K-F v Germany (1998) 26 EHRR 390 97/92

[Application lodged 14.12.1993; Commission report 10.9.1996; Court Judgment 27.11.1997]

Mr K-F was a lawyer. In May 1991, he and his wife rented a holiday flat and paid for their stay in May. On 3 July 1991, the landlady of the flat, Mrs S, asked for payment of rent arrears, including telephone calls. On 4 July, Mrs S telephoned the police station and reported that Mr and Mrs K-F had caused a car accident and that they were about to make off without paying the rent they owed. Police officers went to the flat and took statements. After making further inquiries, the police officers discovered that the address of the applicant and his wife was a Post Office box and that the applicant had previously been under investigation for fraud. Mr and Mrs K-F were arrested at 9.45 pm and taken to the police station so that their identities could be checked. The questioning ended at 12.45 am. After inquiries had been made, they were released at 10.30 am. Criminal proceedings were discontinued against them in September 1991. Their subsequent complaints against the police officers and public prosecutors concerning their arrest and detention on 4 and 5 July 1991 were dismissed. The applicant complained that his arrest and subsequent detention were unlawful as he had not committed any criminal offence and disputes over rent belonged in the realm of civil law.

Court dismissed by majority (7–2) Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously V 5(1)(c).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt (jpd/pc), Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr B Repik, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr U Lôhmus (jpd/pc).

The purpose of A 26 was to afford the Contracting States the opportunity of preventing or putting right the violations alleged against them before those allegations were submitted to the Convention institutions. Thus, the complaint to be submitted to the Commission must first have been made to the appropriate national courts, at least in substance, in accordance with the formal requirements of domestic law and within the prescribed time limits. However, the only remedies that had to be exhausted were those that were effective and capable of redressing the alleged violation and A 26 also had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism. The applicant raised his complaints under A 5(1) in substance in the German courts. The remedy he used (criminal proceedings) was effective and adequate to deal with his complaint. The preliminary objection was therefore dismissed.

The reasonableness of the suspicion on which an arrest had to be based formed an essential part of the safeguard against arbitrary arrest and detention which was laid down in A 5(1)(c). Having a 'reasonable suspicion' presupposed the existence of facts or information which would satisfy an objective observer that the person concerned might have committed the offence. However, facts which raised a suspicion did not have to be of the same level as those necessary to justify a conviction or even the bringing of a charge, which would come at a later stage of the process of criminal investigation. The Court could follow the reasoning of the Koblenz Court of Appeal, which held that the police officers' suspicions of rent fraud and the danger that Mr K-F would abscond were justified. Consequently, the applicant was detained on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence, within the meaning of A 5(1)(c). The fact that the applicant was neither charged nor brought before a court did not necessarily mean that the purpose of his detention was not in accordance with A 5(1)(c). The existence of such a purpose had to be considered independently of its achievement and sub-para (c) of A 5(1) did not presuppose that the police should have obtained sufficient evidence to bring charges, either at the point of arrest or while the applicant was in custody. There was nothing to suggest that the police inquiries were not conducted in good faith or that the applicant's arrest and detention, which were decided after consultation of the public prosecutor's office, were effected for a purpose other than to complete the inquiries by checking the identity of the applicant and investigating the allegations made against him. The deprivation of liberty pursued the purpose indicated in para 1(c). The Court saw no reason to come to a different conclusion from the Court of Appeal which found that the applicant's arrest and detention were lawful. The police continued to make inquiries throughout the night and up until the applicant's release, partly in order to check whether an arrest warrant had been issued against him. Having regard to those circumstances, the Court concluded that the applicant's detention from 9.45 pm on 4 July to 9.45 am the following day was justifiable. However, the length of time the applicant spent in detention exceeded the legal maximum of 12 hours laid down by the Code of Criminal Procedure. The list of exceptions to the right to liberty secured in A 5(1) was an exhaustive one and only a narrow interpretation of those exceptions was consistent with the aim of that provision, namely, to ensure that no one was arbitrarily deprived of his or her liberty. Since the maximum period of detention was known in advance, it was laid down by law and was absolute, the authorities responsible for the detention were under a duty to take all necessary precautions to ensure that the permitted duration was not exceeded. That applied also to the recording of the applicant's personal details, which should have been carried out during the period of detention allotted for that purpose. As that maximum period laid down by law for detaining the applicant was exceeded, there had been a breach of A 5(1)(c).

No causal link between violation and pecuniary damage. Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage, costs and expenses (DM 10,000).

Kadubec v Slovakia 98/74

[Application lodged 14.10.1994; Commission report 30.10.1997; Court Judgment 2.9.1998]

Mr Jaroslav Kadubec, the applicant, was found by a local office on 30 November 1993 to have committed a minor offence against public order under the 1990 Minor Offences Act in that he had disturbed boarders in the spa establishment by his noisy behaviour and refused to obey police officers. He was fined SKK 1,000 and ordered to pay SKK 150 costs. He appealed to the district office, complaining that his case had not been examined properly and that he was prevented from defending himself since the decision of the local office had been taken in his absence. He also requested that a witness be heard. His appeal was dismissed. He appealed to the Constitutional Court. On 25 May 1994, the Constitutional Court dismissed the applicant's complaint because of his failure to instruct a lawyer to represent him in the proceedings, as required by the Constitutional Court Act. He complained, inter alia, that his case had not been examined by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law and that he was deprived of the right to defend himself through legal assistance.

In order to determine whether an offence qualified as 'criminal', regard had to be had first to the classification of the offence in national law, secondly, to the nature of the offence and finally, the nature and degree of severity of the penalty that the person concerned risked incurring. It was not disputed that the minor offence of which the applicant was convicted was not characterised under domestic law as 'criminal'. However, the domestic law had only a relative value. The second and third criteria were alternative and not cumulative. That did not exclude the possibility of a cumulative approach being adopted where the separate analysis of each criterion did not make it possible to reach a clear conclusion as to the existence of a 'criminal charge'. The applicant was convicted under the Minor Offences Act, which regulated minor offences against public order. The legal rule infringed by him was directed towards all citizens and not towards a given group possessing a special status. The general character of the legal rule referred to the fact that all citizens had to ensure respect for legal rules and the rights of other citizens and defined a minor offence as a wrongful act which interfered with or caused danger to the public interest. The sentence of a fine was intended as a punishment to deter reoffending. It had a punitive character, which was the customary distinguishing feature of criminal penalties. The fact that the commission of the offence was not punishable by imprisonment and was not entered on the criminal record were not decisive of the classification of the offence for the purpose of the applicability of A 6(1). The general character of the legal provision infringed by the applicant together with the deterrent and punitive purpose of the penalty imposed on him, sufficed to show that the offence in question was, in terms of A 6, criminal in nature. Accordingly, there was no need to examine it also in the light of the third criterion. The relative lack of seriousness of the penalty at stake could not deprive an offence of its inherently criminal character. A 6(1) was therefore applicable.

In order to determine whether a body could be considered to be 'independent' of the executive it was necessary to have regard to the manner of appointment of its members and the duration of their term of office, the existence of guarantees against outside pressures and the question whether the body presented an appearance of independence. The local office and district office were charged with carrying out local State administration under the control of the government. The appointment of the heads of those bodies was controlled by the executive and their officers, whose employment contracts were governed by the provisions of the Labour Code, had the status of salaried employees. Therefore, the manner of appointment of the officers of the local and district offices together with the lack of any guarantees against outside pressures and any appearance of independence clearly showed that those bodies could not be considered to be 'independent' of the executive within the meaning of A 6(1). While entrusting the prosecution and punishment of minor offences to administrative authorities was not inconsistent with the Convention, it was to be stressed that the person concerned had to have an opportunity to challenge any decision made against him before a tribunal that offered the guarantees of A 6. In the present case, however, the applicant was unable to have the decisions of the local and district offices reviewed by an independent and impartial tribunal. There had therefore been an infringement of the applicant's right to a hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.

The guarantees provided by A 6(3)(c) developed the notion of a fair trial laid down in A 6(1). In view of the examination of the issues arising under A 6(1) and the conclusion concerning the violation of that provision, it was unnecessary to examine this complaint.

The requirements of A 13 were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6. Accordingly, having regard to the conclusion under A 6, the Court did not consider it necessary also to examine the case under A 13.

Mr Faruk Kalaç was judge advocate in the air force. In 1990 he was serving with the rank of group captain, as the high command's director of legal affairs. By an order of 1 August 1990, the Supreme Military Council ordered the compulsory retirement of three officers, including the applicant, and 28 non-commissioned officers for breaches of discipline and scandalous conduct. The decision, which was based on the Military Personnel Act, Military Legal Service Act and Regulations on assessment of officers and non-commissioned officers, made the specific criticism, in the applicant's case, that his conduct and attitude 'revealed that he had adopted unlawful fundamentalist opinions'. On 21 September 1990, the applicant asked the Supreme Administrative Court of the Armed Forces to set aside the order. In a judgment of 30 May 1991, the Supreme Administrative Court of the Armed Forces ruled that it did not have jurisdiction to entertain the application to set aside the order, on the ground that under A 125 of the Constitution, the decisions of the Supreme Military Council were final and not subject to judicial review. The applicant complained that he had been removed from his post as judge advocate on account of his religious convictions.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found NV 9.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr I Foighel, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr D Gotchev.

The applicant's fresh complaint under A 6(1) lay outside the compass of the case as delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility and as it was not dealt with either in that decision or in the Commission's report, it could not be considered by the Court.

The objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies had to be dismissed because, under the Constitution, and as the Supreme Administrative Court of the Armed Forces held in its judgment of 30 May 1991, the Supreme Military Council's decision against the applicant was not subject to judicial review.

While religious freedom was primarily a matter of individual conscience, it also implied, inter alia, freedom to manifest one's religion not only in community with others, in public and within the circle of those whose faith one shared, but also alone and in private. A 9 listed a number of forms which manifestation of one's religion or belief might take, namely worship, teaching, practice and observance. Nevertheless, A 9 did not protect every act motivated or inspired by a religion or belief. Moreover, in exercising his freedom to manifest his religion, an individual might need to take his specific situation into account. In choosing to pursue a military career, the applicant was accepting of his own accord a system of military discipline that by its very nature implied the possibility of placing on certain of the rights and freedoms of members of the armed forces limitations incapable of being imposed on civilians. States could adopt for their armies disciplinary regulations forbidding certain types of conduct, in particular an attitude inimical to an established order reflecting the requirements of military service. It was not contested that the applicant, within the limits imposed by the requirements of military life, was able to fulfil the obligations which constituted the normal forms through which a Muslim practised his religion. The Supreme Military Council's order was, moreover, not based on the applicant's religious opinions and beliefs or the way he had performed his religious duties, but on his conduct and attitude, which according to the authorities, breached military discipline and infringed the principle of secularism. The applicant's compulsory retirement did not amount to an interference with the right guaranteed by A 9 since it was not prompted by the way he manifested his religion.

Kamasinski v Austria (1991) 13 EHRR 36 89/23

[Application lodged 6.11.1981; Commission report 5.5.1988; Court Judgment 19.12.1989]

Theodore Kamasinski, an American citizen, was arrested in Austria on 4 October 1980 for fraud and misappropriation. He complained about aspects of the proceedings, in particular the inadequacy of legal representation (including non-attendance of lawyer at a hearing, brevity of pre-trial visits to prison, failure to keep him informed of prosecution case and performance at trial) and inadequacy of interpretation facilities. After the trial, he was found guilty and sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment by the Regional Court. He appealed, pleading nullity (based on inadequate representation, insufficiency and inadequacy of interpretation facilities, court failure to allow investigation of bankers, insufficiently reasoned judgment). The Supreme Court refused the applicant leave to appear in person. After a hearing, at which the applicant was represented by Counsel, the Supreme Court dismissed his appeal.

Comm found as regards Regional Court proceedings by majority (11–6) NV 6(3)(a) to be informed, in a language he understood and in detail, of the accusation against him, (14–3) NV 6(3)(b) to have adequate facilities for the preparation of his defence, unanimously NV 6(3)(c) legal assistance, unanimously NV 6(3)(d) to examine witnesses, (15 with 2 abstentions) NV 6(3)(e) to have the assistance of an interpreter, (11–6) NV 6(1) a fair hearing, unanimously NV 6(2), found as regards the Supreme Court unanimously V 6(1) regarding plea of nullity proceedings, (10–1 with 6 abstentions) V 14+6(1) and V 14+6(3)(c) regarding right to defend himself in person, unanimously as regards case as a whole, no separate issue under 13.

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously V 6(1) (on plea of nullity), by majority (6–1) NV 14+6(1) and NV 14+6(3)(c) (on refusal to allow leave to appear), unanimously no other violation of 6 or 6+14 and not necessary to examine 13.

Preliminary objection of non-exhaustion rejected as out of time.

The Court recalled its previous case-law. The Convention was intended to guarantee rights that were practical and effective. Nomination alone did not ensure effective assistance from the lawyer appointed for legal aid purposes. A State could not be held responsible for every shortcoming on the part of a lawyer appointed for legal aid purposes. It followed from the independence of the legal profession that the conduct of the defence was essentially a matter between the defendant and his counsel, whether appointed under a legal aid scheme or privately financed. National authorities were required under A 6(3)(c) to intervene only if a failure by legal aid counsel to provide effective representation was manifest or sufficiently brought to their attention in some other way. There was no indication in the pre-trial stage that the authorities had cause to intervene as concerned the applicant's legal representation. At the trial, the applicant's counsel asked the trial court to discharge him from his functions as defence counsel but his request was refused. However, on the evidence before the Court, the decision at the trial not to discharge defence counsel did not deprive the applicant of the effective assistance of counsel. There had therefore been no breach of A 6(1) and 6(3)(c) in this respect.

The right in A 6(3)(e) to the free assistance of an interpreter applied not only to oral statements made at the trial hearing, but also to documentary material and the pre-trial proceedings. However, it did not require a written translation of all items of written evidence or official documents in the procedure. The interpretation assistance provided had to be such as to enable the defendant to have knowledge of the case against him and to defend himself, notably by being able to put before the court his version of the events. The obligation of the competent authorities was not limited to the appointment of an interpreter but, if put on notice, might also extend to a degree of subsequent control over the adequacy of the interpretation provided. There was no evidence that the requirements of this provision were not met during the pre-trial questioning by the police and the investigating judges. As a result of the oral explanations given to him in English, the applicant had been sufficiently informed of 'the nature and cause of the accusation against him', for the purposes of A 6(3)(a). The absence of a written translation of the indictment neither prevented him from defending himself nor denied him a fair trial. Accordingly, no breach of A 6 in that respect. The interpretation at the trial was not simultaneous, but consecutive and summarising. In particular, questions put to the witnesses were not interpreted. That in itself did not suffice to establish a violation of A 6(3)(d) or 6(3)(e) but was one of the factors to be considered. For the purposes of A 6(3)(d), the applicant had to be identified with his counsel and no liability could be attributed to the respondent State in circumstances where counsel had consented to a witness statement being read. Provisions which allowed civil claimants to be joined to criminal proceedings to recover compensation in the event of conviction were not inconsistent with the principles of a fair trial.

Regarding the nullity proceedings, it was an inherent part of a fair hearing in criminal proceedings that the defendant should be given the opportunity to comment on evidence regarding disputed facts even if they related to procedure rather than the alleged offence. The presiding judge had undertaken the inquiry into the adequacy of interpretation at trial. The Supreme Court failed to observe one of the principal guarantees of judicial procedures, namely, that contending parties should be heard. The right to a fair trial extended to appeal proceedings. However, the personal attendance of the defendant did not take on the same crucial significance for an appeal hearing as for a trial. National authorities enjoyed a margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment in law. Under Austrian law, appeals did not involve retrial of evidence or assessment of guilt or innocence, the applicant had been represented by counsel at the appeal, the Supreme Court did not have power to impose a more severe sentence than that of the first instance court. The decision to refuse leave to appear therefore did not fall outside the State's margin of appreciation. Even if he was in a comparable position to appellants at liberty, the national authorities had good grounds to believe there was objective and reasonable justification for difference in treatment regarding attendance.

The arguments relied on under A 13 were essentially the same as those adduced in the context of A 6. The requirements of A 13 were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6. It was not therefore necessary to examine the case under A 13.

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for A 50. Costs and expenses (USD 5,000).

Kampanis v Greece (1996) 21 EHRR 43 95/23

[Application lodged 7.3.1991; Commission report 11.1.1994; Court Judgment 13.7.1995]

Mr Stamatios Kampanis was a physicist by training. In November 1988, a criminal investigation was opened in connection with alleged offences of misappropriation, fraud and making false statements. He was remanded in custody from 21 December. His applications for release on bail were refused by the Court of Appeal. The Indictment Division heard the application for the prolongation of the applicant's detention on remand in the absence of the applicant. His appeals were dismissed by the Court of Cassation. Following trial, he was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment with a deduction for the period of two years, eleven months and three days he had spent in detention on remand. He complained that his detention on remand was unlawful, had exceeded a 'reasonable time' and that there had been a failure to observe the principle of equality of arms before the Indictment Division of the Court of Appeal, which had infringed his right to take proceedings before the court.

Comm found V 5(4), but only in the proceedings concerning the application for release made on 30 January 1991.

Court found unanimously V 5(4) as regards the proceedings relating to the application for release of 30 January 1991, NV 5(4) as regards the proceedings relating to the application lodged on 18 December 1990 during the committal proceedings and the application for release made on 29 March 1991.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr B Repik, Mr P Kûris.

According to the Court's case-law, the possibility for a prisoner to be heard either in person or, where necessary, through some form of representation featured in certain instances among the fundamental guarantees of procedure applied in matters of deprivation of liberty. That was the case in particular where the prisoner's appearance could be regarded as a means of ensuring respect for equality of arms, one of the main safeguards inherent in judicial proceedings conducted in conformity with the Convention. Regarding the application of 18 December 1990, the applicant requested leave to appear on 18 December 1990, although the prosecutor had been heard on 17 September 1990. As he did not comply with the time limit laid down by the relevant national law on this question, he could not complain of an infringement of the principle of equality of arms in connection with those proceedings. Regarding the application of 30 January 1991, the applicant had lodged his application for leave to appear on 30 January 1991, although the investigation had been closed since 11 June 1990 and the file had been before the Indictment Division since 5 September 1990. The prosecutor essentially represented the interests of society in criminal proceedings. In connection with the application in issue, his task was to suggest to the Indictment Division either that the accused's detention be prolonged or that he be released. The applicant filed a number of applications for release and a number of pleadings in support of them, both during the investigation and even after it had been closed. When he lodged the application in question, the applicant had been in prison for 25 months and 10 days pursuant to three successive orders, each of which fixed a different starting-point for the calculation of his detention on remand. In that application he criticised, inter alia, the incompatibility of the length of his detention with the Constitution and the Convention. In the light of those considerations, to ensure equality of arms it was necessary to give the applicant the opportunity to appear at the same time as the prosecutor so that he could reply to his arguments. As the applicant was not afforded an adequate opportunity to participate in proceedings whose outcome determined whether his detention was to continue or to be terminated, the Greek rules in force at the material time, as applied in the instant case, did not satisfy the requirements of A 5(4). Regarding the application of 29 March 1991, the Indictment Division of the Court of Appeal gave the applicant and his lawyer leave to appear before it on 16 April 1991 while the prosecutor was present and gave them until 23 April to file further observations. No breach of A 5(4) had been established.

[Application lodged 30.9.1993; Commission report 9.3.1994; Court Judgment 26.8.1994]

Mr Mustafa Karakaya, the applicant, was a haemophiliac. He had numerous blood transfusions and became infected with the HIV virus. On 29 December 1989, the applicant submitted a preliminary claim for compensation to the Minister for Solidarity, Health and Social Protection, maintaining that he had been infected as a result of the Minister's negligent delay in implementing appropriate rules for the supply of blood products. His claim was rejected and he appealed. On 2 March 1994, the Administrative Court delivered a judgment finding for the applicant. The judgment was served on the applicant on 5 April 1994. Earlier, in April 1992, the applicant submitted a claim to the Compensation Fund set up by statute. In May 1992, the Fund offered him monetary compensation, which he accepted. The applicant alleged that his case had not been heard within a reasonable time as required by A 6(1).

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court held unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek.

It was not disputed that A 6(1) was applicable. The period to be taken into consideration began on 29 December 1989, when the applicant lodged his preliminary claim for compensation with the Minister for Solidarity, Health and Social Protection, and ended on 5 April 1994, when the Paris Administrative Court's judgment was served: a period of four years and three months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances and having regard to the criteria laid down in case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties and what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation. Even if the case was of some complexity, the information needed to determine the State's liability had been available for a long time. The establishment of a special fund, however laudable, did not have the effect of speeding up either main or supplementary proceedings in the courts dealing with applications from infected persons. Despite the Fund's award of money in June 1992 and February 1993, when a reasonable time had already been exceeded, what was at stake in the proceedings in the administrative courts remained of great importance both in non-pecuniary terms and in terms of additional compensation. What was at stake in the proceedings in issue was of crucial importance to the applicant in view of his incurable disease and his limited life expectancy. He was infected in 1984 and was classified in 1992 as having reached the last but one stage of infection. Exceptional expedition was called for in this instance, notwithstanding the number of cases which were pending, in particular as the facts of the controversy had been known to the Government for several years and its seriousness must have been obvious to them. The Administrative Court did not use its powers to expedite the proceedings, although it was aware of case-law and of the applicant's state of health. Several periods were abnormally long: the 22 months between the application to the Versailles Administrative Court and the first hearing; the year between the first and second interlocutory judgments; the four months taken to serve the judgment of 22 April 1992; and the five months taken to serve the judgment of 14 April 1993. A period of more than four years to obtain a judgment in first instance proceedings far exceeded a reasonable time in a case of this nature. Such a reasonable time had been exceeded even before the applicant was paid compensation by the Fund in June 1992 and February 1993. After the latter date, what was at stake in the proceedings, in both pecuniary and non-pecuniary terms, continued to be of great importance to the applicant. There had been a violation of A 6(1).

Karatas v Turkey 99/33

[Application lodged 27.8.1993; Commission report 11.12.1997; Court Judgment 8.7.1999]

Mr Hüseyin Karatas, a Kurdish Turk, worked as a psychologist. In November 1991, he published an anthology of poems in Istanbul. On 8 January 1992, the Public Prosecutor accused the applicant and his publisher of disseminating propaganda against the 'indivisible unity of the State'. On 22 February 1993, the National Security Court, composed of three judges, including a military judge, found the applicant guilty of the offences charged and sentenced him to one year, eight months' imprisonment and a fine of TRL 41,666,666. It also ordered confiscation of the publications concerned. The Court of Cassation dismissed his appeal on 1 July 1993. On 30 October 1995, a new law came into force which, inter alia, reduced the length of prison sentences that could be imposed while increasing the level of fines. Consequently, the National Security Court reviewed the applicant's case on the merits. In a judgment of 19 April 1996, it reduced the applicant's prison sentence to one year, one month and ten days but increased the fine to TRL 111,111,110. On an appeal by the applicant, the Court of Cassation upheld that decision on 1 December 1997. He complained that he had been denied a fair trial and that his conviction violated A 9 and 10.

Before the Court, the applicant raised a new complaint under A 7. As he did not raise that complaint at the admissibility stage of the procedure before the Commission, the Court had no jurisdiction to examine it.

The applicant's conviction amounted to an interference with the exercise of his right to freedom of expression. Such an interference breached A 10 unless it satisfied the requirements of the second paragraph of A 10. Since the applicant's conviction was based on s 8 of the Law No 3713, the interference could be regarded as prescribed by law. Having regard to the sensitivity of the security situation in south-east Turkey and to the need for the authorities to be alert to acts capable of fuelling additional violence, the measures taken against the applicant could be said to have been in furtherance of certain of the aims of protection of national security and territorial integrity and the prevention of disorder and crime. The Court recalled its previous case-law. A 10 included freedom of artistic expression, which afforded the opportunity to take part in the public exchange of cultural, political and social information and ideas of all kinds In the present case, the poems had an obvious political dimension. There was little scope under A 10(2) for restrictions on political speech or on debate on matters of public interest. The applicant was a private individual who expressed his views through poetry rather than through the mass media, a fact which limited their potential impact on national security, public order and territorial integrity to a substantial degree. Thus, even though some of the passages from the poems appeared very aggressive in tone and to call for the use of violence, the Court considered that the fact that they were artistic in nature and of limited impact made them less a call to an uprising than an expression of deep distress in the face of a difficult political situation. The applicant was convicted by the Ankara National Security Court not so much for having incited violence, but rather for having disseminated separatist propaganda by referring to a particular region of Turkey as 'Kurdistan' and for having glorified the insurrectionary movements in that region. The Court was struck by the severity of the penalty imposed on the applicant and the persistence of the prosecution's efforts to secure his conviction. The nature and severity of penalties imposed were factors to be taken into account when assessing the proportionality of the interference. The applicant's conviction was disproportionate to the aims pursued and accordingly not necessary in a democratic society. There had therefore been a violation of A 10 of the Convention.

The Court recalled its previous judgments where it had found that the status of military judges sitting as members of National Security Courts did provide some guarantees of independence and impartiality. However, certain aspects of those judges' status made their independence and impartiality questionable: for example, the fact that they were servicemen who still belonged to the army, which in turn took its orders from the executive; the fact that they remained subject to military discipline; and the fact that decisions pertaining to their appointment were to a great extent taken by the administrative authorities and the army. It was understandable that the applicant, prosecuted in a National Security Court for disseminating propaganda aimed at undermining the territorial integrity of the State and national unity, should have been apprehensive about being tried by a bench which included a regular army officer, who was a member of the Military Legal Service. On that account, he could legitimately fear that the Istanbul National Security Court might allow itself to be unduly influenced by considerations which had nothing to do with the nature of the case. In other words, the applicant's fears as to that court's lack of independence and impartiality could be regarded as objectively justified. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation were not able to dispel these fears since that court did not have full jurisdiction. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 11.8.1987; Commission report 14.1.1993; Court Judgment 18.7.1994]

Mr Karlheinz Schmidt was a German national resident in Baden-Württemberg. He was required by the municipal authorities pay a fire service levy of DM 75 for 1982 under the Land Fire Brigades Act, which required all male adults residing in the area to pay the contribution. The applicant's appeal to the administrative authority of the district of Lake Constance was rejected. His subsequent appeals to the Administrative Court, the Administrative Appeals Court, Federal Administrative Court and the Federal Constitutional Court were all rejected. He complained of a breach of the principle of sexual equality in so far as in the Land of Baden-Württemberg, only men were subject to the obligation to serve as firemen or pay a financial contribution.

A 14 complemented the other substantive provisions of the Convention and the Protocols. It had no independent existence since it had effect solely in relation to 'the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms' safeguarded by those provisions. Although the application of A 14 did not presuppose a breach of those provisions, there could be no room for its application unless the facts at issue fell within the ambit of one or more of the latter. A 4(3) was not intended to 'limit' the exercise of the right guaranteed by A 4(2), but to 'delimit' the very content of that right, for it formed a whole with para 2 and indicated what the term 'forced or compulsory labour' should not include. That being so, A 4(3) served as an aid to the interpretation of A 4(2). The four sub-paragraphs of A 4(3), notwithstanding their diversity, were grounded on the governing ideas of the general interest, social solidarity and what was normal in the ordinary course of affairs. The compulsory fire service was one of the 'normal civic obligations' envisaged in A 4(3)(d). The financial contribution which was payable in lieu of service was, according to the Federal Constitutional Court, a 'compensatory charge'. Therefore, on account of its close links with the obligation to serve, the obligation to pay also fell within the scope of A 4(3)(d). Therefore, A14 and 4(3)(d) was applicable.

Under A 14, a difference of treatment was discriminatory if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. Moreover, the Contracting States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment. However, very weighty reasons would have to be put forward before the Court could regard a difference of treatment based exclusively on the ground of sex as compatible with the Convention. Some German Länder did not impose different obligations for the two sexes in this field, and even in Baden-Württemberg, women were accepted for voluntary service in the fire brigade. Irrespective of whether or not there could nowadays exist any justification for treating men and women differently as regards compulsory service in the fire brigade, what was finally decisive in the present case was that the obligation to perform such service was exclusively one of law and theory. In view of the continuing existence of a sufficient number of volunteers, no male person was in practice obliged to serve in a fire brigade. The financial contribution had, not in law but in fact, lost its compensatory character and had become the only effective duty. In the imposition of a financial burden such as this, a difference of treatment on the ground of sex could not be justified. There had accordingly been a violation of A 14 and 4(3)(d).

In view of the above conclusions, it was not necessary to examine the complaint under 14 and P1A1.

Katikaridis and Others v Greece 96/47

On 28 July 1981, the State expropriated part of each of the properties belonging to the applicants for the purpose of constructing a flyover. Law No 653/1977 created a presumption that the owners of properties on major roads benefit when such roads were widened and provided that they had to contribute accordingly to the cost of any expropriation. The first two applicants, Mr Savvas Katikaridis and Mr Nicolaos Katikaridis, sold car tyres from their premises; the third applicant, Mr Tormanidis, owned a service station, and the fourth applicant, Agrotikes Syneteristikes Ekdosis was a publishing and printing firm, they all had some of their property expropriated. By a judgment of 8 December 1983, the Salonika Court of Appeal determined the final amount for compensation calculations. Because of the legal presumption operating, the State did not compensate the applicants for a 15 metre wide area. On 20 July 1984, the applicants applied to the Salonika Court of First Instance seeking payment of the compensation. On 27 June 1985, the court dismissed the claim. Their appeal to the Salonika Court of Appeal was successful. On 30 September 1987, the State lodged an appeal on points of law. The Third Division of the Court of Cassation referred the case to the Fourth Division of the Court of Cassation and eventually the case was considered by the full Court of Cassation (32 judges), which gave judgment on 6 June 1991. Although the case was subsequently sent back to the Fourth Division so that it could rule on the merits of the applicants' action, the applicants did not resume the proceedings as the action was bound to fail after the Court of Cassation's judgment. The applicants complained about the length of the proceedings and that the presumption created by the law and the fact that the Court of Cassation had held that it was an irrebuttable one had prevented them from obtaining in the courts the compensation to which they were entitled by virtue of a final court decision following the expropriation of part of their properties.

A 26 had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism. It was sufficient that the complaints intended to be made subsequently before the Convention organs should have been raised at least in substance and in compliance with the formal requirements and time limits laid down in domestic law. In addition, the only remedies A 26 required to be exhausted were those that were available and sufficient and related to the breaches alleged. In the proceedings before the full court of the Court of Cassation, the applicants expressly referred to A 6 and P1A1. The proceedings before the Fourth Division of the Court of Cassation would have had no prospect of success after the full court's judgment of 6 June 1991. Therefore, the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was dismissed.

A 6: The relevant period began on 20 November 1985, when the declaration whereby Greece accepted the right of individual petition took effect. The proceedings ended on 6 June 1991, when the full court of the Court of Cassation delivered its judgment. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. The proceedings in the Salonika Court of First Instance and the Salonika Court of Appeal were not open to criticism. The length of proceedings in the Court of Cassation of just over three years resulted from the fact that the matter came before three differently composed benches of the court in succession and was explained by the conflict between the judgments delivered by the Third and Fourth Divisions, which the full court had to resolve. Having regard to the circumstances of the case, and especially its complexity, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

The applicants had been deprived of their property in accordance with the provisions of legislation, so that improvements could be made to a major road, the expropriation therefore pursued a lawful aim in the public interest. When compensation due to the owners of properties expropriated for roadworks to be carried out was being assessed, it was legitimate to take into account the benefit derived from the works by adjoining owners. In the system applied in the present case, the compensation was in every case reduced by an amount equal to the value of an area 15 metres wide, without the owners concerned being allowed to argue that in reality, the effect of the works concerned either had been of no or less benefit to them or had caused them to sustain varying degrees of loss. That system, which was too inflexible, took no account of the diversity of situations, ignored the differences due in particular to the nature of the works, and the layout of the site was manifestly without reasonable foundation. In the case of a large number of owners, it necessarily upset the fair balance between the protection of the right to property and the requirements of the general interest. In the present case, the applicants had had to bear an individual and excessive burden which could have been rendered legitimate only if they had had the possibility of obtaining payment of the compensation in question. There had therefore been a violation of P1A1.

[Application lodged 10.11.1986; Commission report 6.4.1993; Court Judgment 27.10.1994]

Mr Adolfo Katte Klitsche de la Grange, the applicant, was a lawyer who lived in Rome until his death on 31 December 1989. His widow, Mrs Cocchi, and her two sons continued the proceedings. The applicant owned a large portion of Cibona Park, consisting of woodland, arable land, unproductive land and grassland. On 9 July 1966, Tolfa District Council unanimously approved a plan for the development of the park. On 28 June 1969, the District Council adopted a land-use plan, which excluded part of the applicant's land from the area intended for 'residential construction'. The applicant appealed to the Lazio Regional Administrative Court, which on 14 July 1976 annulled the plan in respect of the applicant's property. On an appeal by Tolfa District Council, the Consiglio di Stato upheld the lower court's decision by a judgment of 14 February 1978. Further proceedings were commenced for the enforcement of the judgment of July 1976 of the Regional Administrative Court. The applicant also instituted proceedings for compensation for damages deriving from the fact that an unlawful measure, the land-use plan, had unfairly deprived him of the right to build on a part of Cibona Park. The Rome District Court dismissed his action on 1 March 1982 and his appeals to the Court of Appeal and to the Court of Cassation were dismissed. He complained of an interference with his possessions on account of the prohibition on building imposed in respect of his land and the lack of compensation for the damage which he had sustained. He also complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found by majority (8–3) V P1A1, unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found NV P1A1, NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr C Russo, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk.

The only remedies that A 26 required to be exhausted were those that were available and sufficient and related to the breaches alleged. The applicant's complaint did not relate to the Tolfa District Council's refusal to grant him permission to build, but to the restrictions imposed on the exercise of his right of property by the 1969 land-use plan. The remedy relied on by the Government (through the mayor) could not therefore be taken into account. The objection of non-exhaustion was therefore unfounded.

The conclusion of an agreement of the kind in issue in the present case between a private individual and the authorities had no effect on the powers of those authorities in the planning sphere. The mere approval of the land-use plan was sufficient to restrict the applicant's exercise of his right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. The dispute fell to be dealt with under the first sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1, since it did not involve a deprivation of property within the meaning of the second sentence of the first paragraph or control of the use of property as envisaged in the second paragraph. There had been an interference with the applicant's right of ownership. The development agreement was valid again following the court proceedings and the applicant could have applied to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, Forestry and the Upland Economy for the authorisations necessary to continue with the housing scheme as the District Council had not sought a stay of execution in its notice of appeal to the Consiglio di Stato. The applicant did not take the appropriate steps he could have taken once the plan had been annulled by the Regional Administrative Court. There was never an absolute prohibition on building on all the applicant's land. The applicant's property had not been the subject of a de facto expropriation and he could not therefore claim compensation for violation of a right. The balance between the interests of the community and those of the applicant was not upset. There had been no breach of P1A1.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 9 May 1978 when the applicant instituted proceedings against the Tolfa District Council and the Lazio Regional Authority in the Rome District Court and ended on 13 May 1986, the date on which the Court of Cassation's judgment was deposited with the registry, a little over eight years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined in the light of the circumstances of the case and with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. The case was complex as regards both the facts and the law. In requiring cases to be heard within a reasonable time, the Convention underlined the importance of administering justice without delays which might jeopardise its effectiveness and credibility. Although there were three periods which appeared abnormal, having regard to all the circumstances of the case and the complexity of the facts and the legal issues involved, those periods did not warrant the conclusion that the length of the proceedings was excessive, in particular since the decisions, which concerned such a sensitive area as town planning and the protection of the environment, had important repercussions on the Italian case-law concerning the distinction between a right and a legitimate interest. There had not been a violation of A 6 (1).

Kaya v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 1 98/11

Mr Mehmet Kaya, was a farmer living in the south-eastern Turkey. His brother, Mr Abdülmenaf Kaya, who also lived and farmed in the same area before his death, was killed on 25 March 1993 in the vicinity of the village in circumstances which were disputed. The application was lodged by the applicant on his own behalf and on behalf of his deceased brother and the widow and seven children of the deceased. The applicant alleged that his brother was deliberately killed by the security forces on 25 March 1993. The Government contended that Mr Abdülmenaf Kaya was killed in a gun battle between members of the security forces and a group of terrorists who had engaged the security forces on the day in question. They claimed that the applicant's brother was among the assailants. The applicant complained that his brother was unlawfully killed by the security forces on 25 March 1993 and that the circumstances surrounding his killing had not been adequately investigated by the authorities.

Comm found by majority (27–3) V 2 on account of the inadequacy of the investigation conducted by the authorities into the death of the applicant's brother, unanimously NV 3, by majority (27–3) V 6, (28–2) no separate issue arose under 13, unanimously NV 14.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr C Russo, Mr J M Morenilla, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits, Mr J Casadevall.

The Government's challenge was not raised at the admissibility stage, or even at any subsequent stage of the proceedings before the Commission, therefore they were estopped from disputing before the Court either the validity of the applicant's application to the Commission or his standing as an applicant. The Government's preliminary objection was accordingly dismissed.

The Court was confronted with fundamentally divergent accounts of how the applicant's brother died. The establishment and verification of the facts were primarily a matter for the Commission. There were no exceptional circumstances which would compel it to reach a conclusion different from that of the Commission. The Commission's fact-finding was considerably impaired on account of the failure of the applicant and eyewitnesses to testify before the delegates. Having regard to the Commission's fact-finding and to its own careful examination of the evidence, the Court considered that there was an insufficient factual and evidentiary basis on which to conclude that the applicant's brother was, beyond reasonable doubt, intentionally killed by the security forces in the circumstances alleged by the applicant.

The general legal prohibition on arbitrary killing by agents of the State contained in A 2 would be ineffective, in practice, if there existed no procedure for reviewing the lawfulness of the use of lethal force by State authorities. The obligation to protect the right to life required by implication that there should be some form of effective official investigation when individuals had been killed as a result of the use of force by, inter alios, agents of the State. The present case was not a clear-cut case of lawful killing by the security forces so that the authorities were dispensed from having to comply with anything other than minimum formalities. The official account of the events was impaired through the absence of corroborating evidence. The minimum formalities relied on by the Government were in themselves seriously deficient even for the purposes of an alleged open and shut case of justified killing by members of the security forces. The investigation, autopsy report, on-the-spot post-mortem and forensic examination were not adequate. The public prosecutor proceeded on the basis that the deceased was a terrorist killed in an armed clash with the security forces and that was never tested against any other evidence. Neither the prevalence of violent armed clashes nor the high incidence of fatalities could displace the obligation under A 2 to ensure that an effective, independent investigation was conducted into deaths arising out of clashes involving the security forces, more so in cases such as the present where the circumstances were in many respects unclear. The authorities failed to carry out an effective investigation into the circumstances surrounding the death of the applicant's brother. There had accordingly been a violation of A 2 in that respect.

It was not necessary to examine the complaint of an alleged lack of protection in domestic law of the right to life having regard to the finding that the authorities were in breach of A 2 on account of their failure to carry out an effective investigation into the killing of the applicant's brother.

A 6(1) applied to a civil claim for compensation by the near relatives of a person who had been killed by agents of the State. The applicant did not at any stage pursue a compensation claim before a civil or administrative court. It was not possible for the Court to determine whether the domestic courts would have been able to adjudicate on the applicant's claim had he, for example, brought a tort action against individual members of the security forces. The complaint under A 6(1) was inextricably bound up with the more general complaint concerning the manner in which the investigating authorities treated the death of his brother and the repercussions which this had on access to effective remedies which would help redress the grievances which he and the deceased's family harboured as a result of the killing and accordingly it was appropriate to examine it under A 13.

Where relatives had an arguable claim that the victim had been unlawfully killed by agents of the State, the notion of an effective remedy for the purposes of A 13 entailed, in addition to the payment of compensation where appropriate, a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible and including effective access for the relatives to the investigatory procedure. Seen in those terms the requirements of A 13 were broader than a Contracting State's procedural obligation under A 2 to conduct an effective investigation. In the case at issue, the relatives had arguable grounds for claiming that Abdülmenaf

Kaya was unlawfully killed by the security forces. The Court had concluded that it had not been established beyond reasonable doubt that the deceased was indeed unlawfully killed. Nevertheless, the fact that the applicant's allegations were not ultimately substantiated did not prevent his claim from being an arguable one for the purposes of A 13 of the Convention. Accordingly, the Court's conclusion on the merits did not dispense with the requirement to conduct an effective investigation into the substance of the allegation. There were serious deficiencies of the autopsy and forensic examination conducted at the scene as well as a failure of the investigating authorities to consider seriously any alternative options which may have explained the death. Having regard to the absence of any effective investigation into the circumstances of the killing, it had to be concluded that the applicant and the next-of-kin were on that account denied an effective remedy against the authorities in respect of the death of Abdülmenaf Kaya, in violation of A 13, and thereby access to any other available remedies at their disposal, including a claim for compensation. There had accordingly been a breach of A 13.

The applicant had not produced any evidence which could ground a violation under A 14.

The evidence assembled by the Commission was insufficient to allow the Court to reach a conclusion on the existence of any administrative practice of the violation of any of the Articles relied on by the applicant.

Kaya, Mahmut v Turkey 00/110

[Application lodged 13.8.1993; Court Judgment 28.3.2000]

Dr Hasan Kaya, the applicant's brother, practised medicine in south-east Turkey. His friend Metin Can was a lawyer and President of a Human Rights Association, also in the south-east. In February 1993, they had gone to see and treat a wounded member of the PKK and failed to return. A few days later they were found dead. Their hands had been bound and they had been shot in the head. They had previously said that they believed they were under surveillance and that their lives were at risk. The applicant's father lodged several petitions with the public prosecutor. Unsuccessful attempts were made to apprehend the suspects and the file was transferred on several occasions to different prosecutors on jurisdictional grounds.

Court found by majority (6–1) V 2 regarding failure to protect life, unanimously V 2 regarding failure to conduct an effective investigation, by majority (6–1) V 3, V 13, unanimously not necessary to A 14.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr J Casadevall, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr R Maruste, Mr F Gölcüklü (pd), ad hoc judge.

The Court accepted the facts as established by the Commission. In the present case it had not been established beyond reasonable doubt that any State agent was involved in the killing of Hasan Kaya; however, from the circumstances of the case, strong inferences could be drawn that the perpetrators of the murder were known to the authorities. The question to be determined was whether in the circumstances, the authorities failed in a positive obligation to protect Hasan Kaya from a risk to his life. At the time, there were rumours of contra-guerrilla elements and a significant number of 'unknown perpetrator killings'. Hasan Kaya, as a doctor suspected of aiding and abetting the PKK, was at this time at particular risk, real and immediate, of falling victim to an unlawful attack. With regard to whether the authorities did all that could be reasonably expected of them to avoid the risk to him, there was a framework of law in place with the aim of protecting life, but the implementation of the criminal law in the south-east disclosed particular characteristics which undermined the effectiveness of the criminal law protection (such as transfer of jurisdiction to administrative councils, failure to investigate incidents). That permitted or fostered a lack of accountability of members of the security forces for their actions which was not compatible with the rule of law in a democratic society respecting the fundamental rights and freedoms guaranteed under the Convention. Consequently, those defects removed the protection which Hasan Kaya should have received by law. A wide range of preventive measures would have been available to the authorities regarding the activities of their own security forces and those groups allegedly acting under their auspices or with their knowledge. In the circumstances of the case, the authorities failed to take reasonable measures available to them to prevent a real and immediate risk to the life of Hasan Kaya. There had accordingly been a violation of A 2.

The obligation to protect life under A 2 read in conjunction with the State's general duty under A 1 required by implication that there should be some form of effective official investigation when individuals had been killed as a result of the use of force. Regarding the investigation in the present case, the file had changed hands four times, the first autopsy was cursory and the second incomplete, there was no forensic examination of the scene or report regarding how the victims were transported. The steps taken by the public prosecutors were often limited and superficial, the investigation was also dilatory, there were significant delays in seeking statements and there were periods of apparent inactivity. Where there were serious allegations of misconduct and infliction of unlawful harm implicating state security officers, it was incumbent on the authorities to respond actively and with reasonable expedition. The Court was not satisfied that the investigation was adequate or effective. It failed to establish significant elements of the incident or clarify what happened to the two men and had not been conducted with the diligence and determination necessary for there to be any realistic prospect of the identification and apprehension of the perpetrators. It had remained from the early stages within the jurisdiction of the State Security Court prosecutors who investigate primarily terrorist or separatist offences. There had been in this respect a violation of A 2.

The authorities knew, or ought to have known, that Hasan Kaya was at risk of targeting as he was suspected of giving assistance to wounded members of the PKK. The failure to protect his life through specific measures and through the general failings in the criminal law framework placed him in danger not only of extra-judicial execution, but also of ill-treatment from persons who were unaccountable for their actions. It followed that the Government was responsible for ill-treatment suffered by Hasan Kaya after his disappearance and prior to his death. The medical evidence available did not establish that the level of suffering could be regarded as very cruel and severe. However, the binding of Hasan Kaya's wrists with wire in such a manner as to cut the skin and the prolonged exposure of his feet to water or snow, whether caused intentionally or otherwise, could be regarded as inflicting inhuman and degrading treatment under A 3.

Although it had not been found proved beyond reasonable doubt that agents of the State carried out, or were otherwise implicated in, the killing of the applicant's brother, that did not preclude the complaint in relation to A 2 from being an 'arguable' one for the purposes of A 13. The applicant's brother was the victim of an unlawful killing and he could therefore be considered to have an 'arguable claim'. The authorities thus had an obligation to carry out an effective investigation into the circumstances of the killing. No effective criminal investigation had been conducted in accordance with A 13, the requirements of which were broader than the obligation to investigate imposed by A 2, therefore that the applicant had been denied an effective remedy.

Having regard to the findings under A 2 and 3 it was not necessary to determine whether the failings identified in the case were part of a practice adopted by the authorities.

The complaints under A 14 arose out of the same facts considered under A 2, 3 and 13 and it was not necessary to examine them separately.

Keegan v Ireland (1994) 18 EHRR 342 94/18

[Application lodged 1.5.1990; Commission report 17.2.1993; Court Judgment 26.5.1994]

Mr Joseph Keegan, the applicant, and his girlfriend, Miss V, lived together from February 1987 until February 1988. On 14 February 1988, they became engaged to be married and on 22 February 1988, it was confirmed that she was pregnant. Shortly afterwards, the relationship broke down and they ceased cohabiting. On 29 September 1988, V gave birth to a daughter, S, of whom the applicant was the father. On 17 November 1988, V had the child placed by a registered adoption society with prospective adopters and informed the applicant of that in a letter dated 22 November 1988. The applicant instituted proceedings before the Circuit Court which, in May 1989, appointed him guardian and awarded him custody. The decision was upheld by the High Court. V appealed to the Supreme Court, which remitted the case back to the High Court for the case to be decided in light of the former court's interpretation of the law. Following the subsequent proceedings before the High Court, the appeal of the mother was allowed. The applicant complained that there had been a violation of his right to respect for family life in that his child had been placed for adoption without his knowledge or consent and that national law did not afford him a right to be appointed guardian. He further complained of a denial of his right of access to court in that he had no locus standi in the proceedings before the Adoption Board. He also alleged that, as the natural father, he had been discriminated against in the exercise of the above-mentioned rights when his position was compared to that of a married father.

Comm found unanimously V 8, V 6(1), by majority (11–1) not necessary to examine 14+6 or 14+8.

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objections, found V 8, V 6(1), not necessary to examine 14.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr J Blayney, ad hoc judge.

It was not necessary to examine the Government's preliminary objection that the applicant had no locus standi with regard to his daughter's claim as it was no longer pursued by the applicant in view of the adoption order made in respect of his daughter. The claim that the applicant had not appealed to the Supreme Court against the final determination of the guardianship and custody proceedings by the High Court, was not raised before the Commission and therefore the Government was estopped from relying on it. Regarding other failures to appeal or challenge decisions, under Irish law no appeal lay from the decision of the High Court on an appeal from the Circuit Court. The only remedies required to be exhausted were remedies which were effective and capable of redressing the alleged violation. The applicant would have had no prospect of success in making those claims before the courts having regard to the case-law of the Supreme Court, which denied to a natural father any constitutional right to take part in the adoption process. Therefore, the Government's objections based on non-exhaustion of domestic remedies failed.

The notion of the family in A 8 was not confined solely to marriage-based relationships and could encompass other de facto 'family' ties where the parties were living together outside of marriage. A child born out of such a relationship was ipso iure part of that family unit from the moment of his birth and by the very fact of it. There thus existed between the child and his parents a bond amounting to family life even if at the time of his or her birth the parents were no longer cohabiting or if their relationship had then ended. The essential object of A 8 was to protect the individual against arbitrary action by the public authorities. Regard had to be had to the fair balance that had to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole; and in both contexts the State enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation. The fact that Irish law permitted the secret placement of the child for adoption without the applicant's knowledge or consent, leading to the bonding of the child with the proposed adopters and to the subsequent making of an adoption order, amounted to an interference with his right to respect for family life. The decision to place the child for adoption without the father's knowledge or consent was in accordance with Irish law and pursued the legitimate aim of protecting the rights and freedoms of the child. Irish law permitted the applicant's child to have been placed for adoption shortly after her birth without his knowledge or consent. Where a child was placed with alternative carers, he or she may in the course of time establish with them new bonds which it might not be in his or her interests to disturb or interrupt by reversing a previous decision as to care. Such a state of affairs not only jeopardised the proper development of the applicant's ties with the child, but also set in motion a process which was likely to prove to be irreversible, thereby putting the applicant at a significant disadvantage in his contest with the prospective adopters for the custody of the child. The Government had advanced no reasons relevant to the welfare of the applicant's daughter to justify such a departure from the principles that governed respect for family ties. Thus, the interference with the applicant's right to respect for family life could not be found to be necessary in a democratic society. There has thus been a violation of A 8.

The adoption process had to be distinguished from the guardianship and custody proceedings. The applicant had no rights under Irish law to challenge the decision either before the Adoption Board or before the courts, nor did he have any standing in the adoption procedure generally. His only recourse to impede the adoption of his daughter was to bring guardianship and custody proceedings. By the time these proceedings had terminated, the scales concerning the child's welfare had tilted inevitably in favour of the prospective adopters. There had thus been a breach of A 6(1).

Having regard to the findings in respect of A 8 and A 6(1), it was not necessary to examine the complaint under A 14.

Kefalas and Others v Greece (1995) 20 EHRR 484 95/16

[Application lodged 23.8.1987; Commission report 17.1.1994; Court Judgment 8.6.1995]

The applicants were shareholders in Athinaïki Khartopiia, one of the largest Greek paper manufacturers and suppliers. On 30 March 1984, on a request by the National Bank of Greece acting as a creditor, the company was made subject, by a Ministerial order, to the provisions of Law concerning businesses 'in difficulties'. The applicants complained that no court had jurisdiction to determine the question whether the conditions for making Athinaïki Khartopiia subject to the regime for businesses in difficulties had been satisfied and, in particular, whether the company really had large debts. They relied on A 6.

Comm found by majority (10–4) NV 6(1).

Court found unanimously that it could not deal with the merits of the case.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr R Macdonald, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr AB Baka, Mr J Makarczyk.

The Government's preliminary argument was that the applicants' complaint lay outside the Court's jurisdiction ratione temporis because it related to facts that had occurred before 20 November 1985, the date when Greece's acceptance of the right of individual petition had taken effect. The Commission's admissibility decision defined the scope of the case before the Court. Within those bounds, the Court had jurisdiction to consider the complaint referred to it and was not bound by the Commission's interpretation of it. The applicants criticised the impossibility in Greek law of having Ministerial Order No 2544/84 reviewed by a judicial body with full jurisdiction. Even if that impossibility amounted to a breach of A 6, the applicants would have become victims of it on 30 March 1984, when the order in issue was published in the Official Gazette and thereby became binding. However, Greece had not by then recognised the right of individual petition. The facts possibly constituting a breach were therefore covered by the time limitation in Greece's declaration of acceptance. It was not the Supreme Administrative Court's judgment of 13 March 1987 that deprived the applicants of their right of access to a court: it was Greece's legislation which did not afford them such a right at the time when the Ministerial Order was adopted. In duly carrying out its review of lawfulness, the Supreme Administrative Court merely highlighted the aforementioned impossibility.

Mr Michel Kemmache was charged on 16 February 1983 with others with importation of counterfeit money and unlawful circulation of counterfeit banknotes. On 20 February 1986, he was charged with conspiracy to suborn a witness. There were a number of sets of proceedings. On 25 April 1991, the Alpes-Maritimes Assize Court sentenced him to imprisonment and a fine. The applicant filed an appeal, which was still pending. The applicant complained under A 5(3) that he had not been informed promptly of the reasons for his arrest and charge against him in view of the length of his detention on remand, and under A 6(1) that the criminal proceedings had exceeded a reasonable time. He did not challenge the length of the related subornation proceedings.

The periods to be taken into consideration lasted a total of 2 years, 10 months and 10 days. It was for national judicial authorities to ensure that, in a given case, the pre-trial detention of an accused person did not exceed a reasonable time. They had to examine all the circumstances arguing for or against the existence of a genuine requirement of public interest justifying, with due regard to the principle of presumption of innocence, a departure from the rule of respect for individual liberty and set them out in their decisions on the applications for release. It was essentially on the basis of the reasons given in these decisions and of the true facts mentioned by the applicant in his appeals that the Court was called upon to decide whether or not there had been a violation of A 5(3). The first detention lasted approximately six weeks, during which the case was investigated by the judge. The nature of the offences to be investigated and the requirements of the investigation could justify the detention in question. The second detention lasted nearly two years, nine months. The existence and persistence of serious indications of the guilt of the person concerned constitute relevant factors, but they alone could not justify such a long period of pre-trial detention. By reason of their particular gravity and public reaction to them, certain offences could give rise to a social disturbance capable of justifying pre-trial detention, at least for a time. However, that was not the position in the present case. After the investigation into the main offence was concluded by the investigating judge, the risk of pressure on witnesses disappeared and could no longer serve as a justification for detention. With regard to the risk of the applicant's absconding, once that was no longer relied on, the detention could not be justified on that account. Therefore the contested detention infringed A 5(3).

A 6: The period to be taken into consideration began on 16 February 1983, the date on which the applicant was charged, and had not yet ended. It had therefore already lasted more than eight and a half years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. The applicant had caused some delay. Although the subornation proceedings, which were themselves very long, had some effect on the course of the main proceedings, that did not justify the length of the latter proceedings. The Court was not convinced by the argument that a separation of the cases could not be envisaged. Examination of the case-file did not disclose any insurmountable obstacle which would have prevented the trial from being held sooner. A reasonable time under A 6(1) had been exceeded.

[Application lodged 28.12.1990; Commission report 21.10.1993; Court Judgment 24.11.1994]

Mr Michel Kemmache was detained in connection with criminal proceedings. In August 1985, he was committed for trial in the Alpes-Maritimes Assize Court and a delivery into custody order was issued. He had previously been at liberty until he reported to be taken into custody on 11 June 1990. An application for an adjournment was granted by the Assize Court on 12 June 1990. A third defendant chose to be tried immediately and his case was separated from that of the applicant and another accused. The applicant's application for release on the same day was rejected. He complained that his continued detention after the decision to adjourn the proceedings on 12 June 1990 violated A 5(1).

Court found by majority (8–1) NV 5(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 12 June 1990, the date on which the Assize Court ordered the separation of the cases of the applicant and another co-accused from that of a third and adjourned the cases of the former to a subsequent session. The period ended on the date of the applicant's actual release, namely 10 August 1990, when the first instalment of the security was paid, rather than on the day when the Court ordered his release subject to payment of the security. The deprivation of the applicant's liberty had a legal basis in French law. The Convention required that every deprivation should be lawful. Lawfulness implied conformity with the substantive and the procedural rules of domestic law and also with the purpose of A 5, namely to protect individuals from arbitrariness. The decisions of the national courts to keep the applicant in detention did not disclose abuse of authority, nor bad faith, nor arbitrariness. They could not therefore be held to be unlawful, especially in view of the fact that once an Assize Court had adjourned the trial, applications for release could be made to the Indictment Division at any time. Therefore there had been no violation of A 5(1).

Kerojärvi v Finland 95/25

[Application lodged 25.8.1990; Commission report 11.1.1994; Court Judgment 19.7.1995]

Mr Erkki Kerojärvi applied for compensation under the 1948 Military Injuries Act in respect of certain conditions which he claimed resulted from his service in the wars between 1939 and 1945 between Finland and the Soviet Union. The Compensation Office accepted some of his claim, but considered that the degree of his disability was less than 10%, the minimum required to qualify for a life annuity, and therefore refused to grant him the benefit. He appealed to the Insurance Court, which dismissed his request. That decision was upheld by the Supreme Court on 15 December 1987. In January 1988, the applicant asked the Compensation Office to adjust the degree of his disability. The Compensation Office rejected the request on 23 August 1988 on the ground that the applicant had failed to show a fundamental change in the circumstances on the basis of which his disability had initially been assessed. His subsequent appeals to the Insurance Court and Supreme Court were dismissed. He complained about the non-communication of documents in the proceedings before the Supreme Court.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen (c), Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris.

The Court had to ascertain whether there was a dispute over a right which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. The dispute had to be genuine and serious; it could relate not only to the actual existence of a right, but also to its scope and the manner of its exercise; and, finally, the result of the proceedings had to be directly decisive for the right in question. It was not contested by the parties that, with the exception of the last criterion, the above-mentioned conditions for applicability of A 6(1) were fulfilled. The Court found that the outcome of the proceedings in the Supreme Court was directly decisive, for the purposes of A 6(1) for the applicant's asserted right to compensation. Disputes over benefits under a social-security scheme concerned 'civil rights'. A 6(1) therefore applied to the present case.

The manner of application of A 6 to proceedings before courts of appeal depended on the special features of the proceedings involved; account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings in the domestic legal order and of the role of the appellate court therein. The Court lacked jurisdiction ratione temporis to review the proceedings in the Insurance Court (as they had taken place prior to the ratification of the Convention by Finland on 10 May 1990). However, they could be taken into account as background to the issue whether those in the Supreme Court were fair. The Insurance Court had rejected the applicant's claims without transmitting to him the opinion and files which it had obtained from the Compensation Office and the Headquarters of the Military District. Although it was open to the applicant to consult those documents on the case file in the Insurance Court, it was apparently only as a result of their being mentioned in its decision that the applicant was made aware that they had been included in the case file. At the time of the notification of its decision, the Insurance Court had already returned the master and medical files to the Headquarters. The possibility available to the applicant of consulting the documents in the Insurance Court was not of significance for the assessment of the fairness of the proceedings in the Supreme Court. The applicant, who did not have the assistance of a lawyer, would not be aware of the court practice. The Supreme Court, which could consider the merits of the case, did not take any measures to make the documents available to the applicant. The procedure followed before the Supreme Court was not such as to allow proper participation of the applicant. He could not therefore be said to have received a fair trial in the procedure before the Supreme Court.

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Legal fees and expenses (FIM 73,144 less FF 7,350).

Keus v The Netherlands (1991) 13 EHRR 700 90/28

[Application lodged 13.6.1986; Commission report 4.10.1989; Court Judgment 25.10.1990]

Mr Jacobus Keus was sentenced by the District Court of The Hague on 15 December 1981 for murder and attempted armed robberies, to four years' imprisonment, to be followed by two years' placement at the Government's disposal (to receive treatment for mental illness). While he was serving his sentence, he absconded on several occasions. In February 1983, he was placed in a psychiatric clinic from which he absconded regularly. In May 1984, the Ministry of Justice wrote to various authorities informing them that, unless extended, the applicant's placement would come to an end in January 1986. Neither the applicant nor his counsel had any knowledge of the letter. In December 1985, whilst the applicant was absent from the clinic, the Crown Prosecutor requested the District Court of The Hague to extend the applicant's placement by two years. On 7 January 1986, the court granted the extension. The applicant was notified of the decision on 19 January when he telephoned the clinic. After having returned to it, he was held there from 22 February in pursuance of the court's order. The applicant complained that neither he nor his lawyer had been informed of these proceedings and that the District Court had not heard him. He also complained that he had been unable to challenge in the courts the lawfulness of his continued confinement in the psychiatric hospital.

Comm found unanimously opinion V 5(4), NV 5(1), NV 6(1), NV 6(3), no separate examination required under 5(2).

Court found unanimously NV 5(2), by majority (5–4) NV 5(4), unanimously not necessary to examine 6(1) and 6(3).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (jd), President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti (jd), Mr B Walsh, Mr R Bernhardt (jd), Mr A Spielmann (jd), Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel.

The complaints under A 5(1) all related to the proceedings which led to the extension of the contested confinement and it was appropriate, therefore, to examine them under A 5(4).

The applicant, who had absconded, acquired knowledge of the extension of his confinement as soon as he contacted the hospital by telephone, 12 days later, and it was confirmed to him on the date of his return. Accordingly, there was no violation of A 5(2).

There did not appear to exist a national legal rule requiring the authorities to indicate to a person placed at the Government's disposal when his placement would finish, or to inform him when an application to extend his confinement was introduced and of the reasons relied on in support of it. The police were unable to notify the applicant of the summons to appear because he was in hiding following his escape. No rule of Netherlands law required the authorities to do more, and in particular to inform the fugitive's lawyer. The applicant was informed of the decision as soon as possible. The court could not be criticised for failing to comply with the Convention. Constrained by both national law and A 5(4) to give a ruling speedily, it was entitled to take a decision on the extension, as the applicant was a fugitive. Nevertheless, a measure depriving a person of his liberty did not afford the fundamental guarantees against arbitrariness if it was taken following proceedings in which neither the person concerned himself nor a person representing him had participated. Notwithstanding the extension of his placement at the Government's disposal, the applicant therefore retained the right protected by A 5(4) to institute proceedings, on his return to the clinic, in a court to obtain a speedy decision on the lawfulness of his detention. There was an effective remedy to the District Court satisfying the requirements of A 5(4) available to the applicant; whether or not he considered it advisable to have recourse thereto made no difference in that respect.

A 5(5) could not apply as the Court had not found a breach of any other provision of A 5.

The complaints under A 6(1) and 6(3) were withdrawn before the Court, which did not therefore consider it necessary to examine them of its own motion.

Mr Faouzi Khalfaoui, the applicant, was accused of indecently assaulting a patient while he worked as a houseman in a hospital. He was committed for trial and sentenced to imprisonment by the criminal court. The Court of Appeal subsequently upheld his conviction and increased his sentence. The applicant appealed on points of law. The public prosecutor's office of the Court of Appeal informed him that he had a duty to surrender to custody at the latest the day before the appeal hearing in the Court of Cassation listed for 24 September 1996. The applicant who was then in Tunisia requested the Court of Appeal to grant him an exemption, submitting a medical certificate dated 2 September 1996 in support of his application. The medical certificate noted that the appellant required 12 months' sick leave and rest because of a contagious condition. The Court of Appeal dismissed the application for an exemption. In a judgment of 24 September, the Court of Cassation held that the application had forfeited his right to appeal on the ground that he had not surrendered to custody and had not obtained an exemption from the duty to surrender.

Court found by majority (6–1) V 6(1).

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides (d), Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert.

The compatibility of the limitations provided for in domestic law with the right of access to a court depended on the particular features of the proceedings. All the proceedings had to be taken into account; Cassation proceedings were crucial, since they were decisive for the accused. The obligation to surrender to custody could not be justified by the special features of the examination of an appeal on points of law. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation were mainly written and it had not been submitted that the applicant's presence at the hearing was necessary. In view of the importance of the review undertaken by the Court of Cassation in criminal matters and the stakes involved for those sentenced to lengthy custodial sentences, the forfeiture of the right of appeal was a particularly severe penalty in the light of the right of access to a court. Respect for the presumption of innocence, taken together with the suspensive effect of an appeal on points of law, made it wrong to oblige a defendant at liberty to surrender to custody, for however short a period of incarceration. The fact that after his request for an exemption had been dismissed by the Court of Appeal, which had tried and convicted him, he did not surrender, did not imply any waiver on his part as forfeiture was automatic. Waiver of a right guaranteed under the Convention had to be conclusively established. The rejection of the application was not subject to appeal. Thus, the possibility of requesting an exemption from the obligation to surrender was not a factor which made forfeiture less disproportionate.

Khan v United Kingdom 00/148

[Application lodged 1.1.1997; Court Judgment 12.5.2000]

Whilst Mr Sultan Khan, the applicant, visited a friend, B, who was under investigation for dealing in heroin, a conversation in which he admitted to being a party to the importation of drugs was covertly recorded by police. The police had not been expecting the applicant to visit B. The applicant pleaded not guilty to drugs offences, although he admitted that his voice was one of those recorded on the tape. The prosecution admitted that the attachment of the listening device had involved a civil trespass, had occasioned some damage to the property and that without the recording there was no case against the applicant. The trial judge ruled that the evidence was admissible and the applicant pleaded guilty to an alternative charge. He was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. His appeals were dismissed by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords.

Court found unanimously V 8, by majority (6–1) NV 6, unanimously V 13.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr L Loucaides (pc/pd), Mr P Kûris, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

The surveillance carried out by the police amounted to an interference with the applicant's rights under A 8(1). The phrase 'in accordance with the law' not only required compliance with domestic law, but also related to the quality of that law, requiring it to be compatible with the rule of law. In the context of covert surveillance by public authorities, in this instance the police, domestic law had to provide protection against arbitrary interference with an individual's right under A 8. Moreover, the law had to be sufficiently clear in its terms to give individuals an adequate indication as to the circumstances in which and the conditions on which public authorities were entitled to resort to such covert measures. At the time of the events in question, there was no statutory system to regulate the use of covert listening devices and the Home Office Guidelines were neither legally binding nor directly publicly accessible. There was, therefore, no domestic law regulating the use of covert listening devices at the relevant time. The interference could not therefore be considered to be 'in accordance with the law' and, accordingly, there had been a violation of A 8.

While A 6 guaranteed the right to a fair hearing, it did not lay down any rules on the admissibility of evidence, which was therefore primarily a matter for regulation under national law. It was not the role of the Court to determine, as a matter of principle, whether particular types of evidence may be admissible or whether the applicant was guilty or not. The question which had to be answered was whether the proceedings as a whole, including the way in which the evidence was obtained, were fair. That involved an examination of the unlawfulness in question and, where violation of another Convention right was concerned, the nature of the violation found. The fixing of the listening device and the recording of the applicant's conversation were not unlawful in the sense of being contrary to domestic criminal law. The unlawfulness in the case related to the fact that there was no statutory authority for the interference with the applicant's right to respect for private life and that, accordingly, such interference was not in accordance with the law, under A 8(2). The contested material in the case was the only evidence against the applicant and his plea of guilty was tendered only on the basis of the judge's ruling that the evidence should be admitted. However, in the circumstances, where the tape recording was acknowledged to be very strong evidence, and where there was no risk of it being unreliable, the need for supporting evidence was correspondingly weaker. The central question in the present case was whether the proceedings as a whole were fair. The applicant had ample opportunity to challenge both the authenticity and the use of the recording. At each level of jurisdiction, the domestic courts assessed the effect of admission of the evidence on the fairness of the trial and discussed the non-statutory basis for the surveillance. Had the domestic courts been of the view that the admission of the evidence would have given rise to substantive unfairness, they would have had a discretion to exclude it. In those circumstances, the use at the applicant's trial of the secretly taped material did not conflict with the requirements of fairness under A 6(1).

With regard to the A 13 claim, the domestic courts were not capable of providing a remedy because, although they could consider questions of the fairness of admitting the evidence in the criminal proceedings, it was not open to them to deal with the substance of the Convention, nor was it open to them to grant appropriate relief. The system of investigation of complaints by the Police Complaints Authority did not meet the requisite standards of independence needed to constitute sufficient protection against the abuse of authority and thus provide an effective remedy within the meaning of A 13. There had therefore been a violation of A 13 of the Convention.

Costs and expenses (by majority (6–1) GBP 11,500 less FF 11,090.30). No claim for pecuniary or non-pecuniary damage made.

Kiefer v Switzerland 00/105

Erich Kiefer, the applicant, was a lorry driver and paid contributions to the Swiss social security insurance. In 1983, he suffered an injury and became partly disabled. On 7 November 1985, he requested pension benefits from the Compensation Office, but his request was dismissed on 23 December 1987 on the basis of 10 medical reports. On 28 January 1988, he appealed to the Federal Appeals Commission for Old Age, Survivors and Invalidity Insurance, which, on 25 October 1988, upheld his appeal and referred the case back to the Compensation Office for renewed examination. Further medical reports were obtained. On 30 October 1992, the applicant was issued a preliminary decision and on 7 April 1993, the Compensation Office dismissed his claim. His appeal was dismissed by the Federal Appeals Commission for Old Age, Survivors and Invalidity Insurance on 21 February 1994 and his administrative law appeal was dismissed on 18 November 1994 by the Federal Insurance Court. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr M Fischbach, President, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska.

In his administrative law appeal before the Federal Insurance Court, the applicant had complained, inter alia, that it had taken nearly 10 years to determine that he had not been insured. He had therefore sufficiently raised in substance his complaint about the length of proceedings and consequently the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was dismissed.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 28 January 1988, when the applicant contested the administrative decision refusing him a pension. It ended on 25 November 1994 when the final decision of the Federal Insurance Court was served on the applicant. It had therefore lasted 6 years, 9 months and 28 days at three levels of jurisdiction. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicant and that of the authorities dealing with the case. In addition, what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation had to be taken into account in certain cases. What was at stake for the applicant were pension benefits intended to compensate his disablement and loss of working capacity and therefore expedition was called for. Even if the case had been of some complexity, that could not reasonably explain the length of the proceedings lasting over 6 years and 9 months. The applicant himself contributed only to a minor extent to the length of the proceedings when he requested a prolongation of the time limit of one month before filing his observations on 4 January 1993. The main delay, attributable to the authorities, lasted approximately 4 years, which could not be considered reasonable. In the circumstances, the reasonable time requirement was not satisfied and there had been a breach of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary damage (CHF 5,000), legal costs (CHF 6,000).

Kiliç v Turkey 00/109

[Application lodged 3.8.1993; Court Judgment 28.3.2000]

Kemal Kiliç, the applicant's brother, was a journalist working for the newspaper Özgür Gündem. In December 1992, referring to attacks made to those associated with the newspaper, he requested the Governor to take measures to protect him and others. His request was refused. He issued a press release in which, inter alia, he condemned the Governor for not ensuring the safe distribution of the newspaper and called upon him and the police to fulfil their responsibilities. He was charged with insulting the Governor and taken into detention, but was released the same day. On 18 February 1993, he was found shot dead with two bullet wounds in the head. He had been gagged and had a rope round his neck. A gendarme took photographs and made a sketch of the scene. Ballistic tests were conducted. An individual was arrested and convicted of being a member of the outlawed Hizbollah organisation, but it was found that he could not be held responsible for the attack on Kemel Kiliç as other members of the group could have shared the pistol. The applicant complained, inter alia, of violation of A 2.

Court found by majority (6–1) V 2 regarding failure to protect life, unanimously V 2 regarding failure to conduct effective investigation, unanimously not necessary to examine 10, by majority (6–1) V 13, unanimously not necessary to examine 14.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr J Casadevall, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr R Maruste, Mr F Gölcüklü (pd), ad hoc judge.

The Court found no elements to require it to exercise its own powers to verify the facts and accordingly accepted the facts as established by the Commission. There was no satisfactory or convincing explanation by the Government as to the non-attendance of an important official witness at the hearings before the Commission's delegates and consequently, the Government had fallen short of its obligations to furnish all necessary facilities.

It had not been established beyond reasonable doubt that any State agent or person acting on the behalf of the State authorities was involved in the killing of Kemel Kiliç and the question to be determined was whether the authorities failed to comply with their positive obligation to protect him from a known risk to his life. Kemal Kiliç had made a request for protection. The authorities were aware that those involved in the publication and distribution of Özgür Gündem feared that they were falling victim to a concerted campaign tolerated, if not approved, by State officials. A significant number of serious incidents occurred involving killings of journalists, attacks on newspaper kiosks and distributors of the newspaper and Kemal Kiliç was at real and immediate risk of falling victim to an unlawful attack. The authorities were aware of that risk and were aware, or ought to have been aware, of the possibility that this risk derived from the activities of persons or groups acting with the knowledge or acquiescence of elements in the security forces. There was a framework of law in place with the aim of protecting life. However, the implementation of the criminal law in respect of unlawful acts allegedly carried out with the involvement of the security forces disclosed particular characteristics in the south-east region in that period which undermined the effectiveness of criminal law (such as the transfer of jurisdiction to administrative councils, the series of failures to investigate allegations of wrongdoing by the security forces and the attribution of responsibility for incidents to the PKK, resulting in the matter falling within the jurisdiction of State Security courts). This permitted or fostered a lack of accountability of members of the security forces for their actions which was not compatible with the rule of law in a democratic society. In addition, there was an absence of any operational measure of protection. There were a wide range of preventive measures available which would have assisted in minimising the risk to Kemal Kiliç's life and which would not have involved an impractical diversion of resources, but there was no evidence that any steps were taken in response to his request for protection. The authorities failed to take reasonable measures available to them to prevent a real and immediate risk to the life of Kemal Kiliç and accordingly, there had been a violation of A 2.

The investigation did not include any inquiries as to the possible targeting of Kemal Kiliç due to his job as a journalist. There was no indication that any steps had been taken to investigate any collusion by security forces in the incident. Having regard, therefore, to the limited scope and short duration of the investigation, the Court found that the authorities had failed to carry out an effective investigation into the circumstances surrounding Kemal Kiliç's death. There had been therefore been a violation of A 2 in that respect.

The applicant's complaints under A 10 arose out of the same facts as those considered under A 2 and it was not, therefore, necessary to examine the complaint separately.

It had not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that agents of the State carried out, or were otherwise implicated in, the killing of the applicant's brother. That did not preclude the complaint in relation to A 2 from being an arguable one for the purposes of A 13. It was not in dispute that the applicant's brother was the victim of an unlawful killing and he could therefore be considered to have an arguable claim. No effective criminal investigation could be considered to have been conducted in accordance with A 13, the requirements of which were broader than the obligation to investigate imposed by A 2. The applicant had therefore been denied an effective remedy in respect of the death of his brother and thereby access to any other available remedies at his disposal, including a claim for compensation. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 13.

Having regard to the findings under A 2 and 13, it was not necessary to determine whether the failings identified in the case were part of a practice adopted by the authorities.

The complaints under A 14 arose out of the same facts considered under A 2 and 13 and it was not therefore necessary to examine them separately.

Non-pecuniary damage (by majority (6–1) GBP 15,000 for applicant's brother's heirs, unanimously GBP 2,500 for applicant), costs and expenses (unanimously GBP 20,000 less FF 4,200).

Kjeldsen, Busk Madsen and Pedersen v Denmark (1979-80) 1 EHRR 711 76/4

[Applications lodged 4.4.1971 and 7.10.1972; Commission report 21.3.1975; Court Judgment 7.12.1976]

The applicants were: Mr Viking Kjeldsen, a galvaniser, and his wife Annemarie, a schoolteacher, who had a child of school age; Mr Arne Busk Madsen, a clergyman, and his wife Inger, a schoolteacher, who had four children; Mr Hans Pedersen, a clergyman, and Mrs Ellen Pedersen, who had five children. They objected to integrated, and hence compulsory, sex education which was introduced into State primary schools in Denmark by an Act of 1970. They sought unsuccessfully to have their children exempted from sex instruction. They complained, inter alia, that the compulsory sex education introduced into State schools by the 1970 Act was contrary to the beliefs they held as Christian parents and constituted a violation of P1A2.

Commission found by majority (7–7 with President exercising casting vote) NV P1A2 regarding Danish system of sex education, unanimously NV 8, NV 9, by majority (7–4 with 3 abstentions) NV 14.

Court found by majority (6–1) NV P1A2, NV 14+P1A2, unanimously NV 8+P1A2, 9+P1A2.

Judges: Mr G Balladore Pallieri, President, Mr A Verdross (so), Mr M Zekia, Mrs H Pedersen, Mr S Petren, Mr R Ryssdal, Mr D Evrigenis.

In Denmark, private schools co-existed with a system of public education. The second sentence of P1A2 was binding upon the Contracting States in the exercise of each and every function that they undertook in the sphere of education and teaching, including that consisting of the organisation and financing of public education. The second sentence of P1A2 had to be read together with the first, which enshrined the right of everyone to education. There was no distinction between State and private teaching. The Danish State schools did not fall outside the province of Protocol 1. P1A2, which applied to each of the State's functions in relation to education and to teaching, did not permit a distinction to be drawn between religious instruction and other subjects. The provisions of the Convention and Protocol had to be read as a whole and accordingly, the two sentences of P1A2 had to be read not only in the light of each other but also, in particular, of A 8, 9 and 10. The setting and planning of the curriculum fell in principle within the competence of the Contracting States. The second sentence of P1A2 did not prevent States from imparting through teaching or education information or knowledge of a directly or indirectly religious or philosophical kind. It did not permit parents to object to the integration of such teaching or education in the school curriculum, for otherwise all institutionalised teaching would run the risk of proving impracticable. However, the State, in fulfilling the functions assumed by it in regard to education and teaching, had to take care that information or knowledge included in the curriculum was conveyed in an objective, critical and pluralistic manner and could not pursue an aim of indoctrination that might be considered as not respecting parents' religious and philosophical convictions. The Danish legislator obtained beforehand the advice of qualified experts. The instruction on the subject given in State schools was aimed less at instilling knowledge than at giving such knowledge more correctly, precisely, objectively and scientifically. The instruction, as provided for and organised by the contested legislation, was principally intended to give pupils better information. The legislation in dispute did not amount to an attempt at indoctrination aimed at advocating a specific kind of sexual behaviour or make a point of exalting sex or inciting pupils to indulge precociously in practices that were dangerous for their stability, health or future or that many parents considered reprehensible. Further, it did not affect the right of parents to enlighten and advise their children, to exercise with regard to their children natural parental functions as educators, or to guide their children on a path in line with the parents' own religious or philosophical convictions. The disputed legislation in itself in no way offended the applicants' religious and philosophical convictions to the extent forbidden by the second sentence of P1A2, interpreted in the light of its first sentence and of the whole of the Convention. In addition, the Danish State allowed parents who wished to dissociate their children from integrated sex education, either to entrust their children to private schools, which were bound by less strict obligations and moreover heavily subsidised by the State, or to educate them or have them educated at home, subject to suffering the undeniable sacrifices and inconveniences caused by recourse to one of those alternative solutions. There was therefore no violation of P1A2.

A 14 prohibited discriminatory treatment having as its basis or reason a personal characteristic by which persons or groups of persons were distinguishable from each other. However, there was nothing in the contested legislation which could suggest that it envisaged such treatment. There was a difference in kind between religious instruction and the sex education concerned in the case. The former of necessity disseminated tenets and not mere knowledge; the same did not apply to the latter. Accordingly, the distinction objected to by the applicants was founded on dissimilar factual circumstances and was consistent with the requirements of A 14.

There was no breach of A 8 or A 9, which the Court had also taken into account when interpreting P1A2.

Mrs Hildegard Klaas, a social worker, and her daughter Monika Klaas, who was eight years old at the time of the incident, were the first and second applicant respectively. At about 7.30 pm on 28 January 1986, the first applicant was stopped by two police officers who accused her of having driven through a red traffic light and of having tried to get away – an allegation denied by the applicant. She failed to provide a specimen of breath satisfactorily and was therefore told that she would have to accompany the police officers to the local hospital in order to have a blood test. An altercation followed, during which the first applicant was arrested. Criminal proceedings instituted against her for driving under the influence of drink and resisting arrest were discontinued, but she was nonetheless fined for the regulatory offence of driving with excess alcohol in her blood. An information laid against the police officers by the first applicant alleging that they had assaulted her and caused her injuries was withdrawn some weeks later. She complained that the treatment to which she had been subjected by the police officers in the course of her arrest constituted inhuman and degrading treatment and further that, as the treatment took place on private property in the presence of her eight year old daughter, it had also given rise to a breach of her right to respect for her private and family life under A 8. The second applicant complained that, having regard to the police officers' excessive use of force against her mother in her presence, she suffered inhuman and degrading treatment contrary to A 3 as well as a violation of her right to respect for her private and family life under A 8.

Comm found by majority (10–5) V 3 in respect of the first applicant and no separate issue had arisen under A 8 in respect of the first applicant, (14–1) NV 3 in respect of the second applicant, (8–7) V 8 in respect of the second applicant.

Court found by majority (6–3) NV 3 in respect of the first applicant, not necessary to consider separately A 8 regarding first applicant, unanimously NV 3 in respect of the second applicant, by majority (6–3) NV 8 in respect of the second applicant.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh (d), Mr A Spielmann (d), Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka.

There was a dispute on the facts by the parties. The establishment and verification of the facts was primarily a matter for the Commission. The Court was not, however, bound by the Commission's findings of fact and remained free to make its own appreciation in the light of all the material before it. It was not normally within the province of the European Court to substitute its own assessment of the facts for that of the domestic courts and, as a general rule, it was for those courts to assess the evidence before them. Regarding the injuries sustained, the national courts had found against the first applicant. In particular, the Regional Court had the benefit of seeing the various witnesses give their evidence and of evaluating their credibility. No material has been adduced in the course of the Strasbourg proceedings which could call into question the findings of the national courts and add weight to the applicant's allegations either before the Commission or the Court. No cogent elements had been provided which could lead the Court to depart from the findings of fact of the national courts. Accordingly, no violation of A 3 could be found to have occurred.

The first applicant's complaint under A 8 was essentially based on the same disputed facts considered in connection with A 3 and found not to have been established. The complaint did not therefore call for separate examination.

The facts on which the second applicant relied were not established. Accordingly, her complaints were likewise unfounded.

Klass and Others v Germany (1979–80) 2 EHRR 214 78/4

[Application lodged 11.6.1971; Commission report 9.3.1977; Court Judgment 6.9.1978]

The applicants were Gerhard Klass, an Oberstaatsanwalt, Peter Lubberger, a lawyer, Jürgen Nussbruch, a judge, Hans-Jürgen Pohl and Dieter Selb, lawyers. They complained that German legislation which permitted the State to monitor their correspondence and telephone communications without obliging the authorities to inform them subsequently of the measures taken against them and which excluded the possibility of challenging such measures before the ordinary courts was contrary to the Convention. Their appeal to the Federal Constitutional Court was dismissed.

Comm found by majority (11 with two abstentions) NV 6(1) regarding 'civil rights', unanimously NV 6(1) regarding 'criminal charge', by majority (12 with one abstention) NV 8 or 13.

Court found unanimously that the applicants could claim to be victims within the meaning of 25, NV 8, NV 13, NV 6.

Judges: Mr G Balladore Pallieri, President, Mr G Wiarda, Mr H Mosler, Mr M Zekia, Mr J Cremona, Mr P O'Donoghue, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr W Ganshof Van Der Meersch, Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr P-H Teitgen, Mr G Lagergren, Mr L Liesch, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (so).

A 25 required that an individual applicant should claim to have been actually affected by the violation alleged. It did not institute for individuals a kind of actio popularis for the interpretation of the Convention; it did not permit individuals to complain against a law in abstracto simply because they felt that it contravened the Convention. It was necessary that the law should have been applied to the individual's detriment. Nevertheless, a law might by itself violate the rights of an individual if the individual was directly affected by the law in the absence of any specific measure of implementation. An individual could, under certain conditions, claim to be the victim of a violation occasioned by the mere existence of secret measures or of legislation permitting secret measures, without having to allege that such measures were in fact applied to him. The relevant conditions were to be determined in each case according to the Convention right or rights alleged to have been infringed, the secret character of the measures objected to, and the connection between the applicant and those measures. Where a State instituted secret surveillance, the existence of which remained unknown to the persons being controlled, with the effect that the surveillance remained unchallengeable, A 8 could to a large extent be reduced to a nullity. It was unacceptable that the assurance of the enjoyment of a right guaranteed by the Convention could be removed by the simple fact that the person concerned is kept unaware of its violation. The disputed legislation directly affected all users or potential users of the postal and telecommunication services in the Federal Republic of Germany. The menace of surveillance could be claimed in itself to restrict free communication through the postal and telecommunication services, thereby constituting for all users or potential users a direct interference with the right guaranteed by A 8. Although the Government informed the Court that at no time had surveillance measures been ordered or implemented in respect of the applicants, that retrospective clarification did not bear on the appreciation of the applicants' status as 'victims'. Each of the applicants was entitled to claim to be the victim of a violation of the Convention, even though he was not able to allege in support of his application that he has been subject to a concrete measure of surveillance.

The secret surveillance amounted to an interference with the exercise of the right in A 8(1). The interference was in accordance with the law. The aim of the legislation was to safeguard national security and/or to prevent disorder or crime. The domestic legislature enjoyed a certain discretion. Under the law there existed an administrative procedure designed to ensure that measures were not ordered haphazardly, irregularly or without due and proper consideration. There were also strict conditions with regard to the implementation of the surveillance measures and to the processing of the information thereby obtained. While recourse to the courts in respect of the ordering and implementation of measures of surveillance was excluded, subsequent control or review was provided instead, by two bodies appointed by the people's elected representatives, namely, the Parliamentary Board and the legislative Commission. In a field where abuse was potentially so easy in individual cases and could have such harmful consequences for democratic society as a whole, it was in principle desirable to entrust supervisory control to a judge. Nevertheless, having regard to the nature of the supervisory and other safeguards provided for by German legislation in the present case, the exclusion of judicial control did not exceed the limits of what might be deemed necessary in a democratic society. The two supervisory bodies could, in the circumstances of the case, be regarded as enjoying sufficient independence to give an objective ruling. The fact of not informing the individual once surveillance had ceased could not itself be incompatible with A 8(2), as it was that very fact which ensured the efficacy of the interference. According to German case-law, the person concerned had to be informed after the termination of the surveillance measures as soon as notification could be made without jeopardising the purpose of the restriction. Some compromise between the requirements for defending democratic society and individual rights was inherent in the system of the Convention. The measures taken could be considered to be necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security and for the prevention of disorder or crime. Accordingly, there was no breach of A8.

The applicants enjoyed an effective remedy under A 13 in so far as they challenged before the Federal Constitutional Court the conformity of the relevant legislation with their right to respect for correspondence and with their right of access to the courts. The authority referred to in A 13 might not necessarily in all instances be a judicial authority in the strict sense. Nevertheless, the powers and procedural guarantees an authority possessed were relevant in determining whether the remedy before it was effective. It was the secrecy of the measures which rendered it difficult, if not impossible, for the person concerned to seek any remedy of his own accord, particularly while surveillance was in progress. The lack of notification did not, in the circumstances of the case, entail a breach of A 13. For the purposes of the present proceedings, an effective remedy under A 13 meant a remedy that was as effective as could be having regard to the restricted scope for recourse inherent in any system of secret surveillance. In the particular circumstances of the case, the aggregate of remedies provided for under German law (complaining to the Commission and to the Constitutional Court, or after notification instituting an action for a declaration, bringing an action for damages in a civil court or an action for the destruction or, if appropriate, restitution of documents, applying to the Federal Constitutional Court for a ruling as to whether there has been a breach of the legislation) satisfied the requirements of A 13.

As long as it remained validly secret, the decision placing someone under surveillance was incapable of judicial control on the initiative of the person concerned, within the meaning of A 6; as a consequence, it of necessity escaped the requirements of that article. The decision could come within the ambit of the said provision only after discontinuance of the surveillance. The individual concerned, once he has been notified of such discontinuance, had at his disposal several legal remedies against the possible infringements of his rights; these remedies would satisfy the requirements of A 6. Accordingly, even if it was applicable, A 6 had not been violated.

[Application lodged 9.1.1996; Court Judgment 27.7.2000]

On 6 December 1985, the Rhineland Westphalia electricity supply company instituted proceedings before the Moers District Court against Mr Edgar Klein, the applicant, claiming outstanding payments for electricity. On 28 April 1986, the District Court ordered the applicant to pay a sum of about DM 141 as well as interest to the plaintiff. On 8 June 1986, the applicant lodged a constitutional complaint with the Federal Constitutional Court. On 11 October 1994, the Federal Constitutional Court quashed the District Court's decision of April 1986 and sent the case back to that court. On 15 February 1995, the District Court ordered the applicant to pay a sum of about DM 80 as well as interest to the plaintiff. On 22 August 1995, the Federal Constitutional Court refused a constitutional complaint by the applicant lodged on 24 May 1995. The applicant received the decision on 2 September 1995. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Judges: Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, President, Mr G Ress, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mrs N Vajic, Mr M Pellonpää.

The case concerned not only the length of proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court, but also the length of proceedings before the civil courts. Proceedings came within the scope of A 6(1), even if they were conducted before a Constitutional Court, where their outcome was decisive for civil rights and obligations. The Federal Constitutional Court had declared the relevant parts of the law at issue unconstitutional, quashed the District Court's decision of April 1986 and sent the case back to that court. Its proceedings were therefore directly decisive for a dispute over the applicant's civil right. The dispute before the civil courts as to the amount of the electricity supply which was due by the applicant, and which comprised the coal-mining contribution, was of a pecuniary nature and undeniably concerned a civil right within the meaning of A 6 § 1.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 6 December 1985, when the Rhineland Westphalia electricity supply company instituted proceedings against the applicant before the Moers District Court. It ended on 22 August 1995, when the Federal Constitutional Court rendered its decision. It had therefore lasted approximately nine years and eight months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the complexity of the case, the conduct of the parties and of the authorities, and the importance of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation. The main delay in the procedure occurred before the Federal Constitutional Court in the first round of constitutional proceedings, which lasted for more than 8 years. The constitutional issues raised were of some complexity. The applicant's conduct did not cause any delay in the proceedings. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements, including the obligation to hear cases within a reasonable time. Although this obligation could not be construed in the same way for a constitutional court as for an ordinary court, it was for the European Court in the last instance to verify that it had been complied with, having regard to the particular circumstances of each case and the criteria laid down in its case-law. A temporary backlog of court business did not entail a Contracting State's international liability if that State took appropriate remedial action with the requisite promptness. However, a chronic overload, like the one the Federal Constitutional Court had laboured under since the end of the 1970s, could not justify an excessive length of proceedings. What was at stake in the proceedings for the applicant was a material consideration, the sum of money was minor, but the constitutionality of the law in issue raised a question of principle for a great number of German citizens. Accordingly, despite the complexity of the case, the length of the constitutional proceedings could not satisfy the reasonable-time requirement laid down in A 6(1).

Koendjbiharie v The Netherlands (1991) 13 EHRR 820 90/27

[Application lodged 18.3.1985; Commission report 12.10.1989; Court Judgment 25.10.1990]

Mr Jonas Mohamed Rafiek Koendjbiharie was sentenced by the Court of Appeal on 22 June 1979 to a term of nine months' imprisonment, to be followed by two years' placement at the Government's disposal, for rape aggravated by a previous conviction for the same offence. On 22 January 1980, the Supreme Court dismissed his appeal on a point of law. On coming out of prison, he was committed to the State psychiatric clinic. His placement had been extended by the Court of Appeal until 2 April 1984. On 17 May 1984, he filed an interlocutory application for his immediate release with the President of the District Court. His application was dismissed and he appealed. On 21 September 1984, the court extended his placement by one year. The applicant, who had absconded on around 17 September, was informed of this decision by his lawyer. His subsequent appeals were rejected. He complained of this detention.

Comm found unanimously V 5(1), 5(4), NV 6(1), 6(3), 14, 3.

Court found unanimously V 5(4), by majority (8–1) not necessary to examine the other complaints based on A 5, unanimously not necessary to examine the complaints based on 3, 6 and 14.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Bernhardt (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel.

The relevant period began on 17 May 1984, when the application to extend the confinement was filed with the Court of Appeal, and ended on the day on which the order of 21 September 1984 was communicated to the applicant or to his lawyer, probably late September, as the decision was not delivered in public. A lapse of time of more than four months appeared incompatible with the notion of speediness and that impression was not dispelled by a more detailed study of the facts of the case. Accordingly, there was a failure to comply with the requirement of speediness in A 5(4). That conclusion made it unnecessary to consider whether there had also been a breach of A 5(1) or to examine the other complaints made by the applicant under A 5.

The applicant withdrew his complaints under A 3, 6 and 14 at the hearing before the Court, which did not consider it necessary to examine them of its own motion.

Kokkinakis v Greece (1994) 17 EHRR 397 93/18

[Application lodged 22.8.1988; Commission report 3.12.1991; Court Judgment 25.5.1993]

Mr Minos Kokkinakis, a retired businessman, was born into an Orthodox family in 1919 and became a Jehovah's Witness in 1936, after which he was arrested more than 60 times for proselytism. He was also interned on various islands in the Aegean for periods of 6 to 13 months and imprisoned on several occasions for proselytism, conscientious objection and holding a religious meeting in a private house. On 2 March 1986, he and his wife were arrested and prosecuted for proselytism. They were found guilty and sentenced to four months' imprisonment, convertible into a pecuniary penalty. The court also ordered the confiscation and destruction of four booklets. On appeal, the Court of Appeal quashed Mrs Kokkinakis's conviction and upheld her husband's, but reduced his prison sentence. The Court of Cassation dismissed the applicant's appeal on 22 April 1988. He complained that his conviction for proselytism was in breach of the rights secured, inter alia, in A 7, 9 and 10.

Comm found by majority (11–2) NV 7, unanimously V 9, by majority (12–1) no separate issue arose under A 10.

Court found by majority (6–3) V 9, (8–1) NV 7, unanimously that it is unnecessary to examine A 10 or A 14+9.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr L-E Pettiti (pc), Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr N Valticos (d), Mr SK Martens (pd), Mr I Foighel (jd), Mr AN Loizou (jd), Mr MA Lopes Rocha.

The sentence passed by the domestic courts amounted to an interference with the exercise of the applicant's right to freedom to manifest his religion or belief. The wording of many statutes was not absolutely precise. The need to avoid excessive rigidity and to keep pace with changing circumstances meant that many laws were inevitably couched in terms which, to a greater or lesser extent, were vague. Criminal law provisions on proselytism fell within that category. The interpretation and application of such enactments depended on practice. There was case-law, which had been published and was accessible, supplemented the legislation and was such as to enable the applicant to regulate his conduct. The measure complained of was prescribed by law within the meaning of A 9(2). The impugned measure was in pursuit of a legitimate aim under A 9(2), namely the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. A certain margin of appreciation was to be left to the Contracting States in assessing the existence and extent of the necessity of an interference, but that margin was subject to European supervision. The Court's task was to determine whether the measures taken at national level were justified in principle and proportionate. In their reasoning, the Greek courts established the applicant's liability by merely reproducing the wording of the legislation and did not sufficiently specify in what way the accused had attempted to convince his neighbour by improper means. None of the facts they set out warranted that finding. That being so, it had not been shown that the applicant's conviction was justified in the circumstances of the case by a pressing social need. The contested measure therefore did not appear to have been proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued or, consequently, necessary in a democratic society for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. There had therefore been a breach of A 9.

A 7(1) was not confined to prohibiting the retrospective application of the criminal law to an accused's disadvantage. It also embodied, more generally, the principle that only the law can define a crime and prescribe a penalty and the principle that the criminal law must not be extensively construed to an accused's detriment, for instance by analogy; it followed that an offence had to be clearly defined in law. That condition was satisfied where the individual could know from the wording of the relevant provision and, if need be, with the assistance of the courts' interpretation of it, what acts and omissions would make him liable. That was so in the present case. There had therefore been no breach of A 7.

Having regard to the decision on A 9, it was unnecessary to examine the complaint under A 10.

Although not raised before the Commission, the complaint under A 14+9 related to the same facts as do those made under A 7 and 9 and having regard to the conclusion in those respects, it was unnecessary to deal with it.

Kolompar v Belgium (1993) 16 EHRR 197 92/59

Mr Djula Kolompar, a Yugoslavian national, was sentenced in absentia by the Florence Assize Court on 13 June 1980 to imprisonment, for, inter alia, attempted rape and attempted murder. In May 1983, Italy requested the Belgian authorities to extradite the applicant. On 22 January 1984, the applicant was arrested in Belgium on suspicion of aggravated theft and attempted theft committed in that country and remanded in custody in respect of those charges. On 4 January 1985, the Antwerp Criminal Court sentenced him to one year's imprisonment for the offences committed in Belgium. That judgment was upheld by the Antwerp Court of Appeal and became final a month later. On 2 May 1984, the Belgian Minister of Justice authorised the applicant's extradition to Italy. There were several proceedings. By a letter from his lawyer, dated 13 September 1987, the applicant informed the Minister of Justice, inter alia, that he no longer opposed his extradition in view of the length of the proceedings instituted both at national and international level.

Comm found by majority (8–3) V 5(1), (10–1) V 5(4).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found NV 5(1), NV 5(4).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr I Foighel, Mr F Bigi.

The Government criticised the applicant for having failed to take to their conclusion the urgent application proceedings instituted by him. However, as the defendant in those proceedings, the Belgian State had contested the jurisdiction of the President of the Brussels First Instance Court. They could not put to the Court arguments which were inconsistent with the position they had adopted before the national courts. Accordingly, the preliminary objection of non-exhaustion had to be dismissed.

The detention on remand and the detention pending extradition partly overlapped. The detention in respect of the offences committed in Belgium lasted from 22 January 1984 to 20 January 1985 and satisfied the requirements of A 5(1)(a) and 5(1)(c). The detention with a view to extradition was in principle justified under A 5(1)(f), but, as it lasted for over two years and eight months, it was necessary to determine whether it remained compatible with that provision to the end. The period spent in detention pending extradition was unusually long. There were successive applications for a stay of execution or for release lodged by the applicant. In addition, the Belgian authorities required time to verify the applicant's alibi in Denmark. The applicant had delayed for three months before replying to the submissions of the Belgian State and, on appeal, he requested that the hearing of the case be postponed and failed to notify the authorities that he was unable to pay a lawyer. The Belgian State could not be held responsible for the delays to which the applicant's conduct gave rise. The applicant could not validly complain of a situation which he largely created. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 5(1).

The mere fact that the Court had found no breach of the requirements of A 5(1) did not mean that it was dispensed from carrying out a review of compliance with A 5(4); the two paragraphs were separate provisions and observance of the former did not necessarily entail observance of the latter. In addition, the Court had consistently stressed the importance of A 5 (4), in particular in extradition cases. The applicant did not argue that the passing of time had rendered his detention unlawful. In so far as the length of the deprivation gave rise to a problem under A 5(4), it had already been dealt with in relation to A 5(1), in having had regard, inter alia, to the applicant's dilatory conduct. Therefore no violation of A 5(4) in this instance.

[Application lodged 3.7.1973; Commission report 14.12.1976; Court Judgment 28.6.1978 (merits), 10.3.1980 (A 50)]

Dr Eberhard König was an ear, nose and throat specialist. In 1960, he opened a clinic. He was the only medical practitioner working at the clinic which he ran and managed himself and where he performed, in particular, plastic surgery. On 16 October 1962, proceedings were instituted against him for unprofessional conduct by the Regional Medical Society before the Tribunal for the Medical Profession attached to the Frankfurt Administrative Court and he was declared unfit to practise on 9 July 1964. The Regional Tribunal for the Medical Profession attached to the Hessen Administrative Court of Appeal rejected his appeal on 14 October 1970. On 12 April 1967 the applicant had his authorisation to run his clinic withdrawn and on 12 May 1971, his authorisation to practise was withdrawn. Actions brought by him to challenge both of those withdrawals had been in progress before the competent administrative courts since November 1967 and October 1971, respectively. He complained of the length of the proceedings taken by him against the withdrawals of the authorisations.

Comm found by majority (10–6) 6 applicable to the rights claimed by the applicant before the administrative courts, (9–6 with one abstention) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (15–1) 6(1) applicable to the proceedings relative to the withdrawal of the applicant's authorisation to run his clinic, (14–2) 6(1) applicable to the proceedings relative to the withdrawal of the applicant's authorisation to practise, (15–1) V 6(1) as regards the duration of the proceedings regarding the withdrawal of the authorisation to run the clinic and to practise.

The concept of 'civil rights and obligations' was autonomous, however, the legislation of the State concerned was not without importance. Whether or not a right was to be regarded as civil within the meaning of this expression in the Convention had to be determined by reference to the substantive content and effects of the right – and not its legal classification – under the domestic law of the State concerned. In the exercise of its supervisory functions, the Court had to also take account of the object and purpose of the Convention and of the national legal systems of the other Contracting States. For A 6(1) to be applicable to a case it was not necessary that both parties to the proceedings should be private persons. If the case concerned a dispute between an individual and a public authority, whether the latter had acted as a private person or in its sovereign capacity was not conclusive. Accordingly, in ascertaining whether a case concerned the determination of a civil right, only the character of the right at issue was relevant. An activity presenting, under the law of the State concerned, the character of a private activity could not automatically be converted into a public-law activity by reason of the fact that it was subject to administrative authorisations and supervision, including if appropriate the withdrawal of authorisations, provided for by law in the interests of public order and public health. The responsibility which the medical profession bore towards society at large did not alter the private character of the medical practitioner's activity. All that was relevant under A 6(1) was the fact that the object of the cases in question was the determination of rights of a private nature. Since the rights affected by the withdrawal decisions and forming the object of the cases before the administrative courts were private rights, A 6(1) was applicable, it was not necessary in the present case to decide whether the concept of 'civil rights and obligations' within the meaning of that provision extended beyond those rights which had a private nature. Once a case was duly referred to it, the Court could take cognisance of every question of law arising in the course of the proceedings and concerning facts submitted to its examination by a Contracting State or by the Commission. The Court did not consider that it had to examine whether in this case A 6(1) was also relevant under the 'criminal charge' head. For, although the requirements of A 6 as regards cases concerning civil rights were less onerous than they were for criminal charges, that difference was of no consequence here: all proceedings covered by A 6 were subject to the requirement of a reasonable time.

It was conceivable that in civil matters the reasonable time might begin to run, in certain circumstances, even before the issue of the writ commencing proceedings before the court to which the plaintiff submitted the dispute. That was the situation in the applicant's case, since he could not seise the competent court before having the lawfulness and the expediency of the impugned administrative acts examined in preliminary proceedings before the administrative authority.

Consequently, in the present case, the reasonable time stipulated by A 6 (1) started to run on the day on which the applicant lodged an objection against the withdrawals of his authorisations. The period to which A 6 was applicable covered the whole of the proceedings in question, including appeal proceedings. The reasonableness of the duration of proceedings covered by A 6(1) had to be assessed in each case according to its circumstances, having regard, inter alia, to the complexity of the case, to the applicant's conduct and to the manner in which the matter was dealt with by the administrative and judicial authorities. The proceedings relative to the withdrawal of the authorisation to run the clinic began on 13 July 1967 when the applicant filed an objection against the withdrawal of the authorisation and had still not been concluded. More than ten years and ten months had elapsed without a decision on the merits of the case and it had been necessary to wait for almost ten years for the judgment at first instance. The delays occasioned by the difficulties in the investigation and by the applicant's behaviour did not of themselves justify the length of the proceedings. The principal reason for the length of the proceedings was to be found in the conduct of the case: It would have been possible for the 4th Chamber to bring the proceedings to an end at an earlier date. Taking into account the fact that the proceedings began on 13 July 1967 and ended on 22 June 1977, the reasonable time stipulated by A 6(1) was exceeded. The proceedings relative to the withdrawal of the authorisation to practise began on 18 May 1971 when the applicant lodged his objection against the withdrawal of the authorisation to practise. The Second Chamber of the Frankfurt Administrative Court gave judgment on 9 June 1976, that is after more than five years of proceedings, and the Hessen Administrative Court of Appeal on 2 May 1978. In an overall assessment of the various factors and taking into account what was at stake in the proceedings, namely the applicant's whole professional livelihood, the Court considered that, notwithstanding the delays attributable to the applicant's behaviour, the investigation of the case was not conducted with the necessary expedition. Accordingly, the reasonable time stipulated by A 6(1) was exceeded.

Kopp v Switzerland (1999) 27 EHRR 91 98/16

[Application lodged 15.12.1993; Commission report 16.10.1996; Court Judgment 25.3.1998]

Mr Hans W Kopp, the applicant, was formerly a lawyer. His wife, Mrs Elisabeth Kopp, was a member of the Federal Council and head of the Federal Department of Justice and Police from 1984 until her resignation in January 1989. In November 1989, the applicant and his wife, together with others, had their telephone lines monitored in connection with an investigation into disclosure of official secrets. The monitoring was discontinued in December 1989 when no evidence was found. In March 1990, in accordance with Swiss law, the applicant was informed of the fact of the telephone tapping, the duration and that the recordings had been destroyed. The applicant's complaint to the Federal Department of Justice and Police about breaches of the legislation on telephone tapping and of A 8 of the Convention was dismissed. His appeals to the Federal Council and the Federal Court were also dismissed. He complained of the monitoring of his telephone lines and of the lack of an effective remedy in that connection.

Comm found unanimously V 8, NV 13.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 8, not necessary to examine A 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr M Voicu.

The applicant raised in substance, before the national authorities, his complaint relating to A 8 of the Convention, in his administrative appeal to the Federal Council. The preliminary objection therefore had to be dismissed.

Telephone calls made from or to business premises, such as those of a law firm, could be covered by the notions of private life and correspondence within the meaning of A 8(1). Interception of telephone calls constituted interference by a public authority, within the meaning of A 8(2), with the exercise of a right guaranteed to the applicant. The subsequent use of the recordings made had no bearing on that finding. The expression 'in accordance with the law', within the meaning of A 8(2), required first that the impugned measure should have some basis in domestic law; it also referred to the quality of the law in question, requiring that it should be accessible to the person concerned, who must moreover be able to foresee its consequences for him, and compatible with the rule of law. The legislation concerned the Federal Criminal Procedure Act. It was primarily for the national authorities to interpret and apply domestic law. However, the Court could not ignore the opinions of academic writers and the Federal Court's case-law on the question. In relation to A 8(2), 'law' had always been understood in its substantive sense, not its formal one, and had in particular included unwritten law therein. The interference complained of had a legal basis in Swiss law. The second requirement which emerged from the phrase 'in accordance with the law', the accessibility of the law, did not raise any problem in the instant case. With regard to the law's foreseeability as to the meaning and nature of the applicable measures, A 8(2) required the law in question to be compatible with the rule of law. In the context of secret measures of surveillance or interception of communications by public authorities, because of the lack of public scrutiny and the risk of misuse of power, the domestic law had to provide some protection to the individual against arbitrary interference with A 8 rights. It had to be sufficiently clear in its terms to give citizens an adequate indication as to the circumstances in and conditions on which public authorities were empowered to resort to any such secret measures. The applicant was monitored as a third party. There were some safeguards built into the law. However, there was a contradiction between the clear text of legislation which protected legal professional privilege when a lawyer was being monitored as a third party and the practice followed in the present case. Astonishingly, the task of distinguishing legal professional privilege and other work was assigned to an official of the Post Office's legal department, who was a member of the executive, without supervision by an independent judge, especially in this sensitive area of the confidential relations between a lawyer and his clients, which directly concerned the rights of the defence. Swiss law, whether written or unwritten, did not indicate with sufficient clarity the scope and manner of exercise of the authorities' discretion in the matter. Consequently, the applicant, as a lawyer, did not enjoy the minimum degree of protection required by the rule of law in a democratic society. There had therefore been a breach of A 8. It was therefore not necessary to review compliance with the other requirements of A 8(2) in this case.

The applicant stated that he did not intend to pursue his complaint under A 13 before the Court, and the Court considered that it was not required to consider it of its own motion.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage, costs and expenses (CHF 15,000).

Mr Rolf Kosiek worked in teaching posts. He was dismissed twice from teaching jobs because of doubts about his loyalty to the free democratic constitutional system of the Republic. He had signed declarations of loyalty, as required, on appointment to the Civil Service. This was based on his election to senior posts in the National Democratic Party of Germany as well as election to the Regional Parliament and to alleged views expressed in two books on politics. His appeals to the Administrative Court, the Administrative Court of Appeal and the Federal Constitutional Court were dismissed. He complained that his dismissal was contrary to A 10.

While under the Convention and its Protocols there was no right of recruitment to the Civil Service, it did not follow that in other respects civil servants fell outside the scope of the Convention. It was not for the European Court to review the correctness of the findings of domestic courts which had decided that the applicant did not meet the requirements for employment in the Civil Service. In refusing the applicant access to the Civil Service, the responsible Ministry of the Land took account of his opinions and activities merely in order to determine whether he had proved himself during his probationary period and whether he possessed one of the necessary personal qualifications for the post in question. That being so, there had been no interference with the exercise of the right protected under A 10(1).

[Application lodged 31.3.1987; Commission report 3.9.1990; Court Judgment 28.11.1991]

Mr Jacobus Koster, the applicant, was arrested on 11 March 1987, while completing his compulsory military service, for repeatedly refusing to obey an order that he should take receipt of a weapon and a uniform. He was questioned by the military police. On Friday 13 March, the applicant, assisted by a lawyer appointed to act for him, appeared before the investigating officer assigned to the case. Before the Military Court, which sat in private on Monday 16 March, the applicant's lawyer pleaded that the length of his detention contravened A 5(3) and that the Military Court did not have the necessary independence and impartiality to rule on the case. The Military Court confirmed the earlier detention and extended it by 30 days to maintain military discipline. On 9 September 1987, the Supreme Military Court sentenced the applicant to a term of one year's imprisonment, from which was deducted the time which he had already spent in detention. The applicant complained that he had not been brought promptly before the Military Court, as was required under A 5(3).

Comm found unanimously V 5(3).

Court found unanimously V 5(3).

Judges: Mr J Cremona, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr J De Meyer (so), Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou.

Promptness had to be assessed in each case according to its special features. The significance to be attached to those features could never be taken to the point of impairing the very essence of the right guaranteed by A 5(3), that is to the point of effectively negativing the State's obligation to ensure a prompt release or a prompt appearance before a judicial authority. Even taking into account the demands of military life and justice, the applicant's appearance before the judicial authorities did not comply with the requirement of promptness laid down in A 5(3).

The complaint of independence/impartiality had not been raised before the Commission and the Court therefore found no jurisdiction to examine it.

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any damage. Costs and expenses (NLG 11,626 less FF 9,382.50).

Kostovski v The Netherlands (1990) 12 EHRR 434 89/20

[Application lodged 18.3.1985; Commission report 12.5.1988; Court Judgment 20.11.1989 (merits), 29.3.1990 (JS)]

Mr Slobodan Kostovski was convicted of armed robbery and sentenced to six years' imprisonment. The conviction was based to a large extent on reports of statements by two anonymous witnesses, both of whom were heard by the police in the absence of the applicant and his counsel. One of them was heard by an examining magistrate, also in the absence of the applicant and his counsel. Neither of the witnesses was heard by the trial court. The applicant complained under A 6(1) and (3).

Comm found unanimously V 6(1)+ 6(3)(d).

Court found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(d).

The admissibility of evidence was primarily a matter for regulation by national law. As a general rule, it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task was to ascertain whether the proceedings considered as a whole, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair. In principle, all the evidence had to be produced in the presence of the accused at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument. That did not mean, however, that in order to be used as evidence, statements of witnesses should always be made at a public hearing in court: to use as evidence such statements obtained at the pre-trial stage was not in itself inconsistent with A 6(3)(d) and 6(1) provided the rights of the defence had been respected. As a rule, those rights required that an accused should be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him, either at the time the witness was making his statement or at some later stage of the proceedings. The applicant was not afforded such an opportunity. At no stage could they be questioned directly by him or on his behalf. The applicant was able to question the police officer and examining magistrates who had taken the statements and was able to submit written questions to one of the witnesses through the examining magistrate, but the nature and scope of the questions was restricted by the decision that the anonymity of the witnesses be preserved. This compounded the applicant's difficulty; if the applicant was unaware of the witness's identity, he could be deprived of testing hostility, unreliability, prejudice and credibility. The handicaps under which the defence laboured were not counterbalanced by the procedures followed by the judicial authorities. The importance of the struggle against organised crime could not be underestimated and demanded the introduction of appropriate measures to protect against, for example, witness intimidation. However, the right to a fair administration of justice held so prominent a place in a democratic society that it could not be sacrificed to expediency. The Convention did not preclude reliance, at the investigation stage of criminal proceedings, on sources such as anonymous informants. However, the subsequent use of anonymous statements as sufficient evidence to found a conviction, as in the present case, was a different matter. It involved limitations on the rights of the defence which were irreconcilable with the guarantees contained in A 6. In the circumstances of the case, the constraints affecting the rights of the defence were such that the applicant could not be said to have received a fair trial.

FS (NLG 150,000 for non-pecuniary damage), therefore A 50 struck from the list.

Kraska v Switzerland (1994) 18 EHRR 188 93/15

[Application lodged 2.4.1988; Commission report 15.10.1991; Court Judgment 19.4.1993]

Mr Martin Kraska, the applicant, practised mostly as an assistant doctor. In the course of proceedings concerning his authorisation to practise independently in the canton, the applicant complained that a judge of the Federal Court had expressed his view on the applicant's public law appeal without having examined the file.

Comm found by majority (14–5) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (6–3) NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (jd), President, Mr F Matscher (c), Mr J De Meyer (c), Mrs E Palm (jd), Mr R Pekkanen (jd), Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber.

The Swiss Constitution guaranteed the freedom of professional activity, construed by the Federal Court as embracing the medical profession. The dispute therefore concerned the very existence of a right which could be said, on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. In addition, the dispute was genuine and of a serious nature. On the question of whether the right in issue was a 'civil right', the Court recalled its case-law concerning the medical profession. In Switzerland, the profession had features which were of a public law nature: it was subject to administrative rules, enacted in the public interest, and its exercise depended on the issue of an authorisation by the Cantonal Health Authority. Nevertheless, the applicant wished to work in the private sector, on the basis of contracts concluded between him and his patients. The dispute between him and the Zürich Government therefore concerned a 'civil right'. As to whether A 6(1) also applied to the examination of the public law appeal, the proceedings came within the scope of that provision, even if they were conducted before a constitutional court, where their outcome was decisive for civil rights, and in order to determine whether this is so in a given case, it was necessary to have regard to all the circumstances. The Zürich Administrative Court had denied the applicant the right to practise medicine independently. It was open to the Federal Court to quash the contested judgment, or to grant the authorisation which the applicant was seeking. The direct effect of the recognition of the right claimed was consequently beyond question. A 6(1) was applicable.

The Health Authority, the Cantonal Government and the Administrative Court of Zürich had carefully studied the applicant's application for an authorisation. The judges of the Federal Court all had access to the file of the cantonal proceedings and the rapporteur communicated to them his opinion a few days before the deliberations. They were also able, in principle, to consult their own court's file and, in particular, the appeal memorial. However, one of the judges complained, at the public deliberations, that he had received it only the previous day and that he had been able to read thoroughly only half of the memorial, which was moreover much too long in his view. The Court stressed the importance of appearances in the administration of justice, but made clear that the standpoint of the persons concerned was not in itself decisive. The misgivings of the individuals before the courts, for instance with regard to the fairness of the proceedings, had in addition to be capable of being held to be objectively justified. The judge in question had taken an active part in the deliberations. However, there was no evidence to suggest that the appeal was not examined with due care before the decision was taken. The applicant's complaint did not prove to be well founded. Even though the judge's comment was open to criticism, the manner in which the Federal Court dealt with the case did not give rise to any reasonable misgivings. There had therefore been no violation of A 6(1).

Krèmáø and Others v Czech Republic 00/88

The applicants, Mr Roman Krèmá, Mrs Marie Hanusová, Mrs Jaroslava Bartosová, Mrs Eduarda Ottová, Mrs Dagmar Rydlová, Mrs Eva Kaòoková, Mrs Michaela Krèmáøová, were successors in title to a company which belonged to members of their family until it was nationalised by the former communist regime in 1945 pursuant to a Presidential Decree. On 22 July 1991, the Czech Government approved a privatisation plan to sell the company to a foreign company. In November 1991, pursuant to the Extra-Judicial Rehabilitations Act and the Transfer of the State's Property to Other Persons Act, the applicants commenced an action for restitution of the Company against the Ministry for Administration of National Property and its Privatisation. They claimed that the company had been nationalised in a way which violated generally recognised human rights and freedoms and that the Decree had been wrongly applied to their family's company because the nationalisation conditions laid down in the Decree, in particular the condition that the company should have more than 150 employees, were not satisfied and that the company had therefore been nationalised after February 1948, the decisive date for restitution under the Restitution Act. The Prague 1 District Court found against the applicants. The applicants' appeals to the Prague Municipal Court, the High Court and the Constitutional Court were dismissed. The applicants complained that they did not have a fair hearing in the proceedings before the Constitutional Court, as the court based its decision on documents which were not considered at the hearing and were not shown to or discussed by the parties.

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja.

A 6(1) applied in the present case. The applicants had a right to claim restitution, a right which was of a pecuniary nature, and there was a serious dispute about whether they were actually entitled to restitution. Moreover, A 6(1) applied to proceedings before Constitutional Courts.

In itself, the gathering of additional evidence by a court was not incompatible with the requirements of a fair hearing. In the present case, only the fact that the documentary evidence collected by the Constitutional Court on its own initiative was not communicated to the applicants raised a problem. The documentary evidence in issue was not communicated to either of the parties to the dispute before the Constitutional Court and therefore no infringement of equality of arms had been established. However, the concept of a fair hearing also implied the right to adversarial proceedings, according to which the parties had to have the opportunity not only to make known any evidence needed for their claims to succeed, but also to have knowledge of, and comment on, all evidence adduced or observations filed, with a view to influencing the court's decision. It was of paramount importance to give the applicants an opportunity to comment on the documentary evidence concerning the number of employees if they wished to do so. Even if the documentary evidence was submitted and read during the oral hearing, that would not have satisfied the right of the applicants to adversarial proceedings, given the character and importance of this evidence. A party to the proceedings had to have the possibility to familiarise itself with the evidence before the court, as well as the possibility to comment on its existence, contents and authenticity in an appropriate form and within an appropriate time, if need be, in a written form and in advance. The parties to a dispute might legitimately expect to be consulted as to whether a specific document called for their comments. What was particularly at stake here was the applicants' confidence in the workings of constitutional justice, which was based on, inter alia, the assumption that they were afforded the opportunity to express their views on every document in the file concerning their constitutional appeal. In the present case, respect for the right to a fair hearing, guaranteed by A 6(1), required that the applicants be given the opportunity to comment on the documentary evidence produced at the request of the Constitutional Court by the national authorities. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

Damages (CZK 1,350,000 to each of the applicants), costs and expenses (CZK 80,000).

Kremzow v Austria (1994) 17 EHRR 322 93/38

Mr Friedrich Wilhelm Kremzow was a judge until 1978, when he retired for health reasons. He then worked as a consultant for various practising lawyers. On 18 December 1984, he was found guilty of murder of one of the lawyers and of unlawful possession of a firearm by the Assize Court. He was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment and ordered to be committed to an institution for mentally deranged criminals. He filed a plea of nullity with the Supreme Court complaining, inter alia, that he had been denied the right to defend himself and that the trial had not been fair. Other appeals against sentence were also filed. The Attorney General submitted a position paper on the nullity plea. The pleas of nullity and the appeals were heard by the Supreme Court in the absence of the applicant. He was represented by his official defence counsel. The court rejected the applicant's pleas of nullity and sentenced him to life imprisonment to be served in an ordinary prison. He complained, inter alia, about the trial proceedings before the Assize Court, that he was not allowed to be present in person at the Supreme Court's hearing, that the Supreme Court proceedings were unfair in that the court's judgment was prepared and communicated to the Attorney General before the hearing and that he did not have sufficient time to prepare his defence.

Comm found by majority (11–3) V 6(1) and 6(3)(c) in that the applicant was not allowed to be present in person at the Supreme Court's hearing, not necessary to examine 14+6 in respect of the same complaint, unanimously NV 6(1) with regard to the fact that a draft judgment had been prepared before the Supreme Court's hearing, (8–6) V 6(1)+6(3)(b) in that he had not been granted sufficient opportunities to obtain, and to comment on, the Attorney General's position paper, unanimously NV 6 as regards his remaining complaints concerning the fairness of the Supreme Court's proceedings, unanimously NV 13, NV 14+5.

Court found unanimously not necessary to decide the Government's preliminary objection in respect of the applicant's complaint that he was not present at the hearing of the pleas of nullity, dismissed the Government's preliminary objection in respect of the applicant's complaint that he was not present at the hearing of the appeals, found NV 6(1)+6(3)(b), NV 6(1)+6(3)(c) as regards the applicant's absence at the hearing of the pleas of nullity, V 6(1)+6(3)(c) as regards the applicant's absence at the hearing of the appeals, NV 6(1) in respect of the remaining complaints under that provision, NV 6(2), not necessary to examine the applicant's complaints under 13 and 14.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk.

The Attorney General's position paper of 49 pages was served on counsel on 9 June 1986, some three weeks before the date fixed for the oral hearing, giving sufficient opportunity to formulate a reply in time for the oral hearing of 2 July 1986. Although the applicant may have been to some extent disadvantaged in the preparation of his defence, he nevertheless had 'adequate time and facilities' to formulate his response to the Attorney General's position paper and accordingly, there had been no breach of A 6(1) and 6(3)(b).

Restriction of the right to inspect the court file to an accused's lawyer was not incompatible with the rights of the defence under A 6. There was no indication that the notification of the Supreme Court's decision on the day of the hearing unduly hampered the defence in the preparation of its case. There had therefore been no breach in that regard.

A 6 extended to nullity and appeal. However, the personal attendance of the defendant did not necessarily take on the same significance for an appeal or nullity hearing as it did for a trial hearing. Even where an appeal court had full jurisdiction to review the case on questions both of fact and of law, A 6 did not always require a right to a public hearing and a right to be present in person. Regard had to be had to the special features of the proceedings involved and the manner in which the defence's interests were presented and protected before the appellate court, particularly in the light of the issues to be decided by it and their importance for the appellant. The nullity proceedings were primarily concerned with questions of law that arose in regard to the conduct of the trial and other matters. As the applicant was legally represented, neither A 6(1) nor 6(3)(c) required his presence at the nullity proceedings. His lawyer was able to make submissions. There had been no breach on that point. The appeal proceedings were of crucial importance for the applicant and involved an assessment of his character and state of mind at the time of the offence and his motive. Given the gravity of what was at stake for the applicant, he ought to have been able to defend himself in person as required by A 6(3)(c). The State was under a positive duty, notwithstanding his failure to make a request, to ensure his presence in court in such circumstances. There had been a breach of A 6(1) and 6(3)(c).

A draft judgment prepared in advance and then discussed informally by members of the Chamber need not in any way bind the Supreme Court or preclude it from amending the draft and reaching a different view after hearing the parties. Therefore, no infringement of A 6(1) in that respect.

There was no time limit for the submission of the Attorney General's position paper. Although the Attorney General's office was required to familiarise itself with the case at a later and separate phase of the procedure, the defence was not in any way prejudiced by the difference in that regard. Although the name of the judge rapporteur was wrongfully disclosed to the Attorney General's office, that in itself could not render the proceedings unfair. There was no evidence that a copy of the draft judgment was forwarded to the Attorney General's office. Accordingly, there had been no breach of A 6(1) in respect of those matters.

The applicant had already been found guilty of murder and the Supreme Court's remarks regarding financial misdeeds related solely to the question of his motive for the offence and could not be construed as a finding that the applicant was guilty of a specific offence. No question of a violation of the presumption of innocence arose.

In view of the Court's finding of a violation concerning the applicant's absence at the hearing of the appeals, it did not consider it necessary to examine his allegation of a breach of A 14+6. The applicant did not appear to have maintained before the Court the other complaints raised before the Commission.

Kristinsson v Iceland (1991) 13 EHRR 238 90/4

[Application lodged 10.4.1986; Commission report 8.3.1989; Court Judgment 1.3.1990]

Jón Kristinsson was summonsed to appear before the criminal court for two offences of speeding and failing to observe a stop sign. The investigation was instigated by the chief of police, who was also the town magistrate. The applicant complained about impartiality. He was convicted, fined and ordered to pay costs. He appealed to the Supreme Court, who acquitted him of the charge of non-observance of the stop sign, but upheld the speeding charge and rejected the complaint of impartiality.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached by the Government and the applicant and had regard to the changes in Icelandic law creating new posts of district court judge and also noted its own case-law on the matter.

FS (Icelandic State Treasury reimbursed the applicant for his fine and the costs the sum of ISK 80,003, costs in respect of his application to the European Commission of Human Rights, totalling ISK 461,130), therefore case struck out of the list.

Kroon and Others v The Netherlands (1995) 19 EHHR 263 94/34

The first applicant, Catharina Kroon, and the second applicant, Ali Zerrouk, were not living together at the time, but had a stable relationship from which the third applicant, Samir M'Hallem-Driss, was born in 1987. The first applicant had been previously married to Mr Omar M'Hallem-Driss, but the marriage had broken down in 1980. Samir was registered as the son of Mrs Kroon and Mr M'Hallem-Driss. One month after Samir's birth, the first applicant instituted divorce proceedings in the Amsterdam Regional Court, which became final in July 1988. In October 1988, Mrs Kroon and Mr Zerrouk requested the Amsterdam registrar of births, deaths and marriages to allow Mrs Kroon to make a statement before him to the effect that Mr M'Hallem-Driss was not Samir's father and thus make it possible for Mr Zerrouk to recognise the child as his. The registrar refused, noting that Samir had been born while Mrs Kroon was still married to Mr M'Hallem-Driss, so that unless the latter brought proceedings to deny paternity recognition by another man, was impossible under Netherlands law as it stood. The applicants applied to the Amsterdam Regional Court for an order directing the registrar to add to the register of births Mrs Kroon's statement that Mr M'Hallem-Driss was not Samir's father and with Mr Zerrouk's recognition of Samir. The Regional Court refused their request. Their subsequent appeals to the Amsterdam Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court were also rejected. They complained that they were unable under Netherlands law to obtain recognition of Mr Zerrouk's paternity of Samir and that while a married man might deny the paternity of a child born in wedlock, it was not open to a married woman to do so.

Comm found by majority (12–6) V 8, unanimously NV 14+8.

Court found by majority (8–1) A 8 applicable, (7–2) V 8, unanimously no separate issue arises under 14+8.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (d), Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (d), Mr D Gotchev.

The notion of 'family life' in A 8 was not confined solely to marriage-based relationships and might encompass other de facto family ties where parties were living together outside marriage. Although, as a rule, living together may be a requirement for such a relationship, exceptionally other factors could also demonstrate that a relationship had sufficient constancy to create de facto family ties. That was the case here as, since 1987, four children had been born to the first and second applicants. A child born of such a relationship was ipso jure part of that 'family unit' from the moment of its birth and by the very fact of it. There was thus, between the second and third applicants, a bond amounting to family life, whatever the contribution of the latter to his son's care and upbringing, and A 8 was therefore applicable. The essential object of A 8 was to protect the individual against arbitrary action by public authorities. There may additionally be positive obligations inherent in effective 'respect' for family life, although the boundaries between the State's positive and negative obligations did not lend themselves to precise definition. However, the applicable principles were similar: in both contexts, regard had to be had to the fair balance to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole; and in both contexts the State enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation. Where the existence of a family tie with a child had been established, the State had to act in a manner calculated to enable that tie to be developed, and legal safeguards had to be established that rendered possible as from the moment of birth or as soon as practicable thereafter the child's integration in his family. In this case, there was a positive obligation to allow complete legal family ties to be formed between the second applicant and his son S as expeditiously as possible. Under Netherlands law, the ordinary instrument for creating family ties between the second and third applicants was recognition. However, since Samir was the legitimate child of Mr M'Hallem-Driss, the second applicant would only be in a position to recognise Samir after Mr M'Hallem-Driss's paternity had been successfully denied. Except for Mr M'Hallem-Driss himself, who was untraceable, only the first applicant could deny Mr M'Hallem-Driss's paternity. However, under Netherlands law, the possibility for the mother of a legitimate child to deny the paternity of her husband was only open in respect of a child born within a specified time within the dissolution of the marriage. This was not open to the first applicant, since Samir was born when she was still married. Respect for family life required that biological and social reality prevailed over a legal presumption which flew in the face of both established fact and the wishes of those concerned without actually benefiting anyone. The Netherlands had failed to secure to the applicants respect for their family life, and there was accordingly a violation of A 8.

The complaint under A 14 was essentially the same as that under A 8, and a violation of A 8 having been found, no separate issue arose under that article in conjunction with A 14.

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (by majority (8–1) NLG 20,000 less FF 13,855.85).

Kruslin v France (1990) 12 EHRR 547 90/8

[Application lodged 16.10.1985; Commission report 14.12.1988; Court Judgment 24.4.1990]

Mr Jean Kruslin, the applicant, was convicted of armed robbery. Evidence against him included a taped record of his telephone conversation on a line which had been tapped in relation to other proceedings. He complained of the interception and recording of his telephone conversation.

Comm found by majority (10–2) V 8.

Court found unanimously V 8.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans.

Although it was the line of a third party which was being tapped, the tapping amounted to an interference by a public authority of the applicant's right to respect for his correspondence and private life. 'In accordance with the law' required the measure to have some basis in domestic law, referred to the quality of the law and required it to be accessible, foreseeable and compatible with the rule of law. 'Prescribed by law' covered not only statute, but also unwritten law. In this case, the interference had a legal basis in French law. Accessibility to law did not raise a problem in this case. Regarding the quality of evidence, there had to be protection against arbitrary interference by public authorities, sufficient clarity and the scope of any discretion had to be indicated. There were some safeguards in the Code and in judgments, but there were not adequate safeguards against various possible abuses. There was no definition of the categories of people who could have their phones tapped or the offences which could give rise to such an order. There was no limit on the duration of the tapping. The procedure for drawing up summary reports of the intercepted conversations was not specified. The precautions for communicating the recordings and their handling and circumstances for their destruction were also unspecified. French law did not indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of the discretion on the authorities and did not provide the applicants with a minimum degree of protection to which they were entitled under the rule of law in a democratic society. They suffered little or no harm, as the tapping did not serve as a basis for the prosecution, but a violation was conceivable even in the absence of any detriment. There had been a breach of A 8.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for damage. Costs and expenses (FF 20,000).

Kuopila v Finland 00/130

[Application lodged 23.11.1994; Court Judgment 27.4.2000]

Ms Kaija Kuopila, the applicant, was an art dealer. At the beginning of November 1990, she obtained through a transfer of a sales commission a painting that was to be sold by the end of November. A statement of 1955, according to which the painting was an authentic work of Helene Schjerfbeck (a famous Finnish artist), was attached on the back of the painting. The applicant sold the painting to a third person, but did not pay the owner the amount due. She was charged with aggravated fraud and embezzlement in autumn 1991. In February 1992, the applicant, who had doubts as to whether the painting was authentic, requested the court to authorise and order the examination of its authenticity. The District Court refused, and in May 1992, it convicted her and sentenced her to imprisonment totaling two years and six months. She appealed to the Court of Appeal. Following a further investigation, the police obtained from the National Gallery of Finland a statement according to which the painting was not authentic. The Prosecutor submitted a supplementary police report, including the National Gallery's statement, to the Court of Appeal. On 14 September 1993, the Court of Appeal upheld the judgment of the District Court without inviting the applicant to submit comments or holding an oral hearing. The court did not make any separate decision as to whether the supplementary police report had been taken into account as evidence or not. The applicant found out about the National Gallery's statement in the autumn of 1993. On 14 November 1993, she requested leave to appeal to the Supreme Court referring to the fresh statement and maintaining that if that information had been available in the lower courts, the outcome of the case would have been different. On 24 May 1994, the Supreme Court refused the applicant leave to appeal. Her subsequent petition with the Parliamentary Ombudsman resulted in a critical remark being addressed to the Prosecutor. The applicant complained that she was not afforded a fair trial due to the fact that vital evidence, in this case the statement from the National Gallery of Finland, was withheld from her.

Judges: Mr G Ress, President, Mr M Pellonpää, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr V Butkevych, Mrs N Vajic.

The supplementary police report, including the National Gallery's statement concerning the authenticity of the painting, was submitted to the Court of Appeal by the prosecutor only about a month before it delivered its judgment. The latter did not refer to that report in its reasoning. Whether the Court of Appeal put any emphasis on the report in its assessment of the case was not known. However, that was not decisive from the point of view of the applicant's right to adversarial proceedings. Under the principle of equality of arms, as a feature of the wider concept of a fair trial, each party had to be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present its case in conditions that did not place him at a disadvantage vis à vis his opponent. In the present case, the prosecutor had expressed his opinion on the relevance of the report to the Court of Appeal, thereby intending to influence the court's judgment. Procedural fairness required that the applicant, too, should have been given an opportunity to assess the relevance and weight of the supplementary police report and to formulate any such comment as she deemed appropriate. Consequently, the procedure did not enable the applicant to participate properly and in conformity with the principle of equality of arms in the proceedings before the Court of Appeal. Accordingly, there has been a violation of A6.

Non pecuniary damage (FIM 15,000), costs and expenses (FIM 30,000, less FF 5,100).

Kurt v Turkey (1999) 27 EHRR 373 98/39

The applicant, Mrs Koçeri Kurt, brought her application on behalf of herself and her son, Üzeyir Kurt. On 30 November 1993, she complained to the public prosecutor that her son had been taken into custody following a clash between the gendarmes and the PKK in her village and that she was concerned about his fate. Following an inquiry from the public prosecutor, the district gendarmerie stated that her son had not been taken into custody and that he may have been kidnapped by the PKK. The applicant made a further request for information about her son. She complained to the commission that he had been taken into custody and subsequently disappeared.

Comm found unanimously V 5 in respect of the disappearance of the applicant's son, by majority (19–5) V 3 in respect of the applicant, unanimously not necessary to examine separately 2 and 3 in relation to the applicant's son, V 13, NV 14, NV 18, Turkey had failed to comply with its obligations under 25(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found not necessary to decide on 2 or 3 in respect of applicant's son, by majority (6–3) V 5, V 3 in respect of the applicant herself, (7–2) V 13, unanimously NV 14+2, 14+3, 14+5 taken together with 2, 3 and 5, unanimously NV 18, by majority (6–3) failure to comply with 25(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr F Matscher (pd), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr U Lohmus.

The applicant confirmed her intention to take part in the proceedings, designated her legal representatives and was present at the hearing before the Court. The Government's preliminary objection that the applicant had never intended to lodge a complaint against the authorities before the Convention institutions was therefore dismissed. The Government's objection of non-exhaustion was not raised in their memorial, but only at the hearing, and therefore outside the time limit prescribed by the procedural rules. The objection therefore had to be dismissed. In any event, the applicant had done everything that could be expected of her to seek redress for the complaint.

The Commission meticulously addressed the discrepancies in the applicant's account as well as each of the Government's counter-arguments. The establishment and verification of the facts were primarily a matter for the Commission. The Court was not persuaded that there existed any exceptional circumstances which would compel it to reach a conclusion different from that of the Commission. There was sufficient factual and evidentiary basis on which the Commission could properly conclude, beyond reasonable doubt, that the applicant's son was detained in the circumstances alleged.

A 2: There was no concrete evidence to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the applicant's son was killed by the authorities either while in detention in the village or at some subsequent stage. The applicant's case rested entirely on presumptions deduced from the circumstances of her son's initial detention bolstered by more general analyses of an alleged officially tolerated practice of disappearances and associated ill-treatment and extra-judicial killing of detainees in the respondent State. Those arguments were not in themselves sufficient to compensate for the absence of more persuasive indications that her son did in fact meet his death in custody.

A 3 in respect of son: The applicant had not presented any specific evidence that her son was the victim of ill-treatment in breach of A 3; nor any evidence to substantiate her claim that an officially tolerated practice of disappearances and associated ill-treatment of detainees existed in the respondent State.

A 5: The Court noted the fundamental importance of the guarantees contained in A 5 and recalled its case-law. The unacknowledged detention of an individual was a complete negation of those guarantees and a most grave violation of A 5. Having assumed control over that individual, it was incumbent on the authorities to account for his or her whereabouts. For that reason, A 5 had to be seen as requiring the authorities to take effective measures to safeguard against the risk of disappearance and to conduct a prompt effective investigation into an arguable claim that a person had been taken into custody and had not been seen since. The absence of data recording such matters as the date, time and location of detention, the name of the detainee as well as the reasons for the detention and the name of the person effecting it had to be seen as incompatible with the purpose of A 5. The authorities failed to offer any credible and substantiated explanation for the whereabouts and fate of the applicant's son after he was detained in the village and no meaningful investigation was conducted into the applicant's insistence that he was in detention and that she was concerned for his life. They failed to discharge their responsibility to account for him and it had to be accepted that he had been held in unacknowledged detention in the complete absence of the safeguards contained in A 5. There had, therefore, been a particularly grave violation of the right to liberty and security of person guaranteed under A 5.

A 3 in respect of applicant: Ill-treatment had to attain a minimum level of severity to fall within the scope of A 3. The public prosecutor had given no serious consideration to the applicant's complaint. As a result, she had been left with the anguish of knowing that her son had been detained, an anguish endured over a prolonged period of time. She was the mother of the victim of a human rights violation and herself the victim of the authorities' complacency in the face of her anguish and distress. The respondent State was therefore in breach of A 3 in respect of the applicant.

A 13 guaranteed the availability at the national level of a remedy to enforce the substance of the Convention rights and freedoms in whatever form they might happen to be secured in the domestic legal order. The scope of the obligation under A 13 varied depending on the nature of the applicant's complaint under the Convention. Nevertheless, the remedy required by A 13 had to be 'effective' in practice as well as in law, in particular in the sense that its exercise should not be unjustifiably hindered by the acts or the omissions of the authorities of the respondent State. Where the relatives of a person had an arguable claim that the latter had disappeared at the hands of the authorities, the notion of an effective remedy for the purposes of A 13 entailed, in addition to the payment of compensation where appropriate, a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible and including effective access for the relatives to the investigatory procedure. Seen in those terms, the requirements of A 13 were broader than a Contracting State's obligation under A 5 to conduct an effective investigation into the disappearance of a person who had been shown to be under their control and for whose welfare they were accordingly responsible. In view, in particular, of the lack of any meaningful investigation, the applicant was denied an effective remedy in respect of her complaint that her son had disappeared in circumstances engaging the responsibility of the authorities. There had therefore been a violation of A 13.

A 14: The evidence presented by the applicant did not substantiate her allegation that her son was the deliberate target of a forced disappearance on account of his ethnic origin. Accordingly, there had been no violation of the Convention under A 14.

The applicant had not substantiated her complaint under A 18 (limitation on use of restrictions on rights).

A 25: It was of the utmost importance for the effective operation of the system of individual petition instituted by A 25 that applicants or potential applicants were able to communicate freely with the Commission without being subjected to any form of pressure from the authorities to withdraw or modify their complaints. The expression 'any form of pressure' had to be taken to cover not only direct coercion and flagrant acts of intimidation of applicants or potential applicants or their families or legal representatives, but also other improper indirect acts or contacts designed to dissuade or discourage them from pursuing a Convention remedy. Whether or not contacts between the authorities and an applicant or potential applicant were tantamount to unacceptable practices from the standpoint of A 25 had to be determined in the light of the particular circumstances at issue. Regard had to be had to the vulnerability of the complainant and his or her susceptibility to influence exerted by the authorities. Villagers in the south-east of Turkey were in a vulnerable position as complaints against the authorities might give rise to a legitimate fear of reprisals. The applicant was subjected to indirect and improper pressure to make statements in respect of her application to the Commission which interfered with the free exercise of her right of individual petition guaranteed under A 25. The moves made by the authorities to institute criminal proceedings against the applicant's lawyer, even though they were not followed up, had to be considered an interference with the exercise of the applicant's right of individual petition and incompatible with the respondent State's obligation under A 25.

The Court had rejected the applicant's complaints that there existed a practice of violation of A 2 and 3, being of the view that the applicant had not substantiated her allegations. It was not persuaded either that the evidence which she had adduced substantiated her allegations as to the existence of a practice of violation of either A 5 or A 13 of the Convention.

Non-pecuniary damage (by majority (8–1) GBP 15,000 for applicant's son and his heirs GBP 10,000 for applicant), costs and expenses, (GBP 15,000 less FF 27,763).

Kurt Nielsen v Denmark 00/70

[Application lodged 23.9.1996; Court Judgment 15.2.2000]

On 12 November 1986, Mr Kurt Nielsen, the applicant, was involved in a car accident which left him severely injured and partly disabled. On 26 February 1988, the applicant instituted proceedings against three insurance companies in the City Court. The applicant made a number of requests to the National Board of Industrial Injuries for expert opinions. On 25 January 1995, the case was heard by the City Court which, in a judgment of 15 February 1995, held that the defendant companies were held liable to make payment to the applicant. The defendants appealed to the High Court of Western Denmark. By judgment of 9 September 1996, the High Court upheld the judgment of the City Court. The applicant complained about the length of the civil proceedings.

Judges: Mr CL Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr G Bonello, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr AB Baka, Mr E Levits.

The relevant period began on 26 February 1988 when the applicant instituted proceedings before the City Court. It ended on 9 September 1996 with the judgment of the High Court of Western Denmark. It therefore lasted eight years, six months, 13 days for two levels of jurisdiction. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of parties. On the latter point, what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation had to be taken into account in certain cases. Even if the case was of some complexity, that could not reasonably explain the length of the proceedings exceeding eight years and six months for two instances. What was at stake for the applicant was a considerable amount mainly intended to compensate his disablement and loss of working capacity. Under those circumstances, special expedition was called for. The applicant's conduct could not justify the total duration of the proceedings. Only delays imputable to the relevant judicial and administrative authorities could justify a finding that a reasonable time has been exceeded, contrary to the Convention. The Contracting Parties were, however, also responsible for delays attributable to public law organs, like municipal authorities, which, although they were not organs of the State, performed official duties assigned to them by law. The fact that delays to some extent were caused by the conduct of the defendants in the proceedings did not in itself lead to the finding that those delays could not be attributed to the State. Even in legal systems applying the principle that the procedural initiative lies with the parties, the latter's attitude does not absolve the courts from the obligation to ensure the expeditious trial required by A 6(1). The applicant's requests to the National Board of Industrial Injuries were all approved by the City Court, and the last one also approved by the High Court. Having regard to the delays imputable to the State, the overall duration of the proceedings and what was at stake for the applicant, the reasonable time requirement was not satisfied.

Non-pecuniary damage (DKK 70,000). No claim made for costs and expenses.

[Application lodged 7.9.1994; Court Judgment 27.4.2000]

The first applicant was the adopted son of the second applicant ('the applicant grandfather'). The applicant father had two daughters, born in 1985 and 1991, whose mother was hospitalised several times after the birth of the second child on account of her mental health. In January 1992, the children were placed in provisional public care, on suspicion that the older child had been sexually abused and that the younger child was in serious danger of being subjected to similar abuse. The Social Welfare Board restricted the parents' right of access to the older child to two weekly visits at the hospital and decided not to disclose the younger child's whereabouts. The parents appealed to the County Administrative Court which dismissed their appeals without holding an oral hearing. Their subsequent appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court was also rejected. The parents divorced in 1996. The restrictions remained in force. The applicant grandfather appealed against access prohibitions imposed on him; his appeals were dismissed by the courts. In 1996, the older child stated that she did not wish to meet her father as often as the visits were taking place and did not wish to meet her grandparents at all. In 1998, the access restrictions were continued on the ground that both applicants had sexually abused the older girl. They did not appeal that decision. The applicants complained that the taking of the children into public care was too drastic a measure and that especially after that measure, the authorities had not aimed at effectively reuniting the family. They also complained that their right to a fair trial had been violated as the Country Administrative Court refused to hold an oral hearing. They further complained that they had been deprived of an effective remedy under A 13.

Court found unanimously NV 8, NV 13, V 6(1).

Judges: Mr G Ress, President, Mr M Pellonpää, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mr V Butkevych, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mr S Botoucharova.

The mutual enjoyment by parent and child, as well as by grandparent and child, of each other's company constituted a fundamental element of family life, and domestic measures hindering such enjoyment amounted to an interference with the right protected by A 8 of the Convention. The impugned measures amounted to interference with the applicants' right to respect for their family life unless they were in accordance with the law, pursued an aim or aims that was legitimate under A 8(2) and could be regarded as necessary in a democratic society. The impugned measures had a basis in national law. The relevant Finnish law was aimed at protecting health or morals and the rights and freedoms of children. The children were taken into care for reasons which were not only relevant but also sufficient for the purposes of A 8(2), the national authorities having acted within the margin of appreciation afforded to them. The appeals open to the applicants before the County Administrative Court and the Supreme Administrative Court satisfied the conditions of A 13. Accordingly, the taking into public care did not constitute a violation of A 8 and 13. Taking a child into care should normally be regarded as a temporary measure to be discontinued as soon as circumstances permitted, any measures of implementation of temporary care had to be consistent with the ultimate aim of reuniting the natural parent and the child. The question of whether the continuation of the implementation of the care measures was justified had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances and their development since 1992. In that regard, it was observed that the applicant father and the mother of the children had separated before the request was made and did not constitute a family any more. The rights and interests of the mother had also to be taken into account. In these circumstances the national authorities could, in the exercise of their discretion, consider the maintenance of the care order to be in the best interest of the children. The rejection of the applicant father's request of September 1994 satisfied the requirements of A 8(2). The failure of the authorities to terminate the care at a later date did not violate that article. The continuation of the public care did not constitute a violation of A 8 and 13. While the applicant father's access has been considerably restricted, he had been able to meet the children regularly. The decisions concerning the applicant father's access could be regarded as fulfilling the principle of proportionality and therefore as necessary in a democratic society. The applicant grandfather had been suspected of the sexual abuse of the older child and both children had later indicated that they did not wish to meet him at all. In those circumstances, the national authorities could reasonably consider that restriction to be necessary in a democratic society. In addition, the appeals which were open to the applicants before the County Administrative Court met the conditions of A 13. Accordingly, those measures did not constitute a violation of A 8 and 13.

The instrument of ratification of the Convention deposited by the Finnish Government on 10 May 1990 contained a reservation according to which Finland could not guarantee a right to an oral hearing before the courts mentioned in the reservation. The reservation was, however, withdrawn, in so far as administrative courts were concerned as from 1 December 1996, ie, before the proceedings leading to the decision of the County Administrative Court of 17 March 1997 had been instituted. At no stage of the previous proceedings had there been an oral hearing. In view of that, the nature of the issues and of what was at stake for the applicants, the Court was not satisfied that there were exceptional circumstances which would have justified dispensing with a hearing. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(1) on account of the lack of an oral hearing before the County Administrative Court in the proceedings ending on 17 March 1997.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Legal fees and expenses (FIM 35,000 less FF 24,560.60).

LCB v United Kingdom (1999) 27 EHRR 212 98/44

[Application lodged 21.4.1993; Commission report 26.11.1996; Court Judgment 9.6.1998]

Between 1952 and 1967 the UK carried out a number of atmospheric tests of nuclear weapons in the Pacific Ocean and at Maralinga, Australia, involving over 20,000 servicemen. Among these tests were a series of six detonations at Christmas Island in the Pacific Ocean (November 1957–September 1958) of weapons many times more powerful than those discharged at Hiroshima and Nagasaki. During the Christmas Island tests, service personnel were ordered to line up in the open and to face away from the explosions with their eyes closed and covered until 20 seconds after the blast. Ms LCB, the applicant, alleged that the purpose of this procedure was deliberately to expose servicemen to radiation for experimental purposes. The Government denied this and stated that it was believed at the time of the tests, and was the case, that personnel were sufficiently far from the centre of the detonations to avoid being exposed to radiation at any harmful level and that the purpose of the line-up procedure was to ensure that they avoided eye damage and other physical injury caused by material blown about by the blast. While the applicant's father was serving as a catering assistant in the Royal Air Force, he was present at Christmas Island during four nuclear tests in 1957 and 1958. He also participated in the clean-up programme following the tests. The applicant was born in 1966 and in about 1970 she was diagnosed as having leukaemia. She received chemotherapy treatment which lasted until she was 10 years old. Because of her illness and associated treatment she missed half of her primary school education and was unable to participate in sports or other normal childhood activities. In December 1992, she became aware of the contents of a report prepared by the British Nuclear Tests Veterans' Association indicating a high incidence of cancers including leukaemia in the children of Christmas Island veterans. The applicant complained, inter alia, under A 2 and 3 of the Convention that she had not been warned of the effects of her father's alleged exposure to radiation.

Comm found unanimously NV 2, NV 3.

Court found unanimously no jurisdiction to consider the applicant's complaint under 2 concerning the State's failure to monitor the extent of her father's exposure to radiation, NV 2 in relation to the State's failure to advise the applicant's parents and monitor her health prior to her diagnosis with leukaemia, NV 3, no jurisdiction to consider the applicant's complaints under 8 and 13 concerning the State's failure to create individual dose records of her father's exposure to radiation and the withholding of contemporaneous records of levels of radiation, not necessary to consider 8 concerning the State's failure to advise the applicant's parents and monitor her health prior to her diagnosis with leukaemia.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr I Foighel, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr B Repik, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr J Casadevall.

The applicant's complaint about the failure of the respondent State to monitor the extent of her father's exposure to radiation on Christmas Island was not raised before the Commission and as the scope of the Court's jurisdiction was determined by the Commission's decision on admissibility, the Court had no power to entertain a new and separate complaint. In any case, the complaint was based on events which took place in 1958, before the UK's A 25 and 46 declarations of 14 January 1966. The Court therefore had no jurisdiction to consider it.

A 2(1) enjoined the State not only to refrain from the intentional and unlawful taking of life, but also to take appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction. It could not be known with any certainty whether, in the course of his duties, the applicant's father was exposed to dangerous levels of radiation. Contemporaneous measurements of radiation on Christmas indicated that radiation did not reach dangerous levels in the areas in which ordinary servicemen were stationed. The State authorities could reasonably have been confident that her father had not been dangerously irradiated. The State could only have been required of its own motion to take steps in relation to the applicant if it had appeared likely at that time that any exposure of her father to radiation might have engendered a real risk to her health. It had not been established that there was a causal link between the exposure of a father to radiation and leukaemia in a child subsequently conceived. It was not established that, given the information available to the State at the relevant time concerning the likelihood of the applicant's father having been exposed to dangerous levels of radiation and of this having created a risk to her health, it could have been expected to act of its own motion to notify her parents of these matters or to take any other special action in relation to her. There had been no violation of A 2.

For the reasons referred to in connection with A 2 it had not been established that there had been a violation by the respondent State of A 3.

The complaints under A 8 and 13 were not raised before the Commission and the Court therefore had no jurisdiction to consider them. However, having examined the question of the State's failure of its own motion to advise her parents and monitor her health prior to her diagnosis with leukaemia from the standpoint of A 2, no relevant separate issue could arise under A 8, and it was therefore unnecessary to examine the complaint further.

Labita v Italy 00/125

[Application lodged 10.4.1994; Commission report 29.10.1998; Court Judgment 6.4.2000]

Mr Benedetto Labita, the applicant, was arrested on 21 April 1992 on suspicion of being a member of a mafia-type organisation on the basis of statements made by a pentito (a former mafioso who has decided to co-operate with the authorities). The applicant was initially detained at Palermo Prison and then transferred to the prison on the island of Pianosa. His applications for bail were refused. In November 1994, the applicant was acquitted and his release was ordered. An appeal by the prosecutor was dismissed in December 1995. The applicant complained that whilst detained in Pianosa Prison he was subject to ill-treatment by warders which included slapping, squeezing of testicles, beatings, body searches when showering, handcuffing during medical examinations, intimidation. He complained about the ill-treatment, but criminal proceedings were discontinued, as the perpetrators could not be identified. The applicant had been detained under a special security regime and his correspondence was censored. After his acquittal, preventive measures were applied (including curfew, reporting weekly to the police, prohibition on going to public meetings or associating with persons with a criminal record, prohibited from travelling abroad). The measures had the effect of depriving him of his voting rights. His attempts to have the measures lifted were rejected. In January 1998, he was awarded ITL 64 million compensation for his 'unjust' detention. He complained of his detention and treatment.

Comm found unanimously V 3, V 5(3), 5(1), V 8, no separate issue under 6(3), by majority (21–7) V P4A2, (23–5) V P1A3.

Court found by majority (9–8) NV 3 as regards the applicant's allegations of ill-treatment in prison, unanimously V 3 as regards lack of effective official investigation into allegations, NV 3 on account of the conditions of transfer from prison, applicant could claim to be a 'victim' for the purposes of 34 as regards the length of his pre-trial detention, V 5(3) on account of the length of detention pending trial, V 5(1) on account of the applicant's detention after 12.25 am on 13 November 1994, V 8 on account of the censorship of the applicant's correspondence, not necessary to examine the issue of censorship of the applicant's correspondence with his lawyers under A 6(3), V P4A2 on account of the preventive measures imposed on the applicant, V P1A3 on account of the applicant's disenfranchisement.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo (JPD), Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Bonello (JPD), Mr J Makarczyk (JPD), Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (JPD), Mrs V Stráznická (JPD), Mr V Butkevych (JPD), Mr J Casadevall (JPD), Mr B Zupancic (JPD), Mrs HS Greve, Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova.

Ill-treatment had to attain a minimum level of severity to fall within the scope of A 3. The assessment of that minimum was relative: it depended on all the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment, its physical and mental effects and, in some cases, the sex, age and state of health of the victim. In respect of a person deprived of his liberty, recourse to physical force which had not been made strictly necessary by his own conduct diminished human dignity and was in principle an infringement of A 3. Allegations of ill-treatment had to be supported by appropriate evidence. To assess that evidence, the Court adopted the standard of proof 'beyond reasonable doubt', but such proof could follow from the co-existence of sufficiently strong, clear and concordant inferences or of similar unrebutted presumptions of fact. The applicant had not produced any conclusive evidence in support of his allegations of ill-treatment or supplied a detailed account of the abuse to which the warders at Pianosa Prison allegedly subjected him. The Court recognised that it may prove difficult for prisoners to obtain evidence of ill-treatment by their prison warders and that they could fear reprisals from warders who were denounced. However, the applicant had not suggested that he was ever refused permission to see a doctor, yet he did not complain about his treatment until the preliminary hearing a year after the most recent incidents and had not given any explanation for that delay. The material available did not constitute sufficient evidence to support that conclusion that the applicant was subjected to physical and mental ill-treatment and that finding was not called into question by the judge's report on the general conditions in Pianosa prison. There was insufficient evidence to conclude that there had been a violation of A 3.

Where an individual made a credible assertion that he had suffered treatment infringing A 3 at the hands of the police or other similar agents of the State, that provision, read in conjunction with the State's general duty under A 1, required by implication that there should be an effective official investigation. Such investigation should be capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible. Otherwise, the general legal prohibition of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment would, despite its fundamental importance, be ineffective in practice and it would be possible in some cases for agents of the State to abuse the rights of those within their control with virtual impunity. The State authorities conducted certain investigations; however, the Court was not satisfied that those investigations were sufficiently thorough and effective to satisfy the requirements of A 3. The investigation was very slow. Although the applicant maintained that he would be able to recognise the warders concerned if he could see them in person, nothing was done to enable him to do so. The applicant's complaint was not an isolated one. In those circumstances, having regard to the lack of a thorough and effective investigation into the credible allegation made by the applicant that he had been ill-treated by warders when detained at Pianosa Prison, there had been a violation of A 3.

With regard to the applicant's complaint about the conditions in which prisoners were transferred from Pianosa to other prisons, he had not supplied detailed information and there was insufficient evidence to conclude that there had been a violation of A 3 on that account.

Despite the payment of a sum as reparation for the time he spent in detention pending trial, the applicant could still claim to be a 'victim' within the meaning of A 34 of a violation of A 5(3). The period to be taken into consideration began on 21 April 1992, when the applicant was taken into custody. The end of the period referred to in A 5(3) was the day on which the charge was determined, even if only by a court of first instance. The applicant's detention pending trial for the purposes of A 5(3) therefore ended on 12 November 1994. The period to be taken into consideration therefore lasted almost two years and seven months. Whether it was reasonable for an accused to remain in detention had to be assessed in each case according to its special features. Continued detention could be justified in a given case only if there were specific indications of a genuine requirement of public interest which, notwithstanding the presumption of innocence, outweighed the rule of respect for individual liberty. In refusing to release the applicant, the authorities relied on the existence of serious evidence of his guilt, the danger of pressure being brought to bear on witnesses and the risk of evidence being tampered with and on the presumption created by the Code of Criminal Procedure. The allegations against the applicant came from the single source of a pentito. Although the co-operation of pentiti was a very important weapon in the fight against the Mafia, the risk that a person might be accused and arrested on the basis of unverified allegations should not be underestimated. Statements of pentiti had to be corroborated by other evidence and hearsay to be supported by objective evidence, especially when a decision was being made whether to prolong detention pending trial, as such statements necessarily became less relevant with the passage of time. As the applicant had been acquitted due to the absence of other evidence, very compelling reasons would be required for the applicant's lengthy detention to be justified. The other grounds relied on stated in the relevant decisions were reasonable initially, but they referred to the prisoners as a whole and did not point to any factor capable of showing that the risks relied on actually existed and failed to establish that the applicant, who had no record and whose role in the mafia-type organisation concerned was said to be minor, posed a danger. No account was taken of the fact that the accusations against the applicant were based on evidence which, with time, had become weaker rather than stronger. Accordingly, the grounds stated in the decisions were not sufficient to justify the applicant's being kept in detention for two years and seven months.

A 5(1): The applicant maintained that he should have been freed immediately after his acquittal, whereas he was held in detention unlawfully for 12 hours after his acquittal. The list of exceptions to the right to liberty secured in A 5(1) was an exhaustive one and only a narrow interpretation of those exceptions was consistent with the aim of that provision, namely, to ensure that no one was arbitrarily deprived of his or her liberty. While some delay in carrying out a decision to release a detainee was often inevitable, it had to be kept to a minimum. The delay in the applicant's release was only partly attributable to the need for the relevant administrative formalities to be carried out; the additional delay was caused by the registration officer's absence. In those circumstances, the applicant's continued detention after his return to prison did not amount to a first step in the execution of the order for his release and therefore did not come within any of the sub-paragraphs of A 5.

A 8: There had been an interference by a public authority in the exercise of the applicant's right to respect for his correspondence. With regard to the period when the censorship of the applicant's correspondence was based on Law No 354 of 1975 it did not comply with A 8 due to the lack of clarity in the relevant provisions. With regard to the period when the censorship was based on an order of the Minister of Justice under the special regime provisions, the Italian Constitutional Court had held that the Minister of Justice had no power to take measures concerning prisoners' correspondence and the interference in that period was not therefore in accordance with the law. For one period, there was no legal basis whatsoever.

A 6(3): In the light of the conclusion regarding A 8, this complaint was absorbed by the preceding complaint.

P4A2: The applicant maintained that the fact that he had been placed under special police supervision despite his acquittal amounted to a breach of P4A2. He was subjected to very severe restrictions on his freedom of movement for three years, which undoubtedly amounted to an interference with his rights under P4A2. Those measures were in accordance with law and pursued legitimate aims of maintenance of public order and the prevention of crime. It was legitimate for preventive measures, including special supervision, to be taken against persons suspected of being members of the Mafia, even prior to conviction, as they were intended to prevent crimes being committed. Furthermore, an acquittal did not necessarily deprive such measures of all foundation, as concrete evidence gathered at trial, though insufficient to secure a conviction, could nonetheless justify reasonable fears that the person concerned may in the future commit criminal offences. In the present case, the decision to put the applicant under special supervision was taken at a time when there existed some evidence that he was a member of the Mafia, but the measure was not put into effect until after his acquittal by the District Court. The grounds relied on by the Italian courts for refusing to rescind the measure after the applicant's acquittal could not be regarded as having been necessary in a democratic society.

The rights under P1A3 were important, but not absolute. Temporarily suspending the voting rights of persons against whom there was evidence of Mafia membership pursued a legitimate aim. However, when the applicant's name was removed from the electoral register, after his acquittal, there was no concrete evidence on which a 'suspicion' that the applicant belonged to the Mafia could be based and the measure could not be regarded as proportionate.

Laghi v Italy 97/56

[Application lodged 11.5.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Luciano Laghi, an officer in the revenue police, instituted proceedings on 24 July 1985 in the Consiglio di Stato for judicial review of a decision of the Ministry of Finance assigning him to a rank lower than the one to which he considered himself to be entitled. He also sought a stay of execution of that decision. In a decision of 5 November 1985, the Consiglio di Stato allowed the application for a stay of execution. After a hearing on 2 February 1988, the Consiglio di Stato ordered the Ministry of Finance to produce various documents. In a judgment of 8 March 1994, the text of which was deposited with the registry on 14 July 1994, the Consiglio di Stato gave judgment against the applicant. The applicant complained about the length of proceedings.

In the law of many Member States there was a basic distinction between civil servants and employees governed by private law. That had led the Court to hold that 'disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1)'. In the present case the applicant sought only judicial review of the decision of the Ministry of Finance to assign him to a rank lower than the one to which he considered himself to be entitled. The dispute raised by him clearly related to his career and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

Laino v Italy 99/12

[Application lodged 12.6.1996; Commission report 16.9.1997; Court Judgment 18.2.1999]

Mr Michele Laino, the applicant, petitioned the Naples District Court for judicial separation from his wife on 15 March 1990. He also requested the court to determine the arrangements for custody of the children and use of the family home. In a judgment of 27 May 1998, the text of which was deposited with the registry on that day, the court pronounced the couple judicially separated, confirmed the provisional measures regarding custody of the children and use of the family home and increased the maintenance. Neither party appealed. The applicant complained about the length of the proceedings and his right to respect for his family life.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), not necessary to examine A 8.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (15–2) not necessary to examine A 8.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Ferrari Bravo (pd), Mr G Bonello, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr R Türmen, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jpd), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jpd), Mrs HS Greve, Mr A Baka, Mr R Maruste.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 15 March 1990, when the applicant petitioned the Naples District Court for judicial separation. It ended on 27 May 1998, the date of the Nola District Court's judgment. It therefore lasted just over 8 years and 2 months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed, in particular, in the light of the complexity of the case and of the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. In cases relating to civil status, what was at stake for the applicant was also a relevant consideration and special diligence was required in view of the possible consequences which the excessive length of proceedings might have, notably on enjoyment of the right to respect for family life. The respondent State could not be considered responsible for the delay caused by the attempt to reach an out-of-court settlement. The case was not particularly complex and the preparation for trial consisted essentially in hearing evidence from four witnesses at the hearing on 22 April 1993. Having regard to what was at stake for the applicant (judicial separation and determination of the arrangements for custody of the children and access rights), the domestic courts failed to act with the special diligence required by A 6(1). The various periods of inactivity attributable to the State failed to satisfy the reasonable time requirement. Having regard also to the total duration of the proceedings, the Court concluded that there has been a violation of A 6(1).

Having regard to the finding in respect of A 6(1), it was not necessary to examine A 8.

Lala v The Netherlands (1994) 18 EHRR 586 94/29

[Application lodged 8.3.1989; Commission report 4.5.1993; Court Judgment 22.9.1994]

Mr Radjinderpersad Roy Lala was convicted on 19 November 1986, after a trial in absentia by the Hague Regional Court for forgery in that he had concealed an income from work while enjoying social security benefits. He was sentenced to four weeks' imprisonment, two weeks of which were suspended for a probationary period of three years on condition, inter alia, that he co-operated in repaying the excess. He appealed to the Hague Court of Appeal. He failed to appear at the hearing of 7 September 1987, although his lawyer appeared. His conviction was upheld in part and sentence reduced. He appealed to the Supreme Court, complaining that his counsel had not had the last word in the proceedings before the Court of Appeal, that his counsel had not been allowed to conduct the defence and that the Court of Appeal had failed to determine whether the applicant had had a compelling and legitimate reason not to appear, in which case his counsel should have been entitled to conduct the defence in his client's absence. In its judgment of 27 September 1988, the Supreme Court dismissed his appeal. The applicant complained that he had not had a fair trial in that his counsel had not been heard by the Court of Appeal and his conviction had been based exclusively on prosecution evidence.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(c), no separate issue under 6(2).

Court found by majority (8–1) V 6(1)+6(3)(c), unanimously not necessary to consider 6(2).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (jc), President, Mr F Matscher (d), Mr B Walsh, Mr SK Martens, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (jc), Mr J Makarczyk.

The applicant's complaint was not that the appeal was heard in his absence (he had not availed himself of his right to attend), but rather that the Court of Appeal decided the case without his counsel, whom he had charged to conduct the defence and who attended the trial with the clear intention of doing so, being allowed to defend him. The case concerned a criminal appeal by way of rehearing, which was the last instance where, under domestic law, the case could be fully examined as to questions of both fact and law. In the interests of a fair and just criminal process, it was of capital importance that the accused should appear at his trial. As a general rule, that was equally true for an appeal by way of rehearing. However, it was also of crucial importance for the fairness of the criminal justice system that the accused be adequately defended, both at first instance and on appeal, the more so if, as is the case under Netherlands law, no objection could be filed against a default judgment given on appeal. The fact that the defendant, in spite of having been properly summoned, did not appear, could not, even in the absence of an excuse, justify depriving him of his right under A 6(3) to be defended by counsel. Everyone charged with a criminal offence had the right to be defended by counsel. For that right to be practical and effective, and not merely theoretical, its exercise should not be made dependent on the fulfilment of unduly formalistic conditions: it was for the courts to ensure that a trial was fair and, accordingly, that counsel who attended trial for the apparent purpose of defending the accused in his absence, was given the opportunity to do so. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1) taken together with A 6(3)(c).

The complaint under A 6(2) was not repeated before the Court and the Court therefore saw no need to address the matter of its own motion.

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction.

Lambert v France 98/66

[Application lodged 8.2.1994; Commission report 1.7.1997; Court Judgment 24.8.1998]

In the course of a judicial investigation into offences of theft, burglary, handling the proceeds of theft, aggravated theft, and unlawful possession of weapons and ammunition, an investigating judge issued a warrant instructing the gendarmerie to arrange for the telephone line of a certain RB to be tapped. As a result of the tapping and the interception of some of his conversations, Mr Michel Lambert, the applicant, was charged with handling the proceeds of aggravated theft. He applied to the Indictment Division of the Riom Court of Appeal for a ruling against the validity of the telephone tapping. His application was dismissed. His appeal to the Court of Cassation was also dismissed. He complained that the interception of certain telephone conversations which were used against him amounted to interference with his private life and correspondence and that he had not had an effective remedy in the Court of Cassation.

Comm found by majority (20–12) V 8, (27–5) not necessary to consider 13.

Court found unanimously V 8, not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Voicu, Mr V Butkevych.

As telephone conversations were covered by the notions of 'private life' and 'correspondence' within the meaning of A 8, the admitted measure of interception amounted to interference by a public authority. It was of little importance that the telephone tapping in question was carried out on the line of a third party. Such interference would contravene A 8 unless it was in accordance with the law, pursued one or more of the legitimate aims referred to in para 2 and was necessary in a democratic society in order to achieve them. The expression 'in accordance with the law' within the meaning of A 8(2) required the impugned measure to have some basis in domestic law and also required that it should be accessible to the person concerned, who had to be able to foresee its consequences for him, and compatible with the rule of law. The telephone tapping was on the basis of the Code of Criminal Procedure and so had a statutory basis in French law. The question of the accessibility of the law did not raise any problems in the present case. With regard to the 'foreseeability of the law', the Code of Criminal Procedure laid down clear, detailed rules and specified with sufficient clarity the scope and manner of exercise of the relevant discretion conferred on the public authorities. The interference was designed to establish the truth in connection with criminal proceedings and therefore to prevent disorder. The Court of Cassation in its judgment held that the applicant had no locus standi to challenge the manner in which the duration of the monitoring of a third party's telephone line was extended and found the Indictment Division had been wrong to examine the objections of invalidity raised by the applicant, as the telephone line being monitored had not been his own. The applicant could have availed himself of a remedy in respect of the disputed point in the Indictment Division. However, the Court of Cassation's reasoning could lead to decisions whereby a very large number of people were deprived of the protection of the law, namely all those who had conversations on a telephone line other than their own. That would in practice render the protective machinery largely devoid of substance. That was the case with the applicant, who did not enjoy the effective protection of national law, which did not make any distinction according to whose line was being tapped. The applicant therefore did not have available to him the effective control to which citizens were entitled under the rule of law and which would have been capable of restricting the interference in question to what was necessary in a democratic society. There had therefore been a violation of A 8.

In view of the preceding conclusion regarding A 8, it was not necessary to consider A 13.

Lamguindaz v United Kingdom 93/27

[Application lodged 6.2.1990; Commission report 13.10.1992; Court Judgment 23.6.1993]

Mr Ahmed Lamguindaz was a Moroccan citizen. He went to the UK in about 1974 to join his father who had settled there and had indefinite leave to remain. His mother and three brothers and sisters also moved to the UK. The applicant had a long criminal record for offences of dishonesty and violence. On 17 May 1985, he was convicted of wounding. On 19 February 1986, the Secretary of State for the Home Department decided to make a deportation order against him on the ground that such an order was 'conducive to the public good'. His appeal to the Immigration Appeal Tribunal was rejected. A deportation order was signed on 22 October 1986 and his subsequent application to the High Court for leave to apply for judicial review of the tribunal's decision was dismissed. In February 1988, the applicant was taken by his father to Morocco and left there in an attempt to keep him out of trouble with the police. He returned to the UK in September 1989 and was eventually deported on 12 May 1990 to Tangier. He has since remained in Morocco. He complained that his deportation was in breach of A 8 and 14.

Comm found by majority (13–1) V 8, not necessary to consider 14.

Court noted the friendly settlement and struck the case from the list.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached by the Government and the applicant and discerned no reason of public policy why the case should not be struck out of the list.

FS (Government proposed to revoke the deportation order against the applicant, allow the applicant to re-enter the UK, grant him indefinite leave to remain, allow him to make an application for naturalisation, pay GBP 8,398.02 in respect of costs and expenses), therefore SO.

Lamy v Belgium (1989) 11 EHRR 529 89/4

[Application lodged 20.6.1983; Commission report 8.10.1987; Court Judgment 30.3.1989]

Mr José Lamy was a company director. On 29 November 1982, a private limited company of which he was the manager and which built industrial premises filed a declaration of insolvency with the registry of the Verviers Commercial Court, and the court adjudged the company bankrupt on the same day. On 18 February 1983, an investigating judge of the Verviers tribunal de première instance questioned Mr Lamy and issued a warrant for his arrest on charges of fraudulent bankruptcy and other criminal bankruptcy matters and trading without business registration. On 12 November 1987, the Verviers Criminal Court convicted and sentenced him to three years' imprisonment, suspended for five years and imposed fines on him. He complained that neither he nor his counsel had had access to the investigation file when the arrest warrant was first confirmed by the chambre du conseil of the Verviers tribunal de première instance or when he appealed to the Indictments Chamber of the Liège Court of Appeal.

Comm found by majority (7–3) V 5(4), unanimously not necessary to consider 5(2) and 5(3), unanimously NV 6(3)(b).

Court found unanimously V 5(4), NV 5(2), NV 5(3), not necessary to examine 6(3)(b).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr JA Carrillo Salcedo.

During the first 30 days of custody, the applicant's counsel was, in accordance with the law as judicially interpreted, unable to inspect anything in the file, and in particular the reports made by the investigating judge and the Verviers police. Access to those documents was essential for the applicant at the crucial first appearance stage in the proceedings, when the court had to decide whether to remand him in custody or to release him. It was therefore essential to inspect the documents in question in order to challenge the lawfulness of the arrest warrant effectively. The appraisal of the need for a remand in custody and the subsequent assessment of guilt were too closely linked for access to documents to be refused in the former case when the law required it in the latter case. Whereas Crown Counsel was familiar with the whole file, the procedure did not afford the applicant an opportunity of challenging appropriately the reasons relied upon to justify a remand in custody. Since it failed to ensure equality of arms, the procedure was not truly adversarial. There was therefore a breach of A 5(4).

A 5(2): The applicant's arguments, that the judicial investigation had begun as a result of a report of which he had had no knowledge and so he could not effectively and usefully prepare his defence and make ready for his appearance before the chambre du conseil, were devoid of foundation. Apart from his questioning by the investigating judge, on the day of his arrest, the applicant was given a copy of the arrest warrant. That document set out not only the reasons for depriving him of his liberty but also the particulars of the charges against him. There was accordingly no breach of A 5(2).

A 5(3): The investigating judge at Verviers issued a warrant containing reasons for the applicant's arrest on the day that he had questioned him, and the chambre du conseil upheld the arrest and likewise gave reasons for its successive orders. The detention on remand ended well before committal for trial and the subsequent conviction. The procedure therefore complied with the requirements of A 5(3).

The facts and arguments relied on by the applicant in support of the complaint under A 6(3)(b) were the same as those put forward under A 5(4). Accordingly, it was not necessary to consider the case under A 6(3)(b).

No causal link regarding pecuniary damage. Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (BEF 100,000).

Langborger v Sweden (1990) 12 EHRR 416 89/9

[Application lodged 7.9.1984; Commission report 8.10.1987; Court Judgment 22.6.1989.]

Mr Rolf Langborger, the applicant, sought the deletion from his lease of a 'negotiation clause' which fixed the rent and other conditions agreed upon on the basis of a negotiation agreement between a landlords' union and a tenants' union. His application was rejected by the Rent Review Board and then by the Housing and Tenancy Court. The court included lay assessors who were nominated respectively by the landlords' union and the tenants' union. The applicant alleged that he had not been given a public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal. He also complained of a breach of his rights to respect for his home, his freedom of association and enjoyment of his possessions and of the lack of an effective remedy before a national authority.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), NV 8, NV 11, NV P1A1 and not necessary to consider the other complaints.

Court found by a majority (17–3) V 6(1), unanimously NV 8, NV 11, NV P1A1 and not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (d), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr JA Carrillo Salcedo, Mr N Valticos (d), Mr SK Martens (c), Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel.

In order to establish whether a body could be considered 'independent', regard had to be had, inter alia, to the manner of appointment of its members and their term of office, to the existence of guarantees against outside pressures and to the question whether the body presented an appearance of independence. As to the question of impartiality, a distinction had to be drawn between a subjective test, whereby it sought to establish the personal conviction of a given judge in a given case, and an objective test, aimed at ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in this respect. The Housing and Tenancy Court was composed of two professional judges and two lay assessors. The independence and impartiality of the professional judges were not at issue. The lay assessors had specialised experience and were well qualified to participate in the adjudication of the disputes. There was no reason to doubt the personal impartiality of the lay assessors. However, as regards their objective impartiality, they had been nominated by and had close links with two associations which both had an interest in the continued existence of the negotiation clause. In the circumstances, the applicant could legitimately fear that the lay assessors had a common interest contrary to his own and therefore that the balance of interests inherent in the court's composition was liable to be upset. The fact that the court also included two professional judges, whose independence and impartiality were not in question, made no difference.

The complaints raised under A 8 (the power of the Tenants' Union to negotiate the rent on his behalf breached the right to respect for his home) and A 11 (that he had to accept against his will the services of the Tenants' Union in negotiations, for which he had to pay) did not come within the scope of the articles relied upon.

The obligation to pay the small financial contribution to the Tenants' Union could not be regarded as inconsistent with P1A1.

With regard to the alleged violations of A 6, it was not necessary to examine the case under A 13, whose requirements were less strict than and absorbed by those of A 6. In this case A 13 could not be taken in conjunction with A 8 or 11 which were inapplicable or with P1A1, because the complaint based on that provision had not given rise to an 'arguable' claim.

Finding of breach constituted adequate just satisfaction for damages. Costs and expenses (by majority (19–1) SEK 63,475).

Lapalorcia v Italy 97/53

[Application lodged 12.5.1994; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mrs Maria Rosaria Lapalorcia, the applicant, was a children's welfare officer. She instituted proceedings on 22 November 1988 in the Campania Regional Administrative Court seeking an order requiring the Provincial Council to pay her salary owed in full, after adjustment for inflation and the addition of interest at the statutory rate. In a judgment of 8 November 1994, the text of which was deposited with the registry on 24 November 1994, and which became final on 19 January 1995, the Administrative Court gave judgment in the applicant's favour. She complained about the length of proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt (d), President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (c), Mr AB Baka (d), Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

The applicant asserted a purely economic right legally derived from her work during her secondment to the Provincial Council. Accordingly, A 6(1) was applicable. The period to be taken into consideration began on 22 November 1988, the date of the application to the Regional Administrative Court and ended on 19 January 1995, when that court's judgment of 8 November 1994 became final, that is, approximately six years and two months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the applicant's conduct and that of the relevant authorities. Despite the applicant's attempts to have a date fixed for the hearing for oral argument, the Administrative Court waited for nearly six years before giving judgment in a case which was of no particular complexity. Accordingly, a reasonable time was exceeded and there had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

The three applicants, Mr Dimitrios Larissis, Mr Savvas Mandalarides, and Mr Ioannis Sarandis, were officers in the same unit of the Greek air force. They were all followers of the Pentecostal Church, a Protestant Christian denomination which adhered to the principle that it was the duty of all believers to engage in evangelism. On 18 May 1992, the applicants appeared before the Permanent Air Force Court in Athens, composed of one officer with legal training and four other officers. They were tried for various offences of proselytism. In a decision delivered on the day of the hearing they were all found guilty of proselytism. The first applicant was sentenced to a total period of 13 months' imprisonment for proselytising airmen Antoniadis, Kokkalis, Voikos and Kafkas. The second applicant was sentenced to a total period of 12 months' imprisonment for proselytising Mrs Zounara, and the Baïramis family and their neighbours. The third applicant was sentenced to a total period of 14 months' imprisonment for proselytising airman Kokkalis, Mrs Zounara, Adjutant Tsikas and airman Kafkas. The court ordered that all the penalties be converted to fines and not enforced provided the applicants did not commit new offences in the following three years. The applicants appealed to the Courts-Martial Appeal Court, which was composed of five military judges. The Appeal Court upheld most of their convictions, but reduced the sentences. The applicants appealed to the Court of Cassation, which dismissed their appeals.

Comm found unanimously V 9 regarding the second applicant's conviction for proselytising the Baïramis family and their neighbours, by majority (24–5) regarding second and third applicants' conviction for proselytising Mrs Zounara, by majority (28–1) NV 9 regarding first and second applicants conviction for proselytising airman Antoniadis and the first and third conviction for proselytising airman Kokkalis, (23–6) regarding first and third applicants conviction for proselytising airman Kafkas, (28–1) NV 7, unanimously no separate issue under 10 or 9+14 regarding second applicant conviction for proselytising the Baïramis family and neighbours and unanimously the second and third applicants conviction for proselytising Mrs Zounara, unanimously NV 9+14 regarding first and second applicants conviction for proselytising airman Antoniadis and the first and third applicants conviction for proselytising airmen Kokkalis and Kafkas.

Court found by majority (8–1) NV 7, NV 9, with regard to the measures taken against the first, second and third applicants for the proselytising of airmen Antoniadis and Kokkalis, (7–2) NV 9 with regard to the measures taken against the first and third applicants for the proselytising of airman Kafkas, (7–2) V 9 with regard to the measures taken against the second and third applicants for the proselytising of civilians, unanimously that no separate issue under 10, unanimously NV 9+14 in relation to the measures taken against the first, second and third applicants for the proselytising of the airmen, unanimously that no separate issue under 9+14 in relation to the measures taken against the second and third applicants for the proselytising of the civilians.

Judges: Mr F Gölcüklü, President, Mr R MacDonald, Mr J De Meyer (C), Mr N Valticos (PD), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr JM Morenilla (pd), Mr B Repik (PD), Mr P Kûris, Mr P Van Dijk (PD).

The Court recalled its finding in the Kokkinakis case that the definition of the offence of proselytism contained in the legislation, together with the settled body of national case-law interpreting and applying it, satisfied the conditions of certainty and foreseeability prescribed by A 7. There was no reason to reverse its previous decision. There had been no violation of A 7.

The prosecution, conviction and punishment of the applicants for offences of proselytism amounted to interferences with the exercise of their rights. The Court referred to its finding in Kokkinakis case that the measures taken against that applicant were prescribed by law. The position in Greek law had not changed and there was no reason to depart from the earlier assessment. The impugned measures essentially pursued the legitimate aim of protecting the rights and freedoms of others. A 9 did not, however, protect every act motivated or inspired by a religion or belief. It did not, for example, protect improper proselytism, such as the offering of material or social advantage or the application of improper pressure with a view to gaining new members for a Church. The Court's task was to determine whether the measures taken against the applicants were justified in principle and proportionate. The Convention applied in principle to members of the armed forces as well as to civilians. Nevertheless, when interpreting and applying its rules in cases such as the present, it was necessary to bear in mind the particular characteristics of military life and its effects on the situation of individual members of the armed forces. The hierarchical structures which were a feature of life in the armed forces might affect every aspect of the relations between military personnel, making it difficult for a subordinate to rebuff the approaches of an individual of superior rank or to withdraw from a conversation initiated by him. Thus, what would in the civilian world be seen as an innocuous exchange of ideas which the recipient was free to accept or reject, might, within the confines of military life, be viewed as a form of harassment or the application of undue pressure in abuse of power. Not every discussion about religion or other sensitive matters between individuals of unequal rank would fall within that category. Nonetheless, where the circumstances so required, States might be justified in taking special measures to protect the rights and freedoms of subordinate members of the armed forces. Airmen Antoniadis and Kokkalis had testified in the domestic proceedings that the applicants approached them on a number of occasions in order to persuade them to convert and to visit the Pentecostal Church. Mr Antoniadis stated that he felt obliged to take part in the discussions because the applicants were his superior officers, and Mr Kokkalis said that the applicants' approaches bothered him. Although the applicants did not use threats or inducements, they were persistent in their advances such that the two airmen felt themselves constrained and subject to a certain degree of pressure owing to the applicants' status as officers, even if this pressure was not consciously applied. In those circumstances, the Greek authorities were in principle justified in taking some measures to protect the lower ranking airmen from improper pressure applied to them by the applicants in their desire to promulgate their religious beliefs. The measures taken were not particularly severe and were more preventative than punitive in nature; in all the circumstances of the case, the measures were not disproportionate. There had therefore been no violation of A 9 with regard to the measures taken against the applicants for the proselytising of airmen.

It was of decisive significance that the civilians whom the applicants attempted to convert were not subject to pressures and constraints of the same kind as the airmen. With regard to the Baïramis family and their neighbours, none of the evidence indicated that they felt obliged to listen to the applicant or that his behaviour towards them was improper in any way. Mrs Zounara had initially sought out the applicants in an attempt to understand the reasons behind her husband's behaviour (he had joined the Pentecostal Church, thus leading to a breakdown in the relationship). Although she was in a state of distress because of her marriage breakdown, her mental condition was not such that she was in need of any special protection from the evangelical activities of the applicants or that they applied improper pressure to her. The second and third applicants' convictions on the charges in question were not therefore justified in the circumstances of the case. There had been a violation of A 9 with regard to the measures taken against them for the proselytising of the Baïramis family and their neighbours and Mrs Zounara.

Having regard to the scrutiny of the case in the context of A 9, no separate issue arose in relation to A 10.

No evidence was produced to suggest that an officer in the armed forces who attempted to convert his subordinates to the Orthodox Church in a manner similar to that adopted by the applicants would have been treated any differently. It followed that no violation of A 9 and 14 taken together had been established in connection with the proselytising of the airmen. Having found a violation of A 9 with regard to the measures taken against the second and third applicants for the proselytising of the Baïramis family and Mrs Zounara, no separate issue arises in that connection under A 9 and 14 taken together.

Non-pecuniary damage (by majority (7–2) GRD 500,000 each to second and third applicants), costs and expenses (to second and third applicants GBP 6,000 less FF 11,149).

Larkos v Cyprus 99/9

[Application lodged 21.11.1995; Commission report 14.1.1998; Court Judgment 18.2.1999]

Mr Xenis Larkos, a retired civil servant, rented his house from the Government of Cyprus on 1 May 1976 and had been living there ever since with his wife and four children. On 3 December 1986, the Ministry of Finance informed the applicant that the permission by virtue of which he occupied the premises was revoked and that he had to surrender the property by 30 April 1987. He failed to do so and, on 3 June 1987, the Attorney-General notified him that if he did not quit the house before 31 July 1987, legal action would be taken against him. The applicant claimed that he was a 'statutory tenant' within the meaning of the Rent Control Law 1983 and thus protected by law. In February 1992, the District Court of Nicosia gave judgment against the applicant, stating that the protection of the Rent Control Law did not extend to the applicant since it only bound private owners of property and not the Government of Cyprus. The applicant's appeal to the Supreme Court relying on the Convention was dismissed. He complained that because he was a tenant of the Government he did not enjoy the protection which the Rent Control Act gave persons who rented from private owners.

Comm found unanimously V 14+8, not necessary to examine 14+P1A1.

Court found unanimously V 14+8, not necessary to consider 14+P1A1.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr I Cabral Barreto (so), Mr J-P Costa, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Mr AN Loizou, ad hoc judge.

It was not disputed that the applicant could rely on the guarantee against unlawful discrimination contained in A 14. The applicant's complaint related to the manner in which the alleged difference in treatment adversely affected the enjoyment of his right to respect for his home guaranteed under A 8. He had not contended that there had been a breach of A 8 on account of the fact that, being a government tenant, he was faced with the threat of eviction from his home. However, it sufficed for the purposes of the application of A 14 that the facts relied on in the case fell within the ambit of A 8 and the relevance of that article could not be denied in view of the judgment of the District Court of Nicosia ordering the applicant to leave his home. A difference in treatment was discriminatory if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. Moreover, the Contracting States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment. The Court had to have close regard to the terms of the tenancy agreement which the applicant concluded with the authorities when assessing his claim to be in a relevantly similar or analogous situation to that of private tenants renting property from private landlords. The lease made no reference to the fact that the property was let to him in his capacity of civil servant or that the subsistence of the lease was dependent on his continued employment in the civil service. The terms of the lease indicated that the Government rented the property in a private law capacity; therefore, the applicant could claim with justification to be in a relevantly similar situation to that of other private tenants who rented accommodation from private landlords and whose property was situated in a regulated area within the meaning of the Rent Control Law 1983. While a measure which had the effect of treating differently persons in a relevantly similar situation could be justified on public interest grounds, in the present case the respondent Government had not provided any convincing explanation of how the general interest would be served by evicting the applicant. The legislation was intended as a measure of social protection for tenants living in particular areas of Cyprus. A decision not to extend that protection to government tenants living side by side with tenants in privately owned dwellings required specific justification, more so since the Government were themselves protected by the legislation when renting property from private individuals. However, the Government had not adduced any reasonable and objective justification for the distinction which would meet the requirements of A 14, even having regard to their margin of appreciation in the area of the control of property. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 14 in conjunction with A 8.

Having regard to its decision on the applicant's complaint under A 14+8, it was not necessary to give separate consideration to the complaint under 14+P1A1.

Laskey, Jaggard and Brown v United Kingdom (1997) 24 EHRR 39 97/4

[Application lodged 14.12.1992; Commission report 26.10.1995; Court Judgment 19.2.1997]

In 1987, in the course of routine investigations into other matters, the police came into possession of a number of video films which were made during sado-masochistic encounters involving the applicants, Mr Colin Laskey, Mr Roland Jaggard and Mr Anthony Brown, and as many as 44 other homosexual men. As a result the applicants, with several other men, were charged with a series of offences, including assault and wounding, relating to sado-masochistic activities that had taken place over a 10 year period. The acts consisted in the main of maltreatment of the genitalia and ritualistic beatings either with the assailant's bare hands or a variety of implements. There were instances of branding and infliction of injuries which resulted in the flow of blood and which left scarring. These activities were consensual and were conducted in private for no apparent purpose other than the achievement of sexual gratification. Video cameras were used to record events and the tapes copied and distributed amongst members of the group. The prosecution was largely based on the contents of those videotapes. There was no suggestion that the tapes had been sold or used other than by members of the group. The applicants pleaded guilty to the assault charges after the trial judge ruled that they could not rely on the consent of the victims as an answer to the prosecution case. On 19 December 1990, the defendants were convicted and sentenced to terms of imprisonment. The applicants appealed against conviction and sentence to the Court of Appeal, which dismissed the appeals against conviction but reduced the sentences as the applicants did not appreciate that their actions in inflicting injuries were criminal. The applicants' appeal to the House of Lords was dismissed by a majority. The applicants complained that their convictions were the result of an unforeseeable application of a provision of the criminal law which, in any event, amounted to an unlawful and unjustifiable interference with their right to respect for their private life.

Comm found by majority (11–7) NV 8.

Court found unanimously NV 8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

The criminal proceedings against the applicants which resulted in their conviction constituted an interference by a public authority with the applicants' right to respect for their private life. The interference had been in accordance with the law and pursued the legitimate aim of the protection of health or morals, within the meaning of A 8(2). The notion of necessity implied that the interference corresponded to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued; in determining whether an interference was 'necessary in a democratic society', the Court would take into account that a margin of appreciation was left to the national authorities. The scope of this margin of appreciation was not identical in each case, but would vary according to the context. Relevant factors included the nature of the Convention right in issue, its importance for the individual and the nature of the activities concerned. One of the roles which the State was entitled to undertake was to seek to regulate, through the operation of the criminal law, activities which involved the infliction of physical harm. That was so whether the activities in question occurred in the course of sexual conduct or otherwise. The determination of the level of harm that should be tolerated by the law in situations where the victim consented was in the first instance a matter for the State concerned since what was at stake was related, on the one hand, to public health considerations and to the general deterrent effect of the criminal law, and, on the other, to the personal autonomy of the individual. The applicants' sado-masochistic activities involved a significant degree of injury or wounding which could not be characterised as trifling or transient. In deciding whether or not to prosecute, the State authorities were entitled to have regard not only to the actual seriousness of the harm caused, but also to the potential for harm inherent in the acts in question. The reasons given by the national authorities for the measures taken in respect of the applicants were relevant and sufficient for the purposes of A 8(2). The charges of assault were numerous and referred to illegal activities which had taken place over more than 10 years. However, only a few charges were selected for inclusion in the prosecution case. In recognition of the fact that the applicants did not appreciate their actions to be criminal, reduced sentences were imposed on appeal. In those circumstances, bearing in mind the degree of organisation involved in the offences, the measures taken against the applicants could not be regarded as disproportionate. The national authorities were entitled to consider that the prosecution and conviction of the applicants was necessary in a democratic society for the protection of health within the meaning of A 8(2). In view of that conclusion it was not necessary to determine whether the interference with the applicants' right to respect for private life could also be justified on the ground of the protection of morals.

Lauko v Slovakia 98/73

[Application lodged 13.6.1994; Commission report 30.10.1997; Court Judgment 2.9.1998]

On 11 May 1994, Mr Ivan Lauko the applicant was accused by the local office of having committed a 'minor offence' in that without justification, he had accused family B of causing a nuisance. He was fined 300 SKK and ordered to pay costs of the proceedings. The applicant appealed against that decision to the district office, which dismissed his appeal on 28 July 1994. On 16 August 1994, the applicant brought a complaint before the Constitutional Court. On 24 November 1994, the Constitutional Court dismissed his complaint as being manifestly ill-founded. On 2 July 1997, the Constitutional Court rejected the applicant's request for the review of its decision of 24 November 1994. He complained in particular that his right to a hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal had been violated in the proceedings before the local and district offices.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), no separate issue under 3.

Court unanimously found V 6(1), not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P Van Dijk, Mr V Butkevych.

In order to determine whether an offence qualified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention, the first matter to be ascertained was whether or not the text defining the offence belonged, in the legal system of the respondent State, to the criminal law; next, the nature of the offence and, finally, the nature and degree of severity of the penalty that the person concerned risked incurring had to be examined, having regard to the object and purpose of A 6, to the ordinary meaning of the terms of that article and to the laws of the Contracting States. The minor offence of which the applicant was convicted under the Minor Offences Act was not characterised under domestic law as 'criminal'. However, that was not conclusive. The legal rule infringed by the applicant was directed towards all citizens and not towards a given group possessing a special status. The general character of the legal provision infringed by the applicant together with the deterrent and punitive purpose of the penalty imposed on him showed that the offence in question was, in terms of A 6, criminal in nature. The relative lack of seriousness of the penalty at stake could not deprive an offence of its inherently criminal character. A 6(1) was therefore applicable.

In order to determine whether a body could be considered to be 'independent' of the executive, it was necessary to have regard to the manner of appointment of its members and the duration of their term of office, the existence of guarantees against outside pressures and the question whether the body presented an appearance of independence. The local office and the district office were charged with carrying out local State administration under the control of the government. The appointment of the heads of those bodies was controlled by the executive and their officers, whose employment contracts are governed by the provisions of the Labour Code, had the status of salaried employees. Therefore, the manner of appointment of the officers of the local and district offices together with the lack of any guarantees against outside pressures and any appearance of independence showed that those bodies could not be considered to be independent of the executive within the meaning of A 6(1). While entrusting the prosecution and punishment of minor offences to administrative authorities was not inconsistent with the Convention, the person concerned had to have an opportunity to challenge any decision made against him before a tribunal that offered the guarantees of A 6. In the present case, however, the applicant was unable to have the decisions of the local and district offices reviewed by an independent and impartial tribunal since his complaint was dismissed by the Constitutional Court on the ground that the minor offence in issue could not be examined by a court. There had therefore been an infringement of the applicant's right to a hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal and accordingly a violation of A 6(1).

The requirements of A 13 were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6. Accordingly, having regard to the conclusion under A 6, it was not necessary to examine the case under A 13.

[Application lodged 8.11.1957; Commission report 19.12.1959; Court Judgment 14.11.1960 (preliminary question), 7.4.1961 (procedural question), 1.7.1961 (merits)]

The applicant, Gerald Richard Lawless, was a builder's labourer, who had become a member of the Irish Republican Army (IRA) in January 1956. He claimed to have left the IRA in June 1956 and a splinter group of the IRA in December 1956. He was arrested on 11 July 1957. He was held in a military detention camp until 11 December 1957. He was informed on 16 August that he would be released if he gave a written undertaking to respect the Constitution and laws of Ireland and not to be a member of or assist any unlawful organisation. He refused. His applications to the High Court and Supreme Court for release were dismissed. He gave a verbal undertaking to the Detention Commission that he would not engage in illegal activities and was thereafter released. He complained that he was detained without trial, between 13 July and 11 December 1957, in a military detention camp in the Republic of Ireland, claiming a violation of A 5, 6 and 7.

Commission found non-violation of the Convention.

Court (on preliminary question) by majority (6–1) rejected the objections relating to procedure raised by Irish Government, unanimously decided to proceed to the examination of the merits of the case.

Court (on merits) unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection under 17 and found NV 5, 6, 7 and 15.

Judges (preliminary question): Mr R Cassin, President, Mr G Maridakis (d), Mr E Rodenbourg, Mr R McGonigal, ex officio member, Mr G Balladore Pallieri, Mr E Arnalds, Mr KF Arik.

Judges (merits): Mr R Cassin, President, Mr G Maridakis (c), Mr E Rodenbourg, Mr R McGonigal, ex officio member, Mr G Balladore Pallieri, Mr E Arnalds, Mr KF Arik.

The purpose of A 17 was to make it impossible for persons to derive from the Convention a right to engage or perform any act aimed at destroying in any activity any of the rights and freedoms in the Convention. The applicant had not relied on the Convention to justify or perform acts contrary to it.

A 5(1)(b) and 6 were irrelevant to the case as the applicant was not detained for non-compliance with the order of a court and there was no criminal charge against him. A 7 had no bearing on the case as his detention was a preventative measure to retrain him from engaging in activities prejudicial to the preservation of public peace and order or security; his detention was not due to him being held guilty of a criminal offence under A 7.

The expression in A 5(1)(c) 'effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority' qualified every category of case of arrest or detention referred to in that sub-paragraph. Similarly A 5(3) entailed the obligation to bring everyone arrested or detained in any of the circumstances contemplated by para 1(c) before a judge promptly and entitled them to a trial within a reasonable time. The detention of the applicant was not effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority and during his detention he was not brought before a judge for trial within a reasonable time. His detention under the Irish 1940 Act was therefore contrary to A 5(1)(c) and (3). However, consideration had to be given to whether his detention could be justified on any right of derogation under A 15.

The Irish government had reasonably deduced from a combination of factors (the existence in the territory of a secret army involved in unconstitutional and violent activities, the fact that that army also operated outside the territory so affecting relations with neighbouring States and increase in terrorist activity) that there existed a public emergency threatening the life of the nation and were justified and entitled to apply A 15 to take measures to derogate from their obligations. The application of the ordinary law had not checked the growing danger. The measure of detention without trial was required by the circumstances and there were safeguards in the system to prevent abuse; the measure was strictly required by the exigencies of the situation within the meaning of A 15. The Irish Government had given the Secretary General of the Council of Europe sufficient information of the measures taken and the reasons for them without delay. States were not required to promulgate notice of derogation within their territories. The Irish Government had fulfilled its obligations under A 15(3).

Le Calvez v France 98/56

[Application lodged 9.7.1994; Commission report 26.2.1997; Court Judgment 29.7.1998]

On 22 August 1980 Mr Jean-Marie Le Calvez was recruited to the New Caledonian Civil Service as an agricultural technician. In 1991, he was declared unfit for work by a doctor. On 30 June 1992, the applicant sent the High Commissioner a letter requesting information on his administrative position and payment of sickness benefit and compensation for loss of salary with effect from 1 August 1991. He received no reply from the High Commissioner and on 15 July 1992, he lodged an application with the Rennes Administrative Court to quash the High Commissioner's implicit refusal to pay him sickness benefit and compensation for loss of salary. The High Commissioner lodged a defence, which was registered at the court registry on 11 July 1994. On 1 March 1995, the Rennes Administrative Court dismissed the applicant's application. His appeal to the Nantes Administrative Court of Appeal was rejected on 14 May 1998. On 20 May 1998, he appealed on points of law to the Conseil d'Etat. That appeal was still outstanding. The applicant complained about the length of proceedings.

Court found by majority (8–1) V 6(1).

The Court recalled its case-law, it had to first ascertain whether there was a dispute over a 'right' which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. The dispute had to be genuine and serious; it could relate not only to the actual existence of a right but also to its scope and the manner of its exercise; and, lastly, the outcome of the proceedings had to be directly decisive for the right in question. There was a dispute between the applicant and his original department as to his entitlement to compensation. The Rennes Administrative Court and subsequently the Nantes Administrative Court of Appeal held the application to be admissible; although they did not find that the applicant had satisfied the eligibility condition laid down by the domestic legislation for payment of the benefit and compensation sought, in so doing they determined the dispute. Furthermore, the outcome of the proceedings in the administrative courts was directly decisive for the applicant's right to be paid sickness benefit while he was absent from work owing to illness. There was consequently a dispute over a 'right' within the meaning of A6(1). Disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). That provision was nevertheless applicable where the claim in issue related to a 'purely economic' right such as payment of salary or pension or an 'essentially economic' one. The applicant's reinstatement in his original department was not possible. The issue of payment of benefit and compensation was economic in nature. His claim was a civil one for the purposes of A 6(1), which therefore applied in the case.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 30 June 1992 with the submission of the preliminary claim to the High Commissioner, the proceedings were still pending in the Conseil d'Etat. To date they had lasted six years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. While the applicant's conduct was not irreproachable, several delays were due to the authorities: two years between the application to the Administrative Court and the filing of the High Commissioner's pleading, nearly eight months between the filing of the pleading and the delivery of the Administrative Court's judgment with no preparatory measures being taken, three years in the Administrative Court of Appeal. In view of all those delays, the reasonable time requirement of A 6(1) was not satisfied.

Le Compte, Van Leuven and De Meyere v Belgium (1982) 4 EHRR 1, (1983) 5 EHRR 183 81/2

[Applications lodged 28.10.1974 and 21.10.1975; Commission report 14.12.1979; Court Judgment 23.6.1981 (merits) and 18.10.1982 (JS)]

The applicants, Dr Herman Le Compte, Dr Frans Van Leuven and Dr Marc De Meyere were medical practitioners. They complained that the obligation to join the Ordre des médecins (medical association) and to be under the jurisdiction of its disciplinary organs contravened A 11. They further alleged that during the course of the disciplinary proceedings they had not had the benefit of the guarantees laid down by A 6.

Comm found unanimously NV 11(1) as the Ordre des médecins did not constitute an association, by majority (8–3) 6(1) applicable to the proceedings which led to the disciplinary measures, V 6(1) as applicants did not receive a public hearing (8–3) before an impartial tribunal (7–4).

Court found by majority (15–5) that 6(1) applicable, (16–4) V 6(1) as regards public hearing by competent tribunal, unanimously NV 6(1) as regards other complaints, NV 11.

A 6 was applicable in that there was a dispute that related to 'civil rights and obligations'. The disciplinary proceedings directly and materially interfered with the right to continue to practise the medical profession. The fact that the result was a temporary suspension did not prevent it imparting that right. It was not necessary for the Court to consider whether 'civil rights' extended beyond private rights, as a private right was directly established between medical practitioners and their patients. A 6(1) could be relied upon by anyone who considered the interference with the exercise of one of his civil rights to be unlawful and complained of the inability to submit that claim to a tribunal meeting its requirements. Although an appeal on a point of law against the administrative body's decision lay to a judicial body, the judicial body had no jurisdiction to rectify factual errors or to examine whether the sanction was proportionate to the fault and, therefore, did not rectify the failure of the administrative body to satisfy the article's requirements.

A 6(1) provided for exceptions to the rule requiring publicity, but it made them subject to certain conditions. There was no evidence to suggest that any of those conditions was satisfied in the present case. The applicants were thus entitled to have the proceedings conducted in public. Conducting disciplinary proceedings of this kind in private did not contravene the Convention, provided that the person concerned consented. In the present case, however, the applicants clearly wanted and claimed a public hearing. The public character of the proceedings before the Belgian Court of Cassation could not suffice to remedy this defect. There had been a breach of A 6(1) in this regard.

The Belgian Ordre des médecins was a public law institution and could not be considered as an association within the meaning of A 11. There were several associations formed to protect the professional interests of medical practitioners which they were completely free to join or not. In those circumstances, the existence of the Ordre and its attendant consequence (namely, the obligation on practitioners to be entered on the register of the Ordre and to be subject to the authority of its organs) had neither the object nor the effect of limiting or suppressing, the right guaranteed by A 11(1).

Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433 87/4

[Application lodged 2.11.1980; Commission report 17.5.1985; Court Judgment 26.3.1987]

Mr Torsten Leander was a carpenter by profession. On 20 August 1979, he started work as a temporary replacement in the post of museum technician at the Naval Museum which was adjacent to a naval base, a restricted military security zone. He alleged that on 3 September, he was told to leave his work pending the outcome of a personnel check which had to be carried out on him in accordance with the Personnel Control Ordinance 1969. On 25 September, the Director informed him that the outcome of the personnel check had been unfavourable and that he could not therefore be employed at the Museum. On 22 October 1979, the applicant complained to the Government. The Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces gave an opinion which was accompanied by a secret annex, containing the information on the applicant. The annex was never communicated to the applicant. He complained that he had been prevented from obtaining permanent employment and dismissed from provisional employment on account of certain secret information which allegedly made him a security risk.

Comm found unanimously NV 8, no separate issue under 10, by majority (7–5) NV 13.

Court found unanimously NV 8, NV 10, by majority (4–3) NV 13.

The secret police register contained information relating to the applicant's private life. Both the storing and the release of such information, which were coupled with a refusal to allow the applicant an opportunity to refute it, amounted to an interference with his right to respect for private life as guaranteed by A 8(1). The aim of the Swedish personnel check system was a legitimate one, namely, the protection of national security. The interference had a valid basis in domestic law, namely the Personnel Control Ordinance. The Ordinance, which was published in the Swedish Official Journal, met the requirement of accessibility. The law gave citizens an adequate indication as to the scope and the manner of exercise of the discretion conferred on the responsible authorities to collect, record and release information under the personnel check system. The interference was therefore 'in accordance with the law', within the meaning of A 8. The safeguards contained in the Swedish personnel check system (including the supervision of the proper implementation of the system being entrusted both to Parliament and to independent institutions, parliamentarians on the National Police Board and supervision effected by the Chancellor of Justice, the Parliamentary Ombudsman and the Parliamentary Committee on Justice, including members of the opposition) met the requirements of A 8(2). Having regard to the wide margin of appreciation available to it, the respondent State was entitled to consider that in the present case, the interests of national security prevailed over the individual interests of the applicant. The interference to which the applicant was subjected could not therefore be said to have been disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. Accordingly, there had been no breach of A 8.

The right of recruitment to the public service was not in itself recognised by the Convention, but it did not follow that in other respects civil servants, including probationary civil servants, fell outside the scope of the Convention and notably of the protection afforded by A 10. The purpose of the Ordinance was to ensure that persons holding posts of importance for national security had the necessary personal qualifications. The relevant authorities had taken into account the relevant information merely in order to satisfy themselves as to whether or not the applicant possessed one of the necessary personal qualifications for the post. Accordingly, there had been no interference with his freedom to express opinions, as protected by A 10. The right to freedom to receive information prohibited a Government from restricting a person from receiving information that others wished or might be willing to impart to him. A 10 did not, in circumstances such as those of the present case, confer on the individual a right of access to a register containing information on his personal position, nor did it embody an obligation on the Government to impart such information to the individual. There had thus been no interference with the applicant's freedom to receive information, as protected by A 10.

The Court recalled its case-law. The Convention had to be read as a whole and therefore any interpretation of A 13 had to be in harmony with the logic of the Convention. Consequently, the Court, consistently with its conclusion concerning A 8, held that the lack of communication of the information to the applicant did not, of itself and in the circumstances of the case, entail a breach of A 8. The Swedish personnel check system was compatible with A 8. Therefore, the requirements of A 13 would be satisfied if there existed domestic machinery whereby, subject to the inherent limitations of the context, the individual could secure compliance with the relevant laws. Both the Chancellor of Justice and the Parliamentary Ombudsman had the competence to receive individual complaints and had the duty to investigate such complaints in order to ensure that the relevant laws have been properly applied by the National Police Board. The applicant was also able to complain to the Government. The authority referred to in A 13 did not need to be a judicial authority in the strict sense, but the powers and procedural guarantees an authority possessed were relevant in determining whether the remedy was effective. An effective remedy under A 13 meant a remedy that was as effective as could be, having regard to the restricted scope for recourse inherent in any system of secret surveillance for the protection of national security. Even if, taken on its own, the complaint to the Government were not considered sufficient to ensure compliance with A 13, the aggregate of the remedies set out above satisfied the conditions of A 13 in the particular circumstances of the present case. Accordingly, there was no violation of A 13.

Lechner and Hess v Austria (1987) 9 EHRR 490 87/8

[Application lodged 18.2.1981; Commission report 2.7.1985; Court Judgment 23.4.1987]

The applicants, a married couple, Siegfried and Rosalia Lechner, and Mrs Lechner's mother, Mrs Rosalia Hess, bought a house in Vienna on 7 August 1970 from Mr and Mrs Josef Mayer who were involved in divorce proceedings. In order to pay the price they had to sell a house and a flat they owned. The applicants moved into the house on 9 September 1970 and were subsequently informed by Mr Mayer that the planning department had not given him permission for the house to be occupied. The applicants were unsuccessful in their application to the department for the necessary permission and they commenced proceedings. Mr Mayer brought proceedings against the applicants for defamation (they had called him a crook) and they brought proceedings against him for fraud. The applicants also brought an action for damages against the municipality of Vienna on 6 August 1975, claiming compensation for breach of obligations. The municipality of Vienna brought administrative proceedings and enforcement proceedings against the applicants. As the applicants were eventually unable to pay sums claimed by their creditors, the house was sold by auction on 19 April 1978 and the applicants were evicted from it on 31 October 1978. Since then, several actions for the recovery of debts had been taken against the applicants by the Austrian State, by the vendors and by the lawyers who had dealt with the case. The applicants complained of the length of the civil and criminal proceedings they had instituted against Mr and Mrs Mayer.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr J Gersing, Mr A Spielmann.

The period to be considered began on 15 May 1972, when the applicants brought their action in the Vienna Regional Civil Court, and ended on 3 September 1980, with the notification of the Supreme Court's judgment. It accordingly amounted to eight years, three months, 19 days. The period contained two phases. The first of these ran from 15 May 1972 to 20 December 1973, when the Court of Appeal's judgment of 21 November remitting the case to the Regional Civil Court reached the latter court, a little over a year and a half. It was not open to criticism, more especially as it included several hearings and other procedural steps at two levels of jurisdiction. The second phase lasted for almost seven years, from 20 December 1973 to 3 September 1980. While the duration of the appeal and the Revision proceedings – five and eleven months respectively – appeared normal in the circumstances, the same might not be true of the proceedings in the Vienna Regional Civil Court, which took five years (20 December 1973 to 10 January 1979). Prima facie, such a period seemed excessive. The court adjourned the proceedings on 5 December 1974 to await the outcome of the applicants' prosecution of the vendors for fraud. The criminal proceedings had begun on 8 February 1973. They were relevant only in so far as they had a bearing on the course of the civil proceedings, which were resumed more than two years after the adjournment. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed according to the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the case-law of the Court. The case did not present any exceptional legal difficulties; although the new claim did not raise any complex legal problems, it was incompatible with the old claim, and that led to some confusion. The court could have indicated that at the outset, however, and thereby have avoided unnecessary delay. To that had to be added the intertwining of several sets of civil, criminal and administrative proceedings which made the task of the relevant courts – particularly the Vienna Regional Civil Court – more difficult. The different procedural measures taken on the applicants' behalf and their personal behaviour contributed to the length of the proceedings. Looking at all the material available as a whole, in the many court proceedings instituted by the applicants as well as the vendors during the period in question (15 May 1972 to 3 September 1980), two stages were open to criticism. Firstly, the investigation opened against the vendors at the applicants' request took a very long time, that is, from 13 March 1973 to 8 June 1976. In particular, no explanation had been given as to what happened between 12 May 1975, when the applicants again asked the investigating judge to question the vendors, and 8 June 1976, when the Vienna Regional Criminal Court closed the investigation. Secondly, the Vienna Regional Civil Court should have conducted the civil proceedings, which were resumed at the applicants' request on 27 December 1976, more speedily, especially since it had the advantage of the lengthy investigation carried out in the first phase of the civil proceedings and in the second phase before they were adjourned, as well as of the file of the criminal proceedings. Apart from the considerable time the civil proceedings had already occupied before they were resumed, the judges responsible for the case should have given consideration to the possible serious consequences for the applicants of any further delay and, on that basis, have handled the case with special diligence. Account had to also be taken of the attitude of the administrative authorities. Although the behaviour of the applicants and some of the methods chosen by their different lawyers had a regrettable impact on the Austrian courts' ability to settle the disputes before them with due expedition, the reasonable time stipulated in A 6(1) was exceeded and that was a situation for which the Austrian authorities had to be held partly responsible. There was accordingly a violation of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 4.4.1997 and 15.9.1997; Court Judgment 12.5.1999]

Ledonne (No 1): Mr Vincenzo Ledonne, the applicant, was informed of the charge against him of criminal libel on 18 September 1991. On 18 June 1992, the Locri Public Prosecutor summoned the applicant to appear before the Bianco (Reggio Calabria) Magistrate at a hearing on 27 April 1993. The summons was served on the applicant on 8 January 1993. On 21 February 1997, the parties presented their final pleadings. In a judgment of the same day, filed with the court registry on 26 February 1997, the Cosenza Magistrate acquitted the applicant.

Ledonne (No 2): on 16 June 1992, the Cosenza Public Prosecutor's Office requested that the applicant be committed for trial on a charge of seeking to vindicate fascism. On 6 July 1992, the Cosenza investigating judge scheduled the date of the preliminary hearing for 2 November 1992. In a judgment of 29 April 1997, filed with the court registry on 21 May 1997, the Cosenza District Court acquitted the applicant.

The applicant complained of the length of the criminal proceedings instituted against him.

Court found by majority (5–2) V 6(1)

Judges: Mr CL Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Conforti (d), Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr A Baka (d), Mr E Levits.

Ledonne No 1: the relevant period began on 18 September 1991, when the Locri Public Prosecutor informed the applicant of the charge against him. It ended on 26 February 1997, when the Cosenza Magistrate's judgment was filed with the court registry. It therefore lasted five years, five months and eight days in one jurisdiction. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the authorities dealing with the case. The case was not complex. The applicant's requests for adjournments and for the summons to be declared null and void and his contesting of the jurisdiction of the Bianco Magistrate contributed to a certain extent to a slowing down of the proceedings. However, A 6 did not require accused persons actively to co-operate with the judicial authorities. Neither could any reproach be levelled against them for making full use of the remedies available under domestic law. Nonetheless, such conduct constituted an objective fact, not capable of being attributed to the respondent State, which was to be taken into account when determining whether or not the proceedings exceeded a reasonable time. Even if the applicant was responsible for some of the delays, that could not justify the length of the periods in between individual hearings and certainly not the total duration of the proceedings. There were two periods of inactivity imputable to the State's authorities. Those two periods amounted to a total of more than two years and 10 months. The Government did not provide any convincing explanation for those delays. Accordingly, the period of more than five years and five months taken to consider the case failed to satisfy the reasonable time requirement and there had been a breach of A 6.

Ledonne No 2: the relevant period began on 16 June 1992, when the Cosenza Public Prosecutor requested that the applicant be committed for trial. It ended on 21 May 1997, when the District Court's judgment was filed with its registry. It had therefore lasted four years, 11 months and five days at one jurisdiction. The case was not complex. Two hearings were adjourned because of the absence of the accused and his lawyer. Nevertheless, even if the applicant could be considered on that account to be responsible for some of the delays, that could not justify the length of the periods in between individual hearings and certainly not the total duration of the proceedings. As to the hearing of 6 June 1995, adjourned to 4 June 1996 because of the lawyers' strike, an event of that kind could not in itself render a Contracting State liable with respect to the reasonable time requirement; however, the efforts made by the State to reduce any resultant delay were to be taken into account for the purposes of determining whether the requirement had been complied with. There were certain periods of inactivity imputable to the State authorities; as a result, the State authorities were responsible for a delay of more than one year and four months. No convincing explanation for those delays had been advanced by the respondent Government. The volume of work of the Cosenza District Court at the relevant period did not constitute such an explanation. A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial system in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements, including the obligation to hear cases within a reasonable time. Having regard to the delays imputable to the State authorities and to the overall duration of the proceedings, the applicant's conduct was not in itself sufficient to justify the length complained of. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

Lehideux and Isorni v France 98/84

On 13 July 1984, the daily newspaper Le Monde published a one-page advertisement bearing the title 'People of France, you have short memories' in large print, beneath which appeared in small italics, 'Philippe Pétain, 17 June 1941'. The text ended with an invitation to readers to write to the Association for the Defence of the Memory of Marshal Pétain and the National Pétain-Verdun Association. On 10 October 1984, the National Association of Former Members of the Resistance filed a criminal complaint against the publication manager of Le Monde, for publicly defending the crimes of collaboration with the enemy, and against Mr Marie-François Lehideux as President of the Association for the Defence of the Memory of Marshal Pétain, Mr Jacques Isorni as the author of the text complained of, and a Mr M, as President of the National Pétain-Verdun Association, for aiding and abetting a public defence of the crimes of collaboration with the enemy. On 27 June 1986, the Paris Criminal Court acquitted the defendants. The civil parties to the action, The National Association of Former Members of the Resistance and the Resistance Action Committee, appealed unsuccessfully to the Court of Appeal and thereafter to the Court of Cassation. The Court of Cassation considered that the lower court had erred and remitted the case to the Court of Appeal On 26 January 1990, the Paris Court of Appeal declared the two civil party applications admissible, set aside the acquittals and awarded the civil parties damages of one franc. The applicants' appeal to the Criminal Division of the Court of Cassation was dismissed on 16 November 1993. They complained that their conviction for 'public defence of war crimes or the crimes of collaboration' had breached A 10.

The requirements of A 10 had to be assessed in the light of A 17. The conviction amounted to 'interference' with the applicants' exercise of their right to freedom of expression. It was prescribed by law and pursued several of the legitimate aims set forth in A 10(2), namely protection of the reputation or rights of others and the prevention of disorder or crime. It was not the Court's task to settle the double game theory point, which was part of an ongoing debate among historians about the events in question and their interpretation. It did not belong to the category of clearly established historical facts, such as the Holocaust, whose negation or revision would be removed from the protection of A 10 by A 17. The applicants had not attempted to deny or revise 'Nazi atrocities and persecutions' or 'German omnipotence and barbarism'; they were supporting one of the conflicting theories in the debate about the role of the head of the Vichy government. The applicants did not act in their personal capacities, as the only names which appeared at the foot of the text in issue were those of the legally constituted Association for the Defence of the Memory of Marshal Pétain and the National Pétain-Verdun Association, to which readers were invited to write. The word 'Advertisement' appeared at the top of the page. The Court did not have to express an opinion on the constituent elements of the offence under French law of publicly defending the crimes of collaboration. It was in the first place for the national authorities to interpret and apply domestic law. The Court's role was limited to verifying whether the interference which resulted from the applicants' conviction of that offence could be regarded as necessary in a democratic society. In exercising its supervisory jurisdiction, the Court had to look at the impugned interference in the light of the case as a whole, including the content of the remarks held against the applicants and the context in which they made them. In particular, it had to determine whether the interference in issue was proportionate to the legitimate aims pursued and whether the reasons adduced by the national authorities to justify it were relevant and sufficient. The content of the publication was unilateral in character. The applicants had explicitly stated their disapproval of 'Nazi atrocities and persecutions' and of 'German omnipotence and barbarism'. They were not so much praising a policy as a man, and doing so for a purpose, namely securing revision of Philippe Pétain's conviction. The omissions, for which the authors of the text were criticised, were about events directly linked with the Holocaust. The gravity of those facts, which constituted crimes against humanity, increased the gravity of any attempt to draw a veil over them. The observation by the Government of the period as a very painful one in the collective memory had to be taken into account. The prosecuting authorities had decided not to proceed with the case and then refrained from appealing against the acquittal. The events referred to in the publication had occurred more than 40 years before. The publication in issue corresponded directly to the object of the associations which produced it. Those associations were legally constituted and no proceedings had been brought against them, either before or after 1984, for pursuing their objects. The Court noted the seriousness of a criminal conviction for publicly defending the crimes of collaboration, having regard to the existence of other means of intervention and rebuttal, particularly through civil remedies. The applicants' criminal conviction was disproportionate and, as such, unnecessary in a democratic society. There had therefore been a breach of A 10. Having reached that conclusion, it was not appropriate to apply A 17.

Violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (FF 100,000).

Lestini v Italy 92/7

[Application lodged 10.4.1987; Commission report 5.3.1991; Court Judgment 26.2.1992]

Mrs Fernanda Lestini took proceedings on 11 March 1985 against the Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale (INPS) before the Rome magistrates' court in order to establish her disability pension right. The investigation opened at the hearing of 19 June 1985. The hearing of 27 November 1985 ended with the dismissal of the applicant's claim by the magistrates' court. On 23 September 1986 the applicant appealed against that decision. A hearing was held on 17 April 1990, when the court deliberated. At the close of the hearing, the District Court delivered judgment. The text of the judgment was lodged with the registry on 13 December 1990. The District Court's judgment became final on 13 December 1991, there having been no appeal to the Court of Cassation. The applicant complained about the length of proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos (d), Mr SK Martens.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 11 March 1985 when the proceedings were instituted against the INPS in the magistrates' court. It ended on 13 December 1991 when the Rome District Court's judgment became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Special diligence was necessary in employment disputes, which included pensions disputes. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The case was not complex. The proceedings were conducted at a normal pace in the magistrates' court and the State could not be held responsible for the period of more than 10 months which elapsed between the filing of the decision of 27 November 1985 and the lodging of the applicant's appeal on 23 September 1986; nor was it answerable for the year which went by before the judgment of 17 April 1990 became final. On the other hand, the appeal proceedings remained dormant for more than 25 months. It had taken nearly 8 months for the text of the District Court's judgment to be filed with the registry. Accordingly, and in view of what was at stake in the proceedings for the applicant, the lapse of time in the case could not be regarded as reasonable.

[Application lodged 21.8.1986; Commission report 15.3.1990; Court Judgment 266.1991

Mrs Monique Merdy, née Letellier took over a bar-restaurant in March 1985. She was the mother of eight children from two marriages and was separated from her second husband, Mr Merdy, a petrol pump attendant, and at the material time was living with a third man. On 6 July 1985 Mr Merdy was killed by a shot fired from a car. The police traced the gunman who admitted that he had fired the shot, but stated that he had acted on the applicant's instructions. Mrs Letellier was charged on 8 July 1985 with being an accessory to murder and remanded in custody. She made numerous applications for release which were dismissed. She was committed for trial. On 10 May 1988 the Val-de-Marne Assize Court sentenced her to three years' imprisonment for being an accessory to murder. She was released on 17 May 1988, the pre-trial detention being automatically deducted from the sentence. She complained that her detention on remand had exceeded the reasonable time provided for in A 5(3) and that the various courts which had examined her application for release had not ruled speedily as required under A 5(4).

Comm found unanimously V 5(3), by majority (17-1) V 5(4).

Court found unanimously V 5(3), NV 5(4).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr LE Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr S K Martens.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 8 July 1985, the date on which the applicant was remanded in custody, and ended on 10 May 1988, with the judgment of the Assize Court, less the period, from 24 December 1985 to 22 January 1986, during which she was released subject to court supervision. It therefore lasted two years and nine months. It fell in the first place to the national judicial authorities to ensure that, in a given case, the pre-trial detention of an accused person did not exceed a reasonable time. To this end they had to examine all the facts arguing for or against the existence of a genuine requirement of public interest justifying, with due regard to the principle of the presumption of innocence, a departure from the rule of respect for individual liberty and set them out in their decisions on the applications for release. It was essentially on the basis of the reasons given in those decisions and of the true facts mentioned by the applicant in his appeals, that the Court was called upon to decide whether or not there had been a violation of A 5(3). The persistence of reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence was a condition sine qua non for the validity of the continued detention, but, after a certain lapse of time, it no longer sufficed; the Court had to then establish whether the other grounds cited by the judicial authorities continued to justify the deprivation of liberty. Where such grounds were relevant and sufficient, the Court also had to ascertain whether the competent national authorities displayed special diligence in the conduct of the proceedings. The reasons given by the courts for refusing to release the applicant were that it was necessary to prevent her from bringing pressure to bear on the witnesses, that there was a risk of her absconding which had to be countered, that court supervision was not sufficient to achieve these objectives and that her release would gravely disturb public order. A genuine risk of pressure being brought to bear on the witnesses might have existed initially, but it diminished and indeed disappeared with the passing of time. After 5 December 1986 the courts no longer referred to such a risk. The danger of absconding could not be gauged solely on the basis of the severity of the sentence risked. It had to be assessed with reference to a number of other relevant factors which might either confirm the existence of a danger of absconding or make it appear so slight that it could not justify detention pending trial. In this case the decisions of the indictments divisions did not give the reasons why, notwithstanding the arguments put forward by the applicant in support of her applications for release, they considered the risk of her absconding to be decisive. When the only remaining reason for continued detention was the fear that the accused would abscond and thereby subsequently avoid appearing for trial, he had to be released if he was in a position to provide adequate guarantees to ensure that he would so appear, for example by lodging a security. The indictments divisions did not establish that this was not the case in this instance. By reason of their particular gravity and public reaction to them, certain offences might give rise to a social disturbance capable of justifying pre-trial detention, at least for a time. In exceptional circumstances that factor might therefore be taken into account for the purposes of the Convention, in any event in so far as domestic law recognised the notion of disturbance to public order caused by an offence. However, that ground could be regarded as relevant and sufficient only provided that it was based on facts capable of showing that the accused's release would actually disturb public order. In addition detention would continue to be legitimate only if public order remained actually threatened; its continuation could not be used to anticipate a custodial sentence. In this case, those conditions were not satisfied. The indictments division assessed the need to continue the deprivation of liberty from a purely abstract point of view, taking into consideration only the gravity of the offence. At least from 23 December 1986, the contested detention ceased to be based on relevant and sufficient grounds. The decision of 24 December 1985 to release the accused was taken by the judicial officer in the best position to know the evidence and to assess the circumstances and personality of the applicant; accordingly the indictments divisions ought in their subsequent judgments to have stated in a more clear and specific, not to say less stereotyped, manner why they considered it necessary to continue the pre-trial detention. There had consequently been a violation of A 5(3).

The Court had certain doubts about the overall length of the examination of the second application for release, in particular before the indictments division was called upon to rule after a previous decision had been quashed in the Court of Cassation; it had to be borne in mind however, that the applicant retained the right to submit a further application at any time. Indeed from 14 February 1986 to 5 August 1987 she lodged six other applications, which were all dealt with in periods of from eight to twenty days. There had therefore been no violation of A 5(4).

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for reparation. Costs and expenses (FF 21,433). Costs and expenses (FF 21,433).

Leterme v France 98/33

[Application lodged 21.5.1997; Commission report 28.10.1997; Court Judgment 29.4.1998]

Mr Pierre Leterme was a haemophiliac who had received numerous blood transfusions. On 12 December 1989, he submitted a preliminary application for compensation to the Minister for Solidarity, Health and Social Protection. That application was rejected on 30 March 1990. He appealed to the Versailles Administrative Court, seeking compensation for the damage sustained as a result of the State's failure to take appropriate measures to prevent his infection with HIV. On 27 January 1995, he lodged an application with the European Commission of Human Rights, complaining of the length of the compensation proceedings and relying on A 6(1). On 4 July 1995, the Commission adopted a report noting that the parties had reached agreement on a friendly settlement of the case. On 1 December 1995, the reporting judge at the Conseil d'Etat filed his report; the case was listed for a hearing on 19 December 1995. The proceedings were still continuing and the applicant complained about their length.

Comm unanimously found V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr P Jambrek, Mr E Levits, Mr T Pantiru, Mr V Toumanov.

The Government had not raised the objection of the friendly settlement having been reached before the Commission; accordingly, they were estopped from raising the objection before the Court.

The present case, as referred to the Court, concerned the proceedings subsequent to the friendly settlement being reached. The starting point had, therefore, to be 5 July 1995, that being the day after the Commission adopted its report taking notice of the settlement reached. The proceedings before the domestic courts were not yet over, as the applicant appealed on 2 May 1994 to the Conseil d'Etat, which on 27 February 1996 remitted the case to the Paris Administrative Court of Appeal, before which it was still pending. The proceedings in issue had therefore already lasted more than 2 years and 9 months to date. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law; in particular, the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. On the latter point, what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation had to be taken into account. Even though the case was of some complexity, that fact alone could not justify the length of the proceedings in question as the information needed to determine the State's liability had been available for a long time. The applicant sought on 28 October 1996 to expedite the proceedings, but without success. What was at stake in the proceedings in issue was of crucial importance to the applicant in view of the disease from which he was suffering. Exceptional diligence was called for, notwithstanding the number of cases to be dealt with, in particular as the facts of the controversy had been known to the Government for several years and its seriousness must have been obvious to them. There were delays and periods of inactivity on the part of the authorities. The proceedings had already lasted nearly 5 years and 7 months by the time the Commission adopted its report noting that a friendly settlement had been reached and they were still pending in the Paris Administrative Court of Appeal. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case and in particular to the applicant's situation, the time taken in the present case could not be considered to have been reasonable.

Leutscher v The Netherlands (1997) 24 EHRR 180 96/13

[Application lodged 29.6.1990; Commission report 12.10.1994; Court Judgment 26.3.1996]

Mr Jakob Koos Leutscher was involved in the management of a number of companies incorporated under Netherlands law in which he also had an interest, directly or indirectly, as a shareholder. In 1977, the tax authorities initiated an investigation into possible tax offences committed by him. On 24 May 1984, the Amsterdam Regional Court tried the applicant in absentia on counts alleging ordering the return of false tax statements and making false statements of his income and assets. The Regional Court found him guilty and sentenced him to imprisonment and a fine. He appealed to the Amsterdam Court of Appeal, which quashed the judgment of the Regional Court and declared the prosecution time-barred. He appealed to the Court of Appeal for reimbursement of costs and expenses incurred in the course of the criminal proceedings against him. The court awarded certain sums to cover the costs of the witnesses, tax consultants and the applicant's travel expenses. However, the court refused to order the payment of any sum to compensate for loss of time or reimbursement of counsel's fees. He complained, inter alia, in respect of the proceedings concerning the claim for reimbursement of legal fees and in respect of his right to be presumed innocent.

Comm found unanimously NV 6(1), by majority (8–5) NV 6(2).

Court unanimously found A 6(1) inapplicable, NV 6(2).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr SK Martens, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr P Jambrek, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris.

As the compass of the case before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility, the Court had no jurisdiction to revive issues declared inadmissible. The applicant complained that he had not had a fair hearing before the Amsterdam Court of Appeal in relation to his request for reimbursement of his counsel's fees. The wording of the domestic provision which allowed the competent court to award the former suspect did not create any 'right' for the former accused. There was a measure of discretion granted to the courts. Proceedings under the provision were not covered by A 6(1). Accordingly A 6(1) was not applicable to the proceedings in question.

A 6(2) did not confer on a person 'charged with a criminal offence' a right to reimbursement of his legal costs where proceedings taken against him were discontinued. In itself, the refusal to order the reimbursement to the former accused of his necessary costs and expenses following the discontinuation of criminal proceedings against him did not amount to a penalty or a measure that could be equated with a penalty. Nevertheless, such a decision could raise an issue under A 6(2) if supporting reasoning, which could not be dissociated from the operative provisions, amounted in substance to a determination of the guilt of the former accused without his having previously been proved guilty according to law and, in particular, without his having had an opportunity to exercise the rights of the defence. Although the judgment at first instance was given in absentia, the applicant had the benefit of appeal proceedings which were by way of a complete rehearing and in which the accused enjoyed the same rights as he did at first instance. In applying the domestic provision, the Court of Appeal was empowered to order that the applicant's costs should be paid out of public funds only if it found that there were 'reasons in equity' for such reimbursement. In the exercise of the wide measure of discretion conferred upon it under those provisions, the Court of Appeal was, both under the Convention and under Netherlands law, entitled to take into account the suspicion which still weighed against the applicant as a result of the fact that his conviction had been quashed on appeal only because the prosecution was found to have been time-barred when the case was brought to trial. The Court of Appeal, when applying the provision was not called upon to reassess the applicant's guilt or express a view as to whether his conviction would have been upheld on appeal. No violation of A 6(2) could therefore be found on the facts of the present case.

Levages Prestations Services v France (1997) 24 EHRR 351 96/41

[Application lodged 1.4.1993; Commission report 5.4.1995; Court Judgment 23.10.1996]

The Levages Prestations Services company carried on the business of leasing lifting gear and providing related services. In May 1983, it had recourse to an employment agency for temporary staff with which it signed five contracts for the provision of manual labour. Subsequently, it refused to pay four out of five invoices, initially because it disagreed with the number of hours charged and then on the ground that they were unsigned and did not bear the company stamp. On 18 September 1984, the Paris Commercial Court ordered it to pay the agency. The applicant company lodged a criminal complaint against a person or persons unknown for forgery of commercial instruments, and against the employment agency for aiding and abetting and for making use of forged instruments. It appealed to the Paris Court of Appeal against the Commercial Court's judgment and made an application for the appeal to be stayed pending the outcome of the criminal proceedings instituted after it had lodged its complaint. On 1 October 1986, the Court of Appeal made an interlocutory order staying the appeal. On 24 December 1987, the investigating judge ruled that there was no case to answer in respect of the two criminal complaints. The appeal proceedings resumed in the Paris Court of Appeal, which upheld the Commercial Court's judgment on 28 September 1989. On 1 December, the applicant company appealed on points of law to the Court of Cassation. In the proceedings in the Court of Cassation, the applicant company was represented by a member of the Conseil d'Etat and Court of Cassation Bar, as required by law. On 1 December 1992, the Court of Cassation held that the appeal was inadmissible as the applicant company had not, in accordance with the procedure rules, produced a copy of the judgment of 1 October 1986 which the Court of Cassation held to form an integral part of the judgment under appeal. The applicant company complained that its right to a fair hearing had been infringed when the Court of Cassation of its own motion ruled that the company's appeal on points of law was inadmissible.

Comm found by majority V 6(1).

Court found by majority (6–3) NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr N Valticos (jd), Mr R Pekkanen (jd), Sir John Freeland (jd), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr K Jungwiert.

The proceedings concerned a dispute over civil rights and obligations. A judgment of the Court of Cassation could rebound in different degrees on the position of the person concerned. The outcome of the present appeal could have had a bearing on the applicant company's debt. Therefore A 6(1) was applicable.

The right to a tribunal, of which the right of access was one aspect, was not absolute; it is subject to limitations permitted by implication, in particular where the conditions of admissibility of an appeal were concerned, since by its very nature it called for regulation by the State, which enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in that regard. The applicant company's appeal on points of law was declared inadmissible for failure to produce the documents. The applicant company's counsel was in a position to ascertain what steps he had to take to bring an appeal on points of law, both from the wording of the provision and, if necessary, with the aid of the case-law, which was sufficiently clear and coherent. A 6 did not compel the Contracting States to set up courts of appeal or of cassation but where such courts did exist, the guarantees of A 6 had to be complied with. The manner in which A 6(1) applied to courts of appeal depended on the special features of the proceedings concerned and account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings conducted in the domestic legal order and the court of appeal's role in them. The requirements inherent in the concept of 'fair hearing' were not necessarily the same in cases concerning the determination of civil rights and obligations as in cases concerning the determination of a criminal charge. Given the special nature of the Court of Cassation's role, which was limited to reviewing whether the law had been correctly applied, the Court was able to accept that the procedure followed in the Court of Cassation might be more formal, especially as in proceedings with compulsory representation the parties would be represented by a member of the Conseil d'Etat and Court of Cassation Bar. Moreover, the appeal to the Court of Cassation was made after the applicant company's claims had been heard by both a commercial court and a court of appeal, each of which had full jurisdiction. Regard being had to all the proceedings in the domestic courts, the applicant company's right of access to a court as guaranteed by A 6(1) was not infringed by reason of the conditions which it had to satisfy for its appeal on points of law to be admissible. Consequently, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 103 86/6

[Application lodged 19.4.1982; Commission report 11.10.1984; Court Judgment 8.7.1986]

Mr Peter Michael Lingens was editor of the magazine Profil. He published two articles in the magazine on 14 October 1975 and on 21 October 1975 as a result of which, on 29 October and 12 November 1975, the then Chancellor, Mr Bruno Kreisky, brought two private prosecutions against the applicant for defamation. On 26 March 1979, the Vienna Regional Court found the applicant guilty of defamation and fined him. Mr Kreisky and the applicant both appealed against the judgment to the Vienna Court of Appeal which on 30 November 1979 set the judgment aside without examining the merits. The Vienna Regional Court, to which the Court of Appeal had returned the case, gave judgment on 1 April 1981. After re-examining the case, it passed the same sentence as in the original judgment. Both sides again appealed to the Vienna Court of Appeal, which gave judgment on 29 October 1981; it reduced the fine imposed on the applicant to ATS 15,000 but confirmed the Regional Court's judgment in all other respects. The applicant complained that his conviction for defamation through the press infringed A 10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr W Ganshof van der Meersch, Mr J Cremona, Mr G Wiarda, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (so), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing, Mr A Spielmann.

The applicant's conviction for defamation by the Vienna Regional Court on 1 April 1981, which was upheld by the Vienna Court of Appeal on 29 October 1981, amounted to an interference by public authority. The conviction was based on the Austrian criminal law and was designed to protect the reputation or rights of others. The conviction was therefore 'prescribed by law' and had a legitimate aim under A 10(2) of the Convention. Freedom of the press afforded the public one of the best means of discovering and forming an opinion of the ideas and attitudes of political leaders. The limits of acceptable criticism were wider as regards a politician as such than as regards a private individual. Unlike the latter, the former inevitably and knowingly lay himself open to close scrutiny of his every word and deed by both journalists and the public at large, and he had to consequently display a greater degree of tolerance. A 10(2) enabled the reputation of others to be protected, and that protection extended to politicians too, even when they were not acting in their private capacity; but in such cases the requirements of such protection had to be weighed in relation to the interests of open discussion of political issues. The applicant was convicted because he had used certain expressions ('basest opportunism', 'immoral' and 'undignified') apropos of Mr Kreisky, who was Federal Chancellor at the time, in two articles published in the Viennese magazine Profil in 1975. The articles dealt with political issues of public interest in Austria which had given rise to many heated discussions concerning the attitude of Austrians in general, and the Chancellor in particular, to National Socialism and to the participation of former Nazis in the governance of the country. The content and tone of the articles were on the whole fairly balanced but the use of the aforementioned expressions in particular appeared likely to harm Mr Kreisky's reputation. However, since the case concerned Mr Kreisky in his capacity as a politician, regard had to be had to the background against which the articles were written. They had appeared shortly after the general election of October 1975 when it was thought Mr Kreisky's party would lose its absolute majority and would have to form a coalition with Mr Peter's Austrian Liberal Party. A careful distinction had to be made between facts and value-judgments. The existence of facts could be demonstrated, whereas the truth of value-judgments was not susceptible of proof. The facts on which the applicant founded his value-judgment were undisputed, as was also his good faith. Under the Criminal Code, journalists in a case such as this could not escape conviction unless they could prove the truth of their statements. As regards value-judgments, that requirement was impossible of fulfilment and it infringed freedom of opinion itself, which was a fundamental part of the right secured by A 10. The interference with the applicant's exercise of the freedom of expression was not necessary in a democratic society for the protection of the reputation of others; it was disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. There was accordingly a breach of A 10.

Lithgow and Others v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 329 86/5

[Applications lodged 30.5.1980, 16.9.1977, 5.2.1981, 3.2.1981, 6.2.1981, 25.3.1981 and 4.6.1981; Commission report 7.3.1984; Court Judgment 8.7.1986]

Sir William Lithgow, and a number of companies had certain of their interests nationalised under the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Act 1977. Whilst not contesting the principle of the nationalisation, they claimed that the compensation which they received was grossly inadequate and discriminatory and alleged that they had been victims of breaches of, inter alia, P1A1 alone and in conjunction with A 14.

Comm found by majority (13–3) NV P1A1, (15 with one abstention) NV 14, unanimously NV 6, 13, 17, 18.

Court found by majority (13–5) NV P1A1 on the ground that the 1977 Act contained no provisions making allowance for developments between 1974 and 1977 in the companies concerned, (17–1) NV P1A1 on any of the other grounds, unanimously NV 14+P1A1, by majority (14–4) NV 6(1) on the ground that Sir William Lithgow had no individual access to an independent tribunal, (16–2) NV 6(1) on any of the other grounds, (15–3) NV 13.

P1A1 in substance guaranteed the right of property. The applicants were clearly deprived of their possessions, within the meaning of the second sentence of P1A1. The obligation to pay compensation derived from an implicit condition in P1A1 read as a whole rather than from the public interest requirement itself. The latter requirement related to the justification and the motives for the actual taking, issues which were not contested by the applicants. As regards the phrase 'subject to the conditions provided for by law', it required in the first place the existence of and compliance with adequately accessible and sufficiently precise domestic legal provisions. Regarding the reference in the second sentence of P1A1 to 'the general principles of international law', as a matter of general international law, the principles in question applied solely to non-nationals, they were not applicable to a taking by a State of the property of its own nationals. Under the legal systems of the Contracting States, the taking of property in the public interest without payment of compensation was treated as justifiable only in exceptional circumstances not relevant for present purposes. A measure depriving a person of his property had to pursue, on the facts as well as in principle, a legitimate aim in the public interest and there had to also be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. Compensation terms were material to the assessment whether a fair balance had been struck between the various interests at stake and, notably, whether or not a disproportionate burden had been imposed on the person who had been deprived of his possessions. Taking of property without payment of an amount reasonably related to its value would normally constitute a disproportionate interference which could not be considered justifiable under P1A1. P1A1 did not, however, guarantee a right to full compensation in all circumstances, since legitimate objectives of public interest, such as pursued in measures of economic reform or measures designed to achieve greater social justice, might call for less than reimbursement of the full market value. Provided always that the fair balance was preserved, the standard of compensation required in a nationalisation case might be different from that required in regard to other takings of property. As regards the compensation system established by the 1977 Act, none of its components could be regarded as in principle unacceptable in terms of Protocol 1. The decision to adopt provisions that excluded from the compensation an element representing the special value of the applicants' large or controlling share-holdings was one which the United Kingdom was reasonably entitled to take within its margin of appreciation. The effects produced by the system established by the 1977 Act were not incompatible with P1A1. In reaching that conclusion, the Court had regard to certain aspects of the method of payment of compensation which were advantageous to the former owners. No violation of P1A1 was established in the present case.

There was no violation of A 14 taken in conjunction with P1A1 as regards the owners of other undertakings nationalised under the 1977 Act or nationalised under earlier legislation

The applicants' right to compensation under the 1977 Act, derived from their ownership of shares in the companies concerned, was without doubt a civil right. A 6(1) was applicable in so far as the applicants might reasonably have considered that there was cause for alleging non-compliance with the statutory compensation provisions. The right of access to the courts secured by A 6(1) was not absolute but could be subject to limitations. The Contracting States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation, but the final decision as to observance of the Convention's requirements rested with the Court. It had to be satisfied that the limitations applied did not restrict or reduce the access left to the individual in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right was impaired. Furthermore, a limitation would not be compatible with A 6(1) if it did not pursue a legitimate aim and if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved. In the present case, the limitation on a direct right of access for every individual shareholder to the Arbitration Tribunal pursued a legitimate aim, namely the desire to avoid, in the context of a large-scale nationalisation measure, a multiplicity of claims and proceedings brought by individual shareholders. Neither did it appear, having regard to the powers and duties of the Stockholders' Representative and to the Government's margin of appreciation, that there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and that aim. Regarding the breach of the reasonable time requirement, the amount of compensation payable was settled in negotiations between the Department of Industry and the Stockholders' Representative and A 6(1) did not apply to those negotiations. It was only after reference of the matter to the Arbitration Tribunal that any question of breach of the reasonable time requirement of A 6(1) could have arisen. The Arbitration Tribunal was established by law. Under the statutory instruments governing the matter, the proceedings before the Arbitration Tribunal were similar to those before a court and due provision was made for appeals. As regards the present case, although two members of the Arbitration Tribunal were nominated by the Secretary of State, the appointments could not be made without prior consultation of the Stockholders' Representatives. The Arbitration Tribunal was in no way bound by the amount of compensation offered by the Government in the negotiations. In those circumstances, there was no warrant for finding a lack of the requisite independence. The applicants did not allege that the members in question were not subjectively impartial. Having regard to the manner in which the appointment procedure was actually carried out, their objective impartiality was not capable of appearing to be open to doubt. There had been no violation of A 6(1) in the present case.

A 13: The Convention was not part of the domestic law of the UK. There thus was, and could be, no domestic remedy in respect of a complaint by Sir William Lithgow that the nationalisation legislation itself did not measure up to the standards of the Convention and Protocol 1. A 13 did not go so far as to guarantee a remedy allowing a Contracting State's laws as such to be challenged before a national authority on the ground of being contrary to the Convention or to equivalent domestic legal norms. The Court was therefore unable to uphold the applicant's allegation in so far as it might relate to the 1977 Act as such. It was open to the Stockholders' Representative in any case to refer the question of compensation to the Arbitration Tribunal or to test in the ordinary courts whether the Secretary of State had erred in law by misinterpreting or misapplying the 1977 Act. Even if those remedies were not directly available to Sir William Lithgow himself, he had the benefit of the collective system established by the Act. That system was not in breach of the requirements of A 6(1), an Article whose requirements were stricter than those of A 13. The aggregate of remedies available to Sir William Lithgow constituted domestic machinery whereby he could, to a sufficient degree, secure compliance with the relevant legislation. There had accordingly been no breach of A 13.

Litwa v Poland 00/114

[Application lodged 6.8.1994; Commission report 4.12.1998; Court Judgment 4.4.2000]

Mr Witold Litwa, the applicant, born in 1946, was disabled in that he was blind in one eye and his sight in the other was severely impaired. On 5 May 1994, whilst checking his post-office boxes at the Kraków Post Office, he found they had been opened and were empty. He complained to the post-office clerks who, subsequently, called the police, alleging that the applicant was drunk and behaved offensively. He was taken by police officers to the Kraków Sobering-up Centre and detained there for six hours and 30 minutes. On 10 May 1994 the applicant requested the Kraków District Prosecutor to institute criminal proceedings against the police officers who had arrested him on 5 May 1994 and against the staff of the Kraków Sobering-up Centre. He alleged that the policemen had beaten him and complained about the behaviour of the staff of the centre. On 29 May 1994 he sued the State Treasury in the Kraków Regional Court seeking compensation for unlawful attacks by agents of the State on 5 May 1994 and theft of his personal possessions. On 28 November 1994 the Regional Court dismissed the claim, finding that the applicant's arrest had been justified. On 28 February 1995 the District Prosecutor discontinued the investigation. A supplementary investigation was subsequently discontinued. The applicant complained, inter alia, that his detention in the Sobering-up Centre on 5 May 1994 had been unlawful and arbitrary and had therefore amounted to a violation of A 5(1).

Comm found by majority (21–5) NV 5(1).

Court found by majority (6–1) V 5(1).

Judges: Mr M Fischbach, President, Mr B Conforti (c), Mr G Bonello (c), Mrs V Stráznická, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr AB Baka (d), Mr E Levits.

The applicant's confinement in the Kraków Sobering-up Centre amounted to a 'deprivation of liberty' within the meaning of A 5(1). A 5(1) contained an exhaustive list of permissible grounds of deprivation of liberty. No deprivation of liberty would be lawful unless it fell within one of the grounds set out in sub-paras (a) to (f) of A 5. However, the applicability of one ground did not necessarily preclude that of another; a deprivation of liberty might, depending on the circumstances, be justified under one or more sub-paragraphs. The only ground the Government invoked to justify the applicant's detention was sub-para (e). In ascertaining the Convention meaning of the term 'alcoholics', the Court was guided by Articles 31–33 of the Vienna Convention of 23 May 1969 on the Law of Treaties. In its common usage, the word 'alcoholics' denoted persons who were addicted to alcohol. There was a link between all the other categories of persons in sub-para (e) that they may be deprived of their liberty either in order to be given medical treatment or because of considerations dictated by social policy, or on both medical and social grounds. It was therefore legitimate to conclude from this context that a predominant reason why the Convention allowed the persons mentioned in para 1(e) to be deprived of their liberty was not only that they were dangerous for public safety but also that their own interests might necessitate their detention. That ratio legis indicated how the expression 'alcoholics' should be understood in the light of the object and purpose of A 5(1)(e). It indicated that the object and purpose of the provision could not be interpreted as only allowing the detention of 'alcoholics' in the limited sense of persons in a clinical state of 'alcoholism'. Under A 5(1)(e), persons who were not medically diagnosed as 'alcoholics', but whose conduct and behaviour under the influence of alcohol posed a threat to public order or themselves, could be taken into custody for the protection of the public or their own interests, such as their health or personal safety. That did not mean that A 5(1)(e) of the Convention could be interpreted as permitting the detention of an individual merely because of his alcohol intake. However, there was nothing in A 5(1)(e) to suggest that the provision prevented that measure from being applied by the State to an individual abusing alcohol, in order to limit the harm caused by alcohol to himself and the public, or to prevent dangerous behaviour after drinking. The meaning of the term 'alcoholics' was also confirmed by the preparatory work of the Convention. The applicant's detention therefore fell within the ambit of A 5(1)(e) of the Convention. Under A 5 any deprivation of liberty had to be lawful, which included a requirement that it had to be effected in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law. The applicant's detention had a legal basis in Polish law. It was not for the Court to review whether the domestic authorities had taken correct decisions under Polish law. Its task is to establish whether the applicant's detention was 'the lawful detention' of an 'alcoholic', within the autonomous meaning of the Convention. The Court had serious doubts as to whether it could be said that the applicant behaved in such a way, influenced by alcohol, that he posed a threat to the public or himself, or that his own health, well-being or personal safety were endangered. Those doubts were reinforced by the trivial factual basis for the detention and the fact that the applicant was almost blind. A necessary element of the 'lawfulness' of the detention within the meaning of A 5(1)(e) was the absence of arbitrariness. The detention of an individual was such a serious measure that it was only justified where other, less severe measures had been considered and found to be insufficient to safeguard the individual or public interest which might require that the person concerned be detained. That meant that it did not suffice that the deprivation of liberty was executed in conformity with national law, but it also had to be necessary in the circumstances. No consideration appeared to have been given to the fact that the domestic legislation provided for several different measures which could be applied to an intoxicated person, among which detention in a sobering-up centre was the most extreme one. In the absence of any such considerations in the present case, although expressly foreseen by the domestic law, the applicant's detention could not be considered lawful under A 5(1)(e). There had therefore been a breach of that provision.

[Application lodged 2.11.1989; Commission report 19.5.1994; Court Judgment 20.2.1996]

Mr Pedro Lobo Machado was an engineer in Petrogal. On 5 February 1986 he brought proceedings against Petrogal in the Lisbon industrial tribunal seeking recognition of the occupational grade of 'director-general' instead of that of 'director' which had been assigned to him by his employer. As that classification had an effect on the amount of his retirement pension, he also sought payment of the sums that, under the collective labour agreement should have been paid him since his retirement in 1980. The Lisbon industrial tribunal dismissed his claims in a judgment of 7 October 1987 and that decision was upheld by the Lisbon Court of Appeal in a judgment of 1 June 1988. The applicant appealed to the Supreme Court. After the parties had exchanged pleadings, the case file was sent to the representative of the Attorney-General's department at the Supreme Court. On 28 February 1989 that representative delivered an opinion in which he recommended that the appeal should be dismissed. On 19 May 1989 the Supreme Court, sitting in private, considered the appeal. Three judges, a registrar and the member of the Attorney-General's department were present at the deliberations. The parties had not been asked to attend. At the end of the deliberations the court adopted a judgment in which it dismissed the appeal and this was served on the applicant on 22 May 1989. He complained about the participation of the Attorney General's department in the proceedings before the Supreme Court and the infringement of his right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions.

Comm found by majority (14–9) V 6(1), (22–1) no separate issue under P1A1.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), not necessary to consider P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr R Macdonald, Mr A Spielmann, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha (c), Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus.

The dispute in question related to social rights and was between two clearly defined parties: the applicant, as plaintiff, and Petrogal as defendant. In that context the duty of the Attorney General's department at the Supreme Court was mainly to assist the court and to help ensure that its case-law was consistent. Given that the rights were social in nature, the department's intervention in the proceedings was more particularly justified for the purposes of upholding the public interest. Portuguese legislation gave no indication as to how the representative of the Attorney-General's department attached to the Employment Division of the Supreme Court was to perform his role when that division sat in private. Great importance had to be attached to the part actually played in the proceedings by the member of the Attorney-General's department, and to the content and effects of his observations. The opinion from the Attorney General's department was objective and reasoned in law, but nevertheless intended to advise and accordingly influence the Supreme Court. The outcome of the appeal could have affected the amount of the applicant's retirement pension. Regard being had, therefore, to what was at stake for the applicant in the proceedings in the Supreme Court and to the nature of the Deputy Attorney-General's opinion, that the appeal should be dismissed, the fact that it was impossible for Mr Lobo Machado to obtain a copy of it and reply to it before judgment was given infringed his right to adversarial proceedings. That right meant in principle the opportunity for the parties to a criminal or civil trial to have knowledge of and comment on all evidence adduced or observations filed, even by an independent member of the national legal service, with a view to influencing the court's decision. That in itself amounted to a breach of A 6. The breach was aggravated by the presence of the Deputy Attorney General at the Supreme Court's private sitting. Even if he had no kind of say, it afforded him, if only to outward appearances, an additional opportunity to bolster his opinion in private, without fear of contradiction. The fact that his presence gave the Attorney General's department the chance to contribute to maintaining the consistency of the case-law could not alter that finding, since having a member present was not the only means of furthering that aim. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

The applicant did not reiterate his complaint under P1A1 before the Court and the Court did not consider that it had to raise the issue of its own motion.

Judgment constitutes sufficient just satisfaction as to alleged damage. Costs and expenses (PTE 1,500,000 less FF 21,724).

Loizidou v Turkey (1995) 20 EHRR 99, (1997) 23 EHRR 513 95/9

[Application lodged 22.7.1989; Commission report 8.7.1993; Court Judgment 23.3.1995 (preliminary objections). 18.12.1996, 28.7.1998]

Mrs Titina Loizidou, a Cypriot national, grew up in Kyrenia in northern Cyprus and after her marriage in 1972 moved with her husband to Nicosia. She claimed to be the owner of plots of land in Kyrenia in northern Cyprus and that following the Turkish occupation of northern Cyprus on 20 July 1974, she had been prevented from returning to Kyrenia and peacefully enjoying her property. On 19 March 1989 the applicant participated in a march organised by a women's group near the Turkish village of Akincilar in the occupied area of northern Cyprus. The aim of the march was to assert the right of Greek Cypriot refugees to return to their homes. They were surrounded by Turkish soldiers, detained by members of the Turkish Cypriot police force and returned to Nicosia. She was released around midnight, having been detained for more than ten hours. She complained that her arrest and detention involved violations of A 3, 5 and 8 and that the refusal of access to her property constituted a continuing violation of A 8 and P1A1.

Comm found unanimously NV 3, by majority (11–2) NV 8 as regards the applicant's private life, (9–4) NV 5(1), (9–4) NV 8 as regards the applicant's home, (8–5) NV P1A1.

Court dismissed unanimously the preliminary objection concerning an alleged abuse of process, found by majority (16–2) facts alleged by the applicant were capable of falling within Turkish jurisdiction within the meaning of 1, (16–2) that the territorial restrictions attached to Turkey's 25 and 46 declarations under the Convention were invalid but that the Turkish declarations under 25 and 46 contained valid acceptances of the competence of the Commission and Court, unanimously joined to the merits the preliminary objection ratione temporis.

Court dismissed by majority (11–6) the preliminary objection ratione temporis, found (11–6) that the denial of access to the applicant's property and consequent loss of control thereof was imputable to Turkey, (11–6) V P1A1, unanimously NV 8.

Preliminary objections

The standing of the applicant government: The locus standi of Cyprus as the Government of a High Contracting Party to the Convention could not be in doubt. Moreover it had not been contested that the applicant was a national of the Republic of Cyprus. In any event recognition of an applicant Government by a respondent Government was not a precondition for either the institution of proceedings under A 24 or the referral of cases to the Court under A 48.

Alleged abuse of process: The preliminary objection of abuse of process was not raised in the proceedings before the Commission and accordingly the Turkish Government was estopped from raising it before the Court in so far as it applied to the applicant. In so far as it was directed to the applicant Government, the Court noted that that Government had referred the case to the Court inter alia because of their concern for the rights of the applicant and other citizens in the same situation. The Court did not consider such motivation to be an abuse of its procedures. It followed that the objection had to be rejected.

The Turkish Government's role in the proceedings: The Court did not consider that it lay within the discretion of a Contracting Party to the Convention to characterise its standing in the proceedings before the Court in the manner it saw fit. The case originated in a petition brought by the applicant against Turkey in her capacity as a High Contracting Party to the Convention and had been referred to the Court under A 48(b) by another High Contracting Party. The Court therefore considered that Turkey was the respondent Party in the case.

Scope of the case: In the application referring the case to the Court under A 48(b) the applicant Government (Cyprus) had confined themselves to seeking a ruling on the complaints under P1A1 and A 8 in so far as they have been declared admissible by the Commission, concerning access to the applicant's property. Accordingly, it was only those complaints which were before the Court. The remaining part of the case concerning the applicant's arrest and detention thus fell within the competence of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe in accordance with A 32(1). Turkey had accepted that the scope of the case be confined in that way. In those circumstances the Court did not find it necessary to give a general ruling on the question whether it was permissible to limit a referral to the Court to some of the issues on which the Commission had stated its opinion.

Objections ratione loci: At the preliminary objections stage of its procedure, the Court's enquiry was limited to determining whether the matters complained of by the applicant were capable of falling within the 'jurisdiction' of Turkey even though they occurred outside her national territory. Although A 1 set limits on the reach of the Convention, the concept of 'jurisdiction' under the provision was not restricted to the national territory of the High Contracting Parties. In addition, the responsibility of Contracting Parties could be involved because of acts of their authorities, whether performed within or outside national boundaries, which produced effects outside their own territory. Bearing in mind the object and purpose of the Convention, the responsibility of a Contracting Party could also arise when as a consequence of military action – whether lawful or unlawful – it exercised effective control of an area outside its national territory. The obligation to secure, in such an area, the rights and freedoms set out in the Convention derived from the fact of such control whether it exercised directly, through its armed forces, or through a subordinate local administration. The respondent Government had acknowledged that the applicant's loss of control of her property stemmed from the occupation of the northern part of Cyprus by Turkish troops and the establishment there of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus 'TRNC'. Furthermore, it had not been disputed that the applicant was prevented by Turkish troops from gaining access to her property. It followed that such acts were capable of falling within Turkish 'jurisdiction' within the meaning of A 1. Whether the matters complained of were imputable to Turkey and gave rise to State responsibility were thus questions which fell to be determined by the Court at the merits phase. The Court observed that A 25 and 46 were provisions which were essential to the effectiveness of the Convention system since they delineated the responsibility of the Commission and Court 'to ensure the observance of the engagements undertaken by the High Contracting Parties', by determining their competence to examine complaints concerning alleged violations of the rights and freedoms set out in the Convention. In interpreting those key provisions the Court had to have regard to the special character of the Convention as a treaty for the collective enforcement of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Convention was a living instrument which had to be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions, that applied not only to the substantive provisions but also to A 25 and 46 which governed the operation of the Convention's enforcement machinery. Accordingly, even if it had been established, which was not the case, that restrictions, other than those ratione temporis, were considered permissible under A 25 and 46 at a time when a minority of the present Contracting Parties adopted the Convention, such evidence could not be decisive. In addition, the object and purpose of the Convention as an instrument for the protection of individual human beings required that its provisions be interpreted and applied so as to make its safeguards practical and effective. Taking into consideration the character of the Convention, the ordinary meaning of A 25 and 46 in their context and in the light of their object and purpose and the practice of Contracting Parties, the Court concluded that the restrictions ratione loci attached to Turkey's A 25 and A 46 declarations were invalid. The Court has examined the text of the Turkish declarations and the wording of the restrictions. Even considering the texts of the A 25 and 46 declarations taken together, the Court considered that the impugned restrictions could be separated from the remainder of the text leaving intact the acceptance of the optional clauses. The declarations of 28 January 1987 and 22 January 1990 under A 25 and 46 contained valid acceptances of the competence of the Commission and Court.

Objection ratione temporis: The Court considered that on the present state of the file it had not sufficient elements enabling it to decide the questions of ratione temporis, which was closely connected to the merits and would be joined thereto.

Merits

Preliminary objections: In principle the Court was not prevented in its examination of the merits of a complaint from having regard to new facts, supplementing and clarifying those established by the Commission, if it considered them to be of relevance. In this case the plea of estoppel had to fail. The Court had previously endorsed the notion of a continuing violation of the Convention and its effects as to temporal limitations of the competence of Convention organs. Accordingly, the present case concerned alleged violations of a continuing nature if the applicant, for purposes of P1A1 and A 8 of the Convention could still be regarded as the legal owner of the land. In the Court's view, the principles underlying the Convention could not be interpreted and applied in a vacuum. Mindful of the Convention's special character as a human rights treaty, the Court had to also take into account any relevant rules of international law when deciding on disputes concerning its jurisdiction pursuant to A 49. In this respect it was evident from international practice and various strongly worded resolutions that the international community did not regard the 'TRNC' as a State under international law and that the Republic of Cyprus had remained the sole legitimate Government of Cyprus – itself, bound to respect international standards in the field of the protection of human and minority rights. Accordingly, the applicant could not be deemed to have lost title to her property as a result of the 1985 Constitution of the 'TRNC'. Thus, for the purposes P1A1 and A 8 the applicant had to still be regarded to be the legal owner of the land. The objection ratione temporis therefore failed.

P1A1: The continuous denial of the applicant's access to her property in northern Cyprus and the ensuing loss of all control over the property was a matter which fell within Turkey's 'jurisdiction' within the meaning of A 1 and was thus imputable to Turkey. The applicant's complaint under P1A1 was not limited to the question of physical access to her property but was that Turkey, by refusing her access to property over the last 16 years had affected her right as a property owner and in particular her right to a peaceful enjoyment of her possessions. P1A1 was applicable. The Court had found that the applicant had remained the legal owner of the land and the continuous denial of access had to be regarded as an interference with her rights under P1A1. Such an interference could not, in the exceptional circumstances of the present case be regarded as either a deprivation of property or a control of use within the meaning of the first and second paragraphs of P1A1. However, it clearly fell within the meaning of the first sentence of P1A1 as an interference with the peaceful enjoyment of possessions. The Turkish Government had not made submissions justifying the interference with the applicant's property rights. No justification had been put forward for the complete negation of the applicant's property rights in the form of a total and continuous denial of access and a purported expropriation without compensation. The fact that property rights were the subject of intercommunal talks involving both communities in Cyprus could not provide a justification for this situation under the Convention. In those circumstances, there had been and continued to be a breach of P1A1.

A 8: The applicant did not have her home on the land in question. It would strain the meaning of the notion 'home' in A 8 to extend it to comprise property on which it was planned to build a house for residential purposes. Nor could that term be interpreted to cover an area of a State where one had grown up and where the family had its roots but where one no longer lived. Accordingly, there had been no interference with the applicant's rights under A 8 .

Pecuniary damage (by majority (14–3) CYP 300,000), non-pecuniary damage ((15–2) CYP 20,000), costs and expenses ((13–4) CYP 137,084.83) to applicant. Cypriot Government's claim for costs and expenses dismissed.

Lombardo, Francesco v Italy (1996) 21 EHRR 188 92/71

[Application lodged 3.10.1984; Commission report 10.7.1991; Court Judgment 26.11.1992]

Mr Francesco Lombardo served in the Carabinieri from 15 August 1946 to 14 March 1974, on which date he was invalided out of the service because he had become disabled as a result of two illnesses, an ulcer and neoplasia. On 10 June 1974 he applied for an enhanced ordinary pension on the ground that the illnesses which had caused his disablement were 'due to his service'. He appealed to the Court of Audit against the decision of the Ministry of Defence rejecting his application. The appeal was received by the Court of Audit on 22 December 1977. He made several requests for his case to be given priority. The case was heard on 15 February 1989, at the end of which his appeal was upheld. The text of the judgment was deposited with the registry on 7 July 1989. He complained of the length of the civil proceedings.

Comm found by majority (13–6) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber.

As the Government withdrew the objection of non-exhaustion at the hearing, the Court would not examine it of its own motion.

Even though disputes relating to the recruitment, employment and retirement of public servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1), State intervention by means of a statute or delegated legislation had not prevented the Court, in several cases, from finding the right in issue to have a civil character. Notwithstanding the public law aspects, what was concerned here was essentially an obligation on the State to pay a pension to a public servant in accordance with the legislation in force. In performing that obligation the State was not using discretionary powers and might be compared, in that respect, with an employer who was a party to a contract of employment governed by private law. Consequently, the right of a carabiniere to receive an 'enhanced ordinary pension' if he fulfilled the necessary conditions of injury and disability was to be regarded as a 'civil right' within the meaning of A 6(1) which was therefore applicable in the present case.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 22 December 1977, when the applicant's appeal was received by the Court of Audit. It ended on 7 July 1989 when that court's judgment was filed. It thus lasted for approximately 11 years, six months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was of a certain difficulty. However, that circumstance did not in itself justify the length of the proceedings. There were several periods of delay: the registry of the Court of Audit received the applicant's administrative file two years after requesting it; the principal public prosecutor waited approximately seven years and nine months before commissioning an expert report and once he was in possession of the report he waited 14 months before filing his submissions. The excessive workload could not be taken into consideration. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of the requirements of that paragraph. The delays were so substantial that the overall length of the proceedings had to be regarded as excessive. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

No just satisfaction claimed.

Mr Giancarlo Lombardo, a former judge, appealed to the Court of Audit on 11 November 1980 against a decree of the Ministry of Justice rejecting his application for the amount of his pension to be increased. In a judgment dated 13 March 1989, filed with the registry on 20 March, the court partially upheld the applicant's appeal and ordered the readjustment of his pension, re-evaluation of the sums due and payment of interest on those sums. He complained of the length of proceedings.

In performing that obligation, the State was not using discretionary powers and might be compared, in that respect, with an employer who was a party to a contract of employment governed by private law. The period to be taken into consideration began on 11 November 1980, when the proceedings were instituted in the Court of Audit. It ended on 20 March 1989 when the judgment of that court was filed. The period to be considered thus lasted for approximately eight years and four months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was of a certain difficulty. However, that circumstance did not in itself justify the length of the proceedings. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of the requirements of that paragraph. There were several periods of inactivity before the Court of Audit: it took the principal public prosecutor more than one year to file his submissions, and then almost five months to refer the case to the combined divisions of the Court of Audit; the case subsequently remained adjourned for over six years while awaiting the outcome of the prosecutor's appeal to the combined divisions in a similar case. Those delays were so substantial that the overall length of the proceedings had to be regarded as excessive. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Judgment constituted just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage sustained.

López Ostra v Spain (1995) 20 EHRR 277 94/47

[Application lodged 14.5.1990; Commission report 31.8.1993; Court Judgment 9.12.1994]

Mrs Gregoria López Ostra, her husband and two daughters, lived in Lorca, a town with a heavy concentration of leather industries. They lived 12 metres away from a waste-treatment plant which had operated without a licence. On 9 September 1988, following numerous complaints and in the light of reports from the health authorities and the Environment and Nature Agency, the town council ordered cessation of one of the plant's activities. On 13 October 1988 she lodged an application with the Administrative Division of the Murcia Audiencia Territorial, seeking protection of her fundamental rights, complaining, inter alia, of an unlawful interference with her home and her peaceful enjoyment of it on account of the nuisance and risks caused by the waste-treatment plant. She requested the court to order temporary or permanent cessation of its activities. The Audiencia Territorial found against her on 31 January 1989. She appealed to the Supreme Court which dismissed her appeal in a judgment of 27 July 1989. Her appeal to the Constitutional Court was ruled inadmissible on the ground that it was manifestly ill-founded. In 1990, two sisters-in-law of the applicant, who lived in the same building as her, brought proceedings alleging that the plant was operating unlawfully without licences required by law. The court ordered that the plant should be closed until they were obtained, but enforcement of the order was stayed following an appeal by the town council and the operating company. The case was still pending in the Supreme Court. The applicant's two sisters-in-law also lodged a complaint and were civil parties to the criminal proceedings against the company for an environmental health offence. In November 1991 the judge decided to close the plant, but that measure was suspended because of an appeal. On 1 February 1992 the applicant and her family were rehoused in a flat in the centre of Lorca, for which the municipality paid the rent. The inconvenience resulting from this move and from the precariousness of their housing situation prompted the applicant and her husband to purchase a house in a different part of town on 23 February 1993. On 27 October 1993 the judge confirmed of the order of November 1991 and the plant was temporarily closed. She complained that she was the victim of a violation of her right to respect for her home that made her private and family life impossible and the victim also of degrading treatment.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi, Mr B Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici.

The applicant had raised her complaint in both the Murcia Audiencia Territorial and the Supreme Court. She was not party to the proceedings brought by her sisters-in-law. Having had recourse to a remedy that was effective and appropriate in relation to the infringement of which she had complained, the applicant was under no obligation also to bring other proceedings that were slower. She had provided the national courts with the opportunity of putting right the violations alleged against them and the preliminary objection of non-exhaustion therefore had to be dismissed. Someone who had been forced by environmental conditions to abandon her home and subsequently to buy another house did not cease to be a victim. Neither her move nor the waste-treatment plant's closure, which was temporary, altered the fact that the applicant and her family lived for years only 12 metres away from a source of smells, noise and fumes. If she could now return to her former home following the decision to close the plant, that would be a factor to be taken into account in assessing the damage she sustained, but would not mean that she ceased to be a victim. Preliminary objection that applicant not a victim therefore dismissed.

Where a situation under consideration was a persisting one, the Court could take into account facts occurring after the application has been lodged and even after the decision on admissibility had been adopted. Severe environmental pollution may affect individuals' well-being and prevent them from enjoying their homes in such a way as to affect their private and family life adversely, without, however, seriously endangering their health. Whether the question was analysed in terms of a positive duty on the State to take reasonable and appropriate measures to secure the applicant's rights under A 8(1), or in terms of an interference by a public authority to be justified in accordance with A 8(2), the applicable principles were broadly similar. In both contexts regard had to be had to the fair balance that had to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole, and in any case the State enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation. Even in relation to the positive obligations flowing from the first paragraph of A 8, in striking the required balance the aims mentioned in the second paragraph might be of a certain relevance. Although the waste-treatment plant was built to solve a serious pollution problem it soon caused nuisance and health problems to many local people. The Spanish authorities were theoretically not directly responsible for the emissions in question. However, the town allowed the plant to be built on its land and the State subsidised the plant's construction. The town council had reacted promptly by rehousing the affected residents and then by stopping one of the plant's activities. However, the council's members would have been aware that the environmental problems continued after this partial shutdown. That was confirmed by the report of the Environment and Nature Agency. The question of the lawfulness of the building and operation of the plant had been pending in the Supreme Court since 1991. It was primarily for the national authorities, notably the courts, to interpret and apply domestic law. However, the municipality not only failed to take steps to fulfil the functions assigned by domestic law after 9 September 1988 but also resisted judicial decisions to that effect. It had appealed against the Murcia High Court's decision ordering temporary closure of the plant, and that measure was suspended as a result. Other State authorities also contributed to prolonging the situation. The family had to bear the nuisance caused by the plant for over three years before moving house with all the attendant inconveniences. The municipality's offer of rehousing could not afford complete redress for the nuisance and inconveniences to which they had been subjected. Having regard to the foregoing, and despite the margin of appreciation left to the respondent State, the State had not succeeded in striking a fair balance between the interest of the town's economic well-being, that of having a waste-treatment Plant, and the applicant's effective enjoyment of her right to respect for her home and her private and family life. There had accordingly been a violation of A 8.

The conditions in which the applicant and her family lived for a number of years were very difficult but did not amount to degrading treatment within the meaning of A 3.

Mr Giovanni Lorenzi, Mr Ivano Bernardini and Mr Alessio Gritti took proceedings on 27 March 1975 before the Brescia District Court against the Minister of Public Works, seeking compensation for the damage caused by the flooding of a stream. The investigation opened at the hearing of 19

May 1975. On 6 June 1984, the Brescia District Court ordered the Ministry of Public Works to compensate the applicants. On 20 May 1985, the Ministry of Public Works appealed against the judgment. Their appeal to the Brescia Court of Appeal was dismissed in November 1986. They appealed to the Court of Cassation which, on 9 March 1989, set aside the decision. The text of the decision was lodged with the registry on 15 May 1990. The applicants complained of the length of the civil proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 27 March 1975, when the proceedings were instituted against the Minister of Public Works in the Brescia District Court. It ended, at the earliest, on 15 May 1990, when the judgment of the Court of Cassation was lodged with the registry, and, at the latest, on 15 May 1991, when the time-limit for resuming the proceedings before the competent court expired. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was a complex one, both as regards the facts and the law, in particular because of the questions of jurisdiction which the Brescia District Court and then the Court of Cassation had to determine. In addition, the parties, by mutual agreement, caused numerous adjournments, which entailed a total delay of 21 months. However, the investigating judge failed to display due diligence in exercising his power of supervision over the work of the expert and there were two periods of total inactivity in the proceedings before the District Court and before the Court of Appeal. Furthermore, the Minister of Public Works, an officer of the State, took more than six months to file an appeal against the judgment of 6 June 1984 and that decision and the judgment of 9 March 1989 were not filed with the registry for nearly six and 14 months respectively. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. Accordingly, the Court could not regard as reasonable the time which it took to make a finding that the court before which the case initially came lacked jurisdiction. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Judgment constituted just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (ITL 2,000,000).

On 20 January 1970 Mr Luciano Luberti killed his mistress by firing several shots at her. Criminal proceedings were instituted against the applicant. He was arrested on 10 July 1972 and committed for trial on a charge of murder. On 17 January 1976, the Rome Assize Court sentenced him to twenty-one years' imprisonment for murder and to one year's imprisonment and a fine for possession of military weapons. He appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that he was insane at the time of the commission of the offence. Psychiatric reports were obtained and on 16 November 1979 the Rome Appeal Court of Assize acquitted him on the ground of mental incapacity and directed that he be confined for two years in a psychiatric hospital. Appeals on points of law to the Court of Cassation were dismissed on 17 June 1981. The applicant made several applications to the judicial authorities for release from confinement. He complained of having been confined in a psychiatric hospital although he was no longer suffering from any mental disorder. He also complained that the Italian courts had not given a decision speedily on his applications for the confinement order to be set aside.

In deciding whether an individual should be detained as a 'person of unsound mind', the national authorities were to be recognised as having a certain margin of appreciation since it was in the first place for the national authorities to evaluate the evidence adduced before them in a particular case; the Court's task was to review under the Convention the decisions of those authorities. An individual could not be considered to be 'of unsound mind' for the purposes of A 5(1) and deprived of his liberty unless the following three minimum conditions were satisfied: he had to be reliably shown to be of unsound mind; the mental disorder had to be of a kind or degree warranting compulsory confinement; and the validity of continued confinement depended upon the persistence of such a disorder. It could be seen to have been reliably established by the Appeal Court of Assize that the applicant was of unsound mind. The Appeal Court verified the existence of that condition not only as at the time of the killing, but also as at the date of adoption of the measure depriving the applicant of his liberty. Moreover, the Appeal Court of Assize did not fail to satisfy itself that the mental disorder from which the applicant was suffering at the time of its judgment was of a kind and degree warranting compulsory confinement. Two reports on the applicant's state of mental health were drawn up during the period between 16 November 1979, when the Appeal Court of Assize gave judgment, and 10 June 1981, when the security measure was terminated. On the basis of the evidence before it, the Court did not consider that it had been established that the applicant's detention continued beyond the period justified by his mental disorder. There had therefore been no violation of A 5(1).

Where the decision to deprive an individual of his liberty was one taken by an administrative body, that individual was entitled to have the lawfulness of the decision reviewed by a court, but the same did not apply when the decision was made by a court at the close of judicial proceedings, the review required by A 5(4) being in that event incorporated in the decision. The Court had also held, in connection with the confinement of persons of unsound mind, that provision should always be made for a subsequent review to be available at reasonable intervals, in as much as the reasons initially warranting confinement may cease to exist. The applicant lodged three applications for termination of his confinement. The proceedings from 19 November 1979 to 29 May 1981, before the Supervision Division and then the Court of Cassation and the Court of Appeal were characterised by excessive delays. As a result of those delays, the Italian judicial authorities, notwithstanding the diligence shown by the Naples Supervision Division, did not give a decision speedily on the lawfulness of the detention in question. There was therefore a breach of A 5(4).

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (ITL 1,000,000).

Lüdi v Switzerland (1993) 15 EHRR 173 92/50

[Application lodged 30.9.1986; Commission report 6.12.1990; Court Judgment 15.6.1992]

On the basis of information about Mr Ludwig Lüdi's intended activities from the German police, an investigating judge at the Laufen District Court opened a preliminary investigation on 15 March 1984. With the agreement of the Indictments Chamber of the Court of Appeal of the Canton of Berne and pursuant to the Berne Code of Criminal Procedure, he also ordered the applicant's telephone conversations to be monitored. The Laufen police and the special drugs unit decided that a sworn officer of the Berne Cantonal Police should pass himself off as a potential purchaser of cocaine. The applicant met the undercover agent on a number of occasions. The applicant was arrested on 1 August 1984 and charged with unlawful trafficking in drugs. On 4 June 1985, the Laufen District Court found the applicant guilty of seven offences against the Federal Drugs Law and sentenced him to three years' imprisonment. In order to preserve the anonymity of the undercover agent, the court declined to call him as a prosecution witness. The applicant applied to the Berne Court of Appeal, which confirmed the original judgment. The Court of Appeal did not call the undercover agent either. The applicant then brought a public law appeal and an application for a declaration of nullity to the Federal Court. On 8 April 1986, the Federal Court dismissed the public law appeal. The application for a declaration of nullity was granted and the case remitted to the Berne Court of Appeal. On 19 February 1987, the First Chamber of that court reduced the sentence to 18 months' imprisonment, suspended for three years. The applicant complained of the interception of his telephone conversations and that his conviction had been based solely on the reports of the undercover agent, who had not been summoned to appear as a witness, thus infringing his right to a fair trial.

Comm found by majority (10–4) V 8, (13–1) V 6(1)+6(3)(d).

Court dismissed unanimously the Government's preliminary, found NV 8, by majority (8–1) V 6(1)+6(3)(d).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr F Matscher (pd), Mr B Walsh, Mr A Spielmann, Mr SK Martens, Mr AN Loizou, Mr F Bigi, Mr L Wildhaber.

The word 'victim' under A 25 denoted the person directly affected by the act or omission in issue, the existence of a violation of the Convention being conceivable even in the absence of prejudice; prejudice being relevant only in the context of A 50. Mitigation of a sentence in principle deprived a person of his status as a victim only where the national authorities had acknowledged, either expressly or in substance, and then afforded redress for, the breach of the Convention. The applicant was directly affected by the intervention of the undercover agent and the national authorities, far from acknowledging that this intervention constituted a violation, expressly decided that it was in fact compatible with the obligations under the Convention. The preliminary objection of lack of victim status had therefore to be dismissed.

The telephone interception was an interference with the applicant's private life and correspondence. The measure was based on the Berne Code of Criminal Procedure. It was aimed at the prevention of crime and there was no doubt as to its necessity in a democratic society. The use of an undercover agent did not, either alone or in combination with the telephone interception, affect private life within the meaning of A 8. The undercover agent's actions took place within the context of a deal relating to 5 kg of cocaine. The applicant must have been aware that he was engaged in a criminal act punishable under the Drugs Law and that consequently he was running the risk of encountering an undercover police officer whose task would in fact be to expose him. There had been no violation of A 8.

The admissibility of evidence was primarily governed by the rules of domestic law, and as a general rule it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task was to ascertain whether the proceedings, considered as a whole, including the way in which the evidence was submitted, were fair. As the requirements of A 6(3) represented particular aspects of the right to a fair trial guaranteed in A 6(1) the complaint would be examined from the point of view of those two provisions taken together. Although the undercover agent did not give evidence to the court in person, for the purposes of A 6(3)(d) he had to be considered as a witness, a term which was to be given an autonomous interpretation. The applicant first made admissions after he had been shown the transcripts of the telephone interceptions, and he was deprived throughout the proceedings of any means of checking them or casting doubt on them. While the Swiss courts did not reach their decisions solely on the basis of the undercover agent's written statements, these played a part in establishing the facts which led to the conviction. All the evidence had normally to be produced in the presence of the accused at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument. There were exceptions to this principle, but they could not infringe the rights of the defence. In distinction to other cases, in this case the person in question was a sworn police officer whose function was known to the investigating judge. Moreover, the applicant knew the agent, if not by his real identity, at least by his physical appearance, as a result of having met him on five occasions. However, neither the investigating judge nor the trial courts were able or willing to hear the undercover agent as a witness and carry out a confrontation which would enable his statements to be contrasted with the applicant's allegations. In addition, neither the applicant nor his counsel had at any time during the proceedings an opportunity to question the agent and cast doubt on his credibility. Yet it would have been possible to do this in a way which took into account the legitimate interest of the police authorities in a drug trafficking case in preserving the anonymity of their agent, so that they could protect him and also make use of him again in the future. The rights of the defence were restricted to such an extent that the applicant did not have a fair trial.

[Applications lodged 23.7.1973, 20.12.1974 and 28.7.1975; Commission report 18.5.1977; Court Judgment 23.11.1978]

Mr Gerhard W Luedicke, a citizen of the UK, was charged with a road traffic offence, Mr Mohammed Belkacem, an Algerian citizen, was charged inter alia with assault occasioning bodily harm and Mr Arif Koç, a Turkish citizen, was charged with causing grievous bodily harm. Since they were not sufficiently familiar with the language of the country, they were assisted by an interpreter in accordance with German law. After conviction, they were ordered, amongst other things, to pay the costs of their proceedings, including the interpretation costs. On 4 May 1973, after unsuccessful appeals, Mr Luedicke paid the costs of the proceedings, including the interpretation costs. On 5 May 1977, following a request by Mr Belkacem, the Berlin Justizkasse allowed him to defer payment until the decision of the Commission of Human Rights was known. Mr Koç had not paid the costs and had indicated that he intended to return to Turkey. They complained that the order by the German courts to bear interpretation costs infringed their right to a fair trial. In addition, Mr Luedicke and Mr Belkacem also alleged discrimination by reason of the fact that a foreigner not speaking German was in a less favourable position than a German person.

Comm found unanimously V 6(3)(e), by majority (12–1) not necessary to examine 14.

Court unanimously rejected the Government's application to strike the case out of its list as far as the applicant Koç was concerned, found V 6(3)(e), not necessary to examine 14.

Judges (merits): Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr H Mosler (SO), Mrs H Pedersen, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr D Evrigenis, Mr P-H Teitgen, Mr G Lagergren (so).

Judges (A 50): Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr H Mosler, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr W Ganshof Van Der Meersch, Mr D Evrigenis, Mr P-H Teitgen, Mr G Lagergren.

The Court took formal notice of the Government's declaration that the compulsory collection of costs from the applicant Koç would not be carried out in future even if he were to return to Germany. However, that declaration was a unilateral act which could not amount to a 'friendly settlement' or an 'arrangement' within the meaning of Rule 47(2). Neither could it be regarded as a 'fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter'. The waiver of recovery of the sums due by Mr. Koç was not prompted by reasons deriving from A 6(3)(e), but from the practical difficulties and cost of recovery, as well as from consideration of the applicant's family and financial situation. Furthermore, the waiver of recovery did not remove the applicant's legal interest to have established the Convention complaint. Retaining the case in its entirety on the list would facilitate providing the Government, who were seeking an interpretation of the Convention by the Court, with an answer of the completeness they were entitled to expect on account, notably, of the conflict of opinion as to the meaning of the provisions in issue. Consequently, the Court decided not to sever Mr Koç's case from the two others and not to strike it out of the list.

The term 'free' in A 6(3)(e) had a clear and determinate meaning. It denoted neither a conditional remission, nor a temporary exemption, nor a suspension, but a once and for all exemption or exoneration. To read A 6(3)(e) as allowing the domestic courts to make a convicted person bear the interpretation costs would amount to limiting in time the benefit of the article and in practice, to denying that benefit to any accused person who was eventually convicted. It would leave in existence the disadvantages that an accused who did not understand or speak the language used in court suffered as compared with an accused who was familiar with that language. The obligation for a convicted person to pay interpretation costs might have repercussions on the exercise of his right to a fair trial as safeguarded by A 6. The ordinary meaning of the term 'free' in A 6(3)(e) was not contradicted by the context of the sub-paragraph and was confirmed by the object and purpose of A 6. The right protected by A 6(3)(e) entailed, for anyone who could not speak or understand the language used in court, the right to receive the free assistance of an interpreter, without subsequently having claimed back from him payment of the costs thereby incurred. Construed in the context of the right to a fair trial guaranteed by A 6, para 3 (e) signified that an accused who could not understand or speak the language used in court had the right to the free assistance of an interpreter for the translation or interpretation of all those documents or statements in the proceedings instituted against him which it was necessary for him to understand in order to have the benefit of a fair trial. Mr Luedicke had to pay interpretation costs, including an amount in respect of the oral hearing. No details were provided as to the nature of the remaining balance and accordingly, the Court could not conclude that that balance fell outside the scope of A 6(3)(e). Mr Koç's interpretation costs were exclusively attributed to three court hearings and came within the ambit of A 6(3)(e). The interpretation costs awarded against Mr Belkacem resulted from his appearance before the judge, the review of his detention on remand, the translation of the indictment and the trial hearing; A 6(3)(e) covered all those costs. Accordingly, the decisions of the German courts were in breach of A 6(3)(e).

It was not necessary to examine the case under A 14. In order to secure the right to a fair trial, A 6(3)(e) sought to prevent any inequality between an accused person who was not conversant with the language used in court and an accused person who did speak and understand that language; hence, it was to be regarded as a particular rule in relation to the general rule embodied in A 6(1) and 14 taken together. Accordingly, there was no scope for the application of the two latter provisions.

A 50: Court held unanimously Federal Republic of Germany to reimburse Mr Luedicke for the interpretation costs that he had paid. Agreements having been reached of an equitable nature between the Federal Republic of Germany and the respective representatives of Mr Luedicke and Mr Koç, their cases were struck out of the list. No issue arose concerning the interpretation costs which Mr Belkacem was ordered to pay or the costs incurred in the exercise of the domestic remedies. The relevant Berlin authorities had suspended recovery of the interpretation costs pending clarification by the Court of the meaning of A 6(3)(e). Subsequently, the claim for costs had been cancelled. Reimbursement of the costs referable to the domestic remedies had not been claimed by the applicant. What remained were the additional costs claimed by Mr Belkacem's lawyer. Mr Belkacem had the benefit of free legal aid before the Commission and the Court and therefore bore no costs himself and suffered no loss capable of being compensated. His lawyer could not rely on A 50 to seek just satisfaction on his own account; besides, he accepted of his own free will the conditions, including the scale of fees, applicable to the legal aid granted to his client. Accordingly, the request made in Mr Belkacem's name was not well-founded.

Lughofer v Austria 99/92

[Application lodged 27.9.1993; Commission report 9.9.1998; Court Judgment 30.11.1999]

Ernst and Anna Lughofer's farm was the object of land consolidation proceedings instituted by the District Agricultural Authority on 22 February 1973. The applicant's appeal was dismissed by the Upper Austria Regional Land Reform Board after an oral hearing held in private, but in the presence of the parties and their lawyer. On 25 September 1990 the applicants filed a complaint with the Administrative Court against the decision. They also asked the Court to hold an oral hearing. On 15 December 1992 the Administrative Court dismissed the complaint, rejecting the applicants' request for an oral hearing. They complained of a violation of A 6(1) on account of the lack of a public hearing.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

By letter of 17 May 1999 the Government conceded that there had been a violation of A 6(1) in the circumstances of the application. The Court recalled its findings in Stallinger and Kuso v A. The failure to hold a public hearing in the land consolidation proceedings was not compatible with A 6(1).

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (ATS 30,965.42).

Lukanov v Bulgaria (1997) 24 EHRR 121 97/17

[Application lodged 1.9.1992; Commission report 16.1.1996; Court Judgment 20.3.1993]

Mr Andrei Karlov Lukanov was formerly a Minister, then Deputy Prime Minister and, in 1990, Prime Minister of Bulgaria, he was a member of the Bulgarian National Assembly at the time of the events giving rise to the present case. On 2 October 1996 he was shot dead outside his home. On 7 July 1992 the National Assembly waived his parliamentary immunity and authorised criminal proceedings against him and his arrest and detention on remand. On 9 July 1992 the public prosecutor charged the applicant with having together with others misappropriated funds allocated to certain developing countries facilitating the misappropriation in order to obtain an advantage for a third party, thereby causing considerable economic damage. He was arrested and remanded in custody at the premises of the National Investigation Service in Sofia. On the same date the applicant's lawyer lodged an appeal with the Bulgarian Supreme Court, requesting his release. The appeal was dismissed on 13 July. Further unsuccessful requests were made for his release. On 30 December 1992 the prosecutor decided to release the applicant on bail. He complained, inter alia, that his arrest and detention on remand had been incompatible with A 5(1)(c) in that there was no reasonable suspicion of his having committed a crime and that the measures were not necessary in order to prevent him from committing an offence or fleeing.

Comm found unanimously V 5(1) and no separate issue under 18.

Court found unanimously V 5(1), no separate issue under 18.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mrs E Palm, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr J Casadevall.

The Court had jurisdiction to examine the facts and circumstances of the applicant's complaints in so far as they related to the period after 7 September 1992, when Bulgaria ratified the Convention and recognised the Court's compulsory jurisdiction. In doing so, it would take into account the state of the proceedings as of that date, in particular the fact that the grounds for his detention, stated in the detention order of 9 July and the Supreme Court judgment of 13 July upholding the order, remained the same until his release on 30 December 1992. A 5(1) contained an exhaustive list of permissible grounds for deprivation of liberty which had to be interpreted strictly. The applicant had, as a member of the Bulgarian Government, taken part in the decisions – granting funds in assistance and loans to certain developing countries – which had given rise to the charges against him. However, none of the provisions of the Criminal Code relied on to justify the detention specified or even implied that anyone could incur criminal liability by taking part in collective decisions of that nature. Moreover, no evidence had been adduced to show that such decisions were unlawful, that is to say contrary to Bulgaria's Constitution or legislation, or more specifically that the decisions were taken in excess of powers or were contrary to the law on the national budget. In the light of the above, the Court was not persuaded that the conduct for which the applicant was prosecuted constituted a criminal offence under Bulgarian law at the relevant time. The public prosecutor's order of detention of 9 July 1992 and the Supreme Court's decision of 13 July upholding the order referred to parts of the Criminal Code and the Court was not provided with any fact or information capable of showing that the applicant was at the time reasonably suspected of the offence. In those circumstances, the Court did not find that the deprivation of the applicant's liberty during the period under consideration was 'lawful detention' effected 'on reasonable suspicion of his having committed an offence'. Having reached that conclusion it was not necessary to examine whether the detention could reasonably be considered necessary to prevent his committing an offence or fleeing after having done so. There had been a violation of A 5(1).

Having regard to the conclusions with respect to A 5(1) no separate issue arose under A 18.

Lustig-Prean and Beckett v United Kingdom (2000) 29 EHRR 548 99/53

[Application lodged 23.4.1996, 11.7.1996; Court Judgment 27.9.1999 (merits) 25.7.2000 (A 41)]

Mr Duncan Lustig-Prean joined the Royal Navy Reserve as a radio operator and in 1982 commenced a career in the Royal Navy. On 27 April 1983 he became a midshipman in the executive branch of the navy. He had been involved in a steady relationship with a civilian partner. In early June 1994 the applicant was informed that the Royal Navy Special Investigations Branch ('the service police') had been given his name anonymously in connection with an allegation of homosexuality and was investigating the matter. He was interviewed and admitted that he was homosexual. On 16 December 1994 the Admiralty Board informed the applicant that it had decided to terminate his commission and to discharge him, administratively, from the navy with effect from 17 January 1995. The ground for his discharge was his sexual orientation. His commission was removed and most of the bonus which he had received with that promotion was recouped by the naval authorities. On 20 February 1989 Mr John Beckett joined the Royal Navy. In May 1993 the applicant had been refused time off to deal with a personal matter (he wished to collect his Aids test results) and consequently he spoke with the chaplain, to whom he admitted his sexual orientation. On 10 May 1993 the applicant was asked by his lieutenant-commander to repeat what he had told the chaplain and he again admitted his homosexuality to that officer. He was then called for interview by the service police. His locker was searched and he was interviewed. On 28 July 1993 his administrative discharge was approved on the basis of his homosexuality. His subsequent complaint to the Admiralty Board about the decision to discharge him was dismissed. The applicants' application to the High Court for judicial review of the decisions to discharge them from the armed forces was dismissed. Their appeals to the Court of Appeal were dismissed on 3 November 1995. On 19 March 1996 the Appeals Committee of the House of Lords refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords. Their appeals to the Industrial Tribunal claiming unfair dismissal and sexual discrimination were dismissed. They complained that the investigations into their homosexuality and their subsequent discharge from the Royal Navy on the sole ground that they were homosexual, in pursuance of the Ministry of Defence's absolute policy against homosexuals in the British armed forces, constituted a violation of their right to respect for their private lives protected by A 8.

Court found unanimously V 8, no separate issue under 14+8.

Judges (merits and A 14): Mr J-P Costa, President, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mr L Loucaides (pc/pd), Mr P Kûris, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mrs HS Greve, Mr Traja.

The investigations by the military police into the applicants' homosexuality, which included detailed interviews with each of them and with third parties on matters relating to their sexual orientation and practices, together with the preparation of a final report for the armed forces' authorities on the investigations, constituted a direct interference with the applicants' right to respect for their private lives. Their consequent administrative discharge on the sole ground of their sexual orientation also constituted an interference with that right. The Ministry of Defence policy excluding homosexuals from the armed forces was in accordance with the law. The interferences could be said to pursue the legitimate aims of the interests of national security and the prevention of disorder. An interference would be considered necessary in a democratic society for a legitimate aim if it answered a pressing social need and, in particular, was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. When the relevant restrictions concerned a most intimate part of an individual's private life, there had to exist particularly serious reasons before such interferences could satisfy the requirements of A 8(2). When the core of the national security aim pursued was the operational effectiveness of the armed forces, it was accepted that each State was competent to organise its own system of military discipline and enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in that respect. However, the national authorities could not rely on such rules to frustrate the exercise by individual members of the armed forces of their right to respect for their private lives, which right applied to service personnel as it does to others within the jurisdiction of the State. Moreover, assertions as to a risk to operational effectiveness had to be substantiated by specific examples. The sole reason for the investigations conducted and for the applicants' discharge was their sexual orientation. As it concerned a most intimate aspect of an individual's private life, particularly serious reasons by way of justification were required. The interferences were especially grave in this case. The investigation process was of an exceptionally intrusive character. The administrative discharge of the applicants had a profound effect on their careers and prospects. The absolute and general character of the policy which led to the interferences in question was striking. The policy resulted in an immediate discharge from the armed forces once an individual's homosexuality was established and irrespective of the individual's conduct or service record. The core argument of the Government in support of the policy was that the presence of open or suspected homosexuals in the armed forces would have a substantial and negative effect on morale and, consequently, on the fighting power and operational effectiveness of the armed forces. However, there was a lack of concrete evidence to substantiate the alleged damage to morale and fighting power that any change in the policy would entail. No convincing or weighty reasons had been offered by the Government to justify the policy against homosexuals in the armed forces or, therefore, the consequent discharge of the applicants from those forces. Neither the investigations conducted into the applicants' sexual orientation, nor their discharge on the grounds of their homosexuality in pursuance of the Ministry of Defence policy, were justified under A 8(2). Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 8.

The applicants' complaints that they were discriminated against on grounds of their sexual orientation by reason of the existence and application of the policy of the Ministry of Defence, amounted in effect to the same complaint, albeit seen from a different angle, that had already been considered in relation to A 8 and accordingly, the complaints under A 14+8 did not give rise to any separate issue.

Lutz v Germany (1988) 19 EHRR 182 87/18

[Application lodged 14.6.1982; Commission report 18.10.1985; Court Judgment 25.8.1987]

Mr Uli Lutz was involved in a road accident on 10 October 1980. On 9 December 1980, on the basis of the police report, the Police Authority fined the applicant and added costs for the road accident. The applicant appealed. On 24 July 1981, the District Court informed the applicant that it intended to discontinue the proceedings as they were time-barred and order costs against the Treasury while the applicant would have to bear his own necessary costs and expenses. On 10 September 1981, the applicant challenged the decision on his costs. On 25 September, the Heilbronn Regional Court dismissed the appeal as being unfounded. His appeal to the Federal Constitutional Court was rejected. He complained that the decision as to costs was contrary to the principle of the presumption of innocence.

Court unanimously rejected preliminary objection, found by majority (14–3) that 6(2) applied, (16–1) NV 6(2).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona (d), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (declaration), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (jd), Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (jd), Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt (jd), Mr J Gersing, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos.

The complaint raised by the applicant was not outside the provisions of the Convention, it related to the Convention's interpretation and application. It had been considered with the merits and could not be tried as a preliminary issue.

In order to determine whether a 'regulatory offence' was a 'criminal' one, the Court referred to the criteria adopted in its previous judgments. The first matter to be ascertained was whether or not the text defining the offence in issue belonged, according to the legal system of the respondent State, to criminal law; next, the nature of the offence and, finally, the nature and degree of severity of the penalty that the person concerned risked incurring had to be examined, having regard to the object and purpose of A 6, to the ordinary meaning of the terms of that article and to the laws of the Contracting States. The second and third criteria were alternative and not cumulative ones: for A 6, by virtue of the words 'criminal charge', it sufficed that the offence in question should by its nature be 'criminal' from the point of view of the Convention, as in the instant case, or should have made the person concerned liable to a sanction which, in its nature and degree of severity, belonged in general to the 'criminal' sphere. The proceedings against the applicant had become time-barred, and that fact was given judicial recognition by the decision of 24 August 1981, which decision also settled the question of costs. Apportionment of the costs was a consequence and necessary concomitant of the stay of proceedings. A 6(2) applied in the instant case. That did not mean that the very principle of the system adopted in the matter by the German legislature was being put in question. Conferring the prosecution and punishment of minor offences on administrative authorities was not inconsistent with the Convention, provided that the person concerned was able to bring any decision thus made against him before a tribunal that afforded the safeguards of A 6.

The refusal to reimburse the applicant for his necessary costs and expenses did not in itself offend the presumption of innocence. Nevertheless, a decision refusing reimbursement of an accused's necessary costs and expenses following termination of proceedings could raise an issue under A 6(2) if supporting reasoning which could not be dissociated from the operative provisions amounted in substance to a determination of the accused's guilt without his having previously been proved guilty according to law and, in particular, without his having had an opportunity to exercise the rights of the defence. Applying the relevant provision of the Code of Criminal Procedure meant that the relevant courts, which decided the matter on an equitable basis and had a degree of discretion, were under an obligation to take into account, inter alia, the weight of the suspicion still falling on the person concerned. The German courts, in their decisions, meant to indicate, as they were required to do for the purposes of the decision, that there were still strong suspicions concerning the applicant. The refusal to order the Treasury to pay the applicant's necessary costs and expenses did not amount to a penalty or a measure that could be equated with a penalty. The applicant only had to bear his own costs and expenses, not those of the proceedings. The Convention, particularly A 6(2), did not oblige the Contracting States, where a prosecution had been discontinued, to indemnify a person 'charged with a criminal offence' for any detriment he may have suffered. Therefore, the decision of the Heilbronn District Court, which was upheld by the Regional Court and the Federal Constitutional Court, did not offend the presumption of innocence guaranteed to the applicant under A 6(2).

MR v Italy 92/74

[Application lodged 10.6.1987; Commission report 8.4.1992; Court Judgment 27.11.1992]

At the end of a series of proceedings which had lasted 25 years in total, Mr N, the applicant's husband, an official at the Ministry of Finance until his retirement in 1973, was retrospectively acknowledged as being entitled to an upgrading and, consequently, to receive the corresponding difference in remuneration. On 19 October 1984 Mrs MR, the applicant, brought an action in the Regional Administrative Court seeking a recalculation of the salary due to her husband (who had died in the meantime) following the career restructuring ordered by the Ministry of Finance on 14 April 1980. On 29 October 1985 the Administrative Court granted the applicant's request and the text of the judgment was filed in the registry on 24 September 1987. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings brought by her.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha.

The applicant had not responded to correspondence from the registry. The Court discerned no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. It noted that there were a number of previous cases and pending cases raising similar issues of the reasonableness of the length of judicial proceedings. Accordingly, the case should be struck out of the list.

[Application lodged 23.9.1992; Commission report 11.4.1996; Court Judgment 27.8.1997]

Ms MS was as a nursery-school teacher. On 9 October 1981 she slipped and fell at work, injuring her back. She was pregnant at the time, and had been seeing a doctor at the women's clinic at the hospital. On the afternoon of the accident she went to the same clinic. Following this incident, Ms MS was unable to return to work for any sustained period of time because of severe back pain. After she had been on the sick-list for some time, she was granted a disability pension. On 13 March 1991 she made a claim for compensation from the Social Insurance Office. As a matter of routine, her lawyer requested a copy of the file which had been compiled by the Office for the purposes of her claim. From the documents on the file she learnt that the Office had written to the women's clinic on 25 March 1992 and that the clinic had submitted copies of her medical records containing information on treatment she had received. She had not been consulted prior to the disclosure of these documents. On 19 May 1992 the Office rejected the applicant's claim for compensation under the Insurance Act, finding that her sick-leave had not been caused by an industrial injury. The applicant appealed successively to the Social Insurance Board, the local County Administrative Court and the competent Administrative Court of Appeal, but at each stage her appeal was rejected. On 26 February 1996 the Supreme Administrative Court refused her leave to appeal. She complained, under A 8, that the submission of her medical records to the Social Insurance Office constituted an unjustified interference with her right to respect for private life and, under A 6 and 13, that she had no remedy she could use to challenge this measure.

Comm found by majority (22–5) NV 8, (24–3) NV 6(1), (20–7) no separate issue under 13.

Court found unanimously NV 8, by majority (6–3) A 6(1) not applicable, unanimously NV 6, NV 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (pc/pd), President, Mr F Gölcüklü (PC/PD), Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Sir John Freeland, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek (pc/pd).

Under Swedish law, the disclosure depended not only on the fact that the applicant had submitted her compensation claim to the Social Insurance Office but also on a number of factors beyond her control. It could not therefore be inferred from her request for compensation that she had waived in an unequivocal manner her right to respect for private life with regard to the medical records at the clinic. Accordingly, A 8 applied to the matters under consideration. The medical records contained highly personal and sensitive data about the applicant. Although the records remained confidential, they had been disclosed to another public authority and therefore to a wider circle of public servants. Moreover, whilst the information had been collected and stored at the clinic in connection with medical treatment, its subsequent communication had served a different purpose, namely to enable the Office to examine her compensation claim. The disclosure of the data by the clinic to the Office entailed an interference with the applicant's right to respect for private life. The interference had a legal basis and was foreseeable; in other words, that it was in accordance with the law. The object of the disclosure was to enable the Office to determine whether the conditions for granting the applicant compensation for industrial injury had been met. The communication of the data was potentially decisive for the allocation of public funds to deserving claimants. It could thus be regarded as having pursued the aim of protecting the economic well-being of the country. The applicant's medical data were communicated by one public institution to another in the context of an assessment of whether she satisfied the legal conditions for obtaining a benefit which she herself had requested. The Office had a legitimate need to check information received from her against data in the possession of the clinic. That claim concerned a back injury which she had allegedly suffered in 1981, and all the medical records produced by the clinic to the Office contained information relevant to the applicant's back problems. The applicant had not substantiated her allegation that the clinic could not reasonably have considered her post-1981 medical records to be material to the Office's decision. The contested measure was subject to important limitations and was accompanied by effective and adequate safeguards against abuse. There were relevant and sufficient reasons for the communication of the applicant's medical records by the clinic to the Office and that the measure was not disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. Accordingly, there had been no violation of the applicant's right to respect for her private life.

In order to determine whether A 6(1) was applicable to the disagreement, it had to ascertained whether there was a dispute over a 'right' which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. The dispute had to be genuine and serious; it could relate not only to the existence of a right but also to its scope and the manner of its exercise; and the outcome of the proceedings had to be directly decisive for the right in question. The right had to be civil in character. The clinic had been under an obligation to supply the Office with information on the applicant concerning circumstances of importance to the application under the Insurance Act. Thus, the obligation incumbent on the imparting authority vis-à-vis the requesting authority depended exclusively on the relevance of the data in its possession; it comprised all data which the clinic had in its possession concerning the applicant and which were potentially relevant to the Office's determination of her compensation claim. In addition, the clinic enjoyed a very wide discretion in assessing what data would be of importance to the application of the Insurance Act. In this regard, it had no duty to hear the applicant's views before transmitting the information to the Office. A 'right' to prevent communication of such data could not, on arguable grounds, be said to be recognised under national law. A 6(1) was not applicable to the proceedings under consideration and had therefore not been violated in the present case.

The applicant's complaint under A 8 was essentially that the clinic had communicated to the Office certain data which in her view were irrelevant to the latter's examination of her compensation claim. She had an arguable claim for the purposes of A 13. It was open to her to bring criminal and civil proceedings before the ordinary courts against the relevant staff of the clinic and to claim damages for breach of professional secrecy. She therefore had access to an authority empowered both to deal with the substance of her A 8 complaint and to grant her relief. Having regard to the limited nature of the disclosure and to the different safeguards, in particular the Office's obligation to secure and maintain the confidentiality of the information, the various ex post facto remedies referred to satisfied the requirements of A 13. Accordingly, there was no violation of A 13.

Macaluso v Italy 91/55

[Application lodged 14.5.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 13.12.1991]

Mrs Maria Macaluso was unemployed. On 13 July 1983 she took action against the 'Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale' (INPS) before the Rome magistrates' court ('pretore') in order to establish her right to a disability pension. On 4 November 1988, the District Court dismissed her claim. The text of the judgment was registered on 11 January 1989. She complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens.

The Court was informed that the applicant had died and her heirs had not expressed any wish to continue the proceedings before the Court. The Court discerned no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. It noted other cases in which it had reviewed the reasonableness of the length of civil proceedings. Accordingly case struck out of the list.

Maciariello Italy 92/21

Mr Vittorio Maciariello instituted divorce proceedings before the District Court of Santa Maria Capua Vetere on 31 May 1983. Judgment was reserved at the hearing of 10 February 1987 and delivered on 19 February 1987, the text of it being lodged with the registry on 14 March 1987. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 31 May 1983 when the divorce proceedings were instituted. It ended at the latest on 14 March 1988 when the judgment of the Santa Maria Capua Vetere District Court became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The proceedings were conducted at a normal pace before the relevant chamber of the District Court; however there had been delays at the beginning of the investigation. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The Court could not regard as reasonable the lapse of time in the present case, in particular as special diligence was required in cases relating to civil status and capacity.

Magee v United Kingdom 00/156

[Application lodged 22 5 1992; Court Judgment 6.6.2000]

Mr Gerard Magee was arrested on 16 December 1988 in Northern Ireland, in connection with an attempted bomb attack on military personnel. Access to a lawyer was delayed under the relevant legislation. He was cautioned that adverse inferences could be drawn from his failure to mention facts later relied on in his defence. He was interviewed several times. The following morning he complained to the doctor that he had been ill-treated. During subsequent interviews the applicant broke his silence and gave detailed answers to a number of questions admitting to his involvement in the assembly and planting of the bomb. He signed a lengthy statement to that effect. The following day he told the doctor that he had not had any further ill-treatment. He was later allowed to consult with his lawyer. His trial took place before a single judge sitting without a jury. The prosecution case was based on his confession and written statement, his application to have it excluded on the basis of the ill-treatment was rejected. Although cautioned that adverse inferences could be drawn from his failure to give evidence at trial, he declined to do so. He was convicted and sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment. His appeal was dismissed. He complained that he had been denied a fair trial.

Court found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(c), NV 14+6.

The applicant's central complaint was that he had been prevailed upon in a coercive environment to incriminate himself without the benefit of legal advice. Even if the primary purpose of A 6, as far as criminal matters was concerned, was to ensure a fair trial by a tribunal competent to determine any criminal charge, it did not follow that the Article has no application to pre-trial proceedings. Thus, A 6, especially para 3, might be relevant before a case was sent for trial if and so far as the fairness of the trial was likely to be seriously prejudiced by an initial failure to comply with its provisions. The manner in which A 6(1) and (3)(c) was to be applied during the preliminary investigation depended on the special features of the proceedings involved and on the circumstances of the case. Prior to his confession the applicant had been interviewed on five occasions for extended periods punctuated by breaks. He was examined by a doctor on two occasions including immediately before the critical interview at which he began to confess. Apart from his contacts with the doctor, he was kept incommunicado during the breaks between bouts of questioning conducted by experienced police officers operating in relays. As a matter of procedural fairness, the applicant should have been given access to a solicitor at the initial stages of the interrogation as a counterweight to the intimidating atmosphere specifically devised to sap his will and make him confide in his interrogators. Irrespective of the fact that the domestic court drew no adverse inferences under the legislation, it could not be denied that the caution administered to the applicant was an element which heightened his vulnerability to the relentless rounds of interrogation on the first days of his detention. To deny access to a lawyer for such a long period (over 48 hours) and in a situation where the rights of the defence were irretrievably prejudiced was, whatever the justification for such denial, incompatible with the rights of the accused under A 6. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1) in conjunction with A 6(3)(c) as regards the denial of access to a solicitor.

The applicant complained that he was discriminated against on grounds of national origin and/or association with a national minority. A 14 protected against a discriminatory difference in treatment of persons in analogous positions in the exercise of the rights and freedoms recognised by the Convention and its Protocols. In the constituent parts of the UK there was not always a uniform approach to legislation in particular areas. Whether or not an individual could assert a right derived from legislation may accordingly depend on the geographical reach of the legislation at issue and the individual's location at the time. In so far as there existed a difference in treatment of detained suspects under the legislation on the matters referred to by the applicant, that difference was not to be explained in terms of personal characteristics, such as national origin or association with a national minority, but on the geographical location where the individual was arrested and detained. That permitted legislation to take account of regional differences and characteristics of an objective and reasonable nature. Such a difference did not amount to discriminatory treatment within the meaning of A 14. There had been no violation of A 14 in conjunction with A 6.

Finding of a violation constituted just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage incurred by the applicant. Costs and expenses (GBP 10,000 less FF 4,100).

Mr Yves Maillard was an officer in the French navy. He complained about the assessment of his abilities in 1983 and sought an order to have it quashed and his career retrospectively adjusted. His applications were refused and he complained about the length of proceedings.

Court found unanimously 6 NA.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek (c), Mr E Levits, Mr M Voicu.

The applicant had raised a dispute over a right within the meaning of A 6(1). The only issue was whether the right in question was a civil one. Disputes concerning the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). Matters were nevertheless different where the claims in issue related to a 'purely economic' right, such as payment of a salary or pension, or at least an 'essentially economic' one. That applied to French professional servicemen. The applicant's disputes thus related to his assessment for 1983 and its consequences for his promotion; they therefore primarily concerned his career. The pecuniary implications of the outcome of the relevant proceedings did not suffice to make those proceedings 'civil' ones. A 6(1) consequently did not apply in the instant case.

Maini v France 99/66

[Application lodged 10.1.1996; Court Judgment 26 10 1999]

Mr Alain Maini filed a criminal complaint and applied to join criminal proceedings as a civil party in September 1991. In March 1996 the investigating judge held that there was no case to answer. The applicant's appeals were dismissed by the Court of Appeal in June 1996 and by the Court of Cassation on 1 October 1997. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja.

In his criminal complaint the applicant had expressly referred to the damage to his property, psychological suffering and financial damage caused by the alleged offences. His complaint therefore concerned a civil right. The fact that he had not quantified the damage at the time of filing the complaint could not be held against him as, under French law, it was open to him to file a claim for damages at any time before or during the trial. In addition, the aim of his complaint was to have criminal proceedings commenced with a view to obtaining a guilty verdict which would have enabled him to exercise his civil rights in relation to the alleged offences, in particular, to obtain compensation for the harm he claimed to have suffered. The outcome of the proceedings was therefore decisive for establishing his right to redress. Consequently A 6(1) was applicable.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 2 September 1991 and ended on 1 October 1997; it had lasted 6 years and one month. The case was not complex and the applicant had not delayed the proceedings by his conduct. There were two delays in the investigation on the part of the authorities which held it up for two years and 11 months of its total length of 4 years and 6 months. No convincing explanation had been put forward for those delays. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, taking into account the complexity of the case, conduct of the applicant and of the competent authorities. The present case was complex, the applicant had not delayed it but there was no justification for the long delays in the process. The lapse of 5 years 8 months was not reasonable.

Majaric v Slovenia 00/44

[Application lodged 13.12.1994; Commission report 21.10.1998; Court Judgment 8.2.2000]

On 6 December 1991 Mr Ljubo Majaric was charged with sexual assault of a minor and abduction of minors. He was remanded in custody. On 5 June 1992 the applicant's trial started before the Nova Gorica District Court. Further charges were added and proceedings joined. On 9 July 1997 the District Court convicted the applicant of sexual offences on several counts. A combined prison sentence of two years and eight months was imposed on the applicant. Both the applicant and the public prosecutor appealed. On 12 February 1998 the Koper High Court rejected the applicant's appeal and increased the sentence to three years' imprisonment. The applicant's appeals to the Supreme Court and Constitutional Court were dismissed by the latter court on 1 December 1998. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr J Casadevall, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr Gaukur Jörundsson, Mr R Türmen, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr R Maruste.

The Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was not raised, as it could have been, when the admissibility of the application was being considered by the Commission and accordingly it was estopped from doing so before the Court.

The criminal proceedings against the applicant were instituted on 6 December 1991. However, the relevant period began only on 28 June 1994, when Slovenia ratified the Convention and recognised the right of individual petition. The proceedings ended with the Constitutional Court's decision of 1 December 1998. Accordingly, the period to be taken into consideration lasted four years and more than five months. In order to determine the reasonableness of the time that elapsed after 28 June 1994, the Court had to take account of the state of the proceedings at that time. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the authorities dealing with the case as well as what was at stake for the applicant. The case was of some complexity due to the fact that additional charges had been brought against the applicant in the course of the proceedings at first instance. However, that could not, as such, justify the length of the proceedings. There was no evidence the applicant contributed to the length of the proceedings. The delays in the proceedings were mainly imputable to the conduct of the domestic courts. With regard to the claimed heavy workload of the domestic courts resulting from the economic and legislative reforms in Slovenia, the Court recalled that A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial system in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

Malige v France 98/85

[Application lodged 28.11.1994; Commission report 29.5.1997; Court Judgment 23.9.1998]

Mr Jérôme Malige was recorded as speeding at 172 kph on a motor bicycle on a stretch of road where a 110 kph limit was in force. He refused to pay the fine imposed and on 22 September 1993 elected to stand trial. The Police Court found him guilty of the offence of exceeding the speed limit and fined him FF 1,500 and disqualified him from driving for 15 days. In addition, the offence of exceeding the speed limit by 40 kph or more entailed the automatic deduction of four of the 12 points allocated to each driving licence. The applicant's appeals to the Versailles Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation, arguing that the laws implementing the deduction of points by administrative measure were contrary to A 6(1) of the Convention and also of the unlawfulness of the legislation penalising speeding and the unreliability of the speed-recording device, were dismissed. He complained before the European Court that the systematic and automatic docking of points from driving licences without any possibility of an appeal to an effective judicial body had deprived him of the right to a tribunal within the meaning of A 6(1).

Comm found by majority (18–10) NV 6(1).

Court found unanimously 6 applicable and NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits, Mr M Voicu.

With regard to the applicability of A 6, the Court had to determine whether the sanction of deducting points from driving licences was a punishment, and accordingly whether it was 'criminal' within the meaning of A 6(1). In order to determine whether there was a 'criminal charge', regard had to be had to three criteria: the legal classification of the offence in question in national law, the very nature of the offence and the nature and degree of severity of the penalty. The offence which led to the deduction of points, namely exceeding the speed limit, was criminal in nature. With regard to the classification in French law of the deduction of points, the measure in question, considered in isolation, was regarded as an administrative sanction not connected with the criminal law. With regard to the nature of the sanction, the points were deducted in the context of, and after the outcome of, a criminal prosecution. The sanction of deducting points was an automatic consequence of the conviction pronounced by the criminal court. With regard to the severity of the measure, the deduction of points could in time entail invalidation of the licence. The right to drive a motor vehicle was very useful in everyday life and for carrying on an occupation. Accordingly, although the deduction of points had a preventive character, it also had a punitive and deterrent character and was accordingly similar to a secondary penalty. The fact that Parliament intended to dissociate the sanction of deducting points from the other penalties imposed by the criminal courts could not change the nature of the measure. Accordingly, A 6(1) was applicable.

Regarding the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, the question whether the applicant had a remedy to challenge the lawfulness of the deduction of points was the same in substance as the complaint he submitted to it.

Where a penalty was criminal in nature, there had to be the possibility of review by a court which satisfied the requirements of A 6(1), even though it was not inconsistent with the Convention for the prosecution and punishment of minor offences to be primarily a matter for the administrative authorities. The applicant did not pay the fixed fine and the partial loss of points thus depended on the criminal courts finding him guilty. In the Versailles Police Court and the Versailles Court of Appeal, criminal courts which satisfied the requirements of A 6(1), the applicant was able to deny that he had committed the criminal offence of exceeding the speed limit and to submit all the factual and legal arguments which he considered helpful to his case, knowing that his conviction would in addition entail the docking of a number of points. In the present case, the offence committed entailed the deduction of four of the licence's 12 points, so the measure could not be described as disproportionate to the conduct it was intended to punish: It did not lead immediately to disqualification and the applicant could win back points. A review sufficient to satisfy the requirements of A 6(1) was incorporated in the criminal decision convicting the applicant and he could seek judicial review in the administrative courts, in order to ascertain whether the administrative authority acted after following a lawful procedure. Therefore, the domestic law afforded the applicant a review by the courts of the measure in issue which was sufficient for the purposes of A 6(1). There had accordingly been no breach of that provision.

Mr James Malone, who had been the subject of police investigations relating to dishonest handling of stolen goods, alleged that both his and his wife's correspondence and his telephone lines had been tapped, one telephone conversation had been intercepted under warrant and that his telephone had been metered by a device recording all the numbers dialled. He claimed that by reason of these matters, and of relevant law and practice in England and Wales, he had been the victim of breaches of A 8 and 13 of the Convention.

The question was whether the interference with the applicant's communications and the release of records of metering to the police had been justified. 'In accordance with the law' required the measure to have some basis in domestic law and also referred to the quality of the law, requiring it to be accessible, foreseeable and compatible with the rule of law. The law did not indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of exercise of the relevant discretion conferred on public authorities. The interference was not 'necessary in a democratic society' as the particular system of secret surveillance adopted contained inadequate guarantees against abuse. Accordingly, the interferences were not justified.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 23 March 1983 when the proceedings were instituted against Mr P in the Teramo District Court. It had not yet ended because that court had still to give judgment. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was one of some complexity, which was increased following the intervention of the second wife of the applicant's father and that of Mr Antonio Manieri (junior). However, there were three periods of stagnation for which no or no satisfactory explanation was provided. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. A lapse of time of almost nine years for only one level of jurisdiction could not be regarded as reasonable.

Non-pecuniary damage (ITL 20,000,000), costs and expenses (ITL 2,609,500 and FF 845).

[Application lodged 9.7.1986; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

The applicant was a limited company. On 14 October 1982 the X company brought an action against the applicant before the Modena District Court to obtain a declaration that no purchase and sale contract existed between it and the applicant company contrary to the latter's allegation. In its counterclaim of 13 January 1983, the applicant asked that the court should first declare the aforesaid contract valid and then order that it be performed. On 12 April 1989 the District Court dismissed the X company's claim and allowed the applicant's claim. On 9 March 1990 the X company appealed to the Bologna Court of Appeal. The case had been set down for trial on 15 October 1993. The applicant company complained of the length of the proceedings.

Manoussakis and Others v Greece (1997) 23 EHRR 387 96/37

The applicants, Mr Titos Manoussakis, Mr Constantinos Makridakis, Mr Kyriakos Baxevanis and Mr Vassilios Hadjakis, were all Jehovah's Witnesses. By an application of 28 June 1983 lodged with the Minister of Education and Religious Affairs, the applicants requested an authorisation to use a room in a building they had rented by private agreement, as a place of worship. They did not receive a response. On 3 March 1986, the Heraklion public prosecutor's office instituted criminal proceedings against the applicants under s 1 of Law No 1363/1938, as amended, accused of having established and operated a place of worship for Jehovah's Witnesses without authorisation from the recognised ecclesiastical authorities and the Minister of Education and Religious Affairs. On 6 October 1987 the Heraklion Criminal Court sitting at first instance and composed of a single judge acquitted the applicants. On 15 February 1990 the Heraklion Criminal Court sitting on appeal and composed of three judges, sentenced each of the accused to three months' imprisonment convertible into a pecuniary penalty, and fined them GRD 20,000 each. Their appeal to the Court of Cassation on points of law was dismissed on 19 March 1991.

The applicants exhausted the domestic remedies in respect of their conviction in the criminal proceedings. The only remedies that A 26 required to be exhausted were those that were available and sufficient and related to the breaches alleged. Moreover, an applicant who had availed himself of a remedy capable of redressing the situation giving rise to the alleged violation, directly and not merely indirectly, was not bound to have recourse to other remedies which would have been available to him but the effectiveness of which was questionable. An application for judicial review of the alleged implied refusal of the authorities could not be regarded as an effective remedy in this case. As the applicants had exhausted the domestic remedies, the Government's preliminary objection fell to be dismissed.

The applicants' conviction for having used the premises in question without the prior authorisation required under Law No 1363/1938 was an interference with the exercise of their freedom of religion. Such interference breached A 9 unless it was prescribed by law, pursued one or more of the legitimate aims referred to in para 2 and was necessary in a democratic society to attain such aim or aims. The applicants' complaint was directed less against the treatment of which they themselves had been the victims than the general policy of obstruction pursued in relation to Jehovah's Witnesses when they wished to set up a church or a place of worship. They were therefore in substance challenging the provisions of the relevant domestic law. However, it was not necessary to rule on the question whether the interference in issue was 'prescribed by law' in this instance because, in any event, it was incompatible with A 9 on other grounds. States were entitled to verify whether a movement or association carried on, ostensibly in pursuit of religious aims, activities which were harmful to the population. Jehovah's Witnesses came within the definition of 'known religion' as provided for under Greek law. However, having regard to the circumstances of the case the impugned measure pursued a legitimate aim for the purposes of A 9(2), namely the protection of public order. Contracting States had a certain margin of appreciation in assessing the existence and extent of the necessity of an interference, but that margin was subject to European supervision, embracing both the legislation and the decisions applying it. The Court's task was to determine whether the measures taken at national level were justified in principle and proportionate. In delimiting the extent of the margin of appreciation in the present case the Court had to have regard to what was at stake, namely the need to secure true religious pluralism, an inherent feature of the notion of a democratic society. In addition, considerable weight had to be attached to that need when it came to determining whether the restriction was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The restrictions imposed on the freedom to manifest religion by the provisions of Law No 1363/1938 and of the decree of 20 May/2 June 1939 called for very strict scrutiny by the Court. Law No 1363/1938 and the decree of 20 May/2 June 1939 allowed far reaching interference by the political, administrative and ecclesiastical authorities with the exercise of religious freedom. There existed in practice the possibility for the Minister of Education and Religious Affairs to defer his reply indefinitely or to refuse his authorisation without explanation or without giving a valid reason. The Minister was empowered to assess whether there was a 'real need' for the religious community in question to set up a church. The Supreme Administrative Court had developed case-law limiting the Minister's power in the matter. The right to freedom of religion as guaranteed under the Convention excluded any discretion on the part of the State to determine whether religious beliefs or the means used to express such beliefs were legitimate. Accordingly, the authorisation requirement under Law No 1363/1938 and the decree was consistent with A 9 only in so far as it was intended to allow the Minister to verify whether the formal conditions laid down in those enactments were satisfied. The applicants were prosecuted and convicted for having operated a place of worship without first obtaining the authorisations required by law. Both the Heraklion public prosecutor's office and the Heraklion Criminal Court sitting on appeal, relied expressly on the lack of the bishop's authorisation as well as the lack of an authorisation from the Minister of Education and Religious Affairs. The latter, in response to five requests made by the applicants replied that he was examining their file. To date the applicants had not received an express decision. In these circumstances the Court considered that the Government could not rely on the applicants' failure to comply with a legal formality to justify their conviction. The degree of severity of the sanction was immaterial. The impugned conviction had such a direct effect on the applicants' freedom of religion that it could not be regarded as proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued, nor, accordingly, as necessary in a democratic society. There had been a violation of A 9.

Judgment constituted just satisfaction for the non-pecuniary damage alleged. Costs and expenses (GRD 4,030,100).

[Application lodged 23.11.1989; Commission report 28.2.1994; Court Judgment 8.6.1995]

Mr Sadi Mansur, an Iranian by origin, had acquired Turkish nationality in 1989. Proceedings were brought against him in respect of drug trafficking offences. He complained of the length of his detention pending trial and of the length of the criminal proceedings against him.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found V 5(3), V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr R Macdonald, Mr I Foighel, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek.

Having regard to Turkey's declaration under A 46, the Court could not entertain complaints about events which occurred before 22 January 1990. However, when examining the complaints relating to A 5(3) and 6(1) it would take account of the state of the proceedings at the time when the above-mentioned declaration was deposited. From the critical date onwards all the State's acts and omissions not only had to conform to the Convention but were also undoubtedly subject to review by the Convention institutions. Preliminary objection of lack of jurisdiction ratione temporis was therefore rejected. The objections of non-exhaustion and loss of victim status were not raised at the admissibility stage of the application and there was therefore estoppel.

The period to be taken into consideration was the one year and 28 days which elapsed between the deposit of the declaration whereby Turkey recognised the Court's compulsory jurisdiction and the judgment of the Edirne First Assize Court. However, when determining whether the applicant's continued detention after 22 January 1990 was justified under A 5(3) the Court had to take into account the fact that by that date the applicant, having been placed in detention on 5 November 1984, had been in custody for nearly five years and three months. It was in the first place for the national judicial authorities to ensure that, in a given case, the detention of an accused person pending trial did not exceed a reasonable time. To that end they had to examine all the facts arguing for or against the existence of a genuine requirement of public interest justifying, with due regard to the principle of presumption of innocence, a departure from the rule of respect for individual liberty and set them out in their decisions on the applications for release. It was essentially on the basis of the reasons given in those decisions and of the true facts mentioned by the applicant in his appeals, that the Court was called upon to decide whether or not there had been a violation of A 5(3). The persistence of reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence was a condition sine qua non for the validity of the continued detention, but, after a certain lapse of time, it no longer sufficed; the Court had to then establish whether the other grounds cited by the judicial authorities continued to justify the deprivation of liberty. Where such grounds were 'relevant' and sufficient, the Court had to also ascertain whether the competent national authorities displayed special diligence in the conduct of the proceedings. During the period covered by the Court's jurisdiction ratione temporis the Edirne First Assize Court considered the question of the applicant's continued detention on nine occasions of its own motion. As grounds for refusing to release the applicant it cited the nature of the offence the applicant stood accused of and the state of the evidence. The Government emphasised the heavy sentence to which the accused was liable, the danger that he would abscond or destroy evidence and the risk of collusion. The Government noted that he had no fixed abode in Turkey and, once released, might have ignored the summonses of the judicial authorities or evaded enforcement of the sentence, only the length of which remained to be determined. The danger of an accused's absconding could not be gauged solely on the basis of the severity of the sentence risked. It had to be assessed with reference to a number of other relevant factors which could either confirm the existence of a danger of absconding or make it appear so slight that it could not justify detention pending trial. The expression 'the state of the evidence' could be understood to mean the existence and persistence of serious indications of guilt. Although in general those might be relevant factors, in the present case they could not on their own justify the continuation of the detention complained of. Therefore the applicant's continued detention during the period in question contravened A 5(3). That conclusion made it unnecessary to look at the way in which the judicial authorities conducted the case.

The proceedings began when the applicant was committed for trial at the Edirne First Assize Court, on 18 April 1984. However, the Court could only consider the period of one year, three months and eight days that elapsed between 22 January 1990, the date of Turkey's declaration, and 30 April 1991, when the Court of Cassation upheld the first court's judgment. Nevertheless, it had to take into account the fact that by the critical date the proceedings had already lasted more than seven years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, regard being had to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The case could not be regarded as complex. No criticism was made of the accused's behaviour at any stage of the trial. The Court was aware of the danger represented by drug trafficking and of the need for effective measures to prevent it. A 6(1) guaranteed to everyone against whom criminal proceedings were brought the right to a final decision within a reasonable time on the charge against him. It was for the Contracting States to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet that requirement. In this case the Edirne First Assize Court did not receive the laboratory report on the substances confiscated in Greece until 13 July 1990; six days later it sent a letter of request to the Ankara Assize Court, asking for a translation. Then, on 19 February 1991, it convicted the applicant on the basis of other evidence, since it still did not have a translation of the report. The Court found it hard to understand why the proceedings were conducted in that way, especially as the Edirne First and Second Assize Courts had each previously persisted in requesting the report and in adjourning the case pending receipt of it. The length of the criminal proceedings in issue contravened A 6(1).

Mantovanelli v France 97/13

Mr Mario Mantovanelli and his wife Andrée were the applicants. On 27 January 1981 their daughter, Jocelyne Mantovanelli, who was then 20, was admitted to the Nancy Orthopaedic and Accident and Emergency Clinic for an operation on a whitlow on her left thumb. She had to undergo repeat operations and skin grafts. She got an infection and contracted jaundice and died in hospital in March 1983. The applicants were convinced that their daughter's death had been caused by excessive administration of halothane and applied to the administrative courts for a ruling that the hospital was liable for her death. An expert was appointed. The applicants alleged that neither they nor their lawyer had been informed of the dates of the steps taken by the expert and that his report referred to documents which they had not been able to inspect. Their case was dismissed and appeals to the Nancy Administrative Court of Appeal and the Conseil d'Etat were unsuccessful. They complained that the procedure followed in preparing the expert medical opinion ordered by the Nancy Administrative Court had not been in conformity with the adversarial principle and had given rise to a violation of their right to a fair hearing.

One of the elements of a fair hearing within the meaning of A 6(1) was the right to adversarial proceedings; each party had to have in principle the opportunity not only to make known any evidence needed for his claims to succeed, but also to have knowledge of and comment on all evidence adduced or observations filed with a view to influencing the court's decision. Compliance with the adversarial principle related to proceedings in a 'tribunal'; no general, abstract principle could therefore be inferred from that provision that, where an expert had been appointed by a court, the parties had to, in all instances, be able to attend the interviews held by him or to be shown the documents he had taken into account. What was essential was that the parties should be able to participate properly in the proceedings before the tribunal. Moreover, the Convention did not lay down rules on evidence as such. The Court therefore could not conclude as a matter of principle and in the abstract that evidence obtained in breach of provisions of domestic law may be admitted. It was for the national courts to assess the evidence they had obtained and the relevance of any evidence that a party wished to have produced. The Court had nevertheless to ascertain whether the proceedings considered as a whole, including the way in which the evidence was taken, were fair as required by A 6(1). The procedural code provided that the parties had to be informed of the dates of the steps taken by the expert. The failure to comply with that provision could not on its own put the fairness of the proceedings in issue seriously in doubt. While the applicants could have made submissions to the administrative court on the content and findings of the expert report after receiving it, that did not afford them a real opportunity to comment effectively on it. The question the expert was instructed to answer was identical with the one that the court had to determine. It pertained to a technical field that was not within the judges' knowledge. Thus although the administrative court was not in law bound by the expert's findings, his report was likely to have a preponderant influence on the assessment of the facts by that court. Under such circumstances, and in the light also of the administrative courts' refusal of their application for a fresh expert report at first instance and on appeal the applicants could only have expressed their views effectively before the expert report was lodged. They were prevented from participating in the interviews of witnesses for the report, although the five people interviewed by the expert were employed by the hospital. Regarding the documents taken into consideration by the expert, the applicants only became aware of them once the report had been completed and transmitted. The applicants were thus not able to comment effectively on the main piece of evidence. The proceedings were therefore not fair as required by A 6(1).

Manunza v Italy 91/56

[Application lodged 20.6.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 13.12.1991]

Mrs Maria Grazia Manunza was unemployed. On 14 January 1985 she instituted proceedings against the 'Instituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale' before the Rome magistrates' court in order to establish her disability pension right. On 28 November 1985, the INPS was ordered to pay the pension claimed. On 11 March 1986 the INPS appealed. The court delivered judgment on 17 February 1989 and the text was lodged with the registry on 4 July 1989. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens.

The Court was informed that the applicant had died and her heirs had not expressed any wish to continue the proceedings before the Court. The Court discerned no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. It noted other cases in which it had reviewed the reasonableness of the length of civil proceedings. Accordingly case struck out of the list.

Manzoni, Giulia v Italy 97/38

[Application lodged 2.12.1991; Commission report 11.4.1996; Court Judgment 1.7.1997]

On 25 September 1991 at about 11 pm, Mrs Giulia Manzoni was arrested in Rome for insulting, threatening and assaulting two municipal police officers in the execution of their duty and taken into police custody. Her custody was confirmed by the public prosecutor's office. On 27 September 1991 at 11 am, the public prosecutor's office applied to the Rome District Court for the applicant to be detained at her home pending trial. The court did not consider it necessary and ordered that she be released immediately. At the end of proceedings the court sentenced the applicant to three months and 11 days' imprisonment, suspended. The hearing ended at 11.45 am. At about 1.30 pm the police escorted the applicant to Rebibbia Prison. At 3.10 pm the record of the hearing was served on her by the prison management. That afternoon the prison authorities completed the statutory formalities. At 6.30 pm the applicant gave the prison management her address for notification purposes, and at 6.45 pm she left the prison. She complained of the unlawfulness of her detention following her arrest and after the suspended sentence had been imposed on her.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr B Repik, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus.

Deprivation of liberty following the arrest: detention had to be lawful. The words 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law' essentially referred to domestic law. The 'lawfulness' of the detention presupposed conformity with domestic law and also conformity with the purpose of the restrictions permitted by A 5(1), namely the protection of individuals from arbitrariness; it was required in respect of both the ordering and the execution of the measures entailing deprivation of liberty. In the instant case the public prosecutor's office acted in accordance with the legislation in force. Accordingly, A 5(1)(c) had not been infringed in that respect.

Release following the judgment (11.45 am to 6.45 pm): the list of exceptions to the right to liberty secured in A 5(1) was an exhaustive one and only a narrow interpretation of those exceptions was consistent with the aim of that provision, namely to ensure that no one was arbitrarily deprived of his or her liberty. The administrative formalities for the applicant's release could have been carried out more swiftly, but that was not a ground for finding that there had been a breach of the Convention; some delay in carrying out a decision to release a detainee was often inevitable, although it had to be kept to a minimum. There had been no violation of A 5(1) in this respect either.

A 25 entitled individuals to contend that a law violated their rights by itself, in the absence of an individual measure of implementation, if they run the risk of being directly affected by it. The applicants were challenging a legal position – that of unmarried mothers and of children born out of wedlock – which affected them personally. The existence of prejudice was not a matter for A 25 which, in its use of the word 'victim', denoted the person directly affected by the act or omission which was in issue. The applicants could therefore claim to be victims of the breaches of which they complained.

By guaranteeing the right to respect for family life, A 8 presupposed the existence of a family. A 8 made no distinction between the 'legitimate' and the 'illegitimate' family and thus applied to the family life of the illegitimate and the legitimate family. Besides, Paula Marckx assumed responsibility for her daughter Alexandra from the moment of her birth and had continuously cared for her, with the result that a real family life existed between them. The object of the Article was essentially that of protecting the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities. Nevertheless it did not merely compel the State to abstain from such interference: in addition to the primarily negative undertaking, there might be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for family life. A 14 had no independent existence, it may play an important autonomous rôle by complementing the other normative provisions of the Convention and the Protocols: A 14 safeguarded individuals, placed in similar situations from any discrimination in the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in those other provisions. A distinction was discriminatory if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. In acting in a manner calculated to allow the family life of an unmarried mother and her child to develop normally, the State had to avoid any discrimination grounded on birth. The necessity to have recourse to recognition, which was declaratory and not attributive, to establish affiliation, derived from a refusal to acknowledge fully Paula Marckx's maternity from the moment of the birth. An unmarried mother was restricted in her capacity to give or bequeath her property to her child. There was a violation of A 8 with respect to the first applicant. As regards Alexandra Marckx, only one method of establishing her maternal affiliation was available to her under Belgian law, namely, to take legal proceedings for the purpose. The procedure was complex and could be time-consuming and, in the interim, the child would remain separated in law from his mother. The system resulted in a lack of respect for the family life of Alexandra Marckx who, in the eyes of the law, was motherless from 16 to 29 October 1973. Despite the brevity of this period, there was thus also a violation of A 8 with respect to the second applicant. The fact that some unmarried mothers did not wish to take care of their child could not justify the rule of Belgian law whereby the establishment of their maternity was conditional on voluntary recognition or a court declaration. Support and encouragement of the traditional family was itself legitimate or even praiseworthy. However, in the achievement of that end recourse should not be had to measures whose object or result was, as in the present case, to prejudice the 'illegitimate' family. The distinction lacked objective and reasonable justification. Accordingly, the manner of establishing Alexandra Marckx's maternal affiliation violated, with respect to both applicants, A 14 taken in conjunction with A 8.

Family life, within the meaning of A 8 included at least the ties between near relatives, for instance those between grandparents and grandchildren, since such relatives might play a considerable part in family life. Respect for a family life implied an obligation for the State to act in a manner calculated to allow those ties to develop normally. The fact that the maternal grandmother did not apply to the Commission in no way prevented the applicants from complaining, on their own account, of the exclusion of one of them from the other's family. There was thus in that connection violation of A 8 with respect to both applicants.

There was no objective and reasonable justification for the differences of treatment between illegitimate and legitimate children. Admittedly, the tranquillity of legitimate families might sometimes be disturbed if an illegitimate child was included, in the eyes of the law, in his mother's family on the same footing as a child born in wedlock, but that was not a motive that justified depriving the former child of fundamental rights. The distinction complained of therefore violated, with respect to both applicants, A 14 taken in conjunction with A 8.

As concerns the second applicant, the Court had taken its stand solely on A 8, taken both alone and in conjunction with A 14. The Court excluded P1A1: P1A1 did no more than enshrine the right of everyone to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions, consequently it applied only to a person's existing possessions and did not guarantee the right to acquire possessions whether on intestacy or through voluntary dispositions. P1A1 was inapplicable and A 14 could not be combined with it on that point. Matters of intestate succession – and of disposition – between near relatives proved to be intimately connected with family life. Family life did not include only social, moral or cultural relations, it also comprised interests of a material kind. It was not a requirement of A 8 that a child should be entitled to some share in the estates of his parents or even of other near relatives. In consequence, the restrictions which the Belgian Civil Code placed on Alexandra Marckx's inheritance rights on intestacy were not of themselves in conflict with the Convention, that is, if they were considered independently of the reason underlying them. Similar reasoning was to be applied to the question of voluntary dispositions. Until she was adopted (30 October 1974), Alexandra had only a capacity to receive property from Paula Marckx that was markedly less than that which a child born in wedlock would have enjoyed. That difference of treatment, in support of which the Government put forward no special argument, lacked objective and reasonable justification. The need to have recourse to adoption in order to eliminate the said difference of treatment involved of itself discrimination. Unlike a 'legitimate' child, Alexandra had at no time before or after 30 October 1974 had any entitlement on intestacy in the estates of members of Paula Marckx's family for which the Court failed to find any objective and reasonable justification. The Court considered discriminatory the need for a mother to adopt her child. Alexandra Marckx was the victim of a breach of A 14, taken in conjunction with A 8, by reason both of the restrictions on her capacity to receive property from her mother and of her total lack of inheritance rights on intestacy over the estates of her near relatives on her mother's side.

By recognising that everyone had the right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions, P1A1 was in substance guaranteeing the right of property. The right to dispose of one's property constituted a traditional and fundamental aspect of the right of property. The second paragraph of P1A1 nevertheless authorised a Contracting State to enforce such laws as it deemed necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest. In consequence, the limitation complained of by the first applicant was not of itself in conflict with Protocol 1. However, the limitation applied only to unmarried and not to married mothers. That distinction, in support of which the Government put forward no special argument, was discriminatory. Accordingly, there was on that point breach of A 14 taken in conjunction with P1A1, with respect to Paula Marckx.

While the legal rules at issue probably presented aspects which the applicants felt to be humiliating, they did not constitute degrading treatment coming within the ambit of A 3.

There was no legal obstacle confronting the first applicant in the exercise of the freedom to marry or to remain single; consequently, the Court had no need to determine whether the Convention enshrined the right not to marry. The issue under consideration fell outside the scope of A 12. Accordingly, A 12 had not been infringed.

Findings amount to adequate just satisfaction for the purposes of A 50 (by majority 9–6).

Markt Intern Verlag GmbH and Klaus Beermann v Germany (1990) 12 EHRR 161 89/19

[Application lodged 11.7.1983; Commission report 18.12.1987; Court Judgment 20.11.1989]

The applicants, a publishing company and one of its editors, had published an article about the complaint of a dissatisfied consumer against an English mail-order firm. In response to a query from a journalist from Markt Intern, the firm had replied that it did not know about the complaint but would carry out a prompt investigation. The publishers had nevertheless asked readers for information of similar experiences about the firm complained about. The firm successfully obtained an injunction to stop repetition of the statements published in the article, on the ground that the statements were 'contrary to honest practices' and infringed the Unfair Competition Act 1909. The applicants alleged a violation of A 10.

Although the Article was addressed to a limited circle of tradespeople and did not concern the public as whole, nevertheless it contained information of a commercial nature. Such information could not be excluded from A 10(1), which did not apply solely to certain types of information or ideas or forms of expression. The prohibition on the repetition of the contested statements was an interference by a public authority which had to be justified under A 10(2). The interference was prescribed by law; there was consistent, clear and abundant case-law from the Federal Court in this case. The interference was intended to protect the reputation and the rights of others and so was legitimate under A 10(2). States have a margin of appreciation in assessing the existence and extent of the necessity of the interference. That margin was essential in commercial matters and, in particular, in areas as complex and fluctuating as that of unfair competition. Otherwise the Court would have to undertake a re-examination of the facts and all the circumstances of each case. The Court had to confine its review to the question whether the measures taken on the national level were justifiable in principle and proportionate. It was necessary to weigh the requirements of the protection of the reputation and the rights of others against the publication of the information in question. In a market economy an undertaking which sought to set up a business inevitably exposed itself to close scrutiny of its practices by its competitors. Its commercial strategy and the manner in which it honoured its commitments could give rise to criticism on the part of consumers and the specialised press. In order to carry out this task the specialised press had to be able to disclose facts which could be of interest to its readers and contribute to the openness of business activities. However, even the publication of items which were true and described real events could under certain circumstances be prohibited. In addition, an isolated incident could deserve closer scrutiny before being made public, otherwise an accurate description of one such incident could give the false impression that the incident was evidence of a general practice. The present article was written in a commercial context. Although Markt Intern were not competitors of the firm, they sought to protect the interests of competing retailers. The article contained some truths, but also contained some doubts about the reliability of the firm as it asked readers to report similar experiences. The national Federal Court had considered the publication was premature as the firm had agreed to investigate the matter and premature publication was bound to have adverse effects on the firm's business. The Court found that having regard to the duties and responsibilities attaching to the freedoms guaranteed by A 10, the final judgment of the Federal Court did not go beyond the margin of appreciation left to the national authorities and there had been no breach of A 10.

Miss Isabelle Marlhens received a blood transfusion during an operation carried out at Pau Hospital in December 1982. At the beginning of 1988 it was discovered that she was infected with HIV. On 9 April 1992 she applied to the Compensation Fund for Haemophiliacs and Transfusion Patients. The Paris Court of Appeal gave judgment on 8 July 1994 and awarded her compensation. She complained of the length of proceedings.

[Application lodged 23.8.1993; Commission report 9.4.1997; Court Judgment 5.3.1998]

Mr Bernhard Marte and Mr Walter Achberger were convicted by the Feldkirch Regional Court on 23 August 1990 of resisting police officers who on 3 July 1990 had been called in to make them leave the refreshment booth at a festival. On 13 September 1990, in the course of administrative criminal proceedings, they were ordered to pay a fine or imprisonment in default of payment. They applicants appealed to the Vorarlberg Regional Public Security Authority against the sentences imposed under the Introductory Act and to the regional government against those imposed under the Public Morality Act. The regional government largely dismissed the appeals, but slightly reduced the amount of the fines. The Public Security Authority dismissed the appeals. On 17 June 1992, the Constitutional Court declined to accept for adjudication appeals lodged by the applicants against the decisions of the regional government and the Public Security Authority on the ground that these did not have sufficient prospects of success. In reply to their complaints concerning A 6 of the Convention, it referred to Austria's reservation in respect of A 5 of the Convention. In connection with the complaint concerning P7A4 (right not to be tried or punished twice), it referred to the declaration made by Austria when it ratified that Protocol. Their appeals to the Administrative Court were dismissed.

Mr José Goncalves Martins Moreira was a bank employee. On 12 November 1975, he was a passenger in a car driven by Mr Virgilio da Silva Pontes, who was the owner of the vehicle. Near Evora, their car was in collision with another vehicle. The applicant was injured in the accident and remained in hospital until 14 May 1976. In August 1976 and August 1977 he underwent surgery in London. He now suffers from a 25% permanent disability. On 20 December 1977, Mr Martins Moreira and Mr Pontes instituted civil proceedings in the Evora Court of First Instance against the owner, driver, the company on whose behalf the journey was undertaken, and the insurance company. The Supreme Court delivered its judgment on 5 February 1987. On 28 October 1987 the applicant asked the Evora Court of First Instance to order the payment of the part of the damages awarded to them by the Court of Appeal which had already been calculated. The enforcement proceedings were still pending. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings

The period to be considered did not begin to run when the action was first brought before the competent court but only when, on 9 November 1978, the Portuguese declaration accepting the right of individual petition took effect. However, in order to determine whether the time which elapsed following that date was reasonable, it was necessary to take account of the stage which the proceedings had reached at that point. The Court considered that the relevant period should also extend to the subsequent enforcement proceedings as those proceedings constituted a second stage, which had to be set in motion by the plaintiffs. They did not begin until 28 October 1987, eight months after the judgment, and only concerned the part of the damages which had already been calculated. They were as yet uncompleted. The first stage, which covered the period from 9 November 1978 to 9 February 1987, lasted eight years and three months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The case was not in itself a complex one. There were procedural difficulties which could not justify the excessive length of the proceedings. The applicant could have assisted the doctors of the Institute in their task by providing them with the necessary documents more expeditiously. Nevertheless, ultimately, this did not prolong the proceedings unduly. The applicant took steps to expedite the proceedings. He wrote to the ombudsman and made a fresh application to the first instance court, complaining of the Institute's inactivity and proposing a solution. Various delays were attributable to the Portuguese judicial authorities and in particular to the Evora Court of First Instance. The arguments of an excessive workload and comparison with the duration of proceedings in the other Member States was rejected. The delays were mainly due to the difficulties encountered in obtaining an examination of the plaintiffs by orthopaedic experts. In particular the lack of facilities at the Lisbon Institute of Forensic Medicine gave rise to difficulties. The various institutions which were prevented through inadequate facilities or an excessive workload from complying with the requests of the Evora court were all public establishments. The fact that they were not judicial in character was immaterial in that respect. The institutes came under the administrative authority of the Ministry of Justice. Accordingly, the Portuguese State was under a duty to provide them with appropriate means in relation to the objectives pursued so as to enable them to comply with the requirements of A 6(1). In any event, the examination in question was to be effected in the context of judicial proceedings supervised by the court, which remained responsible for ensuring the speedy conduct of the trial. The excessive length of the proceedings was essentially due to the conduct of the competent authorities. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Mr Aldo Massa was married to a headmistress. Following her death, he applied to the Ministry of Education for a reversionary pension. His application was refused on 13 March 1968. An appeal lodged on 1 July 1968 to the Court of Audit was dismissed. On 1 April 1980 the Applicant appealed to the President. The Applicant was granted a reversionary pension on 16 May 1981, but only from 18 December 1977. On 23 April 1985 he applied to Court of Audit to have the decision of 16 May 1981 quashed and on 18 July 1986 sent a memorandum requesting that the case be dealt with more quickly. On 25 January 1991 the applicant's application to have the decision of 16 May 1981 quashed was allowed. By 19 November 1991 the applicant had still heard nothing of his appeal of 1 April 1980 to the Italian President. He complained, inter alia, of the length of proceedings.

Disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of public servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1), but State intervention by means of a statute or delegated legislation had not prevented the Court from finding in several cases that the right in issue was a civil one. The present dispute arose from an obligation on the State to pay a reversionary pension to the husband of a public servant in accordance with the legislation in force. In performing that obligation, the State was not using discretionary powers and might be compared, in that respect, to an employer who was a party to a contract of employment governed by private law. Accordingly, the applicant's right to a reversionary pension was a 'civil' one within the meaning of A 6(1), which was therefore applicable in the present case.

The period to be considered began on 23 April 1985, when he applied to the Court of Audit. It ended on 18 March 1991, when that court's judgment was filed. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Two periods of inactivity were attributable solely to the State. Heavy case load could be no excuse. The length of proceedings was excessive and there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Masson and Van Zon v Netherlands (1996) 22 EHRR 491 95/33

Mr Adrianus Johannes Marie Masson was the Investments Manager of the Civil Service Pension Fund (ABP) and Mr Jacobus van Zon was a businessman with interests in real estate development.

Following a criminal investigation, the two applicants were charged with forgery and corruption. They were arrested and remanded in custody. On 7 June 1988, following trial and appeal, the Court of Appeal acquitted them on all charges. In September 1988 they filed requests to the Court of Appeal for reimbursement by the State of their legal costs and of travel and subsistence expenses incurred in connection with the proceedings and for financial compensation for the restrictions on their liberty. The Court of Appeal rejected both applicants' claims for compensation. They complained, inter alia, that their requests for financial compensation for the restrictions on their liberty and their requests for reimbursement of their legal costs incurred in connection with the criminal proceedings had not been dealt with in public by an impartial tribunal.

Comm found by majority (15–9) V 6(1) in respect of both applicants, (21–3) not necessary to examine Mr Masson's complaint under A 13.

Court found unanimously no jurisdiction to entertain Mr van Zon's complaint under A 6(2), by majority (8–1) A 6(1) not applicable, unanimously NV 6(1) in relation to either applicant, unanimously not necessary to examine Mr Masson's complaint under A 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Macdonald, Mr SK Martens (concurring), Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou, Mr F Bigi, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek.

The scope of the case before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility. Consequently, the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the complaint under A 6(2) which the Commission had declared inadmissible.

For A 6(1) under its 'civil' head to be applicable, there had to be a dispute over a right which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. The dispute had to be genuine and serious; it could relate not only to the actual existence of a right but also to its scope and the manner of its exercise. The outcome of the proceedings had to be directly decisive for the right in question, mere tenuous connections or remote consequences not being sufficient to bring A 6(1) into play. In view of the status of the Convention within the legal order of The Netherlands, the Court observed that the Convention did not grant to a person charged with a criminal offence but subsequently acquitted a right either to reimbursement of costs incurred in the course of criminal proceedings against him, however necessary these costs might have been, or to compensation for lawful restrictions on his liberty. Such a right could be derived neither from A 6(2) nor from any other provision of the Convention or its Protocols. It followed that the question whether such a right could be said in any particular case to exist had to be answered solely with reference to domestic law. The Court had to have regard to the wording of the relevant legal provisions and to the way in which those provisions were interpreted by the domestic courts. Whether or not the impugned proceedings involved a dispute for the purposes of A 6(1), the claims asserted by the applicants did not in any event concern a 'right' which could arguably be said to be recognised under the law of The Netherlands. That being so, A 6(1) was not applicable to the impugned proceedings and had therefore not been violated in relation to either applicant.

The allegation of violation of A 13 was not referred to in the proceedings before the Court, which saw no cause, either on the facts or in law, to address the matter of its own motion.

Mastrantonio v Italy 92/16

[Application lodged 17.3.1986; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court judgment 24.1.1992]

Mr Alberto Mastrantonio was involved in a road traffic accident with a German motorist in Italy. On 15 March 1978 a claim for damages from the Ufficio Centrale Italiano, which is liable for any damage resulting from road traffic accidents with foreigners in Italy, was lodged in the Teramo District Court. The investigations began on 7 June 1978, and 15 hearings took place between that date and 29 February 1984, when the investigating judge was transferred. The case was adjourned indefinitely. Investigations were resumed on 3 November 1987 when the new judge called for an expert, who was summoned to a hearing on 1 March 1988. Final submissions were made on 15

November 1991. The applicant complained that the action had not been tried within a reasonable time.

The proceedings began on 15 March 1978 when the Ufficio Centrale Italiano was summonsed to appear in the Teramo District Court and they were still pending in that court. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Although the case was not a complex one, the investigation had already lasted 13 years. The Government invoked the excessive workload of the Teramo District Court, but A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. Accordingly and despite the lack of details on the course of the proceedings after 1 March 1988, the Court cannot regard as reasonable in the present case such a lapse of time for proceedings which were still pending at first instance. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary damage (ITL 10,000,000), costs and expenses (ITL 2,606,000 and FF 772).

Mathieu-Mohin and Clerfayt v Belgium (1987) 10 EHRR 1 87/1

[Application lodged 5.2.1981; Commission report 15.3.1985; Court Judgment 2.3.1987]

Mrs Lucienne Mathieu-Mohin, a French-speaking Belgian citizen lived in Vilvoorde, in the Flemish Region, and in the electoral district of Brussels. She was elected in the latter constituency and at the time sat in the Senate, one of the two Houses of the national Parliament. As she had taken the parliamentary oath in French, she could not be a member of the Flemish Council. She was, on the other hand, a member of the French Community Council, but not of the Walloon Regional Council. She was not re-elected on 8 November 1981 and did not stand in the general election of October 1985.

Mr Georges Clerfayt, a French-speaking Belgian lived Sint-Genesius-Rode, in the Flemish region and the electoral district of Brussels. Together with five other localities on the outskirts of the capital, however, it was given a special status by Parliament because of its large number of French-speaking. He sat in the national Parliament, in the House of Representatives. He took the parliamentary oath in French, which prevented him from belonging to the Flemish Council; on the other hand, he was a member of the French Community Council, but not of the Walloon Regional Council. On 28 November 1983, he sought leave from the Speaker of the House of Representatives to put a question to the member of the Flemish Executive responsible for matters relating to regional planning, land policy, subsidised housing and compulsory purchase in the public interest, on a number of relevant issues arising in Sint-Genesius-Rode. His leave was refused him on the ground that his request was inadmissible.

The applicants complained of clauses in the 1980 Special Act, particularly those governing the method of appointing members of the Community and regional Councils and Executives; they also criticised Parliament on the ground that it had not provided the Brussels Region with institutions comparable to those of the Walloon and Flemish Regions.

Comm found by majority (10–1) V P1A3 in respect of the applicants as electors, unnecessary to consider 14 or to consider the Convention and Protocol 1 in respect of the applicants as elected representatives.

Court found by majority (13–5) NV P1A3, (14–4) NV 14+P1A3.

According to the Preamble to the Convention, fundamental human rights and freedoms were best maintained by 'an effective political democracy'. Since it enshrined a characteristic principle of democracy, P1A3 was accordingly of prime importance in the Convention system. As to the nature of the rights thus enshrined in P1A3, the view taken by the Commission had evolved. From the idea of an 'institutional' right to the holding of free elections, the Commission had moved to the concept of 'universal suffrage' and then, as a consequence, to the concept of subjective rights of participation – the 'right to vote' and the right to stand for election to the legislature. The Court approved that latter concept. The rights in question were not absolute. Since P1A3 recognised them without setting them forth in express terms, let alone defining them, there was room for implied limitations. Contracting States had a wide margin of appreciation in this sphere, but it was for the Court to determine in the last resort whether the requirements of Protocol 1 had been complied with; it had to satisfy itself that the conditions did not curtail the rights in question to such an extent as to impair their very essence and deprive them of their effectiveness; that they were imposed in pursuit of a legitimate aim; and that the means employed were not disproportionate. In particular, such conditions must not thwart the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature. P1A3 applied only to the election of the legislature, or at least of one of its chambers if it had two or more. The word legislature did not necessarily mean only the national parliament, however; it had to be interpreted in the light of the constitutional structure of the State in question. The 1980 reform vested the Flemish Council with competence and powers wide enough to make it, alongside the French Community Council and the Walloon Regional Council, a constituent part of the Belgian legislature in addition to the House of Representatives and the Senate. As regards the method of appointing the legislature, P1A3 provided only for free elections at reasonable intervals, by secret ballot and under conditions which would ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people. Subject to that, it did not create any obligation to introduce a specific system. Contracting States had a wide margin of appreciation given that their legislation on the matter varied from place to place and from time to time. Electoral systems sought to fulfil objectives which were sometimes scarcely compatible with each other. In those circumstances the phrase 'conditions which will ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature' implied essentially the principle of equality of treatment of all citizens in the exercise of their right to vote and their right to stand for election. It did not follow, however, that all votes had to necessarily have equal weight with regard to the outcome of the election or that all candidates had to have equal chances of victory. Thus no electoral system could eliminate wasted votes. For the purposes of P1A3, any electoral system had to be assessed in the light of the political evolution of the country concerned.

In any consideration of the electoral system in issue, its general context should not be forgotten. The system did not appear unreasonable if regard was had to the intentions it reflected and to the respondent State's margin of appreciation within the Belgian parliamentary system – a margin that was all the greater as the system was incomplete and provisional. One of the consequences for the linguistic minorities was that they had to vote for candidates willing and able to use the language of their region. Experience showed that such a situation did not necessarily threaten the interests of the minorities. The French-speaking electors in the district of Halle-Vilvoorde enjoyed the right to vote and the right to stand for election on the same legal footing as the Dutch-speaking electors. They were in no way deprived of those rights by the mere fact that they had to vote either for candidates who would take the parliamentary oath in French and would accordingly join the French-language group in the House of Representatives or the Senate and sit on the French Community Council, or else for candidates who would take the oath in Dutch and so belong to the Dutch-language group in the House of Representatives or the Senate and sit on the Flemish Council. That was not a disproportionate limitation such as would thwart the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature. Accordingly there had been no breach of P1A3.

The arguments under A 14 were the same as those relied on by the applicants in respect of P1A3. The Court had already rejected those arguments, there was no discrimination prejudicial to the applicants. No breach of A 14 had been made out.

Matos e Silva, Lda, and Others v Portugal (1997) 24 EHRR 573 96/31

The first applicant, Matos e Silva, Lda. was a private limited company cultivating land, extracting salt and breeding fish. It, alone among the applicants, was a party to the domestic proceedings. The second and third applicants, Mrs Maria Sofia Machado Perry Vidal and Teodósio dos Santos Gomes, Lda., another company, were the only shareholders in and owners of Matos e Silva. The second applicant managed both companies. On 2 May 1978, by Decree No 45/78, the Portuguese Government created a nature reserve for animals on the Algarve coast. The Government took various measures in connection with this scheme, including the five contested by the applicants concerned with expropriation of land. The measures were challenged and the applicants complained of the length of the administrative proceedings. They also complained that no effective remedy before a national authority was available to them to challenge the infringements of their rights caused by the Government's measures. In addition, they alleged a violation of their right to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions as guaranteed by P1A1 and relied on A 14, complaining of discrimination in relation to other owners of land in the same area.

Comm found by majority (19–3) V 6 by reason of the lack of effective access to a court, (20–2) no separate issue under 6 on account of the length of the proceedings, (21–1) V P1A1, (21–1) not necessary to examine 14+P1A1).

Court unanimously dismissed Government's preliminary objection, found NV 13, NV 6 on account of the lack of access to a tribunal, V 6(1) on account of the length of the proceedings, V P1A1, not necessary to examine 14+P1A1;

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Golcuklu, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens, Mr AN Loizou, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr B Repik, Mr P Kûris.

The objection of a failure to exhaust domestic remedies was raised before the Commission with regard to P1A1 only. The preliminary objections were closely linked to consideration of the merits of the complaints under A 6 P1A1 and were therefore joined to the merits.

No question of hindering access to a tribunal arose where a litigant, represented by a lawyer, freely brought proceedings in a court, made his submissions to it and lodged such appeals against its decisions as he considered appropriate. Matos e Silva used the remedies available under Portuguese law. The fact that the proceedings were taking a long time did not concern access to a tribunal. The difficulties encountered related to conduct of proceedings, not to access. In short, there had been no violation of A 13 or, in that regard, of A 6(1), the requirements of A 13 being less strict than, and here absorbed by, those of A 6(1).

The proceedings in question commenced on 18 April 1983, 15 November 1983, 9 July 1984, 8 February 1988 and 23 March 1991 and were still pending. Their length to date had therefore been approximately thirteen years and four months, twelve years and nine months, twelve years and one and a half months, eight and a half years and five years and five months. The Government had conceded that there had been a breach and therefore the Court did not consider it necessary to examine the reasonableness of the length of each set of proceedings with reference to the criteria laid down in its case-law. The length of the proceedings taken as a whole could not be considered reasonable in this case. Having regard to all those considerations, the Court dismissed the Government's preliminary objections with respect to this part of the case and considered that there had been a violation of A 6(1) in that respect.

Although the disputed measures had, as a matter of law, left intact the applicants' right to deal with and use their possessions, they had nevertheless greatly reduced their ability to do so in practice. They also affected the very substance of ownership in that three of them recognised in advance the lawfulness of an expropriation. The other two measures, the one creating and the other regulating the Ria Formosa Nature Reserve, also incontestably restricted the right to use the possessions. The applicants suffered an interference with their right to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. The consequences of that interference were aggravated by the combined use of the public-interest declarations and the creation of a nature reserve over a long period. There was no formal or de facto expropriation in the present case. The effects of the measures were not such that they could be equated with deprivation of possessions. The position was not irreversible. The restrictions on the right to property stemmed from the reduced ability to dispose of the property and from the damage sustained by reason of the fact that expropriation was contemplated. Although the right in question had lost some of its substance, it had not disappeared. All reasonable manner of exploiting the property had not disappeared seeing that the applicants continued to work the land. The second sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1 was therefore not applicable in the instant case. The measures pursued the public interest relied on by the Government, that is to say town and country planning for the purposes of protecting the environment. The various measures taken with respect to the possessions concerned did not lack a reasonable basis. However, in the circumstances of the case the measures had serious and harmful effects that had hindered the applicants' ordinary enjoyment of their right for more than thirteen years during which time virtually no progress had been made in the proceedings. The long period of uncertainty both as to what would become of the possessions and as to the question of compensation further aggravated the detrimental effects of the disputed measures. As a result, the applicants have had to bear an individual and excessive burden which had upset the fair balance which should be struck between the requirements of the general interest and the protection of the right to the peaceful enjoyment of one's possessions. Having regard to all those considerations, the Court dismissed the Government's preliminary objections with respect to this part of the case; there had been a violation of P1A1.

Having regard to the conclusion regarding P1A1, it was not necessary to examine A 14 taken in conjunction with P1A1.

Matter v Slovakia 99/28

[Application lodged 7.8.1993; Commission report 20.5.1998; Court Judgment 5.7.1999]

In 1976 Mr Wilibald Rudolf Matter's legal capacity was restricted. In 1983, the District Court deprived the applicant of legal capacity on the ground that he suffered from an explosive and vexatious form of paranoid psychosis. On 18 February 1987, the District Court started, at the applicant's request of 2 February 1987, proceedings under the Code of Civil Procedure with a view to determining whether the applicant's legal capacity could be restored. The proceedings were still continuing. The applicant complained, inter alia, about the length of the proceedings concerning his legal capacity and that he was examined in a mental hospital against his will.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (9–4) NV 8.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), NV 8.

Judges: Mr CL Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr A Baka, Mr E Levits.

The purpose of the proceedings was to determine whether or not legal capacity could be restored to the applicant. Their outcome was therefore directly decisive for the determination of the applicant's 'civil rights and obligations'. Accordingly, A 6(1) was applicable. The proceedings were brought on 18 February 1987. However, the relevant period began only on 18 March 1992, when the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic ratified the Convention and recognised the right of individual petition pursuant to former A 25. As of 1 January 1993, the Slovak Republic, as one of the two successor States, took over, according to the territorial principle, all rights and obligations arising under international treaties which had bound the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and made relevant statements to this effect at the international level. The proceedings had not yet ended. The period to be taken into consideration had therefore exceeded seven years and three months. In order to determine the reasonableness of the time that elapsed after 18 March 1992, the Court had to take account of the state of the proceedings at that time. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the authorities dealing with the case. In cases relating to civil status and capacity, what was at stake for the applicant was also a relevant consideration and special diligence was required in view of the possible consequences which the excessive length of proceedings might have. The case was of some complexity due to the necessity to obtain an expert opinion on the applicant's mental health. However, that could not, as such, justify the length of the proceedings. The applicant's conduct had contributed to the length of the proceedings in that he was unwilling to co-operate with experts, by challenging the Regional Court judges and by requesting that his case should be dealt with by another court. In respect of the conduct of the Slovak authorities, there were long delays and periods of inactivity for which no satisfactory explanation had been provided by the Government. The domestic courts failed to act with the special diligence required by A 6(1) in cases of this nature. In those circumstances, and having regard to what was at stake for the applicant and to the state of the proceedings at 18 March 1992, the reasonable time requirement had not been respected. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

The forcible examination of the applicant in a hospital amounted to an interference with his right to respect for his private life. Such interference constituted a violation of A 8 unless it was in accordance with the law, pursued an aim or aims that were legitimate under A 8(1) and could be regarded as necessary in a democratic society to achieve the aim or aims concerned. The interference had a legal basis, in the Code of Civil Procedure. It pursued the legitimate aim of protecting the applicant's own rights and health. The applicant had been entirely deprived of legal capacity since 1983; there was a serious interference with his rights. Because of the complexity of the assessment and the special knowledge it required, it was justified to obtain an expert opinion on the applicant's mental health. The first expert appointed had tried to examine the applicant on a voluntary basis. As the applicant refused, the District Court ordered that he should be examined in a mental hospital. That decision was later confirmed by the Regional Court after the applicant's guardian and the public prosecutor had agreed to such an examination. The District Court invited the applicant twice to submit to the examination in the mental hospital and warned him that, if he did not comply, he could be brought there. The applicant failed to comply and therefore the District Court ordered that the applicant should be brought to the hospital. The applicant was brought to the hospital on 19 August 1993 and he was discharged on 2 September 1993, when the examination was concluded. Having regard to the case as a whole, the interference was not disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. It was therefore necessary in a democratic society within the meaning of A 8(2) and accordingly, there had been no violation of A 8.

No claim submitted for just satisfaction under A 41.

[Application lodged 18.4.1994; Commission report 29.10.1997; Court Judgment 18.2.1999]

Ms Denise Matthews claimed that her inability to vote in elections to the European Parliament from Gibraltar violated P1A3 taken alone or in conjunction with A 14.

Court found by majority (15–2) NV P1A3, unanimously not necessary to consider 14+P1A3.

The UK was responsible for securing the right guaranteed under this article regardless of whether the elections were purely domestic or European. There was no reason made out justifying the exclusion of the European Parliament from the ambit of 'election' and the European Parliament constituted part of the legislature of Gibraltar for the purposes of P1A3. There was a violation of the article because the very essence of the applicant's right to vote was denied in the complete lack of any opportunity for her to express her opinion on the choice of a member of the European Parliament.

Mattoccia v Italy 00/188

Mr Massimiliano Mattoccia used to work as a bus driver for a school for handicapped children. In 1985, the police filed a criminal complaint against him. On 12 June 1990 he was convicted of rape of a mentally handicapped girl who had attended the school. He was sentenced to imprisonment. His appeals were rejected by the Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation. He complained of the length and fairness of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) regarding length of proceedings, by majority (25–7) V 6(1) and 6(3) regarding fairness of proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), (3)(a) and (b) as regards the fairness of the proceedings, V 6(1) as regards the length of the proceedings.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr R Türmen, Mr J Casadevall, Mr T Pantîru, Mr R Maruste, Mr C Russo, ad hoc judge.

A 6(3) required the accused to be made aware promptly and in detail of the cause of the accusation, ie, the material facts alleged against him which were the basis of the accusation, and of the nature of the accusation, ie, the legal qualification of those material facts. While the extent of the 'detailed' information referred to varied depending on the particular circumstances of each case, the accused had at any rate to be provided with sufficient information as was necessary to understand fully the extent of the charges against him with a view to preparing an adequate defence. In this respect, the adequacy of the information had to be assessed in relation to sub-para (b) of A 6(3). The defence was confronted with exceptional difficulties. Given that the information contained in the accusation was characterised by vagueness as to essential details concerning time and place, was repeatedly contradicted and amended in the course of the trial, and in view of the lengthy period which had elapsed between the committal for trial and the trial (more than three and a half years) compared to the rapidity of the trial (less than one month), fairness required that the applicant should have been afforded greater opportunity and facilities to defend himself in a practical and effective manner, for example, by calling witnesses to establish an alibi. The applicant's right to be informed in detail of the nature and cause of the accusation against him and his right to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence were infringed. Consequently, there has been a violation of A 6(3)(a) and (b) taken together with A 6(1).

The period to be taken into consideration began on 17 February 1986, when the applicant received the official notification of the allegation that he had committed the offence of rape and ended with the filing of the Court of Cassation judgment in the Registry on 19 July 1993. The proceedings had lasted approximately seven years and five months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the authorities dealing with the case. The nature of the offence did not make the proceedings especially complex. There was nothing to suggest that the applicant was in any way responsible for the delays in the proceedings. Delays covering more than half of the overall length of the proceedings were attributable to the national authorities. The proceedings in question exceeded a reasonable time.

Matznetter v Austria (1979-80) 1 EHRR 198 69/2

[Application lodged 3.4.1964; Commission report 4.4.1967; Court Judgment 10.11.1969]

Mr Otto Matznetter was employed by the Schiwitz group, first as assistant and later as their principal adviser in tax, economic and financial matters. On 15 May 1963 the applicant was arrested with others for fraud offences. It was feared that he would abscond and suppress evidence if released. The Regional Criminal Court, sitting as a lay judge court, gave judgment on 6 February 1967, after a hearing lasting 23 days. It found the applicant guilty and sentenced him to seven years' severe imprisonment, with one day's fast every quarter, and to a fine of ATS 5,000 or one week's imprisonment. He complained of the decisions refusing his release and the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (9–1) V 5(3) in that the applicant's detention had exceeded a reasonable time, (6–2 with two abstentions) NV 5(4) and 6(1).

Court found by majority (5–2) NV 5(3),unanimously, NV 5(4) or 6(1).

Judges: Mr H Rolin, President, Mr Cremona A Holmbäck (c), Mr A Verdross (jc), Mr G Balladore Pallieri (c), Mr M Zekia (d), Mr J (pd A 5(3), pc A 5(4) and 6(1)), Mr S Bilge (jc).

It was essentially on the basis of the reasons given in the decisions on the applications for release pending trial, and of the true facts mentioned by the applicant in his appeals, that the Court was called upon to decide whether or not there had been a violation of the Convention. The Court of Appeal of Vienna based its decision on a danger of absconding and on a danger of repetition of offences. As regards the danger of absconding, the decisions refusing the request for release of 27 December 1963 contained extensive statements of reasons and were justified at that time. In particular, the circumstances of the arrest, the transfers of funds out of Austria, the applicant's journey to Angola and the connections which he had established abroad could, at the beginning, bear out the idea of such a danger. As to the danger of repetition of the offences, a judge could reasonably take into account the seriousness of the consequences of criminal offences when there was a question of taking into account the danger of seeing such offences being repeated, in order to decide if the person concerned could be released in spite of the possible existence of such danger. In this case the Austrian courts took care to point in their decisions to a series of definite factors and the Court found it proper that they should have attached importance to them, that is, the very prolonged continuation of reprehensible activities, the huge extent of the loss sustained by the victims and the wickedness of the person charged. The explanations of the applicant (Schiwitz enterprises subsequently being independently managed and in the course of liquidation, his own office under control of temporary administrator and his attempts to assist in finding out the truth) lacked weight when measured against the various circumstances mentioned by the Austrian courts, particularly the applicant's experience and great skill which were such as to make it easy for him to resume his unlawful activities either on his own account or in the employ of persons other than the Schiwitz enterprises. At the date of the lodging of the application the applicant's detention while on remand had not exceeded a reasonable time. After his first request had been dismissed on 4 March 1964, the applicant made, on 13 November 1964, a second request which was rejected in final instance on 20 January 1965 by the Court of Appeal of Vienna and then a third on 21 April 1965 which led to his release on 8 July 1965. The time which elapsed between the final dismissal of the first request and the making of the second was not abnormal; the same held good for the period between the final dismissal of the second request and the filing of the third. The reasons given by the Austrian courts for the dismissal of the second request for release were the same as those on which they had relied to dismiss the first request. As regards the further reason of the severity of the sentence to be expected, it could not suffice to establish the existence of a danger of absconding; in any event, the effect of the fear which such severity inspired in a person charged or accused diminished as the detention continued and, consequently, the balance of the sentence which the person concerned might expect to have to serve was reduced. In any case, the national authorities would have been able to accept the security offered by the applicant if the sole reason for his detention had been the danger of absconding. If the danger of absconding could no longer be found to be sufficient in this case, on the contrary and for the reasons set out above, the danger of repetition of offences could be held to justify the continuation of the applicant's detention while on remand. Having regard to the applicant's serious illness, that danger had ceased to exist. The Austrian courts could scarcely have arrived earlier at that last conclusion: The applicant had admittedly made known his state of health as early as 7 January 1964 but without relying much on the point and then, it seems, for the sole purpose of showing that there was no danger of his absconding.

Some delays could constitute violations of A 5(3) while remaining compatible with A 6(1). The length of the applicant's detention, from 15 May 1963 to 8 July 1965, was not due to the slowness of the preliminary investigation which ended only on 11 May 1965; no criticism could be made of the judicial authorities' conduct of the case. The unusual length of the investigation was justified by the exceptional complexity of the case. Intervals of several months elapsed between different interrogations. The competent authorities ordered certain charges to be split up and relieved the Investigating Judge, from 20 November 1963 to 10 May 1965, from his duty to take on new cases, thus showing their anxiety to avoid any delay in the course of the proceedings. While an accused person held in custody was entitled to have his case given priority and conducted with special diligence that could not stand in the way of the proper administration of justice.

As to the question whether or not the procedure followed in the examination of the applicant's applications for release gave rise, by reason of a lack of equality of arms, to a violation of A 5(4) or A 6(1), a similar issue already arose before the Court in the Neumeister case, which the Court decided in the negative. The Court saw no reason to depart in this case from that decision.

Mr Wolfgang Mauer had a taxi business. The first set of proceedings: On 4 March 1988 a car identified as belonging to him was seen to drive through a red traffic-light. On 15 May 1988 the Federal Police Authority in Vienna sent him a letter ordering him to disclose the identity of the driver. On 20 May 1988 the Vienna Federal Police Authority imposed a fine of ATS 800 with 48 hours' imprisonment in default on the applicant by way of a provisional penal order for having failed to comply with his obligation as registered owner to disclose the identity of the driver at a particular time. His subsequent appeals were rejected. The second set of proceedings: On 6 August 1987 officers of the Vienna police found that a tyre on one of the applicant's taxis had too low a tread. They drew up a report and confiscated the car's number plates and logbook. On 20 September 1988 the Vienna Federal Police Authority, having heard the applicant, fined him ATS 500 for failure to comply with his duties as the registered owner of a motor vehicle, with thirty hours' imprisonment in default. His appeal to the Vienna regional government was rejected and appeal to the Administrative Court was dismissed on 13 December 1989 without a hearing.

With regard to the first application he complained that he had not had a fair and public hearing before a tribunal and that he had not been allowed to defend himself in person. With regard to the second application he complained that he had not had a fair hearing and that witnesses whom he had sought to bring forward had not been heard.

Comm found unanimously in the first case V 6(1) with regard to his right to a tribunal but that the absence of a hearing before the Administrative Court raised no separate issue under A 6(1); in the second case V 6(1) with regard to his right to a tribunal but that neither the absence of a hearing before the Administrative Court nor the way in which the evidence was considered raised any separate issue under 6(1).

Court found unanimously it had jurisdiction only to consider the applicant's allegations of violation of the Convention in so far as they related to the two sets of proceedings referred to in the Commission's decisions on admissibility, V 6(1) in both sets of proceedings, not necessary to consider 6(3)(c) or (d).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr A N Loizou, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek.

The scope of the case before the Court was determined by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The third set of proceedings referred to by the applicant was not encompassed by either of the Commission's decisions on admissibility in the present case. Therefore the Court had no jurisdiction to consider the applicant's complaints in so far as they related to those proceedings.

In the cases of Schmautzer, Umlauft, Gradinger, Pramstaller, Palaoro and Pfarrmeier, the Court found that there had been a violation of the applicant's right of access to a tribunal and, in view of that finding, considered it unnecessary to rule specifically on the applicant's other complaints under A 6. There was no reason to follow a different approach in the present case. Accordingly, the Court found that there had been a violation of A 6(1) in each set of proceedings and it was not necessary to rule on the allegations of violation of A 6(3)(c) and (d).

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction in respect of any non-pecuniary damage sustained. Costs (ATS 100,000).

Mauer (No. 2) v Austria 00/165

[Application lodged 23.4.1990; Court Judgment 20.6.2000]

On 23 March 1988, Mr Wolfgang Mauer, was instructed to inform the police who had parked a car belonging to him in the Schlossgasse in Vienna on 18 March 1988 at 5.30pm. He failed to provide the information, and on 11 October 1988 was fined ATS 2,000 for the failure. His complaint to the Administrative Court was ultimately dismissed on 24 January 1990. He complained of violation of A 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mrs H S Greve, Mr K Traja.

The issue under A 6(1) raised by the present case was the same as in the case of Mauer, Schmautzer, Umlauft, Gradinger, Pramstaller, Palaoro and Pfarrmeier. In all those cases the Court found that there had been a violation of the applicant's right of access to a tribunal, given the limited review by the Administrative Court of the decisions of the administrative authorities. There was no reason to follow a different approach in the present case. Accordingly the Court found that there has been a violation of A 6(1).

Finding of a violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage sustained by the applicant. Costs and expenses (ATS 40,000).

Mavronichis v Cyprus 98/31

[Application lodged 10.7.1995; Commission report 15.1.1997; Court Judgment 24.4.1998]

Mr Michael Mavronichis was an accountant by profession. On his failure to obtain a post he had applied for, Head of Accounts with the Industrial Training Authority, he filed a recourse action against the decision to appoint the only other candidate for the post. On 30 November 1990, the District Court delivered a judgment in which it awarded the applicant compensation. There were further appeals and cross-appeals. He complained that his claim for compensation had not been heard within a reasonable time.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P van Dijk.

There was a dispute between the applicant and the authorities over his right to compensation following the annulment of the Industrial Training Authority's decision not to recruit him. The central issue concerned the classification of that right for the purposes of the applicability of A 6(1). Disputes relating to, inter alia, the recruitment of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1), but in this case the issue of recruitment to a public-sector post was not at the heart of the applicant's civil action. The sole aim of the applicant's civil action against the authorities was to obtain compensation for damage. Having regard to the clear terms of the domestic legislation, there were arguable grounds for concluding that the domestic law of the respondent State recognised that a right to seek compensation accrued to the applicant once he had secured the annulment of the Industrial Training Authority's decision. The public-law features of the civil action did not outweigh the predominantly private-law characteristics of the proceedings, the outcome of which was decisive as to whether the applicant was entitled to recover damages against the defendant authority and, in the affirmative, the quantum: the compensation proceedings involved a determination of a purely pecuniary right having a basis in domestic law. In conclusion, the civil action involved a dispute over a 'civil right', and A 6(1) was applicable in the case.

The only set of proceedings to be considered for the purposes of the assessment of the reasonable time requirement was the civil action initiated by the applicant on 13 April 1987 and terminated on 20 June 1995. The earlier recourse action was to be excluded from its assessment. Notwithstanding its relevance to the issue of the applicability of A 6(1), the length of that action never formed the subject matter of the applicant's complaint to the Convention institutions. The total length of time taken by the impugned civil action was eight years, two months, eight days. When assessing the reasonableness of the length of the proceedings in the light of the Court's established case-law, regard had to be had to the fact that the period in respect of which it had jurisdiction ratione temporis began to run from 1 January 1989, when Cyprus recognised the right of individual petition for the purposes of A 25. However, account had to be taken of the state of the case on that date in making its determination. The case was not complex. There were delays on the part of the authorities, no steps were taken by the registry of the Supreme Court to process the appeal proceedings between 8 January 1991 and 15 March 1995. Excessive delay could not be excused on the ground of volume of work, A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements, including the obligation to hear cases within a reasonable time. Accordingly there had been a violation of A 6(1) in that the applicant's civil right was not determined within a reasonable time.

Maxwell v UK (1995) 19 EHRR 97 94/37

[Application lodged 25.3.1991; Commission report 4.5.1993; Court Judgment 28.10.1994]

Mr Peter Maxwell was convicted of assault and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. He complained that the refusal of legal aid for his appeal against conviction violated A 6(3)(c). He also complained under A 6(1) about the conduct of his defence by legal representatives and a number of other matters arising out of his trial.

Comm found by majority (17–2) V 6(3)(c).

Court unanimously found V 6(3)(c).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Macdonald, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mrs E Palm, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland (c), Mr AB Baka, Mr J Makarczyk.

A 6: given the nature of the proceedings, the wide powers of the High Court, the limited capacity of an unrepresented appellant to present a legal argument and, above all, the importance of the issue at stake in view of the severity of the sentence, the interests of justice required the applicant to be granted legal aid for representation at his appeal hearing.

Finding of a violation sufficient to constitute just satisfaction.

Mazurek v France 0/42

[Application lodged 13.12.1996; Court Judgment 1.2.2000]

Mr Claude Mazurek, was born in 1942 when the marriage of his parents still existed, but was registered only under the name of his mother as the couple had separated. After the mother's death, the elder son, who was legitimated by her marriage, applied to the tribunal de grande instance for the division of her estate and for a declaration that the applicant as the child of an adulterous union could only claim, under the French Civil Code, one quarter of the estate. The applicant argued unsuccessfully that this was incompatible with the Convention.

Court found unanimously V P1A1+14, by majority (5–2) not necessary to examine 8+14.

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides (pd), Mrs F Tulkens (pd), Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja.

The protection of the traditional family, which formed the basis of the discrimination under the law, could be considered a legitimate purpose. Nevertheless, developments in family law tended towards the abolition of discrimination with respect to adulterine children. Interpretation of the Convention being necessarily evolutive, those developments had to be taken into account. In this case there was no justification for the different treatment of an adulterine child in the division of the estate, since such discrimination would have the effect of penalising the child for events which were not his fault.

McCallum v United Kingdom (1991) 13 EHRR 596 90/18

[Application lodged 31.8.1981; Commission report 4.5.1989; Court Judgment 30.8.1990]

On 11 March 1980 Mr Michael Peter McCallum was convicted by the High Court of Justiciary at Glasgow of assault and robbery and sentenced to six years' imprisonment, to run from 26 November 1979. Whilst in custody he lost 509 days' remission of sentence for a series of offences against prison discipline. He was released from prison on 18 April 1985. During the course of his sentence, Mr McCallum spent two periods in the Segregation Unit at Inverness Prison for assaults on and abuse of staff, the first from 22 November 1980 to 27 January 1981 and the second from 30 June to 15 October 1981. The second period exceeded the usual three months' maximum in view of his particularly uncooperative attitude whilst he was there. During 1981 and 1982, the prison authorities imposed the following particular restrictions on the applicant's correspondence; Two letters from the applicant, one to his solicitor and one to a Member of Parliament and each dated 24 June 1981, were stopped as were a letter of 5 October 1981 from the applicant to the editor of the Daily Record, a letter dated 18 December 1981 from the applicant to the Procurator Fiscal, a letter dated 19 January 1982 from the applicant to Miss Hampson of Dundee University, letters dated 20 and 23 February 1982 from the applicant to his representative were delayed, copies of letters written by his representative to the Prison Service Headquarters on 4 June 1982 and to the Secretary of State on 22 June 1982 were withheld from the applicant. On 22 December 1982 the Visiting Committee of Barlinnie Prison imposed on the applicant a disciplinary award which included an absolute prohibition for 28 days on all correspondence. The applicant raised various complaints concerning the conditions and circumstances of his imprisonment.

Comm found unanimously V 8 in respect of the stopping of the two letters of 24 June 1981 and of the letters of 5 October 1981, 18 December 1981 and 19 January 1982, the withholding of the copies of the letters dated 4 and 22 June 1982 and the 28-day restriction on correspondence imposed by the disciplinary award, unanimously, NV 8 in respect of the delaying of the letters of 20 and 23 February 1982, not necessary to examine 10, unanimously V 13 in relation to the applicant's complaints under 8 concerning the stopping of the letters of 24 June 1981 and 18 December 1981 and the restriction under the disciplinary award, unanimously NV 13 in relation to the applicant's complaints under 8 concerning the stopping of the letters of 5 October 1981 and 19 January 1982, the delaying of the letters of 20 and 23 February 1982 and the withholding of the copies of the letters dated 4 and 22 June 1982, by majority (9–6) V 13+3.

Court found unanimously V 8 in respect of the measures affecting the applicant's correspondence with the exception of the delaying of the letters of 20 and 23 February 1982, not necessary to examine 10, 13+3 or 13+8.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr J De Meyer, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel.

The measures affecting the applicant's correspondence which were at issue in the present case constituted, with the exception of the delaying of the letters of 20 and 23 February 1982, violations of A 8. Neither the Government nor the applicant contested the opinion of the Commission on the allegations of breach of that provision.

The claim before the Commission under A 10 was not pursued before the Court which saw no need to examine it of its own motion.

The applicant abandoned his claims of violation of A 13 before the Court and the matter was not further pursued by the Delegate of the Commission at the hearing, the Court therefore found it was not necessary to examine the case under that provision.

Finding of violations of A 8 constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the purposes of A 50. Costs and expenses (GBP 3,000).

McCann and Others v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 97 95/28

[Application lodged 14.8.1991; Commission report 4.3.1994; Court Judgment 27.9.1995]

Ms Margaret McCann, Mr Daniel Farrell and Mr John Savage were representatives of the estates of Mr Daniel McCann, Ms Mairead Farrell and Mr Sean Savage. The latter three were suspected IRA terrorists, who were shot and killed by members of the Secret Air Service (SAS) in Gibraltar. They complained that the killings violated A 2.

Comm found by majority (11–6) NV 2.

Court found by majority (10–9) V 2.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (d), President, Mr R Bernhardt (d), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm(d), Mr R Pekkanen (d), Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland (d), Mr AB Baka (d), Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek (d), Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus.

A 2, which not only safeguarded the right to life but sets out the circumstances when the deprivation of life may be justified, ranks as one of the most fundamental provisions in the Convention – which, in peacetime, admits of no derogation under A 15. A 2(2) extends to, but is not concerned exclusively with, intentional killing. It describes the situations where it is permitted to use force which may result, as an unintended outcome, in the deprivation of life. The use of force, however, must be no more than absolutely necessary for the achievement of one of the purposes set out in sub-paragraphs (a), (b) or (c). The term 'absolutely necessary' in A 2(2) indicates that a stricter and more compelling test of necessity must be employed from that normally applicable when determining whether State action is 'necessary in a democratic society' under para 2 of A 8–11. In particular, the force used must be strictly proportionate to the achievement of the aims set out in the sub-paragraphs. A general legal prohibition of arbitrary killing by the agents of the State would be ineffective, in practice, if there existed no procedure for reviewing the lawfulness of the use of lethal force by State authorities. Public inquest proceedings, at which the applicants were legally represented took place and involved a detailed review of the events surrounding the killings. The lawyers acting on behalf of the applicants were able to examine and cross-examine key witnesses, including the military and police personnel involved in the planning and conduct of the anti-terrorist operation, and to make the submissions they wished to make in the course of the proceedings. The alleged various shortcomings in the inquest proceedings did not substantially hamper the carrying out of a thorough, impartial and careful examination of the circumstances surrounding the killings. Therefore there had been no breach of A 2(1) on this ground. The establishment and verification of the facts was primarily a matter for the Commission, accordingly, it was only in exceptional circumstances that the Court would use its powers in that area. The Court took the Commission's establishment of the facts and findings to be an accurate and reliable account of the facts underlying the present case. The Court, in determining whether there had been a breach of A 2 was not assessing the criminal responsibility of those directly or indirectly concerned. It was not established that there was an execution plot at the highest level of command in the Ministry of Defence or in the Government. Nor was there evidence that there was an implicit encouragement by the authorities or hints and innuendoes to execute the three suspects. The United Kingdom authorities received information that there would be a terrorist attack in Gibraltar. They were confronted by an active service unit of the IRA composed of persons who had been convicted of bombing offences and a known explosives expert. They had also had prior warning of the impending terrorist action and thus had ample opportunity to plan their reaction and, in co-ordination with the local Gibraltar authorities, to take measures to foil the attack and arrest the suspects. It was subsequently discovered that the suspects were unarmed, that they did not have a detonator device on their persons and that there was no bomb in the car. All four soldiers admitted that they shot to kill. They considered that it was necessary to continue to fire at the suspects until they were rendered physically incapable of detonating a device. According to the pathologists' evidence Ms Farrell was hit by eight bullets, Mr

McCann by five and Mr Savage by sixteen. The soldiers honestly believed, in the light of the information that they had been given, that it was necessary to shoot the suspects in order to prevent them from detonating a bomb and causing serious loss of life. The use of force by agents of the State in pursuit of one of the aims delineated in A 2(2) may be justified under that provision where it was based on an honest belief which was perceived, for good reasons, to be valid at the time but which subsequently turned out to be mistaken. To hold otherwise would be to impose an unrealistic burden on the State and its law-enforcement personnel in the execution of their duty, perhaps to the detriment of their lives and those of others. Having regard to the dilemma confronting the authorities in the circumstances of the case, the actions of the soldiers did not, in themselves, give rise to a violation of A 2(2). Having regard to the decision not to prevent the suspects from travelling into Gibraltar, to the failure of the authorities to make sufficient allowances for the possibility that their intelligence assessments might, in some respects at least, be erroneous and to the automatic recourse to lethal force when the soldiers opened fire, the Court is not persuaded that the killing of the three terrorists constituted the use of force which was no more than absolutely necessary in defence of persons from unlawful violence within the meaning of A 2(2). Accordingly, there had been a breach of A 2.

McGinley and Egan v United Kingdom (1999) 27 EHRR 1 98/43

[Applications lodged 20.4.1993 and 31.12.1993; Commission report 26.11.1996; Court Judgment 9.6.1998 (merits, A 50), 28.1.2000 (revision request)]

Between 1952 and 1967 the UK carried out a number of atmospheric tests of nuclear weapons in the Pacific Ocean and at Maralinga, Australia, involving over 20,000 servicemen. Among those tests were a series of six detonations at Christmas Island in the Pacific Ocean (November 1957–September 1958) of weapons many times more powerful than those discharged at Hiroshima and Nagasaki. During the Christmas Island tests, service personnel were ordered to line up in the open and to face away from the explosions with their eyes closed and covered until 20 seconds after the blast. Mr Kenneth McGinley was working as a plant operator on the Island and Mr Edward Egan was serving as a stoker on a ship in the area. They complained that they had not been warned of the effects of their alleged exposure to radiation and that they had been denied access to the records compiled in relation to radiation levels and the medical treatment they had received following the explosions, which omissions had exacerbated their suffering and denied them access to, and a fair hearing before the Pensions Appeal Tribunal. In addition, they claimed to have been subjected to harassment and surveillance.

By letters in August 1998, the applicants requested a revision of the European Court's judgment of 9.6.1998 under Rule 80 of the Rules of Procedure, on the ground that certain correspondence constituted facts which were discovered by them, and which could not reasonably have been known to them prior to the delivery of the original judgment of 9 June 1998. They contended that the correspondence would have had a decisive influence on the original judgment of the Court.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), not necessary to consider 13, by majority (23–3) V 8.

Court found by majority (6–3) NV 6(1), unanimously not necessary to rule on the preliminary objection in respect of 6(1), by majority (5–4) NV 8, unanimously not necessary to rule on the preliminary objection in respect of 8, unanimously not necessary to consider the complaint under 13.

Court by majority (5–2) dismissed the request for revision.

Judges (merits, A 50): Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr J De Meyer (jd), Mr N Valticos (jd), Mr R Pekkanen (jd), Mr JM Morenilla (jd), Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr V Butkevych.

Judges (revision): Mrs E Palm, President, Mr J Casadevall (d), Mr V Butkevych, Mr T Pantîru, Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste (d), Sir Simon Brown, ad hoc judge.

The complaints under A 2 and 3 concerning lack of monitoring during nuclear tests of applicants' exposure to radiation were not raised before the Commission and were based on events in 1958 before the UK's A 25 and 46 declarations. The complaint under A 8 concerning alleged harassment of the first applicant was declared inadmissible by Commission as it was introduced outside the six-month limit. The Court had no jurisdiction to consider those complaints. The complaint under A 3 based on same facts (lack of access to documents) as, and fell more appropriately within the scope of, complaints under A 6(1), 8 and 13.

The Government's argument on non-exhaustion of domestic remedies was closely linked to the substance of the applicants' complaints under A 6(1) and 8. The plea would therefore, be joined to the merits.

A 6(1) was applicable. It was not established that the respondent State had in its possession documents relevant to the questions at issue in pension appeals. In any case, it was open to the applicants to apply for disclosure of the relevant documents. Where a procedure was provided for the disclosure of documents which the applicants failed to utilise, it could not be said that the State prevented the applicants from gaining access to, or falsely denied the existence of, any relevant evidence, or that the applicants were thereby denied effective access to or a fair hearing before the Pensions Appeal Tribunal. It followed that there had been no violation of A 6(1). In view of that conclusion, it was not necessary for the Court to determine whether or not the Government's preliminary objection should be upheld.

A 8: the applicants were in doubt as to whether or not they had been exposed to radiation at levels engendering risk to their health. The issue of access to information which could either have allayed their fears in that respect, or enabled them to assess the danger to which they had been exposed, was sufficiently closely linked to their private and family lives within the meaning of A 8 as to raise an issue under that provision. A 8 was applicable. Where a State engaged in hazardous activities, such as those in issue in the present case, which might have hidden adverse consequences on the health of those involved in such activities, respect for private and family life under A 8 required that an effective and accessible procedure be established which enabled such persons to seek all relevant and appropriate information. In providing the procedure under the tribunal rules, the State had fulfilled its positive obligation under A 8 in relation to the applicants. It followed that there had been no violation of A 8.

In view of that conclusion, it was not necessary for the Court to rule on the Government's preliminary objection.

In view of its conclusion in relation to A 6(1), it was not necessary to examine separately the complaint in relation to A 13, the requirements of which were less strict than and absorbed by those of A 6(1) in this case.

Revision request: A 44 set out the principle of the finality of judgments and the possibility of revision was an exceptional procedure. Requests for revision of judgments were therefore to be subjected to strict scrutiny. The series of correspondence submitted by the applicants with the revision request could be regarded as 'facts'. It had not been previously submitted to the Commission or to the Court. The Court was prepared to accept that the revision request was made to the former Court within six months of the applicants' actually obtaining copies of the correspondence. The Court had to decide whether the facts were 'unknown' or 'could not reasonably have been known' to the applicants, within the meaning of Rule 80, prior to the delivery of the original judgment. The Court was satisfied from the evidence that the applicants had sufficiently detailed knowledge in August 1996, from information and copy letters provided to them at that stage, for it to have been clear to them that a significant amount of correspondence and documentation had been created prior to that date in relation to that Rule 6 application. In those circumstances, while copies of the correspondence upon which the revision request was based may not have been actually obtained by the applicants until after the delivery of the original judgment on 9 June 1998, they manifestly were on notice in August 1996 (when they wrote to the Commission) of the existence of the correspondence. Consequently, whether or not the correspondence 'might by its nature have a decisive influence' on the original judgment, the Court found it established that those facts 'could reasonably have been known' to the applicants prior to the delivery of the original judgment. The request for revision was, accordingly, rejected.

[Application lodged 25.3.1980; Commission report 13.7.1983; Court Judgment 26 October 1984]

Mr Anthony McGoff, an Irish citizen, was a contractor by profession. On 27 October 1977, the District Court of Stockholm issued a warrant for his arrest on the ground of suspicion of gross smuggling and a serious offence against the legislation on narcotics. He was arrested in the Netherlands on 10 July 1979, extradited to Sweden on 24 January 1980 and immediately placed in custody in the main prison in Stockholm. From 25 January 1980, the police inspector in charge endeavoured to interrogate the applicant, but the latter declined to make any statement until he had had the opportunity to consult his own lawyer. The District Court appointed that lawyer who on 28 January visited the applicant in his cell. On 8 February, the District Court held a hearing at the close of which it ordered Mr. McGoff's continued detention and directed that criminal proceedings against him should be instituted no later than 21 February 1980. He was kept in detention. Following trial on 13 March 1980 he was convicted of a serious offence against the legislation on narcotics and sentenced to two years' imprisonment with an order that he should be deported from Sweden on expiry of his sentence. Conviction and sentence were upheld on 12 May 1980 by the Svea Court of Appeal and on 26 June 1980 the Supreme Court refused the applicant's request for leave to appeal. He complained of his detention.

Comm found unanimously V 5(3), NV 5(4).

Court found unanimously no jurisdiction to entertain the complaint as to the alleged existence of hindrances contrary to 25(1), V 5(3), NV 5(4).

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr W Ganshof van der Meersch, Mr G Lagergren, Mr E García de Enterría, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr R Bernhardt.

The Commission's admissibility decision of 13 October 1982 determined the object of the case brought before the Court. The Commission had resolved to take no action with regard to the complaint under A 25, in effect to a declaration of inadmissibility, with the result that the Court was unable to entertain the complaint.

The Stockholm District Court did not hear the applicant in person when it issued a warrant for his arrest in October 1977 and his detention began more than two years later. That being so, the arrest warrant did not preclude the subsequent application of the guarantees in A 5(3). However, 15 days elapsed between the time when the applicant was placed in custody in Sweden (24 January 1980) and when he was brought before the District Court (8 February 1980). An interval of that length could not be regarded as consistent with the required promptness. Accordingly, there had been a breach of A 5(3).

The Commission noted that under the Code of Judicial Procedure the applicant had the possibility, which was not subject to any time-limit, of appealing to the Court of Appeal against the arrest warrant issued by the District Court. In the Commission's view, there was no indication that that remedy would not have satisfied the requirements of A 5(4). The Court saw no cause for differing from the Commission's conclusion and accordingly held that there had been no breach of A 5(4).

McGonnell v United Kingdom 00/66

[Application lodged 29.6.1995; Commission report 20.10.1998; Court Judgment 8.2.2000]

Mr Richard James Joseph McGonnell bought a vinery in Guernsey in 1982. A number of planning applications were made to permit residential use of the land in the ensuing years; they were all refused. In 1986/87, the applicant moved into a converted packing shed on his land. In 1988 he made representations to a planning inquiry which was considering the draft Detailed Development Plan No 6 (DDP6). In his report to the President of the Island Development Committee (IDC), the inspector concluded that a dwelling on the applicant's site would be an intrusion into the agricultural/horticultural hinterland. The States of Deliberation, the island's legislature, presided over by the Deputy Bailiff, debated and adopted DDP6 in June 1990. A retrospective application for planning permission to convert the packing shed into a dwelling was rejected by the IDC on 11 July 1991 as the site was a Developed Glasshouse Area where residential development was not allowed. The applicant was convicted by the magistrates' court of changing the use of the shed without permission, and was fined. The IDC's application for permission to carry out the necessary works to remedy the breach of the planning legislation was granted by the Royal Court comprising the Bailiff (head of the island's administration and president of the States of Deliberation, who presided over Royal Court and Court of Appeal), who determined questions of law, and three Jurats, who determined matters of fact. In 1994 a further application for change of use was rejected by the IDC and in June 1995 the Royal Court comprising the Bailiff and seven Jurats unanimously dismissed his appeal, without giving reasons. The applicant claimed that he did not have the benefit of the guarantees of A 6(1) at the hearing of his case before the Royal Court of Guernsey.

Comm found by majority (25–5) V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs HS Greve, Sir John Laws (c), ad hoc judge.

The Government's preliminary submissions were not raised before the Commission and they were therefore estopped from relying on them.

A 6(1) was applicable to the proceedings. Given the clear statement of the Court of Appeal that the Bailiff's constitutional functions in connection with the States did not impinge on his judicial independence, and the fact that a domestic challenge was not only not pursued by the applicant in the domestic proceedings, but was not raised by the Government until a late stage of the Convention proceedings, the Court found that the applicant's failure to challenge the Bailiff in Guernsey could not be said to have been unreasonable, and could not amount to a tacit waiver of his right to an independent and impartial tribunal. There was no suggestion that the Bailiff was subjectively prejudiced or biased when he heard the applicant's planning appeal in June 1995. The sole question was whether the Bailiff had the required 'appearance' of independence, or the required 'objective' impartiality. The Bailiff's functions were not limited to judicial matters, he was also actively involved in non-judicial functions on the island. The Court did not accept the Government's analysis that when the Bailiff acted in a non-judicial capacity he merely occupied positions rather than exercising functions: even a purely ceremonial constitutional role had to be classified as a 'function'. The Bailiff had personal involvement with the planning matters first in 1990, when, as Deputy Bailiff, he presided over the adoption of DDP6. The second occasion was on 6 June 1995, when he presided over the Royal Court in the determination of the applicant's planning appeal. Any direct involvement in the passage of legislation, or of executive rules, was likely to be sufficient to cast doubt on the judicial impartiality of a person subsequently called on to determine a dispute over whether reasons existed to permit a variation from the wording of the legislation or rules at issue. The States of Deliberation in Guernsey was the body which passed the regulations at issue. The mere fact that the Deputy Bailiff presided over the States of Deliberation when DDP6 was adopted was capable of casting doubt on his impartiality when he subsequently determined, as the sole judge of the law in the case, the applicant's planning appeal. The applicant therefore had legitimate grounds for fearing that the Bailiff may have been influenced by his prior participation in the adoption of DDP6. That, however slight its justification, was sufficient to vitiate the impartiality of the Royal Court. It followed that there had been a breach of A 6(1).

McLeod v United Kingdom (1999) 27 EHRR 493 98/82

[Application lodged 22.5.1994; Commission report 9.4.1997; Court Judgment 23.9.1998]

The applicant, Ms Sally McLeod, and her husband separated in 1986 and were divorced in July 1988. The County Court ordered that the former matrimonial home be transferred to the applicant on payment of GBP 30,000. The Court ordered the division of property in accordance with a list identified in the order and on 23 August 1989 ordered Ms McLeod to make arrangements for the delivery of her ex-husband's property within fourteen days. The order was backed by a penal notice. On 3 October 1989 Mr McLeod, accompanied by his siblings and a solicitor's clerk, and fearing there would be a breach of the peace, having made arrangements for two police officers to be present went to remove his remaining property. The applicant was not home but her mother allowed Mr McLeod and his party access to the property. The applicant returned home. She was angry and objected to the removal of the property. The applicant instituted criminal proceedings against those involved in the incident, which were unsuccessful. Together with her mother, she then instituted three sets of civil proceedings for trespass, one against her ex-husband and his siblings, one against the solicitor's clerk and a third against the two police officers. On 12 November 1992 the High Court dismissed the action against the police officers on the grounds that they had not trespassed on the applicant's land or goods. Her appeal was dismissed by the Court of Appeal on 3 February 1994. The House of Lords refused her application for leave to appeal. On 27 November 1992 the Brentford County found that the applicant's ex-husband, his brother and sister and his solicitors had trespassed on her land and property and awarded her compensation. The applicant complained that the entry of the police into her house on 3 October 1989 and the subsequent failure of the courts to grant her legal protection amounted to a violation of her right to respect for her home and private life and to the peaceful enjoyment of her possessions.

Comm found by majority (14–2) NV 8, unanimously NV P1A1.

Court found by majority (7–2) V 8, unanimously not necessary to examine P1A1.

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mr A Spielmann, Sir John Freeland (jpd), Mr M A Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (jpd), Mr B Repik, Mr P Kûris, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P Van Dijk.

The entry of the police into the applicant's home on 3 October 1989 constituted an interference with her right to respect for her private life and home. The concept of breach of the peace had been clarified by the English courts. The police had a duty to prevent a breach of the peace that they reasonably apprehended would occur and to stop a breach of the peace that was occurring. In the execution of that duty, the police had the power to enter into and remain on private property without the consent of the owner or occupier. That power was preserved by s 17(6) of the Police and Criminal Evidence 1984 Act. The power of the police to enter private premises without a warrant to deal with or prevent a breach of the peace was defined with sufficient precision for the foreseeability criterion to be satisfied. The interference was, therefore, in accordance with the law. The aim of the power enabling police officers to enter private premises to prevent a breach of the peace was clearly a legitimate one for the purposes of A 8, namely the prevention of disorder or crime, and there was nothing to suggest that it was applied in the present case for any other purpose. Since Mr McLeod's solicitors genuinely believed that a breach of the peace might occur when their client removed his property from the former matrimonial home, the police could not be faulted for responding to their request for assistance. However, the police did not take any steps to verify whether Mr McLeod was entitled to enter the applicant's home on 3 October 1989 and remove his property. Upon being informed that the applicant was not present, the police officers should not have entered her house, as it should have been clear to them that there was little or no risk of disorder or crime occurring. Therefore the means employed by the police officers were disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 8.

Having regard to the finding that the entry of the police officers into the applicant's home was not justified under A 8(2), the Court did not consider it necessary to examine further the complaint of failure to comply with a positive obligation.

The complaint under P1A1 was not maintained before the Court which saw no reason to examine it of its own motion.

Finding of violation sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage suffered by the applicant. Costs and expenses (GBP 15,000).

