because of the buyer's breach. For example, Floyd agrees to sell goods to Beverly for a contract price of $8,000 due on delivery. Beverly repudiates the contract and refuses to pay Floyd anything. Floyd resells the goods in strict compliance with the Code for $6,000, incurring incidental damages for sales commissions of $500 but saving $200 in transportation costs. Floyd would recover from Beverly the difference between the contract price ($8,000) and the resale price ($6,000), plus incidental damages ($500), minus expenses saved ($200), which equals $2,300.

In a lease, the comparable recovery is the difference between the present values of the old rent due under the original lease and the new rent due under the new lease. More specifically, the lessor may recover (1) the accrued and unpaid rent as of the date of commencement of the new lease; (2) the present value as of that date of total rent for the then-remaining term of the original lease minus the present value, as of the same date, of the rent under the new lease applicable to a comparable time period; and (3) any incidental damages, less expenses saved because of the lessee's breach.

The resale may be a public or private sale, and the goods may be sold as a unit or in parcels. When the resale is a private sale, the seller must give the buyer reasonable notice of his intention to resell. When the resale is at a public sale (such as an auction), it must be made at a usual place or market for public sale if one is reasonably available. The seller must give the buyer reasonable notice of the time and place of the resale, unless the goods are perishable or threaten to decline in value speedily. In addition, the seller may be a purchaser of the goods at the public sale. In choosing between a public and private sale, the seller must observe relevant trade practices and usages and take into account the character of the goods.

The seller is not accountable to the buyer for any profit made on any resale of the goods. (Article 2A.) Moreover, a good faith purchaser at a resale takes the goods free of any rights of the original buyer, even if the seller has failed to comply with one or more of the requirements of the Code in making the resale. (Article 2A.)

Failure to act in good faith and in a commercially reasonable manner deprives the seller of this remedy and relegates him to the remedy of recovering damages for nonacceptance or repudiation (discussed next). (Article 2A.)

CO-202

If the contract is avoided and the seller has resold the goods in a reasonable manner and within a reasonable time after avoidance, he may recover the difference between the contract price and the resale price. In addition, he may recover consequential damages.

TO RECOVER DAMAGES FOR NONACCEPTANCE OR REPUDIATION

In the event of the buyer's wrongful rejection or revocation, repudiation, or failure to make timely payment, the seller may recover damages from the buyer equal to the market price differential, or the difference between the unpaid contract price and the market price at the time and place of tender of the goods, plus incidental damages, less expenses saved because of the buyer's breach. This remedy is an alternative to the remedy of reselling the goods.

For example, Joyce in Seattle agrees to sell goods to Maynard in Chicago for $20,000 F.O.B. ("free on board") Chicago, with delivery by June 15. Maynard wrongfully rejects the goods. The market price would be ascertained as of June 15 in Chicago because F.O.B. Chicago is a destination contract in which the place of tender would be Chicago. The market price of the goods on June 15 in Chicago is $15,000. Joyce, who incurred $1,000 in incidental expenses while saving $500 in expenses, would recover from Maynard the difference between the contract price ($20,000) and the market price ($15,000), plus incidental damages ($1,000), minus expenses saved ($500), which equals $5,500.

If the difference between the contract price and the market price will not place the seller in as good a position as performance would have, then the measure of damages is the lost profit, that is the profit, including reasonable overhead, that the seller would have realized from full performance by the buyer, plus any incidental damages, less expenses the seller saved because of the buyer's breach. For example, Green, an automobile dealer, enters into a contract to sell a large, fuel-inefficient luxury car to Holland for $32,000. The price of gasoline increases 20 percent, and Holland repudiates. The market value of the car is still $32,000, but because Green cannot sell as many cars as he can obtain, Green's sales volume has decreased by one as a result of Holland's breach. Therefore, Green would be permitted to recover the profits he lost on the sale to Holland (computed as the contract price, minus what the car costs Green, plus an allocation of overhead), plus any incidental damages. The following case further explains the computation of lost profits.

Article 2A has a comparable provision, except the profit is reduced to its present value since the lessor would have received it over the term of the lease.

Practical Advice

Carefully consider whether you are better off reselling the goods or seeking damages for nonacceptance or repudiation.

C

If the contract is avoided and the seller has not made a resale, he may recover the difference between the contract price and the current price at the time of avoidance and at the place where delivery of goods should have been made. In addition, he may recover consequential damages.

KENCO HOMES, INC. v. WILLIAMS

COURT OF APPEALS OF WASHINGTON, DIVISION TWO, 1999

<http://caselaw.lp.findlaw.com/scripts/getcase.pl?court=wa&vol=209071&invol=o01>

FACTS Kenco buys mobile homes from the factory and sells them to the consumer. Sometimes, it contracts to sell a home that the factory has not yet built. It has a virtually unlimited supply of product. On September 27, 1994, Kenco Homes, Inc., and Dale E. and Debi A. Williams, husband and wife, signed a written contract by which Kenco agreed to sell a mobile home to the Williams that Kenco had not yet ordered from the factory. The contract called for a price of $39,400, with $500 down.

The contract contained two pertinent conditions. First, the contract would be enforceable only if Williams could obtain financing. Second, the contract would be enforceable only if Williams later approved a bid for site improvements. Financing was to cover the cost of the mobile home and the cost of the land on which the mobile home would be placed. The contract provided for damages. It stated, "I [Williams] understand that you [Kenco] shall have all the rights of a seller upon breach of contract under the Uniform Commercial Code [UCC], except the right to seek and collect 'liquidated damages' under Section 2-718." The contract provided for reasonable attorneys' fees. In early October, Williams accepted Kenco's bid for site improvements. As a result, the parties (1) formed a second contract and (2) fulfilled the first contract's site-improvement-approval condition. Also in early October, Williams received preliminary approval on the needed financing.

Subsequently, Williams gave Kenco a $600 check so Kenco could order an appraisal of the land on which the mobile home would be located. Before Kenco could act, however, Williams stopped payment on the check and repudiated the entire transaction. His reason was that he "had found a better deal elsewhere." When Williams repudiated, Kenco had not yet ordered the mobile home from the factory. After Williams repudiated, Kenco simply did not place the order. As a result, Kenco's only out-of-pocket expense was a minor amount of office overhead. On November 1, 1994, Kenco sued Williams for lost profits.

The trial court found that Williams had breached the contract, causing Kenco to lose profits in the amount of $11,133–$6,720 on the mobile home, and $4,413 on the site improvements. Moreover, the trial court held that Kenco was entitled to damages, but ruled that Kenco would be adequately compensated by retaining Williams' $500 down payment. The trial court declared that Williams was the prevailing party; and that Williams should receive reasonable attorneys' fees in the amount of $1,800. Kenco appealed, claiming the trial court used an incorrect measure of damages.

DECISION Reversed with directions to enter an amended judgment awarding Kenco its lost profit of $11,133 and reasonable attorneys' fees incurred at trial and on appeal.

OPINION Morgan, J. Under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), a nonbreaching seller may recover "damages for non-acceptance" from a breaching buyer. [U.C.C. § 2-703(e)] The measure of such damages is as follows: (1) *** the measure of damages for non-acceptance or repudiation by the buyer is the difference between the market price at the time and place for tender and the unpaid contract price together with any incidental damages provided in this Article ([U.C.C. §] 2-710), but less expenses saved in consequence of the buyer's breach. (2) If the measure of damages provided in subsection (1) is inadequate to put the seller in as good a position as performance would have done then the measure of damages is the profit (including reasonable overhead) which the seller would have made from full performance by the buyer, together with any incidental damages provided in this Article ([U.C.C. §] 2-710), due allowance for costs reasonably incurred and due credit for payments or proceeds of resale. [U.C.C. §] 2-708. *** the statute's purpose is to put the nonbreaching seller in the position that he or she would have occupied if the breaching buyer had fully performed (or, in alternative terms, to give the nonbreaching seller the benefit of his or her bargain). [U.C.C. §] 1-106(1). A party claiming damages under subsection (2) bears the burden of showing that an award of damages under subsection (1) would be inadequate. [Citation.] In general, the adequacy of damages under subsection (1) depends on whether the nonbreaching seller has a readily available market on which he or she can resell the goods that the breaching buyer should have taken. [Citation.] When a buyer breaches before either side has begun to perform, the amount needed to give the seller the benefit of his or her bargain is the difference between the contract price and the seller's expected cost of performance. Using market price, this difference can, in turn, be subdivided into two smaller differences: (a) the difference between the contract price and the market price, and (b) the difference between the market price and the seller's expected cost of performance. So long as a nonbreaching seller can reasonably resell the breached goods on the open market, he or she can recover the difference between contract price and market price by invoking subsection (1), and the difference between market price and his or her expected cost of performance by reselling the breached goods on the open market. Thus, he or she is made whole by subsection (1), and subsection (1) damages should be deemed "adequate." But if a nonbreaching seller cannot reasonably resell the breached goods on the open market, he or she cannot recover, merely by invoking subsection (1), the difference between market price and his or her expected cost of performance. Hence, he or she is not made whole by subsection (1); subsection (1) damages are "inadequate to put the seller in as good a position as performance would have done;" and subsection (2) comes into play.

The cases illustrate at least three specific situations in which a nonbreaching seller cannot reasonably resell on the open market. In the first, the seller never comes into possession of the breached goods; although he or she plans to acquire such goods before the buyer's breach, he or she rightfully elects not to acquire them after the buyer's breach. [Citation.] In the second, the seller possesses some or all of the breached goods, but they are of such an odd or peculiar nature that the seller lacks a post-breach market on which to sell them; they are, for example, unfinished, obsolete, or highly specialized. [Citations.] In the third situation, the seller again possesses some or all of the breached goods, but because the market is already oversupplied with such goods (i.e., the available supply exceeds demand), he or she cannot resell the breached goods without displacing another sale. [Citations.] [Court's footnote: In passing, we observe that this lost volume situation can be described in several ways. Focusing on the breached unit, one can say that due to a market in which supply exceeds demand, the lost volume seller cannot resell the breached unit without sacrificing an additional sale. Focusing on the additional unit, one can say that but for the buyer's breach, the lost volume seller would have made an additional sale. Focusing on both units, one can say that but for the buyer's breach, the lost volume seller would have sold both units. Each statement is equivalent to the others.] Frequently, these sellers are labelled "jobber," "components seller," and "lost volume seller," respectively [ , citation]; in our view, however, such labels confuse more than clarify.

*** In this case, Kenco did not order the breached goods before Williams repudiated. After Williams repudiated, Kenco was not required to order the breached goods from the factory [U.C.C. §§ 2-703, 2-704(2)]; it rightfully elected not to do so; and it could not resell the breached goods on the open market. Here, then, "the measure of damages provided in subsection (1) is inadequate to put [Kenco] in as good a position as [Williams'] performance would have done;" [U.C.C. § 2-708] subsection (2) states the applicable measure of damages; and Kenco is entitled to its lost profit of $11,133.

The second issue is whether Kenco is entitled to reasonable attorneys' fees. The parties' contract provided that the prevailing party would be entitled to such fees. Kenco is the prevailing party. ***

ETHICAL QUESTION Did either party act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the Code's measure of damages for the "lost volume seller"? Explain.

TO RECOVER THE PRICE

The Code permits the seller to recover the price plus incidental damages in three situations: (1) when the buyer has accepted the goods; (2) when conforming goods have been lost or damaged after the risk of loss has passed to the buyer; and (3) where the goods have been identified to the contract and there is no ready market available for their resale at a reasonable price. For example, Kelly, in accordance with her agreement with Sally, prints ten thousand letterheads and envelopes with Sally's name and address on them. Sally wrongfully rejects the stationery, and Kelly is unable to resell it at a reasonable price. Kelly is entitled to recover the price plus incidental damages from Sally.

Article 2A has a similar provision except that the lessor is entitled to (1) accrued and unpaid rent as of the date of the judgment, (2) the present value as of the judgment date of the rent for the then remaining lease term, and (3) incidental damages less expenses saved.

A seller who sues for the price must hold for the buyer any goods that have been identified to the contract and are still in her control. (Article 2A.) If resale becomes possible, the seller may resell the goods at any time before the collection of the judgment, and the net proceeds of such resale must be credited to the buyer. Payment of the judgment entitles the buyer to any goods not resold. In a lease, payment of the judgment entitles the lessee to the use and possession of the goods for the remaining lease term.

G

The seller may require the buyer to pay the price, take delivery, or perform her other obligations, unless the seller has resorted to a remedy that is inconsistent with this requirement.

TO RECOVER INCIDENTAL DAMAGES

In addition to recovering damages for the difference between the contract price and the resale price, recovering damages for nonacceptance or repudiation, or recovering the price, the seller also may recover in the same action her incidental damages in order to recoup expenses she reasonably incurred as a result of the buyer's breach. The Code defines a seller's incidental damages to include any commercially reasonable charges, expenses, or commissions incurred in stopping delivery; in the transportation, care, and custody of goods after the buyer's breach; in connection with return or resale of the goods; or otherwise resulting from the breach. Article 2A has an analogous definition.

Practical Advice

As an aggrieved seller, maintain good records regarding incidental damages you incurred.

TO CANCEL THE CONTRACT

When the buyer wrongfully rejects or revokes acceptance of the goods, fails to make a payment due on or before delivery, or repudiates the contract in whole or in part, the seller may cancel the part of the contract that concerns the goods directly affected. If the breach is of an installment contract and it substantially impairs the whole contract, the seller may cancel the entire contract. (Article 2A.)

The Code defines cancellation as one party's putting an end to the contract because of a breach by the other. (Article 2A.) The obligation of the canceling party for any future performance under the contract is discharged, although he retains any remedy for breach of the whole contract or for any unperformed balance. (Article 2A.) Thus, if the seller has the right to cancel, he may recover damages for breach without having to tender any further performance.

CISG

The seller may declare the contract avoided if (1) the buyer commits a fundamental breach or (2) the buyer does not, within the additional period of time fixed by the seller, perform his obligation to pay the price or take delivery of the goods. Avoidance of the contract releases both parties from their obligations under it, subject to any damages that may be due. Avoidance does not affect any provision of the contract for the settlement of disputes or any other provision of the contract governing the rights and obligations of the parties consequent upon the avoidance of the contract. A party who has performed the contract either wholly or in part may claim restitution from the other party. If both parties are bound to make restitution, they must do so concurrently.

TO RECLAIM THE GOODS UPON THE BUYER'S INSOLVENCY

In addition to the right of an unpaid seller to withhold and stop delivery of the goods, he may reclaim them from an insolvent buyer by demand made to the buyer within ten days after the buyer has received the goods. However, if the buyer has committed fraud by misrepresenting her solvency to the seller in writing within three months prior to delivery of the goods, the ten-day limitation does not apply.

The seller's right to reclaim the goods is subject to the rights of a buyer in the ordinary course of business or to the rights of any other good faith purchaser. In addition, a seller who successfully reclaims goods from an insolvent buyer is excluded from all other remedies with respect to those goods.

A lessor retains title to the goods and therefore has the right to recover possession of them upon default by the lessee.

Practical Advice

If you wish to exercise the seller's rights of reclamation of goods sold, you will need to act quickly.

Remedies of the Buyer

Basically, a seller may default in one of three different ways: she may repudiate, fail to deliver the goods without repudiation, or deliver or tender goods that do not conform to the contract. (Article 2A.) The Code provides remedies for each of these breaches. Some remedies are available for all three types of breaches, whereas others are not. Moreover, the availability of some remedies depends on the buyer's actions. For example, if the seller tenders nonconforming goods, the buyer may reject or accept them. If the buyer rejects them, he can choose from a number of remedies. On the other hand, if the buyer accepts the nonconforming goods and does not justifiably revoke his acceptance, he limits himself to recovering damages.

When the seller fails to make delivery or repudiates, or when the buyer rightfully rejects or justifiably revokes acceptance, the buyer may, with respect to any goods involved, or with respect to the whole if the breach goes to the whole contract, (1) cancel and (2) recover payments made. In addition, the buyer may (3) "cover" and obtain damages or (4) recover damages for nondelivery. When the seller fails to deliver or repudiates, the buyer, when appropriate, may also (5) recover identified goods if the seller is insolvent, or (6) "replevy" the goods, or (7) obtain specific performance. Moreover, on rightful rejection or justifiable revocation of acceptance, the buyer (8) has a security interest in the goods. When the buyer has accepted goods and notified the seller of their nonconformity, the buyer may (9) recover damages for breach of warranty. Finally, in addition to the remedies listed above, the buyer may, when appropriate, (10) recover incidental damages and (11) recover consequential damages. Article 2A provides for essentially the same remedies for the lessee.

We might observe that the first remedy cataloged above is obligation oriented; the second through fourth and ninth through eleventh are money oriented; and the fifth through eighth are goods oriented.

The buyer may deduct from the price due any damages resulting from any breach of contract by the seller. The buyer must, however, give notice to the seller of her intention to withhold such damages from payment of the price due. (Article 2A.)

CISG

If the seller fails to perform any of his obligations under the contract or the CISG, the buyer may (1) require the seller to perform his contractual obligations or (2) fix an additional period of time of reasonable length for performance by the seller of his obligations. Unless the buyer has received notice from the seller that he will not perform within the period so fixed, the buyer may not, during that period, resort to any remedy for breach of contract. Moreover, if the seller's breach is fundamental or the seller fails to perform within the additional time granted by the buyer, the buyer may avoid the contract. In addition to these remedies, the buyer also has the right to damages. If the goods do not conform with the contract, the buyer may reduce the price in the same proportion as the value that the goods actually delivered had at the time of the delivery bears to the value that conforming goods would have had at that time.

To CANCEL THE CONTRACT

When the seller fails to make delivery or repudiates the contract or when the buyer rightfully rejects or justifiably revokes acceptance of goods tendered or delivered to him, the buyer may cancel the contract with respect to any goods involved; and, if the breach by the seller concerns the whole contract, the buyer may cancel the entire contract. (Article 2A.) The buyer, who must give the seller

APPLYING THE LAW

Sales Remedies

Facts TRAC is a wholesaler of computer hardware component parts. In late February, TRAC entered into a sales contract with Gemini, a small manufacturer of custom personal computers, for the sale of $10,000 worth of component parts. The written agreement required Gemini to pay $2,000 on April 15, another $3,000 on May 15, and the remaining $5,000 on June 15, with delivery of all components to Gemini's warehouse on or before May 30.

Gemini paid the $2,000 in March, but was unable to make the second deposit payment of $3,000 on May 15. Soon thereafter, TRAC returned Gemini's $2,000 and notified Gemini in writing that it "considered the contract cancelled" and "did not intend to perform any part of the February contract." The price of the component parts began to increase steadily in early March, and the goods can now be sold for 25 percent more.

Issue What are TRAC's rights and obligations under this sales contract?

Rule of Law A buyer who fails to make a payment due on or before delivery is in default. When faced with a buyer's default, the seller has goods-oriented, money-oriented, and obligation-oriented remedies available to it, all of which are cumulative to the extent they apply. Goods-oriented remedies include identification to the contract, withholding or stopping delivery of the goods, or if the buyer is insolvent, reclamation. The seller's money-oriented remedies involve recovery of (1) damages after a commercially reasonable resale, (2) damages for nonacceptance, or (3) the contract price, and incidental and consequential damages. If the goods are resold at a profit to the seller, however, he need not account to the buyer for it. The seller's obligation-oriented remedy is cancellation, which discharges the seller from any further obligation under the contract.

Application Two of the four goods-oriented remedies are available to TRAC. It may both identify the goods to the contract, if it has not already done so, and withhold their delivery to Gemini. Neither of the other two goods-oriented remedies—stoppage in transit or reclamation—has any application here because the goods have not yet left TRAC's possession. Withholding delivery of the goods and identifying them to the contract enables TRAC to exercise its remedy of resale of the goods, which under current market conditions would yield a higher price than what Gemini had agreed to pay. As long as TRAC's incidental damages, or reasonable costs of such a sale, do not exceed the profit TRAC makes when it resells the goods, TRAC has suffered no damages. After returning Gemini's $2,000 deposit, TRAC has exercised its remaining Code remedy, the obligation-oriented remedy of cancellation. Cancellation effectively discharges TRAC of any further obligation to Gemini.

Conclusion TRAC may (1) withhold delivery of the goods to Gemini, (2) identify them to the contract, (3) resell them in a commercially reasonable manner, resulting here in a profit for which it is not accountable to Gemini, and (4) cancel the contract, resulting in a discharge of TRAC's performance under the contract.

notice of his cancellation, is excused from further performance or tender on his part. (Article 2A.)

The buyer may declare the contract avoided if the seller (1) commits a fundamental breach or (2) does not deliver the goods within the additional period of time fixed by the buyer. Avoidance of the contract releases both parties from their obligations under it, subject to any damages that may be due. Avoidance does not affect any provision of the contract for the settlement of disputes or any other provision of the contract governing the rights and obligations of the parties consequent upon the avoidance of the contract. A party who has performed the contract either wholly or in part may claim restitution from the other party. If both parties are bound to make restitution, they must do so concurrently.

TO RECOVER PAYMENTS MADE

The buyer, on the seller's breach, may also recover as much of the price as he has paid. For example, Jonas and Sheila enter into a contract for a sale of goods for a contract price of $3,000, and Sheila, the buyer, has made a down payment of $600. Jonas delivers nonconforming goods to Sheila, who rightfully rejects them. Sheila may cancel the contract and recover the $600 plus whatever other damages she can prove. Under Article 2A, the lessee may recover so much of the rent and security as has been paid and is just under the circumstances.

TO COVER

On the seller's breach, the buyer may protect herself by obtaining cover. Cover means that the buyer may in good faith and without unreasonable delay proceed to purchase needed goods or make a contract to purchase such goods in substitution for those due under the contract from the seller. In a lease, the lessee may purchase or lease substitute goods.

On making a reasonable contract of cover, the buyer may recover from the seller the difference between the cost of cover and the contract price, plus any incidental and consequential damages (discussed below), less expenses saved because of the seller's breach. For example, Phillip, whose factory is in Oakland, agrees to sell goods to Edith, in Atlanta, for $22,000 F.O.B. Oakland. Phillip fails to deliver, and Edith covers by purchasing substitute goods for $25,000, incurring $700 in sales commissions. Edith suffers no other damages as a consequence of Phillip's breach. Shipping costs from Oakland to Atlanta for the goods are $1,300. Edith would recover the difference between the cost of cover ($25,000) and the contract price ($22,000), plus incidental damages ($700 in sales commissions), plus consequential damages ($0 in this example), minus expenses saved (the $1,300 in shipping costs that Edith need not pay under the contract of cover), which equals $2,400.

In a lease, the comparable recovery is the difference between the present values of the new rent due under the new lease and the old rent due under the original lease.

The buyer is not required to obtain cover, and his failure to do so does not bar him from any other remedy the Code provides. (Article 2A.) The buyer may not, however, recover consequential damages that he could have prevented by cover. (Article 2A.)

If the contract is avoided and the buyer has bought goods in replacement in a reasonable manner and within a reasonable time after avoidance, he may recover the difference between the contract price and the price paid in the substitute transaction. In addition, he may recover consequential damages.

BIGELOW-SANFORD, INC. v. GUNNY CORP.

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS, FIFTH CIRCUIT, 1981

649 F.2D 1060

FACTS The plaintiff, Bigelow-Sanford, Inc., contracted with the defendant, Gunny Corp., for the purchase of 100,000 linear yards of jute at $0.64 per yard. Gunny delivered 22,228 linear yards in January 1979. The February and March deliveries required under the contract were not made, and eight rolls (each roll containing 66.7 linear yards) were delivered in April. With 72,265 linear yards ultimately undelivered, Gunny told Bigelow-Sanford that no more would be delivered. In mid-March, Bigelow-Sanford turned to the jute spot market to replace the balance of the order at a price of $1.21 per linear yard. As several other companies had also defaulted on their jute contracts with Bigelow-Sanford, the plaintiff purchased a total of 164,503 linear yards on the spot market. The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover losses sustained as a result of the breach of contract. Gunny appealed from a judgment in favor of Bigelow-Sanford.

DECISION Judgment for Bigelow-Sanford affirmed.

OPINION Kravitch, J. Gunny contends that appellee's [Bigelow-Sanford's] alleged cover purchases should not have been used to measure damages in that they were not made in substitution for the contract purchases, were not made seasonably or in good faith and were not shown to be due to Gunny's breach. [W]e disagree. Again, we quote UCC § 2-711 providing in part for cover damages where the seller fails to make delivery or repudiates the contract: ***

(a) "cover" and have damages under the next section as to all the goods affected whether or not they have been identified to the contract; or (b) recover damages for non-delivery as provided in this Article (2-713).

UCC § 2-712 defines cover:

(1) After a breach within the preceding section the buyer may "cover" by making in good faith and without unreasonable delay any reasonable purchase of or contract to purchase goods in substitution for those due from the seller.

(2) The buyer may recover from the seller as damages the difference between the cost of cover and the contract price together with any incidental or consequential damages as hereinafter defined (2-715), but less expenses saved in consequence of the seller's breach.

(3) Failure of the buyer to effect cover within this section does not bar him from any other remedy.

In addition, the purchaser may recover under 2-713:

(1) Subject to the provisions of this Article with respect to proof of market price (2-723), the measure of damages for nondelivery or repudiation by the seller is the difference between the market price at the time when the buyer learned of the breach and the contract price together with any incidental and consequential damages provided in this Article (2-715), but less expenses saved in consequence of the seller's breach.

(2) Market price is to be determined as of the place for tender or, in cases of rejection after arrival or revocation of acceptance, as of the place of arrival.

Most importantly, “whether a plaintiff has made his cover purchases in a reasonable manner poses a classic jury issue.” [Citation.] The district court thus acted properly in submitting the question of cover damages to the jury, which found that Gunny had breached, appellee had covered, and had done so in good faith without unreasonable delay by making reasonable purchases, and was therefore entitled to damages under § 2-712. Gunny argues Bigelow is not entitled to such damages on the ground that it failed to make cover purchases without undue delay and that the jury should not have been permitted to average the cost of Bigelow's spot market purchases totalling 164,503 linear yards in order to arrive at the cost of cover for the 72,265 linear yards Gunny failed to deliver. Both arguments fail. Gunny notified Bigelow in February that no more jute would be forthcoming. Bigelow made its first spot market purchases in mid-March. Given that it is within the jury's province to decide the reasonableness of the manner in which cover purchases were made, we believe the jury could reasonably decide such purchases, made one month after the date the jury assigned to Gunny's breach, were made without undue delay. The same is true with respect to Gunny's second argument: Bigelow's spot market purchases were made to replace several vendors' shipments. Bigelow did not specifically allocate the spot market replacements to individual vendors' accounts, however, nor was there a requirement that they do so. The jury's method of averaging such costs and assigning them to Gunny in proportion to the amount of jute if [sic] failed to deliver would, therefore, seem not only fair but well within the jury's permissible bounds.

Gunny also argues that the court erroneously charged the jury regarding damages under both §§ 2-712 and 2-713. We disagree. Whether Bigelow covered was a question of fact submitted to the jury. In the event that it had not, alternative damages were available to Bigelow under § 2-713. [Citation.] The jury found that Bigelow had covered and awarded damages under § 2-712; § 2-713 then became irrelevant. Since either was applicable until that time, the court's charge as to both sections was not error.

INTERPRETATION If the buyer makes substitute purchases in good faith and without unreasonable delay, he may recover as damages the difference between the cost of cover and the contract price plus any incidental damages, but minus any expenses he saved because of the seller's breach.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the remedy of cover? Explain.

TO RECOVER DAMAGES FOR NONDELIVERY OR REPUDIATION

If the seller repudiates the contract or fails to deliver the goods, or if the buyer rightfully rejects or justifiably revokes acceptance of the goods, the buyer is entitled to recover damages from the seller equal to the difference between the market price at the time the buyer learned of the breach and the contract price, together with incidental and consequential damages, less expenses saved because of the seller's breach. This remedy is a complete alternative to the remedy of cover and is available only to the extent the buyer has not covered. As previously indicated, the buyer who elects this remedy may not recover consequential damages that she could have avoided by cover.

In a lease, the comparable recovery is the difference between the present values of the market rent and the old rent due under the original lease.

The market price is to be determined as of the place for tender or, in the event that the buyer has rightfully rejected the goods or has justifiably revoked his acceptance of them, as of the place of arrival. For example, Janet, in Boston, agrees to sell goods to Laura, in Denver, for $7,000 C.O.D. (collect on delivery), with delivery by November 15. Janet fails to deliver. As a consequence, Laura suffers incidental damages of $1,500 and consequential damages of $1,000. In the case of nondelivery or repudiation, market price is determined as of the place of tender. Because C.O.D. is a shipment contract, the place of tender would be the seller's city. Therefore, the market price must be the market price in Boston, the seller's city, on November 15, when Laura learned of the breach. At this time and place, the market price is $8,000. Laura would recover the difference between the market price ($8,000) and the contract price ($7,000), plus incidental damages ($1,500), plus consequential damages ($1,000), less expenses saved ($0 in this example), which equals $3,500.

In the example above, if Janet had instead delivered nonconforming goods that Laura rejected, the market price would be determined at Denver, Laura's place of business; if Janet had repudiated the contract on November 1, instead of November 15, then the market price would be determined as of November 1.

In a lease, market rent is to be determined as of the place for tender or, in cases of rejection after arrival or revocation of acceptance, as of the place of arrival.

Practical Advice

Carefully consider whether you are better off covering or seeking damages for nondelivery or repudiation.

CISG

If the contract is avoided and the buyer has not made a replacement purchase, he may recover the difference between the contract price and the current price at the time of avoidance and at the place where delivery of the goods should have been made. In addition, he may recover consequential damages.

TO RECOVER IDENTIFIED GOODS ON THE SELLER'S INSOLVENCY

When existing goods are identified to the contract of sale, the buyer acquires a special property interest in the goods. This interest exists even if the goods are nonconforming and the buyer therefore has the right to return or reject them. Either the buyer or the seller may identify the goods to the contract.

The Code gives the buyer a right, which does not exist at common law, to recover from an insolvent seller the goods in which the buyer has a special property interest and for which he has paid part or all of the price. This right exists where the seller, who is in possession or control of the goods, becomes insolvent within ten days after receiving the first installment of the price. To exercise it, the buyer must tender to the seller any unpaid portion of the price. If the special property interest exists by reason of an identification made by the buyer, he may recover the goods only if they conform to the contract for sale. (Article 2A.)

TO SUE FOR REPLEVIN

Replevin is an action at law to recover from a defendant's possession specific goods that are being unlawfully withheld from the plaintiff. When the seller has repudiated or breached the contract, the buyer may maintain against the seller an action for replevin for goods that have been identified to the contract if the buyer after a reasonable effort is unable to obtain cover for such goods. (Article 2A.) Article 2 also provides the buyer with the right to replevin if the goods have been shipped under reservation of a security interest in the seller and satisfaction of this security interest has been made or tendered.

TO SUE FOR SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE

Specific performance is an equitable remedy compelling the party in breach to perform the contract according to its terms. At common law, specific performance is available only if legal remedies are inadequate. For example, when the contract is for the purchase of a unique item, such as a work of art, a famous racehorse, or an heirloom, money damages may not be an adequate remedy. In such a case, a court of equity has the discretion to order the seller specifically to deliver to the buyer, on payment of the price, the goods described in the contract.

The Code not only has continued the availability of specific performance but also has sought to promote a more liberal attitude toward its use. Accordingly, it does not expressly require that the remedy at law be inadequate. Instead, the Code states that specific performance may be granted "where the goods are unique or in other proper circumstances." (Article 2A.)

CISG

The buyer may require the seller to perform his contractual obligations. If the goods do not conform to the contract and the nonconformity constitutes a fundamental breach of contract, the buyer may require delivery of substitute goods. If the goods do not conform to the contract, the buyer may require the seller to remedy the lack of conformity by repair, unless this is unreasonable having regard to all the circumstances. Nevertheless, a court is not bound to enter a judgment for specific performance unless a court would do so under its own law with respect to similar contracts of sale not governed by the CISG.

TO ENFORCE A SECURITY INTEREST IN THE GOODS

A buyer who has rightfully rejected or justifiably revoked acceptance of goods that remain in her possession or control has a security interest in these goods for any payments made on their price and for any expenses reasonably incurred in their inspection, receipt, transportation, care, and custody. The buyer may hold such goods and resell them in the same manner as an aggrieved seller may resell goods. (Article 2A.) In the event of resale, the buyer is accountable to the seller for any amount of the net proceeds of the resale that exceeds the amount of her security interest. (Article 2A.)

TO RECOVER DAMAGES FOR BREACH IN REGARD TO ACCEPTED GOODS

When the buyer has accepted nonconforming goods and has timely notified the seller of the breach of contract, the buyer is entitled to recover from the seller the damages resulting in the ordinary course of events from the seller's breach as determined in any reasonable manner. (Article 2A.) When appropriate, incidental and consequential damages also may be recovered. Nonconformity includes breaches of warranty as well as any failure of the seller to perform according to her obligations under the contract. Thus, even if a seller cures a nonconforming tender, the buyer may recover under this section for any injury suffered because the original tender was nonconforming.

In the event of breach of warranty, the measure of damages is the difference at the time and place of acceptance between the value of the goods that have been accepted and the value that the goods would have had if they had been as warranted, unless special circumstances show proximate damages of a different amount. Article 2A has a comparable provision, except the recovery is for the present value of the difference between the value of the use of the goods accepted and the value if they had been as warranted for the lease term.

The contract price of the goods does not figure in this computation because the buyer is entitled to the benefit of his bargain, which is to receive goods that are as warranted. For example, Eleanor agrees to sell goods to Timothy for $1,000. Although the value of the goods accepted by Timothy is $800, if they had been as warranted, their value would have been $1,200. Timothy's damages for breach of warranty are $400, which he may deduct from any unpaid balance due on the purchase price upon notice to Eleanor of his intention to do so. (Article 2A.)

TO RECOVER INCIDENTAL DAMAGES

In addition to remedies such as covering, recovering damages for nondelivery or repudiation, or recovering damages for breach in regard to accepted goods, including breach of warranty, the buyer may recover incidental damages. A buyer's incidental damages provide reimbursement for the buyer who incurs reasonable expenses in handling rightfully rejected goods or in effecting cover. The buyer's incidental damages resulting from the seller's breach include expenses reasonably incurred in inspection, receipt, transportation, and care and custody of goods rightfully rejected; any commercially reasonable charges, expenses, or commissions in connection with obtaining cover; and any other reasonable expense connected to the delay or other breach. Article 2A has an analogous definition. For example, the buyer of a racehorse who justifiably revokes acceptance because the horse does not conform to the contract will be allowed to recover as incidental damages the cost of caring for the horse from the date the horse was delivered until the buyer returns it to the seller.

Practical Advice

As an aggrieved buyer, maintain good records regarding incidental damages you incurred.

TO RECOVER CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES

In many cases, the remedies discussed above will not fully compensate the aggrieved buyer for her losses. For example, nonconforming goods that are accepted may in some way damage or destroy the buyer's warehouse and its contents, or undelivered goods may have been the subject of a lucrative contract of resale, the profits from which are now lost. The Code responds to this problem by providing the buyer with the opportunity to recover consequential damages resulting from the seller's breach, including (1) any loss resulting from the buyer's requirements and needs of which the seller at the time of contracting had reason to know and which the buyer could not reasonably prevent by cover or otherwise and (2) injury to person or property proximately resulting from any breach of warranty. (Article 2A.)

Practical Advice

As the buyer, be sure to inform the other party to the contract of any "particular needs" beyond the ordinary course of events that could result from a breach of contract.

With respect to the first type of consequential damages, particular needs of the buyer usually must be made known to the seller, whereas general needs usually need not be. In the case of a buyer who is in the business of reselling goods, resale is one requirement of which the seller has reason to know. For example, Supreme Machine Co., a manufacturer, contracts to sell Allied Sales, Inc., a dealer in used machinery, a used machine that Allied plans to resell. After Supreme repudiates and Allied is unable to obtain a similar machine elsewhere, Allied's damages include the net profit that it would have made on resale of the machine. A buyer may not, however, recover consequential damages he could have prevented by cover. (Article 2A.) For instance, Supreme Machine Co. contracts to sell Capitol Manufacturing Co. a used machine for $10,000 to be delivered at Capitol's factory by June 1. Supreme repudiates the contract on May 1. By reasonable efforts, Capitol could buy a similar machine from United Machinery, Inc., for $11,000 in time for a June 1 delivery. Capitol fails to do so, losing a $5,000 profit that it would have made from the resale of the machine. Though it can recover $1,000 from Supreme, Capitol's damages do not include the loss of the $5,000 profit.

An example of the second type of consequential damage would be as follows: Federal Machine Co. sells a machine to Southern Manufacturing Co., warranting its suitability for Southern's purpose. However, the machine is not suitable for Southern's purpose and causes $10,000

Practical Advice

If you are the seller, consider including a contractual provision for the limitation or exclusion of consequential damages. If you are the buyer, avoid such limitations.

Contractual Provisions Affecting Remedies

Within specified limits, the Code permits the parties to a sales contract to modify, exclude, or limit by agreement the remedies or damages that will be available for breach of that contract. Two basic types of contractual provisions affect remedies: (1) liquidation or limitation of damages and (2) modification or limitation of remedy.

LIQUIDATION OR LIMITATION OF DAMAGES

The parties may provide for liquidated damages in their contract by specifying the amount or measure of damages that either party may recover in the event of a breach by the other. The amount of such damages must be reasonable in light of the anticipated or actual loss resulting from a breach, the difficulties of proof of loss, and the inconvenience or lack of feasibility of otherwise obtaining an adequate remedy. A contract provision that fixes unreasonably large liquidated damages is void as a penalty. By comparison, an unreasonably small amount might be stricken on the grounds of unconscionability.

To illustrate, Sterling Cabinetry Company contracts to build and install shelves and cabinets for an office building being constructed by Baron Construction Company. The contract price is $120,000, and the contract provides that Sterling would be liable for $100 per day for every day's delay beyond the completion date specified in the contract. The stipulated sum of $100 per day is reasonable and commensurate with the anticipated loss. Therefore, it is enforceable as liquidated damages. If, instead, the sum stipulated had been $5,000 per day, it would be unreasonably large and, therefore, would be void as a penalty.

Article 2A authorizes liquidated damages payable by either party for default, or any other act or omission. The amount of, or formula for, liquidated damages must be reasonable in light of the then-anticipated harm caused by default or other act or omission.

Practical Advice

Both parties should consider including a contractual provision for reasonable liquidated damages, especially where damages will be difficult to prove.

COASTAL LEASING CORPORATION v. T-BAR S CORPORATION

COURT OF APPEALS OF NORTH CAROLINA, 1998

<http://www.aoc.state.nc.us/www/public/coa/opinions/1998/970382-1.htm>

FACTS The plaintiff, Coastal Leasing Corporation (Coastal), entered into a lease agreement with the defendant, T-Bar S Corporation (T-Bar), in May 1992, whereby Coastal agreed to lease certain cash register equipment to T-Bar. Under the lease, T-Bar agreed to monthly rental payments of $289.13 each for a total of forty-eight months. Defendants George and Sharon Talbott were the officers of T-Bar and personally guaranteed payment. After making eighteen of the monthly payments, the Talbotts and T-Bar defaulted on the lease. On February 28, 1994, Coastal mailed a certified letter to the Talbotts and T-Bar advising them that the lease was in default and, pursuant to the terms of the lease, Coastal was accelerating the remaining payments due under the lease. Coastal further advised the Talbotts and T-Bar that if the entire amount due of $8,841.06 was not received within seven days, Coastal would seek to recover the balance due plus interest and reasonable attorneys' fees, as well as possession of the equipment.

On March 10, Coastal mailed a certified letter and "Notice of Public Sale of Repossessed Leased Equipment" to the Talbotts and T-Bar at the same address. This letter advised the Talbotts and T-Bar that Coastal had taken possession of the equipment and was conducting a public sale pursuant to the terms of the lease. Although the date on the notice of sale stated that the sale was to be held on March 23, the sale was actually scheduled to be held on March 25. This letter and notice of sale were returned to Coastal "unclaimed" on March 29.

Coastal conducted a public sale of the equipment on March 25, and no one appeared on behalf of the Talbotts or T-Bar. There being no other bidders, Coastal purchased the equipment at the sale for $2,000.00. On October 4, 1994, Coastal leased some of the same equipment to another company at a rate calculated to be $212.67 for thirty-six months. Coastal then filed this action seeking to recover the balance due under the lease, minus the net proceeds from the public sale, plus interest and reasonable attorneys' fees. The Talbotts filed an answer and counterclaim. Coastal then filed a motion for summary judgment against the Talbotts. When T-Bar failed to answer, a default judgment was entered against it. After a hearing, the trial court entered summary judgment in favor of Coastal on its complaint and the Talbotts' counterclaims and entered judgment against the Talbotts for the sum of $7,223.56 plus interest and attorneys' fees of $1,083.54. The Talbotts appealed.

DECISION Judgment affirmed.

OPINION Walker, J. *** Since both parties agree that the transaction at issue in this case is not a security interest, but rather is a lease, Article 2A controls.

In their appeal, appellants contend that the trial court erred by granting summary judgment in favor of plaintiff because there exists a genuine issue of material fact as to whether: (1) the liquidated damages clause contained in Paragraph 13 of the lease is reasonable in light of the then-anticipated harm caused by default; ***.

As to appellants' first contention, the official commentary to Article 2A states that "in recognition of the diversity of the transactions to be governed [and] the sophistication of many of the parties to these transactions ***, freedom of contract has been preserved." [U.C.C. §] 2A-102 Official Comment. Also, under general contract principles, when the parties to a transaction deal with each other at arms length and without the exercise by one of the parties of superior bargaining power, the parties will be bound by their agreement. [Citation.]

Article 2A recognizes that "[m]any leasing transactions are predicated on the parties' ability to agree to an appropriate amount of damages or formula for damages in the event of default or other act or omission." [U.C.C. §] 2A-504 Official Comment. [U.C.C. §] 2A-504 states, in pertinent part:

(1) Damages payable by either party for default, or any other act or omission *** may be liquidated in the lease agreement but only at an amount or by a formula that is reasonable in light of the then-anticipated harm caused by the default or other act or omission.

This liquidated damages provision is more flexible than that provided by its statutory analogue under Article 2, [U.C.C. §] 2-718. The Article 2 liquidated damages section provides, in pertinent part:

(1) Damages for breach by either party may be liquidated in the agreement but only at an amount which is reasonable in the light of the anticipated or actual harm caused by the breach, the difficulties of proof of loss, and the inconvenience or nonfeasibility of otherwise obtaining an adequate remedy. A term fixing unreasonably large liquidated damages is void as a penalty.

[UCC §] 2-718(1). A review of these statutes reveals two major differences.

First, the drafters of Article 2A chose not to incorporate the two tests which are required by Article 2, i.e., the difficulties of proof of loss and the inconvenience or nonfeasibility of otherwise obtaining an adequate remedy. In fact, the official commentary to [U.C.C. §] 2A-504 states that since "[t]he ability to liquidate damages is critical to modern leasing practice *** [and] given the parties' freedom to contract at common law, the policy behind retaining these two additional requirements here was thought to be outweighed." [Citation.]

Secondly, the drafters of Article 2A recognized that in order to further promote freedom of contract, it was necessary to delete the last sentence of [U.C.C. §] 2-718(1), which provided that unreasonably large liquidated damages provisions were void as a penalty. As such, the parties to a lease transaction are free to negotiate the amount of liquidated damages, restrained only by the rule of reasonableness.

"The basic test of the reasonableness of an agreement liquidating damages is whether the stipulated amount or amount produced by the stipulated formula represents a reasonable forecast of the probable loss." [Citation.] However, "no court should strike down a reasonable liquidated damage agreement based on foresight that has proved on hindsight to have contained an inaccurate estimation of the probable loss ***." Id. And, "the fact that there is a difference between the actual loss, as determined at or about the time of the default, and the anticipated loss or stipulated amount or formula, as stipulated at the time the lease contract was entered into ***," does not necessarily mean that the liquidated damage agreement is unreasonable. Id. This is so because "[t]he value of a lessor's interest in leased equipment depends upon 'the physical condition of the equipment and the market conditions at that time.'" [Citation.] Further, in determining whether a liquidated damages clause is reasonable:

[A] court should keep in mind that the clause was negotiated by the parties, who are familiar with the circumstances and practices with respect to the type of transaction involved, and the clause carries with it a consensual apportionment of the risks of the agreement that a court should be slow to overturn. [Citation.]

In this case, Paragraph 13 of the lease (the liquidated damages clause) reads as follows:

13. REMEDIES. If an event of default shall occur, Lessor may, at its option, at any time (a) declare the entire amount of unpaid rental for the balance of the term of this lease immediately due and payable, whereupon Lessee shall become obligated to pay to Lessor forthwith the total amount of the said rental for the balance of the said term, and (b) without demand or legal process, enter into the premises where the equipment may be found and take possession of and remove the Equipment, without liability for suit, action or other proceeding, and all rights of Lessee in the Equipment so removed shall terminate absolutely. Lessee hereby waives notice of, or hearing with respect to, such retaking. Lessor may at its option, use, ship, store, repair or lease all Equipment so removed and sell or otherwise dispose of any such Equipment at a private or public sale. In the event Lessor takes possession of the Equipment, Lessor shall give Lessee credit for any sums received by Lessor from the sale or rental of the Equipment after deduction of the expenses of sale or rental and Lessor's residual interest in the Equipment. *** Lessor and Lessee acknowledge the difficulty in establishing a value for the unexpired lease term and owing to such difficulty agree that the provisions of this paragraph represent an agreed measure of damages and are not to be deemed a forfeiture or penalty. ***

After a careful review, we conclude the liquidated damages clause is a reasonable estimation of the then-anticipated damages in the event of default because it protects plaintiff's expectation interest. The liquidated damages clause places plaintiff in the position it would have occupied had the lease been fully performed by allowing it to accelerate the balance of the lease payments and repossess the equipment. Therefore, since there is no evidence that plaintiff exercised a superior bargaining position in the negotiation of the liquidated damages clause, no genuine issue of material fact exists as to its reasonableness, and the trial court did not err by enforcing its provisions.

INTERPRETATION Article 2A, which governs leases, allows the parties to liquidate damages as long as the negotiated amount is reasonable in light of the anticipated loss.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the decision by the drafters of Article 2A to omit Article 2's requirements of difficulty of proof and inconvenience or infeasibility of otherwise obtaining an adequate remedy? Explain.

MODIFICATION OR LIMITATION OF REMEDY BY AGREEMENT

The contract between the seller and buyer may expressly provide for remedies in addition to or instead of those provided in the Code and may limit or change the measure of damages recoverable in the event of breach. (Article 2A.) For instance, the contract may validly limit the buyer's remedy to a return of the goods and a refund of the price, or to the replacement of nonconforming goods or parts.

A contractual remedy is optional, however, unless the parties expressly agree that it is to be exclusive of other remedies, in which event it becomes the sole remedy. (Article 2A.) Moreover, when circumstances cause an exclusive or limited remedy to fail in its essential purpose, the parties may resort to the remedies provided by the Code. (Article 2A.)

The contract may expressly limit or exclude consequential damages unless such limitation or exclusion would be unconscionable. Limitation of consequential damages for personal injuries resulting from breach of warranty in the sale of consumer goods is prima facie unconscionable, whereas limitation of such damages for commercial loss is not. (Article 2A.) For example, Ace Motors, Inc., sells a pickup truck to Brenda, a consumer. The contract of sale excludes liability for all consequential damages. The next day, the truck explodes, causing serious personal injury to Brenda. Brenda would recover for her personal injuries unless Ace could prove that the exclusion of consequential damages was not unconscionable.

BOC GROUP, INC. v. CHEVRON CHEMICAL COMPANY, LLC

SUPERIOR COURT OF NEW JERSEY, APPELLATE DIVISION, 2003

<http://lawlibrary.rutgers.edu/courts/appellate/a0338-01.opn.html>

FACTS BOC Group, Inc. (plaintiff) contracted with Chevron Chemical Company, LLC (defendant) to deliver liquid nitrogen, primarily from its Michoud, Louisiana, plant, to defendant's oil refinery production facility located in Belle Chase, Louisiana. Defendant uses liquid nitrogen to ensure the safe operation of its plant. The contract was a “requirement” contract—deliveries were based on how much liquid nitrogen defendant had in its tanks. As a result, plaintiff typically made deliveries seven days a week, and sometimes several times a day.

Defendant claims that plaintiff repeatedly failed to deliver the liquid nitrogen on time, thereby dropping the liquid nitrogen to dangerously low levels and compromising the safety of the plant and its personnel. Although the contract provided that if plaintiff failed to deliver the liquid nitrogen as required defendant’s sole remedy would be to purchase the product from another supplier and charge plaintiff for the additional expenses incurred, defendant did not do so, but instead terminated plaintiff’s services.

Plaintiff sued defendant for breach of contract, and defendant counterclaimed. Steven Earle, defendant’s operations supervisor, testified that he opted to terminate the contract rather than seek cover damages because he could not find alternate suppliers to deliver the required nitrogen. He claimed other suppliers were hesitant “to come in and infringe on an existing contract.” He did not know, however, which suppliers interpreted the contract that way. Earle also acknowledged that when he made his decision to terminate the contract he had not read the contract and thus he was not aware of the exclusive remedy provision in the contract.

The trial judge relied on the exclusive remedy language of the contract, limiting defendant’s rights in the event of plaintiff’s breach. The court found that defendant’s sole remedy was to purchase nitrogen from another supplier and charge plaintiff for any additional expense. The court concluded that defendant did not have the right to terminate the contract and granted plaintiff’s motion for partial summary judgment on the issue of liability. After trial before a jury on the issue of damages, plaintiff was awarded a judgment in the amount of $1.2 million. Defendant appealed.

DECISION Judgment is affirmed.

OPINION Winkelstein, J. Under the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.) as adopted in New Jersey, parties to a contract may establish an exclusive remedy, which, if so labeled, “is the sole remedy” available to them under the terms of the contract. [U.C.C. §] 2-719(1)(b). Yet, despite this exclusive remedy provision, “where circumstances cause an exclusive or limited remedy to fail of its essential purpose, remedy may be had as provided in [the U.C.C.].” [U.C.C. §] 2-719(2). The exclusive remedy provision is “not concerned with arrangements which were oppressive at their inception, but rather with the application of an agreement to novel circumstances not contemplated by the parties.” [Citations.] Although an arm’s length contract between sophisticated commercial parties, such as in this case, should not be readily upset by a court, [citation], where a party is deprived of the substantial value of its bargain by reason of the exclusive remedy, the contract remedy will give way to the general remedy provisions of the U.C.C. [Citation.]

Issues concerning a contract’s exclusive remedy often arise in the context of a breach of warranty. For example, when a product becomes defective, the breach of warranty provision may limit the seller’s obligation to repair or replace defective equipment. [Citations.] In these types of cases—where the seller has limited the warranty to the repair or replacement of a defective part or product—before the exclusive remedy is considered to have failed in its essential purpose, the seller must be given an opportunity to repair or replace the product. [Citations.]

A remedy may also fail of its essential purpose if, “after numerous attempts to repair,” the product does not operate free of defects. [Citations.]

Failure of an exclusive remedy may also come about if the buyer is required to perform an act that cannot be done, such as where a warranty calls for defective parts to be delivered to its plant, but the parts were destroyed, [citation]; or repair or replacement take an unreasonable time to complete, [citations]; or circumstances “prevent the agreed remedy from yielding its purported and expected relief.” [Citation.]

When deciding whether an exclusive remedy has failed of its essential purpose, a court must examine “the facts and circumstances surrounding the contract, the nature of the basic obligations of the party, the nature of the goods involved, the uniqueness or experimental nature of the items, the general availability of the items, and the good faith and reasonableness of the provision.” [Citation.] Whether an exclusive remedy fails in its essential purpose is a question of fact. [Citations.]

Here, the exclusive remedy provision of the contract limited defendant’s rights in the event of plaintiff’s breach. Defendant’s “exclusive remedy” for the “unexcused failure on the part of [plaintiff] to deliver product to [defendant],” was defendant’s right to recover from plaintiff the difference between defendant’s cost to purchase nitrogen from another supplier and the price defendant would have paid plaintiff for the nitrogen under the terms of the contract. Defendant did not exercise this right because it claims it was unable to purchase nitrogen from other suppliers; therefore, defendant argues, the remedy failed in its essential purpose and may not be enforced. The proofs do not, however, support defendant’s argument.

Defendant’s position, that the exclusive remedy failed, is further belied by Earle’s testimony that at the time he decided to terminate the contract with plaintiff—May 1998—he was not even aware of the exclusive remedy provision of the contract. The clear inference being that if he did not know what the contract required if plaintiff breached, there was no reason for him to invoke the contract’s exclusive remedy.

We agree with the motion judge that a rational fact-finder could not find that the exclusive remedy failed in its essential purpose. On the only occasion defendant actually tried to purchase nitrogen from another supplier, it was successful. The facts paint a clear picture—defendant did not give the exclusive remedy an opportunity to work before terminating the contract. It made no attempt to purchase liquid nitrogen from other suppliers when plaintiff was delinquent in its deliveries. Instead, Earle canceled the contract despite the contract’s exclusive remedy, which did not include termination.

Both plaintiff and defendant are sophisticated business entities, freely entering into a contract which limited defendant’s remedies. We find no reason why the parties should not be held to the terms of their bargain. The evidence presented to the motion judge was so one-sided that plaintiff must prevail as a matter of law. [Citation.]

INTERPRETATION Parties to a sales contract may establish an exclusive remedy as the sole remedy available to them except where circumstances cause an exclusive remedy to fail of its essential purpose, in which case the general remedy provisions of the Code apply.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the Code’s policy permitting the parties to establish an exclusive remedy in place of the Code’s remedies?

Chapter Summary

Remedies of the Seller

Buyer’s Default the seller’s remedies are triggered by the buyer’s action in wrongfully rejecting or revoking acceptance of the goods, in failing to make payment due on or before delivery, or in repudiating the contract

To Withhold Delivery

To Stop Delivery if the buyer is insolvent (one who is unable to pay his debts as they become due or one whose total liabilities exceed his total assets), the seller may stop any delivery; if the buyer repudiates or otherwise breaches, the seller may stop carload, truckload, planeload, or larger shipments

To Identify Goods

To Resell the Goods the seller may resell the goods concerned or the undelivered balance of the goods and recover the difference between the contract price and the resale price, together with any incidental damages, less expenses saved

- Type of Resale may be public or private
- Manner of Resale must be made in good faith and in a commercially reasonable manner

To Recover Damages for Nonacceptance or Repudiation

- Market Price Differential the seller may recover damages from the buyer measured by the difference between the unpaid contract price and the market price at the time and place of tender of the goods, plus incidental damages, less expenses saved
- Lost Profit in the alternative, the seller may recover the lost profit, including reasonable overhead, plus incidental damages, less expenses saved

To Recover the Price the seller may recover the price

- when the buyer has accepted the goods
- when the goods have been lost or damaged after the risk of loss has passed to the buyer
- when the goods have been identified to the contract and there is no ready market available for their resale

To Recover Incidental Damages incidental damages include any commercially reasonable charges, expenses, or commissions directly resulting from the breach

To Cancel the Contract

To Reclaim the Goods upon the Buyer’s Insolvency an unpaid seller may reclaim goods from an insolvent buyer under certain circumstances

Remedies of the Buyer

Seller's Default the buyer's remedies arise when the seller fails to make delivery or repudiates the contract or when the buyer rightfully rejects or justifiably revokes acceptance of goods tendered or delivered

To Recover Payments Made

To Cover the buyer may obtain cover by proceeding in good faith and without unreasonable delay to purchase substitute goods; the buyer may recover the difference between the cost of cover and the contract price, plus any incidental and consequential damages, less expenses saved

To Recover Damages for Nondelivery or Repudiation the buyer may recover the difference between the market price at the time the buyer learned of the breach and the contract price, plus any incidental and consequential damages, but less expenses saved

To Recover Identified Goods on the Seller's Insolvency for which he has paid all or part of the price

To Sue for Replevin the buyer may recover goods identified to the contract if (1) the buyer is unable to obtain cover or (2) the goods have been shipped under reservation of a security interest in the seller

To Sue for Specific Performance the buyer may obtain specific performance when the goods are unique or in other proper circumstances

To Enforce a Security Interest a buyer who has rightfully rejected or justifiably revoked acceptance of goods that remain in her possession has a security interest in these goods for any payments made on their price and for any expenses reasonably incurred

To Recover Damages for Breach in Regard to Accepted Goods the buyer may recover damages resulting in the ordinary course of events from the seller's breach; in the case of breach of warranty, such recovery is the difference between the value the goods would have had if they had been as warranted and the value of the nonconforming goods that have been accepted

To Recover Incidental Damages the buyer may recover incidental damages, which include any commercially reasonable expenses connected with the delay or other breach

To Recover Consequential Damages the buyer may recover consequential damages resulting from the seller's breach, including (1) any loss resulting from the buyer's requirements and needs of which the seller at the time of contracting had reason to know and which the buyer could not reasonably prevent by cover or otherwise, and (2) injury to person or property proximately resulting from any breach of warranty

Contractual Provisions Affecting Remedies

Liquidation or Limitation of Damages the parties may specify the amount or measure of damages that may be recovered in the event of a breach if the amount is reasonable

Modification or Limitation of Remedy by Agreement the contract between the parties may expressly provide for remedies in addition to those in the Code, or it may limit or change the measure of damages recoverable for breach

Questions

1. Mae contracted to sell one thousand bushels of wheat to Lloyd at $10 per bushel. Just before Mae was to deliver the wheat, Lloyd notified her that he would not receive or accept the wheat. Mae sold the wheat for $9.60 per bushel, the market price, and later sued Lloyd for the difference of $400. Lloyd claims he was not notified by Mae of the resale and hence is not liable. Is Lloyd correct? Why?

2. On December 15, Judy wrote a letter to David stating that she would sell to David all of the mine-run coal that David might need to buy during the next calendar year for use at David's factory, delivered at the factory at a price of $50 per ton. David immediately replied by letter to Judy stating that he accepted the offer, that he would purchase all of his mine-run coal from Judy, and that he would need two hundred tons of coal during the first week in January. During the months of January, February, and March, Judy delivered to David a total of seven hundred tons of coal, for which David made payment to Judy at the rate of $50 per ton. On April 10, David ordered two hundred tons of mine-run coal from Judy, who replied to David on April 11 that she could not supply David with any more coal except at a price of $58 per ton delivered. David thereafter purchased elsewhere at the market price, namely $58 per ton, all of his factory's requirements of mine-run coal for the remainder of the year, amounting to a total of two thousand tons of coal. Can David now recover damages from Judy at the rate of $8 per ton for the coal thus purchased, amounting to $16,000?
3. On January 10, Betty, of Emanon, Missouri, visited the showrooms of the Forte Piano Company in St. Louis and selected a piano. A sales memorandum of the transaction signed both by Betty and by the salesman of the Forte Piano Company read as follows: "Sold to Betty one new Andover piano, factory number 46832, price $3,300, to be shipped to the buyer at Emanon, Missouri, freight prepaid, before February 1. Prior to shipment, seller will stain the case a darker color in accordance with buyer's directions and will make the tone more brilliant." On January 15, Betty repudiated the contract by letter to the Forte Piano Company. The company subsequently stained the case, made the tone more brilliant, and offered to ship the piano to Betty on January 26. Betty persisted in her refusal to accept the piano. The Forte Piano Company sued Betty to recover the contract price. To what remedy, if any, is Forte entitled?
4. Sims contracted in writing to sell Blake one hundred electric motors at a price of $100 each, freight prepaid to Blake's warehouse. By the contract of sale, Sims expressly warranted that each motor would develop twenty-five brake horsepower. The contract provided that the motors would be delivered in lots of twenty-five per week beginning January 2 and that Blake should pay for each lot of twenty-five motors as delivered, but that Blake was to have right of inspection on delivery. Immediately on delivery of the first lot of twenty-five motors on January 2, Blake forwarded Sims a check for $2,500, but on testing each of the twenty-five motors, Blake determined that none of them would develop more than fifteen brake horsepower. State all of the remedies under the Uniform Commercial Code available to Blake.
5. Henry and Mary entered into a written contract whereby Henry agreed to sell and Mary agreed to buy a certain automobile for $8,500. Henry drove the car to Mary's residence and properly parked it on the street in front of Mary's house, where he tendered it to Mary and requested payment of the price. Mary refused to take the car or pay the price. Henry informed Mary that he would hold her to the contract; but before Henry had time to enter the car and drive it away, a fire truck, answering a fire alarm and traveling at a high speed, crashed into the car and demolished it. Henry brings an action against Mary to recover the price of the car. Who is entitled to judgment? Would there be any difference in result if Henry were a dealer in automobiles?
6. Jane sells and delivers to Gerald on June 1 certain goods and receives from Gerald at the time of delivery Gerald's check in the amount of $9,000 for the goods. The following day, Gerald is petitioned into bankruptcy; and Gerald's bank dishonors the check. On June 5, Jane serves notice on Gerald and the trustee in bankruptcy that she reclaims the goods. The trustee is in possession of the goods and refuses to deliver them to Jane. What are the rights of the parties?
7. The ABC Company, located in Chicago, contracted to sell a carload of television sets to Dodd in St. Louis, Missouri, on sixty days' credit. ABC Company shipped the carload to Dodd. On arrival of the car at St. Louis, Dodd paid the freight charges and reshipped the car to Hines of Little Rock, Arkansas, to whom he had previously contracted to sell the television sets. While the car was in transit to Little Rock, Dodd went bankrupt. ABC Company was informed of this at once and immediately telegraphed XYZ Railroad Company to withhold delivery of the television sets. What should the XYZ Railroad Company do?
8. Robert in Chicago entered into a contract to sell certain machines to Terry in New York. The machines were to be manufactured by Robert and shipped F.O.B. Chicago not later than March 25. On March 24, when Robert was about to ship the machines, he received a telegram from Terry wrongfully repudiating the contract. The machines cannot readily be resold for a reasonable price because they are a special kind used only in Terry's manufacturing processes. Robert sues Terry to recover the agreed price of the machines. What are the rights of the parties?
9. Calvin purchased a log home construction kit, manufactured by Boone Homes, Inc., from an authorized Boone dealer. The sales contract stated that Boone would repair or replace defective materials and that this was the exclusive remedy available against Boone. The dealer assembled the house, which was defective in a number of respects. The knotholes in the logs caused the walls and ceiling to leak. A support beam was too small and therefore cracked, causing the floor to crack also. These defects could not be completely cured by repair. Should Calvin prevail in a lawsuit against Boone for breach of warranty to recover damages for the loss in value?
10. Margaret contracted to buy a particular model Rolls-Royce from Paragon Motors, Inc. Only one hundred of these models are built each year. She paid a $3,000 deposit on the car but Paragon sold the car to Gluck. What remedy, if any, does Margaret have against Paragon?

Case Problems

- 11. Technical Textile agreed by written contract to manufacture and sell 20,000 pounds of yarn to Jagger Brothers at a price of $2.15 per pound. After Technical had manufactured, delivered, and been paid for 3,723 pounds of yarn, Jagger Brothers by letter informed Technical that it was repudiating the contract and that it would refuse any further yarn deliveries. On August 12, the date of the letter, the market price of yarn was $1.90 per pound. The remaining 16,277 pounds were never manufactured. Technical sued Jagger Brothers for breach of contract. To what damages, if any, is Technical entitled? Explain.
- 12. Sherman Burrus, a job printer, purchased a printing press from the Itek Corporation for a price of $7,006.08. Before making the purchase, Burrus was assured by an Itek salesperson, Mr. Nessel, that the press was appropriate for the type of printing Burrus was doing. Burrus encountered problems in operating the press almost continuously from the time he received it. Burrus, his employees, and Itek representatives spent many hours in an unsuccessful attempt to get the press to operate properly. Burrus requested that the press be replaced, but Itek refused. Burrus then brought an action against Itek for (1) damages for breach of the implied warranty of merchantability and (2) consequential damages for losses resulting from the press's defective operation. Burrus was able to prove that the actual value of the press was $1,167 and, because of the defective press, that his output decreased and he sustained a great loss of paper. Itek contends that consequential damages are not recoverable in this case since Burrus elected to keep the press and continued to use it. How much should Burrus recover in damages for breach of warranty? Is he entitled to consequential damages?
- 13. A farmer made a contract in April to sell a grain dealer forty thousand bushels of corn to be delivered in October. On June 3, the farmer unequivocally informed the grain dealer that he was not going to plant any corn, that he would not fulfill the contract, and that if the buyer had commitments to resell the corn he should make other arrangements. The grain dealer waited in vain until October for performance of the repudiated contract. Then he bought corn at a greatly increased price on the market in order to fulfill commitments to his purchasers. To what damages, if any, is the grain dealer entitled? Explain.
- 14. Through information provided by S-2 Yachts, Inc., the plaintiff, Barr, located a yacht to his liking at the Crow's Nest marina and yacht sales company. When Barr asked the price, he was told that, although the yacht normally sold for $102,000, Crow's Nest was willing to sell this particular one for only $80,000 in order to make room for a new model from the manufacturer, S-2 Yachts, Inc. Barr was assured that the yacht in question came with full manufacturer's warranties. Barr asked if the yacht was new and if anything was wrong with it. Crow's Nest told him that nothing was wrong with the yacht and that there were only twenty hours of use on the engines.

Once the yacht had been delivered and Barr had taken it for a test run, he noticed several problems associated with saltwater damage, such as rusted screws, a rusted stove, and faulty electrical wiring. Barr was assured that Crow's Nest would pay for these repairs. However, as was later discovered, the yacht was in such a damaged condition that Barr experienced great personal hazard the two times that he used the boat. Examination by a marine expert revealed clearly that the boat had been sunk in salt water prior to Barr's purchase. The engines were severely damaged, and there was significant structural and equipment damage as well. According to the expert, not only was the yacht not new, it was worth at most only a half of the new value of $102,000. What should Barr be able to recover from S-2 Yachts and Crow's Nest?
- 15. Lee Oldsmobile sells Rolls-Royce automobiles. Mrs. Kaiden sent Lee a $25,000 deposit on a $135,500 1999 Rolls-Royce. Although Lee informed Mrs. Kaiden that the car would be delivered in November, the order form did not indicate the delivery date and contained a disclaimer for delay or failure to deliver due to circumstances beyond the dealer's control. On November 21, Mrs. Kaiden purchased another car from another dealer and canceled her car from Lee. When Lee attempted to deliver a Rolls-Royce to Mrs. Kaiden on November 29, Mrs. Kaiden refused to accept delivery. Lee later sold the car for $130,495.00. Mrs. Kaiden sued Lee for her $25,000 deposit plus interest. Lee counterclaims, based on the terms of the contract, for liquidated damages of $25,000 (the amount of the deposit) as a result of Mrs. Kaiden's breach of contract. What are the rights of the parties?
- 16. Servebest contracted to sell Emessee two hundred thousand pounds of 50 percent lean beef trimmings for $105,000. Upon a substantial fall in the market price, Emessee refused to pay the contract price and informed Servebest that the contract was canceled. Servebest sues Emessee for breach of contract including (a) damages for the difference between the contract price and the resale price of the trimmings and (b) incidental damages. Discuss.
- 17. Mrs. French was the highest bidder on eight antique guns at an auction held by Sotheby & Company. Mrs. French made a down payment on the guns but subsequently refused to accept the guns and refused to pay the remaining balance of $24,886.27 owed on them. Is Sotheby's entitled to collect the price of the guns from Mrs. French?
- 18. Teledyne Industries, Inc., entered into a contract with Teradyne, Inc., to purchase a T-347A transistor test system for the list and fair market price of $98,400 less a discount of $984. After the system was packed for shipment, Teledyne canceled the order, offering to purchase a Field Effects Transistor System for $65,000. Teradyne refused the offer and sold the T-347A to another purchaser pursuant to an order that was on hand prior to the cancellation. Can Teradyne recover from Teledyne for lost profits resulting from the breach of contract? Explain.

- 19. Wilson Trading Corp. agreed to sell David Ferguson a specified quantity of yarn for use in making sweaters. The written contract provided that notice of defects, to be effective, had to be received by Wilson before knitting or within ten days of receipt of the yarn. When the knitted sweaters were washed, the color of the yarn “shaded” (i.e., variations in color from piece to piece appeared). David Ferguson immediately notified Wilson of the problem and refused to pay for the yarn, claiming that the defect made the sweaters unmarketable. Wilson brought suit against Ferguson for the contract price. What result?
- 20. Daniel Martin and John Duke contracted with J & S Distributors, Inc., to purchase a KIS Magnum Speed printer for $17,000. The parties agreed that Martin and Duke would send one-half of the money as a deposit and would pay the balance upon delivery. When the machine arrived five days late, Martin and Duke refused to accept it, stating that the company had purchased a substitute machine elsewhere. Martin and Duke requested the return of its deposit but J & S refused. Martin and Duke sued Jeff Sheffer and J & S for breach of contract, fraud, and breach of good faith. The defendants counterclaimed for full performance of the contract pursuant to a clause in the contract which provides:

In the event of non-payment of the balance of the purchase price reflected herein on due date and in the manner recorded or on such extended date which may be caused by late delivery on the part of [the seller], the Customer shall be liable for: (1) immediate payment of the full balance recorded herein; and (2) payment of interest at the rate of 12 percent per annum calculated on the balance due, when due, together with any attorney’s fees, collection charges and other necessary expenses incurred by [the seller].

What are the rights of the parties?

- 21. Bishop Logging Company is a large, family-owned logging contractor formed in the low country of South Carolina. Bishop Logging has traditionally harvested pine timber.

However, Bishop Logging began investigating the feasibility of a fully mechanized hardwood swamp logging operation when its main customer, Stone Container Corporation, decided to expand hardwood production. In anticipating an increased demand for hardwood in conjunction with the operation of a new paper machine, Stone Container requested that Bishop Logging harvest and supply hardwood for processing at its mill. In South Carolina, most suitable hardwood is located deep in the swamplands. Because of the high accident risk in the swamp, Bishop Logging did not want to harvest hardwood by the conventional method of manual felling of trees. Because Bishop Logging had already been successful in its totally mechanized pine logging operation, it began a search for improved methods of hardwood swamp logging centered on mechanizing the process in order to reduce labor, minimize personal injury and insurance costs, and improve efficiency and productivity.

Bishop Logging ultimately purchased several pieces of John Deere equipment to make up the system. The gross sales price of the machinery was $608,899. All the equipment came with a written John Deere “New Equipment Warranty,” whereby John Deere agreed only to repair or replace the equipment during the warranty period and did not warrant the suitability of the equipment. In the “New Equipment Warranty,” John Deere expressly provided: (a) John Deere would repair or replace parts that were defective in material or workmanship; (b) a disclaimer of any express warranties or implied warranties of merchantability or fitness for a particular purpose; (c) an exclusion of all incidental or consequential damages; and (d) no authority for the dealer to make any representations, promises, modifications, or limitations of John Deere’s written warranty. Hoping to sell more equipment if the Bishop Logging system was successful, however, John Deere agreed to assume part of the risk of the new enterprise by extending its standard equipment warranties notwithstanding the unusual use and modifications to the equipment.

Soon after being placed in operation in the swamp, the machinery began to experience numerous mechanical problems. John Deere made more than $110,000 in warranty repairs on the equipment. However, Bishop Logging contended the swamp logging system failed to operate as represented by John Deere and, as a result, it suffered a substantial financial loss. What, if any, remedies is Bishop entitled to receive? Explain.

FORM AND CONTENT

Money is not, properly speaking, one of the subjects of commerce; but only the instrument which men have agreed upon to facilitate the exchange of one commodity for another. It is none of the wheels of trade: It is the oil which renders the motion of the wheels more smooth and easy.

DAVID HUME (1711–1776), OF MONEY

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Describe the concept and importance of negotiability.
2. Identify and describe the types of negotiable instruments involving an order to pay.
3. Identify and describe the types of negotiable instruments involving a promise to pay.
4. List and explain the formal requirements that an instrument must meet to be negotiable.
5. Explain the effect on negotiability of an instrument's (a) being undated, antedated, or postdated; (b) lack of completion; and (c) ambiguity.

In 1990, the American Law Institute and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform Laws approved a Revised Article 3 to the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). Named “Negotiable Instruments,” the new Article maintains the basic scope and content of prior Article 3 (Commercial Paper). In 2002, the American Law Institute and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform Law completed updates to Articles 3 and 4. Forty-three states have adopted the 1990 version of Article 3, six states have adopted the 2002 version, and New York has retained the original version of Article 3. This part of the text will discuss Revised Article 3 but will also point out the major changes from prior Article 3. The 1990 version of Revised Article 3 is presented in Appendix B.

Negotiable instruments, also referred to simply as instruments, include drafts, checks, promissory notes, and certificates of deposit. These instruments are crucial to the sale of goods and services as well as to the financing of most businesses. The use of negotiable instruments has increased to such an extent that payments made with these instruments, with checks in particular, are now many times greater than payments made with cash, which now is used primarily for smaller transactions. In the United States, approximately 33 billion checks were written in 2006 for a total value of $42 trillion; however, this was down from the 50 billion checks written in 1995. This decrease is due to the increase in electronic transfers. Electronic transfers rose from 30.5 billion transactions in 2000 to 62.8 billion transactions in 2006, while the value of these transactions rose from $20 trillion to $34 trillion. In addition, as of April 2009, in the United States there was $1.5 trillion of outstanding commercial paper in the form of promissory notes issued by corporations to fund operating expenses or current assets. Moreover, in the United States in 2007, there was almost $6 trillion of outstanding corporate long-term promissory notes (bonds). Accordingly, the vital importance of negotiable instruments and electronic transfers as methods of payment and financing cannot be overstated.

Modern business could not be conducted without the use of negotiable instruments. A tremendous number of transactions involve the writing of one or more checks. Drafts, of which checks are a specialized form, provide an important monetary and credit function in the business world, both inside and outside the banking system. Promissory notes serve an essential business purpose, not only in areas of high finance, but also at the level of the consumer and small businessperson as well. In recent years, individuals have increasingly used certificates of deposit instead of savings accounts.

Negotiability

Negotiability is a legal concept that makes written instruments freely transferable and therefore a readily accepted form of payment in substitution for money.

DEVELOPMENT OF LAW OF NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS

The starting point for an understanding of negotiable instruments is recognizing that four or five centuries ago in England a contract right to the payment of money was not assignable because a contractual promise ran to the promisee. The fact that performance could be rendered only to him constituted a hardship for the owner of the right because it prevented him from selling or disposing of it. Eventually, however, the law permitted recovery upon an assignment by the assignee against the obligor.

An innocent assignee bringing an action against the obligor was subject to all defenses available to the obligor. Such an action would result in the same outcome whether it was brought by the assignee or assignor. Thus, a contract right became assignable but not very marketable because merchants had little interest in buying into a possible lawsuit. This remains the law of assignments: The assignee stands in the shoes of his assignor. For a discussion of assignments, see Chapter 16.

With the flourishing of trade and commerce, it became essential to develop a more effective means of exchanging contractual rights for money. For example, a merchant who sold goods for cash might use the cash to buy more goods for resale. If he were to make a sale on credit in exchange for a promise to pay money, why should he not be permitted to sell that promise to someone else for cash with which to carry on his business? One difficulty was that the buyer of the goods gave the seller only a promise to pay money to him. The seller was the only person to whom performance or payment was promised. If, however, the seller obtained from the buyer a promise in writing to pay money to anyone in possession (a bearer) of the writing (the paper or instrument) or to anyone the seller (or payee in this case) designated, then the duty of performance would run directly to the holder (the bearer of the paper or to the person to whom the payee ordered payment to be made). This is one of the essential distinctions between negotiable and nonnegotiable instruments. Although a negotiable instrument has other formal requirements, this particular one eliminates the limitations of a promise to pay money only to a named promisee.

Moreover, if the promise to pay were not subject to all of the defenses available against the assignor, a transferee would not only be more willing to acquire the promise but also would pay more for it. Accordingly, the law of negotiable instruments developed the concept of the holder in due course, whereby certain good faith transferees who gave value acquired the right to be paid, free of most of the defenses to which an assignee would be subject. By reason of this doctrine, a transferee of a negotiable instrument could acquire greater rights than his transferor, whereas an assignee would acquire only the rights of his assignor. With these basic innovations, negotiable instruments enabled merchants to sell their contractual rights more readily and thereby keep their capital working.

ASSIGNMENT COMPARED WITH NEGOTIATION

Negotiability invests negotiable instruments with a high degree of marketability and commercial utility. It allows negotiable instruments to be freely transferable and enforceable by a person with the rights of a holder in due course against any person obligated on the instrument, subject only to a limited number of defenses. To illustrate, assume that George sells and delivers goods to Elaine for $50,000 on sixty days' credit and that, a few days later, George assigns this account to Marsha. Unless Elaine is duly notified of this assignment, she may safely pay the $50,000 to George on the due date without incurring any liability to Marsha, the assignee. Assume next that the goods were defective and that Elaine, accordingly, has a defense against George to the extent of $20,000. Assume also that Marsha duly notified Elaine of the assignment. The result is that Marsha can recover only $30,000, not $50,000, from Elaine because Elaine's defense against George is equally available against George's assignee, Marsha. In other words, an assignee of contractual rights merely “steps into the shoes” of her assignor and, hence, acquires only the same rights as her assignor—and no more.

Order to Pay:
Draft or Check

Assume, instead, that upon the sale by George to Elaine, Elaine executes and delivers her negotiable note to George for $50,000, payable to George’s order in sixty days, and that, a short time later, George duly negotiates (transfers) the note to Marsha. In the first place, Marsha is not required to notify Elaine that she has acquired the note from George, because one who issues a negotiable instrument is held to know that the instrument may be negotiated and is generally obligated to pay the holder of the instrument, whoever that may be. In the second place, Elaine’s defense is not available against Marsha if Marsha acquired the note in good faith and for value and had no knowledge of Elaine’s defense against George and took it without reason to question its authenticity. Marsha, therefore, is entitled to hold Elaine for the full face amount of the note at maturity, namely, $50,000. In other words, Marsha, by the negotiation of the negotiable note to her, acquired rights greater than those George had, because, by keeping the note, George could have recovered only $30,000 on it because Elaine successfully could have asserted her defense in the amount of $20,000 against him.

To have the full benefit of negotiability, negotiable instruments not only must meet the requirements of negotiability but also must be acquired by a holder in due course. This chapter discusses the formal requirements that instruments must satisfy to be negotiable. Chapter 25 deals with the manner in which a negotiable instrument must be negotiated to preserve its advantages. Chapter 26 covers the requisites and rights of a holder in due course.

Finally, Chapter 27 examines the liability of all the parties to a negotiable instrument.

Types of Negotiable Instruments

There are four types of negotiable instruments: drafts, checks, notes, and certificates of deposit. The first two contain orders or directions to pay money; the last two involve promises to pay money.

DRAFTS

A draft involves three parties, each in a distinct capacity. One party, the drawer, orders a second party, the drawee, to pay a fixed amount of money to a third party, the payee (see Figure 24-1 for a three-party instrument). Thus, the drawer “draws” the draft on the drawee. The drawee is ordinarily a person or entity that either is in possession of money belonging to the drawer or owes money to him. A sample draft is reproduced in Figure 24-2. The same party may appear in more than one capacity; for instance, the drawer may also be the payee.

Drafts may be either “time” or “sight.” A time draft is one payable at a specified future date, whereas a sight draft is payable on demand (i.e., immediately upon presentation to the drawee).

CHECKS

A check is a specialized form of draft, namely, an order to pay money drawn on a bank and payable on demand

(i.e., upon the payee’s request for payment). Once again, there are parties involved in three distinct capacities: the drawer, who orders the drawee, a bank, to pay the payee on demand (see Figure 24-3 for a check). Checks are by far the most widely used form of negotiable instruments. Each year more than 10 billion checks are written in the United States for a total of more than $5 trillion. The Check Clearing for the 21st Century Act (also called Check 21 or the Check Truncation Act), which went into effect in late 2004, creates a new negotiable instrument called a substitute check or image replacement document (IRD). The law permits banks to truncate original checks, to process check information electronically, and to deliver substitute checks to banks that want to continue receiving paper checks. A substitute check would be the legal equivalent of the original check and would include all the information contained on the original check. The law does not require banks to accept checks in electronic form nor does it require banks to use the new authority granted by the act to create substitute checks. This newly authorized document is more fully discussed in Chapter 28.

A cashier’s check is a check drawn by a bank upon itself to the order of a named payee.

NOTES

A promissory note is an instrument involving two parties in two capacities. One party, the maker, promises to pay a second party, the payee, a stated sum of money, either on demand or at a stated future date (see Figure 24-4 for a two-party promise to pay). The note may range from a simple “I promise to pay $X to the order of Y” form to more complex legal instruments such as installment notes, collateral notes, mortgage notes, and judgment notes. Figure 24-5 is a note payable at a definite time—six months from the date of April 7, 2010—and hence is referred to as a time note. A note payable upon the request or demand of the payee or holder is a demand note.

CERTIFICATES OF DEPOSIT

A certificate of deposit, or CD, as it is frequently called, is a specialized form of promise to pay money given by a bank. A certificate of deposit is a written acknowledgment by a bank of the receipt of money that it promises to repay. The issuing party, the maker, which is always a bank, promises to pay a second party, the payee, who is named in the CD (see Figure 24-6 for a sample certificate of deposit).

Formal Requirements of Negotiable Instruments

To perform its function in the business community effectively, a negotiable instrument must be able to pass freely from person to person. The fact that negotiability is wholly a matter of form makes such freedom possible. The instrument must contain within its “four corners” all the information required to determine whether it is negotiable. No reference to any other source is permitted. For this reason, a negotiable instrument is called a “courier without luggage.” In addition, indorsements cannot create or destroy negotiability.

In order to be negotiable, the instrument must

1. be in writing,
2. be signed,
3. contain a promise or order to pay,
4. be unconditional,
5. be for a fixed amount,
6. be for money,
7. contain no other undertaking or instruction,
8. be payable on demand or at a definite time, and
9. be payable to order or to bearer.

If these requirements are not met, the undertaking is not negotiable (nor is it a negotiable instrument or simply an instrument), and the rights of the parties are governed by the law of contract (assignment).

Practical Advice

To increase the value of an undertaking, make sure that any document memorializing it qualifies as a negotiable instrument.

YIN V. SOCIETY NATIONAL BANK INDIANA

COURT OF APPEALS OF INDIANA, 1996

665 N.E.2D 58

FACTS On January 2, 1991, plaintiff, Society National Bank (Society), agreed in a promissory note to lend U.S.A. Diversified Products, Inc. (USAD) up to $2 million in the form of an operating line of credit. Paul Davis (Davis) signed the note both personally and as the president of USAD. Defendant, Sam Yin (Yin), who jointly owns USAD with Davis, also personally signed the note. Defendant, Sophia Kung (Kung), who at that time was married to Yin, also signed the note personally. During negotiations regarding the note, Society directly dealt only with Davis. Once negotiations were finalized, Davis took the note, obtained Yin's and Kung's signatures, and returned it to Society. The outstanding balance was to be paid on April 30, 1992.

Some time prior to the end of April 1992, Davis told Society that a sixty-day extension of the original payment date was needed. Society agreed to the extension. Davis represented that he would obtain Yin's and Kung's signatures as he had for the 1991 document. However, Yin's and Kung's signatures were forged on the extension document.

As a result of USAD's default on the line of credit, Society filed a complaint against USAD, Davis, Yin, and Kung. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of Society and against Yin and Kung in the amount of $2,160,331.73, including interest, attorneys' fees, and expenses.

DECISION Reversed and remanded.

OPINION Chezem, J. Is this line of credit a negotiable instrument?

[Article 3] appl[ies] only to negotiable instruments. [Citation.] Non-negotiable agreements are governed by Indiana common law. [Citations.] Yin and Kung challenge the trial court's finding that their agreement for a line of credit is a negotiable instrument. *** We hold that it is not.

In determining the negotiability of an agreement, we apply the law in effect at the time of the execution of the agreement. [Prior Article 3.]

Yin and Kung assert that their line of credit meets neither the sum certain [fixed amount under Revised Article 3] nor the unconditional requirement. ***

Other courts have faced the issue or a situation quite similar to it and held that such an agreement is not a negotiable instrument. The parties do not seriously dispute that the agreement in the present case is a line of credit upon which USAD could make draws of varying amounts. Indeed, the face of the note contains a notation regarding “draws.” We note that although USAD did make various draws upon the line of credit, it was under no obligation to make any draws whatsoever. In fact, if USAD had never drawn upon the line of credit, it would have owed nothing when the agreement matured. The principal would have been zero. This is noteworthy because it illustrates an important feature of the line of credit: in order to ascertain the principal owed, one must look beyond the agreement itself. A current history of USAD's draws would also be necessary in order to calculate the amount USAD owed. Because of the potentially variable principal which results from such an arrangement, the line of credit contains no sum certain [nor fixed amount]. In addition, USAD's ability to make draws up to two million dollars was not unfettered. It was dependent upon the sufficiency of USAD's accounts receivable. That is, if USAD sold the accounts receivable (Society's security), then Society “in all likelihood *** would put a hold on any further draws.” Society conditioned USAD's access to the line of credit by tracking the company's collateral. Lacking an unconditional promise to pay a sum certain, the line of credit falls outside the definition of a negotiable instrument. Thus, in addressing the parties' other issues regarding the line of credit, we apply Indiana common law.

Because the change must be a material and binding one, we cannot agree with Yin's and Kung's assertion that the forged extension note serves to discharge them from the potential liability they incurred upon signing the original 1991 agreement. They cannot be bound by a document (here, the extension note) which does not bear their signatures. In addition, by signing the 1991 note which contained a consent to future extensions provision, they explicitly gave prior consent to an extension. [Citation.] Accordingly, the extension note has no effect on their liability.

INTERPRETATION An instrument must contain within its “four corners” all the information required to determine whether it is negotiable.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Should negotiability be a matter of form? Explain.

WRITING

The requirement that the instrument be in writing is broadly construed. Printing, typewriting, handwriting, or any other intentional tangible expression is sufficient to satisfy the requirement. Most negotiable instruments, of course, are written on paper, but this is not required. In one instance, a check was reportedly written on a coconut.

SIGNED

A note or certificate of deposit must be signed by the maker; a draft or check must be signed by the drawer. As in the case of a writing, extreme latitude is granted in determining what constitutes a signature, which is any symbol a party executes or adopts with the present intention to authenticate a writing. Revised Article 1 changes the word “authenticate” to “adopt or accept.” Moreover, it may consist of any word or mark used in place of a written signature, such as initials, an X, or a thumbprint. It may be a trade name or an assumed name. Even the location of the signature on the document is unimportant. Normally, a maker or drawer signs in the lower right-hand corner of the instrument, but this is not required. Negotiable instruments are frequently signed by an agent for her principal. For a discussion of the appropriate way in which an agent should sign a negotiable instrument, see Chapter 27.

PROMISE OR ORDER TO PAY

A negotiable instrument must contain either a promise to pay money, in the case of a note or certificate of deposit, or an order to pay, in the case of a draft or check.

Promise to Pay A promise to pay is an undertaking and must be more than the mere acknowledgment or recognition of an existing obligation or debt. The so-called due bill or IOU is not a promise but merely an acknowledgment of indebtedness. Accordingly, an instrument reciting “due Adam Brown $100” or “IOU, Adam Brown, $100” is not negotiable because it does not contain a promise to pay.

Order to Pay An order to pay is an instruction to pay. It must be more than an authorization or request and must identify with reasonable certainty the person to be paid. The usual way to express an order is by use of the word pay: “Pay to the order of John Jones” or “Pay bearer.” The addition of words of courtesy, such as please pay or kindly pay, will not destroy the negotiability. Nonetheless, caution should be exercised in employing words that modify the prototypically correct “pay.” For example, the use of the words “I wish you would pay” has been held to destroy the negotiability of an instrument and to render its transfer a contractual assignment.

UNCONDITIONAL

The requirement that the promise or order be unconditional is to prevent the inclusion of any term that could reduce the promisor’s obligation to pay. Conditions limiting a promise would diminish the payment and credit functions of negotiable instruments by necessitating costly and time-consuming investigations to determine the degree of risk such conditions imposed. Moreover, if the holder (transferee) had to take an instrument subject to certain conditions, her risk factor would be substantial, and this would lead to limited transferability. Substitutes for money must be capable of rapid circulation at a minimum risk.

A promise or order to pay is unconditional if it is absolute and not subject to any contingencies or qualifications. Thus, an instrument would not be negotiable if it stated that “ABC Corp. promises to pay $100,000 to the order of Johnson provided the helicopter sold meets all contractual specifications.” On the other hand, suppose that upon delivering an instrument that provided, “ABC Corp. promises to pay $100,000 to the order of Johnson,” Meeker, the president of ABC, stated that the money would be paid only if the helicopter met all contractual specifications. The instrument would be negotiable because negotiability is determined solely by examining the instrument itself and is not affected by matters beyond the instrument’s face.

A promise or order is unconditional unless it states: (1) that there is an express condition to payment, (2) that the promise or order is subject to or governed by another writing, or (3) that rights or obligations concerning the order or promise are stated in another writing. A mere reference to another writing, however, does not make the promise or order conditional.

An instrument is not made conditional by the fact that it is subject to implied or constructive conditions; the condition must be expressed to destroy negotiability. Implications of law or fact are not to be considered in deciding whether an instrument is negotiable. Thus, a statement in an instrument that it is given for an executory promise does not imply that the instrument is conditioned upon performance of that promise.

Reference to Other Agreements The restriction against reference to another agreement is to enable any person to determine the right to payment provided by the instrument without having to look beyond its four corners. If such a right is made subject to the terms of another agreement, the instrument is nonnegotiable.

A distinction is to be made between a mere recital of the existence of a separate agreement (this does not destroy negotiability) and a recital that makes the instrument subject to the terms of another agreement (this does destroy negotiability).

A statement in a note, such as “This note is given in partial payment for a color TV set to be delivered two weeks from date in accordance with a contract of this date between the payee and the maker,” does not impair negotiability. It merely describes the consideration and the transaction giving rise to the note. It does not place any restriction or condition on the maker’s obligation to pay. The promise is not made subject to any other agreement. The following is an example of added words that would impair negotiability: “This note is subject to all terms of said contract.” Such words make the promise to pay conditional upon the adequate performance of the television set in accordance with the terms of the contract and thus render the instrument nonnegotiable.

The Particular Fund Doctrine Revised Article 3 eliminates the particular fund doctrine by providing that a promise or order is not made conditional because payment is to be made only out of a particular fund.

Under prior Article 3, an order or promise to pay only out of a particular fund was conditional and destroyed negotiability because payment depended on the existence and sufficiency of the particular fund. On the other hand, a promise or order to pay that merely indicated a particular fund out of which reimbursement was to be made or a particular account to be debited with the amount did not impair negotiability, because the promise or order relied on the drawer's or maker's general credit and the notation charging a particular account was merely a bookkeeping entry to be followed after payment.

FIXED AMOUNT

The purpose of the requirement of a fixed amount in money is to enable the person entitled to enforce the instrument to determine from the instrument itself the amount that he is entitled to receive.

The requirement that payment be of a "fixed amount" must be considered from the point of view of the person entitled to enforce the instrument, not the maker or drawer. (Prior Article 3 used the term "sum certain," which means fundamentally the same as "fixed amount.") The holder must be assured of a determinable minimum payment, although provisions of the instrument may increase the recovery under certain circumstances. Revised Article 3, however, applies the fixed amount requirement only to the principal. Thus, the fixed amount portion does not apply to interest or to the charges, such as collection fees or attorneys' fees.

Moreover, negotiability of an instrument is not affected by the inclusion or omission of a stated rate of interest. If the instrument does not state a rate of interest, it is payable without interest. If the instrument states that it is payable "with interest" but does not specify a rate, the judgment rate of interest applies.

Most significantly, Revised Article 3 provides that "Interest may be stated in an instrument as a fixed or variable amount of money or it may be expressed as a fixed or variable rate or rates." Moreover, determination of the rate of interest "may require reference to information not contained in the instrument." Variable rate mortgages, therefore, may be negotiable; this result is consistent with the rule that the fixed amount requirement applies only to the principal.

Under prior Article 3, both principal and interest had to be determined from the face of the instrument. Thus, courts held that variable interest rate provisions destroyed negotiability because the interest rate was tied to a published index external to the instrument.

A sum payable is a fixed amount even though it is payable in installments or payable with a fixed discount, if paid before maturity, or with a fixed addition, if paid after maturity. This is because it is always possible to use the instrument itself to compute the amount due at any given time.

MONEY

The term money means a medium of exchange authorized or adopted by a sovereign government as part of its currency. (Revised Article 1 adds that the authorized or adopted currency must be the current official currency of the government.) Consequently, even though local custom may make gold or diamonds a medium of exchange, an instrument payable in such commodities would be nonnegotiable because of the lack of governmental sanction of such media as legal tender. On the other hand, an instrument paying a fixed amount in Swiss francs, Australian dollars, Nigerian naira, Japanese yen, or other foreign currency is negotiable.

NO OTHER UNDERTAKING OR INSTRUCTION

A negotiable instrument must contain a promise or order to pay money, but it may not "state any other undertaking or instruction by the person promising or ordering payment to do any act in addition to the payment of money." Accordingly, an instrument containing an order or promise to do an act in addition to or in lieu of the payment of money is not negotiable. For example, a promise to pay $100 "and a ton of coal" would be nonnegotiable.

The Code sets out a list of terms and provisions that may be included in instruments without adversely affecting negotiability. Among these are (1) an undertaking or power to give, maintain, or protect collateral in order to secure payment; (2) an authorization or power to confess judgment (written authority by the debtor to allow the holder to enter judgment against the debtor in favor of the holder) on the instrument; (3) an authorization or power to sell or dispose of collateral upon default; and (4) a waiver of the benefit of any law intended for the advantage or protection of the obligor. It is important to note that the Code does not render any of these terms legal or effective; it merely provides that their inclusion will not affect negotiability.

Practical Advice

To preserve the negotiability of an instrument, avoid including any undertaking beyond the promise or order to pay.

PAYABLE ON DEMAND OR AT A DEFINITE TIME

A negotiable instrument must “be payable on demand or at a definite time.” This requirement, like the other formal requirements of negotiability, is designed to promote certainty in determining the present value of a negotiable instrument.

Demand “Payable upon demand” means that the money owed under the instrument must be paid upon the holder’s request. Demand paper always has been considered sufficiently certain as to time of payment to satisfy the requirements of negotiability, because it is the person entitled to enforce the instrument who makes the demand and who thus sets the time for payment. Any instrument in which no time for payment is stated—a check, for example—is payable on demand. An instrument also qualifies as being payable on demand if it is payable at sight or on presentment.

Definite Time Instruments payable at a definite time are called time paper. A promise or order is payable at a definite time if it is payable

1. at a fixed date or dates,
2. at a definite period of time after sight or acceptance, or
3. at a time readily ascertainable at the time the promise or order is issued.

NATIONSBANK OF VIRGINIA, N.A. v. BARNES

VIRGINIA CIRCUIT COURT, 1994
33 VA. CIR. 184, 24 UCC.REP. SERV.2D 782

FACTS In 1991, Ad Barnes and Elaine Barnes (Barnes) executed a promissory note for $200,000 to Sovran Bank, N.A. (Sovran). The note was executed on a standard form and a box marked payable “on demand” was checked. There was no set time for repayment, only a provision requiring monthly payments of interest. NationsBank of Virginia, N.A. (NationsBank) became the successor by merger to Sovran and is now the holder of this note. By a letter dated February 17, 1993, NationsBank made a demand for payment on the note. Barnes did not make payment and NationsBank brought this action to recover payment. NationsBank filed a motion for partial summary judgment on the issue of liability. Barnes argued that NationsBank must make a showing of good faith before it may demand payment on the note.

DECISION Decision for NationsBank.

OPINION Horne, J. The factual question still in dispute concerning the 1991 Note is whether it is a demand note. Plaintiff argues that the language of the note is unambiguous and is clearly a demand note. Defendants argue that the detailed enumeration of events constituting default is inconsistent with a demand note. Thus, a standard of good faith must be applied before a demand for accelerated repayment can be made.

[U.C.C.] § 1–203 establishes a general duty of good faith in every contract governed by the Commercial Code. Under any contract providing for accelerated payment at will, § 1–208 states that the option is to be exercised only in the good faith belief that the prospect of payment or performance is impaired. However, the Official Comment to this section indicates that it is not applicable to a demand instrument.

[U.C.C. Revised § 3–108(a)] states that a note is payable “on demand” if it says it is payable on demand or states no time for payment. In this case, the 1991 *** Note is a standard form with different forms of repayment set out on the first page. The box marked payable “on demand” has been checked in this instance. There is no time set for repayment, only a provision requiring monthly payments of interest.

It is the court’s opinion that the 1991 Note is unambiguous and is clearly a demand note. Thus, Plaintiff is under no obligation to show good faith before requesting payment on the note. Since demand has been made by Plaintiff, Defendants are liable. Thus, Plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment on the issue of liability under the 1991 Note.

INTERPRETATION An instrument payable on demand must be paid upon the holder’s request.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did NationsBank act in good faith? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the court’s decision? Explain.

An instrument is payable at a definite time if it is payable “on or before” a stated date. The person entitled to enforce the instrument is thus assured that she will have her money by the maturity date at the latest, although she may receive it sooner. This right of anticipation enables the obligor, at his option, to pay before the stated maturity date (prepayment) and thereby stop the further accrual of interest or, if interest rates have gone down, to refinance at a lower rate of interest. Nevertheless, it constitutes sufficient certainty so as not to impair negotiability.

Frequently, instruments are made payable at a fixed period after a stated date. For example, the instrument may be made payable “thirty days after date.” This means it is payable thirty days after the date of issuance, which is recited on the instrument. Such an instrument is payable at a definite time, for its exact maturity date can be determined by simple math.

An undated instrument payable “thirty days after date” is not payable at a definite time, as the date of payment cannot be determined from its face. It is therefore nonnegotiable until it is completed.

An instrument that by its terms is otherwise payable only upon an act or event whose time of occurrence is uncertain is not payable at a definite time. An example would be a note providing for payment to the order “when X dies.” However, as previously stated, a time that is readily ascertainable at the time the promise or order is issued is a definite time. This changes prior Article 3 and seemingly would permit a note reading “payable on the day of the next presidential election.” As long as the scheduled event is certain to happen, Revised Article 3 appears to be satisfied.

The clause “at a fixed period after sight” is frequently used in drafts. Because a fixed period after sight means a fixed period after acceptance, a simple mathematical calculation makes the maturity date certain, and the instrument is, therefore, negotiable.

An instrument payable at a fixed time subject to acceleration by the holder also satisfies the requirement of being payable at a definite time. Indeed, such an instrument would seem to have a more certain maturity date than a demand instrument because it at least states a definite maturity date. In addition, the acceleration may be contingent upon the happening of some act or event.

Finally, a provision in an instrument granting the holder an option to extend the maturity of the instrument for a definite or indefinite period does not impair its negotiability. Nor does a provision permitting the obligor of an instrument to extend the maturity date to a further definite time. For example, a provision in a note, payable one year from date, that the maker may extend the maturity date six months does not impair negotiability. If the obligor is given an option to extend the maturity of the instrument for an indefinite period, however, his promise is illusory, and there is no certainty regarding time of payment. Such an instrument is nonnegotiable. If the obligor’s right to extend is limited to a definite time, the extension clause is no more indefinite than an acceleration clause with a time limitation.

In addition, extension may be made automatic upon or after a specified act or event, provided a definite time limit is stated. An example of such an extension clause is, “I promise to pay to the order of John Doe the sum of $2,000 on December 1, 2009, but it is agreed that if the crop of sections 25 and 26 of Twp. 145 is below eight bushels per acre for the 2009 season, this note shall be extended for one year.”

At a Definite Time and on Demand If the instrument, payable at a fixed date, also provides that it is payable on demand made before the fixed date, it is still a negotiable instrument. Revised Article 3 provides that the instrument is payable on demand until the fixed date and, if demand is not made prior to the specified date, becomes payable at a definite time on the fixed date.

COOPERATIVE CENTRALE RAIFFEISEN-BOERENLEENBANK B.A. v. BAILEY

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, CENTRAL DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA, 1989
710 F.SUPP. 737

FACTS William Bailey, M.D., executed a promissory note to California Dreamstreet, a joint venture that solicited investments in cattle breeding operations. California Dreamstreet subsequently sold the note to Cooperative Centrale Raiffeisen-Boerenleenbank B.A. (Bank).

The wording on the promissory note was unusual. In pertinent part it read: “DR. WILLIAM BAILEY ... hereby promises to pay to the order to CALIFORNIA DREAM-STREET ... the sum of Three Hundred Twenty-Nine Thousand Eight Hundred ($329,800) Dollars.”

Dr. Bailey contended that the atypical wording “pay to the order to” rendered the note nonnegotiable, and refused to pay the Bank. The Bank, asserting that the note was negotiable, sued for payment.

DECISION Judgment for the Bank.

OPINION Rea, J. [The parties] agree that the sole issue is whether the unusual language in the note obliging Bailey to “pay to the order California Dreamstreet” renders the note nonnegotiable.

Whether an instrument is negotiable is a question of law to be determined solely from the face of the instrument, without reference to the intent of the parties. [Citation.] To be negotiable, an instrument must “be payable to order or bearer.” Code § 3–104(1)(d). “Payable to order” is further defined by Code § 3–110(1), as follows:

(1) An instrument is payable to order when by its terms it is payable to the order *** of any person therein specified with reasonable certainty, or to him or his order, or when it is conspicuously designated on its face as “exchange” or the like and names a payee.

It is well established that a promissory note is nonnegotiable if it states only “payable to (payee),” rather than “payable to the order of [payee].” [Citations.] Bailey claims that the instant note, which states “pay to the order to [payee],” falls between these two alternatives and should therefore be deemed nonnegotiable.

The authorities are unhelpful. There is apparently no case on record in which a variance this small from the language of the Code has been called into question. Both parties direct the Court’s attention to Official UCC Comment 5 to Code § 3–104, which states:

5. This Article omits the original Section 10, which provided that the instrument need not follow the language of the act if it “clearly indicates an intention to conform” to it. The provision has served no useful purpose, and it has been an encouragement to bad drafting and to liberality in holding questionable paper to be negotiable. The omission is not intended to mean that the instrument must follow the language of this section, or that one term may not be recognized as clearly the equivalent of another, as in the case of “I undertake” instead of “I promise,” or “Pay to holder” instead of “Pay to bearer.” It does mean that either the language of the section or a clear equivalent must be found, and that in doubtful cases the decision should be against negotiability.

In the Court’s opinion, the Comment fails to persuasively support either party’s position. Rules of grammar belie the Bank’s argument that the preposition “to” is an apt substitute for “of” since the resulting sentence, read literally, is not just ambiguous but incomplete. On the other hand, the Comment expressly disavows Bailey’s argument that the Code drafters intended to set forth certain “magic words,” the absence of which precludes negotiability.

What does emerge from the Comment is the need for certainty in determining negotiability. Though sensitive to this goal and to the potentially harsh result of such a finding, the court does not find the instant facts to present the kind of “doubtful” case which should be resolved against negotiability. In this context, the phrase “pay to the order to” can plausibly be construed only to mean “pay to the order of.” While other explanations are possible, none are realistic. To hold otherwise would, in this court’s opinion, set an overly technical standard that could unexpectedly frustrate legitimate expectations of negotiability in commercial transactions.

INTERPRETATION An instrument is payable to order if it is payable to the order of an identified entity.

PAYABLE TO ORDER OR TO BEARER

A negotiable instrument must contain words indicating that the maker or drawer intends that it may pass into the hands of someone other than the payee. Although the “magic” words of negotiability typically are payable to order or to bearer, other clearly equivalent words also may fulfill this requirement. The use of synonyms, however, only invites trouble. Moreover, as noted above, indorsements cannot create or destroy negotiability, which must be determined from the “face” of the instrument. Words of negotiability must be present when the instrument is issued or first comes into possession of a holder.

Revised Article 3 provides that a check that meets all requirements of being a negotiable instrument except that it is not payable to bearer or order is nevertheless a negotiable instrument. This rule does not apply to instruments other than checks and does not exist under prior Article 3.

Payable to Order An instrument is payable to order if it is payable (1) to the order of an identified person or (2) to an identified person or order. If an instrument is payable to bearer, it cannot be payable to order; an instrument that is ambiguous as to this point is payable to bearer. Prior Article 3 provided that use of the word “assigns” met the requirement of words of negotiability; Revised Article 3, however, does not so provide.

Moreover, in every instance the person to whose order the instrument is payable must be designated with reasonable certainty. Within this limitation a broad range of payees is possible, including an individual, two or more payees, an office, an estate, a trust or fund, a partnership or unincorporated association, and a corporation.

This requirement should not be confused with the requirement that the instrument contain an order or promise to pay. An order to pay is an instruction to a third party to pay the instrument as drawn. The word “order” in terms of an “order instrument,” on the other hand, pertains to the transferability of the instrument rather than to instructions directing a specific party to pay.

A writing, other than a check, that names a specified person without indicating that it is payable to order—for example, “Pay to Justin Matthew”—is not payable to order or to bearer. Such a writing is not a negotiable instrument and is not covered by Article 3. On the other hand, a check that meets all of the requirements of a negotiable instrument, except that it does not provide the words of negotiability, is still a negotiable instrument and falls within the purview of Article 3. Thus, a check “payable to Justin Matthew” is a negotiable check.

Payable to Bearer The UCC states that an instrument fulfills the requirements of being payable to bearer if it (1) states it is payable to bearer or the order of bearer, (2) does not state a payee, or (3) states it is payable to “cash” or to the order of “cash.” An instrument made payable both to order and to bearer, that is, “pay to the order of Mildred Courts or bearer,” is payable to bearer.

An instrument that does not state a payee is payable to bearer. Thus, if a drawer leaves blank the “pay to order of” line of a check or the maker of a note writes “pay to _____,” the instrument is a negotiable bearer instrument.

TERMS AND OMISSIONS AND THEIR EFFECT ON NEGOTIABILITY

The negotiability of an instrument may be questioned because of an omission of certain provisions or because of ambiguity. Problems may also arise in connection with the interpretation of an instrument, whether or not negotiability is called into question. Accordingly, the Code contains rules of construction that apply to every instrument.

Dating of the Instrument The negotiability of an instrument is not affected by the fact that it is antedated or postdated. If the instrument is undated, its date is the date of its issuance. If it is unissued, its date is the date it first comes into the possession of a holder.

Incomplete Instruments Occasionally, a party will sign a paper that clearly is intended to become an instrument but that, either by intention or through oversight, is incomplete because of the omission of a necessary element such as a promise or order, a designated payee, an amount payable, or a time for payment. The Code provides that such an instrument is not negotiable until completed.

If, for example, an undated instrument is delivered on November 1, 2009, payable “thirty days after date,” the payee has implied authority to fill in “November 1, 2009.” Until he does so, however, the instrument is not negotiable because it is not payable at a definite time. If the payee completes the instrument by inserting an erroneous date, the rules as to material alteration, covered in Chapter 27, apply.

Ambiguous Instruments Rather than commit the parties to the use of parol evidence to establish the interpretation of an instrument, Revised Article 3 establishes rules to resolve common ambiguities. This promotes negotiability by providing added certainty to the holder.

Where it is doubtful whether the instrument is a draft or note, the holder may treat it as either and present it for payment to the drawee or the person signing it. For example, an instrument reading

To X: On demand, I promise to pay $500 to the order of Y.

Signed, Z

may be presented for payment to X as a draft or to Z as a note.

An instrument naming no drawee but stating

On demand, pay $500 to the order of Y.

Signed, Z

although in the form of a draft, may be treated as a note and presented to Z for payment.

If a printed form of note or draft is used and the party signing it inserts handwritten or typewritten language that is inconsistent with the printed words, the handwritten words control the typewritten and the printed words, and the typewritten words control the printed words.

If the amount payable is set forth on the face of the instrument in both figures and words and the amounts differ, the words control the figures. It is presumed that the maker or drawer would be more careful with words. If the words are ambiguous, however, then the figures control.

