FOREWORD

In the short period of its existence, the new and permanent European Court of Human Rights has already delivered more judgments than its predecessor delivered in the previous 38 years. This is at least in part a reflection of the dramatic increase in the number of applications with which the new Court has been confronted since it came into being.

This increase has brought with it new challenges, not the least of which is the difficulty it poses for practitioners and students alike in keeping abreast of the Court's rapidly developing case law.

It is because of the contribution which this book makes to facilitating this task that it is particularly to be welcomed. Prepared by Barbara Mensah, who as a barrister and former lecturer at the Inns of Court School of Law London has done much to foster knowledge of the Convention system within the United Kingdom, the clear, concise and accurate summaries of the facts, decision and reasoning in all judgments delivered between 1960 and 2000 will serve as an invaluable and practical guide to the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg Court, old and new. I warmly recommend the book.

PREFACE

The aim of this book is to provide a complete reference source of the European Court of Human Rights judgments in a single volume. I have presented a summary of all the cases decided by the Court in the last 40 years. To ensure accuracy I have attempted as far as possible to provide verbatim accounts of the judgments. Included in the information on each case is a summary of the facts, the decision of the Commission (before November 1998), the names of the judges and their decisions as well as the details of the judges who dissented, the ratio, other cases referred to by the judges and where relevant the decision on costs and damages. Section II provides a chronological listing of the cases, each case is given a number based on the year of the decision on merits, followed by the position of the case in the court's list of decisions that year.

Section III provides a subject index which includes both Court judgments and Commission decisions on admissibility and reports. Under each subject heading I have tried to give an indication of the typical/most frequently raised Convention rights, eg, electoral rights usually raise issues under Protocol 1, Article 3, Articles 10 and 11; some of the same cases under that subject may also be listed under freedom of association and freedom of expression. The cases under each subject heading are listed chronologically (except length of proceedings cases which are listed by country, type of case and then chronologically). I hoped by this chronological listing to show the development of the Court's jurisprudence by subject – this has worked better for some subjects (eg, homosexuality) than for others (eg, armed forces where there may be many issues involved). The cases under Court judgments provide name of case, reference number (see Section II) and brief description of the case.

I have also included under each subject in Section III the reported Commission decisions on admissibility and reports. These are listed chronologically, showing the name of the case, the date of decision (reports are indicated as 'Rep' all other entries are Decisions on admissibility), the reference in the volumes of Decisions and Reports (indicated by volume number and page number) and a brief indication of the nature of the case. [For those unfamiliar with the Decisions and Reports series my subject index summaries can be interpreted as follows: Example 1, 'X v D (30.9.1974) 1/73 (expulsion of Algerian)' relates to the case of X v Germany, a Commission decision on admissibility of 30 September 1974 reported in volume 1 of Decisions and Reports at page 73. Example 2, 'Müller v A (Rep 1.10.1975) 3/25 (loss of pension rights)', is a Commission Report (generally following an admissibility decision) of 1 October 1975 at page 25 of volume 3. From volume 76, the cases are reported in two parts; Part A contains the original text and Part B the translated text, I have given the reference for the English text in all cases. Example 3, 'Boffa & 13 others v RSM (15.1.1998) 92B/27 (law requiring compulsory vaccination of children against hepatitis B)' and Example 4, 'Aboikonie & Read v NL (12.1.1998) 92A/23 (expulsion of Surinamese national with criminal convictions but wife and children resident in Netherlands)', the original text of Aboikonie is in English, in Part A, whereas Boffa has French original text and the English translation therefore appears in Part B.

Section IV provides a list of the countries of the Council of Europe (as at March 2001) and Section V contains the relevant Articles and Protocols of the European Convention on Human Rights. Section V sets out the composition of the Court from its inception to the present day. Over the years there has been the use of ad hoc judges for various reasons; I have included the ad hoc judges and the cases on which they sat. Out of concern for the size of this book, I have tried to abbreviate information where possible and sensible to do so. I have done so extensively in Section V on composition of the Court, and hope that I have not unduly inconvenienced researchers by that.

I am very grateful to Leila Agyeman, formerly of the Immigration Appellate Service Research Department, had it not been for her amazing patience on the Court's website and methodical work this book would have missed more than the dozen deadlines I promised the publishers.

I am also very grateful to the following who contributed to summaries: James Robinson, Barrister, former Senior Lecturer at the Inns of Court School of Law; Alexis Slatter, Barrister; Koli Mukhopadhyay, Lawyer, London; Tom Davidson, Senior Lecturer, University of London; Nathalia Berkowitz, Senior Legal and Research Officer, Immigration Appellate Authority; Rexford Darko, Lawyer; Ben Urdang, Barrister; Jeffrey Yates, Lawyer USA; Dean Kershaw, Barrister.

At stages, despite their own very heavy study commitments, various very enthusiastic 2000/2001 Inns of Court School of Law students undertook research for me and helped in other ways. I am very grateful to them. They are James Burton, Nick De Marco, Sahima Qamar, Sarbjit Singh Bakhshi and Emmanuel Vincent.

A v France (1994) 17 EHRR 462 93/49

[Application lodged 15.2.1989; Commission report 2.9.1992; Court Judgment 23.11.1993]

The applicant was charged on 23 July 1981 with five other persons, including Mr G, with attempted murder, infringement of the arms and ammunition legislation and infringement of the law regarding protection and control of nuclear substances. Information came from Mr G, an informant, who approached the Chief Superintendent of police and volunteered to make a phone call to the applicant to discuss the crime with her. The Chief Superintendent accepted the informant's offer but did not at the time inform his superiors. On 7 March 1991 the court found no case to answer against the applicant. The applicant complained that there had been an infringement of her private life.

Comm found by majority (9–2) V 8.

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objection and found V 8.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland.

An appeal to the Court of Cassation was one of the remedies that should in principle be exhausted in order to comply with A 26. Even supposing that it was probably bound to fail in this specific case, the filing of the appeal was thus not a futile step. It consequently had the effect at the very least of postponing the beginning of the six-month period. The objection that the application was out of time was therefore dismissed. The applicant laid a complaint, together with an application to join the resulting criminal proceedings as a civil party, alleging invasion of privacy and breach of the confidentiality of telephone communications and pursued the said proceedings to their conclusion. She could not be criticised for not having had recourse to legal remedies which would have been directed essentially to the same end and would in any case not have offered better chances of success. Accordingly, the objection alleging failure to exhaust domestic remedies was also dismissed.

The telephone conversation did not lose its private character solely because its content concerned or might concern the public interest. The recording complained of depended on the informant and the Chief Superintendent working together; the former conceived and put into effect the plan to make the recording, by going to see the Chief Superintendent and then telephoning the applicant. The Superintendent was an official of a 'public authority'. He made a crucial contribution to executing the scheme by making available for a short time his office, his telephone and his tape recorder. Although he did not inform his superiors of his actions and had not sought the prior authorisation of an investigating judge, he was acting in the performance of his duties as a high-ranking police officer. The public authorities were involved to such an extent that the State's responsibility under the Convention was engaged. In any event the recording represented an interference in respect of which the applicant was entitled to the protection of the French legal system. The interference undoubtedly concerned the applicant's right to respect for her 'correspondence'. In these circumstances it was not necessary to consider whether it also affected her 'private life'. The interference had not been 'in accordance with the law', the contested recording had no basis in domestic law and was therefore in breach of A 8. It was therefore unnecessary to consider the other requirements of para 2 of A 8.

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (FF 50,000) awarded.

A v United Kingdom (1999) 27 EHRR 611 98/80

[Application lodged 15.7.1994; Commission report 18.9.1997; Court Judgment 23.9.1998]

The applicant, born in 1984 and his brother were placed on the local child protection register because of 'known physical abuse'. The cohabitant of the boys' mother was given a police caution after he admitted hitting A with a cane. Both boys were removed from the child protection register in November 1991. The cohabitant subsequently married the applicant's mother and became his stepfather. The stepfather was charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm and tried in February 1994. He accepted having caned the boy on a number of occasions, but argued that this had been necessary and reasonable since A was a difficult boy who did not respond to parental or school discipline. The jury found by a majority verdict that the applicant's stepfather was not guilty of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. The applicant complained that the State had failed to protect him from ill-treatment by his step-father, that he had been denied a remedy for his complaints and that the domestic law on assault discriminated against children.

Comm found unanimously V 3, by majority (16–1) not necessary to examine 8, unanimously NV 13 and not necessary to examine 14+3 and 14+8.

Court found unanimously V 3, not necessary to examine 8, 13, 14.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mrs E Palm, Sir John Freeland, Mr P Kûris, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P Van Dijk, Mr V Toumanov.

Both the Commission and the Government accepted that there had been a violation of A 3. The Court recalled that ill-treatment must attain a minimum level of severity if it was to fall within the scope of A 3. The assessment of this minimum is relative: it depends on all the circumstances of the case, such as the nature and context of the treatment, its duration, its physical and mental effects and, in some instances, the sex, age and state of health of the victim. The applicant, who was nine years old at the time of the assault, was found by the consultant pediatrician who examined him to have been beaten with a garden cane which had been applied with considerable force on more than one occasion. That treatment reached the level of severity prohibited by A 3. States are required to take measures to ensure that individuals within their jurisdiction are not subjected to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, including such ill-treatment administered by private individuals. Children and other vulnerable individuals, in particular, are entitled to State protection, in the form of effective deterrence, against such serious breaches of personal integrity. English law allowed as a defence to a charge of assault on a child that the treatment in question amounted to 'reasonable chastisement'. The law did not provide adequate protection to the applicant against treatment or punishment contrary to A 3. The failure to provide adequate protection constituted a violation of A 3. In the circumstances it was not necessary to examine whether the inadequacy of the legal protection provided to A against the ill-treatment that he suffered also breached his right to respect for private life under A 8.

As the applicant accepted the Commission's finding of no violation of A 13 and did not pursue his complaint under A 14 it was not necessary for the Court to consider those complaints.

Non-pecuniary damage (GBP 10,000), costs and expenses (GBP 20,000 less FF 35,264) awarded.

A and Others v Denmark (1996) 22 EHRR 458 96/3

[Application lodged 27.8.1992; Commission report 24.5.1995; Court Judgment 8.2.1996]

The 10 applicants were HIV victims or relatives of deceased victims of the virus who were infected with HIV during the time they were receiving blood transfusions at Danish hospitals. They sought compensation from the State and complained about the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) for first 8 applicants and NV 6(1) for last 2 applicants.

Court found by majority (6–3) V 6(1) for first 8 applicants, unanimously NV 6(1) for last 2 applicants.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik.

The proceedings involved the determination of the applicants' 'civil rights' and A 6(1) applied. The mere fact that the applicants belonged to a category of members on whose behalf the Danish

Association of Haemophiliacs had acted on 14 December 1987 was not sufficient to justify the conclusion that they were affected by the duration of the proceedings from that date onwards. It was only from the dates when the Association identified the applicants as individual plaintiffs that they could claim to be victims within the meaning of A 25. Accordingly, the periods to be taken into consideration were different for the different applicants: The periods to be taken into account had lasted approximately six years and two months, five years and three months, three years, five years and 10 months and four years and 11 months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicants and that of the relevant authorities. Although the case raised factual and legal questions of some complexity, that alone could not justify the length of the proceedings. The applicants were to a significant extent responsible for the protracted nature of the proceedings: they had not requested the High Court to speed up the proceedings, they had requested or consented to a large number of adjournments taken more than two years to agree on the appointment of experts and provided no convincing explanation for why they waited a long time before submitting claims for damages. The proceedings were not inquisitorial but were subject to the principle that it was for the parties to take the initiative with regard to their progress. The Court recognised that in those circumstances, the competent authorities were faced with a difficult task in trying to accommodate the various interests of the applicants. However, those features did not excuse them from ensuring compliance with the requirement of reasonable time. What was at stake in the proceedings was of crucial importance for the applicants in view of the incurable disease from which they were suffering and their reduced life expectancy. Accordingly, regarding the first eight applicants, the competent administrative and judicial authorities were under a positive obligation under A 6(1) to act with the exceptional diligence required by the Court's case-law in disputes of this nature. The High Court granted all the requests for adjournments, hardly ever using its powers to require the parties to specify their claims, clarify their arguments, adduce relevant evidence or decide on who should be appointed as experts. There were also delays from the Supreme Court. In those circumstances, even having regard to the delays caused by the applicants, the competent authorities had not acted with the exceptional diligence required. No duty of exceptional diligence applied with regard to the last two applicants (father and son died and had submitted later claims) who were not victims of a violation of A 6(1).

AB v Italy 00/60

[Application lodged 1.3.1997; Court Judgment 8.2.2000]

Mr AB complained of the length of administrative proceedings.

Court found by majority (6–1) V 6(1).

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr B Conforti, Mr J Casadevall, Mr L Ferrari Bravo (d), Mr C Bîrsan, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs W Thomassen.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 24 July 1992 and ended on 2 February 1998. It had lasted more than five years, six months at one level of jurisdiction.

Non-pecuniary damage (ITL 10,000,000), costs and expenses (ITL 1,000,000).

ADT v United Kingdom 00/198

[Application lodged 25.3.1997; Court Judgment 31.7.2000]

On 1 April 1996 police officers conducted a search under warrant of the home of the applicant, a practising homosexual, and seized various items including photographs and video tapes. The applicant was arrested and during interview admitted that some of the video tapes found would contain footage of him and up to four other adult men engaging in acts of oral sex and mutual masturbation in the applicant's home. He was charged with gross indecency between men contrary to s 13 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956. He was convicted, and on 20 November 1996 he was sentenced and conditionally discharged for two years. An order was made for the confiscation and destruction of the seized material. He complained that his conviction constituted a violation of his right to respect for his private life under A 8.

Court found unanimously V 8, not necessary to examine 14.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

The mere existence of legislation prohibiting male homosexual conduct in private may continuously and directly affect a person's private life. The applicant was aware that his conduct was in breach of the criminal law, and he was thus continuously and directly affected by the legislation and he was also directly affected in that a criminal prosecution was brought against him which resulted in his conviction. There was no evidence that there was any actual likelihood of the contents of the tapes being made public, deliberately or inadvertently. The applicant having gone to some lengths not to reveal his sexual orientation and having repeated his desire for anonymity before the Court, it was unlikely that he would knowingly be involved in making them public. The applicant was a victim of an interference with his right to respect for his private life both as regards the existence of legislation and as regards the conviction. The interference was in accordance with the law and its aims, of protecting morals and protecting the rights and freedoms of others, were legitimate. The sexual activities involved more than two men, and the applicant was convicted for gross indecency as more than two men had been present. While, at some point, sexual activities could be carried out in such a manner that State interference might be justified, the facts of the present case did not indicate such circumstances. The applicant was involved in sexual activities with a restricted number of friends in circumstances in which it was most unlikely that others would become aware of what was going on. Although the activities were recorded on video tape, the applicant was prosecuted for the activities themselves, and not for the recording, or for any risk of it entering the public domain. The activities were therefore genuinely private. Given the narrow margin of appreciation afforded to the national authorities in the case, the absence of any public health considerations and the purely private nature of the behaviour in the present case, the reasons submitted for the maintenance in force of legislation criminalising homosexual acts between men in private, and a fortiori the prosecution and conviction in the present case, were not sufficient to justify the legislation and the prosecution. There had therefore been a violation of A 8.

Having found a violation of A 8, it was not necessary to also examine the case under A 14.

Damages (GBP 20,929.05), costs and expenses (GBP 12,391.83).

AM v Italy 99/100

[Application lodged 19.6.1997; Court Judgment 14.12.1999]

The applicant was charged with indecently assaulting a minor and committing obscene acts in a public place. The minor, an American, had been staying at a hotel where the applicant worked as caretaker. The Italian authorities sought judicial assistance from the American authorities. Statements were taken from the minor, his parents and doctor which were sent to the Italian courts. The Italian authorities requested that there be no lawyer present during the questioning of the witnesses. The statements were read at the applicant's trial, he was convicted and sentenced to 2 years' imprisonment suspended.

Court unanimously found V 6(1), 6(3)(d).

Judges: Mr CL Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska.

The applicant had not been able to cross-examine or have cross-examined the witnesses at either the investigation stage or at trial. He had not had the opportunity to challenge the witness statements on the basis of which he had been convicted and accordingly his rights had been restricted in a manner incompatible with A 6.

Damages (ITL 50,000,000), costs and expenses (ITL 4,847,900) awarded.

AO v Italy 00/153

[Application lodged 25.5.1993; Court Judgment 30.5.2000]

On 10 October 1986 the applicant served a notice to quit on the tenant of an apartment he owned. On 10 April 1987, the magistrate upheld the validity of the notice to quit and ordered that the premises be vacated by 30 September 1988. A bailiff made nine attempts to recover possession but was unsuccessful as, under the statutory provisions providing for the suspension or staggering of the evictions, the applicant was not entitled to police assistance. In November 1995 the applicant recovered possession of his flat. He complained about the prolonged impossibility of recovering possession of his apartment, owing to the implementation of emergency legislative provisions on residential property leases.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V P1A1.

Judges: Mr CL Rozakis, President, Mr AB Baka, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr E Levits.

The Court had already dismissed the same objection of non-exhaustion in the Immobiliare Saffi case (that challenging the refusal of police assistance in the administrative courts was not an effective remedy), the Government had not submitted any new argument in support of their objection and the Court saw no reason to depart from its previous finding.

The interference with the applicant's property rights amounted to control of the use of property which had a legitimate aim in the general interest. In principle, the Italian system of staggering of the enforcement of court orders was not in itself open to criticism, having regard in particular to the margin of appreciation permitted. However, such a system carried with it the risk of imposing on landlords an excessive burden in terms of their ability to dispose of their property and had to accordingly provide certain procedural safeguards so as to ensure that the operation of the system and its impact on a landlord's property rights were neither arbitrary nor unforeseeable. For several years, the applicant was left in a state of uncertainty as to when he would be able to repossess his apartment. He could not apply to either the judge dealing with the enforcement proceedings or the administrative court, which would not have been able to set aside the prefect's decision to give priority to any pending urgent cases, as that decision was an entirely legitimate one. He had no prospects of obtaining compensation through the Italian courts for his protracted wait. Although the tenant was elderly and sick and therefore deserved special protection, that circumstance could not in itself justify the lengthy restriction of the applicant's use of his apartment. An excessive burden was imposed on the applicant and accordingly the balance that had to be struck between the protection of the right of property and the requirements of the general interest was upset to the applicant's detriment. Consequently, there had been a violation of P1A1.

Pecuniary damage (ITL 50,000,000), non-pecuniary damage (ITL 6,000,000), legal costs (ITL 6,789,823).

AP v Italy 99/44

[Application lodged 30.6.1993, Commission report 10.3.1998, Court Judgment 28.7.1999]

The applicant complained about the length of civil proceedings in a case concerning services provided under a business contract.

Court unanimously found V 6(1).

Mrs E Palm, President, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Bonello, Mr R Türmen (pd), Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall, Mrs HS Greve, Mr A Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova.

The period to be taken into account began on 19 February 1990 and ended on 28 November 1995, over five years, nine months. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. Contracting States had a duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that they could meet the requirements of A 6. There had been 65 judgments in which violations of A 6(1) in respect of reasonable time had been found against Italy since 1987 (Capuano) and over 1,400 reports of the Commission resulting in breaches against Italy for the same reason. The frequency of the violations indicated an accumulation of identical breaches which could not be considered to be isolated incidents. The breaches presented a continuing situation which denied applicants a domestic remedy. A period of over five years, nine months in the present case was not reasonable.

Damages (ITL 15,000,000), costs and expenses (ITL 8,000,000) awarded.

AP, MP and TP v Switzerland (1998) 26 EHRR 541 97/47

[Application lodged 13.3.1992; Commission report 18.4.1996; Court Judgment 29.8.1997]

The applicants were the widow and sons of the late Mr P. An inspection of his books by the tax authorities after his death showed that he had appropriated and failed to declare back payments due to his company, thus evading both cantonal and federal taxes. Proceedings were initiated against the applicants for recovery of the unpaid taxes and fines were imposed on them for tax evasion. The applicants maintained innocence of the tax offences committed by Mr P.

Comm found by majority (20–8) V 6(1) and (17–11) NV 6(2).

Court found by majority (7–2) V 6(2), not necessary to examine 6(1) or 6(3).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt (jd), President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr I Foighel, Mr AB Baka (jd), Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev.

The concept of 'criminal charge' within A 6 is an autonomous one. There were three criteria to be taken into account when it was being decided whether a person was 'charged with a criminal offence' for the purposes of A 6. These are the classification of the offence under national law, the nature of the offence and the nature and degree of severity of the penalty that the person concerned risked incurring. As regards the nature and severity of the penalty, the fines were not inconsiderable: in setting these figures, the authorities took the applicants' cooperative attitude into account; the fines might in fact have been four times as large. As regards the nature of the offence, the tax legislation laid down certain requirements, to which it attached penalties in the event of non-compliance. The penalties in the present case were not intended as pecuniary compensation for damage but were essentially punitive and deterrent in nature. As regards the classification of the proceedings under national law, the Court attached weight to the finding of the highest court in the land, the Federal Court, in its judgment in the present case, that the fine in question was 'penal' in character and depended on the 'guilt' of the offending taxpayer. A 6 was therefore applicable. Compliance with A 6(2) therefore had to be considered. Tax debts, like other debts incurred by the deceased, should be paid out of the estate. Imposing criminal sanctions on the living in respect of acts apparently committed by a deceased person was, however, a different matter. Whether or not the late Mr P was actually guilty, the applicants were subjected to a penal sanction for tax evasion allegedly committed by him. It was a fundamental rule of criminal law that criminal liability did not survive the person who had committed the criminal act. That was recognised by the general criminal law of Switzerland. Such a rule was also required by the presumption of innocence enshrined in A 6(2). Inheritance of the guilt of the dead was not compatible with the standards of criminal justice in a society governed by the rule of law. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(2). In view of that conclusion it was not necessary to consider A 6(1).

Costs and expenses (7,000 CHF) awarded.

Abdoella v The Netherlands (1995) 20 EHRR 585 92/69

[Application lodged 9.2.1987; Commission report 14.10.1991; Court Judgment 25.11.1992]

Mr Abdoel Aliem Khan Abdoella was taken into police custody and charged with incitement to murder, he was detained on remand and subsequently convicted and sentenced to imprisonment. He complained about the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection and found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel, Mr L Wildhaber.

The preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was not raised before the Court until the hearing. Since the Government had failed to file a statement setting out the objection not later than the time when they informed the President of their intention not to file a memorial, as laid down in Rule 48(1) of the Rules of Court, it had to be rejected as out of time.

The period to be taken into account began on 18 January 1983, the date of the applicant's arrest, and ended on 19 May 1987, the date on which the Supreme Court rejected his appeal. It thus lasted for 4 years, 4 months and one day. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings is to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case, although not particularly complex, was a serious one. In view of the fact that five court examinations were involved, the period as such was not unreasonable. The Government offered no explanation for the lapses of time involving the sending of documents to the Supreme Court. A 6(1) imposes on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts can meet its requirements. What was at stake for the applicant had to be taken into account in assessing the reasonableness of the length of proceedings. Where a person is kept in detention pending the determination of a criminal charge against him, the fact of his detention is a factor to be considered in assessing whether the requirement of a decision on the merits within a reasonable time has been met. The protracted periods of inactivity by the Supreme Court were unacceptable, especially where, as in the present case, the accused was detained. There has accordingly been a violation of A 6(1).

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (NLG 10,901.88 less FF 8,825) awarded.

Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali v United Kingdom (1985) 7 EHRR 471 85/7

[Applications lodged 11.12.1980 and 10.8.1981; Commission report 12.5.1983; Court Judgment 28.5.1985]

Mrs Nargis Abdulaziz, Mrs Arcely Cabales and Mrs Sohair Balkandali were lawfully and permanently settled in the United Kingdom. In accordance with the immigration rules in force at the time, their husbands were refused permission to remain with or join them in the UK. The applicants maintained that, on this account, they had been victims of a practice of discrimination on the grounds of sex, race and also, in the case of Mrs Balkandali, birth, and that there had been violations of A 3 and of A 8 taken alone or in conjunction with A 14. They further alleged that, contrary to A 13 no effective domestic remedy existed for their claims.

Comm found unanimously V 14+8 on the ground of sexual discrimination, by majority (9–3) NV 14+8 on the ground of racial discrimination application by majority (11–1) V 14+8 regarding discrimination on the ground of birth against Mrs Balkandali, by majority (11–1) V 13 and not necessary to examine 3, 8.

Court found unanimously NV 8, V 8+14 regarding discrimination on the ground of sex, NV 8+14 regarding other claims, NV 3, V 13 regarding discrimination on the ground of sex.

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr R Ryssdal, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr W Ganshof van der Meersch, Mr D Evrigenis, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing.

By guaranteeing the right to respect for family life A 8 presupposed the existence of a 'family'. Family included the relationship that arose from a lawful and genuine marriage even if a family life had not yet been fully established. 'Family life', in the case of a married couple, normally comprised cohabitation. Each of the applicants had to a sufficient degree entered upon 'family life' for the purposes of A 8. Although the essential object of A 8 was to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, there may in addition be positive obligations inherent in an effective 'respect' for family life. However, especially as far as those positive obligations were concerned, the notion of 'respect' was not clear-cut: having regard to the diversity of the practices followed and the situations obtaining in the Contracting States, the notion's requirements varied considerably from case to case. Accordingly, this was an area in which the Contracting Parties enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation in determining the steps to be taken to ensure compliance with the Convention with due regard to the needs and resources of the community and of individuals. The extent of a State's obligation to admit to its territory relatives of settled immigrants varied according to the particular circumstances of the persons involved. A State had the right to control the entry of non-nationals into its territory. The duty imposed by A 8 could not be considered as extending to a general obligation on the part of a State to respect the choice by married couples of the country of their matrimonial residence and to accept the non-national spouses for settlement in that country. In the present case, the applicants had not shown that there were obstacles to establishing family life in their own or their husbands' home countries or that there were special reasons why that could not be expected of them. There was therefore no 'lack of respect' for family life and, hence, no breach of A 8 taken alone.

A14 complemented the other substantive provisions of the Convention and the Protocols; it had no independent existence since it had effect solely in relation to 'the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms' safeguarded by those provisions. States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment in law. Under the 1980 Immigration Rules it was easier for a man settled in the United Kingdom than for a woman so settled to obtain permission for his or her non-national spouse to enter or remain in the country for settlement. The 1980 Rules had the aim of protecting the domestic labour market. A 14 was concerned with the avoidance of discrimination in the enjoyment of the Convention rights and includes in general cases where a person or group is treated, without proper justification, less favourably than another, even though the more favourable treatment is not called for by the Convention. As regards the alleged discrimination on the ground of race, whilst a Contracting State could not implement 'policies of a purely racist nature', to give preferential treatment to its nationals or to persons from countries with which it had the closest links did not constitute 'racial discrimination'. The effect in practice of the United Kingdom rules did not mean that they were abhorrent on the grounds of racial discrimination, there being no evidence of an actual difference of treatment on grounds of race. The 1980 Rules, which were applicable in general to all 'non-patrials' wanting to enter and settle in the United Kingdom, did not contain regulations differentiating between persons or groups on the ground of their race or ethnic origin. The Court concluded from the foregoing that the 1980 Rules made no distinction on the ground of race and were therefore not discriminatory on that account. There are in general persuasive social reasons for giving special treatment to those whose link with a country stems from birth within it. The difference of treatment must therefore be regarded as having had an objective and reasonable justification and, in particular, its results have not been shown to transgress the principle of proportionality. That conclusion was not altered by the fact that the immigration rules were subsequently amended on this point. Therefore Mrs Balkandali was not the victim of discrimination on the ground of birth. The difference of treatment complained of did not denote any contempt or lack of respect for the personality of the applicants, it was not designed to, and did not, humiliate or debase but was intended solely to achieve the aims referred to above. It could not therefore be regarded as 'degrading' and accordingly no violation of A 3. The discrimination on the ground of sex of which the applicants were victims was the result of norms that were incompatible with the Convention. As the UK had not incorporated the Convention into its domestic law, there could be no 'effective remedy' as required by A 13. Recourse to the available channels of complaint (the immigration appeals system, representations to the Home Secretary, application for judicial review) could have been effective only if the complainant alleged that the discrimination resulted from a misapplication of the 1980 Rules. No such allegation was made nor was it suggested that that discrimination contravened domestic law. The Court accordingly concluded that there had been a violation of A 13.

Abenavoli v Italy 97/54

[Application lodged 3.6.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Francesco Abenavoli, a teacher, applied to the Calabria Regional Administrative Court for judicial review of two reductions in salary, for the months of February and May 1981, imposed on him by the schools' inspectorate and reimbursement of the sums unpaid, after adjustment for inflation and the addition of interest at the statutory rate. On 9 March 1982 he asked for a date to be fixed for the hearing, on 13 June 1988 and 7 April 1992 he applied for the case to be set down for an urgent hearing. He complained about the length of proceedings, which were still pending.

Comm found by majority (24–5) V 6.

Court by majority (7–2) found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt (d), President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (c), Mr AB Baka (d), Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

The Court held that the applicant asserted a purely economic right legally derived from his work as a teacher, accordingly, A 6(1) applied. The period to be taken into consideration began on 19 February 1982, the date of the application to the Administrative Court, and had not yet ended. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the applicant's conduct and that of the relevant authorities. Despite the applicant's three applications and although fifteen years had already elapsed since the case was submitted to it, the Administrative Court had still not fixed a date for the first hearing. Such a lengthy period failed to satisfy the 'reasonable time' requirement laid down in A 6(1).

Non pecuniary damage (ITL 10 million), costs and expenses (ITL 2 million) awarded.

Academy Trading Ltd and Others v Greece 00/115

[Application lodged 30.11.1995; Commission report 9.7.1998; Court Judgment 4.4.2000]

The applicants were six shipping companies, Academy Trading Ltd, Intercontinental Maritime Ltd, Aaron Maritime Ltd, Evie Navigation Co Ltd, TC Trading Company Ltd and Andros Trading Ltd. In January 1982 they brought an action for damages against Citibank and three Greek members of its senior management before the Athens First Instance Civil Court in respect of the grant of a large loan for which they had acted as guarantors. As a result of a shipping crisis they were unable to meet the repayment instalments. On 20 November 1987 the First Instance Civil Court dismissed the applicants' action as being ill-founded. They appealed to the Athens Court of Appeal, which allowed their appeal finding that the bank had acted unethically. The bank appealed to the Court of Cassation threatening to withdraw from the Greek market altogether if the Court of Cassation upheld the judgment of the Court of Appeal. On 29 May 1991, the First Chamber of the Court of Cassation overturned the judgment of the Court of Appeal and referred the case to the Fourth Chamber for further examination. That chamber deliberated on 14 February 1992 and held a hearing on 11 December 1992. On 30 June 1993, one of the judges participating in that hearing retired and under Greek law this meant that the case had to be re-examined by a different composition. However, no actions were taken at that stage, which led the applicants to believe that the decision had already been taken before the retirement of the judge and that they had to await the delivery of the judgment. On 20 May 1994 the new hearing was held. The Fourth Chamber was composed of five judges. The first had participated in the deliberations of 14 February 1992 and the second in both previous compositions as rapporteur. The other three members heard the case for the first time. One of them, a junior judge, was designated as the new rapporteur. On 30 June 1995, the Court of Cassation dismissed the appeal, lodged by the applicants; the judge who was initially the rapporteur dissented. The applicants complained that they had not had a fair hearing before an impartial tribunal, and that their case had not been heard within a reasonable time.

Comm found by majority (24–6) NV 6(1) as regards the fairness of the proceedings before an impartial tribunal, unanimously V 6(1) as regards the length of the proceedings.

Court found by majority (4–3) NV 6(1) as regards the fairness of the proceedings before an impartial tribunal, unanimously V 6(1) as regards the length of the proceedings.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr J Casadevall (pd), Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr B Zupancic (jpd), Mrs W Thomassen, Mr T Pantiru (jpd), Mr G Stavropoulos, ad hoc judge.

There were two aspects to the requirement of impartiality in A 6(1). First, the tribunal had to be subjectively impartial; personal impartiality was presumed unless there was evidence to the contrary. Secondly, the tribunal had to also be impartial from an objective viewpoint, that is, it must offer sufficient guarantees to exclude any legitimate doubt in this respect. No evidence was produced in the present case which might suggest bias on the part of the judges of the Court of Cassation. While the delay in deciding that the case had to be reheard, the intervention in the proceedings of the former President of the Fourth Chamber and the change of rapporteur at the last hearing inevitably raised some questions in the mind of the applicants' representatives, they did not provide a legitimate reason to doubt the impartiality of the Court of Cassation under the objective test. The applicants failed to show that any of those matters involved any illegality or amounted to a radical or unusual departure from the normal internal practice of the Court of Cassation. In particular, the Court was satisfied that the Government's answers to the specific matters raised by the applicants provided a plausible explanation for the procedures followed. The fact that the daughters of two judges were working for a Greek businessman who was allegedly a friend of Citibank's head did not provide grounds for calling into question the impartiality of the Fourth Chamber. Accordingly, the applicants' apprehension about the impartiality of the Court of Cassation and the fairness of the proceedings before it could not be justified, the allegation concerning the partiality of the Court of Cassation was unsubstantiated. Consequently, there had been no violation of A 6(1) as regards the fairness of the proceedings before an impartial tribunal.

The proceedings lasted from 21 January 1982 to 30 June 1995. The period to be taken into consideration began on 20 November 1985, when the recognition by Greece of the right of individual petition took effect; however, in assessing the reasonableness of the time that elapsed after that date, account had to be taken of the state of proceedings at that time. Therefore, the period to be examined lasted 9 years, 7 months and 10 days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. The subject matter of the case was complex. The applicants were not responsible for prolonging the proceedings. The various periods of inactivity attributable to the State failed to satisfy the reasonable time requirement. Having regard also to the total duration of the proceedings, there had been a violation of A 6(1) as regards the length of the proceedings.

Finding of a violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction (majority 4–3). Costs and expenses (unanimously GRD 3,000,000).

Acquaviva v France 95/45

[Application lodged 16.12.1991; Commission report 4.7.1994; Court Judgment 21.11.1995]

The applicants complained about the length of civil proceedings concerning the death of their son, a Corsican militant nationalist on the run, who had been killed by farmers during an attack on their farm.

Comm found by majority (23–1) V 6(1).

Court unanimously NV 6(1).

Regarding the question of whether there was a 'dispute' over a 'right' which could be said to be recognised under domestic law, the dispute had to be genuine and serious; it could relate not only to the existence of a right but also to its scope and the manner of its exercise; and, finally, the outcome of the proceedings had to be directly decisive for the right in question. The applicants' application temporarily denied them access to the civil courts for the purpose of seeking compensation for any damage sustained. By choosing the avenue of criminal procedure, the applicants set in motion judicial criminal proceedings with a view to securing a conviction which was a prior condition for obtaining compensation and retained the right to submit a claim for damages up to and during the trial. The finding of self-defence, which excluded any criminal or civil liability, deprived the applicants of any right to sue for compensation. The outcome of the proceedings was, therefore, for the purposes of A 6 (1), directly decisive for establishing their right to compensation. A 6 (1) was applicable. The proceedings before the Court of Cassation (where appeal declared inadmissible) had to be taken into account. The relevant period therefore ran from 11 December 1987 to 14 April 1992, that is 4 years and 4 months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties and of the competent authorities. The case was not particularly difficult, although the political climate reigning in Corsica at the material time could not be underestimated. Fearful witnesses and transfer of jurisdiction from the Bastia court to the Versailles Court of Appeal had resulted in delays. The applicants had contributed to prolonging the proceedings. There had been some delay in organising a reconstruction. Although State authorities had to act with diligence taking special account of the interests and rights of the defence, they could not disregard the political context where, as in this instance, it had an impact on the course of the investigation. A situation of that kind may justify delays in proceedings, as A 6(1) was intended above all to secure the interests of the defence and those of the proper administration of justice. In the light of the particular circumstances of the case and the situation in Corsica at the time, the investigation proceedings, taken as a whole, did not exceed a reasonable time. There had therefore been no violation of A 6(1).

Mrs Anna and Mrs Maria Adiletta and Mr Aniello Agovino, Post Office employees, received notification on 23 June 1974 of proceedings against them for signing pension receipts in the space reserved for recipients and for failing to comply with the relevant proxy regulations. The cases against them were dismissed on 16 September 1987 by the District Court who found that no offence had been committed. The judgment was finalised on 23 November 1987. The applicants complained about the length of the proceedings.

The Court held that the reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The present case was of some complexity, the applicants had caused delays by asking for several adjournments but a lapse of 13 years and 5 months could not be regarded as reasonable. There had been long periods of inactivity. There had been a 5 year delay between the placing of the case in the hands of the investigating judge and the questioning of the accused and witnesses for which there had been no explanation and there had been a delay of 1 year and 9 months before committal for trial.

Adolf v Austria (1982) 4 EHRR 313 82/2

[Application lodged 7.6.1978; Commission report 8.10.1980; Court Judgment 26.3.1982]

Mr Gustav Adolf was an accountant and financial consultant. On 15 July 1977, an 85-year-old woman, acting through a lawyer, reported to the Innsbruck public prosecutor's office that three days earlier, during a quarrel, the applicant had thrown at another person a bunch of keys which had then struck her (the complainant). The applicant was questioned. After receipt of a medical report the District Court closed the proceedings. The applicant requested the District Court either to acquit him after trial or to terminate the proceedings pursuant to the Code of Criminal Procedure. His request was refused, as was his appeal to the Supreme Court. He complained that the District Court's decision had contained findings both on the facts of the alleged offence and on his guilt contrary to A 6(2), that his request for the hearing of witnesses in his favour had been denied and that the District Court took its decision without holding a trial hearing and without proper inquiry into the evidence.

Commission by majority (9–6, with one abstention) found V 6(2), (12–3, with one abstention) NV 6(1), 6(3).

Court by majority (4–3) NV 6.

The expression 'criminal charge' had an autonomous meaning in the context of the Convention. The legislation of the State concerned was certainly relevant, but it provided no more than a starting point. The applicant's situation under the domestic legal rules in force has to be examined in the light of the object and purpose of A 6, namely the protection of the rights of the defence. The public prosecutor's office had instructed the federal police to investigate 'whether or not a punishable act had been committed', the District Court entered the case in the register under the heading 'punishable act' and referred to s 83 of the Penal Code, which dealt with the infliction of bodily harm, the decision on the costs of the doctor's opinion mentioned 'the criminal proceedings and described the applicant as 'accused'. The Court considered that there was a combination of factors demonstrating that at the relevant time there was a 'criminal charge' against the applicant within the meaning of the Convention. The termination of proceedings took effect on 24 November 1977, but was not notified to the applicant, and was set out in a reasoned written version dated 10 January 1978. There was a single procedural act effected in several stages. Recourse to the Penal Code could not affect the existence, or retroactively alter the nature, of the procedures conducted prior to the court order terminating proceedings. Non-punishable or unpunished criminal offences did exist and A 6 did not distinguish between them and other criminal offences; it applied whenever a person was 'charged' with any criminal offence. On the facts the applicant was subject to a criminal charge, A 6 was therefore applicable. As to whether the Penal Code was compatible with the Convention, the Court's task was not to review in abstracto the provision of domestic law challenged by the applicant but to review the manner in which that provision was applied to him. The reasoning of the District Court was capable of suggesting that the applicant had inflicted bodily harm on the complainant and that he was at fault in doing so, no mention was made that the applicant had denied throwing any keys and had denounced the complaint as being knowingly false. The reasoning in the decision was capable of being understood as meaning that the applicant was guilty of a criminal offence, albeit one that did not merit punishment. The judgment of the Supreme Court held that a decision taken in pursuance of s 42 of the Penal Code did not involve anything in the nature of a verdict of guilt. The Court recognised that the District Court's reasoned decision had to be read with the judgment of the Supreme Court and in the light of it. That judgment cleared Mr Adolf of any finding of guilt and thus the presumption of his innocence was no longer called into question. Because of the nature of s 42 of the Penal Code, it was not necessary for the District Court to proceed with any hearing in the case or examination of evidence. There had accordingly been no breach of A 6.

Aerts v Belgium (2000) 29 EHRR 50 98/58

[Application lodged 8.8.1994; Commission report 20.1.1997; Court Judgment 30.7.1998]

Mr Michel Aerts was arrested on 14 November 1992 for an assault in which he attacked his ex-wife with a hammer. He was placed in detention on a ward in the psychiatric wing of Lantin Prison pending his transfer to the Paifve Social Protection Centre following a court order. The applicant applied for an injunction ordering his immediate transfer and submitted that the conditions of his detention constituted inhuman and degrading treatment. On 10 May 1993 the President of the Court of First Instance ruled that the applicant's continued detention was unlawful and constituted a trespass to the person which should be terminated as quickly as possible. The State appealed successfully to the Liège Court of Appeal. On 24 November 1993 he was released following assessment that his mental state appeared to have improved sufficiently. On 13 January 1994 the applicant applied for legal aid in order to appeal on points of law, his application was refused.

Comm found by majority (29–2) V 5(1), (17–14) V 3 and unanimously NV 5(4) and 6.

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objections, unanimously found V 5(1), NV 5(4), V 6(1), by majority (7–2) NV 3.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr J De Meyer, Mr I Foighel (pd), Mr R Pekkanen (jpd), Mr JM Morenilla, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek (jpd), Mr U Lôhmus.

Preliminary objection of lack of victim was rejected; the applicant could claim to be the 'victim' because the fact that he had been detained so long in detention in the psychiatric wing of Lantin Prison had affected him directly. Regarding the objection that the application was out of time, the decision of the legal aid authorities preventing the applicant from taking his case to the Court of Cassation, put an end to the action he had brought and made it impossible for any subsequent compensation claim to succeed. It constituted the final decision from which the six-month time-limit laid down by A 26 began to run. The objection could not therefore be upheld.

Although the Liège Court of First Instance found that the applicant had committed acts of violence, it ordered his detention on the ground that at the material time and when he appeared in court he had been severely mentally disturbed, to the point where he was incapable of controlling his actions. As he was not criminally responsible, there could be no 'conviction' within the meaning of A 5(1)(a). In order to comply with A 5(1), the detention had to take place 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law' and be 'lawful'. There had to be some relationship between the ground of permitted deprivation of liberty relied on and the place and conditions of detention. In principle, the 'detention' of a person as a mental health patient would only be 'lawful' for the purposes of A 5(1)(e) if effected in a hospital, clinic or other appropriate institution. The applicant had been detained provisionally in the psychiatric wing of the prison pending designation of an appropriate institution by the Mental Health Board. Although the Mental Health Board designated the Paifve Social Protection Centre as the place of detention on 22 March, as there were no spare places there the applicant continued to be detained at Lantin for seven months, his transfer not being effected until 27 October 1993. Reports showed clearly that the Lantin psychiatric wing could not be regarded as an institution appropriate for the detention of persons of unsound mind, the latter not receiving either regular medical attention or a therapeutic environment. The proper relationship between the aim of the detention and the conditions in which it took place was deficient. There had been a breach of A 5(1).

Available domestic remedies had to afford the possibility of reviewing compliance with the conditions to be satisfied if the detention of a person of unsound mind was to be regarded as 'lawful' for the purposes of A5(1)(e). The applicant had been able to apply to the judge responsible for urgent applications, who held that his continued detention at Lantin was unlawful; that decision had been set aside on appeal. However, the judgment did not mean that in general an application for an injunction was an unsuitable means of securing enjoyment of A 5(4) rights. There had accordingly been no breach of that provision.

The Court considered that the present case did not involve 'determination of a criminal charge' although the outcome of the proceedings was decisive for civil rights. The question of the applicant's transfer to Paifve was not the only matter in issue in the case before the Belgian courts, which concerned in substance the lawfulness of the deprivation of liberty. But the right to liberty, which was thus at stake, was a civil right. In requesting the Court of Cassation to rule that the courts did have jurisdiction to review the compatibility of his detention at Lantin with Belgian law and the Convention, the applicant was seeking a judicial declaration that the courts had jurisdiction not only to order his transfer to a Social Protection Centre but also to award him compensation for unlawful imprisonment. The applicant did not have sufficient means to pay a lawyer. It was not for the Legal Aid Board to assess the proposed appeal's prospects of success; it was for the Court of Cassation to determine the issue. By refusing the application on the ground that the appeal did not at that time appear to be well-founded, the Legal Aid Board denied the applicant's right to a tribunal. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

Regarding the treatment in the psychiatric wing, the general conditions in the psychiatric wing of Lantin Prison were unsatisfactory and not conducive to the effective treatment of the inmates. However, there was no proof of a deterioration of the applicant's mental health and it had not been conclusively established that the applicant suffered treatment that could be classified as inhuman or degrading. Accordingly no breach of A 3.

Non-pecuniary damage (BEF 50,000), costs and expenses (BEF 400,000 less FF 10,166) awarded.

Agga v Greece 00/8

[Application lodged 5.8.1997; Court Judgment 25.1.2000]

Mr Mehmet Agga was a candidate in the parliamentary elections of 18 June 1989. On 9 June 1989 Mr TOB complained to the police that the applicant had promised him a sum of money in exchange for his support in the elections. Criminal proceedings were instituted against the applicant for attempting to bribe a voter. On 26 July 1989 the prosecutor summoned the applicant to appear before the first instance criminal court. The applicant was tried on 5 March 1991. He was found guilty and received a suspended sentence of four months' imprisonment. The applicant and the public prosecutor appealed. The appeals were finally heard on 4 March 1996 and in a decision delivered on the same day, the court of appeal upheld the applicant's conviction and sentence. The applicant's appeal to the Court of Cassation was rejected on 18 February 1997. He complained of the length of the criminal proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr M Fischbach, President, Mr C Rozakis, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr AB Baka.

The relevant period began at the latest on 26 July 1989, when the public prosecutor of Xanthi informed the applicant of the proceedings against him. It ended on 18 February 1997 when the applicant's appeal in cassation was rejected. It therefore lasted 7 years, 6 months and 22 days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the authorities dealing with the case. The case was not complex. The applicant's illness resulted in delays of six months. As a result of the failure of prosecution witnesses to appear and industrial action by the clerks of the court, the State was responsible for the resultant delays of approximately one year. There was in addition a period of inactivity of approximately 3 years and 10 months between the date when the case-file was transferred to the public prosecutor of the court of appeal and the first adjournment of the appeal hearing. The Government did not provide any information with regard to the strike by the lawyers. Even assuming that such a strike took place and that the State was not responsible for the delays resulting, the Government did not allege that it resulted in particular hearings being adjourned. Moreover, delays related to the backlog of cases resulting from such a strike came within the State's responsibility. The same applied to the 14-month delay resulting from the adjournments of the appeal hearing, which were due to industrial action by the clerks of the court and the failure of prosecution witnesses to appear. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the obligation to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of the requirements of that provision, including the obligation to decide cases within a reasonable time. In the present case there were excessive delays that were attributable to the national authorities. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 6(1) as the reasonable time requirement had not been respected.

AGOSI v United Kingdom (1986) 9 EHRR 1 86/11

[Application lodged 17.9.1980; Commission report 11.10.1984; Court Judgment 24.10.1986]

The applicant German company sold gold Krugerrands to X and Y who attempted to smuggle them into the UK. The cheque which X and Y had proffered in payment was dishonoured and the contract of sale had stipulated that property in the coins did not pass until full payment had been made. X and Y were prosecuted for attempting to smuggle the coins into the UK and after the trial the coins were declared forfeit by the court. The applicant company complained that the forfeiture of the coins was a breach of P1A1.

Comm found by a majority (9–2) V P1A1.

Court found by majority (5–2) NV P1A1; NA 6.

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr R Ryssdal, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Sir Vincent Evans.

The Court considered, on the facts of the case, that there had been an interference with the applicant's right to peaceful enjoyment of their possessions but that there were administrative procedures sanctioned by law and that, in the circumstances, the scope of judicial review under English law was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the second paragraph of P1A1. The fact that the applicant company, for reasons of its own, chose not to seek judicial review of the administrative decision and hence did not receive full advantage of the safeguards available to owners asserting their innocence and lack of negligence did not invalidate that conclusion. Accordingly, no breach of P1A1.

The proceedings did not concern the determination of a criminal charge against the applicant company. The applicant did not invoke A 6 in relation to its civil rights and obligations.

Agrotexim and Others v Greece (1996) 21 EHRR 250 95/40

[Application lodged 29.11.1988; Commission report 10.3.1994; Court Judgment 24.10.1995]

The six applicant companies were shareholders in Fix Brewery. In order to overcome its financial difficulties, Fix Brewery had decided to transfer and develop two sites as an office and shopping complex. A building permit was obtained. The Athens Municipal Council by planning order designated the sites as areas to be developed into a youth centre and a public park. The applicants complained that the Municipality of Athens had unlawfully interfered with their right to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions (P1A1) and that it was not possible for them under Greek law, as shareholders, to take proceedings in a court and to secure legal protection of their rights (A 6 and 13).

Comm found by majority (13–2) V P1A1, (11–4) NV 6 and (9–6) NV 13.

Court found by majority (8–1) that it could not take cognisance of the merits of the case.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (d), Mr R Macdonald, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mr F Bigi, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr K Jungwiert.

The Court noted that the applicant companies did not complain of a violation of the rights vested in them as shareholders of Fix Brewery, such as the right to attend the general meeting and to vote. Their complaint was based exclusively on the proposition that the alleged violation of the Brewery's right to the peaceful enjoyment of its possessions had adversely affected their own financial interests because of the resulting fall in the value of their shares. They considered that the financial losses sustained by the company and the latter's rights were to be regarded as their own, and that they were therefore victims, albeit indirectly, of the alleged violation. In sum, they sought to have the company's corporate veil pierced in their favour. It was a perfectly normal occurrence in the life of a limited company for there to be differences of opinion among its shareholders or between its shareholders and its board of directors as to the reality of an infringement of the right to the peaceful enjoyment of the company's possessions or concerning the most appropriate way of reacting to such an infringement. Such differences of opinion could, however, be more serious where the company was in the process of liquidation because the realisation of its assets and the discharging of its liabilities were intended primarily to meet the claims of the creditors of a company whose survival was rendered impossible by its financial situation, and only as a secondary aim to satisfy the claims of the shareholders, among whom any remaining assets are divided up. The piercing of the 'corporate veil' or the disregarding of a company's legal personality would be justified only in exceptional circumstances, in particular where it was clearly established that it was impossible for the company to apply to the Convention institutions through the organs set up under its articles of incorporation or, in the event of liquidation, through its liquidators. When the applicant companies lodged their application with the Commission in 1988, Fix Brewery, although in the process of liquidation, had not ceased to exist as a legal person. It was represented at that time by its two liquidators, who had legal capacity to defend its rights and therefore to apply to the Convention institutions, if they considered it appropriate. There was no evidence to suggest that at the material time it would have been impossible as a matter of fact or law for the liquidators to do so. The Athens Court of Appeal appointed two liquidators, one representing the interests of the main creditor and the other those of the company. There were no grounds for doubting that the task of these liquidators was, like a trustee in bankruptcy, to liquidate the company's assets in the interests both of the creditors and the shareholders, or that, de facto and de jure, they were free to carry out that task as they saw fit. There was evidence to show that the liquidators took all the measures that they considered to be in the interests of the insolvent company's assets. The Athens Court of Appeal found that the liquidators had performed their duties in a particularly diligent manner. It had not been clearly established that at the time when the application was lodged with the Commission it was not possible for Fix Brewery to apply through its liquidators to the Convention institutions in respect of the alleged violation of P1A1. It followed that the latter companies could be regarded as being entitled to apply to the Convention institutions. In view of that conclusion it was unnecessary to examine the other objections raised by the Government under P1A1.

Neither A 6 nor A 13 implied that under the national law of the Contracting States shareholders in a limited company should have the right to bring an action seeking an injunction or damages in respect of an act or omission that was prejudicial to 'their' company. The compass of the case before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility. It could not be ruled out that it may be possible for an applicant to plead before the Court that a different construction should be placed on a complaint declared admissible by the Commission than that adopted by the latter; however, the applicant companies had not shown that to be the case and the Court therefore lacked jurisdiction to take cognisance of the complaint.

Ahmed v Austria (1997) 24 EHRR 278 96/63

[Application lodged 13.12.1994; Commission report 5.7.1995; Court Judgment 17.12.1996]

Mr Sharif Hussein Ahmed was a Somali citizen living in Austria, having been granted refugee status in 1992. Subsequently he was convicted of attempted robbery and sentenced to two and half years' imprisonment. The Austrian authorities ordered that he should lose his refugee status and right to remain in Austria. They further claimed that the applicant was not entitled to refugee status since he could not fear ill-treatment in Somalia from the government as no central Somalian Government existed. The applicant claimed that if expelled to Somalia his life would be at risk as a member of the Hawwiye clan. He claimed his expulsion to Somalia would expose him to treatment prohibited by A 3.

Comm found unanimously V 3 if applicant deported to Somalia, 5 and 13 inadmissible.

Court unanimously found V 3.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris.

Contracting States had a right to control the entry, residence and expulsion of aliens onto their territory. However, A 3 prohibited expulsion to a country where there were substantial grounds for believing that there was a real risk that the person would be subjected to treatment contrary to A 3. A 3 prohibits torture, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in absolute terms, irrespective of the victim's conduct, however dangerous or undesirable. There could be no exceptions or derogations from A 3, not even in expulsion cases. Thus A 3 had a wider application than A 33 of the 1951 Refugee Convention. The date for considering the risk to the applicant in an expulsion case was the date of the Court's consideration of the matter, not the date when the Contracting State had made the decision, although the historical situation might shed light on the present situation. There was no indication that the risks to the applicant if returned to Somalia had changed since 1992 when he was granted refugee status. The potential treatment in breach of A 3 might not be by State agents. The applicant could not be expelled to Somalia regardless of his criminal convictions.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (ATS 150,000).

Mr Mobin Ahmed, Mr Dennis Perrin, Mr Ray Bentley and Mr David John Brough were employed in different capacities by various local authorities. Their complaints related to the enactment and implementation of legislative measures designed to limit the involvement of certain categories of local government officials, such as themselves, in political activities. They complained that the legislative measures operated to their detriment in a way that denied them their rights to freedom of expression (A 10) and of assembly (A 11) and their rights to participate fully in the electoral process (P1A1).

Comm found by majority (13–4) V 10, not necessary to consider 11, unanimously NV P1A3.

Court found by majority (6–3) NV 10 and 11, unanimously NV P1A3.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann (jd), Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr R Pekkanen (jd), Sir John Freeland, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Kûris, Mr P Van Dijk (jd).

There had been an interference with the applicant's rights. The Court held that the interferences were 'prescribed by law' and pursued the legitimate aim to protect the rights of others, council members and the electorate alike, to effective political democracy at the local level. Further, there was a pressing social need for action in this area, to strengthen the tradition of senior officers' political neutrality. In looking at the interference complained of in the light of the case as a whole, the Court determined that it was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued and that the reasons adduced by the national authorities to justify it were relevant and sufficient. Having regard to the need that the legislation sought to address and to the margin of appreciation which the respondent State enjoyed in this area, the restrictions imposed on the applicants could not be said to be a disproportionate interference with their rights under A 10 of the Convention.

The Court's conclusions as to the forseeability of the impugned measures, the legitimacy of the aim pursued by them and their necessity, held true for the purposes of A 11(2). The relevant legislation was limited in the scope of its restrictions, which did not restrict the applicants' right to join any political party of their choosing.

The aim of the legislation to secure political impartiality was legitimate for the purposes of restricting the exercise of the applicants' subjective right to stand for election. Further, the restrictions did not limit the very essence of the applicants' rights under this Article having regard to the fact that they only operated for as long as the applicants occupied politically restricted posts and that any of the applicants wishing to run for elected office were at liberty to resign from their post.

[Application lodged 11.7.1991; Commission report 4.4.1995; Court Judgment 15.11.1996]

Mr Sadik Ahmet Sadik, a Greek national of the Muslim faith, a doctor, publisher of a weekly newspaper Güven ('Trust') and a member of the Greek Parliament, was the sole candidate of the political party Güven representing part of the Muslim population of Western Thrace. He published statements in the newspaper Güven and was subsequently charged with deceiving the electors in order to induce them to change the way they intended to vote, provoking and inciting the citizens to sow discord among themselves by his descriptions of the 'Turkish Muslim minority'. He was subsequently found guilty of disturbing the peace. Following appeal he was sentenced to 15 months' imprisonment and fine. After his release in 1990 he was elected to parliament. He died in a road accident on 24 July 1995.

Comm found unanimously V 10.

The applicant's widow and children had a legitimate moral interest in obtaining a ruling that his conviction infringed the right to freedom. In addition the applicant was sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment, commutable to a fine of 1,000 Greek drachmas per day of detention, which sum he paid. His heirs therefore also had a pecuniary interest under A 50.

The supervision machinery set up by the Convention was subsidiary to the national human rights protection systems. That principle is reflected in A 26. A 26 had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism but complaints intended to be made subsequently at Strasbourg should have been made to the domestic courts, at least in substance and in compliance with the formal requirements and time limits laid down in the domestic system. The Court noted that the Convention formed an integral part of the Greek legal system, where it took precedence over every contrary provision of the law; A 10 of the Convention was directly applicable. The applicant did not rely on A 10, or on arguments to the same or like effect based on domestic law, in the courts dealing with his case. Accordingly, as domestic remedies were not exhausted, the merits of the case could not be considered.

Salah Ahmut was born in 1945 and had been a Netherlands national since 22 February 1990, although he had retained his original Moroccan nationality. He married Ms F A in 1967 and they had 5 children. His youngest son, Souffiane, was born on 27 November 1980 in Morocco and had Moroccan nationality. The marriage was dissolved and the children remained with their mother after the applicant moved to The Netherlands in September 1986. Ms F A died as a result of a traffic accident on 27 March 1987. The applicant married a Netherlands national in 1986 from whom he was divorced in 1990, he then married a Moroccan national in The Netherlands in 1991. Souffiane arrived in The Netherlands on 26 March 1990 in the company of his sister. They applied for residence permits to reside with their father. Their applications were refused. The applicant's subsequent appeals were dismissed.

Comm found by majority (9–4) V 8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr R Macdonald, Mr N Valticos (d), Mr SK Martens (jd), Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (jd), Mr U Lôhmus (jd), Mr E Levits.

It followed from the concept of family on which A 8 was based that a child born of a marital union was ipso iure part of that relationship; hence, from the moment of the child's birth and by the very fact of it, there existed between him and his parents a bond amounting to 'family life'. The existence of 'family life' between the applicants was established. The essential object of A 8 was to protect the individual against arbitrary action by public authorities. There may in addition be positive obligations inherent in effective 'respect' for family life. However, the boundaries between the State's positive and negative obligations under this provision did not lend themselves to precise definition. Regard had to be had to the fair balance that had to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole and in both contexts the State enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation. The applicable principles had been stated by the Court in previous judgments as: (a) the extent of a State's obligation to admit to its territory relatives of settled immigrants will vary according to the particular circumstances of the persons involved and the general interest; (b) as a matter of well-established international law and subject to its treaty obligations, a State has the right to control the entry of non-nationals into its territory; (c) where immigration is concerned, A 8 cannot be considered to impose on a State a general obligation to respect immigrants' choice of the country of their matrimonial residence and to authorise family reunion in its territory. The Court considered the facts of the case, the applicant's residence and ties in The Netherlands, the family in Morocco who could care for the son, the family, linguistic and cultural ties of the latter to Morocco and the period of time the latter had spent in The Netherlands. A 8 did not guarantee a right to choose the most suitable place to develop family life. In the circumstances, the respondent State could not be said to have failed to strike a fair balance between the applicants' interests on the one hand and its own interest in controlling immigration on the other. Accordingly no violation of A 8 could be found on the facts of the present case.

Aiello v Italy 99/110

[Application lodged 5.11.1997; Judgment 14.12.1999]

Mr Carmine Aiello complained about the length of civil proceedings which had lasted 5 years 8 months.

Court unanimously found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr C Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr A Baka.

The proceedings had commenced on 13 September 1991 and ended on 2 June 1997, a period of 5 years 8 months. The Court recalled that it had found in judgments on 28 July 1999 that in Italy there was an accumulation of breaches of the reasonable time requirement. That accumulation aggravated the violation of A 6. Length of 5 years 8 months could not be considered reasonable.

[Application lodged 2.5.1991; Commission report 30.11.1993; Court Judgment 5.5.1995]

On the morning of 1 May 1987 officers of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise seized an aircraft owned and operated by the applicant company worth over GBP 60 million which had landed in London. On discharge of its cargo the aircraft had been found to contain 331 kilograms of cannabis resin valued at about GBP 800,000. The Commissioners delivered the aircraft back to the applicant company on payment of a penalty of GBP 50,000. The applicant company commenced a claim disputing that the aircraft was liable to forfeiture. The Commissioners therefore brought condemnation proceedings before the court to confirm, inter alia, that the aircraft was liable to forfeiture at the time of seizure. The applicant company complained that the seizure of its aircraft and its subsequent return on conditions violated its right to peaceful enjoyment of its possessions as guaranteed by P1A1 and that the proceedings involved did not comply with the requirements of A 6(1).

Comm found by majority (9–5) NV P1A1 and (6–8) NV 6.

Court found by majority (5–4) NV P1A1, NV 6(1).

It was not in dispute between the parties that the matters complained of constituted an interference with the peaceful enjoyment of the applicant's possessions. However, there was disagreement as to whether there had been a deprivation of property under the first paragraph (P1A1) or a control of use under the second paragraph. P1A1 guaranteed the right of property and comprised three distinct rules. The first was of a general nature laying down the principle of peaceful enjoyment of property. The second covered deprivation of possessions and made it subject to certain conditions. The third recognised that the Contracting States were entitled to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest or to secure the payment of taxes or other contributions or penalties. However, the three rules were not 'distinct' in the sense of being unconnected: the second and third rules were concerned with enjoyment of property and therefore had to be construed in the light of the general principle enunciated in the first rule. The seizure of the aircraft amounted to a temporary restriction on its use and did not involve a transfer of ownership, in addition the decision of the Court of Appeal to condemn the property as forfeited did not have the effect of depriving Air Canada of ownership since the sum required for the release of the aircraft had been paid. It was clear from the scheme of the legislation that the release of the aircraft subject to the payment of a sum of money was, in effect, a measure taken in furtherance of a policy of seeking to prevent carriers from bringing, inter alia, prohibited drugs into the UK. As such, it amounted to a control of the use of property. The second paragraph of P1A1 was therefore applicable. The second paragraph (P1A1) had to be construed in the light of the principle laid down in the Article's first sentence. An interference had to achieve a 'fair balance' between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. There had to be, therefore, a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim pursued. It was clear from the decision of the Court of Appeal that both the seizure of the aircraft and the requirement of payment, in the absence of any finding of fault or negligence on the part of the applicant, were in conformity with the relevant provisions of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979. While the width of the powers of forfeiture conferred on the Commissioners was striking, the seizure of the applicant's aircraft and its release subject to payment were exceptional measures which were resorted to in order to bring about an improvement in the company's security procedures. The measures taken conformed to the general interest in combating international drug trafficking. The applicant complained that it had been given no reasons by the Commissioners. The Court noted that it would have been open to Air Canada to institute judicial review proceedings to challenge the failure of the Commissioners to provide reasons for the seizure of the aircraft or indeed to contend that the acts of the Commissioners constituted an abuse of their authority. Although not an appeal on the merits of the case, available and effective remedy could have been provided in respect of the exercise of discretion by the Commissioners. Although the provision of reasons from the outset would have contributed to clarifying the situation, the applicant could not have been in any real doubt as to the reasons for the Commissioners' decision having regard to the numerous incidents concerning the various security lapses and irregularities which had occurred in the past as well as the warning letter from the Commissioners which had been sent, inter alia, to Air Canada pointing out that forfeiture of an aircraft was a possibility. The scope of judicial review under English law was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the second paragraph of P1A1. In particular, it was open to the domestic courts to hold that the exercise of discretion by the Commissioners was unlawful on the grounds that it was tainted with illegality, irrationality or procedural impropriety. Taking into account the large quantity of cannabis that was found in the container, its street value as well as the value of the aircraft that had been seized, the Court did not consider the requirement to pay GBP 50,000 to be disproportionate to the aim pursued, namely the prevention of the importation of prohibited drugs into the United Kingdom. Bearing in mind the above, as well as the State's margin of appreciation in this area, in the circumstances of the present case, a fair balance was achieved. There had thus been no violation of P1A1.

The absence of a criminal charge or a provision which was 'criminal' in nature and the lack of involvement of the criminal courts taken together with the fact that there was no threat of any criminal proceedings in the event of non-compliance, were sufficient factors on which to conclude that the matters complained of did not involve 'the determination of a criminal charge'. It had not been disputed by the parties that the present case concerned a dispute relating to the applicant company's civil rights. Regarding the seizure, the relevant provisions of UK law required the Commissioners to take proceedings for forfeiture once the seizure of the aircraft had been challenged. Such proceedings were in fact brought and, with the agreement of the parties, were limited to the determination of specified questions of law. In such circumstances, the requirement of access to court inherent in A 6(1) was satisfied. Furthermore, it was also open to the applicant to bring judicial review proceedings contesting the decision of the Commissioners to require payment as a condition for the return of the aircraft. However, for whatever reason, such proceedings were not in fact instituted. Against that background, the Court did not consider it appropriate to examine in the abstract whether the scope of judicial review, as applied by the English courts, would be capable of satisfying A 6(1). Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 14.6.1973; Commission report 9.3.1978; Court Judgment 9.10.1989 (merits) 6.2.1981 (A 50)]

Mrs Johanna Airey, a married woman of modest means, complained that she was unable to afford the services of a lawyer to obtain a decree of judicial separation in the High Court from her abusive husband as there was no Legal Aid for such civil proceedings available in Ireland. She complained that she had been effectively deprived of a remedy.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), unnecessary to examine 8, 13, 14.

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary pleas of lack of foundation, non-exhaustion of remedies, found by majority (5–2) V 6(1) and (4–3) not necessary to examine 6+14, 13, (4–3) V 8.

There was no doubt that the outcome of separation proceedings was 'decisive for private rights and obligations' and so for 'civil rights and obligations' within the meaning of A 6(1). A 6 was therefore applicable in the present case. It comprised a right for the applicant to have access to the High Court in order to petition for judicial separation. The Convention was intended to guarantee not rights that are theoretical or illusory but rights that are practical and effective. That was particularly so of the right of access to the courts in view of the prominent place held in a democratic society by the right to a fair trial. The applicant would be at a disadvantage if her husband were represented by a lawyer and she were not. Quite apart from that eventuality, it is not realistic to suppose that, in litigation of this nature, the applicant could effectively conduct her own case, despite the assistance which the judge afforded to parties acting in person. Furthermore, litigation of that kind, in addition to involving complicated points of law, necessitated proof of adultery, unnatural practices or, as in the present case, cruelty; to establish the facts, expert evidence may have to be tendered and witnesses may have to be found, called and examined. Additionally, marital disputes often entailed an emotional involvement that was scarcely compatible with the degree of objectivity required by advocacy in court. For these reasons, it was most improbable that a person in the applicant's position could effectively present her own case. Accordingly, the possibility to appear in person before the High Court did not provide the applicant with an effective right of access. Fulfilment of a duty under the Convention on occasion necessitates some positive action on the part of the State; in such circumstances, the State could not simply remain passive. Whilst the Convention sets forth what were essentially civil and political rights, many of them had implications of a social or economic nature. In certain eventualities, the possibility of appearing before a court in person, even without a lawyer's assistance, would meet the requirements of A 6(1). Whilst A 6(1) guaranteed litigants an effective right of access to the courts for the determination of their 'civil rights and obligations', it left to the State a free choice of the means to be used towards that end. The institution of a legal aid scheme constituted one of those means, but there are others such as, for example, a simplification of procedure. That was not to imply that the State must provide free legal aid for every dispute relating to a 'civil right'. The Convention contained no provision on legal aid for civil disputes: A 6(3)(c) dealt only with criminal proceedings. However, despite the absence of a similar clause for civil litigation, A 6(1) could sometimes compel the State to provide for the assistance of a lawyer when such assistance proved indispensable for effective access to court either because legal representation was rendered compulsory for various types of litigation, or by reason of the complexity of the procedure or of the case. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the Court found that the applicant did not enjoy an effective right of access to the High Court for the purpose of petitioning for a decree of judicial separation. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

A 14 had no independent existence. The articles enshrining the Convention rights could be violated alone and/or in conjunction with A 14. An examination would be required where a clear inequality of treatment in the enjoyment of the right in question was a fundamental aspect of the case but that did not apply to the breach of A 6(1) in the present proceedings; accordingly, the Court did not deem it necessary also to examine the case under A 14.

The State could not be said to have 'interfered' with the applicant's private or family life: the substance of her complaint was not that the State has acted but that it has failed to act. However, although the object of A 8 was essentially that of protecting the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, it did not merely compel the State to abstain from such interference: in addition to this primarily negative undertaking, there may be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for private or family life. The State had failed to respect her family life but had not interfered with her private or family life. In Ireland, many aspects of private or family life are regulated by law. In principle, husbands and wives were under a duty to cohabit but were entitled, in certain cases, to petition for a decree of judicial separation. Effective respect for private or family life obliged Ireland to make this means of protection effectively accessible, when appropriate, to anyone who may wish to have recourse thereto. However, it was not effectively accessible to the applicant for the reasons applicable to A 6(1) above, and therefore A 8 was violated.

As A 13 and A 6(1) overlapped in this particular case, it was not necessary to determine whether there has been a failure to observe the requirements of A 13, those requirements were less strict than and entirely absorbed by those of A 6(1).

Agreement was reached between the parties on domestic costs, IRP 3,140 was awarded in respect of remainder of claims.

Aït-Mouhoub v France 98/90

[Application lodged 9.11.1992; Commission report 9.9.1997; Court Judgment 28.10.1998]

Mr Areski Aït-Mouhoub was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment for aiding and abetting armed robbery and for aggravated handling. He lodged two criminal complaints, one against two gendarmes who had taken part in the judicial investigation and the other against a prosecution witness and another, alleging, inter alia, theft, forgery, abuse of office. He complained that he had been ruined by the thefts that had been committed. His applications for legal aid to pursue those complaints were refused. On appeal, a senior investigating judge directed that the applicant should pay FF 80,000 into court as security for costs.

Comm found by majority (22–8) V 6(1).

Court unanimously found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr V Butkevych.

The applicant had been caused financial loss by the alleged offences by the prosecution witness and the other person against him; the complaint therefore concerned a civil right. The applicant's complaint was designed to set in motion judicial criminal proceedings in order to secure a conviction that could have enabled him to exercise his civil rights, in particular, to obtain compensation for the financial loss. The outcome of the proceedings was, therefore, for the purposes of A 6(1) of the Convention, decisive for establishing the applicant's right to compensation. Consequently, A 6(1) applied.

The 'right to a court', of which the right of access constituted one aspect, was not absolute but could be subject to limitations. However, any limitations should not restrict or reduce a person's access in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right was impaired, and the limitations would not be compatible with A 6(1) if they did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved. The applicant's income had been assessed by the Legal Aid Office at nil in connection with his first complaint and despite his renewed application he had never received a reply from the Legal Aid Office in connection with his second complaint, although his position had not changed. The senior investigating judge, after noting that the applicant had not received legal aid, declared the civil-party application relating to his second complaint inadmissible as he had not paid the sum required of FF 80,000. It was not for the Court to assess the merits of the complaint lodged by the applicant with the appropriate judge. However, the setting of such a large sum by the senior investigating judge was disproportionate as the applicant, who had not received a reply from the Legal Aid Office, had no financial resources whatsoever. Requiring the applicant to pay such a large sum amounted to depriving him of his recourse before the investigating judge. The applicant's right of access to a tribunal within the meaning of A 6(1) was infringed.

Just satisfaction, costs and expenses (FF 30,000) awarded.

Aka v Turkey 98/78

[Application lodged 15.8.1991; Commission report 9.9.1997; Court Judgment 23.9.1998]

The National Water Board expropriated two plots of land belonging to the applicant and paid him TRL 4,370,962 compensation. On 2 October 1987 the applicant brought an action for increased compensation for the expropriation. The Court of First Instance ordered additional compensation with interest, a decision confirmed by the Court of Cassation. The Water Board did not pay the additional compensation until 30 January 1992 and 7 January 1993 (more than sixteen months after the Court of Cassation's judgments and four years and three months after the expropriation of the first plot of land and five years and three months after the expropriation of the second). The applicant complained about the insufficiency of the statutory interest for delay.

Comm found unanimously V P1A1.

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection, found V P1A1.

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr V Toumanov.

The Government had failed to establish the adequacy and effectiveness of the remedy provided by Article 105 of the Code of Obligations. Therefore the preliminary objection was dismissed.

The applicant's complaint came within the second sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. An interference, including one resulting from expropriations intended to secure the realisation of large-scale public-works schemes, must strike a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. In order to assess whether a fair balance was preserved between the various interests concerned, consideration had to be given to the terms and conditions on which compensation was payable under domestic legislation and the manner in which they were applied in the applicant's case. National authorities had a margin of appreciation; it was important for them to limit the amount of interest payable on debts due by the State. However, the Court had to ensure that a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim pursued had been maintained and that no disproportionate burden had been imposed on the person who had been deprived of his property. During the periods under consideration in the instant case, inflation in Turkey reached 70% per annum. Yet, the rate of interest for delay payable on the amounts due to the applicant was 30% per annum. Abnormally lengthy delays in the payment of compensation for expropriation led to increased financial loss for the person whose land has been expropriated putting him in a position of uncertainty, especially when the monetary depreciation which occurred in certain States was taken into account. In addition there was increased financial loss when people whose land had been expropriated were obliged to resort to proceedings in order to obtain the compensation to which they were entitled. The difference between the value of the amounts due to the applicant when his land was expropriated and when actually paid, which difference was due solely to failings on the part of the expropriating authority, caused him to sustain a separate loss which, coupled with the loss of his land, upset the fair balance that should have been maintained between the protection of the right to property and the demands of the general interest. There had therefore been a violation of P1A1.

The 7 applicants were resident in villages in areas which had been the centre of intense PKK terrorist activity. The applicants alleged that on 10 November 1992 State security forces launched an attack on their village, burnt nine houses and forced the immediate evacuation of the entire village. The Government categorically denied these allegations, contending that the houses had been set on fire by the PKK. The Commission inquiry found that the security forces were responsible for the destruction of the properties and that no proper investigation was carried out at the domestic level regarding the destruction of the houses on 10 November 1992 either immediately after the event or thereafter.

Judges (A 50): Mr Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, (d) Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici , Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr E Levits.

The Government's argument on abuse of process could only be accepted if it were clear that the application was based on untrue facts, which it was not. The Commission in its findings of fact had substantially upheld the applicants' allegations concerning the destruction of their property. Accordingly, the Government's plea must be rejected. The rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies in A 26 obliged those seeking to bring their case against the State before the Court to use first the remedies provided by the national legal system. Consequently, States are dispensed from answering before an international body for their acts before they have had an opportunity to put matters right through their own legal system. In the area of the exhaustion of domestic remedies there is a distribution of the burden of proof. It was incumbent on the Government claiming non-exhaustion to satisfy the Court that the remedy was an effective one available in theory and in practice at the relevant time, that is to say, that it was accessible, was one which was capable of providing redress in respect of the applicant's complaints and offered reasonable prospects of success. However, once this burden of proof has been satisfied it falls to the applicant to establish that the remedy advanced by the Government was in fact exhausted or was for some reason inadequate and ineffective in the particular circumstances of case. A 26 had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism, it was not absolute nor capable of being applied automatically. Having reviewed the facts of the case the Court concluded that the application could not be rejected for failure to exhaust domestic remedies. The Court emphasised that its ruling was confined to the particular circumstances of the present case.

The Court accepted the facts as established by the Commission who had made findings following hearing of witnesses in Turkey on two separate occasions by a delegation of the Commission in the presence of the representatives from both sides who were able to cross-examine the witnesses and to a hearing on the merits in Strasbourg before the Commission. It was therefore established that the security forces were responsible for the burning of the applicants' houses on 10 November 1992 and that the loss of their homes caused them to abandon the village and move elsewhere. However, it had not been established that the applicants were forcibly expelled from the village by the security forces.

The deliberate burning of the applicants' homes and their contents constituted a serious interference with the right to respect for their family lives and homes and with the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. No justification for these interferences having been proffered by the respondent Government, the Court concluded that there had been violations A 8 and P1A1.

In view of the absence of precise evidence concerning the specific circumstances in which the destruction of the houses took place and its finding of a violation of the applicants' rights under A 8 and P1A1, the Court did not propose to examine further this allegation.

The applicants did not maintain their complaints under A 5 before the Court and they would therefore not be considered.

Regarding A 6(1) and 13, while the Turkish Government had shown the existence of a scheme of remedies under Turkish law to deal with complaints arising out of the struggle against terrorism, the action for compensation before the administrative courts could not be considered an effective remedy in respect of the applicants' complaints. In addition, there existed special circumstances which dispensed the applicants from availing themselves of the civil remedy for damages. Since the complaints under this head reflected the same or similar elements as those issues already dealt with in the context of the objection concerning the exhaustion of domestic remedies, the Court considered that it was not necessary to examine these further complaints.

Regarding A 14 and 18 and the claim by the applicants that they had been targeted because they are Kurds, the Court recalled that these allegations were examined by the Commission which found that they were unsubstantiated. The Court having accepted the Commission's findings of facts concluded no violation A 14 and A 18.

It was of the utmost importance for the effective operation of the system of individual petition instituted by A 25 that applicants or potential applicants were able to communicate freely with the Commission without being subjected to any form of pressure from the authorities to withdraw or modify their complaints Given the vulnerable position of the applicant villagers and the reality that in South-East Turkey complaints against the authorities might well give rise to a legitimate fear of reprisals, the matters complained of by the applicants amounted to a form of illicit and unacceptable pressure on them to withdraw their application. The filming of the two persons who were subsequently declared not to be applicants could have contributed to this pressure. The fact that the applicants pursued their application to the Commission did not prevent such behaviour on the part of the authorities from amounting to a hindrance in respect of the applicants in breach of A 25(1).

Akkus v Turkey 97/42

[Application lodged 26.8.1991; Commission report 27.2.1996; Court Judgment 9.7.1997]

In 1987 the National Water Board expropriated rice growing land belonging to Mrs Sariye Akkus, in order to build a hydro-electric dam. The applicant was paid compensation. The applicant's application for increased compensation was granted by the Court of First Instance and upheld by the Court of Cassation on appeal. The additional compensation was paid in February 1992, six months after the application was lodged with the Strasbourg institutions and approximately seventeen months after the Court of Cassation's decision. She complained of an infringement with her right to peaceful enjoyment of her possessions on account of the delay in paying the additional compensation.

Commission found by majority (22–6) V P1A1.

Court by majority (8–1) rejected Government's preliminary objection and found by majority (7–2) V P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr J De Meyer, Mr AN Loizou, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (jd), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr B Repik, Mr P Kûris.

Regarding the Government's preliminary objection of non-compliance with the six-month time limit, the complaint concerned the national authorities' delay in paying the additional compensation and the damage sustained by the applicant as a result. The applicant could not have made such a complaint until some time after the final judgment of the Court of Cassation; by applying to the Commission on 26 August 1991 when the compensation due had still not been paid, the applicant satisfied the requirement of A 26. The objection was therefore rejected. The objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies had not been raised before the Commission; the Government were therefore estopped from relying on that objection.

The Court had to examine whether a fair balance had been maintained between the demands of the general interest and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. It was not the Court's task to rule on the valuation of the land, the Court was concerned with the alleged damage sustained because of the authorities' delay in paying the compensation due. The adequacy of compensation diminished if paid without reference to various circumstances liable to reduce its value, such as unreasonable delay. Abnormally lengthy delays in the payment of compensation for expropriation led to increased financial loss for the person whose land has been expropriated, putting him in a position of uncertainty, especially when the monetary depreciation which occurs in certain States was taken into account. The additional compensation together with interest at the rate of 30% per annum was paid to the applicant in February 1992, at a time when inflation rates in Turkey had reached 70% per annum. The difference in the value of the applicant's compensation as finally determined by the Court of Cassation and its value when actually paid caused the applicant to sustain separate loss in addition to the loss deriving from the expropriation of her land. By deferring payment of the compensation for seventeen months, the national authorities rendered that compensation inadequate and, consequently, upset the balance between the protection of the right to property and the requirements of the general interest. There had therefore been a violation of P1A1.

Pecuniary damage (USD 48), non pecuniary damage (USD 1,000), costs and expenses (USD 5,000 less FF 8,968 already received by way of legal aid) awarded.

[Application lodged 20.5.1993; Commission report 23.10.1995; Court Judgment 18.12.1996]

The applicant was a metal worker living in south-east Turkey. He was shot and killed on 16 April 1994 since which time his father pursued the case. The facts in the case were in dispute. The applicant claimed that he was arrested on suspicion of membership of, and working for, the PKK (the Kurdish Workers Party) together with 13 other persons and that while in custody was tortured including being strung up by his arms (Palestinian hanging) and being beaten repeatedly. The Government disputed this. The Commission heard evidence and drew conclusions. The applicant was arrested no later than 26 November 1992 and detained for at least 2 weeks by the Turkish police. On 15 December 1992 the applicant was admitted to hospital and was diagnosed with bilateral radial paralysis. There was no evidence that he had suffered any disability prior to his arrest nor that he had suffered any injury between his release from custody and his admission to hospital. Medical evidence indicated that the paralysis might have been caused in various ways, but that it was consistent with the form of ill-treatment the applicant alleged. The Commission was unconvinced by the evidence of the policeman and public prosecutor who claimed it was inconceivable that the applicant could have been ill-treated as alleged. The Turkish Government offered no explanation for the applicant's injuries. There was insufficient evidence to draw any conclusions about the other ill-treatment which the applicant alleged (electric shocks and beatings); however, it did appear that he had been detained in a small cell with two other people who had had to share a single bed and blanket and that he had been blindfolded during interrogation. The applicant also claimed that he was never brought before a judge or other authority in violation of A 5(3) and did not have an opportunity to bring proceedings against those responsible for his ill-treatment in violation of A 6(1) and 13. The applicant's father claimed that the applicant was killed because he had brought the case to the ECHR and that it was therefore an interference with his right of individual petition under A 25.

Comm found by majority (15–1) V 3, 5(3) (13–3) V 6(1) unanimously no separate issue arose under 13 and that no further action needed to be taken under 25.

Court by majority (8–1) dismissed the preliminary objection of non-exhaustion, found by majority (8–1) V 3, 5(3), 13, not necessary to consider A 6, unanimously NV 25.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr J De Meyer (pd), Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr U Lôhmus.

The Court was not bound by the Commission's findings of facts, but would only make its own findings in exceptional circumstances. Here, the Court accepted the findings of the Commission which had taken evidence in Turkey and Strasbourg. There was no obligation to have recourse to remedies which were inadequate or ineffective and there could be special circumstances which absolved the applicant from exhausting domestic remedies. The Turkish authorities claimed that the applicant failed to bring either criminal or civil actions. The applicant claimed that on 10 December 1992 he had complained to the public prosecutor about his ill-treatment in custody. The Court considered that, even if the applicant did not complain to the public prosecutor, the injuries he had sustained must have been clearly visible during their meeting; however, the prosecutor made no enquiry as to the fact, nature and cause of the injuries despite the fact that under Turkish law he was under a duty to investigate such matters. The applicant had been detained and ill-treated without access to legal advice or medical assistance and had sustained serious injuries. That alone would have made him feel vulnerable and powerless and apprehensive of the State. As the public prosecutor had taken no action having seen his injuries it would be understandable if the applicant decided that he would not obtain satisfaction through domestic channels. Thus there were special circumstances which absolved the applicant from exhausting domestic remedies in this case.

Where an individual was taken into custody in good health, but was found injured at the time of release, it was incumbent on the State to provide a plausible explanation for the cause of the injury failing which a clear issue arose under A 3. There was no derogation from or limitation on A 3. The Palestinian hanging torture to which the applicant had been subjected (being stripped naked, arms tied together behind his back and suspended in the air by his arms) was treatment of such severity and cruelty as to constitute torture. It could only have been inflicted deliberately and preparation was required to carry it out; further, it was administered with the aim of obtaining admissions or information. It must have caused severe pain and led to paralysis of both arms for some time. Thus violation of A 3.

A 5 enshrined a fundamental human right, namely the protection of the individual against arbitrary interference with his liberty and judicial control of interference was an essential feature of A 5. The applicant was detained for at least 14 days without being brought before a judge or other officer; although the Court accepted that the investigation of terrorist offences was especially problematic for States, it could not accept that it was necessary to hold a suspect for 14 days without judicial intervention. 14 days was an exceptionally long period and left the applicant vulnerable not only to arbitrary interference with his right to liberty, but also to torture. Turkey had not given any reasons why the fight against the PKK in South-East Turkey rendered judicial intervention impracticable. The derogation allowed from A 5 was limited to the strict minimum required for the fight against terrorism. The situation did not require that the applicant be detained for 14 days incommunicado without access to a judge or judicial officer. Thus there was a violation of A 5(3).

The applicant claimed that he had been denied access to a court in violation of A 6(1) and focused on the prosecutors' failure to take action having noted his visible injuries. The Court considered it more appropriate to consider the matter under A 13.

Given the importance of A 3, where such treatment was alleged, A 13 imposed an obligation on the State to carry out a thorough and effective investigation of the allegation of torture which was capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible and included access of the victim to the process. Under Turkish law the prosecutor had a duty to carry out such investigations. In this case the prosecutor had ignored the visible evidence before him that the applicant had been tortured. Such an attitude from a State official under a duty to investigate was tantamount to undermining the effectiveness of any other remedies which may exist. Thus there was a violation of A 13.

There was no evidence that the applicant's murder was connected to his bringing of legal action under the Convention, thus no violation of A25.

Albert and Le Compte v Belgium (1982) 5 EHRR 533, 13 EHRR 415 83/1

[Applications lodged 10.12.1975 and 6.5.1976; Commission report 14.12.1981; Court Judgment 28.2.1983 (merits) 24.10.1983 (JS)]

The applicants' complaints related to disciplinary proceedings instituted against them before the competent body of the medical association, the Belgian Ordre des Médecins.

Comm found unanimously NV 3 and 11, by majority V 6(1) on the basis that the applicants had been denied a public hearing.

Court unanimously found NV 3 with respect to Dr Le Compte, by majority (16–4) V 6(1) in respect to the hearing of the case of each of the applicants, V 6(1) in that the applicants' cases were not heard publicly by the disciplinary tribunal, which did not pronounce its judgment publicly, unanimously NV 6 as regards the applicants' other complaints and NV 11.

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr R Ryssdal, Mr J Cremona (jc), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (declaration), Mr W Ganshof Van Der Meersch, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (jc), Mr D Evrigenis, Mr G Lagergren, Mr L Liesch (d), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (pd), Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (pd), Mr E García De Enterría, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans (pd), Mr R MacDonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing.

Judges (A 50): Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr W Ganshof Van Der Meersch, Mr D Evrigenis, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald.

Withdrawal of the right to practise as a disciplinary measure was intended to penalise a doctor whose serious misconduct had shown that he no longer satisfied the required conditions for exercising the medical profession. There was no cause to question the legitimacy or justification of a sanction whose object was not to debase or adversely affect Dr Le Compte's personality in a manner incompatible with A 3.

A 6 was applicable because there was a dispute, which related to 'civil rights and obligations'. The disciplinary proceedings directly and materially interfered with the right to continue to exercise the medical profession. The fact that the result was a temporary suspension did not prevent it impairing that right. It was not necessary for the Court to consider whether 'civil rights' extended beyond private rights, as a private right was directly established between medical practitioners and their patients, nor whether A 6(1) was applicable under the criminal head as the fair trial notion in A 6(1) embodied the guarantees in A 6(2) and (3), the benefits of which Dr Albert complained he did not receive. Regarding the complaint of impartiality, its existence had to be determined according to a subjective test, that is, the personal conviction of a particular judge, and also according to an objective test, that is, whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in this respect. On the material before the Court there was nothing to bring the impartiality of the disciplinary tribunal's members into question. In particular, the manner of appointment of the medical practitioners sitting provided no cause for treating those individuals as biased for they acted not as representatives of the Ordre but in a personal capacity. As regards publicity, the conditions providing for exceptions to the rule requiring publicity for the tribunal hearing and pronouncement of the decision were not satisfied and neither applicant waived his entitlement. The public character of the subsequent proceedings before a court did not remedy the defect in the earlier disciplinary proceedings. In relation to Dr Albert's complaints under A 6(2) and (3), the Court, having found that those provisions were applicable to disciplinary proceedings, found that the presumption of innocence had been observed, despite regard being had to the applicant's previous criminal record, as had the provisions complained of in A 6(3). The nature and cause of the complaints against the applicant had been specified, the applicant had had more than 15 days in order to prepare his defence, which was not complex, and there was no evidence to suggest that the attendance and examination of any witnesses Dr Albert wished to call had been refused.

Regarding Dr Le Compte's complaints under A 11, the Ordre was not an association within the meaning of this Article as it was a public-law institution employing processes of a public authority. Nor was there any interference with A 11(1) as the setting up of the Ordre prevented practitioners from forming together or joining professional associations.

Finding of a violation sufficient to constitute just satisfaction, costs and expenses (BEF 77,000).

Ali v Switzerland (1999) 28 EHRR 304 98/63

[Application lodged 14.9.1994; Commission report 26.2.1997; Court Judgment 5.8.1998]

The applicant entered Switzerland on 18 November 1991 and applied for political asylum. He was subsequently convicted of a number of criminal offences including theft, contravention of the Dangerous Drugs Act, motoring offences and violence against a female Red Cross worker. His asylum claim was refused and it was ordered that he should be expelled from Switzerland. On 18 August 1993 he was detained pending removal. However, as it was impossible to expel him because he had no travel documents, he was released on 9 September 1993. Further criminal complaints were lodged against him which resulted in further detention. His administrative detention was ordered on 24 December 1993. His appeal was refused. He was released on 23 June 1994 and lodged an application to the Convention institutions. On 15 November 1994 the applicant left the hostel where he was living in Switzerland, without leaving any other address. The Court was subsequently informed that the applicant was in Somalia.

Commission found unanimously V 5(1).

Court unanimously struck the case from the list.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr I Foighel, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr P Van Dijk.

The Court struck the case out of the list holding that in the light of the facts, further examination of the case was not justified.

Alimena v Italy 91/11

[Application lodged 8.11.1985; Commission report 5.12.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991]

On 8 February 1978 Mr Bernadino Alimena, a lawyer, was charged with contempt of court during a hearing. He was alleged to have said to the judge who had decided in his absence on a case in which he was involved as counsel and had advised the court that he would be late, that his conduct was arbitrary and improper and to have thrown the file onto the judge's desk. The judge ordered the applicant's arrest and started summary proceedings for contempt. On 22 March 1982 the District Judge gave the applicant an 8 month suspended sentence of imprisonment. The appellant's appeals were dismissed. The applicant appealed to the Court of Cassation who fixed a hearing for 27 June 1985 and notified the applicant's lawyer. On that date the applicant's lawyer appeared and learned that the Court had dealt with the appeal on 26 June without notifying him of the change of date and had dismissed the appeal.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) and (3)(c).

Court unanimously found V 6(1) and (3)(c).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla.

The period to be taken into account began on 8 February 1978 and ended on 27 June 1985. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The case was a simple one, the applicant's conduct gave rise to hardly any delay. There were long periods of inactivity which the applicant alleged were due to faults inherent in the legal and court system in Italy and for which no satisfactory explanation had been given by the Government. A lapse of 7 years 4 months could not therefore be regarded as reasonable.

The Italian authorities were under a duty to take steps to ensure the applicant enjoyed effectively the right to which they had recognised he was entitled, namely the possibility of being represented by a lawyer at the examination of his appeal. They had deprived him of legal assistance which could have helped him in his attempt to secure an unqualified acquittal. Accordingly there had been a violation of A6(3)(c).

Non-pecuniary damage (ITL 10,000,000), costs and expenses (ITL 3,000,000) awarded.

Allenet de Ribemont v France (1995) 20 EHRR 557 95/4

[Application lodged 24.5.1989; Commission report 12.10.1993; Court Judgment 10.02.1995]

Following the murder on 24 December 1976 of Mr Jean de Broglie, a Member of Parliament and former minister in front of the applicant's home, a judicial investigation was launched and the applicant arrested. At a press conference (which was unrelated to the investigation) the Minister of Interior, amongst other senior public officials, referred to the applicant as one of the instigators. The applicant was later charged but subsequently released and a discharge order was issued. The applicant alleged that the statements made by the Minister at the press conference infringed A 6 (2), that he had not had an effective remedy contrary to A 13, that the domestic courts had not been independent and that the proceedings had taken too long.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (8–1) V 6(2).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr J De Meyer, Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (pd), Mr B Repik.

The proceedings had begun on 23 March 1977 and ended on 30 November 1988 with the Court of Cassation's decision, a period of 11 years 8 months. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, taking into account the complexity of the case, conduct of the applicant and of the competent authorities. The present case was complex, the applicant had delayed the proceedings at most by 3 years and 4 months, the overall delay was essentially caused by the way the national authorities had handled the case. A lapse of 11 years and 8 months was not reasonable.

At the material time the applicant had been 'charged with a criminal offence' and as the presumption of innocence could be infringed by public authorities other than a judge or court, A 6(2) applied. As the applicant had been referred to at the press conference as one of the instigators, encouraging the public to believe him guilty as an accomplice and prejudicing the assessment of facts by the competent judicial authority, there had been a breach of A 6(2).

[Applications lodged 5.1.1996, 14.2.1996; Commission report 23.4.1998; Court Judgment 11.1.2000]

Mr Alexandre de Almeida Garrett, Mr José Mascarenhas Falcão, Mr Francisco Augusto Mascarenhas Falcão, Mrs Maria Teresa Mascarenhas de Oliveira Falcão de Azevedo, Mrs Maria José Mascarenhas Falcão Themudo de Castro and Leone Marie Irion Falcão were all owners of land which was expropriated and made national property as part of Portugal's agrarian reform after the 1974 revolution. They received interim compensation in the form of Government bonds but had not yet received their final compensation. Their applications through the courts for damages for the delay in determining and paying out the final compensation were rejected. They complained, inter alia, that they had suffered an infringement of their right to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions.

Comm found by majority (23–3) V P1A1, unanimously no need to examine 6, 13 and 17.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V P1A1, not necessary to examine 6, 13 and 17.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr J Casadevall, Mr Gaukur Jörundsson, Mr R Türmen, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr R Maruste, Mr A De Sousa Inês, ad hoc judge.

The Court could not examine issues arising from the deprivation of ownership in itself since these fell outside its jurisdiction, ratione temporis. However, the applications had still not received final compensation and since the applicants were placed in a continuing situation the Government's preliminary objection had to be dismissed.

P1A1 protected financial assets such as debts. The relevant Portuguese legislation and a court decision had upheld the applicants' right to compensation on account of the deprivation of their possessions. The applicants could accordingly assert the right to receive payment of the State's debts towards them, so P1A1 was applicable. It was the fact that no final compensation had been paid to date which constituted the interference with the applicants' right to peaceful enjoyment of their possessions. Neither the deprivation of ownership itself nor the amount of compensation could be examined. The applicable rule was the one in the first sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. The interference had pursued a legitimate aim since it could not be unreasonable for a State to take into account its economic and budgetary resources following far-reaching land reform whose economic and social policy objectives could not be contested. However, 24 years had elapsed without the applicants receiving final compensation, even though it was provided for in the relevant legislation. The adequacy of compensation was diminished if payment failed to take account of factors which might reduce its value, such as the lapse of a period of time which could not be considered reasonable. The length of the period was attributable to the State; the complexity of the task could not justify the length of the period. The interim compensation had been paid several years after the deprivations of property in issue. The fact of payment did not alter the situation of uncertainty which still affected the applicants. It was the uncertainty coupled with the lack of any effective domestic remedy capable of providing redress which led to the conclusion that the applicants had already had to bear a special, excessive burden which had upset the fair balance required between the requirements of the general interests and the protection of the right to peaceful enjoyment of possessions. Accordingly, there had been a violation of P1A1.

In view of the conclusion above, it was not necessary to examine separately the complaints under A 6, 13 and 17.

Amann v Switzerland 00/81

[Application lodged 27.6.1995; Commission report 20.5.1998; Court Judgment 16.2.2000]

Mr Hermann Amann was a businessman importing depilatory appliances into Switzerland which he advertised in magazines. On 12 October 1981 a woman telephoned the applicant from the former Soviet embassy in Berne to order a 'Perma Tweez' depilatory appliance. That telephone call was intercepted by the Federal Public Prosecutor's Office which then requested the Intelligence Service to carry out an investigation into the applicant and the goods he sold. In December 1981 the Public Prosecutor's Office drew up a card on the applicant for its national security card index on the basis of the particulars provided by the police of the Canton of Zürich. The card indicated that the applicant had been identified as a contact with the Russian Embassy. In 1990, having learnt of the existence of the card index being kept by the Public Prosecutor's Office, the applicant asked to consult his card. He was provided with a copy, but two passages had been blue-pencilled. He asked the Ombudsman at the Public Prosecutor's Office to disclose the blue-pencilled passages and in March 1992, having met with no success, he filed an administrative-law action with the Federal Court claiming compensation from the Swiss Confederation of CHF 5,000 for the unlawful entry of his particulars in the card index kept by the Public Prosecutor's Office. In a judgment of 14 September 1994, served on 25 January 1995, the Federal Court dismissed the applicant's claims. He complained that the interception of his telephone call on 12 October 1981 and the creation by the Public Prosecutor's Office of a card on him and the storage of the card in the federal card index violated his rights under A 8. He also complained that he had had no effective remedy in that connection.

Comm found by majority (9–8) V 8, unanimously NV 13.

Court found unanimously V 8 regarding the interception of the telephone call, V 8 regarding the creation and storing of the information card, dismissed the Government's preliminary objection relating to 13, NV 13.

Judges: Mrs E PAlm, President, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr Gaukur Jörundsson, Mr L Caflisch, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja.

Telephone calls received on private or business premises were covered by the notions of private life and correspondence within the meaning of A 8(1). The interception of the telephone call amounted to an interference by a public authority with the exercise of applicant's rights under A 8(1). Such interference breached A 8 unless it was in accordance with the law, pursued one or more of the legitimate aims referred to in A 8(2) and was necessary in a democratic society to achieve those aims. Lawfulness required not only that the impugned measure should have some basis in domestic law, but also referred to the quality of the law in question, requiring that it should be accessible to the person concerned and foreseeable as to its effects. The Federal Council's Decree of 29 April 1958 on the Police Service of the Federal Public Prosecutor's Office and the Federal Criminal Procedure Act (FCPA) were worded too generally to satisfy the forseeability requirement and the Government had not established that the conditions of application of the relevant provisions had been complied with or that the safeguards provided for had been observed. With regard to the Government's submission that the applicant had not been the subject of the impugned measure, either as a suspect or an accused, or as a third party, but had been involved 'fortuitously' in a telephone conversation recorded in the course of surveillance measures taken against a particular member of staff of the former Soviet embassy in Berne, the Act did not regulate in detail the case of persons monitored 'fortuitously' as 'necessary participants' in a telephone conversation recorded by the authorities pursuant to those provisions. In particular, the Act did not specify the precautions which should be taken with regard to those persons. The interference could not therefore be considered to have been 'in accordance with the law' since Swiss law did not indicate with sufficient clarity the scope and conditions of exercise of the authorities' discretionary power in the area under consideration. There had therefore been a violation of A 8 arising from the recording of the telephone call received by the applicant on 12 October 1981 from a person at the former Soviet embassy in Berne.

The storing of data relating to the private life of an individual fell within the application of A 8(1). The term 'private life' should not be interpreted restrictively. The card filled in on the applicant stated that he was a 'contact with the Russian embassy' and did 'business of various kinds with the company [A]'. Those details undeniably amounted to data relating to the applicant's 'private life' and, accordingly, A 8 was applicable to this complaint also. The storing by a public authority of data relating to the private life of an individual amounted to an interference within the meaning of A 8. The subsequent use of the stored information had no bearing on that finding and it was not for the Court to speculate as to whether the information gathered on the applicant was sensitive or not or as to whether the applicant had been inconvenienced in any way. The creation and storing of the impugned card amounted to an interference, within the meaning of A 8, with the applicant's right to respect for his private life. The relevant provisions, as above, were drafted in terms too general to satisfy the requirement of forseeability. The Federal Council's Directives applicable to the Processing of Personal Data in the Federal Administration did not contain any appropriate indication as to the scope and conditions of exercise of the power conferred on the Public Prosecutor's Office to gather, record and store information; thus, they did not specify the conditions in which cards may be created, the procedures that had to be followed, the information which might be stored or comments which might be forbidden. Those provisions could not be considered sufficiently clear and detailed to guarantee adequate protection against interference by the authorities with the applicant's right to respect for his private life. The creation of the card on the applicant was not, therefore, in accordance with the law within the meaning of A 8. Swiss law provided that data which turned out not to be 'necessary' or 'had no further purpose' should be destroyed. The authorities did not destroy the stored information when it emerged that no offence was being prepared. The storing of the card on the applicant was therefore not in accordance with the law within the meaning of A 8. Thus both the creation of the card by the Public Prosecutor's Office and the storing of it in the Confederation's card index amounted to interference with the applicant's private life which could not be considered to be in accordance with the law since Swiss law did not indicate with sufficient clarity the scope and conditions of exercise of the authorities' discretionary power in the area under consideration. It followed that there has been a violation of A 8.

The applicant relied on A 13 before the Commission and submitted observations on it in his memorial before the Court. Accordingly, the applicant did not manifest an intention to waive his complaint of a violation of A 13 and the Government's preliminary objection that the applicant had not repeated his complaint in his earlier memorial could not be upheld.

A 13 required that any individual who considered himself injured by a measure allegedly contrary to the Convention should have a remedy before a national authority in order both to have his claim decided and, if appropriate, to obtain redress. That provision did not, however, require the certainty of a favourable outcome. In the present case the applicant was able to consult his card as soon as he asked to do so. He complained in his administrative-law action in the Federal Court, first, about the lack of a legal basis for the telephone tapping and the creation of his card and, secondly, the lack of an effective remedy against those measures. The Federal Court had had jurisdiction to rule on those complaints and had duly examined them. The applicant had therefore had an effective remedy under Swiss law to complain of the violations of the Convention which he alleged. There had not therefore been a violation of A 13.

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (CHF 7,082.15).

Amuur v France (1996) 22 EHRR 533 96/24

[Application lodged 27.3.1992; Commission report 10.1.1995; Court Judgment 23.6.1996]

The 4 applicants, Somali nationals, were brothers and sister. They arrived at Paris-Orly Airport on 9 March 1992 on board a Syrian Airlines flight from Damascus, where they had stayed for two months after travelling there via Kenya. They asserted that they had fled Somalia because, after the overthrow of the regime of President Siyad Barre, their lives were in danger and several members of their family had been murdered. They were refused admission to French territory on the ground that their passports had been falsified, and they were held at the Hôtel Arcade, part of which had been let to the Ministry of the Interior and converted for use as a waiting area for Orly Airport. They applied for asylum. On 29 March, after the Minister of the Interior had refused them leave to enter, the applicants were sent back to Syria.

Comm found by majority (16–10) NA 5, NV 5.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection and found V 5(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mrs E Palm, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus.

The word 'victim' in A 25 denoted the person directly affected by the act or omission in issue. A decision or measure favourable to the applicant was not in principle sufficient to deprive him of his status as a 'victim' unless the national authorities had acknowledged and then afforded redress for the breach of the Convention. The Créteil tribunal de grande instance had ruled on 31 March that holding the applicants in the transit zone at Paris-Orly Airport was unlawful, and ordered their release. The haste with which the applicants were returned, before the decision, made the prospects for the institution of proceedings unrealistic. The objection must therefore be rejected.

The Court noted that France was a party to the 1951 Geneva Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees. Contracting States had the undeniable sovereign right to control aliens' entry into and residence in their territory. That right had to be exercised in accordance with the provisions of the Convention, including A 5. In order to determine whether someone had been 'deprived of his liberty' within the meaning of A 5, the starting point had to be his concrete situation, and account had to be taken of a whole range of criteria such as the type, duration, effects and manner of implementation of the measure in question. The difference between deprivation of and restriction upon liberty was one of degree or intensity, and not one of nature or substance. Holding aliens in the international zone involved a restriction upon liberty. Such confinement, accompanied by suitable safeguards for the persons concerned, was acceptable only in order to enable States to prevent unlawful immigration while complying with their international obligations, particularly under the 1951 Geneva Convention. Such confinement must not deprive the asylum-seeker of the right to gain effective access to the procedure for determining refugee status. The mere fact that it was possible for asylum-seekers to leave voluntarily the country where they wished to take refuge could not exclude a restriction on liberty. The Court concluded that holding the applicants in the transit zone of Paris-Orly Airport was equivalent in practice, in view of the restrictions suffered, to a deprivation of liberty. A 5 was therefore applicable.

Where a national law authorised deprivation of liberty, especially in respect of a foreign asylum-seeker, it had to be sufficiently accessible and precise, in order to avoid all risk of arbitrariness. Even though the applicants were not in France, holding them in the international zone of Paris-Orly Airport made them subject to French law. From 9 to 29 March 1992 the applicants were in the situation of asylum-seekers whose application had not yet been considered. At the material time no provisions allowed the ordinary courts to review the conditions under which aliens were held or, if necessary, to impose a limit on the administrative authorities as regards the length of time for which they were held. They did not provide for legal, humanitarian and social assistance, nor did they lay down procedures and time limits for access to such assistance so that asylum-seekers like the applicants could take the necessary steps. The French legal rules in force at the time, as applied in the present case, did not sufficiently guarantee the applicants' right to liberty. There had accordingly been a breach of A 5(1).

Judgment in itself constituted sufficient just satisfaction, costs and expenses (FF 57,000 less FF 9,758).

Anne-Marie Andersson v Sweden (1998) 25 EHRR 722 97/45

[Application lodged 11.2.1992; Commission report 11.4.1996; Court Judgment 27.8.1997]

The applicant, a taxi driver, was divorced and living with her son. She was unable to work due to dental problems which caused her severe pain, and anxiety about a dispute with her landlord. She contacted a psychiatric clinic and was advised to seek support for her son. The psychiatrist informed the applicant that she (the psychiatrist) had an obligation under Swedish law to contact the Social Council. The Council thereafter commenced an investigation which, with the applicant's agreement, led to the placement of her son in a non-residential therapeutic school on 2 March 1992. She complained that the passing of information to the Social Council infringed her right to respect for private life and that she could not appeal to a court against the psychiatrist's decision to disclose the information. The applicant died in 1996.

Comm found unanimously NV 6(1) and by majority (22–7) no separate issue under 13.

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection, by majority (5–4) NA 6(1) and (8–1) NV 6(1), unanimously NV 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (pc/pd), President, Mr B Walsh (separate opinion), Mr J De Meyer (pd), Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr J Casadevall (pc/pd).

Preliminary objection rejected, the applicant's heir, her son, had sufficient interest to justify the continuation of the examination of the case.

Regarding the applicability of A 6(1) to the disagreement, regard had to be had to whether there was a dispute over a 'right' which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. The dispute had to be genuine and serious; it had to relate not only to the existence of a right but also to its scope and the manner of its exercise; and the outcome of the proceedings had to be directly decisive for the right in question. In addition to the obligation on psychiatrists to report to the Social Council in cases where it was considered intervention was necessary, the psychiatrist enjoyed a very wide discretion in assessing what data would be of importance to the Social Council's investigation. In that regard, the psychiatrist had no duty to hear the applicant's views before transmitting the information to the Social Council. Swedish national law did not recognise a 'right' to prevent communication of such data. Therefore, A 6(1) was not applicable.

A 13 of the Convention guaranteed the availability of a remedy at national level to enforce the substance of the Convention rights and freedoms in whatever form they may happen to be secured in the domestic legal order. In granting appropriate relief, Contracting States were afforded some discretion as to the manner in which they conformed to their obligations under A 13. That provision applied only in respect of grievances under the Convention which were arguable. Whether that was so in the case of the applicant's claim under A8 had to be determined in the light of the particular facts and the nature of the legal issues raised. The Commission had declared the complaint under A 8 inadmissible as being manifestly ill-founded. On the evidence the applicant had no arguable claim in respect of a violation of the Convention. There had therefore been no violation of A 13.

Jan-Åke Andersson v Sweden (1993) 15 EHRR 218 91/42

[Application lodged 16.10.1984; Commission report 15.3.1990; Court Judgment 29.10.1991]

The applicant was charged by police with driving a tractor on a highway. The District Court found him guilty. In his appeal to the Court of Appeal he claimed that the proceedings before the District Court had been 'unbalanced' and that numerous 'interruptions' by the judge had prevented him from following the arguments and from presenting his case in a satisfactory manner, that the fine imposed was too high and that the District Court had overlooked the fact that certain road signs had been missing. He asked the Court of Appeal for a public hearing, for the police inspector to be heard as a witness and for the relevant meteorological records to be examined. In addition, he requested free legal assistance since he needed defence counsel and did not have sufficient means to pay for one. The Court of Appeal rejected the applicant's requests and decided the case on the basis of the case-file, upholding the findings of the District Court. The Supreme Court refused leave to appeal.

Comm by majority (17–2) found V 6(1).

Court by majority (13–7) found NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr J Cremona (d), President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (jd), Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo (jd), Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann (jd), Mr J De Meyer (jd), Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou (jd), Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi (jd).

In order to decide the question of whether there should be a departure from the principle of a hearing, regard had to be had to the nature of the Swedish appeal system, to the scope of the Court of Appeal's powers and to the manner in which the applicant's interests were actually presented and protected before the Court of Appeal, particularly in the light of the nature of the issues to be decided by it. Value attached to the publicity of legal proceedings. However, even where the court of appeal had jurisdiction to review the case both as to facts and as to law, A 6 did not always require a right to a public hearing irrespective of the nature of the issues to be decided. The publicity requirement was one of the means whereby confidence in the courts was maintained. However, there were other considerations, including the right to trial within a reasonable time and the related need for expeditious handling of the courts' case-load, which had to be taken into account in determining the need for a public hearing at stages in the proceedings subsequent to the trial at first instance. Provided a public hearing has been held at first instance, the absence of such a hearing at second or third instance could be justified by the special features of the proceedings at issue. Thus, leave-to-appeal proceedings and proceedings involving only questions of law, as opposed to questions of fact, could comply with the requirements of A 6, although the appellant was not given an opportunity of being heard in person by the appeal court. The applicant had admitted driving a tractor on a highway but claimed that this should not be punished having regard to the circumstances prevailing at the time of the offence. He referred first to the alleged absence of certain road signs, but this argument was rejected by the Court of Appeal on the basis of photographs contained in the case-file. He also invoked the poor weather conditions and this again was a matter on which the District Court had heard evidence but which it had found could not relieve him from his duty as a driver. As to the sentence, the Court noted that he received only a small fine of a fixed amount. His appeal did not therefore raise any questions of fact or law which could not be adequately resolved on the basis of the case-file. Considering also the minor character of the offence with which he was charged and the prohibition against increasing his sentence on appeal, the Court of Appeal could, as a matter of fair trial, properly decide to examine the appeal without the applicant having a right to present his arguments at a public hearing. Having regard to the entirety of the proceedings before the Swedish courts and to the nature of the issues submitted to the Court of Appeal, the Court reached the conclusion that there were special features to justify the decision not to hold a public hearing. There had accordingly been no violation of A 6(1).

Margareta and Roger Andersson v Sweden (1992) 14 EHRR 615 92/1

[Application lodged 13.2.1987; Commission report 3.10.1990; Court Judgment 25.2.1992]

The applicants were mother and son. The son was taken into care and then placed in a foster home to protect his health and development. Restrictions were placed on their contact with each other, including restrictions on communication by phone and letter.

Comm found unanimously V 8 and NV 13 unanimously with regard to Margareta Andersson, by majority (10–2) with regard to Roger Andersson.

Court found by a majority (8–1) V 8, unanimously that it was not necessary to examine A13 with regard to Margareta and by a majority (5–4) NV 13 with regard to Roger Andersson.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (jpd), Mr L-E Pettiti (jpd), Mr A Spielmann (jpd), Mr J De Meyer (jpd), Mr F Bigi, Mr G Lagergren, ad hoc judge (pd).

The mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted a fundamental element of family life and that relationship was not terminated if the child was taken into public care. The restrictions on contact amounted to interferences with respect for family life and correspondence. 'In accordance with the law' required that the measures had a basis in domestic law, that the law should be accessible, sufficiently precise to be foreseeable. A discretionary provision was not inconsistent with this requirement provided it was sufficiently clear to protect against arbitrary interference. The restrictions were covered under s 16 of the Social Services Act 1980; the interference was in accordance with the law. The measures were aimed at protecting heath or morals and the rights and freedoms of children which were legitimate aims under A 8(2). A parent's and child's right to respect for family life also included a right to the taking of measures with a view to their being reunited. In this case their rights to visits were severely restricted and they were prohibited from having any contact by mail or phone from August 1986 to February 1988. Those restrictions had to be supported by strong reasons to be justified. The Government had not shown that it was necessary to deprive the applicants of almost every means of maintaining contact with each other for a period of about one and a half years, it was questionable whether the measures were compatible with the aim of reuniting the applicants. The aggregate of the restrictions was disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued and therefore not necessary in a democratic society.

At the hearing before the Court the applicant did not pursue the claim under A 13 and the Court did not therefore consider it necessary to examine it. During the relevant period the applicants had met on a number of occasions and the mother was not prevented from appealing on her son's behalf against the restrictions on access, there was therefore no violation of A 13.

Non-pecuniary damage (SEK 50,000 to each of the applicants), costs and expenses (SEK 125,000 jointly).

Andreucci v Italy 92/9

[Application lodged 23.5.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

On 18 March 1985 Mr Aldo Andreucci brought an action for damages before the Rome District Court in respect of the injuries caused by an assault on him. The trial hearing was on 22 February 1989. The District Court allowed the applicant's claim and on 14 November 1989 the defendants paid the applicant the amount awarded by the District Court. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 18 March 1985 when the proceedings against the defendants were instituted in the Rome District Court. It ended, at the latest, on 14 November 1989. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case. The investigation took almost 23 months, after which 2 years elapsed before the trial hearing. As regards the first of these periods, the investigating judge failed to carry out with proper diligence his duty of supervising the work of the expert, but the number of witnesses called had to be taken into account, as had the fact that the examination of one of them necessitated a request for evidence to be taken on commission. The second period appeared on the face of it excessive. Contracting States had a duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The period in question would nevertheless seem to be acceptable if viewed in the context of the total duration of the proceedings. Accordingly, the delays were not so substantial as to violate A 6(1).

Andronicou and Constantinou v Cyprus (1998) 25 EHRR 491 97/76

[Application lodged 28.8.1994; Commission report 23.5.1996; Court Judgment 9.10.1997]

Lefteris Andronicou and Elsie Constantinou met in August 1993. They announced their engagement in the local press on 22 December 1993. On 24 December 1993, as a result of an incident, police were called to the flat. Lefteris Andronicou was armed and had taken Elsie hostage in the flat. Negotiations with Lefteris Andronicou, involving family, friends and police all failed. The police devised a rescue plan, which involved adding soporifics to any food ordered, and storming the flat. The rescue resulted in the wounding of one officer by a shot from Lefteris' gun and the deaths of Lefteris and Elsie. A Commission of Inquiry was set up. The applicants, heirs of the deceased, were granted ex gratia legal aid for the purposes of the inquiry. The Attorney General subsequently informed the applicants that, in the light of the findings of the commission of inquiry, no criminal proceedings would be instituted in connection with the deaths. However, he indicated that he would propose to the Government that it make an ex gratia payment of 'full and substantial compensation' to the heirs of the two deceased. No agreement was reached as to the payment.

Comm found by majority (15–3) V 2 and (12–6) NV 6(1).

Court rejected unanimously Government's preliminary objection concerning abuse of process, rejected by majority (7–2) preliminary objection concerning exhaustion of remedies, held by majority (5–4) NV 2 and unanimously NV 6.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr D Gotchev, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr G Pikis, ad hoc judge.

The commission of inquiry was not competent to grant a remedy even though it could make any recommendations or observations in the light of its findings. The conclusions of the commission of inquiry, chaired by the highest judicial appointee in the State, could reasonably be considered to be decisive of the issue of liability. While those conclusions were not binding on a domestic civil court, they were likely in practice to remove any reasonable prospects of success which a civil claim for damages may have offered the applicants. Accordingly, the applicants' decision not to accept the Attorney General's ex gratia offer of legal aid and to institute civil proceedings on the strength of that offer could be considered to have been justified in the circumstances. The preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies was therefore rejected. The applicant's refusal either to enter into or continue negotiations with the authorities on the terms of a friendly settlement over an alleged breach of a right guaranteed under the Convention could not be construed as an abuse of process. The proposed settlement did not involve any admission of the Government's liability for the deaths of the couple as the applicants sought. Accordingly, that preliminary objection also failed.

A 2 is one of the most fundamental provisions of the Convention admitting of no derogation under A 15. It enshrines one of the basic values of the democratic societies making up the Council of Europe and as such, its provisions must be strictly construed. This is particularly true of the exceptions in paragraph 2 which apply not only to intentional deprivation of life but also to situations where it is permitted to use force which may result, as an unintended outcome, in the deprivation of life. However, the use of force must be no more than 'absolutely necessary' for the achievement of one of the purposes defined in sub-paras (a), (b) and (c). The use of the term 'absolutely necessary' in A 2(2) indicates that a stricter and more compelling test of necessity must be employed than that normally applicable when determining whether State action is 'necessary in a democratic society' under paras 2 of A 8–11. In particular, the force used must be strictly proportionate to the achievement of the aims set out in A 2(2). In making its assessment, deprivations of life had to be subject to the most careful scrutiny, particularly where deliberate lethal force was used, taking into consideration not only the actions of the agents of the State who actually administered the force but also all the surrounding circumstances, including such matters as the planning and control of the actions under examination.

The Court's concern was to evaluate whether in the circumstances the planning and control of the rescue operation showed that the authorities had taken appropriate care to ensure that any risk to life had been minimised and that they were not negligent in their choice of action. It was not appropriate to discuss with the benefit of hindsight the merits of alternative tactics. The authorities understood that they were dealing with a young couple and not with hardened criminals or terrorists. They tried to bring the incident to an end through persuasion and dialogue. While there may have been shortcomings as regards, for example, the lack of crowd control or the absence of a dedicated telephone line between the police negotiator and Lefteris Andronicou, nevertheless the negotiations were in general conducted in a manner which could be said to be reasonable in the circumstances. The situation developed in the eyes of the authorities present into a dangerous situation in which critical decisions had to be taken. The decision to use specialist officers in the circumstances at the time was justified. The officers were issued with clear instructions as to when to use their weapons. It had not been shown that the rescue operation was not planned and organised in a way which minimised to the greatest extent possible any risk to the lives of the couple. The officers' use of lethal force in the circumstances was the direct result of Lefteris Andronicou's violent reaction to the storming of the flat. He sought to take the life of the first officer who entered the room and had fired the second shot at Elsie. The use of force by agents of the State in pursuit of one of the aims set out in A 2(2) may be justified where it is based on an honest belief which is perceived, for good reasons, to be valid at the time but subsequently turns out to be mistaken. To hold otherwise would be to impose an unrealistic burden on the State and its law-enforcement personnel in the execution of their duty, perhaps to the detriment of their lives and the lives of others. The Court could not substitute its own assessment of the situation for that of the officers who were required to react in the heat of the moment in what was for them a unique and unprecedented operation to save life. The officers were entitled to open fire for this purpose and to take all measures which they honestly and reasonably believed were necessary to eliminate any risk either to the young woman's life or to their own lives. The use of lethal force in the circumstances, however regrettable it may have been, did not exceed what was 'absolutely necessary' for the purposes of defending the lives of the hostage and of the officers and to effect a lawful arrest within the meaning of A 2(2) and did not amount to a breach by the respondent State of its obligations under A 2.

Whilst A 6(1) guaranteed to litigants an effective right of access to the courts for the determination of their 'civil rights and obligations', it left the State a free choice of the means to be used towards that end. The institution of a legal-aid scheme constituted one of those means but there were others. It was not the Court's function to indicate or stipulate which measures should be taken. All that the Convention required was that an individual should enjoy his effective right of access to the courts in conditions not at variance with A 6(1). The Attorney General's ex gratia offer provided a solution to help overcome the applicants' lack of resources. They had not taken up that offer and it was significant that they had no hesitation in accepting the Government's earlier offer to cover the costs and expenses of the commission of inquiry. In the circumstances, therefore, the applicants could not maintain that they did not have an effective access to a court within the meaning of A 6(1) of the Convention, which provision did not guarantee a litigant a favourable outcome. There had accordingly been no violation of A 6(1).

Angelucci v Italy 91/15

[Application lodged 10.12.1986; Commission report 13.12.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991]

The applicant with others was reported on 5 August 1975 for aggravated criminal association and drug trafficking. On 10 May 1978 he appointed a defence lawyer and was questioned for the first time by the investigating judge on 28 January 1986 following the summons issued by the latter. After the interrogation he was discharged on 16 July 1986. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla.

The period to be taken into consideration began, at the latest, on 10 May 1978, when the applicant appointed defence counsel. It ended, at the earliest, on 16 July 1986, with the pronouncement that there was no case to answer and, at the latest, on 19 July 1986, when the time limit for an appeal by the prosecuting authorities against that pronouncement expired. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The case was of some complexity owing to the number of accused, but there were very long periods of inactivity in the proceedings; the applicant did nothing to slow down the progress. Therefore a lapse of time of at least eight years and two months could not be regarded as reasonable.

Non-pecuniary damages, costs and expenses awarded (30 million ITL total).

Ankerl v Switzerland 96/42

[Application lodged 10.12.1990; Commission report 24.5.1995; Court Judgment 23.10.1996]

Mr Guy Ankerl and his wife moved into a flat which he sublet from a property-management company. In 1987 the landlords went into liquidation and requested termination of the sub-tenancy agreement. In 1988 an action for possession was brought against the applicant alleging that he was occupying the premises unlawfully since his sub-tenancy agreement had been terminated. The Court of First Instance held a hearing on 19 May 1989. Only the witnesses for the claimant were heard on oath; although evidence was heard from the applicant's wife, it could not be heard on oath under Swiss law. Judgment was given against the applicant. He complained of a lack of equality of arms.

Comm by majority (7–6) found NV 6(1) unanimously that it was unnecessary to examine 14+6(1).

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection, found NV 6(1) and unnecessary to examine 14+6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr B Repik, Mr P Kûris.

Regarding the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies (A 26), the purpose was to afford the Contracting States the opportunity of preventing or putting right the violations alleged against them before those allegations were submitted to the Convention institutions. A 26 had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism. In the present case the applicant had given the Federal Court an adequate opportunity to remedy by its own means the situation complained of. The objection was therefore dismissed.

The requirement of 'equality of arms', in the sense of a 'fair balance' between the parties, applied to litigation in which private interests were opposed; in such instances 'equality of arms' implied that each party had to be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present his case and evidence under conditions which did not place him at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent. Although the applicant's wife was not able to give evidence on oath, she was heard by the Court of First Instance. In the exercise of its power freely to assess the evidence the court was entitled not to regard Mrs Ankerl's statements as decisive in regard to the conclusion of an unwritten agreement to enter into a lease. Additionally, it did not appear from the judgment that the court attached any particular weight to the claimant's testimony on account of his having given evidence on oath. The national court also relied on evidence other than just the statements in issue. The Court did not see how the fact of Mrs Ankerl's giving evidence on oath could have influenced the outcome of the proceedings. Accordingly, the difference of treatment in respect of the hearing of the parties' witnesses by the Court of First Instance did not place the applicant at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent. There had not therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

No separate issue arose under A 14 and A6.

Antonakopoulos, Vorstsela and Antonakopoulos v Greece 99/101

[Application lodged 28.2.1997; Court Judgment 14.12.1999]

The applicants were the children and widow of a former Court of Appeal judge. His widow sought an adjustment of his pension for the period June 1992 to December 1995. In July 1996 the Court of Audit allowed the claim in part. The State General Accounting Department did not pay the sums awarded. In July 1996 a new law was enacted preventing the applicants from enforcing the Court of Audit's judgment. The Court of Audit held the new enactment unconstitutional and contrary to A 6 and dismissed an appeal by the State. The applicants had still not received the amounts owing to them.

Court unanimously found V 6(1), P1A1.

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr C Rozakis, Mr L Loucaides, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja.

The enforcement of a court judgment had to be considered as an integral part of the proceedings for the purposes of A 6. If the authorities refused or omitted to enforce judgment or delayed in doing so, the guarantees under A 6 would become purposeless. Furthermore, the principle of the rule of the law and the notion of fair trial precluded any interference by the legislature with the administration of justice designed to influence the judicial outcome of a dispute in which the State was a party. The refusal of the State General Accounting Department to comply with the judgment of the Court of Audit infringed the applicant's right to effective judicial protection.

The judgment of the Court of Audit had given rise to a debt in the applicant's favour and not a contingent right as argued by the Government. The applicant's inability to enforce that judgment amounted to interference with their property right. The new law had upset the fair balance between the protection of a property right and the demands of the general interest. In addition, the State General Accounting Department's refusal to pay the sum owed to the appellants after the Court of Audit had declared the new law unconstitutional was a further interference with the applicants' right to respect for peaceful enjoyment of their possessions.

Antonetto v Italy 00/185

[Application lodged 31.8.1989; Court Judgment 20.7.2000]

Mrs Irma Antonetto owned a house in Turin. In 1964, the city council granted planning permission for the construction of a multi-storey building next to the applicant's house. On 17 October 1967 the Council of State annulled the planning permission. The applicant requested the city council to demolish the parts of the building which had been built in breach. The city council failed to do so. Despite a succession of actions for enforcement, the council failed to comply with the 1967 judgment. In March 1988 a law was enacted which made it possible to remedy breaches of building regulations. On 1 March 1989, the Council of State rejected a fresh application by the applicant on the ground that the issue was then covered by the new law. The applicant complained of the failure to enforce the court judgment.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), V P1A1.

Judges: Mr CL Rozakis, President, Mr AB Baka, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr E Levits, Mr A Kovler.

The possibility of obtaining enforcement of judgment was an essential ingredient of the right to a court. The administration, as a component of the State governed by the rule of law, was under a duty to comply with the decision of the supreme administrative court. The failure to enforce a judgment, like a delay in implementing a judgment, had the effect of depriving the person concerned of the guarantees laid down in A 6 of which he had the benefit during the judicial stage of the proceedings. From 1 August 1973, the date on which Italy recognised the right of individual petition, the failure to enforce the judgment of the Council of State deprived A 6(1) of all practical effect. The enactment of the law of 1988 was of no relevance to the assessment of the violation since that provision affected the applicant's situation only because of the administration's failure to enforce the 1967 judgment.

Although it was not a deprivation or control of assets, the city council's refusal to comply with the decision of the Council of State constituted an interference with the applicant's right to the peaceful enjoyment of her possessions, since the fact that the building remained unaltered deprived her house of part of its value. The interference had no basis in law, even if the entry into force of the 1988 law allowed it to acquire one.

Aquilina v Malta (2000) 29 EHRR 185 99/20

[Application lodged 7.7.1994; Commission report 4.3.1998; Court Judgment 29.4.1999]

Joseph Aquilina, a handyman, had an affair with a 15-year-old girl, whom he subsequently married. He was arrested by the police on 20 July 1992 and detained for interrogation for two days before being brought before a magistrate on 22 July 1992. He was charged with having defiled his girlfriend in a public place (an offence involving sexual acts) and threatened her family. A bail application was made which was notified to the Attorney General and the case adjourned. His release was ordered on 31 July 1992. He was found guilty on 1 March 1993 and sentenced to probation. On 23 July 1992 the applicant made a constitutional application to the First Hall of the Civil Court, arguing that there had been a violation of A 5(3) as the magistrate did not have power to order his release, thus preventing prompt consideration of the issue. His application was successful but on the Attorney General's appeal the Constitutional Court on 13 June 1994 reversed the decision of the First Hall. He complained that he had not been brought promptly before a judge who could examine the reasonableness of his arrest and order his release.

Comm found unanimously V 5(3).

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection and unanimously found V 5(3).

Judges: Mr Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo Bravo, Mr G Bonello (pd A 50), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr R Tümen, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jpd A 50) Mrs V Stráznická, Mr Fischbach (pd A 50), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jpd A 50), Mrs HS Greve (pd A 50), Mr A Baka, Mrs S Botoucharova.

The applicant had raised his A 5(3) arguments before the highest competent judicial authorities. The Government's argument that the applicant should have invoked certain provisions of the criminal code was an argument going directly to the issue of compliance with that provision. Accordingly, the Government's preliminary objection was to be joined to the merits.

A 5(3) provides persons arrested or detained on suspicion of having committed a criminal offence with a guarantee against any arbitrary or unjustified deprivation of liberty. The fact that an arrested person had access to a judicial authority was not sufficient to constitute compliance with the opening part of A 5(3). This provision enjoined the judicial officer before whom the arrested person appeared to review the circumstances militating for or against detention, to decide by reference to legal criteria whether there were reasons to justify detention, and to order release if there were no such reasons. To be in accordance with A 5(3), judicial control had to be prompt. It also had to be automatic, it could not be made to depend on a previous application by the detained person. Such a requirement would change the nature of the safeguard provided for under A 5(3), which was distinct from that in A 5(4), guaranteeing the right to institute proceedings to have the lawfulness of detention reviewed by a court. Prompt judicial review of detention was also an important safeguard against ill-treatment in custody. Judicial officers should themselves hear the detained person before taking the appropriate decision. The applicant's appearance before a magistrate two days after his arrest could be regarded as 'prompt'. The matters which the judicial officer had to examine went beyond just lawfulness; the review to establish whether the deprivation of the individual's liberty was justified, had to be sufficiently wide to encompass the various circumstances militating for or against detention. In this case, the evidence did not disclose that the magistrate had the power to conduct such a review of his or her own motion. Regarding the Government's argument that the applicant could have obtained a wider review by lodging an application under the Criminal Code, compliance with A 5(3) could not be ensured by making an A 5(4) remedy available. The review had to be automatic. It followed that the Government had not substantiated their preliminary objection that the applicant has not exhausted domestic remedies.

The applicant's appearance before the magistrate on 22 July 1992 was not capable of ensuring compliance with A 5(3) as the magistrate had no power to order his release. It followed that there has been a breach of that provision. The question of bail was a distinct and separate issue, which only came into play when the arrest and detention were lawful and did not have to be addressed in this case.

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damages, costs and expenses (MTL 3,000).

[Application lodged 10.9.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

On 22 March 1982 Mr Carlo Arena was involved in a traffic accident as a passenger on a motorcycle. On 20 March 1984 the applicant brought an action for damages in the Rome District Court against the driver of the motorcycle and the insurance company. The investigation opened at a hearing on 12 May 1984. On 12 February 1988 the District Court declared the summons null and void on the ground of a procedural defect. The text of the decision was lodged with the registry on 16 April 1988. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Court found unanimously NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 20 March 1984 when the proceedings against the driver and the insurance company were instituted in the Rome District Court. It ended, at the earliest, on 16 April 1988, when the District Court's judgment became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case. The investigation took a little more than 25 months, after which approximately seventeen and a half months elapsed before the trial hearing. During the first of these periods, expert medical opinion had been requested and the applicant failed to appear at one of the hearings. Although the second period appeared on the face of it excessive, it appeared acceptable if viewed in the context of the total duration of the proceedings, as it must be. In this case the applicant's action had been dismissed on the ground of a procedural defect, he did not take out a new summons. The delays were not so substantial as to violate A 6(1).

[Application lodged 30.4.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mrs Maria Argento was a doctor employed at her local health unit. On 30 November 1985 she commenced proceedings in the Sicily Regional Administrative Court for judicial review of a decision of the health unit assigning her to a permanent post, at a lower level than the one to which she considered herself to be entitled. On 11 December 1985 she asked for a date to be fixed for the hearing. She complained about the length of the proceedings, which were still pending.

In the law of many Contracting States there is a basic distinction between civil servants and employees governed by private law. This has led the Court to hold that disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants are as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the present case, the applicant sought only judicial review of her employer's decision assigning her, at the time when she was recruited to a permanent post, to a staff category lower than the one to which she considered herself to be entitled. The dispute related to her recruitment and her career and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1), accordingly A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

Arslan v Turkey 99/30

[Application lodged 7.1.1994; Commission report 11.12.1997; Court Judgment 8.7.1999]

Ms Günay Arslan was the author of a book entitled 'History in Mourning, 33 bullets', published in December 1989, with a second edition appearing in July 1991. It was accompanied by a preface attributed to Musa Anter, a well-known pro-Kurdish politician and leader writer whose main theme was the Kurdish question in Turkey and who was murdered in 1992. The applicant was charged with disseminating separatist propaganda, convicted and sentenced to imprisonment, with the book's confiscation being ordered. As a result of new legislation the conviction was declared null and void on 3 May 1991. The book was republished on 21 July 1991. Following a number of unsuccessful applications by the prosecutor for seizure, on 28 January 1993 the National Security Court found the applicant guilty under the new legislation of disseminating propaganda against 'the indivisible unity of the State' and sentenced him to one year, eight months' imprisonment and a fine of TRL 41,666,666.

Comm found by majority (30–2) V 10 and no separate issue 10+14.

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection, found V 10 and no separate issue 10+14.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm (jc), Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello (c), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jc), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach (jc), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jc), Mrs HS Greve (jc), Mr A Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mr K Traja, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge.

The purpose of A 35(1) (exhaustion of domestic remedies) was to afford the Contracting States the opportunity of preventing or putting right the violations alleged against them before those allegations were submitted to the Court. That provision had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism; it was sufficient that the applicant should have raised before the national authorities, at least in substance and in compliance with the formal requirements and time limits laid down in domestic law, the complaints he intends to make subsequently in Strasbourg. In the present case, the applicant had argued before the Court of Cassation that his conviction seriously threatened his freedom of expression. The Court deduced from that fact that he submitted to the Turkish Supreme Court, at least in substance, the complaint that he now raised under A 10. The objection accordingly had to be dismissed.

The applicant's conviction following publication of the second edition of his book amounted to an interference with the exercise of his right to freedom of expression. As the conviction was based on Turkish law, the Prevention of Terrorism Act, the resulting interference could be regarded as 'prescribed by law'. Having regard to the sensitivity of the security situation in south-east Turkey and to the need for the authorities to be alert to acts capable of fuelling additional violence, the measures taken against the applicant could be said to have been in furtherance of the protection of national security and territorial integrity and the prevention of disorder and crime. Freedom of expression was one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and for each individual's self-fulfilment. Subject to A 10(2), it was applicable not only to 'information' or 'ideas' that were favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offended, shocked or disturbed. The freedom was subject to exceptions which had to be construed strictly and their need established convincingly. The meaning of 'necessary' within A 10(2) implied the existence of a 'pressing social need'. Contracting States had a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether such a need existed, but it went hand in hand with European supervision. The background to cases had to be considered, particularly problems linked to the prevention of terrorism. The second edition of the book was published shortly after the Gulf War, at a time when, fleeing repression in Iraq, a large number of people of Kurdish origin were thronging at the Turkish border. However, the applicant was a private individual who had made his views public by means of a literary work rather than through the mass media, a fact which limited their potential impact on 'national security', 'public order' and 'territorial integrity' to a substantial degree. Although certain particularly acerbic passages in the book painted an extremely negative picture of the population of Turkish origin and gave the narrative a hostile tone, they did not constitute an incitement to violence, armed resistance or an uprising. The nature and severity of the penalties imposed were factors to be taken into account when assessing whether the interference was proportionate. The applicant's conviction was disproportionate to the aims pursued and accordingly not 'necessary in a democratic society'. There had therefore been a violation of A 10.

Having regard to that conclusion, it was not necessary to examine the complaint under A 14.

Artico v Italy (1981) 3 EHRR 1 80/2

[Application lodged 26.4.1974; Commission report 8.3.1979; Court Judgment 13.5.1980]

Mr Ettore Artico, an accountant by profession, was sentenced by the Verona District Judge to terms of imprisonment and fines for repeated fraud, impersonation and uttering worthless cheques. He appealed against the decisions. His sentence was subsequently re-calculated but an application for compensation for wrongful detention was dismissed by the Court of Cassation on the ground that it had been lodged out of time. The applicant, who had originally been represented by a lawyer of his own choice, requested free legal aid in connection with his applications to quash his convictions. That request was granted and a lawyer was appointed for the purpose. The applicant subsequently complained about the lawyer and sought a replacement lawyer. No replacement was provided.

Comm found unanimously V 6(3)(c).

Court unanimously found the Government were estopped from contesting the admissibility of the application, found V 6(3)(c).

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr G Balladore Pallieri, Mr M Zekia, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr L Liesch, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha.

The preliminary objection of admissibility had not been raised before the Commission and accordingly the Government were estopped from raising the preliminary objection.

The Convention was intended to guarantee not rights that were theoretical or illusory but rights that were practical and effective; that was particularly so of the rights of the defence in view of the prominent place held in a democratic society by the right to a fair trial, from which they derive. A 6(3)(c) spoke of 'assistance' and not of 'nomination'. Mere nomination did not ensure effective assistance since the lawyer appointed for legal aid purposes might die, fall seriously ill, be prevented for a protracted period from acting or shirk his duties. If they were notified of the situation, the authorities had to either replace the lawyer or cause him to fulfil his obligations. In the present case, the applicant did not have the benefit of the lawyer's services at any point of time. From the very outset, the lawyer stated that he was unable to act, he invoked firstly the existence of other commitments and subsequently his state of health. The Court was not called upon to enquire into the relevance of these explanations: the applicant did not receive effective assistance before the Court of Cassation. In this case the interests of justice required the provision of effective assistance, the President of the criminal section had come to the conclusion that there was a genuine need for a lawyer to be nominated for legal aid purposes. The State could not be held responsible for every shortcoming on the part of a lawyer appointed for legal aid purposes but, in the particular circumstances, it was for the competent Italian authorities to take steps to ensure that the applicant enjoyed effectively the right to which they had recognised he was entitled. Compliance with the Convention called for positive action on the part of the authorities by replacing the lawyer or causing him to fulfil his obligations. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(3)(c).

Artner v Austria 92/55

[Application lodged 6.7.1987; Commission report 8.1.1991; Court Judgment 28.8.1992]

On 16 December 1986 the applicant, Mr Josef Artner, was sentenced by the Vienna Regional Court to three years' imprisonment for usury, aggravated fraud, attempted aggravated fraud, embezzlement and aggravated theft. The complainant had been interviewed first by the police and then by the investigating judge. She was not confronted with the applicant, who had disappeared. He was eventually extradited from Germany on 19 June 1986. By the trial date, the complainant had moved and failed to appear at the hearing, and despite an adjournment, efforts to trace her were unsuccessful. At the hearing the complainant's statements to the police and before the investigating judge were read out. The Court found the complainant's evidence credible and having regard to the applicant's eight previous convictions, mostly for theft and a similar fraud, the court refused to accept his version of events. His appeal was unsuccessful.

Although the Regional Court did not hear the complainant she could, for the purposes of A 6(3)(d), be regarded as a witness, a term to be given an autonomous interpretation, because her statements as taken down in writing and then read out at the hearing, were before the court, which took account of them. From June 1983 to June 1986 the applicant's absence made it impossible to organise a confrontation between him and the complainant. The investigating judge had to wait until he was extradited on 19 June 1986 before he could question him. Shortly afterwards the complainant had disappeared. The Regional Court had twice instructed the police to make every effort to find her, even adjourning the hearing in order to allow the inquiries sufficient time to bear fruit, but to no avail. It would have been preferable if she could have testified in court, but her failure to appear did not in itself make it necessary to halt the prosecution. The appropriateness of that course of action fell outside the scope of the Court's review, provided that the authorities had not been negligent in their efforts to find the persons concerned. As it was impossible to secure the complainant's attendance at the hearing, it was open to the national court, subject to the rights of the defence being respected, to have regard to the statements obtained by the police and the investigating judge, in particular in view of the fact that it could consider those statements to be corroborated by other evidence before it. That other evidence included documentary evidence as well as the applicant's criminal record and his conviction in another case of usury on similar facts. The complainant's contested statements were not the only evidence on which the Regional Court based its finding. Accordingly, the fact that it was impossible to examine the complainant at the hearing did not, in the circumstances of the case, infringe the rights of the defence to such an extent that it constituted a breach of A6(1) and 6(3)(d).

Asan Rushiti v Austria 00/92

[Application lodged 5.7.1995; Court Judgment 21.3.2000]

Mr Asan Rushiti was detained on remand on 1 April 1993 on suspicion of attempted murder. On 1 September 1993 he was acquitted by a jury by 7 votes to 1. On 2 September 1993 the applicant filed a compensation claim relating to his detention on remand. On 25 November 1993, the Graz Regional Criminal Court, sitting in camera, dismissed the applicant's compensation claim. The court found that there had been a reasonable suspicion against the applicant, which had not been dissipated. On 15 December 1994 the Graz Court of Appeal, sitting in camera, dismissed the applicant's appeal. The applicant complained about the lack of a public hearing and the lack of any public pronouncement of the decisions in the proceedings relating to his compensation claim for detention on remand. He also complained that the reasoning of the Graz Court of Appeal dismissing his compensation claim on the ground that the suspicion against him had not been dissipated violated the presumption of innocence in A 6(2).

Court found unanimously V 6(1) on account of the lack of a public hearing in the proceedings concerning the applicant's compensation claim for detention on remand and on account of the failure to pronounce the judgments in these proceedings publicly, V 6(2).

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr P Kûris, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

The Court held in Szücs and Werner that A 6(1) applied to the compensation proceedings and that both the lack of a public hearing in these proceedings and the failure to deliver judgments publicly constituted violations of A 6(1). There was no reason to reach a different conclusion in this case.

The Graz Court of Appeal, which was not the court which acquitted the applicant, did not proceed to a new assessment of the applicant's guilt on the basis of the Assize Court file. The Court was not convinced that a voicing of suspicions was acceptable under A 6(2) if those suspicions had already been expressed in the reasons for the acquittal. Once an acquittal had become final, the voicing of any suspicions of guilt, including those expressed in the reasons for the acquittal, was incompatible with the presumption of innocence. In the present case, the Graz Court of Appeal made statements in the compensation proceedings following the applicant's final acquittal which expressed that there was a continuing suspicion against him and, thus, cast doubt on his innocence. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(2).

No causal link between the breaches found and the alleged pecuniary damage. Finding of violation sufficient for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (ATS 61,318.80).

[Application lodged 22.8.1986; Commission report 3.4.1990; Court Judgment 26.4.1991]

On the night of 5/6 July 1985 a dispute broke out between Mr Johann Asch and the woman with whom he lived. She attended hospital and reported the incident to the police. On 10 July she informed the police that she wished to withdraw her complaint as she and the applicant had reconciled. On 7 August 1985 the public prosecutor's office committed the applicant for trial before the Regional Court on charges of intimidation and causing actual bodily harm. At the hearing on 15 November, Mr Asch protested his innocence. The witness refused to give evidence and an officer recounted the statement she had made on 6 July. On 15 November 1985 Mr Asch was convicted of intimidation and causing actual bodily harm and sentenced to a fine. His appeal before the Court of Appeal was unsuccessful.

Comm found by majority (12–5) V 6(1)+6(3)(d).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Sir Vincent Evans (jd), Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt (jd) Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos.

Although the complainant had refused to testify at the hearing she could, for the purposes of A 6(3)(d), be regarded as a witness, a term to be given an autonomous interpretation, because her statements, as taken down in writing by the officer and then related orally by him at the hearing, were before the Court, which took account of them. The admissibility of evidence was primarily a matter for regulation by national law and, as a rule, it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task was to ascertain whether the proceedings considered as a whole, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair. All the evidence should normally be produced in the presence of the accused at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument. That did not mean that the statement of a witness always had to be made in court and in public if it was to be admitted in evidence; that could prove impossible in certain cases. The use of statements in this way, obtained at the pre-trial stage, was not in itself inconsistent with A 6(3)(d) and A 6(1) provided that the rights of the defence had been respected. As a rule, those rights required that the defendant be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him, either when he was making his statements or at a later stage of the proceedings. The applicant had had the opportunity to discuss the complainant's version of events and to put his own, first to the police and later to the court. He had chosen not to question the officer or to call other witnesses. The complainant's statement was not the only item of evidence on which the first-instance court based its decision; it also had regard to the personal assessment made by that officer as a result of his interviews with the complainant and the applicant, to two concurring medical certificates, to the police investigation and to other evidence. The fact that it was impossible to question the complainant at the hearing did not, in the circumstances of the case, violate the rights of the defence; it did not deprive the accused of a fair trial.

Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528 85/6

[Application lodged 26.10.1977; Commission report 12.5.1983; Court Judgment 28.5.1985]

In November 1970, Mr Leonard John Ashingdane was convicted of dangerous driving and offences of unlawful possession of firearms. Medical evidence was submitted to the effect that he was suffering from mental illness and his mental disorder was of a nature or degree which warranted his detention in a psychiatric hospital. He was placed in a secure hospital but in 1978, when his mental condition sufficiently improved, his transfer was authorised to a local psychiatric hospital. As no suitable accommodation for him could be found he remained at the 'special hospital'. He complained under A 5(1) of his prolonged detention in a 'special hospital' after he had been declared fit for transfer and under A 5(4) and 6(1) of his inability to challenge before the courts the lawfulness of the relevant authorities refusal to transfer him.

Comm found by majority NV 5(1), 5(4), 6(1).

Court found unanimously NV 5(4), by majority (6–1) NV 5(1) and NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs Bindschedler-Robert, Mr G Lagergren (c), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans.

There was no reason to doubt the objectivity and reliability of this unanimous medical judgment that the applicant's detention has been justified throughout the relevant period. A5(1) was not concerned with restrictions on liberty of movement but with detention. The conditions under which he was held at the secure and the local hospitals amounted to detention and thus failure to move the applicant was not unlawful in depriving him of his liberty. Failure to move him was not a wrongful continuation of his detention. The differences between the hospitals were not such as to change the character of his deprivation of liberty as a mental patient. His continued detention was not arbitrary or effected for an ulterior purpose. He had had to endure the stricter regime at the special hospital for longer than his mental state required. The problem of transfer from the 'special' hospitals in England and Wales, which lay at the root of the present case, was undoubtedly a serious one for those affected, however, the injustice suffered by the applicant was not a mischief against which A 5(1)(e) protected. Dismissal by domestic courts of the applicant's claimed entitlement to accommodation and treatment in more appropriate conditions of a different category of psychiatric hospital did not fall within the scope of judicial determination of 'lawfulness' that A 5(4) guaranteed.

Even if A 6(1) were applicable, its requirements were not violated. The right of access to the courts was not absolute but may be subject to limitations; these are permitted by implication since the right of access by its very nature called for State regulation which could vary in time and in place according to the needs and resources of the community and of individuals. States also enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation. The applicant's actions against the relevant State authorities were barred by operation of the law which limited the responsibility of those authorities but did not impair the applicant's right of access to the courts.

Assenov and Others v Bulgaria (1999) 28 EHRR 652 98/88

[Application lodged 6.9.1993; Commission report 10.7.1997; Court Judgment 28.10.1998]

The applicants are a family of Bulgarian Roma; Mrs Fidanka Ivanova and Mr Stefan Ivanov and their son Mr Anton Assenov. On 19 September 1992, while gambling in the market square, Mr Anton Assenov (then aged 14) was arrested by an off-duty policeman. His parents arrived and asked for their son's release. Mr Stefan Ivanov, as a way of showing that he would administer any necessary punishment, took a strip of plywood and hit his son. The applicants allege that other officers arrived and hit the boy with truncheons. A dispute ensued between the boy's parents and the police, father and son were handcuffed and taken to the police station where they were detained for approximately two hours before being released without charge. Mr Assenov alleged he had been beaten with a toy pistol and with truncheons and pummelled in the stomach by officers at the police station. Medical evidence showed that both Mr Assenov and his mother suffered bruising which could have been inflicted as alleged. Complaints were filed with the District Directorate of Internal Affairs and the regional military prosecution office requesting the prosecution of the officers. After inquiry it was decided that criminal proceedings would not be opened against the officers. Further complaints by the applicants proved unsuccessful. In January 1995, Mr Assenov was questioned by the prosecuting authorities in connection with an investigation into a series of thefts and robberies. He was arrested on 27 July 1995 and further questioned and charged. Mr Assenov admitted most of the burglaries but denied having committed the robberies. He was detained on remand. He attended identification parades at which he was identified by some victims. A lawyer was present on all occasions. Between 27 July 1995 and 25 March 1996, Mr Assenov was detained at the Shoumen police station. There was a dispute between the parties as regards the conditions of his detention there. The applicant submitted numerous requests for release to the prosecuting authorities which were refused. He was transferred to the juvenile penitentiary on 25 March 1996. In July 1997 Mr Assenov was convicted of four street robberies and sentenced to thirty months' imprisonment. After the applicants lodged their complaint with the Commission two daily newspapers published articles about the case suggesting that Roma activists had pushed the case and misled Amnesty International. The applicants were also questioned about their application by the prosecuting authorities.

Comm found by majority (16–1) NV 3, V 13, unanimously NV 6 in relation to events of September 1992, unanimously NV 5(1) and 3, V 5(3) and V 5(4) in relation to events since 1995 and unanimously that Bulgaria had not complied with its obligations under 25.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found by majority (8–1) NV 3 regarding ill-treatment by the police, unanimously V 3 regarding failure to carry out an effective official investigation of allegations of ill-treatment by the police, unanimously NV 6(1) and 13, by majority (8–1) NV 3 regarding the conditions of his detention from July 1995 onwards, unanimously NV 5(1), unanimously V 5(3) regarding prompt appearance before a judge or other officer, unanimously V 5(3) regarding trial within a reasonable time or release pending trial, unanimously V 5(4), unanimously V 25(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mrs E Palm, Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (pd), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr Gotchev, Mr P Van Dijk, Mr V Toumanov.

Under Bulgarian law it was not possible for a complainant to initiate a criminal prosecution in respect of offences allegedly committed by agents of the State in the performance of their duties. The applicants had made numerous appeals to the prosecuting authorities at all levels. Having exhausted all the possibilities available to him within the criminal justice system, the applicant was not required, in the absence of a criminal prosecution in connection with his complaints, to embark on another attempt to obtain redress by bringing a civil action for damages. Government's preliminary objection regarding non-exhaustion had to be rejected. The Court found no grounds that the present case was brought before the Commission in abuse of the right of petition. Therefore the preliminary objection regarding abuse of process was also rejected.

A 3 enshrined one of the fundamental values of a democratic society, it was prohibited in absolute terms. In respect of a person deprived of his liberty, recourse to physical force which had not been made strictly necessary by his own conduct diminished human dignity and was in principle an infringement of the right in A 3. The degree of bruising found by the doctor on Mr Assenov indicated that the injuries, whether caused by his father or by the police, were sufficiently serious to amount to ill-treatment within A 3. However, on the available evidence, it was impossible to establish whether or not the applicant's injuries were caused by the police as he alleged. Nevertheless, the evidence raised a reasonable suspicion that the injuries may have been caused by the police and where an individual raised an arguable claim that he had been seriously ill-treated by the police or other such agents of the State unlawfully and in breach of A 3, that provision, read in conjunction with the State's general duty under A 1 of the Convention, required by implication that there should be an effective official investigation. That investigation should be capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible. Although the authorities carried out some investigation into the applicant's allegations, that investigation was not sufficiently thorough and effective to meet the requirements of A 3.

Bulgarian law provided the applicant with causes of action which would have enabled him to commence proceedings in the civil courts. Although the applicant argued that the Code of Civil Procedure would have resulted in the stay of any proceedings, that was a matter of speculation as he did not attempt to bring civil proceedings. In those circumstances, it could not be said that he was denied access to a court or deprived of a fair hearing in the determination of his civil rights. There had therefore been no violation of A 6(1).

Where an individual had an arguable claim that he had been ill-treated in breach of A 3, the notion of an effective remedy entailed, in addition to a thorough and effective investigation, effective access for the complainant to the investigatory procedure and the payment of compensation where appropriate. The Court having found that Mr Assenov had an arguable claim that he had been ill-treated by agents of the State and that the domestic investigation of this claim was not sufficiently thorough and effective, it followed that there had also been a violation of A 13.

Events of and following July 1995: the applicants had made numerous requests for Mr Assenov's release to the prosecuting authorities and the District Court. He had satisfied the requirements of A 26 and it followed that the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion must be rejected. Since the Government's preliminary objection concerning an alleged abuse of process was not raised before the Commission at the admissibility stage of the proceedings, the Government was estopped from raising it before the Court. There was no evidence of abuse of process in connection with the complaints in question.

Mr Assenov was detained on remand for a total of almost eleven months at Shoumen police station when he was 17. Apart from the assertions of the parties, no objective evidence relating to the applicant's conditions of detention was presented to the Court. In the circumstances it had not been established that the conditions of Mr Assenov's detention were sufficiently severe as to give rise to a violation of A 3.

The expressions 'lawful' and 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law' in A 5(1) essentially referred to national law and stated the obligation to conform to the substantive and procedural rules thereof; but they required in addition that any deprivation of liberty should be in conformity with the purpose of A 5, which was to prevent persons from being deprived of their liberty in an arbitrary fashion. There was no evidence that the applicant's detention was unlawful under Bulgarian law. Moreover, it was clear that Mr Assenov was detained on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence, as permitted by A 5(1)(c). Therefore there was no violation of A 5(1).

Judicial control of interferences by the executive with the individual's right to liberty was an essential feature of the guarantee embodied in A 5(3). Before an 'officer' could be said to exercise 'judicial power' within the meaning of this provision, he or she had to satisfy certain conditions providing a guarantee to the person detained against any arbitrary or unjustified deprivation of liberty. The 'officer' had to be independent of the executive and the parties. In this respect, objective appearances at the time of the decision on detention were material: if it appeared at that time that the 'officer' may later intervene in subsequent criminal proceedings on behalf of the prosecuting authority, his independence and impartiality may be open to doubt. The 'officer' must hear the individual brought before him in person and review, by reference to legal criteria, whether or not the detention is justified. If it is not so justified, the 'officer' must have the power to make a binding order for the detainee's release. The application for release was not considered by a judge until three months into the detention. That was not sufficiently 'prompt' for the purposes of A 5(3).

The investigator who questioned, formally charged and took the decision to detain Mr Assenov on remand, was not sufficiently independent properly to be described as an 'officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power' within the meaning of A 5(3). He was not heard in person by the prosecutors who approved the investigator's decision and any of the prosecutors could subsequently have acted against the applicant in criminal proceedings, they were not sufficiently independent or impartial for the purposes of A 5(3). There had therefore been a violation of A 5(3) on the ground that the applicant was not brought before an 'officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power'.

The period to be taken into consideration commenced on 27 July 1995 when Mr Assenov was arrested and continued until an unspecified day in July 1997, when he was convicted and sentenced. His pre-trial detention therefore lasted approximately two years. In the circumstances of the case, Mr Assenov having being charged with more burglaries and robberies, some involving violence and shortly before his arrest, the national authorities were not unreasonable in fearing that he might re-offend if released. However, he was a minor and, according to Bulgarian law, should have been detained on remand only in exceptional circumstances. It was, therefore, more than usually important that the authorities displayed special diligence in ensuring that he was brought to trial within a reasonable time. It took two years, but during one of those years virtually no action was taken in connection with the investigation. In that case he was denied a 'trial within a reasonable time', in violation of A 5(3).

Although it was not always necessary that the procedure under A 5(4) be attended by the same guarantees as those required under A 6(1), it had to have a judicial character and provide guarantees appropriate to the kind of deprivation of liberty in question. Detention under A 5(1)(c) required a hearing. In addition, the person detained on remand had to be able to take proceedings at reasonable intervals to challenge the lawfulness of the detention. In view of the assumption under the Convention that such detention was to be of strictly limited duration, periodic review at short intervals was called for. In view in particular of the impossibility for the applicant, during his two years of pre-trial detention, to have the continuing lawfulness of this detention determined by a court on more than one occasion, and the failure of the court to hold an oral hearing on that occasion, there had been a violation of A 5(4).

It was of the utmost importance for the effective system of individual petition that applicants or potential applicants were able to communicate freely with the Convention organs without being subjected to any form of pressure from the authorities to withdraw or modify their complaints. The expression 'any form of pressure' covered not only direct coercion and flagrant acts of intimidation of applicants, but also other improper indirect acts or contacts designed to dissuade or discourage individuals from pursuing a Convention remedy. Mr Assenov was detained on remand at the time of his complaints to the Commission. The applicants were members of a minority group and had been the subject of comment in the press, further contributing to their susceptibility to pressure brought to bear on them. The questioning of Mr and Mrs Ivanov by a representative of the authorities, which led the applicants to deny in a sworn declaration that they had made any application to the Commission amounted to a form of improper pressure in hindrance of the right of individual petition. There had therefore been a breach of A 25(1).

Non-pecuniary damages (BGL 6,000 to first applicant) costs and expenses (GBP 14,860 plus GBP 7,600, less FF 38,087 to all three applicants).

Athanassoglou and Others v Switzerland 00/124

[Application lodged 9.6.1995; Commission report 15.4.1998; Court Judgment 6.4.2000]

The applicants, Mr Andy Athanassoglou, Mrs Ursula Athanassoglou, Mr Martin Schlumpf, Mrs Antoinette Schweickhardt, Mr Claudius Fischer, Mrs Ursula Brunner, Mr Ernst Haeberli, Mrs Helga Haeberli, Mr Pius Bessire, Mrs Katharina Bessire, Mr Hans Vogt-Gloor and Mrs Claudia Rüegsegger lived near a nuclear power plant. On 18 December 1991, the private company which had operated the nuclear power plant since 1971 applied to the Swiss Federal Council for an extension of its operating licence for an indefinite period. A large number of objections were lodged on the grounds that the plant did not meet current safety standards. The Federal Council dismissed all the objections and granted the company a limited operating licence expiring on 31 December 2004. No appeal lay against the decisions of the Federal Council. The applicants complained that they were denied effective access to a court and an effective remedy.

Comm found by majority (15–15 with the casting vote of the Acting President) NV 6(1), (16–14) NV 13.

Court unanimously struck out of the list the complaints of Mrs Ursula Brunner, Mr Ernst Haeberli, Mrs Helga Haeberli and Mr Hans Vogt-Gloor, unanimously found not necessary to rule on the Government's preliminary objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies, by majority (12–5) NA 6(1) and NA 13.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr R Türmen, Mr J-P Costa (d), Mrs F Tulkens (jd), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach (jd), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jd), Mr B Zupancic, Mrs HS Greve, Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste (jd), Mrs S Botoucharova.