McMichael v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 205 95/7

[Application lodged 11.10.1989; Commission report 31.8.1993; Court Judgment 24.2.1995]

The first applicant, Antony McMichael, and the second applicant, Margaret McMichael were married on 24 April 1990. On 29 November 1987 the second applicant gave birth to a son, A. The first applicant, who was then known as Antony Dench, and the second applicant, were living together and at the time the second applicant expressly denied that the first applicant was A's father, he was not identified on the birth certificate. The second applicant had a history of severe and recurrent mental illness, diagnosed as manic depressive psychosis. A was taken into care. The applicants complained that they had been deprived of the care and custody of their son and thereby of their right to found a family, as well as of access to the child who had ultimately been freed for adoption. They alleged that they had not received a fair children's hearing and not had access to confidential reports and other documents submitted to the hearing. The first applicant also submitted that, as a natural father, he had no legal right to obtain custody of A or to participate in the custody or adoption proceedings and that, accordingly, he had been discriminated against.

Comm found unanimously V 8, by majority (11–2) NV 6(1) in respect of the first applicant, unanimously V 6(1) in respect of the second applicant, unanimously NV 14 in respect of the first applicant.

Court found unanimously no jurisdiction to entertain the applicants' complaints directed against the taking of A into care, the termination of access to A and the freeing of A for adoption, unanimously not necessary to rule whether it had jurisdiction to entertain the applicants' complaint relating to the fairness of the adoption proceedings, unanimously 6(1) not applicable to the first applicant's complaint, unanimously V 6(1) in respect of the second applicant, by majority (6–3) V 8 in respect of the first applicant, unanimously V 8 in respect of the second applicant, unanimously NV 14+6(1) or 14+8 in respect of the first applicant.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President (jpd), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm (jpd), Mr I Foighel, Sir John Freeland (jpd).

The compass of the case before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility. Accordingly, since the grievances in question were declared inadmissible by the Commission as being manifestly ill-founded, the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain them. In the light of the Court's finding in relation to the care and to the fact that full disclosure of relevant documents was made in the later adoption proceedings themselves, the Court did not consider it necessary to rule whether the scope of the case as referred to the Court also extended to the further complaint regarding fairness. The new material the applicants claimed was included in the Government's memorial and took the form either of further particulars as to the facts underlying the complaints declared admissible by the Commission or of legal argument relating to those facts.

The Court was not precluded from taking cognisance of that material in so far as it was judged to be pertinent.

A 6(1): In respect of the second applicant, A 6(1) was applicable to the care proceedings before the children's hearings and the Sheriff Court. The Court agreed with the Commission's reasoning that A 6(1) had no application to the complaint of the first applicant, that he was unable to see the confidential reports and documents submitted in the care proceedings. Even to the extent that the first applicant could claim 'civil rights' under Scots law in respect of the child A, the care proceedings in question did not involve the determination of any of those rights, since he had not taken the requisite prior step of seeking to obtain legal recognition of his status as a father. It was not necessary for the Court to resolve the disputed issue as to whether the children's hearing could be regarded as a tribunal within the meaning of A 6(1) in the present case. In this sensitive domain of family law there may be good reasons for opting for an adjudicatory body that did not have the composition or procedures of a court of law of the classic kind. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the special characteristics of the adjudication to be made, as a matter of general principle the right to a fair, adversarial, trial meant the opportunity to have knowledge of and comment on the observations filed or evidence adduced by the other party. In the present case, the lack of disclosure of such vital documents as social reports was capable of affecting the ability of participating parents not only to influence the outcome of the children's hearing in question but also to assess their prospects of making an appeal to the Sheriff Court. In relation to disputes between a parent and a local authority over children taken into care, the Sheriff Court satisfied the conditions of A 6(1) as far as its composition and jurisdiction were concerned. However, the requirement of an adversarial trial was not fulfilled before the Sheriff Court, any more than it had been on the relevant occasions before the children's hearing. Therefore, Mrs McMichael did not receive a fair hearing, within the meaning of A 6(1) at either of the two stages in the care proceedings concerning her son A and there had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

The mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted a fundamental element of family life and domestic measures hindering such enjoyment amounted to an interference with the right protected by A 8. In relation to both applicants the care and custody measures resulting from the procedures complained of not only came within the scope of A 8(1) but also involved an interference within the meaning of A 8(2). Whilst A 8 contained no explicit procedural requirements, the decision-making process leading to measures of interference had to be fair and such as to afford due respect to the interests safeguarded by A 8. After the initial denial by the second applicant of the first applicant's paternity of A, the two applicants had acted in concert in their endeavour to recover the custody of and have access to A and were living together and leading a joint family life. There was a difference in the nature of the interests protected by A 6(1) and 8. Thus, A 6(1) afforded a procedural safeguard, namely the 'right to a court' in the determination of one's 'civil rights and obligations'; whereas not only did the procedural requirement inherent in A 8 cover administrative procedures as well as judicial proceedings, but it was ancillary to the wider purpose of ensuring proper respect for, inter alia, family life. The difference between the purpose pursued by the respective safeguards afforded by A 6(1) and 8 might, in the light of the particular circumstances, justify the examination of the same set of facts under both Articles. In the present case, the facts complained of had repercussions not only on the conduct of judicial proceedings to which the second applicant was a party, but also on a fundamental element of family life of the two applicants. The Government had conceded, in the context of A 6(1), the unfair character of the care proceedings on specified occasions by reason of the inability of the second applicant or the first applicant acting as her representative to have sight of certain documents considered by the children's hearing and the Sheriff Court. The Court took note of that concession and found that in that respect the decision-making process determining the custody and access arrangements in regard to the child did not afford the requisite protection of the applicants' interests as safeguarded by A 8. Having regard to the approach taken in the present judgment in regard to the treatment of the applicants' complaint under A 8, the Court did not deem it appropriate to draw any material distinction between the two applicants as regards the extent of the violation found, despite some differences in their legal circumstances. There had been a breach of A 8 in respect of both applicants.

A difference of treatment was discriminatory if it had no reasonable and objective justification, that is, if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. The first applicant's complaint was essentially directed against his status as a natural father under Scots law. As the Commission remarked, it is axiomatic that the nature of the relationships of natural fathers with their children will inevitably vary, from ignorance and indifference at one end of the spectrum to a close stable relationship indistinguishable from the conventional matrimonial-based family unit at the other. As explained by the Government, the aim of the relevant legislation of 1986, was to provide a mechanism for identifying meritorious fathers who might be accorded parental rights, thereby protecting the interests of the child and the mother. In the Court's view, that aim was legitimate and the conditions imposed on natural fathers for obtaining recognition of their parental role respected the principle of proportionality. Therefore there was an objective and reasonable justification for the difference of treatment complained of. In conclusion, there had been no violation of A 14 taken in conjunction with A 6(1) or 8.

Megyeri v Germany (1993) 15 EHRR 584 92/49

[Application lodged 22.10.1986; Commission report 26.2.1991; Court Judgment 12.5.1992.

Mr Zoltan Istvan Megyeri was a Hungarian citizen living in Germany. On 14 March 1983 the Cologne Regional Court, before which the applicant was represented by officially-appointed counsel, ordered that he be detained in a psychiatric hospital. The court found that he had performed acts which constituted criminal offences (insulting behaviour, assault occasioning bodily harm, resisting the police, causing a traffic hazard and unauthorised departure from the scene of an accident) but that he could not be held responsible because he was suffering from schizophrenic psychosis with signs of paranoia. His applications for release were refused. In July 1986 the Aachen Regional Court considered the applicant's possible release. It relied on expert evidence and on its own impression of the applicant and considered that the applicant's continued detention was proportionate to the aim pursued, that was, the protection of the public. On 2 September 1986 the Cologne Court of Appeal dismissed his appeal against the Regional Court's decision. The applicant was not represented by counsel in the 1986 proceedings concerning his possible release. He complained that the failure to appoint a lawyer to assist him in the 1986 proceedings before the Aachen Regional Court and the Cologne Court of Appeal concerning his possible release had given rise to a violation of A 5(4).

Comm found unanimously V 5(4).

Court found unanimously V 5(4).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, M L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr F Bigi.

The Court recalled its case-law: A person of unsound mind who was compulsorily confined in a psychiatric institution for an indefinite or lengthy period was in principle entitled, at any rate where there was no automatic periodic review of a judicial character, to take proceedings at reasonable intervals before a court to put in issue the lawfulness of his detention. A 5(4) required that the procedure followed have a judicial character and give to the individual concerned guarantees appropriate to the kind of deprivation of liberty in question; in order to determine whether a proceeding provided adequate guarantees, regard had to be had to the particular nature of the circumstances in which such proceeding took place. The judicial proceedings referred to in A 5(4) did not always need to be attended by the same guarantees as those required under A 6(1) for civil or criminal litigation. None the less, it was essential that the person concerned should have access to a court and the opportunity to be heard either in person or, where necessary, through some form of representation. Special procedural safeguards might prove called for in order to protect the interests of persons who, on account of their mental disabilities, were not fully capable of acting for themselves. A 5(4) did not require that persons committed to care under the head of 'unsound mind' should themselves take the initiative in obtaining legal representation before having recourse to a court. It followed therefore that where a person was confined in a psychiatric institution on the ground of the commission of acts which constituted criminal offences but for which he could not be held responsible on account of mental illness, he should, unless there were special circumstances, receive legal assistance in subsequent proceedings relating to the continuation, suspension or termination of his detention. The importance of what was at stake for him – personal liberty – taken together with the very nature of his affliction – diminished mental capacity – compelled that conclusion. The Aachen Regional Court not only considered expert reports but also heard the applicant in person. It was doubtful whether the applicant, acting on his own, was able to marshal and present adequately points in his favour on the issue, involving as it did matters of medical knowledge and expertise. It was even more doubtful whether, on his own, he was in a position to address adequately the legal issue arising. By July 1986 he had already spent more than four years in a psychiatric hospital. As required by German law, his confinement was reviewed by the courts at yearly intervals and the 1986 proceedings before the Aachen Regional Court formed part of that series. Accordingly, whilst different considerations might apply, as regards the need to appoint counsel, where a detainee applied for release more frequently than at reasonable intervals, that was not the situation in this case. Nothing revealed that this was a case in which legal assistance was unnecessary, even if the applicant did not specifically ask the Aachen Regional Court or the Cologne Court of Appeal to assign counsel to him in the proceedings in question. Nor did the Court perceive any other special circumstances which would lead it to a different conclusion. There had therefore been a breach of A 5(4).

Mehemi v France 97/72

[Application lodged 25.8.1994; Commission report 15.5.1996; Court Judgment 26.9.1997]

Mr Ali Mehemi was an Algerian national who was born in France and had lived all of his life in France until being deported to Algeria (ie, 33 years) where he resided at the date of hearing. He went to school in France until the age of 17. His parents lived in France and had lived there for about 40 years. His two brothers and two sisters also lived in France. He was the father of three children of French nationality, born in 1982, 1983 and 1984 and, in 1986, had married their mother, an Italian national lawfully resident in France since 1978.

In January 1991 the applicant was convicted and sentenced to six years' imprisonment for possession and illegal importation of 7 kg of hashish together with eight other people. Subsequently his permanant exclusion from France was ordered on the grounds that 'public-policy considerations preclude the presence within French territory of an alien engaged as a principal in the offence of drug trafficking'. His appeal was rejected and the permanent exclusion order was enforced on 28 February 1995. He claimed that his expulsion from France was in breach of A 8.

Comm found by majority (10–3) V 8.

Court found, unanimously, V 8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr I Foighel, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr E Levits.

The applicant was born in France, had lived there for over 30 years until the permanent exclusion order was enforced and received all his schooling there. His parents, his two brothers (one of whom is French and the other the father of two French children) and his two sisters (one of whom is French and the other the wife of a French national) lived there. He was the father of three minor children born in France in 1982, 1983 and 1984, who had French nationality, and had kept in touch with them since he was deported. In 1986 he married their mother and it did not appear that any separation or divorce proceedings had subsequently been brought. Thus, the permanent exclusion order amounted to interference with the applicant's right to respect for his private and family life. The permanent exclusion order was in accordance with the law, being based on the Public Health Code. The interference sought to achieve aims compatible with the Convention, namely the prevention of disorder or crime. It was for the Contracting States to maintain public order, in particular by exercising their right, as a matter of well-established international law and subject to their treaty obligations, to control the entry and residence of aliens and notably to order the expulsion of aliens convicted of criminal offences. However, their decisions in this field must, in so far as they may interfere with a right protected under para 1 of A 8, be necessary in a democratic society, that is to say, justified by a pressing social need and, in particular, proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The Court's task was to ascertain whether the measure in issue struck a fair balance between the relevant interests, namely the applicant's right to respect for his private and family life, on the one hand, and the prevention of disorder or crime, on the other. The applicant was born in France, received all his schooling there and lived there until the age of 33, before the permanent exclusion order was enforced. His parents and his four brothers and sisters live there, as do his wife and his three minor children, who were born in France and have French nationality. It had not been established that the applicant had links with Algeria other than his nationality. He had made a number of trips to North Africa before he was deported, but to Morocco, not, with the exception of a brief visit, to Algeria. Furthermore, the Government's assertion that Mr Mehemi was a member of a trafficking network 'mainly composed of Algerians and Tunisians' was not based on any real evidence; on the contrary, the applicant's eight co-defendants included four French nationals, one Portuguese, one Franco-Tunisian, one Tunisian and one person born in Algeria of unspecified nationality. As regards establishing the household in Italy, while that was not inconceivable, since Mrs Mehemi was an Italian national, it would mean a radical upheaval for the couple's children. Moreover, because of the applicant's criminal record, there would no doubt be legal obstacles to his entry into and establishment in Italian territory which the Government had not shown to be surmountable. The fact that in 1989 the applicant had participated in a conspiracy to import a large quantity of hashish counted heavily against him. Nevertheless, in view of the applicant's lack of links with Algeria, the strength of his links with France and above all the fact that the order for his permanent exclusion from French territory separated him from his minor children and his wife, the measure in question was disproportionate to the aims pursued. There had accordingly been a breach of A 8.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction with regard to non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (FF 50,000).

Mr Pierre-André Melin had formerly practised as a lawyer. On 6 May 1985 the Nanterre Criminal Court convicted him of fraud and sentenced him to a suspended term of 16 months' imprisonment, combined with an order requiring him, inter alia, to compensate the victim for the damage which he had sustained. His appeals, conducted himself, to the Versailles Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation were dismissed. He complained that he had not received in good time a copy of the judgment of the Versailles Court of Appeal and that he had been informed neither of the time-limit for submitting a memorial to the Court of Cassation nor of the date of the hearing at which his appeal was examined.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(b) and (c).

Court found by majority (5–4) NV 6.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt (jd), President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr SK Martens, Mr R Pekkanen (jd), Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka (jd), Mr L Wildhaber (jd).

As the requirements of A 6(3)(b) and (c) were specific aspects of the right to a fair trial, guaranteed under A 6(1), the Court considered all the applicant's complaints in the light of the three provisions taken together. The applicant had practised as a lawyer and had worked in the chambers of a lawyer of the Conseil d'Etat and Court of Cassation Bar. He therefore knew the provisions of the legislation and the routines of judicial procedure. He could not claim that the authorities made it impossible for him to produce a memorial. As he had deliberately waived his right to be assisted by a lawyer, he was under a duty to show diligence himself. Accordingly, he did not suffer any interference with the effective enjoyment of the rights guaranteed under A 6.

Mellacher and Others v Austria (1990) 12 EHRR 391 89/24

[Applications lodged 5.8.1983, 22.5.1984 and 4.7.1984; Commission report 11.7.1988; Court Judgment 19.12.1989]

Mr Leopold and Mrs Maria Mellacher, the first applicants, Mr Johannes, Mr Ernst and Mr Anton Mölk and Mrs Maria Schmid, the second applicants, and Mrs Christiane Weiss-Tessbach and Mrs Maria Brenner-Felsach, the third applicants, were property owners who complained that the Austrian authorities had deprived them of a proportion of their future rental income by the operation of the Rent Act 1981. They invoked P1A1 and A 14.

Comm found unanimously V P1A1 first two applications, by a majority (10–1) NV P1A1 in respect of the third application, unanimously no separate issue under 14 in respect of the second application.

Court found by a majority (12–5) NV P1A1 in the first two applications, unanimously NV P1A1 in the third application, unanimously not necessary to examine 14+P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona (jd), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (jd), Mr F Gölcüklü (jd), Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt (jd), Mr A Spielmann (jd), Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel.

It was not disputed that the reductions in rent made pursuant to the Rent Act 1981 constituted an interference with the enjoyment of the applicants' rights as owners of the rented properties. The measures taken did not amount either to a formal or to a de facto expropriation, there was no transfer of the applicants' property, nor were they deprived of their right to use, let or sell it; the measures amounted to a control of the use of property. In order to implement social and economic policies, the legislature has to have a wide margin of appreciation both with regard to the existence of a problem of public concern warranting measures of control and as to the choice of the detailed rules for the implementation of such measures. The Court would not interfere with the legislature's judgment as to what was in the general interest unless it was manifestly without reasonable foundation. The explanations given for the legislation in question (to reduce excessive and unjustified disparities between rents for equivalent flats and to combat property speculation) could not be characterised as manifestly unreasonable; the Act had a legitimate aim in the general interest. In remedial social legislation and in particular in the field of rent control, it had to be open to the legislature to take measures affecting the further execution of previously concluded contracts in order to attain the aim of the policy adopted. Some factors in the Rent Act placed some landlords at a greater disadvantage than others. However, legislation instituting a system of rent control and aiming, inter alia, at establishing a standard of rents for equivalent apartments at an appropriate level had to, perforce, be general in nature. The exceptions and exclusions complained of could not be said to be inappropriate or disproportionate. Having taken into account the provisions of the Rent Act and the legitimate aims pursued by the legislation, the measures complained of did not did not fall outside the State's margin of appreciation.

The applicants, Ms Azize Mentes, Ms Mahile Turhalli and Ms Sulhiye Turhalli and Ms Sariye Uvat lived in south-east Turkey. Relying on A 3, 5, 6, 8, 13, 14 and 18 they complained that their homes had been burnt and that they had been forcibly and summarily expelled from their village by State security forces on 25 June 1993. The fourth applicant also invoked A 2 in relation to the death of her twins who were born prematurely after her expulsion from her home.

The applicants had not themselves approached any domestic authority with their Convention grievances. However, after becoming aware of their allegations, the competent public prosecutors did not carry out any meaningful investigation into the matter. The insecurity and vulnerability of the applicants' position following the destruction of their homes had to be borne in mind. In the absence of any convincing explanations from the Government in rebuttal, the applicants had demonstrated the existence of special circumstances which dispensed them at the time of the events complained of from the obligation to exhaust domestic remedies. In the exceptional circumstances of this case, the Court was not satisfied that remedies before the administrative and civil courts were adequate and sufficient in respect of the applicants' complaint that their homes had been destroyed by the security forces. The Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was dismissed. However, the ruling was confined to the exceptional circumstances of the present case and was not to be interpreted as a general statement that remedies were ineffective in this area of Turkey or that applicants were absolved from the obligation under A 26 to have normal recourse to the system of remedies which were available and functioning.

The establishment and verification of the facts were primarily a matter for the Commission. While the Court was not bound by the Commission's findings of fact and remained free to make its own appreciation in the light of all the material before it, it was only in exceptional circumstances that it would exercise its powers in this area. In the case under consideration, the Commission reached its findings of fact on the basis of an investigation, in the course of which documentary evidence, including written statements, was submitted and oral evidence of 11 witnesses was taken by three delegates at hearings in Ankara. The Court, having itself carefully examined the evidence gathered by the Commission, was satisfied that the facts as established were proved beyond reasonable doubt as far as concerned the first three applicants' allegations, but not those of the fourth applicant.

There was no reason to distinguish between the first applicant and the second and third applicants. Given her strong family connection and the nature of her residence, the first applicant's occupation of the house fell within scope of A 8 of the Convention. Furthermore, the facts established by Commission and which Court had accepted disclosed a particularly grave interference with the first three applicants' right to respect for private life, family life and home as guaranteed by A 8 and that the measure was devoid of justification. There had therefore been a breach of A 8 with respect to the first three applicants.

In view of the specific circumstances of the case and the finding of a violation under A 8 it was not necessary to examine further the allegation under A 3.

Before the Court, the applicants stated that they did not wish to pursue the complaint under A 5(1) and the Court did not find it necessary to deal with the matter of its own motion.

It was appropriate to examine the complaint under A 6 in relation to the more general obligation on States under A 13 to provide an effective remedy in respect of violations of the Convention and therefore it was not necessary to determine whether there has been a violation of A 6(1).

Although the applicants had not approached any domestic authority before bringing their application to Strasbourg, the manner in which investigations were conducted, following the Commission's communication of the application to the respondent Government, could be taken into account in examination of the applicants' initial complaint that they did not dispose of an effective remedy. No thorough and effective investigation had been conducted into the applicants' allegations and this had resulted in undermining the exercise of any remedies at their disposal, including the pursuit of compensation before the courts. There had therefore been a breach of A 13 in respect of the first three applicants.

On the basis of the facts as established by the Commission there was no violation of A 14 or 18.

The evidence established by the Commission was insufficient to allow the Court to reach a conclusion concerning the existence of any administrative practice of the violation of A 8 and 13.

The fourth applicant accepted before the Court that no facts had been established with respect to the fourth applicant's specific complaints.

Costs and expenses (GBP 27,795 to first three applicants less 13,295 FF to first three applicants). Messina v Italy 93/13

[Application lodged 27.10.1987; Commission report 20.2.1992; Court Judgment 26.2.1993]

Mr Antonio Messina was arrested on 18 October 1985. He was charged with membership of a 'Mafia' organisation and with drugs offences. The applicant remained in detention on remand. During his detention, the applicant had met with problems in connection with the forwarding of his mail: according to the applicant, he never received the correspondence which had been sent to him in prison, with the exception of a letter from his lawyer. The correspondence allegedly included a telegram from his wife, which had been sent in April 1987. The applicant claimed that he had on several occasions asked the investigating judge for his mail to be delivered, but to no avail. The Government claimed that the applicant's correspondence had been subject to inspection by the investigating judge from 4 November 1985 onwards. Without being able to provide further details, they stated that the applicant had been officially informed of this, at the latest, when the first duly approved letter reached him. According to the Government, nine letters addressed to the applicant or sent by him were submitted for inspection, although they conceded that the applicant had on several occasions complained in writing that he had not received the letters sent to him in prison. The applicant complained of the length of the criminal proceedings brought against him and of interference with his right to respect for his correspondence.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) and V 8.

Court held unanimously V 6(1), and by a majority (7–2) V 8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr F Bigi.

The applicant alleged that the criminal proceedings brought against him had not been conducted within a 'reasonable time' as required by A 6(1). The period to be taken into consideration began with the applicant's arrest on 18 October 1985, and had not ended at the time of the hearing as the proceedings were still pending in the Marsala District Court. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. In view of the nature of the charges preferred against the applicant, the judicial authorities must have encountered some difficulties linked to the number of people to be questioned and the number of witnesses to be heard, as well as to the need for evidence to be taken on commission. However, it was not reasonable in this case to have a lapse of time which was already more than seven years for proceedings which had still to be completed. There was therefore a violation of A 6(1).

Regarding the complaint under A 8, whether there was in fact 'interference by a public authority' – over and above the requirement of the investigating judge's approval – was disputed. The applicant claimed that he had never received the relevant letters, post card and telegram, whereas the Government maintained that they had been delivered. The Court was confronted with a dispute concerning the exact circumstances of the case rather than a legal problem. The information obtained led the Commission, to which the establishment and verification of the facts primarily fell, to give credence to the applicant's allegations, and at the same time the Government conceded that the applicant had made written complaint of not receiving his correspondence. A Contracting State could not claim to have discharged its obligations under A 8 merely by supplying a record of a prisoner's incoming mail. In the absence of documents or other evidence such as might establish the contrary, the Court could not be certain that the items in question reached their addressee, and accordingly concluded that there was a violation of A 8.

Miailhe v France (1993) 16 EHRR 332 93/5

[Application lodged 11.12.1986; Commission report 8.10.1991; Court Judgment 25.2.1993]

The three applicants were Mr William Miailhe, who had dual French and Philippine nationality, was a company director, and was also honorary consul of the Philippines in Bordeaux, Mrs Victoria Miailhe and Mrs Brigitte Miailhe, both of French nationality, the mother and the wife of the first applicant. In January 1983 customs officers accompanied by a senior police officer made two searches of premises which housed the head offices of the companies managed by Mr Miailhe and which served as the Philippines consulate. The searches and seizures were based on the Customs Code and were part of an investigation to determine whether the applicants were to be regarded as being resident in France and whether they had contravened the legislation on financial dealings with foreign countries. Documents were seized and a judicial investigation in respect of the three applicants was commenced on 19 February 1985. The applicants' proceedings against the Director General of Customs and Excise to have the seizures declared null and void in the Paris District Court, tribunal de grande instance and Court of Cassation were unsuccessful. The applicants complained that the searches and seizures made on their premises infringed A 8 and 13.

Comm found by majority (11–7) NV 8, unanimously NV 13.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (8–1) V 8, unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber.

The applicants brought proceedings to have customs reports on the facts and on the seizures declared null and void and pursued them to a conclusion, without omitting to plead A 8. They could not be criticised for not having made use of a legal remedy (complaint before the Criminal Court) which would have been directed to essentially the same end. The Government's objection was therefore dismissed.

There was an interference with the applicants' private life and their correspondence. It was not necessary to determine the issue of whether the interferences should have been judicially authorised in order to be in accordance with the law, they were in other respects incompatible with A 8. The interferences had a legitimate aim of the economic well-being of the country. Contracting States had a certain margin of appreciation in assessing the need for an interference, but that went hand in hand with European supervision. The exceptions provided for in para 2 of A 8 were to be interpreted narrowly and the need for them in a given case had to be convincingly established. Due to the difficulties States encountered in preventing capital outflows and tax evasion it might be necessary to have recourse to measures such as house searches and seizures in order to obtain physical evidence of exchange-control offences and, where appropriate, to prosecute those responsible. Nevertheless, the relevant legislation and practice had to afford adequate and effective safeguards against abuse. That was not so in the instant case. At the material time the customs authorities had very wide powers; in particular, they had exclusive competence to assess the expediency, number, length and scale of inspections. Above all, in the absence of any requirement of a judicial warrant the restrictions and conditions provided for in law appeared too lax and full of loopholes for the interferences with the applicants' rights to have been strictly proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The seizures made on the applicants' premises were wholesale and, above all, indiscriminate, to such an extent that the customs considered several thousand documents to be of no relevance to their inquiries and returned them to the applicants. There had therefore been a breach of A 8.

The applicants did not rely on A 13 before the Court, which did not consider that it had to examine the issue of its own motion.

A 50 reserved.

Miailhe (No 2) v France (1997) 23 EHRR 491 96/36

[Application lodged 16.9.1991; Commission report 11.4.1995; Court Judgment 26.9.1996]

Mr William Miailhe, who had dual French and Philippine nationality and was formerly honorary consul of the Philippines in Bordeaux was convicted of tax evasion. Relying on A 6 he complained that he had not had access to all the documents relied on by the Revenue which had been seized in violation of A 8.

Comm found by a majority (11–2) V 6(1).

Court dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found unanimously NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr P Jambrek, Mr P Kûris.

The applicant complained that he had not had access to all the documents held by the Revenue and that this had contravened the principle of equality of arms during the administrative stage before the Tax Offences Board (CIF) gave its opinion and had infringed the rights of the defence during the criminal trial. He relied on A 6(1). The Government's preliminary objections that the application was incompatible ratione materiae and that domestic remedies had not been exhausted were devoid of purpose. The Court noted that the documents seized by the customs were passed on by them to the Revenue in May 1983. Three years later the Revenue lodged a complaint alleging tax evasion against the applicant. It had already served supplementary tax assessments on him in 1985. The applicant now complained that he had not been given the documents seized by the customs in breach of A 8 so that he could contest the fraud charges by proving that he was resident for tax purposes in the Philippines, both during the criminal proceedings and during the preceding stage before the CIF. The Miailhe (No 1) judgment on the merits was given on 25 February 1993, after the customs had passed documents on to the Revenue. Of the private letters and personal documents referred to in the judgment, those which were used for the judicial investigation in the criminal proceedings had been annexed to the summary tax-audit report filed by the Revenue in support of its complaint. At the investigating judge's request, the Revenue added documents from the Philippines. All those documents were in the criminal case file, to which the applicant had access. That file did not contain all of the documents provided by the Philippine authorities; however, the documents relevant to the criminal case were added to the file during the judicial investigation, at the request of the investigating judge. By himself filing some of the documents from the Philippines, the applicant had the possibility of establishing the genuineness of his links with the Philippines. Such evidence, however, was relevant only to the first offence of failure to declare his general income for the year 1981, as the second offence concerned agricultural and land income that he had declared in France. It was not for the Court to substitute its view for that of the national courts which were primarily competent to determine the admissibility of evidence. It had to nevertheless satisfy itself that the proceedings as a whole were fair, having regard to any possible irregularities before the case was brought before the courts of trial and appeal and checking that those courts had been able to remedy them if there were any. In the instant case the ordinary courts did, within the limits of their jurisdiction, consider the objections of nullity raised by the applicant and dismissed them. Furthermore, it appeared clearly from their decisions that they based their rulings solely on the documents in the case file, on which the parties had presented argument at hearings before them, thereby ensuring that the applicant had a fair trial. The failure to produce certain documents during the procedure of consulting the CIF or in the criminal proceedings therefore did not infringe the applicant's defence rights or the principle of equality of arms. The Court noted that before the CIF the taxpayer could, within 30 days of the application to it, communicate any information he deemed necessary. When it was consulted on the advisability of lodging a complaint for offences the CIF would give an opinion which was binding on the Minister. The criminal courts had unfettered discretion to assess the facts of an alleged fraud and may acquit. The fact that there were no adversarial proceedings before the CIF gave its opinion may in some cases give rise to a fear that the taxpayer would find himself in a more difficult position. Nevertheless, only the preliminary intervention of an advisory body was concerned. In the instant case there was a judicial investigation and no direct summons. Furthermore, the criminal proceedings that were set in motion following the Revenue's complaint were conducted at two levels of jurisdiction – first instance and appeal – and this enabled the applicant, to whom it was further open to lodge an appeal on points of law, to present argument on the prosecution evidence and the charges against him. The proceedings in issue, taken as a whole, were fair. There was no breach of A 6(1).

Milasi v Italy (1988) 10 EHRR 333 87/11

[Application Lodged 18.7.1983; Commission report 4.12.1985; Court Judgment 25.6.1987]

In June 1973 Mr Elio Milasi was informed by the Italian Public Prosecutor that criminal proceedings were being instituted against him for public order offences in relation to the Fascist Party. The various matters were not finally disposed of until a District Court gave judgment on 7 March 1983, almost 10 years later.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr J Gersing.

The period to be considered began not on 18 June 1973, when the applicant was informed that the proceedings were being instituted, but only on 1 August 1973, when the Italian declaration recognising the right of individual petition took effect. In order to determine the reasonableness of the length of time which elapsed after that date, regard had to be had, however, to the state of the case at that moment. The period ended on 7 March 1983, when the Reggio Calabria District Court gave judgment. The period to be considered amounted to more than nine years, seven months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed according to the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. No problem arose as regards the applicant's conduct. The charges against the accused did not raise any difficult points of law. The facts to be investigated and the procedure to be followed were somewhat complicated on account of the number of persons involved, 35, but that could not justify a delay of nearly ten years. The Convention placed Contracting States under a duty to organise their legal systems so as to enable the courts to comply with the requirements of A 6(1), including that of trial within a reasonable time; nonetheless, a temporary backlog of business did not involve liability on the part of the Contracting States provided that they took, with the requisite promptness, remedial action to deal with an exceptional situation of this kind. Despite the efforts made to improve the functioning of the Reggio Calabria District Court, the applicant had to wait nearly 10 years before the criminal charge against him was the subject of a judicial determination at first instance. A period of that length could not be regarded as the consequence of a passing crisis. The Court did not underestimate the importance of the political and social background, however, it does not consider that they justified a delay of nearly 10 years which, moreover, continued well beyond the cessation of the disturbances in Reggio Calabria. In the light of all the circumstances of the case, the applicant was not tried within a reasonable time and there was accordingly a violation of A 6(1).

Minelli v Switzerland (1983) 5 EHRR 554 83/3

Application lodged 20.6.1979; Commission report 16 May 1981; Court Judgment 25.3.1983]

Mr Ludwig Minelli was a journalist. As a result of an article he published on 27 January 1972, containing accusations of fraud against a company and its director, a criminal complaint of defamation committed through the press was brought by them against him. On 12 May 1976, the Chamber of the Canton of Zürich Assize Court decided that it could not hear the complaint against the applicant because the absolute limitation period of four years had expired on 27 January 1976. It directed that the applicant should bear two-thirds of the court costs and also ordered him to pay to each of the complainants compensation in respect of their expenses. An appeal against that decision, relying on A 6(2), was dismissed by the Court of Cassation on 30 September 1976. A further appeal was dismissed by the Public-Law Chamber of the Federal Court on 16 May 1979. He complained that the decision of 12 May 1976 of the Chamber of the Canton of Zürich Assize Court, ordering him to pay costs and compensation, amounted to 'a punishment on suspicion' and thus violated A 6(2).

Court found unanimously V 6(2).

The infringement of an individual's 'civil' right sometimes also constituted a criminal offence. To determine whether there was a 'criminal charge', an examination had to be made of the situation of the accused – as it arose under the domestic legal rules in force – in the light of the object of A 6, namely, the protection of the rights of the defence. In Switzerland, defamation proceedings were criminal in nature. A 6(2) governed criminal proceedings in their entirety, irrespective of the outcome of the prosecution, and not solely the examination of the merits of the charge. In this case, the apportionment of the costs was the corollary of and necessary complement to the termination of the prosecution. Although limitation had extinguished the criminal action instituted against the applicant, an official procedural act of the Chamber of the Assize Court was required to establish the fact, and it was precisely such a finding that was contained in the decision complained of. The wording, that 'the charge cannot be heard' and then that 'the accused' had to bear some of the costs and expenses, that at that final stage of the proceedings the Chamber of the Assize Court still regarded the applicant as being 'charged with a criminal offence', within the meaning of A 6. A 6(2) was therefore applicable in the case.

The presumption of innocence would be violated if, without the accused's having previously been proved guilty according to law and, notably, without his having had the opportunity of exercising his rights of defence, a judicial decision concerning him reflected an opinion that he was guilty. That might be so even in the absence of any formal finding; it sufficed that there was some reasoning suggesting that the court regarded the accused as guilty. The reasoning of the Chamber of the Assize Court showed that it was satisfied of the guilt of the applicant, an accused who had not had the benefit of the guarantees contained A 6(1) and 6(3). Notwithstanding the absence of a formal finding and despite the use of certain cautious phraseology ('in all probability', 'very probably'), the Chamber proceeded to make appraisals that were incompatible with respect for the presumption of innocence. The Federal Court judgment added certain nuances to the decision of the Assize Court, however, it was confined to clarifying the reasons for that decision, without altering their meaning or scope. By rejecting the applicant's appeal, the judgment confirmed the decision in law; at the same time, it approved the substance of the decision on the essential points. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(2).

Adequate compensation furnished by the finding of a violation. Costs and expenses (CHF 8,668.65).

Miragall Escolano and Others v Spain 00/9

[Applications lodged 1997 and 1998; Court Judgment 25.1.2000]

The National Order of Pharmacists challenged the validity of a decree changing the profit margins of pharmacists. The Supreme Court annulled that decree. Its decision was served three days later on the National Order of Pharmacists, but not on the applicants, who were not parties to the proceedings. The decision was published some months later in the Official Gazette. The applicants filed applications with the public authority for compensation for the damage caused to them by the annulled decree. Since the public authority did not respond, the applicants commenced proceedings in the High Court. The High Court rejected their claims on the ground that their applications for compensation had been filed with the public authority one year and two days after the delivery of the decision quashing the decree and were therefore out of time. The applicants' argument before the Constitutional Court at that time should have started running on the date of publication of the decision in the Official Gazette or the date of notification of the decision to the National Order of Pharmacists. The applicants complained of lack of access to a court.

Court found by majority (6–1) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr M Pellonpää (d), President, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mrs N Vajic, Mr MJ Hedigan.

Interpretation of the provisions governing the time for entering an appeal should not have the effect of depriving the public of the remedies available. In this case, it was highly unlikely that the applicants had knowledge of a decision which was not addressed to them and delivered in a case in which they were not parties. In this context, the High Court's decision to reject their appeal on points of law for being out of time on the ground that the appeal should have been lodged within the time-limit of one year running from the date of publication of the court's decision was an unreasonable interpretation of a procedural requirement and infringed the right to effective judicial protection. The date on which time started to run for the purpose of calculating final dates for appeals had to be the date on which the public could actually have learned of the court decisions which concerned them. The purpose of notification was to allow the parties to be informed of the court's decision so that should the need arise, they could exercise their right of appeal. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Mitap and Müftüoglu v Turkey (1996) 22 EHRR 209 96/12

[Application lodged 14.9.1989; Commission report 8.12.1994; Court Judgment 25.3.1996]

Mr Nasuh Mitap was an economist and Mr Abdullah Oguzhan Müftüoglu was a lawyer. After being arrested by the Ankara police, they were placed in police custody, Mr Mitap on 22 January 1981 and Mr Müftüoglu the following day, on the ground that they were members of the central committee of the Dev-Yol (Revolutionary Way) organisation. They were remanded in custody. They made numerous unsuccessful applications for conditional release. In July 1989, the Martial Law Court found them guilty and sentenced them to life imprisonment. They were released on parole on 23 July 1991. On 28 December 1995, the Court of Cassation upheld the penalties of the lower court. The applicants complained of the length of their detention pending trial, that their case had not been heard within a reasonable time, by a tribunal established by law or fairly by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Comm found unanimously V 5(3), V 6(1).

Court found unanimously no jurisdiction to deal with complaints relating to the length of detention pending trial, lawfulness, independence and impartiality of the Martial Law Court and the fairness of the proceedings before it or the objections raised on these points by the Government, found V 6(1) on account of the length of the criminal proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr P Jambrek.

Turkey accepted the Court's jurisdiction only in respect of facts or events that had occurred since 22 January 1990, when the relevant declaration was deposited. Of the applicants' complaints, only that relating to the excessive length of the criminal proceedings in issue satisfied that condition. The other complaints therefore fell outside the Court's jurisdiction. In addition, the Court could only deal with the complaint relating to the length of the criminal proceedings as from 22 January 1990. However, in doing so, it took account of the state of the proceedings at the time when the declaration was deposited.

The proceedings began on 22 and 23 January 1981, when the applicants were arrested and placed in police custody; they ended on 28 December 1995 with the judgment of the Court of Cassation. They thus lasted just under 15 years. However, only the period of nearly six years that elapsed after 22 January 1990, the date of Turkey's declaration, could be considered. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, regard being had to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The case was complex, but no evidence was submitted capable of justifying such a lengthy period, especially as account had to be taken of the fact that the proceedings at first instance lasted approximately eight years and six months. The length of the criminal proceedings in issue contravened A 6(1).

Mlynek v Austria (1994) 18 EHRR 591 92/66

Application lodged 21.3.1989; Commission report 9.12.1991; Court Judgment 27.10.1992]

On 21 May 1980, criminal proceedings were brought against Mr Hannes Mlynek which led to his conviction, on 30 May 1984, on counts of misappropriation of funds and fraud. On 30 January 1987, the Supreme Court quashed the judgment and remitted the case to the same court, which reopened the proceedings on 11 January 1988. The applicant lodged a first application with the European Commission of Human Rights, which on 10 March 1988 found that the length of the proceedings had exceeded a 'reasonable time'. The Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe recommended that the Government pay the applicant ATS 275,000 as just satisfaction. In the meantime, after 33 days of hearings, including, inter alia, the taking of evidence from some hundred witnesses, the Regional Court had, on 23 March 1988, sentenced the applicant to three years' imprisonment, two of which were suspended, for misappropriation of funds and negligent bankruptcy. The Supreme Court quashed the judgment on 1 June 1990 and once again remitted the case to the Vienna Regional Court. The proceedings were still pending. The applicant lodged a second application with the Commission complaining of the length of the proceedings after 10 March 1988.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached between the Government and the applicant. It discerned no reason of public policy militating against striking the case out of the list.

Modinos v Cyprus (1993) 16 EHRR 485 93/17

[Application lodged 22.5.1989; Commission report 3.12.1991; Court Judgment 22.4.1993]

Mr Alecos Modinos was a homosexual involved in a sexual relationship with another male adult. He was the President of the 'Liberation Movement of Homosexuals in Cyprus'. He stated that he suffered great strain, apprehension and fear of prosecution by reason of the legal provisions which criminalised certain homosexual acts. He complained that the prohibition on male homosexual activity constituted a continuing interference with his right to respect for private life.

Comm found unanimously V 8.

Court found by majority (8–1) V 8.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher (c), Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr I Foighel, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr G Pikis (d), ad hoc judge.

The prohibition of male homosexual conduct in private between adults still remained on the statute book. Moreover, the Supreme Court of Cyprus in another case considered that the relevant provisions of the Criminal Code violated neither the Convention nor the Constitution. Whatever the status in domestic law of those remarks, the Court could not fail to take into account such a statement from the highest court of the land on matters so pertinent to the issue before it. Although, since the Dudgeon v UK judgment, the Attorney-General had followed a consistent policy of not bringing criminal proceedings in respect of private homosexual conduct on the basis that the relevant law was a dead letter, nevertheless, the policy provided no guarantee that action would not be taken by a future Attorney-General to enforce the law, particularly when regard was had to statements by Government ministers which appeared to suggest that the relevant provisions of the Criminal Code were still in force. Moreover, the applicant's private behaviour could be the subject of investigation by the police or an attempt could be made to bring a private prosecution against him. Against that background, the existence of the prohibition continuously and directly affected the applicant's private life. There was therefore an interference with the applicant's rights. The Government had limited their submissions to maintaining that there was no interference with the applicant's rights and had not sought to argue that there existed a justification under A 8(2) for the impugned legal provisions. In the light of that concession and having regard to the Court's case-law, a re-examination of that question was not called for. Accordingly, there was a breach of A 8.

[Application lodged 14 May 1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 26.2.1992]

On 28 February 1985 Mrs Angelina Monaco took proceedings against the Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale (INPS) before the Rome magistrate's court in order to establish her disability pension right. On 30 October 1985 the magistrate's court dismissed her claim. She appealed and in March 1989 the court allowed her claim. The text of the decision was lodged with the registry on 27 November 1989. She complained of the length of the civil proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, M C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr S K Martens.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 28 February 1985 when the proceedings against the INPS were instituted in the magistrate's court. It ended, at the latest, on 27 November 1990 when the judgment of the Rome District Court became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Special diligence was necessary in employment disputes, which included pensions disputes. The Government pleaded the backlog of cases in the relevant courts, but A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The present case did not give rise to any complex question of fact or law. Moreover the proceedings were conducted at a normal pace in the magistrate's court. In addition, the State could not be held responsible for the period of approximately ten and a half months which elapsed between the decision of 30 October 1985 and the filing of the applicant's appeal; nor was it answerable for the year which went by before the judgment, which was lodged with the registry on 27 November 1989, became final. On the other hand, the appeal proceedings were dormant for more than two years and it was hard to understand why it should have taken more than eight months to lodge the judgment in question with the registry. Accordingly and in view of what was at stake in the proceedings for the applicant, the Court could not regard as reasonable the lapse of time in the present case. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Monnell and Morris v United Kingdom (1988) 10 EHRR 205 87/3

Mr Brian Arthur Monnell was convicted on 4 September 1981 of burglary and pleaded guilty to other offences and was sentenced to a total of three years and nine months imprisonment. Against the advice of his counsel he appealed. The notice of appeal warned inter alia that a Judge could refuse the application and direct that part of the time in custody after putting in the notice of application should not count towards the sentence. A renewed application to a Court of three Judges could also result in a direction of more loss of time. The result would be a later date of release. On 20 May 1982, the full Court of Appeal rejected his application and ordered that 28 days spent by him in custody pending the hearing of his application should not count towards his sentence.

Mr Neville Morris was sentenced after conviction in August 1980 of conspiracy to supply heroin to three and a half years' imprisonment. Against the advice of his counsel he appealed to the Court of Appeal. He received the warning concerning loss of time. On 27 October 1981, the full Court of Appeal refused his application and ordered that the 56 days of the period spent in custody by him awaiting the outcome of his application for leave to appeal did not count towards service of his sentence.

Both applicants complained that the loss-of-time orders made by the Court of Appeal resulted in a deprivation of liberty not permitted by A 5, that they had been denied a fair trial in breach of A 6 because they had not been allowed to attend or be represented in the proceedings before the court, and that the loss-of-time procedure was discriminatory.

Comm found by majority (10–1) V 5(1), (9–2) V 6 in regard to both applicants, unanimously not necessary to examine separately whether there had been a breach of 14+5 or (7–4) 6.

Court found by majority (5–2) NV 5(1), (6–1) 6 applicable, (5–2) NV 6(1), NV 6(3)(c), unanimously NV 14+5 or 14+6.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr J Gersing (so), Mr A Spielmann (d).

The contested periods of detention fell to be examined in the first place under A 5(1)(a). The principal issue for decision was whether the periods of detention in question were undergone 'after conviction by a competent court', within the meaning of that sub-para. Each applicant was the subject of a conviction by a competent court. The word 'after' in sub-paragraph (a) did not simply mean that the detention had to follow the conviction in point of time: in addition, the detention had to result from, follow and depend upon or occur by virtue of the conviction. In short, there had to be a sufficient causal connection between the conviction and the deprivation of liberty at issue. The effect of a loss-of-time direction was a later date of release. Whilst the loss of time ordered by the Court of Appeal was not treated under domestic law as part of the applicants' sentences as such, it did form part of the period of detention which resulted from the overall sentencing procedure that followed conviction. As a matter of English law, a sentence of imprisonment passed by a Crown Court was to be served subject to any order which the Court of Appeal might, in the event of an unsuccessful application for leave to appeal, make as to loss of time. The power to order loss of time was exercised to discourage abuse of the Court's own procedures. As such, it was an inherent part of the criminal appeal process following conviction of an offender and pursued a legitimate aim under A 5(1)(a). The technical and formal difference in the way in which sentencing procedures were arranged in the UK as compared with other Convention countries was not such as to exclude the applicability of A 5(1)(a) in the present case. There was a sufficient and legitimate connection for the purposes of the deprivation of liberty permitted under A 5(1)(a), between the conviction of each applicant and the additional period of imprisonment undergone as a result of the loss-of-time order made by the Court of Appeal. The time spent in custody by each applicant under that head was accordingly to be regarded as 'detention of a person after conviction by a competent court', within the meaning of A 5(1)(a). The Court was satisfied in the circumstances of the present case as to the lawfulness and procedural propriety of the contested periods of loss of liberty. The relevant rules and procedures under English law were properly observed by the English courts in relation to the making of the loss-of-time orders. Those orders depriving the applicants of their liberty issued from and were executed by an appropriate authority and were not arbitrary. The contested deprivation of liberty had, therefore, to be found to have been both lawful and effected in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law. There had accordingly been no breach of A 5(1) in respect of either applicant.

In accordance with the procedure normally followed before the Court of Appeal, the applicants were not present in person nor heard in oral argument in the leave-to-appeal proceedings which resulted in their being ordered to lose time in the calculation of their service of sentence. The manner in which A 6(1) and (3)(c) was to be applied in relation to appellate or cassation courts depended upon the special features of the proceedings involved. Account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings conducted in the domestic legal order and of the role of the appellate or cassation court. At first instance before the Crown Court each applicant had received the benefit of a fair trial. The limited nature of the subsequent issue of the grant or refusal of leave to appeal did not call for oral argument at a public hearing or the personal appearance of the two men before the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal's power to direct loss of time was intended to serve as a deterrent against clearly unmeritorious applications for leave to appeal. The aim pursued by the domestic legislation was a legitimate one in the interests of the proper administration of justice. The principle of equality of arms was respected in that the prosecution, like the two accused, was not represented before either the single judge or the full Court of Appeal. However, even in the absence of a prosecuting party, a trial would not be fair if it took place in such conditions as to put the accused unfairly at a disadvantage. The applicants had the benefit of free legal advice on appeal but both chose to ignore the advice of their trial counsel that there were no reasonable prospects of successfully appealing. Both were aware of the warnings as to loss of time. Nevertheless and despite the fact that the single judge had refused leave, they renewed their applications to the full Court of Appeal on the same grounds as in their original applications. They were afforded the opportunity to submit written grounds of appeal. Both the single judge and the full Court of Appeal had before them all the relevant papers, including the grounds of appeal, a transcript of the trial and, for Mr Monnell, the social enquiry and psychiatric reports prepared on him. Under para 6(3)(c) they were guaranteed the right to be given legal assistance free only so far as the interests of justice so required. The interests of justice could not, however, be taken to require an automatic grant of legal aid whenever a convicted person, with no objective likelihood of success, wished to appeal after having received a fair trial at first instance in accordance with A 6. Each applicant benefited from free legal assistance both at his trial and in being advised as to whether he had any arguable grounds of appeal. The issue to be decided did not call, as a matter of fairness, for oral submissions on behalf of the applicants in addition to the written submissions and material already before the Court of Appeal. In short, the interests of justice and fairness could, in the circumstances, be met by the applicants being able to present relevant considerations through making written submissions. The Court also bore in mind that, as the power was exercised in practice, the maximum loss of time risked was in the order of two months and not the whole of the period spent in custody between conviction and determination by the Court of Appeal. The Court had no cause to doubt that the Court of Appeal's decision to refuse the applicants leave to appeal and, further, to impose loss of time was based on a full and thorough evaluation of the relevant factors. Having regard to the special features of the context in which the power to order loss of time was exercised and to the circumstances of the case, the Court found that neither applicant was denied a fair procedure as guaranteed by A 6(1) and (3)(c). There had accordingly been no breach of either of those provisions of the Convention.

The aim pursued by the Court of Appeal's power to order loss of time was to expedite the process of hearing applications and so to reduce the period spent in custody by an applicant with a meritorious appeal. The great majority of applications for leave to appeal were lodged by those in custody. That being so, even assuming that the situation of the applicants was comparable to that of convicted persons at liberty, the difference in treatment complained of had an objective and reasonable justification. Therefore no violation of A 14 and 5.

In so far as the risk of loss of time could operate in practice as an impediment to access to the Court of Appeal by convicted prisoners as compared with convicted persons at liberty, there was a difference of treatment for the purposes of A 14. However, that difference of treatment had an objective and reasonable justification for the same reasons as above. Therefore no violation of A 14 and 6.

Monnet v France (1994) 18 EHRR 27 93/45

[Application lodged 26.11.1987; Commission report 1.7.1992; Court Judgment 27.10.1993]

In March 1969 Mr Claude Monnet, a doctor specialising in radiology, married Miss C Grosclaude. They had two children; the first was born on 8 January 1971 and the second on 2 August 1973. On 15 September 1981, the applicant's wife filed an application for judicial separation and on 30 December 1981 she instituted judicial separation proceedings from him. On 12 October 1988, the Court of Cassation gave its judgment. The applicant complained of the length of the judicial separation and divorce proceedings.

Comm found by majority (7–1) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 15 September 1981, the date on which the petition for judicial separation was filed. It ended on 12 October 1988, when the Court of Cassation delivered its judgment. It therefore lasted seven years and approximately one month. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, notably the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties and of the relevant authorities. The large number of interlocutory applications filed by the parties, especially the applicant, made the case complex. Only delays for which the State could be held responsible could justify a finding that a reasonable time had been exceeded. The parties, especially the applicant, contributed considerably to prolonging the proceedings. With regard to the conduct of the authorities, in respect of the financial report, the applicant waited seven months before depositing the amount fixed by the relevant judge, thus making it impossible to appoint an accountant earlier. The social inquiry report showed that the expert had encountered all manner of difficulties in his dealings with the Monnets, who were bitterly divided on the question of the children. The period of one year did not appear unreasonable in view of the consequences that the report might have on the future of those concerned. The two years that the appeal proceedings lasted did not appear excessive in the light of the conduct of the applicant, who caused the adjournment. The cassation proceedings did not give rise to criticism. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case and in particular to the role of the parties in the conduct of the proceedings, the total length of the proceedings was not excessive.

Moore and Gordon v United Kingdom (2000) 29 EHRR 728 99/56

[Applications lodged 10.6.1997 and 7.8.1997; Court Judgment 29.9.1999]

Mr Jonathan Moore and Mr Garrick Gordon were serving in the Royal Air Force and were tried by district courts-martial. The Air Force Act 1955 applied in their case. Central to the system under the 1955 Act was the role of the 'convening officer' who assumed responsibility for every case to be tried by court-martial. Mr Moore was found guilty of common assault and fined. His subsequent petitions and appeals, as far as the single judge of the Courts-Martial Appeal Court, were unsuccessful. Mr Gordon was found guilty of two charges of disgraceful conduct of an indecent kind and he was sentenced to a reduction in rank. His subsequent petitions and appeals, as far as the Courts-Martial Appeal Court, were unsuccessful. The applicants complained that they did not have a fair or public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

The Court noted the potential penalty of six months' imprisonment in Mr Moore's case and of two years' imprisonment in Mr Gordon's case, together with the nature of the charges of which the applicants were found guilty. It considered that the applicants' court-martial proceedings involved the determination of charges of a criminal nature within the meaning of A 6(1).

In the Findlay judgment, the Court held that a general court-martial convened pursuant to the Army Act 1955 did not meet the requirements of independence and impartiality set down by A 6(1) in view, in particular, of the central part played in its organisation by the convening officer. The convening officer was central to the applicant's prosecution and was closely linked to the prosecution authorities; the members of the court-martial were subordinate to the convening officer; and the convening officer also acted as confirming officer. A district court-martial convened pursuant to the Air Force Act 1955 had similar deficiencies. In the present case district air force courts-martial were convened pursuant to the Air Force Act 1955 to try the applicants. There was no reason to distinguish the present cases from those of Mr Findlay, Mr Coyne or Mr Cable and Others as regards the part played by the convening officer in the organisation of their courts-martial. Accordingly, the applicants' courts-martial did not meet the independence and impartiality requirements of A 6(1). Since the applicants were faced with, inter alia, charges of a serious and criminal nature and were therefore entitled to a first instance tribunal complying with the requirements of A 6(1), such organisational defects in their courts-martial could not be corrected by any subsequent review procedure. The courts-martial which dealt with the applicants' case were not independent and impartial within the meaning of A 6(1), and consequently could not guarantee either of the applicants a fair trial. In view of those conclusions it was not necessary also to examine the complaints of the applicants that their courts-martial were not public or established by law.

A 41 claim not submitted.

[Application lodged 16.11.1984; Commission report 10.7.1989; Court Judgment 23.10.1990 (merits), 28.8.1991 (A 50)]

Mr Manuel Moreira de Azevedo was a bus driver. On 23 January 1977 one of his brothers-in-law shot him in the head following a family quarrel. On the same day the police arrested the suspect. On 2 June 1977 the applicant stated that he wished to intervene as an assistant (assistente) of the prosecuting authority in the preliminary investigation. His application was allowed on 18 June 1977. On 18 February 1985 the court acquitted the accused on the charge of attempted murder.

However, it sentenced him to 14 months' imprisonment for causing grievous bodily harm and ordered him to pay damages to the applicant. The applicant and the accused filed appeals. On 30 October 1985 the Oporto Court of Appeal allowed the accused's appeal. The applicant's appeal to the Supreme Court was dismissed on 7 May 1986. The letter of notification was sent to the applicant on the following day. He was deemed to have received it on the third day after its despatch. He complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found by majority (8–6) NV 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr S K Martens, Mrs E Palm.

The Government submitted that the applicant ought to have brought civil proceedings separately from the criminal proceedings. Such proceedings would however have dealt with the substantive issue in dispute before the Portuguese courts, the applicant's right to compensation, and not the failure to complete the proceedings within a reasonable time, the applicant's only complaint before the European Court. A 26 required remedies to be exercised only in so far as they related to the violations complained of before the organs whose task it was to ensure the observance of the Convention. In addition, it would be pointless to speculate as to whether such proceedings would have led to a decision being given more rapidly, because in any event they constituted a remedy too indirect to be taken into consideration. The objection therefore had to be dismissed.

The right to a fair trial held so prominent a place in a democratic society that there could be no justification for interpreting A 6(1) restrictively. The case concerned the determination of a right; the result of the proceedings was decisive for that right. To intervene in proceedings as an 'assistente' was equivalent to filing a claim for compensation in civil proceedings. By acquiring that status, the applicant demonstrated the importance which he attached not only to the criminal conviction of the accused but also to securing financial reparation for the damage sustained. Moreover, his application that the decision as to quantum be deferred until the subsequent enforcement proceedings confirmed that he genuinely expected to be paid damages. A 6 applied to the case.

The incident took place on 23 January 1977 and the accused was arrested and interviewed on the same date. However, the period to be considered began to run on 9 November 1978, when the Convention entered into force with regard to Portugal. In order to determine the reasonableness of the time which elapsed after that date it was necessary to take into account the stage which the proceedings had reached at that point. The relevant period ended on 11 May 1986, the third day following the despatch of the letter of notification to the applicant. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. The dispute was not complex. The investigation conducted between 23 January 1977 and 5 July 1984 was secret and the applicant did not have free access to the file. In any event the applicant was under no duty to take the steps referred to by the Government; moreover, they would not have shortened the proceedings. Regarding the conduct of the relevant Portuguese courts, the proceedings had scarcely progressed from 26 May 1980 to 5 July 1982, and the time taken to complete the medical examinations of the applicant was excessive. The State was responsible for all its authorities and not merely its judicial organs. The Court was not unaware of the difficulties which sometimes delayed the hearing of cases by national courts and which were due to a variety of factors. The Court was mindful of the reforms carried out by the Portuguese State regarding the organisation of the investigation authorities. Nevertheless the Government had failed to show what practical and effective measures Portuguese law provided in the present case to accelerate the progress of the criminal proceedings. The reasonable time was exceeded and there was accordingly a violation of A 6(1).

Morel v France 00/159

[Application lodged 20.7.1996; Court Judgment 6.6.2000]

Mr Hubert Morel lodged a notice with the commercial court that construction companies of which he was the head were unable to pay their debts. The insolvency judge made a number of orders and following the report prepared by the insolvency judge and the judicial administrator, the court subsequently made an order for the liquidation of the companies. The insolvency judge was appointed president of the court chamber dealing with the liquidation. The applicant complained of the fairness of proceedings.

Court found unanimously NV 6(1) as regards a fair hearing, NV 6(1) as regards an impartial tribunal.

Judges: Mr W Fuhrmann, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr K Jungwiert, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mr K Traja.

The right to an inter partes hearing implied in principle that the parties to a trial were to have the opportunity to peruse any document or observation presented to the court, even by a judge, with a view to influencing its decision or to discuss it. The principle of equality of arms required the parties to be given a reasonable opportunity to state their case in conditions which did not place them at a distinct disadvantage in comparison with their opponent. In the course of the hearing before the Court the Government relied on a clerical error in the drafting of the judgment, without being contradicted by the applicant's lawyer. The procedure followed by the commercial court was laid down in A 61 of the January 1985 Law, not A 36. The course taken by the proceedings confirmed that argument. There was no provision in the A 61 procedure for a written report to be filed by the insolvency judge, unlike the A 36 procedure. The reference to such a report in the judgment was therefore incorrect. The applicant relied on those references in the judgment as the basis for his complaint. His reasoning was therefore based on incorrect references in the judgment of the commercial court.

Regarding the personal impartiality of the insolvency judge, there was insufficient evidence to establish that he had acted with personal prejudice. The impartiality of the bench had to be considered. The insolvency judge adopted a number of measures concerning the companies during the observation stage and subsequently presided over the court which determined the fate of those companies. Such a situation could lead the applicant to doubt the impartiality of the commercial court. However, the mere fact that the insolvency judge had adopted certain decisions during the observation stage could not in itself justify the applicant's concerns as to its impartiality. During the observation stage the insolvency judge made a number of orders concerning the management of the economic and financial survival of the companies and the management of their staff. He was responsible, under domestic law, for ensuring that the matter proceeded expeditiously and that the relevant interests were protected. Following an application under A 61, the court over which he presided was required to assess the long term viability of the proposal that the companies should continue to trade which the applicant had submitted at the end of the observation stage. The court therefore had to examine the financial guarantees and other evidence produced by the applicant at the hearing and also the state of the companies at that date. The court also relied on the evidence provided by the administrator. The insolvency judge was therefore faced with two separate issues. There was no objective reason to believe that the nature and scope of the insolvency judge's role during the observation stage implied any prejudice on the part of the court in its assessment of the viability of the proposal that the companies should continue to trade. In short the applicant's complaints were unfounded.

Morganti v France (1996) 21 EHRR 34 95/22

[Application lodged 15.2.1990; Commission report 30.11.1994; Court Judgment 13.7.1995]

Mr Michel Morganti was charged on 22 November 1985 with the attempted murder of two Spanish Basque refugees, membership of a criminal organisation, unauthorised possession and transport without a lawful reason of category 4 arms and ammunition and handling stolen goods. On the same day he was remanded in custody. He submitted numerous applications for release which were all dismissed. The criminal proceedings lasted from December 1985 to 21 June 1990, when the applicant was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment by the Pyrénées-Atlantiques Assize Court. On 16 October 1991 the Court of Cassation dismissed an appeal on points of law by the applicant. He complained, inter alia, of the length of his pre-trial detention.

Comm found unanimously V 5(3).

Court unanimously held that it could not deal with the merits of the case.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr J De Meyer, Mrs E Palm, Mr F Bigi, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek, Mr K Jungwiert.

The French Government referred the case to the Court on 13 April 1995, whereas the Commission's report was sent to the Committee of Ministers on 11 January 1995. The Government did not dispute the fact that they had exceeded the time they were allowed. The explanations put forward (postal strike and delay in forwarding fax) did not disclose any special circumstance of a nature to suspend the running of time or justify its starting to run afresh. It followed that the application bringing the case before the Court was inadmissible as it was out of time (under A 32).

Mori v Italy 91/20

[Application lodged on 26.11.1987; Commission report 5.12.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991]

Mrs Bruna Mori was a teacher. Proceedings were brought against her for defamation following a complaint lodged with the Genoa prosecuting authorities on 12 January 1981 by a judge at the Regional Administrative Court, in which he alleged that the applicant had asserted in insulting terms that he had, out of personal interest, induced the Administrative Court to deliver a judgment unfavourable to the applicant. The proceedings were the outcome of a series of complaints and accusations in which the applicant and the judge were the active parties. The applicant was formally notified of the charges against her on 13 October 1982. Following hearing, she was acquitted on the grounds of insufficient evidence in 1987. She appealed with a view to obtaining an unqualified acquittal. The prosecuting authorities appealed to obtain a conviction. On 30 March 1988, the Genoa District Court pronounced the applicant's acquittal. On 21 April 1988, the prosecuting authorities appealed to the Court of Cassation. On 22 September 1988, the Court of Cassation, sitting in private, decided that the offence was then time-barred. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 13 October 1982, the date on which the applicant was formally notified of the criminal proceedings. It ended on 22 September 1988 with the Court of Cassation's judgment finding that the offence was time-barred. A 6(1) guaranteed to everyone who was the object of criminal proceedings the right to a final decision within a reasonable time on the charge against him. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The case was a very simple one. The applicant's conduct did not give rise to any delay, she took steps to expedite the proceedings. It followed that the Court could not regard as reasonable in the instant case a lapse of time of nearly six years.

Motta v Italy (1992) 14 EHRR 432 91/8

[Application lodged 22.4.1985; Commission report 6.11.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991]

Mr Luciano Motta, a doctor, had criminal proceedings brought against him on 20 October 1979 for fraudulent claims on the health insurance service. On 29 June 1983 the court decided that the criminal proceedings should be discontinued because of an amnesty. The applicant's appeals were finally dismissed on 4 December 1987. The criminal proceedings had lasted over seven years, six months. He complained of the length of those proceedings and also of the length of civil proceedings he had brought against the State on 15 June 1979 for sums owed for services rendered.

Comm found V 6(1) (unanimously for criminal proceedings and by majority (14–3) for civil proceedings).

Court held unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla.

In assessing the reasonableness of the length of the proceedings, account had to be taken of all the circumstances of the case including the complexity of the case, conduct of the applicant and of the competent authorities. In the present case the criminal proceedings were not complex, the applicant had not delayed. The lapse of seven years, six months was not reasonable. The civil proceedings had been prevented from progressing by the slowness of the criminal proceedings. There had therefore been, in both cases, a violation of A 6(1).

Moustaquim v Belgium (1991) 13 EHRR 802 91/3

[Application lodged 13.5.1986; Commission report 12.10.1989; Court Judgment 18.2.1991]

Mr Abderrahman Moustaquim was a Moroccan national living in Belgium, having arrived there when he was one year old. While the applicant was still a minor, the Liège Juvenile Court dealt with 147 charges against him, making various custodial, protective and educative orders. In December 1981, the applicant appeared before the Liège Criminal Court charged with 26 offences. Following appeal, the applicant was convicted of 22 offences and he was sentenced to imprisonment, being released in April 1984. In February 1984, a deportation order for 10 years was served on the applicant on the grounds of his serious prejudice to public order; he left Belgium in June 1984. In December 1989, a royal order was issued, temporarily suspending the deportation order. The applicant returned in January 1990 and received a residence permit which was valid for one year and was renewable. The applicant alleged that his deportation from Belgium infringed several provisions of the Convention.

Comm found by a majority (10–3) V 8, NV 14+8, unanimously NV 3, NV 7.

Court held by a majority (7–2) V 8, unanimously NV 14+8, not necessary to examine case under 3 and 7.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (d), Mr F Matscher, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos (d), Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel.

The Government's claim that the application had become devoid of purpose, in that the deportation order had been suspended by royal order and the applicant was therefore authorised to reside in Belgium, was rejected. The royal order only suspended the deportation order and did not make reparation for its consequences, which the applicant suffered for more than 5 years. The applicant claimed that his deportation interfered with his family and private life, in breach of A 8. The applicant, his parents and seven brothers and sisters all lived in Belgium. He had never broken off relations with his family, and the measure complained of resulted in his being separated from them for more than five years, although he tried to remain in contact by correspondence. Accordingly there was interference with the right to respect for family life guaranteed in A 8(1). The deportation was lawful, and the interference was for the legitimate aim of the prevention of disorder. However, the measure was disproportionate. Whilst the Court did not underestimate the concern to maintain public order, in particular in exercising Contracting States' right to control the entry, residence and expulsion of aliens, interference with the rights protected by A 8(1) had to be shown to be necessary in a democratic society, that is to say justified by a pressing social need and proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. In the applicant's case, the alleged offences went back to when he was an adolescent; proceedings in the criminal courts were brought in respect of only 26 of them, which were spread over less than a year, and which resulted in 22 convictions; the latest conviction was over 3 years before the deportation order, and during that period the applicant was in detention for some 16 months, but at liberty for nearly 23 months. In addition, all the applicant's close relatives had been living in Belgium for a long while: one acquiring Belgian nationality and three being born there. The applicant himself was less than two years old when he arrived in Belgium, and had lived there for 20 years with his family. His family life was thus seriously disrupted by the measure taken against him, and the means disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. There was therefore a violation of A 8. It was unnecessary to consider whether the deportation was also a breach of the applicant's right to respect for his private life.

The applicant claimed to be discriminated against on the ground of nationality, contrary to A 14 taken together with A 8, compared to juvenile delinquents of two categories: Belgian nationals, since they could not be deported; and citizens of another Member State of the European Communities, as a criminal conviction was not sufficient to render them liable to deportation. The Court held that the applicant could not be compared to Belgian juvenile delinquents, as they have a right of abode in their own country and cannot be expelled from it, and as for the preferential treatment given to nationals of the other Member States of the Communities, there was objective and reasonable justification for it as those States belonged to a special legal order. There was therefore no breach of A 14 taken together with A 8.

Before the Commission the applicant also relied on A 3 and 7, but did not raise them again before the Court, which did not consider itself bound to deal with those questions of its own motion.

Muller v France 97/11

[Application lodged 8.3.1993; Commission report 6.9.1995; Court Judgment 17.3.1997]

Mr Patrick Muller and his brother were arrested on 13 December 1988 and taken into police custody. They immediately admitted the offences of armed robbery, attempted armed robbery, theft and criminal conspiracy of which they were accused. The applicant was held in pre-trial detention for the entire duration of the judicial investigation. He complained, inter alia, of the length of his detention pending trial.

Comm found unanimously V 5(3).

Court found unanimously V 5(3).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen, Sir John Freeland, Mr B Repik, Mr E Levits.

The period to be taken into consideration started on 13 December 1988, when the applicant was taken into police custody, and ended on 9 December 1992, when the Assize Court delivered its judgment. It therefore lasted almost four years. In order to assess whether continued detention was justified, it fell in the first place to the national judicial authorities to examine all the circumstances arguing for or against the existence of such a requirement and to set them out in their decisions on the applications for release. It was essentially on the basis of the reasons given in those decisions and of the undisputed facts stated by the applicant in his appeals that the Court was called upon to decide whether or not there had been a violation of A 5(3). The persistence of reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence was a condition sine qua non for the lawfulness of the continued detention, but after a certain lapse of time it no longer sufficed: the Court had to then establish whether the other grounds given by the judicial authorities continued to justify the deprivation of liberty. Where such grounds were relevant and sufficient, the Court had to also ascertain whether the competent national authorities displayed special diligence in the conduct of the proceedings. As justification for deciding to continue detention pending trial, the relevant authorities relied on both the seriousness of the offences and the risk that the applicant would abscond or reoffend. To justify refusing Mr Muller's applications for release, they relied simultaneously on the complexity of the case, the needs of the investigation and the risk that the applicant would collude with his co-accused, abscond or reoffend. The investigation of the case was complex in that it had been necessary to amalgamate the proceedings, which had originally been conducted in three different jurisdictions simultaneously. However, as soon as he was arrested, the applicant had admitted the offences. The judge closed the criminal investigation on 7 November 1991 and on 12 December the applicant and his accomplices were committed to stand trial at the Assize Court. The risk of collusion between the persons involved must therefore have disappeared by then. It was not apparent from the decisions not to release the applicant that there was a real risk of his absconding. Although such a danger may exist where the sentence faced was a long term of imprisonment, the risk of absconding could not be gauged solely on the basis of the severity of the sentence faced. With regard to the danger of re-offending, a reference to a person's antecedents could not suffice to justify refusing release. Therefore, by 7 November 1991 at the latest – when the order closing the investigation with a view to a committal to the Assize Court was made – the detention in issue had ceased to be based on relevant and sufficient reasons. It was therefore necessary to consider the conduct of the proceedings. The trial was adjourned on account of the prison warders' strike causing a few weeks' delay. The proceedings included the removal of two investigating judges from the case and the subsequent replacement of the investigating judge on three occasions. Whilst the joinder of the various sets of proceedings was certainly necessary for the proper administration of justice, the successive changes of judge contributed to slowing down the investigation. The judicial authorities did not act with all due expedition, although the applicant had admitted the offences once and for all as soon as the investigation had begun and did not thereafter make any application that might have slowed its progress. The period spent by the applicant in detention pending trial therefore exceeded the reasonable time laid down in A 5(3).

Present judgment constituted just satisfaction in respect of the non-pecuniary damage sustained by the applicant. Costs and expenses (FF 40,000).

Müller and Others v Switzerland (1991) 13 EHRR 212 88/5

[Application lodged 22.7.1983; Commission report 8.10.1986; Court Judgment 24.5.1988]

Mr Josef Felix Müller was a painter and the other nine applicants were organisers of an exhibition mounted in 1981. The applicants were convicted of the publication of obscene material and fined (the first applicant's paintings included sodomy, fellatio and bestiality). The paintings were confiscated. Their appeals were dismissed. The paintings were returned in 1988.

Comm found by majority (11–3) V 10 regarding confiscation of paintings, unanimously NV 10 regarding conviction.

Court found by majority (6–1) NV 10 regarding conviction, (5–2) NV 10 regarding confiscation of paintings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann (d), Mr J De Meyer (pc/pd).

A 10 does not distinguish between the various forms of expression. However, it included freedom of artistic expression which afforded the opportunity to take part in the public exchange of cultural, political and social information and ideas of all kinds. The applicants suffered interference by public authority by reason of their conviction and confiscation of the paintings. The conviction was prescribed by law, the Swiss Criminal Code, and had the legitimate aim of protection of public morals. 'Necessary' implied the existence of a pressing social need. States had a margin of appreciation; the requirements of morals varied with time and State authorities were in a better position to give an opinion on the requirements and the necessity of the restriction or penalty to meet them. The paintings depicted sexual relations particularly between men and animals, they were painted on the spot (one of the aims of the exhibition) and the public had free access to them. The paintings were liable to grossly offend the sexual propriety of persons of ordinary sensitivity and having regard to the margin of appreciation the Swiss courts were entitled to consider it necessary for the protection of morals to impose a fine for publication of obscene material. The disputed measure did not infringe A 10.

The confiscation of the painting was prescribed by law, Criminal Code. It had a legitimate aim to protect public morals by preventing any repetition of the offence. The same reasons which applied to the applicant's convictions applied to the confiscation order. The confiscation order deprived the applicant of the opportunity of showing his painting elsewhere. However he could have applied earlier for their return, there was no evidence that he would have failed in that application.

Murray v UK (1995) 19 EHRR 193 94/35

[Application lodged 28.9.1988; Commission report 17.2.1993; Court Judgment 28.10.1994]

Mrs Margaret Murray and Mr Thomas Murray, the first and second applicants, were husband and wife. The other four applicants were their children, Mark, Alana, Michaela and Rossina Murray. Mrs Murray was arrested at her family home on suspicion of involvement in the collection of money for the purchase of arms for the IRA in the US. She complained that her arrest and detention for two hours for questioning gave rise to a violation of A 5(1) and (2), for which she had no enforceable right to compensation under A 5(5); and that the taking and keeping of a photograph and personal details about her was in breach of her right to respect for private life under A 8. The other five applicants alleged a violation of A 5(1), (2) and (5) as a result of being required to assemble for half an hour in one room of their house while the first applicant prepared to leave with the Army. They further argued that the recording and retention of certain personal details about them, such as their names and relationship to the first applicant, violated their right to respect for private life under A 8. All six applicants claimed that the entry into and search of their home by the Army were contrary to their right to respect for their private and family life and their home under A 8; and that, contrary to A 13, no effective remedies existed under domestic law.

Comm found in the case of the first applicant by majority (11–3) V 5(1), (10–4) V 5(2), (11–3) V 5(5), (13–1) NV 8, not necessary to examine complaint under 13, in the case of the first applicant NV 13 unanimously, in relation to either the entry into and search of her home or by majority (10–4) in relation to the taking and keeping of a photograph and personal details about her.

Court found by majority (14–4) NV 5(1) in respect of the first applicant, (13–5) NV 5(2) in respect of the first applicant, (13–5) NV 5(5) in respect of the first applicant, (15–3) NV 8 in respect of any of the applicants, unanimously not necessary to examine A 13 regarding the first applicant's complaint concerning remedies for her claims under 5(1) and 5(2), unanimously NV 13 in respect of the first applicant.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr R Macdonald, Mr A Spielmann, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou (jd), Mr JM Morenilla (jd), Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (pd), Mr J Makarczyk (jd), Mr P Jambrek (pd), Mr K Jungwiert.

A 5: the first applicant alleged that A 5(1)(c) had been breached because she had not been arrested on 'reasonable suspicion' of having committed a criminal offence and that the purpose of her arrest and subsequent detention had not been to bring her before a 'competent legal authority'. Having regard to both the object of questioning under A 5(1)(c), to further a criminal investigation, which meant that the facts which raised a suspicion did not need to be of the same level as those necessary to bring a charge or justify a conviction which came at later stages in the process and the special exigencies of investigating terrorist crime, the Court was satisfied, notwithstanding the lower standard of suspicion under domestic law, that the first applicant was arrested and detained on 'reasonable suspicion' of the commission of a criminal offence. The purpose of the arrest and detention was genuinely to bring the first applicant before a competent legal authority.

There was no breach of A 5(2) because it must have been apparent to the first applicant during the interview that she was being questioned about her possible involvement in the collection of funds for the purchase of arms for the Provisional IRA by her brothers in the US and the interview took place promptly after her arrest.

In view of the Court's conclusions in relation to A 5(1) and (2), no issue arose under A 5(5).

A 8: 'In accordance with the law' required the measure to have some basis in domestic law, referred to the quality of the law and required it to be accessible, foreseeable and compatible with the rule of law. This was satisfied in relation to each of the applicants' complaints, as was the legitimate aim of the prevention of crime. The means employed by the authorities in relation to the entry into and search of the applicants' home and the recording and retention of the applicants' basic personal details were not disproportionate to the aim pursued and therefore the various measures complained of were necessary in a democratic society for the prevention of crime.

A 13: The first applicant had an effective remedy in domestic law in relation to her complaints concerning the entry into and search of her home because the competent national authority could deal with both the substance of the relevant Convention complaint and grant appropriate relief in meritorious cases. Neither was the article breached in relation to the arrest, detention and lack of information about reasons for arrest because the entitlement to a remedy for this was lex specialis A 5(4), which had not been invoked. Nor in relation to the recording and retention of personal details because the Convention did not go as far as to guarantee a remedy allowing her to have challenged the content, rather than application, of domestic law before a national authority.

Murray, John v United Kingdom (1996) 22 EHRR 29 96/2

[Application lodged 16.8.1991; Commission report 27.6.1994; Court Judgment 8.2.1996]

Mr John Murray was arrested by police officers at 5.40 pm on 7 January 1990 under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989. He was cautioned by the police but said that he had nothing to say. His request for access to a solicitor was delayed for a period of 48 hours from the time of detention on the basis that the detective superintendent had reasonable grounds to believe that access would, inter alia, interfere with the gathering of information about the commission of acts of terrorism or make it more difficult to prevent an act of terrorism. On 7 January a police constable cautioned the applicant pursuant to Article 6 of the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988, inter alia, requesting him to account for his presence at the house where he was arrested. He was warned that if he failed or refused to do so, a court, judge or jury might draw such inference from his failure or refusal as appeared proper. He refused to say anything. He was able to see his solicitor for the first time at 6.33 pm on 9 January. In subsequent interviews he stated that he had been advised by his solicitor not to answer any questions. His solicitor was not permitted to be present at any of these interviews. In May 1991 the applicant was tried by a single judge, the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland, sitting without a jury, for the offences of conspiracy to murder, the unlawful imprisonment, with seven other people, of a certain Mr L, a police informer, and of belonging to a proscribed organisation, the Provisional Irish Republican Army (IRA). Acting on the advice of his solicitor and counsel, the applicant chose not to give any evidence. The trial judge drew adverse inferences against the applicant under both Articles 4 and 6 of the Order. On 8 May 1991 he was found guilty of the offence of aiding and abetting the unlawful imprisonment of Mr L and sentenced to eight years' imprisonment. He was acquitted on the remaining charges. The applicant's appeal against conviction and sentence was dismissed by the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland on 7 July 1992. He complained that he was deprived of the right to silence in the criminal proceedings against him and of his lack of access to a solicitor during his detention and the fact that the practice concerning access to solicitors differed between Northern Ireland and England and Wales.

Court found by majority (14–5) NV 6(1) and 6(2) arising out of the drawing of adverse inferences from the applicant's silence, (12–7) V 6(1)+6(3)(c) as regards the applicant's lack of access to a lawyer during the first 48 hours of his police detention, unanimously not necessary to examine 14+6.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President (jpd), Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Matscher (jpd), Mr L-E Pettiti (pd), Mr B Walsh (pd), Mr N Valticos (jpd), Mr S K Martens, Mrs E Palm (jpd), Mr I Foighel (jpd), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr A N Loizou, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland (jpd), Mr M A Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber (jpd), Mr J Makarczyk (jpd), Mr D Gotchev, Mr K Jungwiert (jpd), Mr U Lôhmus (jpd).

The right to remain silent under police questioning and the privilege against self-incrimination were generally recognised international standards which lay at the heart of the notion of a fair procedure under A 6. On the one hand it was incompatible with the immunities under consideration to base a conviction solely or mainly on the accused's silence or on a refusal to answer questions or to give evidence himself. On the other hand those immunities could not and should not prevent that the accused's silence, in situations which clearly called for an explanation from him, be taken into account in assessing the persuasiveness of the evidence adduced by the prosecution. Therefore the right to silence was not absolute. Whether the drawing of adverse inferences from an accused's silence infringed A 6 was a matter to be determined in the light of all the circumstances of the case, having particular regard to the situations where inferences may be drawn, the weight attached to them by the national courts in their assessment of the evidence and the degree of compulsion inherent in the situation. A system which warned the accused that adverse inferences may be drawn from a refusal to provide an explanation to the police for his presence at the scene of a crime or to testify during his trial, when taken in conjunction with the weight of the case against him, involved a certain level of indirect compulsion. However, since the applicant could not be compelled to speak or to testify that factor on its own could not be decisive. The proceedings were without a jury, the trier of fact being an experienced judge. Furthermore, the drawing of inferences under the Order was subject to an important series of safeguards designed to respect the rights of the defence and to limit the extent to which reliance could be placed on inferences. Warnings had to been given to the accused as to the legal effects of maintaining silence. Moreover, the prosecutor had to first establish a prima facie case against the accused. The national court could not conclude that the accused was guilty merely because he choose to remain silent. It was only common-sense inferences which the judge considered proper, in the light of the evidence against the accused, that could be drawn under the Order. In addition, the trial judge had a discretion whether, on the facts of the particular case, an inference should be drawn. Furthermore in trials without a jury, the judge had to explain the reasons for the decision to draw inferences and the weight attached to them. The exercise of discretion in this regard was subject to review by the appellate courts. Having regard to the weight of the evidence against the applicant, the drawing of inferences from his refusal, at arrest, during police questioning and at trial, to provide an explanation for his presence in the house was a matter of common sense and could not be regarded as unfair or unreasonable in the circumstances. Nor could it be said, against that background, that the drawing of reasonable inferences from the applicant's behaviour had the effect of shifting the burden of proof from the prosecution to the defence so as to infringe the principle of the presumption of innocence. The applicant maintained silence right from the first questioning by the police to the end of his trial. There was no indication that the applicant failed to understand the significance of the warning given to him by the police prior to seeing his solicitor. Under those circumstances the fact that during the first 48 hours of his detention the applicant had been refused access to a lawyer did not detract from the conclusion that the drawing of inferences was not unfair or unreasonable and did not infringe of the presumption of innocence. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1) or (2).

A 6 of the Convention applied even at the stage of the preliminary investigation into an offence by the police. A 6, especially 6(3), might be relevant before a case was sent for trial if and so far as the fairness of the trial was likely to be seriously prejudiced by an initial failure to comply with its provisions . The manner in which A 6(3)(c) was to be applied during the preliminary investigation depended on the special features of the proceedings involved and on the circumstances of the case. The Court had no reason to doubt that the restriction of access amounted to a lawful exercise of the power. It was of paramount importance for the rights of the defence that an accused had access to a lawyer at the initial stages of police interrogation. At the beginning of police interrogation an accused was confronted with a fundamental dilemma relating to his defence. If he chose to remain silent, adverse inferences might be drawn against him. On the other hand, if he opted to break his silence during the interrogation, he run the risk of prejudicing his defence without necessarily removing the possibility of inferences being drawn against him. Under such conditions the concept of fairness enshrined in A 6 required that the accused had the benefit of the assistance of a lawyer at the initial stages of police interrogation. To deny access to a lawyer for the first 48 hours of police questioning, in a situation where the rights of the defence might be irretrievably prejudiced, was – whatever the justification for such denial – incompatible with the rights of the accused under A 6. Although after consultation with his solicitor the applicant was advised to continue to remain silent and during the trial he chose not to give evidence or call witnesses, it was not for the Court to speculate on what the applicant's reaction, or his lawyer's advice, would have been had access not been denied during this initial period. The applicant was undoubtedly directly affected by the denial of access and the ensuing interference with the rights of the defence. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1) in conjunction with 6(3)(c) as regards the applicant's denial of access to a lawyer during the first 48 hours of his police detention.

In the light of the above conclusion the Court did not consider that it was necessary to examine the complaint under A 14 and 6.

As regards pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage finding of a violation of 6(1)+6(3)(c) sufficient just satisfaction for A 50. Costs and expenses (GBP 15,000 less FF 37,968.60).

Musial v Poland 99/17

[Application lodged 10.1.1994; Commission report 4.3.1998; Court Judgment 25.3.1999]

Mr Zbigniew Musial was committed to a psychiatric hospital in 1988 after criminal proceedings for the manslaughter of his wife were discontinued on the grounds that he was not criminally responsible. In March 1993, the applicant's lawyer lodged a request with the Katowice Regional Court for the applicant's release from the psychiatric institution where he had been detained since 1988. His lawyers insisted that psychiatrists from Cracow University, rather than from the hospital of his detention, should examine the applicant, claiming that it was only from this institution that an unbiased opinion could be obtained. The court agreed and the applicant's medical records were forwarded to Cracow University. From 31 January to 4 February 1994 the applicant underwent an examination at Cracow University. In an opinion of 30 November 1994, the psychiatrists stated that the applicant's condition required continued detention. This opinion was submitted to the Katowice Regional Court on 15 December 1994, as a result of which the court decided that the applicant's detention should be maintained. Release was again refused in March and December 1996. In September 1996, the applicant had attempted suicide. In June 1997, the Katowice Regional Court ordered the applicant's release. The applicant alleged a violation of A 5(4) in that the proceedings concerning a judicial review of his psychiatric detention were unreasonably long.

The period to be taken into consideration began not on 16 March 1993 but on 1 May 1993, when the declaration whereby Poland recognised the right of individual petition for the purposes of former A 25 of the Convention became effective. It ended on 9 January 1995, the date on which the Regional Court dismissed the applicant's request for release: a period of one year, eight months and nine days. However, in order to assess the length of the proceedings in question, the Court took into account the stage reached at the beginning of the period under examination. A person of unsound mind who was compulsorily confined in a psychiatric institution for an indefinite or lengthy period was entitled under A 5(4) to take proceedings at reasonable intervals before a court to put in issue the lawfulness of his or her detention, inasmuch as the reasons initially warranting confinement may cease to exist. A 5(4) also proclaimed the right, following the institution of such proceedings, to a speedy judicial decision concerning the lawfulness of detention and ordering its termination if it proves unlawful. The contested proceedings were instituted by the applicant's request for release of March 1993. In a decision of April 1993, the Regional Court acceded to the request for examination by psychiatrists from Cracow University, but the applicant's medical file was sent to the University almost five months later. The applicant was admitted to the University hospital after a further delay of four months and nine days. His examination was completed after only five days, although it took the experts a further 10 months to prepare their report, which was eventually submitted to the Regional Court in December 1994, following which his detention was continued. Such a lapse of time would be incompatible with the notion of speediness within the meaning of A 5(4) unless there were exceptional grounds to justify it. The applicant's explicit wish to be examined by doctors from an institution other than Rybnik did not waive his procedural rights under A 5(4). Similarly, the fact that the Regional Court appointed experts at the applicant's specific request did not in itself discharge that court from its obligation to rule speedily on his request for release. There was no cause in this case for the Court to depart from the usual principle that the primary responsibility for delays resulting from the provision of expert opinions rested ultimately with the State. In proceedings concerning a review of a psychiatric detention, the complexity of the medical issues involved was a factor which may be taken into account when assessing compliance with A 5(4). However, the complexity of a medical dossier, however exceptional, could not absolve national authorities from their essential obligations under this provision. It had not in any event been shown that there was a causal link between the complexity of the medical issues which might have been involved in the assessment of the applicant's condition and the delay in the preparation of the expert opinion. The Government failed to show that there were such exceptional grounds as could justify the period in question. Under Polish law, the Regional Court could have fined the experts for failing in their obligation to submit a report, yet chose not to do so in the present case. The Regional Court failed to expedite the production of the report. The Katowice Regional Court, when giving its decision of January 1995 ordering the applicant's continued detention, had regard to the medical opinion prepared on the basis of the applicant's examination which had taken place from 30 January to 4 February 1994: thus deciding on the basis of information about his health which had been obtained 11 months earlier. As a result, the decision was based on medical information which did not necessarily reflect the applicant's condition at the time of the decision. Such a delay between clinical examination and preparation of a medical report was in itself capable of running counter to the principle underlying A 5 of the Convention, namely the protection of individuals against arbitrariness as regards any measure depriving them of their liberty. The lawfulness of the applicant's detention was not decided speedily in the contested proceedings, as required by A 5(4), and there was accordingly a violation.

Muti v Italy 94/12

Mr Giovanni Muti was declared physically unfit to continue to perform his duties at the Bergamo State Counsel's office in March 1975. His application for an enhanced pension was refused and on 1 June 1979 he appealed to the Court of Audit against that decision. The court adopted a decision which partly granted his application in that it recognised his right to an enhanced pension in respect of the health problems that had arisen from the performance of his duties. The judgment was filed at the registry on 8 January 1988 and communicated to the applicant's lawyer on 22 April 1988. He complained of the length of proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 1 June 1979, the date of the appeal to the Court of Audit, and ended on 8 January 1988 when that court's judgment was filed. It thus lasted slightly more than eight years and seven months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The Government's argument based on the excessive workload, could not be taken into consideration since A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. It did not appear that the applicant's alleged passivity contributed to slowing down the proceedings. However, there were two main periods of stagnation attributable to the respondent State: Principal State Counsel waited four years and four months before requesting an expert opinion, and there was then a period of two years and eight months before the medical report was filed. Accordingly and in view of what was at stake in the proceedings for the applicant, the Court could not regard as reasonable the time which elapsed in the case. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Muyldermans v Belgium (1993) 15 EHRR 204 91/40

[Application lodged 22.12.1983; Commission report 2.10.1990; Court Judgment 23.10.1991]

Mrs Marie-Louise Muyldermans worked as an accountant in the post office. A deficit appeared in her accounts which was then automatically submitted to the Audit Court, which ruled on the question on 5 May 1982 in private and on the basis solely of the administrative file. It found that the applicant had failed to perform properly several of her duties and ordered her to reimburse the Post Office the sum of BEF 2,000,000. By two judgments of the same day, it found two other officials, L and C, liable to pay the balance of the deficit. The three officials appealed to the Court of Cassation. On 30 June 1983, the Court of Cassation dismissed the applicant's appeal finding that A 6(1) was not applicable to the case before it. The court quashed the judgments concerning L and C as it considered that they were subordinate officials who did not have the status of accountants in relation to the Treasury, and the Audit Court therefore lacked jurisdiction to rule in their regard. The applicant complained that she had not received a public hearing and there had been no adversarial argument or oral submissions.

Comm found by majority (9–2) V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck case out of list.

Judges: Mr J Cremona, President, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The Court took formal note of the agreement concluded between the Government and Mrs Muyldermans. The agreement would give satisfaction to the latter. In addition, the amended legislation provided that the Audit Court would hold adversarial and public hearings. The adoption of the legislation by the relevant Belgian authorities would remove any reason of public policy for the European Court to decide on the merits of the case. Accordingly, it was appropriate to strike the case out of its list.

FS (Belgian Government agreed in principle not to enforce the judgment of the Audit Court against the applicant and to amend the legislation concerning the organisation of the Audit Court and the legislation on public accounts. Reimbursement of applicant's costs and fees (BEF 50,000). Compensation for pecuniary damage (BEF 20,000), therefore SO.

Nasri v France (1996) 21 EHRR 458 95/21

[Application lodged 30.1.1992; Commission report 10.3.1994; Court Judgment 13.7.1995]

Mr Mohamed Nasri, an Algerian national, was born deaf and dumb in June 1960, in Algeria. He came to France with his family in February 1965. He had criminal convictions for thefts from 1981–83 which had resulted in terms of imprisonment, gang rape in 1986, which had resulted in five years' imprisonment, two of which were suspended and five years' probation, theft with violence in 1987 and 1988 for which he received imprisonment, assaulting a public official in 1989 for which he was fined, theft and receiving stolen goods in 1990 for which he was imprisoned, criminal damage and thefts in 1982, 1992 and 1993. On 21 August 1987, the Minister of the Interior ordered his deportation on the ground that his presence on French territory represented a threat to public order. On 10 March 1988 the Versailles Administrative Court quashed the above-mentioned order. On 15 February 1991 the Conseil d'Etat overturned the Administrative Court's judgment and dismissed the applicant's applications for the quashing of the order or for a stay of execution. On 31 January 1992 the Nanterre tribunal de grande instance issued a compulsory residence order requiring him to live with his parents. His application to the Paris Administrative Court was dismissed in October 1992. The compulsory residence order was renewed. He complained that his deportation to Algeria would entail a violation of A 3 and 8.

Comm found by majority (19–3) V 3 if deported, (20–2) V 8 if deported.

Court found unanimously V8 if decision to deport executed, by majority (7–2) not necessary to examine 3.

The execution of the deportation measure would amount to an interference with the exercise by the applicant of his right to respect for his family life. The deportation order was in accordance with the law and pursued the legitimate aims of prevention of disorder and the prevention of crime. It was for the Contracting States to maintain public order, in particular by exercising their right to control the entry and residence of aliens and notably to order the expulsion of aliens convicted of criminal offences. However, their decisions in this field, in so far as they may interfere with a right protected under A 8(1), had to be necessary in a democratic society, that was to say, justified by a pressing social need and, in particular, proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The applicant's deportation was decided following his conviction for gang rape. The perpetrator of such a serious offence would unquestionably represent a grave threat to public order. In the present case, however, there were other aspects to be taken into account. The Assize Court accepted that there were extenuating circumstances and that was reflected in the sentence, it also recognised implicitly that the applicant had not been the instigator of the offence. The applicant had not re-offended as far as that offence was concerned. The applicant had been deaf and dumb since birth and his condition had been aggravated by illiteracy. In view of his difficulties, the family was especially important, not only in terms of providing a home, but also because it could help to prevent him from lapsing into a life of crime, particularly so in this case as the applicant had received no therapy for his condition. He had always lived with his parents. Most of his siblings had acquired French nationality and had no close ties with Algeria. He had received all his schooling in France. He did not understand Arabic. In view of the accumulation of special circumstances, the decision to deport the applicant, if executed, would not be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. It would infringe the right to respect for family life and therefore constitute a breach of A 8.

Having regard to the conclusion under A 8, it was not necessary to examine A 3.

Not necessary to apply A 50 (no claim made for costs and expenses, legal aid granted for Convention organs).

National & Provincial Building Society, Leeds Permanent Building Society and Yorkshire Building Society v United Kingdom (1998) 25 EHRR 127 97/83

[Applications lodged 15.1.1993, 21.12.1992 and 11.1.1993; Commission report 25.6.1996; Court Judgment 23.10.1997]

The applicants were building societies. Following changes to the tax system on interest paid to investors in building societies in 1986, a gap period was exposed between the end of the applicant societies' accounting periods in 1985–86 and the start of the first quarter under the new regime. Transitional regulations were introduced which deemed payments falling into the gap period to have been made in a later accounting period, with the result that they formed the basis for an assessment to tax under the new 'actual-year' arrangements. In the view of the Government the legislative intention was to ensure that the same amount of tax was collected as would have been collected if the previous arrangements had continued and that the building societies did not receive an undeserved windfall in respect of the gap period. The applicant societies considered that the effect of the Regulations was to impose tax again on interest they had paid in 1985–86, a fiscal year for which liability on their investors' interest had already been discharged. In June 1986 the Woolwich commenced judicial review proceedings seeking a declaration that Regulation 11 was unlawful (Woolwich 1 proceedings). On 4 July 1986 the Government introduced in Parliament a measure intended to validate retrospectively the impugned Regulations and to give effect to what they claimed to be the original intention of Parliament when adopting it. On 15 July 1987 the Woolwich issued a writ against the Inland Revenue claiming repayment of the sums paid by way of tax under the transitional provisions of the Regulations, as well as interest from the date of payment. On 25 October 1990 the House of Lords allowed the appeal of the Woolwich in the Woolwich 1 proceedings and declared the transitional provisions in the 1986 Regulations to be ultra vires. This ruling declaring Regulation 11(4) void on technical grounds meant that no mechanism existed to achieve what the Government claimed to be Parliament's initial intention that interest payments made during the gap period should be assessed for tax. This led the Government to introduce new legislative provisions. Following the House of Lords' decision in the Woolwich 1 proceedings, the applicants commenced proceedings against the Inland Revenue for the restitution of the sums paid pursuant to the 1986 Regulations which had been declared void in the Woolwich 1 proceedings. The legislation to remedy the technical defects in the Regulations became s 53 of the Finance Act 1991. The provision had retrospective effect, save that by sub-s (4) it had no effect 'in relation to a building society which commenced proceedings to challenge the validity of the Regulations before 18 July 1986'. The Woolwich was the only building society which satisfied that condition. Proceedings were commenced by the applicant societies, who also challenged on the ground of unlawfulness, the Treasury Orders establishing the composite-rate tax for 1986–87 and for the following years. On 16 July 1992 s 64 of the Finance (No 2) Act 1992 entered into force. The legislation had been anticipated and was intended to validate retrospectively the impugned Treasury Orders. The effect of s 64 was to extinguish the remaining proceedings lodged by the applicants for judicial review of the validity of the Treasury Orders and for restitution. The applicant societies complained of breaches of P1A1 and of A 6, taken alone or in conjunction with A 14.

The interest paid in the gap period in issue would have been taxed, and subsequent gap periods would have been brought into account in future fiscal years in accordance with the same logic. The voluntary arrangements made no provision for interest to be omitted for tax-assessment purposes. The amounts were lodged in the applicant's reserves waiting to be brought into account. If steps had not been taken to bring those amounts into account in the move from the prior-period system to the actual-year system, the applicant societies would have been left with considerable sums of money representing unpaid tax. It could not be maintained that the effect of the transitional arrangements in the 1986 Regulations was to subject those amounts of money to double taxation, since no tax had ever been paid on the interest paid in the gap period before the changeover to the new actual-year scheme of assessment. Parliament intended interest to be taxed, it could not be maintained that it was misled as to the effect of the transitional arrangements. The Court considered the claims of the applicant societies that they were deprived of their legal rights to restitution of the monies paid to the Inland Revenue under the invalidated Regulations on the clear understanding that those monies were intended by Parliament to be charged to tax, had not been subjected to a double imposition and were not therefore wrongfully expropriated. While expressing no concluded view as to whether any of the claims asserted by the applicant societies could properly be considered to constitute possessions, the Court, was prepared to proceed on the working assumption that in the light of the Woolwich 2 ruling the applicant societies did have possessions in the form of vested rights to restitution which they sought to exercise in direct and indirect ways in the various legal proceedings instituted in 1991 and 1992. The retroactive measures operated in a way which constituted an interference with the enjoyment of the applicant societies' possessions. The Court proceeded on the working assumption that the legal claims in issue amounted to possessions within the meaning of P1A1. The Court recalled its case-law. The Court examined the complaints from the angle of a control of the use of property in the general interest 'to secure the payment of tax', which fell within the rule in the second paragraph of A 1. In enacting s 53 of the 1991 Act with retroactive effect Parliament was concerned to restore and reassert its original intention which had been stymied by the finding of the House of Lords in the Woolwich 1 litigation that the 1986 Regulations were ultra vires on technical grounds. The decision to remedy the technical deficiencies of the Regulations with retroactive effect was taken before 7 March 1991, namely before the date when the Leeds and the National & Provincial issued their writs and without regard to the imminent launch of the first set of restitution proceedings. Although s 53 had the effect of extinguishing the restitution claims of those two applicant societies, it did not appear that the ultimate aim of the measure was without reasonable foundation having regard to the public-interest considerations which underpinned the proposal to legislate with retroactive effect and Parliament's endorsement of that proposal. Section 64 was enacted to safeguard the tax paid by the applicant societies and the attempts to recover that tax. If the enactment of that provision could be considered to be justified on public-interest grounds, it had to also be the case that the same public-interest justification could be lawfully asserted by the respondent State to thwart the challenge to the Treasury Orders. The public-interest considerations in removing any uncertainty as to the lawfulness of the revenue collected had to be seen as compelling and such as to outweigh the interests defended by the applicant societies in contesting the legality of the rate set by the Treasury Orders in order to try once again to circumvent Parliament's original intention. Therefore the actions taken by the respondent State did not upset the balance which had to be struck between the protection of the applicant societies' rights to restitution and the public interest in securing the payment of taxes. There had accordingly been no violation of P1A1.

The applicant societies were not in a similar position to Woolwich, which alone took an independent and bold stance by mounting a legal challenge to the validity of the Regulations and alone bore the costs and risks of the litigation, taking complex and expensive proceedings as far as the House of Lords and secured victories before the Leeds and the National & Provincial had issued writs. Even if it were possible to regard the applicant societies as having been in a relevantly similar situation to the Woolwich, there was nevertheless a reasonable and objective justification for the distinction made in s 53 of the 1991 Act. It was understandable that Parliament did not wish to interfere with a judicial decision which brought to an end litigation which had lasted over three years. Section 64 of the 1992 Act applied generally. It could not be maintained that s 64 perpetuated any difference in treatment between the Woolwich and the applicant societies. Therefore there had been no breach of P1A1 taken in conjunction with A 14.

A 6: Both sets of restitution proceedings were private-law actions and were decisive for the determination of private-law rights to quantifiable sums of money. The judicial review proceedings were closely interrelated with the second set of restitution proceedings and were part of a calculated strategy to reassert the private-law claims which had been extinguished by s 53 of the 1991 Act. In those circumstances and irrespective of the public-law nature of that litigation, the judicial review proceedings had to also be considered to have been decisive of private-law rights. Therefore A 6(1) was applicable.

The right of access was not absolute, but may be subject to limitations. The effect of s 53 of the 1991 Act was to deprive the Leeds and the National & Provincial of their chances of winning their restitution proceedings against the Inland Revenue. The Court had to examine whether the action taken by the legislature constituted an interference with the applicants' right of access to a court. In so doing, it had regard to all the circumstances of the case and subjected to close scrutiny the reasons adduced by the respondent State for justifying any intervention which may have occurred in pending litigation as a result of the retrospective effects of s 53 of the 1991 Act and s 64 of the 1992 Act. By enacting the relevant measures Parliament clearly affirmed its intention to bring the interest paid in the gap period into account for tax purposes in the manner indicated in the 1986 Regulations. Having regard to the clear aim of Parliament in adopting the impugned measures, those two applicant societies must reasonably be considered to have anticipated at the close of the Woolwich 1 litigation that the Treasury would seek Parliament's approval to cure the technical defects in the 1986 Regulations and would not be content on public-interest grounds to allow a substantial amount of already collected revenue to be lost on account of a technicality. The Leeds and the National & Provincial instituted their restitution proceedings after the authorities had formally decided to seek Parliament's approval for the retrospective validation of the 1986 Regulations. In those circumstances, those proceedings had to be considered to have been an attempt to benefit from the vulnerability of the authorities' situation following the outcome of the Woolwich 1 litigation and to pre-empt the enactment of remedial legislation. The decision of the authorities to legislate with retrospective effect to remedy the defect in the 1986 Regulations was taken without regard to pending legal proceedings and with the ultimate aim of restoring Parliament's original intention. The legislation was not specifically targeted at Leeds' and National & Provincial's restitution actions even if its effect was to stifle those actions. The Court was especially mindful of the dangers inherent in the use of retrospective legislation which had the effect of influencing the judicial determination of a dispute to which the State was a party, including where the effect was to make pending litigation unwinnable. However, A 6(1) could not be interpreted as preventing any interference by the authorities with pending legal proceedings to which they were a party. The judicial review proceedings launched by the applicant societies had not even reached the stage of an inter partes hearing. Furthermore, in adopting s 64 of the 1992 Act with retrospective effect the authorities in the instant case had even more compelling public-interest motives to make the applicant societies' judicial review proceedings and the contingent restitution proceedings unwinnable than was the case with the enactment of s 53 of the 1991 Act. The challenge to the Treasury Orders created uncertainty over the substantial amounts of revenue collected from 1986 onwards. It had to also be observed that the applicant societies in their efforts to frustrate the intention of Parliament were at all times aware of the probability that Parliament would equally attempt to frustrate those efforts having regard to the decisive stance taken when enacting s 47 of the Finance Act 1986 and s 53 of the 1991 Act. They had engaged the will of the authorities in the tax sector and must have appreciated that the public-interest considerations in placing the 1986 Regulations on a secure legal footing would not be abandoned easily. Therefore the applicant societies could not in the circumstances justifiably complain that they were denied the right of access to a court for a judicial determination of their rights. There had accordingly been no breach of A 6(1).

The complaints raised by the applicant societies under A 14 and 6 reflect the substance of their earlier complaints under A 14 and P1A1. For the same reasons there was no violation of A 6(1) taken in conjunction with A 14. Therefore the applicant societies were not victims of a violation under A 14 and 6.

National Union of Belgian Police (1979–80) 1 EHRR 578 75/2

[Application lodged 5.3.1970; Commission report 27.5.1974; Court Judgment 27.10.1975]

The National Union of Belgian Police complained of the Government refusal to recognise it as one of the most representative organisations that the Ministry of the Interior was required to consult under the Act of 27 July 1961, which related to such matters as staff structures, conditions of recruitment and promotion, pecuniary status and salary scales of provincial and municipal staff. The applicant union, which was excluded from that consultation as regards both questions of interest to all such staff and questions peculiar to the municipal police, considered that it was put at a disadvantage compared with the three trade unions open to that staff as a whole, as defined in Royal Decree of 2 August 1966. It complained that the provision greatly restricted its field of action, thereby tending to oblige the members of the municipal police to join the organisations considered to be 'representative' but having a 'political' character incompatible with the 'special vocation' of the police.

Comm found unanimously, that the State, whether acting as legislator or employer, assumed obligations within the scope of 11(1), by majority (8-5) that the right to consultation and freedom to bargain collectively were elements of trade union action falling within the scope of 11, unanimously NV 11(1), 14+11.

Court found unanimously NV 11, by majority (10-4) NV 14+11.

Judges: Mr G Balladore Pallieri, President, Mr H Mosler, Mr A Verdross, Mr E Rodenbourg, Mr M Zekia (so), Mr J Cremona, Mr G Wiarda (jso), Mr P O'Donoghue, Mrs H Pedersen, Mr T Vilhjálmsson, Mr R Ryssdal, Mr W Ganshof Van Der Meersch (jso), Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice (so), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (jso).

While A 11(1) presented trade union freedom as one form or a special aspect of freedom of association, it did not guarantee any particular treatment of trade unions, or their members, by the State, such as the right to be consulted by it. The phrase 'for the protection of his interests' denoted purpose and showed that the Convention safeguarded freedom to protect the occupational interests of trade union members by trade union action, the conduct and development of which the Contracting States had to both permit and make possible. Therefore the members of a trade union had a right, in order to protect their interests, that the trade union should be heard. A 11(1) left each State a free choice of the means to be used towards this end. While consultation was one of those means, there were others. What the Convention required was that under national law trade unions should be enabled, in conditions not at variance with A 11, to strive for the protection of their members' interests. The applicant union could engage in various kinds of activity vis-à-vis the Government and it was not alleged that the steps it took were ignored by the Government. In those circumstances, the fact alone that the Minister of the Interior did not consult the applicant under the Act of 27 July 1961 did not constitute a breach of A 11(1) considered on its own. As regards the alleged infringement of personal freedom to join or remain a member of the applicant union, every member of the municipal police retained this freedom as of a right, notwithstanding the Royal Decree of 2 August 1966. The policy of restricting the number of organisations to be consulted was not on its own incompatible with trade union freedom; the steps taken to implement it escaped supervision by the Court provided that they did not contravene A 11 and 14 read in conjunction. There was no violation of A 11(1).

Although A 14 had no independent existence, it was complementary to the other normative provisions of the Convention and Protocols: it safeguarded individuals, or groups of individuals, placed in comparable situations, from all discrimination in the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in those provisions. A measure which in itself was in conformity with the requirements of the Article enshrining the right or freedom in question might therefore infringe that Article when read in conjunction with A 14 for the reason that it was of a discriminatory nature. The applicant union was at a disadvantage compared with certain other trade unions on the issue of consultation. Not every distinction amounted to discrimination. The principle of equality of treatment was violated if the distinction had no objective and reasonable justification, and the existence of such a justification had to be assessed in relation to the aim and effects of the measure under consideration. A difference of treatment in the exercise of a right laid down in the Convention had not only to pursue a legitimate aim: A 14 was also violated when it was clearly established that there was no reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. The Government wish to avoid 'trade union anarchy' and consideration that it was necessary 'to ensure a coherent and balanced staff policy, taking due account of the occupational interests of all provincial and communal staff' was a legitimate aim in itself. A 11 and 14 did not oblige Belgium to set up for provincial and municipal staff, and for the municipal police in particular, a consultation system analogous to the one in operation for State officials. Insofar as consultation covered questions of a general nature which were of interest to all provincial and municipal staff: in that regard, the measure contained in the Royal Decree was a proper means of attaining the legitimate aim sought to be realised. The uniform nature of the rule in the Royal Decree did not justify the conclusion that the Government had exceeded the limits of its freedoms to lay down the measures it deemed appropriate in its relations with the trade unions. It had not been clearly established that the disadvantage suffered by the applicant was excessive in relation to the legitimate aim pursued by the Government. The principle of proportionality had therefore not been offended.

Navarra v France (1994) 17 EHRR 594 93/47

[Application lodged 31.7.1987; Commission report 9.9.1992; Court Judgment 23.11.1993]

Mr Paul Navarra, a farmer from Upper Corsica, was remanded in custody on 22 November 1985 on a charge of armed robbery. During his detention on remand in Nice prison, he filed six applications for release. He complained that the final decision in respect of his third application for release, namely, the decision of the Montpellier Indictment Division of 24 October 1986, had not been rendered speedily. On 24 March 1986 the investigating judge had dismissed the third application, which had been made on 19 March. On 23 April 1986 the Indictment Division found inadmissible the appeal filed by the applicant on 25 March against that decision. On 28 May 1986 the applicant appealed to the Court of Cassation, which received the file on 19 June. On 13 September 1986 it quashed the contested decision and remitted the case to the Indictment Division of the Montpellier Court of Appeal. On 24 October 1986 the Montpellier Indictment Division declared the appeal of 25 March 1986 ill-founded and confirmed the order made on 24 March dismissing the application for release of 19 March. He complained that his appeal of 25 March 1986 against the order made the previous day had not been heard on its merits speedily.

Comm found by majority (13–6) NV 5(4).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found NV 5(4).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka, Mr L Wildhaber.

The Government contended that the applicant had failed to exhaust his domestic remedies as he had not brought an action for compensation against the State. An action for damages may be relevant for the purposes of A 26, but the only remedies which that article required to be exhausted were those that related to the breaches alleged and which were available and sufficient. The existence of such remedies had to be sufficiently certain not only in theory but also in practice, failing which they would lack the requisite accessibility and effectiveness. The relevant provision circumscribed the State's liability very narrowly and may not have assisted the applicant. In any event, the right to a speedy decision on the lawfulness of detention had to be distinguished from the right to receive compensation for such detention. In addition, the Compensation Board of the Court of Cassation rejected the applicant's claim as ill-founded. The objection was therefore dismissed.

Regarding the scope of A 5(1) and 5(4), a periodic judicial review, if it was to satisfy the requirements of those provisions, had to comply with both the substantive and the procedural rules of the national legislation and moreover be conducted in conformity with the aim of A 5, namely to protect the individual against arbitrariness. The courts before which the case came gave their decisions within the time-limits laid down by law. There was a delay for which the applicant was responsible, however, the forwarding of the file to the Court of Cassation and subsequently to the Montpellier Indictment Division, following the remittal of the case to that court, took some time. A 5(4) did not compel the Contracting States to set up a second level of jurisdiction for the examination of the lawfulness of detention and for hearing applications for release. Nevertheless, a State which instituted such a system had in principle to accord to the detainees the same guarantees on appeal as at first instance. The applicant retained the right, enshrined in French law, to submit further applications for release at any time. Yet from 25 March to 24 October 1986 he did not file any new applications and did not do so until 20 March 1987. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 5(4).

Neigel v France 97/12

[Application lodged 29.1.1991; Commission report 17.10.1995; Court Judgment 17.3.1997]

On 4 July 1978, Miss Florence Neigel started working as an auxiliary shorthand typist for Biarritz Town. She was appointed as a trainee on 1 March 1979 and given a permanent post on 1 March 1980. She took leave of absence and applied for reinstatement thereafter. On 22 July 1986 she applied to the Pau Administrative Court to have the mayor's decision confirming her 'technical reinstatement' and her 'leave of absence without pay' quashed and to obtain an order that he should pay her the salary she should have received. Her application was rejected and an appeal to the Conseil d'Etat was dismissed in January 1991. She complained about the length of the civil proceedings.

Comm found by majority (19–10) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (8–1) A 6 not applicable.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm (d), Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev.

The applicant sought reinstatement and the outcome of the proceedings in the administrative courts was directly decisive for her right to reinstatement. There was accordingly a dispute over a right within the meaning of A 6(1). Disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the present case it was clear from the evidence that the applicant was essentially seeking reinstatement to the permanent post of shorthand typist at Biarritz Town Hall that she had held previously. The dispute raised by her clearly related to her recruitment, her career and the termination of her service. It therefore did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Regarding her claim for payment of the salary she would have received if she had been reinstated, an award of such compensation by the administrative court was directly dependent on a prior finding that the refusal to reinstate was unlawful. A 6(1) did not therefore apply to the case.

Mr Fritz Neumeister was formerly the owner and director of a large transport firm. Following investigations in 1959 and 1960 he was arrested and remanded in custody in respect of tax offences and fraud. He was provisionally released but re-arrested and detained in July 1962. His appeals for provisional release were dismissed. On 8 January 1964 his provisional release was ordered against a monetary security and the voluntary deposit of his passport with the Court. The indictment was 219 pages long and concerned ten persons. On 18 June 1965, after one hundred and two days of the hearing, the Regional Criminal Court of Vienna, postponed the completion of the trial indefinitely so that the investigation might be completed. Two counts were discontinued and the trial was resumed before the Regional Criminal Court of Vienna on 4 December 1967. The applicant complained of his detention and length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (11–1) V 5(3), (6–6 with the President's casting vote) V 6(1) as regards length of proceedings, (8–2 with two abstentions) NV 5(4) or 6(1) as regards the applicant's release.

A 5(3) could not be understood as giving the judicial authorities a choice between either bringing the accused to trial within a reasonable time or granting him provisional release even subject to guarantees. The reasonableness of the time spent by an accused person in detention up to the beginning of the trial had to be assessed in relation to the very fact of his detention. Until conviction, he had to be presumed innocent and the purpose of the provision under consideration was essentially to require his provisional release once his continuing detention ceased to be reasonable. In determining whether or not the detention of an accused person exceeded a reasonable limit, it was for the national judicial authorities to seek all the facts arguing for or against the existence of a genuine requirement of public interest justifying a departure from the rule of respect for individual liberty. It was essentially on the basis of the reasons given in the decisions on the applications for release pending trial and of the true facts mentioned by the applicant in his appeals, that the Court was called upon to decide whether or not there has been a violation of the Convention. The applicant was subjected to two periods of detention on remand, the first from 24 February 1961 to 12 May 1961, lasting two months, 17 days, and the second from 12 July 1962 to 16 September 1964, lasting two years, two months, four days. The first period could not be considered as the applicant did not approach the Commission until after the six-month time-limit laid down in A 26 had expired. That period of detention nevertheless had to be taken into account in assessing the reasonableness of his later detention. The Court could take into consideration detention subsequent to 12 July 1963, the day on which he filed his application as he had complained not of an isolated act but rather of a situation in which he had been for some time and which was to last until it was ended by a decision granting him provisional release. It would be excessively formalistic and would paralyse the workings of the Commission and Court to demand that an applicant denouncing such a situation should file a new application with the Commission after each final decision rejecting a request for release. For those reasons, the Court had found that it had to examine the applicant's continued detention on remand until his provisional release on 16 September 1964. The reason invoked by the authorities to justify their rejection of the applications for release was the danger of absconding. The danger of flight could not, however, be evaluated solely on the basis of fear of greater gravity of criminal and civil penalties. Other factors, especially those relating to the character of the person involved, his morals, his home, his occupation, his assets, his family ties and all kinds of links with the country in which he was being prosecuted may either confirm the existence of a danger of flight or make it appear so small that it cannot justify detention pending trial. In addition the danger of flight necessarily decreased as the time spent in detention passed by. The Court was not in a position to state an opinion as to the amount of security which could reasonably be demanded of the applicant. However, the concern to fix the amount of the guarantee to be furnished by a detained person solely in relation to the amount of the loss imputed to him did not appear to be in conformity with A 5(3). The guarantee provided for by A 5(3) was designed to ensure not the reparation of loss but rather the presence of the accused at the hearing. Its amount had therefore to be assessed principally by reference to him, his assets and his relationship with the persons who were to provide the security, in other words to the degree of confidence that was possible that the prospect of loss of the security or of action against the guarantors in case of his non-appearance at the trial would act as a sufficient deterrent to dispel any wish on his part to abscond. For those reasons, the Court found that the applicant's continued provisional detention until 16 September 1964 constituted a violation of A 5(3).

The period to be taken into consideration in considering length of proceedings under A 6(1) began with the day on which a person was charged. The applicant was charged on 23 February 1961. The period ended with the judgment determining the charge. In the present case there had not yet been a judgment on the merits. More than seven years had elapsed indicating an exceptionally long period which in most cases should be considered as exceeding the reasonable time laid down in A 6(1). For a period of fifteen months there was no interrogation of the applicant nor any investigation by the Judge. There was a long investigation but nevertheless the trial court was compelled, after sitting for several months, to order further investigations. However it could not be concluded that the reasonable time laid down in A 6(1) was exceeded in the present case. The case was of extraordinary complexity. Investigations had to be conducted abroad. While severance of the applicant's case from his co-accused may have speeded the case there was no suggestion that severance would here have been compatible with the good administration of justice. Neither would allocation of the case to more than one judge, even if legally possible, have necessarily accelerated the case. A concern for speed could not dispense judges responsible for the investigation or the conduct of the trial from taking every measure likely to throw light on the truth or falsehood of the charges. The delays in opening and reopening the hearing were in large part caused by the need to give the legal representatives and the judges time to acquaint themselves with the case.

The procedure followed by the Austrian courts in examining the applicant's requests for provisional release did not contravene either A 5(4) or A 6(1).

Neves e Silva v Portugal (1991) 13 EHRR 535 89/6

[Application lodged 17.10.1984; Commission report 17.12.1987; Court Judgment 27.4.1989]

Mr José Neves e Silva was a retired accountant. In April 1962 the private company Molda Plásticos Nesil, Lda, of which he was one of the owners and the managing director, requested the Directorate General for Industry for an authorisation to use an automatic machine in order to manufacture plastic fibres from which material its products were made. The request was refused, as were further requests. On 11 May 1972 he instituted proceedings in the Lisbon Administrative Court against the State, a chief engineer in the Directorate General for Industry and shareholders in another company alleging in particular that the chief engineer had acted fraudulently in the exercise of his official duties and that the other defendants had derived benefit from the operation. By a judgment of 30 May 1985, notified to the parties on 9 June, the Supreme Administrative Court upheld the decision of the Lisbon Administrative Court of 1984, finding the action statute-barred. On 7 July 1985, the applicant appealed unsuccessfully to the Supreme Administrative Court and subsequently to the Conferencia, a judicial committee consisting of the judge rapporteur and two other members of the court which on 4 March 1986 upheld the decision of the rapporteur of the Supreme Administrative Court. The applicant complained that the administrative courts had not heard his case within a reasonable time.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed preliminary objections, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos.

A 6(1) extended to disputes over civil rights which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law, irrespective of whether they were also protected under the Convention. Those conditions are satisfied in the present case. A dispute had arisen between the applicant and the State. It no longer concerned the 'right' to manufacture plastic fibres, but the right to receive compensation for culpable conduct on the part of the administrative authorities. The Administrative Court recognised that the applicant had locus standi. The right claimed by the applicant consisted in financial reparation for pecuniary damage. It was therefore a 'civil right', notwithstanding the origin of the dispute and the jurisdiction of the administrative courts. A 6(1) was therefore applicable. The issue before the Court was not whether the applicant met with an unlawful refusal to grant him the authorisation sought, but whether the case was heard within a reasonable time as required under A 6(1). In that respect he was entitled to claim the status of 'victim' for the purposes of A 25. The fact that he was a minority shareholder was immaterial in this connection. The preliminary objection of lack of victim status was therefore rejected.

In this case the period to be considered did not begin to run when the action was first brought before the competent court but only when, on 9 November 1978, the Convention entered into force with regard to Portugal. In order to establish whether the time which elapsed following this date was reasonable, it was however necessary to take account of the stage which the proceedings had reached at that point. The period ended on 9 June 1985, the date of the notification of the Supreme Administrative Court's judgment to the applicant. The period had lasted six years and seven months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard, inter alia, to the complexity of the case and to the conduct of the parties and the competent authorities. The dispute was not a complex one. Although under the Portuguese Code of Civil Procedure it was for the parties to take the initiative with regard to the progress of proceedings, the court was placed under a duty to show diligence. The applicant had to wait, after Portugal's ratification of the Convention, more than six years for a decision which, moreover, merely found that the right relied on was statute-barred. The delays in the proceedings, which were instituted in 1972, could not be regarded as the consequence of a temporary crisis or justified thereby. A reasonable time had been exceeded, resulting in a violation of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary damages (PTE 500,000) costs and expenses (PTE 400,000).

News Verlags GmbH & Co KG v Austria 00/5

[Application lodged 13.3.1996; Court Judgment 11.1.2000]

The applicant was the publisher and owner of the magazine News. In December 1993 the applicant company published articles dealing with the a letter-bomb campaign directed against politicians and others in the public eye, some of whom had been severely injured. The articles also covered the activities of the extreme right and, in particular, the suspect B including pictures of him. On 21 January 1994 B brought proceedings under s 78 of the Copyright Act against the applicant company, requesting that the latter be prohibited from publishing his picture in connection with reports on any criminal proceedings against him. He also requested a preliminary injunction to that effect. On 9 March 1994 the Vienna Commercial Court dismissed B's motion for a preliminary injunction. B appealed and on 22 September 1994 the Vienna Court of Appeal issued a preliminary injunction prohibiting the applicant company from publishing B's picture in connection with reports on the criminal proceedings against him. On 22 November 1994 the Supreme Court upheld that decision. Appeals by the applicant were dismissed. In December 1995 a first-instance court acquitted B of the charges of assault but convicted him of offences under the Prohibition Act. The criminal proceedings against B received extensive news coverage. Newspapers other than the applicant company remained free to publish B's picture. On 18 December 1995 the Vienna Court of Appeal, in proceedings brought by B under the Media Act, found that the applicant company had violated the presumption of innocence in referring to B in its articles as the perpetrator of the letter bomb terror, and ordered it to pay ATS 50,000 by way of compensation to him. The applicant company complained that its right to freedom of expression had been violated.

Court found unanimously V 10, not necessary to examine 14+10.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr J Casadevall, Mr R Türmen, Mr C Bîrsan, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr R Maruste.

The prohibition of the publication of B's picture in the context of reports on the criminal proceedings against him, which limited the applicant company's choice as to the form in which it could present such reports, constituted an interference with its right to freedom of expression. The interference was prescribed by law, the Copyright Act, and pursued a legitimate aim, namely the protection of the reputation or rights of others as well as maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. In considering whether the interference was necessary in a democratic society, the Court had to look at it in the light of the case as a whole, including the context in which the reports were written. The articles were written against the background of a spectacular series of letter bombs which had been sent to politicians and other persons in the public eye in Austria and had severely injured several victims. The attacks, thus, were a news item of major public concern. B was a right-wing extremist, he had entered the public scene well before the letter-bomb series and the offences he was suspected of, namely, offences under the Prohibition Act and aiding and abetting assault through letter bombs, were offences with a political background directed against the foundations of a democratic society. The photographs of B, with the possible exception of one wedding picture, did not disclose any details of his private life and so did not encroach upon B's right to privacy. The essential function the press fulfilled in a democratic society also had to be taken into account. Although the press should not overstep certain bounds, its duty was nevertheless to impart information and ideas on all matters of public interest. The media had the task of imparting the information and ideas and the public had a right to receive them, all the more so where, as in the present case, a person was involved who had laid himself open to public scrutiny by expressing extremist views. However, the limits of permissible comment on pending criminal proceedings could not extend to statements which were likely to prejudice, whether intentionally or not, the chances of a person receiving a fair trial or to undermine the confidence of the public in the role of the courts in the administration of justice. Thus, the fact that B had a right under A 6(2) to be presumed innocent until proved guilty was also of relevance for the balancing of competing interests which the Court had to carry out. The Vienna Court of Appeal stated in the reasons for its decision and in its subsequent judgment of 30 August 1995 that it was not the publication of B's picture in itself but its combination with comments which were insulting and contrary to the presumption of innocence that violated B's legitimate interests within the meaning of s 78 of the Copyright Act. Nevertheless, the court prohibited the applicant company from publishing B's picture irrespective of the accompanying text. There might be good reasons for prohibiting the publication of a suspect's picture in itself, depending on the nature of the offence at issue and the particular circumstances of the case. However, no reasons were given by the Vienna Court of Appeal. Nor did it carry out a weighing of B's interest in the protection of his picture against the public interest in its publication which was required under s 78 of the Copyright Act. This was all the more surprising as the publication of a suspect's picture was not generally prohibited under s 7a of the Media Act unless the suspect was a juvenile or the offences were only of a minor nature, but depended precisely on a weighing of the respective interests. In sum, the reasons adduced by the Vienna Court of Appeal, though relevant, were not sufficient. Although the injunctions did not restrict the applicant company's right to publish comments on the criminal proceedings against B, they restricted its choice as to the presentation of its reports, while other media were free to continue to publish B's picture throughout the criminal proceedings against him. Having regard also to the domestic courts' finding that it was not the pictures used by the applicant company, but only their combination with the text, that interfered with B's rights, the absolute prohibition of the publication of B's picture went further than was necessary to protect B against defamation or against violations of the presumption of innocence. There was no reasonable relationship of proportionality between the injunctions as formulated by the Vienna Court of Appeal and the legitimate aims pursued and therefore the interference with the applicant company's right to freedom of expression was not necessary in a democratic society. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 10.

Having regard to the findings under A 10 it was not necessary to examine the complaint under A 14.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (ATS 276,105.02).

Nibbio v Italy 92/3

[Application lodged 3.4.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 26.2.1992]

Mrs Silvana Nibbio instituted proceedings on 20 October 1982 against the Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale in the Rome magistrates' court to obtain a declaration of her right to a disability pension. The investigation commenced at the hearing of 22 February 1983. The applicant's appeal to the District Court was dismissed on 1 June 1989. She then appealed to the Court of Cassation, a hearing took place on 27 September 1991, but no judgment had yet been given at the date of the judgment of the Court of Human Rights.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 20 October 1982 when the proceedings were instituted in the magistrates' court. They had not yet ended since the applicant's appeal was still pending in the Court of Cassation. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Special diligence was necessary in employment disputes, which included pensions disputes. A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. In this case the magistrates' court took more than three years to give judgment. The applicant did not appeal from the judgment of 12 February 1986 until the following 20 October, for which period the State was not responsible, but the appeal proceedings remained dormant for approximately 25 months. The were further delays on the part of the courts. In addition the Court of Cassation had still not given judgment. In those circumstances and in view of what was at stake in the proceedings for the applicant, a lapse of time which was already more than nine years could not be regarded as reasonable. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Nicodemo v Italy 97/63

[Application lodged 21.8.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Aldo Giuseppe Nicodemo, a lawyer who was already employed by the Calabria Regional Council on a fixed-term contract, was taken into its permanent employment. He instituted proceedings in the Calabria Regional Administrative Court on 15 May 1984 seeking implementation of that decision, the difference in remuneration and damages for the delay. The proceedings were still pending.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt (d), President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (c), Mr AB Baka (d), Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (d), Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

Before the Administrative Court the applicant sought, in addition to implementation of the Regional Council's decision to recruit him, payment of the difference in salary and damages for the delay in implementing the decision. The right asserted by the applicant was essentially economic and the administrative authorities' discretionary powers were not in issue. Consequently, the private-law features predominated over the public-law features. Accordingly, A 6(1) was applicable. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. Despite the applicant's three applications to the court to fix a date for hearing and although more than 13 years had already elapsed since the case was submitted to it, the Administrative Court had still not fixed a date for the first hearing. Such a lengthy period failed to satisfy the reasonable time requirement laid down in A 6(1).

Nideröst-Huber v Switzerland (1998) 25 EHRR 709 97/3

[Application lodged 17.10.1991; Commission report 23.10.1995; Court Judgment 18.2.1997]

On 9 December 1985 Mr Armin Nideröst-Huber was dismissed without notice from the posts of chairman and managing director of a family-run public limited company incorporated under Swiss law, following a change of majority among the shareholders. On 29 July 1986 he brought proceedings against the company seeking arrears of salary and a severance payment. The Schwyz District Court gave judgment against him on 22 September 1988. On 19 June 1990 the Cantonal Court dismissed his appeal. The Cantonal Court transmitted the appeal to the Federal Court on 22 October together with the case file and one page of observations which were not communicated to the applicant. In those observations it argued that the appeal should be dismissed and refuted some of the grounds of appeal. On 1 March 1991 the Federal Court dismissed the appeal. The applicant complained that contrary to A 6(1) he had not received a copy of the observations sent by the Schwyz Cantonal Court to the Federal Court and had therefore been deprived of the opportunity to comment on them before the Federal Court gave judgment.

The filing of observations was not incompatible with the requirements of a fair trial. The principle of equality of arms, one of the elements of the broader concept of fair trial, required each party to be given a reasonable opportunity to present his case under conditions that did not place him at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent. The Cantonal Court's observations were not communicated to either of the parties to the dispute before the Federal Court. The Cantonal Court, which was an independent tribunal, could not be regarded as the opponent of either of the parties. Accordingly, no infringement of equality of arms had been established. However, the concept of fair trial also implied in principle the right for the parties to a trial to have knowledge of and comment on all evidence adduced or observations filed. Even though the observations in issue ran to only one page they nevertheless constituted a reasoned opinion on the merits of the appeal, and explicitly called for it to be dismissed. They were therefore aimed at influencing the Federal Court's decision. The effect they actually had on the decision was of little consequence. As the observations came from an independent tribunal which had a thorough knowledge of the file, having previously considered the merits of the case, it was unlikely that the Federal Court would have paid them no heed. It was therefore all the more needful to give the applicant an opportunity to comment on them if he wished to do so. It was of little consequence that the case concerned civil litigation, where the national authorities enjoyed greater latitude than in the criminal sphere; on that point the requirements derived from the right to adversarial proceedings were the same in both civil and criminal cases. Nor was the position altered when, in the opinion of the courts concerned, the observations did not present any fact or argument which had not already appeared in the decision. Only the parties to a dispute could properly decide whether that was the case. What was particularly at stake here was litigants' confidence in the workings of justice, which was based on, inter alia, the knowledge that they had had the opportunity to express their views on every document in the file. The filing of observations may have been calculated to save time and expedite the proceedings but that did not justify disregarding such a fundamental principle as the right to adversarial proceedings. A 6(1) was intended above all to secure the interests of the parties and those of the proper administration of justice. Respect for the right to a fair trial, guaranteed by A 6(1), required that the applicant be informed that the Cantonal Court had sent observations and that he be given the opportunity to comment on them. In addition, according to the Government's explanations at the hearing before the Court, that was the normal practice of the Federal Court. It was not followed in this case. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

Judgment constituted just satisfaction in respect of any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (CHF 10,775).

Niedbala v Poland 00/173

[Application lodged 5.2.1995; Commission report 1.3.1999; Court Judgment 4.7.2000]

On 31 August 1994 Mr Maciej Niedbala, the applicant, was arrested and on 2 September 1994 the District Public Prosecutor ordered his remand in custody on suspicion of theft of a car. His appeal to the Katowice Regional Court was dismissed on 12 September 1994. His detention was prolonged by the District Public Prosecutor and his further appeal was dismissed on 10 October 1994. The applicant was not entitled to be present at the court hearings relating to his detention, the decisions were taken on the basis of the case-file and the prosecutor's submissions which were not communicated to the applicant. On 20 March 1995, he was convicted of possessing stolen goods and released. On 21 April 1995, he was re-arrested in respect of a new offence. A District Prosecutor ordered his detention on remand, his appeal was dismissed by the District Court six days later. Whilst in detention, the applicant wrote a letter to the Ombudsman, complaining about alleged irregularities in the criminal proceedings against him. He complained of his detention and that a letter he had written to the Ombudsman was opened and delayed.

The role of the officer referred to in A 5(3) was to review the circumstances militating for and against detention and to decide, by reference to legal criteria, whether there were reasons to justify detention and to order release if there were no such reasons. Before an officer could be said to exercise 'judicial power' within the meaning of the provision, he or she had to satisfy certain conditions providing a guarantee to the person detained against any arbitrary or unjustified deprivation of liberty. The officer had to be independent of the executive and of the parties. The judicial control of the detention had to be automatic. It could not be made to depend on a previous application by the detained person. Prosecutors in Poland were subject to supervision of the executive branch of the Government. They performed investigative and prosecuting functions and had to be seen as a party to criminal proceedings. The prosecutors, who remanded the applicant in custody, questioned him before making the detention order and considered whether in the circumstances of the case his detention would be justified. However, that did not suffice for a finding that the prosecutors offered such guarantees of independence as could be regarded as being in compliance with the requirements of A 5(3). The detention orders were subject to judicial review, carried out after 10 days and six days. However, that review was not automatic as it depended on the application lodged with the court by the applicant. Consequently, the fact that judicial review of his detention was open to him did not remedy the shortcoming that the detention orders were made by the prosecutors. Polish law did not offer any safeguards against the risk that the same prosecutor who decided on the applicant's detention on remand might later take part in the prosecution. There had therefore been a violation of A 5(3).

Under A 5(4), an arrested or detained person was entitled to bring proceedings for the review by a court of the procedural and substantive conditions which were essential for the lawfulness of his or her deprivation of liberty. The procedure under A 5(4) had to have a judicial character and provide appropriate guarantees. The law did not entitle either the applicant himself or his lawyer to attend the court session concerning the detention on remand and the provisions did not require that the prosecutor's submissions in support of the applicant's detention be communicated either to the applicant or to his lawyer. The applicant did not have any opportunity to comment on those. The prosecutor was entitled to be present at any of court sessions in which the court examined the lawfulness of the applicant's detention and on one occasion he was present. There had therefore been a violation of A 5(4).

There was interference by a public authority with the exercise of the applicant's right to respect for his correspondence. The expression 'in accordance with the law' necessitated compliance with domestic law and also related to the quality of that law. Domestic law had to indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of exercise of the relevant discretion conferred on the public authorities so as to ensure to individuals the minimum degree of protection to which citizens were entitled under the rule of law in a democratic society. Polish law allowed for automatic censorship of prisoners' correspondence by the authorities conducting criminal proceedings without drawing any distinction between the different categories of persons with whom the prisoners could correspond. Consequently, the correspondence with the Ombudsman was subject to censorship. The relevant provisions had not laid down any principles governing the exercise of this censorship. In particular, they failed to specify the manner and the time-frame within which censorship should be effected. As the censorship was automatic, the authorities were not obliged to give a reasoned decision specifying grounds on which it had been effected. Polish law therefore did not indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of exercise of discretion conferred on the public authorities in respect of control of prisoners' correspondence and accordingly the interference complained of was not 'in accordance with the law'.

Nielsen v Denmark (1989) 11 EHRR 175 88/16

[Application lodged 15.2.1984; Commission report 12.3.1987; Court Judgment 28.11.1988]

Jon Nielsen was born in 1971. His parents lived together from 1968 until 1973. They were not married and, in accordance with Danish law, only the mother had parental rights over the child. After the parents separated in 1973, the applicant remained with the mother and the father had access to him. The father's proceedings for custody to be transferred to him were unsuccessful. In November 1982, after having lived 'underground' for more than 3 years, the applicant's father again instituted proceedings before the City Court of Ballerup in order to have the custody rights transferred to him. Since he was wanted by the police, on suspicion of having kidnapped the applicant, the father did not attend the hearings in person, but only through his lawyer. His application was rejected. He appealed to the Court of Appeal, which on 22 September 1983 upheld the City Court's judgment. Directly after the hearing in the Court of Appeal, at which both the father and the applicant were present, the father was arrested by the police and charged with depriving the mother of the exercise of her parental rights. The applicant was placed in a children's home. The mother, advised by Social Welfare and Professor Tolstrup, Chief Physician at the State Hospital's Child Psychiatric Ward and with the recommendation of her family doctor, requested that the applicant, who was by then 12 years old, be admitted to the State Hospital's Child Psychiatric Ward since it was clear that he did not want to stay with her. On 26 September 1983, the applicant was admitted to the Ward by Professor Tolstrup, who was Chief Physician at the Ward. On 29 September, the Social Welfare Committee recorded its approval that the applicant was to be placed away from home in accordance with his mother's wish. The applicant's challenge, through his father, of the lawfulness of his placement in the Child Psychiatric Ward was rejected. The applicant absconded from 22 February 1984 to 8 March. He was discharged from the hospital on 30 March 1984 and placed in the care of a family not officially known to the father. He complained that his placement at the Child Psychiatric Ward constituted a breach of A 5(1).

Comm found by majority (11–1) V 5, (10–2) V 5(4).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (9–7) A 5 not applicable.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (jd), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti (jd/so), Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo (jd) Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann (jd), Mr J De Meyer (jd), Mr JA Carrillo Salcedo (jd/d), Mr N Valticos (jd), Mr B Gomard, ad hoc judge.

The applicant's complaints did not fall clearly outside the provisions of the Convention. The complaints related to the interpretation and application of the Convention and raised questions going to the merits of the case, which could not be tried merely as preliminary issues. The Government's preliminary objection (that the applicant's complaint was inadmissible under A 27(2) as being incompatible, ratione personae, with the provisions of the Convention), was therefore considered with the merits.

A 5 applied to 'everyone', including minors. Family life encompassed a broad range of parental rights and responsibilities in regard to care and custody of minor children. The care and upbringing of children normally and necessarily required that the parents decided where the child had to reside and also imposed, or authorised others to impose, various restrictions on the child's liberty. The question of hospitalisation was taken by the mother in her capacity as holder of parental rights. Neither the Chief Physician's nor the social authorities' involvement in the case altered the mother's position under Danish law as sole person with power to decide on the hospitalisation of the applicant or on his removal from hospital. Seen in relation to the mother's parental powers, the assistance rendered by the authorities was of a limited and subsidiary nature. Accordingly, the applicant's admission to and stay in the Child Psychiatric Ward were decided by the mother in the exercise of her parental rights. A 5 therefore was not applicable in so far as it was concerned with deprivation of liberty by the authorities of the State. When taking her decision on the basis of medical advice from her family doctor and from Professor Tolstrup, she had as her objective the protection of the applicant's health. That was a proper purpose for the exercise of parental rights. The treatment given at the hospital and the conditions under which it was administered were not inappropriate in the circumstances. The applicant needed medical treatment for his nervous condition and the treatment administered to him was curative, aiming at securing his recovery from his neurosis. This treatment did not involve medication, but consisted of regular talks and environmental therapy. The restrictions on the applicant's freedom of movement and contacts with the outside world were not much different from restrictions which might be imposed on a child in an ordinary hospital. The duration of his treatment was five and a half months, which did not exceed the average period of therapy at the ward and, in addition, the restrictions imposed were relaxed as treatment progressed. There was no abuse of psychiatry. The rights of the holder of parental authority could not be unlimited and it was incumbent on the State to provide safeguards against abuse. However, it did not follow that the present case fell within the ambit of A 5. The restrictions imposed on the applicant were not of a nature or degree similar to the cases of deprivation of liberty specified in A 5(1). The applicant was still of an age at which it would be normal for a decision to be made by the parent even against the wishes of the child. There was no evidence of bad faith on the part of the mother. Hospitalisation was decided upon by her in accordance with expert medical advice. The hospitalisation of the applicant did not amount to a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of A 5 but was a responsible exercise by his mother of her custodial rights in the interest of the child. Accordingly, A 5 was not applicable in the case.

[Application lodged 15.2.1988; Commission report 29.5.1991; Court Judgment 16.12.1992]

Mr Gottfried Niemietz was a lawyer. On 9 December 1985 a letter was sent to Judge Miosga of the Freising District Court relating to criminal proceedings for insulting behaviour pending before that court against Mr J, an employer who refused to deduct from his employees' salaries and pay over to the tax office the Church tax to which they were liable. The letter bore the signature of one Klaus Wegner , followed by the words 'on behalf of the Anti-clerical Working Group of the Freiburg Bunte Liste (multi-coloured group)' and a post-office box number. The applicant had, as a city councillor, been chairman for some years of the Freiburg Bunte Liste, which was a local political party. He had also played a role in its Anti-clerical Working Group, which sought to curtail the influence of the Church. The applicant's colleague had also been active on behalf of the party and had acted for it professionally. Following lack of success in serving a summons on Klaus Wegner and the applicant's colleague refusal to give any information Munich District Court issued, on 8 August 1986, a warrant to search the law office of the applicant and his colleague and the homes of other persons. Those searching neither found the documents they were seeking nor seized any materials from the law offices. The applicant's appeal against the search warrant was dismissed as inadmissible. His constitutional complaint was rejected by the Federal Constitutional Court. He complained that the search had violated his right to respect for his home and correspondence and had also, by impairing the goodwill of his law office and his reputation as a lawyer, constituted a breach of his rights under P1A1.

Comm found unanimously V 8, no separate issue under P1A1.

It was not possible or necessary to attempt an exhaustive definition of the notion of 'private life'. There was no reason of principle why private life should exclude activities of a professional or business nature. It was not always possible to distinguish clearly which of an individual's activities formed part of his professional or business life and which did not. To deny the protection of A 8 on the ground that the measure complained of related only to professional activities could lead to an inequality of treatment, in that such protection would remain available to a person whose professional and non-professional activities were so intermingled that there was no means of distinguishing between them. To interpret the words 'private life' and 'home' as including certain professional or business activities or premises would be consonant with the essential object and purpose of A 8, namely to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities. In addition in the Article, there was no adjective to qualify the word 'correspondence' as there was for the word 'life'. The search of the applicant's office constituted an interference with his rights under A 8. The interference was in accordance with the law, the Code of Criminal Procedure. The interference pursued aims that were legitimate under A 8(2), namely the prevention of crime and the protection of the rights of others, that was the honour of Judge Miosga. The offence in connection with which the search was effected, involving as it did not only an insult to but also an attempt to bring pressure on a judge, could not be classified as no more than minor. On the other hand, the warrant was drawn in broad terms, in that it ordered a search for and seizure of 'documents', without any limitation, revealing the identity of the author of the offensive letter; that point was of special significance where, as in Germany, the search of a lawyer's office was not accompanied by any special procedural safeguards, such as the presence of an independent observer. More importantly, having regard to the materials that were in fact inspected, the search impinged on professional secrecy to an extent that appeared disproportionate in the circumstances; where a lawyer was involved, an encroachment on professional secrecy might have repercussions on the proper administration of justice and hence on the rights guaranteed by A 6. In addition, the attendant publicity must have been capable of affecting adversely the applicant's professional reputation, in the eyes both of his existing clients and of the public at large. Therefore there was a breach of A 8.

Having already taken into consideration, in the context of A 8, the potential effects of the search on the applicant's professional reputation, the Court found that no separate issue arose under P1A1.

Applicant not established that the breach of A 8 caused him pecuniary damage. If it did occasion non-pecuniary damage, the finding of a violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction. No particulars supplied of costs and expenses.

Nikolova v Bulgaria 99/14

[Application lodged 6.2.1996; Commission report 20.5.1998; Court Judgment 25.3.1999]

Mrs Ivanka Nikolova used to work as a cashier and accountant in a State-owned enterprise. On 15 March 1995 criminal proceedings were brought against her for misappropriation of funds. On 24

October 1995 she was arrested and charged under the Criminal Code. The investigator heard the applicant in the presence of her lawyer and decided to detain her on remand. On the same day, without having heard the applicant, a prosecutor from the Regional Prosecutor's Office confirmed the decision to detain her. On 6 November 1995 she appealed against her detention to the Chief Public Prosecutor's Office. Her application was dismissed and a further appeal against her detention on remand was dismissed by the Chief Public Prosecutor's Office in January 1996. On 14 November 1995 the applicant appealed to the Plovdiv Regional Court arguing that the decision to detain her on remand had been based solely on the gravity of the charges against her whereas other important factors had not been taken into account, that she had a permanent address where she lived with her husband and two daughters, that she had known about the criminal charges against her for more than six months prior to her arrest but had made no attempt to abscond or obstruct the investigation and that the evidence against her was weak. Her appeal and submissions were lodged through the Regional Prosecutor's Office. On 4 December 1995 the Regional Prosecutor's Office transmitted the appeal together with the investigator's file and a covering letter to the Regional Court. On 11 December 1995 the court examined the case in camera, without the participation of the parties, and dismissed the appeal. On 19 February 1996 the applicant's detention on remand was discontinued in view of her health problems by an order of the Regional Prosecutor's Office. The applicant was put under house arrest. She complained about her arrest and detention on remand and her appeal against detention

Comm found unanimously V 5(3), V 5(4).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 5(3), V 5(4).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Bonello (pd), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris (pd), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mr M Fischbach (pd), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (pd), Mr B Zupancic, Mrs H S Greve (pd), Mr A B Baka, Mr R Maruste (pd), Mrs S Botoucharova (declaration).

The Government's objection of non-exhaustion was not raised, as it could have been, when the admissibility of the application was being considered by the Commission. There was therefore estoppel.

The role of the officer referred to in A 5(3) was to review the circumstances militating for and against detention and to decide, by reference to legal criteria, whether there were reasons to justify detention and to order release if there were no such reasons. Before an 'officer' could be said to exercise 'judicial power' within the meaning of that provision, he or she had to satisfy certain conditions providing a guarantee to the person detained against any arbitrary or unjustified deprivation of liberty. The officer had to be independent of the executive and of the parties. The officer had to hear the individual brought before him in person and review, by reference to legal criteria, whether or not the detention was justified. If it was not so justified, the officer had to have the power to make a binding order for the detainee's release. Following her arrest on 24 October 1995 the applicant was brought before an investigator who did not have power to make a binding decision as to her detention and was not procedurally independent from the prosecutor. Moreover, there was no legal obstacle to his acting as a prosecutor at the applicant's trial. The investigator could not therefore be regarded as an officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power within the meaning of A 5(3). The applicant was not heard by a prosecutor. In any event the prosecutor, who could act subsequently as a party to the criminal proceedings against the applicant, was not sufficiently independent and impartial for the purposes of A 5(3). Therefore there had been a violation of A 5(3).

Arrested or detained persons were entitled to a review bearing upon the procedural and substantive conditions which were essential for the lawfulness of their deprivation of liberty. According to the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Supreme Court's practice at the relevant time, a person charged with a 'serious wilful crime' was detained on remand unless he or she demonstrated beyond doubt, the burden of proof being borne by him or her, that there did not exist even a hypothetical danger of absconding, re-offending or obstructing justice. The presumption that such danger existed could be overturned only in exceptional circumstances, such as where the detained person was immobilised by illness. According to the Supreme Court's case-law, it was not for the judge examining an appeal against detention on remand to inquire whether or not the charges are supported by sufficient evidence. That question, and apparently the legal characterisation of the charges, were within the competence of the prosecutor. The task of the Court was not to rule on legislation in abstracto and it did not therefore express a view as to the general compatibility of the above provisions and practice with the Convention. The Court had to examine whether the practical implementation of those provisions and case-law in the applicant's case gave rise to a violation of the Convention, as alleged by her. The Plovdiv Regional Court when examining the applicant's appeal against her detention on remand apparently followed the case-law of the Supreme Court at that time and thus limited its consideration of the case to a verification of whether the investigator and the prosecutor had charged the applicant with a 'serious wilful crime' within the meaning of the Criminal Code and whether her medical condition required release. In her appeal of 14 November 1995, however, the applicant had advanced substantial arguments questioning the soundness of the charges against her and the grounds for her detention referring to concrete facts. In its decision of 11 December 1995 the Regional Court devoted no consideration to any of the arguments, apparently treating them as irrelevant to the question of the lawfulness of the applicant's detention on remand. While A 5(4) did not impose an obligation on a judge examining an appeal against detention to address every argument contained in the appellant's submissions, its guarantees would be deprived of their substance if the judge, relying on domestic law and practice, could treat as irrelevant, or disregard, concrete facts invoked by the detainee and capable of putting in doubt the existence of the conditions essential for the lawfulness of the deprivation of liberty. The submissions of the applicant in her appeal of 14 November 1995 contained such concrete facts and did not appear implausible or frivolous. By not taking these submissions into account the Regional Court failed to provide the judicial review of the scope and nature required by A 5(4). The Plovdiv Regional Court gave its ruling after receiving the prosecutor's written comments inviting it to dismiss the appeal. The applicant was not allowed to reply to these comments and apparently was not able to consult any of the documents in the investigation file in order to challenge the reasons for her detention. The proceedings were therefore not truly adversarial and did not ensure equality of arms between the parties. In view of those findings it was not necessary to inquire whether the same deficient judicial review should have been accessible to her periodically. There had therefore been a violation of A 5(4).

A 5(4) of the Convention constituted a lex specialis in relation to the more general requirements of A 13. The facts underlying the applicant's complaint under A 13 were the same as those examined under A 5(4). Accordingly it was not necessary to examine the allegation of a violation of A 13 in view of the finding of a violation of A 5(4).

Non-pecuniary damage (by majority (11–6) present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction), for costs and expenses (by majority (16–1), BGL 14,000,000 less FF 20,215).

Nilsen and Johnsen v Norway 99/91

[Application lodged 2.11.1993; Commission report 9.9.1998; Court Judgment 25.11.1999]

The first applicant, Mr Arnold Nilsen, was a police inspector and at the material time was President of the Norwegian Police Association. The second applicant, Mr Jan Gerhard Johnsen, was a police constable and at the relevant time was Chairman of the Bergen Police Association. In 1981 Mr Gunnar Nordhus and Mr Edvard Vogt, published a summary of their research into violence in Bergen, in a book which included a chapter on police brutality. The book gave rise to a heated public debate. The Ministry of Justice appointed a Committee of Inquiry consisting of a law professor, Anders Bratholm, and a Supreme Court advocate, Hans Stenberg-Nilsen, to verify whether the research provided a basis for making any general observations as to the nature and extent of police brutality in Bergen. In a report published in 1982 they concluded that the nature and extent of police violence in Bergen was more serious than generally assumed. Following an allegation in a newspaper that Mr Nordhus had lied in connection with the collection of material for his research, the latter instituted defamation proceedings against the newspaper which dismissed the action on the grounds that the accusation had been justified. The Prosecutor-General ordered an investigation the results of which were made public in June 1987 and which reached the overall conclusion that the various allegations of police brutality were unfounded. Charges were laid and 10 people were convicted in jury trials before the High Court of having made false charges against the police, the so-called 'boomerang cases'. The applicants made statements publicised in the press in response to the various accusations of police brutality. In May 1989 Professor Bratholm instituted defamation proceedings against the applicants. The Oslo City Court in its judgment of 7 October 1992 found some of the statements had been defamatory and declared them null and void. It ordered the first applicant to pay non-pecuniary damages and both applicants to pay Professor Bratholm's legal costs. The applicants appealed to the Supreme Court which on 5 May 1993 upheld the City Court's judgment. On 16 January 1998 the Supreme Court ordered the reopening of seven of the 'boomerang cases' and on 16 April 1998 the defendants were acquitted. The applicants complained that the City Court's and the Supreme Court's judgments constituted an unjustified interference with their right to freedom of expression under A 10.

Comm found unanimously V 10.

Court found by majority (12–5) V 10.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr CL Rozakis (d), Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mr M Pellonpää, Mr B Conforti, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr P Kûris (d), Mr R Türmen (d), Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs V Stráznická (d), Mr C Bîrsan, Mr M Fischbach, Mr J Casadevall, Mrs HS Greve (d), Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste.

The impugned measures constituted an interference by a public authority with the applicants' right to freedom of expression. The interference was prescribed by law and pursued a legitimate aim, namely the protection of the reputation or rights of others. Although the applicants argued that the expressions at issue were primarily aimed at Mr Bratholm's informers and were not intended to harm him personally, they were nevertheless capable of adversely affecting Mr Bratholm's reputation. The reasons relied on by the national courts clearly were relevant to the legitimate aim of protecting his reputation. As regards the further question whether the reasons also were sufficient, the impugned statements clearly bore on a matter of serious public concern. There was little scope under A 10(2) for restrictions on political speech or on debate on questions of public interest. Despite the particular role played by the applicants as representatives of professional associations and the privileged protection afforded under the Convention to the kind of speech in issue, the applicants had to act within the bounds set, inter alia, in the interest of the protection of the reputation or rights of others. What was in issue was whether the applicants exceeded the limits of permissible criticism. One of the allegations, accusing Mr Bratholm of deliberate lies, exceeded the limits of permissible criticism. It could be regarded as an allegation of fact susceptible of proof, for which there was no factual basis and which could not be warranted by Mr Bratholm's way of expressing himself. Declaring that statement null and void was justifiable in terms of A 10. However, other statements, in so far as they were imputing improper motives or intentions to Mr Bratholm, were intended to convey the applicants' own opinions and were akin to value-judgments. In as far as those statements implied that Mr Bratholm had misinformed about police violence and fabricated allegations of such misconduct, there existed at the material time certain objective factors supporting the applicants' questioning of Mr Bratholm's investigations: the libel action brought by Mr Nordhus and Mr Vogt in respect of allegations of lies in certain newspaper articles had been unsuccessful; the Prosecutor-General's criminal investigations of the Bergen police had reached the overall conclusion that the various allegations of police brutality were unfounded; in the ensuing 'boomerang cases' a number of informers had been convicted of false accusations against the police. This was not altered by the fact that the Supreme Court subsequently re-opened the 'boomerang cases' and acquitted the defendants. Regard had to be had to the role played by the injured party in the present case, notably the harsh criticism voiced by Mr Bratholm in his book, including the use of a number of derogatory expressions. The applicants were therefore not entirely unjustified in claiming that they were entitled to 'hit back in the same way'. Bearing in mind that the applicants were in their capacity as elected representatives of professional associations responding to criticism of the working methods and ethics within the profession, in weighing the interests of free speech against those of protection of reputation under the necessity test in A 10(2), greater weight should be attached to the plaintiff's own active involvement in a lively public discussion, than was done by the national courts when applying national law. The statements at issue were directly concerned with the plaintiff's contribution to that discussion. A degree of exaggeration should be tolerated in the context of such a heated and continuing public debate of affairs of general concern, where on both sides professional reputations were at stake. Against that background, those other statements did not exceed the limits of permissible criticism for the purposes of A 10. The resultant interference with the applicants' exercise of their freedom of expression was not supported by sufficient reasons in terms of A 10 and was disproportionate to the legitimate aim of protecting the reputation of Mr Bratholm. There had thus been a violation of A 10.

Finding of violation just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage alleged (13–4). Pecuniary damage (12–5) NOK 375,000), costs and expenses (NOK 465,000), additional interest (NOK 50,000).

Nölkenbockhoff v Germany (1991) 13 EHRR 360 87/20

[Application lodged 7.2.1983; Commission report 9.10.1985; Court Judgment 25.8.1987]

Mrs Martha Nölkenbockhoff was the widow and heir of Mr Theodor Nölkenbockhoff, who died on 13 November 1981. He had been a senior manager in a holding company. On 13 November 1974, he was arrested on suspicion, among other things of bankruptcy offences. On 17 May 1976, a 489 page indictment was served on Mr Nölkenbockhoff and four co-defendants. The trial hearings began on 29 October 1976 in the Essen Regional Court. On 11 July 1980, the Regional Court found Mr Nölkenbockhoff and his co-defendants guilty of charges of breach of trust, criminal bankruptcy and fraud but acquitted him of some of the charges. Mr Nölkenbockhoff entered an appeal on points of law but the Federal Court of Justice had not given a decision by the time he died on 13 November. On 1 December 1981, the applicant, as her deceased husband's sole heir, sought orders that the Treasury should bear the necessary costs and expenses incurred by her late husband in connection with his conviction by the Regional Court and that the estate should be paid compensation for his detention pending trial. On 5 March 1982, the Essen Regional Court found against the applicant on grounds that had he not died her husband would almost certainly have been convicted or his conviction almost certainly have been upheld. She appealed to the Hamm Court of Appeal which dismissed the action on 14 July 1982. Her application to the Federal Constitutional Court was rejected on 30 September 1982. She complained that the presumption of innocence had been disregarded by reason of the grounds on which the Essen Regional Court and the Hamm Court of Appeal had refused to award any compensation for the time spent by her husband in detention on remand and to order the Treasury to bear his necessary costs and expenses.

Comm found unanimously V 6(2).

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objection, found by a majority (16–1) NV 6(2).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona (d), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos.

The principle of the presumption of innocence was intended to protect 'everyone charged with a criminal offence' from having a verdict of guilty passed on him without his guilt having been proved according to law. It did not follow that a decision whereby the innocence of a man 'charged with a criminal offence' was put in issue after his death could not be challenged by his widow under A 25: she may be able to show both a legitimate material interest in her capacity as the deceased's heir and a moral interest, on behalf of herself and of the family, in having her late husband exonerated from any finding of guilt. This was the case here, and the applicant could claim to be a 'victim' within the meaning of A 25.

Neither A 6(2) nor any other provision of the Convention gives a person 'charged with a criminal offence' a right to reimbursement of his costs or a right to compensation for lawful detention on remand where proceedings taken against him were discontinued. The double refusal complained of by the applicant accordingly did not in itself offend the presumption of innocence. However, a decision refusing such matters following termination of proceedings may raise an issue under A 6(2) if supporting reasoning which could not be dissociated from the operative provisions amounted in substance to a determination of the accused's guilt without his having previously been proved guilty according to law and, in particular, without his having had an opportunity to exercise the rights of the defence. The Essen Regional Court, the Hamm Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court based their reasoning on provisions which set out exceptions to the rule under German law that, where criminal proceedings were discontinued, the Treasury must bear the necessary costs and expenses of the defendant and pay him compensation for any detention on remand. Applying the provisions meant that the courts, which decided the matter on an equitable basis and had a degree of discretion, were obligated to take into account the state of the proceedings when brought to a close, the conduct of the defendant and the weight of the suspicion still falling on him. The German courts indicated that there were still strong suspicions concerning the applicant. On the basis of the evidence, the decisions described a 'state of suspicion'. They assessed the prospects of success of Mr Nölkenbockhoff's appeal on points of law having regard to the fate of the appeals entered by his co-defendants. They contained a prediction of the probable outcome of the proceedings had they been continued, but not a finding of guilt. In addition, the refusal to order the Treasury to pay costs, expenses or compensation did not amount to a penalty or a measure that could be equated with a penalty. The applicant did not have to bear the costs of the proceedings, but only the costs and expenses of her late husband, and she was not awarded any compensation in respect of his detention on remand. The competent courts did not impose a sanction, but merely refused to order that the costs, expenses or compensation be paid out of public funds. The Convention did not oblige the Contracting States, where a prosecution has been discontinued, to indemnify a person charged with a criminal offence for any detriment he may have suffered. The decisions did not offend the presumption of innocence guaranteed under A 6(2).

Nonnis v Italy 91/58

[Application lodged 5.3.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 3.12.1991]

Mrs Anna Maria Nonnis was a school attendant. On 20 October 1982 she took proceedings against the Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale (INPS) before the Rome magistrates' court to establish her entitlement to a disability pension. The investigation began at the hearing of 22 February 1983. The District Court dismissed her appeal on 4 September 1990. That judgment was filed with the registry on 17 November 1990. The applicant complained about the length of the civil proceedings brought by her.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck the case from the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens.

Despite several reminders from the registry, the applicant showed no interest in the proceedings before the Court. Although there had been no formal withdrawal for the purposes of Rule 49, that was an implied withdrawal which constituted a 'fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter'. In addition there was no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. The Court noted a number of previous cases in which it had considered the same issue and noted that there were 410 cases pending before the Commission concerning compliance with the 'reasonable time' requirement in Italy. Accordingly, the case should be struck out of the list.

Norris v Ireland (1991) 13 EHRR 186 88/14

[Application lodged 5.10.1983; Commission report 12.3.1987; Court Judgment 26.10.1988]

Mr David Norris, the applicant, was an active homosexual and campaigner for homosexual rights in Ireland and a founder member and chairman of the Irish Gay Rights Movement. He complained that Irish laws making certain homosexual practices between consenting adult men criminal offences interfered with his right to respect for private life. He had never been charged with any offence relating to his homosexual activities.

Comm found by majority (6–5) V 8.

Court by majority (8–6) dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 8.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr F Matscher (d), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (d), Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr JA Carrillo Salcedo (d), Mr N Valticos (d).

A 25 could not be used to found an action in the nature of an actio popularis; nor might it form the basis of a claim made in abstracto that a law contravened the Convention. The conditions governing individual applications under A 25 were not necessarily the same as national criteria relating to locus standi. National rules in that respect might serve purposes different from those contemplated by A 25. A 25 entitled individuals to contend that a law violated their rights by itself, in the absence of an individual measure of implementation, if they run the risk of being directly affected by it. The applicant could claim to be the victim of a violation of the Convention within the meaning of A 25.

The legislation in question interfered with the applicant's right to respect for his private life under A 8. The interference was in accordance with the law as it arose from the impugned legislation and it had a legitimate aim, namely, the protection of morals. In considering whether the legislation was necessary in a democratic society for the mentioned aim, the interference had had to answer a pressing social need and be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. National authorities enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation in matters of morals, but that was not unlimited. The present case involved intimate aspects of private life and therefore there had to exist particularly serious reasons before interferences on the part of public authorities could be legitimate under A 8(2). There was better understanding and increased tolerance of homosexual practices. Although some members of the public may be shocked, offended or disturbed by the acts, that could not on its own warrant the application of penal sanctions on consenting adults in private. There was no pressing social need to make such acts criminal offences. Any justification for retention of the law unamended was outweighed by the detrimental effects the provisions could have on homosexual persons. The interference with the applicant's right to respect for his private life could not be justified. Accordingly there was a breach of A 8.

Nortier v The Netherlands (1994) 17 EHRR 273 93/32

[Application lodged 28.4.1988; Commission report 9.7.1992; Court Judgment 24.8.1993]

Mr Erik Hans Nortier was born on 13 May 1972. On 19 September 1987 he was released from a youth custody centre after serving a custodial sentence for rape. On 30 September 1987, he was again arrested on suspicion of attempted rape, which he admitted. On 2 October 1987 the applicant was brought before Judge Meulenbroek, juvenile judge at the Middelburg Regional Court. The applicant was assisted by his lawyer. The private association which was the applicant's legal guardian was represented by two social workers. The applicant again confessed. The judge ordered the applicant's detention on remand and a preliminary investigation with a view to having a psychiatric report drawn up. Neither the applicant nor his lawyer objected. Juvenile Judge Meulenbroek made an order for the applicant's extended detention on remand on 8 October 1987 and prolonged this order twice on the occasion of periodic reviews. At no time did either the applicant or his lawyer raise any objection. The trial was listed before Juvenile Judge Meulenbroek for 6 January 1988. The applicant's challenge to Juvenile Judge Meulenbroek on the grounds of his impartiality was rejected as ill-founded on 6 January 1988. His appeal to the Middelburg Regional Court against that decision was rejected on 22 January 1988. The applicant was eventually tried, on 25 January 1988, by Juvenile Judge Meulenbroek. He was assisted by his lawyer. One of the social workers representing the private association which was the applicant's legal guardian was also present and allowed to speak. Confirming his earlier statements, the applicant admitted the charge, which was then held to be proved in the light of the evidence. In accordance with the recommendation contained in the psychiatric report he was committed to an institution for the psychiatric treatment of juvenile offenders. He did not file an appeal. He complained that he had not received a hearing before an impartial tribunal because the juvenile judge who tried him had also acted as investigating judge during the preliminary investigation and, moreover, had taken several decisions regarding the prolongation of his detention on remand.

What was decisive were not the subjective apprehensions of the suspect, however understandable, but whether, in the particular circumstances of the case, his fears could be held to be objectively justified. The mere fact that Juvenile Judge Meulenbroek also made pre-trial decisions, including decisions relating to detention on remand, could not be taken as in itself justifying fears as to his impartiality; what mattered was the scope and nature of those decisions. Apart from his decisions relating to the applicant's detention on remand, Juvenile Judge Meulenbroek made no other pre-trial decisions than the one allowing the application made by the prosecution for a psychiatric examination of the applicant, which was not contested by the latter. He made no other use of his powers as investigating judge. As for his decisions on the applicant's detention on remand, they could justify fears as to the judge's impartiality only under special circumstances such as those which obtained in the Hauschildt case. There was nothing of that nature in the present case. The questions which the judge had to answer when taking those decisions were not the same as those which were decisive for his final judgment. In finding that there were 'serious indications' against the applicant, the judge's task was only to ascertain summarily that the prosecution had prima facie grounds for the charge against the applicant. The charge had, moreover, been admitted by the applicant and had already at that stage been supported by further evidence. The defendant's interests were looked after by a lawyer, who assisted him at all stages of the proceedings. An appeal was available which would have consisted of a complete rehearing before a chamber of three judges of the Court of Appeal. Under those circumstances the applicant's fear that Juvenile Judge Meulenbroek lacked impartiality could not be regarded as objectively justified. There had therefore not been a violation of A 6(1).

Nsona v The Netherlands 96/57

Francine Nsona and Bata Nsona were both Zairean nationals, born on 15 March 1984 and 26 September 1960 respectively. Bata Nsona arrived in The Netherlands in June 1989, claiming status as a refugee. On 17 November 1992 she was issued with a residence permit for 'cogent reasons of a humanitarian nature'. The permit also applied to her son born in 1992. Francine, Bata Nsona and the latter's son arrived at Schiphol Airport on 29 December 1993 on a Swissair flight from Geneva. Bata Nsona's passport, which had been issued in Kinshasa the day before, listed Francine as one of her children. On inspection by the Royal Military Constabulary it was found that the passport had been tampered with. When confronted, Bata Nsona claimed that Francine was her niece, but she proffered no documentary evidence to prove this. Other Zairean nationals arriving on the same flight included a Ms MM, copies of whose documents were found in Bata Nsona's luggage. Bata Nsona and her son were allowed to enter The Netherlands on 30 December 1993 since they held valid residence permits. As Francine did not have a provisional residence visa or even a travel visa, she was refused entry and taken to the airport hotel at Schiphol, where she stayed under the supervision of the Royal Military Constabulary. Bata Nsona was informed by the Royal Military Constabulary that she would have to accompany Francine back to Zaire, which she agreed to do. On 31 December 1993, Bata Nsona filed an application on behalf of Francine for a residence permit as a foster child and for compelling humanitarian reasons. She also applied to the District Court to be appointed as Francine's temporary guardian. On the same day Bata Nsona returned to Schiphol Airport requesting that Francine be allowed to accompany her home, claiming that there was nobody in Zaire who could take care of her and stating that she would not accompany Francine back to Zaire. Also on 31 December 1993, at about 12.30 pm, the applicants' lawyer, intending to seek an injunction against the State prohibiting Francine's removal, applied for a hearing date for summary proceedings before the President of the Regional Court of The Hague. The President set the case down for hearing on 11 January 1994. At about 1 pm this date was communicated by the applicants' lawyer to the Ministry of Justice. The responsible official of the Ministry of Justice decided that Francine would not be allowed to await the outcome of the summary proceedings in

The Netherlands and at about 2.30 pm, the applicants' lawyer was informed by telephone that at that time Francine was boarding a Swissair flight for Zurich. Francine had been entrusted to Ms MM, who was also being removed and had agreed to accompany Francine. They were both booked on a flight from Zurich to Kinshasa on 4 January 1994. The hearing before the President of the Regional Court of The Hague was brought forward to 3 January 1994 and a request was made by the applicants' lawyer to the Swiss authorities whereby they decided to postpone her departure from Zurich. On 4 January 1994, the President of the Regional Court of The Hague gave judgment finding that the applicants had no locus standi. Francine being a minor, she had to be represented by a guardian, which Bata Nsona was not. On 6 January 1994, Francine, who until that moment had stayed in a Swissair nursery, left Zurich on a Swissair flight to Kinshasa, where she arrived on 7 January 1994. It appeared that she travelled alone. The Netherlands Embassy at Kinshasa requested the International Committee of the Red Cross to meet her at Kinshasa Airport. This request was later withdrawn when the Netherlands authorities had been informed that arrangements had been made by Swissair of its own motion. On 12 January 1995, Francine returned to The Netherlands. Bata Nsona's application to be appointed as Francine's temporary guardian was granted by the Rotterdam District Court on 27 June 1995. Francine was granted a residence permit on 1 December 1995. The applicants complained that Francine's removal from The Netherlands, and the conditions under which it took place, constituted inhuman treatment and violated their right to respect for family life.

Comm found by majority (20–4) NV 3 as regards first applicant, (22–2) NV 8, unanimously NV 13.

Court found by majority (8–1) NV 3, unanimously dismissed Government's preliminary objection in respect of 8, by majority (8–1) NV 8, unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr J De Meyer (d), Mr SK Martens, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr B Repik, Mr U Lôhmus.

The Court recalled its previous case-law. The entry of Francine as Bata Nsona's child in the latter's passport appeared to be forged. The Netherlands authorities were in principle entitled to refuse Francine access to the country provided that such refusal was not inconsistent with the obligations of the respondent State under the Convention. There was no evidence put forward to support the vague suggestion that Bata Nsona might suffer ill-treatment at the hands of the Zairean authorities for the reason that the entry of Francine in her passport was irregular. In those circumstances the separation of Francine and Bata Nsona could not be imputed to the respondent State. After Bata Nsona had refused to accompany Francine back to Zaïre, the Netherlands authorities asked Ms MM to do so. The authorities could reasonably assume, from the evidence, that there existed a relationship between Ms MM and Bata Nsona sufficient to justify entrusting the escorting of Francine back to Kinshasa to Ms MM. Francine and Ms MM travelled together and Francine was allowed to remain at Zürich Airport until 6 January at the request of the applicants' lawyer. The way in which Francine's removal was effected did not constitute treatment of such a nature as to make it 'inhuman or degrading' as understood in the context of A 3. It was not alleged that Francine had anything to fear from the Zairean authorities, it was alleged that the Government did not take sufficient account of the possibility that Francine might not be taken proper care of upon her return to Zaire. When she arrived at Kinshasa Airport on 7 January 1993, Francine was met by a business relation of Swissair, who turned her over to the Zairean immigration authorities. The following day she was taken to the home of the people with whom she had stayed before travelling to The Netherlands. The Netherlands authorities made unsuccessful attempts to arrange for Francine to be met and for the Red Cross to assume responsibility for Francine. Swissair had made adequate arrangements for Francine to be met, there was insufficient ground for reproaching the Netherlands Government for not having acted with due diligence. The Court noted that the most striking features of the case were the haste with which the Netherlands authorities gave effect to their decision to remove Francine from The Netherlands and their apparent willingness to hand over all responsibility for her welfare as soon as she had left Netherlands territory to others (Ms MM and especially Swissair). In a case involving a nine-year-old girl, such an attitude was open to criticism. Nevertheless, in the circumstances of the case, The Netherlands could not be held responsible for treating Francine in such a way as to warrant a finding that she has been the victim of 'inhuman or degrading treatment' or for exposing her to the danger thereof. There had accordingly not been a violation of A 3.

The word 'victim' in A 25 denoted the person directly affected by the act or omission in issue, the existence of a violation of the Convention being conceivable even in the absence of prejudice. Consequently, a measure by a public authority reversing or mitigating the effect of the act or omission alleged to be in breach of the Convention in principle deprived such a person of his status as a victim only where the national authorities had acknowledged, either expressly or in substance, and then afforded redress for, such breach. The decisions appointing Bata Nsona temporary guardian and granting a residence permit to Francine put an end to the situation complained of by the applicants. However, it did not appear that those decisions were intended to put an end to, and afford redress for, any violation of the Convention. They did not reverse or compensate for any of the measures which led to the applicants' separation between 31 December 1993 and 12 January 1995. In fact, the Government maintained before the Court that no breach of A 8 had taken place. The preliminary objection that the applicants could not be considered to be victims therefore had to be dismissed.

The applicants resorted to deceit on arrival at Schiphol Airport, presenting an apparently forged passport and only when confronted admitting that Francine was not Bata Nsona's daughter but claiming that she was her niece. The Netherlands authorities could not be blamed, once this was discovered, for refusing to accept allegations unsupported by evidence. In the circumstances of the case, therefore, no interference with the applicants' right to respect for their family life could be imputed to the respondent State. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 8.

Neither the Commission nor the respondent Government had offered any argument on the question whether there had been a violation of A 13 and the Court saw no need to consider it of its own motion.

Nuutinen v Finland 00/169

[Application lodged 26.8.1996; Commission report 21.10.1998; Court Judgment 27.6.2000]

Mr Pekka Nuutinen, the applicant, served periods of imprisonment in 1987 and 1990 for offences of violence. On 21 January 1992, the Kuopio City Court convicted him of having threatened and assaulted his then girlfriend H and of having subjected her to coercion. She had been pregnant at the time and their relationship had been ending. The applicant was sentenced to three months' imprisonment. In March 1992 H gave birth to a daughter, I, and they moved from Kuopio to Helsinki. In November 1992 the applicant was released from prison and recognised I as his child.

In the light of H's objections, a judge of the Kuopio City Court refused to confirm the recognition. In an action of 21 September 1993, the applicant requested that his paternity in respect of I be confirmed, that custody of her be shared and that she be granted a right to see him. On 16 December 1994 the Kuopio District Court confirmed the applicant's paternity in respect of I and granted a right of access in respect of the child. H refused to co-operate with access arrangements. The applicant complained that the court proceedings for the determination of his paternity and the custody and access rights in respect of his daughter had been too lengthy; that the access rights had been excessively limited at the outset; that the authorities had kept his daughter's whereabouts secret; and that they had failed to make sufficient efforts to enforce the access orders, with the result that he had never been able to contact his daughter.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), NV 8.

Court found unanimously V 6(1) on account of the length of the proceedings, by majority (4–3) NV 8 on account of the non-enforcement of the access rights, unanimously not necessary to examine the other complaints under 8.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr R Türmen (d), Mr B Zupancic (d), Mr T Pantiru (d), Mr Gaukur Jörundsson, Mr R Pekkanen, ad hoc judge.

The scope of the case before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility which dealt only with the applicant's complaints relating to the length of the proceedings, the extent of the access rights granted in respect of his daughter, the non-enforcement of that access and the measures taken by the authorities to keep her whereabouts and other information pertaining to her secret from the applicant. The Court was nonetheless competent, in the interests of economy of proceedings, to take into account facts occurring during the course of the proceedings before it, in so far as they constituted a continuation of the facts underlying the complaints declared admissible.

A 6(1) applied to the proceedings as a whole, including the enforcement stage. The proceedings lasted from September 1993 to February 1999, five years and five months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be considered in the light of the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicant and that of the relevant authorities. On the latter point, the importance of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation had to be taken into account. It was essential that custody cases be dealt with speedily. A delay at some stage might be tolerated if the overall duration of the proceedings could not be deemed excessive. Although not particularly complex at the outset, the present case became increasingly complicated due to the difficulties encountered at the enforcement stage. There were certain delays imputable to the first-instance courts in the two sets of the main proceedings, first in respect of the establishment of the paternity of the child and subsequently as regards the written hearing of the Helsinki Social Welfare Authority on the access question. Notwithstanding the procrastination of H in producing blood samples capable of establishing I's paternity, the responsibility for ensuring compliance with the requirements of A 6 rested ultimately with the courts. In addition, when requesting opinions from other authorities, the courts remained responsible for ensuring that the proceedings were not excessively prolonged. The conduct of the applicant was to blame to some extent in refusing to provide detailed information on his own situation. However, what was at stake for the applicant was his right to obtain a speedy court confirmation of his biological and legal ties with I. Those ties were confirmed in December 1994 and access rights were granted. At the time the applicant had not yet seen his daughter, then almost two years old. She was almost seven years old when the ensuing proceedings eventually ended with the revocation of the access rights without the applicant ever having seen his child. The length of the overall proceedings therefore exceeded a reasonable time.

The essential object of A 8 was to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities. There may in addition be positive obligations inherent in effective 'respect' for family life. The obligation of the national authorities to take measures to facilitate meetings between a parent and his or her child was not absolute, especially where the two were still strangers to one another. Such access may not be possible immediately and may require preparatory measures being taken to this effect. The nature and extent of such preparation would depend on the circumstances of each case. Where contacts with the parent might appear to threaten those interests or interfere with those rights, it was for the national authorities to strike a fair balance between them. What was decisive was whether the national authorities had taken all necessary steps to facilitate access as could reasonably be demanded in the special circumstances of each case. In examining whether the non-enforcement of the access arrangements amounted to a lack of respect for the applicant's family life the Court had to strike a balance between the various interests involved, namely the interests of the applicant's daughter and her de facto family, those of the applicant himself and the general interest in ensuring respect for the rule of law. The access rights were in force for over three years, they were restricted from July 1995 and in April 1998 the access rights were revoked. Although the fetching of I with a view to enforcing her access rights was never recommended or ordered, the Helsinki District Court had found on two occasions that such a drastic measure would not have been in the child's best interests. The fact that the fines imposed on H were, with one exception in 1996, eventually lifted was due to the revocation of the access rights. The ultimate waiver of those fines could not therefore be given any decisive significance in the assessment of whether the authorities could, at the time of imposing those fines, reasonably consider them to be sufficient as a means of enforcement. The applicant himself took sufficient steps before the courts in order to seek implementation of the access arrangements. However, he contributed to the delays at the enforcement stage by not having co-operated sufficiently, in particular with the social authorities in the preparations of their opinions to the Helsinki District Court in the course of the second set of civil proceedings in the middle of 1997. Although he was frustrated following numerous fruitless enforcement attempts, he repeatedly behaved in an inappropriate and even aggressive manner towards the social welfare officials and the conciliators investigating the matter. The Helsinki District Court found in its decision of April 1997 that the fresh evidence regarding the applicant's mental state did not show that enforcement of the access arrangements would be contrary to the child's interests, bearing in mind the limited access and the meeting premises. However, in the continuous re-assessment of the child's best interests the social authorities in Helsinki could, notably in the light of the applicant's more recent unwillingness to co-operate, reasonably formulate a recommendation that the access rights should be revoked until the child had reached a more mature age. Likewise, the Helsinki District Court's decision to revoke the access rights in April 1998 could not be considered unreasonable. In the circumstances and having regard to the margin of appreciation afforded to the State, the national authorities took all necessary steps with a view to enforcing the access rights as could reasonably be demanded in the very difficult conflict at hand. There had therefore been no violation of A 8 on account of the non-enforcement of the access rights.

Other complaints raised before the Commission were not mentioned by the applicant in the proceedings before the Court, which did not consider it necessary to examine them of its own motion.

Nyberg v Sweden (1992) 14 EHRR 870 90/19

[Application lodged 9.6.1986; Commission report 15.3.1990; Court Judgment 31.8.1990]

Shortly after his birth in 1981, Birgitt and Lars Erik Nyberg's elder son, Björn, was taken into public care in Stockholm and was later placed in a foster home. They took various steps with a view to reuniting the family. Their first request was unsuccessful, but the second, filed on 19 October 1984, led to the termination of Björn's care on 6 February 1986. However, the Social Council prohibited the applicants, until further notice, from removing the child from the foster home. In March 1987, the case was settled on appeal and the Social Council withdrew both the custody action and the prohibition. They complained about the refusal to allow them to take their son home and about the length and fairness of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 8, NV 3, NV 13 and by majority (11–2) no separate issue under 6(1).

Court noted the friendly settlement and struck the case from the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached by the Government and the applicants. The Court saw no reason of public policy to proceed with the case, having regard to the final reunification of the family and to its case-law on the matter.

O v United Kingdom (1988) 10 EHRR 82 87/12

[Application lodged 15.12.1980; Commission report 3.12.1985; Court Judgment 8.7.1987 (merits), 9.6.1988 (A50)]

The applicant was married in 1967 but was divorced from his wife on 20 October 1981. During their marriage they had seven children, A, B, C, D, E, F and G, born in 1968, 1970, 1971, 1973, 1975, 1977 and 1978 respectively. Following concern as to the children's welfare, brought to a head when the applicant assaulted A, the local authority obtained from the juvenile court on 2 July 1976 care orders in respect of A, B, C, D and E. The children lived at first in a children's home and subsequently with foster parents. Until June or July 1978, the applicant and his wife continued to visit the children. An application by the parents to revoke the care orders was rejected on 13 June 1979 by the juvenile court and further proceedings were unsuccessful. The applicant complained of the fact that he was unable to challenge the substance of the authority's decisions to restrict and then terminate his access to the children.

Comm found by majority (10–2) V 6(1), unanimously NV 8, by majority (10–1 with one abstention) no separate issue under 13.

Court unanimously found V 6(1) by majority (15–2) NV 8 as regards the procedures followed, not necessary to examine under A 8 the complaint concerning an absence of remedies, unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Judges (merits and A 50 (unanimous)): Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr G Lagergren (jo), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (jo), Mr L-E Pettiti (jo), Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald (jo), Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (jo), Mr N Valticos (jo).

The present judgment was not concerned with the merits of the judicial or local authority decisions regarding the applicant's children. The scope of the case before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The Court was not in the circumstances competent to examine or comment on the justification for such matters as the taking into public care or the adoption of the children or the restriction or termination of the applicant's access to them.

A 6(1) extended only to disputes over civil rights and obligations which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law; it did not in itself guarantee any particular content for civil rights and obligations in the substantive law of the Contracting States. It could be said, at least on arguable grounds, that even after the making of the care orders the applicant could claim a right in regard to his access to the children. There was a dispute between the applicant and the authority on the question of access. If there was a parental 'right' of access, it was a 'civil' right. A 6(1) was therefore applicable in the present case.

There would be no possibility of a determination in accordance with the requirements of A 6(1) of the parent's right in regard to access, unless he or she could have the local authority's decision reviewed by a tribunal having jurisdiction to examine the merits of the matter. It did not appear from the material supplied by the Government (possibility of challenging the care orders, of applying for judicial review or of instituting wardship proceedings) or otherwise available to the Court that the powers of the English courts were of sufficient scope to satisfy fully this requirement during the currency of each of the care orders. There was accordingly a violation of A 6(1).

With respect to the applicant's complaints regarding the procedures followed by the authority in reaching its decision to terminate his access to his children, the material before the Court, in particular that supplied by the applicant, was not sufficient to establish a violation of A 8 on this point. Having regard to its decision regarding A 6(1), that the applicant should have been able to have the question of his access to his children determined by a tribunal, the Court did not find it necessary to examine under A 8 his complaint concerning an absence of remedies.

Having regard to its decision on A 6(1) the Court considered that it was not necessary to examine the case under A 13 as its requirements were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary damage (GBP 5,000). Claim for costs and expenses struck out of list following friendly settlement between Government and applicant (GBP 9,235.25).

Obermeier v Austria (1991) 13 EHRR 290 90/13

[Application lodged 24.9.1985; Commission report 15.12.1988; Court Judgment 28.6.1990]

Mr Karl Obermeier was formerly employed by a private insurance company as the director of their regional branch office for Upper Austria. In 1974 a dispute arose between the applicant and the company concerning various paid activities which it proposed to withdraw from him. He instituted proceedings in the Vienna Labour Court and was suspended from his duties by his employer. His subsequent appeals concerning his suspension and later dismissal were unsuccessful. He complained that he had been impeded in his access to a court and that a dispute concerning his civil rights had not been determined within a reasonable time. The applicant also relied on his right to an effective remedy before a national authority and claimed to be the victim, as a disabled person, of discrimination.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), no separate issue under 13, not necessary to examine 14.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1), not necessary to examine 13 and 14.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr R Macdonald, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel.

Preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of remedies had been conceded before the Commission and the Government were therefore estopped from raising it before the Court.

The dispute relating to the suspension concerned private law relations between the employer and employee and was therefore a 'civil' dispute under A 6(1). The mere fact that his action for declaration was held inadmissible on the ground that he lacked legal interest did not mean he was denied access to a court. Neither the Disabled Person's Board nor the Provincial Governor who heard appeals against the decisions of the Board could be regarded as independent tribunals. The Provincial Governor's decision could be appealed to the Administrative court which could be considered sufficient under A 6 if the Administrative court could be described as a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. The Administrative Court could only determine whether the discretion enjoyed by the administrative authorities had been used in a manner compatible with the object and purpose of the law. In disputes concerning civil rights, such a limited review could not be considered to be an effective judicial review under A 6(1). There had therefore been a violation of the applicant's right of access to a court.

The applicant had instituted proceedings on 9 March 1981 regarding the lawfulness of his suspension. Nine years later no final judgment had been given. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined by reference to the particular circumstances of the case. An employee who considered that he had been wrongly suspended by his employer had an important personal interest in securing a judicial decision on the lawfulness of that measure promptly. The proceedings were of some complexity involving interaction between administrative and judicial proceedings concerning the dismissal of a disabled person and a large number of different sets of proceedings. However, a period of 9 years without reaching a final decision exceeded a reasonable time and accordingly a violation of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 16.6.1985; Commission report 14.12.1989; Court Judgment 23.5.1991]

Mr Oberschlick was a journalist and editor of the periodical Forum. As a result of statements made during the parliamentary election campaign by Mr Walter Grabher-Meyer, then Secretary General of the Austrian Liberal Party, concerning reduction in family allowances for immigrant mothers, on 20 April 1983 the applicant and several other persons laid a criminal information against Mr Grabher-Meyer. However, the Vienna public prosecutor's office decided on 1 June 1983 not to prosecute him. On the day it was laid, the full text of the criminal information was published by the applicant in Forum. On 22 April 1983 Mr Grabher-Meyer brought a private prosecution for defamation against the applicant and the other signatories of the criminal information. The Review Chamber of the Vienna Regional Criminal Court decided on the same day to order the discontinuance of the proceedings. On appeal by Mr Grabher-Meyer, the Vienna Court of Appeal quashed the above decision on 31 May 1983. Following the second set of proceedings held on 11 May 1984, the Regional Court convicted the applicant of defamation and sentenced him to a fine or, in default, to imprisonment. The applicant's subsequent request for the trial record to be rectified was rejected. On 17 December 1984 the Vienna Court of Appeal, composed of the same judges, dismissed the applicant's appeal. His appeal to the Attorney General was rejected. He complained that he had not had a fair hearing by an impartial tribunal and of an infringement of his right to freedom of expression as a result of the defamation proceedings instituted against him and his subsequent conviction.

Comm found by majority (19–2) V 10, (20–1) V 6(1) in relation to the proceedings before the Court of Appeal, unanimously NV 6(1) in relation to the proceedings before the Regional Court.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1) as regards the impartiality of the Vienna Court of Appeal, NV 6(1) as regards the fairness of the trial before the Vienna Regional Court, by majority (16–3) V 10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (pd), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (pd), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (pd), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens (c), Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (c).

The Court accepted that as regards his main complaints the applicant's application was posted on 16 June 1985 and, accordingly, was introduced within the time-limit prescribed by A 26. National proceedings would be unduly delayed and complicated if applications concerning procedural decisions, such as the present one, concerning rectification of the trial record, had to be filed before the final decision on the merits. Consequently, with regard to such procedural decisions, even if they had become final before the termination of the proceedings, the six-month period mentioned in A 26 ran only as from the same date as that which was relevant with regard to the final decision on the merits. The application thus could not be deemed to be out of time in this respect either. In conclusion, the Government's preliminary objections were rejected.

Waiver of a right guaranteed by the Convention had to be established in an unequivocal manner. The President and the other two members of the Court of Appeal should have withdrawn ex officio in accordance with the Code of Criminal Procedure. Neither the applicant nor his counsel were aware until after the hearing of 17 December 1984 that the other two judges had also participated in the decision of 31 May 1983. It was not established that the applicant had waived his right to have his case determined by an 'impartial' tribunal. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1).

The applicant's conviction by the Vienna Regional Court on 11 May 1984, upheld by the Vienna Court of Appeal on 17 December 1984, constituted an interference with his right to freedom of expression. That interference was prescribed by law, namely the Criminal Code, and was aimed at protecting the reputation or rights of others within the meaning of A 10(2). The Court recalled its previous case-law. A 10 protected not only the substance of the ideas and information expressed, but also the form in which they were conveyed. Those principles were of particular importance with regard to the press. Freedom of the press afforded the public one of the best means of discovering and forming an opinion of the ideas and attitudes of political leaders. The limits of acceptable criticism were wider with regard to a politician acting in his public capacity than in relation to a private individual. The former inevitably and knowingly laid himself open to close scrutiny of his every word and deed by both journalists and the public at large, and he had to display a greater degree of tolerance, especially when he himself made public statements that were susceptible of criticism. A politician was entitled to have his reputation protected, even when he was not acting in his private capacity, but the requirements of that protection had to be weighed against the interests of open discussion of political issues. The insertion of the text of the criminal information in Forum contributed to a public debate on a political question of general importance. The applicant's criticisms sought to draw the public's attention in a provocative manner to a proposal made by a politician which was likely to shock many people. A politician who expressed himself in such terms exposed himself to a strong reaction on the part of journalists and the public. The first part of the information recited factually correct information, the second part in analysing the statements presented a value-judgment, expressing the opinion of the authors. The requirement by the Austrian courts that the applicant prove the truth of his allegations was impossible in the case of value-judgments and amounted to an infringement of freedom of opinion. In view of the importance of the issue at stake, the applicant could not be said to have exceeded the limits of freedom of expression by choosing the particular form of presentation chosen. Therefore, the interference with the applicant's exercise of his freedom of expression was not necessary in a democratic society for the protection of the reputation of others.

Oberschlick (No 2) v Austria (1998) 25 EHRR 357 97/41

[Application lodged 15.9.1992; Commission report 29.11.1995; Court Judgment 1.7.1997]

Mr Oberschlick was a journalist and editor of the periodical Forum. Following a speech made on 7 October 1990 by Mr Haider, leader of the Austrian Freedom Party and Governor of the Land of Carinthia, glorifying the role of the 'generation of soldiers' who had taken part in the Second World War, the speech was reproduced in full in Forum and commented on by the applicant and an Austrian writer who had been disparaged by Mr Haider. The applicant's passage was entitled 'PS: "Trottel" statt "Nazi"' ('PS: "Idiot" instead of "Nazi"'). On 26 April 1991 Mr Haider brought an action for defamation and insult against the applicant in the Vienna Regional Criminal Court. On 23 May 1991 the court found the applicant guilty of having insulted Mr Haider and sentenced him to a fine or imprisonment in default. The applicant complained that his conviction had been contrary to A 10.

Comm found by majority (14–1) V 10.

Court found by majority (7–2) V 10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Matscher (d), Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr P Kûris.

The applicant's conviction by the Vienna Regional Court on 23 May 1991 upheld by the Vienna Court of Appeal on 25 March 1992 amounted to an interference with the exercise of freedom of expression. That interference was prescribed by law, namely the Criminal Code, its purpose was to protect the reputation or rights of others, within the meaning of A 10(2). Subject to A 10(2), freedom of expression was applicable not only to 'information' and 'ideas' that were favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offended, shocked or disturbed. Those principles were of particular importance with regard to the press. While it must not overstep the bounds set, inter alia, for 'the protection of the reputation of others', its task was nevertheless to impart information and ideas on political issues and on other matters of general interest. The limits of acceptable criticism were wider with regard to a politician acting in his public capacity than in relation to a private individual. The former inevitably and knowingly laid himself open to close scrutiny of his every word and deed by both journalists and the public at large, and he had to display a greater degree of tolerance, especially when he himself made public statements that were susceptible of criticism. A politician was entitled to have his reputation protected, even when he is not acting in his private capacity, but the requirements of that protection had to be weighed against the interests of open discussion of political issues. The judicial decisions challenged had to be considered in the light of the case as a whole, including the applicant's article and the circumstances in which it was written. Mr Haider's speech was clearly intended to be provocative and consequently to arouse strong reactions. The article was published together with the speech in question and an article by a writer who was also reacting to what Mr Haider had said. The applicant's article, and in particular the word Trottel (idiot) might be considered polemical, but they did not on that account constitute a gratuitous personal attack as the author provided an objectively understandable explanation for them derived from Mr Haider's speech, which was itself provocative. They were part of the political discussion provoked by Mr Haider's speech and amounted to an opinion, whose truth was not susceptible of proof. Such an opinion may, however, be excessive, in particular in the absence of any factual basis, but in the light of the above considerations that was not so in the instant case. Calling a politician a 'Trottel' in public may offend him. In the instant case, however, the word did not seem disproportionate to the indignation knowingly aroused by Mr Haider. As to the polemical tone of the article, which the Court should not be taken to approve, it had to be remembered that A 10 protected not only the substance of the ideas and information expressed but also the form in which they are conveyed. The necessity of the interference with the exercise of the applicant's freedom of expression had not been shown. There had therefore been a breach of A 10.

The Observer and The Guardian v UK (1992) 14 EHRR 153 91/47

[Application lodged 27.1.1988; Commission report 12.7.1990; Court Judgment 26.11.1991]

The applicants were 2 British newspapers who had published some details of a book, Spycatcher, by Mr Peter Wright. The book concerned the memoirs of the author, a former MI5 (security service) member. Injunctions were granted on 27 June 1986 ex parte and on 11 July 1986 inter partes, to prevent further publication. On 27 April 1987 The Independent newspaper published a summary of the Spycatcher allegations. The Court of Appeal considered the injunction binding on all British media. On 12 July 1987 The Sunday Times began serialisation of the book. On 30 July 1987 the House of Lords held the injunctions should continue. The book was published in the US in July 1987 and subsequently in Australia in October 1987 following unsuccessful proceedings by the Attorney General. The applicants complained that the interlocutory injunctions in question constituted an unjustified interference with their freedom of expression, that they had no effective remedy before a national authority for their A 10 complaint and that they were victims of discrimination.

Comm found by majority (6–5) V 10 in respect of temporary injunctions for the period from 11 July 1986 to 30 July 1987, unanimously V 10 in respect of temporary injunctions for the period from 30 July 1987 to 13 October 1988, unanimously NV 13 or 14.

Court found by majority (14–10) NV 10 during the period from 11 July 1986 to 30 July 1987, unanimously V 10 during the period from 30 July 1987 to 13 October 1988, NV 13 or 14+10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (pd), Mr L-E Pettiti (pd/so), Mr B Walsh (pd), Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo (pd), Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (pd/so), Mr N Valticos (so), Mr SK Martens (pd), Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel (pd), Mr R Pekkanen (pd), Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (pd), Mr F Bigi (pd), Mr A Baka.

The restrictions complained of were an interference with the applicants' exercise of their freedom of expression. The interference was prescribed by law; the guidelines in the case-law were sufficiently precise and clear to enable the applicants to foresee that an injunction would be imposed. The interference had legitimate aims under A 10(2) as they had the direct or primary aim of maintaining the authority of the judiciary, including protecting the rights of litigants until trial and of protecting national security. Regarding the period 11 July 1986 to 30 July 1987, the interference was necessary in a democratic society because of the need to preserve the Attorney General's case at trial and protect national security. Regard was had to the national court's margin of appreciation. The injunctions were proportionate to their legitimate aims, they did not require a blanket prohibition. Although they were intended to be temporary, they lasted a year, which was a long time where a perishable commodity such as news was concerned. Regarding the period 30 July 1987 to 13 October 1988, the book had been published in the US and the material was no longer secret. The further aim of preserving confidence in the Security Service was not sufficient to justify continued interference or legitimately used to punish Mr Wright and set an example to others. The continuation of the interference prevented newspapers exercising their right and duty to provide information of legitimate public concern which was already available and there had been a violation of A 10 during that period.

Regarding discrimination, foreign newspapers were subject to the same restrictions as the Observer and Guardian and so there was no difference in treatment.

Regarding A 13, the effectiveness of a remedy did not depend on the certainty of the outcome. There was no obligation to incorporate the Convention into domestic law. A 13 did not guarantee a remedy allowing the State's law to be challenged before national authorities on the grounds of being contrary to the Convention.

Oerlemans v The Netherlands 91/50

[Application lodged 24.11.1986; Commission report 3.4.1990; Court Judgment 27.11.1991]

Mr Johannes Oerlemans was involved in cattle farming. The Minister of Culture, Recreation and Public Works designated an area including the applicant's land as a 'protected natural site' by an order of 20 September 1982. On 30 October 1982 the applicant appealed against the designation order to the Crown. The appeal was heard before the Administrative Disputes Division of the Council of State on 8 November 1985 and subsequently dismissed. The applicant's subsequent appeals were also dismissed. He complained that he was unable under Netherlands law to challenge the designation order affecting his property before a court.

Comm found by majority (15–2) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla.

There existed a dispute concerning the lawfulness of the designation order. The legal consequences of the designation order were that the applicant was no longer free to cultivate his land as he saw fit and was required to seek an authorisation from the Minister for various purposes. The extent to which he was restricted in his use of the land could be seen from the subsequent disputes that he had with the Minister concerning work that he had carried out or proposed to carry out. There was therefore a serious dispute in the case concerning the resultant restrictions on the applicant's use of his property. It made no difference to the conclusion that the potential of the land was enhanced by the completion of the dyke in 1983. The property right in question was 'civil' in nature within the meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, A 6(1) applied to the case.

Under Netherlands law, where an administrative appeal to a higher authority was not considered to offer sufficient guarantees as to a fair procedure, it was possible to have recourse to the civil courts for a full review of the lawfulness of the administrative decision. The fact that the dispute was of a public law nature was irrelevant in that context. Under Netherlands law, a civil court could carry out a full examination of all acts of the administration in the light, inter alia, of principles of administrative law, could award damages for torts committed and could grant injunctions against the administration. The applicant could have submitted his dispute to the civil courts for examination. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

Ogur v Turkey 99/25

[Application lodged 16.3.1993; Commission report 30.10.1997; Court Judgment 20.5.1999]

Mrs Sariye Ogur lived in an area where a state of emergency was in force. Her son Musa, who worked as a night watchman at a mining site, was killed at about 6.30 am on 24 December 1990 as he was about to come off duty. On 26 December 1990 the public prosecutor's office declared that it had no jurisdiction to institute proceedings against civil servants and forwarded the file to the Administrative Council of the province. On 15 August 1991 the Administrative Council delivered its decision that no proceedings should be brought in the criminal courts against the civil servants of the security forces which had taken part in the operation on 24 December 1990. In its view, the victim, who was regarded as a suspect, had died after warning shots had been fired during the operation in question. Neither the evidence in the file nor taking statements from witnesses would make it possible, however, to identify with any certainty the person who had fired. On 19 September 1991 the Supreme Administrative Court, to which the case had automatically been referred by the operation of law, upheld that decision. The applicant complained of a violation of the right to life under A 2.

Comm found by majority (32–1) V 2.

Court dismissed unanimously the Government's preliminary objections, found by majority (16–1) V 2.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello (pd), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Cassadevall, Mrs N Vajic, Mrs HS Greve, Mr A Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova, Mr F Gölcüklü (pd), ad hoc judge.

The applicant was not required to bring the same civil and administrative proceedings as those relied on by the Government in the present case. As to the fact that the criminal proceedings were instituted not by the applicant herself but by the victim's employer, the purpose of the rule that domestic remedies had to be exhausted was to afford the Contracting States the opportunity of preventing or putting right the violations alleged against them before those violations were submitted to the Court. In the instant case that requirement was satisfied as the complaint lodged by the victim's employer had the same effect as one that could have been lodged by the applicant, namely that a criminal investigation was opened. The objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies was therefore rejected. In principle, the fact that an applicant had not appeared personally before the Convention institutions did not affect the validity of complaints he had raised before them in good time, provided that he maintained his application, as the applicant manifestly did in the instant case. The Government's preliminary objection regarding estoppel also had to be dismissed.

The death of the applicant's son: the establishment and verification of the facts was primarily a matter for the Commission. Only in exceptional circumstances would the Court exercise its own powers in this area. It was not disputed that the victim had been killed by a bullet fired by the security forces. He had been shot in the nape of the neck. The disagreement related solely to whether that bullet came from a warning shot or from a shot fired at the victim, and on the circumstances in which the shot was fired. There was not sufficient evidence before the Court to establish that the security forces gave the warnings usual in such cases. By definition, warning shots were fired into the air, with the gun almost vertical, so as to ensure that the suspect was not hit. That was all the more essential in the instant case, as visibility was very poor. It was accordingly difficult to imagine that a genuine warning shot could have struck the victim in the neck. Even supposing that Musa Ogur was killed by a bullet fired as a warning, the firing of that shot was badly executed, to the point of constituting gross negligence, whether the victim was running away or not. In sum, all the deficiencies so far noted in the planning and execution of the operation in issue sufficed for it to be concluded that the use of force against Musa Ogur was neither proportionate nor, accordingly, absolutely necessary in defence of any person from unlawful violence or to arrest the victim. There had therefore been a violation of A 2 on that account.

The investigations by the national authorities: the inspection of the scene of the incident by the public prosecutor had been restricted and had not been thorough. Witnesses questioned at the scene by the prosecutor were all members of the night watchmen's team; no member of the security forces that took part in the operation was interviewed on that occasion. The expert report prepared at the prosecutor's request contained information that was very imprecise and findings mostly unsupported by any established facts. The subsequent investigation carried out by the administrative investigation authorities scarcely remedied the deficiencies. Serious doubts arose as to the ability of the administrative authorities concerned to carry out an independent investigation, as required by A 2. During the administrative investigation the case file was inaccessible to the victim's close relatives. The Supreme Administrative Court ruled on the decision of 15 August 1991 on the sole basis of the papers in the case and this part of the proceedings was likewise inaccessible to the victim's relatives. Nor was the decision served on the applicant's lawyer, with the result that the applicant was deprived of the possibility of herself appealing to the Supreme Administrative Court. The investigations in the case could not be regarded as effective investigations capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible for the events in question. There had therefore been a violation of A 2 on this count also.