Chapter Summary

Negotiability

Rule invests instruments with a high degree of marketability and commercial utility by conferring upon certain good faith transferees immunity from most defenses to the instrument

Formal Requirements negotiability is wholly a matter of form, and all the requirements for negotiability must be met within the “four corners” of the instrument

Types of Negotiable Instruments

Orders to Pay

- Drafts a draft involves three parties: the drawer orders the drawee to pay a fixed amount of money to the payee
- Checks a specialized form of draft that is drawn on a bank and payable on demand; the drawer orders the drawee (bank) to pay the payee on demand (upon the request of the holder)

Promises to Pay

- Notes a written promise by a maker (issuer) to pay a payee
- Certificates of Deposit a specialized form of note that is given by a bank or thrift association

Formal Requirements of Negotiable Instruments

Writing any intentional reduction to tangible form is sufficient

Signature any symbol executed or adopted by a party with the present intention to authenticate/adopt or accept a writing

Promise or Order to Pay

- Promise to Pay an undertaking to pay, which must be more than a mere acknowledgment or recognition of an existing debt
- Order to Pay instruction to pay

Unconditional an absolute promise to pay that is not subject to any contingencies

- Reference to Other Agreements does not destroy negotiability unless the recital makes the instrument subject to or governed by the terms of another agreement
- The Particular Fund Doctrine an order or promise to pay only out of a particular fund is no longer conditional and does not destroy negotiability

Fixed Amount the holder must be assured of a determinable minimum principal payment, although provisions in the instrument may increase the amount of recovery under certain circumstances

Money medium of exchange currently authorized or adopted by a domestic or foreign government

No Other Undertaking or Instruction a promise or order to do an act in addition to the payment of money destroys negotiability

Payable on Demand or at a Definite Time an instrument is demand paper if it must be paid upon request: an instrument is time paper if it is payable at a definite time

Payable to Order or to Bearer a negotiable instrument must contain words indicating that the maker or drawer intends that it pass into the hands of someone other than the payee

- Payable to Order payable to the “order of” (or other words that mean the same) a named person or anyone designated by that person
- Payable to Bearer payable to the holder of the instrument; includes instruments
  - (1) payable to bearer or the order of bearer,
  - (2) that do not specify a payee, or
  - (3) payable to “cash” or to order of “cash”

Case Problems

9. Broadway Management Corporation obtained a judgment against Briggs. The note on which the judgment was based reads in part: "Ninety Days after date, I, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of Three Thousand Four Hundred Ninety Eight and 45/100—Dollars." (The underlined words and symbols were typed in; the remainder was printed.) There are no blanks on the face of the instrument, any unused space having been filled in with hyphens. The note contains clauses permitting acceleration in the event the holder deems itself insecure and authorizes judgment "if this note is not paid at any stated or accelerated maturity." Explain whether the note is negotiable order paper.
10. Sandra and Thomas McGuire entered into a purchase-and-sale agreement for "Becca's Boutique" with Pascal and Rebecca Tursi. The agreement provided that the McGuires would buy the store for $75,000, with a down payment of $10,000 and the balance of $65,000 to be paid at closing on October 5, 2009. The settlement clause stated that the sale was contingent upon the McGuires obtaining a Small Business Administration loan of $65,000. On September 4, 2009, Mrs. McGuire signed a promissory note in which the McGuires promised to pay to the order of the Tursis and the Green Mountain Inn the sum of $65,000. The note specified that interest payments of $541.66 would become due and payable on the fifth days of October, November, and December 2009. The entire balance of the note, with interest, would become due and payable at the option of the holder if any installment of interest was not paid according to that schedule.

The Tursis had for several months been negotiating with Parker Perry for the purchase of the Green Mountain Inn in Stowe, Vermont. On September 7, 2009, the Tursis delivered to Perry a $65,000 promissory note payable to the order of Green Mountain Inn, Inc. This note was secured by transfer to the Green Mountain Inn of the McGuires' note to the Tursis. Subsequently, Mrs. McGuire learned that her Small Business Administration loan had been disapproved. On December 5, 2009, the Tursis defaulted on their promissory note to the Green Mountain Inn. On June 11, 2010, PP, Inc., formerly Green Mountain Inn, Inc., brought an action against the McGuires to recover on the note held as security for the Tursis' promissory note. Discuss whether the instrument is negotiable.

11. On September 2, 2006, Levine executed a mortgage bond under which she promised to pay the Mykoffs a preexisting obligation of $54,000. On October 14, 2009, the Mykoffs transferred the mortgage to Bankers Trust Co., indorsing the instrument with the words "Pay to the Order of Bankers Trust Company Without Recourse." The Lincoln First Bank, N.A., brought this action asserting that the Mykoffs' mortgage is a nonnegotiable instrument because it is not payable to order or bearer; thus it is subject to Lincoln's defense that the mortgage was not supported by consideration because an antecedent debt is not consideration. Is the instrument payable to order or bearer? Discuss.

- 12. Horne executed a $100,000 note in favor of R. C. Clark. On the back of the instrument was a restriction stating that the note could not be transferred, pledged, or otherwise assigned without Horne's written consent. As part of the same transaction between Horne and Clark, Horne gave Clark a separate letter authorizing Clark to pledge the note as collateral for a loan of $50,000 that Clark intended to secure from First State Bank. Clark did secure the loan and pledged the note, which was accompanied by Horne's letter authorizing Clark to use the note as collateral. First State contacted Horne and verified the agreement between Horne and Clark as to using the note as collateral. Clark defaulted on the loan. When First Bank later attempted to collect on the note, Horne refused to pay, arguing that the note was not negotiable as it could not be transferred without obtaining Horne's written consent. This suit was instituted. Is the instrument negotiable? Explain.
- 13. Holly Hill Acres, Ltd., executed and delivered a promissory note and a purchase money mortgage to Rogers and Blythe. The note provided that it was secured by a mortgage on certain real estate and that the terms of that mortgage "are by this reference made a part hereof." Rogers and Blythe then assigned the note to Charter Bank, and the bank sought to foreclose on the note and mortgage. Holly Hill Acres refused to pay, claiming that it was defrauded by Rogers and Blythe. Is the note a negotiable instrument? Why?

TRANSFER

A negotiable instrument is a courier without luggage.

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Distinguish among (a) transfer, (b) negotiation, and (c) assignment.
2. Identify and explain what is necessary to become a holder of an instrument.
3. Explain the imposter rule and the fictitious payee rule.
4. Distinguish among a blank indorsement, a special indorsement, a qualified indorsement, and an unqualified indorsement.
5. Explain which types of restrictive indorsements are effective and ineffective.

The primary advantage of negotiable instruments is their ease of transferability. Nonetheless, although both negotiable instruments and nonnegotiable undertakings are transferable by assignment, only negotiable instruments can result in the transferee becoming a holder. This distinction is highly significant. If the transferee of a negotiable instrument is entitled to payment by the terms of the instrument, he is a holder of the instrument. Only holders may be holders in due course and thus may be entitled to greater rights in the instrument than the transferor may have possessed. These rights, discussed in the next chapter, are the reason why negotiable instruments move freely in the marketplace. This chapter discusses the methods by which negotiable instruments may be transferred.

Negotiation

A holder is broadly defined in Section 1–201(20) as “a person who is in possession of ... an instrument ... drawn, issued, or indorsed to him or his order or to bearer or in blank.” Revised Article 1 has a similar definition: “the person in possession of a negotiable instrument that is payable either to bearer or to an identified person that is the person in possession.” Negotiation is the transfer of possession, whether voluntary or involuntary, by a person other than the issuer of a negotiable instrument in such a manner that the transferee becomes a holder. An instrument is transferred when a person other than its issuer delivers it for the purpose of giving the recipient the right to enforce the instrument. Accordingly, to qualify as a holder a person must have possession of an instrument that runs to him. Thus, there are two ways in which a person can be a holder: (1) the instrument has been issued to that person, or (2) the instrument has been transferred to that person by negotiation.

The transfer of a nonnegotiable promise or order operates as an assignment, as does the transfer of a negotiable instrument by a means that does not render the transferee a holder. As discussed in Chapter 16, an assignment is the voluntary transfer to a third party of the rights arising from a contract.

Whether a transfer is by assignment or by negotiation, the transferee acquires the rights the transferor had. The transfer need not be for value: if the instrument is transferred as a gift, the donee acquires all the rights of the donor. If the transferor was a holder in due course, the transferee acquires the rights of a holder in due course, which rights he in turn may transfer. This rule, sometimes referred to as the shelter rule, existed at common law and still exists under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). The shelter rule is discussed more fully in Chapter 26.

The requirements for negotiation depend on whether the instrument is bearer paper or order paper.

NEGOTIATION OF BEARER PAPER

If an instrument is payable to bearer, it may be negotiated by transfer of possession alone. Because bearer paper (an instrument payable to bearer) runs to whoever is in possession of it, a finder or a thief of bearer paper would be a holder even though he did not receive possession by voluntary transfer. For example, P loses an instrument payable to bearer that I had issued to her. F finds it and sells and delivers it to B, who thus receives it by negotiation and is a holder. F also qualified as a holder because he was in possession of bearer paper. As a holder, F had the power to negotiate the instrument, and B, the transferee, may be a holder in due course if he meets the Code’s requirements for such a holder (discussed in Chapter 26). See Figure 25-1 for an illustration of this example. Because a bearer instrument is transferred by mere possession, it is comparable to cash.

NEGOTIATION OF ORDER PAPER

If the instrument is order paper (an instrument payable to order), both (1) transfer of its possession and (2) its indorsement (signature) by the appropriate parties are necessary for the transferee to become a holder. Figure 25-2 compares the negotiation of bearer and order paper.

Any transfer for value of an instrument not payable to bearer gives the transferee the specifically enforceable right to have the unqualified indorsement of the transferor, unless the parties agree otherwise. The parties may agree that the transfer is to be an assignment rather than a negotiation, in which case no indorsement is required. Absent

Negotiation of Bearer and Order Paper

such agreement, the courts presume that negotiation was intended where value is given. When a transfer is not for value, the transaction is normally noncommercial; thus, the courts do not presume the intent to negotiate.

Until the necessary indorsement has been supplied, the transferee has nothing more than the contract rights of an assignee. Negotiation takes effect only when a proper indorsement is made, at which time the transferee becomes a holder of the instrument.

If a customer deposits a check or other instrument for collection without properly indorsing the item, the depository bank becomes a holder when it accepts the item for deposit if the depositor is a holder. It no longer needs to supply the customer's indorsement.

THE HYATT CORPORATION V. PALM BEACH NATIONAL BANK

COURT OF APPEAL OF FLORIDA, THIRD DISTRICT, 2003

FACTS Hyatt Corporation hired Skyscraper Building Maintenance to perform maintenance work for Hyatt hotels in South Florida. Skyscraper entered into a loan agreement with J&D Financial Corp. under which Hyatt was to make checks payable for maintenance services to Skyscraper and J&D. Of the many checks issued by Hyatt to J&D and Skyscraper, two were cashed by the Palm Beach National Bank but indorsed only by Skyscraper. They were made payable as follows:

1. Check No. 1-78671 for $22,531 payable to:
J&D Financial Corp.
Skyscraper Building Maint
P.O. Box 610250
North Miami, Florida 33261-0250
2. Check No. 1-75723 for $21,107 payable to:
Skyscraper Building Maint
J&D Financial Corp.
North Miami, Florida 33261-0250

J&D filed a complaint against Skyscraper, Hyatt, and the bank. J&D sought damages against Skyscraper under the loan agreement and against Hyatt and the bank for improper negotiation of the two checks. The bank, Hyatt, and J&D all moved for summary judgment on the issue of whether the bank properly negotiated the checks. It is uncontested that the bank had a duty to negotiate the checks only on proper indorsement, and if it did not, it is liable.

The bank argued that the checks were payable to J&D and Skyscraper alternatively, and thus the bank could properly negotiate the checks based upon the indorsement of either of the two payees. The bank further argued that the checks were drafted ambiguously as to whether they were payable alternatively or jointly, and thus the checks would be construed as a matter of law to be payable alternatively.

Hyatt's position was that the checks were not ambiguous, were payable jointly and not alternatively, and thus the checks could only be negotiated by indorsement of both of the payees. J&D similarly argued that the checks were payable jointly. The trial court granted summary judgment for the bank. Hyatt and J&D appealed.

DECISION The trial court's summary judgment is affirmed.

OPINION Levy, J. The issue on appeal is whether or not a check payable to J&D Financial Corporation Skyscraper Building Maintenance (stacked payees) is payable jointly to both payees requiring the indorsement of both, or whether it is ambiguous regarding whether the check was drafted payable alternatively, so that the bank could negotiate the check when it was indorsed by only one of the two payees.

In 1990, Article 3 of the UCC was revised *** Revised UCC Section 3-110(d) *** states, "If an instrument payable to two or more persons is ambiguous as to whether it is payable to the persons alternatively, the instrument is payable to the persons alternatively." ***

Turning to our jurisdiction, Florida has adopted the statutory revision to UCC 3-110 ***

While it does appear that former [Article 3] would have required the checks in this case to be payable to and negotiable only by all of the payees listed, this is no longer the case ... [Citation]. Under these facts, the court found that the check was unambiguous.

We conclude that based on the 1990 amendment to the Uniform Commercial Code, when a check lists two payees without the use of the word "and" or "or", the nature of the payee is ambiguous as to whether they are alternative payees or joint payees. Therefore, the UCC amendment prevails and they are to be treated as alternative payees, thus requiring only one of the payees' signatures.

Consequently, the bank could negotiate the check when it was indorsed by only one of the two payees, thereby escaping liability.

INTERPRETATION The listing of multiple payees on a check renders the check ambiguous as to whether alternate or joint payees were intended by the drawer and thus the payees are treated as alternative payees requiring indorsement by only one payee.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the bank or Skyscraper act inappropriately? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION How would you decide this case? Explain.

The Impostor Rule Negotiation of an order instrument requires a valid indorsement by the person to whose order the instrument is payable. The impostor rule governing unauthorized signatures is an exception to this general rule. Usually, the impostor rule comes into play in situations involving a confidence man who impersonates a respected citizen and who deceives a third party into delivering a negotiable instrument to the impostor in the name of the respected citizen. For instance, John Doe, falsely representing himself as Richard Roe, a prominent citizen, induces Ray Davis to loan him $10,000. Davis draws a check payable to the order of Richard Roe and delivers it to Doe, who then forges Roe's name to the check and presents it to the drawee for payment. The drawee pays it. Subsequently, Davis, the drawer, denies the drawee's right of reimbursement on the ground that the drawee did not pay in accordance with his order: Davis ordered payment to Roe or to Roe's order. Roe did not order payment to anyone; therefore, the drawee would not acquire a right of reimbursement against Davis. The general rule governing unauthorized signatures supports this argument in favor of the drawer.

Nevertheless, the indorsement of the impostor (Doe) or of any other person in the name of the named payee is effective as the indorsement of the payee if the impostor has induced the maker or drawer (Davis) to issue the instrument to him or his confederate using the name of the payee (Roe). It is as if the named payee had indorsed the instrument. The reason for this rule is that the drawer or maker is to blame for failing to detect the impersonation by the impostor. Thus, in the above example, the drawee would be able to debit the drawer's account. Moreover, Revised Article 3 expands the impostor rule by extending its coverage to include an impostor who is impersonating an agent. Thus, if an impostor impersonates Jones and induces the drawer to draw a check to the order of Jones, the impostor can negotiate the check. Moreover, under the Revision, if an impostor impersonates Jones, the president of Jones Corporation, and the check is to the order of Jones Corporation, the impostor can negotiate the check.

If the person paying the instrument fails to exercise ordinary care, the issuer may recover from the payor to the extent the payor's negligence contributed to the loss. If the issuer is also negligent, comparative negligence would apply.

The Fictitious Payee Rule The rule just discussed also applies when a person who does not intend the payee to have an interest in the instrument signs as or on behalf of a maker or drawer. In such a situation, any person's indorsement in the name of the named payee is effective if the person identified as the payee is a fictitious person. For instance, Palmer gives Albrecht, her employee, authority to write checks in order to pay Palmer's debts. Albrecht writes a check for $2,000 to Foushee, a fictitious payee, which Albrecht takes and indorses in Foushee's name to Albrecht. Albrecht cashes the check at Palmer's bank, which can debit Palmer's account because Albrecht's signature in Foushee's name is effective against Palmer. Palmer should bear the risk of her unscrupulous employees.

In a similar situation also involving a disloyal employee, a drawer's employee falsely tells the drawer that money is owed to Leon, and the drawer writes a check payable to the order of Leon and hands it to the agent for delivery to him. The agent forges Leon's name to the check and obtains payment from the drawee bank. The drawer then denies the bank's claim to reimbursement upon the grounds that the bank did not comply with her order; that the drawer had ordered payment to Leon or order; that the drawee did not make payment either to Leon or as ordered by him, inasmuch as the forgery of Leon's signature is wholly inoperative; and that the drawee paid in accordance with the scheme of the faithless agent and not in compliance with the drawer's order. Under the Code, an employer has liability on the instrument when one of its employees, who is entrusted with responsibility with respect to such an instrument, makes a fraudulent indorsement if (1) the instrument is payable to the employer and the employee forges the indorsement of the employer or (2) the instrument is issued by the employer and the employee forges the indorsement of the person identified as the payee. The example above falls under the second part of the rule just stated. Accordingly, the employee's indorsement is effective as that of the unintended payee, and the drawee bank will be able to debit the drawer's (employer's) account.

This rule also applies to a situation (the first part of the rule stated above) not involving a fictitious payee: a fraudulent indorsement made by an employee entrusted with responsibility with respect to an instrument payable to the employer. For example, an employee, whose job involves posting amounts of checks payable to her employer, steals some of the checks and forges her employer's indorsement. The indorsement is effective as the employer's indorsement because the employee's duties included processing checks for bookkeeping purposes.

This section provides, however, that the employer may recover from the drawee bank to the extent the loss resulted from the bank's failure to exercise ordinary care. If the employer is also negligent, a rule of comparative negligence applies.

Practical Advice

Make sure that the payees of all your instruments are the appropriate parties and are being paid the appropriate amount.

SHEARSON LEHMAN BROTHERS, INC. v. WASATCH BANK

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, D. UTAH, C.D., 1992

FACTS Stanley A. Erb became a vice president of the Shearson Lehman Brothers, Inc. branch office in Provo, Utah, in 1987. That year, Erb was contacted by McKay Matthews, the controller for the Orem, Utah-based WordPerfect Corporation and its sister corporation, Utah Softcopy. At Matthews's request, Erb established and managed three separate investment accounts at Shearson. The accounts were for the benefit of the WordPerfect and Utah Softcopy corporations, and one account was for the WordPerfect principals, Allen Ashton, Bruce Bastian, and Willard Peterson. In March 1987, Erb personally accepted from Matthews a check drawn by Utah Softcopy for $460,150.23 and payable to the order of "ABP Investments." At that time, there was no ABP investment account at Shearson, although the WordPerfect principals maintained accounts elsewhere in that name. Erb accepted the check, but rather than deposit it in one of the three authorized accounts, Erb opened a new account at Shearson in the name of "ABP Investments," apparently by forging the signature of Bruce Bastian on the new account documents. Over the next eleven months, Erb induced Shearson to draft thirty-seven checks on the ABP Investment account, payable to ABP Investments, by submitting falsified payment requests to Shearson's cashier. The checks were mailed to an Orem post office box unknown to WordPerfect and its principals. Erb would obtain the checks and indorse them in the name of ABP Investments. He took the checks to Wasatch Bank for deposit into his personal account. Wasatch accepted the deposits and later allowed Erb to withdraw $504,295.30, the entire amount, from the account. Shearson discovered Erb's activities after Erb had left Shearson in 1989. Shearson settled with WordPerfect and its principals and was assigned all their legal rights.

Shearson brought suit against Wasatch. Wasatch moved for summary judgment, claiming under the "fictitious payee" rule that it was not liable.

DECISION Summary judgment for Wasatch.

OPINION Anderson, J.

I. Whether Shearson's claims are barred by the "Fictitious Payee" Defense of U.C.C. 3-405(1)(c). Wasatch acknowledges that, "[a]s a general rule, 'forged indorsements are ineffective to pass title or to authorize a drawee to pay.'" [Citations.] Consequently, when a collecting bank makes payment over a forged indorsement, it is generally liable for the amount paid. [Citations.]

Under this general rule, Wasatch clearly would be liable as the party that accepted checks over forged indorsements. Wasatch attempts to avoid such liability, however, by invoking what is known as the "fictitious payee" defense. The defense is an exception to the general rule that a party accepting or paying an instrument over a forged indorsement ultimately will be liable for the loss and is set forth in section 3-405 of the Uniform Commercial Code:

The policy underlying section 3-405 is thus to place the risk of loss of forgery on the party in the best position to avoid or insure against such loss. [Citations.]

As indicated, by the language of section 3-405(1)(c), if the defense applies to the facts of a given transaction, the result is to render the forged signature effective to transfer good title as if no forgery had occurred. [Citations.] ***

For the defense to apply, an employee or agent of the drawer must "supply" the name of the payee to the drawer, and the faithless employee must intend that the payee have no interest in the instrument. Utah Code Ann. § 3–405(1)(c) (1990). Although the defense commonly has been referred to as the “fictitious payee” defense, the payee named on the check need not be a fictitious person or entity. “It is immaterial whether a person with the name of the payee actually exists or whether the name is in fact a wholly fictitious name.” [Citations.] Moreover, courts applying the defense have liberally construed the term “supply.” “An employee ‘supplies’ the name of the payee if he ‘starts the wheels of normal business procedure in motion to produce a check for a nonauthorized transaction.’” [Citations.] ***

Thus Wasatch argues that the fictitious payee defense of section 3–405(1)(c) applies to the undisputed facts of the present case. Erb, an employee of the drawer of the check, “supplied” the name of the payee within the meaning of the statute and obviously intended that the named payee have no interest in the checks. He then procured the checks and fraudulently indorsed them for deposit into his account at Wasatch. Wasatch accordingly argues that the effect of Erb’s actions was to validate the forged indorsements and to allow good title to pass to Wasatch thereby extinguishing Wasatch’s liability for the transaction.

II. Conclusion. The “fictitious payee” defense as articulated in section 3–405(1)(c) of the Uniform Commercial Code operates under the facts of the present case to shield the collecting bank, Wasatch, from liability resulting from Erb’s misconduct while in Shearson’s employ. Erb deliberately induced the issuance of checks by Shearson. The payee named on those checks was never intended by Erb to take an interest in the checks. In such circumstances the mandate of the Code is clear—the drawer shall bear the loss resulting from the misdeeds of its employee. Wasatch’s conduct in the relevant transactions raises serious questions about whether the bank discharged its duty to act in a commercially reasonable manner. Nevertheless, no fact has been alleged which would support the inference that Wasatch acted in bad faith so as to preclude the operation of the fictitious payee defense.

INTERPRETATION An indorsement by any person in the name of the named payee is effective if an agent of the drawer supplied the name of the payee and intended the payee to have no interest in the instrument.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the “fictitious payee” rule? When would you apply it? Explain.

NEGOTIATIONS SUBJECT TO RESCISSION

A negotiation conforming to the requirements discussed above is effective to transfer the instrument even if it is

1. made by an infant, a corporation exceeding its powers, or a person without capacity; or
2. obtained by fraud, duress, or mistake; or
3. made in breach of a duty or as part of an illegal transaction.

Thus, a negotiation is valid even though the transaction in which it occurs is voidable or even void. In all of these instances, the transferor loses all rights in the instrument until he regains possession of it. His right to do so, determined by state law, is valid against the immediate transferee and all subsequent holders, but not against a subsequent holder in due course or a person paying the instrument in good faith and without notice.

Indorsements

An indorsement is a signature, other than that of a signer as maker, drawer, or acceptor, that alone or accompanied by other words is made on an instrument for the purpose of (i) negotiating the instrument, (ii) restricting payment of the instrument, or

(iii) incurring the indorser’s liability on the instrument, but regardless of the intent of the signer, a signature and its accompanying words is an indorsement unless the accompanying words, terms of the instrument, place of the signature, or other circumstances unambiguously indicate that the signature was made for a purpose other than indorsement.

An indorsement may be complex or simple. It may be dated and may indicate where it is made, but neither date nor place is required to be shown. The simplest type is merely the signature of the indorser. Because the indorser undertakes certain obligations, as explained later, an indorsement consisting of merely a signature may be said to be the shortest contract known to the law. A forged or otherwise unauthorized signature necessary to negotiation is inoperative and thus breaks the chain of title to the instrument.

The type of indorsement used in first negotiating an instrument affects its subsequent negotiation. Every indorsement is (1) either blank or special, (2) either restrictive or nonrestrictive, and (3) either qualified or unqualified. These categories are not mutually exclusive. Indeed, each indorsement may be placed within three of these six categories because all indorsements disclose three things: (1) the method to be employed in making subsequent negotiations (this depends upon whether the indorsement is blank or special); (2) the kind of interest that is being transferred (this depends upon whether the indorsement is restrictive or nonrestrictive); and (3) the liability of the indorser (this depends on whether the indorsement is qualified or unqualified). For instance, an indorser who merely signs her name on the back of an instrument is making a blank, nonrestrictive, unqualified indorsement.

Revised Article 3 identifies an additional type of indorsement—an anomalous indorsement. An anomalous indorsement is “an indorsement made by a person that is not the holder of the instrument.” The only effect of an anomalous indorsement is to make the signer liable on the instrument as an indorser. Such an indorsement does not affect the manner in which the instrument may be negotiated.

The effectiveness of an indorsement as well as the rights of the transferee and transferor depend on whether the indorsement meets certain formal requirements. This section will cover the different kinds of indorsements and the formal requirements of each.

Practical Advice

It is exceedingly important that you indorse your indorsements in the appropriate manner and at the appropriate time.

BLANK INDORSEMENTS

A blank indorsement, which specifies no indorsee, may consist solely of the signature of the indorser or an authorized agent. Such an indorsement converts order paper into bearer paper and leaves bearer paper as bearer paper.

Thus, an instrument indorsed in blank may be negotiated by delivery alone without further indorsement. Hence, the holder should treat it with the same care as cash. See Palmer & Ray Dental Supply of Abilene, Inc. v. First National Bank later in this chapter.

Practical Advice

Blank indorsements present a major risk and should be used judiciously.

SPECIAL INDORSEMENTS

A special indorsement specifically identifies the person to whom or to whose order the instrument is to be payable. Thus, if Peter, the payee of a note, indorses it “Pay to the order of Andrea,” or even “Pay Andrea,” the indorsement is special because it names the transferee. Words of negotiability—“pay to order or bearer”—are not required in an indorsement. Thus, an indorsement reading “Pay Edward” is interpreted as meaning “Pay to the order of Edward.” Any further negotiation of the instrument would require Edward’s indorsement.

Moreover, a holder of an instrument with a blank indorsement may protect himself by converting the blank indorsement to a special indorsement by writing over the signature of the indorser words identifying the person to whom the instrument is payable. For example, on the back of a negotiable instrument appears the blank indorsement “Sally Seller.” Harry Holder, who receives the instrument from Seller, may convert this bearer instrument into order paper by inserting above Seller’s signature “Pay Harry Holder” or other similar words.

STATE OF NEW MEXICO V. HERRERA

<http://caselaw.lp.findlaw.com/scripts/getcase.pl?court=nm&vol=01ca-004&invol=2>

FACTS Defendant Joshua Herrera testified that he found a purse in a dumpster near San Pedro and Kathryn Streets in Albuquerque. Herrera took the purse to a friend’s house. Either Herrera or his friend called the owner of the purse and the owner retrieved it. Herrera testified that after the purse was returned to the owner, he returned to the dumpster where he found a check and some other items. Herrera claimed that he did not know if the check or any of the other items belonged to the owner of the purse, as he did not remember the purse owner’s name at that time.

The check Herrera found was written out to “Cash,” and he thought this meant that he “could get money for [the] check.” Herrera explained that when he presented the check to the teller at a credit union to cash it, the teller instructed him to put his name on the payee line next to “Cash.” Herrera followed the teller’s instructions and added “to Joshua Herrera” next to the word “Cash” on the payee line of the check. Herrera also indorsed the check.

The trial court ruled that “Defendant altered a writing purporting to [have] legal efficacy with intent to [defraud], [and] those acts constitute a crime of forgery.”

Herrera argues on appeal that his acts fail to meet the elements of forgery because (1) he signed his own name and not another’s; (2) he did not alter the genuineness of the check; (3) the legislature did not intend the concept of alteration to include the addition of a genuine signature to a genuine check; and (4) he did not alter the check because he did not change the legal efficacy of the check.

DECISION The trial court’s denial of defendant’s motion to dismiss is reversed because the defendant did not alter the legal efficacy of the instrument.

OPINION Wechsler, J. Section 30-16-10(A) defines forgery as “falsely making or altering any signature to, or any part of, any writing purporting to have any legal efficacy with intent to injure or defraud.” Section 30-16-10(B) defines forgery as the transfer of a forged document. Under Section 30-16-10(A) the State must prove that the defendant made a false document, a false signature, a false indorsement or “changed a genuine [document] so that its effect was different from the original” with an intent to deceive or cheat another. [Citation.] Under Section 30-16-10(B) the State must prove that the defendant gave or delivered a document to a victim with the intent to injure, deceive or cheat the victim or another, knowing that the document (1) was a false document; (2) contained a false signature; (3) had a false indorsement; or (4) was changed so that its effect was different from the original. [Citation.]

Defendant did not make a false signature or offer a false indorsement. Thus, a plain reading of the statute and the jury instructions indicates that under the facts of this case, Defendant could only have committed forgery by changing the legal effect of the check. [Citation.]. * * * Therefore, whether Defendant changed the legal effect of the check is the dispositive question in this case. Defendant argues that the act of adding his name to the payee line next to the word “Cash” failed to alter the legal effect of the check. We look to the Uniform Commercial Code to determine whether Defendant is correct.

When a negotiable instrument is made payable to “Cash,” it is a bearer instrument. [UCC] § 3–109(a)(3). A bearer instrument refers to an instrument that is payable to anyone possessing the instrument and is negotiable by transfer alone. [UCC] § 3–109(a)(1).

In contrast, an instrument payable to an identified person is considered an order instrument. [UCC] § 3–109(b). An order instrument requires the indorsement of the identified person before it can be negotiated. [UCC] § 3–201(b). The legal effect of an order instrument is different from a bearer instrument because each type of instrument has different negotiability requirements:

Whether an instrument is an order instrument or a bearer instrument is important in determining how an instrument is negotiated. If the instrument is payable to bearer, it can be negotiated by delivery alone. If it is payable to the order of an identified person it cannot be negotiated without the indorsement of that person. [Citations.]

At the time Defendant presented the check to the credit union teller, he possessed a bearer instrument because the check was written out to “Cash.” At the direction of the teller, however, Defendant added the words “to Joshua Herrera” to the payee line after the word “Cash.” By doing so, Defendant added a specific payee to what was otherwise a bearer instrument. We analyze whether Defendant changed the legal effect of the check by adding his name on the payee line of the check.

The concepts of bearer and order are mutually exclusive. [UCC] § 3–109(b) states that “[a] promise or order that is not payable to bearer is payable to order if it is payable ... to the order of an identified person.” An instrument payable to bearer cannot be payable to order. [Citation.]

As a result, under the definitions in the Uniform Commercial Code, the check in this case could not have been both a bearer and an order instrument. Defendant could have changed the legal effect of the bearer instrument he possessed by adding his name only if the instrument ceased to have bearer effect. We believe that it did not.

In this circumstance, with the check payable “to the order of Cash to Joshua Herrera,” one who received it could reasonably be confused because it contains both bearer and order instructions. The Uniform Commercial Code resolves such confusion by making the bearer term prevail. [UCC] § 3–109 Official Cmt. 2. We do not view the conjunction “to” in this case as sufficient to avoid confusion from the conflicting terms so as to preclude application of the principles of the commentary.

Indeed, under specific circumstances, a bearer instrument can be transformed to an order instrument. [UCC] § 3–109(c) provides that when a bearer instrument is specially indorsed, it can be transformed to an order instrument. A special indorsement is one that “identifies a person to whom it makes the instrument payable.” [UCC] § 3–205(a). Defendant’s indorsement in this case included only his name and did not include language making the check payable to an identified person. [UCC] § 3–205(c). Thus, the indorsement was not a special indorsement and was not sufficient to transform the legal effect of the check from bearer to order. Instead, because Defendant’s indorsement included only his signature, the indorsement qualified as an indorsement in blank. [UCC] § 3–205(b). Section 3–205(b) states that when an instrument is indorsed in blank, “the instrument “becomes payable to bearer and may be negotiated by transfer of possession alone.” Consequently, Defendant’s indorsement did not change the legal effect of the check from a bearer instrument into an order instrument under [UCC] § 3–109.

Because Defendant did not change the legal effect of the check when he added his name to the payee line or when he indorsed it, Defendant did not commit the crime of forgery. ***

INTERPRETATION A bearer instrument is an instrument that is payable to anyone in possession of the instrument.

ETHICAL QUESTION Is it unethical for Herrera to cash a check he knows is not intended for him? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Should courts protect the writers of bearer checks from situations like this? Explain.

RESTRICTIVE INDORSEMENTS

As the term implies, a restrictive indorsement attempts to restrict the rights of the indorsee in some fashion. It limits the purpose for which the proceeds of the instrument can be applied. The Code discusses four types of indorsements as restrictive: conditional indorsements, indorsements prohibiting further transfer, indorsements for deposit or collection, and indorsements in trust. Only the last two are effective. An unrestrictive indorsement, in contrast, does not attempt to restrict the rights of the indorsee.

Indorsements for Deposit or Collection The most frequently used form of restrictive indorsement is that designed to place the instrument in the banking system for deposit or collection. Indorsements of this type, collectively referred to as “collection indorsements,” include “for collection,” “for deposit,” and “pay any bank.” Such an indorsement effectively limits further negotiation to those consistent with its limitation and binds (1) all nonbanking persons, (2) a depository bank that purchases the instrument or takes it for collection, and (3) a payor bank that is also the depository bank or that takes the instrument for immediate payment over the counter from a person other than a collecting bank. Thus, a collection indorsement binds all parties except an intermediary bank (discussed in Chapter 28) or a payor bank that is not also the depository bank. Compare the following two cases.

Practical Advice

Indorsements “for deposit only” protect you as the indorser and should be used whenever necessary.

PALMER & RAY DENTAL SUPPLY OF ABILENE, INC. v. FIRST NATIONAL BANK

COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS OF TEXAS, 1972

477 S.W.2D 954

FACTS Mrs. Wilson was employed as the office manager of Palmer & Ray Dental Supply of Abilene, Inc. Soon after an auditor discovered a discrepancy in the company’s inventory, Mrs. Wilson confessed to cashing thirty-five checks that she was supposed to deposit on behalf of the company. Palmer & Ray Dental Supply used a rubber stamp to indorse checks. The stamp listed the company’s name and address but did not read “for deposit only.” Mrs. Wilson was authorized by the company’s president, James Ray, to indorse checks with this stamp. All checks were cashed at First National Bank. Palmer & Ray Dental Supply claimed that First National converted the company’s funds by giving Mrs. Wilson cash instead of depositing the checks into the company’s bank account.

Summary judgment was granted in favor of First National, and Palmer & Ray appealed.

DECISION Judgment for First National Bank affirmed.

OPINION Walter, J. Article 3–204, Tex. Uniform Commercial Code, *** defines a blank indorsement as one that specifies no particular indorsee and may consist of a mere signature. Article 3–205 of the U.C.C. defines a restrictive indorsement to include one that uses the words “for deposit.” Section 1–201(43), U.C.C., defines an unauthorized signature or indorsement as one made without actual implied or apparent authority and includes a forgery.

The summary judgment proof establishes that each of the checks has affixed thereto the blank rubber stamp indorsement of the appellant [Palmer & Ray]. We hold that such blank indorsement constitutes an authorized indorsement. When the Bank delivered cash to Mrs. Wilson instead of depositing the proceeds from the checks to appellant's account, the Bank [acted in accordance with the blank indorsement and therefore] was not guilty of conversion. [Citation.]

INTERPRETATION A blank indorsement may be negotiated by delivery alone and does not restrict proceeds of the instrument to the depositor's account.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did First National Bank or Palmer & Ray act inappropriately? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION When should you use a blank indorsement? Explain.

STATE OF QATAR V. FIRST AMERICAN BANK OF VIRGINIA

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, E.D. VA., 1995
885 F.SUPP. 849, 27 U.C.C. REP. SERV.2D 168

FACTS From 1986 to 1992, Bassam Salous defrauded his employer, the state of Qatar, by drawing checks on Qatar's account to pay false or duplicate invoices that he himself had created. He then deposited the checks into his personal account at First American Bank of Virginia (First American). At the time they were deposited, the checks bore the forged indorsement of the named payee, followed by the stamped restriction "for deposit only." Qatar has sued First American for conversion.

DECISION Judgment for Qatar.

OPINION Ellis, J. It is now established that First American may be liable to Qatar for handling a check's proceeds in violation of a restrictive indorsement. [Citation.] Under § 3-205(c) of the pre-1993 Uniform Commercial Code ("U.C.C." or "Code") [Virginia adopted Revised Article 3 in 1993] restrictive indorsements are defined to "include the words 'for collection,' 'for deposit,' 'pay any bank,' or like terms signifying a purpose of deposit or collection." Thus, the U.C.C. makes clear that the phrase "for deposit only" is, in fact, a restrictive indorsement. But the Code does not define "for deposit only" or specify what bank conduct would be inconsistent with that restriction. Nor does Virginia decisional law provide any guidance on this issue. As a result reference to decisional law from other jurisdictions is appropriate.

Not surprisingly, most courts confronted with this issue have held that the restriction "for deposit only," without additional specification or directive, instructs depository banks to deposit the funds only into the payee's account. In addition, commentators on commercial law uniformly agree that the function of such a restriction is to ensure that the checks' proceeds be deposited into the payee's account.

This construction of "for deposit only" is commercially sensible and is adopted here. The clear purpose of the restriction is to avoid the hazards of indorsing a check in blank. Pursuant to former § 3-204(2), a check indorsed in blank "becomes payable to bearer." It is, essentially, cash. Thus, a payee who indorses her check in blank runs the risk of having the check stolen and freely negotiated before the check reaches its intended destination. To protect against this vulnerability, the payee can add the restriction "for deposit only" to the indorsement, and the depository bank is required to handle the check in a manner consistent with that restriction. § 3-206(3). And in so adding the restriction, the payee's intent plainly is to direct that the funds be deposited into her own account, not simply that the funds be deposited into some account. [Citation.] Any other construction of the phrase "for deposit only" is illogical and without commercial justification or utility. Indeed, it is virtually impossible to imagine a scenario in which a payee cared that her check be deposited, but was indifferent with respect to the particular account to which the funds would be credited.

Finally, it is worth noting that the new revisions to the negotiable instruments provisions of the U.C.C., [Revised Article 3], support the result reached here. Although these revisions are inapplicable to this case, the commentary following § 3-206 states that the new subdivision dealing with "for deposit only" and like restrictions "continues previous law." § 3-206 comment 3. Shortly thereafter, the commentary provides an example in which a check bears the words "for deposit only" above the indorsement. In those circumstances, the commentary states, the depository bank acts inconsistently with the restrictive indorsement where it deposits the check into an account other than that of the payee. Although the restriction in that example precedes the signature, whereas the restrictions on the checks at issue here follow the signature, this distinction is immaterial. The clear meaning of the restriction in both circumstances is that the funds should be placed into the payee's account.

Therefore, First American violated the restrictive indorsements in depositing into Bassam Salous' account checks made payable to others and restrictively indorsed "for deposit only." Pursuant to the holding in Qatar I, then, First American is liable to Qatar for conversion in the amount of the total face values of these checks.

INTERPRETATION A "for deposit only" restrictive indorsement effectively limits the depository bank to handle the instrument in a manner consistent with the restriction.

ETHICAL QUESTION Who should bear the risk of loss in this case? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Does the use of a "for deposit only" indorsement present any risks to the indorser or indorsee? Explain.

Indorsements in Trust Another common kind of restrictive indorsement is that in which the indorser creates a trust for the benefit of himself or others. If an instrument is indorsed "Pay Thelma in trust for Barbara," "Pay Thelma for Barbara," "Pay Thelma for account of Barbara," or "Pay Thelma as agent for Barbara," Thelma is a fiduciary, subject to liability for any breach of her obligation to Barbara. Trustees commonly and legitimately sell trust assets, and, consequently, a trustee has power to negotiate an instrument. The first taker under an indorsement to her in trust (in this case Thelma) is under a duty to pay or apply, in a manner consistent with the indorsement, all the funds she receives. Thelma's immediate transferee may safely pay Thelma for the instrument if he does not have notice of any breach of fiduciary duty. Subsequent indorsements or transferees are not bound by such indorsement unless they know that the trustee negotiated the instrument for her own benefit or otherwise in breach of her fiduciary duty.

Indorsements with Ineffective Restrictions A conditional indorsement is one by which the indorser makes the rights of the indorsee subject to the happening or nonhappening of a specified event. Suppose Marcin makes a note payable to Parker's order. Parker indorses it "Pay Rodriguez, but only if the good ship Jolly Jack arrives in Chicago harbor by November 15, 2010." If Marcin had used this language in the instrument itself, it would be nonnegotiable because her promise to pay must be unconditional to satisfy the formal requisites of negotiability. Revised Article 3 makes such indorsements ineffective by providing that an indorsement stating a condition to the right of a holder to receive payment does not affect the right of the indorsee to enforce the instrument.

An indorsement may by its express terms attempt to prohibit further transfer by stating "Pay [name] only" or language to similar effect. Such an indorsement, or any other purporting to prohibit further transfer, is designed to restrict the rights of the indorsee. To remove any doubt as to the effect of such a provision, the Code provides that no indorsement limiting payment to a particular person or otherwise prohibiting further transfer is effective. As a result, an indorsement that purports to prohibit further transfer of the instrument is given the same effect as an unrestricted indorsement.

QUALIFIED AND UNQUALIFIED INDORSEMENTS

Unqualified indorsers promise that they will pay the instrument according to its terms at the time of their indorsement to the holder or to any subsequent indorser who paid it. In short, an unqualified indorser guarantees payment of the instrument if certain conditions are met.

An indorser may disclaim liability on the contract of indorsement, but only if the indorsement so declares and the disclaimer is written on the instrument. The customary manner of disclaiming an indorser's liability is to add the words without recourse, either before or after her signature. A "without recourse" indorsement, called a qualified indorsement, does not, however, eliminate all of an indorser's liability. As discussed in Chapter 27, a qualified indorsement disclaims contract liability but does not entirely remove the warranty liability of the indorser. A qualified indorsement and delivery is a negotiation and transfers legal title to the indorsee, but the indorser does not guarantee payment of the instrument. Furthermore, a qualified indorsement does not destroy negotiability or prevent further negotiation of the instrument. For example, assume that an attorney receives a check payable to her order in payment of a client's claim. She may indorse the check to the client without recourse, thereby disclaiming liability as a guarantor of payment of the check. The qualified indorsement plus delivery would transfer title to the client.

Placement of Indorsement

Indorsement must be in black or blue ink and must be within 1½ inches from the trailing edge so as not to interfere with indorsements from the bank.

FORMAL REQUIREMENTS OF INDORSEMENTS

Place of Indorsement An indorsement must be written on the instrument or on a paper, called an allonge, affixed to the instrument. An allonge may be used even if the instrument contains sufficient space for the indorsement.

Customarily, indorsements are made on the back or reverse side of the instrument, starting at the top and continuing down. Under Federal Reserve Board guidelines, indorsements of checks must be in ink of an appropriate color, such as blue or black, and must be made within one-and-one-half inches of the trailing (left) edge of the back of the check. The remaining space is reserved for bank indorsements. (See Figure 25-3 for the proper placement of indorsements.) Nevertheless, failure to comply with the guidelines does not destroy negotiability, and there are no penalties for violating the standard.

APPLYING THE LAW

Transfer of Negotiable Instruments

Facts On the evening of September 28, the last Friday of the month, Erica Dietz realized she had not yet made arrangements to deliver her October 1 rent payment to her landlord, Dr. Norman Toth. Though Erica's weekly after-tax earnings were $150 more than her $600 monthly rent, it was too late in the day to deposit her check and she knew she only had $212 in her checking account. Therefore, Erica indorsed her paycheck as follows: "Pay ONLY to Norman Toth, [signed] Erica Dietz" and placed it in the mail with a note asking Dr. Toth to apply the excess payment toward November's rent.

Dr. Toth's mail was stolen from his mailbox. The thief, Crawford, signed the words "Norman Toth" below Erica's indorsement on her paycheck, and deposited it in Crawford's personal bank account at Farmers' Bank, along with several thousands of dollars worth of other checks he had stolen.

Issue Is Farmer's Bank a holder of Erica's paycheck?

Rules of Law A holder is a possessor of a negotiable instrument with all necessary indorsements. An indorsement is the signature—of a payee, drawee, accommodation party, or holder—on an instrument. There are several classifications of indorsement: blank or special, restrictive or nonrestrictive, and qualified or unqualified. Special indorsements have two effects. First, they identify the person to whom or to whose order the instrument is thereafter payable, and second, they make the instrument order paper if it is not already. Hence negotiation of specially indorsed instruments requires delivery and the further indorsement of the named person.

Indorsements that purport to limit payment to a particular person or that prohibit further negotiation are ineffective in that regard. Instead they have the same effect as unrestricted indorsements. Forged indorsements are anomalous (made by a person who is not the holder of the instrument) and are effective only to make the forger liable on the instrument as an indorser. Forged indorsements break the chain of title to a negotiable instrument and so are not effective to negotiate it.

Application In effect, Erica's indorsement of her paycheck is a special, nonrestrictive, unqualified indorsement. By adding the words "Pay ONLY to Norman Toth" above her signature, she has simply identified Dr. Toth as the person to be paid and effectively renewed the check's status as order paper; any further negotiation of the check would require Dr. Toth's signature on it. However, Erica's attempt to restrict payment to Dr. Toth "ONLY" does not prevent further negotiation. If Dr. Toth had received the check, he could have negotiated the check simply by indorsing it and delivering it to another. But this is not what happened here.

Crawford's indorsement of Dr. Toth's name is a forgery, which operates not as Dr. Toth's signature but as Crawford's signature. Its only effect is to make Crawford liable on the instrument as an indorser. To effectively negotiate order paper, both indorsement and delivery are required. Crawford has delivered the instrument to Farmers' Bank. But Crawford's unauthorized indorsement on the stolen check breaks the chain of title and does not result in an effective negotiation to Farmer's Bank. Therefore, Crawford's transfer of the check to the Bank does not amount to a negotiation.

Conclusion Since a person in possession of a negotiable instrument can qualify as a holder only if the instrument has all necessary indorsements, and Dr. Toth has not indorsed the check Erica specially indorsed to him, Farmers' Bank cannot qualify as a holder of Erica's paycheck.

Occasionally, however, a signature may appear on an instrument in such a way that it is impossible to tell with certainty the nature of the liability the signer intended to undertake. In such an event, the Code specifies that the signer is to be treated as an indorser. In keeping with the rule that a transferee must be able to determine her rights from the face of the instrument, the person who signed in an ambiguous capacity may not introduce parol evidence to establish that she intended to be something other than an indorser.

Incorrect or Misspelled Indorsements If an instrument is payable to a payee or indorsee under a misspelled name or a name different from that of the holder, the holder may require the indorsement in the name stated or in the holder's correct name or both. Nevertheless, the person paying or taking the instrument for value may require the indorser to sign both names.

Questions

1. Roy Rand executed and delivered the following note to Sue Sims: “Chicago, Illinois, June 1, 2010; I promise to pay to Sue Sims or bearer, on or before July 1, 2010, the sum of $7,000. This note is given in consideration of Sims’s transferring to the undersigned title to her 2002 Buick automobile. (signed) Roy Rand.” Rand and Sims agreed that delivery of the car be deferred to July 1, 2010. On June 15, Sims sold and delivered the note, without indorsement, to Karl Kaye for $6,200. What rights, if any, has Kaye acquired?
2. Lavinia Lane received a check from Wilmore Enterprises, Inc., drawn on the Citizens Bank of Erehwon, in the sum of $10,000. Mrs. Lane indorsed the check “Mrs. Lavinia Lane for deposit only, Account of Lavinia Lane” and placed it in a “Bank by Mail” envelope addressed to the First National Bank of Emanon, where she maintained a checking account. She then placed the envelope over a tier of mailboxes in her apartment building along with other letters to be picked up by the postman the next day.
Flora Fain stole the check, went to the Bank of Omaha, where Mrs. Lane was unknown, represented herself to be Lavinia Lane, and cashed the check. Has Bank of Omaha taken the check by negotiation? Why or why not?
3. What types of indorsements are the following:
  - a. “Pay to Monsein without recourse.”
  - b. “Pay to Allinore for collection.”
  - c. “I hereby assign all my rights, title, and interest in this note to Fullilove in full.”
  - d. “Pay to the Southern Trust Company.”
  - e. “Pay to the order of the Farmers Bank of Nicholasville for deposit only.”
 Indicate whether the indorsement is (1) blank or special, (2) restrictive or nonrestrictive, and (3) qualified or unqualified.
4. Explain whether each of the following transactions results in a valid negotiation:
  - a. Arnold gives a negotiable check payable to bearer to Betsy without indorsing it.
  - b. Golden indorses a negotiable promissory note payable to the order of Golden, “Pay to Chambers and Rambis, (signed) Golden.”
  - c. Porter lost a negotiable check payable to his order. Kersey found it and indorsed the back of the check as follows: “Pay to Drexler, (signed) Kersey.”
  - d. Thomas indorsed a negotiable promissory note payable to the order of Thomas, “(signed) Thomas,” and delivered it to Sally. Sally then wrote above Thomas’s signature, “Pay to Sally.”
5. Alpha issues a negotiable check to Beta payable to the order of Beta in payment of an obligation Alpha owed Beta. Beta delivers the check to Gamma without indorsing it in exchange for one hundred shares of General Motors stock owned by Gamma. How has Beta transferred the check? What rights, if any, does Gamma have against Beta?
6. Margarita executed and delivered to Poncho a negotiable promissory note payable to the order of Poncho as payment for one hundred bushels of wheat Poncho had sold to Margarita. Poncho indorsed the note “Pay to Randy only, (signed) Poncho” and sold it to Randy. Randy then sold the note to Stephanie after indorsing it “Pay to Stephanie, (signed) Randy.” What rights, if any, does Stephanie acquire in the instrument?
7. Simon Sharpe executed and delivered to Ben Bates a negotiable promissory note payable to the order of Ben Bates for $500. Bates indorsed the note, “Pay to Carl Cady upon his satisfactorily repairing the roof of my house, (signed) Ben Bates,” and delivered it to Cady as a down payment on the contract price of the roofing job. Cady then indorsed the note and sold it to Timothy Tate for $450. What rights, if any, does Tate acquire in the promissory note?
8. Debbie Dean issued a check to Betty Brown payable to the order of Cathy Cain and Betty Brown. Betty indorsed the check, “Payable to Elizabeth East, (signed) Betty Brown.” What rights, if any, does Elizabeth acquire in the check?

Case Problems

9. Triplett attempted to arrange a $2,850,000 loan through Meyer Rabin and his Consumer’s Investment Company (CIC). CIC issued a commitment letter conditioned on the payment of a $14,250 commitment fee and the personal guarantee of C. D. Wyche. Triplett sought an additional loan from E. S. Tubin to cover the commitment fee. Tubin agreed to provide the $14,250 if the money would be “safe” pending the closing of the $2,850,000 loan and if he would receive $4,500 for the use of his money. Triplett agreed, and Tubin purchased a $14,250 cashier’s check payable to Melvin Rueckhaus, his attorney. Rueckhaus typed the following indorsement on the back of the check: “PAY TO

Rabin presented the check to Fair Park National Bank for immediate credit to CIC’s account. Not knowing that Rabin had forged Wyche’s signature, the bank complied, and Rabin subsequently depleted CIC’s account. The loan was never closed, and the $14,250 was never returned to Tubin. Is Fair Park National Bank liable to Tubin? Discuss.

10. The drawer, Commercial Credit Corporation (Corporation), issued two checks payable to Rauch Motor Company. Rauch indorsed the checks in blank, deposited them to its account in University National Bank, and received a corresponding amount of money. The Bank stamped “pay any bank” on the checks and initiated collection. However, the checks were dishonored and returned to the Bank with the notation “payment stopped.” Rauch, through subsequent deposits, repaid the bank. Later, to compromise a lawsuit, the Bank executed a special two-page indorsement of the two checks to Lamson. Lamson then sued the Corporation for the face value of the checks, plus interest. The Corporation contends that Lamson was not a holder of the checks because the indorsement was not in conformity with the Uniform Commercial Code in that it was stapled to the checks. Is Lamson a holder? Why?
11. Edmund Jezemski, estranged and living apart from his wife, Paula, was administrator and sole heir-at-law of his deceased mother’s estate, one asset of which was real estate in Philadelphia. Without Edmund’s knowledge or consent, and with the assistance of John M. McAllister, an attorney, and Anthony DiBenedetto, a real estate broker, Paula arranged for a mortgage on the property through Philadelphia Title Insurance Company. Shortly before settlement, Paula represented to McAllister and DiBenedetto that her husband would be unable to attend the closing on the mortgage. She appeared at McAllister’s office in advance of the closing accompanied by a man whom she introduced to McAllister and DiBenedetto as her husband. She and this man, in the presence of McAllister and DiBenedetto, executed a deed conveying the property from the estate to her husband and herself as tenants by the entireties and also executed the mortgage. McAllister and DiBenedetto were witnesses. Thereafter, McAllister, DiBenedetto, and Paula met at the office of the Title Company on the closing date, produced the signed deed and mortgage, and Paula obtained from Title Company its check for the mortgage loan proceeds of $15,640.82, payable to the order of Edmund Jezemski and Paula Jezemski individually and to Edmund as administrator.

Paula cashed the check, bearing the purported indorsements of all the payees, at Penns Grove National Bank and Trust Company. Edmund received none of the proceeds, either individually or as administrator. His purported indorsements were forgeries. In the collection process, the check was presented to and paid by the drawee bank, Fidelity-Philadelphia Trust Company, and charged against the drawer Title Company’s account. Upon discovery of the existence of the mortgage, Edmund brought an action that resulted in the setting aside of the deed and mortgage and the repayment of the amount advanced by the mortgagee. Title Company then sued the drawee bank (Fidelity) to recover the amount of the check, $15,640.82. Is the indorsement effective? Explain.

12. Cole was supervisor of the shipping department of Machine Mfg., Inc. In February, Cole found herself in need of funds and, at the end of that month, submitted to Ames, the treasurer of the corporation, a payroll listing that showed as an employee, among others, “Benita Day,” to whom was allegedly owed $800 for services rendered during February. Actually, there was no employee named Day. Relying upon the word of Cole, Ames drew and delivered to her a series of corporate payroll checks, drawn upon the corporate account in the Capital Bank, one of which was made payable to the order of “Benita Day” for $800. Cole took the check, indorsed on its back “Benita Day,” cashed it at the Capital Bank, and pocketed the proceeds. She repeated the same procedure at the end of March, April, and May. In mid-June, Machine Mfg., Inc., learned of Cole’s fraudulent conduct, fired her, and brought an appropriate action against Capital Bank, seeking a judgment for $3,200. Is Cole’s signature effective against Machine Mfg., Inc.? Explain.
13. While assistant treasurer of Travco Corporation, Frank Mitchell caused two checks, each payable to a fictitious company, to be drawn on Travco’s account with Brown City Savings Bank. In each case, Mitchell indorsed the check in his own name and then cashed it at Citizens Federal Savings & Loan Association of Port Huron. Both checks were cleared through normal banking channels and charged against Travco’s account with Brown City. Travco subsequently discovered the embezzlement, and after its demand for reimbursement was denied, it brought this suit against Citizens. Is the indorsement effective? Explain.
14. Arthur and Lucy Casarez contracted with Blas Garcia, who purported to be a representative of the Albuquerque Fence Company, for the construction of a new home. Blas introduced the Casarezes to Cecil Garcia, who agreed to make a loan to them to be used as a down payment on the project. Cecil then obtained a loan from Rio Grande Valley Bank in the form of a $25,000 cashier’s check payable to himself, which he indorsed over to Lucy Casarez. Lucy indorsed the check with the words “Pay to the order of Albuquerque Fence Company, Lucy N. Casarez” and delivered it to Blas Garcia. Claiming he was following Cecil’s instructions, Blas indorsed the check with the words “Alb. Fence Co.” and gave the check to Cecil. Cecil signed his own name under “Alb. Fence Co.” and presented the check to the bank in exchange for $25,000. The Casarezes soon learned that Blas and Cecil Garcia had never been in any way affiliated with or employed by the Albuquerque Fence Company. Explain whether the unauthorized signatures of Blas and Cecil Garcia invalidate the special indorsement to Albuquerque Fence Company.

15. J.R. Simplot, Inc. (d/b/a Simplot Soilbuilders) held a security interest in Richard L. Knight's 2009 crops. To protect this security interest, Simplot sent a "SECURITY INTEREST NOTICE" to all potential purchasers of Knight's crops. This notice informed the buyers of Simplot's security interest and requested: "If you purchase or are involved in the sale of these farm products, please include Simplot Soilbuilders on all drafts issued to [Knight]." In 2009 Knight sold crops to George DeRuyter & Sons Dairy, which paid for the crops with a check in the amount of $32,916.79. George DeRuyter & Sons Dairy made the check payable to the order of "Rick Knight-Simplot Soil Builders." Knight indorsed his name, forged the indorsement of Simplot Soilbuilders, and deposited the check into his account at Yakima Federal. Knight also sold crops to Connell Grain Growers in 2009. Connell Grain Growers paid for the crops with two checks, one in the amount of $22,494.73 and the other in the amount of $2,573.99. Connell Grain Growers made both checks payable to the order of "Rick Knight-Simplot Soil Builders." Knight indorsed his name, forged the indorsement of Simplot Soilbuilders, and deposited both checks into his account at Yakima Federal.

Simplot Soilbuilders, George DeRuyter & Sons Dairy, and Connell Grain Growers did not maintain accounts at Yakima Federal, and the bank did not have a signature card for any of these businesses. Explain whether the instrument was properly indorsed.

Chapter 26

HOLDER IN DUE COURSE

One might properly ask who gave the FTC [Federal Trade Commission] authority to help tear down one of the pillars of commercial law [the HDC doctrine in consumer credit transactions]. It is odd that its federal dismantling occurred not through federal legislation, but through regulations of an administrative agency.

WHITE & SUMMERS, UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE (5TH EDITION), PAGE 534

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Identify and explain the requirements for becoming a holder in due course.
2. Explain the shelter rule and when a payee can have the rights of a holder in due course.
3. Identify, define, and explain the real defenses.
4. Define and explain personal defenses.
5. Explain the limitations the Federal Trade Commission imposes on the rights of a holder in due course.

The unique and most significant aspect of negotiability is the concept of the holder in due course. While a mere holder acquires a negotiable instrument subject to all claims and defenses to it, a holder in due course, except in consumer credit transactions, takes the instrument free of all claims of other parties and free of all defenses to the instrument except for a very limited number. The law has conferred this preferred position upon the holder in due course in order to encourage the free transferability of negotiable instruments by minimizing the risks assumed by an innocent purchaser of the instrument. The transferee of a negotiable instrument wants payment for it; he does not want to be subject to any dispute between the obligor and the obligee (generally the original payee). This chapter discusses the requirements of becoming a holder in due course and the benefits conferred upon a holder in due course.

Requirements of a Holder in Due Course

To acquire the preferential rights of a holder in due course, a person either must meet the requirements of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) or must “inherit” these rights under the shelter rule (discussed later in this chapter). To satisfy the requirements of the Code, a transferee must

1. be a holder of a negotiable instrument;
2. take it for value;
3. take it in good faith; and
4. take it without notice
  - a. that it is overdue or has been dishonored, or
  - b. that the instrument contains an unauthorized signature or an alteration, or

Transferees

- c. that any person has any defense against or claim to it; and
- 5. take it without reason to question its authenticity due to apparent evidence of forgery, alteration, incompleteness, or other irregularity.

Figure 26-1 illustrates the various requirements of becoming a holder in due course and the consequence of meeting or not meeting these requirements.

HOLDER

To become a holder in due course, the transferee must first be a holder. A holder, as discussed in Chapter 25, is a person who is in possession of a negotiable instrument that is “payable to bearer or, in the case of an instrument payable to an identified person, if the identified person is in possession.” Revised Article 1 has a similar definition: “the person in possession of a negotiable instrument that is payable either to bearer or to an identified person that is the person in possession.” In other words, a holder is a person who has both possession of an instrument and all indorsements necessary to it. Whether the holder is the owner of the instrument or not, he may transfer it, negotiate it, enforce payment of it (subject to valid claims and defenses), or, with certain exceptions, discharge it.

The following factual situation, illustrated in Figure 26-2, defines the significance of being a holder. Poe indorsed her paycheck in blank and cashed it at a hardware store where she was a well-known customer. Shortly thereafter, a burglar stole the check from the hardware store. The owner of the hardware store immediately notified Poe’s employer,

Stolen Bearer Paper

Grocer is a holder in due course because he

- (1) Was a holder of a negotiable instrument,
- (2) Gave value,
- (3) Took in good faith,
- (4) Took without notice, and
- (5) Took without reason to question its authenticity.

who gave the drawee bank a stop payment order (an order not to pay the instrument). The burglar indorsed the check in a false name and transferred it to a grocer who took it in good faith and for value. The check was dishonored (not paid) when presented to the drawee bank. The paycheck became bearer paper when Poe indorsed it in blank. It retained this character in the hands of the owner of the hardware store, in the hands of the burglar, and in the hands of the grocer, who became a holder in due course even though he had received it from a thief who had indorsed it with a false name. Because an indorsement is not necessary to the negotiation of bearer paper, the fact that the indorsement was forged was immaterial. The thief was a “holder” of the check and could negotiate an instrument “whether or not he is the owner.” Accordingly, one who, like the grocer, takes from a holder for value, in good faith, without notice, and without reason to question its authenticity, becomes a holder in due course. Furthermore, in the absence of a real defense, discussed later in this chapter, the grocer would be entitled to payment from the drawer.

This rule does not apply to a stolen order instrument. In the above example, assume that the thief had stolen the paycheck from Poe prior to indorsement. The thief then forged Poe’s signature and transferred the check to the grocer, who again took it in good faith, for value, without notice, and without reason to question its authenticity. Negotiation of an order instrument requires a valid indorsement by the person to whose order the instrument is payable, in this case Poe. A forged indorsement is not valid. Consequently, the grocer had not taken the instrument with all necessary indorsements, and, therefore, he could not be a holder or a holder in due course. The grocer’s only recourse would be to collect the amount of the check from the thief. Figure 26-3 illustrates this example.

In addition, certain other persons are entitled to enforce an instrument even though the person is not the owner of the instrument or is in wrongful possession of the instrument. These other persons entitled to enforce an instrument include a nonholder in possession of the instrument who has the rights of a holder, and a person not in possession of the instrument who is entitled to enforce the instrument pursuant to special situations, such as when the instrument has been lost, destroyed, or stolen or when the instrument has been paid or accepted by mistake and the payor or acceptor has recovered the money or revoked acceptance.

TURMAN V. WARD'S HOME IMPROVEMENT, INC.

26 U.C.C. REP. SERV.2D 175

FACTS On February 23, 1993, Turman executed a deed of trust note for $107,500 payable to Ward's Home Improvement, Inc. (Ward's). The note was in consideration of a contract for Ward's to build a house on Turman's property. On the same day, Ward's executed an assignment of the note to Robert Pomerantz for which Pomerantz paid Ward's $95,000. Although the document uses the word "assignment," no notation or indorsement was made on the note itself. Subsequently, Ward's failed to complete the house, and to do so would require the expenditure of an additional $42,000. The commissioner in this case found that Pomerantz was a holder in due course and awarded payment to Pomerantz. Turman appealed.

DECISION Judgment reversed and remanded.

OPINION Haley, J. This matter comes before the court upon Turman's exception to the finding of the Commissioner that Pomerantz was a holder in due course immune from defenses Turman might raise against Ward.

[Revised] Code § 3-201(b) states that "**** if an instrument is payable to an identified person, negotiation requires *** its indorsement by the holder." [Citation.] An assignment is not an indorsement. [Revised] Code § 3-204(a). Accordingly such a transfer is not a negotiation. [Citations.] And the transferee is not a holder. [Citations.]

An assignment does, however, vest "**** in the transferee any right of the transferor to enforce the instrument *** (under [Revised] Code § 3-301) ****" [Revised] Code

§ 3-203(b). The transferee's rights are derivative of the transferor's. Accordingly, and pursuant to [Revised] Code § 3-305(a)(2), a maker may assert a defense "**** that would be available if the person entitled to enforce the instrument were enforcing a right to payment under a simple contract." In short, the assignee of a negotiable instrument is subject to defenses the maker can raise against the original payee/assignor. [Citation.] And such a defense is failure of consideration. [Citations.] [Revised] Code § 3-303(b). "**** If an instrument is issued for a promise of performance, the issuer has a defense to the extent performance of the promise is due and the promise has not been performed ***."

In light of the foregoing the above noted exception to the Commissioner's Report is sustained and the court holds Pomerantz is not a holder in due course and is subject to the defenses to payment of the $107,500.00 note that Turman could raise against Ward.

This cause is remanded to the Commissioner for such proceedings as he or the parties deem appropriate in consequence of the court's ruling.

INTERPRETATION A holder is a person who has both possession of an instrument and all indorsements necessary to it.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Does the UCC overemphasize formality in its requirements for transferring a negotiable instrument? Explain.

VALUE

The law requires a holder in due course to give value. An obvious case of the failure to do so is when the holder makes a gift of the instrument to a third person.

The concept of value in the law of negotiable instruments is not the same as that of consideration under the law of contracts. Value, for purposes of negotiable instruments, is defined as (1) the actual performing of the agreed promise (executory promises are excluded because they have not been performed); (2) the acquiring of a security interest or other lien in the instrument other than a judicial lien; (3) the taking of the instrument in payment of or as security for an antecedent debt; (4) the giving of a negotiable instrument; and (5) the giving of an irrevocable obligation to a third party.

Executory Promise An executory promise, though clearly valid consideration to support a contract, is not the giving of value to support the holder in due course status because such a promise has yet to be performed. A purchaser of a note or draft who has not yet given value may rescind the transaction if she learns of a defense to the instrument. A person who has given value, however, cannot do this; to recover value, she needs the protection accorded a holder in due course.

For example, Mike executes and delivers a $1,000 note payable to the order of Pat, who negotiates it to Henry, who promises to pay Pat for it a month later. During the month, Henry learns that Mike has a defense against Pat. Henry can rescind the agreement with Pat and return or tender the note back to her. Because this makes him whole, Henry has no need to cut off Mike's defense. Assume, on the other hand, that Henry has paid Pat for the note before he learns of Mike's defense. Because he may be unable to recover his money from Pat, Henry needs holder in due course protection, which permits him to recover on the instrument from Mike.

A holder therefore takes an instrument for value to the extent that the agreed promise of performance has been performed provided that performance was given prior to the holder's learning of any defense or claim to the instrument. Assume that in the previous example, Henry had agreed to pay Pat $900 for the note. If Henry had paid Pat $600, he could be a holder in due course to the extent of $666.67 (600/900 X $1,000), and if a defense were available, it would be valid against him only to the extent of the balance. When Henry paid the $300 balance to Pat, he would become a holder in due course as to the full $1,000 face value of the note, provided payment was made prior to Henry's discovery of Mike's defense. If he made the $300 payment after discovering the defense or claim, Henry would be a holder in due course only to the extent of $666.67. A holder in due course, to give value, need pay only the amount he agreed to pay, not the face amount of the instrument.

The Code provides an exception to the executory promise rule in two situations: (1) the giving of a negotiable instrument and (2) the making of an irrevocable obligation to a third party.

KORZENIK V. SUPREME RADIO, INC.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1964
347 MASS. 309, 197 N.E.2D 702

FACTS Supreme Radio, Inc., issued to Southern New England Distributing Corporation (Southern) two notes worth $1,900. The two notes and others, all of a total face value of about $15,000, were transferred to Korzenik, an attorney, by his client Southern "as a retainer for services to be performed" by Korzenik. Although Korzenik was unaware of the fact, Southern had obtained the notes by fraud. Southern retained Korzenik on October 25 in connection with certain antitrust litigation, and the notes were transferred on October 31. The value of the services Korzenik performed during that time is unclear. Korzenik brought this action against Supreme Radio to recover $1,900 on the notes.

DECISION Judgment for Supreme Radio affirmed.

OPINION Whittemore, J. Decisive of the case, as the Appellate Division held, is the correct ruling that the plaintiffs are not holders in due course under *** § 3-302; they have not shown to what extent they took for value under § 3-303. That section provides: "A holder takes the instrument for value (a) to the extent that the agreed consideration has been performed or that he acquires a security interest in or a lien on the instrument otherwise than by legal process; ***.

Under clause (a) of § 3-303 the "agreed consideration" was the performance of legal services. It is often said that a lawyer is "retained" when he is engaged to perform services, and we hold that the judge spoke of "retainer" in this sense. The phrase that the judge used, "retainer for services" shows his meaning as does the finding as to services already performed by Korzenik at the time of the assignments. Even if the retainer had been only a fee to insure the attorney's availability to perform future services [citation] there is no basis in the record for determining the value of this commitment for one week.

The [Official] Comment to § 3-303 points out that in this article "value is divorced from consideration" and that except as provided in paragraph (c) "[a]n executory promise to give value is not *** value. *** The underlying reason for policy is that when the purchaser learns of a defense *** he is not required to enforce the instrument, but is free to rescind the transaction for breach of the transferor's warranty."

§ 3-307(3), provides: "After it is shown that a defense exists a person claiming the rights of a holder in due course has the burden of establishing that he or some person under whom he claims is in all respects a holder in due course." The defense of fraud having been established, this section puts the burden on the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs have failed to show "the extent *** [to which] the agreed consideration *** [had] been performed."

INTERPRETATION A holder takes an instrument for value to the extent that the agreed consideration has been given, provided the consideration was given prior to the holder's learning of any defense or claim to the instrument.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Should executory promises be considered value for holder in due course purposes? Explain.

Security Interest When an instrument is given as security for an obligation, the lender is regarded as having given value to the extent of his security interest. For example, Pedro is the holder of a $1,000 note payable to his order, executed by Monica, and due in twelve months. Pedro uses the note as security for a $700 loan made to him by Larry. Larry has advanced $700; therefore, he has met the requirement of value to the extent of $700.

Likewise, a bank gives value when a depositor is allowed to withdraw funds against a deposited item. The provisional or temporary crediting of a depositor's account (discussed in Chapter 28) is not sufficient. If a number of checks have been deposited, and some but not all of the funds have been withdrawn, the Code traces the deposit by following the “FIFO” or “first-in, first-out” method of accounting.

Antecedent Debt Under general contract law, an antecedent debt (a preexisting obligation) is not consideration. Under the Code, however, a holder gives value when she takes an instrument in payment of or as security for an antecedent debt. Thus, Martha makes and delivers a note for $1,000 to the order of Penny, who indorses the instrument and delivers it to Howard in payment of an outstanding debt of $970 that she owes him. Howard has given value.

GOOD FAITH

Revised Article 3 defines good faith as “honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing.” Thus, Revised Article 3 adopts a definition of good faith that has both a subjective and objective component. (This is the same definition adopted by Revised Article 1.) The subjective component (“honesty in fact”) measures good faith by what the purchaser knows or believes. The objective component (“the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing”) is comparable to the definition of good faith applicable to merchants under Article 2 in that it includes the requirement of the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fairness. Buying an instrument at a discounted price does not demonstrate lack of good faith. Also see Watson Coatings, Inc. v. American Express Travel Related Services, Inc. later in this chapter.

ANY KIND CHECKS CASHED, INC. v. TALCOTT

COURT OF APPEAL OF FLORIDA, FOURTH DISTRICT, 2002
830 SO. 2D 160, 48 U.C.C. REP. SERV. 2D 800, REHEARING DENIED

FACTS In the mid-1990s, D. J. Rivera, a “financial advisor,” sold ninety-three-year-old John G. Talcott, Jr. an investment for “somewhere in the amount of $75,000.” The investment produced no returns. On December 7, 1999, Salvatore Guarino, a cohort of Rivera, established check-cashing privileges at Any Kind Checks Cashed, Inc. That day, he cashed a $450 check without incident. On January 10, 2000, Rivera telephoned Talcott and talked him into sending him a check for $10,000 made out to Guarino, which was to be used for travel expenses to obtain a return on the original $75,000 investment. Rivera received the check on January 11. On that same morning Rivera spoke to Talcott and stated that the $10,000 was more than what was needed for travel. He said that $5,700 would meet the travel costs. Talcott called his bank and stopped payment on the $10,000 check.

In spite of what Rivera told Talcott, Guarino appeared at Any Kind's Stuart, Florida, office on January 11 and presented the $10,000 check to Nancy Michael. She was a supervisor with the company with the authority to approve checks over $2,000. Guarino showed Michael his driver's license and the Federal Express envelope from Talcott in which he received the check. She asked him the purpose of the check, and he told her that he was a broker and that the maker of the check had sent it as an investment. She was unable to contact Talcott by telephone. Based on her experience, Michael believed the check was good. The Federal Express envelope was “very crucial” to her decision, because it indicated that the maker of the check had sent it to the payee trying to cash the check. After deducting the 5 percent fee, Michael cashed the check and gave Guarino $9,500.

On January 15, 2000, Rivera called Talcott and asked about the $5,700, again promising to send him a return on his investment. The same day, Talcott sent a check for $5,700. He assumed that Rivera knew that he had stopped payment on the $10,000 check. On January 17, 2000, Guarino went into the Stuart branch of the Any Kind store and presented the $5,700 check payable to him to the teller, Joanne Kochakian. He showed her the Federal Express envelope in which the check had come. Kochakian noticed that Michael had previously approved the $10,000 check. She called Michael, who was working at another location, and told her about Guarino's check. Any Kind had no written procedures that a supervisor was required to follow in deciding which checks over $2,000 to cash. Michael instructed the cashier not to cash the check until she contacted Talcott, to obtain approval. On her first attempt, Kochakian received no answer. On the second call, Talcott approved cashing the $5,700 check. There was no discussion of the $10,000 check. Any Kind cashed the second check for Guarino, and deducted a 3 percent fee.

On January 19, Rivera called Talcott to warn him that Guarino was a cheat and a thief. Talcott immediately called his bank and stopped payment on the $5,700 check. Talcott's daughter called Any Kind and told it of the stop payment on the $5,700 check.

Any Kind filed a two-count complaint against Guarino and Talcott, claiming that it was a holder in due course. Talcott's defense was that Any Kind was not a holder in due course and that his obligation on the checks was nullified because of Guarino's illegal acts.

The trial court entered final judgment in favor of Any Kind for only the $5,700 check. On the $10,000 check, the judge found for Talcott. The court held that the check-cashing store was not a holder in due course, because the procedures it followed with the $10,000 check did not comport with reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing. The court found that the circumstances surrounding the cashing of the $10,000 check were sufficient to put Any Kind on notice of potential defenses.

DECISION Judgment of the trial court affirmed.

OPINION Gross, J. Using the terminology of the Uniform Commercial Code, Talcott was the maker or "drawer" of the check, the person who signed the draft "as a person ordering payment." [UCC §3-103(3)(a)] By Federal Expressing the check to Guarino, Talcott issued the check to him. See [UCC §3-105(a)] (defining "issue" as "the first delivery of an instrument by the maker or drawer ... for the purpose of giving rights on the instrument to any person"). Guarino indorsed the check and cashed it with Any Kind. See [UCC § 3-204 (a)] (defining "indorsement"). Any Kind immediately made the funds available to Guarino, less its fee. Talcott stopped payment on the check with his bank, so the check was returned to Any Kind. See [UCC § 4.403(a)] (regarding a customer's right to stop payment).

When Guarino negotiated the check with Any Kind, it became a holder of the check, making it a "person entitled to enforce" the instrument. See [UCC §§ 3.201 (a), .203 (b), .301 (a)]. As the drawer of the check dishonored by his bank, Talcott's obligation was to pay the draft to a person entitled to enforce the draft "according to its terms at the time it was issued...." [UCC § 3.414(a)].

Unless Any Kind is a holder in due course, its right to enforce Talcott's obligation to pay the draft is subject to (1) all defenses Talcott could raise "if the person entitled to enforce the instrument were enforcing a right to payment under a simple contract," and (2) a claim of "recoupment" Talcott could raise against Guarino. [UCC § 3.305 (a) & (b)]. Because Talcott was fraudulently induced to issue the checks, this case turns on Any Kind's entitlement to holder in due course status.

The good faith requirement of the holder in due course doctrine "has been the source of an ancient and continuing dispute." [Citation]. On the one hand, should the courts apply a so-called objective test, and ask whether a reasonably prudent person, behaving the way the alleged holder in due course behaved, would have been acting in good faith? Or should the courts instead apply a subjective test and examine the person's actual behavior, however stupid and irrespective of the reaction a reasonably prudent person would have had in the same circumstance? The legal establishment has steered a crooked course through this debate. [Citations.]

Application of [old UCC's] "honesty in fact" standard to Any Kind's conduct in this case would clothe it with holder in due course status. It is undisputed that Any Kind's employees were pure of heart, that they acted without knowledge of Guarino's wrongdoing.

However, in 1992, the legislature adopted a new definition of "good faith" that applies to the [UCC] section 3.302 definition of a holder in due course: "good faith" means honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing." [Citation.] To the old, subjective good faith, "honesty in fact" standard, the legislature added an objective component—the "pure heart of the holder must now be accompanied by reasoning that assures conduct comporting with reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing." [Citation.] No longer may a holder of an instrument act with "a pure heart and an empty head and still obtain holder in due course status." [Citation.]

Comment 4 to section 3.103, Florida Statutes Annotated, attempts to shed light on how to interpret the new standard:

Although fair dealing is a broad term that must be defined in context, it is clear that it is concerned with the fairness of conduct rather than the care with which an act is performed. Failure to exercise ordinary care in conducting a transaction is an entirely different concept than failure to deal fairly in conducting the transaction.

The Code does not define the term "fair dealing." ***

Application of holder in due course status is the law's value judgment that certain holders are worthy of protection from certain types of claims. For example, it has been argued that application of the old subjective standard facilitated the transfer of checks in the stream of commerce; arguably one would be “more willing to accept the checks if ... she knows ... she can be a holder in due course of that instrument and take it free of defenses that might have existed between the buyer and the seller in the underlying transaction.” [Citation.] In applying the new standard, “fairness” should be measured by taking a global view of the underlying transaction and all of its participants. A holder “must act in a way that is fair according to commercial standards that are themselves reasonable.” [Citation.]

To apply the law requiring “good faith” under section 3.302 (a), we adopt the analysis set forth by the Supreme Court of Maine:

The factfinder must ... determine, first, whether the conduct of the holder comported with industry or “commercial” standards applicable to the transaction and, second, whether those standards were reasonable standards intended to result in fair dealing. Each of those determinations must be made in the context of the specific transaction at hand. If the factfinder’s conclusion on each point is “yes,” the holder will be determined to have acted in good faith even if, in the individual transaction at issue, the result appears unreasonable. Thus a holder may be accorded holder in due course status where it acts pursuant to those reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing—even if it is negligent—but may lose that status, even where it complies with commercial standards, if those standards are not reasonably related to achieving fair dealing. [Citation.]

Check cashing businesses occupy a special niche in the financial industry. They are part of the “alternative financial services” or “fringe banking” sector, a part of the market that “has become a major source of traditional banking services for low-income and working poor consumers, residents of minority neighborhoods, and people with blemished credit histories.” [Citations.]

Against this backdrop, we cannot say that the trial court erred in finding that the $10,000 check was a red flag. The $10,000 personal check was not the typical check cashed at a check cashing outlet. The size of the check, in the context of the check cashing business, was a proper factor to consider under the objective standard of good faith in deciding whether Any Kind was a holder in due course. [Citation.]

Guarino was not the typical customer of a check cashing outlet. As the trial judge observed, because of the 5% fee charged, it is unusual for a small businessman such as a broker to conduct business through a check cashing store instead of through a traditional bank. Guarino did not have a history with Any Kind of cashing checks of similar size without incident. The need for speed in a business transaction is usually less acute than for someone cashing a paycheck or welfare check to pay for life’s necessities. The need for speed in cashing a large business check is consistent with a drawer who, for whatever reason, might stop payment. Fair dealing in this case required that the $10,000 check be approached with a degree of caution.

To affirm the trial court is not to wreak havoc with the check cashing industry. Verification with the maker of a check will not be necessary to preserve holder in due course status in the vast majority of cases arising from check cashing outlets. This was neither the typical customer, nor the typical transaction of a check cashing outlet.

The legislature’s addition of an objective standard of conduct may well have the effect of “slowing the ‘wheels of commerce’” in some transactions. [Citation.] However, by adopting changes to the “good faith” standard in the holder in due course doctrine, the legislature “necessarily must have concluded that the addition of the objective requirement to the definition of ‘good faith’ serves an important goal. The paramount necessity of unquestioned negotiability has given way, at least in part to the desire for reasonable commercial fairness in negotiable transactions.” [Citation.] In this case, reasonable commercial fairness required Any Kind to approach the $10,000 check with some caution and to verify it with the maker if it wanted to preserve its holder in due course status.

INTERPRETATION With respect to establishing holder in due course status, “good faith” means honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did any of the parties act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the position taken by Revised Article 3? Explain.

LACK OF NOTICE

To become a holder in due course, a holder must also take the instrument without notice that it is (1) overdue, (2) dishonored, (3) forged or altered, or (4) subject to any claim or defense. Notice of any of these matters should alert the purchaser that she may be buying a lawsuit and, consequently, may not be accorded the favored position of a holder in due course. The Code defines notice as follows:

A person has “notice” of a fact when (a) he has actual knowledge of it; or (b) he has received a notice or notification of it; or (c) from all the facts and circumstances known to him at the time in question, he has reason to know that it exists.

Revised Article 1's definition is substantially the same. Whereas the first two clauses of this definition impose a wholly subjective standard, the last clause provides a partially objective one: the presence of suspicious circumstances does not adversely affect the purchaser, unless he has reason to recognize them as suspicious. Because the applicable standard is "actual notice," "notice received," or "reason to know," constructive notice through public filing or recording is not of itself sufficient notice to prevent a person from being a holder in due course.

To be effective, notice must be received at a time and in a manner that the recipient will have a reasonable opportunity to act on it.

Notice an Instrument Is Overdue To be a holder in due course, the purchaser must take the instrument without notice that it is overdue. This requirement is based on the idea that overdue paper conveys a suspicion that something is wrong. Time paper is due on its stated due date if the stated date is a business day or, if not, on the next business day. It "becomes overdue on the day after the due date." Thus, if an instrument is payable on July 1, a purchaser cannot become a holder in due course by buying it on July 2, provided that July 1 was a business day. In addition, in the case of an installment note or of several notes issued as part of the same transaction with successive specified maturity dates, the purchaser has notice that an instrument is overdue if he has reason to know that any part of the principal amount is overdue or that there is an uncured default in payment of another instrument of the same series.

Demand paper is overdue for purposes of preventing a purchaser from becoming a holder in due course if the purchaser has notice that she is taking the instrument on a day after demand has been made or after it has been outstanding for an unreasonably long time. The Code provides that for checks, a reasonable time is ninety days after its date. For all other demand instruments, the reasonable period of time varies, depending on the facts of the particular case. Thus, the particular situation, business custom, and other relevant factors must be considered in determining whether an instrument is overdue: no hard-and-fast rules are possible.

Acceleration clauses have caused problems. If an instrument's maturity date has been accelerated, the instrument becomes overdue on the day after the accelerated due date even though the holder may be unaware that it is past due.

Notice an Instrument Has Been Dishonored Dishonor is the refusal to pay or accept an instrument when it becomes due. If a transferee has notice that an instrument has been dishonored, he cannot become a holder in due course. For example, a person who takes a check stamped "NSF" (not sufficient funds) or "no account" has notice of dishonor and will not be a holder in due course.

Notice of a Claim or Defense A purchaser of an instrument cannot become a holder in due course if he purchases it with notice of "any claim to the instrument described in Section 3-306" or "a defense or claim in recoupment described in Section 3-305(a)." A defense protects a person from liability on an instrument, whereas a claim to an instrument asserts ownership to it.

Claims covered by Section 3-306 include "not only claims to ownership but also any other claim of a property or possessory right. It includes the claim to a lien or the claim of a person in rightful possession of an instrument who was wrongfully deprived of possession." Claims to instruments may be made against thieves, finders, or possessors with void or voidable title. In many instances, both a defense and claim will be involved. For example, Donna is fraudulently induced to issue a check to Pablo. Donna has a claim to ownership of the instrument as well as a defense to Pablo's demand for payment.

Section 3-305(a), which is more fully discussed later in this chapter, provides that personal defenses are valid against a holder, while real defenses are effective against both holders and holders in due course. In addition, a person without the rights of a holder in due course is subject to an obligor's claim in recoupment "against the original payee of the instrument if the claim arose from the transaction that gave rise to the instrument." For example, Buyer gives Seller a negotiable note in exchange for Seller's promise to deliver certain goods. Seller delivers nonconforming goods that Buyer elects to accept. Buyer has a cause of action under Article 2 for breach of warranty under the contract, which "claim may be asserted against Seller ... to reduce the amount owing on the note. It is not relevant whether Seller knew or had notice that Buyer had the warranty claim."

Buying an instrument at a discount or for a price less than face value does not mean that the buyer had notice of any defense or claim against the instrument. Nonetheless, a court may construe an unusually large discount as notice of a claim or defense.

WITHOUT REASON TO QUESTION ITS AUTHENTICITY

Under prior Article 3, a purchaser had notice of a claim or defense if the instrument was so incomplete, contained such visible evidence of forgery or alteration, or was otherwise so irregular as to call into question its validity. Courts differed greatly as to how irregular an instrument had to be for a holder to have notice. Revised Article 3 provides that a party may become a holder in due course only if the instrument issued or negotiated to the holder “does not bear such apparent evidence of forgery or alteration or is not otherwise so irregular or incomplete as to call into question its authenticity.” According to the comments to this section, the term “authenticity” clarifies the idea that the irregularity or incompleteness must indicate that the instrument may not be what it purports to be. The Revision takes the position that persons who purchase such instruments do so at their own peril and should not be protected against defenses of the obligor or claims of prior owners. In addition, the Revision takes the position that it makes no difference if the holder does not have notice of such irregularity or incompleteness; it depends only on whether the instrument’s defect is apparent and whether the taker should have reason to know of the problem.

Holder in Due Course Status

A holder who meets the requirements discussed in the previous section obtains the preferred position of holder in due course status. This section discusses whether a payee may become a holder in due course. It also addresses the rights of a transferee from a holder in due course under the shelter rule. Finally, it identifies those special circumstances that prevent a transferee from acquiring holder in due course status.

A PAYEE MAY BE A HOLDER IN DUE COURSE

A payee may be a holder in due course. This does not mean that a payee automatically is a holder in due course but that he may be one if he satisfies the requirements for such status. For example, if a seller delivers goods to a buyer and accepts a current check in payment, the seller will be a holder in due course if he acted in good faith and had no notice of defenses or claims and no reason to question its authenticity. The most common example is where the transaction involves three parties, and the defense involves the parties other than the payee. For example, after purchasing goods from Punky, Robin fraudulently obtains a check from Clem payable to the order of Punky and forwards it to Punky. Punky takes it for value and without any knowledge that Robin had defrauded Clem into issuing the check. In such a case, the payee, Punky, is a holder in due course and takes the instrument free and clear of Clem’s defense of fraud in the inducement.

WATSON COATINGS, INC. v. AMERICAN EXPRESS TRAVEL RELATED SERVICES, INC.

FACTS Over a ten-year period, Christine Mayfield worked for plaintiff Watson Coatings, Inc.—first as an accountant, then as the company controller, and finally as the company treasurer. Mayfield had authority to write checks on funds in Watson’s corporate checking account. Watson placed no restrictions or dollar limitations regarding Mayfield’s authority to sign checks. Mayfield was solely responsible for reconciling the company checkbook register with the bank statements. Although Watson received monthly bank statements with cancelled checks, Carol Watson, one of Watson’s owners, delivered the unopened bank statements to Mayfield but never reviewed the bank statements or reconciled the checking account during Mayfield’s tenure at Watson. Mayfield’s husband, an American Express account holder, added Mayfield’s name to his account in 1992. From August 1997 through October 2001, Mayfield wrote approximately forty-five to forty-seven checks (totaling more than $745,000) on Watson’s corporate checking account payable to American Express for her or her husband’s personal debt. Neither Mayfield’s name nor her husband’s name was printed on any of the checks. Each of the checks was made payable to the order of American Express and for credit to the American Express account of Mayfield’s husband. American Express credited the Mayfield account for each of the checks. Watson informed American Express of Mayfield’s fraud after Mayfield’s employment with Watson ended. Watson filed suit to recover the funds. The district court granted American Express’s motion for summary judgment. Watson filed an appeal.

DECISION Judgment affirmed.

OPINION Smith, J. Watson raises three arguments on appeal: *** (2) that American Express cannot qualify as a holder in due course because it is a payee or because it fails to meet the requirement of good faith ...

Watson's second argument is that a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether American Express, as a payee, qualifies as a holder in due course. Watson further asserts that even if American Express did qualify for holder-in-due-course status, it failed to meet the requirement of good faith. ***

"The payee of an instrument can be a holder in due course, but use of the holder-in-due-course doctrine by the payee of an instrument is not the normal situation." [Citation.] (Explaining that "the drafters of the U.C.C. did not categorically exclude a payee" from holder-in-due-course status but typically a payee is not a holder in due course). Thus, satisfaction of the requirements of a holder in due course is "all that is necessary for a payee to obtain the special protections of a holder in due course." [Citation.] A bare assertion by the plaintiff that "only in rare circumstances" should a payee be regarded as a holder in due course is insufficient to establish how the payee failed to meet the requirements of a holder in due course. [Citation.] However, the payee bears the burden of establishing that it meets all the requirements of a holder in due course. [Citation.].

Given the facts in this case, we see no reason that if American Express meets the requirements of a holder in due course, it should not qualify for such status simply because it is also a payee. Watson only challenges American Express's fulfillment of the good faith requirement. "Good faith" means honesty in fact in the conduct of the transaction concerned." [UCC] § 400.3-103(4). Because the UFL [Uniform Fiduciaries Law] uses a definition substantially similar to the UCC's definition, and because we have already held that *** American Express acted in good faith ***[we must conclude] that American Express was a holder in due course.

"[M]ere suspicious circumstances" are insufficient to show bad faith. [Citation.] Furthermore, "many legitimate reasons [exist as to] why an agent and principal might engage in odd checking practices." [Citation.] ***

Not only must the payee act honestly, but the payee must also act in a commercially reasonable manner to have acted in "good faith." American Express processes over a million payments a day by electronic means—the only practical means to accomplish the task. We consider electronic, automated check processing to be commercially reasonable. [Citation.] Where a bank or payee electronically processes checks pursuant to its normal procedures and does not employ automated procedures that unreasonably vary from general banking usage, no genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether the payee's automated processing of checks is commercially reasonable.

In this case, American Express acted in good faith when it accepted the checks from Mayfield as payment for her husband's credit card bills because it acted honestly and in a commercially reasonable manner. *** American Express had no reason to suspect that it would have a problem collecting payment on the checks because they contained no facial irregularities. Finally, Mayfield drafted the checks over a four-year period without any complaint from Watson to American Express that Mayfield had no authority to pay for her husband's credit card with corporate checks.

In addition to acting honestly, American Express acted in a commercially reasonable manner by using an automated processing system. Watson does not argue that American Express violated its own procedures when it processed the checks. Also, Watson has not provided any evidence that American Express's automated procedures unreasonably vary from general banking usage.

INTERPRETATION A payee may be a holder in due course.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Under what circumstances, if any, should a payee be permitted to be a holder in due course?

THE SHELTER RULE

Through operation of the shelter rule, the transferee of an instrument acquires the same rights in the instrument as the transferor had. Therefore, even a holder who does not comply fully with the requirements for being a holder in due course nevertheless acquires all the rights of a holder in due course if some previous holder of the instrument had been a holder in due course. For example, Prosser induces Mundheim, by fraud in the inducement, to make a note payable to her order and then negotiates it to Henn, a holder in due course. After the note is overdue, Henn gives it to Corbin, who has notice of the fraud. Corbin is not a holder in due course, because he took the instrument when overdue, did not pay value, and had notice of Mundheim's defense. Nonetheless, through the operation of the shelter rule, Corbin acquires Henn's rights as a holder in due course, and Mundheim cannot successfully assert his defense against Corbin. The purpose of the shelter provision is not to benefit the transferee but to assure the holder in due course of a free market for the negotiable instrument he acquires.

Practical Advice

If a negotiable instrument is transferred to you and you will not satisfy the requirements of a holder in due course, make sure that your transferor has the rights of a holder in due course.

The shelter rule, however, provides that a transferee who has himself been a party to any fraud or illegality affecting the instrument cannot subsequently acquire the rights of a holder in due course. For example, Parker induces Miles, by fraud in the inducement, to make an instrument payable to the order of Parker, who subsequently negotiates the instrument to Henson, a holder in due course. If Parker later reacquires it from Henson, Parker will not succeed to Henson's rights as a holder in due course and will remain subject to the defense of fraud.

TRIFFIN V. CIGNA INSURANCE CO.

<http://lawlibrary.rutgers.edu/decisions/appellate/a4000-95.opn.html>

FACTS The defendant, James Mills, received a draft in the amount of $484.12, dated July 7, 1993, from one of Cigna's constituent companies, Atlantic Employers Insurance Co. (Atlantic). The draft had been issued for workers' compensation benefits. Mills falsely indicated to Atlantic that he had not received the draft due to a change in his address and requested that payment be stopped and a new draft issued by defendant. Atlantic complied and stopped payment on the initial draft. Mills nevertheless negotiated the initial draft to Sun's Market (Sun), before the stop payment notation was placed on the draft. Sun was a holder in due course. Atlantic's bank dishonored the draft in accordance with its customer's direction, stamped it "Stop Payment," and returned the draft to Sun. There is no question that had Sun at that point pressed its claim against the insurer as the issuer of the instrument, Sun would have been entitled to a judgment because of its status as a holder in due course.

Thereafter, plaintiff, who is in the business of purchasing dishonored instruments, obtained Sun's interests in this instrument and proceeded with this lawsuit. Plaintiff does not contend that he is a holder in due course of the instrument by virtue of it being negotiated to him for value, in good faith, without notice of dishonor, under the former holder in due course statute, Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) Section 3-302, nor under the present statute: 3-302a(2). The trial court issued summary judgment in favor of Atlantic and Sun appeals.

DECISION Reversed and remanded.

OPINION Dreier, J. There exists a second method by which one may become a holder in due course. The shelter provisions of former UCC (§ 3-201), which was in effect when plaintiff obtained his assignment of this instrument, state clearly that "[t]ransfer of an instrument vests in the transferee such rights as the transferor has therein ***." Official Comment 3 to that section sets to rest any question of whether this section applies to the transfer by assignment of the rights of a holder in due course. The Comment reads: "A holder in due course may transfer his rights as such ***. [The] policy is to assure the holder in due course a free market for the paper, ***." Example (a) following this comment could have been drawn from this case, but is even stronger because it adds an element of fraud and posits a gratuitous transfer rather than a purchase, as in our case:

(a) A [Mills] induces M [Cigna] by fraud to make an instrument payable to A. A negotiates it to B [Sun Corp.], who takes as a holder in due course. After the instrument is overdue B gives it to C [plaintiff], who has notice of the fraud. C succeeds to B's rights as a holder in due course, cutting off the defense.

If the 1995 amendments are to be given retroactive effect, the law governing the rights of a transferee who merely has accepted the transfer of the instrument is now found in Revised UCC [§ 3-203]. It restates the principle of the former Official Comment 3, example (a), as substantive law.

The Uniform Commercial Code Comment 2 to this [Revised] section similarly states:

Under subsection (b) a holder in due course that transfers an instrument transfers those rights as a holder in due course to the purchaser. The policy is to assure the holder in due course a free market for the instrument.

These sections could not be clearer. Plaintiff received by [negotiation] the right of a holder in due course to this instrument, which apparently had been presented and then dishonored because of defendant's stop payment order.

INTERPRETATION Through operation of the shelter rule, the transferee of an instrument acquires the same rights in the instrument as the transferor had.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the shelter rule? Explain.

The Preferred Position of a Holder in Due Course

In a nonconsumer transaction, a holder in due course takes the instrument (1) free from all claims on the part of any person and (2) free from all defenses of any party with whom he has not dealt, except for a limited number of defenses that are available against anyone, including a holder in due course. Such defenses that are available against all parties are referred to as real defenses. In contrast, defenses that may not be asserted against a holder in due course are referred to as personal, or contractual, defenses.

REAL DEFENSES

The real defenses available against all holders, including holders in due course, are

1. infancy, to the extent that it is a defense to a simple contract;
2. any other incapacity, duress, or illegality of the transaction that renders the obligation void;
3. fraud in the execution;
4. discharge in insolvency proceedings;
5. any other discharge of which the holder has notice when he takes the instrument;
6. unauthorized signature; and
7. fraudulent alteration.

Infancy All states have a firmly entrenched public policy of protecting minors from persons who might take advantage of them through contractual dealings. The Code does not state when minority (infancy) is available as a defense or the conditions under which it may be asserted. Rather, it provides that minority is a defense available against a holder in due course to the extent that it is a defense to a contract under the laws of the state involved. See Chapter 14.

Void Obligations When the obligation on an instrument originates in such a way that it is void or null under the law of the state involved, the Code authorizes the use of this defense against a holder in due course. This follows from the idea that when the party was never obligated, it is unreasonable to permit an event over which she has no control—negotiation to a holder in due course—to convert a nullity into a valid claim against her.

Incapacity, duress, and the illegality of a transaction are defenses that may render the obligation of a party either voidable or void, depending on the law of the state involved as applied to the facts of a given transaction. To the extent the obligation is rendered void (because of duress by physical force, because the party is a person under guardianship, or, in some cases, because the contract is illegal), the defense may be asserted against a holder in due course. To the extent it is voidable, which is generally the case, the defense (other than minority, as discussed previously) is not effective against a holder in due course.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION v. MEYER

FACTS Certain partners of the Finley Kumble law firm signed promissory notes that secured loans made to the law firm by the National Bank of Washington (NBW). When Finley Kumble subsequently declared bankruptcy and defaulted on the loans, NBW filed suit to collect on the notes. Then NBW itself became insolvent, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) was appointed as receiver. The FDIC moved for summary judgment against each defendant on the grounds that Section 1823(e) the Federal Deposit Insurance Act (FDIA) of 1950 places the FDIC in the position of a holder in due course and thus bars all personal defenses against FDIC claims as a matter of law. Twenty of the Finley partners opposed the motion, claiming that they signed the notes under the threat that their wages and standing in the firm would decrease if they refused to sign. Such a threat constituted economic duress, which, they contended, is not a personal defense but a real one. They argued that the FDIA does not bar real defenses.

DECISION Summary judgment granted in favor of FDIC.

OPINION Pratt, J. The Finley Partners argue that the FDIC's motion for summary judgment should be denied because their defense of economic duress survives the effects of § 1823(e). They concede that § 1823(e) operates to place the FDIC in the position of a holder in due course, making promissory notes free of personal defenses. They argue, however, that § 1823(e) does not extinguish real defenses set forth in the Uniform Commercial Code ("UCC") and that their economic duress defense constitutes such a real defense.

Defendants are correct that § 1823(e) bars personal defenses but not real defenses. *** As the Supreme Court explained in Langley v. FDIC, a real defense renders an instrument entirely void, leaving no interest that could be "diminish[ed] or defeat[ed]." [Citations.] In contrast, personal defenses render a note voidable but not void. ***

Thus, if the Finley Partners' economic duress constitutes a real defense, then their promissory notes were void from the beginning. *** On the other hand, if the Finley Partners' economic duress defense is a personal defense, then the FDIC received voidable title to the promissory notes from the NBW, which [defense would be cut off by the FDIC] ***.

The main legal question, then, is whether economic duress is a personal defense that rendered NBW's title to the promissory notes voidable, or a real defense that rendered its title entirely void. The Finley Partners suggest that duress of any nature constitutes a real defense, citing UCC § 3-305(2)(b) and several cases from outside of the District of Columbia. A careful reading of the UCC and its Official Commentary reveals that it does not make such a blanket classification.

First, § 3-305(2)(b) provides that holders in due course take free of all defenses except for "(b) such other incapacity, or duress, or illegality of the transaction, as renders the obligation of the party a nullity." The words "such" and "as" indicate that the section is not stating that any type of duress renders an obligation to be nullity. Rather, it suggests that only those types of duress that are so severe as to render it a nullity stand as exceptions to the rule that holders in due course take free of defenses.

Of course, the question left open is what type of duress is severe enough to render it a nullity. Neither UCC § 3-305(2)(b) nor the Official Comment attempt to establish a rule governing which types of duress render a transaction void as opposed to merely voidable. Instead, Official Comment 6 declares that "[a]ll such matters are therefore left to the local law."

Duress takes two forms. In one, a person physically compels conduct that appears to be a manifestation of assent by a party who has no intention of engaging in that conduct. The result of this type of duress is that the conduct is not effective to create a contract ([Restatement] § 174). In the other, a person makes an improper threat that induces a party who has no reasonable alternative to manifesting his assent. The result of this type of duress is that the contract that is created is voidable by the victim (§ 175). [Citation.]

***

The Finley Partners do not allege that they were physically compelled to sign the promissory notes in question. They themselves labeled their defense as "economic" duress, and the substance of their allegations are that they signed the notes because of the threat that their wages and standing in the firm would decrease if they refused. Such economic duress does not reach the level of physical compulsion capable of rendering a transaction entirely void. Thus, NBW held at least voidable title to the promissory notes when the FDIC took over as Receiver. *** Thus, defendants' economic duress defense is not valid against the FDIC.

INTERPRETATION Where the obligation of an instrument is void, the Code authorizes the use of this real defense against a holder in due course.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What other defenses, if any, should be real defenses? Explain.

Fraud in the Execution Fraud in the execution of the instrument renders the instrument void and therefore is a defense valid against a holder in due course. The Code describes this type of fraud as misrepresentation that induced the party to sign the instrument with neither knowledge nor reasonable opportunity to learn of its character or its essential terms. For example, Frances is asked to sign a receipt and does so without realizing or having the opportunity of learning that her signature is going on a promissory note cleverly concealed under the receipt.

Because her signature has been obtained by fraud in the execution, Frances would have a valid defense against a holder in due course.

Discharge in Insolvency Proceedings If a party's obligation on an instrument is discharged in a proceeding for bankruptcy or for any other insolvency, he has a valid defense in any action brought against him on the instrument, including one brought by a holder in due course. Thus, a debtor, whose obligation on a negotiable instrument is discharged in an insolvency proceeding, is relieved of payment, even to a holder in due course.

Discharge of Which the Holder Has Notice

Any holder, including a holder in due course, takes the instrument subject to any discharge of which she has notice at the time of taking. If only some, but not all, of the parties to the instrument have been discharged, the purchaser can still become a holder in due course. The discharged parties, however, have a real defense against a holder in due course who has notice of their discharge. For example, Harris, who is in possession of a negotiable instrument, strikes out the indorsement of Jones. The instrument is subsequently negotiated to Stephen, a holder in due course, against whom Jones has a real defense.

Unauthorized Signature A person's signature on an instrument is unauthorized when it is made without express, implied, or apparent authority. Because he has not made a contract, a person whose signature is unauthorized or forged cannot be held liable on the instrument in the absence of estoppel or ratification, even if the instrument is negotiated to a holder in due course. Similarly, if Joan's signature were forged on the back of an instrument, Joan could not be held as an indorser, because she has not made a contract. Thus, any unauthorized signature is totally invalid as that of the person whose name is signed unless she ratifies it or is precluded from denying it; the unauthorized signature operates only as the signature of the unauthorized signer.

A person may be estopped or prevented from asserting a defense because his conduct in the matter has caused reliance by a third party to his loss or damage. Suppose Neal's son forges Neal's name to a check, which the drawee bank cashes. When the returned check reaches Neal, he learns of the forgery. Rather than subject his son to trouble, possibly including criminal prosecution, Neal says nothing. Thereafter, Neal's son continues to forge checks and to cash them at the drawee bank. Although the bank may be suspicious of the signature, the fact that Neal has not complained may induce it to believe that the signatures are proper. When he finally seeks to compel the bank to recredit his account for all the forged checks, Neal will not succeed: his conduct has estopped him from denying that his son had authority to sign his name.

A party is similarly precluded from denying the validity of his signature if his negligence substantially contributes to the making of the unauthorized signature. The most obvious case is that of a drawer who uses a mechanized or other automatic signing device and is negligent in safeguarding it. In such an instance, the drawer would not be permitted to assert an unauthorized signature as a defense against a holder in due course.

An unauthorized signature may be ratified and thereby become valid so far as its effect as a signature. Thus, Kathy forges Laura's indorsement on a promissory note and negotiates it to Allison. Laura subsequently ratifies Kathy's act. As a result, Kathy is no longer liable to Allison on the note, although Laura is. Nonetheless, Laura's ratification does not relieve Kathy from civil liability to Laura; nor does it in any way affect Kathy's criminal liability for the forgery.

Fraudulent Alteration An alteration is (1) an unauthorized change that modifies the obligation of any party to the instrument or (2) an unauthorized addition or change to an incomplete instrument concerning the obligation of a party.

An alteration that is fraudulently made discharges a party whose obligation is affected by the alteration except where that party assents or is precluded by his own negligence from raising the defense. All other alterations do not discharge any party, and the instrument may be enforced according to its original terms. Thus, if an instrument has been nonfraudulently altered, it may be enforced, but only to the extent of its original tenor (i.e., according to its initially written terms). See Figure 26-4 illustrating the effects of alterations.

A discharge under the Code for fraudulent alteration, however, is not effective against a holder in due course who took the instrument without notice of the alteration. Such a subsequent holder in due course may always enforce the instrument according to its original terms and, in the case of an incomplete instrument, may enforce it as completed. (Under the Code a person taking the instrument for value, in good faith, and without notice of the alteration is accorded the same protection as a holder in due course). The following examples demonstrate the operation of these rules (Figure 26-5 illustrates these examples).

1. M executes and delivers a note to P for $2,000, which P subsequently indorses and transfers to A for $1,900. A intentionally and skillfully changes the figure on the note to $20,000 and then negotiates it to B, who takes it, in good faith, without notice of any wrongdoing and without reason to question its authenticity, for $19,000. B is a holder in due course and, therefore, can collect the original amount of the note ($2,000) from M or P and the full amount ($20,000) from A, less any amount paid by the other parties.
2. Assume the facts in (1), except that B is not a holder in due course. M and P are both discharged by A's fraudulent alteration. B's only recourse is against A for the full amount ($20,000).
3. M issues his blank check to P, who is to complete it when the exact amount is determined. Though the correct amount is set at $2,000, P fraudulently fills in $4,000 and then negotiates the check to T. If T is a holder in due course, she can collect the amount as completed ($4,000) from either M or P. If T is not a holder in due course, however, she has no recourse against M but may recover the full amount ($4,000) from P.

- Assume the facts in (3), except that P filled in the $4,000 amount in good faith. No party is discharged from liability on the instrument because the alteration was not fraudulent. If T is not a holder in due course, M is liable for the correct amount ($2,000). If T is a holder in due course, T is entitled to receive $4,000 from M because she can enforce an incomplete instrument as completed. Whether or not T is a holder in due course, T may recover $4,000 from P.