The applicants Mrs Ursula Brunner, Mr Ernst Haeberli, Mrs Helga Haeberli and Mr Hans Vogt-Gloor indicated that they did not intend to pursue the proceedings before the Court and their complaints were struck out of the list.

The Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was so closely linked to the substance of the applicants' complaints under A 6(1) that the Court joined it to the merits.

The domestic legislation and the nature of the grievance were the same as in the Balmer-Schafroth and Others case. The rights relied on by the applicants (life, physical integrity, property) were recognised under Swiss law. There was a genuine and serious dispute of a justiciable nature between the applicants and the decision-making authorities as to whether the licence for the operation of the nuclear power plant should be extended. However, for the outcome to be directly decisive for those rights, there had to be a specific and imminent risk. Having regard to the safety reports, there was no material difference between the present case and the Balmer-Schafroth case as regards the personal circumstances of the applicants. They had not suffered any loss, economic or other, for which they intended to seek compensation. The report did not show that they were exposed to a danger that was serious, specific and imminent. Therefore, the connection between the Federal Council's decision and the domestic-law rights invoked by the applicants was too tenuous and remote. The applicants were seeking to derive from A 6(1) a remedy to contest the very principle of the use of nuclear energy, or at the least a means for transferring from the government to the courts the responsibility for taking, on the basis of the technical evidence, the ultimate decision on the operation of individual nuclear power stations. The best way to regulate the use of nuclear power was a policy decision for each Contracting State to take according to its democratic processes. A 6(1) could not be read as dictating any one scheme rather than another. What A 6(1) required was that individuals be granted access to a court whenever they had an arguable claim that there has been an unlawful interference with the exercise of one of their (civil) rights recognised under domestic law. It was not for the Court to examine the hypothetical question whether, if the applicants had been able to demonstrate a serious, specific and imminent danger in their personal regard as a result of the operation of the Beznau II power plant, the Civil Code remedies would have been sufficient to satisfy these requirements of A 6(1), as the Government contended in the context of their preliminary objection. There was therefore no necessity for the Court to rule on the Government's preliminary objection. The outcome of the procedure before the Federal Council was decisive for the general question whether the operating licence of the power plant should be extended, but not for the 'determination' of any 'civil right', such as the rights to life, to physical integrity and of property, which Swiss law conferred on the applicants in their individual capacity. A 6(1) was therefore not applicable in the present case.

A 13 had been consistently interpreted by the Court as requiring a remedy only in respect of grievances which could be regarded as 'arguable' in terms of the Convention. The applicants' complaint under A 13, like that under A 6(1), was directed against the denial under Swiss law of a judicial remedy to challenge the Federal Council's decision. The Court found that the connection between that decision and the domestic-law rights to protection of life, physical integrity and property invoked by the applicants was too tenuous and remote to attract the application of A 6(1). The reasons for that finding also led to the conclusion, on grounds of remoteness, that in relation to the Federal Council's decision as such, no arguable claim of violation of A 2 or A 8 and, consequently, no entitlement to a remedy under A 13 had been made out by the applicants. In sum, A 13 was inapplicable.

Ausiello v Italy (1997) 24 EHRR 568 96/20

[Application lodged 21.2.1992; Commission report 24.5.1995; Court Judgment 21.5.1996]

Mr Pasquale Ausiello was formerly a member of the revenue police. On 24 November 1989 he had served a writ instituting proceedings in the Court of Audit in Rome. He complained that the amount of pension awarded to him two years before had been incorrectly calculated. On 2 January 1991 the Ministry of Finance sent the application to the general command of the revenue police, which communicated it to the Court of Audit on 22 January. The Court of Audit received the applicant's administrative file on 19 October 1991. On 21 September 1995 his applications were dismissed by the Judicial Division on the ground that they were without foundation. The text of the decision was deposited in the registry on 17 January 1996. He complained about the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr I Foighel, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr U Lôhmus.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 24 November 1989, when the writ instituting proceedings in the Court of Audit was served at the Ministry of Finance and ended on 17 January 1996, when the judgment against Mr Ausiello was deposited in the registry. The period to be considered therefore lasted just under six years and two months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. The case had remained dormant from 19 October 1991 to the beginning of 1994 and the Government had not produced any valid explanation for that lengthy delay. There was nothing to suggest that the case was complex. Nearly three months elapsed before the judgment was made public on being deposited in the registry. There was no reason to believe that any steps taken by the applicant to expedite consideration of his case would have had the desired effect. Accordingly there had been a breach of A 6(1).

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage.

[Application lodged 9.1.1987; Commission report 8.3.1989; Court Judgment 22.5.1990]

The applicant was a company specialising in electronics and selling aerials for home use. It applied for permission to show a television programme it had received from a Soviet satellite by a private dish, in order to show the technical capabilities of the equipment and promote sales. The Soviet Embassy did not reply to the request and the Swiss telecommunications authority refused the application in the absence of consent from the broadcasting State.

Neither the legal status of the applicant (limited company) nor the fact that its activities were commercial nor the intrinsic nature of freedom of expression could deprive the applicants of the protection of A 10. The article applied to 'everyone', whether natural or legal persons. It covered not only the content of information but also the means of transmission or reception. The administrative and judicial decisions prevented the applicant receiving transmissions and therefore amounted to an interference by a public authority. It was unnecessary to rule on the third sentence of A 10(1) in the present case. The legal basis of the interference was to be found in the Federal Act 1922 and its Ordinance as well as the International Telecommunications Convention and Radio Regulations. The interference was in pursuance of the legitimate aims of preventing disorder in telecommunications and preventing the disclosure of confidential information. States enjoyed a margin of appreciation but the necessity for restricting rights had to be convincingly established. Later developments could be taken into account: Several other telecommunication satellites broadcasting television programmes had come into service, other States allowed reception of uncoded television broadcasts from satellites without requiring the consent of the authorities of the transmitting country, the broadcasts were intended for public viewing, there was no risk of obtaining secret information from dish aerials receiving broadcasts from telecommunication satellites. For those reasons the interference was not necessary in a democratic society and there had been a breach of A 10.

No damages sought. Costs and expenses (CHF 25,000) awarded.

Averill v United Kingdom 00/157

[Application lodged 24.3.1997; Court Judgment 6.6.2000]

Mr Liam Averill was arrested by police in Northern Ireland shortly after an armed attack in which two people were killed and another wounded. He was taken to barracks and questioned. Access to a solicitor was deferred for 24 hours. He was cautioned that adverse inferences could be drawn from his failure to mention facts later relied on in his defence but he remained silent throughout 37 interviews which took place between 24 and 30 April 1994. He was denied access to legal advice during police interviews. He was also cautioned that adverse inferences could be drawn from any failure to account for a number of fibres found on him. He was charged with the murder, attempted murder and possession of two loaded AKM assault rifles with intent and was tried before a judge sitting without a jury. The prosecution case was based on forensic evidence linking the applicant to a balaclava and gloves found in the car which had been used in the attack. The applicant's case was that he had been working with sheep and had worn black gloves and a rolled up balaclava as protective clothing. On 20 December 1995 he was convicted of the charges. The judge relied on the forensic evidence and the 'very strong adverse inference' which he drew from the applicant's failure to provide explanations during questioning. The applicant's appeal was dismissed by the Court of Appeal of Northern Ireland. He complained that he had been denied a fair hearing on account of the facts that the trial judge drew an adverse inference from his silence when questioned by the police and that he had been refused access to his solicitor during the first 24 hours of his interrogation in custody.

Court found by majority (6–1) NV 6(1) in respect of drawing of adverse inferences from the applicant's silence, NV 6(2), unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(c) as regards the applicant's lack of access to a lawyer during the first 24 hours of his police detention.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr L Loucaides (pc/pd), Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr K Jungwiert, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mrs HS Greve.

The question whether the right to silence was an absolute right had to be answered in the negative. Whether the drawing of adverse inferences from an accused's silence infringed A 6 was a matter to be determined in the light of all the circumstances of the case, having regard to the situations where inferences might be drawn, the weight attached to them by the national courts in their assessment of the evidence and the degree of compulsion inherent in the situation. Since the right to silence, like the privilege against self-incrimination, lay at the heart of the notion of a fair procedure under A 6, particular caution was required before a domestic court could invoke an accused's silence against him. It would be incompatible with the right to silence to base a conviction solely or mainly on the accused's silence or on a refusal to answer questions or to give evidence himself. Nevertheless, the right could not and should not prevent the accused's silence, in situations which clearly called for an explanation from him, being taken into account in assessing the persuasiveness of the evidence adduced by the prosecution. The extent to which adverse inferences could be drawn from an accused's failure to respond to police questioning had to be necessarily limited. There might be reasons why, in a specific case, an innocent person would not be prepared to co-operate with the police. In particular, an innocent person may not wish to make any statement before he had had the opportunity to consult a lawyer. Considerable caution was therefore required when attaching weight to the fact that a person arrested for a serious criminal offence and having been denied access to a lawyer during the first 24 hours of his interrogation, did not provide detailed responses when confronted with incriminating evidence against him. Nor was the need for caution removed simply because an accused was eventually allowed to see his solicitor but continued to refuse to answer questions. The trial judge was not obliged to draw adverse inferences from the applicant's silence; he exercised a discretion and provided detailed reasons for his decision which were scrupulously reviewed and endorsed by the Court of Appeal. The applicant was not convicted solely or mainly on account of his silence. There was a considerable body of forensic evidence against the applicant and his oral testimony did not advance his alibi defence having regard to the fact that the trial judge found him to be a dishonest and unreliable witness and dismissed his witnesses evidence as lies. The decision to draw adverse inferences was only one of the elements upon which the trial judge found that the charges against the applicant had been proved beyond reasonable doubt. In drawing adverse inferences, the trial judge had not exceeded the limits of fairness since he could properly conclude that, when questioned, the applicant could have been expected to provide the police with explanations. The presence of incriminating fibres in the applicant's hair and clothing called for an explanation from him and his failure to provide one allowed the drawing of an adverse inference, all the more so since he did have daily access to his lawyer after the first 24 hours. The applicant was fully apprised of the implications of remaining silent and was therefore aware of the risks which a policy-based defence could entail for him at his trial. There had therefore been no violation of A 6(1) in respect of the adverse inferences drawn at the applicant's trial from his silence during police questioning.

The issue raised by the applicant under A 6(2) was a restatement of his argument under A 6(1) and having found that the latter article had not been breached, the Court considered that for the same reasons there has been no violation of A 6(2).

The scheme permitting the drawing of adverse inferences made it of paramount importance for an accused to have access to a lawyer at the initial stages of police interrogation: An accused was confronted at the beginning of police interrogation with a fundamental dilemma relating to his defence of whether or not to remain silent. The concept of fairness in A 6 required that the accused had the benefit of the assistance of a lawyer at the initial stages of police interrogation. A refusal to allow an accused under caution to consult a lawyer during the first 24 hours of police questioning had to be considered incompatible with the rights guaranteed to him by A 6. In that period, the rights of the defence might be irretrievably prejudiced. The fact that the applicant maintained his silence after he had seen his solicitor could not justify the denial. Nor did the Court's conclusion as to the drawing of adverse inferences from the applicant's silence serve to legitimate the authorities' refusal to provide him with access to a solicitor during the first 24 hours of his interrogation. The trial judge invoked the applicant's silence during the first 24 hours of his detention against him. As a matter of fairness, access to a lawyer should have been guaranteed to the applicant before his interrogation began. The denial of access to his solicitor during the first 24 hours of detention failed to comply with the requirements of A 6(3)(c). There had therefore been a breach of that provision taken in conjunction with A 6(1). Having regard to that conclusion it was not necessary to consider the applicant's complaint concerning the refusal to allow his solicitor to be present during interview.

Finding of a violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (GBP 5,000).

Avis Enterprises v Greece 98/61

[Application lodged 15.11.1995; Commission report 28.10.1997; Court Judgment 30.7.1998]

Avis Hotel, Tourist and Rural Industry Enterprises owned land on the island of Santorini, a popular tourist destination in Greece. On 15 February 1978, the State expropriated some of the applicant's land with a view to installing floodlights for Santorini Airport. The applicant company refused to accept the compensation offered on the ground that it was substantially less than the value of the land that had been expropriated from it. On 6 July 1984 the Court of Appeal assessed the final amount of compensation, the State appealed on 8 March 1985 to the Court of Cassation which upheld the Court of Appeal's judgment regarding compensation. The Court of Cassation dismissed the applicant company's claim for special compensation. On 20 March 1991 the Court of Appeal of the Aegean Sea dismissed the further application as unfounded. On 29 May 1991 compensation was paid to the Bank for Official Deposits. The applicant company, which had not yet accepted that sum, alleges that it was not at any stage advised that it had been deposited. A further appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed on 20 June 1995 and the applicant company ordered to pay the costs. At an earlier hearing there had been a set-off between the parties in respect of costs.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) regarding the fairness and length of the proceedings, V P1A1 regarding reasonable compensation not having been paid within the time by law and the system for 'setting off' costs, and by majority (14–3) no separate issue under 14+P1A1.

Court unanimously found merits could not be considered.

The Court noted that the Greek Government referred the case to it on 7 March 1998 whereas the Commission's report was communicated to the Committee of Ministers on 3 December 1997. The Court noted that the Government's application was received by facsimile transmission at the registry on 7 March 1998 at 10.29 pm and that the version allegedly sent by express Greek post on 23 February 1998 was never received by the registry or any other department of the Council of Europe. The explanations put forward by the Government did not disclose any special circumstance of a nature to suspend the running of time or justify its starting to run afresh. It followed that the application bringing the case before the Court was inadmissible as it was out of time and cognisance could not be taken of the merits.

Axen v Germany (1983) 6 EHRR 195 83/8

[Application lodged 1.9.1977; Commission report 14.12.1981; Court Judgment 8.12.1983]

On 6 August 1950 Mr Karl-Heinz Axen was driving his car when he collided with an unlit lorry trailer which a garage had undertaken to tow to the side of the road. As a result of the accident the applicant's mother, who was a passenger in the car, died of her injuries. The applicant sued the driver and owners of the lorry, the garage and filling-station assistant at different times. The initial hearings at first instance and subsequent appeals were heard in open court and the judgments delivered in open court. The final appeal on points of law was dismissed without a hearing and the applicant informed by letter. The applicant complained that because the Federal Court of Justice had dismissed his appeal without previously holding a public hearing and had not pronounced its judgment publicly there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Comm found by majority (12–3) NV 6(1).

Court held unanimously NV 6(1)

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr W Ganshof van Meersch (c), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr L Liesch, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing.

The public character of proceedings before the judicial bodies referred to in A 6(1) protected litigants against the administration of justice in secret with no public scrutiny; it was also one of the means whereby confidence in the courts, superior and inferior, could be maintained. However, the Federal Court only decided points of law, and, under domestic law, was only required to hear oral argument in public if it intended to reverse the judgment of the lower appeal court. The lower courts, the Regional Court and Court of Appeal had heard the case in public before giving their decisions. The terms used in the second sentence of A 6(1), 'judgment shall be pronounced publicly', might suggest that a reading out aloud of the judgment was required. The Court did not feel bound to adopt a literal interpretation. In each case the form of publicity to be given to the 'judgment' under the domestic law of the respondent State had to be assessed in the light of the special features of the proceedings in question and by reference to the object and purpose of A 6(1). In the present case, the Federal Court of Justice had informed the parties and offered them the opportunity of submitting observations on the possible application of the German Act. It then made final the Court of Appeal's judgment which had been pronounced in open court. In the particular circumstances, the absence of public pronouncement of the Federal Court of Justice's judgment did not contravene the Convention; the object pursued by A 6(1) in this context, namely, to ensure scrutiny of the judiciary by the public with a view to safeguarding the right to a fair trial, was achieved during the course of the proceedings taken as a whole. Therefore, in all the circumstances, taking all the proceedings as a whole, there was no violation of A 6(1) as the Federal Court of Justice was confirming issues that had been litigated in public and an appeal judgment which had previously been pronounced in public.

Aydin v Turkey (1998) 25 EHRR 251 97/71

[Application lodged 21.12.1993; Commission report 7.3.1996; Court Judgment 25.9.1997]

The applicant, Mrs Aydin, was 17 years old at the time of the incident. On 29 June 1993, village guards and a gendarme questioned the family about recent visits to the house by PKK members. The applicant, members of her family and other villagers were taken to the gendarmerie headquarters. She alleged that while detained she was stripped of her clothes, put into a car tyre and spun round and round, beaten and sprayed with cold water from high-pressure jets, blindfolded and raped. The Government challenged the credibility of the applicant's account of the events. The Commission found the facts of treatment as detailed by the applicant.

Comm found by majority (26–1) V 3, (19–8) V 6(1), (19–8) no separate issue under 13 and (25–2) that Turkey had failed to comply with its obligations under 25(1).

Court dismissed by majority (18–3) preliminary objection concerning the exhaustion of domestic remedies and unanimously preliminary objection concerning abuse of process; found by majority (14–7) V 3, (16–5) V 13, (25–1) not necessary to consider 6(1), unanimously NV 25(1) and not necessary to examine 28(1) and 53.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü (jd3, jd13, id), Mr F Matscher (pc/pd, jd3), Mr L-E Pettiti (pc/pd, jd3, jd13), Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer (jd3, jd13, id), Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr A N Loizou, Sir J Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha (jd3, jd13), Mr L Wildhaber, Mr Makarczyk (jd3), Mr D Gothev (jd3, jd13), Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris.

The Court noted that the Government had failed to submit any observations on the question of admissibility and was therefore estopped from raising objections to it. Regarding the issue of abuse of process the Court found that the Government had failed to assert the argument at the admissibility stage of the proceedings before the Commission. The Government's preliminary objections were therefore dismissed.

The establishment and verification of the facts were primarily a matter for the Commission. The Commission had reached its conclusions on the basis of the appropriate evidentiary requirement, namely proof beyond reasonable doubt, and the Court accepted the Commission's findings of facts. A 3 enshrined one of the fundamental values of democratic societies and as such it prohibited in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, it admitted of no exceptions to that fundamental value and no derogation from it was permissible under A 15 even having regard to the imperatives of a public emergency threatening the life of the nation or to any suspicion, however well-founded, that a person may be involved in terrorist or other criminal activities. The distinction in A3 between torture and inhuman treatment or degrading treatment was embodied in the Convention to allow the special stigma of 'torture' to attach only to deliberate inhuman treatment causing very serious and cruel suffering. The accumulation of acts of physical and mental violence inflicted on the applicant and the especially cruel act of rape to which she was subjected amounted to torture in breach of A3. There had therefore been a violation of A 3.

A 13 guaranteed the availability at the national level of a remedy to enforce the substance of the Convention rights and freedoms in whatever form they might happen to be secured in the domestic legal order. Contracting States were afforded some discretion as to the manner in which they conform to their obligations under that provision. The scope of the obligation under A 13 varied depending on the nature of the applicant's complaint under the Convention. Nevertheless, the remedy required by A 13 had to be 'effective' in practice as well as in law, in particular in the sense that its exercise should not be unjustifiably hindered by the acts or omissions of the authorities of the respondent State. Where an individual had an arguable claim that he or she has been tortured by agents of the State, the notion of an 'effective remedy' entailed, in addition to the payment of compensation where appropriate, a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible and including effective access for the complainant to the investigatory procedure. A requirement to proceed to a 'prompt and impartial' investigation whenever there is a reasonable ground to believe that an act of torture has been committed was implicit in the notion of an 'effective remedy' under A13. The requirement of a thorough and effective investigation into an allegation of rape in custody at the hands of a State official also implied that the victim be examined, with all appropriate sensitivity, by medical professionals who were independent and had particular competence in the area. The medical examinations ordered by the public prosecutor could not be said to have fulfilled that requirement. On the facts no thorough and effective investigation was conducted into the applicant's allegations and that failure undermined the effectiveness of any other remedies which may have existed given the centrality of the public prosecutor's role to the system of remedies as a whole, including the pursuit of compensation. There had therefore been a violation of A 13.

It was of the utmost importance for the effective operation of the system of individual petition under A 25 that applicants or potential applicants were able to communicate freely with the Commission without being subjected to any form of pressure from the authorities to withdraw or modify their complaints. The applicant had not adduced any concrete and independent proof of acts of intimidation or harassment calculated to hinder the conduct by her of the proceedings which she brought before the Convention institutions. In the circumstances there was insufficient factual basis to conclude that there had been a breach of A 25(1). Having regard to that conclusion it was unnecessary to examine the applicant's other complaints.

Aytekin v Turkey 98/79

[Application lodged 22.10.1993; Commission report 18.9.1997; Court Judgment 23.9.1998]

The applicant, Mrs Gülten Aytekin, alleged that her husband, Mr Ali Aytekin, a 27 year old building contractor and partner in a construction company, was unlawfully killed by a soldier on 24 April 1993 at a checkpoint outside a gendarmerie headquarters. He had been travelling with colleagues, all of them unarmed. He was shot in the back of the head by a bullet which had entered from the rear of the vehicle. The soldier, a 21 year old conscript on military service, was convicted of manslaughter on 2 October 1997. He claimed that he had fired after the vehicle failed to stop in response to signs, his whistle and a warning shot.

Commission found by majority (29–1) V 2 and no separate issue under 13.

Court unanimously upheld preliminary objection (domestic remedies not exhausted).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr B Repik, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr E Levits, Mr M Voicu.

The Government had informed the Commission that the investigation into the death of the applicant's husband was proceeding without providing any details. The applicant was aware of the state of the proceedings against the Private by the date of the Commission's admissibility decision. She had applied to the Military Tribunal on 10 May 1994 to join the proceedings as a civil party and she had requested the tribunal on the same day to hear evidence of witnesses. The applicant did not appear to have informed the Commission of the true extent of her involvement in the domestic proceedings against the Private. Accordingly the Government could not be considered estopped, as the applicant requested, from raising their objection of non-exhaustion and from relying on the outcome of the criminal proceedings against the accused soldier. The investigation into the killing of the applicant's husband had resulted in the conviction of the Private on a count of unintentional homicide. Despite the applicant's criticism of the conduct of the official investigation and the trial of the gendarme, she had not been deterred from taking an active part in the proceedings. Regarding the possibility of instituting compensation proceedings in respect of the death of her husband, a violation of A 2 could not be remedied exclusively through an award of damages to the relatives of the victim. However, having regard to the measures taken by the authorities to prosecute the Private and his subsequent trial and conviction by an ordinary court on a charge of unintentional homicide, it had to be concluded that the applicant had reasonable prospects of successfully suing the convicted soldier or his superiors in a tort action, including with respect to any alleged deficiency in the way the checkpoint was manned and operated. As an alternative to a civil action in damages, it was open to the applicant to lodge a claim for compensation against the accused soldier when she declared herself a civil party in the proceedings. She had not done so nor explained why she had not done so. Nor had she lodged a compensation claim with the Ministry of Defence relying on the principle of the strict liability of the authorities for the acts of their officials. Her failure to make such a claim within the prescribed time limit had not been explained. Having regard to those considerations and to the particular circumstances of this case, the Court concluded that the applicant had failed to exhaust domestic remedies in respect of her Convention grievances. The Government's preliminary objection was accordingly upheld.

B v Austria (1991) 13 EHRR 20 90/7

[Application lodged 10.1.1986; Commission report 14.13.1988; Court Judgment 28.3.1990]

The applicant, who was an insurance broker and financial consultant, was arrested on 1 July 1980. The investigation was completed on 8 May 1981 and his trial began on 9 November 1981 but following an adjournment on 12 November did not re-open until 15 November 1982. On 16 November he was sentenced to 8 years' imprisonment for professional aggravated fraud offences. He appealed and his sentence was reduced from eight to six years by the Supreme Court on 19 December 1985. He complained of the length of his detention on remand and the duration of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), by majority NV 5(3).

Court found unanimously V 6(1), NV 5(3).

Judges: Mr J Cremona, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mrs E Palm.

The period to be taken into consideration regarding the alleged A 5(3) violation was 2 years 4 months 15 days (1 July 1980 to 16 November 1982). 'Conviction' in A5(1)(a) signified both a finding of guilt and the imposition of a penalty. The word 'after' required both a chronological (detention must follow conviction in time) and causal (detention must result from, follow and depend upon or occur by virtue of conviction) condition. The cause of the continuation of the applicant's detention on remand lay in the conviction: if there had been no conviction he would have been released. A person convicted and detained pending appeal could not be considered to be detained 'for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence'. There are differences between Contracting States on the question of whether a person convicted has started serving his sentence while an appeal is pending and therefore the guarantees of A 5(3) should not be made dependent on any one particular national situation. The persistence of reasonable suspicion that the person arrested committed the offence is a condition sine qua non for the validity of continued detention. However, after a certain lapse of time it was no longer sufficient and the Court had to examine the grounds which persuaded the judicial authorities to decide detention should be continued. The case was complex and the judge had showed diligence, the length of detention was not unreasonable.

Regarding the length of the proceedings (A 6), the period was from the date of arrest, 1 July 1980, to the final decision, five years, five months, 18 days. Although the case was complex, all evidence had been gathered and a decision made, yet the judge did not complete his judgment until 33 months after the pronouncement. Although the judge's workload had been lightened and disciplinary proceedings taken against him, those measures were insufficient and too belated to ensure proceedings were concluded in a reasonable time.

B v France (1993) 16 EHRR 1 92/40

[Application lodged 28.9.1987; Commission report 6.9.1990; Court Judgment 25.3.1992]

The applicant, a French citizen born in 1935 in Algeria, was registered as a male but adopted female behaviour from a very early age. She received treatment and underwent a surgical operation in Morocco in 1972, consisting of the removal of the external genital organs and the creation of a vaginal cavity. The applicant met a man with whom she lived and whom she wished to marry. She brought proceedings, asking the court to find that although registered at birth as a male she was in reality a female and seeking rectification of her birth certificate. The court dismissed her action and her subsequent appeals were also dismissed.

Comm found by majority (17–1) V 8, (15–3) NV 3.

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objections, found by majority (15–6) V 8 and unanimously not necessary to examine 3.

Judges: Mr J Cremona, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (d), Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (d), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt (jd), Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos (d), Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen (jd), Mr AN Loizou (d), Mr JM Morenilla (jd, d), Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka (jd).

The Court recalled its previous case-law and considered that it had jurisdiction to examine the Government's preliminary objections. The Court dismissed the objections of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies and application out of time. The Court noted that the notion of 'respect' in A 8 was not clear-cut. Attitudes had changed, science had progressed and increasing importance was attached to the problem of transsexualism. However, there still remained some uncertainty as to the essential nature of transsexualism and that the legitimacy of surgical intervention in such cases was sometimes questioned. The legal situations which resulted were extremely complex and there was no sufficiently broad consensus between the Member States of the Council of Europe to persuade the Court to reach opposite conclusions to those in its Rees and Cossey judgments. However, there were noticeable differences between France and England with reference to their law and practice on civil status, change of forenames, the use of identity documents, etc. There were factors in the case which distinguished it from the Rees and Cossey cases, such as the inability to change her name and the inconveniences complained of by the applicant regarding documentation, which reached a sufficient degree of seriousness to be taken into account for the purposes of A 8. Even having regard to the State's margin of appreciation, the fair balance which had to be struck between the general interest and the interests of the individual had not been attained, and there had therefore been a violation of A 8. The respondent State had several means to choose from for remedying this state of affairs and it was not the Court's function to indicate which was the most appropriate. The applicant had not repeated her complaints under A 3, and the Court did not consider it necessary to examine the question of its own motion.

B v United Kingdom (1988) 10 EHRR 87 87/15

[Application lodged 26.4.1982; Commission report 4.12.1985; Court Judgment 8.7.1987 (merits), 9.6.1988 (A 50)]

The applicant was brought up by her father and attended a special school for the mentally abnormal until the age of 15. Her child, P, was born on 17 July 1977; she had two more children in 1979 and 1983. She was divorced from the father of P on 26 May 1980. The applicant received social work support and the child was subject to various orders in favour of the local authority, namely a place of safety order, interim orders and a full care order from 5 December 1978. In April 1978, P was placed with foster parents. The applicant had access to the child, although she visited him erratically. On 19 September 1979, the juvenile court rejected an application by the applicant to have the care order discharged, but recommended increased access. At a statutory review meeting on 2 May 1980, the local authority decided to terminate the applicant's access to P forthwith. Subsequent court proceedings by the applicant to have the care order discharged or to obtain restoration of her access to him were unsuccessful.

Comm found by majority (12–2) V 6(1), unanimously V 8 and by majority (12–1) no separate issue under A 13.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), V 8, not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos.

The mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted a fundamental element of family life and the natural family relationship was not terminated by reason of the fact that the child was taken into public care. The Authority's decisions amounted to interferences with the applicant's right to respect for her family life. The applicant did not assert that the Authority's decisions were not 'in accordance with the law' or lacked a legitimate aim. Neither was there any evidence that the measures taken were not designed to achieve a legitimate purpose, namely the protection of health or of the rights and freedoms of others. In reaching decisions in so sensitive an area, local authorities are faced with a task that is extremely difficult. This was accordingly a domain in which there was an even greater call than usual for protection against arbitrary interferences. A 8 contained no explicit procedural requirements, but this was not conclusive of the matter. The Court could have regard to that process to determine whether it had been conducted in a manner that, in all the circumstances, was fair and afforded due respect to the interests protected by A 8. In the Court's view, what therefore had to be determined was whether, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case and notably the serious nature of the decisions to be taken, the parents have been involved in the decision-making process, seen as a whole, to a degree sufficient to provide them with the requisite protection of their interests. If they had not, there would have been a failure to respect their family life and the interference resulting from the decision would not be capable of being regarded as 'necessary' within the meaning of A 8. The procedure of the local authority revealed an insufficient involvement of the applicant in the local authority's decision-making process. In the circumstances and notwithstanding the State's margin of appreciation in the area, there had been a violation of A 8. In view of that conclusion, it was not necessary to examine the remedies available to the applicant.

The existence of a power on the part of the authority to decide questions of access to a child by his parent did not necessarily mean that there were no longer any parental rights. Judicial review and wardship proceedings provided valuable safeguards against exercise by the authority of its discretion in an improper manner but were confined to ensuring that the authority had not acted illegally, unreasonably or unfairly and did not allow for a review of the merits of the decision. There was therefore no possibility of a 'determination' in accordance with the requirements of A 6(1) unless the local authority's decision could be reviewed by a tribunal having jurisdiction to examine the merits of the matter. There was no evidence before the Court that the powers of the English courts were of sufficient scope to satisfy fully this requirement during the currency of the care orders. Accordingly there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Having regard to the decision on A 6(1), it was not necessary to examine the case under A 13 as its requirements were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6(1).

BB v France 98/75

[Application lodged 2.4.1996; Commission report 9.3.1998; Court Judgment 7.9.1998]

Mr B B, a national of the Democratic Republic of Congo, was born in Kinshasa in 1954. He arrived in France in 1983. He was given leave to remain that was successively renewed until 1988. He returned to Zaire in December 1988, but came back to France in December and applied for asylum. In September 1995 he was convicted of drugs and immigration offences and sentenced to two years' imprisonment with an order permanently excluding him from French territory. He was found to be suffering from the Aids virus compounded by Kaposi's syndrome and presented signs of acute immunosuppression. He complained that if he was deported to the former Zaire that would amount to treatment contrary to A 3 as it would reduce his life expectancy because he would not receive the medical treatment his condition demanded. He also argued that his deportation would infringe his right to respect for his family life as guaranteed by A 8 as he would be deprived of the moral support afforded by the presence of his family and friends.

Comm found by majority (29–2) there would be a breach of 3 and no separate issue under 8.

Court unanimously struck the case from the list.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R MacDonald, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr D Gotchev, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Voicu.

There had been no friendly settlement or arrangement in the case. A compulsory residence order made on 9 April 1998 was unilateral in character and issued by the French authorities after the Commission had adopted its report. That order constituted an 'other fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter'. The order reflected the French authorities' intention to allow the applicant to receive the treatment his condition required and to guarantee him, for the time being, the right to remain in France. The risk of a potential violation had therefore ceased, at least until any new factors emerged. The complaint under A8 did not raise any independent issue requiring separate examination. There was no reason of public policy to proceed with the case. Accordingly, it was appropriate to strike the case out of the list with the power reserved to restore it to the list if new circumstances arose justifying such a measure.

Baegen v Netherlands 95/42

[Application lodged 6.4.1990; Commission report 20.10.1994; Court Judgment 27.10.1995]

Mr Wilhelmus Elisabert Baegen was charged with rape on the basis of a statement made by Ms X to the Utrecht municipal police to the effect that she had been raped by two men. She chose to remain anonymous in the subsequent criminal proceedings on the ground that she feared reprisals from the men who had raped her. Before the Regional Court the applicant denied the charge. At no point in the proceedings before the Regional Court did either the applicant or his lawyer request the Regional Court to hear any witnesses. He was convicted of rape and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. In his pleadings on appeal his counsel requested the Court of Appeal to suspend its hearing or else refer the case back to the investigating judge so that Ms X might be subjected to further interrogation. In its judgment of 20 September 1988 the Court of Appeal rejected counsel's submissions, quashed the judgment of the Regional Court for technical reasons, convicted the applicant of rape and sentenced him to twelve months' imprisonment. An appeal on points of law filed by the applicant on 20 September 1988 was rejected by the Supreme Court on 10 October 1989, one month and ten days before the European Court of Human Rights delivered its judgment in the case of Kostovski v NL.

Court struck case out of the list.

Because of the failure of the applicant to come forward despite repeated reminders by the Registrar, further examination of the case was not justified. The Court noted, in addition, the position adopted by the Government and the Commission. Furthermore, the Court observed that in a number of previous cases it had had occasion to express itself on the rights of the defence in cases involving anonymous prosecution witnesses and that another case against the same Contracting State raising related issues was currently before it. In those circumstances it could not be said that there was any reason of public policy for continuing the present proceedings. Accordingly, it was appropriate to strike the case out of the list.

Baggetta v Italy (1987) 10 EHRR 325 87/10

[Application lodged 25.1.1983; Commission report 4.12.1985; Court Judgment 25.6.1987]

Mr Giuseppe Baggetta, the applicant, was arrested on 27 November 1971. After investigation, he was released on 28 January 1972. He was committed for trial on 9 January 1973 on charges of possession of dangerous weapons, criminal damage and arson. Following hearings and appeals the final decision was given by the Court of Cassation on 19 December 1986. That judgment was filed with the registry on 17 February 1987. The applicant complained, inter alia, about the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously rejected the Government's application for case to be struck out and found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr J Gersing.

Application for case to be struck out of the list, on the basis that the applicant was no longer a victim, rejected because the new facts were not of a kind to provide a solution to the matter.

The period to be considered began on 1 August 1973, when the Italian declaration recognising the right of individual petition took effect. The period ended on 19 December 1986, the day on which the Court of Cassation's judgment was given. The period to be considered amounted to more than thirteen years and four months.

The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, taking into account the complexity of the case, conduct of the applicant and of the competent authorities. The case was not complex and the applicant's conduct did not call for any particular comment. The Convention placed the Contracting States under a duty to organise their legal systems so as to enable the courts to comply with the requirements of A 6(1), including that of trial within a 'reasonable time'; nonetheless, a temporary backlog of business does not involve liability on the part of the Contracting States provided that they take, with the requisite promptness, remedial action to deal with an exceptional situation of this kind. However, a period of more than nine years before the judgment of 22 November 1982 could not be justified. The respondent State's endeavours to improve the working conditions of the Calabria courts began only in 1978, roughly seven years after the institution of the proceedings against the applicant, who had been waiting for his case to be set down for trial since 9 January 1973, when the judicial investigation was concluded. Despite the expeditiousness of the Court of Appeal, the proceedings did not end until December 1986.

Baghli v France 99/93

[Application lodged 26.12.1996; Commission report 9.9.1998; Court Judgment 30.11.1999]

Mr Mohamed Baghli, an Algerian national, came to France in 1967, at the age of two. Apart from military service in Algeria between January 1984 and December 1985, he remained in France. All his close family lived in France, including his seven brothers and sisters, who had French nationality. He did his schooling in France and gained an occupational diploma. In 1987 he began a stable relationship with Miss L. In 1990 he was arrested and charged with drug-trafficking offences and following conviction was sentenced to 15 months' imprisonment, of which 12 were suspended, and he was banned from French territory for 10 years. On his appeal, the Lyon court of appeal increased his sentence of imprisonment and upheld the exclusion order. The Court of Cassation dismissed his appeal on 6 September 1993. In December 1992, the applicant started a relationship with Miss I following the death of his previous girlfriend. His appeal against the exclusion order was dismissed. His appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed by a judgment of 19 December 1995. The judgment was not served on the applicant and his lawyer claimed to have received a copy only in September 1996. In May 1994 the applicant had been deported to Algeria after serving his prison sentence. He claimed a violation of A 8.

Court found by majority (5–2) NV 8.

Judges: Mr L Loucaides, President, Mr J-P Costa (jd), Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens (jd), Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja, Mr M Ugrekhelidze.

The six months could not begin to run until there was effective knowledge of the decision. The Government did not deny that the Court of Cassation's judgment of 19 December 1995 had not been served on the applicant but argued that it was his own lack of diligence that prevented him from finding out about it before June 1996. The applicant was in Algeria at the time in trying conditions that in all likelihood made it very difficult for him to obtain information on the outcome of his case in France. In addition, the judgment had not been served on his representative either, even though it was he who had lodged the appeal to the Court of Cassation and the registry of the court had his name and address. For those reasons, in the absence of irrefutable evidence to the contrary from the Government, the preliminary objection of six month limit was dismissed.

There had been an interference with the applicant's private and family life. The interference was provided for by law and pursued the legitimate aim of protection of public health and prevention of disorder. The applicant, who was single and had no children, had not shown that he was in close contact with his family in France and his relationship with Miss I had not started until after the exclusion order had been made and at a time when he must have known that his situation was precarious. Unlike other members of his family, he had kept his Algerian nationality and had shown no desire to become a French national when he was entitled to do so. He had not said that he did not speak Arabic, had done his military service in Algeria and returned there on holiday several times. Thus, he had retained links with his country of birth that went beyond mere nationality. His drug-trafficking offence was a serious breach of public order which endangered the health of others. The authorities were entitled to take a firm line with drug-traffickers. The 10 year exclusion order was not disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 8.

Bahaddar v Netherlands (1998) 26 EHRR 278 98/9

[Application lodged 2.12.1994; Commission report 13.9.1996; Court Judgment 19.2.1998]

Mr Shammsuddin Bahaddar, the applicant, was a Bangladeshi national resident in The Netherlands. He arrived in The Netherlands on 7 July 1990 and applied for refugee status or, in the alternative, a residence permit on humanitarian grounds the basis of his claim being his membership of the illegal organisation Shanti Bahini (Peace Troops), the military wing of the Jana Samhati Samiti (People's Solidarity Association, an organisation seeking autonomy for the inhabitants of the Chittagong Hill Tracts), and to be in danger of persecution on that ground. His application was refused and his appeals were unsuccessful. He claimed that the decision of the Netherlands authorities to expel him to Bangladesh would, if put into effect, expose him to a serious risk of being killed or ill-treated.

Comm found in respect of applicant's expulsion to Bangladesh, unanimously NV 2, by majority (26–5) V 3.

Court found by majority (7–2) that as domestic remedies had not been exhausted it could not consider the merits of the case.

Judges: Mr Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr I Foighel (d), Mr JM Morenilla (d), Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Kûris, Mr P Van Dijk (c), Mr T Pantiru.

The Court noted its previous case-law. Although A 3 was absolute in expulsion cases, as in other cases applicants were not for that reason dispensed from exhausting domestic remedies that were available and effective. Whether there are special circumstances which absolve an applicant from the obligation to comply with such rules will depend on the facts of each case. In applications for refugee status it could be difficult or impossible for the person concerned to supply evidence within a short time. Accordingly, time limits should not be so short, or applied so inflexibly, as to deny an applicant for recognition of refugee status a realistic opportunity to prove his or her claim. However, those considerations did not apply in the present case. The applicant was able to lodge fresh applications to the Netherlands authorities, either for refugee status or for a residence permit on humanitarian grounds, even after the expiry of the time limit. He had not been refused an interim injunction against his expulsion. Consequently he was in no imminent danger of treatment contrary to A 3. It was still open to the applicant to lodge a further such application, and if necessary to apply for an interim measure restraining the respondent Government from expelling him pending the outcome of the ensuing proceedings. It had not been argued that such a remedy would necessarily be ineffective. In those circumstances the applicant failed to exhaust the available domestic remedies before applying to the Commission and accordingly the merits of the case could not be considered.

Balmer-Schafroth and Others v Switzerland (1998) 25 EHRR 598 97/43

[Application lodged 14.6.1993; Commission report 18.4.1996; Court Judgment 26.8.1997]

The applicants lived in the village within a 4–5 kilometre radius from the nuclear power station at Mühleberg, Canton of Berne. On 9 November 1990 the company which had operated the power station since 1971 applied to the government for an extension of its operating licence for an indefinite period and for permission to increase production by 10%. The application was published in the Official Gazette of 4 December 1990 together with a notice inviting persons satisfying the requirements laid down by s 48 of the Federal Administrative Proceedings Act to file an objection. More than 28,000 objections in all were sent, 21,000 of which came from Germany and Austria. On 14 December 1992 the Federal Council dismissed all the objections as being unfounded and, subject to compliance with various specified safeguards, granted an operating licence until 31 December 2002 and authorised a 10% increase in production.

Comm found by majority (16–12) V 6(1) and (27–1) no separate issue under 13.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection that the applicants were not victims and unnecessary to rule on preliminary objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies, found by majority (12–8) NA 6 and NA 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Gölcüklü (jd), Mr L-E Pettiti (jd), Mr B Walsh (jd), Mr C Russo (jd), Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos (jd), Mr I Foighel (d), Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha (jd), Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Jambrek (jd), Mr K Jungwiert, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr E Levits.

Under the Court's case-law, for the purposes of A 25 the word 'victim' meant the person directly affected by the act or omission in issue, the existence of a violation of the Convention being conceivable even in the absence of prejudice, which was relevant only in the context of A 50. The fact that the Federal Council declared admissible the objections the applicants wished to raise before a tribunal justified regarding them as victims. The first preliminary objection must therefore be dismissed. In view of its conclusion on the applicability of A 6(1) the Court did not consider it necessary to decide the issue of exhaustion of remedies.

Under the Court's case-law, for A 6(1) in its 'civil' limb to be applicable, there must be a dispute over a 'right' which can be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. The dispute must be genuine and serious; it may relate not only to the actual existence of a right but also to its scope and the manner of its exercise. The outcome of the proceedings must be directly decisive for the right in question. Mere tenuous connections or remote consequences are not sufficient to bring A 6(1) into play. The applicants had not claimed to have suffered any loss, economic or other, for which they intended to seek compensation. The right on which they relied before the Federal Council was the right to have their physical integrity adequately protected from the risks entailed by the use of nuclear energy. That right was recognised in Swiss law. The dispute was genuine and serious. However, the applicants did not establish a direct link between the operating conditions of the power station which were contested by them and their right to protection of their physical integrity, as they failed to show that the operation of the power station exposed them personally to a danger that was not only serious but also specific and, above all, imminent. In the absence of such a finding, the effects on the population of the measures which the Federal Council could have ordered to be taken in the instant case therefore remained hypothetical. Consequently, neither the dangers nor the remedies were established with a degree of probability that made the outcome of the proceedings directly decisive within the meaning of the Court's case-law for the right relied on by the applicants. In the Court's view, the connection between the Federal Council's decision and the right invoked by the applicants was too tenuous and remote. Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the instant case. In that case, A 13 was also not applicable.

Baranowski v Poland 00/108

[Application lodged 24.5.1994; Commission report 28.5.1998; Court Judgment 28.3.2000]

Mr Janusz Baranowski was arrested on 1 June 1993. He was charged with fraud and detained on remand. The Regional Court prolonged the detention until 31 December 1993 and then until 31 January 1994. After completion of the investigation, the Regional Prosecutor lodged a bill of indictment with the Regional Court. As a result, an appeal which the applicant lodged on 7 January 1994 was treated as a request for release, as the practice was to consider it unnecessary for any decision prolonging detention to be taken once the bill of indictment had been lodged. The Court of Appeal referred the matter back to the Regional Court, which did not examine it. The applicant had notified the prosecutor on 1 February that the order for his detention had expired on 31 January 1994, so that his continued detention had become unlawful and unfounded, but his two requests for release (7 February and 28 March) were rejected on 24 May and confirmed on appeal on 5 July. The applicant complained that his detention on remand, in so far as it had been effected under the bill of indictment and after the expiry of the detention order of 30 December 1993, had not been lawful within the meaning of A 5(1) and of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 5(1) in that the applicant's detention under the bill of indictment had been unlawful, V 5(4) in view of the length of the proceedings relating to the lawfulness of the applicant's detention.

Court found unanimously V 5(1) and V 5(4).

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr R Türmen, Mr B Zupancic, Mr T Pantîru, Mr R Maruste.

The practice of keeping a person in detention under a bill of indictment was not based on any specific legislative provision or case-law, but stemmed from the fact that Polish criminal legislation at the material time lacked clear rules governing the situation of a detainee in court proceedings, after the expiry of the term of his detention fixed in the last detention order made at the investigation stage. The relevant legislation therefore did not satisfy the test of forseeability of a law for the purposes of A 5(1). In addition, the practice whereby a person was detained for an unlimited and unpredictable time and without his detention being based on a concrete legal provision or on any judicial decision was contrary to the principle of legal certainty, a principle which was implied in the Convention and which constituted one of the basic elements of the rule of law. Detention which had not been ordered by a court or by a judge or any other person authorised to exercise judicial power could not be considered 'lawful'. Detention which was prolonged beyond the initial period foreseen in A 5(3) necessitated judicial intervention as a safeguard against arbitrariness. Therefore, the applicant's detention was not lawful within the meaning of A 5(1) and there had been a breach of that provision.

The proceedings relating to the first application for release lasted from 7 February to 5 July 1994, that is, approximately five months. The proceedings relating to the second started on 28 March 1994 and ran concurrently, lasting a little more than three months. The complexity of medical issues involved could be a factor to be taken into account when assessing the compliance with the requirement of 'speediness' laid down in A 5(4). However, that complexity did not absolve the national authorities from their essential obligations. There were rather lengthy intervals between the decisions to take evidence which did not appear to be consistent with 'special diligence' in the conduct of the proceedings. The proceedings were not conducted speedily, as required by A 5(4). As the applicant's appeal of 7 January 1994 was not examined, all the issues concerning the lawfulness of his detention were, in effect, determined by the Court of Appeal in its decision of 5 July 1994 and that decision could be seen as having addressed the arguments made by the applicant in his appeal of 7 January 1994. Therefore, the determination of the lawfulness of the prolongation of the applicant's detention until 31 January 1994 lasted from 7 January to 5 July 1994, that is, nearly six months. Such a long delay, which resulted in the applicant's appeal being of no legal or practical effect, amounted to a denial of the applicant's right to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily and there had been a violation of A 5(4).

Baranoa v Portugal (1991) 13 EHRR 329 87/17

[Application lodged 6.9.1982; Commission report 8.10.1985; Court Judgment 8.7.1987]

Mr Joachim Baranoa, a businessman, learned that he was about to be arrested in 1975 following an attempted coup, and fled to Brazil. He did not return to Portugal until 1978, after the warrant for arrest had been revoked. In his absence his employees had taken over his company, which a court later declared insolvent, and took over other assets. On 31 July 1981 he brought a civil action in the Administrative Court seeking damages from the State, claiming that the arrest warrant was illegal. The applicant complained about the length of proceedings which were still pending at first instance.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

A dispute existed, namely whether the applicant had a right to recover financial compensation for damage flowing from the arrest warrant. He could claim to have a right recognised under Portuguese law as he understood it (the Court further noted that the Administrative Court had given a preliminary decision that the case was admissible). The right to compensation was a private one as it embodied a personal and property interest and was founded on an infringement of rights of this kind, notably the right of property. Accordingly A 6(1) applied. The proceedings had already lasted 6 years and were continuing. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the Court's case-law. The case was of some complexity (the interlocutory appeal raised a difficult question of equality of arms which had been dealt with at 3 levels of jurisdiction over nearly 3 years). The applicant's appeal, although justified, complicated the proceedings to some extent. The fact that domestic legislation allowed State Counsel to seek an extension of time did not exclude the State's responsibility for resultant delays. Neither the complexity of the case nor the applicant's behaviour had any marked influence on the length of the proceedings, which resulted mainly from the way in which the relevant authorities had conducted the case. The reasonable time in A 6(1) had been exceeded.

Pecuniary damage did not flow from failure to hear the case within a reasonable time but from the subject matter of the domestic proceedings, namely the impossibility of resettling in Portugal. Non-pecuniary damage (PTE 500,000). Costs and expenses awarded.

Barbagallo v Italy 92/29

[Application lodged 27.6.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

On 18 November 1980 Mrs Emilia Barbagallo, the applicant, instituted enforcement proceedings against her former husband in order to recover property owing to her. On 11 December 1980 her former husband's wife, Mrs C, lodged an objection on the ground that she was sole owner of the property concerned. The first hearing before the deputy magistrate took place on 15 December 1980. The final decision of the District Court was lodged with the registry on 24 July 1989 and became final on 25 October 1989. She complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 11 December 1980 when Mrs C entered her objection to the enforcement proceedings instituted by the applicant. It ended on 25 October 1989, when the judgment of the District Court became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The case was a simple one although it had come before two first-instance courts. It took the deputy magistrate approximately one and a half years and eight hearings to find that he lacked jurisdiction. The District Court took more than five years to establish that the former husband's summons was not in due form and six years and five months to allow Mrs C's objection. The proceedings remained dormant from 5 June 1984 to 16 October 1985, and then from 16 June 1986 to 20 January 1988. A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The respondent State could not be held responsible for the delays in instituting proceedings (approximately five months) or renewing the summons or the time which elapsed before the judgment became final. However, taking the proceedings as a whole, the lapse of time in the present case could not be regarded as reasonable.

[Application lodged 22.7.1983; Commission report 16.10.1986; Court Judgment 6.12.1988 (merits), 13.6.1989 (JS)]

On 9 May 1977 a Catalan businessman was killed after an explosive device, fixed to his chest with a ransom demand exploded. On 14 October 1980 the three applicants were arrested with other persons and charged with belonging to the terrorist organisation EPOCA (Catalan People's Army), murder, criminal damage and other offences. They were held incommunicado and not allowed to have the assistance of a lawyer. They confessed to the murder of the Catalan businessman, but retracted the confessions before the investigating judge complaining of being subjected to physical and psychological torture while in police custody. They were committed for trial to the Criminal Division of the Audiencia Nacional. Applications for the trial to be transferred from Madrid to Barcelona on account of the needs of the defence and witnesses' travel difficulties were rejected. The applicants were moved from Barcelona to Madrid on the night before the trial, arriving at four o'clock in the morning, when the hearing was due to commence at 10.30 on 12 January 1982. On the same morning the presiding judge had to be substituted because of the sudden illness of his brother-in-law. The trial lasted one day. On 15 January 1982 the applicants were sentenced to imprisonment. They appealed to the Supreme Court. They complained that the change in the membership of the bench without notice, the political persuasion of the substitute presiding judge (insignia on his tie and cuff links) and his hostility and attitude towards the applicants and witnesses during the hearing were factors which made the Audiencia Nacional's impartiality open to doubt. Their appeals were dismissed.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) and by majority (12–0 with one abstention) no need for separate examination of 6(2).

Court rejected Government's preliminary objections, found by majority (10–8) V 6(1) and unanimously NV 6(2).

The Government's preliminary objection that domestic remedies had not been exhausted in respect of the complaint concerning the change of membership of the Audiencia Nacional without notice was rejected on the ground of estoppel and because it was raised out of time. The applicants had not exhausted domestic remedies in respect of their complaints concerning the substitute presiding judge of the Audiencia Nacional and therefore the Government's preliminary objection on that issue was allowed. The Government's preliminary objection that domestic remedies had not been exhausted in that the applicants did not apply to the Audiencia Nacional for an adjournment of the trial was rejected on the grounds of estoppel and raised out of time.

Having regard to the belated transfer of the applicants from Barcelona to Madrid, the unexpected change in the court's membership immediately before the hearing opened, the brevity of the trial and the fact that very important pieces of evidence were not adequately adduced and discussed at the trial in the applicants' presence and under the watchful eye of the public, the proceedings in question, taken as a whole, did not satisfy the requirements of a fair and public hearing. Consequently, there was a violation of A 6(1).

There was no evidence on the facts of the case that there had been a violation of A 6(2).

Barfod v Denmark (1989) 13 EHRR 493 89/2

[Application lodged 22.3.1985; Commission report 16.7.1987; Court Judgment 22.2.1989]

Mr Bjørn Barfod was a precious-stone cutter residing in Greenland. Government new taxation measures were challenged in the High Court where a professional judge sat with two lay judges employed by the Local Government. The High Court unanimously found for the Local Government. The applicant wrote an article on the judgment, expressing his opinion that the two lay judges were disqualified under the Danish Constitution and questioning their ability and power to decide impartially in a case brought against their employer. The applicant was subsequently charged with defamation of character. He was found guilty by the District Court and fined 2,000 Danish Crowns. His appeal to the High Court was unsuccessful and his application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court was rejected.

Comm found by majority (14–1) V 10.

Court found by majority (6–1) NV 10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr B Gomard, ad hoc judge.

The applicant's conviction amounted to an interference by a public authority with his right to freedom of expression. He did not contest that the interference was 'prescribed by law' and that its aims were the protection of the reputation of others and, indirectly, the maintenance of the authority of the judiciary. The sole issue was whether the interference was 'necessary in a democratic society' for achieving the above-mentioned aims. Contracting States had a certain margin of appreciation in assessing the existence and extent of such a necessity, but that margin was subject to a European supervision, embracing both the legislation and the decisions applying it, even those given by an independent court. Proportionality implied that the pursuit of the aims mentioned in A 10(2) had to be weighed against the value of open discussion of topics of public concern. It was important not to discourage members of the public, for fear of criminal or other sanctions, from voicing their opinions on issues of public concern. In this case the interference with the applicant's freedom of expression did not aim at restricting his right to criticise publicly the composition of the High Court, nor could his conviction be considered to have had the result of effectively limiting that right. It was quite possible to question the composition of the High Court without at the same time attacking the two lay judges personally. The High Court's finding that there was no proof of the accusations against the lay judges remained unchallenged; the applicant must accordingly be considered to have based his accusations on the mere fact that the lay judges were employed by the Local Government, the defendant in the tax case. Although that fact may have given rise to a difference of opinion as to whether the court was properly composed, it was not proof of actual bias. The State's legitimate interest in protecting the reputation of the two lay judges was not in conflict with the applicant's interest in being able to participate in free public debate on the question of the structural impartiality of the High Court. The Court did not accept the applicant's argument that, having regard to the political background to the tax case, his accusations against the lay judges should be seen as part of political debate, with its wider limits for legitimate criticism. The lay judges exercised judicial functions. The impugned statement was not a criticism of the reasoning in the judgment, but rather, a defamatory accusation against the lay judges personally, which was likely to lower them in public esteem and was put forward without any supporting evidence. In view of those considerations, the political context in which the tax case was fought could not be regarded as relevant for the question of proportionality. Accordingly there had been no breach of A 10.

Barfuss v Czech Republic 00/199

[Application lodged 5.2.1997; Court Judgment 31.7.2000]

On 19 May 1994 the applicant was arrested and charged with fraud and remanded in detention. His detention was extended on several occasions; his requests for release were rejected. On 7 November 1997 the Regional Court convicted him of fraud and sentenced him to nine years' imprisonment. On 26 March 1998 the High Court upheld that judgment. The applicant complained of the length of his detention on remand.

Court found unanimously V 5(3) and V 6(1).

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mr K Jungwiert, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mr K Traja.

The period of the applicant's detention to be taken into account under A 5(3) lasted from the moment when he was remanded in custody until the delivery of the Regional Court's judgment (19 May 1994 to 7 November 1997), a period of three years, five months, 19 days. There existed a reasonable suspicion that the applicant had committed an offence. On the grounds for continued detention the national courts relied on the complexity of the investigation, the seriousness of the charges and the danger that the proceedings would be obstructed if the applicant were released due to the risk of his absconding. The reasoning of the national courts (that the applicant was charged with a serious offence, that he risked a lengthy prison sentence and that, if he absconded to Germany and obtained German citizenship, his extradition to the Czech Republic for trial would be impossible, he had been convicted in the past, had numerous contacts abroad and was greatly in debt in the Czech Republic) was sufficient and relevant to justify the deprivation of liberty. However, as regards the conduct of the proceedings by the national authorities, there were a number of delays of several months and, having regard to the circumstances of the case as a whole, special diligence was not displayed. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 5(3) as a result of the length of the applicant's detention on remand.

The criminal proceedings against the applicant were brought on 19 May 1994, when he was charged with fraud, and ended on 26 March 1998 when the High Court delivered the final decision. Accordingly, the period to be taken into consideration lasted three years, ten months and seven days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, regard being had to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the applicant's conduct and the conduct of the competent authorities. The case was of some complexity and the applicant had contributed to the length of the proceedings. However, there were delays on the part of the authorities for which the Government had provided no convincing explanation. In these circumstances, the period of three years, ten months and seven days, considering the case as a whole, failed to satisfy the reasonable time requirement and breached A 6(1).

[Application lodged 13.7.1979; Commission report 13.7.1983; Court Judgment 25.3.1985 (merits), 31.1.1986 (JS)]

Dr Barthold, a veterinary surgeon, was director and proprietor of a clinic and a member of the Hamburg Veterinary Surgeons' Council, whose task, among other things, was to ensure that its members complied with their professional obligations. On 24 August 1978, an article in a newspaper complained about the inadequacy of emergency veterinary services. The applicant, who provided a round-the-clock emergency service, had been interviewed for the article, which contained his photograph and details of his practice. The veterinary surgeons' professional body accused the applicant of, inter alia, advertising in breach of the profession's ethics. An injunction was issued against the applicant which was upheld by the Regional Court and the Court of Appeal. A further application to the Constitutional Court was dismissed. The applicant complained that the prohibitory injunctions against him and the rule of professional conduct were contrary to A 10.

Comm found unanimously V 10.

Court found by majority (5–2) V 10, unanimously no jurisdiction to consider 11.

Judges (merits and A 50): Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (d), Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing.

Freedom of expression included freedom to hold opinions and to impart information and ideas, A 10 applied. There had been an interference by public authority with the exercise of the applicant's freedom of expression, namely the interference resulting from the judgment. The legal basis of the interference was provided by domestic laws emanating from parliament and the Rules of Professional Conduct which could be regarded as a 'law' within the meaning of A 10(2). The competence of the Veterinary Surgeons' Council in the sphere of professional conduct derived from the independent rule-making power that the veterinary profession enjoyed by parliamentary delegation in the Federal Republic of Germany. In addition, it was a competence exercised by the Council under the control of the State. The injunctions complained of were 'prescribed by law'. The interference had a legitimate aim. The final injunction was issued in order to prevent the applicant from acquiring a commercial advantage over professional colleagues prepared to conduct themselves in compliance with the rule of professional conduct that required veterinary surgeons to refrain from advertising. Whilst the adjective 'necessary', in A 10(2), was not synonymous with 'indispensable', neither did it have the flexibility of such expressions as 'admissible', 'ordinary', 'useful', 'reasonable' or 'desirable'; rather, it implied a 'pressing social need'. The Contracting States enjoyed a power of appreciation in this respect, but that power of appreciation went hand in hand with a European supervision. The article concerned the absence in Hamburg of a night service operated by the entirety of veterinary surgeons. The newspaper indicated to readers the telephone number of the emergency service where they could obtain the name and address of practitioners available at the weekend. The article was thus pursuing a specific object, that is to say, informing the public about the situation obtaining in Hamburg, at a time when, according to the two practitioners interviewed, the enactment of new legislation on veterinary surgeons was under consideration. The problem discussed in the article was a genuine one. Freedom of expression held a prominent place in a democratic society. The necessity for restricting that freedom for one of the purposes listed in A 10(2) had to be convincingly established. When considered from that viewpoint, the interference complained of went further than the requirements of the legitimate aim pursued. The article had the effect of giving publicity to the applicant's own clinic, thereby providing a source of complaint for his fellow veterinary surgeons, but in the particular circumstances this effect was secondary having regard to the principal content of the article and to the nature of the issue being put to the public at large. The injunction did not achieve a fair balance between the two interests at stake. A strict criterion regarding anti-competition conduct in the area of advertising and publicity in the liberal professions was not consonant with freedom of expression. Its application risked discouraging members of the liberal professions from contributing to public debate on topics affecting the life of the community if there was the slightest likelihood of their utterances being treated as entailing, to some degree, an advertising effect. In addition it was liable to hamper the press in the performance of its task of purveyor of information and public watchdog. The injunctions were not proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued and, accordingly, were not 'necessary in a democratic society' 'for the protection of the rights of others', with the result that they violated A 10.

The complaint under A 11 had been declared inadmissible by the Commission and therefore fell outside the ambit of the case referred to the Court.

Partial friendly settlement therefore A 50 struck out of the list.

Baskaya and Okçuoglu v Turkey 99/35

[Applications lodged 22.2.1994 and 9.6.1994; Commission report 13.1.1998; Court Judgment 8.7.1999]

The first applicant, Mr Fikret Baskaya, was a journalist whose book was published by the second applicant, Mr Mehemet Selim Okçuoglu, the owner of a publishing house. After publication in May 1991, the applicants were charged under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1991 with disseminating propaganda against the indivisibility of the State. They were acquitted by a court which found the book to be an academic work containing no elements of propaganda. The Istanbul National Security Court subsequently found the applicants guilty and sentenced them to two years' imprisonment and a fine of TKL 50 m and to six months' imprisonment and a fine of TRL 50 m respectively. Those sentences were subsequently reduced to one year and eight months' imprisonment and five months' imprisonment respectively and a fine of TRL 41,666,666 each. The applicants' appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed. The first applicant was subsequently dismissed from his post as lecturer at the University of Ankara. On 3 October 1997 the National Security Court granted a request by the prosecution for an order of seizure in respect of the sixth edition of the impugned book.

Comm found unanimously V 10, by majority (31–1) V 6(1), (31–1) NV 7 regarding first applicant and unanimously V 7 regarding second applicant, unanimously not necessary to examine 6 and no separate issue 10+14.

Court found unanimously no jurisdiction to examine the first applicant's complaints under 3 and 14, NV 7 regarding first applicant, V 7 regarding second applicant, V 10 regarding both applicants, rejects Government's preliminary objection concerning the exhaustion of domestic remedies in relation to the applicants' complaint under 6(1), by majority (16–1) V 6(1) regarding independence and impartiality of the Istanbul National Security Court, unanimously not necessary to examine the applicants' further complaints under respectively 6(1 and 2 and 14 taken in conjunction with 10.

Judges: Mr Wildhaber, President (declaration), Mrs E Palm (jc), Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jc), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach (jc), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jc), Mrs HS Greve (jc), Mr AB Baka, Mr K Traja, Mr Gölcüklü (pd).

A 7 embodied, inter alia, the principle that only the law could define a crime and prescribe a penalty and the principle that the criminal law must not be extensively construed to an accused's detriment, for instance by analogy. An offence and the sanctions provided for it had to be clearly defined in the law. That requirement was satisfied where the individual could know from the wording of the relevant provision and, if need be, with the assistance of the courts' interpretation of it, what acts and omissions will make him criminally liable. The Court recognised that in the area under consideration it may be difficult to frame laws with absolute precision and that a certain degree of flexibility may be called for to enable the national courts to assess whether a publication should be considered separatist propaganda against the indivisibility of the State. However clearly drafted a legal provision may be, there was an inevitable element of judicial interpretation. The applicant's conviction did not breach the principle nullum crimen sine lege embodied in A 7. The imposition of a prison sentence on the second applicant was incompatible with the principle nulla poena sine lege embodied in A 7. As regards the first applicant there had been no violation of A 7 with respect to his conviction and sentence. As regards the second applicant, there had been no violation of A 7 on account of his conviction but there had been a violation of A 7 on account of his sentence to a term of imprisonment.

There had been an interference with the applicants' right to freedom of expression on account of their conviction and sentence. The first applicant's conviction and sentence were prescribed by law but the conviction and sentence of the second applicant were not. Having regard to the sensitivity of the security situation in south-east Turkey and to the need for the authorities to be alert to acts capable of fuelling additional violence, the measures taken against the applicants could be said to have been in furtherance of certain of the aims of the protection of national security and territorial integrity and the prevention of disorder and crime. Freedom of expression constituted one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and for each individual's self-fulfilment. It was applicable not only to 'information' or 'ideas' that were favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offended, shocked or disturbed. That freedom was subject to exceptions which had to be construed strictly. 'Necessary', in A 10(2), implied a 'pressing social need'. The Contracting States had a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether such a need existed. There was little scope under A 10(2) for restrictions on political speech or on debate on questions of public interest. In addition, the limits of permissible criticism were wider with regard to the government than in relation to a private citizen, or even a politician. In a democratic system the actions or omissions of the government had to be subject to the close scrutiny not only of the legislative and judicial authorities but also of public opinion. The dominant position which the government occupied made it necessary for it to display restraint in resorting to criminal proceedings, particularly where other means are available for replying to the unjustified attacks and criticisms of its adversaries. Nevertheless it remained open to the State authorities to adopt, in their capacity as guarantors of public order, measures, even of a criminal-law nature, intended to react appropriately and without excess to such remarks. Where such remarks incited violence against an individual or a public official or a sector of the population, the State enjoyed a wider margin of appreciation when examining the need for an interference with freedom of expression. The views expressed in the book could not be said to incite to violence. Although the authorities were concerned about words or deeds which had the potential to exacerbate the security situation in the region, they had not had sufficient regard to the freedom of academic expression and to the public's right to be informed of a different perspective on the situation in south-east Turkey, irrespective of how unpalatable that perspective may be for them. The reasons adduced for convicting and sentencing the applicants, although relevant, could not be considered sufficient to justify the interference with their right to freedom of expression. In addition the penalty had been severe, copies of the book had been seized by the authorities and the first applicant was dismissed from his post as a university professor. The conviction and sentencing of the applicants was disproportionate to the aims pursued and therefore not 'necessary in a democratic society'. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 10.

Regarding A 6(1) the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was rejected, the Court noting that there was no obligation for an applicant to have recourse to remedies which were inadequate or ineffective. The Court recalled its previous case-law where it had noted that, although the status of military judges sitting as members of National Security Courts did provide certain guarantees of independence, some aspects of these judges' status made their independence and impartiality questionable: for example, the fact that they were servicemen who still belonged to the army, which in turn took its orders from the executive; or that they remained subject to military discipline; and the fact that decisions pertaining to their appointment were to a great extent taken by the administrative authorities and the army. There was no reason to reach a different conclusion from those other cases. The applicants' fears as to that court's lack of independence and impartiality could be regarded as objectively justified. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation were not able to dispel those fears since that court did not have full jurisdiction. For those reasons, the Court found that there had been a breach of A 6(1).

Further complaints raised by the applicants before the Commission were not mentioned before the Court, which in the circumstances did not consider it necessary to examine them of its own motion.

[Application lodged 19.7.1989; Commission report 29.6.1993; Court Judgment 24.11.1994]

Mr Pierre Beaumartin and his sisters held shares in a Moroccan company and a French company. Following nationalisation of land by the Moroccan Government, the applicants were awarded compensation in respect of the Moroccan company only under a Protocol between the Moroccan and French Governments making provision for the financial consequences of the nationalisation of French citizens' assets. On 26 September 1980 the applicants challenged the decision in the Paris Administrative Court. On 15 June 1981 the Vice-President of the Administrative Court held that the dispute fell outside that court's jurisdiction and forwarded the application and the file to the Conseil d'Etat. On 3 October 1986 the Conseil d'Etat deferred its decision on the application until the relevant Protocol had been interpreted by the Minister for Foreign Affairs. In a judgment of 27 January 1989 the Conseil d'Etat dismissed the application stating that the interpretation given by the Minister for Foreign Affairs was binding on the Conseil d'Etat.

Comm found by majority (10–5) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1) regarding length of the proceedings and lack of independent 'tribunal' having full jurisdiction.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann, Mr AN Loizou, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk.

The entitlement to compensation was a pecuniary right and consequently a civil one, notwithstanding the origin of the dispute and the fact that the administrative courts had jurisdiction. The expropriation measure and extent of reparation directly affected the applicants' property right, a civil right; the outcome of the dispute, which depended on the interpretation of the treaty, was directly decisive for a right of that nature. A 6 was applicable. The period to be taken into consideration began on 26 September 1980, when the application was filed in the Paris Administrative Court and ended on 27 January 1989 when the Conseil d'Etat delivered its judgment dismissing the appeal; eight years and four months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The applicants had caused some of the delays, the case was a difficult one and the proceedings had stagnated at times, there were delays with the respondent ministry and the court dealing with the case took over five years to hold its first hearing. Nevertheless, a lapse of time of more than eight years could not be regarded as reasonable.

The Conseil d'Etat had referred to a representative of the executive for a solution to the legal problem before it. The applicants were not able to give their opinion on the referral procedure or the wording of the question. The minister's involvement was decisive for the outcome of the case and was not open to challenge by the applicants. The Conseil d'Etat did not have full jurisdiction and nor was it independent of the executive and of the parties, it could not be designated a 'tribunal'. Accordingly there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Beer and Regan v Germany 99/5

[Application lodged 13.9.1995; Commission report 2.12.1997; Court Judgment 18.2.1999]

Mr Karlheinz Beer and Mr Philip Regan worked for foreign companies and were placed at the disposal of the European Space Agency (ESA) to perform services at the European Space Operations Centre in Darmstadt. When their contracts were not renewed they brought proceedings in the Labour Court against the ESA, arguing that, under the German Provision of Labour (Temporary Staff) Act, they had acquired the status of employees of the ESA. The ESA relied on its immunity from jurisdiction. The Labour Court declared the applicants' actions inadmissible. They claimed that they had been denied access to a court.

Comm found by majority (17–15) NV 6(1).

Court found unanimously NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Mr E Klein, ad hoc judge.

A 6(1) embodied the 'right to a court', of which the right of access, that is, the right to institute proceedings before courts in civil matters, constituted only one aspect. The applicants' action had been declared inadmissible. The Labour Court had concentrated on the question of whether or not ESA could validly rely on its immunity from jurisdiction. According to its constituent instrument, ESA enjoyed immunity from jurisdiction and execution. The Labour Court's decision to give effect to the immunity from jurisdiction of ESA could not be regarded as arbitrary. The right of access to the courts secured by A 6(1) was not absolute, but may be subject to limitations; these are permitted by implication since the right of access by its very nature calls for regulation by the State. Contracting States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation, although the final decision as to the observance of the Convention's requirements rested with the Court. The attribution of privileges and immunities to international organisations was an essential means of ensuring the proper functioning of such organisations free from unilateral interference by individual governments. The rule of immunity from jurisdiction, which the German courts applied to ESA in the present case, had a legitimate objective. Where States established international organisations in order to pursue or strengthen their co-operation in certain fields of activities, and where they attributed to those organisations certain competences and accorded them immunities, there might be implications as to the protection of fundamental rights. It would be incompatible with the purpose and object of the Convention if the Contracting States were thereby absolved from their responsibility under the Convention in relation to the field of activity covered by such attribution. The Convention was intended to guarantee not theoretical or illusory rights, but rights that were practical and effective. A material factor in determining whether granting ESA immunity from German jurisdiction was permissible under the Convention was whether the applicants had available to them reasonable alternative means to protect effectively their rights under the Convention. As the applicants argued an employment relationship with ESA, they could and should have had recourse to the ESA Appeals Board which was independent of the Agency and had jurisdiction to hear disputes relating to any explicit or implicit decision taken by the Agency and arising between it and a staff member. It was open to temporary workers to seek redress from the firms that employed them and hired them out. The test of proportionality could not be applied in such a way as to compel an international organisation to submit itself to national litigation in relation to employment conditions prescribed under national labour law. Such a reading of A 6(1) would thwart the proper functioning of international organisations and run counter to the current trend towards extending and strengthening international co-operation. In view of all those circumstances, in giving effect to the immunity from jurisdiction of ESA, the German courts did not exceed their margin of appreciation. Taking into account in particular the alternative means of legal process available to the applicants, it could not be said that the limitation on their access to the German courts with regard to ESA impaired the essence of their 'right to a court' or was disproportionate for the purposes of A 6. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6.

Beïs v Greece (1998) 25 EHRR 335 97/18

[Application lodged 18.3.1993; Commission report 5.12.1995; Court Judgment 20.3.1997]

Konstantinas Beïs was a professor of the law of civil procedure in the University of Athens. In March 1992 the head of the Legal Service of the Greek Chamber of Technology (TEE) instructed the applicant to draw up two expert reports for a fee of GRD 7,500,000. On 22 April 1992 the applicant submitted his reports but the agreed fees were not paid. On 5 October 1992 the applicant made a successful ex parte application to a single judge of the Athens Court of First Instance for an order to pay. Although the order was served on the TEE, they made no payment. The TEE issued payment warrants, but the auditor in charge of the file at the Court of Audit refused to authorise payment. He complained that the fact that there was no means of compelling TEE to pay infringed A6 and P1A1.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), V P1A1 and no separate issue arose under 13.

Court found by majority (8–1) domestic remedies not exhausted.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (d), President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek.

The applicant was the author of a book on civil procedure and a professor of the law and was well placed to assess whether an application for an order to pay was sufficient and appropriate to ensure that he received his remuneration. He had admitted that he could have brought a civil action in the ordinary courts. In the circumstances the applicant had not made use of an adequate and effective remedy such as would have afforded the Greek authorities the opportunity of putting right the alleged violations. Accordingly the objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies was well-founded; it was unnecessary to consider the other matters.

Beldjoudi v France (1992) 14 EHRR 801 92/42

[Application lodged 28.3.1986; Commission report 6.9.1990; Court Judgment 26.3.1992]

Mr Mohand Beldjoudi was an Algerian citizen who had lost his French citizenship as his parents had failed to comply with the relevant legislation. He lived and worked in France and married a French citizen. He was convicted of numerous criminal offences and served periods of imprisonment. A deportation order was made against him on the grounds that his presence in France was a threat to public order. He appealed unsuccessfully. He complained that the deportation order infringed his and his family's right to respect for private and family life, that the probable refusal of the Algerian authorities to issue him with a passport to leave Algeria would amount to inhuman and degrading treatment, discrimination on the grounds of his religious beliefs or ethnic origin, and interference with his A 9 and A 12 rights.

Comm found by majority (12–5) V 8, unanimously NV 3, unanimously NV 14+8 and NV 9, 12.

Court held by majority (7–2) that deportation would result in V 8, by majority (8–1) that not necessary to consider 14+8, 3, 9 and 12.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (s), Mr N Valticos (d), Mr SK Martens (c), Mr R Pekkanen.

The Court noted that enforcement of the deportation order would constitute interference with the applicant's right to respect for family life. The deportation order was based on a provision relating to entry and residence of aliens. The legitimate aim was prevention of disorder and crime. It was for States to maintain public order and control entry, residence and expulsion of aliens, but the decisions of States had to be necessary in a democratic society, that is, justified by a pressing social need and proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The applicant's bad criminal record had to be weighed against other factors. He and his wife had been married for over 20 years but had no children; his periods in prison did not terminate his family life. He had made attempts over the years to regain his French nationality and had been declared by the military authorities to be fit for national service. His close relatives were all resident in France. He had lived in France all his life, over 40 years, and did not seem to have any links with Algeria. There would be great difficulty for his wife to uproot to Algeria, those may include legal obstacles as well as practical difficulties. The deportation could imperil the unity or existence of the marriage. If the decision to deport were effected it would not be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued therefore and would violate A 8. Having reached that conclusion it was not necessary to examine the other complaints.

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (FF 60,000).

In the case 'relating to certain aspects of the laws on the use of languages in education in Belgium' v Belgium (1979–80) 1 EHRR 241 68/1

[Judgment 9.2.1967 (preliminary issues), 23.7.1968 (merits)]

The applicants, who were Belgian parents, complained on their own behalf and on behalf of their children, of whom there were more than 800, that Belgian linguistic legislation relating to education infringed their rights under the Convention. They complained that the law in the Dutch speaking regions in which they lived did not provide any or any adequate French-language education.

Comm found by majority and unanimously V and NV of P1A1, P1A2+14 regarding the various Belgian law and by majority (10–2) NV 8, 8+14.

Court rejected unanimously the Government's preliminary objections, found by majority (8–7) V 14+P1A2 with regard to the Belgian legislation, unanimously NV 8, 14, P1A2.

Judges (preliminary issues): Mr R Cassin, President, Mr A Holmbäck, Mr A Verdross, Mr G Maridakis, Mr E Rodenbourg, Mr A Ross, Mr T Wold, Mr G Balladore Pallieri, Mr H Mosler, Mr M Zekia, Mr A Favre, Sir Humphrey Waldock, Mr S Bilge, Mr G Wiarda, Mr A Mast, ad hoc judge.

Judges (merits): Mr R Cassin, President, Mr A Holmbäck (d), Mr A Verdross, Mr G Maridakis (c/d), Mr E Rodenbourg (d), Mr A Ross (d), Mr T Wold (c/d), Mr G Balladore Pallieri, Mr H Mosler, Mr M Zekia, Mr A Favre, Mr J Cremona, Sir Humphrey Waldock, Mr G Wiarda (d), Mr A Mast (d), ad hoc judge.

The Court rejected unanimously the Government's preliminary submissions, that right to education in one's own language was not included in the Convention and the Protocol, that the applicants did not belong to a national minority within A 14.

In spite of its negative formulation, the first sentence of P1A2 used the term 'right' and spoke of a 'right to education'. Likewise the preamble to the Protocol specified that the object of the Protocol lay in the collective enforcement of 'rights and freedoms'. There was therefore no doubt that P1A2 enshrined a right. It could not be concluded that the State had no positive obligation to ensure respect for such a right as was protected by P1A2. As a 'right' existed, it was secured, by virtue of A1 of the Convention, to everyone within the jurisdiction of a Contracting State. P1A2 did not specify the language in which education must be conducted in order that the right to education should be respected. However, the right to education would be meaningless if it did not imply in favour of its beneficiaries, the right to be educated in the national language or in one of the national languages, as the case might be. The right to education guaranteed by the first sentence of P1A2 called for regulation by the State. The second sentence of P1A2 did not guarantee a right to education. There was no provision in the area of education that parents' linguistic preferences should be respected, only their religious and philosophical convictions. Neither did A 8 guarantee either a right to education or a personal right of parents relating to the education of their children: its object was essentially that of protecting the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities in his private family life. A 14 did not forbid every difference in treatment in the exercise of the rights and freedoms recognised. The principle of equality of treatment was violated if the distinction had no objective and reasonable justification. The existence of such a justification had to be assessed in relation to the aim and effects of the measure under consideration, regard being had to the principles which normally prevailed in democratic societies. A difference of treatment in the exercise of a right laid down in the Convention had not only to pursue a legitimate aim, A 14 required a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. A 14 in conjunction with P1A2 did not have the effect of guaranteeing to a child or to his parent the right to obtain instruction in a language of his choice. The object was more limited: it was to ensure that the right to education should be secured by each Contracting Party to everyone within its jurisdiction without discrimination on the ground, for instance, of language. To interpret the two provisions as conferring on everyone within the jurisdiction of a State a right to obtain education in the language of his own choice would lead to absurd results, for it would be open to anyone to claim any language of instruction in any of the territories of the Contracting Parties.

After considering the particular questions referred to it the Court concluded that s 7(3) of the Belgian Act of 2 August 1963 did not comply with the requirements of A 14 read in conjunction with the first sentence of P1A2 in so far as it prevented certain children, solely on the basis of the residence of their parents, from having access to the French-language schools existing in the six communes on the periphery of Brussels invested with a special status. The Court also concluded that with regard to the other points at issue there was no breach of any of the Articles of the Convention (8, 14) and the Protocol (P1A2) invoked by the applicants.

Belilos v Switzerland (1988) 10 EHRR 466 88/4

[Application lodged 24.3.1983; Commission report 7.5.1986; Court Judgment 29.4.1988]

Mrs Marlène Belilos, a student, was reported by the Lausanne police for taking part in a demonstration for which permission had not been sought in advance. The municipal Police Board fined her 200 Swiss francs (CHF) in her absence. Following application the Board allowed the applicant a further hearing and also heard evidence from her former husband as a witness. She denied having taken part in the demonstration and her ex-husband provided evidence of alibi. The Board was satisfied that the applicant had participated in the demonstration but concluded that she had not played an active role and reduced the fine to 120 CHF and costs. Her appeals to the Criminal Cassation Division of the Vaud Cantonal Court and the Federal Court were dismissed. She complained that she had not been tried by an independent and impartial tribunal with full jurisdiction to determine questions both of law and of fact.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (c), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (c) , Mr N Valticos.

The Court rejected the Government's preliminary objection noting that the declaration on the reservations on which they relied did not satisfy two of the requirements of A 64, and therefore had to be held to be invalid. Switzerland regarded itself as bound by the Convention irrespective of the validity of the declaration. Moreover, the Swiss Government recognised the Court's competence to determine the latter issue, which they argued before it. The Government's preliminary objection therefore had to be rejected.

The offence of which the applicant was accused was a 'criminal' one. A 'tribunal' was characterised in the substantive sense of the term by its judicial function, that is to say determining matters within its competence on the basis of rules of law and after proceedings conducted in a prescribed manner. It also had to satisfy a series of further requirements – independence, in particular of the executive; impartiality; duration of its members' terms of office; guarantees afforded by its procedure – several of which appeared in the text of A 6(1). The Police Board was a 'municipal authority', the Federal Court in its judgment mentioned 'administrative authorities'. Even if the terms were not decisive, they provided an important indication as to the nature of the body in question. The Police Board had been given a judicial function, its single member was appointed by the municipality, but that was not sufficient to cast doubt on the independence and impartiality of the person concerned, especially as in many Contracting States it was the executive which appointed judges. The appointed member, a lawyer from police headquarters, was a municipal civil servant but sat in a personal capacity and was not subject to orders in the exercise of his powers, he took a different oath from the one taken by policemen, although the requirement of independence did not appear in the text of it; in principle he could not be dismissed during his term of office, which lasted four years. Moreover, his personal impartiality had not been called into question in the instant case. Nonetheless, a number of considerations relating to the functions exercised and to internal organisation were relevant. In Lausanne the member of the Police Board was a senior civil servant whom citizens would tend to see as a member of the police force subordinate to his superiors and loyal to his colleagues. A situation of that kind could undermine the confidence which must be inspired by the courts in a democratic society. Therefore, the applicant could legitimately have doubts as to the independence and organisational impartiality of the Police Board, which accordingly did not satisfy the requirements of A 6(1). The Court recalled its previous case-law in which it had stated that conferring the prosecution and punishment of minor offences on administrative authorities was not inconsistent with the Convention, provided that the person concerned was able to take any decision made against him before a tribunal that offered the guarantees of A 6. In this case neither the jurisdiction of the Criminal Cassation Division of the Vaud Cantonal Court nor that of the Federal Court was sufficient for the purposes of A 6. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Bellet v France 95/53

[Application lodged 24.3.1994; Commission report 19.1.1995; Court Judgment 4.12.1995]

Mr Daniel Bellet was a haemophiliac requiring frequent blood transfusions. On 26 October 1983 he was diagnosed as having been infected with HIV. On 19 May 1990 he applied to the Paris Administrative Court for damages from the State on account of his infection. The court dismissed his action on the ground that he had been shown to be HIV-positive outside the period of the State's liability for negligent failure to act, which began on 12 March 1985, when the ministerial authorities were fully apprised that the blood products prepared from groups of donors in Paris were dangerous. He appealed to the civil courts and to the Compensation Fund. The Court of Appeal held his subsequent appeal inadmissible. He complained that he had not had access to a court, for the purposes of asserting his right to compensation.

Comm found by majority (24–2) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (8–1) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh (c), Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr R Pekkanen (c), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek (c).

The Court referred to its previous case-law on the principle of the right of access to a court. The right of access to the courts was not absolute but may be subject to limitations as the right called for regulation by the State. States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in that regulation. The limitation would not be compatible with A 6(1) if it did not pursue a legitimate aim and if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved.' It was not for the Court to assess France's compensation system. While the Court was not empowered to substitute its own assessment for that of the national authorities as regards the application of domestic law, it was its duty to rule at last instance on compliance with the requirements of the Convention. For the right of access to be effective, an individual had to have a clear, practical opportunity to challenge an act that was an interference with his rights. In the present case the applicant could reasonably believe that he was entitled to begin or continue actions in parallel with his application to the Compensation Fund, even after accepting the Fund's offer. Having regard to the legislation, the system was not sufficiently clear or sufficiently attended by safeguards to prevent a misunderstanding as to the procedures for making use of the available remedies and the restrictions stemming from the simultaneous use of them. The applicant did not have a practical, effective right of access to the courts in the proceedings before the Paris Court of Appeal. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 2.5.1996; Court Judgment 30.5.2000]

The applicant company was the owner of the Belvedere Hotel at Monte Argentario and also owned 1,375 square metres of land that gave patrons of the hotel direct access to the sea. On 19 May 1987 the Monte Argentario Municipality passed a resolution approving a road-building scheme which would pass over the applicant company's land. On 25 May 1987 the Mayor of Monte Argentario issued an order, under an expedited procedure, for the possession of the applicant company's land. The applicant company appealed to the Tuscany Regional Administrative Court which on 2 December 1987 allowed the appeal. The Municipality took no action to reinstate and return the land. The applicant company's enforcement proceedings were dismissed on 26 June 1991 by the Administrative Court on the ground that the judgment of 2 December 1987 could not be enforced as there had been a constructive expropriation. By the constructive-expropriation rule, where the authorities took possession of land under an expedited procedure and performed building work on it in the public interest, the land could not be returned to the applicant; the land became the property of the Municipality following completion of the road-building works, and the fact that the authorities had completed the works meant that title to the land had been transferred. Consequently, restitution was impossible but the applicant company was entitled to claim damages in the civil courts. The applicant company's appeal to the Consiglio di Stato was dismissed on 7 February 1996. The applicant company complained that it had become impossible for it to recover its land as a result of the constructive-expropriation rule, which had been applied despite the Tuscany Administrative Court's decision to quash the building scheme and that the possession order was unlawful and not in the public interest.

Court found unanimously V P1A1.

Judges: Mr CL Rozakis (c), President, Mr Ab Baka (jc), Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello (c), Mrs V Strásnická, Mr P Lorenzen (c), Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska.

There had been a deprivation of possessions. By applying the constructive-expropriation rule, the Consiglio di Stato deprived the applicant company of the possibility of obtaining restitution of its land. The effect of the judgment was to deprive the applicant company of its possessions within the meaning of the second sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. In order to be compatible with the general rule set forth in the first sentence of the first paragraph of A 1, such an interference had to be in the public interest, subject to the conditions provided by law and by the general principles of international law and had to strike a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. Furthermore, the issue of whether a fair balance has been struck became relevant only once it has been established that the interference in question satisfied the requirement of lawfulness and was not arbitrary. The first and most important requirement of P1A1 was that any interference by a public authority with the peaceful enjoyment of possessions should be lawful. The requirement of lawfulness meant that rules of domestic law had to be sufficiently accessible, precise and foreseeable. The case-law on constructive expropriations had evolved in a way that had led to the rule being applied inconsistently, a factor which could result in unforeseeable or arbitrary outcomes and deprive litigants of effective protection of their rights and was, as a consequence, inconsistent with the requirement of lawfulness. Under the rule established by the Court of Cassation every constructive expropriation followed the unlawful taking of possession of the land. The Court had reservations as to the compatibility with the requirement of lawfulness of a mechanism which, generally, enabled the authorities to benefit from an unlawful situation in which the landowner was presented with a fait accompli. In the present case, on 2 December 1987 the Tuscany Administrative Court quashed with retrospective effect the resolution passed by the authorities as being unlawful and not in the public interest. However, that finding did not result in restitution of the land, since the Consiglio di Stato held that the transfer of property to the authorities had become irreversible. The interference in question was not compatible with P1A1. It was therefore unnecessary to examine whether a fair balance was struck between the requirements of the general interest of the community and the need to protect individual rights. Consequently, there had been a violation of P1A1.

Belzuik v Poland 98/17

[Application lodged 31.5.1993; Commission report 26.2.1997; Court Judgment 25.3.1998]

Mr Antoni Belzuik was arrested on 31 May 1992 on suspicion of having attempted to steal a car and was remanded in custody. Following a trial in Tarnów District Court at which the applicant was present, he was convicted on 25 November 1992 and sentenced to three years' imprisonment. The applicant appealed. On 21 April 1993 the Regional Court refused the applicant's request to be brought before it, considering that his presence was unnecessary, since he had already given a detailed account of the events at his trial before the District Court. In addition, in his written statement of appeal he had set out at length his complaints in respect of the contested conviction. The Regional Court further considered that the applicant had sufficient time to submit further observations in writing, if he wished to do so. On 10 May 1993, after a hearing at which the public prosecutor, but not the applicant, was present, the Regional Court dismissed the applicant's appeal. The applicant complained of lack of fair trial.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1)+(3)(c).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found V 6(1)+(3)(c).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Jambrek, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr J Casadevall.

Poland had accepted the Court's jurisdiction from 1 May 1993. The central fact giving rise to the applicant's complaint in the case was not the decision of the Tarnów Regional Court of 21 April 1993, but the appeal hearing of 10 May 1993 at which the public prosecutor and not the applicant was present. Accordingly, this preliminary objection must be dismissed. The rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies in A 26 obliged applicants to use first the remedies provided by the national legal system. The applicant's complaint related to the refusal of the Regional Court to grant his request to be present at his appeal hearing and to defend himself in person. In those circumstances he had exhausted available and sufficient remedies. The Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies was therefore dismissed.

The Court recalled its previous case-law. The protection afforded to criminal proceedings by A 6 did not cease with the decision at first instance. A State was required to ensure the guarantees were also enjoyed before courts of appeal. A person charged with a criminal offence should be entitled to be present at the first-instance trial hearing. However, the personal attendance of the defendant did not necessarily take on the same significance for an appeal hearing. Even where an appellate court had full jurisdiction to review the case on both fact and law, A 6 did not always entail rights to a public hearing and to be present in person. Regard had to be had, inter alia, to the special features of the proceedings involved and the manner in which the defence's interests are presented and protected before the appellate court, particularly in the light of the issues to be decided by it and their importance for the appellant. The principle of equality of arms was only one feature of the wider concept of a fair trial, which also included the fundamental right that criminal proceedings should be adversarial, meaning that both prosecution and defence had to be given the opportunity to have knowledge of and comment on the observations filed and the evidence adduced by the other party. The Tarnów Regional Court was empowered to consider questions of both fact and law. The applicant, who was not allowed to be present at the hearing on his appeal, intended to contest his conviction and to adduce evidence in support thereof. The issues to be determined by the Tarnów Regional Court when adjudicating on the appeal could not properly have been examined without a direct assessment of the evidence given by the applicant in person. The applicant's interests were not represented at the appeal, it was immaterial that he had chosen not to be legally represented. Under A 6(1) and 3(c) he had the right to be present at his appeal and to defend himself in person. The public prosecutor was present at the appellate hearing as a traditional prosecutor. Respect for the principle of equality of arms and the right to adversarial proceedings required that the applicant be allowed to attend the hearing and to contest the submissions of the public prosecutor. Nor could the resulting inequality have been redressed by the applicant presenting written submissions to the Regional Court, having regard both to the presence of the public prosecutor in the courtroom and to the forcefulness of his oral statements. Having regard to the prominent place held in a democratic society by the right to a fair trial, there had been a violation of A 6(1) taken in conjunction with A 6(3)(c).

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage.

[Application lodged 30.6.1982; Commission report 7.5.1985; Court Judgment 27.11.1987]

The applicant, a Tunisian living in Brussels, was charged with several offences of aggravated theft. He was remanded in custody, committed for trial, convicted and sentenced to three years' imprisonment for robbery with violence or threats. He appealed, complaining that the same judge had taken the decisions regarding his detention on remand and directed that he be committed for trial, and then presided over the court which convicted him at first instance. His appeal was dismissed by the Court of Appeal, as was a further appeal to the Court of Cassation. The applicant was expelled from Belgium and now lives in Geneva. He complained that his case was not heard by an impartial tribunal.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached by the Government and the applicant, a settlement which the latter regarded as being in accordance with his interests. The Belgian Court of Cassation had recently reversed its case-law in relation to its decision in the applicant's case. The case was therefore struck from the list.

Bendenoun v France (1994) 18 EHRR 54 94/7

[Application lodged 9.9.1986; Commission report 10.12.1992; Court Judgment 24.2.1994]

Mr Michel Bendenoun, the applicant, formed a public limited company under French law for the purpose of dealing in old coins, objets d'art and precious stones. As a result of his activities, three sets of proceedings, customs, tax and criminal proceedings, were brought against him. He complained that he had not had a fair trial in the criminal and administrative courts, that he had not had access to the whole of the customs file, whereas the Revenue had sent to the administrative courts certain evidence against him. He also alleged that there had been a breach of his right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions in that, as a result of the various national decisions, he had had to pay substantial sums to the French State.

Comm found by majority (10–2) V 6, unanimously that it was unnecessary to consider the case under P1A1.

Court unanimously found NV 6, unnecessary to examine P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber.

In considering the applicability of A 6 the Court noted that the offences with which the applicant was charged came within the General Tax Code, that tax surcharges were intended not as pecuniary compensation for damage but essentially as a punishment to deter re-offending, that they are imposed under a general rule, whose purpose was both deterrent and punitive and that the surcharges were very substantial and carried committal to prison by the criminal courts in the event of failure to pay. Those factors had a predominantly criminal connotation. None of them was decisive on its own, but taken together and cumulatively they made the 'charge' in issue a 'criminal' one within the meaning of A 6(1) which was therefore applicable.

The documents whose production the applicant complained he had sought were not among those relied on by the tax authorities. The complaint therefore related to documents that were not in the file produced to the administrative courts and were not ones on which the applicant's adversary relied. Although in some circumstances the concept of a fair trial might entail an obligation on the Revenue to agree to supply the litigant with certain documents from the file on him or even with the file in its entirety, it was necessary, at the very least, that the person concerned should have given, even if only briefly, specific reasons for his request. The applicant sought production in full of a fairly bulky file. The evidence before the Court did not show that he ever put forward any precise argument to support his contention that, notwithstanding his admission of the customs offences and his admissions during the criminal investigation, he could not counter the charge of tax evasion without having a copy of that file. That omission was all the more detrimental to his case as he was aware of the existence and content of most of the documents and he and his counsel had had access to the complete file, at any rate during the criminal investigation. From the information available to the Court it did not appear that the failure to produce documents infringed the rights of the defence or the principle of equality of arms. There had therefore not been a breach of A 6(1).

Before the Court the applicant made no further reference to P1A1 and accordingly the Court did not consider that it had to deal with the issue of its own motion.

Benham v United Kingdom (1996) 22 EHRR 293 96/21

[Application lodged 20.9.1991; Commission report 29.11.1994; Court Judgment 10.6.1996]

On 1 April 1990 Mr Stephen Andrew Benham was liable to pay a community charge of GBP 325. Since he did not pay, enforcement proceedings commenced against him. At a hearing on 25 March 1991 magistrates concluded that his failure to pay the community charge was due to his culpable neglect and committed him to prison for 30 days. He was unrepresented at the magistrates' hearing. He appealed to the Divisional Court which held that the magistrates had been mistaken in their decision. The applicant was not able to apply for compensation in respect of the time he spent in prison, because he was unable to show bad faith on the part of the magistrates. He complained that his detention between 25 March 1991 and 5 April 1991 was unlawful and violated A 5(1), that domestic legislation deprived him of an enforceable right to compensation in respect of it, and that the fact that full legal aid was not available to him for the committal hearing before the magistrates constituted a violation of A 6.

Comm found by majority (12–6) V 5(1), (17–1) V 5(5), (15–3) V 6(3)(c).

Court found by majority (17–4) NV 5(1) and 5(5) not applicable, unanimously V 6(3)(c).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt (pd), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (pd), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr J De Meyer (pd), Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel (pd), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek, Mr K Jungwiert.

The case fell to be examined under A 5(1)(b). A period of detention would in principle be lawful if it was carried out pursuant to a court order. A subsequent finding that the court erred under domestic law in making the order would not necessarily retrospectively affect the validity of the intervening period of detention. The evidence before the Court had not established that the order for detention was invalid and thus that the detention which resulted from it was unlawful under national law. The mere fact that the order was set aside on appeal did not in itself affect the lawfulness of the detention. Nor did the Court find that the detention was arbitrary. It had not been suggested that the magistrates who ordered the applicant's detention acted in bad faith, nor that they neglected to attempt to apply the relevant legislation correctly. Accordingly, no violation of A 5(1). In view of the finding that there was no violation of A 5(1), A 5(5) was not applicable.

The criteria for deciding whether a person was 'charged with a criminal offence' were the classification of the proceedings under national law, the nature of the proceedings and the nature and degree of severity of the penalty. The domestic authority indicated that, under English law, the proceedings in question were regarded as civil rather than criminal in nature. However, that factor was of relative weight and served only as a starting point. The nature of the proceedings carried more weight. The law concerning liability to pay the community charge and the procedure for non-payment was of general application to all citizens, the proceedings in question were brought by a public authority under statutory powers of enforcement. In addition, the proceedings had some punitive elements, the magistrates' power of committal to prison. The applicant had faced a relatively severe maximum penalty of three months' imprisonment and was detained for 30 days. Having regard to those factors, the applicant was 'charged with a criminal offence' for the purposes of A 6(1) and 6(3). The applicant lacked sufficient means to pay for legal assistance himself. In considering whether the interests of justice required that he be provided with free legal representation at the hearing regard had to be had to the severity of the penalty at stake and the complexity of the case. The penalty was severe and the law was complex, the interests of justice demanded therefore that in order to receive a fair hearing, the applicant ought to have benefited from free legal representation during the proceedings before the magistrates. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1) and 3(c) taken together.

Finding of violation constituted adequate satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (GBP 10,000 less FF 25,510).

Benkessiouer v France 98/68

[Application lodged 6.9.1995; Commission report 28.5.1997; Court Judgment 24.8.1998]

Mr Ahmed Benkessiouer, a civil servant working for the Post Office, complained about the length of proceedings for judicial review of the Post Office's decisions to refuse him extended sick-leave, to suspend payment of his salary for failure to perform his duties and to put him on notice to return to work or face dismissal.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found by majority (7–2) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr Gölcüklü (jd), President, Mr L-E Pettiti (jd), Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (c), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr E Levits, Mr V Butkevych.

The Court drew attention to its settled case-law, according to which disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). That provision was applicable where the claim related to a 'purely economic' right such as payment of salary or pension or an 'essentially economic' one. The applicants' claims in the Paris Administrative Court were intended mainly to secure the quashing of the decisions to refuse him extended sick-leave and suspend payment of his salary; a grant of such leave would have enabled the applicant to enjoy salary benefits. The Court thus found that the applicant was claiming an essentially economic right which did not mainly put in issue the authorities' special rights. The applicant's claims were therefore civil ones within the meaning of A 6(1) which therefore applied in the case. The first set of proceedings in the Paris Administrative Court began on 29 August 1991, when the application was made to it, and ended on 15 February 1996, when that court gave judgment. It therefore lasted four years, five months and fifteen days. The second set of proceedings, for an interim order, began on 9 June 1993 with the application to the Paris Administrative Court and ended on 19 May 1995, when the Conseil d'Etat gave judgment. It therefore lasted one year, eleven months and ten days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The Court noted that the proceedings for an interim order were completed within a reasonable time. However, there was a long period of inactivity attributable to the judicial authorities in connection with the proceedings, which began on 29 August 1991. A reasonable time was exceeded and there had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Benthem v Netherlands (1986) 8 EHRR 1 85/10

[Application lodged 21.12.1979; Commission report 8.10.1983; Court Judgment 23.10.1985.]

Mr Albert Benthem used to own and run a garage. In 1976 he applied for a licence to install a surface storage tank for the delivery of liquid petroleum gas to motor vehicles. The municipal authorities granted the licence, subject to fifty-six conditions which they considered would counter the dangers of fire and explosions. The Regional Health Inspector, who had advised refusal of a licence due to the excessive risks to proximate housing, lodged an appeal with the Crown. After a hearing in the presence of the parties, during which the applicant was heard, the Chairman of the Administrative Litigation Division asked the Director General for additional information. On the basis of further evidence, the Director General concluded that the licence sought by the applicant should be refused. There were further hearings and an appeal by the applicant which was unsuccessful. The installation was eventually closed down and the applicant declared bankrupt. The applicant claimed that, contrary to the requirements of A 6(1), his case had not been heard by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Comm found by majority (9–8) NV 6(1).

A 'genuine and serious' dispute as to the 'actual existence' of the right to a licence claimed by the applicant arose between him and the Netherlands authorities. In addition, the result of the proceedings complained of, which could – and in fact did – lead to a reversal of the decision under appeal, was directly decisive for the right at issue. The grant of the licence to which the applicant claimed to be entitled was one of the conditions for the exercise of part of his activities as a businessman. It was closely associated with the right to use one's possessions in conformity with the law's requirements. In addition, a licence of this kind had a proprietary character. In consequence, what was at stake was a 'civil' right, within the meaning of A 6(1), and that provision was therefore applicable to the proceedings in the appeal to the Crown. In order to determine whether the proceedings complained of were in conformity with A 6(1) it was necessary to consider the two institutions: the Administrative Litigation Division of the Council of State and the Crown. A power of decision was inherent in the notion of 'tribunal' within the meaning of the Convention. However, the Division tendered only an advice. Although that advice was followed in the great majority of cases, this was only a practice of no binding force, from which the Crown could depart at any moment. The proceedings before the Administrative Litigation Division of the Council of State thus did not provide the 'determination by a tribunal of the matters in dispute' which was required by A 6(1). The Crown, unlike the Administrative Litigation Division, was empowered to determine the dispute. However, the Royal Decree by which the Crown, as head of the executive, rendered its decision constituted an administrative act and it emanated from a Minister who was responsible to Parliament. In addition, the Minister was the hierarchical superior of the Regional Health Inspector, who had lodged the appeal, and of the Ministry's Director General, who had submitted the technical report to the Division. Moreover, the Royal Decree was not susceptible to review by a judicial body as required by A 6(1). There was therefore a violation of A 6(1).

Finding of breach sufficient: just satisfaction.

Bergens Tidende and Others v Norway 00/144

[Application lodged 13.9.1994; Court Judgment 2.5.2000]

The first applicant, Bergens Tidende, was a daily newspaper, the second applicant, Mr Einar Eriksen, was its former editor-in-chief and the third applicant, Mrs Berit Kvalheim, was a journalist employed by the newspaper. Dr R was a specialist in cosmetic surgery. On 5 March 1986, following the opening of a new clinic by Dr R, Bergens Tidende published an article, prepared by the third applicant, which described Dr R's work and the advantages of cosmetic surgery. Subsequently, the newspaper was contacted by a number of women who had undergone such operations by Dr R and who were dissatisfied with the treatment received. In May 1986 the newspaper published an article about three women who claimed to have been disfigured by operations performed by Dr R and complained about the poor after-care. The newspaper subsequently published an article from another doctor and an interview with Dr R and further articles including some in which women stated that they were satisfied with the work of Dr R. As a result of the publications, Dr R received fewer patients, experienced financial difficulties and had to close down his business in April 1989. On 22 June 1987, he instituted defamation proceedings against the applicants, claiming damages. By judgment of 12 April 1989, the Bergen City Court ordered the applicants to pay him damages and costs. The High Court, on appeal, found in favour of the applicants. Dr R appealed to the Supreme Court which, on 23 March 1994, found in his favour and ordered the applicants to pay him damages and costs. The applicants complained that the Supreme Court's judgment unjustifiably interfered with their right to freedom of expression under A 10.

Court found unanimously V 10.

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja, Mr S Evju, ad hoc judge.

The impugned measure constituted an interference by a public authority with the applicants' right to freedom of expression, that interference was prescribed by law, namely the Damage Compensation Act 1969, and pursued the legitimate aim of protecting the reputation or rights of others. The articles concerned an important aspect of human health and thus raised serious issues affecting the public interest, and the Court could not accept the Government's submission that the grievances of a few patients concerning the standard of health care afforded by a particular surgeon were private matters between the patient and surgeon themselves and were not matters in which the community at large has an interest, nor could it agree that the fact that the articles were not published as part of an ongoing general debate on the issues attached to cosmetic surgery, but were specifically focused on the standard of treatment provided at a single clinic, meant that the articles did not relate to matters of general public interest. The articles concerned allegations of unacceptable health care provided at a private cosmetic surgery clinic by Dr R. Their publication had to be seen against the background of an earlier article which described Dr R's work and the advantages of cosmetic surgery. A 10 did not guarantee a wholly unrestricted freedom of expression even with respect to press coverage of matters of serious public concern: 'duties and responsibilities', which also applied to the press and assumed significance when there was question of attacking the reputation of private individuals and undermining the rights of others. The safeguard afforded by A 10 to journalists in relation to reporting on issues of general interest was subject to the proviso that they were acting in good faith in order to provide accurate and reliable information in accordance with the ethics of journalism. To a large extent the criticisms of Dr R. which were expressed in the articles were found to be justified by the national courts, which also found that this justified criticism had significantly and adversely affected his professional reputation. Considering the articles as a whole, the statements were not excessive or misleading. The reporting of the accounts of the women did not show a lack of any proper balance. The newspaper had printed other articles including an interview with Dr R as well as subsequent articles defending him. The publication of the articles had serious consequences for his professional practice. However, as expressly recognised by the national courts, given the justified criticisms relating to his post-surgical care and follow-up treatment, it was inevitable that substantial damage would in any event be done to his professional reputation. Dr R's role was not limited to surgery in the narrow sense, but encompassed all aspects of cosmetic surgery. The undoubted interest of Dr R in protecting his professional reputation was not sufficient to outweigh the important public interest in the freedom of the press to impart information on matters of legitimate public concern. The reasons relied on by the respondent State, although relevant, were not sufficient to show that the interference complained of was necessary in a democratic society. There was no reasonable relationship of proportionality between the restrictions placed by the measures applied by the Supreme Court on the applicants' right to freedom of expression and the legitimate aim pursued. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 10.

Pecuniary damage (NOK 4,848,589 to the first applicant, NOK 44,383 each to the second and third applicants), costs and expenses (NOK 878,945 to the applicants together), additional interest (NOK 740,000 to the first applicant, NOK 5,700 each to the second and third applicants).

Bernard v France 98/29

[Application lodged 29.5.1993; Commission report 22.10.1996; Court Judgment 23.4.1998]

In the course of a judicial investigation into a charge brought against Mr Jean-Paul Bernard on a number of counts of armed robbery, an investigating judge at Nevers ordered two expert opinions on him: a psychiatric report and a medical and psychological report. Following receipt of those reports the applicant requested a second opinion, which the investigating judge commissioned. Following service of that report the applicant requested a third opinion, but on 25 July 1989 the investigating judge refused this request. In the course of a separate investigation concerning an attempted escape the same judge ordered a psychiatric report. After this report had been filed, Mr Bernard requested a second opinion, but this request was refused by the investigating judge. The applicant appealed unsuccessfully. After the experts had given evidence at his trial, the applicant's lawyer requested in his submissions that a formal note be entered in the record to the effect that the experts had stated an opinion on the question of the applicant's guilt. The Assize Court dismissed the applicant's lawyer's request for the evidence of two experts examined during the trial to be ruled inadmissible. On 12 June 1992 the Assize Court sentenced the applicant to ten years' imprisonment for armed robbery. He complained of an infringement of his right to a fair trial.

Comm found by majority (7–7 with the President's casting vote) V 6(1) and not necessary to consider 6(2).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (8–1) NV 6(1), 6(2).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt (c), President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Jambrek, Mr U Lôhmus (d).

The Court observed that the Government's submission that the appellant had failed to request independent expert reports referred to the expert reports filed during the investigation conducted by the investigating judge, whereas the applicant challenged the comments made by the experts at his trial on 9 June 1992 in the Rhône Assize Court. In addition, the applicant raised the complaint in question before the Assize Court, by means of an interlocutory application, and later by appealing to the Court of Cassation. Domestic remedies were therefore exhausted. In any event any further request for an independent opinion would have been bound to fail.

It was not the Court's task to substitute its own assessment of the facts and the evidence for that of the domestic courts and, as a general rule, it was for those courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task was to ascertain whether the proceedings considered as a whole, including the way in which the evidence was taken, were fair. The purpose of the psychiatric examinations was to obtain, inter alia, an answer to the question whether he was suffering from some mental or psychological disorder and, if so, whether there was a link between the disorders found and the offences of which he stood charged. They were also intended to assess how dangerous he was. The two specialists appointed by the investigating judge logically had to start from the working hypothesis that the applicant had committed the crimes which had given rise to the prosecution. The applicant had himself requested the second expert opinion and his request for a third had been refused. At the hearing before the Lyons Court of Appeal the applicant had the opportunity to challenge the expert reports but he did not appear to have done so. The domestic court had noted that the experts had always taken care to specify that they were stating their conclusions concerning offences which the applicant denied committing. In addition, the record of the hearings showed that all the witnesses called by the applicant were heard and that his counsel had the opportunity to make observations after each witness had given evidence. The file showed that the applicant's conviction was based on all the charges preferred and on the evidence obtained during the investigation and discussed at the hearings in the Assize Court. That being so, the Court could not regard the statements in issue, which formed only one part of the evidence submitted to the jury, as contrary to the requirements of a fair trial and the presumption of innocence. There had therefore been no breach of A 6(1) and (2).

Berrehab v Netherlands (1989) 11 EHRR 322 88/9

[Application lodged 14.11.1983; Commission report 7.10.1986; Court Judgment 21.6.1988]

Mr Abdellah Berrehab was a Moroccan citizen permanently resident in Amsterdam. After marrying a Netherlands national in 1977 he was granted permission to remain for the purpose of enabling him to live with his Dutch wife. That permission was renewed until 8 December 1979. Following their divorce his ex-wife was appointed guardian of their daughter; the applicant, who was auxiliary guardian, maintained frequent contact. His application for renewal of his residence permit was refused on the ground that it would be contrary to the public interest as the marriage was no longer subsisting. The applicant's appeals to the Minister of Justice and thereafter to the Raad van State were rejected. The applicant was arrested on 28 December 1983 for the purpose of his deportation. In 1984 his daughter and ex-wife visited him in Morocco. He returned to The Netherlands on 27 May 1985 on a short visa. On 14 August 1985 he remarried his ex-wife in Amsterdam. On 9 December 1985, the Ministry of Justice granted him permission to reside in The Netherlands 'for the purpose of living with his Dutch wife and working during that time'. He complained that the deportation amounted to treatment that was inhuman and degrading and infringed the right to respect for privacy and family life.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr G Lagergren, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens, ad hoc judge.

Cohabitation was not a sine qua non of family life between parents and minor children. The relationship created between spouses by a lawful and genuine marriage had to be regarded as 'family life'. It followed from the concept of family on which A 8 was based that a child born of such a union was ipso jure part of that relationship; hence, from the moment of the child's birth and by the very fact of it, there existed between him and his parents a bond amounting to 'family life', even if the parents were not then living together. The applicant saw his daughter frequently and regularly and the ties of family life had not been broken in this case. The disputed measures prevented Mr Berrehab and his daughter from maintaining regular contact with each other, although such contact was essential, as the child was very young. The measures accordingly amounted to interferences with the exercise of a right under A 8(1). The measures in question were based on The Netherlands1965 Act. The legitimate aim pursued was the preservation of the country's economic well-being within the meaning of paragraph 2 of A 8(2): the Government were concerned, because of the population density, to regulate the labour market. In determining whether an interference was 'necessary in a democratic society', allowance had to be made for the margin of appreciation left to the Contracting States. The Convention did not in principle prohibit the Contracting States from regulating the entry and length of stay of aliens. However, 'necessity' implied that the interference corresponded to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The present case did not concern an alien seeking admission to The Netherlands for the first time but a person who had already lawfully lived there for several years, who had a home and a job there, and against whom the Government did not claim to have any complaint. Furthermore, the applicant already had real family ties there – he had married a Dutch woman, and a child had been born of the marriage. There had been very close ties between Mr Berrehab and his daughter for several years and the refusal of an independent residence permit and the ensuing expulsion threatened to break those ties. The effect of the interferences in issue was the more serious as his daughter needed to remain in contact with her father, particularly because of her youth. Having regard to those particular circumstances, the Court considered that a proper balance was not achieved between the interests involved and there was therefore a disproportion between the means employed and the legitimate aim pursued. Therefore the disputed measures could not be considered as being necessary in a democratic society. There had been a violation of A 8.

The facts of the case did not show that either of the applicants underwent suffering of a degree corresponding to the concepts of 'inhuman' or 'degrading' treatment. There had therefore been no violation of A 3.

On 1 December 1983 the intermediary made a declaration to the Ministry of Cultural Heritage stating that he had purchased the painting on behalf of the applicant. On 2 May 1988 the applicant sold the painting to the Peggy Guggenheim collection in Venice for USD 8,500,000. In an order of 24 November 1988 the Ministry exercised its right of pre-emption in respect of the 1977 sale at the 1977 sale price. The applicant's appeals to the Regional Administrative Court, Consiglio di Stato, Court of Cassation and Constitutional Court were unsuccessful. During the night of 19/20 May 1998 the painting, which was still in the Rome Gallery of Modern and Contemporary Art, was stolen in an armed robbery along with two other paintings. It was found by the carabinieri and Italian police on 6 July 1998. The applicant complained that the Ministry of Cultural Heritage's exercise of a right of pre-emption violated his rights under P1A1, 14 and 18.

Comm found by majority (20–10) NV P1A1, (23–7) NV 14, unanimously NV 18.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (16–1) V P1A1, unanimously no need to give a separate ruling on 14, unanimously that no separate issue arose under 18.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo (D), Mr G Bonello, Mr P Kûris, Mr R Türmen, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall, Mrs HS Greve, Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova.

The Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, as the applicant could have applied to the civil courts for the amount paid in 1977 to be revised, had not been raised before the Commission and accordingly they were estopped from relying on that objection.

The applicant had a proprietary interest from the time the work was purchased until the right of pre-emption was exercised and he was paid compensation. That interest therefore constituted a possession for the purposes of P1A1, which was therefore applicable to the present case. The measure complained of, namely the exercise by the Ministry of Cultural Heritage of its right of pre-emption, amounted to an interference with the applicant's right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. The essential condition for an interference to be deemed compatible with P1A1 was that it should be lawful. The Court had limited power to review compliance with domestic law, especially as there was nothing in the instant case from which it could conclude that the Italian authorities applied the legal provisions in question manifestly erroneously or so as to reach arbitrary conclusions. However, the principle of lawfulness also presupposed that the applicable provisions of domestic law be sufficiently accessible, precise and foreseeable. In certain respects the statute lacked clarity, particularly in that it left open the time-limit for the exercise of a right of pre-emption in the event of an incomplete declaration without indicating how such an omission could subsequently be rectified. The element of uncertainty in the statute and the considerable latitude it afforded the authorities were material considerations to be taken into account in determining whether the measure complained of struck a fair balance. The control by the State of the market in works of art was a legitimate aim for the purposes of protecting a country's cultural and artistic heritage. The national authorities enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in determining what was in the general interest of the community. In relation to works of art lawfully on the territory of a State and belonging to the cultural heritage of all nations, it was legitimate for a State to take measures designed to facilitate in the most effective way wide public access to them, in the general interest of universal culture. At the time of the 1977 sale, the applicant did not disclose to the vendor that the painting had been purchased on his behalf. He had then waited six years before declaring his purchase, contrary to the relevant provisions of Italian law of which he was deemed to be aware. He did not approach the authorities until December 1983 when he was intending to sell the painting to the Peggy Guggenheim Collection in Venice for USD 2,000,000. Thus the applicant had not acted openly and honestly, especially as there was nothing to prevent him from informing the authorities of the true position before 2 December 1983 in order to comply with the statutory requirements. The Court did not question either the right of pre-emption over works of art in itself or the State's interest in being informed of all the details of a contract, including the identity of the end purchaser on a sale through an agent, so that the authorities could decide in the full knowledge of the facts whether or not to exercise their right of pre-emption. After receiving in 1983 the information missing from the declaration made in 1977, that is, the identity of the end purchaser, the Italian authorities waited until 1988 before giving serious consideration to the question of ownership of the painting and deciding to exercise their right of pre-emption. During that time the authorities' attitude towards the applicant oscillated between ambivalence and assent and they often treated him de facto as the legitimate title-holder under the 1977 sale. Furthermore, the considerable latitude left to the authorities under the applicable provisions, as interpreted by the domestic courts, and the above-mentioned lack of clarity in the law made the situation even more uncertain, to the applicant's detriment. The respondent Government had failed to give a convincing explanation as to why the Italian authorities had not acted in 1984 in the same manner as they acted in 1988. Thus, taking punitive action in 1988 on the ground that the applicant had made an incomplete declaration, a fact of which the authorities had become aware almost five years earlier, hardly appeared justified. In that connection it had to be stressed that where an issue in the general interest was at stake it was incumbent on the public authorities to act in good time, in an appropriate manner and with utmost consistency. That state of affairs allowed the Ministry of Cultural Heritage to acquire the painting in 1988 at well below its market value. The authorities had derived an unjust enrichment from the uncertainty that existed during the period from 1983 to 1988 to which they had largely contributed. Irrespective of the applicant's nationality, such enrichment is incompatible with the requirement of a fair balance. The applicant had to bear a disproportionate and excessive burden and there had therefore been a violation of P1A1.

In the light of the conclusions in respect of P1A1, there was no reason to examine separately A 14 and no separate issue arose under A 18.

[Application lodged 18.1.1985; Commission report 10.3.1988; Court Judgment 25.10.1989]

Mr Marcantonio Bezicheri, a practising lawyer, was arrested on 14 May 1983 and the file was transmitted to the investigating judge. The applicant was remanded in custody on suspicion, inter alia, of being an accessory to an aggravated murder which had taken place in 1982. On 18 May 1983 he applied, unsuccessfully, for release. On 6 July 1983 he made another application for release and a request for various investigatory measures. He repeated that request on 6 October 1983. The investigating judge refused the application for release on 22 December 1983. The applicant complained that the application had not been examined speedily within the meaning of A 5(4).

The investigating judge constituted a 'court' for the purposes of A 5(4) in view of his independence and the guarantees attaching to the proceedings conducted before him. The nature of detention on remand called for short intervals; there was an assumption in the Convention that detention on remand was to be of strictly limited duration because its raison d'être was essentially related to the requirements of an investigation which was to be conducted with expedition. The proceedings had taken approximately five and a half months. The investigating judge required a certain amount of time to carry out the necessary enquiries but the investigations were spread out over a period whose overall length was incompatible with A 5(4). With regard to the State's argument that the investigating judge had an excessive workload and concentrated on other sensitive custody cases, the Convention required States to organise their legal systems so as to enable the courts to comply with the various requirements. The examination of the application of 6 July had not been effected speedily as required by A 5(4).

Judgment constituted adequate just satisfaction for A50.

Billi v Italy 93/12

By writ of summons served on 7 June 1969, the municipality of Perugia instituted proceedings before the Perugia District Court against a friendly society which organised mutual assistance between employees and pensioners. The President of the Court ordered the interim seizure of the immovable property belonging to the members of the society's governing body, which included the applicant's father. He died during the trial and the applicant, Mrs Emma Billi, as his heir, sought leave to be joined to the proceedings at the hearing of 25 January 1973. There were adjournments for expert reports. Following trial in 1988, in a judgment dated 14 May 1988, deposited with the registry on 7 November 1988, the Perugia District Court rejected the municipality's claims. The decision became final on 7 November 1989. The applicant complained about the length of the proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 1 August 1973 when Italy accepted the right of individual petition under A 25. The period in question ended on 7 November 1989. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was complex, the necessity for an expert opinion and the presence of several defendants made the proceedings more cumbersome and slowed them down. More than twelve years elapsed between the hearing at which the first expert took the oath and the date on which the second lodged his report. Both experts were working in the context of judicial proceedings supervised by a judge, who remained responsible for the preparation and the speedy conduct of the trial. In addition, having regard to the fact that the case was heard at only one level of jurisdiction, the Court could not consider reasonable a period of over sixteen years which had elapsed in the proceedings. There had therefore been a violation of A 6.

Biondi v Italy 92/5

[Application lodged 17.4.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 26.2.1992]

Mrs Ida Biondi brought proceedings on 7 March 1986 against the Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale (INPS) before the Rome magistrates' court in order to establish her right to a disability pension. Although the District Court gave judgment on 10 October 1991, the text of its decision had not yet been filed with the registry.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 7 March 1986 when the proceedings were instituted against the INPS in the magistrates' court. It had not yet ended as Mrs Biondi's appeal was still pending in the appellate court. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Special diligence was necessary in employment disputes, which included pensions disputes. A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. This case did not give rise to any complex question of fact or law. The proceedings were conducted at a normal pace in the magistrates' court and the State could not be held responsible for the four months which elapsed between the decision of 3 October 1986 and the date on which the applicant appealed to the Rome District Court. On the other hand, the appeal proceedings remained dormant for more than two years. On 5 February 1987 the President of the Rome District Court set down the first hearing before the competent chamber for 21 February 1989. Furthermore, two years and eight months went by before the District Court gave judgment, on 10 October 1991. In view of what was at stake in the proceedings for Mrs Biondi, a lapse of time already amounting to nearly six years could not be regarded as reasonable. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Bizzotto v Greece 96/49

[Application lodged 15.6.1992; Commission report 4.7.1995; Court Judgment 15.11.1996]

On 4 March 1990 Mr Carlo Bizzotto was arrested in transit at Athens Airport while in possession of 3.5 kg of cannabis which he had purchased in Islamabad for USD 1,000. On 6 May 1991 the Athens Court of Appeal, sitting as a first-instance criminal court, found him guilty and sentenced him to eight years' imprisonment and a fine of two million drachmas. In addition, it ordered his placement in an appropriate centre to receive treatment for his drug addiction. An appeal court upheld the decision although the sentence was reduced. The applicant served his sentence in Patras Prison. The public prosecutor confirmed that there was no institution with the appropriate medical facilities available. The applicant made four requests to be released.

Comm found by majority (8–7) V 5(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found NV 5(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr E Levits.

A 26 required that available and sufficient remedies for the alleged violation be exhausted. An action under the domestic Code of Criminal Procedure would not have been effective in the circumstances of the case. The objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies therefore had to be dismissed. The applicant had made four applications for release on licence. As his application to the Commission was made a few days after the dismissal of his third application he had satisfied the requirement of A 26 regarding complying with the time limit. The objection had therefore to be dismissed.

In order to comply with A 5(1) detention must take place 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law' and be 'lawful'. The Convention here referred essentially to national law and laid down the obligation to conform to the substantive and procedural rules of national law, but it required in addition that any deprivation of liberty should be in keeping with the aim of A 5, namely to protect the individual from arbitrariness. In addition, there had to be some relationship between the ground of permitted deprivation of liberty relied on and the place and conditions of detention. The applicant's 'detention' was the consequence of his conviction as a drug trafficker. The Athens Court of Appeal, both sitting as a court of first instance and as appeal, passed sentence for the purposes of punishment. The court's finding that the applicant was a drug addict and the decision to have him placed in a prison with medical facilities did not in any way affect the main ground for his 'detention'. Accordingly, only sub-para (a) of A 5(1) applied. The domestic law had a humanitarian nature that was curative in purpose, but five years after that law was passed those provisions remained inoperative. The sections of the law lay down the arrangements for implementing sentences. Although such arrangements might sometimes be caught by the Convention, particularly where they were incompatible with A 3, they could not, in principle, have any bearing on the 'lawfulness' of a deprivation of liberty. Consequently the applicant's detention in the ordinary prison in Patras did not infringe A 5(1).

Bladet Tromsø and Stensaas v Norway (2000) 29 EHRR 125 99/23

[Application lodged 10.12.1992; Commission report 9.7.1998; Court Judgment 20.5.1999]

The first applicant was a limited liability company Bladet Tromsø A/S, which published the daily newspaper Bladet Tromsø in the town of Tromsø in the north of Norway. The second applicant, Mr Pål Stensaas, was its editor. Mr Odd F Lindberg was a freelance journalist, author and photographer and in March 1988 he was appointed as a seal hunting inspector. In 1988 he served as an inspector on board the vessel Harmoni. In his report he alleged a series of violations of the Seal Hunting Regulations, claiming amongst other things that seals had been flayed alive. The Ministry of Fisheries decided that the report should not be published. Bladet Tromsø published an article by Mr Lindberg reproducing some of the allegations in his report but not mentioning any seal hunter by name. On 15 May 1991 the crew members of the Harmoni instituted defamation proceedings against the applicants. On 4 March 1992, the Nord-Troms District Court found the statements defamatory and declared them null and void. The applicants were refused leave to appeal to the Supreme Court. They complained that the District Court's judgment constituted an unjustified interference with their right to freedom of expression.

The impugned measures constituted an interference by a public authority with the applicants' right to freedom of expression. The interference was prescribed by law and pursued a legitimate aim, namely the protection of the reputation or rights of others, and thus fulfilled two of the conditions for regarding the interference as permissible under the second paragraph of A 10. The dispute in the case under consideration related to the third condition, that the interference be 'necessary in a democratic society'. The Court recalled its well-established case-law. A factor of particular importance in the present case was the essential function the press fulfilled in a democratic society. The reasons relied on by the District Court were relevant to the legitimate aim of protecting the reputation or rights of the crew members. As to the sufficiency of those reasons for the purposes of A 10, the Court had to take account of the overall background against which the statements in question were made. Thus, the contents of the impugned articles could not be looked at in isolation of the controversy that seal hunting represented at the time in Norway and in Tromsø. In the Court's view, the manner of reporting in question should not be considered solely by reference to the disputed articles in Bladet Tromsø on 15 and 20 July 1988 but in the wider context of the newspaper's coverage of the seal hunting issue. During the period from 15 to 23 July 1988, Bladet Tromsø, which was a local newspaper, published almost on a daily basis the different points of view, including the newspaper's own comments, those of the Ministry of Fisheries, the Norwegian Sailors' Federation, Greenpeace and, above all, the seal hunters. Although the latter were not published simultaneously as the contested articles, there was a high degree of proximity in time, giving an overall picture of balanced news reporting. The thrust of the impugned articles was not primarily to accuse certain individuals of committing offences against the seal hunting regulations or of cruelty to animals, but rather for the fisheries authorities to make a constructive use of the findings in the Lindberg report in order to improve the reputation of seal hunting. A 10 did not guarantee wholly unrestricted freedom of expression even with respect to press coverage of matters of serious public concern. Examination had to be made of whether there were any special grounds in the present case for dispensing the newspaper from its ordinary obligation to verify factual statements that were defamatory of private individuals. That depended in particular on the nature and degree of the defamation at hand and the extent to which the newspaper could reasonably regard the Lindberg report as reliable with respect to the allegations in question. The latter issue had be determined in the light of the situation as it presented itself to Bladet Tromsø at the material time, rather than with the benefit of hindsight. While some of the accusations were relatively serious, the potential adverse effect of the impugned statements on each individual seal hunter's reputation or rights was significantly attenuated by several factors. In particular, the criticism was not an attack against all the crew members or any specific crew member. Regarding the trustworthiness of the Lindberg report, it had been drawn up by Mr Lindberg in an official capacity as an appointed inspector. The press should normally be entitled, when contributing to public debate on matters of legitimate concern, to rely on the contents of official reports without having to undertake independent research. Otherwise, the vital public-watchdog role of the press might be undermined. The newspaper were already aware from the reactions to Mr Lindberg's statements in April 1988 that the crew disputed his competence and the truth of any allegations of 'beastly killing methods'. It must have been evident to the paper that the Lindberg report was liable to be controverted by the crew members. Taken on its own, this cannot be considered decisive for whether the newspaper had a duty to verify the truth of the critical factual statements contained in the report before it could exercise its freedom of expression under A 10 of the Convention. Far more material was the attitude of the Ministry of Fisheries, which had appointed Mr Lindberg to carry out the inspection and to report back. The Ministry had decided to exempt the report from public disclosure. Prior to the contested publication on 15 July 1988, the Ministry had not publicly expressed a doubt as to the possible truth of the criticism or questioned Mr

Lindberg's competence. The attitude expressed by the Ministry before 20 July 1988 did not constitute a ground for considering that it was unreasonable for the newspaper to regard as reliable the information contained in the report. Having regard to the various factors limiting the likely harm to the individual seal hunters' reputation and to the situation as it presented itself to Bladet Tromsø at the relevant time, the Court considered that the paper could reasonably rely on the official Lindberg report, without being required to carry out its own research into the accuracy of the facts reported. There was no reason to doubt that the newspaper acted in good faith in this respect. On the facts of the present case, the Court could not find that the crew members' undoubted interest in protecting their reputation was sufficient to outweigh the vital public interest in ensuring an informed public debate over a matter of local and national as well as international interest. In short, the reasons relied on by the respondent State, although relevant, were not sufficient to show that the interference complained of was 'necessary in a democratic society'. Notwithstanding the national authorities' margin of appreciation, there was no reasonable relationship of proportionality between the restrictions placed on the applicants' right to freedom of expression and the legitimate aim pursued. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 10.

The Court made the guardianship order. The applicant was committed to a mental hospital on the application of the guardian and remained there until the order was set aside on 3 May. There were further applications and reports. They were divorced in 1983. The applicant complained of the length of divorce proceedings which had lasted over nine years.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos.

The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, taking into account the complexity of the case, conduct of the parties and what was at stake in the litigation. The most striking feature of the case was the amount of time devoted to a consideration of the applicant's mental capacity to take legal proceedings. In principle, national courts had to proceed on the basis that a prospective or actual plaintiff was not suffering from mental incapacity. Should any reasonable doubt arise, arrangements had to be made to ensure that the position was clarified as soon as possible. By the time of the final divorce decree there had been five reports attesting to the applicant's soundness of mind against one whose author had been disqualified. The suffering caused to the applicant, in this case for 9 years because of the doubts cast on his mental state which proved unfounded, amounted to a serious encroachment on human dignity. Although some responsibility for the duration of the proceedings rested with the parties, the divorce petition was not heard within a reasonable time, owing to cumulative delays which were attributable to the competent courts. Having regard to the diligence required in cases concerning civil status and capacity, there had been a breach of A 6(1).

The period to be taken into consideration began on 19 July 1980, the date on which the warrant was issued for the applicant's arrest. Following a brief interruption, owing to Mr Boddaert's departure to Spain, it ended on 22 October 1986, when the Court of Cassation delivered its judgment. It had lasted six years, two months and twenty-two days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed by reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The enquiry was a difficult one. The conduct of another defendant had to be taken into account. The gravity of the offences and the interdependence of the charges could reasonably appear to have made it necessary for a 'parallel progression' of the two cases, which were joined on 11 February 1986. The decision to hold a joint trial could further delay the applicant's committal for trial. However, the applicant had been released on 2 February 1982. A 6 commanded that judicial proceedings be expeditious, but it also laid down the more general principle of the proper administration of justice. In the circumstances of the case, the conduct of the authorities was consistent with the fair balance which had to be struck between the various aspects of that fundamental requirement.

Bodén v Sweden (1988) 10 EHRR 367 87/22

[Application lodged 10.1.1984; Commission report 15.5 1986; Court Judgment 27.10.1987]

The applicant and his brother owned three properties. Following the issue of an expropriation permit by the Municipal Council, proceedings were instituted by the Municipality before a real estate court. Swedish law contained no provision for appeals to the ordinary or the administrative courts against the Government's decisions to issue expropriation permits. There was a limited possibility to file a petition before the Supreme Administrative Court for re-opening of the proceedings. After the present case had been brought before the Court, the Municipality concluded an agreement with the applicant for the repurchase by him of the properties for the same amount as it had paid for them. The applicant alleged a breach of A 6(1), complaining that he had not had the opportunity under Swedish law to challenge before a court an expropriation permit affecting property of which he was part-owner.

The applicant's right of ownership of the properties was a civil right. The expression 'disputes over civil rights and obligations' covered all proceedings the result of which were decisive for such rights and obligations. However, a tenuous connection or remote consequences would not suffice for A 6(1). There was a serious disagreement between the applicant and the authorities. In addition, the expropriation permit was decisive for the applicant's property rights. The objections lodged by the applicant with the Government against the Municipal Council's request for an expropriation permit gave rise to a dispute over one of his civil rights, sufficient for A 6(1) to apply. The Court had to ascertain whether the applicant enjoyed the right to a court, guaranteed to him under A 6(1). The Government's decision as to the issue of the permit was not open to appeal before either the ordinary or the administrative courts, or before any other body which could be considered to be a 'tribunal' for the purposes of A 6(1). The applicant could have challenged the lawfulness of such a decision by requesting the Supreme Administrative Court to re-open the proceedings, but this extraordinary remedy did not meet the requirements of A 6(1). In addition, the requirements of A 6(1) would not have been satisfied by any possibility which the applicant might have had of seeking compensation for prejudice. Such an action would have concerned only certain effects of the expropriation permit and would not have determined the lawfulness of its issue. There was accordingly a violation of A 6(1).

Boner v United Kingdom (1995) 19 EHRR 246 94/36

[Application lodged 4.4.1991; Commission report 4.5.1993; Court Judgment 28.10.1994]

The applicant, Mr Anthony Boner, lived in Glasgow, Scotland. He was arrested and indicted on a charge of assault and armed robbery, a charge of wilful damage and three charges relating to firearms. His trial took place between 29 March and 10 April 1990 at the High Court of Justiciary in Edinburgh. He received legal aid for the preparation of his defence and for his representation by counsel at the trial. He was found guilty and sentenced to eight years' imprisonment. He submitted notice of appeal and applied for legal aid to be extended to cover the appeal proceedings. On 14 November 1990 the Scottish Legal Aid Board told the applicant's solicitors that his application for legal aid had been refused. The applicant proceeded with his appeal without legal assistance. His appeal was dismissed. He complained that he had been refused legal aid.

A 6(3)(c) attached two conditions to an accused's right to receive legal aid: 'lack of sufficient means to pay for legal assistance', and whether the 'interests of justice' required that the applicant be granted such assistance free. The manner in which A 6(3)(c) had to be applied in relation to appellate or cassation courts depended on the special features of the proceedings involved; account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings conducted in the domestic legal order and of the role of the appellate or cassation court therein. The Scottish system of criminal appeals granted all persons a right to appeal without special leave being required. The proceedings always involved an oral hearing at which the Crown was represented. The Scottish Legal Aid Board, an independent body, decided in each case whether an applicant had substantial grounds for taking an appeal and whether it was in the interests of justice that he should have legal representation. A safeguard had been introduced in the form of a Practice Note by the Lord Justice General, dated 4 December 1990, ensuring that, in any appeal where legal aid had been refused, such aid was automatically granted where the court had reached the conclusion that, prima facie, an appellant may have substantial grounds for taking the appeal and that it was in the interests of justice that he should have legal representation in arguing these grounds. The legal issue in this case was not particularly complex. Nevertheless, to attack in appeal proceedings a judge's exercise of discretion in the course of a trial required a certain legal skill and experience. It was not the Court's function to indicate the measures to be taken by national authorities to ensure that their appeals system satisfied the requirements of A 6. Its task was solely to determine whether the system chosen by them in this connection led to results which were consistent with the requirements of A 6. A case such as the present, involving a heavy penalty, where an appellant was left to present his own defence unassisted before the highest instance of appeal, was not in conformity with the requirements of A 6. Given the nature of the proceedings, the wide powers of the High Court, the limited capacity of an unrepresented appellant to present a legal argument and, above all, the importance of the issue at stake in view of the severity of the sentence, the interests of justice required that the applicant be granted legal aid for representation at the hearing of his appeal. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(3)(c).

[Application lodged 18.6.1979; Commission report 12.3.1984; Court Judgment 6.5.1985 (merits), 2.6.1986 (just satisfaction)]

Mr Helmut Bönisch ran a meat smoking firm. Complaints were made which led to his prosecution by the Federal Food Control Institute before the District Criminal Court and Regional Court of Vienna. The applicant was convicted. In October 1976 samples of his smoked meat were analysed by the Institute and found to be dangerous to health and adulterated. This opinion, drafted by the Director of the Institute, amounted to the lodging of a complaint: it was sent to the prosecuting authorities with a view to the institution of criminal proceedings. The case came before the same judge of the Regional Court who had dealt with an earlier case against the applicant and the Director of the Institute was appointed as expert. The applicant's allegation of bias in challenging the judge and the expert was rejected. He was found guilty and sentenced to two months' imprisonment. His appeal was rejected by the Vienna Court of Appeal in December 1978. A further prosecution and conviction by the same judge considering expert evidence from an Institute expert resulted in September 1979 in a sentence of one month's imprisonment. His appeal was dismissed. In February 1984, the Federal President commuted the two prison sentences imposed on the applicant to fines. The applicant alleged that the proceedings taken against him had violated A 6(1), in that they had not provided a fair trial, and A 6(3)(d), by reason of the inequality of treatment between the Institute's expert and the defence's expert, who had been heard only as a witness.

The Court held that, read literally, sub-paragraph (d) of para 3 related to witnesses and not experts. The guarantees contained in para 3 were constituent elements of the concept of a fair trial set out in paragraph 1. In the circumstances of the case, the Court considered that it should examine the complaints under the general rule of paragraph 1. As far as domestic law was concerned, it was not for the Court to depart from the definition which the Government had furnished of the notion of 'expert'. However, in order to assess the role played by the Director of the Institute, the Court had to have regard to the procedural position he occupied and to the manner in which he performed his function. In this connection, the Director had drafted the Institute's reports, the transmission of which to the prosecuting authorities had set in motion the criminal proceedings against the applicant. Thereafter he was designated as expert by the Regional Court pursuant to Austrian law, under which he had the duty of 'explaining and supplementing the findings or the opinion' of the Institute. It was understandable that doubts should arise as to the neutrality of an expert when it was his report that prompted the bringing of a prosecution. In the present case, appearances suggested that the Director was more like a witness against the accused. In principle, his being examined at the hearings was not precluded by the Convention, but the principle of equality of arms inherent in the concept of a fair trial required equal treatment as between the hearing of the Director and the hearing of persons who were or could be called by the defence. The Court considered that such equal treatment had not been afforded in the two proceedings in issue. In the first place, the Director had been appointed as 'expert' by the Regional Court in accordance with Austrian law; by virtue of that law, he was formally invested with the function of neutral and impartial auxiliary of the court. By reason of this, his statements must have carried greater weight than those of an 'expert witness' called by the accused, and yet his neutrality and impartiality were capable of appearing open to doubt. Circumstances also illustrated the dominant role that the Director was able to play: he could attend throughout the hearings, question the accused and witnesses with the leave of the court and comment on their evidence. The lack of equal treatment was particularly striking in the first proceedings, by reason of the difference between the respective positions of the court expert and the 'expert witness' of the defence. As a mere witness, the Director of the Institute for Meat Hygiene was not allowed to appear before the Regional Court until being called to give evidence; when giving his evidence, he was examined by both the judge and the expert; thereafter he was relegated to the public gallery. The Director, however, directly examined the Meat Hygiene Director and the accused. In addition, there was little opportunity for the defence to obtain the appointment of a counter-expert. Under Austrian law, if the court needed clarification in respect of the Institute's opinion, it had to first hear a member of the Institute's staff; the court may not have recourse to another expert except in certain contingencies, none of which obtained in the present case. Consequently, there was a breach of A 6(1). This conclusion dispensed the Court from giving a separate ruling on the alleged violation of A 6(3)(d). Having already found a violation of A 6(1), the Court did not rule on the merits of the complaint made under A 6(2), that there had been a reversal of the burden of proof contrary to the rule of the presumption of innocence.

Borgers v Belgium (1993) 15 EHRR 92 91/45

[Application lodged 5.12.1985; Commission report 17.5.1990; Court Judgment 30.10.1991]

Mr André Borgers, a lawyer, was elected provincial counsellor on 8 November 1981 and thereupon tendered his resignation from the post of substitute district judge which he had held since 12 April 1976, but which under the Judicial Code was incompatible with his new elected office. On 16 June 1981 he appeared before the Antwerp Court of Appeal charged with forgery and using forged documents and on 19 May 1982 he was given a suspended sentence of six months' imprisonment and fined 40,000 Belgian francs. He appealed to the Court of Cassation who on 20 March 1984 allowed the appeal and quashed the contested decision on the ground that an adequate statement of the reasons on which it was based had not been given. The Ghent Court of Appeal, to which the case had been remitted, convicted the applicant on 14 November 1984 and imposed on him identical sanctions to those resulting from the earlier decision. The applicant again appealed. His appeal was dismissed on 18 June 1985, following a hearing at which the Court heard the report of the judge rapporteur and the concurring submissions of the avocat général, who had again participated in the deliberations. The applicant complained that the avocat général at the Court of Cassation had attended the deliberations of that court, infringing his right to a fair trial and violating the principle of the equality of arms. He further complained that he had not been able to reply to that official's submissions or address the Court of Cassation.

The Court noted its previous case-law. The rights of the defence and the principle of the equality of arms, which constituted features of the wider concept of a fair trial, had undergone a considerable evolution in the Court's case-law, notably in respect of the importance attached to appearances and to the increased sensitivity of the public to the fair administration of justice. The objectivity with which the procureur général's department at the Court of Cassation discharged its functions could not be questioned. However, the opinion of the procureur général's department could not be regarded as neutral from the point of view of the parties to the cassation proceedings. By recommending that an accused's appeal be allowed or dismissed, the official of the procureur général's department became objectively speaking his ally or his opponent. In the latter event, A 6(1) required that the rights of the defence and the principle of equality of arms be respected. The applicant could not reply to the submissions of the avocat général before the Court of Cassation that the appeal should not be allowed: before hearing them, he was unaware of their contents because they had not been communicated to him in advance; thereafter he was prevented from doing so by statute. There was no justification for such restrictions on the rights of the defence. The inequality was increased even more by the avocat général's participation, in an advisory capacity, in the Court's deliberations. Assistance of that nature, given with total objectivity, might be of some use in drafting judgments, although this task fell in the first place to the Court of Cassation itself. Even if such assistance was limited to stylistic consideration, it could reasonably be thought that the deliberations afforded the avocat général an additional opportunity to promote, without fear of contradiction by the applicant, his submissions to the effect that the appeal should be dismissed. Having regard to the requirements of the rights of the defence and of the principle of the equality of arms and to the role of appearances in determining whether they had been complied with, there was a violation of A 6(1).

Finding of violation constituted just satisfaction for damages. Costs and expenses (BEF 113,250).

Borgese v Italy 92/4

[Application lodged 15.4.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 26.2.1992]

The applicant, Mr Michelangelo Borgese, took proceedings on 4 September 1984 before the Rome magistrates' court against the Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale (INPS) to establish his entitlement to a disability pension. On 12 April 1988, the District Court found that the applicant qualified for the pension. The text of the decision was lodged with the registry on 6 July 1988, the judgment became final on 6 July 1989, there having been no appeal to the Court of Cassation. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos (d), Mr SK Martens.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 4 September 1984 when the proceedings were instituted against the INPS in the magistrates' court. It ended on 6 July 1989 when the Rome District Court's judgment became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Special diligence was necessary in employment disputes, which included pensions disputes. Although the Government pleaded the backlog of cases in the relevant courts, A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The case was not complex. The proceedings were conducted at a normal pace in the magistrates' court. The applicant would appear to have delayed serving on the INPS the decision of 22 May 1985 so that the State could not be held responsible for the five and a half months which elapsed before the appeal was filed on 5 November 1985; nor was it answerable for the year which went by before the judgment of 12 April 1988 became final. However, the appeal proceedings remained dormant for more than twenty-two months. In view of what was at stake in the proceedings for the applicant, the lapse of time could not be regarded as reasonable.

Mr Maurizio Botta, who was physically disabled, went on holiday in 1990 to a seaside resort, Lido degli Estensi. There he discovered that the bathing establishments were not equipped with the facilities needed to enable disabled people to gain access to the beach and the sea (particularly special access ramps and specially equipped lavatories and washrooms), in breach of Italian legislation. In 1991 the applicant sent a letter to the mayor asking him to take the necessary measures to remedy the shortcomings noted the previous year. No reply was received, and later in 1991 when the applicant returned to the resort he found that none of the measures requested had been implemented, although they were mandatory. The applicant complained to the carabinieri, alleging that, by failing to take any steps to oblige the private beaches to install the facilities for disabled people prescribed by law, the authorities had committed the offence of omitting to perform an official duty. In May 1992 the judge responsible for preliminary investigations ordered the discontinuation of the proceedings on the ground that, having completed his inquiry, he had not found any evidence that the offence had been committed. The applicant complained of impairment of his private life and development of his personality resulting from the State's failure to take appropriate measures to remedy the omissions of the private bathing establishments, namely the lack of lavatories and ramps providing access to the sea for the use of disabled people. He relied on A 8, claiming that he was unable to enjoy a normal social life which would enable him to participate in the life of the community and to exercise essential rights, such as his non-pecuniary personal rights, on account of the State's failure to discharge its positive obligations to adopt measures and to monitor compliance with domestic provisions relating to private beaches.

Comm found by majority (24–6) NV 8, unanimously NV 8+14.

Court found unanimously that neither 8 nor 14 were applicable.

Judges: Mr F Gölcüklü, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mr R Pekkanen, Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek.

Private life included a person's physical and psychological integrity; the guarantee afforded by A 8 was primarily intended to ensure the development, without outside interference, of the personality of each individual in his relations with other human beings. In the instant case the applicant complained of inaction by the State. While the essential object of A 8 was to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, it did not merely compel the State to abstain from such interference: in addition to this negative undertaking, there may be positive obligations inherent in effective respect for private or family life. These obligations may involve the adoption of measures designed to secure respect for private life even in the sphere of the relations of individuals between themselves. However, the concept of respect is not precisely defined. In order to determine whether such obligations exist, regard must be had to the fair balance to be struck between the general interest and the interests of the individual. The State has a margin of appreciation. A State has obligations of this type where there is a direct and immediate link between the measures sought by an applicant and the latter's private and/or family life. In the instant case, however, the right asserted by the applicant – the right to gain access to the beach and the sea at a place distant from his normal place of residence during his holidays – concerned interpersonal relations of such broad and indeterminate scope that there could be no conceivable direct link between the measures the State was urged to take in order to make good the omissions of the private bathing establishments and the applicant's private life. Accordingly, A 8 was not applicable.

The applicant also relied on A 14 taken in conjunction with A 8, claiming that he was the victim of discrimination against him as a disabled person in the exercise of fundamental rights secured to all. A 14 complemented the other substantive provisions of the Convention and its Protocols. It had no independent existence, since it had effect solely in relation to 'the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms' safeguarded by those provisions. Although the application of A 14 did not presuppose a breach of one or more of those provisions, there could be no room for its application unless the facts of the case fell within the ambit of one or more of the latter. As the Court concluded that A 8 was not applicable, A 14 could not apply.

Mr Emilio Bottazzi complained about the length of civil proceedings in a case concerning the review of a decision to stop payment of a war pension. The proceedings began on 4 April 1991 and

The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. Contracting States had a duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that they could meet the requirements of A 6. There had been 65 judgments in which violations of 6(1) in respect of reasonable time had been found against Italy since 1987 (Capuano) and over 1,400 reports of the Commission resulting in breaches against Italy for the same reason. The frequency of the violations indicated an accumulation of identical breaches which could not be considered to be isolated incidents. The breaches presented a continuing situation which denied applicants a domestic remedy. A period of almost 6 years 8 months in the present case was not reasonable.

Botten v Norway 96/4

[Application lodged 22.12.1989; Commission report 11.10.1994; Court Judgment 19.2.1996]

Mr Harald Ståle Botten was a Lieutenant-Colonel in the Norwegian Air Force. Following a failed rescue in which 2 persons died on a shrimp trawler, a military board of inquiry found that the applicant, as Head of Station, was responsible. After a trial before the City Court the applicant was acquitted. On 12 April 1989 the public prosecutor appealed to the Supreme Court. At the hearing on 20 June 1989 the applicant was not present, although his counsel was, and addressed the Supreme Court and replied to the prosecutor's oral submissions. The Supreme Court heard no witnesses or experts. In a judgment of 27 June 1989, which was final, the Supreme Court upheld the prosecution appeal. He complained of violations of A 6

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr R Ryssdal (d), Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr U Lôhmus.

Regarding the preliminary objection of non-exhaustion, the subject-matter of the complaint was addressed and dealt with in the domestic proceedings. It was implicit in the Supreme Court's judgment that it did not consider the sentencing of the applicant without summoning him or hearing him in person gave rise to any unfairness in the proceedings against the applicant. In those circumstances, although neither the applicant or his counsel raised the matter themselves, the Norwegian court could not be said to have been denied the opportunity which the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies was designed to afford to States, to put right the violations alleged against them. Accordingly, the Government's preliminary objection had to be dismissed.

The manner of application of A 6 to proceedings before courts of appeal depended on the special features of the proceedings involved; account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings in the domestic legal order and of the role of the appellate court therein. Where a public hearing had been held at first instance, the absence of such a hearing might be justified at the appeal stage by the special features of the proceedings at issue, having regard to the nature of the domestic appeal system, the scope of the appellate court's powers and to the manner in which the applicant's interests were actually presented and protected before the court of appeal, particularly in the light of the nature of the issues to be decided by it. Leave-to-appeal proceedings and proceedings involving only questions of law, as opposed to questions of fact, might comply with the requirements of A 6 although the appellant was not given an opportunity of being heard in person by the appeal or cassation court. Even where the court of appeal had full jurisdiction to examine both points of law and of fact, A 6 did not always require a right to a public hearing or, if a hearing took place, a right to be present in person. The fairness of the proceedings in the City Court was undisputed. The appeal proceedings in the Supreme Court included a public and oral hearing at which the applicant was represented by counsel. The fact that the Supreme Court was empowered to overturn an acquittal by the City Court without summoning the defendant and without hearing the latter in person did not on its own infringe the fair hearing guarantee in A 6. Although the facts relating to the question of guilt established by the City Court were undisputed and the Supreme Court was bound by them, it had to some extent to make its own assessment for the purposes of determining whether they provided a sufficient basis for convicting the applicant. The Supreme Court had full jurisdiction to examine questions of fact and of law in considering sentence. However, in deciding on sentence in the case, the Supreme Court did not have the benefit of having a prior assessment of the question by the lower court which had heard the applicant directly. Bearing in mind the character of the offence in question, there was no reason to doubt that the outcome of the proceedings could have adversely affected the applicant's professional career. Taking into account what was at stake for the applicant, the Court did not consider that the issues to be determined by the Supreme Court when convicting and sentencing the applicant – and in doing so overturning his acquittal by the City Court – could, as a matter of fair trial, properly have been examined without a direct assessment of the evidence given by the applicant in person. Having regard to the entirety of the proceedings before the Norwegian courts, to the role of the Supreme Court and to the nature of the issues adjudicated on, the Court reached the conclusion that there were no special features to justify the fact that the Supreme Court did not summon the applicant and hear evidence from him directly before passing judgment. The Supreme Court was under a duty to take positive measures to that effect, notwithstanding the fact that the applicant neither attended the hearing, nor asked for leave to address the court, nor objected through his counsel to a new judgment under the relevant legislation being given by the Supreme Court. Therefore there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Damages not sought. Not necessary to make an award for costs and expenses.

Bouamar v Belgium (1989) 11 EHRR 1 88/1

[Application lodged 2.9.1980; Commission report 18.7.1986; Court Judgment 29.2.1999 (merits), 27.6.1988 (A50)]

Mr Naïm Bouamar, a Moroccan national, was a minor at the material time. He arrived in Belgium in 1972 and, as an adolescent with a disturbed personality, he was placed in various juvenile homes. In May 1978, the applicant was suspected of certain offences and was brought before the Liège Juvenile Court. Thereafter, a number of court orders were made in regard to him under the Children's and Young Persons' Welfare Act 1965 whose purpose was to protect the health, morals and education of young people under 18. On 9 occasions in 1980 he was ordered to be remanded in custody; in all, he was deprived of his liberty for 119 days during the period from 18 January to 4 November 1980. The applicant complained that his detentions were contrary to A 5(1), that the lawfulness of his detentions had never been reviewed and that the manner in which the proceedings were organised discriminated between adults and juveniles.

Comm found unanimously V 5(1)(d), V 5(4), no separate issue under 13, NV 5(4)+14.

Court found unanimously V 5(1), by majority (6–1) V 5(4), unanimously not necessary to consider 13, unanimously NV 5(4)+14.

Judges (merits and A 50): Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer (pd).

A 5(1) set out an exhaustive list which had to be interpreted strictly. It was for the national authorities, notably the courts, to interpret and apply the domestic law of their State. The confinement of a juvenile in a remand prison did not necessarily contravene A 5(1)(d), even if it was not in itself such as to provide for the person's 'educational supervision'. A 5(1)(d) did not preclude an interim custody measure being used as a preliminary to a regime of supervised education, without itself involving any supervised education. In such circumstances, however, the imprisonment must be speedily followed by actual application of such a regime in a setting (open or closed) designed and with sufficient resources for the purpose. The Belgian State had chosen the system of educational supervision with a view to carrying out its policy on juvenile delinquency. Consequently it was under an obligation to put in place appropriate institutional facilities which met the demands of security and the educational objectives of the relevant legislation, in order to be able to satisfy the requirements of A 5(1)(d). Nothing in the evidence, however, showed that that was the case. The applicant had been detained in a remand prison in conditions of virtual isolation and without the assistance of staff with educational training, that could not be regarded as furthering any educational aim. The 9 placement orders, taken together, were not compatible with A 5(1)(d). Their fruitless repetition had the effect of making them less and less 'lawful' under A 5(1)(d), especially as Crown Counsel never instituted criminal proceedings against the applicant in respect of the offences alleged against him. There was therefore a breach of A 5(1).

The scope of the obligation under A 5(4) was not identical in all circumstances or for every kind of deprivation of liberty. In a case of the present kind, it was essential not only that the individual concerned should have the opportunity to be heard in person (as the applicant was) but that he should also have the effective assistance of his lawyer (his lawyers were not present at the Juvenile Court hearings). The mere fact that the applicant, who was very young at the time, appeared in person before the court did not, in the circumstances of the case, afford him the necessary safeguards. On appeal, the Court of Appeal heard the applicant's lawyers. However, there were lapses of time which were not compatible with the speed required by the terms of A 5(4). Furthermore, the appellate court did not really 'decide' the 'lawfulness' of the placement measures which were challenged before it, although it did go into the issue of lawfulness in some of the reasons given in two of its three decisions. The applicant's ordinary appeals and appeals on points of law thus had no practical effect. In sum, there had been a breach of A 5(4).

In the light of the conclusions regarding A 5(4), it was not necessary in this case to enquire into the less strict requirements of A 13, especially as the applicant did not reiterate the complaint in question before the Court.

The difference of treatment of between adults and juveniles regarding the review of the lawfulness of detention did not amount to discrimination. It stemmed from the protective, not punitive, nature of the procedure applicable to juveniles in Belgium. There was, accordingly, an objective and reasonable justification for the difference of treatment.

Friendly settlement reached (payment of 150,000 BEF to applicant) and accordingly the A 50 struck out of list.

Bouchelkia v France 97/1

[Application lodged 25.10.1993; Commission report 6.9.1995; Court Judgment 29.1.1997]

Mr Hadi Bouchelkia was born in 1970 in Algeria and came to France in 1972 with his mother and his elder brother under the arrangements for family reunion. His mother and nine brothers and sisters live in France. He was convicted of rape with violence and theft. He escaped from custody and received an addition to the sentence for the other matters. On 11 June 1990 the Minister of the Interior made a deportation order against the applicant. His subsequent appeals were unsuccessful. In 1986 he met a woman of French nationality whom he married on 29 March 1996. They had a daughter born on 22 February 1993, in respect of whom he made a formal declaration of paternity on 3 December 1993. He complained of violation of his right to respect for his private and family life.

The deportation order was made on 11 June 1990 and executed on 9 July 1990. It was with regard to the position at that time that the question whether the applicant had a private and family life within the meaning of A 8 fell to be considered. The applicant was at that point single and had no children. He only started his own family after the deportation order was made, thereby consolidating his family ties in France. At the time, he was still living with his original family and, since the age of 2, had lived in France where he had his main private and family ties. The applicant's deportation in 1990 amounted to an interference with his right to respect for his private and family life. The deportation order was based on s 26 of the 1945 Ordinance. The interference had aims which were entirely compatible with the Convention, namely 'the prevention of disorder or crime'. It was for the Contracting States to maintain public order, in particular by exercising their right, as a matter of well-established international law and subject to their treaty obligations, to control the entry and residence of aliens. For that purpose they were entitled to order the expulsion of such persons convicted of criminal offences. However, their decisions in that field had, in so far as they may interfere with a right protected under A 8(1), to be necessary in a democratic society, that is to say, justified by a pressing social need and, in particular, proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The applicant, who was 20 years old, single and had no children when the deportation order was executed, maintained links at the material time with his country of origin of which he was a national and where close relatives of his lived. In addition the Court attached great importance to the nature of the offence which gave rise to the deportation order, aggravated rape. While it had been committed when the applicant was a minor aged 17, that did not detract from the seriousness and gravity of such a crime. The authorities could legitimately consider that the applicant's deportation was, at that time, necessary for the prevention of disorder or crime. The fact that, after the deportation order was made and while he was an illegal immigrant, the applicant built up a new family life, did not justify finding, a posteriori, that the deportation order made and executed in 1990 was not necessary. In the circumstances, a fair balance was struck between the relevant interests and the decision to deport the applicant was not disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. There had therefore been no violation of A 8.

[Application lodged 3.6.1993; Commission report 10.1.1995; Court Judgment 24.4.1996]

Mr Kamel Boughanemi was a Tunisian national. He came to France in 1968 at the age of 8 and lived there continuously until his deportation. His parents and his ten brothers and sisters resided in France. He claimed that he lived with a woman of French nationality whose child, born on 19 June 1993, he did not formally recognise until 5 April 1994. The applicant was convicted on a number of occasions for offences of burglary, assault, driving without a licence and without insurance and living on the earnings of prostitution with aggravating circumstances. On 8 March 1988 the Minister of the Interior issued an order for his deportation. The deportation order was executed on 12 November 1988 but the applicant returned to France and lived there illegally. His appeals against the deportation order were dismissed. He complained of violation of his right to respect for his private and family life.