Okçuoglu v Turkey 99/36

[Application lodged 15.3.1994; Commission report 11.12.1997; Court Judgment 8.7.1999]

Mr Ahmet Zeki Okçuoglu was a lawyer. In May 1991, a magazine, 'Demokrat', published in its issue No 12 an article on a round-table debate it had organised in which the applicant had taken part. The applicant's comments were recorded in the article, entitled 'The past and present of the Kurdish problem'. On 10 June 1991 the Public Prosecutor of the Istanbul National Security Court No 2 accused the applicant of disseminating propaganda against the indivisibility of the State. On 11 March 1993 the National Security Court, composed of three judges, including a military judge, found the applicant guilty of the offence charged and sentenced him to one year, eight months' imprisonment and a fine of TRL 41,666,666. The Court of Cassation dismissed his appeal. After Law No 4126 of 27 October 1995 came into force, the National Security Court reviewed the applicant's case on the merits. In its judgment of 8 March 1996 it reduced his prison sentence to one year, one month and ten days but increased the fine to TRL 111,111,110. He complained, inter alia, that he had been denied a fair trial and that his right to freedom of expression had been violated.

The applicant did not raise the complaint under A 7 at the admissibility stage of the procedure before the Commission and the Court had no jurisdiction to examine it.

The Court recalled its case-law. The applicant's conviction following publication of his comments amounted to an interference with the exercise of his right to freedom of expression. The conviction was based on the Prevention of Terrorism Act and the resultant interference could be regarded as prescribed by law. Having regard to the sensitivity of the security situation in south-east Turkey and to the need for the authorities to be alert to acts capable of fuelling additional violence, the measures taken against the applicant could be said to have been in furtherance of the protection of national security and territorial integrity and the prevention of disorder and crime. The Court had regard to the background to the case, particularly problems linked to the prevention of terrorism, and noted the Turkish authorities' concern about the dissemination of views which they considered might exacerbate the serious disturbances that had been going on in Turkey for some 15 years. The applicant's comments, made during a round-table debate, were published in a periodical whose circulation was low, thereby significantly reducing their potential impact on national security, public order or territorial integrity. Although some of his remarks painted a negative picture of the population of Turkish origin and made his comments hostile in tone, they nevertheless did not amount to incitement to engage in violence, armed resistance, or an uprising. The penalty imposed on the applicant was severe and the prosecution had been persistent in its efforts to secure his conviction. His conviction was therefore disproportionate to the aims pursued and accordingly not necessary in a democratic society. There had therefore been a violation of A 10 of the Convention.

The Court recalled its previous case-law. It was understandable that the applicant, prosecuted in a National Security Court for disseminating propaganda aimed at undermining the territorial integrity of the State and national unity, should have been apprehensive about being tried by a bench which included a regular army officer, who was a member of the Military Legal Service. On that account he could legitimately fear that the Istanbul National Security Court might allow itself to be unduly influenced by considerations which had nothing to do with the nature of the case. In other words, the applicant's fears as to that court's lack of independence and impartiality could be regarded as objectively justified. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation were not able to dispel those fears since that court did not have full jurisdiction. There had been a breach of A 6(1)

Having regard to the conclusion that there had been a violation of A 10 taken separately it was not necessary to examine the complaint under A 14.

Oliveira v Switzerland (1999) 28 EHRR 289 98/59

[Application lodged 22 October 1994; Commission report 1 July 1997; Court Judgment 30.7.1998]

Mrs Maria Celeste Vieira Veloso de Oliveira was a Portuguese citizen living in Zurich. On 15 December 1990, while she was driving on a road covered with ice and snow in Zurich, her car veered onto the other side of the road hitting one car and then colliding with a second driven by M, who sustained serious injuries. On 13 August 1991 she was convicted under the Federal Road Traffic Act of failing to control her vehicle, as she had not adapted her speed to the road conditions and sentenced to a fine of CHF 200. On 25 January 1993 the district attorney's office issued a penal order fining her CHF 2,000 for negligently causing physical injury contrary to the Swiss Criminal Code in respect of the injuries sustained by M. The applicant challenged that order in the Zurich District Court, which on 11 March 1993 reduced the fine to CHF 1,500 and quashed the CHF 200 fine imposed on 13 August 1991 and said that any part of that fine that had already been paid was to be deducted from the fine it was imposing, the latter fine thus being reduced to CHF 1,300. She appealed to the Zurich Court of Appeal, which on 7 October 1993 dismissed the appeal. She appealed against that decision on grounds of nullity to the Court of Cassation of the Canton of Zurich and to the Federal Court. On 27 April 1994 the Court of Cassation declined to consider her appeal. The applicant then filed a public-law appeal with the Federal Court against that decision. On 17 August 1994, the Federal Court dismissed both the applicant's public-law appeal and her appeal on grounds of nullity. She complained of a breach of P7A4.

Comm found by majority (24–8) V P7A4.

Court found by majority (8–1) NV P7A4.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr A N Loizou, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr B Repik (d), Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits, Mr P Van Dijk, Mr M Voicu.

The convictions in issue concerned an accident caused by the applicant on 15 December 1990: She was firstly ordered to pay a fine by the police magistrate for failing to control her vehicle as she had not adapted her speed to the road conditions and subsequently, the Zurich District Court and then the Zurich Court of Appeal imposed a fine (from which, however, was deducted the amount of the initial fine) for negligently causing physical injury. That was a typical example of a single act constituting various offences. The characteristic feature of that notion was that a single criminal act was split up into two separate offences, in this case the failure to control the vehicle and the negligent causing of physical injury. In such cases, the greater penalty would usually absorb the lesser one. There was nothing in that situation which infringed P7A4 since that provision prohibited people being tried twice for the same offence whereas in cases concerning a single act constituting various offences one criminal act constituted two separate offences. It would admittedly have been more consistent with the principles governing the proper administration of justice for sentence in respect of both offences, which resulted from the same criminal act, to have been passed by the same court in a single set of proceedings. Indeed, it appeared that that is what ought to have occurred in the instant case as the police magistrate should, in view of the fact that the serious injuries sustained by the injured party were outside his jurisdiction, have sent the case file to the district attorney for him to rule on both offences together. The fact that that procedure was not followed in the applicant's case was, however, irrelevant as regards compliance with P7A4 since that provision did not preclude separate offences, even if they were all part of a single criminal act, being tried by different courts, especially where, as in the present case, the penalties were not cumulative, the lesser being absorbed by the greater. The instant case was therefore distinguishable from the case of Gradinger, in which two different courts came to inconsistent findings on the applicant's blood alcohol level. Therefore there had been no violation of P7A4.

Oliveira Modesto and Others v Portugal 00/160

[Application lodged 11.9.1996; Court Judgment 8.6.2000]

Mrs Maria de Lurdes Ferreira Matos Oliveira Modesto and 121 other persons, the applicants, were employed by a limited company, F-CME SA, which from 1985 was unable to pay its staff their wages. In October 1986 the company applied to the courts to be placed in judicial administration. In February 1988 the applicants' claims were recognised by the other creditors. The company was finally declared insolvent in October 1994. In May 1995 an order was made for seizure of the company's assets and the creditors were called on to prove their claims. In March 2000 the judge delivered a decision determining the rank of several creditors, he declared admissible the appeals against that decision lodged by three of the creditors. The proceedings were still pending; the applicants complained of their length.

Civil rights, in particular the right to remuneration, were at stake, at least from February 1988, the date on which all the creditors approved the applicant's claims. There were delays on the part of the authorities. The length of proceedings was not reasonable.

Oliveira Neves v Portugal (1991) 13 EHRR 576 89/8

[Application lodged 11.6.1985; Commission report 15.12.1988; Court Judgment 25.5.1989]

Mrs Maria de Conceiçao Oliveira Neves was a poultry dealer. On 13 March 1979 she dismissed an employee whom she had engaged in October 1976. On 25 March 1980 her former employee instituted proceedings against her in the Oporto Labour Court. The hearing took place on 11 April 1985. On that date the judge gave his decision, finding for the employee and ruling that certain of the sums awarded should be calculated in subsequent proceedings. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings instituted against her.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court struck the case from list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr A Spielmann, Mr SK Martens.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached by the Government and the applicant. There was no reason of public policy to continue the examination of the case. The Court recalled other cases in which it had dealt with the question of the reasonableness of the length of civil proceedings, in Portugal and other countries.

Olsson v Sweden (1989) 11 EHRR 259 88/2

[Application lodged 10.6.1983; Commission report 2.12.1986; Court Judgment 24.3.1988]

The applicants, Mr Stig and Mrs Gun Olsson, were husband and wife. They had three children of the marriage, Stefan, born in June 1971, Helena, born in December 1976, and Thomas, born in January 1979. The applicants and the children belonged to the Church of Sweden; the applicants' membership was purely nominal, as they described themselves as atheists. On 22 January 1980, Social District decided that the children should be placed under supervision in view of their parents' inability to satisfy their need for care and supervision. Further case conferences, at which the applicants were present, were held in 1980. On 16 September 1980, the Council decided, at a meeting at which the applicants were present and had an opportunity to submit their views, that the children should be taken into care. Reports were considered including a medical report by a doctor and psychologist who were both members of the team that was in contact with the family. The County Administrative Court at Gothenburg, by a judgment of 30 December 1980, confirmed the Council's decision. The applicants appealed to the Administrative Court of Appeal which, after a hearing on 8 July 1981, confirmed the judgment of the County Administrative Court. The applicants were refused leave to appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court. The applicants complained that the care decision and the subsequent placement of the children constituted a breach of A 8 and they also invoked other articles under the Convention.

Comm found by majority (8–5) V 8 with regard to the care decisions concerning the applicants' children in combination with their placement in separate foster homes and far away from the applicants, unanimously NV 3, 6, 13, 14, P1A2.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (10–5) NV 8 with regard to the decision to take the children into care and its maintenance in force, (12–3) V8 with regard to the manner in which the said decision was implemented, unanimously NV 6, NV 3, NV 14+8, NV P1A2, NV 13+P1A2.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (jpd), President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (jpd), Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü (jpd), Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (so), Mr L-E Pettiti (so), Mr B Walsh (so), Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo (so), Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (so).

The Court had to confine itself, as far as possible, to an examination of the concrete case before it. Its task was not to review the law and practice in abstracto, but to determine whether the manner in which they were applied to or affected the applicants gave rise to a violation of the Convention. The Government's preliminary objection was out of time. While the Court's jurisdiction in contentious matters was determined by the Commission's decision declaring the originating application admissible, it was competent, in the interests of the economy of the procedure, to take into account facts occurring during the course of the proceedings in so far as they constituted a continuation of the facts underlying the complaints declared admissible. The decisions in question complained about by the Government could be regarded as falling into that category and the Commission acted properly in taking them into account. Subsequent decisions which were the subject of a further application raising new questions could not be settled by the Court in the present judgment.

A 8: the mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted a fundamental element of family life; the natural family relationship was not terminated by reason of the fact that the child was taken into public care. The measures at issue amounted to interferences with the applicants' right to respect for their family life. Such an interference entailed a violation of A 8 unless it was in accordance with the law, had an aim or aims that was or were legitimate under A 8(2) and was necessary in a democratic society for the aforesaid aim or aims. A norm could not be regarded as a 'law' unless it was formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen, if need be, with appropriate advice, to foresee, to a degree that was reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action might entail. Experience showed that absolute precision was unattainable and the need to avoid excessive rigidity and to keep pace with changing circumstances meant that many laws were inevitably couched in terms which, to a greater or lesser extent, were vague. The phrase 'in accordance with the law' did not merely refer to domestic law but also related to the quality of the law, requiring it to be compatible with the rule of law. A law which conferred a discretion was not in itself inconsistent with the requirement of foreseeability, provided that the scope of the discretion and the manner of its exercise were indicated with sufficient clarity, having regard to the legitimate aim of the measure in question, to give the individual adequate protection against arbitrary interference. The Swedish legislation applied in the present case was rather general in terms and conferred a wide measure of discretion, especially as regards the implementation of care decisions. However the circumstances in which it may be necessary to take a child into public care and in which a care decision might fall to be implemented were so variable that it would scarcely be possible to formulate a law to cover every eventuality. In interpreting and applying the legislation, the relevant preparatory work provided guidance as to the exercise of the discretion it confers. Safeguards against arbitrary interference were provided and taking those into account, the scope of the discretion conferred on the authorities by the laws in question appeared reasonable and acceptable for the purposes of A 8. The interferences in question were therefore in accordance with the law. The decisions concerning the care and the placement of the children were taken in their interests and had the legitimate aims of protecting health or morals and protecting the rights and freedoms of others. The notion of necessity implied that the interference corresponded to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued, a margin of appreciation was left to the Contracting

States. The reasons given by the County Administrative Court for confirming the Council's decision of 16 September 1980 to take the children into care (unsatisfactory home environment, retardation in the children's development, risk that Helena would develop negatively, lack of success in preventive measures, jeopardising of the health and development of the children) were relevant and the impugned decision was supported by sufficient reasons (a number of different social authorities had been individually involved with the Olsson family, the Council's decision was based on a substantial report, supported by a number of statements from persons well acquainted with the case, including a medical report, and there had been a hearing before the Court) that, having regard to their margin of appreciation, the Swedish authorities were reasonably entitled to think that it was necessary to take the children into care, especially since preventive measures had proved unsuccessful. The reasons given by the County Administrative Court in its judgment of 17 November 1982 were also relevant and sufficient reasons for thinking that it was necessary for the care decision to remain in force. It was not established that the quality of the care given to the children in the homes where they were placed was not satisfactory. The applicants' complaint on this score therefore had to be rejected. There was nothing to suggest that the Swedish authorities did not act in good faith in implementing the care decision. However, that did not suffice to render a measure necessary in Convention terms. An objective standard had to be applied. Examination of the Government's arguments suggested that it was partly administrative difficulties that prompted the authorities' decisions, yet, in so fundamental an area as respect for family life, such considerations could not be allowed to play more than a secondary role. Despite the applicants' unco-operative attitude, the measures taken in implementation of the care decision were not supported by sufficient reasons justifying them as proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. They were therefore, notwithstanding the domestic authorities' margin of appreciation, not necessary in a democratic society. Therefore the implementation of the care decision, but not that decision itself or its maintenance in force, gave rise to a breach of A 8.

A 3: the allegation of ill-treatment of Stefan was not substantiated. The applicants' other complaints (the frequent moving of Stefan from one home to another, his ill-treatment at the hands of a family with whom he was placed and his placement in an institution run by the Board for the Retarded, the manner in which, on one occasion, Stefan and Thomas had been removed, with police assistance, from the applicants' home), did not constitute inhuman treatment. There had therefore been no breach of A 3.

A 6: Dr Bosaeus was heard as an expert in the 1980 proceedings and in the 1982 proceedings as a witness called at the request of the applicants' lawyer. It was reasonable, in view of her extensive knowledge of the background, that she should have been heard as an expert in 1980, the applicants had not been prevented from cross-examining her or calling a counter-expert to rebut her testimony. The presence of Dr Bosaeus in the court-room before she gave evidence and the County Administrative Court's alleged failure both to remind her of her obligation to tell the truth and to insist that she answered certain questions, were not sufficient to show that the proceedings were not fair. As for the applicants' more general allegation, they were at all times represented by a lawyer and were able to submit such material and arguments as they saw fit. Although the Administrative Court of Appeal refused to hear Dr Bosaeus as a witness at its hearing in 1982, she had already been heard in the County Administrative Court. There was no evidence to support a conclusion that the proceedings as a whole were not fair or that the Swedish courts failed to make due and proper inquiries.

A 14+8: there was nothing to substantiate the applicants' claim under A 14+8 that the interference with their rights had not been based on objective grounds but on their social origin.

P1A2: the fact that the children were taken into public care did not cause the applicants to lose all their rights under P1A2. Although they described themselves as atheists, the applicants had not left the Church and there was no serious indication of their being particularly concerned, except at a late stage, with giving the children a non-religious upbringing. Neither had they shown that in practice the general education of the children whilst in public care diverged from what they would have wished. In those circumstances, no violation of P1A2 had been established.

A 13+P1A2: leaving aside the possibility of seeking redress before the County Administrative Board, a parent could, after the entry into force of the 1980 Act, appeal to the County Administrative Court against a placement decision taken by a Social Council. Both before and after that time, the question of a child's religious upbringing could have been raised and examined in a request for termination of care. There was nothing to suggest that those remedies, which were apparently not utilised by the applicants as regards Thomas' upbringing, would not have been effective, within the meaning of A 13.

Olsson (No 2) v Sweden (1994) 17 EHRR 134 92/73

[Application lodged 23.10.1987; Commission report 17.4.1991; Court Judgment 27.11.1992]

The applicants, Mr Stig and Mrs Gun Olsson, were husband and wife. They had three children of the marriage, namely Stefan, Helena and Thomas, born in June 1971, December 1976 and January 1979, respectively. The background to the case is set out at Olsson v S, the present proceedings are a sequel to that case. The applicants made several requests for the termination of the public care order in respect of the children. Eventually, in a judgment of 18 June 1987, the Supreme Administrative Court directed that the public care of the two younger children should terminate. Despite the judgment, on 23 June 1987 the Social Council prohibited the applicants from removing the children from their respective foster homes. The applicants brought proceedings to challenge the prohibition on removal. On 30 May 1988 the Supreme Administrative Court dismissed their claim for revocation of the prohibition on removal but accepted that the measure should be limited in time and did so to 30 June 1989. On 27 June 1989 the Social Council renewed the prohibition order until further notice and refused a further visiting request by the applicants. The applicants' further appeals to challenge the order, gain access and challenge the transfer of the custody of the children to the foster parents were unsuccessful.

Comm found unanimously V 8 on the ground that the restrictions on access were not in accordance with the law, by majority (17–3) V 8 with regard to the prohibition on removal, unanimously V 6(1) on the ground that the applicants did not have access to court to challenge the restrictions on access to the children, by majority (14–6) NV 6(1) with regard to length of proceedings concerning the termination of the public care of the three children, (19–1) NV 6(1) with regard to the length of the proceedings under the Parental Code, (19–1) NV 6(1) on the ground that the Supreme Administrative Court did not hold a hearing on the prohibition on removal appeal, unanimously NV 6(1) in relation to the first appointment of a guardian ad litem, unanimously, NV 6(1) regarding length of proceedings relating to the second appointment of a guardian ad litem, unanimously not necessary to examine 13 in respect of the restrictions on access, unanimously NV 13 in respect of the first appointment of a guardian ad litem.

Court found by majority (6–3) NV 8 in respect of the prohibition on removal, unanimously V 8 on account of the restrictions on access imposed between 23 June 1987 and 1 July 1990, by majority (6–3) NV 8 on access imposed after 1 July 1990, unanimously V 6(1) in that no court remedy was available to challenge the restrictions on access imposed between 23 June 1987 and 1 July 1990, unanimously NV 6(1) as regards any of the other points raised by the applicants before the Commission and the Court, by majority (7–2) no separate issue under 53, unanimously not necessary to examine other complaints under 6(1) and 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher (pd), Mr L-E Pettiti (pd), Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo (pd), Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Mr AB Baka.

New complaints raised by the applicants were not covered by the Commission's decision on admissibility and did not meet the conditions in the Court's case-law, the Court therefore had no jurisdiction to entertain them.

A 8: The prohibition on removal and its maintenance in force, as well as the restrictions on access, constituted interferences with the applicants' right to respect for family life. The prohibition on removal and its maintenance in force were in accordance with the law. The restrictions on access from 23 June 1987 to 1 July 1990 were not in accordance with the law and therefore there had been a violation of A 8 in so far as concerned the restrictions on access between 23 June 1987 and 1 July 1990. There was no evidence that the purpose of the prohibition on removal and its maintenance in force was to hinder reunion. The measure was aimed at protecting the children's health and rights and freedoms, a legitimate aim. The reasons for ordering the prohibition on removal were both relevant and sufficient. There was a serious risk that separating the children from their foster homes would harm them. Having regard to the margin of appreciation to be left to the national authorities, it had not been established that the social welfare authorities failed to fulfil their obligation to take measures with a view to the applicants being reunited with the children. Accordingly, the maintenance in force of the prohibition on removal and the restrictions on access were based on reasons that were relevant and sufficient and therefore necessary. Consequently, the complaint under A 8 failed on this point.

A 53: The facts and circumstances underlying the applicants' complaint under A 53 (undertaking to abide by decision of Court) raised a new issue which was not determined by the Olsson (No 1) judgment and were essentially the same as those which were considered under A 8 above, in respect of which no violation was found. No separate issue therefore arose under A 53.

A 6: The Government accepted the applicants' contention that there had been a violation of A 6(1) on the ground that it was not possible for them, until the entry into force of the 1990 Act on 1 July 1990, to have the restrictions on their access to the two younger children reviewed by a court. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(1) on this point. The proceedings relating to one of the requests made by the applicants for termination of the public care had started on 16 August 1984, when the applicants submitted their request to the Social Council. The periods had lasted approximately two years and six months in the case of the eldest child and two years and ten months in the case of the younger two children. Having regard to the complexity of the case, the delay was not so long as to warrant the conclusion that the total duration of the proceedings was excessive. The proceedings relating to the applicants' request to have the two younger children returned to them under the Parental Code had lasted for a period of 13 and a half months and comprised three levels of jurisdiction. This was not excessive for the purposes of A 6(1). The proceedings relating to the second appointment of a guardian ad litem lasted a little more than a year and included three levels of jurisdiction. They were concluded within a reasonable time. There had accordingly been no breach of A 6(1).

The miscellaneous allegations of violations of A 6(1) and 13 raised before the Commission were not mentioned by the applicants before the Court, which did not consider it necessary to examine them of its own motion.

Non-pecuniary damage (SEK 50,000), legal fees and expenses, (SEK 55,000 less FF 6,900).

Omar v France (2000) 29 EHRR 210 98/54

[Application lodged 27.7.1994; Commission report 6.3.1997; Court Judgment 29.7.1998]

The applicants were Mr Cheniti Omar, an Algerian national who was retired, and his two sons, Hassane and Kamal Omar, also Algerian nationals, born in 1959 and 1962 respectively, who were building workers at the material time. The three applicants were charged in October 1989 with aiding and abetting the investment, concealment or conversion of funds derived from drug trafficking. Cheniti Omar was detained on remand from 13 October to 3 November 1989 and Kamal and Hassane Omar from 13 October to 8 December 1989. On release, they were placed under judicial supervision. Following trial, the Lyons Criminal Court, in a judgment of 19

November 1991, sentenced the applicants to imprisonment and issued warrants for their arrest. They appealed against the above judgment and requested a second expert opinion on their financial accounts. On 1 October 1992 the case was heard at an adversarial hearing attended by the accused. In a judgment of 16 February 1993, the Lyons Court of Appeal fully upheld the impugned judgment with regard to the five-year prison sentences imposed on Kamal and Hassane Omar and raised Cheniti Omar's sentence to five years. It also issued warrants for the arrest of each of the three applicants, who were not in court. The applicants lodged an appeal on points of law within the time-limit of five clear days laid down by of the Code of Criminal Procedure. None of the applicants complied with the arrest warrants issued, but Cheniti Omar was arrested by the police at his place of work on 27 May 1993 and committed to prison pursuant to the warrant for his arrest. On 7 February 1994 the Court of Cassation declared the appeal inadmissible on the ground that a convicted person who has not complied with a warrant for his arrest was not entitled to act through a representative in order to lodge an appeal on points of law. In April and September 1994 Kamal and Hassane Omar were arrested and committed to prison pursuant to the warrants for their arrest. On 15 and 17 May 1995 the prefect of the Rhône département issued deportation orders against them. They complained that the decision to rule their appeal on points of law inadmissible had infringed their right to a court.

Comm found by majority (23–8) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (18–3) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka (d), Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Jambrek (d), Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P van Dijk, Mr M Voicu, Mr V Butkevych.

The right to a court, of which the right of access was one aspect, was not absolute; it may be subject to limitations permitted by implication, particularly regarding the conditions of admissibility of an appeal. However, these limitations must not restrict exercise of the right in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right is impaired. They had to pursue a legitimate aim and there had to be a reasonable proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved. Where an appeal on points of law was declared inadmissible solely because, as in the present case, the appellant had not surrendered to custody pursuant to the judicial decision challenged in the appeal, that ruling compelled the appellant to subject himself in advance to the deprivation of liberty resulting from the impugned decision, although that decision could not be considered final until the appeal had been decided or the time-limit for lodging an appeal had expired. That impaired the very essence of the right of appeal, by imposing a disproportionate burden on the appellant, thus upsetting the fair balance that had to be struck between the legitimate concern to ensure that judicial decisions were enforced, on the one hand, and the right of access to the Court of Cassation and exercise of the rights of the defence on the other. The proceedings in cassation formed a special stage of the criminal proceedings whose consequences could prove decisive for the accused. A 6(1) did not compel the Contracting States to set up courts of appeal or of cassation. Nevertheless, a State which did institute such courts was required to ensure that persons amenable to the law should enjoy before those courts the fundamental guarantees contained in A 6. In its Poitrimol judgment, the Court held that 'the inadmissibility of the appeal on points of law, on grounds connected with the applicant's having absconded … amounted to a disproportionate sanction, having regard to the signal importance of the rights of the defence and of the principle of the rule of law in a democratic society'. That finding was even more valid in the present case where the applicants had not attempted to evade enforcement of the arrest warrants. They did not leave their work or their place of residence. They attended the hearings in the Court of Appeal. They were not in court for the delivery of the judgment, but no statutory provision obliged them to attend, since in French law such attendance was a right, not an obligation. The police could have apprehended them at any time, and indeed did apprehend Mr Cheniti Omar, who was arrested at his place of work on 27 May 1993. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the applicants suffered an excessive restriction of their right of access to a court, and therefore of their right to a fair trial.

Open Door and Dublin Well Woman v Ireland (1993) 15 EHRR 244 92/67

[Applications lodged 19.8.1988, 22.9.1988; Commission report 7.3.1991; Court Judgment 29.10.1992]

The applicants in this case were (a) Open Door Counselling Ltd, a company which was engaged, inter alia, in counselling pregnant women in Dublin and other parts of Ireland; and (b) Dublin Well Woman Centre Ltd, a company which provided similar services at two clinics in Dublin; (c) Bonnie Maher and Ann Downes, who worked as trained counsellors for Dublin Well Woman providing non-directive counselling; (d) Mrs X, born in 1950 and Ms Maeve Geraghty, born in 1970, who joined in the Dublin Well Woman application as women of child-bearing age. The applicant companies were the defendants in proceedings before the High Court which were commenced on 28 June 1985 as a private action brought by the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children (Ireland) Ltd (SPUC), which was converted into a relator action brought at the suit of the Attorney General by order of the High Court of 24 September 1986. SPUC sought a declaration that the activities of the applicant companies in counselling pregnant women within the jurisdiction of the court to travel abroad to obtain an abortion were unlawful having regard to Article 40.3.3 of the Constitution which protects the right to life of the unborn and also sought an order restraining the defendants from such counselling or assistance. On 19 December 1986 the President of the High Court found that the activities of Open Door and Dublin Well Woman were unlawful having regard to the provisions of Article 40.3.3 of the Constitution of Ireland. Open Door and Dublin Well Woman appealed against this decision to the Supreme Court, which rejected the appeal. The costs of the Supreme Court appeal were awarded against the applicant companies on 3 May 1988. Following the judgment of the Supreme Court, Open Door, having no assets, ceased its activities. The applicants complained that the injunction imposed by the Irish courts on Open Door and Dublin Well Woman to restrain them from providing certain information to pregnant women concerning abortion facilities outside the jurisdiction of Ireland by way of non-directive counselling constituted an unjustified interference with their right to impart or receive information contrary to A 10. Open Door, Mrs X and Ms Geraghty further claimed that the restrictions amounted to an interference with their right to respect for private life in breach of A 8 and, in the case of Open Door, discrimination contrary to A 14 in conjunction with A 8 and 10.

Comm found by majority (8–5) V 10 in respect of the Supreme Court injunction as it affected the applicant companies and counsellors, (7–6) V 10 in respect of the Supreme Court injunction as it affected Mrs X and Ms Geraghty, (7–2 with four abstentions), that it was not necessary to examine further the complaints of Mrs X and Ms Geraghty under 8, unanimously, NV 8, NV 14 in respect of Open Door.

Court dismissed by majority (15–8) Government's preliminary objection regarding Mrs X and Ms Geraghty's claim to be victims, unanimously dismissed remainder of the Government's preliminary objections, found by majority (15–8) V 10, unanimously not necessary to examine remaining complaints.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona (d), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (pd), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo (d), Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (so), Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (c), Mr F Bigi (d), Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka (pd), Mr MA Lopes Rocha (d), Mr J Blayney (d), ad hoc judge.

The scope of the Court's jurisdiction was determined by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The Court had no jurisdiction to entertain new and separate issues.

Ms Maher and Ms Downes could claim to be victims of an interference with their rights since they were directly affected by the Supreme Court injunction. In addition, the Government were precluded from making submissions as regards preliminary exceptions which were inconsistent with concessions previously made in their pleadings before the Commission. A 25 entitled individuals to contend that a law violated their rights by itself, in the absence of an individual measure of implementation, if they run the risk of being directly affected by it. Mrs X and Ms Geraghty belonged to a class of women of child-bearing age which may be adversely affected by the restrictions imposed by the injunction. They were not seeking to challenge in abstracto the compatibility of Irish law with the Convention since they run a risk of being directly prejudiced by the measure complained of. They could claim to be victims. Although the plea regarding failure to comply with the six-month rule was raised before the Commission, it was not reiterated in the Government's memorial to the Court and was raised solely at the oral hearing. The Government had therefore failed under Rule 48 to file it before the expiry of the time-limit and the objection therefore had to be rejected as being out of time. Having regard to the reasoning of the Supreme Court on the issue, Open Door would have had no prospect of success in asserting its complaints under A 8 and 14. Open Door and Dublin Well Woman were not introducing a fresh complaint, but developing their submissions in respect of complaints already examined by the Irish courts. It emerged from the judgments of the Supreme Court that any action brought by the four individual applicants would have had no prospects of success. Accordingly, the Government's objection based on non-exhaustion of domestic remedies failed.

The injunction interfered with the freedom of the corporate applicants to impart information. Having regard to the scope of the injunction which also restrained the 'servants or agents' of the corporate applicants from assisting 'pregnant women', there could be no doubt that there was also an interference with the rights of the applicant counsellors to impart information and with the rights of Mrs X and Ms Geraghty to receive information in the event of being pregnant. Taking into consideration the high threshold of protection of the unborn provided under Irish law generally and the manner in which the courts have interpreted their role as the guarantors of constitutional rights, the possibility that action might be taken against the corporate applicants must have been, with appropriate legal advice, reasonably foreseeable. That conclusion was reinforced by the legal advice that was actually given to Dublin Well Woman that, in the light of Article 40.3.3 of the Irish Constitution, an injunction could be sought against its counselling activities. The restriction was accordingly prescribed by law. The protection afforded under Irish law to the right to life of the unborn was based on profound moral values concerning the nature of life which were reflected in the stance of the majority of the Irish people against abortion. The restriction thus pursued the legitimate aim of the protection of morals of which the protection in Ireland of the right to life of the unborn was one aspect. The State's discretion in the field of the protection of morals was not unfettered and unreviewable. National authorities enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation in matters of morals, particularly in areas touching on matters of belief concerning the nature of human life. However, that power of appreciation was not unlimited. The Supreme Court injunction was absolute in nature, imposing a 'perpetual' restraint on the provision of information to pregnant women concerning abortion facilities abroad, regardless of age or state of health or their reasons for seeking counselling on the termination of pregnancy. On that ground alone, the restriction appeared over broad and disproportionate. Moreover, the counsellors neither advocated nor encouraged abortion, but confined themselves to an explanation of the available options. The decision as to whether or not to act on the information provided was that of the woman concerned. Such counselling had been tolerated by the State authorities until the Supreme Court's judgment in the present case. The information that was provided by the relevant applicants concerning abortion facilities abroad was not made available to the public at large. The information concerning abortion facilities abroad could be obtained from other sources in Ireland such as magazines and telephone directories. Furthermore, the injunction appeared to have been largely ineffective in protecting the right to life of the unborn since it did not prevent large numbers of Irish women from continuing to obtain abortions in Great Britain. In addition, evidence suggested that the injunction had created a risk to the health of those women who were then seeking abortions at a later stage in their pregnancy, due to lack of proper counselling and having an adverse effect on women who were not sufficiently resourceful or educated to have access to alternative sources of information. In conclusion, the restraint imposed on the applicants from receiving or imparting information was disproportionate to the aims pursued. Accordingly, there has been a breach of A 10.

The complaints of discrimination made by the applicants in Dublin Well Woman were made for the first time in the proceedings before the Court; there was therefore no jurisdiction to examine them. However, having regard to the finding of a breach of A 10, it was not necessary to examine either those complaints or those made by the other applicants.

Orlandini v Italy 97/58

[Application lodged 4.11.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Rino Orlandini was a district council employee. On 18 July 1985 the District Council promoted him with effect from 28 July 1980, but postponed the corresponding pecuniary advantages until 14 December 1985. On 17 January 1987 he applied to the Tuscany Regional Administrative Court seeking the backdating of his promotion as regards the pecuniary advantages, also payment of the difference in salary and annulment of the decision in issue. In a judgment of 9 April 1993, the text of which was deposited with the registry on 11 August 1993, the court gave judgment against the applicant. It held that his claim was ill-founded, as throughout the period in question his work had consisted of the duties associated with the post he had held prior to being promoted. He complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found by majority (24–5) V 6.

Court found by majority (8–1) A 6 not applicable.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (d), Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

Disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the instant case the applicant was seeking the backdating of the pecuniary advantages of his promotion, payment of the difference in salary and annulment of the decision of 18 July 1985. Although the dispute did have an economic aspect, that aspect could not in the present case be decisive for the purpose of determining whether A 6 was applicable. The applicant's application was a direct challenge to the administrative authorities' 'discretionary powers', since they had specifically stated in the decision in issue that he would become entitled to payment of his new salary only when, five years after the date on which the decision was to take effect, he began his new duties. The dispute raised did not, therefore, concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, that provision was not applicable in the case.

Ortenberg v Austria (1995) 19 EHRR 524 94/41

[Application lodged 10.9.1986; Commission report 14.5.1993; Court Judgment 25.11.1994]

Mrs Margarete Ortenberg was a house-owner. On 12 September 1980 the District Council adopted a land-use plan which designated as building land an area adjoining the applicant's property. On 30 January 1981 the council voted for a development plan authorising the construction of terrace houses on the land. Building permits were subsequently issued. Mrs Ortenberg lodged an appeal with the district council against all these decisions, challenging in particular the lawfulness of the land-use and development plans and complaining of the substantial nuisance that would be caused to her by the proposed buildings. The council dismissed the appeal. Her appeals to the Constitutional Court and the Administrative Court were dismissed. She complained that she had not had access to a court with full jurisdiction or had a fair hearing

Comm found by majority (15–1) NV 6(1) as regards access to a court, unanimously NV 6(1) as regards fairness of the proceedings.

Court found unanimously NV 6(1) as regards access to a court and fairness of the proceedings, no jurisdiction to consider the complaint based on the lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court, no jurisdiction to consider P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland.

A 6(1) applied where the subject-matter of an action was pecuniary in nature and was founded on an alleged infringement of rights which were likewise pecuniary or where its outcome was 'decisive for private rights and obligations'. Having regard to the close link between the proceedings brought by the applicant and the consequences of their outcome for her property, the right in question was a 'civil' one. Accordingly, A 6(1) applied.

Under A 6(1) it was necessary that decisions of administrative authorities which did not themselves satisfy the requirements of that article should be subject to subsequent control by a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. The Constitutional Court was not such a body. In this instance, it could only review the lawfulness of the land-use and development plans, and, that did not enable it to consider all the facts of the case. It therefore did not have the competence required by A 6(1). The Administrative Court had thoroughly examined the applicant's complaints point by point, without ever having to decline jurisdiction in replying to them. Regard being had to the fact that this was a decision taken by an administrative authority on grounds of expediency and to the nature of the applicant's complaints, the review by the Administrative Court fulfilled the requirements of A 6(1) in this instance. The applicant further complained that she had not had a fair hearing. The Constitutional Court was not in issue, as it was not a 'tribunal' within the meaning of A 6(1) for the purposes of this case. The same was not true of the Administrative Court. However, the applicant did not point to any feature that might cast doubt on the fairness of the proceedings in the case in that court. The complaint that the Administrative Court had not held a hearing was not raised before the Commission and accordingly the Court had no jurisdiction to consider it. In sum, there had been no breach of A 6.

The complaint under P1A1, having been declared inadmissible by the Commission on 29 June 1992 as being out of time, lay outside the scope of the case referred to the Court and the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain it.

Osman v United Kingdom (2000) 29 EHRR 245 98/91

[Application lodged 10.11.1993; Commission report 1.7.1997; Court Judgment 28.10.1999]

The first applicant, Mrs Mulkiye Osman, was the widow of Mr Ali Osman, who was shot dead by Mr Paul Paget-Lewis on 7 March 1988. The second applicant, Ahmet Osman, was her son, born in England in 1972. He was a former pupil of Paul Paget-Lewis at Homerton House School. Ahmet Osman was wounded in the shooting incident which led to the death of his father. The applicant's complaints are directed at the failure of the authorities to appreciate and act on what they claimed was a series of clear warning signs that Paul Paget-Lewis represented a serious threat to the physical safety of Ahmet Osman and his family. In 1986, Paul Paget-Lewis, had developed an attachment to Ahmet Osman, taking photographs of him and giving him money. By March 1987 graffiti had appeared at six locations around the school of a sexual nature, referring to Ahmet. Files relating to Ahmet and the file relating to staff disciplinary matters were stolen from the school. On 14 April 1987, Paget-Lewis changed his name by deed poll to Paul Ahmet Yildirim Osman. There were discussions between the police, the school and the Ahmets. A police officer visited the school but no immediate action was taken. The headteacher met with the Osman family to discuss the situation. Paget-Lewis was examined by a psychiatrist who concluded that he was not mentally ill but should be receiving some form of therapy. In May and June 1987, there were attacks on the applicant's property, a brick was thrown through a window of the house and on two occasions the tyres of Ali Osman's car were deliberately burst. Paget-Lewis was suspended from the school pending an investigation for 'unprofessional behaviour' towards Ahmet Osman. The incidents continued with attacks on the Osman's property. In December 1987 the police visited the Osman family and discussed the criminal damage and Paget-Lewis' relationship with Ahmet. Paget-Lewis was also interviewed by officers of the education authority and admitting feeling totally self-destructive. Between January and March 1988 Paget-Lewis travelled around England hiring cars in his adopted name of Osman and was involved in a number of accidents. At the beginning of March 1988 Paget-Lewis was seen near the applicants' home. On 7 March at about 11 pm Paget-Lewis shot and killed Ali Osman and seriously wounded Ahmet. He then drove to the home of the headteacher where he shot and wounded him and killed his son. Early the next morning Paget-Lewis was arrested. On being arrested he stated 'why didn't you stop me before I did it, I gave you all the warning signs?' On 28 October 1988 Paget-Lewis was convicted of two charges of manslaughter having pleaded guilty on grounds of diminished responsibility. He was sentenced to be detained in a secure mental hospital without limit of time. On 28 September 1989 the applicants commenced proceedings against, inter alios, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis alleging negligence in that although the police were aware of Paget-Lewis' activities since May 1987, they failed to apprehend or interview him, search his home or charge him with an offence before March 1988. On 19 August 1991 the Metropolitan Police Commissioner issued an application to strike out the statement of claim on the ground that it disclosed no reasonable cause of action. The High Court judge dismissed the application. On 7 October 1992 the Court of Appeal upheld the appeal by the Commissioner. In its judgment, the court held that in light of previous case-law no action could lie against the police in negligence in the investigation and suppression of crime on the grounds that public policy required an immunity from suit. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords was refused. The applicants complained that there had been a failure to protect the lives of Ali and Ahmet Osman and to prevent the harassment of their family, and that they had no access to court or effective remedy in respect of that failure.

A 2(1) enjoined the State not only to refrain from the intentional and unlawful taking of life, but also to take appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction. A 2 could also imply in certain well-defined circumstances a positive obligation on the authorities to take preventive operational measures to protect an individual whose life was at risk from the criminal acts of another individual. Bearing in mind the difficulties involved in policing modern societies, the unpredictability of human conduct and the operational choices which had to be made in terms of priorities and resources, such an obligation had to be interpreted in a way which did not impose an impossible or disproportionate burden on the authorities. There was also the need to ensure that the police exercised their powers to control and prevent crime in a manner which fully respected the due process and other guarantees which legitimately placed restraints on the scope of their action to investigate crime and bring offenders to justice. Where there was an allegation that the authorities had violated their positive obligation to protect the right to life in the context of their above-mentioned duty to prevent and suppress offences against the person, it had to be established that the authorities knew or ought to have known at the time of the existence of a real and immediate risk to the life of an identified individual or individuals from the criminal acts of a third party and that they failed to take measures within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might have been expected to avoid that risk. The applicants had failed to point to any decisive stage in the sequence of the events leading up to the shooting when it could be said that the police knew or ought to have known that the lives of the Osman family were at real and immediate risk from Paget-Lewis. While the applicants had pointed to a series of missed opportunities, it could not be said that those opportunities, judged reasonably, would have resulted in the police neutralising the threat or a domestic court convicting him or ordering his detention in a psychiatric hospital. The police could not be criticised for attaching weight to the presumption of innocence or failing to use powers of arrest, search and seizure having regard to their reasonably held view that they lacked at relevant times the required standard of suspicion to use those powers or that any action taken would in fact have produced concrete results. There had therefore been no violation of A 2.

A 8: it had not been established that the police knew or ought to have known at the time that Paget-Lewis represented a real and immediate risk to the life of Ahmet Osman and that their response to the events as they unfolded was reasonable in the circumstances and not incompatible with the authorities' duty under A 2 of the Convention to safeguard the right to life. That conclusion equally supported a finding that there had been no breach of any positive obligation implied by A 8 of the Convention to safeguard the second applicant's physical integrity. The facts of the case did not disclose a breach by the authorities of any positive obligation under A 8.

The applicants had a right, derived from the law of negligence, to seek an adjudication on the admissibility and merits of an arguable claim that they were in a relationship of proximity to the police, that the harm caused was foreseeable and that in the circumstances it was fair, just and reasonable not to apply the exclusionary rule outlined by the domestic case-law. The assertion of that right by the applicants was in itself sufficient to ensure the applicability of A 6(1).

A 6(1) embodied the right to a court of which the right of access, that is, the right to institute proceedings before a court in civil matters, constituted one aspect. However, that right was not absolute, but might be subject to limitations. The reasons which led the House of Lords to lay down an exclusionary rule to protect the police from negligence actions were based on the legitimate aim in maintaining the effectiveness of the police service and hence to the prevention of disorder or crime. However, the application of the exclusionary rule in the manner in the case, without further inquiry into the existence of competing public-interest considerations only served to confer a blanket immunity on the police for their acts and omissions during the investigation and suppression of crime and amounted to an unjustifiable restriction on an applicant's right to have a determination on the merits of his or her claim against the police in deserving cases. Those other considerations had to be examined on the merits and not automatically excluded by the application of a rule which amounted to the grant of an immunity to the police. The application of the exclusionary rule in the instant case constituted a disproportionate restriction on the applicants' right of access to a court. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1) of the Convention.

Having regard to the conclusion that the applicants' rights under A 6(1) had been violated and recalling that the requirements of A 13 were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6, it was not necessary to examine A 13.

Otto-Preminger-Institut v Austria (1995) 19 EHRR 34 94/25

[Application lodged 6.10.1987; Commission report 14.1.1993; Court Judgment 20.9.1994]

The applicant, Otto-Preminger-Institut für audiovisuelle Mediengestaltung (OPI) was a private non-profit-making association under Austrian law whose general aim was to promote creativity, communication and entertainment through the audiovisual media. Its activities included operating a cinema in Innsbruck. The applicant association announced a series of six showings, which would be accessible to the general public except those under 17 years of age, of the film Das Liebeskonzil ('Council in Heaven') by Werner Schroeter. The announcement was made in an information bulletin distributed by OPI to its members and in various display windows in Innsbruck including that of the cinema itself. At the request of the Innsbruck diocese of the Roman Catholic Church, the public prosecutor instituted criminal proceedings against OPI's manager, Mr Dietmar Zingl, on 10 May 1985 on a charge of 'disparaging religious doctrines' contrary to the Penal Code. On 12 May 1985, after the film had been shown at a private session in the presence of a duty judge, an application by the public prosecutor for its seizure was granted by the Innsbruck Regional Court. As a result, the public showings announced by OPI could not take place. An appeal by Mr Zingl against the seizure order, filed with the Innsbruck Court of Appeal, was dismissed on 30 July 1985. On 24 October 1985 the criminal prosecution against Mr Zingl was discontinued and the case was pursued in the form of 'objective proceedings' under the Media Act aimed at suppression of the film. In its judgment the Regional Court ordered the forfeiture of the film. Mr Zingl's appeal to the Innsbruck Court of Appeal was declared inadmissible on 25 March 1987. The applicant association complained of violation of A 10.

Comm found by majority (9–5) V 10 as regards the seizure of the film, (13–1) V 10 as regards the forfeiture of the film.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's primary preliminary objections, found by majority (6–3) NV 10 as regards seizure and forfeiture.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mrs E Palm (jd), Mr R Pekkanen (jd), Mr J Makarczyk (jd), Mr D Gotchev.

The Government had not raised their alternative argument regarding the six month rule before the Commission and were estopped from doing so before the Court. Although the applicant association was not the owner of either the copyright or the forfeited copy of the film, it was directly affected by the decision on forfeiture, which had the effect of making it impossible for it ever to show the film in its cinema in Innsbruck or anywhere in Austria. In addition, the seizure was a provisional measure, the legality of which was confirmed by the decision on forfeiture. The applicant association could therefore validly claim to be a 'victim' of the forfeiture of the film as well as its seizure. The 'final decision' for the purpose of A 26 was the judgment of the Innsbruck Court of Appeal on 25 March 1987 and notified to OPI on 7. In accordance with its usual practice, the Commission decided that the application, which had been lodged within six months of the latter date, had been filed within the requisite time-limit. The Government's preliminary objection was therefore rejected.

Both the seizure and the forfeiture constituted interference with the applicant association's right to freedom of expression. The interferences were prescribed by law, the Austrian Penal Code and pursued the legitimate aim of the protection of the rights of others. Although access to the cinema to see the film was subject to payment of an admission fee and an age-limit, the film was widely advertised. There was sufficient information of its nature and the proposed screening was an expression sufficiently public to cause offence. The conflicting interests had to be weighed up and regard had to be had to the margin of appreciation left to the national authorities, whose duty it was in a democratic society also to consider, within the limits of their jurisdiction, the interests of society as a whole. The Austrian courts, ordering the seizure and forfeiture of the film, held it to be an abusive attack on the Roman Catholic religion. They had due regard to the freedom of artistic expression. They did not consider that its merit as a work of art or as a contribution to public debate in Austrian society outweighed those features which made it essentially offensive to the general public within their jurisdiction. The content of the film could not be said to be incapable of grounding the conclusions arrived at by the Austrian courts. The Roman Catholic religion was the religion of the overwhelming majority of Tyroleans. In seizing the film, the Austrian authorities acted to ensure religious peace in that region and to prevent some people feeling the object of attacks on their religious beliefs in an unwarranted and offensive manner. The Austrian authorities could not be regarded as having overstepped their margin of appreciation in this respect. No violation of A 10 could therefore be found as far as the seizure was concerned. The same reasoning applied to the forfeiture. A 10 could not be interpreted as prohibiting the forfeiture in the public interest of items whose use had lawfully been adjudged illicit. Although the forfeiture made it permanently impossible to show the film anywhere in Austria, the means employed were not disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued and therefore the national authorities did not exceed their margin of appreciation in that respect. There had accordingly been no violation of A 10 as regards the forfeiture either.

Owners' Services Ltd v Italy 91/35

By summons served on 13 March 1982, the applicant took proceedings before the Salerno court against a company to recover ITL 29,850,000 which it had paid in error and which the defendant refused to refund. The investigation began at the hearing of 28 April 1982. On 2 December 1986 the court allowed the applicant's claim for reimbursement. The text of the decision was lodged with the registry on 6 March 1987. The applicant company complained of the length of the civil proceedings brought by it. On 2 June 1987 the applicant agreed to a friendly settlement of the case.

In a letter of 13 May 1991 the applicant company informed the Court of its wish to 'withdraw' and its decision not to seek just satisfaction. That was a 'fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter', there was no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings.

Özgür Gündem v Turkey 00/91

(Application lodged 9.12.1993; Commission report 29.10.1998; Court Judgment 16.3.2000]

Gurbetelli Ersöz, Fahri Ferda Çetin, Yasar Kaya and Ülkem Basin ve Yayincilik Sanayi Ticaret Limited were, respectively, the editor-in-chief and the assistant editor-in-chief and the owners of the newspaper Özgür Gündem. The application concerned the applicants' allegations that there had been a concerted and deliberate assault on their freedom of expression through a campaign of targeting journalists and others involved in the newspaper Özgür Gündem. The campaign had involved killings, disappearances, arson, harassment and intimidation of journalists, distributors and others associated with the newspaper. In one operation on 10 December 1993, the police conducted a search at the Özgür Gündem office in Istanbul. During the operation, they took into custody those present in the building (107 persons) and seized all the documents and archives. Numerous prosecutions were brought against the newspaper. The applicants claimed that the Government instigated or tolerated the actions. The Government denied that State agents were involved and considered the newspaper to be run by the PKK. The Susurluk report commissioned by the Prime Minster described acquiescence and connivance by State authorities in unlawful activities, some of which targeted Özgür Gündem.

Court unanimously struck case out of the list insofar as it concerned Gurbetelli Ersöz, found unanimously V 10, NV 14.

Judges: Mr M Pellonpää, President, Mr G Ress, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr V Butkevych, Mr F Gölcüklü (pd), ad hoc judge.

The applicant, Gurbetelli Ersöz, was formerly the editor of Özgür Gündem. After submission of her application, she died in autumn of 1997 and no information had been received that any heir or close relative wished to pursue her complaints. Accordingly, the part of the case relating to her was struck off the list.

While the Susurluk report could not be relied on for establishing to the required standard of proof that State officials were implicated in any particular incident, the Court considered that the report, which was drawn up at the request of the Prime Minister and which he decided should be made public, had to be regarded as a serious attempt to provide information on and analyse problems associated with the fight against terrorism from a general perspective and to recommend preventive and investigative measures. On that basis, the report could be relied on as providing factual substantiation of the fears expressed by the applicants from 1992 onwards that the newspaper and persons associated with it were at risk of unlawful violence. The Court was satisfied that from 1992 to 1994 there were numerous incidents of violence, including killings, assaults and arson attacks and that the concerns of the newspaper were brought to the attention of the authorities. It did not appear, however, that any measures were taken to investigate that allegation. Nor did the authorities respond by any protective measures. Although the essential object of many provisions of the Convention was to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by public authorities, there could in addition be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect of the rights concerned. Genuine, effective exercise of freedom of expression did not depend merely on the State's duty not to interfere, but could require positive measures of protection, even in the sphere of relations between individuals. In determining whether or not a positive obligation existed, regard had to be had to the fair balance that had to be struck between the general interest of the community and the interests of the individual, the search for which was called for throughout the Convention. The scope of the obligation would inevitably vary, having regard to the diversity of situations obtaining in Contracting States, the difficulties involved in policing modern societies and the choices which must be made in terms of priorities and resources. Nor should such an obligation be interpreted in such a way as to impose an impossible or disproportionate burden on the authorities. Having regard to the seriousness of the attacks and their widespread nature, the Government could not rely on the investigations lodged by individual public prosecutors into specific incidents, which did not provide adequate or effective responses to the applicants' allegations that the attacks were part of a concerted campaign which was supported, or tolerated, by the authorities. Moreover, the Government's conviction that Özgür Gündem and its staff supported the PKK and acted as its propaganda tool, even if true, did not provide a justification for failing to take steps effectively to investigate and, where necessary, provide protection against unlawful acts involving violence. The Government had failed, in the circumstances, to comply with their positive obligation to protect Özgür Gündem in the exercise of its freedom of expression.

The operation on 10 December 1993, which resulted in newspaper production being disrupted for two days, constituted a serious interference with the applicants' freedom of expression. The operation was conducted according to a procedure prescribed by law for the purpose of preventing crime and disorder. However, a measure of such dimension was not proportionate to the aim. No justification had been provided for the seizure of the newspaper's archives, documentation and library and no explanation for the blanket apprehension of every person found on the newspaper's premises, including the cook, cleaner and heating engineer. The presence of 40 persons who were not employed by the newspaper was not, in itself, evidence of any sinister purpose or of the commission of any offence. The search operation, as conducted by the authorities, had not been shown to be necessary, in a democratic society, for the implementation of any legitimate aim. Regarding the legal measures taken in respect of the issues of the newspaper, there was no reason for criticising the approach adopted by the Commission which consisted in selecting domestic decisions for examination. Given the number of prosecutions and decisions, a detailed analysis of all cases would have been impracticable. The articles examined varied in subject-matter and form and the Government had not provided any reason for holding that the selection was biased, unrepresentative or otherwise gave a distorted picture; nor did they identify any court decisions or articles which should have been examined instead. The measures constituted an interference with freedom of expression under A 10. The measures were prescribed by law and pursued the legitimate aims of protecting national security and territorial integrity and of preventing crime and disorder. The Court recalled its case-law. With regard to necessity, the essential role of the press had to be taken into account and the dominant position of the State. Regarding the prosecutions concerning the offence of insulting the State and the military authorities, there were no convincing reasons for penalising any of those publications. Regarding the prosecutions concerning the offence of provoking racial and regional hostility, there were not relevant and sufficient reasons for imposing criminal convictions and penalties in respect of the article. Regarding the prosecutions for reporting statements of the PKK, the words used and the context in which they were published had to be considered: some could not be regarded as inciting to violence in view of their content, tone and context, others could, and given the relatively light penalties imposed, the measures complained of were reasonably proportionate to the legitimate aims of preventing crime and disorder and could be justified as necessary in a democratic society within the meaning of A 10(2). Regarding the prosecutions identifying officials participating in the fight against terrorism, in some of the articles the officials named were not alleged to be responsible for the misconduct, while in others neither the truth of their content nor the fact that the names were already in the public domain was taken into account and the reasons given for the criminal sanctions could not be regarded as sufficient to justify the restrictions placed on the newspaper's freedom of expression. Regarding the prosecutions for statements constituting separatist propaganda, while the use of the term 'Kurdistan' might be highly provocative to the authorities, the public enjoyed the right to be informed of different perspectives on the situation in south-east Turkey, irrespective of how unpalatable those perspectives appeared to the authorities and, even against the background of serious disturbances in the region, expressions which appeared to support the idea of a separate Kurdish entity did not have to be regarded as inevitably exacerbating the situation. While several of the articles were highly critical of the authorities and attributed unlawful conduct to the security forces, sometimes in colourful and pejorative terms, they could not be reasonably regarded as advocating or inciting the use of violence. Having regard to the severity of the penalties imposed, the restrictions imposed on the newspaper's freedom of expression disclosed in those cases were disproportionate to the aim pursued and could not be justified as necessary in a democratic society. The respondent State had failed to take adequate protective and investigative measures to protect Özgür Gündem's exercise of its freedom of expression and had imposed measures on the newspaper, through the search and arrest operation of 10 December 1993 and through numerous prosecutions and convictions in respect of issues of the newspaper, which were disproportionate and unjustified in the pursuit of any legitimate aim. As a result of those cumulative factors, the newspaper ceased publication. There had accordingly been a breach of A 10.

There was no reason to believe that the restrictions on freedom of expression which resulted could be attributed to a difference of treatment based on the applicants' national origin or to association with a national minority. Accordingly, there had been no breach of A 14.

Öztürk v Germany (1984) 6 EHRR 409, (1985) 7 EHRR 251 84/1

[Application lodged 14.2.1979; Commission report 12.5.1982; Court Judgment 21.2.1984 (merits), 23.10.1984 (A 50)]

Mr Abdulbaki Öztürk, a Turkish citizen born in 1934, arrived in the Federal Republic in 1964 and worked in the motor-car industry. After passing the necessary test, he was issued with a German driving licence on 7 May 1969. On 27 January 1978 in Bad Wimfen, the applicant drove his car into a parked car causing damage to both vehicles. On arriving at the scene of the accident, the police, by means of a notice written in Turkish, informed the applicant, amongst other things, of his rights to refuse to make any statement and to consult a lawyer. He availed himself of these rights, and a report was transmitted to the Heilbronn administrative authorities. By decision of 6 April 1978, the Heilbronn administrative authorities imposed on the applicant a fine of DM 60 for causing a traffic accident by colliding with another vehicle as a result of careless driving and ordered him to pay DM 13 in respect of fees and costs. On 11 April 1978, the applicant lodged an objection and requested a public hearing before a court. The public prosecutor's office indicated that it had no objection to a purely written procedure and that it would not be attending the hearings. Sitting in public on 3 August 1978, the Heilbronn District Court heard the applicant, who was assisted by an interpreter, and then three witnesses. Immediately thereafter, the applicant withdrew his objection. The Heilbronn administrative authorities' decision of 6 April 1978 accordingly became final. The District Court directed that the applicant should bear the court costs and his own expenses which were fixed at DM 184.70, of which DM 63.90 represented interpreter's fees. On 4 October, the applicant entered an appeal against the bill of costs with regard to the interpreter's fees. The District Court dismissed the appeal on 25 October. The applicant complained of the fact that the Heilbronn District Court had ordered him to bear the interpreter's fees.

Under German law, the misconduct committed by the applicant was not treated as a criminal offence but as a 'regulatory offence'. By removing certain forms of conduct from the category of criminal offences under domestic law, the law-maker may be able to serve the interests of the individual as well as the needs of the proper administration of justice, in particular in so far as the judicial authorities were thereby relieved of the task of prosecuting and punishing contraventions, which were numerous but of minor importance, of road traffic rules. The Convention was not opposed to the moves towards 'decriminalisation'. Nevertheless, if the Contracting States were able at their discretion, by classifying an offence as 'regulatory' instead of criminal, to exclude the operation of the fundamental clauses of A 6 and 7, the application of those provisions would be subordinated to their sovereign will. The notion of 'criminal' as conceived of under A 6 was autonomous. In determining whether or not the 'regulatory offence' committed by the applicant was a 'criminal' one within the meaning of A 6, the Court would rely on the criteria adopted in the Engel and Others judgment. The first matter to be ascertained was whether or not the text defining the offence in issue belonged, according to the legal system of the respondent State, to criminal law; next, the nature of the offence and, finally, the nature and degree of severity of the penalty that the person concerned risked incurring had to be examined, having regard to the object and purpose of A 6, to the ordinary meaning of the terms of that article and to the laws of the Contracting States. Under German law, the facts alleged against the applicant amounted to a 'regulatory offence' and did not fall within the ambit of the criminal law. However, no absolute partition separated German criminal law from the law on 'regulatory offences', and the provisions of the ordinary law governing criminal procedure applied by analogy to 'regulatory' proceedings, notably in relation to the judicial stage, if any, of such proceedings. However, the indications furnished by the domestic law of the respondent State had only a relative value, the nature of the offence, represented a factor of appreciation of greater weight. According to the ordinary meaning of the terms, there generally came within the ambit of the criminal law offences that made their perpetrator liable to penalties intended, inter alia, to be deterrent and usually consisting of fines and of measures depriving the person of his liberty. Misconduct of the kind committed by the applicant continued to be classified as part of the criminal law in the vast majority of the Contracting States. The changes resulting from the domestic legislation related essentially to procedural matters and to the range of sanctions. The rule of law infringed by the applicant had undergone no change of content. The sanction sought to punish as well as to deter. The general character of the rule and the purpose of the penalty, being both deterrent and punitive, sufficed to show that the offence in question was, in terms of A 6, criminal in nature. The fact that it was a minor offence, hardly likely to harm the reputation of the offender, did not take it outside the ambit of A 6. There was nothing to suggest that the criminal offence referred to in the Convention necessarily implied a certain degree of seriousness. It would be contrary to the object and purpose of A 6 if the State were allowed to remove from the scope of that article a whole category of offences merely on the ground of regarding them as petty. As the contravention committed by the applicant was criminal for the purposes of A 6, there was no need to examine it also in the light of the final criterion. The relative lack of seriousness of the penalty at stake could not divest an offence of its inherently criminal character. 'Charge', for the purposes of A 6 could, in general, be defined as 'the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he had committed a criminal offence. In the present case, the applicant was 'charged' at the latest as from the beginning of April 1978 when the decision of the Heilbronn administrative authorities was communicated to him. A 6(3)(e) was thus applicable in the instant case. Conferring the prosecution and punishment of minor offences on administrative authorities was not inconsistent with the Convention provided that the person concerned was enabled to take any decision thus made against him before a tribunal that did offer the guarantees of A 6.

The Court recalled its judgment in Luedicke, Belkacem and Koç and found that the impugned decision of the Heilbronn District Court violated A 6(3)(e).

Interpretation fees of DM 63.90 had been borne by the applicant's insurance company and not by him personally so that there was no prejudice capable of being the subject of a claim for restitution. No evidence to support legal costs. Claim for just satisfaction therefore rejected.

Öztürk v Turkey 99/55

[Application lodged 24.5.1993; Commission report 30.6.1998; Court Judgment 28.9.1999]

Mr Ünsal Öztürk owned a publishing house. In October 1988 he published a book by MN Behram entitled 'A testimony to life – Diary of a death under torture' about the life of Ibrahim Kaypakkaya, one of the founder members of the Communist Party of Turkey – Marxist-Leninist (TKP-ML), an illegal Maoist organisation. As the first edition had sold out as soon as it was placed on sale, the book was republished in November 1988. On 21 December 1988 the public prosecutor at the Ankara National Security Court instituted criminal proceedings against Mr Behram and the applicant. In December 1988 copies of the second edition were seized. On 30 March 1989 the National Security Court found the applicant guilty and sentenced him to fines of 328,500 and TRL 285,000 and ordered the book's confiscation. On 22 May 1991 Mr Behram, the author, was acquitted on the same charges. The applicant lodged further appeals. The National Security Court noted that the judgment delivered on 30 March 1989 had become final with regard to the conviction but that the confiscation order remained operative. The Court of Cassation rejected the applicant's further appeal. MN Behram's book went on open sale published by another publishing house, under the different title, 'Biography of a Communist'. The applicant complained that his conviction infringed A 10.

Comm found unanimously V 10, by majority (30–1) not necessary to examine P1A1.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 10, not necessary to consider P1A1.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello, Mr L Caflisch, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall, Mrs HS Greve, Mr A Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mr K Traja, Mrs S Botoucharova, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge.

The reference by written order provided for in Turkish law was an extraordinary remedy available against judgments given at last instance against which no appeal lay to the Court of Cassation, it was not directly accessible to people whose cases had been tried. Consequently, it was not necessary for that remedy to have been used for the requirements of A 35 of the Convention to be held to have been satisfied and it should not, in principle, be taken into consideration for the purposes of the six-month rule. However, it was a different matter where, as in the present case, the remedy has actually been exercised. In that case it became similar to an ordinary appeal on points of law, in that it gave the Court of Cassation the opportunity to set aside the impugned judgment, if necessary, and remit the case to the lower court, and therefore to remedy the situation criticised by the person whose case had been tried. By requesting the Minister of Justice to refer his case to the Court of Cassation the applicant set in motion a procedure which, in the present case, proved to be effective, and the six-month period began to run on 8 January 1993, the date of the Court of Cassation's judgment on the second reference. The applicant therefore lodged his application in good time, and the Government's objection had to be dismissed.

A 10 guaranteed freedom of expression to 'everyone'. No distinction was made in it according to the nature of the aim pursued or the role played by natural or legal persons in the exercise of that freedom. By providing authors with a medium, publishers participated in exercise of the freedom of expression, just as they were vicariously subject to the duties and responsibilities which authors took on when they disseminated their opinions to the public. The applicant's conviction for helping to publish and distribute Mr Behram's book unquestionably constituted interference with the exercise of his freedom of expression under A 10(1). The interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression was prescribed by law. Having regard to the sensitive nature of the fight against terrorism, and the need for the authorities to exercise vigilance when dealing with actions likely to exacerbate violence, the applicant's conviction pursued the aims of prevention of disorder or crime. The Court recalled its case-law. The book in issue took the form of a biography, giving a politicised version of the subject's life. Through his book the author intended, at least implicitly, to criticise both the Turkish authorities' actions in the repression of extreme left-wing movements and the conduct of those alleged to be responsible for Kaypakkaya's death. Albeit indirectly, the book thus gave moral support to the ideology which he had espoused. There was little scope under A 10(2) for restrictions on political speech or on debate on matters of public interest. The dominant position which the government occupied made it necessary for it to display restraint in resorting to criminal proceedings, particularly where other means were available for replying to the unjustified attacks and criticisms of its adversaries. Nevertheless, it remained open to the competent State authorities to adopt, in their capacity as guarantors of public order, measures, even of a criminal-law nature, intended to react appropriately and without excess to such remarks. Finally, where such remarks incited to violence against an individual, a public official or a sector of the population, the national authorities enjoyed a wider margin of appreciation when examining the need for an interference with exercise of freedom of expression. In that connection, it was important to note the conclusion reached by the bench of the National Security Court which tried the author of the book. In its judgment of 22 May 1991, it ruled that nothing in the book disclosed any incitement to crime capable of justifying Mr Behram's conviction under the Criminal Code. This striking contradiction between two interpretations of one and the same book separated in time by about two years and made by two different benches of the same court was one element to be taken into consideration, regard being had to what was at stake for the applicant in the proceedings against him. The words used in the relevant edition of the book, whose content, moreover, did not differ in any way from that of the other editions, could not be regarded as incitement to the use of violence or to hostility and hatred between citizens. Admittedly, the Court could not exclude the possibility that such a book might conceal objectives and intentions different from the ones it proclaimed. However, as there was no evidence of any concrete action which might belie it, the Court saw no reason to doubt the sincerity of the aim pursued by the applicant in the second edition of the book, especially as the first had sold out without occasioning criminal proceedings. The Court was prepared to take into account the background to the cases submitted to it, particularly problems linked to the prevention of terrorism. It was for the domestic courts to determine whether the applicant had published the book with a reprehensible object. The fact that domestic law did not require proof that the offence of which the applicant was accused had had any concrete effect did not in itself weaken the need to justify the interference under A 10(2). The book had been on open sale since 1991 and had not apparently aggravated the 'separatist' threat. Moreover, the Government had not explained how the second edition of the book could have caused more concern to the judicial authorities than the first, published in October 1988. There was nothing which might justify the finding that the applicant had any responsibility whatsoever for the problems caused by terrorism in Turkey and the use of the criminal law against him could not be regarded as justified in the circumstances of the present case. Having regard to the fact that the preventive aspect of the interference under consideration – namely, the seizure of some copies of the book – in itself raised issues under A 10, the Court considered, in the circumstances of the present case, that it could not attach decisive weight to the moderate amount of the fine imposed on the applicant. Accordingly it had not been established in the present case that, at the time when the edition in issue was published, there was a pressing social need capable of justifying a finding that the interference in question was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. Nor, on that point, could the Court accept the Government's argument, based on 'developments in the case-law' since the applicant's conviction, that where a violation of the Convention initially committed had subsequently been made good, the Court should not rule on the matter. The Court's sole task was to assess the particular circumstances of a given case and a decision or measure favourable to an applicant was not sufficient in principle to deprive him of his status as a 'victim' unless the national authorities had acknowledged, either expressly or in substance, and then afforded redress for, the breach of the Convention. In the present case, however, the applicant did not even benefit from any such decision or measure. Even supposing that 'developments in the case-law' prompted Mr Behram's acquittal, it could only be noted that those did not prove to be sufficiently pertinent to enable the Court of Cassation to remedy the situation the applicant now complained of before the Court. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 10.

The confiscation of the copies of the edition complained of by the applicant had been an incidental effect of his conviction, which the Court had held to have been in breach of A 10. It was consequently unnecessary to consider that complaint separately.

P v Italy 99/112

[Application lodged 24.12.1997; Court Judgment 14.12.1999]

Mr P complained about the length of civil proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr C Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr A Baka.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 6 October 1992 and was still pending on 8 October 1999, a duration of a little more than seven years at one instance. In four judgments of 28 July 1999 the Court had found that there existed in Italy a practice incompatible with the Convention, resulting from an accumulation of breaches of the 'reasonable time' requirement. That accumulation constituted circumstances aggravating the violation of A 6.

PL v France (1998) 25 EHRR 481 97/19

[Application lodged 20.7.1992; Commission report 11.4.1996; Court Judgment 2.4.1997]

On 16 September 1988 Mr PL was remanded in custody on suspicion of a number of offences of rape of his stepdaughters. On 3 October 1989 the proceedings were declared null and void and the applicant was released. A second set of proceedings was commenced and on 5 December 1989 the applicant was remanded in custody for the same matters. On 18 October 1991 the appellant was committed for trial. On 25 March 1992 he was sentenced to 17 years' imprisonment on a number of counts of aggravated rape. He applied unsuccessfully to the judge responsible for the execution of sentences to deduct one year and 18 days, that is, the equivalent of the time he had spent in prison during his initial period of detention on remand, from his sentence. He also wrote to the public prosecutor. He was informed that the period in detention on remand in connection with the first judicial investigation could not be taken into account for the execution of his sentence since it took place during proceedings which had been declared null and void and for that reason were deemed never to have existed. On 8 April 1994 the applicant petitioned the French President for a pardon, seeking remission of part (one year and 18 days) of his sentence. That petition was dismissed on 28 February 1995 but reconsidered and granted on 27 January 1997. The applicant complained of the fact that the term of imprisonment to which he had been sentenced had not been reduced by the length of his initial period of detention on remand in connection with a judicial investigation subsequently declared null and void.

Comm found by majority (25–3) V 5(1), unanimously not necessary to consider 14+5(1).

Court unanimously struck the case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr J De Meyer, Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik.

The Court noted that the Government and the applicant had not reached a 'friendly settlement' within the meaning of Rule 49(2), but that the applicant had stated that he was not proceeding. The pardon granted in the decree of 27 January 1997 gave the applicant what he was seeking from the French authorities, namely a reduction of his sentence of imprisonment by one year and 18 days. Those circumstances could be regarded as an 'arrangement or other fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter' within the meaning of Rule 49(2). There was no reason of public policy why the case should not be struck out of the list.

Paccione v Italy (1995) 20 EHRR 396 95/13

[Application lodged 24.2.1989; Commission report 11.5.1994; Court Judgment 27.4.1995]

Mr Francesco Paccione was a retired district medical officer. On 1 March 1980 San Remo District Council communicated to him its decision determining the amount of his ordinary retirement pension. He claimed that he applied to the Court of Audit on 7 April 1980, complaining that the assessment did not take account of all the relevant factors. In a letter of 11 April 1985 he asked for his application to be dealt with speedily. That request was registered on 18 April 1985 and it was listed on 20 April. The Court of Audit gave its ruling on 11 March 1992, the text of the judgment was deposited in the registry on 4 March 1993. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings in the Court of Audit.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr C Russo, Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek, Mr K Jungwiert.

The applicant did not prove that he had applied to the Court of Audit in 1980. Only his letter of 11 April 1985 was registered and listed by the registry of that court. That date therefore marked the beginning of the proceedings, which ended on 4 March 1993, when the judgment dismissing his application was made public on being deposited in the registry. They thus lasted nearly seven years and eleven months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The first adjournment was justified but the second adjournment caused a delay of just under eleven months. The investigation into the applicant's service record was not relevant. The Court of Audit waited until 11 March 1992 before dismissing the application on the sole ground that it had not been served on the Treasury. As this was a condition of admissibility, the Court of Audit should have noticed immediately that it had not been satisfied. The investigation was therefore unnecessary. There had been a violation of A 6(1).

Claim for just satisfaction dismissed as being out of time.

Mr Giulio Paderni complained of the length of civil proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr B Conforti, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 1 February 1992 and was still pending; it had lasted over 7 years 11 months at two levels of jurisdiction. In four judgments of 28 July 1999 the Court had found that there existed in Italy a practice incompatible with the Convention, resulting from an accumulation of breaches of the 'reasonable time' requirement. That accumulation constituted circumstances aggravating the violation of A 6.

Padovani v Italy 93/7

[Application lodged 1 July 1987; Commission report 6 June 1991; Court Judgment 26.2.1993]

Mr Alessandro Padovani was a workman. On 21 February 1987 he was arrested by the police with regard to possession of stolen property. He was brought before the Bergamo magistrate, who immediately after questioning him confirmed his arrest. The magistrate also heard two other accused. On 26 February the magistrate issued a warrant for the applicant's arrest and initiated immediate proceedings (giudizio direttissimo) against him and his co-accused. He set a hearing date of 2 March, and found the case proved against the applicant. He imposed a suspended sentence and a fine. The judgment was filed with the registry seven days later, on 9 March 1987. The applicant complained that the magistrate had not been an impartial tribunal.

Comm found by majority (16–2) V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr N Valticos, Mr JM Morenilla.

The Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was unfounded, as the magistrate acted in accordance with the legislation in force at the time. The argument that the applicant could have asked the appellate court to refer a question to the Constitutional Court was not put forward before the Commission and was therefore subject to estoppel. In any event, an individual was not entitled to apply directly to the Italian Constitutional Court for a review of the constitutionality of a law, so that the applicant did not have available to him in that respect a remedy whose exhaustion was required under A 26.

The task of the Court was not to review the relevant law and practice in abstracto, but to determine whether the manner in which they were applied to or affected the applicant gave rise to a violation of A 6(1). The existence of impartiality for the purposes of A 6(1) had to be determined according to a subjective test, that is, on the basis of the personal conviction of a particular judge in a given case, and also according to an objective test, that is, ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. As to the subjective test, the personal impartiality of a judge had to be presumed until there was proof to the contrary, and no evidence had been produced which might suggest bias on the part of the magistrate. As to the objective test, it had to be determined whether, quite apart from the judge's conduct, there were ascertainable facts which might raise doubts as to his impartiality. In this respect even appearances might be of a certain importance. What was at stake was the confidence which the courts in a democratic society had to inspire in the public and above all, as far as criminal proceedings were concerned, in the accused. In deciding whether there was a legitimate reason to fear that a particular judge lacked impartiality, the standpoint of the accused was important but not decisive. What was decisive was whether the fear could be regarded as objectively justified. In the instant case the fear of lack of impartiality was based on the fact that the magistrate had before the trial questioned the applicant, taken measures restricting his liberty and summoned him to appear before him. Although such a situation could occasion misgivings on the part of the applicant, they could for all that be regarded as objectively justified. The summary investigative measures consisted in the present case merely of questioning the accused, even though under the Code of Criminal Procedure the magistrate could have carried out further questioning. In issuing the arrest warrant of 26 February 1987, the magistrate relied, inter alia, on the applicant's own statements. The magistrate followed specific rules applicable to flagrante delicto cases within his jurisdiction. Giudizio direttissimo was a flexible procedure which sought to satisfy the 'reasonable time' requirement. There had therefore not been a violation of A 6(1).

Paez v Sweden 97/85

[Application lodged 16.11.1995; Commission report 6.12.1996; Court Judgment 30.10.1997]

Mr Jorge Antonio Paez was a Peruvian citizen who arrived in Sweden on 12 February. He requested asylum on the grounds that his activities within the armed opposition group Communist Party of Peru – Shining Path – had led to difficulties for him. On 1 June 1993 the National Immigration Board rejected his asylum request and ordered his expulsion. The applicant subsequently appealed to the Aliens Appeals Board which referred the appeal to the Government. On 12 October 1995 the Minister of Labour rejected the applicant's appeal. The enforcement of the applicant's expulsion was stayed following his appeal to the Commission. He complained that his expulsion to Peru would give rise to a violation of A 3.

Comm found by majority (15–14) that expulsion to Peru would not violate 3.

Court unanimously struck case out of list.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr C Russo, Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr P Jambrek, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

The Court noted that there had been no friendly settlement or agreed arrangement in the present case. The Swedish authorities had granted a permanent residence permit and the repeal of the expulsion order on 23 June 1997 in response to a fresh request by the applicant. Those circumstances disclosed a 'fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter'. The threat of a potential violation had been removed by virtue of the decision of 23 June 1997. There was no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. The Court noted that it had had the opportunity to rule previously on similar cases and the present case did not disclose any fact or circumstance which would require the Court to pursue its examination of the case. Accordingly, the case should be struck out of the list.

Pafitis and Others v Greece (1999) 27 EHRR 566 98/14

[Application lodged 30.6.1992; Commission report 4.9.1996; Court Judgment 26 February 1998]

Following an invitation from the Governor of the Bank of Greece to the Bank of Central Greece (BCG) to increase its capital, a temporary administrator issued new shares, thus increasing BCG's share capital by two and half times its former value. The applicants declined to take up an option to purchase the new shares before 27 August 1986. There were five further increases in the share capital and new administrators were appointed. On 1 December 1986 some of the applicants challenged in the Supreme Administrative Court the decisions of the Governor of the Bank of Greece and the Prefect of Athens approving the first increase in the BCG's capital. After numerous adjournments, on 17 April 1992, the Supreme Administrative Court dismissed the application. Some of the applicants brought proceedings in the Athens District Court, seeking declarations that the increases in capital were null and void. After numerous adjournments and delays, including some caused by a lawyers' strike and a decision of the court to seek a preliminary ruling from the European Court of Justice, the Athens District Court gave judgment on 27 February 1997 dismissing the actions. The applicants complained, inter alia, of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) in two of the nine sets of proceedings.

Court found unanimously 6(1) applicable, unanimously V 6(1) as regards Mr CP Pafitis, Mr P Pafitis, Mr T Frangos, the Sterea company, Mrs P Vossinaki and Mr N Vossinakis in the proceedings for judicial review in the Supreme Administrative Court and in the proceedings concerning action No 10429/1986 in the Athens District Court, by majority (8–1) NV 6(1) as regards the other 29 applicants.

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr B Walsh, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (pd), Mr P Jambrek, Mr P Van Dijk.

The purpose of the proceedings was to settle a dispute over the applicants' 'civil rights and obligations', since, as shareholders in a bank, they could arguably claim under Greek and European Community legislation the right to vote on the increase in the bank's capital and thus participate in decisions concerning the value of their shares. A 6(1) was therefore applicable in the case.

The Court did not question the complexity of the case or the importance of what was at stake for the parties to the proceedings in issue. The dispute the Supreme Administrative Court and the Athens District Court were required to settle raised serious questions regarding the interpretation of Greek and European Community law and the outcome would have important repercussions not only for the parties to the various sets of proceedings but also for the country's economy in general. However, the dispute's complexity alone was not sufficient to justify such lengthy delays as occurred in the present case. More decisive in that respect was the conduct of the parties and of the relevant judicial authorities. Only delays imputable to the relevant judicial authorities could justify a finding that a reasonable time had been exceeded. Even in legal systems applying the principle that the procedural initiative lay with the parties, the latter's attitude did not absolve the courts from the obligation to ensure the expeditious trial required by A 6(1). Three additional factors contributed to the prolongation of the proceedings in the case, the reference to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling, the strike by members of the Athens Bar for nearly a year and the close connection between the nine sets of proceedings. Whilst a question was being referred to the European Court of Justice the proceedings were stayed, which prolonged them by two years, seven months and nine days. The Court could not, however, take that period into consideration in its assessment of the length of each particular set of proceedings: even though it may at first sight appear relatively long, to take it into account would adversely affect the system instituted by Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and work against the aim pursued in substance in that Article. With regard to the strike, the Athens Bar was calling on its members to withdraw their services, it was taking action designed to defend their professional interests, not exercising one of the functions of a public authority. The delays caused by the strike could not therefore be attributed to the State. On the question of the close connection between the different sets of proceedings, the Athens District Court adjourned a number of the cases concerned and the Fourth Division of the Supreme Administrative Court relinquished jurisdiction in favour of the plenary court. Although A 6 required judicial proceedings to be conducted expeditiously, it also lay down the more general principle of the proper administration of justice. In the circumstances of the case, the stayed proceedings and the reference to the plenary court were compatible with the fair balance which had to be struck between the various aspects of that fundamental requirement. The delays due to the above three factors were therefore beyond the jurisdiction of the domestic courts in general and the Supreme Administrative Court and the Athens District Court in particular. The Court would accordingly take into consideration only the delays that the latter could, in one way or another, have avoided or reduced.

The proceedings for judicial review in the Supreme Administrative Court, brought by Mr T Frangos, Mr CP Pafitis and Mr P Pafitis began on 1 December 1986 and ended on 17 April 1992 with the judgment of the plenary court. They therefore lasted five years, four months and 16 days. There were twelve adjournments, eight of which were ordered by the Supreme Administrative Court of its own motion. Having regard to the above, the Court could not consider the period reasonable in the present case.

The proceedings in the Athens District Court No 10429/1986 brought by Mr T Frangos, Mr CP Pafitis, Mr P Pafitis, the Sterea company, Mrs P Vossinaki and Mr N Vossinakis, began on 22 December 1986 and were still pending in the Court of Cassation. The delay was due to the length of the proceedings in the Supreme Administrative Court. As in the latter instance, therefore, there had been a breach of A 6(1) as regards the applicants concerned.

Regarding the remaining applicants, they applied to the District Court on 12 May 1992, after the Supreme Administrative Court had given judgment. However, most of the delays which occurred after that date were due, first, to the proceedings concerning the reference to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling, and secondly to the strike by members of the Athens Bar. There had been no breach therefore of A 6(1) as regards those applicants.

With regard to the proceedings concerning action Nos 5220/1989, 11301/1990, 6137/1991, 5055/1993, 23/1994, 45/1994 and 7968/1994 in the Athens District Court, there had been no breach of A 6(1) as regards those proceedings.

Non-pecuniary damage (GRD 7,500,000 jointly to Mr CP Pafitis, Mr P Pafitis, Mr T Frangos, the Sterea company, Mrs P Vossinaki and Mr N Vossinakis), costs and expenses (GRD 9,000,000).

Pailot v France 98/24

[Application lodged 2.7.1996; Commission report 9.7.1997; Court Judgment 22.4.1998]

Mr Jean-Marc Pailot was a clerical worker employed by an insurance firm. He was a haemophiliac and had received numerous blood transfusions. Following a test on 27 August 1985, he was found to be infected with HIV. On 23 December 1989 the applicant submitted a preliminary application for compensation to the Minister for Solidarity, Health and Social Protection. His application was rejected on 30 March 1990 and he commenced proceedings. On 28 December 1994 the applicant lodged an application with the European Commission of Human Rights. On 28 June 1995, having declared the application admissible, the Commission adopted a report noting that the parties had reached agreement on a friendly settlement. The applicant's appeal in respect of his compensation claim continued in the domestic courts. On 2 July 1996 he lodged a further application with the Commission. On 23 April 1997 the Conseil d'Etat quashed the judgments of the lower courts and found the State liable for the applicant's infection. The applicant complained of the length of time it had taken for his application for compensation from the State to be considered.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P van Dijk.

The wording of the declaration between the applicant and the State referred to the domestic proceedings up to the point they had reached when the friendly settlement was agreed and excluded any subsequent proceedings. It was highly unlikely that the applicant would have accepted a friendly settlement proposal that allowed the outcome of the proceedings to be delayed with impunity. The waiver of a right guaranteed by the Convention had to be established in an unequivocal manner. Those requirements were not fulfilled in the present case. The preliminary objection therefore had to be dismissed.

The present case, as referred to the Court, concerned the proceedings subsequent to the friendly settlement being reached. The starting-point therefore had to be 29 June 1995, that being the day after the Commission adopted its report noting that a settlement had been agreed. The proceedings in issue had lasted one year and 10 months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. On the latter point, what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation had to be taken into account. Even though the case was of some complexity, that fact alone could not justify the length of the proceedings in question as the information needed to determine the State's liability had been available for a long time. The applicant sought twice, on 17 January and 17 April 1996, to expedite the proceedings, but without success. What was at stake in the proceedings was of crucial importance to the applicant in view of the disease from which he was suffering. He was infected in 1985 and was classified in 1994 as having reached stage 3, the last but one stage of infection. Exceptional diligence was called for, notwithstanding the number of cases to be dealt with, in particular as the facts of the controversy had been known to the Government for several years and its seriousness must have been obvious to them. There had been delays in the proceedings. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case and in particular to the applicant's situation, the time taken in the present case could not be considered to have been reasonable. There had been a violation of A 6(1).

Pakelli v Germany (1984) 6 EHRR 1 83/4

[Application lodged 5.10.1978; Commission report 12 December 1981; Court Judgment 25.4.1983]

Mr Lütfü Pakelli, a Turkish national, arrived in the Federal Republic of Germany in February 1964 and held various jobs. In 1974 he was arrested on suspicion of having committed an offence against the Narcotics Act. He was granted the assistance of an officially appointed lawyer. He was tried, convicted and sentenced to imprisonment. On 3 May 1976, his lawyer filed an appeal on points of law. The applicant was released on 10 August 1976 and returned to Turkey. On 29 November 1977, in the absence of the applicant and his lawyer, after hearing submissions of an official of the Federal public prosecutor's office and after deliberating in private, the court dismissed the appeal. The applicant's lawyer appealed unsuccessfully to the Federal Constitutional Court. The applicant complained, inter alia, of the refusal of the Federal Court, in proceedings concerning an appeal on points of law, to appoint his lawyer as official defence counsel for the hearing of 29 November 1977 before that court.

Comm found unanimously V 6(3)(c), by majority (11–1) not necessary to determine 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(3)(c), not necessary to examine 6(1).

A 6(3)(c) guaranteed three rights to a person charged with a criminal offence: to defend himself in person, to defend himself through legal assistance of his own choosing and, on certain conditions, to be given legal assistance free. The question of the applicant's means played no part in the decision complained of: the refusal of the request for the appointment of the lawyer was based solely on the fact that, in the opinion of the court, the case did not fall within the category of cases for which German law prescribed the assistance of a defence counsel. It was in practice impossible now to prove that in 1977 the applicant did not have the means to pay his lawyer, although there were some indications that that was so. The evidence led the Court to regard the first of the two conditions contained in A 6(3)(c) as satisfied. This was one of the rare cases in which the Federal Court held a hearing. It was therefore necessary, in order to ensure a fair trial, to comply with the rule that oral proceedings should take place with the participation of both parties. Although the applicant confined himself to alleging that there had been procedural errors, he would have been able, had his lawyer appeared before the court, to explain his complaints, to supply further particulars thereof if need be and to develop his written arguments. The personal appearance of the appellant would not have compensated for the absence of his lawyer. The appeal proceedings were not conducted with the participation of both parties at the stage of the hearings. The opportunity of refuting the public prosecutor's office's arguments should have been made available to the applicant at the hearings. By refusing to provide him with a defence counsel, the Federal Court deprived him, during the oral stage of the proceedings, of the opportunity of influencing the outcome of the case, a possibility that he would have retained had the proceedings been conducted entirely in writing. In those circumstances, the interests of justice required that the applicant be granted legal assistance for the hearings before the Federal Court. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(3)(c)

The provisions of A 6(3)(c) represented specific applications of the general principle of a fair trial, stated in A 6(1). Accordingly, the question whether para 1 was observed had no real significance in the applicant's case; it was absorbed by the question whether para 3(c) was complied with. The finding of a breach of the requirements of para 3 (c) dispensed the Court from also examining the case in the light of para 1.

Palaoro v Austria 95/38

[Application lodged 28.5.1990; Commission report 19.5.1994; Court Judgment 23.10.1995]

On 7 November 1987 a police car observed the applicant, Mr Peter Palaoro, driving on the motorway at speeds considerably in excess of the maximum speed limits. On 6 December 1987 the Tyrol regional police authority imposed two separate fines on the applicant for speeding. On 16 November 1988, after administrative proceedings which involved an examination of the reporting police officers in the absence of the applicant, the Imst district authority found the applicant guilty of two speeding offences under the Road Traffic Act and he was fined, with a period of imprisonment set in default of payment. The applicant appealed to the Tyrol regional government, which reduced the fines. He then applied to the Constitutional Court, which rejected his application. His appeal to the Administrative Court was dismissed on 25 October 1989. The applicant complained, inter alia, that he had been unable to bring his case before a tribunal, and that he had been denied the right to examine a witness in the administrative proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) in that the applicant had not been able to bring his case before a tribunal, no separate issue regarding the lack of a hearing before the Administrative Court and the failure by the administrative authorities to allow the witnesses to be examined by the applicant.

Court found unanimously 6 applicable, V 6(1) as regards access to a court, not necessary to examine the complaints regarding the lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court and that court's failure to take evidence from witnesses.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr SK Martens (c), Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk.

In order to determine whether an offence qualified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention, it was first necessary to ascertain whether or not the provision defining the offence belonged, in the legal system of the respondent State, to criminal law; next, the 'very nature of the offence' and the degree of severity of the penalty risked had to be considered. Although the offences in issue and the procedures followed in the case fell within the administrative sphere, they were nevertheless criminal in nature. That was reflected in the terminology employed. In addition, the fine imposed on the applicant was accompanied by an order for his committal to prison in the event of his defaulting on payment. Those considerations were sufficient to establish that the offence of which the applicant was accused could be classified as criminal for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that A 6 applied.

The applicant based his complaints on A 6, whereas the wording of the Austrian reservation mentioned only A 5 and made express reference solely to measures for the deprivation of liberty. Moreover, the reservation only came into play where both substantive and procedural provisions of one or more of the four specific laws indicated in it had been applied. Here, however, the substantive provisions of a different Act, the Road Traffic Act 1960, were applied. The reservation in question did not therefore apply in the instant case.

Decisions taken by administrative authorities which did not themselves satisfy the requirements of A 6(1), had to be subject to subsequent control by a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. The Constitutional Court was not such a body. In the present case it could look at the impugned proceedings only from the point of view of their conformity with the Constitution, and that did not enable it to examine all the relevant facts. It accordingly lacked the powers required under A 6(1). The powers of the Administrative Court had to be assessed in the light of the fact that the court in this case was sitting in proceedings that were of a criminal nature for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that when the compatibility of those powers with A 6(1) was being gauged, regard had to be had to the complaints raised in that court by the applicant as well as to the defining characteristics of a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. Those included the power to quash in all respects, on questions of fact and law, the decision of the body below. As the Administrative Court lacked that power, it could not be regarded as a tribunal within the meaning of the Convention. It followed that the applicant did not have access to a tribunal. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6 on that point. Having regard to the conclusion above, it was not necessary to examine the complaints regarding the lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court and that court's failure to take evidence from witnesses.

Present judgment afforded sufficient reparation.

[Application lodged 15.8.1990; Commission report 25.1.1996; Court Judgment 1.7.1997]

Mr Friedrich Wilhelm Pammel was a retired civil servant. In 1971 he inherited a plot of land leased to the Höxter town council in 1949 to be used as allotment gardens. The Höxter town council leased the land to the Höxter Allotment Garden Association, which, in its turn, sub-let it to individual tenants. Mr Pammel brought proceedings contesting the rent fixed by the Land Government and also brought proceedings seeking an order for possession against the Höxter town council and the Allotment Garden Association. He complained of the length of the proceedings in the Federal Constitutional Court.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr I Foighel (c), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr J Casadevall.

In accordance with the Court's established case-law on the question, the relevant criterion for determining whether proceedings before a constitutional court should be taken into account in order to establish whether the overall length of proceedings was reasonable was the question whether the result of those proceedings might influence the outcome of the proceedings in the ordinary courts. Proceedings came within the scope of A 6(1), even if they were conducted before a constitutional court, where their outcome was decisive for civil rights and obligations. The dispute before the civil courts concerned the applicant's right of property, a civil right within the meaning of A 6. The proceedings in the Federal Constitutional Court were closely linked to those in the civil courts; not only was the former's decision directly decisive for the applicant's civil right, but in addition, as the proceedings arose from an application for a preliminary ruling, the Hamm Court of Appeal was obliged to wait for the Federal Constitutional Court's decision before it could give judgment. Therefore A 6(1) was applicable to the proceedings in issue. The period to be taken into consideration was only the time taken for the proceedings in the Federal Constitutional Court, which began on 26 June 1987 when the Hamm Court of Appeal made its application to the Federal Constitutional Court and ended on 23 September 1992 when the latter gave judgment. It therefore lasted just under five years and three months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of each case and having regard in particular to the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties and the relevant authorities. The case was undoubtedly complex. The applicant was not responsible for any delay to the proceedings. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements, including the obligation to hear cases within a reasonable time. Although that obligation could not be construed in the same way for a constitutional court as for an ordinary court, it was for the European Court in the last instance to verify that it had been complied with, having regard to the particular circumstances of each case and the criteria laid down in its case-law. Moreover, a temporary backlog of court business did not entail a Contracting State's international liability if it took appropriate remedial action with the requisite promptness. However, a chronic overload, like the one the Federal Constitutional Court had laboured under since the end of the 1970s, could not justify an excessive length of proceedings. The proceedings remained pending before the Federal Constitutional Court for more than five years. German reunification could have played only a secondary role in the present case because when the reunification treaty was signed, on 3 October 1990, the Pammel case had been pending in the Federal Constitutional Court for more than three years. Moreover, the Federal Court of Justice had already submitted the same question to the Federal Constitutional Court in connection with the Probstmeier case in May 1985, that was two years before the Hamm Court of Appeal. Accordingly, despite the complexity of the case, the length of the constitutional proceedings could not satisfy the reasonable time requirement laid down in A 6(1).

Pandolfelli and Palumbo v Italy 92/31

[Application lodged 20.8.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992.

Mr Gennaro Pandolfelli and Mrs Domenica Palumbo took proceedings on 13 September 1972 before the Terracina magistrates' court against Mrs M in order to establish that they had right of way through her land. There were various hearings and on 5 December 1975 judgment was reserved. However, on 6 March 1976, the magistrates' court decided to reopen the investigation and obtain further clarifications from the expert. Judgment was again reserved on 9 February 1979. On 14 February 1979 the magistrates' court found that it lacked jurisdiction to settle the dispute. The applicants applied to the Court of Cassation which, on 28 December 1979, found that the Terracina magistrates' court did have jurisdiction. The text of the decision was lodged with the registry on 28 March 1980. The hearings returned to the magistrate's court which allowed the applicants' claim. On 3 December 1982 Mrs M appealed to the Latina District Court, which on 12 January 1988 overruled the magistrates' court's decision. The applicants appealed, on 20 December 1988, to the Court of Cassation, which gave judgment on 31 May 1991; its decision had not yet been filed with the registry. The applicants complained of the length of the civil proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration did not begin when the proceedings were instituted against Mrs M in the Terracina magistrates' court, on 13 September 1972, but only on 1 August 1973, when the Italian declaration accepting the right of individual petition (A 25) took effect. However, in order to determine the reasonableness of the length of time which elapsed after that date, regard had to be had to the state of the case at that time. The period ended, at the earliest, on 31 May 1991, as the text of the judgment had not yet been filed with the registry. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Although the decision to reopen the investigation at first instance undoubtedly complicated the course of the proceedings, it was taken by the judge who had studied the file and who had at his disposal all the evidence adduced up to that point. It was not a very simple case. Nevertheless, the investigation was conducted under the supervision of the magistrates' court, which remained responsible for the preparation and the speedy conduct of the trial. Furthermore, it concluded that it lacked jurisdiction nearly six and a half years after the case had been brought before it. Although the Court of Cassation only required until 28 December 1979 to overrule it on this question, it took three months for the text of that decision to be filed with the registry. With regard to the long interval due to, among other things, the transfer of the investigating judge, A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The Court of Cassation did not give judgment for more than two years and five months; moreover, eight months had gone by since then and the text of the judgment had still not been filed with the registry. The parties were responsible for a number of adjournment and delays for which the State could not be held responsible. Taking the proceedings as a whole, a lapse of time of more than 18 years could not be regarded as reasonable.

Papachelas v Greece 99/13

[Application lodged 6.2.1996; Commission report 14.1.1998; Court Judgment 25.3.1999 (merits), 4.4.2000 (A 41)]

On 9 January 1989 the Greek State expropriated more than 150 properties, some of which belonged to the applicants, in order to build a new major road between Stavros and Elefsina. Law no 653/1977 created a presumption that, on the building of a new major road, adjoining owners whose properties fronted the road derived benefit. It accordingly provided that on the expropriation of such properties the owners had to contribute towards the costs thereof. Applying that presumption, the authorities considered in the instant case that the applicants, Mr Aristomenis Papachelas and Mr Eugène Papachelas, had derived an economic benefit from the building of the major road which offset their right to compensation for some of the expropriated land. The Court of First Instance assessed the provisional unit amount for compensation. On 5 March 1992 the applicants brought an action in the Athens Court of Appeal for the assessment of the final unit amount for compensation. Thereafter they appealed to the Court of Cassation which dismissed their appeal on 20 June 1995. They complained that their case had not been heard within a reasonable time and that there had been two violations of P1A1: firstly, by the award of compensation that was less than the value of the expropriated land and, secondly, the application of the presumption created by Law No 653/1977.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), V P1A1.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (12–5) NV 6(1), (15–2) NV P1A1 as regards the amount of compensation per square metre awarded in the instant case, unanimously V P1A1 as a result of the application of the irrebuttable presumption created by s 1(3) of Law No 653/1977.

Where an applicant was entitled to be served ex officio with a written copy of the final domestic decision the object and purpose of A 26 (now A 35(1)), were best served by counting the six-month period as running from the date of service of the written judgment. Where, as in the present case, the domestic law did not provide for service, it was appropriate to take the date the decision was finalised as the starting-point, that being when the parties were definitely able to find out its content. The Court of Cassation's judgment was finalised on 28 September 1995 and the applicants obtained a copy on 9 October 1995. They lodged their application with the Commission less than six months later, on 6 February 1996. Consequently, the Government's preliminary objection was dismissed.

The relevant period began on 5 June 1991, when the Greek State brought an action in the Athens Court of First Instance for the assessment of a provisional unit amount for compensation. It ended on 20 June 1995, when the Court of Cassation delivered its judgment. It therefore amounted to four years and fifteen days. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. The case was relatively complex, owing in particular to the number of properties that were expropriated. Only delays for which the State could be held responsible could justify a finding that a 'reasonable time' has been exceeded. The length of the proceedings before the Court of First Instance (five months and 15 days) and the Athens Court of Appeal (15 months and nine days) was not unreasonable. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation lasted a year and a half, which was not excessive, regard being had in particular to the fact that the applicants lodged their appeal submissions approximately six months after their notice of appeal. In the light of the facts of the case, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

The applicants had been deprived of their property in accordance with the provisions of legislation, so that improvements could be made to a major road, the expropriation therefore pursued a lawful aim in the public interest. Accordingly, it was the second sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1 which was applicable in the instant case. An interference with peaceful enjoyment of possessions had to strike a fair balance between the demands of the general interests of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. Compensation terms under the relevant legislation were material to the assessment whether the contested measure respected the requisite fair balance and, notably, whether it did not impose a disproportionate burden on the applicant. In that connection, the taking of property without payment of an amount reasonably related to its value would normally constitute a disproportionate interference that could not be justified under P1A1. That Article did not, however, guarantee a right to full compensation in all circumstances, since legitimate objectives of public interest might call for less than reimbursement of the full market value. Having regard to the margin of appreciation P1A1 afforded national authorities, the price paid to the applicants bore a reasonable relation to the value of the expropriated land. Consequently, there had been no violation of P1A1 as regards the amount of compensation per square metre awarded in the present case.

In the system applied in the present case, the compensation was in every case reduced by a particular amount, without the owners concerned being allowed to argue that in reality the effect of the works concerned either had been of no or less benefit to them or had caused them to sustain varying degrees of loss. That system, which was too inflexible, took no account of the diversity of situations, ignored the differences due in particular to the nature of the works and the layout of the site and was found in the Court's previous case-law to amount to a breach of P1A1. The Court saw no reason not to follow that case-law in the present case as the applicants were prevented from asserting before the domestic courts their right to compensation in full for the loss of their property. The applicants had had to bear a burden that was individual and excessive and could have been rendered legitimate only if they had had the possibility of proving their alleged damage and, if successful, of receiving the relevant compensation. It was not necessary at this stage to determine whether the applicants were in fact prejudiced; it was in their legal situation itself that the requisite balance was no longer to be found. There had therefore been a violation of P1A1 as a result of the application of the presumption created by s 1(3) of Law No 653/1977.

Papadopoulos v Cyprus 00/94

[Application lodged 9.2.1998; Court Judgment 21.3.2000]

On 19 July 1994 Mr Christos Papadopoulos filed an action in the District Court of Limassol against four defendants claiming, inter alia, arrears of salary, payment for services rendered and damages for unfair dismissal. Because of the amount claimed, the action had to be heard by the Full Court which, moreover, had to be composed of the President of the District Court and another District Court judge. On 28 February 1997 the Court heard the final addresses of all parties concerned. Judgment was reserved. On 30 June 1997 the President of the District Court of Limassol and member of the Full Court which had tried the applicant's case was appointed by the Government to the Public Service Commission. The new President of the District Court of Limassol fixed further dates and eventually delivered judgment on 26 April 1999. The defendants appealed against this judgment to the Supreme Court where the case was still pending when the applicant submitted his observations on the merits to the Court on 29 November 1999. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs HS Greve.

The proceedings concerned started on 19 July 1994 when the applicant filed an action with the District Court of Limassol. As of 29 November 1999, they were still pending before the Supreme Court. By then they had lasted over five years and four months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Only delays for which the State could be held responsible could justify a finding that a reasonable time has been exceeded. The length of the proceedings relating to the first hearing of the case were not excessive, allowing for five adjournments at the request of both parties. Testimonies were completed on 28 February 1997, namely two years, seven months and nine days after the introduction of the application before the District Court of Limassol and the case was ready for judgment. However, following the appointment of its President to the Public Service Commission on 30 June 1997, the District Court was unable to deliver its judgment. It took five months and five days for the new President of the District Court to decide that a rehearing of the case from the beginning was necessary. There were further delays and the District Court then needed 16 hearings to re-examine a total of nine witnesses. It delivered its judgment on 26 April 1999, four years, nine months and seven days after the introduction of the case. Such a delay was hard to reconcile with the need to render justice with the effectiveness and credibility required by the Convention. The applicant's case was not heard within a reasonable time and there had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Papageorgiou v Greece 97/81

[Application lodged 24.5.1994; Commission report 15.5.1996; Court Judgment 22.10.1997]

On 23 December 1987 Mr Christos Papageorgiou and 109 other persons brought an action in the Athens District Court against their employer, the Public Electricity Company ('DEI'), to recover a sum deducted from their salaries for the benefit of the Manpower Employment Organisation ('the OAED'). In a judgment of 20 April 1989 the District Court allowed the applicant's claim in part. The DEI and the OAED appealed to the Athens Court of First Instance which, in a judgment of 30 November 1990, reduced the amount awarded to the applicant by the District Court. The DEI and OAED appealed to the Court of Cassation, which on 19 November 1993 set aside the judgment appealed against. The Court's judgment was not served on the applicant, who claims that he became aware of it on 22 December 1993. The applicant complained that the enactment of Law No 2020/1992 and its application in his case when his action was still pending amounted to violations of A 6(1), 13 and 14 and further complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) with respect to the fairness and length of the proceedings, no separate issue arose under 14+6(1) or 13.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1) as regards right to a fair hearing and hearing within a reasonable time, not necessary to rule on 14+6(1) or 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr I Foighel, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr J Casadevall.

The Commission's Rules of Procedure did not imply that proof that the applicant had complied with the six-month time-limit was a prerequisite to registration of his application. An application was lodged on the date of the applicant's first letter, provided the applicant has sufficiently indicated the purpose of the application. Registration had only one practical consequence: it determined the order in which applications would be considered by the Commission. The parties to proceedings could not be required to inquire day after day whether a judgment that had not been served on them had been delivered. The Government's preliminary objections of failure to comply with the six-month time-limit and negligence in not finding out from the Court of Cassation's registry when judgment was to be delivered were dismissed.

The legislature was not, in principle, precluded from regulating by new provisions rights arising under laws previously in force. The Court could not ignore the effect of s 26 of Law No 2020/1992 in conjunction with the method and timing of its enactment. Although s 26 clarified the meaning of previous legislation, it also provided that any claims for repayment of contributions previously paid to the OAED were extinguished and any proceedings concerning such claims pending in any court were to be struck out. In addition, s 26 was contained in a statute whose title bore no relation to that provision; the absence of such a connection was prohibited by the Greek Constitution. Finally, s 26 was enacted after the appeal against the judgment of the Athens Court of First Instance, sitting as an appellate court, had been lodged with the Court of Cassation by the DEI, joined by the OAED, and before the latter court had held its hearing. At that time it was certainly foreseeable that the Court of Cassation would follow its recent case-law, in which it had already clarified the meaning of the previous legislation and which was favourable to the applicant. In the circumstances of the present case the enactment of s 26 at such a crucial point in the proceedings resolved the substantive issues for practical purposes and made carrying on with the litigation pointless. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 6(1) with respect to the right to a fair hearing.

The proceedings concerned started on 23 December 1987, when 110 employees of the DEI, including the applicant, brought proceedings in the Athens District Court and ended on 23 November 1993, when the Court of Cassation delivered its judgment. They therefore lasted five years and 11 months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Only delays for which the State could be held responsible could justify a finding that a reasonable time had been exceeded. The length of the proceedings before the Athens District Court (16 months) and the Athens Court of First Instance sitting as an appellate court (17 months) were not excessive. Certain delays were due either to procedural requirements or to the conduct of the parties. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation lasted two years and eight months, a relatively lengthy period. The strike by members of the Athens Bar could not render a Contracting State liable with respect to the reasonable time requirement; however, the efforts made by the State to reduce any resultant delay were to be taken into account for the purposes of determining whether the requirement had been complied with. On 21 October 1992, when the Court of Cassation could not reasonably have known when the end of the strike would be, it set a new hearing date of 19 October 1993, that is to say 12 months later and 13 months after the initial hearing date. The Court was not unaware of the complications which strikes as enduring as the one that occurred in the present case could cause by overloading the list of cases to be heard by courts such as the Court of Cassation. Nevertheless, A 6(1) required that cases be heard within a reasonable time. A delay of that length in a case that had been pending in the Court of Cassation since 13 March 1991 was hard to reconcile with the need to render justice with the effectiveness and credibility required by the Convention. The applicant's case was not heard within a reasonable time and there had therefore been a violation of A 6(1) with respect to the length of the proceedings.

In view of the findings under A 6(1), there was no need to rule on the complaints under A 14 or A 13.

[Application lodged 7.11.1988; Commission report 9.4.1992; Court Judgment 24.6.1993]

Mr Ioannis Papamichalopoulos, Mr Pantelis Papamichalopoulos, Mr Petros Karayannis, Mrs Angeliki Karayanni, Mr Panayotis Zontanos, Mr Nikolaos Kyriakopoulos, Mr Konstantinos Tsapalas, Mrs Ioanna Pantelidi, Mrs Marika Hadjinikoli, Mrs Irini Kremmyda, Mrs Christina Kremmyda, Mr Athanas Kremmydas, Mr Evangelos Zybeloudis and Mrs Konstantina Tsouri, who were all of Greek nationality, were the owners or co-owners of land in the area of Agia Marina Loimikou, near Marathon, Attica. By a Law of 20 August 1967, which was passed some months after the dictatorship was established, the Greek State transferred an area of land near Agia Marina beach to the Navy Fund. The applicants applied unsuccessfully to the courts for restoration of their land. The Navy constructed a naval base and a holiday resort for officers on the land. After the fall of the dictatorship in 1974, the Athens Court of First Instance held that the Navy Fund was obliged to return the land. The decision was upheld by the Athens Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation. As construction on the land prevented its return, it was ordered that the land be exchanged for other land of equal value. There was no exchange and no compensation awarded to the applicants. They complained that their land had been unlawfully occupied by the Navy Fund

since 1967 and that to date they had not been able either to enjoy their possessions or to obtain compensation.

Comm found unanimously V P1A1.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found V P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk.

The Court found that there was estoppel in respect of the two preliminary objections of lack of victim and non-exhaustion. The Government had not raised the first objection before the Commission, and they made the second only in respect of the compensation proceedings.

For the purposes of the present dispute, the applicants had to be regarded as the owners of the land in issue. The breach claimed by the applicants began in 1967. At that time Greece had already ratified the Convention and P1, on 28 March 1953. Greece denounced them on 12 December 1969 with effect from 13 June 1970 but was not thereby released from its prior obligations. It ratified them again on 28 November 1974 after the collapse of the military dictatorship established by the coup d'état of April 1967. Greece did not recognise the Commission's competence to receive 'individual' petitions (under A 25) until 20 November 1985 and then only in relation to acts, decisions, facts or events subsequent to that date. However, the applicants' complaints related to a continuing situation, which still obtained at the present time. The occupation of the land in issue by the Navy Fund represented a clear interference with the applicants' exercise of their right to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. The interference was not for the purpose of controlling the use of property within the meaning of the second paragraph of P1A1. The applicants' lands were never formally expropriated: the law did not transfer ownership of the land in question to the Navy Fund. Since the Convention was intended to safeguard rights that were practical and effective, it had to be ascertained whether the situation complained of amounted nevertheless to a de facto expropriation. In 1967, under a Law enacted by the military government of the time, the Navy Fund took possession of a large area of land which included the applicants' land; it established a naval base there and a holiday resort for officers and their families. From that date the applicants were unable either to make use of their property or to sell, bequeath, mortgage or make a gift of it; Mr Petros Papamichalopoulos, the only one who obtained a final court decision ordering the Navy to return his property to him, was even refused access to it. The loss of all ability to dispose of the land in issue, taken together with the failure of the attempts made so far to remedy the situation complained of, entailed sufficiently serious consequences for the applicants de facto to have been expropriated in a manner incompatible with their right to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. There had been and there continued to be a breach of P1A1.

The Court was confronted with a dispute concerning the exact course of the proceedings in the Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal and had to reach its decision on the basis of the available evidence. The documents produced by the applicant did not provide sufficient prima facie evidence of the accuracy of his version of events. In addition, the record of the hearing, which was produced for the first time before the Court, constituted a significant element in support of the opinion that judgment was reserved at the conclusion of the hearing on 9 November 1984; in principle, that ruled out the possibility of a further hearing. There was nothing to show that in the course of the sole hearing the parties confined themselves to expanding upon their submissions concerning the stay of the proceedings. On the contrary, the Court of Appeal's judgment gave the impression that the trustee's lawyer presented argument on the merits. One of the grounds of the judgment indicated that, contrary to the applicant's claims, the relevant documents were in fact filed in the proceedings before the appeal court. Having regard to those considerations, the Court could not find a violation of A 6.

The Commission based its request for revision on two documents to which the applicant did not secure access until after the delivery of the judgment of 20 September 1993. The admissibility of any request for revision of a judgment of the Court was subject to strict scrutiny. The two documents related to the hearing in the Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal. One of them was a letter which the applicant had not been able to produce, a fact to which express reference was made in the judgment of 20 September 1993. In those circumstances, the Court could not exclude the possibility that the documents in question 'might by [their] nature have a decisive influence'. The Commission's request was accordingly admissible.

The Court had to determine whether the documents cast doubt on the conclusions it reached in 1993; it had to establish whether the two documents in question provided sufficient prima facie evidence in support of the applicant's version of events. After reviewing the evidence, the Court concluded that the documents on which the Commission based its request would not have had a decisive influence on the judgment of 20 September 1993 and did not constitute grounds for revision. The letter referred to had been merely a covering letter. Of the list of documents, the Court had had regard to those concerning the course of the domestic proceedings in the original judgment, the other documents in the appeal file did not provide any information on the course of the domestic proceedings. The Commission's request was accordingly unfounded.

Paskhalidis and Others v Greece 97/15

[Applications lodged various dates between 28.7.1992 and 30.9.1993; Commission report 6.9.1995; Court Judgment 19.3.1997]

The 93 applicants were Turkish or Egyptian nationals of Greek origin born between 1902 and 1938 who worked as private-sector employees in Istanbul, Alexandria or Cairo between 1927 at the earliest and 1965 at the latest. Having been obliged to leave Turkey or Egypt, they settled permanently in Athens between 1960 and 1980. On various dates between 10 April 1973 and 13 September 1985 the applicants applied or renewed applications to the various social-security bodies in Athens or Piraeus for recognition of their entitlement to an old-age, invalidity or survivor's pension and for the reckonable period earned by insurance contributions paid by them and their employers in Turkey or Egypt to be recognised in Greece after they had bought back the appropriate years. Their applications were refused by the relevant social-security bodies on the ground that they were out of time and they appealed. Their appeals to higher authority, to the Athens or Piraeus Administrative Courts and to the Supreme Administrative Court were dismissed. The applicants complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (12–1) V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck the case of Mr Karatzalidis out of the list, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek, Mr P Kûris.

Mr Karatzalidis died in 1983 while the proceedings concerning him in the Greek courts was still pending. His lawyer omitted him from the list of applicants submitted to the Court. His heirs did not instruct his lawyer to refer the case to the Commission. His case was therefore severed from those of the other applicants and struck out of the list.

Despite the public-law features, the applicants were not only affected in their relations with the administrative authorities as such, but also suffered an interference with their means of subsistence. They were claiming an individual, economic right derived from specific rules laid down in the Greek legislation. The proceedings in the Greek courts concerned the question whether the one-year time-limit within which the applicants had to submit their applications in order to have the benefit of the provisions of the legislative decrees was binding on them. The outcome of those proceedings were therefore directly 'decisive for civil rights and obligations'. It followed that A 6(1) was applicable in the case.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 20 November 1985, when the Greek declaration recognising the right of individual petition took effect. Depending on the applicant concerned, it ended on various dates between 3 February 1992 and 29 June 1993, that is to say when the Supreme Administrative Court delivered the judgments dismissing the applications for judicial review lodged by the applicants between 10 June 1983 and 6 April 1989. The period in question therefore lasted six years, two months and 13 days at the shortest and seven years, seven months and nine days at the longest. However, in order to determine whether the time which elapsed was reasonable, it was also necessary to take into account the state of the proceedings on the critical date. On the critical date the longest proceedings had already lasted more than seven years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined in the light of the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and by reference to the circumstances of the case. The cases in issue were not at all complex; they concerned determination of the time-limit within which the applicants had to submit their applications in order to be allowed the benefit of the provisions of the Legislative Decrees. There were delays on the part of the authorities. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case and what was at stake in the proceedings for the applicants, whose conduct was not above reproach, the Court could not regard as reasonable the length of time which elapsed in the present case. It followed that there had been a breach of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary (GRD 500,000 to each of the applicants), costs and expenses (GRD 2,000,000 to all applicants jointly).

Pauger v Austria (1998) 25 EHRR 105 97/26

[Application lodged 14.2.1990; Commission report 27.2.1996; Court Judgment 28.5.1997]

Mr Dietmar Pauger was Professor of Public Law and Political Sciences at the University of Graz. His wife, who was a schoolteacher with the status of a civil servant, died on 23 June 1984. On 24 August 1984 he applied to the Regional Education Council for a survivor's pension. His application was dismissed on the ground that whereas under the Pensions Act 1965 a widow of a civil servant could, in certain circumstances, claim a pension, a widower could not. His appeals to the Styria Regional Government, the Administrative Court and the Constitutional Court were all dismissed. Following the reform of the Pensions Act he reapplied to the Regional Education Council for a survivor's pension. The Council awarded him a reduced pension and he appealed. On 16 March 1988 the Constitutional Court repealed the relevant section of the Pensions Act and quashed the Regional Government's decision. On 11 August 1988 the applicant again applied to the Constitutional Court claiming that the transitional provisions of the Pensions Act under which he was only entitled to a reduced pension until 1 January 1995 were unconstitutional. He did not ask for a hearing. On 3 October 1989, after deliberating in private, the Constitutional Court dismissed his appeal. On 5 June 1990 the applicant applied to the Human Rights Committee of the United Nations relying on the same facts. On 30 March 1993 the Human Rights Committee found that there had been a violation of A 26. The applicant complained of the lack of public hearing in the Constitutional Court.

Comm found by majority (17–11) NV 6(1).

Court found unanimously NV 6(1), not necessary to examine of its own motion 27(1)(b).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher (c), Mr R Macdonald, Mr J De Meyer, Mrs E Palm, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk.

There was a dispute over the scope of the applicant's rights to a pension and even as to their existence. The right to a pension was a civil right. Proceedings came within the scope of A 6(1) even where they were conducted before a constitutional court, if their outcome was decisive for civil rights and obligations. The only means by which the applicant could challenge the administrative authorities' decisions was an application to the Constitutional Court as it alone could rule on the constitutionality of the statutory provisions in issue. If it found that those provisions were unconstitutional, they would be declared void and the applicant's pension rights would be reassessed. The Constitutional Court's judgment was therefore directly decisive for the applicant's civil right. A 6(1) accordingly applied to the proceedings in issue.

Section 19(4) of the Constitutional Court Act, on which the decision not to hold a hearing was based, came into force in 1984, whereas Austria ratified the Convention and made the reservation in question in 1958. Under A 64(1), a reservation could only be made in respect of laws 'then in force' in the State's territory. In 1958, there was no provision like s 19(4), enacted in 1984. The reservation did not preclude the Court reviewing the applicant's complaint as to the lack of a hearing in the Constitutional Court. The public character of court hearings constituted a fundamental principle enshrined in A 6(1), but neither the letter nor the spirit of that provision prevented a person from waiving of his own free will, either expressly or tacitly, the entitlement to have his case heard in public. Any such waiver had to be made in an unequivocal manner and not run counter to any important public interest. In the present case the Regional Education Council and the Regional Government which ruled on the applicant's pension claim were wholly administrative bodies. Given the nature of the complaints raised by the applicant, only the Constitutional Court could rule on the constitutionality of the provisions in issue. The applicant was thus in principle entitled to a public hearing, as none of the exceptions laid down in the second sentence of A 6(1) applied. However, the Constitutional Court did not as a rule hear parties unless one of them expressly asked it to do so. The applicant could consequently have been expected to ask for a hearing if he found it important that one be held: he was a professor of public law and was therefore familiar with Constitutional Court procedure. As the applicant made no such request, he had to be considered to have unequivocally waived his right to a public hearing. It was necessary to determine whether, in spite of the waiver, the dispute in the Constitutional Court ran counter to an important public interest which made it necessary for a hearing to be held. The question of the principle of equality between widows and widowers as regards pension entitlement had already been resolved by the Constitutional Court, after holding a public hearing, in its judgment of 4 October 1984. The applicant's application only related to the constitutionality of the transitional provisions of the 1985 Act, which were unfavourable to widowers. His case did not therefore raise a matter of public interest such as warranted a public hearing. There had accordingly been no violation of A 6(1).

The Government did not raise the issue of compliance with A 27(1)(b) (applicant bringing the same case before the Human Rights Committee of the United Nations) before the Court and it was not necessary for the Court to consider it of its own motion.

Paulsen-Medalen and Svensson v Sweden (1998) 26 EHRR 260 98/5

[Application lodged 7.8.1989; Commission report 4.9.1996; Court Judgment 19.2.1998]

The first applicant, Ms Anne-Marie Paulsen-Medalen, was the mother of two children, P and J. The second applicant, Mr Sven-Erik Svensson, was J's father. On 8 February 1989, in the light of an investigation by the social authorities, the children were taken into care on a provisional basis. The first applicant appealed unsuccessfully against the decision to take the children provisionally into care. The first applicant's access to the children was restricted to once every second week for 2 and a half hours in the children's home. The first applicant's appeals regarding access were unsuccessful. The second applicant's appeal regarding access to his son was also unsuccessful. He did not pursue the matter. The first applicant complained, inter alia, about the length of the access proceedings and the second applicant complained about the lack of a court remedy to have a determination of his right of access to his son.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) with regard to the first applicant, NV 6(1) with respect to the second applicant.

Court found unanimously V 6(1) with respect to the first applicant, NV 6(1) with respect to the second applicant, not necessary to examine the second applicant's complaint under A 8 and 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr P van Dijk.

The period to be taken into consideration started on 19 March 1990, when the first applicant submitted her request to the social authorities concerning access rights, and ended on 28 June 1993, when the Supreme Administrative Court gave its judgment. The only phase of the proceedings that gave rise to misgivings was that between 22 January 1991, when the first applicant applied for leave to appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court, and 28 June 1993, when that court decided to uphold the lower courts' judgments in respect of the restrictions on access. It did not transpire from the evidence that the delay had been due to the applicant's conduct or the complexity of the case. Against that background, the authority concerned could not be said to have acted with the exceptional diligence required by A 6(1). Accordingly, there had been a violation of that provision in respect of the first applicant.

While it was unclear whether a father who did not have custody or did not enjoy access rights pursuant to a court order or agreement could claim a right of access under the domestic legislation, that was not excluded by the wording of the provision. That section applied to 'a parent or other person who has custody of [the child]'. Furthermore, the fact that the maternal grandparents of J, although they fell outside the category of persons referred to in the relevant section of the legislation, were able to obtain a formal decision on access, suggested that such a decision could also have been taken in respect of the applicant father. In response to the second applicant's request for access, the Head of the Social Services had replied on 11 February 1991 that only the first applicant, as the child's mother, was covered by the provisions on access in the 1990 Act. However, as was also pointed out, the second applicant was invited to discuss access arrangements with the relevant social officer, but did not pursue the matter. Nor did he take any initiative to follow up the reply to his query by the social authorities on 6 October 1995, in which they stated that a right of access for a person other than the custody holder did not exist under domestic law. He had furnished no particulars in support of his submission that he specifically requested, and that the relevant authority was unwilling or unable to take, a formal decision on his request for access. In those circumstances, the Court was not persuaded by the second applicant's claim that he, as a parent, could not have obtained a decision of the kind in issue. Moreover, it had not been established that it would have been impossible for him to institute judicial review proceedings before the County Administrative Court in respect of a decision refusing him access. The facts of the case did not disclose a breach of A 6(1) with regard to the second applicant.

Having regard to the findings with respect to A 6(1) it was not necessary to consider the same matter under A 8 and 13.

[Application lodged 19.11.1982; Commission report 4.12.1986; Court Judgment 26.5.1988]

Mr Willy Pauwels was a regular army officer. On 2 April 1982, the Board of Inquiry of Field Court Martial 'A', sitting at Cologne, ordered the applicant's arrest and charged him with embezzlement of State funds. The Board was chaired by Mr G Van Even, a senior deputy auditeur militaire, who had questioned Mr Pauwels on 23 and 24 March. The applicant lodged an application for his immediate release but on 8 April the Board of Inquiry, again chaired by Mr Van Even, confirmed the order. On 23 April, the Board of Inquiry, again chaired by Mr Van Even, confirmed the arrest order for the second time. The applicant's further appeals to the Courts-Martial Appeal Court and Court of Cassation were unsuccessful. Following trial, at which evidence was heard from Mr Van Even, the applicant was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment. His appeal to the Courts-Martial Appeal Court was partially successful and his sentence was reduced. His appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed. He complained, inter alia, of the role of the Board of Inquiry, the auditeur militaire and deputy auditeur militaire in his case.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos.

Although an auditeur militaire in Belgium was hierarchically subordinate to the auditeur général and the Minister of Justice, he was completely independent in the performance of the duties devolving upon him both as a member of the public prosecutor's office and as chairman of the Board of Inquiry. The only issue arising was whether in the instant case Mr Van Even, in his capacity as chairman of the Board of Inquiry, afforded the guarantees of impartiality inherent in the concept of 'officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power' when he could be – and in fact was – called upon to act in the same case, in respect of the same defendant, as prosecuting authority and thus as a party. In two cases concerning Dutch legislation on military arrest and detention, the Court found that an auditeur-militaire was also liable to have to act in one and the same case as prosecuting authority after the case had been sent for trial by a court martial; it concluded from that fact that he could not be independent of the parties at that preliminary stage precisely because he was likely to become one of the parties at the next stage of the procedure. The same conclusion is inevitable in the instant case. Mr Van Even combined the functions of investigation and prosecution. That being so, his impartiality was capable of appearing to be open to doubt. There was therefore a breach of A 5(3).

No causal link between alleged non-pecuniary damage and violation found.

Pélissier and Sassi v France 99/16

[Application lodged 18.7.1994; Commission report 13.1.1998; Court Judgment 25.3.1999]

Mr François Pélissier and Mr Philippe Sassi were committed to stand trial in the Toulon Criminal Court on charges of criminal bankruptcy. The court acquitted them in 1991, finding that they had not acted as de jure or de facto managers. On 26 November 1992 the Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal held that the applicants were guilty, not of the offences charged, but of the separate offence of aiding and abetting criminal bankruptcy through the concealment of assets. The court sentenced them to a suspended term of imprisonment and imposed a fine. The applicants' appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed on 14 February 1994. The applicants complained that the Court of Appeal had convicted them of aiding and abetting criminal bankruptcy, which was not the offence charged, without hearing arguments from the parties on the issue. They also complained of the length of the proceedings. The first applicant also complained that a certificate relied by the Court of Appeal should not have been admitted in evidence.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) and 6(3)(a) and (b).

Court found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(a)(b) as regards fairness of proceedings, V 6(1) as regards length of proceedings.

The Convention did not lay down rules on evidence as such. It could not therefore exclude as a matter of principle and in the abstract evidence obtained in breach of provisions of domestic law. It was for the national courts to assess the evidence they had obtained and the relevance of any evidence that a party wished to have produced. The Court had nevertheless to ascertain whether the proceedings considered as a whole, including the way in which the evidence was taken, were fair as required by A 6(1). In the instant case, the Court found that the document in issue and the Court of Appeal's reliance on it were not decisive in the conviction or sentence of the first applicant. The fact that the document was admitted in evidence did not impair the fairness of the proceedings, and consequently, the use by the Court of Appeal of the document did not result in a violation of A 6(1). The provisions of A 6(3)(a) pointed to the need for special attention to be paid to the notification of the 'accusation' to the defendant. Particulars of the offence play a crucial role in the criminal process, in that it was from the moment of their service that the suspect was formally put on written notice of the factual and legal basis of the charges against him. A 6(3)(a) afforded the defendant the right to be informed not only of the 'cause' of the accusation (ie, the acts he is alleged to have committed and on which the accusation was based) but also the legal characterisation given to those acts. That information should be detailed. The scope of the above provision had, in particular, to be assessed in the light of the more general right to a fair hearing guaranteed by A 6(1). In criminal matters the provision of full, detailed information concerning the charges against a defendant, and consequently the legal characterisation that the court might adopt in the matter, was an essential prerequisite for ensuring that the proceedings are fair, although A 6(3)(a) did not impose any special formal requirement as to the manner in which the accused was to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him. Regarding the complaint under A 6(3)(b), sub-paras (a) and (b) were connected and that the right to be informed of the nature and the cause of the accusation had to be considered in the light of the accused's right to prepare his defence. It had not been established that the applicants were aware that the Court of Appeal might return an alternative verdict of 'aiding and abetting' criminal bankruptcy. Aiding and abetting did not constitute an element intrinsic to the initial accusation known to the applicants from the beginning of the proceedings. In using the right which it had to re-characterise facts over which it had jurisdiction, the Court of Appeal should have afforded the applicants the possibility of exercising their defence rights on that issue in a practical and effective manner and, in particular, in good time. There was nothing in the instant case capable of explaining why the hearing was not adjourned for further argument or the applicants were not requested to submit written observations while the Court of Appeal was in deliberation. It appeared that the applicants were given no opportunity to prepare their defence to the new charge, as it was only through the Court of Appeal's judgment that they learnt of the re-characterisation of the facts. That was too late. The applicants' right to be informed in detail of the nature and cause of the accusation against them and their right to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of their defence were infringed. Consequently, there was a violation of A 6(3)(a) and (b), taken together with A 6(1).

The period to be taken into consideration in determining whether the proceedings satisfied the reasonable length requirement began when the applicants were charged, and ended with the judgment of the Court of Cassation: nine years and five months in the case of the first applicant and eight years, eight months and two days in the case of the second applicant. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, regard being had to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the applicant's conduct and the conduct of the competent authorities. There was nothing exceptional or complex about the case. Changes to the law in 1985 simplified the offence of criminal bankruptcy, which ought to have made the investigating judge's task that much easier. The case involved only four defendants, connected with companies engaged in the same line of business, and there was no evidence of the use of legal structures sophisticated enough to have impeded the investigators' work to any great extent. Accordingly, the length of the proceedings could not be justified by the complexity of the case. The applicants were not responsible for the delays in the proceedings. Thus there was no justification for the investigation taking more than five years. There were unjustified delays and periods of inactivity during the investigation. As regards the proceedings before the Criminal Court and the Court of Appeal, there was an unjustified delay between 22 March 1991, when the public prosecutor lodged an appeal, and 16 April 1992, when the Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal held its first hearing. The taking of procedural steps as basic and commonplace as serving summonses to appear, in proceedings in which the number of parties could not be said to have been unusually high, could not explain such a lengthy delay. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of the requirements of that provision, including the obligation to decide cases within a reasonable time. The evidence adduced in the present case showed that there were excessive delays, which were attributable to the national authorities. Having regard to all the evidence, the reasonable time requirement had been exceeded, and there was therefore a violation of A 6(1) as regards the length of the proceedings.

Pelladoah v The Netherlands (1995) 19 EHRR 81 94/30,

Mr Satyanund Pelladoah, a Mauritian national, was arrested on 27 December 1985 at Schiphol Airport after customs officials found more than 20 kg of heroin in a suitcase which he was carrying. He was charged with drugs offences. He was tried by the Haarlem Regional Court and, following conviction on 21 August 1986, was sentenced to detention. Both the prosecution and the defence appealed against the Regional Court's judgment to the Amsterdam Court of Appeal. The applicant was expelled from The Netherlands pursuant to the Aliens Act before the appeals were heard. At hearings before the Amsterdam Court of Appeal, witnesses were heard, but the applicant's lawyer was refused leave to present the defence. On 5 February 1988 the Court of Appeal found the applicant guilty and sentenced him to imprisonment. Through his lawyer, the applicant appealed unsuccessfully to the Supreme Court. The applicant complained that he had not had a fair trial in that his counsel had not been heard by the Court of Appeal.

As the requirements of A 6(3) were to be seen as particular aspects of the right to a fair trial guaranteed by A 6(1), the Court would examine the complaints under both provisions taken together. The applicant's complaint was not that the appeal was heard in his absence but rather that the Court of Appeal decided the case without his counsel, whom he had charged to conduct the defence and who attended the trial with the clear intention of doing so, being allowed to defend him. The importance of what was at stake for the applicant was nonetheless a factor to be taken into account. The present case concerned a criminal appeal by way of rehearing, which was the last instance where, under domestic law, the case could be fully examined as to questions of both fact and law. In the interests of a fair and just criminal process, it was of capital importance that the accused should appear at his trial. As a general rule, this was equally true for an appeal by way of rehearing. However, it was also of crucial importance for the fairness of the criminal justice system that the accused be adequately defended, both at first instance and on appeal, the more so if, as was the case under Netherlands law, no objection could be filed against a default judgment given on appeal. The fact that the defendant, in spite of having been properly summoned, did not appear, could not, even in the absence of an excuse, justify depriving him of his right under A 6(3) to be defended by counsel. Regarding the Government's argument that the applicant cannot claim to be a victim of an interference with his rights under the said provisions because his counsel failed to ask the Court's permission, in accordance with the relevant rule of Netherlands criminal procedure, to defend the accused, the Court noted that everyone charged with a criminal offence had the right to be defended by counsel. For that right to be practical and effective, and not merely theoretical, its exercise should not be made dependent on the fulfilment of unduly formalistic conditions: it was for the courts to ensure that a trial was fair and, accordingly, that counsel who attended trial for the apparent purpose of defending the accused in his absence, was given the opportunity to do so. There had been a violation of A 6(1) and (3)(c).

Finding of a violation constituted just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. No claim made for costs and expenses.

Pellegrin v France 99/95

[Application lodged 8.7.1995; Commission report 17.9.1998; Court Judgment 8.12.1999]

Mr Gilles Pellegrin worked as a management and accountancy consultant. In 1989 he was recruited as a technical adviser to the Minister for the Economy, Planning and Trade of Equatorial Guinea. As head of project, he was to be responsible for drawing up the budget of State investment for 1990 and was to participate in the preparation of the three-year plan and the three-year programme of public investment, in liaison with Guinean civil servants and international organisations. Subsequently he contested a decision by the French Minister for Co-operation and Development not to offer him a new contract, lodging an application on 16 May 1990 with the Paris Administrative Court. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings which were still pending in that court.

Comm found by majority (18–14) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (13–4) A 6 not applicable in the present case.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo (c), Mr L Caflisch, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jd), Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach (jd), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jd), Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen (jd), Mr T Pantîru, Mr K Traja (so).

The facts of the present case raised the problem of the applicability of A 6(1) to disputes raised by servants of the State over their conditions of service. The Court, after reviewing its case-law, considered that, as it stood, it contained a margin of uncertainty for Contracting States as to the scope of their obligations under A 6(1) in disputes raised by employees in the public sector over their conditions of service. The criterion relating to the economic nature of a dispute, for its part, left scope for a degree of arbitrariness, since a decision concerning the 'recruitment', 'career' or 'termination of service' of a civil servant nearly always had pecuniary consequences. That being so, it was difficult to draw a distinction between proceedings of 'purely' or 'essentially' economic interest and other kinds of proceedings. The Court therefore wished to put an end to the uncertainty which surrounded application of the guarantees of A 6(1) to disputes between States and their servants. It was important, with a view to applying A 6(1), to establish an autonomous interpretation of the term 'civil service' which would make it possible to afford equal treatment to public servants performing equivalent or similar duties in the Convention States, irrespective of the domestic system of employment and, in particular, whatever the nature of the legal relation between the official and the administrative authority (whether stipulated in a contract or governed by statutory and regulatory conditions of service). In addition, that interpretation had to take into account the disadvantages engendered by the Court's existing case-law. To that end, in order to determine the applicability of A 6(1) to public servants, whether established or employed under contract, the Court considered that it should adopt a functional criterion based on the nature of the employee's duties and responsibilities. In so doing, it had to adopt a restrictive interpretation, in accordance with the object and purpose of the Convention, of the exceptions to the safeguards afforded by A 6(1). The Court therefore ruled that the only disputes excluded from the scope of A 6(1) of the Convention were those which were raised by public servants whose duties typified the specific activities of the public service in so far as the latter was acting as the depositary of public authority responsible for protecting the general interests of the State or other public authorities. A manifest example of such activities was provided by the armed forces and the police. In practice, the Court would ascertain, in each case, whether the applicant's post entailed, in the light of the nature of the duties and responsibilities appertaining to it, direct or indirect participation in the exercise of powers conferred by public law and duties designed to safeguard the general interests of the State or of other public authorities. In so doing, the Court would have regard, for guidance, to the categories of activities and posts listed by the European Commission in its communication of 18 March 1988 and by the Court of Justice of the European Communities. Accordingly, no disputes between administrative authorities and employees who occupied posts involving participation in the exercise of powers conferred by public law would attract the application of A 6(1) since the Court intended to establish a functional criterion. However, disputes concerning pensions would all come within the ambit of A 6(1) because, on retirement, employees break the special bond between themselves and the authorities; they, and a fortiori those entitled through them, then find themselves in a situation exactly comparable to that of employees under private law in that the special relationship of trust and loyalty binding them to the State had ceased to exist and the employee could no longer wield a portion of the State's sovereign power. In the present case, the applicant was employed by the Ministry of Co-operation and Development. As one of the civilian co-operation staff in post in foreign States, he was under specific obligations 'inherent in the public-service nature' of his duties. As evidenced by those obligations, such an activity, which came under the aegis of a government Ministry and partook of the conduct of foreign relations, typified the specific activities of the public service as defined above. The facts of the case showed that the tasks assigned to the applicant gave him considerable responsibilities in the field of the State's public finances, which was, par excellence, a sphere in which States exercised sovereign power. That entailed participating directly in the exercise of powers conferred by public law and the performance of duties designed to safeguard the general interests of the State. Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the present case.

Pentidis and Others v Greece 97/30

[Application lodged 30.12.1993; Commission report 27.2.1996; Court Judgment 9.6.1997]

Mr Zissis Pentidis, Mr Dimitrios Katharios and Mr Anastassios Stagopoulos were all Jehovah's Witnesses. On 28 June 1990 they rented under a private agreement a room in a building to be used for all kinds of meetings, weddings, etc, of Jehovah's Witnesses. Following complaints by residents of the town, the public prosecutor's office instituted criminal proceedings against the applicants for having 'established a place of worship for religious meetings and ceremonies without appropriate authorisation'. On 2 July 1991 the Alexandroupolis Criminal Court sitting at first instance acquitted the applicants. The public prosecutor's office appealed. On 21 May 1992 the Alexandroupolis Criminal Court sitting on appeal and composed of three judges convicted the applicants and sentenced them to imprisonment convertible into a pecuniary penalty the applicant's appeal was dismissed by the Court of Cassation.

[Application lodged 20.6.1995; Commission report 21.10.1997 Court Judgment 28.10.1998]

Mrs María Gloria Pérez de Rada Cavanilles had been in dispute with a neighbour concerning a view over her property at Lumbier in the province of Navarre. On 6 May 1993 the applicant applied to the Aoiz Court of First Instance for enforcement of an agreement that the neighbour block the view from his patio over the applicant's property. On 25 May 1993 the court gave judgment for the applicant which was subsequently overturned by another court. The applicant lodged a reposición application which the Court of First Instance declared inadmissible as being out of time. The applicant's appeal to the Navarre Audiencia Provincial was dismissed on 23 December 1994. She lodged an amparo appeal with the Constitutional Court which was declared inadmissible. She complained that the dismissal of her reposición application as being out of time had deprived her of the possibility of appealing and of thereby defending her legitimate interests in the courts.

According to the Court's case-law, it was the moment when the right asserted actually became effective which constituted determination of a civil right, regardless of the form of the authority to execute. In the instant case, the proceedings to enforce the agreement were decisive for whether the applicant's right actually became effective or not. A 6(1) therefore applied.

It was not the task of the Court to take the place of the domestic courts. It was primarily for the national authorities, notably the courts, to resolve problems of interpretation of domestic legislation. The Court's role was confined to ascertaining whether the effects of such an interpretation are compatible with the Convention. That applied in particular to the interpretation by courts of rules of a procedural nature such as time-limits governing the filing of documents or lodging of appeals. The 'right to a court', of which the right of access was one aspect, was not absolute; it was subject to limitations permitted by implication, in particular where the conditions of admissibility of an appeal were concerned, since by its very nature it called for regulation by the State, which enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in this regard. However, those limitations should not restrict or reduce a person's access in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right was impaired. Those limitations would not be compatible with A 6(1) if they did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved. The rules on time-limits for appeals were undoubtedly designed to ensure the proper administration of justice and compliance with, in particular, the principle of legal certainty. In the present case, although the reposición application had been posted within the three days laid down by law, it was received at the registry of the Aoiz Court of First Instance two days after that period had expired. In view of the usual time taken to deliver mail, however, it seemed unlikely that a letter could reach its destination more quickly. The applicant could not be accused of having acted negligently, in view of the short period of time available to her for submitting her application, for which sufficient grounds had to be given. Under the relevant domestic legislation, the decision in issue could not be regarded as foreseeable in the context of proceedings to enforce an agreement. The applicant also tried to lodge the application, within the time-limit, with the registry of the Madrid duty court; noticing, however, that the application should have been lodged at the Aoiz Court of First Instance, the head of the registry crossed out the stamp with which it had been marked, thereby invalidating it. She also applied unsuccessfully to the Aoiz Court of First Instance to set aside its decision of 13 December 1993 whereby, in declaring the reposición application inadmissible as being out of time, it had barred any appeal to the Navarre Audiencia Provincial. The applicant had been represented by a lawyer. However, her husband, who was also her legal representative, had explicitly and successfully asked the registry of the Aoiz Court of First Instance for the decision in issue to be served at the applicant's home in Madrid as she was not at her home in Lumbier at the time. To require the applicant to travel to Aoiz in order to lodge her application within the prescribed time, when the decision in question had been served on her in Madrid, would in this instance have been unreasonable. In view of the fact that the applicant demonstrated her clear intention of lodging a reposición application against the decision of 7 September 1993 whereby the Aoiz Court of First Instance declared the agreement concluded with her neighbour to be void, and that the dismissal of that application as being out of time prevented her from appealing, in this instance the particularly strict application of a procedural rule by the domestic courts deprived the applicant of the right of access to a court. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Present judgment constituted just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (ESP 1,000,000).

[Applications lodged 26.4.1994, 27.4.1994, 24.6.1994, 27.6.1994, 14.7.1995, 26.7.1995 and 24.8.1995; Commission report 9.9.1998; Court Judgment 12.10.1999]

The applicants, Mr Kevin Perks, Mrs Andrea Rowe (Kennedy), Mr Gordon Mudryj, Mr Robert Massey, Mr Alan Beattie, Mr Leveson Knight, Mr Arthur Tilley and Mr John Crane were imprisoned in the early 1990s for failure to pay the community charge following separate proceedings in various magistrates' courts. At the time, the applicants were dependent on State benefits or living on a low income. Legal aid was not available and the applicants were not legally represented before the magistrates' courts. The applicants were released on bail after applying for judicial review before the High Court. Following judicial review proceedings, each applicant obtained an order quashing the magistrates' imprisonment order in his or her case. The 8 applicants variously alleged breaches of A 5(1) and 5(5) and A 6(1) and (3)(c).

Commission found unanimously NV 5, V 6(1), V6(3)(c).

Court found unanimously not necessary to consider complaints of Mr Beattie under 5(1) and 5(5), by majority (5–2) NV 5(1) in respect of Mr Perks, unanimously NV 5(1) in respect of any of the remaining six applicants unanimously 5(5) not applicable, unanimously V 6(1) and 3(c) in respect of each of all applicants.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens (jpd), Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs H Greve (jpd), Mr K Traja, judges, Sir Rupert Jackson, ad hoc judge.

The Government only sought a ruling on the issue of just satisfaction under A 41 of the Convention in respect of the undisputed breach of A 6(1) and 6(3)(c). The Court held that the scope of the case was not confined to this sole provision. Mr Beattie expressly stated that he did not pursue before the Court his complaint that there had been violations of A 5(1) and 5(5), and the Court saw no reason to deal with the complaints of its own motion. The remaining applicants complained that their detention was unlawful and contrary to A 5(1). The main issue was whether the disputed detention was 'lawful', including whether it complied with 'a procedure prescribed by law'. The Convention essentially refers back to national law and stated the obligation to conform to the substantive and procedural rules thereof, but it required in addition that any deprivation of liberty should be consistent with the purpose of A 5, namely, to protect individuals from arbitrariness. It was in the first place for the national authorities, notably the courts, to interpret and apply domestic law. However, since under A 5(1), failure to comply with domestic law entailed a breach of the Convention, the Court could and should exercise a certain power to review whether the law had been complied with. A period of detention would in principle be lawful if it was carried out pursuant to a court order. A subsequent finding that the court erred under domestic law in making the order would not necessarily retrospectively affect the validity of the intervening period of detention. In the present case the Court had to examine whether it could be said, with a degree of certainty, that the applicant's detention was unlawful under domestic law. As regards Mr Perks, the Court was not convinced that the relevant domestic case-law should be read as clearly providing for a fresh inquiry as a condition precedent to the magistrates' jurisdiction to issue a warrant which had previously been postponed. In these circumstances the Court did not find it established that the magistrates' decision to issue a warrant against Mr Perks suffered from a defect other than unreasonableness within the meaning of the 'Wednesbury' doctrine. In the cases of Mrs Rowe, Mr Mudryi, Mr Massey, Mr Knight, Mr Tilley and Mr Crane, the magistrates failed to consider alternatives to imprisonment as a means to extract payment and that their decisions were quashed on that ground. The contested issue was whether that defect was of such a nature as to render them invalid for being in excess of jurisdiction. The Court attached importance to the reasoning of the High Court judgments in these applicants' cases: the High Court apparently left open the possibility that the imprisonment orders were within the magistrates' jurisdiction, their defect being only a fettered exercise of discretion, and that the use of the word 'unlawful' in some of the judgments could not be regarded as a finding of a failure to observe a condition precedent. It could not be excluded that these orders were 'flawed' or 'unlawful' in the sense of being an unreasonable exercise of discretion within the Wednesbury doctrine, but nevertheless fell within the jurisdiction of the courts by which they were made. The Court found that it could not be said, in respect of any of the seven applications, that the judgments of the national courts quashing the magistrates' imprisonment orders were to the effect that the magistrates had acted in excess of jurisdiction within the meaning of English law. The Court did not find that the imprisonment orders were invalid or that the detention which resulted from it was unlawful under national law. The applicants also contended that, by not considering alternatives to imprisonment, the magistrates' detention orders were not permissible under A 5(1)(b). The Court held that purpose of the detention orders was to secure the fulfilment of the applicants' obligations to pay the community charge owed by them and were compatible with the objectives of A 5(1)(b). The Court did not find that the nature of the applicants' imprisonment was altered to such an extent as to question the applicability of A 5(1)(b). In none of the cases of the seven applicants did the magistrates' orders amount to arbitrariness. There was no violation of A 5(1). The applicants Perks, Rowe, Mudryi, Massey, Knight, Tilley and Crane also alleged that, since the entry into force of s 108 of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, UK law was in structural breach of A 5(5) in that it did not ensure compensation for unlawful detention without establishing bad faith on the part of the authorities. The Court observed that A 5(5) guaranteed an enforceable right to compensation only to those who have been the victims of arrest or detention in contravention of the provisions of A 5. In view of its finding that there was no violation of A 5(1) in this case, A 5(5) was not applicable. It was common ground among the parties that there had been a violation of A 6(1) and 6(3)(c) in each of the applicants' cases in that they were not legally represented and had no right to legal aid in the proceedings before the magistrates' courts which led to their imprisonment. It was undisputed that the applicants lacked sufficient means to pay for legal representation and that free assistance by way of legal representation before the magistrates' court was not available at the relevant time. Having regard to the severity of the penalty risked by the applicants and the complexity of the applicable law, the interests of justice demanded that, in order to receive a fair hearing, the applicants ought to have benefited from free legal representation before the magistrates. Since this was not the case in any of the eight applications, the Court found that there was a violation of A 6(1) and 6(3)(c) in each of them.

By majority (5–2) finding of violation constituted just satisfaction in respect of Mrs Rowe, Mr Mudryj, Mr Massey, Mr Beattie, Mr Knight, Mr Tilley and Mr Crane, unanimously non-pecuniary damage (GBP 5,500 to Mr Perks), costs and expenses (GBP 28,000 less FF 23,958).

Mr Ioan Petra was serving a 15 year sentence for murder imposed on 30 April 1991 by the County Court. He complained that he had not had a fair trial in the County Court and that he had encountered difficulties in sending letters from prison and that there had been interference with his correspondence.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Sir John Freeland, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr M Voicu, Mr V Toumanov

In his application bringing the case before the Court, the applicant had complained of hindrance of his correspondence with the Commission, his family and the national authorities. The Court had jurisdiction ratione materiae within the compass of the Commission's decision on the admissibility of an application. The Commission had expressed the opinion that there had been a violation of A 8 on account of the opening and delaying of correspondence between the applicant and it. The case file did not contain any letters sent by the applicant to his family or to his country's authorities that had been intercepted and monitored by prison authorities. In view of the lack of evidence in support of those allegations, the Court did not consider that it had to entertain them.

There was interference by a public authority with the exercise of the applicant's right to respect for his correspondence. Such an interference would contravene A 8 unless it was in accordance with the law, pursued one or more of the legitimate aims referred to in A 8(2) and was necessary in a democratic society in order to achieve them. While a law which conferred a discretion had to indicate the scope of that discretion, it was impossible to attain absolute certainty in the framing of the law, and the likely outcome of any search for certainty would be excessive rigidity. In the instant case the domestic provisions applicable to the monitoring of prisoners' correspondence and its implementing regulations left the national authorities too much latitude. Monitoring of correspondence appeared to be automatic, independent of any decision by a judicial authority and unappealable. The implementing regulations had not been published, so that the applicant was unable to acquaint himself with them. The Government did not dispute the Commission's conclusion that the implementing regulations did not satisfy the requirement of accessibility entailed by A 8(2) and that Romanian law did not indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of exercise of the discretion conferred on the public authorities. Therefore, the applicant did not enjoy the minimum degree of protection to which citizens were entitled under the rule of law in a democratic society and the interference complained of was not therefore in accordance with the law. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 8. Having regard to that conclusion, it was not necessary in the instant case to ascertain whether the other requirements of A 8(2) were complied with.

It was of the utmost importance for the effective operation of the system of individual petition under A 25 that applicants or potential applicants should be able to communicate freely with the Commission without being subjected to any form of pressure from the authorities to withdraw or modify their complaints. The expression 'any form of pressure' had to be taken to cover not only direct coercion and flagrant acts of intimidation of applicants or potential applicants or their families or legal representatives but also other improper indirect acts or contacts designed to dissuade or discourage them from pursuing a Convention remedy. Whether or not contacts between the authorities and an applicant or potential applicant were tantamount to unacceptable practices from the standpoint of A 25 had to be determined in the light of the particular circumstances at issue. In this respect, regard had to be had to the vulnerability of the complainant and his or her susceptibility to influence exerted by the authorities. The applicant's complaints that he had twice been threatened by the Aiud prison authorities when he had asked to write to the Commission were not contradicted by the respondent Government. Such remarks as 'The Council of Europe is at Aiud and nowhere else' and 'I'll give you Council of Europe!', amounted in this instance to a form of illegitimate and unacceptable pressure which hindered the right of individual petition, contrary to A 25(1).

Non-pecuniary damage (FF 10,000). No claim for costs and expenses.

Petrovic v Austria 98/18

[Application lodged 3.8.1992; Commission report 15.10.1996; Court Judgment 27.3.1998]

Mr Antun Petrovic was a student and worked part time. His wife, who had already finished her university studies and was a civil servant in a federal ministry, gave birth on 27 February 1989. She carried on working while the applicant took parental leave to look after the child. On 25 April 1989 Mr Petrovic claimed a parental leave allowance. His claim was turned down by the local employment office on the ground that only mothers could claim such an allowance when a child was born. His appeal against that decision to the Vienna Regional Employment Office was dismissed, as was his further appeal to the Constitutional Court. He complained of the refusal to grant him a parental leave allowance and of the discriminatory nature of that decision.

Comm found by majority (25–5) V 14+8.

Court found by majority (7–2) NV 14+8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt (jd), President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr B Walsh, Mr A Spielmann (jd), Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr B Repik, Mr J Casadevall.

A 14 complemented the other substantive provisions of the Convention and its Protocols. It had no independent existence, since it had effect solely in relation to 'the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms' safeguarded by those provisions. Although the application of A 14 did not presuppose a breach of those provisions, and to that extent it was autonomous, there could be no room for its application unless the facts at issue fell within the ambit of one or more of the latter. The Court therefore had to determine whether the facts of the present case came within the scope of A 8 and, consequently, of A 14. The refusal to grant the applicant a parental leave allowance could not amount to a failure to respect family life, since A 8 did not impose any positive obligation on States to provide the financial assistance in question. Nonetheless, the allowance paid by the State was intended to promote family life and necessarily affected the way in which the latter was organised. A 14 came into play whenever the subject-matter of the disadvantage constituted one of the modalities of the exercise of a right guaranteed, or the measures complained of were linked to the exercise of a right guaranteed. By granting parental leave allowance, States were able to demonstrate their respect for family life within the meaning of A 8; the allowance therefore came within the scope of that provision. It followed that A 14, taken together with A 8, was applicable.

A difference in treatment was discriminatory for the purposes of A14 if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. The payment of parental leave allowance only to mothers, not fathers, once a period of eight weeks had elapsed after the birth and the right to a maternity allowance had been exhausted, amounted to a difference in treatment on grounds of sex. While aware of the differences which may exist between mother and father in their relationship with the child, the Court started from the premise that so far as taking care of the child during that early period was concerned, both parents are similarly placed. Contracting States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment in law. The scope of the margin of appreciation varied according to the circumstances, the subject matter and its background; in this respect, one of the relevant factors could be the existence or non-existence of common ground between the laws of the Contracting States. At the material time, that is, at the end of the 1980s, there was no common standard in this field, as the majority of the Contracting States did not provide for parental leave allowances to be paid to fathers. It therefore appeared difficult to criticise the Austrian legislature for having introduced in a gradual manner, reflecting the evolution of society in that sphere, legislation which was, all things considered, very progressive in Europe. There still remained a very great disparity between the legal systems of the Contracting States in this field. While measures to give fathers an entitlement to parental leave had now been taken by a large number of States, the same was not true of the parental leave allowance, which only a very few States granted to fathers. The Austrian authorities' refusal to grant the applicant a parental leave allowance had not, therefore, exceeded the margin of appreciation allowed to them. Consequently, the difference in treatment complained of was not discriminatory within the meaning of A 14.

Pfarrmeier v Austria (1996) 22 EHRR 175 95/39

[Application lodged 13.6.1990; Commission report 19.5.1994; Court Judgment 23.10.1995]

On 5 April 1986 Mr Harald Pfarrmeier was stopped by the police after he had parked his car at the side of the road with its headlights on and the engine running. He refused to submit to a breath test. In a 'sentence order' of the same day the Bregenz district authority imposed on him a fine with imprisonment in default of payment, for an offence under the Road Traffic Act. The applicant's appeal to the Vorarlberg regional government was dismissed on 11 November 1987. He applied to the Administrative Court, which quashed the decision of the regional government and referred the case back to it. The Vorarlberg regional government, giving a second ruling on 23 December 1988, upheld the Bregenz district authority's decision on the issue of guilt, but reduced the sentence. On 10 February 1989 the applicant applied to the Constitutional Court which, on 10 March 1989, declined to accept the appeal for adjudication. A further appeal to the Administrative Court was dismissed. The applicant complained that he had not had access to a court with full jurisdiction and had not been able to examine witnesses.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) as regards access to a court, no separate issue regarding failure to hold a hearing or impossibility of examining witnesses.

Court found unanimously 6 applicable, V 6(1) as regards access to a court, not necessary to examine the complaints regarding the lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court and that court's failure to take evidence from witnesses.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr SK Martens (so), Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk.

In order to determine whether an offence qualified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention, it was first necessary to ascertain whether or not the provision defining the offence belonged, in the legal system of the respondent State, to criminal law; next, the 'very nature of the offence' and the degree of severity of the penalty risked had to be considered. Although the offences in issue and the procedures followed in the case fell within the administrative sphere, they were nevertheless criminal in nature. That was reflected in the terminology employed. In addition, the fine imposed on the applicant was accompanied by an order for his committal to prison in the event of his defaulting on payment. Those considerations were sufficient to establish that the offence of which the applicant was accused could be classified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that A 6 applied.

The applicant based his complaints on A 6, whereas the wording of the Austrian reservation mentioned only A 5 and made express reference solely to measures for the deprivation of liberty. Moreover, the reservation only came into play where both substantive and procedural provisions of one or more of the four specific laws indicated in it had been applied. Here, however, the substantive provisions of a different Act, the Road Traffic Act 1960, were applied. The reservation in question did not therefore apply in the instant case.

Decisions taken by administrative authorities which did not themselves satisfy the requirements of A 6(1) had to be subject to subsequent control by a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. The Constitutional Court was not such a body. In the present case it could look at the impugned proceedings only from the point of view of their conformity with the Constitution, and that did not enable it to examine all the relevant facts. It accordingly lacked the powers required under A 6(1). The powers of the Administrative Court had to be assessed in the light of the fact that the court in this case was sitting in proceedings that were of a criminal nature for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that when the compatibility of those powers with A 6(1) was being gauged, regard had to be had to the complaints raised in that court by the applicant as well as to the defining characteristics of a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. Those included the power to quash in all respects, on questions of fact and law, the decision of the body below. As the Administrative Court lacked that power, it could not be regarded as a tribunal within the meaning of the Convention. It followed that the applicant did not have access to a tribunal. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6 on that point. Having regard to the conclusion above, it was not necessary to examine the complaints regarding the lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court and that court's failure to take evidence from witnesses.

Judgment afforded sufficient reparation for damages.

Pfeifer and Plankl v Austria (1992) 14 EHRR 692 92/2

[Application lodged 23.9.1983; Commission report 11.10.1990; Court Judgment 25.2.1992]

Mr Heinrich Pfeifer and Mrs Margit Plankl were detained on remand in 1982 in connection with separate criminal proceedings brought against them before the Klagenfurt Regional Court. Two of the investigating judges later presided over the first applicant's trial. In the absence of his lawyer he waived his right to have the judges disqualified. He was convicted and sentenced. The Supreme Court dismissed his challenge and confirmed his sentence. The first applicant complained that his case had not been examined by an independent and impartial tribunal. Both applicants claimed that the censorship of a letter from Mrs Plankl to Mr Pfeifer constituted an unjustified interference with their right to respect for their correspondence under A 8.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) and by majority (10–1) V 8.

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously V 6(1), no need to examine 8 in the case of Mr Pfeifer, V 8 with respect to both applicants.

Judges: Mr J Cremona, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Bernhardt (so), Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou.

Preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was joined to the merits and rejected. The waiver of a right guaranteed by the Convention had to be established in an unequivocal manner and a waiver of procedural rights required minimum guarantees commensurate to its importance. In the present case the judge on his own initiative had approached the applicant in the absence of his lawyer, the lawyer having appeared in earlier proceedings, put a question of law which a layman could not have completely appreciated. The fact that the applicant did not think it necessary for his lawyer to be present made no difference. The circumstances surrounding the applicant's decision deprived it of validity from the point of view of the Convention and so there had been a violation of A 6(1).

There had been an interference with the exercise of the applicants' right to respect for their correspondence. The disputed measure was based on the Code of Criminal Procedure. The censorship was aimed at ensuring the protection of the rights of others and the prevention of crime. Some measure of control over prisoners' correspondence was not incompatible with the Convention but the resulting interference must not exceed what was required by the legitimate aim pursued. In this case the disputed passage was said to contain 'jokes of an insulting nature against prison officers'. The Court noted its decision in Silver v UK; although the deletion of the passages in this case was a less serious interference, in the circumstances of the case it was disproportionate and there had therefore been a violation of A8 with respect to both applicants.

Pham Hoang v France (1993) 16 EHRR 53 92/16

[Application lodged 20.8.1987; Commission report 26.2.1991; Court Judgment 25.9.1992]

On 3 January 1984 Mr Tuan Tran Pham Hoang was arrested in Paris with four other people from Hong Kong, Cambodia or Vietnam. He was charged with an offence under the drugs legislation and committed for trial. On 31 May 1985 the Paris tribunal de grande instance acquitted him of all the charges for lack of sufficient evidence. The Director-General of Customs appealed against the decision to acquit the applicant. On 10 March 1986 the Paris Court of Appeal found the applicant guilty and sentenced him to a financial penalty. The applicant's appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed on 9 March 1987. He complained that he had been convicted on the basis of statutory presumptions of guilt which were contrary to A 6(1) and 6(2) because they were incompatible with the rights of the defence and with the presumption of innocence. He also complained that he had not been assisted by a lawyer during the hearing of his appeal on points of law.

Comm found by majority (7–5) NV 6(1), 6(2), unanimously V 6(3)(c).

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objection, found NV 6(1), 6(2), V 6(3)(c).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Sir John Freeland.

The Government's preliminary objection dismissed as, in the circumstances of the case, the refusal of an official assignment of counsel rendered the remedy in question ineffective.

A 6 required Contracting States to confine presumptions of fact or of law provided for in their criminal law within reasonable limits which took into account the importance of what was at stake and maintained the rights of the defence. The applicant was not, in fact, deprived of all means of defending himself, he could rely on other parts of the legislation. The presumption of his responsibility was not an irrebuttable one. The Court of Appeal weighed the evidence before it, assessed it carefully and based its finding of guilt on it. It refrained from any automatic reliance on the presumptions created in the relevant provisions of the Customs Code and did not apply them in a manner incompatible with A 6(1) and 6(2).

The right of a person charged with a criminal offence to free legal assistance was one element, amongst others, of the concept of a fair trial in criminal proceedings. A 6(3)(c) attached two conditions to that right. The first, lack of 'sufficient means to pay for legal assistance', was not in dispute in the present case. On the other hand, it is necessary to determine whether the 'interests of justice' required that the applicant be granted such assistance. The proceedings were fraught with consequences for the applicant, who had been acquitted at first instance but found guilty on appeal of unlawfully importing prohibited goods and sentenced to pay large sums to the customs authorities. In addition he intended to challenge in the Court of Cassation the compatibility of the Customs Code with A 6(1) and 6(2) of the Convention. He did not have the legal training essential to enable him to present and develop the appropriate arguments on such complex issues himself. Only an experienced counsel could have undertaken that. The interests of justice accordingly required a lawyer to be officially assigned to the case. Since he was unable to secure this, the applicant was the victim of a breach of A 6(3)(c).

Finding of a breach constituted just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (FF 30,000).

[Applications lodged 5.1.1987, 6.4.1988 and 24.6.1988; Commission report 8.3.1990; Court Judgment 27.8.1991]

Mr Nicolaos Philis was a consultant engineer. Following a disagreement as to the amount of fees owed to him for a number of projects which he had designed, three disputes arose between him and those who had commissioned the work, two public corporations and a private individual. Proceedings for the recovery of fees were instituted by the Technical Chamber of Greece (TEE). The applicant argued that he was deprived of his right of access to a court by a Royal Decree, according to the terms of which only the TEE was empowered to bring an action for the recovery of fees. That meant that he was dependent on the intervention of a third party, he was able to participate in person in the proceedings only for the purpose of supporting the TEE's arguments and did not therefore have effective control of them.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) with regard to right of access to a court, by majority (11–2) V 6(1) with regard to hearing within a reasonable time, unanimously no separate issue under 13.

Court found by majority (8–1) V 6(1) with regard to right of access to a court, unanimously not necessary to determine 6(1) regarding reasonable time, not necessary to examine 13 or 14+6.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel.

The Court could take cognisance of every question of law arising in the course of the proceedings and concerning the facts submitted to its examination by a Contracting State or by the Commission. Being master of the characterisation to be given in law to these facts, the Court was empowered to examine them if it deemed it necessary and if need be of its own motion, in the light of the Convention as a whole. Having regard to all the evidence before it, the Court considered that it could also examine the complaint based on A 14 because it related to the same facts as the complaints under A 6 and 13. On the other hand, the Court considered that the other articles relied on (8, 17, P1A1) should not be taken into account.

A 6(1) secured to everyone the right to have any claim relating to his civil rights and obligations brought before a court or tribunal; in this way the article embodied the right to a court, of which the right of access, that is, the right to institute proceedings before courts in civil matters, constituted one aspect. The right of access was not absolute but could be subject to limitations since the right by its very nature called for regulation by the State. Nonetheless, the limitations applied should not restrict or reduce the access left to the individual in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right was impaired. Since the applicant was not able to institute proceedings, directly and independently, to seek the payment from his clients, even to the TEE in the first instance, of fees which were owed to him, the very essence of his right to a court was impaired, and this could not be redressed by any remedy available under Greek law. There had therefore been on this point a violation of A 6(1).

In the light of the findings above, the Court did not consider it necessary to examine this complaint of length of proceedings.

Having regard to its decision concerning A 6, it was not necessary to examine the case under A 13 as its requirements were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6.

Regarding A 14, in view of the finding under A 6, no useful purpose would be served in determining whether the applicant had, in addition, suffered discrimination as compared with other persons who were subject to lesser limitations on the same right.

Philis v Greece (No 2) (1998) 25 EHRR 417 97/33

[Application lodged 15.1.1992; Commission report 16.1.1996; Court Judgment 27.6.1997]

Mr Nicolas Philis was working as an engineer. Following an investigation, he was charged with insulting the judiciary. On 9 October 1986 he appeared before the investigating judge. On 12 October 1988 the Athens Criminal Court convicted him and sentenced him to imprisonment, a penalty which was converted into a fine. The applicant appealed and on 25 October 1991 the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and quashed the conviction. The Court of Appeal's judgment became final on 29 November 1991. Following complaints against the applicant the Greek Chamber of Technology (TEE) initiated disciplinary proceedings against the applicant for improper conduct. On 14 November 1983 the charges were drawn and a rapporteur appointed. On 20 November 1984 the disciplinary board suspended the applicant from practising his profession for 10 months. He appealed, and on 10 March 1993 the Supreme Disciplinary Council allowed the appeal and completely exonerated the applicant. The applicant complained of the length of the criminal and disciplinary proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) as regards both the criminal and disciplinary proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1) as regards both the length of the criminal proceedings and the length of the disciplinary proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr B Walsh, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr P Jambrek, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr E Levits, Mr J Casadevall.

The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. It was necessary among other things to take account of the importance of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation. As the Court had been unable to ascertain when notice of the investigation was first served on the applicant or when he was first affected by it, the period to be taken into consideration began on 9 October 1986, when the applicant first appeared before the investigating judge; it ended on 29 November 1991, when the Court of Appeal's decision quashing his conviction became final. Consequently, the period to be taken into consideration under this head lasted more than five years. The case was not particularly complex and the applicant was not in any way responsible for the length of the proceedings. The applicant was convicted at first instance and there was a period of inactivity of approximately three years between the date of his appeal and the date on which his conviction was quashed. Such a period may be considered reasonable only in exceptional circumstances which the respondent State had to account for. The Government pleaded the excessive caseload of the Court of Appeal and organisational difficulties. However, as the Court had repeatedly held, A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements, including the obligation to hear cases within a reasonable time. Accordingly, and taking into account what was at stake for the applicant in the proceedings, the Court could not regard the period of time that elapsed in the instant case as reasonable.

Disciplinary proceedings in which, as in the present case, the right to continue to practise a profession was at stake gave rise to disputes over civil rights within the meaning of A 6(1). The procedural guarantees of A 6(1) applied to all litigants, not just those who had not won their case in the national courts. The period to be taken into consideration began at the latest on 14 November 1983, when the disciplinary charges against the applicant were drawn. The Court acquired jurisdiction ratione temporis when Greece's recognition of the right of individual petition took effect on 20 November 1985. However, in order to assess the reasonableness of the length of time which elapsed after that date, regard had to be had to the state of the case at the time. The proceedings ended on 10 March 1993, when the Supreme Disciplinary Council completely exonerated the applicant. The disciplinary proceedings had lasted more than nine years, seven of which were within the jurisdiction ratione temporis of the Convention institutions. There was a long period of inactivity between the lodging of the applicant's appeal with the Supreme Disciplinary Council in June 1985 and the hearing in March 1993. The case was not complex. The Supreme Disciplinary Council never expressly ordered a deferment pending the outcome of other cases. The duty to administer justice expeditiously was incumbent in the first place on the relevant authorities, especially in proceedings in which they had the power of initiative and the power to ensure that progress was made. A period of more than seven years to consider a case acknowledged to be simple failed to satisfy the 'reasonable time' requirement in the Convention. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1) in this respect too.

As the other complaints raised by the applicant were declared inadmissible by the Commission, the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain them.

Phocas v France 96/16

[Application lodged 19.11.1990; Commission report 4.7.1994; Court Judgment 23.4.1996]

Mr Léopold Phocas owned and ran commercial premises at a spot where one road crossed another. In a decision of 20 May 1960, the Minister of Public Works and Transport adopted a scheme for improving the crossroads in question. The applicant complained of the restrictions imposed on his right of property on account of the scheme for improving the crossroads where his property was situated and of the duration of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V P1A1, not necessary to consider 6(1).

Court found by majority (7–2) NV P1A1, dismissed unanimously the Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously NV 6(1) in respect of application for judicial review lodged on 15 November 1976, by majority (7–2) NV 6(1) in respect of application for judicial review lodged on 9 February 1979, by majority (5–4) NV 6(1) in respect of compensation proceedings of 8 January 1982.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo (jd), Mrs E Palm (jd), Mr I Foighel (jd), Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi (jd), Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris.

The measures relating to the applicant's property amounted to an interference with his right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. From 31 July 1965 (when the Prefect of Hérault decided to adjourn the application lodged by the applicant on 1 March 1965) to 22 January 1982 (the date of the judgment in which the Expropriations Division of the Court of Appeal of Hérault finally determined the expropriation compensation), there was an interference with the right secured to the applicant by P1A1. The interference in issue was designed to enable an urban development scheme to be carried out. Contracting States enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation in order to implement their town-planning policy. The interference answered the needs of the general interest. The applicant's rights as an owner had for the most part been preserved; he could make use of his building – and, in particular, continue to use it for business purposes – or let it as it was. Furthermore, if it had proved difficult to sell the building because of the restriction affecting it, the possibility of having it purchased by the authorities had been open to him. In sum, the balance between the community's interests and those of the applicant had not been upset. There were various interferences with the applicant's full enjoyment of his property as a result of different kinds of proceedings. The threat of expropriation and the restrictions on building were undoubtedly an obstacle to continuing to run his business on the premises and made it doubtful that he could sell or let to a trader. Nor was the applicant able to convert his building as he wished, since three of his applications for planning permission were adjourned and one refused. Such a situation was in principle incompatible with the fair balance required by P1A1. However, the procedures provided in domestic law afforded a remedy sufficient to ensure protection of the right to the peaceful enjoyment of possessions. In short, there had not been a breach of P1A1.

The applicant raised the slowness of the proceedings in the national courts and thus, in substance, relied on A 6(1). Therefore the preliminary objection based on the A 6(1) application being out of time was dismissed.

The applicant provided no particulars in support of his complaint. He initiated various distinct sets of proceedings, which had to be assessed separately. The proceedings in connection with the application for judicial review made to the Montpellier Administrative Court on 2 December 1967 did not fall under the Court's scrutiny as they were terminated on 16 October 1972, that is to say before 3 May 1974, when France ratified the Convention. The same was true of the second set of proceedings to obtain compensation. The length of the preliminary, amicable stage of the proceedings to abandon property was mainly attributable to the conduct of the applicant. The proceedings before the expropriations judge and the Expropriations Division, on the other hand, took place speedily. Regarding the proceedings brought in the Montpellier Administrative Court on 15 November 1976 and 9 February 1979 and those relating to the applicant's first application for compensation, the reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities and the importance of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation. The first of the three sets of proceedings lasted about two years and two months. The second set of proceedings lasted a little over four years and three months. The third set of proceedings lasted eight years and nearly five months. Those proceedings were to some degree complex. The main delay was to be ascribed to the applicant. There had been no breach of A 6(1).

Pierazzini v Italy 92/32

[Application lodged 3.9.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mrs Paola Pierazzini was a housewife. On 27 December 1983 she took out a writ against 4 defendants before the Tempio Pausania District Court, asking for a settlement in respect of holdings in two companies which she claimed to have inherited following the death of her father, a joint owner of the said companies. She complained of the length of the civil proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr A N Loizou, Mr J M Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 27 December 1983, when the proceedings were instituted against the defendants in the Tempio Pausania District Court. It had not yet ended as that court had still to give judgment. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The respondent State was not in principle answerable for certain adjournments which were requested by the applicant and not ordered by the judicial authorities of their own motion. However, there were two periods of stagnation for which the State was entirely responsible totalling more than three years and nine months. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. In addition, the expert did not submit his report until 15 November 1990, a good ten months after the expiry of the prescribed time-limit. He was acting in the context of judicial proceedings supervised by the judge; the latter remained responsible for the preparation of the case and the speedy conduct of the trial. A lapse of time already amounting to more than eight years could not be regarded as reasonable.

Piermont v France (1995) 20 EHRR 301 95/12

[Applications lodged 6.11.1989 and 8.11.1989; Commission report 20.1.1994; Court Judgment 27.4.1995]

Mrs Dorothée Piermont, a German citizen, member of the European Parliament was an environmentalist and a pacifist. At the invitation of Mr Oscar Temaru, the President of the French Polynesian Liberation Front, she was on Polynesian territory from 24 February to 3 March 1986, during the election campaign. On 28 February 1986 she took part in a public meeting and on 1 March joined in the traditional march organised by the independence and anti-nuclear movements. She denounced the continuation of nuclear testing and the French presence in the Pacific. On 2 March 1986, the High Commissioner made an order expelling the applicant and prohibiting her from re-entering the territory. The order was served on the applicant on 3 March 1986 when she was already on board the aircraft that was to take her to New Caledonia. After leaving Polynesia on 3 March Mrs Piermont travelled to New Caledonia at the invitation of local elected representatives, including the President of the Socialist Kanak National Liberation Front. On 4 March, at 1.55 pm, she arrived at Nouméa Airport. After she had gone with the other passengers through immigration control, a police officer stopped her and took her into an airport office, where she was held until her departure. The High Commissioner issued an order excluding Mrs Piermont from the territory of New Caledonia. A police superintendent served this order on her whilst she was still within the airport perimeter, at about 6.30 pm. At about midnight the applicant was put on an aircraft bound for Tokyo. The applicant complained that the administrative measures taken against her in French Polynesia and New Caledonia failed to respect her right to liberty of movement on French territory, hindered her freedom of expression and discriminated against her on the ground of national origin.

Comm found with regard to the expulsion and exclusion from French Polynesia unanimously NV P4A2, by majority (8–6) V 10, with regard to the exclusion from New Caledonia by majority (13–1) NV P4A2, by majority (12–2) NV 10, unanimously NV 14+10.

Court found unanimously NV P4A2 as regards the measure taken in French Polynesia or New Caledonia, by majority (5–4) V 10 as regards the measure taken in French Polynesia and in New Caledonia, unanimously not necessary to consider A14+10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (jpd), President, Mr F Matscher (jpd), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mrs E Palm, Mr A N Loizou, Mr J M Morenilla, Sir John Freeland (jpd), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr K Jungwiert (jpd).

P4A2 French Polynesia: The expulsion order of 2 March 1986 was served on the applicant the next day when she had already taken her seat in the aircraft. The applicant, who was not travelling on business for the European Parliament, had been able to move around Polynesia as she wished from 24 February to 3 March 1986 and during that period had suffered no interference with the exercise of her right to liberty of movement within the meaning of P4A2. Once the expulsion order had been served, the applicant was no longer lawfully on Polynesian territory and in those circumstances did not suffer any interference with the exercise of her right to liberty of movement, as secured by the provision in question, at that point either. There had been no breach of P4A2.

P4A2 New Caledonia: At an airport such as Nouméa's a passenger remained liable to checks for as long as he remained within the perimeter. In this instance the applicant was stopped just after her passport had been stamped and the impugned order was served on her before she had left the airport, since she was still held in an office under police guard. The order made by the High Commissioner of the Republic was headed 'Order prohibiting an alien from entering the territory' and it embodied the prohibition. The Conseil d'Etat, in its decision of 12 May 1989, did not question the nature of the order. That being so, the applicant was never lawfully within the territory, a requirement P4A2 was to apply. There had therefore been no breach of that provision.

A 10 French Polynesia: There had been an interference. The expulsion was prescribed by law, based on s 7 of the Act of 3 December 1849. Having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, the interference pursued the aims of the prevention of disorder, and territorial integrity. Freedom of expression constituted one of the essential foundations of a democratic society, one of the basic conditions for its progress. While freedom of expression was important for everybody, it was especially so for an elected representative of the people. Freedom of political debate was not absolute in nature. A Contracting State could make it subject to certain 'restrictions' or 'penalties', but it was for the Court to give a final ruling on the compatibility of such measures with the freedom of expression enshrined in A 10. The political atmosphere prevailing in French Polynesia at the time and the prospect of the two sets of elections were factors of some weight. The conduct of the applicant, whose political ideas were well known, could undoubtedly have had a special impact on the political atmosphere. Furthermore, she was requested on her arrival to show some discretion in what she said in public. Nevertheless, the utterances held against the applicant were made during a peaceful, authorised demonstration and her speech contributed to a democratic debate in Polynesia. No disorder followed. Although the expulsion order was served just before the applicant's departure, it was made the day after the demonstration in issue. A fair balance was accordingly not struck between, on the one hand, the public interest requiring the prevention of disorder and the upholding of territorial integrity and, on the other, Mrs Piermont's freedom of expression. The measure was not necessary in a democratic society and there had been a breach of A 10.

A 10 New Caledonia: The exclusion order made by the High Commissioner of the Republic amounted to an interference with the exercise of the right secured by A 10 as, having been detained at the airport, the applicant had not been able to come into contact with the politicians who had invited her or to express her ideas on the spot. The measure was prescribed by law. Even if some doubts may be entertained as to whether s 7 of the Act of 3 December 1849 applied to the instant case, which concerned not an expulsion in the strict sense but a refusal of entry, the High Commissioner was entitled to use his general police powers to ban the applicant from entering New Caledonia on grounds of public safety. The applicant's behaviour and the fear that she would express her views on sensitive topics on the spot could account for the reasons given for the refusal to let her enter Caledonian territory. Even if the political atmosphere was tense and her arrival led to a limited demonstration of hostility, the Court discerned no substantial difference in the applicant's position vis-à-vis the two territories. The reasons which prompted it to hold that the measure taken in French Polynesia was not justified in the light of the requirements of A 10(2) led it to make an identical finding in respect of New Caledonia. In conclusion, there had been a breach of A 10.

Having regard to its findings in relation to A 10, the Court considered it unnecessary to ascertain whether there has also been a breach of 14+10.

Present judgment constituted just satisfaction as regards non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (FF 80,000).

[Application lodged 6.4.1994; Commission report 1.7.1996; Court Judgment 21.10.1997]

In the general election of 21 and 28 March 1993 Mr Jean-Pierre Pierre-Bloch stood as a candidate for the Union for French Democracy in the 19th administrative district of Paris and was elected as a member of the National Assembly. On 27 May 1993 the applicant submitted his campaign accounts to the National Commission on Election Campaign Accounts and Political Funding. He was found to have exceeded the maximum permitted amount of campaign expenditure and disqualified from standing for election. He complained that he had not had a fair hearing before the Constitutional Council and that there had been a violation of his right to an effective remedy. He also complained of discrimination on account of his political views

The fact that proceedings had taken place before a constitutional court did not suffice to remove them from the ambit of A 6(1). It had to be ascertained whether the proceedings in issue in the instant case did or did not relate to 'the determination of civil rights and obligations' or of a 'criminal charge'. There had been a dispute. The right to stand for election to the National Assembly and to keep one's seat was a political one and not a 'civil' one within the meaning of A 6(1) so that disputes relating to the arrangements for the exercise of it, such as ones concerning candidates' obligation to limit their election expenditure, lay outside the scope of that provision. The applicant's pecuniary interests were also at stake. The economic aspect of the proceedings in issue did not, however, make them 'civil' ones within the meaning of A 6(1). A 6(1) accordingly did not apply in its civil aspect.

There had been a 'charge'. To determine whether it was criminal, regard had to be had to three criteria: the legal classification of the offence in question in national law, the very nature of the offence and the nature and degree of severity of the penalty. The provisions in question did not belong to French criminal law but to the rules governing the financing and capping of election expenditure and therefore to electoral law. Nor could a breach of a legal rule governing such a matter be described as 'criminal' by nature. Three 'penalties' could be imposed on candidates who did not keep within the statutory limit on expenditure: disqualification from standing for election, an obligation to pay the Treasury a sum equal to the amount of the excess, and the penalties provided for in Article L 113-1 of the Elections Code. The purpose of that penalty was to compel candidates to respect the maximum limit. The penalty of disqualification was directly one of the measures designed to ensure the proper conduct of parliamentary elections, so that, by virtue of its purpose, it lay outside the 'criminal' sphere. The disqualification was limited to a period of one year from the date of the election and applied only to the election in question. Thus neither the nature nor the degree of severity of that penalty brought the issue into the 'criminal' realm. The obligation to pay the Treasury a sum equal to the amount of the excess related to the amount by which the Constitutional Council had found the ceiling to have been exceeded. That appeared to show that it was in the nature of a payment to the community of the sum of which the candidate in question improperly took advantage to seek the votes of his fellow citizens and that it formed part of the measures designed to ensure the proper conduct of parliamentary elections and, in particular, equality of the candidates. It differed in several respects from criminal fines in the strict sense. In view of its nature, the obligation to pay the Treasury a sum equal to the amount of the excess could not be construed as a fine. The nature of those penalties in Article L 113-1 of the Elections Code were not in issue in this case as no proceedings were brought against the applicant on the basis of that Article. Accordingly A 6(1) did not apply in its criminal aspect either.

The applicant's complaint under A 14 was not reiterated either in his memorial or at the hearing before the Court. The Court saw no reason to consider it of its own motion. The right of recourse guaranteed in A 13 could only relate to a right protected by the Convention. Accordingly, having regard to its decisions on the complaints based on A 6(1), A 13 was not applicable.

[Application lodged 15.3.1979; Commission report 13.5.1981; Court Judgment 1.10.1982 (merits), 26.10.1984 (A 50)]

Mr Christian Piersack was a gunsmith. He was sentenced to 18 years' hard labour on 10 November 1978 by the Brabant Assize Court for murder. He complained that he had not received a hearing by 'an independent and impartial tribunal established by law', since Mr Van de Walle, the President of the Assize Court which convicted him, had allegedly dealt with the case at an earlier stage in the capacity of a senior deputy to the procureur du Roi.

The applicant did not adduce any supporting evidence of his assertion that the court by which he was convicted was not an independent tribunal, and the assertion did not stand up to examination. Whilst impartiality normally denoted absence of prejudice or bias, its existence or otherwise could be tested in various ways. A distinction could be drawn between a subjective approach, that was endeavouring to ascertain the personal conviction of a given judge in a given case, and an objective approach, that was determining whether he offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. As regards the first approach, Mr Van de Walle's personal impartiality did not give any cause for doubt and indeed personal impartiality was to be presumed until there was proof to the contrary. However, even appearances could be of a certain importance. What was at stake was the confidence which the courts had to inspire in the public in a democratic society. The mere fact that a judge was once a member of the public prosecutor's department was not a reason for fearing that he lacked impartiality. In order that the courts may inspire in the public the confidence which was indispensable, account had to also be taken of questions of internal organisation. If an individual, after holding in the public prosecutor's department an office whose nature was such that he may have to deal with a given matter in the course of his duties, subsequently sat in the same case as a judge, the public were entitled to fear that he did not offer sufficient guarantees of impartiality. That was what occurred in the present case. In November 1978, Mr Van de Walle presided over the Brabant Assize Court before which the Indictments Chamber of the Brussels Court of Appeal had remitted the applicant for trial. In that capacity, he enjoyed during the hearings and the deliberations extensive powers to which, moreover, he was led to have recourse. Yet previously and until November 1977, Mr Van de Walle had been the head of a section of the Brussels public prosecutor's department, which was responsible for the prosecution instituted against the applicant. Whether or not the applicant was unaware of all those facts at the relevant time was of little moment. Neither was it necessary to endeavour to gauge the precise extent of the role played by Mr Van de Walle. It was sufficient to find that the impartiality of the tribunal which had to determine the merits of the charge was capable of appearing open to doubt. Therefore, in that respect, there was a violation of A 6(1).

In the particular circumstances, it was not necessary to examine the issue of 'tribunal established by law', for in the present case the complaint, although made in a different legal context, coincided in substance with the complaint which had been held to be well-founded; besides, the applicant did not revert to the former complaint either in his written observations on admissibility or during the hearings before the Commission and before the Court.

Respondent State to refrain from recovering, out of the court costs which the Belgian Court of Cassation and the Hainaut Assize Court ordered the applicant to bear on 21 February 1979 and 17 October 1983 respectively, a sum totalling BEF 51,978, pay to the applicant BEF 275,000 less FF 3,500, in respect of lawyer's costs before the Belgian Court of Cassation, BEF 25,000, the Hainaut Assize Court BEF 150,000 and the Convention institutions BEF 100,000.

Pine Valley Developments Ltd and Others v Ireland (1992) 14 EHRR 319 91/53

The first and second applicants, Pine Valley and Healy Holdings, were land developers, the third applicant, Mr Healy, was the managing director of Healy Holdings. Pine Valley purchased land relying on outline planning permission for industrial warehouse and office development. Dublin County Council later refused the detailed planning approval applied for by Pine Valley. The applicant obtained an order of mandamus from the High Court and subsequently sold the land to Healy Holdings. On further appeal the Supreme Court held the grant outline permission ultra vires and therefore a nullity. The applicants complained that the respondent State's alleged failure to validate retrospectively the outline planning permission or to provide compensation or other remedy for the reduction in value of their property constituted a violation of P1A1. They also complained of discrimination in the enjoyment of their property rights taken in conjunction with P1A1 and that they did not have an effective remedy under Irish law in respect of the foregoing complaints.

Comm found unanimously NV P1A1 of Pine Valley, by majority (9–4) NV P1A1 of Healy Holdings (10-3) NV P1A1 of Mr Healy, by majority (12–1) V 14+P1A1 of Healy Holdings (12–1) V 14+P1A1 of Mr Healy, unanimously NV P1A1 of Pine Valley, unanimously NV 13.

Court dismissed the Government's preliminary objection and found unanimously regarding Pine Valley NV P1A1 and NV P1A1+14; by majority (6–3) NV P1A1 regarding Healy Holdings and Mr Healy and unanimously V14+P1A1 regarding Healy Holdings and Mr Healy, unanimously NV 13.

Preliminary objections dismissed. The three applicants could be considered victims. It was sufficient for an applicant to have owned property, later dissolution was not relevant to admissibility, nor did insolvency extinguish the right to be a victim. Arguments regarding non-exhaustion rejected.

The first applicants had purchased the property in reliance on the grant of the planning permission and so had a right with which the State had interfered even though the Supreme Court subsequently held that right to be void ab initio. It was for the national courts to interpret and apply domestic law. There was no interference with the rights of the first applicant as they had sold the land before the Supreme Court's decision, but there had been a violation regarding the rights of the other applicants. There was no expropriation or deprivation of the land, the interference was a control of use of property (second paragraph of P1A1). It was lawful as it was in accordance with relevant legislation. It was proportionate as it was the only way in which the aim of preserving a green belt could be achieved. The applicants were engaged in a commercial venture which involved some risk, and they were aware of the Council's position. On the basis of the Supreme Court's obiter dictum that the domestic legislation did not apply to validate the grant of planning permission in the applicants' case, the applicants were treated differently from other property owners in the same category and so were discriminated against. The applicants could and did raise their Convention claims before the domestic courts, the effectiveness of a remedy did not depend on a favourable outcome and so no violation of A 13.

Pio v Italy 00/50

[Application lodged 29.7.1997; Court Judgment 8.2.2000]

Mr Ruggiero Pio complained of the length of civil proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr C Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 6 August 1969 and ended on 28 May 1997. It had lasted more than 27 years and nine months at one level of jurisdiction, of which 23 years and 10 months were after the coming into force of Italy's recognition of the right of individual petition. The period could not be considered as reasonable.

Pisano v Italy 00/196

[Application lodged 28.10.1996; Court Judgment 27.7.2000]

Mr Massimo Pisano and his mistress were convicted of murdering his wife and concealing the corpse. During the trial the Assize Court refused the hiss request to call a witness who he said was in front of him in the queue at the land registry office at the time of the murder. The applicant's appeal to the Assize Court of Appeal challenging the refusal to call the defence witness was dismissed. He complained of lack of fair trial.

Court found by majority (5–2) NV 6(1), NV 6(1)+6(3)(d).

Judges: Mr C L Rozakis (d), President, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello (d) Mr P Lorenzen, Mr M Fischbach, Mrs M Tsatsa- Nikolovska, Mr E Levits.

Under Italian law the accused, like the prosecution, had to indicate before the trial commenced the witnesses whom he wished to be called. Since the applicant indicated the name of his defence witness only after the trial had commenced, the conditions for calling that witness were different from those applicable to the prosecution witnesses indicated in time by the prosecution. The summoning of defence witnesses was subject to stricter rules in the Code of Criminal Procedure which provided that the court was not to summon a witness unless it considered the witness absolutely necessary. The applicant did not challenge the legality of the refusal, only its appropriateness. A 6(3)(d) did not require that every witness be summoned to give evidence. The applicant was able to present to the courts of first instance, appeal and cassation his arguments regarding the appropriateness of hearing evidence for that witness. Since the fairness of the proceedings was not adversely affected by the decision to hear evidence from that witness, it could not be inferred that there was a violation of the rights of the defence. The Assize Court did not find it established that the applicant had gone to the land registry office and noted that there was other evidence which established the applicant's guilt. The brief information provided with the order refusing to summon the witness for the defence could not constitute a violation of the rights of the defence. As regards the investigations carried out, they concerned the way in which the applicant spent his time on the day of the offence and the possibility that he might have visited the scene of the crime. The applicant was able to apprise himself of the result of those investigations and to challenge the conclusions which the prosecution had drawn from them before the investigating and trial courts. He had not adduced any evidence on which it might be concluded that the prosecution had knowingly intended to interfere with the fairness of the proceedings. The rights of the defence were not subject to any restriction which deprived the applicant of a fair trial.

Pizzetti v Italy 93/8

[Application lodged 29.7.1986; Commission report 10.12.1991; Court Judgment 26.2.1993]

On 6 September 1983 Mr Bartolomeo Pizzetti brought an action for damages against Mr G before the Bergamo District Court in respect of the injuries he sustained when he was assaulted during an argument. He complained of the length of proceedings and lack of effective remedy.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (14-6) NV 13.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), not necessary to examine A 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr S K Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 6 September 1983, when Mr G was summonsed before the Bergamo District Court. It had not yet ended as the proceedings were still pending in the same court at the stage of the investigation. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The applicant's attitude was not sufficient in itself to explain the total duration of the proceedings. In particular, his attempt to secure a friendly settlement and the fact that he failed to attend the medical examination could not justify the period of inactivity which lasted from 14 June 1984 to 31 March 1988. Moreover, although some hearings were adjourned at his request, he also asked for three others to be scheduled or brought forward. As regards the argument based on the backlog of cases pending before the Bergamo District Court, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. A lapse of time which was already more than nine years could not be regarded as reasonable.

In view of its decision concerning A 6 the Court did not consider it necessary also to examine the case under A 13.

Pizzi v Italy 97/64

[Application lodged 30.11.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Antonio Pizzi was a civil servant. On 18 May 1982 he applied to the Calabria Regional Administrative Court for judicial review of a decision of the Regional Council assigning him, at the time when he was recruited to a permanent post, to a staff category lower than the one to which he considered himself to be entitled on the basis of the duties he had performed during the period when he had been employed on a fixed-term contract. He complained of the length of proceedings which were still pending.

Comm found by majority (23–6) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (8–1) A 6(1) NA.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (d), Mr A B Baka, Mr M A Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

In the law of many Member States of the Council of Europe there was a basic distinction between civil servants and employees governed by private law. That had led the Court to hold that disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the present case the applicant sought only judicial review of the Regional Council's decision assigning him, at the time when he was recruited to a permanent post, to a category of staff lower than the one to which he considered himself to be entitled. The dispute raised by him thus clearly related simultaneously to his recruitment and his career and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

[Application lodged 13.9.1982; Commission report 12.3.1987; Court Judgment 21.6.1988]

The applicant association, an association of doctors campaigning against abortion, held two demonstrations which were disrupted by counter demonstrators. The applicant association lodged a complaint against the police for failing to provide sufficient protection for the demonstration. They appealed to the Constitutional Court which held that it had no jurisdiction and declared the appeal inadmissible. They complained of lack of effective remedy.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr R Macdonald, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J A Carrillo Salcedo.

A 13 did not only apply where a substantive provision of the Convention had been infringed. It secured an effective remedy before a national authority to anyone claiming on arguable grounds to be the victim of a violation of his rights and freedoms set out in the Convention. Although the complaint under A 11 had been dismissed as manifestly ill-founded, it was necessary nevertheless to consider whether it was arguable; the decision on admissibility could provide pointers as to the arguability of the relevant claim. A demonstration may annoy or give offence to persons opposed to it. However the participants had to be able to hold demonstrations without fear that they would be physically attacked. In a democracy the right to counter demonstrate could not extend to inhibiting the exercise of the right to demonstrate. A 11 sometimes required positive measures to be taken. Reasonable and appropriate measures had to be taken to enable lawful demonstrations to proceed peacefully but this could not be guaranteed absolutely and States had a wide discretion in the choice of means to be used. In this area the obligation entered into under A 11 was one as to measures to be taken and not as to results to be achieved. The Court did not have to assess the expediency or effectiveness of the tactics adopted by the police but only to determine whether there was an arguable claim that the appropriate authorities failed to take the necessary measures. In this case the Austrian authorities had not failed to take reasonable and appropriate measures. No arguable claim that A 11 was violated was made out and therefore A 13 did not apply.

Podbielski v Poland 98/95

[Application lodged 31.3.1995; Commission report 22.10.1997; Court Judgment 30.10.1998]

Mr Janusz Podbielski was a businessman. On 25 May 1992 he sued the municipality before the Regional Court seeking payment for construction works which his company had carried out for the municipality on the basis of a contract dated 18 February 1991 and pecuniary penalties resulting from the defendant's breach of the terms of the contract. Hearings proceeded and on 30 June 1998 the applicant lodged with the Supreme Court an appeal on points of law. Those proceedings were still pending. He complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found by majority (13–2) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt R, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr I Foighel, Mr A B Baka, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr E Levits, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P Van Dijk, Mr M Voicu.

The period to be taken into consideration for the purpose of assessing the length of the proceedings from the angle of the reasonable time requirement under A 6(1) began not on 25 May 1992, when the applicant initiated civil proceedings before the Regional Court, but on 1 May 1993, when the declaration whereby Poland recognised the right of individual petition for the purposes of A 25 of the Convention took effect. The proceedings were still pending since the final decision on his appeal in cassation had not yet been delivered. Accordingly, the proceedings have lasted so far over six years and five months, out of which five years, five months and 29 days were taken into consideration by the Court. In order to determine the reasonableness of the length of time in question the Court had regard to the state of the case on 1 May 1993. The applicant had a strong economic interest at a time of rampant inflation in the respondent State in securing a definitive adjudication of his claim against the municipality within a reasonable period of time. The subject matter of the litigation was not particularly complex, being concerned with the enforcement of rights and obligations under a straightforward contract. While it was true that the interpretation of the penalty clauses in the contract was rendered complex on account of the evolving nature of the domestic legal system at the relevant time and the uncertainty about the correct approach to be adopted by the courts to this case, it was to be noted that the principal legal issues were clarified by the Supreme Court on 28 January 1994. Therefore, the complexity of the subject matter of the case could not justify the length of the proceedings. Although the applicant may have contributed to some extent to the delay in the proceedings by his conduct, that could not justify the overall length of the proceedings. The delay in the delivery of a final decision on the applicant's action had been caused to a large extent by the legislative changes resulting from the requirements of the transition from a state-controlled to a free-market system and by the complexity of the procedures which surrounded the litigation and which prevented an expeditious decision on the applicant's claim. A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements, including the obligation to decide cases within a reasonable time. Therefore the delay in the proceedings had to be mainly attributed to the national authorities. In the particular circumstances of the instant case, the period exceeded a reasonable time.

[Application lodged 25.1.1982; Commission report 24.1.1986; Court Judgment 23.4.1987 (merits), 29.9.1987 (A 50)]

The applicants, Leopold Poiss, who died on 30 April 1984, and his children, Josef and Anna, were Austrian farmers. They complained of consolidation proceedings taken in respect of their land. They lodged various appeals which were unsuccessful. They complained of the length of proceedings. They also complained that the provisional transfer of their land in 1963 interfered with their right of property. They claimed that they had still not received the compensation in land to which they were entitled and that they had suffered loss as a consequence.

Court found unanimously V 6(1) as regards reasonable time requirement, no jurisdiction to entertain the other complaints under this provision, V P1A1.

Judges: (merits and A 50) Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcükü, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo.

Any decision, whether favourable or unfavourable, by the authorities dealing with the matter affected, or would in the future affect their property rights. The outcome of the proceedings complained of was accordingly 'decisive for private rights and obligations'.

New complaints that hearings before the land reform boards were not held in public, and that the boards were not independent and impartial were not raised as such before the Commission and the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain them.

In civil proceedings, the reasonable time referred to in A 6(1) normally began to run from the moment the action was instituted before the tribunal. The period whose reasonableness fell to be reviewed took in the entirety of the proceedings in issue, including any appeals. That period accordingly extended right up to the decision which disposed of the dispute. The first phase began between 27 and 30 September 1965 when the applicants appealed against the consolidation plan of 1 September 1965. It ended on 23 May 1972, when they received notification of the Constitutional Court's judgment. The proceedings in the Constitutional Court were material, because although that Court had no jurisdiction to rule on the merits, its decision was nonetheless capable of affecting the outcome of the dispute. The first phase therefore lasted six years, seven months and 23 days. The second phase began on 6 September 1974, when the applicants requested the reopening of proceedings. The second phase was still under way; it had already lasted more than twelve and a half years. Consequently, the total length of time to be considered amounted to more than 19 years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed according to the particular circumstances and having regard to the criteria stated in the case-law of the Court, especially the degree of complexity of the case, the applicants' behaviour and the conduct of the relevant authorities. Any land consolidation was by its nature a complex process, and in this case the application of the law appeared to have raised issues of fact of considerable complexity. Applicants could not be blamed for making full use of the remedies available to them under domestic law. The applicants' behaviour, in itself legitimate, nonetheless constituted an objective fact which could not be attributed to the respondent State and which had to be taken into account for the purpose of determining whether or not the reasonable time referred to in A 6(1) had been exceeded. The competent authorities, who had initiated the consolidation process of their own motion and were responsible for the conduct of it were under a special duty to act expeditiously. There were various unjustified delays attributable to the authorities dealing with the case. As a result of those delays, viewed together and cumulatively, the applicants' case was not heard within a reasonable time as required by A 6(1).

There had indisputably been an interference with the applicants' right of property as guaranteed in P1A1. In authorising a provisional transfer at an early stage of the consolidation process, the intention was to ensure that the land in question could be continuously and economically farmed in the interests of the landowners generally and of the community. Furthermore, although the applicants lost their land in consequence of the transfer decided on in 1963, they received other land in lieu, even if they were not satisfied with it. The applicable system, however, suffered from a degree of inflexibility: before the entry into force of a consolidation plan, it provided no means of altering the position of landowners or of compensating them for damage they may have sustained in the time up to the final award of the statutory compensation in land. In the circumstances of the present case the necessary balance between protection of the right of property and the requirements of the public interest was lacking: the applicants, who remained uncertain as to the final fate of their property, had been made to bear a disproportionate burden. Accordingly there had been a breach of P1A1.

Poitrimol v France (1994) 18 EHRR 130 93/48

[Application lodged 21.4.1988; Commission report 3.9.1992; Court Judgment 23.11.1993]

Mr Bernard Poitrimol married Miss Catherine Bisserier in February 1973 and they were divorced in 1982. There were two children of the marriage. In September 1984, when exercising his right of access to the children, the applicant took his children to Turkey. He failed to return them and on 19 December 1985 he was committed for trial at the Marseilles Criminal Court. Mr Poitrimol did not return to France but was represented at the trial on 3 March 1986 by two counsel. In a judgment delivered after proceedings deemed to be inter partes the court sentenced him on the same day to a year's imprisonment and issued a warrant for his arrest. On 5 March 1986 counsel for Mr Poitrimol lodged an appeal. Although he had been summoned to the hearing on 10 September 1986, the applicant did not appear in person and although his lawyer asked for trial in absentia the Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal ordered that Mr Poitrimol should be summoned again as it considered his presence in court to be necessary. He failed to appear and the court upheld the impugned judgment in its entirety. The applicant appealed on points of law and on 21 December 1987 the Court of Cassation declared the appeal inadmissible on the grounds that a convicted person who had not surrendered to a warrant issued for his arrest was not entitled to instruct counsel to represent him and lodge an appeal on points of law on his behalf against his conviction. He complained that the Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal had convicted him in absentia without his counsel being able to put the case for the defence and of the refusal of access to the Court of Cassation.

As the requirements of A 6(3) were to be seen as particular aspects of the right to a fair trial guaranteed by A 6(1), the Court examined the complaints under both provisions taken together.

Proceedings held in an accused's absence were not in principle incompatible with the Convention if the person concerned could subsequently obtain from a court which had heard him a fresh determination of the merits of the charge, in respect of both law and fact. It was open to question whether that latter requirement applied when the accused had waived his right to appear and to defend himself, but at all events such a waiver had, if it was to be effective for Convention purposes, to be established in an unequivocal manner and be attended by minimum safeguards commensurate to its importance. In the present case the applicant had clearly expressed his wish not to attend the appeal hearings on 10 September 1986 and 4 February 1987 and thus not to defend himself in person. On the other hand, it was apparent from the evidence that he intended to be defended by a lawyer instructed for the purpose, who would attend the hearings. Although not absolute, the right of everyone charged with a criminal offence to be effectively defended by a lawyer, assigned officially if need be, was one of the fundamental features of a fair trial. A person charged with a criminal offence did not lose the benefit of that right merely on account of not being present at the trial. It was of capital importance that a defendant should appear, both because of his right to a hearing and because of the need to verify the accuracy of his statements and compare them with those of the victim – whose interests needed to be protected – and of the witnesses. The legislature accordingly had to be able to discourage unjustified absences. In the instant case, however, it was unnecessary to decide whether it was permissible in principle to punish such absences by ignoring the right to legal assistance, since at all events the suppression of that right was disproportionate in the circumstances. It deprived the applicant, who was not entitled to apply to the Court of Appeal to set aside its judgment and rehear the case, of his only chance of having arguments of law and fact presented at second instance in respect of the charge against him. The inadmissibility of the appeal on points of law, on grounds connected with the applicant's having absconded, also amounted to a disproportionate sanction, having regard to the signal importance of the rights of the defence and of the principle of the rule of law in a democratic society. Admittedly, the remedy in question was an extraordinary one relating to the application of the law and not to the merits of the case. Nevertheless, in the French system of criminal procedure, whether an accused who did not appear may have arguments of law and fact presented at second instance in respect of the charge against him depended largely on whether he had provided valid excuses for his absence. It was accordingly essential that there should be an opportunity for review of the legal grounds on which a court of appeal had rejected such excuses. There had been a breach of A 6 both in the Court of Appeal and in the Court of Cassation.

Polat v Turkey 99/32

[Application lodged 18.11.1993; Commission report 11.12.1997; Court Judgment 8.7.1999]

Mr Edip Polat was a writer. In May 1991 he published a book entitled Nevrozladik Safaklari ('We made each dawn a Newroz'). He was prosecuted and in a judgment of 23 December 1992 the National Security Court found the applicant guilty of disseminating separatist propaganda. He was sentenced to 2 years imprisonment and a fine. His appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed.

Comm found by majority (31–1) V 10 examined together with 9, unanimously no separate issue under P1A1.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 10, not required to examine of its own motion P1A1.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm (jc), Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello (c), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jc), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach (jc), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jc), Mrs H S Greve (jc), Mr A Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mr K Traja, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge.

The applicant did not raise the complaints under A 6(1) and 7 before the Commission and the Court could not entertain them.

The complaint was considered from the standpoint of A 10 alone. The Court, as master of the characterisation to be given in law to the facts of a case, did not consider itself bound by the characterisation given by applicants, governments or the Commission.