PERSONAL DEFENSES

Defenses to an instrument may arise in many ways, either when the instrument is issued or later. In general, the numerous defenses to liability on a negotiable instrument, which are similar to those that may be raised in an action for breach of contract, are available against any holder of the instrument unless she has the rights of a holder in due course. Among the personal defenses are (1) lack of consideration; (2) failure of consideration; (3) breach of contract; (4) fraud in the inducement; (5) illegality that does not render the transaction void; (6) duress, undue influence, mistake, misrepresentation, or incapacity that does not render the transaction void; (7) setoff or counterclaim; (8) discharge of which the holder in due course does not have notice; (9) nondelivery of an instrument, whether complete or incomplete; (10) unauthorized completion of an incomplete instrument; (11) payment without obtaining surrender of the instrument; (12) theft of a bearer instrument or of an instrument payable to him; and (13) lack of authority of a corporate officer, agent, or partner as to the particular instrument, where such officer, agent, or partner had general authority to issue negotiable paper for his principal or firm.

	versus	M	P
Illustration 4	T = HDC	$4,000	$4,000
	T = H	$2,000	$4,000

These situations are the most common examples, but others exist. Indeed, the Code does not attempt to detail defenses that may be cut off. It can be stated that a holder in due course takes the instrument free and clear of all claims and defenses, except those listed as real defenses. See Figure 26-6 depicting the availability of defenses against holders and holders in due course.

Practical Advice

When taking a negotiable instrument, make sure that you satisfy the requirements for becoming holder in due course.

Limitations upon Holder in Due Course Rights

The preferential position enjoyed by a holder in due course has been severely limited by a Federal Trade Commission (FTC) rule restricting the rights of a holder in due course of an instrument concerning a debt arising out of a consumer credit contract, which includes negotiable instruments. The rule, entitled “Preservation of Consumers’ Claims and Defenses,” applies to sellers and lessors of consumer goods, which are goods for personal, household, or family use. It also applies to lenders who advance money to finance a consumer’s purchase of consumer goods or services. The rule is intended to prevent consumer purchase transactions from being financed in such a manner that the purchaser is legally obligated to make full payment of the price to a third party, even though the dealer from whom she bought the goods committed fraud or the goods were defective. Such obligations arise when a purchaser executes and delivers to a seller a negotiable instrument that the seller negotiates to a holder in due course. The buyer’s defense that the goods were defective or that the seller committed fraud, although valid against the seller, is not valid against the holder in due course. See Figure 26-7 illustrating the rights of holders in due course under the FTC rule.

Ethical Dilemma

What Responsibility Does a Holder Have in Negotiating Commercial Paper?

FACTS Marcus Moore and David Arnold are subcontractors specializing in the installation of electrical wiring for commercial office space. They have incorporated their business as Moore & Arnold, Inc. Over the last two years, their business has been extremely slow. Recently, they obtained an offer to install wiring for a general contractor, Barnes & Sons, which was in charge of renovating an office to be occupied by three major tenants. The job was substantial and would pay $35,000.

Marcus and David disagreed on whether to accept the job. Marcus was concerned with the business reputation of Barnes & Sons. For years, the business had been reputedly operated by Tom Barnes, the original owner, but when his son, John, assumed control of operations, problems began. The partnership was recently sued for negligence in connection with a major construction project in a mall. It is well known that John is a gambler, and the business has gained the reputation of being slow to pay creditors.

Marcus and David finally decided to accept the job. Upon their completing the work, John Barnes handed Marcus a negotiable promissory note drawn by John Major, one of three different names Barnes & Sons has been trading under during the last year. The note was payable to Moore & Arnold, Inc., one month from date.

Marcus is instinctively nervous about accepting the note. He is aware of the cash flow problems and the litigation pending against Barnes & Sons and has become increasingly suspicious because of the different trade names the contractor uses. David, who is more trusting, wants to accept the note and negotiate it to Wire Ways, Inc., one of their major suppliers of electrical wiring. Marcus wants to demand cash and, if Barnes refuses, to refer the account to a collection agency.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. Would it be ethical for Marcus and David to accept the note and negotiate it to Wire Ways, Inc.? Why?
2. What ethical responsibilities does one have to review the business reputations of prospective clients or customers and to refuse to do business with disreputable persons?
3. What risks did Moore & Arnold, Inc., assume in accepting the business? Was the risk limited to the failure to obtain payment?
4. Could Marcus and David have structured the business transaction in any way to insulate Moore & Arnold, Inc., from the risks it assumed?

To correct this situation, the FTC rule preserves claims and defenses of consumer buyers and borrowers against holders in due course. The rule states that no seller or creditor can take or receive a consumer credit contract unless the contract contains the conspicuous provision shown below:

NOTICE: ANY HOLDER OF THIS CONSUMER CREDIT CONTRACT IS SUBJECT TO ALL CLAIMS AND DEFENSES WHICH THE DEBTOR COULD ASSERT AGAINST THE SELLER OF THE GOODS OR SERVICES OBTAINED PURSUANT HERETO OR WITH THE PROCEEDS HEREOF. RECOVERY HEREUNDER BY THE DEBTOR SHALL NOT EXCEED AMOUNTS PAID BY THE DEBTOR HEREUNDER.

Practical Advice

As a consumer, make sure that any negotiable instrument you give in a consumer credit transaction contains the notation required by the Federal Trade Commission. As a transferee of negotiable instruments arising from a consumer credit transaction, recognize that you are subject to all defenses.

The purpose of this notice is to inform any holder in due course of a paper or negotiable instrument that he takes the instrument subject to all claims and defenses that the buyer could assert against the seller. The effect of the rule is to place the holder in due course in the position of an assignee.

Chapter Summary

Requirements of a Holder in Due Course

Holder a person who has both possession of an instrument and all indorsements necessary to it

Value differs from contractual consideration and consists of any of the following:

- the timely performance of legal consideration (which excludes executory promises);

- the acquisition of a security interest in or a lien on the instrument;
- taking the instrument in payment of or as security for an antecedent debt;
- the giving of a negotiable instrument; or
- the giving of an irrevocable commitment to a third party

Good Faith honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing

Lack of Notice

- Notice an Instrument Is Overdue time paper is overdue after its stated date; demand paper is overdue after demand has been made or after it has been outstanding for an unreasonable period of time
- Notice an Instrument Has Been Dishonored dishonor is the refusal to pay or accept an instrument when it becomes due
- Notice of Claim or Defense a defense protects a person from liability while a claim is an assertion of ownership

Without Reason to Question Its Authenticity instrument cannot bear such apparent evidence of forgery or alteration or otherwise be so irregular or incomplete as to call into question its authenticity

Holder in Due Course Status

A Payee May Be a Holder in Due Course the payee's rights as a holder in due course are limited to defenses of persons with whom he has not dealt

The Shelter Rule the transferee of an instrument acquires the same rights that the transferor had in the instrument

The Preferred Position of a Holder in Due Course

Real Defenses real defenses are available against all holders, including holders in due course; such defenses are as follows:

- Infancy
- Void Obligations
- Fraud in the Execution
- Discharge in Insolvency Proceedings
- Discharge of Which the Holder Has Notice
- Unauthorized Signature
- Fraudulent Alteration

Personal Defenses all other defenses that might be asserted in the case of any action for breach of contract

Limitations upon Holder in Due Course Rights the preferential position of a holder in due course has been severely limited by a Federal Trade Commission rule that applies to consumer credit contracts, under which a transferee of consumer credit contracts cannot take as a holder in due course

Questions

1. Marcus issues a negotiable promissory note payable to the order of Parish for the amount of $3,000. Parish raises the amount to $13,000 and negotiates it to Hilda for $12,000.
  - a. If Hilda is a holder in due course, how much can she recover from Marcus? How much from Parish? If Marcus's negligence substantially contributed to the making of the alteration, how much can Hilda recover from Marcus and Parish, respectively?

- b. If Hilda is not a holder in due course, how much can she recover from Marcus? How much from Parish? If Marcus's negligence substantially contributed to the making of the alteration, how much can Hilda recover from Marcus and Parish, respectively?
2. On December 2, 2010, Miles executed and delivered to Proctor a negotiable promissory note for $1,000, payable to Proctor or order, due March 2, 2011, with interest at 14 percent from maturity, in partial payment of a printing press. On January 3, 2011, Proctor, in need of ready cash, indorsed and sold the note to Hughes for $800. Hughes paid $600 in cash to Proctor on January 3 and agreed to pay the balance of $200 one week later, namely, on January 10. On January 6, Hughes learned that Miles claimed a breach of warranty by Proctor and, for this reason, intended to refuse to pay the note when it matured. On January 10, Hughes paid Proctor $200, in conformity with their agreement of January 3. Following Miles's refusal to pay the note on March 2, 2011, Hughes sues Miles for $1,000. Is Hughes a holder in due course? If so, for what amount?
3. Thornton fraudulently represented to Daye that he would obtain for her a new car to be used in Daye's business for $17,800 from Pennek Motor Company. Daye thereupon executed her personal check for $17,800 payable to the order of Pennek Motor Company and delivered the check to Thornton, who immediately delivered it to the motor company in payment of his own prior indebtedness. The motor company had no knowledge of the representations made by Thornton to Daye. Pennek Motor Company now brings an action on the check that was not paid against Daye, who defends on the ground of failure of consideration. Is Pennek subject to this defense? Explain.
4. Adams, who reads with difficulty, arranged to borrow $2,000 from Bell. Bell prepared a note, which Adams read laboriously. As Adams was about to sign it, Bell diverted Adams's attention and substituted the following paper, which was identical to the note Adams had read except that the amounts were different:

On June 1, 2010, I promise to pay Ben Bell or order Twelve Thousand Dollars with interest from date at 16 percent. This note is secured by certificate No. 13 for 100 shares of stock of Brookside Mills, Inc.

Adams did not detect the substitution, signed as maker, handed the note and stock certificate to Bell, and received from Bell $2,000. Bell indorsed and sold the paper to Fore, a holder in due course, who paid him $11,000. Fore presented the note at maturity to Adams, who refused to pay. What are Fore's rights, if any, against Adams?

5. On January 2, 2010, seventeen year-old Martin paid $2,000 for a used motorboat to use in his fishing business, after Dealer's fraudulent misrepresentation of the condition of the boat. Martin signed an installment contract for $1,500, and gave Dealer the following instrument as down payment:

Dated: _____ 2010

I promise to pay to the order of Dealer, six months after date, the sum of $500 without interest. This is given as a down payment on an installment contract for a motorboat.

(signed) Martin

Dealer, on July 1, sold his business to Henry and included this note in the transaction. Dealer indorsed the note in blank and handed it to Henry, who left the note in his office safe. On July 10, Sharpie, an employee of Henry, without authority, stole the note and sold it to Bert for $300, indorsing the note "Sharpie." At the time, in Bert's presence, Sharpie filled in the date on the note as February 2, 2010. Bert demanded payment from Martin, who refused to pay.

What are Bert's rights against Martin?

6. McLaughlin borrowed $10,000 from Adler, who, apprehensive about McLaughlin's ability to pay, demanded security. McLaughlin indorsed and delivered to Adler a negotiable promissory note executed by Topping for $12,000 payable to McLaughlin's order in twelve equal monthly installments. The note did not contain an acceleration clause, but it recited that the consideration for the note was McLaughlin's promise to paint and shingle Topping's barn. At the time McLaughlin transferred the note to Adler, the first installment was overdue and unpaid. Adler was unaware that the installment had not been paid. Topping did not pay any of the installments on the note. When the last installment became due, Adler presented the note to Topping for payment. Topping refused upon the ground that McLaughlin had not painted or reshingled her barn.
7. McEnolly purchased a refrigerator for his home from Perrault Appliance Store for $700. McEnolly paid $200 in cash and signed an installment contract for $500, which in its entirety stated:

January 15, 2010

I promise to pay to the order of Perrault Appliance Store the sum of $500 in ten equal monthly installments.

(signed) McEnolly

Perrault negotiated the installment contract to Hughes, who took the instrument for value, in good faith, without notice of any claim or defense of any party, and without question of the instrument's authenticity. After McEnolly had paid two installments, the refrigerator ceased operating, and McEnolly wishes to recover his down payment and first two monthly payments and to discontinue further payments. What outcome?

8. Adams, by fraudulent representations, induced Barton to purchase one hundred shares of the capital stock of the Evermore Oil Company. The shares were worthless. Barton executed and delivered to Adams a negotiable promissory note for $5,000, dated May 5, in full payment for the shares, due six months after date. On May 20, Adams indorsed and sold the note to Cooper for $4,800. On October 21, Barton, having learned that Cooper now held the note, notified Cooper of the fraud and stated he would not pay the note. On December 1, Cooper negotiated the note to Davis who, while not a party, had full knowledge of the fraud perpetrated on Barton. Upon refusal of Barton to pay the note, Davis sues Barton for $5,000. Is Davis a holder in due course or, if not, does he have the rights of a holder in due course? Explain.

9. Donna gives Peter a check for $3,000 in return for a personal computer. The check is dated December 2. Peter transfers the check for value to Howard on December 14, and Howard deposits it in his bank on December 20. In the meantime, Donna has discovered that the personal computer is not what was promised and has stopped payment on the check. If Peter and Howard disappear, may the bank recover from Donna notwithstanding her defense of failure of consideration? What will be the bank's cause of action?

Case Problems

10. Eldon's Super Fresh Stores, Inc., is a corporation engaged in the retail grocery business. William Drexler was the attorney for and the corporate secretary of Eldon's and was also the personal attorney of Eldon Prinzing, the corporation's president and sole shareholder. From January 2010 through January 2011, Drexler maintained an active stock trading account in his name with Merrill Lynch. Eldon's had no such account. On August 12, 2010, Drexler purchased one hundred shares of Clark Oil & Refining Company stock through his Merrill Lynch stockbroker. He paid for the stock with a check drawn by Eldon's, made payable to Merrill Lynch, and signed by Prinzing. On August 15, 2010, Merrill Lynch accepted the check as payment for Drexler's stock purchase. There was no communication between Eldon's and Merrill Lynch until November 2011, fifteen months after the issuance of the check. At that time, Eldon's asked Merrill Lynch about the whereabouts of the stock certificate and asserted a claim to its ownership. Does Merrill Lynch qualify as a holder in due course? Why?
11. Consolidated Business Forms leased a Phillips business computer from Benchmark. Benchmark subsequently transferred the lease and promissory note to Exchange International Leasing Corporation. Consolidated stopped making rental payments when the computer malfunctioned, and Exchange International brought this suit to recover the payments due on the promissory note. Consolidated defends on the grounds that Benchmark prevented its agent, Mr. Spohn, from examining the contents of the agreement between the two companies and further represented that the computer would be removed with a complete refund if it failed to operate properly. Is Exchange subject to Consolidated's defense?
12. Litton decided to purchase photocopiers to use in its offices. Angelo Buquicchio, a Royal (a division of Litton) salesman, recommended that Litton lease the machines from Regent. Regent was a company totally independent of Litton and had agreed to give Buquicchio "service fees" or, more appropriately, bribes. Regent borrowed money from Bankers Trust to finance purchases and transferred the Litton leases as security. A clause in the leases permitted transfer and provided that the transferee's rights would be independent of any claims or offsets of Litton as against Regent. Litton defaulted on the obligations, and Litton argues that Regent's bribery of Royal's employee rendered Litton's obligations a nullity and a defense against the banks as holders in due course. Explain whether Litton is correct in its assertion.

13. Walter Duester purchased a John Deere combine from St. Paul Equipment. John Deere Co. was the lender and secured party under the agreement. The combine was pledged as collateral. Duester defaulted on his debt, and the manager of St. Paul, Hansen, was instructed to repossess the combine. Hansen went to Duester's farm to accomplish this. Duester told him that he had received some payments for custom combining and would immediately purchase a cashier's check to pay the John Deere debt. Hansen followed Duester to the defendant, Boelus State Bank. Hansen remained outside, and Duester returned in a few minutes with a cashier's check in the amount of the balance of his indebtedness payable to John Deere. The check had been signed by an authorized bank employee. When John Deere, however, presented the check to the bank for payment shortly thereafter, the bank refused to pay, claiming that Duester acquired the cashier's check by theft. Is John Deere subject to this defense? Why?
14. Stephens delivered 184 bushels of corn to Aubrey, for which he was to receive $478.23. Aubrey issued a check with $478.23 typewritten in numbers, and on the line customarily used to express the amount in words appeared "$100478 and 23 cts" imprinted in red with a check-writing machine. Before Stephens cashed the check, someone crudely typed "100" in front of the typewritten $478.23. When Stephens presented this check to the State Bank of Salem, Anderson, the manager, questioned Stephens. Anderson knew that Stephens had just declared bankruptcy and was not accustomed to making such large deposits. Stephens told Anderson he had bought and sold a large quantity of corn at a great profit. Anderson accepted the explanation and applied the monies to nine promissory notes, an installment payment, and accrued interest owed by Stephens. Stephens also received $2,000 in cash, with the balance deposited in his checking account.

Later that day, Anderson reexamined the check and discovered the suspicious appearance of the typewriting. He then contacted Aubrey, who said a check in that amount was suspicious, whereupon Anderson froze the transaction. When Aubrey stopped payment on the check, the bank sustained a $28,193.91 loss because Stephens could not be located. The bank then sued Aubrey for the loss. Explain who should bear the loss.

15. L&M Home Health Corporation (L&M) had a checking account with Wells Fargo Bank. L&M engaged Gentner and Company, Inc. (Gentner) to provide consulting services, and paid Gentner for services rendered with a check drawn on its Wells Fargo account in the amount of $60,000, dated September 23, 2009. Eleven days later, on October 4, 2009, L&M orally instructed Wells Fargo to stop payment on the check. Eleven days after that, on October 15, 2009, Gentner presented the L&M check to Wells Fargo for payment. On the same date the teller issued a cashier's check, payable to Gentner, in the amount of $60,000. On November 5, 2009, Wells Fargo placed a "stop payment order" on the cashier's check. On January 15, 2010, Gentner deposited the cashier's check at another bank, but it was not honored and was returned stamped "Payment Stopped." Gentner sues Wells Fargo for wrongful dishonor of the cashier's check. Is Gentner a holder in due course of the check? Discuss.

Chapter 27

LIABILITY OF PARTIES

The truth shall be thy warrant ...

SIR WALTER RALEIGH (1552–1618)

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Explain contractual liability, warranty liability, and liability of conversion.
2. Explain the liability of makers, acceptors, drawers, drawees, indorsers, and accommodation parties.
3. Identify and discuss the condition precedents to the liability of secondary parties.
4. Explain the methods by which liability on an instrument may be terminated.
5. Compare the warranties on transfer with the warranties on presentment.

The preceding chapters discussed the requirements of negotiability, the transfer of negotiable instruments, and the preferred position of a holder in due course. When parties issue negotiable instruments, they do so with the expectation that they, either directly or indirectly, satisfy their obligation under the instrument. Likewise, when a person accepts, indorses, or transfers an instrument, he incurs liability for the instrument under certain circumstances. This chapter examines the liability of parties arising out of negotiable instruments and the ways in which liability may be terminated.

Two types of potential liability are associated with negotiable instruments: contractual liability and warranty liability. The law imposes contractual liability on those who sign, or have a representative agent sign, a negotiable instrument. Because some parties to a negotiable instrument never sign it, they never assume contractual liability.

Warranty liability, on the other hand, is not based on signature; thus, it may be imposed on both signers and nonsigners. Warranty liability applies (1) to persons who transfer an instrument and (2) to persons who obtain payment or acceptance of an instrument.

CONTRACTUAL LIABILITY

they disclaim liability. No person is liable on an instrument unless she signs it herself or has it signed by a person whose signature binds her. Once the person signs the instrument, the person has prima facie liability on the instrument. The maker of a promissory note and the acceptor of a draft assume primary, or unconditional, liability, subject to valid claims and defenses, to pay according to the terms of the instrument at the time they sign it or as completed according to the rules for incomplete instruments, discussed in Chapter 26. Primary liability means that a party is legally obligated to pay without the holder's having to resort first to another party. Indorsers of all instruments incur secondary, or conditional, liability if the instrument is not paid. Secondary liability means that a party is legally obligated to pay only after another party, who is expected to pay, fails to do so. The liability of drawers of drafts and checks is also conditional because it is generally contingent upon the drawee's dishonor of the instrument. A drawee has no liability on the instrument until he accepts it.

An accommodation party signs the instrument to lend her credit to another party to the instrument and is a direct beneficiary of the value received. The liability of an accommodation party, who generally signs as a co-maker, or anomalous indorser, is determined by the capacity in which she signs. If the accommodation party signs as a maker, she incurs primary liability; if she signs as an anomalous indorser, she incurs secondary liability.

Signature

The word signature, as discussed in Chapter 24, is broadly defined to include any name, word, or mark, whether handwritten, typed, printed, or in any other form, made with the intention of authenticating an instrument. The signature may be made by the individual herself or on her behalf by the individual's authorized agent.

AUTHORIZED SIGNATURES

A person is obligated by a signature if the signature is her own or if it is signed by an agent with authority. Authorized agents often execute negotiable instruments on behalf of their principals. The agent is not liable if she is authorized to execute the instrument and does so properly (e.g., "Prince, principal, by Adams, agent"). If these two conditions are met, then only the principal is liable on the instrument. (For a comprehensive discussion of the principal-agent relationship, see Chapters 29 and 30.)

Occasionally, however, the agent, although fully authorized, uses an inappropriate form of signature that may mislead holders or prospective holders as to the identity of the obligor. Although incorrect signatures by agents assume many forms, they can be conveniently sorted into three groups. In each of these instances the intention of the original parties to the instrument is that the principal is to be liable on the instrument and the agent is not.

The first type occurs when an agent signs only his own name to an instrument, neither indicating that he is signing in a representative capacity nor stating the name of the principal. For example, Adams, the agent of Prince, makes a note on behalf of Prince but signs it "Adams." The signature does not indicate that Adams has signed in a representative capacity or that he has made the instrument on behalf of Prince. The second type of incorrect form occurs when an authorized agent indicates that he is signing in a representative capacity but does not disclose the name of his principal. For example, Adams, executing an instrument on behalf of Prince, merely signs it "Adams, agent." The third type of inappropriate signature occurs when an agent reveals both her name and her principal's name, but does not indicate that she has signed in a representative capacity. For example, Adams, signing an instrument on behalf of Prince, signs it "Adams, Prince."

In all three situations, the agent is liable on the instrument only to a holder in due course without notice that Adams was not intended to be liable. Because contract and agency law determine Prince's liability on the instrument, Prince is liable to all holders. Under Revised Article 3, if a representative (an agent) signs his name as the drawer of a check without indicating his representative status and the check is payable from an account of the represented person (the principal) who is identified on the check, the representative is not liable on the check if he is an authorized agent. Some courts reached this result under prior Article 3.

Practical Advice

If you are acting as an agent for another party, make sure that you properly sign any negotiable instrument by indicating your representative capacity and the identity of the principal. If you do that, you will avoid potential liability.

COHEN V. DISNER

36 CAL. APP.4TH 855, 42 CAL.RPTR.2D 782, 27 UCC REP.SERV.2D 540

FACTS Attorney Eliot Disner tendered a check for $100,100 to Sidney and Lynne Cohen. In drawing the check, Disner was serving as an intermediary for his clients, Irvin and Dorothea Kipnes, who owed the money to the Cohens as part of a settlement agreement. The Kipneses had given Disner checks totaling $100,100, which he had deposited into his professional corporation's client trust account. After confirming with the Kipneses' bank that their account held sufficient funds, Disner wrote and delivered a trust account check for $100,100 to the Cohens' attorney, with this note: "Please find $100,100 in settlement (partial) of Cohen v. Kipnes, et al[.] Per our agreement, delivery to you constitutes timely delivery to your clients." Also typed on the check was a notation identifying the underlying lawsuit.

Without Disner's knowledge, the Kipneses stopped payment on their checks, leaving insufficient funds in the trust account to cover the check to the Cohens. The trust account check therefore was not paid due to insufficient funds; the Kipneses declared bankruptcy; and the Cohens served Disner and his professional corporation (jointly, Disner) with demand for payment. The Cohens sought the amount written on the check plus a $500 statutory penalty. The trial court entered summary judgment for Disner, reasoning he is not liable on the check because he was a mere conduit or agent for transferring money from the Kipneses to the Cohens. The Cohens appeal from the judgment.

DECISION Judgment affirmed.

OPINION Ortega, J. [California] Civil Code § 1719, subdivision (a) provides in part that any person who draws a check that is dishonored due to insufficient funds shall be liable to the payee for the amount owing upon the check and treble damages of at least $100, not to exceed $500.

***

The Cohens do not appeal that Disner was a mere conduit or agent for transferring funds. They contend his representative status and motivations for transferring the funds are irrelevant. According to the Cohens, § 1719 imposes strict liability against the [drawer] of a check drawn on an account lacking sufficient funds.

Their contention of strict liability is based on legislative omission. While the UCC permits the [drawer] of a dishonored check to prove that he signed in a representative capacity and that the holder in due course took the check with notice of the representative's lack of liability (UCC, § 3-402, subd. (b)(2), sometimes hereinafter referred to as the "representative capacity" defense), § 1719 does not mention this defense.

***

Nothing in § 1719 affirmatively supports the Cohens' contention that the "representative capacity" and other UCC defenses were written out of § 1719. On the contrary, the express language of subdivision (a) compels us to the opposite conclusion.

***

By acknowledging there must be an enforceable obligation to pay, § 1719 echoes the UCC, which precludes recovery where the payee has no "right to enforce the obligation of a party to pay an instrument." (UCC, § 3-305, subd. (a).) If the [drawer] has no enforceable obligation to pay a dishonored check, there is no amount "owing upon that check" under the plain language of § 1719.

We reject the Cohens' assertion in their reply brief that the "representative capacity" defense is inapplicable here because the conditions of UCC § 3-402, subdivision (c) have not been met. That subdivision provides: "If a representative signs the name of the representative as drawer of a check without indication of the representative status and the check is payable from an account of the representative person who is identified on the check, the signer is not liable on the check if the signature is an authorized signature of the represented person."

According to the official code comment on that subdivision: "Subdivision (c) is directed at the check cases. It states that if the check identifies the represented person, the agent who signs on the signature line does not have to indicate agency status. Virtually all checks used today are in personalized form which identify the person on whose account the check is drawn. In this case, nobody is deceived into thinking that the person signing the check is meant to be liable. ***" [Citation.]

As we understand it, the Cohens' assertion is that because UCC § 3-402, subdivision (b)(2)'s "representative capacity" defense is "subject to" subdivision (c), Disner may not be relieved of liability unless he fulfills the requirements of the subdivision (c) defense. We do not read subdivisions (b)(2) and (c) in that restrictive manner. In our view, any finding of liability under UCC

§ 3–402, subdivision (b)(2) is subject to subdivision (c)'s additional exception that the representative is not liable if he signed his name on a personalized check identifying the account of the represented person. Subdivision (c) expands rather than contracts the representative's defenses.

We conclude that § 1719, by its clear and unambiguous language, permits the [drawer] of a dishonored check to prove he has no enforceable obligation to pay the check.

INTERPRETATION When a holder has notice that the drawer's signature is in the capacity of an agent, the drawer is not personally liable on the instrument.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION When should an agent be liable on an instrument that she signs?

UNAUTHORIZED SIGNATURES

An unauthorized signature, with two exceptions, is totally ineffective and does not bind anybody. Unauthorized signatures include both forgeries and signatures made by an agent without authority. Though generally not binding on the person whose name appears on the instrument, the unauthorized signature is binding upon the unauthorized signer, whether her own name appears on the instrument or not, to any person who in good faith pays or gives value for the instrument. Thus, if Adams, without authority, signed Prince's name to an instrument, Adams, not Prince, would be liable on the instrument. The rule, therefore, is an exception to the principle that only those whose names appear on a negotiable instrument can be liable on it.

Ratification of Unauthorized Signature An unauthorized signature may be ratified by the person whose name appears on the instrument. Although the ratification may relieve the actual signer from liability on the instrument, it does not itself affect any rights the person ratifying the signature may have against the actual signer.

Negligence Contributing to Forged Signature Any person who by his negligence substantially contributes to the making of a forged signature may not assert the lack of authority as a defense against a holder in due course or a person who in good faith pays the instrument or takes it for value or for collection. Nevertheless, if the person asserting the preclusion also fails to exercise reasonable care, Revised Article 3 adopts a comparative negligence standard.

Practical Advice

Exercise diligence to guard against forged signatures on your negotiable instruments.

Liability of Primary Parties

There is a primary party on every note: the maker. The maker's commitment is unconditional. No one, however, is unconditionally liable on a draft or check as issued. A drawee is not liable on the instrument unless he accepts it. If, however, the drawee accepts the draft, after which he is known as the acceptor, the drawee becomes primarily liable on the instrument. Acceptance or, in the case of a check, certification is the drawee's signed promise to pay a draft as presented. Presentment (i.e., a demand for payment) is not a condition to the holder's right to recover from parties with primary liability.

MAKERS

The maker of a note is obligated to pay the instrument according to its terms at the time of issuance or, if the instrument is incomplete, according to its terms when completed, as discussed in Chapter 26. The obligation of the maker is owed to a person entitled to enforce the instrument or to an indorser who paid the instrument.

Primary liability also applies to issuers of cashier's checks and to issuers of drafts drawn on the drawer (i.e., where the issuer is both the drawee and the drawer).

ACCEPTORS

A drawee has no liability on the instrument until she accepts it, at which time the drawee becomes an acceptor and, like the maker, primarily liable. The acceptor becomes liable on the draft according to its terms at the time of acceptance or as completed according to the rules for incomplete instruments as discussed in Chapter 26. Nevertheless, if the acceptor does not state the amount accepted and the amount of the draft is later raised, a subsequent holder in due course can enforce the instrument against the acceptor according to the terms at the time the holder in due course took possession. Thus, an acceptor should always indicate on the instrument the amount that it is accepting. The acceptor owes the obligation to pay a person entitled to enforce the instrument or to the drawer or an indorser who paid the draft under drawer's or indorser's liability.

An acceptance must be written on the draft. Having met this requirement, it may take many forms. It may be printed on the face of the draft, ready for the drawee's signature. It may consist of a rubber stamp, with the signature of the drawee added. It may be the drawee's signature, preceded by a word or phrase such as "Accepted," "Certified," or "Good." It may consist of nothing more than the drawee's signature. Normally, but by no means necessarily, an acceptance is written vertically across the face of the draft. It must not, however, contain any words indicating an intent to refuse to honor the draft. Furthermore, no writing separate from the draft and no oral statement or conduct of the drawee will convert the drawee into an acceptor.

Checks, when accepted, are said to be certified. Certification is a special type of acceptance consisting of the drawee bank's promise to pay the check when subsequently presented for payment.

The drawee bank has no obligation to certify a check, and its refusal to certify does not constitute dishonor of the instrument. If the drawee refuses to accept or pay the instrument, he may be liable to the drawer for breach of contract.

See Messing v. Bank of America, N.A. later in this chapter.

Liability of Secondary Parties

Parties with secondary (conditional) liability do not unconditionally promise to pay the instrument; rather, they engage to pay the instrument if the party expected to pay does not do so. The drawer is liable if the drawee dishonors the instrument. Indorsers (including the payee if he indorses) of an instrument are also conditionally liable; their liability is subject to the conditions of dishonor and notice of dishonor. If an instrument is not paid by the party expected to pay and the conditions precedent to the liability of a secondary party are satisfied, a secondary party is liable unless he has disclaimed liability or possesses a valid defense to the instrument.

DRAWERS

A drawer of a draft orders the drawee to pay the instrument and does not expect to pay the draft personally. The drawer is obligated to pay the draft only if the drawee fails to pay the instrument. The drawer of an unaccepted draft is obligated to pay the instrument upon its dishonor according to its terms at the time it was issued or, in the case of an incomplete instrument, according to the rules discussed in Chapter 26. Under Revised Article 3, the drawer's liability is contingent only upon dishonor and does not require notice of dishonor. The drawer's obligation on an unaccepted draft is owed to a person entitled to enforce the instrument or to an indorser who paid the instrument under indorser's liability.

If the draft has been accepted and the acceptor is not a bank, the obligation of the drawer to pay the instrument is then contingent upon both dishonor of the instrument and notice of dishonor; the drawer's liability in this instance is equivalent to that of an indorser.

DAVIS V. WATSON BROTHERS PLUMBING, INC.

COURT OF CIVIL APPEALS OF TEXAS, DALLAS, 1981

615 S.W.2D 844

FACTS Arnett Lee presented a $152.38 check for cashing to the plaintiff, liquor store operator Troy Davis. After Davis gave Lee the cash, Lee requested a bottle of scotch and a six-pack of beer. As Davis turned to fill the order, a thief stole $110.00 of the $152.38. Lee immediately contacted the defendant-drawer of the check, Watson Brothers Plumbing, Inc., and notified them of the loss. The defendant then issued another check for $152.38 and stopped payment on the first check held by Davis. Davis brought this action against the defendant for the full face amount of the check.

OPINION Akin, J. "Holder" is defined in Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. [U.C.C.] § 1.201(20) as: "[A] person who is in possession of a document of title or an instrument or an investment security drawn, issued or indorsed to him or to his order or to bearer or in blank.” Under the undisputed facts, Lee, the payee indorsed the check in blank to plaintiff, who is now in possession of the check. Thus, as a matter of law, plaintiff is a “holder” under the code [U.C.C.] § 3.413(2), [Revised § 3–414(b)] which sets forth the rights of a holder, [and] provides, in pertinent part, that: “The drawer engages that upon dishonor of the draft *** he will pay the amount of the draft to the holder or to any indorser who takes it up.” Thus, the defendant is liable to the holder of the dishonored check unless the defendant has raised a valid defense against the holder.

Defendant here asserts that it may raise want or failure of consideration in the transaction between plaintiff and Lee, its payee, as a defense to plaintiff’s enforcement of the instrument against it. We disagree.

[U.C.C.] § 3.408 [Revised §§ 3–303(b), 3–305] provides, in pertinent part that: “Want or failure of consideration is a defense against any person not having the rights of a holder in due course ***.” The comments to § 3.408 provide that: “‘Consideration’ to what the obligor has received for his obligation, and is important only on the question of whether his obligation can be enforced against him.” Thus, any holder can enforce the obligation of a draft against the drawer regardless of whether the holder gave anything in consideration for the draft to his indorser. The drawer can assert as a defense to enforcement of the draft want or failure of consideration only to the extent such defense lies against the payee of the draft. Thus, the fact that a holder remote to the drawer’s transaction with the payee did not give full consideration for the draft is not a defense available to the drawer. [Citation.]

This is true because the drawer’s sole obligation on the check is to pay it according to its tenor. Consequently, the fact that the transfer of the check by the payee to the transferee is without consideration is immaterial to the drawer’s obligation and is not a defense available to the drawer against the holder.

The rationale of this, and other decisions, reaching the same conclusion, is that the maker or drawer of an instrument admittedly owes the money and he should not be permitted to bring into the controversy equities of parties with which he has no connection. [Citation.]

Because defendant here may not assert want or failure of consideration in the transaction between plaintiff and Lee, and because defendant has asserted no other defense against plaintiff, plaintiff is entitled to recover the full face value of the check under § 3–413(b) [Revised § 3–414] of the Texas Uniform Commercial Code.

INTERPRETATION The drawer’s liability is contingent upon dishonor of the instrument.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Should the drawer be permitted to raise defenses of other parties to the instrument? Explain.

INDORSERS

An indorser promises that, upon dishonor of the instrument and notice of dishonor, she will pay the instrument according to the terms of the instrument at the time it was indorsed or, if an incomplete instrument when indorsed, according to its terms when completed, as discussed in Chapter 26. Once again, this obligation is owed to a person entitled to enforce the instrument or to a subsequent indorser who paid the instrument under indorser’s liability.

EFFECT OF ACCEPTANCE

When a draft is accepted by a bank, the drawer and all prior indorsers are discharged. The liability of indorsers subsequent to certification is not affected. When the bank accepts a draft, it should withhold from the drawer’s account funds sufficient to pay the instrument. Because the bank is primarily liable on its acceptance and has the funds, whereas the drawer does not, the discharge is reasonable.

DISCLAIMER OF LIABILITY BY SECONDARY PARTIES

Both drawers and indorsers may disclaim their normal conditional liability by drawing or indorsing an instrument “without recourse.” However, drawers of checks may not disclaim contractual liability. The use of the qualifying words without recourse is understood to place purchasers on notice that they may not rely on the credit of the person using this language. A person drawing or indorsing an instrument in this manner does not incur the normal contractual liability of a drawer or indorser to pay the instrument, but he may nonetheless be liable for breach of warranty.

Practical Advice

If you take an instrument from another party, make sure that she unqualifiedly indorses the instrument to add her liability to it.

CONDITIONS PRECEDENT TO LIABILITY

A condition precedent is an event or events that must occur before liability arises. The condition precedent to the liability of the drawer of an unaccepted draft is dishonor. Conditions precedent to the liability of any indorser or the drawer of an accepted draft by a nonbank are dishonor and notice of dishonor. If the conditions to secondary liability are not met, a party's conditional obligation on the instrument is discharged, unless the conditions are excused.

Dishonor Dishonor generally involves the refusal to pay an instrument when it is presented. Presentment is a demand made by or on behalf of a person entitled to enforce the instrument for (1) payment by the drawee or other party obligated to pay the instrument or (2) acceptance by the drawee of a draft. The return of any instrument for lack of necessary indorsements or for failure of the presentment to comply with the terms of the instrument, however, is not a dishonor.

What constitutes dishonor varies depending on the type of instrument and whether presentment is required.

1. Note: A demand note is dishonored if the maker does not pay it on the day of presentment. If the note is payable at a definite time and (a) the terms of the note require presentment or (b) the note is payable at or through a bank, the note is dishonored if it is not paid on the date it is presented or its due date, whichever is later. All other time notes need not be presented and are dishonored if they are not paid on their due dates. Nevertheless, because makers are primarily liable on their notes, their liability is not affected by failure of proper presentment.
2. Drafts: An unaccepted draft (other than a check, discussed below) that is payable on demand is dishonored if presentment is made and it is not paid on the date presented. A time draft presented for payment is due on the due date or presentment date, whichever is later. A time draft presented for acceptance prior to its due date is dishonored if it is not accepted on the day presented. Refusal to accept a demand instrument is not a dishonor, although acceptance may be requested. Of course, if an instrument is payable at a certain time period after acceptance or sight, a refusal to accept the draft on the day presented is a dishonor.

An accepted demand draft is dishonored if the acceptor (who is primarily liable on the instrument) does not pay it on the day presented for payment. An accepted time draft is dishonored if it is not paid on the due date for payment or on the presentment date, whichever is later.

Drawers, with the exception of drafts accepted by a bank, are not discharged from liability by a delay in presentment. Once an instrument has been properly presented and dishonored, a drawer becomes liable to pay the instrument. As previously indicated, drawers and prior indorsers are discharged from liability when a draft is accepted by a bank.

3. Checks: If a check is presented for payment directly to the payor/drawee bank for immediate payment, a refusal to pay the check on the day presented constitutes dishonor. In the more common situation of a check being presented through the normal collection process, a check is dishonored if the payor bank makes timely return of the check, sends timely notice of dishonor or nonpayment, or becomes accountable for the amount of the check (until that payment has been made, the check is dishonored). As more fully explained in Chapter 28, under Article 4 a bank in most instances has a midnight deadline (before midnight of the next banking day) in which to decide whether to honor or dishonor an instrument. Thus, depending on the number of banks involved in the collection process, the time for dishonor can vary greatly.

Delay in presentment discharges an indorser only if the instrument is a check and it is not presented for payment or given to a depository bank for collection within thirty days after the day the indorsement was made. The same rule does not apply, however, to a drawer. If a person entitled to enforce a check fails to present a check within thirty days after its date, the drawer will be discharged only if the delay deprives the drawer of funds because of the suspension of payments by the drawee bank such as would result from a bank failure. This discharge is quite unlikely because of federal bank insurance but would be available where an account is not fully insured because it exceeds $100,000 or because the account doesn't qualify for deposit insurance.

See Messing v. Bank of America, N.A. later in this chapter.

Practical Advice

Make sure that you timely and properly present any negotiable instrument that you possess for acceptance or payment.

Notice of Dishonor The obligation of an indorser of any instrument and of a drawer of a draft accepted by a nonbank is not enforceable unless the indorser or drawer is given notice of dishonor or the notice is otherwise excused. Thus, lack of proper notice discharges the liability of an indorser; for this purpose a drawer of a draft accepted by a party other than a bank is treated as an indorser. Notice of dishonor is not required to retain the liability of drawers of unaccepted drafts. In addition, as previously mentioned, a drawer is discharged when a draft is accepted by a bank. In short, a drawer's liability usually is not contingent upon receiving notice of dishonor, whereas an indorser's liability is.

Notice of dishonor is normally given by the holder or by an indorser who has received notice. For example, Michael makes a note payable to the order of Phyllis; Phyllis indorses it to Arthur; Arthur indorses it to Bambi; and Bambi indorses it to Henry, the last holder. Henry presents it to Michael within a reasonable time, but Michael refuses to pay. Henry may give notice of dishonor to all secondary parties: Phyllis, Arthur, and Bambi. If he is satisfied that Bambi will pay him or if he does not know how to contact Phyllis or Arthur, he may notify only Bambi, who then must see to it that Arthur or Phyllis is notified, or she will have no recourse. Bambi may notify either or both. If she notifies Arthur only, Arthur will have to see to it that Phyllis is notified, or Arthur will have no recourse. When properly given, notice benefits all parties who have rights on the instrument against the party notified. Thus, Henry's notification to Phyllis operates as notice to Phyllis by both Arthur and Bambi. Likewise, if Henry notifies only Bambi and Bambi notifies Arthur and Phyllis, then Henry has the benefit of Bambi's notification of Arthur and Phyllis. Nonetheless, it would be advisable for Henry to give notice to all prior parties because Bambi may be insolvent and thus may not bother to notify Arthur or Phyllis.

If, in the above example, Henry were to notify Phyllis alone, Arthur and Bambi would be discharged. Because she has no claim against Arthur or Bambi, who indorsed after she did, Phyllis would have no ground for complaint. It cannot matter to Phyllis that she is compelled to pay Henry rather than Arthur. Therefore, subsequent parties are permitted to skip intermediate indorsers if they want to discharge them and are willing to look solely to prior indorsers for recourse.

Any necessary notice must be given by a bank before midnight on the next banking day following the banking day on which it receives notice of dishonor. Any nonbank with respect to an instrument taken for collection must give notice within thirty days following the day on which it received notice. In all other situations, notice of dishonor must be within thirty days following the day on which dishonor occurred. For instance, Donna draws a check on Youngstown Bank payable to the order of Pablo; Pablo indorses it to Andrea; Andrea deposits it to her account in Second Chicago National Bank; Second Chicago National Bank properly presents it to Youngstown Bank, the drawee; and Youngstown dishonors it because the drawer, Donna, has insufficient funds on deposit to cover it. Youngstown has until midnight of the following day to notify Second Chicago National, Andrea, or Pablo of the dishonor. Second Chicago

National then has until midnight on the day after receipt of notice of dishonor to notify Andrea or Pablo. That is, if Second Chicago National received the notice of dishonor on Monday, it would have until midnight on Tuesday to notify Andrea or Pablo. If it failed to notify Andrea, it could not charge the item back to her. Andrea, in turn, has thirty days after receipt of notice of dishonor to notify Pablo. Donna, a drawer of an unaccepted draft, is not discharged from liability for failure to receive notice of dishonor.

Frequently, notice of dishonor is given by returning the unpaid instrument with an attached stamp, ticket, or memorandum stating that the item was not paid and requesting that the recipient make good on it. But because the purpose of notice is to give knowledge of dishonor and to inform the secondary party that he may be held liable on the instrument, any kind of notice that informs the recipient of potential liability is sufficient. No formal requisites are imposed—notice may be given by any commercially reasonable means, including oral, written, or electronic communication. An oral notice, while sufficient, is inadvisable because it may be difficult to prove. Notice of dishonor must reasonably identify the instrument.

Practical Advice

Upon dishonor of any instrument that you have presented for payment or acceptance, give proper notice, wherever possible, to all prior parties.

Presentment and Notice of Dishonor Excused

The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) excuses presentment for payment or acceptance if (1) the person entitled to enforce the instrument cannot with reasonable diligence present the instrument; (2) the maker or acceptor of the instrument has repudiated the obligation to pay, is dead, or is in insolvency proceedings; (3) the terms of the instrument do not require presentment to hold the indorsers or drawer liable; (4) the drawer or indorser has waived the right of presentment; (5) the drawer instructed the drawee not to pay or accept the draft; or (6) the drawee was not obligated to the drawer to pay the draft.

Notice of dishonor is excused if the terms of the instrument do not require notice to hold the party liable or if notice has been waived by the party whose obligation is being enforced. Moreover, a waiver of presentment is also a waiver of notice of dishonor. Finally, delay in giving notice of dishonor is excused if the delay is caused by circumstances beyond the control of the person giving notice and that person exercised reasonable diligence in giving notice after the cause of the delay ceased to exist.

LIABILITY FOR CONVERSION

Conversion is a tort by which a person becomes liable in damages because of his wrongful control over the personal property of another. The law applicable to conversion of personal property applies to instruments. An instrument is so converted if the instrument “is taken by transfer, other than by negotiation, from a person not entitled to enforce the instrument or a bank makes or obtains payment with respect to the instrument for a person not entitled to enforce the instrument or receive payment.” (Section 3-420(a).) Examples of conversion thus would include a

Business Law in Action

Checks made payable to “cash” are, by definition, bearer instruments. As such, they are negotiated by simple transfer of possession—their negotiation does not require an indorsement. Nonetheless, most banks instruct their tellers to obtain indorsements on all checks, including those made payable to Cash. Why?

Obtaining indorsements on all checks is a good policy for a bank to employ in order to enhance efficiency and to provide the bank extra protection in the collection process. This blanket policy makes the procedure for verifying indorsements routine, eliminating tellers' need to search the “Pay to” line on each check to ascertain whether a given check is made payable to Cash and therefore exempt from the indorsement requirement. Further, if all checks are to be indorsed, then no order paper will accidentally go without indorsement.

Probably more important, though, is the bank's interest in protecting itself with the indorser liability rules. Every person who signs a check, including an indorser, is at least secondarily liable upon it. Unless an indorser qualified her indorsement by adding such language as “without recourse,” she is liable to pay the check if it is dishonored.

In a worst-case scenario, the bank's customer deposits a check made payable (by a third party) to Cash, but the check is returned because the drawer's account has insufficient funds. Although the bank's depositor agreement with the customer permits it to debit her account, her account may not have enough funds to cover the bounced check. If the dishonored check had been unqualifiedly indorsed by the customer, the bank can give notice of dishonor and seek payment from the customer's other assets by way of a lawsuit. The bank would not have this right of recourse if the check had not been unqualifiedly indorsed by the customer.

Putting sufficient funds on “hold” in the customer's account pending collection of third-party checks can provide some of the same protection. But none of these safeguards is foolproof, and several redundant policies are preferable to suffering the loss.

Termination of Liability

Eventually, every commercial transaction must end, terminating the potential liabilities of the parties to the instrument. The Code specifies the various methods by and extent to which the liability of any party, primary or secondary, is discharged. “Discharge” means that the obligated individual is released from liability on the instrument due to either Article 3 or contract law. The Code also specifies when the liability of all parties is discharged. No discharge of a party is effective against a subsequent holder in due course, however, unless she has notice of the discharge when taking the instrument. In addition, discharge of liability is not always final; liability under certain circumstances (e.g., coming into possession of a subsequent holder in due course) can be revived. Discharge applies to the individual and not the instrument, and discharge of individuals may occur at different points in time. Moreover, a person’s liability may be discharged with regard to one party but not to another.

PAYMENT

The most obvious and common way for a party to discharge liability on an instrument is to pay a party entitled to enforce the instrument. An instrument is paid to the extent that payment is made by or for a person obligated to pay the instrument and to a person entitled to enforce the instrument. Subject to three exceptions, such payment results in a discharge even though it is made with the knowledge of another person’s claim to the instrument, unless such other person either supplies adequate indemnity or obtains an injunction in a proceeding to which the holder is made a party. It should be noted, however, that the discharge is only to the extent of the payment.

Practical Advice

The person making payment should take possession of the instrument or have it canceled—marked “paid” or “canceled”—so that it cannot pass to a subsequent holder in due course against whom his discharge would be ineffective.

TENDER OF PAYMENT

Any party liable on an instrument who makes proper tender of full payment to a person entitled to enforce the instrument when or after payment is due is discharged from liability for interest after the due date. If the party’s tender is refused, she is not discharged from liability for the face amount of the instrument or for any interest accrued until the time of tender. Moreover, if an instrument requires presentment and the obligor is ready and able to pay the instrument when it is due at the place of payment specified in the instrument, such readiness is the equivalent of tender.

Occasionally a person entitled to enforce an instrument will refuse a tender of payment for reasons known only to himself. It may be that he believes his rights exceed the amount of the tender or that he desires to enforce payment against another party. In any event, his refusal of the tender wholly discharges to the extent of the amount of tender every party who has a right of recourse against the party making tender.

CANCELLATION AND RENUNCIATION

The Code provides that a person entitled to enforce an instrument may discharge the liability of any party to an instrument by an intentional voluntary act, such as by canceling the instrument or the signature of the party or parties to be discharged, by mutilating or destroying the instrument, by obliterating a signature, or by adding words indicating a discharge. A party entitled to enforce an instrument may also renounce his rights by a writing, signed and delivered, promising not to sue or otherwise renouncing rights against the party. Like other discharges, however, a written renunciation is of no effect against a subsequent holder in due course who takes without knowledge of the renunciation.

Cancellation or renunciation is effective even without consideration.

LIABILITY BASED ON WARRANTY

Article 3 imposes two types of implied warranties: (1) transferor’s warranties and (2) presenter’s warranties. Although these warranties are effective whether or not the transferor or presenter signs the instrument, the extension of the transferor’s warranty to subsequent holders does depend on whether one or the other has indorsed the instrument. Like other warranties, these may be disclaimed by agreement between immediate parties. In the case of an indorser, his disclaimer of transfer warranties and presentment warranties must appear in the indorsement itself and be effective, except with respect to checks. Such disclaimers must be specific, such as “without warranty.” The use of “without recourse” will only disclaim contract liability, not warranty liability.

Warranties on Transfer

Any person who transfers an instrument, whether by negotiation or assignment, and receives consideration makes certain transferor’s warranties. Any consideration sufficient to support a contract will support transfer warranties. If transfer is by delivery alone, warranties on transfer run only to the immediate transferee. If the transfer is made by indorsement, whether qualified or unqualified, the transfer warranty runs to “any subsequent transferee.” Transfer means that the delivery of possession is voluntary. The warranties of the transferor are as follows.

ENTITLEMENT TO ENFORCE

The first warranty that the Code imposes on a transferor is that the transferor is a person entitled to enforce the instrument. This warranty “is in effect a warranty that there are no unauthorized or missing indorsements that prevent the transferor from making the transferee a person entitled to enforce the instrument.” The following example illustrates this rule. Mitchell makes a note payable to the order of Penelope. A thief steals the note from Penelope, forges Penelope’s indorsement, and sells the instrument to Aaron. Aaron is not entitled to enforce the instrument because the break in the indorsement chain prevents him from being a holder. If Aaron transfers the instrument to Judith for consideration, Judith can hold Aaron liable for breach of warranty. The warranty action is important to Judith because it enables her to hold Aaron liable, even if Aaron indorsed the note “without recourse.”

AUTHENTIC AND AUTHORIZED SIGNATURES

The second warranty imposed by the Code is that all signatures are authentic and authorized. In the example presented above, this warranty would also be breached. If, however, the signature of a maker, drawer, drawee, acceptor, or indorser not in the chain of title is unauthorized, there is a breach of this warranty but no breach of the warranty of entitlement to enforce.

NO ALTERATION

The third warranty is the warranty against alteration. Suppose that Maureen makes a note payable to the order of the payee in the amount of $100. The payee, without authority, alters the note so that it appears to be drawn for $1,000 and negotiates the instrument to Lois, who buys it without knowledge of the alteration. Lois, indorsing “without recourse,” negotiates the instrument to Kyle for consideration. Kyle presents the instrument to Maureen, who refuses to pay more than $100 on it. Kyle can collect the difference from Lois, for although her qualified indorsement saves Lois from liability to Kyle on the indorsement contract, she is liable to him for breach of warranty. If Lois had not qualified her indorsement, Kyle would be able to recover against her on the basis of either warranty or the indorsement contract.

NO DEFENSES

The fourth transferor’s warranty imposed by the Code is that the instrument is not subject to a defense or claim in recoupment of any party. A claim in recoupment, as discussed in Chapter 26, is a counterclaim that arose from the transaction that gave rise to the instrument. Suppose that Madeline, a minor and a resident of a state where minors’ contracts for nonnecessaries are voidable, makes a note payable to bearer in payment of a motorcycle. Pierce, the first holder, negotiates it to Iola by mere delivery. Iola indorses it and negotiates it to Justin, who unqualifiedly indorses it to Hector. All negotiations are made for consideration. Because of Madeline’s minority (a real defense), Hector cannot recover upon the instrument against Iola. Hector therefore recovers against Justin or Iola on either the breach of warranty that no valid defenses exist to the instrument or the indorsement contract. Justin, if he is forced to pay Hector, can in turn recover against Iola on either a breach of warranty or the indorsement contract. Justin, however, cannot recover against Pierce. Pierce is not liable to Justin as an indorser because he did not indorse the instrument. Although Pierce, as a transferor, warrants that there are no defenses good against him, this warranty extends only to his immediate transferee, Iola. Therefore, Justin cannot hold Pierce liable. Iola, however, can recover from Pierce on either warranty or contract.

NO KNOWLEDGE OF INSOLVENCY

Any person who transfers a negotiable instrument warrants that he has no knowledge of any insolvency proceedings instituted with respect to the maker, acceptor, or drawer of an unaccepted instrument. Insolvency proceedings include bankruptcy and “any assignment for the benefit of creditors or other proceedings intended to liquidate or rehabilitate the estate of the person involved.” Thus, if Marcia makes a note payable to bearer, and the first holder, Taylor, negotiates it for consideration without indorsement to Ursula, who then negotiates it for consideration by qualified indorsement to Valerie, both Taylor and Ursula warrant that they do not know that Marcia is in bankruptcy. Valerie could not hold Taylor liable for breach of warranty, however, because Taylor’s warranty runs only in favor of her immediate transferee, Ursula, because Taylor transferred the instrument without indorsement. If Valerie could hold Ursula liable on her warranty, Ursula could thereupon hold Taylor, her immediate transferor, liable. Figure 27-1 summarizes liabilities on transfer.

Warranties on Presentment

Any party who pays or accepts an instrument must do so in strict compliance with the orders that instrument contains. For example, the payment or acceptance must be made to a person entitled to receive payment or acceptance, the amount paid or accepted must be the correct amount, and the instrument must be genuine and unaltered. If the payment or acceptance is incorrect, the payor or acceptor potentially will incur a loss. In the case of a note, a maker who pays the wrong person will not be discharged from his obligation to pay the correct person. If the maker pays too much, the excess comes out of his pocket. If a drawee pays the wrong person, he generally cannot charge the drawer’s account; if the drawee pays too much, he generally cannot charge the drawer’s account for the excess. Indorsers who pay an instrument may make similar incorrect payments.

After paying or accepting an instrument to the wrong person, for the wrong amount, or in some other incorrect way, does the person who incorrectly paid or accepted have any recourse against the person who received the payment or acceptance? The Code addresses this critical question by providing that [I]f an instrument has been paid or accepted by mistake ... the person paying or accepting may, to the extent permitted by the law governing mistake and restitution, (i) recover the payment from the person to whom or for whose benefit payment was made or (ii) in the case of acceptance, may revoke the acceptance.

Liability on Transfer

Nevertheless, this payment or acceptance is final and may not be asserted against a person who took the instrument in good faith and for value or who in good faith changed position in reliance on the payment or acceptance, unless there has been a breach of the implied warranties on presentment. What warranties are given by presenters depend upon who is the payor or acceptor. The greatest protection is given to drawees of unaccepted drafts, while all other payors receive significantly less protection.

DRAWEEES OF UNACCEPTED DRAFTS

A drawee of an unaccepted draft (including uncertified checks), who pays or accepts in good faith, receives a presentment warranty from the person obtaining payment or acceptance and from all prior transferors of the draft. These parties warrant to the drawee making payment or accepting the draft in good faith that (1) the warrantor is a person entitled to enforce the draft, (2) the draft has not been altered, and (3) the warrantor has no knowledge that the drawer's signature is unauthorized.

Entitled to Enforce Presenters of unaccepted checks give the same warranty of entitlement to enforce to persons who pay or accept as is granted to transferees under the transferor's warranty. Thus, the presenter warrants that she is a person entitled to enforce the instrument. As explained above, this warranty extends to the genuineness and completeness of the indorser's signatures but not to the signature of the drawer or maker. It is "in effect a warranty that there are no unauthorized or missing indorsements."

For example, if Donnese draws a check to Peter or order, and Peter's indorsement is forged, the bank does not follow Donnese's order in paying such an item and therefore cannot charge her account (except in the impostor or fictitious payee situations discussed in Chapter 25). The bank, however, can recover for breach of the presenter's warranty of entitlement to enforce the instrument from the person who obtained payment of the check from the bank. Although it should know the signatures of its own customers, the bank should not be expected to know the signatures of payees or other indorsers of checks; the bank, therefore, should not have to bear this loss.

No Alteration Presenters also give a warranty of no alteration. For example, if Dolores makes a check payable to Porter's order in the amount of $30, and the amount is fraudulently raised to $30,000, the drawee bank cannot charge to the drawer's account the $30,000 it pays out on the check. The drawee bank can charge the drawer's account only $30, because that is all the drawer ordered it to pay. Nonetheless, because the presenter's warranty of no alteration has been breached, the drawee bank can collect the difference from all warrantors.

TRAVELERS INDEMNITY CO. v. STEDMAN

U.S. DISTRICT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, 1995
895 F.SUPP. 742, 27 UCC REP. SERV.2D 1347

FACTS In November 1988, the plaintiff, Travelers Indemnity Co., issued a comprehensive crime insurance policy to the American Lung Association (ALA), insuring the ALA against financial losses due to employee fraud or dishonesty. Shortly thereafter, in October of 1989, the ALA hired the defendant, Nancy Stedman, as the Director of Bureau Affairs. In this capacity, Stedman embezzled $129,624.23 of ALA funds by writing seventeen checks against the ALA's account with Merrill, Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith (Merrill Lynch). Stedman deposited six of these checks into her personal checking account with the other defendant, Main Line Federal Savings Bank (Main Line). The checks were subsequently presented to and honored by Merrill Lynch. These checks bore two forged drawer's signatures and at least one forged indorsement. To recover its losses in paying the ALA's insurance claim, Travelers sued Stedman, Main Line, and Merrill Lynch.

Merrill Lynch subsequently advanced a claim for indemnity and for breach of presentment warranties against Main Line. Main Line seeks judgment on the pleadings or partial summary judgment on Merrill Lynch's claims.

DECISION Judgment for Main Line.

OPINION Reed, J. Liability, or loss allocation, under the Uniform Commercial Code ("UCC") for honoring negotiable instruments containing forged or unauthorized signatures is governed by whether the forgery at issue is that of a [drawer's] signature or of the indorsement of a payee or holder. [Citations.] Generally, a drawee bank is strictly liable to its customer, the drawer, for payment over either a forged [drawer's] signature or a forged indorsement. [Citation.] *** Moreover, when a drawee bank honors an instrument bearing a forged [drawer's] signature, that payment is final in favor of a holder in due course or one who has in good faith changed his position in reliance on the payment. UCC § 3–418. As a result, where the only forgery is of the signature of the [drawer] and not of the indorsement, the negligence of a holder in taking the forged instrument will not allow a drawee bank to shift liability to a prior collecting or depository bank, unless such negligence amounts to a lack of good faith, or unless the payee bank returns the instrument or sends notice of dishonor within the limited time provided by § 4–301 of the UCC. [Citation.] But where the only forged signature is an indorsement, the drawee normally may pass liability back through the collection chain to the depository or collecting bank, or to the forger herself if she is available, by a claim for breach of presentment warranties. [Citation.]

Regrettably, the drafters of the UCC failed to address the allocation of liability for honoring instruments containing both a forged [drawer’s] signature and a forged indorsement, so called “double forgeries.” [Citation.] Nor have the state courts of Pennsylvania addressed this issue. Based on a thorough examination of the rationales behind the allocation of liability in “single forgery” cases, however, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit concluded that double forgeries should be treated as though only containing forged [drawer’s] signatures. [Citations.] *** Therefore, this court concludes that under Pennsylvania’s adoption of the UCC, checks containing both a forged [drawer’s] signature and a forged indorsement should be treated, for loss allocation purposes, as though bearing only a forged [drawer’s] signature.

The final count of the crossclaim by Merrill Lynch is a claim for an alleged breach of presentment warranties under [UCC] § 3–417. As the court illustrated above, the loss allocation rules of the UCC permit a payee bank to shift liability to a depository bank via a claim for breach of presentment warranties if, and only if, the checks at issue contain only forged indorsements. Should the checks in fact also bear forged [drawer’s] signatures, then a depository or collecting bank is immunized from liability for having honored such checks unless the depository or collecting bank failed to meet the requirements of the final payment rule codified in [UCC] § 3–418. [Citation.] Moreover, checks bearing dual forgeries are treated as though containing only forged [drawer’s] signatures. Thus, because it is uncontested that all Group Two checks bear forged [drawer’s] signatures, liability for honoring these checks may only be assessed under the loss allocation rules relevant to checks bearing only forged [drawer’s] signatures. In other words, Merrill Lynch is precluded by the operation of law from asserting a claim for breach of presentment warranties under the loss allocation scheme of the UCC.

INTERPRETATION The presentment warranties extend to the genuineness of the indorser’s signatures but not to the signature of the drawer.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Should the warranties for negotiable instruments treat the forgeries of drawers’ signatures differently from those of indorsers? Explain.

GENUINENESS OF DRAWER’S SIGNATURE

Presenters lastly warrant that they have no knowledge that the signature of the drawer is unauthorized. Thus, unless the presenter has knowledge that the drawer’s signature is unauthorized, the drawee bears the risk that the drawer’s signature is unauthorized.

MESSING V. BANK OF AMERICA, N.A.

COURT OF APPEALS OF MARYLAND, 2003
373 MD. 672, 821 A.2D 22, 50 U.C.C. REP. SERV. 2D 1

FACTS Messing had a check in the amount of $976.00 from Toyson J. Burruss, the drawer. Instead of depositing the check into his bank account, Messing presented the check for payment at Mr. Burruss’ bank, Bank of America, the drawee. The teller, by use of a computer, confirmed the availability of funds on deposit, and placed the check into the computer’s printer slot. The computer stamped certain data on the back of the check, including the time, date, amount of the check, account number, and teller number.

The computer also placed a hold on the amount of $976.00 in the customer’s account. The teller gave the check back to the Messing, who indorsed it. The teller then asked for Messing’s identification. He presented his driver’s license and a major credit card. The teller took the indorsed check from Messing and manually inscribed the driver’s license information and certain credit card information on the back of the check.

At some point during the transaction, the teller counted out $976.00 in cash. She asked if Messing was a customer of Bank of America. He stated that he was not. The teller returned the check to Messing and requested, consistent with bank policy when cashing checks for noncustomers, that he place his thumbprint on the check. Messing refused and the teller informed him that she would be unable to complete the transaction without his thumbprint. In response, the teller gave Messing back the check, released the hold on the customer's funds, voided the transaction in the computer, and replaced the cash.

Rather than take the check to his own bank and deposit it there, or return it to Burruss, Messing filed an action against Bank of America in the Circuit Court for Baltimore City. Messing claimed that the Bank had violated the Maryland Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) and had violated his personal privacy when the teller asked him to place an "inkless" thumbprint on the face of the check at issue.

The Circuit Court entered summary judgment in favor of the bank. The Court of Special Appeals upheld the Circuit Court's decision in favor of the bank. Messing petitioned this Court for a writ of certiorari which was granted.

DECISION Judgment of the Court of Special Appeals is affirmed.

OPINION Harrell, J. Under the U.C.C., a check is simply an order to the drawee bank to pay the sum stated, signed by the makers and payable on demand. Receipt of a check does not, however, give the recipient a right against the bank. The recipient may present the check, but if the drawee bank refuses to honor it, the recipient has no recourse against the drawee.

Absent a special relationship, a non-customer has no claim against a bank for refusing to honor a presented check. [Citation.] ***

A check or other draft does not of itself operate as an assignment of funds in the hands of the drawee available for its payment, and the drawee is not liable on the instrument until the drawee accepts it.

Once a bank accepts a check, under § 3-409, it is obliged to pay on the check under § 3-413. Thus, the relevant question in terms of any rights Petitioner had against the Bank turns not on the reasonableness of the thumbprint identification, but rather upon whether the Bank accepted the check when presented as defined by § 3-409. ***

Respondent Bank of America argues that the intermediate appellate court correctly found that it did not "accept" the check as that term is defined in § 3-409(a). We agree.

The mere fact that the teller's computer printed information on the back of the check does not, as Petitioner contends, amount by itself to an acceptance.

The question is whether requiring a thumbprint constitutes a request for "reasonable identification" under § 3-501(b)(2)(ii). If it is "reasonable," then under § 3-501(b)(3)(ii) the refusal of the Bank to accept the check from Petitioner did not constitute dishonor. If, however, requiring a thumbprint is not "reasonable" ***, then the refusal to accept the check may constitute dishonor. ***

***

Nowhere does the language of UCC. § 3-501(b)(2) suggest that "reasonable identification" is limited to information [Respondent] can authenticate at the time presentment is made. Rather, all that is required is that the "person making presentment must ... give reasonable identification." UCC. § 3-501(b)(2). While providing a thumbprint signature does not necessarily confirm identification of the checkholder at presentment—unless of course the drawee bank has a duplicate thumbprint signature on file—it does assist in the identification of the checkholder should the check later prove to be bad. It therefore serves as a powerful deterrent to those who might otherwise attempt to pass a bad check. That one method provides identification at the time of presentment and the other identification after the check may have been honored, does not prevent the latter from being "reasonable identification" for purposes of C.L. § 3-501(b)(2).

In short, when a bank cashes a check over the counter, it assumes the risk that it may suffer losses for counterfeit documents, forged endorsements, or forged or altered checks. Nothing in the Uniform Commercial Code forces a bank to assume such risks. See Barnhill, 503 U.S. 393, 398-99, 118 L. Ed. 2d 39, 112 S. Ct. 1386 (1992); § 3-408. To the extent that banks are willing to cash checks over the counter, with reasonable identification, such willingness expands and facilitates the commercial activities within the State. ***

Because the reduction of risk promotes the expansion of commercial practices, we believe that the direction of § 1-102(2)(b) requires that we conclude that a bank's requirement of a thumbprint placed upon a check presented over the counter by a non-customer is reasonable. [Citation.] As the intermediate appellate court well documented, the Thumbprint Program is part of an industry wide response to the growing threat of check fraud. Prohibiting banks from taking reasonable steps to protect themselves from losses could result in banks refusing to cash checks of non-customers presented over the counter at all, a result which would be counter to the direction of § 1-102(2)(b).

As a result of this conclusion, Bank of America in the present case did not dishonor the check when it refused to accept it over the counter.

INTERPRETATION A bank is not required to accept a check from a noncustomer and, if it chooses to do so, is entitled to demand reasonable identification.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the court fairly decide this case? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What options may Messing now pursue? Explain.

ALL OTHER PAYORS

In all instances other than a drawee of an unaccepted draft or uncertified check, the only presentment warranty that is given is that the warrantor is a person entitled to enforce the instrument or is authorized to obtain payment on behalf of the person entitled to enforce the instrument. This warranty is given by the person obtaining payment and prior transferors and applies to the presentment of notes and accepted drafts for the benefit of any party obliged to pay the instrument, including an indorser. It also applies to presentment of dishonored drafts if made to the drawer or an indorser.

The warranties of no alteration and authenticity of the drawer’s signature are not given to all other payors. These warranties are not necessary for makers and drawers as they should know their own signatures and the terms of their instruments. Similarly, indorsers have already warranted the authenticity of signatures and that the instrument was not altered. Finally, acceptors should know the terms of the instrument when they accepted it; moreover, they did receive the full presentment warranties when they as drawees accepted the draft upon presentment.

Liability Based on Warranty

Ethical Dilemma

Who Gets to Pass the Buck on a Forged Indorsement?

FACTS Tom West goes to Libertyville Currency Exchange to cash a check for $3,525. The check belongs to West's friend, John Reston, who accompanies him. The check is a certified check drawn on NationsBank and made payable to the order of "Piscitello Enterprises, Inc." and indorsed on the reverse side by "Joe Piscitello."

Because West often transacts business at the currency exchange, the clerk, Rita Bosworth, recognizes him as soon as he walks in. West indorses the check and hands it to Bosworth, who dispenses the cash. West immediately turns to Reston, giving him some money.

Later, Libertyville Currency Exchange deposits the check with First National Bank, which eventually files a claim against the currency exchange because the indorsement "Joe Piscitello" has been forged. The currency exchange pays the claim, then brings an action against West.

During the trial, Bosworth testifies that she saw Reston hand some money back to West when the two men turned away from her. West vehemently denies this. He says that he received no money in exchange for helping Reston.

Libertyville Currency Exchange claims that West breached his warranty of good title under the transferor's warranty by obtaining payment for a check on which the payee's indorsement was forged. West, on the other hand, argues that he signed the check to lend his name to another party and that he is thus an accommodation party. He maintains that he is not liable to Libertyville Currency Exchange because NationsBank did not give him timely notice that the signature on the check was forged and also because the Currency Exchange paid the check, thus releasing him from liability as an accommodation indorser.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. How could the bank have prevented this problem? Is a clerk responsible for knowing exactly who is cashing a check and who gave value for it? What steps, if any, could Rita Bosworth have taken to verify the check's indorsements?
2. Did Tom West have a responsibility to ensure that his friend's check was legitimate? Should he have inquired about the indorsement?
3. What issues relating to the transfer of a negotiable instrument are involved here? What liability does the bank face? What liability does Tom West face? What warranties apply to each party?

Chapter Summary

CONTRACTUAL LIABILITY

General Principles

Liability on the Instrument no person has contractual liability on an instrument unless her signature appears on it

Signature a signature may be made by the individual herself or by her authorized agent

- Authorized Signatures an agent who executes a negotiable instrument on behalf of his principal is not liable if the instrument is executed properly and as authorized
- Unauthorized Signatures include forgeries and signatures made by an agent without proper power; are generally not binding on the person whose name appears on the instrument but are binding on the unauthorized signer

Liability of Primary Parties

Primary Liability absolute obligation to pay a negotiable instrument

Makers the maker guarantees that he will pay the note according to its original terms

Acceptors a drawee has no liability on the instrument until she accepts it; the drawee then becomes primarily liable

- Acceptance a drawee's signed engagement to honor the instrument
- Certification acceptance of a check by a bank

Liability of Secondary Parties

Secondary (Conditional) Liability obligation to pay a negotiable instrument that is subject to conditions precedent

Indorsers and Drawers if the instrument is not paid by a primary party and if the conditions precedent to the liability of secondary parties are satisfied, indorsers and drawers are secondarily (conditionally) liable unless they have disclaimed their liability or have a valid defense to the instrument

Effect of Acceptance when a draft is accepted by a bank, the drawer and all prior indorsers are discharged from contractual liability

Disclaimer by Secondary Parties a drawer (except of a check) or indorser may disclaim liability by a qualified drawing or indorsing ("without recourse")

Conditions Precedent to Liability

- Drawer liability is generally contingent only upon dishonor and does not require notice
- Indorser liability is contingent upon dishonor and notice of dishonor

Liability of Conversion

Tort Liability conversion occurs (1) when a drawee refuses to return a draft that was presented for acceptance, (2) when any person refuses to return an instrument after he dishonors it, or (3) when an instrument is paid on a forged indorsement

Termination of Liability

Effect of Discharge potential liability of parties to the instrument is terminated

Discharge

- Performance
- Tender of Payment for interest, costs, and attorneys' fees
- Cancellation
- Renunciation

Warranties on Transfer

Parties

- Warrantor any person who transfers an instrument and receives consideration makes certain transferor's warranties
- Beneficiary if the transfer is by delivery, the warranties run only to the immediate transferee; if the transfer is by indorsement, the warranties run to any subsequent holder who takes the instrument in good faith

Warranties

- Entitled to Enforce
- All Signatures Are Authentic and Authorized
- No Alteration
- No Defenses
- No Knowledge of Insolvency

Warranties on Presentment

Parties

- Warrantors all people who obtain payment or acceptance of an instrument as well as all prior transferors give the presenter's warranties
- Beneficiary the presenter's warranties run to any person who in good faith pays or accepts an instrument

Warranties

- Entitled to Enforce
- No Alteration
- Genuineness of Drawer's Signature

Questions

1. $900.00 Smalltown, Illinois

November 15, 2010

The undersigned promises to pay to the order of John Doe, Nine Hundred Dollars with interest from date of note. Payment to be made in five monthly installments of One Hundred Eighty Dollars, plus accrued interest beginning on December 1, 2010. In the event of default in the payment of any installment or interest on installment date, the holder of this instrument may declare the entire obligation due and owing and proceed forthwith to collect the balance due on this instrument.

On December 18, no payment having been made on the note, Doe indorsed and delivered the instrument to Todd to secure a preexisting debt in the amount of $800.

On January 18, 2011, Todd brought an action against Acton and Phi Corporation, Acton's principal, to collect the full amount of the instrument with interest. Acton defended on the basis that he signed the instrument in a representative capacity and that Doe had failed to deliver the consideration for which the instrument had been issued. Phi Corporation defended on the basis that it did not sign the instrument and that its name does not appear on the instrument.

For what amount, if any, are Acton and Phi Corporation liable?

2. While employed as a night watchman at the place of business of A. B. Cate Trucking Company, Fred Fain observed that the office safe had been left unlocked. It contained fifty payroll checks, which were ready for distribution to employees two days later. The checks had all been signed by the sole proprietor, Cate. Fain removed five of these checks and two blank checks that were also in the safe. Fain forged the indorsements of the payees on the five payroll checks and cashed them at local supermarkets. He then filled out one of the blank checks, making himself payee, and forged Cate's signature as drawer. After cashing that check at a supermarket, Fain departed by airplane to Jamaica. The six checks were promptly presented for payment to the drawee bank, the Bank of Emanon, which paid each one. Shortly thereafter, Cate learned about the missing payroll checks and forgeries and demanded that the Bank of Emanon credit his account with the amount of the six checks.

Must the Bank comply with Cate's demand? What are the Bank's rights, if any, against the supermarkets? You may assume that the supermarkets cashed all of the checks in good faith.

3. A negotiable promissory note executed and delivered by B to C passed in due course to and was indorsed in blank by C, D, E, and F.

G, the present holder, strikes out D's indorsement. What is the liability of D on her indorsement?

4. On June 15, 2002, Joanne, for consideration, executed a negotiable promissory note for $10,000, payable to Robert on or before June 15, 2010. Joanne subsequently suffered financial reverses. In January 2010, Robert, on two occasions, told Joanne that he knew she was having a difficult time, that he, Robert, did not need the money, and that the debt should be considered completely canceled with no other act or payment being required. These conversations were witnessed by three persons, including Larry. On March 15, 2010, Robert changed his mind and indorsed the note for value to Larry. The note was not paid by June 15, 2010, and Larry sued Joanne for the amount of the note. Joanne defended on the ground that Robert had canceled the debt and renounced all rights against Joanne and that Larry had notice of this fact. Has the debt been properly canceled? Explain.

5. Tate and Fitch were longtime friends. Tate was a man of considerable means; Fitch had encountered financial difficulties. To bolster his failing business, Fitch desired to borrow $60,000 from Farmers Bank of Erehwon. To accomplish this, he persuaded Tate to aid him in the making of a promissory note by which it would appear that Tate had the responsibility of maker, but with Fitch's agreeing to pay the instrument when due. Accordingly, they executed the following instrument:

December 1, 2010

Thirty days after date and for value received, I promise to pay to the order of Frank Fitch the sum of $60,000.

/s/ Timothy Tate

On the back of the note, Fitch indorsed, "Pay to the order of Farmers Bank of Erehwon /s/ Frank Fitch" and delivered it to the bank in exchange for $60,000.

- a. When the note was not paid at maturity, may the bank, without first demanding payment by Fitch, recover in an action on the note against Tate?
- b. If Tate voluntarily pays the note to the bank, may he then recover on the note against Fitch, who appears as an indorser?
6. Alpha orally appointed Omega as his agent to find and purchase for him a 1930 Dodge automobile in good condition, and Omega located such a car. Its owner, Roe, agreed to sell and deliver the car on January 10, 2010, for $9,000. To evidence the purchase price, Omega mailed to Roe the following instrument:

$9,000.00 December 1, 2009

We promise to pay to the order of bearer Nine Thousand Dollars with interest from date of this instrument on or before January 10, 2010. This note is given in consideration of John Roe's transferring title to and possession of his 1930 Dodge automobile.

(Signed) Omega, agent

Smith stole the note from Roe's mailbox, indorsed Roe's name on the note, and promptly discounted it with Sunset Bank for $8,700. Not having received the note, Roe sold the car to a third party. On January 10, 2010, the bank, having discovered all the facts, demanded payment of the note from Alpha and Omega. Both refused payment.

- a. What are Sunset Bank's rights with regard to Alpha and Omega?
- b. What are Sunset Bank's rights with regard to Roe and Smith?
7. In payment of the purchase price of a used motorboat that had been fraudulently misrepresented, Young signed and delivered to Armstrong his negotiable note in the amount of $2,000 due October 1, with Selby as an accommodation co-maker. Young intended to use the boat for his fishing business. Armstrong indorsed the note in blank preparatory to discounting it. Tillman stole the note from Armstrong and delivered it to McGowan on July 1 in payment of a past-due debt in the amount of $600 that he owed to McGowan, with McGowan making up the difference by giving Tillman his check for $800 and an oral promise to pay Tillman an additional $600 on October 1.

When McGowan demanded payment of the note on December 1, both Young and Selby refused to pay the note because the note had not been presented for payment on its due date and because Armstrong had fraudulently misrepresented the motorboat for which the note had been executed.

What are McGowan's rights, if any, against Young, Selby, Tillman, and Armstrong, respectively?

8. On July 1, Anderson sold D'Aveni, a jeweler, a necklace containing imitation gems, which Anderson fraudulently represented to be diamonds. In payment for the necklace, D'Aveni executed and delivered to Anderson her promissory note for $25,000 dated July 1 and payable on December 1 to Anderson's order with interest at 12 percent per annum.

The note was thereafter successively indorsed in blank and delivered by Anderson to Bylinski, by Bylinski to Conrad, and by Conrad to Shearson, who became a holder in due course on August 10. On November 1, D'Aveni discovered Anderson's fraud and immediately notified Anderson, Bylinski, Conrad, and Shearson that she would not pay the note when it became due. Bylinski, a friend of Shearson, requested that Shearson release him from liability on the note, and Shearson, as a favor to Bylinski and for no other consideration, struck out Bylinski's indorsement.

On November 15, Shearson, who was solvent and had no creditors, indorsed the note to the order of Frederick, his father, and delivered it to Frederick as a gift. At the same time, Shearson told Frederick of D'Aveni's statement that D'Aveni would not pay the note when it became due. Frederick presented the note to D'Aveni for payment on December 1, but D'Aveni refused to pay. Thereafter, Frederick gave due notice of dishonor to Anderson, Bylinski, and Conrad.

What are Frederick's rights, if any, against Anderson, Bylinski, Conrad, and D'Aveni on the note?

9. Saul sold goods to Bruce, warranting that the goods were of a specified quality. The goods were not of the quality warranted, however, and Saul knew this at the time of the sale. Bruce drew and delivered a check payable to Saul and drawn on Third National Bank in the amount of the purchase price. Bruce subsequently discovered the goods were faulty and stopped payment on the check. Can Saul recover payment from Bruce? Why?

Case Problems

- 10. R & A Concrete Contractors, Inc., executed a promissory note that identifies both R & A Concrete and Grover Roberts as its makers. On the reverse side of the note, the following appears: “X John Ament Sec. & Treas.” National Bank of Georgia, the payee, now sues both R & A Concrete and Ament on the note. What rights does National Bank have against R & A and Ament?
- 11. On August 10, 2008, Theta Electronic Laboratories, Inc. executed a promissory note to George and Marguerite

Thomson. Six other individuals, Gerald Exten, Emil O’Neil, and James Hane, and their wives also indorsed the note. The Thomsons then transferred the note to Hane on November 26, 2010. Although a default occurred at this time, it was not until April 2011 that Hane gave notice of the dishonor and made a demand for payment on the Extens as indorsers. Are the Extens liable under their indorser’s liability?

BANK DEPOSITS, COLLECTIONS, AND FUNDS TRANSFERS

Money is a poor man's credit card.

MARSHALL McLuhan, MACLEAN'S, JUNE 1971

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Identify and explain the various stages of and parties to the collection of a check.
2. Identify and explain the duties of collecting banks.
3. Explain the relationship between a payor bank and its customers.
4. Define a consumer electronic fund transfer, identify the various types of electronic fund transfers, and outline the major provisions of the Electronic Funds Transfer Act.
5. Explain wholesale fund transfers and discuss how they operate.

In today's society, most goods and services are bought and sold without a physical transfer of "money." Credit cards, charge accounts, and various deferred payment plans have made cash sales increasingly rare. But even credit sales must ultimately be settled—when they are, payment is usually made by check rather than with cash. If the parties to a sales transaction happen to have accounts at the same bank, a transfer of credit is easily accomplished. In the vast majority of cases, however, the parties do business at different banks. Then the buyer's check must journey from the seller-payee's bank (the depository bank), where the check is deposited by the seller for credit to his account, to the buyer-drawer's bank (the payor bank) for payment. In this collection process, the check frequently passes through one or more other banks (intermediary banks), each of which must accurately record its passing, before it may be collected. Our banking system has developed a network to handle the collection of checks and other instruments.

In recent years, the amount of payment made by electronic funds transfers has increased at an astounding rate. The dollar volume of commercial payments made by wire transfer far exceeds the dollar amount made by checks or credit cards. In addition, electronic funds transfers have become exceedingly popular with consumers. Consumer electronic funds transfers are covered by the federal Electronic Funds Transfer Act (EFTA); nonconsumer (wholesale) electronic transfers are covered by Article 4A of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

This chapter will cover both the bank deposit-collection system and electronic funds transfers.

BANK DEPOSITS AND COLLECTIONS

Article 4 of the UCC, entitled “Bank Deposits and Collections,” provides the principal rules governing the bank collection process. The end result of the collection process is either the payment of the check or the dishonor (refusal to pay) of the check by the drawee bank. As items in the bank collection process are essentially those covered by Article 3, “Commercial Paper,” and to a lesser extent by Article 8, “Investment Securities,” these Articles often apply to a bank collection problem. In addition, Articles 3 and 4 are supplemented and, at times, preempted by federal law: the Expedited Funds Availability Act and its implementing Federal Reserve Regulation (Regulation CC). This section will cover the collection of an item through the banking system and the relationship between the payor bank and its customer.

Collection of Items

When a person deposits a check in his bank (the depository bank), the bank credits the individual’s account by the amount of the check. This initial crediting is provisional. Normally, a bank does not permit a customer to draw funds against a provisional credit; by permitting its customer to thus draw, the bank will have given value and, provided it meets the other requirements, will be a holder in due course. Under the customer’s contract with his bank, the bank is obligated to make a reasonable effort to obtain payment of all checks deposited for collection. When the amount of the check has been collected from the payor bank (the drawee), the credit becomes a final credit.

The Competitive Equality Banking Act has expedited the availability of funds by establishing maximum time periods for which a bank may hold (and thereby deny a customer access to the funds represented by) various types of instruments. Under the Act, (1) cash deposits, wire transfers, government checks, the first $100 of a day’s check deposits, cashier’s checks, and checks deposited in one branch of a depository institution and drawn on the same or another branch of the same institution must clear by the next business day; (2) local checks must clear within one intervening business day; and (3) nonlocal checks must clear in no more than four intervening business days.

If the payor bank (the drawee bank) does not pay the check for some reason, such as a stop payment order or insufficient funds in the drawer’s account, the depository bank reverses the provisional credit to the account, debits his account for that amount, and returns the check to him with a statement of the reason for nonpayment. If, in the meantime, the customer has been permitted to draw against the provisional credit, the bank may recover the payment from him.

In some cases, the bank involved is both the depository bank and the payor bank. In most cases, however, the depository and payor banks are different, in which event the bank collection aspects of Article 4 come into play. When the depository and payor banks differ, it is necessary for the item to pass from one to the other, either directly through a clearinghouse or through one or more intermediary banks (banks, other than the depository or payor bank, that are involved in the collection process, such as one of the twelve Federal Reserve Banks), as illustrated in Figure 28-1. A clearinghouse is an association, composed of banks or other payors, whose members settle accounts with each other on a daily basis. Each member of the clearinghouse forwards all deposited checks drawn on other members and receives from the clearinghouse all checks drawn on it. Balances are adjusted and settled each day.

COLLECTING BANKS

A collecting bank is any bank, other than the payor bank, handling an item for payment. In the usual situation, when the depository and payor banks are different, the depository bank gives a provisional credit to its customer, transfers the item to the next bank in the chain, and receives a provisional credit or “settlement” from it; the process repeats until the item reaches the payor bank, which gives a provisional settlement to its transferor. When the item is paid, all the provisional settlements given by the respective banks in the chain become final, and the particular transaction has been completed. Because this procedure simplifies bookkeeping by necessitating only one entry if the item is paid, no adjustment is necessary on the books of any of the banks involved.

If, however, the payor bank does not pay the check, it returns the item, and each intermediary or collecting bank reverses the provisional settlement or credit it previously gave to its forwarding bank. Ultimately, the depository bank will charge (remove the provisional credit from) the account of the customer who deposited the item. The customer must then seek recovery from the indorsers or the drawer.

A collecting bank is an agent or subagent of the owner of the item until the settlement becomes final. Unless otherwise provided, any credit given for the item initially is provisional. Once settled, the agency relationship changes to one of debtor-creditor. The effect of this agency rule is that the risk of loss remains with the owner and that any chargebacks go to her, not to the collecting bank.

Bank Collections

All collecting banks have certain responsibilities and duties in collecting checks and other items. These will now be discussed.

Duty of Care A collecting bank must exercise ordinary care in handling an item transferred to it for collection. The steps it takes in presenting an item or sending it for presentment are of particular importance. It must act within a reasonable time after receipt of the item and must choose a reasonable method of forwarding the item for presentment. It also is responsible for using care in routing and in selecting intermediary banks or other agents.

HONEYCUTT V. HONEYCUTT

COURT OF SPECIAL APPEALS OF MARYLAND, 2002

<http://caselaw.lp.findlaw.com/data2/marylandstatecases/cosa/2003/68s02.pdf>

FACTS Ron Honeycutt was the president, treasurer, and sole stockholder of Sheldon, Inc. (Sheldon's Lounge), a bar located in Baltimore City. Christine Honeycutt was, at one time, Ron Honeycutt's wife and held the position of vice president and secretary of Sheldon. On July 1, 1984, Ron Honeycutt and Christine Honeycutt opened a business checking account with Maryland National Bank, now Bank of America, in the name of Sheldon's Lounge. At that time, Ron Honeycutt and Christine Honeycutt executed a signature card for the account, on which they checked off the box requiring only one signature to transact any business on the account. Ron Honeycutt and Christine Honeycutt were the authorized signatories on the account.

Ron Honeycutt died February 10, 2000. On February 15, 2000, Christine Honeycutt withdrew funds in the amount of $13,066.48 from Sheldon's account. At the time of withdrawal, an employee of the bank retrieved and reviewed the signature card on file with the bank in order to verify Christine Honeycutt's authority to direct and conduct transactions on Sheldon's account. The bank did not inquire as to Christine Honeycutt's status with respect to Sheldon, nor did it inquire of anyone at Sheldon as to her status. At the time, the bank was unaware that Ron Honeycutt had died.

On March 13, 2000, Sheldon commenced an action against Christine Honeycutt and the bank, asserting claims for conversion, breach of contract, and negligence for permitting the allegedly unauthorized withdrawal. On May 22, 2001, the bank filed a motion for summary judgment arguing that at the time Christine Honeycutt withdrew funds from Sheldon's account, she was an authorized signatory on the account and, therefore, the bank committed no legal wrong when it permitted the withdrawal. The circuit court granted the bank's motion for summary judgment. Sheldon appealed.

DECISION The summary judgment is affirmed.

OPINION Thieme, J. Sheldon argues that the Bank breached its duty of care "by failing to make an adequate inquiry as to the authority of Christine Honeycutt to conduct banking on behalf of the business." We disagree.

"A bank and its customers enjoy a debtor/creditor relationship in which the rights and liabilities of each are contractual." [Citations.] "Implicit in the contract [between the bank and customer] is the duty of the bank to use ordinary care in disbursing the depositor's funds." [Citations.] ***

A signature card may constitute a contract between a bank and its customer. [Citation.] ("The signature card constituted the contract between the parties and, subject to the statutory schemes, regulates their rights and duties."); [Citations.]

*** The plain language of the signature card established that both Ron and Christine Honeycutt were authorized signatories able to transact business on Sheldon's account. Moreover, the signature card expressly and unambiguously provided that the Bank is authorized to recognize and rely upon either of Ron or Christine Honeycutt's signatures on checks, drafts and orders for the payment of money, the withdrawal of funds, or the transaction of any business to Sheldon's account.

When Christine Honeycutt withdrew funds from Sheldon's account, we find, the Bank did not breach any standard of care owed to appellants. The Bank exercised reasonable care when it inspected the signature card on file for Sheldon's account and verified that Christine Honeycutt was an authorized signatory on the account. Moreover, we are persuaded that no further inquiry was required as the Bank was legally entitled to release the funds to Christine Honeycutt based upon the express authority created by the signature card. Thus, because there was no genuine dispute as to any material fact, i.e., that the 1984 signature card was the authoritative document on file with the Bank, we find that the lower court was correct to conclude, as a matter of law, that the signature card controlled the transaction and was correct to enter summary judgment in favor of appellee.

INTERPRETATION A bank and its customers enjoy a debtor-creditor relationship in which the rights and liabilities of each are contractual.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did any of the parties act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the court's decision? Explain.

Duty to Act Timely Closely related to the collecting bank's duty of care is its duty to act in a timely manner. A collecting bank acts timely in any event if it takes proper action, such as forwarding or presenting an item before the "midnight deadline" following its receipt of the item, notice, or payment. If the bank adheres to this standard, the timeliness of its action cannot be challenged; should it, however, take a reasonably longer time, the bank bears the burden of proof in establishing timeliness. The midnight deadline is the midnight of the banking day following the banking day on which the bank received the item or notice. Thus, if a bank receives a check on Monday, it must take proper action by midnight on the next banking day, or Tuesday. A banking day means the part of a day on which a bank is open to the public for carrying on substantially all of its banking functions.

The midnight deadline presents a problem because it takes time to process an item through a bank—whether it be the depository, intermediary, or payor bank. If a day's transactions are to be completed without overtime work, the bank must either close early or fix an earlier cutoff time for the day's work. Accordingly, the Code provides that for the purpose of allowing time to process items, prove balances, and make the bookkeeping entries necessary to determine its position for the day, a bank may fix an afternoon hour of 2:00 P.M. or later as a cutoff point for handling money and items and for making entries on its books. Items received after the cutoff hour fixed as the close of the banking day are considered to have been received at the opening of the next banking day, and the time for taking action and for determining the bank's midnight deadline begins to run from that point.

Recognizing that everyone involved will be greatly inconvenienced if an item is not paid, the Code provides that unless otherwise instructed, a collecting bank in a good faith effort to secure payment may, in the case of a specific item drawn on a payor other than a bank, waive, modify, or extend the time limits, but not in excess of two additional banking days. This extension may be made without the approval of the parties involved and without discharging drawers or indorsers. This section does not apply to checks and other drafts drawn on a bank. The Code also authorizes delay when communications or computer facilities are interrupted as a result of blizzard, flood, hurricane, or other disaster; the suspension of payments by another bank; war; emergency conditions; failure of equipment; or other circumstances beyond the bank's control. Nevertheless, such delay will be excused only if the bank exercises such diligence as the circumstances require.

Indorsements An item restrictively indorsed with words such as “pay any bank” is locked into the bank collection system, and only a bank may acquire the rights of a holder. When forwarding an item for collection, a bank normally indorses the item “pay any bank,” regardless of the type of indorsement, if any, that the item carried at the time of receipt. This serves to protect the collecting bank by making it impossible for the item to stray from regular collection channels.

If the item had no indorsement when the depository bank received it, the bank nonetheless becomes a holder of the item at the time it takes possession of the item for collection if the customer was a holder at the time of delivery to the bank and, if the bank satisfies the other requirements of a holder in due course, it will become a holder in due course in its own right. In return, the bank warrants to the collecting banks, the payor, and the drawer that it has paid the amount of the item to the customer or deposited that amount to the customer's account. This rule speeds up the collection process by eliminating the necessity of returning checks for indorsement when the depository bank knows they came from its customers.

Warranties Customers and collecting banks give substantially the same warranties as those given by parties under Article 3 upon presentment and transfer, which were discussed in Chapter 27. In addition, under Article 4, customers and collecting banks may give encoding warranties. Each customer or collecting bank who transfers an item and receives a settlement or other consideration warrants to his transferee and any subsequent collecting bank that (1) the person is entitled to enforce the item; (2) all signatures are authentic and authorized; (3) the item has not been altered; (4) he is not subject to any defense or claim in recoupment; and (5) he has no knowledge of any insolvency proceeding involving the maker or acceptor or the drawer of an unaccepted draft. Moreover, each customer or collecting bank who obtains payment or acceptance from a drawee on a draft as well as each prior transferor warrants to the drawee who pays or accepts the draft in good faith that (1) she is a person entitled to enforce the draft; (2) the item has not been altered; and (3) she has no knowledge that the signature of the drawer is unauthorized.

Processing of checks is now done by Magnetic Ink Character Recognition (MICR). When a check is deposited, the depository bank magnetically encodes the check with the amount of the check (all checks are preencoded with the drawer's account number and the designation of the drawee bank), after which the processing occurs automatically, without further human involvement. Despite its efficiency, the magnetic encoding of checks has created several problems. The first is the problem a bank encounters when paying a postdated instrument prior to its date. The Revision changes prior law by providing that the drawee may debit the drawer's account, unless the drawer timely informs the drawee that the check is postdated. A second difficulty arises when a depositing bank or its customer who encodes her own checks miscodes a check. Revised Article 4 provides that such an encoder warrants to any subsequent collecting bank and to the payor that information on a check is properly encoded. If the customer does the encoding, the depository bank also makes the warranty.

Final Payment The provisional settlements made in the collection chain are all directed toward final payment of the item by the payor bank. From this turnaround point in the collection process, the proceeds of the item begin their return flow, and provisional settlements become final. For example, a customer of the California Country State Bank may deposit a check drawn on the State of Maine Country National Bank. The check may then take a course such as follows: from the California Country State Bank to a correspondent bank in San Francisco, to the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, to the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, to the payor bank. Provisional settlements are made at each step. When the payor finally pays the item, the proceeds begin to flow back over the same course.

The critical question, then, is the point at which the payor has paid the item, because this not only commences the payment process but also affects questions of priority between the payment of an item and actions such as the filing of a stop payment order against it. Under the Code, final payment occurs when the payor bank first does any of the following: (1) pays an item in cash; (2) settles an item and does not have the right to revoke the settlement through statute, clearinghouse rule, or agreement; or (3) makes a provisional settlement and does not revoke it within the time and in the manner permitted by statute, clearinghouse rule, or agreement.

PAYOR BANKS

The payor or drawee bank, under its contract of deposit with the drawer, agrees to pay to the payee or his order a check issued by the drawer, provided that the order is not countermanded, and that there are sufficient funds in the drawer's account.

The tremendous increase in volume of bank collections has necessitated deferred posting procedures, whereby items are sorted and proved on the day of receipt but are not posted to customers' accounts or returned until the next banking day. The UCC not only approves such procedures but also establishes specific standards to govern their application to the actions of payor banks.

When a payor bank that is not also a depository bank receives a demand item other than for immediate payment over the counter, it must either return the item or give its transferor a provisional settlement before midnight of the banking day on which the item is received. Otherwise, the bank becomes liable to its transferor for the amount of the item, unless it has a valid defense, such as breach of a presentment warranty.

If the payor bank gives the provisional settlement as required, it has until the midnight deadline to return the item or, if the item is held for protest or is otherwise unavailable for return, to send written notice of dishonor or nonpayment. After doing this, the bank is entitled to revoke the settlement and recover any payment it has made. Should it fail to return the item or send notice before its midnight deadline, the payor bank will be accountable for the amount of the item unless it has a valid defense for its inaction. If a check is for $2,500 or more, federal law (Regulation CC) requires special notice of nonpayment—the paying bank must give notice to the depository bank by 4:00 P.M. on the second business day following the banking day on which the check was presented to the paying bank. This regulation does not, however, relieve the paying bank of returning the check in compliance with Article 4.

There are innumerable reasons for a bank to dishonor an item and return it or send notice. The following situations are the most common: the drawer or maker may have no account or may have funds insufficient to cover the item, a signature on the item may be forged, or the drawer or maker may have stopped payment on the item.

Relationship between Payor Bank and Its Customer

The relationship between a payor bank and its checking account customer is primarily the product of their contractual arrangement. Although the parties have relatively broad latitude in establishing the terms of their agreement and in altering the provisions of the Code, a bank may not validly (1) disclaim responsibility for its lack of good faith, (2) disclaim responsibility for its failure to exercise ordinary care, or (3) limit its damages for a breach comprising such lack or failure. The parties may by agreement, however, determine the standards by which the bank's responsibility is to be measured, if these standards are not clearly unreasonable.

PAYMENT OF AN ITEM

A payor owes a duty to its customer, the drawer, to pay checks properly drawn by him on an account having funds sufficient to cover the items. A check or draft, however, is not an assignment of the drawer's funds that are in the drawee's possession. Moreover, as discussed in Chapter 27, the drawee is not liable on a check until it accepts the item. Therefore, the holder of a check has no right to require the drawee bank to pay it, whether the drawer's account contains sufficient funds or not. But if a payor bank improperly refuses payment when presented with an item, it will incur a liability to the customer from whose account the item should have been paid. If the customer has adequate funds on deposit, and there is no other valid basis for the refusal to pay, the bank is liable to its customer for damages proximately caused by the wrongful dishonor. Liability is limited to actual damages proved and may include damages for arrest, prosecution, or other consequential damages.

When a payor bank receives an item properly payable from a customer's account but the funds in the account are insufficient to pay it, the bank may (1) dishonor the item and return it or (2) pay the item and charge its customer's account, even though the actions create an overdraft. The item authorizes or directs the bank to make the payment and hence carries with it an enforceable implied promise to reimburse the bank. Further, the customer may be liable to pay the bank a service charge for its handling of the overdraft or to pay interest on the amount of the overdraft. A customer, however, is not liable for an overdraft if the customer did not sign the item or benefit from the proceeds of the item.

A payor bank is under no obligation to its customer to pay an uncertified check that is more than six months old. This rule reflects the usual banking practice of consulting a depositor before paying a "stale" item (one more than six months old) on her account. The bank is not required to dishonor such an item, however; and if the bank makes payment in good faith, it may charge the amount of the item to its customer's account.

Practical Advice

Be sure to present checks you hold before they become stale.

SUBSTITUTE CHECK

The Check Clearing for the 21st Century Act (also called Check 21 or the Check Truncation Act) permits banks to truncate original checks, which means removing an original paper check from the check collection or return process and sending in lieu of it (1) a substitute check or (2) by agreement, information relating to the original check (including data taken from the magnetic ink character recognition [MICR] line of the original check or an electronic image of the original check). The Act sets forth a statutory framework under which a substitute check is the legal equivalent of an original check for all purposes, if the substitute check (1) accurately represents all of the information on the front and back of the original check as of the time the original check was truncated; and (2) bears the legend: “This is a legal copy of your check. You can use it the same way you would use the original check.” The Act defines a substitute check as a paper reproduction of the original check that (1) contains an image of the front and back of the original; (2) bears an MICR containing all the information appearing on the MICR line of the original check; (3) conforms, in paper stock, dimension, and otherwise, with generally applicable industry standards for substitute checks; and (4) is suitable for automated processing in the same manner as the original. Thus, a substitute check is basically a copy of the original check that shows both the front and back of the original check.

The law does not require banks to accept checks in electronic form, nor does it require banks to use the new authority granted by the Act to create substitute checks. On the other hand, parties cannot refuse to accept a substitute check that meets the Act’s requirements. The Act permits banks to replace paper checks during the check collection process with either digital or paper substitutes. Thus, banks can employ digital images or image reduction documents (IRDs), which are documents that include the front, rear, and all MICR data in one image. However, the Act does not provide legal equivalence for electronic check or image presentment.

The ultimate objective of the Act is to make the collection process more efficient and much faster (transferring digital files within seconds rather than days) and to enhance fraud detection by accelerating return of dishonored checks.

STOP PAYMENT ORDERS

A check drawn on a bank is an order to pay a sum of money and an authorization to charge the amount to the drawer’s account. The customer, or any person authorized to draw on the account, may countermand this order, however, by means of a stop payment order. If the order does not come too late, the bank is bound by it. If the bank inadvertently pays a check over a valid stop order, it is prima facie liable to the customer, but only to the extent of the customer’s loss resulting from the payment. The burden of establishing the fact and amount of loss is on the customer.

To be effective, a stop payment order must be received in time to provide the bank a reasonable opportunity to act on it. An oral stop order is binding on the bank for only fourteen calendar days. If the customer confirms an oral stop order in writing within the fourteen-day period, the order is effective for six months and may be renewed in writing for additional six-month periods.

Practical Advice

If you wish to stop payment on a check, contact your bank as soon as possible, and confirm in writing an oral stop payment order within fourteen days.

The fact that a drawer has filed a stop payment order does not automatically relieve her of liability. If the bank honors the stop payment order and returns the check, the holder may bring an action against the drawer. If the holder qualifies as a holder in due course, personal defenses that the drawer might have to such an action would be of no avail.

LEIBLING, P.C. v. MELLON PSFS (NJ) NATIONAL ASSOCIATION

SUPERIOR COURT OF NEW JERSEY, LAW DIVISION, SPECIAL CIVIL PART, CAMDEN COUNTY, 1998
710 A.2D 1067, 311 N.J. SUPER. 651, 35 UCC PER. SERV. 2D 590

FACTS Mr. Scott D. Leibling, P.C. (hereinafter Plaintiff) is an attorney at law. Plaintiff maintains an attorney trust account (Account) at Mellon Bank (NJ) National Association (Mellon). Mellon uses a computerized system to process checks for payment.

Plaintiff represented the defendant, Fredy Winda Ramos (Ramos) in a personal injury action which resulted in a settlement. On May 19, 1995, plaintiff issued Check No. 1031 in the amount of $8,483.06 to Ramos, representing her net proceeds from the settlement. Mellon honored that check on May 26, 1995. On May 24, 1995, plaintiff mistakenly issued another check, Check No. 1043, to Ramos in the same amount of $8,483.06. Realizing his error, Plaintiff called Ramos in Puerto Rico and advised her that Check No. 1043 had been issued by mistake and instructed her to destroy the check. Plaintiff then called Mellon and ordered an oral stop payment on the check.

On December 21, 1996, some nineteen months after plaintiff issued Check No. 1043, Ramos cashed the check in Puerto Rico.

Plaintiff filed this complaint against both Ramos and Mellon. Ramos defaulted. Plaintiff's complaint against Mellon alleges breach of duty of good faith, negligence, breach of fiduciary duty, payment of a stale check, and breach of contract as a result of Mellon's honoring the second check.

DECISION Judgment for Mellon: the bank's conduct was fair and in accordance with reasonable commercial standards.

OPINION Rand, J. [T]he issue in the present case turns on whether Mellon acted in good faith when it honored plaintiff's check. Good faith under N.J. Uniform Commercial Code has been defined in [UCC] 3-103(a)(4) as "honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing."

In contrast, plaintiff's argument centers on the proposition that the bank's duty of good faith required it to inquire or consult with plaintiff before honoring a stale check that had a previous oral stop payment order on it. ***

However, *** "[t]he duty [of inquiry] is inconsistent with the provisions of subsection 4-403(2) on the expiration of the 'effectiveness' of stop orders. Such a duty is hardly practical today." Moreover: "[t]o require that a payor bank check the date of every check received via the collection process would unreasonably increase the cost of processing every check written today."

material must be analyzed and applied. First, it appears clear that the Uniform Commercial Code acknowledges that computerized check processing systems are common and accepted banking procedures in the United States. [Citation.] Therefore, it can not be said that defendant bank acted in bad faith by using a computerized system when it honored plaintiff's "stale" check. Furthermore, it appears that the test for good faith is a subjective test. Thus, based on all of the foregoing material, as long as the defendant bank used an adequate computer system for processing checks (here there is no proof to the contrary), it appears to have acted in good faith even though it did not consult the Plaintiff before it honored the "stale" check that had an expired oral stop-payment order on it. * * *

[T]he obligation of a bank to stop payment on a check does not continue in perpetuity once the stop payment order expires.

The bank's conduct was fair and in accordance with reasonable commercial standards. Accordingly, it appears that the defendant bank is not liable and should prevail. A finding of no liability is entered for the defendant bank.

INTERPRETATION It is the responsibility of the banking customer either to regain possession of the mistakenly issued check or to renew the stop payment order in writing every six months for as long as the risk of payment exists.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you think that banks should be required to offer a permanent stop payment option? Explain.

BANK'S RIGHT TO SUBROGATION ON IMPROPER PAYMENT

If a payor bank pays an item over a stop payment order, after an account has been closed, or otherwise in violation of its contract with the drawer or maker, the payor bank is subrogated to (obtains) the rights of (1) any holder in due course on the item against the drawer or maker; (2) the payee or any other holder against the drawer or maker; and (3) the drawer or maker against the payee or any other holder. For instance, over the drawer's stop payment order, a bank pays a check presented to the bank by a holder in due course. The drawer's defense is that the check was obtained by fraud in the inducement. The drawee bank is subrogated to the rights of the holder in due course, who would not be subject to the drawer's personal defense, and thus can debit the drawer's account. The same would be true if the presenter were the payee, against whom the drawer did not have a valid defense.

SEIGEL v. MERRILL LYNCH, PIERCE, FENNER & SMITH, INC.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS, 2000

FACTS In early 1997, the plaintiff, Walter Seigel, a Maryland resident, traveled to Atlantic City, New Jersey, to gamble. While there, he wrote a number of checks to various casinos in order to gamble. The checks were drawn on Seigel's cash management account with the defendant, which was established through Merrill Lynch's District of Columbia offices. There were sufficient funds in the account to cover all the checks. Seigel eventually gambled away all of the money he had received for the checks. Upon returning to Maryland, Seigel discussed the status of the outstanding checks with Merrill Lynch, informing his broker of the gambling nature of the transactions and his desire to avoid realizing the losses. Merrill Lynch informed Seigel that it was possible to escape paying the checks by placing a stop payment order and closing out his cash management account. Seigel took this advice and instructed Merrill Lynch to close his account, liquidate the assets, and not to honor any checks drawn on the account. Merrill Lynch agreed and confirmed Seigel's instructions. Many of the checks were subsequently dishonored and are not now at issue. However, Merrill Lynch accidentally paid several of the checks totaling $143,000, despite the stop payment order and the account closure. Merrill Lynch then debited Seigel's margin account to cover the payments.

Seigel brought suit in the District of Columbia against Merrill Lynch, demanding a return of the $143,000 plus interest. Merrill Lynch was granted a summary judgment. Seigel appealed.

DECISION Judgment affirmed.

OPINION Steadman, J. The basic right of the depositor to stop payment on any item drawn on the depositor's account is set forth in section 4-403(a). However, liability on the bank for payment over a stop payment order is far from automatic. On the contrary, section 4-403(c) provides: "The burden of establishing the fact and amount of loss resulting from the payment of an item contrary to a stop-payment order or order to close an account is on the customer."