The applicant had recognised his child, admittedly belatedly. The concept of family life on which A 8 was based embraced, even where there was no cohabitation, the tie between a parent and his or her child, regardless of whether or not the latter was legitimate. In his case neither the belated character of the formal recognition, nor the applicant's alleged conduct in regard to the child, constituted a breaking of the tie. The applicant's parents and his ten brothers and sisters were legally resident in France and there was no evidence that he had no ties with them. His deportation had the effect of separating him from them and from the child. It could therefore be regarded as an interference with the exercise of the right under A 8. The order for deportation was based on sections 23 and 24 of the 1945 Ordinance on the conditions of entry and residence of aliens in France. The interference in question pursued the legitimate aim of 'the prevention of disorder' and the prevention of 'crime'. It was for the Contracting States to maintain public order, in particular by exercising their right, as a matter of well-established international law and subject to their treaty obligations, to control the entry and residence of aliens and notably to order the expulsion of aliens convicted of criminal offences. In determining whether the interference was 'necessary', allowance was made for the margin of appreciation left to the Contracting States in this field. The applicant had arrived in France at the age of 8 and was legally resident there from 1968 to 1988; he had then lived there, after his return as an illegal immigrant, until 12 October 1994. He had done most of his schooling there. His parents and siblings lived there. In addition he lived with a French woman there as man and wife and eventually formally recognised her child. His retention of his Tunisian nationality indicated that he had never manifested a wish to become French. He did not claim that he could not speak Arabic, or that he had cut all his ties with his country of birth, or that he had not returned there after his deportation. Particular importance was attached to the fact that the applicant's deportation was decided after he had been sentenced to a total of almost four years' imprisonment, non-suspended, three of which were for living on the earnings of prostitution with aggravating circumstances. The seriousness of that last offence and the applicant's previous convictions counted heavily against him. In the circumstances the applicant's deportation was not disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. There had accordingly been no violation of A 8.

Mr Driss Boujlifa, a Moroccan, entered France at the age of 5 when he joined his father under the family reunion procedure. Three of his eight brothers and sisters had French nationality. When he was 20 he committed a number of criminal offences and in 1985 was sentenced to imprisonment for armed robbery. After he had served these sentences he was extradited to Switzerland to serve a prison sentence for theft. At the end of that period he returned to France and went to live with his parents. Deportation proceedings were commenced against him on account of the convictions. His appeals against the order were dismissed. He complained of a violation of his right to respect for private and family life.

Whether the applicant had a private and family life within the meaning of A 8 had to be determined by the Court in the light of the position at the time when the impugned measure was adopted. Although he could not claim at that time to be involved in a relationship, he had received his schooling there, and his parents and his eight brothers and sisters lived there. Consequently, the measure complained of amounted to interference with the applicant's right to respect for his private and family life. The deportation order was based on the 1945 Ordinance concerning the conditions of entry and residence of aliens in France. The interference sought to achieve the aim of 'the prevention of disorder or crime'. It was for the Contracting States to maintain public order, in particular by exercising their right to control the entry and residence of aliens. To that end they had the power to deport aliens convicted of criminal offences. With regard to the applicant's ties, the applicant had arrived in France at the age of 5 and had lived there since 1967, except for the period from 5 May 1987 to 5 August 1988, when he was serving a prison sentence in Switzerland. He received his education in France, he worked there for a short period and his parents and his eight brothers and sisters live there. On the other hand, he had not shown any desire to acquire French nationality at the time when he was entitled to do so. The offences committed, by their seriousness and the severity of the penalties they attracted, constituted a particularly serious violation of the security of persons and property and of public order. In the circumstances the requirements of public order outweighed the personal considerations which prompted the application. The order for the applicant's deportation could not be regarded as disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. There had accordingly been no breach of A 8.

Bowman v United Kingdom 98/7

[Application lodged 11.3.1994; Commission report 12.9.1996; Court Judgment 19.2.1998]

The applicant, Mrs Phyllis Bowman, was the executive director of the Society for the Protection of the Unborn Child (SPUC), an organisation opposed to abortion and human embryo experimentation. Before the parliamentary elections in April 1992, she arranged to have about one and a half million of the Society's leaflets distributed in constituencies throughout the United Kingdom. She was charged with an offence under sub-sections 75(1) and (5) of the Representation of the People Act 1983 which prohibited expenditure of more than GBP 5,000 by an unauthorised person during the period before an election on conveying information to electors with a view to promoting or procuring the election of a candidate. At her trial on 27 September 1993, the judge directed her acquittal because the summons charging her with the offence had not been issued within one year of the alleged prohibited expenditure in accordance with time limits in the Act. The proceedings were reported in the press. She complained that the prosecution violated her right to freedom of expression.

Comm found by majority (28–1) V 10.

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (14–6) V 10.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti (jc), Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos (pd), Mrs E Palm, Mr A N Loizou (jpd), Sir John Freeland (pd), Mr AB Baka (jpd), Mr MA Lopes Rocha (jc), Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek (jpd), Mr U Lôhmus, Mr E Levits (pd), Mr J Casadevall (jc), Mr P Van Dijk (jd).

Although she was eventually acquitted on a technicality, a prosecution had been brought against the applicant, indicating that the authorities considered that, unless she modified her behaviour during future elections, she would run the risk of being prosecuted again and possibly convicted and punished. She could properly claim to have been directly affected by the law in question and, therefore, to be a victim within the meaning of A 25(1). The Government's preliminary objection was accordingly dismissed.

The prohibition on expenditure contained in s 75 of the 1983 Act amounted to a restriction on freedom of expression, which directly affected the applicant. The restriction was provided for by the legislation. The purpose of s 75 was to contribute towards securing equality between candidates. Therefore, the application of this law to the applicant pursued the legitimate aim of protecting the rights of others, namely the candidates for election and the electorate in Halifax and, to the extent that the prosecution was intended to have a deterrent effect, elsewhere in the United Kingdom. Section 75 of the 1983 Act operated, for all practical purposes, as a total barrier to the applicant publishing information with a view to influencing the voters of Halifax in favour of an anti-abortion candidate. The Court was not satisfied that it was necessary to limit her expenditure to GBP 5,000 in order to achieve the legitimate aim of securing equality between candidates, particularly in view of the fact that there were no restrictions placed upon the freedom of the press to support or oppose the election of any particular candidate or upon political parties and their supporters to advertise at national or regional level, provided that such advertisements were not intended to promote or prejudice the electoral prospects of any particular candidate in any particular constituency. Accordingly the restriction was disproportionate to the aim pursued. There had therefore been a violation of A 10.

Mr Terence Boyle formed a close bond over the years with his sister's son C. Following an application by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, C was removed from the care of his mother under a Place of Safety Order on 2 February 1989 on suspicion that he had been sexually abused by her. The Juvenile Court made a full care order on behalf of the local authority; during proceedings the applicant was described as having been 'a good father figure' to C. His requests for access to C throughout C's placement in care were restricted. He complained that the refusal by the local authority to allow him access to his nephew in care and of the absence of any possibility of applying to the courts for access infringed his right to respect for family life.

Boyle and Rice v United Kingdom (1988) 10 EHRR 425 88/3

[Application lodged 4.3.1981; Commission report 15.1.1982; Court Judgment 27.4.1988]

The applicants James and Sarah Boyle: the first applicant was sentenced in Scotland to life imprisonment for murder. He received a number of subsequent prison sentences in 1968 and 1973 for prison breaking, attempted murder of a prison officer and assault on prison staff. The second applicant was his wife, a doctor by profession. The applicant complained that during his detention in Saughton Prison between September 1980 and November 1981 there had been infringement of his right to respect for their family and private life and home and correspondence and freedom of expression by the authorities imposing restrictions on the length of visits, the letters he could send, censorship of his mail and the reading of some of it in public by prison officers in a manner seriously inhibiting and embarrassing for the applicants, denial of access to a telephone, the refusal of the prison authorities in July 1981 to post a letter from the applicant to a friend, refusal to allow him to visit his home other than under a special escorted leave which afforded no privacy. They also complained that, in breach of A 13, there was no effective remedy before a national authority in respect of their complaints under the Convention.

The applicants Brian and John Rice: the first applicant was sentenced to life imprisonment for murder in 1967. The applicants alleged breach of A 8 during Brian Rice's period at Saughton Prison regarding the refusal to grant compassionate leave to visit his father John Rice who was ill, restrictions on prison visits, delays and stoppages to various letters which had been either delayed or stopped by the prison authorities. In addition they alleged that, in breach of A 13, there was no effective remedy before a national authority in respect of the claims presented in their application.

Comm found unanimously V 8 regarding stopping of Mr Boyle's letter, by majority (13–1) V 13 regarding limited prison visiting entitlement, unanimously V 13 regarding refusal to grant Brian Rice compassionate leave, NV 13 regarding applicants' other complaints.

Court unanimously found V 8 regarding stopping of Mr Boyle's letter, NV 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (so), Mr N Valticos.

The stopping of Mr Boyle's letter violated A 8. Regarding Mr and Mrs Boyle's complaint regarding letter postage, the rules on payment of postage (prison authorities paid the postage of one outgoing letter per week and the postage of additional letters had to be met from prison earnings but not from the prisoner's general financial resources) were not in themselves unreasonable. Nor was the vegetarian diet provided to Mr Boyle in prison inadequate, so that he was forced to spend his earnings on extra food rather than correspondence. Accordingly, no breach of A 13. Regarding Mr Brian Rice's complaint of delay of or refusal to post certain letters: on the evidence adduced, there was no arguable claim of violation of A 8 and so no violation of A 13. Regarding Mr and Mrs Boyle's complaint of screening of correspondence the Court recognised that some measure of control over prisoners' correspondence was called for and was not of itself incompatible with the Convention. No arguable claim of violation of A 8 had been made and consequently, no violation of A 13. Regarding their complaint that his mail was read aloud, that would constitute an abuse under the Prison Rules and be contrary to the Standing Orders and, if necessary, a petition to the Secretary of State would have provided an effective remedy under domestic law. Accordingly there had been no breach of A 13. Mr Boyle's complaint regarding the stopping of a letter constituted a violation of A 8. It was raised by petition to the Secretary of State and although he rejected the petition that did not establish that the remedy provided was ineffective. In addition, Mr Boyle could have applied to the courts for judicial review. Accordingly, the remedies available to Mr Boyle in respect of this complaint were sufficient to meet the requirements of A 13 which was therefore not breached. The applicants complained about the limited visiting entitlement. In general it was justifiable to apply to prisoners a uniform regime avoiding any appearance of arbitrariness or discrimination. In any event, in so far as the alleged inadequacy of visiting facilities flowed from a decision by the Governor of Saughton Prison, a remedy existed by way of petition to the Secretary of State, backed up if need be by an application to the courts for judicial review. The lack of success of those representations did not demonstrate that petition to the Secretary of State was an ineffective remedy for airing such complaints. Accordingly there had been no violation of A 13. Even if the complaint of Mr and Mrs Boyle regarding special escorted leave were arguable, an effective remedy existed in the form of a petition to the Secretary of State, who was competent to examine both the terms of the scheme and the individual decisions taken thereunder by the Governor. That conclusion was not affected by the unsuccessful outcome of the representations made to the Secretary of State in this connection by the applicants' solicitors. There had therefore been no violation of A 13 in relation to that complaint. There was no violation of A 8 regarding Brian and John Rice's complaint regarding compassionate leave. Taking into account all the circumstances of the case there had been no violation of A 13.

The difference in treatment between the detention in Saughton Prison and that in an open prison did not raise an arguable issue of discrimination under A 14.

Bozano v France (1987) 9 EHRR 297, (1991) 13 EHRR 428 86/14

[Application lodged 30.3.1982; Commission report 7.12.1984; Court Judgments 18.12.1986 (merits), 2.12.1987 (JS)]

Mr Lorenzo Bozano, an Italian national, had been arrested by Italian police in May 1971 on a charge of abduction and murder in Genoa on 6 May. He was also charged with indecency offences with violence on four women. In June 1973 he was sentenced to imprisonment for offences relating to one of the four women. He was acquitted of the other charges, including the abduction and murder and he was released (having served time on remand). The prosecution appealed to the Genoa Assize Court of Appeal. The appeal began in April 1975, but the accused applied for an adjournment on medical grounds. The court found that he was deliberately refusing to appear and proceeded with the hearing. In May 1975, that court gave judgment in absentia and sentenced the applicant to life imprisonment for the abduction and murder and to four years' imprisonment for the other offences. An international arrest warrant was issued, the applicant having taken refuge in France. Italy officially applied to France for his extradition. In May 1979, the Indictment Division of the Limoges Court of Appeal ruled against extradition, finding that the Italian procedure for trial in absentia was incompatible with French public policy. On 26 October 1979 the applicant was abducted by armed police and driven to the Swiss border from where he was extradited to Italy. The applicant argued that his 'abduction' and his 'forcible removal' to Switzerland had deprived him of his personal liberty and his freedom of movement, contrary to A 5(1) and P4A2. He also claimed breach of A 18.

Comm found by a majority (11–2) V 5(1), made no express finding in respect of 18 and considered it unnecessary to examine the case under P4A2.

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objections, unanimously found V 5(1), not necessary to examine the case either under 18 taken together with 5(1) or under P4A2.

The Government's preliminary objections of incompatibility with the Convention and non-exhaustion of domestic remedies were rejected, the latter objection being in part out of time and for the rest without foundation.

The case concerned the deprivation of liberty he suffered in France during the night of 26/27 October 1979: the main issue to be determined was whether the detention was 'lawful', including whether it was in accordance with 'a procedure prescribed by law'. The Convention refers essentially to national law and establishes the need to apply its rules, but it also requires that any measure depriving the individual of his liberty must be compatible with the purpose of A 5, namely to protect the individual from arbitrariness. This case concerned not only the 'right to liberty' but also the 'right to security of person'. The applicant's contention that the police action of 26/27 October 1979 was automatically deprived of any legal basis when the deportation order was retroactively quashed by the Limoges Administrative Court did not convince the Court. A Contracting State's agents may conduct themselves unlawfully in good faith: in such cases, a subsequent finding by the courts that there has been a failure to comply with domestic law may not necessarily retrospectively affect the validity, under domestic law, of any implementing measures taken in the meantime. However, it could be different if the authorities at the outset knowingly contravened the legislation in force and, in particular, if their original decision was an abuse of powers. There had been an abuse of powers in this case. The Limoges Administrative Court pointed out the haste with which the executive had proceeded, when the applicant had not even indicated his refusal to comply, and the choice of the Swiss border rather than any other; that court had come to the conclusion that the intention had been, not to expel the applicant, but to hand him over to the Italian authorities via the Swiss authorities, with whom Italy had an extradition agreement and therefore to circumvent the negative ruling in relation to extradition, which was binding on the French Government. Where the Convention refers directly back to domestic law, as in A 5, compliance with such law is an integral part of Contracting States' 'engagements' and the Court is accordingly competent to satisfy itself of such compliance where relevant; the scope of its task in this connection, however, is subject to limits inherent in the logic of the European system of protection, since it is in the first place for the national authorities, notably the courts, to interpret and apply domestic law. The arguments before the Court provided sufficient material for the Court to have the gravest doubts whether the contested deprivation of liberty satisfied the legal requirements in the respondent State. 'Lawfulness' also implies absence of any arbitrariness. The Court attached great weight to the circumstances in which the applicant was forcibly conveyed to the Swiss border. In the circumstances of the case, the Court concluded that the applicant's deprivation of liberty in the night of 26/27 October 1975 was neither 'lawful', within the meaning of A 5(1)(f), nor compatible with the 'right to security of person'. Depriving the applicant of his liberty in this way amounted in fact to a disguised form of extradition designed to circumvent the negative ruling of May 1979 by the Indictment Division of the Limoges Court of Appeal, and not to 'detention' necessary in the ordinary course of 'action ... taken with a view to deportation'. There was therefore a breach of A 5(1).

The applicant also relied on A 18, taken together with A 5(1). Given the decision of the Court in respect of A 5(1) taken alone, it was not necessary to examine the same issue under A 18. The Court had no jurisdiction to entertain an allegation made under A 5(4) which had been declared inadmissible by the Commission. The Court's conclusions in relation to A 5(1) made it unnecessary to determine whether P4A2(1) applied or was complied with.

[Application lodged 6.9.1984, 13.3.1987 and 21.10.1987; Commission report 8.5.1990; Court Judgment 28.8.1991]

Mr Karl Brandstetter was an Austrian wine merchant. Following an inspection by the Federal Inspector of Cellars and a report by the Agricultural Institute, the District Prosecutor instituted proceedings against him under s 45 of the Wine Act in respect of offences of offering for sale to the public 'imitation wine' and adulterated wine. The applicant complained that in proceedings concerning the quality of the wine and those relating to the charge of tampering with evidence, he had not had a fair trial, nor had he had the benefit of the right of the defence because of the position which the experts of the Agricultural Institute had occupied in relation to other expert witnesses. On 20 August 1984 criminal proceedings had been instituted at the request of the public prosecutor against the applicant for defamation, following his accusing the Inspector of Cellars of irregularities in taking the first samples. In so doing he had exposed the latter to the risk of disciplinary sanctions. He complained of further breaches of the rights of the defence and the principle of the presumption of innocence.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(d) regarding the quality of the wine and tampering with evidence, by majority (9–3) V 6(3) regarding the applicant's conviction for defamation, unanimously no separate issue regarding other aspects of 6(1) and 6(2), by majority (11–1) NV 6(1) regarding equality of arms in the defamation proceedings.

Court found unanimously NV 6(1)+6(3)(d) regarding the quality of the wine, unanimously that, in the same proceedings, NV 6(3)(c), rejected unanimously Government's preliminary objection regarding expert evidence, unanimously that, in those proceedings, NV 6(1)+6(3)(d), unanimously that, as regards those proceedings, not necessary to examine the other complaints 6(1) and 6(2), unanimously that regarding the defamation proceedings, NV 6(3)(c) and by majority (6–3) NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (pd), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (pd), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (pd), Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr SK Martens.

Read literally, A 6(3)(d) related to witnesses and not experts. However, the guarantees in A 6(3) were constituent elements, amongst others, of the concept of a fair trial in A 6(1) and therefore the position of the expert in the proceedings and the manner in which he performed his functions could be considered. The fact that an expert is employed by the same institute or laboratory as the expert on whose opinion the indictment is based, did not in itself justify fears that he will be unable to act with proper neutrality. In this case the defence had not raised any objection to the expert until after the filing of his report, which was unfavourable to the applicant. The mere fact that the expert belonged to the staff of the Agricultural Institute did not justify his being regarded as a witness for the prosecution. The District Court's refusal of the defence's request to appoint other experts could not be seen as a breach of the principle of equality of arms. Nor was the refusal to call another expert as a witness unfair. The right to a fair trial did not require that a national court should appoint, at the request of the defence, further experts when the opinion of the court-appointed expert supported the prosecution case. Accordingly, there was no violation of A 6(1) read in conjunction with A 6(3)(d). The applicant had never sought the attendance and examination of the members of the Agricultural Institute's panel in the proceedings concerning the quality of wine. The results of the wine-tasting procedures were part of the written expert opinions. The District Court had accepted the views and had found that the minutes of the wine-tasting session, which the applicant wanted to examine, did not constitute conclusive evidence. There was no violation of A 6(3)(1) and 6(3)(d). A 6(3)(c) did not provide for an unlimited right to use any defence arguments. The Court agreed in principle with the ruling of the Vienna Court of Appeal, that the rights of defence could not extend to an accused's conduct where it amounted to a criminal offence. The mere possibility of an accused being subsequently prosecuted on account of allegations made in his defence could not be deemed to infringe his rights under A 6(3)(c). He had not been threatened with the possibility of prosecution for defamation and there was no evidence that he was stopped from making the statements or in any way restrained from airing the views which he expressed. There had therefore been no violation of A 6(3)(c).

Regarding the Government's preliminary objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies, the applicant had raised his complaint regarding the expert to the Vienna Court of Appeal which had rejected it. That being so, the domestic remedies were exhausted. The charge of tampering with evidence originated in a report prepared by the expert Mr F who was later appointed as official expert by the court in those proceedings. In those circumstances the applicant's apprehensions with regard to the neutrality and objectivity of the expert in question could be held to have been justified. Although it was not contrary to the Convention to examine Mr F, under the principle of equality of arms, persons who were or could be called, in whatever capacity, by the defence in order to refute the views professed by Mr Flack, should have been examined under the same conditions as he was. Although the applicant's expert was not heard 'under the same conditions' as Mr F, in the light of the way argument was presented to the hearing it could not be said that the refusal to appoint the applicant's expert amounted to a breach of the principle of equality of arms. Having regard to the particular circumstances of the case concerning the charge of tampering with evidence, the Court concluded that there had been no violation of A 6(1) and 6(3)(d).

The principle of equality of arms included the fundamental right that criminal proceedings should be adversarial. The right to an adversarial trial meant, in a criminal case, that both prosecution and defence must be given the opportunity to have knowledge of and comment on the observations filed and the evidence adduced by the other party. In the present case no copy of the submissions of the Senior Public Prosecutor was sent to the applicant and he was not informed of their having been filed either. An indirect and purely hypothetical possibility for an accused to comment on prosecution arguments included in the text of a judgment could not be regarded as a proper substitute for the right to examine and reply directly to submissions made by the prosecution. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1) in the appeal proceedings concerning the defamation case.

Brannigan and McBride v United Kingdom (1994) 17 EHRR 539 93/19

[Application lodged 19.1.1989; Commission report 3.12.1991; Court Judgment 26.5.1993]

Mr Peter Brannigan, a labourer, was arrested at his home by police officers on 9 January 1989 at 6.30 am under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 and removed to an Interrogation Centre at Gough Barracks. Extensions on his detention resulted in his being detained for a total period of 6 days, 14 hours and 30 minutes. During his detention he was interrogated on 43 occasions and denied access to books, newspapers and writing materials as well radio and television, not allowed to associate with other prisoners and had access to a solicitor delayed. He was seen by a medical practitioner on 17 occasions during police custody.

Mr Patrick McBride was arrested at his home by police officers on 5 January 1989 at 5.05 am and then removed to Castlereagh Interrogation Centre. Extensions to his detention resulted in a total period of detention of a total period of four days, six hours and 25 minutes. During his detention he was interrogated on 22 occasions and was subject to the same regime as Mr Brannigan. He received two visits from his solicitor and was seen by a medical practitioner on eight occasions during police custody. Mr McBride was shot dead on 4 February 1992 by a policeman who had run amok and attacked Sinn Fein Headquarters in Belfast.

The applicants complained that they were not brought promptly before a judge contrary to A 5(3), that they did not have an enforceable right to compensation in breach of A 5(5) and that there was no effective remedy in respect of their complaints contrary to A 13.

Comm found by majority (8–5) NV 5(3) in view of the UK's derogation under 15, unanimously no separate issue under 13.

Court found by majority (22–4) UK derogation satisfied the requirements of 15 and thus applicants could not validly complain of violation of 5(3), NV 5(5)+13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (declaration), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (c), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh (d), Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo (c), Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (d), Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens(c), Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (jc), Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk (d), Mr D Gotchev.

Having regard to its judgment in the case of Brogan and Others, the Court found that A 5(3) and A 5(5) had not been respected. However, the Government submitted that the failure to observe these requirements of A 5 had been met by their derogation of 23 December 1988 under A 15. Having regard to the nature of the terrorist threat in Northern Ireland, the limited scope of the derogation and the reasons advanced in support of it, as well as the existence of basic safeguards against abuse, the Court considered that the Government had not exceeded their margin of appreciation in considering that the derogation was strictly required by the exigencies of the situation. The derogation satisfied the requirements of A 15 and therefore the applicants could not validly complain of a violation of A 5(3). It followed that there was no obligation under A 5(5) to provide the applicants with an enforceable right to compensation.

It was open to the applicants to challenge the lawfulness of their detention by way of proceedings for habeas corpus, a remedy which satisfied A 5(4). Since the requirements of A 13 were less strict than those of A 5(4), which had to be regarded as the lex specialis in respect of complaints under A 5, there had been no breach of that provision.

Bricmont v Belgium (1990) 12 EHRR 217 89/12

[Application lodged 13.2.1984; Commission report 15.10.1987; Court Judgment 7.7.1989]

Mr Georges Bricmont, the first applicant had responsibility for managing some of the Prince of Belgium's assets and was assisted on occasions by his wife, Louise, the second applicant. They were convicted of various counts of forgery and misappropriation of funds. The criminal proceedings were brought by the Prince, who also joined the proceedings as a civil party seeking damages. The applicants complained that they had not had a fair trial because of the Prince's position. They complained about deficiencies in the judicial investigation, the refusal to arrange a confrontation with the Prince and to take evidence from him, the failure to examine certain witnesses, the failure to have an audit account carried out and the failure to produce a picture involved in one of the charges. They relied on A 6(1), A 6(3)(b) and A 6(3)(d).

Comm found by a majority (10–1) V 6(1) in that the applicants were in a less favourable position than the Prince and (6–5) V 6(3)(d) owing the failure to hear witness M; unanimously NV 6(3)(b) regarding the failure to produce the picture 'Storm over Cannes' and lack of special examination of the accounts and NV 6(3)(d) regarding the failure to hear witnesses G and C.

Court unanimously dismissed the preliminary issue of non-exhaustion, found by a majority (5–2) V 6 as regards the failure to arrange a confrontation between the party seeking civil damages and the first applicant on some of the charges; unanimously NV 6 as regards the failure to arrange a confrontation between the party seeking damages and the second applicant; by a majority (5–2) NV 6 as regards the failure to have the accounts audited and unanimously NV 6 in respect of any of the other points raised by the applicants.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr F Matscher (pd), Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (pd), Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo (pd), Mr J De Meyer (pd).

The Court held that on the preliminary issue of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies the Government was estopped from relying on that rule as it had not been raised with sufficient clarity before the Commission.

There were objective reasons for having special regulations governing the taking of evidence from and the questioning of high-ranking persons of State and that did not conflict with A 6. The criminal proceedings were based on the Prince's accusations. The rights of the defence, an essential part of the right to a fair trial, required that the applicants should have an opportunity to challenge any aspect of the complainant's account during a confrontation or an examination, either in public or, if necessary, at the home of the complainant. At each stage of the proceedings the applicants asked for a confrontation with the Prince but none was ever arranged for the second applicant and the one with the first applicant dealt only with some of the charges. In convicting the first applicant, the Court of Appeal relied on the evidence of witnesses who had not been examined or confronted in the presence of the applicant in respect of those charges. Accordingly there had been a violation of A 6. It was normally for the national courts to decide whether it was necessary or advisable to call a witness. There were exceptional circumstances which could prompt the Court to conclude that the failure to hear a person as a witness was incompatible with A 6 but in the instant case it did not have sufficient grounds to so conclude. While an audit would have been desirable in view of the nature of the case, most of the transactions had been completed without any bank records being made and through companies which observed a rule of secrecy. In addition the applicants had never clearly requested an audit and therefore the failure to order an audit could not amount to a breach of A 6(1) and (3)(b). With regard to the failure to produce the picture, the applicants had not given details and could not therefore claim to be victims of a breach in that regard.

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (BEF 274,335.95).

[Application lodged 22.2.1985; Commission report 6.12.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991]

In July 1961 Mr Natale Brigandì's warehouse was demolished by Mr B who put up a new building on the site. On 14 May 1962 the applicant sued Mr B seeking injunctions for demolition of the new building and rebuilding of his warehouse. The Court of Appeal gave final judgment on 23 July 1990 which was filed on 8 October 1990 awarding the applicant compensation and interest on the majority of his claim.

The period to be considered began on 1 August 1973 when Italy recognised the right of individual petition to the ECHR. The proceedings ended on 8 October 1990 when the Court of Appeal's judgment was filed. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The case was not complex although it had been dealt with at several levels of jurisdiction. A lapse of more than 17 years could not be regarded as reasonable especially as over 11 years had earlier elapsed before Italy recognised the right of individual petition. Accordingly V 6(1). In view of that conclusion it was unnecessary to examine P1A1.

Brincat v Italy (1993) 16 EHRR 591 92/70

[Application lodged 8.1.1988; Commission report 28.11.1991; Court Judgment 26.11.1992]

Mr Joseph Brincat, a Maltese lawyer, was a member of the Maltese Parliament and the Assembly of the Council of Europe. On 19 November 1987 one of his clients was seriously injured in a road accident. The applicant was instructed by an insurance company to report on the circumstances of the accident, and on 5 December 1987, accompanied by the victim's wife, he went to a scrapyard where the damaged vehicle had been taken. The client's wife having attempted to recover personal property concealed in the petrol tank, the owner of the scrapyard alerted the police, who discovered in her possession, inter alia, a banknote which formed part of the ransom paid for the release of a person who had been kidnapped. They were taken to the police station. The applicant appeared before the Lagonegro public prosecutor on Monday 7 December, who confirmed his detention. The public prosecutor conducted the preliminary investigation. On 14 December, the Lagonegro public prosecutor declared that he did not have territorial jurisdiction and sent the file to Paola, which had jurisdiction. On 18 December the Paola public prosecutor issued various orders and questioned him on Tuesday 22 December. On Monday 28 December 1987 the Cosenza District Court ordered the applicant's immediate release, as there was insufficient evidence against him. The public prosecutor's appeal was still pending. The applicant complained of his detention.

Comm found unanimously V 5(3).

Court found unanimously V 5(3).

A judicial officer who is competent to decide on detention may also carry out other duties, but there is a risk that his impartiality may arouse legitimate doubt on the part of those subject to his decisions if he is entitled to intervene in the subsequent proceedings as a representative of the prosecuting authority. The Court recalled its previous case-law. If the 'officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power' might later intervene, in the subsequent proceedings, as a representative of the prosecuting authority, there was a risk that his impartiality might arouse doubts which were to be held objectively justified. That was the case on 7 December 1987 when the Lagonegro deputy public prosecutor decided to confirm the applicant's detention. The mere fact that it became clear afterwards, on 14 December 1987, that he lacked territorial jurisdiction and therefore would not be entitled to conduct the prosecution was immaterial. The Paola public prosecutor too did not fulfil the conditions for a judicial officer deciding on detention; moreover, he did not hear Mr Brincat 'promptly' before issuing a warrant for his arrest. There had therefore been a violation of A 5(3).

British-American Tobacco Company Ltd v Netherlands (1996) 21 EHRR 409 95/43

[Application lodged 27.2.1992; Commission report 19.5.1994; Court Judgment 20.11.1995]

On 14 May 1986 the applicant company filed a patent application with the Netherlands Patent Office. On 13 October 1988 the Examination Division gave a final decision refusing to publish the application for opposition purposes. The applicant company lodged an appeal with the Appeals Division of the Patent Office which gave a final decision on 29 August 1991 concluding that the subject-matter of the application was not patentable since it did not involve an inventive step and refusing therefore to publish the application. The applicant company complained that it had not had a fair hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal and under P1A1, that it had been deprived of its possessions without an examination by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Comm found by majority (22–1) V 6(1), unanimously NV P1A1.

Court found unanimously NV 6(1), not necessary to rule on 13, no separate issue arises under P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel, Sir John Freeland, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek.

Even if the proceedings before the Appeals Division of the Patent Office were considered not to comply with A 6 (1), no violation of the Convention could be found if there was available to the applicant company a remedy ensuring the determination of their asserted civil right by an independent judicial body that did have sufficient jurisdiction and did itself provide the safeguards required by A 6(1). Although no Netherlands civil court had ever held itself competent to review decisions of any Division of the Patent Office regarding patent applications, that did not mean that the remedy offered by civil proceedings must for that reason be regarded as 'ineffective'; it was equally true that no civil proceedings directed against a decision of the Appeals Division of the Patent Office had ever resulted in a ruling that the Appeals Division in fact offered sufficient procedural safeguards. The Court reviewed its previous case-law. It had found that 'where an administrative appeal to a higher authority [was] not considered to offer sufficient guarantees as to a fair procedure it [was] possible to have recourse to the civil courts for a full review of the lawfulness of the administrative decision'. The applicant company could have submitted its claim to the civil courts for examination; it chose, for whatever reason, not to do so. In those circumstances the Court could not find in the abstract that the remedies available to the applicant company under Netherlands law for vindicating their asserted right to a patent did not meet the requirements of A 6(1). Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

The Court did not consider it necessary to rule on A 13. The applicant company had not adduced any argument to the effect that a violation of A 13 might be found even in the absence of a finding of a violation of A 6(1). In any event, the requirements of A 13 were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6(1). The complaint under P1A1, namely the denial of a judicial remedy, was in substance identical to that already examined and rejected in the context of A 6(1). No separate issue arose under P1A1 in relation to the matters complained of.

The applicants were Mr Terence Brogan, a farmer, Mr Dermot Coyle, unemployed, Mr William McFadden, unemployed and Mr Michael Tracey, an apprentice joiner. They were arrested from their homes on 17 September 1984 in the case of Mr Brogan and 1 October 1984 in respect of the other applicants, by police officers under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 (the 1984 Act). They were taken to barracks or holding centres where they were detained and questioned about their suspected involvement in attacks on police patrols and security forces and about their suspected membership of the Provisional Irish Republican Army or Irish National Liberation Army, proscribed organisations. Mr Brogan was released on 22 September 1984, having spent a period in detention of five days and 11 hours. Mr Coyle was released on 7 October 1984, after a period of detention of six days and sixteen hours. Mr McFadden was released on 5 October 1984, after a period of detention of four days and six hours. Mr Tracey was released on 5 October 1984, after a detention period of four days and 11 hours. The applicants complained that their arrest and detention were not justified under A 5(1), that there had also been breaches of A 5 and that they had no effective remedy in respect of their complaints.

Comm found in respect of Mr Brogan and Mr Coyle by majority (10–2) V 5(3), (9–3) V 5(5), in respect of Mr McFadden and Mr Tracey (8–4) NV 5(3), NV 5(5), unanimously NV 5(1), by majority (10–2) NV 5(4), unanimously no separate issue under A 13.

Court found by majority (16–3) NV 5(1), (12–7) V 5(1) in respect of all four applicants, unanimously NV 5(4), (13–6) V 5(5), unanimously not necessary to consider A 13.

Judges (A 50): composition as above, but without Mr J Pinheiro Farinha. Judgment unanimous.

The scope of the Court's jurisdiction was determined by the Commission's decision declaring the originating application admissible. The applicant had expressly withdrawn his claim under A 5(2) and as a result the Commission discontinued its examination of the admissibility of that complaint. To permit the applicants to resuscitate this complaint before the Court would be to circumvent the machinery established for the examination of petitions under the Convention. Consequently, the allegation that there has been a breach of A 5(2) could not be entertained.

The applicants' arrest and detention were lawful under Northern Ireland law and, in particular, in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law. The applicants were questioned within a few hours of their arrest about their suspected involvement in specific offences and their suspected membership of proscribed organisations. Accordingly, the arrest and subsequent detention of the applicants were based on a reasonable suspicion of commission of an offence within the meaning of A 5(1)(c). The fact that the applicants were neither charged nor brought before a court did not necessarily mean that the purpose of their detention was not in accordance with A 5(1)(c). The existence of such a purpose had to be considered independently of its achievement and sub-para (c) of A 5(1) did not presuppose that the police should have obtained sufficient evidence to bring charges, either at the point of arrest or while the applicants were in custody. Such evidence may have been unobtainable or, in view of the nature of the suspected offences, impossible to produce in court without endangering the lives of others. There was no reason to believe that the police investigation in this case was not in good faith or that the detention of the applicants was not intended to further that investigation by way of confirming or dispelling the concrete suspicions which grounded their arrest. Had it been possible, the police would, it could be assumed, have laid charges and the applicants would have been brought before the competent legal authority. Their arrest and detention had to therefore be taken to have been effected for the purpose specified in para 1(c). Therefore, there had been no violation of A 5(1).

None of the applicants was brought before a judge or judicial officer during his time in custody. The investigation of terrorist offences presented the authorities with special problems. The difficulties of judicial control over decisions to arrest and detain suspected terrorists could affect the manner of implementation of A 5(3); however, they could not justify, under that article, dispensing altogether with prompt judicial control. The scope for flexibility in interpreting and applying the notion of promptness was very limited. Even the shortest of the four periods of detention (four days, six hours spent in police custody by Mr McFadden), fell outside the strict constraints as to time permitted by the first part of A 5(3). None of the applicants was either brought promptly before a judicial authority or released promptly following his arrest. The undoubted fact that the arrest and detention of the applicants were inspired by the legitimate aim of protecting the community as a whole from terrorism was not on its own sufficient to ensure compliance with the specific requirements of A 5(3). There had thus been a breach of A 5(3) in respect of all four applicants.

The remedy of habeas corpus was available to the applicants in the present case, though they chose not to avail themselves of it. There had been no violation of A 5(4).

As A 5 was not considered part of the domestic law of the UK, no claim for compensation lay for a breach of any provision of A 5 which did not at the same time constitute a breach of UK law. The applicants were arrested and detained lawfully under domestic law but in breach of A 5(3). That violation could not give rise, either before or after the findings made by the European Court in the present judgment, to an enforceable claim for compensation by the victims before the domestic courts. Accordingly, there had been a breach of A 5(5) in respect of all four applicants.

In the light of the finding that there has been no violation of A 5(4) it was not necessary to inquire whether the less strict requirements of A 13 were complied with, especially as the applicants did not pursue that complaint before the Court.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the purposes of A 50.

Bronda v Italy 98/47

[Application lodged 29.4.1993; Commission report 21. 1.1997; Court Judgment 9.6.1998]

The applicants, Mr Aldo Bronda and his wife Mrs Bronda Kaiser, complained that their granddaughter, S, born in 1984, had not been returned to live with them. On 29 October 1987 the Genoa Youth Court had made a care order in respect of S and parental rights were assigned to the local authority. Medical reports confirmed that the mother was mentally fit to assume her parental responsibility. S was subsequently placed in a children's home and in a decision of 22 November 1990 the Youth Court ruled that S was available for adoption. The applicants appealed to the Genoa Court of Appeal which set aside the judgment of the Youth Court and ordered that arrangement be made for S to be returned to her natural family. On 11 August 1995 the Youth Court held that S was sufficiently mature for her wishes to be taken into account and that she should not therefore be returned to her natural family against her will. Accordingly, the court awarded care of S to her foster parents and granted the parents access once every three months. They complained that their granddaughter had not been returned to her original home.

The mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted a fundamental element of family life and domestic measures hindering such enjoyment amounted to an interference with the right protected by A 8. That principle applied to relations between a child and its grandparents, with whom it had lived for a time. The wording of relevant articles of the Civil Code and Code of Civil Procedure was rather general and national authorities had a wide measure of discretion in particular to determine what measures were necessary for the protection of the child. In this sphere it was impossible to lay down legal rules with total precision. Safeguards against arbitrary interference were provided by the fact that the way in which the norms were applied was subject to review by the courts. The measures taken in the present case were in accordance with the law. The provisions concerned were applied in order to protect the child and there was no reason to consider that the domestic courts relied on them with the aim of estranging S from her original family. On the contrary, the wording of the decisions in issue clearly showed that the judges were guided by what was in S's interest and necessary to ensure her mental development. Consequently, the interference pursued a legitimate aim, namely the protection of the rights and freedoms of others under A 8(2). The consideration of what was in the best interest of the child was always of crucial importance. The national authorities had the benefit of direct contact with all the persons concerned, often at the very stage when care measures were being envisaged or immediately after their implementation. It followed that the Court's task was not to take the place of the competent national authorities in the exercise of their responsibilities for the regulation of the public care of children and the rights of parents whose children had been taken into care, but rather to review under the Convention the decisions taken by those authorities in the exercise of their power of appreciation. The decisions of the domestic court were based on reasons that were not only relevant but also sufficient for the purposes of paragraph 2 of A 8. In reaching them the domestic courts relied throughout on the thorough assessments of psychiatric experts and on reports prepared by social workers after each meeting between S and her natural family. While a fair balance had to be struck between S's interest in remaining with her foster parents and her natural family's interest in having her to live with them, the Court attached special weight to the overriding interest of the child, who, now aged fourteen, has always firmly indicated that she did not wish to leave her foster home. In the present case, S's interest outweighed that of her grandparents. Consequently, as the national authorities had not gone beyond their margin of appreciation, there had been no violation of A 8.

In the light of the findings under A 8 it was unnecessary to consider A 13 as no separate question arose in the present case under that provision.

Brozicek v Italy (1990) 12 EHRR 371 89/22

[Application lodged 7.5.1984; Commission report 22.3.1988; Court Judgment 19.12.1989]

The applicant, Mr Georg Brozicek, who was born in Czechoslovakia, resident in Germany and did not understand Italian, was charged with offences of resisting the police, assault and wounding in Italy. The notification of the accusation against him was in Italian. He returned the documentation to the Public Prosecutor's Office requesting that he be notified in his mother tongue or one of the international official languages of the United Nations. The Public Prosecutor's Office did not send any reply and did not have the letter translated. It asked the applicant to provide an address for service in Italy. On 5 December 1978 the German postal authorities returned the letter to the sender marked 'unclaimed'. He was tried and convicted in absentia, having failed to provide an address for service in Italy. He invoked A 6(1) and (3)(a).

Comm found by a majority (11–1, with two abstentions) V 6(3)(a), (13 votes, with one abstention) V 6(1).

Court dismissed the preliminary objection of non-exhaustion and held by a majority (15–5) V 6(1)+(3)(a).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (jd), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti (jd), Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo (jd), Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (jd), Mr JA Carrillo Salcedo, Mr N Valticos (jd), Mr SK Martens (so), Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel.

The remedies that A 26 requires to be exhausted are those that are available and sufficient and relate to the breaches alleged. In this case the Court did not consider the appeal in question was sufficiently available. The applicant learned of his conviction some years after the final judgment. The time limit was unrealistic and a late appeal would not have remedied the violations in this case. In the circumstances the preliminary objection of failure to exhaust remedies was in part out of time and for the rest unfounded.

The applicant had informed the judicial authorities of his lack of knowledge of Italian and asked them to communicate to him in his mother tongue or one of the official languages of the United Nations. The judicial authorities should have taken steps to comply so as to ensure observance of the requirements of A 6(3)(a) unless they could establish that the applicant had sufficient knowledge of Italian to understand the purport of the communication. The right to participate in a trial, although not expressly mentioned in A 6(1) is recognised by the object and purpose of the Article taken as a whole. There was no evidence that the applicant intended to waive his right to participate in the trial. Accordingly, the trial was not fair within the meaning of A 6(1).

Just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage, costs and expenses (DM 4,027.27 and CHF 1,900).

Brualla Gómez de la Torre v Spain 97/100

[Application lodged 7.1.1995; Commission report 18.10.1996; Court Judgment 19.12.1997]

The applicant, Mrs Victoria Brualla Gómez de la Torre, was a practising lawyer in premises owned by an insurance company and to the tenancy of which she considered that she had succeeded on the death of her father. In 1990 the insurance company brought an action in the Madrid Court of First Instance for termination of the lease, arguing that the applicant could not succeed to her father's rights under it. On 18 April 1991 the insurance company's action was dismissed. It appealed successfully to the Madrid Audiencia provincial. The applicant gave notice of her intention to appeal to the Supreme Court. New legislation was enacted with accompanying transitional provisions, and the applicant's appeal was declared inadmissible. The applicant's appeal to the Constitutional Court was dismissed. She complained that she had not had a fair hearing.

Comm found by majority (16–13) NV 6(1), unanimously NV 13.

Court unanimously found NV 6(1), unnecessary to examine 13.

It was primarily for the national authorities, notably the courts, to resolve problems of interpretation of domestic legislation. Both the Supreme Court and the Constitutional Court considered that the principle of application with immediate effect laid down by the transitional provision should also apply in this type of case where the appeal had not been entered with the Supreme Court by the date when the new law came into force but where notice of appeal had been given in accordance with previous rules. It was not for the Court to express a view on the appropriateness of the domestic courts' choice of policy as regards case-law; its task was confined to determining whether the consequences of that choice were in conformity with the Convention. The 'right to a court', of which the right of access is one aspect, was not absolute; it was subject to limitations permitted by implication, in particular where the conditions of admissibility of an appeal were concerned, since by its very nature it called for regulation by the State, which enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in that regard. The solution adopted in the instant case by the Spanish courts followed a generally recognised principle that, save where expressly provided to the contrary, procedural rules applied immediately to proceedings that were under way. The legitimate aim pursued by the statutory amendment was to increase the financial threshold for appeals to the Supreme Court in that sphere, so as to avoid that court becoming overloaded with cases of lesser importance. A 6 did not compel Contracting States to set up courts of appeal or of cassation. However, where such courts did exist, the guarantees of A 6 had to be complied with, for instance, in that it guaranteed to litigants an effective right of access to the courts for the determination of their 'civil rights and obligations'. The manner in which A 6(1) applied to courts of appeal or of cassation depended on the special features of the proceedings concerned and account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings conducted in the domestic legal order and the court of appeal's role in them; the conditions of admissibility of an appeal on points of law may be stricter than for an ordinary appeal. Given the special nature of the Supreme Court's role as a court of appeal, the procedure followed in the Supreme Court might be more formal. However, in this case, the appeal to the Supreme Court had been made after the applicant's claims had been heard by both the Madrid Court of First Instance and the Audiencia provincial sitting as an appellate court, each of which had full jurisdiction. The fairness of the proceedings in those courts was not in any way called into question. For all those reasons and having regard to the proceedings as a whole, the applicant was not unduly hindered in her right of access to a tribunal and, accordingly there had been no violation of A 6(1).

Where the right claimed was a civil right, the role of A 6(1) in relation to A 13 was that of a lex specialis, the requirements of A 13 being absorbed by those of A 6(1). Consequently, it was unnecessary to rule on the complaint.

Brumãrescu v Romania 99/72

[Application lodged 9.5.1995; Commission report 15.4.1998; Court Judgment 28.10.1999]

Mr Dan Brumãrescu's parents built a house in 1930 in Bucharest. In 1950 the State took possession of the house, allegedly under a decree on nationalisation. His parents were allowed to continue to live in one of the flats in the house as tenants of the State. In 1993 the applicant, as the beneficiary of his parents' estate, brought an action in the Bucharest Court of First Instance seeking a declaration that the nationalisation was null and void. On 9 December 1993 the Court of First Instance held that the nationalisation was unlawful and ordered the administrative authorities to return the house to the applicant. No appeal was lodged and the judgment became final and irreversible. In May 1994 the applicant obtained possession and ceased to pay rent on the flat he was occupying in the house and began paying land tax on the house. On an unknown date the Procurator-General of Romania lodged an application with the Supreme Court of Justice to have the judgment of 9 December 1993 quashed on the grounds that the Court of First Instance had exceeded its jurisdiction in examining the lawfulness of the application of the relevant decree. On 1 March 1995 the Supreme Court of Justice quashed the judgment of 9 December 1993 and dismissed the applicant's claim. The tax authorities informed the applicant that the house would be reclassified as State property with effect from 2 April 1996. The applicant lodged an application for restitution with the administrative board. On 24 March 1998 the Administrative Board vested ownership of the flat rented by the applicant in him and awarded him financial compensation for the rest of the house. On 14 May 1998 the applicant challenged that decision which refused to return the whole house to him. That application was dismissed on 21 April 1999. The applicant appealed and the proceedings are currently pending in the Bucharest County Court. He complained that he had been deprived of access to the court as the Supreme Court had held that the lower courts had no jurisdiction to deal with a claim for recovery of possession such as his and he also complained that the Supreme Court's judgment had deprived him of one of his possessions.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), V P1A1.

Court dismissed Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously V 6(1) by reason of the lack of a fair hearing and of the refusal of the right of access to a court, V P1A1.

A decision or measure favourable to an applicant was not in principle sufficient to deprive him of his status as a victim unless the national authorities had acknowledged, either expressly or in substance, and then afforded redress for, the breach of the Convention. The applicant was currently in the same situation as he was on 1 March 1995, since there had been no final decision acknowledging, at least in substance, and redressing any violation of the Convention caused by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Justice. The applicant was still affected by the impugned judgment of the Supreme Court of Justice and continued to be the victim of the violations of the Convention which he asserted flow from that judgment. The preliminary objection of lack of victim was therefore dismissed.

The Government were responsible for the quashing of a final judgment determining an action for recovery of possession and could not subsequently rely on the argument that the applicant had failed to exhaust domestic remedies by failing to bring a fresh action for recovery of possession. Accordingly, the preliminary objection based on non-exhaustion had to be dismissed.

The right to a fair hearing before a tribunal as guaranteed by A 6(1) had to be interpreted in the light of the Preamble to the Convention, which declared, among other things, the rule of law to be part of the common heritage of the Contracting States. One of the fundamental aspects of the rule of law was the principle of legal certainty, which required, inter alia, that where the courts had finally determined an issue, their ruling should not be called into question. At the material time the Procurator-General of Romania had a power, which was not subject to any time-limit, under the Code of Civil Procedure to apply for a final judgment to be quashed. By allowing the application lodged under that power, the Supreme Court of Justice set at naught an entire judicial process which had ended in a judicial decision that was irreversible and thus res judicata, and which had, moreover, been executed. In applying the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure in that manner, the Supreme Court of Justice infringed the principle of legal certainty. On the facts of the present case, that action breached the applicant's right to a fair hearing under A 6(1). Moreover, the ratio of the judgment of the Supreme Court of 1 March 1995 was that the courts had no jurisdiction whatsoever to decide civil disputes such as the action for recovery of possession in the present case. Such an exclusion was in itself contrary to the right of access to a tribunal guaranteed by A 6(1) and there had therefore been a violation of that article.

The applicant had a 'possession' for the purposes of P1A1. The Court of First Instance, in its judgment of 9 December 1993, established that the house in question had been nationalised in breach of the decree and held, with retrospective effect, that the applicant, as his parents' successor in title, was the lawful owner of that house. The judgment of the Supreme Court of Justice amounted to an interference with the applicant's right of property. In determining whether there had been a deprivation of possessions within the second 'rule', it was necessary not only to consider whether there had been a formal taking or expropriation of property but to look behind the appearances and investigate the realities of the situation complained of. Since the Convention was intended to guarantee rights that were practical and effective, it had to be ascertained whether the situation amounted to a de facto expropriation. The judgment of the Court of First Instance, ordering the administrative authorities to return the house to the applicant, became final and irrevocable and, in compliance with the judgment, the Mayor of Bucharest ordered the house to be returned to the applicant, which was done in May 1994. In addition, as of that date, the applicant ceased to pay rent on the flat he was occupying in the house and from April 1994 until April 1996 he paid land tax on the house. The effect of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Justice was to deprive the applicant of all the fruits of the final judgment in his favour by holding that the State had demonstrated its title to the house under the nationalisation decree. In consequence of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Justice, the applicant was accordingly deprived of the rights of ownership of the house which had been vested in him by virtue of the final judgment in his favour. In particular, he was no longer able to sell, devise, donate or otherwise dispose of the property. In those circumstances, the effect of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Justice was to deprive the applicant of his possessions within the meaning of the second sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. A taking of property within this second rule could only be justified if it was shown, inter alia, to be in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law. Moreover, any interference with the property had to also satisfy the requirement of proportionality. A fair balance had to be struck between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights, the search for such a fair balance being inherent in the whole of the Convention. The requisite balance would not be struck where the person concerned bore an individual and excessive burden. No justification had been offered for the situation brought about by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Justice. In particular, neither the Supreme Court of Justice itself nor the Government sought to justify the deprivation of property on substantive grounds as being in the public interest. The applicant had now been deprived of ownership of the property for more than four years without the payment of compensation reflecting its true value, and his efforts to recover ownership had to date proved unsuccessful. In those circumstances, even assuming that the taking could be shown to serve some public interest, a fair balance was upset and the applicant bore and continued to bear an individual and excessive burden. There had accordingly been, and continued to be, a violation of P1A1.

Bryan v United Kingdom (1996) 21 EHRR 342 95/47

[Application lodged 29.10.1991; Commission report 28.6.1994; Court Judgment 22.11.1995]

The applicant, Mr John Bryan, was a farmer and a contractor. An enforcement notice was issued and served on him on 4 December 1989 by the Vale Royal Borough Council requiring the demolition of two brick buildings on land which he had bought in 1987 as they appeared to have been erected without the necessary planning permission. He appealed to the Secretary of State for the Environment. An inspector was appointed to conduct an inquiry and determine the appeal. He was a Principal Housing and Planning Inspector, a civil servant and a member of the salaried staff of the Department of the Environment. He had been appointed by the Secretary of State after approval of the Lord Chancellor. In his decision letter of 1 October 1990 the inspector rejected the appeal. The applicant's further appeal was dismissed by a High Court judge on 8 March 1991. Leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal was refused. He complained of an infringement of A 6.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Matscher, Mr I Foighel, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr U Lôhmus.

The planning proceedings involved a determination of the applicant's 'civil rights' and accordingly A 6 was applicable to the facts of the present case. The proceedings before the inspector in the present case ensured the applicant a 'fair hearing' for the purposes of A 6(1). In considering whether a body could be considered 'independent', regard had to be had, inter alia, to the manner of appointment of its members and to their term of office, to the existence of guarantees against outside pressures and to the question whether the body presented an appearance of independence. Although the inspector was required to decide the applicant's planning appeal in a quasi-judicial, independent and impartial, as well as fair, manner, the Secretary of State could at any time, even during the course of proceedings which were in progress, issue a direction to revoke the power of an inspector to decide an appeal. In the context of planning appeals the very existence of this power available to the Executive, whose own policies might be in issue, was enough to deprive the inspector of the requisite appearance of independence, notwithstanding the limited exercise of the power in practice and irrespective of whether its exercise was or could have been in issue in the present case. For that reason the review by the inspector did not of itself satisfy the requirements of A 6(1), despite the existence of various safeguards customarily associated with an 'independent and impartial tribunal'. Even where an adjudicatory body determining disputes over 'civil rights and obligations' did not comply with A 6(1) in some respect, no violation of the Convention could be found if the proceedings before that body were 'subject to subsequent control by a judicial body that had full jurisdiction and did provide the guarantees of A 6(1). The appeal to the High Court, being on 'points of law', was not capable of embracing all aspects of the inspector's decision concerning the enforcement notice served on the applicant. In particular, there was no rehearing as such of the original complaints submitted to the inspector; the High Court could not substitute its own decision on the merits for that of the inspector; and its jurisdiction over the facts was limited. However, apart from the classic grounds of unlawfulness, the inspector's decision could have been quashed by the High Court on various grounds. The safeguards in the procedure before the inspector (the quasi-judicial character of the decision-making process; the duty incumbent on each inspector to exercise independent judgment; the requirement that inspectors must not be subject to any improper influence; the stated mission of the Inspectorate to uphold the principles of openness, fairness and impartiality) could have been subject to review by the High Court if there were shortcomings in relation to them. In the present case the High Court had jurisdiction to entertain the grounds of the applicant's appeal, and his submissions were adequately dealt with point by point. Although the High Court could not have substituted its own findings of fact for those of the inspector, it had the power to satisfy itself that the inspector's findings of fact or the inferences based on them were neither perverse nor irrational. The scope of review of the High Court was therefore sufficient to comply with A 6(1). There had accordingly been no violation of that provision in the present case.

Buchholz v Germany (1981) 3 EHRR 597 81/1

[Application lodged 18.12.1976; Commission report 14.5.1980; Court Judgment 6.5.1981]

Mr Walter Buchholz worked for a dry-cleaning firm from February 1949; he was mainly employed as a driver until the end of 1963 and thereafter as, in particular, controller of branch establishments. On 28 June 1974, he was given notice that he was dismissed with effect from 31 December of the same year as a result of rationalisation measures. He took proceedings before the appropriate courts contesting the lawfulness of this notice. He complained, inter alia, that the courts did not determine his case within a reasonable time.

Comm found by majority (7–5) V 6(1), no issue under 3, 8 or 12.

Court found unanimously NV 6(1), 3, 8 12.

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr H Mosler, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr W Ganshof Van Der Meersch, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Matscher, Mr E Garcia De Enterria.

The period to be examined extended from 10 July 1974 (commencement of the action before the Labour Court) until 26 April 1979 (delivery of the Federal Labour Court's judgment); its overall duration was four years, nine months, 16 days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed according to the particular circumstances. In respect of criminal matters, the Court had regard, inter alia, to the complexity of the case and to the conduct of both the applicant and the competent authorities. In cases concerning proceedings brought before administrative courts in connection with civil rights, the Court took account additionally of the defendant's behaviour and what was at stake in the litigation for the plaintiff. In Germany, proceedings before the civil courts were governed by the principle of the conduct of the litigation by the parties and, in addition, the legislation encouraged the friendly settlement of cases concerning employment. That did not, however, dispense the judicial authorities from ensuring the trial of the action expeditiously. The Convention placed a duty on the Contracting States to organise their legal systems so as to allow the courts to comply with the requirements of A 6(1) including that of trial within a reasonable time. A temporary backlog of business did not involve liability on the part of the Contracting States provided they had taken reasonably prompt remedial action to deal with an exceptional situation of that kind. More than four years and nine months passed before the Federal Labour Court delivered judgment as the court of final instance. That lapse of time appeared considerable for a case like this. Furthermore, what was at stake in the litigation was of great importance for the applicant: what was involved was either reinstatement in his employment or an award of compensation in the event of the contract being terminated. Although there were long delays on the part of the courts, the duration of the litigation was also to a large extent the result of certain issues raised by the applicant of his own accord, in respect of which he had to bear the consequences. The Court could not overlook the fact that the delays at the Court of Appeal level occurred at a time of transition marked by a significant increase in the volume of litigation resulting from a deterioration in the general economic situation. Having assessed the material before it and taken notice of the authorities' efforts to expedite the conduct of business before the labour courts, the Court considered that, even when viewed cumulatively, the delays attributable to the competent courts did not exceed a reasonable time within the meaning of A 6(1).

The applicant also invoked A 8, 3 and 12 of the Convention contending that the length of the proceedings had been the source of serious financial and personal difficulties for him. Assuming that failure to try an action within a reasonable time could on occasions have repercussions as regards respect for some other right guaranteed by the Convention, the Court had not found a breach of the requirements of A 6(1) in the present case. In addition, no issue arose under A 8, 3 or 12 taken on their own.

Buckley v United Kingdom (1997) 23 EHRR 101 96/35

[Application lodged 7.2.1992; Commission report 11.1.1995; Court Judgment 25.9.1996]

Mrs June Buckley, a Gypsy, lived with her three children in caravans parked on land which she owned. On 4 December 1989 she applied retrospectively to South Cambridgeshire District Council for planning permission for the three caravans on her site. She was refused on 8 March 1990 and on 9 April 1990 the Council issued an enforcement notice requiring the caravans to be removed within a month. The applicant's appeal against the enforcement notice to the Secretary of State for the Environment was dismissed on 16 April 1991. She did not appeal further. She was prosecuted for failure to comply with the 1990 enforcement notice and on 7 January 1992 she was fined GBP 50 and required to pay GBP 10 costs. She was again prosecuted on further occasions. She complained that she was prevented from living with her family in caravans on her own land and from following the traditional lifestyle of a Gypsy.

Comm found by majority (7–5) V 8.

Court found unanimously A 8 applicable, by majority (6–3) NV 8, (8–1) NV 14+8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr B Repik (pd), Mr K Jungwiert, Mr U Lôhmus (pd).

Although the Commission considered the case only under A 8, the additional complaint under A 14 and 8 was encompassed in the Commission's decision declaring the application admissible. The Court accordingly had jurisdiction to examine it.

The applicant bought the land to establish her residence there. She has lived there almost continuously since 1988 and it had not been suggested that she had established, or intended to establish, another residence elsewhere. The case therefore concerned the applicant's right to respect for her home. She was refused the planning permission which would have allowed her to live in the caravans on her land, was required to remove the caravans and prosecuted for failing to do so, all pursuant to the relevant sections of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. That constituted interference by a public authority with the applicant's exercise of her right to respect for her home.

The measures to which the applicant was subjected were in accordance with the law. The legitimate aims pursued by the measures were public safety, the economic well-being of the country, the protection of health and the protection of the rights of others. It was for the national authorities to make the initial assessment of the necessity for an interference, as regards both the legislative framework and the particular measure of implementation. Although a margin of appreciation was thereby left to the national authorities, their decision remained subject to review by the Court for conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The scope of this margin of appreciation was not identical in each case, but would vary according to the context. Relevant factors included the nature of the Convention right in issue, its importance for the individual and the nature of the activities concerned. Town and country planning schemes involved the exercise of discretionary judgment in the implementation of policies adopted in the interest of the community. It was not for the Court to substitute its own view of what would be the best policy in the planning sphere or the most appropriate individual measure in planning cases. National authorities were in principle better placed than an international court to evaluate local needs and conditions. The interests of the community were to be balanced against the applicant's right to respect for her home, a right which was pertinent to her and her children's personal security and well-being. The importance of that right for the applicant and her family had to also be taken into account in determining the scope of the margin of appreciation allowed to the respondent State. Whenever discretion capable of interfering with the enjoyment of a Convention right such as the one in issue in the present case was conferred on national authorities, the procedural safeguards available to the individual would be especially material in determining whether the respondent State had, when fixing the regulatory framework, remained within its margin of appreciation. Whilst A 8 contained no explicit procedural requirements, the decision-making process leading to measures of interference had to be fair and such as to afford due respect to the interests safeguarded to the individual by A 8. The Court's task was to determine, on the basis of the above principles, whether the reasons relied on to justify the interference in question were relevant and sufficient under A 8(2). Proper regard was had to the applicant's predicament both under the terms of the regulatory framework, which contained adequate procedural safeguards protecting her interest under A 8, and by the responsible planning authorities when exercising their discretion in relation to the particular circumstances of her case. The latter authorities arrived at the contested decision after weighing in the balance the various competing interests in issue. It was not the Court's task to sit in appeal on the merits of that decision. Although facts were adduced arguing in favour of another outcome at national level, the Court was satisfied that the reasons relied on by the responsible planning authorities were relevant and sufficient, for the purposes of A 8, to justify the resultant interference with the exercise by the applicant of her right to respect for her home. In particular, the means employed to achieve the legitimate aims pursued could not be regarded as disproportionate. In sum, the Court did not find that in the present case the national authorities exceeded their margin of appreciation. Therefore, there had been no violation of A 8.

It did not appear that the applicant was at any time penalised or subjected to any detrimental treatment for attempting to follow a traditional Gypsy lifestyle. In fact, it appeared that the relevant national policy was aimed at enabling Gypsies to cater for their own needs. That being so, the applicant could not claim to have been the victim of discrimination contrary to A 14 taken together with A 8 and accordingly, there had been no violation under that head.

Bulut v Austria (1997) 24 EHRR 84 96/11

[Application lodged 5.10.1990; Commission report 8.9.1994; Court Judgment 22.2.1996]

Mr Mikdat Bulut was a waiter. In 1990 he faced charges of attempting to bribe staff of the Innsbruck Employment Agency. The trial took place on 23 March 1990. The presiding judge mentioned that one of the judges, Mr Schaumburger, had acted as investigating judge for part of the preliminary proceedings. No point was taken by the parties. The applicant was found guilty and fined. He appealed to the Supreme Court. On 29 June 1990, the Attorney-General filed the observations with the Supreme Court, which were not disclosed to the defence. On 7 August 1990 the Supreme Court rejected the applicant's appeal. On 3 October 1990, after a hearing, the Innsbruck Court of Appeal increased the applicant's sentence to nine months' imprisonment, suspended for three years. The applicant complained that the trial court had included a judge disqualified from sitting by law as he had previously participated in the preliminary investigation. He further complained that no hearing had been held in the Supreme Court, that the Attorney-General had submitted to the Supreme Court observations which had not been made available to the defence and that the Supreme Court had divulged the name of the judge rapporteur to the Attorney-General contrary to the relevant legal provisions.

Comm found by majority (25–1) NV 6(1) on account of Judge Schaumburger's participation in the trial, unanimously NV 6(1) on account of the Supreme Court's failure to hold a hearing on account of the fact that the name of the judge rapporteur was communicated to the Attorney-General, by majority (25–1) V 6(1) on account of the Attorney-General's submission to the Supreme Court of observations of which the applicant was not aware.

Court found by majority (8–1) NV 6(1) with regard to Judge Schaumburger's participation in the trial, NV 6(1) on account of the Supreme Court's failure to hold a hearing, V 6(1) on account of the submission of observations by the Attorney-General's Office to the Supreme Court without communication to the defence.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher (pc/pd), Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer (so), Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla (pd), Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek.

The applicant's complaint that the Supreme Court had divulged the name of the judge rapporteur to the Attorney-General, contrary to the relevant domestic legal provisions, which was declared admissible by the Commission, was abandoned before the Court, which saw no reason to entertain it of its own motion.

When the impartiality of a tribunal for the purposes of A 6(1) was being determined, regard had to be had not only to the personal conviction of a particular judge in a given case, the subjective approach, but also whether he afforded sufficient guarantees to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect, the objective approach. There had been no suggestion of any prejudice or bias on the part of Judge Schaumburger and the Court therefore presumed his personal impartiality. In the present case the fear that the trial court might not be impartial was based on the fact that one of its members had questioned witnesses during the preliminary investigation. That kind of situation might give rise to misgivings on the part of the accused as to the impartiality of the judge. However, whether those misgivings should be treated as objectively justified depended on the circumstances of each particular case; the mere fact that a trial judge has also dealt with the case at the pre-trial stage could not be held as in itself justifying fears as to his impartiality. Judge Schaumburger was responsible for preparing the case for trial or for deciding whether the accused should be brought to trial. It had not been established that he had to take any procedural decisions at all. His role was limited in time and consisted of questioning two witnesses. It did not entail any assessment of the evidence by him, nor did it require him to reach any kind of conclusion as to the applicant's involvement. In that limited context, the applicant's fear that the Innsbruck Regional Court lacked impartiality could not be regarded as objectively justified. In any event, it was not open to the applicant to complain that he had legitimate reasons to doubt the impartiality of the court which tried him, when he had the right to challenge its composition but refrained from doing so. There had therefore been no violation of A 6 in that regard.

The manner of application of A 6 to proceedings before appellate courts depended on the special features of the proceedings involved; account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings in the domestic legal order and of the role of the appellate court therein. Provided that there had been a public hearing at first instance, the absence of public hearings at a second or third instance might be justified by the special features of the proceedings at issue. Thus proceedings for leave to appeal or proceedings involving only questions of law, as opposed to questions of fact, might comply with the requirements of A 6 even where the appellant was not given an opportunity of being heard in person by the appeal or cassation court. In the present case, a public hearing was held at first instance. The Supreme Court rejected the applicant's appeal. The nature of the review could be compared to that of proceedings for leave to appeal. The Court was not satisfied that the grounds of nullity under the Code of Criminal Procedure, as formulated by the applicant, raised questions of fact bearing on the assessment of the applicant's guilt or innocence that would have necessitated a hearing. The applicant essentially challenged the trial court's assessment of the available evidence, a challenge which the Supreme Court considered inadmissible. Accordingly, the Court found no violation as regards the Supreme Court's failure to hold a hearing.

Under the principle of equality of arms, as one of the features of the wider concept of a fair trial, each party had to be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present his case under conditions that did not place him at a disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent. In this context, importance was attached to appearances as well as to the increased sensitivity to the fair administration of justice. While the Attorney-General's objectivity could not be questioned, from the moment he recommended that an appeal be allowed or dismissed, that opinion could not be regarded as neutral. In those circumstances, A 6(1) required that the rights of the defence and the principle of the equality of arms be respected. That applied a fortiori where the Attorney-General's Office was the body charged with the prosecution. The submission of the observations allowed the Attorney-General to take up a clear position as to the applicant's appeal, a position which was not communicated to the defence and to which the defence could not reply. The principle of the equality of arms did not depend on further, quantifiable unfairness flowing from a procedural inequality. It was a matter for the defence to assess whether a submission deserved a reaction. It was therefore unfair for the prosecution to make submissions to a court without the knowledge of the defence. Therefore the principle of the equality of arms had not been respected and there had been a violation of A 6(1) on account of the Attorney-General's submission of observations to the Supreme Court without the applicant's knowledge.

Bunkate v Netherlands (1995) 19 EHRR 477 93/20

[Application lodged 24.11.1987; Commission report 1.4.1992; Court Judgment 26.5.1993]

On 12 September 1983 Mr Johannes Maria Clemens Bunkate was arrested in The Hague on suspicion of having committed forgery. He was placed in detention on remand until 16 December 1983, on which date the Public Prosecutor ordered his release on the ground of a shortage of cells then existing in The Netherlands. He was tried by the Regional Court of The Hague and on 5 January 1984 that court sentenced him to one year's imprisonment on two counts of forgery. Both the Public Prosecutor and the applicant filed an appeal the same day and the applicant was allowed to remain at liberty pending the appeal. Two days after the judgment of the Regional Court the applicant travelled to the Dominican Republic, where he stayed for some 11 months and had a death certificate in his own name issued by the competent Dominican authorities. His death was registered in The Hague on 18 May 1984. He returned to The Netherlands on 19 November 1984 and, following an application by his mother, the Regional Court deleted the entry of his death from the register on 25 June 1986. The appeal against the judgment of the Regional Court of 5 January 1984 was heard by the Court of Appeal of The Hague, which on 28 May 1985 found him guilty of only one count of forgery and acquitted him of the other; his sentence was increased to one year and four months. The applicant introduced an appeal on points of law to the Supreme Court on 10 June 1985. The registry of the Court of Appeal transmitted the case file to the registry of the Supreme Court, which received it on 23 September 1986. The Supreme Court dismissed his appeal by judgment of 26 May 1987. He complained of the duration of the proceedings against him, especially with regard to the period between the judgment of the Court of Appeal and that of the Supreme Court.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously decided not to strike the case out of its list of cases, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Sir John Freeland, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr AB Baka.

By letter of 4 January 1993, the Government, being the party which had brought the case before the Court, notified the Registrar of its intention not to proceed with the case in view of the judgment in the case of Abdoella v Netherlands. The applicant did not comment. There had been no friendly settlement, arrangement or other fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter, so that Rule 49(2) was inapplicable. As to Rule 49(1), the applicant's entitlement to a formal and binding decision on the merits and as to just satisfaction, if any, overrode any interest the Government might have in discontinuance of the case. Accordingly, the Court decided not to strike the case out of its list.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 12 September 1983, the date of the applicant's arrest, and ended on 26 May 1987, the date of the decision of the Supreme Court by which the sentence of 16 months' imprisonment became final. However, the period from 7 January 1984 until 19 November 1984, during which the applicant was in the Dominican Republic and thus effectively out of reach of the Netherlands authorities, had to be deducted from the overall period. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was not particularly complex. Although the applicant filed his appeal on points of law on 10 June 1985, the registry of the Supreme Court did not receive the case file from the Court of Appeal until 23 September 1986. For that lapse of time, spanning 15 and a half months, the Government had offered no satisfactory explanation. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. A period of total inactivity lasting for 15 and a half months was not acceptable. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1).

Burghartz v Switzerland (1994) 18 EHRR 101 94/2

[Application lodged 26.1.1990; Commission report 21.10.1992; Court Judgment 22.2.1994]

Mrs Susanna Burghartz and Mr Albert Burghartz were Swiss nationals, married in Germany in 1984; Mrs Burghartz had German citizenship also. In accordance with German law they chose the wife's surname, 'Burghartz', as their family name; the husband availed himself of his right to put his own surname in front of that and thus call himself 'Schnyder Burghartz'. The Swiss registry office having recorded 'Schnyder' as their joint surname, the couple applied to substitute 'Burghartz' as the family surname and 'Schnyder Burghartz' as the husband's surname. On 6 November 1984 the cantonal government of Basle Rural turned down the application. The applicants complained that the authorities had withheld from Mr Burghartz the right to put his own surname before their family name although Swiss law afforded that possibility to married women who had chosen their husbands' surname as their family name.

Comm found by majority (18–1) V 14+8, (13–6) no need to examine 8 taken alone.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found by majority (6–3) 8 applicable, (5–4) V 14+8, unanimously not necessary to determine 8 taken alone.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr C Russo (pd), Mr N Valticos (d), Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka, Mr L Wildhaber.

The case originated in a joint application by Mr and Mrs Burghartz to change their joint family name and the husband's surname simultaneously. Having regard to the concept of family which prevailed in the Convention system, Mrs Burghartz could claim to be a victim of the impugned decisions, at least indirectly. The objection of lack of victim was therefore dismissed.

The Federal Court was required by Swiss Constitution to apply the laws passed by the Federal Assembly. It was expressly forbidden to suspend the effects of any such laws which might prove to be incompatible with the Constitution. This prohibition had been extended by current case-law to cases in which there was a conflict between such a law and a treaty. That being so, the applicants could not be blamed for having founded their appeal solely on domestic law, seeing that their arguments were identical in substance with those they submitted to the Commission. As to a public-law appeal, its subsidiary nature prevented it from being considered in this instance an adequate remedy which A 26 would also have required the applicants to exhaust. Accordingly, the objection of non-exhaustion was dismissed.

The Convention did not contain any explicit provisions on names. As a means of personal identification and of linking to a family, a person's name concerned his or her private and family life. The fact that society and the State had an interest in regulating the use of names did not exclude this, since these public-law aspects were compatible with private life conceived of as including, to a certain degree, the right to establish and develop relationships with other human beings, in professional or business contexts as in others. The applicant's retention of the surname by which, according to him, he had become known in academic circles might significantly affect his career. A 8 therefore applied.

The advancement of the equality of the sexes was a major goal in the Member States of the Council of Europe; that meant that very weighty reasons would have to be put forward before a difference of treatment on the sole ground of sex could be regarded as compatible with the Convention. The Court was not persuaded by the Government's argument that family unity should be reflected in a single joint surname, since family unity would be no less reflected if the husband added his own surname to his wife's, adopted as the joint family name, than it was by the converse arrangement allowed by the Civil Code. The Court rejected the Government's argument that a genuine tradition was at issue here. Married women had enjoyed the right from which the applicant sought to benefit only since 1984. In any event, the Convention had to be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions, especially the importance of the principle of non-discrimination. Nor was there any distinction to be derived from the spouses' choice of one of their surnames as the family name in preference to the other. Contrary to what the Government contended, it could not be said to represent greater deliberateness on the part of the husband than on the part of the wife. It was therefore unjustified to provide for different consequences in each case. Other types of surname, such as a double-barrelled name or any other informal manner of use, could be distinguished from the legal family name, which was the only one that could appear in a person's official papers. They therefore could not be regarded as equivalent to it. In sum, the difference of treatment complained of lacked an objective and reasonable justification and accordingly contravened A 14 taken together with A 8.

Having regard to that conclusion, it was unnecessary to determine whether there had also been a breach of A 8.

Buscarini and Others v San Marino 99/8

[Application lodged 17.11.1995; Commission report 2.12.1997; Court Judgment 18.2.1999]

Mr Buscarini, Mr Della Balda and Mr Manzaroli, the applicants, were elected to the General Grand Council, the parliament, of the Republic of San Marino in elections held on 30 May 1993. They requested permission from the Captains-Regent to take the oath without making reference to any religious text. At the General Grand Council session of 18 June 1993 the applicants took the oath in writing, save for the reference to the Gospels, which they omitted. At its session of 26 July 1993 the General Grand Council adopted a resolution proposed by the Captains-Regent ordering the applicants to retake the oath on the Gospels, on pain of forfeiting their parliamentary seats. The applicants complied with the Council's order and took the oath on the Gospels, albeit complaining that their right to freedom of religion and conscience had been infringed. Subsequently new legislation was enacted which introduced a choice for newly elected members of the General Grand Council between the traditional oath and one in which the reference to the Gospels was replaced by the words 'on my honour'. The traditional wording is still mandatory for other offices, such as that of Captain-Regent or of a member of the Government. They complained of an infringement of their right to freedom of religion and conscience.

Comm found unanimously V 9.

Court found unanimously V 9.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vjic, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Mrs S Botoucharova.

The applicants' announcement of their intention of bringing the matter to the attention of the Strasbourg Court could not be regarded as an abuse of the right of individual petition. Accordingly, the objection of abuse of process had to be dismissed. The applications were lodged by all three applicants within the period laid down in the Convention and were completed later. Consequently, the objection that the application was lodged out of time had to be dismissed. In order to comply with the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies, normal recourse had to be had by an applicant to remedies which were available and sufficient to afford redress in respect of the breaches alleged. The domestic decisions relied on by the Government in the present case to show that the civil courts would have had jurisdiction to deal with the matter were irrelevant. The civil courts could not in any circumstances review and quash political decisions of the General Grand Council. Administrative proceedings or an application to the Sindacato della Reggenza would have been ineffective. Objection of non-exhaustion also dismissed.

A 9 was, in its religious dimension, one of the most vital elements that went to make up the identity of believers and their conception of life, but it was also a precious asset for atheists, agnostics, sceptics and the unconcerned. Requiring the applicants to take an oath on the Gospels constituted a limitation under A 9, as it required them to swear allegiance to a particular religion on pain of forfeiting their parliamentary seats. The interference was based on s 55 of the Elections Act, and was therefore prescribed by law. Requiring the applicants to take the oath on the Gospels was tantamount to requiring elected representatives of the people to swear allegiance to a particular religion, a requirement which was not compatible with A 9. As the Commission had rightly stated in its report, it would be contradictory to make the exercise of a mandate intended to represent different views of society within Parliament subject to a prior declaration of commitment to a particular set of beliefs. The limitation complained of accordingly could not be regarded as necessary in a democratic society. There had therefore been a violation of A 9 of the Convention.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction as to non-pecuniary damage.

Buscemi v Italy 99/51

[Application lodged 23.6.1995; Commission report 27.10.1998; Court Judgment 16.9.1999]

Mr Vincenzo Ettore Buscemi was a doctor. Following separation from his partner, the Youth Court awarded custody of their daughter to the mother. She subsequently gave the child to him and he applied for legal custody to be transferred. On 5 May 1994 the Turin Youth Court decided to place the child in a children's home and appointed experts to determine which parent should be awarded custody. The applicant's appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed. The official report concluded that neither parent was fit to give the child a sufficiently well-balanced upbringing. The applicant's own report criticised that conclusion with regard to the applicant. The applicant's further application to the court was dismissed and on 3 November 1994 the court upheld the decision to place the child in a children's home. Between 11 July and 5 September 1994 the applicant had been involved in a heated dispute in the press with the President of the Youth Court over the social role played by those courts. On 21 November 1994 he requested that the President withdraw from the case involving his daughter. His application was dismissed as being out of time as the decision relating to the custody of the child had already been given when the request for the President to withdraw was filed. The applicant's further appeals for custody were rejected. On 9 August 1995 custody was again awarded to the mother and the applicant was awarded strictly supervised monthly access. The applicant complained of violation to respect for his family life as a result of the expert report which he submitted was procedurally flawed. He also alleged that the statements to the press by the President of the Youth Court caused injury to his reputation and to his family life and that the issue of custody of his daughter should not have been decided by a judge with whom he had publicly had a dispute.

Comm found unanimously V 8+6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1), NV 8.

Judges: Mr M Fischbach, President, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello (pd), Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr AB Baka, Mr E Levits.

The applicant had been able to play a sufficiently active role in the proceedings which had led to the authorities' interference with his family life. His criticism of the manner in which the experts' investigation had been conducted was not a decisive factor, particularly as one of the experts appointed by him had been able to discuss with the court appointed experts the results of the examinations made during the investigation. Furthermore, the expert report had not been the only factor taken into account by the courts in deciding the case.

The public statement made to the press by the President of the Youth Court did not in any way amount to an infringement of the applicant's private or family life, since he had himself disclosed his identity in his first letter to the newspaper.

The duty of impartiality required judicial authorities to maintain maximum discretion with regard to the cases with which they dealt, even where they were provoked. The public statements by the President of the court had been such as to justify the applicant's fears as to his impartiality. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Finding of violation sufficient just satisfaction regarding non-pecuniary damage (majority 6–1). Costs and expenses (ITL 1,000,000).

C v Belgium 96/25

[Application lodged 22.3.1993; Commission report 21.2.1995; Court Judgment 7.8.1996]

The applicant, a Moroccan citizen born in 1955, came to live in Belgium in 1966 with his parents and siblings. He lived in Brussels with his family in a house which they owned. After leaving school he trained as a mechanic. From 1984 onwards he worked for the family business as a taxi driver. On 17 October 1985, in Morocco, he married a Moroccan woman who came to live with him in Belgium. She gave birth to a son on 10 August 1986. He later divorced his wife in Morocco. On 6 April 1988 the Brussels Criminal Court convicted him of criminal damage, unlawful possession of drugs and conspiracy. Sentence was reduced on appeal to five years' imprisonment. He was released on parole on 23 May 1991. A royal order of 25 February 1991, which was served in March 1991, required the applicant to leave Belgium. The applicant complained of an infringement of his right to respect for his private and family life.

Comm found by majority (19–3) NV 8, (21–1) NV 8+14.

Court unanimously found NV 8, NV 8+14.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr AN Loizou, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr P Kûris.

The concept of family on which A 8 is based embraces, even where there is no cohabitation, the tie between a parent and child, regardless of whether or not the latter is legitimate. Although that tie may be broken by subsequent events, this can only happen in exceptional circumstances. The applicant had established real social ties in Belgium, having lived and schooled and worked there. He had therefore established a private life there within the meaning of A 8, which encompasses the right for an individual to form and develop relationships with other human beings, including relationships of a professional or business nature. The applicant's deportation therefore amounted to interference with his right to respect for his private and family life. The royal order of 25 February 1991, based on ss 20 and 21 of the Act of 15 December 1980 on the entry, residence, settlement and expulsion of aliens was lawful. The interference had aims which were compatible with the Convention, namely the prevention of disorder or crime. It was for the Contracting States to maintain public order, in particular by exercising their right to control the entry and residence of aliens and notably to order the expulsion of aliens convicted of criminal offences. However, their decisions in this field must, in so far as they may interfere with a right protected under A 8(1), be necessary in a democratic society, that is to say, justified by a pressing social need and proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The Court's task was to determine whether they struck a fair balance between the applicant's right to respect for his private and family life, on the one hand, and the prevention of disorder or crime, on the other. The applicant had real links with Belgium, although he had not applied for naturalisation. However, he had preserved important links with Morocco. He had married and divorced a woman there and concluded an agreement with her giving him custody of their child; his father had died there. The interference was not so drastic as that which may result from the expulsion of applicants who were born in the host country or first went there as young children. In addition, the Court attached great importance to the seriousness of the offences which resulted in a long term of imprisonment and his deportation, namely unlawful possession of drugs and conspiracy. The applicant had assisted in the sale of more than 17 kilograms of cannabis. In the light of the ravages of drugs among the population, and especially among young people, it was not surprising that the authorities showed great firmness with regard to those who actively contributed to the spread of that scourge. In all the circumstances the Belgian authorities had not acted in an arbitrary or unreasonable manner, or failed to fulfil their obligation to strike a fair balance between the relevant interests. The applicant's expulsion could not therefore be regarded as disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. There had accordingly been no violation of A 8.

Regarding the applicant's complaint that in breach of A 8 and 14, his deportation amounted to less favourable treatment than was accorded to criminals who, as nationals of a Member State of the European Union, were protected against such a measure in Belgium, the Court considered that such preferential treatment was based on an objective and reasonable justification, given that the Member States of the European Union formed a special legal order, which has, in addition, established its own citizenship. There had accordingly been no violation of A 8 and 14.

CR v United Kingdom (1996) 21 EHRR 363 95/49

[Applications lodged 29 and 31.3.92; Commission report 27.6.1994; Court Judgment 22.11.1995]

The separate applications of SW and CR were heard together (see SW & CR v UK 95/48 for facts of SW). CR's wife had left the matrimonial home, although no divorce proceedings had begun by the time he was charged with her attempted rape and assault occasioning actual bodily harm. At his Crown Court trial on 30 July 1990 he claimed that the charge of rape was one which was not known to the law by reason of the fact that he was the husband of the alleged victim. Following the trial judge's ruling, CR pleaded guilty to attempted rape and assault occasioning actual bodily harm, and was sentenced to three years' imprisonment. He appealed to the Court of Appeal, which dismissed the appeal, as did the House of Lords on 23 October 1991, which declared that the general principle that a husband could not rape his wife no longer formed part of the law of England and Wales. It stressed that the common law was capable of evolving in the light of changing social, economic and cultural developments. Both CR and SW complained that, in breach of A 7, they were convicted in respect of conduct, namely the attempted rape and rape respectively upon their respective wives, which at the relevant time did not constitute a criminal offence.

Comm found by a majority (14–3) NV 7(1).

Court held unanimously NV 7(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr P Jambrek, Mr U Lôhmus.

Both SW and CR complained that their conviction and sentence constituted retrospective punishment in breach of A 7. The Court held that the guarantee enshrined in A 7 occupied a prominent place in the Convention system of protection. It should be construed and applied in such a way as to provide effective safeguards against arbitrary prosecution, conviction and punishment. Accordingly, A 7 was not confined to prohibiting the retrospective application of the criminal law to an accused's disadvantage: it also embodied, more generally, the principle that only the law can define a crime and prescribe a penalty and the principle that the criminal law must not be extensively construed to an accused's detriment, for instance by analogy. From these principles it followed that an offence had to be clearly defined in the law. That requirement was satisfied where the individual could know from the wording of the relevant provision and, if need be, with the assistance of the courts' interpretation of it, what acts and omissions would make him criminally liable. When speaking of 'law' A 7 alluded to the very same concept as that to which the Convention refers elsewhere when using that term, a concept which comprised written as well as unwritten law and implied qualitative requirements, notably those of accessibility and forseeability. However clearly drafted a legal provision might be, in any system of law, including criminal law, there was an inevitable element of judicial interpretation. There would always be a need for elucidation of doubtful points and for adaptation to changing circumstances. The applicants SW and CR maintained that the general common law principle that a husband could not be found guilty of rape upon his wife, subject to certain limitations, was still effective on the dates when they committed the acts which gave rise to the charges. The Court noted that both SW's and CR's convictions were based on the statutory offence of rape in s 1 of the 1956 Act, as further defined in s 1(1) of the 1976 Act. Neither applicant disputed that the conduct for which he was convicted would have constituted rape within the meaning of the statutory definition of rape as applicable at the time, had the victim not been his wife. CR's complaint under A 7 related solely to the fact that he could not avail himself of the marital immunity under common law because, he submitted, it had been retrospectively abolished. The question was whether 'removal' of the marital immunity would conflict with the statutory definition of rape, in particular whether it would be prevented by the word 'unlawful'. The Court of Appeal carefully examined various strands of interpretation of the provision in the case-law, including the argument that the term 'unlawful' excluded intercourse within marriage from the definition of rape. The Court held that it is in the first place for the national authorities, notably the courts, to interpret and apply national law. It saw no reason to disagree with the Court of Appeal's conclusion, which was subsequently upheld by the House of Lords, that the word 'unlawful' in the definition of rape was merely surplusage and did not inhibit them from removing a common law fiction which had become anachronistic and offensive and from declaring that a rapist remains a rapist subject to the criminal law, irrespective of his relationship with his victim. The decisions of the Court of Appeal and then the House of Lords did no more than continue a perceptible line of case-law development dismantling the immunity of a husband from prosecution for rape upon his wife. There was no doubt under the law as it stood at the dates of the offences that a husband who forcibly had sexual intercourse with his wife could, in various circumstances, be found guilty of rape. Moreover, there was an evident evolution, which was consistent with the very essence of the offence, of the criminal law through judicial interpretation towards treating such conduct generally as within the scope of the offence of rape. This evolution had reached a stage where judicial recognition of the absence of immunity had become a reasonably foreseeable development of the law. The essentially debasing character of rape was so manifest that the result of the decisions of the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords could not be said to be at variance with the object and purpose of A 7, namely to ensure that no one should be subjected to arbitrary prosecution, conviction or punishment. The abandonment of the unacceptable idea of a husband being immune against prosecution for rape of his wife was in conformity not only with a civilised concept of marriage but also, and above all, with the fundamental objectives of the Convention, the very essence of which is respect for human dignity and human freedom. The Court found that the national courts' decisions that CR and SW could not invoke immunity to escape conviction and sentence for attempted rape and rape respectively upon their respective wives did not give rise to a violation of their rights under A 7(1). The Court did not find it necessary to enquire into whether the facts in either case were covered by the exceptions to the immunity rule already made by the English courts before 12 November 1989 or 18 September 1990.

Caballero v United Kingdom 00/69

[Application lodged 28.6.1996; Commission report 30.6.1998; Court Judgment 8.2.2000]

Mr Clive Caballero was convicted of manslaughter by the Central Criminal Court in 1987. He was sentenced to four years' imprisonment and was released in August 1988. On 2 January 1996 he was arrested by the police on suspicion of the attempted rape of his next door neighbour. He was brought before the magistrates' court on 4 January 1996. Although he instructed his solicitor to apply for bail on his behalf, no bail application was made in view of s 25 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, the effect of which was that he could not be granted bail because of his previous conviction. He was remanded in custody. He was convicted of attempted rape and of assault occasioning actual bodily harm and on 17 January 1997 he was sentenced to four years' imprisonment for the assault conviction and to life imprisonment for the attempted rape conviction. On 11 July 1997 the Court of Appeal rejected his appeal against sentence. He complained that the automatic denial of bail prior to his trial constituted a violation of A 5 taken alone and in conjunction with A 13 and that there had been a violation of A 14 taken in conjunction with A 5(3).

Comm found by majority (19–12) V 5(3), V 5(5), not necessary to consider 14+5(3), unanimously NV 13.

Court unanimously accepted the Government's concession that there had been a violation of 5(3) and 5(5), not necessary to consider 13, not necessary to consider 14+5(3).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm (c), Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello (jc), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jc), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (so), Mrs Hs Greve (js/o), Mr Ab Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova, Sir Robert Carnwath (c), Ad Hoc Judge.

The Court accepted the Government's concession that there had been a violation of A 5(3) and (5), with the consequence that it was empowered to make an award of just satisfaction to the applicant under A 41, but it did not consider it necessary in the particular circumstances to examine the issues of interpretation of A 5(3) and (5) raised by the applicant's complaint.

The applicant did not pursue his complaint under A 13 before the Court, which saw no cause to examine it of its own motion.

Section 25 of the 1994 Act operated by selecting certain accused persons to whom bail could not be granted prior to trial. In view of the Court's acceptance of the Government's concession in connection with A 5(3), it was not necessary also to consider the applicant's complaint about s 25 of the 1994 Act under A 14.

Cable and Others v United Kingdom 99/11

[Application lodged on various dates between June 1994 and September 1996; Commission report 4.3.1998; Court Judgment 18.2.1999]

Twenty four of the applicants were serving in the Royal Air Force and 11 were serving in the Army. They were each charged with one or more civilian criminal offences or armed forces' disciplinary offences and tried, convicted and sentenced by a court martial under either the Air Force Act 1955 or the Army Act 1955. All the applicants pleaded not guilty, except two who pleaded guilty. They complained that they had been denied fair hearings by independent and impartial tribunals established by law, contrary to A 6(1).

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic(pd), Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Sir John Freeland, ad hoc judge.

The Court recalled its previous case-law in which it had found that courts-martial convened pursuant to the Army Act 1955 and Air Force Act 1955 did not meet the requirements of independence and impartiality laid down by A 6(1), in view in particular of the central part played in the prosecution by the convening officer, who was closely linked to the prosecuting authorities, was superior in rank to the members of the court martial and had the power, albeit in prescribed circumstances, to dissolve the court martial and to refuse to confirm its decision. There was no reason to distinguish the present cases. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any pecuniary damage, costs and expenses (GBP 40,000 less FF 19,200). No basis to award punitive damages.

Caffè Roversi Spa v Italy 92/27

[Application lodged 27.1.1987; Commission report 5.12.1990; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

The applicant, a limited company, filed a suit against Mr and Mrs P before the Modena District Court claiming payment of ITL 8,910,088. The investigation commenced at the hearing of 21

January 1982. On 14 April 1988 the District Court allowed the applicant's claim. The text of the judgment was lodged with the court registry on 20 May 1988. There was no appeal. The applicant company complained of the length of proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into account began on 13 November 1981 when the proceedings were instituted against Mr and Mrs P in the Modena District Court. It appeared to have ended on 20 May 1989, the date on which the District Court's judgment must have become final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The investigation took a little more than five years following which one year and four months elapsed before the trial hearing on 13 April 1988. Regarding the first of those periods, the parties caused several adjournments. In addition, the investigating judge had to have recourse to an expert graphological opinion, hear witnesses and rule on an application for an attachment order. However, the case was not so complex that it warranted no less than twenty hearings. Moreover, the judge in question waited respectively 14 and six months before ordering, at the applicant's request, the two above-mentioned investigative measures. The second period made the situation worse. Although the Government pleaded the backlog of cases in the Modena District Court, A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The lapse of time in the present case could not be regarded as reasonable and there had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Çakici v Turkey 99/40

[Application lodged 2.5.1994; Commission report 12.3.1998; Court Judgment 8.7.1999]

The applicant, Mr Izzet Çakici, made an application to the Commission on his own behalf and on behalf of his brother Ahmet Çakici. On 8 November 1993 an operation was carried out by the gendarmes at Ahmet Çakici's village looking for evidence concerning murders and kidnaps by the PKK. The facts surrounding the disappearance of the applicant's brother were disputed. The applicant claimed that his brother was detained by the gendarmes, tortured and disappeared. The authorities claimed that Ahmet Çakici was not taken into custody. On 13 June they declared that Ahmet Çakici's identity card had been found on the body of a dead terrorist. The applicant complained about his brother's detention by the security forces and his subsequent disappearance and that those events had not been adequately investigated by the authorities.

Comm found unanimously V 2 in respect of the disappearance of the applicant's brother, V 3 in respect of the applicant's brother, V 5 in respect of the disappearance of the applicant's brother, by majority (27–3) V 3 in respect of the applicant, unanimously V 13, NV 14 and 18.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously V 2, V 3 in respect of the applicant's brother, by majority (14–3) NV 3 in respect of the applicant, unanimously V 5, by majority (16–1) V 13, unanimously NV 14 or 18.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert (pd), Mr M Fischbach (pd), Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen (pd), Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Mr F Gölcüklü (pd), ad hoc judge.

The Court accepted the facts as established by the Commission, which had carried out the fact-finding exercise. In reviewing the evidence, the Court found that in this case the Government fell short of their obligations under former A 28(1)(a) to furnish all necessary facilities to the Commission in its task of establishing the facts.

The applicant and his father had made petitions and inquiries to the State Security Court prosecutor in relation to the disappearance of Ahmet Çakici. Although their concerns were known to the prosecutors, nothing was done. In the absence of an effective investigation into the alleged disappearance and in light of the authorities' repeated denial that Ahmet Çakici had ever been in custody, there was no basis for any meaningful recourse by the applicant to the civil and administrative remedies referred to by the Government and the applicant had to be regarded as having done everything that could reasonably be expected of him to exhaust the domestic remedies available to him. Consequently, the Government's preliminary objection was dismissed.

There was sufficient circumstantial evidence, based on concrete elements, on which it could be concluded beyond reasonable doubt that Ahmet Çakici died following his apprehension and detention by the security forces. The responsibility of the respondent State for his death was engaged. No explanation had been forthcoming from the authorities as to what occurred following his apprehension, nor any ground of justification relied on by the Government in respect of any use of lethal force by their agents. Liability for Ahmet Çakici's death was therefore attributable to the respondent State and there had accordingly been a violation of A 2 on that account. Furthermore, having regard to the lack of effective procedural safeguards disclosed by the inadequate investigation carried out into the disappearance and the alleged finding of Ahmet Çakici's body, the respondent State had failed in its obligation to protect his right to life. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 2 on that account also.

The witness evidence supported a finding to the required standard of proof, ie beyond reasonable doubt, that Ahmet Çakici, the applicant's brother, was tortured during his detention. There had, consequently, been a violation of A 3 in relation to him.

Whether a family member of a disappeared person was a victim of A 3 in these circumstances would depend on the existence of special factors which gave the suffering of the applicant a dimension and character distinct from the emotional distress which may be regarded as inevitably caused to relatives of a victim of a serious human rights violation. Relevant elements would include the proximity of the family tie, the particular circumstances of the relationship, the extent to which the family member witnessed the events in question, the involvement of the family member in the attempts to obtain information about the disappeared person and the way in which the authorities responded to those inquiries. The essence of such a violation did not so much lie in the fact of the 'disappearance' of the family member but rather concerned the authorities' reactions and attitudes to the situation when it is brought to their attention. It was especially in respect of the latter that a relative might claim directly to be a victim of the authorities' conduct. In the present case, the applicant was the brother of the disappeared person, he was not present when the security forces took his brother. He did not bear the brunt of making the various petitions and inquiries to the authorities. Nor had any aggravating features arising from the response of the authorities been brought to the attention of the Court in this case. Consequently, there were no special features existing in this case which would justify finding an additional violation of A 3 of in relation to the applicant himself. Accordingly, there had been no breach of A 3 as concerns the applicant in this case.

To minimise the risks of arbitrary detention, A 5 provided a corpus of substantive rights intended to ensure that the act of deprivation of liberty be amenable to independent judicial scrutiny and secured the accountability of the authorities for that measure. The unacknowledged detention of an individual was a complete negation of the guarantees in A 5 and disclosed a most grave violation of that article. Given the responsibility of the authorities to account for individuals under their control, A 5 required them to take effective measures to safeguard against the risk of disappearance and to conduct a prompt and effective investigation into an arguable claim that a person has been taken into custody and had not been seen since. The disappearance of Ahmet Çakici while he was held in unacknowledged detention in the complete absence of the safeguards contained in A 5 constituted a particularly grave violation of the right to liberty and security of person guaranteed under that provision.

There had been unacknowledged detention, ill-treatment and disappearance of the applicant's brother in circumstances that give rise to the presumption that he had died since those events. Given the fundamental importance of the rights in issue, the right to protection of life and freedom from torture and ill-treatment, A 13 imposed, without prejudice to any other remedy available under the domestic system, an obligation on States to carry out a thorough and effective investigation apt to lead to those responsible being identified and punished and in which the complainant had effective access to the investigation proceedings. The authorities had an obligation to carry out an effective investigation into the disappearance of the applicant's brother. They had failed to comply with that obligation, which failure undermined the effectiveness of any other remedies which might have existed. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 13.

The Court, on the basis of the facts as established by the Commission, found no violation of A 14 (discriminatory policy pursued by the authorities against Kurdish citizens) or A 18 (the existence of an authorised practice).

The scope of examination of the evidence undertaken in the case and the material on the case file were not sufficient to enable the Court to determine whether the authorities had adopted a practice of violating A 13.

Caleffi v Italy 91/32

[Application lodged 20.9.1985; Commission report 6.3.1990; Court Judgment 24.5.1991]

On 21 November 1977, Mr Massimo Caleffi, the applicant, brought an action in the Rome magistrates' court against his employer seeking recognition of his right to a professional qualification corresponding to the work he had been doing since 1 April 1972 and payment of a sum equivalent to the resulting difference in remuneration. At a hearing on 1 July 1985 the applicant agreed to relinquish any claim against the employer in exchange for the sum of ITL 20,908,784 and for reimbursement of the procedural costs and lawyers' fees. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr SK Martens, Mr JM Morenilla.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 21 November 1977 when the applicant's employer was summoned to appear before the magistrates' court. It ended on 1 July 1985 when a friendly settlement was reached. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. It was for the Contracting States to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet the requirements under A 6(1). Employment disputes called generally for expeditious decision. The Italian authorities had acknowledged this by amending the special procedure used in such cases in 1973; the changes introduced included a shortening of the time limits normally applicable in civil proceedings. In the present case none of them was complied with. This was particularly so during the cassation proceedings, when over three years elapsed before the hearing. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary damage (ITL 10 million), costs and expenses (ITL 3 million) awarded.

[Application lodged 12.10.1996; Commission report 1.12.1998; Court Judgment 14.3.2000]

Caloc v France 00/186

[Application lodged 6.5.1996; Court Judgment 20.7.2000]

Mr Adrien Caloc, a heavy plant driver, was interviewed by police on 29 September 1988 in respect of a complaint by his former employer who suspected him of having sabotaged two bulldozers. He attempted to flee while being questioned and was caught and immobilised by police. He was examined by a doctor. On 18 November 1988 he complained that he had been beaten and injured and the prosecution opened a preliminary investigation. He claimed that admissions made by him in custody had been obtained by ill-treatment. By a judgment in December 1994 the Court of Cassation concluded that there was no serious charge against the police officers. The applicant complained of his ill-treatment in custody and length of proceedings.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (6–1) NV 3, unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr W Fuhrmann, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs HS Greve (pd), Mr K Traja.

A preliminary investigation was opened by the prosecution less than two weeks after the applicant lodged his complaint. The doctors who examined the applicant while he was in custody and after his release were interviewed and the applicant was interviewed on three occasions. It was regrettable that the authorities took advantage of the fact that the applicant was in custody to carry out those interviews, however, the interviews were carried out by officers not present at the attempt to flee and by officers from a different brigade. There was no evidence that he was unable to speak freely. The indictments division carried out a thorough investigation. The Government did not dispute the allegations of violence on the occasion when the applicant attempted to flee. However, the applicant did not deny having resisted the police officers or having struggled while attempting to escape. Nor was it apparent from the medical report that he had been beaten. Therefore, it had not been proved that the force employed was excessive or disproportionate. Regarding the allegations of ill-treatment following his attempts to flee, the indictments division cast doubt on the appellant's credibility owing to the inconsistencies in his statements and his belated references to the ill-treatment allegedly suffered in the detention cell. The fact that he did not complain of his pain until the day following his release from custody did not necessarily mean that he had been the victim of ill-treatment between the time of his examination by the doctor and when he was released, since the doctors in question stated that the type of pain from which he was suffering could appear after a period of time. He could have withdrawn his admissions, but did not do so. The judgment was upheld by the Court of Cassation. His other complaints of ill-treatment found no support in he medical examinations. In sum, his allegations did not appear to be based on evidence which had sufficient basis to be probative.

The Government's preliminary objection in respect of the complaint under A 6 was rejected.

The proceedings regarding the investigation of the complaint together with an application to join the proceedings as a civil party began on 3 March 1989 and ended on 6 March 1996, a period of seven years, three days. The judicial authorities were under a particular duty to act diligently when they were investigating a complaint lodged by an individual as a result of violence allegedly committed against him by law enforcement agencies. Even though the indictments division of the court carried out a thorough investigation, the total requisite diligence was not observed. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Camenzind v Switzerland (1999) 28 EHRR 458 97/98

[Application lodged 2.10.1992; Commission report 3.9.1996; Court Judgment 16.12.1997]

On 5 December 1991 the radio communications surveillance unit of the Head Office of the Swiss Post and Telecommunications Authority (PTT) located on a frequency reserved for civil and military aircraft a private telephone conversation being held on a telephone of an unauthorised type. The conversation was traced to the applicant, a lawyer. He was suspected of contravening s 42 of the Federal Act of 1922 'regulating telegraph and telephone communications' and an investigation was commenced pursuant to the Federal Administrative Criminal Law Act 1974. On 13 December 1991 the area director of the PTT in Berne issued a warrant to search the applicant's home under the Federal Administrative Criminal Law Act to find and seize the unauthorised cordless telephone. The search was carried out by a single PTT official, as requested by the applicant, and in his presence. No equipment of the type sought was found. On 24 January 1992 the applicant applied to the Indictment Division of the Federal Court under s 26 of the Federal Administrative Criminal Law Act for a declaration that the search was a nullity. The Federal Court dismissed the application. The applicant was fined 150 Swiss francs by the Federal Communications for an offence under s 42 of the Act. The applicant's proceedings in the District Court for review of that decision was dismissed. He complained of the search at his home.

Comm found unanimously NV 8, V 13.

Court found by majority (8–1) NV 8, unanimously dismissed Government's preliminary objection, unanimously V 8+13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr J De Meyer (pd), Mr AN Loizou (c), Mr AB Baka, Mr L Wildhaber (c), Mr Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr E Levits, Mr P Van Dijk.

The search of the room occupied by the applicant amounted to an interference with his right to respect for his home. In the case before it, Swiss federal legislation provided safeguards and, more particularly, the search had been of very limited scope. The notion of 'necessity' implied that the interference corresponded to a pressing social need and was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. Although States had a margin of appreciation, particular vigilance had to be exercised where, as in the present case, the authorities could, under national law, order and effect searches without a judicial warrant. In the present case the purpose of the search was to seize an unauthorised cordless telephone that the applicant was suspected of having used; the seizure and, consequently, the search, were necessary to provide evidence of the relevant offence. Having regard to the safeguards provided by Swiss law and to the limited scope of the search, the interference with the applicant's right to respect for his home could be considered to have been proportionate to the aim pursued and thus 'necessary in a democratic society' under A 8. Consequently, there had not been a violation of that provision.

Regarding the Government's objection that A 13 had not been expressly raised in the application and had been raised by the Commission of its own motion, the Convention institutions had jurisdiction to review the circumstances complained about by the applicant in the light of the entirety of the Convention's requirements. In the performance of their task, the Convention institutions were free to attribute to the facts of the case, as found to have been established on the evidence before them, a characterisation in law different from that given by the applicant or, if need be, to view the facts in a different manner.

A 13 required an effective remedy before a national authority in respect of grievances which could be regarded as 'arguable' in terms of the Convention. In this case the complaint under A 8 was 'arguable'. The Federal Administrative Criminal Law Act provided a special remedy in respect of coercive measures by way of a complaint to the Indictment Division of the Federal Court. However, it was the settled case-law of the Indictment Division of the Federal Court that only persons who were still affected by the impugned decision had locus standi to lodge a complaint; the applicant's complaint was therefore declared inadmissible. Therefore the remedy could not be termed 'effective'. Other procedures relied on by the Government had not been shown to be effective. The applicant did not have an effective remedy before a national authority for airing his complaint under A 8, therefore there had been a violation of A 13 taken together with A 8.

Finding of a violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction in respect non-pecuniary damage, costs and expenses (CHF 8,000 less FF 9,184).

Campbell v United Kingdom (1993) 15 EHRR 137 92/41

[Application lodged 14.1.1986; Commission report 12.7.1990; Court Judgment 25.3.1992]

On 10 October 1984 the applicant was convicted of assault and murder at the High Court, Glasgow, and was sentenced to life imprisonment with a recommendation that he should serve not less that twenty years' imprisonment. Since his imprisonment the applicant had been advised by his solicitor in respect of actions for damages against the Secretary of State for Scotland for injuries sustained following assault by prison officers on various occasions, infestation of lice while in the hospital wing of Peterhead Prison in November 1985, denial of communication with his solicitor following the assault, denial of his right to full and unrestricted correspondence between himself and his legal advisers on all of the above matters, an application to the Commission concerning, inter alia, his solitary confinement and access to his solicitor while in custody in hospital and the present application. He complained that correspondence to and from his solicitor and the Commission was opened and read by the prison authorities in breach of A 8.

Comm found by majority (11–1) V 8 regarding opening of the applicant's correspondence with his solicitor concerning contemplated and pending proceedings, (8–4) V 8 regarding of the opening of the applicant's general correspondence with his solicitor, (11–1) V 8 regarding opening of the applicant's correspondence with the Commission, (10–2) NV 25(1).

Court found by majority (8–1) V 8 regarding interference with the applicant's correspondence with his solicitor and with Commission, unanimously not necessary to examine 25(1).

Judges: Mr J Cremona, President, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (so), Mr R Macdonald, Mr A Spielmann, Mr S K Martens, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr J M Morenilla (pd), Sir John Freeland (pd).

There had been interference with the applicant's correspondence with his solicitor. The interference was 'in accordance with the law', namely the Prison (Scotland) Rules 1952 made under s 35 of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1952. The control of the applicant's correspondence was carried out under the Prison Rules and Standing Orders to ensure, inter alia, that it did not contain material which was harmful to prison security or the safety of others or was otherwise of a criminal nature. The interference thus pursued the legitimate aim of the prevention of disorder or crime. The notion of necessity implied that the interference corresponded to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. In that respect regard could be had to the State's margin of appreciation. A measure of control over prisoners' correspondence was not of itself incompatible with the Convention, regard being paid to the ordinary and reasonable requirements of imprisonment. In assessing the permissible extent of such control in general, the fact that the opportunity to write and to receive letters is sometimes the prisoner's only link with the outside world should not be overlooked. The lawyer–client relationship was, in principle, privileged. There was no reason to distinguish between the different categories of correspondence (general correspondence or that concerning contemplated litigation) with lawyers which, whatever their purpose, concerned matters of a private and confidential character. In principle, such letters were privileged under A 8. Prison authorities could open a letter from a lawyer to a prisoner when they had reasonable cause to believe that it contained an illicit enclosure which the normal means of detection have failed to disclose. The letter should, however, only be opened and should not be read. Suitable guarantees preventing the reading of the letter should be provided, eg, opening the letter in the presence of the prisoner. The reading of a prisoner's mail to and from a lawyer, on the other hand, should only be permitted in exceptional circumstances when the authorities have reasonable cause to believe that the privilege is being abused in that the contents of the letter endanger prison security or the safety of others or are otherwise of a criminal nature. What may be regarded as 'reasonable cause' will depend on all the circumstances but it presupposed the existence of facts or information which would satisfy an objective observer that the privileged channel of communication was being abused. The provisions of the European Agreement relating to persons participating in proceedings of the European Commission and Court of Human Rights of 6 May 1969 were not to be interpreted as limiting the obligations assumed under the Convention, as indicated by A 6 of the Agreement. With regard to the Government's arguments that the professional competence and integrity of solicitors could not always be relied on, the Court noted that the possibility of examining correspondence for reasonable cause provided a sufficient safeguard against the possibility of abuse. In addition, solicitors as officers of the court were subject to disciplinary sanctions by the Law Society for professional misconduct. The mere possibility of abuse was outweighed by the need to respect the confidentiality attached to the lawyer-client relationship. There was no further room for allowing for a margin of appreciation, there was no pressing social need for the opening and reading of the applicant's correspondence with his solicitor and accordingly, the interference was not 'necessary in a democratic society'.

The practice of opening letters from the Commission, whether or not they were read, amounted to an interference with the applicant's right to respect for correspondence. The interference was thus 'in accordance with the law' (inter alia, the Standing Orders). The letters were opened for the prevention of disorder or crime. It was of importance to respect the confidentiality of mail from the Commission. There was no compelling reason why letters from the Commission should be opened. The risk, adverted to by the Government, of Commission stationery being forged in order to smuggle prohibited material or messages into prison, was so negligible that it must be discounted. The provisions of the Agreement could not be invoked to limit the scope of A 8. The opening of letters from the Commission was not 'necessary in a democratic society' and there had therefore been a breach of A 8 regarding correspondence with the Commission.

The question of compliance with A 25 (hindrance in the exercise of the right of individual petition) was not pursued before the Court.

[Applications lodged 30.3.1976 and 1.10.1976; Commission report 16.5.1980; Court Judgment 25.2.1982 (merits), 22.3.1983 (A 50)]

Both applicants lived in Scotland. For both financial and practical reasons, the applicants had no realistic and acceptable alternative to sending their children to State schools. Gordon Campbell attended a primary school where corporal punishment (strapping with the tawse) was used for disciplinary purposes. The relevant Regional Council had refused Campbell's requests for a guarantee that he would not be subjected to this measure. He was, in fact, never so punished whilst at that school. Jeffrey Cosans went to a High School in a different area. In 1976, he was told to report to the Assistant Headmaster to receive corporal punishment. On his father's advice, he reported but refused to accept the punishment. On that account he was immediately suspended from school until such time as he was willing to accept the punishment. His parents were officially informed of his suspension and they had an inconclusive meeting with an official of the Regional Council during which they repeated their disapproval of corporal punishment. The day after a further meeting, that official informed Mr and Mrs Cosans by letter that he had decided to lift the suspension in view of the fact that their son's long absence from school constituted punishment enough, but on condition that they should accept that he would obey the rules, regulations or disciplinary requirements of the school. The Cosans stipulated that if their son were to be readmitted to the school he should not receive corporal punishment for any incident while he was a pupil. This was taken to constitute a refusal to accept the condition, and his suspension was not lifted and his parents were warned that they might be prosecuted for failure to ensure his attendance at school. Each applicant claimed that the use of corporal punishment as a disciplinary measure in the school attended by her child constituted treatment contrary to A 3 and also failed to respect her right as a parent to ensure her son's education and teaching in conformity with her philosophical convictions, as guaranteed by the second sentence of P1A2. Cosans further contended that Jeffrey's suspension from school violated his right to education, protected by the first sentence of P1A2.

Commission found by majority (13–1) V 3, by majority (9–5), as regards both applicants violation second sentence of P1A2, by majority (8–1 with 5 abstentions) not necessary to consider whether separate violation of the first sentence of P1A2.

Court held unanimously NV 3, by majority (6–1), as regards both applicants, violation second sentence of P1A2, by majority (6–1) as regards Cosans, V first sentence of P1A2.

Although neither boy was, in fact, strapped, provided it was sufficiently real and immediate, a mere threat of conduct prohibited by A 3 could itself conflict with that provision. Although the system of corporal punishment could cause a certain degree of apprehension in those who may be subject to it, the situation in which the applicants' sons found themselves did not amount to 'torture' or 'inhuman treatment'. Treatment would not be 'degrading' unless the person concerned had undergone, either in the eyes of others or in his own eyes, humiliation or debasement attaining a minimum level of severity. That level had to be assessed with regard to the circumstances of the case. The threat of a particular measure was not excluded from the category of 'degrading', simply because the measure had been in use for a long time or even met with general approval. However, in this case it was not established that pupils at a school where such punishment was used were, solely by reason of the risk of being subjected thereto, humiliated or debased in the eyes of others to the requisite degree or at all. As to whether Gordon or Jeffrey were humiliated or debased in their own eyes, a threat directed to an exceptionally insensitive person may have no significant effect on him but nevertheless be incontrovertibly degrading; and conversely, an exceptionally sensitive person might be deeply affected by a threat that could be described as degrading only by a distortion of the ordinary and usual meaning of the word. It had not been shown by means of medical certificates or otherwise that they suffered any adverse psychological or other effects. Jeffrey may well have experienced feelings of apprehension or disquiet when he came close to an infliction of the strap, but such feelings were not sufficient to amount to degrading treatment. The same applied to Gordon since he was never directly threatened with corporal punishment. The group tension and sense of alienation in the pupil that might be induced by the very existence of this practice fell into a different category from humiliation or debasement. No violation of A 3 had been established.

The use of corporal punishment could be said to belong to the internal administration of a school, but at the same time it was, when used, an integral part of the process whereby a school sought to achieve the object for which it was established, including the development and moulding of the character and mental powers of its pupils. The State had assumed responsibility for formulating general policy and the schools attended by the applicants' children were State schools. Having regard to the Convention as a whole, including A 17, the expression 'philosophical convictions' in the present context denoted such convictions as were worthy of respect in a democratic society and were not incompatible with human dignity; in addition, they should not conflict with the fundamental right of the child to education. The applicants' views related to a weighty and substantial aspect of human life and behaviour, namely the integrity of the person, the propriety or otherwise of the infliction of corporal punishment and the exclusion of the distress which the risk of such punishment entailed. They were views which satisfied each of the above criteria; it was that which distinguished them from opinions that might be held on other methods of discipline or on discipline in general. The duty to respect parental convictions could not be overridden by the alleged necessity of striking a balance between the conflicting views involved, nor was the Government's policy to move gradually towards the abolition of corporal punishment in itself sufficient to comply with that duty. It had not been established that other means of respecting the applicants' convictions, such as a system of exemption for individual pupils in a particular school, would necessarily be incompatible with 'the provision of efficient instruction and training, and the avoidance of unreasonable public expenditure' – the applicants had accordingly been victims of a violation of the second sentence of P1A2.

As regards Cosans' suspension, there was a substantial difference between the legal basis of the two claims brought under this article, as one concerned a right of a parent and the other a right of a child. The issue arising under the first sentence was therefore not absorbed by the finding of a violation of the second. The right to education guaranteed by the first sentence of P1A2 called for regulation by the State, but such regulation must never injure the substance of the right nor conflict with other rights enshrined in the Convention or its Protocols. The suspension of Jeffrey was motivated by his and his parents' refusal to accept that he receive or be liable to corporal chastisement. His return to school could have been secured only if his parents had acted contrary to their convictions, convictions which the United Kingdom was obliged to respect under the second sentence of P1A2. A condition of access to an educational establishment that conflicted in that way with another right enshrined in P1 could not be described as reasonable and in any event fell outside the State's power of regulation under P1A2. There was accordingly, as regards Jeffrey, a breach of the first sentence of P1A2.

Campbell and Fell v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 165 84/8

[Applications lodged 4 and 31.3.1977; Commission report 12.5.1982; Court Judgment 3.5.1984]

In November 1973 the first applicant John Joseph Campbell was convicted of various offences, including conspiracy to rob and possession of a firearm with intent to commit robbery, and sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment. The second applicant, Father Patrick Fell, a Roman Catholic priest, was convicted in November 1973 of conspiracy to commit arson, conspiracy to commit malicious damage, and taking part in the control and management of an organisation using violent means to obtain a political end and was sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment. They were subsequently detained in a number of different prisons as category A prisoners and, on 16 September 1976, were in Albany Prison. They were engaged in a protest at the treatment of another prisoner, by sitting down in a corridor of the prison and refusing to move. They were removed by prison officers after a struggle and in the process injuries were sustained by certain members of staff and by both applicants. They were charged with, and found guilty by the Prison Board of Visitors of, disciplinary offences against the Prison Rules 1964. They claimed, amongst other things that: (a) the disciplinary hearings amounted in substance to 'criminal' charges and that they had not afforded a hearing complying with the requirements of A 6; (b) they were delayed in obtaining legal advice contrary to A 6 and 8; (c) the refusal to allow them an independent medical examination breached A 6; (d) correspondence was restricted contrary to A 8; and (e) there was no effective remedy in respect of claims under A 6(1) and 8 contrary to A 13.

Comm found by majority (9 with 3 abstentions) V 6 in respect of the proceedings before the Board of Visitors in Mr Campbell's case, unanimously V 6(1) and 8 in respect of the delay in allowing both applicants to obtain legal advice, unanimously NV 6(1) in respect of the refusal to allow the applicants facilities for an independent medical examination, unanimously V 6(1) and not necessary to consider 8 in respect of the refusal to allow Father Fell to consult in private with his lawyer, V 8 in respect of the refusal to allow Father Fell to correspond with Sister Power and Sister Benedict, V 13 in that no effective remedy was available to Father Fell in relation to his complaints under 8.

Court found by majority in relation to Mr Campbell that: A 6 was applicable, NV 6(1) by the Board not conducting its adjudication in public, V 6 (1) by the Board not making its decision public, V 6(3)(b) and (c) in Mr Campbell's inability to obtain legal assistance prior to the Board's hearing or legal representation thereat. Court held unanimously in relation to Father Fell that: V 6(1) as regards the conditions for visits to him by his solicitors and that it was not necessary to examine the matter under 8 and V 8 and 13 as regards the restrictions on his personal correspondence. Court found unanimously V 6(1) and 8 as regards the applicants' access to legal advice in connection with their personal injury claims.

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo.

Preliminary objection of non-exhaustion unanimously rejected, as were further submissions by one of the applicants. In determining:

A 6: the question of whether the disciplinary proceedings involved the determination of a 'criminal charge' was assessed by: (1) the classification of the proceedings in domestic law; (2) the nature of the offence or conduct in question; (3) the nature and degree of severity of the penalty that may be incurred. The forfeiture of remission that the applicant risked and did in fact incur, involved such serious consequences as regards the length of detention that the penalties were regarded as 'criminal'.

In determining whether the Board could be considered 'independent', regard was had to: the manner of appointment of its members and the duration of their term of office, the existence of guarantees against outside pressures and whether the body presents the appearance of independence. The Court saw no reason to conclude that the Board was not 'independent'. Whether the Board was 'impartial' had to be determined according to a subjective test, that is, the personal conviction of a particular judge, and also according to an objective test, that is, whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in this respect. Neither test was met on the facts.

To require disciplinary proceedings concerning convicted prisoners to be held in public would have been to impose a disproportionate burden on the State authorities. However, as it did not appear that any steps had been taken to make public the Board's decision, a breach of A 6(1) was found.

A 6(3)(b) and (c) was breached in that Mr Campbell did not have adequate facilities to prepare his defence which, if not conducted by himself, must have been conducted with legal assistance.

Despite permission to seek legal advice in connection with a civil action claiming compensation for the injuries sustained during the incident to which the disciplinary proceedings related having been only temporarily delayed and the delay having been contributed to by Mr Campbell, such hindrance of access to a court violated A 6(1).

Once permission had been granted, Father Fell was unable to consult his solicitors out of the hearing of a prison officer. This absence of privileged contact amounted to an interference with the right of access to court that was incompatible with A 6(1).

The applicants did not pursue their claim against the refusal to allow them access to independent medical advice and it was not therefore necessary to examine it.

A 8: the applicants' inability to correspond with their solicitors in connection with the civil claim until after the internal inquiry had not been necessary within the meaning of A 8(2).

It was not necessary to examine Father Fell's claim concerning the restriction on his confidential consultation with his solicitors in view of the A 6(1) finding.

The restrictions on Father Fell's correspondence with people other than relatives or existing friends, was not necessary within the meaning of A 8(2).

A 13: as the requirements of this Article were less strict than those of A 6 it was not necessary to examine the claim given the Court's conclusions in relation to A 6.

As regards the complaints under A 8 concerning the restrictions on access to legal advice and on personal correspondence, there was a violation of A 13. A remedy would have been available had the relevant directives been incorrectly applied, but they had not.

As regards restrictions on personal correspondence, where a causal connection was found, a finding of a violation was considered to be sufficient to constitute just satisfaction. Costs and expenses awarded: GBP 13,000 plus VAT.

Can v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 121 85/9

[Application lodged 14.4.1981; Commission report 12.7.1984; Court Judgment 30.9.1985.]

Mr Elvan Can was arrested by police in August 1980, on suspicion of an offence. It was ordered that he be detained on remand, on the ground that there was danger of absconding and suppression of evidence. Six applications for his release were rejected. His detention on remand was authorised to be continued for a number of months. At a hearing before the trial court in November 1981, the applicant was released, subject to depositing a sum as security. At the outset of his detention the applicant was permitted to consult with his lawyer and his assistants only under supervision. The applicant sought leave to consult with his lawyer in the absence of any third party, this was refused. In 1983 the applicant was convicted of being an accomplice to arson and sentenced to 14 months' imprisonment. The applicant complained both of the duration of his detention on remand – 14 months and 26 days – and of the initial supervision of his consultations with his lawyer. On the first point he relied on A 5(3) and on the second, on A 6(3)(c).

Commission found by a majority V 5(3) and unanimously V 6(3)(c).

Court noted the friendly settlement and struck the case from the list.

Canea Catholic Church v Greece (1999) 27 EHRR 521 97/97

[Application lodged 2.8.1994; Commission report 3.9.1996; Court Judgment 16.12.97]

The applicant, the Roman Catholic Church of the Virgin Mary of Canea had been used as a church since at least 1879. In June 1987 two people living next to the church demolished one of the surrounding walls (1.20 metres high) and made a window looking onto the church in the wall of their own building. The church successfully applied to the District Court which ordered that the wall had to be rebuilt. The defendants successfully appealed that judgment to the Canea Court of First Instance which found that the Catholic Church had no legal personality in Greece and therefore could not bring a legal action. The Catholic Church appealed to the Court of Cassation, which dismissed the appeal. The Right Reverend Frangiskos Papamanolis applied to the Commission complaining that the Greek courts' refusal to acknowledge that the Catholic Church of the Virgin Mary in Canea had legal personality amounted to a discriminatory interference with its right of access to a court, its right to respect for its freedom of religion and its right to the peaceful enjoyment of its possessions; he relied on A 6(1), A 9 and A 14 of the Convention and P1A2.

Comm found unanimously NV 9, by majority (18–10) V 9+14, (17–11) no separate issue under 6 or 6+14, (21–7) no separate issue under P1A1 or P1A1+14.

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objection and found V 6(1), 6(1)+14, not necessary to consider 9, P1A1 alone or with 14.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr AB Baka, Mr L Wildhaber.

Government's preliminary objection regarding standing was rejected. The Court considered that the Church had validly applied to the Commission through the Right Reverend Frangiskos Papamanolis, Roman Catholic Bishop of the Islands of Syros, Milos and Thera and Acting Bishop of Crete, noting that the Court of Cassation had already held that the Catholic bishop in charge of the churches in his diocese and the abbots in charge of Catholic monastic establishments were alone empowered to represent those churches and establishments in legal proceedings concerning any claim or issue relating to their property.

The legal personality of the Church and of the various parish churches had never been called into question since the creation of the Greek State either by the administrative authorities or by the courts. Those churches had, in their own name, acquired, used and freely transferred movable and immovable property, concluded contracts and taken part in, among others, notarial transactions, whose validity had always been recognised. In holding that the applicant church had no capacity to take legal proceedings, the Court of Cassation did not only penalise the failure to comply with a simple formality necessary for the protection of public order, as the Government maintained. It also imposed a real restriction on the applicant church preventing it on this particular occasion and for the future from having any dispute relating to its property rights determined by the courts. The Court did not accept the Government's argument that the Catholic Church should have carried out formalities in order to acquire a form of legal personality under the Civil Code since there was nothing to suggest that it would one day be deprived of access to a court in order to defend its civil rights. Quite apart from the difficulties of adapting a church to the personality or union of persons that the Government suggested, and the procedural problems which might arise in the event of litigation, such late compliance with the relevant rules of domestic law might be interpreted as an admission that countless acts of the applicant church in the past were not valid. The finding that the Catholic Church did not have a legal personality impaired the very substance of the 'right to a court' and therefore constituted a breach of A 6(1).

The applicant church, which owned its land and buildings, had been prevented from taking legal proceedings to protect them, whereas the Orthodox Church or the Jewish community could do so in order to protect their own property without any formality or required procedure. Having regard to the conclusion under A 6(1) there had also been a breach of A 14 taken together with A 6(1) as no objective and reasonable justification for such a difference of treatment had been put forward.

Having regard to its conclusions above, the Court held that it was not necessary to rule on the complaints based on A 9 and P1A1.

Cantoni v France 96/45

[Application lodged 26.11.1990; Commission report 12.4.1995; Court Judgment 15.11.1996]

Mr Michel Cantoni was the manager of a supermarket. In 1988 criminal proceedings were brought, at the instigation of the Pharmacists' Association and several individual pharmacists, against the applicant and other managers of supermarkets in the region for unlawfully selling pharmaceutical products. The defendants maintained that the products in question were not medicinal products within the meaning of the Public Health Code and were accordingly not covered by the pharmacists' monopoly. He was found guilty and fined. The Paris Court of Appeal upheld the first-instance judgment and a further appeal to the Criminal Division of the Court of Cassation was dismissed. He complained that the statutory definition of medicinal product lacked sufficient clarity and precision to satisfy the requirements of A 7(1).

Comm found by majority (15–9) V 7(1).

Court unanimously found NV 7.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr SK Martens, Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

A 7 embodied, inter alia, the principle that only the law can define a crime and prescribe a penalty (nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege) and the principle that the criminal law must not be extensively construed to an accused's detriment, for instance by analogy. From these principles it followed that an offence must be clearly defined in the law. That requirement is satisfied where the individual can know from the wording of the relevant provision and, if need be, with the assistance of the courts' interpretation of it, what acts and omissions would make him criminally liable. The 'law' comprises statutory law as well as case-law and implies qualitative requirements, notably those of accessibility and forseeability. The wording of statutes was not always precise. One of the standard techniques of regulation by rules was to use general categorisations as opposed to exhaustive lists. The need to avoid excessive rigidity and to keep pace with changing circumstances meant that many laws were inevitably couched in terms which, to a greater or lesser extent, were vague. The interpretation and application of such enactments depended on practice. The definition of 'medicinal product' was rather general. There would often be grey areas at the fringes of a definition; that penumbra of doubt in relation to borderline facts did not in itself make a provision incompatible with A 7, provided it proved to be sufficiently clear in the large majority of cases. The role of adjudication vested in the courts is precisely to dissipate such interpretational doubts as remain, taking into account the changes in everyday practice. The Court of Cassation had always either confirmed the decisions of the courts below classifying a parapharmaceutical-type product as medicinal or quashed decisions which denied that classification. It had never upheld a decision by a lower court finding that such a product fell outside the notion of medicinal product. The Court of Cassation had adopted, before the present case, a clear position on this matter, which with the passing of time became even more firmly established. The scope of the notion of forseeability depended to a considerable degree on the content of the text in issue, the field it was designed to cover and the number and status of those to whom it is addressed. A law might still satisfy the requirement of forseeability even if the person concerned had to take appropriate legal advice to assess, to a degree that was reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action might entail. That was particularly true in relation to persons carrying on a professional activity, who were used to having to proceed with a high degree of caution when pursuing their occupation. With the benefit of appropriate legal advice, the applicant, who was the manager of a supermarket, should have appreciated at the material time that, in view of the line of case-law stemming from the Court of Cassation and from some of the lower courts, he ran a real risk of prosecution for unlawful sale of medicinal products. Accordingly there had been no breach of A 7.

Cappello v Italy 92/26

[Application lodged 7.2.1987; Commission report 5.12.1990; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mrs Caterina Cappello, a housewife, was knocked down by a motorcycle and seriously injured on 19 August 1976. Criminal proceedings were taken against the rider, a minor. On 23 March 1979 the Cagliari Juvenile Court acquitted him under an amnesty. By a writ dated 16 May 1980, the applicant brought an action for damages before the District Court at Tempio Pausania against the young motorcyclist, his parents and the owner of the motorcycle. She complained about the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 16 May 1980, when the applicant brought her action for damages in the Tempio Pausania District Court. It probably ended, at the latest, on 26 September 1991, the date by which the judgment of the Cagliari Court of Appeal must have become final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Although the Government pleaded the backlog of cases in the Tempio Pausania District Court and the transfer of two judges, A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The case-file did not provide many details on the proceedings in the Cagliari Court of Appeal. The State could not be held responsible for the period of several months which the defendants took to appeal, but approximately three months elapsed between the adoption of the judgment and the filing of its text with the registry. The lapse of time in the present case could not be regarded as 'reasonable'. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Non-pecuniary damage (ITL 10 million), costs and expenses (ITL 3 million) awarded.

Capuano v Italy (1991) 13 EHRR 271 87/9

[Application lodged 21.12.1980; Commission report 15.10.1985; Court Judgment 25.6.1987]

Mrs Gloria Capuano, the applicant, commenced civil proceedings in respect of renovations and building works against a vendor of her property. The hearing commenced on 10 January 1977 and following adjournments and postponements was still continuing at the date of the Court judgment, a lapse of time exceeding 10 years and 4 months.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr J Gersing.

The period to be considered began on 10 January 1977, when the defendants were due to appear before the court, Italian law leaving it to the plaintiff to indicate the date for the initial hearing of the summons. It had not yet ended, since the proceedings were still pending. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the Court's case-law. The Government claim that in Italy the procedure in civil cases was governed by the 'principle of determination', meaning that the initiative and the power of advancing matters rested with the parties, did not dispense the courts from ensuring compliance with A 6 as to the 'reasonable time' requirement. The case was not complex either as regards facts or law. The applicant was responsible to a certain extent for the prolongation of the proceedings. However, the first instance court (before whom the case had lasted six years, eight months and 10 days) was responsible for a delay of almost three years regarding the preparation of experts' opinions. The matter had been before the appeal court for four years and no judgment had yet been delivered. Although the applicant was responsible for some of the delay, the case had not been heard within a reasonable time and therefore there had been a violation of A 6(1)

Carbonara and Ventura v Italy 00/154

[Application lodged 25.5.1994; Commission report 1.7.1998; Court Judgment 30.5.2000]

Mrs Elena Carbonara, Mr Pasquale Carbonara, Mr Augusto Carbonara and Mr Costantino Ventura's late mother owned agricultural land in Noicattaro. By a decree issued on 27 May 1970, the Prefecture of Bari authorised the Noicattaro Town Council to take possession, under an expedited procedure, of land belonging to the applicants for a maximum period of two years with a view to expropriating it in the public interest in order to build a school. The school was not completed until 28 October 1972, by which time the authorised period of possession had expired. The applicants complained that they waited for several years for their land to be formally expropriated and for compensation.

Comm found unanimously V P1A1.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V P1A1.

Judges: Mr AB Baka, President, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr E Levits.

Having perused the settlement agreement and the expert's report of 6 October 1986, the Court considered that the Government had not shown that the amount paid to the applicants pursuant to the settlement agreement related to the land forming the subject-matter of the application. Consequently, the Government's preliminary objection that the applicants no longer had an interest in pursuing the application was dismissed.

The Court recalled its case-law. There had been a deprivation of possessions. The Court of Cassation held, in a decision that was final and in which it applied the constructive-expropriation rule, that there had been a transfer of property in favour of the Noicattaro Town Council; as a consequence of that decision the applicants were deprived of the possibility of obtaining damages. In those circumstances, the effect of the judgment of the Court of Cassation was to deprive the applicants of their possessions within the meaning of the second sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. The first and most important requirement of P1A1 was that any interference by a public authority with the peaceful enjoyment of possessions should be lawful. The requirement of lawfulness meant that rules of domestic law had to be sufficiently accessible, precise and foreseeable. The case-law on constructive expropriations had evolved in a way that had led to the rule being applied inconsistently, a factor which could result in unforeseeable or arbitrary outcomes and deprive litigants of effective protection of their rights and which, as a consequence, was inconsistent with the requirement of lawfulness. Under the rule established by the Court of Cassation every constructive expropriation followed the unlawful taking of possession of the land. The Court had reservations as to the compatibility with the requirement of lawfulness of a mechanism which, generally, enabled the authorities to benefit from an unlawful situation in which the landowner was presented with a fait accompli. Compensation for deprivation of property was not paid automatically by the authorities, but had to be claimed by the landowner within five years, and that might prove to be inadequate protection. Pursuant to the constructive-expropriation rule, the Court of Cassation held that the applicants had been deprived of their land from 28 October 1972. That transfer of property to the authorities therefore occurred during the period of possession without title, automatically, following completion of the public works. That situation could not be regarded as foreseeable as it was only in the final decision, the judgment of the Court of Cassation, that the constructive-expropriation rule could be regarded as being effectively applied as the case-law rule did not bind the courts as regards its application. Consequently the applicants did not become certain that they had been deprived of their land until 26 November 1993, when the Court of Cassation's judgment was lodged with the registry.

That situation enabled the authorities to derive a benefit from taking possession of land which they had held without title since 30 June 1972. As the Court of Cassation applied the five-year limitation period from the date of completion of the works (28 October 1972), the applicants were denied the possibility that had, in principle, been available to them of obtaining damages. The interference could only be described as arbitrary and consequently was not compatible with P1A1 and accordingly, there had been a violation of it.

Cardarelli v Italy 92/18

[Application lodged 9.4.1986; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mr Achille Cardarelli, the owner of a flat damaged by water seepage, served a summons on 23 December 1977 for proceedings before the Florence District Court against Mr M, the owner of the flat from which the seepage had originated. During the proceedings Mr M's counsel, Mr M and the applicant had died. The proceedings had not yet ended at the date of the Court's judgment.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 23 December 1977 when the proceedings were instituted against Mr M in the Florence District Court; it had not yet ended, since that court had still to give judgment. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was of some complexity. The need to have recourse to expert opinions and the presence of several defendants undoubtedly made the investigating judge's task more difficult. Nevertheless, most of the delays occurred after the investigation had been terminated. Almost two years elapsed between the last hearing before the investigating judge and the hearing before the chamber. There were long delays before the trial began again. The Italian State could not be held responsible for three of them: the applicant's lawyer waited more than two months before requesting that the proceedings be resumed following Mr M's death, more than three years and eight months before notifying the court of his client's death and more than four years before requesting leave to act thereafter in his capacity as a trustee. Other delays were due to the District Court not acting diligently. Although the Government pleaded the backlog of cases in the District Court, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. Taking the proceedings as a whole, the Court could not regard as 'reasonable' a lapse of time which was already more than fourteen years for only one level of jurisdiction.

Not necessary to apply A 50 in this instance as the applicant had not requested any just satisfaction in good time and that was not a matter for the Court to examine of its own motion.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald (d), Mr C Russo, Mr SK Martens (d), Mr JM Morenilla (d).

A 26 (exhaustion of domestic remedies) had to be applied with some degree of flexibility. It normally also required that the complaints intended to be made subsequently at Strasbourg should have been made to the national courts, at least in substance and in compliance with the formal requirements and time limits laid down in domestic law and, further, that any procedural means which might prevent a breach of the Convention should have been used. The applicant did not raise his complaints before the French courts and so provide them with the opportunity of preventing or putting right the violations alleged against them. The objection that domestic remedies had not been exhausted was therefore well founded and the Court was unable to take cognisance of the merits of the case.

Casadio v Italy 91/63

[Application lodged 2.2.1987; Commission report 5.3.1991; Court Judgment 3.12.1991]

Mr Alvaro Casadio was unemployed. On 8 November 1983 he took proceedings before the Rome magistrates' court against the 'Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale' (INPS) for the recognition of his entitlement to a disability pension. The investigation opened at the hearing of 14 February 1984 when the magistrates' court ordered a medical opinion. On 9 April 1985 the magistrates' court dismissed the applicant's claim. On 4 April 1986 the applicant appealed to the Rome District Court. The hearing took place on 19 April 1990 after which the appeal was dismissed. The text of the judgment was lodged with the registry on 13 July 1990. The applicant complained about the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck the case from the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens.

Notwithstanding several reminders from the registry the applicant showed no interest in the proceedings before the Court. The Court considered that there had been an implied withdrawal which constituted a 'fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter'. There was no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. The Court noted its previous case-law concerning the 'reasonableness' of the length of civil proceedings in various Contracting States, including Italy and specified the nature and the extent of the obligations arising in that context from A 6(1). Accordingly, the case should be struck out of the list.

Casado Coca v Spain (1994) 18 EHRR 1 94/8

[Application lodged 25.5.1989; Commission report 1.12.1992; Court Judgment 24.2.1994]

Mr Pablo Casado Coca was a lawyer. After setting up his practice in 1979, he regularly placed notices advertising it in the miscellaneous advertisements pages of several Barcelona newspapers and the German Journal of Spain. He also wrote to various companies offering his services. The Barcelona Bar Council brought disciplinary proceedings against him four times resulting in two reprimands and two warnings. The applicant lodged appeals against these penalties. His application to the Barcelona Audiencia Territorial was dismissed on 11 May 1987 and on 23 September 1988 the Supreme Court dismissed his further appeal and refused to refer the case to the Constitutional Court. The applicant lodged an appeal with the Constitutional Court which on 17 April 1989 declared the appeal inadmissible. He complained of the disciplinary sanction imposed on him for having published a notice about his practice.

A 10 guaranteed freedom of expression to 'everyone' with no distinction being made according to whether the type of aim pursued was profit-making or not. A 10 did not apply solely to certain types of information or ideas or forms of expression, it also encompassed artistic expression, information of a commercial nature and even light music and commercials transmitted by cable. In the present case the notices gave the applicant's name, profession, address and telephone number. They were clearly published with the aim of advertising, but they provided persons requiring legal assistance with information that was of definite use and likely to facilitate their access to justice. A 10 was therefore applicable.

Regarding the question of whether there was an interference by a public authority, the domestic law on professional associations stated that they were public-law corporations. In the case of the Bars, this status was further buttressed by their purpose of serving the public interest through the furtherance of free, adequate legal assistance combined with public supervision of the practice of the profession and of compliance with professional ethics. In addition an appeal lay against the decision to the courts. That being so, it was reasonable to hold that there was an interference by a 'public authority' with the applicant's freedom to impart information. The interference was 'prescribed by law' as interpreted by the Constitutional Court. The Bar rules were designed to protect the interests of the public while ensuring respect for members of the Bar. Under the Court's case-law, the Contracting States had a certain margin of appreciation in assessing the necessity of an interference, but that margin was subject to European supervision as regards both the relevant rules and the decisions applying them. Such a margin of appreciation was particularly essential in the complex and fluctuating area of unfair competition. The same applied to advertising. For the citizen, advertising was a means of discovering the characteristics of services and goods offered to him. Nevertheless, it could sometimes be restricted, especially to prevent unfair competition and untruthful or misleading advertising. In some contexts, the publication of even objective, truthful advertisements might be restricted in order to ensure respect for the rights of others or owing to the special circumstances of particular business activities and professions. Any such restrictions had to be closely scrutinised by the Court, which had to weigh the requirements of those particular features against the advertising in question. The applicant had received a written warning from the Barcelona Bar Council for having contravened the ban on professional advertising. Commercial undertakings such as insurance companies who were not subject to restrictions on advertising their legal consulting services could not be compared to members of the Bar in independent practice, whose special status gave them a central position in the administration of justice as intermediaries between the public and the courts. Such a position explained the usual restrictions on the conduct of members of the Bar and also the monitoring and supervisory powers vested in Bar councils. The wide range of regulations and the different rates of change in the Council of Europe's Member States indicated the complexity of the issue. Because of their direct, continuous contact with their members, the Bar authorities and the country's courts were in a better position than an international court to determine how, at a given time, the right balance could be struck between the various interests involved, namely the requirements of the proper administration of justice, the dignity of the profession, the right of everyone to receive information about legal assistance and affording members of the Bar the possibility of advertising their practices. In those circumstances, at the material time, 1982–83, the relevant authorities' reaction could not be considered disproportionate to the aim pursued. Accordingly no breach of A 10 had been made out.

Casciaroli v Italy 92/14

[Application lodged 24.12.1985; Commission report 5.12.1990; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mrs Rosina Casciaroli's husband died as the result of a traffic accident. Civil and criminal proceedings were brought against those presumed responsible for the accident and their insurers.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The case began on 4 March 1976 when the applicant entered a claim for damages in the criminal proceedings; it remained pending in the Venice District Court. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was not complex. There were several periods of stagnation in the criminal proceedings. Twenty-five months elapsed between the date on which the Venice District Court ordered further inquiries to be undertaken and that on which the investigating judge committed the defendants for trial. It then took more than four months to transmit the file to the Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation did not hold a hearing until more than four years after the case had been brought before it. Although the Government pleaded the backlog of cases, A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The parties had contributed to slowing down the civil proceedings by numerous requests for adjournments. However, a lapse of time of nearly sixteen years could not be regarded as reasonable. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 17.9.1985; Commission report 8.1.1991; Court Judgment 23.4.1992]

Mr Miguel Castells was a lawyer and senator elected on the list of Herri Batasuna, a political grouping supporting independence for the Basque Country. In 1979 he wrote an article criticising the government, entitled 'Outrageous Impunity', published in the weekly magazine 'Punto y Hora de Euskalherria'. He was prosecuted, convicted of insulting the government and disqualified from public office. At trial the Spanish courts ruled that the evidence of the truth of his statements was inadmissible. He complained that his freedom of expression had been violated and that others had published similar articles without encountering difficulty.

Comm found by majority V 10.

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection and found V 10, not necessary to examine 14+10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr R Macdonald, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen (c), Mr AN Loizou, Mr JA Carrillo Salcedo (c), ad hoc judge.

Regarding the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion, A 26 had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism. It was sufficient that 'the complaints intended to be made subsequently before the Convention organs' should have been raised 'at least in substance and in compliance with the formal requirements and time limits laid down in domestic law'. The applicant had raised his points in the Supreme Court and had invoked before the Constitutional Court, 'at least in substance', the complaints relating to A 10. The objection that the applicant had failed to exhaust domestic remedies therefore had to be dismissed.

Freedom of expression constituted one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress. It was applicable not only to 'information' or 'ideas' that were favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offended, shocked or disturbed. Such were the demands of that pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there was no 'democratic society'. Freedom of expression was especially important for an elected representative of the people. Interference with the freedom of expression of an opposition member of parliament, like the applicant, called for the closest scrutiny on the part of the Court. The prosecution and conviction were an interference with the exercise of the applicant's freedom of expression. The prosecution had a legal basis in the Criminal Code; the fact that the statute was open to different interpretations did not detract from it being prescribed by law. Considering the circumstances in Spain at the time (1979), the proceedings were brought for the legitimate aim of preventing disorder. Freedom of expression was one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and especially important for elected representatives of the people. Freedom of the press enabled the public and politicians the opportunity to participate in the free political debate which was at the very core of the concept of a democratic society. The freedom of political debate was not absolute in nature. The limits of permissible criticism were wider with regard to the Government than in relation to a private citizen, or even a politician. In a democratic system the actions or omissions of the Government had to be subject to the close scrutiny not only of the legislative and judicial authorities but also of the press and public opinion. Furthermore, the dominant position which the Government occupied made it necessary for it to display restraint in resorting to criminal proceedings, particularly where other means were available for replying to the unjustified attacks and criticisms of its adversaries or the media. The applicant had offered to establish that the facts recounted by him were true and well known but the Supreme Court declared such evidence inadmissible on the ground that the defence of truth could not be pleaded in respect of insults directed at the institutions of the nation. The Court attached decisive importance to the fact that the evidence was declared inadmissible; such an interference in the exercise of the applicant's freedom of expression was not necessary in a democratic society. There had therefore been a violation of A 10.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary injury, costs and expenses (ESP 3,000,000).

Castillo Algar v Spain 98/92

[Application lodged 3.8.1995; Commission report 9.4.1997; Court Judgment 28.10.1998]

Mr Ricardo Castillo Algar was a lieutenant-colonel in the infantry and attached to the Spanish Legion. He was charged with having set up, to the detriment of the Armed Forces Treasury and contrary to A 189 of the Military Criminal Code, an unregulated private fund that was not subject to tax or audit by the tax authorities. He was found guilty by a chamber of the Central Military Court and sentenced him to three months and one day's imprisonment. The applicant appealed on points of law to the Supreme Court. He maintained that the chamber that had tried him could not be considered impartial as two of the judges had previously sat in the chamber that had heard his appeal against the order by which he had been charged. The Supreme Court (Military Division) dismissed the appeal. A further appeal to the Constitutional Court was also dismissed. The applicant complained that his case had not been heard by an impartial tribunal.

Comm unanimously found V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed Government's preliminary objection regarding non-exhaustion, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr V Butkevych.

The Court noted that the purpose of the requirement that domestic remedies had to be exhausted was to afford the Contracting States the opportunity of preventing or putting right alleged violations before the allegations were submitted to the Convention institutions. The applicant had raised his complaints regarding the Central Military Court to the Supreme Court. Although the applicant had not challenged the judges concerned before the start of the trial, the courts of the respondent State could not be said to have been denied an opportunity to put right the alleged violation of A 6(1). Consequently, the Government's preliminary objection was dismissed.

The existence of impartiality had to be determined by a subjective test, that is, on the basis of the personal conviction of a particular judge in a given case, and also by an objective test, that is, ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. As regards the subjective test, the personal impartiality of a judge had to be presumed until there was proof to the contrary. In the present case there was no evidence that either judge acted on the basis of personal bias. Under the objective test, it had to be determined whether, irrespective of the judge's personal conduct, there were ascertainable facts which might raise doubts as to his impartiality. In that respect even appearances might be of importance. What was at stake was the confidence which the courts in a democratic society had to inspire in the public, including the accused. Accordingly, any judge in respect of whom there was a legitimate reason to fear a lack of impartiality had to withdraw. In deciding whether, in a given case, there was a legitimate reason to fear that a particular judge lacked impartiality, the standpoint of the accused was important, but not decisive. What was decisive was whether the fear could be held to be objectively justified. In the present case, the fear that the trial court was not impartial stemmed from the fact that two of the judges sitting in it had previously sat in the chamber that had upheld the order on appeal. That could give rise to misgivings on the part of the accused as to the impartiality of the judges. However, whether such misgivings should be treated as objectively justified depended on the circumstances of each particular case; the mere fact that a judge has already taken decisions before the trial could not in itself be regarded as justifying anxieties as to his impartiality. The wording used by the chamber of the Central Military Court that heard the appeal, which included the two judges, could be taken to mean that it adopted the view taken by the Supreme Court that 'there was sufficient evidence to allow of the conclusion that a military offence had been committed'. The two judges subsequently sat as president and reporting judge respectively in the chamber of the Central Military Court which on 25 May 1994 found the applicant guilty and sentenced him to prison. In those circumstances the impartiality of the trial court could be open to genuine doubt and the applicant's fears in that regard could be considered objectively justified. Accordingly V 6(1).

Mr Loreto Cattivera took proceedings on 14 June 1984 in the Rome magistrates' court against the 'Istituto Nazionale per l'Assicurazione contro gli Infortuni sul Lavoro' (INAIL) to obtain a disability pension. According to the Government, the investigation began at the hearing of 22 November 1984, but records they submitted showed that the initial hearing took place on 5 July 1985 when the magistrates' court ordered a medical opinion. After a hearing on 26 June 1986 the magistrates' court ordered the INAIL to pay the applicant the allowance prescribed for a 20% disability. The text of the decision was lodged with the registry on 25 August 1986. Mrs Cazenave de la Roche's employment as a senior lecturer at the Rabat National School of Architecture in Morocco was terminated by the French and Moroccan authorities. Her application to be appointed to the town-planning teaching staff was refused. On 29 January 1988 she submitted a claim to the Minister for Foreign Affairs for compensation for the loss sustained on account of her not having become an established member of the State's architect teaching staff. On 25 October 1996, the Paris Administrative Court of Appeal dismissed the applicant's appeal; judgment was served on the applicant on 13 November 1996. She complained of the length of proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Sir John Freeland, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr Lôhmus, Mr V Butkevych.

The Court repeated its case-law that 'disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants are as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1)'. The position was different where the claim related to a 'purely economic' right and, more especially, where the right accrued in law after a civil servant's service had ended. The refusal to establish the applicant as a State civil servant was no longer at the heart of the compensation proceedings she brought. The establishment she had sought was not a right, since it was dependent on the creation of a post by means of decrees which did not in this instance exist. Consequently, the Court considered that it did not have to take into account the issue of the applicant's status as a civil servant and the compatibility of her dismissal with her possible right to become an established civil servant. On the other hand, the applicant only brought the compensation proceedings in order to obtain reparation for the damage caused by an administrative act that she had successfully challenged by means of an application for judicial review. That action, purely for damages, was indeed open to her following the acknowledgement of her right to compensation, which arose from the finding that her dismissal had been unlawful, that is to say after the termination of her service. The issue of the award of damages to the applicant and of their quantum concerned a purely economic right. The applicant's action concerned a dispute over a 'civil right', and accordingly A 6(1) applied to the case.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 29 January 1988 with the submission of the preliminary claim to the Minister for Foreign Affairs. The proceedings lasted 8 years, 9 months and 2 weeks. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. The case was not complex. The applicant had not delayed the proceedings. The authorities were responsible for several periods of inactivity which had not been explained by the Government. There had been delays of two years and ten months for a ruling by Administrative Court, one year and three months for service of a judgment and nearly two years in the Administrative Court of Appeal. A reasonable time had been exceeded and there had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Mr Franco Cesarini instituted proceedings against his employer, company O, on 10 September 1982, before the Rome magistrates' court seeking a ruling that his lay-off on 14 June 1982 had been unlawful and that he was entitled to payment of his wages as from that date. The applicant had requested the Rome magistrates' court on 10 June 1982, as an emergency measure, to order the company to pay him the salary due to him from 14 June 1982 to the date of judgment. The investigative stage of the proceedings began at a hearing on 2 March 1983. On 9 February 1984 the magistrates' court dismissed the applicant's suit. On 29 March 1985 the applicant, who had been dismissed in the intervening period, appealed against the judgment. At a hearing on 18 November 1986 the Rome District Court found against the applicant. The applicant appealed to the Court of Cassation. The hearing before that court was arranged for 22 February 1989, but the applicant and company O reached a friendly settlement on 19 January 1989. The applicant withdrew his appeal and on 22 February 1989 the Court of Cassation noted the withdrawal of the action and closed the proceedings. He complained of the length of proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration started on 10 June 1982, when the applicant requested the Rome magistrates' court to adopt an emergency measure. It ended on 22 February 1989, when the Court of Cassation noted that the applicant had withdrawn the action and closed the proceedings. It thus lasted for more than six years and eight months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. There were several periods of inactivity: the magistrates' court waited seventeen months before taking a decision and the Rome District Court waited twenty months before examining the applicant's appeal. Nevertheless, having regard to the applicant's attitude, to the fact that the case came before three different courts and to the friendly settlement, the delays that occurred did not appear substantial enough for the total length of the proceedings to be able to be regarded as excessive. There had therefore been no breach of A 6(1).

Cesky v Czech Republic 00/158

[Application lodged 23.11.1995; Court Judgment 6.6.2000]

On 6 February 1993 Mr Libor Cesky was arrested in Italy, pursuant to an extradition warrant, and on 18 February 1993 he was extradited. He was remanded in custody. His requests for release were rejected. On 10 June 1994 the Municipal Court convicted the applicant of robbery and sentenced him to 15 years' imprisonment, the confiscation of his car as well as a fine of CZK 4,372,000. The applicant appealed. On 18 February 1997 he was released because of the expiration of the four year maximum permissible period for detention on remand. Following a number of retrials and appeals, on 20 January 2000 the Municipal Court delivered its fifth judgment convicting the applicant of robbery and sentencing him to 12 years' imprisonment. The applicant's appeal was still pending before the appellate court. The applicant complained that his detention on remand had been unreasonably long.

Court found unanimously V 5(3).

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr K Jungwiert, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mrs HS Greve.

The period of detention on remand to be examined under A 5(3) included the length of the applicant's detention between 6 February 1993 and 10 June 1994, ie from the moment when he was arrested in Italy, in respect of the criminal proceedings brought against him in the Czech Republic, until the delivery of the first Municipal Court's judgment, his detention on remand between 16 January 1995 and 17 December 1996, ie from the moment when the High Court quashed the first judgment delivered by the Municipal Court until the latter delivered its second judgment, and between 17 and 18 February 1997, ie from the moment when the High Court quashed the second judgment given by the Prague Municipal Court until the applicant's release. Accordingly, the detention to be taken into consideration lasted three years, three months and seven days. The reasonableness of the length of the detention had to be assessed in each case according to its special features. Continued detention could be justified in a given case only if there were clear indications of a genuine public interest which, notwithstanding the presumption of innocence, outweighed the right to liberty. It fell in the first place to the national judicial authorities to examine the circumstances for or against the existence of such an imperative interest, and to set them out in their decisions on the applications for release. It was essentially on the basis of the reasons given in those decisions, and of the facts established by the applicant in his appeals, that the Court was called upon to decide whether or not there had been a violation of A 5(3). The persistence of a reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence was a condition sine qua non for the lawfulness of the continued detention, but after a certain lapse of time it no longer sufficed: the Court had to then establish whether the other grounds given by the judicial authorities continued to justify the deprivation of liberty. Where such grounds were relevant and sufficient, the Court had to also ascertain whether the competent national authorities displayed special diligence in the conduct of the proceedings. There existed a reasonable suspicion that the applicant had committed an offence. The reasons given by the domestic courts concerning the risk of absconding were sufficient and relevant and in those circumstances it was not necessary to examine the other grounds for the applicant's detention invoked by the domestic courts. However, there were a number of delays on the part of the authorities and special diligence was not displayed in the conduct of the proceedings. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 5(3) as a result of the length of the applicant's detention on remand.

Pecuniary damage (CZK 100,000), costs and expenses (CZK 66,000). Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the non-pecuniary damage.

Ceteroni v Italy 96/50

[Application lodged 2.12.1992; Commission report 22.2.1995; Court Judgment 15.11.1996]

On 2 April 1982 the District Court of Fermo made an insolvency order in respect of the company set up by Mr Umberto Ceteroni and his parents and also declared them personally bankrupt. On 8 and 15 June 1983 respectively, Mr A and the LM company, claiming to be creditors of the bankrupts, instituted separate proceedings before the Fermo bankruptcy judge. The judge set down hearings to enter appearances on 26 October and 9 November 1983 respectively. On the latter date the liquidator applied to the judge for leave to join the second proceedings. His application was allowed on 3 February 1987. In the preliminary stages 15 hearings were held in one case and 16 in the other; almost all adjourned at the request of the parties or by the judge of his own motion. The proceedings were stayed sine die because the judge had been transferred to another post and were reopened on 25 March and 7 February 1994. On 30 May 1994 the Fermo District Court struck the first case out of its list because the parties had failed to appear. The second case was heard on 11 March 1994 when the Fermo District Court allowed the company's application. The text of the judgment was deposited at the registry on 7 April 1994. The applicant complained, inter alia, of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), not necessary to examine 8 or P4A2(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1), not necessary to examine 8 or P4A2.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr C Russo, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr K Jungwiert.

The Government's preliminary objection on the ground of failure to exhaust domestic remedies was dismissed. The remedy invoked by the Government of complaint to the bankruptcy judge could not be regarded as effective. In those circumstances the applicants were under no obligation to avail themselves of it. The preliminary objection was therefore unfounded in this respect. The further argument put forward by the Government regarding termination had not been put forward before the Commission and the Government was therefore estopped from relying on it.

The periods to be taken into consideration began on 8 and 15 June 1983 when applications were lodged with the Fermo bankruptcy judge by Mr A and the LM company. They ended on 30 May and 7 April 1994 respectively, when the first proceedings were struck out of the list and when the Fermo District Court's judgment was deposited with the registry in the second set of proceedings, a total of almost eleven years in the first proceedings and ten years and ten months in the second. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The liquidator was authorised to join the proceedings brought by the company on 3 February 1987, more than three years after his application to that effect was lodged with the judge responsible for preparing the case. In addition the transfer of the judge, who also exercised the functions of bankruptcy judge, entailed a stay of more than three years in the preparation for trial of both cases. Consequently, any attempt by the applicants to expedite the proceedings would have been bound to fail. In addition, the judge had never refused the applications for adjournment made by the liquidator and the plaintiffs. A reasonable time was exceeded and there had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

In the circumstances of the case and considering the above findings, the Court did not consider it necessary also to determine the complaints under A 8 or P4A2.

Non-pecuniary damage (ITL 50 million to Mr Umberto Ceteroni, and ITL 25 million each to Mr Gaetano Ceteroni and Mrs Anna Maria Ceteroni), costs and expenses (ITL 20 million).

Ceylan v Turkey (2000) 30 EHRR 73 99/29

[Application lodged 10.2.1994; Commission report 11.12.1997; Court Judgment 8.7.1999]

The applicant, who was the president of the petroleum workers' union, wrote an article entitled 'The time has come for the workers to speak out – tomorrow it will be too late' in the 21–28 July 1991 issue of Yeni Ülke ('New Land'), a weekly newspaper published in Istanbul. On 16 September 1991, the applicant was indicted on charges of non-public incitement to hatred and hostility contrary to the Turkish Criminal Code. The National Security Court found him guilty and sentenced him to one year and eight months' imprisonment, plus a fine of TRL 100,000. The Court of Cassation dismissed the applicant's appeal. He served his sentence in full. As a consequence of his conviction, he also lost his office as president of the petrol workers' union as well as certain political and civil rights. He complained that his conviction infringed A 9 and 10.