An appeal against the interim seizure ordered by the Ankara Court of First Instance would not have had any effect on the events which formed the interference complained of by the applicant, namely his conviction by the Ankara State Security Court and confiscation of his book. Consequently, such an appeal could not be regarded as adequate and effective. The requirement of exhaustion of domestic remedies was satisfied where an applicant had raised before the national authorities, at least in substance and in compliance with the formal requirements and time-limits laid down in domestic law, the complaints he intended to make subsequently in Strasbourg. Before the National Security Court and the Court of Cassation the applicant clearly complained of a restriction of his freedom of expression. The Government's preliminary objection was therefore be dismissed.

The applicant's conviction amounted to an interference with the exercise of his freedom of expression. Such an interference breached A 10 unless it satisfied the requirements of the second paragraph of A 10. The applicant's conviction was based on the Prevention of Terrorism Act and the resulting interference with his right to freedom of expression could be regarded as prescribed by law. Having regard to the sensitivity of the security situation in south-east Turkey and to the need for the authorities to be alert to acts capable of fuelling additional violence, the measures taken against the applicant could be said to have been in furtherance of the aims of protection of national security and territorial integrity and the prevention of disorder and crime.

There was little scope under A 10(2) for restrictions on political speech or on debate on questions of public interest. Furthermore, the limits of permissible criticism were wider with regard to the government than in relation to a private citizen, or even a politician. In a democratic system the actions or omissions of the government had to be subject to the close scrutiny not only of the legislative and judicial authorities but also of public opinion. Moreover, the dominant position which the government occupied made it necessary for it to display restraint in resorting to criminal proceedings, particularly where other means were available for replying to the unjustified attacks and criticisms of its adversaries. Nevertheless, it remained open to the competent State authorities to adopt, in their capacity as guarantors of public order, measures, even of a criminal-law nature, intended to react appropriately and without excess to such remarks. Where such remarks incited to violence against an individual or a public official or a sector of the population, the State authorities enjoyed a wider margin of appreciation when examining the need for an interference with freedom of expression. The Court would take into account the background to the cases submitted to it, particularly problems linked to the prevention of terrorism. However, the applicant was a private individual who had made his views public by means of a literary work rather than through the mass media, a fact which limited their potential impact on national security, public order and territorial integrity to a substantial degree. Although certain passages in the book criticised the attitude of the Turkish authorities and gave the narrative a hostile tone, they did not constitute an incitement to violence, armed resistance or an uprising; that was a factor which it was essential to take into consideration, especially as the events related happened at a period which was already relatively distant in time. The nature and severity of the penalties imposed were also factors to be taken into account when assessing whether the interference was proportionate to the aims it pursued. The penalty imposed on the applicant was severe and the proceedings against him were persistent. After he had served his prison sentence the applicant was ordered to pay an additional fine following the entry into force of another law. The applicant's conviction was disproportionate to the aims pursued and accordingly not necessary in a democratic society. There had therefore been a violation of A 10.

The applicant did not maintain his complaint under P1A1 before the Court, which saw no reason to examine it of its own motion.

Portington v Greece 98/76

[Application lodged 11.5.1995; Commission report 10.9.1997; Court Judgment 23.9.1998]

In 1986, while crossing the frontier into Greece, Mr Philip Portington, a British citizen, was arrested and charged with committing a murder in July 1985 on his previous visit to Greece as well as with using and carrying arms. He denied the charges. He was remanded in custody and committed for trial. On 17 February 1988, after a hearing which lasted one day, the Salonika Criminal Court composed of jurors and professional judges convicted the applicant of all the charges. He was sentenced to the death penalty for murder, to life imprisonment for robbery and to five years' imprisonment for carrying and using arms. On 18 February 1988 he appealed against the verdict. His appeal was finally heard on 12 February 1996. The Court of Appeal upheld his conviction but commuted his death sentence to life imprisonment. He complained of the length of proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began when the appeal was lodged and ended when the appeal was finally heard and judgment delivered by the Court of Appeal, a period of almost 8 years. The complexity of the issues could not explain the length of the proceedings. It was noteworthy that it took the trial court just one day to hear the case and deliver judgment and the Court of Appeal also one day to dispose of the appeal. Even if the delays attributable to requests for adjournments were made by the applicant, and he could be considered on that account to be responsible for some of the delay, that could not justify the length of periods in between individual hearings and certainly not the total length of the appeal proceedings. There were several periods of inactivity in the appeal proceedings – after the applicant had filed the appeal, the case lay dormant for over one year and seven months until it was listed for first hearing; procedural measures which had to be taken in order to have the case file transferred to the appellate court could not explain such an excessive period of delay. Furthermore, the case was relisted on four occasions, which gave rise to periods of inactivity in between dates set for hearing. The Government's submissions that the length of one of those periods was caused by lawyers' strikes was dismissed; since over five months had elapsed after the end of the strikes and before the case was listed, that delay also attributed to the conduct of national authorities. Those and remaining periods of inactivity could not be excused by the Court of Appeal's volume of work. A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. Accordingly, there had been a violation of the reasonable time requirement of A 6(1).

Finding of a violation constituted just satisfaction for any alleged non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (GBP 15,000 less FF 14,549)

Powell and Rayner v United Kingdom (1990) 12 EHRR 355 90/3

[Application lodged 31.12.1980; Commission report 19.1.1989; Court Judgment 21.2.1990]

Richard John Powell and Michael Anthony Rayner, who were owners of property near Heathrow airport, complained of the excessive noise levels. They relied on A 6(1), 8 and 13 of the Convention and P1A1. At the admissibility stage, the Commission rejected all the substantive claims of violation for being manifestly ill-founded but declared the case admissible under A 13. The applicants invoked the same arguments before the Court.

Comm found by majority (12–4) V 13 in relation to Mr Rayner's claim under 8 but not in relation to any of the other claims unanimously as regards both applicants' grievances under P1A1 and 6(1), (15–1) NV 8 as regards Mr Powell.

Court found unanimously no jurisdiction regarding claims under 6(1) and 8, unanimously NV 13 in respect of either applicant.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel.

The jurisdiction of the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility. A 13 required a remedy in domestic law only in respect of grievances which could be regarded as arguable in terms of the Convention. Whatever threshold the Commission had set in its case-law for declaring claims 'manifestly ill-founded' under A 27(2), in principle it should set the same threshold in regard to the parallel notion of 'arguability' under A 13. This did not mean that the Court was bound to hold A 13 inapplicable solely because the Commission had declared the substantive claims of violation manifestly ill-founded. The Court was competent to take cognisance of all questions of fact and law arising in the context of the A 13 complaints referred to it, including the 'arguability' or not of each of the substantive claims. The particular facts and nature of the legal issues raised had to be examined in the light of the Commission's admissibility decision and the reasoning contained therein. A claim was not necessarily rendered arguable because, before rejecting it as inadmissible, the Commission had devoted careful consideration to it and to its underlying facts. The effect of s 76(1) of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 was to exclude liability in nuisance with regard to the flight of aircraft in certain circumstances. To this extent there is no 'civil right' recognised under domestic law to attract the application of A 6(1). A 13 did not guarantee a remedy allowing a Contracting State's laws as such to be challenged before a national authority. Access to the domestic courts was available to any person who considered that he had a cause of action in nuisance under English law. If a question of the application of s 76(1) arose, it would be for the courts to decide. Whether the case was analysed in terms of a positive duty on the State to take reasonable and appropriate measures to secure the applicants' rights under A 8(1) or in terms of an interference by a public authority to be justified in accordance with A 8(2), a fair balance had to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole. The operation of a major international airport pursued a legitimate aim and a consequential negative impact on the environment could not be entirely eliminated. A number of measures had been introduced to control, abate and compensate for aircraft noise. The exclusion of liability in nuisance was not absolute. The Government considered the problems of aircraft noise were better dealt with by taking and enforcing specific regulatory measures than by having the matter settled by the case-law of the courts. This was an area where States enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation. In this case, in view of the foregoing, the UK had not exceeded its margin of appreciation or upset the fair balance to be struck under A 8. No arguable claim of violation of A 8 and no entitlement to a remedy under A 13 have been made out by either applicant as regards noise caused by aircraft flying at a reasonable height and in compliance with air traffic regulations. If the applicants wished to complain about aircraft not satisfying those conditions they could bring their action in nuisance and to that extent had an effective remedy available to them.

Prager and Oberschlick v Austria (1996) 21 EHRR 1 95/11

[Application lodged 21.12.1989; Commission report 28.2.1994; Court Judgment 26.4.1995]

Mr Michael Prager and Mr Gerhard Oberschlick were journalists; the latter was the publisher of the periodical Forum. On 15 March 1987 Forum published an article by Mr Prager entitled 'Danger! Harsh judges!' criticising judges sitting in the Austrian criminal courts. On 23 April 1987 Judge J brought an action for defamation. On 11 October 1988 the Eisenstadt Regional Court found Mr Prager guilty of having defamed Judge J. It sentenced him to 120 day fines and imprisonment in the event of non-payment. Mr Oberschlick was ordered to pay Judge J damages and was declared jointly and severally liable with the first applicant in respect of the fine and the legal costs. The court also ordered the confiscation of the remaining stocks of the relevant issue of Forum and the publication of extracts from its judgment. On 26 June 1989 the Vienna Court of Appeal upheld this judgment, but reduced the damages. The applicants complained that their convictions constituted a violation of their right to freedom of expression and that the order confiscating the remaining copies of the periodical amounted to discrimination prohibited under A 14 taken in conjunction with A 10.

Comm found by majority (15–12) NV 10, unanimously NV 14+10.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (5–4) NV 10, unanimously not necessary to examine 14+10.

By 'victim', A 25 meant the person directly affected by the act or omission which was in issue, a violation being conceivable even in the absence of any detriment; the latter was relevant only to the application of A 50. The criminal proceedings were directed at both Mr Prager and Mr Oberschlick. The latter was personally convicted for having published an article in his periodical. He was therefore directly affected by the decisions of the Eisenstadt Regional Court and the Vienna Court of Appeal. He could, accordingly, claim to be a victim of the alleged violation. The Government's preliminary objection of lack of victim status was therefore dismissed.

Mr Prager's conviction for defamation and the other measures of which the applicants complained amounted to an interference with the exercise by them of their freedom of expression. The relevant provisions of the Criminal Code had the characteristics of 'law', as did the Media Act. The uncertainties linked to the application in this instance of these two provisions did not exceed what the applicants could expect, if need be after having sought appropriate advice. The decisions in issue were intended to protect the reputation of others, in this case Judge J, and to maintain the authority of the judiciary, which were legitimate aims for the purposes of A 10(2). The press played a pre-eminent role in a State governed by the rule of law. Although it must not overstep certain bounds set, inter alia, for the protection of the reputation of others, it was nevertheless incumbent on it to impart – in a way consistent with its duties and responsibilities – information and ideas on political questions and on other matters of public interest. That undoubtedly included questions concerning the functioning of the system of justice, an institution that was essential for any democratic society. Regard, however, had to be had to the special role of the judiciary in society. As the guarantor of justice, a fundamental value in a law-governed State, it had to enjoy public confidence if it was to be successful in carrying out its duties. It might therefore prove necessary to protect such confidence against destructive attacks that were essentially unfounded, especially in view of the fact that judges who had been criticised were subject to a duty of discretion that precluded them from replying. The assessment of those factors fell in the first place to the national authorities, which enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in determining the existence and extent of the necessity of an interference with the freedom of expression. Some of the allegations were extremely serious. It was therefore hardly surprising that their author should be expected to explain himself. He had not only damaged their reputation, but also undermined public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary as a whole. The research that Mr Prager had undertaken did not appear adequate to substantiate such serious allegations. It was noteworthy that, on his own admission, the applicant had not attended a single criminal trial before Judge J. Furthermore, he had not given the judge any opportunity to comment on the accusations levelled against him. Freedom of expression was applicable not only to information or ideas that were favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offended, shocked or disturbed the State or any section of the community. In addition, the Court was mindful of the fact that journalistic freedom also covered possible recourse to a degree of exaggeration, or even provocation. However, regard being had to all the circumstances and to the margin of appreciation that was to be left to the Contracting States, the impugned interference did not appear to be disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. It could therefore be held to have been necessary in a democratic society. Therefore no violation of A 10 had been established.

The applicants did not raise their complaint under A 14 and 10 before the Court which did not consider it necessary to examine the issue of its own motion.

Pramstaller v Austria 95/37

[Application lodged 18.5.1990; Commission report 19.5.1994; Court Judgment 23.10.1995]

On 17 March 1987 Nußdorf-Debant municipal council granted Mr Johann Pramstaller planning permission for the construction of new commercial premises, subject to various detailed conditions. On 23 July 1987 the council ordered the applicant to suspend the works as an inspection of the site had shown that he had disregarded several conditions of the planning permission. On 10 November 1987 the Lienz district authority served a 'sentence order' on the applicant under the Tyrol Building Regulations Act. He was ordered to pay a fine with imprisonment in default of payment plus costs. An appeal by him to the Tyrol regional government was dismissed on 22 March 1988. He applied to the Constitutional Court which, on 16 September 1988, declined to accept the case for adjudication. On 14 September 1989 the applicant's appeal was dismissed by the Administrative Court. He complained that he had not been unable to bring his case before a tribunal.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) as regards access to a court, no separate issue regarding failure to hold a hearing.

Court found unanimously 6 applicable, V 6(1) as regards access to a court, not necessary to examine the complaints regarding the lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr SK Martens (so), Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk.

In order to determine whether an offence qualified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention, it was first necessary to ascertain whether or not the provision defining the offence belonged, in the legal system of the respondent State, to criminal law; next, the 'very nature of the offence' and the degree of severity of the penalty risked had to be considered. Although the offences in issue and the procedures followed in the case fell within the administrative sphere, they were nevertheless criminal in nature. That was reflected in the terminology employed. In addition, the fine imposed on the applicant was accompanied by an order for his committal to prison in the event of his defaulting on payment. Those considerations were sufficient to establish that the offence of which the applicant was accused could be classified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that A 6 applied.

The applicant based his complaints on A 6, whereas the wording of the Austrian reservation mentioned only A 5 and made express reference solely to measures for the deprivation of liberty. Moreover, the reservation only came into play where both substantive and procedural provisions of one or more of the four specific laws indicated in it had been applied. Here, however, the substantive provisions of a different Act, the Tyrol Building Regulations Act 1978, were applied. The reservation in question did not therefore apply in the instant case.

Decisions taken by administrative authorities which did not themselves satisfy the requirements of A 6(1) had to be subject to subsequent control by a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. The Constitutional Court was not such a body. In the present case it could look at the impugned proceedings only from the point of view of their conformity with the Constitution, and that did not enable it to examine all the relevant facts. It accordingly lacked the powers required under A 6(1). The powers of the Administrative Court had to be assessed in the light of the fact that the court in this case was sitting in proceedings that were of a criminal nature for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that when the compatibility of those powers with A 6(1) was being gauged, regard had to be had to the complaints raised in that court by the applicant as well as to the defining characteristics of a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. Those included the power to quash in all respects, on questions of fact and law, the decision of the body below. As the Administrative Court lacked that power, it could not be regarded as a tribunal within the meaning of the Convention. It followed that the applicant did not have access to a tribunal. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6 on that point. Having regard to the conclusion above, it was not necessary to examine the complaints regarding the lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court and that court's failure to take evidence from witnesses.

Pressos Compania Naviera SA and Others v Belgium (1996) 21 EHRR 301 95/44

[Application lodged 4.1.1991; Commission report 4.7.1994; Court Judgment 20.11.1995]

The 26 applicants are shipowners, mutual shipping insurance associations and, in one case, an insolvency administrator whose ships were involved in casualties in Belgian or Netherlands territorial waters prior to 17 September 1988. As they considered that these casualties were the result of the negligence of the Belgian pilots on board the ships in question, they instituted legal proceedings, some of them against the Belgian State and Others against a private company offering pilot services. In March 1989 the applicants applied to the Court of Arbitration to have the Act of 30 August 1988 on the piloting of sea-going vessels declared void, in particular on the ground of its retrospective effect. The court dismissed the applications on 5 July 1990. Their appeals to the Court of Cassation were dismissed. They complained that by exempting the organiser of a pilot service from liability for negligence on the part of its staff and limiting the liability of the latter, the 1988 Act imposed on the applicants an excessive burden which upset the fair balance between the demands of the general interest and the requirements of the protection of their right to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. In addition, the retrospective effect of the Act deprived the applicants of their claims for compensation in respect of the damage sustained.

Comm found unanimously NV P1A1, by majority (11–6) V 6(1) except as regards the second applicant (14–3) V 6(1) and 12th applicant (16–1) V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck the sixth applicant's complaints out of the list, dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (8–1) V P1A1, not necessary to examine 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer (so), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev, Mr U Lôhmus.

The lawyers appointed by the applicants received no instructions from the sixth applicant and the Court therefore concluded that the sixth applicant did not intend to pursue its complaints. There was no public policy reason for continuing the proceedings in respect of the sixth applicant, whose complaints were similar to those of the other applicants. Accordingly, the complaints lodged by City Corporation were severed from those of the other applicants and struck out of the list.

Under A 26 the only remedies required to be exhausted were those that were effective and capable of redressing the alleged violation. In the Court of Arbitration, the first 24 applicants relied in substance on arguments that were virtually identical to those adduced before the Convention institutions. Regard being had to the rank and authority of the Court of Arbitration in the judicial system of Belgium, it could, in the light of that court's reasoning, be assumed that any other remedy of which the applicants could have availed themselves would have been bound to fail. The Government's preliminary objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies was accordingly dismissed.

In order to determine whether in this instance there was a 'possession', the Court had regard to the domestic law in force at the time of the alleged interference, as there was nothing to suggest that that law ran counter to the object and purpose of P1A1. The rules in question were rules of tort, under which claims for compensation came into existence as soon as the damage occurred. A claim of this nature constituted an asset and therefore amounted to a possession within the meaning of the first sentence of P1A1, which was accordingly applicable in the present case. On the basis of the judgments of the Court of Cassation, the applicants could argue that they had a legitimate expectation that their claims deriving from the accidents in question would be determined in accordance with the general law of tort. That was the position with regard to the accidents in issue, which all occurred before 17 September 1988, the date of the entry into force of the 1988 Act. Regarding an interference, the Court recalled its case-law. The 1988 Act exempted the State and other organisers of pilot services from their liability for negligent acts for which they could have been answerable. It resulted in an interference with the exercise of rights deriving from claims for damages which could have been asserted in domestic law up to that point and, accordingly, with the right that everyone, including each of the applicants, had to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. In so far as that Act concerned the accidents that occurred before 17 September 1988, the only ones in issue in the present proceedings, that interference amounted to a deprivation of property within the meaning of the second sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. National authorities enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in determining what was in the public interest. The notion of 'public interest' was necessarily extensive. An interference with the peaceful enjoyment of possessions had to strike a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. In particular, there had to be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised by any measure depriving a person of his possessions. Compensation terms under the relevant legislation were material to the assessment whether the contested measure respected the requisite fair balance and, notably, whether it imposed a disproportionate burden on the applicants. In this connection, the taking of property without payment of an amount reasonably related to its value would normally constitute a disproportionate interference and a total lack of compensation could be considered justifiable under P1A1 only in exceptional circumstances. The 1988 Act extinguished, with retrospective effect going back 30 years and without compensation, claims for very high damages that the victims of the pilot accidents could have pursued against the Belgian State or against the private companies concerned, and in some cases even in proceedings that were already pending. The financial considerations cited by the Government and their concern to bring Belgian law into line with the law of neighbouring countries could warrant prospective legislation in this area to derogate from the general law of tort. Such considerations could not justify legislating with retrospective effect with the aim and consequence of depriving the applicants of their claims for compensation. Such a fundamental interference with the applicants' rights was inconsistent with preserving a fair balance between the interests at stake. Therefore, in so far as the 1988 Act concerned events prior to 17 September 1988, the date of its publication and its entry into force, it breached P1A1.

The complaints under A 6(1) overlapped with those raised under P1A1 and having regard to the conclusions in that regard, it was not necessary to examine them separately under A 6.

Pretto and Others v Italy (1984) 6 EHRR 182 83/7

[Application lodged 27.7.1977; Commission report 14.12.1981; Court Judgment 8.12.1983]

Mr Rodolfo Pretto had farmed for more than 40 years with the help of members of his family. The other applicants were his wife Cesira Possia, his son Palmerino Pretto, his daughter-in-law Rita Zordan and his grandsons Andrea and Rodolfo Pretto. On 24 September 1971, Mr Pretto brought an action before the Vicenza Regional Court seeking the re-sale of land to him relying on his right of pre-emption. The Regional Court gave judgment for him on 21 March 1973. On 7 July 1973, the new owner appealed to the Venice Court of Appeal, which reversed the Regional Court's decision by a judgment of 8 October 1974. On 12 February 1975, Mr Pretto appealed on points of law to the Court of Cassation and the respondent lodged a cross-appeal. On 19 October 1976 the court dismissed Mr Pretto's appeal. The full text of the judgment was made public by being deposited in the Court of Cassation's registry on 5 February 1977. On 24 June 1977, the judgment was served on Mr Pretto by the respondent and thereupon became enforceable. The applicants complained of the fact that the judgment of 19 October 1976 by the Court of Cassation had not been pronounced publicly; they further objected to the length of the proceedings.

Comm found by majority (8–7) NV 6(1) as regards length of the proceedings, (12–3) NV 6(1) as regards public pronouncement of judgment.

Court found unanimously NV 6(1) as regards the absence of public pronouncement of the Court of Cassation's judgment, by majority (14–1) NV 6(1) as regards compliance with the reasonable time requirement.

The public character of proceedings before the judicial bodies referred to in A 6(1) protected litigants against the administration of justice in secret with no public scrutiny; it was also one of the means whereby confidence in the courts, superior and inferior, could be maintained. By rendering the administration of justice visible, publicity contributed to the achievement of the aim of A 6(1), namely a fair trial, the guarantee of which was one of the fundamental principles of any democratic society. The applicability of A 6 to the present facts was not disputed. Many Member States of the Council of Europe had a long-standing tradition of recourse to other means, besides reading out aloud, for making public the decisions of all or some of their courts, and especially of their courts of cassation, for example deposit in a registry accessible to the public. In each case the form of publicity to be given to the judgment under the domestic law of the respondent State had to be assessed in the light of the special features of the proceedings in question and by reference to the object and purpose of A 6(1). In order to determine whether the manner in which the Court of Cassation delivered its judgment met the requirements of A 6(1) account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings conducted in the Italian legal order and of the Court of Cassation's role therein. That role was confined to reviewing in law the decision of the Venice Court of Appeal and could dismiss the applicant's appeal or, alternatively, quash the previous judgment and refer the case back to the trial court. The Court of Cassation took its decision after holding public hearings and, although the judgment dismissing the appeal on points of law was not delivered in open court, anyone could consult or obtain a copy of it on application to the court. The object pursued by A 6(1) in that context, namely, to ensure scrutiny of the judiciary by the public with a view to safeguarding the right to a fair trial, was, as regards cassation proceedings, no less achieved by a deposit in the court registry, making the full text of the judgment available to everyone, than by a reading in open court of a decision dismissing an appeal or quashing a previous judgment, such reading sometimes being limited to the operative provisions. The absence of public pronouncement of the Court of Cassation's judgment therefore did not contravene the Convention in the present case.

The relevant period did not begin to run from the institution of proceedings before the Vicenza Regional Court on 24 September 1971 but only as from 1 August 1973, when the recognition by Italy of the right of individual petition took effect. However, in assessing the reasonableness of the time that elapsed after 31 July 1973, account had to be taken of the then state of proceedings. The closing date was 5 February 1977, the day when the judgment of 19 October 1976 was deposited in the registry of the Court of Cassation. The period was three years, six months and five days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in each instance according to the particular circumstances and having regard to the criteria enunciated in the Court's case-law. The case was of some complexity. Although no blame could be attached to him, the applicant was nevertheless responsible to a certain degree for the prolongation of the proceedings. Although the various delays on the part of the judicial authorities could probably have been avoided, they were not sufficiently serious to warrant the conclusion that the total duration of the proceedings was excessive. The permissible limit was therefore not overstepped.

Prinz v Austria 00/68

[Application lodged 28.3.1994; Commission report 20.5.1998; Court Judgment 8.2.2000]

On 4 October 1993 the Krems Regional Court ordered that Mr Josef Prinz, the applicant, be detained in an institution for mentally ill offenders. The Regional Court found that the applicant had intimidated numerous persons by threats of murder, but that he could not be held responsible because he was suffering from a mental illness. The applicant, assisted by his official defence counsel, filed a plea of nullity and lodged an appeal. Defence counsel did not file any grounds of appeal, and did not request that the applicant be permitted to attend the Supreme Court hearing. The applicant personally filed submissions with the Supreme Court. According to the applicant, he also unsuccessfully requested the Supreme Court for leave to attend the hearing of his plea of nullity and appeal. On 2 March 1994 the Supreme Court held the hearing on the plea of nullity and the appeal in the absence of the applicant, who was represented by his official defence counsel. The Supreme Court rejected the plea of nullity as well as the appeal. The applicant complained about the failure to allow his presence at the hearing of his plea of nullity and his appeal before the Supreme Court.

Comm found by majority V 6(1) and 6(3)(c).

Court unanimously joined Government's preliminary objection to the merits and found NV 6(1)+6(3)(c).

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

The scope of the case before the Court was determined by the Commission's decision on admissibility which in this case was limited to the complaint that, in criminal proceedings against him, the applicant was not present at the hearing before the Supreme Court.

The Court observed that the Government's arguments regarding non-exhaustion were closely linked to the well-foundedness of the applicant's complaint under A 6(1) and (3)(c). The plea was therefore joined to the merits.

A person charged with a criminal offence should, as a general principle based on the notion of a fair trial, be entitled to be present at the first-instance hearing. However, the personal attendance of the defendant did not necessarily take on the same significance for an appeal hearing. Even where an appellate court had full jurisdiction to review the case on questions both of fact and law, A 6 did not always entail rights to a public hearing and to be present in person. Regard had to be had in assessing this question to, inter alia, the special features of the proceedings involved and the manner in which the defence's interests were presented and protected before the appellate court, particularly in the light of the issues to be decided by it and their importance for the applicant. The nullity proceedings were primarily concerned with questions of law and the presence of the accused, who was legally represented, was not generally required. In this case, the applicant's plea of nullity related to procedural and legal matters, such as the dismissal of his requests for the taking of further evidence, as well as the legal reasoning. The applicant was represented by official defence counsel. There were no special circumstances warranting the applicant's personal presence, in particular no indication that the official defence counsel did not effectively ensure the applicant's defence. Accordingly, as far as the plea of nullity was concerned, the applicant's absence from the Supreme Court hearing was not in breach of A 6. With regard to the appeal, the Supreme Court examined whether the conditions for the applicant's placement in an institution for mentally ill offenders were met. The Supreme Court's task was limited to a review of the findings of the lower instance which had taken two expert psychiatric opinions and had heard the applicant directly. The applicant was not convicted, he was found not criminally responsible on account of his mental illness. As the Public Prosecutor did not appeal, the Supreme Court had no power to convict the applicant and to impose a regular prison sentence on him. Placement in an institution for mentally ill offenders was a preventive measure the necessity for which had to be reviewed at least once yearly. Having regard to the limited jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in the present case and taking into account what was at stake for the applicant, a deprivation of liberty subject to a yearly review in further court proceedings, the Court found that it was not essential to the fairness of the proceedings that the applicant be present at the hearing together with his official defence counsel. Given that the future dangerousness of a mentally ill person largely depended on the assessment by psychiatric experts, the Supreme Court could adequately review the Regional Court's decision on the basis of the case-file, including the two expert psychiatric opinions. The Supreme Court was not under a positive duty to ensure of its own motion the applicant's presence at the hearing to enable him to defend himself in person. The interests of the applicant who was, according to the court's findings, suffering from a mental illness were safeguarded through his legal representation. Having regard to the entirety of the proceedings before the Austrian courts, the nature of the issue before the Supreme Court and its limited jurisdiction in the present case, there were special features justifying the applicant's absence from the hearing of his appeal. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1) and 6(3)(c).

Privitera v Italy 99/113

The period to be taken into consideration began on 2 February 1981 and ended on 8 April 1997. It had lasted more than 16 years and two months at two levels of jurisdiction. There was in Italy a practice incompatible with the Convention, resulting from an accumulation of breaches of the reasonable time requirement. To the extent that the Court had found such breaches, that accumulation constituted circumstances aggravating the violation of A 6.

Probstmeier v Germany 97/35

[Application lodged 9.6.1992; Commission report 25.6.1996; Court Judgment 1.7.1997]

Mrs Mechthilde Probstmeier was the owner of a plot of land which she leased to the Munich Allotment Garden Association, which, in its turn, sub-let the land to individual tenants. On 20 February 1978 she brought proceedings in the Munich Regional Court seeking an order for possession against the Allotment Garden Association. On 19 April 1978 the Regional Court gave judgment against Mrs Probstmeier, who appealed to the Munich Court of Appeal. Her appeal was dismissed on 12 December 1983 and on 19 December 1983 she appealed to the Federal Court of Justice. On 25 April 1993 the Federal Court of Justice gave judgment against her. She complained of the length of proceedings in the Federal Constitutional Court.

The relevant criterion for determining whether proceedings before a constitutional court should be taken into account in order to establish whether the overall length of proceedings was reasonable was the question whether the result of those proceedings might influence the outcome of the proceedings in the ordinary courts. The present case concerned only the length of the proceedings in the Federal Constitutional Court. Proceedings came within the scope of A 6(1), even if they were conducted before a constitutional court, where their outcome was decisive for civil rights and obligations. The dispute before the civil courts concerned the applicant's right of property, which was certainly a civil right within the meaning of A 6. The proceedings in the Federal Constitutional Court were closely linked to those in the civil courts; not only was the former's decision directly decisive for the applicant's civil right, but in addition, as the proceedings arose from an application for a preliminary ruling, the Federal Court of Justice was obliged to wait for the Federal Constitutional Court's decision before it could give judgment. Accordingly A 6(1) was applicable to the proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration was only the time taken for the proceedings in the Federal Constitutional Court, which began on 24 May 1985 when the Federal Court of Justice made its application to the Federal Constitutional Court and ended on 23 September 1992 when the latter gave judgment. It therefore lasted seven years and four months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of each case and having regard in particular to the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties and the relevant authorities. The case was undoubtedly complex. The applicant was not responsible for any delay to the proceedings. A 6 imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements, including the obligation to hear cases within a reasonable time. A chronic overload, like the one the Federal Constitutional Court had laboured under since the end of the 1970s, could not justify an excessive length of proceedings. The Federal Court of Justice applied to the Federal Constitutional Court for a ruling in May 1985 and the proceedings remained pending there for more than seven years. Despite the complexity of the case, the length of the constitutional proceedings could not satisfy the reasonable time requirement laid down in A 6(1).

Procaccini v Italy 00/111

[Application lodged 13.3.1996; Commission report 23.4.1998; Court Judgment 30.3.2000]

Mrs Rina Procaccini was employed as a caretaker at a State school under fixed term contracts. She sought a declaration that there was an employment relationship of unlimited duration, continuation of the employment after the expiry of her current contract and payment of the difference between the remuneration received and that to which she claimed she was entitled. The Administrative Court rejected her claims in a judgment deposited with the registry in November 1997. She complained of the length of proceedings.

In order to determine the applicability of A 6(1) to public servants, whether established or employed under contract, a functional criterion should be adopted based on the nature of the person's duties and responsibilities and to ascertain if the post entailed direct or indirect participation in the exercise of powers conferred by public law and duties designed to safeguard the general interests of the State or of other public authorities. In this case the duties performed by the applicant as a caretaker had not entailed participation in the exercise of powers conferred by public law. A 6 was therefore applicable.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 2 March 1990 and ended on 24 November 1997. It had lasted more than seven years and eight months at one level of jurisdiction. That length could not be considered reasonable.

Procola v Luxembourg (1996) 22 EHRR 193 95/32

[Application lodged 22.11.1988; Commission report 6.7.1994; Court Judgment 28.9.1995]

Procola (the Agricultural Association for the Promotion of Milk Marketing) was a dairy constituted as an agricultural association under Luxembourg law. Following the introduction of the milk quota system in the Member States of the European Community, reference quantities for milk purchases were allocated. The applicant association appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Conseil d'Etat against the decisions fixing the reference quantities. In a judgment of 6 July 1988, the Judicial Committee dismissed the appeal. Four of the five members of the Judicial Committee had previously taken part in drawing up the Conseil d'Etat's opinion on the draft regulation and in framing the bill in issue. The applicant association complained that the Judicial Committee of the Conseil d'Etat was not an independent and impartial tribunal.

Comm found by majority (9–6) NV 6.

Court found unanimously A 6 applicable, V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Kûris.

Within the meaning of A 6, there was without any doubt a dispute concerning the determination of a right. A 6(1) was applicable where an action was 'pecuniary' in nature and was founded on an alleged infringement of rights which were likewise pecuniary rights, notwithstanding the origin of the dispute and the fact that the administrative courts had jurisdiction. Having regard to the close connection between the proceedings brought by Procola and the consequences that their outcome might have had for one of its pecuniary rights, and for its economic activities in general, the right in question was a civil one. A 6(1) was applicable in the case.

It was not necessary to determine whether the Judicial Committee was an independent tribunal. The applicant association did not put in doubt the method of appointing the Conseil d'Etat's members and the length of their terms of office or question that there were safeguards against extraneous pressure. The only issue to be determined was whether the Judicial Committee satisfied the impartiality requirement of A 6, regard being had to the fact that four of its five members had to rule on the lawfulness of a regulation which they had previously scrutinised in their advisory capacity. Four members of the Conseil d'Etat carried out both advisory and judicial functions in the same case. In the context of an institution such as Luxembourg's Conseil d'Etat, the mere fact that certain persons successively performed these two types of function in respect of the same decisions was capable of casting doubt on the institution's structural impartiality. In the instant case, Procola had legitimate grounds for fearing that the members of the Judicial Committee had felt bound by the opinion previously given. That doubt in itself, however slight its justification, was sufficient to vitiate the impartiality of the tribunal in question, and that made it unnecessary for the Court to look into the other aspects of the complaint. It followed that there had been a breach of A 6(1).

No causal link between breach of A 6(1) and dismissal of Procola's application by the Conseil d'Etat.

Proszak v Poland 97/94

[Application lodged 28.4.1994; Commission report 4.9.1996; Court Judgment 16.12.1997]

On 20 December 1988 Mrs Bronislawa Proszak was attacked and struck by her neighbour, Mr RT. On 29 November 1989 the Stalowa Wola District Court (Criminal Division) sentenced him to six months' imprisonment for assault and causing actual bodily harm. Mrs Proszak had not joined the proceedings as a civil party. On 25 October 1990 she brought a civil action against Mr RT in the Stalowa Wola District Court (Civil) seeking damages for injury resulting from the attack. She complained of the length of the civil proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found by majority (6–3) NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), President, Mr J De Meyer, Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland (d), Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (d), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr E Levits.

The period to be taken into consideration began not on 25 October 1990, when the application was made to the Stalowa Wola District Court, but only on 1 May 1993, when the declaration whereby Poland recognised the right of individual petition for the purposes of A 25 took effect. The period ended on 19 February 1997, when the appeal on points of law was dismissed by the Tarnobrzeg Regional Court. It therefore lasted about three years, nine months and two weeks. In order to determine the reasonableness of the length of time in question, regard had to be had, however, to the state of the case on 1 May 1993. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. In respect of the facts, the case was to some extent a complex one. Only delays attributable to the State could justify a finding of failure to comply with the reasonable time requirement. The applicant groundlessly challenged the reporting judge on three occasions, once even after judgment had been given at first instance. Her failures to attend the hearings and her refusal to attend for the third psychiatric examination contributed decisively to slowing down the proceedings. The applicant and her counsel seemed to have co-ordinated their actions poorly. The applicant's conduct was scarcely consistent with the diligence which had to be shown by the plaintiff in civil proceedings. Nor could the authorities dealing with the case be blamed for the lapse of more than one month between the lodging of the appeal on points of law and its dismissal for want of any legal basis. Almost the whole period falling within the court's jurisdiction ratione temporis was essentially taken up with the search for an expert with sufficient specialist qualifications. Experts worked in the context of judicial proceedings supervised by a judge, who remained responsible for the preparation and speedy conduct of proceedings. In the present case it was reasonable to take the view that a third opinion on the applicant's mental health was necessary. The District Court did everything possible to obtain it. The length of time complained of might at first sight seem excessive, but the evidence did not disclose any significant period of inactivity. The District Court even went so far as to offer to take evidence from the applicant at her home in view of her bad health. Furthermore, once the expert was appointed, the applicant refused to undergo examination on 23 January 1996 despite being requested to do so. Regard being had to all the circumstances of the case and, more particularly, to the part played by the applicant in the conduct of the proceedings, the length of time complained of could not be regarded as unreasonable. There had therefore not been a breach of A 6(1).

Protopapa and Marangou v Greece 00/107

[Application lodged 17.10.1997; Court Judgment 28.3.2000]

Mrs Patra Protopapa and Mrs Anna Marangou were the owners of a 50% share in a plot of land situated in Rhodes. On 8 November 1971 the Ministers of Finance and Culture and Sciences decided to expropriate the plot in question considering that it was of archaeological interest. The applicants lodged an application for judicial review. They complained that the length of the proceedings they instituted before the Council of State on 16 August 1993 gave rise to a violation of A 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr C Rozakis, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

In its admissibility decision the Court found that the proceedings in question involved a determination of the applicants' civil rights and obligations within the meaning of A 6(1).

The proceedings began on 16 August 1993, when the applicants lodged their application for judicial review, and were still pending. They had therefore lasted nearly six years and seven months. The reasonableness of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and with the help of the following criteria: the complexity of the case, the conduct of the parties and the conduct of the authorities dealing with the case. The case was not particularly complex and the applicants did not cause any delays. However, the Council of State decided to adjourn the examination of the case on several occasions. The Government had not provided any explanation for the seven month delay that resulted from those adjournments. The lawyers' strike to which both parties referred had ended in April 1993, ie, before the institution of the proceedings in question. There was a period of inactivity between the hearing of the applicant's judicial review application and the hearing before the European Court which had exceeded five years and eight months. The only explanation offered by the Government for that period of inactivity was the Council of State's case-load. It was for Contracting States to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could guarantee the right of everyone to obtain a final decision on disputes relating to civil rights and obligations within a reasonable time. The length of the proceedings failed to meet the reasonable time requirement and accordingly there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Prötsch v Austria 96/53

[Application lodged 12.6.1989; Commission report 5.4.1995; Court Judgment 15.11.1996]

Mr Ludwig and Mrs Maria Prötsch owned a farm. Agricultural land-consolidation proceedings were instituted by the Gmunden District Agricultural Authority in 1972. On 7 October 1980 the District Authority ordered the provisional transfer of the compensatory parcels on the basis of a draft consolidation scheme. The applicants appealed unsuccessfully against that order. On 26 January 1988 they applied for financial compensation in respect of the damage allegedly caused to them by the fact that they had received insufficient compensatory parcels by the provisional transfer. The District Authority rejected their claim. Their appeals to the Upper Austria Board, the Administrative Court and the Constitutional Court were all dismissed. They complained that their inability to obtain financial compensation for the loss of yield from the compensatory parcels provisionally allocated to them was in violation of P1A1.

Comm found by majority (9–2) V P1A1.

Court found unanimously NV P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr I Foighel, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek.

The Court referred to its long-established case-law. The transfer of land, whose lawfulness the applicants contested, could not amount, by the very essence of its provisional nature, to a 'deprivation of possessions', within the meaning of the second sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. The provisional transfer was essentially designed not to restrict or control the use of the land (second paragraph of A 1) but to achieve an early restructuring of the consolidation area with a view to improved, rational farming by the 'provisional owners'. The transfer therefore had to be considered under the first sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. The Court had to inquire whether a proper balance had been struck between the demands of the community's general interest and the requirements of protecting the fundamental rights of the individual. In that respect a temporary disadvantage sustained by an individual by reason of a measure taken in accordance with domestic law might in principle be justified in the general interest, if it was not disproportionate to the aim sought to be achieved by that measure. According to the relevant legislation, the purpose of consolidation was to improve the infrastructure and the pattern of agricultural holdings, by redistributing the land and providing communal facilities. As to the alleged inadequacy of those procedures which, in the applicants' submission, resulted in a decreased productivity of the compensatory parcels allocated to them and ensuing financial damage, it was open to the applicants to contest the lawfulness of that allocation once the consolidation scheme was published. In fact the applicants had appealed, although their complaints were rejected by the Upper Austria Board. Concerning the length of the consolidation proceedings, following an appeal by the applicants, a final scheme – including some improvement in respect of the applicants – came into force three years later. The status of provisional transfer was therefore maintained for a total of six years. In those circumstances, having regard to the statutory aim of the provisional transfer, a period of six years could not be considered, in itself, to be unreasonably long. The domestic authorities were able to examine the applicants' allegations of damage resulting from the provisional allocation of land which essentially corresponded to the situation arising from the consolidation. Their conclusion was invariably that the applicants had suffered no damage as a result of the consolidation measures. Having regard to all the circumstances, the interference with the applicants' right of property could not be held to be disproportionate to the demands of the general interest involved in the consolidation proceedings. Accordingly, no violation of P1A1 had been established.

Pudas v Sweden (1988) 10 EHRR 380 87/21

[Application lodged 30.3.1983; Commission report 4.12.1985; Court Judgment 27.10 1987]

Mr Bengt Pudas was granted by the County Administrative Board of Norrbotten in 1980 a taxi traffic licence and a licence to carry passengers and their goods on specified interurban routes. The licences were expressed to be valid until further notice. He commenced his combined taxi and interurban traffic business on 20 May 1980 with a Peugeot 505 and a seven-seater Citroën. On 2 April 1981, the County Traffic Company of Norrbotten filed an application with the County Administrative Board for a licence to provide interurban transport on routes including those covered by Mr. Pudas' second licence. The County Traffic Company at the same time requested that that licence be revoked, as well as a licence held by another individual. The applicant opposed the revocation of his licence. On 17 August 1981, the County Administrative Board granted the County Traffic Company a licence to provide interurban transport of passengers and goods on the routes indicated in its request and revoked the applicant's and the other individual's licences for interurban traffic. The applicant lodged an appeal with the Board of Transport which was rejected on 14 May 1982. He lodged a further appeal with the Government (Ministry of Transport and Communications) which was dismissed on 21 October 1982. He complained that the revocation of his licence violated P1A1 and that he did not have an effective remedy.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), no separate issue under A 13.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), not necessary to examine A 13 or P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr G Lagergren, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr J Gersing, Mr J De Meyer (so).

A 6(1) extended only to disputes over civil rights and obligations which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law; it did not in itself guarantee any particular content for civil rights and obligations in the substantive law of the Contracting States. On being granted a licence, the applicant acquired certain consequential rights. The licence conferred a 'right' on the applicant in the form of an authorisation to carry out a transport service in accordance with the conditions prescribed in it and laid down by domestic law. The applicant challenged not only the wisdom of the revocation as a matter of policy but also its lawfulness. The proceedings complained of were capable of leading – and did in the event lead – to confirmation of the decision being challenged, namely the revocation by the County Administrative Board of the applicant's licence; they were therefore directly decisive for the right at issue. The features of public law did not suffice to exclude from the category of civil rights under A 6(1) the rights conferred on the applicant by virtue of the licence. The dispute between the applicant and the Swedish authorities concerned a 'civil right'. A 6(1) was therefore applicable to the present case.

The Court had to ascertain whether the applicant enjoyed the guaranteed 'right to a court'. The dispute in question was determined by the Government (Ministry of Transport and Communications) in its capacity as authority of final instance. The Government's decision rejecting the applicant's appeals against the revocation of his licence by the County Administrative Board was not open to review as to its lawfulness by either the ordinary courts or the administrative courts, or by any other body which could be considered to be a 'tribunal' for the purposes of A 6(1). Holders of an interurban traffic licence could challenge the lawfulness of a revocation by requesting the Supreme Administrative Court to re-open the proceedings. However, that extraordinary remedy did not meet the requirements of A 6(1). There was accordingly a violation of A 6(1).

The Court found it unnecessary to examine the case under A 13 as its requirements are less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6(1).

The Court considered it was not called upon to examine whether there was jurisdiction or violation concerning a complaint under P1A1.

Pugliese v Italy (1992) 14 EHRR 413 91/10

[Application lodged 14.10.1985; Commission report 5.12.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991]

Mr Vincenzo Pugliese was a journalist. He was also the sole director of a company, SOGELAI, entrusted by the municipal council with the task of constructing a ski-lift as part of a tourist complex. The company fixed and marked out the boundaries of the land and, after unsuccessfully summoning the previous contractor company to remove from the land the materials it had placed there, removed them itself at the beginning of September 1981. On 17 September 1981 the previous contractor company lodged a complaint for trespass on its land against those who had marked out the boundaries and removed the materials. On 27 April 1982 the Borbona magistrates' sent the applicant a judicial notification informing him that criminal proceedings had been opened against him for the above-mentioned offences. On 5 October 1985 the magistrates' court sentenced the applicant to a fine and ordered him to pay damages. The applicant appealed and on 10 July 1987 the Rieti District Court pronounced an amnesty in application of the President of the Republic's decree of 16 December 1986. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 27 April 1982, the date on which the judicial notification was sent to the applicant. It ended on 10 July 1987 when the Rieti Court pronounced the amnesty. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The case was very simple. The applicant's conduct gave rise to hardly any delay and there were long periods of stagnation in the proceedings both at first instance and on appeal. The Court could not regard as reasonable in the instant case a lapse of time of more than five years and two months. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for A 50.

Pugliese (No 2) v Italy 91/31

[Application lodged 29.6.1985; Commission report 6.3.1990; Court Judgment 24.5.1991]

Mr Vincenzo Pugliese was a journalist. On 6 February 1984 he obtained from the President of the Rome District Court an order for payment against SOGELAI in respect of expenses incurred by him as a director of that company. He served the order on the company on 8 March 1984. On 26 March the company applied for the order to be set aside and summoned the applicant to appear before the Rome District Court on 25 June 1984. A Mrs F intervened in the case and put forward her own claim to the sum demanded by the applicant, maintaining that she had purchased his shares in the company. The judge fixed the hearing for 21 April 1987. The District Court declared the disputed order void and upheld Mrs F's claim to the sum in question. Accordingly, it ordered the company to pay it to Mrs F. The judgment was adopted on 22 May 1987 and filed with the registry on 10 July 1987. The judgment became final one year after it was pronounced, ie, on 10 July 1988. The applicant complained of the length of the civil proceedings brought against him by SOGELAI.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjälmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr SK Martens, Mr JM Morenilla.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 6 February 1984, the date of the order to pay, and ended on 10 July 1988 when the Rome District Court's judgment became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and of the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. Mrs F's intervention did not give rise to any special complexity. It was for the Contracting States to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet the reasonable time requirement. The time taken for the investigative stage did not appear excessive but the same could not be said of the period of almost two years (22 May 1985 to 21 April 1987) which then elapsed until the hearing before the trial court. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Claim for just satisfaction dismissed (no causal link between the violation found and either the alleged damage or any costs relating to the domestic proceedings. Regarding costs referable to the Court's proceedings, in which the applicant took no part, he had not specified any figure).

Pullar v United Kingdom (1996) 22 EHRR 391 96/22

Mr Robert Pullar had been an elected member of Tayside Regional Council. On 13 July 1992 he and another member of the Council were brought before the Perth Sheriff Court for trial on a charge under the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889. It was alleged that they had offered, in exchange for money, to vote for and to use their influence on the Council in favour of an application for planning permission made by Mr John McLaren, a partner in a firm of architects, and Mr Alastair Cormack, a partner in a firm of quantity surveyors. The latter two were the key prosecution witnesses. One of the members of the public selected for the jury at Mr Pullar's trial was Mr Brian Forsyth, a junior employee in Mr McLaren's firm. He had started working there on 30 April 1990 and had been given notice of redundancy on 10 July 1992 to take effect on 7 August 1992. On 17 July 1992 both defendants were convicted by a majority of the 15 jurors. On 6 August 1992 they were sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment and found incapable of holding any public office for five years from the date of conviction. Mr Pullar's lawyers became aware of the connection between Mr Forsyth and Mr McLaren after the verdict and appealed. The High Court of Justiciary dismissed the appeal on 26 February 1993. The applicant complained that his case was not heard by an independent and impartial tribunal and also that a statement of Mr McLaren prepared by the prosecution before the hearing of the appeal, was produced to the High Court of Justiciary without his being afforded the opportunity to test its veracity by examination or cross-examination.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (12–1) not necessary to consider 6(3)(d).

Court found by majority (5–4) NV 6(1) in relation to the composition of the jury, unanimously NV 6(1)+6(3)(d) in relation to the witness evidence produced to the High Court of Justiciary.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (pd), President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr A Spielmann (pd), Mr N Valticos, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha (pd), Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk (pd), Mr K Jungwiert.

The case concerned the determination of a 'criminal charge', and A 6(1) was therefore applicable. The jury which convicted the applicant formed part of a tribunal within the meaning of A 6(1). There were two aspects to the requirement of impartiality in A 6(1): first, the tribunal had to be subjectively impartial, that is, no member of the tribunal should hold any personal prejudice or bias. Personal impartiality was to be presumed unless there was evidence to the contrary. Secondly, the tribunal also had to be impartial from an objective viewpoint, that is, it had to offer sufficient guarantees to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. The view taken by the accused with regard to the impartiality of the tribunal could not be regarded as conclusive. What was decisive was whether his doubts could be held to be objectively justified. The principle of impartiality was an important element in support of the confidence which the courts must inspire in a democratic society. However, it did not necessarily follow from the fact that a member of a tribunal had some personal knowledge of one of the witnesses in a case that he would be prejudiced in favour of that person's testimony. In each individual case it had to be decided whether the familiarity in question was of such a nature and degree as to indicate a lack of impartiality on the part of the tribunal. On the facts (juror was a junior employee, had not worked on the project which was subject to the accusations and had been given notice of redundancy three days before the start of the trial), it was not clear that an objective observer would conclude that the juror would have been more inclined to believe Mr McLaren rather than the witnesses for the defence. In addition, the tribunal offered a number of important safeguards. Mr Forsyth was only one of 15 jurors, all of whom were selected at random from amongst the local population. The sheriff gave the jury directions to the effect that they should dispassionately assess the credibility of all the witnesses before them, and all of the jurors took an oath to a similar effect. Against that background, the applicant's misgivings about the impartiality of the tribunal which tried him could not be regarded as being objectively justified. There had therefore been no violation of A 6(1) in that regard.

The guarantees in A 6(3) were specific aspects of the right to a fair trial set forth in A 6(1). For that reason, it was appropriate to examine that complaint under the two provisions taken together. Although the High Court did not hear Mr McLaren in person, he should, for the purposes of A 6(3)(d), be regarded as a witness – a term to be given an autonomous interpretation – because his written statement was produced to the court, which took account of it. Mr McLaren's statement was not taken by the prosecuting authorities with the intention of placing it before the High Court. That step was only taken when it became apparent that the information contained in it might be helpful to the judges hearing the applicant's appeal. A number of courses of action were open to the applicant's counsel when the statement was produced. However, his counsel chose, at the material time, not to take any step to prevent the statement being accepted at face value by the High Court. In those circumstances, it could not be said that the applicant was denied his rights under A 6(3)(d) as a consequence of the manner in which the appeal hearing was conducted. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1) and (3)(d) taken together.

Punzelt v Czech Republic 00/129

[Application lodged 25.3.1993; Court Judgment 25.4.2000]

Mr Siegfried Punzelt, a German national, was wanted in Germany for fraud and forgery. On 10 December 1992 the Czech authorities took the applicant into custody with a view to his extradition to Germany. In April 1993, he was charged by the Czech authorities with fraud and remanded in custody. His detention was prolonged and his requests for release were rejected. On 10 January 1995 the City Court convicted the applicant of fraud and sentenced him to eight years' imprisonment and to expulsion from the Czech Republic. He appealed, and on 15 March 1995 the Court of Cassation quashed the conviction. On 16 January 1996 the City Court delivered a new judgment in which it again convicted the applicant of fraud. Having regard to the applicant's age and state of health, the City Court reduced the prison sentence and ordered the applicant's deportation from the Czech Republic. The applicant complained of the length of detention on remand.

Court found unanimously V 5(3) on account of the length of the applicant's detention on remand, NV 5(3) on account of the refusal to release the applicant on bail, NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs HS Greve.

The applicant's detention lasted from 23 April 1993, when he was remanded in custody, to 10 January 1995, the delivery of the first City Court's judgment. However, the Court could also examine the applicant's detention on remand between 15 March 1995 when the Court of Cassation quashed the first judgment delivered by the City Court and 16 January 1996, when the City Court delivered its second judgment. Accordingly, the detention to be taken into consideration lasted 2 years, 6 months and 18 days. The reasonableness of the length of detention had to be assessed in each case according to its special features. Continued detention might be justified in a given case only if there were clear indications of a genuine public interest which, notwithstanding the presumption of innocence, outweighed the right to liberty. It fell in the first place to the national judicial authorities to examine the circumstances for or against the existence of such an imperative interest, and to set them out in their decisions on the applications for release. It was essentially on the basis of the reasons given in those decisions, and of the facts established by the applicant in his appeals, that the Court was called upon to decide whether or not there had been a violation of A 5(3). The domestic courts relied on the seriousness of the charges, the danger that the proceedings would be obstructed if the applicant were released owing to his probable extradition to Germany in connection with other criminal proceedings, and the risk of his absconding and committing further offences as grounds for his continued detention. The Czech courts noted, in particular, that the applicant had earlier absconded from the criminal proceedings in Germany, that he had numerous business contacts abroad and that he risked a relatively heavy penalty. That reasoning was sufficient and relevant and outweighed the arguments put forward by the applicant. It was not therefore necessary to examine the other grounds for the applicant's detention relied on by the domestic courts. However, in the light of the delays and adjournment by the City Court, special diligence was not displayed in the conduct of the proceedings. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 5 (3) as a result of the length of the applicant's detention on remand.

Neither the repeated refusal of release on bail nor the eventual imposition of a security of CZK 30,000,000, given the scale of the applicant's financial transactions, infringed the applicant's rights under A 5(3). If the applicant had been granted bail, he would in any case have been redetained pending his extradition to Germany, any security paid would have had to be returned to him, and he could not have been extradited before the Czech proceedings had ended. Against that background, there had been no violation of A 5(3) as a result of the refusal to release the applicant on bail.

The criminal proceedings against the applicant were brought on 14 April 1993, when he was accused of fraud, and ended on 31 July 1996, when the Court of Cassation delivered the final decision. Accordingly, the period to be taken into consideration lasted three years, three months and 17 days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, regard being had to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the applicant's conduct and the conduct of the competent authorities. The case was not particularly complex. The applicant contributed to the length of the proceedings. There was no substantial period of inactivity for which the authorities could be held responsible. During the period under consideration, the case was examined twice by courts at two levels of jurisdiction. The hearings were held at reasonable intervals and adjourned only when it was necessary to obtain further evidence. The reasonable time requirement set out in A 6(1) and that contained in A 5(3) were to be distinguished from each other. Having regard to the circumstances of the case as a whole, the proceedings did not last an unreasonably long time. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

Pupillo v Italy 00/63

[Application lodged 3.5.1994; Court Judgment 8.2.2000]

Mr Vittorio Pupillo complained of the length of civil proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 15 June 1983 and ended on 20 April 1995. It had lasted more than 11 years and 10 months at one level of jurisdiction. The period could not be considered reasonable.

Putz v Austria 96/10

[Application lodged 23.9.1991; Commission report 11.10.1994; Court Judgment 22.2.1996]

Mr Wilhelm Putz, who was the manager of several commercial companies, was prosecuted in 1985 for, among other things, bankruptcy. During the proceedings the Wels Regional Court imposed several pecuniary penalties on him for disrupting court proceedings. His appeal to the Linz Court of Appeal was declared inadmissible as no appeal lay against the imposition of pecuniary penalties. On 25 February 1992 an appeal brought by the applicant against the Linz Court of Appeal's decision was declared inadmissible by the Supreme Court. He complained that he had had neither a fair hearing by an impartial tribunal nor any effective remedy in respect of the decisions of the Austrian courts whereby pecuniary penalties had been imposed on him for disrupting court proceedings.

Comm found by majority (10–6) V 6(1) and 6(3), unanimously not necessary to consider 13.

Court found by majority (7–2) A 6 not applicable to pecuniary penalties imposed on the applicant and accordingly NV 6, 13 NA and accordingly no breach of it.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J De Meyer (d), Mr AN Loizou, Mr D Gotchev, Mr K Jungwiert (d), Mr P Kûris.

In order to determine whether A 6 was applicable under its 'criminal' head, the Court had regard to the three alternative criteria laid down in its case-law. Regarding the legal classification of the offence in Austrian law, there was nothing to show that in the national legal system the provisions covering disruptions of court proceedings belonged to criminal law. Regarding the nature of the offence, the kind of proscribed conduct for which the applicant was fined in principle fell outside the ambit of A 6. The courts might need to respond to such conduct even if it was neither necessary nor practicable to bring a criminal charge against the person concerned. Regarding the nature and degree of severity of the penalty, the Code of Criminal Procedure concerning responsibility for keeping order at hearings provided for the imposition of a fine not exceeding ATS 10,000 or, where essential for maintaining order, a custodial sentence not exceeding eight days. The applicant was sentenced to pay fines of ATS 5,000, 7,500 and 10,000. Two of them were converted into prison sentences, but after payment the applicant did not have to serve these. Under the law, the fines were not entered in the criminal record, the court could only convert them into prison sentences if they were unpaid, and an appeal lay against such decisions, as it did against immediate custodial sentences, the term of imprisonment into which a fine could be converted could not exceed ten days. The penalties were designed to enable the courts to ensure the proper conduct of court proceedings. What was at stake for the applicant was not sufficiently important to warrant classifying the offences as 'criminal'. Therefore A 6 did not apply to the matters complained of and there had therefore been no breach of it.

A 13 guaranteed the availability of a remedy at national level to allege non-compliance with the substance of the Convention rights and freedoms in whatever form they might happen to be secured in the domestic legal order. In the present case, however, the Court had held that there was no 'criminal charge' and, accordingly, that A 6 did not apply. The applicant therefore could not claim to be the victim of a breach of rights protected by that provision. Consequently, his complaint lay outside the ambit of A 13.

Quadrelli v Italy 00/2

[Application lodged 10.5.1995; Commission report 9.9.1998; Court Judgment 11.1.2000]

Mr Tonino Quadrelli, the applicant, was an employee of the Italian Chamber of Commerce in Madrid. He was dismissed on 29 February 1980. He challenged his dismissal first before the Spanish courts. He then challenged it before the Italian courts. He was unsuccessful and his subsequent appeals were also dismissed. He lodged an appeal on points of law and was later advised that State Counsel had submitted that it was inadmissible. He filed a submission in response but his appeal on points of law was ruled inadmissible for being lodged after the expiry of the time-limit, no reference was made to the arguments in his pleadings.

Comm found by majority (15–2) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr M Fischbach, President, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Bonello (pd), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mr A Baka, Mr E Levits.

The case related to a challenge to a conciliation award regarding dismissal and A 6 therefore applied. The applicant's appeal on points of law was not limited to a procedural question but also attacked the lawfulness of the decision rejecting the appeal. Even if the proceedings had been limited to a preliminary question that would not have been enough to exclude the applicability of A 6. The applicant had the right to file a pleading for the purposes of the proceedings. It did not appear that the Court of Cassation had considered the applicant's pleadings. Taking into account what was at stake for the applicant in the proceedings and the nature of the State Counsel's submissions, the failure to examine the applicant's pleading was an infringement of his right to inter partes proceedings. In principle, this included the right of the parties to have any documents and observations which were submitted to the court with a view to influencing its decision produced and discussed. There had therefore been a violation of A 6.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage (by majority 6–1), costs and expenses (unanimously ITL 10,000,000).

Quaranta v Switzerland 91/30

[Application lodged 18.12.1986; Commission report 12.2.1990; Court Judgment 24.5.1991]

Mr Claudio Quaranta, an Italian national, was born in 1962 and arrived in Switzerland at a very young age, with his parents. He was an assistant plumber. Between 1975 and 1978 he was placed in various homes for juveniles. On 10 March 1985 the applicant appeared before an investigating judge in respect of drug offences. His request for free legal assistance was rejected. On 23 August 1985 he was committed for trial. On 17 October 1985 he repeated his request for free legal assistance, but on 30 October the President of the Criminal Court refused it. The hearing began on 12 November 1985 at 2.30 pm; it lasted only 25 minutes. The applicant appeared in person without the assistance of a lawyer. No representative of the public prosecutor's office participated in the court proceedings. The main documents in the file were read out, including the committal order. The applicant answered the President's questions and added a few words in his defence. The court found the applicant guilty of taking drugs and drug trafficking and sentenced him to six months' imprisonment. In addition, as he was on probation for offences committed in 1982, the court revoked the previous order and ordered the activation of the previous sentence. Through a lawyer, whose services he paid for himself, the applicant appealed to the Court of Criminal Cassation of the Vaud Cantonal Court. On 27 January 1986 the Criminal Court of Cassation dismissed the appeal. The applicant then lodged a public-law appeal with the Federal Court and sought free legal assistance in the proceedings before that court. On 5 December 1986 the Federal Court allowed his request for free legal assistance, but dismissed the appeal. On 21 July 1987 the applicant went to prison to serve his sentence, but the High Council of the Canton of Vaud accorded him a partial pardon by a decree of 18 November 1987. He complained that he had been the victim of A 6(3)(c).

Comm found unanimously V 6(3)(c).

Court found unanimously V 6(3)(c).

The right of an accused to be given, in certain circumstances, free legal assistance constituted one aspect of the notion of a fair trial in criminal proceedings. Sub-paragraph (c) attached two conditions to that right. The lack of sufficient means to pay for legal assistance was not in dispute in the present case. On the other hand, it was necessary to determine whether the interests of justice required that the applicant be granted such assistance. Contracting States enjoyed considerable freedom in the choice of the means of ensuring that their legal system satisfied the requirements of A 6. The task of the Court was to determine whether the method chosen by them led to results which were consistent with the requirements of the Convention. In order to determine whether the interests of justice required that the applicant receive free legal assistance, the Court had regard to various criteria. Consideration had to be given to the seriousness of the offence of which the applicant was accused and the severity of the sentence which he risked. The applicant was accused of use of and traffic in narcotics and was liable to imprisonment or a fine. Under the Swiss Criminal Code, the maximum sentence was three years' imprisonment, free legal assistance should have been afforded by reason of the mere fact that so much was at stake. An additional factor was the complexity of the case. The case did not raise special difficulties as regards the establishment of the facts, which the applicant had moreover admitted immediately. However, the outcome of the trial was of considerable importance for the applicant since the alleged offence had occurred during the probationary period to which he was previously made subject. The Criminal Court therefore had both to rule on the possibility of activating the suspended sentence and to decide on a new sentence. The participation of a lawyer at the trial would have created the best conditions for the accused's defence, in particular in view of the fact that a wide range of measures was available to the Court. Such questions, which were complicated in themselves, were even more so for the applicant on account of his personal situation: a young adult of foreign origin from an underprivileged background, without a real occupational training and with a long criminal record. He had taken drugs since and, at the material time, was living with his family on social security benefit. In the circumstances of the case, his appearance in person before the investigating judge, and then before the Criminal Court, without the assistance of a lawyer, did not enable him to present his case in an adequate manner. The defect was not cured either in the Criminal Court of Cassation of the Canton of Vaud, despite the presence of a lawyer paid by the applicant, or in the Federal Court, although he was accorded free legal assistance before that court, because of the limits on the scope of the review which could be carried out by those two courts. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(3)(c).

Quinn v France (1996) 21 EHRR 529 95/8

Mr Thomas Quinn was an American national living in Paris. He was arrested on 1 August 1988 and remanded in detention, charged with fraud, offences under the legislation on the issuing of securities and forgery of administrative documents. On 29 November, the investigating judge added to the initial charges the aggravating circumstance of fraud by a person having solicited the public for a savings scheme. His detention on remand was extended. He appealed to the Indictment Division of the Paris Court of Appeal against the order of 20 July 1989 extending his detention on remand. After holding a hearing on 2 August 1989, the Indictment Division set aside the contested order by a decision delivered in the applicant's absence at 9 am on 4 August. It directed that he should be 'released forthwith if he [was] not detained on other grounds'. The applicant was not released, however. His release was subject to the decision being notified by the public prosecutor responsible for its execution and to completion of the relevant formalities. Towards 5.30 pm on the same day, a Geneva investigating judge sent by fax to the Paris public prosecutor's office a request for the applicant's provisional arrest with a view to his extradition. It was accompanied by an international warrant issued by a Swiss judge for his arrest on charges of professional fraud and forging securities estimated at over USD 10 million. The Paris public prosecutor ordered the applicant's provisional arrest. The applicant, who was still detained in the prison, was arrested there. He was questioned by the prosecutor at around 8 pm and placed in detention with a view to extradition. His applications for release were all dismissed. He appeared before the Paris Criminal Court while in detention with a view to extradition. On 10 July 1991 he was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment and fined. On appeal, the Paris Court of Appeal reduced his sentence. He was extradited to Switzerland on 24 September 1992 after having completed his sentence. He complained of the unlawfulness and length of his detention.

Comm found unanimously V 5(1) on account of the applicant's detention on 4 August 1989 from 9 am to 8 pm, by majority (13–4) V 5(1) on account of his detention with a view to extradition, unanimously NV 5(3).

Court found unanimously V 5(1) on account of the applicant's continued detention on 4 August 1989 and by reason of the length of the applicant's detention with a view to extradition, NV 5(3), not necessary to examine 18.

The list of exceptions to the right to liberty secured in A 5(1) was an exhaustive one and only a narrow interpretation of those exceptions was consistent with the aim and purpose of A 5(1), namely to ensure that no one was arbitrarily deprived of his or her liberty. Some delay in executing a decision ordering the release of a detainee was understandable. However, in the instant case, the applicant remained in detention for 11 hours after the Indictment Division's decision directing that he be released 'forthwith', without that decision being notified to him or any move being made to commence its execution. His continued detention on 4 August 1989 was not covered by A 5(1)(c) and did not fall within the scope of any other of the sub-paragraphs of that provision. There had accordingly been a breach of A 5(1).

The detention with a view to extradition was in principle justified under sub-para (f) of A 5(1). A 5(1) required that the detention be 'lawful', which included the condition of compliance with a procedure prescribed by law. The national courts found that the contested detention was lawful in its initial stage and as regards its purpose. They could legitimately take account of the requirements of international mutual assistance in the judicial field. There was no evidence to suggest that the detention pending extradition pursued an aim other than that for which it was ordered and that it was pre-trial detention in disguise. The applicant's detention with a view to extradition was unusually long. He was detained in connection with the extradition proceedings from 4 August 1989 to 10 July 1991, almost two years. Thereafter he served the sentence imposed by the Paris Court of Appeal until 24 September 1992, on which date he was surrendered to the Swiss authorities pursuant to the order. The deprivation of liberty under this A 5(1)(f) would be justified only for as long as extradition proceedings were being conducted. It followed that if such proceedings were not being prosecuted with due diligence, the detention would cease to be justified under A 5(1)(f). At the different stages of the extradition proceedings, there were delays of sufficient length to render the total duration of those proceedings excessive. The detention with a view to extradition continued until 10 July 1991, well after the adoption of the extradition order, as the applicant's surrender to the Swiss authorities was postponed, on account of the criminal proceedings conducted in France at the same time. It was not the Court's role to determine what measures the national authorities should have taken in those circumstances to ensure that the detention pending extradition, which had already exceeded a reasonable time by 24 January 1991 (the date the Prime Minister granted the Swiss authorities' request for the extradition), did not last even longer, especially in view of the fact that such detention could not be deducted from the sentence imposed in France. There had accordingly been a violation of A 5(1) on this point too.

A 5(3) referred only to para 1(c) of A 5. It did not therefore apply to detention with a view to extradition within the meaning of A 5(1)(f). The position was different with regard to the applicant's detention on remand in connection with the French proceedings from 1 August 1988 to 4 August 1989, a period of one year. In the light of the circumstances of the case, the period was not excessive. In particular, there was no negligence on the part of the authorities, who acted with the necessary promptness. There had therefore been no violation of A 5(3).

Having found there was no evidence to substantiate the claim of an abuse of procedure, the Court did not consider it necessary to examine the same facts from the point of view of A 18.

R v United Kingdom (1988) 10 EHRR 74 87/16

[Application lodged 28.4.1983; Commission report 4.12.1985; Court Judgment 8.7.1987 (merits), 9.6.1988 (A 50)]

The applicant, had two children, A, born on 29 August 1979, and J, born on 9 October 1980. Following assaults from her partner, Mr B, her child A was put on an 'at-risk register' in 1979. Because of the violent and criminal conduct of Mr B and her circumstances, the applicant, on the advice of the Social Services, placed A in voluntary care with short-term foster parents employed by its Social Services Department. A was returned home in November, but the situation with Mr B did not improve. During a period in hospital in February 1981, the applicant and Mr B decided that since he was incapable of looking after the children, they should be put into the voluntary care of the local authority, which placed them with foster parents. The applicant moved into a women's refuge. Following a case conference held in March 1981, in the absence of the applicant, who had not been informed of the meeting, the Authority decided to place J, in addition to A, on the 'at-risk register' in view of the uncertainty of the family's position. On 26 March, A and J were discharged from care and went to live with the applicant at the refuge. During a discussion on 2 April 1981, the two social workers responsible for the case agreed that an application should be made to assume the applicant's parental rights. The applicant was not contacted by the authority in respect of this discussion. On 10 August 1981, Mr B got drunk and broke into a safe in a hospital where he and the applicant had started voluntary work. They were both subsequently arrested and charged. On 14 September the applicant was sentenced to six months' imprisonment which, on 9 October, following an appeal to the Crown Court, was reduced to probation. Mr B was imprisoned until June 1982, and there was no further contact between him and the applicant. At a case conference on 25 August 1981, the authority took the contingent decision that if the parental rights resolution did not lapse, because the applicant either withdrew her objection or failed in challenging it before the juvenile court, her access to A and J would be stopped and they would be placed for adoption with long-term foster parents. The applicant was not notified of the conference or its outcome and the fact that this decision was taken was only revealed subsequently. On 29 September 1981 she withdrew her objection to the parental rights resolution. On her release from prison on 9 October, the applicant asked to see her children but was refused. The children were placed with long-term foster parents in December. The applicant, who had last seen A and J on 13 September 1981, did not see them again until April 1986. Her further application to the juvenile court for the discharge of the parental rights resolution was rejected and her appeal to the High Court was dismissed. The applicant complained about various aspects of the Authority's decisions concerning A and J and the absence of any remedy for challenging those decisions before a court.

Comm found by majority (12–3) V 6(1) in that the applicant was denied access to court for the determination of her civil right of access to A and J, unanimously V 8 in that the procedures which were applied in reaching the decisions to terminate the applicant's access to A and J did not respect her family life, by majority (12–2 with one abstention) no separate issue under 13.

Court found unanimously V 8, V 6(1), not necessary to examine 13.

Judges (merits and A 50 (unanimous)): Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr G Lagergren (jo), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (jo), Mr L-E Pettiti (jo), Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald (jo), Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing (c), Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (jo/so), Mr N Valticos (jo).

The present judgment was not concerned with the merits of the judicial or local authority decisions regarding the applicant's children. The scope of the case before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The Court was not in the circumstances competent to examine or comment on the justification for such matters as the taking of the children into public care or the restriction or termination of the applicant's access to them.

The exercise of parental rights and the mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted fundamental elements of family life. The natural family relationship was not terminated by reason of the fact that the child was taken into public care. The Authority's decisions resulting from the procedures at issue amounted to interferences with the applicant's right to respect for her family life. The Authority's decisions were in accordance with the law and pursued a legitimate aim, namely the protection of health or of the rights and freedoms of others. The authorities were allowed a measure of discretion in this area. Predominant in the consideration of the case had to be the fact that the decisions might prove to be irreversible. The relevant considerations to be weighed by a local authority in reaching decisions on children in its care had to include the views and interests of the natural parents. What had to be determined was whether, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case and the serious nature of the decisions to be taken, the parents had been involved in the decision-making process, seen as a whole, to a degree sufficient to provide them with the requisite protection of their interests. If they had not, there would have been a failure to respect their family life and the interference resulting from the decision would not be capable of being regarded as 'necessary' within the meaning of A 8. The evidence revealed an insufficient involvement of the applicant in the authority's decision-making process. The decisions of April and of August 1981 were crucial for the future of A and J, in that the former altered the whole basis of the relationship between them, their mother and the authority and the latter could have been a stepping-stone on the road to the children's possible adoption. They were thus decisions in which the applicant should have been closely involved if she was to be afforded the requisite consideration of her views and protection of her interests. There was no reason for not involving the applicant more closely in the April 1981 decision. With regard to the decision of August 1981, she had been involved in the incident concerning the theft from the hospital safe, although she had been released on bail. In addition the decision was only contingent, depending on the outcome of the applicant's challenge to the parental rights resolution. There had been a delay in advising her of the decision which could have affected the decision on whether to withdraw her objection to the resolution. The delays in the subsequent court proceedings were relevant but subsidiary, factors. In the circumstances and notwithstanding the UK's margin of appreciation in this area, there had been a violation of A 8.

Regarding the applicability of A 6, it could be said, at least on arguable grounds, that even after the adoption of the parental rights resolution the applicant could claim a right in regard to her access to A and J. There was clearly a dispute between the applicant and the authority on the access question. The parental right of access was a civil right. A 6(1) was therefore applicable in the present case. There would be no possibility of a determination in accordance with the requirements of A 6(1) of the parent's right in regard to access, unless he or she could have the local authority's decision reviewed by a tribunal having jurisdiction to examine the merits of the matter. It did not appear from the material supplied by the Government (applying for judicial review or of instituting wardship proceedings) or otherwise available to the Court that the powers of the English courts were of sufficient scope to satisfy fully this requirement during the currency of the parental rights resolution. There was accordingly a violation of A 6(1).

Having regard to the decision on A 6(1) it was not necessary to examine the case under A 13 as its requirements were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary damage (GBP 8,000). Claim for costs and expenses struck out of list following friendly settlement between the Government and applicant (GBP 6,007.91 less amounts received from Council of Europe by way of legal aid).

RMD v Switzerland (1999) 28 EHRR 224 97/74

[Application lodged 26.3.1992; Commission report 11.4.1996; Court Judgment 26.9.1997]

Mr RMD, the applicant, was arrested at the request of the Willisau district authority (Canton of Lucerne) and held in custody at Uster (Canton of Zürich) on 13 January 1992. Being suspected of having committed offences in several cantons, he was successively detained in the cantons of Zürich, Lucerne, Berne, Glarus, St Gall, Schwyz, Zürich, Aargau and Zürich again in connection with the procedure for 'amalgamation' of judicial investigations, before ultimately being released on 13 March 1992. His counsel made a number of unsuccessful applications to the various cantons for his release. On 23 January 1992 his counsel appealed to the Lucerne Court of Appeal against the detention order issued on 17 January and applied for his client's immediate release. On 27 January 1992 the Lucerne Court of Appeal struck out the appeal on the ground that it had become devoid of purpose because, as the applicant had been transferred on 21 January to Aarwangen and on 24 January to Glarus, the detention order made on 17 January had lapsed. On 31 January 1992 his counsel lodged a public-law appeal with the Swiss Federal Court against the judgment of the Lucerne Court of Appeal. That appeal was dismissed on 12 February 1992 as, when the applicant had lodged his appeal, he was no longer in detention in the Canton of Lucerne. The applicant complained that the failure by the Lucerne Court of Appeal and the Swiss Federal Court to consider the merits of his appeal against detention pending trial had infringed A 5(4).

Comm found unanimously V 5(4).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 5(4).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr N Valticos (c), Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr K Jungwiert.

The Government's preliminary objection of exhaustion of domestic remedies and the merits of the applicant's complaint under A 5(4) were closely linked and consequently were joined in the Court's consideration of the case.

The question whether a person's right under A 5(4) to obtain a speedy court decision on the lawfulness of his detention has been respected has to be determined in the light of the circumstances of each case. The applicant had been detained for two months in seven different cantons. The Lucerne Court of Appeal had struck out the appeal and the Federal Court had dismissed the applicant's appeal. The applicant was unable in those proceedings to obtain a decision on the lawfulness of his detention. He had therefore exhausted domestic remedies since, in the appeal to the Federal Court, his counsel referred to A 5(4) and asked the Federal Court to direct the Lucerne Court of Appeal to order his client's immediate release. The applicant could not be criticised for failing to take all possible steps he had not already taken in the various cantons where he was held in order to obtain a ruling on his pre-trial detention. In that connection, realistic account had to be taken not only of the existence of formal remedies in the legal system of the Contracting Party concerned but also of the context in which they operated and the personal circumstances of the applicant. The applicant was in a position of great legal uncertainty. In the light of the procedure for 'amalgamating' the proceedings against him, he had to expect to be transferred from one canton to another at any moment, in which eventuality the courts of the transferring canton no longer had jurisdiction to decide the lawfulness of his detention; that rendered any remedy ineffective. He could have applied for release in the cantons of Glarus, St Gall and Aargau, where he was detained for 11, 18 and 10 days respectively. However, he was at that time still waiting for the judgment of the Lucerne Court of Appeal and of the Federal Court, and he was expecting to be transferred to another canton at any moment. Regard being had to the time that such applications took, to the practical difficulties that persons held in custody might encounter in arranging effective representation and to the resulting feeling of helplessness, the applicant could not be blamed for failing to avail himself of those remedies. With regard to the Government's submission of pursuing an action in damages, the right to a speedy decision on the lawfulness of detention was to be distinguished from the right to receive compensation for such detention. The problem was not that remedies were unavailable in each of the cantons, but that they were ineffective in the applicant's particular situation. Having been successively transferred from one canton to another, he was unable, owing to the limits of the cantonal courts' jurisdiction, to obtain a decision on his detention from a court, as he was entitled to do under A 5(4). The explanation lay in the federal structure of the Swiss Confederation, in which each canton had its own code of criminal procedure, and it was not for the Court to express a view on the system as such. However, those circumstances could not justify the applicant being deprived of his rights under A 5(4). Where a detained person was continually transferred from one canton to another, it was for the State to organise its judicial system in such a way as to enable its courts to comply with the requirements of that Article. Therefore the Government's preliminary objection was dismissed and on the merits there had been a violation of A 5(4).

Radio ABC v Austria (1998) 25 EHRR 185 97/78

Radio ABC was a non-profit-making association whose registered address was in Vienna. On 28 August 1989 it applied to the Post and Telecommunications Regional Head Office for Vienna, Lower Austria and Burgenland for a licence to set up and operate a radio station and for allocation of a frequency on which it could broadcast programmes to the Vienna region. On 9 January 1990 the Regional Head Office refused the application as activities of that type had to be authorised by federal legislation, and such legislation had been enacted only in respect of the Austrian Broadcasting Corporation. The National Head Office dismissed his appeal on 25 September 1990 and the Constitutional Court refused to consider the application. After the entry into force, on 1 January 1994, of the Regional Broadcasting Law, the applicant association lodged further applications which were also refused. The applicant association complained that the refusal to grant it an operating licence constituted an unjustified interference with its right to impart information and was in breach of A 10 of the Convention.

The restriction complained of amounted to an 'interference' with the applicant association's exercise of its freedom to impart information and ideas. The interference complained of was prescribed by law. Its aim had already been held by the Court to be a legitimate one; through the supervisory powers over the media it conferred on the authorities, the monopoly system operated in Austria was capable of contributing to the quality and balance of programmes and was consistent with the third sentence of para 1 of A 10. In assessing the need for an interference, the Contracting States enjoyed a margin of appreciation, but that margin went hand in hand with European supervision. In the first period (from the application to the Post and Telecommunications Regional Head Office on 28 August 1989 to the entry into force of the Regional Broadcasting Law on 1 January 1994) there was no legal basis whereby an operating licence could be granted to any station other than the Austrian Broadcasting Corporation. Accordingly, there was a breach of A 10 during the period in question. In the second period (from the entry into force of the Regional Broadcasting Law on 1 January 1994 to the Constitutional Court's judgment declaring certain provisions of that Law null and void on 27 September 1995), the judgment had put the applicant association back in the legal situation which had obtained before the law's entry into force, thus prolonging the violation of A 10 already found in connection with the first period. In the third period (from the Constitutional Court's judgment on 27 September 1995 to the entry into force of the amendments to the new Regional Broadcasting Law on 1 May 1997), the judgment not only invalidated the decisions refusing the applicant association's applications, it also prevented any further application of the Regional Broadcasting Law pending the entry into force of the amendments. Accordingly, the violation of A 10 already found in connection with the first two periods continued during the third. Regarding the fourth period (since the entry into force of the amendments to the Regional Broadcasting Law on 1 May 1997), as the amended version of the Regional Broadcasting Law had not yet been applied to the applicant association, which had not submitted a licence application either, the Court was not required to rule on that fourth period. In conclusion, there had been a breach of A 10.

Raimondo v Italy (1994) 18 EHRR 237 94/3

Mr Giuseppe Raimondo was a building entrepreneur. Criminal proceedings were brought against him as he was suspected of belonging to a mafia-type organisation operating in the Soverato region. On 24 July 1984 the Catanzaro Public Prosecutor issued a warrant for his arrest, he gave himself up to the authorities on 7 November 1984 and was immediately remanded in custody. The investigation was closed on 24 July 1985 and he was committed for trial in the District Court. His detention on remand was replaced by house arrest. On 30 January 1986 the District Court acquitted the applicant on the ground of insufficient evidence and revoked the order placing him under house arrest. Following appeal, on 16 January 1987 the Catanzaro Court of Appeal acquitted the applicant on the ground that the material facts of the offence had not been established. At the same time various preventive measures were taken concerning him. On 16 January 1985 the Catanzaro Public Prosecutor applied to the District Court for an order placing the applicant under special police supervision and for the preventive seizure of a number of assets with a view to their possible confiscation. On 13 May 1985 the District Court ordered the seizure of 16 items of real property (10 plots of land and six buildings) and of six vehicles, all of which appeared to be at the applicant's disposal. The measure was entered in the relevant public registers on 15 May 1985. On 16 October the District Court revoked the seizure of certain property belonging to third parties but ordered the confiscation of some of the buildings seized and four vehicles. The confiscation was recorded in the register on 9 November 1985. The applicant was placed under special police supervision, which however did not become effective until 30 January 1986, the day on which he was acquitted by the District Court; he had to provide security in respect of supervision conditions. On an appeal by the applicant, the Catanzaro Court of Appeal on 4 July 1986 annulled the special supervision measure and ordered the restitution of the security and the property seized and confiscated. The decision was filed with the registry on 2 December 1986 and signed by the relevant official of the prosecuting authority on 10 December. The applicant was informed on 20 December. The decision became final on 31 December 1986. The revocation of the seizure of the real property and of the confiscation of the vehicles was entered in the relevant registers on 2 February (real property), 10 February (two cars and a van) and 10 July 1987 (a lorry). The security was returned to the applicant on 24 April 1987. Regarding the real property that had been confiscated, the applications for the entry in the register of the revocation of the measure were dated 9 August 1991. The applicant complained, inter alia, of the length of various proceedings concerning him, an interference with his property resulting from the seizure and confiscation of certain of his possessions and the fact that he had been deprived of his right to freedom of movement.

Comm found by majority NV P1A1 with regard to the seizure (18–1) and the confiscation (16–3) of the applicant's property up to 31 December 1986 and on account of the damage occasioned by the administration of the seized and confiscated assets until that date (18–1), unanimously V P1A1 in so far as the confiscation of nine items of real property and one lorry had continued to take effect after 31 December 1986, unanimously V P4A2 inasmuch as the applicant had been deprived of his right to freedom of movement from 4 July to 20 December 1986, NV 6(1) as regards the length of the proceedings relating to the seizure and confiscation.

Court found unanimously NV P1A1 either in respect of the seizure and confiscation of the applicant's property up to 31 December 1986 or in respect of the damage occasioned by those measures, V P1A1 inasmuch as the confiscation, on 16 October 1985, of a lorry and nine items of real property remained entered in the relevant registers after 31 December 1986, NV P1A1 in respect of other matters, V P4A2 in so far as the special police supervision of the applicant continued after 2 December 1986, 6 not applicable to the special supervision, NV 6 as regards the length of the confiscation proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr F Bigi, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev.

There had been an interference with the applicant's right to peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. The seizure was provided for in legislation and did not purport to deprive the applicant of his possessions, but only to prevent him from using them. It was therefore the second paragraph of P1A1 which was relevant. Seizure under relevant domestic measure was a provisional measure intended to ensure that property which appeared to be the fruit of unlawful activities carried out to the detriment of the community could subsequently be confiscated if necessary. The measure was therefore justified by the general interest and, in view of the extremely dangerous economic power of an organisation like the Mafia, it could not be said that taking it at that stage of the proceedings was disproportionate to the aim pursued. Accordingly no violation of P1A1 had been established on that point.

The confiscation pursued an aim that was in the general interest, namely, it sought to ensure that the use of the property in question did not procure for the applicant, or the criminal organisation, advantages to the detriment of the community. Confiscation, which was designed to block movements of suspect capital, was an effective and necessary weapon in the combat against crime. It therefore appeared proportionate to the aim pursued, all the more so as it entailed no additional restriction in relation to seizure. The preventive purpose of confiscation justified its immediate application notwithstanding any appeal. The respondent State did not therefore overstep the margin of appreciation left to it under the second paragraph of P1A1. Any seizure or confiscation inevitably entailed damage. The applicant's allegations did not provide a sufficiently clear basis for examining whether the actual damage sustained in the present case exceeded such inevitable damage. Therefore no violation of P1A1 had been established.

The possessions in question were returned to the applicant on 2 February 1987, two months after the Court of Appeal's decision was filed with the registry. No interference occurred in relation to the real property seized on 13 May 1985 and three of the vehicles confiscated on 16 October 1985, as the requisite entries were made rapidly, on 2 and 10 February 1987. However, there was an interference as regards the lorry and the nine items of real property confiscated on 16 October 1985 inasmuch as the entry concerning the lorry was not made until 10 July 1987 and that concerning the real property not until after 9 August 1991. It was not for the Court to determine who should have taken the appropriate steps in this case, however the responsibility of the public authorities was engaged. There had been delays of more than seven months and of four years and eight months before regularising the legal status of some of the applicant's possessions. That interference was neither provided for by law nor necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest within the meaning of P1A1. Accordingly, there had been a violation of that provision.

The special police supervision did not amount to a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of A 5. The restrictions on the liberty of movement resulting from special supervision fell to be dealt P4A2. In view of the threat posed by the Mafia to democratic society, the measure was necessary for the maintenance of public order and for the prevention of crime. It was in particular proportionate to the aim pursued, up to the moment at which the Catanzaro Court of Appeal decided, on 4 July 1986, to revoke it. Even if the decision could not acquire legal force until it was filed with the registry, there was a delay of nearly five months in drafting the grounds for a decision which was immediately enforceable and concerned a fundamental right, namely the applicant's freedom to come and go as he pleased and the applicant was moreover not informed of the revocation for 18 days. Therefore, at least from 2 to 20 December 1986, the interference in issue was neither provided for by law nor necessary. There had accordingly been a violation of P4A2.

With regard to the length of the proceedings relating to the appeal against the confiscation and the special supervision, the period to be taken into consideration began on 16 October 1985, the date on which the Catanzaro District Court ordered the measures in question and ended on 31 December 1986, when the decision of the Court of Appeal became final. It therefore lasted one year, two months and two weeks. Special supervision was not comparable to a criminal sanction because it was designed to prevent the commission of offences. It followed that proceedings concerning it did not involve 'the determination of a criminal charge'. Regarding the confiscation, A 6 applied to any action whose subject matter was pecuniary in nature and which was founded on an alleged infringement of rights that were likewise of a pecuniary character. That was the position in the instant case. Having regard to the fact that the case came before two domestic courts, the Court did not consider the total length of the proceedings to have been unreasonable. It followed that there had been no violation of A 6.

Raninen v Finland (1998) 26 EHRR 563 97/76

Mr Kaj Raninen was called up for military service but objected to performing any kind of military or substitute civilian service. As a consequence he was arrested, detained on remand, prosecuted and sentenced to imprisonment on several occasions. On 5 October 1992 he was discharged from his military service for one year. On 16 February 1993 the applicant lodged a petition with the Parliamentary Ombudsman complaining in particular about the deprivation of his liberty and his handcuffing while being transported to the prison. The Ombudsman considered that the applicant's arrest on 18 June 1992 had lacked a legal basis. He complained of the deprivation of his liberty and treatment by the authorities.

Comm found by majority (20–10) V 3, (23–7) no separate issue under 8, unanimously V 5(1) and no separate issue under 5(2).

Court by majority (6–3) dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously V 5(1), not necessary to examine 5(2), NV 3, by majority (7–2) NV 8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr I Foighel (pd), Mr R Pekkanen (pd), Mr A N Loizou, Mr J M Morenilla (jpd), Mr M A Lopes Rocha, Mr J Makarczyk (jpd), Mr K Jungwiert (jpd).

The rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies in A 26 required an applicant to have normal recourse to remedies within the national legal system which were available and sufficient to afford redress in respect of the breaches alleged. The existence of the remedies in question had to be sufficiently certain not only in theory but in practice, failing which they would lack the requisite accessibility and effectiveness. There was no obligation to have recourse to remedies which were inadequate or ineffective. The Government had not demonstrated that either a criminal prosecution or an action for damages would in the specific circumstances of the case have offered reasonable prospects of success. Accordingly, the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was dismissed.

The applicant's arrest and detention during his transportation by the military police from the prison to the Pori barracks on 18 June 1992 was contrary to national law. Accordingly his deprivation of liberty was not lawful under A 5(1). It was not established that the applicant was unlawfully deprived of his liberty following his arrival at the barracks, in breach of A 5(1).

In view of the conclusion that the applicant's arrest failed to comply with Finnish law and thus gave rise to a breach of A 5(1), it was not necessary to examine the complaint under A 5(2).

A 3 prohibited in absolute terms torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, irrespective of the victim's conduct. In order to fall within the scope of A 3, the ill-treatment had to attain a minimum level of severity, the assessment of which depended on all the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment, its physical or mental effects and, in some cases, the sex, age and state of health of the victim, etc. In considering whether a punishment or treatment was degrading within the meaning of A 3, the Court would have regard to whether its object was to humiliate and debase the person concerned and whether, as far as the consequences were concerned, it adversely affected his or her personality in a manner incompatible with A 3. The public nature of the punishment or treatment might be a relevant factor. However, the absence of publicity would not necessarily prevent a given treatment from falling into that category: it may well suffice that the victim was humiliated in his or her own eyes, even if not in the eyes of others. Handcuffing did not normally give rise to an issue under A 3 where the measure had been imposed in connection with lawful arrest or detention and did not entail use of force, or public exposure, exceeding what was reasonably considered necessary in the circumstances. In that regard, it was of importance for instance whether there was reason to believe that the person concerned would resist arrest or abscond, cause injury or damage or suppress evidence. The handcuffing of the applicant had not been made necessary by his own conduct. Apart from the fact that the measure was itself unjustified, it had been imposed in the context of unlawful arrest and detention. In addition, he had, albeit only briefly, been visible to the public on his entering the military police vehicle outside the prison gate. He claimed that he had felt humiliated by appearing handcuffed in front of members of his support group. Those considerations were no doubt relevant for the purposes of determining whether the contested treatment was degrading within the meaning of A 3. However, the Court was not convinced by the applicant's allegation that the event of 18 June 1992 had adversely affected his mental state. There was nothing in the evidence to suggest that a causal link existed between the impugned treatment and his undefined psychosocial problem. Nor had the applicant made out his allegation that the handcuffing was aimed at debasing or humiliating him and it had not been contended that the handcuffing had affected the applicant physically. Therefore, it was not established that the treatment in issue attained the minimum level of severity required by A 3. There had accordingly been no violation of that provision.

The notion of private life was a broad one and was not susceptible to exhaustive definition; it might, depending on the circumstances, cover the moral and physical integrity of the person. Those aspects of the concept extended to situations of deprivation of liberty. Moreover, it did not exclude the possibility that there might be circumstances in which A 8 could be regarded as affording a protection in relation to conditions during detention which did not attain the level of severity required by A 3. The applicant based his complaint under A 8 on the same facts as that under A 3, which the Court had considered and found not to have been established in essential aspects. The Court did not consider that there were sufficient elements enabling it to find that the treatment complained of entailed such adverse effects on his physical or moral integrity as to constitute an interference with the applicant's right to respect for private life as guaranteed by A 8. Accordingly, there was no violation of this provision either.

Rasmussen v Denmark (1985) 7 EHRR 371 84/15

Mr Per Krohn Rasmussen worked as a clerk. He was married in 1966. During the marriage, two children were born, a boy in 1966 and a girl, Pernille, on 20 January 1971. The applicant had grounds, even before the latter's birth, for assuming that another man might be the father; however, in order to save the marriage, he took no steps to have paternity determined. In June 1973, he and his wife applied for a separation, which they obtained on 9 August. Mrs Rasmussen retained custody of the children and the applicant paid for maintenance. In June 1975, the applicant and his wife applied for a divorce, which was granted on 16 July. On 27 January 1976 the applicant sought leave from the Eastern Court of Appeal to institute proceedings out of time to determine the paternity of the girl. The Court of Appeal refused the application on 12 April 1976, for the reason that the statutory conditions for granting leave at that time were not satisfied. The applicant did not appeal against the decision within the statutory time-limit. However, on 27 July 1976, he petitioned the Ministry of Justice for leave to appeal out of time to the Supreme Court but this was refused on 3 September 1976. On 20 November 1978, the applicant applied again to the Court of Appeal for leave to institute paternity proceedings. His former wife opposed the application, on the ground that such proceedings would have a detrimental effect on the child. By a decision of 11 December 1978, the Court of Appeal refused the application for the reason that the applicant had not brought the action contesting paternity within the time-limits provided. A similar decision was given by the Supreme Court on 12 January 1979. The applicant complained that he had been subjected to discrimination based on sex in that his right to contest his paternity of a child born during the marriage was subject to time-limits, whereas his former wife was entitled to institute paternity proceedings at any time.

Comm found by majority (8–5) V 14+6 and 14+8.

Court unanimously found NV 14+6, NV 14+8.

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr W Ganshof van der Meersch, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Matscher, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr J Gersing (so).

A 14 complemented the other substantive provisions of the Convention and the Protocols. It had no independent existence since it had effect solely in relation to the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms safeguarded by those provisions. Although the application of A 14 did not necessarily presuppose a breach of those provisions, there could be no room for its application unless the facts at issue fell within the ambit of one or more of the latter. An action contesting paternity was a matter of family law; on that account alone, it was civil in character and A 6 was applicable. Even though the paternity proceedings which the applicant wished to institute were aimed at the dissolution of existing family ties, the determination of his legal relations with Pernille concerned his private life. The facts of the case accordingly also fell within A 8.

Under the 1960 Act, the husband, unlike the child, its guardian or the mother, had to institute paternity proceedings within prescribed time-limits. There was a difference of treatment as between the applicant and his former wife as regards the possibility of instituting proceedings to contest the former's paternity. There was no need to determine on what ground this difference was based, the list of grounds appearing in A 14 not being exhaustive. A 14 safeguarded individuals who were placed in analogous situations against discriminatory differences of treatment. The Court assumed that the difference was made between persons placed in analogous situations. A difference of treatment was discriminatory if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. Contracting States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment in law. The scope of the margin of appreciation would vary according to the circumstances, the subject-matter and its background; in this respect, one of the relevant factors may be the existence or non-existence of common ground between the laws of the Contracting States. Examination showed no such common ground between the States. The authorities were entitled to think that the introduction of time-limits for the institution of paternity proceedings was justified by the desire to ensure legal certainty and to protect the interests of the child. In that respect, the legislation complained of did not differ substantially from that of most other Contracting States or from that currently in force in Denmark. The difference of treatment between husbands and wives was based on the notion that such time-limits were less necessary for wives than for husbands since the mother's interests usually coincided with those of the child, she being awarded custody in most cases of divorce or separation. The rules in force were modified by the Danish Parliament in 1982 because it considered that the thinking underlying the 1960 Act was no longer consistent with the developments in society. The competent authorities were entitled to think that as regards the husband the aim sought to be realised would be most satisfactorily achieved by the enactment of a statutory rule, whereas as regards the mother it was sufficient to leave the matter to be decided by the courts on a case-by-case basis. Accordingly, having regard to their margin of appreciation, the authorities also did not transgress the principle of proportionality. The difference of treatment complained of was not discriminatory within the meaning of A 14.

Ravnsborg v Sweden (1994) 18 EHRR 38 94/10

Mr Göran Ravnsborg was a university lecturer in law. He held a power of attorney from his adoptive mother and was appointed administrator for her friend. They were both in a nursing home which charged them for medical care and the applicant effected the relevant payments. A dispute arose between the applicant and the nursing home and the latter brought a court action. On 6 April 1987, while the proceedings were pending, the Board of the Principal Guardian asked the District Court to appoint an administrator for the applicant's adoptive mother. The applicant filed a counter-claim and sought the immediate dismissal of the members of the Board. Referring to A 6(1), he asked for a public hearing. On three occasions in the course of the ensuing proceedings the applicant was ordered by the relevant courts, under the Code of Judicial Procedure, to pay fines for improper statements made in his written observations. The orders were made in the form of decisions and made without oral proceedings. His appeals to the Supreme Court were refused. He complained, inter alia, that in the proceedings relating to the fines he had been refused an oral hearing.

The Court would only deal with the complaint declared admissible by the Commission, namely that the absence of an oral hearing in any of the proceedings relating to the fines violated A 6.

In order to determine whether A 6 was applicable under its 'criminal' head, the Court had regard to the three alternative criteria laid down in its case-law. With regard to the legal classification of the offence under Swedish law, the formal classification under Swedish law was open to differing interpretations. On the evidence, the Court could not find it established that the provisions concerning sanctions against disturbance of the good order of court proceedings belonged to criminal law under the domestic legal system. With regard to the nature of the offence, rules enabled a court to sanction disorderly conduct in proceedings before it derived from the indispensable power of a court to ensure the proper and orderly functioning of its own proceedings. Measures ordered by courts under such rules were more akin to the exercise of disciplinary powers than to the imposition of a punishment for commission of a criminal offence. It was open to States to bring what were considered to be more serious examples of disorderly conduct within the sphere of criminal law, but that had not been shown to be the case in the present instance as regards the fines imposed on the applicant. The proscribed conduct for which the applicant was fined in principle therefore fell outside the ambit of A 6. With regard to the nature and degree of severity of the penalty, a fine imposed in respect of the measure could amount to SEK 1,000 and actually did so in all three instances in the present case. Moreover, the fine was convertible under Swedish law into a term of imprisonment. However, the possible amount of each fine did not attain a level such as to make it a 'criminal' sanction. Unlike ordinary fines, the kind at issue was not to be entered on the police register. A decision to convert the fines could only be taken by the District Court in limited circumstances and it would then have been necessary to summon the applicant to appear before the District Court for an oral hearing in separate proceedings. Accordingly, what was at stake for the applicant was not sufficiently important to warrant classifying the offences as 'criminal'. Therefore A 6 did not apply to the matters complained of and had therefore not been violated in the present case.

[Application lodged 18.4.1979; Commission report 12.12.1984; Court Judgment 17.10.1986]

Mr Mark Rees was born with all the physical and biological characteristics of a child of the female sex and was consequently recorded in the register of births as a female, under the name Brenda Margaret Rees. However, from a tender age the child started to exhibit masculine behaviour and was ambiguous in appearance. He changed his name to Brendan Mark Rees and subsequently, in September 1977, to Mark Nicholas Alban Rees. He had been living as a male ever since. Surgical treatment for physical sexual conversion began in May 1974 on the National Health Service. He complained primarily of the constraints upon his full integration into social life which were a result of the failure of the Government to provide measures that would legally constitute him as a male. In particular, he complained of the practice of issuing him with a birth certificate on which his sex continued to be recorded as female so causing him embarrassment and humiliation whenever social practices required its production.

Court found by majority (12–3) NV 8, unanimously NV 12.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (d), Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo (d), Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr A M Donner.

Although the essential object of A 8 was to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, there might in addition be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for private life, albeit subject to the State's margin of appreciation. In the present case it was the existence and scope of such positive obligations which had to be determined. The mere refusal to alter the register of births or to issue birth certificates whose contents and nature differed from those of the birth register could not be considered as interferences. The notion of 'respect' was not clear-cut, especially as far as those positive obligations were concerned. There was at present little common ground between the Contracting States in the area of giving transsexuals the option of changing their personal status to fit their newly-gained identity and, generally speaking, the law appeared to be in a transitional stage. Accordingly, it was an area in which the Contracting Parties enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation. In determining whether or not a positive obligation existed, regard had to be had to the fair balance that had to be struck between the general interest of the community and the interests of the individual. Transsexuals were free to change their first names and surnames at will. Similarly, they could be issued with official documents bearing their chosen first names and surnames and indicating, if their sex was mentioned at all, their preferred sex by the relevant prefix. However, such persons had on occasion to establish their identity by means of a birth certificate which mentioned the biological sex which the individuals had at the time of their birth. The United Kingdom did not recognise the applicant as a man for all social purposes (he would be regarded as a woman, inter alia, as far as marriage, pension rights and certain employments were concerned). The United Kingdom, albeit with delay and some misgivings on the part of the authorities, had endeavoured to meet the applicant's demands to the fullest extent that its system allowed. The alleged lack of respect therefore appeared to come down to a refusal to establish a type of documentation showing, and constituting proof of, current civil status. The introduction of such a system had not hitherto been considered necessary in the United Kingdom. It would have important administrative consequences and would impose new duties on the rest of the population. The governing authorities in the United Kingdom were fully entitled, in the exercise of their margin of appreciation, to take account of the requirements of the situation pertaining there in determining what measures to adopt. While the requirement of striking a fair balance might possibly, in the interests of persons in the applicant's situation, call for incidental adjustments to the existing system, it could not give rise to any direct obligation on the United Kingdom to alter the very basis thereof. The additions at present permitted to the register as regards adoption and legitimation concerned events occurring after birth. However, they recorded facts of legal significance and were designed to ensure that the register fulfilled its purpose of providing an authoritative record for the establishment of family ties in connection with succession, legitimate descent and the distribution of property. The annotation being requested by the applicant would, on the other hand, establish only that the person concerned henceforth belonged to the other sex. Furthermore, the change so recorded could not mean the acquisition of all the biological characteristics of the other sex. In any event, the annotation could not, without more, constitute an effective safeguard for ensuring the integrity of the applicant's private life, as it would reveal his change of sexual identity. The applicant had also asked that the change, and the corresponding annotation, be kept secret from third parties. However, such secrecy could not be achieved without first modifying fundamentally the present system for keeping the register of births, so as to prohibit public access to entries made before the annotation. Secrecy could also have considerable unintended results and could prejudice the purpose and function of the birth register by complicating factual issues arising in, inter alia, the fields of family and succession law. Furthermore, no account would be taken of the position of third parties, including public authorities or private bodies (eg life insurance companies) in that they would be deprived of information which they had a legitimate interest to receive. Having regard to the wide margin of appreciation to be afforded the State in this area and to the relevance of protecting the interests of others in striking the requisite balance, the positive obligations arising from A 8 could not be held to extend that far. That conclusion was not affected by the fact that the United Kingdom co-operated in the applicant's medical treatment. Accordingly, there was no breach of A 8. The Court was conscious of the seriousness of the problems affecting those persons and the distress they suffered. The Convention had always to be interpreted and applied in the light of current circumstances. The need for appropriate legal measures therefore had to be kept under review having regard particularly to scientific and societal developments.

The right to marry guaranteed by A 12 referred to the traditional marriage between persons of opposite biological sex. Furthermore, A 12 laid down that the exercise of that right should be subject to the national laws of the Contracting States. The limitations thereby introduced should not restrict or reduce the right in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right was impaired. However, the legal impediment in the United Kingdom on the marriage of persons who were not of the opposite biological sex could not be said to have an effect of that kind. There was accordingly no violation of A 12.

Reinhardt and Slimane-Kaïd v France (1999) 28 EHRR 59 98/21

Mr Mohamed Slimane-Kaïd was formerly the chairman of two public limited companies engaged, in particular, in buying equipment for export and in industrial coachbuilding. On 26 January 1982 he had also formed with Mrs Françoise Reinhardt a private company, whose registered office was at the latter's home address and main activity the hire and sale of equipment of all types both in France and overseas. On 1 July 1982 Mr Slimane-Kaïd had replaced Mrs Reinhardt as manager of that company. On 2 October 1984 Mr Slimane-Kaïd was questioned and later charged with misappropriation and procuring the issue of administrative documents by means of false information, certificates or statements and other offences of forgery, and remanded in custody. Between 9 October 1984 and 27 March 1985 the authorities carried out a number of searches and seizures at Mr Slimane-Kaïd's home address and on the premises of one of his companies; they also carried out searches and seizures on 16 October 1984 at Mrs Reinhardt's home (the registered office of the private company) – while she was in custody – and on 18 October 1984 in a house rented by the private company. On 14 November 1984 Mrs Reinhardt was questioned by a police investigator. She was arrested on 6 February 1985 and charged on the following day with aiding and abetting the misappropriation of company assets and of handling misappropriated company assets. Investigations continued, proceedings were joined and on 14 December 1989 the court made a committal order in respect of both applicants to the criminal court. On 14 November 1990 both applicants were found guilty and they appealed to the Versailles Court of Appeal. On 2 April 1992 the Versailles Court of Appeal acquitted Mr Slimane-Kaïd in respect of some of the counts, upheld the guilty verdict on others, and confirmed the sentence. It increased Mrs Reinhardt's sentence. Both applicants appealed on points of law to the Court of Cassation and lodged pleadings. The reporting judge filed his report on 20 November 1992 and the advocate-general was appointed on 30 November. The hearing of the Court of Cassation on 15 March 1993 took place without the applicant's representatives being present, the reporting judge addressed the court and oral submissions were made by the advocate-general. In a decision delivered on 15 March 1993, the Court of Cassation, relying on the reporting judge's report, the parties' pleadings and the submissions of the advocate-general, dismissed the appeals. The applicants complained, inter alia, of the length and fairness of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1) with regard to reasonable time by majority (19–2), V 6(1) with regard to fair hearing in the Court of Cassation.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (pd), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer (pd), Mr I Foighel (pd), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr M Voicu, Mr V Butkevych.

The scope of the case before the Court was determined by the Commission's decision on admissibility.

The period to be taken into consideration when ruling on the applicants' two complaints had ended on 15 March 1993 when the Court of Cassation had delivered judgment. With regard to when that period had started, Mr Slimane-Kaïd was not implicated until the period of police custody which ended with his being charged with misappropriation and procuring the issue of administrative documents by means of false information, certificates or statements. In his case, the period to be taken into consideration therefore began on 2 October 1984 and the proceedings lasted eight years, five months and almost two weeks. Mrs Reinhardt was taken into police custody on 16 October 1984 in connection with a preliminary inquiry concerning Mr Slimane-Kaïd. As Mrs Reinhardt's home was the registered office of one of the companies managed by Mr Slimane-Kaïd, it was probable that through the search that was carried out there that same day it was intended to obtain evidence of the offences of which the latter was suspected. Neither measure was therefore an 'official notification' to Mrs Reinhardt of an 'allegation' that she had committed a criminal offence. In her case, the relevant date was, at the latest, 6 February 1985 when the period of police custody that ended in her being charged began; the proceedings consequently lasted eight years, one month and just over a week. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, regard being had to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the applicant's conduct and that of the competent authorities. The case was of some complexity. No blame could be attached to the applicants conduct. There was no criticism of the trial and appeal courts for their handling of the case. However, the length of the proceedings was largely a result of the investigation not being carried out expeditiously. Accordingly the proceedings lasted more than a reasonable time and there had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Before the hearing the advocate-general had received the report and draft judgment that had been prepared by the reporting judge. The report was in two parts: the first contained a description of the facts, procedure and grounds of appeal and the second a legal analysis of the case and an opinion on the merits of the appeal. Those documents were not communicated to either the applicants or their lawyers. The applicants' lawyers could have made oral submissions if they had so requested, which would have meant that they would have been able to hear the first part of his report and to comment on it. The second part of the report and the draft judgment, which were legitimately privileged from disclosure as forming part of the deliberations, could not in any event be communicated to them. Conversely, the entire report and the draft judgment were communicated to the advocate-general, who was not a member of the court hearing the appeal. His role was to ensure that the law was correctly applied when it was clear and correctly construed when ambiguous. He 'advised' the judges on the solution in each individual case and, through the authority of his office, he could influence their decision in a way that was either favourable or run counter to the case put forward by appellants. Given the importance of the reporting judge's report (particularly the second part), the advocate-general's role and the consequences of the outcome of the proceedings for the applicants, the imbalance thus created by the failure to give like disclosure of the report to the applicants' advisers was not reconcilable with the requirements of a fair trial. The fact that the advocate-general's submissions were not communicated to the applicants was likewise questionable. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

JS for non-pecuniary damage (by majority (20–1). JS for remainder of claim. Costs and expenses not quantified or detailed and therefore dismissed.

Rekvényi v Hungary 99/24

[Application lodged 20.4.1994; Commission report 9.7.1998; Court Judgment 20.5.1999]

Mr László Rekvényi, the applicant, was a police officer and the Secretary General of the Police Independent Trade Union. On 24 December 1993 an Act was published in the Hungarian Official Gazette which amended the Constitution to the effect that, as from 1 January 1994, members of the armed forces, the police and security services were prohibited from joining any political party and from engaging in any political activity. In a circular letter dated 28 January 1994, the Head of the National Police demanded, in view of the forthcoming parliamentary elections, that police officers refrain from political activities. He referred to the new legislation and indicated that those who wished to pursue political activities would have to leave the police. In a second circular letter he declared that no exemption could be given from the prohibition contained in the legislation. On 9 March 1994 the Police Independent Trade Union filed a constitutional complaint with the Constitutional Court claiming that the new legislation infringed constitutional rights of career members of the police, was contrary to the generally recognised rules of international law and had been adopted by Parliament unconstitutionally. On 11 April 1994 the Constitutional Court dismissed the constitutional complaint, holding that it had no competence to annul a provision of the Constitution itself. The applicant complained that the prohibitions contained in the Constitution infringed his rights under A 10 and 11 of the Convention taken either alone or together with A 14.

Comm found by majority (21–9) V 10, NV 11, (25–5) not necessary to examine 14+10, (22–8) NV 14+11.

Court found unanimously NV 10, by majority (16–1) NV 11, unanimously NV 14+10, NV 14+11. that there had been no violation of 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with 10 or 11.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr R Türmen, Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach (pd), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall, Mrs HS Greve, Mr A Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova.

The pursuit of activities of a political nature came within the ambit of A 10 in so far as freedom of political debate constituted a particular aspect of freedom of expression. The guarantees contained in A 10 extended to military personnel and civil servants and police officers. The prohibition, by curtailing the applicant's involvement in political activities, interfered with the exercise of his right to freedom of expression. The interference was prescribed by law for the purposes of A 10(2) and pursued legitimate aims, namely the protection of national security and public safety and the prevention of disorder. The Court had to determine whether a fair balance had been struck between the fundamental right of the individual to freedom of expression and the legitimate interest of a democratic State in ensuring that its civil service properly furthered the purposes enumerated in A 10(2). In carrying out that review, the Court bore in mind that whenever civil servants' right to freedom of expression was in issue, the duties and responsibilities referred to in A 10(2) assumed a special significance, which justified leaving to the national authorities a certain margin of appreciation in determining whether the impugned interference was proportionate to the legitimate aim in question. Such considerations applied equally to police officers. Bearing in mind the role of the police in society, it was a legitimate aim in any democratic society to have a politically neutral police force. Regard being had to the margin of appreciation left to the national authorities in this area, and especially against the historical background, the relevant measures taken in Hungary in order to protect the police force from the direct influence of party politics could be seen as answering a pressing social need in a democratic society. The relevant laws did not impose an absolute ban; police officers remained entitled to undertake some activities enabling them to articulate their political opinions and preferences (such as expounding election programmes, promoting and nominating candidates, organising election campaign meetings, voting in and standing for elections to Parliament, local authorities and the office of mayor, participating in referenda, joining trade unions, associations and other organisations, participating in peaceful assemblies, make statements to the press, appear on radio or television programmes or publish works on politics). In those circumstances the scope and the effect of the impugned restrictions on the applicant's exercise of his freedom of expression did not appear excessive. The means employed in order to achieve the legitimate aims pursued were not disproportionate. Accordingly, the impugned interference with the applicant's freedom of expression was not in violation of A 10.

In the present case A 11 had to be considered in the light of A 10. The protection of personal opinions, secured by A 10, was one of the objectives of the freedoms of assembly and association as enshrined in A 11. The last sentence of A 11(2) entitled States to impose lawful restrictions on the exercise of the right to freedom of association by members of the police. The concept of lawfulness in the Convention, apart from positing conformity with domestic law, also implied qualitative requirements in the domestic law such as foreseeability and, generally, an absence of arbitrariness. It was primarily for the national authorities to interpret and apply domestic law, especially if there was a need to elucidate doubtful points. In the present case, the legal position was sufficiently clear to enable the applicant to regulate his conduct and the requirement of foreseeability was accordingly satisfied. There was no evidence of arbitrariness. The contested restriction was consequently lawful within the meaning of A 11(2). It was not necessary in the present case to settle the disputed issue of the extent to which the interference in question was, by virtue of the second sentence of A 11(2), excluded from being subject to the conditions other than lawfulness enumerated in the first sentence of that paragraph. For the reasons previously given in relation to A 10 the interference with the applicant's freedom of association satisfied the conditions in A 11. The interference could be regarded as justified under A 11(2). Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 11 either.

The considerations underlying the Court's conclusions that the interferences with the applicant's freedoms of expression and association were justified under A 10(2) and 11(2), had already taken into account the applicant's special status as a police officer. Those considerations were equally valid in the context of A 14 and, even assuming that police officers could be taken to be in a comparable position to ordinary citizens, justified the difference of treatment complained of. There had accordingly been no violation of A 14 taken in conjunction with A 10 or 11.

Remli v France (1996) 22 EHRR 253 96/17

[Application lodged 16.5.1990; Commission report 30.11.1994; Court Judgment 23.4.1996]

Mr Saïd André Remli was a French national of Algerian origin. On 16 April 1985, while attempting to escape from Lyons-Montluc Prison, the applicant and a fellow prisoner of Algerian nationality, Mr Boumédienne Merdji, knocked out a warder, who died four months later as a result of the blows he had received. The two prisoners were charged with intentional homicide and were committed for trial at the Rhône Assize Court. The trial at the Assize Court took place on 12 to 14 April 1989. A jury was empanelled and the hearing of witnesses began. On 13 April 1989 the applicant's counsel submitted that a remark had been made by one of the jurors and overheard by a third person, Mrs M. That remark was 'What's more, I'm a racist.' The Court refused the application made to it for formal note to be taken. On 14 April 1989 the Assize Court sentenced Mr Remli to life imprisonment and Mr Merdji to a twenty-year term. The applicant's appeal was dismissed by the Court of Cassation on 22 November 1989. He complained that he had not had a hearing by an impartial tribunal and that he had also suffered discrimination on the ground of racial origin.

Comm found by majority (7–4) V 6(1).

Court dismissed by majority (7–2) the Government's preliminary objection based on non-exhaustion of domestic remedies in respect of the complaint under 6, found unanimously that as domestic remedies had not been exhausted it could not entertain the complaint under 14+6, dismissed unanimously the Government's preliminary objection based on failure to comply with the six-month time-limit, found by majority (5–4) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr M A Lopes Rocha (d), Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (d), Mr B. Repik.

The purpose of A 26 was to afford the Contracting States the opportunity of preventing or putting right the violations alleged against them before those allegations were submitted to the Convention institutions. Thus the complaint to be submitted to the Commission had first to have been made to the appropriate national courts, at least in substance, in accordance with the formal requirements of domestic law and within the prescribed time-limits. Nevertheless, the only remedies that had to be exhausted were those that were effective and capable of redressing the alleged violation. In the instant case the application for formal note to be taken was an effective remedy. An application for transfer of a trial on the ground of reasonable suspicion of bias could only be made in respect of a whole court. Where the impartiality of a given member of a court was in issue, only the procedure of a challenge was available. In the case of members of the jury, however, a challenge could only be made when the names of the jurors were being drawn by lot, so that it was too late to make one in the circumstances of the instant case. The objection therefore failed.

The Government maintained that in the national courts the applicant had not complained of discrimination on the ground of race or national origin. Having regard to the purpose of the requirement that domestic remedies had to be exhausted, the Court allowed the Government's objection as to the admissibility of the complaint based on A 14 taken together with A 6.

An appeal to the Court of Cassation was one of the remedies that should in principle be exhausted in order to comply with A 26. Even supposing that it was probably bound to fail in this specific case, the filing of the appeal was thus not a futile step. It had the effect at the very least of postponing the beginning of the six-month period. The objection that the application was out of time therefore had to be dismissed.

The Court recalled its case-law concerning the independence and impartiality of tribunals, which applied to jurors as they did to professional and lay judges. When it was being decided whether in a given case there was a legitimate reason to fear that a particular judge lacked impartiality, the standpoint of the accused was important but not decisive. What was decisive was whether the fear could be held to be objectively justified. The Rhône Assize Court had to try Mr Remli and his co-defendant, both of them of North African origin, and a third person, Mrs M, certified in writing that she had heard one of the jurors say: 'What's more, I'm a racist.' A 6(1) imposed an obligation on every national court to check whether, as constituted, it was an impartial tribunal within the meaning of that provision where, as in the instant case, that was disputed on a ground that did not immediately appear to be manifestly devoid of merit. The Rhône Assize Court did not make any such check, thereby depriving the applicant of the possibility of remedying, if it proved necessary, a situation contrary to the requirements of the Convention. That finding, regard being had to the confidence which the courts had to inspire in those subject to their jurisdiction, sufficed for the Court to hold that there has been a breach of A 6(1).

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction in respect of the alleged damage. Costs and expenses (by majority (8–1) FF 60,000).

[Application lodged 5.8.1991; Commission report 4.7.1994; Court Judgment 4.12.1995]

On 21 May 1988, following the deaths of two people from heroin and information given to the police, officers questioned Mr Ronald Ribitsch, the applicant, and searched his home, although they had no warrant. He was held in detention in police custody from 31 May 1988 to 2 June 1988. He alleged that the officers questioning him grossly insulted him and then assaulted him repeatedly in order to wring a confession from him. Criminal proceedings brought against the police officers in the Vienna District Criminal Court for assault occasioning bodily harm resulted in Police Officer Markl being found guilty of assault occasioning bodily harm and being sentenced him to suspended imprisonment and probation and ordered to pay compensation to the applicant. The other two police officers were acquitted. Officer Markl appealed successfully to the Vienna Regional Criminal Court. The applicant's application to the Constitutional Court was declared inadmissible. He complained that he had undergone inhuman and degrading treatment during his detention in police custody.

The establishment and verification of the facts was primarily a matter for the Commission. The Court was not, however, bound by the Commission's findings of fact and remained free to make its own appreciation in the light of all the material before it. In principle it was not the Court's task to substitute its own assessment of the facts for that of the domestic courts, but it was not bound by the domestic courts' findings any more than it was by those of the Commission. Its scrutiny had to be particularly thorough where the Commission had reached conclusions at variance with those of the courts concerned. Its vigilance had to be heightened when dealing with rights such as those set forth in A 3. A 3 made no provision for exceptions and, under A 15(2), there could be no derogation therefrom even in the event of a public emergency threatening the life of the nation. The applicant's injuries were sustained during his detention in police custody, which was in any case unlawful, while he was entirely under the control of police officers. Police Officer Markl's acquittal in the criminal proceedings by a court bound by the principle of presumption of innocence did not absolve Austria from its responsibility under the Convention. The Government were accordingly under an obligation to provide a plausible explanation of how the applicant's injuries were caused. Significant weight was given to the explanation that the injuries were caused by a fall against a car door. The Court found that explanation unconvincing; even if the applicant had fallen while he was being moved under escort, that could only have provided a very incomplete, and therefore insufficient, explanation of the injuries concerned. On the basis of all the material placed before it, the Court concluded that the Government had not satisfactorily established that the applicant's injuries were caused otherwise than – entirely, mainly, or partly – by the treatment he underwent while in police custody. In respect of a person deprived of his liberty, any recourse to physical force which had not been made strictly necessary by his own conduct diminished human dignity and was in principle an infringement of the right set forth in A 3. The requirements of an investigation and the undeniable difficulties inherent in the fight against crime could not justify placing limits on the protection to be afforded in respect of the physical integrity of individuals. The injuries suffered by the applicant showed that he underwent ill-treatment which amounted to both inhuman and degrading treatment. Accordingly, there had been a breach of A 3.

Richard v France 98/25

[Application lodged 2.10.1996; Commission report 16.9.1997; Court Judgment 22.4.1998]

Mr Michel Richard, a postmaster, was a haemophiliac who had received numerous blood transfusions. A test carried out in November 1985 showed that the applicant had been infected with HIV. On 27 December 1989 the applicant submitted a preliminary application for compensation to the Minister for Solidarity, Health and Social Protection. His application was rejected on 30 March 1990 and he commenced proceedings. On 9 May 1995 he lodged an application with the European Commission of Human Rights. On 23 January 1996, having declared the application admissible, the Commission adopted a report noting that the parties had reached agreement on a friendly. The applicant's appeal in respect of his compensation claim continued in the domestic courts. On 2 October 1996 he lodged a further application with the Commission. On 21 February 1997 the Conseil d'Etat gave judgment remitted the case to the Paris Administrative Court of Appeal for reconsideration. The applicant complained of the length of time it had taken for his application for compensation from the State to be considered.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P van Dijk.

The wording of the declaration between the applicant and the State referred to the domestic proceedings up to the point they had reached when the friendly settlement was agreed and excluded any subsequent proceedings. It was highly unlikely that the applicant would have accepted a friendly settlement proposal that allowed the outcome of the proceedings to be delayed with impunity. The waiver of a right guaranteed by the Convention had to be established in an unequivocal manner. Those requirements were not fulfilled in the present case. The preliminary objection therefore had to be dismissed.

The present case, as referred to the Court, concerned the proceedings subsequent to the friendly settlement being reached. The starting-point therefore had to be 24 January 1996, that being the day after the Commission adopted its report noting that a settlement had been agreed. The proceedings before the domestic courts were not yet over, as an appeal was pending before the Court of Appeal. The proceedings in issue had therefore already lasted two years and one month to date. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. On the latter point, what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation had to be taken into account. Even though the case was of some complexity, that fact alone could not justify the length of the proceedings in question as the information needed to determine the State's liability had been available for a long time. The applicant sought on 30 November 1995 to expedite the proceedings, but without success. What was at stake in the proceedings was of crucial importance to the applicant in view of the disease from which he is suffering. He was infected in 1985 and was classified in 1991 as having reached stage 2 on the scale of infection. Exceptional diligence was called for, notwithstanding the number of cases to be dealt with, in particular as the facts of the controversy had been known to the Government for several years and its seriousness must have been obvious to them. There had been delays in the proceedings. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case and in particular to the applicant's situation, the time taken in the present case could not be considered to have been reasonable. There had been a violation of A 6(1).

Ridi v Italy 92/13

Mr Antonio Ridi filed a writ in the Belluno District Court on 4 May 1976 against a Mr Z, seeking compensation for the damage arising from the unlawful widening of a cart track which crossed the land jointly owned by them, and its restoration to its original condition. On 8 May 1985 the court delivered judgment finding for the applicant. The text of the judgment was lodged with the registry on 8 October 1985. On 18 September 1986 Mr Z appealed against the court's decision. The proceedings before the Venice Court of Appeal ended with the hearing on 15 March 1988 when the appeal court delivered judgment, finding that the applicant and the other joint owners had sold the land in question on 17 December 1976 to purchasers who had transferred it to Mr Z on 11 September 1986. Thus the Court of Appeal was required to rule on the damage sustained by the plaintiffs up to 17 December 1976. The text of the decision was lodged with the registry of the Court of Appeal on 2 May 1988. The applicant complained of the length of the civil proceedings brought by him.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 4 May 1976 when the proceedings were instituted against Mr Z in the Belluno District Court. It ended, at the latest, on 2 May 1989, when the judgment of the Venice Court of Appeal became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was a simple one, yet it took nearly six years to conduct the investigation and there was a long period of stagnation in the proceedings before the competent chamber of the District Court. As regards the first of these periods, the experts were acting in the context of judicial proceedings supervised by the judge who remained responsible for the preparation of the case and for the speedy conduct of the trial. The second period was also excessive. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal system in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. There was some delay on the part of the applicant but the lapse of time in the present case could not be regarded as reasonable. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. No causal connection between costs claimed and length of proceedings.

Rieme v Sweden (1993) 16 EHRR 155 92/46

Mr Antero Rieme, a Finnish citizen resident in Sweden, was a metal worker by profession. He had a daughter, Susanne, together with Mrs J, with whom he cohabited from January 1976 until March 1977. The latter had legal custody of Susanne from the time of her birth on 28 October 1976. On 26

September 1977, when Susanne was 11 months old, the Social District Council decided that she should be taken into public care because of her mother's alcohol problems. Shortly afterwards, she was placed in a foster home. In January 1978 the applicant applied to the District Court for legal custody of Susanne. In a custody report to the court, dated 21 September 1978, the social welfare authorities opposed his request, observing, inter alia, that the applicant had been reported several times for offences of drunkenness. It also noted that Susanne had become completely integrated into the foster family. The applicant withdrew his request but applied again on 30 November 1981. On 17 March 1982, the court dismissed his request. By judgment of 28 September 1983, the court ordered that the custody of Susanne be transferred to the applicant. Mrs J appealed to the Svea Court of Appeal which, however, confirmed the transfer of custody. On 11 October 1983, the applicant had asked the Social Council, first, to terminate the public care of Susanne and, secondly, to grant him access to her at regular intervals. The social welfare officers granted the care claim but did not determine the access claim and decided to prohibit the applicant from removing Susanne from the foster home. The applicant lodged an appeal with the County Administrative Court in Stockholm against the prohibition on removal. The appeal was dismissed. The Administrative Court of Appeal dismissed his subsequent appeal. Leave to appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court was refused on 26 March 1986. On 1 September 1989 the applicant again asked the Social Council to lift the prohibition on removal. At that time, Susanne had been staying with him since school started in August. On 20 November 1989 the Social Council terminated the prohibition on removal. Around Christmas 1989 Susanne returned to the foster family home, where at her own wish she has been living ever since. The applicant complained that the Swedish authorities had hindered his reunion with his daughter in violation of A 8.

Comm found by majority (8–5) V 8.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary plea, found NV 8.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr B Walsh, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou.

The applicant did not complain of an isolated act but rather of a situation in which he had been for some time and which would continue until it was ended by a decision to lift the prohibition on removal. The prohibition applied until further notice and, apart from the passage of time, there were no significant new facts which could justify fresh proceedings to have it quashed. Were A 26 to make mandatory the taking of such steps, which by their very nature might be repeated an indefinite number of times, it might create a permanent barrier to bringing matters before the Convention institutions. While the Court's jurisdiction was determined by the Commission's decision on admissibility, it was competent, in the interests of economy of proceedings, to take into account facts occurring during the course of the proceedings in so far as they constituted a continuation of the facts underlying the complaints declared admissible. Therefore the Government's preliminary objection regarding the scope of the case was rejected.

The mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted a fundamental element of family life, and the natural family relationship was not terminated by reason of the fact that the child was taken into public care. The implementation of the public care order, the subsequent prohibition on removal and its maintenance in force constituted an interference with the applicant's right to respect for family life. The interference was in accordance with the law. The interference had legitimate aims under A 8(2), namely protecting the health and the rights and freedoms of the child. The notion of necessity implied that the interference had to be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. In addition, a father's right to respect for family life included a right to the taking of measures with a view to his being reunited with the child. The reasons of the Social Council were relevant and sufficient and provided a valid justification for the prohibition on removal and its maintenance in force, at least up to 26 March 1986, when the Supreme Administrative Court refused leave to appeal. In particular, having regard to the Swedish authorities' margin of appreciation, the interference complained of was not disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. From May 1986, Susanne had spent weekends and spent several holidays with the applicant and his new wife. In view of her age and maturity, the relationship with her father was to evolve at her own pace. There was no ground for criticising the social welfare authorities' conduct. The Swedish authorities had acted within the law and having regard to their margin of appreciation, they could not be said not to have had relevant and sufficient reasons for keeping the child in the foster home during the period in question. Consequently, the prohibition on removal did not last for longer than could reasonably be thought necessary. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 8.

Riera Blume and Others v Spain 99/63

[Application lodged 25.8.1997; Court Judgment 14.10.1999]

Ms Elena Riera Blume, Ms Concepción Riera Blume, Ms Maria Luz Casado Perez, Ms Daria Amelia Casado Perez, Ms Maria Teresa Sales Aige and Mr Javier Bruna Reverter, were born in 1954, 1952, 1950, 1950, 1951 and 1957 respectively. In 1983 the Public Safety Department of Catalonia received through Pro Juventud ('Pro Youth'), an association formed to fight against sects, a request for help from several people who alleged that members of their families had been ensnared by a group known by the name of CEIS (Centro Esotérico de Investigaciones). The Barcelona investigating court opened a preliminary investigation and on 20 June 1984 ordered searches of the homes of members of the CEIS, including the applicants. The applicants were arrested. The duty judge decided to release the applicants but gave oral instructions, later confirmed in writing, to the police that they should be handed over to their families, to whom it should be suggested that it would be as well to have them interned in a psychiatric centre, on a voluntary basis as regards the persons of full age, in order for them to recover their psychological balance. On the orders of the Director-General of Public Safety, the applicants were transferred to the premises of the Public Safety Department and on 21 June 1984, they were taken by members of the Catalan police in official vehicles to a hotel near Barcelona, where they were handed over to their families with a view to their recovering their psychological balance. At the hotel they were taken to individual rooms, not allowed to leave their rooms for the first three days, the windows were firmly closed and they were kept under constant supervision. They were subjected to 'deprogramming' by a psychologist and a psychiatrist at the request of Pro Juventud. On 29 and 30 June 1984, after being informed of their rights, they were questioned by the Assistant Director-General of Public Safety in the presence of a lawyer not appointed by them. On 30 June 1984 the applicants left the hotel. They lodged a criminal complaint alleging, inter alia, false imprisonment against the Director-General, Acting Director-General and official of the Public Safety Department. In a judgment of 7 March 1990 the Barcelona Audiencia provincial acquitted the accused, holding that the acts complained of had been prompted by a philanthropic, legitimate and well-intentioned motive and that there had been no intention of depriving the applicants of their liberty, so that the offence of false imprisonment was not made out. The prosecution and the applicants lodged appeals on points of law, which were dismissed by the Supreme Court on 23 March 1993. The applicants lodged an appeal with the Constitutional Court which was dismissed on 10 March 1997. They complained that their deprivation of liberty from 20 to 30 June 1984 had given rise to a violation of A 5(1).

Court found unanimously V 5(1), not necessary to examine 9.

Judges: Mr M Pellonpää, President, Mr G Ress, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mrs N Vajic.

The applicants' transfer to the hotel by the Catalan police and their subsequent confinement to the hotel for ten days amounted in fact, on account of the restrictions placed on the applicants, to a deprivation of liberty. There was no legal basis for the deprivation of liberty. It was therefore necessary to consider the part played by the Catalan authorities in the deprivation of liberty complained of by the applicants and to determine its extent. In other words, it had to be ascertained whether, as the applicants maintained, the contribution of the Catalan police had been so decisive that without it the deprivation of liberty would not have occurred. The national authorities at all times acquiesced in the applicants' loss of liberty. While it was true that it was the applicants' families and the Pro Juventud association that bore the direct and immediate responsibility for the supervision of the applicants during their ten days' loss of liberty, it was equally true that without the active cooperation of the Catalan authorities the deprivation of liberty could not have taken place. As the ultimate responsibility for the matter complained of thus lay with the authorities in question, the Court concluded that there has been a violation of A 5(1).

In view of the finding under A 5(1) it was not necessary to undertake a separate examination of the case under A 9.

Non-pecuniary damage (ESP 250,000 to each of the applicants), costs and expenses (ESP 500,000 to the applicants jointly).

Ringeisen v Austria (1979-80) 1 EHRR 455, 504, 513 71/2

[Application lodged 3.7.1965; Commission report 19.3.1970; Court Judgment 16.7.1971 (merits), 22.6.1972 (A 50), 23.6.1973 (interpretation)]

Mr Michael Ringeisen was, from 1958 to 1963, in business as an insurance agent in Linz, Austria, he also negotiated loans and dealt in real estate. On 6 February 1962, the applicant made a contract with Mr and Mrs Roth for the purchase of property. The District Commission refused to approve the contract for sale. His appeals to the Regional Commission and Constitutional Court were rejected. Subsequently charges of fraud were laid against him and he was remanded in custody. He was convicted and following appeal the sentence was fixed at five years' severe imprisonment with the additional punishment of fasting and sleeping hard once every three months. The court took into account the time the applicant had spent in custody on remand. He also faced charges of fraudulent bankruptcy. He complained of his detention on remand from 5 August to 23 December 1963 and from 15 March 1965 to 20 March 1967. His numerous applications for release and appeals were dismissed. He complained of his detention and the proceedings against him.

Comm found by majority (11–1) V 5(3), NV 6(1) regarding the length of the proceedings (unanimously in the fraud case and by majority (11–1) in the bankruptcy case), (7–5) NV 6(1) in respect of the proceedings for approval of the contracts for sale.

The Court had jurisdiction to consider the complaint. It would be going too far and contrary to the spirit of the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies to allow that a person might properly lodge an application with the Commission before exercising any domestic remedies. However, in various circumstances there was a need for a certain flexibility in the application of the rule. Documents were often submitted after the original applications. There was no reason why supplements to the initial application should not relate in particular to the proof that the applicant had complied with the conditions of A 26, even if he had done so after the lodging of the application. Thus, while the applicant was, as a rule, in duty bound to exercise the different domestic remedies before he applied to the Commission, it had to be left open to the Commission to accept the fact that the last stage of such remedies might be reached shortly after the lodging of the application but before the Commission was called upon to pronounce itself on admissibility. Applications often came from laymen who addressed themselves to the Commission without legal assistance. A formalistic interpretation of A 26 would therefore lead to unfair consequences. The applicant exercised, before he lodged his application with the Commission, every domestic remedy which was available to him. No legitimate interest of the respondent State could have been prejudiced in the present case through the fact that the application was lodged and registered a short while before the final decision of the Constitutional Court. Therefore the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was dismissed.

For A 6(1) to be applicable to a case it was not necessary that both parties to the proceedings should be private persons. The character of the legislation which governed how the matter was to be determined (civil, commercial, administrative law, etc) and that of the authority which was invested with jurisdiction in the matter (ordinary court, administrative body, etc) were therefore of little consequence. Although it was applying rules of administrative law, the Regional Commission's decision was to be decisive for the relations in civil law between the applicant and the Roth couple. That was enough to make it necessary for the Court to decide whether or not the proceedings in the case complied with the requirements of A 6(1).

The Court did not find any facts to prove that the applicant was not given a fair hearing of his case. The Regional Commission was a tribunal within the meaning of A 6(1), it was independent of the executive and also of the parties, its members were appointed for a term of five years and the proceedings before it afforded the necessary guarantees. The applicant accused six members of the Regional Commission of bias. Even if the applicant's assertions were true they would not support the conclusion that there was bias on the part of the Regional Commission. In the case of such a board with mixed membership comprising, under the presidency of a judge, civil servants and representatives of interested bodies, the complaint made against individual members could not be said to bear out a charge of bias. The Austrian reservation did not refer expressly to administrative proceedings but only to civil and criminal cases. Yet it had to be accepted that the reservation covered a fortiori proceedings before administrative authorities where their subject matter was the determination of civil rights and where, therefore, the said authorities were considered to be tribunals within the meaning of A 6(1). That was the case of the proceedings commenced by the applicant's request for approval on 30 March 1962. Therefore there was no violation of A 6(1) in the proceedings relating to that request.

A 5(3): The applicant was detained in connection with two separate prosecutions, the first for fraud and fraudulent conversion, the second for fraudulent bankruptcy. The detention of the applicant in the two cases lasted in all nearly two years and five months. The four and a half months of the first detention (5 August to 23 December 1963) had to be added to the periods which followed for the purpose of assessing the reasonableness of the whole period of detention on remand in the fraud case. The second period of detention (15 March 1965 to 20 March 1967) occurred entirely in the context of the proceedings for fraudulent bankruptcy, while the new detention ordered in the course of the prosecution for fraud lasted for only part of this time (12 May 1965 to 15 March 1967). The reasons invoked in the second case were danger of collusion and danger of committing further offences. The first reason did not stand up to examination as the inquiries into the acts of fraudulent bankruptcy had begun before the applicant had been examined and while he remained at liberty. If he had wished to tamper with witnesses he could have done so in the intervening period. As to the danger of committing further offences, a provisional receiver had been appointed on 23 March 1965 and the applicant was adjudged bankrupt on 14 May 1965 from which time the administration of his property was outside his power and no debt due could be paid validly to him, if he had any other debtors. The detention in the fraudulent bankruptcy case exceeded the reasonable limit at least as from 14 May 1965. The same was true of his detention in the fraud case for the greater part of this period. The cases were interconnected. The decisions to detain him again and to keep him in custody, taken after 12 May 1965, invoked the dangers of his absconding and of his committing further offences but no precise information was given as to any circumstances arising after 12 May 1965 which caused such dangers to appear or to reappear. The new detention, which was ordered on 12 May 1965 and lasted until 15 March 1967 in the fraud case, fell entirely within the limits of the remand in custody in the fraudulent bankruptcy case which was ordered on 15 March 1965 and finished only on 20 March 1967. The new detention could be explained only by the other detention. The conviction of the applicant on 14 January 1966 did not change that situation. Having held that the detention in the fraudulent bankruptcy case exceeded the reasonable time provided for in A 5(3), the Court considered that that finding applied to the whole of the applicant's detention up to 20 March 1967, the date of his release.

A 6(1): The length of the fraud proceedings – preliminary investigations were opened on 21 February 1963 and the final decision was taken on 24 April 1968 – resulted from both the complexity of the case and the innumerable requests and appeals made by the applicant not merely for his release, but also challenging most of the competent judges and for the transfer of the proceedings to different court areas. That also applied, to a large extent, to the proceedings for fraudulent bankruptcy, at least as regards the investigation prior to the filing of the indictment on 24 March 1966. Even for the subsequent period, it was understandable that the public prosecutor thought it wise, by reason of the clear connection between the facts relevant in this case and the facts supporting the prosecution for fraud, to wait until there was a final conviction and sentence in the fraud case before withdrawing the prosecution. That explained why the fraudulent bankruptcy proceedings were allowed to stagnate. Therefore there was no violation of A 6(1).

Damages (DM 20,000).

Interpretation of A 50 judgment of 22.6.1972: Court found by majority (6–1) that the judgment of 22 June 1972 meant that the compensation in the sum of DM 20,000 afforded to the applicant should be paid to him in that currency and in the Federal Republic of Germany, (5–2) the compensation was to be paid to the applicant personally and free from attachment.

[Application lodged 14.3.1993; Commission report 4.7.1996; Court Judgment 23.9.1997]

Mr Geoffrey Robins and Mrs Margaret Robins were in a dispute with their neighbours, Mr and Mrs T, over sewerage. On 1 May 1991 judgment was given against the applicants. Their appeal was subsequently dismissed by the Court of Appeal. Thereafter followed the costs proceedings. The hearing was held on 12 to 13 November 1992 after which the judge ordered the applicants to pay the costs of the successful party. The applicants appealed and on 19 June 1995, the Court of Appeal confirmed the judgment of 13 November 1992 and dismissed the appeal. They complained, inter alia, of the length of proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr I Foighel, Mr A N Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev, Mr U Lôhmus.

A 6(1) required that all stages of legal proceedings for the determination of civil rights and obligations, not excluding stages subsequent to judgment on the merits, be resolved within a reasonable time. The legal costs which formed the subject matter of the proceedings in question were incurred during the resolution of a dispute between neighbours which undoubtedly involved the determination of civil rights and obligations. Whether the proceedings in question were for the determination of the applicants' liability to pay their neighbours' costs or were limited to an investigation into the applicants' financial circumstances and the size of the contribution it was reasonable for them to pay, the costs proceedings, even though separately decided, had to be seen as a continuation of the substantive litigation and accordingly as part of a determination of civil rights and obligations. It followed that A 6(1) was applicable.

The relevant period began on 1 May 1991 when the Judge determined the substantive dispute and ended on 19 June 1995, with the Court of Appeal's dismissal of the applicants' appeal against the judgment on costs. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case, having regard in particular to the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties to the dispute and the relevant authorities. It took over four years to resolve what might be regarded as a relatively straightforward dispute over costs. The State authorities could not be held responsible for the totality of the delays in the case. Nonetheless, 10 months were wasted between February and November 1992 because of the Department of Social Security's mistaken belief that the applicants had separated. In addition, there was a period of approximately 16 months, between the application for an extension of time for the filing of notice of appeal in January 1993 and the registrar's directions in April 1994, when it would seem that the court authorities were totally inactive. Basing itself on those two periods, in the context of the overall length of the proceedings, the Court concluded that there was an unreasonable delay in dealing with the applicants' case. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1) in that the applicants' civil rights and obligations were not determined within a reasonable time.

Violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the non-pecuniary damage alleged by the applicants (no causal link in respect of pecuniary damage). Costs and expenses (GBP 2,700).

Rotaru v Romania 00/145

(Application lodged 22.2.1995; Commission report 1.3.1999; Court Judgment 4.5.2000]

Mr Aurel Rotaru was a lawyer by profession. In 1946, after the communist regime had been established, the applicant, who was then a student, was refused permission by the prefect of the county of Vaslui to publish two pamphlets, 'Student Soul' and 'Protests', on the ground that they expressed anti-Government sentiments. Dissatisfied with that refusal, the applicant wrote two letters to the prefect in which he protested against the abolition of freedom of expression by the new people's regime. As a result of those letters, he was arrested on 7 July 1948. On 20 September 1948 the Vaslui People's Court convicted the applicant on a charge of insulting behaviour and sentenced him to one year's imprisonment. In 1989, after the communist regime had been overthrown, the new Government passed Legislative Decree No 118/1990, which granted certain rights to those who had been persecuted by the communist regime and who had not engaged in Fascist activities. On 30 July 1990 the applicant brought proceedings in the Bârlad Court of First Instance against the Ministry of the Interior, the Ministry of Defence and the Vaslui County Employment Department in respect of his prison sentence. The court gave judgment for the applicant on 11 January 1993 and awarded him compensation. As part of its defence in those proceedings, the Ministry of the Interior submitted to the court a letter of 19 December 1990 that it had received from the Romanian Intelligence Service (RIS) which contained information about the applicant's political activities between 1946 and 1948, alleging that he had been a member of a right wing legionnaire movement. The applicant brought proceedings against the RIS, stating that some of the information in its letter was false and defamatory and claiming damages from the RIS for the non-pecuniary damage he had sustained. He also sought an order that the RIS should amend or destroy the file containing the information on his supposed legionnaire past. The Bucharest Court of First Instance dismissed the applicant's application. On appeal, the Bucharest County Court found on 18 January 1994 that the information that the applicant had been a legionnaire was false but nevertheless dismissed the appeal on the ground that the RIS had not been negligent. On 15 December 1994 the Bucharest Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal by the applicant. Following further checks, the Director of the RIS informed the Minister of Justice on 6 July 1997 that the information about being a member of the legionnaire movement referred not to the applicant but to another person with the same name. In the light of that letter, the applicant sought a review of the Court of Appeal's decision of 15 December 1994. In a final decision of 25 November 1997, the Bucharest Court of Appeal quashed the decision of 15 December 1994 and allowed the applicant's action without making any order as to damages or costs. The applicant alleged a violation of his right to respect for his private life on account of the holding and use by the Romanian Intelligence Service of a file containing personal information and an infringement of his right of access to a court and his right to a remedy before a national authority that could rule on his application to have the file amended or destroyed.

Comm found V 8, V 13.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection that the applicant was no longer a victim, joined to the merits the Government's preliminary objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies and dismissed it after consideration of the merits, found by majority (16–1) V 8, unanimously V 13, V 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber (c), President, Mrs E Palm, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello (pd), Mr J Makarczyk (jc), Mr R Türmen (jc), Mr J-P Costa (jc), Mrs F Tulkens (jc), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jc), Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova, Mrs R Weber (jc), ad hoc judge (so).

An individual could, under certain conditions, claim to be the victim of a violation occasioned by the mere existence of secret measures or of legislation permitting secret measures, without having to allege that such measures were in fact applied to him. Furthermore, a decision or measure favourable to an applicant was not in principle sufficient to deprive him of his status as a victim unless the national authorities had acknowledged, either expressly or in substance, and then afforded redress for, the breach of the Convention. The applicant complained of the holding of a secret register containing information about him, whose existence was publicly revealed during judicial proceedings. He could on that account claim to be the victim of a violation of the Convention. As to the Bucharest Court of Appeal judgment of 25 November 1997, assuming that it could be considered that it did, to some extent, afford the applicant redress for the existence in his file of information that proved false, the Court took the view that such redress was only partial and that at all events it was insufficient under the case-law to deprive him of his status of victim. The applicant could claim to be a victim for the purposes of A 34. The objection was therefore dismissed. There was a close connection between the Government's argument on the exhaustion of domestic remedies and the merits of the complaints made by the applicant under A 13 of the Convention and accordingly that objection was joined to the merits.

The storing of information relating to an individual's private life in a secret register and the release of such information came within the scope of A 8(1). Public information could fall within the scope of private life where it was systematically collected and stored in files held by the authorities. That was all the truer where such information concerned a person's distant past. The RIS's letter of 19 December 1990 contained various pieces of information about the applicant's life, in particular his studies, his political activities and his criminal record, some of which had been gathered more than 50 years earlier. Such information, when systematically collected and stored in a file held by agents of the State, fell within the scope of private life for the purposes of A 8(1). That was all the more so in the instant case as some of the information has been declared false and was likely to injure the applicant's reputation. A 8 consequently applied.

Both the storing by a public authority of information relating to an individual's private life and the use of it and the refusal to allow an opportunity for it to be refuted amounted to interference with the right to respect for private life secured in A 8(1). Paragraph 2 of A 8 was to be interpreted narrowly. While intelligence services might legitimately exist in a democratic society, powers of secret surveillance of citizens were tolerable under the Convention only in so far as strictly necessary for safeguarding the democratic institutions. If it was not to contravene A 8, such interference had to have been in accordance with the law, pursue a legitimate aim under para 2 and, furthermore, be necessary in a democratic society in order to achieve that aim. The expression 'in accordance with the law' not only required that the impugned measure should have some basis in domestic law, but also referred to the quality of the law in question, requiring that it should be accessible to the person concerned and foreseeable as to its effects. The Bucharest Court of Appeal confirmed that it was lawful for the RIS to hold the information as depositary of the archives of the former security services. That being so, the Court could conclude that the storing of information about the applicant's private life had a basis in Romanian law. The law was accessible, having been published in Romania's Official Gazette. Regarding foreseeability, a rule was foreseeable if it was formulated with sufficient precision to enable any individual, if need be with appropriate advice, to regulate his conduct. No provision of domestic law laid down any limits on the exercise of those powers. Thus, for instance, domestic law did not define the kind of information that could be recorded, the categories of people against whom surveillance measures such as gathering and keeping information could be taken, the circumstances in which such measures could be taken or the procedure to be followed. Similarly, the law did not lay down limits on the age of information held or the length of time for which it may be kept. Section 45 empowered the RIS to take over for storage and use the archives that belonged to the former intelligence services operating on Romanian territory and allowed inspection of RIS documents with the Director's consent. However, the section contained no explicit, detailed provision concerning the persons authorised to consult the files, the nature of the files, the procedure to be followed or the use that could be made of the information thus obtained. Although s 2 of the Law empowered the relevant authorities to permit interferences necessary to prevent and counteract threats to national security, the ground allowing such interferences was not laid down with sufficient precision. The Romanian system for gathering and archiving information did not provide any safeguards and no supervision procedure, whether while the measure ordered was in force or afterwards. Therefore, domestic law did not indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of exercise of the relevant discretion conferred on the public authorities. The Court concluded that the holding and use by the RIS of information on the applicant's private life was not in accordance with the law, a fact that sufficed to constitute a violation of A 8. That fact prevented the Court from reviewing the legitimacy of the aim pursued by the measures ordered and determining whether they were necessary in a democratic society. There had consequently been a violation of A 8.

Regarding the Government's preliminary objection, A 54 of the Romanian Decree provided for a general action in the courts, designed to protect non-pecuniary rights that had been unlawfully infringed. The Bucharest Court of Appeal, however, indicated in its judgment of 25 November 1997 that the RIS was empowered by domestic law to hold information on the applicant that came from the files of the former intelligence services. The Government had not established the existence of any domestic decision that had set a precedent in the matter. It had therefore not been shown that such a remedy would have been effective. That being so, the preliminary objection by the Government had to be dismissed.

Neither the provisions relied on by the respondent Government nor any other provisions of the relevant law made it possible to challenge the holding, by agents of the State, of information on a person's private life or the truth of such information. The supervisory machinery established by ss 15 and 16 related only to the disclosure of information about the identity of some of the Securitate's collaborators and agents. The Court had not been informed of any other provision of Romanian law that made it possible to challenge the holding, by the intelligence services, of information on the applicant's private life or to refute the truth of such information. Therefore the applicant had been the victim of a violation of A 13.

The applicant's claim for compensation for non-pecuniary damage and costs was a civil one within the meaning of A 6(1) and the Bucharest Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to deal with it. The Court of Appeal's failure to consider the claim infringed the applicant's right to a fair hearing within the meaning of A 6(1). There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

In an earlier application to the European Commission of Human Rights a violation of A 6(1) had been found in respect of the period from 9 September 1989 to 13 June 1995. The period the Court was concerned with began from 14 June 1995 and concluded on 6 March 1997. The period of one year and eight months did not appear excessive in itself but it followed a long period which had already been found to constitute a violation.

Rowe and Davis v United Kingdom 00/83

[Application lodged 20.12.1993; Commission report 20.10.1998; Court Judgment 16.2.2000]

On the evening of 15/16 December 1988 a series of offences occurred in Surrey. Following investigations, the police arrested and prosecuted Mr Raphael Rowe and Mr Michael Davis and a third man, Johnson. On 26 February 1990 the jury returned unanimous verdicts convicting the applicants and Johnson of murder, assault occasioning grievous bodily harm, and three counts of robbery. They were each sentenced to concurrent terms of life, 15 years' and 12 years' imprisonment. They appealed on the grounds, inter alia, that their convictions were unsafe and unsatisfactory because of weaknesses and inconsistencies in the evidence against them. At a hearing before the Court of Appeal, counsel for the prosecution handed a document to the court seeking a ruling on a matter of disclosure. Having considered those submissions and having examined the relevant documents, the court refused to order disclosure. On 29 July 1993 the Court of Appeal upheld the applicants' conviction and that of Johnson, concluding that there was no basis to say that there was even a lurking doubt about their safety. The application of the applicants to the Court of Appeal for leave to appeal to the House of Lords was refused on 30 September 1993. The applicants complained that they had not had a fair trial at first instance or before the Court of Appeal.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(b) and (d).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Sir John Laws, ad hoc judge.

The guarantees in A 6(3) were specific aspects of the right to a fair trial set out in para 1. It was a fundamental aspect of the right to a fair trial that criminal proceedings, including the elements of such proceedings which related to procedure, should be adversarial and that there should be equality of arms between the prosecution and defence. In addition A 6(1) required that the prosecution authorities should disclose to the defence all material evidence in their possession for or against the accused. However, the entitlement to disclosure of relevant evidence was not an absolute right. In any criminal proceedings there might be competing interests, such as national security or the need to protect witnesses at risk of reprisals or keep secret police methods of investigation of crime, which had to be weighed against the rights of the accused. In some cases it might be necessary to withhold certain evidence from the defence so as to preserve the fundamental rights of another individual or to safeguard an important public interest. However, only such measures restricting the rights of the defence which were strictly necessary were permissible under A 6(1). Moreover, in order to ensure that the accused received a fair trial, any difficulties caused to the defence by a limitation on its rights had to be sufficiently counterbalanced by the procedures followed by the judicial authorities. During the applicants' trial at first instance the prosecution decided, without notifying the judge, to withhold certain relevant evidence on grounds of public interest. Such a procedure, whereby the prosecution itself attempted to assess the importance of concealed information to the defence and weigh that against the public interest in keeping the information secret, could not comply with the above-mentioned requirements of A 6(1). It was true that at the commencement of the applicants' appeal prosecution counsel notified the defence that certain information had been withheld, without however revealing the nature of this material, and that on two separate occasions the Court of Appeal reviewed the undisclosed evidence and, in ex parte hearings with the benefit of submissions from the Crown but in the absence of the defence, decided in favour of non-disclosure. However, the Court did not consider that that procedure before the appeal court was sufficient to remedy the unfairness caused by the absence of any scrutiny of the withheld information by the trial judge. Unlike the latter, who saw the witnesses give their testimony and was fully versed in all the evidence and issues in the case, the judges in the Court of Appeal were dependent for their understanding of the possible relevance of the undisclosed material on transcripts of the Crown Court hearings and on the account of the issues given to them by prosecuting counsel. In addition, the first instance judge would have been in a position to monitor the need for disclosure throughout the trial, assessing the importance of the evidence at a stage when new issues were emerging, when it might have been possible through cross-examination seriously to undermine the credibility of key witnesses and when the defence case was still open to take a number of different directions or emphases. In contrast, the Court of Appeal was obliged to carry out its appraisal ex post facto and might even, to a certain extent, have unconsciously been influenced by the jury's verdict of guilty into underestimating the significance of the undisclosed evidence. Therefore, the prosecution's failure to lay the evidence in question before the trial judge and to permit him to rule on the question of disclosure deprived the applicants of a fair trial and there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Rubinat v Italy (1985) 7 EHRR 512 85/2

[Application lodged 21.7.1978; Commission report 5.5.1983; Court Judgment 12.2.1985]

Mr. Pedro Rubinat was a Spanish sailor. On 27 April 1972, in the course of a dispute, he fatally wounded a Nicaraguan sailor in a boarding-house in Genoa, after which he went abroad. The next day a warrant for his arrest was issued but he could not be found. On 25 November 1974, the Genoa Assize Court, after holding a trial by default sentenced him to 21 years' imprisonment for murder. The officially appointed defence counsel entered an appeal which was dismissed by the Genoa Appeal Court of Assize on 28 May 1976. On 29 October 1976, Mr Rubinat was arrested in France and extradited on 27 May 1977. His appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed and his 'procedural objection' and application for a retrial were dismissed by the Genoa Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation. On 12 May 1983, the President of the Italian Republic granted a pardon to Mr Rubinat, who after his release went abroad and his whereabouts were not known. The applicant complained that he had not received the benefit of a fair trial.

The circumstances disclosed a fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter. The applicant had been released well before expiry of the sentence and the lasting silence observed by him since then appeared to amount to an implied discontinuance or an indication that he no longer wished to be associated in the proceedings, the aim he was pursuing having been attained. Although the case raised issues of principle transcending the person and the interests of the applicant there was no compelling reason to proceed. The court was giving a ruling on the same date, on analogous legal issues arising in respect of Mr Colozza and thereby clarified the scope of the engagements undertaken by the Contracting States in that area.

Ruiz-Mateos v Spain (1993) 16 EHRR 505 93/23

Mr José María Ruiz-Mateos, a businessman, Mr Zoilo Ruiz-Mateos, Mr Rafael Ruiz-Mateos, Mr Isidoro Ruiz-Mateos, Mr Alfonso Ruiz-Mateos and Mrs María Dolores Ruiz-Mateos were brothers and sister. In 1983 they held 100% of the shares in RUMASA SA, the parent company of the RUMASA group, which comprised several hundred undertakings. RUMASA SA's holding in these undertakings varied from one to the other. By a legislative decree of 23 February 1983 the Government ordered the expropriation in the public interest of all the shares in the companies comprising the RUMASA group, including those of the parent company. The State, which was the beneficiary of this measure, was to take immediate possession of the expropriated property through the intermediary of the Directorate General for National Assets. The aim of the expropriation and transfer of possession of the companies concerned was to protect the public interest because, in order to finance the group's companies, its banks had taken risks considered to be disproportionate in relation to their solvency, thereby jeopardising the stability of the banking system and the interests of the depositors, employees and third parties. On 9 May 1983 Mr José María Ruiz-Mateos instituted proceedings for 50% of the shares. The other five applicants followed suit on 27 May with regard to the remaining shares. Preliminary questions were referred to the Constitutional Court. On 23 December 1986 the action for restitution was dismissed. On 27 December 1986 the applicants appealed to the Audiencia provincial of Madrid. Following a reference to the Constitutional Court the Audiencia provincial dismissed the appeal by a judgment of 25 February 1991. The applicants complained of the length of the proceedings and that they had not had a fair hearing in the proceedings before the Constitutional Court as Counsel for the State, their opponent in the civil proceedings, was able to submit to the Constitutional Court.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 27 May 1983, when Zoilo, Rafael, Isidoro, Alfonso and María Dolores Ruiz-Mateos brought their action in respect of half the capital of RUMASA, thereby supplementing the action brought by José María Ruiz-Mateos on 9 May 1983 in respect of the other half. It ended on 25 February 1991, the date of the judgment of the Audiencia provincial. The application of 6 March 1991 for the interpretation of the judgment was not relevant, as it had no bearing on the outcome of the dispute. Proceedings in the Constitutional Court were to be taken into account for calculating the relevant period where the result of such proceedings was capable of affecting the outcome of the dispute before the ordinary courts. The constitutional proceedings took place in mid-course of the main action and not after its conclusion which provided an additional reason for taking them into account in the calculation of the period to be considered, especially where they concerned a preliminary issue. The Constitutional Court found the two questions referred by the civil courts to be admissible. As the questions referred concerned a preliminary issue, the civil courts had to await the decisions of the Constitutional Court, which were decisive for the ruling in the main action. The period to be taken into consideration therefore included the two sets of constitutional proceedings; that being so, it lasted nearly seven years and nine months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Although the main civil action was not complex at the outset, it subsequently gave rise to constitutional questions which were undeniably difficult. There was little delay on the part of the applicants. There were no notable interruptions at first instance except to resolve the preliminary issue. On appeal there were two long periods of inactivity. Despite the special features of constitutional proceedings, the proceedings were too long in this instance, in particular as there was a connection between the two questions referred to the Constitutional Court. What was at stake in the case, not only for the applicants but also for Spanish society in general, was considerable, in view of its vast social and economic implications. The large number of persons concerned and the amount of capital involved militated in favour of a prompt resolution of the dispute. The proceedings exceeded a reasonable time within the meaning of A 6(1).

The Court was not called upon to give an abstract ruling on the applicability of A 6(1) to constitutional courts in general or to the constitutional courts of particular countries. It had to determine whether any rights guaranteed to the applicants under that provision were affected in the present case. The constitutional proceedings did not in general deal with disputes over civil rights and obligations. There was a close link between the subject-matter of the two civil and constitutional proceedings and, in the present case, to have dealt with them separately would have been artificial and considerably weakened the protection afforded in respect of the applicants' rights. The questions of constitutionality provided the applicants with the sole means available to them of complaining of an interference with their right of property. Accordingly, A 6(1) applied to the contested proceedings. The right to an adversarial trial meant the opportunity for the parties to have knowledge of and comment on the observations filed or evidence adduced by the other party. Proceedings before a constitutional court had their own characteristics which took account of the specific nature of the legal rules to be applied and the implications of the constitutional decision for the legal system in force. In this case they dealt with a law which directly concerned a restricted circle of persons. If in such a case the question whether that law was compatible with the Constitution was referred to the Constitutional Court within the context of proceedings on a civil right to which persons belonging to that circle were a party, those persons had as a rule to be guaranteed free access to the observations of the other participants in these proceedings and a genuine opportunity to comment on those observations. In view of the closeness of the link between the proceedings in the case, it would be artificial to dissociate the role of the executive, on whose authority the decision to expropriate was taken, from that of the Directorate General for National Assets, the beneficiary of the measure. The applicants were not given an opportunity to reply to the observations of the Counsel for the State, although it would have been in their interests to be able to do so before the final decision. The Counsel for the State had advance knowledge of their arguments and was able to comment on them in the last instance before the Constitutional Court. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1).

Just satisfaction dismissed (no causal connection between the alleged damage and the violations found had been established).

Ruiz Torija v Spain (1995) 19 EHRR 542 94/45

[Application lodged 15.3.1991; Commission report 8.7.1993; Court Judgment 9.12.1994]

Mr Eusebio Ruiz Torija had been the lessee of a bar in Madrid since 1960, when in 1988 the lessor instituted proceedings for the termination of the lease and his eviction. On 13 February 1989 the first-instance court dismissed the lessor's action but did not examine the applicant's objection that the action was time-barred. On appeal by the lessor, the Madrid Audiencia Provincial gave judgment on 30 January 1990 quashing the impugned decision and allowing the action for the applicant's eviction without ruling on the question whether the action was time-barred. The applicant's appeal to the Constitutional Court was declared inadmissible on 29 October 1990. He complained that he had not been given a fair hearing in so far as the Madrid Audiencia Provincial had failed to deal in its judgment with one of his submissions.

Comm found by majority (18–3) V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (8–1) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt (d), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr S Martens, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi, Mr MA Lopes Rocha.

In Spanish law, having suffered no prejudice, the party to whom the operative part of the judgment was wholly favourable lacked standing to appeal, whether by filing a separate appeal or by 'joining' the appellant's appeal. The applicant's pleadings in the first-instance court were directed towards the dismissal of the action for his eviction. As the first-instance court found in his favour, it was not open to him to challenge the judgment. The objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies was therefore dismissed.

A 6(1) obliged the courts to give reasons for their judgments, but could not be understood as requiring a detailed answer to every argument. The extent to which that duty to give reasons applied might vary according to the nature of the decision. It was necessary to take into account, inter alia, the diversity of the submissions that a litigant might bring before the courts and the differences existing in the Contracting States with regard to statutory provisions, customary rules, legal opinion and the presentation and drafting of judgments. That was why the question whether a court had failed to fulfil the obligation to state reasons, deriving from A 6, could only be determined in the light of the circumstances of the case. The applicant pleaded before the first instance court, inter alia, that the action brought by the lessor for his eviction was time-barred. The Audiencia Provincial was bound, under the applicable procedural law, to review all the submissions made at first instance, at least in so far as they had been 'the subject of argument' and regardless of whether they had been expressly repeated in the appeal. It was not the task of the Court to examine whether the limitation plea was well-founded. The submission was relevant. If the Audiencia Provincial had held the submission to be well-founded, it would of necessity have had to dismiss the plaintiff's action. The fact that the first-instance court allowed evidence to be adduced in support of this submission suggested the contrary. Accordingly, since the issue of limitation would have been decisive in this instance, the Audiencia Provincial should have addressed the submission in its judgment. It was therefore necessary to establish whether in the present case the silence of the appeal court could reasonably be construed as an implied rejection. The court was under no obligation to examine the question of limitation before considering the arguments on the merits. In addition, the question whether the action was time-barred fell within a completely different legal category from that of the grounds for termination of the lease; it therefore required a specific and express reply. In the absence of such a reply, it was impossible to ascertain whether the Audiencia Provincial simply neglected to deal with the submission that the action was out of time or whether it intended to dismiss it and, if that were its intention, what its reasons were for so deciding. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction in respect of the alleged non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (ESP 1,000,000).

Ruotolo v Italy 92/24

[Application lodged 15.9.1986; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mr Luigi Ruotolo was dismissed by the X Company in April 1979. On 18 October 1979 he applied to the Rome magistrates' court for reinstatement and damages. On 28 April 1981 the magistrates' court dismissed the applicant's claim. Following appeals, his case was referred by the Court of Cassation to the District Court. On 17 January 1987 the applicant resumed his action before the District Court which on 19 January 1989 allowed his petition for reinstatement and awarded him damages. The X company appealed against that decision to the Court of Cassation. The Court of Cassation gave judgment on 31 May 1991, but on 24 January 1992 the text of its judgment had still not been filed with the registry. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi (d).

The period to be taken into consideration began on 18 October 1979 when the proceedings were instituted in the Rome magistrates' court. It ended, at the earliest, on 31 May 1991, the date of the second judgment of the Court of Cassation. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Special diligence was necessary in employment disputes. The case was one of some complexity and the parties caused five adjournments of hearings. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. Viewed separately, several of the delays observed appeared normal; however, having regard to the sum of such periods and several delays for which the competent courts were responsible, an overall lapse of time of more than 12 years was excessive. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Ryllo v Italy 97/59

[Application lodged 30.4.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Giuseppe Ryllo was a retired headteacher. On 8 September 1984 he took early retirement. On 2 June 1987 he asked to be reappointed to his former post, but on 2 July 1988 the Ministry of Education refused his request. He appealed to the Lazio Regional Administrative Court, which, on 22 March 1989, set aside the Ministry's decision on the ground that no reasons had been given for it. On 5 May 1989 the applicant applied to be reinstated, but this request was likewise refused on 24 October 1989. He again applied to the Administrative Court for judicial review of the decision of 24 October. Following a hearing on 1 March 1995 the Administrative Court gave judgment in the applicant's favour. The text of its decision was deposited with the registry on 23 October 1995. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings

Disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the present case the applicant was seeking judicial review of the Ministry of Education's decision of 24 October 1989 refusing to reappoint him to the headteacher's post from which he had resigned in 1984. The dispute raised by him thus clearly related to his recruitment, career and termination of service. It did not, therefore, concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

S was a mason. In the early 1980s a protest movement broke out in Zürich directed against the sale of nuclear power stations to a Latin American country then under a military regime. Demonstrations, arson and attacks with explosives resulted. The applicant was suspected of being involved in the crimes and arrested. During the proceedings his contacts with his lawyer were subject to surveillance. Interviews with his lawyer were conducted in the presence of a policeman and his correspondence was intercepted. The Zürich Principal Public Prosecutor considered those measures necessary in view of the risk that the applicant's lawyer might collude with other lawyers or other co-accused. The appellant's appeals against the surveillance were dismissed. He complained, inter alia, that he had not been allowed to communicate with his lawyer freely and without supervision.

The Convention did not expressly guarantee the right of a person charged with a criminal offence to communicate with defence counsel without hindrance. However, an accused's right to communicate with his advocate out of hearing of a third person was part of the basic requirements of a fair trial in a democratic society and followed from A 6(3)(c). If a lawyer were unable to confer with his client and receive confidential instructions from him without such surveillance, his assistance would lose much of its usefulness, whereas the Convention was intended to guarantee rights that were practical and effective. The risk of 'collusion' relied on by the Government, notwithstanding the seriousness of the charges against the applicant, could not justify the restriction in issue and no other reason had been adduced cogent enough to do so. There was nothing extraordinary in a number of defence counsel collaborating with a view to co-ordinating their defence strategy. Moreover, neither the professional ethics of the lawyer, who had been designated as court-appointed defence counsel, nor the lawfulness of his conduct were at any time called into question in the case. Furthermore, the restriction in issue lasted for over seven months. The argument that the applicant was not prejudiced by the measures in question as he was able to make several applications for provisional release also had to be dismissed. A violation of the Convention did not necessarily imply the existence of damage. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(3)(c).

The applicant did not rely on A 6(3)(b) before the Court and there was no need for the Court to consider the question of its own motion.

Having regard to the conclusion in respect of A 6(3)(c), it was not necessary to consider the case from the point of view of A 5(4).

SR v Italy 98/26

Application lodged 5.5.1993; Commission report 28.5.1997; Court Judgment 23 April 1998]

Mr SR was a civil servant. On 27 July 1988 he applied to the Court of Audit in Rome for the annulment of decisions of the Minister of Transport and the Italian State Railway Company refusing his request to have an additional period of employment of about one year taken into account for the calculation of his pension. By a judgment of 10 May 1995, which was deposited with the registry on 11 September 1995, the Tuscany Regional Division allowed the applicant's claim in part. He complained of the length of the proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr U Lôhmus.

The relevant period began on 27 July 1988 when the applicant applied to the Court of Audit in Rome and ended on 11 September 1995 when the judgment of the Tuscany Regional Division of the Court of Audit was deposited with the registry. It therefore lasted a little over seven years and one month. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the applicant's conduct and that of the relevant authorities. The introduction of reform of the jurisdiction and organisation of the Court of Audit could not justify delays as the State was under a duty to organise the entry into force and implementation of such measures in a way that avoided prolonging the examination of pending cases. There were periods of inactivity which counted against the authorities. No criticism could be levelled at the appellant's conduct. The case was not particularly complex. The length of the proceedings could not be regarded as reasonable. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1).

[Applications lodged 29.3.1992; Commission report 27.6.1994; Court Judgment 22.11.1995]

The separate applications of SW and CR were heard together. SW married his wife in 1987. By 1990 the relationship had deteriorated and they were sleeping separately. On 18 September 1990, following an argument, his wife left the house. Later the same evening she re-entered the house and the applicant had sexual intercourse with her. She complained that she had been raped at knife-point. On 19 September 1990 the applicant was charged with rape and assault. He was convicted following trial and sentenced to imprisonment. His appeal was dismissed. He complained that, in breach of A 7, he was convicted in respect of conduct, namely the rape upon his wife, which at the relevant time did not constitute a criminal offence.

Court found unanimously NV 7.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr P Jambrek, Mr U Lôhmus.

The guarantee enshrined in A 7 occupied a prominent place in the Convention system of protection. It had to be construed and applied in such a way as to provide effective safeguards against arbitrary prosecution, conviction and punishment. Accordingly, A 7 was not confined to prohibiting the retrospective application of the criminal law to an accused's disadvantage: it also embodied, more generally, the principle that only the law can define a crime and prescribe a penalty and the principle that the criminal law must not be extensively construed to an accused's detriment, for instance by analogy. From those principles it followed that an offence had to be clearly defined in the law. That requirement was satisfied where the individual could know from the wording of the relevant provision and, if need be, with the assistance of the courts' interpretation of it, what acts and omissions will make him criminally liable. When speaking of 'law', A 7 alluded to the very same concept as that to which the Convention referred elsewhere when using that term, a concept which comprised written as well as unwritten law and implied qualitative requirements, notably those of accessibility and forseeability. However clearly drafted a legal provision might be, in any system of law, including criminal law, there was an inevitable element of judicial interpretation. There would always be a need for elucidation of doubtful points and for adaptation to changing circumstances. The applicant's conviction was based on the statutory offence of rape. The applicant did not dispute that the conduct for which he was convicted would have constituted rape within the meaning of the statutory definition of rape as applicable at the time, had the victim not been his wife. The question was whether removal of the marital immunity would conflict with the statutory definition of rape, in particular whether it would be prevented by the word 'unlawful'. The Court of Appeal carefully examined various strands of interpretation of the provision in the case-law, including the argument that the term 'unlawful' excluded intercourse within marriage from the definition of rape. The Court held that it was in the first place for the national authorities, notably the courts, to interpret and apply national law. It saw no reason to disagree with the Court of Appeal's conclusion, which was subsequently upheld by the House of Lords, that the word 'unlawful' in the definition of rape was merely surplusage and did not inhibit them from removing a common law fiction which had become anachronistic and offensive and from declaring that a rapist remains a rapist subject to the criminal law, irrespective of his relationship with his victim. The decisions of the Court of Appeal and then the House of Lords did no more than continue a perceptible line of case-law development dismantling the immunity of a husband from prosecution for rape upon his wife. There was no doubt under the law as it stood at the dates of the offences that a husband who forcibly had sexual intercourse with his wife could, in various circumstances, be found guilty of rape. Moreover, there was an evident evolution, which was consistent with the very essence of the offence, of the criminal law through judicial interpretation towards treating such conduct generally as within the scope of the offence of rape. This evolution had reached a stage where judicial recognition of the absence of immunity had become a reasonably foreseeable development of the law. The essentially debasing character of rape was so manifest that the result of the decisions of the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords could not be said to be at variance with the object and purpose of A 7, namely to ensure that no one should be subjected to arbitrary prosecution, conviction or punishment. The abandonment of the unacceptable idea of a husband being immune against prosecution for rape of his wife was in conformity not only with a civilised concept of marriage but also, and above all, with the fundamental objectives of the Convention, the very essence of which was respect for human dignity and human freedom. The national courts' decisions that the applicant could not invoke immunity to escape conviction and sentence for rape upon his wife did not give rise to a violation of his right under A 7(1). It was not necessary to enquire into whether the facts in the case were covered by the exceptions to the immunity rule already made by the English courts before 12 November 1989 or 18 September 1990.

Sabeur Ben Ali v Malta 00/172

[Application lodged 21.2.1997; Court Judgment 29.6.2000]

Mr Ben Nasr Sabeur Ben Ali was arrested on 17 March 1995 for drug-related offences. On 19 March 1995 he was brought before the Court of Magistrates and remanded in custody. On conclusion of the inquiry on 4 April 1995, he was committed for trial. On 29 July 1996 he applied to the Court of Magistrates for provisional release. The application was communicated to the Attorney General, who was given 24 hours to reply. The parties were heard on 31 July 1996 and on 1 August 1996 the magistrate rejected the application because he was not satisfied that, if the applicant was released, there would be no interference with the due administration of justice. The trial commenced on 4 February 1997. On 5 February 1997 the applicant was acquitted of all charges and was released from custody. He complained that the Court of Magistrates before which he appeared on 19 March 1995 did not have the power to examine the reasonableness of the suspicion against him and that he could not obtain a review of his detention.

Court found unanimously V 5(3), V 5(4).

Judges: Mr CL Rozakis, President, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mr M Fischbach, Mr E Levits.

A 5(3) provided persons arrested or detained on suspicion of having committed a criminal offence with a guarantee against any arbitrary or unjustified deprivation of liberty. According to the Court's case-law, the opening part of A 5(3) required prompt automatic review by a judicial officer of the merits of the detention. The applicant's appearance before the Court of Magistrates on 19 March 1995 was not capable of ensuring respect for A 5(3) because, as established in Aquilina v M, that court had no power to review automatically the merits of the detention. Since A 5(3) guaranteed an automatic right to be brought before a judge, the fact that the national law gave the applicant the possibility, which he did not use, of lodging an application challenging the lawfulness of his detention and a bail application, the latter after the conclusion of the inquiry, was not sufficient to satisfy the requirements of A 5(3). The applicant could not obtain an automatic ruling by a domestic judicial authority on whether there existed a reasonable suspicion against him and therefore there had been a breach of A 5(3).

The aim of A 5(4) was to ensure a speedy review of the lawfulness of detention. The Government in support of their contention that the applicant could have obtained a review of the lawfulness of his detention invoked s 137 of the Criminal Code, but did not refer to any instances in which s 137 was successfully invoked to challenge the lawfulness of arrest or detention on suspicion of a criminal offence. They had therefore not shown that the applicant could have obtained a review of the lawfulness of his detention by relying on s 137 of the Criminal Code. With regard to a constitutional application, such an application involved a referral to the Civil Court and the possibility of an appeal to the Constitutional Court. That was a cumbersome procedure in which the proceedings were invariably longer than what would qualify as speedy for A 5(4). It followed that lodging a constitutional application would not have ensured a speedy review of the lawfulness of the applicant's detention. Finally, the applicant could not have obtained a review of the lawfulness of his detention by lodging a bail application, the question of bail coming into play only when the detention was lawful. It had not been shown that the applicant had at his disposal under domestic law a remedy for challenging the lawfulness of his detention. A 5(4) was therefore violated.

[Application lodged 28.3.1997; Court Judgment 12.5.1999]

Mr Giacomo Saccomanno was a lawyer. In 1990 he was charged with malicious accusation. On 8 January 1997 he was acquitted. The judgment was lodged with the registry on 19 February 1997. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr CL Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 8 October 1990 and ended on 19 February 1997. It had lasted more than six years and four months at one level of jurisdiction. The case had not been complex. Although some of the delay was due to the applicant, that did not justify the length of the intervals between hearings, nor above all, the overall length of the proceedings. There had been several long periods of inactivity for which the judicial authorities had been responsible and in respect of which the Government had advanced no explanation. Saïdi v France (1994) 17 EHRR 251 93/36

[Application lodged 17.1.1989; Commission report 14.5.1992; Court Judgment 20.9.1993]

Mr Fahrat Saïdi, a Tunisian national, was a bricklayer. On 29 May 1986 the Nice police arrested him and on 30 May 1986 he was charged with possession and supply of heroin and involuntary homicide. He was committed with others for trial. On 3 February 1987 the Nice Criminal Court sentenced him to imprisonment and an order permanently excluding him from French territory. His appeals to the Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation were unsuccessful. He complained of the refusal of the judicial authorities to organise a confrontation with the prosecution witnesses who had identified him.

Comm found by majority (13–1) V 6(1) and (3)(d).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1), 6(3)(d).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr C Russo, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha.

The applicant provided the French courts with the opportunity which was in principle intended to be afforded to the Contracting States by A 26, to prevent or to put right the violations alleged against them. The objection based on a failure to exhaust the domestic remedies was therefore unfounded.

The taking of evidence was governed primarily by the rules of domestic law and it was in principle for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task under the Convention was to ascertain whether the proceedings in their entirety, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair. All the evidence normally had to be produced in the presence of the accused at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument. However, the use as evidence of statements obtained at the stage of the police inquiry and the judicial investigation was not in itself inconsistent with A 6(3)(d) and 6(1), provided that the rights of the defence had been respected. As a rule those rights required that the defendant be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him either when he was making his statements or at a later stage of the proceedings. In convicting the applicant the two courts which tried him referred to no evidence other than the statements obtained prior to the trial. The testimony of drug dealers constituted the sole basis for the applicant's conviction, after having been the only ground for his committal for trial. Yet neither at the stage of the investigation nor during the trial was the applicant able to examine or have examined the witnesses concerned. The lack of any confrontation deprived him in certain respects of a fair trial. The Court was fully aware of the undeniable difficulties of the fight against drug-trafficking – in particular with regard to obtaining and producing evidence – and of the ravages caused to society by the drug problem, but such considerations could not justify restricting to this extent the rights of the defence of everyone charged with a criminal offence. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1) and 6(3)(d).

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction. Costs and expenses (FF 42,000).

[Application lodged 29.4.1987; Commission report 10.7.1991; Court Judgment 16.12.1992]

Mr Jean-Pierre Sainte-Marie was a farmer. On 30 January 1985 he was arrested in connection with an inquiry into a bomb attack carried out against a police station by Iparretarrak, a clandestine Basque separatist movement. He was charged first with firearms offences and criminal conspiracy and second with using explosives to cause criminal damage. The two sets of proceedings were conducted in parallel both as regards review of the detention on remand and for the investigation and trial. His appeals against his detention were dismissed. In October 1985 he was convicted by the Court of Appeal. Two of the judges in the Pau Court of Appeal had previously heard his appeal against his detention on remand. He complained of the impartiality of the tribunal.

Comm found by majority (14–5) NV 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (8–1) NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (d), Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou.

Regarding the Government's objection of failure to exhaust his domestic remedies, the applicant's complaint before the Convention organs was directed at something completely different from that suggested by the Government. The preliminary objection was therefore devoid of purpose.

The mere fact that a judge had already taken pre-trial decisions in the case, including decisions relating to detention on remand, could not in itself justify fears as to his impartiality. Only special circumstances might warrant a different conclusion. There was nothing of that nature in the present case. The judges based their decision on the applicant's own statements. He did not retract those statements and never claimed that they had been obtained under duress. They were moreover corroborated by uncontested physical evidence. The judges made a brief assessment of the available facts in order to establish whether prima facie the police suspicions had some substance and gave grounds for fearing that there was a risk of the accused's absconding. Accordingly, the participation of the judges in the adoption of the judgment did not undermine the impartiality of the Criminal Appeals Division since the applicant's misgivings could not be regarded as objectively justified. There had therefore been no violation of A 6(1).

Sakik and Others v Turkey (1998) 26 EHRR 662 97/90

[Application lodged 11.3.1994; Commission report 23.5.1996; Court Judgment 26.11.1997]

Mr Sirri Sakik, Mr Ahmet Türk, Mr Mahmut Alinak, Mrs Leyla Zana, Mr Mehmet Hatip Dicle and Mr Orhan Dogan were members of the Turkish National Assembly who were elected at the general election of 20 October 1991. At that time they were members of the People's Labour Party, which was founded in June 1990 but proscribed and dissolved by the Constitutional Court on 14 August 1993 on account of what were held to be separatist activities. By that date the applicants had joined the Democracy Party which had been set up in the meantime. In early March 1994 the National Assembly lifted their parliamentary immunity and the applicants were arrested, having been accused by the public prosecutor of committing terrorist crimes. They were detained pending trial. On 21 March 1994 the Constitutional Court dismissed appeals lodged by the applicants against the lifting of their parliamentary immunity. On 8 December 1994 the National Security Court sentenced Mr Sakik and Mr Alinak to three years and six months' imprisonment for separatist propaganda and Mr Türk, Mr Dicle, Mr Dogan and Mrs Zana to 15 years' imprisonment for membership of an armed gang. On appeal the Court of Cassation quashed Mr Türk's conviction on 26 October 1995 and ordered his release but upheld the other applicants' convictions. They complained inter alia of the lawfulness and length of their detention in police custody, the impossibility of securing review by a court and the lack of a right to compensation.

Comm found unanimously NV 5(1), V 5(3), (4) and (5).

Court found unanimously Turkey's derogation under 15 was not applicable, NV 5(1), V 5(3), dismissed the Government's preliminary objection relating to 5(4), V 5(4), dismissed both limbs of the Government's preliminary objection relating to 5(5), the second of which it joined to and considered with the merits, found V 5(5).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr P Kûris.

The derogation applied only to the region where a state of emergency had been proclaimed, which did not include the city of Ankara. However, the applicants' arrest and detention took place in Ankara. A 15 authorised derogations from the obligations arising from the Convention only 'to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation'. The Court would be working against the object and purpose of that provision if, when assessing the territorial scope of the derogation concerned, it were to extend its effects to a part of Turkish territory not explicitly named in the notice of derogation. It followed that the derogation in question was inapplicable ratione loci to the facts of the case.

In their memorial the applicants accepted the Commission's conclusion that A 5(1) had not been breached. Consequently, they presented no argument regarding this complaint to the Court which likewise considered that no breach of A 5(1) had been established.

The Court recalled its case-law on the effects of A 5 on the investigation of terrorist offences. The applicants' detention in police custody had lasted 12 days in the case of Mr Sakik, Mr Türk, Mr Alinak and Mrs Zana, and 14 days in the case of Mr Dicle and Mr Dogan. Even if the activities of which the applicants stood accused were linked to a terrorist threat, the Court could not accept that it was necessary to detain them for 12 or 14 days without judicial intervention. Accordingly, there had been a breach of A 5(3).

The Government's preliminary objection on the ground of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies in respect of A 5(4) was not raised before the Commission and was therefore inadmissible on the grounds of estoppel.

The single judge who had ordered the applicants' detention pending trial did not intervene until 12 or 14 days after their arrest. Such a lengthy period sat ill with the notion of 'speedily'. The existence of a remedy had to be sufficiently certain, failing which it would lack the accessibility and effectiveness required for the purposes of A 5(4). There was no example of any person detained in police custody having successfully invoked A 19(8) of the Constitution or A 5(4) of the Convention when applying to a judge for a ruling on the lawfulness of his detention or for his release. The lack of precedents indicated the uncertainty of that remedy in practice. There had been a breach of A 5(4).

The first limb of the preliminary objection regarding non-exhaustion of remedies in respect of A 5(5) was not raised before the Commission and was therefore inadmissible on grounds of estoppel. The second limb was closely linked to consideration of the complaint under A 5(5) and therefore joined to the merits. There was no example of any litigant obtaining compensation referred to in A 5(5) by relying on one of the provisions mentioned by the Government. The effective enjoyment of the right guaranteed by A 5(5) was not ensured with a sufficient degree of certainty. Therefore the Court dismissed the second limb of the Government's preliminary objection and concluded that there had been a breach of A 5(5).

Non-pecuniary damage (FF 25,000 each to Mr Sakik, Mr Türk, Mr Alinak and Mrs Zana and FF 30,000 each to Mr Dicle and Mr Dogan), costs and expenses (FF 120,000).

Salabiaku v France (1991) 13 EHRR 379 88/12

[Application lodged 29.7.1983; Commission report 16.7.1987; Court Judgment 7.10.1988]

Mr Amosi Salabiaku was a Zairean who was arrested at Roissy Airport when collecting a trunk which was subsequently found to contain a large quantity of cannabis. The applicant asserted that he was unaware of the presence of the cannabis and that he had mistaken the trunk for a parcel he had come to collect. He was charged with both the criminal offence of illegally importing narcotics and the customs offence of smuggling prohibited goods and committed for trial. He was convicted and sentenced to two years' imprisonment, a prohibition on residing in French territory and a fine. On 9 February 1982, the Paris Court of Appeal set aside the judgment with regard to the criminal offence of illegal importation of narcotics but upheld the first-instance decision as regards the customs offence of smuggling prohibited goods. The Court of Cassation dismissed the appeal on 21 February 1983. The applicant complained that the presumption on the basis of which he was convicted of a customs offence was incompatible with A 6.

Contracting States were free to apply the criminal law to an act where it was not carried out in the normal exercise of one of the rights protected under the Convention and, accordingly, to define the constituent elements of the resulting offence. Contracting States could, under certain conditions, penalise a simple or objective fact as such, irrespective of whether it resulted from criminal intent or from negligence. However, the applicant was not convicted for mere possession of unlawfully imported prohibited goods but for smuggling prohibited goods. The shift from the idea of accountability in criminal law to the notion of guilt showed the relative nature of the distinction. It raised a question with regard to A 6(2). Presumptions of fact or of law operated in every legal system and the Convention did not prohibit such presumptions in principle. However, it required the Contracting States to remain within certain limits which took into account the importance of what was at stake and maintained the rights of the defence. The prosecuting authority had to establish possession of the smuggled goods. This was a simple finding of fact. The applicant could be accorded the benefit of extenuating circumstances and acquitted if he succeeded in establishing a case of force majeure. It was clear from the judgments that the courts in question were careful to avoid resorting automatically to the presumption laid down in the Customs Code and did not apply the Customs Code in a way which conflicted with the presumption of innocence.

The applicant's complaints under A 6(1) to a large extent corresponded to those which he formulated under A 6(2). There were no ground for departing from the conclusion reached in considering specifically the presumption of innocence. For the rest, the evidence adduced did not disclose any failure to comply with the various requirements of A 6(1). In particular, the proceedings at first instance, on appeal and in the Court of Cassation were fully judicial and adversarial in nature.

Salerno v Italy 92/65

Mr Vincenzo Salerno brought proceedings against the notaries' pension fund before the Rome magistrates' court in June 1973. He said, as he had worked as an auxiliary notary for 19 years and had paid contributions into the notaries' pension fund, he sought recognition of his right to join the fund and to draw the pension payable to its members. The Court of Cassation dismissed his application. On 8 April 1982 the applicant instituted further proceedings in the Rome magistrates' court to have the notaries' pension fund repay old-age pension contributions he had paid into it.

His claim was dismissed by the magistrates' court. His appeal to the Rome District Court was dismissed the appeal and an appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed on 12 June 1986, the judgment being filed with the registry on 1 April 1987. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (16–4) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr SK Martens (c), Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel (c), Mr R Pekkanen (c), Mr AN Loizou.

This was a disputed issue, on which only the competent courts could rule. The first action, which was finally disposed of by the Court of Cassation, was brought to secure recognition of a right to old-age benefits, whereas the second action, which ended on 1 April 1987, was for repayment of contributions to the pension fund in question. The courts to which the fresh application was made in 1982 acknowledged that the applicant's arguments were sufficiently tenable, since they held the action to be admissible. The claimed right was undoubtedly a civil one, thus A 6(1) applied.

The period to be considered began on 8 April 1982, with the institution of proceedings against the notaries' pension fund in the Rome magistrates' court, and ended on 1 April 1987, when the Court of Cassation's judgment was filed. It therefore lasted for nearly five years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. There were several periods of inactivity on the part of the judicial authorities. Nevertheless, having regard to the fact that the case came before three different courts, the delays that occurred did not appear substantial enough for the total length of the proceedings to have exceeded an acceptable limit in the circumstances of the present case. There had accordingly been no breach of A 6(1).

Salesi v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR 187 93/10

[Application lodged 12.6.1987; Commission report 20.2.1992; Court Judgment 26.2.1993]

Mrs Enrica Salesi instituted proceedings on 28 February 1986 against the Minister of the Interior before the Rome magistrates' court seeking payment of a monthly disability allowance which the Lazio social-security department had refused her. On 2 December 1986 the court ordered the Minister of the Interior to pay the allowance requested. On 21 April 1987 the Minister of the Interior appealed and on 24 May 1989 the Rome District Court dismissed the appeal. The Minister's appeal on points of law was dismissed by the Court of Cassation in a judgment of 5 June 1991, filed in the registry on 10 March 1992. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found by majority (13–8) V 6(1).

Court unanimously found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr F Bigi.

The Court recalled Feldbrugge v NL and Deumeland v D, as to the applicability of A 6(1) to social security disputes. Nevertheless, the development in the law that was initiated by those judgments and the principle of equality of treatment warranted taking the view that now the general rule was that A 6(1) did apply in the field of social insurance. The present case raised the question of welfare assistance and not social insurance. There were differences between the two, but they could not be regarded as fundamental at the present stage of development of social security law. State intervention was not sufficient to establish that A 6(1) was inapplicable. Despite the public law features of the case, the applicant was not affected in her relations with the administrative authorities as such, acting in the exercise of discretionary powers; she suffered an interference with her means of subsistence and was claiming an individual, economic right flowing from specific rules laid down in a statute giving effect to the Constitution. The protection of that basic right was, moreover, organised in such a way that at the judicial stage disputes over it came within the jurisdiction of the ordinary court, the labour magistrates' court. A 6(1) therefore applied in the instant case.

The period to be considered began on 28 February 1986, when proceedings were instituted against the Minister of the Interior in the Rome magistrates' court, and ended on 10 March 1992, when the Court of Cassation's judgment was filed. It therefore lasted a little over six years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was not a complex one and the applicant's conduct did not substantially contribute to the length of the proceedings. There were delays on the part of the judicial authorities. As to the argument based on the backlog of cases in the appellate court, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. In addition, in view of what was at stake for the applicant, the period of time which elapsed in the case was not reasonable.

Salgueiro da Silva Mouta v Portugal 99/125

[Application lodged 12.2.1996; Court Judgment 21.12.1999]

Mr João Manuel Salgueiro da Silva Mouta married his wife in 1983 and they had a daughter, M, born on 2 November 1987. The applicant and his wife separated in 1990 and since then he had been in a homosexual relationship. They started divorce proceedings in which they reached an agreement giving parental responsibility to the mother and access to the applicant. However, she refused the applicant access to M. He sought an order giving him parental responsibility for the child which was granted by the Family Affairs Court in 1994. M stayed with the applicant until 1995 when, he alleged, she was abducted by her mother. Criminal proceedings were pending in that regard. His wife's appeal resulted in the Court of Appeal reversing the lower court's judgment, holding that generally a young child should not be separated from its mother and stating that a homosexual environment could not be claimed to be healthy for a child's development, given that, in the Court of Appeal's view, it was an abnormal situation. The court granted the applicant a contact order but it was never complied with. He complained of a violation of A 8 alone and together with A 14.

Court found unanimously V 14+8.

Judges: Mr M Pellonpää, President, Mr G Ress, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mrs N Vajic.

Regarding the difference in treatment, the Court of Appeal had acted correctly in considering the interest of the child, basing its decision on the facts of the case and the law allowing it to award parental responsibility to one parent rather than the other. However, in reversing the decision of the lower court and awarding parental responsibility to the mother rather than the father, the Court of Appeal had had regard to a new factor, namely that the applicant was a homosexual living with another man. There had therefore been a difference in treatment between the applicant and M's mother based on the applicant's sexual orientation, which fell within A 14 since the list set out in that article was not exhaustive. Regarding the justification for the difference of treatment, the Court of Appeal had pursued a legitimate aim in reaching its decision, namely the protection of the child's health and rights. The comments of the Court of Appeal (that the child must live in a traditional Portuguese family and that it was unnecessary to examine whether or not homosexuality was an illness or sexual orientation, either way it was an abnormality and children must not grow up in the shadow of abnormal situations) were not simply clumsy or unfortunate or obiter dicta, they suggested that the applicant's homosexuality had been decisive in the decision to award parental responsibility to the mother. That conclusion was supported by the fact that when ruling on the applicant's rights of access, the Court of Appeal had discouraged the applicant from behaving during visits in a way that would make the child aware that he was living with another man as if they were spouses. The Court of Appeal had drawn a distinction dictated by considerations as to the applicant's sexual orientation and there had been a violation of A 14+8.

Having regard to the above conclusion it was not necessary to examine A 8 taken in isolation, the arguments on that point were similar in substance with those already examined under A 14+8.

Present judgment constituted just satisfaction for alleged damage. Costs (PTE 350,000) and expenses (PTE 1,800,000).

Salman v Turkey 00/170

[Application lodged 20.5.1993; Commission report 1.5.1999; Court Judgment 27.6.2000]

Mrs Behiye Salman's husband, Agit Salman, was detained by police on 28/29 April 1992 on suspicion of aiding and abetting the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) and subsequently died. The facts were disputed between the parties. The applicant complained that her husband had died as a result of being tortured while in police custody. She relied on A 2, 3, 6, 13, 14 and 18 of the Convention. In the course of the proceedings, she further alleged that she had been hindered in the effective exercise of the right of individual petition as guaranteed by former A 25(1).

Comm found unanimously V 2 on account of the death in custody of the applicant's husband, V 3 in that her husband had been tortured, V 13, NV 14 and 18, that Turkey had failed to comply with its obligations under former 25.

Court dismissed by majority (16–1) the Government's preliminary objection, found (16–1) V 2 in respect of the death of Agit Salman in custody, unanimously V 2 in that the authorities failed to carry out an adequate and effective investigation into the circumstances of Agit Salman's death in custody, unanimously V 3, (16–1) V 13, unanimously that the respondent State has failed to comply with its obligations under former 25(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Bonello (c), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall, Mrs N Vajic, Mrs HS Greve (c), Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova, Mr M Ugrekhelidze, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), ad hoc judge.

The Court recalled its case-law relating to the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies. With respect to an action in administrative law based on the authorities' strict liability, a Contracting State's obligation under A 2 and 13 of the Convention to conduct an investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible in cases of fatal assault might be rendered illusory if in respect of complaints under those articles an applicant were to be required to exhaust an administrative law action leading only to an award of damages. Consequently, the applicant was not required to bring the administrative proceedings in question and the preliminary objection was in that respect unfounded. The preliminary objection based on administrative law was therefore dismissed. As regards a civil action for redress for damage sustained through illegal acts or patently unlawful conduct on the part of State agents, the plaintiff in such an action had to establish a causal link between the tort and the damage and identify the person believed to have committed the tort. In the present case there was no evidence as to which police officer was responsible and the report from the Forensic Medicine Institute did not establish that any unlawful acts had occurred. With regard to the criminal law remedies, the trial terminated in an acquittal of the police officers on the basis that there was insufficient evidence to establish that they had ill-treated her husband prior to his death or to establish that he had died because of ill-treatment. The applicant has argued that in those circumstances a further appeal had no reasonable prospect of success. The issues were closely linked to the complaints regarding the ineffectiveness of the investigation and therefore that aspect of the preliminary objection was joined to the merits.

A 2 ranked as one of the most fundamental provisions in the Convention, to which no derogation was permitted. A 2 had to be interpreted and applied so as to make its safeguards practical and effective. Any use of force had to be no more than 'absolutely necessary' for the achievement of one or more of the purposes set out in sub-paras (a)–(c). The force used had to be strictly proportionate to the achievement of the permitted aims. In the light of the importance of the protection afforded by A 2, the Court had to subject deprivations of life to the most careful scrutiny, taking into consideration not only the actions of State agents but also all the surrounding circumstances. Persons in custody were in a vulnerable position and the authorities were under a duty to protect them. Consequently, where an individual was taken into police custody in good health and was found to be injured on release, it was incumbent on the State to provide a plausible explanation of how those injuries were caused. The obligation on the authorities to account for the treatment of an individual in custody was particularly stringent where that individual died. In assessing evidence, the general principle applied in cases had been to apply the standard of proof 'beyond reasonable doubt'. However, such proof may follow from the co-existence of sufficiently strong, clear and concordant inferences or of similar unrebutted presumptions of fact. Where the events in issue lay wholly, or in large part, within the exclusive knowledge of the authorities, as in the case of persons within their control in custody, strong presumptions of fact would arise in respect of injuries and death occurring during that detention. Indeed, the burden of proof may be regarded as resting on the authorities to provide a satisfactory and convincing explanation. Agit Salman was taken into custody in apparent good health and without any pre-existing injuries or active illness. No plausible explanation had been provided for the injuries to the left ankle, bruising and swelling of the left foot, the bruise to the chest and the broken sternum. The evidence did not support the Government's contention that injuries might have been caused on arrest nor that the broken sternum was caused by cardiac massage after a heart attack brought on by the stress of his detention. The Government had not accounted for the death of Agit Salman during his detention and their responsibility for his death was engaged. There had been a violation of A 2 in that respect.

While an autopsy investigation was of critical importance in determining the facts surrounding Agit Salman's death, the procedure was defective thereby fundamentally undermining any attempt to determine police responsibility for Agit Salman's death. Furthermore, the indictment named indiscriminately all the officers known to have come in to contact with Agit Salman from his arrest to his death without adducing evidence concerning the more precise identification of the officers who did, or could have, ill-treated Agit Salman. In those circumstances, an appeal to the Court of Cassation had no effective prospect of clarifying or improving the evidence available. That being so, the applicant had to be regarded as having complied with the requirement to exhaust the relevant criminal law remedies. The authorities failed to carry out an effective investigation into the circumstances surrounding Agit Salman's death thus rendering recourse to civil remedies equally ineffective in the circumstances. Therefore the criminal and civil proceedings limb of the Government's preliminary objection were dismissed. There had been a violation of A 2 in this respect.

The Government had not provided a plausible explanation for the marks and injuries found on Agit Salman's body after he had entered custody in apparent good health. The bruising and swelling on the left foot combined with the grazes on the left ankle were consistent with the application of falaka. It was not likely to have been caused accidentally. The bruise to the chest overlying a fracture in the sternum was also more consistent with a blow to the chest than a fall. Those injuries, unaccounted for by the Government, had therefore to be considered attributable to a form of ill-treatment for which the authorities were responsible. Having regard to the nature and degree of the ill-treatment and to the strong inferences that could be drawn from the evidence that it occurred during interrogation about Agit Salman's suspected participation in PKK activities, it involved very serious and cruel suffering that could be characterised as torture. There had therefore been a breach of A 3.

Given the fundamental importance of the right to protection of life, A 13 required, in addition to the payment of compensation where appropriate, a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible for the deprivation of life and including effective access for the complainant to the investigation procedure. The Government were responsible under A 2 and 3 of the Convention for the death and torture in custody of the applicant's husband. The applicant's complaints in this regard were therefore arguable for the purposes of A 13. The authorities thus had an obligation to carry out an effective investigation into the circumstances of the death of the applicant's husband. No effective criminal investigation could be considered to have been conducted in accordance with A 13, the requirements of which may be broader than the obligation to investigate imposed by the article. The applicant had therefore been denied an effective remedy in respect of the death of her husband and thereby access to any other available remedies at her disposal, including a claim for compensation. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 13.

Having regard to the findings under A 2, 3 and 13 above, it was not necessary to determine whether the failings identified in the case were part of a practice adopted by the authorities.

It was of the utmost importance for the effective operation of the system of individual petition instituted by former A 25 (now A 34) that applicants or potential applicants should be able to communicate freely with the Convention organs without being subjected to any form of pressure from the authorities to withdraw or modify their complaints. In this context, pressure included not only direct coercion and flagrant acts of intimidation but also other improper indirect acts or contacts designed to dissuade or discourage applicants from pursuing a Convention remedy. Whether or not contacts between the authorities and an applicant were tantamount to unacceptable practices from the standpoint of former A 25(1) had to be determined in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The applicant was questioned by police officers from the Adana Anti-Terror Department on 24 January 1996 and by police officers again on 9 February 1996. The record of interview showed that she was questioned, not only about her declaration of means, but also about how she introduced her application to the Commission and with whose assistance. Furthermore, the Government had not denied that the applicant was blindfolded while at the Adana Anti-Terror Department. That would have increased the applicant's vulnerability causing her anxiety and distress and amounted to oppressive treatment. There was no plausible reason as to why the applicant was questioned twice about her legal aid application and in particular why the questioning was by Anti-Terror Department police officers, whom the applicant had claimed were responsible for the death of her husband. The applicant must have felt intimidated by these contacts with the authorities. That constituted undue interference with her petition to the Convention organs. The respondent State had therefore failed to comply with its obligations under former A 25(1) of the Convention.

[Application lodged 10.5.1982; Commission report 13.12.1984; Court Judgment 21.10.1986]

The applicant was arrested in Switzerland with a view to extradition, but he objected and applied for provisional release. He complained that the procedures adopted by the Federal Court for considering his requests for release breached A 5(4).

Comm found unanimously V 5(4) because the requirements of the procedures and the speed laid down therein had not been complied with in the proceedings in question.

Court by majority found V 5(4) on account of non-compliance with procedural guarantees and on account of the failure to take decisions speedily.

It was the duty of national judicial authorities to ensure that pre-trial detention did not exceed a reasonable time. A sine qua non for continued detention was the persistence of a reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence but after a certain time that was no longer sufficient and the Court had to establish whether the other grounds were relevant and sufficient and if the national courts had displayed special diligence. In this case the procedure followed, viewed as a whole, did not fully comply with the guarantees afforded by A 5(4) because it did not provide the applicant with the benefit of an adversarial procedure. Furthermore, because the matter was particularly straightforward, the time which elapsed between the lodging of the requests and the decisions thereon did not satisfy the requirements of speed laid down in A 5(4).