This provision, which places the burden on the customer to show actual loss, is reinforced by the extensive rights of subrogation given to the payor bank by section 4-407. Under that section, as to the drawer or maker (that is, the depositor), the bank is subrogated both to the rights of "any holder in due course on the item" and to the rights of

"the payee or any other holder of the item against the drawer or maker either on the item or under the transaction out of which the item arose." As a leading authority on the Uniform Commercial Code has noted, this section "contemplates that the bank will use its subrogation rights primarily to defend against a suit by the customer to recover payment." [Citation.]

As applied to the facts here, then, Seigel is required to bear the burden of establishing that he in fact suffered a loss as a result of the payment of the checks. In assessing whether any such loss was actually incurred, Merrill Lynch must be treated as the subrogee of any rights of the casino payees against Seigel. As the payee of a dishonored check, the casino would have a prima facie right to recover its amount from Seigel as drawer, 3-414(b), ***

As already indicated, even if payment had been stopped, the casinos could have enforced the checks in New Jersey, where the transaction was entered into. Merrill Lynch therefore, under the Code scheme, conceptually has the same right. Furthermore, even if there were a problem in asserting jurisdiction over Seigel in New Jersey, Maryland would have provided an appropriate forum for enforcing the checks. The highest Maryland court has squarely held that because there is no longer a strong public policy against gambling per se, *** and that therefore Maryland courts will enforce gambling debts if legally incurred in a foreign jurisdiction. [Citation.] Accordingly the casinos, and hence derivatively Merrill Lynch, could enforce the checks directly against Seigel in the state of his residence—Maryland.

INTERPRETATION The drawer is required to bear the burden of establishing that he in fact suffered a loss as a result of the payment of a check over a stop payment order.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What rule should be established for liability of a bank making a payment over a stop payment order?

DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS

Congress enacted the Truth in Savings Act, which requires all depository institutions (including commercial banks, savings and loan associations, savings banks, and credit unions) to disclose in great detail to consumers the terms and conditions of their deposit accounts. The stated purpose of the Act is to allow consumers to make informed decisions regarding deposit accounts by mandating standardized disclosure of rates of interest and fees in order to facilitate meaningful comparison of different deposit products.

More specifically, the Act provides that the disclosures must be made in a clear and conspicuous writing and must be given to the consumer when an account is opened or service is provided. These disclosures must include the following: (1) the annual percentage yield (APY) and the percentage rate; (2) how variable rates are calculated and when the rates may be changed; (3) balance information (including how the balance is calculated); (4) when and how interest is calculated and credited; (5) the amount of fees that may be charged and how they are calculated; and (6) any limitation on the number or amount of withdrawals or deposits. In addition, the Act requires the depository institution to disclose the following information with periodic statements it sends to its customers: (1) the APY earned; (2) any fees debited during the covered period; (3) the dollar amount of the interest earned during the covered period; and (4) the dates of the covered period.

CUSTOMER'S DEATH OR INCOMPETENCE

The general rule is that death or incompetence revokes all agency agreements. Furthermore, adjudication of incompetence by a court is regarded as notice to the world of that fact. Actual notice is not required. The Code modifies these stringent rules in several ways with respect to bank deposits and collections.

First, if either a payor or collecting bank does not know that a customer has been adjudicated incompetent, the existence of such incompetence at the time an item is issued or its collection undertaken does not impair either bank's authority to accept, pay, or collect the item or to account for proceeds of its collection. The bank may pay the item without incurring any liability.

Second, neither death nor adjudication of incompetence of a customer revokes a payor or collecting bank's authority to accept, pay, or collect an item until the bank knows of the condition and has a reasonable opportunity to act on this knowledge.

Finally, even though a bank knows of the death of its customer, it may for ten days after the date of his death pay or certify checks drawn by the customer unless a person claiming an interest in the account, such as an heir, executor, or administrator, orders the bank to stop making such payments.

CUSTOMER'S DUTIES

The Code imposes certain affirmative duties on bank customers and fixes time limits within which they must assert their rights. The duties arise and the time starts to run from the point at which the bank either sends or makes available to its customer a statement of account showing payment of items against the account. The statement of account will suffice provided it describes by item the number of the item, the amount, and the date of payment. The customer must exercise reasonable promptness in examining the bank statement or the items to discover whether any payment was unauthorized due to an unauthorized signature on or any alteration of an item. Because he is not presumed to know the signatures of payees or indorsers, this duty of prompt and careful examination applies only to alterations and the customer's own signature, both of which he should be able to detect immediately. If the customer discovers an unauthorized signature or an alteration, he must notify the bank promptly. A failure to fulfill these duties of prompt examination and notice precludes the customer from asserting against the bank his unauthorized signature or any alteration if the bank establishes that it suffered a loss by reason of such failure.

Furthermore, the customer will lose his rights in a potentially more serious situation. Occasionally, a forger, possibly an employee who has access to the employer's checkbook, carries out a series of transactions involving the account of the same individual. He may forge one or more checks each month until finally detected. The bank, noticing nothing suspicious, might pay one or more of the customer's checks bearing the false signatures before the customer detects the forgery, months or even years later. The Code deals with these situations by stating that once the statement and items become available to him, the customer must examine them within a reasonable period, which in no event may exceed thirty calendar days and which may, under certain circumstances, be less, and notify the bank. Any instruments containing alterations or unauthorized signatures by the same wrongdoer that the bank pays during that period will be the bank's responsibility, but any instruments paid thereafter but before the customer notifies the bank may not be asserted against it. This rule is based on the concept that the loss involved is directly traceable to the customer's negligence and that, as a result, he should stand the loss.

These rules depend, however, on the bank's exercising ordinary care in paying the items involved. If it does not and that failure by the bank substantially contributed to the loss, the loss will be allocated between the bank and the customer based on their comparative negligence. But whether the bank exercised due care or not, the customer must in all events report any alteration or his unauthorized signature within one year from the time the statement or items are made available to him or be barred from asserting them against the bank. Any unauthorized indorsement must be asserted within three years under the Article's general Statute of Limitations provisions.

Practical Advice

Promptly review your monthly bank statement to ensure that all checks and transactions were issued by you or your authorized agent and are for the correct amount.

Consistent with modern automated methods for processing checks, Articles 3 and 4 provide that "ordinary care" does not require a bank to examine every check if the failure to do so does not vary unreasonably from general banking usage.

UNION PLANTERS BANK, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION V. ROGERS

SUPREME COURT OF MISSISSIPPI, 2005

912 SO.2D 116

FACTS Neal D. and Helen K. Rogers, both in their eighties, maintained four checking accounts with the Union Planters Bank in Greenville, Washington County, Mississippi. After Neal became bedridden, Helen hired Jackie Reese to help her take care of Neal, do chores, and run errands. In September 2000, Reese began writing checks on the Rogerses' four accounts and forged Helen's name on the signature line. Some of the checks were made out to "cash," some to "Helen K. Rogers," and some to "Jackie Reese." The following chart summarizes the forgeries to each account:

54282309	11/27/2000	6/18/2001	46	$16,635.00
0039289441	9/27/2000	1/25/2001	10	$ 2,701.00
6100110922	11/29/2000	8/13/2001	29	$ 9,297.00
6404000343	11/20/2000	8/16/2001	83	$29,765.00
TOTAL			168	$58,398.00

Neal died in late May 2001. Shortly thereafter, the Rogerses' son, Neal, Jr., began helping Helen with financial matters. Together they discovered that many bank statements were missing and that there was not as much money in the accounts as they had thought. In June 2001, they contacted Union Planters and asked for copies of the missing bank statements. In September 2001, Helen was advised by Union Planters to contact the police due to forgeries made on her accounts. Subsequently, criminal charges were brought against Reese. In the meantime, Helen filed suit against Union Planters, alleging unlawful payment of forged checks and negligence. After a trial, the jury awarded Helen $29,595 in damages, and the circuit court entered judgment accordingly.

DECISION Judgment reversed.

OPINION WALLER, J.

The relationship between Rogers and Union Planters is governed by Article 4 of the Uniform Commercial Code, Section 4-406(a) & (c) provide that a bank customer has a duty to discover and report "unauthorized signatures"; i.e., forgeries. Section 4-406 of the UCC reflects an underlying policy decision that furthers the UCC's "objective of promoting certainty and predictability in commercial transactions." The UCC facilitates financial transactions, benefitting both consumers and financial institutions, by allocating responsibility among the parties according to whomever is best able to prevent a loss. Because the customer is more familiar with his own signature, and should know whether or not he authorized a particular withdrawal or check, he can prevent further unauthorized activity better than a financial institution which may process thousands of transactions in a single day. Section 4-406 acknowledges that the customer is best situated to detect unauthorized transactions on his own account by placing the burden on the customer to exercise reasonable care to discover and report such transactions. The customer's duty to exercise this care is triggered when the bank satisfies its burden to provide sufficient information to the customer. As a result, if the bank provides sufficient information, the customer bears the loss when he fails to detect and notify the bank about unauthorized transactions. [Citation.]

A. Union Planters' Duty to Provide Information under § 4-406(a).

The court admitted into evidence copies of all Union Planters statements sent to Rogers during the relevant time period. Enclosed with the bank statements were either the cancelled checks themselves or copies of the checks relating to the period of time of each statement. The evidence shows that all bank statements and cancelled checks were sent, via United States Mail, postage prepaid, to all customers at their "designated address" each month. Rogers introduced no evidence to the contrary. We therefore find that the bank fulfilled its duty of making the statements available to Rogers and that the remaining provisions of § 4-406 are applicable to the case at bar. [Citation.]

In defense of her failure to inspect the bank statements, Rogers claims that she never received the bank statements and cancelled checks. Even if this allegation is true, it does not excuse Rogers from failing to fulfill her duties under § 4-406(a) & (c) because the statute clearly states a bank discharges its duty in providing the necessary information to a customer when it “sends ... to a customer a statement of account showing payment of items.” [Citation.] The word “receive” is absent. The customer’s duty to inspect and report does not arise when the statement is received, as Rogers claims; the customer’s duty to inspect and report arises when the bank sends the statement to the customer’s address. A reasonable person who has not received a monthly statement from the bank would promptly ask the bank for a copy of the statement. ***

B. Rogers’ Duty to Report the Forgeries under § 4-406(d).

A customer who has not promptly notified a bank of an irregularity may be precluded from bringing certain claims against the bank:

(d) If the bank proves that the customer failed, with respect to an item, to comply with the duties imposed on the customer by subsection (c), the customer is precluded from asserting against the bank:

(1) The customer’s unauthorized signature ... on the item, if the bank also proves that it suffered a loss by reason of the failure; ...

[Citation.]

Also, when there is a series of forgeries, § 4-406(d)(2) places additional duties on the customer:

(2) The customer’s unauthorized signature ... by the same wrongdoer on any other item paid in good faith by the bank if the payment was made before the bank received notice from the customer of the unauthorized signature ... and after the customer had been afforded a reasonable period of time, not exceeding thirty (30) days, in which to examine the item or statement of account and notify the bank.

[Citation.] A bank may shorten the customer’s thirty-day period for notifying the bank of a series of forgeries, and here, Union Planters shortened the thirty-day period to fifteen days. The statute states that a customer must report a series of forgeries within “a reasonable period of time, not exceeding thirty (30) days.”

Rogers is therefore precluded from making claims against Union Planters because (1) under § 4-406(a), Union Planters provided the statements to Rogers, and (2) under §4-406(d)(2), Rogers failed to notify Union Planters of the forgeries within 15 and/or 30 days of the date she should have reasonably discovered the forgeries.

INTERPRETATION A bank customer must exercise reasonable promptness in examining account statements and canceled checks to detect unauthorized signatures or alterations.

ELECTRONIC FUNDS TRANSFER

As previously mentioned, the use of negotiable instruments for payment has transformed the United States into a virtually cashless society. The advent and technological advances of computers make it likely that in the foreseeable future electronic funds transfer systems (EFTS) will bring about a society that is virtually checkless as well. Financial institutions seek to substitute EFTS for checks for two principal reasons. The first is to eliminate the ever-increasing paperwork involved in processing the billions of checks issued annually. The second is to eliminate the “float” that a drawer of a check currently enjoys by maintaining the use of his funds during the processing period between the time at which he issues the check and final payment.

An electronic funds transfer (EFT) has been defined as “any transfer of funds, other than a transaction originated by check, draft, or similar paper instrument, which is initiated through an electronic terminal, telephonic instrument, or computer or magnetic tape so as to order, instruct or authorize a financial institution to debit or credit an account.” For example, with an EFT, William in New York would be able to pay a debt he owes to Yvette in Illinois by entering into his computer an order to his bank to pay Yvette. The drawee bank would then instantly debit William’s account and transfer the credit to Yvette’s bank, where Yvette’s account would immediately be credited in that amount. The entire transaction would be completed in minutes.

Although EFTs are still in their formative stages, their use has generated considerable confusion concerning the legal rights of customers and financial institutions. Congress provided a partial solution to these legal issues by enacting the EFTA discussed later. But significant and numerous legal problems remain. In an attempt to resolve some of these questions, the Permanent Editorial Board of the UCC has promulgated Article 4A—Fund Transfer.

Types of Electronic Funds Transfer

Although a number of new EFTs are likely to appear in the coming years, five main types of EFTs are currently in use: (1) automated teller machines, (2) point-of-sale systems, (3) direct deposit and withdrawal of funds, (4) pay-by-phone systems, and (5) wholesale wire transfers.

AUTOMATED TELLER MACHINES

Now available throughout the country, automated teller machines (ATMs) permit customers to conduct various transactions with their bank through the use of electronic terminals. After activating an ATM with a plastic identification card and a personal identification number, or PIN, a customer can deposit and withdraw funds from her account, transfer funds between accounts, obtain cash advances, and make payments on loan accounts. (See Business Law in Action.)

Business Law in Action

What is the easiest way to rob a bank these days? Head for your local ATM, or automatic teller machine. With more than 383,000 machines located in the United States, most of which are open virtually round the clock nationwide, ATMs offer thieves a wide new frontier.

Thieves Get Sophisticated

These days, you still may find yourself held up by some robber who pulls a gun and demands your ATM withdrawal, but other thieves have gotten much more sophisticated. Often, ATM robbers will use binoculars or video cameras to record your finger movements as you enter your personal identification number (PIN) at an ATM. Then they'll match your PIN with your account number on the ATM receipt that you perhaps carelessly threw away. If they encounter a problem, they'll even call you at home, posing as bank officials seeking to verify your PIN. You should know, however, that banks never do this sort of thing.

To reduce street crime around ATMs, banks have begun installing the machines in well-lighted public places such as twenty-four-hour grocery stores and shopping malls. They have also teamed up with city officials in such places as Chicago and Los Angeles to install bank machines in police stations.

Malls Become Targets

Such measures, however, haven't stopped more cunning ATM robbers. One group, for example, approached mall officials at the Buckland Hills Mall in Manchester, Connecticut, about installing an ATM. Before a contract could be signed, the thieves rolled in a temporary-looking machine, which they left in the mall for two weeks, during which time shoppers who slipped in their cards and entered their PINs received an apologetic message saying that the machine was out of service. Often, a "repairman" stood by, ostensibly waiting to fix the machine. Even to mall employees, the ATM looked legitimate. Yet the machine, which rested on wheels, could have been carted away at any moment. Finally, two men dressed in uniforms came on Mother's Day and did just that. Then, using the stolen PIN and account numbers that the machine had recorded, the robbers made fake cash cards, traveled to midtown Manhattan, and went on a shopping spree.

A recent method for stealing information is a thin, transparent-plastic overlay that is placed on an ATM keypad that captures a user's identification code as it is entered. To the card holder, it looks like some sort of cover to protect the keys. In fact, microchips in the device record every keystroke. Another transparent device inside the card slot captures the data on the ATM card. While the cardholder completes the transaction, a computer attached to the overlay records all the data necessary to clone the card.

Banks Held Liable

One problem that banks face is that thieves like those in Connecticut can now buy used ATMs for as little as $6,000. Another is that customers often carelessly toss their ATM cards, PINs, or account receipts around. Many times, in fact, customers fall victim to friends or relatives who "borrow" their cards to make withdrawals.

Moreover, under the Electronic Funds Transfer Act, customers can limit their liability for unauthorized withdrawals. If, as a customer, you lose your card or it is stolen, you have two days to notify the bank from the time that you discover the problem. By acting quickly, you reduce your liability to no more than $50; if you wait four days, however, your liability shoots up to $500.

If you discover an unauthorized withdrawal on your monthly statement, you have sixty days from the postmark on the statement's envelope to report the problem. Again, your liability will be limited to $50. If you become the victim of a criminal who makes a fake ATM card for your account, you face no liability. Whatever the circumstance, the burden of proof rests with the bank. If your bank refuses to reimburse you in a timely manner, you can sue.

Precautions to Consider

Today, ATMs account for more than 7 billion transactions each year in the United States, and that number is growing. Increasingly, banks are using ATMs to sell everything from American Express traveler's checks to home equity loans. The list keeps expanding. And if you travel, some ATMs in foreign countries will even allow you to link up with your local bank, withdraw money from your account, and receive it in the local coin. To thwart would-be robbers, then, you may want to remember these important safety tips:

- Keep your ATM card and your PIN in separate places.
- Better yet, memorize your PIN, and never give it out to anyone.
- If you must keep a record of your PIN, put it in your safe deposit box at your bank.
- Never write your PIN on your ATM card or keep your PIN in your wallet.
- Avoid using the first part of your social security number, your driver's license number, your telephone number, or your birthday for your PIN.
- Don't leave your ATM card lying around the house for someone else to pick up.
- Keep all your ATM withdrawal receipts rather than tossing them away.
- Take someone with you to the cash machine and watch out for people who are loitering nearby.
- Head for ATMs in well-lighted, protected locations, such as grocery stores or malls.
- Never let a stranger into an ATM area with you, and get in and out quickly.
- Try to use ATMs during the day and have your card ready before you approach the machine.
- Conceal your finger movements from view as you enter your PIN.
- Look for possible fraudulent devices attached to the ATM.
- If the ATM looks different or appears to have any attachments over the card slot or keypad, do not use the ATM.
- Opt for drive-through ATMs and keep your car windows and doors locked, except for the driver's side.
- Put your money away as soon as you get it and count it later.
- Finally, regularly compare your monthly statements with your ATM receipts.

POINT-OF-SALE SYSTEMS

Computerized point-of-sale (POS) systems permit consumers to transfer funds from their bank accounts to a merchant automatically. The POS machines, located within the merchant's store and activated by the consumer's identification card and code, instantaneously debit the consumer's account and credit the merchant's account.

DIRECT DEPOSITS AND WITHDRAWALS

Another type of EFT involves deposits, authorized in advance by a customer, that are made directly to the customer's account through an electronic terminal. Examples include direct payroll deposits, deposits of Social Security payments, and deposits of pension payments. Conversely, automatic withdrawals are preauthorized EFTs from the customer's account for regular payments to some party other than the financial institution at which the funds are deposited. Automatic withdrawals to pay insurance premiums, utility bills, or automobile loan payments are common examples of this type of EFT.

PAY-BY-PHONE SYSTEMS

Some financial institutions have a service that permits customers to pay bills by telephoning the bank's computer system and directing a transfer of funds to a designated third party. This service also permits customers to transfer funds between accounts.

WHOLESALE ELECTRONIC FUNDS TRANSFERS

Wholesale electronic funds transfers, commonly called wholesale wire transfers, involve the movement of funds between financial institutions, between financial institutions and businesses, and between businesses. More than $1 trillion is transferred this way each business day over the two major transfer systems—the Federal Reserve wire transfer network system (Fedwire) and the New York Clearing House Interbank Payment System (CHIPS). In addition, a number of private wholesale wire systems exist among the large banks. Limited aspects of wholesale wire transfers are governed by uniform rules promulgated by the Federal Reserve, CHIPS, and the National Automated Clearing House Association.

Consumer Funds Transfers

Congress determined that the use of electronic systems to transfer funds provided the potential for substantial benefits to consumers. Existing consumer protection legislation failed to account for the unique characteristics of such systems, however, leaving the rights and obligations of consumers and financial institutions undefined. Accordingly, Congress enacted Title IX of the Consumer Protection Act, called the Electronic Funds Transfer Act (EFTA), to “provide a basic framework establishing the rights, liabilities, and responsibilities of participants in electronic fund transfers” with primary emphasis on “the provision of individual consumer rights.” Because the EFTA deals exclusively with the protection of consumers, it does not govern electronic transfers between financial institutions, between financial institutions and businesses, and between businesses. The act is similar in many respects to the Fair Credit Billing Act (see Chapter 45), which applies to credit card transactions. The EFTA is administered by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, which is mandated to prescribe regulations to carry out the purposes of the Act. Pursuant to this congressional mandate, the Federal Reserve has issued Regulation E.

DISCLOSURE

The EFTA is primarily a disclosure statute and as such requires that the terms and conditions of EFTs involving a consumer’s account be disclosed in readily understandable language at the time the consumer contracts for such services. Included among the required disclosures are the consumer’s liability for unauthorized transfers, the kinds of EFTs allowed, the charges for transfers or for the right to make transfers, the consumer’s right to stop payment of preauthorized EFTs, the consumer’s right to receive documentation of EFTs, rules concerning disclosure of information to third parties, procedures for correcting account errors, and the financial institution’s liability to the consumer under the Act.

DOCUMENTATION AND PERIODIC STATEMENTS

The Act requires the financial institution to provide the consumer with written documentation of each transfer made from an electronic terminal at the time of transfer—a receipt. The receipt must clearly state the amount involved, the date, the type of transfer, the identity of the account(s) involved, the identity of any third party involved, and the location of the terminal involved.

In addition, the financial institution must provide each consumer with a periodic statement for each account of the consumer that may be accessed by means of an EFT. The statement must describe the amount, date, and location for each transfer; the fee, if any, to be charged for the transaction; and an address and phone number for questions and information.

PREAUTHORIZED TRANSFERS

A preauthorized transfer from a consumer’s account must be authorized in advance and in writing by the consumer, and a copy of the authorization must be provided to the consumer when the transfer is made. Up to three business days before the scheduled date of the transfer, a consumer may stop payment of a preauthorized EFT by notifying the financial institution orally or in writing, although the financial institution may require the consumer to provide written confirmation of an oral notification within fourteen days.

ERROR RESOLUTION

The consumer has sixty days after the financial institution sends a periodic statement in which to notify the institution of any errors appearing on that statement. The financial institution is required to investigate alleged errors and report its findings within ten business days. If the financial institution needs more than ten days to investigate, it may take up to forty-five days, provided it recredits the consumer’s account for the amount alleged to be in error. If it determines that an error did occur, it must properly correct the error. Failure to investigate in good faith makes the financial institution liable to the consumer for treble damages (i.e., three times the amount of provable damages).

CONSUMER LIABILITY

A consumer’s liability for an unauthorized EFT is limited to a maximum of $50 if the consumer notifies the financial institution within two days after he learns of the loss or theft. If the consumer does not report the loss or theft within two days, he is liable for losses up to $500 but no more than $50 for the first two days. If the consumer fails to report the unauthorized use within sixty days of transmittal of a periodic statement, he is liable for losses resulting from any unauthorized EFT that appeared on the statement if the financial institution can show that the loss would not have occurred had the consumer reported the loss within sixty days; thus there is unlimited liability on unauthorized transfers made after sixty days following the bank’s sending the periodic statement.

Practical Advice

Promptly and carefully review all electronic fund activities to ensure that they are accurate, and if they are not, notify your financial institution immediately.

LIABILITY OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTION

A financial institution is liable to a consumer for all damages proximately caused by its failure to make an EFT in accordance with the terms and conditions of an account, in the correct amount, or in a timely manner when properly instructed to do so by the consumer. There are, however, exceptions to such liability. The financial institution will not be liable if

1. the consumer's account has insufficient funds through no fault of the financial institution,
2. the funds are subject to legal process,
3. the transfer would exceed an established credit limit,
4. an electronic terminal has insufficient cash, or
5. circumstances beyond the financial institution's control prevent the transfer.

The financial institution is also liable for failure to stop payment of a preauthorized transfer from a consumer's account when instructed to do so in accordance with the terms and conditions of the account.

Wholesale Funds Transfers

Article 4A, Funds Transfers, is designed to provide a statutory framework for a payment system that is not covered by existing Articles of the UCC or by the EFTA. The typical wholesale wire transfer involves sophisticated parties who desire great speed in transferring large sums of money. Article 4A has been universally adopted by the states and territories. In general, "Article 4A governs a method of payment in which the person making payment (the 'originator') directly transfers an instruction to a bank to either make a payment to the person receiving the payment (the 'beneficiary') or to instruct some other bank to make payment to the beneficiary." Although checks and credit cards are more common forms of payment as measured by number of transactions per day, commercial electronic transfers (commercial or wholesale wire transfers) far exceed these transactions as measured by their dollar volume, which is much greater than $1 trillion a day.

Article 4A provides that the parties to a funds transfer generally may by agreement vary their rights and obligations. Moreover, funds-transfer system rules governing banks that use the system may be effective even if such rules conflict with Article 4A. Rights and obligations under Article 4A can also be changed by Federal Reserve regulations and operating circulars of Federal Reserve Banks.

SCOPE OF ARTICLE 4A

Article 4A, which covers wholesale funds transfers, defines a funds transfer as a series of transactions, beginning with the originator's payment order, made for the purpose of making payment to the beneficiary of the order. The term includes any payment order issued by the originator's bank or an intermediary bank intended to carry out the originator's payment order. A funds transfer is completed by acceptance by the beneficiary's bank of a payment order for the benefit of the beneficiary of the originator's payment order.

The Article, therefore, covers the transfers of credit that move from an originator to a beneficiary through the banking system. If any step in the process is governed by the EFTA, however, the entire transaction is excluded from the Article's coverage.

The following examples illustrate the coverage of the Article.

1. Johnson Co. instructs its bank, First National Bank (FNB), to pay $2 million to West Co., also a customer of FNB. FNB executes the payment order by crediting West's account with $2 million and notifying West that the credit has been made and is available.
2. Assume the same facts as those in the first example, except that West's bank is Central Bank (CB). FNB will execute the payment order of Johnson Co. by issuing to CB its own payment order instructing CB to credit the account of West.
3. Assume the facts presented in the second example with the added fact that FNB does not have a correspondent relationship with CB. In this instance, FNB will have to issue its payment order to Northern Bank (NB), a bank that does have a correspondent relationship with CB, and NB will then issue its payment order to CB.

Payment Order A payment order is a sender's instruction to a receiving bank to pay, or to cause another bank to pay, a fixed or determinable amount of money to a beneficiary. The instruction may be communicated orally, electronically, or in writing. To be a payment order, the instruction must

1. contain no condition to payment other than the time of payment;
2. be sent to a receiving bank that is to be reimbursed either by debiting an account of the sender or by otherwise receiving payment from the sender; and

- be transmitted by the sender directly to the receiving bank or indirectly through an agent, a funds-transfer system, or a communication system.

The payment order is issued when sent and, if more than one payment is to be made, each payment represents a separate payment order. In the examples above, there is one payment order in the first example (from Johnson Co.), two in the second example (from Johnson Co. and from FNB), and three in the third example (from Johnson Co., from FNB, and from NB).

Parties The originator is either the sender of the payment order or, in a series of payment orders, the sender of the first payment order. A sender is the party who gives an instruction to the receiving bank, or the bank to which the sender's instruction is addressed. The receiving bank may be the originator's bank, an intermediary bank, or the beneficiary's bank. The originator's bank is either the bank that receives the original payment order or the originator if the originator is a bank. The beneficiary's bank, the last bank in the chain of a funds transfer, is the bank instructed in the payment order to credit the beneficiary's account. The beneficiary is the person to be paid by the beneficiary bank. An intermediary bank is any receiving bank, other than the originator's bank or the beneficiary's bank, that receives the payment order. Thus, in the above examples,

- Johnson Co. is the originator in all three examples;
- Johnson Co. is a sender in all three examples, FNB is a sender in examples 2 and 3, and NB is a sender in example 3;

- FNB is the receiving bank of Johnson Co.'s payment order in all three examples; in example 2, CB is the receiving bank of FNB's payment order; and, in example 3, CB is the receiving bank of NB's payment order and NB is the receiving bank of FNB's payment order;
- FNB is the originator's bank in all three examples;
- FNB is the beneficiary's bank in example 1; CB is the beneficiary's bank in examples 2 and 3;
- West is the beneficiary in all three examples; and
- NB is an intermediary bank in example 3.

In some instances, the originator and the beneficiary may be the same party. For example, a corporation may wish to transfer funds from one account to another account that is in the same or a different bank.

Excluded Transactions As previously mentioned, if any part of a funds transfer is governed by the EFTA, the transfer is excluded from Article 4A coverage. In addition, Article 4A covers only credit transactions; it therefore excludes debit transactions. If the person making the payment gives the instruction, the transfer is a credit transfer. If, however, the person receiving the payment gives the instruction, the transfer is a debit transfer. For example, a seller of goods obtains authority from the purchaser to debit the purchaser's account after the seller ships the goods. Article 4A does not cover this transaction because the instructions to make payment issue from the beneficiary (the seller), not from the party whose account is to be debited (the purchaser). See Figure 28-2 for an example of credit transaction.

ACCEPTANCE

Rights and obligations arise as a result of a receiving bank's acceptance of a payment order. The effect of acceptance depends on whether the payment order was issued to the beneficiary's bank or to a receiving bank other than the beneficiary's bank.

If a receiving bank is not the beneficiary's bank, the receiving bank does not subject itself to any liability until it accepts the instrument. Acceptance by a receiving bank other than the beneficiary's bank occurs when the receiving bank executes the sender's order. Such execution occurs when the receiving bank "issues a payment order intended to carry out" the sender's payment order. When the receiving bank executes the sender's payment order, the bank is entitled to payment from the sender and can debit the sender's account.

The beneficiary's bank may accept an order in any of three ways, and acceptance occurs at the earliest of these events: (1) when the bank (a) pays the beneficiary or

(b) notifies the beneficiary that the bank has received the order or has credited the beneficiary's account with the funds; (2) when the bank receives payment of the sender's order; or (3) the opening of the next funds-transfer business day of the bank after the payment date of the order if the order was not rejected and funds are available for payment.

If a beneficiary's bank accepts a payment order, the bank is obliged to pay the beneficiary the amount of the order. The bank's acceptance of the payment order does not, however, create any obligation to either the sender or the originator.

ERRONEOUS EXECUTION OF PAYMENT ORDERS

If a receiving bank mistakenly executes a payment order for an amount greater than the amount authorized, the bank is entitled to payment only in the amount of the sender's correct order. To the extent allowed by the law governing mistake and restitution, the receiving bank

When Should an Agent's Power to Bind His Principal Terminate?

FACTS Susan Jennings was the head cashier for Pears, a highly respected discount store located in the heart of Chicago. Her job included distributing funds to each cashier, periodically collecting any large amounts from them, making a collection at the end of each shift, and depositing the previous day's receipts each morning. When a cashier brought money to Susan, the cashier would count the money and Susan would check it. At the end of each day, Susan would make out a deposit slip for the amount of cash and checks received, giving a copy of the slip to the accounting department for proper book entry. She would endorse each check with a company stamp marked "For Deposit Only."

On December 1, 2010, Alvin Troop, a new cashier, finished his shift and brought his money tray to Susan. While counting his receipts, he had noticed a check for $120 that had been made out without a payee. Alvin brought the check to Susan's attention. Matching his receipts to the cash register tape, Susan found that Alvin was exactly $120 over. Susan told him not to worry and said that she would fill in the store's name when she made the next deposit and would reconcile the receipts to the tape.

On December 2, 2010, Susan deposited the previous day's receipts in Pears's account in the First Sandy Hill Bank of Chicago, but decided to borrow $120 for her Christmas shopping. Short of cash and wanting to take advantage of a special sale, she intended to make up the difference on December 5, 2010, which was a payday. She filled her name in on the blank check, which also was drawn on the First Sandy Hill Bank, and the bank cashed it. Three days later, she replaced the money. No one knew what she had done until the customer who had written the check received his bank statement and demanded that the bank credit his account for the amount of the check that showed Susan as the payee.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. Were Susan's actions unethical or illegal? Explain. Would Susan's using the money for essential items, such as food or medicine, change your answer?
2. What should Susan have done?
3. What responsibility does the First Sandy Hill Bank have to its customers? In general, are banking procedures and standards established for the benefit of the bank or for that of the public?
4. If the bank teller had any idea that Susan had done something wrong, does the fact that he may have followed banking rules relieve him of any ethical responsibility?

may then recover from the beneficiary of the erroneous order the amount in excess of the authorized amount. If the wrong beneficiary is paid, however, the bank that issued the erroneous payment order is entitled to payment neither from its sender nor from prior senders and has the burden of recovering the payment from the improper beneficiary.

which a customer agrees, and the bank properly follows the process it has established, the customer must pay an order even if it was unauthorized. The customer, however, can avoid liability by showing that the unauthorized order was not caused directly or indirectly by (1) a person with access to confidential security information who was acting for the customer or (2) a person who obtained such information from a source controlled by the customer.

Final Credit payment of the instrument by the payor bank; if the payor bank (drawee) does not pay the check, the depository bank reverses the provisional credit

Intermediary Bank a bank, other than the depository or payor bank, involved in the collection process

Collecting Bank any bank (other than the payor bank) handling the item for payment

- Agency a collecting bank is an agent or subagent of the owner of the check until the settlement becomes final
- Duty of Care a collecting bank must exercise ordinary care in handling an item
- Duty to Act Timely a collecting bank acts timely if it takes proper action before its midnight deadline (midnight of the next banking day)
- Indorsements if an item is restrictively indorsed “for deposit only,” only a bank may be a holder
- Warranties customers and collecting banks give warranties on transfer, presentment, and encoding
- Final Payment occurs when the payor bank does any of the following, whichever happens first: (1) pays an item in cash; (2) settles and does not have the right to revoke the settlement; or (3) makes a provisional settlement and does not properly revoke it

Payor Bank under its contract with the drawer, the payor or drawee bank agrees to pay to the payee or his order checks that are issued by the drawer, provided the order is not countermanded by a stop payment order and provided there are sufficient funds in the drawer’s account

Relationship between Payor Bank and Its Customer

Contractual Relationship the relationship between a payor bank and its checking account customer is primarily the product of their contractual arrangement

Payment of an Item when a payor receives an item for which the funds in the account are insufficient, the bank may either dishonor the item and return it or pay the item and charge the customer’s account even though an overdraft is created

Substitute Check a paper reproduction of the original check that for all purposes is the legal equivalent of an original check

Stop Payment Orders an oral stop payment order (a command from a drawer to a drawee not to pay an instrument) is binding for fourteen calendar days; a written order is effective for six months and may be renewed in writing

Bank's Right to Subrogation on Improper Payment if a payor bank pays an item over a stop payment order or otherwise in violation of its contract, the payor bank is subrogated to (obtains) the rights of (1) any holder in due course on the item against the drawer or maker, (2) the payee or any holder against the drawer or maker, and (3) the drawer or maker against the payee or any other holder

Disclosure Requirements all depository institutions must disclose in great detail to their consumers the terms and conditions of their deposit account

Customer's Death or Incompetence a bank may pay an item if it does not know of the customer's incompetency or death

Customer's Duties the customer must examine bank statements and items carefully and promptly to discover any unauthorized signatures or alterations

Questions

1. On November 9, Jane Jones writes a check for $500 payable to Ralph Rodgers in payment for goods to be received later in the month. Before the close of business on the ninth, Jane notifies the bank by telephone to stop payment on the check. On Monday, December 19, Ralph gives the check to Bill Briggs for value and without notice. On the twentieth, Bill deposits the check in his account at Bank A. On the twenty-first, Bank A sends the check to its correspondent, Bank B. On the twenty-second, Bank B presents the check through the clearinghouse to Bank C. On the twenty-third, Bank C presents the check to Bank P, the payor bank. On Wednesday, December 28, the payor bank makes payment of the check final. Is Jane Jones' stop payment order effective against the payor bank? Explain.
2. Howard Harrison, a longtime customer of Western Bank, operates a small department store, Harrison's Store. Because his store has few experienced employees, Harrison frequently travels throughout the United States on buying trips, although he also runs the financial operations of the business. On one of his buying trips, Harrison purchased two hundred sport shirts from Well-Made Shirt Company and paid for the transaction with a check on his store account with Western Bank in the amount of $3,000. Adams, an employee of Well-Made who deposits its checks in Security Bank, sloppily raised the amount of the check to $30,000 and indorsed the check, "Pay to the order of Adams from Pension Plan Benefits, Well-Made Shirt Company by Adams." He cashed the check and cannot be found. Western Bank processed the check, paid it, and sent it to Harrison's Store with the monthly statement. After briefly examining the statement, Harrison left on another buying trip for three weeks.
  - a. Assuming the bank acted in good faith and the alteration is not discovered and reported to the bank until an audit conducted thirteen months after the statement was received by Harrison's Store, who must bear the loss on the raised check?
  - b. Assume that Harrison, who was unable to examine his statement promptly because of his buying trips, left instructions with the bank to carefully examine and to notify him of any item over $5,000 to be charged to his account; assume further that the bank nevertheless paid the item in his absence. Who bears the loss if the alteration is discovered one month after the statement was received by Harrison's Store? If the alteration is discovered thirteen months later?
3. Tom Jones owed Bank of Cleveland $10,000 on a note due November 17, with 1 percent interest due the bank for each day delinquent in payment. Jones issued a $10,000 check to Bank of Cleveland and deposited it in the night vault the evening of November 17. Several days later, he received a letter saying he owed one day's interest on the payment because of a one-day delinquency in payment. Jones refused because he said he had put the payment in the vault on November 17. Who is correct? Why?
4. Assume that Davis draws a check on Dallas Bank, payable to the order of Perkins; that Perkins indorses it to Cooper; that Cooper deposits it to her account in Houston Bank; that Houston Bank presents it to Dallas Bank, the drawee; and that Dallas Bank dishonors it because of insufficient funds. Houston Bank receives notification of the dishonor on Monday but, because of an interruption of communication facilities, fails to notify Cooper until Wednesday. What will be the result?
5. Jones, a food wholesaler whose company has an account with City Bank in New York City, is traveling in California on business. He finds a particularly attractive offer and decides to buy a carload of oranges for delivery in New York. He gives Saltin, the seller, his company's check for $25,000 to pay for the purchase. Saltin deposits the check, with others he received that day, with his bank, the Carrboro Bank. Carrboro Bank sends the check to Downs Bank in Los Angeles, which in turn deposits it with the Los Angeles Federal Reserve Bank (L.A. Fed). The L.A. Fed sends the check, with others, to the New York Federal Reserve Bank (N.Y. Fed), which forwards the check to City Bank, Jones's bank, for collection.
  - a. Is City Bank a depository bank? A collecting bank? A payor bank?
  - b. Is Carrboro a depository bank? A collecting bank?
  - c. Is the N.Y. Fed an intermediary bank?
  - d. Is Downs Bank a collecting bank?
6. On April 1, Moore gave Pipkin a check properly drawn by Moore on Zebra Bank for $500 in payment of a painting to be framed and delivered the next day. Pipkin immediately indorsed the check and gave it to Yeager Bank as payment in full of his indebtedness to the bank on a note he previously had signed. Yeager Bank canceled the note and returned it to Pipkin.

On April 2, upon learning that the painting had been destroyed in a fire at Pipkin's studio, Moore promptly went to Zebra Bank, signed a printed form of stop payment order, and gave it to the cashier. Zebra Bank refused payment on the check upon proper presentment by Yeager Bank.

  - a. What are the rights of Yeager Bank against Zebra Bank?
  - b. What are the rights of Yeager Bank against Moore?
  - c. Assuming that Zebra Bank inadvertently paid the amount of the check to Yeager Bank and debited Moore's account, what are the rights of Moore against Zebra Bank?
7. As payment in advance for services to be performed, Acton signed and delivered the following instrument:

December 1, 2010

LAST NATIONAL BANK
MONEYVILLE, STATE X

Pay to the order of Olaf Owen $1,500.00 _____
Fifteen Hundred Dollars _____ For services to be performed by Olaf Owen starting on December 6, 2010.

(signed) Arthur Acton

Owen requested and received Last National Bank's certification of the check even though Acton had only $900 on deposit. Owen indorsed the check in blank and delivered it to Dan Doty in payment of a preexisting debt.

When Owen failed to appear for work, Acton issued a written stop payment order ordering the bank not to pay the check. Doty presented the check to Last National Bank for payment. The bank refused payment.

What are the bank's rights and liabilities relating to the transactions described?

8. Jones drew a check for $1,000 on The First Bank and mailed it to the payee, Thrift, Inc. Caldwell stole the check from Thrift, Inc., chemically erased the name of the payee, and inserted the name of Henderson as payee. Caldwell also increased the amount of the check to $10,000 and, by using the name of Henderson, negotiated the check to Willis. Willis then took the check to The First Bank, obtained its certification on the check, and negotiated the check to Griffin, who deposited the check in The Second National Bank for collection. The Second National Bank forwarded the check to the Detroit Trust Company for collection from The First Bank, which honored the check. Griffin exhausted her account in The Second National Bank, and the account was closed. Shortly thereafter, The First Bank learned that it had paid an altered check.
What are the rights of each of the parties?
9. On July 21, Boehmer, a customer of Birmingham Trust, secured a loan from that bank for the principal sum of $5,500 in order to purchase a boat allegedly being built for him by A. C. Manufacturing Company, Inc. After Boehmer signed a promissory note, Birmingham Trust issued a cashier's check to Boehmer and A. C. Manufacturing Company as payees. The check was given to Boehmer, who then forged A. C. Manufacturing Company's indorsement and deposited the check in his own account at Central Bank. Central Bank credited Boehmer's account and then placed the legend "P.I.G.," meaning "Prior Indorsements Guaranteed," on the check. The check was presented to and paid by Birmingham Trust on July 22. When the loan became delinquent in March of the following year, Birmingham Trust contacted A. C. Manufacturing Company to learn the location of the boat. They were informed that it had never been purchased, and they soon after learned that Boehmer had died on January 24 of that year. Can Birmingham Trust obtain reimbursement from Central Bank under Central's warranty of prior indorsements? Explain.

10. Jason, who has extremely poor vision, went to an automated teller machine (ATM) to withdraw $200 on February 1. Joshua saw that Jason was having great difficulty reading the computer screen and offered to help. Joshua obtained Jason's personal identification number and secretly exchanged one of his old credit cards for Jason's ATM card. Between February 1 and February 15, Joshua withdrew $1,600 from Jason's account. On February 15, Jason discovered that his ATM card was missing and immediately notified his bank. The bank closed Jason's ATM account on February 16, by which time Joshua had withdrawn another $150. What is Jason's liability, if any, for the unauthorized use of his account?
11. Advanced Alloys, Inc., issued a check in the amount of $2,500 to Sergeant Steel Corporation. The check was presented for payment fourteen months later to the Chase Manhattan Bank, which made payment on the check and charged Advanced Alloys's account. Can Advanced Alloys recover the payment made on the check? Why?

Case Problems

12. Laboratory Management deposited into its account at Pulaski Bank a check issued by Fairway Farms in the amount of $150,000. The date of deposit was February 5. Pulaski, the depository bank, initiated the collection process immediately by forwarding the check to Worthen Bank on the sixth. Worthen sent the check on for collection to M Bank Dallas, and M Bank Dallas, still on February 6, delivered the check to M Bank Fort Worth. That same day, M Bank Fort Worth delivered the check to the Fort Worth Clearinghouse. Because TAB/West Side, the drawee/payor bank, was not a clearinghouse member, it had to rely on

TAB/Fort Worth for further transmittal of the check. TASI, a processing center used by both TAB/Fort Worth and TAB/West Side, received the check on the sixth and processed it as a reject item because of insufficient funds. On the seventh, TAB/West Side determined to return the check unpaid. TASI gave M Bank Dallas telephone notice of the return on February 7, but physically misrouted the check. Because of this, M Bank Dallas did not physically receive the check until February 19. However, M Bank notified Worthen by telephone on the fifteenth of the dishonor and return of the check. Worthen received the check on the twenty-first and notified

Pulaski by telephone on the twenty-second. Pulaski actually received the check from Worthen on the twenty-third. On February 22 and 23, Laboratory Management's checking account with Pulaski was $46,000. Pulaski did not freeze the account because it considered the return to be too late. The Laboratory Management account was finally frozen on April 30, when it had a balance of $1,400. Pulaski brings this suit against TAB/Fort Worth, Tab/Dallas, and TASI, alleging their notice of dishonor was not timely relayed to Pulaski. Explain whether Pulaski is correct in its assertion.

13. On November 22, a $25,000 check drawn on the First National Bank of Nevada was deposited with Lincoln First Bank-Central. Lincoln forwarded the check to Nevada via Hartford National Bank and Trust Company and Wells Fargo Bank. Nevada received the check on Friday, December 10, and discovered that it was drawn on insufficient funds. That same day, Nevada informed Wells Fargo by telephone that the check had been dishonored. On Monday, December 13, Nevada mailed the check to Wells Fargo, which received it on Friday, December 17. Upon receiving the check, Wells Fargo promptly wired notice of the dishonor to Hartford and mailed the check to Hartford. Hartford received the check on December 21 and mailed it to Lincoln, which received it on December 27. Lincoln refused to accept the check, claiming that the notice of dishonor had arrived too late. Wells Fargo, which eventually ended up with the check and the $25,000 loss, brought an action to reverse the $25,000 credit it had given to Hartford in the course of handling the check. Decision?
14. On Tuesday, June 11, Siniscalchi issued a $200 check on the drawee, Valley Bank. On Saturday morning, June 15, the check was cashed. This transaction, as well as others taking place on that Saturday morning, was not recorded or processed through the bank's bookkeeping system until Monday, June 17. On that date, Siniscalchi arrived at the bank at 9:00 A.M. and asked to place a stop payment order on the check. A bank employee checked the bank records, which at that time indicated the instrument had not cleared the bank. At 9:45 A.M., she gave him a printed notice confirming his request to stop payment. May Siniscalchi recover the $200 paid on the check? Explain.
15. Tally held a savings account with American Security Bank. On seven occasions, Tally's personal secretary, who received his bank statements and had custody of his passbook, forged Tally's name on withdrawal slips that she then presented to the bank. The secretary obtained $52,825 in this manner. She confessed this to Tally after avoiding detection for several years. Tally, upon being informed of this, notified the bank of the issue (which was three years after his secretary's last withdrawal). Can Tally recover the funds from American Security Bank? The bank moved for partial summary judgment. Decision?
16. Morvarid Kashanchi and her sister, Firoyeh Paydar, held a savings account with Texas Commerce Medical Bank. An unauthorized withdrawal of $4,900 from the account was allegedly made by means of a telephone conversation between some other unidentified individual and a bank employee. Paydar learned of the transfer of funds when she received her bank statement and notified the bank that the withdrawal was unauthorized. The bank, however, declined to recredit the account for the $4,900 transfer. Kashanchi brought an action against the bank, claiming that the bank had violated the Electronic Funds Transfer Act (EFTA). The bank defended by arguing that the Act did not apply. Does the EFTA govern the transaction? Explain.
17. During a period of almost two years, Great Lakes Higher Education Corp. (Great Lakes), a not-for-profit student loan servicer, issued 224 student loan checks totaling $273,152.88. The checks were drawn against Great Lakes's account at First Wisconsin National Bank of Milwaukee (First Wisconsin). Each of the 224 checks was presented to Austin Bank of Chicago (Austin) without indorsement of the named payee. Austin Bank accepted each check for purposes of collection and without delay forwarded each check to First Wisconsin for that purpose. First Wisconsin paid Austin Bank the face amount of each check even though the indorsement signature of the payee was not on any of the checks. Has Austin Bank breached its warranty to First Wisconsin and Great Lakes due to the absence of proper indorsements? Explain.
18. Mary Mansi claims that eighteen checks on her account contain forgeries but were paid by the defendant bank, Sterling National Bank. The checks bore signatures which, according to the plaintiff's handwriting expert, were apparently "written by another person who attempted to simulate her signature" and thus were not considered obvious forgeries. Sterling National Bank acknowledged that while it did honor those eighteen checks, nine of them were returned to the plaintiff more than one year prior to this action. The defendant asserts that the plaintiff's claims on the remaining nine checks are barred due to her failure to examine her monthly bank statements. Who should prevail? Why?

- Chapter 29 Relationship of Principal and Agent
Chapter 30 Relationship with Third Parties

Chapter 29

RELATIONSHIP OF PRINCIPAL AND AGENT

Practically all of the world's business involves agents and in most important transactions, an agent on each side.

WARREN SEABEY, HANDBOOK ON THE LAW OF AGENCY

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Distinguish among the following relationships: (a) agency, (b) employment, and (c) independent contractor.
2. Explain the requirements for creating an agency relationship.
3. List and explain the duties owed by an agent to her principal.
4. List and explain the duties owed by a principal to his agent.
5. Identify the ways in which an agency relationship may be terminated.

By using agents, one person (the principal) may enter into any number of business transactions as though he had carried them out personally, thus multiplying and expanding his business activities. The law of agency, like the law of contracts, is basic to almost every other branch of business law.

Practically every type of contract or business transaction can be created or conducted through an agent. Therefore, the place and importance of agency in the practical conduct and operation of business cannot be overemphasized, particularly in the case of partnerships, corporations, and other business associations. Partnership is founded on the agency of the partners. Each partner is an agent of the partnership and as such has the authority to represent and bind the partnership in all usual transactions of the partnership. Corporations, in turn, must act through the agency of their officers and employees. Limited liability companies act through the actions of their members, managers, or both. Thus, practically and legally, agency is an essential part of partnerships, corporations, and other business associations. In addition, sole proprietors also may employ agents in the operations of their businesses. Business, therefore, is largely conducted by agents or representatives, not by the owners themselves.

Although some overlap occurs, the law of agency divides broadly into two main parts: the internal and the external. An agent functions as an agent by dealing with third persons, thereby establishing legal relationships between her principal and those third persons. These relationships are the external part of agency law, which we will discuss in the next chapter. In this chapter, we will consider the nature and function of agency, as well as other topics concerning the internal part of the law of agency.

Agency is primarily governed by state common law. An orderly presentation of this law is found in the Restatement (Second) of the Law of Agency published in 1958 by the American Law Institute (ALI). Regarded as a valuable authoritative reference work, the Restatement is extensively cited and quoted in reported judicial opinions and by legal scholars. In 2006 the ALI published the Restatement of the Law Third, Agency, which replaced the ALI's Restatement Second of Agency. This chapter and the next chapter will refer to the Third Restatement as the Restatement.

Nature of Agency

Agency is a consensual relationship in which one person (the agent) acts as a representative of or otherwise acts on behalf of another person (the principal) with power to affect the legal rights and duties of the principal. Moreover, the principal has a right to control the actions of the agent. An agent is, therefore, one who represents another, the principal, in business dealings with a third person, and the operation of agency therefore involves three persons: the principal, the agent, and a third person who deals with the agent. In dealings with a third person, the agent acts for and in the name and place of the principal, who, along with the third person, is a party to the transaction. The result of the agent's functioning is exactly the same as if the principal had dealt directly with the third person. However, if the existence and identity of the principal are disclosed, the agent acts not as a party but simply as an intermediary.

Within the scope of the authority granted to her by her principal, the agent may negotiate the terms of contracts with others and bind her principal to such contracts. Moreover, the negligence of an agent who is an employee in conducting the business of her principal exposes the principal to tort liability for injury and loss suffered by third persons.

SCOPE OF AGENCY PURPOSES

As a general rule, a person may do through an agent whatever business activity he may accomplish personally. Conversely, whatever he cannot legally do, he cannot authorize another to do for him. In addition, a person may not appoint an agent to perform acts that are so personal that their performance may not be delegated to another, as in the case of a contract for personal services.

OTHER LEGAL RELATIONSHIPS

Two other legal relationships overlap with agency: employer-employee and principal-independent contractor. In the employment relationship, for the purposes of vicarious liability discussed in the next chapter, an employee is an agent whose principal controls or has the right to control the manner and means of the agent's performance of work. All employees are agents, even those employees not authorized to contract on behalf of the employer or otherwise to conduct business with third parties. Thus, an assembly-line worker in a factory is an agent of the company employing her since she is subject to the employer's control, thereby consenting to act "on behalf" of the principal, but she does not have the right to bind the principal in contracts with third parties.

Although all employees are agents, not all agents are employees. Agents who are not employees are generally referred to as independent contractors. (The Third Restatement does not use this term.) In these cases, although the principal has the right of control over the agent, the principal does not control the manner and means of the agent's performance. For instance, an attorney retained to handle a particular transaction would be an independent contractor-agent regarding that particular transaction because the attorney is hired by the principal to perform a service, but the manner of the attorney's performance is not controlled by the principal. Other examples are auctioneers, brokers, and factors.

Finally, not all independent contractors are agents because the person hiring the independent contractor has no right of control over the independent contractor. For example, a taxicab driver hired to carry a person to the airport is not an agent of that person. Likewise, if Pam hires Bill to build a stone wall around her property, Bill is an independent contractor who is not an agent.

The distinction between employee and independent contractor has a number of important legal consequences. For example, as we will discuss in the next chapter, a principal is liable for the torts an employee commits within the scope of her employment but ordinarily is not liable for torts committed by an independent contractor. The following case further explains the differences between an employee and an independent contractor.

Practical Advice

When appointing an agent, consider structuring the relationship as a principal and independent contractor.

DEL PILAR V. DHL GLOBAL CUSTOMER SOLUTIONS (USA), INC.

DISTRICT COURT OF APPEAL OF FLORIDA, FIRST DISTRICT, 2008

caselaw.findlaw.com/data2/floridastatecases/app/app1_10_2008/07-5140.pdf

FACTS Danny Del Pilar (appellant) sustained injuries when his car collided with a delivery van painted in yellow, the widely recognized DHL color, and displaying the DHL name and logo. The truck was driven by a driver clad in DHL uniform and laden with packages destined for DHL customers in Duval County, Florida, and beyond. The van was owned not by DHL (appellee), but by Johnny Boyd, a driver for Silver Ink, Inc., a local company that was responsible at the time for picking up, sorting, and delivering all DHL packages in metropolitan Jacksonville. Boyd, working for Silver Ink on the DHL contract, was shuttling DHL packages when the accident occurred. DHL, whose primary business focuses on shipping packages via air around the world, has no capability to pick up or deliver local packages in Duval County and, at the time of the accident, it relied exclusively on Silver Ink to provide such local services.

DHL's agreement with Silver Ink essentially delegated to Silver Ink the responsibility to service DHL customers in the Jacksonville area. The contract identified Silver Ink as an "independent contractor" and provided that "the manner and means by which Contractor performs the services shall be at Contractor's sole discretion and control and are Contractor's sole responsibility." The agreement also, however, recited an exhaustive and detailed list of procedures that Silver Ink employees were to follow in processing, picking up, and delivering packages, and contained a provision under which Silver Ink was required to indemnify DHL in the event Silver Ink lost or damaged packages bound for DHL's customers. The agreement gave either party the power to terminate in the event of the other party's breach.

Silver Ink employees were contractually required to "wear a DHL uniform and properly display the DHL Marks [sic] and uniform in a clean, professional, and businesslike manner"; the contract specified the particular articles of clothing and accessories considered part of the DHL uniform, the purchase of which was funded by DHL. Silver Ink was required to submit to unannounced operational inspections and audits at DHL's sole discretion and was required to maintain a fleet of delivery vans operated in DHL livery, designed and placed on the vehicles in strict accordance with specifications established by DHL. Silver Ink's operational hub was co-located with DHL's Duval County facility and DHL employees monitored and reviewed Silver Ink operations on a daily basis.

Danny Del Pilar sued DHL for his personal injuries arising from the auto accident. The trial court granted summary judgment for DHL after concluding that Silver Ink was an independent contractor for whose alleged negligence DHL is not vicariously liable. Danny Del Pilar appealed.

DECISION Judgment reversed, and case is remanded.

OPINION Kahn, J. Generally, a principal is not vicariously liable for the negligence of its independent contractor, but the principal is liable for the negligence of its agent. [Citation.] Whether one laboring on behalf of another is a mere agent or an independent contractor "is a question of fact ... not controlled by descriptive labels employed by the parties themselves." [Citations.]

A particularly significant factor in the determination of status is "the degree of control exercised by the employer or owner over the agent. More particularly, it is the right of control, and not actual control, which determines the relationship between the parties." [Citations.]

In most cases, the terms of a contract between the parties is a pertinent index of the principal's right of control and should factor heavily into the inquiry, "unless other provisions of the agreement, or the parties' actual practice, demonstrate that it is not a valid indicator of status [or] ... belie the creation of the status agreed to by the parties." [Citation.] In that case, "the actual practice and relationship of the parties should control." [Citation.]

Elements of control that tend to suggest a relationship in which the principal is vicariously liable for the agent's negligence include, but are not limited to, (1) the principal's right to control the agent's use of the principal's trademarks, [citation]; (2) reservation to the principal of the unilateral right to prohibit the agent from working on behalf of competitors, [citations]; (3) a requirement that the agent's employees must undergo training before they work on the principal's behalf, [citation]; (4) a requirement that the agent perform services using only equipment selected pursuant to the principal's specifications, [citation]; (5) a requirement that the agent, when working on behalf of the principal, use a vehicle with the principal's logo, placed according to parameters established by the principal, [citation]; (6) a requirement that the agent adhere to customer-service procedures established by the principal, [citation]; and (7) a requirement that the agent submit to inspections conducted at the principal's discretion, [citation].

Here, the contract between appellee and Silver Ink certainly recites in conclusory terms the status of independent contractor; it identifies Silver Ink as an independent contractor and provides that “the manner and means by which Contractor performs the services shall be at Contractor’s sole discretion and control and are Contractor’s sole responsibility.” This observation does not conclude the matter.

When we look, as we must, more deeply than the agreement’s conclusory language, we find that, like provisions of the franchise agreement at issue in [citation], the balance of DHL’s contract with Silver Ink “leaves nothing to chance.” [Citation.] Somewhat inconsistently with the conclusory language purporting to confer broad discretion upon Silver Ink to fulfill its operational obligations, subsequent provisions list specific procedures and protocols that Silver Ink employees are to follow when picking up, sorting, and delivering DHL packages; everything from the process of scanning packages into DHL’s tracking system to procedures for redelivery after unsuccessful delivery attempts is set out in detail in the agreement. Shippers and recipients are “DHL customers,” and the agreement contains an indemnity provision requiring Silver Ink to indemnify DHL for damages stemming from packages lost or damaged due to Silver Ink’s negligence, suggesting that DHL intends, in the first instance, to answer directly to its customers. The contract requires Silver Ink employees to “wear a DHL uniform and properly display the DHL Marks and uniform in a clean, professional, and business-like manner,” with further specification of the particular apparel considered part of the DHL uniform. Silver Ink must operate delivery vehicles painted in the DHL livery and must submit to unannounced operational inspections and audits at DHL’s sole discretion. Silver Ink must pick up and deliver packages at times requested by DHL’s customers pursuant to DHL’s advertised guarantees.

Even if the analysis were limited to the terms of the contract itself, the facts in this case are susceptible of reasonably differing inferences as to the quantum of control reserved by DHL. The trial court erred in concluding, as a matter of law, that Silver Ink was appellee’s independent contractor. The question of DHL’s control over Silver Ink operations should go to the jury. [Citations.]

INTERPRETATION Whether a person is an employee or an independent contractor is a question of fact not controlled by descriptive labels employed by the parties themselves. A particularly significant factor in this determination is the degree of control exercised by the employer or owner over the agent, and it is the right of control, not actual control, which determines the relationship between the parties.

In addition, under numerous federal and state statutes, the obligations of a principal apply only to agents who are employees. These statutes cover such matters as labor relations, employment discrimination, disability, employee safety, workers’ compensation, social security, minimum wage, and unemployment compensation. We will discuss these and other statutory enactments affecting the employment relationship in Chapter 42.

Creation of Agency

As previously stated, agency is a consensual relationship that the principal and agent may form by contract or agreement. The Restatement defines an agency relationship as “the fiduciary relationship that arises when one person (a ‘principal’) manifests assent to another person (an ‘agent’) that the agent shall act on the principal’s behalf and subject to the principal’s control, and the agent manifests assent or otherwise consents so to act.” Thus the agency relationship involves three basic elements: assent, control by the principal, and the agent’s acting on behalf of the principal. A person can manifest assent or intention through written or spoken words or other conduct. Thus, whether an agency relationship has been created is determined by an objective test. If the principal requests another to act for him with respect to a matter and indicates that the other is to act without further communication, and the other consents to act, the relation of principal and agent exists. For example, Paula writes to Austin, a factor whose business is purchasing goods for others, telling him to select described goods and ship them at once to Paula. Before answering Paula’s letter, Austin does as directed, charging the goods to Paula. He is authorized to do this because an agency relationship exists between Paula and Austin.

The principal has the right to control the conduct of the agent with respect to the matters entrusted to the agent. The principal’s right to control continues throughout the duration of the agency relationship.

The relationship of principal and agent is consensual and not necessarily contractual; therefore, it may exist without consideration. Even though the agency relationship is consensual, how the parties label the relationship does not determine whether it is an agency. An agency created without an agent's right to compensation is a gratuitous agency. For example, Patti asks her friend Andrew to return for credit goods recently purchased from a store. If Andrew consents, a gratuitous agency has been created. The power of a gratuitous agent to affect the principal's relationships with third persons is the same as that of a paid agent, and his liabilities to and rights against third persons are the same as well. Nonetheless, agency by contract, the most usual method of creating the relationship, must satisfy all of the requirements of a contract.

In some circumstances a person is held liable as a principal, even though no actual agency has been created, in order to protect third parties who justifiably rely on a reasonable belief that a person is an agent and who act on that belief to their detriment. Called agency by estoppel, apparent agency, or ostensible agency, this liability arises when (1) a person ("principal") intentionally or carelessly causes a third party to believe that another person (the "agent") has authority to act on the principal's behalf; (2) the principal has notice of the third party's belief and does not take reasonable steps to notify the third party; (3) the third party reasonably and in good faith relies on the appearances created by the principal; and (4) the third party justifiably and detrimentally changes her position in reliance on the agent's apparent authority. When these requirements are met, the principal is liable to the third party for the loss the third party suffered by changing her position. The doctrine is applicable when the person against whom estoppel is asserted has made no manifestation that an actor has authority as an agent, but is responsible for the third party's belief that an actor is an agent, and the third party has justifiably been induced by that belief to undergo a detrimental change in position.

MILLER V. MCDONALD'S CORPORATION

COURT OF APPEALS OF OREGON, 1997
150 OR.APP. 274, 945 P.2D 1107

FACTS Joni Miller seeks damages from defendant McDonald's Corporation for injuries that she suffered when she bit into a heart-shaped sapphire stone while eating a Big Mac sandwich that she had purchased at a McDonald's restaurant in Tigard. McDonald's claims it is not liable because the 3K Corporation owns the restaurant. 3K owned and operated the restaurant under a License Agreement with McDonald's that required 3K to operate in a manner consistent with the "McDonald's System." This system includes proprietary rights in trademarks, "designs and color schemes" for restaurant buildings and signs, and specifications for certain food products as well as other business practices and policies. 3K, as the licensee, agreed to adopt and exclusively use the business practices of McDonald's. Despite these detailed instructions, the Agreement provided that 3K was not an agent of McDonald's for any purpose. Rather, it was an independent contractor and was responsible for all obligations and liabilities, including claims based on injury, illness, or death directly or indirectly resulting from the operation of the restaurant.

Miller was under the assumption that McDonald's owned, controlled, and managed the restaurant because its appearance and menu were similar to that of other McDonald's restaurants. In short, Miller testified, she went to the Tigard McDonald's because she relied on defendant's reputation and because she wanted to obtain the same quality of service, standard of care in food preparation, and general attention to detail that she had previously enjoyed at other McDonald's restaurants.

The trial court granted summary judgment to McDonald's on the ground that it did not own or operate the restaurant; rather, the owner and operator was a nonparty, 3K Restaurants, which held a franchise from McDonald's. Miller appeals.

DECISION Reversed and remanded.

OPINION Warren, J. Under these facts, 3K would be directly liable for any injuries that plaintiff suffered as a result of the restaurant's negligence. The issue on summary judgment is whether there is evidence that would permit a jury to find defendant vicariously liable for those injuries because of its relationship with 3K. Plaintiff asserts two theories of vicarious liability, actual agency and apparent agency. We hold that there is sufficient evidence to raise a jury issue under both theories. We first discuss actual agency.

The kind of actual agency relationship that would make defendant vicariously liable for 3K's negligence requires that defendant have the right to control the method by which 3K performed its obligations under the Agreement.

The common context for that test is a normal master-servant (or employer-employee) relationship. [Citations.] The relationship between two business entities is not precisely an employment relationship, but the Oregon Supreme Court, in common with most if not all other courts that have considered the issue, has applied the right to control test for vicarious liability in that context as well. [Citation.] We therefore apply that test to this case.

A number of other courts have applied the right to control test to a franchise relationship. The Delaware Supreme Court, in [citation], stated the test as it applies to that context:

If, in practical effect, the franchise agreement goes beyond the stage of setting standards, and allocates to the franchisor the right to exercise control over the daily operations of the franchise, an agency relationship exists. [Citation.]

*** we believe that a jury could find that defendant retained sufficient control over 3K's daily operations that an actual agency relationship existed. The Agreement did not simply set standards that 3K had to meet. Rather, it required 3K to use the precise methods that defendant established, both in the Agreement and in the detailed manuals that the Agreement incorporated. Those methods included the ways in which 3K was to handle and prepare food. Defendant enforced the use of those methods by regularly sending inspectors and by its retained power to cancel the Agreement. That evidence would support a finding that defendant had the right to control the way in which 3K performed at least food handling and preparation. In her complaint, plaintiff alleges that 3K's deficiencies in those functions resulted in the sapphire being in the Big Mac and thereby caused her injuries. ***

Plaintiff next asserts that defendant is vicariously liable for 3K's alleged negligence because 3K was defendant's apparent agent. The relevant standard is in Restatement (Second) of Agency, § 267, which we adopted in [citation]:

One who represents that another is his servant or other agent and thereby causes a third person justifiably to rely upon the care or skill of such apparent agent is subject to liability to the third person for harm caused by the lack of care or skill of the one appearing to be a servant or other agent as if he were such. [Citation.]

We have not applied § 267 to a franchisor/franchisee situation, but courts in a number of other jurisdictions have done so in ways that we find instructive. In most cases the courts have found that there was a jury issue of apparent agency. The crucial issues are whether the putative principal held the third party out as an agent and whether the plaintiff relied on that holding out.

In this case *** there is an issue of fact about whether defendant held 3K out as its agent. Everything about the appearance and operation of the Tigard McDonald's identified it with defendant and with the common image for all McDonald's restaurants that defendant has worked to create through national advertising, common signs and uniforms, common menus, common appearance, and common standards. The possible existence of a sign identifying 3K as the operator does not alter the conclusion that there is an issue of apparent agency for the jury. There are issues of fact of whether that sign was sufficiently visible to the public, in light of plaintiff's apparent failure to see it, and of whether one sign by itself is sufficient to remove the impression that defendant created through all of the other indicia of its control that it, and 3K under the requirements that defendant imposed, presented to the public.

Defendant does not seriously dispute that a jury could find that it held 3K out as its agent. Rather, it argues that there is insufficient evidence that plaintiff justifiably relied on that holding out. It argues that it is not sufficient for her to prove that she went to the Tigard McDonald's because it was a McDonald's restaurant. Rather, she also had to prove that she went to it because she believed that McDonald's Corporation operated both it and the other McDonald's restaurants that she had previously patronized. ***

*** in this case plaintiff testified that she relied on the general reputation of McDonald's in patronizing the Tigard restaurant and in her expectation of the quality of the food and service that she would receive. Especially in light of defendant's efforts to create a public perception of a common McDonald's system at all McDonald's restaurants, whoever operated them, a jury could find that plaintiff's reliance was objectively reasonable. The trial court erred in granting summary judgment on the apparent agency theory.

INTERPRETATION If a franchisor exercises sufficient control over its franchisee's operations, actual agency and/or apparent agency can exist and cause the franchisor to be held vicariously liable as a principal for the acts of the franchisee even if their written agreement provides that no agency relationship exists.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree that a franchise relationship should under certain circumstances be treated as an agency relationship? Explain.

FORMALITIES

As a general rule, a contract of agency requires no particular formality, and usually the contract either may be oral or may be inferred from the conduct of the principal. In some cases, however, the contract must be in writing. For example, the appointment of an agent for a period of more than a year comes within the one-year clause of the statute of frauds and thus must be in writing. In some states, the authority of an agent to sell land must be set down in a writing signed by the principal. Many states have “equal dignity” statutes providing that a principal must grant his agent in a written instrument the authority to enter into any contract required to be in writing. See Chapter 15 for a discussion of state and federal legislation giving electronic records and signatures the legal effect of traditional writings and signatures.

A power of attorney is an instrument that states an agent’s authority. A power of attorney is a formal manifestation from principal to agent, who is known as “an attorney in fact,” as well as to third parties, that evidences the agent’s appointment and the nature or extent of the agent’s authority. Under a power of attorney, a principal may, for example, appoint an agent not only to execute a contract for the sale of the principal’s real estate but also to execute the deed conveying title to the real estate to the third party. A number of states have created an optional statutory short-form power of attorney based on the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act. In 2006, a new Uniform Power of Attorney Act was promulgated to replace the Uniform Statutory Form Power of Attorney Act. To date, only four states have adopted the 2006 Act.

CAPACITY

The capacity of an individual to be a principal, and thus to act through an agent, depends on the capacity of the principal to do the act. For example, contracts entered into by a minor or an incompetent not under a guardianship are voidable. Consequently, the appointment of an agent by a minor or an incompetent not under a guardianship and any resulting contracts are voidable, regardless of the agent’s contractual capacity. The capacity of a person that is not an individual, such as a government or business association, to be a principal is determined by the law governing that entity.

Almost all of the states have adopted the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act providing for a durable power of attorney under which an agent’s power survives or is triggered by the principal’s loss of mental competence. (In 2006, a new Uniform Power of Attorney Act was promulgated to replace Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act. To date, only four states have adopted the 2006 Act.) A durable power of attorney is a written instrument that expresses the principal’s intention that the agent’s authority will not be affected by the principal’s subsequent incapacity or that the agent’s authority will become effective upon the principal’s subsequent incapacity.

On the other hand, because the act of the agent is considered the act of the principal, the incapacity of an agent to bind himself by contract does not disqualify him from making a contract that is binding on the principal. Thus, any person able to act, including individuals, corporations, partnerships, and other associations, ordinarily has the capacity to be an agent. The agent’s liability, however, depends on the agent’s capacity to contract. Therefore, although the contract of agency may be voidable, an authorized contract between the principal and the third person who dealt with the agent is valid.

An “electronic agent” is a computer program or other automated means used independently to initiate an action or respond to electronic records or performances in whole or in part without review or action by an individual. Electronic agents are not persons and, therefore, are not considered agents. In 2000 Congress enacted the Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce (E-Sign). The Act makes electronic records and signatures valid and enforceable across the United States for many types of transactions in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce. The Act validates contracts or other records relating to a transaction in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce formed by electronic agents so long as the action of each electronic agent is legally attributable to the person to be bound. E-Sign specifically excludes certain transactions, including (1) wills, codicils, and testamentary trusts; (2) adoptions, divorces, and other matters of family law; and (3) the Uniform Commercial Code other than sales and leases of goods.

Duties of Agent to Principal

The duties of the agent to the principal are determined by the express and implied provisions of any contract between the agent and the principal. In addition to these contractual duties, the agent is subject to various other duties imposed by law, unless the parties agree otherwise. Normally, a principal bases the selection of an agent on the agent’s ability, skill, and integrity. Moreover, the principal not only authorizes and empowers the agent to bind her on contracts with third persons but also often places the agent in possession of her money and other property. As a result, the agent is in a position to injure the principal, either through negligence or dishonesty. Accordingly, an agent, as a fiduciary (a person in a position of trust and confidence), owes her principal the duties of obedience, good conduct, diligence, and loyalty; the duty to inform; and the duty to provide an accounting. Moreover, an agent is liable for any loss she causes to the principal through her breach of these duties.

A gratuitous agent is subject to the same duty of loyalty that is imposed on a paid agent and is equally liable to the principal for the harm he causes by his careless performance. Although the lack of consideration usually places a gratuitous agent under no duty to perform for the principal, such an agent may be liable to the principal for failing to perform a promise on which the principal has relied if the agent should have realized that his promise would induce reliance.

Practical Advice

Recognize that even if you agree to serve as an agent without compensation, you owe a fiduciary duty to the principal and are liable to her for your negligence.

DUTY OF OBEDIENCE

The duty of obedience requires the agent to act in the principal's affairs only as actually authorized by the principal and to obey all lawful instructions and directions of the principal. If an agent exceeds her actual authority, she is subject to liability to the principal for loss caused the principal. An agent is also liable to the principal for unauthorized acts that are the result of the agent's unreasonable interpretations of the principal's directions. An agent is not, however, under a duty to follow orders to perform illegal or tortious acts, such as misrepresenting the quality of his principal's goods or those of a competitor. The agent may be subject to liability to her principal for breach of the duty of obedience (1) if she entered into an unauthorized contract for which her principal is now liable; (2) if she has improperly delegated her authority; or (3) if she has committed a tort for which the principal is now liable. Thus, an agent who sells on credit in violation of his principal's explicit instructions has breached the duty of obedience and is liable to the principal for any amounts the purchaser does not pay. Moreover, an agent who violates her duty of obedience materially breaches the agency contract and loses her right to compensation.

DUTY OF GOOD CONDUCT

An agent has a duty, within the scope of the agency relationship, to act reasonably and to avoid conduct that is likely to damage the principal's interests. This duty reflects the fact that the conduct of agents can have a significant effect on the principal's reputation. A breach of this duty makes the agent liable to the principal and subject to rightful discharge or termination.

DUTY OF DILIGENCE

Subject to any agreement with the principal, an agent has a duty to the principal to act with the care, competence, and diligence normally exercised by agents in similar circumstances. Special skills or knowledge possessed by an agent are circumstances to be taken into account in determining whether the agent acted with due care and diligence. Moreover, if the agent claims to possess special skill or knowledge, the agent has a duty to act with the care, competence, and diligence normally exercised by agents with such skill or knowledge. An agent who does not exercise the required care, competence, and diligence is liable to his principal for any resulting harm. For example, Peg appoints Alvin as her agent to sell goods in markets where the highest price can be obtained. Although he could have obtained a higher price in a nearby market by carefully obtaining information, Alvin sells goods in a glutted market and obtains a low price. Consequently, he is liable to Peg for breach of the duty of diligence.

A gratuitous agent owes a standard of care that is reasonable to expect under the circumstances, which include the skill and experience that the agent possesses. Thus, providing a service gratuitously may subject an agent to duties of competence and diligence to the principal that do not differ from the duties owed by a compensated agent.

DUTY TO INFORM

An agent has a duty to use reasonable effort to provide the principal with facts that the agent knows, has reason to know, or should know if (1) the agent knows, or has reason to know, that the principal would wish to have the facts or (2) the facts are material to the agent's duties to the principal. However, this duty does not apply to facts if providing them to the principal would violate a superior duty owed by the agent to another person. The rule of agency providing that notice to an agent is notice to her principal makes this duty essential. An agent who breaches this duty is subject to liability to the principal for loss caused the principal by the agent's breach and may also be subject to termination of the agency relationship. Moreover, if the agent's breach of this duty constitutes a breach of the contract between the agent and the principal, the agent is also liable for breach of contract.

Examples of information that an agent is under a duty to communicate may include the following: (1) a customer of the principal has become insolvent; (2) a debtor of the principal has become insolvent; (3) a partner of a firm with which the principal has previously dealt, and with which the principal or agent is about to deal, has withdrawn from the firm; or (4) property that the principal has authorized the agent to sell at a specified price can be sold at a higher price.

DUTY TO ACCOUNT

Subject to any agreement with the principal, an agent has a duty to keep and render accounts to the principal of money or other property received or paid out on the principal's account. Moreover, the agent may not mingle the principal's property with any other person's property and may not deal with the principal's property so that it appears to be the agent's property.

FIDUCIARY DUTY

A fiduciary duty, arising out of a relationship of trust and confidence, requires the utmost loyalty and good faith. An agent has a fiduciary duty to act loyally for the principal's benefit in all matters connected with the agency relationship. This duty is imposed by law upon the agent and is also owed by an employee to his employer. The principal may agree that conduct by an agent that would otherwise constitute a breach of the fiduciary duty shall not constitute a breach of that duty provided that in obtaining the principal's consent, the agent (1) acts in good faith, (2) discloses all material facts that the agent knows, has reason to know, or should know would reasonably affect the principal's judgment, and (3) otherwise deals fairly with the principal.

An agent's fiduciary duty to a principal generally begins with the formation of the agency relationship and ends with its termination. However, as discussed below, an agent may be subject to duties after termination with respect to the agent's use of the principal's property and confidential information provided by the principal.

An agent who violates his fiduciary duty is liable to his principal for breach of contract, in tort for losses caused and possibly punitive damages, and in restitution for profits he made or property received in breach of the fiduciary duty. Moreover, he loses the right to compensation. The principal may avoid a transaction in which the agent breached his fiduciary duty, even though the principal suffered no loss. A breach of fiduciary duty may also constitute just cause for discharge of the agent.

The fiduciary duty arises most frequently in the following situations involving principals and their agents, although it is by no means limited to these situations.

Conflicts of Interest An agent has a duty not to deal with the principal as, or on behalf of, an adverse party in a transaction connected with the agency relationship. An agent must act solely in the interest of his principal, not in his own interest or in the interest of another. In addition, an agent may not represent his principal in any transaction in which the agent has a personal interest. Nor may the agent act on behalf of adverse parties to a transaction without both principals' approval to the dual agency. An agent may take a position that conflicts with the interest of his principal only if the principal, with full knowledge of all of the facts, consents. For example, A, an agent of P who desires to purchase land, agrees with C, who represents B, a seller of land, that A and C will endeavor to effect a transaction between their principals and will pool their commissions. A and C have committed a breach of fiduciary duty to P and B.

Self-Dealing An agent has a duty not to deal with the principal as an adverse party in a transaction connected with the agency relationship. The courts closely scrutinize transactions between an agent and her principal. The agent may not deal at arm's length with her principal. The agent thus owes her principal a duty of full disclosure regarding all relevant facts that affect the transaction. Moreover, the transaction must be fair. Thus, Penny employs Albert to purchase for her a site suitable for a shopping center. Albert owns such a site and sells it to Penny at the fair market value but does not disclose to Penny that he had owned the land. Penny may rescind the transaction. The agent's loyalty must be undivided, and he must devote his actions exclusively to the representation and promotion of his principal's interests.

Duty Not to Compete During the agency relationship an agent must not compete with his principal or act on behalf or otherwise assist any of the principal's competitors. After the agency terminates without breach by the agent, however, unless otherwise agreed, the agent may compete with his former principal. The courts will enforce by injunction a contractual agreement by the agent not to compete after termination if the restriction is reasonable as to time and place and necessary to protect the principal's legitimate interest. Contractual agreements not to compete are discussed in Chapter 13 where it is noted that such noncompetition contracts may be subject to different standards for Internet companies and their employees.

Practical Advice

If you are the principal, consider obtaining from your agents a reasonable covenant that they will not compete with you after the agency terminates.

Misappropriation An agent may not use property of the principal for the agent's own purposes or for the benefit of a third party. Unless the principal consents, an agent who has possession of the principal's property has a duty to use it only on the principal's behalf even if the agent's use of the property does not cause harm to the principal. An agent is liable to the principal for any profit the agent made while using the principal's property or for the value of the agent's use of the principal's property. An agent's duties regarding the principal's property continue after the agency terminates, and a former agent has a duty to return any of the principal's property she still possesses.

Confidential Information An agent may not use or disclose confidential information obtained in the course of the agency for her own benefit or the benefit of a third party. Confidential information is information that, if disclosed, would harm the principal's business or that has value because it is not generally known. Confidential information includes unique business methods, trade secrets, business plans, personnel, nonpublic financial results, and customer lists. An agent may, however, reveal confidential information that the principal is committing, or is about to commit, a crime. Many statutes provided protection to employees who "whistle-blow."

Unless otherwise agreed, even after the agency terminates, the agent may not use or disclose to third persons confidential information. The agent may, however, use the generally known skills, knowledge, and information she acquired during the agency relationship.

Duty to Account for Financial Benefits Unless otherwise agreed, an agent has a duty not to acquire any financial or other material benefits in connection with transactions conducted on behalf of the principal. Such benefits would include bribes, kickbacks, and gifts. Moreover, an agent may not make a secret profit from any transaction subject to the agency. All material benefits, including secret profits, belong to the principal, to whom the agent must account. In addition, the principal may recover any damages caused by the agent's breach. Thus, if an agent, authorized to sell certain property of her principal for $1,000 sells it for $1,500, she may not secretly pocket the additional $500.

Practical Advice

Do not agree to become an agent if you are not willing or able to fulfill all of the duties an agent owes unless your agency contract clearly relieves you of those duties you find unacceptable.

DETROIT LIONS, INC. v. ARGOVITZ

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN, 1984
580 F.SUPP. 542, AFFIRMED, 767 F.2D 919

FACTS Jerry Argovitz was employed as an agent of Billy Sims, a professional football player. Early in 1983, Argovitz informed Sims that he was awaiting the approval of his application for a U.S. Football League franchise in Houston. Sims was unaware, however, of Argovitz's extensive ownership interest in the new Houston Gamblers organization. Meanwhile, during the spring of 1983, Argovitz continued contract negotiations on behalf of Sims with the Detroit Lions of the National Football League. By June 22, Argovitz and the Lions were very close to an agreement, although Argovitz represented to Sims that the negotiations were not proceeding well. Argovitz then sought an offer for Sims's services from the Gamblers. The Gamblers offered Sims a $3.5 million, five-year deal. Argovitz told Sims that he thought the Lions would match this figure; however, he did not seek a final offer from the Lions and then present the terms of both packages to Sims. Sims, convinced that the Lions were not negotiating in good faith, signed with the Gamblers on July 1, 1983. On December 16, 1983, Sims signed a second contract with the Lions. The Lions and Sims brought an action against Argovitz, seeking to invalidate Sims's contract with the Gamblers on the ground that Argovitz breached his fiduciary duty when negotiating the contract with the Gamblers.

DECISION Judgment for the Lions and Sims rescinding the Gamblers' contract with Sims.

OPINION DeMascio, J. The relationship between a principal and agent is fiduciary in nature, and as such imposes a duty of loyalty, good faith, and fair and honest dealing on the agent. [Citation.]

A fiduciary relationship arises not only from a formal principal-agent relationship, but also from informal relationships of trust and confidence. [Citations.]

In light of the express agency agreement, and the relationship between Sims and Argovitz, Argovitz clearly owed Sims the fiduciary duties of an agent at all times relevant to this lawsuit.

An agent's duty of loyalty requires that he not have a personal stake that conflicts with the principal's interest in a transaction in which he represents his principal. As stated in [citation]:

(T)he principal is entitled to the best efforts and unbiased judgment of his agent. *** (T)he law denies the right of an agent to assume any relationship that is antagonistic to his duty to his principal, and it has many times been held that the agent cannot be both buyer and seller at the same time nor connect his own interests with property involved in his dealings as an agent for another.

A fiduciary violates the prohibition against self-dealing not only by dealing with himself on his principal's behalf, but also by dealing on his principal's behalf with a third party in which he has an interest, such as a partnership in which he is a member. ***

Where an agent has an interest adverse to that of his principal in a transaction in which he purports to act on behalf of his principal, the transaction is voidable by the principal unless the agent disclosed all material facts within the agent's knowledge that might affect the principal's judgment. [Citation.]

The mere fact that the contract is fair to the principal does not deny the principal the right to rescind the contract when it was negotiated by an agent in violation of the prohibition against self-dealing. ***

Once it has been shown that an agent had an interest in a transaction involving his principal antagonistic to the principal's interest, fraud on the part of the agent is presumed. The burden of proof then rests upon the agent to show that his principal had full knowledge, not only of the fact that the agent was interested, but also of every material fact known to the agent which might affect the principal and that having such knowledge, the principal freely consented to the transaction.

It is not sufficient for the agent merely to inform the principal that he has an interest that conflicts with the principal's interest. Rather, he must inform the principal "of all facts that come to his knowledge that are or may be material or which might affect his principal's rights or interests or influence the action he takes." [Citation.]

Argovitz clearly had a personal interest in signing Sims with the Gamblers that was adverse to Sims's interest—he had an ownership interest in the Gamblers and thus would profit if the Gamblers were profitable, and would incur substantial personal liabilities should the Gamblers not be financially successful. Since this showing has been made, fraud on Argovitz's part is presumed, and the Gamblers' contract must be rescinded unless Argovitz has shown by a preponderance of the evidence that he informed Sims of every material fact that might have influenced Sims's decision whether or not to sign the Gamblers' contract.

We conclude that Argovitz has failed to show by a preponderance of the evidence either: 1) that he informed Sims of the [material] facts, or 2) that these facts would not have influenced Sims's decision whether to sign the Gamblers' contract. ***

As a court sitting in equity, we conclude that rescission is the appropriate remedy. We are dismayed by Argovitz's egregious conduct. The careless fashion in which Argovitz went about ascertaining the highest price for Sims's service convinces us of the wisdom of the maxim: no man can faithfully serve two masters whose interests are in conflict.

INTERPRETATION An agent's fiduciary duty precludes the agent from acting in his own interest or in the interests of another if such action would conflict with his principal's interests.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did Argovitz act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What is the appropriate relief in this situation? Explain.

Duties of Principal to Agent

Although, in terms of the rights and duties arising out of the agency relationship, the duties of the agent receive more emphasis than those of the principal, an agent nonetheless has certain rights against the principal, both under the contract and by the operation of law. Connected to these rights are certain duties, based in contract and tort law, which the principal owes to the agent. For a summary of the primary duties in the principal-agent relationship, see Figure 29-1.

CONTRACTUAL DUTIES

An agency relationship may exist in the absence of a contract between the principal and agent. However, many principals and agents do enter into contracts, in which case a principal has a duty to act in accordance with the express and implied terms of any contract between the principal and the agent. The contractual duties owed by a principal to an agent are the duties of compensation, reimbursement, and indemnification; each may be excluded or modified by agreement between the principal and agent. Although a gratuitous agent is not owed a duty of

Depending on the particular case, the principal must furnish either the agent's means of employment or the opportunity for work. For example, a principal who employs an agent to sell his goods must supply the agent with conforming goods. It is also the duty of the principal not to terminate the agency wrongfully.

Compensation A principal has a duty to compensate her agent unless the agent has agreed to serve gratuitously. If the agreement does not specify a definite compensation, a principal is under a duty to pay the reasonable value of authorized services the agent has performed. An agent loses the right to compensation by (1) breaching the duty of obedience, (2) breaching the duty of loyalty, or (3) willfully and deliberately breaching the agency contract. Furthermore, an agent whose compensation is dependent upon her accomplishing a specific result is entitled to the agreed compensation only if she achieves the result in the time specified or in a reasonable time, if no time is stated. A common example is a listing agreement between a seller and a real estate broker providing for a commission to the broker if he finds a buyer ready, willing, and able to buy the property on the terms specified in the agreement.

Practical Advice

Specify the compensation to be paid the agent; if none is to be paid, clearly state that the agency is intended to be gratuitous.

Indemnification and Reimbursement In general, a principal has an obligation to indemnify (compensate for a loss) an agent whenever the agent makes a payment or incurs an expense or other loss while acting as authorized on behalf of the principal. The contract between the principal and agent may specify the extent of this duty. In the absence of any contractual provisions, a principal has a duty to reimburse the agent when the agent makes a payment within the scope of the agent's actual authority. For example, an agent who reasonably and properly pays a fire insurance premium for the protection of her principal's property is entitled to reimbursement for the payment.

A principal also has a duty to indemnify the agent when the agent suffers a loss that fairly should be borne by the principal in light of their relationship. For example, suppose that Perry, the principal, has in his possession goods belonging to Margot. Perry directs Alma, his agent, to sell these goods. Alma, believing Perry to be the owner, sells the goods to Turner. Margot then sues Alma for the conversion of her goods and recovers a judgment, which Alma pays to Margot. Alma is entitled to indemnification from Perry for her loss, including the amount she reasonably expended in defense of the lawsuit brought by Margot.

TORT AND OTHER DUTIES

A principal owes to any agent the same duties under tort law that the principal owes to all parties. Moreover, a principal has a duty to deal with the agent fairly and in good faith. This duty requires that the principal provide the agent with information about risks of physical harm or monetary loss that the principal knows, has reason to know, or should know are present in the agent's work but are unknown to the agent. For instance, in directing his agent to collect rent from a tenant who is known to have assaulted rent collectors, a principal has a duty to warn the agent of this risk.

When the agent is an employee, the principal owes the agent additional duties. Among these is the duty to provide the employee with reasonably safe conditions of employment and to warn the employee of any unreasonable risk involved in the employment. A negligent employer is also liable to his employees for injury caused by the negligence of other employees and of other agents doing work for him. We will discuss the duties owed by an employer to an employee more fully in Chapter 42.

Termination of Agency

Because the authority of an agent is based on the consent of the principal, the agency is terminated when such consent is withdrawn or otherwise ceases to exist. On termination of the agency, the agent's actual authority ends, and she is not entitled to compensation for services subsequently rendered. However, some of the agent's fiduciary duties may continue. The termination of apparent authority will be discussed in the next chapter. Termination may take place by the acts of the parties or by operation of law.

ACTS OF THE PARTIES

Termination by the acts of the parties may occur by the provisions of the original agreement, by the subsequent acts of both principal and agent, or by the subsequent act of either one.

Lapse of Time An agent's actual authority terminates as agreed by the agent and the principal. Authority conferred upon an agent for a specified time terminates when that period expires. If no time is specified, authority terminates at the end of a reasonable period. For example, Palmer authorizes Avery to sell a tract of land for him. After ten years pass without communication between Palmer and Avery, Avery purports to sell the tract. But his authorization has terminated due to lapse of time.

Mutual Agreement of the Parties The agency relationship is created by agreement and may be terminated at any time by mutual agreement of the principal and the agent.

Revocation of Authority A principal may revoke an agent's authority at any time by notifying the agent. But if such revocation constitutes a breach of contract by the principal, the agent may recover damages from the principal. Nonetheless, when the agent has seriously breached the agency contract, has willfully disobeyed, or has violated the fiduciary duty, the principal is not liable for terminating the agency relationship. In addition, if the agency is gratuitous, the principal ordinarily may revoke it without liability to the agent.

Renunciation by the Agent The agent also has the power to end the agency by notifying the principal that she renounces the authority given her by the principal. If the agency is gratuitous, the agent ordinarily may renounce it without liability to the principal. However, if the parties have contracted for the agency to continue for a specified time, an unjustified renunciation prior to the expiration of that time is a breach of contract.

OPERATION OF LAW

By the operation of law, the occurrence of certain events will automatically terminate an agency relationship. These events either make it impossible for the agent to perform or unlikely that the principal would want the agent to act. As a matter of law, the occurrence of any of the following events ordinarily terminates agency.

Death Because the authority given to an agent by a principal is strictly personal, the death of an individual agent terminates the agent's actual authority. The death of an individual principal also terminates the actual authority of the agent when the agent has notice of the principal's death. This is contrary to the Second Restatement, which took the position that the principal's death terminated the agent's actual authority whether the agent had notice or not. For example, Polk employs Allison to sell Polk's line of goods under a contract that specifies Allison's commission and the one-year period for which the employment is to continue. Without Allison's knowledge, Polk dies. Under the Second Restatement, Allison no longer has authority to sell Polk's goods. The death of Polk, the principal, terminated the authority of Allison the agent. Under the Third Restatement, on the other hand, Allison would continue to have actual authority until she received notice of Polk's death. A person has notice of a fact if the person knows the fact, has reason to know the fact, has received an effective notification of the fact, or should know the fact to fulfill a duty owed to another person. Moreover, the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act allows the holder of any power of attorney, durable or otherwise, to exercise it on the death of the principal, if its exercise is in good faith and without knowledge of the principal's death. More than forty states have adopted this Act.

When an agent or principal is not an individual, the organizational statutes typically determine when authority terminates upon the cessation of the existence of that organization. (This will be discussed further in Part VII of this book.) When the organizational statute does not specify, the Restatement provides the agent's actual authority terminates when the nonindividual principal or agent ceases to exist or begins a process that will lead to the cessation of its existence.

Incapacity Incapacity of the principal that occurs after the formation of the agency terminates the agent's actual authority when the agent has notice of the principal's incapacity. This is contrary to the Second Restatement, which took the position that the principal's incapacity terminated the agent's actual authority without notice to the agent. To illustrate, Powell authorizes Anna to sell in the next ten months an apartment complex for not less than $2 million. Without Anna's knowledge, Powell is adjudicated incompetent two months later. Under the Second Restatement, Anna's authority to sell the apartment complex is terminated. Under the Third Restatement, Anna would continue to have actual authority until she received notice of Powell's incapacity.

If an agent is appointed under a durable power of attorney, the authority of an agent survives, or is triggered by, the incapacity or disability of the principal. Moreover, the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act allows the holder of a power of attorney that is not durable to exercise it on the incapacity of the principal, if its exercise is in good faith and without knowledge of the principal's incapacity.

Practical Advice

A durable power of attorney is useful in families, allowing adult children to become the agents of their elderly or ill parents.

GADDY V. DOUGLASS

COURT OF APPEALS OF SOUTH CAROLINA, 2004

FACTS Ms. M was born in 1918. After retiring, Ms. M returned to Fairfield, South Carolina, where she lived on her family farm with her brother, a dentist, until his death in the early 1980s. Ms. M never married. Dr. Gaddy was Ms. M's physician and a close family friend. Ms. M had little contact with many of her relatives, including the appellants, who are Ms. M's third cousins. In 1988, Ms. M executed a durable general power of attorney designating Dr. Gaddy as her attorney-in-fact. Concerns about Ms. M's progressively worsening mental condition prompted Dr. Gaddy to file the 1988 durable power of attorney in November 1995. Thereafter, Dr. Gaddy began to act as Ms. M's attorney-in-fact and assumed control of her finances, farm, and health care. His responsibilities included paying her bills, tilling her garden, repairing fences, and hiring caregivers.

In March 1996, Dr. Gaddy discovered that Ms. M had fallen in her home and fractured a vertebra. Ms. M was hospitalized for six weeks. During the hospitalization, Dr. Gaddy fumigated and cleaned her home, which had become flea-infested and unclean to the point where rat droppings were found in the house. Finding that Ms. M was not mentally competent to care for herself, he arranged for full-time caretakers to attend to her after she recovered from the injuries she sustained in her fall. He made improvements in her home, including plumbing repairs adapting a bathroom to make it safer for caretakers to bathe Ms. M, who was incapable of doing so unassisted. During Ms. M's hospitalization, neither of the appellants visited her in the hospital or sought to assist her in any manner.

Dr. Gaddy had Ms. M examined and evaluated by Dr. James E. Carnes, a neurologist, in December 1996. After examining Ms. M, Dr. Carnes found that she suffered from dementia and confirmed she was unable to handle her affairs. Ms. M's long-standing distant relationship with some members of her family, including appellants, changed in March of 1999. On March 12, 1999, appellants visited Ms. M, and with the help of a disgruntled caretaker, took her to an appointment with Columbia attorney Douglas N. Truslow to "get rid of Dr. Gaddy." On the drive to Truslow's office, Heller had to remind Ms. M several times of their destination and purpose. At Truslow's office, Ms. M signed a document revoking the 1988 will and the 1988 durable power of attorney. She also signed a new durable power of attorney naming appellants as her attorneys-in-fact. Appellants failed to disclose Ms. M's dementia to Truslow. Based on the revocation of the 1988 power of attorney and recently executed power of attorney, appellants prohibited Dr. Gaddy from contacting Ms. M. and threatened Dr. Gaddy with arrest if he tried to visit Ms. M.

On March 15, 1999, three days after Ms. M purportedly revoked the 1988 durable power of attorney and executed the 1999 durable power of attorney, Dr. Gaddy brought a legal action as her attorney-in-fact pursuant to the 1988 durable power of attorney. Medical testimony was presented from five physicians who had examined Ms. M. They concluded that Ms. M. (1) was “unable to handle her financial affairs” and “would need help managing her daily activities,” and (2) would not “ever have moments of lucidity” to “understand legal documents.”

The trial judge concluded that Ms. M lacked contractual capacity “from March 12, 1999 and continuously thereafter.” As a result, he invalidated the 1999 revocation of the 1988 durable power of attorney and the 1999 durable power of attorney, and declared valid the 1988 durable power of attorney.

DECISION Judgment affirmed in relevant part.

OPINION Kittredge, J. Since 1986, the South Carolina Legislature has expressly authorized and sanctioned the use and efficacy of durable powers of attorneys. ***

Upon the execution of a durable power of attorney, the attorney-in-fact retains authority to act on the principal’s behalf notwithstanding the subsequent physical disability or mental incompetence of the principal. To honor this unmistakable legislative intent, it is incumbent on courts to uphold a durable power of attorney unless the principal retains contractual capacity to revoke the then existing durable power of attorney or to execute a new power of attorney. *****

“In order to execute or revoke a valid power of attorney, the principal must possess contractual capacity.” [Citation.] Contractual capacity is generally defined as a person’s ability to understand in a meaningful way, at the time the contract is executed, the nature, scope and effect of the contract. [Citation.] Where, as here, the mental condition of the principal is of a chronic nature, evidence of the principal’s prior or subsequent condition is admissible as bearing upon his or her condition at the time the contract is executed. [Citation.] ***

Here, the credible medical *** testimony presented compellingly indicates that Ms. M suffered from at least moderate to severe dementia caused by Alzheimer’s Disease, a chronic and permanent organic disease, on March 12, 1999. We are firmly persuaded that Ms. M’s dementia, chronic and progressive in nature, clearly rendered her incapable of possessing contractual capacity to revoke the 1988 durable power of attorney or execute the 1999 power of attorney. We find this conclusion inescapable based on the record before us.

The very idea of a durable power of attorney is to protect the principal should he or she become incapacitated. This case is precisely the type of situation for which the durable power of attorney is intended. ***

INTERPRETATION Under a durable power of attorney, the agent retains authority to act on the principal’s behalf despite the principal’s subsequent mental incompetence; the principal may revoke a valid power of attorney only if she possesses contractual capacity.

ETHICAL QUESTION Were the appellants’ actions ethical?

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What are benefits and costs of authorizing durable powers of attorney?

Change in Circumstances An agent’s actual authority terminates whenever the agent should reasonably conclude that the principal no longer would assent to the agent’s taking action on the principal’s behalf. For example, Patricia authorizes Aaron to sell her eighty acres of farmland for $800 per acre. Subsequently, oil is discovered on nearby land, and Patricia’s land greatly increases in value. Because Aaron knows of this, whereas Patricia does not, Aaron’s authority to sell the land is terminated.

The Second Restatement specified a number of subsequent changes in circumstances that would terminate an agent’s actual authority, including accomplishment of authorized act, bankruptcy of principal or agent, change in business conditions, loss or destruction of subject matter, disloyalty of agent, change in law, and outbreak of war. The Third Restatement takes a different approach by providing a basic rule that an agent acts with actual authority “when, at the time of taking action that has legal consequences for the principal, the agent reasonably believes, in accordance with the principal’s manifestations to the agent, that the principal wishes the agent so to act.” Thus, if circumstances have changed such that, at the time the agent takes action, it is not reasonable for the agent to believe that the principal at that time consents to the action being taken on the principal’s behalf, then the agent lacks actual authority to act even though she would have had actual authority prior to the change in circumstances.

IRREVOCABLE POWERS

The Restatement defines a power given as security as “a power to affect the legal relations of its creator that is created

APPLYING THE LAW

Relationship of Principal and Agent

Facts After Thomson's husband died in 1999, she gave a power of attorney to her niece, Surani, who was an accountant. The written power of attorney granted Surani authority to manage all of Thomson's financial affairs and specified that Surani's authority was to remain unaffected by Thomson's subsequent incapacity. Accordingly, Surani provided a copy of the power of attorney to Thomson's bank, took possession of Thomson's checkbook, and began paying all of her aunt's expenses by drawing checks on Thomson's bank account.

In 2004, Surani was involved in an accident that diminished her mental capacity. As a result, she left her job as an accountant, but she was able to continue to pay Thomson's bills. In 2008, when Thomson was ninety-two, she was hospitalized for a severe illness and subsequently adjudicated to be incompetent. Nonetheless, Surani continued to write checks for Thomson's expenses from Thomson's checking account.

Issue Was Surani's authority to issue checks from Thomson's account terminated as a matter of law—either by her own diminished capacity in 2004 or by the court's declaring Thomson incompetent in 2008?

Rule of Law The general rule is that incapacity of the principal that occurs after the formation of the agency terminates the agent's actual authority. A durable power of attorney is a formal, written appointment of an agent that provides for the agent's authority to survive, or be triggered by, the principal's subsequent incapacity.

Because the act of the agent is considered the act of the principal, the incapacity of an agent to bind himself by contract does not disqualify him from making a contract that is binding on the principal. Thus, any person able to act ordinarily has the capacity to be an agent. Thus, if the contract is authorized, it is valid despite the agent's incapacity. However, if after the creation of the agency, the agent is rendered incapable of performing the acts authorized by the principal, the agency is terminated by operation of law.

Application This case involves incapacity of both the principal, Thomson, and the agent, Surani, some years after the agency was created. The power of attorney Thomson granted to Surani by a written document in 1998 is a durable power of attorney because it expressly provided that Surani's authority to manage Thomson's financial affairs was to continue after Thomson lost her capacity to contract. Therefore, the fact that Thomson was adjudicated incompetent in 2008 did not terminate Surani's agency. Indeed, the point of a durable power of attorney is to empower the agent to act, or continue to act, on the principal's behalf after the principal's capacity is called into question.

Surani's capacity to perform the tasks required of the agency is a different question. The accident she suffered in 2004 reduced her mental capacity to some unspecified degree, but Surani was not adjudged incompetent. Instead, as a result of her disability, she either chose to, or was required to, leave her accounting practice. Nonetheless, she apparently was still capable of successfully handling Thomson's bills by issuing the necessary checks. Therefore, her accident did not terminate her authority to continue handling those expenses. This is true regardless of whether her diminished capacity may have operated to terminate other more sophisticated aspects of her written authority to "manage all of Thomson's financial affairs," such as making investment decisions, of which Surani may no longer have been capable after her accident.

Conclusion Neither Surani's accident in 2004 nor Thomson's adjudicated incompetency in 2008 terminated Surani's agency, and she retained her authority to pay Thomson's bills by drawing checks on Thomson's bank account.

in the form of a manifestation of actual authority and held for the benefit of the holder or a third person." A power given as security creates neither a relationship of agency nor actual authority, although the power enables its holder to affect the legal relations of the creator of the power. The power arises from a manifestation of assent by its creator that the holder of the power may, for example, dispose of property or other interests of the creator. The Restatement provides the following illustration: Pillsbury owns Blackacre, which is situated next to Whiteacre, on which Pillsbury operates a restaurant.

To finance renovations and expansions, Pillsbury borrows money from Ashton. A written agreement between Pillsbury and Ashton provides that Ashton shall irrevocably have Pillsbury's authority to transfer ownership of Blackacre to Ashton in the event Pillsbury defaults on the loan. Ashton has a power given as security.

The Restatement's definition includes, but is more extensive than, the rule in some states regarding an agency coupled with an interest, in which the holder (agent) has a security interest in the power conferred upon him by the

Is Medicaid Designed to Protect Inheritances?

FACTS Mrs. Singer is a seventy-eight-year-old widow. Although she remains somewhat active and lives in her own apartment, her physical and mental abilities are declining. She fell recently and needs assistance with bathing and some routine chores.

Mrs. Singer has two children, a son, Steven, who lives within fifteen minutes of her home, and a daughter, Kate, who lives a great distance away. While Mrs. Singer sees Kate only once a year, she remains in close contact with Steven, who does her grocery shopping, takes her to the doctor, and provides transportation, thereby enabling Mrs. Singer to maintain some social life.

Steven has become increasingly concerned about his mother's declining condition and is unsure how much longer she can remain in her apartment. Steven has consulted his lawyer, who suggested that Mrs. Singer give Steven a durable power of attorney authorizing Steven to manage most of her financial affairs. It would also give Steven the power to transfer Mrs. Singer's assets to himself so that Mrs. Singer will qualify for Medicaid should she need to enter a nursing home. Steven's lawyer explained that in order to qualify for Medicaid, Mrs. Singer must meet asset and income limits that are quite low.

Mrs. Singer has substantial assets. She has a portfolio of investments in stocks, bonds, and certificates of deposit worth more than $700,000. The durable power of attorney would enable Steven to strip Mrs. Singer of her assets within the time frame necessary to allow the declining Mrs. Singer to qualify for Medicaid.

Mrs. Singer has agreed to execute the power. But Kate objects to the plan. She does not get along with Steven, does not trust his judgment, and is concerned that he will not properly share his mother's assets.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. Is it ethical for Steven to execute the power of attorney in an effort to enable his mother to qualify for Medicaid?
2. Should Medicaid be available only to those with low income and few assets? Could a national health care plan provide a solution?
3. What role, if any, should private insurance play in providing a safety net against the catastrophic costs of nursing home care?
4. What questions of family ethics does a plan such as Steven's raise?

creator (principal). For example, an agency coupled with an interest would arise where an agent has advanced funds on behalf of the principal and the agent's power to act is given as security for the loan.

Unless otherwise agreed, a power given as security may not be revoked. In addition, the incapacity of the creator or of the holder of the power does not terminate the power. Nor will the death of the creator terminate the power, unless the duty for which the power was given terminates with the death of the creator. A power given as security is terminated by an event that discharges the obligation secured by it or that makes execution of the power illegal or impossible. Thus, in the example above, when the creator repays the loan, the power is terminated.