Comm found by majority (30–2) V 10, no separate issue 10+14.

Court found by majority (16–1) V 10, unanimously no separate issue 10+14, unanimously that the applicant was estopped from bringing a complaint under 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm (jc), Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello (c), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jc), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach (jc), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jc), Mrs HS Greve (jc), Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mr K Traja, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge (d).

The applicant's conviction as a result of the publication of his article amounted to an interference with the exercise of his right to freedom of expression. The conviction was based on the Turkish Criminal Code and it was therefore prescribed by law. Having regard to the sensitivity of the security situation in south-east Turkey and to the need for the authorities to be alert to acts capable of fuelling additional violence, the Court accepted that the applicant's conviction could be said to have been in furtherance of the aims of maintaining national security, preventing disorder and preserving territorial integrity. Freedom of expression constituted one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and for each individual's self-fulfilment. The freedom was subject to exceptions, which had to be construed strictly, and the need for any restrictions established convincingly. 'Necessary', in A 10(2), implied the existence of a 'pressing social need'. The Contracting States had a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether such a need existed, but that went hand in hand with European supervision. The article in issue took the form of a political speech, both in its content and in the kind of terms employed. The style was virulent and the criticism of the Turkish authorities' actions in the relevant part of the country acerbic. There was little scope under A 10(2) for restrictions on political speech or on debate on matters of public interest. The limits of permissible criticism were wider with regard to the government than in relation to a private citizen or even a politician. In a democratic system the actions or omissions of the government had to be subject to the close scrutiny not only of the legislative and judicial authorities but also of public opinion. Moreover, the dominant position which the government occupied made it necessary for it to display restraint in resorting to criminal proceedings, particularly where other means were available for replying to the unjustified attacks and criticisms of its adversaries. Nevertheless, it certainly remained open to the competent State authorities to adopt, in their capacity as guarantors of public order, measures, even of a criminal-law nature, intended to react appropriately and without excess to such remarks. Where such remarks incited to violence against an individual, a public official or a sector of the population, the State authorities enjoyed a wider margin of appreciation when examining the need for an interference with freedom of expression. The Court took into account the background to the case, particularly problems of terrorism and the recently ended Gulf War. However, it was essential to take into account that the applicant was writing in his capacity as a trade-union leader and that the article, despite its virulence, did not encourage the use of violence or armed resistance or insurrection. In addition the Court took into account in assessing the proportionality of the interference, the severity of the penalty imposed on the applicant and the fact that he lost his post and other political and civil rights. The applicant's conviction was disproportionate to the aims pursued and accordingly not necessary in a democratic society. There had therefore been a violation of A 10.

Having regard to its conclusion that there has been a violation of A 10 taken alone the Court did not consider it necessary to examine the complaint under A 14.

As the applicant did not take the opportunity to raise his complaint under A 6(1) when the Commission was examining the admissibility of his application, he was now estopped from doing so.

Non-pecuniary damage (FF 40,000), costs and expenses (FF 15,000).

Cha'are Shalom Ve Tsedek (The Jewish Liturgical Association) v France 00/167

[Application lodged 23.5.1995; Commission report 20.10.1998; Court Judgment 27.6.2000]

The liturgical association Cha'are Shalom Ve Tsedek was an association whose aims were to organise, subsidise, encourage, revive, assist, promote and finance, in France, public Jewish worship and any other related or connected activities of a religious nature which might, directly or indirectly, lead towards the object it pursued. On 11 February 1987 the applicant association asked the Minister of the Interior to propose its approval with a view to practising ritual slaughter in accordance with the very strict religious prescriptions of its members for whom meat was not kosher unless it was glatt (the slaughtered animal must not have any impurity, or in other words any trace of a previous illness, especially in the lungs). This application was refused by a decision of 7 May 1987 and appeals to the Paris Administrative Court and the Conseil d'Etat were also dismissed. The applicant association alleged a violation of A 9 on account of the French authorities' refusal to grant it the approval necessary for access to slaughterhouses with a view to performing ritual slaughter. It further alleged a violation of A 14 in that only the Jewish Consistorial Association of Paris (ACIP), to which the large majority of Jews in France belonged, had received the approval in question.

Comm found by majority (14–3) V 14+9, (15–2) no separate issue under 9 taken alone.

Court found by majority (12–5) NV 9, (10–7) NV 14+9.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mr J-P Costa, Sir Nicolas Bratza (jd), Mr L Ferrari-Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach (jd), Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen (jd), Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska (jd), Mr T Pantîru (jd), Mr AB Baka, Mr E Levits (jd), Mr K Traja (jd).

The president of the applicant association until 25 February 1999, Rabbi David Bitton, told the Court that he wished to withdraw the application. In the absence of an express request by the Government for it to strike the case out of its list, the Court did not consider it necessary to examine of its own motion the question whether, as a matter of domestic law, the new president of the applicant association, elected in March 1999, could validly act on behalf of the applicant association, since in the light of the documentary evidence produced by the association's lawyer the Court considered that it has been established that the applicant intended to pursue its application. There was therefore no reason to strike the case out of its list.

A 9 listed a number of forms which manifestation of one's religion or belief could take, namely worship, teaching, practice and observance. Ritual slaughter constituted a rite, whose purpose was to provide Jews with meat from animals slaughtered in accordance with religious prescriptions, which was an essential aspect of practice of the Jewish religion. The applicant association employed ritual slaughterers and kashrut inspectors who slaughtered animals in accordance with its prescriptions on the question, and it was likewise the applicant association which, by certifying as glatt kosher the meat sold in its members' butcher's shops, exercised religious supervision of ritual slaughter. It followed that the applicant association could rely on A 9 with regard to the French authorities' refusal to approve it, since ritual slaughter had to be considered to be covered by a right guaranteed by the Convention, namely the right to manifest one's religion in observance, within the meaning of A 9. By establishing an exception to the principle that animals had to be stunned before slaughter, French law gave practical effect to a positive undertaking on the State's part intended to ensure effective respect for freedom of religion. The fact that the exceptional rules designed to regulate the practice of ritual slaughter permitted only ritual slaughterers authorised by approved religious bodies to engage in it did not in itself lead to the conclusion that there had been an interference with the freedom to manifest one's religion. It was in the general interest to avoid unregulated slaughter, carried out in conditions of doubtful hygiene, and it was therefore preferable, if there was to be ritual slaughter, for it to be performed in slaughterhouses supervised by the public authorities. The method of slaughter employed by the ritual slaughterers of the applicant association was exactly the same as that employed by the ACIP's ritual slaughterers, the only difference lay in the thoroughness of the examination of the slaughtered animal's lungs after death. It was essential for the applicant association to be able to certify meat not only as kosher but also as glatt in order to comply with its interpretation of the dietary laws, whereas the great majority of practising Jews accepted the kosher certification made under the aegis of the ACIP. There would be interference with the freedom to manifest one's religion only if the illegality of performing ritual slaughter made it impossible for ultra-orthodox Jews to eat meat from animals slaughtered in accordance with the religious prescriptions they considered applicable. But that was not the case. It was not contested that the applicant association could easily obtain supplies of glatt meat in Belgium. Furthermore, a number of butcher's shops operating under the control of the ACIP make meat certified glatt by the Beth Din available to Jews. The right to freedom of religion guaranteed by A 9 could not extend to the right to take part in person in the performance of ritual slaughter and the subsequent certification process, given that the applicant association and its members were not in practice deprived of the possibility of obtaining and eating meat considered by them to be more compatible with religious prescriptions. Since it had not been established that Jews belonging to the applicant association could not obtain glatt meat, or that the applicant could not supply them with it by reaching an agreement with the ACIP, in order to be able to engage in ritual slaughter under cover of the approval granted to the ACIP, the Court considered that the refusal of approval complained of did not constitute an interference with the applicant association's right to the freedom to manifest its religion.

That finding absolved the Court from the task of ruling on the compatibility of the restriction with the requirements laid down in A 9(2). However, even if that restriction could be considered an interference with the right to freedom to manifest one's religion, the measure complained of, which was prescribed by law, pursued a legitimate aim, namely protection of public health and public order, in so far as organisation by the State of the exercise of worship was conducive to religious harmony and tolerance. Furthermore, regard being had to the margin of appreciation left to Contracting States, particularly with regard to establishment of the delicate relations between the State and religions, it could not be considered excessive or disproportionate. In other words, it was compatible with A 9(2), accordingly there had been no violation of A 9 of the Convention taken alone.

A 14 only complemented the other substantive provisions of the Convention and the Protocols. It had no independent existence since it had effect solely in relation to the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms safeguarded by those provisions. The application of A 14 did not presuppose a breach of those provisions. In the light of the findings concerning the limited effect of the measure complained of and the conclusion that there had been no interference with the applicant association's freedom to manifest its religion, the Court considered that the difference of treatment which resulted from the measure was limited in scope. In so far as there was a difference of treatment, it pursued a legitimate aim, and there was a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. Such difference of treatment as there was therefore had an objective and reasonable justification within the meaning of the Court's consistent case-law. There had accordingly been no violation of A 9 taken together with A14.

Chahal v United Kingdom (1997) 23 EHRR 413 96/54

[Application lodged 27.7.1993; Commission report 27.6.1995; Court Judgment 15.11.1996]

The applicants were an Indian Sikh family. The first applicant had entered the UK illegally in 1971 in search of employment. His wife had arrived in 1975 following their marriage; their two children were born in the UK. Mr Chahal had visited India in 1984 and claimed to have been arrested by the Punjab police, detained and tortured. He returned to the UK and was involved in political activities on behalf of the Sikh community. In October 1985 he was detained under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 on suspicion of involvement in a conspiracy to assassinate the Indian Prime Minister, Mr Rajiv Gandhi, during an official visit to the United Kingdom. He was released for lack of evidence. He was arrested on other occasions and was either released without charge or had his convictions quashed. On 14 August 1990 the Home Secretary decided to deport Mr Chahal because his continued presence in the UK was not conducive to the public good for reasons of national security and other reasons of a political nature, namely the international fight against terrorism. He was detained in custody for deportation purposes. Mr Chahal's claim for political asylum on 16 August 1990 was refused by the Home Secretary on 27 March 1991. Because of the national security elements of the case, there was no right of appeal against the deportation order. However, on 10 June 1991, the matter was considered by an advisory panel, chaired by a Court of Appeal judge and including a former president of the Immigration Appeal Tribunal. On 25 July 1991 the Home Secretary signed an order for Mr Chahal's deportation, which was served on 29 July. Following judicial review proceedings the asylum refusal was quashed, the application further considered and a fresh decision taken to refuse asylum. Further legal proceedings followed. The first applicant remained in custody and the deportation order remained in force.

Comm found unanimously V 3 and 8 if first applicant were deported, V 5(1), V 13, by majority (16–1) not necessary to examine 5(4).

Court found by majority (12–7) V 3 if first applicant deported, (13–6) NV 5(1), unanimously V 5(4), (17–2) not necessary to consider A 8, unanimously V 13+3.

A 3: Contracting States had the right to control the entry, residence and expulsion of aliens. However, expulsion by a Contracting State could give rise to an issue under A 3 where substantial grounds had been shown for believing that the person in question, if expelled, would face a real risk of being subjected to treatment contrary to A 3 in the receiving country. The Court was aware of the immense difficulties faced by States in modern times in protecting their communities from terrorist violence. However, even in those circumstances, the Convention prohibited in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, irrespective of the victim's conduct. The prohibition provided by A 3 against ill-treatment was equally absolute in expulsion cases. If there were substantial grounds for believing that an individual would face a real risk of being subjected to treatment contrary to A 3 if removed to another State, then however undesirable or dangerous his activities, they could not be a material consideration in the decision to deport. The protection afforded by A 3 was wider than that provided by Articles 32 and 33 of the 1951 UN Refugee Convention. The date to be taken by the Court for its assessment of the risk to Mr Chahal if expelled to India was the date of the Court's consideration of the case. Whilst the Commission was responsible for the establishment and verification of the facts the Court was not bound by the Commission's findings of fact and was free to make its own assessment. As the UK proposed to return Mr Chahal to the airport of his choice in India, it was necessary for the Court to evaluate the risk of his being ill-treated with reference to conditions throughout India rather than in Punjab alone. Against the background of the situation in India the Court was not persuaded that the good faith assurances of the Indian Government would provide Mr Chahal with an adequate guarantee of safety. In addition, the applicant's high profile would be more likely to increase the risk to him of harm than otherwise. Having considered all the evidence the Court found that there was a real risk of Mr Chahal being subjected to treatment contrary to A 3 if he was returned to India.

A 5: The period under consideration commenced on 16 August 1990 when Mr Chahal was first detained with a view to deportation and terminated on 3 March 1994 when the domestic proceedings came to an end with the refusal of the House of Lords to allow leave to appeal. Although he had remained in custody until the present day, the latter period had to be distinguished because during that time the Government had refrained from deporting him in compliance with the request made by the Commission under Rule 36. Considering the background of the case and bearing in mind what was at stake for the applicant and the interest that he had in his claims being thoroughly examined by the courts, none of the periods for the various decisions complained of could be regarded as excessive, taken either individually or in combination. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 5(1)(f). The applicant's detention was lawful under national law and was effected 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law'. In view of the exceptional circumstances of the case and the fact that the national authorities had acted with due diligence throughout the deportation proceedings against him and that there were sufficient guarantees against the arbitrary deprivation of his liberty, the advisory panel procedure providing an important safeguard against arbitrariness, the detention complied with the requirements of A 5(1)(f). There had been no violation of A 5(1).

A 5(4): Neither the proceedings for habeas corpus and for judicial review of the decision to detain Mr Chahal before the domestic courts, nor the advisory panel procedure, satisfied the requirements of A 5(4). That shortcoming was all the more significant given that Mr Chahal had been deprived of his liberty for a length of time which gave rise to serious concern. There had been a violation of A 5(4).

A 8: The Court had no reason to doubt that the respondent Government would comply with the present judgment (deportation would constitute violation of A 3), and therefore it was not necessary to decide the hypothetical question under A 8.

A. 13: Where questions of national security were in issue, an 'effective remedy' under A 13 meant a remedy that was as effective as could be, given the necessity of relying upon secret sources of information. Neither the advisory panel nor the courts could review the decision of the Home Secretary to deport Mr Chahal to India with reference solely to the question of risk. On the contrary, the courts' approach was one of satisfying themselves that the Home Secretary had balanced the risk to Mr Chahal against the danger to national security. It followed that those could not be considered effective remedies in respect of Mr Chahal's A 3 complaint for the purposes of A 13. Having regard to the extent of the deficiencies of both the judicial review proceedings and the advisory panel, the Court could not consider that the remedies taken together satisfied the requirements of A 13 in conjunction with A 3. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 13.

Judgment sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage, costs and expenses (GBP 45,000 less FF 21,141).

Chappell v United Kingdom (1990) 12 EHRR 1 89/5

[Application lodged 11.10.1982; Commission report 14.10.1987; Court Judgment 30.3.1989]

The applicant complained about the execution of an Anton Pillar order made against him by the High Court for breach of copyright. The order required him to permit the plaintiffs in the action to search his business premises, which were also his home, to remove specified films and documents. The Anton Pillar order was executed simultaneously with a police search warrant.

Comm found by a majority (6–5) NV 8.

Court held unanimously NV 8.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr AS Spielmann.

The parties had agreed that there had been an interference with the exercise of the applicant's right to respect for his private life and home, which had the legitimate aim of protecting the rights of others in that it defended the plaintiff's copyright against unauthorised infringement. An interference could not be regarded as in accordance with the law unless it had some basis in domestic law. There had been a sufficient legal basis for the interference, since 'law' under A 8(2) included unwritten or common law. The relevant domestic law was 'accessible' and sufficiently precise to satisfy the 'forseeability' criterion. The Anton Pillar order was granted without the defendant being notified or heard and it was essential therefore that the measure should be accompanied by adequate and effective safeguards against arbitrary interference and abuse. The grant of the order, as such, was undoubtedly necessary, having regard to the nature and scope of the applicant's business. Moreover, the order itself incorporated significant limitations on its scope; the plaintiffs had given a series of undertakings, and a series of remedies for improper exercise were available to the applicant. Although the implementation of the order was left to the plaintiff's solicitors they would be bound by undertakings and professional conduct. Certain aspects of the actual execution of the order were, however, open to criticism such as the manner of entry, the search by 16 or 17 people and simultaneous search by the police. These, however, were not so serious that the execution of the order could be regarded as disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued.

Chassagnou and Others v France (2000) 29 EHRR 615 99/18

[Applications lodged 20.4.1994, 29.4.1995, 30.6.1995; Commission reports 30.10.1997, 4.12.1997; Court Judgment 29.4.1999]

The applicants were farmers living in various departments in France where their landholdings were included in the hunting grounds of the municipal hunters' associations. Some of the applicants were members of the Anti-Hunting Movement and of the Association for the Protection of Wildlife and opposed to hunting on ethical grounds. They sought to have their land removed from the hunting grounds of the hunters' association. Their applications for judicial review of the decision of the prefects of their regions were refused. Further appeals to the Administrative Court, Court of Appeal, Conseil d'Etat and Court of Cassation were also dismissed. They complained that they had been obliged, notwithstanding their opposition to hunting on ethical grounds, to transfer hunting rights over their land to approved municipal hunters' associations, had been made automatic members of those associations and could not prevent hunting on their properties. They further alleged that they were the victims of discrimination based on property, in that only the owners of landholdings exceeding a certain minimum area could escape the compulsory transfer of hunting rights over their land to an approved municipal hunters' association, thus preventing hunting there and avoiding becoming members of such an association.

Although the applicants had not been deprived of their right to use their property, to lease it or to sell it, the compulsory transfer of the hunting rights over their land to the hunters' association prevented them from making use of the right as they saw fit. In the present case the applicants did not wish to hunt on their land and objected to others coming onto their land to do so. Although opposed to hunting on ethical grounds, they were obliged to tolerate the presence of armed men and gun dogs on their land each year. That restriction on the free exercise of the right of use constituted an interference with the their enjoyment of their rights as the owners of property. Accordingly, the second paragraph of P1A1 was applicable in the case. The relevant law, the Loi Verdeille, assigned aims to the hunters' associations which were in the general interest to avoid unregulated hunting and encourage the rational management of game stocks. Notwithstanding the legitimate aims of the Loi Verdeille when it was adopted, the Court considered that the result of the compulsory-transfer system which it laid down had been to place the applicants in a situation which upset the fair balance to be struck between protection of the right of property and the requirements of the general interest. Compelling small landowners to transfer hunting rights over their land so that others could make use of them in a way which was totally incompatible with their beliefs imposed a disproportionate burden which was not justified under the second paragraph of A 1 of Protocol No 1. There had therefore been a violation of that provision.

A 14 had no independent existence, but played an important role by complementing the other provisions of the Convention and the Protocols. A difference in treatment is discriminatory if it 'has no objective and reasonable justification', that is if it does not pursue a 'legitimate aim' or if there is not a 'reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised'. Moreover, the Contracting States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences between otherwise similar situations justify a different treatment. Since the result of the difference in treatment between large and small landowners was to give only the former the right to use their land in accordance with their conscience, it constituted discrimination on the ground of property under A 14. There had therefore been a violation of P1A1 taken in conjunction with A 14.

The term 'association' in A 11 possessed an autonomous meaning; the classification in national law had only relative value and constituted no more than a starting point. The hunting associations owed their existence to the will of parliament and were associations set up in accordance with law, they were composed of hunters or the owners of land or hunting rights, and therefore of private individuals, all of whom wished to pool their land for the purpose of hunting. Their supervision by the prefect was not sufficient to support the contention that they remained integrated within the structures of the State nor could it be maintained that under the Loi Verdeille hunting associations enjoyed prerogatives outside the orbit of the ordinary law, or that they employed processes of a public authority, like professional associations. The Court considered that hunting associations were 'associations' for the purposes of A 11. The obligation to join a hunting association imposed on the applicants was an interference with the 'negative' freedom of association. The interference was prescribed by law, by the Loi Verdeille of 1964, and the Countryside Code. While hunting was an ancient activity its main purpose in the present day was to provide pleasure and relaxation to those who took part in it while respecting its traditions. The organisation and regulation of that activity might be a matter for which the State bore responsibility, particularly as regards its duty to ensure, on behalf of the community, the safety of people and property. Accordingly the legislation in issue pursued a 'legitimate aim'. The Government had not established that it was necessary to compel the applicants to become members of the hunting associations in their municipalities despite their personal convictions. With respect to the need to protect the rights and freedoms of others to ensure democratic participation in hunting, an obligation to join a hunting association which was imposed on landowners in only one municipality in four in France could not be regarded as proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. In addition, only small properties were pooled while large estates, both public and private, were protected from democratic participation in hunting. To compel a person by law to join an association such that it was fundamentally contrary to his own convictions to be a member of it, and to oblige him, on account of his membership of that association, to transfer his rights over the land he owned so that the association in question could attain objectives of which he disapproved, went beyond what was necessary to ensure that a fair balance was struck between conflicting interests and could not be considered proportionate to the aim pursued. There had therefore been a violation of A 11.

There was no objective and reasonable justification for the difference in treatment obliging small landowners to become members of the hunting associations but enabling large landowners to evade compulsory membership. There had been a violation of A 11 taken in conjunction with A 14.

In the light of the conclusions reached with regard to P1A1 and A 11, taken both separately and in conjunction with A 14, it was not necessary to conduct a separate examination of the case from the standpoint of A 9.

[Application lodged 25.4.1984; Commission report 16.3.1989; Court Judgment 29.11.1989]

Mr Ferdinand Chichlian and Mrs Jeanne Ekindjian were charged under the Customs Code with 'infringement of the legislation and the regulations governing financial relations with foreign countries', consisting in 'failure to deposit ... foreign currency' with 'an approved intermediary'. The Toulouse tribunal de grande instance acquitted them and the public prosecutor appealed. On 6 January 1983 the Toulouse Court of Appeal found the applicants guilty and sentenced them to a suspended term of six months' imprisonment and a fine. In addition, it ordered the confiscation of the sum in question. Their appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed. They complained that they had had no knowledge of the grounds for the customs authorities' appeal until the hearing, that they had not been informed promptly of the nature and cause of the accusation against them before the Toulouse Court of Appeal and that they had not had adequate time and facilities for the preparation of their defence.

[Application lodged 14.7.1987; Commission report 21.5.1992; Court Judgment 25.8.1993]

Mr Otmar Chorherr and a friend distributed leaflets calling for a referendum on the purchase of fighter aircraft by the Austrian armed forces during a military ceremony on 26 October 1985 to mark the thirtieth anniversary of Austrian neutrality and the fortieth anniversary of the end of the Second World War. Following a commotion, the applicant and his friend were arrested at 11.15 am and taken to Central Vienna police station where administrative criminal proceedings were instituted against them. The applicant was placed in police custody and after questioning he was released at 2.40 pm. His appeal to the Constitutional Court against his arrest and the prohibition on distributing leaflets was dismissed.

The Court on reviewing its case-law and considering the facts of the present case concluded that the Austrian reservation in respect of A 5 complied with A 64(2) of the Convention. Accordingly there had been no violation of A 5.

Regarding A 10, the deprivation of liberty constituted an interference. In considering whether the interference was prescribed by law the Court noted that the level of precision required of the domestic legislation, which could not in any case provide for every eventuality, depended to a considerable degree on the content of the instrument considered, the field it was designed to cover and the number and status of those to whom it was addressed. The applicant was in a position to foresee to a reasonable extent the risks inherent in his conduct. The interference was prescribed by law. Having regard to all the circumstances surrounding the actions of the applicant and the police, the Court found that the arrest pursued at least one of the legitimate aims referred to in A 10(2), namely the prevention of disorder. Contracting States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent an interference was necessary, but that margin went hand in hand with European supervision. That margin of appreciation extended in particular to the choice of the means to be used by the authorities to ensure that lawful manifestations could take place peacefully. The Court noted the nature, importance and scale of the parade which could appear to the police to justify strengthening the forces deployed to ensure that it passed off peacefully. In addition, when he chose that event for his demonstration against the Austrian armed forces, the applicant must have realised that it might lead to a disturbance requiring measures of restraint, which in this instance, were not excessive. It could not be said that the authorities overstepped the margin of appreciation which they enjoyed in order to determine whether the measures in issue were necessary in a democratic society and in particular whether there was a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the legitimate aim pursued. There had therefore been no violation of A 10.

Cifola v Italy 92/30

[Application lodged 11.9.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mr Attilio Cifola was a builder. On 5 March 1984 he took proceedings before the Rome District Court against the group of co-owners of a building to determine his proprietary rights over a part of the building and his claim for damages. The investigation began at the hearing on 29 May 1984. By decision of 1 March 1988 the District Court confirmed the applicant's right of property over the disputed part of the building which it also found to be subject to a right of passage for the other co-owners. The text of the decision was lodged with the registry on 25 March 1988. He complained of the length of proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 5 March 1984 when the proceedings were instituted against the defendants in the Rome District Court. It ended, at the latest, on 25 March 1989, when the District Court's judgment became final, no appeal having been filed. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The investigation took a little more than twenty-five months, the trial hearing took place one year and seven months later, on 10 February 1988. The initial misunderstanding between the investigating judge and the applicant's lawyer on the question of the validity of the originating summons had taken nearly two years to resolve. In addition, there were ten months between the first hearing and the second. There was a second period of stagnation of nineteen months, between the end of the investigation and the trial hearing. However, the State could not be held responsible for the year which went by before the judgment, which was filed with the registry on 25 March 1988, became final. Taking the proceedings as a whole the Court did not regard as reasonable the lapse of time in the present case. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage alleged.

Ciliz v Netherlands 00/177

[Application lodged 6.11.1995; Commission report 20.5.1998; Court Judgment 11.7.2000]

Mr Mehmet Ciliz, a Turkish national, came to The Netherlands on 31 March 1988 and married a Turkish woman there on 29 December 1988. He was granted a residence permit which enabled him to live with his spouse and to work in The Netherlands. On 27 August 1990, a son, Kürsad, was born to the applicant and his wife. The applicant and his wife separated in November 1991 and divorce proceedings were initiated. As the applicant's right to reside in The Netherlands indefinitely had been dependent on his being married and cohabiting with his spouse, he lost this right ex jure from the moment of separation. On 24 January 1992, he obtained an independent residence permit in order to work in The Netherlands for one year. His request to extend his residence permit was rejected in February 1993 as he was in receipt of unemployment benefits. His appeal to the State Secretary for Justice was refused, as was his appeal to The Hague Regional Court in May 1995. In the meantime, the applicant requested the Utrecht Regional Court to establish an arrangement concerning parental access to his child. The Court found such arrangements inappropriate. During his appeal he was placed in detention pending his expulsion. The first trial meeting between the applicant and Kürsad, organised by the Child Care and Protection Board, took place on 3 November 1995 while the applicant was still in detention. Despite appeals, the applicant was expelled to Turkey on 8 November 1995. The appeal proceedings concerning the formal access arrangement before the Amsterdam Court of Appeal were continued in the absence of the applicant, who had not been granted an entry visa in order to attend either more trial meetings or the hearing before the Court of Appeal. On 7 May 1998 the Court of Appeal confirmed the decision of the Utrecht Regional Court not to lay down a formal access arrangement, taking into account the fact that Kürsad and his father had not seen each other since November 1995. The applicant's further appeal to the Supreme Court was rejected on 16 April 1999. Meanwhile, on 5 January 1999, the applicant re-entered The Netherlands with a visa valid for three months. He submitted a new application for a formal access arrangement to the Utrecht Regional Court which was rejected on 15 December 1999. His appeal against that decision was currently still pending. The applicant complained that the authorities' refusal to grant him continued residence and his subsequent expulsion had infringed A 8.

A bond amounting to family life existed between the parents and the child born from their marriage-based relationship and was not terminated by reason of the fact that the parents separated or divorced as a result of which the child ceased to live with one of its parents. In the present case it could not be said that the applicant demonstrated at all times to what extent he valued meetings with his son. During the period immediately following the separation, he made no attempt to see his son and when he did express a desire to meet with him, he failed to keep appointments with the relevant authorities. However, contact was re-established from February 1993 and there then followed a period during which meetings took place between the applicant and his son, if not on a regular basis, then at least with some frequency. The applicant also applied to the courts on a number of occasions in order to have the matter of access determined. The events subsequent to his separation from his wife did not constitute exceptional circumstances capable of breaking the ties of family life between the applicant and his son. The decision to refuse the applicant continued residence in The Netherlands had a basis in domestic law. The measure was aimed at the preservation of the economic well-being of the country and thus served a legitimate aim. By expelling the applicant when they did, the authorities not only prejudged the outcome of the proceedings relating to the question of access but, and more importantly, they denied the applicant all possibility of any meaningful further involvement in those proceedings for which his availability for trial meetings in particular was obviously of essential importance. Moreover, when the applicant eventually obtained a visa to return to The Netherlands for three months in 1999, the mere passage of time had resulted in a de facto determination of the proceedings for access which he then instituted. The authorities, through their failure to co-ordinate the various proceedings touching on the applicant's family rights, had not, therefore, acted in a manner which had enabled family ties to be developed. In sum, the decision-making process concerning both the question of the applicant's expulsion and the question of access did not afford the requisite protection of the applicant's interests as safeguarded by A 8. The interference with the applicant's right under this provision was, therefore, not necessary in a democratic society. Accordingly, there had been a breach of that provision.

Çiraklar v Turkey 98/94

[Application lodged 28.11.1991; Commission report 20.5.1997; Court Judgment 28.10.1998]

Mr Cengiz Çiraklar was a student at the University of the Aegean. On 16 March 1990 a group of students held an unauthorised demonstration in front of the buildings of the University to commemorate the deaths in 1978 of seven students from Istanbul University and the deaths of Kurds in the north of Iraq in 1988. The police intervened, dispersed the crowd and arrested the applicant together with other demonstrators and took them into police custody. On 20 March 1990 the applicant and his co-defendants appeared before the National Security Court charged with taking part in an unauthorised demonstration, offering violent resistance to the police and disseminating separatist propaganda. The National Security Court, composed of two civilian judges and a military judge with the rank of colonel, found the applicant guilty of having taken part in a demonstration on a public highway without permission and using violence against the police, and it sentenced him to two years and six months' imprisonment. Thirty of his co-defendants were convicted on the same counts. His appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed. He complained that his case had not been heard by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr MA Lopes Rocha (d), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr T Pantiru, Mr V Butkevych, Mr V Toumanov.

Regarding the scope of the case: the scope of the case before the Court was determined by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The Court could not therefore consider the applicant's other complaints.

Preliminary objection: the remedy of rectification of judgment suggested by the Government was not directly accessible to the applicant; parties could not themselves lodge such an application with the Court of Cassation; they had to submit an application for that purpose to Principal State Counsel at the Court of Cassation, who decided in his discretion whether or not to apply to the court. The objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies had therefore to be dismissed.

In order to establish whether a tribunal could be considered 'independent' for the purposes of A 6(1), regard had to be had, inter alia, to the manner of appointment of its members and their term of office, the existence of safeguards against outside pressures and the question whether it presented an appearance of independence. It was understandable that a civilian prosecuted in a National Security Court for offences regarded ipso facto as directed against Turkey's territorial or national integrity, the democratic order or national security should be apprehensive about being tried by a bench of three judges which included a regular army officer, who was a member of the Military Legal Service. Such mistrust was not sufficient for it to be held that there had been a violation of A 6(1). Regard had to be had to the safeguards afforded to the applicant by the status of the military judges who sat in National Security Courts. That status provided certain guarantees of independence and impartiality. For example, military judges underwent the same professional training as their civilian counterparts, enjoyed constitutional safeguards identical to those of civilian judges, with certain exceptions could not be removed from office or made to retire early without their consent, had to be independent and no public authority could give them instructions concerning their judicial activities or influence them in the performance of their duties. However, on the other hand the judges were servicemen who still belonged to the army, they remained subject to military discipline and assessment. Decisions relating to their appointment were to a great extent taken by the administrative authorities and the army and their term of office as National Security Court judges was only four years and could be renewed. The applicant could legitimately fear that because one of the judges of the National Security Court was a military judge, it might allow itself to be unduly influenced by considerations which had nothing to do with the nature of the case. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation were not able to dispel the applicant's fears. In short, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Having regard to its finding that the applicant's right to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal had been infringed, it was unnecessary to examine the complaint under A 6(3)(d) of refusal to hear a defence witness.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction as to alleged non-pecuniary damage.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 4 July 1980 when the action was brought in the Palmi magistrates' court. The summary proceedings ended on 5 March 1981, the proceedings on the merits were still pending, the next hearing having been fixed for 24 January 1996. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings must be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. The case was not complex. Only delays attributable to the State could justify a finding of failure to comply with the reasonable time requirement. In the instant case, the relevant court was responsible for a number of delays. The hearing of 3 February 1986 was postponed by the magistrate of his own motion; the hearing of 2 October 1991 did not take place because the magistrate had been transferred; then, from 8 June 1994 to 22 March 1995, the Palmi magistrates' court suspended all sittings for lack of registry staff. With the exception of the summary stage, the proceedings did not appear to have been conducted efficiently. However, the conduct of the relevant authorities was not in this case primarily responsible for the length of the proceedings. During the preparation of the case for trial on the merits, which was still pending, the applicants, either alone or in agreement with the defendant, requested at least seventeen adjournments and did not object to six adjournments requested by a witness. The applicants had never taken any steps to have their case dealt with more speedily. Even though a period of more than fifteen years for civil proceedings that were still pending may, on the face of it, appear unreasonable, the conduct of the applicants, led the Court to declare the applicants' complaint unfounded.

Mr Salvatore Ciulla was prosecuted in Italy in respect of drugs offences. He was also the subject of a compulsory residence order made as a preventive measure and was detained during the proceedings to consider that application. He complained of the deprivation of liberty.

Comm found by majority (10–2) V 5(1) and 5(5).

Court unanimously dismissed Government's objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, found by majority (15–2) V 5(1), (13–4) V 5(5).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (jpd), Mr F Gölcüklü (jpd), Mr F Matscher (d), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos (d), Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm.

The Government had not raised the objection of non-exhaustion in respect of some of the claims before the Commission and were therefore estopped from raising them before the Court. With regard to the final claim the objection was without foundation.

The detention ordered on 8 May 1984 by the Milan District Court was a deprivation of liberty, so that A 5 applied to the case. A 5(1)(c) permitted deprivation of liberty only in connection with criminal proceedings. The preventive procedure was designed for purposes different from those of criminal proceedings. The compulsory residence order, unlike a conviction and prison sentence, could be based on suspicion rather than proof, and the deprivation of liberty which sometimes preceded it could not therefore be equated with pre-trial detention as governed by A 5(1)(c). The arrest of the applicant was designed to obviate the risk that he might 'evade any preventive measure that might be taken'. The exhaustive list of permissible exceptions in A 5(1) had to be interpreted strictly. There had been a violation of A 5(1).

The effective enjoyment of the right to compensation guaranteed in A 5(5) was not, in the circumstances of the case, ensured with a sufficient degree of certainty.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for A 50.

Clerc v France 90/10

[Application lodged 28.8.1986; Commission report 12.7.1989; Court Judgment 26.4.1990]

The applicant was a manager of one of a number of civil engineering firms investigated on suspicion of taking anti-competitive concerted action in relation to a call for tenders. The administrative inquiry lasted from 28 June 1971 to November 1973, the judicial inquiry commenced on 4 April 1974. The applicant and other defendants were acquitted by the Criminal Court on 27 April 1987. The applicant complained about the length of the proceedings.

[Application lodged 12.2.1987; Commission report 10.7.1990; Court Judgment 12.12.1991 (merits), 5.3.1998 (A 50)]

On 13 September 1984 Mr Serge Clooth was remanded in custody on suspicion of murder and arson. He was released after three years, two months, four days, on 17 November 1987, with no case to answer. During that time investigations had been conducted, psychiatric reports obtained (which showed him to be in need of therapy, although none was provided) and the applicant had changed his version, so complicating the investigation. He complained about the length of detention on remand.

It was the duty of national judicial authorities to ensure that pre-trial detention did not exceed a reasonable time. A sine qua non for continued detention was the persistence of a reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence but after a certain time that was no longer sufficient and the Court had to establish whether the other grounds were relevant and sufficient and if the national courts had displayed special diligence. In this case the continued extension was based on fears the applicant would commit further offences, the needs of the inquiry, the risks of collusion and the fear that he would abscond. The danger of further offences had to be a plausible one and the measure appropriate in the light of the circumstances of the case, the past history and the personality of the person concerned. In the present case neither the charge nor the psychiatric report justified continued detention without accompanying therapeutic measure. This was a complicated case and the applicant had impeded and delayed the inquiries. In the long term, after initial inquiries, the continued detention could not be justified. In addition, the authorities had invoked the needs of the investigation in a general and abstract fashion which was not sufficient to justify continued detention. There were delays due to the change of investigating judge, obtaining a psychiatric report and identifying anonymous witnesses. No new evidence resulted in the applicant's release, suggesting that he could have been released earlier. No arguments were put forward to show the fear of absconding was well founded; the fear of absconding was first raised 31 months after the applicant's arrest. The length of detention on remand therefore exceeded a reasonable time.

Judgment of Brussels Court of Appeal sufficient reparation.

Clube de Futebol União de Coimbra v Portugal 98/62

[Application lodged 21.3.1995; Commission report 15.9.1997; Court Judgment 30.7.1998]

The applicant association had tendered unsuccessfully for the grant of a bingo hall concession. The association commenced proceedings on 13 October 1983 in the Supreme Administrative Court for an order quashing decisions of the Secretary of State for Tourism, following the recommendation of the Gaming Board which agreed to the provisional grant of the concession to operate a bingo hall to a sports association other than the applicant association and to a public company. Following legal proceedings, a new invitation to tender for the concession to operate the bingo hall was issued on 27 November 1994. On 1 October 1997 the applicant association brought an action in the Coimbra District Court seeking compensation for the losses it had sustained as a result of the refusal to grant it the concession. It complained about the length of proceedings before the Supreme Administrative Court.

On 1 September 1977 Mr Antonio Colacioppo, head of the National Pensions Institute, received judicial notice of the fact that he was under investigation for the offence of extortion. The period to be taken into consideration began on 1 September 1977, the date on which the applicant received a judicial notification. It ended, at the earliest, on 12 November 1987, with the pronouncement that there was no case to answer, and, at the latest, on 15 November 1987, when the time limit for an appeal on a point of law by the prosecuting authorities against that pronouncement expired. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. At times the proceedings did progress at a normal rate, in particular at the stage of the cassation proceedings, but a lapse of time of more than ten years and two months could not be regarded as reasonable where the case was not complex and the appellant's conduct did not give rise to any significant delays.

[Application lodged 7.6.1982; Commission report 6.10.1987; Court Judgment 6.12.1988]

Serif Colak, a Turkish national, lived and worked in the Federal Republic of Germany for a number of years. He was arrested on 27 April 1979 on grave suspicion of attempted murder following a fight in a Frankfurt restaurant in which he injured another Turk by a knife thrust to the abdomen. The detention order was on the basis of suspicion of attempted murder. The applicant was committed for trial. He claimed that his counsel had a conversation with the President of the Assize Court outside the courtroom in which the President gave assurances that a conviction for grievous bodily harm was possible. The applicant claimed he had based his defence on that assumption. The Government disputed that allegation of the conversation. At the hearing on 10 February 1981 the Assize Court, basing its decision principally on the victim's testimony, found the applicant guilty of attempted murder and sentenced him to five years' imprisonment. The applicant appealed to the Federal Court of Justice. A formal statement from the President of the Assize Court stated that he did not recall any details of conversations with defence counsel in the corridor. The Federal Court of Justice declared the appeal unfounded. An appeal to the Federal Constitutional Court was also rejected. He complained that he had not had a fair trial.

The Court noted that it was impossible to establish with certainty whether the conversation between the President of the Assize Court and the accused's lawyer had taken place. Even if such a conversation did take place, the Court would have no means of ascertaining exactly what was said. The President of the Assize Court could not in any event speak on behalf of his fellow judges. According to the documentation the applicant was accused of attempted murder. At the hearing on 16 January 1981, the court did not exclude the possibility of a conviction on this charge. It merely pointed out, as it was obliged to do by law in the circumstances of the case, that a conviction for causing grievous bodily harm was also a possibility. Neither at that point, nor at any other, did the Assize Court suggest that it was no longer intending to deal with the charge of attempted murder. The applicant's lawyer knew that the Assize Court would make its ruling after its deliberations, solely on the basis of the issues raised during the hearings. Accordingly, he should have satisfied himself that the President's alleged appraisal of the situation reflected the views of the court itself. It was open to him to seek formal confirmation of those views. There had not been a violation of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 11.5.1990; Commission report 19.10.1992; Court Judgment 28.6.1993]

Dr Richard Colman was a medical practitioner in private general practice. He established in York a practice named the 'Holistic Counselling and Education Centre'. He wrote to the General Medical Council (GMC) in March 1987 seeking its advice to advertise and requesting the GMC to review the existing rules on practice advertising and professional ethics. The GMC declined to review its recently amended guidance and warned that to advertise could lead to disciplinary action against the applicant. In August 1987 the applicant instituted legal proceedings seeking a declaration that the GMC's decision and policy on the dissemination of information by doctors were unlawful. He was unsuccessful before the High Court and the Court of Appeal and his petition to the House of Lords for leave to appeal was rejected in February 1990. Following a Government White Paper and a report by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, in May 1990 the GMC revised its advertising rules to allow, inter alia, the publication in the press of factual information about doctors' services.

Colozza v Italy (1985) 7 EHRR 516 85/1

[Application lodged 5.5.1980; Commission report 5.5.1983; Court Judgment 12.2.1985]

On 20 June 1972, the carabinieri reported Mr Giacinto Colozza, the applicant, to the Rome public prosecutor's office for various alleged offences, including fraud, committed before November 1971. They said that they had not questioned the suspect because they had failed to contact him at his last-known address. On 4 October 1973, the investigating judge issued a 'judicial notification' intended to inform the applicant of the opening of criminal proceedings against him. A bailiff attempted to serve it on the applicant at the address shown in the Registrar-General's records, but without success: he had moved – about ten years earlier according to the carabinieri and five years earlier according to the police – and had omitted to inform the City Hall of his change of residence as required by law. Meanwhile, when renewing his driving licence in September 1973, the applicant had given, as his current address, that shown in the Registrar-General's records. On 14 November 1973, after unsuccessful searches, the investigating judge declared the accused untraceable, appointed an official defence lawyer for him and continued the investigations. The applicant was committed for trial and sentenced to six years' imprisonment and a fine of ITL 600,000. An arrest warrant was issued and he was arrested at his home in Rome on 24 September 1977. His appeals to the Rome Regional Court, the Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation were unsuccessful. The applicant, who had been in custody since 23 September 1977 to serve his sentence, as well as other suspended sentences previously passed on him, died in prison on 2 December 1983.

Although not expressly mentioned in A 6(1), the object and purpose of the Article taken as a whole showed that a person 'charged with a criminal offence' was entitled to take part in the hearing. In addition A 6(3)(c), (d) and (e) gave guarantees which could not be exercised without the accused being present. Waiver of the exercise of a right guaranteed by the Convention must be established in an unequivocal manner. The material before the Court did not disclose that the applicant had waived exercise of his right to appear and to defend himself or that he was seeking to evade justice. When domestic law permitted a trial to be held notwithstanding the absence of a person 'charged with a criminal offence', that person should, once he became aware of the proceedings, be able to obtain, from a court which had heard him, a fresh determination of the merits of the charge. The Contracting States enjoyed a wide discretion as regards the choice of the means calculated to ensure that their legal systems were in compliance with the requirements of A 6(1). The Court's task was not to indicate those means to the States, but to determine whether the result called for by the Convention had been achieved. For that to be so, the resources available under domestic law had to be shown to be effective and a person 'charged with a criminal offence' who was in a situation like that of the applicant should not be left with the burden of proving that he was not seeking to evade justice or that his absence was due to force majeure. That remedy of lodging a late appeal did not satisfy the criteria mentioned above. Neither the Court of Appeal nor the Court of Cassation redressed the alleged violation. Thus the applicant's case was never heard, in his presence, by a 'tribunal' which was competent to determine all the aspects of the matter. Regarding the Government's claim that the applicant was to blame, the applicant could not have provided an address for service or of giving himself up as it was not established that he was aware of the proceedings instituted against him. The failure to inform the City Hall of his change of address was a regulatory offence. The consequences which the Italian judicial authorities attributed to it were manifestly disproportionate, having regard to the prominent place which the right to a fair trial held in a democratic society within the meaning of the Convention. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

Comingersoll SA v Portugal 00/122

[Application lodged 7.2.1997; Court Judgment 6.4.2000]

The applicant company issued enforcement proceedings against A Lda in the Lisbon Court of First Instance on 11 October 1982 to recover the outstanding amounts of bills of exchange that were not honoured. It complained of the length of proceedings, which were still pending.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr C Rozakis (c), Sir Nicolas Bratza (jc), Mr M Pellonpää, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr Gaukur Jörundsson, Mr G Ress, Mr L Caflisch (jc), Mr L Loucaides, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic (jc), Mrs W Thomassen, Mr K Traja, Mr A Kovler.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 11 October 1982, when the applicant company issued proceedings in the Lisbon Court of First Instance. Those proceedings were still pending. Consequently, the length of the proceedings to be considered was to date 17 years and approximately six months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be determined in the light of the circumstances of the case and with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities, and what was at stake for the applicant in the dispute. Some aspects of the case were complex and the conduct of the applicant company did not justify the length of the period under review. There were delays on the part of the judicial authorities which sufficed by themselves to justify the conclusion that the length of the proceedings was unreasonable. In the light of the circumstances of the case, which were to be assessed as a whole, the Court considered that a period of 17 years and five months for a final decision that had yet to be delivered in proceedings issued on the basis of an authority to execute, which by their very nature needed to be dealt with expeditiously, could not be said to have been reasonable. It was for the Contracting States to organise their judicial system in such a way that their courts were able to guarantee everyone the right to obtain a final decision on disputes concerning civil rights and obligations within a reasonable time. The reasonable-time requirement had not been complied with in the instant case and, consequently, that there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Condron v United Kingdom 00/143

[Application lodged 13.11.1996; Court Judgment 2.5.2000]

Mr William Condron and Mrs Karen Condron were heroin addicts. They were arrested on 28 April 1995 and charged with supplying heroin. A police doctor considered that although they showed signs of withdrawal symptoms, they were fit to be interviewed. Their lawyer took a different view. They were interviewed and cautioned that it might harm their defence if they did not mention when questioned something which they later relied on in court. They said that they understood the warning, but when asked to explain their actions regarding the alleged supply of drugs they simply responded 'no comment'. At trial, the police interviews were allowed in evidence. Both applicants gave evidence and said that the heroin found in the flat had been for their own personal use and had been purchased in bulk by the first applicant the evening before their arrest and that the packet they were seen handing to their neighbour had not been drugs. They said they had made no comment to police questions during interview on their solicitor's advice that they were not in a condition to do so, given their withdrawal from heroin. The judge directed the jury that it could draw inferences from the applicants' silence at interview. Both applicants were convicted and sentenced to four years' and three years' respectively. Their appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed on 17 October 1996. They complained that were denied a fair hearing on account of the fact that the trial judge left the jury with the option of drawing an adverse inference from their silence during police interview.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), no separate issue under 6(2), not necessary to examine 6(3)(b) and (c).

The right to silence was not an absolute right. Whether the drawing of adverse inferences from an accused's silence infringed A 6 was a matter to be determined in the light of all the circumstances of the case, having regard to the situations where inferences might be drawn, the weight attached to them by the national courts in their assessment of the evidence and the degree of compulsion inherent in the situation. Since the right to silence, like the privilege against self-incrimination, lay at the heart of the notion of a fair procedure under A 6, particular caution was required before a domestic court could invoke an accused's silence against him. It would be incompatible with the right to silence to base a conviction solely or mainly on the accused's silence or on a refusal to answer questions or to give evidence himself. Nevertheless, the right could not and should not prevent that the accused's silence, in situations which clearly called for an explanation from him, be taken into account in assessing the persuasiveness of the evidence adduced by the prosecution. In distinction to the John Murray case, the applicants gave evidence at their trial and their case was conducted before a jury which required direction by the trial judge on how to approach the issue of their silence during police interview. The applicants offered an explanation at their trial for their silence at the police station. The fact that the applicants' exercised their right to silence at the police station was relevant to the determination of the fairness issue. However, that fact did not of itself preclude the drawing of an adverse inference. Similarly, the fact that the issue of the applicants' silence was left to a jury could not of itself be considered incompatible with the requirements of a fair trial. It was, rather, another relevant consideration to be weighed in the balance when assessing whether or not it was fair to do so in the circumstances. The applicants were under no legal compulsion to co-operate with the police and could not be exposed to any penal sanction for their failure to do so. The police were required to administer a clear warning to the applicants about the possible implications of withholding information which they might later rely on at their trial and the presence of the applicants' solicitor throughout the whole of their interviews to advise them was an important safeguard for dispelling any compulsion to speak which may be inherent in the terms of the caution. The applicants stated that they held their silence on the strength of their solicitor's advice that they were unfit to answer questions. The issue of the applicants' lucidity at the time of interview and the question whether the trial judge gave sufficient weight to the applicants' reliance on legal advice to explain their silence at interview had to be examined from the standpoint of his directions on the matter. The formula employed by the trial judge could not be said to reflect the balance to be struck between the right to silence and the circumstances in which an adverse inference might be drawn from silence. Provided appropriate safeguards were in place, an accused's silence, in situations which clearly called for an explanation, could be taken into account in assessing the persuasiveness of the evidence adduced by the prosecution against him. In this case the applicants put forward an explanation for their silence during interview (their lawyer's advice), but the trial judge left the jury at liberty to draw an adverse inference notwithstanding that it may have been satisfied as to the plausibility of the explanation. As the responsibility for deciding whether or not to draw such an inference rested with the jury and it was impossible to ascertain what weight, if any, was given to the applicants' silence and the safeguards in the John Murray case (reasons given, an experienced judge and review by the appellate courts) were not present, it was even more compelling to ensure that the jury was properly advised on how to address the issue of the applicants' silence. The judge was under no obligation to leave the jury with the option of drawing an adverse inference from their silence and, left with that option, the jury had a discretion whether or not to do so. The burden of proof lay with the prosecution to prove the applicants' guilt beyond reasonable doubt and the jury was informed that the applicants' silence could not 'on its own prove guilt'. However, notwithstanding the presence of those safeguards, the trial judge's omission to restrict even further the jury's discretion had to be seen as incompatible with the exercise by the applicants of their right to silence at the police station. The defects could not be remedied on appeal as the Court of Appeal had no means of ascertaining whether or not the applicants' silence played a significant role in the jury's decision to convict. In addition, the Court of Appeal was concerned with the safety of the applicants' conviction, not whether they had in the circumstances received a fair trial. The question whether or not the rights of the defence guaranteed to an accused under A 6 were secured in any given case could not be assimilated to a finding that his conviction was safe in the absence of any inquiry into the issue of fairness. In the circumstances, the jury was not properly directed and the imperfection in the direction could not be remedied on appeal. Therefore, the applicants did not receive a fair hearing within the meaning of A 6(1).

The applicants' argument under A 6(2) amounted to a restatement of their case under A 6(1). Therefore, no separate issue arose under this head.

The guarantees in A 6(3) were specific aspects of the right to a fair hearing set out in para 1. Having regard to the finding on the applicants' complaint under A 6(1), the issues which they raised from the standpoint of A 6(3)(b) and (c) amounted in reality to a complaint that they did not receive a fair hearing. For that reason, it was unnecessary to examine them.

Constantinescu v Romania 00/168

[Application lodged 4.4.1995; Commission report 19.4.1999; Court Judgment 27.6.2000]

Mr Mihail Constantinescu was president of a teachers' union. He was prosecuted following the publication in the press of comments he made regarding an internal dispute in the union and the functioning of the judicial system. He referred to three teachers, members of the union who had refused to return money belonging to the union, as delapidatori, receivers of stolen goods. On 10 October 1994 he was convicted by the Bucharest District Court and ordered to pay damages. He complained of an infringement of his rights under A 10 and that he had not had a fair trial contrary to A 6(1).

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (21–7) NV 10.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection regarding victim, found by majority (5–2) that applicant could claim to be a victim of A 10, unanimously V6(1), (6–1) NV 10.

Judges: Mrs W Thomassen, President, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr Gaukur Jörundsson, Mr R Türmen, Mr J Casadevall (So), Mr B Zupancic.

On 4 February 2000 the Supreme Court had quashed the conviction and acquitted the applicant. However, that could not be considered as adequate reparation. The applicant had not been awarded any compensation for his conviction and the damages he paid had not been reimbursed. The applicant could claim to be a victim and the Government's preliminary objection that he could not claim to be a victim was dismissed.

The Bucharest District Court had ruled on the merits of the criminal accusation against the applicant and found him guilty of defamation without affording him an opportunity to give evidence and defend his case. The applicant should have been heard by the District Court as it was the first court to convict him in proceedings aimed at establishing whether he was guilty of a criminal offence. There had been a violation of A 6(1).

The applicant's conviction constituted an interference. It was prescribed by law and pursued a legitimate aim of the protection of the reputation or rights of others. The applicant's remarks had been made in the context of a debate on the independence of the trade unions and the functioning of the judicial system and were therefore in the public interest. However, the use of the word delapidatori to describe people guilty of the offence of receiving stolen goods was apt to offend the teachers, as they had not been convicted by a court. The applicant could have voiced his criticism and contributed to the public debate on trade union problems without using the word delapidation. The resulting interference was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The penalty imposed, a fine of 50,000 lei and 500,000 lei non-pecuniary damage to each teacher, was not disproportionate. The Bucharest court had not overstepped its margin of appreciation and there had been no violation of A 10.

Pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage (FF 15,000), costs and expenses (FF 20,000 less FF 10,806.00).

Contrada v Italy 98/64

[Application lodged 4.11.1994; Commission report 10.7.1997; Court Judgment 24.8.1998]

The applicant, a senior police officer, was at the time of his arrest Deputy Director of the Civil Secret Service for Sicily, in Palermo. He had previously been, inter alia, Head of the Criminal Investigation Police and Principal Private Secretary to the Anti-Mafia High Commission. He was detained on 24 December 1992 at Palermo Military Prison under a warrant issued the previous day by the investigating judge accused of involvement in a mafia-type organisation on the basis of statements of several pentiti (former members of the Mafia who had decided to co-operate with the authorities). All the pentiti had themselves been charged with or convicted of involvement in a mafia-type organisation and, in some cases, other offences, such as drug trafficking or murder. He made numerous requests for release. His release was finally ordered on 31 July 1995. Following conviction, in a judgment of 5 April 1996, which was filed with the court registry on 17 October 1996, the Palermo District Court sentenced the applicant to ten years' imprisonment for aiding and abetting from the outside a mafia-type organisation. The applicant's appeal before the Palermo Court of Appeal began on 11 June 1998 and following a hearing on 2 July the appeal was adjourned to 22 October 1998. He complained of the length of detention.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü. Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou (d), Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr T Pantiru.

Regarding the scope of the case, the Commission had declared the complaint under A 5(1)(c) inadmissible as it considered that the national authorities had a wide margin of appreciation in deciding what weight should be attached to the statements that had led to the applicant's arrest. Although the applicant complained from the outset that he had been detained for an unreasonable period the complaint under A 3 concerned the actual conditions of detention (solitary confinement in military prison), not its length. The Court had no jurisdiction to hear those complaints, as the first complaint was identical to the one declared inadmissible by the Commission and the second was a new complaint, unconnected to the complaint under A 5(3).

The period to be considered began on 24 December 1992, when the applicant was arrested, and ended on 31 July 1995, when his release was ordered by the Palermo District Court. It had therefore lasted for two years, seven months, seven days. The authorities considered on ten occasions whether the applicant should remain in detention. The reasons given by them for refusing to release him were that there was a risk that he would commit further offences or abscond and that evidence would be tampered with and witnesses suborned. The Code of Criminal Procedure created a presumption that there was a risk that a suspect would abscond, commit further offences or tamper with evidence in cases concerning serious offences such as those with which the applicant was charged. On all the evidence, although the risk of the applicant's absconding diminished during the course of the investigation, the dangers of his committing further offences, tampering with evidence or exerting pressure constituted in the instant case relevant and sufficient grounds for his being detained throughout the period. With regard to the conduct of the proceedings, the public prosecutor's office had to take a number of highly complex steps in the investigation, including checking the statements of the pentiti in minute detail, obtaining many items of evidence, hearing witnesses – in particular, police officers and judges engaged in the fight against the Mafia – and obtaining international judicial assistance. The trial court heard evidence from no less than 250 witnesses or people being tried for offences connected with those of which the applicant was accused. Seven pentiti were, for security reasons, questioned in the Rome and Padua prisons in which they were detained. Three confrontations were organised. Between 4 November and 29 December 1994 all thirteen hearings were devoted to hearing evidence from the applicant. The right of an accused in detention to have his case examined with particular expedition should not hinder the efforts of the courts to carry out their tasks with proper care. In the instant case, with the exception of the analysis of the data relating to the applicant's mobile telephones, which could and should have been carried out earlier, and the excessive workload referred to by the trial court on 31 March 1995, the Court saw no particular reason to criticise the relevant national authorities' conduct of the case, especially as, when the maximum periods of detention pending trial were extended, the trial court offered to increase the rate of the hearings, but the defence declined. In addition detailed inquiries were necessary in the particularly sensitive and complicated cases involving presumed members of the Mafia, or persons suspected of supporting that organisation from within State institutions. The authorities who dealt with the case could reasonably base the detention in issue on relevant and sufficient grounds and they had conducted the proceedings without delay. There had therefore been no violation of A 5(3).

Michael Edward Cooke v Austria 00/67

[Application lodged 12.8.1994; Commission report 20.5.1998; Court Judgment 8.2.2000]

Mr. Michael Edward Cooke was arrested on 10 March 1993 in Austria, on suspicion of having killed his friend Ms W, with whom he had gone to Austria on holiday. Following trial, he was convicted of murder on 18 November 1993 by a jury. He was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment. The applicant filed a plea of nullity with the Supreme Court, challenging the decisions of the lower court. He also appealed the severity of his sentence. On 26 January 1994, the Supreme Court issued a summons for the hearing on the plea of nullity and the appeals, indicating that, at the hearing on the plea of nullity, the applicant, being incarcerated, could only appear through his official defence counsel and that, at the hearing of the appeals, he would not be brought to court. On 17 February 1994 the Supreme Court held the hearing on the plea of nullity and the appeals in the absence of the applicant and rejected his pleas. He complained that he was not present at the hearing before the Supreme Court.

Comm found V 6(1) and 6(3)(c).

Court found unanimously not necessary to decide the Government's preliminary objections in respect of the applicant's complaint that he was not present at the hearing of his plea of nullity, dismissed the Government's preliminary objections in respect of the applicant's complaint that he was not present at the hearing of his appeal, found V 6(1)+6(3)(c), NV former 25(1) and 34.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs Hs Greve, Mr K Traja.

The parties' arguments were closely linked to the well-foundedness of the applicant's substantive complaint under A 6(1) and (3)(c) and therefore the plea of non-exhaustion was joined to the merits.

A person charged with a criminal offence should, as a general principle, based on the notion of a fair trial, be entitled to be present at the first-instance hearing. However, the personal attendance of the defendant did not necessarily take on the same significance for an appeal hearing. Regard had to be had in assessing this question to, inter alia, the special features of the proceedings involved and the manner in which the defence's interests were presented and protected before the appellate court, particularly in the light of the issues to be decided by it and their importance for the applicant. The hearing before the Supreme Court involved both a plea of nullity and appeals against sentence. In dealing with nullity proceedings, the Supreme Court was primarily concerned with questions of law that arose in regard to the conduct of the trial and other matters. The presence of the accused was not generally required. In the present case, the applicant's plea of nullity related to procedural and legal matters, he was represented by official defence counsel and general apprehensions were not sufficient to cast doubt on the effectiveness of his representation at the hearing. Accordingly, there were no special circumstances warranting his personal presence and his absence from the Supreme Court hearing was not in breach of A 6. In the appeals against sentence, the Supreme Court was called upon to examine whether the sentence of 20 years' imprisonment was to be reduced or to be increased to life imprisonment. The Supreme Court had regard to the applicant's personality and character, including his state of mind at the time of the offence, his motive and his dangerousness and aggressiveness in general. Taking into account the gravity of what was at stake for the applicant, the case could not be properly examined without gaining a personal impression of the applicant and it was therefore essential to the fairness of the proceedings that he be present at the hearing of the appeals and afforded the opportunity to participate, together with his defence counsel. Although his official defence counsel had not requested that the applicant be summoned to the hearing of the appeals, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and in particular the gravity of what was at stake for the applicant, the respondent State was under a positive duty to ensure the applicant's presence in order to enable him to defend himself in person as required by A 6(3)(c). There had not been a failure to exhaust domestic remedies in that regard. There was a breach of A 6(1) in conjunction with A 6(3)(c).

The Court had jurisdiction to examine the applicant's complaints which related to incidents which occurred partly before the Commission's decision on admissibility of 10 April 1997 and partly after the taking of that decision. In that respect the timing of an applicant's complaint under former A 25 (now A 34) did not give rise to any issue of admissibility under the Convention. Moreover, insofar as the applicant's allegations were based on facts which occurred prior to the Commission's admissibility decision, the applicant made a complaint under former A 25 in his observations of 10 July 1996. Thus, notwithstanding the fact that the Commission had not examined the issue, the Court had jurisdiction to do so. The Government's approach to the applicant's former defence counsel, who no longer represented the applicant in the proceedings before the Commission, might be undesirable, but could not be regarded as pressure on the applicant to withdraw or modify his complaint, or as a contact designed to dissuade or discourage the applicant from pursuing a Convention remedy. The applicant had not adduced any proof as regards the alleged overhearing of his telephone conversations, nor had he submitted any direct proof of the alleged opening of letters by the prison administration. There was nothing to show that the applicant was in any way frustrated in the exercise of his right of petition. The facts of the present case did not disclose that the applicant has been hindered in the effective exercise of his right of individual petition under former A 25 (now A 34).

Cooperativa Parco Cuma v Italy 92/34

[Application lodged 25.3.1986; Commission report 5.3.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

The applicant, a building association, served a summons on 3 November 1980 in the Naples District Court against the co-owners of the building for whose construction it had been responsible, claiming payment of sums which it was owed as part of the joint expenditure. The applicant association complained about the length of proceedings, the next hearing for which was scheduled for 25 March 1992.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 3 November 1980, when the proceedings were instituted against the defendants in the Naples District Court. It had not yet ended as that court still had to give judgment. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The investigation took more than eight years and three months during which the applicant association caused one adjournment. A further two years elapsed before the date fixed for the trial hearing, which was finally to be held on 25 March 1992, at the earliest. There were delays before the judge ordered certain witnesses to be called and delays before the witness was examined; one witness was never examined. The District Court waited until 8 July 1987 before finding that the summons of 3 November 1980 had not been served on certain defendants and it did not file its order until 25 September 1987. Although the Government pleaded the backlog of cases, A 6(1) imposed a duty on Contracting States to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. Taking the proceedings as a whole, the Court could not regard as 'reasonable' a lapse of time which already amounted to more than eleven years and was still pending at first instance.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage, costs and expenses (ITL 3,090,334).

Mr Clemente Corigliano, the applicant, was a lawyer. In March 1973, during demonstrations in Reggio, the police arrested Mr A in a shop belonging to the applicant and in the latter's presence. The applicant gave evidence at the trial of Mr A directly contradicting that of the police officers who had made the arrest. The Court upheld their version of the facts. On 2 April the applicant lodged a complaint with the Reggio public prosecutor's office against two judicial officers who accused them of various offences in respect of the trial of Mr A. The public prosecutor decided to commence proceedings against the applicant for aggravated slander. The applicant received judicial notification on 7 December 1973 that criminal proceedings had been brought against him. The applicant was convicted following trial and given a suspended sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment. Following the applicant's appeal, the Messina Court of Appeal acquitted the applicant at a hearing on 19 February 1980. The applicant complained, inter alia, about the length of proceedings.

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objections, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr D Evrigenis, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt.

The Government's preliminary objections under A 27(1)(b) (the applicant's third application was 'substantially the same' as the 2 previous applications, which had been declared inadmissible by the Commission) and A 26 (non-exhaustion of domestic remedies) had only been raised after the Commission's admissibility decision of 2 October 1979. The Government were estopped from relying on them. Regarding the objection that the applicant could not be regarded as a 'victim' within the meaning of A 25(1): the Court recalling its case-law noted that the word 'victim' in A 25 denoted the person directly affected by the act or omission in issue, the existence of a violation being conceivable even in the absence of prejudice; prejudice was relevant only in the context of A 50. It was undeniable that the duration of the proceedings in question directly affected the applicant, albeit doubtless not constituting one of his major sources of concern.

In criminal matters, in order to assess compliance with the reasonable time requirement in A 6(1) the moment of 'charge' had to be ascertained. Whilst 'charge', for the purposes of A 6(1), could in general be defined as 'the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he had committed a criminal offence', it could in some instances take the form of other measures which carried the implication of such an allegation and which substantially affected the situation of the suspect. In this case the judicial notification issued by the public prosecutor attached to the Messina Regional Court was served on the applicant on 7 December 1973. Judicial notification was intended to give the person affected official notice of the commencement of criminal proceedings against him and of his entitlement to appoint a defending lawyer within three days. The Court took that date as the date from which there was a 'charge' within the meaning of A 6(1). The period ended on 19 February 1980, the day the Messina Court of Appeal rendered the final judgment of acquittal. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in each instance according to the particular circumstances. The present case concerned proceedings that lasted more than six years. The legal issues involved were in themselves relatively simple. The applicant's behaviour did not appreciably contribute to prolonging the proceedings. The procedure at first instance lasted approximately seven months which did not appear unduly long, especially in view of the fact that it began to run during the legal vacation. Similarly the time taken regarding the proceedings before the Messina Court of Appeal did not appear unreasonable. However, the preliminary investigation phase of the proceedings beginning with the committal for trial had lasted four years, seven months. Without further explanation from the Government, the Court found that delay to be unjustified and incompatible with A 6(1).

Claim for monetary compensation for the alleged pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage rejected, travel and subsistence expenses in coming to Strasbourg (ITL 2,200,000) awarded.

[Application lodged 17.7.1987; Commission report 5.3.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mr Armando Cormio entered an agreement with Mr B and then emigrated to Australia, conferring a general power of attorney on his brother. On 6 January 1984 his brother commenced proceedings against Mr B, who had refused to conclude the agreement. The period to be taken into consideration began on 6 January 1984, when the proceedings against Mr B were instituted in the Rome District Court. It ended on 27 October 1989, when the District Court struck the case out of its list. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The investigation took almost three years and five months, after which approximately twenty-one months elapsed before the trial hearing. In respect of the first period the expert opinion had complicated the investigation. The investigating judge had displayed diligence in replacing the expert as soon as he had established that the expert had not submitted his report by the prescribed date. During the second period the parties failed to appear before the trial court, which accordingly struck the case out of the list and they concluded an out-of-court settlement which removed any dispute between them. In the light of all the circumstances of the case and in particular the fact that the dispute was settled out of court, the delays which occurred in the proceedings were not so substantial as to violate A 6(1).

[Application lodged 24.3.1984; Commission report 9.5.1989; Court Judgment 27.9.1990]

The applicant was born in 1954 and registered as a male, under the male Christian names of Barry Kenneth. By the age of 15 or 16, she understood that, although she had male external genitalia, she was psychologically of the female sex. She changed her name by deed poll to Caroline, a change which she confirmed by deed poll in March 1973. Since July 1972 she had been known under that name for all purposes, had dressed as a woman and had adopted a female role. In December 1974 she underwent gender reassignment surgery in a London hospital, to render the external anatomy nearer that of the female gender. In 1976 she was issued with a UK passport as a female. From about 1979 to 1986 she was a successful fashion model. In 1983 Miss Cossey and Mr L, an Italian national whom she had known for some fourteen months, wished to marry each other. By letter of 22 August 1983, the Registrar General informed the applicant that such a marriage would be void as a matter of English law, because it would classify her as male notwithstanding her anatomical and psychological status. Reply to a further enquiry by the applicant stated that she could not be granted a birth certificate showing her sex as female, since such a certificate records details as at the date of birth. The engagement was broken. A subsequent purported marriage to a Mr X at a ceremony conducted at a London synagogue was declared by the High Court in January 1990 to have been void. She complained that she could not claim full recognition of her changed status or enter a valid marriage with a man.

The Court recalled that it had been confronted with similar issues in the Rees case. The Court was not persuaded that the fact Miss Cossey had a male partner wishing to marry her and that Mr Rees had no such partner was a material difference in the case. Nor was it material that Miss Cossey was a male-to-female transsexual whereas Mr Rees a female-to-male transsexual. Therefore the present case was not materially distinguishable on its facts from the Rees case. Although the Court was not bound by its previous judgments, it usually followed and applied its own precedents, in the interests of legal certainty and the orderly development of the Convention case-law. Nevertheless, that would not prevent the Court from departing from an earlier decision if it was persuaded that there were cogent reasons for doing so. Such a departure might, for example, be warranted in order to ensure that the interpretation of the Convention reflected societal changes and remained in line with present-day conditions. The Court remained of the opinion, which it expressed in the Rees judgment, that the refusal to alter the register of births or to issue birth certificates whose contents and nature differed from those of the original entries could not be considered as an interference. In determining whether or not a positive obligation existed on the State, regard had to be had to the fair balance that had to be struck between the general interest of the community and the interests of the individual. The basis of the UK system for the registration of births was designed as a record of historical facts and the need to strike a fair balance could not justify an alteration of the system. An annotation to the birth register, recording the change of sexual identity, would establish only that he belonged thenceforth, not from birth, to the other sex. The annotation could not constitute an effective safeguard to ensuring the integrity of his private life as it would reveal the change in question. Those points made in Rees were equally cogent in the present case. In addition, the register could not be corrected to record a complete change of sex since that was not medically possible. There had been no violation of A 8. The Court was conscious of the seriousness of the problems facing transsexuals and the distress they suffered. Since the Convention always has to be interpreted and applied in the light of current circumstances, it was important that the need for appropriate legal measures in this area should be kept under review.

Regarding A 12, the Court noted its judgment in Rees. The right to marry guaranteed by A 12 referred to the traditional marriage between persons of opposite biological sex. Miss Cossey did not dispute that she had not acquired all the biological characteristics of a woman but challenged the exclusively biological criteria for determining a person's sex for the purposes of marriage and submitted that there was no good reason for not allowing her to marry a man. Her inability to marry a woman did not stem from any legal impediment and in that respect it could not be said that the right to marry had been impaired as a consequence of the provisions of domestic law. Regarding her inability to marry a man, the criteria adopted by English law were in this respect in conformity with the concept of marriage to which the right guaranteed by A 12 referred. Although some Contracting States would now regard as valid a marriage between a person in Miss Cossey's situation and a man, the developments which had occurred to date could not be said to evidence any general abandonment of the traditional concept of marriage. In these circumstances, the Court did not consider that it was open to it to take a new approach to the interpretation of A 12. There was no violation of A 12.

[Application lodged 17.1.1986; Commission report 8.10.1991; Court Judgment 25.2.1993]

The applicant, aged 7, was a boarding pupil at an independent preparatory school. The school operated a system whereby corporal punishment was administered after receiving five demerit marks. Three days after being told he would be punished for his fifth demerit, the applicant received from the headmaster three strikes on the bottom through his shorts with a rubber-soled gym shoe, with no other persons being present. The applicant submitted that this corporal punishment constituted a breach of A 3 and also violated his right to respect for his private and family life guaranteed by A 8. In addition he claimed that, contrary to A 13, he had no effective domestic remedies for these Convention complaints.

Comm found by a majority (9–4) V 8, (11–2) V 13, (9–4) NV 3.

Court held by a majority (5–4) NV 3, unanimously NV 8, NV 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President (jpd), Mr R Bernhardt, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (jpd), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (jpd), Mr R Macdonald, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland (c), Mr L Wildhaber (jpd).

In order for punishment to be 'degrading' and in breach of A 3, the humiliation or debasement involved had to attain a particular level of severity and had to be other than that usual element of humiliation inherent in any punishment. Assessment of this minimum level of severity depended on all the circumstances. Factors such as the nature and context of the punishment, the manner and method of its execution, its duration, its physical and mental effects and, in some instances, the sex, age and state of health of the victim had to all be taken into account. In this case the applicant was a young boy punished in accordance with the disciplinary rules in force within the school in which he was a boarder, and beyond the expected consequences of purely disciplinary measures, he had adduced no evidence of any severe or long-lasting effects as a result of the treatment complained of. A punishment which did not occasion such effects may fall within A 3, provided that in the particular circumstances of the case it may be said to have reached the minimum threshold of severity required. While the Court had misgivings about the automatic nature of the punishment and the three-day wait before its imposition, the minimum level of severity had not been attained.

Whilst there might be circumstances in which A 8 could be regarded as affording, in relation to disciplinary measures, a protection going beyond that given by A 3, having regard to the purpose and aim of the Convention taken as a whole, and bearing in mind that sending a child to school necessarily involved some degree of interference with his or her private life, the treatment complained of did not entail adverse effects for the applicant's physical or moral integrity sufficient to bring it within the scope of the prohibition contained in A 8.

Given that it would have been open to the applicant to institute civil proceedings for assault and that, if successful, the English courts would have been in a position to grant him appropriate relief in respect of the punishment which he had received, and that the effectiveness of a remedy for the purposes of A 13 did not depend on the certainty of a favourable outcome, there was no breach of A 13.

Couez v France 98/67

[Application lodged 8.7.1993; Commission report 21.5.1997; Court Judgment 24.8.1998]

Mr Guy Couez had a heart attack on 20 January 1989 during the annual cross-country race held by the company of mobile security police units to which he belonged. He took sick leave and asked that his heart attack and the subsequent periods of sick-leave should be recognised as work-related so that he would be covered by the rules applicable to police officers injured in the execution of their duty. On 20 January 1992 the applicant brought proceedings in the Amiens Administrative Court to challenge the decision of the medical board refusing to regard his sick-leave as having been due to a work-related accident. On 28 June 1996 the Administrative Court quashed the decisions. On 18 March 1992 Mr Couez had also brought proceedings in the Amiens Administrative Court to challenge the decision sending him on compulsory unpaid leave of absence. His appeal to the Nancy Administrative Court of Appeal in respect of those proceedings was still pending.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found by majority (7–2) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr F Gölcüklü, President (d), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (c), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr E Levits, Mr V Butkevych.

Disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). That provision was nevertheless applicable where the claim in issue related to a 'purely economic' right – such as payment of salary or pension – or an 'essentially economic' one. The outcome of the applicant's claims were bound to have a decisive effect on his economic rights, since if the Administrative Court had quashed the authorities' refusal to regard his sick-leave as having been due to a work-related accident, the rules on civil servants injured in the execution of their duty would have been applied to him and also he would not have been sent on compulsory unpaid leave of absence. The Court therefore found that the dispute between the applicant and the authorities did not put in issue the authorities' special rights; if he had succeeded in his claim, the State would have been obliged to apply those arrangements to him in accordance with the legislation in force. The Court consequently concludes that the applicant's claims were civil ones within the meaning of A 6(1).

The first set of proceedings, concerning the authorities' refusal to regard the applicant's sick-leave as having been due to a work-related accident, began on 20 January 1992 with the application to the Amiens Administrative Court and ended on 28 June 1996, when that court gave judgment. It therefore lasted four years, five months and eight days. The applicant's appeal against the interlocutory order of 31 May 1995 was still pending in the Nancy Administrative Court of Appeal. The second set of proceedings, relating to the unpaid leave of absence, began on 18 March 1992, the date of the application to the Amiens Administrative Court, and was still pending in the Nancy Administrative Court of Appeal. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. There was inactivity attributable to the judicial authorities in connection with the first set of proceedings. A reasonable time had been exceeded and there had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Covitti v Italy 91/65

[Application lodged 14.5.1987; Commission report 5.3.1991; Court Judgment 3.12.1991]

Mrs Bianca Maria Covitti took proceedings before the Rome Magistrates' court on 21 May 1982 against the 'Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale' in order to establish her disability pension right. The investigation opened at the hearing of 10 November 1982 followed by other hearings. On 15 October 1985 the magistrates' court dismissed the applicant's claim. The applicant's appeal was dismissed by the Rome District Court on 28 March 1991. The text of the judgment was filed with the registry on 13 April 1991. She complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck the case from the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens.

Despite several reminders the applicant had shown no interest in the proceedings before the Court. That was an implied withdrawal which constituted a 'fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter'. The Court discerned no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. It noted its case-law on the question of 'reasonableness' of the length of civil proceedings in various Contracting States, including Italy.

Coyne v United Kingdom 97/70

[Application lodged 23.11.1994; Commission report 25.6.1996; Court Judgment 24.9.1997]

Mr Paul Matthew Coyne, joined the Royal Air Force (RAF) in 1990. Following a police investigation into his financial activities in Germany, he was charged with various offences of forgery and deception pursuant to the Air Force Act 1955. He was tried by RAF court martial in Brüggen. The convening officer was the Air Officer Commanding No 2 Group, RAF, Rheindahlen and as such was the senior commander of all air force personnel serving in Germany. The convening officer convened a district court martial, appointing all three members of the court martial by name. The prosecuting officer was appointed by the convening officer from the Directorate of Legal Services and was also within the convening officer's chain of command. A judge advocate was appointed by the Judge Advocate General's Office. The applicant was found guilty and sentenced to nine months' detention, dismissal from the air force and reduction to the ranks. His petition to the confirming officer, appeal to the Defence Council and to the Courts Martial Appeal Court were rejected. He complained of the fairness of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber.

The Court recalled its judgment in Findlay where it found that a court martial convened pursuant to the Army Act 1955 did not meet the requirements of independence and impartiality set by A 6(1), in view in particular of the central part played in its organisation by the convening officer. There were no significant differences between the part played by the convening officer in the organisation of the applicant's court martial, under the Air Force Act 1955, and that of Mr Findlay, under the Army Act 1955. For the reasons expressed in the Findlay judgment, the court martial which dealt with the applicant's case was not independent and impartial within the meaning of A 6(1).

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the non-pecuniary damage, costs and expenses (GBP 6,000 less FF 10,566).

Crémieux v France (1993) 16 EHRR 357 93/4

[Application lodged 11.3.1985; Commission report 8.10.1991; Court Judgment 25.2.1993]

Mr Paul Crémieux, the applicant, was chairman and managing director of a wholesale wine firm. In October 1976 in the course of an investigation into the company, customs officers seized documents relating to business transactions. Between 27 January 1977 to 26 February 1980, the customs authorities under the Customs Code carried out eighty-three investigative operations in the form of interviews and of raids on the company head office, on the applicant's home and at other addresses of his and on the homes of other people, during which further items were seized. In November 1982 the applicant was charged with offences against the legislation and regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries. Following an agreement customs agreed to compound with those charged and the judge issued a discharge order on 16 June 1987. The applicant's subsequent appeal proceedings to have the reports and seizures declared null and void were dismissed.

Comm found by majority (11–7) NV 8, unanimously NV 6(3) or 10.

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (8–1) V 8, not necessary to consider 6(3), 10.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber.

Regarding the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion, the applicant had brought proceedings to have customs reports on the searches and seizures declared null and void and pursued them to a conclusion, without omitting to plead A 8. He could not be criticised for not having made use of a legal remedy, suggested by the Government, which would have been directed to essentially the same end, was hardly ever used and would in any case probably have failed. The objection was therefore dismissed.

The search and seizure interfered with the applicant's rights to respect for private life, home and correspondence. As the interferences were incompatible with A 8 in other respects the Court did not consider it necessary to determine the issue of whether they were in accordance with the law. The interferences had a legitimate aim in that they were in pursuit of 'the economic well-being of the country'. Contracting States had a certain margin of appreciation in assessing the need for an interference, but that went hand in hand with European supervision. The exceptions provided for in A 8(2) had to be interpreted narrowly and the need for them in a given case had to be convincingly established. States encountered serious difficulties in the prevention of capital outflows and tax evasion owing to the scale and complexity of banking systems and financial channels and to the immense scope for international investment. As a result it may be necessary for them to have recourse to measures such as house searches and seizures in order to obtain physical evidence of exchange-control offences and, where appropriate, to prosecute those responsible. Nevertheless, the relevant legislation and practice had to afford adequate and effective safeguards against abuse. The authorities had very wide powers; in particular, they had exclusive competence to assess the expediency, number, length and scale of inspections. In the absence of any requirement of a judicial warrant the restrictions and conditions provided for in law appeared too lax and full of loopholes for the interferences with the applicant's rights to have been strictly proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. There had therefore been a breach of A 8.

The alleged infringements of the rights of the defence (A 6(3)) and of freedom of expression (A 10) related to the same facts as those which the Court had held to have contravened A 8 and in the circumstances it was therefore unnecessary to consider them separately.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage, costs and expenses (FF 50,000).

Croissant v Germany (1993) 16 EHRR 135 92/60

[Application lodged 3.12.1987; Commission report 7.3.1991; Court Judgment 25.9.1992]

Mr Klaus Croissant, the applicant, was a lawyer facing criminal proceedings in the Stuttgart Regional Court in connection with his activities as the lawyer of various members of the 'Red Army Faction' (RAF). He was initially represented by two lawyers of his choice, Mr B and Mr K. They were subsequently designated, at his request, to represent him as court-appointed defence counsel. On an application by the prosecuting authority, the President of the Regional Court designated as third court-appointed defence counsel, Mr H, a lawyer practising in Stuttgart. The applicant objected to the appointment of a third defence counsel and to the choice of the person concerned (Mr H was a member of the Social Democratic Party which the applicant fundamentally opposed). Mr H for his part asked to be relieved of his duties in the case. Both applications were dismissed by the Regional Court on 1 March 1978. At the trial, which lasted seventy-three days, the applicant was represented by the three court-appointed defence counsel. He was convicted of supporting a criminal organisation and sentenced to two years and six months' imprisonment; he was also barred from practising his profession for a period of four years and ordered to pay the costs and expenses, including those which he had been compelled to incur himself. His appeals and requests to have the debts cancelled were rejected.

Comm found unanimously NV 6(1) regarding fees of Mr B and Mr K, by majority (7–4) NV 6(1) regarding fees of Mr H.

Court found unanimously NV 6(1)+6(3)(c) regarding obligation to pay the fees of the first two court-appointed lawyers, by majority (8–1) NV 6(1)+6(3)(c) regarding appointment of the third lawyer and the obligation to his fees.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr J De Meyer (so), Mr SK Martens, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The requirement that a defendant be assisted by counsel at all stages of the Regional Court's proceedings and to appoint more than one defence counsel was not incompatible with the Convention. However, before nominating more than one counsel a court should pay heed to the accused's views as to the number needed, especially where, as in Germany, he would in principle have to bear the consequent costs if he was convicted. An appointment that run counter to those wishes will be incompatible with the notion of fair trial under A 6(1) if, even taking into account a proper margin of appreciation, it lacked relevant and sufficient justification. Avoiding interruptions or adjournments corresponded to an interest of justice which was relevant in the present context and might justify an appointment against the accused's wishes. In addition the nomination of Mr H had the aim of ensuring that the applicant was adequately represented throughout his trial, having regard to its probable length and to the size and complexity of the case. Notwithstanding the importance of a relationship of confidence between lawyer and client, the right to be defended by counsel of his own choosing could not be considered to be absolute. It was necessarily subject to certain limitations where free legal aid was concerned and also where, as in the present case, it was for the courts to decide whether the interests of justice required that the accused be defended by counsel appointed by them. The national courts had to have regard to the defendant's wishes in appointing defence counsel. However, those wishes could be overridden when there were relevant and sufficient grounds for holding that that was necessary in the interests of justice. The appointment of the three lawyers could not be held to have been incompatible with the requirements of A 6(3)(c) and 6(1) taken together.

The right to free legal assistance under A 6(3)(c) was not absolute; such assistance was to be provided only if the accused had not sufficient means to pay. Under German law a convicted person was in principle always bound to pay the fees and disbursements of his court-appointed lawyers, that being held to be a normal consequence of the conviction. It was only in the enforcement procedure that followed the final judgment that the financial situation of the convicted person played a role; in that respect, it was immaterial whether he had sufficient means during the trial, only his situation after the conviction being relevant. That system had not adversely affected the fairness of the proceedings. The national courts were entitled to consider it necessary to appoint the three lawyers and the amounts claimed for them were not excessive. The reimbursement order was not incompatible with A 6(3)(c) and there had been no violation of A 6.

Cruz Varaz and Others v Sweden (1992) 14 EHRR 1 91/26

[Application lodged 5.10.1989; Commission report 7.6.1990; Court Judgment 20.3.1991]

The applicants, Mr Hector Cruz Varas, his wife Mrs Magaly Maritza Bustamento Lazo and their son Richard Cruz, Chilean citizens, applied for political asylum in Sweden. Their applications were refused and they appealed submitting additional evidence, including medical evidence and psychological reports of the third applicant, the son. The first applicant, the father, complained that if returned he would be tortured in Chile, he complained about the separation from his family as a result of the expulsion and of non-compliance with obligations under A25(1). The first applicant was deported on the same day the Commission gave the rule 36 decision (that is, indicating that it was desirable for Sweden not to deport the applicants until the Commission had examined the application.) The second and third applicants went into hiding.

Comm found by majority (8–5) NV 3, unanimously NV 8, by majority (12–1) failure to comply with 25(1) by not following the Commission's rule 36 request not to expel the first applicant.

Court found by majority (18–1) NV 3, unanimously NV 8, by majority (10–9) NV 25(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona (d), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (d), Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald (d), Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (d/so), Mr SK Martens (d), Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel (d), Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (d).

The Court recalled its Soering judgment where it had held that the decision by a Contracting State to extradite a fugitive might give rise to an issue under A 3 where substantial grounds had been shown for believing that the person concerned, if extradited, faced a real risk of being subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the requesting country. That principle also applied to expulsion decisions and to cases of actual expulsion. The Court took into account the medical evidence submitted by the applicants; however, doubt had been cast on the applicants' credibility. The Swedish authorities had particular knowledge and experience in evaluating claims of the present nature by virtue of the large number of Chilean asylum-seekers who had arrived in Sweden since 1973. The final decision to expel the applicant was taken after thorough examinations of his case by the National Immigration Board and by the Government. Substantial grounds had not been shown for believing that the first applicant's expulsion would expose him to a real risk of being subjected to inhuman or degrading treatment on his return to Chile in October 1989. Accordingly there had been no breach of A 3. Ill-treatment had to attain a minimum level of severity if it was to fall within the scope of A 3. The assessment of that minimum was relative; it depended on all the circumstances of the case, such as the nature and context of the treatment, the manner and method of its execution, its duration, its physical or mental effects and, in some instances, the sex, age and state of health of the victim. Although the first applicant was considered to be suffering from a post-traumatic stress disorder prior to his expulsion and his mental health appeared to deteriorate following his return to Chile, no substantial basis had been shown for his fears. Accordingly his expulsion did not exceed the threshold set by A 3.

A 8: Although the expulsion of all three applicants was ordered by the Swedish Government, the second and third applicants went into hiding. The evidence adduced did not show that there were obstacles to establishing family life in their home country. In those circumstances responsibility for the resulting separation of the family could not be imputed to Sweden. Accordingly there had been no 'lack of respect' for the applicants' family life in breach of A 8.

Rule 36 had the status of a rule of procedure, the Commission could not order interim measures; compliance with Rule 36 was based on good faith co-operation and no power to order interim measures could be derived from A 25.

Curley v United Kingdom 00/106

[Court Judgment 28.3.2000]

In 1979, Brian Curley, then aged 17, was convicted of murder and sentenced to be detained during Her Majesty's pleasure. The 'tariff' part of the applicant's sentence, attributable to deterrence and punishment, was set at 8 years, and expired in 1987. Following the expiry of his tariff, reviews were held by the Parole Board on a number of occasions. Following the fourth review in January 1991, the applicant absconded from prison. Following his recapture on 6 July 1993, the fifth review by the Parole Board, in August 1995, recommended that the applicant be given a provisional release date of 12 months hence. The Secretary of State did not accept the recommendation. The applicant's leave to apply for judicial review of the Secretary of State's decision was refused by a single judge of the High Court on 26 April 1996. On 12 August 1996, the applicant was notified that, pursuant to interim measures introduced by the Secretary of State on 23 July 1996, the applicant's case would be referred back to the Parole Board for review in the form of an oral hearing at which the applicant would be entitled to legal representation. That review took place on 7 February 1997 and, by letter dated 14 February 1997, the Parole Board recommended the applicant's release. The Home Secretary followed the recommendation and released the applicant on 7 May 1997. The applicant complained that he had no review of the lawfulness of his continued detention in compliance with A 5(4) or the possibility of obtaining compensation for a breach of that right as required by A 5(5).

Court found unanimously V 5(4), V 5(5), NV 3.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mr L Loucaides, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja.

Prisoners detained during Her Majesty's Pleasure were entitled, after the expiry of their 'tariff', to have the lawfulness of their continued detention reviewed by a court offering the necessary judicial guarantees; in particular, the power to order release and adversarial proceedings. The applicant's tariff expired in 1987. Before his eventual release in May 1997, the applicant did not receive a review by a body fulfilling this criterion as the Parole Board, even under the interim arrangements, did not have the power to order the applicant's release. In those circumstances, the applicant did not receive a review which was decided by a court or which was decided speedily. It was unnecessary to examine separately the claim that there was excessive delay in implementing the interim arrangements. There had therefore been a breach of A 5(4).

It was not contested by the Government that the violation could not give rise to an enforceable claim for compensation before the domestic courts. Therefore there had been a violation of A 5(5).

There was no indication that the lack of any review complying with A 5(4) was sufficiently severe in its effects to disclose treatment contrary to A 3. There was therefore no breach of that provision.

D v United Kingdom 97/24

[Application lodged 15.2.1996; Commission report 15.10.1996; Court Judgment 2.5.1997]

The applicant was born in St Kitts and had lived there most of his life. He arrived in the UK on 21 January 1993 in possession of cocaine with a street value of about GBP 120,000. He was arrested, charged, remanded in custody and subsequently prosecuted for being knowingly involved in the fraudulent evasion of the prohibition on the importation of controlled drugs of class A. He pleaded guilty on 19 April 1993 and was sentenced on 10 May 1993 to six years' imprisonment. In August 1994, while serving his prison sentence, the applicant was diagnosed as HIV positive and as suffering from AIDS. On 20 January 1996, immediately prior to his release on licence, on 24 January, the immigration authorities gave directions for his removal to St Kitts. The applicant applied to remain in the UK on compassionate grounds since his removal to St Kitts would entail the loss of the medical treatment which he was currently receiving, thereby shortening his life expectancy. The request was refused on 25 January 1996 by the Chief Immigration Officer. His application for leave to apply for judicial review was rejected and the Court of Appeal dismissed his appeal. The applicant complained that his proposed removal to St Kitts would be in violation of A 2, A 3 and A 8 and that he had been denied an effective remedy to challenge the removal order in breach of A 13.

Comm found by majority (11–7) V 3 if the applicant were to be removed to St Kitts, unanimously unnecessary to examine 2, no separate issue under 8, by majority (13–5) NV 13.

Court found unanimously V3 regarding implementation of the decision to remove applicant to St Kitts, necessary to examine 2, no separate issue under 8, NV 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr J Casadevall.

The Court recalled that Contracting States had the right to control the entry, residence and expulsion of aliens. It also noted the gravity of the offence committed by the applicant and was aware of the problems confronting Contracting States in their efforts to combat the harm caused to their societies through the supply of drugs from abroad. However, in exercising their right to expel such aliens Contracting States had to have regard to A 3 which enshrined one of the fundamental values of democratic societies. A 3 prohibited in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment and its guarantees applied irrespective of the reprehensible nature of the conduct of the person in question. The Court had sufficient flexibility to address the application of A 3 to other contexts than those in which the risk to the individual of being subjected to any of the proscribed forms of treatment emanated from intentionally inflicted acts of the public authorities in the receiving country or from those of non-State bodies in that country when the authorities there were unable to afford him appropriate protection. To limit the application of A3 in that manner would be to undermine the absolute character of its protection. In this case the source of the risk of proscribed treatment in the receiving country stemmed from factors which could not engage either directly or indirectly the responsibility of the public authorities of that country, or which, taken alone, did not in themselves infringe the standards of A 3. The applicant was in the advanced stages of a terminal and incurable illness. At the date of the hearing there had been a marked decline in his condition. The limited quality of life he now enjoyed resulted from the availability of sophisticated treatment and medication in the United Kingdom and the care and kindness administered by a charitable organisation. He had been counselled on how to approach death and had formed bonds with his carers. The abrupt withdrawal of those facilities would entail the most dramatic consequences for the applicant. His removal would hasten his death. There was a serious danger that the conditions of adversity which awaited him in St Kitts would further reduce his already limited life expectancy and subject him to acute mental and physical suffering. Any medical treatment which he might hope to receive there could not contend with the infections which he might possibly contract on account of his lack of shelter and of a proper diet as well as exposure to the health and sanitation problems which beset the population of St Kitts. There was no evidence that his cousin in St Kitts would be willing or in a position to attend to the needs of a terminally ill man. There was no evidence of any other form of moral or social support. Nor had it been shown whether he would be guaranteed a bed in either of the hospitals on the island which cared for AIDS patients. In view of those exceptional circumstances and bearing in mind the critical stage now reached in the applicant's fatal illness, the implementation of the decision to remove him to St Kitts would amount to inhuman treatment by the respondent State in violation of A 3. In addition the respondent State has assumed responsibility for treating the applicant's condition since August 1994. He had become reliant on the medical and palliative care which he was at present receiving and was no doubt psychologically prepared for death in an environment which was familiar and compassionate. Although it could not be said that the conditions in the receiving country were themselves a breach of the standards of A 3, his removal would expose him to a real risk of dying under most distressing circumstances and would thus amount to inhuman treatment. The Court emphasised that aliens who had served their prison sentences and were subject to expulsion could not in principle claim any entitlement to remain in the territory of a Contracting State in order to continue to benefit from medical, social or other forms of assistance provided by the expelling State during their stay in prison. However, in the very exceptional circumstances of this case and given the compelling humanitarian considerations at stake, it had to be concluded that the implementation of the decision to remove the applicant would be a violation of A 3.

A 2: the complaints raised by the applicant under A 2 could not be dissociated from the complaints under A 3 in respect of the consequences of the impugned decision for his life, health and welfare. Having regard to the finding that the removal of the applicant to St Kitts would give rise to a violation of A 3 it was not necessary to examine the complaint under A 2.

A 8: having regard to the finding under A 3, the complaints under A 8 did not raise any separate issue.

In previous cases the Court had considered judicial review proceedings to be an effective remedy in relation to the complaints raised under A 3 in the contexts of deportation and extradition. A court in the exercise of its powers of judicial review had power to quash a decision to expel or deport an individual to a country where it was established that there was a serious risk of inhuman or degrading treatment, on the ground that in all the circumstances of the case the decision was one that no reasonable Secretary of State could take. In addition, the Court of Appeal had the power to afford the applicant the relief he sought. The fact that it did not do so was not a material consideration since the effectiveness of a remedy for the purposes of A 13 did not depend on the certainty of a favourable outcome for an applicant. The applicant thus had available to him an effective remedy in relation to his complaints under A 2, 3 and 8. Accordingly there had been no breach of A 13.

Dal Sasso v Italy 91/68

[Application lodged 15.10.1987; Commission report 5.3.1991; Court Judgment 3.12.1991]

Mrs Ernestina Dal Sasso, who was unemployed, took proceedings against the Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale before the Rome magistrates' court on 8 March 1985 in order to establish her disability pension right. At a hearing on 27 May 1986 the magistrates' court dismissed the claim. The applicant's appeal to the Rome District Court was dismissed with the text of the judgment being lodged with the registry on 4 October 1990. The applicant complained about the length of the civil proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck the case from the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens.

Despite several reminders the applicant had shown no interest in the proceedings before the Court. There was no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. The Court noted its previous cases in which it had considered the question of the 'reasonableness' of the length of civil proceedings in various Contracting States, including Italy. Accordingly, the case should be struck out of the list.

Dalban v Romania 99/54

[Application lodged 20.4.1995; Commission report 22.1.1998; Court Judgment 28.9.1999]

Mr Ionel Dalban was a journalist who ran a local weekly magazine until his death on 13 March 1998. On 23 September 1992 an article by the applicant exposed a series of frauds allegedly committed by Mr GS, the chief executive of a State-owned agricultural company; the article also made mention of RT. GS and RT laid an information against the applicant under the Criminal Code on the basis that what he had written was defamatory. On 24 June 1994 the Court of First Instance convicted the applicant of criminal libel, giving him a suspended sentence of three months' imprisonment and ordering him to pay 300,000 lei (ROL) to RT and GS, who were claiming damages in the same proceedings. Further, the applicant was banned from practising his profession for an indefinite period. His appeal was dismissed by the County Court although the ban was set aside. The applicant continued to publish information concerning the fraud allegedly committed by GS, as did other newspapers. On 2 March 1999 the Supreme Court acquitted the applicant in respect of the conviction for libelling GS. In respect of the libel of RT, the court quashed the conviction and, while holding that the applicant had been rightly convicted, decided to discontinue the proceedings in view of his death.

Comm found unanimously V 10, by majority (31–1) not necessary to examine 6(1).

Court found unanimously widow and heir had standing for proceedings and that widow could claim to be a 'victim', V 10, not necessary to examine 6(1).

Judges: Mr Wildhaber, President, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr R Türmen, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mrs HS Greve, Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mr E Levits, Mrs S Botoucharova, Mrs Beoteliu, ad hoc judge.

The applicant having been convicted of libel, his widow had a legitimate interest in obtaining a ruling that her late husband's conviction constituted a breach of the right to freedom of expression, on which he had relied in the Commission proceedings. She had standing to continue the proceedings in the applicant's stead. Consequently, the Government's application for the case to be struck out was dismissed. The Supreme Court's quashing of the applicant's conviction did not provide adequate redress as required by the Court's case-law. The decision to discontinue the proceedings in relation to RT was due solely to the applicant's death. That did not constitute any acknowledgement, whether explicit or implicit, on the part of the national authorities that there had been a violation of A 10. The applicant's widow could claim to be a 'victim' for the purposes of A 34.

The applicant's conviction constituted interference by public authority with the applicant's right to freedom of expression, the interference had been prescribed by law and had pursued a legitimate aim, the protection of the reputation of others. Whether the interference was necessary in a democratic society depended on whether the interference complained of corresponded to a pressing social need, whether it was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued and whether the reasons given by the national authorities to justify it were relevant and sufficient. The articles in issue concerned a matter of public interest, namely the management of State assets and the manner in which politicians fulfilled their mandate. Although the press must not overstep certain bounds, in particular in respect of the reputation and rights of others and the need to prevent the disclosure of confidential information, its duty was nevertheless to impart information and ideas on all matters of public interest. Journalistic freedom also covered possible recourse to a degree of exaggeration, or even provocation. In cases such as the present one, the national margin of appreciation was circumscribed by the interest of democratic society in enabling the press to exercise its rightful role of 'public watchdog' in imparting information of serious public concern. It would be unacceptable for a journalist to be debarred from expressing critical value judgments unless he or she could prove their truth. In the instant case there was no proof that the description of events given in the articles was totally untrue and was designed to fuel a defamation campaign against GS and RT. In relation to the legitimate aim pursued, convicting the applicant of a criminal offence and sentencing him to imprisonment amounted to disproportionate interference with the exercise of his freedom of expression as a journalist. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 10.

Having regard to the conclusion reached in respect of the complaint under A 10, it was not necessary to examine the case under A 6(1).

Dalia v France 98/3

[Application lodged 3.11.1994; Commission report 24.10.1996; Court Judgment 19.2.1998]

Mrs Aïcha Dalia, an Algerian national, arrived in France when she was about 17 to join her parents and siblings. On 10 May 1985 the Nanterre tribunal de grande instance passed a sentence of twelve months' immediate imprisonment on Mrs Dalia for offences against the dangerous drugs legislation and ordered her deportation and permanent exclusion from French territory. She appealed to the Versailles Court of Appeal which reconsidered the case and passed the same sentence. In April 1986 she married a French national. Following a police summons, she was convicted on 29 July 1987, sentenced to three months' imprisonment and excluded from France for one year for having remained there in spite of the permanent exclusion order imposed by the Versailles Court. She left France on 14 August 1987 for Algeria. She returned to France on 15 July 1989. On 5 November 1989 a court granted the applicant and her husband a divorce. On 6 June 1990 she gave birth to a boy who had French nationality; she had parental responsibility for him. Her applications to have the permanent exclusion order lifted were rejected. She complained that returning her to Algeria would amount to treatment contrary to A 3 and that the court's refusal to lift the exclusion order infringed her right to respect for her private and family life as secured in A 8.

Comm found unanimously NV 3, by majority (21–9) NV 8.

Court by majority (7–2) dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found (6–3) NV 8, unanimously NV 3.

The only remedies which A 26 required to be exhausted were those that related to the breaches alleged and at the same time were available and sufficient. The existence of such remedies had to be sufficiently certain not only in theory but also in practice, failing which they would lack the requisite accessibility and effectiveness; it fell to the respondent State to establish that those various conditions are satisfied. The Government did not produce any evidence to support their argument concerning the sufficiency and effectiveness of the remedy. The appeal on points of law which the applicant could have lodged at the time against the judgment of 4 October 1994 did not meet the requirement of effectiveness. The preliminary objection was therefore dismissed.

The applicant had been living in France since the age of about 17, except for a period of twenty-three months. She gave birth in France to a child who, at birth, had French nationality and for whom she had parental responsibility. The Versailles Court of Appeal's refusal in 1994 of her application to lift the exclusion order made against her in 1985 amounted to an interference with her right to respect for her private and family life. The permanent exclusion order was in accordance with the law being based on the Public Health Code. The interference sought to achieve the aim of 'the prevention of disorder or crime'. It was for the Contracting States to maintain public order, in particular by exercising their right to control the entry and residence of aliens. To that end they had the power to deport aliens convicted of criminal offences. However, their decisions in that field had to be necessary in a democratic society, that is to say justified by a pressing social need and, in particular, proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The applicant's family ties were therefore essentially in France. However having lived in Algeria until about the age of 17 she had maintained certain family relations, spoke the local language and established social and school relationships. In those circumstances, her Algerian nationality was not merely a legal fact but reflected certain social and emotional links. Therefore the interference was not so drastic as that which might result from the expulsion of applicants who were born in the host country or first went there as young children. In support of her application to have the exclusion order lifted, the applicant had relied on the fact that she was the mother of a French child. That situation was created at a time when she was in France illegally and she could not have been unaware of the resulting insecurity, the fact of her motherhood could not therefore be decisive. The fact that she took part in dangerous drug trafficking weighed heavily in the balance. In the circumstances the refusal to lift the exclusion order could not be regarded as disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. There had therefore been no violation of A 8.

The facts of the case did not establish that enforcement of the exclusion order would cause the applicant suffering of such intensity as to constitute inhuman or degrading treatment within the meaning of A 3. There had been no violation of A 3.

Darby v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 774 90/23

[Application lodged 20.11.1984; Commission report 9.5.1989; Court Judgment 23.10.1990]

Dr Peter Darby, was a Finnish citizen of British origin, born in 1926, employed as a doctor by the Swedish State Railways in Gävle, Sweden. He rented a flat in the town, but spent the weekends with his family on the island of Lemland in the neutral and demilitarised Finnish archipelago of Åland at the southern end of the Gulf of Bothnia. Whilst he worked in Sweden his income was, in accordance with the convention between Sweden and Finland for the avoidance of double taxation, liable to Swedish tax with deductions for the cost of maintaining two homes as well as for travel expenses to and from Åland. On 1 January 1979 the law was amended, with the result that the deductions previously allowed were no longer permitted and he now had to pay the full municipal tax, including a special tax to the Lutheran Church of Sweden. He was informed by the tax authorities that he could not claim any reduction of the church tax unless he was formally registered as resident in Sweden. His appeal against the tax decision was dismissed by the Joint Municipal Tax Court. His appeals to the Administrative Court of Appeal and the Supreme Administrative Court were dismissed.

Comm found by majority (10–3) V 9, (9–4) V 14+9, (11–2) not necessary to examine 14+P1A1.

Court found unanimously V 14+P1A1, not necessary to examine 9 or 14+9.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel.

The duty to pay tax fell within P1A1, accordingly, A 14 was also applicable. A14 protected individuals placed in similar situations from discrimination in their enjoyment of their rights under the Convention and its Protocols. However, a difference in the treatment would only be discriminatory if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is if it did not pursue a 'legitimate aim' and if there was no 'reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised'. As regards his right to an exemption under the Dissenters Tax Act, the applicant was in a situation similar to that of other non-members of the Church who were formally registered as residents in Sweden. According to the Government Bill which gave raise to the Dissenters Tax Act, the reason why the right to exemption was reserved for persons formally registered as residents was that the case for reduction could not be argued with the same force in regard to persons who were not so registered as it could in regard to those who were, and that the procedure would be more complicated if the reduction was to apply to non-residents. The Government Bill did not mention the special situation which the amendments would create for non-residents under the Dissenters Tax Act. In fact the Government stated at the hearing before the Court that they did not argue that the distinction in treatment had a legitimate aim. In the circumstances the measure complained of could not be seen as having had any legitimate aim under the Convention and accordingly, there had been a violation of A 14 taken together with P1A1.

Having regard to the above conclusion it was not necessary to examine the applicant's complaint under A 9 or 14.

[Application lodged 2.12.1988; Commission report 13.5.1992; Court Judgment 26.10.1993]

Dr Royce Darnell, had been unemployed since the Trent Regional Health Authority terminated his employment as a consultant microbiologist and Director of the Public Health Laboratory in Derby. On 10 August 1984 he commenced proceedings in the Industrial Tribunal seeking reinstatement, re-engagement and damages for dismissal. In its reserved decision of 23 February 1990, the Tribunal held that the dismissal of the applicant was not unfair. The applicant's appeal to the Employment Appeal Tribunal was dismissed on 8 April 1993. The applicant complained about the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka.

The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. As the Government conceded that there had been a violation, it was not necessary to rule on the dispute as to the starting date of the period to be taken into consideration in the present case. Even if the Government's position were adopted that, at the earliest, it should start to run from 10 August 1984, the date of the initial application to the Industrial Tribunal, the lapse of time of nearly nine years until the Employment Appeal Tribunal gave its reserved judgment on 8 April 1993 could not be regarded as reasonable. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Daud v Portugal 98/22

[Application lodged 5.3.1993; Commission report 2.12.1996; Court Judgment 21.4.1998]

Mr Juan Carlos Daud, an Argentine citizen, was arrested at Lisbon Airport as he arrived from Rio de Janeiro, carrying a false passport and a suitcase containing 1.5 kg of cocaine. He was interviewed in the presence of an officially assigned lawyer and an interpreter. He was detained pending trial. He made unsuccessful applications in respect of the preliminary investigation stage of his trial. He was convicted and sentenced to nine years' imprisonment for drug trafficking and using a false passport and an order for costs made against him. On 4 August 1995 he died in Caxias prison hospital. In his application to the Commission he complained that he had not had a fair hearing, owing, in particular, to the inadequate legal assistance he had received, the shortcomings of his officially assigned lawyer, the refusal of his application for a judicial investigation and his application to bring evidence and the poor quality of the interpreting at the hearing.

Comm found by majority (26–3) V 6(3)(c)+6(1), (27–2) NV 6(3)(e)+6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(c), unnecessary to consider 6(1)+6(3)(e).

Judges: Mr F Gölcüklü, President, Mr C Russo, Mr I Foighel, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P Van Dijk.

The Court recalling its previous case-law noted that the Convention was designed to guarantee not rights that were theoretical or illusory but rights that were practical and effective, and assigning counsel did not in itself ensure the effectiveness of the assistance he might afford an accused. Nevertheless, a State could not be held responsible for every shortcoming on the part of a lawyer appointed for legal aid purposes. It followed from the independence of the legal profession from the State that the conduct of the defence was essentially a matter between the defendant and his counsel, whether counsel was appointed under a legal aid scheme or privately financed. The competent national authorities were required under A 6(3)(c) to intervene only if a failure by legal aid counsel to provide effective representation was manifest or sufficiently brought to their attention in some other way. In the present case the first officially assigned lawyer, before reporting sick, had not taken any steps as counsel for the applicant, who tried unsuccessfully to conduct his own defence. The second lawyer, whose appointment the applicant learned of only three days before the beginning of the trial at the Criminal Court, did not have the time she needed to study the file, visit her client in prison if necessary and prepare his defence. The time between notification of the replacement of the lawyer and the hearing was too short for a serious, complex case in which there had been no judicial investigation and which led to a heavy sentence. The Supreme Court did not remedy the situation, since in its judgment it declared the appeal inadmissible on account of an inadequate presentation of the grounds. Consequently the applicant did not have the benefit of a practical and effective defence as required by A 6(3)(c). The Court had to ascertain whether it was for the relevant authorities, while respecting the fundamental principle of the independence of the Bar, to act so as to ensure that the applicant received the effective benefit of his right, which they had acknowledged. In his letter of 15 December 1992, after more than eight months had elapsed, the applicant asked the court for an interview with his lawyer, who had still not contacted him. Because the letter was written in a foreign language, the judge disregarded the request. Yet the request should have alerted the relevant authorities to a manifest shortcoming on the part of the first officially assigned lawyer, especially as the latter had not taken any steps since being appointed in March 1992. The court should have inquired into the manner in which the lawyer was fulfilling his duty and possibly replaced him sooner, without waiting for him to state that he was unable to act for the applicant. Furthermore, after appointing a replacement, the Lisbon Criminal Court, which must have known that the applicant had not had any proper legal assistance until then, could have adjourned the trial on its own initiative. The fact that the second officially assigned lawyer did not make such an application was of no consequence. The circumstances of the case required that the court should not remain passive. Taken as a whole those considerations amounted to a failure to comply with the requirements of A 6(1) in conjunction 6(3)(c) from the stage of the preliminary inquiries until the beginning of the hearings before the Lisbon Criminal Court.

The applicant's complaint before the Commission of the poor quality of the interpreting during the proceedings had not been raised before the Court and accordingly it was not necessary to consider A 6(1) in conjunction 6(3)(e).

[Application lodged 1.9.1956; Commission report 28.4.1960; Court Judgment 27.3.1962]

Mr Raymond De Becker, a Belgian journalist, was convicted of collaborating with the German occupying forces between 1940 and 1943. The death penalty imposed on him in 1946 was commuted to life imprisonment and reduced to 17 years in 1950. The conviction involved forfeiture of certain civil and political rights (including, eg, the right to vote, practise as a barrister, teach, work on a newspaper or in broadcasting or run a business). He was released in 1951 on condition that he did not live in France or engage in politics.

[Application lodged 10.10.1980; Commission report 5.7.1983; Court Judgment 26.10.1984 (merits), 14.9.1987 (A 50)]

Mr Albert De Cubber was a sales manager. On 4 April 1977, he was arrested by the police at his home and taken to Oudenaarde, where he was questioned in connection with a car theft. Warrants of arrest for forgery and uttering forged documents were issued against the applicant; one of the warrants was issued by Mr Pilate, an investigating judge who was later one of the three judges presiding at the applicant's trial. On 29 June 1979 the applicant was acquitted on two counts and convicted on the remainder, note being taken of the fact that he was a recidivist. He was sentenced to imprisonment and fined. His appeal to the Court of Cassation was allowed in part, but dismissed on the question of the impartiality of the judge. He complained, inter alia, that the Oudenaarde criminal court had not constituted an impartial tribunal within the meaning of A 6(1) since one of the judges, Mr Pilate, had previously acted as investigating judge in the same case.

Impartiality could be tested in various ways: a distinction should be drawn between a subjective approach that was endeavouring to ascertain the personal conviction of a given judge in a given case, and an objective approach, that was determining whether he offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. The personal impartiality of a judge was to be presumed until there was proof to the contrary, and in the present case no such proof was to be found in the evidence adduced before the Court. Regarding the objective approach, appearances might be important. What was at stake was the confidence which the courts in a democratic society had to inspire in the public and, above all, as far as criminal proceedings were concerned, in the accused. An investigating judge had very wide-ranging powers. Under Belgian law the preparatory investigation, which was inquisitorial in nature, was secret and was not conducted in the presence of both parties. It was understandable that an accused might feel some unease should he see on the bench of the court called upon to determine the charge against him the judge who had ordered him to be placed in detention on remand and who had interrogated him on numerous occasions during the preparatory investigation, albeit with questions dictated by a concern to ascertain the truth. Through his investigation, the judge in question, unlike his colleagues, would already have acquired well before the hearing a particularly detailed knowledge of the files which he had assembled. Consequently, it was quite conceivable that he might, in the eyes of the accused, appear, first, to be in a position enabling him to play a crucial role in the trial court and, secondly, even to have a pre-formed opinion which was liable to weigh heavily in the balance at the moment of the decision. In addition, the criminal court might have to review the lawfulness of measures taken or ordered by the investigating judge. The accused might view with some alarm the prospect of the investigating judge being actively involved in this process of review. Therefore, the impartiality of the Oudenaarde court was capable of appearing to the applicant to be open to doubt. A restrictive interpretation of A 6(1) – notably in regard to observance of the fundamental principle of the impartiality of the courts – would not be consonant with the object and purpose of the provision, bearing in mind the prominent place which the right to a fair trial holds in a democratic society within the meaning of the Convention.

The Government argued that the proceedings before the Oudenaarde court fell outside the ambit of A 6(1). A 6(1) concerned primarily courts of first instance; it did not require the existence of courts of further instance. Its fundamental guarantees had also to be provided by any courts of appeal or courts of cassation which a Contracting State may have chosen to set up. However, even when that was the case, it did not follow that the lower courts did not have to provide the required guarantees. Such a result would be at variance with the intention underlying the creation of several levels of courts, namely to reinforce the protection afforded to litigants. The present case involved a criminal trial. The possibility existed that a higher or the highest court might, in some circumstances, make reparation for an initial violation of one of the Convention's provisions: that was precisely the reason for the existence of the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies, contained in A 26. The particular defect in question in the present case did not bear solely upon the conduct of the first-instance proceedings: its source being the composition of the Oudenaarde criminal court, the defect involved matters of internal organisation and the Court of Appeal did not cure that defect since it did not quash on that ground the judgment of 29 June 1979 in its entirety. Contracting States were under the obligation to organise their legal systems so as to ensure compliance with the requirements of A 6(1). The applicant was the victim of a breach of A 6(1).

De Geouffre de la Pradelle v France 92/79

[Application lodged 2.2.1987; Commission report 4.9.1991; Court Judgment 16.12.1992]

Mr Raymond de Geouffre de la Pradelle was a lawyer and landowner. On 3 April 1980 the Minister for the Environment and Quality of Life commenced proceedings to designate the land in the Montane valley as an area of outstanding beauty and of public interest. The applicant's land was affected and he was informed of that by letter on 12 May 1980. The applicant objected in a letter of 22 May 1980 to the Prefect of Corrèze. A public inquiry was opened. On 4 July 1983, following a favourable report by the National Places of Interest Commission, the Prime Minister, after consulting the Conseil d'Etat, issued a decree designating the Montane valley as an area of outstanding beauty. On 27 October 1983 the applicant applied to the Conseil d'Etat for judicial review of the decree. On 7 November 1986 the Conseil d'Etat dismissed the application as being out of time. The applicant complained of a breach of his right of access to a court in that the authorities had notified him of the designation decision only after the period within which any appeal had to be brought had expired.

Comm found by majority (7–5) V 6, unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

A 26 (non-exhaustion of remedies) had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism. The applicant had drawn the Conseil d'Etat's attention to arguments which amounted to complaining, in substance, of an infringement of the rights secured in A 6 and 13 and had thereby given the Conseil d'Etat an opportunity to prevent or remedy the alleged breaches, in accordance with the purpose of A 26. Accordingly the preliminary objection was dismissed.

The 'right to a court' enshrined in A 6 was not an absolute one. It could be subject to limitations, but those should not restrict or reduce the access left to the individual in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right was impaired. The law resulting from the legislation on the conservation of places of interest taken together with the case-law on the classification of administrative acts was extremely complex. The proceedings involving the applicant lasted over two and a half years (7 October 1980 to 4 July 1983). The applicant was entitled to expect a coherent system that would achieve a fair balance between the authorities' interests and his own; in particular, he should have had a clear, practical and effective opportunity to challenge an administrative act that was a direct interference with his right of property. Before the designation proceedings were commenced, the applicant had obtained the authorities' consent to a scheme for a miniature hydroelectric power station on his land. The Prefect had not notified him of the impugned decree until two months and one day later. Although the time allowed for appealing started to run from the moment of publication in the Official Gazette, this was an isolated judgment of which only a summary had appeared in another publication. In the circumstances, the system was therefore not sufficiently coherent and clear and the applicant did not have a practical, effective right of access to the Conseil d'Etat.

In view of the decision concerning A 6 not necessary to consider A 13, the requirements of which are less strict than those of A 6 and were in this instance absorbed by them.

De Haan v Netherlands 97/44

[Application lodged 5.8.1993; Commission report 15.5.1996; Court Judgment 26.8.1997]

Ms Klaziena Wilhelmina de Haan, worked at a dry cleaner's from 1987 and from 1989 developed physical complaints which caused her to take sick-leave. She received sick-pay for a period. After being informed by the Occupational Association for the Chemical Industry that her entitlement to sick-pay would be terminated she appealed to the Groningen Appeals Tribunal. The Tribunal followed the permanent medical expert procedure whereby the applicant was examined by a permanent medical expert attached to the Appeals Tribunal, a general practitioner. On 11 September 1990 the acting president of the Appeals Tribunal, Judge S, dismissed the appeal. The applicant filed an objection. Judge S was officiating at the appeal hearing and rejected the applicant's submission that he withdraw and further rejected the substantive appeal objection. The applicant's further appeal to the Central Appeals Tribunal on 6 September 1991 was subsequently rejected.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found by majority (6–3) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher (d), Mr J De Meyer (d), Mr I Foighel, Mr AN Loizou, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Van Dijk (d).

The Court noted that in the permanent medical expert procedure under the Appeals Act, the sole responsibility for taking the decision fell to the president of the Appeals Tribunal, even when he did no more than ratify the opinion of the permanent medical expert. The procedure was not comparable to criminal proceedings in absentia in which the accused was neither present nor represented. It involved a medical examination of the applicant who could make any comments to a medical expert and was thus actively involved in the establishment of the expert's opinion which was to be the basis of the acting president's decision. The applicant also had unlimited access to the Appeals Tribunal. In considering the impartiality of a tribunal regard had to be had to the personal conviction and behaviour of a particular judge and also to whether there were afforded sufficient guarantees to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. Regarding the subjective aspect, there was nothing in the case to indicate any prejudice or bias on the part of the Judge S. However, the judge presided over a tribunal, composed of a professional judge assisted by two lay judges, called upon to decide on an objection against a decision for which he himself was responsible. The applicant's fears were therefore objectively justified. However, there would be no violation of A 6(1) if the decision of the Appeals Tribunal were subject to subsequent control by a judicial body that had full jurisdiction and provided the guarantees of A 6. The Central Appeals Tribunal was not able to reassess the medical evidence and to decide the issue in dispute. However, the possibility existed that a higher or the highest tribunal might, in some circumstances, make reparation for an initial violation of one of the Convention's provisions. The Central Appeals Tribunal had the power to quash the decision appealed against on the ground that the composition of the Appeals Tribunal had not been such as to guarantee its impartiality and to refer the case back to the Appeals Tribunal for rehearing if necessary. However, it had declined to do so and, as a consequence, did not cure the failing in question. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage, costs and expenses (NLG 33,794.88 less FF 14,553).

De Haes and Gijsels v Belgium (1998) 25 EHRR 1 97/7

[Application lodged 12.3.1992; Commission report 29.11.1995; Court Judgment 4.2.1997]

Mr Leo De Haes and Mr Hugo Gijsels were editor and journalist respectively for the weekly magazine Humo. On 26 June, 17 July, 18 September and 6 and 27 November 1986 the applicants published five articles in which they criticised judges of the Antwerp Court of Appeal at length and in virulent terms for having, in a divorce suit, awarded custody of the children to the father, Mr X, a Belgian notary who had previously been accused of incest and of abusing the children although it had been found then that there was no case to answer. Mr X had instituted proceedings for criminal libel against the complaint but they had been acquitted. On 17 February 1987 three judges and an advocate-general of the Antwerp Court of Appeal, instituted proceedings against Mr De Haes and Mr Gijsels in the Brussels tribunal de première instance seeking compensation for the damage caused by the statements in the articles which were described as very defamatory. The court found against the applicants. They appealed to the Brussels Court of Appeal which affirmed the judgment. Their appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed on 13 September 1991.

Comm found by majority (6–3) V 10, unanimously V 6, NV 8.

Court found by majority (7–2) V 10, unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher (pd), Mr J De Meyer, Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla (pd), Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr U Lôhmus.

The judgment against the applicants amounted to an interference with their exercise of their freedom of expression, that interference had been prescribed by law and had pursued at least one of the legitimate aims in A 10(2), the protection of the reputation or rights of others, in this instance the rights of the judges and Advocate-General who brought proceedings. The Court repeated that the press played an essential role in a democratic society. Although it must not overstep certain bounds, in particular in respect of the reputation and rights of others, its duty was nevertheless to impart, in a manner consistent with its obligations and responsibilities, information and ideas on all matters of public interest, including those relating to the functioning of the judiciary. The courts, as the guarantors of justice, had to enjoy public confidence. Accordingly they had to be protected from destructive attacks that were unfounded, especially in view of the fact that judges were subject to a duty of discretion that precluded them from replying to criticism. It was primarily for the national authorities to determine the need for an interference with the exercise of freedom of expression. The articles contained detailed information based on thorough research. The applicants had not failed in their professional obligations by publishing what they had learned about the case. The press had to impart information and ideas of public interest. Not only did the press have the task of imparting such information and ideas: the public also had a right to receive them. Freedom of expression was applicable not only to 'information' or 'ideas' that were favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference but also to those that offended, shocked or disturbed the State or any section of the community. In addition, journalistic freedom also covered possible recourse to a degree of exaggeration, or even provocation. The accusations in question amounted to an opinion, whose truth, by definition, was not susceptible of proof. Although such an opinion might be excessive, in particular in the absence of any factual basis, it was not so in this instance. Although the applicants' comments were severely critical, they appeared proportionate to the reaction caused by the matters alleged in their articles. Regarding the journalists' polemical and even aggressive tone, which the Court did not approve, it had to be remembered that A 10 protected not only the substance of the ideas and information expressed but also the form in which they are conveyed. Having had regard to the seriousness of the circumstances of the case and of the issues at stake, the necessity of the interference with the exercise of the applicants' freedom of expression had not been shown, except as regards the allusion to the past history of the father of one of the judges in question. There had therefore been a breach of A 10.

The principle of equality of arms required that each party had to be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present his case under conditions that did not place him at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent. The outright rejection by the Brussels tribunal de première instance of the application to study the reports of the professors whose examinations had prompted the writing of the articles put the journalists at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis the plaintiffs. There was therefore a breach of the principle of equality of arms. That finding alone constituted a breach of A 6(1) and it was therefore unnecessary to examine the other complaints raised by the applicants under A 6(1).

Pecuniary damage (BEF 113,101), costs and expenses (BEF 851,697). JS for non-pecuniary damage.

De Jong, Baljet and van den Brink v Netherlands (1986) 8 EHRR 20 84/5

[Applications lodged 3.8.1979, 17.12.1980; Commission report 11.10.1982; Court Judgment 22.5.1984]

Mr Tjeerd de Jong and Mr Jan Herman Henricus Baljet were drafted as conscript soldiers in an infantry battalion of the Netherlands Armed Forces, which was designated to leave on a mission as part of the United Nations Peace Corps in the Lebanon. Fearing that they might be forced to use violence against other human beings, the applicants lodged applications with the Minister of Defence to be recognised as conscientious objectors and subsequently refused to obey orders to participate in a military exercise. They were placed under arrest by their commanding officer and accused of insubordination contrary to the Military Penal Code. They both appeared before the auditeur-militair and were referred for trial before the Military Court, and at the same time their release was ordered. The Minister of Defence granted them the status of conscientious objectors and they were discharged from military service. Their appeals and requests for compensation were rejected. Mr Gerrit van den Brink was forcibly drafted as a conscript soldier on his failure to register in due time. On arrival at a training centre, he refused to take receipt of and put on a military uniform. Being a 'total objector' he never submitted to any request to be granted the status of conscientious objector. He was placed under arrest by his commanding officer accused of the offence of insubordination contrary to the Military Penal Code. He appeared before the auditeur-militair and was referred for trial before the Military Court. It was decided that he should be kept in custody. The Military Court convicted him and sentenced him to 18 months' imprisonment. He appealed unsuccessfully to the Supreme Military Court. His appeal to the Supreme Court was dismissed.

Comm found unanimously NV 5(1), 5+14, by majority (13–1) V 5(3), (9–1 with four abstentions) V 5(4), not necessary to examine 13 or 18.

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objection, found NV 5(1), V 5(3), 5(4), NV 5+14, not necessary to examine 13 or 18.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr G Wiarda, Mr J Cremona, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcücklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh.

The Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies was rejected on grounds of estoppel as the remedies had not been raised at all or sufficiently clearly and precisely before the Commission or did not constitute available and sufficient remedies. 'Victim' in A 25 denoted the person directly affected by the act or omission in issue, the existence of a violation being conceivable even in the absence of detriment. Consequently, the relevant deduction from sentence did not in principle deprive the applicant of his status as an alleged 'victim', it was a matter to be taken into consideration solely for the purpose of assessing the extent of any prejudice he may have suffered.

A 5(1)(c) set out three alternative circumstances in which detention might be effected for the purpose of bringing a person before the competent legal authority, among which was included reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence. In making the need to maintain discipline amongst other servicemen an additional condition, the Military Code did not lay down a further instance to those listed in A 5(1) of the Convention where deprivation of liberty was permitted, but a further requirement to be satisfied under Netherlands law before a serviceman could be placed or kept in custody on suspicion of having committed an offence. There was no evidence in the cases that the deprivation of liberty of any of the applicants was 'unlawful' and so incompatible with A 5 in the sense of being arbitrary or not being in conformity with the purpose of the restrictions permitted by A 5(1)(c). Accordingly no breach of A 5(1) has been established in the case.

The Court recalled its previous case-law under A 5(3). The 'officer', who could be either a judge or an official in the public prosecutor's department had to offer guarantees befitting the 'judicial' power conferred on him by law. The 'officer' was not identical with the 'judge' but had to have some of the latter's attributes, that is to say he had to satisfy certain conditions each of which constituted a guarantee for the person arrested. The officer had to be independent of the executive and of the parties. There was a procedural requirement placing the 'officer' under the obligation of hearing the individual brought before him and a substantive requirement imposing on him the obligation of reviewing the circumstances militating for or against detention, of deciding, by reference to legal criteria, whether there were reasons to justify detention and of ordering release if there were no such reasons. In determining Convention rights consideration had to be given to looking beyond the appearances and the language used and concentrating on the realities of the situation. However, formal, visible requirements stated in the 'law' were especially important for the identification of the judicial authority empowered to decide on the liberty of the individual in view of the confidence which that authority had to inspire in the public in a democratic society. In this case there was no official directive or policy instruction to auditeurs-militair and referring officers regarding interpretation of the Military Code, only a purely internal practice of no binding force. That was not sufficient to constitute authority given by 'law' to exercise the requisite 'judicial power' contemplated by A 5(3). In addition, the auditeur-militair did not enjoy the kind of independence demanded by A 5(3). Although independent of the military authorities, the same auditeur-militair could be called upon to perform the function of prosecuting authority after referral of the case to the Military Court. He would thereby become a committed party to any criminal proceedings subsequently brought against the serviceman on whose detention he was advising prior to referral for trial. Consequently, the procedure followed in the applicants' cases before the auditeur-militair did not provide the guarantees required by A 5(3). Mr de Jong and Mr Baljet were released on the day they were referred for trial and were thus held in custody for 7 and 11 days respectively without being brought before a judge or judicial officer. The issue of promptness had to be assessed in each case according to its special features. In the particular circumstances, even taking due account of the exigencies of military life and military justice the intervals in question could not be regarded as consistent with the required 'promptness' under A 5(3). Mr van den Brink was referred for trial six days after his arrest, the limits under A 5(3) had therefore been exceeded. As that was decisive to establish non-compliance with A 5(3) it was unnecessary to examine the subsequent procedure followed in his case.

The guarantee assured by A 5(4) was of a different order from, and additional to, that provided by A 5(3). The Military Court could be regarded as a 'court' for the purposes of A 5(4) in the sense of enjoying the necessary independence and offering sufficient procedural safeguards appropriate to the category of deprivation of liberty being dealt with. The applicants had been in custody for 7, 11 and 6 days respectively before being referred for trial and hence without a remedy. Having regard to the exigencies of military life and military justice, the length of absence of access to a court was in each case such as to deprive the applicant of his entitlement to bring proceedings to obtain a 'speedy' review of the lawfulness of his detention. The first two applicants were released on being referred for trial, and the third applicant, although maintained in detention, did not take advantage of the possibility of seeking release under the Military Code following his referral for trial. However the breach of A 5(4) had already occurred before the applicant was in the position of having access to a remedy before the Military Court. There had therefore been a breach of A 5(4) in each case.

The applicants did not maintain the complaint under A 13 before the Court. In addition, in the light of its conclusions on A 5(4), it was not necessary to examine whether there had been a failure under the less strict requirements of A 13.

The applicants' complaint appeared to be directed more against the processing of their requests to be recognised as conscientious objectors than against their deprivation of liberty as such. However, even if a distinction was made between the applicants and other servicemen in an otherwise comparable position, the circumstances of that impending mission provided an objective and reasonable justification. There had accordingly been no breach of A 14 taken in conjunction with A 5.

The complaints under A 18 were not raised before the Court and it was not therefore necessary to examine them.

De Micheli v Italy 93/9

[Application lodged 27.2.1987; Commission report 13.1.1992; Court Judgment 26.2.1993]

Mrs Roberta De Micheli was served with an injunction granted to the company Z by the President of the Udine District Court on 29 July 1986 ordering her to pay the company the sum of ITL 700 million. The applicant appealed against the order and commenced proceedings against the company Z by a writ of summons served on 16 September 1986. Judgment dated 25 October 1990 was deposited with the registry on 17 December 1990 and the decision became final on 25 March 1991. She complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into account began on 16 September 1986, when the Z company was summonsed before the Udine District Court and ended on 25 March 1991 when the judgment of that court became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was not a complex one. There were two periods during which the proceedings stagnated, namely from 8 June 1987 to 21 November 1988 and from 11 December 1989 to 25 October 1990. During the first of the above-mentioned periods, the applicant unsuccessfully requested that the date of the hearing be brought forward. As regards the Government's argument based on the excessive workload of the competent court, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. Having regard to what was at stake in the dispute for the applicant and to the fact that the case was heard at only one level of jurisdiction, the Court could not consider reasonable the time which elapsed in the proceedings. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

De Moor v Belgium (1994) 18 EHRR 372 94/20

[Application lodged 26.6.1990; Commission report 8.1.1993; Court Judgment 23.6.1994]

Mr Jérôme De Moor, a member of the Belgian army, retired in 1981 with the rank of capitaine-commandant. On 7 July 1983 he gained a law degree. His application for enrolment on the list of pupil advocates was rejected by the Bar Council. The Chairman of the Bar Association informed Mr de Moor of the decision in a letter of 23 November 1983. He stated that it was consistent with the practice followed by Bar Councils according to which persons who had completed a full career outside the Bar were not admitted to the list of pupil advocates. His subsequent application to the Conseil d'Etat to have the decision set aside was unsuccessful. He complained that the Hasselt Bar Council had not been impartial. He further complained that the proceedings before the Bar Council had lacked fairness and had not been conducted in public and that the length of the proceedings in the Conseil d'Etat had been excessive.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr J De Meyer, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk.

Regarding the applicability of A 6(1), the case was similar to that of H v B; the question raised before the Hasselt Bar Council concerned the determination of a right.

The Government were estopped from relying on the objection of non-exhaustion not raised before the Commission. With regard to the other preliminary objections, the application to take the oath could not be regarded as a remedy; although Mr de Moor applied to the Commission without waiting for the judgment of the Conseil d'Etat, that did not mean that the Commission's decision on the admissibility of the application was premature or that any legitimate interest of the respondent State was harmed. The applicant instituted the proceedings before the Conseil d'Etat and pursued them to their conclusion. He could not be criticised for not having had recourse to legal remedies which would have been directed essentially to the same end and would in any case not have offered better chances of success. The preliminary objection was therefore unfounded.

The Bar Council under the Judicial Code enjoyed a very wide discretion in dealing with an application for enrolment on the list of pupil advocates. Nevertheless, a decision rejecting an application had to be based either on the failure to comply with the conditions laid down in the Judicial Code (nationality, diploma, the taking of the oath), or on the fact that the candidate fell within one of the categories of incompatibility or was unfit or incompetent to practise the profession of advocate. The refusal to enrol the applicant should have been founded on his unfitness or his professional incompetence. Although the auditeur, in his report, took the view that incapacity should be ascertained on the basis of the specific and concrete circumstances in which the previous activities of the person concerned were carried out, no mention was made of any such circumstances, and the contested decision had no legal justification. The Bar Council did not give the applicant's case a fair hearing inasmuch as the reason it gave for refusing to enrol him was not a legally valid one. At the material time no remedy was available to the applicant. No public hearing was held to examine Mr de Moor's application and the Bar Council's decision was not delivered in public. The applicant was entitled to public proceedings, as there was no reason justifying their being held in private. The proceedings did not satisfy the requirements of A 6(1). In the light of that finding it was not necessary for the Court to rule on the complaint based on the Bar Council's lack of impartiality.

Regarding the length of the proceedings in the Conseil d'Etat, the period to be taken into consideration began on 29 November 1983, when the application to have the Bar Council's decision set aside was filed; it ended on 31 October 1991 with the delivery of the Conseil d'Etat's judgment. It therefore lasted 7 years and 11 months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. There had been periods of delay and inactivity including a period of almost 5 years of total inactivity. The applicant's conduct was not open to criticism. The complexity of the case and the sensitive nature of the question put to the Conseil d'Etat did not explain the period of just over four years during which judgment was reserved. The intervention of the National Bar Association, one month before the first hearing on 12 October 1987, was not sufficient to justify the delay in the proceedings. Nor did the death of the judgerapporteur, the departure of another judge and the retirement of the President justify the above-mentioned lapse of time. Accordingly there had been a violation of A 6(1).

De Salvador Torres v Spain (1997) 23 EHRR 601 96/43

[Application lodged 11.1.1993; Commission report 21.2.1995; Court Judgment 24.10.1996]

Mr José Antonio de Salvador Torres, had been the head administrator of a public hospital in Barcelona. In 1983 criminal proceedings were brought against him. The Barcelona investigating judge found that the facts disclosed the offence of embezzlement of public funds carried out by a person entrusted with funds belonging to a public institution. The applicant was committed for trial in the Barcelona Audiencia Provincial. In a judgment of 12 September 1988, the Audiencia Provincial convicted the applicant of the offence of simple embezzlement and sentenced him to 18 months' imprisonment. The Audiencia Provincial did not find any aggravating circumstance of general application. The public prosecutor and the hospital appealed on points of law, the applicant did not appeal. The Supreme Court quashed the judgment being appealed and convicted the applicant of the offence of simple embezzlement with the aggravating circumstance that he had taken advantage of the public nature of his position in performing the duties entrusted to him. The Supreme Court sentenced the applicant to 5 years' imprisonment. The Constitutional Court declared the applicant's subsequent appeal inadmissible. The applicant complained that he had not been given a fair hearing as he was never formally charged with the aggravating circumstance found to be established in his final sentence.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1)+(3)(a).

Court found unanimously NV 6(3)(a).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris.

The public nature of the applicant's position was an intrinsic element of the original accusation of embezzlement of public funds and hence known to the applicant from the very outset of the proceedings. He had, accordingly, to be considered to have been aware of the possibility that the Audiencia Provincial and the Supreme Court would find that this underlying factual element could, in the less severe context of simple embezzlement, constitute an aggravating circumstance for the purpose of determining the sentence. There had therefore been no infringement of the applicant's right under A 6(3)(a) to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him.

De Santa v Italy 97/51

[Application lodged 24.5.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Maurizio de Santa, secretary of the municipal welfare agency, applied on 27 December 1977 to the Friuli-Venezia Giulia Regional Administrative Court for judicial review of a decision of his employer's board of governors, assigning to him a level of remuneration lower than that to which he considered himself to be entitled on the basis of the collective agreements on contracts of employment negotiated at national level by the unions concerned. In a judgment of 10 June 1994, the text of which was deposited with the registry on 29 November 1994, the Consiglio di Stato dismissed the applicant's appeal. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Commission found by majority (24–5) V 6.

Court by majority (7–2) found V 6(1).

Before the administrative courts the applicant asserted a purely economic right, namely the level of salary laid down in the collective agreements, which had, moreover, been applied to the other employees of the municipal welfare agency. The private-law features of the case predominated over the public-law features. Accordingly A 6(1) was applicable. The period to be taken into consideration began on 27 December 1977, the date of the application to the Administrative Court and ended on 29 November 1994, when the judgment of the Consiglio di Stato was deposited with the registry, that was nearly 17 years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. Two lengthy periods were attributable to the authorities. The first of these lasted more than four years, between the application to the Administrative Court and that court's order for certain documents to be filed. The second lasted over ten years and five months, between the applicant's appeal and the date on which the Consiglio di Stato's judgment was deposited with the registry. Accordingly, a 'reasonable time' was exceeded and there had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp v Belgium (1979-80) 1 EHRR 373 71/1

[Applications lodged 17.6.1966, 20.5.1966, 16.8.1966; Commission report 19.7.1969; Court Judgment 18.11.1970 (procedure), 18.6.1971 (merits), 10.3.1972 (A 50)]

Under Belgian law vagrants, persons with no fixed abode, no means of subsistence and no regular trade or profession, were brought before the police court and after a hearing could be placed at the disposal of the Government to be detained in a vagrancy centre, for not less than two and not more than seven years or, could be placed at the disposal of the Government to be detained in an assistance home for an indeterminate period which in no case could exceed a year.

Mr Jacques De Wilde, had been in the Foreign Legion, was in receipt of war disablement pension and a military retirement pension and worked from time to time as an agricultural labourer. On 18th April 1966 he reported to the Charleroi police station and declared that he had unsuccessfully looked for work and that he had neither a roof over his head nor money. On 19 April, at about 10 am, the police court at Charleroi, placed the applicant at the disposal of the Government to be detained in a vagrancy centre for two years. He regained his freedom on 16 November 1966. His detention had lasted a little less than seven months, of which three months were spent serving a prison sentence in respect of a criminal offence.

On 21 December 1965, Franz Ooms, reported to the police at Namur, in order to be treated as a vagrant unless one of the social services could find him employment where he could be provided with board and lodging while waiting for regular work. On the same day the police court at Namur, placed him at the disposal of the Government to be detained in an assistance home. He was released ex officio on 21 December 1966.

Mr Edgard Versyp, was a draughtsman. On 3 November 1965 he appeared before the police at Brussels asking to be sent to a welfare settlement. The police court in Brussels placed him at the disposal of the Government to be detained in a vagrancy centre for two years. He was released on 10th August 1967 after one year, nine months and six days of detention.

The jurisdiction of the Court extended to all cases concerning the interpretation and application of the Convention referred to it by the parties. It was therefore impossible to see how questions concerning the interpretation and application of A 26 raised before the Court during the hearing of a case should fall outside its jurisdiction. The rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies, which dispensed States from answering before an international body for their acts before they had had an opportunity to put matters right through their own legal system, was one of the generally recognised principles of international law to which A 26 made specific reference. The Commission decision to accept an application was not binding on the Court. The Court had jurisdiction to examine the questions of non-exhaustion and of delay raised in the present cases. Contracting States could waive the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies, the essential aim of which was to protect their national legal order, but not after the case had been referred to the Court. In the present case the Government was not precluded from raising before it the Court the objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies as regards the orders of the magistrates at Charleroi, Namur and Brussels. However, the submission that the applicant Versyp was out of time, was never made before the Commission nor even before the Court during the written procedure and they were therefore precluded from submitting that Versyp's application was out of time. The rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies demanded the use only of such remedies as were available to the persons concerned and were sufficient. It was for the Government to indicate the remedies which, in its view, were available to the persons concerned and which ought to have been used by them until they had been exhausted. According to the settled legal opinion which existed in Belgium up to 7 June 1967 recourse to the Conseil d'Etat against the orders of a magistrate was thought to be inadmissible. The applicants could not be reproached for conduct in 1965 and 1966 which conformed with that view. Once the case-law was reversed the applicants were not in a position to benefit from the possible remedy it seemed to open up because, the time-limit on the procedure before the administrative division of the Conseil d'Etat had expired. Therefore the preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies was not well-founded and was dismissed.

The fact that a person may have been driven to give himself up to the police to be detained did not necessarily mean that the person so asking was in a state of vagrancy or was a professional beggar or that his state of vagrancy resulted from idleness, drunkenness or immorality. Insofar as the wishes of the applicants were taken into account, they could not remove or disguise the mandatory, as opposed to contractual, character of the decisions complained of. The right to liberty was too important in a democratic society within the meaning of the Convention for a person to lose the benefit of the protection of the Convention for the single reason that he gave himself up to be taken into detention. Detention might violate A 5 even although the person concerned might have agreed to it. When the matter was one which concerned public order within the Council of Europe, a scrupulous supervision by the organs of the Convention of all measures capable of violating the rights and freedoms which it guaranteed was necessary in every case. Nor did the fact that the applicants reported voluntarily in any way relieve the Court of its duty to see whether there had been a violation of the Convention.

The Convention did not contain a definition of the term 'vagrant'. The definition in the Belgian Criminal Code of vagrants as persons with no fixed abode, no means of subsistence and no regular trade or profession fell within the exception provided for in A 5(1)(e). The applicants had the character of a 'vagrant' and could, under A 5(1)(e), be made the subject of a detention provided that it was ordered by the competent authorities and in accordance with the procedure prescribed by Belgian law. The Court did not find either irregularity or arbitrariness in the placing of the three applicants at the disposal of the Government and it had no reason to find the resulting detention incompatible with A 5(1)(e).

The applicants were arrested and detained not under sub-para (c) of the first paragraph of A 5 but under sub-para (e) and therefore para (3) was not applicable to them.

Where the decision depriving a person of his liberty was one taken by an administrative body, there was no doubt that A 5(4) obliged the Contracting States to make available to the person detained a right of recourse to a court; but there was nothing to indicate that the same applied when the decision was made by a court at the close of judicial proceedings. From an organisational point of view the magistrate was a 'court'. The magistrate was independent both of the executive and of the parties to the case. The use of the word 'court' in the Convention denoted bodies which exhibited not only common fundamental features, of which the most important was independence of the executive and of the parties to the case, but also the guarantees of judicial procedure. The deprivation of liberty complained of by the applicants resembled that imposed by a criminal court. Therefore, the procedure applicable should not have provided guarantees markedly inferior to those existing in criminal matters. The procedure in question was affected by the administrative nature of the decision to be given. The procedure undoubtedly presented certain judicial features, such as the hearing taking place and the decision being given in public, but they were not sufficient to give the magistrate the character of a 'court' within the meaning of A 5(4) when due account was taken of the seriousness of what was at stake, namely a long deprivation of liberty attended by various shameful consequences. Therefore it did not by itself satisfy the requirements of A 5(4) and a remedy should have been open to them. The applicants had no access either to a superior court or to the Conseil d'Etat. There was therefore a violation of A 5(4) in that the three applicants did not enjoy the guarantees contained in that paragraph. Regarding the rejection of the requests for release addressed by the applicants to the administrative authorities, the applicants could have appealed to the Conseil d'Etat. The requests looked to the Minister of Justice to use his discretionary power. Whatever action was taken thereafter fell completely outside the application of the provision of A 5(4). There had not therefore been any violation of A 5(4) on that point at issue.

During the hearing before the magistrates, the applicants were not dealt with in accordance with the requirements of A 5(4) and that conclusion made it superfluous to examine whether A 6 was applicable.

A 7 was not relevant. Simple vagrancy was not an 'offence' under Belgian law and the magistrate did not find the applicants 'guilty' nor impose a 'penalty' on them.

Despite finding a violation of A 5(4) the Court did not consider that it had to deduce therefrom a violation of A 4. A 4(3)(a) authorised work ordinarily required of individuals deprived of their liberty under A 5(1)(e). No violation had been found of A 5(1)(e). The duty to work imposed on the three applicants had not exceeded the ordinary limits, within the meaning of A 4(3)(a), because it aimed at their rehabilitation and was based on a general standard which found its equivalent in several member States of the Council of Europe. The Belgian authorities did not therefore fail to comply with the requirements of A 4.

The supervision of the applicants' correspondence constituted an interference under A 8, was in accordance with the law. In the light of the information given to it, the Court found that the competent Belgian authorities did not transgress in the present cases the limits of the power of appreciation which A 8(2) left to the Contracting States: even in cases of persons detained for vagrancy, those authorities had sufficient reason to believe that it was necessary to impose restrictions for the purpose of the prevention of disorder or crime, the protection of health or morals, and the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. There was nothing to indicate that there was any discrimination or abuse of power to the prejudice of the applicants.

Having regard to the facts before it, there was no suggestion of a violation of A 3.

In the light of the ruling that the applicants were not dealt with in a manner compatible with the requirements of A 5(4) the Court did not consider that it had to enquire whether there had been a violation of A 13.

Regarding the applicants' other complaints, the Court found that A 3–8 of the Convention were directly applicable in Belgian law. If, therefore, the applicants considered that the administrative decisions put in issue had violated the rights guaranteed by those articles, they could have challenged them before the Conseil d'Etat.

Damages claim (by majority 14–1) not well-founded.

Debboub alias Husseini Ali v France 99/81

[Application lodged 10.9.1997; Court Judgment 9.11.1999]

Mr Ismaël Debboub alias Ali Husseini was arrested on 8 November 1994 and detained pending trial in connection with a police operation concerning a support network for Islamic terrorist groups. His applications for release were rejected. His trial began on 1 September 1998. On 22 January 1999 he was convicted and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. He complained of the length of his pre-trial detention of approximately four years.

Court found unanimously V 5(3).

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, president, Mr J-P Costa, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 12 November 1994, and ended on 22 January 1999, a period of four years, two months, 10 days. The considerations relevant to the initial decision to keep the applicant in custody, namely the risk of his absconding or colluding with other defendants and the danger he presented for public order, became progressively less persuasive and did not suffice to justify such a lengthy period of detention pending trial. Moreover, in the later decision the courts merely affirmed, but did not establish that there was a risk that co-defendants would collude. While it was true that the case was complex, the courts did not appear to have aced with due expedition. There had accordingly been a violation of A 5(3).

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the damages alleged. Costs and expenses (FF 30,000).

Debled v Belgium (1995) 19 EHRR 506 94/27

[Application lodged 17.11.1988; Commission report 16.2.1993; Court Judgment 22.9.1994]

Dr Georges Debled was a urologist. From 1982 to 1984 patients of his complained to the medical association, the Brabant Ordre des médecins, that the fees he charged were excessive. The Provincial Council summoned the applicant to appear before it on 5 March 1985. He filed pleadings but then withdrew from the hearing. The Council found most of the charges against the applicant had been substantiated and suspended him from practice for a year. The applicant appealed to the Appeals Board of the Ordre des médecins. He sought an adjournment of the hearing and in the meantime, on 3 November 1986, he applied to the Court of Cassation for a transfer of jurisdiction, claiming that there were reasonable grounds for suspecting the Appeals Board of bias. In a judgment of 21 May 1987 the Court of Cassation ruled the application for a transfer of jurisdiction inadmissible. The applicant's challenge to some of the members of the Appeals Board was rejected. On 29 September 1987 the Appeals Board gave its decision in absentia since the applicant had not made any further appearances before it, partly allowing and partly dismissing the appeal. The applicant's further appeals were dismissed by the Appeals Board and the Court of Cassation on 13 April 1989. He complained that he had not had a hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.

The participation of judges in a decision concerning challenges against one of their colleagues could pose problems if identical challenges had been directed against them. But the special circumstances of the present case had to be taken into account. The applicant had challenged several members of the Appeals Board; their exclusion from all the decisions concerning those challenges would have paralysed the whole disciplinary system. He based each of his complaints concerning the challenged members on almost identical grounds, which were general and abstract in nature and were inferred from their membership of the medical unions or their alleged connections with the unions. No reference was made to specific, material facts that could have revealed personal animosity or hostility towards him. Such vague objections could not be regarded as well-founded. Accordingly, there had been no breach of A 6(1).

Delcourt v Belgium (1979–80) 1 EHRR 69/3

Mr Emile Delcourt was a company director. On 21 September 1964, he was found guilty by the Bruges Court of Summary Jurisdiction on 36 out of 41 counts of obtaining money by menaces, fraud and fraudulent conversion, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine of BEF 2,000. On 17 March 1965, the Court of Appeal in Ghent rejected the applicant's appeal and increased his principal sentence to five years' imprisonment and further decided that on serving his sentence, he should be 'placed at the disposal of the Government' for 10 years. The applicant's appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed on 21 June 1965. He complained that a member of the procureur général's department had attended private deliberations of the Court of Cassation, thus contravening the principle of equality of arms.

Although the judgment of the Court of Cassation could only confirm or quash decisions and not reverse or replace them, the judgment might rebound in different degrees on the position of the person concerned. A judgment in cassation sometimes had even more direct repercussions on the fate of an accused. If the highest court dismissed the appeal in cassation, the acquittal or conviction became final. If the Court of Cassation allowed the appeal without ordering the case to be sent back, then by its own sole decision it put an end to the prosecution. A criminal charge was not really 'determined' as long as the verdict of acquittal or conviction had not become final. Criminal proceedings formed an entity and had to, in the ordinary way, terminate in an enforceable decision. Proceedings in cassation were one special stage of the criminal proceedings and their consequences might prove decisive for the accused. It would therefore be hard to imagine that proceedings in cassation fell outside the scope of A 6(1). A 6(1) did not compel the Contracting States to set up courts of appeal or of cassation. Nevertheless, a State which did institute such courts was required to ensure that persons amenable to the law should enjoy before those courts the fundamental guarantees contained in A 6. A 6(1) was therefore applicable to the proceedings in cassation.

The principle of equality of arms was only one feature of the wider concept of fair trial by an independent and impartial tribunal. The applicant could claim full equality of treatment as against the procureur général's departments at the courts of appeal and cassation. The information given to the Court showed that the applicant did not suffer from any discrimination in that respect. The procureur général's department at the Belgian Court of Cassation did not ordinarily conduct public prosecutions, nor did it bring cases before that court, nor did it either have the character of respondent and it could not, therefore, be considered as a party. Justice had not only to be done, but had also to be seen to be done, but that did not amount to proof of a violation of the right to a fair hearing. Looking behind appearances, the Court did not find the realities of the situation to be in any way in conflict with that right. The procureur général's department at the Court of Cassation functioned wholly independently of the Minister of Justice. Thus, the Minister had no power to compel the procureur général to make his submissions one way or the other, while he had the power to direct the institution of prosecutions by the procureur général's departments attached to the courts of first instance and appeal. The procureur général at the Court of Cassation exercised supervision over the officers of the procureur général's departments at the courts of first instance and appeal only in regard to matters of doctrine and did not give them injunctions or instructions. Nor was the procureur général at the Court of Cassation the virtual adversary of the accused whose conviction or acquittal might lead to an appeal in cassation; nor did he become their actual adversary when he submitted in open court that their arguments should not be accepted. Even in the absence of a prosecuting party, a trial would not be fair if it took place in such conditions as to put the accused unfairly at a disadvantage. A close examination of the legislation in issue as it was applied in practice did not, however, disclose any such result. The procureur général's department at the Court of Cassation was an adjunct and an adviser of the Court; it discharged a function of a quasi-judicial nature. By the opinions which it gave according to its legal conscience, it assisted the Court to supervise the lawfulness of the decisions attacked and to ensure the uniformity of judicial precedent. Examination of the facts showed that those considerations were not abstract or theoretical but were indeed real and actual. Nor could the independence and impartiality of the Court of Cassation itself be adversely affected by the presence of a member of the procureur général's department at its deliberations once it had been shown that the procureur général himself was independent and impartial. The system now challenged dated back for more than a century and a half. While the long standing of a national legal rule could not justify a failure to comply with the present requirements of international law, it might under certain conditions provide supporting evidence that there had been no such failure. The Court was of the opinion that that was the case here. There had been no violation in that respect.

The new complaints of the applicant had not previously been raised. However, they were ill-founded. The fact that the procureur général's department at the Court of Cassation expressed its opinion at the end of the hearing, without having communicated it in advance to the parties, was explained by the very nature of its task as noted above. A 6 did not require, even by implication, that an accused should have the possibility of replying to the purely legal submissions of an independent official attached to the highest court in Belgium as its assistant and adviser. Having regard, therefore, to the nature of the proceedings before the Belgian Court of Cassation, it had not been established that the applicant did not receive a fair hearing before that court.

[Application lodged 4.8.1984; Commission report 12.10.1989; Court Judgment 19.12.1990]

Mr Michel Sophie Delta was a French citizen who was born in Guadeloupe. On 29 March 1983 he was arrested in connection with a robbery which had occurred at an underground station that evening. The victim and her friend made statements. The Paris public prosecutor considered that a judicial investigation was unnecessary and used the direct committal procedure. Although summoned by the prosecution, the two girls did not attend the trial and gave no reasons for their failure to do so. The court did not take any steps to have them brought before it. On 5 May the court passed a sentence of three years' imprisonment on him. His appeals to the Paris Court of Appeal and Court of Cassation (Criminal Division) were dismissed. He complained that he had not had a fair trial as his conviction was based solely on statements made to the police by witnesses whom neither he nor his counsel had been able to examine.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(d).

Court found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(d), not necessary to examine 6(2), no jurisdiction to examine 6(3)(b), 17 and 18.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer.

Although the victim of the offence and her friend did not testify in court in person, they were to be regarded for the purposes of A 6(3)(d) as witnesses, a term to be given an autonomous interpretation, as their statements were before the court, which took them into account. The admissibility of evidence was primarily a matter for regulation by national law, and, as a general rule, it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. Accordingly, the Court's task under the Convention was to ascertain whether the proceedings considered as a whole, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair. In principle, the evidence had to be produced in the presence of the accused at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument. That did not mean, however, that in order to be used as evidence statements of witnesses should always be made at a public hearing in court: to use as evidence such statements obtained at the pre-trial stage was not inconsistent with A 6(3)(d) and A 6(1) provided the rights of the defence had been respected. Those rights required that an accused should be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him, either at the time the witness made his statement or at some later stage of the proceedings. The applicant had never had an adequate opportunity to examine the witnesses whose evidence was taken into account by the courts at first instance and on appeal, as the file contained no other evidence. The applicant was therefore unable to test the witnesses' reliability or cast doubt on their credibility. The applicant had not therefore received a fair trial.

The alleged disregard of the presumption of innocence concerned the same facts and consequences that the Court had held to be contrary to A 6(1) and A 6(3)(d) and therefore no separate examination of it was necessary.

Complaints under A 6(3)(b), 17 and 18 were not raised before the Commission and accordingly the Court had no jurisdiction to consider them.

[Application lodged 15.10.1993; Commission report 18.5.1994; Court Judgment 28.10.1994]

Mr Christian Demai, a haemophiliac, had received frequent blood transfusions. A blood test on 22 July 1985 showed that he had been infected with HIV. On 8 December 1989 he submitted a preliminary claim for compensation to the Minister for Solidarity, Health and Social Protection, who refused it on 30 March 1990. On 25 May 1990 he lodged an application with the Versailles Administrative Court. On 24 July 1991 the Conseil d'Etat assigned the case to the Paris Administrative Court, the court designated to deal with all the applications lodged by infected haemophiliacs. The court ordered the appointment of an expert, who examined the applicant on 8 April 1993. Concurrently, on 8 October 1992, the Compensation Fund for Haemophiliacs and Transfusion Patients offered the applicant compensation. On March 1994 the Paris Administrative Court on 2 March 1994 made an award to the applicant, the judgment was served on the applicant on 18 April 1994 and no appeal was lodged against it. The applicant complained that his case had not been heard within a reasonable time.

Demicoli v Malta (1992) 14 EHRR 47 91/37

[Application lodged 22.5.1987; Commission report 15.3.1990; Court Judgment 27.8.1991]

Mr Carmel Demicoli was the editor of a political satirical periodical 'NOT in the people's interest'. On 3 January 1986 he published an article on a parliamentary debate in the Maltese House of Representatives, in which, inter alia, he described a Minister as a clown. On 13 January 1986 the two Members of Parliament referred to in the article brought the article to the attention of the House of Representatives as an alleged breach of privilege. The applicant appeared before the House of Representatives with his lawyer and was found guilty of breach of privilege. The House fined him MTL 250 and ordered him to publish their conclusion in his paper. He claimed a breach of A 6.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1), not necessary to examine A 6(2).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (c), Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (c), Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann (c), Mr N Valticos, Mr I Foighel.

Preliminary objection of non-exhaustion rejected. In determining whether the breach of privilege proceedings for defamatory libel could be regarded as criminal within A 6(1), the Court had to consider the State's classification, the nature of the offence and the degree of severity of the penalty. The proceedings taken against the applicant for an act done outside the House were to be distinguished from other types of breach of privilege proceedings which could be said to be disciplinary in nature in that they related to the internal regulation and orderly functioning of the House. The relevant measure could potentially affect anyone in the population. The measure provided for the imposition of a penal sanction and not a civil claim for damages. The particular breach of privilege in question was therefore akin to a criminal offence under the Press Act. The maximum penalty the applicant risked was imprisonment of not more than 60 days or a fine not exceeding MTL 500 or both. What was at stake was sufficiently important to warrant classifying the offence with which the applicant was charged as a criminal one under the Convention. The Maltese Parliament had power to impose disciplinary measures and to govern its own internal affairs. The offence could therefore be classified as criminal. A 'tribunal' was characterised by its judicial function, it also had to satisfy the requirements of independence, in particular of the executive, impartiality, duration of its members' terms of office, guarantees afforded by its procedure. The House of Representatives exercised a judicial function in determining the applicant's guilt. The test of impartiality had to be determined according to a subjective test, that is, on the basis of the personal conviction or interest of a particular judge in a given case, and according to an objective test, namely ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. In this context even appearances may be of a certain importance, particularly as far as criminal proceedings were concerned. The two Members of the House criticised in the article and who raised the breach of privilege in the House had participated throughout in the proceedings against the accused, including the finding of guilt and the sentencing. The impartiality of the adjudicating body therefore appeared open to doubt and the applicant's fears in that connection were justified. Accordingly, there had been a breach of A 6(1).