Sander v United Kingdom 00/147

[Application lodged 22.7.1996; Court Judgment 9.5.2000]

Mr Kudlip S Sander, an Asian, together with co-accused appeared before the Birmingham Crown Court, composed of a judge and a jury, to be tried for conspiracy to defraud. During the trial one of the jurors wrote a note to the court in which he alleged that at least two of the other jurors had made openly racist remarks and jokes. After discussing the matter with counsel in chambers and hearing submissions in open court, the judge recalled the jury and reminded them of their oath and to search their consciences and indicate if they were unable to try the case solely on the evidence. The next morning the judge received two letters from the jury. The first letter, which was signed by all the jurors including the juror who had sent the complaint, refuted the allegations and confirmed their intention to reach a verdict without any racial bias. The second letter was written by a juror who appeared to have thought himself to have been the one who had been making the jokes. He apologised if he had given any offence, that he was somebody who had many connections with people from ethnic minorities and that he was in no way racially biased. The judge decided that he would not discharge the jury. The jury found the applicant guilty, but acquitted another Asian co-accused. The applicant was sentenced to five years' imprisonment. His appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed. The applicant complained that he was not tried by an impartial tribunal.

Court found by majority (4–3) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr J-P Costa (d), President, Sir Nicolas Bratza (d), Mr L Loucaides (pc/pd), Mr P Kûris, Mr W Fuhrmann (d), Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

It was of fundamental importance in a democratic society that the courts inspired confidence in the public and, as far as criminal proceedings were concerned, in the accused. To that end a tribunal, including a jury, had to be impartial from a subjective as well as an objective point of view. The personal impartiality of a judge had to be presumed until there was proof to the contrary. The same held true in respect of jurors. It was established that at least one juror had made comments that could be understood as jokes about Asians. That did not on its own amount to evidence that the juror in question was actually biased against the applicant. Since it was not possible for the trial judge to question the jurors about the true nature of those comments and the exact context in which they had been made, it had not been established that the court that tried the applicant was lacking in impartiality from a subjective point of view. Regarding objective impartiality, the letter from all the jurors could not on its own discredit the allegations contained in the original note, because, first, one of the jurors wrote a separate letter indirectly admitting that he had been making racist jokes, which in the context of judicial proceedings, took on a different hue and assumed a different significance from jokes made in the context of a more intimate and informal atmosphere; secondly, the collective letter was also signed by the juror who had submitted the note, thus casting some doubt on the credibility of the letter and since the identity of the juror was known he must have compromised his position vis-à-vis his fellow jurors; thirdly, openly admitting to racism was something which the average person would have a natural tendency to avoid. A fortiori, an open admission of racism could not be easily expected from a person in jury service, the latter being generally regarded an important civic duty. Therefore, the collective denial of the allegations contained in the note could not in itself provide a satisfactory solution to the problem. Generally speaking, an admonition or direction by a judge, however clear, detailed and forceful, would not change racist views overnight. Although in the present case it could not be assumed that such views were indeed held by one or more jurors, it had been established that at least one juror had been making racist comments. In those circumstances, the direction given by the judge to the jury could not dispel the reasonable impression and fear of a lack of impartiality, which were based on the original note. Under domestic law the judge could not question the jurors on the allegations contained in the note. Nor could the co-accused's acquittal be of decisive importance, since there was nothing to indicate that the two cases were comparable. Finally, the fact that the Court of Appeal rejected the applicant's appeal applying principles that corresponded to the Convention case-law could offer only limited assistance to the Court in the present case. The allegations contained in the note were capable of causing the applicant and any objective observer legitimate doubts as to the impartiality of the court, which neither the collective letter nor the redirection of the jury by the judge could have dispelled. The case of Gregory v UK could be distinguished as there was no admission by a juror that he had made racist comments, in the form of a joke or otherwise; there was no indication as to who had made the complaint and the complaint was vague and imprecise. Although discharging the jury might not always be the only means to achieve a fair trial, there were certain circumstances where this was required by A 6(1). Given the importance attached by all Contracting States to the need to combat racism, the judge should have reacted in a more robust manner than merely seeking vague assurances that the jurors could set aside their prejudices and try the case solely on the evidence. By failing to do so, the judge did not provide sufficient guarantees to exclude any objectively justified or legitimate doubts as to the impartiality of the court. It followed that the court that condemned the applicant was not impartial from an objective point of view. There was, therefore, a violation of A 6(1).

Dismissed unanimously the applicant's claims for just satisfaction as no causal link established between the violation found and the claimed damage.

[Application lodged 4.3.1985; Commission report 6.11.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991]

Mr Franco Santilli operated a food-production business. On 24 July 1979 he obtained a loan from a finance institution on condition that the sum would be used solely for equipping the firm. On 11 September the amount was paid into the applicant's account, but the bank used it to offset his overdraft. He brought proceedings against his bank on 27 September 1979. Judgment was delivered against the applicant on 19 July 1984. The applicant's trustee in bankruptcy appealed on 7 December 1984 and the appeal was dismissed in a judgment dated 6 May 1986, filed on 18 June 1986. He complained of the length of the civil proceedings and of the disregard of his right to peaceful enjoyment of his possessions.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), NV P1A1.

The period to be considered began on 27 September 1979, when the summons was served on the defendant. It ended on 18 June 1986, when the Court of Appeal's judgment was filed. It had lasted just under six years, nine months. States had to organise their legal systems so as to allow the courts to comply with the requirement of reasonable time. In assessing the reasonableness of the length of the proceedings, account had to be taken of the complexity of the case, conduct of the applicant and of the competent authorities. The present case was complex but there had been long periods of total inactivity by the trial court. The lapse of time was not reasonable; there had been a breach of A 6(1).

In the circumstances of the case and the conclusion above, it was not necessary to determine also the complaint based on P1A1.

Santos v Portugal 99/42

[Application lodged 4.2.1997; Court Judgment 22.7.1999]

Mr Cassiano Santos lodged a criminal complaint against a bad cheque on 20 June 1991. In May 1993, he claimed damages against the defendant. The defendant could not be found and he was summonsed by the display of notices. The defendant received the case file on 8 February 1997 and the case was set for trial. The trial was adjourned sine die when the judge fell ill. On 19 March 1999 the case was set down for trial for 11 October 2000. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr M Pellonpää, President, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mrs N Vajic, Mrs S Botoucharova.

The period to be taken into consideration began not when the criminal complaint was lodged on 20 June 1991, but when the action in damages was brought on 7 May 1993. The adjourned proceedings were still pending. The length of the proceedings was six years and approximately two months. The case was not complex and the applicant had not contributed to the delay in the proceedings. There had been periods of inactivity when the defendant could not be found. Whilst that could not be entirely attributable to the State, the fact that the judicial authorities had difficulties in effecting service as required by statute could not deprive the applicant, who was the civil party to those proceedings, of his right to have his case heard within a reasonable time. There were other unjustifiable delays in the proceedings.

Saraiva de Carvalho v Portugal (1994) 18 EHRR 534 94/15

[Application lodged 10 October 1989; Commission report 14.1.1993; Court Judgment 22.4.1994]

Mr Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho was a lieutenant-colonel in the Portuguese army. On 10 June 1984 he was arrested and detained on a charge of founding and leading a terrorist organisation, 'FP 25 de Abril' (Popular Forces 25 April), a group that had claimed responsibility for several bomb outrages, armed attacks and murders. On 7 January 1985 the prosecutor delivered his charges. On 22 January 1985 the judge responsible for the case, Mr Antonio Salvado, issued a despacho de pronúncia, assessing and classifying the offences charged. The applicant did not appeal against the despacho. The trial, on 7 October 1985 before the Lisbon Criminal Court, was composed of three judges and was presided over by Mr Salvado. On 20 May 1987 was found guilty of being a leading member of the 'FP 25 de Abril' and sentenced to 15 years' military imprisonment. The applicant complained that his case had not been heard by an impartial tribunal as the same judge had both initially issued the despacho de pronúncia and subsequently presided over the Criminal Court.

The existence of impartiality for the purposes of A 6(1) had to be determined according to a subjective test, that was on the basis of the personal conviction of a particular judge in a given case, and also according to an objective test, that was ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. There was no dispute about the judge's personal impartiality. The mere fact that a judge had already taken decisions before the trial could not in itself be regarded as justifying anxieties about his impartiality. What mattered was the scope and nature of the measures taken by the judge before the trial. That intermediate decision was not equivalent to a committal for trial. The judge in charge of the case, when issuing the despacho, was determining whether the file, including the prosecution's charges, amounted to a prima facie case such as to justify making an individual go through the ordeal of a trial. The issues which the judge had to settle when taking that decision were consequently not the same as those which were decisive for his final judgment. The applicant had not appealed the decision. In producing the despacho, Mr Salvado was acting in his capacity as a judge of the Criminal Court, he took no steps in the investigation or in the prosecution. His detailed knowledge of the case did not mean that he was prejudiced in a way that prevented him from being impartial when the case came to trial. His function in the initial phase of the proceedings was to satisfy himself not that there was a 'particularly confirmed suspicion' but that there was prima facie evidence. Nor could Mr Salvado's preliminary assessment of the available evidence be regarded as a formal finding of guilt. That was made only in the judgment of 20 May 1987, on the basis of the evidence adduced and tested orally at 263 sittings and which led the division presided over by Mr Salvado to convict the applicant. As to the decision to leave an accused in pre-trial detention, this could only justify fears concerning a judge's impartiality in special circumstances. Mr Salvado, however, did not at the time make any fresh assessment capable of having a decisive influence on his opinion of the merits; he did no more than make a cursory examination, which disclosed no factors telling in favour of Mr Saraiva de Carvalho's release. Mr Salvado's participation in the adoption of the judgment of 20 May 1987 did not undermine the impartiality of the Criminal Court, since the applicant's fears could not be regarded as having been objectively justified. There had therefore been no breach of A 6(1).

Saunders v United Kingdom (1997) 23 EHRR 313 96/59

[Application lodged 20.7.1988; Commission report 10.5.1994; Court Judgment 17.12.1996]

Mr Ernest Saunders had become a director and chief executive of Guinness plc in 1981. In early 1986 Guinness was competing with another public company, Argyll Group plc, to take over a third public company, the Distillers Company plc ('Distillers'). The take-over battle resulted in victory for Guinness. Allegations and rumours of misconduct during the course of the bid led the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to appoint inspectors to investigate the affairs of Guinness. The applicant was interviewed by DTI inspectors. A criminal investigation followed, the transcripts and documents obtained as a result of the inspectors' interviews being passed on to the police. The applicant was subsequently charged with numerous offences relating to an illegal share-support operation. On 22 August 1990 he was convicted of conspiracy, false accounting and theft and sentenced to an overall prison sentence of five years. He complained that the use at his trial of statements made by him to the DTI inspectors under their compulsory powers deprived him of a fair hearing.

Comm found by majority (14–1) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (16–4) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr B Walsh (c), Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr N Valticos (d), Mr SK Martens(d), Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (c), Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik (c), Mr P Kûris (d).

The applicant's complaint was confined to the use of the statements obtained by the DTI inspectors during the criminal proceedings against him. While an administrative investigation was capable of involving the determination of a 'criminal charge' in the light of the Court's case-law concerning the autonomous meaning of this concept, it had not been suggested that A 6(1) was applicable to the proceedings conducted by the inspectors or that those proceedings themselves involved the determination of a criminal charge within the meaning of that provision. As was held in Fayed v UK, the functions performed by the inspectors under the relevant provision of the Companies Act 1985 were essentially investigative in nature and they did not adjudicate either in form or in substance. Their purpose was to ascertain and record facts which might subsequently be used as the basis for action by other competent authorities – prosecuting, regulatory, disciplinary or even legislative. A requirement that such a preparatory investigation should be subject to the guarantees of a judicial procedure as set forth in A 6(1) would in practice unduly hamper the effective regulation in the public interest of complex financial and commercial activities. Accordingly, the Court's sole concern in the present case was with the use made of the relevant statements at the applicant's criminal trial. Although not specifically mentioned in A 6, the right to silence and the right not to incriminate oneself were generally recognised international standards which lay at the heart of the notion of a fair procedure under A 6. Their rationale lay, inter alia, in the protection of the accused against improper compulsion by the authorities thereby contributing to the avoidance of miscarriages of justice and to the fulfilment of the aims of A 6. The right not to incriminate oneself, in particular, presupposed that the prosecution in a criminal case sought to prove their case against the accused without resort to evidence obtained through methods of coercion or oppression in defiance of the will of the accused. In this sense the right was closely linked to the presumption of innocence contained in A 6(2). The right not to incriminate oneself was primarily concerned, however, with respecting the will of an accused person to remain silent. It did not extend to the use in criminal proceedings of material which might be obtained from the accused through the use of compulsory powers but which had an existence independent of the will of the suspect such as, inter alia, documents acquired pursuant to a warrant, breath, blood and urine samples and bodily tissue for the purpose of DNA testing. In the present case the Court was only called upon to decide whether the use made by the prosecution of the statements obtained from the applicant by the inspectors amounted to an unjustifiable infringement of the right. The Court did not accept the Government's premise that only statements which were self-incriminating could fall within the privilege against self-incrimination since some of the applicant's answers were in fact of an incriminating nature in the sense that they contained admissions to knowledge of information which tended to incriminate him. In any event, bearing in mind the concept of fairness in A 6, the right not to incriminate oneself could not reasonably be confined to statements of admission of wrongdoing or to remarks which were directly incriminating. Testimony obtained under compulsion which appeared on its face to be of a non-incriminating nature – such as exculpatory remarks or mere information on questions of fact – might later be deployed in criminal proceedings in support of the prosecution case, for example, to contradict or cast doubt upon other statements of the accused or evidence given by him during the trial or to otherwise undermine his credibility. Where the credibility of an accused had to be assessed by a jury, the use of such testimony might be especially harmful. It followed that what was of the essence in that context was the use to which evidence obtained under compulsion was put in the course of the criminal trial. The transcripts of the applicant's answers, whether directly self-incriminating or not, were used in the course of the proceedings in a manner which sought to incriminate the applicant. It was unnecessary to speculate on the reasons why the applicant chose to give evidence at his trial. Nor was it necessary to decide whether the right not to incriminate oneself was absolute or whether infringements of it might be justified in particular circumstances. The general requirements of fairness contained in A 6, including the right not to incriminate oneself, applied to criminal proceedings in respect of all types of criminal offences without distinction from the most simple to the most complex. The public interest could not be invoked to justify the use of answers compulsorily obtained in a non-judicial investigation to incriminate the accused during the trial proceedings. The various procedural safeguards to which reference had been made by the respondent Government (independence of inspectors who were subject to judicial supervision, the power of judge to exclude evidence at trial), could not provide a defence in the present case since they did not operate to prevent the use of the statements in the subsequent criminal proceedings. Accordingly, there had been an infringement in the present case of the right not to incriminate oneself and the applicant had been deprived of a fair hearing in violation of A 6(1).

In the light of the above finding of an infringement of the right not to incriminate oneself, it was not necessary to examine the applicant's allegations regarding misuse of powers by the prosecuting authorities.

Finding of a violation constituted just satisfaction in respect of any non-pecuniary damage sustained. Costs and expenses (GBP 75,000).

Scarfò v Italy 97/65

[Application lodged 30.11.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Raffaele Vincenzo Scarfò was a civil servant employed by the Calabria Regional Council. On 4 May 1982 he instituted proceedings in the Calabria Regional Administrative Court for judicial review of a decision of the Regional Council assigning him, at the time when he was recruited to a permanent post, to a staff category lower than the one to which he considered himself to be entitled on the basis of the duties he had performed during the period when he was employed on a fixed-term contract. In a judgment of 5 December 1994, deposited with the registry on 13

February 1995, judgment was given against the applicant. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (23–6) V 6.

Court found by majority (8–1) 6(1) not applicable.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (d), Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

In the law of many Member States of the Council of Europe there was a basic distinction between civil servants and employees governed by private law. That had led the Court to hold that disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the present case the applicant sought only judicial review of the Regional Council's decision assigning him, at the time when he was recruited to a permanent post, to a staff category lower than the one to which he considered himself to be entitled. The dispute raised by him thus clearly related to his recruitment and his career and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

Proceedings were brought against Mr Scarth on 26 September 1994 for recovery of a debt of GBP 697. The case was referred for hearing by way of arbitration. The applicant made an application for the main hearing to be in public and for evidence to be given on oath. The District Judge refused. The arbitration hearing took place in private on 16 January 1995 and the award was in favour of the plaintiff. The applicant's further appeals were dismissed. The Government did not contest the opinion of the Commission on the allegations of breach of A 6(1). Regarding the further submissions of the applicant concerning those parts of the application which had been declared inadmissible, the scope of the case before the Court was determined by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The Commission declared inadmissible the whole of the application save the complaint relating to the absence of an oral hearing. It followed that the scope of the present case was limited exclusively to that complaint. The Court saw no reason to disagree with the conclusion reached by the Commission. The denial of a public hearing at first instance of the applicant's case was not compatible with A 6(1).

[Application lodged 6.3.1984; Commission report 14.5.1987; Court Judgment 12.7.1988]

Mr Pierre Schenk was a company director. He married Josette in 1947 and they separated in 1973. He advertised, under an assumed name, for a member of the Foreign Legion or similar for an assignment. Mr P answered the advert but informed the applicant's wife that her husband had commissioned him to kill her. They reported the matter to the police. The applicant phoned Mr P and the conversation was secretly taped. The recording was used in the applicant's trial for attempted incitement to murder. He was convicted and appealed claiming unlawfulness of the recording. His appeals were dismissed. He claimed to be the victim of an infringement of his right to respect for his private life and his correspondence, which included the right to the confidentiality of telephone communications. He also alleged that his right to a fair trial had been infringed by reason of the use of the disputed recording in evidence. Finally, he complained of a failure to comply with the principle of the presumption of innocence since his guilt had not been proved according to law.

Although the Commission had declared the claim under A 8 inadmissible for failure to exhaust domestic remedies and the Court had no jurisdiction to examine it as such, it could nevertheless be considered under another relevant provision, in this case A 6(1). While A 6 guaranteed the right to a fair trial, it did not lay down any rules on the admissibility of evidence which was primarily a matter for regulation under national law: The Court could only ascertain whether the applicant's trial as a whole was fair. The rights of the defence were not disregarded. The applicant had the opportunity, which he took, to challenge the authenticity of the recording and oppose its use. He had obtained an investigation of Mr P. The recording of the telephone conversation was not the only evidence on which the conviction was based. The use of the disputed recording in evidence did not deprive him of a fair trial and therefore did not contravene A 6(1).

The record of the hearing and the judgment contained nothing to suggest that the Criminal Court had treated him as if he were guilty before convicting him. There was therefore no breach of A 6(2).

The A 8 complaint was subsumed under the A 6 consideration.

Scherer v Switzerland (1994) 18 EHRR 276 94/13

[Application lodged 6.8.1990; Commission report 14.1.1993; Court Judgment 5.3.1994]

Mr Bruno Scherer, who died on 13 March 1992, ran a sex shop in Zurich for homosexuals. The shop sold, among other things, magazines, books and video films. The nature of the establishment was not apparent to passers-by, but customers knew about it through advertisements to be found in specialist magazines or at homosexuals' meeting-places. At the back of the shop there was a room seating twelve people that was used for showing video films, which were changed every week or every fortnight. Customers heard of the films by word of mouth. From 21 to 23 November 1983 nine people saw the film New York City, which lasted two hours and was made up almost exclusively of sexual acts. On 23 November 1983 the sex shop was searched and the Zurich district attorney's office confiscated the film, the video recorder and the film-show takings and brought proceedings against the applicant. On 15 March 1984 the district attorney's office issued a sentence order whereby the applicant was fined for publishing obscene items and driving while under the influence of alcohol. There followed numerous appeal hearings. The applicant complained, inter alia, of his conviction for showing the film New York City and the ban on showing that film on his own premises and of later convictions for selling obscene publications.

The applicant's lawyer informed the Registrar on 3 May 1993 that his client had died on 13 March 1992 and subsequently indicated that the applicant's executor wanted the proceedings to continue. He did not at any time provide information concerning the heirs or their connection with the applicant. On a number of occasions the Court had accepted that the parents, spouse or children of a deceased applicant were entitled to take his place in the proceedings. Those cases always involved close relatives. There was nothing to show that that was the position here. Furthermore, the applicant's executor had not expressed any intention whatsoever of seeking, on the applicant's behalf, to have the criminal proceedings reopened in Switzerland or to claim compensation for non-pecuniary damage in Strasbourg. Under those circumstances the applicant's death could be held to constitute a fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter. There was also no reason of public policy why the case should not be struck out of the list, especially as, since the events giving rise to the instant case, the Federal Court's case-law on obscene items and the relevant Swiss legislation had undergone substantial changes. Accordingly the case was struck out of the list.

Schiesser v Switzerland (1979–80) 2 EHRR 417 79/5

[Application lodged 15.11.1976; Commission report 9.3.1978; Court Judgment 4.12.1979]

Mr Friedrich Schiesser, who had been hiding from the police, gave himself up on 5 April 1976. He was at once brought before the Winterthur District Attorney and heard without his lawyer being present. He was placed in detention on remand. The District Attorney strongly suspected that the applicant had committed or attempted to commit several offences of aggravated theft and feared that he might suppress evidence. The applicant's appeal was dismissed by the Zürich Public Prosecutor on 13 April 1976. His public law appeal to the Federal Court was rejected. His detention on remand continued and further appeals were dismissed. He was eventually released on 12 July 1976. On 11 May 1978 he was sentenced to a suspended term of imprisonment for professional theft as a member of a gang. He alleged a violation of A 5(3) in that the District Attorney could not be regarded as an 'officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power', within the meaning of that provision.

Comm found by majority (9–5) NV 5(3), (11–1 with two abstentions that it was not called upon to consider 5(4) as the applicant had not exhausted domestic remedies). within the meaning of 26.

Court found by majority (5–2) NV 5(3), unanimously no jurisdiction to consider 5(4).

Judges: Mr G Balladore Pallieri, President, Mr M Zekia, Mr R Ryssdal (d), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr D Evrigenis (d), Mr P-H Teitgen, Mr F Matscher.

The Court had to ascertain only whether the Attorney possessed the attributes of an 'officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power'. A 5 was designed to ensure that no one should be arbitrarily dispossessed of his liberty. That overall purpose entailed following a procedure that had a judicial character and gave guarantees appropriate to the kind of deprivation of liberty in question, without which it would be impossible to speak of a court. The officer referred to in A 5(3) had to offer guarantees befitting the judicial power conferred on him by law. The officer was not identical with the judge, but had to have some of the latter's attributes, that was to say he had to satisfy certain conditions each of which constituted a guarantee for the person arrested. One of the conditions was independence of the executive and of the parties. That did not mean that the officer may not be to some extent subordinate to other judges or officers provided that they themselves enjoyed similar independence. In addition, under A 5(3), there was both a procedural and a substantive requirement. The procedural requirement placed the officer under the obligation of himself hearing the individual brought before him; the substantive requirement imposed on him the obligations of reviewing the circumstances militating for or against detention, of deciding, by reference to legal criteria, whether there were reasons to justify detention and of ordering release if there were no such reasons. The status of the District Attorney and his powers in the matter of detention on remand were laid down in detail in the Constitution of the Courts Act and the Code of Criminal Procedure. In the present case the District Attorney intervened exclusively in his capacity as an investigating authority, that was in considering whether the applicant should be charged and detained on remand and, subsequently, in conducting inquiries with an obligation to be equally thorough in gathering evidence in his favour and evidence against him. He did not assume the mantle of prosecutor. The District Attorney received no advice or instructions from outside sources, he acted alone, without the Public Prosecutor's assistance or supervision. He therefore exercised the personal discretion conferred on him by law. In those conditions, he offered guarantees of independence that were sufficient for the purposes of A 5(3). With regard to the procedural guarantees, when the applicant gave himself up, he was interrogated by the District Attorney himself within 24 hours. The District Attorney told the applicant why he was suspected of having committed or attempted to commit offences and informed him of his right of appeal against the warrant issued for his arrest. Although the applicant complained that his lawyer was not allowed to attend the interrogation, A 5(3) did not make a lawyer's presence obligatory. Immediately after the interrogation the District Attorney issued a detention order made in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law. The District Attorney therefore offered in the present case the guarantees of independence and the procedural and substantive guarantees inherent in the notion of 'officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power'. There had accordingly been no breach of A 5(3).

The Commission's report regarding A 5(4) amounted, in substance, to an implicit decision of inadmissibility. An examination therefore lay outside the Court's jurisdiction.

Schmautzer v Austria (1996) 21 EHRR 511 95/34

[Application lodged 26.5.1989; Commission report 19.5.1994; Court Judgment 23.10.1995]

On 30 April 1986 Mr Peter Schmautzer was stopped by the police while driving his car. He was not wearing his safety-belt. In a sentence order of 1 June 1987 the federal police authority in Graz imposed on him a fine with imprisonment in default of payment, for an offence under the Motor Vehicles Act. He appealed to the Styria regional government, which upheld the decision, but reduced the fine. His appeals to the Constitutional Court and the Administrative Court were rejected. He complained that he had not had access to an independent and impartial tribunal.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) as regards access to a court and that no separate issue under A 6(1) as to the failure to hold a hearing.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), not necessary to examine the complaint based on lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr SK Martens (so), Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk.

In order to determine whether an offence qualified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention, it was first necessary to ascertain whether or not the provision defining the offence belonged, in the legal system of the respondent State, to criminal law; next, the very nature of the offence and the degree of severity of the penalty risked had to be considered. Although the offences in issue and the procedures followed in the case fell within the administrative sphere, they were nevertheless criminal in nature. That was reflected in the terminology employed. In addition, the fine imposed on the applicant was accompanied by an order for his committal to prison in the event of his defaulting on payment. Those considerations were sufficient to establish that the offence of which the applicant was accused could be classified as criminal for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that A 6 applied.

The applicant based his complaints on A 6, whereas the wording of the Austrian reservation mentioned only A 5 and made express reference solely to measures for the deprivation of liberty. Moreover, the reservation only came into play where both substantive and procedural provisions of one or more of the four specific laws indicated in it had been applied. Here, however, the substantive provisions of a different Act, the Motor Vehicles Act 1967, were applied. The reservation in question did not therefore apply in the instant case.

Decisions taken by administrative authorities, which did not themselves satisfy the requirements of A 6(1), had to be subject to subsequent control by a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. The Constitutional Court was not such a body. In the present case, it could look at the impugned proceedings only from the point of view of their conformity with the Constitution, and that did not enable it to examine all the relevant facts. It accordingly lacked the powers required under A 6(1). The powers of the Administrative Court had to be assessed in the light of the fact that the court in the case was sitting in proceedings that were of a criminal nature for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that when the compatibility of those powers with A 6(1) was being gauged, regard had to be had to the complaints raised in that court by the applicant as well as to the defining characteristics of a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. Those included the power to quash in all respects, on questions of fact and law, the decision of the body below. As the Administrative Court lacked that power, it could not be regarded as a tribunal within the meaning of the Convention. It followed that the applicant did not have access to a tribunal. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6 on that point.

Having regard to the conclusion above, it was not necessary to examine the complaints regarding the lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court and that court's failure to take evidence from witnesses.

Schmidt and Dahlström v Sweden (1979–80) 1 EHRR 632 76/2

[Application lodged 9.6.1972; Commission report 17.7.1974; Court Judgment 6.2.1976]

Mr Folke Schmidt was a professor of law at the University of Stockholm and Mr Hans Dahlström was an officer in the Swedish Army. They were members of trade unions affiliated to two of the main federations representing Swedish State employees. They complained that under clause 18 of the collective agreement of June 1971, as members of organisations having proclaimed selective strikes, namely SACO (Swedish Confederation of Professional Associations) and SR (National Federation of State Employees), they were denied retroactivity of certain benefits, even though they themselves had not gone on strike. They complained that they had been unfairly prejudiced as compared with non-union officials and members of other unions, such as TCO-S and SF, that had refrained from strike action.

Comm found by majority (9–1 with one abstention) NV 11 in respect of the Government's policy of denying retroactive benefits to non-striking members of belligerent unions, (8–1 with two abstentions) NV 14+11(1) in respect of differential treatment.

Court found unanimously NV 11, NV 14+11.

Judges: Mr G Balladore Pallieri President, Mr H Mosler, Mr J Cemona, Mr G Wiarda, Mr P O'Donoghue, Mrs H Pedersen, Mr S Petren.

The Convention nowhere made an express distinction between the functions of a Contracting State as holder of public power and its responsibilities as employer. A 11 was accordingly binding upon the State as employer, whether the latter's relations with its employees were governed by public or private law. While A 11 (1) presented trade union freedom as one form or a special aspect of freedom of association, the Article did not secure any particular treatment of trade union members by the State. As far as their personal freedom of association was concerned, the applicants had retained that freedom both as of right and, in fact, despite the measure complained of; for they had remained members of their respective trade union organisations. The Convention safeguarded freedom to protect the occupational interests of trade union members by trade union action, the conduct and development of which the Contracting States had to both permit and make possible. A 11(1) nevertheless left each State a free choice of the means to be used towards this end. The grant of a right to strike represented without any doubt one of the most important of these means, but there were others. The Convention required that under national law, trade unionists should be enabled, in conditions not at variance with A 11, to strive through the medium of their organisations for the protection of their occupational interests. Examination of the file in the case did not disclose that the applicants had been deprived of that capacity. There was thus established no infringement of a right guaranteed by A 11(1).

Despite finding no breach of A 11, the Court had to ascertain whether the difference in treatment, characterised by the applicants as discriminatory, infringed A 11 and 14 taken together. While the granting of retroactivity of salary increases or other benefits in itself fell outside the scope of A 11, in the present circumstances it was linked to the exercise of a right guaranteed by the said provision, namely the freedom to protect the occupational interests of trade union members by trade union action. A 14 was pertinent in the case. Clause 18 of the collective agreement of June 1971 accorded retroactivity of benefits to union officials except insofar as they had been on strike. In support of the difference of treatment thus established between the applicants and their non-striking colleagues, whether non-union or members of other unions, the Government invoked the principle according to which 'a strike destroys retroactivity'. The application of that principle was legitimate and there was no reason to believe that the State had other and ill-intentioned aims. Clause 18 of the collective agreement of June 1971 denied retroactivity of benefits to those who had continued to carry out their professional tasks during the period in question. Solidarity prevailed between the various members of the two organisations when engaged in a concerted campaign of selective industrial action. While some members were participating in person wherever strikes had been proclaimed, the other members, though discharging their duties in sectors unaffected by strike action, were providing financial and psychological support for this action. That reasoning did not apply to non-union employees or employees belonging to organisations other than SACO or SR, who had not gone on strike. Consequently, the Court could not accept the applicants' argument that the benefit of retroactivity should have been refused – or, alternatively, granted – to all staff in sectors where SACO or SR were representative. The principle of proportionality had not been offended in the present case.

Schönenberger and Durmaz v Switzerland (1989) 11 EHRR 202 88/8

[Application lodged 10.1.1985; Commission report 12.12.1986; Court Judgment 20.6.1988]

Mr Edmund Schönenberger, the first applicant, was a lawyer. The second applicant, Mr Mehmet Durmaz, a Turkish national, was a taxi-driver. On 16 February 1984 the second applicant was arrested and questioned in respect of drugs offences. His wife asked Mr Schönenberger to take charge of his defence and the district prosecutor was informed. On 24 February the first applicant wrote to the district prosecutor enclosing forms of authority to act and a letter to the second applicant. The letter to the second applicant contained information, inter alia, informing him of his right to refuse to make any statement and advising him that to exercise it would be to his advantage. The district prosecutor received the letter and enclosure for the second applicant but kept them from him without telling him that he had received them. He also asked the second applicant to choose a lawyer. The applicant then chose another lawyer. The applicants complained not that the Swiss authorities had apprised themselves of the contents of the letter from Mr Schönenberger to Mr Durmaz, but that they did not forward the letter to its addressee.

There was interference by a public authority in the exercise of the right to respect for correspondence. The interference was in accordance with the law. The stopping of the letter by the district prosecutor had as its aim the prevention of disorder or crime. The pursuit of that objective might justify wider measures of interference in the case of a convicted prisoner than in that of a person at liberty. The same reasoning could be applied to a person being held on remand and against whom inquiries with a view to bringing criminal charges were being made since in such a case there was often a risk of collusion. To be necessary in a democratic society, an interference had to be founded on a pressing social need and, in particular, be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The Court did not accept the Government's argument that the stopping of the letter was necessary as the advice given was of such a nature as to jeopardise their proper conduct of the criminal proceedings. The first applicant sought to inform the second applicant of his right not to make a statement and advising him that to exercise it would be to his advantage. In that way, he was recommending that the second applicant adopt a certain tactic, lawful in itself under Swiss case-law, as it was open to an accused person to remain silent. The first applicant could also properly regard it as his duty, pending a meeting with the second applicant, to advise him of his right and of the possible consequences of exercising it. Advice given in those terms was not capable of creating a danger of connivance between the sender of the letter and its recipient and did not pose a threat to the normal conduct of the prosecution. The first applicant was acting on the instructions of Mrs Durmaz and had so informed the district prosecutor by telephone. The various contacts amounted to preliminary steps intended to enable the second applicant to have the benefit of the assistance of a defence lawyer of his choice and, thereby, to exercise a right enshrined in A 6. The fact that the first applicant had not been formally appointed was therefore of little consequence. Therefore the contested interference was not justifiable as necessary in a democratic society; consequently it was in breach of A 8.

No separate issue arose under A 10.

Schöpfer v Switzerland 98/35

[Application lodged 11.8.1994; Commission report 9.4.1997; Court Judgment 20.5.1998]

Mr Alois Schöpfer was a lawyer and a former member of the Cantonal Council. At the material time he was an advocate acting as defence counsel for a Mr S, who had been placed in detention pending trial on suspicion of committing a number of thefts. On 9 November 1992 the applicant held a press conference in his office in Lucerne at which he declared that at the Hochdorf district authority offices both the laws of the Canton of Lucerne and human rights were flagrantly disregarded, and had been for years. He pointed out that he was speaking to the press because it was his last resort. His comments were published in the press. The Lucerne Bar's Supervisory Board informed the applicant that his conduct raised certain ethical questions, relating in particular to the need for discretion with regard to pending proceedings and to covert publicity. On 21 December 1992 the Supervisory Board brought disciplinary proceedings against the applicant. On 15 March 1993 he was fined CHF 500 for a breach of professional ethics. The applicant's appeal was dismissed. He complained that the disciplinary penalty imposed on him had breached A 10.

The penalty in issue amounted to interference with the applicant's exercise of his freedom of expression. It was prescribed by law and pursued a legitimate aim, namely maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. The special status of lawyers gave them a central position in the administration of justice as intermediaries between the public and the courts. Such a position explained the usual restrictions on the conduct of members of the Bar. The courts as the guarantors of justice, whose role was fundamental in a State based on the rule of law, had to enjoy public confidence. Regard being had to the key role of lawyers in this field, it was legitimate to expect them to contribute to the proper administration of justice, and thus to maintain public confidence therein. The applicant first publicly criticised the administration of justice in Hochdorf and then exercised a legal remedy which proved effective with regard to the complaint in question. In so doing, his conduct was scarcely compatible with the contribution it was legitimate to expect lawyers to make to maintaining public confidence in the judicial authorities. The Court had regard to the seriousness and general nature of the criticisms made by the applicant and the tone in which he chose to make them. Freedom of expression was secured to lawyers, who were certainly entitled to comment in public on the administration of justice, but their criticism should not overstep certain bounds. In that connection, account had to be taken of the need to strike the right balance between the various interests involved, which included the public's right to receive information about questions arising from judicial decisions, the requirements of the proper administration of justice and the dignity of the legal profession. The applicant, who was a lawyer, had raised in public his complaints on the subject of criminal proceedings which were at that time pending before a criminal court. In addition to the general nature, the seriousness and the tone of the applicant's assertions, the Court noted that he first held a press conference, claiming that this was his last resort, and only afterwards lodged an appeal before the Lucerne Court of Appeal, which was partly successful. He also omitted to apply to the other supervisory body for the district authority, the public prosecutor's office, whose ineffectiveness he did not attempt to establish except by means of mere assertions. Having regard also to the modest amount of the fine imposed on the applicant, the Court considered that the authorities did not go beyond their margin of appreciation in punishing Mr Schöpfer. There had accordingly been no breach of A 10.

Schouten and Meldrum v Netherlands (1995) 19 EHRR 432 94/48

[Application lodged 4.9.1991; Commission report 12.10.1993; Court Judgment 9.12.1994]

Mr Johannes Schouten was sole managing director of a limited liability company which owned a physiotherapy practice. In March 1987 the Occupational Association for Health and Mental and Social Well-being (BVG) sent Mr Schouten a demand for payment of contributions in respect of the physiotherapists under the Health Insurance Act, the Medical Assistance Fund Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Occupational Disability Insurance Act. On 27 March 1987 the applicant lodged an objection to the BVG's demand and requested formal confirmation of its decision, with a view to lodging an appeal. The BVG gave such confirmation on 9 December 1988 with the reasons for its decision. The applicant appealed to the Rotterdam Appeals Tribunal. Thereafter proceedings continued until the Central Appeals Tribunal gave judgment in July 1991.

Mr Hendrik Alexander Meldrum was a physiotherapist. In October 1987 the BVG sent Mr Meldrum a demand for payment of contributions in respect of the other physiotherapists under the same statutes as above. In a letter of 4 December 1987 Mr Meldrum lodged an objection to the BVG's demand and requested formal confirmation of its decision, with a view to lodging an appeal. The BVG gave this confirmation on 1 May 1989 and Mr Meldrum appealed.

The applicants complained of the length of proceedings and of the fairness of proceedings in that the BVG was able to delay the start of judicial proceedings indefinitely.

Comm found V 6(1) as regards reasonable time, by majority (18–1) in the case of Mr Schouten and unanimously in the case of Mr Meldrum, V 6(2) as regards breach of principle of equality of arms, by majority (11–8 and 11–7 respectively).

Court found unanimously V 6(1) as regards the reasonable time requirement, NV 6(1) as regards fairness.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr B Walsh, Mr A Spielmann, Mr SK Martens, Mr AN Loizou, Mr AB Baka, Mr P Jambrek, Mr K Jungwiert.

This was the first time the Court had had to rule on the applicability of A 6(1) to a dispute concerning contributions under social-security schemes, as distinct from entitlement to benefits under such schemes. The approaches to benefits and to contributions were not necessarily the same. The Court analysed the various features of both the public law (the character of the legislation, the compulsory nature of the social-security schemes and the assumption by the State or by public or semi-public institutions of full or partial responsibility for ensuring social protection) and private law (the personal and economic nature of the right, the link between the social-insurance schemes and the contract of employment and the similarity between the social-security schemes and private insurance) which were contained in the social-security legislation in issue, in order to determine whether the contested obligation could be regarded as a 'civil' one for the purposes of A 6(1). The Court concluded that the relative cogency of the features of public and private law present in the instant cases led it to find that the private law features were of greater significance than those of public law. On balance, the disputes in issue were to be regarded as having involved the determination of civil rights and obligations and A 6(1) was therefore applicable.

The periods to be taken into consideration began when the applicants requested formal confirmation of the BVG's decision. In Mr Schouten's case, the period ran from 27 March 1987 until 10 July 1991, thus amounting to more than four years and three months. In Mr Meldrum's case, it ran from 4 December 1987 until 13 March 1991, thus amounting to approximately three years and three months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case, having regard to the criteria developed in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. No criticism could be levelled against the national authorities in respect of the proceedings before the Appeals Tribunal and the Central Appeals Tribunal. Extensions of time were granted at the applicants' request. The Court was concerned only with the time which elapsed before the BVG gave formal confirmation of its decision, which was one year, 10 months and 12 days in Mr Schouten's case and one year, four months and 27 days in Mr Meldrum's case. The case was of some complexity, but that was not sufficient to explain the delays in question. The evidence adduced did not indicate that the BVG would, or even could, have complied with any request from the applicants to speed up the formal confirmation. The Netherlands Supreme Court case-law appeared to deprive the applicants of the remedy of bringing summary proceedings and that could not therefore be held against them. Regarding the BVG's workload, A 6(1) obliged Contracting States to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. There had, accordingly, been a violation of A 6(1) as the applicants' civil rights and obligations were not determined within a reasonable time.

Regarding the fairness of the proceedings, the Court did not find it established that the applicants' position before the tribunals would have been any different had the delays in question not occurred. No violation of A 6 had been made out in this respect.

Schuler-Zgraggen v Switzerland (1993) 16 EHRR 405 93/25

Mrs Margrit Schuler-Zgraggen contracted open pulmonary tuberculosis and being physically and mentally unfit for work was granted a full state invalidity pension. After the birth of her son in May 1984 and a medical examination by the invalidity insurance authorities, her pension was cancelled on the basis that her health had improved after the birth and she was 60–70% able to look after her home and her child. She appealed, requesting sight of her medical file. That was refused, although subsequently granted by the appeal court. The appeal court dismissed her appeal without a hearing. She complained that her right to a fair trial had been infringed in that she had had insufficient access to the file of the Appeals Board and there had been no hearing in the Federal Insurance Court. She also complained that the assumption made by that court, that she would have given up working even if she had not had health problems, amounted to discrimination on the ground of sex.

Comm found by majority (10–5) NV 6(1) on account of the failure to hold a hearing, (13–2) NV 6(1) in respect of access to the file, (9–6) NV 14+6(1).

Court dismissed unanimously the Government's preliminary objections, found no jurisdiction to entertain the complaint concerning the independence of the medical experts, by majority (8–1) NV 6(1), V 14+6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr B Walsh (d), Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber.

The development in the law and the principle of equality of treatment warranted taking the view that the general rule was that A 6(1) applied in the field of social insurance, including welfare assistance. State intervention was not sufficient to establish that A 6(1) was inapplicable; other considerations argued in favour of the applicability of A 6(1) in the instant case. The most important of those lay in the fact that despite the public law features, the applicant was not only affected in her relations with the administrative authorities as such, but also suffered an interference with her means of subsistence; she was claiming an individual, economic right flowing from specific rules laid down in a federal statute. A 6 therefore applied in the instant case.

With regard to access to the file, the applicant's complaint related not so much to inspecting the file as to having the documents in it handed over or securing photocopies of them. The preliminary objection of lack of victim status was therefore dismissed. Although the proceedings before the Appeals Board did not enable the applicant to have a complete, detailed picture of the particulars supplied to the Board, the Federal Insurance Court remedied that shortcoming by requesting the Board to make all the documents available to the applicant. Taken as a whole, the proceedings were therefore fair and there had not been a breach of A 6(1) in that respect.

Regarding lack of hearing before the Federal Insurance Court, the Government was estopped from relying on the preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies as they only raised it after the Commission decision on admissibility, whereas nothing prevented them from doing so earlier. The public character of court hearings constituted a fundamental principle enshrined in A 6(1), although it could be waived at a person's own free will. The Federal Insurance Court's Rules of Procedure provided for the possibility of a hearing on an application by one of the parties which the applicant had not sought. It could reasonably be considered, therefore, that she unequivocally waived her right to a public hearing in the Federal Insurance Court. The dispute did not appear to raise issues of public importance such as to make a hearing necessary. It was understandable that in this sphere the national authorities should have regard to the demands of efficiency and economy. Systematically holding hearings could be an obstacle to the particular diligence required in social-security cases and could ultimately prevent compliance with the reasonable time requirement of A 6(1). There had accordingly been no breach of A 6(1) in respect of the oral and public nature of the proceedings.

The complaint regarding the independence of doctors was a new complaint which had not been raised before the Commission and did not relate to the facts the Commission found within the limits of its decision on admissibility. That being so, the Court had no jurisdiction to consider it.

A 14+6: regarding the Government's preliminary objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies, the applicant had objected to the terms of the Federal Insurance Court's judgment against which no appeal lay. In addition, in her administrative law appeal she had already criticised the similar assumption made by the Appeals Board in its decision. The objection was therefore unfounded. The admissibility of evidence was governed primarily by the rules of domestic law, it was normally for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task under the Convention was to ascertain whether the proceedings, considered as a whole, including the way in which the evidence was submitted, were fair. In this instance, the Federal Insurance Court adopted in its entirety the Appeals Board's assumption that women gave up work when they gave birth to a child. It did not attempt to probe the validity of that assumption itself by weighing arguments to the contrary. That assumption could not be regarded as an incidental remark, clumsily drafted but of negligible effect. On the contrary, it constituted the sole basis for the reasoning, thus being decisive, and introduced a difference of treatment based on the ground of sex only. The advancement of the equality of the sexes was now a major goal in the Member States of the Council of Europe and very weighty reasons would have to be put forward before such a difference of treatment could be regarded as compatible with the Convention. There were no such reasons in the present case. Therefore, for want of any reasonable and objective justification, there had been a breach of A 14 taken together with A 6(1).

Judgment itself constituted just satisfaction as to the alleged non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (by majority (8–1) CHF 7,500). Pecuniary damage reserved.

Schwabe v Austria 92/56

[Application lodged 1.2.1988; Commission report 8.1.1991; Court Judgment 28.8.1992]

Mr Karl Thomas Uwe Schwabe was Chairman of the Young Austrian People's Party for the District of Wolfsberg in Carinthia and a councillor. On 26 September 1986 he was convicted of defamation and of having reproached a person with an offence for which he had already served his sentence, for having stated in a press release of 19 August 1985 that the Deputy Head of the Carinthian Government had caused a traffic accident in 1966 under the influence of alcohol. The Klagenfurt Regional Court considered it decisive that the applicant had compared that accident with the Mayor's, without mentioning that, unlike the Mayor, the Deputy Head had not been convicted of drunken driving. That omission, according to the Regional Court, could have led the reader to believe that the accidents were comparable, as far as the drivers' blood alcohol content was concerned. In that respect, it held that the applicant had failed to prove the truth of his allegations. His appeal to the Graz Court of Appeal was dismissed. He complained that his conviction had breached A 10.

The conviction was an interference with the applicant's exercise of his freedom of expression. The interference was prescribed by law, namely the Criminal Code, and had a legitimate aim, namely the protection of the reputation or rights of others. Where what was at stake was the limits of acceptable criticism in the context of public debate on a political question of general interest, the Court had to satisfy itself that the national authorities did apply standards which were in conformity with those principles and, moreover, that in doing so they based themselves on an acceptable assessment of the relevant facts. For this purpose the Court considered the impugned judicial decisions in the light of the case as a whole, including the applicant's publication and the context in which it was written. The applicant's press release was a reaction to the interview given by the Head of the Carinthian Government, a member of the Austrian Socialist Party, suggesting that the Mayor of Maria Rain, who was a member of the People's Party, should resign because of his conviction. It was apparent from the release, when read as a whole, that the applicant's main concern was to show that the writer applied different and stricter standards of political morality to a 'small mayor of a village', belonging to another political party, than to his 'party friend' and deputy. The question became a matter of general debate on political morals between the two rival parties. A politician's previous criminal convictions of the kind at issue here, together with his public conduct in other respects, may be relevant factors in assessing his fitness to exercise political functions. It was not established that the applicant's statement about the Deputy's alcohol consumption was misleading. The two accidents were not the subject of direct comparison but were mentioned only in relation to the different attitude towards them. It was significant that the applicant described both accidents in completely different terms. He nevertheless concluded that they had enough features in common to warrant the resignation of both the politicians concerned. The impugned comparison thus essentially amounted to a value-judgment, for which no proof of truth was possible. The facts on which the applicant based his value-judgment were substantially correct and his good faith did not give rise to serious doubts. He could not be considered to have exceeded the limits of freedom of expression. Therefore the interference complained of by the applicant was not necessary in a democratic society for the protection of the reputation of others. There had, accordingly, been a violation of A 10.

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non pecuniary damage. Pecuniary damage (ATS 35,242.42), costs and expenses (ATS 130,402).

Scollo v Italy (1996) 22 EHRR 514 95/31

[Application lodged 19.11.1991; Commission report 9.5.1994; Court Judgment 28.9.1995]

Mr Francesco Salvatore Scollo let out a flat on which the rent was subject to control by the public authorities. He served his tenant notice to quit and on 22 April 1983 the magistrate formally confirmed the notice to quit and set the date of eviction at 30 June 1984. Subsequently, on an application by the tenant, the magistrate deferred execution until 31 October 1984, pursuant to a Law of 25 March 1982, which had extended existing leases for a period of two years. Nevertheless, the tenant remained in occupation even after that date. Attempts by the bailiff to evict the tenant were unsuccessful. On 8 February 1988 a new series of laws came into force suspending forcible evictions until 30 April 1989. The applicant recovered his flat on 15 January 1995 after further numerous attempts at eviction. He complained of an interference with his right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions as he had been unable to recover his flat due to the legislative provisions, and of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (21–2) V P1A1, (22–1) not necessary to examine 6(1).

Court found unanimously V P1A1, V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr SK Martens, Mr AN Loizou, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici.

The applicant's complaints under A 14+P1A1 and under A 6(1) in respect of the right of access to a court, were outside the scope of the case as defined by the Commission's decision on admissibility.

There was neither a transfer of property nor a de facto expropriation. At all times the applicant retained the possibility of alienating his property and received rent. As the implementation of the measures in question meant that the tenant continued to occupy the flat, it undoubtedly amounted to control of the use of property. Accordingly, the second paragraph of P1A1 was applicable. The legislative provisions suspending evictions during the period from 1984 to 1988 were prompted by the need to deal with the large number of leases which expired in 1982 and 1983 and by the concern to enable the tenants affected to find acceptable new homes or obtain subsidised housing. To have enforced all evictions simultaneously would undoubtedly have led to considerable social tension and jeopardised public order. Therefore, the impugned legislation had a legitimate aim in the general interest, as required by the second paragraph P1A1. The applicant did not have an urgent need to recover his property for the whole of the period concerned. By adopting emergency measures and providing for certain exceptions to their application, the Italian legislature was reasonably entitled to consider, having regard to the need to strike a fair balance between the interests of the community and the right of landlords, and of the applicant in particular, that the means chosen were appropriate to achieve the legitimate aim. However, the restriction on the applicant's use of his flat resulting from the competent authorities' failure to apply those provisions was contrary to the requirements of the second paragraph of P1A1. It followed that there had been a breach of P1A1.

A 6(1) was applicable, regard being had to the purpose of the proceedings, which was to settle the dispute between the applicant and his tenant. The period in question began on 4 March 1983, when the tenant was summoned to appear before the magistrate. It ended on 15 January 1995, when the tenant vacated the premises of his own accord. It therefore lasted just over 11 years and 10 months. If an eviction was to be enforced, the interested party had to take the initiative, and the applicant did not spare any effort to obtain satisfaction, applying on numerous occasions to the bailiff, who systematically requested police assistance. However, the prefectoral committee and the Prefect never acted on these requests. While not overlooking the practical difficulties raised by the enforcement of a very large number of evictions, the inertia of the competent administrative authorities engaged the responsibility of the Italian State under A 6(1). There had accordingly been a breach of that provision.

Scopelliti v Italy (1994) 17 EHRR 493 93/50

[Application lodged 6.4.1989; Commission report 1.7.1992; Court Judgment 23.11.1993]

Mrs Antonia Scopelliti instituted proceedings on 10 December 1980 against the National Highways Corporation and the Ministry of Public Works seeking compensation for damage deriving from the unauthorised occupation of the Highways Corporation of land belonging to her, which had been used to improve a trunk road. On 5 October 1987 the Catanzaro District Court gave judgment allowing the applicant's claims and ordering the Highway Corporation to pay her compensation. She complained of the length of proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 10 December 1980, when the proceedings were instituted against the Highway Corporation in the Catanzaro District Court, and ended on 1 March 1989, the date on which the District Court's judgment became final. It therefore lasted a little under eight years and three months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The expert was working in the context of judicial proceedings, supervised by a judge, who remained responsible for the preparation and the speedy conduct of the trial. Although adjournments were requested jointly by the parties, considerable periods of time elapsed between the majority of the adjournments. Although civil proceedings in Italy were subject to the 'principio dispositivo', according to which it was for the parties to take the initiative with regard to the progress of the proceedings, that principle did not dispense the courts from ensuring compliance with the requirements of A 6 as regards reasonable time. Considered as a whole, the time which elapsed between 10 December 1980 and 14 January 1988 could not be regarded as reasonable. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Finding of this violation constituted just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage sustained. Costs and expenses (ITL 11,546,310).

Scott v Spain (1997) 24 EHRR 391 96/67

[Application lodged 2.9.1992; Commission report 4.7.1995; Court Judgment 30.11.1996]

Mr Christopher Ian Scott was first arrested on 5 March 1990 under suspicion of having raped a Finnish woman. Subsequently, it was ordered that he be kept in custody pending the resolution of a request for extradition. On 22 February 1991 the Audiencia Nacional ordered the applicant's extradition, as requested by the UK authorities. However, the extradition order was only to be executed after the determination of the rape case. He was subsequently acquitted of the rape but detention continued to his extradition. He spent a total of two years, six months and 29 days under the different orders for detention pending trial on the rape charge and exactly four years in connection with extradition proceedings. He relied on A 5(1)(c) and (3) of the Convention, complaining that he had been unlawfully detained for an unreasonably long period of time.

Comm found by majority (10–3) NV 5(1)(c), (12–1) V 5(3).

Court found by majority (8–1) NV 5(1), dismissed unanimously the Government's preliminary objection concerning the non-exhaustion of domestic remedies as regards the complaint under A 5(3), unanimously V 5(3).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr A Spielmann, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik (pd), Mr K Jungwiert.

The orders for the applicant's detention were made in compliance with the substantive domestic legislation applicable and were not arbitrary for the purposes of the Convention. Accordingly, there was no breach of A 5(1).

Preliminary objection of non-exhaustion rejected. The applicant's applications for provisional release included one to the Constitutional Court.

It was the duty of national judicial authorities to ensure that pre-trial detention did not exceed a reasonable time. A sine qua non for continued detention was the persistence of a reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence, but after a certain time that was no longer sufficient and the Court had to establish whether the other grounds are relevant and sufficient and if the national courts have displayed special diligence. The Court was unable to subscribe to the Government's contention that the various difficulties associated with the implementation of the international letter of judicial co-operation (translation of documents, transmission by diplomatic channels, repeated summons of the complainant) could justify the very long period of time the applicant spent in detention. The case was not particularly complex and there was nothing to suggest that the length of the proceedings could be attributable in whole or in part to the applicant's conduct. In these circumstances the Court could not but conclude that the duty of special diligence enshrined in A 5(3) had not been observed.

Finding of violation constituted adequate satisfaction for any damage suffered by the applicant. Costs and expenses (GBP 18,000 less FF 20,700).

Scozzari and Giunta v Italy 00/181

[Applications lodged 9.12.1997 and 16.6.1998; Commission report 2.12.1998; Court Judgment 13.7.2000]

The first applicant, Mrs Dolorata Scozzari, had dual Belgian and Italian nationality and lived in Italy. She was also acting on behalf of her children, G, born in 1987, who had dual Belgian and Italian nationality, and M, born in 1994, who had Italian nationality. The second applicant, Mrs Carmela Giunta, was the first applicant's mother. Following examination by social services of the first applicant's home situation and the conclusion that there was violence by the first applicant's husband towards both her and the children and the fact that the elder child had been subjected to paedophile abuse by a social worker, the Florence Youth Court on 9 September 1997 ordered the two children's placement at 'Il Forteto', a community which was organised as an agricultural co-operative. Two of the main leaders of the community had been convicted in January 1985 of ill treatment and sexual abuse of persons who had stayed in the home. The two men continued to hold positions of responsibility in the community. On 9 September the Youth Court restricted the first applicant's contact with the children although in practice she was prevented from seeing them. Arranged visits were suspended. Following the Youth Court's decision of 22 December 1998, the first applicant saw them for the first time on 29 April 1999 and a second visit took place on 9 September 1999, but social services suspended all visits thereafter. The applicants appealed to the Court of Appeal, which on 31 March 1999 upheld the decision of the Youth Court. The applicants complained of various infringements of their rights under, inter alia, A 8.

Comm found by majority (24–1) NV 8 as a result of the suspension of the first applicant's parental rights or of the fact that her children had been taken into care, (13–12) NV 8 as a result of the children being placed at 'Il Forteto', (21–4) V 8 as a result of the suspension of all contact between the first applicant and her children, unanimously NV 3 or NV P1A2 as regards the second applicant, no separate issue under 6(1) and 14.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found NV 8 on account of the suspension of the first applicant's parental rights and of the fact that her children were taken into care, V 8 on account of the delays in and limited number of contact visits between the first applicant and her children, V 8 on account of the placement of the first applicant's children at 'Il Forteto', NV 8 as regards the second applicant, no separate issue under 6(1) and 14, NV 3 on account of the treatment of the first applicant's children at 'Il Forteto', applicants were estopped from raising their complaint of a violation of 3 of the Convention based on the suffering linked to their situation taken as a whole, NV P1A2.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr Gaukur Jörundsson, Mr L Caflisch, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic (c), Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantîru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Mr C Russo, ad hoc judge.

In principle, a person who was not entitled under domestic law to represent another might nevertheless, in certain circumstances, act before the Court in the name of the other person. In particular, minors could apply to the Court even, or indeed especially, if they were represented by a mother who was in conflict with the authorities and criticised their decisions and conduct as not being consistent with the rights guaranteed by the Convention. In the event of a conflict over a minor's interests between a natural parent and the person appointed by the authorities to act as the child's guardian, there was a danger that some of those interests would never be brought to the Court's attention and that the minor would be deprived of effective protection of his rights under the Convention. Consequently, even though the mother had been deprived of parental rights, her standing as the natural mother sufficed to afford her the necessary power to apply to the Court on the children's behalf, too, in order to protect their interests. Therefore, since the first applicant also had standing to act on behalf of the children, the Belgian Government were entitled to take part in the proceedings within the meaning of A 36(1) and Rule 61(2) of the Rules of Court, as the elder child also had Belgian nationality. Therefore, the Government's preliminary objection had to be dismissed, both as regards the locus standi of the first applicant's children and the standing of the Belgian Government to intervene in the proceedings.

A 8: the interference was in accordance with the law and pursued a legitimate aim, namely the protection of health or morals and the protection of the rights and freedoms of others, as they were intended to protect the welfare of the first applicant's children.

Regarding the suspension of the first applicant's parental authority and the removal of the children: it was an interference of a very serious order to split up a family. Such a step had to be supported by sufficiently sound and weighty considerations in the interests of the child. The first applicant's domestic circumstances seriously deteriorated in 1994. Her former husband had played a negative role. The case file showed that it was he who was largely responsible for the violent atmosphere within the family through his repeated assaults on the children and his former wife. However, even after separating from her former husband, the first applicant found it difficult to look after her children (a neuropsychiatric report stated that she was suffering from a personality disorder and was incapable of managing the complex situation of her family and children). The problem was compounded by the severe trauma suffered by the elder child as a result of the paedophile abuse of him by a social worker who succeeded in ingratiating himself with the first applicant's family. Against that background the authorities' intervention, through the suspension of the first applicant's parental rights and the temporary removal of the children from their mother's care, was based on relevant and sufficient reasons and was justified by the need to protect the children's interests. Consequently, there has been no violation of A 8 of the Convention on that account.

Regarding contact between the first applicant and her children: the decision of 9 September 1997 to prohibit any contact between the first applicant and her elder son did not appear to have been based on sufficiently valid reasons. The child had gone through a very difficult and traumatic experience. However, a measure as radical as the total severance of contact could be justified only in exceptional circumstances. While the complex circumstances that were harmful to the family life and the development of the children fully justified their being temporarily taken into care, the grave situation within the first applicant's family did not justify by itself contact with the elder child being severed, regard being had not only to the attachment which the first applicant had always shown to her children, but also and above all to the authorities' decision to allow at the same time a resumption of contact with the younger child. Although the decision of 9 September 1997 provided for the organisation of visits with the younger son, there were delays in taking further action. To the extent that the delay was attributable to administrative difficulties, in so fundamental an area as respect for family life, such considerations could not be allowed to play more than a secondary role. In the circumstances of the present case, it was unacceptable that social services should be able, as they had been, to alter the practical effect of judicial decisions establishing that contact would, in principle, take place. Given their limited number and irregular occurrence (two in almost three years), the visits arranged to date had for all intents and purposes been sporadic and made little sense when viewed in the light of the principles established under A 8. It was apparent from the case file that since the first visit social services had played an inordinate role in the implementation of the Youth Court's decisions and adopted a negative attitude towards the first applicant, an attitude for which the Court found no convincing objective basis. In reality, the manner in which social services had dealt with the situation had helped to accentuate the rift between the first applicant and the children, creating a risk that it would become permanent. The fact that there had been only two visits (after one and a half years' separation) since its decision of 22 December 1998 should have incited the Youth Court to investigate the reasons for the delays in the programme, yet it merely accepted the negative conclusions of social services, without conducting any critical analysis of the facts. A 8 demanded that decisions of courts aimed in principle at facilitating visits between parents and their children so that they could re-establish relations with a view to reunification of the family be implemented in an effective and coherent manner. Accordingly, the relevant authorities, in this case the Youth Court, had a duty to exercise constant vigilance, particularly as regards action taken by social services, to ensure the latter's conduct did not defeat the authorities' decisions. In conclusion, the authorities failed to strike a fair balance between the interests of the first applicant's children and her rights under A 8 of the Convention and consequently, there had been a violation of A 8 on that point.

Regarding the decision to place the children with the 'Forteto' community: the Court recalled its case-law. The Court was not called upon to express an opinion on or become involved in the debate between the supporters and opponents of 'Il Forteto'. However, the fact that the two members of the community convicted in 1985 continued to hold positions of responsibility within the community could not be regarded as innocuous and for practical purposes meant that a detailed examination of the concrete situation of the first applicant's children was called for. Contrary to the assertions of the respondent Government, the evidence on the case file showed that the two leaders concerned played a very active role in bringing up the first applicant's children. The Court had strong reservations about that. The combination of the past sexual abuse against the elder child and the criminal antecedents of two community leaders made the first applicant's concerns about the placement of her children in 'Il Forteto' understandable from an objective standpoint, especially bearing in mind her position as a mother separated from her children. In addition, the authorities had at no point explained to the first applicant why, despite the men's convictions, sending the children to 'Il Forteto' did not pose a problem. Such a failure to communicate was not compatible with the duties incumbent on States to act fairly and to provide information when taking serious measures interfering in a sphere as delicate and sensitive as family life. Unless full and pertinent explanations were given by the authorities concerned, parents should not be forced, as they were in the instant case, merely to stand by while their children were entrusted into the care of a community whose leaders included people with serious previous convictions for ill treatment and sexual abuse. The situation was compounded first by the fact that some of the leaders of 'Il Forteto', including one of the two men convicted in 1985, appeared to have contributed substantially to delaying or hindering the implementation of the decisions of the Florence Youth Court to allow contact between the first applicant and her children; and secondly the evidence pointed to the first applicant's children having been subjected to the mounting influence of the leaders at 'Il Forteto', including one of the two men convicted in 1985. The facts showed that the leaders of 'Il Forteto' responsible for looking after the first applicant's children helped to deflect the implementation of the Youth Court's decisions from their intended purpose of allowing visits to take place. Moreover, it was not known who really had effective care of the children at 'Il Forteto'. That situation should have prompted the Youth Court to increase its level of supervision regarding the way in which the children were being looked after, however, that did not occur. In practice, the leaders concerned worked in a community which enjoyed very substantial latitude and did not appear to be subject to effective supervision by the relevant authorities. As regards the absence of any time-limit on the children's stay at 'Il Forteto', experience showed that when children remained in the care of a community for a protracted period, many of them never returned to a real family life outside the community. Accordingly, there was no valid justification for the failure to put a time-limit on the care order concerning the first applicant's children, especially as that failure appeared to contravene the relevant provisions of Italian law. The absence of any time limit on the care order, the negative influence of the people responsible for the children at 'Il Forteto', coupled with the attitude and conduct of social services, were in the process of driving the first applicant's children towards an irreversible separation from their mother and long-term integration within 'Il Forteto'. While there was evidence of improvement in the children's psychological and physical condition since the placement, that process, which undermined both the role of the courts dealing with the case and of their decisions, presented a real danger that the relations between the first applicant and her children would be severed. Consequently, the authorities had failed to show the degree of prudence and vigilance required in such a delicate and sensitive situation, and had done so to the detriment not just of the first applicant's rights but also of the superior interests of the children. Accordingly, the uninterrupted placement to date of the children at 'Il Forteto' did not satisfy the requirements of A 8 of the Convention.

Regarding the position of the second applicant: the evidence on the case file indicated that the second applicant would have substantial difficulty in looking after the children properly. After moving to Italy, she had had to return to Belgium to resolve other problems. The authorities' decision not to entrust the children into the second applicant's care was based on reasons that remained relevant even after the second applicant's move to Italy, which in any event proved to be temporary. With regard to contact between the second applicant and the children, the Court noted that her attitude was initially characterised by a degree of incoherence. Subsequently, despite the decision of the Florence Youth Court on 22 December 1998 that contact between the second applicant and the children should start before 15 March 1999, she failed to get in contact but simply waited to hear from social services, even after the expiry of the time-limit fixed by the Youth Court. Nor did she consider it necessary to inform the authorities when she travelled to Belgium so that the two notices of appointment which social services did send, albeit belatedly, were to no avail. The second applicant had not furnished any valid explanation for her failure to act after the time-limit expired or to inform the relevant authorities when she travelled to Belgium. Her conduct betrayed a lack of enthusiasm for seeing her grandchildren again, a factor which offsets the authorities' delay. There had therefore been no violation of A 8 as regards the second applicant.

The applicants did not pursue before the Court their complaints of violations of A 6(1) (for delays in the examination of their appeals before the domestic courts) and A 14 (for allegedly discriminatory treatment). In the light of its decision under A 8, the Court followed the conclusions of the Commission (that the complaint under A 6(1) should be regarded as having been absorbed by the issues related to A 8 and that A 14 was of no relevance to the case) and held that no separate issue arose under those provisions.

Despite the fact that some of the witness statements produced by the first applicant gave cause for concern and the Government had not contested their veracity, there was nothing on the case file to indicate that the children had been subjected to treatment contrary to A 3 at 'Il Forteto'. In addition, the first applicant had not lodged a criminal complaint with the relevant domestic authorities. Consequently, there had been no violation of A 3.

With regard to the applicants' complaint that there had also been a violation of A 3 in that their situation, taken as a whole, had caused them suffering and distress, that complaint, in substance, raised no separate issue from the issues arising under A 8 and was not declared admissible by the Commission. The applicants were therefore estopped from raising it.

The first applicant's elder son began school shortly after arriving at 'Il Forteto'. The younger child had just reached school age and was attending a nursery school. With regard to the influence of 'Il Forteto' on the supervision and education of the children, the Court referred to its conclusions on the placement of the children within that community. Consequently, there had been no violation of P1A2.

Non-pecuniary damage (ITL 100,000,000 to first applicant, ITL 50,000,000 to each of the first applicant's children in person), costs and expenses (ITL 17,685,000), lawyer's fees paid on account (ITL 800,000).

Scuderi v Italy (1995) 19 EHRR 187 93/30

[Application lodged 14.2.1987; Commission report 8.4.1992; Court Judgment 24.8.1993]

Mr Giuseppe Scuderi was an official at the Ministry of Finance until his retirement in 1973. On 23 November 1982 he brought an action against the Ministry of Finance, the Treasury and the Ente Nazionale di Previdenza e Assistenza per i Dipendenti Statali (ENPAS) in the Lazio Regional Administrative Court seeking a recalculation of the salary due to him. On 29 October 1985 the Lazio Regional Administrative Court allowed the applicant's application. The text of the judgment was filed in the registry on 3 March 1987. That judgment was notified to the parties on 12 and 13 March 1987 and became final on 13 May 1987, the time-limit for any appeal by counsel for the State. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha.

The period to be considered began on 23 November 1982, the date of the application to the Administrative Court, and ended on 13 May 1987, the time-limit for any appeal by counsel for the State. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was not complex and the applicant's conduct did not contribute to slowing down the proceedings. While those followed their course at a normal speed until 29 October 1985, it thereafter took more than 16 months for the reasons given in the judgment delivered by the Administrative Court on that date to be made known through being filed in the registry. Regarding the excessive workload of the Administrative Court and, in particular, of the judge responsible for writing the decision of 29 October 1985, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. A period of more than four years and five months for a single level of jurisdiction could not be considered reasonable.

Non-pecuniary damage (ITL 3,000,000). Costs and expenses not sought.

Sekanina v Austria (1994) 17 EHRR 221 93/33

[Application lodged 21.4.1987; Commission report 20.5.1992; Court Judgment 25.8.1993]

On 1 August 1985, Mr Karl Sekanina was arrested on suspicion of having murdered his wife. Mrs Sekanina had fallen from a window of their matrimonial home, on the fifth floor of a building in Linz, on 4 July 1985. He was detained on remand. On 30 July 1986 the Assize Court sitting at the Linz Regional Court acquitted the applicant. He was immediately released. The prosecution did not appeal against the acquittal. The applicant applied for a contribution from the State to the costs necessarily incurred in his defence and for compensation for the pecuniary damage sustained on account of his being kept in detention. The Linz Regional Court awarded his necessary defence costs but refused to award the compensation sought. His appeal to the Court of Appeal was unsuccessful. He complained that there had been a violation of the principle of presumption of innocence guaranteed by A 6(2) as when dismissing his claim for compensation for wrongful detention, the Austrian courts had considered that, despite his acquittal, he was still the object of suspicion.

Comm found by majority (18–1) V 6(2).

Court found unanimously V 6(2).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Matscher (c), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AB Baka, Mr J Makarczyk.

The Linz Regional Court gave its decision rejecting the claim on 10 December 1986, several months after the judgment acquitting the applicant on 30 July. Austrian legislation and practice nevertheless linked the two questions of the criminal responsibility of the accused and the right to compensation to such a degree that the decision on the latter issue could be regarded as a consequence and, to some extent, the concomitant of the decision on the former. The Austrian courts relied heavily on the evidence from the Assize Court's case file in order to justify their decision rejecting the applicant's claims, thus demonstrating that, in their opinion, there was indeed a link between the two sets of proceedings. The applicant could therefore invoke A 6(2) in relation to the impugned decisions.

A 6(2) did not guarantee a person charged with a criminal offence a right to compensation for detention on remand imposed in conformity with the requirements of A 5. Notwithstanding the acquittal, on 10 December 1986 the Linz Regional Court rejected the applicant's claim for compensation. In its view, there remained strong indications of the applicant's guilt capable of substantiating the suspicions concerning him; it listed them relying on the Assize Court file. The evidence in question could, in its opinion, still constitute an argument for the applicant's guilt. The court inferred from the record of the jury's deliberations that in acquitting the applicant they had given him the benefit of the doubt. The Linz Court of Appeal went further in the grounds of its decision of 25 February 1987, it did not regard itself as bound by the Assize Court's acquittal. After having drawn up a comprehensive list of items of evidence against the applicant, in its view not refuted during the trial, and after having carefully examined the statements of various witnesses, it concluded: 'The jury took the view that the suspicion was not sufficient to reach a guilty verdict; there was, however, no question of that suspicion's being dispelled'. Such affirmations, not corroborated by the judgment acquitting the applicant or by the record of the jury's deliberations, left open a doubt both as to the applicant's innocence and as to the correctness of the Assize Court's verdict. Despite the fact that there had been a final decision acquitting the applicant, the courts which had to rule on the claim for compensation undertook an assessment of the applicant's guilt on the basis of the contents of the Assize Court file. The voicing of suspicions regarding an accused's innocence was conceivable as long as the conclusion of criminal proceedings had not resulted in a decision on the merits of the accusation. However, it was no longer admissible to rely on such suspicions once an acquittal had become final. Consequently, the reasoning of the Linz Regional Court and the Linz Court of Appeal was incompatible with the presumption of innocence and accordingly there had been a violation of A 6(2).

Selçuk and Asker v Turkey (1998) 26 EHRR 477 98/30

[Application lodged 15.12.1993; Commission report 28.11.96; Court Judgment 24.4.98]

The applicants were Kurds living in Islamköy, a village in South-Eastern Turkey. The first applicant, Mrs Keje Selçuk, was a widow and the mother of five children. The second applicant, Mr Ismet Asker, was married and had seven children. The facts in the case were disputed. The applicants claimed that the Turkish army had deliberately burnt down their homes on 16 June 1993 and, 10 days later, returned to burn the mill partly owned by the first applicant. They claimed breaches of numerous provisions of the Convention.

Comm found unanimously V 8, V P1A1, by majority (27–1) V 3, unanimously NV 2 in respect of the second applicant, NV 5(1), by majority (26–2) V 6(1), V 13, unanimously NV 14 or 18.

Court unanimously dismissed the preliminary objection concerning the non-validity of the applications, by majority (8–1) dismissed the preliminary objection concerning non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, found by majority (8–1) V 3, unanimously not necessary to consider 2 or 5(1), by majority (8–1) V 8, V P1A1, unanimously not necessary to consider 6(1), by majority (8–1) V 13, unanimously NV 14 or 18.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr An Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Jambrek, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr E Levits.

The finding and verification of facts was primarily a matter for the Commission. The Court was not bound by the Commission's findings of fact and remained free to make its own findings, however, it would only exercise its powers to do that in exceptional circumstances. In this case the Court accepted the Commission's findings of the facts which had been proved beyond reasonable doubt.

There was no cause to doubt that the applications were genuine and valid, therefore preliminary objection of non-validity of applications was rejected. The existence of effective and accessible domestic remedies for complaints such as the applicants' had not been demonstrated with sufficient certainty. Although the second applicant presented a petition of complaint to the District Governor, no investigation was opened until communication of applications by Commission to Government. It was understandable if the applicants formed the belief that, the petition to the District Governor having elicited no response, it was pointless for them to attempt to secure satisfaction through national legal channels. There existed special circumstances which dispensed the applicants from the obligation to exhaust domestic remedies. The Government's preliminary objection on non-exhaustion was dismissed.

A 3: even in the most difficult of circumstances, such as the fight against organised terrorism and crime, torture, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment were prohibited by the Convention. There were no exceptions and no derogations from A 3 even where there was a public emergency threatening the life of the nation. In this case the applicants were 54 and 60 years old respectively and had lived in the village of Islamköy all their lives. Their homes and most of their possessions were destroyed by the security forces depriving them of their livelihoods and forcing them to leave the village. The exercise was premeditated and carried out contemptuously and without respect for the feelings of the applicants and without any precautions taken to secure their safety and no assistance was offered to them afterwards. Bearing in mind the manner in which the houses were destroyed and the personal circumstances of the applicants they were caused suffering of sufficient severity for the acts of the security forces to be categorised as inhuman treatment within the meaning of A 3 even if the acts in question were carried out without the intention of punishing the applicants, but rather of preventing the homes being used by PKK members of being a discouragement to others.

Before the Court the applicants did not pursue their claims under A 2 and A 5(1) and in those circumstances, the Court found it unnecessary to consider those complaints.

The acts by the security forces of deliberately destroying the applicants' homes and household property, and the mill partly owned by the first applicant, obliging them to leave Islamköy, constituted particularly grave and unjustified interferences with the applicants' rights to respect for their private and family lives and homes, and to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. Thus there were violations of A 8 and P1A1.

A 6(1) and 13: given the nature of the complaint it was not necessary to consider A 6(1), but only A 13. Where an individual had an arguable claim that his or her home and possessions have been deliberately destroyed by the authorities, the notion of an effective remedy under A 13 entailed in addition to the payment of appropriate compensation and without prejudice to any other available domestic remedy, an obligation on the State to carry out a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible and including effective access for the complainant to the procedures. Turkey had not carried out a through and effective investigation.

The Commission found the applicants' complaints under A 14 in conjunction with A 6, 8, 13 and P1A1 unsubstantiated. On the basis of the facts as established by the Commission, the Court, therefore, found no violation of those provisions.

Selmouni v France (2000) 29 EHRR 403 99/48

[Application lodged 11.11.1999; Commission report 11.12.1997; Court Judgment 28.7.1999]

Mr Ahmed Selmouni, a Netherlands and Moroccan national, was arrested on 25 November 1991 and held in police custody until 29 November in connection with drug-trafficking proceedings. He was remanded in custody pending trial. While in police custody he was examined six times by doctors. He was ultimately sentenced in December 1992 to 15 years' imprisonment and permanent exclusion from French territory and a penalty. In a judgment of 16 September 1993, the Paris Court of Appeal reduced the prison sentence to 13 years and upheld the remainder of the judgment. On 27 June 1994 the Court of Cassation dismissed the applicant's appeal. On 1 February 1993 he lodged a criminal complaint together with an application to join the criminal proceedings as a civil party for assault occasioning actual bodily harm resulting in total unfitness for work for more than eight days; assault and wounding with a weapon (namely a baseball bat); indecent assault; assault occasioning permanent disability (namely the loss of an eye); and rape aided and abetted by two or more accomplices, all of which offences were committed between 25 and 29 November 1991 by police officers in the performance of their duties. The applicant identified police officers who were subsequently charged and committed for trial. In a judgment of 25 March 1999 the Versailles Criminal Court sentenced the officers to three years' imprisonment. Those sentences were reduced, although the majority of the convictions were upheld, in a judgment of 1 July 1999 of the Versailles Court of Appeal. The applicant alleged a violation of A 3 and 6(1).

Comm found unanimously V 3 and 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection that domestic remedies had not been exhausted, found V 3, V 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Bonello, Mr L Caflisch, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr R Maruste, Mr K Traja.

The purpose of A 35 was to afford the Contracting States the opportunity of preventing or putting right the violations alleged against them before those allegations are submitted to the Convention institutions. However, the only remedies which A 35 of the Convention required to be exhausted were those that related to the breaches alleged and at the same time were available and sufficient. The existence of such remedies had to be sufficiently certain not only in theory but also in practice, failing which they would lack the requisite accessibility and effectiveness. A 35 provided for a distribution of the burden of proof. It was incumbent on the Government claiming non-exhaustion to satisfy the Court that the remedy was an effective one available in theory and in practice at the relevant time, that is to say, that it was accessible, was one which was capable of providing redress in respect of the applicant's complaints and offered reasonable prospects of success. However, once that burden of proof had been satisfied, it fell to the applicant to establish that the remedy advanced by the Government was in fact exhausted or was for some reason inadequate and ineffective in the particular circumstances of the case or that there existed special circumstances absolving him or her from the requirement. A 35 had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism. The rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies was neither absolute nor capable of being applied automatically. As soon as the applicant was released from police custody on 29 November 1991, the investigating judge ordered an expert medical report and a preliminary investigation was carried out under the authority of the Public Prosecutor. However, no statement was taken from the applicant until more than a year after the events in issue and the opening of a judicial investigation was not requested until after the applicant had lodged, on 1 February 1993, a criminal complaint together with an application to join the proceedings as a civil party. There were a number of other delays which had to be taken into consideration. The police officers did not finally appear before the criminal courts until almost five years after they had been identified and seven years after the period of police custody in question. Where an individual had an arguable claim that there had been a violation of A 3 (or A 2), the notion of an effective remedy entailed, on the part of the State, a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible. The authorities did not take the positive measures required in the circumstances of the case to ensure that the remedy referred to by the Government was effective. On the facts of this case the Government's objection on grounds of failure to exhaust domestic remedies could not be upheld.

Where an individual was taken into police custody in good health but was found to be injured at the time of release, it was incumbent on the State to provide a plausible explanation of how those injuries were caused, failing which a clear issue arose under A 3. In the instant case the Court considered that it should accept, in the main, the facts as established by the Commission, having been satisfied on the basis of the evidence which it had examined that the Commission could properly reach the conclusion that the applicant's allegations were proved beyond reasonable doubt, it being recalled that such proof may follow from the co-existence of sufficiently strong, clear and concordant inferences. However, it had not been proved that the applicant was raped nor could a causal link be established on the basis of the medical report between the applicant's alleged loss of visual acuity and the events which occurred during police custody. A 3 enshrined one of the most fundamental values of democratic societies and was prohibited absolutely. The distinction, embodied in A 3, between this torture and inhuman or degrading treatment appeared intended to attach a special stigma to deliberate inhuman treatment causing very serious and cruel suffering. The applicant had been subjected while in police custody to physical and undoubtedly mental pain and suffering which were inflicted on him intentionally for the purpose, inter alia, of making him confess to the offence which he was suspected of having committed. The numerous acts of violence were directly inflicted by police officers in the performance of their duties. The acts were such as to arouse in the applicant feelings of fear, anguish and inferiority capable of humiliating and debasing him and possibly breaking his physical and moral resistance. The Court therefore found elements which were sufficiently serious to render such treatment inhuman and degrading. In respect of a person deprived of his liberty, recourse to physical force which had not been made strictly necessary by his own conduct diminished human dignity and was in principle an infringement of A 3. Having regard to the fact that the Convention was a living instrument which had to be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions, the Court considered that certain acts which were classified in the past as 'inhuman and degrading treatment' as opposed to 'torture' could be classified differently in future. The increasingly high standard being required in the area of the protection of human rights and fundamental liberties correspondingly and inevitably required greater firmness in assessing breaches of the fundamental values of democratic societies. A large number of blows were inflicted on the applicant which could be presumed to have caused substantial pain. He was dragged along by his hair, made to run along a corridor with police officers positioned on either side to trip him up, made to kneel down in front of a young woman to whom someone said 'Look, you're going to hear somebody sing', that one police officer then showed him his penis, saying 'Look, suck this', before urinating over him and that he was threatened with a blowlamp and then a syringe. Besides the violent nature of the above acts, they would be heinous and humiliating for anyone, irrespective of their condition. The applicant endured repeated and sustained assaults over a number of days of questioning. Under those circumstances, the physical and mental violence, considered as a whole, committed against the applicant's person caused severe pain and suffering and was particularly serious and cruel. Such conduct had to be regarded as acts of torture for the purposes of A 3.

A 6: the period to be taken into consideration began when the applicant expressly lodged a complaint while being interviewed by an officer of the National Police Inspectorate, that is, on 1 December 1992. Having regard to the nature and extreme seriousness of the alleged acts, the Court did not consider that it should take as the starting-point 1 February 1993, the date on which the applicant lodged a criminal complaint and an application to join the proceedings as a civil party or, a fortiori, the date on which that complaint and application were registered. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, regard being had to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. Neither the complexity of the case nor the applicant's conduct justified the length of the proceedings. The proceedings, which were still pending since an appeal on points of law might be brought, had already lasted more than six years and seven months. A number of delays were attributable to the judicial authorities. Having regard to all the evidence, the reasonable time prescribed by A 6(1) was exceeded.

Sener v Turkey 00/184

[Application lodged 7.3.1995; Court Judgment 18.7.2000]

Ms Pelin Sener was the owner and editor of a weekly review entitled Haberde Yorumda Gerçek (The Truth of News and Comments), published in Istanbul. On 5 September 1993 the Istanbul State Security Court ordered the seizure of the 23rd edition of the review, dated 4 September 1993, on the ground that an article in it contained separatist propaganda. The applicant was charged with having disseminated propaganda against the indivisibility of the State by publishing the article. In a judgment dated 5 July 1994 the Istanbul State Security Court, composed of three judges including a military judge, found the applicant guilty and sentenced her to six months' imprisonment and a fine of TRL 50,000,000 and ordered confiscation of the offending publication. The applicant's appeal was dismissed by the Court of Cassation on 30 November 1994. Following amendments to the law, the Istanbul State Security Court re-examined the applicant's case and on 8 March 1996 imposed the same sentence on her. The applicant appealed. On 10 June 1997 the Court of Cassation quashed the judgment of 8 March 1996 on the ground that the Istanbul State Security Court had not commuted the applicant's sentence of imprisonment to a fine. On 25 September 1997 the State Security Court decided to defer the imposition of a final sentence, a final sentence would be imposed should the applicant be convicted of a further intentional offence in her capacity as an editor within three years of that decision. The author of the article was convicted in November 1995 and his sentenced suspended. The applicant complained that her conviction constituted an unjustified interference with her right to freedom of expression, that the restrictions which were applied to the exercise of that right were inconsistent with the legitimate aims prescribed in A 10(2) and that the Istanbul State Security Court which dealt with her case was not an independent and impartial tribunal.

Court found by majority (6–1) V 10, V 6(1), unanimously NV 18.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), ad hoc judge.

There had been an interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression on account of her conviction and sentence. The interference was prescribed by law, namely the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1991. Having regard to the sensitivity of the security situation in south-east Turkey and to the need for the authorities to be alert to acts capable of fuelling additional violence, the measures taken against the applicant could be said to have been in furtherance of the aims of protection of national security and public safety. Although certain phrases seemed aggressive in tone, the article taken as a whole did not glorify violence. Nor did it incite people to hatred, revenge, recrimination or armed resistance. On the contrary, the article was an intellectual analysis of the Kurdish problem which called for an end to the armed conflict. Furthermore, the applicant was not convicted for incitement to violence, but for disseminating separatist propaganda. In that regard, the domestic authorities failed to give sufficient weight to the public's right to be informed of a different perspective on the situation in south-east Turkey, irrespective of how unpalatable that perspective may be for them. The reasons given by the Istanbul State Security Court for convicting the applicant, although relevant, could not be considered sufficient to justify the interference with her right to freedom of expression. Despite the fact that the imposition of a final sentence on the applicant was suspended, the conditional suspended sentence had the effect of restricting her work as an editor and reducing her ability to offer the public views. The applicant's conviction was therefore disproportionate to the aims pursued and, accordingly, not necessary in a democratic society. There had therefore been a violation of A 10.

In previous judgments the Court found that the status of military judges sitting as members of State Security Courts did provide some guarantees of independence and impartiality. However, certain aspects of these judges' status made their independence and impartiality questionable: for example, the fact that they were servicemen who still belonged to the army, which in turn took its orders from the Executive; the fact that they remained subject to military discipline; and the fact that decisions pertaining to their appointment were to a great extent taken by the administrative authorities and the army. It was understandable that the applicant, prosecuted in a State Security Court for disseminating propaganda aimed at undermining the national security of the State and public safety, should have been apprehensive about being tried by a bench which included a regular army officer and member of the Military Legal Service. On that account she could legitimately fear that the Istanbul State Security Court might allow itself to be unduly influenced by considerations which had nothing to do with the nature of the case. In other words, the applicant's fears as to that court's lack of independence and impartiality could be regarded as objectively justified. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation were not able to dispel these fears since that court did not have full jurisdiction. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

The Court agreed with the Commission that the restrictions which were applied to the applicant's right to freedom of expression were consistent with the legitimate aims contained in A 10(2). Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 18.

Non-pecuniary damage (by majority (6–1) FF 30,000), costs and expenses ((6–1) FF 10,000).

Seri v Italy 91/61

[Application lodged 8.6.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 3.12.1991]

Mrs Maria Seri was an agricultural worker. On 20 May 1985 she took out a writ against the 'Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale' before the Rome magistrates' court in order to be reinstated in her disability pension rights, which had been withdrawn with effect from 1 June 1984, and to obtain a court order for the pension arrears. On 12 November 1986 the magistrates' court dismissed her claim. She appealed on 6 February 1987 against the decision. The District Court gave judgment on 24 February 1989 which was lodged with the registry on 12 May 1989. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens.

Despite several reminders from the registry, the applicant showed no interest in the proceedings before the Court. The Court considered that there has been an implied withdrawal which constituted a 'fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter'. In addition, the Court discerned no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. It recalled its previous case-law in which it had reviewed the reasonableness of the length of civil proceedings in various Contracting States. Accordingly, the case was struck out of the list.

Serif v Greece 99/103

[Application lodged 29.9.1997; Court Judgment 14.12.1999]

The State appointed Mr MT as Mufti (Muslim religious leader) of Rodopi, ad interim following the death of the previous Mufti. He was confirmed in the post on 6 April 1990. In December 1990, the two independent Muslim Members of Parliament for Xanthi and Rodopi requested the State to organise elections for the posts of Mufti of Rodopi and Xanthi. Having received no reply, the two independent MPs decided to organise themselves elections at the mosques on Friday 28 December 1990 after the prayers. On 24 December 1990, the President of the Republic adopted a legislative act changing the manner of selection of the Muftis, so that they were to be appointed by presidential decree. On 28 December 1990 Mr Ibraim Serif, a theological school graduate, was elected Mufti of Rodopi by those attending Friday prayers at the mosques. Together with other Moslems he challenged the lawfulness of MT's appointment before the Council of State. These proceedings were still pending. On 4 February 1991 Parliament enacted Law 1920 retroactively, thereby validating the act of 24 December 1990. The public prosecutor instituted criminal proceedings against the applicant for having usurped the functions of a minister of a 'known religion' and for having publicly worn the uniform of such a minister without having the right to do so. On 12 December 1994 the court found the applicant guilty and sentenced him to eight months' imprisonment. On appeal, his conviction was upheld and a sentence of six months' imprisonment to be commuted to a fine was imposed. His appeal to the Court of Cassation was rejected. He complained that his conviction amounted to a violation of A 9.

Court found unanimously V 9, no separate issue under 10.

Judges: Mr M Fischbach, President, Mr C Rozakis, Mr B Conforti, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr AB Baka, Mr E Levits.

While religious freedom was primarily a matter of individual conscience, it also included, inter alia, freedom, in community with others and in public, to manifest one's religion in worship and teaching. The facts underlying the applicant's conviction were issuing a message about the religious significance of a feast, delivering a speech at a religious gathering, issuing another message on the occasion of a religious holiday and appearing in the clothes of a religious leader. In those circumstances, his conviction amounted to an interference with his right under A 9(1), 'in community with others and in public, to manifest his religion in worship and teaching'. It was not necessary to rule on the question whether the interference in issue was prescribed by law because it was in any event incompatible with A 9 on other grounds. The interference pursued a legitimate aim under A 9(2), namely to protect public order. The applicant was not the only person claiming to be the religious leader of the local Moslem community; on 6 April 1990 the authorities had appointed another person as Mufti of Rodopi and the relevant decision had been challenged before the Council of State. Despite a vague assertion that the applicant had officiated at wedding ceremonies and engaged in administrative activities, the domestic courts that convicted the applicant did not mention in their decisions any specific acts by the applicant with a view to producing legal effects. Punishing a person for the mere fact that he acted as the religious leader of a group that willingly followed him could hardly be considered compatible with the demands of religious pluralism in a democratic society. There existed an officially appointed Mufti, but there was no indication that the applicant attempted at any time to exercise the judicial and administrative functions for which the legislation on the Muftis and other ministers of 'known religions' made provision. In democratic societies, the State did not need to take measures to ensure that religious communities remained or were brought under a unified leadership. Although it was possible that tension was created in situations where a religious or any other community became divided, that was one of the unavoidable consequences of pluralism. The role of the authorities in such circumstances was not to remove the cause of tension by eliminating pluralism, but to ensure that the competing groups tolerated each other. The Government did not make any allusion to actual disturbances. Nothing was adduced that could warrant qualifying the risk of tension between the Moslems and Christians or between Greece and Turkey as anything more than a very remote possibility. It had not therefore been shown that the applicant's conviction was justified in the circumstances of the case by a pressing social need. As a result, the interference with the applicant's right, in community with others and in public, to manifest his religion in worship and teaching was not necessary in a democratic society for the protection of public order under A 9(2) and there had, therefore, been a violation of A 9.

Given the finding of violation of A 9 of the Convention, it was not necessary to examine whether A 10 was also violated.

Serra v France 00/162

[Application lodged 1.10.1996; Court Judgment 13.6.2000]

Mr Jaime Serra complained of the length of administrative proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr W Fuhrmann, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mrs Hs Greve, Mr K Traja.

The period to be taken into consideration had lasted 10 years, three months and 17 days at five levels of jurisdiction including more than four and a half years for the examination of the applicant's first cassation appeal. The period could not be considered reasonable.

Serre v France 99/58

[Application lodged 26.12.1995; Court Judgment 29.9.1999]

Mr Jean-Pierre Serre was a veterinary surgeon. He was disqualified by the Veterinary Council from practice for various breaches of the professional regulations. His appeal to the Disciplinary Council resulted in his disqualification being reduced. His appeal to the Conseil d'Etat was rejected. He complained that the proceedings had not been heard in open court.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja.

As the matter at stake in the disciplinary proceedings was the right to practise as a veterinary surgeon in the private sector, A 6(1) applied to the disciplinary proceedings. The holding of proceedings in open court was a fundamental requirement of A 6(1).

Serrentino v Italy 92/35

[Application lodged 22.7.1986; Commission report 6.3.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

On 10 October 1983 Mr Ignazio Serrentino was involved in a road accident and seriously injured. By summons served on 11 September 1984, he took proceedings for damages before the Reggio Calabria District Court against the owner and the driver of the car which had knocked him down, and also against the X insurance company. On 30 January 1987 the court declared the defendants jointly and severally liable to pay the applicant damages, interest and costs. The text of the judgment was lodged with the registry on 27 March 1987. The parties appealed. On 15 November 1990 the Appeal Court re-assessed the damages. The text of the decision was lodged with the registry on 6 December 1990. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (9–1) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 11 September 1984 when the proceedings were instituted against the person responsible for the accident and his insurance company. It had not yet ended, as the Court of Cassation had still to give judgment. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was not a complex one. There were several periods of inactivity on the part of the authorities. The parties were responsible for several delays resulting in a total delay of about 11 months, but at the applicant's request the District Court brought forward the date of one hearing by nearly two years. It took the Reggio Calabria Court of Appeal almost two years to find that the appeal filed by the X insurance company had not been notified to the owner of the car in question. Yet under the Italian Code of Civil Procedure the judicial authorities were responsible for ensuring that such steps are properly carried out. In those circumstances and in view of what was at stake for the applicant, the Court could not regard as reasonable a lapse of time which had already amounted to more than seven years.

Serves v France (1999) 28 EHRR 265 97/77

[Application lodged 21.4.1992; Commission report 23.5.1996; Court Judgment 20.10.1997]

Mr Paul Serves was a regular officer in the French army and at the material time held the rank of captain. He was in command of the first company of the Second Foreign Parachute Regiment and was based in the Central African Republic. On 11 April 1988 the applicant instructed the heads of platoon on an operation. During the course of the operation a native was shot and wounded by Staff Sergeant B. The injured man was treated by the platoon's medical orderly and taken to the bivouac, where Lieutenant C ordered Corporal D to dig a grave. An hour after that had been done, and after being questioned, the captive, on Lieutenant C's orders, was dispatched by means of five shots fired by Corporal D and then buried. The applicant was told of the incident on 15 or 16 April 1988 and ordered his men to remain silent. They returned to their camp at Bouar on 21 April. In his report on the 'provincial tour' the applicant made no mention of any incident. A judicial investigation, for murder, was begun in respect of Lieutenant C and Corporal D only. They were charged on 19 April 1990. In connection with that investigation, the applicant was summoned to appear as a witness before the military investigating judge three times. He attended but refused to take the oath and give evidence. He was ordered to pay fines of FF 500, FF 2,000 and FF 4,000 respectively for refusing to take the oath and give evidence. The applicant's appeal against those orders to the Paris Court of Appeal and thereafter to the Court of Cassation (Criminal Division) were dismissed. On 28 February 1994 the First Indictment Division of the Paris Court of Appeal indicted Corporal D for murder, and Lieutenant C and the applicant for aiding and abetting murder. On 11 May 1994 the Paris Military Court convicted and sentenced Corporal D to one year's imprisonment, suspended, Lieutenant C to three years' imprisonment, with one year suspended, and the applicant to four years' imprisonment, with one year suspended. The applicant complained that the fines imposed on him for refusing to take the oath and give evidence before the investigating judge amounted to an infringement of his right not to incriminate himself. In addition, he criticised the conditions in which the proceedings leading to the imposition of those fines had taken place.

Comm found by majority (25–2) V 6(1), (26–1) no separate issue under 10.

Court found unanimously 6(1) applicable, by majority (6–3) NV 6(1), NV 6(1)+6(3)(b), unanimously not necessary to examine 10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr R Pekkanen (D), Sir John Freeland, Mr Ma Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber (D), Mr J Makarczyk (D).

The Court recalled its case-law. When the applicant was summoned to appear as a witness and fined under the Code of Criminal Procedure, he could be considered the subject of a 'charge' within the autonomous meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, A 6(1) was applicable in the instant case.

The right of any person charged to remain silent and the right not to incriminate himself were generally recognised international standards which lay at the heart of the notion of a fair procedure under A 6 of the Convention. Their rationale lay, inter alia, in protecting the person charged against improper compulsion by the authorities and thereby contributing to the avoidance of miscarriages of justice and to the fulfilment of the aims of A 6. The right not to incriminate oneself, in particular, presupposed that the prosecution in a criminal case sought to prove their case without resort to evidence obtained through methods of coercion or oppression in defiance of the will of the person charged. It was the task of the Court to decide whether the fining of the applicant amounted to coercion such as to render his right not to incriminate himself ineffective. The applicant refused at the outset to take the oath. Yet the oath was a solemn act whereby the person concerned undertook before the investigating judge to tell 'the whole truth and nothing but the truth'. Whilst a witness's obligation to take the oath and the penalties imposed for failure to do so involved a degree of coercion, the latter was designed to ensure that any statements made to the judge were truthful, not to force witnesses to give evidence. In other words, the fines imposed on the applicant did not constitute a measure such as to compel him to incriminate himself as they were imposed before such a risk ever arose. Consequently, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

The applicant appealed against the orders imposing the fines concerned and at the end of the proceedings, which could not be faulted under A 6 of the Convention, the Paris Court of Appeal dealt with his ground of appeal based on the Code of Criminal Procedure. Consequently, the Court held, without its being necessary to consider the Government's preliminary objection, that there has been no violation of A 6(1) and (3)(b) taken together.

The merits of the applicant's complaint that his right not to incriminate himself had been violated had been considered under A 6(1). He did not provide any information demonstrating a need for that complaint to be considered under A 10 also. It was therefore unnecessary to examine whether there has been a violation of that provision.

Sheffield and Horsham v United Kingdom (1999) 27 EHRR 163 98/60

The first applicant, Miss Kristina Sheffield, was born in 1946 and was registered at birth as being of the male sex. In 1986 she began treatment and successfully underwent sex reassignment surgery. She changed her name by deed poll to her present name and that name was recorded on her passport and driving licence. Prior to her operation she had been married and had one daughter. She complained of the difficulties which she had encountered as a result of her decision to undergo gender reassignment surgery and her subsequent change of sex.

The second applicant, Miss Rachel Horsham, born in 1946, was registered at birth as being of the male sex. She moved to Amsterdam and underwent gender reassignment surgery on 21 May 1992. She experienced difficulties in getting the British consulate in Amsterdam to allow a change of photograph and the inscription of her new name in her passport. She was unable to amend her original birth certificate in the UK to record her sex as female. She stated that she was forced to live in exile and would not be able to marry and live a married life with her male partner in the UK.

The applicants complained that the failure of the respondent State to recognise in law that they were of female sex interfered with their rights under A 8 and A 12.

Comm found in respect of the first applicant by majority (15–1) V 8, (9–7) no separate issue under 12, unanimously no separate issue under 14, unanimously NV 13. In respect of the second applicant by majority (15–1) V 8, (10–6) no separate issue under 12, unanimously no separate issue under 14, unanimously NV 13.

Court found by majority (11–9) NV 8, (18–2) NV 12, unanimously NV 14+8, unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt (jpd), President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (jpd), Mr F Matscher, Mr A Spielmann (jpd), Mr J De Meyer (jc), Mr N Valticos (jc), Mrs E Palm (jpd), Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (jc), Sir John Freeland (c), Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber (jpd/declaration), Mr J Makarczyk (jpd), Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris, Mr J Casadevall (pd), Mr P Van Dijk (d), Mr T Pantiru, Mr M Voicu (jpd), Mr V Butkevych.

The issue raised by the applicants before the Court was not that the respondent State should abstain from acting to their detriment, but that it had failed to take positive steps to modify a system which they claimed operated to their prejudice. The essence of their complaints concerned the continuing insistence by the authorities on the determination of gender according to biological criteria alone and the immutability of the gender information once it was entered on the register of births. No scientific or legal developments in the area of transsexualism had been shown since the Cossey judgment and the Court was accordingly not persuaded that it should depart from its Rees and Cossey decisions. The respondent State could rely on a margin of appreciation to defend its continuing refusal to recognise in law a transsexual's post-operative gender. For the Court, it continued to be the case that transsexualism raised complex scientific, legal, moral and social issues, in respect of which there was no generally shared approach among the Contracting States. In addition, the detriment suffered by the applicants in being obliged to disclose pre-operative gender in certain contexts was not of sufficient seriousness as to override the respondent State's margin of appreciation in that area. The situations in which the applicants might be required to disclose their pre-operative gender did not occur with a degree of frequency which could be said to impinge to a disproportionate extent on their right to respect for their private lives. Moreover, the respondent State had endeavoured to some extent to minimise intrusive inquiries as to their gender status by allowing transsexuals to be issued with driving licences, passports and other types of official documents in their new name and gender, and that the use of birth certificates as a means of identification was officially discouraged. Despite the Court's statements in the Rees and Cossey cases on the importance of keeping the need for appropriate legal measures in this area under review having regard in particular to scientific and societal developments, it appeared that the respondent State had not taken any steps to do so. The fact that a transsexual was able to record his or her new sexual identity on a driving licence or passport or to change a first name were not innovative facilities. Even if there had been no significant scientific developments since the date of the Cossey judgment which made it possible to reach a firm conclusion on the aetiology of transsexualism, it was nevertheless the case that there was an increased social acceptance of transsexualism and an increased recognition of the problems which post-operative transsexuals encountered. In finding no breach of A 8 in this case, the Court reiterated that the area needed to be kept under review by Contracting States. The applicants had not established that the respondent State had a positive obligation under A 8 of the Convention to recognise in law their post-operative gender. Accordingly, there was no breach of that provision in the instant case.

The right to marry guaranteed by A 12 referred to the traditional marriage between persons of opposite biological sex. Furthermore, A 12 laid down that the exercise of that right should be subject to the national laws of the Contracting States. The limitations thereby introduced must not restrict or reduce the right in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right was impaired. However, the legal impediment in the UK on the marriage of persons who were not of the opposite biological sex could not be said to have an effect of that kind. The attachment to the traditional concept of marriage which underpinned A 12 of the Convention provided sufficient reason for the continued adoption by the respondent State of biological criteria for determining a person's sex for the purposes of marriage. The inability of either applicant to contract a valid marriage under the domestic law of the respondent State having regard to the conditions imposed by the domestic legislation could not be said to constitute a violation of A 12.

A 14 afforded protection against discrimination in the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms safeguarded by the other substantive provisions of the Convention. However, not every difference in treatment would amount to a violation of A 14. It had to be established that other persons in an analogous or relevantly similar situation enjoyed preferential treatment, and that there was no reasonable or objective justification for that distinction. Contracting States enjoyed a margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment in law. The Court had already concluded that the respondent State had not overstepped its margin of appreciation in not according legal recognition to a transsexual's post-operative gender. In reaching that conclusion, it was satisfied that a fair balance continued to be struck between the need to safeguard the interests of transsexuals such as the applicants and the interests of the community in general and that the situations in which the applicants might be required to disclose their pre-operative gender did not occur with a degree of frequency which could be said to impinge to a disproportionate extent on their right to respect for their private lives. Those considerations, which were equally encompassed in the notion of 'reasonable and objective justification' for the purposes of A 14 of the Convention, had also to be seen as justifying the difference in treatment which the applicants experienced irrespective of the reference group relied on. Therefore no violation has been established under A 14.

The applicants stated that they did not wish to pursue their complaints under A 13, the Court did not consider it necessary therefore to examine that head of complaint.

Sibson v United Kingdom (1994) 17 EHRR 193 93/16

[Application lodged 17.10.1988; Commission report 10.12.1991; Court Judgment 20.4.1993]

Mr Dennis Sibson was employed by Courtaulds Northern Spinning Ltd (CNS) from November 1973 as a heavy goods vehicle driver. He was based at its depot at Greengate. He had been a member of the Transport and General Workers Union (TGWU) and its branch secretary from 1981 to 1984. Following an allegation against him by Mr D of having 'milked the funds' of the union and the rejection of his complaint by the TGWU branch adjudication panel, he resigned from TGWU and joined the United Road Transport Union instead. There was disagreement between the applicant and some of his fellow drivers and the threat of strike action. Negotiations were held. The applicant was offered the choice of rejoining TGWU or being employed on driving work not based at Greengate but at Chadderton. The applicant stated that he would rejoin the union only if he received an apology from Mr D. At a final meeting on 8 November 1985 the applicant declined to accept either of the alternatives then put before him and suggested that the management should dismiss him. He lodged with the Industrial Tribunal a complaint of unfair dismissal. By decision of 21 July 1986, the Industrial Tribunal unanimously accepted the complaint of unfair dismissal. That decision was upheld by the Employment Appeal Tribunal. An appeal by CNS was allowed on 25 March 1988 by the Court of Appeal. He complained that the compulsion imposed on him to join TGWU or to move to another depot was contrary to his rights under A 11.

Comm found by majority (8–6) NV 11.

Court found by majority (7–2) NV 11.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo (d), Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (d), Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha.

The Government's preliminary objections of non-exhaustion were closely linked to those that would have to be examined if it proved necessary to determine whether there had been such a failure and they were therefore joined to the merits.

As the Court had previously held, although compulsion to join a particular trade union might not always be contrary to the Convention, a form of such compulsion which, in the circumstances of the case, struck at the very substance of the freedom of association guaranteed by A 11 would constitute an interference with that freedom. The applicant did not object to rejoining TGWU on account of any specific convictions as regards trade union membership (he did in fact join another union instead). He would have rejoined TGWU had he received a form of apology acceptable to him. The present case was not one in which a closed shop agreement was in force. The applicant was not faced with a threat of dismissal involving loss of livelihood but had the possibility of going to work at the nearby Chadderton depot, to which his employers were contractually entitled to move him; their offer to him in that respect was not conditional on his rejoining TGWU; and it was not established that his working conditions there would have been significantly less favourable than those at the Greengate depot. Having regard to those various factors, the applicant was not subjected to a form of treatment striking at the very substance of the freedom of association guaranteed by A 11. There had accordingly been no violation of that provision. In those circumstances, it was not necessary to determine the other questions.

Sidiropoulos and Others v Greece (1999) 27 EHRR 633 98/50

[Application lodged 16.11.1994; Commission report 11.4.1997; Court Judgment 10.7.1998]

Mr Christos Sidiropoulos, an electrician, Mr Petros Dimtsis, a teacher, Mr Stavros Anastassiadis, a farmer, Mr Anastassios Boules, a farmer, Mr Dimitrios Seltsas, a dentist and Mr Stavros Sovislis, a farmer, all lived in northern Greece, on the border of the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. They claimed to be of 'Macedonian' ethnic origin and to have a 'Macedonian national consciousness' and decided with others to form a non-profit-making association called 'Home of Macedonian Civilisation'. The association's headquarters were to be at Florina. According to clause 2 of its memorandum of association, the association's objects were '(a) the cultural, intellectual and artistic development of its members and of the inhabitants of Florina in general and the fostering of a spirit of co-operation, solidarity and love between them; (b) cultural decentralisation and the preservation of intellectual and artistic endeavours and traditions and of the civilisation's monuments and, more generally, the promotion and development of their folk culture; and (c) the protection of the region's natural and cultural environment'. Their application for registration of their association under the name of 'Home of Macedonian Civilisation' was refused by the Florina Court of First Instance. Their appeal to the Salonika Court of Appeal was dismissed as was their subsequent appeal to the Court of Cassation.

Comm found unanimously V 11, not necessary to consider 6 and 14, no separate issue under 9 and 10.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found V 11, not necessary to rule on 6(1), 9, 10 and 14.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr I Foighel, Mr Jm Morenilla, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr V Butkevych.

A 11, notwithstanding its autonomous role and particular sphere of application, could also be considered in the light of A 9 and 10. The protection of personal opinion afforded by those articles in the shape of freedom of conscience and freedom of expression was also one of the purposes of freedom of association as guaranteed by A 11. The applicants' complaints under A 9, 10 and 14 went to the very substance of A 11, so that in the national courts the applicants did rely on grounds of equivalent effect within the meaning of the Court's case-law. As to the complaints under A 6(1), inasmuch as they concerned the way in which the national courts used certain evidence to refuse the application to register the association, they were identical with those raised by the applicants under A 11. The preliminary objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies was therefore dismissed. There was nothing in the relevant association's memorandum of association to warrant the conclusion that the association relied on the Convention to engage in activity or perform acts aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth in it. The Government's preliminary objection of abuse of the right of individual petition was therefore dismissed.

The Greek courts' refusal to register the applicants' association amounted to an interference by the authorities with the applicants' exercise of their right to freedom of association; the refusal deprived the applicants of any possibility of jointly or individually pursuing the aims they had laid down in the association's memorandum of association and of thus exercising the right in question. The interference was prescribed by law, as the Civil Code allowed the courts to refuse an application to register an association where they found that the validity of its memorandum of association was open to question. Having regard to the situation prevailing in the Balkans at the time and to the political friction between Greece and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (FYROM), the Court accepted that the interference in issue was intended to protect national security and prevent disorder. The right to form an association was an inherent part of the right set forth in A 11, even if that article only made express reference to the right to form trade unions. That citizens should be able to form a legal entity in order to act collectively in a field of mutual interest was one of the most important aspects of the right to freedom of association, without which that right would be deprived of any meaning. The way in which national legislation enshrined that freedom and its practical application by the authorities revealed the state of democracy in the country concerned. States had a right to satisfy themselves that an association's aim and activities were in conformity with the rules laid down in legislation, but they had to do so in a manner compatible with their obligations under the Convention and subject to review by the Convention institutions. The exceptions set out in A 11 were to be construed strictly; only convincing and compelling reasons could justify restrictions on freedom of association. In determining whether a necessity within the meaning of A 11(2) existed, States had only a limited margin of appreciation. The aims of the association called 'Home of Macedonian Civilisation', as set out in its memorandum of association, were exclusively to preserve and develop the traditions and folk culture of the Florina region. Such aims appeared to be perfectly clear and legitimate. The press articles in question, which had a decisive influence on the outcome of the proceedings, showed that they reported matters some of which were unconnected with the applicants and drew inferences derived from a subjective assessment by the authors of the articles. Relying on those articles and having regard to the political dispute that then dominated relations between Greece and the FYROM, the national courts held that the applicants and the association they wished to found represented a danger to Greece's territorial integrity. That statement, however, was based on a mere suspicion as to the true intentions of the association's founders and the activities it might have engaged in once it had begun to function. Greek law did not lay down a system of preventive review for setting up non-profit-making associations. The Civil Code allowed the courts merely to review lawfulness and not to review desirability. Under the Civil Code, the Court of First Instance could order that the association should be dissolved if it subsequently pursued an aim different from the one laid down in its memorandum of association or if its functioning proved to be contrary to law, morality or public order. The refusal to register the applicants' association was disproportionate to the objectives pursued. That being so, there had been a violation of A 11.

The applicants' complaints under A 6(1) were largely the same as those raised under A 11 and therefore, having regard to its decision in relation to that article, it was not necessary to examine A 6(1).

The complaint under A 9, 10 and 14 related to the same facts as the ones based on A 11 and it was not therefore necessary to consider it.

Present judgment constituted just satisfaction for the non-pecuniary damage sustained. Costs and expenses (GRD 4,000,000).

[Application lodged 22.12.1989; Commission report 15.5.1992; Court Judgment 30.6.1993]

Mr Sigurdur A Sigurjónsson was a taxi driver in Reykjavik. He was granted a licence to operate a taxicab by the licence issuers. He refused to join Frami Automobile Association. As a consequence, on 30 June 1986, his licence was revoked. On 18 September 1986 he instituted proceedings against both the Committee and the Ministry before the Civil Court of Reykjavik, seeking a declaration that the revocation was null and void. The Civil Court dismissed his claim and a subsequent appeal to the Supreme Court was rejected. The applicant complained that the obligation to be a member of the automobile association on pain of losing his licence constituted a violation of A 11.

There was not sufficient evidence for Frami to be regarded as a public law association outside the ambit of A 11. It performed certain functions which were to some extent provided for in the applicable legislation and which served not only its members but also the public at large. However, the role of supervision of the implementation of the relevant rules was entrusted primarily to another institution, namely the Committee, which in addition had the power to issue licences and to decide on their suspension and revocation. Frami was established under private law and enjoyed full autonomy in determining its own aims, organisation and procedure. Regard also was had to its articles. It was predominantly a private law organisation and had to be therefore considered an 'association' for the purposes of A 11. It was not necessary to decide whether Frami could also be regarded as a trade union as the right to form and join trade unions was an aspect of the wider right to freedom of association, rather than a separate right. The measures complained of constituted an interference with his right to freedom of association. It was not contested that the impugned membership obligation was prescribed by law and pursued a legitimate aim, namely the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. The applicant was subjected to a form of compulsion which was rare within the Contracting States and which, on the face of it, had to be considered incompatible with A 11. Frami had a role that served not only the occupational interests of its members but also the public interest, and its performance of the supervisory functions in question must have been facilitated by the obligation of every licence-holder within the association's area to be a member. However, the Court was not convinced that compulsory membership of Frami was required in order to perform those functions. Supervision of the implementation of the relevant rules lay with the Committee and membership was not the only conceivable way of compelling the licence-holders to carry out such duties and responsibilities as might be necessary for the relevant functions. Nor had it been established that there was any other reason that would have prevented Frami from protecting its members' occupational interests in the absence of the compulsory membership imposed on the applicant despite his opinions. Although the reasons adduced by the Government could be considered relevant, they were not sufficient to show that it was necessary to compel the applicant to be a member of Frami, on pain of losing his licence and contrary to his own opinions. In particular, notwithstanding Iceland's margin of appreciation, the measures complained of were disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 11.

Having found a violation of A 11 and taken account of A 9 and 10 in the context of A 11, it was not necessary to consider those articles.

Before the Court the applicant stated that he accepted the Commission's conclusion that there had been no violation of A 13, accordingly the Court did not find it necessary to examine the matter of its own motion.

[Application lodged 16.1.1989; Commission report 11.12.1992; Court Judgment 23.3.1994]

Mr Virgílio da Silva Pontes was a bank employee. On 12 November 1975 the car he was driving, in which Mr José Gonçalves Martins Moreira was a passenger, was in collision with another vehicle. As a result of his injuries the applicant remained in hospital until 31 May 1976. He underwent several operations including one in London in December 1978. He suffered from a 58% permanent disability. On 20 December 1977 the applicant and Mr Martins Moreira instituted civil proceedings in the Evora Court of First Instance against the owner, driver, the company on whose behalf the journey was undertaken, and the insurance company. On 5 February 1987 the Supreme Court delivered its judgment and on 28 October 1987 the applicant asked the Evora Court of First Instance to order the payment of the part of the damages awarded to them by the Court of Appeal which had already been calculated. An out of court settlement was reached in December 1989. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings

If the national law of a State made provision for proceedings consisting of two stages – one when the court ruled on the existence of an obligation to pay and another when it fixed the amount owed – it was reasonable to consider that, for the purposes of A 6(1), a civil right was not 'determined' until the amount had been decided. The determination of a right entailed deciding not only on the existence of that right, but also on its scope or the manner in which it may be exercised, which would evidently include the calculation of the amount due. In the present case, at the stage of the declaratory proceedings, the Evora court awarded Mr Silva Pontes and reserved for the subsequent enforcement proceedings the matter of the reimbursement of the transport costs incurred in order to receive medical treatment after the accident. The Evora Court of Appeal dismissed the applicant's appeal, but the Supreme Court awarded him an additional sum, likewise to be determined in the course of the enforcement proceedings, for damage resulting from his disability. Thus the enforcement proceedings were not intended solely to enforce an obligation to pay a fixed amount; they also served to determine important elements of the debt itself. Those proceedings had therefore to be regarded as the second stage of the proceedings which began on 20 December 1977. It followed that the dispute over the applicant's right to damages would only have been resolved by the final decision in the enforcement proceedings. As the applicant complained of the length of the proceedings taken as a whole and not of a flaw affecting only the first stage, the out-of-court settlement concluded on 19 December 1989 denoted the final domestic decision. The preliminary objection that the application was out of time was therefore dismissed.

A 6 applied to the first stage of the proceedings and, having regard to its reasoning in relation to the preliminary objection, the Court was of the view that it also applied to the second stage.

The period to be taken into consideration did not begin to run when the action was first brought before the relevant court on 20 December 1977, but only on 9 November 1978, when the Convention entered into force with regard to Portugal. It ended on 19 December 1989, the date on which the out-of-court settlement was concluded. It therefore lasted 11 years and one month. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined in the light of the circumstances of the case and with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities and what was at stake for the applicant in the dispute. Special diligence was called for in determining compensation for the victims of road accidents. The Court noted the similarity between the applicant's position and that of Mr Martins Moreira, his co-plaintiff in those proceedings. There was no reason to depart from the considerations set forth in the judgment of 26 October 1988. The length of the declaratory proceedings was accordingly in itself already excessive. The period subsequent to the decision of the Supreme Court of 5 February 1987 only made the proceedings even longer. Accordingly, it was not necessary to examine it in detail. There had been a violation of A 6(1).

Silva Rocha v Portugal 96/55

[Application lodged 28.6.1990; Commission report 16.5.1995; Court Judgment 15.11.1996]

Mr Serafim da Silva Rocha was remanded in custody for the offences of aggravated homicide and illegal possession of weapons. On 13 July 1990 the Oporto Criminal Court held that, on account of his mentally disturbed state, the applicant was not criminally responsible and was dangerous. It accordingly ordered that he be detained for a minimum of three years in a psychiatric institution. His detention was extended. He left hospital on 8 March 1994. He complained that he was unable to have the lawfulness of his continued detention reviewed at reasonable intervals.

Comm found it by majority (25–3) V 5(4).

Court found by majority (6–3) NV 5(4).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (c), President, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr C Russo (d), Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos (d), Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel (c), Mr MA Lopes Rocha (c), Mr P Kûris.

The Oporto Criminal Court found that the established facts constituted the offences of which the applicant had been accused and that, on account of the mental disturbance from which he suffered, he could not be held criminally responsible and was at the same time dangerous. It was for those reasons that it ordered, in accordance with the Criminal Code, his detention in a psychiatric institution for a minimum period of three years. The applicant was accordingly lawfully detained pursuant to a decision which, in the circumstances of the case, was both a conviction by a competent Court within the meaning of A 5(1)(a) and a security measure taken in relation to a person of unsound mind within the meaning of A 5(1)(e). The seriousness of the offences together with the risk that he represented for himself as well as for others could reasonably justify his being removed from society for at least three years. For that period the review required by A 5(4) was incorporated in the detention decision taken in this case by the Oporto Criminal Court. It was therefore not until those three years had elapsed that the applicant's right to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention be decided by a court at reasonable intervals took effect. The legislation applied to the applicant provided for a periodic and automatic judicial review after two years and made it possible for the person detained to apply to the court at any moment to have the detention measure lifted. After the judgment of 13 July 1990 judicial reviews took place on several occasions. The intervals between the different reviews were not excessive. The applicant was discharged as soon as he had ceased to be regarded as dangerous. Therefore, the applicant had the possibility of having the lawfulness of his detention reviewed at reasonable intervals and that there had therefore been no violation of A 5(4).

Silver and Others v United Kingdom (1983) 5 EHHR 347 83/2

[Applications lodged 20.11.1972, 1.2.1973, 2.6.1975, 20.3.1975, 28.10.1974, 8.7.1975 and 5.4.1975; Commission report 11.10.1980; Court Judgment 25.3.1983 (merits), 24.10.1983 (A 50)]

The principal complaint of all seven applicants, Mr Reuben Silver, Mr Clifford Dixon Noe, Mrs Judith Colne, Mr James Henry Tuttle, Mr Gary Cooper, Mr Michael McMahon, and Mr Desmond Roy Carne, was that the control of their mail by the prison authorities constituted a breach of their right to respect for correspondence and of their freedom of expression, guaranteed by A 8 and 10. They also alleged that, contrary to A 13, no effective domestic remedy existed for the breaches. In addition, Mr Silver claimed that he had been denied access to the courts on account of the refusal of two petitions for permission to seek legal advice. The applicants variously complained of breach of A 6(1), 8, 10 and 13.

Comm found by a series of votes (with one exception unanimous) V 8; not necessary to pursue a further examination under 10; unanimously in the case of Mr Silver's right of access to the civil courts V 6(1), and by a majority (14–1) V 13.

Court held unanimously V 6(1), V 8, V 13, not necessary to examine the case under 10 or the 6(1) and 10 aspects of 13.

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (A 50 declaration), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo.

Mr Silver claimed that the refusal of a petition in 1972 to the Home Secretary for permission to seek legal advice constituted a denial of access to the courts, in violation of A 6(1). The Government conceded such a violation of A 6(1), and the Court so held.

The applicants claimed that the stopping or delaying of 64 letters violated A 8. It was not disputed that there were 'interferences by a public authority' with the exercise of the applicants' right to respect for their correspondence. Such interferences entailed a violation if they did not fall within one of the exceptions provided for in para 2. The law had to be adequately accessible: the citizen had to be able to have an indication that was adequate, in the circumstances, of the legal rules applicable to a given case. The Prison Act and the Rules met this criterion, but the Orders and Instructions were not published. A norm could not be regarded as a 'law' unless it was formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct: he had to be able, with advice if necessary, to foresee, to a degree that was reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail. A law which conferred a discretion had to indicate the scope of that discretion. However, it was impossible to attain absolute certainty in the framing of laws. Those points were of particular weight in the circumstances of the present case involving in the context of imprisonment, the screening of approximately 10 million items of correspondence in a year. It would scarcely be possible to formulate a law to cover every eventuality. The operation of the correspondence control system was not merely a question of practice that varied in each individual instance: the Orders and Instructions established a practice which had to be followed save in exceptional circumstances. In those conditions, although those directives did not themselves have the force of law, they could be taken into account in assessing whether the criterion of foreseeability was satisfied in the application of the Rules. The expression 'in accordance with the law' did not mean that the safeguards which were necessary had to be enshrined in the very text which authorised the imposition of restrictions. The question of safeguards against abuse was closely linked with the question of effective remedies and the Court preferred to take this issue into account in the wider context of A 13. The Court considered the individual circumstances of a lot of letters. It saw no reason to doubt that each interference had an aim that was legitimate under A 8. The Contracting States enjoyed a certain, but not unlimited margin of appreciation, but it was for the Court to give the final ruling on whether they were compatible with the Convention. The phrase 'necessary in a democratic society' meant that the interference must correspond to a 'pressing social need' and be 'proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued'. Those paragraphs of articles of the Convention which provided for an exception to a right guaranteed were to be narrowly interpreted. In assessing whether an interference with the exercise of the right of a convicted prisoner to respect for his correspondence was 'necessary' for one of the aims set out in A 8(2), regard had to be paid to the ordinary and reasonable requirements of imprisonment. Some measure of control over prisoners' correspondence was called for and was not of itself incompatible with the Convention. Examining the facts of the case, the Court held that a number of instances of interference were not necessary. When in any particular instance subordinate prison authorities were in doubt as to how they should exercise their supervisory functions regarding prisoners' correspondence, they had to be able to seek instructions from higher authority. The stopping of some letters by Mr Silver, Mr Noe and Mrs Colne was both in accordance with the law and justifiable as necessary in a democratic society. These interferences therefore did not constitute a violation of A 8. However, the stopping of the 57 remaining letters was not necessary in a democratic society, and there was a violation of A 8 in each case.

The applicants also submitted that the control of their mail by the prison authorities constituted a breach of their right to freedom of expression, guaranteed by A 10. The Court held that since, in the context of correspondence, the right to free expression was guaranteed by A 8, it was not necessary to pursue a further examination of the matter in the light of A 10.

The applicants alleged that there existed no effective remedy in respect of their claims under A 6(1), 8 and 10 and that they were therefore victims of a violation of A 13. Having regard to the decision on A 6(1) there was no need to examine Mr Silver's complaint concerning the refusal of his 1972 petition under A 13, as the requirements of that article were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of the former. The same did not apply to the A 8 aspects of the applicants' complaints, especially as the Court had decided to consider in the context of A 13 the question of safeguards against abuse of the powers to control prisoners' correspondence. Where an individual had an arguable claim to be the victim of a violation of Convention rights, he should have a remedy before a national authority in order both to have his claim decided and to obtain redress. The authority may not necessarily be a judicial authority but, if it was not, its powers and the guarantees which it afforded were relevant in determining whether the remedy before it was effective. Although no single remedy may itself entirely satisfy the requirements of A 13, the aggregate of remedies provided for under domestic law may do so. Neither A 13 nor the Convention in general lay down any given manner for ensuring within their internal law the effective implementation of any of the provisions of the Convention. The application of A 13 in a given case depended upon the manner in which the Contracting State had chosen to discharge its obligation directly to secure to anyone within its jurisdiction the rights and freedoms. In the present case the remedies were an application to the Board of Visitors, an application to the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, a petition to the Home Secretary and the institution of proceedings before the English courts. The first two channels did not constitute an effective remedy for the present purposes: the Board of Visitors could not enforce its conclusions nor could it entertain applications from individuals who were not in prison. The Parliamentary Commissioner had no power to render a binding decision granting redress. The Home Secretary could not be considered to have a sufficiently independent standpoint to satisfy the requirements of A 13: as the author of the directives in question, he would in reality be judge in his own cause. The position, however, would be otherwise if the complainant alleged that a measure of control resulted from a misapplication of one of those directives. In such cases a petition to the Home Secretary would in general be effective to secure compliance with the directive, if the complaint was well-founded. The English courts were endowed with a certain supervisory jurisdiction over the exercise of the powers conferred on the Home Secretary and the prison authorities by the Prison Act and the Rules. However, their jurisdiction was limited to determining whether or not those powers have been exercised arbitrarily, in bad faith, for an improper motive or in an ultra vires manner. The applicants made no allegation that the interferences with their correspondence were contrary to English law. The majority of the measures complained of were incompatible with the Convention. To that extent there could be no effective remedy as required by A 13 and consequently there was a violation of that Article. To the extent, however, that the norms were compatible with A 8, the aggregate of the remedies available satisfied the requirements of A 13, at least in those cases in which it was possible for a petition to be submitted to the Home Secretary.

On 21 January 1984 he took proceedings before the Rome magistrates' court against the Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale in order to establish his entitlement to a disability pension. At a hearing on 26 April 1989 the court dismissed the appeal. The text of the judgment was lodged with the registry on 20 April 1990. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings.

Despite several reminders from the registry, the applicant showed no interest in the proceedings before the Court. The Court considered that there had been in this case an implied withdrawal which constituted a fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter. The Court discerned no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. It recalled its previous case-law in which it had reviewed the reasonableness of the length of civil proceedings in various Contracting States. Accordingly, the case was struck out of the list.

Mr Prem Singh, then aged 15, was convicted on 19 February 1973, at Leeds Crown Court, of the murder of a 72-year-old woman. He received a mandatory sentence of detention 'during Her Majesty's pleasure'. In October 1990, having served the punitive part of his sentence ('tariff'), he was released on licence. On 11 March 1991 he was arrested in connection with offences of deception and of using threatening behaviour. He denied the allegations. On 21 March 1991 his life licence was revoked and he was detained. On 2 March 1992 the criminal charges against him were dismissed. However, the Parole Board declined to recommend his release. In July 1994 the Parole Board recommended his release; however, the Secretary of State was not prepared to accept the recommendation and did not agree to his release. He appealed and his case was reconsidered. His provisional date for release was eventually set for 18 March 1996. He complained that he not had the lawfulness of his continued detention determined by a court and that the Parole Board in its powers and procedures failed to offer the requisite safeguards.

Comm found unanimously V 5(4).

Court unanimously found V 5(4).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr R Macdonald, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr P Jambrek.

As the applicant's complaint of the secretive and unfair manner in which his tariff had been established was not dealt with by the Commission and his punitive period had expired, the Court did not consider it necessary to examine that complaint.

On all the evidence, the applicant's sentence, after the expiration of his tariff, was more comparable to a discretionary life sentence. The decisive ground for the applicant's continued detention was and continued to be his dangerousness to society, a characteristic susceptible to change with the passage of time. Accordingly, new issues of lawfulness may arise in the course of detention and the applicant was entitled under A 5(4) to take proceedings to have those issues decided by a court at reasonable intervals. A 5(4) did not guarantee a right to judicial control of such scope as to empower the court on all aspects of the case, including questions of expediency, to substitute its own discretion for that of the decision-making authority; the review, nevertheless, had to be wide enough to bear on those conditions which, according to the Convention, were essential for the lawful detention of a person subject to the special type of deprivation of liberty ordered against the applicant. The Parole Board did not satisfy the requirements of A 5(4). It could not order the release of a prisoner. In addition, the lack of adversarial proceedings before the Parole Board also prevented it from being regarded as a court or court-like body for the purposes of A 5(4). In matters of such crucial importance as the deprivation of liberty and where questions arose which involved, for example, an assessment of the applicant's character or mental state, it could be essential to the fairness of the proceedings that the applicant be present at an oral hearing. In a situation such as that of the applicant, where a substantial term of imprisonment may be at stake and where characteristics pertaining to his personality and level of maturity were of importance in deciding on his dangerousness, A 5(4) required an oral hearing in the context of an adversarial procedure involving legal representation and the possibility of calling and questioning witnesses. Proceedings for judicial review did not provide a substitute as A 5(4) presupposed the existence of a procedure in conformity with its requirements without the necessity of instituting separate legal proceedings in order to bring it about. In addition, the applicant's possibility of obtaining an oral hearing by way of proceedings for judicial review was not sufficiently certain to be regarded as satisfying the requirements of A 5(4). There had been a violation of A 5(4) in that the applicant, after the expiry of his tariff, was unable to bring the case of his continued detention during Her Majesty's pleasure or of his re-detention following the revocation of his licence, before a court with the powers and procedural guarantees satisfying that provision.

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage sustained. Legal costs and expenses (GBP 13,000 less FF 15,421).

Skärby v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 90 90/15

[Application lodged 26.6.1986; Commission report 16.3.1989; Court Judgment 28.6.1990]

Mrs Ingegärd Skärby, Mrs Rigmor Skärby, Mrs Majken Skärby, Mr Bertil Skärby, Mr Rolf Skärby and Mrs Lena Hedman, were the children and heirs of Christian and Maria Skärby. The dispute concerned the applicants' attempts to build on farm land belonging to them in an area designated as being of national interest from the point of view of natural resources and cultural values. Their application to the Building Committee for a building permit for a house and two garages on the property, in an area designated as a nature park, was rejected on 24 March 1986. In so far as the decision implied a refusal to grant an exemption, it could not be appealed against. The applicants alleged, inter alia, that Swedish law did not provide them with access to a court to challenge the decision prohibiting them from constructing a building at a specific site on their property

Comm found by majority (12–5) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously no jurisdiction to examine 8, 17, P1A1, found by majority (5–2) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (d), President, Mr J Cremona, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (d), Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm.

The applicants complaints concerning A 8, 17 and 18 and P1A1 had been rejected by the Commission as manifestly ill-founded. Accordingly, the Court did not have jurisdiction to examine them.

In order to decide whether there was a dispute over a right, the Court had first to ascertain whether there was a dispute over a right which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. The dispute had to be genuine and serious; it could relate not only to the actual existence of a right but also to its scope and the manner of its exercise; and, finally, the result of the proceedings had to be directly decisive for the right in question. The present dispute concerned the right to choose the site of a new building, a right provided for in Swedish law. A dispute within the meaning of A 6 could therefore in principle arise if the lawfulness of a decision affecting that right were questioned. The fact that an exemption could be refused made no difference in that respect. The Building Committee did not enjoy unfettered discretion; it was bound by generally recognised legal and administrative principles. In so far as the applicants could arguably claim that the Building Committee's refusal conflicted with those principles, a dispute could arise in the present case. That being so, it made no difference that the applicants did not exercise the right, claimed by them, to build a house on the site of their choice. The dispute was a serious one. The applicants claimed to have been discriminated against; in addition, they complained that the authorities had been guided by extraneous considerations and improper motives. They thereby sought in substance to contest the lawfulness of the decision of 24 March 1986. There was therefore a genuine and serious dispute concerning a right. The right in question was a civil right within the meaning of A 6. That finding was not affected by the Government's assertion that the dispute concerned only a minor question, the location of the building to be constructed. In sum, A 6(1) applied to the present case. The Government did not put forward any arguments on the question of the applicants' submission, that it had not been possible for them to challenge the refusal to grant an exemption from the building plan in a court satisfying the requirements of A 6(1). The 1959 Ordinance did not provide for any remedy against the Building Committee's rejection of an application. There had been a violation of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 20.10.1978; Commission report 15.7.1983; Court Judgment 2.10.1984]

Mr Owe Skoogström ran a hotel-restaurant business and was detained in police custody on suspicion of having committed various offences in connection with the management of the business, of which he was later convicted. He claimed under A 5(3) that he had neither been brought before a judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power, nor brought to trial within a reasonable time.

Slimane-Kaïd v France 00/11

[Application lodged 10.11.1994; Court Judgment 25.1.2000]

Mr Mohamed Slimane-Kaïd was the director of two public limited companies which entered into contractual relations with a third enterprise, the IVECO company. The latter made a complaint and the applicant was prosecuted for fraud causing losses to IVECO. He was found guilty and subsequently ordered to make payment to IVECO. His appeal against that decision was rejected. He complained that during the proceedings before the Court of Cassation neither the judge rapporteur's report nor the avocat général's conclusions were communicated to him before the hearing.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

In the Reinhardt and Slimane-Kaïd judgment, the Court found a violation of A 6 on the basis of the same complaints. The Court held that communication of the judge rapporteur's report and draft judgment to the avocat général only, in the light of the influence the latter could have over the former, created an imbalance to the detriment of the applicants which was incompatible with the rule of fair trial. The Court criticised the fact that the avocat général's conclusions were not communicated to the applicants. The Court found that there appeared to be no development in the proceedings in the Criminal Division and therefore found no grounds to depart from the conclusions it had reached in that judgment. In those circumstances there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for alleged non-pecuniary damage suffered. Costs and expenses (FF 20,000).

Smith and Ford v United Kingdom (2000) 29 EHRR 493 99/57

[Applications lodged 18.8.1997, 10.12.1997; Court Judgment 29.9.1999]

Mr David Smith and Mr Darren Ford were serving in the British Army. Mr Smith was tried by a general court-martial and Mr Ford was tried by a district court-martial, both courts-martial having been convened pursuant to the Army Act 1955. Mr Smith was found guilty of, inter alia, four disciplinary offences of conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline contrary to s 69 of the 1955 Act which provided for a maximum sentence of two years' imprisonment. He was sentenced to be dismissed from the army. Mr Ford was found guilty of, inter alia, three counts of common assault contrary to the Criminal Justice Act 1988 and was sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The applicants' subsequent petitions and appeals, as far as the full Courts-Martial Appeal Court, were unsuccessful. They complained that they did not have a fair or public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

Noting the potential penalty and the sentence imposed, together with the nature of the charges, the Court considered that the applicants' court-martial proceedings involved the determination of charges of a criminal nature within the meaning of A 6(1). The Court recalled its previous judgments in which it had found that general courts-martial convened pursuant to the Army Act 1955 and district courts-martial convened pursuant to the Air Force Act 1955 did not meet the requirements of independence and impartiality set down by A 6(1) in view, in particular, of the central part played in its organisation by the convening officer. The Court could find no reason to distinguish the present cases from the earlier cases as regards the part played by the convening officer in the organisation of their courts-martial. Accordingly, the applicants' courts-martial did not meet the independence and impartiality requirements of A 6(1) of the Convention. The applicants were faced with, inter alia, charges of a serious and criminal nature and were therefore entitled to a first instance tribunal complying with the requirements of A 6(1), such organisational defects in their courts-martial could not be corrected by any subsequent review procedure. Accordingly, and for the reasons expressed in detail in its previous case-law, the courts-martial which dealt with the applicants' case were not independent and impartial within the meaning of A 6(1) and could not therefore guarantee either of the applicants a fair trial.

In view of that conclusion, it was not necessary also to examine the complaints of the applicants that the courts-martial were not public or established by law.

No claim for compensation, costs or expenses submitted.

Smith and Grady v United Kingdom (2000) 29 EHRR 493 99/52

[Applications lodged 9.9.1996, 6.9.1996; Court Judgment 27.9.1999]

Ms Jeanette Smith joined the Royal Air Force as an enrolled nurse. She subsequently obtained the rank of senior aircraft woman and was recommended for promotion. Following an allegation by an unidentified female caller the applicant admitted that she was homosexual. An investigation commenced and the applicant was questioned. The investigation report was sent to the applicant's commanding officer who, on 10 August 1994, recommended the applicant's administrative discharge. On 16 November 1994 the applicant received a certificate of discharge from the armed forces. Mr Graeme Grady joined the Royal Air Force at the rank of aircraftman serving as a trainee administrative clerk. He achieved the rank of sergeant and worked as a personnel administrator, he was posted to Washington at the British Defence Intelligence Liaison Service (North America). In May 1993 the applicant, who was married with two children, told his wife that he was homosexual. His security clearance was suspended, an investigation was opened, and he was questioned. He initially denied he was homosexual but after detailed questioning and search of his accommodation he admitted his homosexuality. Following the investigators' report, the applicant was administratively discharged with effect from 12 December 1994. The applicants' application to the High Court for judicial review of the decisions to discharge them from the armed forces was dismissed. Their appeals to the Court of Appeal were dismissed on 3 November 1995. Their appeals to the Industrial Tribunal claiming unfair dismissal and sexual discrimination were dismissed. They complained that the investigations into their homosexuality and their subsequent discharge from the Royal Air Force on the sole ground that they were homosexual, in pursuance of the Ministry of Defence's absolute policy against homosexuals in the British armed forces, constituted a violation of their right to respect for their private lives protected by A 8.

Court found unanimously V 8, no separate issue under 14+8, NV 3 or 14+3, not necessary to examine 10 or 14+10, V 13.

Judges (merits and A 41): Mr J-P Costa, President, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mr L Loucaides (pc/pd), Mr P Kûris, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

The investigations by the military police into the applicants' homosexuality, which included detailed interviews with each of them and with third parties on matters relating to their sexual orientation and practices, together with the preparation of a final report for the armed forces' authorities on the investigations, constituted a direct interference with the applicants' right to respect for their private lives. Their consequent administrative discharge on the sole ground of their sexual orientation also constituted an interference with that right. The Ministry of Defence policy excluding homosexuals from the armed forces was in accordance with the law. The interferences could be said to pursue the legitimate aims of the interests of national security and the prevention of disorder. An interference would be considered necessary in a democratic society for a legitimate aim if it answered a pressing social need and, in particular, was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. When the relevant restrictions concerned a most intimate part of an individual's private life, there had to exist particularly serious reasons before such interferences could satisfy the requirements of A 8(2). When the core of the national security aim pursued was the operational effectiveness of the armed forces, it was accepted that each State was competent to organise its own system of military discipline and enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in that respect. However, the national authorities could not rely on such rules to frustrate the exercise by individual members of the armed forces of their right to respect for their private lives, which right applied to service personnel as it did to others within the jurisdiction of the State. Moreover, assertions as to a risk to operational effectiveness had to be substantiated by specific examples. The sole reason for the investigations conducted and for the applicants' discharge was their sexual orientation. As it concerned a most intimate aspect of an individual's private life, particularly serious reasons by way of justification were required. The interferences were especially grave in this case. The investigation process was of an exceptionally intrusive character. The administrative discharge of the applicants had a profound effect on their careers and prospects. The absolute and general character of the policy which led to the interferences in question was striking. The policy resulted in an immediate discharge from the armed forces once an individual's homosexuality was established and irrespective of the individual's conduct or service record. The core argument of the Government in support of the policy was that the presence of open or suspected homosexuals in the armed forces would have a substantial and negative effect on morale and, consequently, on the fighting power and operational effectiveness of the armed forces. However, there was a lack of concrete evidence to substantiate the alleged damage to morale and fighting power that any change in the policy would entail. No convincing or weighty reasons had been offered by the Government to justify the policy against homosexuals in the armed forces or, therefore, the consequent discharge of the applicants from those forces. Neither the investigations conducted into the applicants' sexual orientation, nor their discharge on the grounds of their homosexuality in pursuance of the Ministry of Defence policy, were justified under A 8(2). Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 8.

The applicants' complaints that they were discriminated against on grounds of their sexual orientation by reason of the existence and application of the policy of the Ministry of Defence, amounted in effect to the same complaint, albeit seen from a different angle, that had already been considered in relation to A 8 and accordingly, the complaints under A 14+8 did not give rise to any separate issue.

Ill-treatment had to attain a minimum level of severity to fall within the scope of A 3 of the Convention. The assessment of that minimum was relative and depended on all of the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment and its physical or mental effects. Treatment could be considered degrading if it was such as to arouse in its victims feelings of fear, anguish and inferiority capable of humiliating and debasing them and possibly breaking their physical or moral resistance. Moreover, it was sufficient if the victim was humiliated in his or her own eyes. The investigation and discharge together with the blanket nature of the policy of the Ministry of Defence were of a particularly grave nature. The Court would not exclude that treatment which was grounded upon a predisposed bias on the part of a heterosexual majority against a homosexual minority of the nature described above could, in principle, fall within the scope of A 3. Although the policy, together with the investigation and discharge which ensued, were undoubtedly distressing and humiliating for each of the applicants, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the treatment did not reach the minimum level of severity which would bring it within the scope of A 3. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 3 taken alone or in conjunction with A 14.

The silence imposed on the applicants as regards their sexual orientation, together with the consequent and constant need for vigilance, discretion and secrecy in that respect with colleagues, friends and acquaintances as a result of the chilling effect of the Ministry of Defence policy, could constitute an interference with their freedom of expression. However, the subject matter of the policy and, consequently, the sole ground for the investigation and discharge of the applicants, was their sexual orientation, which was an essentially private manifestation of human personality. The freedom of expression element of the present case was subsidiary to the applicants' right to respect for their private lives which was principally at issue. Consequently, it was not necessary to examine the applicants' complaints under A 10 either taken alone or in conjunction with A 14.

Although the applicants invoked A 13 in relation to all of their complaints, it was the applicants' right to respect for their private lives which was principally at issue in the present case. In such circumstances, the applicants' complaints under A 13 of the Convention were more appropriately considered in conjunction with A 8. Even if the complaints of the applicants were before and considered by the domestic courts, the threshold at which the High Court and the Court of Appeal could find the Ministry of Defence policy irrational was placed so high that it effectively excluded any consideration by the domestic courts of the question of whether the interference with the applicants' rights answered a pressing social need or was proportionate to the national security and public order aims pursued, principles which lay at the heart of the Court's analysis of complaints under A 8. In such circumstances, the applicants had no effective remedy in relation to the violation of their right to respect for their private lives guaranteed by A 8 of the Convention. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 13.

Socialist Party and Others v Turkey (1999) 27 EHRR 51 98/40

The Socialist Party, the first applicant, was a political party formed on 1 February 1988. Mr Ilhan Kirit and Mr Dogu Perinçek, the second and third applicants, were respectively Chairman and former Chairman of the Party. On the day of its formation, its constitution and programme were submitted to the office of Principal State Counsel at the Court of Cassation for assessment of their compatibility with the Constitution and Law No 2820 on the regulation of political parties. The Principal State Counsel at the Court of Cassation obtained an order from the Constitutional Court dissolving the Party on the ground that its activities encouraged separatism. The order entailed ipso jure the liquidation of the party and the transfer of its assets to the Treasury. As a consequence of the order the founders and managers of the party were banned from holding similar office in any other political body. The applicants complained that the measures had infringed their right to freedom of association.

Comm found unanimously V 11, NV 6(1) no separate issue under 9 and 10, not necessary to consider separately the complaints under 14 and 18, P1A1 and P1A3.

Court found unanimously V 11, not necessary to determine 6(1), 9, 10, 14, 18, P1A1, P1A3.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr P Van Dijk.

Political parties were a form of association essential to the proper functioning of democracy and in view of the importance of democracy in the Convention system, there could be no doubt that political parties came within the scope of A 11. An association, including a political party, was not excluded from the protection afforded by the Convention simply because its activities were regarded by the national authorities as undermining the constitutional structures of the State and calling for the imposition of restrictions. The Party's dissolution amounted to an interference in the applicants' right to freedom of association. The interference was prescribed by law as the measures ordered by the Constitutional Court were based on the Constitution and the Law on the regulation of political parties. The dissolution pursued the aim of national security. A 11 had to be considered in the light of A 10. Political parties had an essential role in ensuring pluralism and the proper functioning of democracy. Having analysed Mr Perinçek's statements, the Court found nothing in them that could be considered a call for the use of violence, an uprising or any other form of rejection of democratic principles. Although the phrases were directed at citizens of Kurdish origin and constituted an invitation to them to rally together and assert certain political claims, there was no trace of any incitement to use violence or infringe the rules of democracy. In that regard, the relevant statements were scarcely any different from those made by other political groups that were active in other countries of the Council of Europe. The statements put forward a political programme with the essential aim being the establishment, in accordance with democratic rules, of a federal system in which Turks and Kurds would be represented on an equal footing and on a voluntary basis. Admittedly, reference was made to the right to self-determination of the 'Kurdish nation' and its right to 'secede'; however, read in their context, the statements using these words did not encourage secession from Turkey but sought rather to stress that the proposed federal system could not come about without the Kurds' freely given consent, which should be expressed through a referendum. The fact that such a political programme was considered incompatible with the current principles and structures of the Turkish State did not make it incompatible with the rules of democracy. It was of the essence of democracy to allow diverse political programmes to be proposed and debated, even those that called into question the way a State was currently organised, provided that they did not harm democracy itself. Mr Perinçek was acquitted in the National Security Courts where he had been prosecuted in respect of the same statements. In determining whether a necessity within the meaning of A 11(2) existed, the Contracting States had only a limited margin of appreciation. The interference in question was radical: the Socialist Party was dissolved with immediate and permanent effect, its assets were liquidated and transferred ipso jure to the Treasury and its leaders banned from carrying on certain similar political activities. Measures as severe as those could only be applied in the most serious cases. It had not been established how, in spite of the fact that in making them their author declared attachment to democracy and expressed rejection of violence, the statements in issue could be considered to have been in any way responsible for the problems which terrorism posed in Turkey. In view of the findings, there was no need to bring A 17 into play, as nothing in the statements warranted the conclusion that their author relied on the Convention to engage in activity or perform acts aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth in it. Therefore, the dissolution of the Socialist Party was disproportionate to the aim pursued and consequently unnecessary in a democratic society and there had been a violation of A 11.

As the applicants' complaints under A 9, 10, 14 and 18 related to the same facts, the Court considered it unnecessary to examine them separately.

The measures complained of under P1 were incidental effects of the Socialist Party's dissolution, which the Court had held to amount to a breach of A 11. Consequently it was unnecessary to consider those complaints separately.

In view of the conclusion concerning compliance with A 11 it was not necessary to examine the complaint under A 6(1).

The applicant company informed the Court of its wish to 'withdraw'. French regulations had evolved since the application had been made in 1984 in respect of facts which themselves dated back to 1981. Although the applicant's decision did not strictly speaking constitute a withdrawal, since it was not taken by a party to the case in view of the fact that Protocol 9 had not yet come into force, it was in any event a 'fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter' and the Court discerned no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings.

Söderbäck v Sweden (2000) 29 EHRR 95 98/93

[Application lodged 17.12.1991; Commission report 22.10.1997; Court Judgment 28.10.1998]

Mr Per Söderbäck worked as a bus driver. He met KW in 1980. On 19 September 1982 KW gave birth to a daughter, M, of whom the applicant was the father. The applicant visited KW and the child at the maternity ward on one occasion. In the following months he met M twice at KW's home. He also attended M's christening. During the spring of 1983, he once looked after M for about an hour. No further contacts took place between the applicant and his daughter that year. The applicant maintained that he gave up his attempts to see M, in part because he felt obstructed by KW, in part because his continued commitment to the daughter had been undermined by difficulties in his job. He had also had problems with alcohol. In 1983 KW met MW, they began to live together in May 1983 and married in January 1989. The applicant met his daughter once in 1984. He wished to see her more often but KW allegedly opposed further contact. There was further limited contact. In November 1988, MW applied to the District Court for permission to adopt M. The applicant objected. The District Court held a hearing on 12 December 1989 during which it heard the applicant and MW. By decision of 22 December 1989, the court granted MW permission to adopt M. On 5 February 1991 the Svea Court of Appeal upheld the District Court's decision. On 19 June 1991 the Supreme Court refused leave to appeal. He complained that the decision to grant, without his consent, permission to adopt his daughter had constituted a violation of his right to respect for family life.

Comm found by majority (10–5) V 8.

Court found unanimously NV 8.

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr Jm Morenilla, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev, Mr M Voicu, Mr V Butkevych.

When the adoption was granted, there existed certain ties between the applicant and M. A 8 was applicable. The adoption order amounted to an interference with the applicant's right to respect for family life. The adoption was in accordance with the law and pursued the legitimate aim of protecting the rights and freedoms of the child. The Court distinguished the approach employed in the Johansen v Norway judgment. Although the adoption in the present case had the legal effect of totally depriving the applicant of family life with his daughter, it concerned the links between a natural father and a child who had been in the care of her mother since she was born. During the period under consideration, the contacts between the applicant and the child were infrequent and limited in character and when the adoption was granted he had not seen her for quite some time. When the adoption was granted by the District Court in December 1989, de facto family ties had existed between the mother and the adoptive father for five and a half years, until they married in January 1989, and between him and M for six and a half years. The adoption consolidated and formalised those ties. Against that background, and having regard to the assessment of the child's best interests made by the domestic courts, as well as to the limited relations that the applicant had with M during the relevant period, the Court was satisfied that the decision fell within the margin of appreciation. Given the aims sought to be achieved by allowing the adoption to go ahead, it could not be said that the adverse effects it had on the applicant's relations with the child were disproportionate. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 8.

Soering v United Kingdom (1989) 11 EHHR 439 89/15

[Application lodged 8.7.88; Commission report 19.1.89; Court Judgment 7.7.89]

Mr Jens Soering was a German national detained in prison in England pending extradition to the United States of America to face charges of capital murder in the State of Virginia. The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany also sought the applicant's extradition in respect of the same murders. The US Government requested that its application take preference to that of the FRG, and the UK Government proceeded with the US extradition request. The UK Government requested an assurance from the US Government that the death penalty, if imposed, would not be carried out. An assurance was made that representations would be made to the sentencing judge that it was the UK Government's wish that the death penalty should not be imposed or carried out, although it was indicated that no further assurances would be made, and that the death penalty would be sought by the Virginian authorities. Following extradition proceedings, the Secretary of State ordered the applicant's surrender to the US, although that transfer was delayed pending proceedings before the Commission and the Court. The applicant stated that should the UK Government require that he be deported to the FRG (where there was no death penalty) he would not oppose such an order. The applicant claimed that there was a serious likelihood that he would be sentenced to death if extradited to the US. He maintained that in the circumstances and having regard to the 'death row phenomenon' (including a wait of six to eight years before execution) he would thereby be subjected to inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment contrary to A 3. He also claimed that his extradition would violate A 6(3)(c) because of the absence of legal aid in the State of Virginia to pursue various appeals, and that he had no effective remedy under UK law in respect of his complaint under A 3, such that this was a breach of A 13.

Comm found by a majority (7–4) V 13, (6–5) NV 3, unanimously NV 6(3)(c).

Court held unanimously V 3 if extradited, NV 6(3)(c), no jurisdiction 6(1) and (3)(d), and NV 13.

Whilst it was not normally for the Convention institutions to pronounce on the existence or otherwise of potential violations of the Convention, where an applicant claimed that a decision to extradite him would, if implemented, be contrary to A 3 by reason of its foreseeable consequences in the requesting country, a departure from this principle was necessary, in view of the serious and irreparable nature of the alleged suffering risked, in order to ensure the effectiveness of the safeguard provided by that article. The decision by a Contracting State to extradite a fugitive may give rise to an issue under A 3 where substantial grounds had been shown for believing that the person concerned, if extradited, faced a real risk of being subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the requesting country. This inevitably involved an assessment of conditions in the requesting country against the standards of A 3, although there was no question of adjudicating on or establishing the responsibility of the receiving country. Whilst capital punishment was permitted under certain conditions by A 2, the circumstances relating to a death sentence could give rise to an issue under A 3. The manner in which it was imposed or executed, the personal circumstances of the condemned person and a disproportionality to the gravity of the crime committed, as well as the conditions of detention awaiting execution, were examples of factors capable of bringing the treatment or punishment within the proscription under A 3. For any prisoner condemned to death, some element of delay between imposition and execution of the sentence and the experience of severe stress in conditions necessary for strict incarceration were inevitable. Although the machinery of justice to which the applicant would be subject in the US was in itself neither arbitrary nor unreasonable and had a number of procedural safeguards, having regard to the very long period of time the condemned spent on death row in such extreme conditions, with the ever present and mounting anguish of awaiting execution of the death penalty, and to the personal circumstances of the applicant, especially his age and mental state at the time of the offence, the applicant's extradition to the US would expose him to a real risk of treatment going beyond the A 3 threshold. It was a relevant consideration that in this case the legitimate purpose of extradition could be achieved by another means which would not involve suffering of such exceptional intensity or duration, namely extradition to the FRG.

The A 6 claim in respect of lack of legal aid to mount collateral challenges on the conviction, whilst it might exceptionally arise in an extradition case, failed on the facts. There was no jurisdiction to determine new complaints based on A 6(1) and (3)(d) raised about the extradition proceedings before the magistrate which had not been raised before the Commission.

There were sufficient remedies available to the applicant through judicial review to mean that there was no violation of A 13.

Soldani v Italy 97/60

[Application lodged 6.5.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mrs Maria Teresa Soldani was an assistant psychologist at the co-ordination bureau of the National Centre for the Prevention of Accidents. On 11 February 1983 she applied to the Lazio Regional Administrative Court for judicial review of five decisions in which the Treasury had refused to appoint her to a post in a higher category than the one she held, although she had been in second or third place on the reserve lists published each time such posts had fallen vacant. In a judgment of 17 June 1987 the Administrative Court allowed her application. The Treasury appealed to the Consiglio di Stato. In a judgment of 30 March 1993, the text of which was deposited with the registry on 12 May 1993, the Consiglio di Stato dismissed the appeal as being ill-founded. She complained of the length of proceedings.

In the law of many Member States of the Council of Europe there was a basic distinction between civil servants and employees governed by private law. That had led the Court to hold that disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants are as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the present case the applicant sought only judicial review of a series of decisions in which the Treasury had refused to appoint her to a post in a higher category than the one she held. The dispute raised by her thus clearly related to her career and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

Soumare v France 98/65

[Application lodged 2.3.1993; Commission report 14.1.1997; Court Judgment 24.8.1998]

Mr Abdourahim Soumare, a Malian national, was arrested in Paris and remanded in custody on 22 January 1988 in connection with a heroin-trafficking operation involving five other people. On 10 November 1989 Bobigny Criminal Court sentenced him to 10 years' imprisonment and made an order permanently excluding him from French territory. It also ordered confiscation of the drugs that had been seized and imposed a fine jointly on the applicant and the other convicted defendants in lieu of confiscation and ordered them to pay a like amount, equal to the value of the unlawfully imported substances, to the customs authorities. The court ordered the applicant's continued detention for a period not exceeding the maximum period for imprisonment in default, which was two years, until the customs' penalties had been paid. The applicant's appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed on 10 June 1991. His application to the Ministry of Justice to be transferred to Mali to complete his sentence was rejected on the ground that the customs fine had not been paid. On several occasions he sought a settlement with the customs authorities but was unsuccessful. His applications with the tribunal de grande instance to have the order for his imprisonment in default discharged, as he was insolvent, were rejected. The case was referred to the Paris Court of Appeal which dismissed the application for discharge. He complained that he had not been able to have a court rule on the lawfulness of his detention under the order for his imprisonment in default.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (8–1) V 5(4).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr E Levits, Mr T Pantiru, Mr M Voicu, Mr V Butkevych.

The Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was closely linked to the question of whether an appeal to the Court of Cassation would have been effective and, therefore, to the merits of the complaint that there has been a breach of A 5(4). Consequently, the preliminary objection was considered with the merits.

On 10 June 1991 the Paris Court of Appeal sentenced the applicant to 10 years' imprisonment and imposed a customs fine coupled with an order for his imprisonment in default, intended to secure payment. After he had served his prison sentence, the applicant was held in detention for approximately six months, from 22 June 1994 to 16 January 1995, under the order for imprisonment in default, because he had not paid the customs fine. As regards the first period of detention, which began on 22 January 1988 and ended on 21 June 1994, the supervision required by A 5(4) of the Convention was incorporated in the Paris Court of Appeal's decision passing sentence. It was therefore only subsequently that the applicant's right to 'take proceedings before a court' to obtain a ruling on the lawfulness of his imprisonment in default arose. The lawfulness of the deprivation of liberty depended on the applicant's solvency, a factor which could evolve with time. The need for supervision was made even greater by the fact that the applicant's release was largely dependent upon financial agreements or arrangements with the customs authorities. The customs authorities had wide powers to settle. It was accordingly essential that when an issue of freedom of the individual was referred to them, the judges of the judicial order should have the widest possible powers to consider it. For the purposes of A 7, imprisonment in default constituted a penalty and such imprisonment subsequent to the serving of the main sentence may consequently be considered to be separate detention for the purposes of A 5(4). The tribunal de grande instance referred the applicant's application to have the order for his imprisonment in default discharged on the basis that he was insolvent, to the Paris Court of Appeal, which had sentenced him. That court dismissed the application on the ground that it had no jurisdiction. The Court did not consider that it had to determine questions of French law, or express a view on the appropriateness of the domestic courts' choice of policy as regards case-law. The domestic law may be considered to have been uncertain at the material time and the case-law on the subject recent and in the formative stage. The fact that the Paris Court of Appeal expressly relied on a decision of the Court of Cassation in dismissing as unfounded in law the application to have the order discharged was a decisive factor in instilling in the applicant the belief that it would be pointless to seek satisfaction through an appeal to the Court of Cassation. The existence of a remedy had to be sufficiently certain, failing which it would lack the accessibility and effectiveness required for the purposes of A 5(4). Further, if the applicant had appealed to the Court of Cassation, his appeal, being a criminal appeal, would have been considered by the Criminal Division, which, at the material time, had not yet aligned its case-law with that of the Commercial Division. The application to the urgent applications judge to determine whether the applicant was solvent could have been effective for the purposes of A 5(4) only if the Paris Court of Appeal had accepted that it had jurisdiction. The effective enjoyment of the right guaranteed by A 5(4) was not secured with a sufficient degree of certainty at the material time. Consequently, the Government's preliminary objection was dismissed; in addition, there had been a violation of A 5(4).

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the alleged damage, costs and expenses claim dismissed.

Spacek sro v Czech Republic 99/79

[Application lodged 22.11.1994; Commission report 15.4.1998; Court Judgment 9.11.1999]

Spacek sro was a limited liability company. On 22 April 1993 the Prague 5 Finance Office notified the applicant company that it was required to pay additional income tax, including a penalty, for the 1991 tax year because its predecessor company had not increased the income tax base for the 1991 tax year by including certain assets as required by the Regulations on the procedure for passing from single to double-entry book-keeping. Those Regulations had been published by the Ministry of Finance in a Financial Bulletin on 30 May 1991. The applicant company's appeals to the Finance Ministry and the Prague Municipal Court were rejected and a constitutional appeal was dismissed on 2 June 1994 by the Constitutional Court as being ill-founded. The applicant complained that the imposition of additional tax on it based on administrative provisions which had never been published or announced in the Official Gazette violated P1A1.

Comm found by majority (27–2) NV P1A1.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found NV P1A1.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

The Government's objection that the applicant company could not claim to be a 'victim' within the meaning of A 34 was not raised, as it could have been, when the admissibility of the application was being considered by the Commission. There was therefore an estoppel. Neither could the fact that the applicant company was the subject of bankruptcy proceedings, instituted against it by the Czech judicial authorities on 16 March 1998, affect its status as a 'victim' in respect of the complaints it submitted to the Commission on 22 November 1994.

The assessment of additional income tax and the penalty imposed on the applicant company by the Czech tax authorities constituted an interference by a public authority with the applicant company's enjoyment of its possessions. In the present case, only the question of the lawfulness of the interference with the applicant company's rights, within the meaning of the second paragraph of P1A1, was at issue. Taxation, as an interference with the rights guaranteed in P1A1, was justified under the second paragraph of P1A1. The main question in the present case was the publicity afforded to the principles governing the calculation of the income tax base upon which the amount of income tax payable was to be determined. When speaking of 'law', P1A1 alluded to the same concept to be found elsewhere in the Convention, a concept which comprised statutory law as well as case-law. It implied qualitative requirements, notably those of accessibility and foreseeability. At the relevant time the taxation of private companies was governed by the Income Tax Act, as amended. That Act and the subsequent amending legislation were published in the Official Gazette. The obligation for businesses to keep accounts in compliance with prescribed accounting principles was laid down by s 25 of the Private Business Activities Act. In addition, the Ministry of Finance issued the Rules, which defined two possible forms of book-keeping, and the Regulations, which established, inter alia, the obligation for businesses to increase their income tax base when they passed from single to double-entry book-keeping. Although intended for the public, neither the Rules nor the Regulations were published in full or announced in the Official Gazette in the form of a 'decree' or 'ruling'. They could not, therefore, constitute legislative or regulatory instruments binding on citizens and legal entities in general under the Official Gazette Act. The term 'law' was to be understood in its substantive sense and not in its formal one. The Convention did not contain any specific requirements as to the degree of publicity to be given to a particular legal provision. The Financial Bulletin was created for the purpose of informing the public about measures adopted by the Ministry of Finance and was given the same publicity as the Official Gazette and there was no requirement that such measures be published in the Official Gazette itself. The predecessor of the applicant company had applied the accounting principles included in the Rules which were published in the previous Financial Bulletin and had thus accepted the Financial Bulletin as an official public source of binding regulations, which it had followed for the purposes of keeping its accounts in compliance with accounting principles. It had been aware of the way in which the Ministry of Finance published its accounting principles and could easily have sought information about any possible transitional provisions, if necessary with the advice of specialists. Taking into consideration that the applicant company as a legal entity, contrary to an individual taxpayer, could and should have consulted the competent specialists, the publication of the Regulations in the Financial Bulletin was sufficient. The Regulations were adequately accessible and foreseeable, and the interference complained of had a sufficient legal basis in Czech law to comply with the requirements of the second paragraph of P1A1. Accordingly, there was no violation of P1A1.

Spadea and Scalabrino v Italy (1996) 21 EHRR 482 95/30

[Application lodged 15.4.1987; Commission report 9.5.1994; Court Judgment 28.9.1995]

Mr Giovanni Spadea was a lawyer and Mrs Michelangela Scalabrino was a university teacher. In April 1982 they bought two adjacent flats with the aim of making their home there. The former owner of the flats had let them to a Mrs B and a Mrs Z, who paid a rent subject to public-authority control. In a writ served on 13 October 1982, the applicants gave the tenants of the flats notice to quit when the leases expired, on 31 December 1983, and summoned them to appear before the Milan magistrate. The magistrate formally confirmed the notices to quit, and fixed the date of eviction. Pursuant to a Law of 5 April 1985, the magistrate suspended enforcement of the evictions until 30 January 1986. On 14 March 1986, the applicants began proceedings to enforce the orders for possession, as the tenants had still not complied with them. The tenants refused to leave, they were elderly ladies of modest means who had asked Milan City Council to allocate them low-rent flats. The relevant Law suspended the enforcement of evictions. Attempts by the bailiff to enforce the orders for possession were unsuccessful. In August 1988, Mrs Z died and the applicants regained possession of one of the flats. Mrs B left the other in February 1989. In the meantime, the applicants had been obliged to buy another flat. They complained of interference with their property and discrimination between owners of residential property and tenants, and between owners of residential property and owners of non-residential property.

Comm found by majority (21–2) NV P1A1, NV 14+P1A1.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found NV P1A1, NV 14+P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr SK Martens, Mr AN Loizou, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici.

The applicants' complaint under A 6 was outside the scope of the case as defined by the Commission's decision on admissibility.

Under the Italian legal system, an individual was not entitled to apply directly to the Constitutional Court for review of the constitutionality of a law. Accordingly, such an application could not be a remedy whose exhaustion was required under A 26. As the applicants did not satisfy the conditions laid down in the relevant law to apply to the Prefect for police assistance or, in the event of his refusing it, to the administrative courts in order to challenge his decision, it followed that such a remedy would have had no prospects of success. The objection of non-exhaustion was therefore dismissed.

In the present case there was neither a de facto expropriation nor a transfer of property. At all times the applicants retained the possibility of alienating their property and were paid the rents regularly. As the implementation of the measures in question meant that the tenants continued to occupy the flats, it undoubtedly amounted to control of the use of property. Accordingly, the second paragraph of P1A1 was applicable. The legislative provisions suspending evictions during the period from 1984 to 1988 were prompted by the need to deal with the large number of leases which expired in 1982 and 1983 and by the concern to enable the tenants affected to find acceptable new homes or obtain subsidised housing. To have enforced all evictions simultaneously would undoubtedly have led to considerable social tension and jeopardised public order. Therefore the impugned legislation had a legitimate aim in the general interest, as required by the second paragraph of P1A1. An interference had to strike a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. There had to be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim pursued. The only reason for the evictions was that the leases on the flats had expired; none of the exceptions to the suspension of enforcement applied to the applicants. In addition, Mrs B and Mrs Z, who were elderly ladies of modest means, had asked Milan City Council to allocate them low-rent flats. Admittedly, the applicants had to buy another flat and did not recover their property until one of the tenants died and the other left of her own accord. However, regard being had to the legitimate aim pursued, the legislative measures adopted by the Italian State and criticised by the applicants could not be considered disproportionate in view of the margin of appreciation permitted under the second paragraph of P1A1. By adopting emergency measures, the Italian legislature was reasonably entitled to consider, having regard to the need to strike a fair balance between the interests of the community and the right of landlords, and of the applicants in particular, that the means chosen were appropriate to achieve the legitimate aim pursued. The restriction on the applicants' use of their flats resulting from the provisions in question was not contrary to the requirements of the second paragraph of P1A1. There had therefore been no breach of that article.

A 14 would be breached where, without objective and reasonable justification, persons in relevantly similar situations were treated differently. With regard to the first part of the complaint, the Court noted that it raised the question whether the emergency measures complained of were proportionate to their aim, a point already considered in connection with P1A1. As for the difference in treatment vis-à-vis the owners of non-residential property, the distinction drawn between those two classes of person for the purpose of enforcing evictions was objective and reasonable given the aim of the legislation – to protect tenants during a serious housing shortage – and the use made of the properties, one category being let as housing and the other used mainly as commercial premises. Therefore, there had been no breach, in the instant case, of A 14 read in conjunction with P1A1.

[Application lodged 15.8.1975; Commission report 8.10.1980; Court Judgment 23.9.1982 (merits), 18.12.1984 (A 50)]

The applications related to the effects of long-term expropriation permits and prohibitions on construction on the estate of the late Mr Sporrong and on Mrs Lönnroth, in their capacity as property owners. The applicants complained, inter alia, of interference with their right to peaceful enjoyment of their possessions.

The expropriation permits and prohibitions on construction in question were lawful in themselves. Although the expropriation permits left intact in law the owners' right to use and dispose of their possessions, they nevertheless in practice significantly reduced the possibility of its exercise. The prohibitions on construction undoubtedly restricted the applicants' right to use their possessions. P1A1 comprised three distinct rules. The first rule, which was of a general nature, enounced the principle of peaceful enjoyment of property; it was set out in the first sentence of the first paragraph. The second rule covered deprivation of possessions and subjected it to certain conditions; it appeared in the second sentence of the same paragraph. The third rule recognised that the States were entitled, amongst other things, to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest, by enforcing such laws as they deemed necessary for the purpose; it was contained in the second paragraph. There was an interference with the applicants' right of property and the consequences of that interference were undoubtedly rendered more serious by the combined use, over a long period of time, of expropriation permits and prohibitions on construction. The Swedish authorities did not proceed to an expropriation of the applicants' properties. However, full enjoyment of the applicants' right of property was impeded for a total period of 25 years in the case of the Sporrong Estate and of 12 years in the case of Mrs Lönnroth. The two series of measures created a situation which upset the fair balance which should be struck between the protection of the right of property and the requirements of the general interest: the Sporrong Estate and Mrs Lönnroth bore an individual and excessive burden which could have been rendered legitimate only if they had had the possibility of seeking a reduction of the time-limits or of claiming compensation. Yet at the relevant time Swedish law excluded those possibilities. The permits in question, whose consequences were aggravated by the prohibitions on construction, therefore violated P1A1 as regards both applicants. In view of the foregoing, it was not necessary to determine whether the prohibitions on construction, taken alone, also infringed P1A1.

Having found that there was a breach of P1A1, it was not necessary also to examine the case under A 17 and 18.

The applicants' argument under 14+P1A1 that they had been victims of discrimination as compared with two categories of owners, namely those whose properties were not expropriated and those whose properties were expropriated in an manner consistent with Swedish law and the Convention, was not supported by any evidence in the material before the Court.

The expropriation permits affecting the applicants' properties related to a civil right and, as regards their period of validity, gave rise to a dispute, within the meaning of A 6(1). It had to be ascertained whether the applicants could have instituted legal proceedings to challenge the lawfulness of the decisions of the City Council and of the Government concerning the issue or extension of the long-term expropriation permits. In so far as the decisions of the City of Stockholm had come to the applicants' knowledge, they could have referred the matter to the County Administrative Board and then, if necessary, to the Supreme Administrative Court. However, the requests were only preparatory steps which, in themselves, did not at that stage interfere with a civil right nor did their lawfulness necessarily depend on the same criteria as the lawfulness of the final decisions taken by the Government in that respect. Admittedly, owners could challenge the lawfulness of the Government's decisions by requesting the Supreme Administrative Court to re-open the proceedings. However, they had in practice to rely on grounds identical or similar to those set out in the Code of Judicial Procedure. Furthermore, that was an extraordinary remedy and was exercised but rarely. When considering the admissibility of such an application, the Supreme Administrative Court did not examine the merits of the case; at that stage, it therefore did not undertake a full review of measures affecting a civil right. It was only where the Supreme Administrative Court had declared the application admissible that such a review could be effected, either by that court itself or, if it had referred the case back to a court or authority previously dealing with the matter, by the latter court or authority. In short, the said remedy did not meet the requirements of A 6(1). Thus the applicants could not be heard by a tribunal competent to determine all the aspects of the matter.

Having regard to its decision on A 6(1) it was not necessary to examine the case under A 13 as its requirements were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6(1).

Spurio v Italy 97/50

[Application lodged 31.8.1992; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Carlo Spurio was a nurse in a public hospital. On 19 September 1980 the applicant, who asserted that from 1973 to 1976 he had worked as a specialist nurse although he had been recruited on the basic grade, asked the hospital administration, which had previously refused, to promote him to specialist nurse, to pay him the difference between the salary he had received and the salary to which in his view he was entitled. In a memorandum of 10 December 1980 the administration refused his request. On 23 June 1981 he applied to the Marches Regional Administrative Court for a declaration that the hospital administration's conduct had been unlawful and that he was entitled to be paid the difference in salary. On 24 June 1992 the Administrative Court dismissed the applicant's claim on the grounds that it was unsubstantiated and ill-founded, the text of the judgment was deposited with the registry on 9 October 1992. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (28–1) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (8–1) A 6(1) not applicable.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (d), Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

Disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the instant case the applicant was essentially seeking a declaration by the Administrative Court that his employer, a public hospital, had acted unlawfully in refusing to recognise that from 1973 to 1976 he had performed the duties of a specialist nurse. The dispute raised by him thus clearly related to his career and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Regarding his claim for payment of the difference in salary, the award of such compensation by the administrative courts was directly dependent on a prior finding that the employer had acted unlawfully. Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

Sramek v Austria (1985) 7 EHRR 351 84/12

[Application lodged 19.9.1979; Commission report 8.12.1982; Court Judgment 22.10.1984]

Mrs Viera Sramek, a US citizen living in Munich, wished to build a holiday residence in Hopfgarten, Austria. Following a hearing in camera at which the applicant was present but unrepresented, the Regional Real Property Transactions Authority (RRPTA) refused to approve the transfer of title on the grounds that the contract was contrary to social and economic interests given the imminent danger of foreign domination in the municipality. Her appeal to the Constitutional Court was dismissed on 3 March 1979. She complained that she had not received a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law.

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr R Ryssdal, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr W Ganshof van der Meersch (c), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr D Evrigenis (c), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr E Garcia de Enterria (d), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans (d), Mr C Russo, Mr J Gersing (d).

A 6 was applicable as the outcome of the proceedings at issue was decisive for private rights and obligations. The RRPTA was a 'tribunal' for the purposes of the Article: its function was to determine matters within its competence on the basis of rules of law, following proceedings conducted in a prescribed manner. The length of the term of office of members of the RRPTA and the limited possibility of their removal satisfied the requirements of the article. The powers of the appointment of the members of the RRPTA did not give cause to doubt the member's independence and impartiality. The Regional Authority was composed of a farmer, who was the elected mayor of a municipality in the Tyrol, as chairman; a judge of the Innsbruck Court of Appeal; another farmer, sitting as an agricultural expert; a lawyer; and three civil servants from the Office of the Land Government, one of whom acted as rapporteur. There were no difficulties with the independence and impartiality of the judge, the agricultural expert, the lawyer or the person who, by reason of his experience in real estate matters, acted as chairman of the Regional Authority and happened to be a mayor. With regard to the three civil servants from the Office of the Land Government, the Land Government represented by the Transactions Officer, acquired the status of a party when they appealed to the Regional Authority against the first-instance decision in the applicant's favour, and one of the three civil servants in question had the Transactions Officer as his hierarchical superior. Although the Transactions Officer could not take advantage of his hierarchical position to give to the rapporteur instructions to be followed in the handling of cases, appearances could be of importance in determining whether a tribunal could be considered to be independent. Where, as in the present case, a tribunal's members included a person who was in a subordinate position, in terms of his duties and the organisation of his service, vis-à-vis one of the parties, litigants might entertain a legitimate doubt about that person's independence. Such a situation seriously affected the confidence which the courts had to inspire in a democratic society. There was accordingly a violation of A 6(1).

In view of the above conclusion it was not necessary to rule on the applicant's further complaint that she did not receive a fair hearing in public.

Stallinger and Kuso v Austria (1998) 26 EHRR 81 97/21

[Applications lodged 16.11.1988, 27.2.1989; Commission report 7.12.1995; Court Judgment 23.4.1997]

Mr Alois and Mrs Amalia Stallinger and Mr Johann and Mrs Elisabeth Kuso were farmers. Their land was involved in agricultural land-consolidation proceedings. Their appeals against the consolidation scheme were dismissed by the Land Reform Board, which included civil servants and judges. Their subsequent appeals to the Constitutional Court and Administrative Court were rejected. They complained that the land reform boards could not be regarded as independent and impartial tribunals established by law and that they did not have a public hearing.

Comm found unanimously NV 6 as regards an independent and impartial tribunal established by law, V 6 as regards right to a public hearing, NV 6 as regards right to a fair hearing.

Court found unanimously NV 6(1) as regards an independent and impartial tribunal, V 6(1) on account of the lack of a public hearing before the Administrative Court.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek, Mr P Kûris.

With regard to the membership of and procedure before land reform boards, the legal situation obtaining in the present case was identical to that examined in the case of Ettl and Others. The expert members of the Board were needed in cases concerning land consolidation, which was an operation that raised issues of great complexity and affected not only the owners directly concerned but the community as a whole. The adversarial nature of the proceedings before the boards was unaffected by the participation of the 'civil-servant experts'. The applicants had failed to identify any convincing reason why the Court should depart from its case-law. The Court therefore found no breach of the applicants' right under A 6(1) to have their case determined by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Hearings in civil matters were subject in principle to a reservation Austria made when ratifying the Convention. The provisions of the Administrative Court Act came into force in 1982, whereas Austria ratified the Convention and made the reservation under A 6 in 1958. Only laws then in force in the State's territory could be the subject of a reservation. The applicants' complaint that the Administrative Court did not hold a hearing was not excluded from review on account of the Austrian reservation, since the provision on which the refusal to hold such a hearing was based was not in force at the time the reservation was made.

Only hearings in the Administrative Court were at stake, hearings before land reform boards not being open to the public. The practice of the Administrative Court was not to hear the parties unless one of them asked it to do so. The applicants expressly requested an oral hearing in the Administrative Court. That was refused on the ground that it was not likely to clarify the case further. Since the Government had not identified any exceptional circumstances that might have justified dispensing with a hearing, the Court considered that the Administrative Court's refusal amounted to a violation of the applicants' A 6 right to a public hearing.

The applicants' complaint that they were never summoned to the in situ inspection of the land by the expert members of the Regional Board was not pursued before the Court, which saw no reason to entertain it of its own motion.

Present judgment constituted just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage sustained. Costs and expenses (ATS 120,000).

Stamoulakatos v Greece (1994) 17 EHRR 479 93/43

[Application lodged 18.7.1986; Commission report 20.5.1992; Court Judgment 26.10.1993]

Mr Nicolas Stamoulakatos was a journalist. He had been convicted by criminal courts in 1979 and 1980 of insulting the authorities, fraudulent conversion of securities, slander, forgery and uttering. He stated that he left Greece in May 1979; he was extradited from Belgium to Greece in December 1985. He was imprisoned and was conditionally released on 7 April 1987. He appealed against the judgments of the Criminal Court and sought retrials. His appeals to the Athens Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation were dismissed. He complained that he had not been properly summoned to appear in the proceedings which led to his conviction and that he had therefore been unable to defend himself against the charges against him.

Comm found by majority (10–4) V 6(1) and 6(3).

Court found unanimously it could not deal with the merits of the case.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Mr F Bigi, Mr L Wildhaber.

Greece's acceptance of the right of individual petition took effect on 20 November 1985. The breach of which the applicant complained originated in three convictions dating from 1979 and 1980. Divorcing the appeals and applications from the events which gave rise to them would, in the instant case, be tantamount to rendering Greece's declaration (in respect of A 25) nugatory. It was reasonable to infer from the declaration that Greece could not be held to have violated its obligations for not affording any possibility of a retrial to those who had been convicted in absentia before 20 November 1985. The Government's objection was well-founded.

Stamoulakatos v Greece (No 2) 97/91

[Application lodged 1.4.1995; Commission report 4.9.1996; Court Judgment 26.11.1997]

On 23 February 1987 Mr Nicolas Stamoulakatos submitted to the Prefecture of Athens an application for a disability pension on the grounds that he had been tortured during the dictatorship and had suffered irreparable damage to his health as a result. On 23 May 1988 the Pensions Regulatory Service rejected the applicant's application. His appeal was rejected by the Audit Court. There were further appeals and hearings. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (12–1) V 6(1), not necessary also to examine A 13.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found V 6(1), not necessary to examine A 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr E Levits.

Under A 26, normal recourse should be had by an applicant to remedies which were available and sufficient to afford redress in respect of the breaches alleged. The Government had not shown that the Audit Court would have considered giving the applicant's case priority had he made such a request. It followed that the Court could not find that such a remedy would have been effective. The preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies was accordingly dismissed. Although the applicant's claim before the domestic court was based on the allegation that his condition was caused by torture suffered between 1967 and 1974, the Court only had to examine the complaint relating to the length of the judicial proceedings brought by the applicant with a view to securing a pension. Greece accepted the right of individual petition on 20 November 1985. The proceedings in issue were brought after that date. The objection of lack of competence ratione temporis was therefore dismissed.

The right to a pension was a civil right and A 6(1) was accordingly applicable.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 14 June 1988, the date on which the applicant lodged an appeal with the Audit Court. It had not yet ended as no final judgment had so far been delivered. It amounted to some nine and a half years thus far. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities, it was also necessary to take account of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation. The case was not especially complex. The applicant could not be held responsible for the length of the proceedings. There had been delays on the part of the authorities for which the workload of the plenary Audit Court did not provide a justification, Contracting Parties being under an obligation to ensure that their judicial authorities complied with the requirements of A 6. Bearing in mind the overall length of time taken by the proceedings, namely nine and a half years already, and the importance of what was at stake for the applicant, namely his entitlement to a disability pension and thus a significant portion of his livelihood, the length of proceedings went beyond what could be considered reasonable under A 6(1). There had accordingly been a violation of that provision.

It was not necessary to examine the present case under A 13 in addition to A 6.

Non-pecuniary damage (GRD 1,000,000). Not established any costs in domestic proceedings, applicant presented own case before Commission and Court.

Stanford v United Kingdom 94/5

[Application lodged 8.1.1990; Commission report 21.10.1992; Court Judgment 23.2.1994]

Mr Bryan Stanford was committed for trial by jury at the Crown Court in Norwich on seven counts arising out of his relationship with a young girl: indecent assault, two counts of rape, unlawful sexual intercourse, kidnapping and two counts of making a threat to kill. The trial, before a High Court judge and a jury, took place from 8 June to 15 June 1988. Throughout the trial the applicant, who sat in a glass-fronted dock, was represented by solicitor and counsel. His counsel had been in practice for 13 years and specialised in criminal work. He was found guilty and sentenced to 10 years imprisonment. The applicant's application for leave to appeal against his conviction on the ground, inter alia, that at his trial he could not hear the proceedings was refused. He complained that he had not received a fair trial.

Comm found by majority (11–7) NV 6.

Court found unanimously NV 6.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr J De Meyer, Mr R Pekkanen, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev.

It was not in dispute that the applicant had difficulties in hearing some of the evidence given during the trial. A 6, read as a whole, guaranteed the right of an accused to participate effectively in a criminal trial. In general that included, inter alia, not only his right to be present, but also to hear and follow the proceedings. Such rights were implicit in the notion of an adversarial procedure and could also be derived from the guarantees contained in A 6(3)(c), (d) and (e). Neither the applicant nor the legal representatives sought to bring his hearing difficulties to the attention of the trial judge at any stage throughout the six-day hearing. The applicant had mentioned his problems to a prison officer and subsequently to his lawyers. However, the officer was neither a court official nor an officer of the court. Moreover, counsel, who had lengthy experience in handling criminal cases, chose for tactical reasons to remain silent about the difficulties and there was nothing to indicate that, as subsequently claimed, the applicant disagreed with this decision. The State could not normally be held responsible for the actions or decisions of an accused's lawyer. It followed from the independence of the legal profession that the conduct of the defence was essentially a matter between the defendant and his representatives. The Contracting States were required to intervene only if a failure by counsel to provide effective representation was manifest or sufficiently brought to their attention. That was not the position in the present case. Expert reports which were carried out both before and after the applicant's complaint indicated that, apart from a minimal loss of sound due to the glass screen, the acoustic levels in the courtroom were satisfactory. The applicant was represented by a solicitor and counsel who had no difficulty in following the proceedings and who would have had every opportunity to discuss with the applicant any points that arose out of the evidence which did not already appear in the witness statements. The transcript of the trial revealed that he was ably defended by his counsel and that the trial judge's summing up to the jury fairly and thoroughly reflected the evidence presented to the court. In addition, the Court of Appeal could not reasonably have been expected in the circumstances to correct an alleged shortcoming in the trial proceedings which had not been raised before the trial judge. In the circumstances of the case there had been no failure by the UK to ensure that the applicant received a fair trial. There had thus been no breach of A 6(1).

Starace v Italy 00/133

[Application lodged 4.11.1996; Court Judgment 27.4.2000]

In 1990, GC and VA filed a complaint against Mr Andrea Starace and another person in relation to the publication, in the review 'Atenapoli' on 23 March 1990, of an article. Criminal proceedings were instituted by the Naples Public Prosecutor's Office for libel. On 27 October 1990 the Naples Public Prosecutor summoned the applicant and two other persons to appear before the Naples District Court on 23 November 1990. In May 1996 the applicant was convicted for libel and sentenced to a fine and damages. His appeal to the Court of Appeal was rejected. He further appealed to the Court of Cassation which, in a judgment of 5 May 1998, filed with the court registry on 23 June 1998, held that the charge against the applicant had become time-barred and consequently annulled the order imposing a fine on him. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr C Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Conforti, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr Ab Baka, Mr E Levits.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 27 October 1990, the date of the committal for trial issued by the Naples Public Prosecutor's Office, and ended on 23 June 1998, when the Court of Cassation's judgment was filed with the registry. The proceedings had lasted seven years, seven months and 27 days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the authorities dealing with the case. There were four periods of delay, the length of which had not been justified by the State's authorities amounting to a total of more than three years and six months. There had been adjournments of hearings postponed at the applicant's request and hearings which did not take place by reason of a lawyers' strike. The case was not complex. Even if the applicant might be considered to be responsible for some of the delays, that could not justify the length of the periods in between individual hearings and certainly not the total duration of the proceedings. The Government did not provide any convincing explanation for the delays. In the circumstances, the period taken to consider the case failed to satisfy the reasonable time requirement. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

Steel and Others v United Kingdom (1999) 28 EHRR 603 98/81

The first applicant, Ms Helen Steel, took part in a protest against a grouse shoot on 22 August 1992. She walked in front of an armed member of the shoot, thus physically preventing him from firing. She was arrested and detained for approximately 44 hours prior to being brought before a magistrates' court and then released. At the subsequent hearing, she was fined GBP 70 in respect of an offence under the Public Order Act 1986 and, in respect of the breach of the peace, she was ordered to agree to be bound over for 12 months in the sum of GBP 100. When she refused, she was imprisoned for 28 days. Her appeal to the Teesside Crown Court was unsuccessful.

The second applicant, Ms Rebecca Lush, took part in a protest against the building of an extension to a motorway. She placed herself in front of a JCB digger in order to impede the engineering works. She was arrested and detained for approximately 17 hours prior to being brought before a magistrates' court, and was subsequently imprisoned for seven days after refusing to agree to be bound over.

The third, fourth and fifth applicants, Ms Andrea Needham, Mr David Polden, and Mr Christopher Cole, attended a Conference Centre on 20 January 1994, where the 'Fighter Helicopter II' Conference was being held, in order to protest against the sale of fighter helicopters. The protest took the form of handing out leaflets and holding up banners saying: 'Work for Peace and not War'. They were arrested and detained for approximately seven hours before being brought before a magistrate. The proceedings were adjourned. On 25 February 1994, when the proceedings were resumed, the prosecution decided not to call any evidence and the magistrates dismissed the case against the applicants.

The applicants complained that the concept of breach of the peace and the power to bind over were not sufficiently clearly defined for their detention to be prescribed by law, that their detention did not fall into any of the categories set out in A 5(1), and that, because of the immunity of magistrates from civil proceedings, they had been denied a right to compensation in breach of A 5(5). They also complained of violations of A 10 and 11, arising from the uncertainty inherent in the concept of breach of the peace and the power to bind over and the disproportionality of the restrictions on their freedom to protest.

Comm found unanimously NV 5(1), (3) or (5), NV 6(1), (2) or (3), NV 10 as regards the first and second applicants, V 10 as regards the third, fourth and fifth applicants, not necessary to examine 11, NV 13.

Court found unanimously not necessary to examine 5(3), 6(2), 6(3) (b) and (c), 11 or 13, by majority (7–2) NV 5(1) in respect of the arrest and initial detention of the first applicant, unanimously NV 5(1) in respect of the arrest and initial detention of the second applicant, unanimously NV 5(1) in respect of the arrests and detention of the third, fourth and fifth applicants, by majority (8–1) NV 5(1) in respect of the detention of the first and second applicants for refusing to agree to be bound over, unanimously NV 5(5), NV 6(3)(a), (5–4) NV 10 in respect of the first applicant (7–1) NV 10 in respect of the second applicant, unanimously V 10 in respect of the third, fourth and fifth applicants.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (jpd), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr N Valticos (jpd), Mrs E Palm (jpd), Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk (jpd), Mr K Jungwiert, Mr T Pantiru.

The complaints under A 5 (3), 6(2) and 6(3) (b) and (c) were not pursued before the Court, which saw no reason to consider them of its own motion.

Breach of the peace amounted to a 'criminal offence' for the purposes of the Convention, and the applicants' arrests and detention before being brought to the magistrates' courts fell within the scope of A 5(1)(c). The expressions 'lawful' and 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law' in A 5(1) stipulated not only full compliance with the procedural and substantive rules of national law, but also that any deprivation of liberty be consistent with the purpose of A 5 and not arbitrary. In addition, given the importance of personal liberty, it was essential that the applicable national law met the standard of 'lawfulness' set by the Convention, which required that all law, whether written or unwritten, be sufficiently precise to allow the citizen to foresee, to a degree that was reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action might entail. The national courts that dealt with these cases were satisfied that each applicant had caused or had been likely to cause a breach of the peace and the Court saw no reason to disagree. It followed that the arrests and initial detention of the first and second applicants complied with English law. There was no evidence to suggest that those deprivations of liberty were arbitrary. Therefore, there had been no violation of A 5(1) in respect of the arrests and initial detention of the first and second applicants. The protest of the third fourth and fifth applicants was entirely peaceful. There did not appear to anything in their behaviour which could have justified the police in fearing that a breach of the peace was likely to be caused. In the absence of any national decision on the question, the Court was not satisfied that their arrests and subsequent detention for seven hours complied with English law so as to be 'lawful' within the meaning of A 5(1). Therefore there had been a violation of A 5(1) in respect of the third, fourth and fifth applicants.

The first and second applicants, in being committed to prison for refusing to be bound over, were detained for non-compliance with the order of a court, as was permitted by A 5(1)(b). The elements of breach of the peace were adequately defined by English law. Therefore the applicants could reasonably have foreseen that, if they acted in a manner the natural consequence of which would be to provoke others to violence, they might be ordered to be bound over to keep the peace, and if they refused so to be bound over, they might be committed to prison. The orders were expressed in rather vague and general terms; the expression 'to be of good behaviour' was particularly imprecise and offered little guidance to the person bound over as to the type of conduct which would amount to a breach of the order. However, in each applicant's case the binding-over order was imposed after a finding that she had committed a breach of the peace. Given the context, it was sufficiently clear that the applicants were being requested to agree to refrain from causing further, similar, breaches of the peace during the ensuing months. There was no evidence to suggest that the magistrates acted outside their jurisdiction or that the binding-over orders or the applicants' subsequent detention failed to comply with English law for any other reason. It followed that there has been no violation of A 5(1) in respect of the detention of the first and second applicants following their refusal to be bound over.

A 5(5) guaranteed an enforceable right to compensation to those who had been the victims of arrest or detention in contravention of the other provisions of A 5. In view of the finding that there was no violation of A 5(1) in respect of the first and second applicants, A 5(5) was not applicable in those cases. In respect of the third, fourth and fifth applicants, however, it would have been open to those applicants to bring civil actions for damages against the police. They therefore had at their disposal an enforceable right to compensation and accordingly A 5(5) was not violated in that case.

As breach of the peace amounted to an offence for the purposes of the Convention, A 6(3)(a) was applicable. The details contained in the charge-sheets given to the first and second applicants were sufficient to comply with that article. It followed that there had been no violation of A 6(3)(a).

The protests of the first and second applicants constituted expressions of opinion within the meaning of A 10. The measures taken against the applicants were, therefore, interferences with their right to freedom of expression. With regard to the third, fourth and fifth applicants, their arrests and detention constituted interferences with their A 10 rights. The measures taken against the first and second applicants were lawful within the meaning of A 5(1), but those taken against the third, fourth and fifth applicants were not. Since the requirement under A 10(2) that an interference with the exercise of freedom of expression be 'prescribed by law' was similar to that under A 5(1) that any deprivation of liberty be 'lawful', it followed that the arrests and detention of the first and second applicants were 'prescribed by law' under A 10(2) but that those of the third, fourth and fifth applicants were not. The applicant's arrest and initial detention pursued the legitimate aims of preventing disorder and protecting the rights of others. The subsequent committal to prison of the first and second applicant was intended not only to deter future breaches of the peace, but also pursued the aim of maintaining the authority of the judiciary. Given dangers and risk of disorder inherent in first and second applicants' protest activities, the actions of police in arresting and detaining them before bringing them to court was not disproportionate. Neither was their imprisonment following refusal to be bound over, given the importance of deterrence and maintaining the authority of the judiciary. The measures taken against the third, fourth and fifth applicants were not 'lawful' or 'prescribed by law', the Court not having been satisfied that the police had grounds reasonably to apprehend that the applicants' peaceful protest would cause a breach of the peace. The interference with the exercise by the applicants of their right to freedom of expression was disproportionate to the aims of preventing disorder and protecting the rights of others, and was not, therefore, necessary in a democratic society. Therefore, the measures taken against the first and second applicants did not give rise to any violation of A 10, while those taken against the third, fourth and fifth applicants did.

The complaint under A 11 did not raise any issues not already examined in the context of A 10 and it was therefore unnecessary to consider it.

The applicants did not submit any argumentation in respect of the complaint under A 13 to the Court. The Court did not consider it necessary to consider it of its own motion.

Non-pecuniary damage (GBP 500 to each of the third, fourth and fifth applicants), costs and expenses (to the third, fourth and fifth applicants, GBP 20,000 less FF 46,747).

Stefanelli v Republic of San-Marino 00/58

[Application lodged 13.1.1997; Court Judgment 8.2.2000]

Mrs Sylviane Stefanelli was detained in connection with proceedings relating to the unlawful marketing of products. The investigation was conducted by a commissioner who held a public hearing for examining the witnesses. Without holding a public hearing nor seeing the applicant, on 19 June 1996, the first instance judge sentenced her to four years and six months imprisonment and ordered preventive measures because she was considered dangerous. The applicant appealed. The appeal judge upheld her conviction but reduced the sentence. She complained of the fairness of the proceedings.

Judges: Mr CL Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr AB Baka, Mr E Levits.

The hearing at first instance had been held before the commissioner, who had only investigative duties. The same had happened on appeal. As a result the proceedings had taken place without a hearing at first instance and on appeal before a judicial officer called up on to take a decision on the merits. There had been a violation of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary damage (ITL 10,000,000), costs and expenses (ITL 9,000,000).

Steffano v Italy 92/23

[Application lodged 16.6.1986; Commission report 5.12.1990; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mrs Silvia Steffano was a trainee lawyer. From 30 June to 28 July 1982 she served as an 'expert' on an examinations board for the upper secondary examinations and received the remuneration prescribed by law for all members of such boards. Her application to the Provincial Director of Education for a payment calculated on the basis of a teacher's monthly salary was rejected on 17 September 1982. On 13 November 1982 she applied to the Lombardy Regional Administrative Court to establish her claim to the requested additional remuneration. On 29 January 1988 the Administrative Court dismissed her claim. The text of the decision was lodged with the court registry on 17 October 1988. On 13 April 1989 she appealed to the Consiglio di Stato. At the date of the European Court judgment no further information was presented of the Consiglio di Stato's decision. Subsequent to the Court's judgment it was informed that the Consiglio di Stato had dismissed the applicant's appeal by a decision of 5 July 1991, filed with the registry on 30 January 1992. She complained of the length of proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 13 November 1982 when the proceedings were instituted in the Lombardy Regional Administrative Court. It would end when the text of the decision of the Consiglio di Stato was filed with the registry, or ended when that occurred, if it already had done. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. With regard to the excessive workload of the Lombardy Regional Administrative Court, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. In the administrative court the applicant had to wait more than five years, despite her repeated requests, for the date of the hearing to be fixed. In addition, no investigative measure was taken during that period and more than eight and a half months elapsed before the judgment was filed. The applicant then took almost six months to lodge an appeal, for which period the State was not responsible. As regards the Consiglio di Stato, neither the applicant nor the other participants in the Strasbourg proceedings provided the Court with sufficient details for it to be able to determine whether that body displayed due diligence. Nevertheless, the Court could not regard as reasonable a total duration which at 16 July 1991 was already more than eight and a half years, six of which were for the first-instance proceedings alone. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction in respect of the non-pecuniary damage alleged.

Stjerna v Finland (1997) 24 EHRR 194 94/42

[Application lodged 11.3.1991; Commission report 8.7.1993; Court Judgment 25.11.1994]

In March 1989 the applicant applied to a County Administrative Board for permission to change his surname to 'Tawaststjerna'. He claimed that his ancestors had used that name and that he had always felt it an injustice only to bear half of the original name. He also claimed that the use of his surname gave rise to practical difficulties as it was an old Swedish form, was not well known and was difficult to pronounce; this meant that it was frequently misspelt. In addition, he claimed, his name had given rise to a pejorative nickname in Finnish. The Advisory Committee on Names rejected his request. He then asked for his name to be changed to 'Tavaststjerna'. That was also refused. He appealed to the Supreme Administrative Court which upheld the Board's decision. The applicant complained that the refusal by the Finnish authorities to grant his request for a change of surname violated his right to respect for private life under A 8.

Comm found by a majority (12–9) NV 8, and unanimously NV 14+8.

Court held unanimously NV 8 and NV 14+8.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr L Wildhaber (c).

A 8 did not contain any explicit reference to names. However, since it constituted a means of personal identification and a link to a family, an individual's name did concern his or her private and family life. The fact that there might exist a public interest in regulating the use of names was not sufficient to remove the question of a person's name from the scope of private and family life, which had been construed as including, to a certain degree, the right to establish relationships with others. The subject-matter of the complaint fell within the ambit of A 8.

The refusal of the authorities to allow the applicant to adopt a specific new surname could not necessarily be considered an interference in the exercise of his right to respect for his private life, as would have been, eg, an obligation on him to change surname. However, although the essential object of A 8 was to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities with his or her exercise of the right protected, there might in addition be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for private life. The boundaries between the State's positive and negative obligations under A 8 did not lend themselves to precise definition, although the applicable principles were similar. In both contexts regard had to be had to the fair balance to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community. The Contracting States enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation. The Court was not satisfied on the evidence before it that the alleged difficulties in the spelling and pronunciation of the name were very frequent or any more significant than those experienced by a large number of people in Europe. In any event, in the view of the Advisory Committee on Names, the use of the proposed name involved similar practical difficulties to those associated with the current name. The national authorities were in principle better placed to assess the level of inconvenience relating to the use of one name rather than another within their national society, and no sufficient grounds were adduced to justify the Court coming to a conclusion different from that of the Finnish authorities. Although the applicant's current name might have given rise to a pejorative nickname, this was not a specific feature of his name, since many names lent themselves to distortion. Therefore, the sources of inconvenience the applicant complained of were not sufficient to raise an issue of failure to respect private life under A 8(1). The refusal therefore did not constitute a lack of respect for his private life, and accordingly there was no violation of that article.

For the purposes of A 14, a difference of treatment was discriminatory if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. The Contracting States enjoyed a margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment in law. The Court was not convinced that the applicant was subjected to discriminatory treatment. His complaint that one of his ancestors was born out of wedlock did not appear to have had any bearing on the refusal. The reason for refusal seemed to have been that the name could not be said to have been in 'established' use in the family, a condition for acquisition of a surname under Finnish law. The justification advanced by the Government appeared objective and reasonable. There was no violation of A 14 taken together with A 8.

Stocké v Germany (1991) 13 EHRR 839 91/24

[Application lodged 20.9.1985; Commission report 12.10.1989; Court Judgment 19.3.1991]

Mr Walter Stocké was the owner of a building firm which went bankrupt in 1975. In 1976 he was held in custody on suspicion of tax offences. In November 1977 the court ordered that he should be re-detained as he had not complied with the conditions of his provisional release. In order to avoid arrest, he fled to Switzerland and then to Strasbourg in France. In November 1977 an international request for the location of his whereabouts was issued. In 1978 Mr Köster, a police informer, tricked the applicant into re-entering Germany and he was arrested. He complained that he had been a victim of collusion between the German authorities and Mr Köster for the purpose of bringing him back to the Federal Republic of Germany against his will with a view to arresting him and that the circumstances of his arrest made it and his detention both on remand and after conviction unlawful. He also asserted that those circumstances had deprived him of a fair trial.

Comm found by majority (12–1) NV 5(1), NV 6(1).

Court found unanimously NV 5 or 6.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (c), Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens.

The applicant was induced by a trick to board a plane chartered by Mr Köster, although he had been warned that they were going to fly over a small part of German territory. After being arrested by the German police immediately after the plane landed at Saarbrücken, he lodged a complaint in France and in the Federal Republic of Germany, alleging false imprisonment. The Commission examined nine witnesses and did not consider their evidence to be inconsistent or unreliable. Neither the facts found by the Commission nor the circumstances of the case as a whole established that the cooperation that there had unquestionably been between the German prosecuting authorities and Mr Köster had extended to unlawful activities abroad. The establishment and verification of the facts was primarily a matter for the Commission. Accordingly, it was only in exceptional circumstances that the Court would use its powers in this area. Having regard to the conclusions reached by the French and German authorities, after thorough investigations, to the evidence of the numerous witnesses already heard by the Commission as set out in its report in a summary whose accuracy had not been challenged, and to the fact that the Commission deemed it unnecessary to hear further evidence, the Court saw no reason to entertain the applicant's request to examine further witnesses. It was not necessary to examine whether, if the activities abroad had been deemed unlawful, the applicant's arrest in the Federal Republic of Germany would have violated the Convention. There had been no violation of A 5 or A 6.

Stögmüller v Austria (1979–80) 1 EHRR 155 69/1

[Application lodged 1.8.1962; Commission report 9.2.1967; Court Judgment 10.11.1969]

Mr Ernst Stögmüller was employed as an inspector for an insurance company. He subsequently founded his own private limited company. He was also a pilot. Following investigations he was charged with fraud and usury and remanded in custody on the grounds of danger of absconding and danger of suppression of evidence. He was detained for over two years and his applications for release were rejected. Following his trial he was sentenced to severe imprisonment, with one night of sleeping-hard and one day's fasting each year, on 19 counts of aggravated usury, one count of usury, 19 counts of aggravated fraud and seven counts of aggravated fraudulent conversion. He was also ordered to pay damages to his victims. He complained about his detention on remand.

Court found unanimously V 5(3).

Judges: Mr H Rolin, President, Mr A Holmbäck, Mr A Verdross (jc), Mr G Balladore Pallieri, Mr M Zekia, Mr J Cremona, Mr S Bilge (jc).