Chapter Summary

Nature of Agency

Definition of Agency consensual relationship authorizing one party (the agent) to act on behalf of the other party (the principal) subject to the principal's control

Scope of Agency Purposes whatever business activity a person may accomplish personally, he generally may do through an agent

Other Legal Relationships

- Employment Relationship one in which the employer has the right to control the manner and means of the employee's performance of work

Creation of Agency

Formalities though agency is a consensual relationship that may be formed by contract or agreement between the principal and agent; agency may exist without consideration

- Requirements no particular formality is usually required in a contract of agency, although appointments of agents for a period of more than one year must be in writing
- Power of Attorney written, formal appointment of an agent

Capacity

- Principal if the principal is a minor or an incompetent not under a guardianship, his appointment of another to act as an agent is voidable, as are any resulting contracts with third parties

Duty to Inform an agent must use reasonable efforts to give the principal information material to the affairs entrusted to her

Duty to Account an agent must maintain and provide the principal with an accurate account of money or other property that the agent has received or expended on behalf of the principal; an agent must not mingle the principal's property with any other person's property

Questions

1. Parker, the owner of certain unimproved real estate in Chicago, employed Adams, a real estate agent, to sell the property for a price of $250,000 or more and agreed to pay Adams a commission of 6 percent for making a sale. Adams negotiated with Turner, who was interested in the property and willing to pay as much as $280,000 for it. Adams made an agreement with Turner that if Adams could obtain Parker's signature to a contract to sell the property to Turner for $250,000, Turner would pay Adams a bonus of $10,000. Adams prepared and Parker and Turner signed a contract for the sale of the property to Turner for $250,000. Turner refuses to pay Adams the $10,000 as promised. Parker refuses to pay Adams the 6 percent commission. In an action by Adams against Parker and Turner, what is the judgment?
2. Perry employed Alice to sell a parcel of real estate at a fixed price without knowledge that David had previously employed Alice to purchase the same property for him. Perry gave Alice no discretion as to price or terms, and Alice entered into a contract of sale with David on the exact terms authorized by Perry. After accepting a partial payment, Perry discovered that Alice was employed by David and brought an action to rescind. David resisted on the ground that Perry had suffered no damage because Alice had been given no discretion and the sale was made on the exact basis authorized by Perry. Discuss whether Perry will prevail.
3. Packer owned and operated a fruit cannery in Southton, Illinois. He stored a substantial amount of finished canned goods in a warehouse in East St. Louis, Illinois, owned and operated by Alden, in order to have goods readily available for the St. Louis market. On March 1, he had ten thousand cans of peaches and five thousand cans of apples in storage with Alden. On the day named, he borrowed $5,000 from Alden, giving Alden his promissory note for this amount due June 1, together with a letter authorizing Alden, in the event the note was not paid at maturity, to sell any or all of his goods in storage, pay the indebtedness, and account to him for any surplus. Packer died on June 2 without having paid the note. On June 8, Alden told Taylor, a wholesale food distributor, that he had for sale, as agent of the owner, ten thousand cans of peaches and five thousand cans of apples. Taylor said he would take the peaches and would decide later about the apples. A contract for the sale of ten thousand cans of peaches for $6,000 was thereupon signed "Alden, agent for Packer, seller; Taylor, buyer." Both Alden and Taylor knew of the death of Packer. Delivery of the peaches and payment were made on June 10. On June 11, Alden and Taylor signed a similar contract covering the five thousand cans of apples, delivery and payment to be made June 30. On June 23, Packer's executor, having learned of these contracts, wrote Alden and Taylor stating that Alden had no authority to make the contracts, demanding that Taylor return the peaches, and directing Alden not to deliver the apples. Discuss the correctness of the contentions of Packer's executor.
4. Harvey Hilgendorf was a licensed real estate broker acting as the agent of the Hagues in the sale of eighty acres of farmland. The Hagues, however, terminated Hilgendorf's agency before the expiration of the listing contract when they encountered financial difficulties and decided to liquidate their entire holdings of land at one time. Hilgendorf brought this action for breach of the listing contract. The Hagues maintain that Hilgendorf's duty of loyalty required him to give up the listing contract. Are the Hagues correct in their assertion?
5. Palmer made a valid contract with Ames under which Ames was to sell Palmer's goods on commission from January 1 to June 30. Ames made satisfactory sales up to May 15 and was about to close an unusually large order when Palmer suddenly and without notice revoked Ames's authority to sell. Can Ames continue to sell Palmer's goods during the unexpired term of her contract?
6. Piedmont Electric Co. gave a list of delinquent accounts to Alexander, an employee, with instructions to discontinue electric service to delinquent customers. Among those listed was Todd Hatchery, which was then in the process of hatching chickens in a large, electrically heated incubator. Todd Hatchery told Alexander that it did not consider its account delinquent, but Alexander nevertheless cut the wires leading to the hatchery. Subsequently, Todd Hatchery recovered a judgment of $5,000 in an action brought against Alexander for the loss resulting from the interruption of the incubation process. Alexander has paid the judgment and brings a cause of action against Piedmont Electric Co. What may he recover? Explain.

7. In October 2005, Black, the owner of the Grand Opera House, and Harvey entered into a written agreement to lease the opera house to Harvey for five years at a rental of $300,000 a year. Harvey engaged Day as manager of the theater at a salary of $1,175 per week plus 10 percent of the profits. One of Day's duties was to determine the amounts of money taken in each night and, after deducting expenses, to divide the profits between Harvey and the manager of the particular attraction playing at the theater. In September 2010, Day went to Black and offered to rent the opera house from Black at a rental of $375,000 per year, whereupon Black entered into a lease with Day for five years at this figure. When Harvey learned of and objected to this transaction, Day offered to assign the lease to him for $600,000 per year. Harvey refused and brought an appropriate action against Day. Should Harvey recover? If so, on what basis and to what relief is he entitled?
8. Timothy retains Cynthia, an attorney, to bring a lawsuit upon a valid claim against Vincent. Recently enacted legislation has shortened the statute of limitations for this type of legal action. Cynthia fails to make herself aware of this new statute. Consequently, she files the complaint after the statute of limitations has run. As a result, the lawsuit is dismissed. What rights, if any, does Timothy have against Cynthia?

9. Wilson engages Ruth to sell Wilson's antique walnut chest to Harold for $2,500. The next day, Ruth learns that Sandy is willing to pay $3,000 for Wilson's chest. Ruth nevertheless sells the chest to Harold. Wilson then discovers these facts. What are Wilson's rights, if any, against Ruth?
10. Morris is a salesperson for Acme, Inc., a manufacturer of household appliances. Morris receives a commission on all sales made and no further compensation. He drives his own automobile, pays his own expenses, and calls on whom he pleases. While driving to make a call on a potential customer, Morris negligently collides with Hudson. Hudson sues Acme and Morris. Who should be held liable?

Case Problems

11. Sierra Pacific Industries purchased various areas of timber and six other pieces of real property, including a ten-acre parcel on which five duplexes and two single-family units were located. Sierra Pacific requested the assistance of Joseph Carter, a licensed real estate broker, in selling the nontimberland properties. It commissioned him to sell the property for an asking price of $850,000, of which Sierra Pacific would receive $800,000 and Carter would receive $50,000 as a commission. Unable to find a prospective buyer, Carter finally sold the property to his daughter and son-in-law for $850,000 and retained the $50,000 commission without informing Sierra Pacific of his relationship to the buyers. After learning of these facts, Sierra Pacific brought an action against Carter. To what relief, if any, is Sierra Pacific entitled?
12. Murphy, while a guest at a motel operated by the Betsy-Len Motor Hotel Corporation, sustained injuries from a fall allegedly caused by negligence in maintaining the premises. At that time, Betsy-Len was under a license agreement with Holiday Inns, Inc. The license contained provisions permitting Holiday Inns to regulate the architectural style of the buildings as well as the type and style of the furnishings and equipment. The contract, however, did not grant Holiday Inns the power to control the day-to-day operations of Betsy-Len's motel, to fix customer rates, or to demand a share of the profits. Betsy-Len could hire and fire its employees, determine wages and working conditions, supervise the employee work routine, and discipline its employees. In return, Betsy-Len used the trade name "Holiday Inns" and paid a fee for use of the license and Holiday Inns' national advertising. Murphy sued Holiday Inns, claiming Betsy-Len was its agent. Is Murphy correct?

13. Hunter Farms contracted with Petrolia Grain & Feed Company, a Canadian company, to purchase a large supply of the farm herbicide Sencor from Petrolia for resale. Petrolia learned from the U.S. Customs Service that the import duty for the Sencor would be 5 percent but that the final rate could be determined only upon an inspection of the Sencor at the time of importation. Petrolia forwarded this information to Hunter. Meanwhile, Hunter employed F. W. Myers & Company, an import broker, to assist in moving the herbicide through customs by drafting the necessary papers. When customs later determined that certain chemicals in the herbicide, not listed on its label, would increase the customs duty from $30,000 to $128,000, Myers paid the additional amount under protest and turned to Hunter for indemnification. Explain what Myers would have to prove to recover from Hunter.
14. Tube Art was involved in moving a reader board sign to a new location. Tube Art's service manager and another employee went to the proposed site and took photographs and measurements. Later, a Tube Art employee laid out the exact size and location for the excavation by marking a four-by-four square on the asphalt surface with yellow paint. The dimensions of the hole, including its depth of six feet, were indicated with spray paint inside the square. After the layout was painted on the asphalt, Tube Art engaged a backhoe operator, Richard F. Redford, to dig the hole. Redford began digging in the early evening hours at the location designated by Tube Art. At approximately 9:30 P.M., the bucket of Redford's backhoe struck a small natural gas pipeline. After examining the pipe and finding no indication of a break or leak, he concluded that the line was not in use and left the site. Shortly before 2:00 A.M. on the following day, an explosion and fire occurred in the building serviced by that gas pipeline. As a result, two people in the building were killed, and most of its contents were destroyed. Massey and his associates, as tenants of the building, brought an action against Tube Art and Richard Redford for the total destruction of their property. Will the plaintiffs prevail? Explain.

15. Brian Hanson sustained a paralyzing injury while playing in a lacrosse match between Ohio State University and Ashland University. Hanson had interceded in a fight between one of his teammates and an Ashland player, William Kynast. Hanson grabbed Kynast in a bear hug, but Kynast threw Hanson off his back. Hanson's head struck the ground, resulting in serious injuries. An ambulance was summoned, and after several delays, Hanson was transported to a local hospital where he underwent surgery. Doctors determined that Hanson suffered a compression fracture of his sixth spinal vertebrae. Hanson, now an incomplete quadriplegic, subsequently filed suit against Ashland University, maintaining that because Kynast was acting as the agent of Ashland, the university was therefore liable for Kynast's alleged wrongful acts. Was Kynast an agent of Ashland?
16. Tony Wilson was a member of Troop 392 of the Boy Scouts of America (BSA) and of the St. Louis Area Council (Council). Tony went on a trip with the troop to Fort Leonard Wood, Missouri. Five adult volunteer leaders accompanied the troop. The troop stayed in a building that had thirty-foot aluminum pipes stacked next to it. At approximately 10:00 P.M., Tony and other scouts were outside the building, and the leaders were inside. Tony and two other scouts picked up a pipe and raised it so that it came into contact with 7,200-volt power lines that ran over the building. All three scouts were electrocuted, and Tony died.

His parents brought a suit for wrongful death against the Council, claiming that the volunteer leaders were agents or
- servants of the Council and that it was vicariously liable for their negligence. The Council filed a motion for summary judgment, arguing as follows: the BSA chartered local councils in certain areas, and councils in turn granted charters to local sponsors such as schools, churches, or civic organizations. Local councils did not administer the scouting program for the sponsor, did not select volunteers, did not prescribe training for volunteers, and did not direct or control the activities of troops. Troops were not required to get permission from local councils before participating in an activity. Are the troop leaders agents of the Council? Explain.
17. Western Rivers Fly Fisher (Western) operates under license of the U.S. Forest Service as an "outfitter," a corporation in the business of arranging fishing expeditions on the Green River, Utah. Michael D. Petragallo, is licensed by the Forest Service as a guide to conduct fishing expeditions but cannot do so by himself, because the Forest Service licenses only outfitters to float patrons down the Green River. Western and several other licensed outfitters contact Petragallo to guide clients on fishing trips. Because the Forest Service licenses only outfitters to sponsor fishing expeditions, every guide must display on the boat and vehicle he uses the insignia of the outfitter sponsoring the particular trip. Petragallo may agree or refuse to take individuals Western refers to him, and Western does not restrict him from guiding expeditions for other outfitters. Western pays Petragallo a certain sum per fishing trip and does not make any deductions from his compensation. Petragallo's responsibilities include transporting patrons to the Green River, using his own boat for fishing trips, providing food and overnight needs for patrons, assisting patrons in fly fishing, and transporting them from the river to their vehicles. Robert McMaster contacted Western and arranged for a fishing trip for himself and two others. Jaeger, was a member of McMaster's fishing party. McMaster paid Western, which set the price for the trip, planned the itinerary for the McMaster party, rented fishing rods to them, and arranged for Petragallo to be their guide. When Petragallo met the McMaster party, he answered affirmatively when Jaeger asked him if he worked for Western. While driving the McMaster party back to town at the conclusion of the fishing trip, Petragallo lost control of his vehicle, injuring Jaeger, who brought suit against Western, Petragallo, and others. Western claims that because Petragallo is an independent contractor and was never its employee, it is not liable for Petragallo's acts in causing Jaeger's injuries. Is Petragallo an independent contractor? Explain.

RELATIONSHIP WITH THIRD PARTIES

Qui facit per alium facit per se. (He who acts through another, acts himself.)

LEGAL MAXIM

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Distinguish among actual express authority, actual implied authority, and apparent authority.
2. Explain the contractual liability of the principal, agent, and third party when the principal is (a) disclosed, (b) partially disclosed, and (c) undisclosed.
3. Explain how apparent authority is terminated and distinguish between actual and constructive notice.
4. Describe the tort liability of a principal for the (a) authorized acts of agents, (b) authorized acts of employees, and (c) unauthorized acts of independent contractors.
5. Explain the criminal liability of a principal for the acts of agents.

The purpose of an agency relationship is to allow the principal to extend his business activities by authorizing agents to enter into contracts with third persons on his behalf. Accordingly, it is important that the law balance the competing interests of principals and third persons. The principal wants to be liable only for those contracts he actually authorizes the agent to make for him. The third party, on the other hand, wishes the principal bound on all contracts that the agent negotiates on the principal's behalf. As we will discuss in this chapter, the law has adopted an intermediate outcome: the principal and the third party are bound to those contracts the principal actually authorizes plus those the principal has apparently authorized.

While pursuing the principal's business, an agent may tortiously injure third parties, who then may seek to hold the principal personally liable. Under what circumstances should the principal be held liable? Similar questions arise concerning a principal's criminal liability for an agent's violation of the criminal law. The law of agency has established rules to determine when the principal is liable for the torts and crimes his agents commit.

Finally, what liability to the third party should the agent incur and what rights should she acquire against the third party? Usually, the agent has no liability for, or rights under, contracts made on behalf of a principal. As we will discuss in this chapter, however, in some situations the agent has contractually created obligations or rights or both. We will discuss these rules in this chapter.

RELATIONSHIP OF PRINCIPAL AND THIRD PERSONS

In this section, we will first consider the contract liability of the principal; then we will examine the principal's potential tort liability.

Contract Liability of the Principal

The power of an agent is his ability to change the legal status of his principal. An agent who has either actual or apparent authority has the power to bind his principal. Thus, whenever an agent, acting within his authority, makes a contract for his principal, he creates new rights or liabilities for his principal and thus changes his principal's legal status. This power of an agent to act for his principal in business transactions is the basis of agency.

A principal's contract liability also depends on whether she is disclosed, unidentified, or undisclosed. The principal is a disclosed principal if, when an agent and a third party interact, the third party has notice that the agent is acting for a principal and also has notice of the principal's identity. The principal is an unidentified principal if, when an agent and a third party interact, the third party has notice that the agent is or may be acting for a principal but has no notice of the principal's identity. (Some courts refer to an unidentified principal as a "partially disclosed principal.") An example is an auctioneer who sells on behalf of a seller who is not identified: the seller is an unidentified principal (or a partially disclosed principal) since it is understood that the auctioneer acts as an agent. The principal is an undisclosed principal if, when an agent and a third party interact, the third party has no notice that the agent is acting for a principal. See Figures 30-1, 30-2, and 30-3, which

TYPES OF AUTHORITY

Authority is of two basic types: actual and apparent. Actual authority exists when the principal gives actual consent to the agent. Such authority may be either express or implied. In either case, it is binding and gives the agent both the power and the right to create or to affect the principal's legal relations with third persons. Actual express authority does not depend on the third party having knowledge of the manifestations or statements made by the principal to the agent.

Apparent authority is based on acts or conduct of the principal that lead a third person to believe that the agent, or supposed agent, has actual authority, on which belief the third person justifiably relies. This manifestation, which confers upon the agent the power to create a legal relationship between the principal and a third party, may consist of words or actions of the principal as well as other facts and circumstances that induce the third person reasonably to rely on the existence of an agency relationship.

Practical Advice

As a principal, be careful how you hold out your employees and agents because you may create apparent authority in them.

Actual Express Authority The express authority of an agent, found in the spoken or written words the principal communicates to the agent, is actual authority stated in language directing or instructing the agent to do something specific. The term "express authority" generally

 Contract Liability of Undisclosed Principal

means actual authority that a principal has stated in very specific or detailed language. Thus, if Lee, orally or in writing, requests his agent, Anita, to sell his automobile for $6,500, Anita's authority to sell the car for this sum is actual and express.

Practical Advice

As a principal, clearly and specifically communicate to your agents the extent of their actual authority. As a third party, be sure to check with the principal when there is any doubt as to the actual authority of an agent; this is a more certain approach than relying upon the possibility that you will be able to prove that the agent had apparent authority.

Actual Implied Authority Implied authority is not found in express or explicit words of the principal but is inferred from words or conduct that the principal manifests to the agent. An agent has implied authority to do what she reasonably believes the principal wishes her to do, based on the agent's reasonable interpretation of the principal's manifestations to her and all other facts she knows or should know. Implied authority may arise from customs and usages of the principal's business. In addition, the authority granted to an agent to accomplish a particular purpose necessarily includes the implied authority to employ the means reasonably required to accomplish it. For example, Helen authorizes Clyde to manage her eighty-two-unit apartment complex but says nothing about expenses. In order to manage the building, Clyde must employ a janitor, purchase fuel for heating, and arrange for ordinary maintenance. Even though Helen has not expressly granted him the authority to incur such expenses, Clyde may infer the authority to incur them from the express authority to manage the building because such expenses are necessary to proper management. On the other hand, suppose Paige employs Arthur, a real estate broker, to find a purchaser for her residence at a stated price. Arthur has no authority to contract for its sale.

Apparent Authority Apparent authority is power arising from the conduct or words of a disclosed or unidentified principal that, when manifested to third persons, reasonably induce them to rely upon the assumption that actual authority exists. Apparent authority depends upon the principal's manifestations to the third party; an agent's own statements about the agent's authority do not by themselves create apparent authority. Apparent authority confers upon the agent, or supposed agent, the power to bind the disclosed or unidentified principal in contracts with third persons and prevents the principal from denying the existence of actual authority. Thus, when authority is apparent but not actual, the disclosed or unidentified principal is nonetheless bound by the act of the agent. By exceeding his actual authority, however, the agent violates his duty of obedience and is liable to the principal for any loss the principal suffers as a result of the agent's acting beyond his actual authority. See Figures 30-1 and 30-2.

Business Law in Action

One of the most ambitious, successful land purchases ever made by agents for an undisclosed principal took place in Orange County, Florida, in 1964 and 1965. In just eighteen months, buyers working for a mysterious developer assembled a piece of land twice the size of Manhattan. Rumors regarding the developer's identity were rampant as agents bought up cattle ranches and road frontage, scrub woods, and swampland. When the agents were finished, they had acquired about twenty-seven thousand four hundred acres at an average reported price per acre of $185, for a total expenditure of somewhat more than $5 million.

The mystery ended in 1965. Walt Disney Productions announced its intention to build Disney World, an amusement park and resort, on two thousand five hundred acres within the large tract. Disney World would be modeled on Disneyland Park, which had opened in 1955 in Anaheim, California. But Disney World would dwarf the 289 acres at Disneyland.

Disney's announcement set off the biggest wave of land speculation Florida had seen in fifty years. David Nusbickel, an Orlando real estate broker, worked with Disney's attorneys to help buy land. Several years after Disney's announcement of its purchase had set off a buying frenzy, Nusbickel said of the land speculators, "These guys, who obviously know their business, don't even blink when you quote them a price of $75,000 to $150,000 for an acre of property that maybe went for $3,000 a few years back." BusinessWeek estimated that between 1965 and 1971 more than $200 million in property changed hands—confirming the wisdom of Disney's secret buying.

Walt Disney World, as the project became known, opened on October 1, 1971. While still under construction, it was called by Newsweek the world's largest non-governmental construction project. Despite occupying two thousand five hundred acres of land, however, phase one of Walt Disney World took up slightly less than one-tenth of the total parcel Disney had assembled. Why had Disney directed its agents to buy so much land?

In Anaheim, hotels and restaurants had sprung up on the perimeter of Disneyland. The value of room and food revenues, which far exceeded the park's revenues, went to the owners and operators of the hotels and restaurants, not to Disney. And having developed without a plan, the hotels, restaurants, and stores gave the impression of clutter. Walt Disney's response: "It is necessary to control the environment. We learned this at Disneyland." Accordingly, Walt and his brother, Roy, decided to take their plan for Walt Disney World one step further. Not only would the company put restaurants, hotels, and golf courses inside the park, it would also buy enough land to develop housing—thus, the huge land purchase.

Said Roy Disney, who ran the financial side of the company, "I think we will make a lot more on the land than we ever will on the park. The development of this 20,000 acres can give us a future. And we will keep that future right in our own company."

Common ways in which apparent authority may arise include the following:

1. When a principal appoints an agent to a position in an organization, third parties may reasonably believe that the agent has the authority to do those acts customary of a person in such a position. (Apparent authority for agents of various business associations is discussed in Part VII.)
2. If a principal has given an agent general authority to engage in a transaction, subsequently imposed limitations or restrictions will not affect the agent's apparent authority to engage in that transaction until third parties are notified of the restrictions.
3. The principal's assent to prior similar transactions between the agent and a third party may create a basis for the third party reasonably to believe that the agent has apparent authority.

4. The agent shows the third party a document, such as a power of attorney, from the principal authorizing the agent to enter into such a transaction.
5. As discussed later, after many terminations of authority, an agent has lingering apparent authority until the third party has actual knowledge or receives notice of the termination.

For example, Peter writes a letter to Alice authorizing her to sell his automobile and sends a copy of the letter to Thomas, a prospective purchaser. On the following day, Peter writes a letter to Alice revoking the authority to sell the car but does not send a copy of the second letter to Thomas, who is not otherwise informed of the revocation.

Although Alice has no actual authority to sell the car, she continues to have apparent authority with respect to Thomas. Or suppose that Arlene, in the presence of Polly, tells Thad that Arlene is Polly's agent to buy lumber. Although this statement is not true, Polly does not deny it, as she easily could. Thad, in reliance upon the statement, ships lumber to Polly on Arlene's order. Polly is obligated to pay for the lumber because Arlene had apparent authority to act on Polly's behalf. Arlene's apparent authority exists only with respect to Thad. If Arlene were to give David an order for a shipment of lumber to Polly, David would not be able to hold Polly liable. Arlene would have had neither actual authority nor, as to David, apparent authority.

Because apparent authority is the power resulting from acts that appear to the third party to be authorized by the principal, no apparent authority can exist where the principal is undisclosed. See Figure 30-3. Nor can apparent authority exist where the third party knows that the agent has no actual authority.

SCHOENBERGER V. CHICAGO TRANSIT AUTHORITY

APPELLATE COURT OF ILLINOIS, FIRST DISTRICT, FIRST DIVISION, 1980
84 ILL.APP.3D 1132, 39 ILL.DEC. 941, 405 N.E.2D 1076

FACTS Schoenberger applied and interviewed for a position with the Chicago Transit Authority (C.T.A.). He met several times with Frank ZuChristian, who was in charge of recruiting for the C.T.A. Data Center. At the third of these meetings, ZuChristian informed Schoenberger that he wanted to employ him at a salary of $19,800 and that he was making a recommendation to that effect. When the formal offer was made by the placement department, however, the salary was stated at $19,300. Schoenberger did not accept the offer immediately but instead called ZuChristian for an explanation of the salary difference. After making inquiries, ZuChristian informed Schoenberger that a clerical error had been made and that it would take some time to correct. He urged Schoenberger to accept the job at $19,300 and said that he would see that the $500 was made up to him at one of the salary reviews in the following year. When the increase was not given, Schoenberger resigned and filed this suit to recover damages. The trial court ruled in favor of C.T.A., and Schoenberger appealed.

DECISION Judgment for C.T.A. affirmed.

OPINION Campbell, J. The main question before us is whether ZuChristian, acting as an agent of the C.T.A., orally contracted with Schoenberger for $500 in compensation in addition to his $19,300 salary. The authority of an agent may only come from the principal and it is therefore necessary to trace the source of an agent's authority to some word or act of the alleged principal. [Citations.] The authority to bind a principal will not be presumed, but rather, the person alleging authority must prove its source unless the act of the agent has been ratified. [Citations.] Moreover, the authority must be founded upon some word or act of the principal, not on the acts or words of the agent. [Citations.]

*** Both Hagan and Bonner, ZuChristian's superiors, testified that ZuChristian had no actual authority to either make an offer of a specific salary to Schoenberger or to make any promise of additional compensation. Furthermore, ZuChristian's testimony corroborated the testimony that he lacked the authority to make formal offers. From this evidence, it is clear that the trial court properly determined that ZuChristian lacked the actual authority to bind the C.T.A. for the additional $500 in compensation to Schoenberger.

Nor can it be said that the C.T.A. clothed ZuChristian with the apparent authority to make Schoenberger a promise of compensation over and above that formally offered by the Placement Department. The general rule to consider in determining whether an agent is acting within the apparent authority of his principal was stated in [citation] in this way:

Apparent authority in an agent in such authority as the principal knowingly permits the agent to assume or which he holds his agent out as possessing—it is such authority as a reasonably prudent man, exercising diligence and discretion, in view of the principal's conduct, would naturally suppose the agent to possess.

Here, Schoenberger's initial contact with the C.T.A. was with the Placement Department where he filled out an application and had his first interview. There is no evidence that the C.T.A. did anything to permit ZuChristian to assume authority nor did they do anything to hold him out as having the authority to hire and set salaries. ZuChristian was not at a management level in the C.T.A. nor did his job title of Principal Communications Analyst suggest otherwise. The mere fact that he was allowed to interview prospective employees does not establish that the C.T.A. held him out as possessing the authority to hire employees or set salaries. Moreover, ZuChristian did inform Schoenberger that the formal offer of employment would be made by the Placement Department.

INTERPRETATION In order for an agent to bind a principal, she must have either actual authority or apparent authority, either of which must come from the conduct or words of the principal.

DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY

A subagent is a person appointed by an agent to perform functions that the agent has consented to perform on behalf of the agent's principal; the appointing agent is responsible to the principal for the subagent's conduct. Because the appointment of an agent reflects the principal's confidence in the agent's personal skill, integrity, and other qualifications, an agent may appoint a subagent only if the agent has actual or apparent authority to do so.

If an agent is authorized to appoint subagents, the acts of the subagent are as binding on the principal as those of the agent. The subagent, an agent of both the principal and the agent, owes a fiduciary duty to both. For example, P contracts with A, a real estate broker (agent), to sell P's house. P knows that A employs salespersons to show houses to prospective purchasers and to make representations about the property. The salespersons are A's employees and P's subagents.

If no authority exists to delegate the agent's authority, but the agent does so nevertheless, the acts of the subagent do not impose on the principal any obligations or liability to third persons. Likewise, the principal acquires no rights against such third persons.

EFFECT OF TERMINATION OF AGENCY ON AUTHORITY

As discussed in Chapter 29, when an agency terminates, the agent's actual authority ceases. The Second and Third Restatements differ, however, regarding when an agent's apparent authority ceases.

Business Law in Action

Under typical employment arrangements, employees in a retail outlet are agents of the store owner. They, therefore, are vested with authority to conduct the store's retail business. Their actual authority will include not only that which is expressly authorized by the store owner, store manager(s), or any written manuals or policies, but also any necessary implied authority to effectuate their job of selling goods.

Actual authority in this setting might include accepting payment for goods, scheduling deliveries, and the like. Ordinarily there will be rules outlining exactly what the employee's authority includes, such as "never schedule a delivery on a Sunday" or "do not accept checks as payment." Of necessity, these types of instructions exclude certain things from the authority of the agent-employee. So if an employee accepted a personal check for payment of a $300 purchase, this was without actual authority. The employee can be held liable to the principal—the store owner—for any resulting damage if, for example, the check cannot be collected.

However, the fact that an agent may be operating without actual authority, or contrary to express direction from the principal, does not necessarily mean the principal's liability to the third party will be affected. If a clerk schedules a Sunday delivery, the store cannot legally refuse to deliver on the appointed day simply because the clerk was unauthorized to schedule it. Instead, the store will be bound to the customer as long as the clerk had "apparent authority."

Apparent authority arises from the principal's conduct toward the third party. In a situation such as this, providing the clerk with access to a delivery schedule that includes Sundays is probably enough to establish apparent authority. Unless there is a sign in the store or legend on the store's preprinted invoices indicating that Sunday deliveries will not be scheduled, or unless this particular customer knows of the policy, the store has led the customer reasonably to believe that the clerk may schedule Sunday deliveries, and as a result the store is bound.

Second Restatement Where the performance of an authorized transaction becomes impossible, such as when the subject matter of the transaction is destroyed or the transaction is made illegal, the agent's apparent authority also expires and notice of such termination to third persons is not required. The bankruptcy of the principal terminates without notice the power of an agent to affect the principal's property, which has passed to the bankruptcy trustee.

When the termination is by the death or incapacity of the principal or agent, the Second Restatement provides that the agent's apparent authority also expires, and notice of such termination to third persons is not required. However, with respect to the death or incapacity of the principal, this rule has been legislatively changed in more than forty states that have adopted the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act. This Act provides that the death of a principal, who has executed a written power of attorney, whether or not it is durable, does not terminate the agency as to the attorney in fact (agent) or a third person who without actual knowledge of the principal's death acts in good faith under the power. Moreover, the Act provides that the incapacity of a principal, who has previously executed a written power of attorney that is not durable, does not terminate the agency as to the attorney in fact or a third person who without actual knowledge of the principal's incapacity acts in good faith under the power. If an agent is appointed under a durable power of attorney, the actual authority of an agent survives the incapacity of the principal.

In other cases, apparent authority continues until the third party has actual knowledge or receives actual notice, if the third party is one (1) with whom the agent had previously dealt on credit, (2) to whom the agent has been specially accredited, or (3) with whom the agent has begun to deal, as the principal should know. Actual notice requires a communication, either oral or written, to the third party. All other third parties as to whom there was apparent authority must have actual knowledge or be given constructive notice, through publication, for example, in a newspaper of general circulation in the area where the agency is regularly carried on.

In the next case, the court decides whether to apply the constructive notice by publication rule just discussed.

Third Restatement Under the Third Restatement, the same rule—a reasonableness standard—applies to all causes of termination of agency.

1. The termination of actual authority does not by itself end any apparent authority held by an agent.
2. Apparent authority ends when it is no longer reasonable for the third party with whom an agent deals to believe that the agent continues to act with actual authority.

The general rule of the Third Restatement is that it is reasonable for third parties to assume that an agent's actual authority continues ("lingers"), unless and until a third party has notice of circumstances that make it unreasonable to continue that assumption. These circumstances include notice that (1) principal has revoked the agent's actual authority, (2) the agent has renounced it, or (3) circumstances otherwise have changed such that it is no longer reasonable to believe that the principal consents to the agent's act on the principal's behalf. A person has notice of a fact if the person knows the fact, has reason to know the fact, has received an effective notification of the fact, or should know the fact to fulfill a duty owed to another person.

For example, if the principal tells a third party that the agent's authority has terminated, the former agent's lingering apparent authority with respect to that third party has terminated. Moreover, if a third party has notice of facts that call the agent's authority into question, and these facts would prompt a reasonable person to make inquiry of the principal before dealing with the agent, the agent no longer acts with apparent authority. In addition, suppose that a principal has furnished an agent with a power of attorney stating the extent, nature, and duration of the agent's actual authority. Prior to the stated expiration of the power of attorney the principal terminates the agent's actual authority. At this time the agent has a duty to return the power of attorney to the principal. If, however, the agent does not return the power of attorney to the principal, third parties to whom the agent shows the power of attorney would still be protected by apparent authority until the third parties have notice that actual authority had been terminated.

Consistent with this general rule—but contrary to the rule under the Second Restatement—a principal's death or loss of capacity does not automatically end the agent's apparent authority. In these instances, apparent authority terminates when the third party has (1) notice of the principal's death or (2) has notice that the principal's loss of capacity is permanent or that the principal has been adjudicated to lack capacity. The Third Restatement's rule is consistent with the Uniform Durable Power of Attorney Act.

Practical Advice

As principal, be sure to give the appropriate notice to third parties whenever an agency relationship terminates.

PARLATO V. EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF THE UNITED STATES

SUPREME COURT OF NEW YORK, APPELLATE DIVISION, FIRST DEPARTMENT, 2002

299 A.D.2D 108, 749 N.Y.S.2D 216

FACTS Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States hired Kenneth Soule on April 1, 1990, as an agent authorized to sell Equitable financial products, such as insurance policies and annuities. Parlato, a resident of Queens, began investing in Equitable financial products through Soule in May 1990, and Soule actually opened several Equitable accounts in Parlato's name while he was an Equitable agent. In the spring of 1992, however, Soule began criminally defrauding Parlato. Between March and May of 1992, Parlato, at Soule's urging, liquidated certain of her non-Equitable investments, and entrusted the proceeds to Soule for investment in Equitable financial products. Soule used these funds, and all additional funds that Parlato subsequently entrusted to him, for his personal use.

In 1991, Soule began soliciting plaintiff Perry, Parlato's sister and a resident of Hawaii, to invest in Equitable products. In May 1992, Perry began entrusting funds to Soule to be used to open investment accounts for her at Equitable. Perry alleges that Soule never opened any Equitable account for her and that he misappropriated all the money she entrusted to him. Equitable terminated Soule's employment in July 1992. Although Parlato allegedly still had an account with Equitable at that time, Equitable did not notify her of the termination. For approximately four years after his termination, Soule allegedly continued to represent himself to plaintiffs as an Equitable agent and to solicit their further investment in Equitable financial products. Plaintiffs do not allege, however, that Equitable made any manifestations to them of a continuing connection between Soule and Equitable after July 1992.

In August 1996, plaintiffs contacted Equitable to verify the status of their investments. At that time, Equitable informed plaintiffs that Soule had been terminated by Equitable in July 1992. Plaintiffs then alerted law enforcement authorities to Soule's misconduct. Ultimately, Soule pleaded guilty to a federal charge of mail fraud and was sentenced to twenty-seven months in prison and three years of supervised release, conditioned on his promise to make restitution in the amount of $416,000. Plaintiffs commenced this action against Equitable in December 1999. Each plaintiff asserted a cause of action for fraud, based on the contention that she entrusted her money to Soule in reliance on the appearance of authority to act for Equitable with which the company had clothed him. The trial court granted the defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint, and plaintiffs have appealed.

DECISION Judgment modified in part and affirmed in part.

OPINION Friedman, J. *** [I]t is well established that a principal may be held liable in tort for the misuse by its agent of his apparent authority to defraud a third party who reasonably relies on the appearance of authority, even if the agent commits the fraud solely for his personal benefit, and to the detriment of the principal [citations]; Restatement [Second] of Agency §§ 261, 262, 265 [1]; [citations]. The reason for this rule is that the principal, by virtue of its ability to select its agents and to exercise control over them (see Restatement [Second] of Agency § 1 [1]), is in a better position than third parties to prevent the perpetration of fraud by such agents through the misuse of their positions. Thus, the principal should not escape liability when an innocent third person suffers a loss as the result of an agent's abuse, for his own fraudulent purposes, of the third person's reasonable reliance on the apparent authority with which the principal has invested the agent. ***

*** The final question before us, therefore, is whether, under these circumstances, Equitable's termination of Soule's employment in July 1992 had the effect, as a matter of law, of immediately cutting off his apparent authority to act for Equitable vis-a-vis the two plaintiffs. ***

We hold that Parlato's claim, to the extent it is not time-barred, should not have been dismissed on a motion addressed to her pleading. The Court of Appeals has held that a third party who, like Parlato, is known by a principal to have previously dealt with the principal through the principal's authorized agent, is entitled to assume that the agent's authority continues until the third party receives notice the principal has revoked the agent's authority [citations]. ***

In this case, Parlato alleges that Soule opened actual Equitable investment accounts for her while he was still an authorized agent of Equitable. If this is proven to be so, Parlato will be entitled to the benefit of the above-described rule permitting her, as a person known to have done business with Equitable through Soule in the past, to presume that Soule remained authorized to act for Equitable in the absence of either (1) notice that his authority had been revoked or (2) other circumstances that would have rendered it unreasonable to believe that Soule had authority to act for Equitable in the transactions he proposed [citation]; Restatement [Second] of Agency § 125, Comment b; [citation]. ***

This brings us to the question of the viability of Perry's claim against Equitable. Perry alleges that Soule stole all of the money she entrusted to him, and that he never opened any Equitable account in her name. Thus, Perry's own allegations establish that Equitable had no way of notifying her of Soule's termination in July 1992. Under these circumstances, we hold that any apparent authority Soule may have had vis-a-vis Perry terminated along with his actual authority when his employment by Equitable came to an end.

Considerations of fairness, practicality and sound public policy lead us to this conclusion. Even in the case of a third party unknown to the principal, it seems fair to hold the principal responsible for the agent's misuse of his apparent authority while the principal-agent relationship continues to exist, bringing benefits to the principal and giving the principal a measure of control over the agent's conduct (see Restatement [Second] of Agency § 1 [1] [an agent acts on behalf of the principal subject to the principal's control]). It seems unfair, however, to hold the principal responsible for torts its former agent commits after termination against an unknown third party, even if the former agent facilitates his wrongdoing by misrepresenting to the victim that the agency relationship is still in existence. Once the agent's employment has been terminated, the principal no longer has any power to control the agent's conduct. Moreover, the principal obviously cannot give notice of the agent's termination to a third party that is totally unknown to it. The law, of course, "does not require the impossible ..." [Citation.] ***

Finally, the amended complaint alleges that Equitable "made no effort to alert the public in general that Soule was no longer its agent. ..." It is true that section 136 (3) of the Restatement (Second) of Agency (published in 1958) takes the position that, absent public notice (as by advertisement in a newspaper of general circulation) of revocation of an agent's authority in the area in which he formerly acted for the principal, apparent authority continues to exist after such revocation as to persons who previously knew of the agency and do not receive actual notice of the revocation, even if such persons never previously did business with the agent and thus are unknown to the principal. While this rule (hereinafter, the "public notice rule") finds support in a number of very old New York cases [citation], we do not regard the public notice rule as binding at this late date, at least under the particular facts alleged by plaintiffs. There is no statutory or regulatory mandate for public notice in this context *** and the most recent New York cases giving support to the rule appear to be from the era when the telephone was a relatively new and uncommon device. Today, a person dealing with an individual known to have represented a company in the past can easily verify that the individual is still an agent for the company by contacting the company by telephone. Moreover, there is no reason to believe that the newspaper advertisements contemplated by the public notice rule would actually be read by customers such as plaintiffs in this action. This is particularly so in the case of plaintiff Perry, who, as a resident of Hawaii, would have been highly unlikely to come across a newspaper advertisement announcing Soule's termination in the New York area (see Restatement [Second] of Agency § 136 [3] [a] [public notice rule is satisfied by publication "in a newspaper of general circulation in the place where the agency is regularly carried on"])). We therefore decline to ascribe legal significance to Equitable's alleged failure to give public notice of Soule's termination.

INTERPRETATION A third party who is known by a principal to have previously dealt with the principal through the principal's authorized agent is entitled to assume that the agent's authority continues until the third party receives notice the principal has revoked the agent's authority or until other circumstances render it unreasonable to believe that the agent had authority to act for the principal; however, a principal is not responsible for torts its former agent commits after termination against an unknown third party.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION How could Perry have protected herself?

RATIFICATION

Ratification is the confirmation or affirmance by one person of a prior unauthorized act performed by another who is his agent, or who purports to be, his agent. The ratification of such act or contract binds the principal and the third party as if the agent or purported agent had been acting initially with actual authority. Once made, a valid ratification is irrevocable.

Requirements of Ratification Ratification may relate to acts that have exceeded the authority granted to an agent, as well as to acts that a person without any authority performs on behalf of an alleged principal. To effect a ratification, the principal must manifest an intent to do so with knowledge of all material facts concerning the transaction. The principal does not need to communicate this intent, which may be manifested by express language or implied from her conduct, such as accepting or retaining the benefits of a transaction. Thus, if Amanda, without authority, contracts in Penelope's name for the purchase of goods from Tate on credit, and Penelope, having learned of Amanda's unauthorized act, accepts the goods from Tate, she thereby impliedly ratifies the contract and is bound on it. Furthermore, a principal may ratify an unauthorized action by failing to repudiate it once the principal knows the material facts about the agent's action. If formalities are required for the authorization of an act, the same formalities apply to a ratification of that act. In any event, the principal must ratify the entire act or contract.

A person may ratify an act if the actor acted or purported to act as an agent on the person's behalf. Under this section and a number of relatively recent cases, an undisclosed principal may ratify an agent's unauthorized act. This is contrary to the Second Restatement's rule, which requires that the actor must have indicated to the third person that he was acting on a principal's behalf. Thus, under the Second Restatement there can be no ratification by an undisclosed principal. To illustrate: Archie, without any authority, contracts to sell to Tina an automobile belonging to Pierce. Archie states that the auto is his. Tina promises to pay $5,500 for the automobile. Pierce subsequently learns of the agreement and affirms. Under the Third Restatement Pierce's affirmation of Archie's action would be a ratification because Archie had acted on behalf of Pierce. On the other hand, under the Second Restatement, it would not be a ratification because Archie did not indicate he was acting on behalf of a principal.

To be effective, ratification must occur before the third party gives notice of his withdrawal to the principal or agent. If the affirmance of a transaction occurs when the situation has so materially changed that it would be inequitable to subject the third party to liability, the third party may elect to avoid liability. For example, Alex has no authority, but, purporting to act for Penny, he contracts to sell Penny's house to Taylor. The next day, the house burns down. Penny then affirms the sale. Taylor is not bound. Moreover, the power to ratify would be terminated by the third party's death or loss of capacity and by the lapse of a reasonable time.

Finally, for ratification to be effective, the purported principal must have been in existence when the act was done. For example, a promoter of a corporation not yet in existence may enter into contracts on behalf of the corporation. However, in the majority of states, these acts cannot be ratified by the corporation because it did not exist when the contracts were made. Instead, the corporation may adopt the contract. Adoption differs from ratification because it is not retroactive and does not release the promoter from liability. See Chapter 34.

If a principal's lack of capacity entitles her to avoid transactions, the principal may also avoid any ratification made when under the incapacity. The principal may, however, ratify a contract that is voidable because of the principal's incapacity when the incapacity no longer exists. Thus, after she reaches majority, a principal may ratify an unauthorized contract made on her behalf while she was a minor. She may also avoid any ratification made prior to attaining majority.

Practical Advice

As a principal, recognize that if you accept the benefits of an unauthorized contract with full knowledge, under the doctrine of ratification, you will be obliged to fulfill the contract's burdens.

Effect of Ratification Ratification retroactively creates the effects of actual authority. Ratification is equivalent to prior authority, which means that the effect of ratification is substantially the same as if the agent or purported agent had been actually authorized when he performed the act. The respective rights, duties, and remedies of the principal and the third party are the same as if the agent had originally possessed actual authority. Both the principal and the agent are in the same position as the one they would have been in had the principal actually authorized the act originally. The agent is entitled to her due compensation. Moreover, she is exonerated (freed) from liability to the principal for acting as his agent without authority or for exceeding her authority, as the case may be. Between the agent and the third party, the agent is released from any liability she may have to the third party by reason of having induced the third party to enter into the contract without the principal's authority.

FUNDAMENTAL RULES OF CONTRACTUAL LIABILITY

The following rules summarize the contractual relations between the principal and the third party:

1. A disclosed principal and the third party are parties to the contract if the agent acts within her actual or apparent authority in making the contract on the principal's behalf. See Figure 30-1.
2. An unidentified (partially disclosed) principal and the third party are parties to the contract bound if the agent acts within her actual or apparent authority in making the contract on the principal's behalf. See Figure 30-2.
3. An undisclosed principal and the third party are parties to the contract if the agent acts within her actual authority in making the contract on the principal's behalf unless (a) the terms of the contract exclude the principal or (b) his existence is fraudulently concealed. See Figure 30-3.

- No principal is a party to a contract with a third party if the agent acts without any authority in making the contract on the principal's behalf, unless the principal ratifies the contract. Under the Second Restatement, the principal must have been either disclosed or unidentified.

Practical Advice

As a principal, carefully consider the extent to which you want your agent to disclose your existence and identity.

Tort Liability of the Principal

In addition to being contractually liable to third persons, a principal may be liable in tort to third persons because of the acts of her agent. Tort liability may arise directly or indirectly (vicariously) from authorized or unauthorized acts of an agent. Also, a principal is liable for the unauthorized torts an agent commits in connection with a transaction that the purported principal, with full knowledge of the tort, subsequently ratifies. Cases involving unauthorized but ratified torts are extremely rare. Of course, in all of these situations, the wrongdoing agent is personally liable to the injured person because the agent committed the tort. See Figure 30-4, which explains the tort liability of the principal.

Tort Liability

*If not illegal or known by A to be wrongful.

DIRECT LIABILITY OF PRINCIPAL

A principal is liable for his own tortious conduct involving the use of agents. Such liability may arise in two primary ways. First, a principal is directly liable in damages for harm resulting from his directing an agent to commit a tort. Second, the principal is directly liable if he fails to exercise reasonable care in employing competent agents.

Authorized Acts of Agent A principal who authorizes his agent to commit a tortious act concerning the property or person of another is liable for the injury or loss that person sustains. This liability also extends to unauthorized tortious conduct that the principal subsequently ratifies. The authorized act is that of the principal. Thus, if Phillip directs his agent, Anthony, to enter Clark's land and cut timber, which neither Phillip nor Anthony has any right to do, the cutting of the timber is a trespass, and Phillip is liable to Clark. A principal may be subject to tort liability because of an agent's conduct even though the agent is not subject to liability. Phillip instructs his agent, Anthony, to make certain representations as to Phillip's property that Anthony is authorized to sell. Phillip knows these representations are false, but Anthony does not know and has no reason or duty to know. Such representations by Anthony to Tammy, who buys the property in reliance on them, constitute a deceit for which Phillip is liable to Tammy. Anthony, however, would not be liable to Tammy.

Unauthorized Acts of Agent A principal who negligently conducts activities through an employee or other agent is liable for harm resulting from such conduct. For example, a principal is liable if he negligently (1) selects agents, (2) retains agents, (3) trains agents, (4) supervises agents, or (5) otherwise controls agents.

The liability of a principal under this provision—called negligent hiring—arises when the principal does not exercise proper care in selecting an agent for the job to be done. For example, if Patricia lends to her employee, Art, a company car with which to run a business errand, knowing that Art is incapable of driving the vehicle, Patricia would be liable for her own negligence to anyone injured by Art's unsafe driving. The negligent hiring doctrine has also been used to impose liability on a principal for intentional torts committed by an agent against customers of the principal or members of the public, when the principal either knew or should have known that the agent was violent or aggressive.

CONNES V. MOLALLA TRANSPORT SYSTEM, INC.

FACTS Terry Taylor was an employee of Molalla Transport. In hiring Taylor, Molalla followed its standard hiring procedure, which includes a personal interview with each applicant and requires the applicant to fill out an extensive job application form and to produce a current driver's license and a certificate from a medical examiner. Molalla also contacts prior employers and other references about the applicant's qualifications and conducts an investigation of the applicant's driving record in the state where the applicant obtained the driver's license. Although applicants are asked whether they have been convicted of a crime, Molalla does not conduct an independent investigation to verify the statement. Approximately three months after Taylor began working for Molalla, he was assigned to transport freight from Kansas to Oregon. While traveling through Colorado, Taylor left the highway and drove by a hotel where Grace Connes was working as a night clerk. Observing that Connes was alone in the lobby, Taylor pulled his truck into the parking lot and entered the lobby. Once inside, Taylor sexually assaulted Connes at knife-point. Although Taylor denied any prior criminal convictions on his application and during his interview, police and court records obtained since these events show that Taylor had been convicted of three felonies in Colorado and had been issued three citations for lewd conduct and another citation for simple assault in Seattle, Washington.

Connes sued Molalla on the theory of negligent hiring, claiming that Molalla knew or should have known that Taylor would come into contact with members of the public, that Molalla had a duty to hire and retain high-quality employees so as not to endanger members of the public, and that Molalla had breached its duty by failing to investigate fully and adequately Taylor's criminal background. The district court granted Molalla's motion for summary judgment. The Court of Appeals upheld the lower court's ruling, holding that Molalla had no legal duty to investigate the nonvehicular criminal record of its driver prior to hiring him as an employee. Connes appealed.

DECISION Judgment affirmed.

OPINION Quinn, J. The tort of negligent hiring is based on the principle that a person conducting an activity through employees is subject to liability for harm resulting from negligent conduct “in the employment of improper persons or instrumentalities in work involving risk of harm to others.” Restatement (Second) of Agency § 213(b). This principle of liability is not based on the rule of agency but rather on the law of torts. In [citation], the New Jersey Supreme Court offered the following distinction between the tort of negligent hiring and the agency doctrine of vicarious liability based on the rule of respondeat superior:

Thus, the tort of negligent hiring addresses the risk created by exposing members of the public to a potentially dangerous individual, while the doctrine of respondeat superior is based on the theory that the employee is the agent or is acting for the employer. Therefore the scope of employment limitation on liability which is part of the respondeat superior doctrine is not implicit in the wrong of negligent hiring.

Accordingly, the negligent hiring theory has been used to impose liability in cases where the employee commits an intentional tort, an action almost invariably outside the scope of employment, against the customer of a particular employer or other member of the public, where the employer either knew or should have known that the employee was violent or aggressive, or that the employee might engage in injurious conduct toward third persons.

In recognizing the tort of negligent hiring, we emphasize that an employer is not an insurer for violent acts committed by an employee against a third person. On the contrary, liability is predicated on the employer’s hiring of a person under circumstances antecedently giving the employer reason to believe that the person, by reason of some attribute of character or prior conduct, would create an undue risk of harm to others in carrying out his or her employment responsibilities. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 213, comment d. The scope of the employer’s duty in exercising reasonable care in a hiring decision will depend largely on the anticipated degree of contact which the employee will have with other persons in performing his or her employment duties.

Where the employment calls for minimum contact between the employee and other persons, there may be no reason for an employer to conduct any investigation of the applicant’s background beyond obtaining past employment information and personal data during the initial interview. [Citation.]

We endorse the proposition that where an employer hires a person for a job requiring frequent contact with members of the public, or involving close contact with particular persons as a result of a special relationship between such persons and the employer, the employer’s duty of reasonable care is not satisfied by a mere review of personal data disclosed by the applicant on a job application form or during a personal interview. However, in the absence of circumstances antecedently giving the employer reason to believe that the job applicant, by reason of some attribute of character or prior conduct, would constitute an undue risk of harm to members of the public with whom the applicant will be in frequent contact or to particular persons standing in a special relationship to the employer and with whom the applicant will have close contact, we decline to impose upon the employer his duty to obtain and review official records of an applicant’s criminal history. To impose such a requirement would mean that an employer would be obligated to seek out and evaluate official police and perhaps court records from every jurisdiction in which a job applicant had any significant contact. We have serious doubts whether such a task could be effectively achieved. *** Accordingly, in the absence of circumstances antecedently giving the employer reason to believe that a job applicant, by reason of some attribute of character or prior conduct, would constitute an undue risk of harm to members of the public with whom the applicant will be in frequent contact or to particular persons who stand in a special relationship to the employer and with whom the applicant will be in close contact, the employer’s duty of reasonable care does not extend to searching for and reviewing official records of a job applicant’s criminal history.

In the instant case, we agree with the court of appeals’ determination that Molalla had no duty to conduct an independent investigation into Taylor’s non-vehicular criminal background before hiring him as a long-haul driver. Molalla had no reason to foresee that its hiring of Taylor under the circumstances of this case would create a risk that Taylor would sexually assault or otherwise endanger a member of the public by engaging in violent conduct. To be sure, Molalla had a duty to use reasonable care in hiring a safe driver who would not create a danger to the public in carrying out the duties of the job. Far from requiring frequent contact with members of the public or involving close contact with persons having a special relationship with the employer, Taylor’s duties were restricted to the hauling of freight on interstate highways and, as such, involved only incidental contact with third persons having no special relationship to Molalla or to Taylor. After checking on Taylor’s driving record and contacting some of his references, Molalla had no reason to believe that Taylor would not be a safe driver or a dependable employee. In addition, Molalla specifically instructed its drivers to stay on the interstate highways and, except for an emergency, to stop only in order to service the truck and to eat and to sleep. It further directed its drivers to sleep in the sleeping compartment behind the driver’s seat of the truck at rest areas or truck stops located along the interstate highway system. Furthermore, Molalla required Taylor to fill out a job application and to submit to a personal interview. Taylor stated on the application form and at the interview that he had never been convicted of a crime. Nothing in the hiring process gave Molalla reason to foresee that Taylor would pose an unreasonable risk of harm to members of the public with whom he might have incidental contact during the performance of his duties. ***

We accordingly hold that Molalla, in hiring Taylor as a long-haul truck driver, had no legal duty to conduct an independent investigation into Taylor's non-vehicular criminal background in order to protect a member of the public, such as Connes, from a sexual assault committed by Taylor in the course of making a long-haul trip over the interstate highway system.

INTERPRETATION An employer's liability for negligent hiring is based on the employer's hiring a person under circumstances antecedently giving the employer reason to believe that the person would create an undue risk of harm to others in carrying out his employment duties.

ETHICAL QUESTION Was the court's decision fair? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION When should a prospective employer be required to check the criminal record of a job applicant? Explain.

VICARIOUS LIABILITY OF PRINCIPAL FOR UNAUTHORIZED ACTS OF AGENT

The vicarious liability of a principal for unauthorized torts by an agent depends primarily on whether the agent is an employee or not. In this context, an employee is an agent whose principal controls or has the right to control the manner and means of the agent's performance of work. By comparison, if the principal does not control the manner and means of the agent's performance of the work, the agent is not an employee and is often referred to as an "independent contractor." The general rule is that a principal is not liable for physical harm caused by the tortious conduct of an agent who is an independent contractor if the principal did not intend or authorize the result or the manner of performance. Conversely, a principal is liable for an unauthorized tort committed by an employee acting within the scope of his employment.

Respondeat Superior An employer is subject to vicarious liability for an unauthorized tort committed by his employee, even one that is in flagrant disobedience of his instructions, if the employee committed the tort within the scope of her employment. This form of employer liability without fault is based on the doctrine of respondeat superior, or "let the superior respond." It does not matter how carefully the employer selected the employee if, in fact, the latter tortiously injures a third party while engaged in the scope of employment. Moreover, an undisclosed principal-employer is liable for the torts his employee commits within the scope of employment. Furthermore, the principal is liable even if the work is performed gratuitously so long as the principal controls or has the right to control the manner and means of the agent's performance of work.

The doctrine of respondeat superior is fundamental to the operation of tort law in the United States. The rationale for this doctrine is that a person who conducts his business activities through the use of employees should be liable for the employees' tortious conduct in carrying out those activities. The employer is more likely to insure against liability and is more likely to have the assets to satisfy a tort judgment than the employee. Moreover, respondeat superior creates an economic incentive for employers to exercise care in choosing, training, supervising, and insuring employees.

The liability of the principal under respondeat superior is vicarious or derivative and depends on proof of wrongdoing by the employee within the scope of his employment. The employer's vicarious liability to the third party is in addition to the agent's liability to the third party. Frequently, both principal and employee are defendants in the same suit. If the employee is not held liable, the principal is not liable either, because the employer's liability is based upon the employee's tortious conduct. A principal who is held liable for her employee's tort has a right of indemnification against the employee, which is the right to be reimbursed for the amount that she was required to pay as a result of the employee's wrongful act. Frequently, however, an employee is not able to reimburse his employer, and the principal must bear the brunt of the liability.

The wrongful act of the employee must be connected with his employment and within its scope if the principal is to be held liable for resulting injuries or damage to third persons.

The Restatement provides a general rule for determining whether the conduct of an employee is within the scope of employment:

An employee acts within the scope of employment when performing work assigned by the employer or engaging in a course of conduct subject to the employer's control. An employee's act is not within the scope of employment when it occurs within an independent course of conduct not intended by the employee to serve any purpose of the employer.

For example, Hal, delivering gasoline for Martha, lights his pipe and negligently throws the blazing match into a pool of gasoline that has dripped on the ground during the delivery. The gasoline ignites, burning Arnold's filling station. Martha is subject to liability for the resulting harm because the negligence of the employee who delivered the gasoline relates directly to the manner in which he handled the goods in his custody. But if a chauffeur, while driving his employer's car on an errand for his employer, suddenly decides to shoot his pistol at pedestrians on the sidewalk, the employer would not be liable to the pedestrians. This willful and intentional misconduct is not related to the performance of the services for which the chauffeur was employed.

The same rule applies to an employee's tortious conduct that is unrelated to his employment. If Page employs Edward to deliver merchandise to Page's customers in a given city, and while driving a delivery truck to or from a place of delivery Edward negligently causes the truck to hit and injure Fred, Page is liable to Fred for injuries sustained. But if, after making the scheduled deliveries, Edward drives the truck to a neighboring city to visit a friend and while so doing negligently causes the truck to hit and injure Debra, Page is not liable. In the latter case, Edward is said to be on a "frolic of his own." By using the truck to accomplish his own purposes, not those of his employer, he has deviated from serving any purpose of his employer.

A principal may be held liable for the intentional torts of his employee if the commission of the tort is so reasonably connected with the employment as to be within its scope.

RUBIN V. YELLOW CAB COMPANY

APPELLATE COURT OF ILLINOIS, FIRST DISTRICT, FIFTH DIVISION, 1987
154 ILL.APP.3D 336, 107 ILL.DEC. 450, 507 N.E.2D 114

FACTS Rubin, the plaintiff, was driving on one of the city's streets when he inadvertently obstructed the path of a taxicab, causing the cab to come into contact with his vehicle. Angered by the plaintiff's sudden blocking of his traffic lane, the defendant taxi driver exited his cab, approached Rubin, and struck him about the head and shoulders with a metal pipe. Rubin filed suit against the cab driver to recover for bodily injuries resulting from the altercation. He also sued the Yellow Cab Company (Yellow Cab), asserting that the company was vicariously liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior. The trial court ruled in favor of Yellow Cab, and the plaintiff appealed.

DECISION Judgment for Yellow Cab affirmed.

OPINION Lorenz, J. We initially consider whether the subject complaint states a cause of action under the doctrine of respondeat superior.

It is well established that an employer may be held liable for the negligent, willful, malicious or criminal acts of its employees where such acts are committed in the course of employment and in furtherance of the business of the employer. [Citation.] However, where the acts complained of are committed solely for the benefit of the employee, the employer will not be held liable to an injured third party. [Citation.]

Plaintiff in the instant case maintains that his fourth amended complaint alleges sufficient facts to show that Ball committed the battery within the course and scope of his duties as a cab driver. According to plaintiff, Ball's acts were designed to further the business purposes of Yellow Cab by virtue of the fact that they: (1) fulfilled his obligation to investigate and report any accidents damaging property owned by Yellow Cab; (2) were performed pursuant to his obligation to protect property owned by Yellow Cab; and (3) were meant to prevent plaintiff and others from delaying his progress to obtain fares. We disagree.

First, the complaint in question contains no allegation that plaintiff was interfering with Ball's investigation or attempt to report the accident or, for that matter, that Ball was even attempting to investigate or report the incident at the time he struck plaintiff with the pipe. Rather, the subject complaint merely states that Ball got out of his cab, walked over to plaintiff and proceeded to hit him over the head with a pipe. This act patently has no relation to the business of driving a cab. In view of their duties, cab drivers are not expected to strike individuals on the street with metal pipes. Second, the battery could have no relation to Yellow Cab's interest in protecting its property since the contact between the two vehicles had already occurred. Lastly, the battery could not have prevented plaintiff from delaying Ball's progress to the airport to obtain passengers as a delay had already occurred before Ball got out of his cab to strike plaintiff.

While we accept the principles stated in the cases primarily relied on by plaintiff, their factual inapplicability makes their application improper in the resolution of the instant case. [Citations], all present situations in which bartenders or bouncers endeavored to maintain order or protect the property of their employers. The nature of a bartender's or bouncer's job makes the use of force during the course of his employment highly probable. A cab driver, on the other hand, is basically relegated to transporting individuals from one destination to another and, as such, it is unlikely that he will undertake to attack a person that is neither a passenger nor is connected with the cab company. ***

As Ball's assault of plaintiff was clearly not an act undertaken to further Yellow Cab's business but rather one propelled singularly by anger and frustration, the trial court properly dismissed Count IX of plaintiff's fourth amended complaint for failure to state a cause of action under the doctrine of respondeat superior.

INTERPRETATION Under respondeat superior, an employer's liability for torts extends only to torts committed within the scope of employment.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree that the taxi driver's conduct was outside his employment duties? If so, should it exonerate the employer from liability? Explain.

Agent Acts with Apparent Authority The Restatement provides that

A principal is subject to vicarious liability for a tort committed by an agent in dealing or communicating with a third party on or purportedly on behalf of the principal when actions taken by the agent with apparent authority constitute the tort or enable the agent to conceal its commission.

This liability applies to (1) agents, whether or not they are employees, and (2) agents who are employees but whose tortious conduct is not within the scope of employment under respondeat superior. The torts to which this rule applies include fraudulent and negligent misrepresentations, defamation, wrongful institution of legal proceedings, and conversion of property.

Torts of Independent Contractor An independent contractor is not the employee of the person for whom he is performing work or rendering services. Hence, the doctrine of respondeat superior generally does not apply to torts committed by an independent contractor. For example, Parnell authorizes Bob, his broker, to sell land for him. Parnell, Teresa, and Bob meet in Teresa's office; and Bob arranges the sale to Teresa. While Bob is preparing a deed for Parnell to sign, he negligently knocks over an inkstand and ruins a valuable rug belonging to Teresa. Bob, not Parnell, is liable to Teresa.

Nonetheless, the principal may be directly liable if she fails to exercise reasonable care in selecting an independent contractor. For example, Melanie employs Gordon, whom she knows to be an alcoholic, as an independent contractor to repair her roof. Gordon attempts the repairs while heavily intoxicated and negligently drops a fifty-pound bundle of shingles upon Eric, a pedestrian walking on the sidewalk. Both Gordon and Melanie are liable to Eric.

Moreover, under some circumstances, a principal will be vicariously liable for torts committed by a carefully selected independent contractor. Certain duties imposed by law are nondelegable, and a person may not escape the consequences of their nonperformance by having entrusted them to another person. For example, a landowner who permits an independent contractor to maintain a dangerous condition on his premises, such as an excavation that is neither surrounded by a guardrail nor lit at night and that adjoins a public sidewalk, is liable to a member of the public who is injured by falling into the excavation.

A principal is also vicariously liable for an independent contractor's conduct in carrying on an abnormally dangerous activity, such as using fire or high explosives, or spraying crops.

Practical Advice

As a principal, consider hiring an independent contractor to limit your potential tort liability.

Criminal Liability of the Principal

A principal is liable for the authorized criminal acts of his agents only if the principal directed, participated in, or approved of the acts. For example, if an agent, at his principal's direction or with his principal's knowledge, fixes prices with the principal's competitors, both the agent and the principal have criminally violated the antitrust laws. Otherwise, a principal ordinarily is not liable for the unauthorized criminal acts of his agents. One of the elements of a crime is mental fault, and this element is absent, so far as the principal's criminal responsibility is concerned, when the principal did not authorize the agent's act.

An employer may, nevertheless, be subject to a criminal penalty for the unauthorized act of an advisory or managerial employee acting in the scope of her employment. Moreover, an employer may be criminally liable under liability without fault statutes for certain unauthorized criminal acts of an employee, whether the employee is managerial or not. These statutes are usually regulatory and do not require mental fault. For example, many states have statutes that punish “every person who by himself or his employee or agent sells anything at short weight,” or “whoever sells liquor to a minor and any sale by an employee shall be deemed the act of the employer as well.” Another example is a statute prohibiting the sale of unwholesome or adulterated food. See Chapter 6 for a more detailed discussion of this topic.

RELATIONSHIP OF AGENT AND THIRD PERSONS

The function of an agent is to assist in the conduct of the principal’s business by carrying out his orders. Generally, the agent acquires no rights against third parties and likewise incurs no liabilities to them. There are, however, several exceptions to this proposition. In certain instances, an agent may become personally liable to the third party for contracts she made on behalf of her principal. Occasionally, the agent also may acquire rights against the third party. In addition, an agent who commits a tort is personally liable to the injured third party. In this section, we will cover these circumstances involving the personal liability of an agent, as well as those in which an agent may acquire rights against third persons.

Contract Liability of Agent

The agent normally is not a party to the contract he makes with a third person on behalf of a disclosed principal. An agent who exceeds his actual and apparent authority may, however, be personally liable to the third party. In addition, an agent acting for a disclosed principal may become liable if he expressly assumes liability on the contract. When an agent enters into a contract on behalf of an unidentified (partially disclosed) principal or an undisclosed principal, the agent becomes personally liable to the third party on the contract. Furthermore, an agent who knowingly enters into a contract on behalf of a nonexistent or completely incompetent principal is personally liable to the third party on that contract.

DISCLOSED PRINCIPAL

has notice that the agent is acting for a principal and also has notice of the principal’s identity. The liability of an agent acting for a disclosed principal depends on whether the agent acts within her authority in making the contract or otherwise assumes liability on the contract.

Authorized Contracts When an agent acting with actual or apparent authority makes a contract with a third party on behalf of a disclosed principal, the agent is not a party to the contract unless she and the third party agree otherwise. The third person is on notice that he is transacting business with an agent who is acting for an identified principal and that the agent is not personally undertaking to perform the contract but is simply negotiating on behalf of her principal. The resulting contract, if within the agent’s actual authority, is between the third person and the principal. The agent ordinarily incurs no liability on the contract to either party. (See Figure 30-1.) This is also true of unauthorized contracts that are subsequently ratified by the principal. However, if the agent has apparent authority but no actual authority, the agent has no liability to the third party but is liable to the principal for any loss the agent has caused by exceeding his actual authority.

Practical Advice

When signing contracts as an agent, be sure to indicate clearly your representative capacity.

Unauthorized Contracts If an agent exceeds his actual and apparent authority, the principal is not bound. The fact that the principal is not bound does not, however, make the agent a party to the contract unless the agent had agreed to be a party to the contract. The agent’s liability, if any, arises from express or implied representations about his authority that he makes to the third party. For example, an agent may give an express warranty of authority by stating that he has authority and that he will be personally liable to the third party if he does not in fact have the authority to bind his principal.

Moreover, a person who undertakes to make a contract on behalf of another gives an implied warranty of authority that he is in fact authorized to make the contract on behalf of the party whom he purports to represent. If the agent does not have authority to bind the principal, the agent is liable to the third party for damages unless the principal ratifies the contract or unless the third party knew that the agent was unauthorized. No implied warranty exists, however, if the agent expressly states that the agent gives no warranty of authority or if the agent, acting in good faith, discloses to the third person all of the facts upon which his authority rests. For example, agent Larson has received an ambiguous letter of instruction from his principal, Dan. Larson shows it to Carol, stating that it represents all of the authority that he has to act, and both Larson and Carol rely upon its sufficiency. In this case, Larson has made to Carol no implied or express warranty of his authority.

The Restatement provides that breach of the implied warranty of authority subjects the agent to liability to the third party for damages caused by breach of that warranty, including loss of the benefit expected from performance by the principal. Some courts, however, limit the third party's recovery to the damage or loss the third party suffered and exclude the third party's expected gain from the contract.

If a purported agent misrepresents to a third person that he has authority to make a contract on behalf of a principal whom he has no power to bind, he is liable in a tort action to the third person for the loss she sustained in reliance upon the misrepresentation. However, if the third party knows that the representation is false, the agent is not liable.

Practical Advice

As an agent, consider disclaiming liability for any lack of authority; as a third party, consider obtaining from the agent an express warranty of authority.

Agent Assumes Liability An agent for a disclosed principal may agree to become liable on a contract between the principal and the third party by (1) making the contract in her own name, (2) co-making the contract with the principal, or (3) guaranteeing that the principal will perform the contract between the third party and the principal. In all of these situations, the agent's liability is separate unless the parties agree otherwise. Therefore, the third party may sue the agent separately without joining the principal and may obtain a judgment against either the principal or the agent, or both. If the principal satisfies the judgment, the agent is discharged. If the agent pays the judgment, he usually will have a right of reimbursement from the principal. This right is based upon the principles of suretyship, discussed in Chapter 38.

UNIDENTIFIED PRINCIPAL

As we discussed previously, the principal is an unidentified principal (partially disclosed principal) if, when an agent and a third party interact, the third party has notice that the agent is acting for a principal but does not have notice of the principal's identity. Using an unidentified principal may be helpful when, for example, the third party might inflate the price of property he is selling if he knew the identity of the principal. Partial disclosure may also occur inadvertently, when the agent fails through neglect to inform the third party of the principal's identity.

Unless otherwise agreed, when an agent makes a contract with actual or apparent authority on behalf of an unidentified principal, the agent is a party to the contract. For example, Ashley writes to Terrence offering to sell a rare painting on behalf of its owner, who wishes to remain unknown. Terrence accepts. Ashley is a party to the contract.

Whether the particular transaction is authorized or not, an agent for an unidentified principal is liable to the third party. (See Figure 30-2.) If the agent is actually or apparently authorized to make the contract, both the agent and the unidentified principal are liable. If the agent has no actual and no apparent authority, the agent is liable either as a party to the contract or for breach of the implied warranty of authority. In any event, the agent is separately liable, and the third party may sue her individually, without joining the principal, and the agent or the principal may obtain a judgment against either or both. If the principal satisfies the judgment, the agent is also discharged. If the agent pays the judgment, the principal is discharged from liability to the third party, but the agent has the right to be reimbursed by the principal.

UNDISCLOSED PRINCIPAL

The principal is an undisclosed principal if, when an agent and a third party interact, the third party has no notice that the agent is acting for a principal. Thus, when an agent acts for an undisclosed principal, she appears to be acting on her own behalf and the third person with whom she is dealing has no knowledge that she is acting as an agent. The principal has instructed the agent to conceal not only the principal's identity but also the agency relationship. Such concealment can also occur if the agent simply neglects to disclose the existence and identity of her principal. Thus, the third person is dealing with the agent as though the agent were a principal.

The agent is personally liable upon a contract she enters into with a third person on behalf of an undisclosed principal. (See Figure 30-3.) The agent is liable because the third person has relied upon the agent individually and has accepted the agent's personal undertaking to perform the contract. Obviously, when the principal is undisclosed, the third person does not know of the interest of anyone in the contract other than that of himself and the agent.

The Second Restatement and many cases hold that after learning the identity of the undisclosed principal, the third person may obtain performance of the contract from either the principal or the agent, but not both; and his choice, once made, binds him irrevocably. However, to avoid the risk that evidence at trial may fail to establish the agency relationship, the third person may bring suit against both the principal and agent. In most states following this approach, this act of bringing suit and proceeding to trial against both is not an election, but, before the entry of any judgment, the third person is compelled to make an election because he is not entitled to a judgment against both. A judgment against the agent by a third party who knows the identity of the previously undisclosed principal discharges the principal's liability to the third party but leaves her liable to the agent, who would have the right to be reimbursed by the principal. If the third party obtains a judgment against the agent before learning the identity of the principal, the principal is not discharged. Finally, the agent is discharged from liability if the third party obtains a judgment against the principal.

The Third Restatement and a number of states have recently rejected the election rule, holding that a third party's rights against the principal are additional and not alternative to the third party's rights against the agent. The Third Restatement provides, "When an agent has made a contract with a third party on behalf of a principal, unless the contract provides otherwise, the liability, if any, of the principal or the agent to the third party is not discharged if the third party obtains a judgment against the other." However, the liability, if any, of the principal or the agent to the third party is discharged to the extent a judgment against the other is satisfied.

NONEXISTENT OR INCOMPETENT PRINCIPAL

Unless the third party agrees otherwise, if a person who purports to act as an agent knows or has reason to know that the person purportedly represented does not exist or completely lacks capacity to be a party to contract, the person purporting to act as agent will become a party to the contract. Complete lack of capacity to contract includes an individual person who has been adjudicated incompetent. An example of a nonexistent principal is a corporation or limited liability company (LLC) that has not yet been formed. Thus, a promoter of a corporation who enters into contracts with third persons in the name of a corporation yet to be organized is personally liable on such contracts. Not yet in existence, and therefore unable to authorize the contracts, the corporation is not liable. If, after coming into existence, the corporation affirmatively adopts a preincorporation contract made on its behalf, it, in addition to the promoter, becomes bound. If the corporation enters into a new contract with such a third person, however, the prior contract between the promoter and the third person is discharged, and the liability of the promoter is terminated. This is a novation.

An agent who makes a contract for a disclosed principal whose contracts are voidable for lack of contractual capacity is not liable to the third party, with two exceptions: (1) if the agent warrants or represents that the principal has capacity or (2) if the agent has reason to know both of the principal's lack of capacity and of the third party's ignorance of that incapacity.

PLAIN DEALER PUBLISHING CO. v. WORRELL

FACTS The Plain Dealer Publishing Company brought a lawsuit in August 2005 to collect a debt for advertising placed by Frederick "Rick" Worrell, doing business as WRL Advertising. The lawsuit also named Martha J. Musil, an employee of WRL Advertising who had placed the advertising orders with the Plain Dealer at the direction of her employer. Shortly after the case was brought, Worrell filed bankruptcy, and as a result of the automatic stay, the trial court placed the case on the inactive docket. On January 24, 2006, the trial court granted the Plain Dealer's motion to reactivate the case as to Musil only. Subsequently, the Plain Dealer moved for summary judgment, asserting that Musil was personally liable on the contracts because WRL Advertising was a fictitious entity with no legal standing.

The trial court determined that although Musil communicated her agency relationship to the Plain Dealer, she did not sufficiently disclose the identity of her principal. In making this determination, the trial court noted that "[i]t is also undisputed that WRL Advertising is not a legal entity in its own right, but rather a trade name for Winfield, [sic] Bennett & Baer, LLC, which is owned and operated by Worrell." The trial court held that the use of a principal's trade name is insufficient to identify the principal. The trial court found that because she was acting, at best, on behalf of a partially disclosed principal, Musil was liable on the contracts. The trial court awarded the Plain Dealer a judgment against Musil in the amount of $8,720 plus interest. Musil appealed.

DECISION Judgment is reversed and case is remanded.

OPINION Moore, P.J. In resolving this case, we must look to the law of agency. Agency law in Ohio has been summarized as follows:

1. Where the agent is acting for a disclosed principal, i.e., where both the existence of the agency and the identity of the principal are known to the person with whom the agent deals. An agent who acts for a disclosed principal and who acts within the scope of his authority and in the name of the principal is ordinarily not liable on the contracts he makes. [Citations.] The rationale for this rule is that in this situation the third party intends to deal with the principal, not his agent.
2. Where the principal is only partially disclosed, i.e., where the existence of an agency is known to the third person, but the identity of the principal is not known. Here, the agent is held to be a party to the transaction and is liable to the third party, as is the agent's principal. [Citations.] The reason for the rule is that since the identity of the principal is not known to the third party, he ordinarily will not be willing to rely wholly upon the credit and integrity of an unknown party.
3. Where the principal is undisclosed, i.e., where neither the existence of an agency nor the identity of the principal is known to the third party. Here, the dealing is held to be between the agent and the third party, and the agent is liable. [Citation.] Should the identity of the principal be discovered, he may be held liable by the third party who must elect to pursue either the principal or agent—both are not liable. [Citation.] The rationale for the agent's liability is that since the third party was unaware of the agency, he intended to deal with the agent as an individual, not as an agent.
4. Where there is a fictitious or nonexistent principal, or the principal is without legal capacity or status. If an agent purports to act on behalf of such a "principal," the agent will be liable to the third party as a party to the transaction. [Citations.] One cannot be an agent for a nonexistent principal; there is no agency. This situation frequently arises where a corporate promoter enters into contracts prior to the time the corporation is actually incorporated. [Citation.] [Citation.]

The parties do not contest the fact that Musil communicated to the Plain Dealer that she was working on behalf of a principal. In its brief, the Plain Dealer asserts that "Musil dealt directly with [the] Plain Dealer and held herself as acting on behalf of 'WRL Advertising.' Musil executed two contracts on behalf of 'WRL Advertising [,]' an entity that does not exist in Ohio." Therefore, Musil properly notified the Plain Dealer that she was acting as an agent. In Ohio, an agent is liable to a third party when she contracts in the name of a nonexistent or fictitious principal or assumes to act as an agent for a principal who has no legal status or existence. [Citations.] We hold that Musil was not acting on behalf of a fictitious entity or an entity that does not exist in Ohio, but rather that WRL Advertising was a fictitious name for Wingfield, Bennett, & Baer, L.L.C.

"A corporation may use a name other than its corporate name in the conduct of its business." [Citation.] For example, "[a]n action may be commenced or maintained against the user of a fictitious name whether or not the name has been reported," but a person doing business under an unreported fictitious name cannot bring an action against a third party in that name. Id. In the instant case, the parties do not dispute that Wingfield, Bennett & Baer L.L.C. was registered with the Secretary of State. We find that Wingfield, Bennett & Baer is therefore not a fictitious or nonexistent principal for agency law purposes. Further *** we note that WRL Advertising was a fictitious name for Wingfield, Bennett & Baer and that Musil was acting on behalf of Wingfield, Bennett & Baer, which was in turn using a fictitious name.

An agent will "avoid personal liability for debts of the corporation only if he complies with the rules which apply in all agency relationships—he must so conduct himself in dealing on behalf of the corporation with third persons that those persons are aware that he is an agent of the corporation and it is the corporation (principal) with which they are dealing, not the agent individually." [Citation.] In the instant case, Musil disclosed that she was acting on behalf of a principal, and therefore, the Plain Dealer knew that it was not dealing with Musil individually. We note that the Plain Dealer knew it was dealing with an entity, but that entity was using the fictitious name WRL Advertising. We do not find, as the Plain Dealer has urged, that the use of a name other than Wingfield, Bennett & Baer in the conduct of business would render Musil liable as an agent of a nonexistent or fictitious principal. As we find that Musil was acting on behalf of a legal entity using a fictitious name, we hold that the trial court erred when it granted the Plain Dealer's motion for summary judgment.***

INTERPRETATION To avoid personal liability on a contract, an agent must disclose both that she is acting as an agent and the identity of her principal.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Should it be legally permissible for an agent not to disclose the existence and identity of his principal? Explain.

Ethical Dilemma

When Should an Agent's Power to Bind His Principal Terminate?

FACTS Tim Banks was an employee of Golden Harvest Florists International (GHFI). GHFI operated a wholesale florist business on the East Coast and also maintained a small chain of retail shops in the Washington, D.C.–Baltimore area. Tim, whose responsibilities included buying large quantities of fresh cut flowers from various greenhouses along the East Coast, had established an excellent rapport with all of his suppliers and was well respected throughout the entire industry.

Because of his good reputation, Tim was shocked to discover on April 1, 1993, that he had been released by GHFI. This notice came after five years of faithful service to the company. Though the company would not tell Tim why he had been fired, Tim learned that GHFI felt threatened by his reputation and was worried that he was becoming better known and more important than the company itself.

GHFI did not, moreover, notify any of Tim's suppliers of his release until January 1, 1994. The company was worried that notice might undermine the suppliers' confidence in the company and could possibly cause prices to rise. Meanwhile, deciding to begin his own business, Tim continued to purchase flowers from the same greenhouses. He was able to pay his supply bills from April through November 1993, but, when his funds were low in December, he charged the flowers to GHFI. GHFI refused to pay, and the greenhouses have filed suit against Tim and GHFI.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. Who is legally responsible for the bills? Who is ethically responsible?
2. What is the social policy behind the requirement of notice prior to termination of a principal-agent relationship?
3. Does Tim have a responsibility to the greenhouses to notify them of the source of his funds, as long as the bill is paid?

Tort Liability of Agent

An agent is personally liable for his tortious acts that injure third persons, whether such acts are authorized by the principal or not and whether the principal may also be liable or not. For example, an agent is personally liable if he converts the goods of a third person to his principal's use. An agent is also liable for making representations that he knows to be fraudulent to a third person who in reliance sustains a loss.

Rights of Agent against Third Person

An agent who makes a contract with a third person on behalf of a disclosed principal usually has no right of action against the third person for breach of contract. The agent is not a party to the contract. An agent for a disclosed principal may sue on the contract, however, if it provides that the agent is a party to the contract. Furthermore, an agent for an undisclosed principal or an unidentified (partially disclosed) principal may maintain in her own name an action against the third person for breach of contract.

Chapter Summary

RELATIONSHIP OF PRINCIPAL AND THIRD PERSONS

Contract Liability of Principal

Types of Principals

- Disclosed Principal principal whose existence and identity are known
- Unidentified (Partially Disclosed) Principal principal whose existence is known but whose identity is not known
- Undisclosed Principal principal whose existence and identity are not known

Authority power of an agent to change the legal status of the principal

- Actual Authority power conferred upon the agent by actual consent manifested by the principal to the agent
- Actual Express Authority actual authority derived from written or spoken words of the principal communicated to the agent
- Actual Implied Authority actual authority inferred from words or conduct manifested to the agent by the principal
- Apparent Authority power conferred upon the agent by acts or conduct of the principal that reasonably lead a third party to believe that the agent has such power

Delegation of Authority is usually not permitted unless actually or apparently authorized by the principal; if the agent is authorized to appoint other subagents, the acts of these subagents are as binding on the principal as those of the agent

Effect of Termination of Agency on Authority ends actual authority

- Second Restatement if the termination is by operation of law, apparent authority also ends without notice to third parties; if the termination is by an act of the parties, apparent authority ends when third parties have actual knowledge or when appropriate notice is given to third parties; actual notice must be given to third parties with whom the agent had previously dealt on credit, has been specially accredited, or has begun to deal; all other third parties as to whom there was apparent authority need only be given constructive notice
- Third Restatement termination of actual authority does not by itself end any apparent authority held by an agent; apparent authority ends when it is no longer reasonable for the third party with whom an agent deals to believe that the agent continues to act with actual authority

Ratification affirmation by one person of a prior unauthorized act that another has done as her agent or as her purported agent

Fundamental Rules of Contractual Liability

- Disclosed Principal contractually bound with the third party if the agent acts within her actual or apparent authority in making the contract on the principal's behalf
- Unidentified (Partially Disclosed) Principal contractually bound with the third party if the agent acts within her actual or apparent authority in making the contract on the principal's behalf
- Undisclosed Principal contractually bound with the third party if the agent acts within her actual authority in making the contract on the principal's behalf

Tort Liability of Principal

Direct Liability of Principal a principal is liable for his own tortious conduct involving the use of agents

- Authorized Acts of Agent a principal is liable for torts that she authorizes another to commit or that she ratifies
- Unauthorized Acts of Agent a principal is liable for failing to exercise reasonable care in employing agents whose unauthorized acts cause harm

Vicarious Liability of Principal for Unauthorized Acts of Agent

- Respondeat Superior an employer is liable for unauthorized torts committed by an employee in the scope of his employment
- Agent Acts with Apparent Authority a principal is liable for torts committed by an agent in dealing with third parties while acting within the agent's apparent authority
- Independent Contractor a principal is usually not liable for the unauthorized torts of an independent contractor

Criminal Liability of the Principal

Authorized Acts the principal is liable if he directed, participated in, or approved the acts of his agents

Unauthorized Acts the principal may be liable either for a criminal act of a managerial person or under liability without fault statutes

RELATIONSHIP OF AGENTS AND THIRD PERSONS

Contract Liability of Agent

Disclosed Principal

- Authorized Contracts the agent is not normally a party to the contract she makes with a third person if she has actual or apparent authority or if the principal ratifies an unauthorized contract
- Unauthorized Contracts if an agent exceeds her actual and apparent authority, the principal is not bound but the agent may be liable to the third party for breach of warranty or for misrepresentation
- Agent Assumes Liability an agent may agree to become liable on a contract between the principal and the third party

Unidentified (Partially Disclosed) Principal an agent who acts for a partially disclosed principal is a party to the contract with the third party unless otherwise agreed

Undisclosed Principal an agent who acts for an undisclosed principal is personally liable on the contract to the third party

Nonexistent or Incompetent Principal a person who purports to act as agent for a principal whom the agent knows to be nonexistent or completely incompetent is personally liable on a contract entered into with a third person on behalf of such a principal

Tort Liability of Agent

Authorized Acts the agent is liable to the third party for his own torts

Unauthorized Acts the agent is liable to the third party for his own torts

Rights of Agent against Third Person

Disclosed Principal the agent usually has no rights against the third party

Unidentified (Partially Disclosed) Principal the agent may enforce the contract against the third party

Undisclosed Principal the agent may enforce the contract against the third party

Questions

1. Alice was Peter's traveling salesperson and was authorized to collect accounts. Before the agreed termination of the agency, Peter wrongfully discharged Alice. Peter did not notify anyone of Alice's termination. Alice then called on Tom, an old customer, and collected an account from Tom. She also called on Laura, a new prospect, as Peter's agent, secured a large order, collected the price of the order, sent the order to Peter, and disappeared with the collections. Peter delivered the goods to Laura per the order.
  - a. What will be the result if Peter sues Tom for his account?
  - b. What will be the result if Peter sues Laura for the agreed price of the goods?
2. Paula instructed Alvin, her agent, to purchase a quantity of hides. Alvin ordered the hides from Ted in his own (Alvin's) name and delivered the hides to Paula. Ted, learning later that Paula was the principal, sends the bill to Paula, who refuses to pay Ted. Ted sues Paula and Alvin. What are Ted's rights against Paula and Alvin?
3. Stan sold goods to Bill in good faith, believing him to be a principal. Bill in fact was acting as agent for Nancy and within the scope of his authority. The goods were charged to Bill, and, on his refusal to pay, Stan sued Bill for the purchase price. While this action was pending, Stan learned of Bill's relationship with Nancy. Nevertheless, thirty days after learning of that relationship, Stan obtained judgment against Bill and had an execution issued that was never satisfied. Three months after the judgment was made, Stan sued Nancy for the purchase price of the goods. Is Nancy liable? Explain.

4. Green Grocery Company employed Jones as its manager and gave her authority to purchase supplies and goods for resale. Jones had conducted business for several years with Brown Distributing Company, although her purchases had been limited to groceries. Jones contacted Brown and had it deliver a color television set to her house. She told Brown that the set was to be used in promotional advertising to increase Green's business. The advertising did not develop, and Jones disappeared from the area, taking the television set with her. Brown now seeks to recover the purchase price of the set from Green. Will Brown prevail? Explain.
5. Stone was the agent authorized to sell stock of the Turner Company at $10 per share and was authorized in case of sale to fill in the blanks in the certificates with the name of the purchaser, the number of shares, and the date of sale. He sold one hundred shares to Barrie, and without the knowledge or consent of the company and without reporting to the company, he indorsed the back of the certificate as follows:

It is hereby agreed that Turner Company shall, at the end of three years after the date, repurchase the stock at $13 per share on thirty days' notice. Turner Company, by Stone.

After three years, demand was made on Turner Company to repurchase. The company refused the demand and repudiated the agreement on the ground that the agent had no authority to make the agreement for repurchase. Is Turner Company liable to Barrie? Explain.
6. Helper, a delivery boy for Gunn, delivered two heavy packages of groceries to Reed's porch. As instructed by Gunn, Helper rang the bell to let Reed know the groceries had arrived. Mrs. Reed came to the door and asked Helper if he would deliver the groceries into the kitchen because the bags were heavy. Helper did so, and on leaving he observed Mrs. Reed having difficulty in moving a cabinet in the dining room. He undertook to assist her, but being more interested in watching Mrs. Reed than in noting the course of the cabinet, he failed to observe a small, valuable antique table, which he smashed into with the cabinet and totally destroyed. Does Reed have a cause of action against Gunn for the value of the destroyed antique?
7. Driver picked up Friend to accompany him on an out-of-town delivery for his employer, Speedy Service. A "No Riders" sign was prominently displayed on the windshield of the truck, and Driver violated specific instructions of his employer by permitting an unauthorized person to ride in the vehicle. While discussing a planned fishing trip with Friend, Driver ran a red light and collided with an automobile driven by Motorist. Both Friend and Motorist were injured. Is Speedy Service liable to either Friend or Motorist for the injuries they sustained?

8. Cook's Department Store advertises that it maintains a barber shop in its store and that the shop is managed by Hunter, a Cook's employee. Actually, Hunter is not an employee of the store but merely rents space in the store. While shaving Jordan in the barber shop, Hunter negligently puts a deep gash, requiring ten stitches, into one of Jordan's ears. Should Jordan be entitled to collect damages from Cook's Department Store?
9. The following contract was executed on August 22:

Ray agrees to sell and Shaw, the representative of Todd and acting on his behalf, agrees to buy 10,000 pounds of  $0.32 \times 15/8$  stainless steel strip type 410.

(signed) Ray

(signed) Shaw

On August 26 Ray informs Shaw and Todd that the contract was in reality signed by him as agent for Upson. What are the rights of Ray, Shaw, Todd, and Upson in the event of a breach of the contract?
10. Harris, owner of certain land known as Red Bank, mailed a letter to Byron, a real estate broker in City X, stating, "I have been thinking of selling Red Bank. I have never met you, but a friend has advised me that you are an industrious and honest real estate broker. I therefore employ you to find a purchaser for Red Bank at a price of $350,000." Ten days after receiving the letter, Byron mailed the following reply to Harris: "Acting pursuant to your recent letter requesting me to find a purchaser for Red Bank, this is to advise that I have sold the property to Sims for $350,000. I enclose your copy of the contract of sale signed by Sims. Your name was signed to the contract by me as your agent." Is Harris obligated to convey Red Bank to Sims?

Case Problems

11. While crossing a public highway in the city, Joel was struck by a horse-drawn cart driven by Morison's agent. The agent was traveling between Burton Crescent Mews and Finchley on his employer's business and was not supposed to go into the city at all. Apparently, the agent was on a detour to visit a friend when the accident occurred. Joel brought this action against Morison for the injuries he sustained as a result of the agent's negligence. Morison argues that he is not liable for his agent's negligence because the agent had strayed from his assigned path. Who is correct?

- 12. Serges is the owner of a retail meat marketing business. Without authority his managing agent borrowed $3,500 from David, on Serges's behalf, for use in Serges's business. Serges paid $200 on the alleged loan and on several other occasions told David that the full balance owed would eventually be paid. He then disclaimed liability on the debt, asserting that he had not authorized his agent to enter into the loan agreement. Should David succeed in an action to collect on the loan?
- 13. Sherwood negligently ran into the rear of Austen's car, which was stopped at a stoplight. As a result, Austen received bodily injuries and her car was damaged. Sherwood, arts editor for the Mississippi Press Register, was en route from a concert he had covered for the newspaper. When the accident occurred, he was on his way to spend the night at a friend's house. Austen sued Sherwood and—under the doctrine of respondeat superior—Sherwood's employer, the Mississippi Press Register. Who is liable? Explain.
- 14. Aretta J. Parkinson owned a two-hundred-acre farm in a state that requires written authority for an agent to sell land. Prior to her death on December 23, Parkinson deeded a one-eighth undivided interest in the farm to each of her eight children as tenants in common. On January 15 of the following year, one of the daughters, Roma Funk, approached Barbara Bradshaw about selling the Parkinson farm to the Bradshaws. They orally agreed to a selling price of $800,000. After this meeting, Funk contacted Bryant Hansen, a real estate broker, to assist her in completing the transaction. Hansen prepared an earnest money agreement that was signed by the Bradshaws but by none of the Parkinson children. Hansen also prepared warranty deeds, which were signed by three of the children. Several of the children subsequently refused to convey their interests in the farm to the Bradshaws. Explain whether the Bradshaws can get specific performance of the oral contract of sale, based on the defendants' ratification of the oral contract by their knowledge of and failure to repudiate it.
- 15. Chris Zulliger was a chef at the Plaza Restaurant in the Snowbird Ski Resort in Utah. The restaurant is located at the base of a mountain. As a chef for the Plaza, Zulliger was instructed by his supervisor and the restaurant manager to make periodic trips to inspect the Mid-Gad Restaurant, which was located halfway up the mountain. Because skiing helped its employees to get to work, Snowbird preferred that its employees know how to ski and gave them ski passes as part of their compensation. One day prior to beginning work at the Plaza, Zulliger went skiing. The restaurant manager asked Zulliger to stop at the Mid-Gad before beginning work that day, and Zulliger stopped at the Mid-Gad during his first run and inspected the kitchen. He then skied four runs before heading down the mountain to begin work. On the last run, Zulliger decided to take a route often taken by Snowbird employees. About midway down, Zulliger decided to jump off a crest on the side of an intermediate run. Because of the drop, a skier above the crest cannot see whether there are skiers below, and Zulliger ran into Margaret Clover, who was below the crest. The jump was well known to Snowbird; the resort's ski patrol often instructed people not to jump, and there was a sign instructing skiers to take it slow at that point. Clover sued Zulliger and, under the doctrine of respondeat superior, Snowbird, claiming that Zulliger had been acting within the scope of his employment. Who is liable? Explain.
- 16. Van D. Costas, Inc. (Costas) entered into a contract to remodel the entrance of the Magic Moment Restaurant owned by Seascope Restaurants, Inc. Rosenberg, part owner and president of Seascope, signed the contract on a line under which was typed "Jeff Rosenberg, The Magic Moment." When a dispute arose over the performance and payment of the contract, Costas brought suit against Rosenberg for breach of contract. Rosenberg contended that he had no personal liability for the contract and that only Seascope, the owner of the restaurant, was liable. Costas claimed that Rosenberg signed for an undisclosed principal and, therefore, was individually liable. Explain whether Rosenberg is liable on the contract.
- 17. Virginia and her husband Ronnie Hulbert were involved in an accident in Mobile County when their automobile collided with another automobile driven by Dr. Murray's nanny. The nanny's regular duties of employment included housekeeping, supervising the children, and taking the children places that they needed to go. At the time of the collision, the nanny was driving her own car and was following Dr. Murray and her family to Florida from Louisiana to accompany Dr. Murray's family on their vacation. One of Dr. Murray's daughters was in the automobile driven by the nanny. Virginia Hulbert sued Dr. Murray under the doctrine of respondeat superior, alleging that the nanny was acting within the scope of her employment when the automobile accident occurred. Should she be able to recover from Dr. Murray? Explain.
- 18. Raymond Zukaitis was a physician practicing medicine in Douglas County, Nebraska. Aetna issued a policy of professional liability insurance to Zukaitis through its agent, the Ed Larsen Insurance Agency. The policy covered the period from August 31, 2008, through August of the following year. On August 7, 2010, Dr. Zukaitis received a written notification of a claim for malpractice that had occurred on September 27, 2008. Dr. Zukaitis notified the Ed Larsen Insurance Agency immediately and forwarded the written claim to it. The claim was then mistakenly referred to St. Paul Fire and Marine Insurance Company, the company that currently insured Dr. Zukaitis. Apparently without notice to Dr. Zukaitis, the agency contract between Larsen and Aetna had been canceled on August 1, 2009, and St. Paul had replaced Aetna as the insurance carrier. However, when St. Paul discovered it was not the carrier on the date of the alleged wrongdoing, it notified Aetna and withdrew from Dr. Zukaitis's defense. Aetna also refused to represent Dr. Zukaitis, contending that it was relieved of its obligation to Dr. Zukaitis because he had not notified Aetna immediately of the claim. Dr. Zukaitis then secured his own attorney to defend against the malpractice claim and brought an action against Aetna to recover attorneys' fees and other expenses incurred in the defense. Should Dr. Zukaitis recover? Explain.

- 19. Sonenberg Company managed Westchester Manor Apartments through its on-site property manager, Judith. Manor Associates Limited Partnership, whose general partner is Westchester Manor, Ltd., owned the complex. The entry sign to the property did not reveal the owner's name but did disclose that Sonenberg managed the property. Judith contacted Redi-Floors and requested a proposal for installing carpet in several of the units. In preparing the proposal, Redi-Floors confirmed that Sonenberg was the managing company and that Judith was its on-site property manager. Sonenberg did not inform Redi-Floors of the owner's identity. Judith and her assistant orally ordered the carpet, and Redi-Floors installed the carpet. Redi-Floors sent invoices to the complex and received checks from "Westchester Manor Apartments." Believing Sonenberg owned the complex, Redi-Floors did not learn of the true owner's identity until after the work had been completed when a dispute arose concerning the payment of some of its later invoices. Against whom may Redi-Floors recover on the outstanding invoices? Explain.

FORMATION AND INTERNAL RELATIONS OF GENERAL PARTNERSHIPS

Except for marriage, it is hard to think of a voluntary legal relationship that is more intimate or complex, in human terms, than the normal partnership whose members work constantly together.

ALAN BROMBERG, IN CRANE AND BROMBERG ON PARTNERSHIP

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Identify the various types of business associations and explain the factors relevant to deciding which form to use.
2. Distinguish between a legal entity and a legal aggregate and identify those purposes for which a partnership is treated as a legal entity and those purposes for which it is treated as a legal aggregate.
3. Distinguish between a partner's rights in specific partnership property and a partner's interest in the partnership.
4. Identify and explain the duties owed by a partner to her copartners.
5. Identify and describe the rights of partners.

A business enterprise may be operated or conducted as a sole proprietorship, an unincorporated business association (such as a general partnership, a limited partnership, or a limited liability company), or a corporation. The choice of the most appropriate form cannot be determined in a general way but depends on the particular circumstances of the owners. We will begin this chapter with a brief overview of the various types of business associations and the factors relevant to deciding which form to use. The rest of this chapter and the next chapter will examine general partnerships. Chapter 33 will cover other types of unincorporated business associations. Chapters 34 through 37 will address corporations.

CHOOSING A BUSINESS ASSOCIATION

The owners of an enterprise determine the form of business unit they wish to use based upon their specific circumstances. In the United States there are more than 28 million business entities, with annual receipts of more than $20 trillion. There are approximately 20.6 million sole proprietorships, 5.4 million corporations, 1.3 million limited liability companies, 700,000 general partnerships, and 400,000 limited partnerships. See Figure 31-1 for the number and size of these business entities. Unincorporated business associations are common in a number of areas. General partnerships, for example, are used frequently in finance, insurance, accounting, real estate, law, and other service-related fields. Joint ventures have enjoyed popularity among major corporations planning to engage in cooperative research; in the exploitation of land and mineral rights; in the development, promotion, and sale of patents, trade names, and copyrights; and in manufacturing operations in foreign countries. Limited partnerships have been widely used for enterprises such as real estate investment and development, motion picture and theater productions, oil and gas ventures, and equipment leasing. In the last few years the states have authorized the formation of limited liability companies. This form of business organization will probably appeal to a number of businesses including real estate ventures, high-technology enterprises, businesses in which transactions involve foreign investors, professional organizations, corporate joint ventures, startup businesses, and venture capital projects.

First to be discussed are the most important factors to consider in choosing a form of business association. This is followed by a brief description of the various forms of business associations and how they differ with respect to these factors.

Practical Advice

You should give considerable thought to choosing the best form of business association for you and your co-owners.

Factors Affecting the Choice

In choosing the form in which to conduct business the owners should consider a number of factors, including ease of formation, federal and state income tax laws, external liability, management and control, transferability of ownership interests, and continuity. The relative importance of each factor will vary with the specific needs and objectives of the owners.

EASE OF FORMATION

Business associations differ as to the formalities and expenses of formation. Some can be created with no formality, while others require the filing of documents with the state.

TAXATION

Some business associations are not considered to be separate taxable entities and taxation is on a “pass-through” basis. In these cases, the income of the business is conclusively presumed to have been distributed to the owners, who must pay taxes on that income. Losses receive comparable treatment and can be used to offset some of the owners’ income. In contrast, some business forms, most significantly corporations, are considered separate tax entities and are directly taxed. When such an entity distributes income to the owners, that income currently is separately taxed to the recipients. Thus, these funds currently are taxed twice: once to the entity and once to the owners. Unincorporated business entities can elect whether or not to be taxed as a separate entity. All businesses that have publicly traded ownership interests must be taxed as a corporation.

EXTERNAL LIABILITY

External liability arises in a variety of ways, but the crucial and most commonly occurring are tort and contract liability. Owners of some business forms have unlimited liability for all of the obligations of the business. Thus, if the business does not have sufficient funds to pay its debts, each and every owner has personal liability to the creditors for the full amount of the debts. In brief, owners of interests in businesses with unlimited liability place their entire estate at risk. In some types of entities, the owners have unlimited liability for some but not all of the entity’s obligations. Finally, in some types of business associations, the owners enjoy limited liability, which means their liability is limited to the extent of their capital contribution. It should be noted, however, that creditors often require that the owners of small businesses guarantee personally loans made to the businesses. Moreover, an owner of any type of business does not have limited liability for his own tortious conduct; the person is liable as an individual tortfeasor.

MANAGEMENT AND CONTROL

In some entities, the owners can fully share in the control of the business. In other types of business associations, the owners are restricted as to their right to take part in control.

TRANSFERABILITY

An ownership interest in a business consists of a financial interest, which is the right to share in the profits of the business, and a management interest, which is the right to participate in control of the business. In some types of business associations, the owners may freely transfer their financial interest but may not transfer their management interest without the consent of all of the other owners. In other types of business associations, the entire ownership interest is freely transferable.

CONTINUITY

Some business associations have low continuity, which means that the death, bankruptcy, or withdrawal of an owner results in the dissolution of the association. Other types have high continuity and are not affected by the death, bankruptcy, or withdrawal of owners.

Forms of Business Associations

This section contains a brief description of the various types of business associations and how they differ with respect to the factors just discussed. In addition, general partnerships, limited partnerships, limited liability companies, limited liability partnerships, and corporations will be discussed more extensively in this part of the book.

SOLE PROPRIETORSHIP

A sole proprietorship is an unincorporated business consisting of one person who owns and completely controls the business. It is formed without any formality, and no documents need be filed. Moreover, if one person conducts a business and does not file with the state to form a limited liability company or corporation, a sole proprietorship will result by default. A sole proprietorship is not a separate taxable entity and only the sole proprietor is taxed. Sole proprietors have unlimited liability for the sole proprietorship's debts. The sole proprietor's interest in the business is freely transferable. The death of a sole proprietor dissolves the sole proprietorship.

GENERAL PARTNERSHIP

A general partnership is an unincorporated business association consisting of two or more persons who co-own a business for profit. It is formed without any formality and no documents need be filed. Thus, if two or more people conduct a business and do not file with the state to form another type of business organization, a general partnership will result by default. A partnership may elect not to be a separate taxable entity, in which case only the partners are taxed. Partners have unlimited liability for the partnership's debts. Each partner has an equal right to control of the partnership. Partners may assign their financial interest in the partnership, but the assignee may become a member of the partnership only if all of the members consent. Under the Revised Partnership Act, the death or bankruptcy of a partner usually does not dissolve a partnership; the same is also true in a term partnership for the withdrawal of a partner.

JOINT VENTURE

A joint venture is an unincorporated business association composed of persons who combine their property, money, efforts, skill, and knowledge for the purpose of carrying out a particular business enterprise for profit. Usually, although not necessarily, it is of short duration. A joint venture, therefore, differs from a partnership, which is formed to carry on a business over a considerable or indefinite period of time. Nonetheless, except for a few differences, the law of partnerships generally governs a joint venture. An example of a joint venture is a securities underwriting syndicate or a syndicate formed to acquire a certain tract of land for subdivision and resale. Other common examples involve joint research conducted by corporations, the exploitation of mineral rights, and manufacturing operations in foreign countries.

LIMITED PARTNERSHIP

A limited partnership is an unincorporated business association consisting of at least one general partner and at least one limited partner. It is formed by filing a certificate of limited partnership with the state. A limited partnership may elect not to be a separate taxable entity, in which case only the partners are taxed. Publicly traded limited partnerships, however, are subject to corporate income taxation. General partners have unlimited liability for the partnership's debts; limited partners have limited liability. Each general partner has an equal right to control of the partnership; limited partners have no right to participate in control. Partners may assign their financial interest in the partnership, but the assignee may become a limited partner only if all of the members consent. The death, bankruptcy, or withdrawal of a general partner dissolves a limited partnership; the limited partners have neither the right nor the power to dissolve the limited partnership.

LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANY

A limited liability company (LLC) is an unincorporated business association that provides limited liability to all of its owners (members) and permits all of its members to participate in management of the business. It may elect not to be a separate taxable entity, in which case only the members are taxed. As noted previously, publicly traded LLCs are subject to corporate income taxation. If an LLC has only one member, then it will be taxed as a sole proprietorship, unless separate entity tax treatment is elected. Thus, the LLC provides many of the advantages of a general partnership plus limited liability for all its members. Its benefits outweigh those of a limited partnership in that all members of an LLC not only enjoy limited liability but also may participate in management and control of the business. In most states members may assign their financial interest in the LLC, but the assignee may become a member of the LLC only if all of the members consent or the LLC's operating agreement provides otherwise. In some states the death, bankruptcy, or withdrawal of a member dissolves an LLC; in others they do not. Every state has adopted an LLC statute.

LIMITED LIABILITY PARTNERSHIP

A registered limited liability partnership (LLP) is a general partnership that, by making the statutorily required filing, limits the liability of its partners for some or all of the partnership's obligations. To become an LLP, a general partnership must file with the state an application containing specified information. All of the states have enacted LLP statutes. Except for the filing requirements and the partners' liability shield, the law governing LLPs is identical to the law governing general partnerships.

LIMITED LIABILITY LIMITED PARTNERSHIP

A limited liability limited partnership (LLLLP) is a limited partnership in which the liability of the general partners has been limited to the same extent as in an LLP. A growing number of states authorize LLLPs, enabling the general partners in an LLLP to obtain the same degree of liability limitation that general partners can achieve in LLPs. Where available, a limited partnership may register as an LLLP without having to form a new organization, as would be the case in converting to an LLC.

CORPORATION

A corporation is a legal entity separate and distinct from its owners. It is formed by filing its articles of incorporation with the state. A corporation is taxed as a separate entity, and shareholders are taxed on corporate earnings that are distributed to them. (Some corporations are eligible to elect to be taxed as Subchapter S corporations, which results in only the shareholders being taxed.) The shareholders have limited liability for the corporation's obligations. The board of directors elected by the shareholders manages the corporation. Shares in a corporation are freely transferable. The death, bankruptcy, or withdrawal of a shareholder does not dissolve the corporation.

BUSINESS TRUSTS

The business trust, sometimes called a Massachusetts trust, was devised to avoid the burdens of corporate regulation, particularly the formerly widespread prohibition denying to corporations the power to own and deal in real estate. The business trust is used today primarily for asset securitization ventures in which income-generating assets, such as mortgages, are pooled in a trust. Like an ordinary trust between natural persons, a business trust may be created by a voluntary agreement without any authorization or consent of the state. A business trust has three distinguishing characteristics: (1) the trust estate is devoted to the conduct of a business; (2) by the terms of the agreement, each beneficiary is entitled to a certificate evidencing his ownership of a beneficial interest in the trust, which he is free to sell or otherwise transfer; and (3) the trustees have the exclusive right to manage and control the business free from control of the beneficiaries. If the third condition is not met, the trust may fail; the beneficiaries, by participating in control, would become personally liable as partners for the obligations of the business.

The trustees are personally liable for the debts of the business unless, in entering into contractual relations with others, it is expressly stated or definitely understood between the parties that the obligation is incurred solely upon the responsibility of the trust estate. To escape personal liability on the contractual obligations of the business, the trustee must obtain the agreement or consent of the other contracting party to look solely to the assets of the trust. The personal liability of the trustees for their own torts or the torts of their agents and servants employed in the operation of the business stands on a different footing. Although this liability cannot be avoided, the risk involved may be reduced substantially or eliminated altogether by insurance. In most jurisdictions, the beneficiaries of a business trust have no liability for obligations of the business trust.

FORMATION OF GENERAL PARTNERSHIPS

The form of business association known as partnership can be traced to ancient Babylonia, classical Greece, and the Roman Empire. It was also used in Europe and England during the Middle Ages. Eventually the English common law recognized partnerships. In the nineteenth century, partnerships were widely used in England and the United States, and the common law of partnership developed considerably during this period. Partnerships are important in that they allow individuals with different expertise, backgrounds, resources, and interests to form a more competitive enterprise by combining their various skills. This part of the chapter will cover the nature of general partnerships and how they are formed. It should be recalled that except for the filing requirements and the partners' liability shield, the law governing LLPs is identical to the law governing general partnerships.

Nature of Partnership

In 1914, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws promulgated the Uniform Partnership Act (UPA). Since then it has been adopted in all states (except Louisiana), as well as by the District of Columbia, the Virgin Islands, and Guam.

In August 1986, the UPA Revision Subcommittee of the Committee on Partnerships and Unincorporated Business Organizations of the American Bar Association's Section of Corporation, Banking and Business Law and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws decided to undertake a complete revision of the Uniform Partnership Act. The revision was approved in August 1992 and was amended in 1993, 1994, 1996, and 1997. More than thirty-five states have adopted the Revised Act. This chapter will discuss the Revised Uniform Partnership Act (RUPA). Where the RUPA has made significant changes, the original 1914 UPA will also be discussed. The marginal definitions and the chapter summary reflect the RUPA.