In view of the above finding of a violation of A 6(1), it was not necessary to examine A 6(2).

Demir and Others v Turkey 98/77

[Application lodged 12.2.1993; Commission report 29.5.1997; Court Judgment 23.9.1998]

Mr Demir, a businessman, and Mr Süsin, a councillor, were respectively the chairman and former secretary of the Ydil branch of the People's Social Democratic Party (SHP). Mr Kaplan was a correspondent and member of the executive committee of the Ydil branch of the People's Republican Party. On 26 January 1993 they were arrested with others and placed in police custody. On 27 January 1993 the security police sent the applicants to the forensic medicine centre to be examined. On 12 February 1993 the applicants' lawyer lodged a complaint with the prosecuting authorities complaining of the length of time spent in police custody. On 18 February the applicants were brought before the single judge of the Criminal Court, who ordered them to be placed in pre-trial detention. On 11 June 1993 the public prosecutor filed submissions with the National Security Court against 35 defendants, including the applicants, whom he accused of being active members of an illegal organisation, the PKK (Workers' Party of Kurdistan). The applicants were granted conditional release after a hearing on 3 February 1994. The National Security Court gave judgment on 14 November 1996. They were sentenced to 12 years, six months' imprisonment for membership of an armed gang. Their appeals to the Court of Cassation were dismissed in a judgment of 2 March 1998.

Comm found unanimously V 5(3).

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objection, found V 5(3).

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka, Mr K Jungwiert.

The Government's preliminary objection relating to a remedy under the Constitution had not been raised before the Commission and the Government were therefore estopped from relying on it. The cases involving compensation relied on by the Government were not relevant and concerned A 5(5), whereas the applicants' complaint concerned A 5(3). Government's preliminary objection concerning non-exhaustion therefore rejected.

Mr Demir and Mr Süsin were held in police custody for at least 23 days, during which time none of them appeared before a judge or other judicial officer. Having regard to its previous case-law the Court concluded that the periods of detention concerned failed to satisfy the requirement of promptness under A 5(3). Terrorist offences presented the authorities with special problems but that did not mean that the authorities had carte blanche under A 5 to arrest suspects and detain them in police custody, free from effective control by the domestic courts and, in the final instance, by the Convention's supervisory institutions, whenever they considered that there has been a terrorist offence. Similarly, the requirements of the investigation could not absolve the authorities from the obligation to bring any person arrested in accordance with A 5(1)(c) promptly before a judge, as required by A 5(3). Where necessary, it was for the authorities to develop forms of judicial control which were adapted to the circumstances but compatible with the Convention. It fell to each Contracting State to determine whether the life of the nation was threatened by a 'public emergency' and, if so, how far it was necessary to go in attempting to overcome the emergency. In that respect States had a wide margin of appreciation but not an unlimited discretion. It was for the Court to rule whether, inter alia, the States had gone beyond the 'extent strictly required by the exigencies' of the crisis. The Court noted the particular extent and impact of PKK terrorist activity in south-east Turkey which had created in the region concerned, a 'public emergency threatening the life of the nation'. The mere fact that the detention concerned was in accordance with domestic law could not justify under A 15 measures derogating from A 5(3). The eventual conviction of a suspect at the most served to confirm that the suspicions which led to his arrest were well-founded, but was not indispensable. It had no bearing on the question whether there was a situation which necessitated the detention of suspects incommunicado for such lengthy periods, as their conviction did not give any indication of the circumstances surrounding both the deprivation of liberty and the investigation in issue, any more than it could remove after the event the risks of arbitrary treatment which A 5(3) was intended to prevent. Nor, consequently, could the conviction of a suspect justify, under A 15, the periods of detention in police custody imposed in the present case. The medical examinations, separated by periods of 23 days, were not in themselves safeguards sufficient to justify the excessive length of the applicants' detention. Nor could the fact that the applicants' lawyer was able to lodge a complaint be regarded as an effective guarantee against arbitrary treatment, especially as, being held incommunicado, the applicants were deprived of all contact with him. The applicants' incommunicado detention for 23 days, without any possibility of seeing a judge or other judicial officer, was not strictly required by the crisis relied on by the Government. There had accordingly been a breach of A 5(3).

Deumeland v Germany (1986) 8 EHRR 448 86/3

[Application lodged 15.4.1981; Commission report 9.5.1984; Court Judgment 29.5.1986]

Mr Klaus Dieter Deumeland continued the proceedings on behalf of his mother, who died on 8 December 1976. She had commenced proceedings before the social courts against the Land, represented by the Berlin Industrial Accident Insurance Office. She had applied for a widow's supplementary pension claiming that the death of her husband on 25 March 1970 had been the consequence of an industrial accident. Coming home on 12 January 1970 from an appointment with an ear, nose and throat specialist whom he had consulted on leaving his workplace, he had slipped on a snow-covered pavement, breaking his left thigh-bone. As an employee of the Berlin City Authorities, he was compulsorily insured against accidents. Proceedings were commenced in the Berlin Social Court on 16 June 1970. The Social Court rejected the claim. Mrs Deumeland appealed against the judgment on 23 November 1972 to the Berlin Social Court of Appeal. Following numerous proceedings, on 9 February 1981, the Federal Constitutional Court decided not to consider the complaint since, even assuming it to be admissible, its chances of succeeding were insufficient. The applicant applied for the proceedings to be reopened. On 23 November 1981, the Federal Social Court rejected the applicant's appeal. Mr Deumeland complained that the social courts had not given the case a fair hearing within a reasonable time, contrary to A 6(1).

Comm found by majority (8–6) 6(1) did not apply to present proceedings and no violation of it.

Court found by majority (9–8) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr R Ryssdal (jd), Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr W Ganshof van der Meersch, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (jd), Mr G Lagergren (jd), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (jd), Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (d), Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans (jd), Mr C Russo (c), Mr R Bernhardt (jd), Mr J Gersing (jd), Mr A Spielmann.

The Court considered its previous case-law regarding the applicability of A 6. There was a clear dispute in the present case which arose at the latest on the institution of proceedings before the Berlin Social Court on 16 June 1970. The dispute was genuine and serious, and concerned the actual existence of the right asserted by Mrs Deumeland to receive a widow's supplementary pension. The outcome of the relevant proceedings was capable of leading to confirmation of the decision being challenged, namely the refusal of the Land of Berlin to grant the pension; it was thus directly decisive for the right in issue. The notion of 'civil rights and obligations' could not be interpreted solely by reference to the domestic law of the respondent State. A 6 did not cover only private law disputes. Under German legislation, the right in issue was treated as a public law right.

That classification, however, provided only a starting point and could not be conclusive of the matter unless corroborated by other factors. However an analysis of the characteristics of the German system of industrial-accident social insurance disclosed that the claimed entitlement comprised features of both public law and private law. The factors suggesting that the dispute fell within the sphere of public law included the character of the legislation, the compulsory nature of the insurance and the assumption by the State of responsibility for social protection. But those 3 factors did not suffice to establish that A 6 was inapplicable. Considerations indicating the opposite conclusion included the personal and economic nature of the asserted right, connection with the contract of employment and affinities with insurance under the ordinary law. Having evaluated the relative cogency of the features of public law and private law present in the instant case, the Court found the latter to be predominant. None of the various features of private law was decisive on its own, but taken together and cumulatively they conferred on the asserted entitlement the character of a civil right within the meaning of A 6(1), which was therefore applicable.

The starting point of the period to be taken into account was 16 June 1970, the date on which the action was instituted before the Berlin Social Court. The period to be taken into account covered in principle the entirety of the litigation, including the appeal proceedings. In this case the Federal Constitutional Court was to be taken into account as, although it had no jurisdiction to rule on the merits, its decision was capable of affecting the outcome of the claim. However, the time spent by the Berlin Social Court of Appeal in examining the application for re-opening of the proceedings was not material because this application involved a fresh set of proceedings. The period ended on 9 February 1981, when the Federal Constitutional Court rejected Mr Deumeland's constitutional complaint. The period to be considered thus lasted 10 years, seven months, three weeks. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in each instance according to the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria stated in the case-law of the Court. The case was not a difficult one. The applicant had contributed to prolonging the proceedings. A number of delays were attributable to the competent courts, primarily the Berlin Social Court and Social Court of Appeal. As a result of those delays, viewed together and cumulatively, the applicant's case was not heard within a reasonable time. The litigation had extended over almost 11 years. Whatever might have been the value of the benefit being claimed, an interval of such length was abnormal for the circumstances, especially having regard to the particular diligence required in social security cases. The applicant's case was not heard within a reasonable time, as required by A 6(1).

The applicant had not produced any evidence capable of supporting his allegations that he had not been given a fair hearing before an impartial tribunal.

Finding constituted adequate just satisfaction for A 50.

Deweer v Belgium (1979–80) 2 EHRR 439 80/1

[Application lodged 6.2.1975; Commission report 5.10.1978; Court Judgment 27.2.1980]

Mr Julius Deweer had been a retail butcher in Louvain since 1935. He died on 14 January 1978 and his widow and three daughters completed the proceedings he had instituted. On 18 September 1974 his shop was inspected by an official in the Economic Inspectorate General. This official found an infringement of the Ministerial Decree of 9 August 1974 'fixing the selling price to the consumer of beef and pigmeat'. The inspector did not supply a copy of the report to the applicant but submitted his formal statement to the procureur du Roi attached to the Louvain Court of First Instance. On 30 September, the Louvain procureur du Roi ordered the provisional closure of the applicant's shop within 48 hours from notification of the decision. The closure was to come to an end either on the day after the payment of a sum of BEF 10,000 by way of friendly settlement or, at the latest, on the date on which judgment was passed on the offence. Mr Deweer had eight days in which to indicate whether he accepted the offer of settlement. By letter of 3 October the applicant replied stating that he would be paying the sum claimed by way of friendly settlement. Following payment, his shop was not closed. He did not bring any action before the civil courts for restitution of money paid over without cause and for damages; nor did he apply to the Conseil d'Etat for a declaration of annulment of the Decree of 9 August 1974. He complained to the Commission that the imposition of the fine by way of settlement under constraint of provisional closure of his establishment infringed his rights under A 6.

Comm unanimously found V 6(1), NV 6(2), NV P1A1, not necessary to consider 6(3).

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection and application to strike out, found V 6(1), not necessary to examine A 6(2) and 6(3), by majority (6–1) not necessary to examine P1A1.

Judges: Mr H Mosler, President, Mr M Zekia, Mr R Ryssdal, Mr W Ganshof van der Meersch, Mr P-H Teitgen, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (pd).

The only remedies which A 26 required to be exercised were those that were both available and sufficient in respect of the violation alleged. An application for a declaration of annulment would have remedied certain of the consequences of the contested decision but not its cause. A 26 did not require the use of an indirect means of redress. An action for restitution of money paid over without cause and for damages would not have offered the applicant a genuine opportunity to argue his case. An application for a retrial of the criminal case was an extraordinary remedy under Belgian law. The objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies had not been substantiated therefore on any of the three counts submitted by the Government.

Regarding the request to strike the case off the list, the Court considered Rule 47 of the Rules of Court. In its judgment of 31 May 1978 the Conseil d'Etat had annulled the Decree of 9 August 1974. However, the leading issue raised by the case remained unresolved; that issue transcended the person and the interests of the applicant and his heirs. That being so, the Court had to proceed with the consideration of the issue.

The case had a criminal character. The 'charge' could, for the purposes of A 6(1), be defined as the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he had committed a criminal offence. In those circumstances, the applicant was under a 'criminal charge' as from 30 September 1974. The 'right to a court', which was a constituent element of the right to a fair trial, was not absolute. By paying BEF 10,000 which the Louvain procureur du Roi required by way of settlement the applicant waived his right to have his case dealt with by a tribunal. Waiver did not in principle offend against the Convention. However, in this case the applicant's waiver of a fair trial attended by all the guarantees which are required in the matter by the Convention was tainted by constraint (closure of his shop). There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

A 6(2) and 6(3) represented specific applications of the general principle stated in A 6(1). In finding a breach of A 6(1), it was not necessary to examine A 6(2) or 6(3). The collection of the sum from the applicant, having been effected in conditions incompatible with A 6(1), was unlawful and, accordingly, it was superfluous to determine whether the collection also offended P1A1.

Dewicka v Poland 00/112

[Application lodged 26.2.1997; Court Judgment 4.4.2000]

Mrs Janina Dewicka, born in 1911, sought a contract with the telecommunications company in 1991 for the installation of a telephone. She was told it was technically impossible at the time. In June 1993 she sued the company. Her claim was dismissed in August 1997. Her appeal was upheld in January 1998. By March 1999 she had been unable to obtain an enforcement order from the first instance court. She complained about the length of the civil proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr M Pellonpää, President, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mr V Butkevych, Mrs S Botoucharova.

The period under consideration began on 19 June 1993, when the applicant lodged her claim with the Wroclaw-Krzyki District Court. The proceedings on the merits came to an end on 21 January 1998, when the Wroclaw Regional Court allowed the applicant's appeal and granted her claim. However, as of 20 March 1999 at the latest, the applicant was unable to institute enforcement proceedings since the Wroclaw-Krzyki District Court had failed to provide her with an enforcement order. For the purposes of A 6(1), the termination of the proceedings on the merits of the claim did not always constitute an end of a 'determination of a civil right' within the meaning of that provision. What was decisive was the point at which the right asserted by a claimant actually became 'effective', that is to say, when his civil claim was finally satisfied. Where the party to civil proceedings had to institute enforcement proceedings in order to satisfy his or her judicially-determined claim, those proceedings had to be regarded as a second stage of proceedings on the merits and, consequently, their integral part. Accordingly, the length of the proceedings to be considered under A 6(1) was at least five years and nine months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular, the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicant and that of the relevant authorities, and the importance of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation. The case concerned the determination of the applicant's right to enter into a simple civil contract. The only issue relevant for the final ruling was whether it was technically feasible for the defendant to install a telephone line in the applicant's apartment. The fact that the court had to obtain expert evidence concerning that matter could not in itself render the case a complicated one. The applicant, like her opponent, considered that the stay of the proceedings might expedite the determination of her claim, in particular because the relevant expert report was to be obtained in those other proceedings. There was no reason why the applicant's exercise of her procedural rights in that instance could be seen as unreasonable or dilatory conduct. What was at stake in the litigation was undoubtedly of crucial importance to the applicant. Her very great age, her disability and the fact that the outcome of the case was of vital significance for her basic human needs, in particular, the need to maintain essential contact with the outside world, required that the domestic courts show special diligence in handling her case. Having regard to the period of inactivity on the part of the authorities and to what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation and the overall length of the proceedings, the requirement of the reasonable time in A 6(1) was not complied with in the present case. There had therefore been a breach of that provision.

Mr Giustino Di Luca and Mr Osvaldo Saluzzi were surveyors. On 21 December 1989 they instituted proceedings against the Ministry of Finance in the Apulia Regional Administrative Court (RAC), seeking judicial review of a decision of the Ministry assigning them to a category of staff and salary scale lower than those to which they considered themselves to be entitled on the basis of the duties they had performed as temporary staff. The case was set down for hearing on 7 February 1996. They complained about the length of proceedings.

The Court reviewed its previous case-law and noted that in the law of many Member States there was a basic distinction between civil servants and employees governed by private law. That had led it to hold that 'disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the present case the dispute related to the applicants' recruitment and their career and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

On 5 March 1984 Mrs V, the owner of a flat rented by the applicant, instituted proceedings against him in the Rome magistrates' court. She sought to have the lease terminated and the applicant evicted because of late payment of the rent. Her application for a possession order was dismissed on 18 July 1984. Her appeals to the District Court and the Court of Appeal were dismissed. She appealed to the Court of Cassation which in a judgment of 19 June 1991 quashed the Court of Appeal's judgment and remitted the case to a different division of the Court of Appeal. The landlady on 12 March 1993 resumed the proceedings in the Court of Appeal. In a judgment of 5 July 1995, the text of which was deposited with the registry on 7 September 1995, the Court of Appeal terminated the lease on the ground that the applicant was in breach of its terms. On 29

February 1996 the applicant appealed on points of law to the Court of Cassation, which quashed the Court of Appeal's judgment and remitted the case to a different division of the Court of Appeal. The court's judgment of 7 January 1997 was deposited with the registry on 13 May 1997. The proceedings automatically lapsed on 27 December 1997, as neither party had resumed them.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 5 March 1984, when proceedings were instituted against the applicant in the Rome magistrates' court. It ended on 27 December 1997, when the proceedings lapsed on account of the parties' failure to resume them. It therefore lasted almost 13 years and 10 months. A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet the requirements of the provision. The Court reaffirmed the importance of administering justice without delays which might jeopardise its effectiveness and credibility. Since 25 June 1987, the date of the Capuano v Italy judgment, the Court had delivered 65 judgments in which it had found violations of A 6(1) in proceedings exceeding a 'reasonable time' in the civil courts of the various regions of Italy. Similarly, more than 1,400 reports of the Commission resulted in resolutions by the Committee of Ministers finding Italy in breach of A 6 of the Convention for the same reason. The frequency with which violations were found showed that there was an accumulation of identical breaches which were sufficiently numerous to amount not merely to isolated incidents. Such breaches reflected a continuing situation that had not yet been remedied and in respect of which litigants had no domestic remedy. The accumulation of breaches accordingly constituted a practice that was incompatible with the Convention. The length of the proceedings was excessive and failed to meet the 'reasonable time' requirement. Accordingly there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Di Pede v Italy 96/38

[Application lodged 3.7.1989; Commission report 6.7.1995; Court Judgment 26.9.1996]

On 14 July 1978 Mr Francesco Paolo Di Pede brought proceedings against Mr V and Mrs L in the Matera District Court seeking an order requiring them to demolish a building erected in breach of the statutory provisions on minimum distances from the boundaries of adjacent properties and to remove four trees for the same reason. The first hearing was held on 13 October 1978. On 11 March 1986 the Matera District Court found in the applicant's favour, but ruled that new proceedings should be brought to determine the amount of damages to be paid to him. On 24 May 1986 Mr V and Mrs L appealed, but the proceedings were terminated because they had omitted to register their notice of appeal with the Potenza Court of Appeal. On 26 April 1988, the applicant applied for enforcement proceedings to the Matera magistrate. On 28 December 1988 the surveyor's report stated that the works had been partially completed. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (23–6) V 6, (25–4) not necessary to examine whether P1A1.

Court by majority (8–1) rejected the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1), unanimously not necessary to consider P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr C Russo, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (d), Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr E Levits.

The enforcement had to be regarded as the second stage of the proceedings which began on 14 July 1978. To date, no final decision within the meaning of A 26 had been given. There was no evidence that the case had been discontinued. Accordingly the objection that the application was out of time was dismissed.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 14 July 1978 when proceedings were brought against Mr V and Mrs L in the Matera District Court. The relevant period had not yet ended. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. The case was not complex. The applicant was responsible for some of the delay but the authorities bore most of the responsibility. A period of more than 18 years could not be regarded as reasonable.

In view of the conclusion on A 6 it was not necessary to determine whether there had been a breach of P1A1.

Diana v Italy 92/12

[Application lodged 3.10.1985; Commission report 15. 1.1991; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mr Giovanni Diana brought an action by summons served on 12 and 14 April 1978 against Mr Z and Mrs V before the Savona District Court to establish that he had lawfully altered the conditions governing the use of a right of way to which his property was subject. On 5 June 1981 the action was joined with two other actions. After the hearing on 8 May 1987 the court found for the applicant. On 23 October 1987 Mr Z and Mrs V appealed. On 5 October 1989 the appeal was dismissed and the decision was lodged with the registry on 30 October 1989. The Court of Appeal's judgment became final on 29 January 1990. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into account began on 12 April 1978 when the proceedings against Mr Z were instituted in the Savona District Court. It ended, at the latest, on 29 January 1990 when the Court of Appeal's judgment became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was of some complexity, which complexity was increased on 5 June 1981 following its joinder with two other cases. There were numerous hearings, some of them concerned with attempting to secure an out-of-court settlement; the parties had also been responsible for some adjournments. The transfer of the investigating judge had resulted in the proceedings remaining dormant until he was replaced approximately seventeen months later. Furthermore there was a long period of stagnation of nearly 21 months before the District Court. Thereafter the proceedings had been conducted at an acceptable pace. Although the Government pleaded the backlog of cases, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The overall lapse of time in the case could not be regarded as reasonable.

Calogero Diana v Italy 96/51

[Application lodged 30.5.1989; Commission report 28.2.1995; Court Judgment 15.11.1996]

Mr Calogero Diana was arrested and detained on suspicion of having taken part in the activities of the Red Brigades terrorist organisation. He was convicted of numerous criminal offences. He was sentenced to life imprisonment, permanently disqualified from holding public office, stripped of his civic rights for the duration of his prison sentence and removed from parental control. During detention his correspondence was subject to censorship, in particular that with his lawyer. He complained that there had been infringements of his right to respect for his correspondence, that there had been a breach of his right to defend himself and to have all necessary facilities for the preparation of his defence, that he had not obtained a decision by an impartial tribunal on his application to have the censorship of his correspondence ended and that there were no effective remedies in respect of the alleged breaches of the Convention.

Comm found unanimously V 8, no separate issue under 6(3), V 13.

Court unanimously dismissed Government's preliminary objection, found V 8, no separate issue under 6(3)(b), V 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr C Russo, Mr AN Loizou, Mr AB Baka, Mr B Repik, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus.

There was interference by a public authority with the exercise of the applicant's right to respect for his correspondence with his lawyer. A law which conferred a discretion had to indicate the scope of that discretion although it was impossible to attain absolute certainty in the framing of the law, and the likely outcome of any search for certainty would be excessive rigidity. The domestic legislation in this case, Law No 354, left the authorities too much latitude. The Italian law did not indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of exercise of the relevant discretion conferred on the public authorities, so that the applicant did not enjoy the minimum degree of protection to which citizens were entitled under the rule of law in a democratic society. There had therefore been a breach of A 8. It was not therefore necessary to ascertain whether the other requirements of para 2 of A 8 were complied with.

The applicant's complaints under A 6(3)(b) could be regarded as being covered under A 8 and did not need to examined separately.

The possibility of applying to the judge responsible for the execution of sentences could not be regarded as an effective remedy for the purposes of A 13, as he was required to reconsider the merits of his own decision, taken without any adversarial proceedings. In addition the Court of Cassation had held that Italian law did not provide any remedies in respect of decisions whereby prisoners' correspondence had been ordered to be monitored and no regional administrative court had delivered a judgment on the subject. The Court therefore dismissed the Government's preliminary objection and held that there had been a breach of A 13.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage.

Díaz Ruano v Spain (1995) 19 EHRR 555 94/17

[Application lodged 12.7.90; Commission report 31.8.93; Court Judgment 26.4.94]

In the course of a police inquiry into several thefts, Mr Manuel Jesús Díaz Santana, the applicant's son, aged 21, was arrested at his home on 13 October 1982. He died from being shot whilst in police custody. In addition to the gunshot wound, there were a number of other marks to the body. A police officer was convicted of homicide with the extenuating circumstance of self-defence, but this conviction was quashed on appeal. An appeal by the applicant was declared inadmissible. The applicant alleged, inter alia, that his son had been subjected to torture and inhuman and degrading treatment while in police custody, in breach of A 3.

Commission found by a majority NV 2 and 3.

Court noted the friendly settlement and struck the case from the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr SK Martens, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached by the Government and the applicant. It discerned no reason of public policy why the case should not be struck out of the list.

Diennet v France (1996) 21 EHRR 554 95/27

[Application lodged 18.4.1991; Commission report 5.4.1994; Court Judgment 26.9.1995]

Dr Marcel Diennet, a general practitioner, was subject to proceedings for professional misconduct in respect of his method of 'consultation by correspondence'. On 11 March 1984 the Regional Council of the Ile-de-France ordre des médecins struck him off the register. He appealed to the disciplinary section of the National Council of the ordre des médecins, which on 30 January 1985 ordered that he should be disqualified from practising medicine for three years instead of being struck off. As a result of appeal to the Conseil d'Etat the decision was quashed on the ground of an irregularity in the proceedings and the case was remitted to the disciplinary section. On 26 April 1989, after a hearing in private, the disciplinary section of the National Council again disqualified the applicant from practising medicine for three years. He appealed to the Conseil d'Etat, alleging that the composition of the disciplinary section did not satisfy the impartiality requirement of A 6(1) and that the hearing of 26 April 1989 had not been held in public. On 29 October 1990 the Conseil d'Etat dismissed the appeal.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) regarding right to a hearing in public, by majority (14–9) NV 6(1) regarding right to an impartial tribunal.

Court found unanimously V 6(1) in that the applicant did not receive a public hearing, by majority (8–1) NV 6(1) regarding impartial tribunal.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mrs E Palm, Mr JM Morenilla (pd), Mr L Wildhaber, Mr P Kûris.

The Court referred to its previous case-law and noted that disciplinary proceedings in which the right to continue to practise medicine as a private practitioner was at stake gave rise to disputes over civil rights within the meaning of A 6(1). A 6(1) therefore applied to the case. It was unnecessary to determine whether there was any 'criminal charge' against him within the meaning of A 6(1) as the breaches he alleged applied to both civil and criminal matters.

The holding of court hearings in public constituted a fundamental principle enshrined in A 6(1). This public character protected litigants against the administration of justice in secret with no public scrutiny and was also one of the means whereby confidence in the courts could be maintained. The principle was not an absolute one. The Court took into account that the Government did not dispute that the hearings before the disciplinary bodies of the ordre des médecins had not been held in public; that the Conseil d'Etat hearing appeals on points of law from decisions of the disciplinary section of the National Council of the ordre des médecins could not be regarded as a judicial body that had full jurisdiction so its public hearings were not sufficient to remedy the defect found to exist at the stage of the disciplinary proceedings; and that while the need to protect professional confidentiality and the private lives of patients might justify holding proceedings in camera, such an occurrence had to be strictly required by the circumstances and in this case the proceedings were to deal only with the 'method of consultation by correspondence' adopted by the applicant, there was no reason to suppose that any patient or confidences would be mentioned. In this case, there had been a breach of A 6(1) in that the applicant did not receive a public hearing before the Regional Council and the disciplinary section of the National Council of the ordre des médecins.

No ground for legitimate suspicion could be discerned in the fact that three of the seven members of the disciplinary section had taken part in the first decision. Even if the second decision had been differently worded, it would necessarily have had the same basis because there were no new factors. The applicant's fears could not be regarded as having been objectively justified. Accordingly there had been no breach of A 6(1).

Judgment constituted just satisfaction for damage. Costs and expenses (FF 20,000).

Dikme v Turkey 00/175

[Application lodged 22.10.1992; Commission report 4.6.1999; Court Judgment 11.7.2000]

Mr Metin Dikme was found to be in possession of false identity papers and detained by the Anti-Terrorist Brigade of the Security Forces for 16 days. He claimed that during the period he was blindfolded while being questioned, subjected to 'Palestinian hanging', given electric shocks to parts of his body and subjected to mock execution. He had no contact with the outside world but was examined by a medical practitioner at the end of the 16 days and taken before a judge. His mother was refused permission to visit him. At his trial he retracted the admissions he had made whilst in custody and lodged a complaint of torture against the officers who had questioned him. He was convicted and sentenced to death. The Court of Cassation set aside the judgment and remitted the case back to the State Security Court where it was still pending.

Comm found unanimously V 3, 5(3), 6(1)+6(3)(c), NV 5(2), NV 8.

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objections, found unanimously NV 5(2), V 5(3), V 3, NV 6(1)+6(3)(c), NV 8.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr C Bîrsan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr B Zupancic, Mr R Maruste, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge.

The Government failed to communicate their preliminary objections regarding failure to exhaust domestic remedies and the six-month time limit in time.

The applicant had been stopped and questioned whilst in possession of false papers and could not therefore claim that he did not know the reason for his arrest. He was able to realise the nature of the suspicions against him and accordingly no violation of A 5(2).

Although it was consistent with national provisions applying to terrorism, being held in custody for 16 days before being brought before a judge breached the prompt review requirement of A 5(3).

The evidence provided by the applicant, medical reports and lack of denials by the Government showed beyond reasonable doubt that the applicant had suffered forms of torture. His suffering was exacerbated by being kept isolated and blindfolded. The treatment was intended to humiliate him, degrade him and break his resistance and was inhuman and degrading. The number, duration and purpose of the assaults gave them a particularly grave and cruel nature likely to cause acute suffering which justified them being classified as torture in breach of A3.

The applicant's conviction was quashed on the grounds of insufficient evidence. As the case was still pending it was not possible to examine the question of the fairness of the trial under A 6(1)+6(3)(c).

The mother's desire to see the applicant fell within A 8, but she had not pursued her attempts. The State had not exceeded their margin of appreciation in controlling visits to persons in detention.

Djaid v France 99/59

[Application lodged 23.7.1995; Court Judgment 29.9.1999]

Mr Karim Djaid, an Algerian national, was arrested in connection with international drug trafficking. He was convicted on 18 April 1994, the conviction was upheld by the Lyon Court of Appeal on 9 February 1995. On 14 February 1995 he lodged an appeal to the Court of Cassation. That appeal was rejected on 21 May 1997. He complained of the length of the proceedings.

Judges: Sir Nicolas Bratza, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr K Jungwiert, Mrs H S Greve.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 6 November 1992 and ended on 21 May 1997. It had lasted 4 years 6 months 15 days at three levels of jurisdiction. The case was of some complexity as it concerned international drug trafficking, but the parties agreed that the investigation was carried out diligently as were the proceedings before the first instance and appeal courts. The proceedings before the Court of Cassation lasted two years, three months, 12 days and although the applicant was partly responsible for the length of the proceedings having requested extensions of time-limits, that could not justify the length of the procedure. Almost a year passed between the lodging of the judge-rapporteur's report and the judgment of the court for which the Government had not provided any convincing explanation. In addition, the obligation of expedition on the Government was particularly important for the applicant as he was regarded under domestic law as being in detention on remand.

No claim submitted but applicant had undoubtedly sustained non-pecuniary damage (FF 20,000).

Djeroud v France (1992) 14 EHRR 68 91/1

[Application lodged 25.9.1987; Commission report 15.3.1990; Court Judgment 23.1.1991]

Mr Mohamed Djeroud, an Algerian national born in Algeria in 1958, arrived in France the following year with his family. His mother and his six brothers and sisters, four of whom have French nationality, live in France. He was convicted of criminal offences on several occasions in 1977 and 1978. In February 1979 the Minister of the Interior ordered his deportation on the ground that he represented a danger to public order. He went to Algeria of his own accord in 1980 but returned to France in 1982, where he lived until 1985. He continued to commit further offences. He was deported in February 1985 and again in April 1987 but returned to France each time. In December 1987 he refused to board an aeroplane for Algeria, as a result of which he served a prison sentence in France. Since 1988 he had been the subject of a compulsory residence order confining him to a municipality near Paris, until he complied with the deportation order. Various attempts to secure the revocation of that order failed, as did an application for political asylum in 1987.

Comm found by a majority (13–1) V 8, unanimously NV 3.

Court noted the friendly settlement and struck the case from the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mr JM Morenilla.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached by the Government and the applicant. It discerned no reason of public order militating against striking the case out of the list.

Dobbertin v France (1993) 16 EHRR 558 93/6

[Application lodged 19.6.1987; Commission report 10.9.1991; Court Judgment 25.2.1993]

Mr Rolf Dobbertin, a national of the German Democratic Republic, was a plasma physicist and was working in Paris as a research assistant under contract to the French National Scientific Research Centre. On 19 January 1979 he was arrested by the police and held in police custody until 25 January 1979, when he appeared before the investigating judge at the National Security Court who charged him with being in communication with agents of a foreign power, namely the German Democratic Republic. Proceedings commenced before the National Security Court until its abolition when the proceedings were transferred to the Paris Court of Appeal. In a judgment of 23 March 1983 the Indictment Division ordered the applicant's release under judicial supervision and on bail. The proceedings continued and on 15 June 1990 he was convicted and sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment. Following further appeals the case was remitted to a differently constituted bench of the Paris special Assize Court, which on 29 November 1991 acquitted the applicant. The prosecution did not appeal within the five day period laid down in the Code of Criminal Procedure. The applicant complained about the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr F Gölcüklü, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka.

The period to be considered began on 19 January 1979 when Mr Dobbertin was arrested and ended at the latest on 4 December 1991 when the period during which the prosecution could have appealed on points of law against the Paris Assize Court's acquittal of the applicant expired. It therefore lasted a just over twelve years and ten months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. Although the applicant's case presented real difficulties arising from the highly sensitive nature of the offences charged, which related to national security, those difficulties could not on their own justify the total length of the proceedings. Regarding the applicant's conduct, A 6 did not require a person charged with a criminal offence to co-operate actively with the judicial authorities. A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. Although the National Security Court and the Paris Military Court appeared to have shown the necessary diligence, once they had been abolished the authorities took no steps to ensure that the cases still pending, including the applicant's, were dealt with swiftly. The ordinary courts were slow to resolve the issues, nine months to determine the validity of the indictment and more than two years before the order commissioning experts was quashed, making it necessary for a fresh investigation to be carried out, with the result that the applicant was not committed for trial until more than ten years after his arrest by the police and more than six years after regaining his freedom. The total length of the proceedings exceeded a reasonable time, there had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

Dombo Beheer BV v Netherlands (1994) 18 EHRR 213 93/46

[Application lodged 15.8.1988; Commission report 9.9.1992; Court Judgment 27.10.1993]

The applicant was a limited liability company under Netherlands law. A dispute arose between the applicant company and its bank concerning the development of their financial relationship between December 1980 and February 1981. Civil proceedings ensued. At trial the court refused to allow the former managing director of the applicant company to give evidence as he was a witness, whereas the branch manager of the Bank, who had been the only other person present when the oral agreement was entered into, had been able to testify. The Supreme Court dismissed the applicant's appeal on 19 February 1988. The applicant company complained that the refusal of the courts to hear its director (or former director) as a witness, while the manager of the branch office of its opponent was heard, placed it at a disadvantage vis-à-vis its opponent and constituted a breach of the principle of 'equality of arms' enshrined in A 6(1).

Comm found by majority (14–5) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (5–4) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt (jd), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh, Mr S K Martens (d), Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen (jd), Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici.

The competence of witnesses was primarily governed by national law. The Court's task was not to substitute its own assessment of the facts for those of the national courts but to ascertain whether the proceedings in their entirety, including the way in which evidence was permitted, were 'fair' within the meaning of A 6(1). The requirements inherent in the concept of 'fair hearing' were not necessarily the same in cases concerning the determination of civil rights and obligations as they were in cases concerning the determination of a criminal charge. Although the detailed provisions of A 6(2) and 6(3) had a certain relevance outside the strict confines of criminal law, Contracting States had greater latitude when dealing with civil cases concerning civil rights and obligations than they had when dealing with criminal cases. However, the requirement of 'equality of arms', in the sense of a 'fair balance' between the parties, applied in principle to civil cases as well as to criminal cases. In litigation involving opposing private interests, 'equality of arms' implied that each party had to be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present his case, including his evidence, under conditions that did not place him at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent. In the present case, it was for the applicant company to prove that there was an oral agreement between it and the Bank to extend certain credit facilities. Only two persons had been present at the meeting at which this agreement had allegedly been reached, one representing the applicant company and the other representing the Bank. Yet only one of those two key persons was permitted to be heard, the Bank's representative. The applicant company was denied the possibility of calling the person who had represented it, because the Court of Appeal identified him with the applicant company itself. During the relevant negotiations the two representatives had acted on an equal footing, both being empowered to negotiate on behalf of their respective parties. Therefore, both should have been allowed to give evidence. The applicant company was placed at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis the Bank and there had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

A law which conferred a discretion had to indicate the scope of that discretion although it was impossible to attain absolute certainty in the framing of the law, and the likely outcome of any search for certainty would be excessive rigidity. The domestic legislation in this case, Law No 354, left the authorities too much latitude. The Italian law did not indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of exercise of the relevant discretion conferred on the public authorities, so that the applicant did not enjoy the minimum degree of protection to which citizens were entitled under the rule of law in a democratic society. There had therefore been a breach of A 8. It was not therefore necessary to ascertain whether the other requirements of paragraph 2 of A 8 were complied with.

The letter of instruction to appeal from the appellant to his lawyer had been intercepted at the prison, read and then forwarded to the lawyer after the statutory ten days for filing appeal had elapsed. The monitoring of the letter infringed the applicant's defence rights. His lawyer filed the grounds in support after the statutory ten-day period had expired. There had consequently been a breach of A 6(3)(b).

The possibility of applying to the judge responsible for the execution of sentences could not be regarded as an effective remedy for the purposes of A 13, as he was required to reconsider the merits of his own decision, taken without any adversarial proceedings. In addition the Court of Cassation had held that Italian law did not provide any remedies in respect of decisions whereby prisoners' correspondence had been ordered to be monitored and no regional administrative court had delivered a judgment on the subject. The Court therefore dismissed the Government's preliminary objection and held that there had been a breach of A 13.

Judgment constituted just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage.

[Application lodged 27.6.1992; Commission report 11.10.1994; Court Judgment 26.3.1996]

On 12 April 1988 the applicant was arrested and detained on suspicion of having committed drug offences. He was convicted mainly on the evidence of anonymous witnesses. He complained that he had been convicted on the evidence of witnesses who had not been heard in his presence and whom he had not had the opportunity to question, the Court of Appeal having accepted the evidence of the anonymous witnesses on the basis of the statement of an investigating judge who at a previous stage of the proceedings had participated in a decision to prolong his detention on remand, and the Court of Appeal having refused to hear an expert brought forward by the defence although the prosecution expert had been heard.

As the requirements of A 6(3) were to be seen as particular aspects of the right to a fair trial guaranteed by A 6(1), the Court examined the complaints under A 6(1) and (3)(d) taken together.

The admissibility of evidence was primarily a matter for regulation by national law and as a general rule it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task under the Convention was not to give a ruling as to whether statements of witnesses were properly admitted as evidence, but rather to ascertain whether the proceedings as a whole, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair. The Convention did not preclude reliance, at the investigation stage, on sources such as anonymous informants. The subsequent use of their statements by the trial court to found a conviction was, however, capable of raising issues under the Convention. A 6 did not explicitly require the interests of witnesses in general, and those of victims called upon to testify in particular, to be taken into consideration. The principles of fair trial also required that in appropriate cases the interests of the defence were balanced against those of witnesses or victims called upon to testify. The decision not to disclose the identity of witnesses Y15 and Y16 to the defence was inspired by the need to obtain evidence from them while at the same time protecting them against the possibility of reprisals by the applicant. There was sufficient reason for maintaining the anonymity of Y15 and Y16. Although the anonymity of the witnesses presented the defence with difficulties, nevertheless, no violation of A 6(1) and 6(3)(d) could be found if it was established that the handicaps on the defence were sufficiently counterbalanced by the procedures followed by the judicial authorities. In the present case the anonymous witnesses were questioned at the appeals stage in the presence of counsel by an investigating judge who was aware of their identity, even if the defence was not. Counsel was present and able to put questions he considered to be in the interests of the defence and these questions were all answered. The Amsterdam Court of Appeal was entitled to consider that the interests of the applicant were outweighed by the need to ensure the safety of the witnesses. The 'counterbalancing' procedure followed by the judicial authorities in obtaining the evidence of witnesses Y15 and Y16 was sufficient to have enabled the defence to challenge the evidence of the anonymous witnesses and attempt to cast doubt on the reliability of their statements. However, even when 'counterbalancing' procedures were found to compensate sufficiently the handicaps under which the defence laboured, a conviction should not be based either solely or to a decisive extent on anonymous statements. In addition, evidence obtained from witnesses under conditions in which the rights of the defence could not be secured to the extent normally required by the Convention should be treated with extreme care.

The Court could not hold in the abstract that evidence given by a witness in open court and on oath should always be relied on in preference to other statements made by the same witness in the course of criminal proceedings, not even when the two were in conflict. Witness N made a statement to the police inculpating the applicant but retracted it when questioned on oath in open court in the presence of the applicant. The decision taken by the Court of Appeal to attach some credence to N's statement to the police did not render the applicant's trial unfair.

It had been impossible to secure R's attendance at the hearing. In the circumstances it was open to the Court of Appeal to have regard to the statement obtained by the police, especially since it could consider that statement to be corroborated by other evidence before it. Accordingly, no unfairness could be found in that respect.

The Court of Appeal refused to hear the defence expert K for the reason that, as an expert rather than a witness, he would not be able to contribute to the elucidation of the facts of the case. The evidence of the police officer I, on the other hand, concerned the way in which the police went about obtaining statements from drug addicts and ensuring that these were as reliable as possible. Decisions whether to allow evidence and what reliance to place on admitted evidence were primarily the responsibility of the domestic courts. The Court of Appeal could come to the conclusions it came to; the fairness of the criminal proceedings against the applicant was not adversely affected by the Court of Appeal's decision to hear I but not K.

None of the alleged shortcomings considered on their own or together led to the conclusion that the applicant did not receive a fair trial. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1) taken together with A 6(3)(d).

Douiyeb v Netherlands 99/49

[Application lodged 1.3.1996; Commission report 17.9.1998; Court Judgment 4.8.1999]

Mr Abdelaziz Douiyeb was a Moroccan national. On 26 February 1996, in the course of an investigation into offences against public decency following complaints filed with the police, the assistant public prosecutor in accordance with the Netherlands Code of Criminal Procedure issued a warrant for the applicant's arrest on suspicion of contravening Article 250 ter of the Criminal Code which provision prohibited trafficking in persons. On the basis of this warrant, the applicant was arrested. On 27 February 1996 the applicant was brought before the investigating judge. The applicant's lawyer submitted that the applicant had been placed in police custody on suspicion of contravening Article 250 CC, for which offence police custody could not be ordered. He demanded the applicant's immediate release. The investigating judge ordered the applicant's detention on remand. Further detention on remand was authorised by the Regional Court of Amsterdam. On 30 August 1996, the Regional Court of Amsterdam acquitted the applicant of the charges brought against him under Article 250 ter CC. However, in separate proceedings he was convicted of unlawful possession of a firearm and sentenced to six weeks' imprisonment. In November 1996, the applicant filed a request for compensation in respect of damage sustained on account of the time spent in pre-trial detention on suspicion of committing the offences of which he had been acquitted. In its decision of 25 April 1997, the Regional Court ordered that 10 days be deducted from the six weeks' imprisonment imposed for the other offence. As to the remaining 32 days, the applicant had successfully sought a royal pardon and the 32 days had been commuted to 69 hours' community work.

Comm found by a majority (18–14) V 5(1)(c), no separate issue arose under 5(4).

Court held unanimously NV 5(1) and NV 5(4).

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Mrs S Botoucharova.

The expressions 'lawful' and 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law' in A 5(1) essentially referred back to national law and stated the obligation to conform to the substantive and procedural rules. It was in the first place for the national authorities to interpret and apply domestic law. However, since under A 5(1) failure to comply with domestic law entailed a breach of the Convention, it followed that the Court could and should exercise a certain power to review whether this law has been complied with. A period of detention would in principle be lawful if it was carried out pursuant to a court order. A subsequent finding that the court erred under domestic law in making the order would not necessarily retrospectively affect the validity of the intervening period of detention. Both Article 250 and Article 250 ter CC of the Netherlands law offered in principle sufficient scope for an order for detention in police custody. The criminal investigation against the applicant concerned the offence of trafficking in persons under Article 250 ter CC and the order for his arrest correctly specified the statutory provision which the applicant was suspected of contravening. On first questioning the applicant was informed of the subject matter about which he was going to be questioned and he stated that he understood what he was suspected of. There was therefore no support for the applicant's contention that he only became aware of the nature of the suspicions against him when he was brought before the investigating judge on 27 February 1996. Although the order for the applicant's detention in police custody mentioned Article 250 CC as the legal basis for this order, that was the result of a clerical error, all other documents concerning the applicant's case mention Article 250 ter CC as the basis of the criminal investigation against him. In the circumstances, the applicant must have or ought to have been aware that the mention of Article 250 CC instead of Article 250 ter CC in the order for his detention in police custody was the result of a clerical error. The error was brought to the attention of the investigating judge. The investigating judge had examined the lawfulness of the applicant's detention in police custody under Article 250 ter CC. On the facts of the present case, the applicant's complaint was unfounded and there had therefore been no breach of A 5(1).

The mere fact that the Court found no breach of the requirements of A 5(1) did not mean that it was dispensed from carrying out a review of compliance with A 5(4). The applicant had been brought before the investigating judge on 27 February 1996, in order to be heard and in connection with the public prosecutor's request for an order for the applicant's detention on remand. During that hearing the investigating judge examined the lawfulness of the applicant's detention in police custody, the applicant's request for immediate release on grounds of the alleged unlawfulness of his detention in police custody and the prosecutor's request for an extension of the applicant's detention. It followed that the applicant did have access to proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention in police custody was decided speedily by a court. Accordingly, the Court could not find a violation of A 5(4).

Doustaly v France 98/28

[Application lodged 29.12.1994; Commission report 27.11.1996; Court Judgment 23.4.1998]

Mr Michel Doustaly was formerly in practice as an architect. On 9 January 1984 Nîmes City Council awarded him a contract for work on the design and construction of a general-purpose senior high school to be built as part of the State school system. When the work was completed the Council decided to reduce by half the amount of the agreed fees, alleging, among other matters, breaches by the applicant of his contractual obligations. On 26 July 1985 Mr Doustaly lodged an application with the Montpellier Administrative Court seeking payment and interest as final settlement of the fees agreed in the contract. He complained about the length of proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 26 July 1985, when the applicant lodged his application with the Montpellier Administrative Court. It ended on 4 July 1994, with the judgment delivered by the Bordeaux Administrative Court of Appeal. The proceedings had lasted almost nine years not including the time taken for enforcement. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. The importance of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation also had to be taken into account. The case was not particularly complex, it concerned the determination of the balance of a lump sum payable for a public works contract. The applicant was not responsible for delays. The proceedings in the Montpellier Administrative Court were affected by lengthy periods of inactivity attributable to the State and the Government did not supply any convincing explanation for those delays. The applicant was to a certain extent professionally dependent as an architect on Nîmes City Council. It was therefore necessary to bring to a close as quickly as possible a dispute between him and an authority which could directly influence the way he carried on his profession. Consequently, special diligence was required of the courts dealing with the case, regard being had to the fact that the amount the applicant claimed was of vital significance to him and was connected with his professional activity. A period of nearly nine years could not be considered to be reasonable.

Drozd and Janousek v France and Spain (1992) 14 EHRR 745 92/52

[Application lodged 26.11.1986; Commission report 11.12.1990; Court Judgment 26.6.1992]

The applicants were Mr Jordi Drozd, a Spanish citizen, and Mr Pavel Janousek, a citizen of Czechoslovakia who were convicted by a court in Andorra (composed of French and Spanish assessors) of armed robbery and were sentenced to 14 years and ordered to be expelled. They chose to serve their sentences in France rather than Spain. They complained that they had not had a fair trial and that their imprisonment in France after being convicted by an Andorran court was unlawful as there was no French provision relating to enforcement of such judgments.

Comm found by majority (10–6) NV 6 by France, (12–4) NV 6 by Spain, (8–8 with President's casting vote) NV 5(1) by France.

Court found unanimously no jurisdiction to examine the merits under 6, unanimously dismissed preliminary objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies raised by the French Government with respect to 5(1), by majority (12–11) NV 5(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona (pd), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (c), Mr L-E Pettiti (jd), Mr B Walsh (jd), Mr R Macdonald (jd), Mr C Russo (d), Mr R Bernhardt (jd), Mr A Spielmann (jd), Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos (jd), Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen (jd), Mr AN Loizou, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha (jd), Mr L Wildhaber (jd), Mr JA Carrillo Salcedo, ad hoc judge.

Regarding the Court's jurisdiction to examine the matter as regards A 6, the Court noted that the Principality of Andorra occupied a complex and unusual status but it was independent of France or Spain. It was not a member of the Council of Europe. The Court therefore lacked jurisdiction ratione loci. The term 'jurisdiction' was not limited to the national territory of the Contracting States, their responsibility could be involved because of acts of authorities producing effects outside their own territory. Although judges from France and Spain sat as members of the Andorran courts they exercised their functions in an autonomous manner and their judgments were not subject to supervision by the French or Spanish authorities. The Court therefore had no jurisdiction ratione personae. The preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of remedies with regard to A 5(1) was dismissed. The detention originated from an Andorran Court and the French courts did not regard themselves as having jurisdiction to assess the lawfulness of criminal convictions pronounced in the Principality. For those reasons the Court did not consider that it had jurisdiction to review the lawfulness of Andorran legal proceedings. The Convention did not require States to impose its standards on third States and France was not obliged to verify that the Andorran proceedings were compatible with the Convention. To require that would be to thwart the trend towards strengthening international co-operation in the administration of justice. The States, however, were obliged to refuse their co-operation if it emerged that the conviction was the result of a flagrant denial of justice. The French government said that it would refuse its customary co-operation if it had to enforce an Andorran judgment which was manifestly contrary to the provisions of A 6. That was not the case here. No violation of A 5(1) had been established.

Mr Alain Duclos, a company secretary, was injured in a road accident on 23 April 1980 that obliged him to take sick leave and, since it counted as an 'industrial accident', was covered by social security. He commenced proceedings against the Dieppe Health Insurance Office (CPAM), the Union des assurances de Paris (UAP) and the Dieppe Family Allowances Office (CAF). He complained about the length of the proceedings.

Comm found by majority (7–6) V 6(1).

Court held unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr AN Loizou, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Jambrek, Mr P Kûris.

The proceedings against the Dieppe CPAM began on 21 July 1982, when the applicant lodged his claim with the review board and ended on 20 February 1992, when the Court of Cassation gave judgment; they therefore lasted nine years and seven months. The proceedings against the UAP began on 26 August 1983, when the applicant instituted proceedings in the Paris tribunal de grande instance and ended on 16 April 1992, when the Court of Cassation gave judgment; they therefore lasted eight years and nearly eight months. The proceedings against the Dieppe CAF began on 18 July 1983, when the applicant submitted his complaint to the Benefit Payments Board and ended on 2 April 1992, when the Court of Cassation gave judgment; they therefore lasted eight years, eight months, two weeks. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the conduct of the parties and the importance of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation. Although the New Code of Civil Procedure left it to the parties to take the initiative, that did not absolve the courts from ensuring that the proceedings were conducted within a reasonable time. A 6(1) imposed on Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of the requirements of A 6(1).

The proceedings against the Dieppe CPAM involving the assessment of benefits in kind received by the applicant when in employment and the weight given to them in the calculation of the daily allowances to be paid to him, were not particularly complex, especially as it was examined at first instance by a specialised tribunal experienced in dealing with such matters. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings before social-security appeal tribunals, which were governed by the New Code of Civil Procedure, had to be assessed in the same way as before the ordinary civil courts. While the applicant's conduct was not beyond reproach, the administrative and judicial authorities were responsible for most of the delays. A total period of nine years and seven months could not be regarded as reasonable.

The proceedings against the UAP concerned performance of the 'disablement insurance' policy that the applicant's former employer had taken out with the UAP and the question of which insurance policy was applicable. The case was not by its nature a particularly complex one. The conduct of the applicant was not beyond reproach but there were delays on the part of the authorities. The applicant was unemployed and disabled. There was much at stake for him in the proceedings against the UAP, the main purpose of which was to secure payment of a life annuity. His situation and what was at stake for him in the proceedings called for special expedition. A period of eight years and nearly eight months could not be regarded as reasonable.

The proceedings against the Dieppe CAF concerned the assessment of the applicant's situation after his accident for the purpose of calculating his family allowance. The case was not a particularly complex one, especially since it was examined at first instance by a specialised tribunal experienced in dealing with such matters. While the applicant's conduct was not beyond reproach, most of the delays were due to the conduct of the administrative and judicial authorities. A total period of eight years, eight months, two weeks could not be regarded as reasonable.

Dudgeon v United Kingdom (1982) 4 EHRR 149; (1983) 5 EHRR 573 81/4

[Application lodged 22.5.1976; Commission report 13.3.1980; Court Judgment 22.10.1981 (merits) and 24.2.1983 (A 50)]

Mr Jeffrey Dudgeon lived in Northern Ireland and was a homosexual. He complained about Northern Ireland laws (the Offences against the Person Act 1861, the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1885 and the common law) which made certain homosexual acts between consenting adult males criminal offences. In England, Wales and Scotland the law was different. In January 1976, the police searched the applicant's house for drugs, in the execution of a warrant. During the search personal papers, including correspondence and diaries belonging to the applicant, in which were described homosexual activities, were found and seized. He was questioned, on the basis of these papers, about his sexual life. The police file was sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions with a view to instituting proceedings for the offence of gross indecency between males, although the Director decided that it would not be in the public interest for proceedings to be brought. The applicant was so informed in February 1977 and his papers, with annotations marked over them, were returned to him. The applicant claimed that the existence of various offences capable of relating to male homosexual conduct and the police investigation in January 1976 constituted an unjustified interference with his right to respect for his private life, in breach of A 8, and that he had suffered discrimination, within the meaning of A 14, on grounds of sex, sexuality and residence.

Comm found by majority (8–2) NV 8, (8–1 with one abstention) NV 14+8, regarding the legal prohibition of private consensual homosexual acts involving male persons under 21 years of age, (9–1) V 8 regarding the legal prohibition of such acts between male persons over 21 years of age, (9–1) not necessary to examine the question whether the last-mentioned prohibition also violated 14+8.

Court found by a majority (15–4) V 8, (14–5) not necessary to examine 14+8.

The legislation constituted a continuing interference with the applicant's right to respect for his private life (which included his sexual life) within the meaning of A 8(1). The police investigation in January 1976 was a specific measure of implementation which directly affected the applicant in the enjoyment of his right to respect for his private life. An interference with an A 8 right would not be compatible with paragraph 2 unless it was 'in accordance with the law', had an aim or aims that was or were legitimate under that paragraph and was 'necessary in a democratic society' for the aforesaid aim or aims. The interference was plainly in accordance with the law since it resulted from the existence of certain provisions in the 1861 and 1885 Acts and the common law. The general aim pursued by the legislation was the protection of morals in the sense of moral standards obtaining in Northern Ireland. The Court held that some degree of regulation of homosexual conduct by means of the criminal law could be justified as 'necessary in a democratic society'. This necessity may even extend to consensual acts committed in private, notably where there was call to provide sufficient safeguards against exploitation and corruption of others, particularly those who were specially vulnerable. What distinguished the law in NI from that existing in the great majority of the Member States was that it prohibited generally gross indecency between males and buggery whatever the circumstances. The question was whether the law of NI remained within the bounds of what, in a democratic society, may be regarded as necessary in order to accomplish those aims. 'Necessary' does not have the flexibility of such expressions as 'useful', 'reasonable', or 'desirable', but implies the existence of a pressing social need for the interference in question. It is for the national authorities to make the initial assessment of the pressing social need in each case: a margin of appreciation was left to them, although their decision remained subject to review by the Court. The scope of that margin was not identical in respect of each of the aims justifying restrictions on a right. Not only the nature of the aim of the restriction but also the nature of the activities involved would affect its scope. The present case concerned a most intimate aspect of private life. Accordingly, there must exist particularly serious reasons before interferences on the part of the public authorities could be legitimate for the purposes of A 8(2). A restriction on a Convention right could not be regarded as 'necessary in a democratic society' unless it was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The fact that similar measures were not considered necessary in other parts of the UK or in other Member States did not mean that they could not be necessary in NI. The moral climate in Northern Ireland in sexual matters was one of the matters which the national authorities may legitimately take into account in exercising their discretion. There is now a better understanding and an increased tolerance of homosexual behaviour compared to the time when the legislation was enacted. The great majority of the Member States no longer considered it necessary or appropriate to treat homosexual practices as in themselves a criminal matter. In NI itself, the authorities had refrained in recent years from enforcing the law in respect of private homosexual acts between consenting males over the age of 21 years capable of valid consent. It could not be maintained in those circumstances that there was a 'pressing social need' to make such acts criminal offences, there being no sufficient justification provided by the risk of harm to vulnerable sections of society requiring protection or by the effects on the public. Such justifications as there were for retaining the law in force unamended were outweighed by the detrimental effects which the very existence of the legislative provisions in question could have on the life of a person of homosexual orientation. Although members of the public who regard homosexuality as immoral may be shocked, offended or disturbed by the commission by others of private homosexual acts, this cannot on its own warrant the application of penal sanctions when it is consenting adults alone who are involved. The reasons given by the Government were not sufficient to justify the maintenance in force of the legislation in so far as it had the general effect of criminalising private homosexual relations between adult males capable of valid consent. The moral attitudes towards homosexuality in NI and the concern that any relaxation in the law would tend to erode existing moral standards could not, without more, warrant interfering with the applicant's private life to such an extent. 'Decriminalisation' did not imply approval, and a fear that some sectors of the population might draw misguided conclusions in this respect from reform did not afford a good ground for maintaining it in force with all its unjustifiable features. The restriction imposed under NI law, by reason of its breadth and absolute character, was, quite apart from the severity of the possible penalties provided for, disproportionate to the aims sought to be achieved. The applicant suffered and continued to suffer an unjustified interference with his right to respect for his private life. There was accordingly a breach of A 8.

Where a substantive Article of the Convention had been invoked both on its own and together with A 14 and a separate breach had been found of the substantive Article, it was not generally necessary for the Court also to examine the case under A 14. The essential aspect of complaint under A 14 amounted in effect to the same as the one that had already been considered in relation to A 8; there was no call to rule on the merits of a particular issue which was part of and absorbed by a wider issue.

Mr Bernard Joost Duinhof was arrested on 18 November 1981 for having failed to register in due time as a conscript serviceman. He was transferred to military barracks where he refused to submit to a medical examination. He was accused of persistent insubordination and his detention confirmed by the commanding officer. On 20 November, he was brought before the auditeur-militair and referred by the designated senior for trial before the Military Court. On 28 January 1982 he was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment. His appeal to the Supreme Military Court was allowed in part. Mr Robert Duijf, having failed to register in due time as a conscript serviceman, was taken to a military house of detention where he refused to take receipt of a military uniform and weapon. He was accused of persistent insubordination. The commanding officer confirmed the detention. In accordance with the verbal advice of the auditeur-militair, the designated senior officer referred the applicant for trial before the Military Court. He was convicted of insubordination and sentenced by the Military Court to 18 months' imprisonment. His appeal to the Supreme Military Court was rejected.

The Court recalled its previous case-law under A 5(3). The 'officer' who could be either a judge or an official in the public prosecutor's department had to offer guarantees befitting the 'judicial' power conferred on him by law. The 'officer' was not identical with the judge but had to have some of the latter's attributes, that is to say he had to satisfy certain conditions each of which constituted a guarantee for the person arrested. The officer had to be independent of the executive and of the parties. There was a procedural requirement placing the 'officer' under the obligation of hearing the individual brought before him and a substantive requirement imposing on him the obligation of reviewing the circumstances militating for or against detention, of deciding, by reference to legal criteria, whether there were reasons to justify detention and of ordering release if there were no such reasons. In determining Convention rights consideration had to be given to looking beyond the appearances and the language used and concentrating on the realities of the situation. However, formal, visible requirements stated in the 'law' were especially important for the identification of the judicial authority empowered to decide on the liberty of the individual in view of the confidence which that authority must inspire in the public in a democratic society. In this case there was no official directive or policy instruction to auditeurs-militair and referring officers regarding interpretation of the Military Code, only a purely internal practice of no binding force. That was not sufficient to constitute authority given by 'law' to exercise the requisite 'judicial power' contemplated by A 5(3). The procedure followed in Mr Duinhof's case before the auditeur-militair prior to referral for trial did not provide the guarantees required by A 5(3). The applicants were referred for trial before the Military Court 5 days and 3 days respectively after their arrest. A 5(3) was aimed at ensuring prompt and automatic judicial control of police or administrative detention ordered in accordance with the provisions of A 5(1)(c). The language of A 5(3) ('shall be brought promptly before'), read in the light of its object and purpose, made evident its inherent 'procedural requirement', the 'judge' or judicial 'officer' had to actually hear the detained person and take the appropriate decision. Accordingly, the referral of the applicants for trial did not assure them the guarantees provided for under A 5(3). Mr Duijf was heard by the auditeur-militair 4 days after his arrest and one day after his referral for trial. Without formally issuing a decision not to release, the auditeur-militair, three days after Mr Duijf's appearance before him, asked the Military Court to extend the detention beyond the fourteen-day limit provided for under the Military Code. Although the auditeur-militair was competent to direct release he did not enjoy the necessary independence as he was also prosecuting authority before the Military Court. Consequently, the procedure followed before the auditeur-militair in Mr Duijf's case did not satisfy the requirements of A 5(3). Although both applicants were heard by the officier-commissaris, the latter was not authorised by law to exercise the requisite 'judicial power' referred to in A 5(3), notably the power to decide on the justification for the detention and to order release if there was none. The procedure before the officier-commissaris therefore lacked one of the fundamental guarantees implicit in A 5(3). The Military Court did not hold a hearing and give a decision on detention until 8 days after Mr Duinhof's arrest and 12 days after Mr Duijf's arrest. Whilst the question of promptness had to be assessed in each case according to its special features the intervals in this case were in excess of the limits laid down by A 5(3), even taking due account of the exigencies of military life and military justice. Each applicant was therefore the victim of a violation of A 5(3).

NLG 300 awarded to each applicant under A 50.

Dulaurans v France 00/99

[Application lodged 17.12.1996; Commission report 20.5.1998; Court Judgment 21.3.2000]

Mrs Michelle Christine Dulaurans instructed a property dealer to sell two properties belonging to her. She revoked powers of attorney she had given to him and agreed to pay him compensation. He brought proceedings against her for failing to pay the compensation. She claimed that the powers of attorney she had granted were void for failure to comply with formalities under domestic legislation. The tribunal de grande instance ordered her to pay the compensation. She did so and appealed to the Court of Appeal, which dismissed her appeal stating that the domestic legislation did not apply to the dealer. Her further appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed on the ground that the applicant had not raised the arguments concerning the dealer's activities before the Court of Cassation.

Both at first instance and in the Court of Cassation the applicant had argued that the habitual nature of the work she had instructed the dealer to carry out was apparent from the powers of attorney. Although at the appeal stage she had not expressly referred to the two powers of attorney in issue it could not be said on that account that she had put forward two different lines of reasoning. The Court of Cassation confined itself to declaring that in her submissions the applicant had only maintained that the dealer had effected or participated in transactions covered by the legislation. The Court of Appeal however, in its judgment, had decided precisely that issue and there was no reason for the Court of Appeal to have reached that conclusion unless to answer a complaint raised by the applicant. The absence of any other reasoning by the Court of Cassation suggested that the dismissal of the ground of appeal in question was the result of an error.

E v Norway 90/16

[Application lodged 13.5.1985; Commission report 16.3.1989; Court Judgment 29.8.1990]

The applicant was involved in a traffic accident in 1965 in which he suffered serious brain damage, and he subsequently showed a distinct tendency to become aggressive. In 1967 he was convicted of criminal offences, declared mentally ill and spent the period from May 1967 to July 1978 in mental hospitals. In 1978 he was sentenced to further imprisonment and in addition the court authorised the use of security measures under the Penal Code. On 3 July 1978 the prosecuting authority detained the applicant in a security ward at Ila National Penal and Preventive Detention Institution. Over the years he was released but re-detained following the commission of further offences. In custody he assaulted prison staff and nurses. The applicant alleged that the review available under Norwegian law of the lawfulness of his repeated periods of detention in the Ila security ward and in prison under the Penal Code did not meet the requirements of the Convention in three respects: that the scope of review was too limited, the courts lacked the power to order release and that the Oslo City Court did not deliver its decision in 1988 speedily.

Comm found unanimously V 5(4).

Court found unanimously NV 5(4) regarding the scope of the Norwegian courts' power to review the lawfulness of the applicant's detention and regarding powers to order his release, V 5(4) regarding the failure to take a decision 'speedily'.

Judges: Mr J Cremona, President, Mr R Ryssdal, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann.

The notion of 'lawfulness' under A 5(4) had the same meaning as in A 5(1), so that the arrested or detained person was entitled to a review of the 'lawfulness' of his detention in the light not only of the requirements of domestic law but also of the text of the Convention. A 5(4) did not guarantee a right to judicial review of such a scope as to empower the court to substitute its own discretion for that of the decision-making authority. The review should, however, be wide enough to bear on those conditions which were essential for the 'lawful' detention of a person according to A 5(1).

The applicant had the possibility of challenging in the ordinary courts each of the Ministry's decisions that he should remain in detention or return to custody under the Penal Code. The ordinary courts had competence to review all the facts on which the Ministry's decision was based. Moreover, the courts had competence to determine whether the conditions for imposing security measures were still satisfied. Having examined the Norwegian system, the Court was satisfied that the available judicial review was wide enough to bear on those conditions which, under the Convention, were essential for the lawful detention of the applicant pursuant to the Penal Code. There had therefore been no violation of the Convention on that point.

Where an administrative decision to detain a person was considered to be invalid, the Norwegian court had the power to order his release. In the proceedings instituted in the Oslo City Court on 3 August 1988 the applicant contended that the Ministry's decision of 21 July 1988 was invalid, and he claimed that the court should order his release. There was no reason to believe that the court would have declined to do so if it had accepted his contention. Accordingly, no violation of A 5(4) had been established in this respect.

The notion of promptness indicated greater urgency than that of speedily. Even so, a period of approximately eight weeks from the filing of summons to judgment was difficult to reconcile with the notion of speedily. There were further delays in the proceedings, some due to administrative problems. However, the Convention required that Contracting States organised their legal systems so as to enable the courts to comply with the various requirements under the Convention. It was incumbent on the judicial authorities to make the necessary administrative arrangements, even during a vacation period, to ensure that urgent matters were dealt with speedily and that was particularly necessary when the individual's personal liberty was at stake. No appropriate provisions had been made in the case. Regarding the period of three weeks required to write the judgment, the applicant was entitled to a speedy decision, whether affirmative or negative, on the lawfulness of his custody. In all the circumstances the review proceedings were not conducted 'speedily', and there was therefore a violation of A 5(4) in this respect.

EL, RL and JO-L v Switzerland 97/48

[Application lodged 29.10.1992; Commission report 10.4.1996; Court Judgment 29.8.1997]

The applicants were the widow, the son and the daughter of the late Mr L. Mr L was the owner of a mail-order company. In 1984 he declared certain moneys to the tax authorities. He died on 7 October 1985. The three-month period within which the applicants could have rejected the inheritance under the Swiss Civil Code expired on 7 January 1986. On 18 August 1989 the Tax Office concluded that Mr L had unlawfully failed to declare income in Switzerland and initiated proceedings against the applicants for recovery of unpaid cantonal and federal taxes and at the same time imposed fines for tax evasion. The applicants appealed to the Obwalden Cantonal Tax Appeals Board against the federal taxes. The Board upheld the applicants' claim and the Direct Federal Tax Administration lodged an administrative law appeal to the Federal Court. On 22 May 1992 the Federal Court upheld the appeal. The applicants complained that, irrespective of any personal guilt, they had been convicted of an offence allegedly committed by Mr L.

The concept of 'criminal charge' within A 6 was an autonomous one. There were three criteria to be taken into account when it was being decided whether a person was 'charged with a criminal offence' for the purposes of A 6. These were the classification of the offence under national law, the nature of the offence and the nature and degree of severity of the penalty that the person concerned risked incurring. The fine was not inconsiderable. In setting the figure, the authorities took the applicants' co-operative attitude into account. The tax legislation laid down certain requirements, to which were attached penalties for non-compliance. The penalties, which took the form of fines, were not intended as pecuniary compensation for damage but were punitive and deterrent in nature. The Federal Court had held that the fine in question constituted a 'real penalty' and depended on the 'guilt' of the offending taxpayer. A 6 was therefore applicable under its criminal head.

It was normal that tax debts, like other debts incurred by the deceased, should be paid out of the estate. Imposing criminal sanctions on the living for acts apparently committed by a deceased person was, however, a different matter. Whether or not the late Mr L was actually guilty, the applicants were subjected to a penal sanction for tax evasion allegedly committed by him. It was a fundamental rule of criminal law that criminal liability did not survive the person who had committed the criminal act. Such a rule was also required by the presumption of innocence enshrined in A 6(2) of the Convention. Inheritance of the guilt of the dead was not compatible with the standards of criminal justice in a society governed by the rule of law. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(2).

EP v Italy 99/86

[Application lodged 24.12.1995; Commission report 21.10.1998; Court Judgment 16.11.1999]

On 3 October 1988 the applicant and her daughter M-A (born in 1981), who had lived in Greece since the latter's birth, arrived in Rome. As soon as they landed, the applicant consulted the airport medical service because her daughter had not been feeling well. The duty doctor found vomiting and high temperature and had M-A admitted to hospital. On 15 October 1988, the hospital psychiatric department applied to the Rome Youth Court to have M.-A. removed from her mother's care and for an injunction on the mother visiting her until the complex medical and psychiatric state of the child, who did not speak Italian, had been clearly diagnosed. According to the doctor in charge of M-A's case, the applicant, inter alia, had a clinical obsession with her daughter's health. In an order of 16 March 1989, the court suspended the applicant's parental responsibility and ordered that there should for the time being be no contact between the child and her mother or the other members of her family. In view of the urgency of the matter, the court did not hear submissions from State Counsel or the applicant. On 9 May 1989 the applicant appealed to the Milan Youth Court. On 30 June 1989 the Milan Youth Court declared M-A available for adoption after hearing submissions. In a judgment of 16 July 1993 the Milan Youth Court dismissed the applicant's appeal. The applicant's appeal to the Milan Court of Appeal was dismissed in a judgment of 2 June 1994. The applicant appealed to the Court of Cassation on a point of law. In a judgment of 7 June 1995, deposited with the court registry on 24 October of that year, the applicant's appeal was dismissed. In 1996 the applicant's daughter was finally adopted by her foster parents. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings and a violation of her right to respect for her family life.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) and 8.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (6–1) V 8.

Judges: Mr M Fischbach, President, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello (d), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr AB Baka.

The period to be taken into consideration commenced on 26 October 1988, the date on which the Rome Youth Court intervened for the first time by ordering M-A to be temporarily placed with the applicant's brother's family, and ended on 24 October 1995 when the Court of Cassation's judgment of 7 June 1995 was deposited with the court registry. It had therefore lasted 7 years. Recalling its judgments in cases earlier in the year, the Court noted that there was in Italy an accumulation of breaches of the 'reasonable time' requirement constituting a practice contrary to the Convention. As the proceedings in this case concerned the custody of a child, particular celerity was required. Having examined the facts of the case in the light of the arguments put forward by the parties and having regard to its case-law in this field, the Court considered that the length of the proceedings failed to meet the reasonable time requirement and constituted a further example of practice contrary to the Convention. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

There had been an interference with the applicant's right to respect for her family life. The impugned measures had been in accordance with the law within the meaning of A 8(2). The measures had pursued a legitimate aim in that they were intended to further the well-being of the applicant's child and thus 'the protection of the rights and freedoms of others'. With regard to whether the interference was necessary in a democratic society, a fair balance had to be struck between the interests of the child and those of the parent and in doing so particular importance had to be attached to the best interests of the child, which, depending on their nature and seriousness, may override those of the parent. In particular the parent could not be entitled under A 8 to have such measures taken as would harm the child's health and development. In addition the State enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation. Taking a child into care should normally be regarded as a temporary measure, to be discontinued as soon as circumstances permitted, and any measure of implementation should be consistent with the ultimate aim of reuniting the natural parent with his or her child. Although there appeared to have been relevant and sufficient grounds for intervening, the total ban on contact between the applicant and her daughter was so severe a measure against a mother who had just arrived in Italy with her little daughter who spoke only Greek, and about whose past the authorities dealing with the case knew very little, that serious questions were raised. Having regard to all the circumstances, the authorities dealing with the case, albeit enjoying a margin of appreciation, failed to take all the necessary steps which could be reasonably expected of them in the circumstances, to ensure that the chances of the applicant and her daughter re-establishing their relationship should not be definitively compromised. Hence, the authorities did not strike a fair balance between the best interests of the child and the applicant's rights under A 8 and there had accordingly been a violation of A 8.

The word 'victim', in the context of A 25, denoted the person directly affected by the act or omission in issue, the existence of a violation was conceivable even in the absence of prejudice; prejudice was relevant only in the context of A 50. Mitigation of sentence and discontinuance of prosecution granted on account of the excessive length of proceedings did not in principle deprive the individual concerned of his status as a victim; they were to be taken into consideration solely for the purpose of assessing the extent of the damage he had allegedly suffered. There was exception where national authorities acknowledged either expressly or in substance, and then gave redress for, the breach of the Convention. It would be unnecessary then to duplicate the domestic process with proceedings before the Commission and the Court. The question of whether the German courts held that A 6(1) had been breached and, if so, whether they granted redress, could be considered with the merits.

In criminal matters, the 'reasonable time' referred to in A 6(1) began to run as soon as a person was 'charged'; that might occur on a date prior to the case coming before the trial court, such as the date of arrest, the date when the person concerned was officially notified that he would be prosecuted, or the date when preliminary investigations were opened. 'Charge', for the purposes of A 6(1), could be defined as 'the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he had committed a criminal offence'. Having been unable to ascertain as from what moment the applicants officially learnt of the investigation or began to be affected by it, the Court took as the starting point for the 'time' the date of 1 January 1961. The appropriate date for the commencement of the Cologne proceedings was the date of service of the warrant, 11 May 1967. In criminal matters, the period governed by A 6(1) covered the whole of the proceedings in issue, including appeal proceedings. In the event of conviction, there was no 'determination ... of any criminal charge', within the meaning of A 6(1) as long as the sentence was not definitively fixed. Consequently, the period to be taken into account ended on 23 January 1978 when the Koblenz Court of Appeal delivered its judgments upholding the cumulative sentences pronounced by the Regional Court on 24 November 1977. The Cologne proceedings came to a close on 21 September 1977 when the Regional Court ordered discontinuance of prosecution. The length of time to be examined under A 6(1) amounted to seventeen years and three weeks as regards the Trier proceedings and ten years, four months and ten days as regards the Cologne proceedings. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in each instance according to the particular circumstances. Regard was had to the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicants and the conduct of the judicial authorities. There was some complexity in the Trier proceedings. The applicants had added to the delay by resorting to actions such as the systematic recourse to challenge of judges. A 6 did not require applicants actively to co-operate with the judicial authorities. Nor could they be reproached for having made full use of the remedies available under the domestic law. The competent authorities did not act with the necessary diligence and expedition. The difficulties of the investigation and the behaviour of the applicants did not on their own account for the length of the proceedings: one of the principal causes was to be found in the manner in which the judicial authorities conducted the case. Having regard to the length of the delays attributable to the State, the reduction of sentence that the Regional Court stated it was granting to the applicants was not capable of divesting the latter of their entitlement to claim to be victims. Accordingly, the Government's preliminary plea was rejected. The Trier proceedings exceeded a reasonable time in breach of A 6(1). The case investigated and tried at Cologne was particularly difficult and complex. The applicants slowed down the progress of the proceedings by making numerous applications and appeals, often accompanied by requests for an extension of the time limit for the filing of written pleadings. The competent authorities did not act with the necessary diligence and expedition. The difficulties of investigation and the behaviour of the applicants did not on their own account for the length of the proceedings. The discontinuance of the prosecutions, ordered by the Regional Court on 21 September 1977 with the consent of the applicants, was in principle capable of affecting their entitlement to claim to be 'victims', but the length of the delays attributable to the authorities was such that the applicants did not lose their status as 'victims'. Accordingly, the Government's preliminary plea was rejected. The Cologne proceedings had exceeded a reasonable time in breach of A 6(1).

Edificaciones March Gallego SA v Spain 98/10

[Application lodged 19.5.1995; Commission report 26.11.1996; Court Judgment 19.2.1998]

Edificaciones March Gallego SA was a public limited company whose sole director was Mr Federico March Olmos. On 11 December 1989 proceedings for payment were brought against the applicant company and, as guarantor, Mr March in the Valencia Court of First Instance by another company, Manuel Codesido Marí SL, which claimed the sum of ESP 4,367,842 on a bill of exchange. The Valencia Court of First Instance and the Valencia Audiencia provincial refused the applicant company's subsequent application to have the proceedings set aside: Mr March's name had appeared in the application, as a result of error, rather than that of the applicant company. The Constitutional Court dismissed the applicant company's appeal holding that there had not been merely a rectifiable error in the identification of the persons who had applied to set aside, but a want of diligence that could not be remedied. The applicant company complained that the courts' refusal to rectify the clerical error in the application to set aside was a breach of fair trial.

The Court's task was not to take the place of the domestic courts. It was primarily for the national authorities to resolve problems of interpretation of domestic legislation. The Court's role was confined to ascertaining whether the effects of such an interpretation were compatible with the Convention. From the Court's case-law, the 'right to a court', of which the right of access was one aspect, was not absolute. It called for regulation by the State, which enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in this regard. However, any limitations should not restrict or reduce a person's access in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right was impaired. In addition, limitations would not be compatible with A 6(1) if they did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved. In the present case the inadmissibility of the application to set aside was the result of an inaccurate reference to the party bringing the application, a mistake which could not subsequently be remedied. The applicant company, the only party to appear, was therefore deprived of the possibility of itself applying to set aside, as the time limits were mandatory and no extensions of time could be granted. The inadmissibility of the application complained of by the applicant company was thus the result of an avoidable mistake at the time it was submitted. Regard had to be had to the special character of the proceedings in question, which by their formal nature were designed solely to secure summary payment of a debt acknowledged by the debtors and recorded in the form of a bill of exchange duly signed. As such proceedings were not designed to determine the merits of the claim, the strict time limits attending them served exclusively to speed up payment of the sums in issue. The applicant company had not suffered any interference with its right of access to a court and there had therefore been no violation of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 20.9.1985; Commission report 11.10.1990; Court Judgment 26.3.1992]

The applicant company was formed to produce an industrial products publication. It applied to the Joint Committee on Press Publications and Press Agencies on 21 October 1960 for registration to secure tax concessions and preferential postage charges accorded to the press. The application was refused as were two further applications in 1961 and 1964. No reply was received to a fourth application lodged in 1970. The applicant ceased trading in 1974. In November 1976, after an application for compensation to the Minister had been ignored, the applicant commenced proceedings. The Administrative Court dismissed the application on 27 April 1981. An appeal to the Conseil d'Etat was dismissed on 22 March 1985. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Commission found by a majority V 6(1).

Court held unanimously V 6(1).

The Court held that A 6(1) extended to disputes over civil rights which could be said, arguably, to be recognised under domestic law. In this case the parties agreed that a dispute existed, but disagreed as to the subject matter. The government argued that it concerned rules relating to the granting of tax concessions. The Court accepted the applicant's argument that the dispute concerned the liability of authorities for injury caused to the applicant. The subject matter of the applicant's action was pecuniary in nature and the action was founded on an infringement of pecuniary rights. The right was a civil right notwithstanding the origin of the dispute and the fact that the administrative courts had jurisdiction. Accordingly, A 6(1) applied. The period in question had lasted from 12 November 1976 to 22 March 1985. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was not particularly complex and the applicant company had not delayed it; on the contrary, it had made repeated attempts to compel the ministries to submit their arguments more rapidly. The lapse of over 8 years was not reasonable.

Pecuniary claim not allowed, as no causal connection between violation and dismissal of applicant's action by national courts. Costs and expenses (FF 50,000).

Edwards v United Kingdom (1993) 15 EHRR 417 92/80

[Application lodged 29.9.1986; Commission report 10.7.1991; Court Judgment 16.12.1992]

On 9 November 1984 Derek Edwards was convicted of robbery and burglary and sentenced to imprisonment. The evidence against the applicant consisted of detailed oral admissions that he had allegedly made to the police concerning his involvement in the offences. His defence at trial was that the statements had been concocted by the police. The applicant submitted to the Court of Appeal that the verdict should be set aside as unsafe and unsatisfactory because of certain shortcomings in the prosecution case, in particular, that certain information had been withheld by the police. He claimed that the police had shown two volumes of photographs of possible burglars (including a photograph of the applicant) to the elderly victim of the robbery. Her statement, read to the jury, said that she thought she would be able to recognise her assailant yet she did not pick out the applicant from the photographs. That fact had not been indicated to the applicant before or during his trial. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The applicant complained that he had not received a fair trial, in particular, that he was denied the right to cross-examine police witnesses on the basis of the new evidence. He further complained that he was denied an effective remedy in respect of his complaints in breach of A 13.

Comm found by majority (8–6) NV 6(1)+6(3)(d), (12–2) no separate issue under 13.

Court found by majority (7–2) NV 6, unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr C Russo, Mr J de Meyer (d), Mr I Foighel, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland.

The guarantees in A 6(3) were specific aspects of the right to a fair trial in A 6(1). It was unnecessary in the present case to examine the relevance of A 6(3)(d) as the applicant's allegations amounted to a complaint that the proceedings have been unfair. It was not within the province of the European Court to substitute its own assessment of the facts for that of the domestic courts and, as a general rule, it was for those courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task was to ascertain whether the proceedings in their entirety, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair. The applicant's conviction was based mainly on police evidence, which he contested, that he had confessed to the offences. It subsequently came to light that certain facts had not been disclosed by the police to the defence which would have enabled it to attack the credibility and veracity of police testimony. It was a requirement of fairness under A 6(1) that the prosecution authorities disclosed to the defence all material evidence for or against the accused and the failure to do so in the present case gave rise to a defect in the trial proceedings. However, when that was discovered, the Secretary of State, following an independent police investigation, referred the case to the Court of Appeal which examined the transcript of the trial including the applicant's alleged confession and considered in detail the impact of the new information on the conviction. Before the Court of Appeal the applicant was represented by senior and junior counsel.

The police officers who had given evidence at the trial were not heard by the Court of Appeal. Counsel for the applicant had not made an application for the police officers to be called as witnesses. However, the defects of the original trial were remedied by the subsequent procedure before the Court of Appeal. There was no indication that the proceedings before the Court of Appeal were in any respect unfair. Accordingly there had been no breach of A 6.

Before the Court the applicant accepted that there had been no breach of A 13 and abandoned that complaint. Not necessary therefore for the Court to examine it.

Efstratiou v Greece 99/66

[Application lodged 25.4.1994; Commission report 11.4.1996; Court Judgment 18.12.1996]

Petros and Anastassia Efstratiou and their daughter Sophia were Jehovah's Witnesses. Pacifism was a fundamental tenet of their religion and they were forbidden from conduct or practice associated with war or violence, even indirectly. As a result of an application by her parents, Sophia was exempted from attendance at religious education lessons and Orthodox Mass. In October 1993 she was asked to take part in the National Day celebrations which commemorated the outbreak of war between Greece and Fascist Italy on 28 October 1940. She refused to parade on account of her religious beliefs. She was punished by the school for her failure to attend with two days' suspension. The following year she was again punished with suspension, for one day, on the ground that she had not taken part in the school parade held on 28 October 1994. The applicants complained of the penalties of suspension from school.

Court found by majority (7–2) NV P1A2, NV 9, unanimously NV 3, V 13+P1A2, 13+9, NV 13+3.

The two sentences of P1A2 had to read not only in the light of each other but also, in particular, of A 8, 9 and 10 of the Convention. When applying P1A2, in its ordinary meaning 'convictions', taken on its own, was not synonymous with the words 'opinions' and 'ideas'. It denoted 'views that attained a certain level of cogency, seriousness, cohesion and importance'. Jehovah's Witnesses enjoyed both the status of a 'known religion' and the advantages flowing from that as regards observance. The applicants were therefore entitled to rely on the right to respect for their religious convictions within the meaning of P1A2. P1A2 enjoined the State to respect parents' convictions, religious or philosophical, throughout the entire State education programme. That duty was broad in its extent as it applied not only to the content of education and the manner of its provision but also to the performance of all the 'functions' assumed by the State. 'Respect' meant more than 'acknowledge' or 'take into account'. In addition to a primarily negative undertaking, it implied some positive obligation on the part of the State. Although individual interests on occasion had to be subordinated to those of a group, democracy did not simply mean that the views of a majority must always prevail: a balance had to be achieved which ensured the fair and proper treatment of minorities and avoided any abuse of a dominant position. Given the discretion of a State, the second sentence of P1A2 forbade the State pursuing an aim of indoctrination that might be regarded as not respecting parents' religious and philosophical convictions. That was a limit that should not be exceeded. The imposition of disciplinary penalties was an integral part of the process whereby a school could achieve the object for which it was established, including the development and moulding of the character and mental powers of its pupils. There was nothing, either in the purpose of the parade or in the arrangements for it, which could offend the applicants' pacifist convictions to an extent prohibited by the second sentence of P1A2. Such commemorations of national events served, in their way, both pacifist objectives and the public interest. The presence of military representatives at some of the parades which took place did not in itself alter the nature of the parades. Furthermore, the obligation on the pupil did not deprive her parents of their right 'to enlighten and advise their children, to exercise with regard to their children natural parental functions as educators, or to guide their children on a path in line with the parents' own religious or philosophical convictions'. The Court could not rule on the expediency of other educational methods which, in the applicants' view, would be better suited to the aim of perpetuating historical memory among the younger generation. However, the penalty of suspension, which could not be regarded as an exclusively educational measure and might have some psychological impact on the pupil on whom it is imposed, was nevertheless of limited duration and did not require the exclusion of the pupil from the school premises. There had not therefore been a breach of P1A2.

The obligation to take part in the school parade was not such as to offend her parents' religious convictions. The impugned measure did not therefore amount to an interference with her right to freedom of religion.

Ill-treatment had to attain a minimum level of severity to fall within the scope of A 3. There had been no infringement of that provision.

The conclusions on the substantive articles did not mean that the allegations of failure to comply with P1A2 and A 9 were not arguable. They were arguable and the applicants were therefore entitled to have a remedy in order to raise their allegations. As regards the complaint under A 3, on which Miss Efstratiou did not expand, it contained no arguable allegation of a breach. It was not possible to apply to the Greek administrative courts for judicial review. The applicants could not therefore obtain a judicial decision that the disciplinary measure of suspension from school was unlawful. Such a decision, however, was a prerequisite for submitting a claim for compensation. The effectiveness of other remedies relied on by the Government had not been established. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case the applicants did not have an effective remedy before a national authority in order to raise the complaints they later submitted at Strasbourg. There had consequently been a breach of A 13 taken together with P1A2 and A 9, but not taken together with A 3.

Judgment constituted just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (GRD 600,000).

Ekbatani v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 504 88/6

[Application lodged 20.6.1983; Commission report 7.10.1986; Court Judgment 26.5.1988]

Mr John Ekbatani, the applicant, was a US citizen living and working in Sweden. Following an incident between him and the traffic assistant who had been in charge of his driving test, he was charged with threatening a civil servant. During the trial before the City Court of Gothenburg in February 1982, both the applicant and the traffic assistant were heard. The applicant was found guilty and fined. The applicant appealed to the Court of Appeal. In October 1982, the Court of Appeal informed the parties that, as the case might be determined without a hearing, they were invited to file their final submissions in writing. The parties made submissions; the public prosecutor had no objection to the case being determined without a hearing but the applicant sought a hearing for a re-examination of the case. The Court of Appeal did not hold a hearing and in its judgment of November 1982 simply stated that it confirmed the City Court's judgment. The applicant's appeal to the Supreme Court was refused. The applicant complained that, in breach of A 6(1), the Court of Appeal had decided his case without a hearing.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (d), Mr G Lagergren (declaration), Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr F Matscher (d), Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (d), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos.

It was not disputed that A 6(1) was applicable to the proceedings brought against the applicant including those before the Court of Appeal. The protection afforded by A 6 did not cease with the decision at first instance. The Court held that with regard to proceedings at first instance a person charged with a criminal offence should, as a general principle, be entitled to be present at the trial hearing, a requirement satisfied in this case by the City Court. However, he did not receive such a hearing before the Court of Appeal. The manner of application of A 6 to proceedings before courts of appeal depended on the special features of the proceedings involved; account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings in the domestic legal order and of the role of the appellate court therein. In this case the question was whether a departure from the principle that there should be a public hearing at which the accused has the right to be present and argue his case, could, in regard to the proceedings before the Court of Appeal, be justified in the circumstances of the present case by the special features of the domestic proceedings viewed as a whole. It was true that the Court of Appeal observed the principle of 'equality of arms': neither the applicant nor the prosecutor was allowed to appear in person and both were given equal opportunities to present their cases in writing. However, observance of this principle was not decisive, as it was only one feature of the wider concept of a fair trial in criminal proceedings. The Court restated that, provided that there has been a public hearing at first instance, the absence of public hearings at second or third instance may be justified by the special features of the proceedings at issue, eg, leave to appeal proceedings and those involving only questions of law, as opposed to questions of fact, may comply with the requirements of A 6, even though the appellant was not given an opportunity of being heard in person by the appeal court. However, in this case the Court of Appeal was called upon to examine the case as to the facts and the law. In particular, it had to make a full assessment of the question of the applicant's guilt or innocence. The only limitation on its jurisdiction was that it did not have the power to increase the sentence imposed. In the circumstances of the case that matter in question could not, as a matter of fair trial, have been properly determined without a direct assessment of the evidence given in person by the applicant and by the complainant. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal's re-examination of the applicant's conviction at first instance ought to have comprised a full rehearing of the applicant and the complainant. The limitations on the Court of Appeal's powers as a result of the prohibition of 'reformatio in pejus' related only to sentencing. They could not be considered to be relevant to the principal issue before the Court of Appeal, namely the question of guilt or innocence. Neither could the fact that the case-file was available to the public. Having regard to the entirety of the proceedings before the Swedish courts, to the role of the Court of Appeal, and to the nature of the issue submitted to it, there were no special features to justify a denial of a public hearing and of the applicant's right to be heard in person. Accordingly, there was a violation of A 6(1).

Ekinci v Turkey 00/183

[Application lodged 3.10.1994; Court Judgment 18.12.2000]

Mr Seho Ekinci's brother, Nuri Ekinci, was an official in a pro-Kurdish political party. On 16 February 1994 he was killed in the centre of his village. The police attended and an investigation was conducted, but they were unable to find a perpetrator. The applicant complained that his brother, Nuri, was killed by or with the connivance of the law-enforcement agencies because of his political activities and that no effective investigation was carried out with a view to solving the murder.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found NV 2.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge.

Regarding the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion, a civil action for damages in respect of unlawful acts by agents of the State presupposed that the person responsible for the harm had been identified, which was not so in the present case, and it had not been shown that an administrative remedy would be effective in a comparable situation to the appellant's.

On the evidence adduced, it was impossible to establish beyond reasonable doubt that the authorities had any responsibility for the murder of the applicant's brother. The investigations aimed at finding the killer were carried out both at the preliminary investigation stage and afterwards. The possibility that the village guards might be involved was investigated. The authorities could not be accused of having remained passive or having carried out an ineffective investigation.

El Boujaïdi v France 97/73

[Application lodged 7.11.1994; Commission report 26.6.1996; Court Judgment 26.9.1997]

Mr Abderrahim El Boujaïdi was a Moroccan national. In 1974 he went with his mother, his three sisters and his brother to join his father in France. He went to school in France, where he also worked for several years. On 24 March 1988 the Saint-Etienne Criminal Court sentenced the applicant to three years' imprisonment for drug trafficking, to run concurrently with another sentence of thirty months' imprisonment imposed by the Annecy Criminal Court on 25 September 1987 for dealing in heroin, and ordered him to pay customs fines. The Criminal Court further imposed a permanent exclusion order on the applicant. On appeal by the prosecution, the Lyons Court of Appeal, in a judgment of 12 January 1989, increased the applicant's sentence to six years' imprisonment, and confirmed the permanent exclusion order. Following his release from custody he committed a further offence and was convicted and sentenced for robbery. His three applications to have the order permanently excluding him from French territory rescinded were dismissed. In his third application, on 22 July 1993, he pleaded changes in his personal circumstances, namely the fact that he was living with a Frenchwoman, Mrs M, and was the father of their child. On 26 August 1993 the exclusion order was enforced. On 20 October 1993, at the French Consulate in Fez, the applicant recognised paternity of Mrs M's child. In a judgment of 16 December 1993 the Lyons Court of Appeal refused the application to have the exclusion order rescinded. His appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed. The applicant claimed that his permanent exclusion from French territory was in breach of A 8 of the Convention.

Comm found by majority (11–2) NV 8.

Court found by majority (8–1) NV 8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R MacDonald, Mr C Russo, Mr I Foighel (d), Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr E Levits.

The question whether the applicant had a private and family life within the meaning of A 8 had to be determined in the light of the position when the exclusion order became final. That meant in this case, at the beginning of 1989, the applicant could not therefore plead his relationship with Mrs M and the fact that he was the father of her child, since those circumstances came into being long after that date. However, he arrived in France at the age of 7 and lived there until 26 August 1993. He received most of his schooling there and worked there for several years. In addition, his parents, his three sisters and his brother lived there. Consequently, the enforcement of the exclusion order amounted to interference with the applicant's right to respect for his private and family life. The permanent exclusion order was in accordance with the law being based on the Public Health Code. The interference sought to achieve aims compatible with the Convention, namely the prevention of disorder or crime. It was for the Contracting States to maintain public order, in particular by exercising their right to control the entry and residence of aliens and to order the expulsion of aliens convicted of criminal offences. However, their decisions had to be necessary in a democratic society, that was to say, justified by a pressing social need and, in particular, proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The applicant arrived in France at the age of 7, lived there lawfully, received most of his education there, worked there and his parents and siblings lived there. He did not claim not to know Arabic or that he had never returned to Morocco before the exclusion order. He had never shown any desire to acquire French nationality. Accordingly, even though most of his family and social ties were in France, it had not been established that he had lost all links with his country of origin other than his nationality. In addition, he had a previous conviction for heroin dealing in 1987 and continued to commit criminal offences on his release when he was unlawfully present in France. The seriousness of the offence and his subsequent conduct counted heavily against him. In the circumstances, the enforcement of the order for the applicant's permanent exclusion from French territory was not disproportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. There had accordingly been no breach of A 8.

Elsholz v Germany 00/180

[Application lodged 31.10.1994; Commission report 1.3.1999; Court Judgment 13.7.2000]

Mr Egbert Elsholz was the father of child C, born out of wedlock on 13 December 1986. On 9 January 1987 he acknowledged paternity and undertook to pay maintenance for C. After the mother of C moved out of the home, he continued to see his son frequently until July 1991. When questioned by an official of the Erkrath Youth Office at his home in December 1991, C stated that he did not wish to have further contacts with the applicant. The applicant's application to the Mettmann District Court for access was dismissed on 4 December 1992. His further application in 1993 for access was also dismissed. On 21 January 1994, the Wuppertal Regional Court, without a hearing, dismissed the applicant's appeal. On 19 April 1994, a panel of three judges of the Federal Constitutional Court refused to entertain the applicant's constitutional complaint. The applicant alleged that the refusal to grant him access to his son amounted to a breach of A 8, that, as the father of a child born out of wedlock, he had been the victim of discrimination contrary to A 14 taken together with A 8 and that, under A 6(1), the proceedings before the German courts were unfair.

Comm found by majority (15–12) V 14+8, no separate issue regarding A 8 taken alone, (17–10) V 6 (1).

Court found by majority (13–4) V 8, unanimously NV 14+8, (13–4) V 6(1).

The notion of family under A 8 was not confined to marriage-based relationships and could encompass other de facto 'family' ties where the parties were living together out of wedlock. A child born out of such a relationship was ipso jure part of that 'family' unit from the moment and by the very fact of his birth. Thus, there existed between the child and his parents a bond amounting to family life. The mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted a fundamental element of family life, even if the relationship between the parents had broken down, and domestic measures hindering such enjoyment amounted to an interference with the right protected by A 8. The decisions refusing the applicant access to his son interfered with the exercise of his right to respect for his family life as guaranteed by A 8(1). The relevant decisions had a basis in national law, namely, Article 1711(2) of the Civil Code as in force at the relevant time. The court decisions were clearly aimed at protecting the health or morals and the rights and freedoms of the child. Accordingly, they pursued legitimate aims within the meaning of A 8(2). In determining whether the impugned measure was necessary in a democratic society, the Court considered whether, in the light of the case as a whole, the reasons adduced to justify the measure were relevant and sufficient for the purposes of A 8(2). The competent national courts, when refusing the applicant's request for a visiting arrangement, relied on the statements made by the child, questioned by the District Court at the age of about five and six years, took into account the strained relations between the parents, considering that it did not matter who was responsible for the tensions, and found that any further contact would negatively affect the child. Those reasons were relevant. However, it had to be determined whether, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case and notably the importance of the decisions to be taken, the applicant had been involved in the decision-making process, seen as a whole, to a degree sufficient to provide him with the requisite protection of his interests. The reasons given by the District Court were insufficient to explain why, in the particular circumstances of the case, expert advice was not considered necessary, as recommended by the Erkrath Youth Office. Moreover, taking into account the importance of the subject-matter, namely, the relations between a father and his child, the Regional Court should not have been satisfied, in the circumstances, by relying on the file and the written appeal submissions without having at its disposal psychological expert evidence in order to evaluate the child's statements. The combination of the refusal to order an independent psychological report and the absence of a hearing before the Regional Court revealed an insufficient involvement of the applicant in the decision-making process. Therefore the national authorities overstepped their margin of appreciation, thereby violating the applicant's rights under A 8.

The Court did not find it necessary to consider whether the former German legislation as such, namely, A 1711(2) of the Civil Code, made an unjustifiable distinction between fathers of children born out of wedlock and divorced fathers, such as to be discriminatory within the meaning of A 14, since the application of that provision in the present case did not appear to have led to a different approach than would have ensued in the case of a divorced couple. The courts' decisions were clearly based on the danger to the child's development if he had to take up contact with the applicant contrary to the will of the mother. The risk to the child's welfare was thus the paramount consideration. Consequently, it could not be said on the facts of the present case that a divorced father would have been treated more favourably. There had accordingly been no violation of A 14 in conjunction with A 8.

The admissibility of evidence was primarily a matter for regulation by national law and, as a general rule, it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task under the Convention was rather to ascertain whether the proceedings as a whole, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair. Having regard to the findings with respect to A 8, the Court considered that, in the present case, because of the lack of psychological expert evidence and the circumstance that the Regional Court did not conduct a further hearing, although the applicant's appeal raised questions of fact and law which could not adequately be resolved on the basis of the written material at the disposal of the Regional Court, the proceedings, taken as a whole, did not satisfy the requirements of a fair and public hearing within the meaning of A 6(1). There has thus been a breach of that provision.

[Applications lodged 6.7.1971, 31.5.1971, 19.12.1971, 29.12.1971; Commission report 19.7.1974; Court Judgment 8.6.1976 (merits), 23.11.1976 (A 50)]

forces. On separate occasions, various penalties had been passed on them by their respective commanding officers for offences against military discipline. The applicants had appealed to the complaints officer and finally to the Supreme Military Court which in substance confirmed the decisions challenged but, in two cases, reduced the punishment imposed. They complained that the penalties imposed on them constituted deprivation of liberty contrary to A 5, that the proceedings before the military authorities and the Supreme Military Court were not in accordance with the requirements of A 6 and that the manner in which they were treated was discriminatory. Mr Engel also alleged a separate breach of A 5 in connection with his provisional arrest. Mr Dona and Mr Schul contended that their interim custody had been in disregard of A 5 and that the punishment imposed on them for having published and distributed articles deemed to undermine military discipline had contravened A 10, 11, 14, 17 and 18.

Comm found by majority (11 with one abstention) NV 5 regarding the light arrest of Mr Engel and Mr van der Wiel, by various majorities V 5(1) regarding the other disciplinary punishments complained of by Mr Engel, Mr de Wit, Mr Dona and Mr Schul, (11 with one abstention) V 5(4) in that the appeals had not been decided speedily, (11 with one member absent) V 5(1) regarding Mr Engel's provisional arrest under Article 44 of the 1903 Act, (10–1 with one member absent) 6 not applicable to any of the disciplinary proceedings concerned, by various majorities NV 10, 11, 17 or 18 in the cases of Mr Dona and Mr Schul and NV 5 in respect of their interim custody, by various majorities NV 14+5, 14+6, 14+10.

Court found unanimously 5 not applicable to the light arrest of Mr Engel (second punishment) and of Mr van der Wiel, by majority (12–1) 5 not applicable to the aggravated arrest of Mr de Wit, or to the interim aggravated arrest of Mr Dona and Mr Schul, (11–2) NV 5(1) regarding the committal of Mr Dona and Mr Schul to a disciplinary unit, (9–4) V 5(1) regarding the whole period of Mr Engel's provisional strict arrest, (10–3) V 5(1) regarding Mr Engel's strict arrest exceeding 24 hours, unanimously NV 14+5(1) regarding the committal of Mr Dona and Mr Schul to a disciplinary unit and Mr Engel's provisional arrest, (12–1) NV 5(4) regarding the committal of Mr Dona and Mr Schul to a disciplinary unit, (11–2) 6 not applicable to Mr Engel and Mr van der Wiel on the ground of the words criminal charge or civil rights and obligations, (11–2) V 6(1) in the case of Mr de Wit, Mr Dona and Mr Schul insofar as hearings before the Supreme Military Court took place in camera, unanimously NV 6(2) in the case of Mr Dona and Mr Schul, unanimously NV 6(3)(b) in the case of Mr de Wit, Mr Dona and Mr Schul, (9–4) NV 6(3)(c) in the case of those three applicants, (9–4) NV 6(3)(d) in the case of Mr de Wit, (12–1) NV 6(3)(d) in the case of Mr Dona and Mr Schul, unanimously NV 14+6 in the case of Mr de Wit, Mr Dona and Mr Schul, unanimously no need to rule on 18+6 in the complaint of Mr Dona and Mr Schul, unanimously NV 10, 14+10, 17+10 or 18+10 in the case of Mr Dona and Mr Schul, unanimously NV 11 in the case of Mr Dona and Mr Schul.

Judges (A 50): Composition as above, separate opinions from Mr Ganshof van der Meersch, Mr Evrigenis and Mrs Bindschedler-Robert.

Military discipline did not fall outside the scope of A 5(1). That provision had to be read in the light of A 1 and 14, and the list of deprivations of liberty set out in the Article was exhaustive. A disciplinary penalty or measure could in consequence constitute a breach of A 5(1). The right to liberty was contemplating individual liberty, the physical liberty of the person. Its aim was to ensure that no one should be dispossessed of this liberty in an arbitrary fashion and it did not concern mere restrictions upon liberty of movement. Military service did not on its own, in any way constitute a deprivation of liberty under the Convention, since it was expressly sanctioned in A 4(3)(b). Wide limitations upon the freedom of movement of the members of the armed forces were entailed by reason of the specific demands of military service so that the normal restrictions accompanying it did not come within the ambit of A 5 either. Each State was competent to organise its own system of military discipline and enjoyed in the matter a certain margin of appreciation. The bounds that A 5 required the State not to exceed were not identical for servicemen and civilians. A disciplinary penalty or measure which on analysis would unquestionably be deemed a deprivation of liberty were it to be applied to a civilian may not possess this characteristic when imposed upon a serviceman. Nevertheless, such penalty or measure did not escape the terms of A 5 when it took the form of restrictions that clearly deviated from the normal conditions of life within the armed forces of the Contracting States. In order to establish whether this was so, account had to be taken of a whole range of factors such as the nature, duration, effects and manner of execution of the penalty or measure in question. No deprivation of liberty resulted from the three to four days' light arrest awarded respectively against Mr Engel and Mr van der Wiel. Aggravated arrest differed from light arrest on one point alone: in off-duty hours, soldiers served the arrest in a specially designated place which they could not leave, but they were not kept under lock and key. Consequently, the Court did not consider as a deprivation of liberty the 12 days' aggravated arrest complained of by Mr de Wit. Strict arrest differed in that the person was locked in a cell day and night and was excluded from the performance of their normal duties. It thus involved deprivation of liberty. Therefore, the provisional arrest inflicted on Mr Engel in the form of strict arrest had the same character despite its short duration. Committal to a disciplinary unit, applied in 1971 to Mr Dona and Mr Schul, represented the most severe penalty under military disciplinary law in The Netherlands. The committal lasted for a period of three to six months and Mr Dona and Mr Schul spent the night locked in a cell. In those circumstances, deprivation of liberty occurred.

A 14 and 5: A distinction based on rank could run counter to A 14. A distinction that concerned the manner of execution of a penalty or measure occasioning deprivation of liberty did not on that account fall outside the ambit of A 14. The hierarchical structure inherent in armies entailed differentiation according to rank. Corresponding to the various ranks were differing responsibilities which in their turn justified certain inequalities of treatment in the disciplinary sphere. Based on an element objective in itself, that is, rank, those distinctions could have been dictated by a legitimate aim, namely the preservation of discipline by methods suited to each category of servicemen. On the whole, the legislator did not seem in the circumstances to have abused the latitude left to him by the Convention and the principle of proportionality had not been offended in the present case. Inequalities of treatment between servicemen and civilians did not result in any discrimination incompatible with the Convention, the conditions and demands of military life being by nature different from those of civil. There was therefore no breach of A 5(1) and 14 taken together.

A 5(4): the committal of Mr Dona and Mr Schul to a disciplinary unit ensued from their conviction by a competent court. While A 5(4) obliged the Contracting States to make available a right of recourse to a court when the decision depriving a person of his liberty was one taken by an administrative body, there was nothing to indicate that the same applied when the decision was made by a court at the close of judicial proceedings. Therefore, there was no breach of A 5(4) in the case of Mr Dona and Mr Schul.

A 6: regarding the applicability of A 6, the word 'charge' had to be understood within the meaning of the Convention. The definition of the offence according to the legal system of the respondent State provided no more than a starting point. The very nature of the offence was a factor of greater importance. In addition, regard had to be had to the degree of severity of the penalty that the person concerned risked incurring. In a society subscribing to the rule of law, there belonged to the 'criminal' sphere deprivations of liberty liable to be imposed as a punishment, except those which by their nature, duration or manner of execution could not be appreciably detrimental. The seriousness of what was at stake, the traditions of the Contracting States and the importance attached by the Convention to respect for the physical liberty of the person all required that that should be so. As Mr Dona and Mr Schul were the subject of 'criminal charges', A 6 applied to them in its entirety. Mr Engel was not 'charged with a criminal offence', therefore the proceedings brought against him were occasioned solely by offences against military discipline. The Supreme Military Court constituted an independent and impartial tribunal established by law and there was nothing to indicate that it failed to give the applicants a fair hearing. The time that elapsed between the charge and the final decision appeared reasonable. The sentence was pronounced publicly. However, the hearings in the presence of the parties had taken place in camera in accordance with the established practice of the Supreme Military Court in disciplinary proceedings. A 6(1) required in a very general fashion that judicial proceedings be conducted in public. None of the exceptions listed in A 6(1) were raised. Hence, on that point, there had been violation of A 6(1).

A 6(2) dealt only with the proof of guilt and not with the kind or level of punishment. It was for the sole purpose of determining their punishment in the light of their character and previous record that the court also took into consideration certain similar, established facts the truth of which they did not challenge. The court did not punish them for those facts in themselves.

The allegations of Mr de Wit, Mr Dona and Mr Schul regarding A 6(3) were too vague to lead the Court to conclude that there had been a breach of A 6(3)(b), there was no interference with the right protected by A 6(3)(c) and no evidence of a breach of A 6(3)(d).

A 14 and 6: Whilst military disciplinary procedure was not attended by the same guarantees as criminal proceedings brought against civilians, it offered on the other hand substantial advantages to those subject to it. The distinctions between military disciplinary procedure and criminal proceedings in the legislation of the Contracting States were explicable by the differences between the conditions of military and of civil life. They could not be taken as entailing a discrimination against members of the armed forces, within the meaning of A 6 and 14 taken together.

A 6 and 18: The Court's conclusions on the applicability and observance of A 6 in the case of Mr Dona and Mr Schul made it unnecessary for it to rule on the complaint under A 6 and 18 taken together.

A 10: Regarding the disciplinary punishment undergone by the applicants for having collaborated in the publication and distribution of 'Alarm', the disputed penalty represented an interference with the exercise of the freedom of expression of Mr Dona and Mr Schul. The penalty was prescribed by law. The treatment was aimed at the prevention of disorder. The applicants contributed to the publication and distribution of a writing at a time when the atmosphere in the barracks was somewhat strained. In those circumstances the Supreme Military Court may have had well-founded reasons for considering that they had attempted to undermine military discipline and that it was necessary for the prevention of disorder to impose the penalty inflicted. There was thus no question of depriving them of their freedom of expression but only of punishing the abusive exercise of that freedom on their part. Consequently, it did not appear that its decision infringed A 10(2).

A 14 and 10: The distinction at issue was explicable by the differences between the conditions of military and of civil life and, more specifically, by the duties and responsibilities peculiar to members of the armed forces in the field of freedom of expression. In principle it was not the Court's function to compare different decisions of national courts, even if given in apparently similar proceedings; it had to respect the independence of those courts. Such a decision would actually become discriminatory in character if it were to depart from others to the point of constituting a denial of justice or a manifest abuse, but the information supplied to the Court did not permit a finding of that sort.

A 17 and 10, 18 and 10: This complaint under A 17 and 18 did not support examination since the Court had already concluded that the said limitation was justified under A 10(2).

A 11: Mr Dona and Mr Schul were not punished by reason either of their membership of the of the particular conscript group or of their participation in its activities, including preparation and publication of the journal 'Alarm'. While the Supreme Military Court punished them, it was only because it considered that they had made use of their freedom of expression with a view to undermining military discipline. In view of the absence of any interference with their right under A 11(1), the Court did not have to consider A 11(2) or A 14, 17 and 18.

Englert v Germany (1991) 13 EHRR 392 87/19

[Application lodged 13.10.1982; Commission report 9.10.1985; Court Judgment 25.8.1987]

Mr Joachim Englert, the applicant, was tried for a number of offences. During his trial the Regional Court stayed the proceedings in respect of some charges, and convicted him of others, for which he was sentenced to imprisonment. He was acquitted of one charge. He appealed on points of law against conviction. The Federal Court of Justice set the judgment aside and remitted the case for retrial by a different criminal chamber of the Regional Court. The prosecution applied for the proceedings to be stayed, as the sentence the applicant could expect was almost negligible in comparison with one passed earlier. Defence counsel informed the Regional Court that he could agree on the defendant's behalf to the applicant bearing his own necessary costs and expenses but that his client had no intention of forgoing compensation for his detention on remand. The Regional Court stayed the proceedings and ordered that the costs of the proceedings – but not the applicant's necessary costs and expenses – should be borne by the Treasury. It refused to award the applicant any compensation in respect of his arrest and detention on remand, on the grounds that the circumstances of the case were so overwhelming that a conviction was more likely than an acquittal and that it was his own actions that gave rise to the strong suspicion that he had committed the offence. The applicant complained that the reasons given by the Regional Court offended the principle of the presumption of innocence enshrined in A 6(2).

Comm found unanimously V 6(2).

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection and held by a majority NV 6(2).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona (d), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos.

The Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was rejected. In dismissing the original appeal, the Court of Appeal had stated that the finality of the decision ending the proceedings extended also to the ancillary decisions, including not only the one as to costs and expenses but also the one as to compensation. In addition, the Regional Court itself had stated that its decision as to costs and compensation was final because the order staying the proceedings was unappealable. On the facts, A 26 did not require the applicant to have raised the matter in the Court of Appeal. A 26 required that applicants should, at least in substance, have raised before the domestic courts the complaint they subsequently submit to the Convention institutions. In order for the applicant to be able to complain of a breach of A 6(2) it was first necessary that a remedy should be available, and in the present case this was lacking, given the finality of the Regional Court's decision. The only remedies that A 26 required to be exhausted were those that related to the breaches alleged and that were available and sufficient. While it was possible for the applicant to bring his complaint before the Constitutional Court, such a remedy would not have been effective in the circumstances of the case.

The Court held that no provision of the Convention gave a person charged with a criminal offence a right to reimbursement of his costs or compensation for lawful detention on remand where proceedings taken against him were discontinued. However, a decision refusing such compensation, costs and expenses following the termination of proceedings could raise an issue under A 6(2) if the supporting reasoning amounted in substance to a determination of the accused's guilt without his having previously been proved guilty and, in particular, without his having had an opportunity to exercise the rights of the defence. In the applicant's case, the relevant national provisions required the Regional Court to take into account the state of the proceedings when brought to a close, the conduct of the defendant and the weight of the suspicion still falling on him. The Regional Court refused to award the applicant compensation, costs and expenses, indicating that there were still strong suspicions concerning him, and that he had caused the criminal proceedings to be taken against him by his own behaviour. This decision described a state of suspicion and did not contain any finding of guilt. In addition, the refusal to order compensation, costs and expenses did not amount to a penalty or a measure that could be equated with a penalty. The Regional Court did not impose any sanction but merely refused to order that costs, expenses or compensation should be paid out of public funds. The Regional Court's decision did not offend the presumption of innocence guaranteed to the applicant under A 6(2).

Erdagöz v Turkey 97/82

[Application lodged 1.5.1993; Commission report 23.5.1996; Court Judgment 22.10.1997]

Mr Mehmet Erdagöz, the applicant, was the owner of a shop in Adana. As a result of various incidents, he lodged a complaint with the police against a person he stated had attacked his property. The applicant was suspected of fabricating evidence and the Chief Inspector ordered him to be taken to the security police headquarters and referred to public prosecutor's office. He was released the same day. He lodged a criminal complaint against the chief inspector and deputy inspector, the former he said had drawn up a biased report and the latter had inflicted ill-treatment on him at the police station. At the request of the police a medical examination was undertaken which showed some superficial grazing, bruises and swelling at the knees. The Adana public prosecutor, after conducting an investigation, discontinued the proceedings. The applicant's appeal against the discontinuation order to the Tarsus Assize Court was dismissed and his petition to the Minister of Justice to lodge an appeal was refused. The applicant lodged further complaints which were also discontinued and his applications dismissed on appeal. He complained of ill-treatment inflicted by police officers and of the unlawfulness of his detention in police custody.

Comm found unanimously NV 3, V 5.

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objections, found unanimously NV 3, by majority (7–2) NV 5(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü (jc), Mr F Matscher (jc), Mr L-E Pettiti (jc), Mr J De Meyer, Mr AN Loizou (jpc/pd), Sir John Freeland (jpc/pd), Mr B Repik, Mr J Casadevall.

The compass of the case was delimited not by the Commission report but by the admissibility decision. The Court had full jurisdiction within the limits of the case referred to it and therefore dismissed the Government's plea that the scope of the case should be limited to issues under A 5(1).

A 3: The establishment and verification of facts was primarily a matter for the Commission although the Court was bound by the Commission's findings of fact and remained free to make its own appreciation in the light of all the material before it. Nor was it in principle for the Court to substitute its own view of the facts for those of the domestic courts, whose task it was to assess the evidence adduced before them. There were doubts in this case as to whether the applicant had suffered treatment prohibited by A 3 when he first went to the police station to lodge a complaint about the damage to his shop. Although traces of blows and injuries on the applicant's body were mentioned in the medical report, there was no proof that those lesions were the result of ill-treatment allegedly inflicted by the deputy inspector. Accordingly, the Court found no breach of A 3.

Regarding A 5(1), the Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies had not been submitted to the Commission and it was therefore dismissed on the grounds of estoppel.

The fact that an applicant had not been charged or brought before a court did not necessarily mean that the purpose of his detention was not in accordance with A 5(1)(c). The existence of a purpose had to be considered independently of its achievement and A 5(1)(c) did not presuppose that the police should have obtained sufficient evidence to bring charges, either at the point of arrest or while the applicant was in custody. The object of questioning during detention under A 5(1)(c) was to further the criminal investigation by way of confirming or dispelling the concrete suspicion grounding the arrest. Thus, facts which raised a suspicion need not be of the same level as those necessary to justify a conviction or even the bringing of a charge, which would come at the next stage of the process of criminal investigation. However, for there to be reasonable suspicion there had to be facts or information which would satisfy an objective observer that the person concerned may have committed an offence. In the present case the suspicion reached the required level as it was based on specific facts which showed that the purpose of the deprivation of liberty was to confirm or dispel the suspicion that the applicant had falsely reported a criminal offence and fabricated evidence. Having regard to the applicant's conduct and the nature of the offences in question, there was no reason to disagree with the public prosecutor's finding that the applicant had been detained for twenty-four hours so that the inquiry concerning him could be completed. The deprivation of his liberty was therefore justified under A 5(1)(c) and there had been no breach of that provision.

Erdogdu v Turkey 00/163

[Application lodged 4.11.1994; Commission report 1.3.1999; Court Judgment 15.6.2000]

Mr Ümit Erdogdu was the editor of the fortnightly review 'The Workers' Voice'. In an edition of 2 October 1992, the review published an article written by a reader entitled 'The Kurdish problem is a Turkish problem'. The applicant and the publisher were charged with spreading propaganda against the integrity of the State and the indivisibility of the Turkish nation under the Prevention of Terrorism Act. On 20 December 1993 the National Security Court convicted the applicant and sentenced him to six months' imprisonment and a fine. He appealed to the Court of Cassation which, following enactment of a new law No 4304, reversed the impugned judgment and remitted the case to the National Security Court. On 10 December 1997 the National Security Court deferred sentencing the applicant, ordering that he would be sentenced if, within 3 years from the date of deferral, he was convicted in his capacity as editor of an offence with intent. He complained that his conviction and sentence violated his freedom of expression.

Comm found by majority (25–1) V 10, unanimously NV 7.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 10.

Judges: Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, President, Mr V Butkevych, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mr M Pellonpää, Mrs S Botoucharova, Mr F Gölcüklü (so), ad hoc judge.

The Government's preliminary objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies was rejected.

The applicant's conviction amounted to an interference. The author of the article had sought to provide an explanation for developments in south east Turkey and had expressed his point of view on both the internal and external repercussions. The article had taken the form of a political speech and it was clear that the author had intended to criticise the dominant political ideology of the State and the way in which the authorities were dealing with the Kurdish problem. The phrases criticised by the Government expressed personal and subjective views which could be regarded as reflecting the author's fierce opposition to the official policy applied in the south-east. While there were aspects of the article which lent a degree of virulence to the political criticism contained in it, there was nothing that would have caused readers to gain the impression that recourse to violence was a necessary and justified measure of self-defence against Turkey. The national authorities had not taken sufficient account of the freedom of the press or the right of the public to obtain a different perspective on the Kurdish problem. The deferral of sentence, which only produced its effect if the applicant committed no further offences with intent as an editor for 3 years, was similar to a ban effectively censoring the applicant in the exercise of his profession. The extent of the ban was also unreasonable. There had accordingly been a violation of A 10.

Erdogdu and Ince v Turkey 99/34

[Application lodged 20.8.1994; Commission report 11.12.1997; Court Judgment 8.7.1999]

Mr Ümit Erdogdu was the editor of the monthly review 'Democratic Opposition'. In the January 1992 issue of the review he published an interview which the second applicant, Mr Selami Ince, had conducted with a Turkish sociologist, Dr I B. The applicants were charged under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1991 with having disseminated propaganda against the indivisibility of the State by publishing the interview. They were found guilty by the Istanbul National Security Court. The first applicant was sentenced to five months' imprisonment and a fine of TRL 41,666,666, the second applicant was sentenced to one year and eight months' imprisonment and a fine of the same amount. Their appeals to the Court of Cassation were dismissed. The applicants complained that their convictions resulting from the publication of the incriminated interview unjustifiably interfered with their freedom of thought and freedom of expression and that they had been convicted for an act which had not constituted a criminal offence under national or international law at the time it had been committed given that the relevant provision of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1991 was so vague that it had not enabled them to distinguish between permissible and prohibited behaviour.

Comm found by majority (31–1) V 10, unanimously NV 7.

Court dismissed Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously V 10, NV 7.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm (jc), Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jc), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach (jc), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jc), Mrs HS Greve (jc), Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mr K Traja, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge.

After considering the dates of the various decisions' communications the Court considered that the fact that the applicants' first letter was received by the Commission only four days after the date indicated in the letter did not suggest that the applicants had back-dated that letter. The Court therefore dismissed the Government's preliminary objection of failure to respect the six months' rule.

The complaint under A 6(1) had not been raised before the Commission and could not therefore be considered by the Court.

There had been an interference with the applicants' right to freedom of expression on account of their conviction and sentence under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1991. The interference was prescribed by law. Having regard to the sensitivity of the security situation in south-east Turkey and to the need for the authorities to be alert to acts capable of fuelling additional violence, the measures taken against the applicants could be said to have been in furtherance of certain of the aims of the protection of national security and territorial integrity and the prevention of disorder and crime. The impugned interferences had to be seen in the context of the essential role of the press in ensuring the proper functioning of a political democracy. While the press should not overstep the bounds set, inter alia, for the protection of vital interests of the State such as national security or territorial integrity against the threat of violence or the prevention of disorder or crime, it was nevertheless incumbent on the press to impart information and ideas on political issues, including divisive ones. Not only had the press the task of imparting such information and ideas; the public has a right to receive them. Freedom of the press afforded the public one of the best means of discovering and forming an opinion of the ideas and attitudes of political leaders. In assessing the necessity of the interference there was little scope under A 10(2) for restrictions on political speech or on debate on questions of public interest. Furthermore, the limits of permissible criticism were wider with regard to the government than in relation to a private citizen or even a politician. In a democratic system the actions or omissions of the government had to be subject to the close scrutiny not only of the legislative and judicial authorities but also of public opinion. In addition, the dominant position which the government occupied made it necessary for it to display restraint in resorting to criminal proceedings, particularly where other means were available for replying to the unjustified attacks and criticisms of its adversaries. Nevertheless, it remained open to the competent State authorities to adopt, in their capacity as guarantors of public order, measures, even of a criminal-law nature, intended to react appropriately and without excess to such remarks. Where such remarks constituted incitement to violence against an individual or a public official or a sector of the population, the State authorities enjoyed a wider margin of appreciation when examining the need for an interference with freedom of expression. The content of the interview was of an analytical nature and the text did not contain any passages which could be described as an incitement to violence. The domestic authorities failed to have sufficient regard to the public's right to be informed of a different perspective on the situation in south-east Turkey, irrespective of how unpalatable that perspective might be for them. The reasons given by the Istanbul National Security Court for convicting and sentencing the applicants, although relevant, could not be considered sufficient to justify the interference with their right to freedom of expression. The nature and severity of the penalties imposed were factors to be taken into account when assessing the proportionality of the interference. The duties and responsibilities which accompany the exercise of the right to freedom of expression by media professionals assumed special significance in situations of conflict and tension. Particular caution was called for when consideration was being given to the publication of the views of representatives of organisations which resorted to violence against the State lest the media became a vehicle for the dissemination of hate speech and the promotion of violence. At the same time, where such views could not be categorised as such, Contracting States could not with reference to the protection of territorial integrity or national security or the prevention of crime or disorder restrict the right of the public to be informed of them by bringing the weight of the criminal law to bear on the media. In all the circumstances, the conviction and sentencing of the applicants was disproportionate to the aims pursued and therefore not necessary in a democratic society. There had accordingly been a violation of A 10.

When speaking of 'law' A 7 alluded to the same concept as that to which the Convention referred elsewhere when using that term. In view of its conclusion in respect of the 'prescribed by law' requirement under A 10(2), the Court found that there had been no violation of A 7.

Ergi v Turkey 98/53

Mr Muharrem Ergi brought the application on his own behalf, on behalf of his deceased sister, Havva Ergi, and her young daughter. It concerned complaints relating to an incident on 29 September 1993 in which Havva Ergi was killed. The applicant complained that she had been killed by the security forces and that there had not been an effective investigation. The facts in this case were disputed by the Government.

Comm found unanimously V 2 on account of the planning and conduct of the security forces' operation and the failure to carry out an effective investigation into the death of the applicant's sister, no separate issue under 8, (22–9) no separate issue under 13, unanimously NV 14 or 18, (30–1) Turkey had failed to comply with its obligations under 25.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found unanimously NV 2 regarding death of applicant's sister by security forces, V 2 regarding planning and conduct of the security forces' operation and lack of effective investigation, unanimously not necessary to examine 8, by majority (8–1) V 13 in respect of the applicant and his niece, unanimously NV 14 and 18, (8–1) V 25(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Gölcüklü (pd), Mr An Loizou, Mr Ma Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr B Repik, Mr E Levits, Mr V Toumanov.

The Government was not estopped from raising before the Court their objection as to the validity of the application. However, the application disclosed a genuine and valid exercise of the applicant's right of individual petition under A 25. Therefore, the Government's preliminary objection regarding validity of application was dismissed. The Government failed to submit any observations at the admissibility stage and were therefore estopped from raising their second preliminary objection regarding non-exhaustion of remedies.

A 2 regarding killing of applicant's sister: there were divergent versions as to the circumstances which led to the killing of the applicant's sister. Having regard to the Commission's fact-finding and to its own careful examination of the evidence, the Court considered that there were legitimate doubts as to the origin of the bullet which killed Havva Ergi and the context of the firing. Accordingly, there was an insufficient factual and evidentiary basis on which to conclude that the applicant's sister was, beyond reasonable doubt, intentionally killed by the security forces in the circumstances alleged by the applicant.

Under A 2 of the Convention, read in conjunction with A 1, the State might be required to take certain measures in order to secure an effective enjoyment of the right to life. The responsibility of the State was not confined to circumstances where there was significant evidence that misdirected fire from agents of the State had killed a civilian. It could also be engaged where they failed to take all feasible precautions in the choice of means and methods of a security operation mounted against an opposing group with a view to avoiding and, in any event, to minimising, incidental loss of civilian life. The Court, having regard to the Commission's findings and to its own assessment, and in the light of the failure of the authorities of the respondent State to adduce direct evidence on the planning and conduct of the ambush operation, it could reasonably be inferred that insufficient precautions had been taken to protect the lives of the civilian population.

The obligation to carry out an effective investigation was not confined to cases where it had been established that the killing was caused by an agent of the State. Nor was it decisive whether members of the deceased's family or others had lodged a formal complaint about the killing with the relevant investigatory authority. In the present case, the mere knowledge of the killing on the part of the authorities gave rise ipso facto to an obligation under A 2 to carry out an effective investigation into the circumstances surrounding the death. The Court was struck by the heavy reliance placed by the public prosecutor on the conclusion of the gendarmerie incident report that it was the PKK which had shot the applicant's sister. The public prosecutor had not investigated the circumstances surrounding the killing. Nor was any detailed consideration given by either the district gendarmerie commander or the public prosecutor to verifying whether the security forces had conducted the operation in a proper manner. Therefore, the authorities failed to carry out an effective investigation into the circumstances surrounding the death. Neither the prevalence of violent armed clashes nor the high incidence of fatalities in the region could displace the obligation under A 2 to ensure that an effective, independent investigation was conducted into the deaths arising out of clashes involving the security forces, more so in cases such as the present where the circumstances were in many respects unclear. Therefore, the Turkish authorities failed to protect Havva Ergi's right to life on account of the defects in the planning and conduct of the security forces' operation and the lack of an adequate and effective investigation. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 2.

Before the Commission the applicant alleged on behalf of Havva Ergi's daughter that the killing of her mother had entailed a violation of A 8. He did not pursue that complaint before the Court, which did not therefore deem it necessary to examine the matter of its own motion.

A 13 guaranteed the availability at the national level of a remedy to enforce the substance of the Convention rights and freedoms in whatever form they might happen to be secured in the domestic legal order. The scope of the obligation under A 13 varied depending on the nature of the applicant's complaint under the Convention. Nevertheless, the remedy required by A 13 had to be effective in practice as well as in law. A 13 applied only in respect of grievances under the Convention which were arguable. There was no doubt that the applicant had an arguable claim for the purposes of A 13. The notion of an effective remedy for the purposes of A 13 entailed, in addition to the payment of compensation where appropriate, a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible and including effective access for the relatives to the investigatory procedure. The failure of the authorities to carry out an effective investigation into the circumstances surrounding the death of Havva Ergi undermined the exercise of any remedies the applicant and his niece had at their disposal under Turkish law. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 13.

The Court, on the basis of the facts as established by the Commission, found no violation of A 14 and 18.

The questioning of the applicant by the authorities was not confined to matters regarding his declaration of means. He was asked about the subject matter of his application to the Commission and to provide an explanation concerning any application he might have made. There was no plausible reason as to why the applicant was heard twice by the authorities and why the questioning had been conducted by the anti-terrorism department of the police and the public prosecutor. The applicant must have felt intimidated as a result of his contact with the authorities on those occasions in a manner which unduly interfered with his petition to the Commission. It was of the utmost importance for the effective operation of the system of individual petition instituted by A 25 that an applicant be able to communicate freely with the Commission, without any form of pressure from the authorities to withdraw or modify his or her complaints. The facts of the present case disclosed that the respondent State failed to comply with its obligations under that provision and there had thus been a violation of A 25(1).

Eriksen v Norway (2000) 29 EHRR 328 97/25

Mr Steinar Eriksen was involved in a traffic accident in 1965 in which he suffered serious brain damage. He subsequently showed a distinct tendency to become aggressive as a result of which he spent considerable amounts of time in detention. A psychiatric opinion declared him mentally ill and he was detained in mental hospitals. The State prosecutor sought extension of the applicant's detention from 25 February 1990 under security measures as the prior court authorisation would expire on that date. The District Court agreed to the further detention noting that there was a risk of further offences being committed. The applicant's appeals to the higher courts were all rejected. The applicant continued to be held in solitary confinement. On 14 May 1990 the prosecutor-general withdrew the request for a prolongation of the authorisation to use security measures against the applicant and he was released on 15 May 1990. He committed further offences in July, August and September 1990 and was arrested, convicted and sentenced to further imprisonment. He continued to offend following his release and spent further periods imprisoned. He complained of his detention.

Comm found by majority (12–1) V 5(1), unanimously NV 5(3).

Court found unanimously NV 5(1), NV 5(3).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr R Ryssdal, Mr F Matscher (c), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr I Foighel, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr B Repik (c), Mr E Levits.

A 5(1) contained a list of permissible grounds of deprivation of liberty which was exhaustive. However, the applicability of one ground did not necessarily preclude that of another; a detention could, depending on the circumstances, be justified under more than one sub-paragraph. The lawfulness of the applicant's detention under the Code of Criminal Procedure was considered by the District Court, the High Court and the Supreme Court in seven decisions. In finding the detention justified, the Court was satisfied from a consideration of the Norwegian law that the detention in issue was directly linked to the applicant's initial conviction in 1984 and could therefore be regarded as 'lawful detention after conviction by a competent court' for the purposes of A 5(1)(a). In the exceptional circumstances of the present case, the applicant's detention on remand could also be justified on the basis of paragraph A 5(1)(c) as detention of a person 'when it is reasonably considered necessary to prevent his committing an offence'. In view of the nature and extent of the applicant's previous convictions for threatening behaviour and physical assault and his mental state at the relevant time there were substantial grounds for believing that he would commit further similar offences. As a rule A 5(1)(c) would not provide a justification for the re-detention or continued detention of a person who had served a sentence after conviction of a specific criminal offence where there was a suspicion that he might commit a further similar offence. However, the position was different when a person was detained with a view to determining whether he should be subjected, after expiry of the maximum period prescribed by a court, to a further period of security detention imposed following conviction for a criminal offence. In a situation such as that in the present case, the authorities were entitled, having regard to the applicant's impaired mental state and history as well as to his established and foreseeable propensity for violence, to detain the applicant pending the determination by a court of the Prosecutor's request for a prolongation of the relevant authorisation. Such a 'bridging' detention was of a short duration, was imposed in order to bring the applicant before a judicial authority and was made necessary by the need to obtain updated medical reports on the applicant's mental health as well as by the serious difficulties facing the authorities in arranging preventive supervision outside prison due to the applicant's aggressive conduct and his objection to close supervision. Against that background, the period of detention in question could be seen as closely linked to the original criminal proceedings in 1984 and the resulting conviction and security measures. Accordingly the deprivation of the applicant's liberty from 25 February to 15 May 1990 was justified under both A 5(1)(a) and 5(1)(c). It was not therefore necessary to examine whether A 5(1)(e) also applied.

The expediency of obtaining evidence was primarily a matter for the national authorities and it was not for the Court to substitute its view for theirs in that respect. There was nothing to suggest that the two experts and the medical authority concerned failed to act with a sufficient degree of diligence; nor was there any other indication that the detention exceeded a reasonable time. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 5(3).

Eriksson v Sweden (1990) 12 EHRR 183 89/10

[Application lodged 7.12.1984; Commission report 14.7.1988; Court Judgment 22.6.1989]

Mrs Cecilia Eriksson was granted custody of her children Lisa and Jonas after her divorce from their father. In March 1978 Lisa was taken into care and placed in a foster home. At the time Cecilia Eriksson had personal difficulties having been convicted for dealing in stolen goods and for possession of drugs and sentenced to 14 months' imprisonment. While in prison she went through a religious conversion and she became a member of the Philadelphia Congregation (Pentecostal movement). She complained about the decision of the local authority to prohibit her, for an indefinite period, from removing her daughter from the foster home, restrictions on her access to the child and the failure to reunite them. She also complained about the fairness of proceedings relating to the prohibition on removal and the lack of judicial remedy against the decisions restricting her access to her daughter. She further complained that the prohibitions and restrictions prevented her giving her daughter an education according to the beliefs she held of the Pentecostal movement. She brought the same complaints on behalf of her daughter invoking A 6(1), 8 and 13 and P1A2.

Comm found by majority (8–2) V 6(1) in respect of the claim for access to Lisa, (9–1) V 8 in respect of both applicants, NV regarding other complaints.

Court found unanimously V 8 regarding both applicants, unanimously V 6(1) as regards Cecilia Eriksson and by majority (15–5) V 6(1) as regards Lisa in that no court remedy was available to challenge the restrictions on access, unanimously as regards both applicants not necessary to examine 13, NV 6(1) in respect of other complaints, unanimously NV P1A2 or P1A2+13 regarding Cecilia Eriksson, unanimously Lisa Eriksson not a victim of P1A2 or P1A2+13.

In an application under A 25 of the Convention, the Court's task was not to review the legal provisions and practice in abstracto but to determine whether the manner in which they were applied to or affected the applicants gave rise to a violation of the Convention. The mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted a fundamental element of family life which was not terminated by reason of the fact that the child was taken into public care. The prohibition on removal and its maintenance in force for an unlimited period and the restrictions on access amounted to an interference with the mother's right to respect for family life. The existence of such interference was not affected by the daughter's relationship with her foster parents. The phrase 'in accordance with the law' required, inter alia, that if the law conferred a discretion, its scope and manner of exercise must be indicated with sufficient clarity to afford a measure of protection against arbitrary interference. The national legislation was worded in general terms and conferred a wide measure of discretion. However, it was scarcely feasible to set out in advance all the circumstances in which the removal of a child from a foster home may cause serious risk of harming his physical or mental health. Taking into account the safeguards against arbitrary interference, the scope of discretion conferred on the authorities by the national legislation appeared to be reasonable and acceptable. Nothing in the judgments of the national administrative courts suggested that the prohibition was contrary to law. However the restrictions on access did not have any legal basis and so that interference was not 'in accordance with the law' for the purposes of A 8. The prohibition on removal and the restrictions on access were designed to protect the rights and health of children and thus served a legitimate aim despite the fact that the Court found that the restrictions on access had no basis in domestic law. A mother's right to respect for family life under A 8 included the right to take measures with a view to being reunited with her child. The mother had no enforceable visiting rights while the prohibition on removal was in force. In addition, due to the restrictions on access, she was denied the opportunity to meet with her daughter to an extent and in circumstances likely to promote the aim of reuniting them or developing their relationship. The measures had lasted over 6 years causing great anguish to mother and daughter. Notwithstanding the State's margin of appreciation, the severe and lasting restrictions on access combined with the long duration of the prohibition on removal were not proportionate to the legitimate aims pursued. Those possibilities for the applicants to meet and develop their relationship also constituted an interference with the daughter's right to respect for family life, the reasons as regards the mother applied mutatis mutandis to the daughter. The conduct of the proceedings relating to the prohibition on removal was compatible with A 6(1). The length of the proceedings, 20 months, was not excessive for the purposes of A 6(1). The question of access was distinct from the question of whether or not to uphold the prohibition on removal. Only if sufficient access was permitted would there be real possibilities of having the prohibition on removal lifted. The recourse in the administrative courts in the form of a challenge to the prohibition on removal was not sufficient for the mother's claim for access rights. Accordingly there had been a violation of A 6 on this point. The complaint under Protocol 1 was not substantiated. Having regard to its conclusions regarding A 6(1), the complaint under A 13 was not examined.

Non-pecuniary damage (SEK 200,000 to Cecilia Eriksson, SEK 100,000 to Lisa), costs and expenses (SEK 100,000 to Cecilia Eriksson).

Erkalo v Netherlands 98/72

[Application lodged 12.10.1993; Commission report 2.7.1997; Court Judgment 2.9.1998]

Mr Dawit Shugute Erkalo, an Ethiopian national, was convicted on two counts of manslaughter on 21 June 1990. He was sentenced to placement at the disposal of the government with committal to a psychiatric institution. Due to the applicant's disturbed mental state, his treatment began before he was eligible for early release. The public prosecutor made a request for a one-year extension of the applicant's placement. The applicant was informed of that fact by letter. However, the public prosecutor's request was mistakenly placed in the archives of the court. About three and a half months after receiving the letter of the public prosecutor, the applicant alerted the staff in the psychiatric institution to the fact that he had not received any further information regarding the extension of his placement. The request of the public prosecutor was found and submitted to the court's registry. The Regional Court rejected the applicant's submissions and extended his placement at the government's disposal for another year. The applicant complained that at the end of the statutory period of his placement at the disposal of the government his detention became unlawful; that the decision to extend his placement was not made in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law; that he did not receive a speedy review of the lawfulness of his detention; and that he was unable to appeal against the decision to extend his detention. He relied on A 5(1) and 5(4).

Comm found unanimously V 5(1), NV 5(4), NV 5(4)+13.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (8–1) V 5(1), unanimously not necessary to consider A 5(4) regarding speedy review of his detention, unanimously no examination A 5(4) and A 13 in respect of absence of right of appeal.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek, Mr E Levits (d), Mr P Van Dijk.

The applicant was under the assumption that the public prosecutor had submitted a request for an extension of his placement, which was being processed. In those circumstances, he could not be faulted for failing to institute summary civil proceedings. If the applicant had instituted summary civil proceedings his application would probably have been refused as the decision of the Regional Court was imminent. Accordingly, the Government's preliminary objection was dismissed.

A 5(1) contained a list of permissible grounds of deprivation of liberty that was exhaustive. However, the applicability of one ground did not necessarily preclude that of another; a detention could be justified under more than one sub-paragraph. The applicant was suffering from a mental derangement and had been convicted of manslaughter. His detention during the period under consideration fell within A 5(1)(a) as it resulted from a 'conviction' by a 'competent court' and his placement in a psychiatric institution fell within A 5(1)(e). Although the public prosecutor prepared the request for the extension of the applicant's placement in time, and informed the applicant accordingly, the request did not reach the Regional Court until two months after the expiry of the statutory period. The time limit specified in the criminal code had not therefore been respected. However, domestic case-law recognised that a placement order remained lawful even though the public prosecutor failed to comply with the time limit prescribed by the criminal code. The lawfulness of the extension of the applicant's placement under domestic law was not in itself decisive. It also had to be established that his detention during the period under consideration was in conformity with the purpose of A 5(1), namely to prevent arbitrary deprivation of liberty. As a result of the delay in receipt of the extension of the placement order by the Regional Court, for 82 days the placement of the applicant was not based on any judicial decision. There was a lack of adequate safeguards to ensure that the applicant's release from detention would not be unreasonably delayed. The interests of a person who has been placed by a court at the government's disposal had to be weighed against those of the general public. However, although the relevant authorities were all aware that the applicant's placement was due to expire, none of them took any steps to verify whether the request of the public prosecutor had been received at the registry of the Regional Court and whether a date had been fixed for a hearing on the request. In those circumstances, and in the absence of any adequate safeguards, the public interest involved could not be relied upon as a justification for keeping the applicant in a state of uncertainty for over two and a half months. The onus for ensuring that a request for the extension of a placement order was made and examined in time had to be placed on the competent authorities and not on the person concerned. The detention of the applicant between the date of the expiry of the initial placement order, 3 July 1993, and the date on which the Regional Court rendered its decision, 23 September 1993, was not compatible with the purpose of A 5 and was for that reason unlawful. There had therefore been a breach of A 5(1).

The applicant's arguments under A 5(4) were akin to those under A 5(1) and, in view of its finding of a violation of that provision on account, inter alia, of the lack of a timely decision, it was not necessary to examine the complaint under A 5(4).

The complaint under A 5(4) and 13 raised before the Commission was not maintained before the Court.

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction. Costs and expenses (NLG 6,475).

Erkner and Hofauer v Austria (1987) 9 EHRR 464 87/6

[Application lodged 3.4.1979; Commission report 24.1.1986; Court Judgment 23.4.1987 (merits), 29.9.1987 (A 50)]

The applicants, Johann Erkner (deceased on 22 June 1983), his wife, Theresia Erkner, their son-in-law, Josef Hofauer, and their daughter, Theresia Hofauer, were Austrian farmers. They complained of consolidation proceedings taken in respect of their land.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (11–1) V P1A1.

Court found unanimously V 6(1) regarding the reasonable time requirement, no jurisdiction to consider other complaints under this provision, V P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo.

A 6(1) was applicable in the present case. The complaints regarding an independent and impartial tribunal and public hearing had not been raised as such before the Commission and the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain them.

In civil proceedings, the 'reasonable time' referred to in A 6(1) normally began to run from the moment the action was instituted before the tribunal; it was conceivable, however, that in certain circumstances the time might begin to run earlier. In the present case, the beginning of the period to be taken into consideration was around 10 August 1970. The period under consideration took in the entirety of the proceedings in issue, including any appeals, extending to the decision which disposed of the dispute. In the present case the proceedings were still pending. Consequently, the length of time to be considered exceeded sixteen and a half years (10 August 1970 – 24 March 1987). The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed according to the particular circumstances and having regard to the criteria stated in the case-law of the Court, especially the degree of complexity of the case, the applicants' behaviour and the conduct of the relevant authorities. Land consolidation was by its nature a complex process, in this case it involved 38 landowners and covered 266 hectares and raised issues of fact of considerable complexity. Applicants could not be blamed for making full use of the remedies available to them under domestic law. In the instant case, the remedies resorted to were mostly successful. The applicants were nonetheless responsible for some of the delay. The authorities having initiated the consolidation process of their own motion, having responsibility for its conduct and having decided on a provisional transfer of land were under a special duty to act expeditiously. There were a number of delays attributable to the authorities. As a result of those delays, viewed together and cumulatively, the applicants' case was not heard within a reasonable time as required by A 6(1).

There had been an interference with the applicants' right of property as guaranteed in P1A1. The first sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1 was of a general nature and enunciated the principle of peaceful enjoyment of property; the second sentence of the same paragraph covered deprivation of possessions and made it subject to certain conditions; the second paragraph recognised that States were entitled, amongst other things, to control the use of property in accordance with the public interest. The Court had to consider the applicability of the last two rules before determining whether the first one has been complied with. However, the three rules were not 'distinct' in the sense of being unconnected: the second and third rules were concerned with particular instances of interference with the right to peaceful enjoyment of property and should therefore be construed in the light of the general principle enunciated in the first sentence. The Austrian authorities did not effect either a formal or a de facto expropriation. The transfer carried out in August 1970 was a provisional one and accordingly the applicants could not be said to have been definitively 'deprived of their possessions' within the meaning of the second sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. Nor was the provisional transfer essentially designed to restrict or control the 'use' of the land (second paragraph P1A1) but to achieve an early restructuring of the consolidation area with a view to improved, rational farming by the 'provisional' owners. The transfer had therefore to be considered under the first sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. More than 16 years had elapsed since the provisional transfer without the applicants having received, under a final consolidation plan, the compensation in land provided for by law. The length of proceedings complaint under A 6(1) could be distinguished from the complaint relating to P1A1. In the former case, the question was one of determining whether the length of the consolidation proceedings had exceeded a 'reasonable time', whereas in the latter case their length – whether excessive or not – was material, together with other elements, in determining whether the disputed transfer was compatible with the guarantee of the right of property. The relevant provincial legislation did not permit any reconsideration of the provisional transfer, notwithstanding the applicants' successful appeals against the consolidation plans. Nor did it provide for the possibility of compensating the applicants financially for the loss they may have sustained on account of the forced exchange of their land for other, inferior land pursuant to the provisional transfer. The legislature was concerned to ensure that the land in question could be continuously and economically farmed in the interests of the landowners generally and of the community. In addition, although the applicants lost their land in consequence of the transfer decided on in 1970, they received other land in lieu, even if they were not satisfied with it. However, the applicable system suffered from a degree of inflexibility. In the circumstances the necessary balance between protection of the right of property and the requirements of the public interest was lacking: the applicants remained uncertain as to the final fate of their property and had been made to bear a disproportionate burden. There had accordingly been a breach of P1A1.

FS (Republic of Austria to pay the applicants a sum of ATS 650,000 (ATS 350,000 compensation and ATS 300,000 in costs), therefore case struck from the list.

Ertak v Turkey 00/146

[Application lodged 1.10.1992; Commission report 4.12.1998; Court Judgment 9.5.2000]

Mr Ismail Ertak complained that his son, Mehmet Ertak, had disappeared after arrest by the police and further that there had been a lack of investigation into that disappearance. The facts were disputed by the Government.

Comm found unanimously V 2, by majority (28–2) NV 25.

Court dismissed unanimously Government's preliminary objection, found V 2.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr J Casadevall, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr T Pantiru, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge.

The Court based its findings on the facts found by the Commission.

The applicant had done all he could be expected to do to obtain redress. As the authorities had not conducted an effective investigation and denied that his son had been arrested, he could not pursue the civil and administrative remedies mentioned by the Government. Accordingly the preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was dismissed.

There was sufficient evidence to conclude beyond all reasonable doubt that the applicant's son after being arrested and detained had been the victim of serious ill-treatment that had not been acknowledged and he had died in the custody of the security forces. The authorities were under a duty to account for persons in their charge; no explanation had been offered as to what had happened after the applicant's son's arrest. In the circumstances, the Government bore responsibility for the death. There had been a violation of A 2.

The authorities were under an obligation to conduct an effective and thorough investigation into his disappearance. The investigation in the present case was not sufficient and effective and accordingly there had been a violation of A 2 on that account also.

Before the Court the applicant did not pursue his complaint under A 25 and the Court was not required to examine it of its own motion.

There was insufficient evidence to decide that the Turkish authorities had adopted a practice of violating A 2.

Pecuniary damage (GBP 15,000 to be held by the applicant on behalf of the widow and orphan children of his son), non-pecuniary damage (GBP 20,000 to be held by the applicant on behalf of the widow and orphan children of his son, GBP 2,500 to the applicant himself), costs and expenses (GBP 12,000 less FF 14,660.35).

Escoubet v Belgium 99/74

[Application lodged 12.9.1994; Commission report 12.3.1998; Court Judgment 28.10.1999]

Mr Alain Escoubet was involved in a road accident at 6.30 pm on 16 June 1994. The Brussels Crown prosecutor, who was informed of the accident by the police officers called to the scene, ordered the applicant's driving licence to be immediately withdrawn on the ground that he was presumed to have been driving with a blood-alcohol level over the legal limit. On 29 June 1995 the police court in Brussels sentenced the applicant to a fine of BEF 22,500 and disqualified him from driving for 45 days. He appealed to the Brussels Criminal Court, which allowed the appeal in part and reduced the sentence. He complained that the immediate withdrawal of his driving licence ordered by the Crown prosecutor with no possibility of an effective appeal to a judicial body had deprived him of his right to a 'tribunal' for the purposes of A 6(1).

Comm found by majority (18–13) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (14–3) 6 not applicable, unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Bonello, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr R Türmen, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (Jd), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach (Jd), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (Jd), Mrs Hs Greve, Mr A Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova.

The first issue before the Court was to determine whether A 6 applied. It had to therefore determine whether a 'criminal charge' or a 'civil' right was in issue. In ascertaining whether there was a 'criminal charge', the Court has regard to three criteria: the legal classification of the measure in question in national law, the very nature of the measure, and the nature and degree of severity of the 'penalty'. As regards the classification in domestic law of the immediate withdrawal of a driving licence, according to the Court of Cassation, it was not a measure imposed under the criminal law, since it was a 'preventive measure designed to take a dangerous driver off the roads for a specific period of time'. However, classification in domestic law was not decisive, having regard to the autonomous and substantive meaning to be given to the term 'criminal charge'. As regards the nature of the measure, s 55 of the consolidated Acts did not presuppose any investigation or finding of guilt and its application was totally independent of any criminal proceedings which may subsequently be brought. The immediate withdrawal of a driving licence appeared to be a preventive, precautionary measure; the fact that it was an emergency measure justified its being applied immediately and there was nothing to indicate that its purpose was punitive. Withdrawal of a driving licence could be distinguished from disqualification from driving, a measure ordered by the criminal courts in the context of, and after the outcome of, a criminal prosecution. With regard to the degree of severity, the effect of immediate withdrawal of a driving licence was limited in time, since it could not be withheld for more than 15 days, unless there were special circumstances. The impact of such a measure, in scope and in length, was not sufficiently substantial to allow it to be classified as a 'criminal' penalty. In the instant case the Court observed that the withdrawal of the applicant's driving licence did not cause him significant prejudice, since he was able to get it back six days after he had handed it over to the police and two days after he had requested its return. Therefore A 6 was not applicable under its criminal head. Moreover, the applicant had not submitted any evidence in support of his argument that a 'civil' right was at issue in the present case.

Neither in his memorial, nor in his oral submissions to the Court, did the applicant make any other reference to a complaint based on A 13. Under the circumstances, and since no separate issue appeared to arise under that provision, the Court could see no reason to examine it.

Estima Jorge v Portugal 98/23

[Application lodged 27.10.1993; Commission report 5.12.1996; Court Judgment 21.4.1998]

Mrs Amélia Alves Estima Jorge, the applicant, and AP, by a notarial deed dated 19 December 1978, jointly agreed to lend to Mr and Mrs O a total of PTE 1,360,000, to be repaid within six months, which period was renewable as often as the parties agreed. The loan bore interest. The borrowers undertook to bear the costs incurred in securing and enforcing the debt. The capital and interest and other costs were secured by a mortgage over a property. The borrowers failed to repay either capital or interest. The lenders brought enforcement proceedings in the Lisbon Court of First Instance against Mr and Mrs O for repayment of the mortgage. They also sought an order for payment of accrued interest at the date of repayment of the loan in full and of costs and expenses. On 29 November 1994 the Bank for Official Deposits delivered a cheque to Mrs Estima Jorge. She complained about the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (18–8) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr J De Meyer (pd), Mrs E Palm (pd), Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr B Repik (pd), Mr J Casadevall, Mr M Voicu.

The present case was distinguishable from previous cases since what was being enforced was not a judgment, but another form of authority to execute, namely a notarial deed providing security for a specific debt. The sole object of the proceedings was recovery of the debt. Conformity with the spirit of the Convention required that the word 'dispute' should not be construed too technically and that it should be given a substantive rather than a formal meaning. Determination of a civil right was constituted at the moment when the right asserted actually became effective. Irrespective of whether the authority to execute took the form of a judgment or a notarial deed, Portuguese law provided that it had to be enforced through the courts, the procedure to be followed being the same in each case. That enforcement procedure was decisive for the effective exercise of the applicant's right. Consequently, A 6(1) was applicable.

The period to be taken into account began on 27 November 1981, when proceedings were issued in the Lisbon Court of First Instance, and ended on 29 November 1994, when Mrs Estima Jorge obtained a payment. It therefore lasted thirteen years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. The authorities were responsible for a number of delays. Mrs Estima Jorge's application for an attachment on 26 May 1989 was not executed until 8 January 1993, that is to say three years and seven months after it was made. In addition, the financial statement was not sent to the applicant until a year later. A period of 13 years to obtain a final decision on the basis of an authority to execute could not be said to have been reasonable. Therefore there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Ettl and Others v Austria (1988) 10 EHRR 255 87/5

[Application lodged 27.10.1980; Commission report 3.7.1985; Court Judgment 24.3.1987]

The applicants were Austrian farmers who complained that they had not had a public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal as required by A 6(1) in relation to land consolidation proceedings that took place in 1973.

Comm found by majority (10–2) V 6 (1).

Court found unanimously NV 6 (1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo.

A 6(1) was applicable in the present case. The Provincial and Supreme Boards, the Administrative Court and the Constitutional Court were clearly tribunals established by law. The Provincial Board and Supreme Board included judges and civil servants. The independence and impartiality of the judge members was not in issue. The fact that civil servants sat, and even constituted a majority, on the bodies concerned did not in itself contravene A 6(1). The Federal Constitution and the Federal Agricultural Authorities Act made provision for their independence and prohibited public authorities from giving them any instructions concerning their judicial duties. The boards were independent not only of the executive but also of the parties to the case. Neither the Provincial Government nor the Federal Government was a party to the case. In this case the hierarchical links which existed in other contexts between civil servants from the same division were of no consequence from the point of view of A 6. Such links existed only between the chairman and the rapporteur in each of the two boards. The membership of the civil servants who sat as experts could not give rise to doubts about the independence and impartiality of the boards. They were experts in their fields and the boards' composition enabled them to reach balanced decisions, having regard to the various interests at stake. The domestic legislation of many Member States provided many examples of tribunals in which professional judges sat alongside specialists in a particular sphere whose knowledge was desirable and even essential in settling the disputes within the tribunals' jurisdiction. The adversarial nature of the proceedings before the boards was unaffected by the participation of the civil servant experts. As regards the length of the term of office of members of the boards, the Federal Agricultural Authorities Act satisfied the conditions laid down in A 6(1): the five-year term, coupled with virtual irremovability during that period did not put the independence and impartiality of these boards in doubt. The lack of any public hearing, which was normally contrary to A 6(1) was covered by the reservation Austria made when ratifying the Convention. Accordingly, there was no breach of A 6(1) in respect of the Provincial and Supreme Boards. It was consequently unnecessary to determine whether the Administrative Court's review, taken by itself or in conjunction with the Constitutional Court's review, complied, as regards its scope, with the requirements of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 16.10.1985; Commission report 14.12.1989; Court Judgment 26.4.1991]

Mr Roland Ezelin, a lawyer, took part in a demonstration protesting against 2 court decisions. Graffiti was daubed on buildings, abuse hurled at the judiciary and death threats made against the police. Although the applicant was not one of the graffiti artists nor responsible for the abuse or threatening words he did not dissociate himself from the demonstration. At a judicial investigation into the demonstration, he declined to give evidence. He was reprimanded under the Bar professional conduct rules. He claimed that the disciplinary sanction infringed A 10 and A 11.

Comm found by majority (15–6) V 11, unanimously no separate issue under 10.

Court found unanimously not necessary to examine 10, by majority (6–3) V 11.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (pd), President, Mr J Cremona, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (d), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr B Walsh, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr R Pekkanen.

A restriction on freedom of expression could be interpreted as including subsequent punitive measures. The demonstration had not been prohibited. There was interference with the applicant's freedom of peaceful assembly. The lawyers' professional rules were sufficiently precise and the consequences reasonably foreseeable to be 'prescribed by law'. The interference was in pursuit of a legitimate aim, 'prevention of disorder'. In considering whether the sanction was necessary, proportionate to the legitimate aim, a balance had to be struck between the requirements of the purposes set out in A 11(2) and those of free expression by people assembled. Freedom to take part in a peaceful assembly that had not been prohibited was of such importance that it could be not be restricted so long as the person concerned did not commit any reprehensible act.

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (FF 40,000).

The applicant, born in 1943, had married four times since 1963. He married Miss G in 1963 and divorced her on 8 May 1964. On 12 August 1966, he married Mrs B, the couple separated in December 1978, and F cohabited with another woman. Mrs B obtained a divorce on 27 October 1981. On 11 January 1983 Miss N replied to the applicant's advertisement for a secretary. They married on 26 February. On 11 March 1983, F began divorce proceedings in the District Civil Court. On 21 October 1983 the Civil Court imposed on the applicant a three-year prohibition on remarriage. The applicant's appeals to the Appellate Division of the Vaud Cantonal Court and to the Federal Court to discharge the order prohibiting remarriage were dismissed. F and the woman with whom he was living stated that they intended to get married as soon as possible. Her divorce from her previous marriage became absolute on 21 April 1986 and on 22 May 1986 the president of the Lausanne court allowed her application to have the waiting time reduced and gave her leave to remarry as from that date. F's appeal to the Conseil d'Etat was unsuccessful. He married Mrs F on 23 January 1987. F complained that the three-year prohibition on remarriage imposed on him was incompatible with his right to marry.

The exercise of the right under A 12 gave rise to personal, social and legal consequences. It was subject to the national laws of the Contracting States, but the limitations thereby introduced should not restrict or reduce the right in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right was impaired. The prohibition imposed on F was applied under rules governing the exercise of the right to marry, as A 12 did not distinguish between marriage and remarriage. A waiting period no longer existed under the laws of other Contracting States. The Convention had to be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions. However, the fact that, at the end of a gradual evolution, a country found itself in an isolated position as regards one aspect of its legislation did not necessarily imply that that aspect offended the Convention, particularly in the field of matrimony which was so closely bound up with the cultural and historical traditions of each society and its deep-rooted ideas about the family unit. The measure complained of amounted to a civil sanction. Although automatically applicable because of its mandatory nature, Article 150 of the Civil Code nonetheless allowed the courts some degree of discretion: the prohibition period to be imposed on the party at fault in the event of divorce granted on the ground of adultery could range from one to three years. The District Civil Court had chosen the maximum period, holding that F's unacceptable attitude rendered him solely responsible for the breakdown of the marriage. The stability of marriage was a legitimate aim which was in the public interest. However, the particular means used may not have been appropriate for achieving that aim. The woman with whom F was cohabiting had, on 22 May 1986, obtained a reduction of the waiting time following her own divorce, which had become absolute a month earlier. The prohibition on F expired on 21 December 1986. During the intervening period the applicant's future wife could consider that she was personally and directly wronged by the measure affecting F. Given that she was neither under age nor insane, her rights were in no way protected by the measure in question. An unborn child could also be adversely affected by such a prohibition. The argument that the prohibition allowed time for reflection was not of sufficient weight to justify the impugned interference in the case of a person of full age in possession of his mental faculties. The Court recalling its previous case-law noted that 'in the area of human rights he who can do more cannot necessarily do less. The Convention permits under certain conditions some very serious forms of treatment ... whilst at the same time prohibiting others which by comparison can be regarded as rather mild.' If national legislation allowed divorce, which was not a requirement of the Convention, A 12 secured for divorced persons the right to remarry without unreasonable restrictions. The situation of judicial separation was different and that in any case occurred prior to any decree of divorce. The disputed measure, which affected the very essence of the right to marry, was disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. There was, therefore, a violation of A 12.