It was essentially on the basis of the reasons given in the decisions on the applications for release pending trial, and of the true facts mentioned by the applicant in his appeals, that the Court was called upon to decide whether or not there has been a violation of the Convention. A 5(1)(c) authorised arrest or detention for the purpose of bringing 'before the competent legal authority' on the mere grounds of the existence of reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence and it was clear that the persistence of such suspicions was a condition sine qua non for the validity of the continued detention of the person concerned. A 5(3) clearly implied, however, that the persistence of suspicion did not suffice to justify, after a certain lapse of time, the prolongation of the detention. However, in examining the question whether A 5(3) had been observed, the Court had to consider and assess the reasonableness of the grounds which persuaded the judicial authorities to decide, in the case which was brought before the Court, on the serious departure from the rules of respect for individual liberty and of the presumption of innocence which was involved in every detention without a conviction. For that purpose, the Court took into account the facts established by the decisions of the said authorities and the non-refuted facts advanced by the person concerned. A 5(3) referred only to persons charged and detained. It implied that there had to be special diligence in the conduct of the prosecution of the cases concerning such persons. The reasonable time mentioned in that provision could be distinguished from that provided for in A 6. On the other hand, even if the duration of the preliminary investigation was not open to criticism, that of the detention should not exceed a reasonable time. A 5(3) appeared as an independent provision which produced its own effects whatever may have been the facts on which the arrest was grounded or the circumstances which made the preliminary investigation as long as it was. The Court was not restricted to consideration of the period of detention prior to the lodging of the Commission application. The Government did not rely on the objection of non-exhaustion before the Commission. On the question of whether the proceedings instituted could embrace complaints concerning facts which occurred after the lodging of the application, international law, to which A 26 referred explicitly, was far from conferring on the rule of exhaustion an inflexible character. International law only imposed the use of the remedies which were not only available to the persons concerned but were also sufficient, that is to say capable of redressing their complaints. In matters of detention while on remand, it was in the light of the circumstances of the case that the question was, in appropriate cases, to be assessed whether and to what extent it was necessary, pursuant to A 26, for the detained applicant, who had exhausted the remedies before the Commission declared his application admissible, to make, later on, further appeals to the national courts in order to make it possible to examine, at international level, the reasonableness of his continued detention. But such question only arose if the examination of the reasons given by the national courts in their decisions on the appeals made before the lodging of the application had not led to the conclusion that, at that date, the detention had exceeded a reasonable time. If the opposite was the case it was clear that the detention while on remand which was held to have exceeded a reasonable time on the day when the application was lodged had to be found, except in extraordinary circumstances, to have necessarily kept such character throughout the time for which it was continued. As that was the conclusion which the Court had reached in the present case, there was no need for the Court to examine separately the applicant's complaints concerning the period of detention which followed the lodging of the application. With regard to the danger of repetition of the offences, the applicant had allegedly continued his fraudulent activities even after his first release. However, he had sold his company thus giving up his occupation of money-lender in order to become an aviator. However, from March 1961 he did not appear to have committed any further offences. Therefore, the existence of a danger of repetition of the offences could not be upheld in the circumstances of the case. With regard to the danger of his absconding, it was submitted that he had to expect a heavy sentence and that his pilot's licence and his father's aeroplane enabled him to go abroad at any time. However, during the first period of his provisional release he had gone abroad by plane on several occasions and had always returned to Austria. The danger of an accused absconding did not result just because it is possible or easy for him to cross the frontier: there had to be a whole set of circumstances, particularly, the heavy sentence to be expected or the accused's particular distaste of detention, or the lack of well-established ties in the country, which gave reason to suppose that the consequences and hazards of flight would seem to him to be a lesser evil than continued imprisonment. But that was not the situation of the present applicant. The Vienna Court of Appeal found, in its decision of 10 November 1961, that there was no danger of his absconding and his provisional release was granted afterwards on provision of security. In those circumstances, the Court considered that, at least from that date, there was no danger of absconding sufficient to justify the keeping of the applicant in detention. The second application for provisional release, which was made on 6 December 1961, should therefore have been granted. The same arguments applied to the two sets of criminal proceedings faced by the applicant. With regard to the argument that the applicant had made further applications and appeals in his case, those were made in November 1962 and at that time the length of his detention had already ceased to be reasonable.

A 50 reserved for the applicant, should the occasion arise, to apply for it.

Stran Greek Refineries and Stratis Andreadis v Greece (1995) 19 EHRR 293 94/44

[Application lodged 20.11.1987; Commission report 12.5.1993; Court Judgment 9.12.1994]

Mr Stratis Andreadis was the sole shareholder in Stran Greek Refineries. Under the terms of a contract concluded on 22 July 1972 with the Greek State, Mr Andreadis undertook to construct a crude oil refinery in the Megara region. The Government ratified the contract by Legislative Decree No 1211/1972. However, the project stagnated because the State failed to fulfil its obligation and, in November 1973, the Megara police ordered that the work should cease. Prior to the termination of the contract, Stran had incurred expenditure in connection with the scheme. On 10 November 1978, Stran brought an action in the Athens Court of First Instance for a declaration that the State should pay it compensation for breach of its obligations during the period of validity of the contract. In a preliminary decision, the court ruled against the State. On 12 June 1980, the State filed an arbitration petition. The arbitration court made its award in favour of the applicants. The State's application to the Athens Court of First Instance to set aside the arbitration award was dismissed, as was its appeal to the Court of Appeal. On 15 December 1986, the State appealed to the Court of Cassation. The case was adjourned at the State's request, on the ground that a draft law concerning the case in question was before Parliament. On 22 May 1987, Parliament enacted Law No 1701/1987 on the compulsory participation of the State in private undertakings and the redemption of shares. The Law stated, inter alia, that on termination of contracts under consideration, all their terms, conditions and clauses, including the arbitration clause, were repealed and the arbitration tribunal no longer had jurisdiction, that any principal or ancillary claims against the Greek State were time-barred and any court proceedings at whatever level pending at the time of the enactment of the statute, in respect of claims within its meaning were declared void. The First Division of the Court of Cassation found the new Law unconstitutional. The Court of Cassation sitting in plenary found that the new measure was not unconstitutional. The applicants complained that they had not had a fair trial within a reasonable time and that they were victims of P1A1.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) as regards the right to a fair trial, by majority (12–2) NV 6(1) as regards the length of the proceedings, unanimously V P1A1.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1) as regards the right to a fair trial, NV 6(1) as regards the length of the proceedings, V P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr F Bigi, Mr L Wildhaber.

The Court took cognisance of preliminary objections in so far as the State in question had already raised them, at least in substance and with sufficient clarity, before the Commission, in principle at the stage of the initial examination of admissibility. When a State relied on the exhaustion rule, it had to indicate with sufficient clarity the effective remedies to which the applicants had not had recourse; it was not for the Convention bodies to cure of their own motion any shortcomings or lack of precision in the respondent States' arguments. Regarding the Government's claim that the applicants had chosen arbitration and failed to exhaust statutory remedies, it was the Government that had initially contested the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts and opted for arbitration as a means of resolving the dispute. There was therefore estoppel in respect of the preliminary objection.

The concept of 'civil rights and obligations' was not to be interpreted solely by reference to the respondent State's domestic law. A 6(1) applied irrespective of the status of the parties, of the nature of the legislation which governed the manner in which the dispute was to be determined and of the character of the authority which had jurisdiction in the matter. It was enough that the outcome of the proceedings should be decisive for private rights and obligations. The applicants' right under the arbitration award was pecuniary in nature, as had been their claim for damages allowed by the arbitration court. Their right to recover the sums awarded by the arbitration court was therefore a civil right within the meaning of A 6, whatever the nature, under Greek law, of the contract between the applicants and the Greek State. It followed that the outcome of the proceedings brought in the ordinary courts by the State to have the arbitration award set aside was decisive for a 'civil right'. A 6(1) was accordingly applicable.

The Court had regard to both the timing and manner of the adoption of Law No 1701/1987. The legislature's intervention in the present case took place at a time when judicial proceedings in which the State was a party were pending. The principle of the rule of law and the notion of fair trial enshrined in A 6 precluded any interference by the legislature with the administration of justice designed to influence the judicial determination of the dispute. The wording of the new measure effectively excluded any meaningful examination of the case by the Court of Cassation. Once the constitutionality of the measures had been upheld by the Court of Cassation in plenary session, the court's decision became inevitable. The State had infringed the applicants' rights under A 6(1) by intervening in a manner which was decisive to ensure that the imminent outcome of proceedings in which it was a party was favourable to it. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

The relevant period began on 20 November 1985 when the Greek declaration accepting the right of individual petition took effect. In order to determine the reasonableness of the period of time which elapsed after that date, regard had to be had to the stage which the case had reached at that time. Only the proceedings concerning the validity of the arbitration award, which commenced on 2 May 1985, could be taken into account. The whole of the period in question had to be taken into consideration. It ended on 11 April 1990, when the judgment of the Court of Cassation declaring the arbitration award void was delivered. It therefore lasted four years, four months and 20 days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The proceedings in the Athens Court of First Instance and the Court of Appeal lasted 18 months, about six of which were prior to the Greek declaration under A 25. Those proceedings were not open to criticism. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation lasted more than three years, a period that was justified in view of the need to take account of Law No 1701/1987, and above all the fact that the Code of Civil Procedure required a division of the Court of Cassation to refer a case to the plenary court if it refused to apply a law on the ground that it was unconstitutional. There had therefore been no violation of A 6(1) in respect of length of proceedings.

In order to determine whether the applicants had a 'possession' for the purposes of P1A1, the Court had to ascertain whether the judgment of the Athens Court of First Instance and the arbitration award had given rise to a debt in their favour that was sufficiently established to be enforceable. At the moment when Law No 1701/1987 was passed, the arbitration award of 27 February 1984 conferred on the applicants a right in the sums awarded. Admittedly, that right was revocable, since the award could still be annulled, but the ordinary courts had by then already twice held – at first instance and on appeal – that there was no ground for such annulment. Accordingly, that right constituted a possession within the meaning of P1A1. There was an interference with the applicants' right of property as guaranteed by P1A1. It was impossible for them to secure enforcement of an arbitration award having final effect and under which the State was required to pay them specified sums in respect of expenditure that they had incurred in seeking to fulfil their contractual obligations or even for them to take further action to recover the sums in question through the courts. The interference in question was neither an expropriation nor a measure to control the use of property; it fell to be dealt with under the first sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. It was necessary for the Greek State to terminate a contract which it considered to be prejudicial to its economic interests. However, the unilateral termination of a contract did not take effect in relation to certain essential clauses of the contract, such as the arbitration clause. To alter the machinery set up by enacting an authoritative amendment to such a clause would make it possible for one of the parties to evade jurisdiction in a dispute in respect of which specific provision was made for arbitration. The State was therefore under a duty to pay the applicants the sums awarded against it at the conclusion of the arbitration procedure, a procedure for which it had itself opted and the validity of which had been accepted until the day of the hearing in the Court of Cassation. By choosing to intervene at that stage of the proceedings in the Court of Cassation by a law which invoked the termination of the contract in question in order to declare void the arbitration clause and to annul the arbitration award of 27 February 1984, the legislature upset, to the detriment of the applicants, the balance that had to be struck between the protection of the right of property and the requirements of public interest. There had accordingly been a violation of P1A1.

Stubbings and Others v United Kingdom (1997) 23 EHRR 213 96/40

Ms Leslie Stubbings was born on 29 January 1957. She alleged that she was sexually assaulted by Mr Webb, the adoptive father with whom she had been placed by the local authority, between 1959 and 1971 and that his son had forced her to have sexual intercourse with him on two occasions in 1969. Since 1976 she had experienced severe psychological problems, which have led to her admission to hospital on three occasions. On 18 August 1987 she commenced proceedings against her adoptive parents and brother, seeking damages for the alleged assaults. Her claim was dismissed by the High Court, Court of Appeal and House of Lords as time-barred under the Limitation Act 1980. The limitation period for such actions was three years.

Ms JL was born in 1962. She alleged that between 1968 and September 1979 she was frequently abused by her father, who took pornographic photographs of her and subjected her to serious assaults of a sexual nature. Following the decision of the House of Lords in Stubbings v Webb, her civil claim against her father was discontinued on the advice of counsel that it had become time-barred in 1986, six years after her 18th birthday.

Ms JP was born in 1958. Between the ages of five and seven she attended a State primary school and recalled sexual abuse, including rape, by the Deputy Headmaster, during that period. She commenced proceedings for damages against the Deputy Headmaster in February 1992 but discontinued the action following the decision of the House of Lords in Stubbings v Webb, because her claim had become time-barred in January 1982.

Ms DS was born in 1962. Between 1968 and 1977 she was allegedly subjected to repeated sexual assaults by her father, including acts of rape. On 15 March 1991 her father pleaded guilty to a charge of indecent assault based on his abuse of her and was sentenced to one year's probation. She instituted civil proceedings against him on 14 August 1992. Her action was discontinued on 24 May 1993 following the House of Lords' judgment in Stubbings v Webb, since her claim had been brought outside the six-year time-limit held in that case to apply.

All the applicants complained that they were denied access to a court in respect of their claims for compensation for psychological injury caused by childhood sexual abuse because of the operation of the Limitation Act 1980, in violation of A 6(1), and that the difference in the rules applied to themselves and other types of claimants was discriminatory.

Comm found unanimously V 14+6(1), not necessary to examine 6(1) or 8 or 14+8.

Court found by majority (7–2) NV 6(1), unanimously NV 8, by majority (8–1) NV 14+6(1) or 14+8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr R Macdonald (so), Mr N Valticos, Mr I Foighel (so), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk.

A 6(1) embodied the right to a court, of which the right of access, the right to institute proceedings before a court in civil matters, constituted one aspect. However, that right was not absolute, but might be subject to limitations. Limitation periods in personal injury cases were a common feature of the domestic legal systems of the Contracting States and served several important purposes. The English law of limitation allowed the applicants six years from their 18th birthdays in which to initiate civil proceedings. In addition, subject to the need for sufficient evidence, a criminal prosecution could be brought at any time and, if successful, a compensation order could be made. Thus, the very essence of the applicants' right of access to a court was not impaired. The time-limit in question was not unduly short. Moreover, the rules applied were proportionate to the aims sought to be achieved when it was considered that if the applicants had commenced actions shortly before the expiry of the period, the courts would have been required to adjudicate on events which had taken place approximately 20 years earlier. The Contracting States enjoyed a margin of appreciation in deciding how the right of access to court should be circumscribed. The UK legislature had devoted a substantial amount of time and study to the consideration of those questions. There had been a developing awareness in recent years of the range of problems caused by child abuse and its psychological effects on victims, and it was possible that the rules on limitation of actions applying in member States of the Council of Europe might have to be amended to make special provision for this group of claimants in the near future. However, since the very essence of the applicants' right of access was not impaired and the restrictions in question pursued a legitimate aim and were proportionate, it was not for the Court to substitute its own view for that of the State authorities as to what would be the most appropriate policy in that regard. Accordingly, taking into account in particular the legitimate aims served by the rules of limitation in question and the margin of appreciation afforded to States in regulating the right of access to a court, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

A 8 was clearly applicable to the complaints, which concerned private life, a concept which covered the physical and moral integrity of the person. Although the object of A 8 was essentially that of protecting the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, it did not merely compel the State to abstain from such interference: there might, in addition to this primary negative undertaking, be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for private or family life. There were different ways of ensuring respect for private life and the nature of the State's obligation would depend on the particular aspect of private life that was in issue. Sexual abuse was unquestionably an abhorrent type of wrongdoing, with debilitating effects on its victims. Children and other vulnerable individuals were entitled to State protection, in the form of effective deterrence, from such grave types of interference with essential aspects of their private lives. In the instant case, however, such protection was afforded. The abuse of which the applicants complained was regarded most seriously and subject to severe maximum penalties. Provided sufficient evidence could be secured, a criminal prosecution could have been brought at any time and could still be brought. In principle, civil remedies were also available provided they were sought within the statutory time-limit. Accordingly, in view of the protection afforded by the domestic law against the sexual abuse of children and the margin of appreciation allowed to States in these matters, there had been no violation of A 8.

A 14 afforded protection against discrimination in the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms safeguarded by the other substantive provisions of the Convention. However, not every difference in treatment would amount to a violation of this article. It had to be established that other persons in an analogous or relevantly similar situation enjoyed preferential treatment, and that there was no reasonable or objective justification for the distinction. Contracting States enjoyed a margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment in law. As between the applicants and victims of other forms of deliberate wrongdoing with different psychological after-effects, there was no disparity in treatment, because the same rules of limitation were applied to each group. The victims of intentionally and negligently inflicted harm could not be said to be in analogous situations for the purposes of A 14. In any domestic judicial system there might be a number of separate categories of claimant, classified by reference to the type of harm suffered, the legal basis of the claim or other factors, who were subject to varying rules and procedures. In the instant case, different rules had evolved within the English law of limitation in respect of the victims of intentionally and negligently inflicted injury. Different considerations might apply to each of those groups. It would be artificial to emphasise the similarities between these groups of claimants and to ignore the distinctions between them for the purposes of A 14. Even if a comparison could properly be drawn between the two groups of claimants in question, the difference in treatment might be reasonably and objectively justified by reference to their distinctive characteristics. It was quite reasonable, and fell within the margin of appreciation afforded to the Contracting States in those matters, to create separate regimes for the limitation of actions based on deliberately inflicted harm and negligence, since, for example, the existence of a civil claim might be less obvious to victims of the latter type of injury. Accordingly, there was no violation of A 14+6(1) or 14+8.

Styranowski v Poland 98/96

[Application lodged 24.7.1995; Commission report 3.12.1997; Court Judgment 30.10.1998]

Mr Szczepan Styranowski was a judge. He retired in May 1991. The amount of his pension was calculated by the Social Security Board. On 17 December 1991 he appealed against a decision of the Social Security Board reducing his pension. His case was dismissed by the Regional Court on 16 January 1996. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (10–5) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr I Foighel, Mr AB Baka, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr E Levits, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P Van Dijk, Mr M Voicu.

The period to be taken into consideration began not on 17 December 1991, when the applicant filed a compensation claim with the Olsztyn District Court, but on 1 May 1993, when the declaration whereby Poland recognised the right of individual petition for the purposes of A 25 took effect. The period ended on 16 January 1996 when the Regional Court dismissed the applicant's appeal. In determining the reasonableness of the length of time in question, regard had to be had to the state of the case on 1 May 1993. The proceedings lasted four years and one month, out of which two years, eight months and 16 days were taken into consideration by the Court. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in its case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities, and the importance of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation. Even though the case involved a measure of procedural complexity on account of the need to transfer the case between different courts, it could not be said that that in itself justified the length of the compensation proceedings. Neither could the nature of the substantive issues raised by the applicant's claim justify the length of the proceedings. The applicant's conduct did not contribute to the length of the proceedings; he had behaved in a diligent manner and on several occasions requested that the proceedings in his case be expedited. It took over four years to decide the compensation claim arising from the reduction of the applicant's pension. There were two periods of inactivity which resulted in delays in the proceedings lasting respectively seven months and six days and almost eight months. As no explanation had been provided for those periods of inactivity, the delays had to be attributed to the national authorities. The compensation proceedings originated from and were based on the reduction of the applicant's pension. Therefore, in view of his age, the proceedings were of undeniable importance for him. Accordingly, what was at stake for the applicant called for an expeditious decision on his claim. There was an unreasonable delay in dealing with the applicant's case and there had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1) in that the applicant's civil right was not determined within a reasonable time.

Sunday Times v United Kingdom (1979–80) 2 EHRR 245 79/1

As a result of the severe deformities suffered by children of women who had taken the Distillers Company drug known as thalidomide, prescribed as a sedative during pregnancy, legal proceedings were commenced. Reports concerning the deformed children had appeared regularly in The Sunday Times since 1967, and in 1968 it criticised the settlements concluded in that year. The newspaper announced that in a future article it would trace how the tragedy occurred. On 17 November 1972, the High Court granted the Attorney-General's application for an injunction restraining publication of the future article on the ground that it would constitute contempt of court. Following an appeal, the injunction was discharged by the Court of Appeal on 16 February 1973, but restored in modified form on 24 August 1973 following the House of Lords' decision of 18 July allowing a further appeal by the Attorney-General. The injunction was discharged on 23 June 1976 and four days later, the contentious article was published. The applicants claimed that the injunction to restrain them from publishing an article in The Sunday Times dealing with thalidomide children and the settlement of their compensation claims in the United Kingdom constituted a breach of A 10.

There was an interference by public authority in the exercise of the applicants' freedom of expression. Such an interference entailed a violation of A 10 if it did not fall within one of the exceptions provided for in A 10(2). The word 'law' in the expression 'prescribed by law' covered not only statute, but also unwritten law. The requirements were first that the law had to be adequately accessible: the citizen had to be able to have an indication that was adequate in the circumstances of the legal rules applicable to a given case. Secondly, a norm could not be regarded as a 'law' unless it was formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct: he had to be able – if need be with appropriate advice – to foresee, to a degree that was reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action might entail. The applicants were not without an indication that was adequate in the circumstances of the existence of the principles at issue. Even if there were doubts concerning the precision with which that principle was formulated at the relevant time, the applicants were able to foresee, to a degree that was reasonable in the circumstances, a risk that publication of the draft article might fall foul of the principle. The interference with the applicants' freedom of expression was thus prescribed by law within the meaning of A 10(2). The interference with the applicants' freedom of expression had the aim of maintaining the authority of the judiciary, an aim that was legitimate under A 10(2). A 10(2) left Contracting States a margin of appreciation but did not give them unlimited power of appreciation. The task of the Court was not to take the place of the competent national courts but rather to review under A 10 the decisions they delivered in the exercise of their power of appreciation. The article was couched in moderate terms and presented both sides of the argument. The effect of the article, if published, would have varied from reader to reader. Accordingly, even to the extent that the article might have led some readers to form an opinion on the negligence issue, that would not have had adverse consequences for the authority of the judiciary, especially since there had been a nationwide campaign in the meantime. The injunction had been discharged in 1976 when there were still outstanding not only some of the parents' actions but also an action between Distillers and their insurers involving the issue of negligence. The thalidomide disaster was a matter of undisputed public concern. A 10 guaranteed not only the freedom of the press to inform the public, but also the right of the public to be properly informed. The families of numerous victims of the tragedy, who were unaware of the legal difficulties involved, had a vital interest in knowing all the underlying facts and the various possible solutions. It was artificial to attempt to divide the 'wider issues' and the negligence issue. The question of where responsibility for such a tragedy lay was also a matter of public interest. The facts did not cease to be a matter of public interest merely because they formed the background to pending litigation. By bringing to light certain facts, the article might have served as a brake on speculative and unenlightened discussion. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the interference complained of did not correspond to a social need sufficiently pressing to outweigh the public interest in freedom of expression. The reasons for the restraint imposed on the applicants were not sufficient under A 10(2). That restraint proved not to be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued; it was not necessary in a democratic society for maintaining the authority of the judiciary. There had accordingly been a violation of A 10.

A 14 safeguarded those placed in comparable situations, from all discrimination in the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms in the Convention and Protocols. The fact that no steps were taken against other newspapers was not sufficient evidence that the injunction granted against the applicant newspaper constituted discrimination contrary to A 14. With regard to the debates in Parliament, the press and parliamentarians could not be considered to be placed in comparable situations since their respective duties and responsibilities were essentially different. Furthermore, the parliamentary debate of 29 November 1972 did not cover exactly the same ground as the proposed Sunday Times article. There had therefore been no violation of A 14 taken together with A 10.

The applicant did not maintain the claim under A 18 before the Court which accepted the Commission's opinion that there had been no breach of A 18 taken in conjunction with A 10 and did not consider that it was necessary for it to examine that question.

[Application lodged 31.7.1987; Commission report 12.7.1990; Court Judgment 26.11.1991]

The applicant newspapers published some details of a book, Spycatcher, by Mr Peter Wright. The book concerned the memoirs of the author, a former M15 (security service) member. Injunctions were granted in June 1986 to prevent further publication. On 27 April 1987, The Independent newspaper published a summary of the Spycatcher allegations. The Court of Appeal considered the injunction binding on all British media. On 12 July 1987, The Sunday Times began serialisation of the book. On 30 July 1987, the House of Lords held the injunctions should continue. The book was published in the USA in July 1987 and subsequently in Australia in October 1987 following unsuccessful proceedings by the Attorney General.

The interference (interlocutory injunction) was prescribed by law with legitimate aims under A 10(2) of maintaining the authority of the judiciary, including protecting national security. Regarding the period 30 July 1987 to 13 October 1988, the book had been published in the US and the material was no longer confidential. The further aim of preserving confidence in the Security Service was not sufficient to justify continued interference or legitimately used to punish Mr Wright and set an example to others. The continuation of the interference prevented newspapers exercising their right and duty to provide information of legitimate public concern which was already available and so V 10 during that period.

Regarding discrimination, foreign newspapers were subject to the same restrictions as the Observer and Guardian and so there was no difference in treatment.

Regarding A 13, the effectiveness of a remedy did not depend on the certainty of the outcome. There was no obligation to incorporate the Convention in to domestic law. A 13 did not guarantee a remedy allowing the State's law to be challenged before national authorities on the grounds of being contrary to the Convention.

Sur v Turkey 97/75

[Application lodged 15.3.1993; Commission report 3.9.1996; Court Judgment 3.10.1997]

Mr Abdullah Sur worked in a jeweller's shop in Istanbul. It was alleged that, when asked by a customer to melt down some pieces of gold, he had added some copper to the gold he had been given, thus devaluing it. Following a complaint by the customer concerned, the applicant was arrested and taken into police custody at the security police headquarters. He lodged a complaint with the Istanbul public prosecutor against the police officers who had questioned him during his detention in police custody. He accused them of ill-treating him in order to extract a confession. He asserted in particular that he had been blindfolded for part of the time, that he had been beaten with sticks and fists and that electric shocks had been administered to his hands, feet and testicles. The public prosecutor, having noted that the applicant had not been able to identify the police officers who had allegedly inflicted the ill-treatment, ordered the discontinuation of the proceedings. The applicant complained of the ill-treatment inflicted by police officers while he was in police custody and of the fact that he had not had an effective remedy, in that the public prosecutor dealing with his complaint against those officers had discontinued the proceedings against them.

Mr Kamil Tekin Sürek was the major shareholder in a Turkish company which owned a weekly review, entitled The Truth of News and Comments, published in Istanbul.

Sürek (No 1)

Issue No 23 dated 30 August 1992 contained two readers' articles, entitled 'Weapons cannot win against freedom' and 'It is our fault'. On 12 April 1993, the Istanbul National Security Court found the applicant guilty in his capacity as the owner of the review of disseminating propaganda against the indivisibility of the State. On 12 April 1994 he was fined TRL 83,333,333. His subsequent appeals were dismissed.

The issue dated 26 April 1992 contained a news report providing information given at a press conference by a delegation which included two former Turkish parliamentarians – Lord Avebury and a member of the Anglican Church – on its visit to Sirnak village, in the wake of tensions in the area. The news report included an article reporting the Governor of the village as having told the delegation that the Chief of Police had given an order to open fire on the people. It also produced a dialogue between the parliamentarians and a Gendarme Commander. On 2 September 1993 the National Security Court convicted the applicant as the owner of the review, with revealing the identity of officials mandated to fight terrorism and thus rendering them terrorist targets . He was fined TRL 54,000,000.

Scope of the case (Sürek (No 1)): the applicant's complaint of the unreasonableness of the length of the criminal proceedings had been declared inadmissible by the Commission and could not therefore be considered to be within the scope of the case before the Court.

A 10: there had been an interference with the applicants' right to freedom of expression on account of their conviction and sentence. The convictions were based on the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1991 and prescribed by law. The measures taken against the applicants could be said to have been in furtherance of certain of the aims of the protection of national security and territorial integrity and the prevention of disorder and crime.

In Sürek (No 1), the words used contained a clear intention to stigmatise the other side to the conflict. The impugned letters amounted to an appeal to bloody revenge by stirring up base emotions and hardening already embedded prejudices which had manifested themselves in deadly violence. Furthermore, it was to be noted that the letters were published in the context of the security situation in south-east Turkey. In such a context the content of the letters had to be seen as capable of incitement to further violence in the region by instilling a deep-seated and irrational hatred against those depicted as responsible for the alleged atrocities. In Sürek (No 3), the nature of the article and the context in which it was published had to be seen as capable of incitement to further violence in the region. The reasons given by the authorities for the applicant's conviction with their emphasis on the destruction of the territorial integrity of the State were both relevant and sufficient to ground an interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression. The mere fact that information or ideas offended, shocked or disturbed did not suffice to justify that. What was in issue in the instant case, however, was hate speech and the glorification of violence. Although the applicant did not personally associate himself with the views contained in the letters, he nevertheless provided their writers with an outlet for stirring up violence and hatred. He was an owner and as such had the power to shape the editorial direction of the review. For that reason, he was vicariously subject to the 'duties and responsibilities' which the review's editorial and journalistic staff undertook in the collection and dissemination of information to the public and which assumed an even greater importance in situations of conflict and tension. Therefore the penalty imposed on the applicant as the owner of the review could reasonably be regarded as answering a pressing social need and the reasons adduced by the authorities for the applicant's conviction were relevant and sufficient. The applicant first received a relatively modest fine which was later halved. The nature and severity of the penalty imposed were factors to be taken into account when assessing the proportionality of the interference. Having regard to the margin of appreciation which national authorities had in such a case, the interference at issue was proportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. There had consequently been no breach of A 10 in the circumstances of the case.

In Sürek (No 2), the wording of the statements clearly implied serious misconduct on the part of the police and gendarme officers in question. Although the statements were not presented in a manner which could be regarded as incitement to violence against the officers concerned or the authorities, they were capable of exposing the officers to strong public contempt. The news report was published in the context of the security situation in south-east Turkey. Therefore the applicant's conviction and sentence were supported by reasons which were relevant for the purposes of the necessity test under A 10(2). With regard to whether the reasons relied on could also be considered sufficient, the contested interference related to journalistic reporting of statements made by certain politicians to the press concerning their visit to an area of Turkey where tensions had occurred. Assuming that the assertions were true, in view of the seriousness of the misconduct in question, the public had a legitimate interest in knowing not only the nature of the conduct but also the identity of the officers. However, the defences of truth and public interest could not have been pleaded under the relevant Turkish law. The press declaration on which the news report was based had already been reported in other newspapers and the incriminated news coverage added nothing to those reports; the information was already in the public domain. Thus, the interest in protecting the identity of the officers concerned had been substantially diminished and the potential damage which the restriction was aimed at preventing had already been done. The conviction and sentence were capable of discouraging the contribution of the press to open discussion on matters of public concern. Therefore the objective of the Government in protecting the officers in question against terrorist attack was not sufficient to justify the restrictions placed on the applicant's right to freedom of expression under A 10 of the Convention. In the absence of a fair balance between the interests in protecting the freedom of the press and those in protecting the identity of the public officials in question, the interference complained of was disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. There had therefore been a breach of A 10 in the case of Sürek (No 2).

In Sürek (No 4), the incriminated news commentary could be interpreted as describing an awakening of Kurdish sentiment but was not an appeal to violence. The interview contained hard-hitting criticism of the Turkish authorities but that was more a reflection of the hardened attitude of one side to the conflict, rather than a call to violence. The Court had regard to the sensitivities in the region. However, the domestic authorities failed to have sufficient regard to the public's right to be informed of a different perspective on the situation in south-east Turkey, irrespective of how unpalatable that perspective may be for them. The reasons given by the Istanbul National Security Court for convicting and sentencing the applicant, although relevant, could not be considered sufficient to justify the interference with his right to freedom of expression. The nature and severity of the penalty imposed were factors to be taken into account when assessing the proportionality of the interference. The conviction and sentencing of the applicant were disproportionate to the aims pursued and therefore not necessary in a democratic society. There had accordingly been a violation of A 10.

Preliminary objection in Sürek (Nos 2 and 4): the Government did not raise the objection of non-exhaustion regarding A 6 before the Commission and was therefore estopped from raising their objection before the Court.

A 6(1): the Court recalled its previous case-law in which it had found that applicant's fears as to the Istanbul National Security Court's lack of independence and impartiality could be regarded as objectively justified. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation were not able to dispel those fears since that court did not have full jurisdiction. Therefore there had been a breach of A 6(1).

Sürek (No 1): finding of a violation of A 6(1) constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the non-pecuniary damage alleged by the applicant. Costs and expenses (FF 10,000).

Sürek (No 2): pecuniary damage (FF 13,000), non-pecuniary damage (FF 30,000), costs and expenses (FF 15,000).

Sürek (No 3): finding of a violation of A 6(1) constituted just satisfaction for the non-pecuniary damage alleged by the applicant. Costs and expenses (FF 15,000).

Sürek (No 4): pecuniary damage (FF 3,000), non-pecuniary damage (FF 30,000), costs and expenses (FF 15,000).

Sürek and Özdemir v Turkey 99/37

[Applications lodged 25.2.1994, 4.5.1994; Commission report 13.1.1998; Court Judgment 8.7.1999]

Mr Kamil Tekin Sürek was the major shareholder in a Turkish company which owned a weekly review entitled The Truth of News and Comments published in Istanbul. Mr Yücel Özdemir was the editor-in-chief of the review. In the 31 May 1992 and 7 June 1992 issues of the review, an interview with a leader of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), an illegal organisation, was published in two parts. In the edition of 31 May 1992 a joint declaration by four socialist organisations was published. Copies of the review were seized and the applicants were arrested and charged. On 27 May 1993 the Istanbul National Security Court found the applicants guilty of disseminating propaganda against the indivisibility of the State and sentenced the first applicant to fines totalling TRL 300,000,000 and the second applicant to six months' imprisonment fines totalling TRL 150,000,000. The Court of Cassation dismissed their appeals. They complained that their convictions resulting from the publication of material in his periodical unjustifiably interfered with their right to freedom of expression and that they had not received a fair hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal. The second applicant also alleged that, contrary to A 18, the restrictions imposed on his right to freedom of expression were inconsistent with the legitimate aims set out in A 10(2).

Comm found by majority (17–15) V 10, unanimously no separate issue regarding second applicant's complaint under A 18, by majority (31–1) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (11–6) V 10, unanimously not necessary to examine the second applicant's complaint under A 18, unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection under A 6(1), by majority (16–1) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber (declaration/jpd), President, Mrs E Palm (jc), Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello (c), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris (jpd), Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jc), Mrs V Stráznická (jpd), Mr M Fischbach (jc), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jc), Mrs HS Greve (jc), Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mr K Traja, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), ad hoc judge.

There had been an interference with the applicants' right to freedom of expression on account of their conviction and sentence. The convictions were based on the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1991 and prescribed by law. The measures taken against the applicants could be said to have been in furtherance of certain of the aims of the protection of national security and territorial integrity and the prevention of disorder and crime. The fact that the impugned interviews were given by a leading member of a proscribed organisation could not in itself justify an interference with the applicants' right to freedom of expression; equally so the fact that the interviews contained hard-hitting criticism of official policy and communicated a one-sided view of the origin of and responsibility for the disturbances in south-east Turkey. While it was clear from the words used in the interviews that the message was one of intransigence and a refusal to compromise with the authorities as long as the objectives of the PKK had not been secured, the texts taken as a whole could not be considered to incite to violence or hatred. The Court had regard to the sensitivity of the region. However, it appeared that the domestic authorities in the instant case failed to have sufficient regard to the public's right to be informed of a different perspective on the situation in south-east Turkey, irrespective of how unpalatable that perspective may be for them. The reasons given by the Istanbul National Security Court for convicting and sentencing the applicants, although relevant, could not be considered sufficient for justifying the interferences with their right to freedom of expression. The nature and severity of the penalties imposed were factors to be taken into account when assessing the proportionality of the interference. The duties and responsibilities which accompanied the exercise of the right to freedom of expression by media professionals assumed special significance in situations of conflict and tension. Particular caution was called for when consideration was being given to the publication of the views of representatives of organisations which resorted to violence against the State lest the media become a vehicle for the dissemination of hate speech and the promotion of violence. At the same time, where such views could not be categorised as such, Contracting States could not with reference to the protection of territorial integrity or national security or the prevention of crime or disorder restrict the right of the public to be informed of them by bringing the weight of the criminal law to bear on the media. Therefore the conviction and sentencing of the applicants were disproportionate to the aims pursued and therefore not necessary in a democratic society. There had accordingly been a violation of A 10.

The second applicant did not pursue the complaint under A 18 in the proceedings before the Court which did not propose to examine the complaint of its own motion.

The Government did not raise the objection of non-exhaustion regarding A 6 before the Commission and were therefore estopped from raising their objection before the Court.

The Court recalled its previous case-law in which it had found that applicant's fears as to the Istanbul National Security Court's lack of independence and impartiality could be regarded as objectively justified. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation were not able to dispel those fears since that court did not have full jurisdiction. Therefore there had been a breach of A 6(1).

Pecuniary damage (FF 8,000 to Mr Sürek), non-pecuniary damage (FF 30,000 to each applicant), costs and expenses (FF 15,000 to each applicant).

Süßmann v Germany (1998) 25 EHRR 64 96/33

[Application lodged 21.5.1992; Commission report 12.4.1995; Court Judgment 16.9.1996]

Mr Gerhard Süßmann worked as a physicist in research institutes whose remuneration and pension system was the same as that of the civil service. He retired in 1980. Following amendment to the Supplementary Pensions Fund which administered the supplementary old-age pensions scheme, the Federal Court gave judgment in a series of test cases. The applicant appealed to the Arbitration Tribunal of the Supplementary Pensions Fund, challenging, inter alia, the legality of the amendments made to the rules governing the pension scheme. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously A 6(1) applicable, by majority (14–6) NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr L-E Pettiti (jpd), Mr R Macdonald, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel (pd), Mr R Pekkanen, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (pd), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek (pd), Mr K Jungwiert, Mr U Lôhmus (jpd), Mr J Casadevall (pd).

The scope of the case was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility, the Court had no jurisdiction to revive issues declared inadmissible. Nor could the Court take cognisance of matters not raised before the Commission.

The Court recalled its case-law. The relevant test in determining whether Constitutional Court proceedings may be taken into account in assessing the reasonableness of the length of proceedings was whether the result of the Constitutional Court proceedings was capable of affecting the outcome of the dispute before the ordinary courts. The Court reviewed the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court. The dispute as to the amount of the applicant's pension entitlement was of a pecuniary nature and concerned a civil right within the meaning of A 6. The Federal Constitutional Court proceedings were directly decisive for a dispute over the applicant's civil right. A 6(1) was applicable.

The Court was concerned only with the length of the proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court. The relevant period began on 11 July 1988, the date on which the applicant appealed to the Federal Constitutional Court, and ended on 5 December 1991, the date on which the decision was notified to him. It therefore lasted three years, four months and three weeks. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the complexity of the case, the conduct of the parties and of the authorities, and the importance of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation. The case was one of some complexity. The applicant's conduct did not cause any delay in the proceedings. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements, including the obligation to hear cases within a reasonable time. While A 6 required that judicial proceedings be expeditious, it also lay emphasis on the more general principle of the proper administration of justice. In view of the importance of the decision taken by the German Federal Constitutional Court in the present case, the impact of which extended far beyond the individual application before it, that principle was of special relevance here. Bearing in mind the unique political context of German reunification and the serious social implications of the disputes which concerned termination of employment contracts, the Federal Constitutional Court was entitled to decide that it should give priority to those cases. The applicant's supplementary pension had been reduced and, in view of his age, the proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court were of undeniable importance for him. However, the amendments to the supplementary pensions scheme did not cause prejudice to him to such an extent as to impose on the court concerned a duty to deal with his case as a matter of very great urgency, as was true of certain types of litigation. Therefore a reasonable time was not exceeded and there had accordingly been no breach of A 6(1) on this point.

Sutter v Switzerland (1984) 6 EHRR 272 84/2

[Application lodged 17.4.1978; Commission report 10.10.1981; Court Judgment 22.2.1984]

Mr Peter Sutter was a student. During refresher courses organised in 1974 and 1975 as part of ordinary military obligations, he was subjected to five and seven days' strict arrest for refusing to comply with the service regulations relating to haircuts. In November 1976, following further refusal, he was charged with repeated insubordination and failure to observe service regulations. On 16 May 1977, at the close of a public hearing, Divisional Court delivered in public a judgment sentencing the applicant to 10 days' imprisonment for the two offences. He appealed to the Military Court of Cassation. He complained that the Military Court of Cassation had dismissed his appeal without previously holding a public hearing and had not pronounced its judgment of 21 October 1977 publicly.

Comm found by majority (10–8) NV 6(1).

Court found unanimously NV 6(1) regarding the absence of public hearings before the Military Court of Cassation, by majority (11–4) NV 6(1) regarding the absence of public pronouncement of that Court's judgment.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona (d), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr W Ganshof van der Meersch (d/supplementary observations), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (jc), Mr L Liesch, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (jc), Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (d), Mr R Macdonald (d), Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt (c), Mr J Gersing.

The public character of proceedings before the judicial bodies referred to in A 6(1) protected litigants against the administration of justice in secret with no public scrutiny; it was also one of the means whereby confidence in the courts, superior and inferior, could be maintained. By rendering the administration of justice visible, publicity contributed to the achievement of the aim of A 6(1), namely a fair trial. Account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings conducted in the domestic legal order; what had to be determined was whether, in the present instance, the proceedings before the Military Court of Cassation had, like those before the Divisional Court, to be accompanied by each of the guarantees laid down in A 6(1). The proceedings before the Military Court of Cassation were conducted in writing. The court received only a memorial filed by the applicant, since the grand juge, the Military Prosecutor and the Chief Military Prosecutor had confined themselves, without giving reasons, to submitting that the appeal should be dismissed. The Court of Cassation did not rule on the merits of the case, as regards either the question of guilt or the sanction imposed by the Divisional Court. It dismissed the applicant's appeal in a judgment that was devoted solely to the interpretation of the legal provisions concerned. There was therefore nothing to suggest that his trial before the Military Court of Cassation was less fair than his trial before the Divisional Court, the latter trial having fulfilled the requirements of A 6. In the particular circumstances of the case, oral argument during a public hearing before the Court of Cassation would not have provided any further guarantee of the fundamental principles underlying A 6. Accordingly, the absence of public hearings at the cassation stage did not infringe A 6(1).

The judgment delivered on 21 October 1977 by the Military Court of Cassation was served on the parties but not pronounced in open court. The form of publicity given to the judgment under the domestic law of the respondent State had to be assessed in the light of the special features of the proceedings in question and by reference to the object and purpose of A 6(1). Anyone who could establish an interest could consult or obtain a copy of the full text of judgments of the Military Court of Cassation; important judgments, were subsequently published in an official collection. Its jurisprudence was therefore to a certain extent open to public scrutiny. Having regard to the issues dealt with by the Military Court of Cassation in the instant case and to its decision – which made the judgment of the Divisional Court final and changed nothing in respect of its consequences for the applicant – a literal interpretation of the terms of A 6(1), concerning pronouncement of the judgment, appeared to be too rigid and not necessary for achieving the aims of A 6. The Convention did not require the reading out aloud of the judgment delivered at the final stage of the proceedings.

Swedish Engine Drivers' Union (1979–80) 1 EHRR 617 76/1

[Application lodged 6.7.1972; Commission report 27.5.1974; Court Judgment 6.2.1976]

The Swedish Engine Drivers' Union was an independent trade union open to certain employees of the Swedish State Railways. Its membership comprised between 20% to 25% of the eligible railway personnel, the majority of whom – 75% to 80% – belonged to the Railwaymen's Section of the State Employees' Union, one of the three principal federations of Swedish State employees. It complained that the Swedish National Collective Bargaining Office concluded collective agreements on terms of employment and conditions of work only with the said federations, thus resulting in disadvantages of the applicant union.

Comm found unanimously NV 11, NV 14+11, NV 13.

Court found unanimously NV 11, NV 14+11, NV 13.

Judges: Mr G Balladore Pallieri, President, Mr H Mosler, Mr J Cremona, Mr G Wiarda, Mr P O'Donoghue, Mrs H Pedersen, Mr S Petren.

The Convention nowhere made an express distinction between the functions of a Contracting State as holder of public power and its responsibilities as employer. A 11 was accordingly binding upon the State as employer, whether the latter's relations with its employees were governed by public or private law. While A 11(1) presented trade union freedom as one form or a special aspect of freedom of association, the Article did not secure any particular treatment of trade unions, or their members, by the State, such as the right that the State should conclude any given collective agreement with them. It was not an element necessarily inherent in a right guaranteed by the Convention. The phrase 'for the protection of his interests' showed that the Convention safeguarded freedom to protect the occupational interests of trade union members by trade union action, the conduct and development of which the Contracting States had to both permit and make possible. It followed that the members of a trade union had a right, in order to protect their interests, that the trade union should be heard. While the concluding of collective agreements was one of those means, there were others. The applicant union could engage in various kinds of activity vis-à-vis the Government. The employees in question retained the freedom, as of right, to join or remain members of the Union. There was no infringement of a right guaranteed by A 11(1) and therefore the Court was not called upon to have regard to A 11(2).

The applicant union complains in the first place of the Office declining to enter into collective agreements with it despite frequently doing so with the large trade union federations. That policy on the part of the Office unquestionably resulted in several inequalities of treatment to the prejudice of the independent unions such as the applicant. The explanation of the policy was in the high degree of centralisation achieved within the Swedish trade union movement. In consequence of that state of affairs, the Office preferred as a general rule to sign collective agreements only with the most representative organisations and not to be faced with an excessive number of negotiating partners, in order to avoid dissipating its efforts and to arrive more easily at a concrete result. That aim was legitimate and there was no reason to think that the Swedish State had other and ill-intentioned designs in the matter. Furthermore, the principle of proportionality was not offended.

Swedish legislation offered the applicant union a remedy of which, moreover, the union had availed itself, namely the institution of proceedings before the Labour Court. The fact that the applicant's claim was rejected could not alone establish that the remedy was ineffective. The Labour Court carefully examined the complaints brought before it in the light of the legislation in force and not without taking into account Sweden's international undertakings. In addition, neither A 13 nor the Convention in general lay down for the Contracting States any given manner for ensuring within their internal law the effective implementation of any of the provisions of the Convention.

Szücs v Austria 97/86

[Application lodged 24.8.1992; Commission report 3.9.1996; Court Judgment 24.11.1997]

Mr Zoltan Szücs, a Hungarian national, was arrested on 25 February 1991 as he was entering Austria on suspicion of having made fraudulent use of another person's credit card when making purchases in various shops in Austria. He was detained pending trial. On 11 May 1991 proceedings were discontinued in the light of a graphologist's finding that it was unlikely that the signatures on the payment slips for the purchases made with the stolen credit card were in the applicant's hand. He was released. On 6 May 1991 the applicant sought compensation from the State for the pecuniary damage sustained on account of his detention. The Regional Court refused his compensation claim and on 27 May 1991 he appealed against that decision to the Vienna Court of Appeal. On 9 January 1992 the Court of Appeal dismissed his claim. He complained that the Austrian courts had not pronounced judgment publicly.

Comm found by majority (27–2) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1) on account of the failure to pronounce the judgments in those proceedings publicly.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (c), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr B Repik.

The applicant had the right to be compensated for his detention pending trial, provided that the statutory requirements had been satisfied. There had therefore been a dispute over a right. The outcome of the proceedings in the relevant criminal courts were directly decisive for his right. The applicant's right to compensation was a civil one. Accordingly, A 6(1) was applicable to the proceedings in issue.

The Government did not raise the issue of the reservation in their memorial to the Court and were therefore estopped from raising the question whether the complaint was covered by the relevant reservation and it was unnecessary for the Court to consider it of its own motion.

The holding of court hearings in public constituted a fundamental principle enshrined in A 6(1). That public character protected litigants against the administration of justice in secret with no public scrutiny; it was also one of the means whereby confidence in the courts could be maintained. A third party could be given leave to inspect the files and obtain copies of the judgments they contained if he showed a legitimate interest. Such leave was, however, granted only at the discretion of the relevant courts, so that the full texts of the judgments were not made available to everyone. In Austria the possibility of obtaining the full texts of judgments from the court registry existed only in respect of judgments of the Supreme Court, the Administrative Court and the Constitutional Court and not in respect of the judgments and decisions of courts of appeal or first instance. The Government's argument as to maintaining the presumption of the applicant's innocence could not succeed. It was not necessary for the relevant courts, in the course of proceedings brought under the Compensation (Criminal Proceedings) Act, to make statements which would breach the principle of presumption of innocence. However, it might be of importance to the person concerned that the fact that suspicion concerning him has been dispelled should be brought to the knowledge of the public. That being so, in view of the fact that no judicial decision in the two sets of proceedings complained of was pronounced publicly and that publicity was not sufficiently ensured by other means, there had been a breach of A 6(1) in this respect.

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage sustained. Costs and expenses (ATS 98,501.50).

T

T v Italy 92/63

[Application lodged 1.4.1988; Commission report 4.7.1991; Court Judgment 12.10.1992]

On 19 May 1982, Mr T's daughter, aged 14, lodged a complaint with the Genoa public prosecutor's office, which opened an investigation concerning T in connection with an alleged rape. On 15 February 1983 it sent to him in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, a 'judicial notification' advising him that proceedings had been instituted and inviting him to provide an address for service in Italy. The applicant claimed that he did not receive the notification in question because on 13 February he had left Jeddah, where he had worked for a time, for Khartoum, Sudan. He had, moreover, visited the Italian Embassy there to report his change of address. The investigating judge declared the applicant untraceable and designated a lawyer to act for him. Thereafter all the documents which were to be notified to the applicant were lodged with the registry, his lawyer being informed thereof on each occasion. On 9 October 1984 the Genoa District Court convicted Mr T in absentia and sentenced him to seven years' imprisonment, to be stripped of his civic rights and to accessory penalties. The officially appointed lawyer appealed. On 1 October 1986 the Genoa Court of Appeal upheld the contested judgment. On 4 March 1987 the Genoa public prosecutor's office issued a warrant for Mr T's arrest. On 20 August he was arrested in Copenhagen, on the premises of the Italian Embassy, and extradited on 29 October. He lodged an objection to the execution of the warrant which was dismissed by the Genoa District Court on 17 December. A further appeal to the Court of Cassation was rejected. He complained of his trial in absentia.

The requirements of A 6(3) were specific aspects of the right to a fair trial guaranteed under A 6(1) and therefore the complaint would be examined from the point of view of A 6(1). Although not expressly mentioned in A 6(1), the object and purpose of the article taken as a whole showed that a person charged with a criminal offence was entitled to take part in the hearing. Mr T denied having received the 'judicial notification' of 15 February 1983. At the time he had already left Saudi Arabia to take up residence in Khartoum. He had learned indirectly that criminal proceedings had been instituted against him. To inform someone of a prosecution brought against him was, however, a legal act of such importance that it had to be carried out in accordance with procedural and substantive requirements capable of guaranteeing the effective exercise of the accused's rights. Vague and informal knowledge could not suffice. During the investigation and then in the course of the trial proceedings, the police made fresh inquiries in order to discover Mr T's whereabouts, but those efforts were limited to the latter's address in Italy. Yet from the outset it was clear that the applicant was living abroad; indeed, he had had his passport renewed by the Italian consulate in Khartoum on 8 February 1984. Notwithstanding that, the Italian judicial authorities declared him untraceable and then convicted and sentenced him without having ordered more thorough investigations. It was difficult to reconcile that situation with the diligence which the Contracting States had to exercise to ensure the effective enjoyment of the rights guaranteed under A 6. Mr T did not receive a fair trial. As the legislation in force at the time did not afford him any means of redress in that respect, there was a violation of A 6(1).

Present judgment constituted just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage.

T v United Kingdom 99/121

[Application lodged 20.5.1994; Commission report 4.12.1998; Court Judgment 16.12.1999]

The applicant was born in August 1982. On 12 February 1993, when he was 10 years old, he and another 10-year-old boy, V had played truant from school and abducted a two-year-old boy from a shopping precinct, taken him on a journey of over two miles and then battered him to death and left him on a railway line to be run over. The applicant and V were arrested in February 1993 and detained pending trial. Their trial took place over three weeks in November 1993, in public, at an adult Crown Court before a judge and 12 jurors. Following their conviction for murder, the judge sentenced them, as required by law, to detention during Her Majesty's pleasure. There had to be set a tariff to satisfy the requirements of retribution and deterrence. The trial judge set the tariff at 8 years. The Home Secretary set the tariff at 15 years in respect of each applicant. That decision was quashed in judicial review proceedings by the House of Lords on 12 June 1997. The applicant complained that, in view of his young age, his trial in public in an adult Crown Court and the punitive nature of his sentence constituted violations of his right not to be subjected to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment as guaranteed under A 3. He further complained that he had been denied a fair trial in breach of A 6 of the Convention, that he had suffered discrimination in breach of A 14 in that a child aged younger than 10 at the time of the alleged offence would not have been held criminally responsible, that the sentence imposed on him of detention during Her Majesty's pleasure amounted to a breach of his right to liberty under A 5, and the fact that a government minister, rather than a judge, was responsible for setting the tariff violated his rights under A 6. Finally, he complained under A 5(4) of the Convention that he had not had the opportunity to have the continuing lawfulness of his detention examined by a judicial body, such as the Parole Board.

Comm found by majority (17–2) NV 3 in respect of the trial, (14–5) V 6 in respect of the trial, (15–4) no separate issue under 14 in respect of the trial, (17–2) NV 3 or 5(1) in respect of the sentence, (18–1) V 6 in respect of the fixing of the sentence, (18–1) V 5(4).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (12–5) NV 3 in respect of trial, (16–1) V 6(1) in respect of the trial, unanimously not necessary to examine 6(1)+14, (10–7) NV 3 in respect of sentence, unanimously NV 5(1), V 6(1) in respect of the setting of the applicant's tariff, V 5(4).

The Government had not discharged the burden upon them of proving the availability to the applicant of a remedy capable of providing redress in respect of his Convention complaints and offering reasonable prospects of success. Therefore the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was dismissed.

The attribution of criminal responsibility to the applicants in respect of acts committed at the age of 10 did not in itself give rise to a breach of A 3 of the Convention. The criminal proceedings took place over three weeks in public in an adult Crown Court with attendant formality. The Court was not convinced that the particular features of the trial process as applied to the applicant caused, to a significant degree, suffering going beyond that which would inevitably have been engendered by any attempt by the authorities to deal with the applicant following the commission by him of the offence in question. The applicant's trial did not give rise to a violation of A 3 of the Convention.

A 6: it was essential that a child charged with an offence was dealt with in a manner which took full account of his age, level of maturity and intellectual and emotional capacities, and that steps were taken to promote his ability to understand and participate in the proceedings. In respect of a young child charged with a grave offence attracting high levels of media and public interest, it would be necessary to conduct the hearing in such a way as to reduce as far as possible his or her feelings of intimidation and inhibition, or, where appropriate in view of the age and other characteristics of the child and the circumstances surrounding the criminal proceedings, to provide a modified procedure of selected attendance rights and judicious reporting. The trial took place over three weeks in public in the Crown Court. Special measures were taken in view of the applicant's young age and to promote his understanding of the proceedings: for example, he had the trial procedure explained to him and was taken to see the courtroom in advance, and the hearing times were shortened so as not to tire the defendants excessively. Nonetheless, the formality and ritual of the Crown Court must at times have seemed incomprehensible and intimidating for a child of 11, and there was evidence that certain of the modifications to the courtroom, in particular the raised dock, which was designed to enable the defendants to see what was going on, had the effect of increasing the applicant's sense of discomfort during the trial, since he felt exposed to the scrutiny of the press and public. There was psychiatric evidence that the applicant was suffering from post-traumatic effects and found it very difficult and distressing to think or talk about the events in question, to concentrate during the trial or discuss the offence with his lawyers. In such circumstances it was not sufficient for the purposes of A 6(1) that the applicant was represented by skilled and experienced lawyers. Although his legal representatives were seated, as the Government put it, 'within whispering distance', it was highly unlikely that the applicant would have felt sufficiently uninhibited, in the tense courtroom and under public scrutiny, to have consulted with them during the trial or, indeed, that, given his immaturity and his disturbed emotional state, he would have been capable outside the courtroom of co-operating with his lawyers and giving them information for the purposes of his defence. The applicant was therefore unable to participate effectively in the criminal proceedings against him and was, in consequence, denied a fair hearing in breach of A 6(1).

The applicant did not maintain his complaint under 14+6 before the Court, which saw no reason of its own motion to examine it.

A 3 sentence: States had a duty under the Convention to take measures for the protection of the public from violent crime. The punitive element inherent in the tariff approach did not give rise to a breach of A 3 and the Convention did not prohibit States from subjecting a child or young person convicted of a serious crime to an indeterminate sentence allowing for the offender's continued detention or recall to detention following release where necessary for the protection of the public. Until a new tariff had been set, it was not possible to draw any conclusions regarding the length of punitive detention to be served by the applicant who had by now been detained for six years since his conviction in November 1993. In all the circumstances of the case including the applicant's age and his conditions of detention, a period of punitive detention of this length could not be said to amount to inhuman or degrading treatment. There had been no violation of A 3 in respect of the applicant's sentence.

The sentence of detention during Her Majesty's pleasure was lawful under English law and was imposed in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law. It could not be said that the applicant's detention was not in conformity with the purposes of the deprivation of liberty permitted by A 5(1)(a) so as to be arbitrary. There had been no violation of A 5(1).

A 6(1) covered the whole of the proceedings in issue, including appeal proceedings and the determination of sentence. The tariff was served to satisfy the requirements of retribution and deterrence, and thereafter it was legitimate to continue to detain the offender only if that appeared to be necessary for the protection of the public. Where a juvenile sentenced to detention during Her Majesty's pleasure was not perceived to be dangerous, the tariff represented the maximum period of detention which he could be required to serve. The fixing of the tariff amounted to a sentencing exercise and, accordingly, A 6(1) was applicable to the procedure. A 6(1) guaranteed, inter alia, a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal. Independent in this context meant independent of the parties to the case and also of the executive. The Home Secretary, who set the applicant's tariff, was not independent of the executive, and it followed that there had been a violation of A 6(1).

As the sentence of detention during Her Majesty's pleasure was indeterminate and the tariff was initially set by the Home Secretary rather than the sentencing judge, the judicial supervision required by A 5(4) was not incorporated in the trial court's sentence. The Home Secretary's decision setting the tariff was quashed by the House of Lords on 12 June 1997 and no new tariff had since been substituted. That failure to set a new tariff meant that the applicant's entitlement to access to a tribunal for periodic review of the continuing lawfulness of his detention remained inchoate. It followed that the applicant has been deprived, since his conviction in November 1993, of the opportunity to have the lawfulness of his detention reviewed by a judicial body in accordance with A 5(4).

TW v Malta (2000) 29 EHRR 185 99/19

[Application lodged 2.11.1994; Commission report 4.3.1998; Court Judgment 29.4.1999]

TW was a UK national residing in Malta, where he was a storekeeper. On Thursday 6 October 1994 he was arrested by the police. He was brought before a magistrate the following day. He pleaded not guilty to sexual offences of defiling his minor daughter and committing acts of violent assault on her. He applied for bail. His application was immediately sent to the Attorney-General, who opposed it. Another magistrate examined his bail application and refused it on 10 October 1994. On 20 October 1994 the second magistrate began hearing evidence and on 25 October 1994 he ordered the applicant's release on bail. On 8 May 1995 the Court of Magistrates convicted the applicant and gave him a two-year suspended prison sentence. On 8 January 1996 the Court of Criminal Appeal upheld the applicant's conviction. He complained that he had not been brought promptly before a judge who had the power to order his release, that there was no remedy whereby the lawfulness of his arrest or detention could be challenged speedily.

Commission found unanimously V 5(3), NV 5(4).

Court unanimously joined to the merits the Government's preliminary objection and dismissed it, found V 5(3) not necessary to examine A 5(4).

Judges; Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Bonello (pd A 41), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr R Tümen, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jpd A41) Mrs V Stráznická, Mr Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jpd A 41), Mrs HS Greve, Mr A Baka, Mrs S Botoucharova.

In so far as the Government's argument was that the applicant could have invoked particular sections of the Criminal Code, that was an argument going directly to the issue of compliance with that provision. Accordingly, the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was joined to the merits.

As the Court had pointed out on many occasions, A 5(3) provided persons arrested or detained on suspicion of having committed a criminal offence with a guarantee against any arbitrary or unjustified deprivation of liberty. The fact that an arrested person had access to a judicial authority was not sufficient to constitute compliance with the opening part of A 5(3). This provision enjoined the judicial officer before whom the arrested person appeared to review the circumstances militating for or against detention, to decide by reference to legal criteria whether there were reasons to justify detention, and to order release if there were no such reasons. To be in accordance with A 5(3), judicial control had to be prompt. It also had to be automatic, it could not be made to depend on a previous application by the detained person. Such a requirement would change the nature of the safeguard provided for under A 5(3), which was distinct from that in A 5(4), guaranteeing the right to institute proceedings to have the lawfulness of detention reviewed by a court. Prompt judicial review of detention was also an important safeguard against ill-treatment in custody. Judicial officers should themselves hear the detained person before taking the appropriate decision. The applicant was arrested on 6 October 1994 and was brought before the magistrate on 7 October 1994; that appearance could be regarded as prompt. The matters which the judicial officer had to examine went beyond just lawfulness; the review to establish whether the deprivation of the individual's liberty was justified had to be sufficiently wide to encompass the various circumstances militating for or against detention. In this case, the evidence did not disclose that the magistrate had the power to conduct such a review of his or her own motion. Regarding the Government's argument that the applicant could have obtained a wider review by lodging an application under the Criminal Code, compliance with A 5(3) could not be ensured by making an A 5(4) remedy available. The review had to be automatic. It followed that the Government had not substantiated their preliminary objection that the applicant had not exhausted domestic remedies. Moreover, the applicant's appearance before the magistrate on 7 October 1994 was not capable of ensuring compliance with A 5(3) as the magistrate had no power to order his release. It followed that there had been a breach of that provision. The question of bail was a distinct and separate issue, which only came into play when the arrest and detention were lawful. In consequence, the Court did not have to address that issue for the purposes of its finding of a violation of A 5(3).

The parties had not addressed A 5(4) in the proceedings before the Court. That being so and having regard also to the conclusion under A 5(3), it was not necessary to examine the complaint under A 5(4).

Present judgment constituted just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage (by majority (14–3)). Costs and expenses (MTL 2,600).

Taiuti v Italy 92/20

[Application lodged 23.5.1986; Commission report 5.12.1990; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mr Renzo Taiuti instituted divorce proceedings before the Florence District Court on 1 June 1982. The parties were heard on 17 February 1988, after which judgment was reserved. The date of the Court's judgment had not been communicated, but the text was lodged with the court registry on 20 October 1988. The judgment became final on 1 December 1990. The applicant complained of the length of the civil proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 1 June 1982, when the applicant instituted divorce proceedings, and ended on 1 December 1990. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. There were delays on the part of the courts. The Government pleaded the backlog of cases in the District Court, but A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. Accordingly, the Court could not regard as reasonable the lapse of time in the present case, in particular as special diligence was required in cases concerning civil status and capacity. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Tanrikulu v Turkey 99/39

[Application lodged 25.2.1994; Commission report 15.4.1998; Court Judgment 8.7.1999]

Mrs Selma Tanrikulu's husband, Dr Zeki Tanrikulu, was shot dead on 2 September 1993 on a road between the hospital and the Silvan police headquarters. The applicant heard the shots and rushed over from her apartment in the hospital grounds; she saw two men running away. The applicant and the Government put forward different versions of the events concerned. On 5 November the public prosecutor issued a decision to the effect that he had no jurisdiction to investigate the matter and transferred the file to the prosecutor's office at the Diyarbakir State Security Court, where the case was still pending. The applicant complained that her husband had been killed either by State security forces or with their connivance and that the killing had not been adequately investigated by the authorities. In the course of the proceedings before the Commission the applicant further alleged that she had been hindered in the effective exercise of the right of individual petition as guaranteed by former A 25(1).

Comm found unanimously NV 2 on account of the killing of the applicant's husband itself or on account of its alleged discriminatory aspect, V 2 on account of the failure to carry out an effective investigation into the death of the applicant's husband, NV 3, not necessary to examine 6, V 13, NV 14, by majority (29–1) Turkey had failed to comply with its obligations under former 25.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found NV 2 in respect of killing of applicant's husband, V 2 on account of the failure of the authorities of the respondent State to conduct an effective investigation not necessary to consider 2 regarding the alleged lack of protection in domestic law of the right to life, by majority (16–1) V 13, unanimously NV 14+2, by majority (16–1) respondent State had failed to comply with its obligations under former 25(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Mr F Gölcüklü (pd), ad hoc judge.

As regards a civil action for redress for damage, a plaintiff in such an action had to identify the person believed to have committed the tort. In the instant case, however, it was still unknown who was responsible for the acts of which the applicant complained. With respect to an action in administrative law, a remedy indicated by the Government had to be sufficiently certain in practice as well as in theory and they had not been provided with any examples of persons having brought such an action in a situation comparable to the applicant's. Consequently, the applicant was not required to bring the civil and administrative proceedings in question and the preliminary objection concerning such proceedings was unfounded. The criminal law remedies raised issues closely linked to those raised in the complaints on the merits.

The Court accepted the Commission's establishment of the facts in the case. Although the Government had fallen short of their obligations under former A 28(1)(a) to furnish all necessary facilities to the Commission in its task of establishing the facts, there was no cause to depart from the Commission's conclusions regarding the complaint. Accordingly, the material in the case file did not enable the Court to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that Dr Zeki Tanrikulu was killed by security forces or with their connivance. It followed that no violation of A 2 had been established on that account.

The obligation to protect the right to life under A 2, read in conjunction with the State's general duty under A 1 of the Convention to secure to everyone within its jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in the Convention, required by implication that there should be some form of effective official investigation when individuals had been killed as a result of the use of force. It seemed doubtful that the investigation of the scene could have amounted to more than a superficial one in view of the limited time spent on it and the lack of photographs. There was no record of any attempt to retrieve the 11 missing bullets that passed through the body of the applicant's husband. There was lack of precision and detail on the sketch map drawn by one of the police officers and the whole of the investigation was characterised by inadequate and imprecise reporting of the steps that were taken. The Court expressed misgivings as to the limited amount of forensic information obtained from the post-mortem examination and considered it regrettable that no forensic specialist was involved and that no full autopsy was performed. The public prosecutor referred the investigation to the State Security Court suggesting that the killing constituted a terrorist offence, yet the evidence available to the public prosecutor at that time contained few indications of the manner in which the offence had been committed, and did not appear sufficient to conclude that terrorists must have been responsible. The applicant's statement was not taken until more than a year after the incident occurred and no statements taken from those members of the security forces who had been standing guard outside the security directorate. The authorities failed to carry out an effective investigation into the circumstances surrounding Dr Zeki Tanrikulu's death. Moreover, the Court was not persuaded that the criminal law remedies nominally available to the applicant would have been capable of altering to any significant extent the course of the investigation that was made. That being so, the applicant must be regarded as having complied with the requirement to exhaust the relevant criminal law remedies. Accordingly, the remainder of the Government's preliminary objection relating to criminal proceedings was dismissed. There had been a violation of A 2.

In view of the finding of breach of A 2, it was not necessary to examine the complaint regarding an alleged lack of protection in domestic law of the right to life.

The authorities had an obligation to carry out an effective investigation into the circumstances of the killing of the applicant's husband. For the reasons set out under A 2, no effective criminal investigation could be considered to have been conducted in accordance with A 13, the requirements of which were broader than the obligation to investigate imposed by A 2. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 13.

The scope of the examination of the evidence undertaken in this case and the material in the file were not sufficient, even in the light of findings made in previous cases, to enable the Court to determine whether the authorities had adopted a practice of violating A 2 and 13.

The Court considered that it did not have before it any evidence substantiating the alleged breach of A 14.

It was of the utmost importance for the effective operation of the system of individual petition instituted by former A 25 that applicants or potential applicants should be able to communicate freely with the Convention organs without being subjected to any form of pressure from the authorities to withdraw or modify their complaints. In that context, 'pressure' included not only direct coercion and flagrant acts of intimidation, but also other improper indirect acts or contacts designed to dissuade or discourage applicants from pursuing a Convention remedy. The applicant was questioned about the authenticity of the power of attorney which had been submitted in respect of her legal representation in the proceedings before the Commission. It was not appropriate for the authorities of a respondent government to enter into direct contact with an applicant on the pretext that 'forged documents have been submitted in other cases'. To proceed as the Government did in the present case could very well have been interpreted by the applicant as an attempt to intimidate her. According to the record of the applicant's interview, she was shown a power of attorney in the name of another person, even though the only power of attorney that the Government had been provided with was a copy of the power of attorney bearing the applicant's full name. The Government subsequently informed the Commission that the applicant had denied signing the power of attorney. A deliberate attempt had been made on the part of the authorities to cast doubt on the validity of the application and thereby on the credibility of the applicant. The actions of the authorities described above could not but be interpreted as a bid to try and frustrate the applicant's successful pursuance of her claims, thus constituting a negation of the very essence of the right of individual petition. The respondent State had failed to comply with its obligations under former A 25(1).

[Application lodged 24.10.1994; Commission report 25.2.1997; Court Judgment 9.6.1998]

Mr Francisco Teixeira de Castro worked in a textile factory. In connection with an operation monitoring drug trafficking, two plain-clothes officers of the Public Security Police approached an individual, VS, on a number of occasions. Shortly before midnight on 30 December 1992 the two officers went to VS's home saying that they were interested in buying heroin. VS mentioned the name of Francisco Teixeira de Castro as being someone who might be able to find some; however, he did not know the latter's address and had to obtain it from FO. All four then went to the applicant's home. The officers said that they wished to buy a large quantity of heroin. The applicant agreed to procure the heroin and, accompanied by FO, went in his own car to the home of another person who provided the heroin in exchange for a payment. The applicant then took the drugs to VS's home where the latter and the two police officers were waiting. When the applicant produced the heroin, the two officers identified themselves and arrested the applicant, VS and FO. The applicant was brought before an investigating judge at the Famalição Criminal Court later that day and was detained pending trial. His applications for release were refused. On 6 December 1993 the Santo Tirso Criminal Court convicted the applicant and sentenced him to six years' imprisonment. His appeal to the Supreme Court was dismissed on 5 May 1994. He complained, inter alia, that he had not had a fair hearing as police officers had incited him to commit the offence of which he was subsequently convicted.

The admissibility of evidence was primarily a matter for regulation by national law and as a general rule it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task under the Convention was not to give a ruling as to whether statements of witnesses were properly admitted as evidence, but rather to ascertain whether the proceedings as a whole, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair. The use of undercover agents had to be restricted and safeguards put in place even in cases concerning the fight against drug trafficking. While the rise in organised crime undoubtedly required that appropriate measures be taken, the right to a fair administration of justice nevertheless held such a prominent place that it could not be sacrificed for the sake of expedience. The public interest could not justify the use of evidence obtained as a result of police incitement. In the present case it was necessary to determine whether or not the two police officers' activity went beyond that of undercover agents. It was not contended that the officers' intervention took place as part of an anti-drug-trafficking operation ordered and supervised by a judge and it did not appear that the competent authorities had good reason to suspect that the applicant was a drug trafficker; on the contrary, he had no criminal record and no preliminary investigation concerning him had been opened. The drugs were not at the applicant's home, he obtained them from a third party who had, in turn, obtained them from another person. Nor were there more drugs in his possession than the quantity the police officers had requested, thereby going beyond what he had been incited to do by the police. There was no evidence that the applicant was predisposed to commit offences. The two police officers did not confine themselves to investigating the applicant's criminal activity in an essentially passive manner, but exercised an influence such as to incite the commission of the offence. The two police officers' actions went beyond those of undercover agents because they instigated the offence and there was nothing to suggest that without their intervention it would have been committed. That intervention and its use in the impugned criminal proceedings meant that, right from the outset, the applicant was definitively deprived of a fair trial. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

No argument was adduced before the Court on A 3 and there was no cause for the Court to consider the point of its own motion.

Having regard to the conclusion in respect of A 6(1), it was not necessary to examine that complaint separately under A 8.

[Application lodged 4.8.1994; Commission report 3.9.1996; Court Judgment 16.12.1997]

Mr Manuel Tejedor García was an officer in the national police force. On 21 May 1989, while off duty and drunk, he assaulted and arrested a Gambian national and a Portuguese national. A preliminary inquiry was opened in respect of the applicant for wrongful arrest, assault and disobeying orders. On 10 September 1990 the investigating judge considered that no offence had been made out and ordered the discharge of the applicant. The file was to be sent to the public prosecutor who had three days to apply to have the order set aside. The application was not lodged until November 1990 but was accepted by the investigating judge. The applicant was committed for trial. On 6 November 1991 the Audiencia Provincial found the applicant guilty of the alleged offences. It sentenced him to 6 months and 15 days' imprisonment, a fine of ESP 200,000, and ordered him to pay compensation to the victims. He was also suspended from duty for six months. His appeal to the Supreme Court was dismissed. The applicant complained of a violation of A 6(1) in that the investigating judge had granted an application filed out of time by the public prosecutor for an order setting aside the decision of 10 September 1990 discontinuing the criminal proceedings against him.

The complaint under A 6(2) having been declared inadmissible by the Commission for failure to exhaust domestic remedies, the Court had no jurisdiction to consider it.

The concept of a 'charge' for the purposes of A 6(1) was autonomous and had to be understood within the meaning of the Convention and not solely within its meaning under national law. It could be defined as 'the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he has committed a criminal offence', a definition that also corresponded to the test whether 'the situation of the suspect has been substantially affected'. Moreover, the words 'determination of any criminal charge' in A 6(1) did not imply that that article had no application to pre-trial proceedings. In the present case, a preliminary inquiry had been opened against the applicant in respect of various criminal offences arising out of the incident of 21 May 1989, after which he had been cautioned by the police and brought before the Saragossa investigating judge. The allegations made against him had been examined by the investigating judge, who subsequently ordered that no further action be taken in the light of the contradictory nature of the evidence. Therefore, the applicant had been the subject of a criminal charge within the meaning of A 6(1). That provision was accordingly applicable.

It was in the first place for the national authorities, and notably the courts, to interpret domestic law and the Court would not substitute its own interpretation for theirs in the absence of arbitrariness. That applied in particular to the interpretation by courts of rules of a procedural nature such as time-limits governing the filing of documents or the lodging of appeals. Although time-limits and procedural rules governing appeals by the prosecution had to be adhered to as part of the concept of a fair procedure, in principle it was for the national courts to police the conduct of their own proceedings. The national law allowed the public prosecutor three days to appeal against the decision that no further action be taken; that period began to run from the date of receipt of the case file accompanying the decision. Both the file and the application or appeal had to be returned to the judge. It appeared that the investigating judge's decision of 10 September 1990 was served on the applicant's legal representative the following day. However, the case file did not contain any annotation from the registrar attesting service of the decision on the public prosecutor, or the dates the latter received and returned the file to the investigating judge. In the absence of any indication as to the date of receipt, the investigating judge considered that the application had to be deemed to have been made in time. That interpretation was upheld by the Supreme Court, which stressed the importance of avoiding a strict interpretation that would unjustifiably prevent the case from being examined on its merits. Both the investigating judge and the Supreme Court took into consideration the submissions made in support of the applicant's position. Although the date appearing on the public prosecutor's application to have the decision set aside was marked as 13 September 1990, the national courts did not consider that fact to be relevant to the issue concerning the date of receipt of the file and held that that date could not be determined for certain, there being nothing to show when the decision had been sent to the public prosecutor or when he had actually received it. The courts were thus called upon to interpret the procedure rules in circumstances where the date of receipt could not be established as a matter of certainty. The interpretation to be given to the relevant rule, in such circumstances, was a matter for the domestic courts. Granting the public prosecutor's application almost two months after the decision not to prosecute meant that the matter had not become final under Spanish law. In those circumstances, the interpretation of the national courts could not be described as either arbitrary or unreasonable, or of such a nature as to taint the fairness of the proceedings. Nor could it be said that any issue arose concerning the equality of arms in this case. There had, accordingly, been no violation of A 6(1).

Tekin v Turkey 98/48

[Application lodged 14.7.1993; Commission report 17.4.1997; Court Judgment 9.6.1998]

Mr Salih Tekin was a journalist for the newspaper Özgür Gündem. In February 1993 he was arrested on suspicion of threatening village guards and taken to Derinsu gendarmerie headquarters. Following a hearing on 13 May 1993, he was acquitted on 2 August 1993 of the charges against him. He complained that he had been ill-treated while being held in detention at gendarmerie headquarters from 15 to 19 February 1993 and that this event had not been adequately investigated by the State authorities.

Comm found unanimously NV 2, 10, 14 and 18, by majority (31–1) V 3 and 13, unanimously not necessary to examine the applicant's other complaints.

Court found unanimously NV 2, by majority (6–3) V 3, (8–1) not necessary to consider 5(1) and 6(1), unanimously NV 10, by majority (7–2) V 13, unanimously NV 14 or 18.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer (d), Mr JM Morenilla, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr V Toumanov (d).

The establishment and verification of the facts were primarily a matter for the Commission. While the Court was not bound by the Commission's findings of fact and remained free to make its own appreciation in the light of all the material before it, it was only in exceptional circumstances that it would exercise its powers in that area. The Commission and its delegates had the opportunity to see and hear the applicant and other witnesses give their testimony and answer questions. The Commission found the applicant's testimony to be consistent and convincing, whereas it found the evidence given by the witnesses for the Government to be flawed and unreliable. A 28(1)(a) placed the State concerned under a duty to 'furnish all necessary facilities' to the Commission for its investigation of the facts underlying a petition. In the present case, when key witnesses failed to attend before the Commission, the respondent State was not justified in complaining of the insufficiency of the evidence on which the Commission based its findings. Therefore the Court accepted the facts as found by the Commission.

The facts as found by the Commission did not support the conclusion that the applicant was treated in such a way as to amount to an interference with his right to life within the meaning of A 2.

Ill-treatment had to attain a minimum level of severity if it was to fall within the scope of A 3. The assessment of that minimum was relative, depending on all the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment, its physical and/or mental effects and, in some cases, the sex, age and state of health of the victim. The Commission found that the applicant was held in a cold and dark cell, blindfolded, and treated, in connection with his interrogation, in a way which left wounds and bruises on his body. Assessing those facts against the standards imposed by A 3, in respect of a person deprived of his liberty, recourse to physical force which had not been made strictly necessary by his own conduct diminished human dignity and was in principle an infringement of the right set forth in A 3. The conditions in which the applicant was held, and the manner in which he must have been treated in order to leave wounds and bruises on his body, amounted to inhuman and degrading treatment within the meaning of A 3.

Before the Court, the applicant did not pursue his claims in respect of A 5(1) and 6(1) and it was not therefore necessary for the Court to consider them.

The finding by the Commission did not establish that the applicant's detention and treatment in custody amounted to interferences with his right to freedom of expression. It followed that there had been no violation of A 10.

The applicant complained of ill-treatment to the public prosecutor on his release from custody but no action was taken in respect of the complaint. It was not until 10 months later, following the Commission's communication of the application to the Government, that an investigation was commenced into the applicant's allegations. There were delays in taking statements and the investigation could not properly be described as thorough and effective such as to meet the requirements of A 13.

There was no evidence to substantiate the alleged breaches of A 14 and 18.

Non-pecuniary damage (by majority (8–1) GBP 10,000), costs and expenses, (GBP 15,000).

Telesystem Tirol Kabeltelevision v Austria 97/29

[Application lodged 29.11.1991; Commission report 18.10.1995; Court Judgment 9.6.1997]

Telesystem Tirol Kabeltelevision Unterland Gesellschaft mbH & Co KG was a limited partnership which obtained authorisation to set up a shared aerial to receive broadcast programmes and retransmit them to subscribers via a cable television network. On 12 January 1989, the applicant applied for authorisation to send out its own programmes via its cable network. The application was rejected. The applicant appealed to the National Post and Telecommunications Head Office, which dismissed the appeal on 17 February 1989. An application to the Constitutional Court was rejected and on 18 September 1991 the Administrative Court also dismissed the application. The applicant complained that it had been refused permission to send out its own programmes on account of the Austrian Broadcasting Corporation's monopoly.

Comm found unanimously V 10.

Court unanimously struck case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached by the Government and the applicant. It discerned no reason of public policy militating against striking the case out of its list.

Terra Woningen BV v Netherlands (1997) 24 EHRR 456 96/60

[Application lodged 9.9.1992; Commission report 5.4.1995; Court Judgment 17.12.1996.

Terra Woningen BV, the applicant company, had business including the development of real property. One of their properties was on soil polluted land. A tenant in one of the applicant company flats applied to the Rent Board in Schiedam for a ruling as to the fairness of the rent. The Rent Board gave its ruling on 17 April 1991 and thereafter the applicant company applied to the District Court of Schiedam for a binding decision arguing that the soil pollution should not be taken into account. The District Court gave its decision dismissing the applicant company's arguments. The applicant company complained that they had not had the benefit of effective judicial review in the determination of their civil rights as the District Court had considered itself bound by the Provincial Executive's finding in respect of the soil pollution and its effects on public health and the environment and had thus denied them a judicial ruling on an important part of their case.

Comm found by majority (12–1) V 6(1), not necessary to examine 13.

Court found by majority (8–1) no jurisdiction to rule on 14+P1A1, 17+P1A1, 18+P1A1, unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, by majority (5–4) V 6(1), unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh, Mr J De Meyer (pd), Mr N Valticos (d), Mr SK Martens (d), Mr B Repik.

The compass of the case before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility. In the present case, the application as declared admissible related solely to an alleged deficiency of a procedural nature. Whether or not the outcome of the proceedings in question was affected by that alleged deficiency, the scope of the case before the Court did not extend to the substance of the issues involved. Accordingly, the Court had no jurisdiction to examine the complaints which the Commission declared inadmissible.

The Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies was formulated for the first time before the Court. They were therefore estopped from raising it.

The rent-determination proceedings in question constituted the determination of civil rights and obligations. For the determination of civil rights and obligations by a tribunal to satisfy A 6(1), it was required that the tribunal in question had jurisdiction to examine all questions of fact and law relevant to the dispute before it. The Schiedam District Court, in its judgment, held that the health and environmental risk was necessarily implied by the Provincial Executive's decision. In so doing the Schiedam District Court, a 'tribunal' satisfying the requirements of A 6(1), deprived itself of jurisdiction to examine facts which were crucial for the determination of the dispute. In those circumstances, the applicant company could not be considered to have had access to a tribunal invested with sufficient jurisdiction to decide the case before it. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1).

In view of the conclusion as to A 6(1) it was not necessary to examine the allegation under A 13.

No causal link between the violation found and the damage allegedly suffered had been established. Costs and expenses (NLG 30,000).

Terranova v Italy 95/52

[Application lodged 11.6.1990; Commission report 7.12.1994; Court Judgment 4.12.1995]

Mr Giuseppe Terranova, a pensioner, was formerly a municipal employee. On 25 April 1985 he applied to the Court of Audit in Rome seeking judicial review of a Treasury order whereby he had been granted an enhanced pension but was required to repay half of a sum he had previously received as compensation for invalidity occasioned during the performance of his official duties. The application was registered on 3 May 1985. On 26 October 1992 the court ruled that it lacked jurisdiction ratione materiae and declared the application inadmissible. The judgment was deposited with the registry on 15 June 1993. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 3 May 1985, when Mr Terranova's application was registered by the Court of Audit registry, and ended on 15 June 1993, when the judgment dismissing the application was deposited in the registry. The period to be examined thus lasted just over eight years and one month. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. There were delays on the part of the authorities. A period of approximately eight years and one month could not be considered reasonable, regard being had to the fact that the case was not complex and to what was at stake for the applicant, namely repayment of half of the sum received in compensation. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

Testa v Italy 91/64

[Application lodged 5.3.1987; Commission report 5.3.1991; Court Judgment 3.12.1991]

Mr Giancarlo Testa was a train driver. On 21 May 1985, having suffered an accident at work, he took proceedings before the Rome magistrates' court against the railway company, claiming payment of a temporary disability allowance. On 19 March 1986 the magistrates' court ordered the railway company to pay the applicant the benefit claimed. On 9 October 1986 the railway company appealed against the decision. A hearing took place on 11 May 1989 after which the appeal was dismissed. The text of the appeal judgment was lodged with the registry on 30 June 1990. The applicant complained of the length of the civil proceedings brought by him.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck case out of list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens.

Despite several reminders from the registry, the applicant showed no interest in the proceedings before the Court. There was an implied withdrawal which constituted a fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter. In addition, there was no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. The Court noted other cases in which it had reviewed the reasonableness of the length of civil proceedings.

Thery v France 00/43

[Application lodged 10.10.1996; Court Judgment 1.2.2000]

Mr Hubert Thery was the joint owner of agricultural land which formed part of an estate of 250 hectares. In 1971 the property was leased for 19 years. In January 1988 the owners gave notice to the tenants of the repossession of the property by the applicant. The applicant obtained authorisation for a requisite permit in the form of a prefectoral decision. In September 1988 the tenants lodged an appeal with the administrative court. On 8 December 1992 the administrative court set aside the prefectoral decision. In March 1993 the applicant lodged an appeal against that decision. On 10 May 1996 the Conseil d'Etat dismissed the applicant's appeal. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Court found by majority V 6(1), not necessary to examine P1A1.

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr MK Traja.

The proceedings concerned a dispute which related to the applicant's arguable right to use his farmland to carry on his occupation in accordance with a given practice and the legislation in force. However, a right relating to the manner in which the right of property was exercised was a civil right within the meaning of A 6. The outcome of the proceedings had been decisive as to the applicant's right to cultivate the farmland which he held in ownership in common. That conclusion was not invalidated by the fact that the applicable law had been based on public interest and the refusal to grant the permit had been justified by regional planning considerations. A 6 therefore applied to the case.

The period to be taken into consideration began with the lodging of the appeal with the administrative court on 13 September 1988 and ended on 10 May 1996 with the decision of the Conseil d'Etat. It had lasted nearly seven years and eight months. The reasonableness of the proceedings had to be assessed in the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the authorities. There were substantial procedural delays. Neither the complexity of the case nor the conduct of the parties justified this length. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

In view of the conclusion in respect of A 6(1) it was not necessary to examine P1A1.

Thlimmenos v Greece 00/123

[Application lodged 18.12.1996; Commission report 4.12.1998; Court Judgment 6.4.2000]

Mr Iakovos Thlimmenos was a Jehovah's Witness. On 9 December 1983 the Athens Permanent Army Tribunal convicted him of insubordination for having refused to wear military uniform at a time of general mobilisation. However, the tribunal considered that there were extenuating circumstances and sentenced the applicant to four years' imprisonment. The applicant was released on parole after two years and one day. In June 1988 the applicant sat a public examination for the appointment of chartered accountants. He came second among 60 candidates. However, on 8 February 1989, the Executive Board of the Greek Institute of Chartered Accountants refused to appoint him on the ground that he had been convicted of a felony. On 8 May 1989 he appealed to the Supreme Administrative Court invoking, inter alia, his right to freedom of religion and equality before the law and also claiming that he had not been convicted of a felony but of a less serious crime. The Supreme Administrative Court decided that the Board had acted in accordance with the law. It considered, inter alia, that the Board's failure to appoint him was not related to his religious beliefs but to the fact that he had committed a criminal offence. He complained of infringement of A 9, 14+9 and 6.

Comm found by majority (22–6) V 14+9, (21–7) not necessary to examine whether 9, unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 14+9, not necessary to examine 9, V 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantîru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Mr G Koumantos, ad hoc judge.

The scope of the Court's jurisdiction was determined by the Commission's decision declaring the originating application admissible. The complaint under P1A1 was separate from the complaints declared admissible and therefore the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain that complaint.

With regard to the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of remedies, even if the applicant had raised the claim of conscientious objector, the military commission and the Minister would not have been obliged to grant the his claim since they, at least to a certain degree, retained discretionary powers. Even if the applicant had obtained the removal of his conviction from his criminal record, he would not have been able to obtain reparation for the prejudice he had suffered until then as a result of his conviction. For the same reason the applicant could not have been certain that his request for a pardon would have been granted and, even if it had, the applicant could not have obtained reparation. The Government's preliminary objection concerning the applicant's status as a victim had not been put forward when the admissibility of the application was being considered by the Commission and they were therefore estopped from raising it.

The applicant was treated differently from the other persons who had applied for that post on the ground of his status as a convicted person. Such difference of treatment did not generally come within the scope of A 14 in so far as it related to access to a particular profession, the right to freedom of profession not being guaranteed by the Convention. However, the applicant's complaint rather concerned the fact that in the application of the relevant law, no distinction was made between persons convicted of offences committed exclusively because of their religious beliefs and persons convicted of other offences, and the facts complained of fell within the ambit of A 9. The right not to be discriminated against in the enjoyment of the rights guaranteed under the Convention was also violated when States without an objective and reasonable justification failed to treat differently persons whose situations were significantly different. As a matter of principle, States had a legitimate interest to exclude some offenders from the profession of chartered accountant. However, a conviction for refusing on religious or philosophical grounds to wear the military uniform could not imply any dishonesty or moral turpitude likely to undermine the offender's ability to exercise this profession. Excluding the applicant on the ground that he was an unfit person was not, therefore, justified. The applicant had served a prison sentence for his refusal to wear the military uniform. In those circumstances, imposing a further sanction on him was disproportionate. It followed that the applicant's exclusion from the profession of chartered accountants did not pursue a legitimate aim. There was no objective and reasonable justification for not treating the applicant differently from other persons convicted of a felony. Although the board had no option under the law but to refuse to appoint the applicant, it was the State's enactment of the relevant legislation, without appropriate exceptions, which violated the applicant's right not to be discriminated against in the enjoyment of his right under A 9. There had been therefore a violation of A 14 taken in conjunction with A 9.

In view of the finding of a breach of A 14 taken in conjunction with A 9 it was not necessary also to consider whether there had been a violation of A 9 taken on its own.

Although regulated by administrative law, the profession of chartered accountants was one of the liberal professions in Greece. As a result, the proceedings instituted by the applicant to challenge the authorities' failure to appoint him to a post of chartered accountant involved a determination of his civil rights within the meaning of A 6(1) of the Convention. The proceedings before the Supreme Administrative Court began on 8 May 1989, when the applicant lodged his application for judicial review, and ended on 28 June 1996, when the Third Chamber of the court rejected it. They lasted, therefore, seven years, one month and 20 days. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case having regard to the complexity of the case, the conduct of the parties, the conduct of the authorities dealing with the case and what was at stake for the applicant. Employment disputes, to which disputes concerning access to a liberal profession could be compared, generally called for expeditious decision. The case involved legal issues of some complexity. The applicant did not cause any delays. There were two periods of inactivity of a total duration of almost three years. The only explanation offered by the Government for these periods of inactivity was the Supreme Administrative Court's case-load. According to the Court's case-law, it was for Contracting States to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could guarantee the right of everyone to obtain a final decision on disputes relating to civil rights and obligations within a reasonable time. In the light of all the above and given that the proceedings concerned the applicant's professional future, the length of the proceedings failed to meet the reasonable time requirement. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Thomann v Switzerland (1997) 24 EHRR 553 96/23

[Application lodged 5.12.1990; Commission report 2.3.1995; Court Judgment 10.6.1996]

Mr Martin Thomann was prosecuted on various charges of fraud and accounting offences. He did not appear at his trial, but was arrested and attended court for the delivery of the judgment, when he was sentenced to imprisonment and fined. He sought a retrial. The Criminal Court allowed his request and the case was set down for a new trial. On discovering that the composition of the Criminal Court would be identical to that of the court that had convicted him in absentia, on 29 June 1989 the applicant lodged an application challenging its three members. His challenge was dismissed by the Criminal Court, the Court of Appeal and the Federal Court. The retrial in the Criminal Court was before the same judges. They heard evidence and convicted and sentenced the applicant. On 11 July 1991 the cantonal Court of Appeal acquitted the applicant on some of the counts and reduced his prison sentence. On 9 December 1992 the Federal Court dismissed the applicant's public-law appeal against that judgment. He complained that he had been convicted by a court that was not impartial for the purposes of A 6(1).

Comm found by majority (20–4) NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Jambrek.

In considering the question of impartiality of a tribunal for the purposes of A 6(1), regard had to be had not only to the personal conviction and behaviour of a particular judge in a given case, the subjective approach, but also to whether it afforded sufficient guarantees to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. As regards the subjective aspect, there was nothing to indicate in the present case any prejudice or bias on the part of the judges and, moreover, the applicant did not level any criticism at them in that respect. As regards the objective test, the instant case did not concern the successive exercise of different judicial functions, but judges who sat twice in the same capacity. The Federal Court explained that judges who retried in the defendant's presence a case that they had first had to try in absentia on the basis of the evidence that they had available to them at the time were in no way bound by their first decision. They undertook a fresh consideration of the whole case; all the issues raised by the case remain opened and were examined in adversarial proceedings with the benefit of the more comprehensive information that might be obtained from the appearance of the defendant in person. That was in fact what happened in the present case. Such a situation was not sufficient to cast doubt on the impartiality of the judges in question. Furthermore, if a court had to alter its composition each time that it accepted an application for a retrial from a person who had been convicted in his absence, such persons would be placed at an advantage in relation to defendants who appeared at the opening of their trial, because that would enable the former to obtain a second hearing of their case by different judges at the same level of jurisdiction. In addition, it would contribute to slowing down the work of the courts as it would force a larger number of judges to examine the same file, and that would scarcely be compatible with conducting proceedings within a reasonable time. Therefore there had been no violation of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 19.11.1987; Commission report 11.12.1990; Court Judgment 25.6.1992]

Mr Thorgeir Thorgeirson, a writer, published two articles on police brutality in the daily newspaper. He was prosecuted, found guilty of defaming members of the Reykjavik police force and fined. He complained that as the Public Prosecutor had been absent from a number of sittings of the Reykjavik Criminal Court, the single judge had not only conducted the court investigation but had also taken on a role as a representative of the prosecution. Consequently, the Criminal Court did not satisfy the requirement of impartiality. In addition, there had been interference with his right to freedom of expression.

The Court's task was not to review the relevant law and practice in abstracto, but to determine whether the manner in which they were applied to the applicant gave rise to a violation of A 6(1). The existence of impartiality for the purposes of A 6(1) had to be determined according to a subjective test, that was on the basis of the personal conviction of a particular judge in a given case, and also according to an objective test, that was ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. As to the subjective test, the personal impartiality of a judge had to be presumed until there was proof to the contrary; the applicant has adduced no evidence to suggest that the judge in question was personally biased. Under the objective test, it had to be determined whether, quite apart from the judge's personal conduct, there were ascertainable facts which might raise doubts as to his impartiality. Appearances could be of importance. In deciding whether in a given case there was a legitimate reason to fear that a particular judge lacked impartiality, the standpoint of the accused was important but not decisive. What was decisive was whether this fear could be held to be objectively justified. The Reykjavik Criminal Court held 12 sittings, the Public Prosecutor was absent from six. At those sittings at which the Public Prosecutor was absent, the Reykjavik Criminal Court was not called upon to conduct any investigation into the merits of the case or to assume any functions which might have been fulfilled by the prosecutor had he been present (in the absences of the prosecutor, the court dealt with requests for an adjournment, preparatory sitting, procedural matters, filing of applicant's written defence, delivery of judgment). The Public Prosecutor was, with one exception (when a video was shown), present at all the sittings at which evidence was submitted and witnesses were heard. In those circumstances, any fears the applicant may have had, on account of the prosecutor's absence, as regards the Reykjavik Court's lack of impartiality could not be held to be justified. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

The applicant's conviction and sentence for defamation constituted an interference with his right to freedom of expression. Such an interference entailed a violation of A 10 unless it was prescribed by law, had an aim or aims that was or were legitimate under A 10(2) and was necessary in a democratic society for the aforesaid aim or aims. The interference was prescribed by law. The applicant's conviction and sentence were aimed at protecting the reputation of others and thus had an aim that was legitimate under this provision. Freedom of expression constituted one of the essential foundations of a democratic society, applicable not only to information or ideas that were favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offended, shocked or disturbed. The exceptions in A 10(2) had to be narrowly interpreted and the necessity for any restrictions had to be convincingly established. The applicant expressed his views by having them published in a newspaper. Regard had to be had, therefore, to the pre-eminent role of the press in a State governed by the rule of law. Whilst the press should not overstep the bounds set, inter alia, for 'the protection of the reputation of others', it was nevertheless incumbent on it to impart information and ideas on matters of public interest. Not only did it have the task of imparting such information and ideas: the public also had a right to receive them. The applicant was essentially reporting what was being said by others about police brutality. In so far as the applicant was required to establish the truth of his statements, he was faced with an unreasonable, if not impossible task. His purpose was to encourage the establishment of an investigation into police brutality and not to defame the police. The articles were framed in particularly strong terms. However, having regard to their purpose and the impact which they were designed to have, the language used could not be regarded as excessive. The Court considered that the conviction and sentence were capable of discouraging open discussion of matters of public concern. The interference therefore was not proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued and therefore not necessary in a democratic society.

Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell (1991) 13 EHRR 666 90/26

[Applications lodged 3.6.1985, 1.9.1985, 24.4.1985; Commission report 7.9.1989; Court Judgment 25.10.1990]

Mr Michael Keith Thynne pleaded guilty on 27 October 1975 at the Central Criminal Court to rape and buggery. He was sentenced to life imprisonment. Escape and commission of further offences resulted in further sentencing. He was referred to the Parole Board, who referred the case to the Local Review Committee, which did not recommend release. Mr Benjamin Wilson pleaded guilty on 17 May 1972 at the Central Criminal Court to buggery, attempted buggery and indecent assault on boys under 16. He was sentenced to life imprisonment. The Parole Board recommended his release into a controlled protective environment with psychiatric supervision. On 11 February 1983, five months after his release on licence, the Parole Board recommended his recall and the Secretary of State revoked his licence as his conduct had given cause for concern and he had failed to co-operate with his supervising officer. Mr Edward James Gunnell was convicted at the Central Criminal Court on 15 December 1965, inter alia, of rapes and attempted rape. He was sentenced to life imprisonment. His case was reviewed by the Parole Board and, following their recommendation, he was released in 1982 subject to conditions. In 1983 his licence was revoked and he was recalled to prison. All three applicants complained that there was no judicial procedure available under UK law to determine the continued lawfulness of their detention or, in the case of the second and third applicants, their re-detention following release.

Comm found by majority (10–2) V 5(4) in respect of all three applicants, V 5(5) in the case of Mr Wilson.

Court found by (18–1) V 5(4) in the case of all three applicants, V 5(5) in the case of Mr Wilson.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr A Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla Rodriguez.

Where a sentence of imprisonment was imposed after conviction by a competent court, the supervision required by A 5(4) was incorporated in the decision of the court. In subsequent cases the concept of lawfulness under A 5(4) required that the detention be in conformity not only with domestic law but also with the text of the Convention, the general principles embodied therein and the aim of the restrictions permitted by A 5(1). Each of the applicants was sentenced to life imprisonment because, in addition to the need for punishment, he was considered by the courts to be suffering from a mental or personality disorder and to be dangerous and in need of treatment. The discretionary life sentence has clearly developed in English law as a measure to deal with mentally unstable and dangerous offenders. Such sentences, unlike mandatory sentences, were composed of a punitive element and of a security element designed to confer on the Secretary of State the responsibility for determining when the public interest permitted the prisoner's release. The three applicants had committed offences of the utmost gravity meriting lengthy terms of imprisonment. However, in each case the punitive period of the discretionary life sentence had expired. The factors of mental instability and dangerousness were susceptible to change over the passage of time and new issues of lawfulness might arise in the course of detention. It followed that, at that phase in the execution of their sentences, the applicants were entitled under A 5(4) to take proceedings to have the lawfulness of their continued detention decided by a court at reasonable intervals and to have the lawfulness of any re-detention determined by a court. The punitive period of their life sentences having expired, the applicants were entitled to subsequent judicial control as guaranteed by A 5(4). A 5(4) did not guarantee a right to judicial control of such scope as to empower the court on all aspects of the case, including questions of expediency, to substitute its own discretion for that of the decision-making authority. The review had to be, nevertheless, wide enough to bear on those conditions which, according to the Convention, were essential for the lawful detention of a person subject to the special type of deprivation of liberty ordered against the three applicants. The Court had regard to its previous case-law, neither the Parole Board nor judicial review proceedings satisfied the requirements of A 5(4). Therefore, there had been a violation of A 5(4) in respect of all three applicants.

The lack of an enforceable right to compensation before the UK courts in respect of the violation of A 5(4) was a breach of A 5(5).

Finding of violation constituted just satisfaction for A 50. Costs and expenses (GBP 4,500 less FF 7,845 to Mr Thynne, GBP 18,000 less FF 24,849.98 jointly to Mr Wilson and Mr Gunnell).

Tierce and Others v San Marino 00/187

[Applications lodged 17.5.1994, 9.2.1994; Commission reports 23.4.1998, 30.11.1998; Court Judgment 25.7.2000]

Mr Jean-Marc Tierce's business associate filed a complaint against him in November 1990 accusing him of irregularities in the management of their company. The Commissario della Legge investigated the matter. In 1992, the applicant was committed for trial for fraud and misappropriation before the same Commissario della Legge sitting as a judge in the summary procedure applied to the case. The applicant was found guilty by the Commissario della Legge who imposed a suspended sentence and ordered him to pay a fine. The applicant appealed. Without holding a hearing and relying on the documents relating to the investigation at first instance placed in the file for the appeal by the Commissario della Legge, the appellate court rejected the applicant's appeal.

Mr Roberto Marra, the second applicant, and Mrs Paola Gabrielli, the third applicant, were arrested in possession of drugs. The Commissario della Legge confirmed their arrest, questioned them, charged them with possession and trafficking of drugs and summoned them for trial. The Commissario della Legge convicted the second applicant of possession of drugs and acquitted the third applicant for lack of evidence. The applicants and the Procuratore del Fisco appealed. Without holding a hearing and on the basis of the documents relating to the investigation at first instance placed in the file for the appeal, the appellate court convicted both applicants.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) in respect of the impartiality of the tribunal, by majority (29–1) in respect of a public hearing, by majority (28–1) V 6(1) regarding public hearing in respect of second and third applicants.

Court found unanimously V 6(1) with regard to the first applicant on the question of impartiality of tribunal, V 6(1) regarding the three applicants on the question of a hearing in person.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr R Türmen, Mr J Casadevall, Mr T Pantîru, Mr R Maruste.

The first applicant's fears as to the objective impartiality of the Commissario della Legge related to the combination of his roles as investigating judge, trial judge at first instance and judge responsible for preparing the appeal. For more than two years, the Commissario della Legge conducted a very thorough investigation into the first applicant's affairs, including repeated questioning of the applicant, the complainant and the witnesses, ordering expert inquiries, questioning the expert and making orders for attachment of the applicant's assets. The Commissario della Legge had made extensive use of his powers as investigating judge and had then committed the applicant for trial and convicted him. Consequently, the applicant's concerns regarding the impartiality of the Commissario della Legge could be regarded as justified from an objective standpoint. Accordingly, there was a violation of A 6(1). In the light of that conclusion it was not necessary to consider whether the applicant's fears concerning the fact that the Commissario della Legge had then prepared the file for the appeal were also well founded.

The appellate court in San Marino had jurisdiction to deal with points of fact and of law. There was no public hearing before that court. Under the Code of Criminal Procedure an investigative hearing could be held in the course of the appeal if the appellate court considered that further investigations were necessary, but the hearing was before the Commissario della Legge, who was responsible for investigations on appeal. There was no investigative hearing in any of the applicants' cases. Had such a hearing taken place, it would not have been before the appellate court and the applicants would not therefore have been able to plead their case before that court. In both cases the appellate court was required to deal with facts and law in order to ascertain the applicants' guilt. In the first applicant's case, the court considered the legal classification of the applicant's conduct. In the case of the other two applicants the appellate court had to evaluate the testimony of both applicants before the court of first instance without directly questioning them. The second applicant's conviction was aggravated by the fact that he intended to deal in the drugs in his possession and the third applicant was convicted although she had been acquitted at first instance. In both cases it was necessary to hear the applicants directly in their appeals. The role of the appellate court and the nature of the questions submitted to it led to the conclusion that there was no special feature of the procedure that could justify refusing the applicants a hearing in public on appeal which they could attend and at which they could give evidence in person. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary damage (ITL 12,000,000 to the first applicant, ITL 10,000,000 to each of the other two applicants), costs and expenses (ITL 15,000,000 to all three applicants).

Timurtas v Turkey 00/161

[Application lodged 9.2.1994; Court Judgment 13.6.2000]

Mr Mehmet Timurtas complained that his son, Abdulvahap Timurtas, had disappeared after being taken into custody by the security forces in August 1993. He relied on A 2, 5, 13 and 18 of the Convention on account of his son's disappearance and that he himself was a victim of a violation of A 3. He further contended that the respondent State had failed to comply with its obligations under former A 25 and 28(1)(a).

Court found by majority (6–1) V 2 in respect of death of Abdulvahap Timurtas, V (2) in respect of failure to conduct an effective investigation, V 3 in respect of the applicant, unanimously V 5, by majority (6–1) V 13, unanimously not necessary to decide on 18, unanimously that the respondent State has not failed to comply with its obligations under 34.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr J Casadevall, Mr B Zupancic, Mr R Maruste, Mr F Gölcüklü (pd), ad hoc judge.

The facts were disputed by the parties. The Commission reached its findings of fact after a delegation had heard evidence in Ankara. The applicant's allegations of the apprehension of his son were confirmed in a document submitted on his behalf. The question of whether the document was a photocopy of an authentic post-operation report was of importance to the establishment of the facts and their assessment. A photocopied document had to be subjected to close scrutiny before it could be accepted as a true copy of an original, the more so as it was undeniably true that modern technological devices could be employed to forge, or to tamper with, documents. The Convention proceedings did not in all cases lend themselves for rigorous application of the principle of affirmanti incumbit probatio. It was of the utmost importance for the effective operation of the system of individual petition instituted under former A 25 (now A 34) that States should furnish all necessary facilities to make possible a proper and effective examination of applications. It was inherent in proceedings relating to cases of this nature, where an individual applicant accused State agents of violating his rights under the Convention, that in certain instances solely the respondent Government have access to information capable of corroborating or refuting these allegations. A failure on a Government's part to submit such information which was in their hands without a satisfactory explanation might not only reflect negatively on the level of compliance by a respondent State with its obligations under A 38(1)(a) (former A 28(1)(a)), but might also give rise to the drawing of inferences as to the well-foundedness of the allegations. In the present case the Government were in the pre-eminent position to assist the Commission by providing access to the document which they claimed was the genuine document bearing the reference number featuring on the photocopy. It was insufficient for the Government to rely on the allegedly secret nature of that document which, in the Court's opinion, would not have precluded it from having been made available to the Commission's delegates, none of whom were Turkish, so that they could have proceeded to a simple comparison of the two documents without actually taking cognisance of the contents. Consequently, the Court found it appropriate to draw an inference from the Government's failure to produce the document without a satisfactory explanation. Noting, furthermore, other factors pointing to the document's authenticity, the Court agreed with the Commission's finding that it was a photocopy of an authentic post-operation report. The Court considered that the Commission also approached its task of assessing the other evidence with the requisite caution, giving detailed consideration to the elements which supported the applicant's account and to those which cast doubt on its credibility. It thus accepted the facts as established by the Commission. The Court observed that the Government had not advanced any explanation to account for the omissions relating to documentary evidence and the attendance of a witness. In this case the Government fell short of their obligations under former A 28(1)(a) to furnish all necessary facilities to the Commission in its task of establishing the facts.

Whether the failure on the part of the authorities to provide a plausible explanation as to a detainee's fate, in the absence of a body, might raise issues under A 2 would depend on all the circumstances of the case, and in particular on the existence of sufficient circumstantial evidence, based on concrete elements, from which it may be concluded to the requisite standard of proof that the detainee must be presumed to have died in custody. In this respect the period of time which had elapsed since the person was placed in detention, although not decisive in itself, was a relevant factor to be taken into account. It had to be accepted that the more time went by without any news of the detained person, the greater the likelihood that he or she had died. The passage of time might therefore to some extent affect the weight to be attached to other elements of circumstantial evidence before it could be concluded that the person concerned was to be presumed dead. In the present case, six and a half years had elapsed since Abdulvahap Timurtas was apprehended and detained. He was taken to a place of detention by authorities for whom the State was responsible. He was wanted by the authorities for his alleged PKK activities. In the general context of the situation in south-east Turkey in 1993, it could by no means be excluded that an unacknowledged detention of such a person would be life-threatening. In all the circumstances Abdulvahap Timurtas had to be presumed dead following an unacknowledged detention by the security forces. Consequently, the responsibility of the respondent State for his death was engaged. The authorities had not provided any explanation as to what occurred after his apprehension and they did not rely on any ground of justification in respect of any use of lethal force by their agents. There had been a violation of A 2 on that count.

The Court noted the length of time it took before an official investigation got underway and before statements from witnesses were obtained, the inadequate questions put to the witnesses and the manner in which relevant information was ignored and subsequently denied by the investigating authorities. It was not until two years after the applicant's son had been taken into detention that inquiries were made of the gendarmes in Sirnak. The applicant had apprised the authorities long before then of the information he had obtained to the effect that his son had been transferred to Sirnak. Moreover, there was no evidence to suggest that the public prosecutors concerned made an attempt to inspect custody ledgers or places of detention for themselves, or that the Silopi district gendarmerie were asked to account for their actions on the day of apprehension. The investigation carried out into the disappearance of the applicant's son was inadequate and therefore in breach of the State's procedural obligations to protect the right to life. There had accordingly been a violation of A 2 on this count also.

The question whether a family member of a 'disappeared person' was a victim of treatment contrary to A 3 would depend on the existence of special factors which gave the suffering of the applicant a dimension and character distinct from the emotional distress which might be regarded as inevitably caused to relatives of a victim of a serious human rights violation. Relevant elements would include the proximity of the family tie, the particular circumstances of the relationship, the extent to which the family member witnessed the events in question, the involvement of the family member in the attempts to obtain information about the disappeared person and the way in which the authorities responded to those inquiries. The applicant was the father of the disappeared person. He made many inquiries to find out what had happened to his son. His anguish about the fate of his son would have been exacerbated by the fact that another son had died whilst in custody and by the conduct of the authorities to whom he addressed his multiple inquiries. Not only did the investigation into the applicant's allegations lack promptitude and efficiency, certain members of the security forces also displayed a callous disregard for the applicant's concerns by denying, to the applicant's face and contrary to the truth, that his son had been taken into custody. His anguish concerning his son's fate continued to the present day. The disappearance of his son amounted to inhuman and degrading treatment contrary to A 3 in relation to the applicant.

The Court noted that its reasoning and findings in relation to A 2 left no doubt that Abdulvahap Timurtas' detention was in breach of A 5. He was held in unacknowledged detention in the complete absence of the safeguards contained in A 5 and there had been a particularly grave violation of the right to liberty and security of person guaranteed under that provision.

The applicant had an arguable complaint that his son had been taken into custody. In view of the finding that the domestic authorities failed in their obligation to protect the life of the applicant's son, the applicant was entitled to an effective remedy. Accordingly, the authorities were under the obligation to conduct an effective investigation into the disappearance of the applicant's son. They failed to comply with that obligation. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 13.

The scope of examination of the evidence undertaken in the case and the material on the case file were not sufficient to enable the Court to determine whether the failings identified in the case are part of a practice adopted by the authorities.

Having regard to its other findings, the Court did not consider it necessary to examine A 18 separately.

In the circumstances of the present case, the conduct of the authorities, in particular the gendarme concerned, did not constitute a failure to comply with the obligation of A 34 on the part of the respondent Government.

Non-pecuniary damage (GBP 20,000 in respect of son, GBP 10,000 in respect of applicant), costs and expenses (GBP 20,000 less FF 10,245.06).

Tinnelly and Sons Ltd and Others and McElduff and Others v United Kingdom (1999) 27 EHRR 249 98/51

[Applications lodged 27.5.1992, 26.8.1992; Commission report 8.4.1997; Court Judgment 10.7.1998]

The first applicant, Tinnelly and Sons Ltd, was a contracting firm based in Northern Ireland with experience in the demolition and dismantling of industrial plants as well as asbestos stripping. Mr Patrick Tinnelly, the second applicant, was the firm's managing director and his brother, Mr Gerard Tinnelly, the third applicant, was its company secretary. The second and third applicants are Catholics. Mr Kevin McElduff, Mr Michael McElduff, Mr Paddy McElduff and Mr Barry McElduff, the remaining applicants, were all self-employed joiners based in Northern Ireland. They were all Catholics. In 1984, Northern Ireland Electricity Services (NIE) invited tenders for the demolition of a power station and the purchase of the resulting scrap. The Tinnelly firm submitted the lowest tender. Having regard to their competitive bid as well as to the firm's track record in demolition work, an executive committee of NIE recommended that the firm's bid be accepted. On 26 June 1985 a revised recommendation was drawn up recommending that the contract be given to the Glasgow-based firm of McWilliam Demolition Ltd which had submitted the second lowest tender offer. The applicant firm was not informed of the reasons for this decision. The applicant firm subsequently complained to the Fair Employment Agency (FEA) on the ground that it believed that it had been refused the contracts because of perceived religious beliefs or political opinion. The FEA agreed to investigate the complaint. During the proceedings, on 28 October 1987 the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland issued a certificate under s 42 of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1976 Act to the effect that the decision not to grant Tinnelly the contract in question was 'an act done for the purpose of safeguarding national security or of protecting public safety or public order'. The FEA commenced judicial review proceedings in the High Court of Justice of Northern Ireland. Documents sought by the FEA were covered by a public-interest immunity certificate issued by the Secretary of State. The judicial review application was dismissed.

In about May 1990 the McElduffs were awarded a subcontract subject to security clearance from the Department of the Environment (DOE). They were later informed that they had not been granted security clearance despite having no criminal convictions. They believed that they were discriminated against by the DOE on the grounds of religious belief or political opinion. They requested an explanation from the DOE, but received none. They complained to the Fair Employment Tribunal alleging that the contractor and the DOE had discriminated against them contrary to the 1976 Act. During the proceedings the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland issued a s 42(2) certificate to the effect that the decision to refuse the applicants' admission to the site of the contract was done for the purpose of safeguarding national security. Counsel advised the applicants that the effect of issuing the certificate was to bar the Tribunal from determining the complaint in the applicants' favour; they withdrew their application, which was accordingly dismissed by the Tribunal on 27 March 1992.

They complained that they had been denied access to an independent and impartial tribunal, that the authorities had interfered with their right to respect for their private and family lives, and that they had no effective remedy in respect of their Convention grievances. They also maintained that they were victims of discrimination on, inter alia, religious grounds.

Comm found unanimously V 6, not necessary to determine 8, 13+8 or 14+6.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), not necessary to consider 14+6(1), 8 13+8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mrs E Palm, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr E Levits, Mr T Pantiru.

The 1976 Act guaranteed persons a right not to be discriminated against on grounds of religious belief or political opinion in the job market, including when bidding for a public works contract or subcontract. That clearly defined statutory right, having regard to the context in which it applied and to its pecuniary nature, could be classified as a 'civil right' within the meaning of A 6(1). Had it been established that the applicants were the victims of unlawful discrimination, the County Court in the case of Tinnelly and the Fair Employment Tribunal in the case of the McElduffs could have ordered financial reparation in their favour. The fact that the contracts in issue were public procurement contracts or that the applicants' offers were never accepted could not prevent that right from being considered a 'civil right' for the purposes of A 6(1). Contrary to the Government's submissions, s 42(1) of the Act did not define the scope of the substantive right in limine but provided a respondent with a defence to a complaint of unlawful discrimination. The issue as to whether the act was done for purposes of national security or an act of unlawful discrimination could be submitted to a domestic court or tribunal for determination. A 6(1) was applicable to the proceedings instigated by the applicants under the 1976 and 1989 Acts.

A 6(1) embodied the right to a court, of which the right of access, the right to institute proceedings before a court in civil matters, constituted one aspect. That right was not absolute, but might be subject to limitations. At no stage of the proceedings was there any independent scrutiny by the fact-finding bodies set up under the Acts of the facts which led the Secretary of State to issue the conclusive certificates under s 42 of the 1976 Act. The primary fact-finding body in the Tinnelly case, the Fair Employment Agency, could not pursue its investigation into Tinnelly's complaint. As to the McElduffs, the Fair Employment Tribunal was never presented with any evidence as to why the complainants were considered a security risk by the Department of the Environment and the weight of the McElduffs' assertion that they were victims of mistaken identity could not be verified by the Tribunal since its further consideration of the case was brought to a halt by the issue of a s 42 certificate. The judicial review proceedings in the High Court of Northern Ireland in the Tinnelly case never led to a full scrutiny of the factual basis of the Secretary of State's certificate. The judge was unable to go behind the terms of the s 42 certificate in order to verify the underlying basis for the conclusions and he did not have sight of all the materials on which the Secretary of State had based his decision. The Court was naturally mindful of the security considerations at stake in the instant case and of the need for the authorities to display the utmost vigilance in the award of contracts for work involving access to vital power supplies or public buildings situated in town centres in Northern Ireland. However, there was no reasonable relationship of proportionality between the protection of the national security concerns relied on and the impact which the certificates had on the applicants' right of access to a court. In other contexts it had been found possible to modify judicial procedures in such a way as to safeguard national security concerns about the nature and sources of intelligence information and yet accord the individual a substantial degree of procedural justice. There was nothing to suggest that such arrangements would impair public confidence in the administration of justice in Northern Ireland; it might serve to enhance public confidence. The issue by the Secretary of State of s 42 certificates constituted a disproportionate restriction on the applicants' right of access to a court or tribunal and there had been a breach of A 6(1).

Having regard to the conclusions regarding breach of A 6(1), it was not necessary to determine 14+6(1), 8 or 8+13.

Compensation for loss of opportunity (GBP 15,000 to Tinnelly GBP 10,000 to the McElduffs), expenses (GBP 1,200.14 to Mr Patrick and Mr Gerard Tinnelly, no claim submitted in respect of other applicants).

Tolstoy Miloslavsky v United Kingdom (1995) 20 EHRR 442 95/20

[Application lodged 18.12.1990; Commission report 6.12.1993; Court Judgment 13.7.1995]

Count Nikolai Tolstoy Miloslavsky was a historian. In March 1987 he wrote a pamphlet entitled 'War Crimes and the Wardenship of Winchester College' which contained defamatory statements about Lord Aldington. Aldington instituted libel proceedings. At the end of the trial the jury of 12 found unanimously for Lord Aldington and awarded GBP 1,500,000 damages. The judge also granted an injunction restraining further publication and ordered the applicant to pay Lord Aldington's costs. The applicant gave notice of appeal to the Court of Appeal. Lord Aldington's application for an order requiring the applicant to give security in an amount which would cover the costs of his opponent's representation if the appeal were to be unsuccessful was allowed. The applicant did not furnish the required security and his appeal was dismissed on 3 August 1990. He complained that the Court of Appeal's order making his right to appeal conditional upon his paying security for Lord Aldington's costs gave rise to a breach of his right of access to court and that the libel award and injunction constituted a violation of his right to freedom of expression.

Comm found by majority (10–5) NV 6(1) regarding the applicant's right of access to court, unanimously V 10.

Court found unanimously NV 10 as the award was 'prescribed by law', unanimously V 10 in that the award, having regard to its size taken in conjunction with the state of national law at the relevant time was not 'necessary in a democratic society', unanimously NV 10 in respect of the injunction, either taken alone or together with the award, unanimously 6(1) applicable, by majority (8–1) NV 6(1) in respect of the applicant's right of access to court on account of the security for costs.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Sir John Freeland, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek (pd).

Both the award of damages and the injunction constituted an interference with the exercise by the applicant of his right to freedom of expression. Such an interference entailed a violation of A 10 unless it was prescribed by law, pursued an aim or aims that was or were legitimate under A 10(2) and was necessary in a democratic society to attain the aforesaid aim or aims. The libel as found by the jury was of an exceptionally serious nature. National laws concerning the calculation of damages for injury to reputation had to make allowance for an open-ended variety of factual situations. A considerable degree of flexibility might be called for to enable juries to assess damages tailored to the facts of the particular case. That was reflected in the trial judge's summing-up to the jury. It followed that the absence of specific guidelines in the legal rules governing the assessment of damages had to be seen as an inherent feature of the law of damages in this area. Having regard to the fact that a high degree of flexibility might be justified in this area, the various criteria to be taken into account by juries in the assessment of damages as well as the review exercised by the Court of Appeal, the Court reached the conclusion that the relevant legal rules concerning damages for libel were formulated with sufficient precision. In short, the award was prescribed by law. The award and the injunction pursued the legitimate aim of protecting the reputation or rights of others. The scope of judicial control, at the trial and on appeal, at the time of the applicant's case did not offer adequate and effective safeguards against a disproportionately large award. Having regard to the size of the award in the applicant's case in conjunction with the lack of adequate and effective safeguards at the relevant time against a disproportionately large award, the Court found that there had been a violation of the applicant's rights under A 10.

The award was not necessary in a democratic society as there was not, having regard to its size in conjunction with the state of national law at the relevant time, the assurance of a reasonable relationship of proportionality to the legitimate aim pursued. Accordingly there had been a violation of A 10.

It was not claimed that the jury's finding of libel was incompatible with A 10. The injunction was only a logical consequence of the finding and was framed precisely to prevent the applicant from repeating the libellous allegations against Lord Aldington. There was nothing to indicate that the injunction went beyond that purpose. Nor was there any other ground for holding that the measure, either taken alone or in conjunction with the award, amounted to a disproportionate interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression as guaranteed by A 10.

A 6(1) applied to defamation proceedings, the right to enjoy a good reputation being a 'civil right' within the meaning of that provision. A 6 also applied in relation to a defendant in such proceedings, where the outcome was directly decisive for his or her civil obligations vis-à-vis the plaintiff. Accordingly, A 6(1) applied to the present case. The right of access to the courts may be subject to limitations in the form of regulation by the State. The State enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation. A 6(1) did not guarantee a right of appeal. Nevertheless, a Contracting State which set up an appeal system was required to ensure that persons within its jurisdiction enjoyed before appellate courts the fundamental guarantees in A 6. The security for costs order clearly pursued a legitimate aim, namely to protect Lord Aldington from being faced with an irrecoverable bill for legal costs if the applicant were unsuccessful in the appeal. In addition, since regard was also had to the lack of prospects of success of the applicant's appeal, the requirement could also be said to have been imposed in the interests of a fair administration of justice. The sum required (GBP 124,900) was very substantial and the time-limit (14 days) for providing the money was relatively short. However, there was nothing to suggest that the figure was an unreasonable estimate of Lord Aldington's costs before the Court of Appeal or that the applicant would have been able to raise the money had he been given more time. According to the relevant practice in the Court of Appeal, impecuniosity was a ground for awarding security for costs of an appeal to that court, but only on certain conditions. In exercising its discretion as to whether to grant an application for such an order, the Court of Appeal would consider whether the measure would amount to a denial of justice to the defendant, in particular having regard to the merits of the appeal. If it had reasonable prospects of success, the Court of Appeal would be reluctant to order security for costs. The justification given by the Court of Appeal for ordering security for costs did not disclose any arbitrariness, its decision was based on a full and thorough evaluation of the relevant factors. The national authorities had not overstepped their margin of appreciation in setting the conditions which they did for the applicant to pursue his appeal in the Court of Appeal. It could not be said that those conditions impaired the essence of the applicant's right of access to court or were disproportionate for the purposes of A 6(1).

Tomasi v France (1993) 15 EHRR 1 92/53

[Application lodged 10.3.1987; Commission report 11.12.1990; Court Judgment 27.8.1992]

Mr Félix Tomasi was a shopkeeper and a salaried accountant. At the time of his arrest, he was an active member of a Corsican political organisation which put up candidates for the local elections and of which he was the treasurer. On 23 March 1983 the police apprehended him in his shop on suspicion of having taken part in an attack against the rest centre of the Foreign Legion. He was charged with murder, attempted murder and the carrying of weapons and ammunition. The applicant submitted numerous applications for release which were unsuccessful. On 22 October 1988 he was acquitted and immediately released. On 18 April 1989 he lodged a claim with the Compensation Board at the Court of Cassation. By a decision of 8 November 1991 the Compensation Board awarded the applicant compensation. When in police custody after his arrest the applicant alleged that he had been badly treated. He complained that during his police custody he had suffered inhuman and degrading treatment; he also criticised the length of the proceedings.

Comm found by majority (12–2) V 3, (13–1) V 6(1), unanimously V 5(3).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found V 5(3), V 3, V 6(1).

The right to secure the ending of a deprivation of liberty was to be distinguished from the right to receive compensation for such deprivation. The Code of Criminal Procedure made the award of compensation subject to the fulfilment of specific conditions not required under A 5(3). The applicant had lodged his application in Strasbourg after four years spent in detention. The objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies was therefore dismissed. The objection based on the loss of victim status was open to the same considerations as the plea based on the failure to exhaust domestic remedies and was therefore unfounded.

A 5(3): the period to be taken into consideration began on 23 March 1983, the date of the applicant's arrest, and ended on 22 October 1988 with his release following the delivery of the Gironde assize court's judgment acquitting. It therefore lasted five years and seven months. It fell in the first place to the national judicial authorities to ensure that, in a given case, the pre-trial detention of an accused person did not exceed a reasonable time. They had to examine all the circumstances arguing for or against the existence of a genuine requirement of public interest justifying, with due regard to the principle of the presumption of innocence, a departure from the rule of respect for individual liberty and set them out in their decisions on the applications for release. It was essentially on the basis of the reasons given in these decisions and of the true facts mentioned by the applicant in his applications for release and his appeals that the Court was called upon to decide whether or not there had been a violation of A 5(3).

The persistence of reasonable suspicion that the person arrested has committed an offence was a condition sine qua non for the validity of the continued detention, but, after a certain lapse of time, it no longer sufficed. The grounds for continuing detention put forward by the investigating authorities were the seriousness of the alleged offences, the protection of public order, the need to prevent pressure being brought to bear on the witnesses or to avoid collusion between the co-accused, and the danger of the applicant's absconding. The existence and persistence of serious indications of the guilt of the person concerned undoubtedly constituted relevant factors, but they could not alone justify such a long period of pre-trial detention. By reason of their particular gravity and public reaction to them, certain offences may give rise to public disquiet capable of justifying pre-trial detention, at least for a time. However, that ground could be regarded as relevant and sufficient only provided that it was based on facts capable of showing that the accused's release would actually prejudice public order. In addition, detention would continue to be legitimate only if public order remained actually threatened; its continuation could not be used to anticipate a custodial sentence. There was, from the outset, a genuine risk that pressure might be brought to bear on the witnesses. It gradually diminished, without however disappearing completely. The danger of absconding could not be gauged solely on the basis of the severity of the sentence risked; it had to be assessed with reference to a number of other relevant factors which might either confirm the existence of a danger of absconding or make it appear so slight that it could not justify detention pending trial. In this case, the decisions of the judicial investigating authorities contained scarcely any reason capable of explaining why they considered the risk of his absconding to be decisive and why they did not seek to counter it by, for instance, requiring the lodging of a security and placing him under court supervision. Some of the reasons for dismissing the applicant's applications were both relevant and sufficient, but with the passing of time they became much less so, and it was thus necessary to consider the conduct of the proceedings. The right of an accused in detention to have his case examined with particular expedition should not unduly hinder the efforts of the courts to carry out their tasks with proper care. The French courts in this case did not act with the necessary promptness. The length of the contested detention would not appear to have been essentially attributable either to the complexity of the case or to the applicant's conduct. There had therefore been a violation of A 5(3).

A 3: the Government's objection of failure to exhaust related to a completely different matter and the Government were estopped therefore from relying on that objection. The medical evidence indicated that the applicant's injuries related to the period when he was in custody. The medical certificates and reports, drawn up in total independence by medical practitioners, attested to the large number of blows inflicted on the applicant and their intensity; these were two elements which were sufficiently serious to render such treatment inhuman and degrading. The requirements of the investigation and the undeniable difficulties inherent in the fight against crime, particularly with regard to terrorism, could not result in limits being placed on the protection to be afforded in respect of the physical integrity of individuals. There had accordingly been a violation of A 3.

The Government's objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies in respect of A 6(1) was made for the first time before the Court and was therefore out of time. The Code of Criminal Procedure provided for the filing of a complaint with an application to join the proceedings as a civil party. The right to compensation claimed by the applicant depended on the outcome of his complaint, in other words on the conviction of the perpetrators of the treatment complained of. It was a civil right, notwithstanding the fact that the criminal courts had jurisdiction. Therefore, A 6(1) was applicable. The period to be taken into consideration began on 29 March 1983, the date on which the applicant filed his complaint; it ended on 6 February 1989, with the delivery of the Court of Cassation's judgment. It therefore lasted more than five years and 10 months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was not a particularly complex one. In addition, the applicant hardly contributed to delaying. Responsibility for the delays lay essentially with the judicial authorities. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1).

Torri v Italy 97/37

[Application lodged 8.9.1993; Commission report 23.1.1996; Court Judgment 1.7.1997]

Mr Angelo Torri's son died on 17 November 1978 as a result of a road accident. On 9 July 1979, he made a civil party application seeking leave to join criminal proceedings that had been brought in the Rome District Court (Criminal Division) against the person responsible for the accident in order to secure his conviction and obtain damages. On 17 November 1982 the accused was convicted, sentenced to imprisonment and ordered to pay the applicant damages. On 29 March 1991 the applicant brought proceedings against the convicted defendant and his insurance company in the Rome District Court (Civil Division) seeking compensation for pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage. In a judgment deposited with the registry on 3 June 1995 the District Court allowed the applicant's claim. The insurance company appealed to the Rome Court of Appeal. The case was still proceeding. The applicant complained of the length of criminal proceedings which he had joined as a civil party followed by proceedings for damages.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mrs E Palm, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr U Lôhmus.

Where the national law of a State made provision for proceedings consisting of two stages – the first where the court ruled on, inter alia, the existence of an entitlement to damages and the second when it fixed the amount – it was reasonable to consider that, for the purposes of A 6(1), a civil right was not 'determined' until the amount had been decided. The determination of a right entailed deciding not only on the existence of that right but also on its scope or the manner in which it might be exercised, which included the assessment of damages. When sentencing the defendant, the Rome District Court stated that the quantum of the damages to be paid to the applicant would have to be determined by further proceedings, which obliged him to institute civil proceedings for that purpose. The action for damages was closely linked to the criminal proceedings which the applicant joined as a civil party. Therefore, the preliminary objection that the applicant was out of time regarding the first set of proceedings had to be dismissed.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 9 July 1979, when the applicant lodged his civil party application, and had not yet ended, since the civil proceedings were still pending following an appeal. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. The criminal proceedings lasted just over seven years and two months. Four years and six months then went by before the commencement of the civil action, even though the applicant's lawyer had been served with a copy of the notice of an appeal on points of law and notified of the date of the hearing for oral argument. In the civil proceedings, which had commenced on 29 March 1991, four years elapsed before the Rome District Court's judgment was deposited with the registry. Moreover, on 7 July 1996, the Court of Appeal adjourned the case until June 1997. Those last two periods were too long and in themselves exceeded the 'reasonable time' required by A 6, without it being necessary to consider the length of the criminal proceedings and the question of the applicant's conduct, especially as there was no particular complexity to the case. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 12.10.1985; Commission report 3.7.1990; Court Judgment 12.12.1991]

Mr Stefan Toth was arrested on 11 January 1985 for aggravated fraud. He remained in custody for two years, one month and two days during which time he made a number of bail applications. He complained of his detention.

Comm found unanimously V 5(3), 5(4).

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection, unanimously found V 5(3), by majority (8–1) V 5(4) inasmuch as the proceedings were not adversarial, 5(4) not applicable to proceedings in the Court of Appeal concerning the extensions of the applicant's pre-trial detention.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (pc/pd), Sir Vincent Evans (pd), Mr A Spielmann, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen.

The preliminary objection related to the applicant failing to distinguish between two different types of appeal proceedings and not bringing his complaint within the time limit of one. The Court considered it unrealistic to expect the applicant to make the distinction; his arguments should be considered as a whole and some had been sent within the time limit.

A sine qua non for continued detention was the persistence of a reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence, but after a certain time that was no longer sufficient and the court had to establish whether the other grounds were relevant and sufficient. In this case there were fears the applicant would commit further offences or would abscond; those fears were based on earlier offences and sentences, the severity of sentence risked by the applicant and the gravity of the charges pending against him. The Court found that the national courts had based their decisions on grounds which were relevant and sufficient. The length of the proceedings were not attributable to either the complexity of the case or the applicant's conduct. Delay had been caused by the transmission of original documents, rather than copies, every time a different court heard an application. Although States did not have to provide appeal proceedings for bail applications, where a State had such a system detainees had to have the same guarantees on appeal as at first instance. In the present case, the proceedings before the Court of Appeal had not been adversarial, the applicant and his lawyer were not summoned, but an official of the public prosecutor's office had attended and had been able to reply to questions. The proceedings did not ensure equal treatment, were not adversarial and had violated A 5(4) on that point. Regarding the judicial proceedings instituted in the Court of Appeal for extension of the pre-trial detention, the appellate court was ruling on the framework within which the investigating judge was free to take decisions and was not deciding on bail or custody or substituting its own decisions. The proceedings were not therefore adversarial and A 5(4) did not therefore apply to those judicial review proceedings.

[Application lodged 23.1.1984; Commission report 10.11.1987; Court Judgment 7.7.1989]

The applicant company had its licence to serve alcoholic beverages revoked by the County Administrative Board. The licence was revoked as not complying with special conditions (resulting in overcrowding, most customers being aged 18 and there being a discotheque open all evening). An appeal to the National Board of Health and Welfare was rejected. The applicant complained that the revocation of its drinks licence violated P1A1; it also complained that it did not have the possibility of having the revocation of its licence reviewed by a court.

In considering the question of whether there was a dispute over a right and its civil character, the Court referred to its previous case-law. The dispute had to be genuine and serious, it might relate not only to the actual existence of a right but also to its scope and manner of exercise and the result of the proceedings had to be directly decisive for the right in question. The licence conferred a right on the applicant company, the proceedings led to the withdrawal of the licence and were thus directly decisive for the right at issue. The concept of 'civil rights and obligations' was not to be determined solely by reference to the State's domestic law. The company carried on a private commercial activity which had the object of earning profits and was based on a contractual relationship between the licence holder and the customers. The withdrawal of the licence had adverse effects on the goodwill or value of the applicant's restaurant business. The public law features of the case were not sufficient to exclude it from the category of civil rights under A 6(1). The dispute therefore concerned a civil right. The withdrawal of the licence did not constitute the determination of a criminal charge. Although the revocation was a severe measure it could not be characterised as a penal sanction, even if it was linked to the licensee's behaviour; what was decisive was suitability to sell alcoholic beverages. Neither the County Administrative Board nor the National Board of Health and Welfare met the requirement of a tribunal nor provided a remedy which did.

The economic interests connected with running the restaurant were possessions for the purposes of P1A1. The withdrawal constituted an interference with the applicant's right to peaceful enjoyment. The interference did not fall within the second sentence of the first paragraph; the withdrawal constituted a measure of control of the use of property under the second paragraph of P1A1. The withdrawal of the licence was not contrary to Swedish law and pursued the general interest. As there was no stay of execution the financial repercussions were serious. The heavy burden placed on the applicant had to be weighed against the general interest of the community. The State enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation. Having regard to the legitimate aim of Swedish social policy concerning the consumption of alcohol, the State had not failed to strike a fair balance between the economic interests of the applicant company and the general interests of Swedish society. Accordingly NV P1A1.

Trevisan v Italy 93/11

[Application lodged 2.2.1988; Commission report 9.12.1991; Court Judgment 26.2.1993]

Mr Paolo Trevisan instituted proceedings on 18 July 1986 against the AMP company before the Padua magistrates' court seeking an order requiring AMP to pay him the arrears of salary to which he claimed entitlement, together with damages in respect of the company's failure to fulfil its obligations under his contract of employment and the premature termination of that contract. On 4 May 1987 the Padua magistrates' court ruled that it lacked territorial jurisdiction over the case. The applicant then instituted proceedings against AMP before the Treviso magistrates' court on 9 June 1987. The judgment of the magistrates' court was given on 26 June 1991 partly upholding the applicant's claims. The judgment became final on 7 July 1992. The applicant complained of the length of the civil proceedings.

In view of the Commission's decision on the admissibility of the application (application declared inadmissible as out of time as regards the period prior to 9 June 1987), the period to be taken into consideration began on 9 June 1987, when the AMP company was summonsed before the Treviso magistrates' court; it ended on 7 July 1992, the date on which the latter's decision became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was of some complexity but that did not in itself explain the length of the proceedings. The parties' attempt at conciliation resulted in some delay, for which the State could not be held responsible, but the same could not be said of several periods of inactivity. As to the argument based on the vacant post at the Treviso magistrates' court, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. Special diligence was necessary in employment disputes. In those circumstances and in view of what was at stake in the proceedings for the applicant, the Court could not regard as reasonable the time which elapsed in this case. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Triggiani v Italy 91/19

Mr Emanuele Triggiani was a bank employee. He was arrested on 18 August 1975, under an arrest warrant dated 14 August 1975, issued by the Rome investigating judge, on charges of fraud, forgery and use of forged documents, and criminal association. He was suspended from his job on 12 September 1978 and dismissed in November 1978. The case led to marriage difficulties and his wife sought a divorce; separation was pronounced on 27 July 1977. On 30 September 1981 the applicant was acquitted for lack of evidence. The judgment was filed with the court registry on 11 November 1981. The applicant appealed against the decision, believing that he should be totally cleared of suspicion. By judgment of 28 October 1987, the Rome Court of Appeal declared the applicant not guilty of the offences with which he had been charged. The judgment became final on 1 November 1987. He complained, inter alia, of the length of the proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 14 August 1975, the date on which the investigating judge ordered Mr Triggiani's arrest; it ended on 1 November 1987. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The proceedings were of some complexity owing to the nature of the facts to be established, but the applicant did nothing to slow them down and there were lengthy periods involved in the investigation of the case, the trial at first instance and the appeal proceedings, for which no adequate explanation had been given by the Government. The Court could not regard as reasonable in the instant case a lapse of time of more than 12 years and 2 months. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Tripodi v Italy (1994) 18 EHRR 295 94/4

[Application lodged 9.7.1986; Commission report 14.10.1992; Court Judgment 22.2.1994]

Mrs Rosa Tripodi was a shopkeeper. In 1975 a lawyer, Mr MF, sold her a plot of land adjoining his property in Riace. Numerous disputes arose between them. As a result of Mr MF's complaints, criminal proceedings were instituted against the applicant. Following her trial on 8 November 1983, she was convicted and the District Court sentenced her on 9 May 1984 to suspended imprisonment and a fine. On an appeal, the Reggio di Calabria Court of Appeal quashed the conviction on one count and reduced the suspended prison sentence. The applicant appealed, filing her submissions in a memorial of 11 March 1985. On 2 October 1985 the lawyer appointed by the applicant received the notice fixing the date of the hearing. On 18 November 1985 he asked the court to postpone the hearing set down for 6 December 1985, as his state of health prevented him from attending on that date. He had had an operation and when he had left hospital on 15 November his doctor had prescribed 30 days' total rest for him. The letter reached the registry on 25 November 1985. The hearing before the Court of Cassation was nevertheless held on 6 December 1985. On that date the public prosecutor opposed an adjournment. The Court of Cassation refused to accede to the applicant's lawyer's request and proceeded to hear the case in the latter's absence. In a judgment of the same date, filed with the registry on 14 March 1986, it dismissed the appeals. The applicant complained that, at its hearing on 6 December 1985, the Court of Cassation had examined her appeal in the absence of her lawyer and had failed to appoint a lawyer to take his place.

Comm found unanimously V 6(3)(c).

Court found by majority (7–2) NV 6(3)(c).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (jd), President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (jd), Mr R Pekkanen.

In appeal and cassation proceedings the manner in which A 6(1) and 6(3)(c) were to be applied depended upon the special features of the proceedings in question. Account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings conducted in the domestic legal system and the role of the particular appellate court therein. The Italian Court of Cassation decided on points of law and its proceedings were essentially written. Despite knowing that he would be unable to attend the hearing set down for 6 December 1985, the applicant's lawyer failed to take any action. Yet he could not have been unaware of the statutory provisions on adjournment. He could, and should, have taken steps to ensure that he was replaced for the day of the hearing. He could also have filed a further memorial, or have arranged for the filing of such a memorial by another lawyer, even as late as eight days before the hearing. The State could not be held responsible for a shortcoming on the part of the lawyer appointed by the accused. Having regard to the special features of the procedure in the Court of Cassation and to the conduct of the applicant's lawyer, there had been no violation of A 6(3)(c).

Giuseppe Tripodi v Italy 00/18

[Application lodged 23.9.1996; Court Judgment 25.1.2000]

Mr Giuseppe Tripodi complained of the length of civil proceedings involving expropriation of land.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), that it was not necessary to examine P1A1 or 13.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr B Conforti, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 8 November 1988 and was still pending at 18 October 1999. It had lasted more than 10 years and 11 months at one level of jurisdiction. The length of time could not be considered reasonable.

In the light of that finding it was not necessary to examine P1A1 or A 13.

Trombetta v Italy 97/67

[Application lodged 5.6.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mrs Maria Luisa Trombetta was employed in a local health unit. The present application concerned five sets of proceedings commenced in 1987, 1988 and 1989, concerning the post assigned to the applicant and her remuneration following the dissolution of where she had formerly worked as an administrator. She contested in particular a series of decisions by which her new employer had assigned her to a staff category lower than the one to which she considered herself to be entitled. According to the observations submitted by the applicant in October 1996, the proceedings were still pending.

Comm found by majority (24–5) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (8–1) A 6(1) not applicable.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (d), Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

In the law of many Member States of the Council of Europe there was a basic distinction between civil servants and employees governed by private law. That had led the Court to hold that disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants are as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the present case the applicant was seeking judicial review of a series of decisions in which her employer had assigned her to a staff category lower than the one to which she considered herself to be entitled. The dispute raised by her clearly related to her career and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Regarding her claim for payment of the difference in salary, the award of such compensation by the administrative courts was directly dependent on a prior finding that the employer has acted unlawfully. Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

Trotto v Italy 91/59

[Application lodged 26.3.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 3.12.1991]

Mrs Maria Trotto was a housewife. On 21 May 1985 she brought an action against the 'Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale' (INPS) before the Rome magistrates' court in order to establish her disability pension right. Her claim was dismissed on 29 January 1986 and she appealed. The District Court delivered judgment on 20 April 1989, which was filed with the registry on 11 January 1990. She complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens.

Despite several reminders from the registry, the applicant showed no interest in the proceedings before the Court. There was an implied withdrawal which constituted a fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter. In addition, there was no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. The Court noted other cases in which it had reviewed the reasonableness of the length of civil proceedings.

Trzaska v Poland 00/178

[Application lodged 11.4.1994; Commission report 19.5.1998; Court Judgment 11.7.2000]

Mr Andrzej Trzaska was arrested on 27 June 1991 on suspicion of attempted manslaughter, robbery and rape. A number of hearings were held. His requests for release were refused. On 22 March 1995 he was sentenced to 25 years' imprisonment. On 19 October 1995, following the applicant's appeal, the Katowice Court of Appeal in part quashed the first-instance judgment and ordered that the case be reconsidered. On 27 May 1997 the Katowice Regional Court again convicted the applicant and imposed a sentence of 25 years' imprisonment.

Comm found by majority (30–1) V 5(3) on account of the length of the applicant's pre-trial detention, unanimously V 5(4) in that the proceedings concerning review of his detention on remand had not been truly adversarial, by majority (26–5) V 6(1) in view of the unreasonable length of the proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 5(3), 5(4), 6(1)

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr R Türmen, Mr B Zupancic, Mr R Maruste.

The period which fell to be examined under A 5(3) began not on 27 June 1991, the date on which the applicant was remanded in custody, but on 1 May 1993, when Poland's declaration recognising the right of individual petition for the purposes of former A 25 of the Convention took effect. However, when determining whether the applicant's continued detention after that date was justified in the light of A 5(3), the fact that by 1 May 1993 the applicant had already been kept in custody for one year, ten months and three days had to be taken into account. In principle, conviction by a court marked the end of the period to be considered under A 5(3); from that point on, the detention of the person concerned fell within the scope of A 5(1)(a). The applicant was first convicted on 22 March 1995; his conviction was quashed on appeal on 19 October 1995. During the period following the former date, he was obviously detained 'after conviction by a competent court', not 'for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority'. Notwithstanding the retrospective effect under Polish law of a judgment which quashed his conviction, that period had to be deducted from the period to be considered under A 5(3). Subsequently, on 27 May 1997, he was again convicted. The period under examination therefore lasted three years and six months. The courts relied on the serious character of the offences with which the applicant had been charged and on one occasion on the risk of collusion. No concrete factual circumstances were relied on in respect of the risk of collusion. The risk of re-offending, submitted by the Government, was not expressly referred to in any of the decisions of the domestic authorities and could not be considered as constituting a relevant and sufficient ground for a protracted detention on remand in the present case. There were delays and inactivity in the case. Through its protracted length, the detention in issue breached A 5(3).

A 5(4): the applicant submitted a request for release at the hearing held before the Katowice Regional Court on 23 May 1994. However, that hearing was held after the applicant had been detained for a period of two years and 10 months, of which one year and 23 days after 1 May 1993, the date on which the Court became competent to examine individual petitions against Poland. The Regional Court carried out a review of the lawfulness of the applicant's detention in a manner which respected the principle of equality of arms. However, after such a protracted period of detention, it could not be said that the review was carried out speedily as required by A 5(4). The applicant's detention on remand was also reviewed in other types of proceedings. However, as the law stood at the relevant time, neither the applicant nor his lawyer was entitled to attend the relevant hearing although the prosecutor was, nor did the law require that the prosecutor's submissions in support of the applicant's detention be communicated either to the applicant or to his lawyer. Consequently, the applicant did not have an opportunity to comment on those arguments in order to contest the reasons invoked by the prosecuting authorities to justify his detention. There had been a violation of A 5(4).

A 6(1): the proceedings began on 27 June 1991 when the applicant was arrested, and ended on 18 June 1997 when the judgment of the Katowice Regional Court of 27 May 1997 became final and enforceable. However, having regard to the conclusion in respect of its temporal competence, the Court could only consider the period of four years, one month and eighteen days which elapsed after 1 May 1993, the date on which Poland recognised the right of individual petition. In order to assess the reasonableness of the period under examination, the Court had regard to the stage reached in the proceedings on 1 May 1993 and to the fact that by that date the proceedings against the applicant had already lasted for one year, 10 months and three days. The case disclosed a certain complexity but there were no grounds on which to hold that the case had been particularly complex. The applicant had contributed to the length of proceedings. There were delays on the part of the authorities. Overall, the length of the criminal proceedings contravened A 6(1).

Present judgment constituted just satisfaction in respect of any damage sustained. Costs and expenses (PLN 6,000).

Tsingour v Greece 00/174

[Application lodged 10.3.1998; Court Judgment 6.7.2000]

Mr Djahit Tsingour appealed to the Conseil d'Etat on 30 June 1994 against the refusal of the Order of Pharmacists to admit him as a member. The hearing was postponed on several occasions. The hearing took place on 19 May 1998 and on 12 January the decision of the order was annulled. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr AB Baka, President, Mr CL Rozakis, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mr P Lorenzen, Mr M Fischbach, Mr A Kovler.

The proceedings began with the application to the Conseil d'Etat on 30 June 1994 and ended on 12 January 1999. It had lasted four years, six months and 12 days at one level of jurisdiction. Although a persistent lawyers' strike was capable of disrupting the functioning of a supreme court, decision had nonetheless to be delivered within a reasonable time. The considerable length of the proceedings in these circumstances was difficult to reconcile with the effectiveness and credibility of the judicial system demanded by the Convention.

Tsirlis and Kouloumpas v Greece (1998) 25 EHRR 198 97/27

[Application lodged 26.11.1991; Commission report 7.3.1996; Court Judgment 29.5.1997]

Mr Dimitrios Tsirlis and Mr Timotheos Kouloumpas were religious ministers of the Christian Jehovah's Witnesses of Greece. They applied to be exempted from military service. Their applications were rejected on the ground that Jehovah's Witnesses were not a 'known religion' and they were ordered to report for duty at military training centres. They each presented themselves at their centre but refused to join their unit or wear a military uniform as ordered by a military officer. They were arrested and charged with insubordination. Following trial they were found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment. Both applicants appealed, remaining in detention pending the hearing. In the meantime the Supreme Administrative Court had delivered judgment in which the right of Jehovah's Witnesses ministers of religion to be exempted from military service had been expressly upheld. They were acquitted following trial and released. They complained that their detention was unlawful and amounted to discrimination on account of their religious beliefs, that they had been subjected to inhuman and degrading treatment, and that they did not have a fair hearing in the matter of compensation for their unlawful detention.

Court found unanimously V 5(1), 5(5), not necessary to examine 9, 14+9, 6(1) or 13, NV 3.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr AB Baka, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus.

The applicants' detention fell to be classified as detention 'after conviction by a competent court' and its lawfulness to be examined under sub-para (a) of A 5(1). Detention would in principle be lawful if it is carried out pursuant to a court order. As early as 1975, the Supreme Administrative Court acknowledged that the Jehovah's Witnesses were to be considered as such, and that case-law could unquestionably be regarded as established by 1990. It was not disputed throughout the domestic proceedings that the applicants were ministers of that religion. However, in deciding on the issue of the applicants' criminal liability, and thus on the lawfulness of their detention, the military authorities blatantly ignored this case-law. As a result, the applicants spent 13 and 12 months in detention respectively. Furthermore, the relevant authorities' persistence not to recognise Jehovah's Witnesses as a 'known religion' and the disregard of the applicants' right to liberty that followed, were of a discriminatory nature when contrasted with the way in which ministers of the Greek Orthodox Church obtained exemption. The applicants' detention following their conviction on charges of insubordination had no basis under domestic law and was arbitrary. It could not accordingly be considered to have been 'lawful' for the purposes of A 5(1).

The Military Appeal Court found that the applicants were not entitled under Greek law to any compensation on the ground that their detention had been due to their own 'gross negligence'. In the absence of any enforceable claim for compensation before the domestic authorities, it followed that A 5(5) had also been breached.

Having found that the applicants' detention was arbitrary and hence unlawful for the purposes of A 5(1), it was not necessary to examine the same facts also from the angle of A 9, either taken alone or in conjunction with A 14. In those circumstances, the Court was not required to rule on the Government's preliminary objections of non-exhaustion and that the complaint was introduced after the six-month period.

In matters of compensation for unlawful detention, A 5(5) constituted a lex specialis. Having already found a breach of A 5(5), it was not necessary to examine whether the breach of the State's obligation to grant compensation in respect of the applicants' unlawful detention was also contrary to A 6(1) or 13.

The applicants did not seek to substantiate the complaint under A 3 before the Court and, accordingly, no breach of it had been established.

Tsomtsos and Others v Greece 96/48

[Application lodged 3.8.1992; Commission report 18.10.1995; Court Judgment 15.11.1996 (merits), 31.3.1998 (A 50)]

On 20 August 1986, by means of a joint decision of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Public Works, the State expropriated land of each Mr Nikolaos Tsomtsos and the 100 other applicants' properties in the public interest, in particular to build new sections of the major road between Salonika and Nea Moudania. On 27 November 1987 the applicants applied to the Supreme Administrative Court to have the decisions quashed. Their applications were dismissed. The Salonika Court of First Instance assessed the unit amount for compensation. On account of the application of the presumption created by Law No 653/1977, that the owners of properties on major roads benefit when such roads were widened and had to accordingly contribute to the cost of expropriation if they were expropriated, the State did not compensate the applicants for the area laid down in that Law.

Comm found unanimously V P1A1.

The only remedies A 26 required to be exhausted were those that were available and sufficient and related to the breaches alleged. The failure to take the formal steps referred to by the Government could only have been relevant under the rule requiring domestic remedies to be exhausted if the Supreme Administrative Court had considered the merits of the appeals of those applicants who had produced the necessary documents. However, the Supreme Administrative Court had held that it did not have jurisdiction. Several months after the unit amount for compensation had been assessed and the persons entitled to it judicially determined, a full court of the Court of Cassation had delivered a final ruling holding that the presumption was compatible with the Constitution. Any further proceedings brought by the applicants in the civil courts would therefore have been bound to fail. The objection, that the incompatibility of the presumption with P1A1 had not been raised in the national courts, was not raised before the Commission and there was therefore an estoppel. Consequently, the objection of non-exhaustion was dismissed.

The applicants had been deprived of their property in accordance with the provisions of the legislation, so that new sections of a major road could be built. The expropriation thus pursued a lawful aim in the public interest. When compensation due to the owners of properties expropriated for roadworks to be carried out was being assessed, it was legitimate to take into account the benefit derived from the works by adjoining owners. However, in the system applied in this instance, the compensation was in every case reduced by an amount equal to the value of an area 15 metres wide, without the owners concerned being allowed to argue that in reality the effect of the works concerned either had been of no benefit – or less benefit – to them or had caused them to sustain varying degrees of loss. That system, which was too inflexible, took no account of the diversity of situations, ignoring the differences due in particular to the nature of the works and the layout of the site. It was manifestly without reasonable foundation. In the case of a large number of owners, it necessarily upset the fair balance between the protection of the right to property and the requirements of the general interest. In the instant case, the applicants had strong arguments to put forward in an attempt to show that the construction of the new road, instead of increasing the value of the properties they retained, in practice contributed to a drop in value of the properties and to a deterioration in housing conditions. The applicants thus had to bear an individual and excessive burden which could have been rendered legitimate only if they had had the possibility of proving their alleged loss in the courts and, where appropriate, receiving commensurate compensation. There had therefore been a violation of P1A1.

Tumminelli v Italy 92/37

[Application lodged 29.10.1987; Commission report 5.3.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mr Salvatore Tumminelli was a surveyor. On 29 May 1979 he applied to the presiding judge of the Caltanissetta District Court for a payment order against a Mr M, who he alleged owed him money for professional services. On 31 May 1979 the presiding judge issued an order to pay against Mr M. The proceedings were still pending and the applicant complained of their length.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 31 May 1979, the date of the payment order, and had not yet ended. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was a simple one. There were long delays on the part of the authorities and two particular periods of inactivity. The decision to have recourse to the testimony of a witness was taken in the context of judicial proceedings supervised by a judge. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. In those circumstances a lapse of time of more than 12 years for proceedings which were still at the stage of the investigation could not be regarded as reasonable.

Tusa v Italy 92/33

[Application lodged 7.10.1987; Commission report 5.12.1990; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mr Antonio Tusa was a salesman. On 27 November 1973 he filed a suit with the Agrigento District Court against Mr R and the X insurance company, claiming compensation for damage sustained in a collision between his car and one driven by Mr R. On 16 March 1988 the court declared the defendants jointly and severally liable to pay damages to the applicant. The text of the decision was lodged with the court registry on 28 April 1988. Mr R appealed against the District Court's judgment. By a judgment of 5 April 1991, lodged with the registry on 8 October, the Palermo Court of Appeal dismissed Mr R's appeal and found for the applicant. He complained of the length of the proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 27 November 1973, when the proceedings were instituted against Mr R and the X company in the Agrigento District Court. It had not yet ended, as an appeal to the Court of Cassation from the judgment of the Palermo Court of Appeal remained possible. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was one of some complexity. However, the investigation took more than 12 years. Although the parties contributed to slowing down the proceedings by several requests for adjournments, there were numerous adjournments by the judicial authorities of their own motion. Regarding the backlog of cases and the transfer of the investigating judge, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. There were delays on the part of the authorities. A lapse of time of approximately 18 years for two levels of jurisdiction could not be regarded as reasonable.

Twalib v Greece 98/45

[Application lodged 6.4.1993; Commission report 25.2.1997; Court Judgment 9.6.1998]

Mr Mosses Twalib was a Tanzanian seaman. On 18 February 1990 criminal proceedings were instituted against him for forgery and various drug-related offences. When he appeared before the court on 12 July 1991, his lawyer was absent and the court asked the lawyer of one of the co-accused to act for the applicant as well. A short interval was ordered to enable the appointed lawyer to study the applicant's case file. On 16 July 1991 the applicant was found guilty of importing and transporting drugs and using forged documents. It sentenced him to life imprisonment and a fine. The applicant appealed. On appeal he was again assisted by a court-assigned interpreter and was defended by a lawyer provided by a humanitarian organisation. He was convicted of lesser matters and sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment and a fine. He lodged an appeal on points of law on 26 March 1993 stating that grounds would follow. On 12 July 1993 the Court of Cassation declared the applicant's appeal on points of law inadmissible on the ground that no grounds of appeal had been submitted. His claim to have petitioned the Court of Cassation about his case and to have asked for legal aid was rejected. He complained, inter alia, that the lawyer appointed by the trial court had not had sufficient time and facilities to prepare his defence and that he had not been granted legal aid for the preparation and hearing of his case in the proceedings before the Court of Cassation.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) and 6(3)(c), by majority (24–6) NV 6(1) and 6(3)(b), unanimously NV 6(1) and (3)(e), NV 5(2).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (6–3) NV 6(1)+6(3)(b), unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(c).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr I Foighel, Mr J Makarczyk (pd), Mr P Jambrek (pd), Mr P Kûris, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P Van Dijk (pd).

The applicant affirmed in his pleadings before the Court that he did not wish to pursue the complaints under A 5(2) and A 6(1)+6(3)(e). Accordingly, the Court confined its examination to the applicant's complaints under A 6(1) taken together with A 6(3)(b) and (c).

The Government's arguments on the issue of exhaustion of domestic remedies were closely linked to the merits of the applicant's complaint under A 6(3)(c) concerning the unavailability of legal aid in respect of his appeal on points of law and therefore the preliminary plea would be joined to the merits.

The applicant's counsel was also appearing on behalf of one of his co-accused. Despite the seriousness of the offence and the complexity of the case, the lawyer was afforded very limited time to consult the case file and prepare the applicant's defence. In view of the applicant's submission that there was a conflict of interests between him and his co-accused, the brevity of the period of preparation could hardly be defended on the basis of the argument that the lawyer, as the representative of the co-accused, was largely familiar with the case. There were therefore serious shortcomings in the fairness of the proceedings at first instance which may have adversely affected the position of the applicant. However, on appeal, the applicant was represented by a different lawyer. The Court of Appeal was empowered to examine all questions of fact and of law and to quash the impugned judgment. The applicant's lawyer did not contend on appeal that the conviction was unsafe and that a retrial should be ordered. There was no clear indication that the appellate court could assume that there had been a defect in the first-instance proceedings without being alerted to the matter. The Court of Appeal reached its conclusion after having a hearing at which the applicant and his counsel were present. Given that the applicant had the opportunity to raise the alleged deficiency at the appeal hearing and that there was nothing to suggest that the fairness of the appeal proceedings could be called into question, there had been no violation of A 6(1) in conjunction with para 3(b) in the instant case.

The right of an accused charged with a criminal offence to free legal assistance was one element of the concept of a fair trial in criminal proceedings. The manner in which para 1, as well as para (3)(c), of A 6 was to be applied in relation to appellate or cassation courts depended on the special features of the proceedings involved; account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings conducted in the domestic legal order and the role of the appellate or cassation court therein. The Court was satisfied that the applicant lacked sufficient means to pay for his legal representation in connection with his appeal to the Court of Cassation. In view of the seriousness of the offence for which he was convicted, the severity of the sentence imposed on him and the complexity of the cassation procedure, the interests of justice required that the applicant be granted free legal assistance to pursue an appeal on points of law. The applicant was of foreign origin and unfamiliar with the Greek language and legal system. In those circumstances, the interests of justice required that the applicant be granted free legal assistance in connection with his intended appeal to the Court of Cassation. Greek law made no provision for the grant of legal aid to individuals like the applicant in connection with their appeals on points of law. It was accordingly not of relevance in the instant case that the applicant's request for legal aid was made after the expiry of the time-limit for the appeal: it could not have been complied with.

Having regard to the fact that the law of the respondent State made no provision for the grant of legal aid in connection with an appeal on points of law the Government's preliminary objection had to be dismissed, there had been a violation of A 6(1) taken together with para 3(c).

Tyrer v United Kingdom (1979–80) 2 EHRR 1 78/2

[Application lodged 21.9.1972; Commission report 14.12.1976; Court Judgment 25.4.1978]

Mr Anthony M Tyrer lived in Isle of Man. In 1972, aged 15 and of previous good character, he pleaded guilty before the local juvenile court to an assault charge on a senior pupil. He was sentenced on the same day to three strokes of the birch in accordance with the relevant legislation. His appeal to the High Court of Justice of the Isle of Man was dismissed. The court ordered the applicant to be medically examined in the morning of the same day and had before it a doctor's report that the applicant was fit to receive the punishment. After a considerable wait in a police station for a doctor to arrive, the applicant was birched late in the afternoon of the same day. His father and a doctor were present. The applicant was made to take down his trousers and underpants and bend over a table; he was held by two policemen whilst a third administered the punishment, pieces of the birch breaking at the first stroke. The birching raised, but did not cut, the applicant's skin and he was sore for about a week and a half afterwards. The applicant claimed a breach of A 3. In January 1976, the Commission was notified that the applicant wished to withdraw his application. However, the Commission decided that it could not accede to this request since the case raised questions of a general character affecting the observance of the Convention which necessitated a further examination of the issues involved. The applicant took no further part in the proceedings.

Comm found by a majority (14–1) V 3, not necessary to examine 14.

Court held by a majority (6–1) V 3; unanimously not necessary to examine 3+14.

Judges: Mr G Balladore Pallieri, President, Mr J Cremona, Mrs H Pedersen, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice (d), Mr P-H Teitgen, Mr F Matscher.

The preliminary application to have the case struck from the list in view of the fact that the applicant had declared that he wished to withdraw his complaint was refused. Under the rules, the Court could strike out of its list a case brought before it by the Commission, but only when the Court 'was informed of a friendly settlement, arrangement or other fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter'. The Commission never examined the circumstances surrounding the applicant's request and the Court received no indication that the applicant's declaration of withdrawal was a fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter. The proposed abolition of corporal punishment as a penalty for the offence of which the applicant had been convicted could not be regarded as such a fact.

The applicant claimed a breach of A 3, alleging that there had been torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, or any combination thereof. The Court held that the applicant's punishment did not amount to 'torture', nor was the level of suffering reached for the punishment to be classified as 'inhuman'. The question was whether the applicant was subjected to a 'degrading punishment'. A person may be humiliated by the mere fact of being criminally convicted. However, for the purposes of A 3 he should be humiliated not simply by his conviction but by the execution of the punishment which was imposed on him. In most, if not all cases, this might be one of the effects of judicial punishment, involving as it did unwilling subjection to the demands of the penal system. A 3, by expressly prohibiting inhuman and degrading punishment, implied that there was a distinction between such punishment and punishment in general. In order for a punishment to be degrading and in breach of A 3, the humiliation or debasement involved had to attain a particular level and had to in any event be other than that usual element of humiliation referred to above. The assessment was relative, depending on all the circumstances of the case and, in particular, on the nature and context of the punishment itself and the manner and method of its execution. It was never permissible to have recourse to punishments which were contrary to A 3, whatever their deterrent effect may be. The Convention was a living instrument which had to be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions. The Court was influenced by the developments and commonly accepted standards in the penal policy of the member States of the Council of Europe in this field. Publicity may be a relevant factor in assessing whether a punishment was degrading within the meaning of A 3, but the Court did not consider that absence of publicity would necessarily prevent a given punishment from falling into that category: it may well suffice that the victim was humiliated in his own eyes, even if not in the eyes of others. The very nature of judicial corporal punishment was that it involved one human being inflicting physical violence on another human being. It was institutionalised violence: permitted by the law, ordered by the judicial authorities of the State and carried out by the police authorities of the State. Although the applicant did not suffer any severe or long-lasting physical effects, his punishment constituted an assault on precisely that which it was one of the main purposes of A 3 to protect, namely, a person's dignity and physical integrity. Neither could it be excluded that the punishment may have had adverse psychological effects. The institutionalised character of this violence was further compounded by the whole aura of official procedure attending the punishment and by the fact that those inflicting it were total strangers to the offender. There had been an interval of several weeks since the applicant's conviction by the juvenile court and a considerable delay in the police station where the punishment was carried out. Accordingly, in addition to the physical pain he experienced, the applicant was subjected to the mental anguish of anticipating the violence he was to have inflicted on him. In the present case, it was not relevant that the sentence was imposed for an offence of violence, nor was it relevant that birching was an alternative to a period of detention: the fact that one penalty may be preferable to, or have less adverse effects or be less serious than, another penalty did not of itself mean that the first penalty was not degrading within the meaning of A 3. The applicant was subjected to a punishment in which the element of humiliation attained the level inherent in the notion of degrading punishment. The indignity of having the punishment administered over the bare posterior aggravated the degrading character of the applicant's punishment but it was not the only or determining factor. There was therefore a violation of A 3.

It was not necessary to examine the question of breach of A 14.

Not necessary to apply A 50 as there was no longer an applicant associated with the case.

Umlauft v Austria (1996) 22 EHRR 76 95/35

[Application lodged 23.8.1989; Commission report 19.5.1994; Court Judgment 23.10.1995]

On 16 October 1987 Mr Helmut Umlauft was stopped by the police while driving his car. He refused to submit to a breath test. In a sentence order of the same day the Bregenz district authority ordered him to pay a fine of ATS 10,000 with 480 hours' imprisonment in default, for an offence under the Road Traffic Act. The applicant's appeal against that decision to the Vorarlberg regional government, was dismissed on 19 January 1988. On 8 March 1988 he applied to the Constitutional Court. On 14 October 1988, at the conclusion of a consideration of the case in private, the Constitutional Court declined to accept the appeal for adjudication. At the applicant's request, it referred the application to the Administrative Court on 13 December 1988. On 20 January 1989 the Administrative Court dismissed the appeal. The court refused to refer the case to the Constitutional Court. He complained that he had not had access to a court with full jurisdiction.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) as regards access to a court and that no separate issue arose under as to the failure to hold a hearing.

Court found unanimously V 6(1) as regards access to a court, not necessary to examine the complaint based on the lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr SK Martens (so), Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk.

In order to determine whether an offence qualified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention, it was first necessary to ascertain whether or not the provision defining the offence belonged, in the legal system of the respondent State, to criminal law; next, the very nature of the offence and the degree of severity of the penalty risked had to be considered. Although the offences in issue and the procedures followed in the case fell within the administrative sphere, they were nevertheless criminal in nature. That was moreover reflected in the terminology employed. In addition, the fine imposed on the applicant was accompanied by an order for his committal to prison in the event of his defaulting on payment. Those considerations were sufficient to establish that the offence of which the applicant was accused could be classified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that A 6 applied.

The Austrian reservation did not apply in the instant case as it related to A 5, whereas the applicant's complaints were based on A 6, and did not include the Road Traffic Act 1960.

Decisions taken by administrative authorities which did not themselves satisfy the requirements of A 6(1) had to be subject to subsequent control by a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. The Constitutional Court was not such a body. In the present case it could look at the impugned proceedings only from the point of view of their conformity with the Constitution, and that did not enable it to examine all the relevant facts. It accordingly lacked the powers required under A 6(1). The powers of the Administrative Court had to be assessed in the light of the fact that the court in this case was sitting in proceedings that were of a criminal nature for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that when the compatibility of those powers with A 6(1) was being gauged, regard had to be had to the complaints raised in that court by the applicant as well as to the defining characteristics of a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. Those included the power to quash in all respects, on questions of fact and law, the decision of the body below. As the Administrative Court lacked that power, it could not be regarded as a tribunal within the meaning of the Convention. It followed that the applicant did not have access to a tribunal. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6 on that point.

Having regard to that it was not necessary to examine the complaint of lack of a hearing.

Unión Alimentaria Sanders SA v Spain (1990) 12 EHRR 25 89/11

[Application lodged 5.7.1985; Commission report 13.10.1988; Court Judgment 7.7.1989]

The applicant company brought an action in a Barcelona Court of First Instance on 2 May 1979 to recover money owed. On 18 October 1986, Unión Alimentaria Sanders SA applied to the Barcelona Court of First Instance No 9 for enforcement of the Court of Appeal's judgment of 13 September 1986 and seizure of the defendants' assets. That application was still pending. The applicant complained about the length of time it had taken to hear the case.

Comm found by majority (13–1) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr R Macdonald, Mr J De Meyer, Mr JA Carrillo Salcedo.

The period to be considered began on 1 July 1981, when Spain's declaration accepting the right of individual petition took effect. However, in order to determine the reasonableness of the period which elapsed after then, regard had to be had to the stage which the proceedings had reached at that juncture. Regarding the end of the period, two phases had to be distinguished. The first had lasted until 13 September 1986, when the Barcelona Court of Appeal's judgment was notified to the parties; the second consisted of the enforcement proceedings. The latter proceedings, which depended entirely on the initiative of the applicant company, began on 18 October 1986 and had still not been concluded. The Court concentrated on the first phase, which lasted five years, two months and 13 days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard, inter alia, to its complexity and the conduct of the applicant and the competent authorities. The applicant was only required to show diligence in carrying out the procedural steps relevant to him, to refrain from using delaying tactics and to avail himself of the scope afforded by domestic law for shortening the proceedings. The present case was not complex and the applicant had shown diligence. There had been two periods of inactivity amounting to more than three and a half years; such delay could only be justified by very exceptional circumstances. A temporary backlog of court business did not make a State liable if appropriate remedial action was taken with requisite promptness. In such circumstances it was legitimate as a temporary expedient to decide on a particular order in which cases would be dealt with, based on urgency and importance. However, the urgency of a case increased with time. In the present case the backlog had become organisationally inbuilt and the remedial measures taken were insufficient and belated. The length of the proceedings was excessive.

United Communist Party of Turkey and Others v Turkey (1998) 26 EHRR 121 98/1

[Application lodged 7.1.1992; Commission report 3.9.1996; Court Judgment 30.1.1998]

The United Communist Party of Turkey (TBKP), the first applicant, was a political party formed on 4 June 1990. Mr Nihat Sargin and Mr Nabi Yagci, the second and third applicants, were respectively Chairman and General Secretary of the TBKP. On the day of its formation, its constitution and programme were submitted to the office of Principal State Counsel at the Court of Cassation for assessment of their compatibility with the Constitution and Law. On 14 June 1990, when the TBKP was preparing to participate in a general election, Principal State Counsel at the Court of Cassation applied to the Constitutional Court for an order dissolving the TBKP. He accused the party of having sought to establish the domination of one social class over the others, of having incorporated the word 'communist' into its name, of having carried on activities likely to undermine the territorial integrity of the State and the unity of the nation and of having declared itself to be the successor to a previously dissolved political party, the Turkish Workers' Party. On 16

July 1991 the Constitutional Court made an order dissolving the TBKP on the grounds of its name and its constitution and programme. The leaders, including the applicants, were banned from holding similar office in any other political party. They complained that the dissolution and the ban had infringed their right to freedom of association.

Comm found unanimously V 11, no separate issue under 9 and 10, no need to consider separately 14 and 18 and P1A1, P1A3.

Court found unanimously V 11, not necessary to examine 9, 10, 14, 18 and P1A1, P1A3.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr P van Dijk.

The wording of A 11 provided an initial indication as to whether political parties could rely on that provision; trade unions were but one example among others of the form in which the right to freedom of association might be exercised. Political parties were a form of association essential to the proper functioning of democracy and in view of the importance of democracy in the Convention system, there could be no doubt that political parties came within the scope of A 11. An association, including a political party, was not excluded from the protection afforded by the Convention simply because its activities were regarded by the national authorities as undermining the constitutional structures of the State and calling for the imposition of restrictions. A 1 made no distinction as to the type of rule or measure concerned and did not exclude any part of the Member States' jurisdiction from scrutiny under the Convention.. The political and institutional organisation of the Member States had accordingly to respect the rights and principles enshrined in the Convention. Some compromise between the requirements of defending democratic society and individual rights was inherent in the system of the Convention. The protection afforded by A 11 lasted for an association's entire life and dissolution of an association by a country's authorities had accordingly to satisfy the requirements of para 2 of A 11. A 11 was applicable to the facts of the case.

There had been an interference with the right in respect of all three applicants. The interference was prescribed by law. The dissolution of the TBKP pursued at least one of the legitimate aims set out in A 11, the protection of national security. Notwithstanding its autonomous role and particular sphere of application, A 11 also had to be considered in the light of A 10. The fact that their activities formed part of a collective exercise of freedom of expression in itself entitled political parties to seek the protection of A 10 and 11. Political parties made an irreplaceable contribution to political debate, which was at the very core of the concept of a democratic society. The Court had identified certain provisions of the Convention as being characteristic of democratic society. The exceptions set out in A 11 were, where political parties were concerned, to be construed strictly; only convincing and compelling reasons could justify restrictions on such parties' freedom of association. In determining whether a necessity within the meaning of A 11(2) existed, the Contracting States had only a limited margin of appreciation, which went hand in hand with rigorous European supervision. The TBKP was dissolved even before it had been able to start its activities on the basis of its constitution and programme. A political party's choice of name could not, in principle, justify a measure as drastic as dissolution, in the absence of other relevant and sufficient circumstances. In the absence of any concrete evidence to show that in choosing to call itself 'communist', the TBKP had opted for a policy that represented a real threat to Turkish society or the Turkish State, the Court could not accept that the submission based on the party's name might, by itself, entail the party's dissolution. There could be no justification for hindering a political group solely because it sought to debate in public the situation of part of the State's population and to take part in the nation's political life in order to find, according to democratic rules, solutions capable of satisfying everyone concerned. There was no evidence to conclude that the party bore any responsibility for the problems which terrorism posed in Turkey. There was need to bring A 17 into play. A measure as drastic as the immediate and permanent dissolution of the TBKP, ordered before its activities had even started and coupled with a ban barring its leaders from discharging any other political responsibility, was disproportionate to the aim pursued and consequently unnecessary in a democratic society. It followed that the measure infringed A 11 of the Convention.

The applicants did not pursue their complaints under A 9, 10, 14 and 18 in the proceedings before the Court, which saw no reason to consider them of its own motion.

The measures complained of under P1A1 and P1A3 by the applicants were incidental effects of the TBKP's dissolution, which the Court had held to be in breach of A 11. It was therefore unnecessary to consider those complaints separately.

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction in respect of any damage sustained by Mr Sargin and Mr Yagci. Costs and expenses (FF 120,000).

Unterpertinger v Austria (1991) 13 EHRR 175 86/13

[Application lodged 1.9.1980; Commission report 11.10.1984; Court Judgment 24.11.1986]

Mr Alois Unterpertinger was charged with assaulting his wife and step-daughter. They declined to give evidence, as was their right as close relatives, and their statements were read. He claimed self-defence regarding the attack on his daughter and insufficient agility and strength to kick his wife's thumb such as to break it. He was convicted and sentenced to 6 months' imprisonment. His appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed. He claimed a breach of A 6.

Comm found by majority (5–5 with the President's casting vote) NV 6(3)(d), (5–4 with one abstention) NV 6(1).

Court unanimously found V 6.

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr W Ganshof van der Meersch, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo.

Although the refusal to give evidence prevented the trial judge from hearing the witnesses and the defence and prosecution from examining them during oral proceedings, that was not manifestly incompatible with A 6(1) and (3)(d). The reading out of the statements before the trial judge and Court of Appeal was not inconsistent with A 6(1) and (3)(d) but the use made of them as evidence had to comply with the rights of the defence. The applicant had not been able to examine the witnesses. Although he was able to submit his comments freely during the hearing, the Court of Appeal had refused to admit evidence he wished to adduce to put his, now former, wife and step-daughter's credibility in doubt. The courts had other evidence before them but had convicted the applicant mainly on the statements of the former wife and step-daughter. The courts had treated those statements not as items of information but as proof of the truth of the accusations made by the women at the time. The applicant's rights were therefore appreciably restricted and he did not have a fair trial. There had been a breach of A 6(1) taken together with the principles in (3)(d).

V v United Kingdom 99/122

[Application lodged 20.5.1994; Commission report 4.12.1998; Court Judgment 16.12.1999]

The applicant was born in August 1982. On 12 February 1993, when he was ten years old, he and another ten-year-old boy, T, had played truant from school and abducted a two-year-old boy from a shopping precinct, taken him on a journey of over two miles and then battered him to death and left him on a railway line to be run over. The applicant and T were arrested in February 1993 and detained pending trial. Their trial took place over three weeks in November 1993, in public, at an adult Crown Court before a judge and 12 jurors. Following their conviction for murder, the judge sentenced them, as required by law, to detention during Her Majesty's pleasure. There had to be set a tariff to satisfy the requirements of retribution and deterrence. The trial judge set the tariff at 8 years. The Home Secretary set the tariff at 15 years in respect of each applicant. That decision was quashed in judicial review proceedings by the House of Lords on 12 June 1997. The applicant complained that, in view of his young age, his trial in public in an adult Crown Court and the punitive nature of his sentence constituted violations of his right not to be subjected to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment as guaranteed under A 3. He further complained that he had been denied a fair trial in breach of A 6 of the Convention, that he had suffered discrimination in breach of A 14 in that a child aged younger than ten at the time of the alleged offence would not have been held criminally responsible, that the sentence imposed on him of detention during Her Majesty's pleasure amounted to a breach of his right to liberty under A 5, and that the fact that a government minister, rather than a judge, was responsible for setting the tariff violated his rights under A 6. Finally, he complained under A 5(4) of the Convention that he had not had the opportunity to have the continuing lawfulness of his detention examined by a judicial body, such as the Parole Board.

Comm found by majority (17–2) NV 3 in respect of the trial, (14–5) V 6 in respect of the trial, (15–4) no separate issue under 14 in respect of the trial, (17–2) NV 3 or 5(1) in respect of the sentence, (18–1) V 6 in respect of the fixing of the sentence, (18–1) V 5(4).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (12–5) NV 3 in respect of trial, (16–1) V 6(1) in respect of the trial, unanimously not necessary to examine 6(1)+14, (10–7) NV 3 in respect of sentence, unanimously NV 5(1), V 6(1) in respect of the setting of the applicant's tariff, V 5(4).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr CL Rozakis (pd), Mr A Pastor Ridruejo (jpd), Mr G Ress (jpd), Mr J Makarczyk (jpd), Mr P Kûris, Mr R Türmen, Mr J-P Costa (pd), Mrs F Tulkens (jpd), Mr C Bîrsan, Mr P Lorenzen, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych (jpd), Mr J Casadevall, Mr AB Baka (pd), Lord Reed (c), ad hoc judge.

The Government had not discharged the burden upon them of proving the availability to the applicant of a remedy capable of providing redress in respect of his Convention complaints and offering reasonable prospects of success. Therefore the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was dismissed.

The attribution of criminal responsibility to the applicants in respect of acts committed at the age of ten did not in itself give rise to a breach of A 3 of the Convention. The criminal proceedings took place over three weeks in public in an adult Crown Court with attendant formality. The Court was not convinced that the particular features of the trial process as applied to the applicant caused, to a significant degree, suffering going beyond that which would inevitably have been engendered by any attempt by the authorities to deal with the applicant following the commission by him of the offence in question. The applicant's trial did not give rise to a violation of A 3 of the Convention.

A 6: it was essential that a child charged with an offence was dealt with in a manner which took full account of his age, level of maturity and intellectual and emotional capacities, and that steps were taken to promote his ability to understand and participate in the proceedings. In respect of a young child charged with a grave offence attracting high levels of media and public interest, it would be necessary to conduct the hearing in such a way as to reduce as far as possible his or her feelings of intimidation and inhibition, or, where appropriate in view of the age and other characteristics of the child and the circumstances surrounding the criminal proceedings, to provide a modified procedure of selected attendance rights and judicious reporting. The trial took place over three weeks in public in the Crown Court. Special measures were taken in view of the applicant's young age and to promote his understanding of the proceedings: for example, he had the trial procedure explained to him and was taken to see the courtroom in advance, and the hearing times were shortened so as not to tire the defendant excessively. Nonetheless, the formality and ritual of the Crown Court must at times have seemed incomprehensible and intimidating for a child of 11, and there was evidence that certain of the modifications to the courtroom, in particular the raised dock, which was designed to enable the defendant to see what was going on, had the effect of increasing the applicant's sense of discomfort during the trial, since he felt exposed to the scrutiny of the press and public. There was psychiatric evidence that the applicant was suffering from post-traumatic effects and found it very difficult and distressing to think or talk about the events in question, to concentrate during the trial or discuss the offence with his lawyers. In such circumstances it was not sufficient for the purposes of A 6(1) that the applicant was represented by skilled and experienced lawyers. Although his legal representatives were seated, as the Government put it, 'within whispering distance', it was highly unlikely that the applicant would have felt sufficiently uninhibited, in the tense courtroom and under public scrutiny, to have consulted with them during the trial or, indeed, that, given his immaturity and his disturbed emotional state, he would have been capable outside the courtroom of co-operating with his lawyers and giving them information for the purposes of his defence. The applicant was therefore unable to participate effectively in the criminal proceedings against him and was, in consequence, denied a fair hearing in breach of A 6(1).

The applicant did not maintain his complaint under 14+6 before the Court, which saw no reason of its own motion to examine it.

A 3 sentence: States had a duty under the Convention to take measures for the protection of the public from violent crime. The punitive element inherent in the tariff approach did not give rise to a breach of A 3 and the Convention did not prohibit States from subjecting a child or young person convicted of a serious crime to an indeterminate sentence allowing for the offender's continued detention or recall to detention following release where necessary for the protection of the public. Until a new tariff had been set, it was not possible to draw any conclusions regarding the length of punitive detention to be served by the applicant who had by now been detained for six years since his conviction in November 1993. In all the circumstances of the case including the applicant's age and his conditions of detention, a period of punitive detention of this length could not be said to amount to inhuman or degrading treatment. There had been no violation of A 3 in respect of the applicant's sentence.

The sentence of detention during Her Majesty's pleasure was lawful under English law and was imposed in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law. It could not be said that the applicant's detention was not in conformity with the purposes of the deprivation of liberty permitted by A 5(1)(a) so as to be arbitrary. There had been no violation of A 5(1).

A 6(1) covered the whole of the proceedings in issue, including appeal proceedings and the determination of sentence. The tariff was served to satisfy the requirements of retribution and deterrence, and thereafter it was legitimate to continue to detain the offender only if that appeared to be necessary for the protection of the public. Where a juvenile sentenced to detention during Her Majesty's pleasure was not perceived to be dangerous, the tariff represented the maximum period of detention which he could be required to serve. The fixing of the tariff amounted to a sentencing exercise and, accordingly, A 6(1) was applicable to the procedure. A 6(1) guaranteed, inter alia, a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal. Independent in this context meant independent of the parties to the case and also of the executive. The Home Secretary, who set the applicant's tariff, was not independent of the executive, and it followed that there had been a violation of A 6(1).

As the sentence of detention during Her Majesty's pleasure was indeterminate and the tariff was initially set by the Home Secretary rather than the sentencing judge, the judicial supervision required by A 5(4) was not incorporated in the trial court's sentence. The Home Secretary's decision setting the tariff was quashed by the House of Lords on 12 June 1997 and no new tariff had since been substituted. That failure to set a new tariff meant that the applicant's entitlement to access to a tribunal for periodic review of the continuing lawfulness of his detention remained inchoate. It followed that the applicant has been deprived, since his conviction in November 1993, of the opportunity to have the lawfulness of his detention reviewed by a judicial body in accordance with A 5(4).

Vacher v France 96/61

[Application lodged 18.11.1991; Commission report 5.4.1995; Court Judgment 17.12.1996]

Mr Gérard Vacher was a company director. On 21 September 1988 the Public Works Department lodged a criminal complaint against him alleging offences under the Town Planning Code and, more particularly, that he had built a wall without first obtaining planning permission. On 9 February 1990 the Nanterre Criminal Court sentenced the applicant to a fine and ordered him to alter the wall so that it complied with regulations. His appeal to the Versailles Court of Appeal was dismissed. On 28 May 1991 Mr Vacher lodged a notice of appeal on points of law against the judgment of the Versailles Court of Appeal with that court's registry. On 19 June 1991 the case file for the appeal was registered by the Court of Cassation registry. On 14 August 1991 the applicant filed a pleading in support of his appeal. On 3 September 1991 the chief registrar of the Court of Cassation sent the applicant a letter informing him that the Court of Cassation delivered a judgment on 6 August 1991 dismissing his appeal and that as his pleading was received at the registry on 14 August 1991 it would be disregarded as being out of time. The applicant complained that he had not had a fair trial as the Court of Cassation had dismissed his appeal on points of law for failure to lodge grounds of appeal, without informing him of the time-limit for filing a pleading.

The new complaint under A 6(3)(a) was outside the scope of the case as defined by the Commission's decision on admissibility.

As the requirements A 6(3)(b) and (c) constituted specific aspects of the right to a fair trial, guaranteed under A 6(1), the Court would examine all the complaints under the three provisions taken together. The manner in which A 6 applied depended upon the special features of the proceedings involved. States had to ensure that everyone charged with a criminal offence benefited from the safeguards provided by A 6(3). Putting the onus on convicted appellants to find out when an allotted period of time started to run or expired was not compatible with the diligence which the Contracting States had to exercise to ensure that the rights guaranteed by A 6 were enjoyed in an effective manner. As there was no fixed date for filing a pleading and the Court of Cassation took less time than usual to hear the appeal, without the applicant being either warned of the fact by the registry or able to foresee it, he was deprived of the possibility of putting his case in the Court of Cassation in a concrete and effective manner. There had therefore been a violation of A 6.

Valenzuela Contreras v Spain 98/57

[Application lodged 2.5.1995; Commission report 11.4.1997; Court Judgment 30.7.1998]

Mr Cosme Valenzuela Contreras was deputy head of personnel of the W company. On 12 November 1984, following a complaint lodged by Mrs M, an employee, against a person or persons unknown in respect of insulting and threatening telephone calls and letters she had received, a criminal investigation was started. A number of people had their telephone lines monitored. On 19 November 1985 the investigating judge made an order, under the Constitution and the Code of Criminal Procedure, for the monitoring of the private telephone lines of the applicant. As a result of investigations, the applicant was committed for trial. On 8 May 1992 the Madrid Audiencia provincial convicted the applicant of making threats by letter and on the telephone and sentenced him to four months imprisonment, fines and ordered him to pay Mrs M compensation. The applicant's appeals to the Supreme Court and to the Constitutional Court were dismissed. He complained, inter alia, that the monitoring of his telephone line had infringed his right to respect for his private life.

Comm found by majority (11–6) V 8.

Court unanimously found no jurisdiction under 6, V 8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Casadevall, Mr V Butkevych.

Since the compass of the case before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility, the Court had no jurisdiction to revive issues declared inadmissible, in this case under A 6.

Telephone calls from a person's home came within the notions of private life and correspondence referred to in A 8. The tapping of the applicant's telephone line between 26 November and 20 December 1985 constituted an interference by a public authority in the applicant's exercise of his right to respect for his private life and correspondence. There was a legal basis in Spanish law and the law was accessible. The requirement that the effects of the law be foreseeable meant, in the sphere of monitoring telephone communications, that the guarantees stating the extent of the authorities' discretion and the manner in which it was to be exercised had to be set out in detail in domestic law so that it had a binding force which circumscribed the judges' discretion in the application of such measures. The law had to be sufficiently clear in its terms to give citizens an adequate indication as to the circumstances in and the conditions on which public authorities were empowered to resort to this secret and potentially dangerous interference with the right to respect for private life and correspondence. The Spanish law, both written and unwritten, did not indicate with sufficient clarity at the material time the extent of the authorities' discretion in the domain concerned or the way in which it should be exercised. The applicant did not, therefore, enjoy the minimum degree of legal protection to which citizens were entitled under the rule of law in a democratic society. There had therefore been a violation of A 8.

No causal link between violation found and alleged pecuniary damage.

Vallée v France (1994) 18 EHRR 549 94/16

[Application lodged 9.6.1993; Commission report 7.12.1993; Court Judgment 26.4.1994]

Mr Alain Vallée was infected with the HIV virus between November 1984 and June 1985. As a haemophiliac, he had received frequent blood transfusions. On 12 December 1989 he submitted a preliminary claim for compensation to the Minister for Solidarity, Health and Social Protection, maintaining that he had been infected as a result of the Minister's negligent delay in implementing appropriate rules for the supply of blood products. On 30 March 1990 the Director-General for Health rejected his claim. On 31 May 1990 he applied to the Administrative Court for the annulment of the ministerial decision and for compensation from the State. On 28 May 1993 the Paris Administrative Court gave judgment for the applicant. In the same decision the court referred the case to the Conseil d'Etat for an opinion on a point of law. On 15 October 1993 the Conseil d'Etat gave its opinion. On 5 January 1994 the Administrative Court ordered the payment of money to the applicant. The judgment was served on the applicant on 4 March 1994. Earlier, on 3 March 1992 the applicant had submitted a claim to the Compensation Fund set up by statute. Following court proceedings, the Fund sent the applicant a cheque for compensation on 18 December 1992. On 22 June 1992 the applicant had applied to the Paris Criminal Court to be joined as a civil party to the proceedings at the trial of certain senior officials of the blood transfusion service. On 23 October 1992 the court awarded him FF 300,000 as compensation for deception as to the quality of the products. The applicant alleged that his case had not been heard within a reasonable time as required under A 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr N Valticos, Sir John Freeland, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr K Jungwiert.

It was not disputed that A 6(1) was applicable. The period to be taken into consideration began on 12 December 1989, when the applicant lodged his preliminary claim with the Minister for Solidarity, Health and Social Protection. At the time of the Court's judgment it had not yet ended, as the time-limit for filing an appeal against the judgment adopted by the Paris Administrative Court had not yet expired. It had already lasted more than four years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. On the latter point, what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation had to be taken into account. Even if the case was of some complexity, the information needed to determine the State's liability had been available for a long time. In any event, the opinion of the Conseil d'Etat could have been sought earlier in the proceedings. The problems raised by the existence of two parallel sets of proceedings in the administrative courts and before the Compensation Fund could not justify the length of the proceedings in question. The applicant did not contribute to the delay. What was at stake in the contested proceedings was of crucial importance for the applicant in view of his incurable disease and his reduced life expectancy. He was infected in 1985 and as early as 1987 was classified as having reached the last stage of infection. Exceptional diligence was called for in this instance, notwithstanding the number of cases which were pending, in particular as it was a controversy the facts of which had been known to the Government for several years and the seriousness of which must have been obvious to them. The Administrative Court did not use its powers to expedite the proceedings, although it was aware of case-law and of the applicant's state of health. Several periods were abnormally long: the 22 months between the application to the Versailles Administrative Court and the first hearing; the 7 months from the filing of the applicant's memorial to the second hearing; and the period of nearly 5 months between the adoption of the Conseil d'Etat's opinion and the notification of the Administrative Court's judgment. A period of more than four years to obtain a judgment in first-instance proceedings far exceeded a reasonable time in a case of this nature. Such a reasonable time had been exceeded even before the applicant was paid compensation by the Fund in December 1992. After that date, what was at stake in the proceedings in terms of compensation for both pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage continued to be of great importance for the applicant. There was a violation of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 23.10.1981; Commission report 8.5.1984; Court Judgment 3.6.1985]

Mr Daniel Vallon was wanted in France for murder and attempted murder, and was arrested in Genoa on an international warrant on 4 December 1976. Extradition proceedings were commenced on 25 September 1979 and refused. The applicant was not released, but prosecuted in Italy for the crimes committed in France. On 16 March 1982 he was sentenced to 14 years' imprisonment. After appeal, the judgment became final on 18 January 1983. He complained about the length of detention on remand and the length of the proceedings.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached by the Government and the applicant. There were no reasons of public policy justifying the continuation of the proceedings. In particular, the Court recalled that it had already determined, in the context of A 5(3) and A 6(1), legal issues analogous to those arising in the instant case.

Valsamis v Greece 99/65

[Application lodged 25.4.1994; Commission report 11.4.1996; Court Judgment 18.12.1996]

Elias and Maria Valsamis and their daughter Victoria were Jehovah's Witnesses. Pacifism was a fundamental tenet of their religion and they were forbidden from conduct or practice associated with war or violence, even indirectly. As a result of an application by her parents, Victoria was exempted from attendance at religious-education lessons and Orthodox Mass. In October 1992 she was asked to take part in the National Day celebrations which commemorated the outbreak of war between Greece and Fascist Italy on 28 October 1940. Her request to be excused attendance was refused. She was punished by the school for her failure to attend with one day's suspension. The applicants complained of the penalties of suspension from school.

Court found by majority (7–2) NV P1A2, NV 9, unanimously NV 3, V 13+P1A2, 13+9, NV 13+3.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr N Valticos, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek (d).

The two sentences of P1A2 had to be read not only in the light of each other but also, in particular, of A 8, 9 and 10 of the Convention. When applying P1A2, in its ordinary meaning, 'convictions', taken on its own, was not synonymous with the words 'opinions' and 'ideas'. It denoted 'views that attained a certain level of cogency, seriousness, cohesion and importance'. Jehovah's Witnesses enjoyed both the status of a 'known religion' and the advantages flowing from that as regards observance. The applicants were therefore entitled to rely on the right to respect for their religious convictions within the meaning of P1A2. P1A2 enjoined the State to respect parents' convictions, religious or philosophical, throughout the entire State education programme. That duty was broad in its extent as it applied not only to the content of education and the manner of its provision but also to the performance of all the 'functions' assumed by the State. 'Respect' meant more than 'acknowledge' or 'take into account'. In addition to a primarily negative undertaking, it implied some positive obligation on the part of the State. Although individual interests on occasion had to be subordinated to those of a group, democracy did not simply mean that the views of a majority must always prevail: a balance had to be achieved which ensured the fair and proper treatment of minorities and avoided any abuse of a dominant position. Given the discretion of a State, the second sentence of P1A2 forbade the State pursuing an aim of indoctrination that might be regarded as not respecting parents' religious and philosophical convictions. That was a limit that should not be exceeded. The imposition of disciplinary penalties was an integral part of the process whereby a school could achieve the object for which it was established, including the development and moulding of the character and mental powers of its pupils. There was nothing, either in the purpose of the parade or in the arrangements for it, which could offend the applicants' pacifist convictions to an extent prohibited by the second sentence of P1A2. Such commemorations of national events served, in their way, both pacifist objectives and the public interest. The presence of military representatives at some of the parades which took place did not in itself alter the nature of the parades. Furthermore, the obligation on the pupil did not deprive her parents of their right 'to enlighten and advise their children, to exercise with regard to their children natural parental functions as educators, or to guide their children on a path in line with the parents' own religious or philosophical convictions'. The Court could not rule on the expediency of other educational methods which, in the applicants' view, would be better suited to the aim of perpetuating historical memory among the younger generation. However, the penalty of suspension, which could not be regarded as an exclusively educational measure and might have some psychological impact on the pupil on whom it was imposed, was nevertheless of limited duration and did not require the exclusion of the pupil from the school premises. There had not therefore been a breach of P1A2.

The obligation to take part in the school parade was not such as to offend her parents' religious convictions. The impugned measure did not therefore amount to an interference with her right to freedom of religion under A 9.

Ill-treatment had to attain a minimum level of severity to fall within the scope of A 3. There had been no infringement of that provision.

The conclusions on the substantive articles did not mean that the allegations of failure to comply with P1A2 and A 9 were not arguable. They were arguable and the applicants were therefore entitled to have a remedy in order to raise their allegations. As regards the complaint under A 3, on which Miss Efstratiou did not expand, it contained no arguable allegation of a breach. It was not possible to apply to the Greek administrative courts for judicial review. The applicants could not therefore obtain a judicial decision that the disciplinary measure of suspension from school was unlawful. Such a decision, however, was a prerequisite for submitting a claim for compensation. The effectiveness of other remedies relied on by the Government had not been established. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the applicants did not have an effective remedy before a national authority in order to raise the complaints they later submitted at Strasbourg. There had consequently been a breach of A 13 taken together with P1A2 and A 9, but not taken together with A 3.

[Application lodged 1.12.1989; Commission report 10.12.1992; Court Judgment 19.4.1994]

Mr Cornelis Petrus Maria Van de Hurk was a dairy farmer. On 29 June 1984 he filed a claim for a larger levy-free quantity of milk. His claim was rejected by the Director of Agriculture and Food Supply on 1 November 1984. His appeal to the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries was dismissed He appealed unsuccessfully to the Industrial Appeals Tribunal. He complained that his case had not been dealt with by an independent and impartial tribunal, since the Crown and thus the Minister could decide that a judgment of the Tribunal should not be implemented or suspend its execution. He claimed that he had not been afforded a fair hearing by the Tribunal and that in its judgment the Tribunal had not, or not sufficiently, dealt with various arguments which he had advanced.

Comm found by majority (12–5) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (6–3) V 6(1) in that the applicant's civil rights and obligations were not determined by a tribunal, unanimously NV 6(1) as regards the requirements of fairness of proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President (c), Mr SK Martens (pd), Mr I Foighel (pd), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (pd), Mr J Makarczyk.

The power to give a binding decision which may not be altered by a non-judicial authority to the detriment of an individual party was inherent in the notion of a tribunal. There was nothing to indicate that the mere existence of the Crown's powers had any influence on the way the Tribunal handled and decided the cases which came before it. However, the measure was still law at the time of the events complained of and there was nothing to prevent the Crown from availing itself of the powers thereby conferred upon it had it considered such a course of action necessary or desirable in view of what it might perceive as the general interest. The Minister could partially or completely deprive a judgment of the Tribunal of its effect to the detriment of an individual party. One of the basic attributes of a 'tribunal' was therefore missing. A defect of that nature could, however, be remedied by the availability of a form of subsequent review by a judicial body that afforded all the guarantees required by A 6. However, none was available and there had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1) in that the applicant's civil rights and obligations were not determined by a tribunal.

The applicant had had a genuine opportunity to respond and had done so. No breach of the principle of equality of arms was therefore established. A 6(1) placed the tribunal under a duty to conduct a proper examination of the submissions, arguments and evidence adduced by the parties, without prejudice to its assessment of whether they were relevant to its decision. The applicant had produced his new figures at the latest possible stage, namely at the oral hearing after the Minister had responded in writing to his written pleadings. Given those circumstances, the refusal of the Tribunal to consider the applicant's new figure did not constitute a violation of A 6(1). A 6(1) obliged courts to give reasons for their decisions, but could not be understood as requiring a detailed answer to every argument. Making a general assessment, the Court did not find that the judgment of the Industrial Appeals Tribunal was insufficiently reasoned. Consequently no violation of A 6(1) was established in this respect either.

[Application lodged 18.5.1984; Commission report 14.7.1988; Court Judgment 21.2.1990]

Mrs Hendrika Wilhelmina van der Leer had been receiving treatment in a psychiatric hospital on a voluntary basis. On her husband's application, the Cantonal Court judge on 18 November 1983 ordered her compulsory confinement for 6 months. She was not told of the order, nor did she receive a copy of the decision. She found out about the order on 28 November 1993 and requested a discharge through her lawyers. The application was refused and she left the hospital, with the help of her husband, without authorisation on 31 January 1984. Without her knowledge she had been granted probationary leave on 7 February and the District Court ordered her discharge on 7 May 1984. She complained that her compulsory confinement in a psychiatric hospital had been neither ordered in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law nor was it lawful and that she had not been informed of the order of 18 November 1983 or given the possibility of having the lawfulness of her deprivation of liberty reviewed speedily by a court. Finally, she claimed that, in breach of A 6(1), she had been denied a fair hearing in the determination of her civil rights and obligations.

In considering the lawfulness of detention, national law had to be considered and in addition there was a requirement that any deprivation of liberty should be consistent with the purpose of A 5, namely to protect individuals from arbitrariness. The Cantonal judge had failed to hear the applicant before authorising her confinement although the legal conditions under which a hearing may be dispensed with were not satisfied. This amounted to a violation of 5(1). The words 'arrest' and 'charge' should be interpreted autonomously, in particular in accordance with the aim and purpose of A 5, which was to protect everyone from arbitrary deprivation of liberty. Thus arrest extended beyond criminal law measures and the charge did not lay down a condition for applicability, but indicated an eventuality of which it took account. The right to a speedy determination of lawfulness of detention was only effective if the person was informed promptly and adequately of the reasons for deprivation of his liberty. Paragraph (4) did not make a distinction between persons deprived of their liberty on the basis of whether they had been arrested or detained. Neither the manner in which the applicant was informed of the measures depriving her of her liberty nor the time it took to communicate the information to her conformed with A 5(2). Although the applicant had absconded, and even though she was granted probationary leave, she could have been returned to the hospital against her will. The proceedings did not end until the judicial discharge, 5 months later. That lapse of time was excessive.

Before the Court the applicant withdrew the complaint under A 6.

Van der Mussele v Belgium (1984) 6 EHRR 163 83/6

[Application lodged 7.3.1980; Commission report 3.3.1982; Court Judgment 27.10.1983]

Mr Eric Van der Mussele was a pupil lawyer who was officially appointed to represent an individual in criminal proceedings. On 31 July 1979, the Legal Advice and Defence Office of the Antwerp Bar appointed him to defend one Njie Ebrima, a Gambian national, in respect of theft and narcotics matters. Following the conclusion of the case, the Legal Advice and Defence Office notified the applicant that because of Mr Ebrima's lack of resources, no assessment of fees and disbursements could be made against him. He complained, not of this appointment, but because a refusal to act would have made him liable to sanctions and because he had not been entitled to any remuneration or reimbursement of his expenses. In his submission, these circumstances gave rise both to forced or compulsory labour and to treatment incompatible with P1A1 and there was discrimination in this respect between lawyers and certain other professions.

A 4: the adjectives 'forced or compulsory' labour meant that the work had to be exacted under the menace of any penalty and also performed against the will of the person concerned, that is, work for which he had not offered himself voluntarily. The penalties which the applicant faced for refusing, without good reason, to defend the individual were sufficiently daunting to constitute the menace of a penalty. Foresight of such service in order to gain access to the profession was not determinative of the applicant's voluntary acceptance. Of significance was whether the service imposed a burden that was so excessive or disproportionate to the advantages attached to the future exercise of that profession. Notwithstanding the lack of remuneration and of reimbursement of expenses which the Court noted was in itself far from satisfactory, no such imbalance was disclosed by the evidence before the Court. There was thus no compulsory labour for the purposes of A 4(2).

Although applicable, A 14 taken in conjunction with A 4 was not breached, as the evidence did not disclose any similarity between the disparate situations relating to other, including para-judicial, professions. Each profession was characterised by a corpus of rights and obligations of which it would be artificial to isolate one specific aspect.

P1A1 was not applicable either taken alone or in conjunction with A 14, in relation to the outlay by the applicant of expenses, as the duty prescribed by law to undertake the work, which was compatible with A 4, involved a certain outlay and, therefore, A 1 of Protocol No 1 could not be said to have been engaged. Nor was this article otherwise applicable as no assessment of fees was ever made because of the individual's lack of means and therefore no debt in favour of the applicant ever arose that could be said to have constituted 'his' possession.