Though fairly comprehensive, the RUPA and UPA do not cover all legal issues concerning partnerships. Accordingly, both the RUPA and the UPA provide that unless displaced by particular provisions of this Act, the principles of law and equity supplement this Act.

DEFINITION

The RUPA defines a partnership as "an association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit." The RUPA broadly defines "person" to include "individuals, partnerships, corporations, joint ventures, business trusts, estates, trusts, and any other legal or commercial entity." The comments indicate that this definition would include an LLC. Moreover, a business includes every trade, occupation, and profession.

ENTITY THEORY

A legal entity is a unit capable of possessing legal rights and of being subject to legal duties. A legal entity may acquire, own, and dispose of property. It may enter into contracts, commit wrongs, sue, and be sued. For example, each business corporation is a legal entity having a legal existence separate from that of its shareholders.

A partnership was regarded by the common law as a legal aggregate, a group of individuals having no legal existence apart from that of its members. The Revised Act has greatly increased the extent to which partnerships are treated as entities. It applies aggregate treatment to very few aspects of partnerships, the most significant of which is that partners still have unlimited liability for the partnership's obligations. The UPA treats partnerships as legal entities for some purposes and as aggregates for others.

Partnership as a Legal Entity The RUPA states: "A partnership is an entity distinct from its partners." The Revised Act embraces the entity treatment of partnerships, particularly in matters concerning title to partnership property, legal actions by and against the partnership, and continuity of existence. Examples of entity treatment include the following: (1) The assets of the firm are treated as those of the business and are considered to be distinct from the individual assets of the members. (2) A partner is accountable as a fiduciary to the partnership. (3) Every partner is considered an agent of the partnership. (4) A partnership may sue and be sued in the name of the partnership.

Partnership as a Legal Aggregate The Revised Act has retained the aggregate characteristic of a partner's unlimited liability for partnership obligations, unless the partnership has filed a statement of qualification to become an LLP. Thus, if Meg and Mike enter into a partnership that becomes insolvent, as does Meg, Mike is fully liable for the partnership's debts. Likewise, although a partner's interest in the partnership may be assigned, the assignee does not become a partner without the consent of all the partners. Moreover, a partner's dissociation results in dissolution although only in limited circumstances.

Under the UPA, because a partnership is considered an aggregate for some purposes, it can neither sue nor be sued in the firm name unless a statute specifically allows such an action. In addition, a partnership generally lacks continuity of existence: whenever any partner ceases to be associated with the partnership, it is dissolved.

Formation of a Partnership

The RUPA provides that the association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit forms a partnership, whether or not the parties intend to form a partnership. The formation of a partnership is relatively simple and may be done consciously or unconsciously. A partnership may result from an oral or written agreement between the parties, from an informal arrangement, or from the conduct of the parties, who become partners by associating themselves in a business as co-owners. Consequently, if two or more individuals share the control and profits of a business, the law may deem them partners without regard to how they themselves characterize their relationship. Thus, associates frequently discover, to their chagrin, that they have inadvertently formed a partnership and have thereby subjected themselves to the duties and liabilities of partners. The legal existence of the relationship depends merely upon the parties' explicit or implicit agreement and their association in business as co-owners.

Practical Advice

Be careful that you do not unwittingly enter into a partnership: doing so will greatly increase your risk of personal liability.

PARTNERSHIP AGREEMENT

The RUPA defines a “partnership agreement” as “the agreement, whether written, oral, or implied, among the partners concerning the partnership, including amendments to the partnership agreement.” This definition does not include other agreements between some or all of the partners, such as a lease or a loan agreement.

Except as otherwise provided by the RUPA, the partnership agreement governs relations among the partners and between the partners and the partnership. Thus, the RUPA gives almost total freedom to the partners to provide whatever provisions they agree upon in their partnership agreement. In essence, RUPA is primarily a set of “default rules” that apply only when the partnership agreement does not address the issue. Nevertheless, the RUPA makes some duties mandatory; these cannot be waived or varied by the partnership agreement.

To render their understanding more clear, definite, and complete, partners are advised, though not usually required, to put their partnership agreement in writing. A partnership agreement can provide almost any conceivable arrangement of capital investment, control sharing, and profit distribution that the partners desire. Unless the agreement provides otherwise, the partners may amend it only by unanimous consent. Any partnership agreement should include the following:

1. The firm name and the identity of the partners;
2. The nature and scope of the partnership business;
3. The duration of the partnership;

4. The capital contributions of each partner;
5. The division of profits and sharing of losses;
6. The managerial duties of each partner;
7. A provision for salaries, if desired;
8. Restrictions, if any, upon the authority of particular partners to bind the firm;
9. Any desired variations from the partnership statute's default provisions governing dissolution; and
10. A statement of the method or formula for determining the value of a partner's interest in the partnership.

Statute of Frauds Because the statute of frauds does not apply expressly to a contract for the formation of a partnership, usually no writing is required to create the relationship. A contract to form a partnership to continue for a period longer than one year is within the statute, however, as is a contract for the transfer of an interest in real estate to or by a partnership; consequently, both of these contracts require a writing in order to be enforceable.

Firm Name In the interest of acquiring and retaining goodwill, a partnership should have a firm name. Although the name selected by the partners may not be identical or deceptively similar to the name of any other existing business concern, it may be the name of the partners or of any one of them; or the partners may decide to operate the business under a fictitious or assumed name, such as “Peachtree Restaurant,” “Globe Theater,” or “Paradise Laundry.” A partnership may not use a name that would be likely to indicate to the public that it is a corporation. Nearly all of the states have enacted statutes that require any person or persons conducting business under an assumed or fictitious name to file in a designated public office a certificate setting forth the name under which the business is conducted and the real names and addresses of all persons conducting the business as partners or proprietors.

Practical Advice

Partners should have a comprehensive written partnership agreement: doing so brings about a clearer and more reliable understanding of their respective rights and obligations in their relations as partners.

TESTS OF PARTNERSHIP EXISTENCE

Partnerships can be formed without the slightest formality. Consequently, it is important that the law establish a test for determining whether or not a partnership has been formed. Two situations most often require this determination. The most common involves a creditor who has dealt only with one person but who wishes to hold another liable as well by asserting that the two were partners. Less frequently, a person seeks to share profits earned and property held by another by claiming that they are partners.

As previously mentioned, the RUPA provides the operative rule for formation of a partnership: an association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit. Thus, three components are essential to the existence of a partnership: (1) an association of two or more persons, (2) conducting a business for profit, (3) which they co-own.

Association A partnership must consist of two or more persons who have agreed to become partners. Any natural person having full capacity may enter into a partnership. A corporation is defined as a “person” by the RUPA and is, therefore, legally capable of entering into a partnership in those states whose incorporation statutes authorize a corporation to do so. Furthermore, as previously noted, a partnership, joint venture, business trust, estate, trust, and any other legal or commercial entity may be a member of a partnership.

Business for Profit The RUPA provides that co-ownership does not in itself establish a partnership, even if the co-owners share profits made by the use of the property. For a partnership to exist, there must be co-ownership of a business. Thus, passive co-ownership of property by itself, as distinguished from the carrying on of a business, does not establish a partnership. Moreover, to be a partnership, the business carried on by the association of two or more persons must be “for profit.” This requirement excludes unincorporated nonprofit organizations from being partnerships. State common law and statutes govern such unincorporated nonprofit organizations. These laws, however, generally do not address the issues facing nonprofit associations in a systematic or integrated fashion. Consequently, in 1996, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws promulgated a Uniform Unincorporated Nonprofit Association Act to reform the common law concerning unincorporated nonprofit associations in a limited number of major issues, including ownership of property, authority to sue and be sued, and the contract and tort liability of officers and members of the association. At least ten states have adopted the act.

Nor does a partnership exist in situations in which persons associate for mutual financial gain on a temporary or limited basis involving a single transaction or a few isolated transactions: such persons are not engaged in the continuous series of commercial activities necessary to constitute a business. Co-ownership of the means or instrumentality of accomplishing a single business transaction or a limited series of transactions may result in a joint venture but not in a general partnership.

For example, Katherine and Edith have joint ownership of shares of the capital stock of a corporation, have a joint bank account, and have inherited or purchased real estate as joint tenants or tenants in common. They share the dividends paid on the stock, the interest on the bank account, and the net proceeds from the sale or lease of the real estate. Nevertheless, Katherine and Edith are not partners. Although they are co-owners and share profits, they are not engaged in carrying on a business; hence, no partnership exists. On the other hand, if Katherine and Edith continually bought and sold real estate over a period of time and conducted a business of trading in real estate, a partnership relation would exist between them, regardless of whether they considered themselves partners or not.

To illustrate further: Alec, Laura, and Shirley each inherit an undivided one-third interest in a hotel and, instead of selling the property, decide by an informal agreement to continue operating the hotel. The operation of a hotel is a business; as co-owners of a hotel business, Alec, Laura, and Shirley are partners and are subject to all of the rights, duties, and incidents arising from the partnership relation.

Co-ownership Although the co-ownership of property used in a business is a condition neither necessary nor sufficient for the existence of a partnership, the co-ownership of a business is essential. In identifying business co-ownership, the two most important factors are the sharing of profits and the right to manage and control the business.

A person who receives a share of the profits from a business is presumed to be a partner in the business. This means that persons who share profits are deemed to be partners unless they can prove otherwise. The RUPA, however, provides that the existence of a partnership relation shall not be presumed where such profits were received in payment

1. of a debt, by installments or otherwise;
2. for services as an independent contractor or of wages or other compensation to an employee;
3. of rent;
4. of an annuity or other retirement or health benefit to a beneficiary, representative, or designee of a deceased or retired partner;
5. of interest or other charge on a loan, even if the amount of payment varies with the profits of the business; or
6. for the sale of the goodwill of a business or other property by installments or otherwise.

These transactions do not give rise to a presumption that the party is a partner because the law assumes that the creditor, employee, landlord, or other recipient of such profits is unlikely to be a co-owner. It is possible, nonetheless, to establish that such a person is a partner by proof of other facts and circumstances, such as the sharing of control.

Tests for Existence of a Partnership

The sharing of gross returns, in contrast to profits, does not of itself establish a partnership. This is so whether or not the persons sharing the gross returns have a joint or common right or interest in property from which the returns are derived. Thus, two brokers who share commissions are not necessarily partners, or even presumed to be. Similarly, an author who receives royalties (a share of gross receipts from the sales of a book) is not a partner with her publisher.

By itself, evidence as to participation in the management or control of a business is not conclusive proof of a partnership relation, but it is persuasive. Limited voice in the management and control of a business may be accorded to an employee, a landlord, or a creditor. On the other hand, an actual partner may choose to take no active part in the affairs of the firm and may, by agreement with his copartners, forgo all right to exercise any control over the ordinary affairs of the business. In any event, the right to participate in control is an important factor considered by the courts in conjunction with other factors, particularly with profit sharing.

Figure 31-2 illustrates the tests for determining whether a partnership exists, as does the following case.

Practical Advice

If you receive a share of a partnership's profits in a capacity other than a partner, be sure to document your actual relationship and refrain from exercising such control that would be considered that of a partner or from holding yourself out as a partner.

IN RE KEYTRONICS

SUPREME COURT OF NEBRASKA, 2008
274 NEB. 936, 744 N.W.2D 425

FACTS In 1999, King was doing business under the name of “Washco” as a sole proprietorship engaged in selling, installing, and servicing carwash systems and accessories. King offered to his customers the “QuikPay” system, a cashless vending system for carwashes that used a memory chip key that interacted with a controller at the carwash. Either a cash value can be placed on the key or the carwash usage recorded on the key is billed monthly. Washco purchased QuikPay systems for resale from Datakey Electronics Inc. (Datakey) but it was becoming unprofitable for Datakey, partly because the keys for QuikPay could only be obtained from an attendant. According to Glen Jennings, president of Datakey, since most carwashes are unattended, this reliance on the presence of the carwash owner or employee was limiting the product's market.

As QuikPay's largest distributor, King was aware that QuikPay's limitations made the product unattractive to many of his customers. King contacted Willson, an electronics technician and computer programmer, to see if Willson could develop a combined “key dispenser” and “revalue station” for the QuikPay system that would make the system self-serve. King also asked Willson if he would design and install an interface between the QuikPay system and the carwash of one of King’s customers. Designing such an interface was beyond King’s technical expertise. Willson individually designed and installed at least four specific customer interfaces that allowed King to sell the QuikPay system to those customers, but Willson was never paid for his work.

According to King, there was an oral agreement among himself, Willson, and Scott Gardeen (an employee of Datakey who was an original designer of QuikPay) to form a corporation whenever Willson developed the key dispenser-revalue station. The three parties met in the spring of 2002 to discuss the venture in which they would design and build the key dispenser-revalue station and sell it to Datakey. It was agreed that Willson would write the software and do the firmware, hardware, and any other electrical or software work; Gardeen would contribute his knowledge of the system and his contact with Datakey; and King would contribute financial resources and his experience and contacts as QuikPay’s largest distributor. Together, Willson, King, and Gardeen came up with the name “Secure Data Systems” for their business. They discussed the fact that the entity’s initials, “SDS,” were also the initials of their first names, Scott, Don, and Scott. By the summer, Willson had built a handheld revalue station for a meeting with Jennings. Jennings indicated that if a final, marketable key dispenser-revalue station were developed, Datakey would be interested in a business relationship with Secure Data Systems.

Around October 2002, Datakey decided to discontinue its QuikPay line and referred all of its customers to King for continued support of the system. By the beginning of 2003, King had deliberately separated his QuikPay sales, maintenance, and its future development from his Washco carwash business and had moved all QuikPay business to Secure Data Systems. Around the same time, Willson developed a Web site for Secure Data Systems with e-mail accounts for King and Willson.

By the spring of 2003, Willson’s work for Secure Data Systems consisted primarily of dealing with QuikPay maintenance and repair issues, although he continued to try to finish the key dispenser-revalue station whenever he had time. Willson made changes in the QuikPay software to fix problems that customers wanted fixed.

In May 2003, King and Willson went together to an international carwash convention in Las Vegas, Nevada. King suggested to Willson that he make up Secure Data Systems business cards for King and Willson. The cards presented Willson as “System Designer & Engineer” and King as “Sales.” The cards described Secure Data Systems as carrying the “QuikPay Product Line.”

In correspondence with clients, King often referred to Willson as the person doing technical work for QuikPay. Willson also sent e-mails communicating directly with QuikPay clients on various issues. In an e-mail dated August 12, 2003, Willson described himself as the software and hardware designer with Secure Data Systems and he referred to King as his “partner.” In October 2003, King sent an e-mail to a potential customer in which King referred to Willson as “the other half of Secure Data Systems.”

Willson estimated that he had put at least 2,000 hours into QuikPay sales and maintenance and in developing the key dispenser-revalue station. When Willson was asked why he invested his time and expertise into QuikPay without any remuneration, he explained, “That was my contribution to the company. I mean that was my piece.” Willson contacted a law firm to draw up papers to formalize the partnership. These papers were never drafted. According to Willson, when he told King he was looking into creating a written agreement for their relationship, King “assured [him] that he was having his attorneys look at it.” King and Willson had another meeting around the end of December and agreed to end their relationship and any joint QuikPay or key dispenser-revalue station activities. Approximately two weeks after this meeting, King called Willson and offered to compensate him for the time he had spent in maintaining or repairing QuikPay. Willson refused.

Willson brought an action for winding up and an accounting, alleging formation of a partnership. King denied they had formed a partnership. The trial court found that King and Willson had “pooled resources, money and labor,” but found no partnership existed because there was no “specific agreement.” Alternatively, the trial court found that because King did not commit his preexisting business to any specifically formed partnership, the scope of the partnership did not encompass any activity garnering profits. Willson appealed the trial court’s order.

DECISION Reversed and remanded.

OPINION McCormack, J. This case is governed by the *** revised Uniform Partnership Act. Section [202(a)] of the Act defines that a partnership is formed by “the association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit” and explains that this is true “whether or not the persons intend to form a partnership.” [Citation.]

Obviously, the relationship between King and Willson is “of two or more persons.” In addition, whether the business of QuikPay maintenance, or even the development of the never-produced key dispenser-revalue station, qualifies as a business “for profit” is not in issue. It is not essential that the business for which the association was formed ever actually be carried on, let alone that it earn a profit. Rather, a business qualifies under the “business for profit” element of [Section 202(a)] so long as the parties intended to carry on a business with the expectation of profits. [Citations.]

We first consider whether King and Willson formed an association. King correctly points out that inherent to the term “association” is the idea that the relationship between the “two or more persons” be intentional. [Citation.] King argues that no partnership was formed because he never intended to form a partnership relationship with Willson. ***

But, as [Section 202(a)] explicitly states, the intent necessary to form an association does not refer to the intent to form a partnership per se. There is no requirement that the parties have a “specific agreement” in order to form a partnership. People do not become partners when they attain co-ownership of a business for profit through an involuntary act. [Citation.] But, if the parties’ voluntary actions form a relationship in which they carry on as co-owners of a business for profit, then “they may inadvertently create a partnership despite their expressed subjective intention not to do so.” [Citation.] Intent, in such cases, is still of prime concern, but it will be ascertained objectively, rather than subjectively, from all the evidence and circumstances. [Citation.]

Because of this, King’s focus on his intent to form a corporation, as opposed to a partnership, does more to prove an intent to form the requisite association than to disprove it. It is, in fact, not unusual for courts to find a partnership relationship between parties that were operating with the intent to form a corporation and to specifically avoid a partnership relationship. [Citation.] ***

In considering the parties’ intent to form an association, it is generally considered relevant how the parties characterize their relationship or how they have previously referred to one another. [Citation.] The joint use of a business name is evidence of an association. [Citations.] This is especially true when the business name is composed of the parties’ names or initials. [Citations.]

It is undisputed that King and Willson discussed the fact that Secure Data Systems had the initials of Scott, Don, and Scott. Granted, at its inception, Secure Data Systems was an association among three parties focused on the limited task of creating a key dispenser-revalue station. *** King removed any QuikPay operations from his Washco business. He instead began to conduct all QuikPay business exclusively through Secure Data Systems. Willson was clearly associated with King in that venture.

*** Business cards were created for King and Willson describing their respective positions in Secure Data Systems. King and Willson went as joint representatives of Secure Data Systems to a Las Vegas carwash convention. King and Willson worked together both in servicing the QuikPay line, assembling and repairing Datakey’s old inventory, and developing the key dispenser-revalue station.

Various e-mails to customers and to Datakey evidence their joint efforts in this regard. To King and to others, Willson referred to himself and King as partners. Specifically in regard to ventures involving the regular QuikPay system, King referred to Willson as “the other half of Secure Data Systems.” We believe the evidence is clear that King and Willson formally associated to develop a key dispenser-revalue station and that further, this association expanded in scope to encompass all QuikPay operations.

Still, King asserts that any reference he made to Willson as the “other half of Secure Data Systems” was an insignificant figure of speech. Most importantly, according to King, there was no partnership because Willson never had co-ownership of the QuikPay business. King claims that he started selling and maintaining QuikPay by himself and asserts that he maintained full control of that business line. According to King, Willson simply did what King asked him to—apparently for free.

Being “co-owners” of a business for profit does not refer to the co-ownership of property, [RUPA Section 202(c)(3),] but to the co-ownership of the business intended to garner profits. It is co-ownership that distinguishes partnerships from other commercial relationships such as creditor and debtor, employer and employee, franchisor and franchisee, and landlord and tenant. [Citation.] Co-ownership generally addresses whether the parties share the benefits, risks, and management of the enterprise such that (1) they subjectively view themselves as members of the business rather than as outsiders contracting with it and (2) they are in a better position than others dealing with the firm to monitor and obtain information about the business. [Citation.]

The objective indicia of co-ownership are commonly considered to be: (1) profit sharing, (2) control sharing, (3) loss sharing, (4) contribution, and (5) co-ownership of property. [Citation.] The five indicia of co-ownership are only that; they are not all necessary to establish a partnership relationship, and no single indicium of co-ownership is either necessary or sufficient to prove co-ownership. [Citation.]

*** The record demonstrates that Willson contributed his time and expertise not only to the business of developing the key dispenser-revalue station, but also to the continued operations of the regular QuikPay product line. ***

The continuing investment of one’s labor without pay is generally considered a strong indicator of co-ownership. [Citations.] *** Valid consideration for an ownership interest in a partnership may take the form of either property, capital, labor, or skill, and the law does not exalt one type of contribution over another. [Citations.]

In this case, Willson contributed his time and expertise without any compensation for approximately 1 year. Conservatively, Willson estimated his contribution as totaling over 2,000 hours. King did not present evidence of how many hours he had spent in the QuikPay venture. But more importantly, we conclude on our review of the record that without Willson's technical assistance, King would have been unable to continue QuikPay's viability after Datakey abandoned the product. That King could have dealt with certain issues by hiring contractors or employees is irrelevant. He chose not to do so—presumably because the promise of the key dispenser-revalue station made a partnership relationship more worthwhile—and saved himself the expense of paying for this labor.

We also find that despite King's protestations to the contrary, the evidence shows that King and Willson shared control over QuikPay business. We note that control is "elusive because of the many gradations of control and because partners often delegate decision-making power." [Citation.] Still, Willson testified that he and King consulted with each other over what appropriate pricing would be as they picked up Datakey's equipment and customers. ***

Willson also testified that he had an agreement with King to share profits, although King denies this. Of the five indicia of co-ownership, profit sharing is possibly the most important, and the presence of profit sharing is singled out in [Section 202(c)(3)] as creating a rebuttable presumption of a partnership. [Citations.] However, what is essential to a partnership is not that profits actually be distributed, but, instead, that there be an interest in the profits. [Citations.] Willson's testimony that they agreed to share in the profits of the business is, in light of all the evidence, simply more credible than King's statement that compensation "was never discussed." And even King vaguely admits that they had an understanding to share profits of the key dispenser-revalue station, if that were developed. It seems reasonable to assume that this same understanding would apply to Willson as his participation and the scope of the venture expanded to encompass all QuikPay business.

We do not find any evidence that King and Willson had an agreement for loss sharing. But we find this of little import, since purported partners, expecting profits, often do not have any explicit understanding regarding loss sharing. [Citation.] Likewise, although King and Willson admittedly do not own any joint property, in an informal relationship, the parties may intend co-ownership of property but fail to attend to the formalities of title. [Citation.] Moreover, in this case, it is unclear that there is much QuikPay "property" at all. ***

We conclude that the objective, as well as subjective, indicia are sufficient to prove co-ownership of the business of selling, maintaining, and developing QuikPay. Having already concluded that there was an association for the same, we conclude that Willson proved that he and King had formed a partnership for the business of selling, maintaining, and developing QuikPay.

INTERPRETATION If the parties' voluntary actions form a relationship in which they carry on as co-owners of a business for profit, then they may inadvertently create a partnership despite their expressed subjective intention not to do so.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the test for the existence of a partnership?

PARTNERSHIP CAPITAL AND PROPERTY

The total money and property that the partners contribute and dedicate to use in the enterprise is the partnership capital. Partnership capital represents the partners' equity in the partnership. No minimum amount of capitalization is necessary before a partnership may commence business.

Partnership property is property acquired by a partnership. Property acquired by the partnership is conclusively deemed to be partnership property. Property becomes partnership property if acquired in the name of the partnership, which includes a transfer to (1) the partnership in its name or (2) one or more partners in their capacity as partners in the partnership, if the name of the partnership is indicated in the instrument transferring title to the property. Property also may be partnership property even if it is not acquired in the name of the partnership. Property is partnership property if acquired in the name of one or more of the partners with an indication in the instrument transferring title of either (1) their capacity as partners or (2) of the existence of a partnership, even if the name of the partnership is not indicated.

Even if the instrument transferring title to one or more of the partners does not indicate their capacity as a partner or the existence of a partnership, the property nevertheless may be partnership property. Ultimately, the partners' intention controls whether property belongs to the partnership or to one or more of the partners in their individual capacities. The RUPA sets forth two rebuttable presumptions that apply when the partners have failed to express their intent. First, property purchased with partnership funds is presumed to be partnership property, without regard to the name in which title is held. The presumption applies not only when partnership cash or property is used for payment but also when partnership credit is used to obtain financing.

Second, property acquired in the name of one or more of the partners, without an indication of their capacity as partners and without use of partnership funds or credit, is presumed to be the partners' separate property, even if used for partnership purposes. In this last case it is presumed that only the use of the property is contributed to the partnership.

As discussed later, who owns the property—an individual partner or the partnership—determines (1) who gets it upon dissolution of the partnership, (2) who shares in any loss or gain upon its sale, (3) who shares in income from it, and (4) who may sell it or transfer it by will.

A question may arise regarding whether property that was owned by a partner before formation of the partnership and was used in the partnership business is a capital contribution and hence an asset of the partnership. For example, a partner who owns a store building may contribute to the partnership the use of the building but not the building itself. The building is, therefore, not partnership property, and the amount of capital contributed by this partner is the reasonable value of the rental of the building.

The fact that legal title to property remains unchanged is not conclusive evidence that such property has not become a partnership asset. The intent of the partners controls the question of who owns the property. Without an express agreement, an intention to consider property as partnership property may be inferred from any of the following facts: (1) the property was improved with partnership funds; (2) the property was carried on the books of the partnership as an asset; (3) taxes, liens, or expenses, such as insurance or repairs, were paid by the partnership; (4) income or proceeds of the property were treated as partnership funds; or (5) the partners declared or admitted the property to be partnership property.

Practical Advice

Make clear by a written agreement whether property previously owned by one partner but used by the partnership belongs to the partnership or to the partner.

THOMAS V. LLOYD

MISSOURI COURT OF APPEALS, SOUTHERN DISTRICT, DIVISION ONE, 2000

http://caselaw.findlaw.com/scripts/getcase.pl?court=5mo&vol=5/appeals/052000/&invol5=29051600\_2000

FACTS In February 1989, Plaintiff, Mary Dean Thomas, met Defendant, Eubert Gayle Lloyd, Jr., in Mobile, Alabama, while she was traveling. Their chance meeting quickly blossomed into a romantic relationship. When Plaintiff returned to her home in Maryland, Defendant accompanied her, and they began living together. Initially, Defendant told Plaintiff he worked for a major oil company, had been outside the country for the past three years, was independently wealthy, and was not married. As Plaintiff later learned, none of these statements was true. In truth, Defendant had recently been released from prison. He had multiple criminal convictions, including convictions for counterfeiting and stealing. In addition, Defendant's assets at the time were no more than $2,000, and he was legally married to Patricia Lloyd. Prior to Plaintiff's discovering that Defendant was not single, the parties were "married" on July 10, 1989, in Canada. Due to the circumstances, this marriage was void.

Plaintiff and Defendant resided in Plaintiff's home in Maryland from late February 1989 through October 1990. During that period, Defendant made repairs and renovations to Plaintiff's house. In October 1990, Plaintiff sold her home and the parties moved to Missouri. After looking at several farm properties, they bought a six hundred-acre farm in Crawford County, Missouri, for $150,000. The deed was dated March 8, 1991. The deed named Plaintiff, a single person, and Defendant, a single person, as joint tenants with right of survivorship. The $150,000 purchase price was paid with a $100,000 cash down payment and a $50,000 promissory note that called for one hundred and twenty monthly installments of $633.38.

After buying the farm, Plaintiff and Defendant bought cattle and farm machinery, and then began operating a cattle business on the property. The parties also made improvements to the farm, including remodeling an old farmhouse in which they lived. In June 1992, they began construction on a four-thousand-two-hundred-square-foot house. Later, the house was expanded to six thousand five hundred square feet. By the time of trial, Plaintiff's expenditures for labor and materials on the home exceeded $201,000.

A progressive deterioration in the parties' relationship led to the filing of this lawsuit in October 1995. The trial court found that the subject real estate was not a partnership asset and ordered it be sold at public auction and the net sale proceeds to be distributed 98 percent to Plaintiff and two percent to Defendant. The Defendant appealed the trial court's refusal to classify farm real estate as a partnership asset. The Defendant claims he was prejudiced by this error because if the farm were properly classified as partnership property, any proceeds from its sale would be divided in accordance with the partners' interests.

DECISION The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

OPINION Shrum, J. "The true method of determining whether, as between partners themselves, land standing in the names of individuals is to be treated as partnership property is to ascertain from the conduct of the parties and their course of dealing, the understanding and intention of the partners themselves, which, when ascertained, unquestionably should control.” [Citations.] Whether real estate titled in the names of individual partners is partnership property is a question of fact and the burden of proof is on the one alleging that the ownership does not accord with the legal title. [Citation.]

In attempting to demonstrate that the parties intended for the real estate to be a partnership asset, Defendant points to the joint ownership of the farm and the fact that the parties operated the partnership cattle business on the farm as evidence that the two understood and intended for the farm to be a partnership asset. His reliance on those facts is misplaced, however. A joint purchase of real estate by two individuals does not, in and of itself, prove the land is a partnership asset. [Citation.] On the contrary, when land is conveyed to partnership members without any statement in the deed that the grantees hold the land as property of the firm, there is a presumption that title is in the individual grantees. [Citation.] Moreover, “[e]vidence that the land is used by the firm is of itself insufficient to rebut the presumption.” [Citation.] The mere use of land by a partnership does little to show the land is owned by the partnership. [Citation.] Standing alone, evidence of partnership usage does not compel a finding that the land is a partnership asset. [Citations.]

Defendant points to evidence that some real estate taxes and promissory note payments for the farm came from partnership funds. He argues such evidence indicates the parties intended the farm to be a partnership asset. We agree that such evidence is a factor to be considered, but it is not determinative of the issue, especially, when, as here, the partnership payment evidence is viewed in context. For instance, none of the $100,000 downpayment for the farm came from partnership funds. Instead, it all came from Plaintiff’s separate funds. Plaintiff was never reimbursed by either the partnership or Defendant for her downpayment. Of eighty-four monthly farm note payments, only three were paid from the parties’ joint account. Seventy-seven of the monthly farm note payments, a total of $48,770.26, were paid from Plaintiff’s separate funds. Plaintiff also spent $201,927.87 of her separate money to build a new house on the farm. None of the house construction costs came from partnership funds. Of the seven years’ worth of state and county real estate taxes that had been paid on the farm property, only one year was paid out of partnership funds. On the whole, the evidence is that Plaintiff invested over $350,000 of her own funds in this farm while less than $2,400 of partnership funds were used to pay the farm note and real estate taxes. Such minimal partnership expenditures is more indicative of the tendency of people—particularly in family or quasi-family businesses—to intermingle personal and partnership affairs, than it is an indication of the parties’ intent to include the farm as a partnership asset. [Citation.]

Other evidence from which the parties’ intent can be gleaned includes the following: (A) Plaintiff and Defendant signed as individuals on the $50,000 purchase money note and deed of trust securing the same, without a recital of partnership status; (B) neither party filed a partnership income tax return; (C) Plaintiff filed income tax returns as an individual; (D) Defendant never filed an income tax return after the farm was purchased; (E) Plaintiff wrote checks on her individual account for materials and labor for farm improvements; and (F) Plaintiff repeatedly testified she never intended nor agreed to a partnership with Defendant. We find these circumstances sufficient to support the implicit finding and judgment of the trial court that a partnership agreement did not exist regarding the land and it was not a partnership asset. The trial court did not commit reversible error when it failed to include the farm as a partnership asset.

INTERPRETATION Whether property is partnership property depends on the intent of the parties as indicated by factors such as their express agreement; the use of the property in the partnership business; the listing of the property as an asset on the partnership’s books; the improvement of the property with partnership assets; and the payment by the partnership of taxes, insurance, and other expenses of property ownership.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What factors did the court use to determine whether the properties were partnership assets?

RELATIONSHIPS AMONG PARTNERS

When parties enter into a partnership, the law imposes certain obligations upon them and also grants them specific rights. Except as otherwise provided by the RUPA, the partnership agreement governs relations among the partners and between the partners and the partnership. Thus, the RUPA gives almost total freedom to the partners to provide whatever provisions they agree upon in their partnership agreement. Nevertheless, the RUPA makes some duties mandatory; these cannot be waived or varied by the partnership agreement.

Practical Advice

When forming a partnership, carefully consider which, if any, duties you wish to vary by agreement.

Duties among Partners

The principal legal duties imposed upon partners in their relations with one another are (1) the fiduciary duty (the duty of loyalty), (2) the duty of obedience, and (3) the duty of care. In addition, each partner has a duty to inform his copartners and a duty to account to the partnership. (These additional duties are discussed later, in a section covering the rights of partners.) All of these duties correspond precisely with those duties owed by an agent to his principal and reflect the fact that much of the law of partnership is the law of agency.

FIDUCIARY DUTY

The extent of the fiduciary duty or duty of loyalty has been most eloquently expressed by the often-quoted words of Judge (later Justice) Cardozo:

Joint adventurers, like copartners, owe to one another, while the enterprise continues, the duty of the finest loyalty. Many forms of conduct permissible in a workaday world for those acting at arm's length, are forbidden to those bound by fiduciary ties. A trustee is held to something stricter than the morals of the market place. Not honesty alone, but the punctilio of an honor the most sensitive, is then the standard of behavior. As to this there has developed a tradition that is unbending and inveterate. Uncompromising rigidity has been the attitude of courts of equity when petitioned to undermine the rule of undivided loyalty by the "disintegrating erosion" of particular exceptions. Only thus has the level of conduct for fiduciaries been kept at a level higher than that trodden by the crowd. It will not consciously be lowered by any judgment of this court. Meinhard v. Salmon, 249 N.Y. 458, 459, 164 N.E. 545, 546 (1928) [emphasis added]

The RUPA's provision regarding the fiduciary duty is both comprehensive and exclusive. The comment to this provision explains: "In that regard, it is structurally different from the UPA which touches only sparingly on a partner's duty of loyalty and leaves any further development of the fiduciary duties of partners to the common law of agency." The RUPA completely and exclusively states the components of the duty of loyalty by specifying that a partner has a duty not to appropriate partnership benefits without the consent of her partners, to refrain from self-dealing, and to refrain from competing with the partnership. More specifically, the RUPA provides that a partner's duty of loyalty to the partnership and the other partners is limited to the following:

1. to account to the partnership and hold as trustee for it any property, profit, or benefit derived by the partner in the conduct and winding up of the partnership business or derived from a use by the partner of partnership property, including the appropriation of a partnership opportunity;
2. to refrain from dealing with the partnership in the conduct or winding up of the partnership business as, or on behalf of, a party having an interest adverse to the partnership; and
3. to refrain from competing with the partnership in the conduct of the partnership business before the dissolution of the partnership.

In addition, the Revised Act provides that a partner does not violate the duty of loyalty merely because the partner's conduct furthers the partner's own interest. For example, a partner committed a breach of fiduciary duty when he retained a secret discount on purchases of petroleum that he obtained through acquisition of a bulk plant, and the partnership was entitled to the entire amount of the discount.

Within the demands of the fiduciary duty, a partner cannot acquire for herself a partnership asset or opportunity without the consent of all the partners. Thus, a partner may not renew a partnership lease in her name alone. A partner cannot, without the permission of her partners, engage in any other business within the scope of the partnership enterprise. Should she participate in a competing or similar business, the disloyal partner not only must surrender any profit she has acquired from such business but must compensate the existing partnership for any damage it may have suffered as a result of the competition. A partner, however, may enter into any business neither in competition with nor within the scope of the partnership's business. For example, a partner in a law firm may, without violating her fiduciary duty, act as an executor or administrator of an estate. Furthermore, she need not account for her fees where it cannot be shown that her service in this other capacity impaired her duty to the partnership (e.g., by monopolizing her attention).

The fiduciary duty does not extend to the formation of the partnership when, according to the comments to RUPA, the parties are really negotiating at arm's length. The duty not to compete terminates upon dissociation, and the dissociated partner may immediately engage in a competitive business without any further consent. The partner's other fiduciary duties continue only with regard to matters arising and events occurring before the partner's dissociation, unless the partner participates in winding up the partnership's business. Thus, upon a partner's dissociation, a partner may appropriate to his own benefit any new business opportunity coming to his attention after dissociation, even if the partnership continues, and a partner may deal with the partnership as an adversary with respect to new matters or events. A dissociated partner is not, however, free to use confidential partnership information after dissociation.

The Revised Act imposes a duty of good faith and fair dealing when a partner discharges duties to the partnership and the other partners under the RUPA or under the partnership agreement and exercises any rights. The comments state:

The obligation of good faith and fair dealing is a contract concept, imposed on the partners because of the consensual nature of a partnership.... It is not characterized, in RUPA, as a fiduciary duty arising out of the partners' special relationship. Nor is it a separate and independent obligation. It is an ancillary obligation that applies whenever a partner discharges a duty or exercises a right under the partnership agreement or the Act.

The partnership agreement may not eliminate the duty of loyalty or the obligation of good faith and fair dealing. However, the partnership agreement may identify specific types or categories of activities that do not violate the duty of loyalty, if not clearly unreasonable. In addition, the other partners may consent to a specific act or transaction that otherwise violates the duty of loyalty, if there has been full disclosure of all material facts regarding the act or transaction as well as the partner's conflict of interest.

Similarly, the partnership agreement may prescribe the standards by which the performance of the obligation of good faith and fair dealing is to be measured, if the standards are not manifestly unreasonable.

The fiduciary duty under the UPA differs in some respects from that of the RUPA. First, the partner's fiduciary duty under the UPA applies to the formation of the partnership. Second, it applies to the winding up of the partnership. The UPA states that every partner must account to the partnership for any benefit he receives and must hold as trustee for it any profits he derives without the consent of the other partners from any transaction connected with the formation, conduct, or liquidation of the partnership or from any use he makes of its property. A partner may not prefer himself over the firm, nor may he even deal at arm's length with his partners, to whom his duty is one of undivided and continuous loyalty. The fiduciary duty also applies to the purchase of a partner's interest from another partner. Each partner owes the highest duty of honesty and fair dealing to the other partners, including the obligation to disclose fully and accurately all material facts.

The next case illustrates how rigorously the courts enforce the fiduciary duty.

Practical Advice

As a partner, be sure to make full disclosure of all material facts regarding the partnership and your relationship to your partners.

ENE A V. THE SUPERIOR COURT OF MONTEREY COUNTY

COURT OF APPEAL OF CALIFORNIA, SIXTH APPELLATE DISTRICT, 2005
132 CAL.APP.4TH 1559, 34 CAL.RPTR.3D 513

FACTS In 1980 defendants William Daniels and Claudia Daniels, and other family members formed a general partnership: 3-D. The partnership's sole asset was a building that had been converted from a residence into offices. A portion of the property has been rented since 1981 on a month-to-month basis by the law practice of William Daniels, the firm's sole member. From time to time the property was rented on similar arrangements to others, including defendant Claudia Daniels. The partnership agreement has as its principal purpose the ownership, leasing, and sale of the only partnership assets—the building. The partnership agreement contained no provision that the property would be leased for fair market value. Defendants assert that there was no evidence of any agreement to maximize rental profits. In 1993, the plaintiff Benny Enea, a client of William Daniels, purchased a one-third interest in the partnership from William's brother, John P. Daniels. In 2001, however, plaintiff questioned William Daniels about the rents being paid for the property, and in 2003, the plaintiff was "dissociated" from the partnership.

On August 6, 2003, Enea brought an action for damages alleging that defendants had occupied the partnership property while paying significantly less-than-fair rental value, in breach of their fiduciary duty to plaintiff. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the plaintiff appealed.

DECISION Trial court's order for summary judgment is reversed.

OPINION Rushing, P. J. For present purposes it must be assumed that defendants in fact leased the property to themselves, or associated entities, at below-market rents. *** Therefore the sole question presented is whether defendants were categorically entitled to lease partnership property to themselves, or associated entities (or for that matter, to anyone) at less than it could yield in the open market. Remarkably, we have found no case squarely addressing this precise question. We are satisfied, however, that the answer is a resounding "No."

The defining characteristic of a partnership is the combination of two or more persons to jointly conduct business. [Citation.] It is hornbook law that in forming such an arrangement the partners obligate themselves to share risks and benefits and to carry out the enterprise with the highest good faith toward one another—in short, with the loyalty and care of a fiduciary. "Partnership is a fiduciary relationship, and partners are held to the standards and duties of a trustee in their dealings with each other." "... [I]n all proceedings connected with the conduct of the partnership every partner is bound to act in the highest good faith to his copartner and may not obtain any advantage over him in the partnership affairs by the slightest misrepresentation, concealment, threat or adverse pressure of any kind." [Citations.] [Citation.] Or to put the point more succinctly, "Partnership is a fiduciary relationship, and partners may not take advantages for themselves at the expense of the partnership." [Citations.]

Here the facts as assumed by the parties and the trial court plainly depict defendants taking advantages for themselves from partnership property at the expense of the partnership. The advantage consisted of occupying partnership property at below-market rates, i.e., less than they would be required to pay to an independent landlord for equivalent premises. The cost to the partnership was the additional rent thereby rendered unavailable for collection from an independent tenant willing to pay the property's value.

***

Defendants *** persuaded the trial court that they had no duty to collect market rents in the absence of a contract expressly requiring them to do so. This argument turns partnership law on its head. Nowhere does the law declare that partners owe each other only those duties they explicitly assume by contract. On the contrary, the fiduciary duties at issue here are imposed by law, and their breach sounds in tort. ***

INTERPRETATION Partnership is a fiduciary relationship, and partners may not take advantages for themselves at the expense of the partnership.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the defendants act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Explain whether the outcome of the case would have been different if the partnership agreement had explicitly stated that partnership property could be rented at below-market rates.

DUTY OF OBEDIENCE

A partner owes his partners a duty to act in obedience to the partnership agreement and to any business decisions properly made by the partnership. Any partner who violates this duty is liable individually to his partners for any resulting loss. For example, a partner who, in violation of a specific agreement not to extend credit to relatives, advances money from partnership funds and sells goods on credit to an insolvent relative, would be held personally liable to his partners for the unpaid debt.

DUTY OF CARE

Whereas under the fiduciary duty a partner "is held to something stricter than the morals of the market place," he is held to something less than the skill of the marketplace.

Each partner owes the partnership a duty of faithful service to the best of his ability. Nonetheless, he need not possess the degree of knowledge and skill of an ordinary paid agent. Under the Revised Act, a partner's duty of care to the partnership and the other partners in the conduct and winding up of the partnership business is limited to refraining from engaging in grossly negligent or reckless conduct, intentional misconduct, or a knowing violation of law. For example, a partner assigned to keep the partnership books uses an overly complicated bookkeeping system and consequently produces numerous mistakes. Because these errors result simply from poor judgment, not an intent to defraud, and are not intended to and do not operate to the personal advantage of the negligent bookkeeping partner, she is not liable to her copartners for any resulting loss. The duty of care may not be eliminated entirely by agreement, but the standard may be reasonably reduced. The standard may be increased by agreement to one of ordinary care or an even higher standard of care.

Rights among Partners

The law provides partners with certain rights, which include (1) their right to use and possess partnership property for partnership purposes, (2) their transferable interest in the partnership, (3) their right to share in distributions (part of their transferable interest), (4) their right to participate in management, (5) their right to choose associates, and (6) their enforcement rights.

RIGHTS IN SPECIFIC PARTNERSHIP PROPERTY

In adopting the entity theory, the Revised Act abolishes the UPA's concept of tenants in partnership: partnership property is owned by the partnership entity and not by the individual partners. Moreover, RUPA provides, "A partner is not a co-owner of partnership property and has no interest in partnership property which can be transferred, either voluntarily or involuntarily." A partner may use or possess partnership property only on behalf of the partnership.

Under the UPA a partner's ownership interest in any specific item of partnership property is that of a tenant in partnership. The UPA's tenancy in partnership reaches a similar entity result to the RUPA but states that result in aggregate terms. This type of ownership, which exists only in a partnership, has the following principal characteristics:

1. Each partner has a right equal to that of his copartners to possess partnership property for partnership purposes, but he has no right to possess it for any other purpose without his copartners' consent.
2. A partner may not make an individual assignment of his right in specific partnership property.
3. A partner's interest in specific partnership property is not subject to attachment or execution by his individual creditors. It is subject to attachment or execution only on a claim against the partnership.
4. Upon the death of a partner, his right in specific partnership property vests in the surviving partner or partners. Upon the death of the last surviving partner, his right in such property vests in his legal representative.

PARTNER'S INTEREST IN THE PARTNERSHIP

Each partner has an interest in the partnership, which is defined as "all of a partner's interests in the partnership, including the partner's transferable interest and all management and other rights." A partner's transferable interest is a more limited concept; it is the partner's share of the profits and losses of the partnership and the partner's right to receive distributions. This interest is personal property. A partner's transferable interest is discussed here; a partner's management and other rights are discussed later in this chapter.

Assignability A partner may voluntarily transfer, in whole or in part, his transferable interest in the partnership. The transfer does not by itself cause the partner's dissociation or a dissolution and winding up of the partnership business. (Dissolution is discussed in Chapter 32.) The transferee, however, is not entitled to (1) participate in the management or conduct of the partnership business, (2) require access to any information concerning partnership transactions, or (3) inspect or copy the partnership books or records. She is merely entitled to receive, in accordance with the terms of the assignment, any distributions to which the assigning partner would have been entitled under the partnership agreement before dissolution. After dissolution, the transferee is entitled to receive the net amount that would have been distributed to the transferring partner upon the winding up of the business. Moreover, the assignee may apply for a court-ordered dissolution. The assigning partner remains a partner with all of a partner's other rights and duties other than the transferred interest in distributions.

However, the other partners by a unanimous vote may expel a partner who has transferred substantially all of his transferable partnership interest, other than as security for a loan. The partner may be expelled, nevertheless, upon foreclosure of the security interest.

The partners may agree among themselves to restrict the right to transfer their partnership interests.

Creditors' Rights A partner's transferable interest (the right to distributions from the partnership and the right to seek court-ordered dissolution of the partnership) is subject to the claims of that partner's creditors, who may obtain a charging order (a type of judicial lien) against the partner's transferable interest. On application by a judgment creditor of a partner, a court may charge the transferable interest of the partner to satisfy the judgment. A charging order is also available to the judgment creditor of a transferee of a partnership interest. The court may appoint a receiver of the debtor's share of the distributions due or to become due. The court may order a foreclosure of the interest subject to the charging order at any time. The purchaser at the foreclosure sale has the rights of a transferee. At any time before foreclosure, an interest charged may be redeemed by (1) the partner who is the judgment debtor; (2) other partners with nonpartnership

Partnership Property Compared with Partner's Interest

	Partnership Property		Partner's Interest
	RUPA	UPA

Possession	For partnership purposes, not individual ones	For partnership purposes, not individual ones	Intangible, personal property right
Assignability	Partner has no interest in partnership property which can be transferred	If all other partners assign their rights in the property	Assignee does not become a partner
Attachment	Only for a claim against the partnership	Only for a claim against the partnership	By a charging order property; or (3) other partners with partnership property but only with the consent of all of the remaining partners.

Neither the judgment creditor, the receiver, nor the purchaser at foreclosure becomes a partner, and thus none is entitled to participate in the partnership's management or to have access to information. Furthermore, neither the charging order nor its sale upon foreclosure causes dissolution, though the other partners may dissolve the partnership or redeem the charged interest. Moreover, a partner may be expelled by a unanimous vote of the other partners upon foreclosure of a judicial lien charging a partner's interest.

RIGHT TO SHARE IN DISTRIBUTIONS

A distribution is a transfer of money or other partnership property from the partnership to a partner in the partner's capacity as a partner. Distributions include a division of profits, a return of capital contributions, a repayment of a loan or advance made by a partner to the partnership, and a payment made to compensate a partner for services rendered to the partnership. The RUPA's rules regarding distribution are subject to contrary agreement of the partners. A partner has no right to receive, and may not be required to accept, a distribution in kind. The RUPA provides that each partner is deemed to have an account that is credited with the partner's contributions and share of the partnership profits and charged with distributions to the partner and the partner's share of partnership losses.

Right to Share in Profits Because a partnership is an association to carry on a business for profit, each partner is entitled, unless otherwise agreed, to a share of the profits. Absent an agreement to the contrary, however, a partner does not have a right to receive a current distribution of the profits credited to his account, the timing of the distribution of profits being a matter arising in the ordinary course of business to be decided by majority vote of the partners. In the absence of an agreement regarding the division of profits, the partners share the profits equally, regardless of the ratio of their financial contributions or the degree of their participation in management. Thus, under this default rule, partners share profits per capita and not in proportion to their capital contributions.

Conversely, each partner is chargeable with a share of any losses the partnership sustains. A partner, however, is not obligated to contribute to partnership losses before his withdrawal or the liquidation of the partnership, unless the partners agree otherwise. The partners bear losses in a proportion identical to that in which they share profits. The partnership agreement may, however, validly provide for bearing losses in a proportion different from that in which profits are shared.

For example, Alice, Betty, and Carol form a partnership, with Alice contributing $10,000; Betty, $20,000; and Carol, $30,000. They could agree that Alice would receive 20 percent of the profits and assume 30 percent of the losses; that Betty would receive 30 percent of the profits and assume 50 percent of the losses; and that Carol would receive 50 percent of the profits and assume 20 percent of the losses. If their agreement is silent as to the sharing of profits and losses, however, each would have an equal one-third share of both profits and losses.

Right to Return of Capital Absent an agreement to the contrary, a partner does not have a right to receive a distribution of the capital contributions in his account before his withdrawal or the liquidation of the partnership.

Under the UPA after all the partnership's creditors have been paid, each partner is entitled to repayment of his capital contribution during the winding up of the firm. Unless otherwise agreed, a partner is not entitled to interest on his capital contribution; however, a delay in the return of his capital contribution entitles the partner to interest at the legal rate from the date when it should have been repaid.

Right to Indemnification A partner who makes an advance beyond his agreed capital contribution is entitled to reimbursement from the partnership. An advance is treated as a loan to the partnership that accrues interest. In addition, the partnership must reimburse a partner for payments made and indemnify a partner for liabilities incurred by the partner in the ordinary course of the business of the partnership or for the protection of the partnership business or property. Under the Revised Act a loan from a partner to the partnership is treated the same as loans of a person not a partner, subject to other applicable law, such as fraudulent transfer law, the law of avoidable preferences under the Bankruptcy Act, and general debtor-creditor law. See the case of Warnick v. Warnick in Chapter 32.

Under the UPA a partner's claim as a creditor of the firm, though subordinate to the claims of nonpartner creditors, is superior to the partners' rights to the return of capital.

Practical Advice

If, as a partner, you advance money to your partnership, make it clear by a written agreement signed by all of the partners that your advance is to be treated as a loan, not as additional capital.

Right to Compensation The RUPA provides that, unless otherwise agreed, no partner is entitled to payment for services performed for the partnership. Even a partner who works disproportionately harder than the others to conduct the business is entitled to no salary but only to his share of the profits. A partner may, however, by agreement among all of the partners, receive a salary. Moreover, a partner is entitled to reasonable compensation for services rendered in winding up the business of the partnership.

Practical Advice

If, as a partner, you expect to be compensated for services you render to the partnership, make that understanding clear by a written agreement signed by all of the partners.

RIGHT TO PARTICIPATE IN MANAGEMENT

Each of the partners, unless otherwise agreed, has equal rights in the management and conduct of the partnership business. The majority governs the actions and decisions of the partnership with respect to matters in the ordinary course of partnership business. All the partners must consent to any act outside the ordinary course of partnership business and to any amendment of the partnership agreement. In their partnership agreement, the partners may provide for unequal voting rights. For example, Jones, Smith, and Williams form a partnership, agreeing that Jones will have two votes, Smith four votes, and Williams five votes. Large partnerships commonly concentrate most or all management authority in a committee of a few partners or even in just one partner. Classes of partners with different management rights also may be created. This practice is common in accounting and law firms, which may have two classes (e.g., junior and senior partners) or three classes (e.g., junior, senior, and managing partners).

RIGHT TO CHOOSE ASSOCIATES

No partner may be forced to accept as a partner any person of whom she does not approve. This is partly because of the fiduciary relationship between the partners and partly because each partner has a right to take part in the management of the business, to handle the partnership's assets for partnership purposes, and to act as an agent of the partnership. An ill-chosen partner, through negligence, poor judgment, or dishonesty, may bring financial loss or ruin to her copartners. Because of this danger and because of the close relationship among the members, partnerships must necessarily be founded on mutual trust and confidence. All this finds expression in the term delectus personae (literally, "choice of the person"), which indicates the right one has to choose her partners. This principle is embodied in the RUPA, which provides: "A person may become a partner only with the consent of all of the partners" [emphasis added]. It is because of delectus personae that a purchaser (assignee) of a partner's interest does not become a partner and is not entitled to participate in management. The partnership agreement may provide, however, for admission of a new partner by a less-than-unanimous vote.

Practical Advice

Consider whether your partnership agreement should permit the admission of partners by a less-than-unanimous vote, recognizing that by doing so you forfeit veto power over new members of the partnership.

ENFORCEMENT RIGHTS

As discussed, the partnership relationship creates a number of duties and rights among partners. Accordingly, partnership law provides partners and the partnership with the means to enforce these rights and duties.

Right to Information and Inspection of the Books The RUPA provides that if a partnership maintains books and records, they must be kept at its chief executive office. A partnership must provide partners access to its books and records to inspect and copy them during ordinary business hours. Former partners are given a similar right, although limited to the books and records pertaining to the period during which they were partners. A duly authorized agent on behalf of a partner may also exercise this right. A partnership may impose a reasonable charge, covering the costs of labor and material, for copies of documents furnished. The partnership agreement may not unreasonably restrict a partner's right of access to partnership books and records.

Each partner and the partnership must affirmatively disclose to a partner, without demand, any information concerning the partnership's business and affairs reasonably required for the proper exercise of the partner's rights and duties under the partnership agreement or the Act. (In addition, under some circumstances, a disclosure duty may arise from the obligation of good faith and fair dealing.) Moreover, on demand, each partner and the partnership must furnish to a partner any other information concerning the partnership's business and affairs, except to the extent the demand or the information demanded is unreasonable or otherwise improper under the circumstances. The rights to receive and demand information extend also to the legal representative of a deceased partner. They may, however, be waived or varied by agreement of the partners.

When Is an Opportunity a Partnership Opportunity?

FACTS Ted Johnson is a real estate manager and investor. Nearly twenty years ago, Ted embarked on a partnership with Karla Jones to improve and operate an office building in New Haven, Connecticut. The building and land are owned by James Jason. James gave Ted and Karla a twenty-year lease. At the end of twenty years, the lease would terminate and the property would revert to James. Pursuant to their partnership agreement, Ted and Karla each provided 50 percent of the capital for improvements of the office space and received 50 percent of allocable net profits.

Ted has successfully managed the building and during the past twenty years has accumulated some additional capital. Six months before the twenty-year lease was scheduled to expire, he and James had dinner together. Indicating how pleased he had been with Ted's management skills, James offered to lease the property for another twenty-year term and mentioned the idea of knocking down the present structure and building a small mall. In light of the recent building of luxury condominiums and exclusive restaurants in the neighborhood, the development of a mall appeared to be a sound idea.

Though he no longer needed Karla's capital for the project, Ted suspected that Karla would be interested in participating in the mall development. However, it was not clear whether James made the offer to renew the lease solely to Ted or to the partnership. Because Karla had not been invited to dinner and her name had never been mentioned, Ted believed that the offer was made solely to him.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. Does Ted have an ethical responsibility to inform Karla of the opportunity to renew the lease?
2. Does it matter that the renewal offer for the long-term lease was initially raised in a dinner conversation between Ted and James?
3. Should Ted be free to sever relations with Karla with regard to the property? Consider that Ted has managed the property and no longer needs Karla's capital. What competing social values does his dilemma involve?

Legal Action Under the RUPA, a partner may maintain a direct suit against the partnership or another partner for legal or equitable relief, with or without an accounting as to partnership business, to enforce the partner's rights under the partnership agreement and the Revised Act. Thus, under the RUPA, an accounting is not a prerequisite to the availability of the other remedies a partner may have against the partnership or the other partners. Since general partners are not passive investors, the RUPA does not authorize derivative actions. Reflecting the entity theory of partnership, the RUPA provides that the partnership itself may maintain an action against a partner for any breach of the partnership agreement or for the violation of any duty owed to the partnership, such as a breach of fiduciary duty.

The UPA grants to each partner the right to an account whenever (1) his copartners wrongfully exclude him from the partnership business or possession of its property, (2) the partnership agreement so provides, (3) a partner makes a profit in violation of his fiduciary duty, or (4) other circumstances render it just and reasonable. If a partner does not receive or is dissatisfied with a requested account, she may bring an enforcement action, called an accounting. Designed to produce and evaluate all testimony relevant to the various claims of the partners, an accounting is an equitable proceeding for a comprehensive and effective settlement of partnership affairs.

Questions

1. Lynn and Jack jointly own shares of stock of a corporation, have a joint bank account, and have purchased and own as tenants in common a piece of real estate. They share equally the dividends paid on the stock, the interest on the bank account, and the rent from the real estate. Without Lynn's knowledge, Jack makes a trip to inspect the real estate and on his way runs over Samuel. Samuel sues Lynn and Jack for his personal injuries, joining Lynn as defendant on the theory that Lynn was Jack's partner. Is Lynn a partner of Jack?
2. James and Suzanne engaged in the grocery business as partners. In one year they earned considerable money, and at the end of the year they invested a part of the profits in oil land, taking title to the land in their names as tenants in common. The investment was fortunate, for oil was discovered near the land, and its value increased many times. Is the oil land partnership property? Why?
3. Sheila owned an old roadside building that she believed could be easily converted into an antique shop. She talked to her friend Barbara, an antique fancier, and they executed the following written agreement:

- a. Sheila would supply the building, all utilities, and $100,000 capital for purchasing antiques.
- b. Barbara would supply $30,000 for purchasing antiques, Sheila to repay her when the business terminated.
- c. Barbara would manage the shop, make all purchases, and receive a salary of $500 per week plus 5 percent of the gross receipts.
- d. Fifty percent of the net profits would go into the purchase of new stock. The balance of the net profits would go to Sheila.
- e. The business would operate under the name “Roadside Antiques.”

Business went poorly, and after one year a debt of $40,000 is owed to Old Fashioned, Inc., the principal supplier of antiques purchased by Barbara in the name of Roadside Antiques. Old Fashioned sues Roadside Antiques, and Sheila and Barbara as partners. Decision?

4. Clark, who owned a vacant lot, and Bird, who was engaged in building houses, entered into an oral agreement by which Bird was to erect a house on the lot. Upon the sale of the house and lot, Bird was to have his money first. Clark was then to have the agreed value of the lot, and the profits were to be equally divided. Did a partnership exist?
5. Grant, Arthur, and David formed a partnership for the purpose of betting on boxing matches. Grant and Arthur would become friendly with various boxers and offer them bribes to lose certain bouts. David would then place large bets, using money contributed by all three, and would collect the winnings. After David had accumulated a large sum of money, Grant and Arthur demanded their share, but David refused to make any split. Can Grant and Arthur compel David to account for the profits of the partnership? Why?
6. Teresa, Peter, and Walker were partners under a written agreement made in January that the partnership should continue for ten years. During the same year, Walker, being indebted to Smith, sold and conveyed his interest in the partnership to Smith. Teresa and Peter paid Smith $50,000 as Walker’s share of the profits for that year but refused Smith permission to inspect the books or to come into the managing office of the partnership. Smith brings an action setting forth the above facts and asks for an account of partnership transactions and an order to inspect the books and to participate in the management of the partnership business.
  - a. Does Walker’s action dissolve the partnership?
  - b. To what is Smith entitled with respect to (1) partnership profits, (2) inspection of partnership books, (3) an account of partnership transactions, and (4) participation in the partnership management?
7. Horn’s Crane Service furnished supplies and services under a written contract to a partnership engaged in operating a quarry and rock-crushing business. Horn brought this action against Prior and Cook, the individual members of the partnership, to recover a personal judgment against them for the partnership’s liability under that contract. Horn has not sued the partnership itself, nor does he claim that the partnership property is insufficient to satisfy its debts. What result? Explain.
8. Cutler worked as a bartender for Bowen until they orally agreed that Bowen would have the authority and responsibility for the entire active management and operation of the tavern business known as the Havana Club. Each was to receive $300 per week plus half of the net profits. The business continued under this arrangement for four years until the building was taken over by the Salt Lake City Redevelopment Agency. The agency paid $30,000 to Bowen as compensation for disruption. The business, however, was terminated after Bowen and Cutler failed to find a new, suitable location. Cutler, alleging a partnership with Bowen, then brought this action against him to recover one-half of the $30,000. Bowen contends that he is entitled to the entire $30,000 because he was the sole owner of the business and that Cutler was merely his employee. Cutler argues that although Bowen owned the physical assets of the business, she, as a partner in the business, is entitled to one-half of the compensation that was paid for the business’s goodwill and going-concern value. Who is correct? Explain.
9. In 1999, Gauldin and Corn entered into a partnership for the purpose of raising cattle and hogs. The two men were to share equally all costs, labor, losses, and profits. The business was started on land owned initially by Corn’s parents but later acquired by Corn and his wife. No rent was ever requested or paid for use of the land. Partnership funds were used to bulldoze and clear the land, to repair and build fences, and to seed and fertilize the land. In 2003, at a cost of $2,487.50, a machine shed was built on the land. In 2005, a Cargill unit was built on the land at a cost of $8,000. When the partnership dissolved in 2009, Gauldin paid Corn $7,500 for the “removable” assets; however, the two had no agreement regarding the distribution of the barn and the Cargill unit. Is Gauldin entitled to one-half of the value of the two buildings? Explain.
10. Anita and Duncan had been partners for many years in a mercantile business. Their relationship deteriorated to the point at which Anita threatened to bring an action for an accounting and dissolution of the firm. Duncan then offered to buy Anita’s interest in the partnership for $250,000. Anita refused the offer and told Duncan that she would take no less than $360,000. A short time later, James approached Duncan and informed him he had inside information that a proposed street change would greatly benefit the business and that he, James, would buy the entire business for $1 million or buy a one-half interest for $500,000. Duncan made a final offer of $350,000 to Anita for her interest. Anita accepted this offer, and the transaction was completed. Duncan then sold the one-half interest to James for $500,000. Several months later, Anita learned for the first time of the transaction between Duncan and James. What rights, if any, does Anita have against Duncan?

- 11. ABCD Company is a general partnership. It consists of Dianne, Greg, Knox, and Laura, whose capital contributions were as follows: Dianne, $5,000; Greg, $7,500; Knox, $10,000; and Laura, $5,000. The partnership agreement provided that the partnership would continue for three years and that no withdrawals of capital were to be made without the consent of all the partners. The agreement also provided that all advances would be entitled to interest at 10 percent per year. Six months after the partnership was formed, Dianne advanced $10,000 to the partnership. At the end of the first year, net profits totaled $11,000 before any moneys had been distributed to partners. How should the $11,000 be allocated to Dianne, Greg, Knox, and Laura? Explain.

Case Problems

- 12. Donald Petersen joined his father, William Petersen, in a chicken hatchery business William had previously operated as a sole proprietorship. When the partnership was formed, William contributed the assets of the proprietorship, which included cash, equipment, and inventory having a total value of $41,000. Donald contributed nothing. They agreed to share the profits equally. For fifteen years Donald took over the operation of the hatchery with very little help from his father. When the business was terminated William contended that he was entitled to the return of his capital investment of $41,000 before Donald could recover anything. Donald asserted that he is entitled to one-half the value of the business. Explain who is correct in his contention.

- 13. Smith, Jones, and Brown were creditors of White, who operated a grain elevator known as White's Elevator. Heavily in debt, White was about to fail when the three creditors agreed to take title to his elevator property and pay all the debts. It was also agreed that White should continue as manager of the business at a salary of $1,500 per month and that all profits of the business were to be paid to Smith, Jones, and Brown. It was further agreed that they could dispense with White's services at any time and that he was free to quit when he pleased. White accepted the proposition and continued to operate the business as before. The agreement worked successfully and for several years paid substantial profits, enough so that Smith, Jones, and Brown had received nearly all that they had originally advanced. Were Smith, Jones, and Brown partners? Explain.

- 14. Virginia, Georgia, Carolina, and Louis were partners doing business under the trade name of Morning Glory Nursery.

Virginia owned a one-third interest, and Georgia, Carolina, and Louis owned two-ninths each. The partners acquired three tracts of land for the purpose of the partnership. Two of the tracts were acquired in the names of the four partners, "trading and doing business as Morning Glory Nursery." The third tract was acquired in the names of the individuals, the trade name not appearing in the deed. This third tract was acquired by the partnership out of partnership funds and for partnership purposes. Who owns each of the three tracts? Why?

- 15. Charles and L. W. Clement were brothers who had formed a partnership that lasted forty years until Charles discovered that his brother, who kept the partnership's books, had made several substantial personal investments with funds improperly withdrawn from the partnership. He then brought an action seeking dissolution of the partnership, appointment of a receiver, and an accounting. Should Charles succeed? Explain.
- 16. Chaiken entered into separate but nearly identical agreements with Strazella and Spitzer to operate a barber shop. Under the terms of the "partnership" agreements, Chaiken would provide barber chairs, supplies, and licenses, while the other two would provide tools of the trade. The agreements also stated that gross returns from the partnership were to be divided on a percentage basis among the three men and that Chaiken would decide all matters of partnership policy. Finally, the agreements stated hours of work and holidays for Strazella and Spitzer and required Chaiken to hold and distribute all receipts. Are Strazella and Spitzer partners of Chaiken or are they his employees? Explain.

OPERATION AND DISSOLUTION OF GENERAL PARTNERSHIPS

Joint adventures, like copartners, owe to one another, while the enterprise continues, the duty of the finest loyalty.

BENJAMIN CARDOZO, U.S. SUPREME COURT JUSTICE

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Explain the contract liability of a partnership and the partners.
2. Explain the tort liability of a partnership and the partners.
3. Distinguish between the liability of incoming partner for debts arising before his admission and those arising after admission.
4. Identify the causes of dissolution of a partnership and the conditions under which partners have the right to continue the partnership after dissociation.
5. Explain the effect of dissolution on the authority and liability of the partners and the order in which the assets of a partnership are distributed to creditors and partners.

The operation and management of a general partnership involves interactions among the partners as well as their interactions with third persons. The previous chapter covered the rights and duties of the partners among themselves. The first part of this chapter focuses on the relations among the partnership, the partners, and third persons who deal with the partnership. These relations are governed by the laws of agency, contracts, and torts as well as by the partnership statute. The second part of the chapter addresses the dissociation and dissolution of general partnerships.

RELATIONSHIP OF PARTNERSHIP AND PARTNERS WITH THIRD PARTIES

In the course of transacting business, the partnership and the partners also may acquire rights over and incur duties to third parties. For example, under the law of agency, a principal is liable upon contracts that his duly authorized agents make on his behalf and is liable in tort for the wrongful acts his employees commit in the course of their employment. Because much of the law of partnership is the law of agency, most problems arising between partners and third persons require the application of principles of agency law. The Revised Uniform Partnership Act (RUPA) makes this relationship explicit by stating that “[e]ach partner is an agent of the partnership for the purpose of its business.” In addition, the RUPA provides that unless displaced by particular provisions of the RUPA, the principles of law and equity supplement the RUPA. The law of agency is discussed in Chapters 29 and 30.

When a partnership becomes liable to a third party, each partner has unlimited personal liability for that partnership obligation.

partner does not have actual or apparent authority to so act. If the partnership is bound, then each general partner has unlimited personal liability for that partnership obligation unless the partnership is a limited liability partnership (LLP) and the LLP statute shields contract obligations. See Figure 32-1 for a depiction of the contract liability of partnerships. Under the Revised Act, the partners are jointly and severally liable for all contract obligations of the partnership. Joint and several liability means that all of the partners may be sued jointly in one action or that separate actions, leading to separate judgments, may be maintained against each of them. Judgments obtained are enforceable, however, against only property of the defendant or defendants named in the suit; and payment of any one of the judgments satisfies all of them. The Revised Act, in keeping with its entity treatment of partnerships, requires the judgment creditor to exhaust the partnership’s assets before enforcing a judgment against the separate assets of a partner.

The Uniform Partnership Act (UPA) provides that partners are jointly liable on all debts and contract obligations

Contracts of Partnership

The act of every partner binds the partnership to transactions within the scope of the partnership business unless the

Business Law in Action

Jose Miranda and Jim Troy are equal partners in a refrigeration maintenance and repair business called T&M Refrigeration. Unless they have established some other form of business entity by filing the required forms with the state, Troy and Miranda are general partners, with unlimited personal liability for the debts and liabilities of the business. Besides being unlimited, under the Revised Uniform Partnership Act, their personal liability for partnership obligations is also joint and several.

This means that each of them is liable for the entirety of any judgment that is obtained against the partnership, beyond what can be satisfied by partnership assets. If, for example, while acting within the ordinary course of T&M's business, Jim negligently—but not grossly negligently—works on an air-conditioning unit that later explodes, causing personal injury and property damage, a lawsuit might follow. The suit likely will name as defendants Jim, T&M Refrigeration, and Jose. Even though Jose had nothing to do with the negligent conduct, he is still a proper defendant because he has joint and several liability for all partnership obligations.

Assuming the plaintiff in the personal injury suit prevails and the verdict is large, the partnership's assets may not suffice to pay the judgment. T&M Refrigeration may even be forced into bankruptcy. But that will not discharge any remaining debt, because the partners' assets are available to satisfy the judgment. If $30,000 is still owed on the judgment after exhausting the partnership's assets, Jose and Jim each face that entire $30,000 liability, payable out of his personal assets.

The plaintiff can choose to proceed against either Jim or Jose for the entire $30,000. Or the plaintiff can choose to collect portions of the remaining judgment amount from each of the partners. Of course a plaintiff can only collect once on his or her judgment, up to its total amount. So if Jim pays $20,000, the plaintiff can collect no more than $10,000 from Jose. As they are equal partners, Jim can then pursue Jose for contribution of $5,000, making each of the partner's overall liability equal.

of the partnership. Under joint liability, a creditor must bring suit against all of the partners as a group, and the judgment must be against all of the obligors. Therefore, any suit in contract against the partners must name all of them as defendants.

AUTHORITY TO BIND PARTNERSHIP

A partner may bind the partnership by her act if (1) she has actual authority, express or implied, to perform the act or (2) she has apparent authority to perform the act. If the act is not apparently for carrying on in the ordinary course the partnership business, then the partnership is bound only where the partner has actual authority. In such a case, the third person dealing with the partner assumes the risk that such actual authority exists. Ratification is discussed in Chapter 30.

Actual Express Authority The actual express authority of partners may be written or oral; it may be specifically set forth in the partnership agreement or in an additional agreement between the partners. In addition, it may arise from decisions made by a majority of the partners regarding ordinary matters connected with the partnership business.

A partner who does not have actual authority from all of her partners may not bind the partnership by any act that does not apparently carry on in the ordinary course the partnership business. Acts outside the ordinary course of the partnership business would include the following: (1) execution of contracts of guaranty or suretyship in the firm name, (2) sale of partnership property not held for sale in the usual course of business, and (3) payment of an individual partner's debts out of partnership assets.

The Revised Act also authorizes the optional, central filing of a statement of partnership authority specifying the names of the partners authorized to execute instruments transferring real property held in the name of the partnership. A statement may also limit the authority of a partner or partners to transfer real property. In addition, a statement may grant extraordinary authority to some or all the partners, or limit their ordinary authority, to enter into transactions on behalf of the partnership. A filed statement is effective for up to five years. A partner, or other person named as a partner, may file a statement denying any fact asserted in a statement of partnership authority, including a denial of a person's status as a partner or of another person's authority as a partner. A statement of denial is a limitation on authority.

The UPA provides that the following acts do not bind the partnership unless authorized by all of the partners: (1) assignment of partnership property for the benefit of its creditors; (2) disposal of the goodwill of the business; (3) any act which would make it impossible to carry on the ordinary business of the partnership; (4) confession of a judgment; or (5) submission of a partnership claim or liability to arbitration or reference.

Actual Implied Authority Actual implied authority is neither expressly granted nor expressly denied but is reasonably deduced from the nature of the partnership, the terms of the partnership agreement, or the relations of the partners. For example, a partner has implied authority to hire and fire employees whose services are necessary to carry on the partnership business. In addition, a partner has implied authority to purchase property necessary for the business, to receive performance of obligations due to the partnership, and to bring legal actions to enforce claims of the partnership.

Apparent Authority Apparent authority (which may or may not be actual) is authority that a third person, in view of the circumstances, the conduct of the parties, and a lack of knowledge or notification to the contrary, may reasonably believe to exist. The RUPA provides tion of an instrument in the partnership name, for apparently carrying on in the ordinary course the partnership business or business of the kind carried on by the partnership binds the partnership, unless the partner had no authority to act for the partnership in the particular matter and the person with whom the partner was dealing knew or had received a notification that the partner lacked authority.

This provision characterizes a partner as a general managerial agent having both actual and apparent authority within the scope of the firm's ordinary business. For example, a partner has apparent authority to indorse checks and notes, to make representations and warranties in selling goods, and to enter into contracts for advertising. A third person, however, may not rely upon apparent authority in any situation in which he already knows, or has received notification, that the partner does not have actual authority. A person knows a fact if the person has actual knowledge of it. A person receives a notification when the notification comes to the person's attention or is duly delivered at the person's place of business or at any other place held out by the person as a place for receiving communications.

RNR INVESTMENTS LIMITED PARTNERSHIP V. PEOPLES FIRST COMMUNITY BANK

COURT OF APPEAL OF FLORIDA, FIRST DISTRICT, 2002

FACTS RNR Investments (RNR) is a Florida limited partnership formed to purchase land in Destin, Florida, and to construct a house on the land for resale. Bernard Roeger was RNR's general partner and Heinz Rapp, Claus North, and S.E. Waltz, Inc., were limited partners. The limited partnership agreement provided for various restrictions on the authority of the general partner: (1) it required the general partner to prepare a budget covering the cost of acquisition and construction of the project (Approved Budget); (2) it restricted the general partner's ability to borrow or spend partnership funds if not specifically provided for in the Approved Budget; and (3) it restricted the general partner's ability to exceed any line item in the Approved Budget by more than 10 percent or the total budget by more than 5 percent.

In June 1998, RNR, through its general partner, entered into a construction loan agreement, note, and mortgage in the principal amount of $990,000. From June 25, 1998, through March 13, 2000, the bank disbursed the aggregate sum of $952,699. All draws were approved by an architect, who certified that the work had progressed as indicated and that the quality of the work was in accordance with the construction contract.

RNR defaulted under the terms of the note and mortgage by failing to make payments due in July 2000 and all monthly payments due after that. The Bank sought to foreclose. RNR defended by alleging that the Bank had failed to review the limitations on the general partner's authority in RNR's limited partnership agreement. RNR asserted that the Bank had negligently failed to investigate and to realize that the general partner had no authority to execute notes, a mortgage, and a construction loan agreement. Stephen E. Waltz alleged that the limited partners understood and orally agreed that the general partner would seek financing in the approximate amount of $650,000. RNR also asserted that a copy of the limited partnership agreement was maintained at its offices. However, the record contains no copy of an Approved Budget of the partnership or any evidence that would show that a copy of RNR's partnership agreement or any partnership budget was given to the Bank or that any notice of the general partner's restricted authority was provided to the Bank.

The trial court entered a summary judgment of foreclosure in favor of the Bank. RNR appealed.

DECISION Summary judgment is affirmed.

OPINION Van Nortwick, J. Although the agency concept of apparent authority was applied to partnerships under the common law, [citation], in Florida the extent to which the partnership is bound by the acts of a partner acting within the apparent authority is now governed by statute. Section 301(1), [citation], a part of the Florida Revised Uniform Partnership Act (FRUPA), provides:

Each partner is an agent of the partnership for the purpose of its business. An act of a partner, including the execution of an instrument in the partnership name, for apparently carrying on in the ordinary scope of partnership business or business of the kind carried on by the partnership, in the geographic area in which the partnership operates, binds the partnership unless the partner had no authority to act for the partnership in the particular manner and the person with whom the partner was dealing knew or had received notification that the partner lacked authority.

[Court's footnote: RNR mistakenly argues that section 301(1) has no application to a limited partnership because that section is part of the Florida Revised Uniform Partnership Act, not the Florida Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act [FRUPA]. Section 620.186 (comparable to Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act Section 1105), however, provides, as follows: "In any case not provided for in this act, the provisions of the Uniform Partnership Act or the Revised Uniform Partnership Act of 1995, as applicable, and the rules of law and equity shall govern.]

Thus, even if a general partner's actual authority is restricted by the terms of the partnership agreement, the general partner possesses the apparent authority to bind the partnership in the ordinary course of partnership business or in the business of the kind carried on by the partnership, unless the third party "knew or had received a notification that the partner lacked authority." [Citation.] "Knowledge" and "notice" under FRUPA are defined [as] *** "[a] person knows a fact if the person has actual knowledge of the fact." [Citation.] Further, a third party has notice of a fact if that party "(a) knows of the fact; (b) has received notification of the fact; or (c) has reason to know the fact exists from all other facts known to the person at the time in question." [Citation.]. Finally, under [FRUPA] *** a partnership may file a statement of partnership authority setting forth any restrictions in a general partner's authority.

"Absent actual knowledge, third parties have no duty to inspect the partnership agreement or inquire otherwise to ascertain the extent of a partner's actual authority in the ordinary course of business ... even if they have some reason to question it." [Citation.] The apparent authority provisions *** reflect a policy by the drafters that "the risk of loss from partner misconduct more appropriately belongs on the partnership than on third parties who do not knowingly participate in or take advantage of the misconduct ..." [Citation.]

*** [T]he determination of whether a partner is acting with authority to bind the partnership involves a two-step analysis. The first step is to determine whether the partner purporting to bind the partnership apparently is carrying on the partnership business in the usual way or a business of the kind carried on by the partnership. An affirmative answer on this step ends the inquiry, unless it is shown that the person with whom the partner is dealing actually knew or had received a notification that the partner lacked authority. [Citation.] Here, it is undisputed that, in entering into the loan, the general partner was carrying on the business of RNR in the usual way. The dispositive question in this appeal is whether there are issues of material fact as to whether the Bank had actual knowledge or notice of restrictions on the general partner's authority.

RNR argues that, as a result of the restrictions on the general partner's authority in the partnership agreement, the Bank had constructive knowledge of the restrictions and was obligated to inquire as to the general partner's specific authority to bind RNR in the construction loan. We cannot agree. *** [T]he Bank could rely on the general partner's apparent authority, unless it had actual knowledge or notice of restrictions on that authority. While the RNR partners may have agreed upon restrictions that would limit the general partner to borrowing no more than $650,000 on behalf of the partnership, RNR does not contend and nothing before us would show that the Bank had actual knowledge or notice of any restrictions on the general partner's authority. Here, the partnership could have protected itself by filing a statement *** or by providing notice to the Bank of the specific restrictions on the authority of the general partner.

INTERPRETATION A general partner has the apparent authority to bind the partnership in the ordinary course of partnership business or in the business of the kind carried on by the partnership, unless the third party knew or had received a notification that the partner lacked authority.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the RUPA's policy that "the risk of loss from partner misconduct more appropriately belongs on the partnership than on third parties who do not knowingly participate in or take advantage of the misconduct"? Explain.

PARTNERSHIP BY ESTOPPEL

Partnership by estoppel imposes partnership duties and liabilities upon a nonpartner who has either represented himself or consented to be represented as a partner. It extends to a third person to whom such a representation is made and who justifiably relies upon the representation.

For example, Marks and Saunders are partners doing business as Marks and Company. Marks introduces Patterson to Taylor, describing Patterson as a member of the partnership. Patterson verbally confirms the statement made by Marks. Believing that Patterson is a member of the partnership and relying upon Patterson's good credit standing, Taylor sells goods on credit to Marks and Company. In an action by Taylor against Marks, Saunders, and Patterson as partners to recover the price of the goods, Patterson is liable although he is not a partner in Marks and Company. Taylor had justifiably relied upon the representation that Patterson was a partner in Marks and Company, to which Patterson actually consented. If, however, Taylor had known at the time of the sale that Patterson was not a partner, his reliance on the representation would not have been justified, and Patterson would not be liable.

Except in situations in which the representation of membership in a partnership has been made publicly, no person is entitled to rely upon a representation of partnership unless it is made directly to him. For example, Patterson falsely tells Dillon that he is a member of the partnership Marks and Company. Dillon casually relays this statement to Taylor, who in reliance sells goods on credit to Marks and Company. Taylor cannot hold Patterson liable, as he was not justified in relying on the representation made privately by Patterson to Dillon, which Patterson did not consent to have repeated to Taylor.

Where Patterson, however, knowingly consents to his name appearing publicly in the firm name or in a list of partners, or to be used in public announcements or advertisements in a manner which indicates that he is a partner in the firm, Patterson is liable to any member of the public who relies on the purported partnership, whether or not Patterson is aware of being held out as a partner to such person.

Torts and Crimes of Partnership

As discussed in Chapter 30, under the doctrine of respondet superior a partnership, like any employer, may be liable for an unauthorized tort committed by its employee if the employee committed the tort in the scope of his employment. With respect to partner's conduct, the RUPA provides that a partnership is liable for the loss or injury any partner causes by any wrongful act or omission, or other actionable conduct, while acting within the ordinary course of the partnership business or with the authority of the partnership. See Figure 32-2 for the tort liability of partnerships.

Tort liability of the partnership may include not only the negligence of the partners but also trespass, fraud, defamation, and breach of fiduciary duty, so long as the tort is committed in the course of partnership business. Moreover, though the fact that a tort is intentional does not necessarily remove it from the course of business, it is a factor to be considered. The Revised Act makes the partnership liable for no-fault torts by the addition of the phrase "or other actionable conduct." A partnership is also liable if a partner in the course of the partnership's business or while acting with authority of the partnership breaches a trust by receiving money or property of a person not a partner, and the partner misapplies the money or property.

If the partnership is liable, each partner has unlimited personal liability for the partnership obligation unless the partnership is an LLP. The liability of partners for a tort or breach of trust committed by any partner or by an employee of the firm in the course of partnership business is joint and several. As mentioned earlier, the Revised Act requires the judgment creditor to exhaust the partnership's assets before enforcing a judgment against the separate assets of a partner.

The partner who commits the tort or breach of trust is directly liable to the third party and must also indemnify the partnership for any damages it pays to the third party.

A partner is not criminally liable for the crimes of her partners unless she authorized or participated in them. Nor is a partnership criminally liable for the crimes of individual partners or employees unless a statute imposes vicarious liability. Even under such a statute, a partnership usually is liable only in those states that have adopted the entity theory or if the statute itself expressly imposes liability upon partnerships. Otherwise, the vicarious liability statute renders the partners liable as individuals.

Notice to a Partner

A partner's knowledge, notice, or receipt of a notification of a fact relating to the partnership is effective immediately as knowledge by, notice to, or receipt of a notification by the partnership, except in the case of a fraud on the partnership committed by or with the consent of that partner. A person has notice of a fact if the person (1) knows of it, (2) has received a notification of it, or (3) has reason to know it exists from all of the facts known to the person at the time in question.

Liability of Incoming Partner

A person admitted as a partner into an existing partnership is not personally liable for any partnership obligations incurred before the person's admission as a partner. This means that the liability of an incoming partner for antecedent debts and obligations of the firm is limited to his capital contribution. This restriction does not apply, of course, to subsequent debts (obligations arising after his admission into the partnership), for which obligations his liability is unlimited. For example, Nash is admitted to Higgins, Cooke, and White Co., a partnership. Nash's capital contribution is $7,500, which she paid in cash upon her admission to the partnership. A year later, when liabilities of the firm exceed its assets by $40,000, the partnership is dissolved. Porter had lent the firm $15,000 eight months before Nash was admitted; Skinner lent the firm $20,000 two months after Nash was admitted. Nash has no liability to Porter except to the extent of her capital contribution, but she is personally liable to Skinner.

In an LLP, an incoming partner does not have personal liability for both antecedent debts and those subsequent debts that are shielded by that state's LLP statute.

CONKLIN FARM V. LEIBOWITZ

SUPREME COURT OF NEW JERSEY, 1995
140 N.J. 471, 658 A.2D 1257

<http://lawlibrary.rutgers.edu/courts/supreme/a-99-94.opn.html>

FACTS In December 1986, Paula Hertzberg, Elliot Leibowitz, and Joel Leibowitz formed a general partnership, LongView Estates (LongView), to acquire from plaintiff Conklin Farm (Conklin) approximately one hundred acres of land in the Township of Montville, New Jersey. Paula Hertzberg owned 40 percent of LongView; Elliot and Joel Leibowitz owned 30 percent each. They intended to build a residential condominium complex on the property.

On the same day that the partners formed the partnership, it executed a promissory note in favor of Conklin for $9 million. The three LongView partners signed the note as partners and also personally guaranteed the note. The note represented a portion of the purchase price for the land and was secured by a mortgage on the land.

On March 15, 1990, Joel Leibowitz assigned his 30 percent interest in LongView to his wife, defendant Doris Leibowitz, who agreed to be bound by all the terms and conditions of the partnership agreement. Seventeen months later, Doris assigned the interest back to her husband. During those seventeen months, the entire principal of the Conklin note of $9 million was outstanding, and interest accrued at an annual rate of 9 percent.

LongView's condominium project failed, and LongView defaulted on the Conklin note. In March 1991, LongView filed a petition for bankruptcy. Eventually, Paula Hertzberg, Elliot Leibowitz, and Joel Leibowitz filed for personal bankruptcy protection, and all three were discharged of any personal liability on the Conklin note.

Conklin sued Doris Leibowitz in November 1991, claiming that she was personally liable for $547,000: 30 percent of the interest on the Conklin note that accrued during the seventeen months during which she had held her husband's partnership interest, plus interest since then and costs. Conklin asserted that, although the principal of the note was preexisting debt, the interest that accrued while Doris Leibowitz had been a partner was new debt. Doris Leibowitz filed a motion for summary judgment arguing that as an incoming partner she was not personally liable for LongView's preexisting debt, including interest. The trial court found in favor of Doris Leibowitz holding that the interest was part of the preexisting debt, not new debt. Conklin appealed and the Appellate Division reversed, ruling that the interest on preexisting debt is new debt. Doris Leibowitz appealed.

DECISION The judgment of the Appellate Division is reversed.

OPINION Garibaldi, J. We find that the plain language of section 17 of New Jersey's Uniform Partnership Law and its legislative history compel the conclusion that Doris Leibowitz, as an incoming partner, is liable for debt to Conklin only to the extent of her interest in partnership assets. Under [section 15(b) of New Jersey's Uniform Partnership Law] each partner is personally liable for the debts and obligations of a partnership. [Section 17 of New Jersey's Uniform Partnership Law] defines the liability of new partners entering an existing partnership. That statute provides:

A person admitted as a partner into an existing partnership is liable for all the obligations of the partnership arising before his admission as though he had been a partner when such obligations were incurred, except that this liability shall be satisfied only out of partnership property.

Under this statute, although the original partners are personally liable for preexisting debt, the incoming partner's liability for preexisting debt is limited to partnership property.

Thus, section 17 of the Uniform Partnership *** made incoming partners personally liable for preexisting debts, but only to the extent of their investment in the partnership. ***

***

The Conklin note was executed by the partnership prior to Doris Leibowitz's having any interest in LongView. She did not sign or guarantee payment of that note. Thus, the issue appears resolved by the clear language of [section 17]: Because the note was a preexisting debt, and because Doris Leibowitz was an incoming partner, she is not personally liable for the debt. The parties agree that the principal of the note was preexisting debt. However, while Doris Leibowitz argues that the interest that accrued while she was a partner was part of that preexisting debt, Conklin argues that it was new debt that arose each month as it became due. Thus, according to Conklin, Doris Leibowitz is personally liable for the interest that accrued while she was a partner. We disagree.

Conklin argues that just as a rent obligation arises for current use of property, an interest obligation arises for current use of principal. The Appellate Division described the analogy as a "sound approach," and agreed that "interest is current rent for money and also should be treated as new debt." [Citation.] We disagree, and we find the rent analogy faulty.

Contractual interest is created by the contract, and is therefore inseparable from the contractual debt. In [citation], we described contractual interest as "an integral part of the debt itself." Indeed, contractual interest does not exist absent provision for it in the debt-creating instrument. *** The interest obligation cannot be a separate debt from the principal obligation because, independent of the contract establishing the principal obligation, there is no obligation to pay interest.

***

Because there is no obligation to pay interest independent of the promissory note, Conklin's rent analogy fails. Since the obligation to pay interest arises only as a result of the original loan instrument, interest, unlike rent, cannot be "new" debt. ***

***

Moreover, there is no prejudice to Conklin in the fact that it may look to only the original partners for payment of the preexisting debt and interest. In executing the note, Conklin considered the personal credit of only Paula Hertzberg, Elliot Leibowitz, and Joel Leibowitz, all of whom guaranteed the loan. Conklin did not rely on the personal credit of Doris Leibowitz. When lenders loan money, they rely on the financial statements of the general partners, and not of some future, unknown general partner.

We find that contractual interest is not new debt *** and Doris Leibowitz is not personally liable for its payment.

INTERPRETATION A new partner is not personally liable for preexisting debt including interest on a preexisting note even though the interest accrues after the partner's admission.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the court's decision? Explain.

DISSOCIATION AND DISSOLUTION OF GENERAL PARTNERSHIPS UNDER RUPA

Dissociation occurs when a partner ceases to be associated in carrying on of the business. “Dissolution” refers to those situations when the Revised Act requires a partnership to wind up and terminate. A dissociation of a partner results in dissolution only in limited circumstances. In many instances, dissociation will result merely in a buyout of the withdrawing partner’s interest rather than a winding up of the partnership. When dissociation or other cause results in dissolution, the partnership is not terminated but continues until the winding up of its affairs is complete. During winding up, unfinished business is completed, receivables are collected, payments are made to creditors, and the remaining assets are distributed to the partners. Termination occurs when the process is finished.

Dissociation

Dissociation occurs when a partner ceases to be associated in carrying on of the business. A number of events that were considered causes of dissociation or dissolution under the common law are no longer considered so under the RUPA. For example, the assignment of a partner’s interest, a creditor’s charging order on a partner’s interest, and an accounting are not considered a dissociation or dissolution.

A partner has the power to dissociate at any time, rightfully or wrongfully, by expressing an intent to withdraw. A partner does not, however, always have the right to dissociate. A partner who wrongfully dissociates is liable to the partnership for damages caused by the dissociation. In addition, if the wrongful dissociation results in the dissolution of the partnership, the wrongfully dissociating partner is not entitled to participate in winding up the business.

WRONGFUL DISSOCIATIONS

A partner’s dissociation is wrongful if it breaches an express provision of the partnership agreement. In addition, dissociation is wrongful in a term partnership if before the expiration of the term or the completion of the undertaking (1) the partner voluntarily withdraws by express will unless the withdrawal follows within ninety days after another partner’s dissociation by death, bankruptcy, or wrongful dissociation; (2) the partner is expelled for misconduct by judicial determination; (3) the partner becomes a debtor in bankruptcy; or (4) the partner is an entity (other than a trust or estate) and is expelled or otherwise dissociated because its dissolution or termination was willful. A “term partnership” is a partnership for a specific term or particular undertaking. The partnership agreement may eliminate or expand the dissociations that are wrongful or modify the effects of wrongful dissociation, except for the power of a court to expel a partner for misconduct.

RIGHTFUL DISSOCIATIONS

The RUPA provides that a partner’s dissociation is wrongful only if it results from one of the events just discussed. All other dissociations are rightful, including (1) the death of partner in any partnership, (2) the withdrawal of a partner in a partnership at will, (3) in any partnership an event occurs that was agreed to in the partnership agreement as causing dissociation, and (4) in any partnership a court determines that a partner has become incapable of performing the partner’s duties under the partnership agreement. The RUPA defines a “partnership at will” as a partnership in which the partners have not agreed to remain partners until the expiration of a definite term or the completion of a particular undertaking.

EFFECT OF DISSOCIATION

Upon a partner’s dissociation, the partner’s right to participate in the management and conduct of the partnership business terminates. If, however, the dissociation results in a dissolution and winding up of the business, all of the partners who have not wrongfully dissociated may participate in winding up the business. The duty not to compete terminates upon dissociation, and the dissociated partner may immediately engage in a competitive business, without any further consent. The partner’s other fiduciary duties and duty of care continue only with regard to matters arising and events occurring before the partner’s dissociation, unless the partner participates in winding up the partnership’s business. For example, a partner who leaves a partnership providing consulting services may immediately compete with the firm for new clients, but must exercise care in completing current transactions with clients and must account to the firm for any fees received from the old clients on account of those transactions.

Dissolution

In accordance with the Revised Act’s emphasis on the entity treatment of partnerships, only a limited subset of dissociations requires the dissolution of a partnership. In addition, some events other than dissociation can bring about the dissolution of a partnership under RUPA. The following sections discuss the causes and effects of dissolution.

CAUSES OF DISSOLUTION

The basic rule under the RUPA is that a partnership is dissolved and its business must be wound up only if one of the events listed in Section 801 occur. The events causing dissolution may be brought about by (1) an act of the partners (i.e., some dissociations), (2) operation of law, or (3) court order. The provisions of Section 801 that involve an act of the parties are default provisions: the partners may by agreement modify or eliminate these grounds. The partners may not vary or eliminate the grounds for dissolution based on operation of law or court order.

Dissolution by Act of the Partners These causes of dissolution comprise a subset of dissociations. In a partnership at will, a partner's giving notice of intent to withdraw will result in dissolution of a partnership. Thus, any member of a partnership at will has the right to force a liquidation of the partnership. (The death or bankruptcy of a partner does not dissolve a partnership at will.)

The Revised Act provides for three ways in which a term partnership will be dissolved. No partner by herself has the power to dissolve a term partnership.

1. The term of the partnership expires or the undertaking is complete. It should be noted that if the partners continue a term partnership after the expiration of the term or completion of the undertaking, the partnership will be treated as a partnership at will.
2. All of the partners expressly agree to dissolve. This reflects the principle that the partners can unanimously amend the partnership agreement.
3. A partner's dissociation caused by a partner's death or incapacity, bankruptcy or similar financial impairment, or wrongful dissociation will bring on a dissolution if within ninety days after dissociation at least half of the remaining partners express their will to wind up the partnership business. Thus, if a term partnership has eight partners and one of the partners wrongfully dissociates before the end of the term, the partnership will be dissolved only if four of the remaining seven partners vote in favor of liquidation.

In all partnerships dissolution occurs upon the happening of an event that was specified in the partnership agreement as resulting in dissolution. The partners may, however, agree to continue the business.

Dissolution by Operation of Law A partnership is dissolved by operation of law if an event occurs that makes it unlawful to continue all or substantially all of the partnership's business. For example, a law prohibiting the production and sale of alcoholic beverages would dissolve a partnership formed to manufacture liquor. A cure of such illegality within ninety days after notice to the partnership of the event is effective retroactively. The partnership agreement cannot vary the requirement that an uncured illegal business must be dissolved and liquidated.

Dissolution by Court Order On application by a partner, a court may order dissolution on grounds of another partner's misconduct or upon a finding that (1) the economic purpose of the partnership is likely to be unreasonably frustrated; (2) another partner has engaged in conduct relating to the partnership business that makes it not reasonably practicable to carry on the business in partnership with that partner; or (3) it is not otherwise reasonably practicable to carry on the partnership business in conformity with the partnership agreement. On application of a transferee of a partner's transferable interest or a purchaser at foreclosure of a charging order, a court may order dissolution if it determines that it is equitable to wind up the partnership business (1) at any time in a partnership at will or (2) after the term of a term partnership has expired. The partners may not by agreement vary or eliminate the court's power to wind up a partnership.

HORIZON/CMS HEALTHCARE CORPORATION V. SOUTHERN OAKS HEALTH CARE, INC.

COURT OF APPEAL OF FLORIDA, FIFTH DISTRICT, 1999
732 SO. 2D 1156, REVIEW DENIED, 744 SO.2D 454

FACTS Horizon is a large, publicly traded provider of both nursing homes and management for nursing homes. It wanted to expand into Osceola County, Florida, in 1993. Southern Oaks was already operating in Osceola County; it owned the Southern Oaks Health Care Center and had a Certificate of Need issued by the Florida Agency for Health Care Administration for a new one-hundred-and-twenty-bed facility in Kissimmee. Horizon and Southern Oaks decided to form a partnership to own the proposed Kissimmee facility, which was ultimately named Royal Oaks, and agreed that Horizon would manage both the Southern Oaks facility and the new Royal Oaks facility. To that end, Southern Oaks and Horizon entered into several twenty-year partnership and management contracts in 1993.

In 1996, Southern Oaks filed suit alleging that Horizon breached its obligations under two different partnership agreements and that Horizon had breached several management contracts. The court ordered that the partnerships be dissolved, finding that they were incapable of continuing to operate in business together. Because it was dissolving the partnerships, the court ruled that “there is no entitlement to future damages.” In its cross-appeal, Southern Oaks asserts that because Horizon unilaterally and wrongfully sought dissolution of the partnerships, Southern Oaks should receive a damage award for the loss of the partnerships’ seventeen remaining years’ worth of future profits.

DECISION Dissolution affirmed and damages request denied.

OPINION Goshorn, J. First, the trial court’s finding that the parties are incapable of continuing to operate in business together is a finding of “irreconcilable differences,” a permissible reason for dissolving the partnerships under the express terms of the partnership agreements. Thus, dissolution was not “wrongful,” assuming there can be “wrongful” dissolutions, and Southern Oaks was not entitled to damages for lost future profits. Additionally, the partnership contracts also permit dissolution by “judicial decree.” Although neither party cites this provision, it appears that pursuant thereto, the parties agreed that dissolution would be proper if done by a trial court for whatever reason the court found sufficient to warrant dissolution.

Second, even assuming the partnership was dissolved for a reason not provided for in the partnership agreements, damages were properly denied. Under RUPA, it is clear that wrongful dissociation triggers liability for lost future profits. See § 602(3) (“A partner who wrongfully dissociates is liable to the partnership and to the other partners for damages caused by the dissociation. The liability is in addition to any other obligation of the partner to the partnership or to the other partners.”). However, RUPA does not contain a similar provision for dissolution; RUPA does not refer to the dissolutions as rightful or wrongful. Section 801, “Events causing dissolution and winding up of partnership business,” outlines the events causing dissolution without any provision for liability for damages. Under subsection 801(5), the statute recognizes judicial dissolution:

A partnership is dissolved, and its business must be wound up, only upon the occurrence of any of the following events:

(5) On application by a partner, a judicial determination that:

a. The economic purpose of the partnership is likely to be unreasonably frustrated;

b. Another partner has engaged in conduct relating to the partnership business which makes it not reasonably practicable to carry on the business in partnership with such partner; or

c. It is not otherwise reasonably practicable to carry on the partnership business in conformity with the partnership agreement; ***

Paragraph (5)(c) provides the basis for the trial court’s dissolution in this case. While “reasonably practicable” is not defined in RUPA, the term is broad enough to encompass the inability of partners to continue working together, which is what the court found.

Certainly the law predating RUPA allowed for recovery of lost profits upon the wrongful dissolution of a partnership. [Citations.] However, RUPA brought significant changes to partnership law, among which was the adoption of the term “dissociation.” Although the term is undefined in RUPA, dissociation appears to have taken the place of “dissolution” as that word was used pre-RUPA. [Citation.] “Dissociation” under RUPA has a different meaning, although the term is undefined in RUPA. [Citation.] It follows that the pre-RUPA cases providing for future damages upon wrongful dissolution are no longer applicable to a partnership dissolution. In other words a “wrongful dissolution” referred to in the pre-RUPA case law is now, under RUPA, known as “wrongful dissociation.” Simply stated, under section 602, only when a partner dissociates and the dissociation is wrongful can the remaining partners sue for damages. [Court’s footnote: Dissociation is not a condition precedent to dissolution under RUPA.*** (“Most dissolution events are dissociations. On the other hand, it is not necessary to have a dissociation to cause a dissolution and winding up.”).] ***

Southern Oaks’ attempt to bring the instant dissolution under the statute applicable to dissociation is rejected. The trial court ordered dissolution of the partnership, not the dissociation of Horizon for wrongful conduct. There no longer appears to be “wrongful” dissolution—either dissolution is provided for by contract or statute or the dissolution was improper and the dissolution order should be reversed. In the instant case, because the dissolution either came within the terms of the partnership agreements or paragraph 801(5)(c) (judicial dissolution where it is not reasonably practicable to carry on the partnership business), Southern Oaks’ claim for lost future profits is without merit.

INTERPRETATION A court-ordered dissolution for good cause is not wrongful and does not entitle either party to damages from the other.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Should the courts have placed blame on Horizon for breaching the partnership agreements and management contracts?

* Dissolution will occur if, within ninety days after dissociation, at least half the remaining partners express their will to wind up the partnership business.

EFFECTS OF DISSOLUTION

A partnership continues after dissolution only for the purpose of winding up its business. The partnership is terminated when the winding up of its business is completed. The remaining partners have the right, however, to continue the business after dissolution if all of the partners, including any dissociating partner other than a wrongfully dissociating partner, waive the right to have the partnership's business wound up and the partnership terminated. In that event the partnership resumes carrying on its business as if dissolution had not occurred.

Authority Upon dissolution, the actual authority of a partner to act for the partnership terminates, except so far as is appropriate to wind up partnership business. Actual authority to wind up includes the authority to complete existing contracts, to collect debts, to sell partnership assets, and to pay partnership obligations. A person winding up a partnership's business also has the authority to preserve the partnership business or property as a going concern for a reasonable time, bring and defend legal actions, settle and close the partnership's business, distribute the assets of the partnership pursuant to the RUPA, settle disputes by mediation or arbitration, and perform other necessary acts.

With respect to apparent authority, the partnership is bound in a transaction not appropriate for winding up only if the partner's act would have bound the partnership before dissolution and the other party to the transaction did not have notice of the dissolution. A person has notice of a fact if the person (1) knows of it, (2) has received a notification of it, or (3) has reason to know it exists from all of the facts known to the person at the time in question. Moreover, RUPA provides that, after an event of dissolution, any partner who has not wrongfully dissociated may file a statement of dissolution on behalf of the partnership and that ninety days after the filing of the statement of dissolution nonpartners are deemed to have notice of the dissolution and the corresponding limitation on the authority of all partners. Thus, after ninety days the statement of dissolution operates as constructive notice conclusively limiting the apparent authority of partners to transactions that are appropriate for winding up the business.

Practical Advice

Be sure to give the appropriate notice to third parties whenever a partnership dissolves.

Liability Dissolution does not in itself discharge the existing liability of any partner. Partners are liable to the other partners for their share of partnership liabilities incurred after dissolution. That includes not only obligations that are appropriate for winding up the business, but also obligations that are inappropriate but within the partner's apparent authority. A partner, however, who, with knowledge of the dissolution, nevertheless incurs a liability binding on the partnership by an act that is not appropriate for winding up the partnership business, is liable to the partnership for any damage caused to the partnership by the liability.

WINDING UP

Whenever a dissolved partnership is not to be continued, the partnership must be liquidated. The process of liquidation, called winding up, involves completing unfinished business, collecting debts, taking inventory, reducing assets to cash, auditing the partnership books, paying creditors, and distributing the remaining assets to the partners. During this period, the fiduciary duties of the partners continue in effect except the duty not to compete.

Participation in Winding Up After dissolution, a partner who has not wrongfully dissociated may participate in winding up the partnership's business. On application of any partner, partner's legal representative, or transferee, the court may order judicial supervision of the winding up if good cause is shown. Any partner winding up the partnership is entitled to reasonable compensation for services rendered in the winding up.

Distribution of Assets After all the partnership assets have been collected and reduced to cash, they are distributed to creditors and the partners. When the partnership has been profitable, the order of distribution is not critical; however, when liabilities exceed assets, the order of distribution has great importance. In winding up a partnership's business, the "assets" of the partnership include all required contributions of partners.

The RUPA provides that the partnership must apply its assets first to discharge the obligations of partners who are creditors on parity with other creditors, subject to any other laws, such as fraudulent conveyance laws and voidable transfers under the Bankruptcy Act. Second, any surplus must be applied to pay a liquidating distribution equal to the net amount distributable to partners in accordance with their right to distributions. (This does not distinguish between amounts owing to partners for return of capital and amounts owing to partners for profits.) The partnership agreement may vary the RUPA's rules for distributing the surplus among the partners. For example, it may distinguish between capital and operating losses, as the original UPA does.

Each partner is entitled to a settlement of all partnership accounts upon winding up. In settling accounts among the partners, profits and losses that result from the liquidation of the partnership assets must be credited and charged to the partners' accounts according to their respective shares of profits and losses. Then, the partnership must make a final liquidating distribution to those partners with a positive account balance in an amount equal to any excess of the credits over the charges in the partner's account. Any partner with a negative account balance must contribute to the partnership an amount equal to any excess of the charges over the credits in the partner's account. (In an LLP a partner is not required to contribute for any partnership obligations for which that partner is not personally liable under the LLP statute's shield.)

Partners share proportionately in the shortfall caused by partners who fail to contribute their proportionate share. The partnership may enforce a partner's obligation to contribute. A partner is entitled to recover from the other partners any contributions in excess of that partner's share of the partnership's liabilities. After the settlement of accounts, each partner must contribute, in the proportion in which the partner shares partnership losses, the amount necessary to satisfy partnership obligations that were not known at the time of the settlement. The estate of a deceased partner is liable for the partner's obligation to contribute to the partnership.

Marshaling of Assets The Revised Act abolishes the marshaling of assets doctrine—which segregates and considers separately the assets and liabilities of the partnership and the respective assets and liabilities of the individual partners—and the dual priority rule. (These are discussed later in this chapter.) Under RUPA, like the UPA, partnership creditors are entitled to be satisfied first out of partnership assets. Unlike the UPA, the Revised Act provides that unsatisfied partnership creditors may recover any deficiency out of the individually owned assets of the partners on equal footing with the partners' creditors.

Dissociation without Dissolution

As already mentioned, the RUPA uses the term “dissociation,” instead of the UPA term “dissolution,” to denote the change in the relationship caused by a partner’s ceasing to be associated in carrying on of the business. Under the RUPA, a dissociation of a partner results in dissolution only in limited circumstances, discussed above. Thus, in many instances, dissociation will result merely in a buyout of the withdrawing partner’s interest rather than a winding up of the partnership.

DISSOCIATIONS NOT CAUSING DISSOLUTION

In a partnership at will, a partner will be dissociated from the partnership without dissolution upon specified causes, including that partner’s death, bankruptcy, or incapacity; the expulsion of that partner; or, in the case of an entity-partner, its termination. (As covered earlier, a partnership at will is dissolved upon notice of a partner’s intent to withdraw.)

In a term partnership, if within ninety days after any specified causes of dissolution occurs, fewer than half of the remaining partners express their will to wind up the partnership business, then the partnership will not dissolve. These causes include the following: a partner’s dissociation by death, bankruptcy, or incapacity; the distribution by a trust-partner of its entire partnership interest; the termination of an entity-partner; or a partner’s wrongful dissociation. (A wrongful dissociation includes a partner’s voluntary withdrawal in violation of the partnership agreement and the judicial expulsion of a partner.)

With three exceptions, the partners may by agreement modify or eliminate any of the grounds for dissolution. The three exceptions are (1) carrying on an illegal business, (2) a court-ordered dissolution on application of a partner, and (3) a court-ordered dissolution on application of a transferee of a partner’s interest. Moreover, at any time after the dissolution of a partnership and before the winding up of its business is completed, all of the partners, including any dissociating partner other than a wrongfully dissociating partner, may waive the right to have the partnership’s business wound up and the partnership terminated. In that event, the partnership resumes carrying on its business as if dissolution had never occurred.

CONTINUATION AFTER DISSOCIATION

If a partner is dissociated from a partnership without resulting in dissolution, the remaining partners have the right to continue the business. Creditors of the partnership remain creditors of the continued partnership. Moreover, the dissociated partner remains liable for partnership obligations incurred before dissociation.