[Application lodged 9.5.1986; Commission report 17.5.1990; Court Judgment 28.8.1991]

The applicant was tried in his absence for armed robbery, murder and attempted murder, convicted and sentenced in his absence. The applicant's lawyer was present and informed the Assize Court that the applicant was in custody in The Netherlands. No evidence was submitted to support that claim and the court accepted the prosecution submission to try the applicant in absentia as unlawfully absent. The evidence of his detention elsewhere appeared after conviction. However, the Dutch authorities had previously asked the Italian authorities for assistance in their investigation of the applicant. The applicant claimed that trial in his absence violated A 6.

Commission found unanimously V 6(1) and (3)(c).

Court held unanimously V 6(1)+(3)(c).

The applicant had not waived his attendance at the hearing. The court had learnt that the appellant was in custody in The Netherlands but had not adjourned the trial or investigated to see if the applicant consented to trial in absentia. It had not been shown that the applicant was aware of the trial date. Even if indirect knowledge (through his lawyer) sufficed, the applicant did not appear to have waived his right to appear at the trial and defend himself. The action of the judicial authorities (proceeding with the trial) was disproportionate having regard to the prominent place which the right to a fair trial holds in a democratic society.

The applicant was born in 1971. On 29 October 1985, during a tonsillectomy operation, he was given a blood transfusion. Tests conducted in December 1988 and January 1989 found that he was HIV positive. The applicant had lodged an application with the Administrative Court against the blood transfusion centre and brought a civil action against the Foundation Saint-Marc, owners of the clinic, in the tribunal de grande instance seeking compensation for the damage he had sustained on account of his infection. When his claim was dismissed he appealed to the Court of Appeal. While that appeal was pending, he submitted a compensation claim to the Fund. He accepted the Fund's offer in April 1993 and thereby lost the right to bring any action against it. His action in the Court of Appeal resulted in his compensation claim being upheld.

Court found by majority (7–2) V 6(1) as regards the right of access to a court, (8–1) V 6(1) as regards the length of the proceedings.

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr C Russo, Mrs E Palm, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr T Pantiru.

The right to a court, of which the right of access was one aspect, was not absolute; it could be subject to limitations which, however, should not restrict the exercise of the right in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right was impaired. It had to pursue a legitimate aim and there had to be a reasonable proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved. The degree of access afforded by national legislation had to be sufficient to secure the individual's 'right to a court', having regard to the principle of the rule of law in a democratic society. For the right of access to be effective, an individual had to have a clear, practical opportunity to challenge an act that was an interference with his rights. At the time when he accepted the Fund's offer, the applicant could have reasonably believed that it was possible to pursue an action in the civil courts concurrently with his compensation claim to the Fund, even after he had accepted the Fund's offer. In view of his situation at that time, he could not be criticised for not refusing a solution which met his most urgent needs, since he was entitled to think that it had not been intended that, in the event of an offer being accepted, the Act should deprive victims of the right to bring proceedings against any liable party. In the circumstances, on the date when the applicant accepted the offer, the system was not sufficiently clear or sufficiently attended by safeguards to prevent a misunderstanding as to the procedures for making use of the available remedies and the restrictions stemming from the simultaneous use of them. Consequently, the Court found that the applicant did not have a clear, practical opportunity of challenging the amount of compensation in a court. The applicant did not have an effective right of access to a court. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties including what was at stake for the applicant. The case was somewhat complex. The applicant could not be held responsible for any delay. However, there had been delay regarding the conduct of the relevant authorities. What was at stake, in pecuniary and non-pecuniary terms, in the proceedings in the Court of Cassation was of crucial importance to the applicant in view of the disease from which he was suffering. Notwithstanding a certain complexity, exceptional expedition was called for in this instance, especially since the facts of the controversy had been known to the Court of Cassation for several years. Consequently, the proceedings before the Court of Cassation did not satisfy the reasonable time requirement and there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Farmakopoulos v Belgium (1993) 16 EHRR 187 92/44

Mr Georgios Farmakopoulos, a Greek national, was apprehended on 11 January 1985 while passing through Belgium following a radiogram from the UK requesting his extradition for murder and theft. As the warrants had not been served within the statutory time limit, the Belgian Minister of Justice ordered that the applicant should leave Belgian territory and that he should remain in custody in the meantime. He was due to be deported to Argentina, the country of his choice, on 7 February. At midday on 6 February he was served with the two British warrants. His appeal was dismissed by the Antwerp Court of Appeal as being out of time. His further appeal to the Court of Cassation was also dismissed. He was extradited to the United Kingdom on 9 August 1985 and sentenced to life imprisonment by the Norwich Crown Court on 4 March 1986. He was thereafter handed over to the Greek authorities. He complained, inter alia, that he had been unable to take proceedings in accordance with A 5(4).

Despite being approached by the registry on several occasions over a period of eight months, the applicant had shown no interest in the proceedings pending before the Court. There was no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings, which were concerned to a large extent with questions of fact, whose examination would furthermore require additional information on the facts of the case. The Court did not consider it necessary to seek to obtain this information of its own motion.

Fayed v United Kingdom (1994) 18 EHRR 393 94/26

[Application lodged 30.8.1990; Commission report 7.4.1993; Court Judgment 21.9.1994]

Mr Mohamed Al Fayed, Mr Ali Fayed and Mr Salah Fayed were brothers. They were businessmen. In March 1985 they acquired ownership of the House of Fraser plc (HOF) effected through a public company called House of Fraser Holdings plc (HOFH), previously known as the Al Fayed Investment Trust (UK) Limited. Prior to the HOF takeover, they took active steps to promote their reputations. The takeover was vigorously but unsuccessfully opposed by Lohnro plc and, in particular, its Chief Executive, Mr Rowland, a former business associate, turned rival, of the applicants, who pursued a campaign against the applicants. On 9 April 1987, the Secretary of State appointed two Inspectors to investigate the affairs of HOFH. The Inspectors' provisional conclusions were largely unfavourable to the applicants, concluding that the applicants had dishonestly misrepresented their origins, their wealth, their business interests and their resources to the Secretary of State, the Office of Fair Trading, the press, the HOF Board and HOF shareholders and their own advisers. On 30 March 1989 The Observer newspaper published a special edition devoted solely to extracts from and comments on a leaked copy of the Inspectors' report. The report was published on 7 March 1990. In August 1990 the applicants abandoned a libel action against The Observer newspaper. The applicants complained that the Inspectors' report had determined their civil right to honour and reputation and denied them effective access to a court in determination of that civil right. They further alleged a denial of effective domestic remedies to challenge the findings of the Inspectors.

Comm by majority (12–1) found NV 6(1) either as regards the making and publication of the Inspectors' or as regards the applicant brothers' access to court whether for proceeding against the Inspectors and the Secretary of State (10–3) or for proceeding against others (12–1), unanimously no separate issue under 13.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found NV 6(1), not necessary to examine 13.

The grounds on which judicial review may be sought were such that it would not have ensured access to a court for determination of the truth of statements made about the applicants in the Inspectors' report, the absence of such access being the essence of their complaints under the Convention. Nor would the libel actions against The Observer have provided a remedy against the Inspectors or the Secretary of State as regards the publication of the damaging statements contained in the Inspectors' report. The objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies was not made out by the Government and accordingly dismissed.

In order for an individual to be entitled to a hearing before a tribunal, there had to exist a dispute over one of his or her civil rights or obligations. The result of the proceedings in question had to be directly decisive for such a right or obligation to bring A 6(1) into play. The functions performed by the Inspectors were, in practice as well as in theory, essentially investigative. They did not adjudicate, either in form or in substance. Their findings were not dispositive of anything. They did not make a legal determination as to criminal or civil liability concerning the applicants. The purpose of their inquiry was to ascertain and record facts which might subsequently be used as the basis for action by other competent authorities. Their inquiry did not determine the applicants' civil right to a good reputation, nor was its result directly decisive for that right. Investigative proceedings of the kind in issue fell outside the ambit and intendment of A 6. The investigation by the Inspectors was not such therefore as to attract the application of A 6(1).

The Inspectors' report, published to the world at large, contained statements damaging to the applicants' reputations. A 6 secured to everyone the right to have any claim relating to his civil rights and obligations brought before a court or tribunal. It embodied the right to a court, of which the right of access, that is the right to institute proceedings before courts in civil matters, constituted one aspect only. Whether a person had an actionable domestic claim might depend not only on the substantive content of the relevant civil right but also on the existence of procedural bars preventing or limiting the possibilities of bringing potential claims to court. However, it would not be consistent with the rule of law in a democratic society or with the basic principle underlying A 6(1) if, for example, a State could, without restraint or control by the Convention enforcement bodies, remove from the jurisdiction of the courts a whole range of civil claims or confer immunities from civil liability on large groups or categories of persons. It was not always an easy matter to trace the dividing line between procedural and substantive limitations of a given entitlement under domestic law. In the present case the Court did not consider it necessary to settle the question of the precise nature of the defence of privilege for the purposes of A 6(1) since it was devoid of significance in the particular circumstances. The Court would proceed on the basis that A 6(1) was applicable to the facts of the case. The legitimacy of the limitation complained of could not be divorced from its context, namely the system of investigation and reporting under the Companies Act 1985. The underlying aim of the system was clearly the furtherance of the public interest. The investigation into the affairs of HOFH and the publication of the resultant report in themselves therefore pursued legitimate aims. The Court could not find that, in the exercise of their responsibility of regulating the conduct of the affairs of public companies, the national authorities exceeded their margin of appreciation to limit the applicant brothers' access to the courts under A 6(1), either as regards the state of the applicable law or as regards the effects of the application of that law to the brothers. Having regard in particular to the safeguards that did exist in relation to the impugned investigation, a reasonable relationship of proportionality could be said to have existed between the freedom of reporting accorded to the Inspectors and the legitimate aim pursued in the public interest. The limitation on the applicants' opportunity, before and after publication of the Inspectors' report, to take legal proceedings to challenge the Inspectors' findings damaging to their reputations did not involve an unjustified denial of their right to a court under A 6(1). There was no violation of A 6(1).

In view of the applicants' effective withdrawal of the complaint under A 13, the Court did not find it necessary also to examine the case under that provision.

[Application lodged 28.7.1986; Commission report 8.5.1990; Court Judgment 29.10.1991]

Mr Hans Fejde was charged on 2 March 1984 with illegal possession of a weapon contrary to the Weapons Act 1973. The City Court sentenced him to 30 day-fines of 10 kronor each. The applicant appealed to the Court of Appeal. He was informed that his case could be dealt with without a hearing and invited to express his views as to the necessity for a hearing or submit his final written observations within the a 14 day time limit. His request for a trial hearing was found to be manifestly unnecessary. The Supreme Court refused him leave to appeal on 3 March 1986 and refused his subsequent application to have his case re-opened. The applicant complained that he had not had a fair trial.

The manner of application of A 6 to proceedings before courts of appeal depended on the special features of the proceedings involved; account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings in the domestic legal order and of the role of the appellate court. A public hearing had been held at first instance. Even where the court of appeal had jurisdiction to review the case both as to facts and law, A 6 did not always require a right to a public hearing irrespective of the nature of the issue to be decided. The publicity requirement was one of the means whereby confidence in the courts was maintained. However, there were other considerations, including the right to trial within a reasonable time and the related need for expeditious handling of the courts' case-load, which had to be taken into account in determining the need for a public hearing at stages in the proceedings subsequent to the trial at first instance. Provided a public hearing had been held at first instance, the absence of such hearing before a second or third instance might be justified by the special features of the proceedings at issue. Thus, leave-to-appeal proceedings and proceedings involving only questions of law, as opposed to questions of fact, might comply with the requirements of A 6 although the appellant was not given an opportunity of being heard in person by the appeal court. The applicant's appeal did not raise any questions of fact or law which could not be adequately resolved on the basis of the case-file. In addition, considering the minor character of the offence with which he was charged and the prohibition against increasing his sentence on appeal, the Court of Appeal could, as a matter of fair trial, properly decide, as it did, that a public hearing was manifestly unnecessary in the applicant's case. The special features of the case justified the refusal to hold a public hearing. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 16.2.1979; Commission report 9.5.1984; Court Judgment 29.5.1986 (merits), 27.7.1987 (A 50)]

Mrs Geziena Hendrika Maria Feldbrugge was unemployed. On 11 April 1978, the Governing Board of the Occupational Association of the Banking and Insurance, Wholesale Trade and Self-Employment Sector decided that as from 24 March 1978 she was no longer entitled to the sickness allowances she had been receiving until then, as the Association's consulting doctor had judged her fit to resume work on that date. Her appeal to the Appeals Board was rejected, as was her further appeal to the Central Appeals Board. She complained that she had not received a fair trial before the President of the Appeals Board.

Judges (A 50): composition as above, decision unanimous.

A dispute arose following the decision taken on 11 April 1978 by the Governing Board of the Occupational Association of the Banking and Insurance, Wholesale Trade and Self-Employment Sector in Amsterdam. That dispute was genuine and serious, and concerned the actual existence of the right asserted by the applicant to continue receiving a sickness allowance. The outcome of the relevant proceedings was capable of leading – and in the event did lead – to confirmation of the decision being challenged, namely the refusal of the President of the Haarlem Appeals Board to grant the claimed allowance; it was thus directly decisive for the right in issue. The President of the Appeals Board thus had to determine a dispute concerning a right claimed by Mrs Feldbrugge. Whether it was a civil right, national classification provided only a starting point and could not be conclusive of the matter. Whether or not a right was to be regarded as civil had to be determined by reference to the substantive content and effects of the right – and not its legal classification – under the domestic law of the State concerned. An analysis of the characteristics of the Netherlands system of social health insurance disclosed that the claimed entitlement comprised features of both public law and private law. The public law features (character of the legislation, compulsory nature of the insurance, assumption by the State of responsibility for social protection) did not suffice to establish that A 6 was inapplicable. The private law features (personal and economic nature of the asserted right, connection with the contract of employment, affinities with insurance under the ordinary law) were predominant. None of those various features of private law was decisive on its own, but taken together and cumulatively they conferred on the asserted entitlement the character of a civil right within the meaning of A 6(1), which was therefore applicable.

The permanent medical expert could not himself determine a dispute over a civil right. The sole responsibility for taking the decision fell to the President of the Appeals Board, even when he did no more than ratify the opinion of the expert. There was no breach of the principle of equality of arms inherent in the concept of a fair trial. The Occupational Association did not enjoy a procedural position any more advantageous than Mrs Feldbrugge's, in that had the experts expressed an opinion unfavourable to its standpoint, the Association would likewise have been unable to present oral or written arguments or to challenge the validity of the unfavourable opinion. No lack of fair balance thus obtained between the parties in that respect. However, the President neither heard the applicant nor asked her to file written pleadings and he did not afford her or her representative the opportunity to consult the evidence in the case-file, in particular the two reports which were the basis of the decision of the permanent experts, and to formulate her objections to it. The proceedings conducted before the President of the Appeals Board were not therefore attended, to a sufficient degree, by one of the principal guarantees of a judicial procedure. The conditions of access to the full Appeals Board and the Central Appeals Boards were framed in restrictive terms and prevented the applicant from challenging the merits of the decision by the President of the Appeals Board. Accordingly, the shortcoming found to exist in respect of the procedure before that judicial officer was not capable of being cured at a later stage. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

Ferrantelli and Santangelo v Italy (1997) 23 EHRR 33 96/26

On 26 January 1976 two police officers were murdered in barracks, and clothes, firearms and ammunition were found to be missing. In the night of 11 to 12 February Mr GV was arrested. He admitted the murders and named others involved. Mr Vincenzo Ferrantelli and Mr Gaetano Santangelo, the applicants, and two other suspects were arrested on 13 February 1976. On 26 October 1977 GV was found dead, said to have committed suicide, in the prison hospital. On 23 January 1978 the applicants, who had not had an opportunity to examine or have examined GV in the proceedings prior to his death, were committed for trial with the two other accused. The proceedings in the Trapani Assize Court began on 25 November 1980 and ended on 10 February 1981 with the acquittal of the applicants, on the basis of the benefit of the doubt. The prosecuting authority and the accused appealed. The applicants, in particular, sought their unqualified acquittal. On 7 March 1986 the Juvenile Section of the Palermo Court of Appeal acquitted the applicants on the basis of the benefit of the doubt. The prosecuting authority and the applicants again appealed to the Court of Cassation. On 12 October 1987 the Court of Cassation quashed the decision and remitted the case to the Juvenile Section of the Caltanisetta Court of Appeal. On 31 May 1988 that court quashed the judgment of the Trapani Assize Court of 10 February 1981. On 2 June 1988 the Assize Court of Appeal, presided over by Judge S P, dealt with the case of the accused, GG. On 6 October 1989 the Palermo Juvenile Court, which was trying the case at first instance, acquitted the applicants on the basis of the benefit of the doubt. The applicants and the prosecuting authority appealed. On 6 April 1991 that court, the Juvenile Court presided over by SP, who had also presided over the Caltanisetta Assize Court of Appeal in GG's trial, sentenced Mr Santangelo to 22 years and five months' imprisonment and a fine of ITL 450,000. Mr Ferrantelli was sentenced to 14 years and 10 months. On 4 June 1991 the prosecuting authority and the applicants appealed to the Court of Cassation. In a judgment of 8 January 1992, deposited in the registry on 28 February, the Court of Cassation dismissed the applicants' appeal. An application of 18 January 1992 seeking a pardon from the President of the Republic was rejected. The applicants complained about the length of proceedings, fairness of trial and lack of impartiality of the tribunal.

Comm found unanimously V 6.

Court found unanimously V 6(1) as regards the length of the proceedings, NV 6(1) and 6(3)(d), as regards the right to a fair trial, by majority (8–1) V 6(1) regarding the lack of impartiality of the Juvenile Section of the Court of Appeal.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer (d), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr D Gotchev.

The relevant period began on 13 February 1976, the date of the applicants' arrest, and ended on 28 February 1992, when the Court of Cassation's judgment was deposited in the registry. It had lasted 16 years and two weeks. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The case was complex having regard to the nature of the charges and to the problems in determining jurisdiction for offences committed by minors acting in concert with adults. Taken separately, the different phases of the proceedings were, in addition, conducted at a regular pace, apart from the inexplicable period of stagnation of nearly two years during the first investigation. Examined as a whole, however, the only possible conclusion was that the reasonable time requirement was not complied with because the applicants were not convicted with final effect until 16 years after the events, which had occurred when they were still minors. There had, accordingly, been a violation of A 6(1).

The admissibility of evidence was primarily a matter for regulation by national law and, as a rule, it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task was to ascertain whether the proceedings considered as a whole, including the way in which the evidence was taken, were fair. The guarantees in A 6(3)(d) were specific aspects of the right to a fair trial in A 6(1). Normally all the evidence had to be produced in the presence of the accused at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument. However, the use of statements obtained at the pre-trial stage was not in itself inconsistent with A 6(3)(d) and 6(1), provided that the rights of the defence had been respected. As a rule, these rights required that the defendant be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him, either when he was making his statements or at a later stage of the proceedings. Although the judicial authorities had not organised a confrontation between all the accused before GV's death, they could not be held responsible for the latter event. The Juvenile Section of the Caltanisetta Court of Appeal carried out a detailed analysis of the prosecution witness's statements and found them to be corroborated by other evidence. The applicants had had a fair trial and there had been no violation of A 6(1) and 6(3)(d).

The existence of impartiality for the purposes of A 6(1) had to be determined according to a subjective test, that is, on the basis of the personal conviction and behaviour of a particular judge in a given case, and also according to an objective test, that is, ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. The personal impartiality of the judge concerned was not questioned. With regard to the objective test, what was at stake was the confidence which the courts in a democratic society had to inspire in the public. That implied that, in deciding whether in a given case there was a legitimate reason to fear that a particular judge lacked impartiality, the standpoint of the accused was important but not decisive. What was decisive was whether that fear could be held objectively justified. In the present case the judgment of 2 June 1988 of the Caltanisetta Assize Court of Appeal, presided over by Judge SP, contained numerous references to the applicants and their respective roles in the attack on the barracks. The judgment of the Juvenile Section of the Caltanisetta Court of Appeal of 6 April 1991, where Judge SP was the presiding and reporting judge, convicted the applicants citing numerous extracts from the decision of the Assize Court of Appeal concerning another defendant. In the Juvenile Section it was once again Judge SP who presided and indeed he was the reporting judge. Those circumstances were sufficient to hold the applicants' fears as to the lack of impartiality of the Juvenile Section of the Caltanisetta Court of Appeal to be objectively justified. There had, accordingly, been a breach of A 6(1).

Ferrari v Italy 99/45

Mrs Marcella Ferrari instituted proceedings in the Rome District Court on 31 January 1990 against a local health clinic in Rome for payment of an adjustment for inflation and of statutory interest in respect of arrears of her widow's pension which had been paid six years late. The court's judgment of 13 March, deposited with the registry on 6 August 1998, allowed the applicant's appeal in part. The applicant complained about the length of proceedings.

The period to be taken into account began on 31 January 1990, when the applicant instituted proceedings in the Rome District Court against the local health clinic in Rome. It ended on 6 August 1998, when that court's judgment of 13 March 1998 was deposited with the registry. It had therefore lasted just over eight years and six months. A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet the requirements of the provision. It was important to administer justice without delays which might jeopardise its effectiveness and credibility. Since 25 June 1987 (the date of the Capuano v I judgment), the Court had already delivered 65 judgments in which it has found violations of A 6(1) in proceedings exceeding a 'reasonable time' in the civil courts of the various regions of Italy. Similarly, under former A 31 and 32 of the Convention, more than 1,400 reports of the Commission resulted in resolutions by the Committee of Ministers finding Italy in breach of A 6 of the Convention for the same reason. The frequency with which violations were found showed that there was an accumulation of identical breaches which were sufficiently numerous to amount not merely to isolated incidents. Such breaches reflected a continuing situation that had not yet been remedied and in respect of which litigants had no domestic remedy. The accumulation of breaches constituted a practice that was incompatible with the Convention. The length of the proceedings was excessive and failed to meet the reasonable time requirement. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Ferraro v Italy 91/18

[Application lodged 26.11.1987; Commission report 5.12.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991]

On 3 February 1979 Mr Erico Ferraro, an inspector with the Ministry of Transport, was questioned by the police. On 8 February 1979 an arrest warrant was issued against him for forgery and corruption on a charge of falsely certifying that he had carried out approval tests on a number of vehicles, allegedly at the request of a certain M who, in return, had supplied him with watches imported from Japan to sell off on the Italian market. Following a trial on 3 June 1987, the applicant was acquitted. The judgment became final on 3 July 1987 when the time limit for an appeal by the prosecuting authorities expired. He complained of the length of proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 8 February 1979, the date on which the Italian judicial authorities ordered the applicant's arrest; it ended on 3 July 1987. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The proceedings were of some complexity owing to the nature of the facts to be established but the applicant did nothing to slow down their progress. The two investigations of the alleged offences extended over a period of approximately five years and eight months from 8 February 1979 to 28 October 1984, after which there was a long period of inactivity in the trial proceedings up until 22 April 1987. Fey v Austria (1993) 16 EHRR 387 93/2

[Application lodged 10.11.1988; Commission report 15.10.1991; Court Judgment 24.2.1993]

Mr Hans Jürgen Fey, a pensioner, rented a room from a Mrs Rosa Kröll from 17 to 27 January 1988. During that period he told her that his wife was very ill and was undergoing treatment in hospital and that he was expecting to receive payments under a pension scheme. As a result, Mrs Kröll gave him money and waived the rent. Subsequently, proceedings were instituted against the applicant for fraud. By a rogatory letter the District Court Judge, Mrs Andrea Kohlegger, put questions to the witness. The judge took a number of steps in the applicant's case. At a later date a hearing was held in the District Court before Judge Kohlegger sitting as a single judge. The District Prosecutor was present, but the applicant's lawyer at the time did not appear, although he had been summoned. The applicant and Mrs Kröll were heard and other evidence considered. By judgment of 24 March 1988, the District Court acquitted the applicant of one of the fraud charges but convicted and sentenced him to three months' imprisonment and compensation on the other charge. The applicant's appeal to the Regional Court was dismissed. He complained that the case against him had not been determined by an impartial tribunal as the District Court judge had both undertaken preliminary investigations and tried the case.

The existence of impartiality for the purposes of A 6(1) had to be determined according to a subjective test, that is, on the basis of the personal conviction of a particular judge in a given case, and also according to an objective test, that is, ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in this respect. As to the subjective test, the applicant did not dispute the personal impartiality of Judge Kohlegger. With regard to the objective test, appearances could be of importance. What was at stake was the confidence which the courts in a democratic society inspired in the public and, above all, as far as criminal proceedings were concerned, in the accused. This implied that in deciding whether in a given case there was a legitimate reason to fear that a particular judge lacked impartiality, the standpoint of the accused was important, but not decisive. What was determinant was whether that fear could be held to be objectively justified. The mere fact that a judge had also made pre-trial decisions in the case could not be taken as in itself justifying fears as to his impartiality. What mattered was the extent and nature of the pre-trial measures taken by the judge. The interrogation of the landlady had been conducted by Judge Kohlegger, under a rogatory letter from the investigating judge that asked the District Court to put some very specific questions to the landlady. Judge Kohlegger undertook certain pre-trial measures which were of a preparatory nature. Judge Kohlegger's decision of 18

March 1988 to set the case down for trial did not reflect a belief on her part that there was a likelihood that he was guilty. That decision merely gave effect to the rule, under the applicable law, that the hearing date should be fixed as soon as such preliminary inquiries as may be necessary had been made. It was not until the hearing on 24 March 1988 that Judge Kohlegger was faced with the applicant for the first time and all the evidence in the case was presented. It was only at that stage that she was in a position to form any opinion as to the applicant's guilt. The various measures she had taken prior to the trial could not have led her to reach a preconceived view on the merits. The fears the applicant may have had as to the District Court judge's impartiality could not be held to have been objectively justified. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

Ficara v Italy 91/13

A complaint was lodged against Mr Antonio Ficara on 28 December 1978 leading subsequently to his prosecution on criminal charges. On 27 June 1979 he was notified that a preliminary investigation had been opened against him. The appeal court acquitted him on 25 January 1989. The time limit for appeal on a point of law by the prosecutor expired on 28 January 1989. He complained of the length of the proceedings.

The period to be taken into account began on 27 June 1989 and ended on 28 January 1989. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The applicant had contributed to the delays by making three requests for adjournments. However, the case was not complex and there were long periods of stagnation in the proceedings, in particular a period of five years when the proceedings were before the Court of Appeal which had been unable to deal with its heavy caseload. A lapse of more than nine years, seven months could not be regarded as reasonable. Accordingly V 6(1).

Mrs Albina Figus Milone, who used to work for a security firm, Istitutio di Vigilanza, brought proceedings on 26 October 1978 against her former employer in the Turin magistrates' court for unfair dismissal. At the first hearing, on 28 November 1978, the magistrate raised a preliminary question of his own motion and stayed the proceedings pending the decision of the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court gave judgment on 16 January 1987. The applicant resumed the proceedings on 16 February 1987 and they ended on 28 May with a friendly settlement. She complained about the length of the proceedings.

Under A 47, the Court may only be seised of a case within the period of three months provided for in A 32. In order to seise a court, it was not sufficient to decide to seise it. The decision had to be implemented. The Commission had exceeded, albeit by only one day, the time allowed it. No special circumstance of a nature to suspend the running of time or justify its starting to run afresh was apparent from the file. The application was therefore inadmissible as it was made out of time.

Findlay v United Kingdom (1997) 24 EHRR 221 97/8

[Application lodged 28.5.1993; Commission report 5.9.1995; Court Judgment 25.2.1997]

Mr Alexander Findlay was a member of the Scots Guards. On 29 July 1990, after a heavy drinking session, he held members of his own unit at pistol point and threatened to kill himself and some of his colleagues. He fired two shots, which were not aimed at anyone, and hit a television set, and subsequently surrendered the pistol. He was then arrested. The convening officer convened the general court-martial and appointed the military personnel who were to act as prosecuting officer, assistant prosecuting officer and assistant defending officer. The court-martial consisted of a president and four other members who were subordinate in rank to the convening officer. None of them had legal training. On 11 November 1991, Mr Findlay appeared before the general court-martial at Regent's Park Barracks in London and was represented by a solicitor. He complained that he had been denied a fair hearing before the court-martial and that it was not an independent and impartial tribunal.

The scope of the Court's jurisdiction was determined by the Commission's decision on admissibility and it had no power to entertain new and separate complaints which were not raised before the Commission However, in his application to the Commission the applicant, although not expressly, appeared to have raised in substance most of the matters which formed the basis of his complaints in relation to the provisions of public hearing and tribunal established by law. They were not new and separate complaints, and the Court had jurisdiction to consider them.

A 6(1) was applicable to the court-martial proceedings, since they involved the determination of the applicant's sentence following his plea of guilty to criminal charges.

In order to establish whether a tribunal could be considered as independent, regard had to be had, inter alia, to the manner of appointment of its members and their term of office, the existence of guarantees against outside pressures and the question whether the body presented an appearance of independence. Regarding the question of impartiality, there are two aspects to that requirement. First, the tribunal had to be subjectively free of personal prejudice or bias. Secondly, it had to also be impartial from an objective viewpoint, that is, it had to offer sufficient guarantees to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. The convening officer played a significant and central role in the applicant's prosecution and was closely linked to the prosecuting authorities. The convening officer appointed the members of the court martial; they were subordinate in rank to him. Many of them, including the president, were directly or ultimately under his command. Furthermore, the convening officer had the power, albeit in prescribed circumstances, to dissolve the court martial either before or during the trial. In order to maintain confidence in the independence and impartiality of the court, appearances may be of importance. Since all the members of the court-martial which decided the applicant's case were subordinate in rank to the convening officer and fell within his chain of command, the applicant's doubts about the tribunal's independence and impartiality could be objectively justified. In addition, the convening officer also acted as confirming officer. Thus, the decision of the court martial was not effective until ratified by him, and he had the power to vary the sentence imposed as he saw fit. That was contrary to the well-established principle that the power to give a binding decision which may not be altered by a non-judicial authority was inherent in the very notion of 'tribunal' and could also be seen as a component of the 'independence' required by A 6(1). Those fundamental flaws in the court-martial system were not remedied by the presence of safeguards, such as the involvement of the judge advocate, who was not himself a member of the tribunal and whose advice to it was not made public, or the oath taken by the members of the court-martial board. Nor could the defects referred to above be corrected by any subsequent review proceedings. Since the applicant's hearing was concerned with serious charges classified as 'criminal' under both domestic and Convention law, he was entitled to a first-instance tribunal which fully met the requirements of A 6(1). For all those reasons, and in particular the central role played by the convening officer in the organisation of the court martial, the applicant's misgivings about the independence and impartiality of the tribunal which dealt with his case were objectively justified. It was not therefore necessary for the Court to consider the applicant's other complaints under A 6(1), namely that he was not afforded a public hearing by a tribunal established by law.

Pecuniary damage claim dismissed (Court could not speculate as to what the outcome of the court-martial proceedings might have been had the violation not occurred). Finding of a violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (GBP 23,956.25 less FF 26,891).

Fisanotti v Italy 98/27

[Application lodged 28.4.1994; Commission report 9.7.1997; Court Judgment 23.4.1998]

Mr Gian Carlo Fisanotti was a civil servant until he took early retirement on 31 July 1989. On 13 July 1992 he applied to the Sardinia Regional Division of the Court of Audit for an enhanced pension, claiming a work-related illness. The first hearing was held on 28 January 1995 when, by an order which was deposited with the registry on 4 March 1996, the Regional Division requested the opinion of the Medical Board. On 3 June 1997 the applicant was examined by the Board. On 6 October 1997 the Regional Division set down a hearing for 11 February 1998. The applicant complained about the length of proceedings.

The relevant period began on 13 July 1992 when the applicant applied to the Sardinia Regional Division of the Court of Audit and had not yet ended. The proceedings had therefore already lasted approximately five years and eight months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. The Court took note of the efforts of the Italian authorities in connection with legislation on the jurisdiction and organisation of the Court of Audit. However, the introduction of a reform of that nature could not justify delays since States were under a duty to organise the entry into force and implementation of such measures in a way that avoided prolonging the examination of pending cases. In the present case there was no delay linked to the reform. On the other hand, there were several inexplicable periods of inactivity due to the authorities. The applicant's conduct could not be criticised. The case was not particularly complex. The length of the proceedings was not reasonable and accordingly there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Fischer v Austria (1995) 20 EHRR 349 95/10

[Application lodged 11.5.1990; Commission report 9.9.1993; Court Judgment 26.4.1995]

Mr Josef Fischer, the applicant, had owned a refuse tip since 1975 which he operated under a revocable refuse-tipping licence. On 5 December 1986 the tipping licence was revoked by the Governor of the Land of Lower Austria on the grounds, inter alia, that dangerously high levels of toxic substances had been found in the groundwater and the unsuitability of the site for tipping. The applicant's appeal to the Federal Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry was dismissed on 20 July 1987. His further complaint to the Constitutional Court was dismissed without a hearing. The Administrative Court also dismissed his appeal without a hearing. The applicant complained that he had not been able to bring his case before a 'tribunal' which complied with A 6 or to have a public hearing on the issue of the revocation of his tipping licence.

Comm found by majority (12–1) NV 6(1) in respect of the right to have his case determined by a tribunal, unanimously V 6(1) in regard to the lack of an oral hearing in the Administrative Court, by majority (12–1) NV 6(1) in regard to lack of an oral hearing in the Constitutional Court.

Court found by majority (8–1) NV 6(1) as regards the complaint that he was not able to bring his case before a 'tribunal', unanimously V 6(1) as regards the lack of an oral public hearing.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Matscher (c), Mr C Russo, Mr SK Martens (so), Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Jambrek (c).

Under A 6(1) it was necessary that, in the determination of 'civil rights and obligations', decisions taken by administrative authorities which did not themselves satisfy the requirements of A 6(1) were subject to subsequent control by a 'judicial body that had full jurisdiction'. The Austrian Constitutional Court did not have the requisite jurisdiction. Its review was confined to ascertaining whether the administrative decision was in conformity with the Constitution. The decision to revoke the tipping licence was not one which lay exclusively within the discretion of the administrative authorities. It was not the task of the Court to assess the quality of the experts' reports on which the revocation was based. The impugned administrative decision was based on objective criteria that left relatively little room for discretion. The Administrative Court considered all the applicant's submissions on their merits, point by point, without ever having to decline jurisdiction in replying to them or in ascertaining facts. Having regard to the nature of Mr Fischer's concrete complaints as well as to the scope of review necessitated by such complaints, the Administrative Court's review of the decision being challenged fulfilled the requirements of A 6(1).

Regarding the lack of a hearing, the relevant legislation, the Administrative Court Act came into force in 1982, whereas Austria ratified the Convention and made the reservation in respect of A 6 in 1958. Under A 64(1) only laws 'then in force' in the State's territory could be the subject of a reservation. The applicant's complaint that the Administrative Court had not held a hearing was not excluded from review by the reservation, since the provision on which the refusal to hold such a hearing was based was not in force at the time the reservation was made. Only the proceedings before the Administrative Court were in issue; the other authorities which dealt with the applicant's complaint, notably the Austrian Constitutional Court, could not be considered tribunals invested with full jurisdiction for the purposes of A 6. The practice of the Austrian Administrative Court was not to hear the parties unless one of them asked it to do so. The applicant expressly requested an oral hearing in the Administrative Court. That was refused on the ground that it was not likely to contribute to clarifying the case. There was accordingly no question of the applicant's having waived that right. There did not appear to have been any exceptional circumstances that might have justified dispensing with a hearing. The Administrative Court was the first and only judicial body before which the applicant's case was brought; it was able to examine the merits of his complaints; the review addressed not only issues of law but also important factual questions. That being so, and having due regard to the importance of the proceedings in question for the very existence of the applicant's tipping business, the right to a 'public hearing' included an entitlement to an 'oral hearing'. The refusal by the Administrative Court to hold such a hearing amounted therefore to a violation of A 6(1).

Fitt v United Kingdom 00/82

[Application lodged 30.11.1995; Commission report 20.10.1998; Court Judgment 16.2.2000]

Mr Barry Fitt was charged with various offences following an armed robbery of a Royal Mail van. The prosecution made applications to the trial judge that they should not be required to disclose certain material to the defence. Having heard submissions from the defence, the trial judge refused to order disclosure. The applicant gave evidence. On 16 May 1994 he was convicted of conspiracy to rob, possession of a firearm and possession of a prohibited weapon, and he was sentenced to 11 years' imprisonment. On 6 June 1995 the Court of Appeal upheld his conviction. The applicant complained that the proceedings before the Crown Court and the Court of Appeal undermined his right to a fair trial.

Comm found by majority (18–12) NV 6(1) in conjunction with 6(3)(b)+(d), unanimously NV 6(2) of the Convention.

Court found by majority (9–8) NV 6(1), unanimously not necessary to examine A 6(2).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm (d), Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach (d), Mr B Zupancic (d), Mrs N Vajic (d), Mr J Hedigan (d), Mrs W Thomassen (d), Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska (d), Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja (d), Sir John Laws, ad hoc judge.

The guarantees in A 6(3) were specific aspects of the right to a fair trial in A 6(1). It was a fundamental aspect of the right to a fair trial that criminal proceedings, including the elements of such proceedings which related to procedure, should be adversarial and that there should be equality of arms between the prosecution and defence. The right to an adversarial trial meant, in a criminal case, that both prosecution and defence must be given the opportunity to have knowledge of and comment on the observations filed and the evidence adduced by the other party. In addition, A 6(1) required that the prosecution authorities should disclose to the defence all material evidence in their possession for or against the accused. However, the entitlement to disclosure of relevant evidence was not an absolute right. In any criminal proceedings there might be competing interests, such as national security or the need to protect witnesses at risk of reprisals or keep secret police methods of investigation of crime, which had to be weighed against the rights of the accused, and it might be necessary to withhold certain evidence from the defence so as to preserve the fundamental rights of another individual or to safeguard an important public interest. However, only such measures restricting the rights of the defence which were strictly necessary were permissible under A 6(1). Moreover, in order to ensure that the accused receives a fair trial, any difficulties caused to the defence by a limitation on its rights had to be sufficiently counterbalanced by the procedures followed by the judicial authorities. In cases where evidence had been withheld from the defence on public interest grounds, it was not the role of this Court to decide whether or not such non-disclosure was strictly necessary since, as a general rule, it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court had to scrutinise the decision-making procedure to ensure that, as far as possible, it complied with the requirements to provide adversarial proceedings and equality of arms and incorporated adequate safeguards to protect the interests of the accused. The defence were kept informed and permitted to make submissions and participate in the decision-making process as far as was possible without revealing to them the material which the prosecution sought to keep secret on public interest grounds. The material which was not disclosed in the present case formed no part of the prosecution case and was never put to the jury. The fact that the need for disclosure was at all times under assessment by the trial judge provided a further, important, safeguard in that it was his duty to monitor throughout the trial the fairness or otherwise of the evidence being withheld. The judge was fully versed in all the evidence and issues in the case and in a position to monitor the relevance to the defence of the withheld information both before and during the trial. It could be assumed that the judge applied the principles which had recently been clarified by the Court of Appeal in such cases. The trial court had applied standards which were in conformity with the relevant principles of a fair trial embodied in A 6(1). The Court of Appeal had also considered whether or not the evidence should have been disclosed, so providing an additional level of protection for the applicant's rights. The decision-making procedure complied with the requirements of adversarial proceedings and equality of arms and incorporated adequate safeguards to protect the interests of the accused therefore there had been no violation of A 6(1) in the present case.

The applicant did not pursue before the Court his complaint under A 6(2) and the Court saw no reason to examine it of its own motion.

The Government were estopped from raising the argument regarding non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, it was for the State to establish the existence of available remedies and raise the objection before the Commission. That had not been done.

Although the decision to prosecute the applicants dated back to 1970, 1971 and 1973 for the various proceedings in respect of the various applicants, the periods to be considered began only on 1 August 1973, when the recognition by Italy of the right of individual petition took effect. However, in assessing the reasonableness of the time that elapsed after 31 July 1973, account had to be taken of the then state of proceedings. The various ends of the periods to be taken into account for the applicants resulted in the length of time exceeding four years, six months in the first proceedings against Mr Foti, five years, 10 months in the second proceedings against him and three years, 10 months in the third proceedings against him; three years, five months in the case of Mr Lentini; four years, 10 months in the case of Mr Cenerini; five years, two months in the case of Mr Gulli. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed according to the particular circumstances having regard to the complexity of the case and the conduct of the parties. The cases were not complex and, except in the second Foti case, they were dealt with at one jurisdictional level alone. The applicants were not responsible for delays. The unusual political and social climate at the time and the effects of the troubles on the workings of criminal justice (notably the exceptional backlog of business) had to be considered; in particular, normal lapses of time stemming from the transfer of the cases were not to be regarded as unjustified. However, the six sets of proceedings brought against the applicants were subject to delays incompatible with A 6(1).

It was superfluous to decide on the application of A 13 as the parties had not pursued the matter and in view of the conclusion that there has been a breach of A 6(1).

FS (Mr Foti and Mr Lentini to be paid ITL 6 million each, part of which was destined for their lawyers; partial settlement reached in the case of Mr Gulli, and State to pay ITL 1,000,000 in respect of his lawyer's fees and expenses; ITL 10,000,000 to Mr Cenerini for damage suffered), therefore SO.

Foucher v France 97/14

Mr Frédéric Foucher and his father were charged with having used insulting and threatening words and behaviour towards public-service employees – two national game and wildlife wardens – on 13 February 1991 in Fontenai-sur-Orne. The applicant decided to conduct his own case but was informed that copies of official reports could not be issued to him. The applicant complained about lack of access to the file and the police court upheld his submissions. The public prosecutor's office and the civil parties appealed to the Caen Court of Appeal. The applicant did not attend the hearing. The Court of Appeal reversed the judgment of the police court. Relying on the official report of the two game wardens and on the statements made by another hunter, the Court of Appeal fined the applicant and his father FF 3,000 each for insulting the game wardens. The Court of Cassation dismissed the applicant's appeal. The applicant complained of an infringement of the rights of the defence in that he had not been able to have access to his case file or to obtain a copy of the documents in it.

The guarantees in A 6(3) were specific aspects of the right to a fair trial set forth in general in A 6(1). It was therefore appropriate to examine the complaint under the two provisions taken together. Both the Caen Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation took it as settled that the applicant had not been able to have access to his case file or to obtain a copy of the documents in it and considered that there was no requirement to that effect under A 6 of the Convention. According to the principle of equality of arms, as one of the features of the wider concept of a fair trial, each party must be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present his case in conditions that do not place him at a disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent. The applicant had chosen to conduct his own case. As he had been committed directly for trial in the police court without a preliminary investigation, the question of ensuring the confidentiality of the investigation did not arise. His conviction by the Caen Court of Appeal was based solely on the game wardens' official report. It was important, therefore, for the applicant to have access to his case file and to obtain a copy of the documents it contained in order to be able to challenge the official report concerning him. Without access, the applicant had been unable to prepare an adequate defence and had not been afforded equality of arms, contrary to A 6(1)+6(3).

Fouquet v France (1996) 22 EHRR 279 96/1

[Application lodged 15.4.1992; Commission report 12.10.1994; Court Judgment 31.1.1996]

On 26 March 1985, while he was travelling on a moped, Mr Marc Fouquet, aged 14, was knocked over and seriously injured by a car driven by Mr D. The applicant's father, acting on his son's behalf, brought an action for damages against Mr D and his insurer. The court found Mr Marc Fouquet contributorily negligent and reduced the award of damages by 50%. The applicant and his father appealed to the Poitiers Court of Appeal which, in a judgment of 13 September 1989, upheld the judgment of the court below. A subsequent appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed. The applicant complained that the Court of Cassation had made a mistake of fact when considering one of the grounds of appeal submitted to it and that that had given rise to a breach of his right to a fair hearing under A 6.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court struck case from the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr SK Martens, Mr AN Loizou, Mr F Bigi, Mr J Makarczyk.

The Court took note of the friendly settlement reached by the Government and Mr Fouquet and discerned no reason of public policy why the case should not be struck out of the list.

Fox, Campbell and Hartley v United Kingdom (1991) 13 EHRR 157 90/17

[Applications lodged 16.6.1986 and 2.9.1986; Commission report 4.5.1989; Court Judgment 30.8.1990 (merits) and 27.3.1991 (A 50)]

Mr Bernard Fox and Ms Marie Campbell were husband and wife, but separated. They lived in Northern Ireland. On 5 February 1986 they were stopped by police, arrested and questioned under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provision) Act 1978 about their suspected involvement in and membership of the Provisional IRA. The first applicant was detained for 44 hours and the second for 44 hours and five minutes. Mr Samuel Hartley was arrested at home on 19 August 1986 under the same Act. He was questioned about suspected involvement in a kidnapping thought to be connected to the Provisional IRA. He was detained for 30 hours and 15 minutes and released without charge. The applicants complained of their detentions.

Commission found by majority (7–5) V 5(1), 5(2) and 5(5), (9–3) NV 5(4), unanimously no separate issue under 13.

Court found by majority (4–3) V 5(1), unanimously NV 5(2), by majority (4–3) V 5(5), unanimously not necessary to examine 5(4)+13.

The Court recognised the need for a proper balance to be struck between the defence of institutions of democracy in the common interest and the protection of individual rights. It took into account the special nature of terrorist crime and the exigencies of dealing with it. The applicants did not dispute that their arrest was 'lawful' and 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law' but argued that their arrest and detention was not on 'reasonable suspicion' (A 5(1)(c)) but under the 1978 Act on an honestly held suspicion. The Court's task was not to review the impugned legislation in abstracto but to examine its application in particular cases. What may be regarded as 'reasonable' depended upon all the circumstances. Terrorist crime fell into a special category. However, the exigencies of dealing with terrorist crime could not justify stretching the notion of 'reasonableness' to the point where the essence of the safeguard in A 5(1)(c) was impaired. A 5(1)(c) should not be applied in such a manner as to put disproportionate difficulties in the way of police involved in counter-terrorism and they could not be asked to disclose confidential sources of information. However, in order to ascertain whether A 5(1)(c) safeguards had been secured, some facts had to be furnished to the Court, particularly in cases where domestic law did not require a reasonable suspicion but set a lower threshold of honest suspicion. The government had not provided any further information: the first two applicants had previous convictions for terrorism connected with the IRA seven years previously, they had been questioned about specific terrorist acts on this occasion, but that was not sufficient to support a conclusion of 'reasonable suspicion'. There had been a breach of A 5(1)(c). The interval of a few hours between arrest and questioning did not fall outside the time constraints imposed by the notion of promptness in A 5(2). All the applicants had been released speedily before any judicial control of their detention had taken place, accordingly not necessary to examine A 5(4). A breach of A 5(1) had been found which could not give rise to an enforceable claim for compensation before national courts and therefore there had been a violation of A 5(5). In the light of the conclusions under A 5(2) and A 5(4) it was not necessary to examine the complaint under A 13.

Foxley v United Kingdom 00/164

Mr Gordon Foxley was convicted on 3 November 1993, at the Crown Court, of 12 counts of corruption committed between 11 December 1979 and 7 August 1984, when he was employed by the Ministry of Defence as an ammunition procurement officer. The court sentenced him to imprisonment and a confiscation Order was made against him. His appeal was dismissed by the Court of Appeal on 6 February 1995. On 8 August 1996 a receiver was appointed to realise his assets. He was declared bankrupt and the same person was his Trustee in Bankruptcy. She made an order that all correspondence was re-directed to her so that she could identify his assets and income. A total of 71 letters were re-directed to the Receiver and Trustee in Bankruptcy which included letters from his legal advisers relating to the proceedings before the European Commission of Human Rights, and affidavits and drafts made or prepared for use in the High Court in relation to the receivership proceedings. Each of the letters was copied to file before being forwarded promptly to the applicant. Although the re-direction Order expired on 27 December 1996, it was only as from 18 January 1997 that the applicant began to receive his mail directly again. During that period there were two mail deliveries to the Trustee in Bankruptcy, a number of the items were copied to file before being forwarded to the applicant. The applicant complained of the interception of his correspondence.

Court found unanimously V 8 as regards the interception of the applicant's correspondence following the expiry of the period of the validity of the re-direction Order and as regards the interception of his correspondence covered by legal professional privilege during the period of the validity of the re-direction Order, not necessary to examine the applicant's complaint under 34 or under 6.

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr K Jungwiert, Sir Nicolas Bratza.

There was an interference with the applicant's right to respect for his correspondence. There was a legal basis for the interception of the applicant's correspondence up until 27 December 1996 and its perusal and copying to file by the Trustee in Bankruptcy. The Trustee in Bankruptcy's discretion to open, read and make copies of the applicant's correspondence was not open-ended but confined to particular items which might assist her in her capacity of Trustee in locating and securing the applicant's assets for the benefit of his creditors. However, the interference with the applicant's correspondence continued after the expiry of the Order. Regardless of the alleged breakdown in the administrative arrangements for re-directing the applicant's correspondence relied on by the Government, nevertheless the Trustee in Bankruptcy exercised her discretion to open letters and to retain copies of some of them even though she must have known that the re-direction Order which she herself applied for and obtained no longer provided her with a legal basis to interfere with the applicant's correspondence. On that account, the actions of the Trustee in Bankruptcy after 27 December 1996 were not in accordance with the law. There had therefore been a breach of A 8 and the Court found it was not necessary to examine with respect to these particular items of correspondence whether the other conditions of para 2 of A 8 were complied with.

The interference before the expiry of the Order pursued a legitimate aim; it was in furtherance of the protection of the rights of others, the applicant's creditors. In the field under consideration – the concealment of a bankrupt's assets to the detriment of his creditors – the authorities could consider it necessary to have recourse to the interception of a bankrupt's correspondence in order to identify and trace the sources of his income. Nevertheless, the implementation of the measures had to be accompanied by adequate and effective safeguards which ensured minimum impairment of the right to respect for his correspondence. That is particularly so where correspondence with the bankrupt's legal advisers might be intercepted. The lawyer-client relationship was, in principle, privileged and correspondence in that context, whatever its purpose, concerned matters of a private and confidential nature. It might be difficult to identify from the envelope whether its contents attracted legal professional privilege; however, the Government had not challenged the accuracy of the applicant's allegations that letters from his legal advisers, once opened, were read, photocopied and a copy committed to file before being forwarded to him. There was no justification for that procedure and the action taken was not in keeping with the principles of confidentiality and professional privilege attaching to relations between a lawyer and his client. The Government did not argue that the privileged channel of communication was being abused; nor had they invoked any other exceptional circumstances which would serve to justify the interference with reference to their margin of appreciation. The fact that the Trustee in Bankruptcy was also the court-appointed Receiver made it even more compelling to forward, unread, the applicant's correspondence from his legal adviser in connection with the receivership proceedings. There was no pressing social need for the opening, reading and copying to file of the applicant's correspondence with his legal advisers and accordingly, the interference was not necessary in a democratic society within the meaning of A 8(2) and there had been a breach in that respect.

For that reason, it was not necessary to examine the applicant's assertion that the facts of the case also gave rise to an interference with the exercise of his right of individual petition pursuant to A 34 of the Convention.

Where a lawyer was involved, an encroachment on professional secrecy might have repercussions on the proper administration of justice and hence on the rights guaranteed by A 6 of the Convention. However, the applicant had not provided the Court with any information on the conduct and outcome of the receivership proceedings. In those circumstances, and having regard to its finding of a violation of A 8, the Court did not consider it was necessary to examine the applicant's complaint under A 6.

Finding of violations constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the alleged non-pecuniary damage sustained by the applicant. Costs and expenses (GBP 6,000 less FF 4,100).

Frau v Italy 91/12

[Application lodged 22.12.1982; Commission report 5.12.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991]

Mr Aventino Frau was a lawyer and a Member of Parliament. He put a parliamentary question to the Minister of the Treasury concerning irregularities in the management of the 'Banco di Milano' which had been put into compulsory liquidation on 16 January 1975. The Director-General of the Bank was arrested for misappropriation of funds and fraudulent bankruptcy and subsequently brought proceedings against the applicant and the applicant's lawyer and adviser for obtaining money from him with menaces. On 21 October 1975 the public prosecutor transmitted the file to the investigating judge requesting him to conduct the investigation in the case. The applicant's parliamentary immunity was lifted. Following a trial the applicant was acquitted on the grounds of insufficient evidence. The judgment was filed with the court registry on 23 November 1979. The applicant appealed against this judgment. The Court of Appeal's judgment was filed with the court registry on 15 July 1982. It confirmed the applicant's acquittal, the judgment being based on the finding that no offence had been committed. The time limit for an appeal on a point of law by the prosecuting authorities expired on 3 July 1982. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 20 October 1975, the date on which the prosecuting authorities asked the Chamber of Deputies to lift the applicant's parliamentary immunity. It ended on 3 July 1982. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The proceedings were of some complexity, but there were several periods when they were not carried forward with reasonable expedition. The applicant's conduct did not give rise to any delay. A lapse of time of more than 6 years and 8 months could not be regarded as reasonable; there had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Fredin v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 784 91/2

[Application lodged 5.3.1986; Commission report 6.11.1989; Court Judgment 18.2.1991]

Mr Anders Fredin, an agricultural engineer, and his wife Mrs Maria Fredin owned several parcels of land including a farm and a gravel pit. In 1963 the family were granted a permit to exploit the land. On 1 July 1973 an amendment to the Nature Conservation Act 1964 empowered the County Administrative Board to revoke permits that were more than ten years old. On 25 August 1983 the County Administrative Board notified the applicants that, in the interest of nature conservation, it was contemplating amending the permit so as to provide that exploitation of the gravel pit should cease by 1 June 1984. The applicants appealed to the Government. The Government (Ministry of Agriculture) dismissed the appeal, stating that they concurred with the County Administrative Board's assessment. The applicants complained that the revocation of the exploitation permit amounted to a deprivation of property contrary to P1A1, that they had not had access to a court to challenge certain of the Government's decisions as required by A 6 and that the County Administrative Board had, in contravention of A 14 taken together with P1A1, discriminated against them because they were the sole independent operators in the area.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), NV P1A1, P1A1+14.

Court found unanimously NV P1A1, P1A1+14, V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (so), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm.

The revocation of the permit interfered with the applicants' right to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions, including the economic interests connected with the exploitation of the gravel pit. P1A1 guaranteed the right of property and comprised three distinct rules. The first, expressed in the first sentence of the first paragraph, was of a general nature, laying down the principle of peaceful enjoyment of property. The second rule, in the second sentence of the same paragraph, covered deprivation of possessions and subjected it to certain conditions. The third, contained in the second paragraph, recognised that the Contracting States were entitled, amongst other things, to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest, by enforcing such laws as they deemed necessary for the purpose. However, the rules were not 'distinct' in the sense of being unconnected: the second and third rules are concerned with particular instances of interference with the right to peaceful enjoyment of property. They therefore had to be construed in the light of the general principle laid down in the first rule. There was no formal expropriation of the applicants' property. However, 'deprivation' in P1A1 covered not only formal expropriation but also measures which amounted to a de facto expropriation. The impugned measure was designed to control the applicants' use of their possessions and left unaffected their powers to take formal decisions, within the normal boundaries of the law, concerning the fate of their property and of their company. Considering all the evidence, the Court did not find it established that the revocation took away all meaningful use of the properties in question. The applicants were still the owners of the gravel resources on the property. The revocation of the 1963 permit had serious adverse effects on the income derivable from the possessions involved, and also on their value. However, the exploitation of gravel had become more and more regulated and restricted. The amendment to the 1964 Act empowered the authorities to revoke, without compensation, old permits, such as the applicants', after 10 years had passed. Consequently, the applicants' possibilities of continuing their gravel exploitation business after that date became uncertain. In the light of the above considerations, the revocation of the applicants' permit to exploit gravel could not be regarded as amounting to a deprivation of possessions within the meaning of the first paragraph of P1A1. The aim of the relevant legislation was the protection of nature. The evidence available did not show that the revocation decision was contrary to Swedish law. The relevant provisions of the 1964 Act indicated the scope and manner of exercise of the discretion conferred on the authorities with sufficient precision, having regard to the subject matter, to meet the requirements of the Convention. The absence of judicial review did not amount, in itself, to a violation of P1A1. An interference had to achieve a 'fair balance' between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. In determining whether that requirement was met, it was recognised that the State enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation with regard both to choosing the means of enforcement and to ascertaining whether the consequences of enforcement were justified in the general interest for the purpose of achieving the object of the law in question. The applicants suffered substantial losses having regard to the potential of the gravel pit if it had been exploited in accordance with the 1963 permit. However, reliance could not be placed solely on that potential when the effects of the revocation in 1984 came to be assessed; account has to be taken also of the restrictions lawfully imposed on the use of the pit. The applicants must have been aware of the possibility that they might lose their permit after the expiry of the 10 year period. Nor had authorities given them any assurances that they would be allowed to continue to extract gravel after that date. The applicants could only have relied on the authorities' obligation to take due account of their interests, but that obligation could not have founded any legitimate expectations on their part of being able to continue exploitation for a long period of time. The applicants were granted a three-year closing-down period and the authorities showed a certain flexibility in subsequently extending it by eleven months at the applicants' request. For all those reasons it could not be said that the revocation decision was inappropriate or disproportionate. Therefore no violation of P1A1 had been established.

A 14 afforded protection against discrimination, that is, treating differently, without an objective and reasonable justification, persons in 'relevantly' similar situations. For a claim of violation of A 14 to succeed, it had to be established, inter alia, that the situation of the alleged victim could be considered similar to that of persons who had been better treated. The applicants' pit appeared to be the only one to have been closed by virtue of the amendment to the legislation. However, that was not sufficient to support a finding that the applicants' situation could be considered similar to that of other ongoing businesses which had not been closed. Accordingly no issue of discrimination contrary to A 14 arose.

A 6: the applicants' right to develop their property in accordance with the applicable laws and regulations was 'civil' within the meaning of A 6(1). There was clearly a 'genuine and serious' dispute between them and the authorities regarding the lawfulness of the impugned decisions and the outcome of that dispute was directly decisive for that right. A 6 was therefore applicable. As the dispute in question could, at the relevant time, be determined only by the Government at the final instance, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Fredin (No 2) v Sweden 94/6

The applicant and his wife owned land which included a gravel pit. They held a permit to extract gravel from the pit from 14 April 1983 until 1 December 1988, when the permit was revoked; it had previously been extended on the understanding that the activities in question would be terminated and restoration work carried out on the land by the latter date. The revocation of the permit, and the lack of a court remedy, gave rise to Fredin (No 1) v S. Following the revocation on 1 December 1988, the applicant applied to the County Administrative Board for a special extraction permit, so that he could comply with a plan adopted by the Board on 9 March 1987 for the restoration of the pit. The application was dismissed by the Board on 14 March 1989 and an appeal by the applicant against this decision was rejected by the Government (the Ministry of Environment and Energy) on 21 June 1989. The applicant applied to the Supreme Administrative Court for a review, asking for an oral hearing. The Supreme Administrative Court dismissed the request for an oral hearing and on the basis of written observations submitted by the applicant and the County Administrative Board, it concluded unanimously that the Government's decision was not unlawful. The applicant complained that he had been denied a 'fair and public hearing' in breach of A 6(1).

Comm found by majority (16–2) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha.

A 6 was applicable to the proceedings. In proceedings before a court of first and only instance the right to a 'public hearing' in the sense of A(1) might entail an entitlement to an 'oral hearing'. The Supreme Administrative Court acted as the first and only judicial instance in the contested proceedings. Its jurisdiction included matters of law and factual issues. In such circumstances at least A 6(1) guaranteed a right to an oral hearing. Accordingly, the refusal by the Supreme Administrative Court to hold an oral hearing in the applicant's case constituted a violation of A 6(1).

Freedom and Democracy Party (ÖZDEP) v Turkey 99/96

(Application lodged 21.3.1994; Commission report 12.3.1998; Court Judgment 8.12.1999]

The Freedom and Democracy Party (ÖZDEP) was founded on 19 October 1992. On 29 January 1993 the Principal State Counsel at the Court of Cassation applied to the Turkish Constitutional Court to have ÖZDEP dissolved on the grounds that it had infringed the principles of the Constitution and the Law on the regulation of political parties in that its programme sought to undermine the territorial integrity and secular nature of the State and the unity of the nation. While the Constitutional Court proceedings were still pending, a meeting of the founding members of ÖZDEP resolved to dissolve the party in order to protect themselves from the consequences of a dissolution order. On 14 July 1993 the Constitutional Court made an order dissolving ÖZDEP. The applicant party complained that its dissolution by the Constitutional Court infringed the rights of its members to freedom of association.

Comm found by majority (29–1) V 11, no separate issue 9 or 10, not necessary to examine separately 14.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 11, not necessary to consider 9, 10 or 14.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs Hs Greve, Mr A Baka, Mrs S Botoucharova, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge.

The Government did not raise before the Commission the preliminary objection that ÖZDEP did not have standing as a victim. Consequently, an estoppel should arise against them. In its report, however, the Commission examined that issue of its own motion. If an estoppel was nonetheless held to arise against the Government, they would be deprived of an opportunity to make representations on a point that was considered by the Commission of its own motion and was the subject of argument before the Court. That appeared inconsistent with the principles of adversarial procedure and equality of arms. Consequently, the Government had to be permitted to raise the objection concerned even though it was made out of time. ÖZDEP's leaders resolved to dissolve their party in the hope of avoiding certain effects of a dissolution by the Constitutional Court: The decision of ÖZDEP's leaders to dissolve the party was not made freely. The Law on the regulation of political parties provided that voluntarily dissolved political parties continued to exist for the purposes of dissolution by the Constitutional Court. Therefore, the Government could not contend that ÖZDEP was no longer in existence when the dissolution order was made. Consequently, the Government's preliminary objection was dismissed.

ÖZDEP's dissolution amounted to an interference in the freedom of association of its members. The interference was prescribed by law being based on the Constitution and the Law on the regulation of political parties. The impugned measures could be regarded as having pursued at least one of the legitimate aims set out in A 11, namely the protection of territorial integrity and thus the preservation of national security. Notwithstanding its autonomous role and particular sphere of application, A 11 had to also be considered in the light of A 10. The protection of opinions and the freedom to express them was one of the objectives of the freedoms of assembly and association as enshrined in A 11. That applied all the more in relation to political parties in view of their essential role in ensuring pluralism and the proper functioning of democracy. There was nothing in ÖZDEP's programme that could be considered a call for the use of violence, an uprising or any other form of rejection of democratic principles. On the contrary, the need to abide by democratic rules when implementing the proposed political project was stressed in the programme. Taken together, the passages in issue presented a political project whose aim was in essence the establishment, in accordance with democratic rules, of 'a social order encompassing the Turkish and Kurdish peoples'. In its programme, ÖZDEP also referred to the right to self-determination of the 'national or religious minorities'; however, taken in context, those words did not encourage people to seek separation from Turkey but were intended instead to emphasise that the proposed political project must be underpinned by the freely given, democratically expressed, consent of the Kurds. The fact that such a political project was considered incompatible with the current principles and structures of the Turkish State did not mean that it infringed democratic rules. It was of the essence of democracy to allow diverse political projects to be proposed and debated, even those that called into question the way a State was currently organised, provided that they did not harm democracy. Given the absence of any concrete acts suggesting that the passages concerned might conceal a different political design from the publicly proclaimed one, there was no reason to cast doubts on the genuineness of ÖZDEP's programme. ÖZDEP was therefore penalised solely for exercising its freedom of expression. In view of the essential role played by political parties in the proper functioning of democracy, the exceptions set out in A 11 were, where political parties were concerned, to be construed strictly; only convincing and compelling reasons could justify restrictions on such parties' freedom of association. The interference in issue was radical: ÖZDEP was definitively dissolved with immediate effect, its assets were liquidated and transferred ipso iure to the Treasury and its leaders were banned from carrying on certain similar political activities. Such drastic measures should be taken only in the most serious cases. The Court took into account the background of cases before it, in particular the difficulties associated with the fight against terrorism. The Government had failed to explain how, as they claimed, ÖZDEP bore a share of the responsibility for the problems caused by terrorism in Turkey as ÖZDEP scarcely had time to take any significant action. ÖZDEP's dissolution was disproportionate to the aim pursued and consequently unnecessary in a democratic society. It followed that there had been a violation of A 11.

The complaints under A 9, 10 and 14 related to the same matters as those considered under A 11; the Court did not consider it necessary to examine them separately.

Fressoz and Roire v France 99/1

(Application lodged 3.8.1995; Commission report 13.1.1998; Court Judgment 21.1.1999]

Mr Roger Fressoz was a former publishing director of the weekly satirical newspaper Le Canard enchaîné. Mr Claude Roire was a journalist on the paper. In September 1989 there was a period of industrial unrest within the Peugeot motor company. The workforce's demands included pay rises, which the management, led by the company chairman and managing director Mr Jacques Calvet, refused to award. On 27 September 1989, Le Canard enchaîné published an article by Mr Roire referring to salary increases awarded to Mr Jacques Calvet. The article was illustrated by a box reproducing a photocopy of extracts from Mr Calvet's last three tax assessments. Following a criminal complaint by Mr Calvet, the applicants were committed for trial before the Criminal Court on charges of handling confidential information concerning Mr Calvet's income obtained through a breach of professional confidence by an unidentified tax official and of handling stolen photocopies of Mr Calvet's tax assessments. On 17 June 1992, Paris Criminal Court acquitted the applicants. The public prosecutor and the civil parties claiming damages appealed. On 10 March 1993, Paris Court of Appeal reversed the judgment and found the applicants guilty of handling photocopies of Mr Calvet's tax returns obtained through a breach of professional confidence by an unidentified tax official. They were sentenced to, respectively, fines of FF 10,000 and FF 5,000 and ordered, jointly and severally, to pay Mr Calvet FF 1 by way of damages for non-pecuniary damage and FF 10,000 by way of reimbursement of legal costs. Their appeal to the Court of Cassation on points of law was dismissed on 3 April 1995. They complained that their conviction by the Court of Appeal constituted a breach of their right to freedom of expression and that the principle of the presumption of innocence had been violated in their case.

Comm found by majority (21–11) V 10, (18–14) no separate issue under 6(2).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 10, no separate issue under 6(2).

The applicants' complaint under A 10 was raised, at least in substance, before the Court of Cassation and therefore the Government's objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies had to be dismissed.

The applicants' conviction was an interference with the exercise of their right to freedom of expression. The interference was prescribed by law, namely the Criminal Code and the Code of Tax Procedure. The interference was intended to protect the reputation or rights of others and to prevent the disclosure of information received in confidence. The Court recalled its case-law. The Court was unconvinced by the Government's argument that the information was not a matter of general interest. The article was published during an industrial dispute, widely reported in the press, at one of the major French car manufacturers. The workers were seeking a pay rise which the management were refusing. The article showed that the company chairman had received large pay increases during the period under consideration while at the same time opposing his employees' claims for a rise. By making such a comparison against that background, the article contributed to a public debate on a matter of general interest. It was not intended to damage Mr Calvet's reputation, but to contribute to the more general debate on a topic that interested the public. Not only did the press have the task of imparting information and ideas on matters of public interest: the public also had a right to receive them. That was particularly true in the instant case, as issues concerning employment and pay generally attracted considerable attention. Consequently, an interference with the exercise of press freedom could not be compatible with A 10 unless it was justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest. Although the press played a vital role in a democratic society, journalists could not, in principle, be released from their duty to obey the ordinary criminal law on the basis that A 10 afforded them protection. It fell to be decided whether, in the particular circumstances of the case, the interest in the public's being informed outweighed the duties and responsibilities the applicants had as a result of the suspect origin of the documents that were sent to them. The Court had in particular to determine whether the objective of protecting fiscal confidentiality, which in itself was legitimate, constituted a relevant and sufficient justification for the interference. In that connection, it had to be noted that although the applicants' conviction was based solely on the reproduction in Le Canard enchaîné of documents in the possession of the tax authorities that were held to have been communicated to Mr Fressoz and Mr Roire in breach of professional confidence, it inevitably concerned the disclosure of information. The issue did, however, arise as to whether there was any need to prevent the disclosure of information that was already available to the public and might already have been known to a large number of people. As the Government accepted, a degree of transparency existed regarding earnings and pay rises. Local taxpayers could consult a list of the people liable for tax in their municipality, with details of each taxpayer's taxable income and tax liability. While that information could not be disseminated, it was accessible to a large number of people who could in turn pass it on to others. Although publication of the tax assessments in the present case was prohibited, the information they contained was not confidential. Indeed, the remuneration of people who, like Mr Calvet, run major companies was regularly published in financial reviews. Accordingly, there was no overriding requirement for the information to be protected as confidential. If, as the Government accepted, the information about Mr Calvet's annual income was lawful and its disclosure permitted, the applicants' conviction merely for having published the documents in which that information was contained, namely the tax assessments, could not be justified under A 10. In essence, that article left it for journalists to decide whether or not it was necessary to reproduce such documents to ensure credibility. It protected journalists' right to divulge information on issues of general interest provided that they are acting in good faith and on an accurate factual basis and provided reliable and precise information in accordance with the ethics of journalism. Neither Mr Fressoz and Mr Roire's account of the events nor their good faith had been called into question. Mr Roire, who verified the authenticity of the tax assessments, acted in accordance with the standards governing his profession as a journalist. The extracts from each document were intended to corroborate the terms of the article in question. The publication of the tax assessments was thus relevant not only to the subject matter but also to the credibility of the information supplied. In sum, there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the legitimate aim pursued by the journalists' conviction and the means deployed to achieve that aim, given the interest a democratic society had in ensuring and preserving freedom of the press. There had therefore been a violation of A 10.

In the light of the findings under A 10, no separate issue arose under A 6(2).

Friedl v Austria (1996) 21 EHRR 83 95/1

[Application lodged 5.6.1989; Commission report 19.5.1994; Court Judgment 31.1.1995]

Mr Ludwig Friedl was one of the participants in a demonstration that he had organised with other persons with a view to drawing public attention to the plight of the homeless. The demonstration began on 12 February 1988 in an underground passage for pedestrians; there was a round-the-clock sit-in of some 50 persons which was organised to coincide with the demonstration. Police accompanied by municipal officials attended and instructed the homeless persons to leave and informed them that their demonstration required an authorisation under the Road Traffic Act. As the demonstrators did not immediately comply, the identities of some of them were taken down. In the course of the operation the police took photographs for use in the event of prosecution. The whole proceedings were also recorded on video-cassette. The applicant complained to the Constitutional Court of breaches of his rights under in particular A 8 and 11 of the Convention. The Constitutional Court rejected his complaint.

Comm found unanimously NV 8, by majority (19–4) V 13 as regards a remedy in respect of the gathering and taking down of personal data, (14–9) NV 13 as regards a remedy in respect of the taking of photographs and their storing.

Court unanimously struck case out of list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AB Baka, Mr L Wildhaber.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached between the Government and Mr Friedl. It discerned no reason of public policy militating against striking the case out of the list.

FS (payment of ATS 148,787.60 to the applicant and destruction of all the photographs and negatives in question), therefore case struck out of list.

Frydlender v France 00/166

[Application lodged 20.11.1995; Commission report 20.10.1998; Court Judgment 27.6.2999]

Mr Nicolas Frydlender was engaged as an official employed under an individual contract by the Economic Development Department of the Ministry for Economic Affairs. Under a contract of 29 September 1977 he was sent to Athens to work as a technical adviser. In a letter dated 10 December 1985, which was served on the applicant on 27 December 1985, the Minister for Economic Affairs informed the applicant that, owing to his inadequate performance, he did not intend to renew his contract when it expired on 13 April 1986. In a letter dated 9 January 1986, served on the applicant on 21 January 1986, the Minister informed him of his final decision not to renew the contract. The applicant lodged three applications for judicial review of this decision with the Paris Administrative Court. In a judgment of 6 January 1989 the Paris Administrative Court, having joined all three applications, dismissed them. On 24 October 1989 the applicant gave notice of an appeal to the Conseil d'Etat on points of law. He lodged a statement of the grounds of appeal on 23 February 1990. In a judgment of 10 May 1995, which was served on the applicant on 26 October 1995, the Conseil d'Etat dismissed the appeal, holding inter alia that it had been lawful for the Minister to dismiss the applicant on the ground of inadequate performance. The applicant complained of the length of the administrative proceedings.

Comm found by majority (20–10) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mrs F Tulkens (C), Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall, Mr B Zupanic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr T Pantiru, Mr K Traja.

There was a dispute over a right recognised under domestic law, it was genuine and serious and the outcome of the proceedings was directly decisive for the right concerned. The dispute related to a right which was civil by its nature. In order to determine the applicability of A 6(1) to public servants, whether established or employed under contract, the Court considered that it should adopt a functional criterion based on the nature of the official's duties and responsibilities. The only disputes excluded from the scope of A 6(1) were those raised by public servants whose duties typified the specific activities of the public service in so far as the latter was acting as the depositary of public authority responsible for protecting the general interests of the State or other public authorities. The documents in the file showed that the applicant, a graduate of the National Agronomic Institute in Paris, was posted to the New York economic development office as head of an autonomous section, to handle more specifically the promotion of French wines, beers and spirits. In view of the nature of the duties performed in the present case by the applicant and the relatively low level of his responsibilities, the Court considered that he was not carrying out any task which could be said to entail, either directly or indirectly, duties designed to safeguard the general interests of the State. The Pellegrin judgment was intended to restrict cases in which public servants could be denied the practical and effective protection afforded to them, as to any other person, by the Convention, and in particular by A 6. The Court had to adopt a restrictive interpretation, in accordance with the object and purpose of the Convention, of the exceptions to the safeguards afforded by A 6(1). But the restrictive interpretation would be too seriously weakened if, as the Government wished in the present case, the Court were to find, by analogy or by extension, that the activities of the staff of the economic development offices as a whole, whatever the nature of their duties and their level of responsibility, entailed the exercise of powers conferred by public law. In the light of those considerations, the Court considered that A 6 was applicable in the present case to the dispute over a civil right between Mr Frydlender and the French State.

The proceedings began on 28 February 1986 with the first application to the Paris Administrative Court and ended on 26 October 1995 when the Conseil d'Etat's judgment was served on the applicant, nearly nine years and eight months. The reasonableness of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and with reference to the complexity of the case, the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities and what was at stake for the applicant in the dispute. Neither the complexity of the case nor the applicant's conduct explained the length of the proceedings. The Conseil d'Etat gave judgment nearly six years after the case was referred to it and the Government did not supply any explanation of that delay, which appeared manifestly excessive. It was for the Contracting States to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could guarantee to everyone the right to a final decision within a reasonable time in the determination of his civil rights and obligations. An employee who considered that he had been wrongly suspended or dismissed by his employer had an important personal interest in securing a judicial decision on the lawfulness of that measure promptly, since employment disputes by their nature called for expeditious decision, in view of what was at stake for the person concerned, who through dismissal lost his means of subsistence. In the light of the criteria laid down in its case-law and having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the length of the proceedings complained of was excessive and failed to satisfy the reasonable-time requirement. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1).

Fuentes Bobo v Spain 00/87

[Application lodged 5.1.1998; Court Judgment 29.2.2000]

Mr Bernardo Fuentes Bobo had been employed by the Spanish State Television company (TVE) since 1971 as a producer. At the end of 1992, his programme was dropped and no replacement post was offered to him. Following a demonstration by staff on 23 October 1993 about the way TVE was managed, the applicant and a colleague co-authored an article in the newspaper Diario 16 criticising certain of the management's actions. Following exchange of letters and disciplinary proceedings the applicant was suspended without pay. Identical penalties were imposed on a certain LCM. The applicant's appeal to the Madrid Labour Court No 10 was dismissed, but the Madrid Labour Court No 34 set aside the penalty imposed on LCM. The applicant appealed to the Madrid High Court, which overturned the lower court's judgment and set aside the disciplinary penalty. In the meantime, the applicant had commented on the penalties and TVE's actions in two radio programmes during which he made remarks about TVE's managers which were considered offensive. Those remarks led to further disciplinary proceedings and ended with the applicant's dismissal on 15 April 1994. The applicant appealed; the Madrid Labour Court No 4 allowed his appeal, but it was overturned by the Madrid High Court. The Supreme Court and Constitutional Court rejected his further appeal. He complained that his dismissal infringed his right to freedom of expression.

Court found by majority (5–2) V 10, unanimously not necessary to examine 14.

Judges: Mr M Pellonpää, President, Mr G Ress, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Caflisch (D), Mr J Makarczyk (D), Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mrs N Vajic.

A 10 also applied when relations between employer and employee were governed by private law and, moreover, the State had a positive obligation in certain cases to protect the right to freedom of expression. Even though the interference concerned had been prescribed by law and pursued a legitimate aim, namely, the protection of the reputation or rights of others, it did not, on the facts of the case and in view of the severity of the penalty imposed on the applicant, meet a pressing social need. The statements had been made in the context of a labour dispute and the failings of the public entity denounced by the applicant were of a general nature. The 'offensive' remarks attributed to the applicant had first been used by radio-show hosts in exchanges that had been both lively and spontaneous. There was nothing to indicate that TVE or the supposed targets of the remarks had taken any legal action against the applicant. Notwithstanding the national authorities' margin of appreciation, the relation between the penalty and the legitimate aim pursued was not reasonably proportionate. Therefore there had been a violation of A 10.

In the light of the finding under A10 it was not necessary to examine A 14.

Funke v France (1993) 16 EHRR 297 93/3

[Application lodged 13.2.1984; Commission report 8.10.1991; Court Judgment 25.2.1993]

Mr Jean-Gustave Funke worked as a sales representative. On 14 January 1980 three Strasbourg customs officers, accompanied by a senior police officer, went to the house of the applicant and his wife to obtain particulars of their assets abroad. The customs officers' search and the seizures did not lead to any criminal proceedings for offences against the regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries. They did, however, give rise to parallel proceedings for disclosure of documents and for interim orders. The applicant was convicted and fined. His subsequent appeals were unsuccessful. He claimed that his criminal conviction for refusal to produce the documents requested by the customs had violated his right to a fair trial and disregarded the principle of presumption of innocence, that his case had not been heard within a reasonable time and that the search and seizures effected at his home by customs officers had infringed his right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

Comm found by majority (7–5) NV 6(1) as regards the principle of a fair trial, (8–4) NV 6(1) on account of the length of the proceedings, (9–3) NV 6(2), (6–6 with President's casting vote) NV 8.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (8–1) V 6(1) as regards a fair trial, not necessary to consider other complaints under 6, V 8.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (d), Mr F Matscher (c), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber.

The Government's objection of inadmissibility for lack of victim status was on the basis that no criminal proceedings had been taken against the applicant for contravening the regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries, and his death on 22 July 1987 finally precluded any prosecution. The applicant's complaints under A 6 related to quite different proceedings, those concerning the production of documents. The objection therefore had to be dismissed.

The customs secured the applicant's conviction in order to obtain certain documents which they believed existed, although they were not certain of the fact. Being unable or unwilling to procure them by some other means, they attempted to compel the applicant himself to provide the evidence of offences he had allegedly committed. The special features of customs law could not justify such an infringement of the right of anyone charged with a criminal offence, within the autonomous meaning of that expression in A 6, to remain silent and not to contribute to incriminating himself. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

In view of that conclusion it was not necessary to ascertain whether the conviction also contravened the principle of presumption of innocence.

Likewise, it was not necessary to examine the complaint that the proceedings relating to the making and discharge of the interim orders lasted for more than a reasonable time.

All the rights secured in A 8(1) were in issue, except for the right to respect for family life. The interferences complained of were incompatible with A 8 and it was not necessary to consider, therefore, whether they were in accordance with the law. The interferences were in the interests of the economic well-being of the country. Contracting States had a certain margin of appreciation in assessing the need for an interference, but it went hand in hand with European supervision. The exceptions provided for in A 8(2) were to be interpreted narrowly, and the need for them in a given case had to be convincingly established. In the field under consideration – the prevention of capital outflows and tax evasion – States encountered serious difficulties owing to the scale and complexity of banking systems and financial channels and to the immense scope for international investment, made all the easier by the relative porousness of national borders. Therefore States may have to have recourse to measures such as house searches and seizures in order to obtain physical evidence of exchange-control offences and, where appropriate, to prosecute those responsible. Nevertheless, the relevant legislation and practice had to afford adequate and effective safeguards against abuse. That was not so in the present case. The customs authorities had very wide powers. In the absence of any requirement of a judicial warrant, the restrictions and conditions provided for in law appeared too lax and full of loopholes for the interferences with the applicant's rights to have been strictly proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. In this particular case the customs authorities never lodged a complaint against the applicant alleging an offence against the regulations governing financial dealings with foreign countries. There had been a breach of A 8.

Fusco v Italy 97/61

[Application lodged 12.3.1994; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mrs Raffaella Fusco was a secretary. On 24 April 1980 she was recruited on a fixed-term contract to the accounts department of Benevento District Council. As her contract had not been renewed after 31 December 1983, she required the Council on 31 July 1984 to reinstate her within 60 days. When that time-limit expired she applied to the Campania Regional Administrative Court on 8 October 1984 for judicial review of her employer's tacit refusal and recognition of the existence of a permanent contract of employment, in consideration, inter alia, of the conditions under which she had performed her duties, which, she asserted, were comparable to those obtaining in the case of an ordinary contract of employment with the administrative authorities. In a judgment delivered on 18 April 1995 and deposited with the registry on 26 September 1995 the RAC declared the application inadmissible. On 21 November 1995 she appealed to the Consiglio di Stato and those proceedings were still pending. She complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (23–6) V 6.

Court found by majority (8–1) 6(1) not applicable.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr C Russo, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen (D), Mr Ab Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits.

The complaint of a lack of fair and public hearing fell outside the scope of the case as defined by the Commission's decision on admissibility, since it was not examined either in that decision or in the report.

In the law of many Member States of the Council of Europe there was a basic distinction between civil servants and employees governed by private law. That had led it to hold that disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants are as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the instant case the applicant sought judicial review of her employer's tacit refusal to reinstate her in her post and recognition of the existence of a permanent contract of employment. The dispute raised by her related to her recruitment and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

G v France (1996) 21 EHRR 288 95/29

[Application lodged 19.7.1989; Commission report 29.6.1994; Court Judgment 27.9.1995]

Mr G, a driving test examiner, was charged on 14 December 1980 with accepting bribes by issuing driving licences in exchange for money. In the course of the investigation and following additional submissions from the prosecuting authority, the investigating judge charged him with 'corruption in the form of soliciting sexual favours' and indecent assault with violence or coercion on P, a driving test candidate. On 18 November 1982, the Rennes Criminal Court sentenced him to five years' imprisonment, two of which were suspended, for accepting bribes as a citizen responsible for a public service and indecent assault with violence or coercion by a person in authority. In so doing, the court was applying a Law of 23 December 1980. His further appeals were dismissed. He complained that his conviction for an act which, at the time of its commission, did not constitute an offence under the law in force infringed A 7 of the Convention and further that he had not had a fair trial.

Comm found unanimously NV 7.

Court found unanimously no jurisdiction to examine A 6(1), NV 7(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Mr B Repik, Mr U Lôhmus.

The compass of a case brought before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The Commission had found the complaint under A 6 inadmissible. The Court accordingly lacked jurisdiction to take cognisance of it. In addition, a decision by the Commission finding a complaint inadmissible was final and not open to appeal.

A 7(1) embodied generally the principle that only the law could define a crime and prescribe a penalty and prohibited in particular the retrospective application of the criminal law where it was to an accused's disadvantage. The offences of which the applicant was accused fell within the scope of the former Articles 332 and 333 of the Criminal Code, which satisfied the requirements of foreseeability and accessibility. There was consistent case-law from the Court of Cassation, which was published and therefore accessible, on the notions of violence and abuse of authority. As regards the notion of violence, the new provisions in the new Articles 332 and 333 of the Criminal Code merely confirmed that case-law. The acts of which the applicant was accused also fell within the scope of the new legislation. On the basis of the principle that the more lenient law should apply both as regards the definition of the offence and the sanctions imposed, the national courts applied the new Article 333 of the Criminal Code for the imposition of sanctions as that provision downgraded the offence of which Mr G was accused from serious offence to less serious offence. Its application, admittedly retrospective, therefore operated in the applicant's favour. There had been no violation of A 7(1).

G v Italy 92/8

[Application lodged 6.3.1987; 5.12.1990; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mr G took proceedings on 27 June 1985 against the X company before the Rome magistrates' court. He alleged that the company, which had employed him until October 1983, had not remunerated him in accordance with the managerial duties which he had discharged, and requested that it be ordered to pay him. On 28 April 1986 the magistrates' court dismissed the applicant's claim. He appealed. On 1 July 1988 the District Court upheld the decision by the magistrates' court. The text of the judgment was lodged with the court registry on 21 July 1988. The applicant complained of the length of proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 27 June 1985 when the proceedings against the X company were instituted in the Rome magistrates' court. It ended on 21 July 1989 when the District Court's judgment became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. There were delays on the part of the court. Regarding the backlog of the cases in the District Court, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The period in question nevertheless appeared acceptable if viewed in the context of the total duration of the proceedings, as it must be. Accordingly, the delays which occurred in the proceedings were not so substantial as to violate A 6(1).

[Application lodged 26.8.1998; Court Judgment 11.7.2000]

The applicants were Iranian nationals. They were anti-government activists in Iran where the first applicant claimed to have been detained and ill-treated on several occasions. As a result of his treatment the first applicant fled Iran, after which his wife, the second applicant, was subjected to harassment and threats from vigilante groups in connection with his disappearance. On 1 May 1997, the first applicant was interviewed by the UNHCR, which rejected his asylum claim on 13 June 1997. He appealed, and on 21 November 1997, the UNHCR rejected his appeal. On 18 August 1998, the applicants received a deportation order from the Turkish police. On 21 September 1998, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs reconfirmed that the applicants did not meet the criteria for the grant of refugee status. The UNHCR conducted a fresh examination of the first applicant's request for refugee status. Following that examination, and in light of new elements submitted by the first applicant, the UNHCR decided to grant him refugee status. As a result the Ministry of Foreign Affairs directed that the applicants be entitled to remain in Turkey temporarily, for humanitarian reasons, until they were resettled in a third country. In October 1999, the applicants left Turkey and were resettled in the US pursuant to a resettlement programme. The applicants complained that their deportation to Iran would subject them to the risk of death, torture and the break-up of their family and that they had no effective remedy in the domestic law of the respondent State to challenge their deportation from the standpoint of their Convention rights.

Court found unanimously not necessary to examine 2, 3+8, NV 13.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr Gaukur Jörundsson, Mr C Bîrsan, Mr J Casadevall, Mr R Maruste, judges, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge.

The applicants were now living in the US. Given that the fears which they harboured about their forced return to Iran had been removed, they could no longer claim to be victims within the meaning of A 34. On that account no further examination of their complaints under A 2, 3 and 8 of the Convention was required.

It was not the Court's function to review in abstracto the compatibility of the asylum regulations of the respondent State with the Convention. Contracting States had the right, as a matter of well-established international law and subject to their treaty obligations including the Convention, to control the entry, residence and expulsion of aliens. Moreover, the right to political asylum was not contained in either the Convention or its Protocols. Where an asylum seeker had an arguable claim that his expulsion would expose him to the risk of treatment prohibited by A 3, the domestic law of the deporting Contracting Party had to guarantee him the availability of a remedy to enforce the substance of his right under that Article. That obligation resulted from A 13, the effect of which was to require the provision of a domestic remedy allowing the competent national authority both to deal with the substance of the Convention complaint and to grant appropriate relief, although Contracting States were afforded some discretion as to the manner in which they conformed to their obligations under that provision. By the time the Ministry of Foreign Affairs confirmed that the applicants did not meet the requirements for the grant of refugee status (21 September 1998), they had not made out a claim under A 3 which could be said to be arguable on the merits: the UNHCR had on three occasions already rejected their applications for asylum and it was only when the applicants supplied further details that the UNHCR and ultimately the Ministry of Foreign Affairs were led to take a different view of the risk attendant on their deportation. In the absence of information about the new developments, the domestic authorities could not be accused of having underestimated the risk by imposing a deportation order on the applicants and then rejecting their appeal against it. When the merits of the applicants' claim were strengthened in the light of the new developments, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs allowed them to remain and from that moment there was no risk of summary deportation to Iran and no issue under A 13 from that date. Having regard to the conclusion that the applicants could not be considered to have an arguable claim at the material time that their rights under A 2, 3 and 8 would be breached if they were to be removed to Iran, the Court found that there had been no violation of A 13 in the circumstances of their case.

[Application lodged 9.12.1994; Commission report 3.6.1999; Court Judgment 21.12.1999]

In June 1990, the applicant appealed to the Federal Ministry for Health, Sports and Consumer Protection against the refusal of the Provincial Governor to grant him a licence to run a pharmacy. In April 1991, he appealed to he Administrative Court against the administration's failure to decide within the statutory time limit. The Ministry then refused his appeal and the applicant lodged a further appeal to the Administrative Court in July 1991. In December 1995, he withdrew his appeal after reaching an agreement with another pharmacist. He complained of the length of proceedings.

A 6 applied, since the private law aspects of the profession of pharmacist in Austria outweighed the public law features. The proceedings had taken more than 5 years 5 months of which more than 4 years and 4 months were before the Administrative Court, including a period of total inactivity of 3_ years. Although the proceedings were of some complexity, this argument had little weight as regards the proceedings before the Administrative Court, which did not examine the merits. Although the State had taken measures to reduce the court's workload, the applicant's case remained pending, without a decision on the merits, until the end of 1995. No delays were attributable to the applicant and the Court could not subscribe to the Government's argument that the matter was of little significance to him after he obtained a licence to run a pharmacy elsewhere.

Gallo v Italy 97/52

[Application lodged 5.7.1993; Commission report 28.11.1995; Court Judgment 2.9.1997]

Mr Alcide Gallo was a caretaker. On 28 August 1986, he instituted proceedings against the centre in the Friuli-Venezia Giulia Regional Administrative Court seeking judicial review of a disciplinary penalty imposed on him by decision of the chairman of the centre's board of governors on 12 August 1986 for failing in his duty of diligence and perturbing 'the continuity and regularity of the service' by taking sick-leave which was considered to be unjustified. The applicant forfeited all but a fraction of his salary. In a judgment of 9 April 1987, the text of which was deposited with the registry on 28 May 1987, the applicant's case was allowed. The centre appealed on 5 October 1987. In a judgment of 12 June 1992, the text of which was deposited with the registry on 8 January 1993, the Consiglio di Stato reversed the lower court's judgment and dismissed the applicant's application. He complained, inter alia, of the length of proceedings.

The complaint relating to A 14 fell outside the scope of the case as defined by the Commission's decision on admissibility.

Disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were as a general rule outside the scope of A 6(1). In the present case the applicant sought only judicial review of the decision to suspend him for one month taken by the chairman of the Student Welfare Centre's board of governors. The dispute raised by him thus clearly related to his career and did not concern a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable in the case.

[Application lodged 2.6.1987; Commission report 5.12.1990; Court Judgment 27.2.1992]

Mrs Serena Gana brought judicial separation proceedings before the Rome District Court on 14 July 1976. The separation was decreed on 27 April 1981. The text of the decision was lodged with the court registry on 5 October 1981. On 23 November 1981, Mr C, the applicant's husband, lodged an appeal. On 6 May 1983, the Court of Appeal dismissed the application by Mr C. He appealed to the Court of Cassation. On 5 February 1988, that court dismissed the appeal. The text of the decision was lodged with the registry on 15 July 1988. The applicant complained of the length of the civil proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 14 July 1976 when the proceedings were instituted in the Rome District Court. It ended on 15 July 1988 when the Court of Cassation's judgment was filed with the registry. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The parties contributed to a large extent, by several applications for adjournment and by their absence from certain hearings, to slowing down the investigation at first instance and during the appeal proceedings, which, for the rest, would seem to have been conducted at a normal pace. Although the State could not be held responsible for the period of more than 13 months before Mr C's appeal, there were three periods for which the State was responsible representing a total of six years and two months. With regard to the backlog of cases in the Court of Cassation, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. A lapse of time of 12 years, in a case concerning civil status and capacity where special diligence was required, could not be considered reasonable. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

García Manibardo v Spain 00/71

[Application lodged 2.9.1997; Court Judgment 15.2.2000]

Mrs Florencia García Manibardo's husband died in a road accident on 10 October 1990. The insurance company of the driver of the other vehicle, Mr P, paid the applicant a sum of money. The widow and children of the presumed driver were also paid compensation but appealed the adequacy of the amount. Mrs P lodged her appeal against the heirs of the applicant's husband, the owner of the vehicle and the insurers of the vehicle. The applicant challenged the case against her, gave written answers to the plaintiff's arguments and requested legal aid. The Amposta Court of First Instance found that it had been the deceased spouse of the applicant who had been driving the vehicle at the time of the accident and not the plaintiff's husband; the court declared the applicant's husband and insurers to be liable. All the parties appealed. The judge required the applicant to make an advance deposit of the amount she had been ordered to pay as a precondition for her lodging an appeal. The applicant lodged an appeal on the ground of the impossibility of making an advance. The Tarragone Audiencia provincial upheld the judgment of the first instance court and found the applicant's appeal inadmissible as she had not paid the requisite amount in. The applicant lodged an appeal with the Constitutional Court, which was dismissed on 10 March 1997. In the interim the Amposta Court of First Instance ordered, in the context of enforcement, the seizure of property of the applicant to cover payment of the compensation awarded to Mrs P. On 7 January the applicant requested examination of her application for legal aid made on 23 June 1994. The Amposta Court of First Instance granted the applicant legal aid on 15 April l997. She complained that the Tarragona Audiencia Provincial had ruled her appeal inadmissible on the ground that she had not deposited in advance the sum she had been ordered to pay in at a time when no decision had been taken on her entitlement to legal aid.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr M Pellonpää, President, Mr G Ress, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mr V Butkevych, Mrs N Vajic.

The domestic legislation and case-law of the Constitutional Court allowed a litigant's economic situation to be taken into consideration, in particular, for him or her to be discharged of the obligation not to make an advance deposit when he or she had been granted legal aid. In this case, even though the applicant had fulfilled all the requirements, she had not been granted the legal aid in the requisite time. However, her appeal had been ruled inadmissible for failure to deposit the requisite amount with the court. In that respect, requiring her to deposit in advance the damages ordered under the first judgment had prevented her from using an existing and available appeal so that she had been subjected to disproportionate interference with her right of access to a court. As a result there had been a violation of A 6(1).

García Ruiz v Spain 99/2

[Application lodged 19.12.1995; Commission report 15.9.1997; Court Judgment 21.1.1999]

Mr Faustino Francisco García Ruiz was registered as a member of the Madrid Bar but worked as a nurse. In August 1985, one M gave him instructions to carry out certain non-contentious property work. He brought a civil action against M for payment for services, advice and technical assistance. The claim was dismissed by a judgment of 24 May 1993. On 4 June 1993, the applicant appealed. By a judgment of 17 March 1995, the Madrid Audiencia Provincial dismissed the appeal and upheld the impugned judgment. On 13 May 1995, the applicant lodged an amparo appeal with the Constitutional Court, which was dismissed on 11 July 1995. He complained, inter alia, that the Madrid Audiencia Provincial had failed to give any reply to his arguments in its judgment.

Comm found by majority (22–8) V 6(1).

Court unanimously found NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr R Türmen, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs HS Greve, Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova.

Judgments of courts and tribunals had to adequately state the reasons on which they were based. The extent to which that duty to give reasons applied varied according to the nature of the decision and had to be determined in the light of the circumstances of the case. Although A 6(1) obliged courts to give reasons for their decisions, it could not be understood as requiring a detailed answer to every argument. Thus, in dismissing an appeal, an appellate court may, in principle, simply endorse the reasons for the lower court's decision. In the present case, the first instance judge took into account in his decision the defendant's statements denying the facts alleged by the applicant in his claim. It held that the evidence of a witness called by the applicant was not conclusive and ruled that the applicant had not proved that he had performed the services for which he was claiming a fee. On appeal, the Audiencia Provincial first stated that it accepted and deemed to be reproduced in its own decision the statement of the facts set out in the judgment at first instance, thus ruling that the applicant had not proved that he had performed as counsel the non-contentious services which formed the basis of his claim. It went on to say that it likewise endorsed the legal reasoning of the impugned decision in so far as it was not incompatible with its own findings. On that point, it held that there was not the slightest evidence in the case file to prove that the applicant had acted as counsel in summary foreclosure proceedings, although he might have performed non-contentious services. It therefore dismissed the appeal and upheld the judgment delivered at first instance. The case was then referred to the Constitutional Court, which, in its judgment of 11 July 1995, dismissed the applicant's amparo appeal on the grounds that, according to the trial courts, the applicant had not established that he had rendered the professional services for which he was claiming a fee and that assessment of the facts was a matter over which the Constitutional Court did not have jurisdiction. In so far as the applicant's complaint may be understood to concern assessment of the evidence and the result of the proceedings before the domestic courts, the Court reiterated that it was not its function to deal with errors of fact or law allegedly committed by a national court unless and in so far as they may have infringed rights and freedoms protected by the Convention. Moreover, while A 6 guaranteed the right to a fair hearing, it did not lay down any rules on the admissibility of evidence or the way it should be assessed, which were therefore primarily matters for regulation by national law and the national courts. The applicant had the benefit of adversarial proceedings. At the various stages of those proceedings he was able to submit the arguments he considered relevant to his case. The factual and legal reasons for the first-instance decision dismissing his claim were set out at length. In the judgment at the appeal stage the Audiencia Provincial endorsed the statement of the facts and the legal reasoning set out in the judgment at first instance in so far as they did not conflict with its own findings. The applicant could not therefore validly argue that that judgment lacked reasons, even though in the present case a more substantial statement of reasons might have been desirable. Taken as a whole, the proceedings in issue were fair for the purposes of A 6(1).

Garyfallou AEBE v Greece (1999) 28 EHRR 344 97/69

[Application lodged 12.10.1991; Commission report 11.4.1996; Court Judgment 24.9.1997]

The applicant company, Garyfallou AEBE was an international carrier. On 24 March 1986, the Deputy Minister of Commerce ordered the applicant company to pay a fine of 500,000 drachmas for having violated the rules concerning import and export trade, when importing glass panels from Romania. On 9 April 1986, the applicant company challenged the imposition of the fine before the First Instance Administrative Court which subsequently referred the case to the Supreme Administrative Court. The application was rejected. In a judgment of 9 April 1996, the Supreme Administrative Court referred the case to the Athens First Instance Administrative Court before which a hearing took place on 27 September 1996. On 18 June 1997, the Athens First Instance Administrative Court notified its decision to the applicant company. The ministerial order of 24 March 1986 was held to be ineffective. The applicant company complained, inter alia, of the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr B Repik, Mr P van Dijk.

Regarding the Government's objection that the applicant company's fresh complaint relating to the length of proceedings operated an unacceptable mutatio litis, the Court noted that the said complaint was introduced before the Commission decided on the admissibility of the application. The Government were given the opportunity to make any relevant submissions before the Commission and had availed themselves of that opportunity. The Court saw no reason to depart from its well-established principle that the compass of the case before it was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The allegation that the new complaint was time-barred would only apply if the two identifiable sets of proceedings were treated separately. The issue was closely linked to the substance of the applicant company's complaint and the Court therefore joined to the merits the Government's preliminary objection.

The Court recalled its case-law on determining whether an offence qualified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention. The fine imposed on the applicant company was not characterised under domestic law as a criminal sanction. The applicant company was fined 500,000 drachmas; however, it risked a maximum fine equal to the value of the imported goods, that was nearly three times the amount actually fined. In the event of non-payment, national law provided for the seizure of the applicant company's assets and the detention of its directors for up to one year. In those circumstances, the sanction to which the applicant company and its legal representatives were liable was sufficiently severe to warrant considering the charge against them to be a criminal charge for the purposes of the Convention. A 6(1) was applicable in the instant case.

The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. From the introduction of the original action in the first-instance administrative court in April 1986, the applicant company constantly sought to obtain judicial examination of the lawfulness of the ministerial order and of the fine imposed. That fact alone was sufficient to warrant the examination of both sets of proceedings as a whole. Issues of domestic law, such as the legal characterisation of the action to be introduced or the jurisdictional organisation of the national courts, which resulted in the applicant company's case being shuttled back and forth between the different administrative tribunals, were irrelevant to this end. State authorities had the duty to organise their judicial system in such a way as to meet each of the requirements in A 6(1). In the absence of any other explanation by the Government, the proceedings, which had lasted over 11 years, did not comply with the requirement in A 6(1) that criminal charges be determined within a reasonable time. It was necessary to examine the proceedings brought by the applicant company in their entirety. It followed that the Government's preliminary objection that the complaint concerning the length of proceedings in respect of the first set of proceedings was out of time had to fail. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1).

Gaskin v United Kingdom (1990) 12 EHRR 36 89/14

[Application lodged 17.2.1983; Commission report 13.11.1987; Court Judgment 7.7.1989]

Mr Graham Gaskin was taken into care by Liverpool City Council from 1959 until 1977 and was boarded out to foster parents. He claimed that he was ill-treated in care and sought details of his confidential records from the Council. The Council released a number of files in which the contributors gave their consent but refused to release others. He claimed refusal of access to all his records was a breach of A 8 and 10.

Comm found by majority (6–6 casting vote by the acting President) V 8, (11–0 with one abstention) NV 10.

Court held by a majority (11–6) V 8 and unanimously NV 10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (jd), President, Mr J Cremona (jd), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü (jd), Mr F Matscher (jd), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (d), Sir Vincent Evans (jd), Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr JA Carrillo Salcedo, Mr N Valticos Mr SK Martens.

The Court held, without expressing an opinion on whether general rights of access to personal data and information may be derived from A 8(1), that records contained in the file in this case did relate to the applicant's private and family life in such a way that the question of access fell within the ambit of A 8. Although the essential object of A 8 was to protect an individual against arbitrary interference by public authorities, there may be in addition positive obligations inherent in an effective 'respect' for family life. By refusing access, the UK could not be said to have 'interfered' with the applicant's private or family life. The substance of the applicant's complaint was not that the State had acted, but that it had failed to act. In determining whether or not positive obligations of the State under A 8 existed, the Court would have regard to the fair balance that had to be struck between the general interest of the community and the interests of the individual. In striking the balance, the aims mentioned in A 8(2) may be of certain relevance, although this provision was concerned with the negative obligations flowing therefrom. Confidentiality of public records was of importance for receiving objective and reliable information. Such confidentiality contributed to the effective operation of the child care system and served a legitimate aim by protecting the rights of contributors as well of children in need of care. A system which made access to records dependent on the consent of the contributor could, in principle, be considered to be compatible with the obligations under A 8, taking into account the State's margin of appreciation. Such a system was only in conformity with the principle of proportionality if it provided that an independent authority finally decided whether access had to be granted in cases where a contributor failed to answer or withheld consent. No such procedure was available in this case therefore there had been a breach of A 8.

The right to freedom to receive information prohibited a Government from restricting a person from receiving information that others wished or might be willing to impart to him. In this case, A 10 did not embody an obligation on the State to impart the information in question to the individual. There had been no interference with the applicant's right to receive information as protected by A 10.

Gast and Popp v Germany 00/85

[Application lodged on 1.5.1995; Commission report 28.5.1998; Court Judgment 25.2.2000]

Mrs Gabriele Gast was a political scientist and Mr Dieter Popp was an insurance agent. In 1990 they were arrested and following separate criminal trials convicted, on suspicion of having committed espionage on behalf of the former German Democratic Republic. Their appeals to the Federal Court of Justice were dismissed in 1992. They appealed to the Federal Constitutional Court. The processing of the cases was postponed as the Second Division of the Federal Constitutional Court envisaged rendering a leading decision in some test cases. On 23 May 1995 the Second Section of the Second Division of the Federal Constitutional Court, in separate decisions, refused to admit the applicants' constitutional complaints. They complained of the length of proceedings.

Comm found by majority (20–11) NV 6(1).

Court found unanimously NV 6(1).

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr J Casadevall, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr R Türmen, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr R Maruste.

The relevant test in determining whether Constitutional Court proceedings might be taken into account in assessing the reasonableness of the length of proceedings was whether the result of the Constitutional Court proceedings was capable of affecting the outcome of the dispute before the ordinary courts. It followed that Constitutional Court proceedings did not in principle fall outside the scope of A 6(1). The proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court were directly related to the question of the accusations of espionage being well-founded. In the event of a successful outcome of the constitutional complaint proceedings, the Constitutional Court quashed the impugned decision and referred the matter back to the competent court. If the legislation in question was declared void a reopening of criminal proceedings was permissible. In the factual circumstances underlying the numerous complaint proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court, relating to conviction for espionage or treason following German unification, these proceedings were a further stage of the respective criminal proceedings and their consequences could be decisive for the convicted persons. While the applicants' constitutional complaints were rejected in the course of preliminary proceedings, the Federal Constitutional Court was able to do so after having examined and rendered a leading decision on the merits of all relevant arguments on 15 May 1995. In those circumstances, A 6(1) was applicable to the proceedings in issue.

The Court was concerned only with the length of the proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court. The relevant periods began on 18 July and 13 August 1992, respectively, the dates on which the applicants appealed to the Federal Constitutional Court. It ended on 9 June and 3 June 1995, respectively, the dates on which the Constitutional Court's decisions of 23 May 1995 were notified to the first applicant and the second applicant's counsel. It therefore lasted about two years and ten months in the first applicant's case and about two years and nine months in the second applicant's case. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings was to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, regard being had to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The legal issues were, on the whole, complex. The applicants' conduct did not cause any delay in the proceedings. As regards the conduct of the Federal Constitutional Court, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their judicial systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements, including the obligation to hear cases within a reasonable time. Although that obligation applied also to a Constitutional Court, it could not be construed in the same way as for an ordinary court. Its role as guardian of the Constitution made it particularly necessary for a Constitutional Court sometimes to take into account other considerations than the mere chronological order in which cases were entered on the list, such as the nature of a case and its importance in political and social terms. It was reasonable for the Federal Constitutional Court to have grouped cases so as to obtain a comprehensive view of the legal issues arising from the convictions of espionage and treason following German unification, balancing what was at stake for the numerous persons sentenced to imprisonment for treason or espionage and the serious political and social implications of other cases to which the Federal Constitutional Court could reasonably give priority. Although the applicants were already serving their prison sentences, their punishment did not cause prejudice to them to such an extent as to impose on the court concerned a duty to deal with the cases as a matter of very great urgency. Moreover, they were released in 1994. Any delays that occurred did not appear substantial enough for the length of the proceedings before the Federal Constitutional Court to have exceeded a reasonable time within the meaning of A 6(1), having regard to the fact that the criminal proceedings against the first and second applicants, including the pre-trial stage, the trial and the appeal proceedings, only lasted about one year and ten months and about two years and three months respectively. Accordingly, no violation of A 6(1).

Gasus Dosier- und Fördertechnik GmbH v The Netherlands (1995) 20 EHRR 403 95/6

[Application lodged 6.7.1989; Commission report 21.10.1993; Court Judgment 23.2.1995]

The applicant company, Gasus Dosier- und Fördertechnik GmbH (hereinafter 'Gasus'), were a limited liability company. In 1980, they sold a concrete mixer and ancillary equipment to a Dutch company, Atlas, on condition that title would not pass until the full price had been paid. The machine was seized by the Tax Bailiff to cover Atlas' tax debts. On 22 May 1981, Gasus brought proceedings against Atlas's trustee in bankruptcy before the Utrecht Regional Court to obtain an order for the concrete mixer to be returned. They were unsuccessful. Their appeals to the Hague Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court were rejected. They complained that they had been deprived of their possessions in violation of P1A1.

Comm found by majority (6–6 with the casting vote of its President) NV P1A1.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (6–3) NV P1A1.

The purpose of the requirement that domestic remedies had to be exhausted was to afford the Contracting States the opportunity of preventing or putting right the violations alleged against them before those allegations were submitted to the Convention institutions. That meant that the complaint which it was intended to bring before the Commission had to first be raised, at least in substance and in compliance with the relevant requirements of domestic law, before the appropriate national courts. The applicant company did provide the Netherlands courts with the opportunity of preventing or putting right the alleged violation of P1A1. The preliminary objection therefore failed.

The notion 'possessions' in P1A1 had an autonomous meaning which was not limited to ownership of physical goods: certain other rights and interests constituting assets could also be regarded as 'property rights', and thus as 'possessions', for the purposes of this provision. In the present context it was immaterial whether the applicant company's right to the concrete mixer was to be considered as a right of ownership or as a security right in rem. The seizure and sale of the concrete mixer constituted an 'interference' with the applicant company's right to the peaceful enjoyment of a possession within the meaning of P1A1. The Court recalled its case-law. The interference complained of in this case was the result of the tax authorities' exercise of their powers in relation to the regulation of the collection of direct taxes. The applicant company's complaints were therefore examined under the rule in the second paragraph of P1A1. In passing tax laws the legislature had to be allowed a wide margin of appreciation, especially with regard to the question whether, and if so, to what extent the tax authorities should be put in a better position to enforce tax debts than ordinary creditors are in to enforce commercial debts. The power given to the tax authorities to recover tax debts dispensed them from having to consider whether goods were actually the property of the tax debtor, in order to facilitate the enforcement of tax debts. However, an interference had to achieve a fair balance between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights; there had to be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim pursued. The grant to the tax authorities of a power to recover tax debts against goods owned by certain third parties – such as a seller of goods who retained his title – did not in itself prompt the conclusion that a fair balance between the general interest and the protection of the individual's fundamental rights had not been achieved. The power of recovery against goods which were in fact in a debtor's possession, although nominally owned by a third party, was a not uncommon device to strengthen a creditor's position in enforcement proceedings; it could not be held incompatible per se with the requirements of P1A1. The essential question was whether as a consequence of the tax authorities' actions against the goods to which title had been retained the vendor had had to bear an individual and excessive burden. A State could legitimately, within its margin of appreciation, differentiate between retention of title and other forms of ownership. The applicant company were engaged in a commercial venture which, by its very nature, involved an element of risk. The applicant company could have eliminated their risk altogether by declining to extend credit to Atlas or obtained additional security which passed the risk on to another party. It was therefore unnecessary for the Court to establish whether the applicant company could have ascertained the existence and extent of Atlas's tax debts. Nor was it material that the applicant company bore no responsibility for the tax debt. The owners of goods subject to seizure had knowingly allowed them to serve as 'furnishings' of the tax debtor's premises. They might therefore be held responsible to some extent for enabling the tax debtor to present a semblance of creditworthiness. Whether or not the tax authorities were under any legal or other obligation to be more flexible in respect of tax debtors in temporary financial difficulties, they did not have the same means at their disposal as commercial creditors for protecting themselves against the consequences of their debtors' financial problems. Nor did they have any other means of protecting themselves against their debtors' attempts to solve such problems by vesting the title to their 'furnishings' in another party as a device for borrowing against a security. The fact that the concrete mixer to which the applicant company had reserved title was seized while goods subject to the bank's fiduciary ownership rights were spared did not suffice to demonstrate that the seizure of the concrete mixer was arbitrary. That distinction was based on the case-law, and accorded with the stated policy of the Minister of Finance. Under Netherlands law, third parties whose goods were seized might have the use that had been made of the powers conferred by the legislation adequately reviewed by a tribunal under a procedure which met the requirements of A 6(1). The requirement of proportionality had been satisfied and accordingly, there had been no violation of P1A1.

[Applications lodged 7.1.1993; Commission report 26.11.1996; Court Judgment 20.5.1998]

The 105 applicants were medical practitioners and all members of the organisation 'SOS Médecins', whose object was to provide emergency medical services on call to patients. A number of doctors' unions and département councils of the Medical Association lodged complaints with the professional disciplinary bodies against the members of those associations. They maintained, inter alia, that by using a flashing blue light without permission from the authorities and displaying the name 'SOS Médecins' on their vehicles, in telephone directories and in advertising brochures, the members of the associations were contravening the Code of Professional Conduct, which prohibited advertising. On 28 January 1990, the regional council of the Ile-de-France ordre des médecins held that there had been a breach of the Code of Professional Conduct and suspended or reprimanded the doctors concerned. The applicants appealed against those decisions to the disciplinary section of the National Council of the ordre des médecins. On 25 March 1992, that section upheld the decisions of the regional council as to the finding that there had been a breach of the Code of Professional Conduct, but reduced the penalties. The applicants complained that the hearings before the regional council of the Ile-de-France ordre des médecins and the National Council of the ordre had not been held in public and that those bodies had not been impartial.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found V 6(1) in that the applicants' case was not heard in public, V 6(1) in that the applicants' case was not heard by an impartial tribunal.

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus.

It was clear from the Court's settled case-law that disciplinary proceedings in which what was at stake was the right to continue to practise medicine as a private practitioner gave rise to disputes over civil rights within the meaning of A 6(1), which was therefore applicable.

A 26 required persons wishing to make an application to the Strasbourg institutions to have prior recourse to such domestic remedies as were 'adequate' and 'effective'. At the material time the Decree of October 1948 expressly precluded holding in public hearings before the regional councils of the ordre des médecins and the disciplinary section of the National Council of the ordre and it was the Conseil d'Etat's settled case-law that the provisions of A 6(1) were inapplicable to proceedings before those bodies. In those circumstances, an appeal on points of law based on that complaint would not have been an 'adequate' and 'effective' remedy. The preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was therefore dismissed.

The holding of court hearings in public constituted a fundamental principle enshrined in A 6 (1). That public character protected litigants against the administration of justice without public scrutiny; it was also one of the means whereby people's confidence in the courts could be maintained. By rendering the administration of justice transparent, publicity contributed to the achievement of the aim of A 6(1). It was not suggested that circumstances existed to permit dispensing with a public hearing in this case. The fact that the applicants would have had a hearing in public if they had appealed to the Conseil d'Etat was irrelevant. There had been a breach of A 6(1) in that the applicants' case was not heard 'in public' by the Ile-de-France regional council of the ordre des médecins or by the disciplinary section of the National Council of the ordre.

The applicants' complaint was not of bias on the part of any individual member of the disciplinary bodies hearing their cases, but of the 'objective' bias of those bodies. The right of challenge could only be exercised in respect of individual members of the tribunal, not in respect of the tribunal as a whole. Therefore the exercise by the applicants of their right of challenge would not have constituted an 'effective' remedy. The preliminary objection based on failure to exercise the right of challenge was therefore dismissed. Regarding the objection based on failure to appeal on points of law, if the Conseil d'Etat had quashed the decision of the disciplinary section of the National Council of the ordre, it would not have been bound to rule on the merits of the case. If, however, it had remitted the case, it could only have done so to the same body without there being any requirement that it be differently constituted; it would only have been after a second appeal on points of law that the Conseil d'Etat would have been required to decide the case finally. In the circumstances, it could not be maintained that such a remedy would, in the instant case, have been adequate. Consequently, that preliminary objection was dismissed.

Conferring the duty of adjudicating on disciplinary offences on professional disciplinary bodies did not in itself infringe the Convention. Nonetheless, in such circumstances the Convention called for at least one of the following two systems: either the professional disciplinary bodies themselves complied with the requirements of A 6(1), or they did not so comply but were subject to subsequent review by a judicial body that had full jurisdiction and did provide the guarantees of A 6(1). There were two tests for assessing whether a tribunal was impartial within the meaning of A 6 (1): the first consisted in seeking to determine the personal conviction of a particular judge in a given case, and the second in ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in that respect. Only the second of those tests was relevant in the instant case. The members of the regional council and 32 of the 38 members of the National Council, from among whose members the disciplinary section was elected, were practitioners directly appointed by the département councils. As a result, those two bodies had a worrying connection with the competitors of SOS Médecins and it was understandable that the applicants suspected the members of those bodies of bias. Regard being had mainly to the special context and special nature of the dispute the professional disciplinary bodies had to decide, neither the Ile-de-France regional council of the ordre des médecins, nor the disciplinary section of the National Council of the ordre was an 'impartial' tribunal within the meaning of A 6(1).

Present judgment constituted just satisfaction for any alleged non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (FF 13,650 to Dr Fillion, FF 6,030 Dr Boyer and FF 50,000 jointly to the other 102 applicants).

Gaygusuz v Austria (1997) 23 EHRR 365 96/32

[Application lodged 17.5.1990; Commission report 11.1.1995; Court Judgment 16.9.1996]

Mr Cevat Gaygusuz was a Turkish national who lived in Austria from 1973 until September 1987. He worked in Austria, with interruptions, from 1973 until October 1984. From then until 1 July 1986 periods when he was unemployed alternated with periods when he was certified unfit for work for medical reasons, and he was in receipt of the corresponding benefits. He applied to the Linz Employment Agency on 6 July 1987 for an advance on his pension in the form of emergency. The agency rejected the application on the ground that the applicant did not have Austrian nationality, which was one of the conditions laid down in the 1977 Unemployment Insurance Act for entitlement to an allowance of that type. His appeal to the Upper Austria Regional Employment Agency was dismissed. His subsequent appeals to the Constitutional Court and Administrative Court were rejected. He complained that he was a victim of discrimination based on national origin following the Austrian authorities' refusal to grant him emergency assistance and that he had not had a fair trial.

A 14 complemented the other substantive provisions of the Convention and the Protocols. It had no independent existence since it had effect solely in relation to the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms safeguarded by those provisions. Although the application of A 14 did not presuppose a breach of those provisions – and to that extent it was autonomous – there could be no room for its application unless the facts at issue fell within the ambit of one or more of them. The refusal to grant the applicant emergency assistance was based exclusively on the finding that he did not have Austrian nationality and did not fall into any of the categories exempted from that condition. The right to emergency assistance – in so far as provided for in the applicable legislation – was a pecuniary right for the purposes of P1A1. That provision was therefore applicable without it being necessary to rely solely on the link between entitlement to emergency assistance and the obligation to pay 'taxes or other contributions'. Accordingly, as the applicant was denied emergency assistance on a ground of distinction covered by A 14, namely his nationality, A 14 was also applicable.

A difference of treatment was discriminatory, for the purposes of A 14, if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. Moreover, the Contracting States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment. The applicant was legally resident in Austria and worked there at certain times, paying contributions to the unemployment insurance fund in the same capacity and on the same basis as Austrian nationals. The authorities' refusal to grant him emergency assistance was based exclusively on the fact that he did not have Austrian nationality as required by the 1977 Unemployment Insurance Act. It had not been argued that he failed to satisfy the other statutory conditions for the award of the social benefit in question. He was accordingly in a like situation to Austrian nationals regarding his entitlement thereto. The difference in treatment between Austrians and non-Austrians as regards entitlement to emergency assistance, of which the applicant was a victim, was not based on any objective and reasonable justification. Even though, at the material time, Austria was not bound by reciprocal agreements with Turkey, it undertook, when ratifying the Convention, to secure 'to everyone within its jurisdiction' the rights and freedoms defined in A 1 of the Convention. There had accordingly been a breach of A 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with P1A1.

Having regard to the finding of violation of A 14+P1A1 it was not necessary to examine the case under A 6(1).

Having regard to the conclusion regarding A 14+P1A1 no separate issue arose under A 8.

Gea Catalán v Spain (1995) 20 EHRR 266 95/5

[Application lodged 14.10.1991; Commission report 30.11.1993; Court Judgment 10.2.1995]

Mr Francisco Gea Catalán was a bank employee. Criminal proceedings were brought against him for obtaining property by deception. He was committed for trial in the Barcelona Audiencia Provincial. As civil party, the bank lodged submissions which essentially reproduced those of the public prosecutor. The applicant was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment. His appeals to the Supreme Court and Constitutional Court were dismissed. He complained that he had not been informed of a component of the charge against him.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, NV 6(3)(a).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr R Macdonald, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer, Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr B Repik.

The applicant had expressed the wish to take part in the proceedings and had submitted, albeit belatedly, a claim for just satisfaction. It could not therefore be inferred that he did not intend to pursue his complaints. In addition, there had been neither a friendly settlement, nor arrangement, nor other fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter. The preliminary objection that the applicant's inactivity was tantamount to an implied withdrawal accordingly had to be dismissed.

The discrepancy complained of was clearly the result of a clerical error, committed when the prosecution submissions were typed and subsequently reproduced on various occasions by the prosecuting authority and the civil party. That was also the view taken by the Supreme Court and the Constitutional Court in dismissing the applicant's appeal on points of law and his amparo appeal. Having regard to the clarity of the legal classification given to the findings of fact set out in the investigating judge's committal order of 1 July 1986, the Court failed to see how the applicant could complain that he had not been informed of all the components of the charge, since the prosecution submissions were based on the same facts. The applicant's complaint was unfounded and therefore there had been no breach of A 6(3)(a).

Gelli v Italy 99/65

Mr Licio Gelli was suspected inter alia of association aiming at political conspiracy, seeking and obtaining classified information, false pretences, espionage, fraud, aggravated slander and extortion, forgery in public deeds in relation to an investigation concerning the bankruptcy of the private bank Banco Ambrosiano and activities of the Masonic lodge called 'Propaganda 2' (P2). Warrants were issued in 1982 and on 13 September 1982 the applicant was arrested in Switzerland and detained with a view to extradition. The applicant escaped from Champ-Dollon prison on 10 August 1983. On 21 September 1987, the applicant was again arrested in Switzerland and was extradited to Italy on 17 February 1988. On 16 April 1994, the Assize Court of Rome found the applicant guilty. His appeal to the Rome Assize Court of Appeal was dismissed. He further appeal to the Court of Cassation resulted in some of the charges being dropped as time-barred and a reduction in sentence. The judgment was filed with the Registry on 24 December 1996. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr M Fischbach, President, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr AB Baka.

The proceedings began at the latest on 13 September 1982, when the applicant was arrested, and ended on 24 December 1996, when the final judgment was filed with the court registry. The applicant escaped from prison on 10 August 1983 and absconded until 21 September 1987, when he was arrested again. When an accused person fled from a State which respected the principle of the rule of law, it could be assumed that he was not entitled to complain of the unreasonable duration of the proceedings following his flight, unless he could show sufficient reason to rebut that assumption. In the present case, the applicant failed to do so, and in particular he failed to prove that his absconding did not have any prejudicial impact on the length of the proceedings in absentia; it followed that the four years and one month during which the applicant absconded would not be counted towards the length of the proceedings at issue. The period to be taken into consideration therefore lasted approximately 10 years and two months for three levels of jurisdiction. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The proceedings at issue were extremely complex. No delay appeared attributable to the applicant's conduct, save for the period during which he absconded from prison, which at any event had not been counted towards the period to be taken into consideration. There appeared to have been a very long delay between the decision of 26 March 1985 whereby the Rome District Court was found to be competent to deal with the case, and the judgment of the Judge for the Preliminary Investigations on committals for trial on 18 November 1991 for which no explanation was provided by the Government. That delay, which covered more than half of the total length of the period under consideration, was of itself sufficient to conclude that the case was not heard within a reasonable time. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 27.2.1993; Commission report 27.2.1996; Court Judgment 29.5.1997]

Mr Anastasios Georgiadis was a minister of religion of the Christian Jehovah's Witnesses of Greece. On 11 September 1991, he lodged an application to be exempted from military service. His application was rejected on the ground that he was not a minister of a 'known religion' and he was ordered to report for duty at a military training centre in Nauplia on 20 January 1992. He presented himself at the centre, as ordered, but refused to join his unit, invoking his status as a minister of a 'known religion'. Charges of insubordination resulted in his acquittal. He was not, however, awarded compensation. He complained that he did not have a fair hearing in the matter of compensation for his allegedly unlawful detention.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr AB Baka, Mr D Gotchev, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus.

Regardless of its characterisation under domestic law, the Code of Criminal Procedure created a right for a person having been detained to claim compensation following his or her acquittal.

However, the Code excluded from compensation situations where it was established that the detained person was 'intentionally or by gross negligence' responsible for his own detention. The Code also prevented decisions regarding the obligation of the State to pay compensation to be challenged separately. The army rulings that no compensation should be granted to the applicant for his detention pending trial, because his detention was due to his own gross negligence, meant that the outcome of the proceedings was directly decisive for establishing the applicant's right to compensation. Although the prerequisite for the operation of the relevant part of the code, detention followed by an acquittal, concerned public law issues, the right to compensation created by that provision was, by its very nature, of a civil character. Its typically private law features confirmed that conclusion, as did the fact that it is for the civil courts to decide on the precise amount of the compensation to be granted. No decision on the question of compensation should have been taken without affording the applicant an opportunity to submit to the courts his arguments on the matter. A procedure whereby civil rights were determined without ever hearing the parties' submissions could not be considered to be compatible with A 6(1). In addition, the permanent army tribunals' rulings proprio motu on the question of compensation effectively precluded the applicant from making an application himself. Moreover, it was not open to him to challenge those rulings. Regarding the alleged lack of adequate reasons in the decisions of the military tribunals, it was noted that, in discarding the State's liability for the applicant's detention, the domestic courts referred to the applicant's own 'gross negligence'. In doing so, they repeated the wording of the Code. The extent to which a court's duty to give reasons applied varied according, inter alia, to the nature of the decision. Whether a court had failed to fulfil the obligation to state reasons, deriving from A 6, could only be determined in the light of the circumstances of the case. The lack of precision of the concept of 'gross negligence' which involved an assessment of questions of fact, required that the courts give more detailed reasons, particularly since their finding was decisive for the applicant's right to compensation. Therefore, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

In view of the findings concerning A 6(1), it was not necessary to examine the case under A 13.

Present judgment constituted just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (GRD 750,000).

Georgiadis v Greece 00/104

[Application lodged 26.3.1998; Court Judgment 28.3.2000]

Mr Dimitrios Georgiadis, a retired judge, made an application to the General State Finance Office to obtain a supplementary pension pursuant to an inter-ministerial decision. The application was refused and the applicant appealed to the Audit Office which on 4 July 1996 allowed the appeal and fixed the amount of the additional pension. The judgment was enforceable as soon as it was served on the authorities concerned, but they refused to comply with it and pay the amount due. The judgment became final on 26 September 1997, the State not having entered an appeal on points of law. In July 1997, new legislation was passed which stated, inter alia, that the inter-ministerial decision did not apply to pensions, that all claims based on it were barred, that all pending legal proceedings were annulled and that sums paid, with the exception of those awarded in final court decision, were to be paid back. The Court of Audit held the new enactment unconstitutional and contrary to A 6 and dismissed an appeal by the State. The applicant had still not received the amount owing to him.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), V P1A1.

Judges: Mr M Fischbach, President, Mr CL Rozakis, Mr B Conforti, Mr P Lorenzen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr AB Baka, Mr E Levits.

The issue in the case was the State's obligation to make back payment of a pension to a civil servant in accordance with the legislation in force. It was therefore a civil right and A 6(1) applied.

The execution of a court judgment had to be considered as an integral part of the proceedings for the purposes of A 6. If the authorities refused or omitted to enforce judgment or delayed in doing so, the guarantees under A 6 would become purposeless. Furthermore, the principle of the rule of the law and the notion of fair trial precluded any interference by the legislature with the administration of justice designed to influence the judicial outcome of a dispute in which the State was a party. The refusal of the State General Accounting Department to comply with the judgment of the Court of Audit amounted to a denial of justice. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

The judgment of the Court of Audit had given rise to a debt in the applicant's favour and not a contingent right as argued by the Government. The applicant's inability to enforce that judgment amounted to an interference with his right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. By intervening after the final judgment of the Audit Court, the new law had upset the fair balance between the protection of a property right and the demands of the general interest. In addition, the State General Accounting Department's refusal to pay the sum owed to the appellants after the Court of Audit had declared the new law unconstitutional was a further interference with the applicant's right to respect for peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. That interference was contrary to P1A1 as the refusal in question was manifestly unlawful under domestic law.

Gerger v Turkey 99/31

[Application lodged 22.6.1994; Commission report 11.12.1997; Court Judgment 8.7.1999]

Mr Haluk Gerger was a journalist. On 23 May 1993, a memorial ceremony was held in Ankara for Denis Gezmis, Yusuf Aslan and Hüseyin Inan, founders of an extreme left-wing movement among university students at the end of the 1960s. They had been sentenced to death for seeking to destroy the constitutional order by violence and executed in May 1972. The applicant was invited to speak at the ceremony, but was unable to attend and sent the organising committee a message that was read out in public. The applicant was accused of disseminating propaganda against the unity of the Turkish nation and the territorial integrity of the State. On 9 December 1993, the National Security Court found the applicant guilty and sentenced him to one year, eight months' imprisonment and a fine of TRL 208,333,333. On 22 April 1994, the Court of Cassation dismissed an appeal by the applicant. On 23 September 1995 the applicant completed his prison sentence. However, as he had not paid the fine that had been imposed, he was kept in detention to serve an additional day's imprisonment for every TRL 10,000 due. On 26 October 1995, he paid the balance of the fine and was released. He complained that his conviction constituted a violation of A 9 and 10. He further submitted that, by failing to give adequate reasons in its judgment, the National Security Court had denied him a fair hearing and that he had been discriminated against, in that the conditions for obtaining automatic parole under the terrorism legislation were stricter than those under the general law.

Comm found by majority (30–2) V 10, considered jointly with A 9, unanimously NV 14+5(1), by majority (31–1) V 6(1) in that the applicant's case had not been heard by an independent and impartial tribunal, not necessary to examine separately the complaint that the National Security Court had given inadequate reasons in its judgment.

Court found by majority (16–1) V 10, dismissed unanimously the Government's preliminary objections, by majority (16–1) V 6(1) in that the Ankara National Security Court was not independent and impartial, unanimously not necessary to examine the applicant's other complaint under A 6(1), NV 14+5(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber (declaration), President, Mrs E Palm (jc), Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello (c), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens (jc), Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach (jc), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jc), Mrs HS Greve (jc), Mr A Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mr K Traja, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), ad hoc judge.

The Court considered that the complaint should be considered from the standpoint of A 10 alone.

The applicant's conviction amounted to an interference with the exercise of his right to freedom of expression. Such an interference breached A 10 unless it satisfied the requirements of A 10(2). The interference was prescribed by law, the section satisfied the foreseeability requirements inherent in the notion of 'law'. Having regard to the sensitivity of the security situation in south-east Turkey and to the need for the authorities to be alert to acts capable of fuelling additional violence, the measures taken against the applicant could be said to have been in furtherance of certain of the aims of the protection of national security and territorial integrity and the prevention of disorder and crime. The Court recalled its case-law. There was little scope under A 10(2) for restrictions on political speech or on debate on matters of public interest. Furthermore, the limits of permissible criticism were wider with regard to the government than in relation to a private citizen, or even a politician. In a democratic system, the actions or omissions of the government had to be subject to the close scrutiny not only of the legislative and judicial authorities, but also of public opinion. Moreover, the dominant position which the government occupied made it necessary for it to display restraint in resorting to criminal proceedings, particularly where other means were available for replying to the unjustified attacks and criticisms of its adversaries. Nevertheless, it remained open to the competent State authorities to adopt, in their capacity as guarantors of public order, measures, even of a criminal law nature, intended to react appropriately and without excess to such remarks. Finally, where such remarks constituted an incitement to violence against an individual or a public official or a sector of the population, the State authorities enjoyed a wider margin of appreciation when examining the need for an interference with freedom of expression. The Court took into account the background to the cases submitted. The applicant's message was read out only to a group of people attending a commemorative ceremony, which considerably restricted its potential impact on national security, public order or 'territorial integrity'. It did not constitute an incitement to violence, armed resistance or an uprising. The nature and severity of the penalties imposed were also factors to be taken into account when assessing the proportionality of the interference. The applicant's conviction was disproportionate to the aims pursued and accordingly not necessary in a democratic society. There had therefore been a violation of A 10.

Although the applicant did not allege a lack of impartiality or independence on the part of the Ankara National Security Court in his application to the Commission, in his memorial lodged with the Court, he made a general reference to the report of the Commission, which had concluded that the complaint was founded. The Commission had considered the complaint of its own motion and despite inviting a response from the Government, the Government had not done so. Therefore, the Government were estopped from raising the preliminary objection.

The status of military judges sitting as members of National Security Courts provided some guarantees of independence and impartiality. However, certain aspects of the judges' status made their independence and impartiality questionable: for example, the fact that they were servicemen who still belonged to the army, which in turn took its orders from the executive, the fact that they remained subject to military discipline and the fact that decisions pertaining to their appointment were to a great extent taken by the administrative authorities and the army. It was understandable that the applicant should be apprehensive about being tried by a bench which included a regular army officer, who was a member of the Military Legal Service. On that account he could legitimately fear that the Ankara National Security Court might allow itself to be unduly influenced by considerations which had nothing to do with the nature of the case. In other words, the applicant's fears as to that court's lack of independence and impartiality could be regarded as objectively justified. The proceedings in the Court of Cassation were not able to dispel these fears since that court did not have full jurisdiction. Therefore, there had been a breach of A 6(1).

In view of the finding of a violation of the applicant's right to be tried by an independent and impartial tribunal it was not necessary to examine the complaint that the National Security Court had not given sufficient reasons for its decision.

Although A 5(1)(a) did not guarantee a right to automatic parole, an issue might arise under that provision taken together with A 14 of the Convention if a settled sentencing policy affected individuals in a discriminatory manner. In principle, the aim of the relevant law in the present case was to penalise people who committed terrorist offences and anyone convicted under that law would be treated less favourably with regard to automatic parole than persons convicted under the ordinary law. From that fact, the distinction was made not between different groups of people, but between different types of offence, according to the legislature's view of their gravity. There was no ground for concluding that that practice amounted to a form of 'discrimination' that was contrary to the Convention. Consequently, there had been no violation of A 14 taken together with A 5(1)(a).

Having regard to the global length of the proceedings, the authorities had shown necessary diligence.

Gilberti v Italy 91/57

[Application lodged 21.1.1987; Commission report 15.1.1991; Court Judgment 3.12.1991]

Mrs Silvia Gilberti brought an action on 11 March 1985 against the Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale before the Rome magistrates' court in order to be reinstated in her right to a disability pension, which had been withdrawn with effect from 1 October 1983, and to obtain a court order for the pension arrears. The magistrates' court dismissed the applicant's claim on 10 July 1986. She appealed to the District Court, which dismissed her appeal on 16 October 1990. The judgment was filed with the registry on 17 June 1991. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously struck case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens.

Despite several reminders from the registry, the applicant showed no interest in the proceedings before the Court. There had been an implied withdrawal which constituted a fact of a kind to provide a solution to the matter. The Court discerned no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. It noted previous cases in which it had reviewed the reasonableness of the length of civil proceedings. Accordingly, the case was struck out of the list.

Gillow v United Kingdom (1989) 11 EHRR 335, (1991) 13 EHRR 593 86/12

[Application lodged 25.1.1980; Commission report 3.10.1984; Court Judgment 24.11.1986 (merits), 14.9.1987 (A 50)]

Mr Joseph Gillow and his wife Mrs Yvonne Gillow were both British citizens. In 1956, following Mr Gillow's appointment as Director of the recently created States of Guernsey Horticultural Advisory Service, they sold their home in Lancashire and moved to Guernsey. In 1957 they built a house, called 'Whiteknights'. The applicants did not require a licence to occupy the house, since they had residence qualifications. In August 1960, Mr Gillow resigned from his post in Guernsey and worked overseas for various development agencies until his retirement in 1978. During that period, the house was let. On 29 April 1979, the applicants went back to Guernsey. Under the Housing Laws they needed a licence to occupy the property. The Housing Authority rejected the application for a long term licence to occupy 'Whiteknights' in the light of the 'present adverse housing situation'. Their applications for extensions to stay to repair and sell the property were rejected and they were ordered to leave the house, on pain of prosecution. They sought to appeal the decision but in the meantime they were summonsed and appeared before the magistrates' court. Mr Gillow was convicted of occupying 'Whiteknights' without a licence and fined. The applicants finally sold 'Whiteknights' on 15 April 1980. On 8 July 1980, the Royal Court dismissed their appeal regarding the licence to occupy. Mr Gillow's appeal against his conviction was heard and dismissed by the Royal Court on 26 August 1980. They complained that the restrictions imposed on their occupation of 'Whiteknights' constituted an interference with their rights to respect for their home and to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions, which interference also had a discriminatory character. They further complained that, in the proceedings which took place in Guernsey, there had been a violation of their rights of access to court and to a fair hearing.

Comm found unanimously V 8, V P1A1, by majority (10–1) NV 6, unanimously NV 14.

Court found unanimously V 8, NV 14+8, NV 6, P1 and 4 NA.

The Court had no jurisdiction to investigate the applicants' complaint under Protocol No 4 as that instrument had not been ratified by the UK.

The applicants had not established any other home elsewhere in the UK. Although the applicants had been absent from Guernsey for almost 19 years, they had in the circumstances retained sufficient continuing links with 'Whiteknights' for it to be considered their 'home', for the purposes of A 8. The fact that, on pain of prosecution, the applicants were obliged to obtain a licence to live in their own house on their return to Guernsey in 1979, the refusal of the licences applied for, the institution of criminal proceedings against them for unlawful occupation of the property and, in Mr Gillow's case, his conviction and the imposition of a fine constituted interferences with the exercise of the applicants' right to respect for their home. The interferences were in accordance with the law; there could be no doubt as to the constitutional validity and accessibility of the housing law and the the scope of the discretion in the law, coupled with the provision for judicial control of its exercise, was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the Convention inherent in the expression 'in accordance with the law'. The relevant legislation was designed to promote the economic well-being of the island. It was not established that the legislation pursued any other purpose. The Guernsey legislature was better placed than the international judge to assess the effects of any relaxation of the housing controls. Furthermore, when considering whether to grant a licence, the Housing Authority could exercise its discretion so as to avoid any disproportionality in a particular case. It followed that the statutory obligation imposed on the applicants to seek a licence to live in their 'home' could not be regarded as disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. There had accordingly been no breach of A 8 as far as the terms of the contested legislation were concerned. However, the decisions by the Housing Authority to refuse the applicants permanent and temporary licences to occupy 'Whiteknights', as well as the conviction and fining of Mr Gillow, constituted interferences with the exercise of their right to respect for their 'home' which were disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. There had accordingly been a breach of A 8 as far as the application of the legislation in the particular circumstances of the applicants' case was concerned.

As to the applicability of P1 to the island of Guernsey, an express declaration was required for its application to the island. According to the records of the Council of Europe, no such declaration extending the provisions of the Protocol to Guernsey had been communicated by the UK to the Secretary General of the Council of Europe. Therefore, P1A1 was not applicable in the present case and the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the complaints under it.

Preferential treatment for persons with strong attachments to the island was legitimate for the purposes of the restrictions permitted under A 8. The difference in treatment complained of therefore had an objective and reasonable justification. As to the alleged discrimination on the ground of property or wealth, the introduction of rateable-value limits reflected the Government's desire to exclude from the control of the Housing Authority the small percentage of expensive houses likely to be sought after by better-off persons not considered to be in need of protection, while providing necessary protection for persons of more limited means who had strong connections with Guernsey. In view of the legitimate objectives being pursued in the general interest and having regard to the State's margin of appreciation, the policy of different treatment could not be considered as unreasonable or as imposing a disproportionate burden on owners of more modest houses like the applicants, taking into account the possibilities open to them under the licensing system. The facts of the case did not therefore disclose a breach of A 14 of the Convention, taken in conjunction with A 8.

The proceedings against the decisions of the Housing Authority to refuse to grant licences to occupy 'Whiteknights was concerned with the applicants' right to occupy their own home, which was a civil right within the meaning of A 6(1). The prosecution of Mr Gillow for unlawful occupation of the house involved the determination of a criminal charge. A 6 applied in respect of both proceedings. The Royal Court entertained the appeal even though it had been lodged out of time, and thus remedied the failure on the lawyer's part to properly perform his duty. The applicants had failed to show how their effective right of access to court had been interfered with by the refusal to allow them to occupy their house without facing prosecution. The adjournment of a hearing was a matter which fell in principle within the discretion of the competent national court. In addition, Mrs Gillow's civil appeal was not lodged until the day already appointed for the criminal. In those circumstances, the decision of the magistrate not to adjourn was not open to criticism. Access to the original taped transcript of the first instance proceedings by the accused was in principle a question within the discretion of the domestic courts. In the present case, although access to the tape was refused, the Registrar of the Royal Court checked the transcript and pronounced it accurate. The evidence did not therefore disclose that any unfairness resulted in that connection. There was a factual nexus between the two appeals heard by the Royal Court. With one exception, each member of the Royal Court who had sat in the first case also took part in the second, but that in itself was not reasonably capable of giving rise to legitimate doubts as to the impartiality of the Royal Court. Regarding the partiality of the Jurat who had earlier sat as Magistrate in the criminal proceedings against Mrs Gillow and the other Jurat who had previously been President of the Housing Authority, the former had only taken a decision to adjourn, ultimately sine die, the hearing on the charges against Mrs Gillow and the latter did not appear from the evidence at any stage to have been involved, directly or indirectly, in the applicants' case. The performance of those previous functions was not sufficient to give rise to legitimate doubt as to the impartiality of the two Jurats in question. Accordingly there had been no violation of A 6(1). The applicants other complaints concerning the Royal Court were not pursued during the hearings and the Court did not consider it necessary to examine them.

Giorgio v Italy 00/33

[Application lodged 8.4.1997; Court Judgment 25.1.2000]

Girolami v Italy 91/17

[Application lodged 8.10.1987; Commission report 5.12.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991]

Mr Dino Girolami was a butcher's assistant. He was prosecuted for fraud to the detriment of a co-operative society on the occasion of a transaction concerning the sale of meat. The warrant for the applicant's arrest issued on 25 March 1978 could not be executed, as the applicant had fled. On 19 November 1979, the applicant appeared before the investigating judge and was questioned. On 3 April 1987 the Livorno court acquitted the applicant. The judgment became final on 3 May 1987. He complained of the length of proceedings.

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 25 March 1978, the date on which the public prosecutor's office ordered the applicant's arrest. It ended on 3 May 1987; the period for which the applicant was on the run, namely from 25 March 1978 to 30 May 1979, was excluded from the calculation. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case. The case was not a complex one and there was a long period of stagnation from 24 May 1980 to 11 January 1985. The applicant's flight undoubtedly served to slow down the progress of the proceedings; nevertheless, the Court could not regard as reasonable the remaining lapse of time of approximately eight years. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Present judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction. Costs and expenses (ITL 1,210,000).

In the general election of 8 April 1990, Mr Konstantinos Gitonas was elected as a Socialist Party member, Mr Dimitrios Paleothodoros was elected as member of the electoral coalition 'Zante Initiative for Progress, Development and Simple Proportional Representation', Mr Nicolaos Sifounakis was elected as member for the Socialist Party, Mr Ioannis Kavaratzis and Mr Gerassimos Giakoumatos were elected as members for the 'Nea Dimokratia' Party. They had held the posts respectively of Deputy Head of the Prime Minister's private office, Directors General of a television channel, First Deputy Director of the Social Security Fund and Second Deputy Director of the Social Security Fund. Those posts gave grounds for disqualification from standing for election under the legislation and following complaints the Special Supreme Court annulled their elections. They complained that the annulment of their election by the Special Supreme Court pursuant to the Greek Constitution infringed the right of the electorate freely to choose its representatives and, by the same token, their own right to be elected.

Comm found by majority (9–8 in the case of Mr Gitonas and Others, 16–12 in the case of Mr Kavaratzis and 14–12 in the case of Mr Giakoumatos) V P1A3.

Court found unanimously NV P1A3.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr P Kûris, Mr J Casadevall.

P1A3 implied subjective rights to vote and to stand for election. Those rights were not absolute. Since P1A3 recognised them without setting them forth in express terms or defining them, there was room for 'implied limitations'. In their internal legal orders the Contracting States made the rights to vote and to stand for election subject to conditions which were not in principle precluded under P1A3. They had a wide margin of appreciation in that sphere, but it was for the Court to determine in the last resort whether the requirements of Protocol No 1 had been complied with; it had to satisfy itself that the conditions did not curtail the rights in question to such an extent as to impair their very essence and deprive them of their effectiveness; that they were imposed in pursuit of a legitimate aim; and that the means employed were not disproportionate. States enjoyed considerable latitude to establish in their constitutional order rules governing the status of parliamentarians, including criteria for disqualification. The relevant provision of the Constitution, which was applied in the applicants' case, established grounds for disqualification that were both relative and final in that certain categories of holders of public office were precluded from standing for election and being elected in any constituency where they had performed their duties for more than three months in the three years preceding the elections. Such disqualification served a dual purpose that was essential for the proper functioning and upholding of democratic regimes, namely ensuring that candidates of different political persuasions enjoyed equal means of influence and protecting the electorate from pressure from such officials who, because of their position, were called upon to take many, and sometimes important, decisions and enjoyed substantial prestige in the eyes of the ordinary citizen, whose choice of candidate might be influenced. The system introduced by the Constitution was somewhat complex. However, the Court had not encountered any incoherencies and would not say that the system was arbitrary. As for the objective establishment of criteria for disqualification, which was laid down by the Constitution and prevented the Special Supreme Court from having regard to any special features of the case, the Court did not find it unreasonable having regard to the enormous practical difficulty in proving that a position in the civil service had been used to electoral ends. It was primarily for the national authorities, and in particular the courts of first instance and of appeal, which were specially qualified for the task, to construe and apply domestic law. The positions held by the applicants were not among those expressly referred to in the relevant part of the Constitution. However, that did not guarantee them a right to be elected. The Special Supreme Court had sole jurisdiction under the Constitution to decide any dispute over disqualifications and, as in any judicial order where such a system existed, anyone elected in breach of the applicable rules would forfeit his position as a Member of Parliament. In the instant case the Special Supreme Court, after analysing the nature of the posts held by the applicants and the applicable legislation, held that the posts were similar to the ones described in the Greek constitution; it further found that the conditions relating to when the position was held, and the duration and extent of the duties, were met in the case of each of the applicants. On reasonable grounds it considered it necessary to annul their election. There was nothing in the judgments of the Special Supreme Court to suggest that the annulments were contrary to Greek legislation, arbitrary or disproportionate, or thwarted 'the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature'. Consequently, there had been no violation of P1A3.

Glasenapp v Germany (1987) 9 EHRR 25 86/7

[Application lodged 7.11.1980; Commission report 11.5.1984; Court Judgment 28.8.1986]

Mrs Julia Glasenapp was appointed as a secondary schoolteacher, which involved being treated as a probationary civil servant. As a civil servant, she was required to sign a declaration of loyalty to the Constitution prior to her appointment. Subsequently, the secret service revealed that she had lived in a block of flats among whose tenants there were Maoist Communists. She admitted in a letter that she was involved in a kindergarten run by Communists and did not dissociate herself from such policies of the Communists. As a result, she was dismissed for wilful deceit in signing her declaration of loyalty. She complained of the revocation of her provisional appointment as a secondary school teacher, relying on A 10.

Court dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (16–1) NV 10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr W Ganshof van der Meersch, Mr J Cremona (c), Mr G Wiarda, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (jc), Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (jc), Mr L-E Pettiti (declaration/jc), Mr B Walsh (jc), Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo (jc), Mr R Bernhardt (jc), Mr A Spielmann (pd).

The Government's preliminary objection of incompatibility of the application with the provisions of the Convention related to the interpretation and application of the Convention and was a question going to the merits, which could not be tried merely as a preliminary issue. Regarding exhaustion of domestic remedies, in substance, the applicant had ventilated before the domestic courts the grievance which she submitted to the Commission and then the Court. She thereby provided the national authorities with the opportunity which was, in principle, intended to be afforded to Contracting States by A 26, namely of putting right the violations alleged against them. The Constitutional Court had held that it was not necessary to plead the relevant Article of the Basic Law; it was sufficient that the rights alleged to have been disregarded should be apparent from the complainant's submissions. In addition, the case-law of the Federal Constitutional Court had established that in the case of civil servants, the Basic Law safeguarded the expression of political opinions only in so far as such expression was reconcilable with the duty of allegiance to the Constitution. Accordingly, the objection that domestic remedies were not exhausted could not be sustained.

The Convention deliberately excluded a right of access to a post in the Civil Service. However, that did not totally exclude civil servants from the protection of the Convention, which applied to everyone within the jurisdiction of the Contracting States, and therefore A 10 applied. The status of probationary civil servant that the applicant had acquired through her appointment as a secondary school teacher accordingly did not deprive her of the protection afforded by A 10. Access to the civil service lay at the heart of the issue. In refusing the applicant such access, the Land Authority took account of her opinions and attitude merely in order to satisfy itself as to whether she possessed one of the necessary personal qualifications for the post in question. That being so, there had been no interference with the exercise of the right protected under A 10(1).

Goddi v Italy (1984) 6 EHRR 457 84/4

[Application lodged 1.5.1980; Commission report 14.7.1982; Court Judgment 9.4.1984]

Mr Francesco Goddi was a shepherd. On 6 June 1975, he was tried for various firearms offences and sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment and a serious offence fine. He appealed to the Bologna Court of Appeal. The hearing of 3 December 1977 was held in the absence of the applicant and his lawyer and also of the party seeking damages, the co-accused and his lawyer, and the three witnesses who had been summoned. The Court of Appeal declared the applicant to be unlawfully absent (he had been recently arrested). Mr Bezicheri, the applicant's chosen lawyer, failed to appear, since he had not received the notification which had been sent to the applicant's previous lawyers. At the hearing on 3 December, the Court of Appeal assigned another lawyer, Mr Straziani, to act for the applicant. Mr Straziani did no more than refer back to the grounds of appeal, which had been drafted by the previous lawyer. The hearing was concluded on the same day. The Court of Appeal accepted the senior public prosecutor's submissions and imposed on the applicant heavier sentences. The applicant's appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed on 8 November 1979. The applicant complained that he had not been able to appear at the hearing himself, that he had been deprived of the services of the lawyer of his own choosing, by reason of the fact that the date of the hearing had been notified to another lawyer, who was no longer acting for him, and that the defence provided by Mr Straziani, the officially appointed lawyer, had not been effective.

Court found unanimously V 6(3)(c).

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr Glacergren, Mr L Liesch, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr B Walsh, Mr C Russo, Mr J Gersing.

The aim pursued by A 6(3)(c) was not achieved before the Bologna Court of Appeal. The applicant's chosen lawyer did not attend the hearing and was therefore unable to fulfil the task entrusted to him by the applicant. The applicant was also unable to appear as he was in prison. Mr Straziani, who was designated on the spot as the officially appointed lawyer, was acquainted neither with the case-file nor with his client; in addition, he did not have the requisite time to prepare himself since the Court of Appeal refused the request for an adjournment and the hearing closed on the same day, the outcome being the imposition of heavier sentences than those imposed at first instance. Therefore, the applicant did not have the benefit on 3 December 1977 of a defence that was 'practical and effective', as required by A 6(3)(c). Nevertheless, it had to be ascertained whether and to what extent that factual situation was attributable to the Italian State. On the evidence, the public prosecutor's office could not be regarded as responsible for the applicant's non-appearance before the appeal court. The applicant maintained that he told the prison authorities the date of the hearing of the criminal proceedings, but that was contested by the Government. Neither the applicant nor the Government adduced any evidence in support of their assertions and there was no other information before the Court which would enable it to resolve that disputed issue of fact. Accordingly, on that point, it was not established that the Italian authorities were at fault. The failure to notify Mr Bezicheri was instrumental in depriving the applicant of a 'practical and effective' defence. The preceding phases of the proceedings should have led the Bologna Court of Appeal to believe that only Mr Bezicheri could have provided the defence on 3 December 1977: unlike the previous lawyer, who had never appeared before the Court of Appeal, Mr Bezicheri had taken part in the previous hearing. Accordingly, it was necessary to send the notification in question to him. The fact that Mr Bezicheri was absent was all the more disturbing because the applicant himself was also absent. No reproach could be levelled against the applicant for his conduct. As regards the defence provided for the applicant on 3 December 1977 by the officially appointed lawyer, it was not the Court's task to express an opinion on the manner in which Mr Straziani considered that he should conduct the case. The Court had to determine whether the Bologna Court of Appeal took steps to ensure that the accused had the benefit of a fair trial, including an opportunity for an adequate defence. Mr Straziani did not have the time and facilities he would have needed to study the case-file, prepare his pleadings and, if appropriate, consult his client. The Court of Appeal should have taken measures, of a positive nature, calculated to permit the officially appointed lawyer to fulfil his obligations in the best possible conditions. No inference could be drawn from the fact that Mr Straziani himself made no such request. The exceptional circumstances of the case – the absence of Mr Goddi and the failure to notify Mr Bezicheri – required the Court of Appeal not to remain passive. Taken together, those considerations led the Court to find that there was a failure to comply with the requirements of A 6(3)(c) at the stage of the hearing of 3 December 1977 before the Bologna Court of Appeal. That failure was not remedied by the Court of Cassation since its judgment of 8 November 1979 dismissed the applicant's appeal on points of law. There had therefore been a violation.

Goisis v Italy 93/42

[Application lodged 16 May 1989; Commission report 1.7.1992; Court Judgment 22.9.1993]

Mr Mario Goisis took proceedings on 4 January 1989 against three persons in the Bergamo magistrates' court. He sought to have them ordered to move the low wall which enclosed their properties. In a judgment of 7 April 1993, which was filed at the registry on 14 April, the magistrate declined jurisdiction in favour of the Bergamo District Court. The proceedings were resumed on 26 May 1993. The applicant complained about the length of proceedings.

Court unanimously held it could not consider the merits.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr C Russo, Mr I Foighel, Mr F Bigi, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr J Makarczyk.

The Commission exceeded, albeit by only one day, the time allowed for referring the case to the Court. No special circumstance of a nature to suspend the running of time or justify its starting to run afresh was apparent from the file. The request bringing the case before the Court was consequently inadmissible as it was made out of time.

Golder v United Kingdom (1979–80) 1 EHRR 524 75/1

Mr Sidney Elmer Golder was serving a sentence of 15 years' imprisonment in Parkhurst Prison for robbery with violence. On 24 October 1969, a serious disturbance occurred in a recreation area of the prison. A prison officer, who had taken part and been injured in quelling the disturbance, made a statement identifying his assailants, including the applicant. The applicant and other prisoners suspected of having participated in the disturbance, were segregated from the main body of prisoners. The prison governor stopped the applicant's letters to his Member of Parliament and to a Chief Constable about the disturbance and the ensuing hardships it had entailed for him. In November, the accusations against the applicant were withdrawn by the prison officer and he was returned to his ordinary cell. On 20 March 1970, he addressed a petition to the Home Secretary requesting a transfer to another prison and permission to consult a solicitor with a view to taking civil action for libel against the prison officer accuser. His requests were refused. He complained about his treatment.

By forbidding the applicant to make contact with his solicitor, the Home Secretary impeded the launching of the applicant's contemplated action. Hindrance could contravene the Convention just like a legal impediment. The right which the applicant wished to invoke against the prison officer was a 'civil right' within the meaning of A 6(1). A 6(1) did not state a right of access to the courts or tribunals in express terms. It enunciated rights which were distinct, but stemmed from the same basic idea and which, taken together, made up a single right not specifically defined in the narrower sense of the term. While the right to a fair, public and expeditious judicial procedure could apply only to proceedings in being, it did not necessarily follow that a right to the very institution of such proceedings was thereby excluded. In civil matters, the rule of law could not be conceived without there being a possibility of having access to the courts. The principle whereby a civil claim had to be capable of being submitted to a judge ranked as one of the universally recognised fundamental principles of law. It would be inconceivable that A 6(1) should describe in detail the procedural guarantees afforded to parties in a pending lawsuit and should not first protect that which alone made it possible to benefit from such guarantees, that is, access to a court. The fair, public and expeditious characteristics of judicial proceedings were of no value at all if there were no judicial proceedings. The right of access constituted an element which was inherent in the right stated by A 6(1). A 6(1) secured to everyone the right to have any claim relating to his civil rights and obligations brought before a court or tribunal. In that way the Article embodied the 'right to a court', of which the right of access, that is, the right to institute proceedings before courts in civil matters, constituted one aspect only. To that were added the guarantees laid down by A 6(1) as regards both the organisation and composition of the court, and the conduct of the proceedings. In sum, the whole made up the right to a fair hearing. The right of access to the courts was not absolute, there was room for limitations permitted by implication. The applicant could justifiably wish to consult a solicitor with a view to instituting legal proceedings. It was not for the Home Secretary himself to appraise the prospects of the action contemplated; it was for an independent and impartial court to rule on any claim that might be brought. In declining to accord the leave which had been requested, the Home Secretary failed to respect the applicant's right to go before a court as guaranteed by A 6(1).

A 8: The interference was in accordance with the law, namely the Prison Rules 1964. The necessity for interference with the exercise of the right of a convicted prisoner to respect for his correspondence had to be appreciated having regard to the ordinary and reasonable requirements of imprisonment. Even having regard to the power of appreciation left to the Contracting States, the Court could not discern how the considerations of prevention of disorder, the interests of public safety and the protection of the rights and freedoms of others, could oblige the Home Secretary to prevent the applicant from corresponding with a solicitor with a view to suing the prison officer for libel. The applicant was seeking to exculpate himself and could justifiably wish to write to a solicitor. It was not for the Home Secretary himself to appraise the prospects of the action contemplated; it was for a solicitor to advise the applicant on his rights and then for a court to rule on any action that might be brought. The Home Secretary's decision proved to be all the less necessary in a democratic society in that the applicant's correspondence with a solicitor would have been a preparatory step to the institution of civil legal proceedings and, therefore, to the exercise of a right embodied in A 6. There had been a violation of A 8.

Findings constituted sufficient just satisfaction.

By summons served on 4 September 1982, he claimed damages in respect of the accident against Mrs F and Mr M before the Santa Maria Capua Vetere District Court. The period to be taken into consideration began on 4 September 1982 when the proceedings were instituted against Mrs F and Mr M in the Santa Maria Capua Vetere District Court. It ended, at the latest, on 27 May 1990 when the District Court's judgment became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The investigation took just under six years. There were two periods of stagnation. Regarding the Government's plea of the backlog of cases, A 6(1) imposed on the Contracting States the duty to organise their legal systems in such a way that their courts could meet each of its requirements. The State could not be held responsible for the year which elapsed until the decision, the text of which was lodged with the registry on 27 May 1989, became final. However, the Court could not regard as reasonable the lapse of time in the present case.