[Applications lodged 1.1.1981, 31.3.1981, 19.2.1981; Commission report 13.10.1982; Court Judgment 22.5.1984]

Mr Jan Christian Martinus van der Sluijs, Mr Harm Pieter Zuiderveld and Mr Albertus Laurentius Klappe were forcibly drafted as conscript soldiers in the Netherlands Armed Forces and transferred to a military house of detention. They each refused, on account of their beliefs as conscientious objectors, to obey specific orders to put on a military uniform and to take receipt of a weapon. They were detained by the competent military officers and their detentions prolonged until trial. Following trial they were convicted of acts of insubordination and sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment. Their appeals to the Supreme Military Court were rejected. They complained that they had not been brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power.

Victim in A 25 denoted the person directly affected by the act or omission in issue, the existence of a violation being conceivable even in the absence of detriment. Consequently, the relevant deduction from sentence did not in principle deprive the applicant of his status as an alleged victim, it was a matter to be taken into consideration solely for the purpose of assessing the extent of any prejudice he may have suffered. Mr Zuiderveld and Mr Klappe, who had each had the time spent in custody on remand deducted in its entirety from the sentence ultimately imposed on him, were directly affected by the matters which they alleged to be in breach of A 5(3) and could each claim to be a victim within the meaning of A 25. The Court took formal note of the Government's withdrawal of the preliminary objection of non-exhaustion.

The Court recalled its previous case-law under A 5(3). The 'officer', who could be either a judge or an official in the public prosecutor's department, had to offer guarantees befitting the judicial power conferred on him by law. The officer was not identical with the judge but had to have some of the latter's attributes, that is to say he had to satisfy certain conditions, each of which constituted a guarantee for the person arrested. The officer had to be independent of the executive and of the parties. There was a procedural requirement placing the officer under the obligation of hearing the individual brought before him and a substantive requirement imposing on him the obligation of reviewing the circumstances militating for or against detention, of deciding, by reference to legal criteria, whether there were reasons to justify detention and of ordering release if there are no such reasons. In determining Convention rights, consideration had to be given to looking beyond the appearances and the language used and concentrating on the realities of the situation. However, formal, visible requirements stated in the law were especially important for the identification of the judicial authority empowered to decide on the liberty of the individual in view of the confidence which that authority must inspire in the public in a democratic society. In this case there was no official directive or policy instruction to auditeurs-militair and referring officers regarding interpretation of the Military Code, only a purely internal practice of no binding force. That was not sufficient to constitute authority given by law to exercise the requisite judicial power contemplated by A5(3). In addition, the auditeur-militair did not enjoy the kind of independence demanded by A 5(3). Although independent of the military authorities, the same auditeur-militair could be called upon to perform the function of prosecuting authority after referral of the case to the Military Court. He would thereby become a committed party to any criminal proceedings subsequently brought against the serviceman on whose detention he was advising prior to referral for trial. Consequently, the procedure followed in the applicants' cases before the auditeur-militair did not provide the guarantees required by A 5(3). The three applicants were referred for trial before the Military Court five days, three days and two days respectively after their arrest. They appeared before the officier-commissaris, who was responsible for the preliminary investigation of their cases, subsequent to their referral for trial. The officier-commissaris was not authorised by law to exercise the requisite judicial power referred to in A 5(3), notably the power to decide on the justification for the detention and to order release if there was none. The procedure before the officier-commissaris was thus lacking one of the fundamental guarantees implicit in A 5(3). The Military Court did not hold a hearing on the issue of detention and give a decision on it until 12 days after Mr van der Sluijs's arrest, 11 days after Mr Zuiderveld's arrest and 14 days after Mr Klappe's. Whilst the question of promptness had to be assessed in each case according to its special features, intervals as long as those were far in excess of the limits laid down by A 5(3), even taking due account of the exigencies of military life and military justice.

Van der Tang v Spain (1996) 22 EHRR 363 95/24

Mr Antonius Adrianus van der Tang worked as a lorry driver. In the early morning of 26 May 1989 he was arrested by the police; the lorry he was driving contained 1,300 kg of hashish. Others were detained in connection with the police operation. His applications for release were rejected and he was committed for trial. The applicant's case was considered to be closely linked with other files relating to a nationwide operation to combat a large-scale drug-trafficking organisation, Operación Nécora, and was therefore transferred to Madrid on 29 October 1990. On 29 April 1992 the Audiencia Nacional allowed the applicant's release on conditions, which included a cash security, submission of address to the court, daily reporting to the police and not to leave Spanish territory. On 2 July 1992, the Audiencia Nacional allowed the applicant's request for a reduction in the amount of the security. On 24 July 1992 the security was deposited by the applicant's wife, whereupon he was released. On 9 October 1992, the conditions of his reporting were relaxed. On 23 December 1992 the applicant left Spain for The Netherlands. The trial took place in Madrid from 20 September 1993 to 24 May 1994 in the applicant's absence. He was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment and a fine of ESP 100 million. He complained that the period of his detention pending trial had been unreasonable.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr JM Morenilla (so), Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek, Mr K Jungwiert.

The alleged violation of the Convention by the Spanish authorities occurred before the applicant absconded in breach of his undertakings. While he remained within the jurisdiction of Spain, and in particular in custody, he was entitled to expect that the rights and freedoms set forth in the Convention would be secured to him in accordance with A 1. His subsequent act of flight, albeit wrongful, did not render illegitimate his interest in obtaining from the Convention institutions a ruling on the violation he was alleging. The Government's preliminary objection was therefore rejected.

Whether a period of pre-trial detention could be considered reasonable had to be assessed in each case according to its special features. The period to be taken into consideration began on 26 May 1989, the day when the applicant was arrested. Following a request by the applicant, the Audiencia Nacional on 2 July 1994 reduced the original security. The amount was not disproportionately high, but it would nonetheless appear reasonable that a number of days might be needed to collect the sum. In those circumstances, and since no negligence by the applicant as regards the deposit of his security had been established, the relevant date was that of the applicant's actual release, namely 24 July 1992, when his wife paid the security. The total period of the applicant's detention was therefore three years, one month and 27 days. The evidence adduced clearly established that the applicant was well aware as to why he was being kept in detention. In rejecting his applications for release, the judicial authorities put forward two main grounds: the seriousness of the alleged offences and the danger of the applicant's absconding. While it would certainly have been desirable for the Spanish courts to have given more detailed reasoning as to the grounds for the applicant's detention, that could not in itself, in the present case where the relevant circumstances, and particularly the evident and significant risk of his absconding, remained unchanged, amount to a violation of his rights under A 5(3). The alleged offences were of a serious nature and the evidence incriminating the applicant was cogent. However, the existence of a strong suspicion of the involvement of the person concerned in serious offences, while constituting a relevant factor, could not alone justify a long period of pre-trial detention. The existence of a substantial risk of the applicant's absconding, being confirmed by a number of relevant factors which persisted throughout the total period of his detention, constituted a relevant and sufficient ground for refusing his repeated applications for release. The right of an accused in custody to have his case examined with all necessary expedition should not hinder the efforts of the courts to carry out their tasks with proper care. The applicant's case did not appear particularly complex and could have been dealt with more speedily. However, once joined to the Nécora file, that being a measure which the Spanish courts were entitled to take and maintain, it became part of a complex process. The competent judicial authorities could not be said to have displayed a lack of special diligence in handling the applicant's case in the broader context of the Nécora investigation, having regard to the difficulties intrinsic to the investigation of large-scale drug-trafficking offences committed by criminal organisations. Accordingly, the facts of the present case did not disclose a violation of A 5(3).

[Application lodged 16.4.1977; Commission report 9.7.1980; Court Judgment 24.6.1982 (merits), 25.4.1983 (A 50)]

Mr Valery Van Droogenbroeck had no fixed occupation. He had a long history of criminal offences. He was ordered that he be 'placed at the Government's disposal' as he was a recidivist who manifested a persistent tendency to crime. He complained that he was held in servitude and forced to work contrary to A 4 of the Convention, that his deprivation of liberty, which in his view had been ordered by the Minister of Justice and not by a court, contravened A 5(1) and that he had not been able to seek a judicial review of the lawfulness of his various periods of detention, as was required by A 5(4).

A 5(1): In Belgium – as in other Contracting States – it was traditional for the execution of sentences and other measures pronounced by criminal courts to fall within the province of the Minister of Justice. The Court saw no reason to doubt that that Minister was, by virtue of the general principles of Belgian public law concerning the attribution and the allocation of powers, an appropriate authority to act in the applicant's case. There had accordingly been no violation of A 5(1).

A 5(4): The Court recalled that the scope of the obligation undertaken by the Contracting States under A 5(4) would not necessarily be the same in all circumstances and as regards every category of deprivation of liberty. Nevertheless, in this context the nature and purpose of a given type of 'detention' were of more importance than was the place which it occupied in the structure of the Convention. The system of placing recidivists and habitual offenders at the Government's disposal was established with specific objectives in mind. A 5(4) did not guarantee a right to judicial control of such scope as to empower the court, on all aspects of the case, including questions of pure expediency, to substitute its own discretion for that of the decision-making authority. In the instant case, the Convention required an appropriate procedure allowing a court to determine speedily, on application by the applicant, whether the Minister of Justice was entitled to hold that detention was still consistent with the object and purpose of the domestic legislation. For the purposes of A 5(4), this was not simply a question of expediency but one that bore on the very lawfulness of the deprivation of liberty at issue. The Court rejected the Government's alternative plea that several remedies satisfying the requirements of A 5(4) would have been available to the applicant. Accordingly there had been a violation of A 5(4).

A 4: The situation complained of did not violate A 5(1). Accordingly, it could have been regarded as servitude only if it involved a particularly serious form of denial of freedom, which was not so in the present case. The applicant complained that he was forced to work whereas the Government said he was simply invited to work. That question of fact was left open. However, once release was conditional on the possession of savings from pay for work done in prison, one was not far away from an obligation in the strict sense of the term. However, it did not follow that the complaint was well-founded, for failure to observe A 5(4) did not automatically mean that there had been failure to observe A 4: the latter Article authorised, in 4(3)(a), work required to be done in the ordinary course of detention which had been imposed, as was here the case, in a manner that did not infringe A 5(1). Moreover, the work which the applicant was asked to do did not go beyond what was 'ordinary' in that context since it was calculated to assist him in reintegrating himself into society and had as its legal basis provisions which found an equivalent in certain other Member States of the Council of Europe. Accordingly, the Belgian authorities did not fail to observe the requirements of A 4.

Van Geyseghem v Belgium 99/4

[Application lodged 25.10.1994; Commission report 3.12.1997; Court Judgment 21.1.1999]

Mrs Nicole Van Geyseghem and four others were prosecuted for importing drugs from Brazil. On 10 December 1992 the Brussels Criminal Court convicted the applicant in absentia and sentenced her to four years' imprisonment and a fine. On 26 April 1993 she applied to the same court to set aside its judgment. She attended the hearing of her application and on 7 May 1993 she was sentenced to three years' imprisonment and a fine. Both the applicant and the prosecution appealed. Neither the applicant nor her lawyer attended the appeal hearing and on 14 June 1993 the Brussels Court of Appeal, ruling in the applicant's absence, upheld the judgment of 7 May 1993 in its entirety and ordered the applicant's immediate arrest. On 26 August 1993 the applicant applied to set aside the Court of Appeal's judgment. She did not attend the hearing in person. Her counsel appeared and stated that he would be making submissions to the effect that the prosecution had become time-barred between the delivery of the Court of Appeal's judgment in absentia and the date on which the application to set it aside was to be heard by the Court of Appeal. The court refused her counsel leave to address it and make submissions on his client's behalf. The applicant's appeal on points of law against that judgment was dismissed by the Court of Cassation. She complained that she had been denied a fair hearing and that her defence rights had been infringed in that, because of her failure to appear, she had been unable to be represented by counsel in the Brussels Court of Appeal.

The issue in the present case was not whether a trial in the accused's absence was compatible with A 6(1) and (3)(c), but that the Brussels Court of Appeal had decided the case without allowing her counsel to defend her and, in particular, make submissions on her behalf to the effect that the prosecution was time-barred. Since the incident occurred during the hearing of her application to set aside an appellate court's judgment, the applicant had no further opportunity of having arguments of law and fact presented at second instance in respect of the charge against her. The right of everyone charged with a criminal offence to be effectively defended by a lawyer was one of the basic features of a fair trial. An accused did not lose that right merely on account of not attending a court hearing. Even if the legislature had to be able to discourage unjustified absences, it could not penalise them by creating exceptions to the right to legal assistance. The legitimate requirement that defendants had to attend court hearings could be satisfied by means other than deprivation of the right to be defended. Even if the applicant did have several opportunities of defending herself, it was the Brussels Court of Appeal's duty to allow her counsel, who attended the hearing, to defend her, even in her absence. That was particularly true in this case since the defence which the lawyer intended to put forward concerned a point of law. The lawyer intended to plead statutory limitation, an issue which the Court had described as crucial. Even if the Court of Appeal must have examined of its own motion the issue of statutory limitation, the fact remained that counsel's assistance was indispensable for resolving conflicts and his role was necessary in order for the rights of the defence to be exercised. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1) taken together with A 6(3)(c).

Judgment constituted just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (BEF 300,000).

Mr Germen van Marle, Mr Johannes Petrus van Zomeren, Mr Johannes Flantua and Mr Roelof Hendrik de Bruijn all, at various dates between 1947 and 1950, practised as accountants. In 1974, each of the applicants applied to be registered as a certified accountant. They were asked by the Board of Admission to submit annual accounts and they were interviewed by the Board in the course of 1977. The Board finally rejected the applications. They appealed to the Board of Appeal, which also dismissed the appeals. They complained, inter alia, that their right to peaceful enjoyment of their possessions had been infringed.

Conformity with the spirit of the Convention required that the word 'dispute' should not be construed too technically and should be given a substantive rather than a formal meaning. The dispute had to be genuine and of a serious nature. The dispute could relate not only to the actual existence of a right, but also to its scope or the manner in which it could be exercised. The dispute could concern both questions of fact and questions of law. The function of the Board of Appeal was both to review the proper conduct of Board of Admission proceedings and to reconsider whether applicants, as regards ability, experience, length of time in the profession, or diplomas or qualifications held, met the legal requirements for registration. The complaints made by the applicants to the Board of Appeal concerned, in essence, what they regarded as an incorrect assessment of their competence by the Board of Admission. The Board of Appeal re-examined the applicants, calling them to interviews at which they had the opportunity to comment on balance sheets they had drawn up and to answer questions on accountancy theory and practice. An assessment of that kind, evaluating knowledge and experience for carrying on a profession under a particular title, was akin to a school or university examination and was so far removed from the exercise of the normal judicial function that the safeguards in A 6 could not be taken as covering resultant disagreements. There was thus no dispute within the meaning of A 6, which therefore was not applicable in the case. The fact that, in domestic law, the Board of Appeal was considered to be a tribunal did not alter that conclusion.

The right relied upon by the applicants could be likened to the right of property embodied in P1A1: by dint of their own work, the applicants had built up a clientèle; that had in many respects the nature of a private right and constituted an asset and, hence, a possession within the meaning of the first sentence of P1A1. That provision was accordingly applicable in the present case. The refusal to register the applicants as certified accountants radically affected the conditions of their professional activities and the scope of those activities was reduced. Their income fell, as did the value of their clientèle and, more generally, their business. Consequently, there was interference with their right to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. However, that interference was justified in terms of the second paragraph of P1A1. The legislation was designed to promote the 'general interest': its purpose was to structure a profession that was important to the entire economic sector by providing the public with guarantees of the competence of those who carry on that profession. A fair balance between the means used and the intended aim was at any rate ensured by transitional provisions enabling the former unqualified accountants to gain entry to the new profession on prescribed conditions. Therefore there was no breach of P1A1.

Mr Hendrik van Mechelen, Mr Willem Venerius, Mr Johan Venerius and Mr Antonius Amandus Pruijmboom and another man were charged with attempted murder – or, in the alternative, attempted manslaughter – and robbery with the threat of violence. The Regional Court convicted the accused. The evidence identifying the applicants as perpetrators of the crimes included statements made before the trial by anonymous police officers, none of whom gave evidence before either the Regional Court or the investigating judge. They were sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. The five convicted men appealed to the 's-Hertogenbosch Court of Appeal which convicted all four applicants in four separate but similar judgments on 4 February 1991. They were sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment. The fifth suspect was acquitted. The applicants complained that their convictions were based to a decisive extent on the evidence of anonymous witnesses, police officers whose identity was not disclosed to them and who were not heard either in public or in their presence and therefore the rights of the defence had been unacceptably restricted.

The admissibility of evidence was primarily a matter for regulation by national law and as a general rule it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task under the Convention was not to give a ruling as to whether statements of witnesses were properly admitted as evidence, but rather to ascertain whether the proceedings as a whole, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair. In addition, all the evidence had to normally be produced at a public hearing, in the presence of the accused, with a view to adversarial argument. There were exceptions to this principle, but they should not infringe the rights of the defence; as a general rule. The defendant had to be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him, either when he made his statements or at a later stage. The use of statements made by anonymous witnesses to found a conviction was not under all circumstances incompatible with the Convention. If the anonymity of prosecution witnesses was maintained, the defence would be faced with difficulties which criminal proceedings should not normally involve. Accordingly, in such cases A 6(1) taken together with A 6(3)(d) required that the handicaps under which the defence laboured be sufficiently counterbalanced by the procedures followed by the judicial authorities.

A conviction should not be based either solely or to a decisive extent on anonymous statements. The balancing of the interests of the defence against arguments in favour of maintaining the anonymity of witnesses raised special problems if the witnesses in question were members of the police force of the State. Although their interests – and those of their families – also deserved protection under the Convention, it had to be recognised that their position was to some extent different from that of a disinterested witness or a victim. They owed a general duty of obedience to the State's executive authorities and usually had links with the prosecution; for those reasons alone their use as anonymous witnesses should be resorted to only in exceptional circumstances. In addition, it was in the nature of things that their duties, particularly in the case of arresting officers, may involve giving evidence in open court. On the other hand, provided that the rights of the defence were respected, it may be legitimate for the police authorities to wish to preserve the anonymity of an agent deployed in undercover activities, for his own or his family's protection and so as not to impair his usefulness for future operations. Having regard to the place that the right to a fair administration of justice held in a democratic society, any measures restricting the rights of the defence should be strictly necessary. If a less restrictive measure could suffice then that measure should be applied. In the present case, the police officers in question were in a separate room with the investigating judge, from which the accused and even their counsel were excluded. All communication was via a sound link. The defence was thus not only unaware of the identity of the police witnesses but were also prevented from observing their demeanour under direct questioning, and thus from testing their reliability. It had not been explained to the Court's satisfaction why it was necessary to resort to such extreme limitations on the right of the accused to have the evidence against them given in their presence, or why less far-reaching measures were not considered. In the absence of any further information, the operational needs of the police did not provide sufficient justification. Nor was the Court persuaded that the Court of Appeal made sufficient effort to assess the threat of reprisals against the police officers or their families. Its decision was based exclusively on the seriousness of the crimes committed. The anonymous police officers were interrogated before an investigating judge, who had himself ascertained their identity and had, in a very detailed official report of his findings, stated his opinion on their reliability and credibility as well as their reasons for remaining anonymous. However those measures could not be considered a proper substitute for the possibility of the defence to question the witnesses in their presence and make their own judgment as to their demeanour and reliability. It thus could not be said that the handicaps under which the defence laboured were counterbalanced by the above procedures. Moreover, the only evidence relied on by the Court of Appeal which provided positive identification of the applicants as the perpetrators of the crimes were the statements of the anonymous police officers. That being so the conviction of the applicants was based to a decisive extent on those anonymous statements. Therefore the proceedings taken as a whole were not fair. There had been a violation of A 6(1) taken together with A 6(3)(d).

Van Oosterwijck v Belgium (1981) 3 EHRR 357 80/4

[Application lodged 1.9.1976; Commission report 1.3.1979; Court Judgment 6.11.1980]

Danielle Van Oosterwijck had been working since 1963 in the Secretariat of the Commission of the European Communities and was studying law. She had been registered at birth on 23 December 1944 as a female. She subsequently underwent a sex-change. On 18 October 1973, the applicant filed a petition for rectification of a civil states certificate so that his birth certificate should indicate a male child. His application was refused and he appealed to the Brussels Court of Appeal, which dismissed his appeal on 7 May 1974. He complained that his situation was one of civil death and was inhuman and degrading, that the application of the law obliged him to use documents which did not reflect his real identity and that since, by maintaining a distortion between his legal being and his physical being, the contested court decisions prevented his marrying and founding a family.

Comm found unanimously V 8, by majority (7–3) V 11, not necessary to examine 3.

Court found by majority (13–4) domestic remedies not exhausted, therefore cognisance could not be taken of the merits of the case.

Judges: Mr G Balladore Pallieri, President, Mr G Wiarda, Mr M Zekia, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (c), Mr R Ryssdal, Mr W Ganshof Van Der Meersch (pc), Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice, Mr D Evrigenis (jd), Mr G Lagergren, Mr L Liesch (jd), Mr F Gölcüklü (jd), Mr F Matscher (jd), Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr E Garcia De Enterria, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh.

According to the Government, domestic remedies were not exhausted as the applicant had not appealed on a point of law to the Court of Cassation, had not pleaded the Convention either at first instance or on appeal, had not sought authorisation to change his forenames, pursuant to the domestic legislation, had not instituted an action d'état (action pertaining to personal status). The Court found that the applicant had not exhausted the domestic remedies available to him and there did not exist any special grounds capable of dispensing him from exercising the remedies taken into consideration by the Court.

Van Orshoven v Belgium (1998) 26 EHRR 55 97/32

[Application lodged 13.3.1992; Commission report 15.9.1995; Court Judgment 25.6.1997]

Mr Yvo Van Orshoven had a private practice as a doctor. At the beginning of 1987 he was the subject of an administrative inquiry by the National Institute for Sickness and Disability Insurance following a complaint by a mutual insurance company, which accused him of supplying treatment without a prescription and claiming payment for treatment that had not been given or in respect of which the conditions laid down by law had not been satisfied. On 24 March 1988 the Provincial Council held a hearing, which the applicant did not attend despite being summoned to do so. The council ordered that he should be struck off the register of the Ordre des médecins. His appeals to the Provincial Council and the Appeals Board of the Ordre were rejected. He appealed to the Court of Cassation. On 13 September 1991 a hearing was held at which the court heard in turn the reporting judge, counsel for the applicant, counsel for the Ordre and the avocat général, who after making his submissions took part in the court of Cassation's deliberations. On the same day the court dismissed the appeal. The applicant complained, inter alia, that he had not been able to reply to the procureur général's submissions at the hearing in the Court of Cassation.

Comm found by majority (20–7) V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (7–2) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr R Macdonald, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (c), Mr E Levits, Mr M Storme (d), ad hoc judge.

The scope of the case before the Court was determined by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The only complaint declared admissible by the Commission in the present case was that it had been impossible for the applicant to reply to the submissions of the procureur général's department. That complaint therefore constituted the sole subject matter of the case. Consequently, the Government's preliminary objection as to the Court's jurisdiction had to be dismissed.

The main duty of the procureur général's department at the Court of Cassation at the hearing, as at the deliberations, was always to assist the Court of Cassation and to help ensure that its case-law was consistent. The procureur général's department acted with the strictest objectivity. Great importance had to be attached to the part actually played in the proceedings by the member of the procureur général's department, and more particularly to the content and effects of his submissions. These contained an opinion which derived its authority from that of the procureur général's department itself. Although it was objective and reasoned in law, the opinion was nevertheless intended to advise and accordingly influence the Court of Cassation. Regard being had to what was at stake and to the nature of the submissions made by the avocat général, the fact that it was impossible for the applicant to reply to them before the end of the hearing infringed his right to adversarial proceedings. That right meant in principle the opportunity for the parties to a trial to have knowledge of and comment on all evidence adduced or observations filed. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

No causal link in respect of alleged pecuniary damage (no causal link). Judgment constituted just satisfaction for the alleged non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (BEF 250,000).

Van Pelt v France 00/151

[Application lodged 17.4.1996; Court Judgment 23.5.2000]

Mr Leonardus Van Pelt was extradited to France in 1987, where he was charged with drugs offences following an international drug trafficking inquiry. He was committed for trial in 1990 and the tribunal de grande instance, after conviction, sentenced him to 18 years' imprisonment and ordered his permanent exclusion from French territory. In 1991 the court of appeal acquitted him on appeal. The public prosecutor appealed and in February 1992 the Court of Cassation quashed the court of appeal's judgment and referred the case back to a different court of appeal. When the proceedings were resumed in 1993, the applicant's lawyers produced medical certificates stating that the appellant was in hospital in The Netherlands and could not appear in court. The court refused the adjournment request and convicted the applicant and issued a warrant for his arrest. An appeal on points of law by the applicant to the Court of Cassation was dismissed. He complained of violations of A 6.

Court found by majority (5–2) NV 6(1) with regard to length of proceedings, unanimously V 6(1)+6(3) with regard to the proceedings before the court of appeal, V 6(1) concerning the inadmissibility of the appeal on points of law.

Judges: Mr W Fuhrmann, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides (so), Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens (pd), Mr K Jungwiert, Sir Nicolas Bratza (pd).

The period to be considered began on 30 January 1987, the date of the applicant's arrest. It ended on 19 October 1995, the date of the judgment of the Court of Cassation. The proceedings had therefore lasted 8 years, 8 months and 20 days. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, taking into account the complexity of the case, conduct of the applicant and of the competent authorities. The length of the proceedings in this case had not been unreasonable.

With regard to the fact that the applicant's lawyers had been unable to argue his case in his absence, it was of importance that a defendant should appear, both because of his right to a hearing and because of the need to verify the accuracy of his statements and compare them with those of the victim, whose interests had to be protected, and of the witnesses. The legislature had to be able to discourage unjustified absences. However, it was also of crucial importance for the fairness of the proceedings that the accused be adequately defended. It was for the courts to ensure that counsel who attended trial for the purpose of defending the accused in his absence was given the opportunity to do so. Moreover, the right of everyone charged with a criminal offence to be effectively defended by a lawyer was one of the basic features of a fair trial. An accused did not lose that right merely on account of not attending a court hearing. In the present case the applicant's lawyers had been able to present argument only on the application for an adjournment, not on the merits. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1) and (3).

Where an appeal on points of law was declared inadmissible solely because the appellant had not surrendered to custody pursuant to the judicial decision challenged in the appeal, that impaired the applicant's right of appeal by imposing a disproportionate burden on the applicant, thus upsetting the fair balance that had to be struck between the legitimate concern to ensure that judicial decisions were enforced and the right of access to the Court of Cassation and exercise of the rights of the defence. The applicant had therefore suffered an excessive restriction of his right of access to court when he lost his right of appeal because of non-compliance with the warrant for his arrest.

Van Raalte v Netherlands (1997) 24 EHRR 503 97/6

[Application lodged 23.4.1992; Commission report 17.10.1995; Court Judgment 21.2.1997]

Mr Anton Gerard van Raalte had never been married and had no children. On 30 September 1987 the Inspector of Direct Taxes sent him an assessment of his contributions for the year 1985 under various social security schemes, including the General Child Care Benefits Act. He filed an objection to this assessment on the basis that under the legislation, unmarried childless women of 45 years or over were exempted from the obligation to pay contributions under the General Child Care Benefits Act and the prohibition of discrimination implied that that exemption should be extended to men in the same situation. His objection was rejected and he appealed to the Amsterdam Court of Appeal, which dismissed his appeal on 6 October 1989. His subsequent appeal on points of law to the Supreme Court was also dismissed. He complained that he had been the victim of discriminatory treatment with regard to the obligation to pay contributions under the General Child Care Benefits Act.

Comm found by majority (23–5) V 14+P1A1.

Court unanimously found V 14+P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel (d), Mr AB Baka, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P van Dijk.

A 14 complemented the other substantive provisions of the Convention and the Protocols. It had no independent existence since it had effect solely in relation to the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms safeguarded by those provisions. Although the application of A 14 did not presuppose a breach of those provisions, there could be no room for its application unless the facts in issue fell within the ambit of one or more of the latter. The case concerned the right of the State to secure the payment of taxes or other contributions and therefore came within the ambit of P1A1, and accordingly A 14 was applicable. A difference of treatment was discriminatory if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. Moreover, the Contracting States enjoyed a margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment. However, very weighty reasons would have to be put forward before the Court could regard a difference in treatment based exclusively on the ground of sex as compatible with the Convention. In the present case there was a difference in treatment between persons in similar situations, based on gender. No compelling reasons had been adduced to justify a difference in treatment between men and women as regards the exemptions to the contributory obligations. There has therefore been a violation of A 14 taken together with P1A1.

Dismissed by majority (8–1) claims for pecuniary damage, unanimously found present judgment constituted just satisfaction in respect of any non-pecuniary damage sustained. Costs and expenses (NLG 23,271).

Varipati v Greece 99/70

[Application lodged 29.8.1997; Court Judgment 26.10.1999]

Mrs Maria Varipati had a piece of her land expropriated in 1964. In 1983 the court of appeal held that the expropriation order had been revoked. The judgment was declaratory and the applicant did not succeed in having the order formally revoked until 1991. The public-sector company occupying the land applied to the Supreme Administrative Court to have the decision quashed. The Supreme Court heard the case in January 1995 and gave judgment in March 1997 dismissing the company's application. The company continued to occupy the land until August 1997, when it reached an agreement with the applicant. She complained, inter alia, of the length of proceedings.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1), NV P1A1.

Judges: Mr Fischbach, President, Mr C Rozakis, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mr AB Baka, Mr E Levits.

The applicant had not abused the right to individual petition or waived her financial claims by reaching an agreement with the company. The Government's preliminary objection was therefore dismissed.

By applying for the decision in the applicant's favour to be quashed, the company had cast doubt on the legal status of the applicant's property so that a dispute had arisen between them, the outcome of which had been decisive for the applicant's right of property. A 6(1) therefore applied. The period to be taken into consideration began on 26 June 1992 and ended on 19 March 1997, a period of 4 years and 9 months at one level of jurisdiction. Despite the fact that the delays caused by the lawyer's strike could not be attributed to the State, the length of the proceedings could not be regarded as reasonable.

P1A1: any adverse financial effects entailed by the excessive length of the proceedings had to be regarded as consequences of the violation of the right guaranteed by A 6(1) and could only be taken into consideration for the purposes of the just satisfaction which the applicant could obtain as a result of that finding of violation.

Vasilescu v Romania (1999) 28 EHRR 241 98/36

[Application lodged 10.2.1995; Commission report 17.4.1997; Court Judgment 22.5.1998]

On 23 June 1966, police officers from the militia searched Mrs Elisabeta Vasilescu's house without a warrant, in connection with a police investigation that had been started in respect of her husband for unlawful possession of valuables. They seized 327 gold coins, most of which were pierced for use in jewellery. On 4 July 1966 these items were deposited in the National Bank of Romania. On 8 July 1966 the militia headquarters decided not to press charges against the applicant's husband and discontinued the investigation of the case, but they nevertheless decided to keep the items in question. The applicant made inquiries of State Counsel for the county and on 11 October 1990 lodged an application for restitution with the Procurator-General of Romania. In 1991 she brought an action for recovery of possession of 40 gold coins that had been made into a necklace and a pair of earrings against the National Bank, with which they had been deposited. The Court of First Instance found for the applicant and ordered the National Bank to return the items claimed. The National Bank appealed to the County Court, which dismissed the appeal on 7 October 1992. In 1994 the Procurator-General made an application to the Supreme Court of Justice to have the earlier judgment quashed. On 20 October 1994 the Supreme Court of Justice allowed the Procurator-General's application and quashed all the judgments concerned, holding that under domestic legislation, State Counsel for the county had sole jurisdiction to entertain Mrs Vasilescu's application for return of the items in issue. The applicant complained that the search of her home and the seizure of her property had infringed A 8 of the Convention and that, contrary to A 6(1) and P1A1, the Supreme Court of Justice had deprived her of a tribunal that could have enabled her to recover possession of her property.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (28–1) V P1A1, not necessary to consider 8.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1), V P1A1, not necessary to examine 8 and 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr D Gotchev, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr E Levits, Mr J Casadevall, Mr M Voicu.

The Government's preliminary objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies was not raised before the Commission and they were accordingly estopped from relying it.

Even where, as in the instant case, State Counsel for a county exercised powers of a judicial nature, he acted as a member of the Procurator-General's department, subordinated first to the Procurator-General and then to the Minister of Justice. Only an institution that had full jurisdiction and satisfied a number of requirements, such as independence of the executive and also of the parties, merited the description 'tribunal' within the meaning of A 6(1). Neither State Counsel nor the Procurator-General met those requirements. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Having regard to its finding of a violation of A 6(1), it was not necessary to rule on the complaint under A 13, which was moreover unsupported by any argument. Where the right claimed was a civil one, the role of A 6(1) in relation to A 13 was that of a lex specialis, the requirements of A 13 being absorbed by those of A 6(1).

The seizure of the property by the militia had been unlawful. The applicant was, and remained, the owner of the property and had been deprived of the use and enjoyment of the relevant property since 1966. Romania did not recognise the right of individual petition and the Court's jurisdiction until 20 June 1994. However, the applicant's complaint related to a continuing situation, which still obtained at the present time, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Justice dated from 20 October 1994. In view of the lack of any basis in law, the continuing retention of the items in question could not be interpreted as a deprivation of possessions or control of the use of property allowed by P1A1. The applicant had obtained a court decision ordering the National Bank of Romania to return to her the 40 gold coins and the earrings she had claimed. However, that decision, together with the one upholding it, was quashed by the Supreme Court of Justice. She had already made approaches to State Counsel and to the Procurator-General, in 1990, but had had no greater success. The loss of all ability to dispose of the property in issue, taken together with the failure of the attempts made so far to have the situation remedied by the national authorities and courts, entailed sufficiently serious consequences for it to be held that the applicant has been the victim of a de facto confiscation incompatible with her right to the peaceful enjoyment of her possessions. There was a therefore a violation of P1A1.

Having regard to the finding in respect of P1A1 it was not necessary to examine the case under A 8 also.

Velikova v Bulgaria 00/150

[Application lodged 12.2.1998; Court Judgment 18.5.2000]

Ms Anya Velikova and Mr Slavtcho Tsonchev had lived together for about 12 years. On 24 September 1994 Mr Tsonchev was arrested on suspicion of stealing cows. He was too drunk to be questioned. He died about 12 hours later in police custody. The regional investigator ordered a criminal investigation into the death and an autopsy was carried out which stated that death was caused by haemorrhaging due to trauma caused by a blunt object. The applicant complained under A 2, 6, 13 and 14 of the Convention in respect of the death in police custody of Mr Tsonchev, the alleged ineffective investigation into this event, the alleged obstacles to the determination of her civil right to compensation arising out of the death, the alleged lack of effective remedies in this respect and the alleged discrimination on the basis of Mr Tsonchev's Romani ethnic origin.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found V 2 in respect of the death of Mr Tsonchev, V 2 in respect of the respondent State's obligation to conduct an effective investigation, V 13, NV 14.

Judges: Mr M Pellonpää, President, Mr G Ress, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs S Botoucharova.

Regarding the Government's claim as to the authenticity of the claim, the applicant had declared that she had signed the power of attorney and demonstrated her ability to sign in the presence of the President of the Chamber and the representatives of the parties. The Government were not estopped from raising the objection of authenticity of the application, as it was based on a document which was created and came to light after 18 May 1999, the date of the admissibility decision in the present case. There were no serious doubts as to the applicant's wish to pursue her complaints and the application had been validly submitted on her behalf. Therefore, the first preliminary objection of the Government was dismissed. Regarding the Government's claims that the admissibility decision contained incorrect statements of fact and unjustified conclusions, they were all to be found in the summary of the applicant's complaints and submissions, which formed part of the text of the decision, without any of them being the expression of the Court's opinion. Regarding the other objections, the Government, for the most part, reiterate their objections as to the admissibility of the application, which were already examined by the Court and rejected by its earlier decision. There were no new elements justifying a re-examination of those matters. The remainder of the Government's preliminary objections were therefore dismissed.

Where an individual was taken into police custody in good health but was later found dead, it was incumbent on the State to provide a plausible explanation of the events leading to his death, failing which the authorities had to be held responsible under A 2. In assessing evidence, the general principle applied in cases had been to apply the standard of proof 'beyond reasonable doubt'. However, such proof could follow from the co-existence of sufficiently strong, clear and concordant inferences or of similar unrebutted presumptions of fact. Where the events in issue lay wholly, or in large part, within the exclusive knowledge of the authorities, as in the case of persons within their control in custody, strong presumptions of fact would arise in respect of injuries and death occurring during that detention. Indeed, the burden of proof may be regarded as resting on the authorities to provide a satisfactory and convincing explanation. The cause of Mr Tsonchev's death was the acute loss of blood resulting from the large and deep haematomas in the upper limbs and the left buttock. It was undisputed that he had consumed a certain quantity of alcohol, was able to walk, that there was verbal communication between him, the police officers and other persons, that in the course of this verbal communication, at the time of the arrest and within the next two hours, he did not complain of any ailment, and that no one in contact with him, including the police officers involved, reported any visible sign of such grave injuries as were found later by the autopsy. The Government's suggestion that Mr Tsonchev might have received his fatal injuries prior to his arrest was therefore implausible. Equally implausible was the suggestion that he might have been injured by falling on the ground as he was allegedly staggering. The post-mortem report mentioned such a possibility only in respect of the bruises on his face, which were not among the injuries that led to the acute loss of blood. According to the reports, the fatal injuries were the result of a deliberate beating. There was sufficient evidence to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that Mr Tsonchev died as a result of injuries inflicted while he was in the hands of the police and therefore the responsibility of the respondent State was engaged. In addition, there was no evidence of Mr Tsonchev having been examined, with the proper care due by a medical professional, at any time when he was in custody suffering from grave injuries and therefore, there had been a violation of A 2 in respect of his death.

As to the alleged lack of a meaningful investigation, certain references in the material submitted could lead to the supposition that there existed documents concerning the investigation into the death which had not been provided by the Government. It was not necessary to examine whether the Government had complied with their obligations under A 38. The Court was entitled to draw the inference that the material submitted to it contained all information about the investigation. There were numerous unexplained omissions from the very beginning and throughout the investigation; no expert was ever asked to comment on the timing of the injuries, there was no attempt by the investigator to identify the members of the medical team who, the police officers claimed, had visited the police station twice during the night, a number of important witnesses were never examined or questioned. The unexplained failure to undertake indispensable and obvious investigative steps was to be treated with particular vigilance and failing a plausible explanation by the respondent Government, the State's responsibility was engaged for a particularly serious violation of its obligation under A 2 to protect the right to life. The investigator did not proceed to collect available evidence and the investigation had remained dormant since December 1994. No plausible explanation for the reasons of the authorities' failure to collect key evidence was ever provided by the respondent Government. There had therefore been a violation of the respondent State's obligation under A 2 to conduct an effective investigation into the death of Mr Tsonchev.

The complaint regarding the excessive length of the investigation and the failure to carry out a thorough, effective and timely investigation fell to be examined under A 13. Having regard to the above conclusions, the respondent State had failed to comply with its obligation to carry out an effective investigation into the death of Mr Tsonchev. That failure undermined the effectiveness of any other remedies which might have existed. There had therefore been a violation of A 13 of the Convention.

The applicant's complaint under A 14 was grounded on a number of serious arguments. However, the respondent State failed to provide a plausible explanation as to the circumstances of the death and as to the reasons why the investigation omitted certain fundamental and indispensable steps which could have shed light on the events. The standard of proof required being 'proof beyond reasonable doubt', the material before the Court did not enable it to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that the killing and the lack of a meaningful investigation into it were motivated by racial prejudice, as claimed by the applicant. It followed that no violation of A 14 has been established.

Velosa Barreto v Portugal 95/46

[Application lodged 31.3.1991; Commission report 29.6.1994; Court Judgment 21.11.1995]

Mr Francisco Velosa Barreto was an office worker. He married in April 1979 and he and his wife had one child, born on 7 June 1980. When the applicant was still single, he lived with his parents. Since his marriage he had lived in a house rented by his parents-in-law. In November 1982 he inherited a house from his parents, which had been let for residential use to ER since 23 June 1964. On 6 April 1983 the applicant and his wife brought proceedings against ER and his wife in the Funchal Court of First Instance, asking the court to terminate the lease on the ground that they needed to occupy the property as their own home. The Funchal Court of First Instance found against the applicant and his wife on 13 March 1989 on the ground that they had not established facts which proved a real need to occupy the house themselves. On 6 April 1989 the applicant appealed to the Lisbon Court of Appeal which upheld the impugned judgment. He complained that the Portuguese courts, by not allowing him to terminate the lease on the house he owned, had infringed his right to respect for his private and family life.

Although the object of A 8 was essentially that of protecting the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, it could also give rise to positive obligations, particularly the obligation to ensure respect for private and family life even in the sphere of interpersonal relations. A fair balance had to be struck between the general interest and the interests of the people concerned. The decisions complained of prevented the applicant from living in his house, as he intended. Nevertheless, effective protection of respect for private and family life could not require the existence in national law of legal protection enabling each family to have a home for themselves alone. It did not go so far as to place the State under an obligation to give a landlord the right to recover possession of a rented house on request and in any circumstances. The legislation applied in this case pursued a legitimate aim, namely the social protection of tenants, and it thus tended to promote the economic well-being of the country and the protection of the rights of others. In pursuit of those aims, the Portuguese legislature was entitled to make termination of a lease subject to the condition that the landlord 'needs the property in order to live there'. The Funchal Court of First Instance and the Lisbon Court of Appeal held that in the circumstances of the case existence of the 'need' required by law had not been proved. There was no evidence to suggest that by ruling as they did, the Portuguese courts acted arbitrarily or unreasonably or failed to discharge their obligation to strike a fair balance between the respective interests. Accordingly, the right guaranteed by A 8 had not been infringed.

The restriction on the applicant's right to terminate his tenant's lease constituted control of the use of property within the meaning of the second paragraph of P1A1. That restriction pursued a legitimate social policy aim. For the requirements of P1A1 to be satisfied, such an interference had to strike a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. The considerations relating to A 8 were also applicable to his right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. Accordingly there had been no breach of P1A1.

Vendittelli v Italy (1995) 19 EHRR 464 94/22

[Application lodged 11.1.1989; Commission report 31.3.1993; Court Judgment 18.7.1994]

Mr Manlio Vendittelli was an architect. On 19 May 1986 the Rome municipal police sealed his flat, on the ground that he had infringed the town-planning regulations. On 20 May 1986 the Rome magistrate confirmed the sequestration and criminal proceedings were instituted against the applicant. He lodged three applications for release of his property from sequestration but they were dismissed for reasons of prevention and of preservation of evidence. Following trial on 15 December 1987 the applicant was given a suspended sentence of imprisonment and fined 10 million lire. He appealed. In a judgment of 4 July 1990, which became final on 30 October 1990, the Court of Appeal held that the offence had been amnestied and the prosecution barred as a result of a presidential decree. It did not, however, order that the property should be released from sequestration, nor was the judgment notified to the applicant, who had to obtain a copy from the registry on 5 December 1990. He made further applications to have his property released from sequestration. In an order of 17 May 1991, served on the applicant on 3 June, the Rome Court of Appeal allowed the application. The applicant complained of the length of the criminal proceedings against him and of an infringement of his right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions arising from the length of the proceedings and from the continued sequestration of his flat after the Rome Court of Appeal's judgment.

Comm unanimously found V 6(1) in respect of length of the proceedings, not necessary to consider P1A1 with respect to length of the criminal proceedings, V P1A1 on account of the failure to remove the seals after the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

Court found by majority (5–4) NV 6(1), NV P1A1+6(1), unanimously V P1A1 with respect to sequestration of the applicant's flat continuing beyond 30 October 1990.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (d), Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann (d), Mrs E Palm (d), Mr AN Loizou (d), Mr G Mifsud Bonnici.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 20 May 1986 with the decision by the Rome magistrate, who upheld the placing of seals on the applicant's flat. It ended on 30 October 1990, when the Rome Court of Appeal's decision became final. It therefore covered 4 years, 5 months and 10 days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Only delays attributable to the State could justify a finding that a reasonable time had been exceeded. The case was not particularly complex. The applicant bore some responsibility for the prolongation of the proceedings in the Court of Appeal. There had been delays on the part of the authorities. However, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, to the applicant's conduct, to the fact that two courts dealt with the case, and to the outcome, the overall length of the trial could not be considered to have been excessive. There had accordingly been no breach of A 6(1).

With regard to P1A1 taken together with A 6(1), in the instant case the sequestration of the flat was a measure ancillary to the criminal proceedings. That being so, given the conclusion in respect of A 6, no breach has been made out in this respect.

P1A1: the impugned measure was provided for by law and was designed not to deprive the applicant of his property but only to prevent him from using it. Consequently, the second paragraph of P1A1 applied in this instance. The sequestration, which was part of the criminal proceedings, had two objectives: to preserve the evidence of the offence and to prevent any aggravation of the offence. The measure therefore had a legitimate aim. The Court of Appeal ought to have ordered the immediate release of the property from sequestration without waiting for the applicant to raise the issue, as the considerations justifying sequestration until 30 October 1990 had ceased to exist thereafter. Continuing the sequestration after that date until 21 May 1991 therefore placed a disproportionate burden on the applicant. There had accordingly been a breach of P1A1 in this respect.

Claims for just satisfaction dismissed as being out of time.

Vereinigung demokratischer Soldaten Österreichs and Gubi v Austria (1995) 20 EHRR 55 94/49

[Application lodged 12.6.1989; Commission report 30.6.1993; Court Judgment 19.12.1994]

Vereinigung demokratischer Soldaten Österreichs (the VDSÖ), the first applicant, published a monthly magazine aimed at the soldiers serving in the Austrian army and entitled Der Igel (The Hedgehog). It contained information and articles, often of a critical nature, on military life. Mr Berthold Gubi, the second applicant, was a member of the VDSÖ and serving his military service in barracks. The Federal Minister for Defence refused a request from VDSO to have Der Igel distributed in the barracks in the same way as the only other two military magazines published by private associations and ordered the second applicant to stop distributing it. The second applicant's complaint about this ban to the Military Complaints Board was rejected. His appeal to the Constitutional Court was rejected. The applicants complained of the prohibition imposed in respect of the magazine Der Igel in Austrian barracks, and the second applicant of the order of 29 December 1987 requiring him to cease distributing the magazine in the barracks. They also maintained that they had not had an effective remedy and had been victims of discrimination on political grounds.

Comm found as regards the first applicant by majority (12–9) V 10, V 13, unanimously no separate issue under 14+10, as regards the second applicant (12–9) V 10, unanimously NV 13, unanimously no separate issue under 14+10.

The responsibility of a Contracting State was engaged if a violation of one of the rights and freedoms defined in the Convention was the result of non-observance by that State of its obligation under A 1 to secure those rights and freedoms in its domestic law to everyone within its jurisdiction. In the present case, the authorities effected themselves and at their own expense the distribution on a regular basis of military periodicals published by various associations, by sending them out with their official publications. Whatever the legal status of that arrangement, such a practice was bound to have an influence on the level of information imparted to the members of the armed forces and, accordingly, engaged the responsibility of the respondent State under A 10. Freedom of expression applied to servicemen just as it did to other persons within the jurisdiction of the Contracting States. Of all the periodicals for servicemen, only Der Igel was not allowed access to this type of distribution and the VDSÖ could therefore reasonably claim that this situation should be remedied. It followed that the Minister for Defence's rejection of its request was an interference with the exercise of its right to impart information and ideas. Although those provisions could not strictly constitute the legal basis of the minister's action, he nevertheless followed them. The provisions were formulated in general terms. However, the level of precision required of domestic legislation depended to a considerable degree on the content of the instrument considered, the field it was designed to cover and the number and status of those to whom it was addressed. As far as military discipline was concerned, it would scarcely be possible to draw up rules describing different types of conduct in detail. It might therefore be necessary for the authorities to formulate such rules more broadly. The relevant provisions, however, had to afford sufficient protection against arbitrariness and make it possible to foresee the consequences of their application. The provisions in question provided sufficient legal basis for the refusal of the VDSÖ's request. The first applicant had among its members servicemen who had access to these rules and it could therefore have been expected to be aware of the possibility that the minister might regard himself as bound to refer to them in relation to it. Therefore, the interference was prescribed by law. The impugned decision was taken with a view to preserving order in the armed forces, a legitimate aim for the purposes of A 10(2). Freedom of expression was also applicable to information or ideas that offended, shocked or disturbed the State or any section of the population. The proper functioning of an army was hardly imaginable without legal rules designed to prevent servicemen from undermining military discipline. The denial of free distribution of Der Igel undoubtedly reduced considerably its chances of increasing its readership among service personnel. The fact that it retained the possibility of sending its journal to subscribers could not offset such a handicap. It could therefore only have been justified by imperative necessities since exceptions to the freedom of expression had to be interpreted narrowly. None of the issues of Der Igel submitted in evidence recommended disobedience or violence, or even questioned the usefulness of the army. Despite their often polemical tenor, it did not appear that they overstepped the bounds of what was permissible in the context of a mere discussion of ideas, which had to be tolerated in the army of a democratic State just as it had to be in the society that such an army served. The magazine could not be seen as a serious threat to military discipline. It followed that the measure in question was disproportionate to the aim pursued and infringed A 10.

The complaint was arguable. The Government had failed to show that the possible remedies cited would have been effective. It followed that the first applicant has been the victim of a violation of A 13. The Constitutional Court was competent to hear complaints of servicemen alleging a violation of their right to freedom of expression. Although the Constitutional Court declined to entertain the second applicant's complaint, the effectiveness of a remedy for the purposes of A 13 did not depend on the certainty of a favourable outcome. The second applicant consequently had available to him a remedy satisfying the requirements of that provision.

Having regard to its conclusions concerning A 10 it was not necessary to rule on the complaint under A 14.

Judgment constituted just satisfaction for the alleged non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (ATS 180,000).

Vereniging Weekblad Bluf! v Netherlands (1995) 20 EHRR 189 95/2

[Application lodged 4.5.1988; Commission report 9.9.1993; Court Judgment 9.2.1995]

The applicant association published a weekly called Bluf! for a left-wing readership. The editor of Bluf! proposed to publish an internal security service (BVD) confidential report with a commentary as a supplement to issue No 267 of the journal on 29 April 1987. Following a court order on an application by the public prosecutor, the police seized the entire print run of the particular issue and the supplement. During the night of 29 April 1987, unknown to the authorities, the staff of the applicant association managed to reprint the issue that had been seized. Some 2,500 copies were sold in the streets of Amsterdam the next day. The authorities decided not to put a stop to this so as not to cause any public disorder. The applicant association complained unsuccessfully of the seizure to the Regional Court and to the Supreme Court. The applicant association complained that the seizure and the subsequent withdrawal from circulation of issue No 267 of its periodical Bluf! infringed its right to freedom of expression.

Comm found by majority (160–2) V 10.

Court found unanimously V 10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Sir John Freeland, Mr D Gotchev, Mr K Jungwiert.

The impugned measures amounted to interferences by a public authority in the applicant association's exercise of its freedom to impart information and ideas. National authorities had to be able to take such measures solely in order to prevent punishable disclosure of a secret without taking criminal proceedings against the party concerned, provided that national law afforded that party sufficient procedural safeguards. Netherlands law satisfied that condition by allowing the party concerned to complain both of a seizure and of a withdrawal from circulation.

It was primarily for the national authorities to interpret and apply domestic law. There was no reason to suppose that Netherlands law was not correctly applied. The interferences were prescribed by law. They were designed to protect national security, a legitimate aim under A 10(2). Because of the nature of the duties performed by the internal security service, such an institution had to enjoy a high degree of protection where the disclosure of information about its activities was concerned. Nevertheless, it was open to question whether the information in the report was sufficiently sensitive to justify preventing its distribution. The document in question was six years old at the time of the seizure and was of a fairly general nature. In addition, the report was marked simply 'Confidential', which represented a low degree of secrecy – it was a document intended for BVD staff and other officials who worked for them. After the newspaper had been seized, the publishers reprinted a large number of copies and sold them in the streets of Amsterdam, which were very crowded. Consequently, the information in question had already been widely distributed when the journal was withdrawn from circulation and there was no reason to doubt that the BVD's report was made widely known. It was unnecessary to prevent the disclosure of certain information which had already been made public or had ceased to be confidential. In this case, the information in question was made accessible to a large number of people, who were able in their turn to communicate it to others. Furthermore, the events were commented on by the media. That being so, the protection of the information as a State secret was no longer justified and the withdrawal of Issue No 267 of Bluf! no longer appeared necessary to achieve the legitimate aim pursued. It would have been quite possible, however, to prosecute the offenders. As the measure was not necessary in a democratic society, there had been a breach of A 10.

Vermeire v Belgium (1993) 15 EHRR 488 91/54

[Application lodged 1.4.1987; Commission report 5.4.1990; Court Judgment 29.11.1991 (merits), 4.10.1993 (A 50)]

Mrs Astrid Vermeire was the recognised illegitimate daughter of Jérôme Vermeire, who died unmarried in 1939. He was the son of the late Camiel Vermeire and his late wife Irma Vermeire née Van den Berghe, who also had two other children, Gérard and Robert. They died in 1951 and 1978 respectively, Gérard unmarried and without issue, Robert survived by two children of his marriage, Francine and Michel. The applicant's grandparents, who had brought her up after her father's death, both died intestate, the grandmother on 16 January 1975 and the grandfather on 22 July 1980. As the grandmother's heirs had remained co-owners in undivided shares up to the grandfather's death, the two estates were realised and distributed to the legitimate grandchildren Francine and Michel in a single procedure. Astrid Vermeire was excluded under the old Civil Code which did not allow illegitimate children any rights in the estates of their deceased parents. On 10 June 1981 she brought an action to claim a share in the estates before the Brussels Court of First Instance. In a judgment of 3 June 1983 that court allowed her the same rights as a legitimate descendant in the estates in question. The legitimate grandchildren appealed and on 23 May 1985 the Brussels Court of Appeal set aside the judgment. The Court of Cassation concurred and dismissed the applicant's appeal on 12 February 1987. The applicant complained that the Belgian courts, in denying her the status of an heir of her grandparents, had caused her to suffer a discriminatory interference with the exercise of her right to respect for her private and family life.

Comm found by majority (7–6) NV 14+8 as regards her grandmother's estate, unanimously V 14+8 with respect to her grandfather's estate.

Court found by majority (8–1) that the Belgian State was under no obligation to reopen the succession to the estate of the grandmother, unanimously that the applicant's exclusion from the estate of her grandfather violated 14+8.

The present case concerned the estates of a grandmother who died before and a grandfather who died after the date of the Marckx judgment. The succession to Irma Vermeire née Van den Berghe took place on her death and the estate devolved on her legitimate heirs as of that date. The estate was not wound up until after 13 June 1979, but by reason of its declaratory nature the distribution had effect as from the date of death, that is to say, 16 January 1975. The principle of legal certainty absolved the Belgian State from reopening legal acts or situations that antedated the delivery of the judgment.

The Marckx judgment held that the total lack of inheritance rights on intestacy, based only on the illegitimate nature of the affiliation, was discriminatory. That finding related to facts which were so close to those of the present case that it applied equally to the succession in issue, which took place after its delivery. There was nothing to prevent the Brussels Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation from complying with the findings of the Marckx judgment, as the Court of First Instance had done. There was nothing imprecise or incomplete about the rule which prohibited discrimination on the grounds of the illegitimate nature of the kinship. An overall revision of the legislation, with the aim of carrying out a thoroughgoing and consistent amendment of the whole of the law on affiliation and inheritance on intestacy, was not necessary at all as an essential preliminary to compliance with the Convention. The freedom of choice allowed to a State as to the means of fulfilling its obligation under A 53 could not allow it to suspend the application of the Convention while waiting for such a reform to be completed, in this case over 10 years after the judgment. The applicant's exclusion from the estate of her grandfather Camiel Vermeire violated A 14 in conjunction with A 8.

Vermeulen v Belgium 96/7

[Application lodged 6.11.1991; Commission report 11.10.1994; Court Judgment 20.2.1996]

On 6 May 1987, on an application by the department of the procureur du Roi and without any adversarial hearing, the Furnes Commercial Court adjudicated Mr Frans Vermeulen bankrupt and declared his company insolvent. It had heard the opinion of the deputy procureur du Roi but had not heard the applicant himself, who was in custody in Ghent prison on account of criminal proceedings against him for forgery, uttering, fraud and misappropriation. His applicant to have the judgment set aside and the case reheard was unsuccessful. He complained that he had not been able to reply, through his lawyer, to the avocat général's submissions or to address the court last at the hearing before the Court of Cassation and that the representative of the procureur général's department had taken part in the deliberations that had followed immediately afterwards.

Comm found by majority (11–5) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (15–4) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Gölcüklü (jd), Mr F Matscher (jd), Mr L-E Pettiti (jd), Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris, Mr J Van Compernolle (d), ad hoc judge.

The nature of the functions of the procureur général's department at the Court of Cassation did not vary according to whether the case was a civil or a criminal one. In both instances its main duty, at the hearing as at the deliberations, was to assist the Court of Cassation and to help ensure that its case-law was consistent. The fact that it could not raise grounds of appeal of its own motion concerned only the scope of its functions, not their nature. The procureur général's department acted with the strictest objectivity. Great importance had to be attached to the part actually played in the proceedings by the member of the procureur général's department, and more particularly to the content and effects of his submissions. Those contained an opinion which derived its authority from that of the procureur général's department itself. Although it was objective and reasoned in law, the opinion was nevertheless intended to advise and accordingly influence the Court of Cassation. Regard being had to what was at stake for the applicant in the proceedings in the Court of Cassation and to the nature of the submissions made by the avocat général, the fact that it was impossible for the applicant to reply to them before the end of the hearing infringed his right to adversarial proceedings. That right meant in principle the opportunity for the parties to have knowledge of and comment on all evidence adduced or observations filed, even by an independent member of the national legal service, with a view to influencing the court's decision. That amounted to a breach of A 6(1). The breach in question was aggravated by the avocat général's participation in the court's deliberations, albeit only in an advisory capacity. The deliberations afforded the avocat général, if only to outward appearances, an additional opportunity to bolster his submissions in private, without fear of contradiction. The fact that his presence gave the procureur général's department the chance to contribute to maintaining the consistency of the case-law could not alter that finding, since having a member present was not the only means of furthering that aim, as was shown by the practice of most other Member States of the Council of Europe. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1) in that respect also.

Judgment constituted just satisfaction in respect of the alleged non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (BEF 250,000).

[Application lodged 22.11.1985; Commission report 6.2.1990; Court Judgment 20.2.1991]

Mr Generoso Vernillo and his wife Maria, née Siciliano, were Italian citizens who lived near Naples. On 10 October 1967 they bought a three-room flat in Nice from Mr Ange Torzuoli and his wife (their aunt) for a down payment followed by monthly payments to the vendors during their lifetimes and to the survivor of the two, without any reduction on the death of the first. On 18 July 1977 the applicants were served with a formal notice to pay arrears and service charges. They failed to do so and on 12 December 1977 Mr and Mrs Torzuoli summoned the applicants before the Nice tribunal de grande instance for rescission of the contract. The public hearing took place on 10 March 1981. In a judgment of 16 June 1981, the court refused to declare that the contract of sale was rescinded. Mrs Torzuoli appealed (her husband having died in the meantime) to the Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal which on 29 June 1983 reversed the decision of the court below and granted a declaration that the sale was rescinded through the fault of the applicants. The applicants appealed to the Court of Cassation which, on 5 June 1985, dismissed the appeal. The applicants complained of the length of the civil proceedings.

It was for the national courts in the first instance to determine whether a given remedy was likely to afford any prospect of success. An action for damages might be relevant for the purposes of A 26, but the only remedies which that article required to be exhausted were those that related to the breaches alleged and at the same time were available and sufficient. The existence of such remedies had to be sufficiently certain not only in theory but also in practice, failing which they would lack the requisite accessibility and effectiveness; it fell to the respondent State to establish that those various conditions were satisfied. The Code of Judicial Organisation circumscribed the State's liability very narrowly. Furthermore, the applicants did not claim to be the victims of a denial of justice or even of gross negligence, and it did not appear from the quite large number of decisions drawn to the Court's attention by the Government that the French courts had interpreted the concept of gross negligence sufficiently broadly to include, for example, every delay exceeding the reasonable time laid down in A 6(1). The preliminary objection was accordingly dismissed.

The period to be considered began on 12 December 1977, when the applicants were summoned before the Nice tribunal de grande instance, and ended on 5 June 1985, when the Court of Cassation delivered its judgment. It therefore amounted to about seven and a half years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. Although the Code of Civil Procedure left the initiative to the parties, that did not dispense the courts from ensuring compliance with A 6 as to the reasonable time requirement. The case was not a very complex one. Only delays attributable to the State could justify a finding of a failure to comply with the reasonable time requirement. The parties showed little alacrity in filing their submissions and did much to prolong the proceedings. In requiring cases to be heard within a reasonable time, the Convention underlined the importance of administering justice without delays which might jeopardise its effectiveness and credibility. The Court was not unaware of the difficulties which sometimes delayed the hearing of cases by national courts and which were due to a variety of factors. At least two periods appeared to be abnormal in the present case. However, having regard to all the circumstances of the case and, more particularly, to the parties' responsibilities in the conduct of the trial, those periods were not so long as to warrant the conclusion that the total duration of the proceedings was excessive. The Court therefore considered that the applicants' complaint was unfounded.

Vero v Italy 00/142

[Application lodged 24.11.1996; Court Judgment 28.4.2000]

Mr Francesco Vero complained of the length of proceedings in the Audit Court.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Veznedaroglu v Turkey 00/128

[Application lodged 6.4.1996; Court Judgment 11.4.2000]

Mrs Sevtap Veznedaroglu, the applicant, was arrested on 4 July 1994 on suspicion of membership of the Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK), an illegal organisation. She alleged that she was tortured for four days, blindfolded and interrogated by approximately 15 policemen, hung by her arms and given electric shocks to her mouth and sexual organs and that she was threatened with death and rape. Medical reports prepared prior to her release noted bruising on her arm and leg. She complained both to the public prosecutor and the State Security Court judge before whom she was brought. On 30 October 1995 she was acquitted by the State Security Court on the ground of lack of evidence.

Court found unanimously V 3 on account of the failure of the authorities of the respondent State to investigate the applicant's complaint of torture.

Judges: Mr CL Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr G Bonello (Pd), Mr P Lorenzen, Mr Ab Baka, Mr E Levits, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge.

A 3 enshrined one of the fundamental values of democratic society. Even in the most difficult of circumstances, such as the fight against terrorism or crime, the Convention prohibited in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. Ill-treatment had to attain a minimum level of severity if it was to fall within the scope of A 3. The assessment of that minimum was relative: it depended on all the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment, its physical and/or mental effects and, in some cases, the sex, age and state of health of the victim. In respect of a person deprived of his liberty, recourse to physical force which had not been made strictly necessary by his own conduct diminished human dignity and was in principle an infringement of the right set forth in A 3. The facts were in dispute. It was impossible to establish on the basis of the evidence before the Court whether or not the applicant's injuries were caused by the police or whether she was tortured to the extent claimed. The Court was not persuaded that the hearing of witnesses by it would clarify the facts of the case or make it possible to conclude, beyond reasonable doubt, that the applicant's allegations were substantiated. However, the difficulty rested with the failure of the authorities to investigate her complaints. Where an individual raised an arguable claim that he had been seriously ill-treated by the police or other such agents of the State unlawfully and in breach of A 3, that provision, read in conjunction with the State's general duty under A 1, required by implication that there should be an effective official investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible. The applicant's insistence on her complaint of torture taken with the medical evidence in the file should have been sufficient to alert the public prosecutor to the need to investigate the substance of the complaint. However, no steps were taken either to obtain further details from the applicant or to question the police officers at her place of detention about her allegations. In the circumstances the applicant had laid the basis of an arguable claim that she had been tortured. She had persisted in her allegations right up to the stage of trial. The inertia displayed by the authorities in response to her allegations was inconsistent with the procedural obligation which devolved on them under A 3. Consequently there had been a violation of that article on account of the failure of the authorities of the respondent State to investigate the applicant's complaint of torture.

Vidal v Belgium 92/47

[Application lodged 7.7.1986; Commission report 14.1.1991; Court Judgment 22.4.1992]

Mr Frans Vidal was a prison warder. Following a failed escape attempt on 6 February 1983 by Mr Bosch Hernandez, an inmate of Namur Prison serving a life sentence, the applicant was charged with offences relating to the provision of a weapon and assisting in the escape of a prisoner. A promissory note signed by the applicant had been found on Mr Bosch Hernandez when he was caught. The applicant was committed for trial. On 9 August 1984 the Namur Criminal Court acquitted him. The prosecution and the civil party seeking damages appealed. By a unanimous judgment of 26 October 1984, the Liège Court of Appeal convicted the applicant and sentenced him to imprisonment. He appealed, and the Court of Cassation quashed the judgment on 29 May 1985. The case was remitted to the Brussels Court of Appeal which on 11 December 1985 convicted the applicant and sentenced him to imprisonment. The applicant's appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed on 12 February 1986. The applicant complained that he had been unable to have four defence witnesses called and questioned before the Court of Appeal.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J De Meyer, Mrs E Palm.

As a general rule, it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them as well as the relevance of the evidence which defendants sought to adduce. More specifically, A 6(3)(d) left it to them, as a general rule, to assess whether it was appropriate to call witnesses. It did not require the attendance and examination of every witness on the accused's behalf: its essential aim was equality of arms. The Brussels Court of Appeal did not hear any witness, whether for the prosecution or for the defence, before giving judgment. The applicant had originally been acquitted after several witnesses had been heard. When the appellate judges substituted a conviction, they had no fresh evidence; apart from the oral statements of the two defendants (at Liège) or the sole remaining defendant (at Brussels), they based their decision entirely on the documents in the case-file. Moreover, the Brussels Court of Appeal gave no reasons for its rejection, which was merely implicit, of the submissions requesting it to call the four witnesses. The complete silence of the judgment of 11 December 1985 on the point in question was not consistent with the concept of a fair trial which was the basis of A 6. This was all the more the case as the Brussels Court of Appeal increased the sentence which had been passed on 26 October 1984, by substituting four years for three years and not suspending it. The rights of the defence were restricted to such an extent in the present case that the applicant did not have a fair trial. There had consequently been a violation of A 6.

Viero v Italy 97/57

[Application lodged 14.5.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Dario Viero was employed by a local medical and welfare centre. On 23 January 1987 he instituted proceedings in the Veneto Regional Administrative Court for judicial review of a decision of the Regional Council classifying his post in a lower staff category than the one which corresponded to the duties he actually performed, and claimed on that account payment of the difference in remuneration. On 6 April 1995 the Administrative Court gave judgment against the applicant, who then appealed to the Consiglio di Stato. The proceedings were still pending. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings

Disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the present case the applicant was essentially seeking judicial review of his employer's decision to assign him to a staff category lower than the one to which he considered himself to be entitled. The dispute raised by him thus clearly related to his career and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). With regard to his claim for payment of the difference in remuneration, the Court observed that the award of such compensation by the administrative courts was directly dependent on a prior finding that the employer had acted unlawfully. Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 21 May 1981 with the applicant's arrest. It had not yet ended. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The investigation was of some complexity owing to the nature of the facts to be established, but the applicant did nothing to slow it down, and the Court could not regard as reasonable in the instant case a lapse of time for the investigation stage alone which was already more than nine and a half years. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Mr Ampalam Vijayanathan and Mr Nagalingam Pusparajah were Sri Lankan citizens of Tamil ethnic origin. They were both refused refugee status and ordered to leave French territory. Neither did so. No expulsion order had been made with respect to the applicants. If the Commissioner of Police were to decide that they should be removed, there was an appeal open to them, with all its attendant safeguards; if they were to attempt to bring such an appeal at present, the courts appealed to would probably declare it inadmissible as being premature or devoid of purpose. Mr Nadarajah Vilvarajah, Mr Vaithialingam Skandarajah, Mr Saravamuthu Sivakumaran, Mr Vathanan Navratnasingam and Mr Vinnasithamby Rasalingam were Tamils from Sri Lanka. They applied for asylum alleging ill-treatment by government forces. Their claims were rejected and they were returned to Sri Lanka, where some said they continued to suffer ill-treatment. Their appeals subsequently succeeded and they returned to the UK. They complained that as young male Tamils they feared treatment in breach of A 3 if returned to Sri Lanka and that they had no effective remedy in the UK.

States had a right to control entry, residence and expulsion of aliens; the Convention and Protocols did not contain a right to political asylum. Expulsion of an asylum seeker may raise an issue under A3 if substantial grounds were shown for believing the applicant would face a real risk of being subject to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment in the country to which he was being returned. Ill-treatment had to achieve a minimum level of severity and the courts' examination of the risk had to be rigorous in view of the absolute character of A 3. In the light of the reports on the general situation and the applicants' personal situation, the applicants' position was no worse than that of any other young male Tamil returning to Sri Lanka. Of the applicants who said they had in fact been ill-treated, there were no distinguishing features in the case to enable the Secretary of State to foresee that they would be treated in that way. A mere possibility of ill-treatment was not sufficient. The UK authorities had experience of the Sri Lankan situation. Substantial grounds had not been established for believing the applicants would be exposed to a real risk of being subject to inhuman or degrading treatment.

The effect of A 13 was to require the provision of a remedy which allowed the substance of the Convention complaint to be dealt with and provided appropriate relief. A 13 did not require any particular form of remedy, nor did its effectiveness depend on the certainty of a favourable outcome. Judicial review proceeding provided an effective degree of control over the decisions of the administrative authorities in asylum cases and were sufficient to satisfy the requirements of A 13.

[Application lodged 20.9.1985; Commission report 6.3.1990; Court Judgment 24.5.1991]

On 26 June 1973, Mr B brought an action before the Rome District Court against the 'Istituto Nazionale delle Assicurazioni' (INA) and against Mr Nicola Vocaturo, the INA's property manager. He sought recognition of his status as an employee and asked that the INA and the applicant, as employers, be ordered to pay the differences in remuneration to which he claimed to be entitled in respect of work carried out between 1969 and 1972 at the INA's property management office. On 29 April 1985 the applicant's appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed and the text of the judgment was deposited with the registry on 27 November 1985. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began not on 26 June 1973, when the action against the applicant and INA was commenced in the Rome District Court, but on 1 August 1973, when the Italian declaration recognising the right of individual petition took effect. In order to determine whether the length of time which elapsed after that date was reasonable, regard had to be had, however, to the state of the case at that time. The relevant period ended when the Court of Cassation's judgment was deposited on 27 November 1985. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. As regards the excessive workload, it was for the Contracting States to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet the requirements of A 6. Employment disputes by their nature called generally for expeditious decision. At first instance and in the Court of Cassation there was a period of stagnation of over four years. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Vogt v Germany (1996) 21 EHRR 205 95/26

[Application lodged 13.2.1991; Commission report 30.11.1993; Court Judgment 26.9.1995]

Mrs Dorothea Vogt was a member of the German Communist Party (DKP). She qualified as a secondary-school teacher and obtained a post from 1 August 1977, with the status of probationary civil servant. On 1 February 1979, before the end of her probationary period, she was appointed a permanent civil servant. Disciplinary proceedings were issued against her on the ground that she had failed to comply with the duty of loyalty to the Constitution that she owed as a civil servant under the Lower Saxony Civil Service Act. It was said that she had engaged in various political activities on behalf of the DKP since the autumn of 1980 and in particular had stood as the DKP candidate in the 1982 elections to the Parliament of the Land of Lower Saxony. The Disciplinary Division ordered her dismissal. Her appeal to the Lower Saxony Disciplinary Court was dismissed on 31 October 1989 and that decision was upheld by the Administrative Court. She appealed to the Federal Constitutional Court which decided on 7 August 1990 not to entertain the constitutional complaint, on the ground that it had insufficient prospects of success. She complained that her right to freedom of expression and to freedom of association had been infringed.

The right of recruitment to the civil service was deliberately omitted from the Convention. Consequently, the refusal to appoint a person as a civil servant could not as such provide the basis for a complaint under the Convention. That did not mean, however, that a person who had been appointed as a civil servant could not complain on being dismissed if that dismissal violated one of his or her rights under the Convention. Civil servants did not fall outside the scope of the Convention. Accordingly, the status of permanent civil servant that Mrs Vogt had obtained when she was appointed a secondary-school teacher did not deprive her of the protection of A 10. There had been an interference with the exercise of the applicant's right protected by A 10. The interference had been based on the Lower Saxony Civil Service Act, as construed in the case-law of the relevant courts and had therefore been prescribed by law. Her dismissal pursued a legitimate aim of protecting national security, preventing disorder and protecting the rights of others. She became a member of the DKP in 1972. It had not been disputed that this was known to the authorities when, in 1979, even before the end of her probationary period, she was appointed a permanent civil servant. The duty of political loyalty to which German civil servants were subject entailed for all civil servants the duty to dissociate themselves unequivocally from groups that attacked and cast aspersions on the State and the existing constitutional system. At the material time the German courts had held – on the basis of the DKP's own official programme – that its aims were the overthrow of the social structures and the constitutional order of the Federal Republic of Germany and the establishment of a political system similar to that of the German Democratic Republic. A democratic State was entitled to require civil servants to be loyal to the constitutional principles on which it was founded. Even so, the absolute nature of that duty as construed by the German courts was striking. It was owed equally by every civil servant, regardless of his or her function and rank. It implied that every civil servant, whatever his or her own opinion on the matter, had to unambiguously renounce all groups and movements which the competent authorities held to be inimical to the Constitution. It did not allow for distinctions between service and private life; the duty was always owed, in every context. Another relevant consideration was that at the material time a similarly strict duty of loyalty did not seem to have been imposed in any other Member State of the Council of Europe, whilst even within Germany the duty was not construed and implemented in the same manner throughout the country. However, the dismissal of a secondary-school teacher by way of disciplinary sanction for breach of duty was a very severe measure (due to effect of the measure on the reputation of the person concerned, loss of livelihood and the near impossibility of finding another job as a teacher). Moreover, the applicant was a teacher of German and French in a secondary school, a post which did not intrinsically involve any security risks. Although teachers were figures of authority to their pupils and their special duties and responsibilities to a certain extent also applied to their activities outside school, there was no evidence that the applicant, even outside her work at school, actually made anti-constitutional statements or personally adopted an anti-constitutional stance. The only criticisms retained against her concerned her active membership of the DKP, the posts she had held in that party and her candidature in the elections for the Parliament of the Land. The DKP had not been banned by the Federal Constitutional Court and, consequently, the applicant's activities on its behalf were entirely lawful. In all the circumstances, although the reasons put forward by the Government in order to justify their interference with Mrs Vogt's right to freedom of expression were relevant, they are not sufficient to establish convincingly that it was necessary in a democratic society to dismiss her. Even allowing for a certain margin of appreciation, the conclusion had to be that to dismiss the applicant by way of disciplinary sanction from her post as secondary-school teacher was disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. There had accordingly been a violation of A 10.

Notwithstanding its autonomous role and particular sphere of application, A 11 had, in the present case also to be considered in the light of A 10. The protection of personal opinions, secured by A 10, was one of the objectives of the freedoms of assembly and association as enshrined in A 11. The applicant was dismissed from her post as a civil servant for having persistently refused to dissociate herself from the DKP on the ground that in her personal opinion membership of that party was not incompatible with her duty of loyalty. There had accordingly been an interference with the exercise of the right protected by A 11(1). The notion of 'administration of the State' (para 2) had to be interpreted narrowly, in the light of the post held by the official concerned. However, even if teachers were to be regarded as being part of the 'administration of the State' for the purposes of A 11(2) – a question which the Court did not consider it necessary to determine in the instant case -, the applicant's dismissal was, for the reasons previously given in relation to A 10, disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. There had accordingly also been a violation of A 11.

The applicant did not raise her complaint under A 14 taken in conjunction with A 10 before the Court. The Court did not consider it necessary to examine the question of its own motion.

Voisine v France 00/65

[Application lodged 3.4.1995; Commission report 21.10.1998; Court Judgment 8.2.2000]

Mr Rémy Voisine was ordered by a court to pay a fine of FF 1,500 and had his driving licence suspended for seven days for speeding. The Dijon Court of Appeal increased the fine to FF 3,000 and the suspension to one month. The applicant appealed on points of law, drafting his pleadings unaided. He was not aware of the avocat général's submissions to the Court of Cassation or of the date of hearing. The Court of Cassation dismissed his appeal on 4 January 1995 as they had been filed out of time. He complained of violations of A 6.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found by majority (5–2) V 6(1).

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa (d), Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr K Jungwiert (d), Mrs HS Greve.

The applicant had not had the benefit of the practice by which the avocat général at the Court of Cassation informed the advisers of the parties of the contents of his submissions before the date of the hearing so that they could reply to them. The practice was reserved exclusively for barristers at the Court of Cassation. However, the applicant had chosen, as was his right, to defend himself without the benefit of a barrister at the Court of Cassation. He had not had access to the avocat général's submissions and so had not been able to reply to them before the Court of Cassation rejected his appeal. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6. Although the applicant had not applied for legal aid so that he could be represented by a lawyer, it did not mean that he had waived the benefit of the safeguards relating to inter partes proceedings. In addition, the specificity of the proceedings in the Court of Cassation could not justify depriving an appellant who had decided to defend himself the procedural safeguards protecting the right to a fair trial.

Vorrasi v Italy 92/25

[Application lodged 31.10.1986; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mrs Maria Vorrasi was a housewife. By a writ served on 15 March 1978 she instituted proceedings against her mother, Mrs L, and her three brothers before the Melfi District Court, asking for the division of her father's estate. The proceedings were still continuing and she complained about their length.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 15 March 1978 when the proceedings were instituted against the defendants in the Melfi District Court. It had not yet ended, since that court has still not given judgment. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The problem to be determined was a complex one concerning the apportionment of indivisible property among several heirs. The State was not responsible for the long period from 15 April 1980 to 11 July 1984 during which the parties sought a number of adjournments in connection with their attempt to achieve an out-of-court settlement. However, there were periods of inactivity for which the State was wholly responsible. Although there was said to be a lack of judges appointed to the Melfi District Court, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. Taking the proceedings as a whole, the Court could not regard as reasonable in this instance a lapse of time which was already more than 13 and a half years.

W v Switzerland (1994) 17 EHRR 60 93/1

[Application lodged 20.9.1988; Commission report 10.9.1991; Court Judgment 26.1.1993]

The applicant was a Swiss businessman who, with 11 accomplices, was prosecuted for a series of economic offences, including a large number of frauds in the management of some 60 companies. He was arrested on 27 March 1985 and placed in pre-trial detention with six of his co-accused, on the grounds that there was a risk of absconding, collusion and repetition of offences. He made applications for release which were rejected. The trial before the Economic Criminal Court opened on 17 February 1989 and ended on 30 March 1989 with the applicant being convicted and sentenced to 11 years' imprisonment and a fine. He complained of the length of his pre-trial detention.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh (d), Mr J De Meyer (d), Mr SK Martens, Mr AN Loizou (d), Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 27 March 1985, the date of the applicant's arrest, and ended on 30 March 1989 with his conviction by the Berne Economic Criminal Court. It thus lasted for four years and three days. The reasonableness of an accused person's continued detention had to be assessed in each case according to its special features. Continued detention could be justified in a given case only if there were specific indications of a genuine requirement of public interest which, notwithstanding the presumption of innocence, outweighed the rule of respect for individual liberty. In refusing to release the applicant, the Swiss courts relied, in addition to the serious suspicion against him, on three principal grounds: the danger of absconding, the risk of collusion, and the need to prevent the accused committing further offences. The danger of absconding could not be gauged solely on the basis of the severity of the possible sentence; it had to be assessed with reference to a number of other relevant factors which might either confirm the existence of a danger of absconding or make it appear so slight that it could not justify pre-trial detention. In this context regard had to be had in particular to the character of the person involved, his morals, his assets, his links with the State in which he was being prosecuted and his international contacts. There was no reason for the Court to reach a different conclusion from the domestic courts. The investigation in the case constantly brought to light further offences which were likely to result in a more severe sentence. In addition, the circumstances of the case and the applicant's character entitled the relevant courts to decline his offer to provide security. The fact that, once convicted, the applicant returned to prison after each leave could not retrospectively invalidate the view taken by the courts. With regard to the risk of collusion, the risks alleged would diminish with the passing of time as inquiries were effected, statements taken and verifications carried out. However, in the present case, the national authorities were entitled to regard the circumstances of the case as justification for using the risk of collusion as a further ground for the detention in issue. It was not necessary to consider the danger of repetition of offences, the dangers of absconding and collusion were relevant and sufficient reasons in themselves to justify the continued detention. With regard to the conduct of the proceedings, the length of the detention in issue was essentially attributable to the exceptional complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant. Although he was not obliged to co-operate with the authorities, he had to bear the consequences which his attitude may have caused for the progress of the investigation. Accordingly there had not been a violation of A 5(3).

W v United Kingdom (1988) 10 EHRR 29 87/14

[Application lodged 18.1.1982; Commission report 15.10.1985; Court Judgment 8.7.1987 (merits), 9.6.1988 (A 50)]

The applicant and his wife had three children; the present case concerned only the youngest of them, S, who was born on 31 October 1978. The couple had a history of serious marital and financial difficulties. On 16 August 1979, the Local Authority assumed parental rights in respect of S, but in September it reached agreement with the natural parents with a view to returning S to them in February 1980 if they overcame their domestic difficulties. Because of deterioration in the family circumstances, the Authority decided that S should be placed with long-term foster parents with a view to adoption. This decision was approved by the Authority's Adoption and Foster Care Committee on 31 March 1980. In April 1980 the Authority decided that access of the applicant and his wife to S should be terminated. Applications made by the applicant and his wife in November 1980 for the discharge of the Authority's parental rights resolutions in respect of S were granted by the juvenile court in January 1981. However, on 22 June 1981, following wardship proceedings by the Authority in the High Court, confirmed by the Court of Appeal on 6 October 1981, it was decided that it was in S's best interests and in view of the time that had elapsed that he should remain with the foster parents with whom he had been placed in May 1980 and that the applicant and his wife should not have access to him. The applicant complained about the procedures applied in reaching the decisions to restrict and then terminate his access to S and about the remedies available to him in that connection.

Comm found by majority (11–2 with one abstention) V 6(1) during the time when the parental rights resolution affecting the applicant was in force in that he was denied access to court for the determination of his civil right of access to S, (13–1) no separate issue arose under 6(1) in regard to the length of the wardship proceedings, (13–1) V 8 (8–6) no separate issue under 13.

Court found unanimously V 8, V 6(1) during the currency of the parental rights resolution, by majority (14–3) not necessary to decide whether duration of the subsequent wardship proceedings gave rise to a further violation of 6(1), unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Judges (merits and A 50 (unanimous)): Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr G Lagergren (jo), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (jo), Mr L-E Pettiti (jo), Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald (jo), Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing (pc/pd), Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (jo/so), Mr N Valticos (jo).

The present judgment was not concerned with the merits of the judicial or local authority decisions regarding the applicant's children. The scope of the case before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The Court was not in the circumstances competent to examine or comment on the justification for such matters as the taking into public care or the adoption of the child or the restriction or termination of the applicant's access to him.

The exercise of parental rights and the mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted fundamental elements of family life. The natural family relationship was not terminated by reason of the fact that the child was taken into public care. The Authority's decisions resulting from the procedures at issue amounted to interferences with the applicant's right to respect for family life. The Authority's decisions were in accordance with the law and pursued a legitimate aim, namely, the protection of health or the rights and freedoms of others. The authorities were allowed a measure of discretion in this area. Predominant in the consideration of the case had to be the fact that the decisions might prove to be irreversible. The relevant considerations to be weighed by a local authority in reaching decisions on children in its care had to include the views and interests of the natural parents. What had to be determined was whether, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case and the serious nature of the decisions to be taken, the parents had been involved in the decision-making process, seen as a whole, to a degree sufficient to provide them with the requisite protection of their interests. If they had not, there would have been a failure to respect their family life and the interference resulting from the decision would not be capable of being regarded as 'necessary' within the meaning of A 8. In conducting its review in the context of A 8 the Court could also have regard to the length of the local authority's decision-making process and of any related judicial proceedings. The evidence revealed an insufficient involvement of the applicant in the Authority's decision-making process. The duration of the wardship proceedings was a relevant, though subsidiary, factor. In the circumstances, and notwithstanding the UK's margin of appreciation in this area, there had been a violation of A 8.

Regarding the applicability of A 6, it could be said, at least on arguable grounds, that even after the adoption of the parental rights resolution the applicant could claim a right in regard to his access to S. There was clearly a dispute between the applicant and the Authority on the access question. The parental right of access was a civil right. A 6(1) was therefore applicable in the present case. There would be no possibility of a determination in accordance with the requirements of A 6(1) of the parent's right in regard to access, unless he or she could have the local authority's decision reviewed by a tribunal having jurisdiction to examine the merits of the matter. It did not appear from the material supplied by the Government (applying for judicial review or of instituting wardship proceedings) or otherwise available to the Court that the powers of the English courts were of sufficient scope to satisfy fully this requirement during the currency of the parental rights resolution. There was accordingly a violation of A 6(1).

Since the length of the wardship proceedings had been taken into account under A 8, it was not necessary to examine the issue of the reasonableness of the length of the proceedings separately under A 6(1).

Having regard to the decision on A 6(1), it was not necessary to examine the case under A 13 as its requirements were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary damage (GBP 12,000). Claim for costs and expenses struck out of list following friendly settlement between Government and applicant (GBP 25,350 less amounts received from Council of Europe by way of legal aid).

WR v Austria 99/124

[Application lodged 13.2.1995; Commission report 3.3.1998; Court Judgment 21.12.1999]

The applicant was a practising lawyer by profession. On 30 April and 15 May 1985, respectively, the president of the Mauerkirchen District Court laid a disciplinary information against him. On 15 June 1987 the Disciplinary Council of the Upper Austrian Bar Chamber decided to open disciplinary proceedings against him. He was charged with several counts of professional misconduct. On 18 January 1989 the Disciplinary Council convicted him on three counts and acquitted him on three other counts. He was ordered to pay a fine. His appeal to the Appeals Board was dismissed on 2 January 1993; in addition, the Board found him guilty of two disciplinary offences for which he had been acquitted by the Disciplinary Council. The applicant lodged a complaint with the Constitutional Court, complaining in particular about the length of the disciplinary proceedings against him. On 12 October 1994 the Constitutional Court dismissed his complaint.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr P Kûris, President, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja, Mr M Ugrekhelidze.

The scope of the case before the Court was determined by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The applicant's submissions that his disciplinary conviction violated his right to freedom of expression had not been declared admissible. The scope of the present case was limited to the sole complaint declared admissible; length of proceedings.

The applicant's right to practise as a lawyer was a civil right within the meaning of A 6(1). Disciplinary proceedings in which the right to continue to exercise a profession was at stake gave rise to disputes over civil rights within the meaning of A 6(1). The possible penalties for disciplinary offences in the present case included a suspension of the right to practise as a lawyer for up to one year. Therefore, the applicant's right to continue to practise as a lawyer was at stake in the disciplinary proceedings against him. Accordingly, A 6(1) was applicable under its civil head. It was not necessary to decide on the question whether there was also a 'criminal charge' against the applicant, as the reasonable time requirement of A 6(1) applied to civil and to criminal matters. The overall duration of the disciplinary proceedings of seven years and four months, at three levels of jurisdiction, could not be considered 'reasonable' within the meaning of A 6(1).

Wabl v Austria 00/93

[Application lodged 7.7.1994; Commission report 4.3.1998; Court Judgment 21.3.2000]

In June 1988, Mr Andreas Wabl, a member of Parliament and a member of the Green Party, participated in a protest campaign against the stationing of interceptor fighter planes near Graz airport. In the course of the protest it was alleged that he had scratched a police officer's arm. Proceedings against him were subsequently discontinued. On 14 August 1988 a newspaper article called for the applicant to have an AIDS test as the policeman scratched feared that he had been infected. In the course of complaining and commenting about the article, the applicant stated that he believed the article to be politically motivated and said that it was 'Nazi-journalism'. The newspaper brought injunction proceedings against the applicant to prohibit him from repeating the statement. The Graz Regional Civil Court dismissed the injunction claim finding that the expression 'Nazi-journalism' was a value-judgment. The Graz Court of Appeal dismissed the plaintiff's appeal. On 14 December 1993 the Austrian Supreme Court, on the plaintiff's further appeal, reversed the Appeal Court's decision and issued an injunction against the applicant prohibiting him from repeating the statement that the article of 14 August 1988 amounted to 'Nazi-journalism', and similar statements. The Supreme Court noted that while the statement was intended as a value-judgment, balancing all circumstances, the applicant's interests did not outweigh those of the newspaper. It found that the applicant had exceeded the limits of acceptable criticism. He complained that the judgment on 14 December 1993 constituted a violation of A 10.

Comm found by majority NV 10.

Court found by majority (6–1) NV 10.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs HS Greve (d), Mr K Traja.

The Supreme Court's injunction constituted an interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression. The interference was prescribed by law and pursued a legitimate aim, namely the protection of the reputation or rights of others. The dispute in the case related to the question whether the interference was necessary in a democratic society. The reasons given by the Supreme Court were relevant with regard to the aim pursued. It had duly balanced the interests involved, the detailed reasons given by it were sufficient for the purposes of A 10(2). In coming to that conclusion, the Court had particular regard to the special stigma which attached to activities inspired by National Socialist ideas. The article published in the newspaper about the applicant was defamatory and it was open to doubt whether it contributed to a debate of general concern as it contained hardly any information about the protest in which the applicant had participated. Even though the applicant was a politician, who inevitably and knowingly lay himself open to close scrutiny of his every word and deed by both journalists and the public at large and had to display a greater degree of tolerance, the article was an understandable ground for indignation. However, the applicant did not use the expression 'Nazi-journalism' as an immediate reaction, but only a few days later when the newspaper published a rectification which included a statement drafted by the applicant himself. The applicant could himself have brought injunction proceedings under the Civil Code. He had taken a private prosecution against the company publishing the newspaper, which resulted in the latter's conviction for defamation, pursuant to the Media Act. The injunction was confined to prohibiting the applicant from repeating the statement that the article of 14 August 1988 amounted to 'Nazi-journalism', or the making of similar statements. He retained the right to voice his opinion regarding the reporting by the newspaper in other terms. In the light of those considerations, the Supreme Court was entitled to consider that the injunction was necessary in a democratic society for the protection of the reputation and rights of others. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 10 of the Convention.

Waite and Kennedy v Germany 99/6

[Application lodged 24.11.1994; Commission report 2.12.1997; Court Judgment 18.2.1999]

Mr Richard Waite and Mr Terry Kennedy were systems programmers and were placed at the disposal of the European Space Agency (ESA) to perform services at the European Space Operations Centre in Darmstadt. When their contracts were not renewed, they brought proceedings in the Labour Court against the ESA, arguing that, under the German Provision of Labour (Temporary Staff) Act, they had acquired the status of employees of ESA. The ESA relied on its immunity from jurisdiction. The Labour Court declared the applicants' actions inadmissible. The applicants complained that they had been denied access to a court for a determination of their dispute with ESA in connection with an issue under German labour law.

Comm found by majority (17–15) NV 6(1).

Court found unanimously NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Mr E Klein, ad hoc judge.

A 6(1) embodied the 'right to a court', of which the right of access, that is, the right to institute proceedings before courts in civil matters, constituted only one aspect. The applicants' action had been declared inadmissible. The Labour Court had concentrated on the question of whether or not ESA could validly rely on its immunity from jurisdiction. According to its constituent instrument, ESA enjoyed immunity from jurisdiction and execution. The labour court's decision to give effect to the immunity from jurisdiction of ESA could not be regarded as arbitrary. The right of access to the courts secured by A 6(1) was not absolute, but may be subject to limitations; these were permitted by implication since the right of access, by its very nature, called for regulation by the State. Contracting States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation, although the final decision as to the observance of the Convention's requirements rested with the Court. The attribution of privileges and immunities to international organisations was an essential means of ensuring the proper functioning of such organisations free from unilateral interference by individual governments. The rule of immunity from jurisdiction, which the German courts applied to ESA in the present case, had a legitimate objective. Where States established international organisations in order to pursue or strengthen their co-operation in certain fields of activities, and where they attributed to those organisations certain competences and accorded them immunities, there might be implications as to the protection of fundamental rights. It would be incompatible with the purpose and object of the Convention if the Contracting States were thereby absolved from their responsibility under the Convention in relation to the field of activity covered by such attribution. The Convention was intended to guarantee not theoretical or illusory rights, but rights that were practical and effective. A material factor in determining whether granting ESA immunity from German jurisdiction was permissible under the Convention was whether the applicants had available to them reasonable alternative means to protect effectively their rights under the Convention. As the applicants argued an employment relationship with ESA, they could and should have had recourse to the ESA Appeals Board which was independent of the Agency and had jurisdiction to hear disputes relating to any explicit or implicit decision taken by the Agency and arising between it and a staff member. It was open to temporary workers to seek redress from the firms that employed them and hired them out. The test of proportionality could not be applied in such a way as to compel an international organisation to submit itself to national litigation in relation to employment conditions prescribed under national labour law. Such a reading of A 6(1) would thwart the proper functioning of international organisations and run counter to the current trend towards extending and strengthening international co-operation. In view of all those circumstances, in giving effect to the immunity from jurisdiction of ESA, the German courts did not exceed their margin of appreciation. Taking into account in particular the alternative means of legal process available to the applicants, it could not be said that the limitation on their access to the German courts with regard to ESA impaired the essence of their 'right to a court' or was disproportionate for the purposes of A 6. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6.

Wassink v The Netherlands 90/21

[Application lodged 17.10.1986; Commission report 12.7.1989; Court Judgment 27.9.1990]

On 15 November 1985 the Burgomaster of Emmen ordered Mr Jan Wassink's emergency confinement in a psychiatric hospital pursuant to s 35 (b) of the Mentally Ill Persons Act 1884. On 19 November 1985 the Crown requested the President of the District Court of Assen to extend the applicant's confinement. On 20 November, in the presence of Mr Jongeneelen, the applicant's 'confidential counsellor', the District Court President interviewed the applicant together with a psychiatrist. He then consulted three other persons by telephone - two doctors and Mr Wassink's wife. By telephone, he gave a summary of the resulting information to Mr Jongeneelen. On 25 November 1985 the President ordered the continuation of the applicant's confinement pursuant to the Mentally Ill Persons Act. Mr Wassink left the hospital on 20 December 1985. On 24 January 1986 the applicant filed an appeal on points of law with the Supreme Court against the order of 25 November 1985. He complained that the President of the District Court had not specified sufficiently the nature of the danger which his mental illness represented for himself and for public order, that the President had held a hearing without a registrar's being present to draw up a record and, finally, that, before making the order, the President had failed to communicate to him the text of the statements of the persons whom he had telephoned, thereby depriving the applicant of any opportunity to react thereto. On 18 April 1986 the Supreme Court declared the appeal inadmissible, finding that Mr Wassink no longer had any interest in having the contested order quashed since the maximum period for an emergency confinement had already expired. The applicant complained that his confinement in a psychiatric hospital had not been ordered in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law and had not been lawful, he also complained that he had not been given the possibility of having the lawfulness of the order of 25 November 1985 reviewed speedily by a court, nor obtained compensation in respect of this breach. Finally, he claimed that, in violation of A 6(1) he had not received a fair trial in proceedings to obtain a decision on a dispute relating to his civil rights and obligations.

Court found by majority (6–1) V 5(1), NV 5(4), unanimously NV 5(5), not necessary to examine 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (d A 5(4)), President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (d A 5(1)), Mr J De Meyer, Mr HLJ Roelvink, ad hoc judge.

Any deprivation of liberty had to be consistent with the purpose of A 5, namely to protect individuals from arbitrariness. Regarding the assessment of whether there was a danger for the purposes of s 35(b) of the 1884 Act, it was in the first place for the national authorities to evaluate the evidence adduced before them in deciding whether an individual should be detained as a person of unsound mind; the Court's task was to review under the Convention the decisions of those authorities. The President of the District Court had available to him four different medical opinions. There was no grounds for questioning the weight of the evidence on which the President relied to reach his decision that it was necessary to extend the applicant's confinement. The President did not read to the applicant's confidential counsellor the notes which he had drawn up following his telephone conversations, but informed him of the substance of the statements which he had thereby obtained. The fact that no registrar was present at the hearing infringed Article 72 of Regulation I made in pursuance of the Judiciary (Organisation) Act and that was also the opinion of the Attorney General. Consequently, there was in that respect a failure to comply with a procedure prescribed by law, which amounted to a breach of A 5(1).

There were risks inherent in the questioning by telephone of Mr Wassink's wife and two doctors. However, it took place on the initiative and under the responsibility of an independent judicial officer acting under an emergency procedure whose effects were limited as to their duration. The President did not read out the text of his notes to the applicant's confidential counsellor, but he gave to him a summary of his conversations and told him that they had not produced any new information. In so doing, he gave him an opportunity to comment on them. Even though the procedure prescribed by law within the meaning of A 5(1) was not strictly followed as regards one aspect, the judge nevertheless reviewed at the outset the lawfulness of the detention as such to an extent consistent with the requirements of A 5(4).

A 5 was complied with where it was possible to apply for compensation in respect of a deprivation of liberty effected in conditions contrary to A 5. It did not prohibit the Contracting States from making the award of compensation dependent upon the ability of the person concerned to show damage resulting from the breach. In the context of A 5(1), the status of victim may exist even where there was no damage, but there could be no question of compensation where there was no pecuniary or non-pecuniary damage to compensate. More generally, the evidence provided to the Court did not lead to the conclusion that an action based on Article 1401 of the Netherlands Civil Code would have failed to satisfy the requirements of A 5(5) of the Convention.

Before the Court the applicant withdrew his complaint under A 6(1).

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction. Costs and expenses (NLG 11,897.40 less FF 8,657.50).

Weber v Switzerland (1990) 12 EHRR 508 90/11

[Application lodged 15.5.1984; Commission report 16.3.1989; Court Judgment 22.5.1990]

Mr Franz Weber was a journalist. On 2 April 1980 together with one of the associations he ran, Helvetia Nostra, the applicant lodged a complaint alleging defamation against RM, who had written a letter published in the letters column of another paper against the applicant. On 2 March 1982 at a press conference in Lausanne the applicant informed the public that defamation proceedings had been taken against RM, that orders had been made for the production and then for the sequestration of the associations' accounts and that these had been handed over under seal. He also stated that he had lodged a challenge and a complaint against the investigating judge. He had already divulged the first three items of information at a press conference in Berne on 11 May 1981, during which he denounced 'the plot hatched against him by the Vaud authorities in order to intimidate him'. Under the Vaud Code of Criminal Procedure, the President of the Criminal Cassation Division of the Vaud Cantonal Court commenced of his own motion a summary investigation for breach of the confidentiality of a judicial investigation. On 27 April 1982 the President of the Cassation Division imposed a fine of 300 Swiss francs on him, together with a probationary period of a year for the purposes of deletion of the fine from the cantonal register. On 15 October 1982 an appeal that he brought against that decision was unanimously dismissed by the Criminal Cassation Division sitting in private. His public-law appeal with the Federal Court was dismissed on 16 November 1983. He paid the fine in January 1985. He complained of a failure to comply with the requirements of A 6(1) in that the summary proceedings had been conducted in chambers and without any hearing of the parties or the witnesses. He also complained that the imposition of a fine was an unjustified interference with his right to freedom of expression.

In determining the applicability of A 6(1), the State's definition was a starting point. In considering the nature of the offence the Court noted that parties are subject to the jurisdiction of the court and do not come with the disciplinary sphere of the judicial system as others such as judges and lawyers do. In this case the relevant provision, the Code of Criminal Procedure, affected the whole population and attached a punitive sanction and was therefore criminal. With regard to the nature and degree of the penalty incurred, the fine could be converted into a term of imprisonment. A 6 applied. The Swiss Government's reservation in respect of A 6(1), deposited with the instrument of ratification of the Convention, was invalid. The applicant was therefore entitled to a public hearing. The fact that the proceedings in the Federal Court had been public did not cure the defect as the latter court only considered that there had been no arbitrariness and did not determine the disputed questions of fact and law. The applicant had not waived his right to hearing and the case did not come within any of the exceptions in the second sentence of A 6(1).

There had been an interference by a public authority with the exercise of the A 10 right. It was prescribed by law, based on the Code of Criminal Procedure, and pursued the legitimate aim of protection of the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. States had a margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent an interference was necessary and the necessity for a restriction had to be convincingly established. At the relevant time the interest in maintaining the confidentiality of the judicial investigation no longer existed; there had been a previous press conference at which the information had been disclosed. At the time, the investigation was practically complete and the applicant could not be said to be attempting to bring pressure on the investigating judge. In those circumstances the interference, conviction and sentence were not necessary in a democratic society for achieving the legitimate aim pursued.

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (CHF 8,482.50).

Weeks v United Kingdom (1987) 10 EHRR 293 87/2

[Application lodged 6.4.1982; Commission report 7.12.1984; Court Judgment 2.3.1987 (merits), 5.10.1988 (A 50)]

In December 1966 Mr Robert Malcolm Weeks, then aged 17, went into a pet shop with a starting pistol that fired blanks and stole 35 pence, which was subsequently found on the floor of the shop. He pleaded guilty to armed robbery, assaulting a police officer and being in the unlawful possession of a firearm, was sentenced to life imprisonment in respect of the robbery and concurrent terms of imprisonment for the other offences. He was released on licence, but because of breach of parole conditions, further petty crime and absconding, he was recalled. He was released on licence a first time in March 1976 but recalled to prison in June 1977 by decision of the Home Secretary. He was released on licence a second time in October 1982 but re-detained in April 1985, his licence having previously been revoked by the Home Secretary in November 1984. He remained in prison until September 1985 when he was once more released on licence. This licence was revoked in March 1986, although as at 27 January 1987 Mr Weeks was still at liberty, having fled to France. He complained that his re-detention in June 1977 was not in accordance with A 5(1) and that, contrary to A 5(4), he was unable to challenge the lawfulness of his re-detention before a court or to have periodic reviews of his detention at reasonable intervals throughout his imprisonment.

A sufficient connection, for the purposes of A 5(1)(a), existed between the applicant's conviction in 1966 and his recall to prison in 1977. Accordingly, his recall to prison in 1977 and the period of his subsequent detention were not incompatible with A 5(1).

However, precisely because the expressed aim of the life sentence had not been to incarcerate the applicant for life but to be able to supervise him for life, the applicant should be able under A 5(4) to take proceedings to test the lawfulness of his detention when changed circumstances, whether of fact or law, dictated it, and judicial review on its own did not satisfy that requirement. The Court was of the opinion that although the Parole Board was sufficiently independent to constitute an acceptable 'court' and that its duty to review such cases and receive oral and written representations from the applicant guaranteed access, its limited powers to 'advise' the Home Secretary and the lack of full disclosure to the applicant meant that the Board lacked the necessary powers and procedural guarantees for the purposes of A 5(4).

Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247 95/3

[Application lodged 22.6.1990; Commission report 15.10.1993; Court Judgment 9.2.1995]

On 3 November 1986 Mr Peter Welch was arrested for suspected drug offences. On 4 November he was charged in respect of offences concerning the importation of large quantities of cannabis. After further investigations, including forensic examinations, further evidence came to light and on 24 February 1987 he was charged with the offence of possession with intent to supply cocaine alleged to have been committed on 3 November 1986. Subsequently, on 5 May 1987, he was charged with conspiracy to obtain cocaine within intent to supply in respect of activities which occurred between 1 January 1986 and 3 November. On 24 August 1988, he was found guilty on five counts and was given an overall sentence of 22 years' imprisonment. In addition, the trial judge imposed a confiscation order pursuant to the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986 ('the 1986 Act') in the amount of GBP 66,914. In default of the payment of this sum he would be liable to serve a consecutive two years' prison sentence. The operative provisions of the 1986 Act had come into force on 12 January 1987. The Act applied only to offences proceedings for which were instituted after that date. On 11 June 1990 the Court of Appeal reduced Mr Welch's overall sentence by two years. In addition it reduced the confiscation order by GBP 7,000 to GBP 59,914. He complained under A 7 that the confiscation order imposed on him constituted the imposition of a retrospective criminal penalty.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr R Macdonald, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr K Jungwiert.

The retrospective imposition of the confiscation order was not in dispute in the present case. The order was made following a conviction in respect of drugs offences which had been committed before the 1986 Act came into force. The only question to be determined therefore was whether the order constituted a penalty within the meaning of the second sentence of A 7. The concept of a penalty was an autonomous Convention concept. The starting-point in any assessment of the existence of a penalty was whether the measure in question was imposed following conviction for a criminal offence. Other factors that could be taken into account as relevant in that connection were the nature and purpose of the measure in question; its characterisation under national law; the procedures involved in the making and implementation of the measure; and its severity. Taking into consideration the combination of punitive elements, the confiscation order amounted, in the circumstances of the present case, to a penalty. Accordingly, there had been a breach of A 7(1). That conclusion concerned only the retrospective application of the relevant legislation and did not call into question in any respect the powers of confiscation conferred on the courts as a weapon in the fight against the scourge of drug trafficking.

[Application lodged 9.1.1964; Commission report 1.4.1966; Court Judgment 27.6.1968]

Mr Karl-Heinz Wemhoff, a broker, was arrested on 9 November 1961 for breach of trust. Several requests for release were made but were refused on the ground of danger of suppression of evidence and fear of absconding. His trial began on 9 November 1964. Following conviction on 7 April 1965 he was sentenced to six years and six months imprisonment and DM 500 fine. He was conditionally released on 8 November 1966. He complained, inter alia, of the length of detention.

Comm found by majority (7–3) V 5(3), unanimously NV 5(1)(c), NV 6(1).

Court found by majority (6–1) NV 5(3), unanimously NV 6(1).

The applicant had been arrested and detained in order to bring him before the competent legal authority, there being reasonable suspicion that he had committed an offence and reasonable grounds for believing it was necessary to prevent his fleeing after having done so. He was informed promptly of the reasons for his arrest and brought promptly before a judge. Consequently NV 5(1)(c) or first part 5(3). The word 'reasonable' in A 5(3) applied to the time within which a person was entitled to trial. It was the provisional detention of accused persons which should not be prolonged beyond a reasonable time. The Court had to reconcile the English and French texts: it was impossible to see why the protection against unduly long detention on remand which A 5 sought to ensure for persons suspected of offences should not continue up to delivery of judgment rather than cease the moment the trial opened. The end of the period of detention with which A 5 was concerned was not the day on which a conviction became final, but that on which the charge was determined, even if only by a court of first instance. A person who had cause to complain about his continued detention after conviction, because of delay in determining his appeal, could not avail himself of A 5(3) but could possibly allege disregard of reasonable time provided for in A 6(1). The reasonableness of an accused person's continued detention had to be assessed in each case according to its special features. The Court would not apply a set of criteria but would judge whether the reasons given by the national authorities to justify continued detention were relevant and sufficient to show that detention was not unreasonably prolonged contrary to A 5(3). Regarding the danger of suppression of evidence, the anxiety of the German courts was justified in view of the character of the offences and extreme complexity of the case. Regarding the danger of flight, the severity of sentence was a legitimate factor to consider although the effect of that fear diminished as detention continued. The concluding words of A 5(3) showed that, when the only remaining reasons for continued detention was fear of absconding, release pending trial must be ordered if it was possible to obtain guarantees that would ensure appearance. In this case there should have been deposit of bail or provision of security, but the applicant in this case did not indicate he would have been prepared to furnish such guarantees. The length of the proceedings were justified by the exceptional complexity of the case and further unavoidable delay. While an accused person in detention was entitled to have his case given priority and conducted with expedition, that should not stand in the way of the efforts of judges to clarify fully the facts in issue, give both parties all facilities to put forward their evidence and state their case and to pronounce judgment only after careful reflection on whether the offences were committed and on sentence.

Regarding A6(1), the period to be taken into account lasted at least until acquittal or conviction, even if that decision was reached on appeal. The period to be taken into account ran from the date the first charges were levelled and his arrest ordered (9 November 1961) and coincided for the most part with his period of detention under A 5(3). The Court having found no failure by the judicial authorities in their duty of particular diligence under A 5(3) must a fortiori accept no contravention under A 6(1). Even if the length of review proceedings were taken into account, they did not exceed the reasonable limit.

Werner v Austria (1998) 26 EHRR 310 97/87

[Application lodged 16.3.1993; Commission report 3.9.1996; Court Judgment 24.11.1997]

Mr Johannes Werner was arrested on 1 July 1991 on suspicion of having aided and abetted in the fraudulent use of a credit card. On 3 July he was detained pending trial, he was released on 19 July. The proceedings were discontinued and he claimed for compensation. He complained that, when ruling on his claim for compensation for his detention, the Vienna Regional Court and Court of Appeal had not held a public hearing and had not pronounced judgment publicly. He also maintained that he had not had a fair hearing in the Vienna Court of Appeal as he had been unable to reply to the principal public prosecutor's submissions or to have any witnesses examined.

Comm found by majority (25–4) V 6(1) on account of the lack of a public hearing, (27–2) on account of the failure to pronounce judgment publicly, (26–3) on account of the lack of a fair hearing in the Vienna Court of Appeal.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection (joined to merits), V 6(1) on account of the lack of a public hearing and failure to pronounce the judgments publicly, by majority (8–1) V 6(1) on account of Court of Appeal's failure to communicate the principal public prosecutor's observations to the applicant.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (pc/pd), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr B Repik.

The Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies in respect of the complaint concerning the lack of a public hearing was closely bound up with the merits of the case and would therefore be joined to it.

Applicability of A 6: the Court recalled its previous case-law. The applicant had a right to be compensated for his detention pending trial; there had been a dispute over a right. The outcome of the proceedings in the relevant criminal courts was directly decisive for his right. His right to compensation was a civil one. Accordingly, A 6(1) was applicable to the proceedings.

The Government did not raise the issue of the Austrian reservation in their memorial to the Court and were therefore estopped from raising it. It was not necessary for the Court to consider it of its own motion.

The holding of court hearings in public constituted a fundamental principle enshrined in A 6(1). Neither the Vienna Regional Court nor the Vienna Court of Appeal held a public hearing of the applicant's compensation claim. The applicant was in principle entitled to a public hearing as none of the exceptions laid down in the second sentence of A 6(1) applied. In practice, there was never a public hearing in such proceedings. The applicant could not therefore be blamed for not having made an application which had no prospects of success. The compensation proceedings could not be regarded as an 'appellate stage' of the main proceedings in the criminal courts. The protection of the applicant's private life should not have been made to prevail over the principle laid down in A 6(1) that proceedings must be public.

The decisions of the Vienna Regional Court and Court of Appeal were served on the applicant and not delivered at public sittings. The leave that could be given to a third party to inspect the files and obtain copies of the judgments they contained if he showed a legitimate interest was granted only at the discretion of the relevant courts, so that the full texts of the judgments were not made available to everyone. The possibility of obtaining the full texts of judgments from the court registry existed only in respect of judgments of the Supreme Court, the Administrative Court and the Constitutional Court. In addition, it was not necessary for the relevant courts to make statements which would breach the principle of presumption of innocence laid down in A 6(2). Accordingly, as no judicial decision was pronounced publicly and publicity was not sufficiently ensured by other means, there had been a breach of A 6(1) in that respect.

The principle of equality of arms was only one feature of the wider concept of a fair trial, which also included the fundamental right that proceedings should be adversarial. The right to adversarial proceedings meant that each party had to be given the opportunity to have knowledge of and comment on the observations filed or evidence adduced by the other party. In this case the principle of equality of arms dictated that the principal public prosecutor's observations should have been communicated to the applicant and he should have had the opportunity to comment on them. As that did not happen, he found himself at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1) on account of the Court of Appeal's failure to communicate the principal public prosecutor's observations to the applicant.

No causal link between breaches and alleged pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (ATS 128,501.40).

Wiesinger v Austria (1993) 16 EHRR 258 91/44

[Application lodged 12.8.1985; Commission report 6.6.1990; Court Judgment 30.10.1991]

Mr Konrad Wiesinger and his wife Klara were farmers. They complained of consolidation measures taken in respect of their land since July 1975. The applicants complained, inter alia, of the length of time to consider their case and that they had suffered an unjustified interference with their property rights pending the adoption of the final consolidation scheme.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), P1A1, not necessary to consider A 14.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (8–1) NV P1A1, unanimously not necessary to examine 14+P1A1.

Judges: Mr J Cremona (so), President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr A Spielmann, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou.

The consolidation scheme in issue affected the applicants' property rights, and was thus decisive for their private rights and obligations. A 6(1) was applicable. The consolidation proceedings started on 22 July 1975 and the provisional transfer of the parcels covered by the scheme, all of which were at the time designated as agricultural land, was ordered on 13 October 1978. However, no dispute arose in this case until 10 August 1982. The consolidation proceedings had not yet given rise to a decision which disposed of the dispute since the applicants' appeal to the Constitutional Court was still pending. The proceedings had thus lasted so far more than nine years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in each case according to the particular circumstances and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. In addition, only delays attributable to the State could justify a finding of a failure to comply with the reasonable time requirement. Land consolidation was by its nature a complex process. No substantial delay could be attributed to the applicants. Having particular regard to the difficulties occasioned by the lack of co-ordination between the various authorities concerned, the applicants' case had not been determined within a reasonable time.

The Court's jurisdiction was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility and the Commission had not found admissible the complaint regarding lack of compensation. There was an interference with the applicants' right of property. The applicants had not been deprived of their possessions, the transfer effected in October 1978 was only provisional. The purpose of consolidation was to improve the infrastructure and the pattern of agricultural holdings, by redistributing the land and providing communal facilities. It served the interest of both the landowners concerned and the community as a whole by increasing the rentability of holdings and rationalising cultivation. The applicants voluntarily surrendered their plots and received other plots in exchange which they cultivated as they wished. Only a small area of the land covered by the consolidation scheme was the object of any dispute and the decisions of the national courts to include the plots in question could not be regarded as inadequate and disproportionate. Following amendments to the provincial legislation and the applicants' appeal, the Provincial Board could be said to have reacted promptly. Subsequently the District Authority reallocated to the applicants in the consolidation scheme part of their former land and the Provincial Board, after the failure of friendly settlement negotiations, again improved their position in January 1990. It was therefore still possible that some of the applicants' former land may be returned to them when the scheme was definitively approved. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the interference with the applicants' right of property could not be held to be disproportionate to the demands of the general interest involved in the consolidation proceedings. Accordingly, no violation of P1A1 had been established.

The applicants did not pursue the matter under A 14+P1A1 as a separate issue before the Court which saw no reason to examine it.

Non-pecuniary damage (ATS 200,000 to Mr Wiesinger) costs and expenses (ATS 500,000 to both applicants).

Wille v Liechtenstein 99/73

[Application lodged 25.8.1995; Commission report 17.9.1998; Court Judgment 28.10.1999]

Mr Herbert Willie was a member of the Liechtenstein Government until May 1993 and from December 1993 was President of the Liechtenstein Administrative Court. In 1992 a controversy arose between His Serene Highness Prince Hans-Adam II of Liechtenstein and the Liechtenstein Government on political competences in connection with the plebiscite on the question of Liechtenstein's accession to the European Economic Area. Following an argument between the Prince and members of the Government at a meeting on 28 October 1992, the matter was settled on the basis of a common declaration by the Prince, the Diet and the Government. On 16 February 1995, in the context of a series of lectures on questions of constitutional jurisdiction and fundamental rights, the applicant gave a public lecture on the 'Nature and Functions of the Liechtenstein Constitutional Court' in which he expressed the view that the Constitutional Court was competent to decide on the interpretation of the Constitution in case of disagreement between the Prince (Government) and the Diet. The lecture was reported in the local press. On 27 February 1995 the Prince addressed a letter to the applicant concerning the lecture. He disagreed with the applicant's views and stated that he believed the applicant did not feel bound by the Constitution, that his opinions infringed the Constitution and that he was therefore disqualified from holding a public office and would not be appointed to one. Further correspondence passed between the Prince and the applicant. In April 1997 the applicant's term of office as President of the Administrative Court expired. On 14 April 1997 the Liechtenstein Diet decided to propose the applicant again as President of the Administrative Court. The Prince refused to appoint him. The applicant complained that the Prince's letter announcing his intention not to appoint the applicant to a public office again constituted a breach of his right to freedom of expression.

The status of civil servant obtained by the applicant when he was appointed President of the Liechtenstein Administrative Court did not deprive him of the protection of A 10. The responsibility of a State under the Convention could arise for acts of all its organs, agents and servants; their rank was immaterial, since the acts by persons accomplished in an official capacity were imputed to the State in any case. The letters of the Prince were not private correspondence and did constitute an act of State. The Prince's letter of 27 February 1995 amounted to an interference with the exercise of the applicant's right to freedom of expression. Assuming that the interference was prescribed by law and pursued a legitimate aim (to maintain public order and promote civil stability, and to preserve judicial independence and impartiality), as the Government claimed, the Court considered that it was not necessary in a democratic society. In assessing whether the interference corresponded to a pressing social need and was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued, the Court considered the impugned statement in the light of the case as a whole, attaching particular importance to the office held by the applicant, the applicant's statement and the context in which it was made and the reaction to it. The applicant was a high-ranking judge at the time. Whenever the right of freedom of expression of persons in such a position was at issue, the duties and responsibilities referred to in A 10(2) assumed a special significance since it could be expected of public officials serving in the judiciary that they should show restraint in exercising their freedom of expression in all cases where the authority and impartiality of judiciary were likely to be called in question. Nevertheless, an interference with the freedom of expression of a judge in a position such as the applicant's called for close scrutiny on the part of the Court. The lecture formed part of a series of academic lectures on questions of constitutional jurisdiction and fundamental rights. As it dealt with matters of constitutional law, it inevitably had political implications. However, that element alone should not have prevented the applicant from making any statement on this matter. The opinion expressed by the applicant could not be regarded as an untenable proposition since it was shared by a considerable number of persons in Liechtenstein. Moreover, there was no evidence to conclude that the applicant's lecture contained any remarks on pending cases, severe criticism of persons or public institutions or insults of high officials or the Prince. The Prince's reaction was based on general inferences drawn from the applicant's previous conduct in his position as a member of Government, in particular on the occasion of the political controversy in 1992. No reference was made to any incident suggesting that the applicant's view, as expressed at the lecture in question, had a bearing on his performance as President of the Administrative Court or on any other pending or imminent proceedings. In addition, the Government did not refer to any instance where the applicant, in the pursuit of his judicial duties or otherwise, had acted in an objectionable way. Therefore, on the facts of the present case, while relevant, the reasons relied on by the Government in order to justify the interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression were not sufficient to show that the interference complained of was necessary in a democratic society. Even allowing for a certain margin of appreciation, the Prince's action appeared disproportionate to the aim pursued. Accordingly there had been a violation of A 10.

The applicant complained that he did not have an effective judicial or other remedy enabling him to challenge the action taken by the Prince, the Government, had failed to show that there existed any precedent in the Constitutional Court's case-law, since its establishment in 1925, that that court had ever accepted for adjudication a complaint brought against the Prince. They had therefore failed to show that such a remedy would have been effective. It followed that the applicant had also been the victim of a violation of A 13.

Before the Court the applicant did not reiterate his complaints under A 6 and 14+10 and the Court did not find it necessary to deal with the matter of its own motion.

[Application lodged 2.10.1986; Commission report 12.7.1989; Court Judgment 27.9.1990 (merits), 28.6.1993 (A 50)]

Mr Harald Windisch was arrested for burglary following information from two witnesses who wished to remain anonymous. He was identified by them after a covert confrontation. At the trial, police officers gave evidence of the statements of the witnesses who were not called. The applicant was convicted and sentenced to three years' imprisonment. His appeal to the Supreme Court was dismissed. He complained that he had been convicted solely on the basis of evidence given by two anonymous witnesses, who had not been heard by the Regional Court and whom he had had no opportunity to examine.

The two unidentified persons would be regarded as witnesses for the purposes of A 6(3)(d), in the autonomous interpretation given by the Court. In principle, all evidence had to be produced in the presence of the accused at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument. However, the use of evidence of statements obtained at pre-trial stage was not in itself inconsistent with paras (3)(d) and (1) of A 6 provided the defendant was given adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question witnesses against him. In this case, the applicant had not had the opportunity to directly examine the witnesses and the opportunity to indirectly question their statements through the police officers was restricted by the decision to preserve their anonymity. Being unaware of their anonymity, the defence could not test reliability or credibility or observe demeanour. Collaboration of the public was of great importance for the police in the struggle against crime: The Convention did not preclude reliance, at the investigation stage, on sources such as anonymous informants. However, the subsequent use of their statements at trial was a different matter, the right to a fair trial could not be sacrificed. In this case, the commission of the offence had not been observed, the evidence of the anonymous witnesses was the only evidence indicating the applicant's presence at the scene of the crime and the trial court relied on that evidence to a large extent. The use of the evidence limited the rights of the defence in this case and the applicant could not be said to have had a fair trial. There had been a violation of A 6(3)(d) taken together with A 6(1).

Wingrove v United Kingdom (1997) 24 EHRR 1 96/56

[Application lodged 18.6.1990; Commission report 10.1.1995; Court Judgment 25.11.1996]

Mr Nigel Wingrove was a film director. He wrote the shooting script for, and directed the making of, a video work entitled Visions of Ecstasy. The applicant submitted the video to the British Board of Film Classification in order that it could lawfully be sold, hired out or otherwise supplied to the general public or a section of it. The Board rejected the application for a classification certificate on 18 September 1989. The applicant appealed to the Video Appeals Committee, which rejected the appeal on 23 December 1989. As a result of the Board's determination, as upheld on appeal, the applicant would commit an offence under the Video Recordings Act 1984 if he were to supply the video in any manner, whether or not for reward, without a classification. The applicant complained that the refusal of a classification certificate for his video work Visions of Ecstasy was in breach of his freedom of expression.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt (c), President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr J De Meyer (d), Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr D Gotchev, Mr U Lôhmus (d).

The refusal by the British Board of Film Classification to grant a certificate for the applicant's video work Visions of Ecstasy, seen in conjunction with the statutory provisions making it a criminal offence to distribute a video work without this certificate, amounted to an interference by a public authority with the applicant's right to impart ideas. The impugned restriction was prescribed by law. The aim of the interference as stated by the Board was to protect against the treatment of a religious subject in such a manner as to be calculated to outrage those who had an understanding of, sympathy towards and support for the Christian story and ethic, because of the contemptuous, reviling, insulting, scurrilous or ludicrous tone, style and spirit in which the subject was presented. The aim was the protection of the rights of others. The fact that the law of blasphemy did not treat on an equal footing the different religions practised in the UK did not detract from the legitimacy of the aim pursued in the present context. Whereas there was little scope under A 10(2) for restrictions on political speech or on debate of questions of public interest, a wider margin of appreciation was generally available to the Contracting States when regulating freedom of expression in relation to matters liable to offend intimate personal convictions within the sphere of morals or, especially, religion. There was no uniform European conception of the requirements of the protection of the rights of others in relation to attacks on their religious convictions. The Court's task was to determine whether the reasons relied on by the national authorities to justify the measures interfering with the applicant's freedom of expression were relevant and sufficient for the purposes of A 10(2). As regards the content of the law itself, English law of blasphemy did not prohibit the expression, in any form, of views hostile to the Christian religion. As the English courts had indicated, it was the manner in which views were advocated rather than the views themselves which the law sought to control. Bearing in mind the safeguard of the high threshold of profanation embodied in the definition of the offence of blasphemy under the law as well as the State's margin of appreciation in that area, the reasons given to justify the measures taken could be considered as both relevant and sufficient for the purposes of A 10(2). It was in the nature of video works that once they became available on the market they could, in practice, be copied, lent, rented, sold and viewed in different homes, thereby easily escaping any form of control by the authorities. The measures taken by the authorities amounted to a complete ban on the film's distribution. However, that was an understandable consequence of the opinion of the competent authorities that the distribution of the video would infringe the criminal law and of the refusal of the applicant to amend or cut out the objectionable sequences. Having reached the conclusion that they did as to the blasphemous content of the film it could not be said that the authorities overstepped their margin of appreciation. The national authorities were entitled to consider that the impugned measure was justified as being necessary in a democratic society within the meaning of A 10(2). There had therefore been no violation of A 10.

[Application lodged 13.12.1972; Commission report 15.12.1977; Court Judgment 24.10.1979 (merits) 27.11.1981 (A 50)]

In 1968 Mr Frits Winterwerp was committed to a psychiatric hospital by his local burgomaster in accordance with an emergency procedure prescribed in the Mentally Ill Persons Act. Six weeks later, on his wife's application, he was confined in the same hospital under an order made by the local District Court. On his wife's further application, and subsequently at the request of the Public Prosecutor, the order was renewed from year to year by the Regional Court on the basis of medical reports from the doctor treating the applicant. The applicant complained of the procedure followed in his case. In particular, he objected that he was never heard by the various courts or notified of the orders, that he did not receive any legal assistance and that he had no opportunity of challenging the medical reports. His complaints were also directed against the decision on his requests for discharge and against his loss of civil capacity.

There was no dispute that the Applicant had been deprived of his liberty, except for a few short periods, since 1968 in pursuance of the Mentally Ill Persons Act. A 5(1): the article could not be taken as permitting the detention of a person simply because his views or behaviour deviated from the norms prevailing in a particular society, nor should anyone be dispossessed of his liberty in an arbitrary fashion. The nature of what had to be established before the competent authority called for objective medical expertise, and the degree of the disorder must be of a kind or degree warranting compulsory confinement, and the validity of continued confinement depended upon the persistence of such a disorder. The applicant's confinement during all the various phases under consideration constituted the lawful detention of a person of unsound mind within A 5(1). 'A procedure prescribed by law' referred to a procedure prescribed by domestic law, viz, Netherlands law, which had to itself be in conformity with the Convention, including the requirements of natural justice and due process. The Applicant's detention had been 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law'; although the emergency order for six weeks might be considered excessive, and, although there were gaps in the continuity of appropriate subsequent orders, those imperfections were not so excessive or unlawful as to reach a conclusion that A 5(1) had been breached.

A 5(4): it was essential that a person concerned should have access to a court and the opportunity to be heard either in person, or, where necessary, through some form of representation, failing which he would not have been afforded the fundamental guarantees of procedure applied in matters of deprivation of liberty. Mental illness may entail restricting or modifying the manner of exercise of such a right. On the facts of this case the Applicant was never associated, either personally or through a representative, in the proceedings leading to the various detention orders made against him: he was never notified of the proceedings or of their outcome, nor was he heard by the courts or given the opportunity to argue his case, therefore the guarantees demanded by A 5(4) were lacking both in law and in practice and did not meet the requirements of the article.

A 6(1): the applicant lost the capacity to administer his property on his confinement to a psychiatric hospital. The capacity to deal personally with one's property involved the exercise of private rights and hence affected 'civil rights and obligations' within the meaning of A 6(1). Divesting the applicant of that capacity amounted to a 'determination' of such rights and obligations. Since, based on the facts above, the applicant was never given the opportunity to be heard, and, in any event those proceedings never considered his civil rights and obligations, it could not be said that he had a fair hearing within the meaning of A 6(1) on the question of his civil capacity. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

Worm v Austria (1998) 25 EHRR 454 97/49

[Application lodged 28.7.1993; Commission report 23.5.1996; Court Judgment 29.8.1997]

Mr Alfred Worm was a journalist working for Profil, an Austrian periodical dealing mostly with politics. For several years, he investigated into and reported on the case of Mr Hannes Androsch, a former Vice-Chancellor and Minister of Finance, who was involved in certain criminal proceedings. In 1989 Mr Androsch had been convicted by the Vienna Court of Appeal of having made false statements as a witness on two occasions. In 1991 the Vienna Regional Criminal Court convicted him of tax evasion between 1973 and 1981 and fined him. On 1 July 1991 Profil published an article written by the applicant, relating to the criminal proceedings. The applicant was charged under the Media Act for having exercised prohibited influence on criminal proceedings. On 12 May 1992 the Vienna Regional Criminal Court acquitted the applicant. On 19 October 1992, the Vienna Court of Appeal, after a hearing following an appeal by the public prosecutor, convicted the applicant of having exercised prohibited influence on criminal proceedings and imposed on him a fine of ATS 48,000 or 21 days' imprisonment in default of payment. The publishing firm was made jointly and severally liable for payment of the fine. The applicant complained that his conviction under the Media Act violated his right to freedom of expression.

Under domestic law and practice, the applicant was entitled to be served ex officio a written copy of the Court of Appeal's judgment, and the long delay for the service was exclusively the responsibility of the judicial authorities. The final version of the judgment ran to over nine pages and contained detailed legal reasoning. In those circumstances, the object and purpose of A 26 were best served by counting the six-month period as running from the date of service of the written judgment. The judgment of the Vienna Court of Appeal was served on the applicant on 25 March 1993 and the application to the Commission was introduced less than six months thereafter. Therefore, the Government's preliminary objection had to be dismissed.

The applicant's conviction constituted an interference with his right to freedom of expression. Convictions for 'prohibited influence on criminal proceedings' had a legal basis in domestic law, namely the Media Act. The conviction was aimed at maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary and thus pursued a legitimate aim under the Convention. The phrase 'authority of the judiciary' included, in particular, the notion that the courts were, and were accepted by the public at large as being, the proper forum for the settlement of legal disputes and for the determination of a person's guilt or innocence on a criminal charge; further, that the public at large had respect for and confidence in the courts' capacity to fulfil that function. 'Impartiality' normally denoted lack of prejudice or bias. However, what was at stake in maintaining the impartiality of the judiciary was the confidence which the courts in a democratic society had to inspire in the accused, as far as criminal proceedings were concerned, and also in the public at large. It followed that, in seeking to maintain the authority and impartiality of the judiciary, Contracting States were entitled to take account of considerations going beyond the concrete case, to the protection of the fundamental role of courts in a democratic society. The reasons given by the Court of Appeal were relevant with regard to the aim pursued. The domestic margin of appreciation was not identical as regards each of the aims listed in A 10(2). Restrictions on freedom of expression permitted by the second paragraph of A 10 for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary did not entitle States to restrict all forms of public discussion on matters pending before the courts. Courts could not operate in a vacuum. Whilst the courts were the forum for the determination of a person's guilt or innocence on a criminal charge, that did not mean that there could be no prior or contemporaneous discussion of the subject matter of criminal trials elsewhere, such as in specialised journals, in the general press or amongst the public at large. Provided that it did not overstep the bounds imposed in the interests of the proper administration of justice, reporting, including comment, on court proceedings contributed to their publicity and was thus perfectly consonant with the requirement under A 6(1) that hearings be public. Not only did the media have the task of imparting such information and ideas: the public also had a right to receive them. That was all the more so where a public figure was involved, such as, in the present case, a former member of the Government. Such persons inevitably and knowingly laid themselves open to close scrutiny by both journalists and the public at large. Accordingly, the limits of acceptable comment were wider as regards a politician as such than as regards a private individual. However, public figures were entitled to the enjoyment of the guarantees of a fair trial set out in A 6 on the same basis as every other person. The Court of Appeal's judgment was not directed to restricting the applicant's right to inform the public in an objective manner about the development of Mr Androsch's trial. Its criticism went essentially to the unfavourable assessment the applicant had made of the former minister's replies at trial, an element of evidence for the purposes of the Media Act. The Court of Appeal's judgment took into account the incriminated article in its entirety. The content of the article could not be said to be incapable of warranting the conclusion arrived at by the Vienna Court of Appeal as to the article's potential for influencing the outcome of Mr Androsch's trial. Having regard to the State's margin of appreciation, it was also in principle for the appellate court to evaluate the likelihood that at least the lay judges would read the article as it was to ascertain the applicant's criminal intent in publishing it. The Court of Appeal pointed out that it could be inferred from the article that the applicant wished to usurp the position of the judges dealing with the case. Against that background, the reasons adduced by the Vienna Court of Appeal to justify the interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression resulting from his conviction were sufficient for the purposes of A 10(2). In particular, the respective interests of the applicant and the public in imparting and receiving his ideas concerning a matter of general concern which was before the courts were not such as to outweigh the considerations relied on by the Vienna Court of Appeal as to the adverse consequences of the diffusion of the impugned article for the authority and impartiality of the judiciary in Austria. Given the amount of the fine and the fact that the publishing firm was ordered to be jointly and severally liable for payment of it, the sanction imposed could not be regarded as disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. Accordingly the national courts were entitled to consider that the applicant's conviction and sentence were necessary in a democratic society for maintaining both the authority and the impartiality of the judiciary within the meaning of A 10(2). Therefore there had been no violation of A 10.

Woukam Moudefo v France 88/13

[Application lodged 8.9.1983; Commission report 8.7.1987; Court Judgment 11.10.1988]

Mr Gabriel Woukam Moudefo, a Cameroonian, was arrested in France on 1 October 1980 on suspicion of involvement in armed robbery. Two days later he was charged with aggravated theft and attempted murder. He submitted seven applications for his release which were all rejected, as were his appeals. He asked the President of the Conseil d'Etat to appoint a lawyer for him and was told that the services of a lawyer were not obligatory in criminal proceedings, but that his case would be investigated and defence counsel appointed if a genuine ground of appeal were found to exist. The President of the Bar Association subsequently responded that a colleague who had examined the case had been unable to find a ground which could be usefully relied upon. On 23 December 1983 the investigating judge ordered the applicant's discharge on the ground of insufficient evidence. The applicant claimed compensation and was awarded FF 30,000, the compensation board acknowledging that the length of detention on remand, three years and three months, appeared manifestly excessive. The applicant complained of the length of both his detention on remand and the criminal proceedings and the fact that he had not received the assistance of a lawyer in the Court of Cassation.

Wynne v United Kingdom 94/23

[Application lodged 15.6.1989; Commission report 4.5.1993; Court Judgment 18.7.1994]

In 1964 Mr Edward Wynne was convicted of murder and sentenced to a mandatory term of life imprisonment. In May 1980 he was released on life licence after a recommendation by the Parole Board. In June 1981 the applicant killed again. In December 1981 his plea of not guilty to murder, but guilty to manslaughter on the ground of diminished responsibility was accepted and in January 1982 a discretionary sentence of life imprisonment was imposed. The trial judge considered that a life sentence was appropriate in view of the extreme danger to the public, which the applicant represented. The court, at the same time, revoked his life licence. The applicant was considered for parole by the Parole Board in January 1989. The Board recommended that his case be referred again to the local review committee in 1994. He subsequently learned that the 'tariff' period fixed by the trial judge in respect of his second offence expired in June 1991. In June 1992 the applicant was informed that the 'tariff' in respect of his conviction in 1964 had now been served and that his continued detention was based on the risk he represented. The applicant complained under A 5(4) that he was unable to have the continued lawfulness of his detention reviewed by a tribunal.

Comm found by a majority (10–5) NV 5(4).

Court held unanimously NV 5(4).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber.

The applicant claimed that it was the discretionary life sentence which had become the real and effective basis for his detention since his conviction in 1982. He received a mandatory life sentence in 1964 and was released on life licence in 1980, which was revoked by the trial judge in 1982 following the conviction for manslaughter. The Court held that his detention thereafter was based on both the mandatory sentence, which remained in force, and the new discretionary life sentence. The fact that he committed a further offence in 1981 and was judged to be suffering from a mental disorder at that time in no way affected under English law the continued validity of the original sentence or its reactivation on his recall. It merely provided a supplementary legal basis for his detention. The mandatory sentence belonged to a different category from the discretionary sentence in the sense that it was imposed automatically as the punishment for the offence of murder irrespective of considerations pertaining to the dangerousness of the offender. That mandatory life prisoners did not actually spend the rest of their lives in prison and that a notional tariff period was also established in such cases did not alter that essential distinction between the two types of life sentence. As regards mandatory life sentences, the guarantee of A 5(4) was satisfied by the original trial and appeal proceedings and conferred no additional right to challenge the lawfulness of continuing detention or re-detention following revocation of the life licence. Accordingly, there were no new issues of lawfulness which entitled the applicant to a review of his continued detention under the original mandatory life sentence. The Court did not accept the applicant's additional claim that at the very least A 5(4) conferred on him the right to challenge the lawfulness of his detention on the basis of the discretionary life sentence. A review of the lawfulness of the applicant's detention following his conviction for manslaughter would be devoid of purpose since he was also serving a mandatory life sentence for murder at the same time and enjoyed no possibility of release until the Secretary of State considered that it was in the public interest to do so. There was no violation of A 5(4).

The notion of a 'civil right and obligation' was not to be interpreted solely by reference to the State's domestic law, A 6(1) applied irrespective of the parties status and of the nature of the legislation governing the manner in which the dispute was to be determined. It was sufficient that the outcome of the proceedings should be decisive for the private rights and obligations. Accordingly, A 6 applied. The period to be taken into account was 2 years and continuing. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, taking into account the complexity of the case, conduct of the applicant and of the competent authorities. The present case was of some complexity but the government ought to have obtained information and reports earlier. The applicant had acted diligently. Given that the applicant was suffering from an incurable disease and his life expectancy was reduced, exceptional diligence was called for. The Administrative Court did not order expedited proceedings, even though it was aware of the deterioration in the applicant's health. A reasonable time had been exceeded and there had been a violation of A 6(1).

The applicant pleaded guilty to a charge of wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm on 22 October 1968. Following his conviction and the consideration of medical reports, the court made an order for his admission to and detention in Broadmoor Hospital, a special secure mental hospital for the criminally insane. During his detention in Broadmoor Hospital, his case was frequently reviewed by the hospital authorities. On 19 May 1971, the Home Secretary ordered the applicant's conditional discharge. Throughout the time of his conditional discharge, the applicant lived with his wife. He committed no further criminal offence. On 5 April 1974, he was recalled to Broadmoor Hospital by warrant of the Home Secretary. He remained confined there until February 1976 when he was allowed out of hospital on leave. Earlier proceedings to secure his release were unsuccessful. He was conditionally discharged a second time on 28 July 1976 and died on 17 January 1979. The applicant lodged his application in 1974 complaining that his recall was a deprivation of liberty and that he had no possibility of having the lawfulness of his readmission judicially determined.

There was a conviction by a competent court and, following that, a lawful detention ordered by the same court: para 5(1)(a) applied. The court had committed him to a mental hospital for treatment and therefore sub-para (e), relating to the detention of persons of unsound mind, also applied. The applicant's deprivation of liberty therefore fell within the ambit of both sub-paragraphs. There were three minimum conditions which had to be satisfied in order for there to be the lawful detention of a person of unsound mind within the meaning of A 5(1)(e): the individual concerned had to be reliably shown to be of unsound mind, the mental disorder had to be of a kind or degree warranting compulsory confinement and the validity of continued confinement depended upon the persistence of such a disorder. Section 66 of the Mental Health Act was framed in very wide terms, but it was apparent from other sections in the Act that the Home Secretary's discretionary power under s 66(3) was not unlimited. Where a provision of domestic law was designed, amongst other things, to authorise emergency confinement of persons capable of presenting a danger to others, it would be impracticable to require thorough medical examination prior to any arrest or detention. A wide discretion had to be enjoyed by the national authority empowered to order such emergency confinements. The terms of s 66 of the Act, read in their context, did not grant an arbitrary power to the Home Secretary. The conditions under the 1959 Act governing the recall to hospital of restricted patients did not appear to be incompatible with the meaning under the Convention of the expression 'the lawful detention of persons of unsound mind'. The applicant's deprivation of liberty was effected in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law and throughout it was lawful in the sense of being in conformity with the relevant domestic law. The object and purpose of A 5(1) was to ensure that no one would be deprived of his liberty in an arbitrary fashion. Regard had to be had to the applicant's mental health history and to the system under the 1959 Act governing the discharge and recall of restricted patients. In the circumstances, the interests of the protection of the public prevailed over the individual's right to liberty to the extent of justifying an emergency confinement in the absence of the usual guarantees implied in A 5(1)(e). On the facts of the present case, there was sufficient reason for the Home Secretary to have considered that the applicant's continued liberty constituted a danger to the public, and in particular to his wife. While those considerations were enough to justify X's recall as an emergency measure and for a short duration, his further detention in hospital until February 1976 had to also satisfy the three minimum conditions. Those conditions were satisfied in the case of X: he was examined after his re-admission and the responsible medical officer was of the opinion that he should be further detained for treatment. This opinion was maintained until December 1975 when an improvement in his condition was noted. There was no reason to doubt the objectivity and reliability of the medical judgment. Therefore there was no breach of A 5(1).

By virtue of A 5(4), a person of unsound mind compulsorily confined in a psychiatric institution for an indefinite or lengthy period was in principle entitled, at any rate where there was no automatic periodic review of a judicial character, to take proceedings at reasonable intervals before a court to put in issue the 'lawfulness' of his detention, whether that detention was ordered by a civil or criminal court or by some other authority. The word 'court' in A 5(4) was not necessarily to be understood as signifying a court of law of the classic kind, integrated within the standard judicial machinery of the country. The term served to denote bodies which exhibited not only common fundamental features, of which the most important was independence of the executive and of the parties to the case, but also the guarantees appropriate to the kind of deprivation of liberty in question of a judicial procedure. During the period of his detention subsequent to his re-admission to Broadmoor Hospital in April 1974, X should have been enabled to take proceedings attended by such 'guarantees'. At that stage, the proceedings that had been held in 1968 before the criminal court were no longer sufficient to satisfy the requirements of A 5(4). Although X had access to a court which ruled that his detention was 'lawful' in terms of English law, that could not of itself be decisive as to whether there was a sufficient review of 'lawfulness' for the purposes of A 5(4). The remedy of habeas corpus could on occasions constitute an effective check against arbitrariness in this sphere. However, a judicial review as limited as that available in the habeas corpus procedure in the present case was not sufficient for a continuing confinement such as the one undergone by X. The review had to be wide enough to bear on those conditions which, according to the Convention, were essential for the lawful detention of a person on the ground of unsoundness of mind, especially as the reasons capable of initially justifying such a detention might have ceased to exist. That meant that in the instant case, A 5(4) required an appropriate procedure allowing a court to examine whether the patient's disorder still persisted and whether the Home Secretary was entitled to think that a continuation of the compulsory confinement was necessary in the interest of public safety. The habeas corpus proceedings brought by X in 1974 did not therefore secure him the enjoyment of the right guaranteed by A 5(4). The Government's other suggestions of a recommendation from the responsible medical officer that the patient be discharged, the intervention of a Member of Parliament with the Home Secretary, a direct request by the patient to the Home Secretary asking for release did not bring into play any independent review procedure, whether judicial or administrative. With regard to the periodic review by Mental Health Review Tribunals, even if they satisfied the definition of a 'court' lacked the competence to decide the lawfulness of the detention and to order release if the detention was unlawful, as they had advisory functions only. Therefore, the inadequacy was not remedied for the purposes of A 5(4) of the habeas corpus proceedings. There had therefore been a breach of A 5(4).

The need for the applicant to be apprised of the reasons for his recall necessarily followed from A 5(4). The complaint under A 5(2) amounted to no more than one aspect of the complaint that the Court had already considered in relation to A 5(4). It was not necessary to rule on the merits of an issue which was part of and absorbed by a wider issue.

X and Y v Netherlands (1986) 8 EHRR 235 85/4

[Application lodged 10.1.1980; Commission report 5.7.1983; Court Judgment 26.3.1985]

The applicants were father and daughter. The daughter, Y, was mentally handicapped, and lived in a privately run home for mentally handicapped children. In December 1977, Y was woken up by one B, who lived on the premises of the institution. B forced the girl to follow him to his room, to undress and to have sexual intercourse with him. This incident, which occurred on the day after Miss Y's 16th birthday, had traumatic consequences for her, causing her major mental disturbance. In December 1977, X went to the local police station to file a complaint and to ask for criminal proceedings to be instituted. The police officer said that since X considered his daughter unable to sign the complaint because of her mental condition, he could do so himself. The police officer drew up a report and it was signed by X. In May 1978, the public prosecutor's office provisionally decided not to open proceedings against B, provided that he did not commit a similar offence within the next two years. X appealed against the decision to the Arnhem Court of Appeal, requesting the court to direct that criminal proceedings be instituted. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal in July 1979, considering it doubtful whether a charge of rape could be proved. Certain provisions of Netherlands law would have been applicable in the instant case, but only if the victim herself had taken action. In the Court of Appeal's view, the father's complaint could not be regarded as a substitute for the complaint which the girl, being over the age of 16, should have lodged herself, although the police had regarded her as incapable of doing so; since in the instant case no one was legally empowered to file a complaint, there was on this point a gap in the law, but it could not be filled by means of a broad interpretation to the detriment of B. There was no possibility of appealing on a point of law to the Supreme Court against this decision. X claimed that his daughter had been subjected to inhuman and degrading treatment, within the meaning of A 3, and that the right of both his daughter and himself to respect for their private life, guaranteed by A 8, had been infringed. He further maintained that the right to respect for family life meant that parents must be able to have recourse to remedies in the event of their children being the victims of sexual abuse, particularly if the children were minors and if the father was their legal representative. In addition, X claimed that he and his daughter had not had an effective remedy before a national authority as required by A 13, and that the situation complained of was discriminatory and contrary to A 14.

Comm found unanimously V 8 as regards Y, by a majority (15–1) NV 3 as regards Y, not necessary to examine the application either under 14 taken in conjunction with 8 or 3, or under 13, as regards X, no separate issue arose concerning his right to respect for family life.

Court held unanimously V 8 as regards Y, that not necessary to give a separate decision on her other complaints or the complaints of X.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr G Wiarda, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing.

There was no dispute as to the applicability of A 8: the facts underlying the application concerned a matter of private life, a concept which covered the physical and moral integrity of the person, including his or her sexual life. Although the object of A 8 was essentially that of protecting the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, it did not merely compel the State to abstain from such interference: in addition to that primarily negative undertaking, there may be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for private or family life. Those obligations may involve the adoption of measures designed to secure respect for private life even in the sphere of the relations of individuals between themselves. The choice of the means calculated to secure compliance with A 8 in the sphere of the relations of individuals between themselves was in principle a matter that fell within the Contracting States' margin of appreciation. There were different ways of ensuring 'respect for private life', and the nature of the State's obligation would depend on the particular aspect of private life that was at issue. Recourse to the criminal law was not necessarily the only answer. The protection afforded by the civil law in the case of wrongdoing of the kind inflicted on Y was insufficient. This was a case where fundamental values and essential aspects of private life were at stake. Effective deterrence was indispensable in this area and it could be achieved only by criminal law provisions. The only gap was as regards persons in the situation of Y; in such cases, this system met a procedural obstacle which the Netherlands legislature had not foreseen. The relevant provisions of the Criminal Code required a complaint by the actual victim before criminal proceedings could be instituted against someone. The Arnhem Court of Appeal held that the legal representative could not act on the victim's behalf for this purpose. The Criminal Code did not provide Y with practical and effective protection. She was the victim of a violation of A 8.

A 14 had no independent existence, it constituted one particular element (non-discrimination) of each of the rights safeguarded by the Convention. The Articles enshrining those rights could be violated alone or in conjunction with A 14. An examination of the case under A 14 was not generally required when the Court found a violation of one of the former articles taken alone; it was not necessary to examine the case under A 14 as well.

Having found that A 8 was violated, the Court did not consider that it had also to examine the case under A 3, taken alone or in conjunction with A 14.

The Court had already considered, in the context of A 8, whether an adequate means of obtaining a remedy was available to Y: it did not have to examine the same issue under A 13.

Initially, X also alleged that Netherlands law had violated his own rights under A 8 and 13, he did not revert to this aspect of the case at the hearings. The Court saw no necessity to give a decision thereon.

X, Y and Z v United Kingdom (1997) 24 EHRR 143 97/20

[Application lodged 6.5.1993, Commission report 27.6.1995; Court Judgment 22.4.1997]

Mr X, the first applicant, worked as a college lecturer and was a female-to-male transsexual. Since 1979 he had lived in a permanent and stable union with the second applicant Ms Y, a woman. The third applicant, Miss Z, was born in 1992 to the second applicant as a result of artificial insemination with sperm from an anonymous donor (AID). X and Y had applied together as a couple for the treatment which was conducted with the agreement of the hospital medical ethics committee. Following Z's birth, X was prevented from registering himself as the father since, under UK law, a person's legal gender was that at birth and could not be subsequently changed. However Z took X's surname and a joint residence order including parental responsibility was granted to both X and Y. They complained that the failure to legally recognise the relationship between X and Z was a breach of A 8 and that there was discrimination in their treatment under A 14.

Comm found by a majority V 8, not necessary to consider 14.

Court found unanimously A 8 applicable, by majority (14–6) NV 8, (17–3) not necessary to consider 14+8.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr C Russo (pd), Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr N Valticos, Mr I Foighel (d), Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr J Makarczyk (pd), Mr D Gotchev (d), Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr E Levits, Mr J Casadevall (pd).

There was 'family life' within the meaning of the Convention. X had lived with Y for many years apparently as her male partner and the couple had jointly applied for and been accepted for artificial insemination. X had been involved in the process throughout and had acted as Z's father since the birth. Thus de facto family ties existed. The notion of 'family life' in A 8 was not confined solely to families based on marriage and could encompass other de facto relationships. When deciding whether a relationship could be said to amount to 'family life', a number of factors may be relevant, including whether the couple lived together, the length of their relationship and whether they had demonstrated their commitment to each other by having children together or by any other means. The essential object of A 8 was to protect the individual against arbitrary interferences by the public authorities; there may, in addition, be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for private or family life. The boundaries between the State's positive and negative obligations did not always lend themselves to precise definition; nonetheless, the applicable principles were similar. In both contexts, regard had to be had to the fair balance that had to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole, and in both cases the State enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation. There was no common European standard with regard to the granting of parental rights to transsexuals or the rights of children born by artificial insemination to know their biological father. Since the issues in this case touched on areas where there was little common ground amongst the Member States of the Council of Europe and the law was in a transitional stage, the respondent State would be afforded a wide margin of appreciation. In relation to whether the correct balance had been struck by the UK in this case, the Court noted that the community had an interest in maintaining a coherent system of family law which placed the best interests of the child at the forefront. It had not been suggested that the amendment to the law sought by the applicants would be harmful to the interests of Z or of children conceived by AID in general; it was not clear that it would necessarily be to the advantage of such children. In these circumstances, the State would justifiably be cautious in changing the law, since it was possible that the amendment sought might have undesirable or unforeseen ramifications. Against these general interests, the Court had to weigh the disadvantages suffered by the applicants as a result of the refusal to recognise X in law as Z's 'father'. While Z would not inherit from X if he died intestate, this problem could be solved by X writing a will. Since Z was a British citizen by birth and could trace connection through her mother in immigration and nationality matters, she would not be disadvantaged in this respect by the lack of a legal relationship with X. Z was unlikely to be caused emotional distress by the lack of X's name on the birth certificate, especially since in the UK a birth certificate was not in common use for administrative or identification purposes and there were few occasions when it is necessary to produce a full length certificate. X was not prevented in any way from acting as Z's father in a social sense, financially and emotionally supporting her and could have full parental authority in English law. Given that transsexuality raised complex scientific, legal, moral and social issues, in respect of which there was no generally shared approach among the Contracting States, the Court was of the opinion that A 8 could not, in this context, be taken to imply an obligation for the respondent State formally to recognise as the father of a child a person who was not the biological father. It followed that there has been no violation of A 8 in this case.

The complaint under A 14 was tantamount to a restatement of the complaint under A 8 and raised no separate issue. In view of the finding in respect of A 8, there was no need to examine the issue again in the context of A 14.

[Application lodged 2.9.1986; Commission report 8.10.1991; Court Judgment 29.10.1992]

In 1983, Y, then aged 15, was a day pupil at an independent school in England. In September, following an incident with another pupil, he was sent for punishment to the headmaster who caned him four times on his bottom through his trousers. He was taken to the doctor and found to have four wheals across both buttocks, each wheal approximately 15 cm in length and 1.23 cm in width. There was heavy bruising and swelling of both buttocks. The police decided not to prosecute the headmaster. The parents then initiated civil proceedings in the County Court claiming, inter alia, damages for assault. On 28 July 1986 the County Court judge rejected the claims. Y complained that his corporal punishment constituted a breach of A 3, that it violated his right to respect for his private and family life under A 8, and that he had no effective domestic remedies for those Convention complaints.

Comm found by majority (11–2) V 3 and 13, no separate issue under 8.

Yagci and Sargin v Turkey (1995) 20 EHRR 505 95/17

[Application lodged 6.2.1990; Commission report 30.11.1993; Court Judgment 8.6.1995]

Mr Nabi Yagci, a journalist, and Mr Nihat Sargin, a doctor, were the general secretaries of the Turkish Workers' Party and the Turkish Communist Party respectively. At a press conference in Brussels in October 1987, they announced their intention of returning to Turkey to found the Turkish United Communist Party (TBKP) and develop its organisation and political action while staying within the law. On arrival at Ankara on 16 November 1987, they were arrested as they alighted from the plane and taken into police custody. On 5 December they were charged with leading an organisation whose aim was to establish the domination of a particular social class and disseminating propaganda to that end and with the intention of abolishing the rights guaranteed in the Constitution; inciting public hostility and hatred; and harming the reputation of the Republic of Turkey, its President and its Government. Their applications for release were rejected. The trial opened on 8 June 1988. On 9 October 1991 the Ankara National Security Court acquitted the applicants of some of the charges brought against them. On 9 July 1992 the Ankara Second Assize Court acquitted the applicants of the remaining matters. The applicants complained of the length of their detention pending trial and of the length of the criminal proceedings brought against them.

Comm found unanimously V 5(3) and 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found by majority (8–1) V 5(3), V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr J De Meyer, Mr I Foighel, Mr B Repik.

Having regard to the wording of Turkey's declaration under A 46, the Court considered that it could not entertain complaints about events which occurred before 22 January 1990 and that its jurisdiction only covered the period after that date. However, when examining the complaints relating to A 5(3) and 6(1), account would be taken of the state of the proceedings at the time when the declaration was deposited. The Government's argument that even facts subsequent to 22

January 1990 were excluded from its jurisdiction where they were merely extensions of an already existing situation could not be accepted. From the critical date onwards all the State's acts and omissions not only had to conform to the Convention but were also undoubtedly subject to review by the Convention institutions. Objection of lack of jurisdiction was therefore dismissed. With regard to non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, the remedy indicated by the Government had to be sufficiently certain, in practice as well as in theory. The Government did not cite any case-law to show that the Code of Criminal Procedure applied to orders prolonging detention. The provision of the Constitution was largely modelled on A 5, which the applicants had relied upon before the courts. Law No 466 was not applicable as it referred to compensation, which was not the applicants' complaint. The objection of loss of victim status was not raised before the Commission, and the Government were therefore estopped from raising it; that objection was therefore also dismissed.

A 5(3): the Court could only consider the period of three months and 12 days which elapsed between 22 January 1990, when the declaration whereby Turkey recognised the Court's compulsory jurisdiction was deposited, and 4 May 1990, when the applicants were provisionally released. However, when determining whether the applicants' continued detention after 22 January 1990 was justified under A 5(3), account had to be taken of the fact that by that date the applicants, having been placed in detention on 16 November 1987, had already been in custody for two years and two months. The persistence of reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence was a condition sine qua non for the validity of the continued detention, but, after a certain lapse of time, it no longer sufficed. The Court had to establish whether the other grounds cited by the judicial authorities continued to justify the deprivation of liberty. As grounds for refusing to release the applicants, the National Security Court cited the nature of the offences, 'the state of the evidence' and the date of arrest, namely 16 November 1987. The Court danger of an accused's absconding could not be gauged solely on the basis of the severity of the sentence risked. It had to be assessed with reference to a number of other relevant factors which might either confirm the existence of a danger of absconding or make it appear so slight that it cannot justify detention pending trial. The applicants had returned to Turkey of their own accord and with the specific aim of founding the Turkish United Communist Party and they could not be unaware that they would be prosecuted for this. The National Security Court's orders confirming detention nearly always used an identical, stereotyped, form of words, without in any way explaining why there was a danger of absconding. The expression 'the state of the evidence' could be understood to mean the existence and persistence of serious indications of guilt. Although in general those could be relevant factors, in the present case they could not on their own justify the continuation of the detention complained about. The third reason put forward by the National Security Court, namely the date of the applicants' arrest, did not stand up to scrutiny as no total period of detention was justified in itself, without there being relevant grounds under the Convention. Therefore the applicants' continued detention during the period in question contravened A 5(3).

A 6(1): The proceedings began on 16 November 1987, when the applicants were arrested and taken into police custody, and ended not as the Government argued on 9 October 1991, when the applicants were acquitted of offences under Articles 141–43, 311 and 312 of the Criminal Code, but on 16 July 1992, when the Ankara Second Assize Court's judgment of 9 July in which the applicants were acquitted on the remaining charges became final. However, the Court could only consider the period of two years, five months and 24 days that elapsed between 22 January 1990, the date on which the declaration whereby Turkey recognised the Court's compulsory jurisdiction was deposited, and 16 July 1992. Nevertheless, it had to take into account the fact that by the critical date the proceedings had already lasted more than two years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, regard being had to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. From 22 January 1990 the National Security Court held 20 hearings, 16 of which were devoted almost entirely to reading out evidence. That process, even allowing for the quantity of documents, could not be regarded as complex. A 6 did not require a person charged with a criminal offence to co-operate actively with the judicial authorities. The conduct of the applicants and their counsel at the hearings did not seem to have displayed any determination to be obstructive. At all events, the applicants could not be blamed for having taken full advantage of the resources afforded by national law in their defence. The Court did not in this instance have to speculate as to the motives of the prosecution at the National Security Court. It noted that between 22 January 1990 and 9 July 1992 that court held only 20 hearings in the case at regular intervals (less than 30 days), only one of which lasted for longer than half a day. Moreover, after the Antiterrorist Act of 12 April 1991, repealing Articles 141–43 of the Criminal Code, had come into force, the National Security Court waited nearly six months before acquitting the applicants on the charges based on those provisions. In conclusion, therefore, the length of the criminal proceedings in question contravened A 6(1).

[Application lodged 8.10.1991; Commission report 16.5.1995; Court Judgment 7.8.1996]

Mrs Yüksel Yagiz, a nursing auxiliary on the maternity ward, was questioned on 14 December 1989 and arrested on 15 December 1989 on suspicion of involvement in the abduction of a new-born baby at the hospital where she worked. She was kept in custody and on her release on 16 December 1989 she had to be admitted to hospital on account of the psychological shock she had suffered. A medical report, of 21 December 1989, prepared on her behalf concluded that she was suffering from 'acute post-traumatic stress' and bore marks on the soles of her feet. Three police officers were prosecuted and following trial acquitted of ill-treating her. As a result of the police investigation into the child's abduction, the real offenders were arrested and prosecuted. The proceedings against Mrs Yagiz and her four co-defendants were discontinued on 28 December 1989. She complained of the ill-treatment she had suffered while in police custody.

The Court could not deal with the merits of the case, as the detention in police custody during which Mrs Yagiz allegedly suffered ill-treatment took place on 15 and 16 December 1989, more than a month before Turkey's recognition of the Court's compulsory jurisdiction on 22 January 1990. The Government's preliminary objection of lack of jurisdiction ratione temporis was therefore accepted.

Yasa v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 408 98/71

[Application lodged 12.7.1993; Commission report 8.4.1997; Court Judgment 2.9.1998]

The applicant and his uncle had sold the newspaper Özgür Gündem. The applicant was shot at and seriously injured in an attack by two men on 15 January 1993. His uncle was shot and killed by a gunman on 14 June 1993. The Commission found that there was no evidence before it that proved beyond reasonable doubt that agents of the security forces or police were involved in the shooting of either the applicant or his uncle. It also found that the applicant's complaints concerning police obstruction at the hospital and ill-treatment in custody following his uncle's funeral had not been substantiated. However, having regard to appeals made for protection and protests made by the owner of the Özgür Gündem, the Commission found that the Government had or ought to have been aware that those involved in its publication and distribution feared that they were falling victim to a concerted campaign tolerated, if not approved, by State agents. The applicant lodged an application with the Commission on his own behalf and on behalf of his deceased uncle. He complained of ill treatment, lack of access to a court and no effective remedy.

Comm found by majority (30–2) V 2, unanimously NV 3, (31–1) no separate issue under 6(1) and NV 10, (30–2) no separate issue under 13, unanimously NV 14 or 18.

Court dismissed by majority (8–1) Government's preliminary objections, found unanimously NV 2 in regard to the attack on applicant and killing of uncle, V 2 in regard to an adequate and effective investigation, V 13, unanimously not necessary to examine 10, 14 or 18.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev, Mr J Casadevall, Mr M Voicu, Mr V Butkevych.

Regarding the scope of the case, the complaints under A 3 and 6 were not pursued before the Court, which saw no reason to consider them of its own motion.

The Government had not raised the objection as to whether the applicant was a victim before the Commission and were estopped from denying it before the Court. In the light of the principles established in its case-law and of the particular facts of the case, the applicant, as the deceased's nephew, could legitimately claim to be a victim of the murder of his uncle. With respect to the objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies regarding a civil action for damage, those responsible for the acts complained of had not been identified. The applicant was not required to bring the civil and administrative proceedings in question. Consequently the preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was rejected in respect of those remedies. The criminal law remedies were closely linked to the complaints on the merits.

The establishment and verification of the facts were primarily a matter for the Commission. Only in exceptional circumstances would the Court exercise its own powers in this area. The Court did not consider that it should depart from the Commission's conclusions regarding this complaint and was not therefore able to conclude beyond all reasonable doubt that the applicant and his uncle were respectively attacked and killed by the security forces. It followed that there has been no violation of A 2 on that account.

The obligation to protect the right to life under A 2 required by implication that there should be some form of effective official investigation when individuals had been killed as a result of the use of force. That was not confined to cases where it had been established that the killing was caused by an agent of the State. Nor was the issue of whether members of the deceased's family or others had lodged a formal complaint about the killing with the competent investigatory authorities decisive. The mere fact that the authorities were informed of the murder of the applicant's uncle gave rise ipso facto to an obligation under A 2 to carry out an effective investigation. The same applied to the attack on the applicant. The Court took into account the fact that the prevailing climate at the time in that region of Turkey, marked by violent action by the PKK and measures taken in reaction thereto by the authorities, may have impeded the search for conclusive evidence in the domestic criminal proceedings. Nonetheless, circumstances of that nature could not relieve the authorities of their obligations under A 2 to carry out an investigation. As the investigations carried out in the instant case did not allow of the possibility that given the circumstances of the case, the security forces might have been implicated in the attacks and because more than five years after the events, no concrete and credible progress had been made, the investigations could not be considered to have been effective as required by A 2. Therefore the applicant had satisfied the obligation to exhaust domestic remedies and the criminal proceedings limb of the Government's preliminary objection had to be dismissed; there had been a violation of A 2.

Although no violation was found in respect of the attacks on the applicant and his uncle, that did not necessarily mean that the complaint under A 2 was not arguable. The Court's conclusion as to the merits did not relieve the State of the obligation to carry out an effective investigation into the substance of the complaint. The nature of the right alleged to have been infringed had implications on the extent of the obligations under A 13. Given the fundamental importance of the right to protection of life, A 13 imposed, without prejudice to any other remedy available under the domestic system including the payment of compensation where appropriate, an obligation on States to carry out a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible and in which the complainant had effective access to the investigatory procedure. The respondent State could not be considered to have conducted an effective criminal investigation as required by A 13, the requirements of which were stricter than the investigatory obligation under A 2. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 13.

The evidence before the Court was not sufficient to enable it to determine whether the authorities had adopted a practice of violating A 2 and 13.

The complaints under A 10, 14 and 18 arose out of the same facts as those considered under A 2 and 13. In the light of the conclusions with respect to those articles, it was not necessary to examine the former complaints separately.

Young, James and Webster v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 38, (1983) 5 EHRR 201 81/3

[Applications lodged 26.7.1976 and 18.2.1977; Commission report 14.12.1979; Court Judgment 13.8.1981 (merits), 18.10.1982 (A 50)]

Mr Ian McLean Young, Mr Noel Henry James and Mr Ronald Roger Webster were former employees of the British Railways Board (BRB) before it became a condition of employment, with the only exemption being for objection on religious grounds, upon certain categories of staff, including the applicants, to become members of one of three trade unions. The condition was introduced pursuant to a closed shop agreement between three trade unions (National Union of Railwaymen ('NUR'), the Transport Salaried Staffs' Association ('TSSA') and the Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen ('ASLEF')) and BRB. The applicants were faced with the choice either of joining NUR (in the case of Mr James) or TSSA or NUR (in the cases of Mr Young and Mr Webster) or of losing jobs for which union membership had not been a requirement when they were first engaged and which two of them had held for several years. Each applicant regarded the membership condition introduced by that agreement as an interference with the freedom of association to which he considered that he was entitled; in addition, Mr Young and Mr Webster had objections to trade union policies and activities coupled, in the case of Mr Young, with objections to the political affiliations of the specified unions. The applicants refused to join the unions and received notices terminating their employment. Under legislation in force at the time, their dismissal was fair and therefore they could not found a claim for compensation let alone reinstatement or re-engagement. The applicants complained that the domestic legislation which allowed their dismissal when they had objected on reasonable (albeit non-religious) grounds to joining one of the three trade unions interfered with their freedom of thought, conscience, expression and association with others and that no adequate remedies were available to them.

Comm found by majority (14–3) V 11, not necessary to deal separately with 9 and 10, (8–2 with two abstentions) no additional breach 13.

Court found by majority (18–3) V 11, unanimously not necessary to consider 9, 10 or 13.

State responsibility was engaged as a result of the enactment of legislation relating to unfair dismissal. The negative aspect of a person's freedom of association was not completely outside A 11's ambit despite the deliberate omission from the Convention of a rule preventing compulsion to belong to an association. The threat of dismissal involving loss of livelihood was a most serious form of compulsion and when directed against persons in the position of the applicants, engaged by BRB before the introduction of any obligation to join a trade-union, constituted interference with A 11. Furthermore, where the freedom of action or choice was so reduced so as to be of no practical significance and someone was compelled to join an association contrary to their personal convictions, interference with the freedom guaranteed in A 11 was established. Although the Government conceded that were an interference established, it would be unnecessary in a democratic society, the Court went on to find that the interference had not been proportionate to the aim of the unions of protecting their members' best interests, as this could be achieved without compelling non-union employees, having objections like the applicants, to join a specific union. Accordingly there has been a violation of A 11. In view of that finding it was not necessary to consider A 9, 10 or 13.

Z v Finland (1998) 25 EHRR 371 97/10

[Application lodged 21.5.1993; Commission report 2.12.1995; Court Judgment 25.2.1997]

The applicant, a Finnish national, was married to X, who was not Finnish. They divorced on 22 September 1995. They are both infected with HIV. On 19 March 1992 X was informed of the results of a blood test performed on 6 March 1992, indicating that he was HIV-positive. In 1992 X was charged and investigated for a number of offences of sexual assault, rape and attempted manslaughter by deliberately subjecting the complainants to a risk of HIV infection. The applicant refused to give evidence to police against her husband. At a hearing before the City Court on 22 April 1992 in public, X refused to reply to a question put by one of the complainant's counsel as to whether the applicant was also an HIV carrier. The City Court summoned the applicant to appear before it as a witness on 20 May 1992, but she relied on her right not to give evidence in a case concerning her husband. On 12 August 1992, despite his objections, the City Court ordered a senior doctor to give evidence. He disclosed to the court medical data concerning the applicant. Other doctors were also required to give evidence despite their objections. On 8 and 9 March 1993 the police carried out a search at the hospital where the applicant and X had occasionally been treated. The police seized all the records concerning the applicant and appended copies of these to the record of the investigation concerning the charges against X of attempted manslaughter. These measures had been ordered by the prosecution. After photocopying the records the police returned them to the hospital. On 10 March 1993 the City Court decided to include the copies of the seized records in its case file. On 19 May 1993 X was convicted on three counts of attempted manslaughter and rape and sentenced to imprisonment. The City Court published the operative part of the judgment, an abridged version of its reasoning and an indication of the law which it had applied in the case. It ordered that the full reasoning and the documents in the case be kept confidential for 10 years. Both the complainants as well as X had requested a longer period of confidentiality. On 10 December 1993, the Court of Appeal, inter alia, upheld the conviction of X, in addition, convicted him on two further such counts, increased his total sentence of imprisonment and upheld the City Court's decision that the case documents should remain confidential for a period of 10 years. The Supreme Court refused to grant X leave to appeal. On 19 May 1995 the applicant applied to the Supreme Court for an order quashing the Court of Appeal's judgment in so far as it permitted the information and material about her to become available to the public as from 2002, alternatively an order reversing the Court of Appeal's judgment as being incompatible with A 8. On 1 September 1995 the Supreme Court dismissed the applicant's application for an order quashing or reversing the Court of Appeal's on the grounds that the first application had been lodged out of time and she did not have locus standi to make the second. The applicant complained of violations of her right to respect for private and family life as guaranteed by A 8.

Comm found unanimously V 8, not necessary to examine 13.

Court found by majority (8–1) NV 8 with respect to the orders requiring the applicant's medical advisers to give evidence, NV 8 with respect to the seizure of the applicant's medical records and their inclusion in the investigation file, unanimously V 8 with respect to the order to make the transcripts of the evidence given by her medical advisers and her medical records accessible to the public in 2002 if implemented, V 8 with regard to the disclosure of the applicant's identity and medical condition by the Helsinki Court of Appeal, not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer (pd), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr B Repik.

Regarding the scope of the issues before the Court, it had not been established that there had been a leak of confidential medical data concerning the applicant for which the respondent State could be held responsible under A 8. The applicant's allegation that she was subjected to discriminatory treatment did not appear to be an elaboration of her complaints declared admissible by the Commission, but rather a separate and new complaint which was not covered by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The Court therefore had no jurisdiction to entertain it.

The various measures complained of constituted interferences with the applicant's right to respect for her private and family life. There was no evidence to suggest that the measures did not comply with domestic law or that the effects of the relevant law were not sufficiently foreseeable for the purposes of the quality requirement which was implied by the expression 'in accordance with the law'. With regard to the legitimate aim, the question was whether, at the time when the contested measures were taken, the relevant authorities sought to achieve a legitimate aim. At the material time, the investigative measures in issue were aimed at the prevention of crime and the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. As regards the 10-year limitation on the confidentiality order, there was a public interest in ensuring the transparency of court proceedings and thereby the maintenance of the public's confidence in the courts. The limitation in question would, under Finnish law, enable any member of the public to exercise his or her right to have access to the case material after the expiry of the confidentiality order and could therefore be said to have been aimed at protecting the rights and freedoms of others. The protection of personal data, not least medical data, was of fundamental importance to a person's enjoyment of his or her right to respect for private and family life. Domestic law had to afford appropriate safeguards to prevent any communication or disclosure of personal health data as might be inconsistent with the guarantees in A 8. In view of the highly intimate and sensitive nature of information concerning a person's HIV status, any State measures compelling communication or disclosure of such information without the consent of the patient called for the most careful scrutiny on the part of the Court, as did the safeguards designed to secure an effective protection. However, the interests of a patient and the community as a whole in protecting the confidentiality of medical data could be outweighed by the interest in investigation and prosecution of crime and in the publicity of court proceedings where such interests were shown to be of even greater importance. Regarding access by the public to personal data, a margin of appreciation was left to the competent national authorities in striking a fair balance between the interest of publicity of court proceedings, on the one hand, and the interests of a party or a third person in maintaining the confidentiality of such data, on the other hand. The scope of that margin would depend on such factors as the nature and seriousness of the interests at stake and the gravity of the interference. Although the applicant was not heard directly by the competent authorities before they took the measures, they had been made aware of her views and interests in these matters. Her medical advisers had objected to the various orders to testify and had thus actively sought to protect her interests in maintaining the confidentiality of her medical data. In addition, the Court of Appeal had been informed by X's lawyer of the applicant's wish that the period of confidentiality be extended. In those circumstances, the decision-making process leading to the measures in question was such as to take her views sufficiently into account for the purposes of A 8 and therefore the procedure followed did not give rise to any breach of that article.

The orders requiring the applicant's doctors and psychiatrist to give evidence were subject to important limitations and accompanied by effective and adequate safeguards against abuse. The proceedings against X were confidential and of an exceptional character. The various orders were supported by relevant and sufficient reasons which corresponded to an overriding requirement in the interest of the legitimate aims pursued. There was a reasonable relationship of proportionality between those measures and aims. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 8 on that point.

The seizure of the applicant's medical records and their inclusion in the investigation file were complementary to the orders compelling the medical advisers to give evidence and also taken in the context of the applicant refusing to give evidence against her husband. They were based on the same weighty public interests and were subject to similar limitations and safeguards against abuse. Although the seizure had not been authorised by a court but had been ordered by the prosecution, the legal conditions for the seizure were essentially the same as those for the orders on the doctors to give evidence. In addition the applicant had the possibility of challenging the seizure before the City Court. Therefore, the fact that the seizure was ordered by the prosecution and not by a court could not of itself give rise to any misgivings under A 8. The expediency of the adducing and admission of evidence by national authorities in domestic proceedings was primarily a matter to be assessed by them and in this case the Court saw no reason to doubt the assessment by the national authorities. The seizure and inclusion orders were supported by relevant and sufficient reasons, the weight of which was such as to override the applicant's interest in the information in question not being communicated. The measures were proportionate to the legitimate aims pursued and accordingly there was no violation of A 8 on this point.

Regarding the duration of the order to maintain the medical data confidential, the 10-year limitation on the confidentiality order did not correspond to the wishes or interests of the litigants in the proceedings, all of whom had requested a longer period of confidentiality. As a result of the information in issue having been produced in the proceedings without her consent, the applicant had already been subjected to a serious interference with her right to respect for her private and family life. The further interference which she would suffer if the medical information were to be made accessible to the public after 10 years was not supported by reasons which could be considered sufficient to override her interest in the data remaining confidential for a longer period. The order to make the material so accessible as early as 2002 would, if implemented, amount to a disproportionate interference with her right to respect for her private and family life, in violation of A 8.

The disclosure of the applicant's identity and HIV infection in the text of the Court of Appeal's judgment made available to the press was not supported by any cogent reasons. Accordingly, the publication of the information concerned gave rise to a violation of the applicant's right to respect for her private and family life as guaranteed by A 8.

The complaints raised had been taken into account in relation to A 8 and it was not necessary therefore to examine them under A 13.

Zana v Turkey (1999) 27 EHRR 667 97/88

[Application lodged 30.9.1991; Commission report 10.4.1996; Court Judgment 25.11.1997]

Mr Mehdi Zana was a former mayor of Diyarbakir. In August 1987, while serving several sentences in Diyarbakir military prison, the applicant in an interview with journalists stated that he supported the PKK but was not in favour of massacres and that the PKK killed women and children by mistake. His statement was published in the national daily newspaper Cumhuriyet on 30 August 1987. On 30 August 1987 the 'press offences' department of the Istanbul public prosecutor's office began a preliminary investigation on the ground that the applicant had 'defended an act punishable by law as a serious crime'. The Istanbul and the Diyarbakir public prosecutor's offices and the Diyarbakir National Security Court ruled they had no jurisdiction to deal with the applicant's case. By an indictment dated 19 November 1987, the Diyarbakir military prosecutor's office instituted proceedings in the Diyarbakir Military Court against the applicant charging him with supporting the activities of an armed organisation, the PKK, whose aim was to break up Turkey's national territory. The proceedings were transferred to the Diyarbakir National Security and on 26 March 1991 that court sentenced him to twelve months' imprisonment for having 'defended an act punishable by law as a serious crime' and 'endangering public safety'. He appealed and on 18 July 1991, the Court of Cassation upheld the National Security Court's judgment. He complained, inter alia, of the length of the criminal proceedings, of an infringement of his right to a fair trial in that he had not been able to appear before the court which convicted him and of an interference with his freedom of thought and expression.

Comm found by majority (14–15 with the President's casting vote) NV 10, unanimously V 6(1) and 3(c) as the applicant had not been present at his trial, by majority (23–5) V 6(1) in that the case had not been heard within a reasonable time.

Court dismissed by majority (18–2) the preliminary objection to jurisdiction ratione temporis as regards the complaint under 10, dismissed unanimously the objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies as regards the complaint under 10, found by majority (12–8) NV 10, dismissed unanimously the objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies as regards the complaints under 6, found by majority (17–3) V 6(1) and 3(c) on account of the applicant's absence from his trial, (19-1) V 6(1) on account of the length of the criminal proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d) F Gölcüklü (pd/d), Mr F Matscher (pd) A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm (pd), Mr AN Loizou (pd), Sir John Freeland, Mr A B Baka, Mr M A Lopes Rocha (pd), Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (pd), Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris (pd), Mr E Levits (pd), Mr J Casadevall, Mr P Van Dijk (pd).

Regarding the objection of lack of jurisdiction, ratione temporis, Turkey accepted the Court's jurisdiction only in respect of facts and events subsequent to 22 January 1990, when it deposited its declaration. In the instant case, however, the principal fact lay not in the applicant's statement to the journalists but in the Diyarbakir National Security Court's judgment of 26 March 1991, whereby the applicant was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment for having 'defended an act punishable by law as a serious crime' under Turkish legislation, a judgment that was upheld by the Court of Cassation on 26 June 1991. It was that conviction and sentence, subsequent to Turkey's recognition of the Court's compulsory jurisdiction, which constituted the 'interference' within the meaning of A 10 of the Convention and whose justification under that Article the Court had to determine. This preliminary objection was accordingly dismissed. The objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies was not raised when the admissibility of the application was being considered and there was therefore an estoppel.

The applicant's conviction and sentence by the Turkish courts for remarks made to journalists amounted to an interference with his exercise of his freedom of expression. His conviction and sentence were based on Articles 168 and 312 of the Turkish Criminal Code and accordingly the impugned interference was prescribed by law. At a time when serious disturbances were raging in south-east Turkey the applicant's statement, coming from a political figure well known in the region, could have an impact such as to justify the national authorities' taking a measure designed to maintain national security and public safety. The interference complained of therefore pursued legitimate aims under A 10(2). The applicant's statement as published in the national daily newspaper was both contradictory and ambiguous: It would seem difficult simultaneously to support the PKK, a terrorist organisation which resorted to violence to achieve its ends, and to declare oneself opposed to massacres; ambiguous because whilst the applicant disapproved of the massacres of women and children, he at the same time described them as 'mistakes' that anybody could make. The statement could not, however, be looked at in isolation. It had a special significance in the circumstances of the case, as the applicant must have realised. The interview coincided with murderous attacks carried out by the PKK on civilians in south-east Turkey, where there was extreme tension at the material time. In those circumstances the support given to the PKK by the former mayor of Diyarbakir, the most important city in south-east Turkey, in an interview published in a major national daily newspaper, had to be regarded as likely to exacerbate an already explosive situation in that region. Accordingly that penalty imposed on the applicant could reasonably be regarded as answering a pressing social need and the reasons adduced by the national authorities were relevant and sufficient. Having regard to all those factors and to the margin of appreciation which national authorities had in such a case, the interference in issue was proportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. There had consequently been no breach of A 10.

The object and purpose of A 6 taken as a whole showed that a person charged with a criminal offence was entitled to take part in the hearing. Moreover, paras 3(c) and 3(d) guaranteed to everyone charged with a criminal offence the right to defend himself in person and to examine or have examined witnesses, and those rights could not be exercised without the person concerned being present. The applicant was not requested to attend the hearing before the Diyarbakir National Security Court, which sentenced him to a 12-month prison term. In accordance with the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Aydin Assize Court had been asked to take evidence from him in his defence, under powers delegated by the National Security Court. The fact that the applicant raised procedural objections or wished to address the court in Kurdish, as he did at the hearing in the Aydin Assize Court, in no way signified that he implicitly waived his right to defend himself and to appear before the Diyarbakir National Security Court. Waiver of the exercise of a right guaranteed by the Convention had to be established in an unequivocal manner. In view of what was at stake for the applicant, the National Security Court could not, if the trial was to be fair, give judgment without a direct assessment of the applicant's evidence given in person. If the applicant had been present at the hearing, he would have had an opportunity, in particular, to say what his intentions had been when he had made his statement and in what circumstances the interview had taken place, to summon journalists as witnesses or to seek production of the recording. Neither the 'indirect' hearing by the Aydin Assize Court nor the presence of the applicant's lawyers at the hearing before the Diyarbakir National Security Court could compensate for the absence of the accused. Such an interference with the rights of the defence could not be justified, regard being had to the prominent place held in a democratic society by the right to a fair trial within the meaning of the Convention. There had consequently been a breach of A 6(1) and 3(c).

The proceedings began on 30 August 1987 when the preliminary investigation in respect of the applicant was begun and ended on 18 July 1991, when the Court of Cassation's judgment was served. They therefore lasted for almost three years and 11 months. However, the Court could take cognisance of the complaint relating to the length of the criminal proceedings only from 22 January 1990, when the declaration whereby Turkey recognised the Court's compulsory jurisdiction was deposited. Nevertheless account had to be taken of the state of the proceedings at the time when the aforementioned declaration was deposited. On the critical date the proceedings had already lasted two years and five months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case, regard being had to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The proceedings were not particularly complex, the facts of the case being straightforward, notwithstanding the issues of jurisdiction that could arise. A 6 did not require a person charged with a criminal offence to cooperate actively with the judicial authorities. The applicant's conduct, even if it may to some extent have slowed down the proceedings, could not, on its own, explain such a length of time. Between 22 January 1990 (Turkey's declaration of recognition), and 18 July 1991, when the Court of Cassation's judgment was served, one year and six months elapsed. In that period the Diyarbakir National Security Court did not deliver its judgment until 26 March 1991, that it is to say nine months after the hearing of 20 June 1990 at the Aydin Assize Court, during which the applicant had refused to speak Turkish. There was a period of inactivity attributable to the judicial authorities between the hearing before the Diyarbakir Military Court on 15 December 1987 and the Military Court's decision of 18 April 1989. A 6(1) guaranteed to everyone against whom criminal proceedings were brought the right to a final decision within a reasonable time on the charge against him. It was for the Contracting States to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet that requirement. What was at stake in the case was important to the applicant as he was already in custody when he made his statement to the journalists and was sentenced to a further term of imprisonment by the Diyarbakir National Security Court. The length of the proceedings could not be regarded as reasonable. There had consequently been a violation of A 6(1).

Zanatta v France 00/101

[Application lodged 30.7.1997; Court Judgment 28.3.2000]

Aldo and Jean-Baptiste Zanatta complained about the length of compulsory purchase proceedings of their property. Following a decision by the local authority, the applicants applied to the Administrative Court on 1 March 1991. On 16 April 1992 the Administrative Court dismissed the application. The applicants appealed to the Conseil d'Etat which dismissed their appeal on 5 March 1997. They complained of the length of proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja.

While proceedings challenging the lawfulness of the expropriation order related to the assessment of the public interest, it was the stage prior to the transfer of ownership itself and therefore the outcome had a direct impact on the applicant's right of property, a civil right within the meaning of the Convention. A 6 was applicable.

The proceedings had commenced on 1 March 1991 and ended on 5 March 1997; a period of 6 years. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, taking into account the complexity of the case, conduct of the applicant and of the competent authorities. The period of inactivity in the Conseil d'Etat could not be justified by the conduct of the applicants. There had been a violation of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary damage (FF 15,000 to each of the applicants), costs and expenses (FF 5,000).

Zander v Sweden (1994) 18 EHRR 175 93/54

[Application lodged 12.9.1988; Commission report 14.10.1992; Court Judgment 25.11.1993]

Mr Lennhart and Mrs Gunny Zander, husband and wife, owned a property adjacent to land on which a company, VAFAB, took delivery of and treated household and industrial waste, amongst other things. Analyses effected in October 1983 showed excessive levels of cyanide in wells in the area. In July 1986, VAFAB asked the Licensing Board to renew its permit and to allow it to expand its activities on the dump. The applicants, together with other landowners, objected. By decision of 13 March 1987, the Licensing Board granted VAFAB's request and dismissed the applicants' and the other owners' claim. It granted a permit with conditions. The applicants appealed to the Government, challenging the conditions set for the permit. The Government, as the final instance of appeal, upheld these and dismissed the appeal on 17 March 1988. The applicants complained that it was not possible for them to have the decision authorising VAFAB to increase its activities on the dump reviewed by a court.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr B Walsh, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr D Gotchev.

With regard to the applicability of A 6(1), the applicants could arguably maintain that they were entitled under Swedish law to protection against the water in their well being polluted as a result of VAFAB's activities on the dump. There was a serious disagreement between the applicants and the authorities, the outcome of the dispute was directly decisive for the applicants' entitlement to protection against pollution of their well by VAFAB. Their appeal lodged with the Government involved a determination of one of their rights for the purposes of A 6. The applicants' claim was directly concerned with their ability to use the water in their well for drinking purposes, that ability was one facet of their right as owners of the land on which it was situated. The right of property was clearly a civil right within the meaning of A 6(1). A 6(1) therefore applied to the case.

The Government admitted that under Swedish law it was not possible at the material time for the applicants to have the Government's decision of 17 March 1988, upholding the Licensing Board's decision of 13 March 1987, reviewed by a court. Accordingly, there has been a violation of A 6(1).

Zanghì v Italy 91/6

[Application lodged 16.4.1985; Commission report 11.12.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991 (merits), 10.2.1993 (A 50)]

Mr Claudio Zanghì, a university professor, complained that he had suffered damage from works his neighbour had carried out on a property adjoining his own. On 3 April 1982 he brought proceedings in the District Court. Judgment was delivered and filed on 9 May 1988 in favour of the applicant. On 27 September 1988 his neighbour appealed; the judgment of the Court of Appeal was still outstanding at the date of the European Court's judgment. In a judgment of 31 May 1990, which was filed in its registry on 25 June 1990 and became final on 26 September 1991, the Court of Appeal found against the neighbour and awarded the applicant, compensation in the amount of 298,000 lire, representing the value of a parcel of land that had been unlawfully occupied by Mrs D. He complained of length of proceedings and deprivation of peaceful enjoyment of his possessions.

Under A 6(1) everyone had the right to a final decision, within a reasonable time, on disputes over his civil rights and obligations. The Contracting States had the obligation to organise their legal systems so as to allow the courts to comply with that requirement. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The case was not complex and a lapse of nine years could not be regarded as reasonable. Accordingly V 6(1).

In view of that conclusion it was unnecessary to examine P1A1.

Dismissed by majority (8–1) claim for just satisfaction, in view of the Court of Appeal's judgment.

Zappia v Italy 96/39

[Application lodged 15.5.1993; Commission report 6.7.1995; Court Judgment 26.9.1996]

Mr Giuseppe Zappia and his wife Giuseppa brought proceedings on 27 July 1963 against Mr B in the Reggio di Calabria District Court seeking damages for breach of a contract of sale relating to a flat under construction. By a judgment of 5 July 1968, deposited in the registry on 21 September 1968, the District Court assessed damages and confirmed the charging order which the applicants had been granted on 19 June 1964. The judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal on 7 June 1969 and by the Court of Cassation in 1973. On 28 November 1969 the applicants served Mr B with a notice to comply. It produced no result and a second notice, served on 21 July 1977, was no more successful. On 5 December 1977, they applied to the judge responsible for enforcement proceedings to have the property sold so that they could be paid the sum due together with interest and costs. The applicants complained of the length of proceedings which had still not concluded on the day of the European Court's judgment.

Comm found by majority (26–3) V 6.

Court dismissed by majority (8–1) the Government's preliminary objection of out of time application, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (d), Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr E Levits.

The Court had to decide whether, and if so when, the right asserted by the applicants on 27 July 1963 actually became effective. It was that moment which constituted determination of a civil right, and therefore a final decision within the meaning of A 26. On 12 March 1973, the Court of Cassation upheld the decision of the lower courts in the applicants' favour. On 21 July 1977 the applicants served Mr B with a notice to comply. The enforcement proceedings had to be regarded as the second stage of the proceedings which began on 27 July 1963 – which in this case were not covered by the Italian declaration recognising the right of individual petition. The proceedings had not yet concluded. Accordingly, the government's preliminary objection regarding the application being out of time of the six-month period was dismissed.

The period to be taken into consideration did not begin on 27 July 1963, when proceedings were brought against Mr B in the Reggio di Calabria District Court, but only on 1 August 1973 when the Italian declaration under A 25 took effect. However, in order to determine the reasonableness of the length of time which had elapsed since that date, regard had to be had to the state of the case at the time. The relevant period had not yet ended, as the enforcement proceedings were still pending. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. There had been delays on the part of the applicants; however, their conduct alone did not explain the length of the proceedings. Thirteen hearings were adjourned, sometimes on account of a judge's transfer, sometimes by the court of its own motion and sometimes because the registry was not functioning correctly. In addition, the expert's supplementary report, which was ordered on 31 December 1992, had still not been filed at the registry. An expert worked in the context of judicial proceedings supervised by a judge, who remained responsible for the preparation and the speedy conduct of the trial. A period of more than 23 years for proceedings which were still pending and were of no particular complexity could not be regarded as reasonable.

Periods of more than five years, three months and six years and two months at one level of jurisdiction and still pending could not be considered reasonable in the circumstances of the case.

Zielinski and Pradal and Gonzalez and Others v France 99/71

[Application lodged 5.7.1994, 19.8.1996 and 9.9.1996; Commission reports 9.9.1997 and 21.10.1998; Court Judgment 28.10.1999]

Mr Benoît Zielinski, Mr Patrick Pradal, Ms Jeanine Gonzalez, Ms Martine Mary, Ms Anita Delaquerrière, Mr Guy Schreiber, Ms Monique Kern, Mr Pascal Gontier, Ms Nicole Schreiber, Ms Josiane Memeteau and Mr Claude Cossuta worked for social-security bodies in Alsace-Moselle. On 28 March 1953 the representatives of the social-security offices of the Strasbourg region signed an agreement with the regional representatives of the trade unions under which a 'special difficulties allowance' was introduced for the staff of social-security bodies on the ground that applying the local law of the départements of Haut-Rhin, Bas-Rhin and Moselle was a particularly complicated task. Legal proceedings were brought by some staff members of the social-security offices with regard to the allowance and the applicants brought proceedings in the industrial tribunals. The applications of the applicants were allowed by the courts. By means of an amendment to the legislation, s 85, Law 94-43 of 18 January 1994, Parliament endorsed the amount of the allowance argued for by the State's representative and the health-insurance offices and did so with retrospective effect. The Constitutional Council ruled in a decision of 13 January 1994 that the provision was constitutional. Applying the new Act, the Court of Cassation quashed the judgments given in Mr Zielinski and Mr Pradal's favour by the Metz Court of Appeal and the Colmar Court of Appeal similarly reversed the judgments that had been given in favour of the other applicants. The applicants complained that the intervention of the State by means of retrospective legislation infringed the fair trial guarantee and except for Mr Zielinski and Mr Pradal they also complained, inter alia, of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) as regards the fairness of the proceedings, not necessary to consider 13, V 6(1) as regards length of proceedings in respect of Ms Gonzalez, Ms Mary, Ms Delaquerrière, Mr Schreiber, Ms Kern, Mr Gontier, Ms Schreiber, Ms Memeteau and Mr Cossuta.

Court unanimously found V 6(1) as regards the fairness of the proceedings, V 6(1) as regards the length of the proceedings in respect of Ms Gonzalez, Ms Mary, Ms Delaquerrière, Mr Schreiber, Ms Kern, Mr Gontier, Ms Schreiber, Ms Memeteau and Mr Cossuta, not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Mrs S Botoucharova, Mr A Bacquet (c), ad hoc judge.

While in principle the legislature was not precluded in civil matters from adopting new retrospective provisions to regulate rights arising under existing laws, the principle of the rule of law and the notion of fair trial enshrined in A 6 precluded any interference by the legislature, other than on compelling grounds of the general interest, with the administration of justice designed to influence the judicial determination of a dispute. The Court could not overlook the effect of the content of s 85 of the Act of 18 January 1994 (Law No 94-43), taken together with the method and timing of its adoption. The new legislation settled the terms of the dispute before the ordinary courts and did so retrospectively The relevant section was part of an Act on 'public health and social welfare'. It was only in the course of the parliamentary debates and shortly after the delivery of a court judgment that an amendment on the allowance was tabled. The section endorsed the position taken up by the State in pending proceedings. The majority of earlier decisions by the tribunals of fact had been favourable to the applicants. The financial risk adverted to by the Government could not in itself warrant the legislature's substituting itself both for the parties to the collective agreement and for the courts in order to settle the dispute. The adoption of s 85 in reality determined the substance of the dispute. The application of it by the domestic courts, in particular the Court of Cassation in its judgments of 2 March 1995, made it pointless to continue the proceedings. The social-security bodies performed a public-service mission and came under the supervision both of the minister responsible for social security and the Minister for Economic Affairs and Finances. The State was a party to the proceedings and the intervention of the legislature had taken place at a time when legal proceedings to which the State was a party were pending. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1) in respect of the right to a fair trial.

Ms Gonzalez, Ms Mary, Ms Delaquerrière, Mr Schreiber, Ms Kern, Mr Gontier, Ms Schreiber, Ms Memeteau and Mr Cossuta maintained that the proceedings did not take place within a reasonable time. The periods to be taken into consideration began on 17 and 28 August 1990, the dates of the applications to the Colmar industrial tribunal and ended with the Court of Cassation's judgment of 18 June 1996. The proceedings therefore lasted for almost five years and 10 months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. The subject matter of the case before the domestic courts was complex. The applicants were not responsible for prolonging the proceedings. There had been delay before the Court of Appeal for which no persuasive explanation was put forward. Having regard to all the evidence, the reasonable time requirement in A 6(1) had been exceeded.

Having regard to the finding in respect of the fair trial, it was not necessary to rule on the complaint under A 13.

Damages, costs and expenses (FF 47,000 each to Mr Zielinski and Mr Pradal for pecuniary damage, FF 80,000 to Ms Gonzalez, Ms Mary, Ms Delaquerrière, Mr Schreiber, Ms Kern, Mr Gontier, Ms Schreiber, Ms Memeteau and Mr Cossuta for pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage, and FF 30,000 each to Mr Zielinski and Mr Pradal and FF 4,000 to each of the other nine applicants for costs and expenses).

Zilaghe v Italy 97/55

[Application lodged 11.10.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Augusto Zilaghe was a surveyor. On 12 February 1985 he applied to the Sardinia Regional Administrative Court for judicial review of a decision by his employer assigning him to a staff category lower than the one to which he considered himself to be entitled on the basis of the duties he actually performed. On 2 April 1996 the Administrative Court decided to join the application to another the applicant had lodged in 1990 before dismissing them both as being ill-founded. The judgment was deposited with the registry on 11 May 1996. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (23–6) V 6.

Court found by majority (8–1) A 6(1) not applicable.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (d), Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

Disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the present case the applicant sought only judicial review of his employer's decision to assign him to a staff category lower than the one to which he considered himself to be entitled. The dispute raised by him thus clearly related to his career and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

Zimmermann and Steiner v Switzerland (1984) 6 EHRR 17 83/5

[Application lodged 30.8.1979; Commission report 9.3.1982; Court Judgment 13.7.1983]

Mr Werner Zimmermann was a fitter and Mr Johann Steiner was retired. They were tenants in flats close to Zürich-Kloten airport. In 1974, they sought compensation from the Canton of Zürich for the damage caused by the noise and air pollution resulting from the operation of the airport. The case was referred to the Federal Assessment Commission which rejected the applicants' claims by a decision of 6 October 1976, which was served on them on 7 March 1977. On 18 April 1977, the applicants lodged an administrative law appeal with the Federal Court. The Federal Court dismissed the appeal on 15 October 1980. The applicants complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr D Evrigenis, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald.

The rights claimed were personal or property rights, they were private, and therefore civil within the meaning of A 6(1). The period to be taken into consideration began on 18 April 1977, when the applicants lodged their appeal, to 15 October 1980, when the Federal Court gave judgment, a period of nearly three and a half years. For a case dealt with at a single jurisdictional level, such a lapse of time was considerable and called for close scrutiny under A 6(1). The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed according to the particular circumstances of the case. Regard had to be had, inter alia, to the complexity of the factual or legal issues raised by the case, to the conduct of the applicants and the competent authorities and to what was at stake for the former; in addition, only delays attributable to the State could justify a finding of a failure to comply with the reasonable time requirement. The case was not complex. The delays complained of could not be attributed to the applicants. The principal cause of the length of the proceedings was the manner in which the Federal Court carried out its task. The Convention placed a duty on the Contracting States to organise their legal systems so as to allow the courts to comply with the requirements of A 6(1) including that of trial within a reasonable time. Nonetheless, a temporary backlog of business did not involve liability on the part of the Contracting States provided that they took, with the requisite promptness, remedial action to deal with an exceptional situation of that kind. However, during most of the three and a half year period the applicants' case remained stationary. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the lapse of time was excessive; the difficulties undeniably encountered by the Federal Court could by then no longer be considered to be temporary, nor could they deprive the applicants of their right to a hearing within a reasonable time. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Zonetti v Italy 91/66

[Application lodged 26.6.1987; Commission report 5.3.1991; Court Judgment 3.12.1991]

Mr Remo Zonetti took proceedings on 21 May 1985 before the Rome magistrates' court against the Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale in order to establish his entitlement to a disability pension. The investigation opened at the hearing of 25 September 1985, when the magistrates' court ordered a medical opinion. Following the hearing of 29 January 1986 the applicant's claim by the magistrates' court was dismissed. On 14 October 1986 the applicant instituted an appeal. At the end of a hearing held on 23 November 1989, the court dismissed the appeal. The text of the judgment was lodged with the registry on 20 July 1990. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found by majority (10–1) V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens.

Notwithstanding several reminders from the registry, the applicant showed no interest in the proceedings before the Court. There had therefore been in this case an implied withdrawal which constituted a fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter. There was no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. The Court noted previous cases in which it had reviewed the reasonableness of the length of civil proceedings in various Contracting States and a large number raising similar questions were still pending before the Court.

Zubani v Italy 96/30

[Application lodged 26.1.1988; Commission report 11.2.1995; Court Judgment 7.8.1996 (merits), 16.6.1999 (A 41)]

Mrs Maddalena, Mrs Letizia, Mrs Angela and Mr Aldo Zubani, sisters and brother, owned a farmhouse and adjoining land, which they used for agricultural purposes. On 21 August 1979, as part of the implementation of the general development plan, the Municipality of Brescia issued an order, under an expedited procedure, for the possession of the applicants' land, which was located in a zone intended for the construction of low-cost and social housing. On 16 July 1980 the Municipality took physical possession of the land, aided by the police, and an expropriation order was issued in October 1980. The applicants challenged the lawfulness of the measures taken by the authorities bringing several actions in the administrative courts and in the ordinary civil courts. In 1988 a new law gave legislative force to a principle laid down by the Court of Cassation that property on which public work had been carried out making it impossible to restore it to its owner was to be the subject of compulsory transfer to the public authorities and the person concerned was entitled to full compensation. On 26 April 1995 the District Court awarded the applicants compensation costs and expenses. Further proceedings ensued in 1996 to enforce judgment. The applicants complained, inter alia, of violation of their right to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions.

Comm found unanimously V P1A1.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found V P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr U Lôhmus.

The applicants' application to the Commission was lodged before the entry into force of the 1988 Law. The case-law cited by the Government referred solely to expropriation and not to the expedited procedure for taking possession. In addition, it could not be regarded as constituting binding precedent. The preliminary objection of lateness was therefore dismissed as unfounded. On 28 November 1991, in the proceedings brought by the co-operatives against the applicants, the latter obtained a ruling ordering the Municipality to pay compensation for the damage sustained. Subsequently, they applied to the District Court and on 26 April 1995 the District Court fixed the sum to which they were entitled by way of compensation. Therefore, the applicants had exhausted their domestic remedies and that objection also had to be dismissed.

The interference in issue was a deprivation of property within the meaning of the second sentence of A 1, was provided for in s 3 of the 1988 Law and pursued a public-interest aim, namely the construction of housing for a category of disadvantaged persons. The legislature might reasonably choose to give preference to the interests of the community in cases of unlawful expropriation or occupation of land. Full compensation for the damage sustained by the proprietors concerned constituted sufficient reparation as the authorities were required to pay an additional sum corresponding to monetary depreciation since the day of the unlawful action. Nevertheless, the Law in question did not enter into force until 1988, when the litigation concerning the applicants' property had already lasted eight years and although the Municipality had initially, on 29

September 1995, agreed to pay to the persons concerned the sums awarded by the Brescia District Court, it later appeared reluctant to pay the whole amount. The size of the sum awarded by the Brescia District Court could not be decisive in this case in view of the length of the proceedings instituted by the applicants. Although the sum of ITL 1,015,255,000 might appear enormous in relation to the surface area actually occupied by the buildings, an additional factor to be borne in mind was that a new road was laid through the applicant's property which rendered access to the plots returned to them difficult. Having regard to all those considerations, a fair balance between protecting the right of property and the demands of the general interest had not been struck. Accordingly, there had been a violation of P1A1.

FM Zumtobel, a commercial partnership, and its manager, Mr Martin Zumtobel, were the applicants whose property would have been divided into two parcels by the construction of a highway. The Highway authority issued expropriation proceedings which the partnership claimed, amongst other things, had violated its right of access to a court with full jurisdiction, guaranteed by A 6(1) the Convention.

Comm by different majorities on the various points found NV 6(1).

Court unanimously found NV 6 (1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Matscher, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr F Bigi, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr J Makarczyk.

The decisions of the Office of the Government could give rise to appeals to the Constitutional Court and the Administrative Court, but the proceedings for the consideration of such appeals would be consistent with A 6(1) only if conducted before judicial bodies that had full jurisdiction. The Constitutional Court did not satisfy that requirement. In this case it could inquire into the contested proceedings only from the point of view of their conformity with the Constitution, which, did not make it possible for it to examine all the relevant facts. The submissions relied upon before the Administrative Court concerned solely the proceedings before the Government Office. The Administrative Court considered the submissions on their merits, point by point, without ever having to decline jurisdiction in replying to them or in ascertaining various facts. The review by the Administrative Court fulfilled the requirements of A 6(1). There was therefore access to a court with full jurisdiction.

The practice of the Austrian Administrative Court was not to hear the parties unless one of them expressly requested it to do so. As no such request was made by the applicant partnership, it had to be deemed to have waived unequivocally its right to a hearing. In addition the dispute did not give rise to questions of public interest making such a hearing necessary. Accordingly, there had been no breach of the requirements of A 6(1) concerning the public character of court hearings.

The other complaints raised by the applicants (the lack of independence of the experts and the failure to communicate several documents from the file) were examined and rejected by the Administrative Court under a procedure which was in conformity with A 6(1).