The partnership must purchase the dissociated partner’s interest in the partnership. The partnership agreement can vary these rights. The buyout price of a dissociated partner’s interest is the amount that would have been distributable to the dissociating partner in a winding up of the partnership if, on the date of dissociation, the assets of the partnership were sold at a price equal to the greater of liquidation value or going concern value without the dissociated partner. The partnership must offset against the buyout price all other amounts owing from the dissociated partner to the partnership, including damages for wrongful dissociation. These rules, however, are merely default rules, and the partnership agreement may specify the method or formula for determining the buyout price and all of the other terms and conditions of the buyout right.

A partner in a term partnership who wrongfully dissociates before the expiration of a definite term or the completion of a particular undertaking is not entitled to payment of any portion of the buyout price until the expiration of the term or completion of the undertaking, unless the partner establishes to the satisfaction of the court that earlier payment will not cause undue hardship to the business of the partnership.

A partnership must indemnify a dissociated partner whose interest is being purchased against all partnership liabilities, whether incurred before or after the dissociation, except liabilities incurred by an act of the dissociated partner after dissociation that binds the partnership, as discussed later.

Practical Advice

Consider whether to include a provision in your partnership agreement specifying a method for valuing each partner’s interest in the partnership.

DISSOCIATED PARTNER’S POWER TO BIND THE PARTNERSHIP

A dissociated partner has no actual authority to act for the partnership. With respect to apparent authority, the RUPA provides that for two years after a partner dissociates without resulting in a dissolution of the partnership business, the partnership is bound by an act of the dissociated partner which would have bound the partnership before dissociation but only if at the time of entering into the transaction the other party

1. reasonably believed that the dissociated partner was then a partner;
2. did not have notice of the partner’s dissociation; and
3. is not deemed to have had constructive notice from a filed statement of dissociation.

WARNICK V. WARNICK

SUPREME COURT OF WYOMING, 2003

2003 WY 113, 76 P.3D 316

FACTS In August 1978, Wilbur and Dee Warnick and their son Randall Warnick purchased a ranch in Sheridan County, Wyoming for $335,000, with $90,000 down plus $245,000 in installments over ten years at 8 percent interest. In April 1979, they formed a general partnership, Warnick Ranches, to operate the ranch and to pay off the purchase agreement. The partnership agreement recited that the initial capital contributions of the partners totaled $60,000, paid 36 percent by Wilbur, 30 percent by Dee, and 34 percent by Randall. The Warnick Ranches Partnership Agreement stated that by “unanimous agreement of all Partners, additional contributions may be made to, or withdrawals may be made from, the capital of the Partnership.”

The partners over the years each contributed additional funds to the operation of the ranch and received cash distributions from the partnership. After 1983, Randall contributed very little new money, and almost all of the additional funds to pay off the mortgage came from Wilbur and Dee Warnick. Wilbur also left in the partnership account two $12,000 cash distributions that were payable to him. The net cash contributions of the partners through 1999 were as follows: Wilbur $170,112.60 (51 percent); Dee $138,834.63 (41 percent); and Randall $25,406.28 (8 percent).

In 1998, Randall Warnick began having discussions with his brother about the possibility of selling his interest in Warnick Ranches. When Randall mentioned this to his father, a dispute arose between them concerning the percentage of the partnership that Randall owned. On April 14, 1999, Randall’s attorney sent a letter to Warnick Ranches proposing the sale of Randall’s partnership to a third party or to the partnership, or a liquidation of the partnership.

On August 11, 1999, Warnick Ranches responded in writing, treating the letter from Randall’s attorney as the expressed will of a partner to dissociate. Randall brought an action against the partnership to determine his interest in the partnership, including a buyout price if he is determined to be dissociated from the partnership.

The district court, in granting Randall Warnick’s motion for summary judgment, found that dissociation of Randall as a partner was the appropriate remedy. The court awarded judgment to Randall Warnick for the amount of his cash contributions, plus 34 percent of the partnership assets’ increase in value above all partners’ cash contributions. As a result of that calculation, $230,819.14, or 25.24 percent, of the undisputed value of the partnership was awarded to Randall.

DECISION Judgment affirmed in part and reversed in part; case is remanded.

OPINION Golden, J. Resolution of this matter relies almost entirely on application of the Wyoming Revised Uniform Partnership Act (“RUPA”), [citation] ***.

The partnership agreement is entirely silent as to how cash advances or payments on behalf of the business are to be treated. The partners knew that additional cash would be needed to make the mortgage payments on the ranch, and perhaps assumed that *** their agreement would cover the additional funds when they would unanimously agree to adjust the capital accounts when a partner paid more money into the operation.

It is, however, undisputed that the partners never entered into a unanimous agreement to amend their partnership agreement or to reflect additional capital contributions. It is also undisputed that the advances by the partners were not anywhere documented as a loan to the partnership rather than capital contributions.*** The [district] court specifically found that there was no documentation to support a conclusion that the payments by the elder Warnicks were a loan, so they could not be treated as a loan.

The district court’s decision, however, misapplies the clear provisions of the Revised Uniform Partnership Act. RUPA operates automatically if a partnership agreement does not have contrary provisions; ***.

The district court’s calculations in this case treat the mortgage payments as neither capital contributions nor advances, but as something else not contemplated by RUPA. *** Advances are not addressed in the [partnership] agreement, so we must turn to RUPA’s default provisions in that regard. [Citation.] Nothing in RUPA requires advances to the partnership or payment of partnership debts by partners to be memorialized in writing as a loan. In fact, the act addresses payments and advances in several places without requiring a writing or unanimous partner approval:

[RUPA] § 401(c) requires the partnership to reimburse a partner for payments made by the partner in the ordinary and proper conduct of the business of the partnership or for the preservation of its business or property;

[RUPA] § 401(d) requires the partnership to reimburse a partner for a payment or advance to the partnership beyond the amount of capital the partner agreed to contribute;

[RUPA] § 401(e) provides that a partner's cash payment on behalf of the partnership automatically constitutes a loan which accrues interest from the date of the payment;

Read [together], these provisions of the act evidence a presumption that additional amounts paid by a partner, over and above the capital contributions recited in the partnership agreement or agreed to, are presumed to be loans to the partnership, with interest payable from the date of the advance. RUPA is unequivocal on this point. ***

*** The silence of the partnership agreement on [the duty to make capital contributions beyond the partnership agreement], combined with the statutory presumption in favor of advances over capital contributions, leads necessarily to the conclusion that a partner's payment of the Warnick Ranch mortgage, without the unanimous consent required for additional capital contributions, would be an advance and a loan to the partnership.

RUPA dramatically changes the law governing partnership breakups and dissolution. An entirely new concept, "dissociation," is used in lieu of the UPA term "dissolution" to denote the change in the relationship caused by a partner's ceasing to be associated in the carrying on of the business. ...

Under RUPA, unlike the UPA, the dissociation of a partner does not necessarily cause a dissolution and winding up of the business of the partnership. Section 801 identifies the situations in which the dissociation of a partner causes a winding up of the business. Section 701 provides that in all other situations there is a buyout of the partner's interest in the partnership, rather than a windup of the partnership business. In those other situations, the partnership entity continues, unaffected by the partner's dissociation.

[Revised] Uniform Partnership Act § 601, cmt. 1, [citation].

The Warnick Ranch Partnership Agreement is again silent as to dissociation, addressing only liquidation. RUPA states that a partner has the power to dissociate at any time by express will, [RUPA] § 602(a), and that:

(a) A partner is dissociated from a partnership upon:

(i) Receipt by the partnership of notice of the partner's express will to withdraw as a partner or upon any later date specified in the notice;

Under these circumstances, the record supports the district court's conclusion that there was no genuine issue as to the material fact that a dissociation occurred. Considering the April 1999 letter from Randall's attorney to the partnership, in the context of deposition testimony regarding allegations of physical violence and misappropriation of partnership funds, we determine that the date of the letter is the date of dissociation.

However, the court erred in its calculation of the judgment. RUPA states that a dissociated partner's interest in the partnership shall be purchased by the partnership for a buyout price. [Citations.]. The buyout price is equal to the amount that would have been distributable to the dissociating partner under [citation] if, on the date of the dissociation, the partnership's assets had been sold. [Citation.] However, [RUPA] provides that partnership assets must first be applied to discharge partnership liabilities to creditors, including partners who are creditors. As noted above, as each partner advanced funds to pay the mortgage or other partnership expenses, that partner became a creditor of the partnership for the amount advanced, and is entitled to interest on each amount from the date of the advance. In calculating Randall's buyout price, it is therefore necessary to first calculate the amount that the partnership owes to each partner for advances to the partnership, with interest accrued from the date of each advance)***.

Next, there is the matter of two $12,000 draws, or "guaranteed payments," that Wilbur Warnick was entitled to in 1998 and 1999, but actually left in the partnership account and did not receive. The guaranteed payment arrangement was at Randall's request and agreed among the partners in order to provide Randall an income and to avoid the partnership showing a taxable profit. Randall received his draw as agreed in 1998 and 1999 but Wilbur did not, even though he reported it as personal income and paid taxes on it. At the time he became entitled to the "guaranteed payment," the $12,000 was Wilbur's personal money and his leaving it with the partnership was the functional equivalent of another advance to the partnership. [Citations.]. Upon remand, therefore, in calculating the buyout price for Randall Warnick's share, it is necessary to first calculate the amount the partnership owes Wilbur Warnick for the two $12,000 draws he left with the partnership, with interest from the date he was entitled to the payments.

INTERPRETATION A partnership must purchase a dissociated partner's interest in the partnership for a buyout price equal to the amount that would have been distributable to the dissociating partner under RUPA if, on the date of the dissociation, the partnership's assets had been sold and first applied to discharge partnership liabilities to creditors, including partners who are creditors.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the Wyoming Supreme Court's decision? Explain.

A dissociated partner is liable to the partnership for any damage caused to the partnership arising from an obligation improperly incurred by the dissociated partner after dissociation for which the partnership is liable. The dissociated partner is also personally liable to the third party for the unauthorized obligation.

A person has “notice” of a fact if he knows or has reason to know it exists from all the facts that are known to him or he has received a notification of it. The RUPA provides that ninety days after a statement of dissociation is filed, nonpartners are deemed to have constructive notice of the dissociation, thereby conclusively terminating a dissociated partner’s apparent authority. Thus, under the RUPA a partnership should notify all known creditors of a partner’s dissociation and file a statement of dissociation, which will conclusively limit a dissociated partner’s continuing agency power to ninety days after filing. Conversely, third parties dealing with a partnership should check for partnership filings at least every ninety days.

DISSOCIATED PARTNER’S LIABILITY TO THIRD PERSONS

A partner’s dissociation does not of itself discharge the partner’s liability for a partnership obligation incurred before dissociation. A dissociated partner is not liable for a partnership obligation incurred more than two years after dissociation. For partnership obligations incurred within two years after a partner dissociates without resulting in a dissolution of the partnership business, a dissociated partner is liable for a partnership obligation if at the time of entering into the transaction the other party (1) reasonably believed that the dissociated partner was then a partner; (2) did not have notice of the partner’s dissociation; and (3) is not deemed to have had constructive notice from a filed statement of dissociation.

By agreement with the partnership creditor and the partners continuing the business, a dissociated partner may be released from liability for a partnership obligation. Moreover, a dissociated partner is released from liability for a partnership obligation if a partnership creditor, with notice of the partner’s dissociation but without the partner’s consent, agrees to a material alteration in the nature or time of payment of a partnership obligation.

DISSOLUTION OF GENERAL PARTNERSHIPS UNDER UPA

The extinguishment of a partnership consists of three stages: (1) dissolution, (2) winding up or liquidation, and (3) termination. Dissolution occurs when the partners cease to carry on the business together. Upon dissolution, the partnership is not terminated but continues until the winding up of its affairs is complete. During winding up, unfinished business is completed, receivables are collected, payments are made to creditors, and the remaining assets are distributed to the partners. Termination occurs when the process is finished.

Dissolution

The UPA defines dissolution as the change in the relation of the partners caused by any partner’s ceasing to be associated in the carrying on, as distinguished from the winding up, of the business. The following sections discuss the causes and effects of dissolution.

CAUSES OF DISSOLUTION

Dissolution may be brought about by (1) an act of the partners, (2) operation of law, or (3) court order. A number of events that were considered causes of dissolution under the common law are no longer considered so under the UPA. For example, the assignment of a partner’s interest, a creditor’s charging order (judicial lien) on a partner’s interest, and an accounting no longer trigger dissolution.

Dissolution by Act of the Partners Because a partnership is a personal relationship, a partner always has the power to dissolve it by his actions, but whether he has the right to do so is determined by the partnership agreement. A partner who has withdrawn from the partnership in violation of the partnership agreement is liable to the remaining partners for damages resulting from the wrongful dissolution.

A partnership is rightfully dissolved, that is, dissolved in such a manner that the partner’s or partners’ act does not violate the partnership agreement (1) when all of those partners who have not assigned their interests or permitted their interests to be charged expressly agree to dissolve the partnership; (2) when the time period provided in the agreement has ended or the purpose for which the partnership was formed has been accomplished; (3) when a partner withdraws from a partnership at will, that is, a partnership with no definite term or specific undertaking; or (4) when a partner is expelled in accordance with a power to expel conferred by the partnership agreement.

Dissolution by Operation of Law A partnership is dissolved by operation of law upon (1) the death of a partner, (2) the bankruptcy of a partner or of the partnership, or (3) the subsequent illegality of the partnership, which includes any event that makes it unlawful for the partnership business to be carried on or for the members to carry on the business in partnership form.

Dissolution by Court Order Upon application by or for a partner, a court will order a dissolution if it finds that (1) a partner has been adjudicated mentally incompetent or suffers some other incapacity that prevents him from functioning as a partner; (2) a partner has engaged in conduct prejudicial to the business, has willfully or persistently breached the partnership agreement, or has conducted himself so that it is impracticable to carry on business; (3) the business can be carried on only at a loss; or (4) other circumstances render a dissolution equitable. An assignee of a partner's interest or a partner's personal creditor who has obtained a charging order against the partner's interest is entitled to dissolution by court decree. If the partnership is not at will, however, the partnership will not be dissolved until the term or particular undertaking specified in the partnership agreement is complete.

EFFECTS OF DISSOLUTION

On dissolution, the partnership is not terminated but continues until the winding up of its affairs is complete. Moreover, dissolution does not discharge the existing liability of any partner, though it does restrict her authority to act for the partnership.

Upon dissolution, the actual authority of a partner to act for the partnership terminates, except so far as may be necessary to wind up partnership affairs. Actual authority to wind up includes the authority to complete existing contracts, to collect debts, to sell partnership assets, and to pay partnership obligations.

Although actual authority terminates upon dissolution, apparent authority continues to bind the partnership for acts within the scope of the partnership business unless the third party is given notice of the dissolution. A third party who extended credit to the partnership before dissolution may hold the partnership liable for any transaction that would have bound the partnership had dissolution not occurred, unless the third party had knowledge or actual notice of the dissolution. Actual notice requires a verbal statement to the third party or actual delivery of a written statement. On the other hand, a third party who knew of or had dealt with the partnership but who had not extended credit to it before its dissolution can hold the partnership liable unless he had knowledge, actual notice, or constructive notice of the dissolution. Constructive notice consists of advertising a notice of dissolution in a newspaper of general circulation in the places at which the partnership regularly conducted its business. No notice need be given to third parties who had no knowledge of the partnership before its dissolution.

Winding Up

Whenever a dissolved partnership is not to be continued, the partnership must be liquidated. The process of liquidation, called winding up, involves completing unfinished business, collecting debts, taking inventory, reducing assets to cash, auditing the partnership books, paying creditors, and distributing the remaining assets to the partners. During this period, the fiduciary duties of the partners continue in effect.

THE RIGHT TO WIND UP

Upon dissolution any partner who has not wrongfully dissolved the partnership or been rightfully expelled according to the terms of the partnership agreement has the right to insist on the winding up of the partnership unless the partnership agreement provides otherwise. Unless otherwise agreed, all nonbankrupt partners who have not wrongfully dissolved the partnership have the right to wind up the partnership affairs.

DISTRIBUTION OF ASSETS

After all the partnership assets have been collected and reduced to cash, they are distributed to creditors and the partners. When the partnership has been profitable, the order of distribution is not critical; however, when liabilities exceed assets, the order of distribution has great importance.

The UPA sets forth the rules for settling accounts between the parties after dissolution. It states that the liabilities of a partnership are to be paid out of partnership assets in the following order: (1) amounts owing to nonpartner creditors, (2) amounts owing to partners other than for capital and profits (loans or advances), (3) amounts owing to partners for capital, and (4) amounts owing to partners for profits. The partners may by agreement among themselves change the internal priorities of distribution (numbers 2, 3, and 4) but not the preferred position of third parties (number 1). The UPA defines partnership assets to include all partnership property as well as the contributions necessary for the payment of all partnership liabilities, which consist of numbers 1, 2, and 3.

In addition, the UPA provides that, in the absence of any contrary agreement, each partner shall share equally in the profits and surplus remaining after all liabilities (numbers 1, 2, and 3) are satisfied and must contribute toward the partnership's losses, capital or otherwise, according to his share in the profits. Thus, the proportion in which the partners bear losses depends not on their relative capital contributions but on their agreement. If no specific agreement exists, the partners bear losses in the same proportion in which they share profits.

If the partnership is insolvent, the partners individually must contribute their respective share of the losses to pay the creditors. Furthermore, if one or more of the partners is insolvent or bankrupt or is out of the jurisdiction and refuses to contribute, the other partners must contribute the additional amount necessary to pay the firm's liabilities in the relative proportions in which they share the profits. Any partner who pays an amount in excess of his proper share of the losses has a right of contribution against the partners who have not paid their share.

MARSHALING OF ASSETS

The doctrine of marshaling of assets applies only in situations in which a court of equity is administering the assets of a partnership and of its members. Marshaling of assets means segregating and considering separately the assets and liabilities of the partnership and the respective assets and liabilities of the individual partners. Partnership creditors are entitled to be satisfied first out of partnership assets and may recover any deficiency out of the individually owned assets of the partners. This right is subordinate, however, to the rights of nonpartnership creditors to those assets. Conversely, the nonpartnership creditors have first claim to the individually owned assets of their respective debtors, whereas their claims to partnership assets are subordinate to the claims of partnership creditors. This approach is called the "dual priority" rule.

Finally, the assets of an insolvent partner are distributed in the following order: (1) debts and liabilities owing to her nonpartnership creditors, (2) debts and liabilities owing to partnership creditors, and (3) contributions owing to other partners who have paid more than their respective share of the firm's liabilities to partnership creditors.

This rule, however, is no longer followed if the partnership is a debtor under the Bankruptcy Code. In a proceeding under the federal bankruptcy law, a trustee is appointed to administer the estate of the debtor. If the partnership property is insufficient to pay all the claims against the partnership, the statute directs the trustee to seek recovery of the deficiency first from the general partners who are not bankrupt. The trustee may then seek recovery against the estates of bankrupt partners on the same basis as other creditors of the bankrupt partner. This provision, although contrary to the UPA's doctrine of marshaling of assets, governs whenever a bankruptcy court is administering partnership assets.

Continuation after Dissolution

Dissolution produces one of two outcomes: either the partnership is liquidated or the remaining partners continue the partnership. Whereas liquidation sacrifices the value of a going concern, continuation of the partnership after dissolution avoids this loss. The UPA, nonetheless, gives each partner the right to have the partnership liquidated except in a few instances in which the remaining partners have the right to continue the partnership.

RIGHT TO CONTINUE PARTNERSHIP

After dissolution, the remaining partners have the right to continue the partnership when (1) the partnership has been dissolved in contravention of the partnership agreement, (2) a partner has been expelled in accordance with the partnership agreement, or (3) all the partners agree to continue the business. Nevertheless, the noncontinuing partner, or his legal representative, has a right to an account of his interest against the person or partnership continuing the business as of the date of dissolution, unless otherwise agreed. Moreover, when a partner dies or retires and the surviving partners continue the business, the retired partner or the legal representative of the deceased partner is entitled to be paid the value of his interest as of the date of the dissolution as an ordinary creditor of the partnership. In addition, he is entitled to receive interest on this amount or, at his option, in lieu of interest, the profits of the business attributable to the use of his right in the property of the dissolved partnership. His rights are subordinate, however, to those of creditors of the dissolved partnership.

Continuation after Wrongful Dissolution A partner who causes dissolution by wrongfully withdrawing cannot force the liquidation of the firm. The aggrieved partners may either liquidate the firm and recover damages for the breach of the partnership agreement or continue the partnership by buying out the withdrawing partner, who is entitled to realize his interest in the partnership less the amount of the damages that the other partners have sustained because of his breach. The withdrawing partner's interest is computed without considering the goodwill of the business. In addition, the remaining partners may use the capital contributions of the wrongdoing partner for the unexpired period of the partnership agreement. They must, however, indemnify

What Duty of Disclosure Is Owed to Incoming Partners?

FACTS James Edwards was just appointed managing partner of the northeastern division of Banks & Borre, a prestigious national certified public accountant (CPA) firm operating as a partnership. The position is an excellent one, and James is the youngest partner ever to have served as a regional managing partner. However, although Banks & Borre is a well-established firm, it recently has been subject to several sizable lawsuits that allege the firm's misconduct in services it provided to several banks and certain tax shelters.

Robert Smith, the national manager, has given James clear guidelines on management strategy for the northeast division. Smith has emphasized the importance of expanding the client base in light of the pending lawsuits. A principal strategy is to expand through acquisition of smaller firms. Because of his position as manager of the northeastern division, James receives both a salary and a percentage of new client revenues.

Jones, Jones, & Frank is a medium-size CPA firm that provides auditing, tax, and management advisory services to a variety of clients. Brothers Ken Jones and Richard Jones began the practice twenty-five years ago. Donald Frank began as an employee but was brought into the partnership in its fifth year.

Jones, Jones, & Frank has been considering the possibility of merging its practice with that of a larger firm. Ken and Richard are in their late fifties and no longer want managerial responsibilities. Nevertheless, they wish to remain active in the practice.

James Edwards initiated discussions with Jones, Jones, & Frank regarding the possibility of a merger. James indicated that he could arrange attractive compensation packages for the partners of the smaller firm. Ken, Richard, and Donald have inquired about the lawsuits pending against Banks & Borre. Not having been involved in the services that gave rise to the lawsuits, James does not know most of the details. He does know, however, that concern about the litigation could destroy all prospects for the merger. James reassures Ken, Richard, and Donald that he does not know much about the lawsuits but is under the impression that they are not significant.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. Should James make a point of acquainting himself with the details of the litigation? Were his preliminary statements about the lawsuits justifiable?
2. Is it ethical for Banks & Borre to recruit new partners and to institute a policy that encourages mergers, given the pending litigation?
3. If a merger takes place, could Ken, Richard, and Donald be held liable for any judgments arising from the litigation?
4. How might a CPA firm insulate its partners from personal liability?
5. What actions should Jones, Jones, & Frank take to investigate Banks & Borre before proceeding with the merger?

the former partner against all present and future partnership liabilities.

Continuation after Expulsion A partner expelled pursuant to the partnership agreement cannot force the liquidation of the partnership. He is entitled only (1) to be discharged from all partnership liabilities either by payment or by a novation with the creditors and (2) to receive in cash the net amount due him from the partnership.

Continuation Agreement of the Partners By far the best and most reliable tool for preserving a partnership business after dissolution is through a continuation agreement. Frequently used to ensure continuity in the event of a partner's death or retirement, continuation agreements permit remaining partners to keep partnership property, carry on partnership business, and specify settlements for outgoing partners.

RIGHTS OF CREDITORS

Any change in membership dissolves a partnership and forms a new one, despite the fact that the new combination may include a majority of the old partners. The creditors of the old partnership may pursue their claims against the new partnership and also may proceed to hold all of the members of the dissolved partnership personally liable. If a withdrawing partner has made arrangements with those who continue the business whereby they assume and pay all debts and obligations of the firm, the partner is still liable to creditors whose claims arose before the dissolution. If compelled to pay such debts, the withdrawing partner nonetheless has a right of indemnity against her former partners, who agreed to pay the debts but failed to do so.

A retiring partner may be discharged from his existing liabilities by entering into a novation with the continuing partners and the creditors. A creditor must agree to a novation, although his consent may be inferred from his course of dealing with the partnership after dissolution. Whether such dealings with a continuing partnership constitute an implied novation is a factual question of intent.

A withdrawing partner may protect herself against liability upon contracts the firm enters subsequent to her withdrawal by giving notice that she is no longer a member of the firm. Otherwise, she will be liable for debts thus incurred to creditors who had no notice or knowledge of the partner's withdrawal. Persons who had extended credit to the partnership prior to its dissolution must receive actual notice, whereas constructive notice by newspaper publication will suffice for those who knew of the partnership but had not extended credit to it before its dissolution.

DISSOCIATION AND DISSOLUTION OF GENERAL PARTNERSHIPS UNDER RUPA

Dissociation

Definition of Dissociation change in the relation of partners caused by any partner's ceasing to be associated in carrying on of the business

- Term Partnership partnership for a specific term or particular undertaking
- Partnership at Will partnership in which the partners have not agreed to remain partners until the expiration of a definite term or the completion of a particular undertaking

Wrongful Dissociation a dissociation that breaches an express provision of the partnership agreement or in a term partnership if before the expiration of the term or the completion of the undertaking (1) the partner voluntarily withdraws by express will, (2) the partner is judicially expelled for misconduct, (3) the partner becomes a debtor in bankruptcy, or (4) the partner is an entity (other than a trust or estate) and is expelled or otherwise dissociated because its dissolution or termination was willful

Rightful Dissociation all other dissociations are rightful including the death of a partner in any partnership and the withdrawal of a partner in a partnership at will

Effect of Dissociation terminates dissociating partner's right to participate in the management of the partnership business and duties to partnership

Dissolution

Causes of Dissolution

- Dissolution by Act of the Partners partnership at will: withdrawal of a partner; term partnership: (1) the term ends, (2) all partners expressly agree to dissolve, or (3) a partner's dissociation is caused by a partner's death or incapacity, bankruptcy or similar financial impairment, or wrongful dissociation if within ninety days after dissociation at least half of the remaining partners express their will to wind up the partnership business; any partnership: an event occurs that was specified in the partnership agreement as resulting in dissolution

- Dissolution by Court Order a court will order dissolution of a partnership under certain conditions

Effects of Dissolution upon dissolution a partnership is not terminated but continues until the winding up is completed

- Authority a partner's actual authority to act for the partnership terminates, except so far as may be appropriate to wind up partnership affairs; apparent authority continues unless notice of the dissolution is given to a third party
- Liability dissolution does not in itself discharge the existing liability of any partner; partners are liable to the other partners for their share of partnership liabilities incurred after dissolution

Winding Up completing unfinished business, collecting debts, and distributing assets to creditors and partners; also called liquidation

- Winding Up Required A dissolved partnership must be wound up and terminated when the winding up of its business is completed unless all of the partners, including any rightfully dissociating partner, waive the right to have the partnership's business wound up and the partnership terminated

- Participation in Winding Up any partner who has not wrongfully dissociated may participate in winding up the partnership's business
- Distribution of Assets the assets of the partnership include all required contributions of partners; the liabilities of a partnership are to be paid out of partnership assets in the following order: (1) amounts owing to nonpartner and partner creditors and (2) amounts owing to partners on their partners' accounts
- Partnership Creditors are entitled to be first satisfied out of partnership assets
- Nonpartnership Creditors share on equal footing with unsatisfied partnership creditors in the individually owned assets of their respective debtor-partners

Dissociation without Dissolution

Dissociations Not Causing Dissolution

- Partnership at Will a partner's death, bankruptcy, or incapacity; the expulsion of a partner; or the termination of an entity-partner results in a dissociation of that partner but does not result in a dissolution
- Term Partnership if within ninety days after any of following causes of dissolution occur, fewer than half of the remaining partners express their will to wind up the partnership business, then the partnership will not dissolve: a partner's dissociation by death, bankruptcy, or incapacity; the distribution by a trust-partner of its entire partnership interest; the termination of an entity-partner; or a partner's wrongful dissociation

Continuation after Dissociation the remaining partners have the right to continue the partnership with a mandatory buyout of the dissociating partner; the creditors of the partnership have claims against the continued partnership

Dissociated Partner's Power to Bind the Partnership a dissociated partner's actual authority to act for the partnership terminates; apparent authority continues for two years unless notice of the dissolution is given to a third party

Dissociated Partner's Liability to Third Persons a partner's dissociation does not of itself discharge the partner's liability for a partnership obligation incurred before dissociation; a dissociated partner is liable for a partnership obligation incurred within two years after a partner dissociates unless notice of the dissolution is given to a third party

1. Albert, Betty, and Carol own and operate the Roy Lumber Company. Each contributed one-third of the capital, and they share equally in the profits and losses. Their partnership agreement provides that two partners must authorize all purchases over $2,500 in advance and that only Albert is authorized to draw checks. Unknown to Albert or Carol, Betty purchases on the firm's account a $5,500 diamond bracelet and a $5,000 forklift and orders $5,000 worth of logs, all from Doug, who operates a jewelry store and is engaged in various activities connected with the lumber business. Before Betty made these purchases, Albert told Doug that Betty is not the log buyer. Albert refuses to pay Doug for Betty's purchases. Doug calls at the mill to collect, and Albert again refuses to pay him. Doug calls Albert an unprintable name, and Albert then punches Doug in the nose, knocking him out. While Doug is lying unconscious on the ground, an employee of Roy Lumber Company negligently drops a log on Doug's leg, breaking three bones. The firm and the three partners are completely solvent. What are the rights of Doug against Roy Lumber Company, Albert, Betty, and Carol?
2. Paula, Fred, and Stephanie agree that Paula and Fred will form and conduct a partnership business and that Stephanie will become a partner in two years. Stephanie agrees to lend the firm $50,000 and take 10 percent of the profits in lieu of interest. Without Stephanie's knowledge, Paula and Fred tell Harold that Stephanie is a partner, and Harold, relying on Stephanie's sound financial status, gives the firm credit. The firm later becomes insolvent, and Harold seeks to hold Stephanie liable as a partner. Should Harold succeed?

3. Simmons, Hoffman, and Murray were partners doing business under the firm name of Simmons & Co. The firm borrowed money from a bank and gave the bank the firm's note for the loan. In addition, each partner guaranteed the note individually. The firm became insolvent, and a receiver was appointed. The bank claims that it has a right to file its claim as a firm debt and also that it has a right to participate in the distribution of the assets of the individual partners before partnership creditors receive any payment from such assets.

- a. Explain the principle involved in this case.
- b. Is the bank correct?

4. Anthony and Karen were partners doing business as the Petite Garment Company. Leroy owned a dye plant that did much of the processing for the company. Anthony and Karen decided to offer Leroy an interest in their company, in consideration for which Leroy would contribute his dye plant to the partnership. Leroy accepted the offer and was duly admitted as a partner. At the time he was admitted as a partner, Leroy did not know that the partnership was on the verge of insolvency. About three months after Leroy was admitted to the partnership, a textile firm obtained a judgment against the partnership in the amount of $50,000. This debt represented an unpaid balance that had existed before Leroy was admitted as a partner.

The textile firm brought an action to subject the partnership property, including the dye plant, to the satisfaction of its judgment. The complaint also requested that, in the event the judgment was unsatisfied by sale of the partnership property, Leroy's home be sold and the proceeds applied to the balance of the judgment. Anthony and Karen own nothing but their interest in the partnership property.

What should be the result (a) with regard to the dye plant and (b) with regard to Leroy's home?

5. Jones and Ray formed a partnership on January 1, known as JR Construction Co., to engage in the construction business, each partner owning a one-half interest. On February 10, while conducting partnership business, Jones negligently injured Ware, who brought an action against Jones, Ray, and JR Construction Co. and obtained judgment for $250,000 against them on March 1. On April 15, Muir joined the partnership by contributing $100,000 cash, and by agreement each partner was entitled to a one-third interest. In July, the partners agreed to purchase new construction equipment for the partnership, and Muir was authorized to obtain a loan from XYZ Bank in the partnership name for $200,000 to finance the purchase. On July 10, Muir signed a $200,000 note on behalf of the partnership, and the equipment was purchased. In November, the partnership was in financial difficulty, its total assets amounting to $50,000. The note was in default, with a balance of $150,000 owing to XYZ Bank. Muir has substantial resources, while Jones and Ray each individually have assets of $20,000.

What is the extent of Muir's personal liability and the personal liability of Jones and Ray as to (a) the judgment obtained by Ware and (b) the debt owing to XYZ Bank?

6. Lauren, Matthew, and Susan form a partnership, Lauren contributing $100,000; Matthew $50,000; and Susan her time and skill. Nothing is said regarding the division of profits. The firm later dissolves. No distributions to partners have been made since the partnership was formed. The partnership sells its assets for a loss of $90,000. After payment of all firm debts, $60,000 is left. Lauren claims that she is entitled to the entire $60,000. Matthew contends that the distribution should be $40,000 to Lauren and $20,000 to Matthew. Susan claims the $60,000 should be divided equally among the partners. Who is correct? Explain.

7. Adams, a consulting engineer, entered into a partnership with three others for the practice of their profession. The only written partnership agreement is a brief document specifying that Adams is entitled to 55 percent of the profits and the others to 15 percent each. The venture is a total failure. Creditors are pressing for payment, and some have filed suit. The partners cannot agree on a course of action.

How many of the partners must agree to achieve each of the following objectives?

- a. To add Jones, also an engineer, as a partner, Jones being willing to contribute a substantial amount of new capital.
  - b. To sell a vacant lot held in the partnership name, which had been acquired as a future office site for the partnership.
  - c. To move the partnership's offices to less expensive quarters.
  - d. To demand a formal accounting.
  - e. To dissolve the partnership.
  - f. To agree to submit certain disputed claims to arbitration, which Adams believes will prove less expensive than litigation.
  - g. To sell all of the partnership's personal property, Adams having what he believes to be a good offer for the property from a newly formed engineering firm.
  - h. To alter the respective interests of the parties in the profits and losses by decreasing Adams's share to 40 percent and increasing the others' shares accordingly.
  - i. To assign all the partnership's assets to a bank in trust for the benefit of creditors, hoping to work out satisfactory arrangements without filing for bankruptcy.
8. Charles and Jack orally agreed to become partners in a tool and die business. Charles, who had experience in tool and die work, was to operate the business. Jack was to take no active part but was to contribute the entire $500,000 capitalization. Charles worked ten hours a day at the plant, for which he was paid nothing. Nevertheless, despite Charles's best efforts, the business failed. The $500,000 capital was depleted, and the partnership owed $500,000 in debts. Prior to the failure of the partnership business, Jack became personally insolvent; consequently, the creditors of the partnership collected the entire $500,000 indebtedness from Charles, who was forced to sell his home and farm to satisfy the indebtedness. Jack later regained his financial responsibility, and Charles brought an appropriate action against Jack for (a) one-half of the $500,000 he had paid to partnership creditors and (b) one-half of $80,000, the reasonable value of Charles's services during the operation of the partnership. Who will prevail and why?

9. Glenn refuses an invitation to become a partner of Dorothy and Cynthia in a retail grocery business. Nevertheless, Dorothy inserts an advertisement in the local newspaper representing Glenn as their partner. Glenn takes no steps to deny the existence of a partnership between them. Ron, who extended credit to the firm, seeks to hold Glenn liable as a partner. Is Glenn liable? Explain.
10. Hanover leased a portion of his farm to Brown and Black, doing business as the Colorite Hatchery. Brown went upon the premises to remove certain chicken sheds that he and Black had placed there for hatchery purposes. Thinking that Brown intended to remove certain other sheds, which were Hanover's property, Hanover accosted Brown, who willfully struck Hanover and knocked him down. Brown then ran to the Colorite truck, which he had previously loaded with chicken coops, and drove back to the hatchery. On the way, he picked up George, who was hitchhiking to the city to look for a job. Brown was driving at seventy miles an hour down the highway. At an open intersection with another highway, Brown in his hurry ran a stop sign, striking another vehicle. The collision caused severe injuries to George. Immediately thereafter, the partnership was dissolved, and Brown was insolvent. Hanover and George each bring separate actions against Black as copartner for the alleged tort committed by Brown against each. What judgments as to each?
11. Martin, Mark, and Marvin formed a retail clothing partnership named M Clothiers and conducted a business for many years, buying most of their clothing from Hill, a wholesaler. On January 15, Marvin retired from the business, but Martin and Mark decided to continue it. As part of the retirement agreement, Martin and Mark agreed in writing with Marvin that Marvin would not be responsible for any of the partnership debts, either past or future. On January 15 the partnership published a notice of Marvin's retirement in a newspaper of general circulation where the partnership carried on its business.

Before January 15, Hill was a creditor of M Clothiers to the extent of $10,000, and on January 30, he extended additional credit of $5,000. Hill was not advised and did not in fact know of Marvin's retirement and the change of the partnership. On January 30, Ray, a competitor of Hill, extended credit for the first time to M Clothiers in the amount of $3,000. Ray also was not advised and did not in fact know of Marvin's retirement and the change of the partnership.

On February 1, Martin and Mark departed for parts unknown, leaving no partnership assets with which to pay the described debts. What is Marvin's liability, if any, (a) to Hill and (b) to Ray?
12. Ben, Dan, and Lilli were partners sharing profits in proportions of one-fourth, one-third, and five-twelfths, respectively. Their business failed, and the firm was dissolved. At the time of dissolution, no financial adjustments between the partners were necessary with reference to their respective partners' accounts, but the firm's liabilities to creditors exceeded its assets by $24,000. Without contributing any amount toward the payment of the liabilities, Dan moved to a destination unknown. Ben and Lilli are financially responsible. How much must each contribute?
13. Ames, Bell, and Cole were equal partners in the ABC Construction Company. Their written partnership agreement provided that the partnership would dissolve upon the death of any partner. Cole died on June 30, and his widow, Cora Cole, qualified as executor of his will. Ames and Bell wound up the business of the partnership and on December 31 they completed the sale of all of the partnership's assets. After paying all partnership debts, they distributed the balance equally among themselves and Mrs. Cole as executor.

Subsequently, Mrs. Cole learned that Ames and Bell had made and withdrawn a net profit of $200,000 from July 1 to December 31. The profit was made through new contracts using the partnership name and assets. Ames and Bell had concealed such contracts and profit from Mrs. Cole, and she learned about them from other sources. Immediately after acquiring this information, Mrs. Cole made demand upon Ames and Bell for one-third of the profit of $200,000. They rejected her demand. What are the rights and remedies, if any, of Cora Cole as executor?
14. The articles of partnership of the firm of Wilson and Company provide the following:

William Smith to contribute $50,000; to receive interest thereon at 13 percent per annum and to devote such time as he may be able to give; and to receive 30 percent of the profits.

John Jones to contribute $50,000; to receive interest on same at 13 percent per annum; to give all of his time to the business; and to receive 30 percent of the profits.

Henry Wilson to contribute all of his time to the business and to receive 20 percent of the profits.

James Brown to contribute all of his time to the business and to receive 20 percent of the profits.

There is no provision for sharing losses. After six years of operation, the firm is dissolved and wound up. No distributions to partners have been made since the partnership was formed. The partnership assets are sold for $400,000 with a loss of $198,000. Liabilities to creditors total $420,000. What are the rights and liabilities of the respective parties?

15. Adam, Stanley, and Rosalind formed a partnership in State X to distribute beer and wine. Their agreement provided that the partnership would continue until December 31, 2013. Which of the following events would cause the ABC partnership to dissolve? If so, when would the partnership be dissolved?
  - a. Rosalind assigns her interest in the partnership to Mary on April 1, 2011.
  - b. Stanley dies on June 1, 2013.
  - c. Adam withdraws from the partnership on September 15, 2012.
  - d. A creditor of Stanley obtains a charging order against Stanley's interest on October 9, 2010.
  - e. In 2011, the legislature of State X enacts a statute making the sale or distribution of alcoholic beverages illegal.
  - f. Stanley has a formal accounting of partnership affairs on September 19, 2012.

Case Problems

16. Phillips and Harris are partners in a used car business. Under their oral partnership, each has an equal voice in the conduct and management of the business. Because of their irregular business hours, the two further agreed that they could use any partnership vehicle as desired. This use includes transportation to and from work, even though the vehicles are for sale at all times. Harris conducted partnership business both at the used car lot and from his home. He was on call by Phillips or customers at his home and he went back to the lot two or three times after going home. While driving a partnership vehicle home from the used car lot, Harris negligently hit a car driven by Cook, who brought this action against Harris and Phillips individually and as copartners for his injuries. Who is liable?
17. Stroud and Freeman are general partners in Stroud's Food Center, a grocery store. Nothing in the articles of partnership restricts the power or authority of either partner to act in respect to the ordinary and legitimate business of the Food Center. In November, however, Stroud informed National Biscuit that he would not be personally responsible for any more bread sold to the partnership. Then, in the following February, at the request of Freeman, National Biscuit sold and delivered more bread to the Food Center. Explain whether National Biscuit will be able to recover the value of the bread delivered to the Food Center from Stroud and the partnership.
18. Voeller, the managing partner of the Pay-Out Drive-In Theater, signed a contract to sell to Hodge a small parcel of land belonging to the partnership. Except for the last twenty feet, which were necessary for the theater's driveway, the parcel was not used in theater operations. The agreement stated that it was between Hodge and the partnership, with Voeller signing for the partnership. Voeller claims that he told Hodge before signing that a plat plan would have to be approved by the other partners before the sale. Hodge denies this and sues for specific performance, claiming that Voeller had actual and apparent authority to bind the partnership. The partners argue that Voeller had no such authority and that Hodge knew this. Who is correct? Explain.
19. L. G. and S. L. Patel, husband and wife, owned and operated the City Center Motel in Eureka. On April 16, Rajeshkumar, the son of L. G. and S. L., formed a partnership with his parents and became owner of 35 percent of the City Center Motel. The partnership agreement required that Rajeshkumar approve any sale of the motel. Record title to the motel was not changed, however, to reflect his interest. On April 21, L. G. and S. L. listed their motel for sale with a real estate broker. On May 2, P. V. and Kirit Patel made an offer on the motel, which L. G. and S. L. accepted. Neither the broker nor the purchasers knew of the son's interest in the motel. When L. G. and S. L. notified Rajeshkumar of their plans, to their surprise, he refused to sell his 35 percent of the motel. On May 4, L. G. and S. L. notified P. V. and Kirit that they wished to withdraw their acceptance. They offered to pay $10,000 in damages and to give the purchasers a right of first refusal for five years. Rather than accept the offer, on May 29, P. V. and Kirit filed an action for specific performance and incidental damages. L. G., S. L., and Rajeshkumar responded that the contract could not lawfully be enforced. Discuss who will prevail and why.
20. Davis and Shipman founded a partnership under the name of Shipman & Davis Lumber Company. Seven years later, the partnership was dissolved by written agreement. Notice of the dissolution was published in a newspaper of general circulation in Merced County, where the business was conducted. No actual notice of dissolution was given to firms that had previously extended credit to the partnership. By the dissolution agreement, Shipman, who was to continue the business, was to pay all of the partnership's debts. He continued the business as a sole proprietorship for a short time until he formed a successor corporation, Shipman Lumber Servaes Co. After the partnership's dissolution, two firms that previously had done business with the partnership extended credit to Shipman for certain repair work and merchandise. The partnership also had a balance due to Valley Company for prior purchases. Five months later, two checks were drawn by Shipman Lumber Servaes Co. and accepted by Valley as partial payment on this debt. Credit Bureaus of Merced County, as assignee of these three accounts, sued the partnership as well as Shipman and Davis individually. Does the dissolution of the partnership relieve Davis of personal liability for the accounts? Explain.

- 21. In August Victoria Air Conditioning, Inc. (VAC), entered into a subcontract for insulation services with Southwest Texas Mechanical Insulation Company (SWT), a partnership composed of Charlie Jupe and Tommy Nabors. In February of the following year, Jupe and Nabors dissolved the partnership, but VAC did not receive notice of the dissolution at that time. Sometime later, insulation was removed from Nabors's premises to Jupe's possession and Jupe continued the insulation project with VAC. From then on, Nabors had no more involvement with SWT. One month later, Nabors informed VAC's project manager, Von Behrenfeld, that Nabors was no longer associated with SWT, had formed his own insulation company, and was interested in bidding on new jobs. Subsequently, SWT failed to perform the subcontract and Jupe could not be found. VAC brought suit for breach of contract against SWT, Jupe, and Nabors. Nabors claims that several letters and change orders introduced by both parties show that VAC knew of the dissolution and impliedly agreed to discharge Nabors from liability. These documents indicated that VAC had dealt with Jupe, but had not dealt with Nabors, after the dissolution. VAC denies that the course of dealings between VAC and Jupe was the type from which an agreement to discharge Nabors could be inferred. Who is correct? Explain.

LIMITED PARTNERSHIPS AND LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES

A limited partner is not liable for the obligations of a limited partnership.

REVISED UNIFORM LIMITED PARTNERSHIP ACT

A member is not personally liable for a debt, obligation, or liability of the [limited liability] company.

UNIFORM LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANY ACT

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Distinguish between a general partnership and a limited partnership.
2. Identify those activities in which a limited partner may engage without forfeiting limited liability.
3. Distinguish between a limited partnership and a limited liability company.
4. Distinguish between a member-managed limited liability company and a manager-managed limited liability company.
5. Distinguish between a limited liability partnership and a limited liability limited partnership.

In this chapter, we will consider other types of unincorporated business associations: limited partnerships, limited liability companies, limited liability partnerships, and limited liability limited partnerships. These organizations have developed to meet special business and investment needs. Each has characteristics that make it appropriate for certain purposes.

Limited Partnerships

The limited partnership has proved to be an attractive vehicle for a variety of investments because of its tax advantages and the limited liability it confers upon the limited partners. Unlike general partnerships, limited partnerships are statutory creations. Before 1976, the governing statute in all states except Louisiana was the Uniform Limited Partnership Act (ULPA), which was promulgated in 1916. In 1976, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws promulgated the Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act (RULPA). In 1985, the National Conference revised the RULPA; the resulting 1985 Act is substantially similar to the 1976 RULPA and does not alter its underlying philosophy or thrust. All states except Louisiana had adopted either the 1976 Act or the 1985 Act with a large majority of these states adopting the 1985 version.

In 2001, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws promulgated a new revision of the 1985 RULPA (the 2001 ReRULPA). The new Act has been drafted to reflect that limited liability partnerships and limited liability companies can meet many of the needs formerly met by limited partnerships. Accordingly, the ReRULPA adopts as default rules provisions that strongly favor current management and treat limited partners as passive investors with little control over or right to exit the limited partnership. At least fifteen states have adopted the statute.

In this chapter, we will discuss the 1985 RULPA. The ULPA, the 1976 RULPA, and the 1985 RULPA are supplemented by the Uniform Partnership Act, which applies to limited partnerships in any case for which the Limited Partnership Act does not provide. (The 2001 ReRULPA is a standalone statute and is not linked the Uniform Partnership Act.) For a concise comparison of general and limited partnerships, see Concept Review 31.1.

In addition, limited partnership interests are almost always considered to be securities, and their sale is therefore subject to state and federal regulation, as we will discuss in Chapter 40.

DEFINITION

A limited partnership is a partnership formed by two or more persons under the laws of a state and that has one or more general partners and one or more limited partners. A person includes a natural person, a partnership, a limited partnership, a trust, an estate, an association, or a corporation. Such a partnership differs from a general partnership in several respects, three of which are fundamental:

1. A statute providing for the formation of limited partnerships must be in effect.
2. The limited partnership must substantially comply with the requirements of that statute.
3. The liability of a limited partner for partnership debts or obligations is limited to the extent of the capital he has contributed or has agreed to contribute.

FORMATION

Although the formation of a general partnership requires no special procedures, the formation of a limited partnership requires substantial compliance with the limited partnership statute. Failure to comply may result in the limited partners not obtaining limited liability.

Filing of Certificate The RULPA provides that two or more persons desiring to form a limited partnership shall file in the office of the secretary of state of the state in which the limited partnership has its principal office a signed certificate of limited partnership. The certificate must include the following information: (1) the name of the limited partnership; (2) the address of its office and the name and address of the agent for service of process; (3) the name and the business address of each general partner; (4) the latest date upon which the limited partnership is to dissolve; and (5) any other matters the general partners decide to include in the certificate.

The certificate of limited partnership must be amended if a new general partner is admitted, a partner withdraws, or a general partner becomes aware that any statement in the certificate was or has become false. In addition, the certificate may be amended at any time for any other purpose the general partners deem proper. As discussed later, false statements in a certificate or amendment that cause loss to third parties who rely on the statements may result in liability for the general partners.

Name Including the surname of a limited partner in the partnership name is prohibited unless it is also the surname of a general partner or unless the business had been carried on under that name before the admission of that limited partner. A limited partner who knowingly permits his name to be used in violation of this provision is liable to any creditor who did not know that he was a limited partner. The RULPA also prohibits a partnership name that is the same as, or deceptively similar to, that of any corporation or other limited partnership. Finally, the name of the limited partnership must contain, unabbreviated, the words “limited partnership.”

Contributions The contribution of a partner may be cash, property, services rendered, a promissory note, or an obligation to contribute cash or property or to perform services. A promise by a limited partner to contribute to the limited partnership is not enforceable unless it is in a signed writing. Should a partner fail to make a required capital contribution described in a signed writing, the limited partnership may hold her liable to contribute the cash value of the stated contribution.

Defective Formation A limited partnership is formed when a certificate of limited partnership that substantially complies with the statutory requirements is filed. Therefore, if no certificate is filed or if the certificate filed does not substantially meet the statutory requirements, the formation is defective. In either case, the limited liability of limited partners is jeopardized. The RULPA provides that a person who has contributed to the capital of a business (an “equity participant”), believing erroneously and in good faith that he has become a limited partner in a limited partnership, is not liable as a general partner, provided that on ascertaining the mistake he either (1) withdraws from the business and renounces future profits or (2) files a certificate or an amendment curing the defect. However, the equity participant will be liable to any third party who transacted business with the enterprise before the withdrawal or amendment and who in good faith believed that the equity participant was a general partner at the time of the transaction.

The 1985 RULPA does not require that the limited partners be named in the certificate. This greatly reduces the risk that an inadvertent omission of such information will expose a limited partner to liability.

Practical Advice

To obtain limited liability as a limited partner, make sure that the limited partnership has been properly organized.

Foreign Limited Partnerships A limited partnership is considered “foreign” in any state other than the one in which it was formed. The laws of the state in which a foreign limited partnership is organized govern its organization, its internal affairs, and the liability of its limited partners. In addition, the RULPA requires all foreign limited partnerships to register with the secretary of state before transacting any business in a state. Any foreign limited partnership transacting business without so registering may not bring enforcement actions in the state’s courts until it registers, although it may defend itself in the state’s courts.

Rights Because limited partnerships are organized pursuant to statute, the rights of the parties are usually set forth in the articles of limited partnership and in the limited partnership agreement. Unless otherwise agreed or provided in the act, a general partner of a limited partnership has all the rights and powers of a partner in a partnership without limited partners. A general partner may also be a limited partner and thereby may also share in profits, losses, and distributions as a limited partner.

Practical Advice

When forming a limited partnership, carefully specify the rights and duties of the general and limited partners but be sure to adhere to the statutory limitations on the powers of limited partners.

Control The general partners of a limited partnership have almost exclusive control and management of the limited partnership. A limited partner, on the other hand, may not share in this management or control; if he does, he may forfeit his limited liability. A limited partner who participates in the control of the business is liable only to those persons who transact business with the limited partnership reasonably believing, based upon the limited partner’s conduct, that the limited partner is a general partner.

Moreover, both versions of the RULPA provide a “safe harbor” by enumerating certain activities, any or all of which a limited partner may perform without being deemed to have participated in control of the business. They include (1) being a contractor for, or an agent or employee of, the limited partnership or a general partner; (2) consulting with and advising a general partner with respect to the business of the limited partnership; (3) acting as surety for the limited partnership; (4) approving or disapproving an amendment to the partnership agreement; and (5) voting on various fundamental changes in the limited partnership.

Practical Advice

As a limited partner, exercise care not to take part in the control of the limited partnership beyond that which is legally permitted.

ALZADO V. BLINDER, ROBINSON & COMPANY, INC.

SUPREME COURT OF COLORADO, 1988
752 P.2D 544

FACTS In 1979, Lyle Alzado and two business associates formed Combat Promotions, Inc., to promote an eight-round exhibition boxing match in Denver, Colorado, between Alzado and Muhammad Ali. Ali agreed to participate on the condition that prior to the match he would receive an irrevocable letter of credit guaranteeing payment of $250,000. Combat Promotions persuaded Blinder, Robinson & Company, Inc. (B-R) to put up the $250,000 letter of credit. B-R, however, insisted on several conditions.

First, B-R required the formation of a limited partnership, Combat Associates, with B-R as limited partner and Combat Promotions as general partner. Second, B-R required that the partnership agreement provide that the letter of credit be paid off as a partnership expense. Finally, B-R required Alzado’s personal secured guarantee to reimburse B-R for any losses it might suffer. In a separate transaction, Alzado signed an agreement with Combat Associates stating that he would be paid $100,000 for the match but subordinating that right to payment for expenses of the promotion.

B-R used its office as a ticket outlet, gave two parties to promote the exhibition match, and gave several promotional television interviews. Nonetheless, few tickets were sold and the exhibition boxing match was a financial disaster. After Ali collected on the letter of credit as he was entitled to do, Combat Associates could pay B-R only $65,000, and paid nothing to Alzado or other creditors. B-R then sued Alzado for $185,000 in damages. Alzado counterclaimed, alleging that B-R should be deemed a general partner of Combat Associates and therefore liable to Alzado for $100,000. The jury awarded Alzado $92,500. B-R appealed, and the Colorado Court of Appeals reversed. Alzado then appealed to the Colorado Supreme Court.

DECISION Judgment of the Court of Appeals for Blinder, Robinson & Co., Inc., reversing the trial court's award to Alzado, affirmed.

OPINION Kirshbaum, J. Alzado next contends that the Court of Appeals erred in concluding that Blinder-Robinson's conduct in promoting the match did not constitute sufficient control of Combat Associates to justify the conclusion that the company must be deemed a general rather than a limited partner. We disagree.

A limited partner may become liable to partnership creditors as a general partner if the limited partner assumes control of partnership business. [Citations]; see also [RULPA] § 303, which provides that a limited partner does not participate in the control of partnership business solely by doing one or more of the following:

- a. Being a contractor for or an agent or employee of the limited partnership or of a general partner;
- b. Being an officer, director, or shareholder of a corporate general partner;

- c. Consulting with and advising a general partner with respect to the business of the limited partnership;

***

Any determination of whether a limited partner's conduct amounts to control over the business affairs of the partnership must be determined by consideration of several factors, including the purpose of the partnership, the administrative activities undertaken, the manner in which the entity actually functioned, and the nature and frequency of the limited partner's purported activities.

*** The record here reflects that Blinder-Robinson used its Denver office as a ticket outlet, gave two parties to promote the exhibition match and provided a meeting room for many of Combat Associates' meetings. Blinder personally appeared on a television talk show and gave television interviews to promote the match. Blinder-Robinson made no investment, accounting or other financial decisions for the partnership; all such fiscal decisions were made by officers or employees of Combat Promotions, Inc. the general partner. The evidence established at most that Blinder-Robinson engaged in a few promotional activities. It does not establish that it took part in the management or control of the business affairs of the partnership. Accordingly, we agree with the Court of Appeals that the trial court erred in denying Blinder-Robinson's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict with respect to Alzado's first counterclaim.

INTERPRETATION The Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act permits limited partners to carry on certain specified activities without losing their limited liability.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree that limited partners should forfeit their limited liability because they take part in control of the limited partnership? Explain.

Voting Rights The partnership agreement may grant to all or a specified group of general or limited partners the right to vote on any matter. If, however, the agreement grants limited partners voting powers beyond the act's safe harbor provisions, a court may hold that the limited partners have participated in control of the business. The RULPA does not require that limited partners have the right to vote on matters as a class separate from the general partners, although the partnership agreement may provide such a right.

Choice of Associates After the formation of a limited partnership, the admission of additional limited partners requires the written consent of all partners, unless the partnership agreement provides otherwise. Regarding additional general partners, the written partnership agreement determines the procedure for authorizing their admission. The written consent of all partners is required only if the partnership agreement fails to deal with this issue.

Withdrawal A general partner may withdraw from a limited partnership at any time by giving written notice to the other partners. If the withdrawal violates the partnership agreement, the limited partnership may recover damages from the withdrawing general partner. A limited partner may withdraw as provided in the limited partnership certificate or, under the 1985 Act, the written partnership agreement. If the certificate (or written partnership agreement, under the 1985 Act) does not specify when a limited partner may withdraw or a definite time for the limited partnership's dissolution, a limited partner may withdraw upon giving at least six months' prior written notice to each general partner. Upon withdrawal, a withdrawing partner is entitled to receive any distribution to which she is entitled under the partnership agreement, subject to the amount restrictions discussed below. The partner is also entitled to receive the fair value of her interest in the limited partnership as of the date of withdrawal, based upon her right to share in distributions from the limited partnership, if the partnership agreement does not provide otherwise.

Assignment of Partnership Interest A partnership interest is a partner's share of the profits and losses of a limited partnership and the right to receive distributions of partnership assets. A partnership interest is personal property. Unless the partnership agreement provides otherwise, a partner may assign his partnership interest. An assignment does not dissolve the limited partnership. The assignee does not become a partner and may not exercise any rights of a partner: the assignment entitles the assignee only to receive, to the extent of the assignment, the assigning partner's share of distributions. However, an assignee of a partnership interest, including an assignee of a general partner, may become a limited partner if all the other partners consent or if the assigning partner, having such power provided to her in the certificate (or in the partnership agreement, under the 1985 Act), grants the assignee this right. Except as otherwise provided in the partnership agreement, a partner ceases to be a partner upon assignment of all his partnership interest.

A creditor of a partner may obtain a charging order against a partner's interest in the partnership. To the extent of the charging order, the creditor has the rights of an assignee of the partnership interest.

Profit and Loss Sharing The profits and losses are allocated among the partners as provided in the partnership agreement. If the partnership agreement makes no such provision in writing, the profits and losses are allocated on the basis of the value of the contributions each partner has actually made. Nonetheless, limited partners are usually not liable for losses beyond their capital contribution. The 1985 Act requires the agreement for sharing profits and losses to be in writing.

Distributions The partners share distributions of cash or other assets of the limited partnership as provided in writing in the partnership agreement. The RULPA allows partners to share in distributions in a proportion different from that in which they share profits. If the partnership agreement does not allocate distributions in writing, they are made on the basis of the contributions each partner actually made. A partner who becomes entitled to a distribution has the status of a creditor with respect to that distribution. A partner may not receive a distribution from a limited partnership unless the limited partnership's assets after the distribution would be sufficient to pay all of its liabilities other than liabilities to partners on account of their partnership interests.

Loans Both general and limited partners may be secured or unsecured creditors of the partnership with rights the same as those of a person who is not a partner, subject to applicable state and federal bankruptcy and fraudulent conveyance statutes.

Information The partnership must continuously maintain within the state an office at which basic organizational and financial records are kept. Each partner has the right to inspect and copy any of the partnership records.

Derivative Actions A limited partner has the right to bring an action on behalf of a limited partnership to recover a judgment in its favor if the general partners having authority to bring the action have refused to do so.

DUTIES AND LIABILITIES

The duties and liabilities of general partners in a limited partnership are quite different from those of a limited partner. A general partner is subject to all the duties and restrictions of a partner in a partnership without limited partners, whereas a limited partner is subject to few, if any, duties and enjoys limited liability.

Duties A general partner of a limited partnership has a fiduciary relationship to her general and limited partners. This fiduciary duty of the general partner is extremely important to the limited partners because of their circumscribed roles in the control and management of the business enterprise. Conversely, it remains unclear whether a limited partner owes a fiduciary duty to his general partners or to the limited partnership itself. The very limited judicial authority on this question seems to indicate that the limited partner does not.

The RULPA does not distinguish between the duty of care owed by a general partner to a general partnership and that owed by a general partner to a limited partnership. Thus, a general partner owes her partners a duty not to be grossly negligent, as discussed in Chapter 31. As in the next case, however, some courts have imposed upon general partners a higher duty of care toward limited partners. On the other hand, a limited partner owes no duty of care to a limited partnership as long as she remains a limited partner.

WYLER V. FEUER

CALIFORNIA COURT OF APPEAL, SECOND DISTRICT, DIVISION 2, 1978

85 CAL.APP.3D 392, 149 CAL.RPTR. 626

FACTS Feuer and Martin, associated as Feuer and Martin Productions, Inc. (FMPI), had been successful producers of Broadway musical comedies. Their first motion picture, Cabaret, received eight Academy Awards in 1973. In 1972, FMPI bought the motion picture and television rights to Simone Bertheaut's best-selling book about her life with her half-sister Edith Piaf. To finance a movie based on this novel, FMPI sought a substantial private investment from Wyler. In July 1973, Wyler signed a final limited partnership agreement with FMPI. The agreement stated that Wyler would provide, interest free, 100 percent financing for the proposed $1.6 million project in return for a certain portion of the profits, not to exceed 50 percent. In addition, FMPI would obtain $850,000 in production financing by September 30, 1973. The contract specifically provided that FMPI's failure to raise this amount by September 30, 1973, "shall not be deemed a breach of this agreement" and that Wyler's sole remedy would be a reduction in the producer's fee.

A year after its release in 1974, the motion picture proved less than an overwhelming success—costing $1.5 million and taking in total receipts of only $478,000. From the receipts, Wyler received $313,500 for his investment. FMPI had failed to obtain an amount even close to the required $850,000 for production financing. Wyler then sued Feuer, Martin, and FMPI for mismanagement of the limited partnership business and to recover his $1.5 million as damages. The trial court found in favor of Feuer, Martin, and FMPI.

DECISION Judgment for Feuer, Martin, and FMPI affirmed.

OPINION Fleming, J. In a limited partnership, the limited partner restricts his liability to the amount of his capital investment. In return, the limited partner surrenders the right to manage and control the partnership business. The general partner owes to the limited partner a duty of reasonable care in his management of the business. But the general partner may not be held liable to the limited partner for mistakes made or losses incurred in the good faith exercise of reasonable business judgment.

Here, Wyler proved only that the motion picture did not make money, was not sought after by distributors, and did not live up to its producer's expectations. He failed to show that Feuer and Martin's decisions and efforts breached the standards of good faith and reasonableness. Therefore, he cannot recover damages from Feuer and Martin for an investment that simply turned sour.

INTERPRETATION A general partner is not liable for business losses if he or she conducts the business prudently and in good faith.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the general partners act ethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What standard of care should the general partners owe to the limited partners? Explain.

Liabilities One of the most appealing features of a limited partnership is the limited personal liability it offers to limited partners. Limited liability means that a limited partner who has paid her contribution has no further liability to the limited partnership or its creditors. Thus, if a limited partner buys a 25 percent share of a limited partnership for $50,000 and does not forfeit limited liability, her liability is limited to the $50,000 contributed, even if the partnership suffers losses of $500,000.

This protection is subject to three conditions discussed earlier: (1) that the partnership has substantially complied in good faith with the requirement that a certificate of limited partnership be filed; (2) that the surname of the limited partner does not appear in the partnership name; and

(3) that the limited partner does not take part in control of the business. In addition, if the certificate contains a false statement, anyone who suffers loss by reliance on that statement may hold liable any party to the certificate who knew the statement to be false when the certificate was executed. As long as the limited partner abides by these conditions, his liability for any and all obligations of the partnership is limited to his capital contribution.

At the same time, the general partners of a limited partnership have unlimited external liability, unless the limited partnership is a limited liability limited partnership, discussed later in this chapter. Also, any general partner who knew or should have known that the limited partnership certificate contained a false statement is liable to anyone who suffers loss by reliance on that false statement. Moreover, a general partner who knows or should know that a statement has become false, but who does not amend the certificate within a reasonable time, is liable as well. Accordingly, it has become a common practice for limited partnerships to be formed with a corporation or other limited liability entity as the sole general partner.

Any partner to whom any part of her contribution has been returned without violation of the partnership agreement or of the limited partnership act is liable for one year to the limited partnership, to the extent necessary to pay creditors who extended credit during the period the partnership held the contribution. In contrast, any partner to whom any part of her contribution was returned in violation of the partnership agreement or the limited partnership act is liable to the limited partnership for six years for the amount of the contribution wrongfully returned.

Practical Advice

Consider using a corporation as the sole general partner; then no natural person will be subject to unlimited, personal liability.

DISSOLUTION

As with a general partnership, extinguishing a limited partnership involves three steps: (1) dissolution, (2) winding up or liquidation, and (3) termination. The causes of dissolution and the priorities in distributing the assets, however, differ somewhat from those in a general partnership.

Causes In a limited partnership, the limited partners have no right or power to dissolve the partnership, except by court decree. The death or bankruptcy of a limited partner does not dissolve the partnership. The RULPA specifies the events that will trigger a dissolution, after which the partnership affairs must be liquidated: (1) the expiration of the time period specified in the certificate; (2) the happening of events specified in writing in the partnership agreement; (3) the unanimous written consent of all the partners; (4) the withdrawal of a general partner, unless either (a) there is at least one other general partner and the written provisions of the partnership agreement permit the remaining general partners to continue the business or (b) within ninety days all partners agree in writing to continue the business; or (5) a decree of judicial dissolution, which may be granted whenever it is not reasonably practicable to carry on the business in conformity with the partnership agreement. A general partner's withdrawal includes his retirement, the assignment of all his general partnership interest, removal, bankruptcy, death, and adjudication of incompetency. A certificate of cancellation must be filed when the limited partnership dissolves and winding up commences.

Winding Up Unless otherwise provided in the partnership agreement, the general partners who have not wrongfully dissolved the limited partnership may wind up its affairs. The limited partners may wind up the limited partnership if the general partners all have wrongfully dissolved the partnership. But, by showing cause, any partner, his legal representative, or his assignee may obtain a winding up by the court.

Distribution of Assets The priorities in distributing the assets of a limited partnership are as follows:

1. to creditors, including partners who are creditors except with respect to liabilities for distributions;
2. to partners and ex-partners in satisfaction of liabilities for unpaid distributions;

CONCEPT REVIEW 33 - 1

Comparison of General and Limited Partners

	General Partner	Limited Partner
Control	Has all the rights and powers of a partner in a partnership without limited partners	Has no right to take part in management or control
Liability	Unlimited	Limited, unless partner takes part in control or partner's name is used
Agency	Is an agent of the partnership	Is not an agent of the partnership
Fiduciary Duty	Yes	No
Duty of Care	Yes	No

3. to partners for the return of their contributions, except as otherwise agreed; and
4. to partners for their partnership interests in the proportions in which they share in distributions, except as otherwise agreed.

General and limited partners rank equally unless the partnership agreement provides otherwise.

Limited Liability Companies

A limited liability company (LLC) is another form of unincorporated business association. Prior to 1990, only two states had statutes permitting LLCs. Now all states have enacted LLC statutes. Until 1995, there was no uniform statute on which states might base their LLC legislation, and only a few states have adopted the Uniform Limited Liability Company Act (ULLCA), which was amended in 1996. (In 2006, the Revised ULLCA was completed but to date only two states have adopted it. The Revised ULLCA will not be covered in this chapter.) Therefore, the enabling legislation varies from state to state. Nevertheless, the LLC statutes generally share certain characteristics.

A limited liability company is a noncorporate business organization that provides limited liability to all of its owners (members) and permits all of its members to participate in management of the business. It may elect not to be a separate taxable entity, in which case only the members are taxed. (Publicly traded LLCs, however, are subject to corporate income taxation.) If an LLC has only one member, it will be taxed as a sole proprietorship, unless separate entity tax treatment is elected. Thus, the LLC provides many of the advantages of a general partnership plus limited liability for all its members. Its benefits outweigh those of a limited partnership in that all members of an LLC not only enjoy limited liability but also may participate in management and control of the business. (See Concept Review 31.1.) LLCs have become the most popular and widely used unincorporated business form that provides limited liability for its members. The most frequent use of LLCs has been in real estate transactions (about one-half of all LLCs), professional services, construction, finance, and retail. Ownership interests in an LLC may be considered to be securities, especially interests in those LLCs operated by managers. If a particular LLC interest is considered a security, its sale would be subject to state and federal securities regulation, as discussed in Chapter 40.

FORMATION

The formation of an LLC requires substantial compliance with the state's LLC statute. All states permit an LLC to have only one member. Once formed, an LLC is a separate legal entity that is distinct from its members, who are normally not liable for its debts and obligations. An LLC can contract in its own name and is generally permitted to carry on any "lawful purpose," although some statutes restrict the permissible activities of LLCs.

Filing The LLC statutes generally require the central public filing of articles of organization in a designated state office. The states vary regarding the information they require the articles to include; but all require at least the following: (1) the name of the firm, (2) the address of the principal place of business or registered office, and (3) the name and address of the agent for service of process. Most LLC statutes provide that the acceptance for filing is conclusive evidence that the LLC has been properly formed, except against the state in an involuntary dissolution or certificate revocation proceeding. Most LLC statutes require the articles to state whether the LLC will be managed by managers, who may, but need not, be members. Most states provide that LLCs have perpetual existence unless the members agree otherwise. The articles of organization may be amended by filing articles of amendment. The articles of organization may be amended by filing articles of amendment. In most states, LLCs must file annual reports with the state.

Name LLC statutes generally require the name of the LLC to include the words "limited liability company" or the abbreviation "LLC." A number of states also permit the use of the name "limited company" and the abbreviation "LC." The name of the LLC must be distinguishable from other firms doing business within the state.

Contribution The contribution of a member to an LLC may be cash, property, services rendered, a promissory note, or other obligation to contribute cash, property, or to perform services. Most LLC statutes require both a written agreement to make a contribution and a written record of contributions. Members are liable to the LLC for failing to make an agreed contribution.

Operating Agreement The members of most LLCs adopt an operating agreement, which is the basic contract among the members governing the affairs of an LLC and stating the various rights and duties of the members and any managers. The operating agreement is subordinate to federal and state law. LLC statutes generally do not require the operating agreement to be in writing, although this is strongly recommended. In addition, some statutes permit modification of certain statutory rules to be only by written provision in an operating agreement. Unless the operating agreement provides otherwise, the members may amend it only by unanimous consent.

Foreign Limited Liability Companies An LLC is considered “foreign” in any state other than that in which it was formed. LLC statutes typically provide that the laws of the state in which a foreign LLC is organized govern its organization, its internal affairs, and the liability of its members and managers. Foreign limited liability companies must register with the secretary of state before transacting any business in a state. Any foreign limited liability company transacting business without so registering may not bring enforcement actions in the state’s courts until it registers, although it may defend itself in the state’s courts.

Practical Advice

To obtain limited liability as a member of a limited liability company, make sure that the LLC has been properly organized.

RIGHTS OF MEMBERS

A member has no property interest in property owned by the LLC. On the other hand, a member does have an interest in the LLC, which is personal property. A member’s interest in the LLC includes two components:

1. the financial interest, which is the right to share profits and to receive distributions, and
2. the management interest, which consists of all other rights granted to a member by the LLC operating agreement and the LLC statute. The management interest typically includes the right to manage, vote, obtain information, and bring enforcement actions.

Profit and Loss Sharing The LLC’s operating agreement determines how the partners allocate the profits and losses. If the LLC’s operating agreement makes no such provision, the profits and losses are typically allocated on the basis of the value of the members’ contributions. The ULLCA’s default rule and a few states follow the partnership model under which profits are divided equally.

Distributions LLC statutes do not provide LLC members the right to distributions before withdrawal from the LLC. Therefore, the members share distributions of cash or other assets of an LLC as provided in the operating agreement. If the LLC’s operating agreement does not allocate distributions, they are typically made on the basis of the contributions each member made. Almost all LLC statutes give creditors a remedy against members who receive wrongful distributions and many also impose liability on members and managers who approved the wrongful distributions. The statutes vary in defining what constitutes a wrongful distribution, but most make a distribution wrongful if the LLC is insolvent or if the distribution would make the LLC insolvent.

Withdrawal Some statutes permit a member to withdraw and demand payment of her interest upon giving the notice specified in the statute or the LLC’s operating agreement. Some of the statutes permit the operating agreement to deny members the right to withdraw from the LLC.

Management Nearly all LLC statutes provide that, in the absence of a contrary agreement, each member has equal rights in the management of the LLC. All LLC statutes permit LLCs to be managed by one or more managers who may, but need not, be members. In a member-managed LLC, the members have actual and apparent authority to bind the LLC. In a manager-managed LLC, the managers have this authority, while the members have no actual or apparent authority to bind the manager-managed LLC. Most statutes require a publicly filed document to elect a manager-managed structure; a few statutes permit the operating agreement to make that election.

TAGHIPOUR V. JEREZ

SUPREME COURT OF UTAH, 2002
2002 UT 74, 52 P.3D 1252

<http://www.utcourts.gov/opinions/supopin/taghip-1.htm>

FACTS Namvar Taghipour, Danesh Rahemi, and Edgar Jerez formed a limited liability company (the LLC), on August 30, 1994, to purchase and develop a parcel of real estate. The LLC’s articles of organization designated Jerez as the LLC’s manager. In addition, the written operating agreement among the members of the LLC provided: “No loans may be contracted on behalf of the [LLC] ... unless authorized by a resolution of the members.”

On August 31, 1994, the LLC acquired the intended real estate. On January 10, 1997, Jerez, without the knowledge of the LLC’s other members, entered into a loan agreement on behalf of the LLC with Mount Olympus.

According to the loan agreement, Mount Olympus lent the LLC $25,000 and, as security for the loan, Jerez executed and delivered a trust deed on the LLC's real estate property. Mount Olympus then dispensed $20,000 to Jerez and retained the $5,000 balance to cover various fees. In making the loan, Mount Olympus did not investigate Jerez's authority to enter into the loan agreement beyond determining that Jerez was the manager of the LLC.

Jerez absconded with the $20,000. The LLC never made payments on the loan, since it was unaware of the loan, and consequently defaulted. Mount Olympus then foreclosed on the LLC's property giving notice of the default and pending foreclosure sale to only Jerez.

On June 18, 1999, Namvar Taghipour, Danesh Rahemi, and the LLC (collectively, Taghipour) filed suit against Mount Olympus and Jerez seeking that the loan agreement and the foreclosure be declared invalid because Jerez lacked the authority to bind the LLC. Mount Olympus moved to dismiss asserting that the loan agreement documents are valid and binding on the LLC since they were signed by the LLC's manager. Utah Code section 48-2b-127(2) provides Instruments and documents providing for the acquisition, mortgage, or disposition of property of the limited liability company shall be valid and binding upon the limited liability company if they are executed by one or more managers of a limited liability company having a manager or managers or if they are executed by one or more members of a limited liability company in which management has been retained by the members.

The trial court granted Mount Olympus' motion to dismiss. Taghipour appealed to the Utah Court of Appeals. Taghipour argued that the trial court failed to consider Utah Code section 48-2b-125(2)(b), which provides that a manager's authority to bind a limited liability company can be limited by the operating agreement.

The Utah Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court, concluding that the plain language of section 48-2b-127(2) provided no limitation on a manager's authority to execute certain documents and bind a limited liability company. The Supreme Court of Utah granted Taghipour petition for certiorari.

DECISION Judgment is affirmed.

OPINION Russon, J. To determine whether the loan agreement in this case is valid and binding on the LLC, it must first be determined whether this case is governed by section 48-2b-127(2), which makes certain kinds of documents binding on a limited liability company when executed by a manager, or section 48-2b-125(2)(b), which provides that a manager's authority to bind a limited liability company can be limited or eliminated by an operating agreement.

When two statutory provisions purport to cover the same subject, the legislature's intent must be considered in determining which provision applies. [Citation.] To determine that intent, our rules of statutory construction provide that "when two statutory provisions conflict in their operation, the provision more specific in application governs over the more general provision." [Citations.]

***

Section 48-2b-127(2) is the more specific statute because it applies only to documents explicitly enumerated in the statute, i.e., the section expressly addresses "instruments and documents" that provide "for the acquisition, mortgage, or disposition of property of the limited liability company." [Citations.] Thus, this section is tailored precisely to address the documents and instruments Jerez executed, e.g., the trust deed and trust deed note. *** Conversely, section 48-2b-125(2)(b) is more general because it addresses every situation in which a manager can bind a limited liability company.

***

In this case *** Jerez was designated as the LLC's manager in the articles of organization. Jerez, acting in his capacity as manager, executed loan agreement documents, e.g., the trust deed and trust deed note, on behalf of the LLC that are specifically covered by the above statute. [Citation.] As such, these documents are valid and binding on the LLC under section 48-2b-127(2). Therefore, the court of appeals correctly concluded that the LLC was bound by the loan agreement and, consequently, that Mt. Olympus was not liable to Taghipour for Jerez's actions.

INTERPRETATION In a manager-managed LLC, the managers have actual and apparent authority to bind the LLC.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Given this provision of Utah's LLC statute, is there any way that the members of the LLC could have protected themselves?

Voting Most of the LLC statutes specify the voting rights of members, subject to a contrary provision in an LLC's operating agreement. In some states the default rule for voting follows a partnership approach (each member has equal voting rights), while the other states take a corporate approach (voting is based on the financial interests of members). Typically, members have the right to vote on proposals to (1) adopt or amend the operating agreement, (2) admit any person as a member, (3) sell all or substantially all of the LLC's assets prior to dissolution, and (4) merge the LLC with another LLC or other business entity. Some LLC statutes authorize voting by proxy. A proxy is a member's authorization to an agent to vote for the member.

Information The LLC must keep basic organizational and financial records. Each member has the right to inspect the LLC records.

Derivative Actions A member has the right to bring an action on behalf of an LLC to recover a judgment in its favor if the managers or members with authority to bring the action have refused to do so.

Assignment of LLC Interest Unless otherwise provided in the LLC's operating agreement, a member may assign his financial interest in the LLC. An assignment does not dissolve the LLC. The assignment entitles the assignee to receive, to the extent of the assignment, only the assigning member's share of distributions. A judgment creditor of a member may obtain a charging order against the member's financial interest in the LLC. The charging order gives the creditor the same rights as an assignee to the extent of the interest charged.

The assignee does not become a member and may not exercise any rights of a member. However, an assignee of

APPLYING THE LAW

Limited Partnerships and Limited Liability Companies

Facts Rustin was a member of a limited liability company (LLC) called Global Trade, LLC, which refurbished and exported used construction equipment to foreign buyers. When Rustin and his wife divorced, they entered into a property settlement agreement, which divided up their assets and liabilities in a mutually acceptable manner. As part of this contract, Rustin assigned his membership in Global Trade to his ex-wife, Fanning. Rustin's divorce lawyer notified Global Trade of the assignment to Fanning and provided a copy of the court order approving the property settlement to Global Trade's manager. The LLC's operating agreement is silent with respect to transfers of a member's interest.

Fanning subsequently declared herself a member of Global Trade. As such, she requested detailed information about a proposed merger of Global Trade with one of its primary suppliers and demanded permission to attend a meeting of Global Trade's members, at which they anticipated discussing and voting on the proposed merger. Global Trade's members declined to give her the requested information and denied her access to the meeting at which they approved the merger.

Issue Did Rustin's assignment to Fanning make her a member of the LLC?

Rule of Law Members of an LLC own an interest in the entity, which is personal property. A member's interest in the LLC consists of two components: a financial interest and a management interest. The financial interest is a right to share profits and to receive distributions only. The management interest is the bundle of remaining member rights, including the right to manage, right to be informed, and right to vote. Members may assign their financial interest unless the operating agreement provides otherwise. On the other hand, members may assign their management interest only if the operating agreement expressly provides members that right. Otherwise, an assignee of an interest in an LLC will become a member only if the remaining members consent to admit her.

Application As a member of Global Trade, LLC, Rustin had two distinct membership interests—the financial interest and the management interest. Because of the nature of LLCs, both of these membership rights are necessarily shaped and constrained by the terms of the relevant operating agreement and state LLC statute. In this case, the operating agreement said nothing about transfers of members' interests. Therefore, by default, Rustin's assignment is only of his financial interest.

This result is reinforced by the fact that, with notice of Rustin's assignment to her, the members denied Fanning access to their meeting. An assignee of a financial interest in an LLC, like Fanning, can acquire a management interest if the other members of the LLC consent to her membership. Here, it is unclear whether the members formally voted on the question of whether Fanning should be admitted to the LLC. Nonetheless, because they denied her request for information and excluded her from the merger meeting, it is apparent that they are unwilling to consent to her admission as a member.

Conclusion Fanning did not become a member of Global Trade, LLC, by virtue of Rustin's assignment. Instead, she gained only the right to Rustin's share of distributions from the LLC.

a financial interest in an LLC may acquire the other rights by being admitted as a member of the company by all the remaining members. (Some states allow admission by majority vote.) In most states this unanimous acceptance rule is now a default rule, and the operating agreement may eliminate or modify it. For example, the ULLCA provides, “A transferee of a [financial] interest may become a member of a limited liability company if and to the extent that the transferor gives the transferee the right in accordance with authority described in the operating agreement or all other members consent.”

DUTIES

As with general partnerships and limited partnerships, the duties of care and loyalty also apply to LLCs. In a number of states, the LLC statute expressly imposes these duties. In other states, the common law imposes these duties. Some statutes also expressly impose an obligation of good faith and fair dealing. Who has these duties in an LLC depends on whether the LLC is a manager-managed LLC (analogous to a limited partnership) or a member-managed LLC (analogous to a partnership).

Manager-Managed LLCs Most LLC statutes impose upon the managers of an LLC a duty of care. In some states, this is a duty to refrain from grossly negligent, reckless, or intentional conduct; in other states, it is a duty to act in good faith and as a prudent person would in similar circumstances. Managers also have a fiduciary duty, although the statutes vary in how they specify that duty. Usually, members of manager-managed LLCs have no duties to the LLC or its members by reason of being a member.

Member-Managed LLCs Members of member-managed LLCs have the same duties of care and loyalty that managers have in manager-managed LLCs.

Practical Advice

Recognize that your rights and duties as a member of a limited liability company depend on whether the LLC is member managed or manager managed.

LIABILITIES

One of the most appealing features of an LLC is the limited personal liability it offers to all of its members and managers. Statutes typically provide that no member or manager of an LLC shall be obligated personally for any debt, obligation, or liability of the LLC solely by reason of being a member or acting as a manager of the LLC. The limitation on liability, however, will not affect the liability of a member or manager who committed the wrongful act giving rise to the liability. A member or manager is also personally liable for any LLC obligations guaranteed by the member or manager.

As mentioned earlier, a member who fails to make an agreed contribution is liable to the LLC for the deficiency. Moreover, under the great majority of statutes, any member who receives a distribution or return of her contribution in violation of the LLC’s operating agreement or the LLC act is liable to the LLC for the amount of the contribution wrongfully returned. Under a few of the statutes, even members who receive a return of their capital contribution without violating the LLC agreement or the LLC act remain liable to the LLC for a specified time to the extent necessary to pay creditors.

ESTATE OF COUNTRYMAN V. FARMERS COOP. ASS'N

SUPREME COURT OF IOWA, 2004

http://www.judicial.state.ia.us/supreme\_court/recent\_opinions/20040512/02-0906.asp

FACTS In the afternoon of September 6, 1999, an explosion leveled the home of Jerry Usovsky in Richland, Iowa, killing seven people who had gathered in the home to celebrate the Labor Day holiday. Six others were injured, some seriously. The likely cause of the explosion was stray propane gas. The survivors and executors of the estates of those who died filed a lawsuit based on negligence, breach of warranty, and strict liability against a number of defendants, including Iowa Double Circle, L.C. (Double Circle) and Farmers Cooperative Association of Keota (Keota).

Double Circle, is an Iowa limited liability company (LLC). It is a supplier of propane and delivered propane to Usovsky's home prior to the explosion. Keota is one of two members in Double Circle. It owns a 95 percent interest in the company. The other member is Farmland Industries, Inc. (Farmland Industries), a regional cooperative. Keota is a farm cooperative that provides a variety of farm products and services to area farmers. It is a member of Farmland Industries and is managed by Dave Hopscheidt (Hopscheidt). The executive committee of Keota's board of directors serves as the board of directors of Double Circle, along with a representative of Farmland Industries. Keota provides managerial services to Double Circle, pursuant to a management agreement between Keota and Double Circle. Keota's duties under the agreement include "human resource and safety management." Hopscheidt oversees the daily operations of both Keota and Double Circle. However, Keota and Double Circle operate as separate entities and maintain separate finances. The plaintiffs alleged that Keota participated in the claimed wrongdoing through the management decisions it made in consumer safety matters.

The trial court found that plaintiffs failed to produce any facts to show that Keota engaged in conduct separate from its duties as director or manager of Double Circle. Consequently, it concluded Keota was protected as a matter of law from personal liability for claims of wrongful conduct attributable to Double Circle and granted summary judgment for Keota. Plaintiffs appealed.

DECISION Summary judgment is reversed and case remanded.

OPINION Cady, J. The limited liability company, "LLC" as it is now known, is a hybrid business entity that is considered to have the attributes of a partnership for federal income tax purposes and the limited liability protections of a corporation. [Citation.] As such, it provides for the operational advantages of a partnership by allowing the owners, called members, to participate in the management of the business. [Citation.] Yet, the members and managers are protected from liability in the same manner shareholders, officers, and directors of a corporation are protected. [Citation.]

The LLC *** has now been adopted by statute in every state in the nation. [Citation.] Iowa joined the trend in 1992 with the passage of the Iowa Limited Liability Company Act (ILLCA). [Citation.] The ILLCA, among other features, permits the owners or members to centralize management in one or more managers or reserve all management powers to themselves. [Citations.]

Although the tax treatment of an LLC has been largely resolved, the contours of the limited liability of an LLC are less certain. [Citation.] Only a few courts have specifically addressed the issue of tort liability. ***

The[se] rules of liability derived from [The ILLCA] have been summarized as follows:

Sections *** of the Act generally provide that a member or manager of a limited liability company is not personally liable for acts or debts of the company solely by reason of being a member or manager, except in the following situations: (1) the ILLCA expressly provides for the person's liability; (2) the articles of organization provide for the person's liability; (3) the person has agreed in writing to be personally liable; (4) the person participates in tortious conduct; or (5) a shareholder of a corporation would be personally liable in the same situation, except that the failure to hold meetings and related formalities shall not be considered.

[Citation.]

*** While liability of members and managers is limited, the statute clearly imposes liability when they participate in tortious conduct. [Citation.] This approach is compatible with the longstanding approach to liability in corporate settings, where, under general agency principles, corporate officers and directors can be liable for their torts even when committed in their capacity as an officer. [Citations.] ***

We acknowledge that the "participation in tortious conduct" standard would not impose tort liability on a manager for merely performing a general administrative duty. [Citations.] There must be some participation.

[Citation.] The participation standard is consistent with the principle that members or managers are not liable based only on their status as members or managers. [Citation.] Instead, liability is derived from individual activities. Yet, a manager who takes part in the commission of a tort is liable even when the manager acts on behalf of a corporation. [Citation.] The ILLCA does not insulate a manager from liability for participation in tortious conduct merely because the conduct occurs within the scope and role as a manager. *** The limit on liability created for members and managers of LLCs in [citation] means members and managers are not liable for company torts “solely by reason of being a member or manager” of an LLC. [Citation.] The phrase “solely by reason of” refers to liability based upon membership or management status. It does not distinguish between conduct of a member or manager that may be separate and independent from the member or management role. Thus, it is not inconsistent to protect a member or manager from vicarious liability, while imposing liability when the member or manager participates in a tort. Liability of members of an LLC is limited, but not to the extent claimed by Keota.

We conclude that Keota is not protected from liability if it participated in tortious conduct in performing its duties as manager of Double Circle. ***

INTERPRETATION Members and managers of an LLC are not liable for company torts solely by reason of being a member or manager of an LLC, but a member or manager of an LLC who takes part in the commission of a tort is liable even when the member or manager acts on behalf of the LLC.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What can members and managers of LLCs do to limit their personal liability for acting on behalf of the LLC? Explain.

DISSOLUTION

LLC statutes generally provide that an LLC will automatically dissolve upon

1. the expiring of the LLC’s agreed duration or the happening of any of the events specified in the articles,
2. the written consent of all the members, or
3. a decree of judicial dissolution typically on the grounds that “it is not reasonably practicable to carry on the limited liability company’s activities in conformity with the articles of organization and the operating agreement” or, under some statutes, the members or managers have acted illegally, fraudulently, or oppressively.

LLC statutes require a public filing in connection with dissolution. For example, after winding up the company, the ULLCA and some LLC statutes provide for the filing of articles of termination stating (1) the name of the company, (2) the date of the dissolution, and (3) that the company’s business has been wound up and the legal existence of the company has been terminated. Other statutes require either (1) a public filing of the intent to dissolve at the time of dissolution or (2) filings at both the time of dissolution and after winding up.

Dissociation Dissociation means that a member has ceased to be associated with the company and includes voluntary withdrawal, death, incompetence, expulsion, or bankruptcy. Initially, many LLC statutes required an LLC to be dissolved upon the dissociation of a member. Most statutes permitted the nondissociating members by unanimous consent to continue the LLC after a member dissociates. Some allowed continuation by majority vote. Although some states still retain these provisions, an increasing number of states (currently about half) and the amended ULLCA have eliminated a member’s dissociation as a mandatory cause of dissolution.

Winding Up An LLC continues after dissolution only for the purpose of winding up its business, which involves completing unfinished business, collecting debts, taking inventory, reducing assets to cash, paying creditors, and distributing the remaining assets to the members. During this period, the fiduciary duties of members and managers continue.

Authority Upon dissolution, the actual authority of a member or manager to act for the LLC terminates, except so far as is appropriate to wind up LLC business. Actual authority to wind up includes the authority to complete existing contracts, to collect debts, to sell LLC assets, and to pay LLC obligations. In addition, some statutes expressly provide that after dissolution, members and managers continue to have apparent authority to bind the company that they had prior to dissolution provided that the third party did not have notice of the dissolution.

Distribution of Assets Most statutes provide default rules for distributing the assets of an LLC as follows:

1. to creditors, including members and managers who are creditors, except with respect to liabilities for distributions;
2. to members and former members in satisfaction of liabilities for unpaid distributions, except as otherwise agreed;

3. to members for the return of their contributions, except as otherwise agreed; and
4. to members for their LLC interests in the proportions in which members share in distributions, except as otherwise agreed.

Protection of Creditors Many LLC statutes establish procedures to safeguard the interests of the LLC's creditors. Such procedures typically include the required mailing of notice of dissolution to known creditors, a general publication of notice, and the preservation of claims against the LLC for a specified time. For example, the ULLCA provides that a claim against the LLC is barred unless a proceeding to enforce the claim is commenced within five years after publication of the notice of dissolution.

MERGERS AND CONVERSIONS

Most LLC statutes expressly provide for mergers. A merger of two or more entities is the combination of all of their assets. One of the entities, known as the surviving entity, receives title to all the assets. The other party or parties to the merger, known as the merged entity or entities, is merged into the surviving entity and ceases to exist as a separate entity. Thus, if Alpha LLC and Beta LLC combine into Alpha LLC, Alpha is the surviving LLC and Beta is the merged LLC. The ULLCA provides that an LLC may be merged with or into one or more LLCs, corporations, partnerships, limited partnerships, or other entities.

The LLC statutes vary with respect to the voting rights of the members. Some provide for a majority or unanimous vote; others leave it to the operating agreement. Some statutes require the filing of articles of merger; others require that a merged LLC file articles of dissolution. Upon the required filing the merger is effective, and the separate existence of each merged entity terminates. All property owned by each of the merged entities vests in the surviving entity, and all debts, liabilities, and other obligations of each merged entity become the obligations of the surviving entity.

Many LLC statutes provide for the conversion of another business entity into an LLC. LLC statutes and other business association statutes also provide for an LLC to be converted into another business entity. The converted entity remains the same entity that existed before the conversion.

LIMITED LIABILITY PARTNERSHIPS

All of the states have enacted statutes enabling the formation of limited liability partnerships (LLPs). Until 1997

there was no uniform LLP statute, so the enabling statutes varied from state to state. In 1997 the Revised Uniform Partnership Act (RUPA) was amended to add provisions enabling general partnerships to elect to become LLPs, and more than thirty states have adopted this version of the RUPA. A registered limited liability partnership is a general partnership that, by making the statutorily required filing, limits the liability of its partners for some or all of the partnership's obligations.

Formalities To become an LLP, a general partnership must file with the secretary of state an application containing specified information. The RUPA requires the partnership to file a statement of qualification. Most of the statutes require only a majority of the partners to authorize registration as an LLP; others require unanimous approval. Some statutes require renewal of registrations annually; other statutes require periodic reports; and a few require no renewal. The RUPA requires filing annual reports. Some statutes require a new filing after any change in membership of the partnership, but a few of the statutes do not. The RUPA does not.

Designation All statutes require LLPs to designate themselves as such. Most statutes require the name of the LLP to include the words "limited liability partnership" or "registered limited liability partnership," or the abbreviation "LLP" or "RLLP." Most statutes provide that the laws of the jurisdiction under which a foreign LLP is registered shall govern its organization, internal affairs, and the liability and authority of its partners. Many, but not all, of the statutes require a foreign LLP to register or obtain a certificate of authenticity. The RUPA requires a foreign LLP to qualify and file annual reports.

Liability Limitation LLP statutes have taken three different approaches to limiting the liability of partners for the partnership's obligations. The earliest statutes limited liability only for negligent acts; they retain unlimited liability for all other obligations. The next generation of statutes extended limited liability to any partnership tort or contract obligation that arose from negligence, malpractice, wrongful acts, or misconduct committed by any partner, employee, or agent of the partnership. Unlimited liability remained for ordinary contract obligations, such as those owed to suppliers, lenders, and landlords. The first two generations of LLP statutes are called "partial shield" statutes. Many of the more recent statutes, including the RUPA, have provided limited liability for all debts and obligations of the partnership. These statutes are called "full shield" statutes. Most states have now adopted full shield statutes, although some states still provide only a partial shield.

CONCEPT REVIEW 33 - 3

Liability Limitations in LLPs

LLP Statutes	Limited Liability	Unlimited Liability
First Generation	Negligent acts	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• All other obligations</li> <li>• Wrongful partner</li> <li>• Supervising partner</li> </ul>
Second Generation	Tort and contract obligations arising from wrongful acts	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• All other obligations</li> <li>• Wrongful partner</li> <li>• Supervising partner</li> </ul>
Third Generation	All obligations	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• Wrongful partner</li> <li>• Supervising partner</li> </ul>

The statutes, however, generally provide that the limitation on liability will not affect the liability of (1) a partner who committed the wrongful act giving rise to the liability and (2) a partner who supervised the partner, employee, or agent of the partnership who committed the wrongful act. A partner is also personally liable for any partnership obligations guaranteed by the partner. The statutes also provide that the limitations on liability will apply only to claims that arise while the partnership was a registered LLP. Accordingly, partners would have unlimited liability for obligations that arose either before registration or after registration lapses.

Practical Advice

Professionals should consider registering their partnerships as limited liability partnerships or organizing their firms as LLPs.

LIMITED LIABILITY LIMITED PARTNERSHIPS

A limited liability limited partnership (LLLP) is a limited partnership in which the liability of the general partners has been limited to the same extent as in an LLP. A growing number of states allow limited partnerships to become LLLPs. A number of states have statutes expressly providing for LLLPs. In other states, by operation of the provision in the RULPA that a general partner in a limited partnership has the liabilities of a general partner in a general partnership, the LLP statute may provide limited liability to general partners in a limited partnership that registers as an LLLP under the LLP statute. When authorized, the general partners in an LLLP will obtain the same degree of liability limitation that general partners can achieve in LLPs. When available, a limited partnership may register as an LLLP without having to form a new organization, as would be the case in converting to an LLC.

The new revision of the RULPA promulgated in 2001, which has been adopted by at least fifteen states, provides that an LLLP “means a limited partnership whose certificate of limited partnership states that the limited partnership is a limited liability limited partnership.” The revision provides a full shield for general partners in LLLPs:

An obligation of a limited partnership incurred while the limited partnership is a limited liability limited partnership, whether arising in contract, tort, or otherwise, is solely the obligation of the limited partnership. A general partner is not personally liable ... for such an obligation solely by reason of being or acting as a general partner.

Moreover, under the revision, a limited partner cannot be held liable for the partnership debts even if he participates in the management and control of the limited partnership.

Chapter Summary

Limited Partnership

Definition of a Limited Partnership a partnership formed by two or more persons under the laws of a state and having one or more general partners and one or more limited partners

Formation a limited partnership can be formed only by substantial compliance with a state limited partnership statute

- Filing of Certificate two or more persons must file a signed certificate of limited partnership
- Name inclusion of a limited partner's surname in the partnership name in most instances will result in the loss of the limited partner's limited liability
- Contributions may be cash; property; services; or a promise to contribute cash, property, or services
- Defective Formation if no certificate is filed or if the one filed does not substantially meet the statutory requirements, the formation is defective and the limited liability of the limited partners is jeopardized
- Foreign Limited Partnerships a limited partnership is considered "foreign" in any state other than that in which it was formed

Rights a general partner in a limited partnership has all the rights and powers of a partner in a general partnership

- Control the general partners have almost exclusive control and management of the limited partnership; a limited partner who participates in the control of the limited partnership may lose limited liability
- Choice of Associates no person may be added as a general partner or a limited partner without the consent of all partners
- Withdrawal a general partner may withdraw from a limited partnership at any time by giving written notice to the other partners; a limited partner may withdraw as provided in the limited partnership certificate
- Assignment of Partnership Interest unless otherwise provided in the partnership agreement, a partner may assign his partnership interest; an assignee may become a limited partner if all other partners consent
- Profit and Loss Sharing profits and losses are allocated among the partners as provided in the partnership agreement; if the partnership agreement has no such provision, then profits and losses are allocated on the basis of the contributions each partner actually made
- Distributions the partners share distributions of cash or other assets of a limited partnership as provided in the partnership agreement
- Loans both general and limited partners may be secured or unsecured creditors of the partnership
- Information each partner has the right to inspect and copy the partnership records
- Derivative Actions a limited partner may sue on behalf of a limited partnership if the general partners refuse to bring the action

Duties and Liabilities

- Duties general partners owe a duty of care and loyalty (fiduciary duty) to the general partners, the limited partners, and the limited partnership; limited partners do not
- Liabilities the general partners have unlimited liability; the limited partners have limited liability (liability for partnership obligations only to the extent of the capital that the limited partner contributed or agreed to contribute)

Dissolution

- Causes the limited partners have neither the right nor the power to dissolve the partnership, except by decree of the court; the following events trigger a dissolution: (1) the expiration of the time period; (2) the withdrawal of a general partner, unless all partners agree to continue the business; or (3) a decree of judicial dissolution
- Winding Up unless otherwise provided in the partnership agreement, the general partners who have not wrongfully dissolved the partnership may wind up its affairs

- Distribution of Assets the priorities for distribution are as follows: (1) creditors, including partners who are creditors; (2) partners and ex-partners in satisfaction of liabilities for unpaid distributions; (3) partners for the return of contributions, except as otherwise agreed; and (4) partners for their partnership interests in the proportions in which they share in distributions, except as otherwise agreed

Limited Liability Company

Definition a limited liability company is a noncorporate business organization that provides limited liability to all of its owners (members) and permits all of its members to participate in management of the business

Formation the formation of a limited liability company requires substantial compliance with a state's limited liability company statute

- Filing the LLC statutes generally require the central filing of articles of organization in a designated state office
- Name LLC statutes generally require the name of the LLC to include the words "limited liability company" or the abbreviation "LLC"
- Contribution the contribution of a member to a limited liability company may be cash, property, services rendered, a promissory note, or other obligation to contribute cash or property, or to perform services
- Operating Agreement is the basic contract governing the affairs of a limited liability company and stating the various rights and duties of the members
- Foreign Limited Liability Companies a limited liability company is considered "foreign" in any state other than that in which it was formed

Rights of Members a member's interest in the LLC includes the financial interest (the right to distributions) and the management interest (which consists of all other rights granted to a member by the LLC operating agreement and the LLC statute)

- Profit and Loss Sharing the LLC's operating agreement determines how the partners allocate the profits and losses; if the LLC's operating agreement makes no such provision, the profits and losses are typically allocated on the basis of the value of the members' contributions
- Distributions the members share distributions of cash or other assets of a limited liability company as provided in the operating agreement; if the LLC's operating agreement does not allocate distributions, they are typically made on the basis of the contributions each member made
- Withdrawal a member may withdraw and demand payment of her interest upon giving the notice specified in the statute or the LLC's operating agreement
- Management in the absence of a contrary agreement, each member has equal rights in the management of the LLC; but LLCs may be managed by one or more managers who may be members
- Voting LLC statutes usually specify the voting rights of members, subject to a contrary provision in an LLC's operating agreement
- Information LLCs must keep basic organizational and financial records; each member has the right to inspect the LLC records
- Derivative Actions a member has the right to bring an action on behalf of a limited liability company to recover a judgment in its favor if the managers or members with authority to bring the action have refused to do so
- Assignment of LLC Interest unless otherwise provided in the LLC's operating agreement, a member may assign his financial interest in the LLC; an assignee of a financial interest in an LLC may acquire the other rights by being admitted as a member of the company if all the remaining members consent or the operating agreement so provides

Duties

- Manager-Managed LLCs the managers of manager-managed LLCs have a duty of care and loyalty; usually, members of a manager-managed LLC have no duties to the LLC or its members by reason of being a member

- Member-Managed LLCs members of member-managed LLCs have the same duties of care and loyalty that managers have in manager-managed LLCs

Liabilities no member or manager of a limited liability company is obligated personally for any debt, obligation, or liability of the limited liability company solely by reason of being a member or acting as a manager of the limited liability company

Dissolution an LLC will automatically dissolve upon (1) in some states the dissociation of a member, (2) the expiration of the LLC's agreed duration or the happening of any of the events specified in the articles, (3) the written consent of all the members, or (4) a decree of judicial dissolution

- Dissociation means that a member has ceased to be associated with the company and includes voluntary withdrawal, death, incompetence, expulsion, or bankruptcy
- Winding Up completing unfinished business, collecting debts, and distributing assets to creditors and members; also called liquidation
- Authority the actual authority of a member or manager to act for the LLC terminates, except so far as may be appropriate to wind up LLC affairs; apparent authority continues unless notice of the dissolution is given to a third party
- Distribution of Assets the default rules for distributing the assets of a limited liability company are (1) to creditors, including members and managers who are creditors, except with respect to liabilities for distributions; (2) to members and former members in satisfaction of liabilities for unpaid distributions, except as otherwise agreed; (3) to members for the return of their contributions, except as otherwise agreed; and (4) to members for their limited liability company interests in the proportions in which members share in distributions, except as otherwise agreed

Mergers

- Definition the combination of the assets of two or more business entities into one of the entities
- Effect the surviving entity receives title to all of the assets of the merged entities and assumes all of their liabilities; the merged entities cease to exist

Other Unincorporated Business Associations

Limited Liability Partnership is a general partnership that, by making the statutorily required filing, limits the liability of its partners for some or all of the partnership's obligations

- Formalities most statutes require only a majority of the partners to authorize registration as an LLP; others require unanimous approval
- Designation the name of the LLP must include the words "limited liability partnership" or "registered limited liability partnership," or the abbreviation "LLP"
- Liability Limitation some statutes limit liability only for negligent acts; others limit liability to any partnership tort or contract obligation that arose from negligence, malpractice, wrongful acts, or misconduct committed by any partner, employee, or agent of the partnership; most provide limited liability for all debts and obligations of the partnership

Limited Liability Limited Partnership is a limited partnership in which the liability of the general partners has been limited to the same extent as in an LLP

Questions

1. John Palmer and Henry Morrison formed the limited partnership of Palmer & Morrison for the management of the Huntington Hotel. The limited partnership agreement provided that Palmer would contribute $400,000 and be a general partner and that Morrison would contribute $300,000 and be a limited partner. Palmer was to manage the dining and cocktail rooms, and Morrison was to manage the rest of the hotel. Nanette, a popular French singer who knew nothing of the limited partnership affairs, appeared for four weeks in the Blue Room at the hotel and was not paid her fee of $8,000. Subsequently, the limited partnership became insolvent. Nanette sued Palmer and Morrison for $8,000.

- a. For how much, if anything, are Palmer and Morrison liable?
  - b. If Palmer and Morrison had formed a limited liability limited partnership, for how much, if anything, would Palmer and Morrison be liable?
  - c. If Palmer and Morrison had formed a limited liability company with each as members, for how much, if anything, would Palmer and Morrison be liable?
  - d. If Palmer and Morrison had formed a limited liability partnership with each as general partners, for how much, if anything, would Palmer and Morrison be liable?
2. A limited partnership was formed consisting of Webster as the general partner and Stevens and Stewart as the limited partners. The limited partnership was organized in strict compliance with the limited partnership statute. Stevens was employed by the partnership as a purchasing agent. Stewart personally guaranteed a loan made to the partnership. Both Stevens and Stewart consulted with Webster about partnership business, voted on a change in the nature of the partnership business, and disapproved an amendment to the partnership agreement proposed by Webster. The partnership experienced serious financial difficulties, and its creditors seek to hold Webster, Stevens, and Stewart personally liable for the debts of the partnership. Who, if any, is personally liable?
  3. Fox, Dodge, and Gilbey agreed to become limited partners in Palatine Ventures, a limited partnership. In a signed writing each agreed to contribute $20,000. Fox's contribution consisted entirely of cash; Dodge contributed $12,000 in cash and gave the partnership her promissory note for $8,000; and Gilbey's contribution was his promise to perform two hundred hours of legal services for the partnership.
    - a. What liability, if any, do Fox, Dodge, and Gilbey have to the partnership by way of capital contribution?
    - b. If Palatine Ventures had been formed as a limited liability company (LLC) with Fox, Dodge, and Gilbey as members, what liability, if any, would Fox, Dodge, and Gilbey have to the LLC by way of capital contribution?
  4. Madison and Tilson agree to form a limited partnership with Madison as general partner and Tilson as the limited partner, each to contribute $12,500 as capital. No papers are ever filed, and after ten months the enterprise fails with liabilities exceeding assets by $30,000. Creditors of the partnership seek to hold Madison and Tilson personally liable for the $30,000. Explain whether the creditors will prevail.
5. Kraft is a limited partner of Johnson Enterprises, a limited partnership. As provided in the limited partnership agreement, Kraft decided to leave the partnership and demanded that her capital contribution of $20,000 be returned. At this time, the partnership assets were $150,000 and liabilities to all creditors totaled $140,000. The partnership returned to Kraft her capital contribution of $20,000.
    - a. What liability, if any, does Kraft have to the creditors of Johnson Enterprises?
    - b. If Johnson Enterprises had been formed as a limited liability company, what liability, if any, would Kraft have to the creditors of Johnson Enterprises?
  6. Gordon is the only limited partner in Bushmill Ventures, a limited partnership whose general partners are Daniels and McKenna. Gordon contributed $10,000 for his limited partnership interest and loaned the partnership $7,500. Daniels and McKenna each contributed $5,000 by way of capital. After a year, the partnership is dissolved, at which time it owes $12,500 to its only creditor, Dickel, and has assets of $30,000.
    - a. How should these assets be distributed?
    - b. If Bushmill Ventures had been formed as a limited liability company with Gordon, Daniels, and McKenna as members, how should these assets be distributed?
  7. Albert, Betty, and Carol own and operate the Roy Lumber Company, a limited liability partnership (LLP). Each contributed one-third of the capital, and they share equally in the profits and losses. Their LLP agreement provides that all purchases over $2,500 must be authorized in advance by two partners and that only Albert is authorized to draw checks. Unknown to Albert or Carol, Betty purchases on the firm's account a $5,500 diamond bracelet and a $5,000 forklift and orders $5,000 worth of logs, all from Doug, who operates a jewelry store and is engaged in various activities connected with the lumber business. Before Betty made these purchases, Albert told Doug that Betty is not the log buyer. Albert refuses to pay Doug for Betty's purchases. Doug calls at the mill to collect, and Albert again refuses to pay him. Doug calls Albert an unprintable name, and Albert then punches Doug in the nose, knocking him out. While Doug is lying unconscious on the ground, an employee of Roy Lumber Company negligently drops a log on Doug's leg, breaking three bones. The firm and the three partners are completely solvent.