Goodwin v United Kingdom (1996) 22 EHRR 123 96/15

[Application lodged 27.9.1990; Commission report 1.3.1994; Court Judgment 27.3.1996]

Mr William Goodwin was a journalist employed by Morgan Grampian plc, publishers. On 2 November 1989, a source gave him information about Tetra Ltd, to the effect that the company had financial problems. The information was unsolicited and was not given in exchange for any payment. It was provided on an unattributable basis. The applicant maintained that he had no reason to believe that the information derived from a stolen or confidential document. Intending to write an article about Tetra, he telephoned the company to check the facts and seek its comments on the information. The information derived from a draft of Tetra's confidential corporate plan, a copy of which had disappeared. On 7 November 1989, the High Court of Justice granted Tetra an ex parte interim injunction restraining the publishers from publishing any information derived from the corporate plan. On 14 November 1989, the publishers were ordered to disclose their source. They failed to do so. On 22 November 1989, the applicant was ordered to disclose the source's identity in order to enable Tetra to bring proceedings against the source to recover the document, obtain an injunction preventing further publication or seek damages for the expenses to which it had been put. The applicant's appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed and the decision was upheld by the House of Lords. The applicant failed to comply with the High Court order and on 10 April 1990, he was fined GBP 5,000 for contempt of court. The applicant complained that the imposition of a disclosure order requiring him to reveal the identity of a source violated his right to freedom of expression under A 10.

Comm found by majority (11–6) V 10.

Court found by majority (11–7) V 10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (jd), President, Mr R Bernhardt (jd), Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (jd), Mr F Matscher (jd), Mr B Walsh (jd/d), Mr C Russo, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland (jd), Mr AB Baka (jd), Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus.

The measures constituted an interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression. The impugned disclosure order and the fine had a basis in national law, namely, the Contempt of Court Act. Regarding the applicant's argument that as far as the disclosure order was concerned, the relevant national law failed to satisfy the foreseeability requirement, the interpretation of the relevant laws by the House of Lords did not go beyond what could be reasonably foreseen in the circumstances. The interference pursued the aim of protecting Tetra's rights. Freedom of expression constituted one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and the safeguards to be afforded to the press were of particular importance. Having regard to the importance of the protection of journalistic sources for press freedom in a democratic society and the potentially chilling effect an order of source disclosure had on the exercise of that freedom, such a measure could not be compatible with A 10 unless it was justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest. The Court's task was to review under A 10 the decisions taken by the national courts pursuant to their power of appreciation. The purpose of the disclosure order was largely the same as that already being achieved by the injunction, namely, to prevent dissemination of the confidential information contained in the plan. The injunction was effective in stopping dissemination of the confidential information by the press. A vital component of the threat of damage to the company had thus already largely been neutralised by the injunction. That being so, in so far as the disclosure order merely served to reinforce the injunction, the additional restriction on freedom of expression which it entailed was not supported by sufficient reasons for the purposes of A 10(2). The further purposes served by the disclosure order (preventing publication to customers or competitors by the applicant journalist's source and unmasking a disloyal employee or collaborator, who might have continuing access to its premises, in order to terminate his or her association with the company) were relevant reasons. However, it would not be sufficient, per se, for a party seeking disclosure of a source to show merely that they would be unable without disclosure to exercise the legal right or avert the threatened legal wrong on which they based their claim in order to establish the necessity of disclosure. The considerations to be taken into account by the Convention institutions for their review under A 10(2) tipped the balance of competing interests in favour of the interest of democratic society in securing a free press. On the facts of the present case, the Court could not find that Tetra's interests in eliminating, by proceedings against the source, the residual threat of damage through dissemination of the confidential information otherwise than by the press, in obtaining compensation and in unmasking a disloyal employee or collaborator were, even if considered cumulatively, sufficient to outweigh the vital public interest in the protection of the applicant journalist's source. The Court did not, therefore, consider that the further purposes served by the disclosure order, when measured against the standards imposed by the Convention, amounted to an overriding requirement in the public interest. There was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the legitimate aim pursued by the disclosure order and the means deployed to achieve that aim. The restriction which the disclosure order entailed on the applicant journalist's exercise of his freedom of expression could not be regarded as having been necessary in a democratic society, within the meaning of A 10(2), for the protection of Tetra's rights under English law, notwithstanding the margin of appreciation available to the national authorities. Accordingly, both the order requiring the applicant to reveal his source and the fine imposed upon him for having refused to do so gave rise to a violation of his right to freedom of expression under A 10.

Finding of violation constituted just satisfaction for the non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (GBP 37,595.50 less FF 9,300).

Despite several reminders from the registry, the applicant showed no interest in the proceedings before the Court. There had been an implied withdrawal which constituted a 'fact of a kind to provide a solution of the matter'. The Court discerned no reason of public policy for continuing the proceedings. It noted previous cases in which it had reviewed the reasonableness of the length of civil proceedings. Accordingly, the case was struck out of the list.

Gradinger v Austria 95/36

[Application lodged 22.5.1989; Commission report 19.5.1994; Court Judgment 23.10.1995]

On 1 January 1987, at about 4 am, while driving his car, Mr Josef Gradinger caused an accident which led to the death of a cyclist. On 15 May 1987, the St Pölten Regional Court convicted him of causing death by negligence and sentenced him to 200 day-fines of 160 Austrian schillings with 100 days' imprisonment in default of payment. The court found that the applicant had been drinking before the accident, but not to such an extent as to be caught by the Criminal Code. On 16 July 1987, the St Pölten district authority issued a sentence order imposing on the applicant a fine of ATS 12,000, with two weeks' imprisonment in default, for driving under the influence of drink. The applicant appealed to the Lower Austria regional government, which dismissed his appeal on 27 July 1988. On 11 October 1988, the Constitutional Court declined to accept his appeal for adjudication. A further appeal, to the Administrative Court, was dismissed as ill-founded on 29 March 1989. The applicant complained that he had been convicted, contrary to the non bis in idem principle, by an administrative authority which could not be considered an independent and impartial tribunal and which had called on the services of its own experts.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) as regards right to an independent and impartial tribunal, V P7A4, unanimously no separate issue under A 6(1) regarding the lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court.

Court found unanimously V 6(1) as regards access to a court, not necessary to examine the complaints based on the lack of a hearing in the Administrative Court and that court's failure to take evidence from witnesses, V P7A4.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald, Mr SK Martens (so), Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr J Makarczyk.

In order to determine whether an offence qualified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention, it was first necessary to ascertain whether or not the provision defining the offence belonged, in the legal system of the respondent State, to criminal law; next, the 'very nature of the offence' and the degree of severity of the penalty risked had to be considered. Although the offences in issue and the procedures followed in the case fell within the administrative sphere, they were nevertheless criminal in nature. That was reflected in the terminology employed. In addition, the fine imposed on the applicant was accompanied by an order for his committal to prison in the event of his defaulting on payment. Those considerations were sufficient to establish that the offence of which the applicant was accused could be classified as 'criminal' for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that A 6 applied.

The applicant based his complaints on A 6, whereas the wording of the Austrian reservation mentioned only A 5 and made express reference solely to measures for the deprivation of liberty. Moreover, the reservation only came into play where both substantive and procedural provisions of one or more of the four specific laws indicated in it had been applied. Here, however, the substantive provisions of a different Act, the Road Traffic Act 1960, were applied. The reservation in question did not therefore apply in the instant case.

Decisions taken by administrative authorities which did not themselves satisfy the requirements of A 6(1) had to be subject to subsequent control by a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. The Constitutional Court was not such a body. In the present case, it could look at the impugned proceedings only from the point of view of their conformity with the Constitution, and that did not enable it to examine all the relevant facts. It accordingly lacked the powers required under A 6(1). The powers of the Administrative Court had to be assessed in the light of the fact that the court in this case was sitting in proceedings that were of a criminal nature for the purposes of the Convention. It followed that when the compatibility of those powers with A 6(1) was being gauged, regard had to be had to the complaints raised in that court by the applicant as well as to the defining characteristics of a judicial body that had full jurisdiction. Those included the power to quash in all respects, on questions of fact and law, the decision of the body below. As the Administrative Court lacked that power, it could not be regarded as a tribunal within the meaning of the Convention. It followed that the applicant did not have access to a tribunal. There had, accordingly, been a violation of A 6 on that point.

Having regard to the conclusions above, the Court did not consider it necessary to examine the complaints regarding the Administrative Court's failure to hold a hearing or take evidence from witnesses.

Regarding the reservation, there was no 'brief statement' of the law which was said not to conform to P7A3 (compensation for wrongful conviction) and P7A4 (right not to be tried or punished twice). The 'declaration' did not afford to a sufficient degree a guarantee that it did not go beyond the provisions expressly excluded by Austria. Accordingly, the declaration did not satisfy the requirements of A 64(2). Therefore, the 'declaration' was invalid and it was not necessary also to examine whether the other requirements of A 64 were complied with.

The aim of P7A4 was to prohibit the repetition of criminal proceedings that had been concluded by a final decision. P7A4 did not therefore apply before new proceedings had been opened. In the present case, in as much as the new proceedings reached their conclusion in a decision later in date than the entry into force of P7, namely, the Administrative Court's judgment of 29 March 1989, the conditions for applicability ratione temporis were satisfied. According to the St Pölten Regional Court, the aggravating circumstance referred to in the Criminal Code, namely a blood alcohol level of 0.8 grams per litre or higher, was not made out with regard to the applicant. On the other hand, the administrative authorities found, in order to bring the applicant's case within the ambit of the Road Traffic Act, that that alcohol level had been attained. The provisions in question differed not only as regards the designation of the offences but also as regards their nature and purpose. The offence provided for in the Road Traffic Act represented only one aspect of the offence punished under the Criminal Code. Nevertheless, both impugned decisions were based on the same conduct. Accordingly, there had been a breach of P7A4.

Granger v United Kingdom (1990) 12 EHRR 469 90/6

[Application lodged 5.12.1985; Commission report 12.12.1988; Court Judgment 28.3.1990]

Mr Joseph Granger gave evidence in a trial involving serious incidents between rival groups in Glasgow in the early 1980s which had culminated in a fire-raising attack on industrial premises, followed by a petrol-bomb attack on an apartment resulting in the death of six members of the same family. He was subsequently arrested and prosecuted in the High Court of Justiciary for perjury. He was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment. His application for legal assistance, to the Supreme Court Legal Aid Committee of the Law Society of Scotland, was refused, as the Committee was not satisfied that the applicant had substantial grounds for his appeal. As a consequence, the applicant represented himself at the appeal hearing before the High Court of Justiciary. The court refused the appeal. The applicant complained of the refusal of legal aid for his appeal.

Comm found unanimously V 6(3)(c), by majority (11–1) no separate issue under 6(1), unanimously NV 5, NV 8, unanimously NV 13 in respect of the applicant's complaints under 5 and 8, no separate issue under 13 in respect of the applicant's complaints under 6.

Court unanimously rejected Government's preliminary objection, found V 6(3)(c)+6(1), not necessary to examine 5, 8, 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mr SK Martens.

The preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was rejected partly on the grounds of estoppel as the government had not raised the complaint earlier and partly as being without foundation as the government had not furnished the necessary proof of the availability of a remedy that the applicant should have exhausted.

The application of A 6(1) and (3)(c) to the appellate courts depended on the special features of the proceedings; account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings and of the role of the appellate court. The question of whether the interests of justice required a grant of legal aid had to be determined in the light of the case as a whole, not only at the time the legal aid decision was given, but also the time the appeal was heard. The applicant did not have sufficient means, his personal liberty was at stake, the case was complex with one of the issues requiring an adjournment to allow for further detailed consideration. There was no review of the refusal of legal aid by the High Court. In all the circumstances it would have been in the interests of justice for free legal assistance to have been given to the applicant at least at that stage of the proceedings.

The claims under 5, 8 and 13 were not pursued before the Court, which saw no need to examine them of its own motion.

Non-pecuniary damage (by majority (4–3) GBP 1,000), costs and expenses (GBP 7,000).

[Application lodged 7.7.1993; Commission report 18.10.1995; Court Judgment 25 February 1997]

Mr David Gregory was a black British citizen. He was tried for robbery at Manchester Crown Court in November 1991. After the jury retired to consider their verdict, a note was passed by them to the judge stating that racial overtones were being shown and requesting one member to be discharged. The trial judge showed the note to counsel for the prosecution and defence and consulted them on the appropriate response to it. The judge recalled the jury and directed them to decide the case according to the evidence in the case and nothing else and reminding them of their duty. The jury eventually delivered a ten to two majority verdict finding the applicant guilty. He was sentenced to six years' imprisonment. His appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed. He complained that he had not been given a fair trial by an independent and impartial tribunal and that he had been discriminated against on grounds of his race and/or colour.

Comm found by majority (8–3) NV 6, unanimously no separate issue under 14+6.

It was of fundamental importance in a democratic society that the courts inspired confidence in the public and above all, as far as criminal proceedings were concerned, in the accused. To that end a tribunal, including a jury, had to be impartial from a subjective as well as an objective point of view. There was no evidence of actual or subjective bias on the part of one or more jurors. It was not possible under English law for the trial judge to question the jurors about the circumstances which gave rise to the note. The members of the jury were committed by oath or affirmation to faithfully try the applicant and to give a true verdict according to the evidence. The trial judge sought the views of both prosecution and defence counsel. He dealt with the allegation by means of a firmly worded redirection to the jury having had the benefit of submissions from both counsel. No more was required under A 6 to dispel any objectively held fears or misgivings about the impartiality of the jury than was done by the judge. While the guarantee of a fair trial might in certain circumstances require a judge to discharge a jury, it also had to be acknowledged that that might not always be the only means to achieve that aim. In circumstances such as those in issue, other safeguards, including a carefully worded redirection to the jury, might be sufficient. The judge had taken sufficient steps to check that the court was established as an impartial tribunal within the meaning of A 6(1) and he offered sufficient guarantees to dispel any doubts in that regard. Therefore, there had been no violation of A 6(1). The applicant's complaint under A 14 did not give rise to any separate issue. Therefore, there had been no violation under that head.

Grigoriades v Greece (1999) 27 EHRR 464 97/89

[Application lodged 17 March 1994; Commission report 25.6.1996; Court Judgment 25 November 1997]

Mr Panayiotis Grigoriades was a conscripted probationary reserve officer holding the rank of second lieutenant. In the course of his military service, he claimed to have discovered a number of abuses committed against conscripts. On 30 April 1989, he failed to return to his unit after leave. On 10 May 1989, he sent a letter to his unit's commanding officer through a taxi driver. Taking the view that the content of the letter constituted an insult to the armed forces, the commanding officer instituted criminal proceedings against the applicant under the Military Criminal Code. The applicant was tried on 27 June 1989 by the Permanent Army Tribunal of Ioannina on charges of desertion and insulting the army. He was found guilty and was sentenced to imprisonment for both offences. He appealed to the Military Appeal Court which quashed his conviction for desertion but upheld his conviction for insulting the army. His appeal to the Court of Cassation was rejected. He alleged a violation of the right to freedom of expression and complained that he had been convicted under an imprecise provision of criminal law.

Comm found by majority (28–1) V 10, unanimously NV 7.

Court found by majority (12–8) V 10, unanimously NV 7.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt (c), Mr F Gölcüklü (jd), Mr L-E Pettiti (jd), Mr B Walsh, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou (d), Mr JM Morenilla (d), Sir John Freeland (d), Mr L Wildhaber (c), Mr P Jambrek (c), Mr K Jungwiert, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr J Casadevall (d), Mr V Butkevych.

The applicant's conviction for insulting the army, and the sentence imposed on him, constituted an interference with his freedom of expression. The conviction had a basis in national law, namely, the Military Criminal Code as in force at the time. The provision was couched in very broad terms, but from the meaning of the word 'insult' it ought to have been clear to the applicant that he risked incurring a criminal sanction. The interference complained of was prescribed by law. An effective military defence required the maintenance of an appropriate measure of discipline in the armed forces and accordingly, the interference complained of pursued the legitimate aims of protecting national security and public safety. The Court recalled its case-law as to the necessity of the interference. A 10 applied to military personnel as to all other persons. Nevertheless, it was open to the State to impose restrictions on freedom of expression where there was a real threat to military discipline. It was not, however, open to the national authorities to rely on such rules for the purpose of frustrating the expression of opinions, even if these were directed against the army as an institution. The applicant had a letter delivered to his commanding officer. The contents of the letter included certain strong and intemperate remarks concerning the armed forces in Greece. However, those remarks were made in the context of a general and lengthy discourse critical of army life and the army as an institution. The letter was not published by the applicant or disseminated by him to a wider audience and it had not been alleged that any other person had knowledge of it. Nor did it contain any insults directed against either the recipient of the letter or any other person. Against such a background the objective impact on military discipline was insignificant. The prosecution and conviction of the applicant therefore could not be justified as necessary in a democratic society within the meaning of A 10(2). There had thus been a violation of that Article.

The complaint under A 7 coincided with the applicant's allegation that his conviction and sentence were not prescribed by law. For the reasons already stated, there had been no violation of A 7.

Finding of V 10 constituted just satisfaction in respect of any non-pecuniary damage (by majority 17–3). Costs and expenses (GRD 2,000,000).

Groppera Radio AG and Others v Switzerland (1990) 12 EHRR 321 90/5

[Application lodged 9.2.1984; Commission report 13.10.1988; Court Judgment 28.3.1990]

The applicants (a limited company, its sole shareholder, and two journalist employees) relied on A 10, complaining that the ban on cable retransmission in Switzerland of their broadcasts from Italy infringed their right to impart information and ideas regardless of frontiers. They also claimed to be victims of a breach of A 13 for want of any remedy against a federal council ordinance.

Comm found by a majority V 10, unanimously NV 13.

Court dismissed the Government's preliminary objection regarding victim, found by a majority NV 10, unanimously no need to consider 13.

Victim under A 25 meant the person directly affected by the act or omission in issue, a violation being conceivable even in the absence of any detriment. Detriment was relevant only to the application of A 50. Although the bans contained in a 1983 Ordinance and two administrative decisions of 1984 were not formally directed to the applicants, who continued to broadcast freely over the air, they were affected by the measures as shown by the loss of an appreciable proportion of their audience. There was no ground for distinguishing between the different applicants; they all had a direct interest in the continued transmission of the programmes by cable. All of them could claim to be victims of the alleged violation.

It was not necessary to give a precise definition of what was meant by 'information' and 'ideas'. Both broadcasting of programmes over the air and cable retransmission of such programmes were covered by the right enshrined in the first two sentences of A 10(1), without there being a need to draw distinctions according to the content of the programmes. The administrative decisions amounted to an interference by a public authority. The third paragraph of A 10(1) was applicable to the case. The object and purpose of the third sentence of A 10(1) and the scope of its application had to be considered in the context of the Article as a whole and in particular in relation to the requirements of para 2. The purpose of the third sentence of A 10(1) was to make it clear that States were permitted to control by a licensing system the way in which broadcasting, particularly the technical aspects, was organised in their territories. It did not provide, however, that licensing measures should not be subject to the requirements of para 2, as that would lead to a result contrary to the object and purpose of A 10 taken as a whole. The interference was in accordance with the third sentence of para 1. The scope of the concepts of foreseeability and accessibility depended to a considerable degree on the content of the instrument in issue, the field it was designed to cover and the number and status of those to whom it was addressed. In the present case, the relevant provisions of international telecommunications law were highly technical and complex and primarily intended for specialists who knew how the rules could be obtained. The rules in issue were sufficiently clear and precise to enable the applicants and their advisers to regulate their conduct in the matter. The interference pursued the dual aims of prevention of disorder in telecommunications and protection of the rights of others by allowing a fair allocation of frequencies internationally and nationally. Both aims were legitimate and fully compatible with A 10(2). The State had not overstepped the margin of appreciation as most Swiss companies had ceased retransmitting the programmes in question, the Swiss authorities never jammed the broadcasts, the ban was imposed on a company incorporated under Swiss law whose subscribers all lived on Swiss territory and continued to receive the programmes of several other stations and the procedure chosen could appear necessary in order to prevent evasion of the law and not as a form of censorship against the content or tendencies of the programmes.

[Application lodged 11 July 1994; Commission report 11.4.1997; Court Judgment 29 July 1998]

Mr Yves Guérin was a deputy police sergeant. On 29 November 1990, he was charged with accepting a bribe and remanded in custody. In a judgment of 6 June 1991, the Nice Criminal Court acquitted him. The prosecution appealed and in a judgment of 14 October 1991 in the applicant's absence, the Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal set aside the judgment at first instance and sentenced the applicant to two years' imprisonment. The applicant's request for a retrial was granted. He was found guilty, sentenced to imprisonment and a warrant issued for his arrest. On 24 November 1992, the applicant was admitted to a psychiatric institution, where he stayed until 16 December 1992, when the police enforced the warrant for his arrest. On 26 November 1992, acting through a lawyer, the applicant lodged an appeal on points of law. In a judgment of 19 January 1994, the Court of Cassation declared the appeal inadmissible on points of law as the applicant had not complied with the warrant for his arrest. He complained that his right to a court had been infringed.

The right to a court, of which the right of access was one aspect, was not absolute; it might be subject to limitations permitted by implication, particularly regarding the conditions of admissibility of an appeal. However, those limitations should not restrict exercise of the right in such a way or to such an extent that the very essence of the right was impaired. They had to pursue a legitimate aim and there had to be a reasonable proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved. Where an appeal on points of law was declared inadmissible solely because, as in the present case, the appellant had not surrendered to custody pursuant to the judicial decision challenged in the appeal, that ruling compelled the appellant to subject himself in advance to the deprivation of liberty resulting from the impugned decision, although that decision could not be considered final until the appeal has been decided or the time limit for lodging an appeal had expired. That impaired the very essence of the right of appeal, by imposing a disproportionate burden on the appellant, thus upsetting the fair balance that had to be struck between the legitimate concern to ensure that judicial decisions were enforced, on the one hand, and the right of access to the Court of Cassation and exercise of the rights of the defence on the other. The Court emphasised the crucial role of proceedings in cassation, which formed a special stage of criminal proceedings whose consequences might prove decisive for the accused. A 6(1) did not compel the Contracting States to set up courts of appeal or of cassation. Nevertheless, a State which did institute such courts was required to ensure that persons amenable to the law should enjoy before those courts the fundamental guarantees contained in A 6. As the Court had held in Poitrimol, the inadmissibility of the appeal on points of law, on grounds connected with the applicant's having absconded, amounted to a disproportionate sanction, having regard to the signal importance of the rights of the defence and of the principle of the rule of law in a democratic society. The applicant did not attempt to evade enforcement of the arrest warrant. Living in Brest, he was acquitted at first instance and travelled to Aix-en-Provence to attend the hearings in the Court of Appeal. He was not in court for the delivery of the judgment, but no statutory provision obliged him to attend, since in French law such attendance was a right, not an obligation. The day after the judgment of the Court of Appeal, he was admitted to a psychiatric institution. The police could have apprehended him at any time, and indeed did so on 16 December 1992 at the hospital he was in. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the Court considered that the applicant suffered an excessive restriction of his right of access to a court, and therefore of his right to a fair trial. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

Guerra and Others v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR 357 98/8

[Application lodged 18.10.1988; Commission report 29.6.1996; Court Judgment 19 February 1998]

The 40 applicants all lived in the town of Manfredonia which was approximately 1 km away from the Enichem Agricoltura company's chemical factory. In 1988, the factory, which produced fertilisers and caprolactam (a chemical compound used in the manufacture of synthetic fibres such as nylon), was classified as 'high risk'. In the course of its production cycle, the factory released large quantities of inflammable gas and chemicals. Accidents due to malfunctioning had already occurred in the past, the most serious one on 26 September 1976, when the scrubbing tower for the ammonia synthesis gases exploded, allowing several tonnes of potassium carbonate and bicarbonate solution, containing arsenic trioxide, to escape. 150 people were admitted to hospital with acute arsenic poisoning. Following complaints by the residents, there had been criminal proceedings in the Foggia magistrates' court which had resulted in some convictions. The applicants complained that the lack of practical measures, in particular to reduce pollution levels and major-accident hazards arising out of the factory's operation, infringed their right to respect for their lives and physical integrity. They also complained that the relevant authorities' failure to inform the public about the hazards and about the procedures to be followed in the event of a major accident, as required by domestic legislation, infringed their right to freedom of information as guaranteed by A 10.

Comm found by majority (21–8) V 10.

Court by majority (19–1) dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found by majority (18–2) 10 not applicable, unanimously V 8, not necessary to consider 2.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt (jc), President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (pc/pd), Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr B Walsh (c), Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo (jc), Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm (c), Mr AN Loizou, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici (pd/pc), Mr J Makarczyk (jc), Mr B Repik, Mr P Jambrek (c), Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P van Dijk (jc).

The Court's jurisdiction extended to all cases concerning the interpretation and application of the Convention which were referred to it in accordance with A 48 and in the event of dispute as to whether the Court had jurisdiction, the matter was settled by the decision of the Court. Since the Court was master of the characterisation to be given in law to the facts of the case, it did not consider itself bound by the characterisation given by an applicant, a government or the Commission. By virtue of the jura novit curia principle, it has, for example, considered of its own motion complaints under Articles or paragraphs not relied on by those appearing before it and even under a provision in respect of which the Commission had declared the complaint to be inadmissible while declaring it admissible under a different one. A complaint was characterised by the facts alleged in it and not merely by the legal grounds or arguments relied on. The Court had full jurisdiction only within the scope of the case, which was determined by the decision on the admissibility of the application. Within the compass thus delimited, the Court could deal with any issue of fact or law that arose during the proceedings before it. In the present case, the grounds based on A 8 and 2 were not expressly set out in the application or the applicants' initial memorials lodged in the proceedings before the Commission. Clearly, however, those grounds were closely connected with the one pleaded. The Court, therefore, had jurisdiction to consider the case under A 8 and 2 of the Convention as well as under A 10.

An urgent application under the Code of Civil Procedure would have been a practicable remedy if the applicants' complaint had concerned failure to take measures designed to reduce or eliminate pollution; in the instant case, however, such an application would probably have resulted in the factory's operation being suspended. Instituting criminal proceedings would at most have secured conviction of the factory's managers, but certainly not communication of any information. Neither remedy would have enabled the applicants to achieve their aim and the preliminary objection of non-exhaustion was therefore dismissed.

A 10 imposed on States not just a duty to make available information to the public on environmental matters, but also a positive obligation to collect, process and disseminate such information, which by its nature could not otherwise come to the knowledge of the public. The protection afforded by A 10 therefore had a preventive function with respect to potential violations of the Convention in the event of serious damage to the environment and A 10 came into play even before any direct infringement of other fundamental rights, such as the right to life or to respect for private and family life, occurred. In cases concerning restrictions on freedom of the press, the Court had recognised that the public had a right to receive information as a corollary of the specific function of journalists, which was to impart information and ideas on matters of public interest. Although the prefect of Foggia prepared the emergency plan on the basis of the report submitted by the factory and the plan was sent to the Civil Defence Department, the applicants had yet to receive the relevant information. Freedom to receive information, referred to in A 10(2), basically prohibited a government from restricting a person from receiving information that others wished or might be willing to impart to him. That freedom could not be construed as imposing on a State, in circumstances such as those of the present case, positive obligations to collect and disseminate information of its own motion. A 10 was not applicable in the present case.

The direct effect of the toxic emissions on the applicants' right to respect for their private and family life meant that A 8 was applicable. Italy could not be said to have 'interfered' with the applicants' private or family life; the applicants complained not of an act by the State but of its failure to act. However, although the object of A 8 was essentially that of protecting the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, it did not merely compel the State to abstain from such interference: in addition to this primarily negative undertaking, there might be positive obligations inherent in effective respect for private or family life. In the present case, it need only be ascertained whether the national authorities took the necessary steps to ensure effective protection of the applicants' right to respect for their private and family life as guaranteed by A 8. The Ministry for the Environment and the Ministry of Health had jointly adopted conclusions on the safety report submitted by the factory. Those conclusions provided the prefect with instructions as to the emergency plan, which he had drawn up in 1992, and the measures required for informing the local population. However, by 7 December 1995, documents concerning the conclusions had still not been received. Severe environmental pollution might affect individuals' well being and prevent them from enjoying their homes in such a way as to affect their private and family life adversely. In the present case the applicants waited, right up until the production of fertilisers ceased in 1994, for essential information that would have enabled them to assess the risks they and their families might run if they continued to live at Manfredonia, a town particularly exposed to danger in the event of an accident at the factory. The respondent State did not therefore fulfil its obligation to secure the applicants' right to respect for their private and family life, in breach of A 8.

Having regard to the conclusion that there had been a violation of A 8, the Court found it unnecessary to consider the case under A 2 also.

Mrs Adrienne Guillemin owned land on which, in a decision of 7 October 1982, the Prefect of the département of Essonne made a declaration that it was in the public interest to acquire by compulsory purchase for the development of a residential area in the town of Saint-Michel-sur-Orge. She appealed against the expropriation order and sought damages. On 4 January 1990, the Court of Cassation set aside the expropriation order. She sought restoration of her rights or compensation. The property had been developed and sold to individual purchasers who were occupying the properties. The claim for compensation was still pending before the Evry tribunal de grande instance. The applicant complained of the length of the proceedings to challenge the expropriation, the subsequent failure to enforce the judicial decisions in her favour and the loss of her property.

The decision whereby the Prefect declared the acquisition of land including the applicant's to be in the public interest was taken on 7 October 1982. On 19 November 1982, she applied to the administrative court to have that decision set aside. In civil cases, the 'reasonable time' for the purposes of A 6(1) usually began to run when the application was made to the court. In the present case, the period to be taken into consideration began on 19 November 1982 at the latest. In relation to the application of A 6(1), the period whose reasonableness fell to be reviewed took in the entirety of the proceedings, right up to the decision which disposed of the dispute. In the present case, resolving the dispute entailed bringing two sets of proceedings, one of which was still pending. The length of time to be considered accordingly exceeded 14 years. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case, and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. Expropriation proceedings were relatively complex, in particular as they came under the jurisdiction of two sets of courts. There were delays due to organisational difficulties and the applicant could not be held responsible for other delays. There were delays in the courts and delay on the part of the town council. The total delay already exceeded what could be regarded as reasonable. There had accordingly been a violation of A 6(1).

The judgment in which the Evry tribunal de grande instance held that the applicant was entitled to compensation from the expropriating town council was delivered after the end of the proceedings before the Commission. The domestic courts' acknowledgment of the applicant's right to compensation did not mean that she ceased to be a victim. She remained dispossessed of her property without any compensation after its unlawful expropriation by the administrative authorities and she had consequently not ceased to be a 'victim' within the meaning of A 25. As the proceedings to which she was a party had been so slow, it was unnecessary at that time for her to institute further proceedings in order to comply with the requirements of A 26. Nor could she be criticised for not awaiting the outcome of the proceedings pending in the Evry tribunal de grande instance. She had satisfied requirement of A 26 regarding exhaustion of domestic remedies. The Government's objections were therefore dismissed.

In 1982 the French authorities unlawfully expropriated the applicant's property to develop an extensive residential area. By erecting new buildings, later sold individually, she had been permanently deprived of the chance of regaining possession of her land. Her only course was to seek compensation. Compensation for the loss sustained by the applicant could only constitute adequate reparation where it also took into account the damage arising from the length of the deprivation. It also had to be paid within a reasonable time. The court proceedings for compensation had already lasted five years and were continuing. Compensation had not to date begun to be paid, although it could have been agreed on even after the expropriation order had been issued. The potentially large sum that might be awarded at the end of the pending proceedings did not offset the previously noted failure to pay compensation and could not be decisive in view of the length of all the proceedings already instituted by the applicant. There had therefore been a violation of P1A1.

Guillot v France 96/44

[Application lodged 28.3.1987; Commission report 12.4.1995; Court Judgment 24.10.1996]

Mr Gérard Guillot and his wife, Marie-Patrice, chose to give their daughter, born on 7 April 1983, the forenames 'Fleur de Marie, Armine, Angèle'. The registrar of births, deaths and marriages for Neuilly-sur-Seine, refused to register the first of these names on the ground that it did not appear in any calendar of saints' days. Nanterre tribunal de grande instance dismissed the applicants' main application for an order that the forename 'Fleur de Marie' be added as their daughter's first forename, but granted their application made in the alternative for the addition of 'Fleur-Marie'. Their appeals to the Versailles Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation were dismissed. They complained that the refusal by the authorities to enter the forename they had chosen for their child on her birth certificate constituted a violation of the right to respect for their private and family life.

A 8 did not contain any explicit provisions on forenames. However, since they constituted a means of identifying persons within their families and the community, forenames, like surnames, concerned private and family life. Furthermore, the choice of a child's forename by its parents was a personal, emotional matter and therefore came within their private sphere. The subject matter of the complaint thus fell within the ambit of A 8.

The applicants were understandably upset by the refusal to register the forename they had chosen for their daughter. That forename consequently could not appear on official documents and deeds and the difference between the forename in law and the forename she actually used could entail certain complications for the applicants when acting as her statutory representatives. However, the child regularly used the forename in issue (Fleur de Marie) without hindrance and the French courts, which considered the child's interest, allowed the application made in the alternative by the applicants for registration of the forename 'Fleur-Marie'. The Court did not find that the inconvenience complained of by the applicants was sufficient to raise an issue of failure to respect their private and family life under A 8(1). Consequently, there had not been a violation of A 8.

Guincho v Portugal (1985) 7 EHRR 223 84/9

[Application lodged 20.5.1980; Commission report 10.3.1983; Court Judgment 10.7.1984]

Mr Manuel dos Santos Guincho worked as an electrician. On 18 August 1976, the car in which he was travelling was involved in a collision as a consequence of which he was injured, losing the use of his left eye. Criminal proceedings were instituted against the drivers of both vehicles for causing unintentional bodily harm. Those proceedings were subsequently closed as a result of an amnesty granted under a Legislative Decree. On 7 December 1978, the applicant commenced a civil action in the Vila Franca de Xira Regional Court against the drivers. Judgment was given on 25 October 1982 with a finding in favour of the applicant. On 22 September 1983, the applicant sought execution of the judgment in the Regional Court. The applicant complained of the length of the civil proceedings.

Judges: Mr G Wiarda, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr W Ganshof van der Meersch, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr E García de Enterría, Mr J Gersing.

The relevant period started on 7 December 1978, the date proceedings were instituted before the Vila Franca de Xira Regional Court. The action fell into two phases, the first one lasting until 25 October 1982 and the second one, as yet uncompleted, being the 'execution' procedure. The latter procedure, which was entirely dependent upon the initiative being taken by the applicant, was not commenced until 23 September 1983. The Court consequently confined its examination to the first phase, which ran from 7 December 1978 until 25 October 1982, a period of three years, 10 months and 18 days. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in each case according to the particular circumstances and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law. The principle of determination in Portuguese civil litigation whereby the initiative in proceedings rested with the parties did not dispense the courts from ensuring the expeditious trial of the action as required by A 6. The proceedings did not entail any particular difficulty. The dilatory nature of the proceedings could not be attributed to the applicant. There were two occasions of almost total inactivity related to the performance of procedural acts of a purely routine character, such as the service of the writ on the defendants and the transmission of the defence pleadings to the plaintiffs. Those periods could be justified only by very exceptional circumstances. The Court took into account that the restoration of democracy as from April 1974 led Portugal to carry out an overhaul of its judicial system in troubled circumstances which were without equivalent in most of the other European countries and which were rendered more difficult by the process of decolonisation as well as by the economic situation. The Court did not underestimate the efforts taken to improve the citizen's access to justice and the administration of the courts, in particular after the promulgation of the Constitution in 1976. Nonetheless, in ratifying the Convention, Portugal gave the guarantee in A 1 and undertook the obligation of organising its legal system so as to ensure compliance with the requirements of A 6(1), including that of trial within a 'reasonable time'. That requirement was very important for the proper administration of justice. A temporary backlog of court business did not engage the international responsibility of the State concerned under the Convention provided that the State took effective remedial action with the requisite promptness. In the present case, the growth in the burden of work was spread over several years. However, in the face of a state of affairs that had developed into one of structural organisation, the steps taken by the State were insufficient and belated. Although reflecting the will to tackle the problem, they were, by their very nature, incapable of achieving satisfactory results. The exceptional difficulties encountered in Portugal were not such as to deprive the applicant of his entitlement to a judicial determination within a reasonable time. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

Gül v Switzerland (1996) 22 EHRR 93 96/5

Mr Riza Gül was a Turkish national. Until 1983, he lived with his wife and their two sons, Tuncay (born on 12 October 1971) and Ersin (born on 20 January 1983), in Turkey. On 25 April 1983, he travelled to Switzerland, where he applied for political asylum as a Kurd and former member of the Turkish Social Democratic Party. In 1987, the applicant's wife, who had suffered serious burns during a fit brought on by her epilepsy, joined her husband in Switzerland, where she was taken into hospital as an emergency case. On 19 September 1988, in Switzerland, Mrs Gül gave birth to her third child, Nursal, a daughter. As she still suffered from epilepsy, she could not take care of the baby, who was placed in a home. On 9 February 1989, the Minister for Refugees rejected Mr Gül's application for political asylum and ordered him to leave Switzerland by 30 April 1989, failing which he would be deported. The applicant appealed. The Basle Rural Cantonal Aliens Police supported his request for a residence permit, which was granted, and he withdrew his political asylum claim. On 14 May 1990, he sought permission to bring his two sons from Turkey to Switzerland. In a decision of 19 September 1990, the Aliens Police rejected his request. The applicant's appeal to the Basle Rural cantonal government was dismissed. His appeal to the Federal Court was rejected. He complained that the Swiss authorities' refusal to allow his two sons to join him in Switzerland constituted a violation of A 8.

A child born of a marital union was ipso jure part of that relationship; hence, from the moment of the child's birth and by the very fact of it, there existed between him and his parents a bond amounting to family life which subsequent events could not break save in exceptional circumstances. Although the applicant had left Turkey in 1983, when his son Ersin was only three months old, and his wife left in 1987 because of her accident, since 1990 the applicant had asked the Swiss authorities for permission to bring the boy, who was then six years old, to Switzerland, and he had made a number of visits to Turkey. It could not therefore be claimed that the bond of 'family life' between them had been broken. The essential object of A 8 was to protect the individual against arbitrary action by the public authorities. There might in addition be positive obligations inherent in effective 'respect' for family life. In both contexts, regard had to be had to the fair balance that had to be struck between the competing interests of the individual and of the community as a whole; and in both contexts the State enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation. The present case concerned not only family life but also immigration, and the extent of a State's obligation to admit to its territory relatives of settled immigrants would vary according to the particular circumstances of the persons involved and the general interest. A State had the right to control the entry of non-nationals into its territory. Moreover, where immigration was concerned,

A 8 could not be considered to impose on a State a general obligation to respect the choice by married couples of the country of their matrimonial residence and to authorise family reunion in its territory. It had to be determined to what extent Ersin's move to Switzerland would be the only way for the applicant to develop family life with his son. By leaving Turkey in 1983, Mr Gül caused the separation from his son; he had not been granted political refugee status, he had returned to Turkey to visit his son. His wife had been given a residence permit on humanitarian grounds in view of her health. However, it had not been proved that she could not later have received appropriate medical treatment in specialist hospitals in Turkey. She had visited Turkey with her husband in 1995. Although they were lawfully resident in Switzerland, they did not have a permanent right of abode, as they did not have a settlement permit but merely a residence permit on humanitarian grounds, which could be withdrawn, and which under Swiss law did not give them a right to family reunion. In view of the length of time the applicant and his wife had lived in Switzerland, it would not be easy for them to return to Turkey, but there were, strictly speaking, no obstacles preventing them from developing family life in Turkey. That possibility was all the more real because Ersin has always lived there and had therefore grown up in the cultural and linguistic environment of his country. Switzerland had not failed to fulfil the obligations arising under A 8 and there had, therefore, been no interference in the applicant's family life within the meaning of A 8.

Güleç v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 121 98/52

[Application lodged 16 March 1993; Commission report 17.4.1997; Court Judgment 27 July 1998]

On 4 March 1991, there were a number of incidents such as spontaneous unauthorised demonstrations, shop closures and attacks on public buildings during which two people were killed, one of whom was Ahmet Güleç, aged 15, the son Mr Hüseyin Güleç, the applicant. According to the Government, Ahmet Güleç was hit by a bullet fired by armed demonstrators at the gendarmes. According to the applicant, his son was killed by the security forces, who fired on the unarmed demonstrators to make them disperse. On 5 April 1991, the applicant filed a criminal complaint against the commander of the security forces. The Provincial Administrative Council halted the proceedings by means of a discontinuation order, which was never served on the applicant's lawyer. It found that the victim had died of bullet wounds received in the course of a confrontation between the demonstrators and the security forces. However, it found that it was impossible to identify those responsible. The Supreme Administrative Court upheld that decision. The applicant complained that his son's death had been caused by bullets fired by the security forces during a demonstration and complained that he had not been able to lodge a complaint with the criminal courts because of the administrative authorities' decision to discontinue proceedings against members of the gendarmerie.

As the argument concerning non-exhaustion had been put forward for the first time before the Court, the Government were estopped from relying on it.

The establishment and verification of the facts were primarily a matter for the Commission. While the Court was not bound by the Commission's findings of fact and remained free to make its own appreciation in the light of all the material before it, it was only in exceptional circumstances that it would exercise its own powers in that area. The file on the present case has not revealed any reason to cast doubt on the establishment of the facts as set out in the Commission's report. The demonstration was far from peaceful. Confronted with acts of violence which were, admittedly, serious, the security forces, who were not present in sufficient strength, called for reinforcements, and at least two armoured vehicles were deployed. The allegation that shots were fired at the crowd was corroborated by the fact that nearly all the wounded demonstrators were hit in the legs; that would be perfectly consistent with ricochet wounds from bullets with a downward trajectory which could have been fired from the turret of an armoured vehicle. The use of force might have been justified in the present case under para 2(c) of A 2, but a balance had to be struck between the aim pursued and the means employed to achieve it. The gendarmes used a very powerful weapon because they apparently did not have truncheons, riot shields, water cannon, rubber bullets or tear gas. The lack of such equipment was all the more incomprehensible and unacceptable because the province was in a region in which a state of emergency has been declared, where at the material time disorder could have been expected. The Government produced no evidence to support the assertion that there were armed terrorists among the demonstrators. The force used to disperse the demonstrators, which caused the death of Ahmet Güleç, was not absolutely necessary within the meaning of A 2.

The general legal prohibition of arbitrary killing by the agents of the State laid down in A 2 would be ineffective, in practice, if there existed no procedure for reviewing the lawfulness of the use of lethal force by State authorities. The Convention required by implication that there should be some form of effective official investigation when individuals had been killed as a result of the use of force by, inter alia, agents of the State. The procedural protection for the right to life inherent in A 2 meant that agents of the State had to be accountable for their use of lethal force; their actions had to be subjected to some form of independent and public scrutiny capable of determining whether the force used was or was not justified in a particular set of circumstances. The authorities responsible for the investigation were convinced that the victim's death was caused by a shot fired by PKK terrorists, but did not verify whether this was so. Loss of life was unfortunately a frequent occurrence in south-east Turkey in view of the security situation there. However, neither the prevalence of violent armed clashes nor the high incidence of fatalities could displace the obligation under A 2 to ensure that an effective, independent investigation was conducted into deaths arising out of clashes involving the security forces, or, as in the present case, a demonstration, however illegal it might have been. The investigation was not thorough, nor was it conducted by independent authorities. It was conducted without the participation of the complainant, who did not receive notice of the court order or decision. Consequently, there had been a breach of A 2 on account of the use of disproportionate force and the lack of a thorough investigation into the circumstances of the applicant's son's death.

Gündem v Turkey 98/38

Mr Ismet Gündem lived in the south-east of Turkey where there had been serious disturbances between the security forces and the members of the PKK. The facts of the case were in dispute between the parties. The applicant complained that his home and possessions had been severely damaged in the course of attacks conducted by State security forces and village guards on 7 January and 13 February 1993, as a result of which he had to leave his home. The Government denied the applicant's claim. The Commission did not find the applicant's claims to be established.

Court unanimously dismissed the Government's preliminary objection as to the validity of the application and its alleged discontinuance, by majority (14–6) joined the preliminary objection concerning exhaustion of domestic remedies to the merits, found unanimously NV 3, 5(1), 8, 18, P1A1, not necessary to examine 6(1), by majority (13–7) NV 13 and not necessary to decide the Government's preliminary objection concerning the exhaustion of domestic remedies.

Nothing had prevented the Government from raising at the admissibility stage their doubts as to the authenticity of the applicant's application and certain documents. Nor did they at that stage suggest that it could be inferred from the applicant's absence from the hearing that he wished to withdraw or discontinue the proceedings. The Government were estopped from making a preliminary objection before the Court both as to the validity of the application and the alleged withdrawal of the applicant's complaints. The Court recalled its previous case-law on non-exhaustion. The central question in the case was whether the applicant had demonstrated the existence of special circumstances dispensing him from the obligation under A 26 to exhaust domestic remedies. The Court had regard to the security situation which existed in south-east Turkey at the time of the applicant's complaint and which continued to exist. Despite the extent of the problem of village destruction, there appeared to be no example of compensation having been awarded in respect of allegations that property had been purposely destroyed by members of the security forces or of prosecutions having been brought against them as a result of such allegations. Furthermore, there seemed to be a general reluctance on the part of the authorities to admit that this type of practice by members of the security forces had occurred. On the other hand, the applicant had not himself raised his Convention grievances before a domestic authority before complaining to Strasbourg. The Court attached particular significance for the purposes of exhaustion in the present case to the manner in which the authorities conducted their investigation into the applicant's allegations, following the communication of his application by the Commission to the respondent Government. In this regard, the Court noted that despite the seriousness of the applicant's complaints, the investigations carried out by the prosecution authorities were not only protracted, but also of a limited nature. On the other hand, the Government sought to demonstrate that the authorities had made sustained efforts to find the applicant in order to be able to take evidence from him. The evidence did not disclose any shortcomings on the part of the authorities in that respect. Nor did it seem to exclude that the protracted and limited character of the investigations was to some extent caused by the applicant's failure to co-operate with the authorities. Furthermore, during the investigations, the mayor and four villagers from the applicant's neighbourhood had been interviewed, and had all denied that the alleged events had taken place. There were doubts as to whether it could be said that there existed such special circumstances in the present case as could dispense the applicant at the time of the events complained of from the obligation to exhaust domestic remedies. However, that preliminary objection raised issues which were closely linked to those raised by the applicant's complaint under A 13 and therefore, that plea was joined to the merits.

The Commission did not find, on the basis of the written and oral evidence before it, that it could be said to have been established beyond reasonable doubt that the events as alleged by the applicant had occurred. The establishment and verification of the facts were primarily a matter for the Commission and it was only in exceptional circumstances that the Court would exercise its powers in that area. There was no reason to depart from the Commission's findings and accordingly there had been no violation of A 3, 5(1), 8, 18, P1A1.

A 6(1): The applicant did not attempt to make an application before the courts and thus it was not possible for the Court to determine whether the Turkish courts would have been able to adjudicate on his claims had he initiated proceedings. In any event, the applicant complained essentially of the lack of a proper investigation into his allegation that the security forces had purposely destroyed his house and possessions. Therefore, it was appropriate to examine this complaint in relation to the more general obligation on States under A13.

A 13 guaranteed the availability at the national level of a remedy to enforce the substance of the Convention rights and freedoms in whatever form they happened to be secured in the domestic legal order. A 13 only applied in respect of grievances which were arguable. Whether that was so in the applicant's case had to be decided in the light of the particular facts and the nature of the legal issues raised. The Commission found that it was only the oral testimony of the applicant's father which provided support for the applicant's account of events. However, that testimony had been rather unclear as to details and timing and had differed from the applicant's own account as to the reasons for the alleged damage to his house and property. Several witnesses had denied that any houses in the area had been destroyed by security forces and village guards. Some witnesses agreed that some houses belonging to the applicant's family had burned down following a subsequent clash in 1993, but none of those witnesses suggested that this had occurred as a result of a deliberate action by security forces or village guards. Furthermore, the applicant failed to appear before the Commission's delegates to give evidence. The Commission felt concern about his explanation, that he feared adverse consequences, but was unable to determine whether or to what extent such fear might have been justified. Whatever reason there may have been for the applicant's absence, the Commission found that his failure to give evidence made it difficult to establish the facts. The evidence gave rise to serious doubts as to whether the applicant had made out a factual basis for his allegation that his house and property had been purposely destroyed by the security forces. In the circumstances of the case, including the absence of an opportunity for the Commission to test directly with him his written statements, the Court was not satisfied that he had an arguable claim that the Convention provisions invoked by him had been violated. Accordingly, no violation of A 13. In the light of that conclusion, it was not necessary to pursue the examination of the Government's preliminary objection concerning the exhaustion of domestic remedies.

Gustafson v Sweden (1998) 25 EHRR 623 97/36

[Application lodged 5.11.1993; Commission report 18.10.1995; Court Judgment 1.7.1997]

Mr Rolf Gustafson had been imprisoned for the commission of serious economic offences and a serious forgery offence. He claimed that on two occasions in 1991 he was the victim of kidnapping and extortion perpetrated by three persons including a Mr L, who had wanted to be paid for the part he played with him in the commission of certain economic crimes. On 25 March 1993, L was charged with kidnapping and aggravated extortion. In the criminal proceedings before the Stockholm District Court, the applicant requested the court to order L to pay him compensation. On 28 April 1993, the Stockholm District Court convicted L, sentenced him to imprisonment and ordered him to pay damages to the applicant. On 2 July 1993, the Svea Court of Appeal reversed the District Court's decision on the ground that the charges against L had not been proven, acquitted L and rejected the applicant's claim for compensation. The applicant did not seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court. On 26 August 1993, the Board rejected the applicant's compensation claim. He complained that he did not have the possibility of having his claim for compensation determined by a court.

The applicability of A 6(1) under its civil head required the existence of a dispute over a right which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. That dispute had to be genuine and serious; it could relate not only to the existence of a right, but also to its scope and to the manner of its exercise. Furthermore, the outcome of the proceedings had to be directly decisive for the right in question. There was a dispute over the applicant's alleged right to compensation under the 1978 Act. His claim to the Board was rejected; his eligibility under the Act was accordingly in dispute. The dispute over his entitlement to compensation was a genuine and serious one. The right asserted by the applicant could be categorised as a 'civil' right within the meaning of A 6(1). The right invoked by the applicant was intended to confer on him a pecuniary benefit in the form of compensation. A 6(1) was therefore applicable in the instant case.

For the purposes of A 6(1), a tribunal need not be a court of law integrated within the standard judicial machinery. It may, like the Board at issue, be set up to deal with a specific subject matter which could be appropriately administered outside the ordinary court system. What was important to ensure compliance with A 6(1) were the guarantees, both substantive and procedural, which were in place. The Board in its composition and operation satisfied the requirements of independence and impartiality and had jurisdiction to examine and decide with binding effect on all questions of fact and law relevant to the applicant's claim for criminal injuries compensation. The applicant did not request an oral hearing before the Board. It could thus reasonably be considered that he waived his right to one. Furthermore, it did not appear that there were any reasons of expediency which would have required the Board itself to convene the applicant since it had before it his complete case file. The reasons given by the Board were sufficient in the circumstances to justify its rejection of the applicant's claim and its subsequent confirmation of that rejection. Although the decisions reached by the Board were final and not subject to appeal either to a higher administrative authority or to a court of law, the Board complied for the purposes at hand with the requirements which A 6(1) prescribed in respect of a tribunal. That in itself was sufficient in the particular circumstances of this case for the Court to conclude that A 6(1) was complied with; A 6(1) did not guarantee a right of appeal. Therefore, the applicant had access to a tribunal for the determination of his civil right to compensation under the legislation. Accordingly there has been no breach of A 6(1).

Gustafsson v Sweden (1996) 22 EHRR 409 96/19

Mr Torgny Gustafsson owned a summer restaurant and youth hostel on the island of Gotland. The restaurant's employees numbered less than 10 and were engaged on a seasonal basis, but had the option of being re-employed the following year. As the applicant was not a member of either of the two associations of restaurant employers, he was not bound by any collective labour agreement, nor was he obliged to subscribe to the various labour-market insurance schemes. He refused to sign an agreement with a union referring to his objections of principle regarding the system of collective bargaining. In July 1987, the union placed his restaurant under a blockade and declared a boycott against it. Sympathy industrial action was taken by other unions resulting in deliveries to the restaurant being stopped. The applicant requested the Government to prohibit the unions from continuing the blockade and sympathy action and to order the unions to pay compensation for damages. In the alternative, he requested that compensation be paid by the State. The Ministry of Justice dismissed the applicant's request. His appeal to the Supreme Administrative Court was dismissed. In September 1989, the Swedish Touring Club terminated the membership of the applicant's youth hostel. The applicant's proceedings in the District Court and appeal to the Svea Court of Appeal were dismissed. He complained that the lack of State protection against the industrial action taken against his restaurant gave rise to a violation of his right to freedom of association as guaranteed by A 11 and also of his right to peaceful enjoyment of possessions. He also complained of ineffective remedies under Swedish law.

Although the extent of the inconvenience or damage caused by the union action to the applicant's business might be open to question, the measures must have entailed considerable pressure on the applicant to meet the union's demand that he be bound by a collective agreement. The enjoyment of his freedom of association was affected. A 11 was therefore applicable in the present case.

The matters complained of by the applicant, although they were made possible by national law, did not involve a direct intervention by the State. The responsibility of Sweden would nevertheless be engaged if those matters resulted from a failure on its part to secure to him under domestic law the rights set forth in A 11. Although the essential object of A 11 was to protect the individual against arbitrary interferences by the public authorities with his or her exercise of the rights protected, there might in addition be positive obligations to secure the effective enjoyment of these rights. A 11 encompassed not only a positive right to form and join an association, but also the negative aspect of that freedom, namely the right not to join or to withdraw from an association. Although compulsion to join a particular trade union may not always be contrary to the Convention, a form of such compulsion which, in the circumstances of the case, struck at the very substance of the freedom of association guaranteed by A 11 would constitute an interference with that freedom. It followed that national authorities might, in certain circumstances, be obliged to intervene in the relationships between private individuals by taking reasonable and appropriate measures to secure the effective enjoyment of the negative right to freedom of association. Although A 11 did not secure any particular treatment of the trade unions, or their members, by the State, the words 'for the protection of their interests' in A 11 showed that the Convention safeguarded freedom to protect the occupational interests of trade union members by trade union action. In that respect, the State had a choice as to the means to be used and the Court had recognised that the concluding of collective agreements may be one of these. In view of the sensitive character of the social and political issues involved in achieving a proper balance between the competing interests and, in particular, in assessing the appropriateness of State intervention to restrict union action aimed at extending a system of collective bargaining, and the wide degree of divergence between the domestic systems in the particular area under consideration, the Contracting States enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation in their choice of the means to be employed. In reality, the applicant's principal objection was his disagreement with the collective-bargaining system in Sweden. However, A 11 did not as such guarantee a right not to enter into a collective agreement. The positive obligation incumbent on the State under A 11, including the aspect of protection of personal opinion, might well extend to treatment connected with the operation of a collective-bargaining system, but only where such treatment impinged on freedom of association. Compulsion which, as here, did not significantly affect the enjoyment of that freedom, even if it caused economic damage, could not give rise to any positive obligation under A 11. The applicant had not substantiated his submission to the effect that the terms of employment which he offered were more favourable than those required under a collective agreement. Bearing in mind the special role and importance of collective agreements in the regulation of labour relations in Sweden, the Court saw no reason to doubt that the union action pursued legitimate interests consistent with A 11. Having regard to the margin of appreciation to be accorded to the respondent State in the area under consideration, Sweden had not failed to secure the applicant's rights under A 11.

The State could be responsible under P1A1 for interferences with peaceful enjoyment of possessions resulting from transactions between private individuals. In the present case, however, not only were the facts complained of not the product of an exercise of governmental authority, but they concerned exclusively relationships of a contractual nature between private individuals, namely the applicant and his suppliers or deliverers. Such repercussions as the stop in deliveries had on the applicant's restaurant were not such as to bring P1A1 into play.

To ascertain the applicability of A 6(1), the Court had to determine whether there was a dispute over a right which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. The dispute had to be genuine and serious: it could relate not only to the actual existence of a right, but also to its scope and the manner of its exercise. Finally, the result of the proceedings had to be directly decisive for the right in question. The applicant's complaint under A 6 was not that he was denied an effective remedy enabling him to submit to a court a claim alleging a failure to comply with domestic law, rather his complaint was essentially directed against the fact that the union action was lawful under Swedish law. However, A 6(1) did not in itself guarantee any particular content for civil rights and obligations in the Contracting States. In the present case, there was no right recognised under Swedish law to attract the application of A 6 (1).

A 13 required that, where an individual had an arguable claim to be the victim of a violation of Convention rights, he or she should have a remedy before a national authority in order both to have the claim decided and, if appropriate, to obtain redress. However, A 13 did not go so far as to guarantee a remedy allowing a Contracting State's laws as such to be challenged before a national authority. The applicant's complaint under the Convention being essentially directed against the fact that the union action was lawful under Swedish law, A 13 was not applicable.

Having regard to its conclusions on the merits, the Court did not consider it necessary to determine the objections made by the Government as to the procedure followed by the Screening Panel in declaring the revision request admissible.

Revision: The Court recalled its case-law and examined whether evidence adduced by applicant in revision proceedings would actually have had a decisive influence on its original judgment. The Court had particular regard to whether its reasoning and conclusions in the original judgment had taken into account certain additional information submitted by the Government in the main case. Although the judgment referred to the additional information in question, that only disposed of a point of procedure in reply to applicant's contention that the Government was estopped from changing the stance they had adopted before the Commission and adducing the evidence before the Court. The Court's decision that it was not prevented from taking information into account if it considered it relevant could not of its own be taken to mean that Court actually did have regard to information. The reasons stated in the ensuing part of original judgment were sufficient to support, and were decisive for, the Court's conclusion that there had been no violation of A 11 of the Convention. There was no mention of the additional evidence and the arguments submitted by Government, nor was there anything to indicate that evidence relied on, nor did other parts of the judgment mention the first set of facts in dispute, only the second set of disputed facts was alluded to, but the reasons in the relevant part of the judgment were merely accessory to those mentioned above and did not suggest that the Court regarded the additional facts submitted by Government as established facts. It followed that the evidence adduced by the applicant would not have had a decisive influence on the Court's finding with respect to A 11, nor would it have had any bearing on its conclusions with regard to his other complaints.

[Application lodged 17.11.1975; Commission report 7.12.1978; Court Judgment 6.11.1980]

Mr Michele Guzzardi was sentenced to imprisonment for criminal offences. On 8 February 1975, he was removed from Milan gaol to the hamlet of Cala Reale on the island of Asinara, which lies off Sardinia. He was subject to special supervision. His appeals were dismissed. He complained of the arbitrary action of the Italian authorities who were compelling him to reside not within a district, but rather on a 'scrap of land' where he was unable to work, keep his family permanently with him, practise the Catholic religion or ensure his son's education; he described his situation as 'the most barbarous imprisonment, the most degrading and pernicious incarceration'.

The Government objected to the Commission having on its own initiative taken into consideration A 5 and 6. However, A 25 required that individual applicants should claim to be the victim 'of a violation of the rights set forth in the Convention'; it did not oblige them to specify which Article, paragraph or sub-paragraph or even which right they were praying in aid. Any greater strictness would lead to unjust consequences; for the vast majority of 'individual' petitions were received from laymen applying to the Commission without the assistance of a lawyer. Seen in an overall context, the applicant's application and material submitted to the Commission and the Court clearly showed that the present case raised an issue under A 5. The plea concerning the ex officio examination of the case was therefore dismissed. The preliminary objection of non-exhaustion based on the claims that the applicant had not invoked A 5 in the domestic proceedings and the transfer request had not been substantiated. Regarding the plea as to the disappearance of the object of the proceedings, the applicant had left for Force on July 1976, before the Commission had drawn up its report, and since November 1977, Asinara had no longer been used as a place for compulsory residence. The Court recalled its previous case-law in which it had dealt with numerous alleged breaches – isolated or continuing – which related entirely to a period prior to the institution of proceedings (the Delcourt, Tyrer, Schiesser, Deweer cases, etc) or had ceased whilst the proceedings were in progress (the Lawless, Wemhoff, Neumeister, Stögmüller, Matznetter, Ringeisen, De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp, Golder, Sunday Times cases, etc); the Court had nonetheless ruled on those alleged breaches. There remained a conflict of opinion between the interested parties which a judgment by the Court would serve the purpose of resolving. In addition, the applicant claimed to be entitled to just satisfaction under A 50 and if the Court found that the Convention's requirements had not been observed, it would have to decide that claim. The 'matter' had therefore received no solution. The Court's judgments also served to elucidate, safeguard and develop the rules instituted by the Convention thereby contributed to the observance of the engagements undertaken by the Contracting States. The present case raised issues of interpretation sufficiently important to call for decision. Therefore, the proceedings had not become devoid of object.

In proclaiming the 'right to liberty', A 5(1) was contemplating the physical liberty of the person; its aim was to ensure that no one should be dispossessed of this liberty in an arbitrary fashion. The paragraph was not concerned with mere restrictions on liberty of movement; such restrictions were governed by P4A2. The difference between deprivation of and restriction upon liberty was nonetheless merely one of degree or intensity, and not one of nature or substance. Whilst the area around which the applicant could move far exceeded the dimensions of a cell and was not bounded by any physical barrier, it covered no more than a tiny fraction of an island to which access was difficult and about nine-tenths of which was occupied by a prison. The applicant was housed in part of the hamlet of Cala Reale with other persons subjected to the same measures and policemen. There were few opportunities for social contacts other than with his near family, his fellow residents and the supervisory staff. Supervision was carried out strictly and on an almost constant basis, including curfew and reporting restrictions. He was liable to punishment by 'arrest' if he failed to comply with any of his obligations. More than 16 months elapsed between his arrival at Cala Reale and his departure for Force. It was not possible to speak of 'deprivation of liberty' on the strength of any one of those factors taken individually, but cumulatively and in combination they raised an issue of categorisation from the viewpoint of A 5. The present case was therefore to be regarded as one involving deprivation of liberty. The order for the applicant's compulsory residence was not a punishment for a specific offence, but a preventive measure taken on the strength of indications of a propensity to crime. The deprivation of liberty complained of was not covered by A 5(1)(b) and the applicant was not in one of the situations dealt with by A 5(1)(c). Sub-paras (d) and (f) of A 5(1) were not relevant. From 8 February 1975 to 22 July 1976 the applicant was the victim of a breach of A 5(1).

Regarding the applicants complaints under A 3, 6, 8 and 9 which had been found by the Commission to be without foundation, the compass of the case was delimited not by the Commission's report, but by the admissibility decision. The Court could take cognisance of all questions of fact or of law arising in the course of the proceedings instituted before it; the only matter falling outside its jurisdiction was the examination of complaints held by the Commission to be inadmissible. The Court had on occasion found violations in circumstances where the report either perceived none or expressed no opinion. In addition, there were many cases in which the Commission concluded that there had been no violation at all referred to the Court (the Lawless, Delcourt, National Union of Belgian Police, Swedish Engine Drivers' Union, Schmidt and Dahlström, Kjeldsen, Busk Madsen and Pedersen, Handyside, Klass and Others and Schiesser cases).

Certain aspects of the situation complained of on Asinara were undoubtedly unpleasant or even irksome; however, having regard to all the circumstances, it did not attain the level of severity above which treatment fell within the scope of A 3.

The proceedings which ended in the Court of Cassation did not involve the determination of a criminal charge. Whether the right to liberty which was at stake was to be qualified as a civil right was a matter of controversy; in any event, the evidence did not reveal any infringement of A 6(1).

The applicant's wife and son lived with him for about 14 of the 16 months he spent at Cala Reale. The reason why they had to leave the island was that he had not applied for renewal of their residence permits. The reasons given by the applicant to explain his failure to apply disclosed nothing contrary to A 8 which could be attributed to the Italian State and, in the circumstances, the necessity for such permits proved to be compatible with that provision.

The applicant did not claim either that he had requested that services be held in the chapel at Cala Reale or that he had sought authorisation to go to the church at Cala d'Oliva, accordingly, his complaint under A 9 did not bear examination.

Damages (by majority (12–6) ITL 1,000,000).

H v Belgium (1988) 10 EHRR 339 87/25

[Application lodged 20.3.1980; Commission report 8.10.1985; Court Judgment 30.11.1987]

The applicant, who had a doctorate in law, completed his prescribed period as a pupil avocat in Antwerp in 1957, was entered on the roll and took chambers. In May 1963, the Council of the Ordre des avocats of Antwerp commenced disciplinary action against him for having deliberately given false information to clients. He was struck off the roll on 10 June 1963. The Brussels Court of Appeal affirmed the decision to strike him off and his further appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed. He was subsequently prosecuted for fraud and unlawfully holding himself out as an avocat, but was acquitted by the Antwerp Criminal Court on 19 January 1968 and made an unsuccessful claim for compensation. A further prosecution in 1978 for forgery and fraudulent conversion ended in an acquittal on 18 October 1979. He had no criminal convictions. On 3 December 1979, he requested the Council of the Ordre des avocats of Antwerp to restore his name to the roll. The Council dismissed his application, finding that there were no exceptional circumstances to justify restoring his name to the roll. On 9 February 1981, the applicant renewed his application. The Council again dismissed the application, holding that the applicant had not established that there were exceptional circumstances. The decision was served on the applicant on 16 June 1981. The applicant complained that the procedure followed by the Council of the Ordre des avocats of Antwerp when considering his applications for restoration to the roll had infringed A 6.

Comm found by majority (10–2) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (12–6) 6 applicable, (12–6) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal (c), President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (c), Mr G Lagergren (jc), Mr F Gölcüklü (jd), Mr F Matscher (declaration, jd), Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (d), Mr L-E Pettiti (jc), Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans (jd), Mr R Macdonald (jc), Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt (jd/so), Mr J Gersing (jd/so), Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (so), Mr JA Carrillo Salcedo, Mr N Valticos.

Regarding the applicability of A 6, the Court noted its previous case-law. In seeking to be restored to the roll, the applicant raised a matter relating to the determination of a right, restoration to the roll being a prerequisite of resuming practice as an avocat. A 6(1) extended only to disputes over civil 'rights and obligations' which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law; it did not in itself guarantee any particular content for civil rights and obligations in the substantive law of the Contracting States. The profession of avocat had traditionally been treated as one of the independent professions in Belgium. The chambers and clientèle of an avocat constituted property interests and came within the ambit of the right of property, which was a civil right within the meaning of A 6(1). While avocats enjoyed an exclusive right of audience in the courts, they performed numerous important duties out of court, acting as advisers, conciliators and even arbitrators: the work of members of the Bar could not be said to consist solely in contributing to the functioning of the country's courts. After examining the various aspects of the profession of avocat in Belgium, the Court found that they conferred the character of a civil right within the meaning of A 6(1) which was therefore applicable.

According to the Court's case-law, a 'tribunal' was characterised by its judicial function, that is to say determining matters within its competence on the basis of rules of law and after proceedings conducted in a prescribed manner. The Council of the Ordre des avocats performed many functions – administrative, regulatory, adjudicative, advisory and disciplinary functions, but the plurality of powers did not in itself preclude an institution from being a 'tribunal' in respect of some of them. There was no question of the independence of the members of the Council of the Ordre des avocats. They are elected by their peers and were not subject to any authority, being answerable only to their own consciences. There was no evidence to doubt their personal impartiality. Regarding the fairness of the proceedings, the applicant was able to have the assistance of a lawyer to represent him and was able to appear in person. However, it was very difficult for him to adduce appropriate evidence of the 'exceptional circumstances' which might, in law, have brought about his restoration to the roll and, more generally, to argue his case with the requisite effectiveness as neither the applicable provisions nor the previous decisions of the councils of the Ordre gave any indication of what could amount to 'exceptional circumstances'. He had cause to fear a risk of arbitrariness, especially as there was no provision allowing him a right of challenge and as the Antwerp Bar did not have any internal rules of procedure. His applications were not heard in public, nor were the decisions of the Council of the Ordre pronounced in public. Unless cured at a later stage of the procedure, such a defect could deprive the person concerned of one of the safeguards set forth in the first sentence of A 6(1). There was no evidence to indicate that the circumstances warranted hearings not being held in public. There was no evidence he intended to waive his right to a public hearing. The fact that he wished to remain anonymous in the proceedings before the Convention institutions, was not decisive in that context, as those proceedings were quite different both in their purpose and in their nature and scope. Accordingly, the Council of the Ordre did not in the present case satisfy the requirements of A 6(1), and there was therefore a breach of that provision.

[Application lodged 21.6.1982; Commission report 4.3.1988; Court Judgment 24.10.1989]

Mr H was a primary school supply teacher. He attended the Strasbourg Hospital in May 1961 with a letter of introduction from his general practitioner. The applicant was given an intravenous injection which caused 'amphetamine shock'. On 14 June 1974, he took out a writ against the hospital, returnable at the Strasbourg Administrative Court, with a view to having the hospital declared liable for the harmful consequences of the intravenous amphetamine injection. The Administrative Court dismissed the action on 9 May 1978. He appealed to the Conseil d'Etat, which dismissed his appeal on 18 November 1981, judgment being served on 19 January 1982. The applicant complained that the administrative courts had not heard his case within a reasonable time and, by failing to order an expert opinion and a proper investigation, had not given him a fair trial.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) regarding length of proceedings, by majority (9–2) NV 6 in respect of failure to order an expert opinion.

Court found unanimously V 6(1) regarding length of proceedings, by majority (5–2) no other violation of 6(1) regarding fairness of the proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Macdonald (pd), Mr JA Carrillo Salcedo (pd), Mr N Valticos.

The concept of 'civil rights and obligations' was not to be interpreted solely by reference to the respondent State's domestic law. A 6(1) applied irrespective of the parties' status, whether public or private, and of the nature of the legislation which governed the manner in which the dispute was to be determined; it was sufficient that the outcome of the proceedings should be decisive for private rights and obligations. The Court considered the period to be reviewed from 14 June 1974 to 19 January 1982, a period of just over seven years, seven months. The reasonableness of the length of the proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard, inter alia, to the complexity of the case, the behaviour of the applicant and the conduct of the relevant authorities. The case was not complex. In civil proceedings, the parties had to show 'due diligence' and only delays attributable to the State could justify a finding of a failure to comply with the reasonable time requirement. The proceedings before the administrative court took four years, although some of the delay was due to the inactivity of the applicant's lawyer. There was a further two years' delay before a hearing took place. There was no evidence provided that the backlog of cases before the administrative court was temporary and that remedial action had been taken. Accordingly, the length of proceedings was excessive in this case. However the proceedings before the supreme court, the Conseil d'Etat, which took three years, had not been excessive. The Court was not unaware of the difficulties which sometimes delayed hearings in national courts, but in providing that cases should be heard 'within a reasonable time', the Convention underlined the importance of rendering justice without delays which might jeopardise its effectiveness and credibility. A reasonable time was exceeded by the Strasbourg Administrative Court, and there had therefore been a breach of A 6(1).

The Court had to ascertain whether the proceedings as a whole were fair. Although the Conseil d'Etat did not order an expert's report, it had sufficient other evidence in the form of pleadings and documents before it to enable it to give judgment. The refusal to order an expert's report did not, therefore, infringe the applicant's right to a fair trial.

[Application lodged 3.9.1981; Commission report 18.10.1985; Court Judgment 8.7.1987 (merits), 9.6.1988 (A50)]

The applicant had spent several periods in mental hospitals after drug overdoses and bouts of violence. In March 1973, whilst in hospital, she married X, a compulsorily detained patient. On 23 December 1975, she gave birth to A. X was violent towards the applicant. The local County Council applied to a juvenile court for a place of safety order in respect of A and the child subsequently became a ward of court. There was some access between the applicant and A. Eventually the Council placed A for adoption. In 1977, the applicant married H and thereafter, her mental and physical position stabilised. She sought to re-establish contact between herself and A, who had remained in a residential nursery. The Council refused her access and she therefore instituted proceedings on 13 November 1978. On 22 October 1980, a High Court judge made an adoption order in respect of A, dispensed with the applicant's consent to the adoption and refused her access to A. An appeal by the applicant from this decision was dismissed on 14 January 1981 by the Court of Appeal, which also refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords. The applicant sought leave from the Appeal Committee to appeal to the House of Lords, but that was refused on 10 June 1981. The applicant complained to the Local Ombudsman who, in his report of 18 August 1983, concluded that the applicant's complaints revealed no maladministration except in respect of the Council's delay in filing evidence. The applicant complained, inter alia, that she was denied a hearing within a reasonable time of her application of 13 November 1978 for access to A.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (12–2 with one abstention) V 8.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), by majority (16–1) V 8.

Judges (merits and just satisfaction (unanimous)): Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (so), Mr N Valticos.

The judgment was not concerned with the merits of the judicial and local authority decisions regarding the applicant's child. Although that was raised by the applicant before the Commission, it was declared inadmissible. The Commission's admissibility decision delimited the compass of the case before the Court which was not therefore, in the circumstances, competent to examine or comment on the justification for such matters as the taking into public care or the adoption of the child or the restriction or termination of the applicant's access to her.

The proceedings related to the applicant's access to A and to A's adoption. Their outcome was thus decisive for the future relations between mother and child, in that they could, and did, lead to the total dissolution of their natural ties. Since those ties constituted the very substance of family life, there was no doubt that the proceedings involved the determination of a 'civil right' of the applicant. A 6(1) was therefore applicable.

The period to be taken into consideration started on 13 November 1978, when the applicant instituted the proceedings, and ended on 10 June 1981, when the Appeal Committee refused leave to appeal to the House of Lords – a period of two years and seven months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed according to the particular circumstances and having regard to the complexity of the case, the conduct of the parties and to what was at stake in the litigation for the applicant. In addition, only delays attributable to the State could justify a finding of a failure to comply with the 'reasonable time' requirement. The proceedings were somewhat complex. In the present case where what was at stake for the applicant was not only decisive for her future relations with her own child, but had a particular quality of irreversibility, the authorities were under a duty to exercise exceptional diligence since there was always the danger that any procedural delay would result in the de facto determination of the issue submitted to the court before it had held its hearing. Having weighed together all the relevant factors, the Court concluded that the proceedings complained of were not concluded within a reasonable time. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

The proceedings which were the subject of the applicant's complaint related to adoption as well as access. The proceedings, in addition to their particular quality of irreversibility, lay within an area in which procedural delay might lead to a de facto determination of the matter at issue. That was so in the present case. The duration of the proceedings was a factor that could therefore properly be taken into account under A 8. The proceedings related to a fundamental element of family life, concerning the applicant's future relations with her child. Irrespective of their final outcome, an effective respect for the applicant's family life required that that question be determined solely in the light of all relevant considerations and not by the mere effluxion of time. Since it was not, there had been a violation of A 8.

Non-pecuniary damage (GBP 12,000). Claim for costs and expenses struck out of list following friendly settlement between Government and applicant (GBP 5,229.05, less amounts received from Council of Europe for legal aid).

HLR v France (1998) 26 EHRR 29 97/23

[Application lodged 4.7.1994; Commission report 7.12.1995; Court Judgment 29.4.1997]

HLR was a Colombian national. On 14 May 1989, as he was travelling from Colombia to Italy, he was arrested while in transit at Roissy Airport in possession of 580 grams of cocaine. He gave information to the police on the instigators of the traffic and on the person who had recruited him. That information subsequently enabled Interpol to find the recruiter and, following his conviction, deport him to Colombia. In the meantime, the applicant was convicted of drugs offences and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. The court also made an order permanently excluding him from French territory. The Paris Court of Appeal upheld the judgment. The applicant's petition to the President of the Republic to have the exclusion order rescinded was dismissed. The order for the applicant's deportation was made on 26 April 1994 on the ground that his presence on French territory represented a serious threat to public order. The applicant complained that if he were deported to Colombia he would run a serious risk of being treated in a manner contrary to A 3.

Comm found by majority (19–10) V 3 if the applicant deported to Colombia.

Court found by majority (15–6) NV 3 if the order for deportation executed.

Contracting States had the right to control the entry, residence and expulsion of aliens. However, the expulsion of aliens by a Contracting State could give rise to issues under A 3 and thus engage the responsibility of that State under the Convention, where substantial grounds had been shown for believing that the person in question, if deported, would face a real risk of being subjected to treatment contrary to A 3 in the receiving country. In those circumstances, A 3 implied the obligation not to deport the person in question to that country. A 3, which enshrined one of the fundamental values of democratic societies, prohibited in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, irrespective of the victim's conduct. Under the Convention system, the establishment of the facts was primarily a matter for the Commission and it was only in exceptional circumstances that the Court would use its powers in that area. However, the Court was not bound by the findings in the Commission's report and remained free to verify and to assess the facts itself. As the risk was assessed as at the date the Court considered the case, it was necessary to take into account information that had come to light since the case was examined by the Commission. The source of the risk on which the applicant relied was not the public authorities. According to the applicant, it consisted in the threat of reprisals by drug traffickers, who might seek revenge because of statements he made to the French police, coupled with the fact that the Colombian State was, he claimed, incapable of protecting him from attacks by such persons. As well as applying to State authorities, A 3 could also apply where the danger emanated from persons or groups of persons who were not public officials. However, it had to be shown that the risk was real and that the authorities of the receiving State were not able to obviate the risk by providing appropriate protection. The general situation of violence existing in the country of destination would not in itself entail, in the event of deportation, a violation of A 3. The documents submitted by the applicant showed the tense atmosphere in Colombia; although drug traffickers sometimes took revenge on informers, there was no relevant evidence to show in the applicant's case that the alleged risk was real. His aunt's letters could not, by themselves, show that the threat was real. Moreover, there were no documents to support the claim that the applicant's personal situation would be worse than that of other Colombians, were he to be deported. The Amnesty International report was of limited assistance in the present case. The Court was aware of the difficulties the Colombian authorities faced in containing violence. The applicant had not shown that they were incapable of affording him appropriate protection. No substantial grounds had been established for believing that the applicant, if deported, would be exposed to a real risk of being subjected to inhuman or degrading treatment within the meaning of A 3. There would therefore be no violation of A 3 if the order for the applicant's deportation were to be executed.

Hadjianastassiou v Greece (1993) 16 EHRR 219 92/77

[Application lodged 17.12.1986; Commission report 6.6.1991; Court Judgment 16.12.1992]

Mr Hadjianastassiou was an aeronautical engineer and at the material time a captain in the air force. On 4 July 1984, the Permanent Air Force Court of Athens charged him with disclosing military secrets. He was found guilty of having transmitted to a private company information and technical and theoretical data from an Air Force Technological Research Centre report. He was sentenced to two years, six months' imprisonment. He appealed. The Courts-Martial Appeal Court deliberated in private and considered questions formulated by its President who read out the judgment without referring to the questions put to the members of the court. The applicant was sentenced for disclosure of military secrets of minor importance. The applicant asked, on 23 November 1985, to see the record of the hearing but was told that he would have to wait for the 'finalised version' of the judgment. On 26 November 1985, within the five days prescribed in the Military Criminal Code, he appealed to the Court of Cassation. He received a full, detailed copy of the appeal document containing the President's questions on 10 January 1986. On 18 June 1986, the Court of Cassation declared the appeal inadmissible. The applicant complained that the lack of reasons in the judgment of the Courts-Martial Appeal Court and the shortness of the time-limit for appealing had prevented him from further substantiating his appeal to the Court of Cassation. He also maintained in addition that his conviction for the disclosure of military secrets of secondary importance had infringed his right to freedom of expression guaranteed under A 10.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(b), NV 10.

Court found unanimously V 6(1)+6(3)(b), NV 10.

The Contracting States enjoyed considerable freedom in the choice of the appropriate means to ensure that their judicial systems complied with the requirements of A 6. The national courts had, however, to indicate with sufficient clarity the grounds on which they based their decision. It was that, inter alia, which made it possible for the accused to exercise usefully the rights of appeal available to him. In his appeal on points of law, filed within the five day time limit laid down in the Military Criminal Code, the applicant could only rely on what he had been able to hear or gather during the hearing and could do no more than refer generally the legislation. When the applicant received the record of the hearing, on 10 January 1986, he was barred from expanding upon his appeal on points of law. The rights of the defence were subject to such restrictions that the applicant did not have the benefit of a fair trial. There had therefore been a violation A 6(1)+6(3)(b).

Freedom of expression guaranteed by A 10 applied to servicemen just as it did to other persons within the jurisdiction of the Contracting States. Moreover, information of the type in question did not fall outside the scope of A 10, which was not restricted to certain categories of information, ideas or forms of expression. Accordingly, the sentence imposed by the Permanent Air Force Court, later reduced by the Courts-Martial Appeal Court, constituted an interference with the exercise of the applicant's right to the freedom of expression. Such interference infringed A 10 unless it was prescribed by law, pursued one or more of the legitimate aims set out in A 10(2), and was necessary in a democratic society in order to attain the aforesaid aims. The interference was prescribed by law, the sentence was intended to punish the disclosure of information on an arms project classified as secret, and therefore to protect national security, a legitimate aim for the purposes of A 10(2). The disclosure of the State's interest in a given weapon and that of the corresponding technical knowledge, which may give some indication of the state of progress in its manufacture, were capable of causing considerable damage to national security. Account had to be taken of the special conditions attaching to military life and the specific duties and responsibilities incumbent on the members of the armed forces. The applicant, as the officer in charge of an experimental missile programme, was bound by an obligation of discretion in relation to anything concerning the performance of his duties. In the light of those considerations, the Greek military courts could not be said to have overstepped the limits of the margin of appreciation which was to be left to the domestic authorities in matters of national security. Nor did the evidence disclose the lack of a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the legitimate aim pursued. There had therefore been no violation of A 10 established.

Håkansson and Sturesson v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 1 90/2

[Application lodged 3.4.1984; Commission report 13.10.1988; Court Judgment 21.2.1990]

The applicants, Mr Gösta Håkansson, a police officer, and Mr Sune Sturesson, a farmer, bought an agricultural estate at a compulsory sale by auction in December 1979. The property had been seized to secure payment of the previous owners' debts to banks. Under the Land Acquisition Act 1979, such purchasers had to resell the property within two years unless they obtained a requisite permit. The applicants' request for a permit was refused on the ground that the estate was a 'rationalisation unit'. Their appeal to the government was dismissed. The land was subsequently sold in June 1985 at auction to the County Agricultural Board who were the only bidders, at a price lower than that paid by the applicants. The applicants appeal to the Court of Appeal for the compulsory sale to be annulled was dismissed without a public hearing. They complained of infringements of their rights under A 6 and P1A1.

Commission found by majority (10–2) NV P1A1, unanimously NV P1A1+14, unanimously V 6(1) regarding absence of procedure, by majority (7–5) V 6(1) regarding absence of public hearing, unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Court unanimously found NV P1A1, NV P1A1+14, unanimously V 6(1) regarding absence of remedy to challenge decision refusing permit, by majority (6–1) NV 6(1) regarding absence of public hearing, unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (pd), Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mrs E Palm.

The impugned measures constituted an interference with the applicants' rights to peaceful enjoyment and deprivation of property. The aim of the interference, to promote rationalisation of agriculture, was one of legitimate public interest. The Court's role was not to review the 1979 Land Acquisition Act, but to determine whether the manner of its application or its effect on applicants gave rise to any violations. The Court's power to review compliance with domestic law was limited. The impugned measures were in accordance with Swedish law (the 1979 Act). There had to be proportionality between the means employed and the aims sought to be realised. Proportionality would not be found if a person had to bear an individual and excessive burden. Prospective buyers were aware of the resale conditions in the 1979 Act and no binding declaration regarding the likelihood of obtaining the permit could be obtained before the auction. The lesser sum received by the applicants for the property was assessed by specially appointed valuers whose decision had been in accordance with the Act. Having regard to the margin of appreciation enjoyed by the State, the price received by the applicants could be considered to be reasonably related to the value of the estate. In view of the risks deliberately taken by the applicants, they had not been made to carry an individual and excessive burden. There was no supporting evidence of discrimination.

Civil rights and obligations were at stake in the dispute concerning the permit. In addition, the applicants had not waived their right to a court. The dispute concerning the permit could only be determined by the government whose decision were not open to review on lawfulness by any court or tribunal, therefore V 6(1) on this point. The Court of Appeal were the first and only tribunal to deal with all aspects of the applicants' complaints and so the applicants were entitled to a public hearing before that court in the absence of any of the exceptions in A 6(1). The public character of court hearings was a fundamental principle and any waiver by an applicant had to be unequivocal and not against any important public interest. There had been no express waiver in the present case, but as such proceedings in Sweden usually took place without a public hearing and the applicants had not asked for one, they could be considered to have unequivocally waived their right to a public hearing. They had only raised the complaint of absence of public hearing before the Convention organs and in addition no questions of public interest were involved in the case to make a public hearing necessary.

Not necessary to examine A 13, as its requirements were less strict and absorbed by A 6 in this case.

Costs and expenses (SEK 60,000). No award for damages (no causal link between the violation of A 6(1) and any of the alleged prejudice. The refusal to grant the necessary permit to retain the property may have caused the applicants some economic loss, but the Court could not speculate as to what result they would have achieved had they been able to bring their complaints before a court).

Halford v United Kingdom (1997) 24 EHRR 523 97/31

[Application lodged 22.4.1992; Commission report 18.4.1996; Court Judgment 25.6.1997]

Ms Alison Halford, the applicant, was appointed to the rank of Assistant Chief Constable with the Merseyside police in May 1983 and became the most senior-ranking female police officer in the UK. On eight occasions during the following seven years, she applied unsuccessfully to be appointed to the rank of Deputy Chief Constable. In 1990, she commenced proceedings in the Industrial Tribunal against, inter alia, the Chief Constable of Merseyside and the Home Secretary, claiming that she had been discriminated against on grounds of sex. The applicant alleged that certain members of the Merseyside Police Authority launched a 'campaign' against her in response to her complaint to the Industrial Tribunal. This took the form, inter alia, of leaks to the press, interception of her telephone calls and the decision to bring disciplinary proceedings against her. She complained that the interception of calls made from her office and home telephones amounted to unjustifiable interferences with her rights to respect for her private life and freedom of expression, that she had no effective domestic remedy in relation to the interceptions and that she was discriminated against on grounds of sex.

Comm found by majority (26–1) V 8, 13 in relation to office telephones, unanimously, NV 8, 10 or 13 in relation to home telephone, not necessary to consider the complaint under 10 in relation to office telephones, and no violation of 14+8 or 14+10.

Court found unanimously V 8 in relation to calls made on the applicant's office telephones, NV 8 in relation to calls made on the applicant's home telephone, V 13 in relation to the applicant's complaint concerning her office telephones, by majority (8–1) NV 13 in relation to the applicant's complaint concerning her home telephone, unanimously that it is not necessary to consider 10, 14.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo (d), Mr A Spielmann, Mr I Foighel, Mr J M Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr P Kûris.

Telephone calls made from business premises as well as from the home could be covered by the notions of 'private life' and 'correspondence' under A 8(1). There was no evidence of any warning having been given to the applicant that calls made on the internal telecommunications system would be liable to interception. She would have had a reasonable expectation of privacy for such calls. In addition, as Assistant Chief Constable, she had sole use of her office where one of her two telephones was specifically designated for her private use. She had also been given the assurance, in response to a memorandum, that she could use her office telephones for the purposes of her sex-discrimination case. Her conversations on her office telephones therefore fell within the scope of the notions of 'private life' and 'correspondence' and A 8 was therefore applicable to that part of the complaint. The calls made by the applicant from her office were intercepted by the Merseyside police with the primary aim of gathering material to assist in the defence of the sex-discrimination proceedings brought against them. That interception constituted an 'interference by a public authority', within the meaning of A 8(2). In the context of secret measures of surveillance or interception of communications by public authorities, because of the lack of public scrutiny and the risk of misuse of power, the domestic law had to provide some protection to the individual against arbitrary interference with A 8 rights. The domestic law had to be sufficiently clear in its terms to give citizens an adequate indication as to the circumstances and conditions on which public authorities were empowered to resort to any such secret measures. Domestic law did not provide any regulation of interceptions of calls made on telecommunications systems outside the public network. Therefore, the interference was not in accordance with the law for the purposes of A 8(2) as the domestic law did not provide adequate protection to the applicant against interferences by the police with her right to respect for her private life and correspondence. There had therefore been a violation of A 8 in relation to the interception of calls made on the applicant's office telephones. The telephone conversations made from the home were covered by the notions of 'private life' and 'correspondence' under A 8. The applicant complained that measures of surveillance were actually applied to her. The Commission was the organ primarily charged with the establishment and verification of the facts and had considered that the evidence presented to it did not indicate a reasonable likelihood that calls made on the applicant's home telephone were being intercepted. Before the Court, the applicant provided further evidence which the Court did not accept. Having considered all the evidence, the Court did not find it established that there was an interference with the applicant's rights to respect for her private life and correspondence in relation to her home telephone and therefore no violation of A 8 in that regard.

The effect of A 13 was to require the provision of a remedy at national level allowing the competent domestic authority both to deal with the substance of the relevant Convention complaint and to grant appropriate relief, although Contracting States were afforded some discretion as to the manner in which they conformed to their obligations under the provision. However, such a remedy was only required in respect of grievances which could be regarded as 'arguable' in terms of the Convention. The applicant had an 'arguable' claim that calls made from her office telephones were intercepted and that that amounted to a violation of A 8. She was, therefore, entitled to an effective domestic remedy within the meaning of A 13. There was no provision in domestic law to regulate interceptions of telephone calls made on internal communications systems operated by public authorities. The applicant was therefore unable to seek relief at national level in relation to her complaint concerning her office telephones. There had therefore been a violation of A 13 in relation to the applicant's office telephones. In order to find an 'interference' under A 8 in relation to the home telephone, there had to be a reasonable likelihood of some measure of surveillance having been applied to the applicant. The Court had found that the evidence submitted was not sufficient to found an 'arguable' claim within the meaning of A 13 and therefore there had been no violation of A 13 in relation to the home telephone.

The allegations in relation to A 10 and 14 were tantamount to restatements of the complaints under A 8 and therefore it was not necessary to examine them separately.

Hamer v France (1997) 23 EHRR 1 96/29

[Application lodged 10.3.1992; Commission report 21.2.1995; Court Judgment 7.8.1996]

In the night of 17 to 18 August 1978, Prince Victor-Emmanuel of Savoy, returning from a restaurant, noticed his rubber dinghy moored unusually. He shot at a person he confronted, but one of the bullets fatally wounded a 19 year old German youth, Mr Dirk Hamer, who had been asleep on the deck of another boat. Prince Victor-Emmanuel was charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm and possessing and carrying a category 1 weapon. He admitted civil liability for the accident in which Mr Hamer had been injured and on 5 September 1978 paid FF 500,000 to the victim's family. On 26 November 1979 Ms Birgit Hamer, the sister of the deceased and other family members joined the proceedings as civil parties by applying to the investigating judge. On 18 November 1991, the Paris Assize Court sentenced Prince Victor-Emmanuel to six months' imprisonment, suspended, for unauthorised possession and carrying of a rifle and acquitted him of fatal wounding and unintentional homicide. No hearing was held on the civil issues. The applicant complained that her case had not been heard within a reasonable time as required by A 6(1).

Comm found by majority (13–10) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (6–3) 6 not applicable to the proceedings and was accordingly not breached.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann (jd), Mr N Valticos, Mr S K Martens (d), Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr B Repik (jd).

The Court recalled its case-law, noting that it had to be ascertained whether there was a dispute over a 'civil right' which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. The dispute had to be genuine and serious; it could relate not only to the existence of a right but also to its scope and the manner of its exercise; and finally, the outcome of the proceedings had to be directly decisive for the right in question. At no stage in the proceedings did the applicant, who had joined by lodging a civil party application with the investigating judge on 26 November 1979, claim damages or make known any intention of so doing. Nor did she ever object to the settlement reached between her family and Prince Victor-Emmanuel, who had acknowledged his civil liability and paid them compensation on 5 September 1978. Nor did she express any reservations on that subject. The applicant could have claimed damages at various stages in the proceedings or lodged her claim for damages with the civil courts at a later date. The present case had to be distinguished from other similar cases the Court had had to deal with in which the outcome of the proceedings was decisive for the 'civil right' in question. Other cases had ended with judgments in which it was held that there was no case to answer, whereas in the present case the accused was committed for trial. In the present case, the outcome of the proceedings was not decisive, for the purposes of A 6(1), for the establishment of the applicant's right to compensation. As the applicant never asserted that right, there was no dispute over a 'civil right'. Accordingly, A 6(1) was not applicable.

Handyside v United Kingdom (1979–80) 1 EHRR 737 76/5

[Application lodged 13.4.1972; Commission report 30.9.1975; Court Judgment 7.12.1976]

Mr Richard Handyside, the proprietor of a publishing firm, published The Little Red Schoolbook, written by Søren Hansen and Jesper Jensen, two Danish authors. The book, priced at thirty pence, claimed to be a reference book and contained chapters on education, learning, teachers, pupils and The System including sections on, inter alia, masturbation, orgasm, intercourse and petting, contraceptives, wet dreams, menstruation, child-molesters or 'dirty old men', pornography, impotence, homosexuality, venereal diseases and abortion. The British rights had been purchased by the applicant in September 1970. The book had first been published in Denmark in 1969 and subsequently, after translation and with certain adaptations, in other European and non-European countries. After receipt of a number of complaints, the applicant's premises were searched and copies of the book with other advertising material, correspondence and the matrix with which the book was printed were seized. The applicant was summonsed under the Obscene Publications Act 1964. Following trial he was found guilty fined GBP 25 on each of two summonses and ordered to pay GBP 110 costs. The court also made a forfeiture order for the destruction of the books by the police. His appeal to the Inner London Quarter Sessions was dismissed on 29 October 1971. The applicant was ordered to pay further costs and the material seized was then destroyed. The applicant did not appeal. The Schoolbook was not the subject of proceedings in Northern Ireland, the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man. In Scotland, a Glasgow bookseller charged under a local Act was acquitted by a stipendiary magistrate who considered that the book was not indecent or obscene within the meaning of that Act. The applicant complained, inter alia, that the action against him was in breach of his right to freedom of expression, and his right to the peaceful enjoyment of possessions, and discriminatory.

Comm found by majority (8–5 with one abstention) NV 10, NV P1A1 (11) with regard to the provisional seizure, (9–4 with one abstention) with regard to the forfeiture and destruction of The Schoolbook, (12 with two abstentions) further discussion under 17 unnecessary, unanimously NV 18.

The applicant's criminal conviction, the seizure and subsequent forfeiture and destruction of the matrix and of hundreds of copies of the Schoolbook were 'interferences by public authority' in the exercise of his freedom of expression guaranteed by A 10(1). Such interferences entailed a 'violation' of A 10 if they did not fall within one of the exceptions provided for in A 10(2). The restrictions and penalties complained of by the applicant were prescribed by law, the 1959 and 1964 Obscene Publications Acts. They had a legitimate aim under A 10(2), namely, the protection of morals in a democratic society. The machinery of protection established by the Convention was subsidiary to the national systems safeguarding human rights. The Convention left to each Contracting State, in the first place, the task of securing the rights and liberties it enshrined. By reason of their direct and continuous contact with the vital forces of their countries, State authorities were in principle in a better position than the international judge to give an opinion on the exact content of those requirements as well as on the necessity of a restriction or penalty intended to meet them. A 10(2) left to the Contracting States a margin of appreciation. That margin was given both to the domestic legislator and to the bodies, judicial amongst others, that were called upon to interpret and apply the laws in force. Nevertheless, A 10(2) did not give the Contracting States an unlimited power of appreciation. The domestic margin of appreciation went hand in hand with a European supervision. The Court noted the intended readership of the Schoolbook (12–18 years) and concluded that the English judges were entitled, in the exercise of their discretion, to think at the relevant time that the Schoolbook would have pernicious effects on the morals of many of the children and adolescents who would read it. The fundamental aim of the judgment of 29 October 1971 was the protection of the morals of the young, a legitimate purpose under A 10(2), consequently, the seizures effected pending the outcome of the proceedings that were about to open, also had that aim. The lack of proceedings in other parts of the UK and the circulation of copies without impediment did not prove that the judgment of 29 October 1971 was not a response to a real necessity, bearing in mind the national authorities' margin of appreciation. The absence of proceedings against the revised edition suggested that the authorities wished to limit themselves to what was strictly necessary, an attitude in conformity with A 10. Regarding hard core pornography openly on sale and rarely prosecuted, it was not the Court's function to compare different decisions taken, even in apparently similar circumstances, by prosecuting authorities and courts. In addition, the situations were not analogous. With regard to the circulation of the book in other Member States, the Court noted the national margin of appreciation in each State. The State had not been shown to have violated the principle of proportionality in its measures. On the evidence before it, no breach of A 10 had been established in the circumstances of the present case.

The seizure of the matrix and of hundreds of copies of the Schoolbook and their forfeiture and subsequent destruction were both measures which interfered with the applicant's right to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. The seizure complained of was provisional. It did no more than prevent the applicant, for a period, from enjoying and using as he pleased possessions of which he remained the owner and which he would have recovered had the proceedings against him resulted in an acquittal. The second sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1 did not therefore come into play in the case. The structure of P1A1 showed that that sentence applied only to someone who was 'deprived of ownership'. However, the seizure related to 'the use of property' and thus fell within the second paragraph, which paragraph set the Contracting States up as sole judges of the necessity for an interference. Consequently, the Court had to restrict itself to supervising the lawfulness and the purpose of the restriction in question. The measure was in accordance with the law and had the aim of the protection of morals. The forfeiture and destruction of the Schoolbook permanently deprived the applicant of the ownership of certain possessions. However, those measures were authorised by the second paragraph P1A1, interpreted in the light of the principle of law, common to the Contracting States, under which items whose use had been lawfully adjudged illicit and dangerous to the general interest were forfeited with a view to destruction.

The complaint under A 18 did not support examination, since the Court had already concluded that the restrictions concerned aims that were legitimate under A 10 and P1A1).

The evidence before the Court did not show that the applicant suffered discrimination in the enjoyment of his freedom of expression (14+10) and his property rights (14+P1A1).

Hashman and Harrup v United Kingdom 99/90

[Application lodged 19.8.1994; Commission report 6.7.1998; Court Judgment 25.11.1999]

On 3 March 1993, Mr Joseph Hashman and Ms Wanda Harrup, the applicants, blew a hunting horn and engaged in hallooing with the intention of disrupting the activities of the Portman Hunt. A complaint was made to the Gillingham magistrates that the applicants should be required to enter into a recognizance with or without sureties to keep the peace and be of good behaviour pursuant to the Justices of the Peace Act 1361. They were bound over to keep the peace and be of good behaviour in the sum of GBP 100 for 12 months on 7 September 1993. They appealed to the Crown Court, which found that the applicants had not committed any breach of the peace, and that their conduct had not been likely to occasion a breach of the peace but had been contra bonos mores. They complained that the finding infringed, inter alia, their rights under A 10.

Comm found by majority (25–4) V 10.

Court found unanimously not necessary to examine A 11, by majority (16–1) V 10.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr G Bonello, Mr P Kûris, Mr R Türmen, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr P Lorenzen, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall, Mr AB Baka (d), Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova, Lord Reed, ad hoc judge.

The complaint under A 11, raised before the Commission, was not pursued before the Court, which saw no reason to consider it of its own motion.

The protest of the applicants, which took the form of impeding the activities of which they disapproved, constituted an expression of opinion within the meaning of A 10. The measures taken against the applicants were, therefore, an interference with their right to freedom of expression. One of the requirements flowing from the expression 'prescribed by law' was forseeability. A norm could not be regarded as a 'law' unless it was formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct. At the same time, whilst certainty in the law was highly desirable, it may bring in its train excessive rigidity and the law had to be able to keep pace with changing circumstances. The level of precision required of domestic legislation, which could not in any case provide for every eventuality, depended to a considerable degree on the content of the instrument in question, the field it was designed to cover and the number and status of those to whom it was addressed. The present case concerned an interference with freedom of expression which was not expressed to be a 'sanction', or punishment, for behaviour of a certain type, but rather an order, imposed on the applicants, not to breach the peace or behave contra bonos mores in the future. The binding-over order in the present case had purely prospective effect. It did not require a finding that there had been a breach of the peace. The Court recalled its previous case-law, noting that the expression 'to be of good behaviour' 'was particularly imprecise and offered little guidance to the person bound over as to the type of conduct which would amount to a breach of the order'. Conduct contra bonos mores was defined as behaviour which was 'wrong rather than right in the judgment of the majority of contemporary fellow citizens'; conduct which was not described at all, but merely expressed to be 'wrong' in the opinion of a majority of citizens. In the present case it was not necessarily evident to the applicants what they were being ordered not to do for the period of their binding over. The present applicants did not breach the peace, and given the lack of precision referred to above, it could not be said that what they were being bound over not to do must have been apparent to them. Therefore, the order by which the applicants were bound over to keep the peace and not to behave contra bonos mores did not comply with the requirement of A 10(2) that it be 'prescribed by law'. There had therefore been a violation of A 10.

Hatami v Sweden 98/87

[Application lodged 22.7.1996; Commission report 23.4.1998; Court Judgment 9.10.1998]

Mr Korosh Hatami, an Iranian national, arrived in Sweden on 13 June 1993. He asked for asylum upon arrival. The basis of his claim was his sympathies for the Mujahedin Khalgh organisation which had led to his arrest, imprisonment for 2 years and torture. After his release, he continued his activities, but following the arrest of another member of his group, who had revealed the applicant's involvement, the latter fled to Kurdistan and then to Bandar Abbas and thereafter with assistance to Stockholm. The National Immigration Board rejected the applicant's asylum claim on the grounds that it doubted its credibility. The applicant appealed to the Aliens Appeals Board which rejected his appeal on 1 July 1996 and ordered his expulsion. The applicant complained that his expulsion from Sweden and deportation to Iran would expose him to ill-treatment and give rise to a violation of A 3.

Commission found unanimously V 3 if applicant deported to Iran.

Court noted the friendly settlement and struck case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland, Mr MA Lopes Rocha, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr P Jambrek, Mr V Butkevych.

Court noted the friendly settlement reached between the Government and the applicant and discerned no reason of public policy against striking the case out of the list.

Hauschildt v Denmark (1990) 12 EHRR 266 89/7

[Application lodged 26.8.1980; Commission report 16.7.1987; Court Judgment 24.5.1989]

Mr Mogens Hauschildt, the applicant, established a company, Scandinavian Capital Exchange plc, which traded as a bullion dealer and also provided financial services. In January 1980, he was charged with fraud and tax evasion. He was found guilty and sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. He appealed to the High Court, which confirmed his conviction on 2 March 1984. Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court was refused. He complained that he did not receive a fair trial by an impartial tribunal within a reasonable time as the presiding judge of the City Court and the High Court judges, who had respectively convicted him and examined his appeal, had taken before and during his trials numerous decisions regarding his detention on remand and other procedural matters.

Comm found by a majority (9–7) NV 6(1).

Court rejected by majority (14–3) Government's preliminary objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies, found (12–5) V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President (c), Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (jd), Mr F Gölcüklü (jd), Mr F Matscher (jd), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr N Valticos, Mr SK Martens, Mrs E Palm (jd), Mr B Gomard (jd), ad hoc judge.

Preliminary objection dismissed, the government had not shown that there was an effective remedy under Danish law to which the applicant could have resorted. The existence of impartiality for the purpose of A 6(1) had to be determined according to both a subjective test, that is, on the basis of the personal conviction of a particular judge in a particular case, and an objective test, that is, ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in this respect. As to the subjective test, the personal impartiality of a judge had to be presumed until there was proof to the contrary and in the present case, there was no such proof. Under the objective test, it had to be determined whether there were ascertainable facts which may raise doubts as to the impartiality of the judge. Appearances may be important; what was at stake was the confidence which the courts inspired in the public and in the accused. Accordingly, any judge in respect of whom there was a legitimate reason to fear a lack of impartiality had to withdraw. The standpoint of the accused was important, but not decisive; what was decisive was whether the fear of lack of impartiality could be held to be objectively justified. The questions which a judge had to answer when taking pre-trial decisions were not the same as those which were decisive for his final judgment. The mere fact that a trial or appeal judge, in a system like the Danish one, had also made pre-trial decisions in the case, including those concerning detention on remand, could not be held as in itself justifying fears as to his impartiality. In the present case, in prolonging the applicant's detention, the judges specifically relied on s 762(2) of the Administration of Justice Act, which required, inter alia, a 'particularly confirmed suspicion' that the accused had committed the crime (interpreted as meaning that the judge had to be convinced there was very high degree of clarity as to guilt). Thus, the difference between the issue the judge had to settle when applying that section and the issue he would have to settle when giving judgment at the trial became tenuous. In the circumstances of the case, the impartiality of the courts appeared capable of being open to doubt and the applicant's fears could be considered objectively justified. Therefore, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Helle v Finland (1998) 26 EHRR 159 97/99

Mr Pekka Helle was a retired verger of the Evangelical-Lutheran Church. A new salary system was applied in 1977 to the Church employees. On 9 January 1989, the applicant appealed against the 1977 decision to the Parish Council claiming arrears of salary owed to him as a full-time parish verger and other lost benefits. He lodged an appeal with the Cathedral Chapter which acted as a court of first instance in cases concerning salary claims of parish officials. He subsequently appealed against the Cathedral Chapter's decision to the Supreme Administrative Court. In a decision of 8 March 1991, the Supreme Administrative Court, without having held an oral hearing, upheld the Cathedral Chapter's decision as regards the effects of the 1977 decision, finding no reason to alter it. On the other hand, the Supreme Administrative Court considered that the Cathedral Chapter did have jurisdiction to examine the dispute regarding his compensation claim and therefore referred the case back for fresh examination. The applicant complained that he had never received an oral hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal at any stage of the domestic proceedings, nor obtained adequate reasons from the Cathedral Chapter or the Supreme Administrative Court for their rejection of his claims.

Comm found unanimously NV 6(1) with regard to the absence of an oral hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal, by majority (25–5) NV 6(1) with regard to the fairness of the domestic proceedings.

Court found unanimously NV 6(1) with respect to the absence of an oral hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal and fairness of the proceedings.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr N Valticos, Mr I Foighel (c), Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr D Gotchev, Mr B Repik (c), Mr P Van Dijk (c).

The rights invoked by the applicant were pecuniary in nature and fell within the category of 'civil' rights, irrespective of the administrative nature of the proceedings in issue. A 6(1) was therefore applicable.

The Supreme Administrative Court was independent and impartial. Although the Cathedral Chapter had not held an oral hearing when adjudicating on the applicant's grievances, the organisation of an oral procedure before the Supreme Administrative Court would have fully met the requirements of A 6(1) in that respect and compensated for the deficiencies in the proceedings before the Cathedral Chapter. This was all that was required under A 6(1). The application of Finland's reservation to the proceedings before the Supreme Administrative Court was central to the Government's argument that the absence of an oral hearing before that court could not be impugned under A 6(1). The reservation satisfied the substantive and procedural requirements of A 64. The reservation was valid and Finland was not under a Convention obligation to ensure that an oral hearing took place before the Supreme Administrative Court. While the effect of the reservation was to deny the applicant a right to an oral hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal, that result had to be considered to be compatible with the Convention and a consequence of the operation of a valid reservation. The aim of the reservation was to relieve the Supreme Administrative Court from the Convention requirement to hold an oral hearing during a transitional period and that requirement could not be re-imposed during the subsistence of the reservation's validity in order to compensate for the absence of such a hearing downstream in the domestic legal order. Accordingly, there had been no breach of A 6(1) in respect of an oral hearing.

The Court's task was to assess whether or not the proceedings taken as a whole were fair within the meaning of A 6(1) having regard to all the relevant circumstances, including the nature of the dispute and the character of the proceedings in issue, the way in which the evidence was dealt with and whether the proceedings afforded the applicant an opportunity to state his case under conditions which did not place him at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his employer. The applicant was given a real and genuine opportunity by the Supreme Administrative Court to submit his own comments on the content of the Cathedral Chapter's opinions and he availed himself of that opportunity on two occasions. In the circumstances, he could not maintain that there was a breach of the requirement of 'equality of arms' inherent in the concept of a fair procedure.

While A 6(1) obliged the courts to give reasons for their judgments, it did not require a detailed answer to every argument adduced by a litigant. The extent to which the duty to give reasons applied varied according to the nature of the decision at issue. It was moreover necessary to take into account, inter alia, the diversity of the submissions that a litigant may bring before the courts and the differences existing in the Contracting States with regard to statutory provisions, customary rules, legal opinion and the presentation and drafting of judgments. Having regard to the requirements of A 6(1), the Court found no fault with the way in which the Cathedral Chapter dealt with the evidence before it, nor with the adequacy of the reasons which it adduced to ground its rejection of the applicant's appeal. The reasons given by the Cathedral Chapter were adopted twice on appeal by the Supreme Administrative Court by process of incorporation, thus clearly indicating that the latter court had no reasons of its own to depart from the conclusions reached by the Cathedral Chapter and that the applicant had not presented any new submissions which would have had a bearing on the appeal. Nor could it be maintained that the Supreme Administrative Court did not address the essence of the points submitted by the applicant for its consideration; its remittal of the issue of compensation back to the Cathedral Chapter confirmed that it had taken a fresh and considered approach to the submissions before it. The notion of a fair procedure required that a national court which had given sparse reasons for its decisions, whether by incorporating the reasons of a lower court or otherwise, addressed the essential issues which were submitted to its jurisdiction and did not merely endorse without further ado the findings reached by a lower court. That requirement was all the more important where a litigant had not been able to present his case orally in the domestic proceedings. However, in the present case, that requirement was satisfied. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1) under this head of complaint either.

Helmers v Sweden (1993) 15 EHRR 285 91/41

[Application lodged 6.2.1985; Commission report 6.2.1990; Court Judgment 29.10.1991]

Mr Reinhard Helmers, a German citizen, was a university lecturer resident in Sweden. In 1979, he was not selected for appointment to an academic post at the University of Lund. As he considered that the decision was discriminatory and that the recruitment board had been biased, he appealed to the National Board of Universities and Colleges. The University committee which investigated the complaint stated that the applicant had accused the person eventually selected for the post of having obtained it by means of secret pressure as a reward for another's assistance in a campaign led by a professor against the applicant. The applicant, who considered that the university committee's statement amounted to defamation, reported the matter to the police, who chose not to investigate. The applicant brought a private prosecution for defamation, an action for damages and sought compensation from each of the accused. The Lund District Court held a public hearing on 9 September 1981, at which the applicant and the defendants had the opportunity to address the court. The District Court dismissed the applicant's private prosecution and rejected the claim for compensation. His appeal to the Court of Appeal and his request to it to hold an oral hearing was rejected. He was refused leave to appeal to the Supreme Court. He complained of infringements of A 6.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) regarding lack of public hearing.

Court found by majority (11–9) V 6(1) with regard to Court of Appeal's refusal to grant an oral hearing.

Judges: Mr J Cremona, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (jd), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert (jd), Mr F Gölcüklü (jd), Mr F Matscher (jd), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (c), Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo (c), Mr R Bernhardt (jd), Mr A Spielmann (c), Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr SK Martens (jd), Mrs E Palm (jd), Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen (jd), Mr AN Loizou (c), Mr JM Morenilla (d), Mr F Bigi (c).

The scope of the case before the Court was delimited by the Commission's decision on admissibility. The applicant's additional complaints before the Court had not been declared admissible by, or raised before, the Commission in the present case. Consequently, the Court did not have jurisdiction to deal with them. Furthermore, a decision by the Commission that an application was inadmissible was final and not open to appeal.

The 'civil' character of the right to enjoy a good reputation was not disputed and followed from established case-law. Accordingly, A 6(1) was applicable. The manner of application of A 6 to proceedings before courts of appeal depended on the special features of the proceedings involved; account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings in the domestic legal order and of the role of the appellate court. A public hearing had been held at first instance. Even where a court of appeal had jurisdiction to review the case both as to facts and as to law, the Court could not find that A 6 always required a right to a public hearing irrespective of the nature of the issues to be decided. The publicity requirement was one of the means whereby confidence in the courts was maintained. However, there were other considerations, including the right to trial within a reasonable time and the related need for expeditious handling of the courts' case-load, which had to be taken into account in determining the necessity of a public hearing at stages in the proceedings subsequent to the trial at first instance. Provided a public hearing had been held at first instance, the absence of such a hearing before a second or third instance could be justified by the special features of the proceedings at issue. Leave-to-appeal proceedings and proceedings involving only questions of law, as opposed to questions of fact, might comply with the requirements of A 6, although the appellant was not given an opportunity of being heard in person by the appeal court. Taking into account the seriousness of what was at stake for the applicant, namely his professional reputation and career, the question of the defendants' guilt could not, as a matter of fair trial, have been properly determined by the Court of Appeal without a direct assessment of the evidence given in person by the applicant and by the defendants, who claimed that they were innocent of the accusations brought against them. There were no special features to justify the Court of Appeal's denial of a public hearing and of the applicant's right to be heard in person. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Hennings v Germany (1993) 15 EHRR 83 92/75

[Application lodged 16.4.1986; Commission report 30.5.1991; Court Judgment 16.12.1992]

Mr Hans-Dieter Hennings had an altercation with a ticket collector on 15 April 1984. The Railway Police questioned the applicant about the incident. In a standard-form letter of 9 August 1984, the public prosecutor's office informed the applicant of the offence and in accordance with the Criminal Code stated that proceedings would not be brought against him if he paid a fine of DM 300 by 1 October 1984. A form to be returned by 20 September 1984 was enclosed for the purpose of consenting to this method of settlement which would result in the termination of the proceedings without further notice. As the applicant did not return the consent form or pay the fine, he was issued with a penal order by the District Court on 7 November 1984 in accordance with a summary procedure. He was sentenced to a fine of DM 40 per day for 25 days for coercion and for the further offence of dangerous assault, which was not mentioned in the letter of 9 August 1984. As no objection had been lodged by the applicant within the one week time limit then prescribed by law and explicitly mentioned in the penal order, it acquired legal force as the final judgment in the matter on 20 November 1984. An application for the reinstatement of the proceedings against the penal order was submitted by the applicant's lawyer and received by the Rosenheim District Court on 27 November 1984 out of time. The applicant's request for reinstatement was dismissed by the District Court and the applicant was ordered to pay the costs. The Regional Court dismissed the applicant's appeal on 24 January 1985 and ordered him to pay the costs. On 17 October 1985, due to its lack of prospects of success, the Federal Constitutional Court rejected the applicant's appeal against the refusal of reinstatement. The applicant complained about the short time limit for filing an objection against the penal order and that it was not served on him personally.

Comm found by majority (9–4) NV 6(1), (12–1) NV 14+6,

Court found by majority (8–1) NV 6(1), unanimously not necessary to examine A14+6.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh (d), Mr J De Meyer, Mr N Valticos, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr F Bigi.

The guarantees contained in A 6(3) were constituent elements of the general notion of a fair trial. In the circumstances of the case, the complaint should be examined under 6(1). The applicant could reasonably have been expected to obtain a key to his letter-box in order to have ready access to any mail addressed to him, particularly since he must have foreseen that proceedings would be brought against him as a result of his failure to reply to the letter of 9 August 1984 from the public prosecutor's office. The authorities could not be held responsible for barring his access to a court because he failed to take the necessary steps to ensure receipt of his mail and was thereby unable to comply with the requisite time limits laid down under German law. Whilst the time limit of one week for lodging an objection following service of the penal order was short, especially where a new offence had been alleged, it had to be borne in mind that the applicant still had the possibility of seeking reinstatement of the proceedings. Such a request had to be granted if there has been no fault on the part of the person concerned. However, the applicant failed to lodge even this request in time. It could not be said that the applicant was denied his right of access to a court. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 6(1).

The applicant did not pursue his claim of violation of A 14 and 6 before the Court. The Court did not have jurisdiction to examine it and considered that it was subsumed in the general complaint that he was denied access to court.

Henra v France 98/32

[Application lodged 21.5.1997; Commission report 28.10.1997; Court Judgment 29.4.1998]

Mr Mathieu Henra, a minor, was represented by his testamentary guardian and was acting on his own behalf and as his parents' sole heir. His father was a haemophiliac and received numerous blood transfusions. An antenatal test carried out on the applicant's mother in August 1986 revealed that she was HIV-positive. A test subsequently carried out on the applicant's father showed that he too was HIV-positive. When the applicant was born, it was found that he was also HIV-positive. On 6 December 1990, the applicant's parents lodged three applications with the Paris Administrative Court seeking compensation for the damage sustained as a result of the State's failure to take appropriate measures to prevent their infection with HIV. On 22 April 1992, the Administrative Court gave an interlocutory judgment, holding the State liable. The applicant's father died on 8 April 1993 and his mother died on 24 August 1993. The applicant appealed the compensation award to the Administrative Court and there was a further appeal to the Conseil d'Etat. On 9 December 1994, the applicant lodged an application with the European Commission of Human Rights. On 13 September 1995, the Commission adopted a report noting that the parties had reached agreement on a friendly settlement of the case. On 31 January 1996, the Conseil d'Etat quashed the Administrative Court of Appeal's judgment and remitted the case back to that court. On 21 May 1997, the proceedings still outstanding, the applicant lodged a further application with the Commission complaining about the length of proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court dismissed Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr N Valticos, Mr AN Loizou, Mr L Wildhaber, Mr P Jambrek, Mr E Levits, Mr T Pantiru, Mr V Toumanov.

The Government's preliminary objection, that the application was inadmissible on account of the friendly settlement reached before the Commission, had not been raised before the Commission and they were therefore estopped from raising it before the Court.

The present case concerned the proceedings subsequent to the friendly settlement being reached. The starting-point was therefore 14 September 1995, namely, the day after the Commission adopted its report taking notice of the settlement reached. The proceedings before the domestic courts were not yet over, as the applicant appealed on 26 July 1994 to the Conseil d'Etat, which on 27 February 1996 remitted the case to the Paris Administrative Court of Appeal, before which it was still pending. The proceedings had therefore already lasted more than two years, seven months to date. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the relevant authorities. What was at stake for the applicant in the litigation also had to be taken into account. The case was of some complexity. The applicant had not been responsible for any delay. What was at stake in the proceedings was of crucial importance to the applicant, who had been HIV-positive from birth. Exceptional diligence was called for in this instance, notwithstanding the number of cases to be dealt with, in particular as the facts of the controversy had been known to the Government for several years and its seriousness must have been obvious to them. There were delays on the part of the authorities. The proceedings had already lasted five years and two months by the time the Commission adopted its report noting that a friendly settlement had been reached and that they were still pending in the Paris Administrative Court of Appeal. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case and in particular to the applicant's situation, the time taken in the present case was not reasonable. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Hentrich v France (1994) 18 EHRR 440, (1996) 21 EHRR 199 94/28

[Application lodged 14.12.1987; Commission report 4.5.1993; Court Judgment 22.9.1994 (merits), 3.7.1995 (A 50), 3.7.1997 (interpretation)]

Mrs Liliane Hentrich and her husband, Mr Wolfgang Peukert, bought land in Strasbourg on 11 May 1979. On 5 February 1980, They were notified by a bailiff that the Commissioner of Revenue considered the sale price to be too low and he was therefore exercising the right of pre-emption provided for in the General Tax Code. On 31 March 1980, the applicant and her husband instituted proceedings in the Strasbourg tribunal de grande instance against the Commissioner of Revenue to have the pre-emption set aside. The tribunal de grande instance gave judgment against them on 16 December 1980. Their appeals to the Colmar Court of Appeal and Court of Cassation were dismissed. Mrs Hentrich complained that the exercise of the right of pre-emption had been an unjustified interference with her right of property, that it had raised a presumption that she was guilty of tax evasion, that she had been denied the benefit of the right of access to a court that would give her a fair trial within a reasonable time.

Following the judgment of the Court of Human Rights on just satisfaction, Mrs Hentrich wrote to the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe, to complain of the delay in paying the just satisfaction and to claim default interest on the sums awarded.

A 26 had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism. At all stages of the national proceedings, the applicant expressly relied on the relevant provisions of the Convention and indicated to the domestic courts the complaints now made at Strasbourg. She had therefore given the national courts the opportunity of preventing or putting right the violations alleged against them. Accordingly, Government's preliminary objection regarding non-exhaustion of remedies was dismissed.

P1A1: As the right of pre-emption was exercised, the applicant was deprived of her property within the meaning of the second sentence of the first sub-paragraph of P1A1. The right of pre-emption was not designed to punish tax evasion, its purpose was to prevent non-payment of higher registration fees. The notion of 'public interest' was necessarily extensive and States had a certain margin of appreciation to frame and organise their fiscal policies and make arrangements, such as the right of pre-emption, to ensure that taxes were paid. The prevention of tax evasion was a legitimate objective which was in the public interest. In the present case, the pre-emption operated arbitrarily and selectively, it was not foreseeable and it was not attended by the basic procedural safeguards. A pre-emption decision could not be legitimate in the absence of adversarial proceedings that complied with the principle of equality of arms, enabling argument to be presented on the issue of the underestimation of the price and, consequently, on the Revenue's position. The State had other suitable methods at its disposal which would have been adequate for discouraging tax evasion. As a selected victim of the exercise of the right of pre-emption, the applicant bore an individual and excessive burden which could have been rendered legitimate only if she had had the possibility of effectively challenging the measure taken against her. The fair balance which had to be struck between the protection of the right of property and the requirements of the general interest was therefore upset. Accordingly there had been a breach of P1A1.

A 6: One of the requirements of a fair trial was 'equality of arms', which implied that each party had to be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present his case under conditions that did not place him at a substantial disadvantage vis à vis his opponent. In the present case, the proceedings on the merits did not afford the applicant such an opportunity. The tribunals of fact allowed the Revenue to give reasons that were too summary and general to enable the applicant to mount a reasoned challenge to the assessment. The tribunals of fact had also declined to allow the applicant to establish that the price agreed between the parties corresponded to the real market value of the property. There had therefore been a breach of A 6(1) with regard to the fairness of the proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 31 March 1980, when proceedings were instituted in the Strasbourg tribunal de grande instance, and ended on 16 June 1987, with the delivery of the Court of Cassation's judgment: 7 years and nearly 3 months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be determined with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. There were delays in the proceedings, especially on appeal (4 years), and to a lesser extent in the Court of Cassation (2 years). The backlog of cases in the Court of Appeal was a factor which could not excuse it. The length of proceedings in the Court of Cassation was attributable primarily to that court's wish to hear together four cases that raised similar issues. Whilst that approach was understandable, it could not under A 6 justify substantial delay. Having regard to what was at stake for the applicant, the lapse of time in the present case could not be regarded as reasonable.

A 6(2): The implementation of the pre-emption measure was not tantamount to a declaration of guilt. Therefore no violation of A 6(2).

A 13: In view of the decision in respect of A 6(1) it was not necessary to consider the case under A 13 as the requirements of that provision were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6(1).

A 14: The findings also made it unnecessary for the Court to consider the complaint that the applicant had suffered discrimination contrary to A 14 in respect of her P1A1, A 6 and A 13 rights.

Interpretation: Under the terms of the judgment of 3 July 1995 and in accordance with A 53 of the Convention, the respondent State was required to pay the applicant the sums awarded within three months. However, those sums were not paid until 1 December 1995, that is, nearly two months after expiry of the time limit. It was for the Committee of Ministers to supervise execution of the judgment. The judgment did not stipulate that default interest was to be paid in the event of delayed settlement. The Court had directed the respondent State to pay interest on the costs and expenses it was required to reimburse pursuant to the judgment of 22 September 1994. The practice of awarding default interest for delayed settlement was not introduced by the Court until January 1996. Accordingly, to allow the application for interpretation would not be to clarify the meaning and scope of that judgment but rather to modify it in respect of an issue which the Court decided with binding force. Accordingly, there was no matter for interpretation.

Judgment constituted just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Pecuniary damage (by majority (8–1) FF 800,000), costs and expenses (unanimously FF 20,000).

Herczegfalvy v Austria (1993) 15 EHRR 437 92/58

[Application lodged 27.11.1978; Commission report 1.3.1991; Court Judgment 24.9.1992]

Mr Istvan Herczegfalvy, a Hungarian citizen resident in Austria, served two prison sentences in succession, following convictions, inter alia, for assaults on his wife, clients of his television repair business and public officials. Further prosecutions were brought against the applicant for assaults on warders and fellow prisoners and for serious threats against judges. He was sentenced and detained. He was found to be suffering from psychiatric illness and detained in a mental institution. He complained about the lawfulness, length and conditions of his detention and the medical treatment carried out during it.

Comm found unanimously V 3, V 5(1)(e) for the periods from 11.12.1981 to 8.2.1982 and from 8.2.1983 to 16.2.1984, V 5(4), V 8, V 10, by majority (18–2) V 13, (11–9) NV 5(1)(c), (11–9) NV 5(1)(e) for the other periods, unanimously 5(3).

Court found unanimously NV 5(1), NV 5(3), V 5(4), NV 3, V 8 with respect to the applicant's correspondence, NV 8 with respect to the medical treatment, V 10, not necessary to examine 13.

From 27 May 1978 to 10 January 1979 the detention in issue, based on the Code of Criminal Procedure, had as its purpose to ensure that the applicant would appear before the Regional Court. It therefore came under A 5(1)(c). From 10 January to 3 October 1979, the detention came under A 5(1)(e) as the Regional Court had not convicted or sentenced the applicant in view of his lack of criminal responsibility. The Austrian courts had not failed to comply with the relevant national law, in particular the Code of Criminal Procedure, which continued to serve as a basis for the detention in question. Nor did the detention appear to have been tainted by arbitrariness, the Regional Court having considered three expert reports before coming to its conclusions. No violation of A 5(1)(e) had been shown to exist at that stage. During the period from 3 October 1979, following the Supreme Court's judgment quashing the detention order until the Regional Court's decision of 9 April 1980, the detention remained based on the Code of Criminal Procedure. The risk of repetition of offences was still capable of justifying the applicant's detention, having regard in particular to the further verbal attacks made by him. Accordingly, there was no violation of A 5(1)(c). The period from the judgment of 9 April 1980 until his release on 28 November 1984 came under A 5(1)(e) as the court had not found the applicant guilty. The Regional Court had consulted several experts before extending the detention. The measures complained of had not been shown to be arbitrary. In conclusion, no violation of A 5(1) had been established.

A 5(3): The first period lasted for 7 months and 15 days although at its commencement on 27 May 1978 the applicant had already been deprived of his liberty for over a year. There had not been any negligence on the part of the authorities between 27 May 1978 and 10 January 1979 such as to delay the proceedings; however, the applicant had contributed to the prolongation of the proceedings. The second period from 3 October 1979 to 9 April 1980 did not appear excessive. Accordingly there was no violation of A 5(3).

A 5(4): Regarding the scope of A 5(1) and 5(4), any review had to comply with both the substantive and procedural rules of the national legislation and be conducted in conformity with the aim of A 5, namely to protect the individual against arbitrariness. The latter condition implied not only that the competent courts had to decide 'speedily', but also that their decisions had to follow at reasonable intervals. The three decisions taken under the Criminal Code were taken at intervals of 15 months, two years, nine months respectively. The first two decisions could not be regarded as having been taken at reasonable intervals, especially as the numerous requests for release submitted at that time by the applicant brought no response. The conclusions meant that there was no need for the Court to examine whether the decisions in issue complied with national law. There was, therefore, a violation of A 5(4).

A 3: The position of inferiority and powerlessness which was typical of patients confined in psychiatric hospitals called for increased vigilance in reviewing whether the Convention had been complied with. While it was for the medical authorities to decide, on the basis of the recognised rules of medical science, on the therapeutic methods to be used to preserve the physical and mental health of patients who were entirely incapable of deciding for themselves and for whom they were therefore responsible, such patients nevertheless remained under the protection of A 3, whose requirements permitted no derogation. As a general rule, a measure which was a therapeutic necessity could not be regarded as inhuman or degrading. The Court nevertheless had to satisfy itself that the medical necessity had been convincingly shown to exist in this case and on the evidence, the medical necessity justified forcible administration of food and medication, isolation and the use of handcuffs and security bed. Accordingly, no violation of A 3 had been shown.

A 8: The complaint regarding force feeding and the treatment he received had been considered under A 3. There was lack of specific information capable of disproving the Government's opinion that the hospital authorities were entitled to regard the applicant's psychiatric illness as rendering him entirely incapable of taking decisions for himself. Consequently, no violation of A 8 in this respect. The practice of sending all the applicant's letters to the curator for him to select which ones to pass on amounted to an interference with the exercise of the applicant's right to respect for his correspondence. With regard to whether the interference was in accordance with the law, the provisions of the Hospital Law and Civil Code did not specify the scope or conditions of exercise of the discretionary power which was at the origin of the measures complained about. Such specifications were all the more necessary in the field of detention in psychiatric institutions in that the persons concerned were frequently at the mercy of the medical authorities, so that their correspondence was their only contact with the outside world. In the absence of any detail as to the kind of restrictions permitted or their purpose, duration and extent or the arrangements for their review, the provisions under consideration did not offer the minimum degree of protection against arbitrariness required by the rule of law in a democratic society. Nor had there been any case-law to remedy this state of affairs. There had therefore been a violation of A 8 and it was not necessary to examine whether the other requirements of para 2 of A 8 were complied with.

A 10: As the Court had been unable to regard the relevant provisions of the Hospital Law as 'law' within the meaning of A 8(2), there had also been a violation of A 10. Consequently, it was not necessary to examine the other requirements of para 2 of A 10.

A 13: In view of the decision under A 8 and 10 it was not necessary to rule on A 13.

Hertel v Switzerland 98/69

[Application lodged 13.9.1994; Commission report 9.4.1997; Court Judgment 25.8.1998]

Mr Hertel, a technical sciences graduate, in collaboration with Mr Blanc, a professor at the University of Lausanne and a technical adviser at the Lausanne Federal Institute of Technology, carried out a study of the effects on human beings of the consumption of food prepared in microwave ovens. A research paper was written dated June 1991 and the quarterly Journal Franz Weber devoted part of its 19th issue to the effects on human health of using microwave ovens. On the cover was a picture of the Reaper holding out one hand towards a microwave oven, together with the following title 'The danger of microwaves: scientific proof'. The Swiss Association of Manufacturers and Suppliers of Household Electrical Appliances ('MHEA') asked Mr Hertel to publish a statement to the effect that he would no longer make unfair comments on microwave ovens. He did not reply. On 7 August 1992, the association lodged an application under the Federal Unfair Competition Act (UCA) with the Commercial Court, seeking to have Mr Hertel prohibited from stating that food prepared in microwave ovens was a danger to health and from using, in publications and public speeches on microwave ovens, the image of death, whether represented by a hooded skeleton carrying a scythe or by some similar symbol. On 19 March 1993, the Commercial Court allowed the application. The applicant's application to the Federal Court was dismissed. He complained that the ban imposed on him by the Swiss Courts infringed his right of freedom of expression.

Court found by majority (6–3) V 10, unanimously not necessary to consider 6(1) or 8.

The prohibition on the applicant, on pain of penalties, amounted to an interference by a public authority in the exercise of the right guaranteed by A 10. Such an interference would infringe the Convention if it did not meet the requirements of A 10(2). A norm could not be regarded as a 'law' within the meaning of A 10(2) unless it was formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct; he had to be able, if necessary with appropriate advice, to foresee, to a degree that was reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action might entail. The UCA contained a general provision in it which was defined as 'unfair and illegal' not only any commercial practice, but also any conduct that was deceptive or in any other way offended the principle of good faith and affected relations between competitors or between suppliers and customers. In addition, the act listed certain unfair acts, providing in particular that a person acted unfairly if he denigrated others or the goods, work, services, prices or business of others by making inaccurate, misleading or unnecessarily wounding statements. The UCA was not therefore confined in scope solely to economic agents: people, such as the applicant, who were not market players were also concerned. It was foreseeable that the communication to the Journal Franz Weber of the research paper and its subsequent publication were liable to amount to an act of competition within the meaning of the UCA. That being so, the interference was prescribed by law, namely the UCA. The aim of the measure was the protection of the rights of others. With regard to the question of necessary in a democratic society, the Court recalled its case-law. Freedom of expression constituted one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and for each individual's self-fulfilment. It was applicable not only to 'information' or 'ideas' that were favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offended, shocked or disturbed. The freedom was subject to exceptions which had to be construed strictly, and the need for any restrictions had to be established convincingly. The word 'necessary' in A 10(2) implied the existence of a pressing social need. The Contracting States had a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether such a need existed. Such a margin of appreciation was particularly essential in commercial matters, especially in an area as complex and fluctuating as that of unfair competition. It was, however, necessary to reduce the extent of the margin of appreciation when what was at stake was not a given individual's purely 'commercial' statements, but his participation in a debate affecting the general interest, for example, over public health. The applicant had played no part in the choice of the illustration for issue No 19 of the Journal Franz Weber, the statements that were attributable to him were on the whole qualified and there was nothing to suggest that they had any substantial impact on the interests of the members of the MHEA. There was a disparity between that measure and the behaviour it was intended to rectify. Although the injunction applied only to specific statements, nonetheless those statements related to the very substance of the applicant's views. The effect of the injunction was partly to censor the applicant's work and substantially to reduce his ability to put forward in public views which had their place in a public debate whose existence could not be denied. It mattered little that his opinion was a minority one and might appear to be devoid of merit since, in a sphere in which it was unlikely that any certainty existed, it would be particularly unreasonable to restrict freedom of expression only to generally accepted ideas. With regard to presenting the results outside the 'economic sphere', it was not transparently obvious from the courts' decisions that the applicant was given such a possibility. If he failed to comply with the injunction he ran the risk of a penalty, which could include imprisonment. For all those reasons, the measure in issue could not be considered as necessary in a democratic society. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 10.

Having regard to the finding of a violation of A 10, no separate question arose under A 6(1) or A 8.

Higgins and Others v France (1999) 27 EHRR 703 98/2

[Application lodged 1.6.1992; Commission report 4.9.1996; Court Judgment 19.2.1998]

The case concerned a dispute over the succession to the estates of Mary-Ann Higgins, who died on 22 February 1961, and her husband Charles Brown-Petersen, who died on 13 March 1962. The 23 applicants were entitled to a share in the estates of the deceased either by will or on intestacy and were all French citizens. The applicants were parties to three sets of proceedings. Those proceedings were an action for payment of a legacy, a third party application to reopen proceedings and an application to have set aside as fraudulent a transfer of a property development to the Brown Building Corporation ('BBC'). In the last set of proceedings the Papeete (French Polynesia) Civil Court of First Instance found in favour of the applicants. The BBC appealed and while that appeal was pending, the applicants applied for transfer of the case to another court on grounds of bias. On 22 March 1990, the Court of Cassation ordered the transfer of the two other related proceedings to the Paris Court of Appeal on the grounds of doubt as to impartiality of the Papeete Court of Appeal. The Court of Cassation did not mention the proceedings against BBC in its judgment and the applicants, believing that to be a mistake, made an application for rectification of a clerical error to the court. That application was dismissed on 23 October 1991. In the meantime, the Papeete Court of Appeal ruled on 7 December 1989 that there were no grounds for deferring judgment and dismissed the application for an order setting aside the transfer to BBC. The applicants complained that the Papeete Court of Appeal had not been impartial in the proceedings against BBC and that the proceedings before the Court of Cassation had been unfair, as that court had perpetuated the violation committed by the Papeete Court of Appeal by not setting aside the judgment of 7 December 1989.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

The complaint of lack of impartiality was considered in the Papeete Court of Appeal's judgment and by the Court of Cassation in its decision. It was the Court of Cassation decision that was to be taken into account for the purposes of calculating when the six month time limit expired. The preliminary objection that the application was made out of time was therefore dismissed. In view of the overlapping of the various sets of proceedings, in determining the issue of exhaustion of domestic remedies, regard had to be had to the proceedings as a whole. Although in the grounds in support of the appeal no reference was made either to A 6(1) or to a lack of impartiality, the applicants had drawn attention to the issue submitted to the Convention institutions by filing submissions to the effect that it was unnecessary to decide their appeal and by seeking a stay from the Papeete Court of Appeal because they had filed an application for transfer of proceedings to another court on grounds of bias. The applicants had provided the French courts with the opportunity of preventing or putting right the violations alleged against them. Consequently, the objection of failure to exhaust domestic remedies had to be dismissed.

A 6(1) obliged courts to give reasons for their decisions, but could not be understood as requiring a detailed answer to every argument. The extent to which the duty to give reasons applied varied according to the nature of the decision and had to be determined in the light of the circumstances of the case. In its judgment of 22 March 1990, the Second Civil Division acknowledged that the impartiality of the Papeete Court of Appeal was open to doubt. After joining the two applications before it and declaring them admissible, the Second Civil Division ordered a transfer from the Papeete Court of Appeal to the Paris Court of Appeal only of the proceedings concerning the action for payment of a legacy and the third party application to reopen proceedings; it made no mention of the third set of proceedings in the operative provisions, even though those proceedings were expressly referred to at the beginning of the judgment. The third set of proceedings was closely connected to the other two as it formed part of a complex succession dispute which, for practical purposes, concerned the same group of people and the same property. Furthermore, the composition of the Court of Appeal was very similar since, with one exception, all three cases were heard by the same judges. There was nothing in the Court of Cassation's judgment of 22 March 1990 to indicate why the outcome in respect of the proceedings against BBC was different. Neither the proceedings concerning the application for rectification of a clerical error nor the appeal on points of law against the Court of Appeal's judgment of 7 December 1989 provided the applicants with an explanation that was express and specific of the consequences to be drawn from the judgment of 22 March 1990. As a result, it was impossible to know whether the Court of Cassation simply neglected to make an order in respect of the third set of proceedings or whether it decided not to order transfer and, if so, why. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

[Application lodged 30.1.1991; Commission report 15.10.1993; Court Judgment 9.12.1994]

Mrs Rita Hiro Balani was an Indian national resident in Spain. In 1985, the Japanese company Orient Watch Co Ltd filed an application in the Madrid First Instance Court for the removal of the Spanish trade mark 'Orient HW Balani Málaga' from the industrial property register. The trade mark had been registered by the applicant's husband in 1970 and later transferred to her name. The applicant adduced several submissions to contest the application. In its judgment of 9 May 1988, the Madrid Audiencia Territorial accepted the claim that the applicant's mark was 'established' and dismissed the plaintiff's application. It did not rule on the merits of the applicant's other submissions. The plaintiff company appealed on points of law. In a judgment of 30 April 1990 the Supreme Court held that the contested trade mark was not 'established' because its registration was void and quashed the decision of the Audiencia Territorial. Giving a ruling on the merits of the dispute, the Supreme Court expressly rejected the submissions based on the allegedly non-genuine character of the trading name and the general time bar and allowed the application. However, it made no reference to the applicant's submission that the trade mark 'Creacions Orient', registered in Spain in 1934, should have priority over the trading name 'Orient' registered in Japan in 1951. The applicant's appeal to the Constitutional Court was declared inadmissible on 29 October 1990. The applicant complained that she had not had a fair hearing as the Supreme Court had not addressed in its judgment all the submissions made by her in the first instance proceedings.

A 6(1) obliged courts to give reasons for their judgments, but it could not be understood as requiring a detailed answer to every argument. The extent to which this duty to give reasons applied varied according to the nature of the decision. The applicant had contested the action for the removal of her trade mark from the register, inter alia, by a submission based on the priority of another mark that she owned. That submission was made in writing before the first instance court and was formulated in a sufficiently clear and precise manner. An official certificate was submitted with it as evidence. The Supreme Court, which quashed the first instance decision and gave a new ruling on the merits, was bound, under the applicable procedural law, to review all the submissions made during the proceedings, at least in so far as they had been 'the subject of argument', and even if they were not expressly repeated in the appeal on points of law. The applicant's submission was relevant. If the national court had held the submission to be well founded, it would, of necessity, have had to dismiss the plaintiff's action. From its silence, it was impossible to ascertain whether the Supreme Court simply neglected to deal with the submission based on the prior right or whether it intended to dismiss it and, if that were its intention, what its reasons were for so deciding. There had, therefore, been a violation of A 6(1).

Hoffmann v Austria ((1994) 17 EHRR 293 93/24

[Application lodged 20.2.1987; Commission report 16.1.1992; Court Judgment 23.6.1993]

Mrs Ingrid Hoffmann, a housewife, married Mr S, a telephone technician, in 1980. At that time, they were both Roman Catholics. They had two children, both baptised as Roman Catholics. The applicant left the Roman Catholic Church to become a Jehovah's Witness. On 17 October 1983, the applicant instituted divorce proceedings against Mr S. She left him in August or September 1984 while the proceedings were still pending, taking the children with her. The divorce was pronounced on 12 June 1986. Both parents applied to the Innsbruck District Court to be granted parental rights over the children. By decision of 8 January 1986, the District Court granted parental rights to the applicant and denied them to Mr S. Mr S appealed unsuccessfully to the Innsbruck Regional Court. He appealed to the Supreme Court which, in its decision of 3 September 1986, overturned the judgment of the Innsbruck Regional Court and granted parental rights to him. The applicant complained of the denial of custody to her.

The children had lived with the applicant for two years after she had left with them before the judgment of the Supreme Court of 3 September 1986 ordering her to give them up to their father. The Supreme Court's decision therefore constituted an interference with her right to respect for her family life and the case therefore fell within A 8. A 14 afforded protection against different treatment, without an objective and reasonable justification, of persons in similar situations. In assessing the interests of the children, the Supreme Court considered the possible effects on the children's social life of being associated with a particular religious minority, the hazards attaching to the applicant's total rejection of blood transfusions for herself and her children, against the possibility that transferring the children to the care of their father might cause them psychological stress. Those factors could be capable of tipping the scales in favour of one parent rather than the other. However, the Supreme Court also introduced a new element which was decisive for it, namely, the Federal Act on the Religious Education of Children. There had, therefore, been a difference in treatment on the ground of religion. Such a difference in treatment was discriminatory in the absence of an objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it was not justified by a legitimate aim and if there was no reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. The aim pursued by the judgment of the Supreme Court was a legitimate one, namely, the protection of the health and rights of the children. In so far as the Austrian Supreme Court did not rely solely on the Federal Act on the Religious Education of Children, it weighed the facts differently from the courts below, whose reasoning was supported by psychological expert opinion. A distinction based essentially on a difference in religion alone was not acceptable. There was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim pursued and accordingly, there had been a violation of A 8 taken in conjunction with A 14.

In view of the conclusion with regard to 14 and 8, it was not necessary to rule on the allegation of a violation of A 8 taken alone, the arguments in any case being the same as those examined in respect of 14 and 8.

No separate issue arose under A 9 or 14 and 9, as the factual circumstances relied on as the basis of that complaint were the same as those which were at the root of the complaint under 14 and 8, of which a violation has been found.

The complaint P1A2 was not pursued before the Court, which found no reason to examine it of its own motion.

No claim for non-pecuniary damages. Costs and expenses (by majority (8–1) ATS 75,000).

Hokkanen v Finland (1995) 19 EHRR 139 94/32

[Application lodged 10.4.1992; Commission report 22.10.1993; Court Judgment 23.9.1994]

The applicant, Teuvo Hokkanen and his wife Tuula, had a daughter, Sini, born in September 1983. Following the death in April 1985 of Mrs Tuula Hokkanen, Sini was looked after by her maternal grandparents, with the agreement of the applicant. In late 1985, the grandparents informed the applicant that they did not intend to restore Sini to him. Following a hearing on 16 July 1986, the District Court ordered provisionally that Sini should remain with her grandparents and granted the applicant access rights. The grandparents refused to comply with the order giving the applicant access rights. After many proceedings, in a judgment of 25 September 1991, the Court of Appeal, by a majority, held that the applicant should remain Sini's guardian, but transferred custody to the grandparents. He complained, inter alia, that the public authorities had failed to take appropriate measures to facilitate the speedy reunion with his daughter, that they had allowed the grandparents to keep Sini in their care and prevented his access to her in defiance of court decisions and had transferred custody to them.

Comm found by majority (19–2) V 8, unanimously no separate issue under P7A5, by majority (16–5) NV 6(1), (20–1) not necessary to examine 13.

Court found unanimously V 8 with regard to the non-enforcement of the applicant's right of access from 10 May 1990 until 21 October 1993, by majority (6–3) NV 8 thereafter, (6–3) NV 8 with regard to non-enforcement after 10 May 1990 of his right of custody and the subsequent transfer of custody to the grandparents, unanimously not necessary to examine P7A5, unanimously NV 6(1) regarding length of the second set of custody proceedings, unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr C Russo (pd), Mr J De Meyer (pd), Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr K Jungwiert (pd).

The Convention entered into force with respect to Finland on 10 May 1990 and accordingly the examination of the issues was limited to whether the facts occurring after that date disclosed a breach of the Convention.

Sini was the child of a marriage and was thus ipso jure part of that family unit from the moment of birth and by the very fact of it. The applicant had maintained links with her which were sufficient to establish family life within the meaning of A 8, which was therefore applicable. In previous cases, the Court had consistently held that A 8 included a right for the parent to have measures taken with a view to his or her being reunited with the child and an obligation for the national authorities to take such action. That principle applied equally to cases where the origin of the provisional transfer of care was a private agreement. The obligation of the national authorities to take measures to facilitate reunion was not absolute, the national authorities had to take all necessary steps to facilitate reunion as could reasonably be demanded in the special circumstances of each case. On the evidence, the competent authorities, prior to the Court of Appeal's judgment of 21 October 1993, did not make reasonable efforts to facilitate reunion. On the contrary, the inaction of the authorities placed the burden on the applicant to have constant recourse to a succession of time-consuming and ultimately ineffectual remedies to enforce his rights. In its judgment of 21 October 1993, which could not be called into question, the Court of Appeal concluded that the child had become sufficiently mature for her views to be taken into account and that access should therefore not be accorded against her own wishes. Although the competent authorities enjoyed a margin of appreciation, the non-enforcement of the applicant's right of access from 10 May 1990 until 21 October 1993 constituted a breach of his right to respect for his family life under A 8.

However, there had been no such violation in respect of the period thereafter. The child had been living with her grandparents and had very few contacts with her father. There were sufficient grounds to justify non-enforcement of the applicant's custody right pending the outcome of the custody proceedings. The transfer of custody constituted an interference with the applicant's right to respect for family life, the interference was in accordance with the law and pursued the legitimate aim of protecting the rights of the child. The transfer of custody was necessary in a democratic society. The Court of Appeal's judgment was based on expert opinion and had regard to the length of the child's stay with the grandparents, her strong attachment to them and her feeling that their home was her own. Those reasons were relevant and sufficient for the purposes of A 8(2). The competent national authorities, which were in principle better placed than the international judge in evaluating the evidence before them, did not overstep their margin of appreciation in arriving at their decisions. Even taking into account the failure of the authorities to secure the applicant access to his child, the measure could not be regarded as disproportionate to the legitimate aim of protecting her interests.

The applicant did not pursue the complaint under P7A5 before the Court, which did not find it necessary to deal with the matter of its own motion.

The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be considered in the light of the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the conduct of the parties and the importance of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation. The relevant period to be taken into consideration started on 13 August 1990, when the Social Welfare Board made a request to the District Court for transfer of custody, and ended on 21 January 1992, when the Supreme Court refused leave to appeal. Although it was essential that custody cases be dealt with speedily, no criticism could attach to the District Court for having suspended the proceedings twice in order to obtain expert opinions on the issue before it. Although the hearing had been suspended for 6 months, the overall length of the proceedings was approximately 18 months, which was excessive for proceedings comprising three judicial levels. Accordingly, the length of the second custody proceedings did not exceed a reasonable time and therefore there had been no violation of A 6(1).

The complaint under A13 was, in substance, the same as that made under A 6 and A 8 and having regard to the findings it was not necessary to examine that complaint.

Holm v Sweden (1994) 18 EHRR 79 93/53

[Application lodged 24.1.1987; Commission report 13.10.1992; Court Judgment 25.11.1993]

Mr Carl G Holm was an economist employed by the Swedish Federation of Industries. In 1974, he formed together with others a foundation named Contra to scrutinise governments of communist regimes in Eastern Europe and the Swedish Social Democratic Workers Party (SAP). On 15 April 1986, the applicant brought a private prosecution for libel in the District Court against the author and publisher of a book allegedly implying that he belonged to certain Nazi and fascist groups and thus calculated to cast doubt on his honour and to expose him to contempt. The defendants asked for jury trial in the District Court. Although the jury was properly constituted, five of its nine members were activists in the SAP. The prosecution was dismissed and the applicant had no right of appeal against the jury's verdict. The applicant complained that he had not had his case determined by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Comm found by majority (14–1) V 6(1).

Court found by majority (7–2) V 6(1).

The independence and impartiality of a tribunal applied to jurors as well as to professional judges and lay judges. It was only the independence and the objective impartiality of the five jurors who were affiliated to the SAP which was in issue; the applicant did not contest their subjective impartiality, finding it impracticable to do so in view of the secrecy of each juror's vote. The jurors were elected in the prescribed manner by the competent elective body, in conformity with the legal conditions for eligibility. They were drawn by lots after each party to the proceedings had had an opportunity to express its views on the question of disqualification of any juror. Each juror had to take an oath before the trial to the effect that he or she would carry out the tasks to the best of his or her abilities and in a judicial manner. There existed safeguards to ensure the independence and impartiality of the jurors in question. The defence had safeguards that were not applicable to the applicant: they could opt for a trial by jury, despite the fact that the applicant did not wish to have one, benefit of a special majority verdict, absence of an appeal in the event of an acquittal. The applicant as a private prosecutor was placed in a less favourable position than the defence. However, those features did not constitute a legitimate reason to fear a lack of independence and impartiality on the part of the jurors. There were links between the defendants and the five jurors who had been challenged by the applicant which could give rise to misgivings as to the jurors' independence and impartiality. The jurors were active members of the SAP who held or had held offices in or on behalf of the SAP. In those circumstances, the independence and impartiality of the District Court were open to doubt and the applicant's fears in that respect were objectively justified. Since the Court of Appeal's jurisdiction was limited by the terms of the jury's verdict, the defect could not have been cured by an appeal to the Court of Appeal. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Finding of violation constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs (SEK 125,000 less FF 5,650).

[Applications lodged 16.7.1987, 15.5.1988; Commission report 14.1.1993; Court Judgment 9.12.1994 (merits), 1.9.1997 (A 50)]

The eight applicant monasteries, which were founded between the 9th and 13th centuries, complained of the transfer of part of their real property to the State and of the management of it by the Office for the Management of Church Property (ODEP) and thereafter by the Greek Church Acts 1700/1987 and 1911/1988. Three of the monasteries signed an agreement on 11 May 1988 transferring their agricultural and forest property to the State.

Comm found unanimously NV P1A1 with regard to all the monasteries regarding transfer of ownership provided for in Law No 1700/1987, NV P1A1 regarding the provisions of Law No 1700/1987, as amended by Law No 1811/1988, NV 9, 11, 13, 6(1), 14+6, 14+9, 14+11, 14+P1A1, by majority (11–2) NV 6(1) regarding access to court with regard to the monasteries of Ano Xenia, Agia Lavra Kalavriton, Metamorphosis Sotiros, Chryssoleontissa Eginis and Mega Spileo Kalavriton, NV 6(1) regarding access to court with regard to the monasteries of Asomaton Petraki, Phlamourion Volou and Ossios Loukas.

Court dismissed the Government's preliminary objections, found unanimously V P1A1 in respect of the applicant monasteries not parties to the agreement of 11 May 1988, NV P1A1 in respect of the applicant monasteries parties to the agreement of 11 May 1988, V 6(1) in relation to the first complaint of the applicant monasteries not parties to the agreement of 11 May 1988, not necessary to examine the second 6(1) complaint of the applicant monasteries not parties to the agreement of 11 May 1988, NV 9, 11 and 13, NV 14+6, 14+9, 14+11, 14+P1A1 in respect of the distinction between the applicant monasteries that came under the Greek Church and the monasteries that came under the patriarchates, not necessary to rule on

The applicant monasteries did not exercise governmental powers. They were ascetic religious institutions whose objectives were not such as to enable them to be classed with governmental organisations established for public administration purposes. From their classification as public law entities it could be inferred only that the legislature wished to afford them the same legal protection vis à vis third parties as was accorded to other public law entities. The monasteries were distinct from and independent of the State; they came under the spiritual supervision of the local archbishop. They were therefore to be regarded as non-governmental organisations within the meaning of A 25. The Supreme Administrative Court had considered the lawfulness of the membership of the ODEP's governing body as well as the relevant provisions of Law No 1700/1987 and compatibility with the Constitution and the European Convention. The statements were by judges of one of the highest courts in the land and a large part of the reasoning of the judgment was taken up with them. The statements, even though they were obiter, substantially limited the prospects of success of any other appeal the applicant monasteries might bring. The preliminary objections were therefore dismissed.

P1A1 comprised three distinct rules. The first, which was expressed in the first sentence of the first paragraph and was of a general nature, laid down the principle of peaceful enjoyment of property. The second rule, in the second sentence of the same paragraph, covered deprivation of possessions and subjected it to certain conditions. The third, contained in the second paragraph, recognised that the Contracting States were entitled, amongst other things, to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest. The second and third rules, which were concerned with particular instances of interference with the right to peaceful enjoyment of property, were to be construed in the light of the general principle laid down in the first rule. By creating a presumption of State ownership, s 3(1)(A) of the national legislation shifted the burden of proof so that it fell on the applicant monasteries, which could only assert their ownership of the land in issue if it derived from a duly registered title deed, from a statutory provision or from a final court decision against the State. Section 3(1)(A) taken together with s 1(1) thus deprived them of the possibility of relying, in order to adduce proof to the contrary, on all the means of acquiring property provided for in Greek law and by which the applicant monasteries possibly accumulated their property, including adverse possession and even a final court decision against a private individual. It was not feasible for the Court to undertake to determine for itself which of the disputed tracts of land could be said under Greek law to belong in reality to the State. However, the applicant monasteries were primordial constituent parts of the Greek Church and were established long before the creation of the Greek State and had accumulated substantial immovable property over the centuries. The period of possession required in order that adverse possession might be relied upon both against the State and against third parties had certainly been completed by the time Law No 1700/1987 came into force. Particular importance was attached to the acquisition of property by adverse possession because there was no land survey in Greece and it was impossible to have title deeds registered before 1856 and legacies and inheritances registered before 1946. The State, deemed to be the owner of such agricultural and forest property under sub-s (1)(A) of s 3, was automatically given the use and the possession of it, a provision whose effect was to transfer full ownership of the land in question to the State. Five monasteries did not become a party to the agreement of 11 May 1988 in the year following its ratification by Parliament and consequently, the provisions of Law No 1700/1987 remained applicable to them. The fact that no administrative eviction order had yet been issued was no guarantee that none would be issued in the future. There had therefore been an interference with the applicant monasteries' right to the peaceful enjoyment of their possessions which amounted to a deprivation of possessions within the meaning of the second sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. The optional nature of the transfer of the use of the land to farmers or agricultural co-operatives and the inclusion of public bodies among the beneficiaries of such transfers might inspire some doubt as to the reasons for the measures, but they could not suffice to deprive the overall objective of Law No 1700/1987 of its legitimacy as being in the public interest. An interference with peaceful enjoyment of possessions had to strike a fair balance between the demands of the general interests of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. There had to be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised by any measure depriving a person of his possessions. The taking of property without payment of an amount reasonably related to its value would normally constitute a disproportionate interference and a total lack of compensation could be considered justifiable under P1A1 only in exceptional circumstances. P1A1 did not, however, guarantee a right to full compensation in all circumstances, since legitimate objectives of public interest could call for less than reimbursement of the full market value. By awarding no compensation and imposing a considerable burden on the applicant monasteries deprived of their property, Law No 1700/1987 did not preserve a fair balance between the various interests in question as required by P1A1. There had therefore been a breach of P1A1 in the case of the five applicant monasteries which did not sign the agreement of 11 May 1988. On the evidence before the Court, it was not possible to conclude that the three monasteries which had been parties to the agreement of 11 May 1988 acted under duress. Consequently, there had been no interference with their right of property.

A 6(1) embodied the right to a court of which the right of access, that is, the right to institute proceedings before courts in civil matters, constituted one aspect. It could be relied on by anyone who considered that an interference with the exercise of one of his (civil) rights was unlawful and complained that he had not had the possibility of submitting that claim to a tribunal meeting the requirements of A 6(1). The right of property was a civil right. However, the right to a court under A 6(1) extended only to disputes over rights and obligations which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law. The monasteries that signed the agreement had capacity to take legal proceedings relating to the property they retained; the complaint could only be made by monasteries not parties to the agreement. By depriving the applicant monasteries of any further possibility of bringing before the appropriate courts any complaint they might make against the Greek State, third parties or the Greek Church itself in relation to their rights of property, or even of intervening in such proceedings, s 1(1) of Law 1700/1987 impaired the very essence of their right to a court. There was therefore a breach of A 6(1) in relation to the first complaint of the applicant monasteries not parties to the agreement of 11 May 1988. A 6(1) guaranteed a right of access to the courts for the determination of claims under domestic law concerning compensation payable for expropriation of property. In view of the previous finding under P1A1 in respect of the absence of compensation under Law No 1700/1987 and the finding that the applicant's first complaint under A 6(1) had been established, it was not necessary to examine further this second complaint under A 6(1).

A 9: The provisions held to be contrary to P1A1 did not concern the objects intended for the celebration of divine worship and consequently did not interfere with the exercise of the right to freedom of religion under A 9.

The complaint under A 11 that Law 1700/1987 would prevent an increase in the number of monks and would deter the faithful from making gifts, was hypothetical. Consequently, no breach of A 11.

A 13 did not go so far as to require a remedy by which the laws of a Contracting State might be impugned before a national authority as being in themselves contrary to the Convention.

A 14 did not prohibit all differences in treatment in the exercise of the rights and freedoms under the Convention. Given the close links between the Greek Church and the applicant monasteries, the distinction made between the latter and the monasteries coming under the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople or the patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem or under the Holy Sepulchre and the Holy Monastery of Sinai or under the churches of other denominations and religions did not lack an objective and reasonable justification. Consequently, there was no breach of A 14 taken together with A 6, 9, 11 P1A1. In view of its other findings, it was not necessary to rule on the complaint based on the distinction created by Act 1811/1988 between the monasteries which signed the agreement of 11 May 1988 and those which did not.

Costs and expenses (8,400,000 GRD to the applicant monasteries not parties to the agreement). Court took note of friendly settlement on damage and struck the case out of the list.

Hood v United Kingdom (2000) 29 EHRR 365 99/10

[Application lodged 18.4.1995; Commission report 28.5.1998; Court Judgment 18.2.1999]

David Hood was a soldier in the British Army. On 11 May 1994, he did not return after two weeks' leave (his fourth absence without leave). On 27 November 1994, he was arrested at his home by the civilian police and on 28 November 1994, he was taken by army escort to Brompton Barracks. He remained in close arrest until his court-martial, detained in a cell in a guardroom under the supervision of a guard, apart from certain occasions when he was taken to hospital for psychiatric care. On the 72nd day of the applicant's detention, 7 February 1995, an authorisation from the Commander-in-Chief directed the applicant's continued detention to prevent him absconding before trial. On 17 February 1995, the applicant's solicitor issued a writ for habeas corpus which was rejected by the High Court on 21 February 1995. The court martial took place in April 1995; the assistant prosecuting officer was the unit adjutant. The applicant, who was legally represented, was convicted on the two charges of absence without leave and on one of the charges of desertion, and the remaining charge of desertion was reduced to one of absent without leave. He was sentenced to be imprisoned for eight months and to be dismissed from the service. His petition to the Army Board was rejected and his leave applications to the single judge and to the full Courts-Martial Appeal Court were rejected. The applicant complained that he had not been brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power, that he had not had available to him a procedure to challenge his continuing detention and that he had no enforceable right to compensation or effective domestic remedy in those respects. He also claimed that he had been denied a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law.

Comm found unanimously V 5(3), V 5(5), NV5(4), not necessary to consider A 13, V 6(1) as regards fairness, independence and impartiality, NV6(1) as regards public hearing, not necessary to consider remaining complaints under 6(1) and 6(3).

Court found unanimously V 5(3), NV 5(4), V 5(5), not necessary to consider A 13, V 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr P Kûris, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Zupancic (pd), Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Sir John Freeland, ad hoc judge.

A 5(3) applied. Given the nature of the relevant charges and the penalty imposed, the applicant was arrested on reasonable suspicion of having committed an 'offence' within the meaning of A 5(1)(c). Moreover, the applicant's close arrest amounted to detention in view of his confinement to a cell in the unit guardroom under the supervision of a guard. The Court found that the applicant was brought before his commanding officer on 29 November 1994. The powers and duties of the commanding officer, which arose subsequent to that officer's conduct of the hearing pursuant to Rule 4 of the 1972 Rules, indicated that the commanding officer was liable to play a central role in the subsequent prosecution of the case against the applicant. Although the unit adjutant often carried out certain of those functions of the commanding officer, he did so on behalf of the commanding officer to whom he was directly subordinate in rank. In addition, the unit adjutant was generally nominated prosecuting or assistant prosecuting officer. In those circumstances, the applicant's misgivings about his commanding officer's impartiality were objectively justified. The commanding officer's concurrent responsibility for discipline and order in his command would provide an additional reason for an accused reasonably to doubt the officer's impartiality when deciding on the necessity of the pre-trial detention of an accused in his command. The procedural and substantive requirements of A 5(3) obliged the 'officer', inter alia, to hear himself the accused, to examine all the facts militating for and against pre-trial detention and to set out in the decision on detention the facts upon which that decision was based. The Court recalled its previous case-law in which it had stressed the importance of 'formal, visible requirements stated in the law' as opposed to standard practices in determining whether a national procedure for deciding on the liberty of an individual satisfied the requirements of A 5(3). There had been a violation of A 5(3), since the commanding officer could not be regarded as independent of the parties at the relevant time.

The applicant failed to apply for legal aid from the civilian legal aid scheme; he was legally represented during the major part of his pre-trial detention by two lawyers, and also for the habeas corpus proceedings. In those circumstances, he had not demonstrated that he did not have available to him guarantees appropriate to the kind of deprivation of liberty in question. Accordingly, there had been no violation of A 5(4).

The applicant did not specifically refer to A 5(5) before the Court. The Commission had found a violation of A 5(5) and the Government did not contest that before the Court. As the Court had found a violation of A 5(3) and the Government had acknowledged that the applicant did not have an enforceable right to compensation in relation to such a contravention, the Court held there had been a violation of A 5(5).

In view of the conclusion of no violation of A 5(4), it was not necessary to inquire whether the less strict requirements of A 13 were complied with.

The Court recalled its previous case-law in which it had found that a general court-martial convened pursuant to the Army Act 1955 did not meet the requirements of independence and impartiality laid down by A 6(1), in view, in particular, of the central part played in the prosecution by the convening officer, who was closely linked to the prosecuting authorities, was superior in rank to the members of the court martial and had the power, albeit in prescribed circumstances, to dissolve the court martial and to refuse to confirm its decision. It had come to a similar conclusion in respect of a district court martial convened under the Air Force Act 1955. The present case could not be distinguished from the previous cases and therefore, for the same reasons, the applicant's case was not independent and impartial within the meaning of A 6(1).

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction, in respect of non-pecuniary damage (by majority 16–1). Costs and expenses (GBP 10,500).

[Application lodged 7.1.1990; Commission report 23.10.1995; Court Judgment 19.3.1997 (merits), 1.4.1998 (A 50)]

David and Ada Ann Hornsby were graduate teachers of English living in Rhodes. They considered that making nationality a condition for authorisation to establish a private school to teach English (frontistirion) contravened the Treaty of Rome of 25 March 1957 and they applied to the European Commission which referred the case to the Court of Justice. In a judgment of 15 March 1988, the Court of Justice held that by prohibiting nationals of other Member States from setting up frontistiria, the Hellenic Republic had failed to fulfil its obligations under the EEC Treaty. The applicants' further application resulted in two judgments of the Supreme Administrative Court on 9 and 10 May 1989, allowing their application. The applicants complained that the authorities' refusal to comply with the judgments of the Supreme Administrative Court breached A 6(1).

The situation complained of by the applicants began with the relevant authorities' refusal to grant them the authorisation they sought and continued after the lodging of their application to the Commission. The Supreme Administrative Court dismissed the third party appeal on 25 April 1991. The preliminary objection regarding non-observance of the six month time limit therefore had to be dismissed. An action for damages could not in the present case be deemed sufficient to remedy the applicants' complaints. As regards judicial review in the Supreme Administrative Court, there was no reason to suppose that the applicants would have obtained the authorisation they sought. Proceedings in the Rhodes Administrative Court were decisive only in connection with just satisfaction. Accordingly, the objection of non-exhaustion of domestic remedies had to be dismissed.

A 6(1) embodied the right to a court, of which the right of access, that is, the right to institute proceedings before courts in civil matters, constituted one aspect. That right would be illusory if a Contracting State's domestic legal system allowed a final, binding judicial decision to remain inoperative to the detriment of one party. Execution of a judgment given by any court had to be regarded as an integral part of the 'trial' for the purposes of A 6. Those principles were of even greater importance in the context of administrative proceedings concerning a dispute whose outcome was decisive for a litigant's civil rights. The Court of Justice of the European Communities had given judgment on 15 March 1988 and on 9 and 10 May 1989 the Supreme Administrative Court gave its ruling on the applicants' case. Until the adoption of Presidential Decree No 211/1994 on 10 August 1994, the Greek legislation in force laid down no particular condition for nationals of European Community Member States who wished to open a frontistirion in Greece. By refraining for more than five years from taking the necessary measures to comply with a final, enforceable judicial decision in the present case, the Greek authorities deprived the provisions of A 6(1) of all useful effect. There had accordingly been a breach of that article (A 6(1)).

Hozee v The Netherlands 98/37

Mr Wilhelmus Hozee, was the managing director of cleaning agencies which were limited liability companies. The companies were investigated by the Tax Inspector from 1981. On 14 June 1984, the Fiscal Intelligence and Investigation Department (FIID) interrogated the applicant as a suspect and on 8 May 1985, he was arrested on suspicion of fraud. He was convicted of the fraud charges on 10 August 1989 by the Regional Court. His final appeal on points of law was rejected by the Supreme Court on 1 December 1992. He complained of the length of the criminal proceedings against him.

In criminal matters, the 'reasonable time' referred to in A 6(1) began to run as soon as a person was charged; that might occur on a date prior to the case coming before the trial court, such as the date of arrest, the date when the person concerned was officially notified that he would be prosecuted or the date when preliminary investigations were opened. Furthermore, 'charge', for the purposes of A 6(1) could be defined as 'the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he had committed a criminal offence', a definition that also corresponded to the test whether the situation of the suspect has been substantially affected. Even if a fiscal penalty or tax surcharge could in certain circumstances be considered a criminal charge within the meaning of A 6(1) of the Convention, the penalty in the present case was imposed by the tax authorities at the end of 1981 on the applicant's companies and not on him personally. Between 1981 and May 1984, the applicant's companies were under investigation in connection with the tax returns which they had submitted. The applicant himself had no reason to suppose during that period that he was under investigation in his personal capacity and he was not substantially affected by any measure taken. On 14 June 1984, the FIOD questioned the applicant and officially notified him that he was under suspicion of having committed a criminal offence. It was at that moment, when he became a suspect for the first time, that his situation was substantially affected. Therefore, the proceedings began on 14 June 1984, the date from which there was a 'charge' within the meaning of A 6(1), and ended on 1 December 1992, when the Supreme Court rejected the appeal, a period of eight years, five months and 18 days. The reasonableness of the length of the impugned proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and with regard to the criteria laid down in its case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, and the conduct of the parties. Although the investigating judge concluded the preliminary judicial investigation four years and seven months after the applicant was first questioned as a suspect, the case was complex (involving the unraveling of a network of interconnecting companies and accounts, interviewing of substantial number of witnesses, collecting and examining significant volume of material and involvement of other suspects) and the pre-trial investigation did not disclose any period of inertia on the part of the authorities. The length of that phase of the proceedings could not therefore be considered unreasonable. With regard to the length of the court proceedings following the close of the pre-trial investigation, the period spent disposing of the case at three levels, namely, three years and 10 and a half months, could not be regarded as excessive. There had therefore been no breach of A 6(1) in the circumstances of the instant case.

[Application lodged 6.1.1995; Commission report 15.10.1996; Court Judgment 19.2.1998]

Mr François Huber, a secondary school teacher of classics, had been a civil servant in the State education service since 1978. The applicant complained about the length of two sets of administrative proceedings. In the first set of proceedings he had applied to have quashed a decision of 4 November 1990 whereby he had been sent on compulsory leave for one month on the ground that on account of his 'physical or mental state' the children were 'exposed to immediate danger' and a decision of 6 December 1988, whereby payment of his salary had been suspended and to have execution of the latter decision stayed; he also sought to have quashed three decisions of 5 October 1989, whereby he had been sent on extended sick leave and then on extended leave of absence until 6 May 1990. In the second set of proceedings in issue he applied to have quashed the Minister of Education's implicit refusal of his request of 9 August 1991 for a ruling on his administrative position after 6 May 1990 and for payment of an advance on his salary, and also sought a stay of execution of that implicit refusal; he also applied to have quashed two decisions of 6 January 1993 whereby his extended leave of absence was prolonged from 7 May 1990 to 6 November 1992 and he was reinstated in his post at the Lower Secondary School. On 25 November 1996, he had appealed on points of law to the Conseil d'Etat against the Administrative Court of Appeal's judgment and the case was still pending.

The applicant had submitted to the French administrative courts a dispute over a right within the meaning of A 6(1). The only matter in issue was whether that right was a 'civil' one. Disputes relating to the recruitment, careers and termination of service of civil servants were, as a general rule, outside the scope of A 6(1). However, matters were different where the claims in issue related to a purely economic right, such as payment of a salary or pension, or at least an essentially economic one. The applicant's disputes related essentially to his having been sent on compulsory leave and the consequences of that; they therefore primarily concerned his career. The mere fact that the consequences were also partly pecuniary did not suffice to make the proceedings in issue 'civil' ones. A 6(1) therefore did not apply in the present case.

Huber v Switzerland 90/24

[Application lodged 27.2.1987; Commission report 10.4.1989; Court Judgment 23.10.1990]

Mrs Jutta Huber, the applicant, was taken to the District Attorney's office on 11 August 1983 and questioned in connection with a criminal investigation concerning two people suspected of living on the earnings of prostitution and of procuring. The DA, suspecting her of giving false evidence, remanded her in custody for fear of collusion and tampering with evidence. She was released on 19 August 1983. Proceedings were instituted against her by the DA on 12 October 1984. Following her trial on 10 January 1985, she was acquitted on the ground that she had never been validly summonsed to appear as a witness. The prosecution appealed successfully and she was fined. Her further appeals were unsuccessful. She complained that as the same DA had ruled on her detention and then indicted her, he could not be regarded as an 'officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power'.

The only issue in dispute was the impartiality of the Zürich District Attorney when the detention order was made. The applicant did not deny that he was independent of the executive, that he heard her himself before placing her in detention on remand and that he examined with equal care the circumstances militating for and against such detention. The DA first intervened at the stage of the investigation when he ordered the applicant's detention; he had then conducted the investigation. Subsequently, 14 months after the arrest, he acted as prosecuting authority in drawing up the indictment, but had not prosecuted at the trial court. The Convention did not rule out the possibility of the judicial officer who ordered the detention carrying out other duties, but his impartiality was capable of appearing open to doubt if he was entitled to intervene in the subsequent criminal proceedings as a representative of the prosecuting authority. Since that was the situation in the present case, there had been a breach of A 5(3).

Humen v Poland 99/64

[Application lodged 7.4.1994; Commission report 20.5.1998; Court Judgment 15.10.1999]

On 3 May 1982, Mr Edward Humen, the applicant, was arrested by the militia because he had taken part in a street demonstration in Gdañsk. Subsequently, he was detained on remand on suspicion of having participated in an illegal assembly. On 5 January 1983, the Gdañsk Regional Court convicted the applicant of participating in an illegal assembly constituting a violent attack against third persons and public property and sentenced him, under martial law as then in force, to 16 months' imprisonment. On 8 June 1983, the Supreme Court upheld the first instance judgment. On 3 March 1993, a seven judge panel of the Criminal Chamber of the Supreme Court quashed the decisions and acquitted the applicant, finding that he had not committed any offence, but had merely exercised his fundamental civil liberties as 'he had taken part in a peaceful and patriotic demonstration'. On 13 April 1993, the applicant lodged a request for compensation from the State Treasury for his wrongful conviction in 1983 and his unjustified detention which had lasted 249 days. On 6 March 1996, the Regional Court granted the applicant compensation of 6,800 Polish zlotys for pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage. In the absence of appeal, the decision became final and enforceable on 26 March 1996. He complained, inter alia, about the length of the proceedings.

Judges: Mr C Rozakis, President, Mrs E Palm, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mr M Pellonpää, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mr J Makarczyk, Mr R Türmen, Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall, Mrs HS Greve, Mr A Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova.

A 6(1) applied to the case; the proceedings concerned a dispute over the applicant's right to compensation for his wrongful conviction and unjustified detention, which was a civil right within the meaning of A 6(1). The period to be taken into consideration began not on 13 April 1993, when the applicant initiated the proceedings, but on 1 May 1993, when Poland's declaration recognising the right of individual petition for the purposes of former A 25 took effect. The period ended on 26 March 1996, when the decision of the Gdañsk Regional Court became final and enforceable. Accordingly, the proceedings lasted 2 years and nearly 11 months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case, the conduct of the parties, and the importance of what was at stake for the applicant in the litigation. Certain features of the case were complex, the medical evidence assessment of quantum. Only delays attributable to the State could justify a finding of failure to comply with the reasonable time requirement. Although the applicant's conduct in the initial stages could not be regarded as hindering the progress of the proceedings, his subsequent behaviour (failure to submit himself to a brain tomography and inaccurate account of certain facts relating to his employment) was not consistent with the diligence which should normally be shown by a claimant. By the time the applicant initiated the compensation proceedings, his reputation, in so far as it had been damaged by the wrongful and politically motivated conviction, had already been restored as a result of the fact that his conviction had been quashed by the Supreme Court. All that was at stake in those proceedings was, therefore, a compensation claim. It had taken the Gdañsk Regional Court 14 months to prepare the applicant's case for the first hearing, however, except for that instance of failure to make progress in the proceedings, the Court did not find any substantial period of inactivity for which the authorities could be held responsible. During the period under consideration, the case was twice heard at first instance and once on appeal. The hearings were held at reasonable intervals and adjourned only when it was necessary to obtain evidence. When the case was adjourned for about a year (from 17 June 1994), the Gdañsk Regional Court did not remain passive, it obtained extensive medical and documentary evidence and supervised the experts' work and made efforts to ensure that the process of obtaining evidence followed its proper course. Therefore, on the whole, the authorities did not fail to act with all due diligence in the conduct of the applicant's case. The length of the proceedings complained of could not be regarded as unreasonable.

Hurtado v Switzerland 94/1

[Application lodged 30.10.1990; Commission report 8.7.1993; Court Judgment 28.1.1994]

Mr Antonio Hurtado, a Colombian national, was arrested by six officers of the Vaud cantonal police on 5 October 1989. They had thrown a stun grenade before entering the flat, forcing him to the ground and handcuffing and hooding him. It was alleged that they then proceeded to beat him until he lost consciousness. He was questioned at the police headquarters and was not able to change his clothes, which had been dirtied during the police action, until his arrival at the prison on the evening of 6 October. He was examined by a doctor on 13 October; X-rays were taken on 16 October which revealed a fracture of the anterior arch of a rib. His complaint alleging actual bodily harm and abuse of official authority was dismissed by an investigating judge on the ground that there was no case to answer. That decision was upheld by the Federal Court. On 24 May 1991, the District Criminal Court sentenced him to five years' imprisonment for a serious breach of the Federal Dangerous Drugs Act and ordered him to pay part of the costs. It also directed that he be expelled from Swiss territory and banned from re-entering for 15 years. On 7 October, the Criminal Division of the Vaud Cantonal Court increased the prison sentence to eight years. The applicant complained about his treatment in detention.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement concluded between the Government and the applicant and discerned no reason of public policy militating against striking the case out of the list.

Hussain v United Kingdom (1996) 22 EHRR 1 96/8

[Application lodged 31.3.1993; Commission report 11.10.1994; Court Judgment 21.2.1996]

Mr Abed Hussain, the applicant, then aged 16, was convicted on 12 December 1978 of the murder of his younger brother, aged two. He received a mandatory sentence of detention 'during Her Majesty's pleasure', the effect of which was to render him liable to be detained in such a place and under such conditions as the Secretary of State for the Home Department directed. The Court of Appeal dismissed his appeal on 5 March 1980. In 1986, the applicant's tariff was set at 15 years by the Secretary of State after a confidential process of consultation involving the trial judge and the Lord Chief Justice. In the course of the applicant's detention, the Parole Board considered whether or not to recommend the applicant's release on four occasions. The applicant complained that, under the current regulations, he had no right to a periodic review by a court of his continued detention, the ultimate decision as to his release lay with the executive, he had no right to an oral hearing or to question or call witnesses, he had no acknowledged right to see the reports before the Parole Board and that he had been irrationally discriminated against on the basis of his status as a person convicted of murder.

Court unanimously found V 5(4), not necessary to examine A 14.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr R Macdonald, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr P Jambrek.

As the applicant's complaint of the secretive and unfair manner in which his tariff had been established was not dealt with by the Commission and his punitive period had expired, the Court did not consider it necessary to examine that complaint.

On all the evidence, the applicant's sentence, after the expiration of his tariff, was more comparable to a discretionary life sentence. The decisive ground for the applicant's continued detention was and continued to be his dangerousness to society, a characteristic susceptible to change with the passage of time. Accordingly, new issues of lawfulness may arise in the course of detention and the applicant was entitled under A 5(4) to take proceedings to have those issues decided by a court at reasonable intervals. A 5(4) did not guarantee a right to judicial control of such scope as to empower the 'court' on all aspects of the case, including questions of expediency, to substitute its own discretion for that of the decision making authority; the review, nevertheless, had to be wide enough to bear on those conditions which, according to the Convention, were essential for the lawful detention of a person subject to the special type of deprivation of liberty ordered against the applicant. The Parole Board did not satisfy the requirements of A 5(4). It could not order the release of a prisoner. In addition, the lack of adversarial proceedings before the Parole Board also prevented it from being regarded as a court or court-like body for the purposes of A 5(4). In matters of such crucial importance as the deprivation of liberty and where questions arose which involved, for example, an assessment of the applicant's character or mental state, it could be essential to the fairness of the proceedings that the applicant be present at an oral hearing. In a situation such as that of the applicant, where a substantial term of imprisonment may be at stake and where characteristics pertaining to his personality and level of maturity were of importance in deciding on his dangerousness, A 5(4) required an oral hearing in the context of an adversarial procedure involving legal representation and the possibility of calling and questioning witnesses. Proceedings for judicial review did not provide a substitute, as A 5(4) presupposed the existence of a procedure in conformity with its requirements without the necessity of instituting separate legal proceedings in order to bring it about. In addition, the applicant's possibility of obtaining an oral hearing by way of proceedings for judicial review was not sufficiently certain to be regarded as satisfying the requirements of A 5(4). There had been a violation of A 5(4) in that the applicant, after the expiry of his tariff, was unable to bring the case of his continued detention during Her Majesty's pleasure before a court with the powers and procedural guarantees satisfying that provision.

The applicant did not make any reference to his complaint under A 14, and since no separate issues appeared to arise under that provision, the Court saw no reason to entertain it of its own motion.

Judgment constituted just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (GBP 19,000 less FF 14,475).

[Application lodged 9.8.1984; Commission report 14.12.1988; Court Judgment 24.4.1990]

Mr Jacques Huvig and his wife Janine ran a wholesale fruit and vegetable business. On 20 December 1973, the Director of the Tax Office lodged a complaint against the applicants and other persons alleging tax evasion, failure to make entries in accounts and false accounting. Mr and Mrs Huvig's home was searched, as were their business premises, pursuant to a warrant issued on 14 March 1974 by the investigating judge. The judge also issued a warrant to the gendarmerie requiring them to monitor and transcribe all Mr and Mrs Huvig's telephone calls, both business and private ones, on that day and the next day. The applicants complained, inter alia, that the tapping was in violation of A 8.

Commission found by majority (10–2) V 8.

Court held unanimously V 8.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans.

The telephone tapping amounted to an interference by a public authority with the applicants' right to respect for their correspondence and private life. 'Prescribed by law' covered not only statute, but also unwritten law. 'In accordance with the law' required the measure to have some basis in domestic law; it referred to the quality of the law and required it to be accessible, foreseeable and compatible with the rule of law. The interference had a basis in French law, in the Code of Criminal Procedure. There was no problem with accessibility, but difficulties with foreseeability. Regarding the quality of evidence, there had to be protection against arbitrary interference by public authorities, sufficient clarity, and the scope of any discretion had to be indicated. There were some safeguards in the Code and in judgments, but there were not adequate safeguards against various possible abuses. There was no definition of the categories of people who could have their phones tapped or the offences which could give rise to such an order. There was no limit on the duration of the tapping. The procedure for drawing up summary reports of the intercepted conversations was not specified. The precautions for communicating the recordings and their handling and circumstances for their destruction were also unspecified. French law did not indicate with reasonable clarity the scope and manner of the discretion on the authorities and did not provide the applicants with a minimum degree of protection to which they were entitled under the rule of law in a democratic society. The applicants suffered little or no harm as the tapping did not serve as a basis for the prosecution, but a violation was conceivable even in the absence of any detriment. There had, therefore, been a breach of A 8.

Neither compensation nor costs and expenses sought before the Court.

IA v France 98/86

[Application lodged 29.3.1993; Commission report 10.9.1997; Court Judgment 23.9.1998.]

The applicant, who was born in Beirut, married a young Lebanese woman, who became his second wife. On 21 June 1991, the body of his wife was found at the harbour mouth. The applicant had reported her disappearance in August 1991. When he was interviewed in September, he had stated that his wife had left him in June. He then claimed that she had killed herself, and that fearing the reactions of his wife's family, he had disposed of the body. In December 1991, the investigating judge charged the applicant with murder and made a provisional order for his imprisonment. The judge made an order for his detention on remand a few days later. Over the course of the investigation, various experts were consulted and detailed inquiries were made. The applicant made numerous applications for release, all of which were rejected. In January 1996, the applicant was committed for trial for murder. An appeal against this decision was rejected in June. At the hearing in December 1996, the court adjourned the case, in response to an application from the applicant, who objected to being tried in the absence of two witnesses and an expert who had all been summonsed. In March 1997, the court sentenced the applicant to life imprisonment, with ineligibility for parole during the first 18 years. The applicant appealed, and in April 1998, the judgment was quashed and declared null and void, on the ground that the court had misapplied a relevant provision, and the case was remitted to another Assize Court. In April and May 1998, the applicant lodged applications for release, which respectively were withdrawn and dismissed. The applicant complained, under A 6(1), of the excessive length of the criminal proceedings against him and, under A 5(3), of his detention on remand.

Comm found unanimously V 5(3) and NV 6(1).

Court held unanimously V 5(3) and NV 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr L-E Pettiti (c), Mr R MacDonald, Mr J De Meyer, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr AB Baka, Mr E Levits.

A 5(3): The period to be considered had begun on the day when the applicant was charged with murder and placed in detention on remand. In principle, conviction by a court marked the end of the period to be considered under A 5(3); from that point on, the detention of the person concerned fell within the scope of A 5(1)(a). The period to be considered under A 5(3) ended on 20 March 1997: just over five years and three months. It fell in the first place to the national judicial authorities to ensure that the pre-trial detention of an accused person did not exceed a reasonable time. The persistence of reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence was a condition sine qua non for the validity of the continued detention, but, after a certain lapse of time, it no longer sufficed; the Court had to then establish whether the other grounds cited by the judicial authorities continued to justify the deprivation of liberty. Where such grounds were 'relevant' and 'sufficient', the Court also had to ascertain whether the competent national authorities displayed special diligence in the conduct of the proceedings. The French courts ruled on the applicant's detention on remand 57 times at first instance and five times on appeal. The grounds for their decisions referred to the Code of Criminal Procedure, under which detention on remand could not be ordered or extended unless it was the sole means of preserving evidence, of preventing pressure being brought to bear on witnesses or victims, of preventing collusion between persons under investigation and accomplices, was necessary to protect the person concerned, to put an end to the offence or prevent its repetition, to ensure that the person concerned remained at the disposal of the judicial authorities, or to preserve public order from the disturbance caused by the offence. To have been compatible with the Convention, the considerable length of the deprivation of liberty suffered by the applicant should have been based on particularly convincing justifications. The initial relevance of the grounds cited by the French courts for their decisions as to the continuation of the applicant's detention did not stand the test of time. Through its excessive length, the detention breached A 5(3).

A 6(1): The period to be taken into consideration began on the date when the applicant was charged; the proceedings had not yet ended, and to date lasted approximately six years and nine months. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the circumstances of the case, regard being had to the criteria laid down in the case-law, in particular, the complexity of the case, the applicant's conduct and that of the competent authorities. In the present case, the stage of the proceedings subsequent to the judgment committing the applicant for trial (24 January 1996) could not be seriously criticised from the standpoint of A 6(1). The length of the preparatory investigation, more than four years and six months, raised questions. The conduct of the judicial authorities handling the investigation was not exempt from criticism. The late transmission of the case to the investigating judge slowed down the progress of the proceedings. Nevertheless, the case was sufficiently complex factually to explain certain delays. In addition, although the applicant could not be criticised for lodging applications for his release, however numerous, or for constantly denying that he had committed murder, he too substantially contributed to the protractedness of the investigation. Having regard to the evidence and considering the proceedings as matters stood on the date of judgment, there had been no breach of A 6(1).

No compensation required for any prejudice. Costs and expenses (FF 25,000).

IS v Slovakia 00/113

[Application lodged 3.5.1994; Commission report 27.10.1998; Court Judgment 4.4.2000]

The applicant and four other persons lodged an action for restitution of land against two State enterprises. On 24 January 1992, a judge of the District Court invited the defendants to submit written observations on the merits of the action. The case was dealt with at two jurisdictional levels. On 8 April 1999, the Regional Court found in the applicant's favour. On 31 May 1999, the judgment was sent to the parties and on 7 June 1999 it became final. The applicant complained, inter alia, about the length of the proceedings.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1).

Court unanimously dismissed Government's preliminary objections, found V 6(1).

Judges: Mr C Rozakis, President, Mr M Fischbach, Mr B Conforti, Mr G Bonello, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr A Baka, Mr E Levits.

The rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies obliged those seeking to bring their case against the State before an international judicial body to use first the remedies provided by the national legal system, thus dispensing States from answering before an international body for their acts before they have had an opportunity to put matters right through their own legal systems. In order to comply with the rule, normal recourse should be had by an applicant to remedies which were available and sufficient to afford redress in respect of the breaches alleged. Moreover, an applicant who had exhausted a remedy that was apparently effective and sufficient could not be required also to have tried others that were available, but probably no more likely to be successful. The mere fact that the applicant did not complain about the delay referring to the domestic Act could not in the circumstances of the case lead to the conclusion that the applicant had failed to comply with the rule on exhaustion of domestic remedies. Consequently, Government's preliminary objection dismissed. The Government had not raised the objection of failure to observe the six month time limit before the Commission and were therefore estopped from raising it before the Court.

The proceedings were brought on 19 November 1991. However, the relevant period began on 18 March 1992, when the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic ratified the Convention and recognised the right of individual petition. The proceedings ended on 31 May 1999 when the decision of the Regional Court of 8 April 1999 was sent to the parties. In order to determine the reasonableness of the length of time in question, regard had to be had to the state of the case on 18 March 1992. The proceedings lasted seven years, six months, two days for two sets at two levels of jurisdiction each, out of which seven years, two months, 13 days were taken into consideration by the Court. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed in the light of the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law, in particular the complexity of the case and the conduct of the applicant and of the authorities. The restitution proceedings raised a complex issue of a factual nature which contributed to some extent to the overall length of the proceedings. The applicant's conduct contributed to the delay. The authorities had been responsible for some delay. There had been a violation of A 6(1).

No claim submitted for just satisfaction.

[Application lodged 28.3.1996; Commission report 16.4.1998; Court Judgment 25.3.1999]

In 1978, the Ilioupolis open-air cinema was leased to the applicant, who completely restored it. On 16 November 1988, the State Lands Authority assigned the cinema to Ilioupolis Town Council. The applicant was served with an eviction order and the Ilioupolis Town Council seized possession of the cinema. The applicant challenged the eviction order in the Athens District Court, which found for the State. The applicant appealed to the Athens Court of First Instance which, on 23 October 1989, quashed the eviction order. The Minister of Finance refused to return the property. Despite continuing litigation, the cinema was still being operated by Ilioupolis Town Council and had not been returned to the applicant. The applicant had not set up business elsewhere. He complained of a breach of P1A1.

Comm found by majority (14–1) V 13, V P1A1, unanimously not necessary to examine 6(1), 8.

Court dismissed by majority (16–1) Government's preliminary objection that domestic remedies had not been exhausted, unanimously Government's preliminary objection that the six month time limit had not been observed, found unanimously V P1A1, by majority (16–1) V 13, unanimously not necessary to rule on 6(1), 8.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Jörundsson, Mr L Caflisch, Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach, Mr J Casadevall, Mr B Zupancic, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs W Thomassen, Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska, Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja, Mr C Yeraris (pd), ad hoc judge.

The only remedies A 35 required to be exhausted were those that were available and sufficient and related to the breaches alleged. The applicant could not be criticised for not having made use of a legal remedy which would have been directed to essentially the same end as the one already taken and which, moreover, would not have had a better prospect of success. An action for damages would not have been an alternative to the measures which the Greek legal system should have afforded the applicant to overcome the fact that he was unable to regain possession of the cinema despite a court decision quashing the eviction order. A 35 required the exhaustion only of remedies that related to the breaches alleged: suing a private individual could not be regarded as such a remedy in respect of an act on the part of the State. Accordingly, the objection was dismissed. The Minister of Finance's refusal to comply with the decision of the Court of First Instance had led to a continuing situation, so that the six month rule did not apply. In addition, the applicant did not receive a copy of the State Lands Authority's opinion until 7 November 1995 and he lodged his request for the Minister to approve the recommendation on 15 November. In lodging his application with the Commission on 28 March 1996, he had complied with the six month time limit. The objection was therefore dismissed.

The concept of 'possessions' in P1A1 had an autonomous meaning which was not limited to ownership of physical goods: certain other rights and interests constituting assets could also be regarded as 'property rights', and thus as 'possessions' for the purposes of the provision. The applicant, who had a specific licence to operate the cinema he had rented, was evicted from it by Ilioupolis Town Council. Despite a judicial decision quashing the eviction order, the applicant could not regain possession of the cinema because the Minister of Finance refused to revoke the assignment of it to the Council. There had therefore been an interference with the applicant's property rights. Since he held only a lease of his business premises, the interference neither amounted to an expropriation nor was an instance of controlling the use of property, but came under the first sentence of the first paragraph of P1A1. Any interference by a public authority with the peaceful enjoyment of possessions had to be lawful. Moreover, the rule of law, one of the fundamental principles of a democratic society, was inherent in all the articles of the Convention and entailed a duty on the part of the State or other public authority to comply with judicial orders or decisions against it. The applicant's eviction on 17 March 1989 had a legal basis in domestic law. However, on 23 October 1989, the Athens Court of First Instance heard the case under summary procedure and quashed the eviction order on the grounds that the conditions for issuing it had not been satisfied. No appeal lay against that decision. From that moment on, the applicant's eviction thus ceased to have any legal basis and the Town Council became an unlawful occupier and should have returned the cinema to the applicant. The interference was manifestly in breach of Greek law and accordingly incompatible with the applicant's right to peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. It was unnecessary, therefore, to ascertain whether a fair balance had been struck between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. There had been a violation of P1A1.

The complaint under A 13 arose out of the same facts as those examined when dealing with the objection of non-exhaustion and the complaints under P1A1. However, there was a difference in the nature of the interests protected by A 13 and P1A1: the former afforded a procedural safeguard, namely the right to an effective remedy, whereas the procedural requirement inherent in the latter was ancillary to the wider purpose of ensuring respect for the right to peaceful enjoyment of possessions. The remedy required by A 13 had to be effective in practice as well as in law, in particular in the sense that its exercise must not be unjustifiably hindered by the acts or omissions of the authorities of the respondent State. In the light of the Minister of Finance's refusal to comply with the judgment of the Court of First Instance in this case, the remedy in question could not be regarded as 'effective' under A 13 and there had therefore been a violation .

The applicant's complaints under A 8 and 6(1) were essentially the same as those under P1A1 and A 13 respectively. It was therefore not necessary to examine the complaints under A 8 and 6(1) separately, as in this case the requirements of those articles are subsumed under those of P1A1 and A 13.

The applicant was a limited company in the process of liquidation. By a writ served on 26 September and 2 October 1980, the applicant company took proceedings before the Taranto District Court against Mr N, its debtor, and Others. By a decision of 13 February 1987, the applicant's claim was dismissed on account of Mr N's bankruptcy. On 27 April 1989, the Court of Appeal upheld the appealed decision by a ruling filed with the court registry on 10 June 1989. No appeal was lodged in the Court of Cassation. The applicant company complained about the length of the civil proceedings.

The period to be taken into consideration began on 26 September 1980, when the proceedings were instituted against Mr N in the Taranto District Court, and ended on 10 June 1990, when the judgment of the Court of Appeal became final. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings had to be assessed with reference to the criteria laid down in the Court's case-law and in the light of the circumstances of the case. The applicant had contributed to the slowness of some of the proceedings. However, there were several long periods of stagnation and delay on the part of the courts. The lapse of time in the case could not be regarded as reasonable.

Ignaccolo-Zenide v Romania 00/12

[Application lodged 22.1.1996; Commission report 9.9.1998; Court Judgment 25.1.2000]

Mrs Ignaccolo-Zenide, a French national, and her husband DZ, who held French and Romanian nationality, had two children. Following their divorce, a French court ruled that the children were to live with her. During the 1990 holidays, the children went to stay with DZ, who was living in the US. At the end of the holidays he refused to return the children to the applicant. He changed his address several times and then fled to Romania in March 1994. On 14 December 1994, the Bucharest Court of First Instance issued an injunction ordering that the children be returned to the applicant. The applicant's efforts to have the injunction enforced proved unsuccessful. Since 1990, she had seen her children only once, at a meeting organised by the Romanian authorities on 29 January 1997. The applicant complained that the failure of the Romanian authorities to enforce the injunction of the First Instance Court amounted to a breach of her right to respect for family life.

Court found by majority (6–1) V 8.

Judges: Mrs E Palm, President, Mr J Casadevall, Mr Gaukur Jörundsson, Mr R Türmen, Mrs W Thomassen, Mr R Maruste (pd), Mrs A Diculescu-Sova (pd), ad hoc judge.

A 8 included a right for parents to have measures taken with a view to their being reunited with their children and an obligation for the national authorities to take such measures. That obligation was not absolute, since some preparation might be needed prior to the reunion of a parent with a child who had been living for any length of time with the other parent. The nature and extent of the preparation depended on the circumstances of each case and any obligation the authorities had to apply coercion was limited since the interests and rights and freedoms of all concerned, particularly the paramount interests of the child and his rights under A 8, had to be taken into account. Where contact with the parent might threaten those interests or interfere with those rights, it was for the national authorities to strike a fair balance between them. The positive obligation which A 8 imposed on Contracting States to help reunite parents with their children had to be construed in the light of the Hague Convention of 25 October 1980 on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction. Although the first attempts of enforcement of the injunction were made promptly in December 1994, only two attempts were made in 1995. No action was taken between December 1995 and January 1997. In addition, the authorities had not done any preparation for the enforcement of the order. No social workers or psychologists had been involved in the preparation of the meeting of 29 January 1997. The authorities had not implemented the measures set out in the Hague Convention to secure the childrens' return to the applicant. The authorities had failed to take adequate and sufficient steps to comply with the applicant's right to the return of her children and had therefore infringed her right to respect for her family life.

Ilhan v Turkey 00/171

[Application lodged 24.6.1993; Commission report 23.4.1999; Court Judgment 27.6.2000]

On 26 December 1992, gendarmes carried out an operation at Aytepe village. The applicant's brother Abdüllatif Ilhan and another villager saw the soldiers approaching the village and hid. The gendarmes found both men hiding under the bushes and trees in the garden area. The applicant claimed that his brother was beaten, kicked and hit with rifle butts, including being hit on the head. They were taken to the gendarme station where statements were taken. On 27 December, Abdüllatif was taken to hospital. He was said to be in a life threatening situation. On 11 February 1993, the public prosecutor, without interviewing Abdüllatif, the other villager or any gendarme who had witnessed the alleged accident, issued a decision not to prosecute, stating that the injury resulted from an accident for which no one was at fault, either intentionally or negligently. On the same day, the public prosecutor drew up an indictment charging Abdüllatif Ilhan with the offence of resistance to officers by running away from the security forces during the operation and ignoring their orders to stop. On 30 March 1993, Abdüllatif appeared before the Mardin Justice of the Peace Court which found him guilty and sentenced him to a fine of TKL 35,000, which was suspended. The applicant Nasir Ilhan complained, inter alia, that his brother had been the victim of life threatening assault and torture, that he was not given necessary medical treatment, and that he did not have any effective remedy in respect of these matters.

Court dismissed unanimously the Government's preliminary objections, found by majority (12–5) NV 2, unanimously V 3, 13.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mr J-P Costa, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr G Bonello (jpd), Mr J Makarczyk, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens (jpd), Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall (jpd), Mrs N Vajic (jpd), Mrs HS Greve (jpd), Mr AB Baka, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova, Mr M Ugrekhelidze, Mr F Gölcüklü (d), ad hoc judge.

The rules of admissibility had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism and the Convention generally had to be interpreted and applied so as to make its safeguards practical and effective The system of individual petition under A 34 excluded applications by way of actio popularis; complaints had to be brought by or on behalf of persons who claimed to be victims of a violation of the Convention. Such persons had to be able to show that they were 'directly affected' by the measure complained of. Victim status could exist even where there was no damage, damage being an issue relevant under A 41. Although Abdüllatif was the immediate victim of the alleged assault and ill-treatment in the present case, the applicant's application made it clear that he was complaining on behalf of his brother and that his brother, due to his health, was not in a position to pursue the application himself. The fact that Nasir used his own name as that of the applicant rather than that of his brother did not disclose an abuse of the Convention system as Abdüllatif consented to the proceedings, gave evidence before the Convention delegates and there was no apparent conflict of interest arising from the applicant's involvement on behalf of his brother. Special considerations could arise where a victim of an alleged violation of A 2 and 3 at the hands of the security forces was still suffering from serious after-effects to his health. Having regard, therefore, to the special circumstances of this case, where Abdüllatif could claim to have been in a particularly vulnerable position, the applicant could be regarded as having validly introduced the application on his behalf. Accordingly, the Government's preliminary objection in that respect was dismissed. The rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies obliged applicants to use first the remedies that were normally available and sufficient in the domestic legal system to enable them to obtain redress for the breaches alleged. The existence of the remedies had to be sufficiently certain, in practice as well as in theory, failing which they would lack the requisite accessibility and effectiveness. A 35(1) also required that the complaints intended to be brought subsequently before the Court should have been made to the appropriate domestic body, at least in substance and in compliance with the formal requirements laid down in domestic law, but not that recourse should be had to remedies which were inadequate or ineffective. A 35(1) had to be applied with some degree of flexibility and without excessive formalism. It was neither absolute nor capable of being applied automatically; for the purposes of reviewing whether it has been observed, it was essential to have regard to the circumstances of the individual case. With respect to an action in administrative law based on the authorities' strict liability, a Contracting State's obligation under A 2, 3 and 13 of the Convention to conduct an investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible in cases of fatal assault, or A 3 treatment, might be rendered illusory if in respect of complaints under those articles an applicant were to be required to exhaust an administrative law action leading only to an award of damages. Consequently, the applicant was not required to bring the administrative proceedings in question and the preliminary objection was, in that respect, unfounded. As regards a civil action for redress for damage sustained through illegal acts or patently unlawful conduct on the part of State agents, a plaintiff had to identify the person believed to have committed the tort as well as establishing a causal link between the tort and the damage sustained. The public prosecutor had not taken any steps to identify who was present or involved in the incident and it was not apparent that there was any basis on which Abdüllatif could have pursued a civil claim with any reasonable prospect of success. With regard to the criminal law remedies, the public prosecutor had chosen not to make any inquiry as to the circumstances in which the injuries were caused. The Government's preliminary objections as regards civil and criminal law remedies were therefore dismissed.

A 2: The force used against Abdüllatif was not in the event lethal, although that did not exclude an examination of the applicant's complaints under A 2. The criminal responsibility of those concerned in the use of force was not in issue in the proceedings; nonetheless, the degree and type of force used and the unequivocal intention or aim behind the use of force might, amongst other factors, be relevant in assessing whether in a particular case the State agents' actions in inflicting injury short of death had to be regarded as incompatible with the object and purpose of A 2. In almost all cases where a person was assaulted or maltreated by police or soldiers, their complaints would fall to be examined rather under A 3. Abdüllatif suffered brain damage following at least one blow to the head by a rifle butt inflicted by gendarmes who had been ordered to apprehend him during an operation and who kicked and beat him when they found him hiding. Medical reports had identified the head injury as being of a life threatening character. The seriousness of his injury was therefore not in doubt. However, the use of force applied by the gendarmes was not of such a nature or degree as to breach A 2. Nor did any separate issue arise in this context concerning the alleged lack of prompt medical treatment for his injuries. There had therefore been no violation of A 2 concerning the infliction of injuries on Abdüllatif. In the light of that conclusion, it was not necessary to examine the allegations under A 2 of the Convention that there was a failure on the part of the authorities to protect Abdüllatif's right to life or to conduct an effective investigation into the use of force.

A 3: Ill-treatment had to attain a minimum level of severity to fall within the scope of A 3. The assessment of that minimum was relative: it depended on all the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment, its physical and/or mental effects and, in some cases, the sex, age and state of health of the victim. Having regard to the severity of the ill-treatment suffered by Abdüllatif and the surrounding circumstances, including the significant lapse in time before he received proper medical attention, he was a victim of very serious and cruel suffering that could be characterised as torture. There had therefore been a breach of A 3 in this regard.

The notion of effective remedy included the duty to carry out a thorough and effective investigation capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible for any ill-treatment and permitting effective access for the complainant to the investigatory procedure. Whether it was appropriate or necessary to find a procedural breach of A 3 would depend on the circumstances of the particular case. In the present case, the complaints concerning the lack of any effective investigation by the authorities into the cause of his injuries fell to be dealt with under A 13. The Government were responsible under A 3 for ill-treatment of Abdüllatif amounting to torture. The authorities had an obligation to carry out an effective investigation into the circumstances in which Abdüllatif received his injuries. There had been inadequate action on the part of the public prosecutor and the medical report had been deficient. On the evidence, no effective criminal investigation could be considered to have been conducted in accordance with A 13. Therefore, no effective remedy had been provided in respect of Abdüllatif's injuries and thereby access to any other available remedies, including a claim for compensation, had also been denied.

Imbrioscia v Switzerland (1994) 17 EHRR 441 93/51

[Application lodged 5.5.1988; Commission report 14.5.1992; Court Judgment 24.11.1993]

Mr Franco Imbrioscia, an Italian commercial traveller, was arrested at Zürich airport on a Bangkok flight and charged with drugs offences. On 8 February, Ms BG, through someone known to the applicant, wrote to him offering to represent him. He agreed, but on 25 February she withdrew as his lawyer. On the same day, Mr Fischer was officially assigned to act for the applicant. The applicant was interrogated and committed for trial. He was convicted of offences against the dangerous drugs legislation and sentenced to seven years' imprisonment and banned from residing in Switzerland for 15 years as well being ordered to pay costs. His appeals to the Zürich Court of Appeal and Court of Cassation were dismissed. He complained, inter alia, that he had not been assisted by a lawyer during most of his interrogations and that the lawyer had not attended the examination of various witnesses in Italy.

Comm found by majority (9–5) NV 6(1) and (3)(c).

Court found by majority (6–3) NV 6(1)+6(3)(c).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti (d), Mr J De Meyer (d), Mr I Foighel, Mr Pekkanen, Mr AB Baka, Mr MA Lopes Rocha (d), Mr L Wildhaber.

The primary purpose of A 6 as far as criminal matters were concerned was to ensure a fair trial by a tribunal competent to determine any criminal charge, however, it did not follow that A 6 had no application to pre-trial proceedings. The requirements of A 6, especially of A 6(3), could be relevant before a case was sent for trial if and in so far as the fairness of the trial was likely to be seriously prejudiced by an initial failure to comply with them. A 6(3)(c) did not specify the manner of exercising the right. Contracting States were left the choice of the means of ensuring that it was secured in their judicial systems, the Court's task being only to ascertain whether the method they had chosen was consistent with the requirements of a fair trial. The Convention was designed to guarantee not rights that were theoretical or illusory, but rights that were practical and effective and assigning a counsel did not in itself ensure the effectiveness of the assistance he might afford an accused. The manner in which A 6(1) and 6(3)(c) were to be applied during the preliminary investigation depended on the special features of the proceedings involved and on the circumstances of the case. In order to determine whether the aim of A 6 had been achieved, regard had to be had to the entirety of the domestic proceedings conducted in the case. The applicant did not have the necessary legal support at the outset. However, a State could not be held responsible for every shortcoming on the part of a lawyer appointed for legal aid purposes or chosen by the accused. Owing to the legal profession's independence, the conduct of the defence was essentially a matter between the defendant and his representative; under A 6(3)(c), Contracting States were required to intervene only if a failure by counsel to provide effective representation was manifest or sufficiently brought to their attention. Since the period in question was so short and the applicant had not complained about Ms BG's inactivity, the relevant authorities could not be expected to intervene. When she informed them of her withdrawal, they immediately officially assigned a lawyer for his defence. Mr Fischer had visited his client in prison on 1 March, soon after receiving the file. When he returned it to the district prosecutor on 4 March, he did not raise the issue of the non-attendance by a lawyer at the earlier interrogations of which he had inspected the transcripts. Although Mr Fischer did not attend the first two interviews with the district prosecutor, he was given the opportunity to do so; he had been given the relevant transcripts of the investigation, the applicant was able to talk to his counsel before and after each interview. The hearings in the Bülach District Court and the Zürich Court of Appeal were attended by adequate safeguards; the judges heard the applicant in the presence of his lawyer, who had every opportunity to examine him and his co-defendant and to challenge the prosecution's submissions in his address. A scrutiny of the proceedings as a whole therefore led the Court to hold that the applicant was not denied a fair trial. There had not been a breach of A 6(1) and 6(3)(c).

Immobiliare Saffi v Italy 99/47

[Application lodged 23.9.1993; Commission report 2.12.1999; Court Judgment 28.7.1999]

Immobiliare Saffi, a construction company, became the owner of an apartment in Livorno in 1988 following a corporate merger. The tenancy on the apartment had expired on 31 December 1993 and, although an order for possession had been made by the Livorno magistrate, the tenant had refused to vacate the premises. The bailiff made 11 unsuccessful attempts to recover possession. Under the statutory provisions providing for the suspension or staggering of evictions, the applicant company was not entitled to police assistance. The applicant company did not repossess the apartment until 11 April 1996, following the death of the tenant. The applicant company complained under P1A1 and A 6(1) that over a lengthy period it had been unable to enforce the order for possession.

Comm found by majority (28–1) V P1A1, unanimously V 6(1) as regards the right of access to a tribunal, no separate question arose under A 6(1) as regards the length of the eviction proceedings.

Court dismissed Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously V P1A1, 6(1).

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mr M Pellonpää, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr P Kûris, Mr R Türmen, Mr J-P Costa, Mrs F Tulkens, Mrs V Stráznická, Mr M Fischbach, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Casadevall, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs HS Greve, Mr R Maruste, Mrs S Botoucharova.

As there was no basis for challenging the criteria for establishing priority (regarding requests for police assistance in enforcing possession orders after 1 January 1990), an application to the administrative courts could not be regarded as having been an effective remedy. In the Italian legal system, an individual was not entitled to apply directly to the Constitutional Court for review of a law's constitutionality. Accordingly, such an application could not be a remedy whose exhaustion was required under A 35. The Government's preliminary objection regarding non-exhaustion therefore had to be dismissed.

P1A1: The implementation of the legislative measures allowed the tenant to continue to occupy the apartment and therefore amounted to control of the use of property. Accordingly, the second paragraph of P1A1 was applicable. The impugned legislation had a legitimate aim in the general interest, as the simultaneous eviction of a large number of tenants would undoubtedly have led to considerable social tension and jeopardised public order. An interference, particularly one falling to be considered under the second paragraph of P1A1, had to strike a 'fair balance' between the demands of the general interest and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights. There had to be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim pursued and States enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation in that regard. That was so in spheres such as housing, which played a central role in the welfare and economic policies of modern societies. In principle, a system of temporary suspension or staggering of the enforcement of court orders followed by the reinstatement of the landlord in his property was not in itself open to criticism, having regard in particular to the margin of appreciation permitted under the second paragraph of P1A1. However, such a system carried with it the risk of imposing on landlords an excessive burden in terms of their ability to dispose of their property and had accordingly to provide certain procedural safeguards so as to ensure that the operation of the system and its impact on a landlord's property rights were neither arbitrary nor unforeseeable. The Italian system suffered from a degree of inflexibility: by providing that cases in which the lease had been terminated on the ground that the landlord urgently needed to recover the apartment for himself or his family should always be given priority, it automatically made the enforcement of non-urgent orders for possession dependent on there being no requests warranting priority treatment. It followed that, since there were always a large number of priority requests outstanding, non-urgent orders were in practice never enforced after January 1990. The provision of police assistance, which the prefect determined by reference to an order of priority, therefore ended up depending almost entirely on the volume of prior-ranking requests for police assistance and the number of police officers at the prefect's disposal. For approximately 11 years, the applicant company was thus left in a state of uncertainty as to when it would be able to repossess its apartment. It could not apply to either the judge dealing with the enforcement proceedings or the administrative court, nor had it any means of compelling the Government to take into account any particular difficulties it might encounter as a result of the delay in the eviction. It had no prospect of obtaining compensation through the Italian courts for its protracted wait, during which it was unable to sell or let the apartment at market value. Nothing in the file suggested that the tenant occupying the applicant company's premises deserved any special protection. In the circumstances, the system of staggering the enforcement of orders for possession, coupled with what had already been a six-year wait because of the statutory suspension of the enforcement of such orders, imposed an excessive burden on the applicant company and accordingly upset the balance that had to be struck between the protection of the right of property and the requirements of the general interest. Consequently, there had been a violation of P1A1.

A 6(1): Execution of a judgment given by any court had to be regarded as an integral part of the trial for the purposes of A 6 and therefore A 6 was applicable in the present case. The right to a court as guaranteed by A 6 also protected the implementation of final, binding judicial decisions, which could not remain inoperative to the detriment of one party. Accordingly, the execution of a judicial decision could not be unduly delayed. A stay of execution of a judicial decision for such period as was strictly necessary to enable a satisfactory solution to be found to public order problems could be justified in exceptional circumstances. The present case did not concern an isolated refusal by the prefect to provide police assistance. The enforcement of the order was stayed after January 1990 as a result of the intervention of the legislature, which reopened the magistrate's decision regarding the date by which the tenant was required to vacate the premises. The postponement of the date by which the premises had to be vacated rendered nugatory the Livorno magistrate's decision on that point. The assessment of whether it was appropriate subsequently to stay enforcement of the order for possession and therefore de facto to extend the lease, was not subject to any effective review by the courts, since the scope of judicial review of the prefect's decision was limited to verifying whether he had complied with the criteria governing the order of priority. Although Contracting States might, in exceptional circumstances, avail themselves of their margin of appreciation to control the use of property and intervene in proceedings for the enforcement of a judicial decision, the consequence of such intervention should not be that execution was prevented, invalidated or unduly delayed or, still less, that the substance of the decision was undermined. In the present case, the impugned legislation rendered nugatory the Livorno magistrate's ruling and from the moment the prefect became the authority responsible for determining when the order for possession would be enforced, and in the light of the fact that there could be no effective judicial review of his decisions, the applicant company was deprived of its right under A 6(1) to have its dispute with its tenant decided by a court. Consequently, there had been a violation of A 6(1). The complaint concerning the length of the proceedings had been absorbed by the complaint regarding the right to a court.

Incal v Turkey (2000) 29 EHRR 449 98/49

[Application lodged 7.9.1993; Commission report 25.2.1997; Court Judgment 9.6.1998]

Mr Ibrahim Incal, a lawyer, was at the material time a member of the executive committee of the Izmir section of the People's Labour Party (HEP). That party, which was represented in the National Assembly, was dissolved by the Constitutional Court on 14 July 1993. In July 1992, the executive committee decided to distribute in the Izmir constituency a leaflet criticising the measures taken by the local authorities, in particular against small-scale illegal trading and the sprawl of squatters' camps around the city. By a letter accompanied by a copy of the leaflet in question, the president of the HEP asked the Izmir prefecture for permission to distribute the leaflet. The Izmir security police considered that the leaflet contained separatist propaganda capable of inciting the people to resist the government and commit criminal offences. The National Security Court issued an injunction ordering the seizure of the leaflets and prohibiting their distribution. HEP's premises were searched, copies of the leaflets seized and a criminal investigation against the HEP's local leaders and the members of its executive committee was opened. On 9 February 1993, the National Security Court, composed of three judges, one of whom was a member of the Military Legal Service, found the applicant guilty and sentenced him to six months and 20 days' imprisonment and a fine of TRL 55,555. It also ordered the confiscation of the leaflets and disqualified him from driving for 15 days. An appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed. The applicant complained that his criminal conviction on account of his contribution to preparation of the leaflet in issue had infringed his right to freedom of expression and that he had not had a fair trial before an independent tribunal.

Comm found unanimously V 10, V 6(1) as regards fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, NV 6(1)+14, by majority (26–5) V 6(1) as regards applicant being unable to reply to the public prosecutor's opinion, (26–5) NV 6(1) as regards non-appearance of applicant before Court of Cassation.

Court found unanimously V 10, by majority (12–8) V 6(1) as regards the complaint relating to the independence and impartiality of the National Security Court, (19–1) not necessary to consider the applicant's other complaints under 6(1), whether taken separately or in conjunction with 14.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson (jpd), Mr F Gölcüklü (pc/jpd), Mr F Matscher (jpd), Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Mr I Foighel (jpd), Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla, Sir John Freeland (jpd), Mr MA Lopes Rocha (jpd), Mr L Wildhaber (jpd), Mr D Gotchev (jpd), Mr B Repik, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits, Mr J Cassadevall, Mr T Pantiru, Mr M Voicu, Mr V Toumanov.

The applicant's conviction amounted to an interference with the exercise of his right to freedom of expression. The interference was prescribed by law; the conviction was based on the Criminal Code and the Press Act. The conviction pursued the legitimate aim of the prevention of disorder. Freedom of expression was particularly important for political parties and their active members and accordingly, interferences with the freedom of expression of a politician who was a member of an opposition party called for the closest scrutiny. The leaflet criticised certain administrative and municipal measures taken by the authorities, in particular against street traders. They thus reported actual events which were of some interest to the people of Izmir. The leaflet appealed to the Kurdish population to band together to raise certain political demands, but was not an incitement to the use of violence, hostility or hatred between citizens. The dominant position which the government occupied made it necessary for it to display restraint in resorting to criminal proceedings, particularly where other means were available for replying to the unjustified attacks and criticisms of its adversaries. A copy of the leaflet had been submitted to the Izmir prefecture with an application for permission to distribute it. At that stage, the authorities were in a position to require changes to the text. However, the day after this application was lodged at the prefecture, the leaflets were seized and prosecutions brought against its authors. The nature of the interference had been radical; the National Security Court had sentenced the applicant to imprisonment and a fine and disqualified him from driving for 15 days; in addition, as a result of his conviction for a public order offence, he was debarred from the Civil Service and forbidden to take part in a number of activities within political organisations, associations or trade unions. The Court took into account the background to the case and did not discern anything which would warrant the conclusion that the applicant was in any way responsible for the problems of terrorism in Turkey, and more specifically in Izmir. The applicant's conviction was disproportionate to the aim pursued, and therefore unnecessary in a democratic society. There had accordingly been a breach of A 10.

In order to establish whether a tribunal could be considered 'independent' for the purposes of A 6(1), regard had to be had, inter alia, to the manner of appointment of its members and their term of office, the existence of safeguards against outside pressures and the question whether it presented an appearance of independence. Regarding 'impartiality', the personal conviction of a particular judge in a given case had to be ascertained and then whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in this respect. The National Security Court was composed of three judges, one of whom was a regular officer and member of the Military Legal Service. The independence and impartiality of the two civilian judges was not disputed. The status of military judges sitting as members of National Security Courts provided certain guarantees of independence and impartiality. Military judges underwent the same professional training as their civilian counterparts, which gave them the status of career members of the Military Legal Service. When sitting as members of National Security Courts, they enjoyed constitutional safeguards identical to those of civilian judges; in addition, with certain exceptions, they could not be removed from office or made to retire early without their consent, they sat as individuals, they had to be independent and no public authority could give them instructions concerning their judicial activities or influence them in the performance of their duties. However, they were servicemen who still belonged to the army, which took its orders from the executive; they remained subject to military discipline and assessment reports were compiled on them by the army, decisions pertaining to their appointment were to a great extent taken by the administrative authorities and the army and their term of office as National Security Court judges was only four years and could be renewed. Appearances could be of a certain importance. What was at stake was the confidence which the courts in a democratic society had to inspire in the public and, above all, as far as criminal proceedings were concerned, in the accused. In deciding whether there was a legitimate reason to fear that a particular court lacked independence or impartiality, the standpoint of the accused was important without being decisive. What was decisive was whether his doubts could be held to be objectively justified. The applicant could legitimately fear that because one of the judges of the National Security Court was a military judge, it might allow itself to be unduly influenced by considerations which had nothing to do with the nature of the case. The Court of Cassation was not able to dispel those concerns, as it did not have full jurisdiction. Accordingly, the applicant had legitimate cause to doubt the independence and impartiality of the National Security Court. There had accordingly been a breach of A 6(1).

The applicant did not maintain this complaint under A 14 before the Court, which saw no reason to examine it of its own motion.

Non-pecuniary damage (FF 30,000), costs and expenses (FF 15,000).

[Applications lodged between 16.4.1987 and 20.8.1990; Commission report 9.9.1992; Court Judgment 24.11.1993]

Informationsverein Lentia, the first applicant, Arbeitsgemeinschaft Offenes Radio (AGORA), the third applicant and Radio Melody GmbH, the fifth applicant, all applied for operating licences under the Telecommunications legislation. Their applications were refused and their appeals to the Constitutional Court were dismissed. Jörg Haider, the second applicant, and Wilhelm Weber, the fourth applicant, gave up the idea of applying for licences in view of the Constitutional Court interpretation of the law. They complained that the impossibility of obtaining an operating licence was an unjustified interference with their right to communicate information and infringed A 10.

Comm found V 10 (unanimously as regards the first applicant and by 14–1 for the others), not necessary also to A 14 (unanimously as regards the first applicant and by 14–1 for the third applicant).

Court found unanimously V 10, not necessary to examine 14+10.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm, Mr F Bigi, Mr AB Baka, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici.

The restrictions in issue amounted to an 'interference' with the exercise by the applicants of their freedom to impart information and ideas. The object and purpose of the third sentence of A 10(1) and the scope of its application had to be considered in the context of the article as a whole and in particular, in relation to the requirements of A 10(2) to which licensing measures remained subject. States were permitted to regulate by a licensing system the way in which broadcasting was organised in their territories, particularly in its technical aspects. That could lead to interferences whose aims would be legitimate under the third sentence of para 1, even though they did not correspond to any of the aims set out in para 2. The compatibility of such interferences with the Convention had nevertheless to be assessed in the light of the other requirements of para 2. The interferences complained of were prescribed by law. Their aim was a legitimate one. Contracting States enjoyed a margin of appreciation in assessing the need for an interference. In cases such as the present one, the supervision by the Convention institutions had to be strict because of the importance of the rights in question. A public monopoly imposed the greatest restrictions on the freedom of expression. The far-reaching character of such restrictions meant that they could only be justified where they corresponded to a pressing need. As a result of technical progress, justification for the restrictions could no longer be found in considerations relating to the number of frequencies and channels available. They had lost much of their raison d'être in view of the multiplication of foreign programmes aimed at Austrian audiences and the decision of the Administrative Court to recognise the lawfulness of their retransmission by cable. It could not be argued that there were no equivalent less restrictive solutions. The economic argument that the Austrian market was too small to sustain a sufficient number of stations to avoid regroupings and the constitution of 'private monopolies' was groundless. Accordingly, the interferences in issue were disproportionate to the aim pursued and were, accordingly, not necessary in a democratic society. There had therefore been a violation of A 10.

In view of the above finding, it was not necessary to determine whether there had also been a breach of A 14, taken in conjunction with A 10.

Inze v Austria (1988) 10 EHHR 394 87/23

[Application lodged 20.6.1979; Commission report 4.3.1986; Court Judgment 28.10.1987]

Maximilian Inze, the applicant, was illegitimate and lived on a farm belonging to his mother. His mother subsequently married and had a legitimate son. The mother died intestate and left as heirs her husband, the applicant and her second son. According to Austrian law, the widower was entitled to a one-fourth part of the inheritance and each of the sons (irrespective of their legitimacy) to three-eighths. However, the farm was subject to particular legislation providing that farms of a certain size may not be divided in the case of hereditary succession and that one of the heirs must take over the entire property and pay off the other heirs. Precedence was given to legitimate children. The applicant claimed that he should be called to take over the farm as he was the eldest son, and also claimed that both his stepfather and his half-brother were, in any event, excluded as being unfit to work the farm. The question of the determination of the heir entitled to take over the farm was referred to the Regional Court, which decided against the applicant. The applicant appealed, submitting that the provision in the Act giving precedence to legitimate children had been abrogated by the new version of the Civil Code, and by A 14 of the Convention. His appeal and request to submit the question to the Constitutional Court were refused. A judicial settlement was reached between the applicant and his half-brother whereby the applicant renounced any claim to take over the farm, which would pass to his half-brother. In return, he was to receive a piece of land which had been promised to him by his mother during her lifetime, but no other compensation. The applicant complained that he was discriminated against, on account of his illegitimate birth, in the enjoyment of property rights relating to his mother's hereditary farm. He alleged a violation of P1A1 taken in conjunction with A 14.

Commission found by a majority V 14+P1A1.

Court rejected Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously V 14+P1A1.

Judges: Mr J Cremona, President, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr R Bernhardt.

The Court rejected the Government's assertion that the applicant could not claim to be a 'victim' of a Convention breach, based on his renunciation of any claim to the estate under the judicial settlement, and the value of the land received in exchange amounting roughly to three-eighths of that estate. 'Victim' in A 25 referred to the person directly affected by the act or omission at issue: the existence of a violation was conceivable even in the absence of prejudice, prejudice being relevant only for the purposes of A 50. The fact that a judicial settlement may have mitigated the disadvantage suffered by the applicant did not in principle deprive him of his victim status. Moreover, the applicant's complaint was that his illegitimate birth deprived him in law of any possibility of taking over his mother's farm in the partition of her estate. That situation remained unchanged: it was only its financial consequences which had been alleviated by the settlement. In these circumstances, the applicant could still claim to be a victim within the meaning of A 25.

A 14 complemented the other substantive provisions of the Convention and its Protocols. It had no independent existence, since it had effect solely in relation to the rights and freedoms safeguarded by those provisions. Although the application of A 14 did not presuppose a breach of one or more of such provisions, there could be no room for its application unless the facts of the case fell within the ambit of one or more of the latter. The applicant did not challenge the system of hereditary farms as such, but only the criteria applicable to the choice of the principal heir. In that respect, the Austrian legislation gave precedence to legitimate over illegitimate children. In the present case, the farm went to the younger, legitimate, son, whereas the applicant was, on the sole ground of his illegitimacy, deprived of any possibility of obtaining it. A difference of treatment under A 14 was discriminatory if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. Contracting States enjoyed a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations justified a different treatment in law. The Convention, a living instrument, had to be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions. The question of equality between children born in and out of wedlock as regards their civil rights was given importance in the Member States. Very weighty reasons would accordingly have to be advanced before a difference of treatment on the ground of birth out of wedlock could be regarded as compatible with the Convention. In this case, the reasons advanced by the Government were insufficient, and there was a breach of A 14 taken together with P1A1.

Ireland v United Kingdom (1979-80) 2 EHRR 25 78/1

[Application lodged 16 December 1971; Commission report 9 February 1976; Court Judgment 18.1.1978]

In order to combat what the respondent Government described as 'the longest and most violent terrorist campaign witnessed in either part of the island of Ireland', the authorities in Northern Ireland exercised from August 1971 until December 1975 a series of extra-judicial powers of arrest, detention and internment. The proceedings in this case concerned the scope and the operation in practice of those measures as well as the alleged ill-treatment of persons thereby deprived of their liberty. The arrested persons were held at various centres, barracks and holding centres and were subjected to interrogation techniques which consisted of five particular disorientation or sensory deprivation techniques (wall-standing, hooding, subjection to noise, deprivation of sleep, deprivation of food and drink).

Comm found unanimously, that the powers of detention and internment without trial were not in conformity with 5(1–4), but were 'strictly required by the exigencies of the situation' in Northern Ireland, within the meaning of 15(1), unanimously 6 not applicable, NV 14, unanimously the combined use of the five techniques in constituted a practice of inhuman treatment and of torture, unanimously V 3 of various persons arrested, unanimously that there had been at Palace Barracks, Holywood, in the autumn of 1971, a practice in connection with the interrogation of prisoners by members of the RUC which was inhuman treatment in breach of A 3, unanimously that no practice in breach of 3 had been found to exist in relation to the some of those arrested, including the general conditions at Girdwood Park in August 1971, unanimously, that the conditions of detention at Ballykinler in August 1971 did not disclose a violation of 3, by majority (12–1) 1 could not be the subject of a separate breach.

Court found by majority (16–1) that the use of the five techniques in August and October 1971 constituted a practice of inhuman and degrading treatment in breach of 3, (13–4) the use of the five techniques did not constitute a practice of torture within the meaning of 3, (16–1) no other practice of ill-treatment was established for the unidentified interrogation, centres, unanimously that there existed at Palace Barracks in the autumn of 1971 a practice of inhuman treatment in breach of 3, by majority (14–3) that the last-mentioned practice was not one of torture within the meaning of 3, unanimously that it was not established that the practice in question continued beyond the autumn of 1971, by majority (15–2) no practice in breach of 3 was established as regards other places, unanimously that it could not direct the respondent State to institute criminal or disciplinary proceedings against those members of the security forces who had committed the breaches of 3 found by the Court and against those who condoned or tolerated such breaches, unanimously that at the relevant time there existed in Northern Ireland a public emergency threatening the life of the nation, within the meaning of 15(1), that the British notices of derogation dated 20 August 1971, 23 January 1973 and 16 August 1973 fulfilled the requirements of 15(3), by majority (16–1) although the practice followed in Northern Ireland from 9 August 1971 to March 1975 in the application of the legislation providing for extra-judicial deprivation of liberty entailed derogations from 5(1)–(4), it was not established that the said derogations exceeded the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, within the meaning of A 15(1), unanimously that the UK had not disregarded in the present case other obligations under international law, within the meaning of 15(1), by majority (15–2) no discrimination contrary to 14 and 5 taken together was established, unanimously that the derogations from 6 assuming it to be applicable in the present case, were compatible with 15, by majority (15–2) no discrimination contrary to 14 and 6 (14+6) taken together, assuming 6 to be applicable in the present case, was established.

Judges: Mr G Balladore Pallieri, President, Mr G Wiarda, Mr M Zekia (so), Mr J Cremona, Mr P O'Donoghue (so), Mrs H Pedersen, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr R Ryssdal, Mr W Ganshof Van Der Meersch, Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice (so), Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr D Evrigenis (so), Mr P-H Teitgen, Mr G Lagergren, Mr L. Liesch, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher (so).

The Court regretted the attitude of the British Government in not affording the Commission the assistance desired. The Government of the United Kingdom had given an unqualified undertaking, that the 'five techniques' would not be reintroduced as an aid to interrogation. In addition, the United Kingdom had taken various measures designed to prevent the recurrence of the events complained of and to afford reparation for their consequences. Nevertheless, the responsibilities assigned to the Court within the framework of the system under the Convention extended to pronouncing on the non-contested allegations of violation of A 3. The Court's judgments served not only to decide those cases brought before the Court but, more generally, to elucidate, safeguard and develop the rules instituted by the Convention, thereby contributing to the observance by the States of the engagements undertaken by them as Contracting Parties. The Court had jurisdiction to take cognisance of the contested cases of violation of A 3 if and to the extent that the applicant Government put them forward as establishing the existence of a practice. A practice incompatible with the Convention consisted of an accumulation of identical or analogous breaches which were sufficiently numerous and inter-connected to amount not merely to isolated incidents or exceptions but to a pattern or system; a practice did not of itself constitute a violation separate from such breaches. The higher authorities of a State were strictly liable for the conduct of their subordinates; they were under a duty to impose their will on subordinates and could not shelter behind their inability to ensure that it was respected. The concept of practice was of particular importance for the operation of the rule of exhaustion of domestic remedies. That rule, as embodied in A 26, applied to State applications (A 24) in the same way as it did to individual applications (A 25), when the applicant State did no more than denounce a violation or violations allegedly suffered by individuals whose place, as it were, was taken by the State. On the other hand and in principle, the rule did not apply where the applicant State complained of a practice as such, with the aim of preventing its continuation or recurrence, but did not ask the Commission or the Court to give a decision on each of the cases put forward as proof or illustrations of that practice. The Court would not rely on the concept that the burden of proof was borne by one or other of the two Governments concerned. The Court examined all the material before it, whether originating from the Commission, the Parties or other sources, and, if necessary, obtained material proprio motu. The Court adopted the standard of proof 'beyond reasonable doubt' but added that such proof might follow from the coexistence of sufficiently strong, clear and concordant inferences or of similar unrebutted presumptions of fact. In this context, the conduct of the Parties when evidence was being obtained had to be taken into account. Ill-treatment had to attain a minimum level of severity to fall within the scope of A 3. The assessment of that minimum was, in the nature of things, relative; it depended on all the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment, its physical or mental effects and, in some cases, the sex, age and state of health of the victim, etc. The Convention prohibited in absolute terms torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, irrespective of the victim's conduct. There was no provision for exceptions and, under A 15(2) there could be no derogation therefrom even in the event of a public emergency threatening the life of the nation. The police used the five techniques on fourteen persons in 1971. Although never authorised in writing in any official document, the five techniques were taught orally by the English Intelligence Centre to members of the RUC at a seminar held in April 1971. There was accordingly a practice. The five techniques were applied in combination, with premeditation and for hours at a stretch; they caused, if not actual bodily injury, at least intense physical and mental suffering to the persons subjected to it and also led to acute psychiatric disturbances during interrogation. They accordingly fell into the category of inhuman treatment within the meaning of A 3. The techniques were also degrading since they were such as to arouse in their victims feelings of fear, anguish and inferiority capable of humiliating and debasing them and possibly breaking their physical or moral resistance. The distinction between torture and inhuman or degrading treatment derived principally from a difference in the intensity of the suffering inflicted. The Convention, with its distinction between 'torture' and 'inhuman or degrading treatment', had to by the first of those terms attach a special stigma to deliberate inhuman treatment causing very serious and cruel suffering. Although the five techniques undoubtedly amounted to inhuman and degrading treatment, although their object was the extraction of confessions, the naming of others and/or information and although they were used systematically, they did not occasion suffering of the particular intensity and cruelty implied by the word torture as so understood. Those held at Palace Barracks were subjected to violence by members of the RUC which constituted a practice and led to intense suffering and to physical injury which on occasion was substantial; it thus fell into the category of inhuman treatment but did not attain the particular level inherent in the notion of torture. At Ballykinler, the RUC and the army followed a practice which was discreditable and reprehensible but did not infringe A 3. The Court did not have to consider in the proceedings whether its functions extended, in certain circumstances, to addressing consequential orders to Contracting States. The sanctions available to the Court did not include the power to direct States to institute criminal or disciplinary proceedings in accordance with its domestic law.

A 5(1) contained a list of the cases in which it was permissible under the Convention to deprive someone of his liberty. Subject to A 15 and without prejudice to P4A1, which the UK had not ratified, that list was exhaustive. The different forms of deprivation of liberty in the case did not fall under any of the sub-paragraphs of A 5(1). Paragraphs 2 to 4 of A 5 placed the Contracting States under an obligation to provide several guarantees in cases where someone was deprived of his liberty.

A 15 came into play only in time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation. The existence of such an emergency was clear from the facts. The State had a wide margin of appreciation but did not enjoy an unlimited power in that respect. The Court was not bound by strict rules of evidence but was entitled to rely on evidence of every kind. The Court, being master of its own procedure and of its own rules, had complete freedom in assessing not only the admissibility and the relevance but also the probative value of each item of evidence before it. Being confronted with a massive wave of violence and intimidation, the Northern Ireland Government and then, after the introduction of direct rule (30 March 1972), the British Government were reasonably entitled to consider that normal legislation offered insufficient resources for the campaign against terrorism and that recourse to measures outside the scope of the ordinary law, in the shape of extrajudicial deprivation of liberty, was called for. It was not the Court's function to substitute for the British Government's assessment any other assessment of what might be the most prudent or most expedient policy to combat terrorism. The Court had to do no more than review the lawfulness, under the Convention, of the measures adopted by that Government from 9 August 1971 onwards. For that purpose the Court had to arrive at its decision in the light, not of a purely retrospective examination of the efficacy of those measures, but of the conditions and circumstances reigning when they were originally taken and subsequently applied. The Court accepted that the limits of the margin of appreciation left to the Contracting States by A 15 were not overstepped by the UK when it formed the opinion that extrajudicial deprivation of liberty was necessary from August 1971 to March 1975. When a State was struggling against a public emergency threatening the life of the nation, it would be rendered defenceless if it were required to accomplish everything at once, to furnish from the outset each of its chosen means of action with each of the safeguards reconcilable with the priority requirements for the proper functioning of the authorities and for restoring peace within the community. The interpretation of A 15 had to leave a place for progressive adaptations. In view of the Contracting States' margin of appreciation, the Court did not find it established that the United Kingdom exceeded the 'extent strictly required' referred to in A 15(1). A 3 and 5 embodied quite separate obligations. Moreover, the violations of A 3 found in the present judgment failed to show that it was not necessary to apply the extra-judicial powers in force. In conclusion, since the requirements of A 15 were met, the derogations from A 5 were not, in the circumstances of the case, in breach of the Convention.

Regarding A 14 taken together with A 5, the Court found that there were profound differences between Loyalist and Republican terrorism. The aim pursued until 5 February 1973 – the elimination of the most formidable organisation first of all – could be regarded as legitimate and the means employed did not appear disproportionate. After 5 February 1973 extra-judicial deprivation of liberty was used to combat terrorism as such, as defined a few months previously, and no longer just a given organisation. Taking into account the full range of the processes of the law applied in the campaign against the two categories of terrorists, the Court found that the initial difference of treatment did not continue during the last period considered. Accordingly, no discrimination contrary to A 14 and 5 was established.

It was not necessary to give a decision on the applicability of A 6. Assuming A 6 to be material, the derogations from the guarantees of a judicial nature afforded by A 5 perforce involved derogating from those afforded by A 6. The Court had already held that the derogations from A 5 met the requirements of A 15; in the circumstances of the case, it arrived at the same conclusion as regards the derogations from A 6. In addition, the Court likewise found no discrimination with respect to A 6.

A 1, together with the other Articles, demarcated the scope of the Convention ratione personae, materiae and loci. A violation of A 1 followed automatically from, but added nothing to, a breach of the other provisions; hitherto, when the Court had found such a breach, it had never held that A 1 had been violated. The absence of a law expressly prohibiting a violation did not suffice to establish a breach since such a prohibition did not represent the sole method of securing the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms guaranteed. In the present case, the Court had found two practices in breach of A 3. Those practices automatically infringed A 1 as well, but that was a finding which added nothing to the previous finding and which there was no reason to include in the operative provisions of the judgment.

Not necessary to apply A 50 in the present case.

Iribarne Pérez v France (1996) 22 EHRR 153 95/41

[Application lodged 18.3.1986; Commission report 28.6.1994; Court Judgment 24.10.1995]

Mr Francisco Iribarne Pérez, who was a Spanish national living in Andorra, was arrested with two others on 7 July 1985. All three were prosecuted on charges of importing prohibited drugs into Andorra, drug trafficking and unlawful possession of a firearm. The applicant was found guilty by the Tribunal de Corts, Andorra's supreme criminal court, on 26 November 1985. At the time, a person sentenced to over three months would have to serve it in either France or Spain. He chose to serve his sentence in France and was taken to Toulouse prison on 17 December 1985. On 28 January 1990, the applicant lodged a memorial with the Toulouse public prosecutor, complaining of the proceedings conducted against him in Andorra and of his detention in France. The Toulouse public prosecutor informed him that the Tribunal de Corts had sole jurisdiction for his complaints, as it had delivered the judgment. The applicant lodged a criminal complaint against the Toulouse public prosecutor, alleging arbitrary detention and denial of justice. He also joined the proceedings as a civil party, claiming that the public prosecutor had not complied with the requirements of the Code of Criminal Procedure which governed the transfer to France of persons convicted abroad. The applicant was released on 13 August 1994 and then expelled from French territory. He complained that there were no proceedings he could take in the French courts to have the lawfulness of his detention reviewed.

Comm found by a majority (9–9 with the President's casting vote) NV 5(4).

Court held unanimously NV 5(4).

The Court's task was to determine whether the lawfulness of the applicant's detention should have been reviewed in France after his conviction in Andorra. The Court regarded the Tribunal de Corts as the 'competent court' to make that decision, and therefore the review required by A 5(4) was incorporated in the judgment of the Tribunal de Corts at the close of judicial proceedings. In any event, the Court did not perceive any flagrant denial of justice in this case, and noted that the applicant did not allege any infringement of the essential rights of the defence, nor had the applicant questioned the impartiality of the Tribunal de Corts.

Isgrò v Italy 91/4

[Application lodged 12.9.1984; Commission report 14.12.1989; Court Judgment 19.2.1991]

Mr Salvatore Isgrò was arrested on 11 November 1978 on suspicion of involvement in the kidnapping and death of a young man. The evidence against him came from a witness who had been questioned by investigating officers but who could not be traced at the time of the trial. The witness's statements were read at trial. The applicant was convicted and sentenced to 30 years' imprisonment. Appeals confirmed his conviction, but reduced his sentence. The applicant complained that he had been convicted on the basis of the evidence of a witness who could not be traced during the trial and whom his lawyer had never had the opportunity to examine.

Comm found by majority V 6(1) and 6(3)(d).

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objections and found NV 6(3)(d)+6(1).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr C Russo, Mr J De Meyer, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel, Mr A N Loizou.

Preliminary objection of non-exhaustion rejected as in this case it would not have constituted a sufficient and effective remedy, the District Court having rejected similar cases. Second preliminary objection that the applicant was not a 'victim' had not been raised before the Commission and the Government was therefore estopped from relying on it.

The admissibility of evidence was primarily a mater for regulation by national law and, as a rule, it was for the national court to assess the evidence before it. The Court's task was to ascertain whether the proceedings considered as a whole, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair. Although he did not give evidence in person, the accuser was to be regarded as a witness, a term to be given an autonomous interpretation, because the national courts took account of his statements which were read out at trial. All the evidence normally had to be produced in the presence of the accused at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument. However, the use as evidence of statements obtained pre-trial was not inconsistent with A 6(3)(d) and 6(1) provided the rights of the defence had been respected. The identity of the witness was known to both parties, confrontations had been arranged between the witness and the applicant to compare their statements, and the applicant was able to repeat his claims in court. It was not necessarily the case that the courts had based their decisions solely on the statement made by the witness to a judge, whose impartiality had not been contested. Other testimony had been presented. Although the applicant's lawyer had not been present at the confrontation, neither had the prosecution lawyer: the applicant had been able to put questions and make comments himself. Any limitations on the rights of the defence were not such as to deprive him of a fair trial. Accordingly, NV 6(3)(d) taken with 6(1).

[Application lodged 25.11.1987; Commission report 1.7.1992; Court Judgment 22.9.1993]

Istituto di Vigilanza was a security firm. On 26 October 1978 Mrs Figus Milone, a former employee, brought proceedings against it in the Turin magistrate's court for unfair dismissal. At the first hearing, on 28 November 1978, the magistrate raised a preliminary question of his own motion and stayed the proceedings pending the decision of the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court gave judgment on 16 January 1987. The plaintiff resumed the proceedings on 16 February 1987 and they ended on 28 May with a friendly settlement. The applicant company complained about the length of the proceedings brought against it in the Turin magistrate's court.

Court unanimously held that it could not deal with the merits of the case.

Under A 47, the Court may only be seised of a case within the period of three months provided for in A 32. In order to seise a court, it was not sufficient to decide to seise it. The decision had to be implemented. The Commission had exceeded, albeit by only one day, the time allowed it. No special circumstance of a nature to suspend the running of time or justify its starting to run afresh was apparent from the file. The application was therefore inadmissible as it was made out of time.

JJ v The Netherlands (1999) 28 EHRR 168 98/19

[Application lodged 12.11.1992; Commission report 15.10.1996; Court Judgment 27.3.1998]

The applicant was a freelance tax consultant. On 14 December 1989, the Inspector of Direct Taxes sent the applicant an assessment of supplementary income tax and imposed on him a fiscal penalty. On 20 December 1989, the applicant lodged an appeal against this assessment with the Taxation Division of the Court of Appeal. The appeal was declared inadmissible by the President of the Taxation Division on 23 March 1990 on the ground that the court registration fee had not been paid. The applicant lodged an appeal on points of law with the Supreme Court. One of the advocates general to the Supreme Court submitted an advisory opinion on 19 November 1991. The applicant did not receive a copy of the advisory opinion until the Supreme Court delivered its judgment in which it dismissed the applicant's appeal on 17 June 1992. The applicant complained, inter alia, that he had not been able to reply to the advisory opinion submitted to the Supreme Court by the advocate general.

Comm found by majority (26–4) V 6(1).

Court found unanimously V 6(1).

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr F Matscher, Mr A Spielmann, Mrs E Palm, Mr AN Loizou, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits, Mr P Van Dijk, Mr M Voicu.

The fiscal penalty imposed on the applicant was a 'criminal sanction'. Therefore A 6 entitled the applicant to a procedure before a court. Netherlands law provided for such a procedure in the form of an appeal to the Taxation Division of the Court of Appeal. The applicant's appeal was declared inadmissible on the sole ground that the court registration fee had not been paid. His grounds of appeal on points of law to the Supreme Court were therefore limited to the question whether or not the Court of Appeal ought to have declared his appeal admissible. The Supreme Court had jurisdiction to quash the decision of the Court of Appeal, and had it done so, it would have had full jurisdiction to substitute its own decision on the merits for that of the Court of Appeal or to refer the case back to the Court of Appeal for a complete rehearing if necessary. However, it did not and the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court was to ratify the imposition of the fiscal penalty on the applicant. It was thus decisive for the determination of the 'criminal charge' leading to the imposition on him of the penalty. In those circumstances, the fact that the applicant's appeal on points of law to the Supreme Court and the latter's decision were limited to a preliminary question of a procedural nature was not sufficient to find that A 6(1) was inapplicable.

The purpose of the advocate-general's advisory opinion was to assist the Supreme Court and to help ensure that its case-law was consistent. It was the duty of the Procurator General's department at the Supreme Court to act with the strictest objectivity. Great importance had to be attached to the part played in the proceedings before the Supreme Court by the member of the Procurator-General's department, and more particularly to the content and effects of his submissions. Although it was objective and reasoned in law, the opinion was nevertheless intended to advise and accordingly influence the Supreme Court. The outcome of the proceedings before the Supreme Court determined a 'criminal charge' against the applicant. Regard being had, therefore, to what was at stake for the applicant in the proceedings and to the nature of the advisory opinion of the advocate general, the fact that it was impossible for the applicant to reply to it before the Supreme Court took its decision infringed his right to adversarial proceedings. That right meant in principle the opportunity for the parties to a criminal or civil trial to have knowledge of and comment on all evidence adduced or observations filed, even by an independent member of the national legal service, with a view to influencing the court's decision. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 6(1).

Jabari v Turkey 00/179

[Application lodged 26.2.1998; Court Judgment 11.7.2000]

Mrs Hoda Jabari, the applicant, was an Iranian. In 1995, at the age of 22, she met a man ('X') in Iran while attending a secretarial college. She fell in love with him and after some time they decided to get married. X's family was opposed to their marriage and in June 1997, X married another woman. The applicant continued to see him and to have sexual relations with him. In October 1997, the applicant and X were stopped by policemen while walking along a street. The policemen arrested the couple and detained them in custody as X was married. The applicant underwent a virginity examination while in custody. After a few days, she was released from detention with the help of her family. In November 1997, she entered Turkey illegally. She tried to fly to Canada via France using a forged Canadian passport, but was apprehended at Paris airport and returned to Istanbul where she was arrested on arrival. The applicant lodged an asylum application with the Aliens Department. Her application was rejected as it had been submitted out of time. On 12 February 1998, a staff member of the UNHCR, with the permission of the authorities, interviewed the applicant about her asylum request. On 16 February 1998, the applicant was granted refugee status by the UNHCR on the basis that she had a well-founded fear of persecution if removed to Iran as she risked being subjected to inhuman punishment, such as death by stoning or being whipped or flogged. Her application to the Ankara Administrative Court against her deportation was dismissed. She complained, inter alia, that she would be subjected to a real risk of ill-treatment and death by stoning if expelled from Turkey and that she was denied an effective remedy to challenge her expulsion.

Court found unanimously V 3 if decision to deport the applicant to Iran was implemented, V 13.

Judges: Mr G Ress, President, Mr A Pastor Ridruejo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr V Butkevych, Mr J Hedigan, Mr M Pellonpää, Mr F Gölcüklü, ad hoc judge.

Contracting States had the right, as a matter of well established international law and subject to their treaty obligations including the Convention, to control the entry, residence and expulsion of aliens. However, expulsion by a Contracting State could give rise to an issue under A 3, and hence engage the responsibility of that State under the Convention, where substantial grounds had been shown for believing that the person in question, if expelled, would face a real risk of being subjected to treatment contrary to A 3 in the receiving country. Having regard to the fact that A 3 enshrined one of the most fundamental values of a democratic society and prohibited in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, a rigorous scrutiny had to be conducted of an individual's claim that his or her deportation to a third country would expose that individual to treatment prohibited by A 3. The applicant's failure to comply with the five day registration requirement under the Asylum Regulation 1994 denied her any scrutiny of the factual basis of her fears about being removed to Iran. The automatic and mechanical application of such a short time limit for submitting an asylum application had to be considered at variance with the protection of the fundamental value embodied in A 3 of the Convention. The authorities had not investigated the substance of her claim. It fell to the branch office of the UNHCR to interview the applicant about the background to her asylum request and to evaluate the risk to which she would be exposed in the light of the nature of the offence with which she was charged. The Ankara Administrative Court on her application for judicial review limited itself to the issue of the formal legality of the applicant's deportation rather than the more compelling question of the substance of her fears, even though by that stage the applicant must be considered to have had more than an arguable claim that she would be at risk if removed to her country of origin. Weight was given to the UNHCR's conclusion on the applicant's claim in making its own assessment of the risk which would face the applicant if her deportation were to be implemented. The material point in time for the assessment of the risk faced by the applicant was the time of the Court's own consideration of the case. There was a real risk of the applicant being subjected to treatment contrary to A 3 if she was returned to Iran. Accordingly, the order for her deportation to Iran would, if executed, give rise to a violation of A 3.

A 13 guaranteed the availability at national level of a remedy to enforce the substance of the Convention rights and freedoms in whatever form they might happen to be secured in the domestic legal order. The effect of that article was thus to require the provision of a domestic remedy allowing the competent national authority both to deal with the substance of the relevant Convention complaint and to grant appropriate relief, although Contracting States were afforded some discretion as to the manner in which they conformed to their obligations under the provision. No assessment was made by the domestic authorities of the applicant's claim to be at risk if removed to Iran. The refusal to consider her asylum request for non-respect of procedural requirements could not be taken on appeal. Judicial review proceedings would not have entitled her to suspend the implementation of the deportation order or to have an examination of the merits of her claim. Given the irreversible nature of the harm that might occur if the risk of torture or ill-treatment alleged materialised and the importance attached to A 3, the notion of an effective remedy under A 13 required independent and rigorous scrutiny of a claim that there existed substantial grounds for fearing a real risk of treatment contrary to A 3 and the possibility of suspending the implementation of the measure impugned. Since the Ankara Administrative Court failed in the circumstances to provide any of those safeguards, the judicial review proceedings relied on by the Government did not satisfy the requirements of A 13.

Finding of potential breach of A 3 and actual breach of A 13 constituted sufficient just satisfaction for non-pecuniary damage.

Allan Jacobsson v Sweden (1990) 12 EHRR 56 89/17

[Application lodged 11.1.1984; Commission report 8.10.1987; Court Judgment 25.10.1989]

Allan Jacobsson complained that protracted building prohibitions on his property violated A 6, 17 and 18 and A 1 of Protocol 1.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1), NV 17, 18, not necessary to examine A 13, by majority (7–4) NV P1A1.

Court held unanimously NV P1A1, V 6(1) and not necessary to examine A 13, 17 and 18.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr B Walsh, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J De Meyer (c), Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm.

The Court referred to its own case-law and distinguished Sporrong and Lönnroth v S. The Court found that the applicant's property was not subject to an expropriation permit and steps had not been taken to deprive him of his right of property. The case was only concerned with the control of the use of the applicant's property pending the elaboration of a town plan. Under the second paragraph of P1A1, States were entitled to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest by enforcing such laws as they deemed necessary for the purpose. However, as that provision was to be construed in the light of the general principle enunciated in the first sentence of the first paragraph, there had to be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. In striking the fair balance between the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights, the State enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation. The interference was in accordance with Swedish law, the Building Act, and the prohibition had the legitimate aim of facilitating town planning. The applicant had not established that he had unconditional rights to build a second house or partition his land. He cannot have been unaware of the state of the law when he bought the property, he had been able to live there under the same conditions as he bought it. The need to maintain the prohibitions was reviewed regularly. Despite the long duration of the prohibitions, they could not be considered to be disproportionate to the legitimate aim of town planning. There had therefore been no violation of P1A1.

A 6: The Court recalled its case-law. A real dispute existed in this case, in particular with regard to the lawfulness of the authorities' decisions. Subject to meeting the appropriate requirements and despite the discretion of the authorities, the applicant could arguably have claimed to have a right to the permit. The prohibitions severely restricted the right, and the outcome of the proceedings whereby he challenged their lawfulness was directly decisive for his exercise of it. There was therefore a dispute over a right. The applicant's disputed right to build on his land was of a civil nature for the purposes of A 6(1). That was not affected by the general character of the building prohibitions, nor by the facts that the planning procedure was part of public law and that a building prohibition was a necessary element in urban planning. A 6(1) was applicable. As the dispute could be determined only by the Government and the Government's decisions were not open to review as to their lawfulness by either the ordinary courts or the administrative courts, or by any other body which could be considered to be a tribunal for the purposes of A 6(1), there had been a violation of that provision.

Having regard to the decision on A 6(1), it was not necessary to consider the case also under A 13 as its requirements were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6(1).

The applicant did not rely on A 17 and 18 before the Court and there was no need to examine them ex officio.

No causal link between V 6(1) any alleged pecuniary damage. Court could not speculate on result if applicant had been able to bring his complaints before a court. Costs and expenses (SEK 80,000).

Allan Jacobsson (No 2) v Sweden 98/6

[Application lodged 21.7.1990; Commission report 26.11.1996; Court Judgment 19.2.1998]

Whilst the applicant's first case was before the Convention institutions, he made a further request for an opinion on whether a permit to build a house on his property could be granted. The Building Committee confirmed its preliminary position rejecting his request for a building permit. The applicant's subsequent appeals to the County Administrative Board and the Government were rejected. On 11 November 1990, the Supreme Administrative Court, without holding an oral hearing, rejected the applicant's complaints against the Government's decision. The applicant complained, inter alia, that he had been refused an oral hearing in the proceedings before the Supreme Administrative Court.

Court found unanimously NV 6.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mrs E Palm, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr P Jambrek, Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P Van Dijk, Mr T Pantiru.

The disagreement between the applicant and the authorities as to his right to build on his property concerned his civil rights. The dispute was a serious and genuine one and the outcome of the proceedings were directly decisive for the civil rights claimed by the applicant. Therefore, A 6(1) applied to the proceedings before the Supreme Administrative Court in the applicant's case. In proceedings before a court of first and only instance the right to a public hearing under A 6(1) entailed an entitlement to an oral hearing unless there were exceptional circumstances that justified dispensing with such a hearing. The Supreme Administrative Court did not consider that it had jurisdiction to deal with the applicant's request to be granted a building permit. It only had competence to deal with a collateral issue, namely, the lawfulness of the revocation of the detailed development plan. The interpretation of the law adopted by the Supreme Court meant that it did not need to determine any issue of fact as to the applicant's individual interests or any other factual point concerning his arguments against the revocation of the detailed development plan. Therefore, the applicant's submissions to the Supreme Administrative Court were not capable of raising any issues of fact or of law pertaining to his building rights which were of such a nature as to require an oral hearing for their disposition. On the contrary, given the limited nature of the issues to be determined by it, the Supreme Administrative Court, although it acted as the first and only judicial instance in the case, was dispensed from its normal obligation under A 6(1) to hold an oral hearing. Accordingly there had been no violation of A 6(1).

Jacobsson, Mats v Sweden (1991) 13 EHRR 79 90/14

[Application lodged 5.8.1984; Commission report 16.3.1989; Court Judgment 28.6.1990]

The applicant's property was subject to a building plan of 1938 amended in 1983 which restricted construction on the site of his existing house. The applicant complained about a Board decision to prohibit constructions on the site of the applicant's existing house. He appealed to the government and then to the Supreme Administrative Court on the grounds that the decision was based on a false premise and that the plan was contrary to law. The Supreme Administrative Court rejected his application. He complained that he had not had adequate access to a court to challenge the decision to amend the 1938 building plan covering his property.

Comm found by majority (14–3) V 6(1), unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Court found unanimously V 6(1), not necessary to examine 13 and no jurisdiction to examine P1A1.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mrs D Bindschedler-Robert, Mr B Walsh, Mr J De Meyer (so), Mr N Valticos, Mrs E Palm, Mr I Foighel.

Subject to meeting the requirements laid down by law and despite the discretion existing on the part of the authorities, the applicant could arguably have asserted that, by virtue of the provisions of the 1938 plan, he had, inter alia, a right to build a second house on his property and to obtain the necessary permit. The dispute between the applicant and the authorities was of a genuine and serious nature. The rights were civil. A 6 was applicable; the dispute could only be determined by the Government at the final instance and the Government's decisions were not, in principle, open to review as to their lawfulness by either the ordinary courts or the administrative courts, or by any other body which could be considered to be a tribunal for the purposes of A 6(1). Although the applicant could challenge the decision to amend the plan by requesting the Supreme Administrative Court to reopen the proceedings, that extraordinary remedy did not meet the requirements of A 6(1) (see Sporrong and Lönnroth v S). There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).

Having regard to its decision on A 6(1) it was not necessary to consider the case also under A 13 as its requirements were less strict than, and were here absorbed by, those of A 6(1).

The complaint under P1A1 was declared inadmissible by the Commission as being manifestly ill-founded and consequently the Court had no jurisdiction to deal with the matter.

Jacquie and Ledun v France 00/103

[Application lodged 17.3.1998; Court Judgment 28.3.2000]

Marie-Claire Jacquie and Chantal Ledun were, respectively, the widow and daughter of Robert Jacquie, who died in 1990. He had been infected with hepatitis C following blood transfusions in 1983. In March 1993, the applicants commenced proceedings in the administrative court, which dismissed their claim on 28 December 1994. They appealed to the Administrative Court of Appeal, which upheld their claim on 12 February 1998. The defendants appealed to the Conseil d'État, where the proceedings were pending. The applicants complained about the length of proceedings.

The period to be taken into account began on 16 March 1993 and had not yet finished, a period of seven years. The case was not particularly complex. The applicants had not contributed to any delay. Contracting States had to organise their judicial systems so that they could meet their obligations under A 6. A period of seven years in this case could not be regarded as reasonable.

[Application lodged 11.4.1989; Commission report 7.1.1993; Court Judgment 23.6.1994]

Mr Manfred Jacubowski, a journalist, was editor-in-chief of a news agency run by a commercial company, the Deutsche Depeschendienst GmbH, of which he was a founder member and manager. This company filed a petition in bankruptcy on 31 March 1983. A new company, the Deutsche Depeschendienst AG (ddp) was created subsequently, and Mr Jacubowski became its sole director and editor-in-chief on 3 May 1983. He was dismissed by ddp's supervisory board on 17 July 1984. On 25 September he distributed a circular letter and newspaper cuttings to 40 newspaper publishers and newspaper, radio and television journalists giving critical accounts of his dismissal, the circumstances surrounding it and the ddp's activities in general, reporting that the ddp's financial position had worsened again since the bankruptcy and that some of its clients were preparing to dispense with its services, mainly because of their poor standard and the lack of certain technical facilities. Thereafter the applicant set up a public relations agency. An application for an injunction by the owners of dpp was refused by the Düsseldorf Court of Appeal, who nevertheless ordered that the applicant should desist from any further such mailings, on pain of a fine. The Federal Court of Justice and the Federal Constitutional Court declined to accept his complaint for adjudication on the ground that it was unfounded.

The impugned measure was an interference with the applicant's exercise of his freedom of expression. The fact that, in a given case, that freedom was exercised other than in the discussion of matters of public interest did not deprive it of the protection of A 10. The interference was prescribed by law and pursued a legitimate aim under the Convention, namely the protection of the reputation or rights of others. A certain margin of appreciation was to be left to the Contracting States in assessing whether and to what extent an interference was necessary, but that margin went hand in hand with European supervision covering both the legislation and the decisions applying it, even those given by an independent court. Such a margin of appreciation appeared essential in commercial matters, in particular in an area as complex and fluctuating as that of unfair competition. The Court had to confine its review to the question whether the measures taken at national level were justifiable in principle and proportionate. In the instant case, the requirements of protecting the reputation and rights of others had to be weighed against the applicant's freedom to distribute his circular and the newspaper cuttings. The national courts were unanimous in regarding the applicant's action as an act of unfair competition in breach of 'accepted moral standards', as in their view it had been mainly designed to draw the ddp's clients away to the new press agency that he set up shortly afterwards. The three domestic courts had also taken into account the fact that the applicant had been personally attacked in a press release issued by his former employer, but attached less importance to that than to what they regarded as the cardinal feature, namely the essentially competitive purpose of the exercise. The impugned court order went no further than to prohibit distribution of the circular; the Düsseldorf Court of Appeal refused the ddp's application for an injunction prohibiting the applicant from systematically criticising the ddp. He thus retained the right to voice his opinions and to defend himself by any other means. The interference complained of therefore could not be regarded as disproportionate. Accordingly, it could not be said that the German courts overstepped the margin of appreciation left to national authorities and no breach of 10 had been made out.

[Application lodged 23 October 1979; Commission report 11 May 1984; Court Judgment 21.2.1986]

The applicants, John Nigel Courtenay James, a chartered surveyor, Gerald Cavendish the Sixth Duke of Westminster, Patrick Geoffrey Corbett, a chartered accountant and Sir Richard Baker Wilbraham, a banker, were trustees acting under the Will of the Second Duke of Westminster. In the area of Belgravia in Central London, the Westminster family and its trustees had developed a large Estate which had become one of the most desirable residential areas in the capital. The applicants, as trustees, had been deprived of their ownership of a number of properties in that Estate through the exercise by the occupants of rights of acquisition conferred by the Leasehold Reform Act 1967, as amended. They complained that the compulsory transfer of some of their properties and/or at the price paid, gave rise to a breach of P1A1. They also complained that the circumstances of the transfer involved discrimination contrary to A 14 and that the absence of any system of appeal against such transfer violated A 13.

A deprivation of property effected for no reason other than to confer a private benefit on a private party could not be 'in the public interest'. Nonetheless, the compulsory transfer of property from one individual to another might, depending upon the circumstances, constitute a legitimate means for promoting the public interest. Even if there could be differences between the concepts of 'public interest' and 'general interest' in P1A1, on the point under consideration no fundamental distinction of the kind contended for by the applicants could be drawn between them. A taking of property effected in pursuance of legitimate social, economic or other policies may be 'in the public interest', even if the community at large had no direct use or enjoyment of the property taken. The leasehold reform legislation was not therefore ipso facto an infringement of P1A1 on that ground. Eliminating what were judged to be social injustices was an example of the functions of a democratic legislature. The margin of appreciation was wide enough to cover legislation aimed at securing greater social justice in the sphere of people's homes, even where such legislation interfered with existing contractual relations between private parties and conferred no direct benefit on the State or the community at large. In principle, therefore, the aim pursued by the leasehold reform legislation was a legitimate one. The UK Parliament's belief in the existence of a social injustice was not such as could be characterised as manifestly unreasonable. Not only should a measure depriving a person of his property pursue a legitimate aim in the public interest, but there had to also be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. A measure had to be both appropriate for achieving its aim and not disproportionate thereto. The taking of property without payment of an amount reasonably related to its value would normally constitute a disproportionate interference which could not be considered justifiable under P1A1. P1A1 did not, however, guarantee a right to full compensation in all circumstances. Legitimate objectives of public interest, such as pursued in measures of economic reform or measures designed to achieve greater social justice, might call for less than reimbursement of the full market value. Furthermore, the Court's power of review was limited to ascertaining whether the choice of compensation terms fell outside the State's wide margin of appreciation. It had not been established, having regard to the respondent State's wide margin of appreciation, that the 1967 basis of valuation was not such as to afford a fair balance between the interests of the private parties concerned and thereby between the general interest of society and the landlord's right of property. The compensation procedures laid down in the contested legislation did not inherently lead to delays of such a degree as to involve a violation of P1A1. The general principles of international law were not applicable to a taking by a State of the property of its own nationals. There were no grounds for finding that the enfranchisement of the applicants' properties was arbitrary because of the terms of compensation provided for under the leasehold reform legislation. For the rest, such other requirements as might be included in the phrase 'subject to the conditions provided for by law' were satisfied in the circumstances of the taking of the applicants' properties. Each of the requirements of the second sentence was of P1A1 were therefore satisfied in relation to the contested deprivation of possessions suffered by the applicants. The second sentence supplemented and qualified the general principle enunciated in the first sentence. That being so, it was inconceivable that application of that general principle to the present case should lead to any conclusion different from that already arrived at by the Court in application of the second sentence. Neither by reason of the terms and conditions of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 as amended nor by reason of the particular circumstances of the enfranchisement transactions concerning the applicants' properties had there been a breach of P1A1.

The list of prohibited grounds of discrimination as set out in A 14 was not exhaustive. On the facts, the legislation did entail differences of treatment in regard to different categories of property owners in the enjoyment of the right safeguarded by P1A1. The grounds on which those differences of treatment were based were relevant in the context of A 14 and, accordingly, A 14 was applicable to the present case. For the purposes of A 14, a difference of treatment was discriminatory if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is, if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. The contested legislation, being designed to remedy a perceived imbalance in the relations between landlords and occupying tenants under the long leasehold system of tenure, would affect landlords coming within that restricted category rather than all or other property owners. The aim pursued by the legislation was a legitimate one in the public interest. Having regard to the margin of appreciation, the UK legislature did not transgress the principle of proportionality. In the Court's opinion, therefore, the contested distinction drawn in the legislation was reasonably and objectively justified. The introduction of the rateable-value limits and the institution of two levels of compensation reflected Parliament's desire to exclude from the benefits of enfranchisement the small percentage of better-off tenants not considered to be in need of economic protection and to provide more favourable terms of purchase for the vast majority of tenants, most likely to suffer hardship under the existing system. In view of the legitimate objectives being pursued in the public interest and having regard to the respondent State's margin of appreciation, the policy of different treatment could not be considered as unreasonable or as imposing a disproportionate burden on the applicants. The provisions in the legislation entailing progressively disadvantageous treatment for the landlord the lower the value of the property had to be deemed to have a reasonable and objective justification and, consequently, were not discriminatory. The facts of the case did not disclose any breach of A 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with P1A1.

A 6(1) extended only to disputes over civil rights and obligations which could be said, at least on arguable grounds, to be recognised under domestic law; it did not in itself guarantee any particular content for civil rights and obligations in the substantive law of the Contracting States. Unlike the case of Sporrong and Lönnroth, where the Court found A 6(1) applicable because there existed an arguable grievance of non-compliance with Swedish law and to have been violated because of the lack of a remedy whereby that grievance could be brought before a tribunal competent to determine all the aspects of the matter, in the present case in contrast, in so far as the applicants may have considered that there was cause for alleging non-compliance with the leasehold reform legislation, they had unimpeded access to a tribunal competent to determine any such issue. There had accordingly been no breach of A 6(1).

A 13 required that where an individual had an arguable claim to be the victim of a violation of the rights set forth in the Convention, he should have a remedy before a national authority in order both to have his claim decided and, if appropriate, to obtain redress. However the Convention did not lay down for the Contracting States any given manner for ensuring within their internal law the effective implementation of any of the provisions of the Convention. The Convention was not part of the domestic law of the UK. There was no domestic remedy in respect of the applicants' complaint that the leasehold reform legislation itself did not measure up to the standards of the Convention and its Protocols. However A 13 did not go so far as to guarantee a remedy allowing a Contracting State's laws as such to be challenged before a national authority on the ground of being contrary to the Convention or to equivalent domestic legal norms. The Court was therefore unable to uphold the argument to that effect advanced by the applicants. The legislation, including its effects in the applicants' case, was compatible with the substantive provisions of the Convention. In such a situation, the requirements of A 13 would be satisfied if there existed domestic machinery whereby the individual could secure compliance with the relevant laws. Effective remedies in this sense were and remained available to the applicants, before the County Court; and the Leasehold Valuation Tribunal. The facts of the present case therefore disclosed no violation of A 13.

[Application lodged 13.11.1989; Commission report 10.3.1994; Court Judgment 8.6.1995]

Mr Abdallah Jamil, a Brazilian national, was formerly a photographer. He was convicted for drug offences and was sentenced to 8 years' imprisonment, deportation order, confiscation of the goods seized and ordered to pay a fine, with imprisonment in default. On appeal, the Paris Court of Appeal upheld the sentences imposed by the court below and, at the request of the customs authorities, specified that imprisonment in the event of default would be subject to the conditions recently laid down in new legislation on the prevention of drug trafficking, and increased the maximum term of imprisonment in default. The applicant's appeal to the Court of Cassation was dismissed. He was released after serving the sentence imposed under the ordinary criminal law. He did not serve any period of imprisonment in default, as that was rescinded after a sum had been paid by him. He complained that the Paris Court of Appeal's order that the term of imprisonment in default should be increased pursuant to a law enacted after the offence was committed infringed the principle that penalties must not be applied retrospectively.

The word 'penalty' in A 7 had an autonomous meaning. The starting point in any assessment of the existence of a penalty was whether the measure in question was imposed following conviction for a criminal offence. Other factors that could be taken into account as relevant were the characterisation of the measure under national law; its nature and purpose; the procedures involved in the making and implementation of the measure; and its severity. The sanction imposed on the applicant was ordered by a criminal court, was intended to be deterrent and could have led to a punitive deprivation of liberty. It was therefore a penalty within the meaning of A 7(1). The fact that the applicant was absolved from the obligation to pay a substantial part of the customs fine, although he had never been made to serve any period of imprisonment in default did not suffice to invalidate that conclusion. A 7 was therefore applicable. At the time when the offences were committed, the maximum period of imprisonment in default to which he was liable was 4 months. The Paris Court of Appeal nevertheless applied a new law which had increased the maximum to two years. The law had been applied retrospectively and therefore there had been a breach of A 7(1).

Findingof breach constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (FF 50,000).

[Application lodged 25.1.1994; Commission report 3.12.1997; Court Judgment 21.1.1999]

Mr Józef Janowski was a journalist. On 2 September 1992, he was involved in an exchange with two municipal guards who he had noticed apparently ordering street vendors to leave a square. Subsequently, criminal proceedings were instituted against the applicant for having insulted municipal guards while they were carrying out their duties and with having acted with flagrant contempt for legal order. On 29 April 1993, the District Court convicted the applicant and sentenced him to eight months' imprisonment suspended for two years and a fine of 1,500,000 old zlotys. He was also ordered to pay the sum of PLZ 400,000 to charitable institutions and court costs. On appeal, the Regional Court quashed the part of the contested judgment relating to the sentence of imprisonment and the order to pay PLZ 400,000 to charitable institutions; however, it upheld the fine and reduced the court costs. The applicant complained, inter alia, that his conviction violated his right to freedom of expression.

Although the applicant raised several other complaints before the Court, only his complaint under A 10 had been declared admissible by the Commission and the Court was therefore required to examine only that complaint.

The applicant's conviction amounted to an interference with the exercise of his right to freedom of expression. The interference was prescribed by law, the applicant's conviction having been based on the Criminal Code. The applicant's conviction was intended to pursue the legitimate aim of the prevention of disorder. The Court recalled the fundamental principles which emerged from its previous judgments relating to A 10. The applicant was convicted of insulting the municipal guards by calling them 'oafs' and 'dumb' during an incident which took place in a square and was witnessed by bystanders. His remarks did not form part of an open discussion of matters of public concern; neither did they involve the issue of freedom of the press since the applicant, although a journalist by profession, clearly acted as a private individual on this occasion. The applicant's conviction was based on his utterance of the two words which were judged to be insulting by both trial and appeal courts, not the fact that he had expressed opinions critical of the guards or alleged that their actions were unlawful, therefore his conviction was not an attempt by the authorities to restore censorship and did not constitute discouragement of the expression of criticism. Civil servants had to enjoy public confidence in conditions free of undue perturbation if they were to be successful in performing their tasks and it might therefore prove necessary to protect them from offensive and abusive verbal attacks when on duty. In the present case, the requirements of such protection did not have to be weighed in relation to the interests of the freedom of the press or of open discussion of matters of public concern since the applicant's remarks were not uttered in such a context. The reasons prompting the applicant's conviction were relevant ones in terms of the legitimate aim pursued. Although the applicant resorted to abusive language out of genuine concern for the well-being of fellow citizens in the course of a heated discussion and that language was directed at law enforcement officers who were trained how to respond to it, he had however insulted the guards in a public place, in front of a group of bystanders, while they were carrying out their duties. The actions of the guards did not warrant resort to offensive and abusive verbal attacks. Consequently, even if there were some circumstances arguing the other way, sufficient grounds existed for the decision ultimately arrived at by the national courts. The reasons adduced by the national authorities were relevant and sufficient for the purposes of A 10(2) and the resultant interference was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The applicant's sentence was substantially reduced on appeal and, most significantly, his prison sentence was quashed by the Regional Court. Therefore, it could not be said that the national authorities overstepped the margin of appreciation available to them in assessing the necessity of the contested measure. There had therefore been no breach of A 10 of the Convention.

Jasper v United Kingdom 00/84

[Application lodged 26.9.1994; Commission report 20.10.1998; Court Judgment 16.2.2000]

Mr Eric Jasper, the applicant, was charged with an offence of being knowingly concerned in the fraudulent evasion of the prohibition on the importation of cannabis, and remanded for trial in the Crown Court. On 14 January 1994, shortly before the commencement of the trial, the prosecution made an ex parte application to the trial judge to withhold material in its possession on the grounds of public interest immunity. The defence were notified that an application was to be made, but were not informed of the category of material which the prosecution sought to withhold. They were given the opportunity to outline the defence case to the trial judge. The trial judge examined the material in question and ruled that it should not be disclosed. The defence were not informed of the reasons for the judge's decision. The applicant did not give evidence at his trial. On 31 January 1994, he was convicted of the offence charged and on 21 March 1994, he was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment. The applicant appealed to the Court of Appeal. His counsel applied to the Court of Appeal for an order that the defence should be given a transcript of the ex parte hearing of 14 January 1994, to enable them to argue the non-disclosure as a ground of appeal. The Court of Appeal, which had before it the transcript of the ex parte hearing and the material which had been its subject matter, declined to order the disclosure of either to the defence. On 28 March 1995, the Court of Appeal dismissed the applicant's appeal. The applicant complained that the proceedings before the Crown Court and the Court of Appeal, by failing to disclose relevant evidence, undermined his right to a fair trial.

Judges: Mr L Wildhaber, President, Mrs E Palm (d), Mr L Ferrari Bravo, Mr L Caflisch, Mr J-P Costa, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr M Fischbach (d), Mr B Zupancic (d), Mrs N Vajic (d), Mr J Hedigan (d), Mrs W Thomassen (d), Mrs M Tsatsa-Nikolovska (d), Mr T Pantiru, Mr E Levits, Mr K Traja (d), Sir John Laws, ad hoc judge.

The guarantees in A 6(3) were specific aspects of the right to a fair trial (A 6(1)). It was a fundamental aspect of the right to a fair trial that criminal proceedings, including the elements of such proceedings which related to procedure, should be adversarial and that there should be equality of arms between the prosecution and defence. The right to an adversarial trial meant, in a criminal case, that both prosecution and defence had to be given the opportunity to have knowledge of and comment on the observations filed and the evidence adduced by the other party. In addition, A 6(1) required that the prosecution authorities should disclose to the defence all material evidence in their possession for or against the accused. However, the entitlement to disclosure of relevant evidence was not an absolute right. In any criminal proceedings, there might be competing interests, such as national security or the need to protect witnesses at risk of reprisals or keep secret police methods of investigation of crime, which had to be weighed against the rights of the accused, and it might be necessary to withhold certain evidence from the defence so as to preserve the fundamental rights of another individual or to safeguard an important public interest. However, only such measures restricting the rights of the defence which were strictly necessary were permissible under A 6(1). Moreover, in order to ensure that the accused received a fair trial, any difficulties caused to the defence by a limitation on its rights had to be sufficiently counterbalanced by the procedures followed by the judicial authorities. In cases where evidence had been withheld from the defence on public interest grounds, it was not the role of the Court to decide whether or not such non-disclosure was strictly necessary since, as a general rule, it was for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court had to scrutinise the decision making procedure to ensure that, as far as possible, it complied with the requirements to provide adversarial proceedings and equality of arms and incorporated adequate safeguards to protect the interests of the accused. The defence were kept informed and permitted to make submissions and participate in the decision making process as far as was possible without revealing to them the material which the prosecution sought to keep secret on public interest grounds. The material which was not disclosed in the present case formed no part of the prosecution case and was never put to the jury. The fact that the need for disclosure was at all times under assessment by the trial judge provided a further, important, safeguard in that it was his duty to monitor throughout the trial the fairness or otherwise of the evidence being withheld. The judge was fully versed in all the evidence and issues in the case and in a position to monitor the relevance to the defence of the withheld information both before and during the trial. It could be assumed that the judge applied the principles which had recently been clarified by the Court of Appeal in such cases. The trial court had applied standards which were in conformity with the relevant principles of a fair trial embodied in A 6(1). The Court of Appeal had also considered whether or not the evidence should have been disclosed, so providing an additional level of protection for the applicant's rights. The decision making procedure complied with the requirements of adversarial proceedings and equality of arms and incorporated adequate safeguards to protect the interests of the accused, therefore there had been no violation of A 6(1) in the present case.

Jecius v Lithuania 00/200

[Application lodged 30.12.1996; Court Judgment 31.7.2000]

Mr Juozas Jecius a hotel director, was suspected of a murder committed in 1994. In 1995, the murder case was struck off because of the absence of evidence. However, he was arrested on 8 February 1996 and his 'preventive detention' for 60 days was ordered by the Chief Police Commissioner and confirmed the following day by the Regional Court. Preventive detention was authorised where there were reasons to suspect that a dangerous act, such as banditism, criminal association and terrorising a person, might be committed. On 8 March 1996, the murder case was reopened and on 14 March 1996, the Deputy Prosecutor General authorised the applicant's detention on remand until 4 June 1996. Applications by the applicant contesting his detention were rejected. On 13 June 1996, the prosecutor informed the prison administration that the applicant's detention was automatically extended until 14 June 1996 pursuant to the Code of Criminal Procedure. On 31 July 1996, the Regional Court decided that the applicant's remand should remain unchanged. From 14 to 16 October 1996 the Regional Court heard the case in the presence of the applicant and his lawyer and decided that the applicant was to remain in custody until 15 February 1997. The applicant's appeal was dismissed by the Court of Appeal in November 1997. An application to the Supreme Court was also rejected and civil proceedings against the prison administration for keeping him in detention without any formal order were unsuccessful. The Ombudsman had in the meantime found that the applicant had been detained illegally from 14 June to 31 July. The applicant was acquitted and released in June 1997. The proceedings were discontinued in October 1997. The applicant died in 1999. He had complained about his detention.

Court dismissed the Government's preliminary objection, found unanimously V 5(1) as regards the applicant's preventive detention and his detention on remand from 4 June to 31 July 1996, NV 5(1) as regards the applicant's detention on remand from 31 July to 16 October 1996, NV 5(3) as regards the alleged failure to bring the applicant promptly before a judge or other officer, V 5(3) as regards the length of the applicant's detention on remand, V 5(4).

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mr P Kûris, Mrs F Tulkens, Mr K Jungwiert, Mr K Traja, Mr M Ugrekhelidze.

The Court considered that the applicant's widow had a legitimate interest in maintaining the application.

In respect of a complaint about the absence of a remedy for a continuing situation, such as a period of detention, the six months' time limit under A 35(1) started running from the end of that situation, such as release from custody. In addition, in applying A 35(1), the Court often looked behind mere appearances, without excessive formalism. Although, on 14 March 1996, the applicant's preventive detention was formally replaced by remand in custody, the change of statutory basis did not affect the applicant's situation for he was neither moved to another cell or prison, nor brought before a competent legal authority to be informed of the change. The overall period of the applicant's detention had to be taken as a whole for the purpose of applying the six months' rule in the case. As the applicant was still remanded in custody, of which detention he complained when lodging the present application on 30 December 1996, the case could not be dismissed as being out of time. Government's preliminary objection regarding time limit dismissed.

A person could be deprived of his liberty only for the purposes specified in A 5(1). Preventive detention of the kind found in the present case was not permitted by A 5(1)(c). There had thus been a breach.

From 4 June to 31 July 1996, no order was made by a judge or prosecutor authorising the applicant's detention and that therefore was incompatible with the domestic law then in force. The deprivation of liberty by reference to former 226(6) of the Code of the Criminal Procedure was not prescribed by law. The practice of keeping a person in detention without a specific legal basis was incompatible with the principles of legal certainty and the protection from arbitrariness. The fact that the case was transmitted to the Regional Court on 24 June 1996 did not clarify whether and under what conditions the applicant's detention could be continued during the trial. The applicant's detention by reference to the sole fact that the case had been transmitted to the court did not constitute a lawful basis for the applicant's continued remand in custody. There was no valid domestic decision or other lawful basis for the applicant's detention on remand from June to 31 July 1996. There had therefore been a violation of A 5(1).

The applicant did not dispute that during the directions hearing of 31 July 1996, the Regional Court acted within its jurisdiction in so far as it had power to make an appropriate order in respect of the applicant's detention. Although the Regional Court did not order a new remand measure, nor did it specify which type of remand should remain unchanged, given the context, the meaning of the decision must have been clear to all present, including the applicant's lawyer. The Regional Court did not act in bad faith or fail to apply the relevant domestic legislation correctly. It had not been established, therefore, that the detention order of 31 July 1996 was invalid in domestic law or that the ensuing detention was unlawful within the meaning of A 5(1). There had therefore been no breach of A 5(1) in respect of the detention from 31 July to 16 October 1996.

From his arrest on 8 February until 14 March 1996, the applicant was held in preventive detention, to which A 5(1)(c) did not apply, and therefore the guarantee that the applicant be brought promptly before an appropriate officer under A 5(3) was not applicable to his preventive detention. From 14 March to 14 October 1996, he remained in custody without being brought before an officer within the meaning of A 5(3). However, the Lithuanian reservation which was in force until 21 June 1996 was sufficiently clear to fulfil the requirements of A 57 and the fact that the applicant was not brought before an appropriate officer when his remand in custody was ordered could not constitute a violation of A 5(3) as long as the reservation was in force. The words 'brought promptly' implied that the right to be brought before an appropriate officer related to the time when a person was first deprived of his liberty under A 5(1)(c). When the reservation to A 5(3) expired on 21 June 1996, the applicant had been held in detention on remand for more than three months and accordingly, by that date, any notion of 'promptness' had already been exceeded. A reservation would be devoid of its purpose if the State were required, on its expiry, to enforce the right retroactively. Therefore, when the reservation expired, Lithuania was no longer under an obligation to bring the applicant promptly before an appropriate officer. Consequently, there was no scope under A 5(3) for a renewed obligation after the expiry of the reservation and no violation of A 5(3).

The applicant's preventive detention from 8 February to 14 March 1996 did not fall within the scope of A 5(1)(c), and A 5(3) was not applicable to that period. The applicant's remand in custody lasted from 14 March 1996 to 9 June 1997, ie, 14 months and 26 days. By the time the applicant's detention on remand was authorised, he had been held in custody for over a month since 8 February 1996. The reasonableness of the length of detention had to be assessed according to the special features of the case. Continued detention could be justified in a given case only if there were clear indications of a genuine public interest which, notwithstanding the presumption of innocence, outweighed the right to liberty. The persistence of a reasonable suspicion that the person arrested had committed an offence is a condition sine qua non for the lawfulness of the continued detention, but after a certain lapse of time it no longer sufficed. The only reasons given by the prosecuting authorities for the applicant's detention on remand were the gravity of the offence and the strength of evidence against him. The Regional Court gave no reasons justifying the continued remand. The suspicion against the applicant of having committed murder might initially have justified his detention, but it could not constitute a 'relevant and sufficient' ground for his being held in custody for almost 15 months, particularly when that suspicion was proved unsubstantiated by the trial court which acquitted the applicant. It followed that the length of the applicant's detention was excessive and there had been a breach of A 5(3).

A 5(4) guaranteed no right, as such, to an appeal against decisions ordering or extending detention, as the provision spoke of 'proceedings' and not of appeals. In principle, the intervention of one organ satisfied A 5(4), on condition that the procedure followed had a judicial character and gave to the individual concerned appropriate guarantees. The Regional Court, in its decisions authorising the applicant's remand in custody, made no reference to the applicant's grievances about the unlawfulness of his detention and although the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court acknowledged that the lawfulness of the applicant's detention was open to question, they failed to examine the applicant's complaints due to the statutory bar then in force. The civil proceedings brought by the applicant against the prison administration were not relevant for the purpose of A 5(4) as the civil courts were not competent to order the applicant's release. The applicant had therefore been denied the right to contest the procedural and substantive conditions essential for the 'lawfulness' of his remand in custody. There had therefore been a breach of A 5(4).

[Application lodged 25.7.1989; Commission report 8.7.1993; Court Judgment 23.9.1994]

Mr Jens Olaf Jersild was a journalist employed by Danmarks Radio assigned to its Sunday News Magazine. The editors of the Sunday News Magazine decided to produce a documentary on a group of young people with racist attitudes who called themselves the Greenjackets. During the interview, which was conducted by the applicant, the three Greenjackets made abusive and derogatory remarks about immigrants and ethnic groups in Denmark. The applicant subsequently edited and cut the film of the interview down to a few minutes and it was broadcast on 21 July 1985. Following the programme, the Public Prosecutor instituted criminal proceedings against the three youths interviewed by the applicant under the Penal Code. The applicant and the programme controller were charged with aiding and abetting the three youths. On 24 April 1987, the City Court convicted the three youths. The applicant and the programme controller were convicted of aiding and abetting them, and sentenced to pay day fines totalling DKK 1,000 and DKK 2,000, respectively, or alternatively to five days' imprisonment. The applicant's appeals to the High Court and Supreme Court were dismissed. He complained that his conviction and sentence for having aided and abetted the dissemination of racist remarks violated his right to freedom of expression.

The applicant's conviction and sentence constituted an interference with his right to freedom of expression. The interference was prescribed by law, namely, the Penal Code, and pursued a legitimate aim, namely the protection of the reputation or rights of others. The only point in dispute was whether the measures were necessary in a democratic society. The applicant did not make the objectionable statements himself, but assisted in their dissemination in his capacity of television journalist responsible for a news programme. The Court recalled its previous case-law. The applicant had himself taken the initiative of preparing the Greenjackets feature and knew in advance that racist statements were likely to be made during the interview, and encouraged those statements. He had edited the programme in such a way as to include the offensive assertions. Without his involvement, the remarks would not have been disseminated to a wide circle of people and would thus not have been punishable. However, the TV presenter's introduction, putting the programme into a context, meant that the feature could not objectively have appeared to have as its purpose the propagation of racist views and ideas; rather, it clearly sought to expose, analyse and explain this particular group of youths, limited and frustrated by their social situation, with criminal records and violent attitudes, thus dealing with specific aspects of a matter that already then was of great public concern. The item was broadcast as part of a serious Danish news programme and was intended for a well-informed audience. The TV presenter's introduction and the applicant's conduct during the interviews clearly dissociated him from the persons interviewed. The applicant also rebutted some of the racist statements. Taken as a whole, the filmed portrait conveyed the meaning that the racist statements were part of a generally anti-social attitude of the Greenjackets. News reporting based on interviews, whether edited or not, constituted one of the most important means whereby the press was able to play its vital role of 'public watchdog'. The punishment of a journalist for assisting in the dissemination of statements made by another person in an interview would seriously hamper the contribution of the press to discussion of matters of public interest and should not be envisaged unless there were particularly strong reasons for doing so. The remarks in respect of which the Greenjackets were convicted were more than insulting to members of the targeted groups and did not enjoy the protection of A 10. However, even having regard to the manner in which the applicant prepared the Greenjackets item, it had not been shown that, considered as a whole, the feature was such as to justify his conviction of, and punishment for, a criminal offence under the Penal Code. The applicant's purpose in compiling the broadcast in question was not racist. It had not been established convincingly that the interference was necessary in a democratic society; in particular, the means employed were disproportionate to the aim of protecting the reputation or rights of others. Accordingly there had been a breach of A 10.

Johansen v Norway (1997) 23 EHRR 33 96/28

[Application lodged 10.10.1990; Commission report 17.1.1995; Court Judgment 7.8.1996]

Ms Adele Johansen gave birth to her son C when she was 17. She cohabited with a man who mistreated her and C. On many occasions, the social welfare authorities assisted the applicant in the upbringing of C. In August 1988, C began to receive psychiatric treatment and was admitted to a special school adapted to his needs. In November 1989 C, who was then 12 years old, was provisionally taken into care. On 7 December 1989, the applicant gave birth to her daughter S. In view of the applicant's difficult situation and the problems with regard to the upbringing of C, the child welfare authorities were contacted. On 3 May 1990, on the basis of the information and evidence submitted to it, the Client and Patient Committee decided to take S into care, to deprive the applicant of her parental responsibilities, to place S in a foster home with a view to adoption, to refuse the mother access as from the moment of the child's placement in the foster home and to keep the latter's address secret. The applicant's appeals against the care measures in respect of S were unsuccessful. S was placed with foster parents on 30 May 1990. The applicant had not had access to or seen her daughter since. She complained that there had been a violation of her right to respect for family life on account of the order to take her daughter into public care, the deprivation of her parental rights, the termination of her access to her daughter, the excessive length of the proceedings and their lack of fairness.

Comm found unanimously NV 8 with regard to the taking of her daughter into care and the maintenance in force of the care decision, by majority (11–2) V 8 as regards the decision depriving the applicant of her parental rights and access, by majority (12–1) that no separate issue arose under 6, unanimously no separate issue under 13.

Court found unanimously NV 8 with regard to the taking into care of the applicant's daughter and the maintenance in force of the care decision, by majority (8–1) V 8 with regard to the decision of 3 May 1990, in so far as it deprived the applicant of her access and parental rights in respect of her daughter, unanimously NV 6(1), unanimously not necessary to examine 13.

Judges: Mr R Bernhardt, President, Mr R Ryssdal, Mr R Macdonald, Mr I Foighel, Mr R Pekkanen, Mr AN Loizou, Mr JM Morenilla (pd), Mr P Kûris, Mr U Lôhmus.

The mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted a fundamental element of family life and domestic measures hindering such enjoyment amounted to an interference with the right protected by A 8. The impugned measures amounted to interferences with the applicant's right to respect for her family life. Such interference was a violation of A 8 unless it was in accordance with the law, pursued a legitimate aim or aims and could be regarded as necessary in a democratic society. The measures had a basis in national law. The measures were aimed at protecting the health and rights and freedoms of the applicant's daughter and thus pursued legitimate aims. In determining whether the impugned measures were necessary in a democratic society, the Court considered whether, in the light of the case as a whole, the reasons adduced to justify them were relevant and sufficient for the purposes of A 8(2). The margin of appreciation to be accorded to the competent national authorities would vary in the light of the nature of the issues and the seriousness of the interests at stake. The authorities enjoyed a wide margin of appreciation in assessing the necessity of taking a child into care. However, a stricter scrutiny was called for both of any further limitations, such as restrictions placed by those authorities on parental rights and access, and of any legal safeguards designed to secure an effective protection of the right of parents and children to respect for their family life. There was nothing to suggest that the decision-making process leading to the adoption of the impugned measures by the Committee was unfair or failed to involve the applicant to a degree sufficient to provide her with the requisite protection of her interests. The procedure did not give rise to a breach of A 8. The taking of the applicant's daughter S into care and the maintenance in force of the care decision concerned were based on reasons which were relevant and sufficient for the purposes of A 8(2). The measures were supported by painstaking and detailed assessments by the experts appointed by the Committee and the City Court. The national authorities had acted within the margin of appreciation afforded to them in such matters. Accordingly, these measures did not constitute a violation of A 8. Taking a child into care should normally be regarded as a temporary measure to be discontinued as soon as circumstances permitted and any measures of implementation of temporary care should be consistent with the ultimate aim of reuniting the natural parent and the child. In this regard, a fair balance had to be struck between the interests of the child in remaining in public care and those of the parent in being reunited with the child. In carrying out this balancing exercise, particular importance would be attached to the best interests of the child, which, depending on their nature and seriousness, might override those of the parent. In the present case, the applicant had been deprived of her parental rights and access in the context of a permanent placement of her daughter in a foster home with a view to adoption by the foster parents. Those measures were particularly far reaching in that they totally deprived the applicant of her family life with the child and were inconsistent with the aim of reuniting them. Such measures should only be applied in exceptional circumstances and could only be justified if they were motivated by an overriding requirement pertaining to the child's best interests. It was in the child's interest to ensure that the process of establishing bonds with her foster parents was not disrupted. The girl, who had been taken into care shortly after birth and had already spent half a year with temporary carers before being placed in a long term foster home, was at a stage of her development when it was crucial that she live under secure and emotionally stable conditions. There was no reason to doubt that the care in the foster home had better prospects of success if the placement was made with a view to adoption. In addition, regard had to be had to the fact that the child welfare authorities found that the applicant was not 'particularly motivated to accept treatment' and even feared that she might take her daughter away. Those considerations were all relevant to the issue of necessity under A 8(2). It remained to be examined whether they were also sufficient to justify the Committee's decision of 3 May 1990 to cut off the contact between the mother and the child. Between the birth of the applicant's daughter on 7 December 1989 and the Committee's decision of 3 May 1990, the applicant had had access to her child twice a week without any criticism. Her lifestyle had changed for the better. It was the difficulties experienced in the implementation of the care decision concerning her son which provided the reason for the authorities' view that the applicant was unlikely to co-operate and that there was a risk of her disturbing the daughter's care if given access to the foster home. However, it could not be said that those difficulties and that risk were of such a nature and degree as to dispense the authorities altogether from their normal obligation under A 8 to take measures with a view to reuniting them if the mother were to become able to provide the daughter with a satisfactory upbringing. Against that background, the Court did not consider that the decision of 3 May 1990, in so far as it deprived the applicant of her access and parental rights in respect of her daughter, was sufficiently justified for the purposes of A 8(2), it not having been shown that the measure corresponded to any overriding requirement in the child's best interests. Therefore, the national authorities overstepped their margin of appreciation, thereby violating the applicant's rights under A 8. In the circumstances, it could not be considered that the applicant's allegation that the length of the care proceedings was excessive gave rise to any issue under A 8.

A 6: The proceedings leading to the deprivation of parental rights and access commenced before the Committee on 13 December 1989 and ended when the Supreme Court refused leave to appeal on 19 September 1991, a period of one year, nine months. In view of what was at stake for the applicant and the irreversible and definitive character of the measures concerned, the competent national authorities were required by A 6(1) to act with exceptional diligence in ensuring the progress of the proceedings. However, they had not failed to discharge their obligations in this respect. The three administrative and two judicial levels involved had not been shown to have failed to act with the diligence required. Nor did it appear, having regard to the complexity of the case, that the duration of the proceedings as a whole exceeded a reasonable time. Accordingly, there was no breach of A 6 on account of the length of the proceedings.

The complaint under A 13 was not pursued by the applicant before the Court, which did not consider it necessary to examine it of its own motion.

Johnson v United Kingdom (1999) 27 EHRR 296 97/84

[Application lodged 8.7.1993; Commission report 25.6.1996; Court Judgment 24.10.1997]

Mr Stanley Johnson was convicted on 8 August 1984 of causing actual bodily harm to a woman passer-by in a random and unprovoked attack. While on remand in prison, he was diagnosed as suffering from mental illness and the Crown Court accordingly imposed a hospital order on him and also made subject to a restriction order without limit in time, the court being satisfied that this order was necessary for the protection of the public from serious harm. The applicant was admitted to Rampton Hospital, a maximum security psychiatric institution. His detention was reviewed on several occasions between December 1986 and January 1993 by a Mental Health Review Tribunal. The psychiatric reports for the review in June 1989 concluded that the applicant was free of symptoms of mental illness. The Tribunal ordered the applicant's conditional discharge, the conditions being that the applicant be subject to the psychiatric supervision of a psychiatrist and psychiatric social worker, and reside in a supervised hostel approved by his psychiatric team. The applicant's discharge was to be deferred until arrangements could be made for suitable accommodation. There were difficulties in securing appropriate accommodation. The applicant undertook a period of trial leave which was unsuccessful. At a review on 12 January 1993, the Tribunal ordered the applicant's absolute discharge on the basis that the applicant was no longer suffering from any form of mental disorder. The applicant was released from Rampton Hospital on 21 January 1993. He complained that his continued detention from June 1989 to January 1993 constituted a violation of A 5(1) and 5(4).

Comm found by majority (15–1) V 5(1), no separate issue under 5(4).

Court found unanimously V 5(1), no separate issue under 5(4).

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr A Spielmann, Mr N Valticos, Sir John Freeland, Mr AB Baka, Mr P Kûris, Mr E Levits, Mr P Van Dijk.

It did not automatically follow from a finding by an expert authority that the mental disorder which justified a patient's compulsory confinement no longer persisted, that the latter had to be immediately and unconditionally released into the community. Such a rigid approach to the interpretation of that condition would place an unacceptable degree of constraint on the responsible authority's exercise of judgment to determine in particular cases and on the basis of all the relevant circumstances whether the interests of the patient and the community into which he was to be released would be best served by this course of action. It had to also be observed that in the field of mental illness the assessment as to whether the disappearance of the symptoms of the illness was confirmation of complete recovery was not an exact science. A responsible authority was entitled to exercise a measure of discretion in deciding whether in the light of all the relevant circumstances and the interests at stake it would be appropriate to order the immediate and absolute discharge of a person who was no longer suffering from the mental disorder which led to his confinement. That authority had to be able to retain some measure of supervision over the progress of the person once he was released into the community and, to that end, make his discharge subject to conditions. The imposition of a particular condition may in certain circumstances justify a deferral of discharge from detention, having regard to the nature of the condition and to the reasons for imposing it. It was, however, of paramount importance that appropriate safeguards were in place so as to ensure that any deferral of discharge was consonant with the purpose of A 5(1) and with the aim of the restriction in 5(1)(e) and, in particular, that discharge was not unreasonably delayed. The 1989 Tribunal could in the exercise of its judgment properly conclude that it was premature to order the applicant's absolute and immediate discharge from Rampton Hospital. The Tribunal was also in principle justified in deferring the applicant's release in order to enable the authorities to locate a hostel which best suited his needs and provided him with the most appropriate conditions for his successful rehabilitation. The requirement to remain under psychiatric and social-worker supervision would not have hindered his immediate release from Rampton Hospital into the community and could not be said to raise an issue under A 5(1). However, while imposing the hostel residence requirement on the applicant and deferring his release until the arrangements had been made to its satisfaction, the Tribunal lacked the power to guarantee that the applicant would be relocated to a suitable post-discharge hostel within a reasonable period of time. The onus was on the authorities to secure a hostel willing to admit the applicant. They were expected to proceed with all reasonable expedition in finalising the arrangements for a placement. Neither the Tribunal nor the authorities possessed the necessary powers to ensure that the condition could be implemented within a reasonable time. In addition, the earliest date on which the applicant could have had his continued detention reviewed was 12 months after the review conducted by the June 1989 Tribunal. In between reviews the applicant could not petition the Tribunal to have the terms of the hostel residence condition reconsidered; nor was the Tribunal empowered to monitor periodically outside the annual reviews the progress made in the search for a hostel and to amend the deferred conditional discharge order in the light of the difficulties encountered by the authorities. While the Secretary of State could have referred the applicant's case to the Tribunal at any time, that possibility was unlikely to be effected in practice, since even at the date of the January 1993 Tribunal, the authorities maintained their opposition to the applicant's release from detention until he had fulfilled the hostel condition. The imposition of the hostel residence condition by the June 1989 Tribunal led to the indefinite deferral of the applicant's release from Rampton Hospital, especially since the applicant was unwilling after October 1990 to co-operate further with the authorities in their efforts to secure a hostel, thereby excluding any possibility that the condition could be satisfied. While the 1990 and 1991 Tribunals considered the applicant's case afresh, they were obliged to order his continued detention since he had not yet fulfilled the terms of the conditional discharge imposed by the June 1989 Tribunal. Having regard to the situation which resulted from the decision taken by the latter Tribunal and to the lack of adequate safeguards, including provision for judicial review to ensure that the applicant's release from detention would not be unreasonably delayed, his continued confinement after 15 June 1989 could not be justified on the basis of A 5(1)(e) of the Convention. His continued detention after that date therefore constituted a violation of A 5(1).

The issues raised by the applicant under A 5(4) had already been examined in the context of his complaint under A 5(1) and therefore gave rise to no separate issue.

Non-pecuniary damage (GBP 10,000), costs and expenses (GBP 25,000).

Johnston and Others v Ireland (1987) 9 EHRR 203 86/15

[Application lodged 16.2.1982; Commission report 5.3.1985; Court Judgment 18.12.1986]

The first applicant Roy HW Johnston, a scientific research and development manager lived with the second applicant, Janice Williams-Johnston, who was a school-teacher and the third applicant, their daughter Nessa Doreen Williams-Johnston born in 1978. The first applicant had previously been married but that relationship had irretrievably broken down and resulted in a separation. Under the Constitution of Ireland the first applicant was unable to obtain a dissolution of his marriage to enable him to marry the second applicant. The applicants complained of the absence of provision in Ireland for divorce and for recognition of the family life of persons who, after the breakdown of the marriage of one of them, are living in a family relationship outside marriage.

Comm found unanimously NV 8 or 12 in that the right to divorce and subsequently to re-marry was not guaranteed by the Convention, by majority (12–1) NV 8 in that Irish law did not confer a recognised family status on the first and second applicants, unanimously V 8 in that the legal regime concerning the status of the third applicant under Irish law failed to respect the family life of all three applicants, unanimously NV 9 in respect of the first applicant, by majority (12–1) NV 14+8 or 14+12 in that the first and second applicants had not been discriminated against by Irish law, not necessary to examine the third applicant's separate complaint of discrimination, unanimously NV 13.

Court unanimously rejected the Government's preliminary objections, found by majority (16–1) NV 8 or 12 in respect of the absence of provision for divorce under Irish law and the resultant inability of the first and second applicants to marry each other, NV 14+8 in respect of first and second applicants by reason of the fact that certain foreign divorces could be recognised by the law of Ireland, A 9 not applicable, unanimously NV 8 regards the other aspects of their own status under Irish law complained of by the first and second applicants, unanimously V 8 in respect of the legal situation of the third applicant under Irish law as regards all three applicants (16–1) not necessary to examine the third applicant's allegation under 14+8, by reason of the disabilities to which she is subject under Irish succession law.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr J Cremona, Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, Mr G Lagergren, Mr F Gölcüklü, Mr F Matscher, Mr J Pinheiro Farinha (declaration), Mr L-E Pettiti, Mr B Walsh, Sir Vincent Evans, Mr R Macdonald, Mr C Russo, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr J Gersing, Mr A Spielmann, Mr J De Meyer (so), Mr J A Carrillo Salcedo.

A 25 entitled individuals to contend that a law violated their rights by itself, in the absence of an individual measure of implementation, if they run the risk of being directly affected by it. The question of the existence or absence of detriment was not a matter for A 25 which, in its use of the word victim, denoted the person directly affected by the act or omission which was in issue. The applicants were therefore entitled in the present case to claim to be victims of the breaches which they alleged. The Court did not consider that it should accede to the Government's invitation to defer judgment until after the enactment of the Status of Children Bill, which was designed to modify the relevant Irish law in a number of respects. On several occasions the Court had proceeded with its examination of a case notwithstanding the existence of proposed or intervening reforms.

The only remedies which A 26 required to be exhausted were those that related to the breaches alleged; the existence of such remedies had to be sufficiently certain not only in theory but also in practice, failing which they would lack the requisite accessibility and effectiveness; and it fell to the respondent State, if it pleaded non-exhaustion, to establish that those various conditions were satisfied. In so far as the applicants' complaints related to the prohibition of divorce under the Constitution of Ireland, no effective domestic remedy was available. As regards the remaining issues, bearing particularly in mind the established case-law of the Irish courts, the Government had not established with any degree of certainty the existence of any effective remedy.

The matters in question did not fall outside the compass of the case brought before the Court, which compass was delimited by the Commission's admissibility decision. None of them was inadmissible for non-exhaustion of domestic remedies

The right to marry covered the formation of marital relationships but not their dissolution. The Convention and its Protocols had to be interpreted in the light of present-day conditions. However, the Court could not, by means of an evolutive interpretation, derive a right that was not included therein at the outset. That was particularly so here, where the omission was deliberate. The applicants could not derive a right to divorce from A 12. That provision was therefore inapplicable in the present case, either on its own or in conjunction with A 14.

By guaranteeing the right to respect for family life, A 8 presupposed the existence of a family. A 8 applied to the family life of the illegitimate family as well as to that of the legitimate family. Although the essential object of A 8 was to protect the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, there might in addition be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for family life. The applicants constituted a family for the purposes of A 8. They were thus entitled to its protection, notwithstanding the fact that their relationship existed outside marriage.

The Convention had to be read as a whole and the Court did not consider that a right to divorce, could, with consistency, be derived from A 8 a provision of more general purpose and scope. Although the protection of private or family life might sometimes necessitate means whereby spouses could be relieved from the duty to live together, the engagements undertaken by Ireland under A 8 could not be regarded as extending to an obligation on its part to introduce measures permitting the divorce and the re-marriage which the applicants sought. There was therefore no failure to respect the family life of the first and second applicants.

A 14 safeguarded persons who are placed in analogous situations against discriminatory differences of treatment in the exercise of the rights and freedoms recognised by the Convention. Under the general Irish rules of private international law foreign divorces would be recognised in Ireland only if they had been obtained by persons domiciled abroad. It had not been established that those rules were departed from in practice. The situations of such persons and of the first and second applicants could not be regarded as analogous. There was, accordingly, no discrimination, within the meaning of A 14.

A 9 did not extend to the non-availability of divorce under Irish law. Accordingly, that provision, and A 14 were also not applicable.

There had been no interference by the public authorities with the family life of the first and second applicants: Ireland has done nothing to impede or prevent them from living together and continuing to do so and, indeed, they had been able to take a number of steps to regularise their situation as best they could. Certain legislative provisions designed to support family life were not available to the first and second applicants. However, it was not possible to derive from A 8 an obligation on the part of Ireland to establish for unmarried couples a status analogous to that of married couples. A number of the matters complained of were consequences of the inability to obtain a dissolution of the first applicant's marriage to enable him to marry the second applicant, a situation which the Court had found not to be incompatible with the Convention. As for the other matters, A 8 could not be interpreted as imposing an obligation to establish a special regime for a particular category of unmarried couples. There was accordingly no violation of A 8.

The normal development of the natural family ties between the first and second applicants and their daughter required that she should be placed, legally and socially, in a position akin to that of a legitimate child. The third applicant's present legal situation differed considerably from that of a legitimate child; in addition, it had not been shown that there were any means available to her or her parents to eliminate or reduce the differences. Having regard to the particular circumstances of the case and notwithstanding the wide margin of appreciation enjoyed by Ireland in this area, the absence of an appropriate legal regime reflecting the third applicant's natural family ties amounted to a failure to respect her family life. Moreover, the close and intimate relationship between the third applicant and her parents was such that there is of necessity also a resultant failure to respect the family life of each of the latter. There was accordingly, as regards all three applicants, a breach of A 8 under this head.

It was not necessary to give a separate ruling on the allegation under 14 and 8 as succession rights were included amongst the aspects of Irish law which were taken into consideration in the examination of the general complaint concerning the third applicant's legal situation.

Findings on violations constituted sufficient just satisfaction. Legal costs and expenses (IRP 12,000).

Jordan v United Kingdom 00/90

[Application lodged 19.2.1996; Court Judgment 14.3.2000]

Stephen Jordan, a soldier of the regular forces in the Grenadier Guards, was arrested on 20 April 1995 by the civilian police after having gone missing from his unit. His commanding officer dealt with the charge summarily and sentenced him to, inter alia, 28 days' imprisonment. He was due for release on 27 May 1995, but his detention continued on the basis of the suspected offences that were being investigated. On 16 June 1995 and 29 August 1995, the applicant was brought before his commanding officer and charges under the Theft Act were read to him. He was remanded for trial by court-martial. In November 1995, the applicant commenced habeas corpus proceedings in the High Court requesting his release. The army authorities admitted that due to an 'administrative oversight', the applicant had not been charged until 16 June 1995. He was released on 11 December 1995 and subsequently brought proceedings for compensation from the Ministry of Defence in respect of his detention from 27 May to 11 December 1995. The authorities accepted that the applicant's detention had been unlawful and the matter was settled on 21 October 1996 with the applicant being paid compensation and costs. The applicant was tried by court-martial and sentenced to imprisonment. His appeal to the Courts-Martial Appeal Court was pending.

Court found unanimously V 5(3), V 5(5).

Judges: Mr J-P Costa, President, Sir Nicolas Bratza, Mr L Loucaides, Mr P Kûris, Mr W Fuhrmann, Mrs HS Greve, Mr K Traja.

Given the nature of the relevant charges and the penalty imposed, the applicant was arrested on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence within the meaning of A 5(1)(c), his close arrest, that is, confinement to a cell under supervision, amounted to detention. The commanding officer was liable to play a central role in the subsequent prosecution of the case against an accused and, in addition, his responsibility for discipline and order provided an additional reason for an accused reasonably to doubt that officer's impartiality when deciding on the necessity of the pre-trial detention. Accordingly, there had been a violation of A 5(3), since the commanding officer could not be regarded as independent of the parties at the relevant time.

The applicant did not have an enforceable right to compensation. There had therefore been a violation of A 5(5).

Judgment constituted sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage. Costs and expenses (GBP 3,500).

K v Austria 93/21

[Application lodged 27.11.1989; Commission report 13.10.1992; Court Judgment 2.6.1993]

In 1989, the applicant was accused of having bought heroin from a couple, Mr and Mrs W, who were facing a separate prosecution for drug trafficking. He pleaded not guilty in the District Court, which adjourned the trial on 19 May 1989. The Regional Court summoned him to appear on 30 May 1989 to give evidence in the trial of Mr and Mrs W. At the hearing, the applicant refused to testify because of the proceedings pending against him. The court then refused to give him leave to remain silent under the Code of Criminal Procedure and, as he persisted in his refusal, first fined him 3,000 schillings and then sentenced him to five days' imprisonment. His appeal to the Court of Appeal was declared inadmissible. He served the period of imprisonment. On 25 January 1990, when the applicant was again questioned in connection with the proceedings against Mr and Mrs W, he admitted having twice purchased heroin from them. The applicant complained that the proceedings resulting in the imposition of the fine and the obligation to make a statement liable to incriminate himself had been contrary to A 6(1). He also complained of his detention and the lack of any possibility of judicial review.

Comm found by majority (7–5) 6 inapplicable to the proceedings imposing the fine, (10–2) V 10 as regards the refusal to allow the applicant to remain silent, (11–1) NV 6(1) on the same point, (10–2) V 5(1), 5(4).

Court unanimously struck case out of the list.

Judges: Mr R Ryssdal, President, Mr R Bernhardt, Mr F Matscher, Mr J De Meyer, Mr JM Morenilla, Mr F Bigi, Sir John Freeland, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr J Makarczyk.

The Court took formal note of the friendly settlement reached between the Government and Mr K and considered it appropriate to strike the case out of the list.

K and T v Finland 00/131

[Application lodged 26.10.1994; Court Judgment 27.4.2000]

The applicants were cohabitees and had two children, J and M. K, the applicant mother, was hospitalised on occasions, having been diagnosed as suffering from schizophrenia. In 1993, the children were placed in care and restrictions were imposed on access to them. The applicants' appeals against public care orders were rejected by the Supreme Administrative Court. In May 1994, their access to the children was restricted to one monthly three hour supervised visit at the foster home. The applicants appealed unsuccessfully. They complained, inter alia, that their right to respect for their family life had been violated on account of the placement of the children in public care, that they had not been given the chance to work out their problems with the help of their relatives and by taking advantage of various support measures provided by the social and health care authorities, that the Social Welfare Board and the courts failed to carry out a proper examination of their request for a reunification of their family, that the access restrictions were excessive, thereby distancing the children both from their parents and other relatives.

Court unanimously found V 8, NV 13.

Judges: Mr G Ress, President, Mr M Pellonpää (c), Mr I Cabral Barreto, Mr V Butkevych, Mrs N Vajic, Mr J Hedigan, Mrs S Botoucharova.

The mutual enjoyment by parent and child of each other's company constituted a fundamental element of family life, and domestic measures hindering such enjoyment amounted to an interference with the right protected by A 8. The impugned measures amounted to interference with the applicants' right to respect for their family life as guaranteed by A 8(1) and constituted a violation of that article unless it satisfied A 8(2). The impugned measures had a basis in national law and the legitimate aim of protecting health and morals and the rights and freedoms of children. Regarding the taking into care, the reasons given and the methods used were arbitrary and unjustified under the circumstances. The Court noted that the applicants were not given any chance of even beginning their family life with new-born J and that the care order concerning M could not be reasonably justified in a situation in which the child was already in a safe environment and faced none of the risks mentioned in the relevant law as a precondition for the care order. The applicants were not informed of the decisions in advance, even though the authorities had prepared the decisions well before. Despite the margin of appreciation enjoyed by the national authorities in assessing the necessity of taking a child into care, in the light of the case as a whole, the reasons adduced to justify the care orders were not sufficient and the methods used in implementing those decisions were excessive. The taking into public care could not be regarded as necessary in a democratic society and accordingly constituted a violation of A 8.

Taking a child into care should normally be regarded as a temporary measure, to be discontinued as soon as circumstances permitted and any measures implementing temporary care should be consistent with the ultimate aim of reuniting the natural parent and the child. A fair balance had to be struck between the interests of the child in remaining in the public care and those of the parent in being reunited with the child. In carrying out this balancing exercise, particular importance had to be attached to the best interests of the child, which may override those of the parent. In particular, the parent could not be entitled under A 8 to have such measures taken as would harm the child's health and development. It was not the Court's task to substitute its view for that of the national authorities as to what should have been done. Nor did the Court suggest that public care should in all circumstances be a strictly temporary measure. In the present case, it appeared that there was a lack of any effort seriously to consider the termination of public care, despite evidence of an improvement in the situation which had led to the care orders, and that amounted to such a lack of fair balance between the various interests involved as to constitute a violation of A 8. Accordingly, there had been a violation of that article on this ground also.

In view of the above conclusion, it was not necessary to examine the access restrictions as a separate issue, except in so far as the present situation was concerned. Since 1994, the applicants had had access to the children once a month. While that may have been unreasonably restrictive earlier, the children had then been in public care for almost seven years. In view of that, the national authorities, within their margin of appreciation, could consider such restrictions necessary in the light of the present-day interests of the children. Accordingly, there was no violation of A 8 in that respect.

The applicants could apply to administrative courts against the care order, refusal to terminate the care and various access restrictions. Although the applicants' appeals did not prove successful, there was no indication that the Finnish administrative courts would not, as a general matter, fulfil the requirements of an 'effective remedy' within the meaning of A 13. Taking also into account the other remedies invoked by the Government, the Court considered that the applicants had available remedies satisfying the requirements of A 13.

KDB v The Netherlands (1999) 28 EHRR 168 98/20

[Application lodged 23.3.1993; Commission report 21.5.1997; Court Judgment 27.3.1998]

On 15 November 1991, the cattle on the applicant's farm were inspected by the General Inspection Service of the Ministry of Agriculture, Nature Conservancy and Fisheries. Twelve cows were singled out to which the applicant was suspected of having administered the illegal substance clenbuterol. The same day the public prosecutor ordered an interim measure under which the applicant was restrained from removing the 12 cows from his premises without permission and from obstructing the identification of the cows. His applications for the interim measure to be lifted were held before the Regional Court in camera and rejected. On 13 February 1992, through his lawyer, the applicant lodged an appeal on points of law to the Supreme Court. The lawyer did not submit any grounds of appeal in writing. On 24 December 1992, the Procurator General of the Supreme Court submitted an advisory opinion to the effect that no grounds of appeal had been submitted and that there were no reasons for the Supreme Court to quash the decision appealed against ex officio. He appended to his opinion a copy of a preliminary ruling of the Court of Justice of the European Communities concerning the interpretation of EEC Council Directive 86/469. Neither the applicant nor his lawyer received any notice of this until after the Supreme Court had given judgment. On 1 March 1993, the applicant was notified by the Procurator General that the Supreme Court had dismissed his appeal on 19 January. The applicant complained that he had not been informed of the date on which the Supreme Court would consider his appeal on points of law and that he had not been put in a position to respond to the advisory opinion of the Procurator General.

Comm found unanimously V 6(1) with respect to not being able to respond to the advisory opinion of the Procurator General, NV 6(1) with regard to failure to notify applicant of the date the Supreme Court would consider his appeal.

Court found unanimously NV 6(1) with respect to the failure to notify the applicant of the date on which his case would be examined by the Supreme Court, V 6(1) with respect to the lack of opportunity for the applicant to respond to the advisory opinion submitted by the advocate general to the Supreme Court.

Judges: Mr Thór Vilhjálmsson, President, Mr B Walsh, Mr G Mifsud Bonnici, Mr P Kûris, Mr J Casadevall, Mr P Van Dijk, Mr T Pantiru, Mr M Voicu, Mr V Toumanov.

A 6 did not compel Contracting States to set up courts of appeal. However, where such courts existed, the guarantees of A 6 had to be complied with. The manner in which A 6(1) applied to courts of appeal depended on the special features of the proceedings concerned and account had to be taken of the entirety of the proceedings conducted in the domestic legal order and the court of appeal's role in them. Provided that there had been a public hearing at first instance, the absence of 'public hearings' before a second or third instance may be justified by the special features of the proceedings at issue. Thus, leave-to-appeal proceedings and proceedings involving only questions of law may comply with the requirements of A 6, although the appellant was not given an opportunity of being heard in person by the appeal court. In the present case, the appeal to the Supreme Court was made after the applicant's claims had been heard by the Regional Court, which had full jurisdiction over questions of fact and law and which had held an oral hearing attended by the applicant and his counsel. The fairness of those proceedings had not been called into question in any respect. As a rule, the Supreme Court held no hearing before deciding on appeals on points of law lodged against orders given in camera. As the applicant was assisted by a lawyer, he could be expected to have requested the Supreme Court to hold a hearing if he wanted to appear in person before that court, but he failed to do so. It had not been shown that it would not have been possible for the applicant to file written grounds of appeal before the Supreme Court started to examine his case. Given the Supreme Court's role as an appellate court and having regard to the proceedings as a whole, the failure to inform the applicant of the date on which the Supreme Court would examine his case did not amount to a breach of A 6(1).

The purpose of the advocate general's advisory opinion was to assist the Supreme Court and to help ensure that its case-law was consistent. It was the duty of the Procurator General's department at the Supreme Court to act with the strictest objectivity. Great importance had to be attached to the part played in the proceedings before the Supreme Court by the member of the Procurator General's department, and more particularly to the content and effects of his submissions. Although it was objective and reasoned in law, the opinion was nevertheless intended to advise and accordingly influence the Supreme Court. Having regard to what was at stake for the applicant in the proceedings and to the nature of the advisory opinion of the advocate general, the fact that it was impossible for the applicant to reply to it before the Supreme Court took its decision infringed his right to adversarial proceedings. That right meant in principle the opportunity for the parties to a criminal or civil trial to have knowledge of and comment on all evidence adduced or observations filed, even by an independent member of the national legal service, with a view to influencing the court's decision. There had therefore been a violation of A 6(1).