What are the rights of Doug against Roy Lumber Company, Albert, Betty, and Carol?

Case Problems

8. Dr. Vidricksen contributed $250,000 to become a limited partner in a Chevrolet car agency business with Thom, the general partner. Articles of limited partnership were drawn up, but no effort was made to comply with the state's statutory requirement of recording the certificate of limited partnership. In March, Vidricksen learned that, because of the failure to file, he might not have formed a limited partnership. At this time, the business developed financial difficulties and went into bankruptcy on September 11. Eight days later, Vidricksen filed a renunciation of the business's profits. Is Dr. Vidricksen a general partner?

9. Dale Fullerton was chairman of the board of Envirosearch and the sole stockholder in Westover Hills Management. James Anderson was president of AGFC. Fullerton and Anderson agreed to form a limited partnership to purchase certain property from WYORCO, a joint venture of which Fullerton was a member. The parties intended to form a limited partnership with Westover Hills Management as the sole general partner and AGFC and Envirosearch as limited partners. The certificate filed with the Wyoming secretary of state, however, listed all three companies as both general and limited partners of Westover Hills Ltd. Anderson and Fullerton later became aware of this error and filed an amended certificate of limited partnership, which correctly named Envirosearch and AGFC as limited partners only. Subsequently Westover Hills Ltd. became insolvent. What is the potential liability of Envirosearch and AGFC to creditors of the limited partnership?

NATURE AND FORMATION OF CORPORATIONS

A corporation is an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law.

CHIEF JUSTICE JOHN MARSHALL, 1819

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Identify the principal attributes and classifications of corporations.
2. Explain how a corporation is formed and the role, liability, and duties of promoters.
3. Distinguish between the statutory and common law approaches to defective formation of a corporation.
4. Explain how the doctrine of piercing the corporate veil applies to closely held corporations and parent-subsidiary corporations.
5. Identify the sources of corporate powers and explain the legal consequences of a corporation's exceeding its powers.

A corporation is an entity created by law that exists separately and distinctly from the individuals whose contributions of initiative, property, and control enable it to function. The corporation is the dominant form of business organization in the United States, accounting for 85 percent of the gross revenues of all business entities. More than 5 million domestic corporations are currently doing business in the United States, with annual revenues exceeding $20 trillion and assets of about $54 trillion. See Figure 31-1. Approximately 50 percent of American adults own stock directly or indirectly through institutional investors such as mutual funds, pension funds, banks, and insurance companies. Corporations have achieved this dominance because their attributes of limited liability, free transferability of shares, and continuity have attracted great numbers of widespread investors. Moreover, the centralized management of corporations has facilitated the development of large organizations that employ great quantities of invested capital, thereby taking advantage of economies of scale.

Use of the corporation as an instrument of commercial enterprise has made possible the vast concentrations of wealth and capital that have largely transformed this country's economy from an agrarian to an industrial one. Due to its size, power, and impact, the business corporation is a key institution not only in the American economy but also in the world power structure.

In 1946, a committee of the American Bar Association, after careful study and research, submitted a draft of a Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA). The Model Act has been amended frequently since then. Its provisions do not become law until a state enacts them, but the influence of the act has been widespread: a majority of the states adopted it in whole or in part.

In 1984, the Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) was promulgated. More than half of the states have adopted the Revised Act in whole or in part, although Delaware and seven of the ten most populous states have not adopted either the Model Act or the Revised Act. Moreover, many states have adopted selected provisions of the Revised Act. The Revised Act, as amended, will be used throughout the chapters on corporations in this text and will be referred to as the Revised Act or the RMBCA.

NATURE OF CORPORATIONS

A corporation is a creature of the state: it may be formed only by substantial compliance with a state incorporation statute. To understand corporations, it is helpful to examine the various types of corporations and their common attributes. We will discuss both of these topics in this section.

Corporate Attributes

These are the principal attributes of a corporation: (1) it is a legal entity; (2) it provides limited liability to its shareholders; (3) its shares of stock are freely transferable; (4) its existence may be perpetual; (5) its management is centralized; and it is considered, for some purposes, (6) a person and (7) a citizen. See Concept Review 31.1.

LEGAL ENTITY

A corporation is a legal entity separate from its shareholders, with rights and liabilities entirely distinct from theirs. It may sue or be sued by, as well as contract with, any other party, including any one of its shareholders. A transfer of stock in the corporation from one individual to another has no effect on the legal existence of the corporation. Title to corporate property belongs not to the shareholders but to the corporation. Even where a single individual owns all of the stock of the corporation, the shareholder and the corporation have distinct existences.

LIMITED LIABILITY

A corporation is a legal entity and is therefore liable out of its own assets for its debts. Generally, the shareholders have limited liability for the corporation's debts—their liability does not extend beyond the amount of their investment—although later in this chapter we will discuss certain circumstances under which a shareholder may be personally liable. The limitation on liability, however, will not affect the liability of a shareholder who committed the wrongful act giving rise to the liability. A shareholder is also personally liable for any corporate obligations the shareholder guarantees.

FREE TRANSFERABILITY OF CORPORATE SHARES

In the absence of contractual restrictions, shares in a corporation may be freely transferred by sale, gift, or pledge. The ability to transfer shares is a valuable right and may enhance their market value. Article 8 of the Uniform Commercial Code, Investment Securities, governs transfers of shares of stock.

PERPETUAL EXISTENCE

A corporation has perpetual existence unless otherwise stated in its articles of incorporation. Consequently, the death, withdrawal, or addition of a shareholder, director, or officer does not terminate its existence. A corporation's existence will terminate upon its dissolution or merger into another business.

CENTRALIZED MANAGEMENT

The shareholders of a corporation elect a board of directors that manages the business affairs of the corporation. The board must then appoint officers to run the day-to-day operations of the business. Because neither the directors nor the officers (collectively referred to as “management”) need be shareholders, it is entirely possible, and in large corporations quite typical, for the ownership of the corporation to be separate from its management. We will discuss the management structure of corporations in Chapter 36.

AS A PERSON

Whether a corporation is a “person” within the meaning of a constitution or statute is a matter of construction based on the intent of the lawmakers in using the word. For example, a corporation is considered a person within the provisions in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution that no “person” shall be “deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law” and in the Fourteenth Amendment provision that no state shall “deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.” A corporation also enjoys the right of a person to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures, as provided for in the Fourth Amendment. On the other hand, a corporation is not considered to be a person within the Fifth Amendment clause that protects a “person” against self-incrimination.

AS A CITIZEN

A corporation is considered a citizen for some purposes but not for others. For instance, a corporation is not a citizen as the term is used in the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides, “No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.”

A corporation is, however, regarded as a citizen of the state of its incorporation and of the state in which it has its principal office for the purpose of determining whether diversity of citizenship exists between the parties to a lawsuit, so as to provide a basis for federal court jurisdiction.

Classification of Corporations

Corporations may be classified as public or private, profit or nonprofit, domestic or foreign, publicly held or closely held, subchapter S, and professional. As you will see, these classifications are not mutually exclusive. For example, a corporation may be a closely held, professional, private, profit, domestic corporation.

PUBLIC OR PRIVATE

A public corporation is one that is created to administer a unit of local civil government, such as a county, city, town, village, school district, or park district, or one created by the United States to conduct public business, such as the Tennessee Valley Authority or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. A public corporation is usually created by specific legislation, which determines the corporation’s purpose and powers. Many public corporations are also referred to as municipal corporations.

A private corporation is founded by and composed of private persons for private purposes and has no governmental duties. A private corporation may be for profit or nonprofit.

PROFIT OR NONPROFIT

A profit corporation is one founded for the purpose of operating a business for profit from which payments are made to the corporation’s shareholders in the form of dividends.

Although a nonprofit (or not-for-profit) corporation may make a profit, the profit may not be distributed to its members, directors, or officers but must be used exclusively for the charitable, educational, or scientific purpose for which the corporation was organized. Most states have special incorporation statutes governing nonprofit corporations, most of which are patterned after the Model Non-profit Corporation Act.

DOMESTIC OR FOREIGN

A corporation is a domestic corporation in the state in which it is incorporated. It is a foreign corporation in every other state or jurisdiction. A corporation may not do business, except for acts in interstate commerce, in a state other than the state of its incorporation without the permission and authorization of the other state. Every state, however, provides for the issuance of certificates of authority, which allow foreign corporations to do business within its borders, and for the taxation of such foreign businesses. Obtaining a certificate (or “qualifying”) usually involves filing certain information with the secretary of state, paying prescribed fees, and designating a resident agent. Conduct typically requiring a certificate of authority includes maintaining an office to conduct local intrastate business, selling personal property not in interstate commerce, entering into contracts relating to local business or sales, and owning or using real estate for general corporate purposes. A single agreement or isolated transaction within a state does not constitute doing business.

A foreign corporation that transacts business without having first qualified may be subject to a number of penalties. Statutes in many states provide that an unlicensed foreign corporation doing business in the state shall not be entitled to maintain a suit in a state court until it has obtained a certificate of authority. However, the failure to obtain a certificate of authority to transact business in the state does not impair the validity of a contract entered into by the corporation and does not prevent it from defending any action or proceeding brought against it in the state. In addition, most states impose fines on corporations that do not obtain certificates, and a few states also impose fines on the corporation’s officers and directors, as well as holding them personally liable on contracts made within the state.

HAROLD LANG JEWELERS, INC. v. JOHNSON

COURT OF APPEALS OF NORTH CAROLINA, 2003

156 N.C. APP. 187, 576 S.E.2D 360; REVIEW DENIED, 357 N.C. 458, 585 S.E.2D 765

<http://www.aoc.state.nc.us/www/public/coa/opinions/2003/020429-1.htm>

FACTS Harold Lang Jewelers, Inc. (Lang), a Florida corporation, through its single employee, had sold and consigned merchandise to jewelry stores in western North Carolina, since 1970. Lang's employee came frequently to North Carolina for the purpose of transacting business. When the employee came to North Carolina, he always brought jewelry with him for delivery. When he visited jewelry stores in the state, he would either (1) make a direct sale on the spot without any confirmation from any other person or (2) consign the jewelry, also without any further confirmation or approval from any other person. When the employee took orders, he either shipped the ordered items to the business in North Carolina or personally delivered the merchandise. He also took returns of merchandise from customers in the state.

Lang filed suit in April 1999, alleging that Johnson owed it $160,322.90 plus interest for jewelry sold or consigned. Johnson answered in May 1999, asserting as one of its defenses that Lang could not sue in a North Carolina court because Lang had failed to obtain a certificate of authority to transact business in the state. The district court granted the motion and dismissed Lang's action. Lang appealed.

DECISION Affirmed.

OPINION Hudson, J. Our courts have interpreted transacting business in the state to "require the engaging in, carrying on or exercising, in North Carolina, some of the functions for which the corporation was created." [Citation.] The business done by the corporation must be of such nature and character "as to warrant the inference that the corporation has subjected itself to the local jurisdiction and is, by its duly authorized officers and agents, present within the State." [Citation.] In other words, the activities carried on by the corporation in North Carolina must be substantial, continuous, systematic, and regular. [Citation.]

Here, the trial court concluded that Lang's business activity in North Carolina was regular, continuous, and substantial such that it was transacting business in the state. ***

In sum, we conclude that the trial court's conclusions of law are adequately supported by the facts found in this case. There is ample evidence that Lang's business in this state has been regular, systematic, and extensive. Lang has been coming to North Carolina since about 1970 to sell and consign merchandise to several jewelry stores. In fact, Lang routinely came to North Carolina as frequently as twice every four weeks during some parts of the year, and each time he brought with him merchandise to deliver. Moreover, *** Lang's employee finalized the sales in North Carolina. ***

Finally, Lang contends that the trial court erred when it dismissed the action, arguing that the court should have continued the case to permit Lang to obtain the requisite certificate of authority. The applicable [N.C.] statute, [citation], does not specify the procedure in the event of failure to obtain a certificate of authority. The statute simply indicates that an action cannot be maintained unless the certificate is obtained prior to trial. [Citation.] Lang has not cited, nor have we found, a case where a continuance has been granted by a court in these circumstances. Moreover, Lang was aware that Johnson's motion was pending and could have obtained the certificate in the year and a half that passed between the filing of the motion and the court's dismissal of the case.

INTERPRETATION A foreign corporation must obtain a certificate of authority in every state in which it conducts intrastate business.

ETHICAL QUESTION Is the court's decision fair to all the parties? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the test for doing business within a state? Explain.

PUBLICLY HELD OR CLOSELY HELD

A publicly held corporation is one whose shares are owned by a large number of people and are widely traded. There is no accepted minimum number of shareholders, but any corporation required to register under the federal Securities and Exchange Act of 1934 is considered to be publicly held. In addition, corporations that have issued securities subject to a registered public distribution under the federal Securities Act of 1933 usually are also considered publicly

Business Law in Action

If you owned a business and wanted to operate it as a corporation, in what state would you incorporate? Wouldn't you choose your home state?

Then why are the following companies incorporated in Delaware, even though their headquarters are elsewhere?

- McDonald's (Oak Brook, Illinois)
- Wal-Mart (Bentonville, Arkansas)
- Microsoft (Redmond, Washington)
- Ford (Dearborn, Michigan)

Since World War I, Delaware has been the favorite state of incorporation, and more than 50 percent of all U.S. publicly traded companies and 58 percent of Fortune 500 companies are Delaware corporations, many of which reincorporated there. This situation did not come about by accident. Corporations are chartered by the states, not by the federal government, and laws of incorporation vary significantly from state to state. New Jersey, for example, was the favorite domicile of large corporations early in the twentieth century, but later fell behind Delaware, partly because it failed to update its corporation laws often enough.

Delaware purposely has made itself attractive to corporations, and the reason is money. Franchise taxes paid by Delaware corporations are a very significant source of income for that small state. According to the Delaware Department of State:

Businesses choose Delaware because we provide a complete package of incorporation services including modern and flexible corporate laws, our highly-respected Court of Chancery, a business-friendly State Government, and the customer service oriented Staff of the Delaware Division of Corporations.

Over the years Delaware's General Assembly has revised and amended the Delaware General Corporation Law to keep it clear and up to date. Delaware's courts, which have been characterized as "a judiciary of corporate specialists," are another significant attraction. Delaware judges have created a large body of case law that is "well-settled law with unique predictability" and that allows corporations to be flexible in their operations. Moreover, corporate attorneys tend to incorporate in Delaware because they are most familiar with Delaware corporate law.

Today, other states share many of Delaware's favorable provisions, but none has had so many for so long. And Delaware's great body of legal precedents has helped to give the state a head start that is hard to overcome.

held. (The federal securities laws are discussed in Chapter 40.) To distinguish publicly held corporations from other corporations, the Revised Act was amended to define the term "public corporation" as "a corporation that has shares listed on a national securities exchange or regularly traded in a market maintained by one or more members of a national securities association."

A closely held corporation (or close corporation) is one whose outstanding shares of stock are held by a small number of persons, frequently relatives or friends. In most closely held corporations, the shareholders are active in the management and control of the business. Accordingly, the shareholders, concerned about the identities of their fellow shareholders, frequently restrict the transfer of shares in order to prevent "outsiders" from obtaining the stock. Although a vast majority of corporations in the United States are closely held, they account for only a small fraction of corporate revenues and assets.

In most states, closely held corporations are subject to the general incorporation statute that governs all corporations. The Revised Act includes a number of liberalizing provisions for closely held corporations. In addition, about twenty states have enacted special legislation to accommodate the needs of closely held corporations, and a Statutory Close Corporation Supplement to the Model and Revised Acts was promulgated.

The Supplement applies only to an eligible corporation (one having fewer than fifty shareholders) that elects statutory close corporation status. A corporation may voluntarily terminate statutory close corporation status. We will discuss other provisions of the Supplement in this and other chapters.

In 1991 the Revised Act was amended to authorize shareholders in closely held corporations to adopt unanimous shareholders' agreements that depart from the statutory norms by altering (1) the governance of the corporation, (2) the allocation of the economic return from the business, and (3) other aspects of the relationship among shareholders, directors, and the corporation. Such a shareholder agreement is valid for ten years unless the agreement provides otherwise but terminates automatically if the corporation's shares become publicly traded.

Moreover, shareholder agreements bind only the shareholders and the corporation; they do not bind the state, creditors, or other third parties. These provisions will be discussed in this and other chapters.

Practical Advice

If you take a minority interest in a closely held corporation, attempt to provide adequate protection for your rights in the corporation's charter and bylaws as well as in shareholder agreements.

SUBCHAPTER S CORPORATION

Subchapter S of the Internal Revenue Code permits a corporation meeting specified requirements to elect to be taxed essentially as though it were a partnership. (Approximately 60 percent of all corporations in the United States are subchapter S corporations but they account for only 20 percent of total corporate revenues and 4 percent of total corporate assets.) Under subchapter S, a corporation's income is taxed only once at the individual shareholder level. The requirements for a corporation to elect subchapter S treatment are (1) it must be a domestic corporation; (2) it must have no more than one hundred shareholders; (3) each shareholder must be an individual, an estate, or certain types of trusts; (4) no shareholder may be a nonresident alien; and (5) it may have only one class of stock, although classes of common stock differing only in voting rights are permitted.

PROFESSIONAL CORPORATIONS

All of the states have professional association or corporation statutes that permit duly licensed professionals to practice in the corporate form. Some statutes apply to all professions licensed to practice within the state, whereas others apply only to specified professions. There is a Model Professional Corporation Supplement to the MBCA.

FORMATION OF A CORPORATION

The formation of a corporation under a general incorporation statute requires action by various groups, individuals, and state officials.

Organizing the Corporation

The procedure to organize a corporation begins with the promotion of the proposed corporation by its organizers, also known as promoters, who procure offers by interested

Business Law in Action

What is a public company? When a corporation is first formed, it is generally owned by a single person or small group of owners. At that point it is known as a "private" or "closely held" corporation. As the business expands, one of the ways it can raise needed capital is to sell additional shares of stock to the public in a process known as "going public." Usually an investment bank is engaged to analyze the prospects for a successful IPO, or initial public offering, of the company's shares. That bank or a group of banks may then agree to act as underwriters for the proposed IPO.

Since it involves the sale of securities, the IPO is strictly regulated by the federal and state securities laws as well as the rules and regulations of the U.S. Securities Exchange Commission and similar state agencies. The primary goal of these laws is to provide full and fair disclosure to the investing public about the company's financial condition and other important matters affecting investors' risk. Before shares can be issued, company financial statements and other relevant documents must be filed publicly—many of them online—so that they are easily available for potential investors to review.

Once the firm's shares have been sold to the public, it is known as a "public," "publicly held," or "publicly traded" company. Its shares can be bought and sold by investors freely, and it must now comply with a multitude of rules and regulations requiring ongoing public disclosure of important information to all existing shareholders and potential investors. Public companies, and especially those whose stock is traded on national exchanges, are also subject to significant mandates with regard to corporate governance and accounting practices.

The web of disclosure and other regulations with which a public company must comply is increasingly complex and costly. As a result, publicly held companies, especially smaller firms, are considering buying back all of their stock owned by the public and "going private" to avoid extensive regulation and its attendant expense.

persons, known as subscribers, to buy stock in the corporation, once created, and who also prepare the necessary incorporation papers. The incorporators then execute the articles of incorporation and file them with the secretary of state, who issues the charter or certificate of incorporation. Finally, the parties hold an organizational meeting.

PROMOTERS

A promoter is a person who takes the preliminary steps to organize a corporation. The promoter arranges for the capital and financing of the corporation; assembles the necessary assets, equipment, licenses, personnel, leases, and services; and attends to the actual legal formation of the corporation. On incorporation, the promoter's organizational task is finished.

Promoters' Contracts In addition to procuring subscriptions and preparing the incorporation papers, promoters often enter into contracts in anticipation of the creation of the corporation. The contracts may be ordinary agreements necessary for the eventual operation of the business, such as leases, purchase orders, employment contracts, sales contracts, or franchises. If the promoter executes these contracts in her own name and there is no further action, the promoter is liable on such contracts; the corporation, when created, is not liable. Moreover, a preincorporation contract made by a promoter in the name of the corporation and on its behalf does not bind the corporation. Before its formation, a corporation has no capacity to enter into contracts or to employ agents or representatives. After its formation, it is not liable at common law on any prior contract, even one made in its name, unless it adopts the contract expressly, impliedly, or by knowingly accepting benefits under it.

A promoter who enters into a preincorporation contract in the name of the corporation usually remains liable on that contract even if the corporation adopts it. This liability results from the rule of agency law stating that a principal, in order to be able to ratify a contract, must be in existence when the contract is made. A promoter will be relieved of liability, however, if the contract itself provides that adoption shall terminate the promoter's liability or if the promoter, the third party, and the corporation enter into a novation substituting the corporation for the promoter.

Figure 34-1 summarizes the liability of the promoter and the corporation for preincorporation contracts made in the corporation's name.

Practical Advice

As a promoter, obtain the agreement of the third party that the corporation's adoption of a preincorporation contract will terminate your liability; as a third party, carefully consider whether you should agree to such a provision.

COOPERS & LYBRAND v. FOX

COLORADO COURT OF APPEALS, DIVISION IV, 1988
758 P.2D 683

FACTS Fox met with a representative of Coopers & Lybrand (C&L), a national accounting firm, to obtain accounting services. Fox informed C&L that he was acting on behalf of a corporation he was in the process of forming, to be called "G. Fox and Partners, Inc." C&L accepted the engagement with the knowledge that the corporation was not yet in existence. C&L completed the assignment and billed Fox for a reasonable fee of $10,827. When neither Fox nor G. Fox and Partners, Inc., paid, C&L sued Fox for breach of express and implied contracts based on a theory of promoter liability. Fox insisted that he was acting as an agent for the future corporation. The trial court ruled for Fox after determining that there was no agreement that would obligate Fox individually to pay the fee. C&L appealed.

DECISION Judgment for Coopers & Lybrand.

OPINION Kelly, C. J. As a preliminary matter, we reject Fox's argument that he was acting only as an agent for the future corporation. One cannot act as the agent of a non-existent principal. [Citation.]

On the contrary, the uncontroverted facts place Fox squarely within the definition of a promoter. A promoter is one who, alone or with others, undertakes to form a corporation and to procure for it the rights, instrumentalities, and capital to enable it to conduct business. [Citations.]

When Fox first approached Coopers, he was in the process of forming G. Fox and Partners, Inc. He engaged Coopers' services for the future corporation's benefit. In addition, though not dispositive on the issue of his status as a promoter, Fox became the president, a director, and the principal shareholder of the corporation, which he funded, only nominally, with a $100 contribution. Under these circumstances, Fox cannot deny his role as a promoter.

Coopers asserts that the trial court erred in finding that Fox was under no obligation to pay Coopers' fee in the absence of an agreement that he would be personally liable. We agree.

As a general rule, promoters are personally liable for the contracts they make, though made on behalf of a corporation to be formed. [Citation.] The well-recognized exception to the general rule of promoter liability is that if the contracting party knows the corporation is not in existence but nevertheless agrees to look solely to the corporation and not to the promoter for payment, then the promoter incurs no personal liability. [Citations.] In the absence of an express agreement, the existence of an agreement to release the promoter from liability may be shown by circumstances making it reasonably certain that the parties intended to and did enter into the agreement. [Citations.]

Here, the trial court found there was no agreement, either express or implied, regarding Fox's liability. Thus, in the absence of an agreement releasing him from liability, Fox is liable.

INTERPRETATION A promoter is personally liable for the contracts he makes on behalf of a future corporation unless there is an agreement releasing him from liability.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree that a promoter should be liable when the corporation adopts a preincorporation contract? Explain.

Promoters' Fiduciary Duty The promoters of a corporation have a fiduciary relationship among themselves as well as with the corporation, its subscribers, and its initial shareholders. This duty requires good faith, fair dealing, and full disclosure to an independent board of directors. If an independent board has not been elected, full disclosure must be made to all shareholders. Accordingly, the promoters are under a duty to account for any secret profit they realize. Failure to disclose also may violate federal or state securities laws.

SUBSCRIBERS

A subscriber is a person who agrees to purchase stock in a corporation. A preincorporation subscription is an offer to purchase capital stock in a corporation yet to be formed. Courts traditionally have viewed such subscriptions in one of two ways. The majority regards a subscription as a continuing offer to purchase stock from a nonexistent entity incapable of accepting the offer until it exists. Under this view, a subscription may be revoked at any time prior to its acceptance. By comparison, a minority of jurisdictions treat a subscription as a contract among the various subscribers, making the subscription irrevocable except with all of the subscribers' consent. Most incorporation statutes have adopted an intermediate position making preincorporation subscriptions irrevocable for a stated period without regard to whether they are supported by consideration. For example, the Revised Act provides that a preincorporation subscription is irrevocable for six months, unless the subscription agreement provides a different period or all of the subscribers consent to the revocation. If the corporation accepts the subscription during the period of irrevocability, the subscription becomes a contract binding on both the subscriber and the corporation.

Practical Advice

As a preincorporation subscriber, consider how long you are willing to have your subscription be irrevocable.

A postincorporation subscription is a subscription agreement entered into after incorporation. It is treated as a contract between the subscriber and the corporation. Unlike preincorporation subscriptions, the subscriber may withdraw her offer to enter into a postincorporation subscription any time before the corporation accepts it. She cannot, however, withdraw the offer after the corporation has accepted it as the acceptance forms a contract.

Formalities of Incorporation

Although the procedure involved in organizing a corporation varies somewhat from state to state, typically the incorporators execute and deliver articles of incorporation to the secretary of state or to another designated official. The Revised Act provides that after incorporation, the board of directors named in the articles of incorporation shall hold an organizational meeting for the purpose of adopting bylaws, appointing officers, and carrying on any other business brought before the meeting. After completion of these organizational details, the corporation's business and affairs are managed by its board of directors and by its officers.

SELECTION OF NAME

Most general incorporation laws require that the name contain a word or words that clearly designate the organization as a corporation, such as corporation, company, incorporated, limited, Corp., Co., Inc., or Ltd. A corporate name must be distinguishable from the name of any domestic corporation or any foreign corporation authorized to do business within the state.

INCORPORATORS

The incorporators are the persons who sign the articles of incorporation filed in the state of incorporation with the secretary of state. Although they perform a necessary function, in many states their services as incorporators are perfunctory and short-lived, ending with the organizational meeting following incorporation. Furthermore, modern statutes have greatly relaxed the qualifications of incorporators and also have reduced the number required. The Revised Act and almost all states provide that only one person need act as the incorporator, though more may do so. The Revised Act and most states permit artificial entities to serve as incorporators. For example, the Revised Act defines a "person" to include individuals and entities, with an entity defined to include domestic and foreign corporations, not-for-profit corporations, profit and not-for-profit unincorporated associations, business trusts, estates, partnerships, and trusts.

ARTICLES OF INCORPORATION

The articles of incorporation or charter is generally a rather simple document that under the Revised Act must include the name of the corporation, the number of authorized shares, the street address of the registered office and the name of the registered agent, and the name and address of each incorporator. The Revised Act also permits the charter to include optional information such as the identities of the corporation's initial directors; corporate purposes; management of internal affairs; powers of the corporation; par value of shares; and any provision required or permitted to be set forth in the bylaws. Some optional provisions may be elected only in the charter, including cumulative voting, supermajority voting requirements, preemptive rights, and limitations on the personal liability of directors for breach of their duty of care.

To form a corporation, the charter, once drawn up, must be executed and filed with the secretary of state. The charter then becomes the basic governing document of the corporation, so long as its provisions are consistent with state and federal law. Figure 34-2 shows a sample charter.

ORGANIZATIONAL MEETING

The Revised Act and most states requires that an organizational meeting be held to adopt the new corporation’s bylaws, appoint officers, and carry on any other business brought before it. If the articles do not name the corporation’s initial directors; the incorporators hold the organizational meeting to elect directors, and either the incorporators or the directors then complete the organization of the corporation.

The bylaws are the rules and regulations that govern the internal management of a corporation. Because bylaws are necessary to the organization of the corporation, their adoption is one of the first items of business at the organizational meeting held promptly after incorporation. The bylaws may contain any provision for managing the business and regulating the affairs of the corporation that is not inconsistent with law or the articles of incorporation. Under the Revised Act, the shareholders may amend or repeal the bylaws, which, in contrast to the certificate of incorporation embodying the articles of incorporation, do not have to be publicly filed. In addition, the board of directors may amend or repeal the bylaws, unless (1) the articles of incorporation or other sections of the RMBCA reserve that power exclusively to the shareholders in whole or in part or (2) the shareholders in amending, repealing, or adopting a bylaw expressly provide that the board of directors may not amend, repeal, or reinstate that bylaw.

The Statutory Close Corporation Supplement permits close corporations to avoid adopting bylaws by including, either in a shareholder agreement or in the articles of incorporation, all the information necessary to corporate bylaws.

Practical Advice

When you have the choice of placing a provision in either the charter or the bylaws, carefully consider the advantages and disadvantages of each. You may prefer the charter for provisions that protect your interests because charter provisions prevail over bylaws provisions and are more difficult to amend.

RECOGNITION OR DISREGARD OF CORPORATENESS

Business associates choose to incorporate to obtain one or more of the corporate attributes, primarily limited liability and perpetual existence. Because a corporation is a creature of the state, such attributes are recognized when the enterprise complies with the state's requirements for incorporation. Although the formal procedures are relatively simple, errors or omissions sometimes occur. In some cases the mistakes may be trivial, such as incorrectly stating an incorporator's address in the charter; in other instances the error may be more significant, such as a complete failure to file the articles of incorporation. The consequences of procedural noncompliance depend on the seriousness of the error. Conversely, even when a corporation has been formed in strict compliance with the incorporation statute, a court may disregard the corporateness of the enterprise if justice requires.

Defective Incorporation

Although modern corporation statutes have greatly simplified incorporation procedures, defective incorporations do occur. The possible consequences of a defective incorporation include the following: (1) the state brings an action against the association for involuntary dissolution; (2) the associates are held personally liable to a third party; (3) the association asserts that it is not liable on an obligation; or (4) a third party asserts that it is not liable to the association. Corporate statutes addressing this issue have taken an approach considerably different from that of the common law.

COMMON LAW APPROACH

Under the common law, a defectively formed corporation was, under certain circumstances, accorded corporate attributes. The courts developed a set of doctrines granting corporateness to de jure (of right) corporations, de facto

(of fact) corporations, and corporations by estoppel but denying corporateness to corporations that were too defectively formed.

Corporation de Jure A corporation de jure is one that has been formed in substantial compliance with the incorporation statute and the required organizational procedure. Once a de jure corporation is formed, its existence may not be challenged by anyone, even the state in a direct proceeding for this purpose.

Corporation de Facto Although it fails to comply in some way with the incorporation statute and, hence, is not de jure, a corporation de facto is nevertheless recognized for most purposes as a corporation. A failure to form a de jure corporation may result in the formation of a de facto corporation if the following requirements are met: (1) the existence of a general corporation statute, (2) a bona fide attempt to comply with that law in organizing a corporation under the statute, and (3) the actual exercise of corporate power by conducting business in the belief that a corporation has been formed. The existence of a de facto corporation can be challenged only by the state in an action of quo warranto (“by what right”).

Corporation by Estoppel The doctrine of corporation by estoppel is distinct from that of corporation de facto. Estoppel does not create a corporation. It operates only to prevent a person or persons under the facts and circumstances of a particular case from questioning a corporation’s existence or its capacity to act or to own property. Corporation by estoppel requires a holding out by a purported corporation or its associates and reliance by a third party. In addition, application of the doctrine depends on equitable considerations. A person who has dealt with a defectively organized corporation may be precluded or estopped from denying its corporate existence if the necessary elements of holding out and reliance are present. The doctrine can be applied not only to third parties but also to the purported corporation and to the associates who held themselves out as a corporation.

Defective Corporation If the associates who purported to form a corporation fail to comply with the requirements of the incorporation statute to such an extent that neither a de jure nor a de facto corporation is formed and the circumstances do not justify applying the corporation by estoppel doctrine, the courts generally deny the associates the benefits of incorporation. Some or all of the associates are then held unlimitedly liable for the obligations of the business.

STATUTORY APPROACH

In contrast to the common law approach to defective incorporation, which is cumbersome in both theory and application, incorporation statutes now address the issue more simply. All states provide that corporate existence begins either upon the filing of the articles of incorporation or their acceptance by the secretary of state. Moreover, under the Revised Act (RMBCA) and most state statutes, the filing or acceptance of the articles of incorporation by the secretary of state is conclusive proof that the incorporators have satisfied all conditions precedent to incorporation, except in a proceeding brought by the state. This applies even if the articles of incorporation contain mistakes or omissions.

With respect to the attribute of limited liability, the original Model Act (MBCA) and a few states provide that all persons who assume to act as a corporation without authority to do so shall have joint and several unlimited liability for all debts and liabilities incurred or arising as a result of their so acting. The Revised Act, however, imposes liability only on persons who purport to act as or on behalf of a corporation, knowing that there was no incorporation.

Consider two illustrations: First, Smith had been shown executed articles of incorporation some months before he invested in the corporation and became an officer and director. He was also told by the corporation’s attorney that the articles had been filed; however, because of confusion in the attorney’s office, they had not in fact been filed. Under the Revised Act and many court decisions, Smith would not be held liable for the obligations of the defective corporation. Second, knowing that no corporation has been formed because no attempt has been made to file articles of incorporation, Jones represents that a corporation exists and enters into a contract in the corporate name. Jones would be held liable for the obligations of the defective corporation under the Model Act, the Revised Act, and most court decisions involving similar situations.

Practical Advice

To obtain limited liability as a shareholder in a corporation, make sure that the corporation has been properly organized.

HARRIS V. LOONEY

COURT OF APPEALS OF ARKANSAS, 1993

43 ARK.APP. 127, 862 S.W.2D 282

FACTS On February 1, 1988, Robert L. Harris sold his business and its assets to J & R Construction. Joe Alexander, one of three J & R incorporators, signed the contract on behalf of J & R Construction with Harris. On the same day, the incorporators (Joe Alexander, Avaneil Looney, and Rita Alexander) signed the articles of incorporation for J & R Construction, but they were not filed with the secretary of state's office until February 3, 1988. In 1991, J & R Construction defaulted on its contract and promissory note, and Harris sued the three incorporators of J & R Construction for the corporation's debt of $49,696.21. Joe Alexander and Avaneil Looney stated that they were both present at the signing. Harris testified, however, that only he, his wife, and Joe Alexander were present when the contract was signed and that he does not remember Avaneil Looney being present. Kathryn Harris testified that Alexander and Looney were not present when the contract was signed. The trial court held that Joe Alexander was personally liable for the debt because he was the contracting party who dealt on behalf of the corporation. The court refused to hold Avaneil Looney or Rita Alexander liable because neither of them had acted for or on behalf of the corporation. Harris appealed.

DECISION Judgment affirmed.

OPINION Pittman, J. Section 204 of [the Arkansas Business Corporation] Act, [citation], concerns liability for pre-incorporation transactions and is identical to Section 2.04 of the Revised Model Business Corporation Act. It states: "All persons purporting to act as or on behalf of a corporation, knowing there was no incorporation under this Act, are jointly and severally liable for all liabilities created while so acting." The official comment to § 2.04 of the Revised Model Business Corporation Act explains:

Incorporation under modern statutes is so simple and inexpensive that a strong argument may be made that nothing short of filing articles of incorporation should create the privilege of limited liability. A number of situations have arisen, however, in which the protection of limited liability arguably should be recognized even though the simple incorporation process established by modern statutes has not been completed.

*** [I]t seemed appropriate to impose liability only on persons who act as or on behalf of corporations "knowing" that no corporation exists. *** [Citation.]

*** The Act requires that, in order to find liability under § 204, there must be a finding that the persons sought to be charged acted as or on behalf of the corporation and knew there was no incorporation under the Act.

The evidence showed that the contract to purchase appellant's business and the promissory note were signed only by Joe Alexander on behalf of the corporation. The only evidence introduced to support appellant's allegation that appellees were acting on behalf of the corporation was Joe Alexander's and Avaneil Looney's statements that they were present when the contract with appellant was signed; however, these statements were disputed by appellant and his wife. Appellant testified that he, his wife, Kathryn Harris, and Joe Alexander were present when the documents were signed to purchase his business and he did not remember appellee Avaneil Looney being present. Kathryn Harris testified that appellees were not present when the contract was signed.

The trial court denied appellant judgment against appellees because he found appellees had not acted for or on behalf of J & R Construction as required by § 204. The findings of fact of a trial judge sitting as the factfinder will not be disturbed on appeal unless the findings are clearly erroneous or clearly against the preponderance of the evidence, giving due regard to the opportunity of the trial court to assess the credibility of the witnesses. [Citation.] From our review of the records, we cannot say that the trial court's finding in this case is clearly against the preponderance of the evidence, and we find no error in the court's refusal to award appellant judgment against appellees.

INTERPRETATION The Revised Act imposes liability on all persons who purport to act as or on behalf of a corporation if they knew there was no incorporation.

ETHICAL QUESTION Was the court's decision fair to all of the parties? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION With which approach to recognition of corporate attributes do you agree: that taken by the Model Act or by the Revised Act? Explain.

Piercing the Corporate Veil

If substantial compliance with the incorporation statute results in a de jure or de facto corporation, the general rule is that the courts will recognize corporateness and its attendant attributes—including limited liability. Nonetheless, the courts will disregard the corporate entity when it is used to defeat public convenience, commit a wrongdoing, protect fraud, or circumvent the law. Reaching behind a corporate shield to prevent individuals from insulating themselves against personal accountability and the consequences of their wrongdoing is known as piercing the corporate veil. When they deem it necessary, courts will pierce the corporate veil to remedy wrongdoing. However, there is no commonly accepted test used by the courts. They have done so most frequently with closely held corporations and with parent-subsidary relationships. Piercing the corporate veil is the exception, and in most cases courts uphold the separateness of the corporation.

CLOSELY HELD CORPORATIONS

The joint and active management by all the shareholders of closely held corporations frequently results in a tendency to forgo corporate formalities, such as holding meetings of the board and shareholders, while the small size of close corporations often renders certain creditors unable to fully satisfy their claims against the corporation. Such frustrated creditors will likely ask the court to disregard the organization's corporateness and to impose personal liability for the corporate obligations on the shareholders. Courts have responded by piercing the corporate veil when the shareholders (1) have not conducted the business on a corporate basis, (2) have not provided an adequate financial basis for the business, or (3) have used the corporation to defraud. Conducting the business on a corporate basis involves separately maintaining the corporation's and the shareholders' funds, maintaining separate financial records, holding regular directors' meetings, and generally observing corporate formalities. Adequate capitalization requires that the shareholders invest capital or purchase liability insurance sufficient to meet the reasonably anticipated requirements of the enterprise.

Practical Advice

If you form a closely held corporation, be sure to adhere to the required corporate formalities and adequately capitalize the corporation.

The Revised Act validates unanimous shareholder agreements by which the shareholders may relax traditional corporate formalities. The Revised Act further provides that the existence or performance of an agreement authorized by the Act

[S]hall not be grounds for imposing personal liability on any shareholder for the acts or the debts of the corporation even if the agreement or its performance treats the corporation as if it were a partnership or results in failure to observe the corporate formalities otherwise applicable to the matters governed by the agreement.

Thus, this provision narrows the grounds for imposing personal liability on shareholders for the liabilities of a corporation for acts or omissions authorized by a valid shareholder agreement.

The Statutory Close Corporation Supplement validates a number of arrangements that allow the shareholders to relax traditional corporate formalities. The Supplement is intended to prevent the shareholders in a statutory close corporation from being held individually liable for the debts and torts of the business merely because the corporation does not follow the traditional corporate model. Although courts may still pierce the corporate veil of a statutory close corporation if the same circumstances would justify imposing personal liability on the shareholders of a general business corporation, the Supplement simply prevents a court from piercing the corporate veil just because the corporation is a statutory close corporation.

PARENT-SUBSIDIARY

A corporation wishing to risk only a portion of its assets in a particular enterprise may choose to form a subsidiary corporation. A subsidiary corporation is one in which another corporation, the parent corporation, owns at least a majority of the shares and over which the parent corporation therefore has control. Courts may pierce the corporate veil and hold the parent liable for the debts of its subsidiary if (1) both corporations are not adequately capitalized, or (2) the formalities of separate corporate procedures are not observed, or (3) each corporation is not held out to the public as a separate enterprise, or (4) the funds of the two corporations are commingled, or (5) the parent corporation completely dominates the subsidiary only to advance the parent's own interests. So long as a parent-subsidary duo avoids these pitfalls, the courts generally will recognize the subsidiary as a separate entity, even if the parent owns all the subsidiary's stock and the two corporations share facilities, employees, directors, and officers.

NATIONAL HOTEL ASSOCIATES V. O. AHLBORG & SONS, INC.

SUPREME COURT OF RHODE ISLAND, 2003

FACTS In 1983, the plaintiff, National Hotel Associates (NHA) sought to renovate the National Hotel, a large Victorian-style hotel overlooking Old Harbor on Block Island, Rhode Island. Richard Ahlborg (Richard), aware that he was one of several contractors competing for the job, proposed that NHA use nonunion labor through an O. Ahlborg & Sons, Inc. (O. Ahlborg) nonunion entity, Construction Services, Inc. (CSI), to reduce the overall cost of the project. At that time, Richard, CSI's sole stockholder, assured NHA that he personally would rectify any problems with the work of CSI. Barry Evans (Evans), one of NHA's principals, testified that Richard described CSI as a "Siamese twin" of O. Ahlborg's and that CSI operated out of the same offices and shared the same computer facilities, personnel, vehicles, and equipment. Evans further testified that Richard convinced him that NHA "should have no concern about the project being carried out by CSI" because both Richard and the entire O. Ahlborg organization "would back up CSI from start to middle to the end." The record also indicates that Richard repeatedly boasted that "he was CSI" and he "was O. Ahlborg." When asked why he would deploy O. Ahlborg's resources to a project belonging to CSI—a different company—Richard responded, "Because I am both companies." Evans testified that in the face of these promises and Richard's many representations, NHA entered into a contract with CSI.

The renovation work on the National Hotel began in the fall of 1983, but by early December, CSI's cash-flow problems led to construction delays. Consequently, O. Ahlborg extended a $400,000 line of credit to CSI. Later, when CSI's inability to perform further delayed construction, Richard and O. Ahlborg assumed control over the project; CSI's construction manager was fired and was replaced by an O. Ahlborg project manager. CSI, despite its undercapitalization, continued operations with the financial backing of O. Ahlborg. However, CSI never reimbursed O. Ahlborg for the $400,000 cash infusion. In total, approximately $360,000 of the $400,000 advanced by O. Ahlborg was directly attributable to the project. Richard openly admitted that without O. Ahlborg's financial assistance, CSI would have been unable to proceed with the construction. Anthony D. Lee, a certified public accountant specializing in the construction industry, reviewed CSI's financial operating history, work in progress, and cash-flow requirements and testified that CSI was undercapitalized during each year from 1982 through 1986 and was, at all relevant times since its inception in 1981, insolvent.

In 1984, CSI commenced arbitration proceedings against NHA in an effort to collect approximately $500,000 on O. Ahlborg's behalf. This claim centered on defendants' contention that NHA owed money for work performed on the project. Richard later admitted that he and O. Ahlborg were the real parties in interest in this arbitration. NHA counterclaimed and sought recovery for CSI's nonconforming, defective, and untimely performance of the work. The arbitration panel awarded NHA $230,687.20 in damages and denied all claims asserted by CSI. NHA filed this action against O. Ahlborg and Richard, seeking to impose liability on both defendants for the full amount of the judgment because CSI was a sham entity and a mere instrumentality of O. Ahlborg. The trial court found in favor of Richard and O. Ahlborg, and NHA appealed.

DECISION The judgment is vacated, and the case is remanded.

OPINION Goldberg, J. ***[T]he trial justice correctly observed that if two corporations are affiliated through common stock ownership, each will be considered a separate and independent entity "unless the totality of the circumstances surrounding their relationship indicates that one of the corporations 'is so organized and controlled, and its affairs are so conducted, as to make it merely an instrumentality, agency, conduit, or adjunct of [the other].'" [Citation.] The criteria for piercing the corporate veil to impose liability on non-corporate defendants vary with the particular circumstances of each case. [Citation.] However, "when the facts of a particular case render it unjust and inequitable to consider the subject corporation a separate entity" we will not hesitate to disregard the corporate form and treat the defendant as an individual who is personally liable for the debts of the disregarded corporation. [Citation.] Thus, in circumstances in which there is such a unity of interest and ownership between the corporation and its owner or parent corporation such that their separate identities and personalities no longer exist we have held that "adherence to the principle of their separate existence would, under the circumstances, result in injustice." [Citation.] In those situations the corporate form is disregarded and liability is determined by justice and fairness.

In evaluating the degree of separateness between two corporations, we look to the totality of the circumstances and examine such factors as stock ownership, capitalization, dual office holding and directorships, financial support or dependence, a lack of substantial business contracts independent from the other corporation and a domination of finances, policies and practices. [Citation.] Having reviewed the evidence in the record in this case, this Court is of the opinion that a finding that CSI was operated as an instrumentality of O. Ahlborg is amply demonstrated and that liability for CSI's judgment debt should rest with O. Ahlborg.

*** The evidence disclosed that although defendants scrupulously adhered to the usual corporate formalities, thus endeavoring to preserve the corporate protections afforded by law, CSI wound up an empty shell, unable to pay this judgment because its assets were dissipated for the benefit of Richard and O. Ahlborg. Accordingly, we are of the opinion that CSI was dominated and controlled by Richard as an alter ego of O. Ahlborg, all to the detriment of NHA, its victim and judgment creditor.

*** The evidence that Richard Ahlborg dominated the affairs of each entity was overwhelming; not only did he declare, whenever it was expedient to do so, that he was CSI and he was O. Ahlborg, he unhesitatingly deployed the resources of one corporation in favor of the other whenever the circumstances warranted, including steering NHA to CSI, financing the undercapitalized CSI, completing its contract with NHA, and attempting to collect CSI's indebtedness on O. Ahlborg's behalf by financing a meritless arbitration followed by a clandestine war of hide the assets.

Additionally, the evidence that CSI was undercapitalized from its inception and was insolvent for this entire period, including when it was retained by NHA, *** demonstrates undercapitalization and is damning proof that CSI was operated as a shell corporation for defendants' benefit. [Citation.]

Thus, as Richard so often proclaimed, at least for financial operations, O. Ahlborg was CSI. Accordingly, the corporate form that otherwise would shield O. Ahlborg from liability is unavailing and O. Ahlborg is liable for CSI's judgment debt.

INTERPRETATION Courts may pierce the corporate veil and hold the parent liable for the debts of its subsidiary if both corporations are not adequately capitalized or the parent corporation completely dominates the subsidiary.

ETHICAL QUESTION Was Richard's conduct unethical?

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Are the standards for piercing the corporate veil sufficiently definite and predictable? Explain.

CORPORATE POWERS

Because a corporation derives its existence and all of its powers from its state of incorporation, it possesses only those powers that the state has conferred on it. Corporate powers consist of those expressly set forth in the incorporation statute unless limited by the articles of incorporation.

Sources of Corporate Powers

STATUTORY POWERS

Typical of the general corporate powers granted by incorporation statutes are those provided by the Revised Act, which include the following: (1) to have perpetual succession; (2) to sue and be sued in the corporate name; (3) to acquire and dispose of property, including shares or other interests in, or obligations of, any other entity; (4) to make contracts, borrow money, and secure any corporate obligations; (5) to lend money; (6) to be a promoter, partner, member, associate, or manager of any partnership, joint venture, trust, or other entity; (7) to conduct business within or without the state of incorporation; (8) to establish pension plans, profit-sharing plans, share option plans, and other employee benefit plans; and (9) to make charitable donations. In most states this list is not exclusive. Moreover, the Revised Act also grants to all corporations the same powers individuals have to do all things necessary or convenient to carry out their business and affairs.

PURPOSES

All state incorporation statutes provide that a corporation may be formed for any lawful purpose. The Revised Act permits a corporation's articles of incorporation to state a more limited purpose. Many state statutes, but not the RMBCA, require that the articles of incorporation specify the corporation's purposes, although they usually permit a general statement that the corporation is formed to engage in any lawful purpose.

Ultra Vires Acts

Because a corporation has authority to act only within its powers, any corporate action or contract that exceeds these powers is ultra vires. The doctrine of ultra vires is less significant today because modern statutes permit incorporation for any lawful purpose and most articles of incorporation do not limit corporate powers. As a consequence, far fewer acts are ultra vires.

EFFECT OF ULTRA VIRES ACTS

Traditionally, ultra vires contracts were unenforceable as null and void. Under the modern approach, courts allow the ultra vires defense when the contract is wholly executory on both sides. A corporation having received full performance from the other party to the contract is not permitted to escape liability by a plea of ultra vires. Conversely, the other party may not use the defense of ultra vires against a corporation suing for breach of a contract that has been fully performed on its side. Almost all statutes, including the Revised Act, have abolished the defense of ultra vires in an action by or against a corporation. These statutes do not, however, validate illegal corporate actions.

REMEDIES FOR ULTRA VIRES ACTS

Although ultra vires under modern statutes may no longer be used as a shield against liability, corporate activities that are ultra vires may be redressed in any of three ways, as provided by the Revised Act:

1. in a proceeding by a shareholder against the corporation to enjoin the act, if equitable and if all affected persons are parties to the proceeding, the court may award damages for losses suffered by the corporation or another party because of the enjoining of the unauthorized act;

2. in a proceeding by the corporation, or a shareholder derivatively (in a representative capacity), against the incumbent or former directors or officers for exceeding their authority; or
3. in a proceeding by the attorney general of the state of incorporation to dissolve the corporation or to enjoin it from the transaction of unauthorized business.

Liability for Torts and Crimes

A corporation is liable for the torts its agents commit in the course of their employment. The doctrine of ultra vires, even in those jurisdictions where it is permitted as a defense, does not apply to wrongdoing by the corporation. Rather, the doctrine of respondeat superior imposes full liability on a corporation for such agent and employee torts. For example, Robert, a truck driver employed by the Webster Corporation, while on a business errand negligently runs over Pamela, a pedestrian. Both Robert and the Webster Corporation are liable to Pamela in her action to recover damages for the injuries she sustained. A corporation may also be found liable for fraud, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, libel, and other torts; but some states hold the corporation liable for punitive damages only if it authorized or ratified the agent's act.

Historically, corporations were not held criminally liable because, under the traditional view, a corporation could not possess the criminal intent requisite for committing a crime. The dramatic growth in size and importance of corporations has changed this view. Under the modern approach, a corporation may be liable for violating statutes imposing liability without fault. In addition, a corporation may be liable for an offense perpetrated by a high corporate officer or by its board of directors. Punishment of a corporation for crimes is necessarily by fine, not imprisonment.

Crime a corporation may be criminally liable for violations of statutes imposing liability without fault or for an offense perpetrated by a high corporate officer or its board of directors

Questions

1. After part of the shares of a proposed corporation had been successfully subscribed, the promoter hired a carpenter to repair a building that was intended to be conveyed to the proposed corporation. The promoters subsequently secured subscriptions to the balance of the shares and completed the organization, but the corporation, finding the building to be unsuitable for its purposes, declined to use the building or to pay the carpenter. The carpenter brought suit against the corporation and the promoter for the amount that the promoter agreed would be paid to him. Who, if anyone, is liable?
2. C. A. Nimocks was a promoter engaged in organizing the Times Printing Company. On September 12, on behalf of the proposed corporation, he made a written contract with McArthur for her services as comptroller for a one-year period beginning October 1. The Times Printing Company was incorporated October 16, and on that date McArthur commenced her duties as comptroller. Neither the board of directors nor any officer took formal action on her employment, but all the shareholders, directors, and officers knew of the contract made by Nimocks. On December 1, McArthur was discharged without cause.
  - a. Has she a cause of action against the Times Printing Company?
  - b. Has she a cause of action against Nimocks?
3. Todd and Elaine purchased for $300,000 a building that was used for manufacturing pianos. Then, as promoters, they formed a new corporation and resold the building to the new corporation for $500,000 worth of stock. After discovering the actual purchase price paid by the promoters, the other shareholders desire to have $200,000 of the common stock canceled. Can they succeed in this action?
4. Wayne signed a subscription agreement for one hundred shares of stock of the proposed ABC Company, at a price of $18 per share. Two weeks later, the company was incorporated in a state that has adopted the Revised Act. A certificate was duly tendered to Wayne, but he refused to accept it. He was notified of all shareholders' meetings, but he never attended. A dividend check was sent to him, but he returned it. ABC Company brings a legal action against Wayne to recover $1,800. He defends on the ground that his subscription agreement was an unaccepted offer, that he had done nothing to ratify it, and that he was therefore not liable on it. Is he correct? Explain.
5. Julian, Cornelia, and Sheila petitioned for a corporate charter for the purpose of conducting a retail shoe business. They complied with all the statutory provisions except having their charter recorded. This was simply an oversight on their part, and they felt that they had fully complied with the law. They operated the business for three years, after which time it became insolvent. The creditors desire to hold the members personally and individually liable. May they do so?
6. Arthur, Barbara, Carl, and Debra decided to form a corporation for bottling and selling apple cider. Arthur, Barbara, and Carl were to operate the business, while Debra was to supply the necessary capital but was to have no voice in the management. They went to Jane, a lawyer, who agreed to organize a corporation for them under the name A-B-C Inc., and paid her funds sufficient to accomplish the incorporation. Jane promised that the corporation would definitely be formed by May 3. On April 27, Arthur telephoned Jane to inquire how the incorporation was progressing, and Jane said she had drafted the articles of incorporation and would send them to the secretary of state that very day. She assured Arthur that incorporation would occur before May 3.

Relying on Jane's assurance, Arthur, with the approval of Barbara and Carl, on May 4 entered into a written contract with Grower for his entire apple crop. The contract was executed by Arthur on behalf of "A-B-C Inc." Grower delivered the apples as agreed. Unknown to Arthur, Barbara, Carl, Debra, or Grower, the articles of incorporation were never filed, through Jane's negligence. The business subsequently failed.

What are Grower's rights, if any, against Arthur, Barbara, Carl, and Debra as individuals?
7. The Pyro Corporation has outstanding twenty thousand shares of common stock, of which nineteen thousand are owned by Peter B. Arson; five hundred shares are owned by Elizabeth Arson, his wife; and five hundred shares are owned by Joseph Q. Arson, his brother. These three individuals are the officers and directors of the corporation. The Pyro Corporation obtained a $750,000 fire insurance policy to cover a certain building it owned. Thereafter, Peter B. Arson set fire to the building, and it was totally destroyed. Can the corporation recover from the fire insurance company on the $750,000 fire insurance policy? Why?
8. A corporation is formed for the purpose of manufacturing, buying, selling, and dealing in drugs, chemicals, and similar products. The corporation, under authority of its board of directors, contracted to purchase the land and building it occupied as a factory and store. Collins, a shareholder, sues in equity to restrain the corporation from completing the contract, claiming that as the certificate of incorporation contained no provision authorizing the corporation to purchase real estate, the contract was ultra vires. Can Collins prevent the contract from being executed?
9. Amalgamated Corporation, organized under the laws of State S, sends several traveling salespersons into State M to solicit orders, which are accepted only at the home office of Amalgamated Corporation in State S. Riley, a resident of State M, places an order that is accepted by Amalgamated Corporation in State S. The Corporation Act of State M provides that "no foreign corporation transacting business in this state without a certificate of authority shall be permitted to maintain an action in any court of this state until such corporation shall have obtained a certificate of authority.” Riley fails to pay for the goods, and when Amalgamated Corporation sues Riley in a court of State M, Riley defends on the ground that Amalgamated Corporation does not possess a certificate of authority from State M. Result?

Case Problems

10. Dr. North, a surgeon practicing in Georgia, engaged an Arizona professional corporation consisting of twenty lawyers to represent him in a dispute with a Georgia hospital. West, a member of the law firm, flew to Atlanta and hired local counsel with Dr. North’s approval. West represented Dr. North in two hearings before the hospital and in one court proceeding, as well as negotiating a compromise between Dr. North and the hospital. The total bill for the law firm’s travel costs and professional services was $21,000, but Dr. North refused to pay $6,000 of it. The law firm brought an action against Dr. North for the balance owed. Dr. North argued that the action should be dismissed because the law firm failed to register as a foreign corporation in accordance with the Georgia Corporation Statute. Will the law firm be prevented from collecting on the contract? Explain.
11. An Arkansas statute provides that if any foreign corporation authorized to do business in the state should remove to the federal court any suit brought against it by an Arkansas citizen or initiate any suit in the federal court against a local citizen, without the consent of the other party, Arkansas’s secretary of state should revoke all authority of the corporation to do business in the state. The Burke Construction Company, a Missouri corporation authorized to do business in Arkansas, has brought a suit in federal court and has also removed to a federal court a state suit brought against it. Burke now seeks to enjoin the secretary of state from revoking its authority to do business in Arkansas. Should the injunction be issued? Explain.
12. Little Switzerland Brewing Company was incorporated on January 28. On February 18, Ellison and Oxley were made directors of the company after they purchased some stock. Then, on September 25, Ellison and Oxley signed stock subscription agreements to purchase five thousand shares each. Under the agreement, they both issued a note that indicated that they would pay for the stock “at their discretion.” Two years later in March, the board of directors passed a resolution canceling the stock subscription agreements of Ellison and Oxley. The creditors of Little Switzerland brought suit against Ellison and Oxley to recover the money owed under the subscription agreements. Are Ellison and Oxley liable? Why?
13. Oahe Enterprises was formed by the efforts of Emmick, who acted as a promoter and contributed shares of Colonial Manors, Inc. (CM), stock in exchange for stock in Oahe. The CM stock had been valued by CM’s directors for internal stock option purposes at $19 per share. However, one month prior to Emmick’s incorporation of Oahe Enterprises, CM’s board reduced the stock value to $9.50 per share. Although Emmick knew of this reduction before the meeting to form Oahe Enterprises, he did not disclose this information to the Morrises, the other shareholders of the new corporation. Can Oahe Enterprises recover the shortfall?
14. In April, Cranson was asked to invest in a new business corporation that was about to be created. He agreed to purchase stock and to become an officer and director. After his attorney advised him that the corporation had been formed under the laws of Maryland, Cranson paid for and received a stock certificate evidencing his ownership of shares. The business of the new venture was conducted as if it were a corporation. Cranson was elected president, and he conducted all of his corporate actions, including those with IBM, as an officer of the corporation. At no time did he assume any personal obligation or pledge his individual credit to IBM. As a result of an oversight of the attorney, of which Cranson was un-aware, the certificate of incorporation, which had been signed and acknowledged prior to May 1, was not filed until November 24. Between May 1 and November 8, the “corporation” purchased eight computers from IBM. The corporation made only partial payment. Can IBM hold Cranson personally liable for the balance due? Explain.
15. Healthwin-Midtown Convalescent Hospital, Inc. (Healthwin), was incorporated in California for the purpose of operating a health-care facility. For three years thereafter, it participated as a provider of services under the federal Medicare Act and received periodic payments from the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare. Undisputed audits revealed that a series of overpayments had been made to Healthwin. The United States brought an action to recover this sum from the defendants, Healthwin and Israel Zide. Zide was a member of the board of directors of Healthwin, the administrator of its health-care facility, its president, and owner of 50 percent of its stock. Only Zide could sign the corporation’s checks without prior approval of another corporate officer. Board meetings were not regularly held. In addition, Zide had a 50 percent interest in a partnership that owned both the realty in which Healthwin’s health-care facility was located and the furnishings used at that facility. Healthwin consistently had outstanding liabilities in excess of $150,000, and its initial capitalization was only $10,000. Zide exercised control over Healthwin, causing its finances to become inextricably intertwined both with his personal finances and with his other business holdings. The United States contends that the corporate veil should be pierced and that Zide should be held personally liable for the Medicare overpayments made to Healthwin. Is the United States correct in its assertion? Why?

16. MPL Leasing Corporation is a California corporation that provides financing plans to dealers of Saxon Business Products. MPL invited Jay Johnson, a Saxon dealer in Alabama, to attend a sales seminar in Atlanta. MPL and Johnson entered into an agreement under which Johnson was to lease Saxon copiers with an option to buy. MPL shipped the equipment into Alabama and filed a financing statement with the secretary of state. When Johnson became delinquent with his payments to MPL, MPL brought an action against Johnson in an Alabama court. Johnson moved to dismiss the action, claiming that MPL was not qualified to conduct business in Alabama and was thus barred from enforcing its contract with Johnson in an Alabama court. Alabama law prevents foreign corporations not qualified to do business in Alabama from enforcing their intrastate contracts in the Alabama court system. Is Johnson correct?
17. Berger was planning to produce a fashion show in Las Vegas. In April, Berger entered into a written licensing agreement with CBS Films, Inc., a wholly owned subsidiary of CBS, for presentation of the show. The next year, Stewart Cowley decided to produce a fashion show similar to Berger's and entered into a contract with CBS. CBS broadcast Cowley's show, but not Berger's. Berger brought this action against CBS to recover damages for breach of his contract with CBS Films. Berger claimed that CBS was liable because CBS Films was not operated as a separate entity, and that the court should disregard the parent-subsidary form. In support of this claim, Berger showed that CBS Films's directors were employees of CBS, that CBS's organizational chart included CBS Films, and that all lines of employee authority from CBS Films passed through CBS employees to the CBS chairman of the board. CBS, in turn, argued that Berger had failed to justify piercing the corporate veil and disregarding the corporate identity of CBS Films to hold CBS liable. Decision?
18. Frank McAnarney and Joseph Lemon entered into an agreement to promote a corporation to engage in the manufacture of farm implements. Before the corporation was organized, McAnarney and Lemon solicited subscriptions to the stock of the corporation and presented a written agreement for the subscribers to sign. The agreement provided that the subscribers would pay $100 per share for stock in the corporation in consideration of McAnarney and Lemon's agreement to organize the corporation and advance the preincorporation expenses. Thomas Jordan signed the agreement, making application for one hundred shares of stock. After the articles of incorporation had been filed with the secretary of state but before the charter was issued to the corporation, Jordan died. The administrator of Jordan's estate notified McAnarney and Lemon that the estate would not honor Jordan's subscription.
  - After the formation of the corporation, Franklin Adams signed a subscription agreement making application for one hundred shares of stock. Before the corporation accepted the subscription, Adams informed the corporation that he was canceling it.
    - a. Can the corporation enforce Jordan's stock subscription against Jordan's estate?
    - b. Can the corporation enforce Adams's stock subscription?
19. Green & Freedman Baking Company (Green & Freedman) was a family-owned Massachusetts corporation that produced and sold baked goods. The terms of a collective bargaining agreement required Green & Freedman Baking Company to make periodic payments on behalf of its unionized drivers to the New England Teamsters and Baking Industry Health Benefits and Insurance Fund (Health Fund). After sixty years of operation Green & Freedman experienced financial difficulties and ceased to make the agreed-upon contributions. They mixed their own finances with those of Green & Freedman's. The Elmans, through their domination of Green & Freedman, caused the corporation to make payments to themselves and their relatives at a time when the corporation was known to be failing and could be expected to default, or was already in default, on its obligations to the Health Fund. It then transferred all remaining assets to a successor entity named Boston Bakers, Inc. (Boston Bakers). Boston Bakers operated essentially the same business as Green & Freedman until its demise two years later. The Health Fund sued Green & Freedman, Boston Bakers, and the two corporations' principals, Richard Elman and Stanley Elman, to recover the payments owed by Green & Freedman with interest, costs, and penalties. There was no evidence of financial self-dealing in the case of Boston Bakers. Both corporate defendants conceded liability for the delinquent contributions owed by Green & Freedman to the Health Fund. The suit against the Elmans was based on piercing the corporate veil with respect to Green & Freedman and Boston Bakers. The Elmans, however, denied they were personally liable for these corporate debts. Are the Elmans liable? Explain.
20. Ronald Nadler was a resident of Maryland and the CEO of Glenmar Cinestate, Inc., a Maryland corporation, as well as its principal stockholder. Glenmar leased certain space in the Westridge Square Shopping Center, located in Frederick, Maryland, and in Cranberry Mall, located in Westminster, Maryland. Tiller Construction Corporation and Nadler entered into two contracts for the construction of movie theaters at these locations, one calling for Tiller to do the work for Nadler at Westridge for $637,000, and the other for Tiller to do the work for Nadler at Cranberry for $688,800. Ronald Nadler requested that Tiller send all bills to Glenmar, the lessee at both shopping malls, but agreed to be personally liable to Tiller for the payment of both contracts. All inventory was bought and paid for locally, and Tiller paid sales tax in Maryland. Although there was no formal office in the state, Tiller leased a motel room for a considerable period of time, posted a sign at the job site, and maintained telephones listed in information. In addition, Tiller engaged in fairly pervasive management functions, and the value of the projects comprised a substantial part of Tiller's revenues during the period. At the time of the suit, there was a net balance due for the Cranberry project in the amount of $229,799.46, and on the Westridge project for the sum of $264,273.85, which Nadler refused to pay, even though he had approved all work and the work had been performed in a timely, good, and workmanlike manner. Tiller Construction Corporation sued Ronald Nadler and Glenmar Cinestate, Inc., for breach of contract. Nadler filed a motion to dismiss based on Maryland's business corporation statute, which prohibits a foreign corporation that conducts intrastate business in Maryland from maintaining a suit in Maryland courts if the corporation fails to register or qualify under Maryland law. Nadler asserted that Tiller was a New York corporation that has never qualified to transact business in the state of Maryland. Tiller conceded that the corporation had not qualified to do business in Maryland but argued that Tiller was not required to qualify because its activities did not constitute, in the contemplation of the statute, doing business in the state as Tiller just had occasional business in Maryland. Discuss whether Tiller could bring suit in Maryland.

Chapter 35

FINANCIAL STRUCTURE OF CORPORATIONS

Corporation. An ingenious device for obtaining individual profit without individual responsibility.

AMBROSE BIERCE, THE DEVIL'S DICTIONARY, 1881–1906

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Distinguish between equity and debt securities.
2. Identify and describe the principal kinds of debt securities.
3. Identify and describe the principal kinds of equity securities.
4. Explain what type and amount of consideration a corporation may validly receive for the shares it issues.
5. Explain the legal restrictions imposed upon dividends and other distributions.

Capital is necessary for any business to function. Two of the principal sources for corporate financing involve debt and equity investment securities. Although equity securities represent an ownership interest in the corporation and include both common and preferred stock, corporations finance most of their continued operations through debt securities. Debt securities, which include notes and bonds, do not represent an ownership interest in the corporation; rather, they create a debtor-creditor relationship between the corporation and the bondholder. The third principal way in which a corporation may meet its financial needs is through retained earnings.

All states have statutes regulating the issuance and sale of corporate shares and other securities. Popularly known as Blue Sky Laws, these statutes typically contain provisions prohibiting fraud in the sale of securities. In addition, a number of states require the registration of securities, and some states also regulate brokers, dealers, and others who engage in the securities business.

In 1933, Congress passed the first federal statute for the regulation of securities offered for sale and sold through the use of the mails or otherwise in interstate commerce. The statute requires a corporation to disclose certain information about a proposed security in a registration statement and in its prospectus (an offer a corporation makes to interest people in buying securities). Although the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) does not examine the merits of the proposed security and although registration does not guarantee the accuracy of the facts presented in the registration statement or prospectus, the law does prohibit false and misleading statements under penalty of fine or imprisonment or both.

Under certain conditions, a corporation may receive an exemption from the requirement of registration under the Blue Sky Laws of most states and the Securities Act of 1933. If no exemption is available, a corporation offering for sale or selling its shares of stock or other securities, as well as any person selling such securities, is subject to court injunction, possible criminal prosecution, and civil liability in damages to the persons to whom securities are sold in violation of the regulatory statute. A discussion of federal regulation of securities appears in Chapter 40.

An investor has the right to transfer her investment securities by sale, gift, or pledge. The right to transfer is a valuable one, and easy transferability augments the value and marketability of investment securities. The availability of a ready market for any security affords liquidity and makes the security both attractive to investors and useful as collateral. The Uniform Commercial Code, Article 8, Investment Securities, contains the statutory rules applicable to transfers of investment securities; these rules are similar to those in Article 3, which concern negotiable instruments. In 1994 a revision to Article 8 was promulgated, which now has been adopted by all of the states. The federal securities laws also regulate several aspects of the transfer of investment securities, as discussed in Chapter 40.

In this chapter, we will discuss debt and equity securities as well as the payment of dividends and other distributions to shareholders.

DEBT SECURITIES

Corporations frequently find it advantageous to use debt as a source of funds. Debt securities (also called bonds) generally involve the corporation's promise to repay the principal amount of a loan at a stated time and to pay interest, usually at a fixed rate, while the debt is outstanding. In addition to bonds, a corporation may finance its operations through other forms of debt, such as credit extended by its suppliers and short-term commercial paper. Some states, but not the Revised Act, permit articles of incorporation to confer voting rights on debt security holders; a few states allow other shareholder rights to be conferred on bondholders.

Practical Advice

Carefully consider the ratio between debt and equity financing, recognizing that this ratio varies considerably with the type and life cycle of a corporation.

Authority to Issue Debt Securities

The Revised Act provides that every corporation has the power to borrow money and to issue its notes, bonds, and other obligations. The board of directors may issue bonds without the authorization or consent of the shareholders.

Types of Debt Securities

Depending on their characteristics, debt securities can be classified into various types, each offering numerous variants and combinations. A corporation typically issues debt securities under an indenture or debt agreement, which specifies in great detail the terms of the loan.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY v. RJR NABISCO, INC.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, S.D. NEW YORK, 1989

716 F.SUPP. 1504

FACTS On October 20, 1988, F. Ross Johnson, then the CEO of RJR Nabisco (RJR), proposed a $17 billion leveraged buyout (LBO) of RJR's shareholders at $75 dollars per share. (An LBO occurs when a group of investors, usually including the company's management, buy the company with little equity and significant new debt. The debt typically is financed through mortgages or high-risk/high-yield bonds, known as "junk bonds." A portion of this debt normally is secured by the company's assets. After the transaction is complete, some of these assets usually are sold to reduce the debt.) Within a few days, the investment group led by Johnson, the Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co.

(KKR) private equity firm, and others began a bidding war. On December 1, 1988, an RJR committee recommended that RJR accept KKR's proposal of a $24 billion LBO at $109 per share. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. (MetLife), a life insurance company with $88 billion in assets and $49 billion in debt securities holdings, owned $340,542,000 in principal amount of RJR Nabisco bonds purchased between July 1975 and July 1988. These bonds bore interest rates from 8 to 10.25 percent. Jefferson-Pilot Life Insurance Co., with $3 billion in assets, of which $1.5 billion was in debt securities, owned $9.34 million in principal of RJR bonds purchased between June 1978 and June 1988.

MetLife and Jefferson-Pilot (plaintiffs) argued that RJR had an implied duty of good faith and fair dealing not to incur the significant debt involved in the LBO. They asserted that RJR consistently had reassured its bondholders that it had a “mandate” from its board of directors to maintain RJR’s preferred credit rating. The plaintiffs alleged that RJR’s actions drastically impaired the value of their bond holdings, in effect misappropriated the value of those bonds to finance the LBO, and distributed the windfall to the company’s shareholders. They declared that these actions constituted a breach of the implied duty and betrayed the fundamental basis of their bargain with RJR. The plaintiffs alleged that they unfairly suffered a multimillion dollar loss in the value of their bonds and that, therefore, RJR should redeem their bonds.

RJR defended the LBO by pointing to express provisions in the bond indentures that permitted mergers and the assumption of additional debt. These provisions, RJR pointed out, were known to the market and to the plaintiffs, who were sophisticated investors who freely bought the bonds and who were equally free to sell them at any time. RJR argued that no legal grounds supported the existence of an implied duty.

DECISION Judgment for RJR.

OPINION Walter, J. The bonds implicated by this suit are governed by long, detailed indentures, which in turn are governed by New York contract law. No one disputes that the holders of public bond issues, like plaintiffs here, often enter the market after the indentures have been negotiated and memorialized. Thus, those indentures are often not the product of face-to-face negotiations between the ultimate holders and the issuing company. What remains equally true, however, is that underwriters ordinarily negotiate the terms of the indentures with the issuers. Since the underwriters must then sell or place the bonds, they necessarily negotiate in part with the interests of the buyers in mind. Moreover, these indentures were not secret agreements foisted upon unwitting participants in the bond market. No successive holder is required to accept or to continue to hold the bonds, governed by their accompanying indentures; indeed, plaintiffs readily admit that they could have sold their bonds right up until the announcement of the LBO. [Citation.] Instead, sophisticated investors like plaintiffs are well aware of the indenture terms and, presumably, review them carefully before lending hundreds of millions of dollars to any company.

***

Further, as plaintiffs themselves note, the contracts at issue “[do] not impose debt limits, since debt is assumed to be used for productive purposes.” [Citation.]

***

The indentures at issue clearly address the eventuality of a merger. They impose certain related restrictions not at issue in this suit, but no restriction that would prevent the recent RJR Nabisco merger transaction. ***

***

In contracts like bond indentures, “an implied covenant *** derives its substance directly from the language of the Indenture, and ‘cannot give the holders of Debentures any rights inconsistent with those set out in the Indenture.’ [Where] plaintiffs’ contractual rights [have not been] violated, there can have been no breach of an implied covenant.” [Citation] (emphasis added).

***

It is not necessary to decide that indentures like those at issue could never support a finding of additional benefits under different circumstances with different parties. Rather, for present purposes, it is sufficient to conclude what obligation is not covered, either explicitly or implicitly, by these contracts held by these plaintiffs. Accordingly, this Court holds that the “fruits” of these indentures do not include an implied restrictive covenant that would prevent the incurrence of new debt to facilitate the recent LBO. To hold otherwise would permit these plaintiffs to straightjacket the company in order to guarantee their investment. These plaintiffs do not invoke an implied covenant of good faith to protect a legitimate, mutually contemplated benefit of the indentures; rather, they seek to have this Court create an additional benefit for which they did not bargain.

***

The sort of unbounded and one-sided elasticity urged by plaintiffs would interfere with and destabilize the market. *** The Court has no reason to believe that the market, in evaluating bonds such as those at issue here, did not discount for the possibility that any company, even one the size of RJR Nabisco, might engage in an LBO heavily financed by debt. That the bonds did not lose any of their value until the October 20, 1988 announcement of a possible RJR Nabisco LBO only suggests that the market had theretofore evaluated the risks of such a transaction as slight.

INTERPRETATION Bond indentures are highly detailed contracts specifying the terms of the underlying loan. The courts will not imply any duties that are inconsistent with the terms of such a contract.

ETHICAL QUESTION Is the court’s decision fair to the bondholders? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the court’s reluctance to impose an implied duty of good faith and fair dealing? Explain.

UNSECURED BONDS

Unsecured bonds, usually called debentures, have only the obligation of the corporation behind them. Debenture holders are thus unsecured creditors and rank equally with other general creditors. To protect the unsecured bondholders, indentures frequently impose limitations on the corporation's borrowing, its payment of dividends, and its redemption and reacquisition of its own shares. An indenture may also require a corporation to maintain specified minimum reserves.

SECURED BONDS

A secured creditor is one whose claim is not only enforceable against the general assets of the corporation but is also a lien on specific property. Thus, secured or mortgage bonds provide the security of specific corporate property in addition to the general obligation of the corporation. After resorting to the specified security, the holder of secured bonds becomes a general creditor for any unsatisfied amount of the debt.

INCOME BONDS

Traditionally, debt securities bear a fixed interest rate that is payable without regard to the financial condition of the corporation. Income bonds, on the other hand, condition the payment of interest to some extent on corporate earnings. Participating bonds call for a stated percentage of return regardless of earnings, with additional payments dependent on earnings.

CONVERTIBLE BONDS

Usually at the option of the holder, convertible bonds may be exchanged, in a specified ratio, for other securities of the corporation. For example, a convertible bond may provide that the bondholder shall have the right for a specified time to exchange each bond for twenty shares of common stock.

CALLABLE BONDS

Callable bonds are bonds subject to a redemption provision that permits the corporation to redeem or call (pay off) all or part of the issue before maturity at a specified redemption price.

Practical Advice

If you purchase callable bonds, recognize that if interest rates decline, the corporation is likely to exercise its redemption privilege.

EQUITY SECURITIES

An equity security is a source of capital creating an ownership interest in the corporation. The holders of equity securities, as owners of the corporation, occupy a position financially riskier than that of creditors, and changes in the corporation's fortunes and general economic conditions have a greater effect on shareholders than on any other class of investor.

Though a proportionate proprietary interest in a corporate enterprise can be described in terms of the shares a person owns, shares do not in any way vest their owner with title to any of the corporation's property. However, shares do confer on their owner a threefold interest in the corporation: (1) the right to participate in control, (2) the right to participate in the earnings of the corporation, and (3) the right to participate in the residual assets of the corporation on dissolution. The shareholder's interest is usually represented by a certificate of ownership and is recorded by the corporation.

Issuance of Shares

The state of incorporation regulates the issuance of shares by determining the type of shares that may be issued, the kinds and amount of consideration for which shares may be issued, and the rights of shareholders to purchase a proportionate part of additionally issued shares. Moreover, the federal government and each state in which the shares are issued or sold regulate the issuance and sale of shares.

AUTHORITY TO ISSUE

The initial amount of shares to be issued is determined by the promoters or incorporators and is generally governed by practical business considerations and financial needs. A corporation is limited, however, to selling only the amount of shares that has been authorized in its articles of incorporation. Unauthorized shares of stock that are purportedly issued by a corporation are void. The rights of parties entitled to these overissued shares are governed by Article 8 of the Uniform Commercial Code, which provides that the corporation must either obtain an identical security, if one is reasonably available, for the person entitled to the security or pay that person the price he (or the last purchaser for value) paid for it, with interest from the date of that person's demand.

Business Law in Action

Triple-A, “investment grade,” and “junk” are familiar terms to those who invest in bonds. All three terms refer to a central concern of investors: what is the probability that the issuer of bonds will repay the principal at maturity and make scheduled interest payments on time? Put another way, what is the risk of default?

A high rating is supposed to reflect a high probability of repayment. The greater this probability, the less risk to the investor. Conversely, lower rated bonds are judged to be riskier. Generally, safer bonds have a lower yield, riskier bonds have a higher yield. Investors taking greater risks demand a higher return.

Independent rating agencies analyze the companies and municipalities that issue bonds and assign ratings to reflect the creditworthiness of the issuer. The best-known agencies in the United States are Standard and Poor’s and Moody’s Investor Service. Standard and Poor’s bond ratings, from highest to lowest, are AAA, AA+, AA, AA–, A+, A, A–, BBB+, BBB, BBB–, BB+, BB, BB–, B+, B, B–, CCC+, CCC, CCC–, CC, D (in payment default). Moody’s ratings are comparable: Aaa, Aa1, Aa2, Aa3, A1, A2, A3, Baa1, Baa2, Baa3, Ba1, Ba2, Ba3, B1, B2, B3, Caa1, Caa2, Caa3, Ca, C1. Moody’s does not give a D.

“Investment grade” refers to the top-ten ratings, denoting bonds that are relatively safe investments for individuals and institutions. In contrast, “junk bonds” (generally anything rated below the top-ten ratings) are low rated, risky, and high yielding. Yields on junk bonds are at least 7 percentage points above the rate of safe government bonds.

The quality of a particular bond can change over time as business conditions change for the issuer. For this reason, bond ratings have a subjective component. Analysts look not only at an issuing company’s financial statements but also at trends in the industry—and adjust their ratings accordingly. A decrease in ratings will increase the companies’ cost of borrowing and limit their fundraising options. Moreover, investment funds prohibited from owning junk bonds could be forced to sell corporate bonds with ratings below investment grade.

If a rating indicates how risky a bond is, then what, if anything, does it not reveal? Bond ratings relate to bond issuers, not investors. Thus, the ratings do not say whether a particular bond is an appropriate investment for a particular buyer. And ratings do not forecast the movement of interest rates, movement that causes bond prices to rise or fall. In other words, bond ratings are only a tool for investors, not a substitute for good judgment.

Once the amount of shares that the corporation is authorized to issue has been established and specified in the charter, it cannot be increased or decreased without amendment to the charter. Consequently, articles of incorporation commonly specify more shares than are to be issued immediately.

Practical Advice

When drafting the articles of incorporation, you should authorize shares in addition to those that are to be immediately issued unless the state-imposed fees based on the number of authorized shares is prohibitive.

PREEMPTIVE RIGHTS

A shareholder’s proportionate interest in a corporation can be changed by either a disproportionate issuance of additional shares or a disproportionate reacquisition of outstanding shares. Management is subject to fiduciary duties in both types of transactions. Moreover, when a corporation issues additional shares, a shareholder may have the preemptive right to purchase a proportionate part of the new issue. Preemptive rights are used far more frequently in closely held corporations than in publicly traded corporations, possibly because, without such rights, a shareholder may be unable to prevent a dilution of his ownership interest in the corporation. For example, Leonard owns two hundred shares of stock of the Fordham Company, which has a total of one thousand shares outstanding. The company decides to increase its capital stock by issuing one thousand additional shares of stock. If Leonard has preemptive rights, he and every other shareholder will be offered one share of the newly issued stock for every share they own. If he accepts the offer and buys the stock, he will have four hundred shares of a total of two thousand outstanding, and his relative interest in the corporation will be unchanged. Without preemptive rights, however, he would have only two hundred of the two thousand shares outstanding; instead of owning 20 percent of the stock, he would own 10 percent.

Most statutes expressly authorize articles of incorporation to deny or limit preemptive rights to the issuance of additionally authorized shares. In about half of the states, preemptive rights exist unless denied by the charter (“opt-out”); in about half of the states, they do not exist unless the charter so provides (“opt-in”).

Certain shares are not subject to preemptive rights. In some states preemptive rights do not apply to the reissue of previously issued shares. In addition, preemptive rights generally do not apply to shares issued for noncash consideration or shares issued in connection with a merger or consolidation. Moreover, preemptive rights do not apply to the issuance of unissued shares that were originally authorized if the shares represent part of the initial capitalization.

The Revised Act adopts the opt-in approach: shareholders have no preemptive rights unless the charter provides for them. If the charter simply states that the corporation elects to have preemptive rights, the shareholders have a preemptive right to acquire proportional amounts of the corporation’s unissued shares but have no such right with respect to (1) shares issued as compensation to directors, officers, and employees; (2) shares issued within six months of incorporation; and (3) shares issued for consideration other than money. In addition, holders of nonvoting preferred stock have no preemptive rights with respect to any class of shares, and holders of voting common shares have no preemptive rights with respect to preferred stock unless the preferred stock is convertible into common stock. The articles of incorporation may expressly modify any one or all of these limitations.

Practical Advice

To protect your ownership share from dilution, when organizing a close corporation you should consider including in the charter a carefully drafted provision for preemptive rights. You should recognize, however, that preemptive rights will protect you only if you can afford to purchase a proportionate part of a new issue of shares.

AMOUNT OF CONSIDERATION FOR SHARES

The board of directors usually determines the price for which the corporation will issue shares, although the charter may reserve this power to the shareholders. Shares are deemed fully paid and nonassessable when the corporation receives the consideration for which the board of directors authorized their issuance. The amount of consideration depends on the kind of shares being issued.

Par Value Stock In some states a corporation must specify in the articles of incorporation either a par value for its shares or that the shares are no par. Par value shares may be issued for any amount, not less than par, set by the board of directors or shareholders. The par value of stock must be stated in the articles of incorporation. The consideration received constitutes stated capital to the extent of the par value of the shares; any consideration in excess of par value constitutes capital surplus. It is common practice to authorize low or nominal par shares, such as $1 per share, and issue these shares at a considerably higher price, thereby providing ample capital surplus. By doing so, the company, in some jurisdictions, obtains greater flexibility in declaring subsequent distributions to shareholders.

The Revised Act, the 1980 amendments to the Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA), and at least twenty-eight states have eliminated the concepts of par value, stated capital, and capital surplus. Under these acts, all shares may be issued for such consideration as authorized by the board of directors or, if the charter so provides, the shareholders. A corporation may, however, elect to issue shares with par value.

No Par Value Stock Shares without par value may be issued for any amount set by the board of directors or shareholders. Under incorporation statutes recognizing par value, stated capital, and capital surplus, the entire consideration a corporation receives for such stock constitutes stated capital unless the board of directors allocates a portion of the consideration to capital surplus. The directors are free to allocate any or all of the consideration received, unless the no par stock has a liquidation preference. In that event, only the consideration in excess of the amount of liquidation preference may be allocated to capital surplus. No par shares provide the directors great latitude in establishing capital surplus, which can, in some jurisdictions, provide greater flexibility in terms of subsequent distributions to shareholders.

Practical Advice

Because a number of states grant more favorable tax treatment to par value stock, often it is more cost effective to issue low par value stock: this approach provides nearly the same flexibility of no par stock but with lower taxes.

Treasury Stock Treasury stock refers to shares that a corporation buys back after it has issued them. Treasury shares are issued but not outstanding, in contrast to shares owned by shareholders, which are deemed issued and outstanding. A corporation may sell treasury shares for any amount the board of directors determines, even if the shares have a par value that is more than the sale price.

Issuance of Shares

VOID

Treasury shares do not provide voting rights or preemptive rights. In addition, no dividend is paid on treasury stock.

The Revised Act carries forward the 1980 amendments to the MBCA, which eliminated the concept of treasury shares. Under the Revised Act, all shares reacquired by a corporation are authorized but unissued shares, unless the articles of incorporation prohibit reissue, in which event the authorized shares are reduced by the number of shares reacquired.

PAYMENT FOR SHARES

Payment for shares involves two major issues. First, what type of consideration may the corporation validly accept in payment for shares? Second, who shall determine the value to be placed upon the consideration the corporation receives in payment for shares?

Type of Consideration The definition of consideration for the issuance of capital stock is somewhat more limited than the definition of consideration under contract law. In about twenty-five states, cash, property, and services actually rendered to the corporation are generally acceptable as valid consideration, whereas promissory notes and promises regarding the performance of future services are not. Some states permit shares to be issued for preincorporation services; other states do not.

The Revised Act greatly liberalized these rules by specifically validating for the issuance of shares consideration consisting of any tangible or intangible property or benefit to the corporation, including cash, services performed, contracts for future services, and promissory notes.

Valuation of Consideration Determining the value to be placed on the consideration that stock purchasers will exchange for shares is the responsibility of the directors. Many jurisdictions hold that this valuation is a matter of opinion and that, in the absence of fraud in the transaction, the judgment of the board of directors as to the value of the consideration the corporation receives for shares shall be conclusive. For example, assume that the directors of Elite Corporation authorize the issuance of two thousand shares of common stock for $10 per share to Kramer for property the directors purportedly value at $20,000. The valuation, however, is fraudulent, and the property is actually worth only $10,000. Kramer is liable to Elite Corporation and its creditors for $10,000. If, on the other hand, the directors had made the valuation without fraud and in good faith, Kramer would not be liable, even though the property is actually worth less than $20,000.

Under the Revised Act, the directors simply determine whether the consideration received (or to be received) for shares is adequate. Their determination is “conclusive insofar as the adequacy of consideration for the issuance of shares relates to whether the shares are validly issued, fully paid, and nonassessable.” Under the Revised Act, the articles of incorporation may reserve to the shareholders the powers granted to the board regarding the issuance of shares.

Practical Advice

To protect the value of your shares from dilution, when organizing a close corporation you should consider including in the charter a carefully drafted provision reserving to the shareholders the power to determine the value of consideration received for the issuance of additional shares.

LIABILITY FOR SHARES

A purchaser of shares has no liability to the corporation or its creditors with respect to shares except to pay the corporation either the consideration for which the shares were authorized to be issued or the consideration specified in the preincorporation stock subscription. When the corporation receives that consideration, the shares are fully paid and nonassessable. A transferee who acquires shares in good faith and without knowledge or notice that the full consideration had not been paid is not personally liable to the corporation or its creditors for the unpaid portion of the consideration.

Classes of Shares

Corporations are generally authorized by statute to issue different classes of stock, which may vary with respect to their rights to dividends, their voting rights, and their right to share in the assets of the corporation on liquidation. The usual stock classifications are common and preferred shares. Although the Revised Act has eliminated the terms preferred and common, it permits the issuance of shares with different preferences, limitations, and relative rights. The Revised Act, however, explicitly requires a corporation’s charter to authorize “(1) one or more classes of shares that together have unlimited voting rights, and (2) one or more classes of shares (which may be the same class or classes as those with voting rights) that together are entitled to receive the net assets of the corporation upon dissolution.” In most states, however, even nonvoting shares may vote on certain mergers, share exchanges, and other fundamental changes that affect that class of shares as a class. See Chapter 37.

COMMON STOCK

Common stock does not have any special contract rights or preferences. Frequently the only class of stock outstanding, it generally represents the greatest proportion of the corporation’s capital structure and bears the greatest risk of loss should the enterprise fail.

PREFERRED STOCK

Stock generally is considered preferred stock if it has contractual rights superior to those of common stock with regard to dividends, assets on liquidation, or both. (Most preferred stock has both dividend and liquidation preferences.) Other special rights or privileges generally do not remove stock from the common stock classification. The articles of incorporation must provide for the contractual rights and preferences of an issue of preferred stock.

Dividend Preferences Though the holders of an issue of preferred stock with a dividend preference will receive full dividends before any dividend may be paid to holders of common stock, no dividend is payable on any class of stock, common or preferred, unless the board of directors has declared such dividend.

Preferred stock may provide that dividends are cumulative, noncumulative, or cumulative to the extent earned. For cumulative dividends, if the board does not declare regular dividends on the preferred stock, such omitted dividends cumulate, and no dividend may be declared on the common stock until all dividend arrearages on the preferred stock are declared and paid. If noncumulative, regular dividends do not cumulate on the board’s failure to declare them, and all rights to a dividend for the period omitted are gone forever. Accordingly, noncumulative stock has priority over common stock only in the fiscal period during which a dividend on common stock is declared. Unless the charter expressly makes the dividends on preferred stock noncumulative, the courts generally hold them to be cumulative. Cumulative-to-the-extent-earned shares cumulate unpaid dividends only to the extent funds were legally available to pay such dividends during that fiscal period.

Preferred stock also may be participating, although generally it is not. Participating preferred shares are entitled to their original dividend, and after the common shares receive a specified amount, the participating preferred stock shares with the common stock in any additional dividends. The nature and extent of such participation on a specified basis with the common stock must be stated in the articles of incorporation. For example, a class of participating preferred stock could be entitled to share at the same rate with the common stock in any additional distribution of earnings for a given year after provision has been made for payment of the prior preferred dividend and for payment of dividends on the common stock at a rate equal to the fixed rate of the preferred.

Liquidation Preferences After a corporation has been dissolved, its assets liquidated, and the claims of its creditors satisfied, the remaining assets are distributed pro rata among the shareholders according to their priority as provided in the articles of incorporation. If a class of stock with a dividend preference does not expressly provide for a preference of any kind on dissolution and liquidation, its holders share pro rata with the common shareholders.

When the articles provide a liquidation preference, preferred stock has priority over common stock to the extent the articles state. In addition, if specified, preferred shares may participate beyond the liquidation preference in a stated ratio with other classes of shares. Such shares are said to be participating preferred with reference to liquidation. Preferred shares not so specified do not participate beyond the liquidation preference.

Practical Advice

When organizing a corporation, consider issuing common stock to the original shareholders and preferred stock to subsequent investors.

STOCK OPTIONS

A corporation may issue stock options entitling their holders to purchase from the corporation shares of a specified class or classes. A stock warrant is a type of stock option that typically has a longer term and is freely transferable. A stock right is a short-term warrant. The board of directors determines the terms upon which stock rights, options, or warrants are issued; their form and content; and the consideration for which the shares are to be issued. Stock options and warrants are used in incentive compensation plans for directors, officers, and employees. Corporations also use them in raising capital to make one class of securities more attractive by including in it the right to purchase shares in another class.

DIVIDENDS AND OTHER DISTRIBUTIONS

The board of directors, at its discretion, determines the time and amount in which to declare distributions and

Types of Dividends and Other Distributions

The Revised Act defines a distribution as [A] direct or indirect transfer of money or other property (except its own shares) or inurrence of indebtedness by a corporation to or for the benefit of its shareholders with respect to any of its shares. A distribution may be in the form of a declaration or payment of a dividend; a purchase, redemption, or other acquisition of shares; a distribution of indebtedness; or otherwise.

A stock or share dividend is a proportional distribution of additional shares of the corporation's capital stock to its shareholders. In a stock split, the corporation simply breaks each of the issued and outstanding shares into a larger number of shares, each representing a proportionately smaller interest in the corporation. Neither a stock dividend nor a stock split is a distribution.

The Revised Act validates in close corporations unanimous shareholder agreements by which the shareholders may relax traditional corporate formalities. This provision of the Act, for example, expressly authorizes shareholder agreements that permit making distributions not in proportion to share ownership.

CASH DIVIDENDS

The most customary type of dividend is a cash dividend, declared and paid at regular intervals from legally available funds. These dividends may vary in amount, depending on the policy of the board of directors and the earnings of the enterprise.

PROPERTY DIVIDENDS

Although dividends are almost always paid in cash, shareholders occasionally have received a property dividend, a distribution of earnings in the form of property. On one occasion, a distillery declared and paid a dividend in bonded whiskey.

LIQUIDATING DIVIDENDS

Although dividends ordinarily are identified with the distribution of profits, a distribution of capital assets to shareholders is referred to as a liquidating dividend in some jurisdictions. Incorporation statutes usually require that the shareholder be informed when a distribution is a liquidating dividend.

REDEMPTION OF SHARES

Redemption is the corporation's repurchase of its own shares, usually at its own option. Though the Model Act and the statutes of many states permit preferred shares to be redeemed, they do not allow the redemption of common stock; in contrast, the Revised Act does not prohibit redeemable common stock. The power of redemption must be expressly provided for in the articles of incorporation.

ACQUISITION OF SHARES

A corporation may acquire its own shares. As stated previously, such shares, unless canceled, are referred to as treasury shares. Under the Revised Act, such shares are considered authorized but unissued. As with redemption, the acquisition of shares constitutes a distribution to shareholders and has an effect similar to that of a dividend.

Legal Restrictions on Dividends and Other Distributions

A number of legal restrictions limit the amount of distributions the board of directors may declare. All states have statutes restricting the funds that are legally available for dividends and other distributions of corporate assets. In many instances, contractual restrictions imposed by lenders provide even more stringent limitations on the declaration of dividends and distributions.

States restrict the payment of dividends and other distributions to protect creditors. All states impose a "cash flow test," the equity insolvency test, which prohibits the payment of any dividend or other distribution when the corporation either is insolvent or would become so through the payment of the dividend or distribution. Insolvency in the equity sense indicates the inability of a corporation to pay its debts as they become due in the usual course of business. In addition, almost all states impose further restrictions on what funds are legally available to pay dividends and other distributions. These additional restrictions, called the balance sheet test, are based on the corporation's assets or balance sheet, whereas the equity insolvency test is based on the corporation's cash flow.

DEFINITIONS

The legal, asset-based restrictions on the payment of dividends or other distributions involve the concepts of earned surplus, surplus, net assets, stated capital, and capital surplus. See Figure 35-2, which displays the key concepts in the legal restrictions on distributions.

Earned surplus consists of the corporation's undistributed net profits, income, gains, and losses, computed from its date of incorporation.

Surplus is the amount by which the net assets of a corporation exceed its stated capital.

Net assets equal the amount by which the total assets of a corporation exceed its total debts.

Stated capital is the sum of the consideration the corporation has received for its issued stock (except that part of the consideration properly allocated to capital surplus), including any amount transferred to stated capital when stock dividends are declared. In the case of par value shares, the amount of stated capital is the total par value of all the issued shares. In the case of no par stock, it is the consideration the corporation has received for all the no par shares it has issued, except that amount allocated in a manner permitted by law, to an account designated as capital surplus or paid-in surplus.

Capital surplus means the entire surplus of a corporation other than its earned surplus. It may result from an allocation of part of the consideration received for no par shares, from any consideration in excess of par value received for par shares, or from a higher reappraisal of certain corporate assets.

LEGAL RESTRICTIONS ON CASH DIVIDENDS

Each state imposes an equity insolvency test on the payment of dividends. The states differ as to the asset-based or balance sheet test they apply. Some apply the earned surplus test and others use the surplus test. The Revised Act adopts a net asset test.

Earned Surplus Test Unreserved and unrestricted earned surplus is available for dividends in all jurisdictions. Many states permit dividends to be paid only from earned surplus; corporations in these jurisdictions may not pay dividends out of capital surplus or stated capital. In addition, dividends may not be paid if the corporation is or would be rendered insolvent in the equity sense by the payment. The MBCA used this test until 1980.

Surplus Test A number of less-restrictive states permit dividends to be paid out of any surplus—earned or capital. Some of these states express a surplus test by prohibiting dividends that impair stated capital. Moreover, dividends may not be paid if the corporation is or would be rendered insolvent in the equity sense by the payment.

Net Assets Test The MBCA, as amended in 1980, and the Revised Act have adopted a net asset test that permits a corporation to pay dividends unless its total assets after such payment would be less than the sum of its total liabilities and the maximum amount that then would be payable for all outstanding shares having preferential rights in liquidation.

LEGAL RESTRICTIONS ON LIQUIDATING DISTRIBUTIONS

Even those states that do not permit cash dividends to be paid from capital surplus usually will permit distributions, or dividends, in partial liquidation from that source. Prior to 1980, the Model Act had such a provision. A

Financial Structure of Corporations

Facts Borman, Inc. is incorporated in a state that permits dividends to be paid only from unreserved and unrestricted earned surplus. It has two classes of outstanding stock: one hundred thousand shares of common stock and four thousand shares of 10 percent cumulative preferred stock with a stated value of $100. In each of 2008, 2009, and 2010, Borman had enough unreserved and unrestricted surplus earnings to pay $100,000 in dividends. However, in 2008 and 2009, the board declared no dividend. In 2010 the board declared a dividend of $10 per share on the preferred and $0.75 per share on the common stock.

Issue To what dividend payments are Borman's stockholders entitled?

Rule of Law The most common type of distribution is a cash dividend, which is payable from legally available funds. In all jurisdictions unreserved and unrestricted earned surplus is available for payment of dividends but in Borman's state dividends may be paid only from unreserved and unrestricted earned surplus. The board of directors has the discretion, but not the obligation, to declare distributions to shareholders. However, the actual amount and timing of a corporation's dividend payments depends on such factors as its working capital requirements, shareholder expectations, and tax consequences.

Corporations are statutorily authorized to issue different classes of stock, which vary in their rights to vote, to dividends, and to payments upon liquidation. The usual stock classifications are common and preferred. Common stock does not have any special contract rights or preferences. Preferred stock has a preference over common stock with respect to payment of dividends and/or with respect to distributions upon liquidation. If preferred stock has a cumulative dividend preference, no dividends may be paid to common stockholders until any current as well as accumulated dividends on that preferred stock have been declared and paid.

Application Borman's board of directors had no obligation in either 2008 or 2009 to declare a dividend. Nonetheless, the preferred stockholders accumulated dividends in 2008 and 2009, because their stock carries cumulative dividend rights. At its issuance, this particular preferred stock was denominated "10 percent cumulative," and it has a stated value of $100. Thus, Borman's preferred stockholders accumulated dividends of $10 per share in each of 2008 and 2009, despite the fact Borman's board did not declare a dividend. This means that before the 2010 dividend declaration, the preferred stockholders were already owed $20 per share. Before a dividend for the common stock can be declared and paid in 2010, this $80,000 ($20 X 4,000 shares) arrearage must be paid to the preferred stockholders. Since the earned surplus available for distribution in 2010 is only $100,000, that year's preferred stock dividend and accumulated arrearages—totaling $120,000—cannot be paid in full. If the board declares and pays this $100,000 to the preferred shareholders, the $20,000 remaining unpaid to them carries forward as an arrearage.

Because there is still an arrearage owed to preferred stockholders, the declaration of a dividend on the common stock was improper, and the common stockholders will receive no dividend payment in 2010. Unlike preferred stockholders, owners of common stock are entitled to dividends only when declared by the board of directors, and then only after dividend arrearages and any current dividend preferences on the preferred stock are declared and paid.

Conclusion The preferred dividend declaration of $10 per share on the preferred is proper. If the board chooses to pay out the remainder of the legally available funds as dividends, the preferred stockholders are entitled to that remainder resulting in a distribution to them of $25 per share. The remaining $5 per share not paid to the preferred stockholders would accumulate. Common stockholders are entitled to nothing; moreover, they will not be paid any dividend in the future until any arrearages and then-current dividends owed to the preferred stockholders have been paid in full.

distribution paid out of such surplus returns to the shareholders' part of their investment.

No such distribution may be made, however, when the corporation is insolvent or would become insolvent by the distribution. Distributions from capital surplus are also restricted to protect the liquidation preference and cumulative dividend arrearages of preferred shareholders. Unless provided for in the articles of incorporation, a liquidating dividend must be authorized not only by the board of directors but also by the affirmative vote of the holders of a majority of the outstanding shares of stock of each class.

Because the Revised Act does not distinguish between cash and liquidating dividends, it therefore imposes the same limitations upon both.

LEGAL RESTRICTIONS ON REDEMPTION AND ACQUISITION OF SHARES

To protect creditors and holders of other classes of shares, most states have statutory restrictions on redemption. A corporation may not redeem or purchase its redeemable shares when insolvent or when such redemption or purchase would render it insolvent or would reduce its net assets below the aggregate amount payable on shares having prior or equal rights to the corporation's assets upon involuntary dissolution.

A corporation may purchase its own shares only out of earned surplus or, if the articles of incorporation permit or if the shareholders approve, out of capital surplus. As with redemption, the corporation may make no purchase of shares when it is insolvent or when such purchase would make it insolvent.

The Revised Act permits a corporation to purchase, redeem, or otherwise acquire its own shares unless (1) the corporation's total assets after the distribution would be less than the sum of its total liabilities and the maximum amount that then would be payable for all outstanding shares having preferential rights in liquidation or (2) the corporation would be unable to pay its debts as they become due in the usual course of its business.

Additional restrictions may apply to a corporation's acquisition of its own shares. In close corporations, for example, courts may scrutinize acquisitions for compliance with the good faith and fair dealing requirements of the fiduciary duty. See Donahue v. Rodd Electrotype Co., Inc. in Chapter 36.

KLANG V. SMITH'S FOOD & DRUG CENTERS, INC.

SUPREME COURT OF DELAWARE, 1997
702 A.2D 150

FACTS Smith's Food & Drug Centers, Inc. (SFD) is a Delaware corporation that owns and operates a chain of supermarkets in the Southwestern United States. Jeffrey P. Smith, SFD's chief executive officer, and his family hold common and preferred stock constituting 62.1 percent voting control of SFD. The plaintiff and the class he purports to represent are holders of common stock in SFD. On January 29, 1996, SFD entered into a merger agreement with the Yucaipa Companies that would involve a recapitalization of SFD and the repurchase by SFD of up to 50 percent of its common stock. SFD was also to repurchase 3 million shares of preferred stock from Jeffrey Smith and his family. SFD hired the investment firm of Houlihan Lokey Howard & Zukin (Houlihan) to examine the transactions, and it rendered a favorable solvency opinion. On May 17, 1996, in reliance on the Houlihan opinion, SFD's board determined that there existed sufficient surplus to consummate the transactions. On May 23, 1996, SFD's stockholders voted to approve the transactions, which closed on that day. The self-tender offer was oversubscribed, so SFD repurchased fully 50 percent of its shares at the offering price of $36 per share.

The plaintiff brought this purported class action alleging that the corporation's repurchase of shares violated the statutory prohibition against the impairment of capital. The Court of Chancery found for SFD. The plaintiff appealed.

DECISION The judgment of the Court of Chancery is affirmed.

OPINION Veasey, C. J. A corporation may not repurchase its shares if, in so doing, it would cause an impairment of capital, unless expressly authorized by [Delaware Corporate Law] Section 160. [Citation.] A repurchase impairs capital if the funds used in the repurchase exceed the amount of the corporation's "surplus," defined by Section 154 to mean the excess of net assets over the par value of the corporation's issued stock. [Citation.]

Plaintiff asked the Court of Chancery to rescind the transactions in question as violative of Section 160. *** First, he contends that SFD's balance sheets constitute conclusive evidence of capital impairment. He argues that the negative net worth that appeared on SFD's books following the repurchase compels us to find a violation of Section 160. Second, he suggests that even allowing the Board to "go behind the balance sheet" to calculate surplus does not save the transactions from violating Section 160. In connection with this claim, he attacks the SFD Board's off-balance-sheet method of calculating surplus on the theory that it does not adequately take into account all of SFD's assets and liabilities. *** We hold that each of these claims is without merit.

Plaintiff advances an erroneous interpretation of Section 160. We understand that the books of a corporation do not necessarily reflect the current values of its assets and liabilities. Among other factors, unrealized appreciation or depreciation can render book numbers inaccurate. It is unrealistic to hold that a corporation is bound by its balance sheets for purposes of determining compliance with Section 160. Accordingly, we adhere to the principles of [citation] allowing corporations to revalue properly its assets and liabilities to show a surplus and thus conform to the statute.

It is helpful to recall the purpose behind Section 160. The General Assembly enacted the statute to prevent boards from draining corporations of assets to the detriment of creditors and the long-term health of the corporation. [Citation.] That a corporation has not yet realized or reflected on its balance sheet the appreciation of assets is irrelevant to this concern. Regardless of what a balance sheet that has not been updated may show, an actual, though unrealized, appreciation reflects real economic value that the corporation may borrow against or that creditors may claim or levy upon. Allowing corporations to revalue assets and liabilities to reflect current realities complies with the statute and serves well the policies behind this statute.

***

On May 17, 1996, Houlihan released its solvency opinion to the SFD Board, expressing its judgment that the merger and self-tender offer would not impair SFD's capital. Houlihan reached this conclusion by comparing SFD's "Total Invested Capital" of $1.8 billion—a figure Houlihan arrived at by valuing SFD's assets under the "market multiple" approach—with SFD's long-term debt of $1.46 billion. This comparison yielded an approximation of SFD's "concluded equity value" equal to $346 million, a figure clearly in excess of the outstanding par value of SFD's stock. Thus, Houlihan concluded, the transactions would not violate Section 160.

The record contains, in the form of the Houlihan opinion, substantial evidence that the transactions complied with Section 160. Plaintiff has provided no reason to distrust Houlihan's analysis. In cases alleging impairment of capital under Section 160, the trial court may defer to the board's measurement of surplus unless a plaintiff can show that the directors "failed to fulfill their duty to evaluate the assets on the basis of acceptable data and by standards which they are entitled to believe reasonably reflect present values." [Citation.] In the absence of bad faith or fraud on the part of the board, courts will not "substitute [our] concepts of wisdom for that of the directors." [Citation.] Here, plaintiff does not argue that the SFD Board acted in bad faith. Nor has he met his burden of showing that the methods and data that underlay the board's analysis are unreliable or that its determination of surplus is so far off the mark as to constitute actual or constructive fraud.

INTERPRETATION A corporation may repurchase stock only out of surplus, but it may revalue its assets and liabilities from book value if the revaluation is done in good faith, on the basis of acceptable data, and by methods that reasonably reflect present values.

ETHICAL QUESTION Was it fair for SFD to repurchase the preferred stock from its controlling shareholders? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION How independent can an investment firm be that is hired by the controlling shareholders of the corporation? Explain.

Declaration and Payment of Distributions

The board of directors of a corporation declares dividends and other distributions, and this power may not be delegated. If the charter clearly and expressly provides for mandatory dividends, however, the board must comply with the provision. Nonetheless, such provisions are extremely infrequent, and shareholders cannot assume this power in any other way, although it is in their power to elect a new board. Moreover, the board cannot discriminate in its declaration of dividends among shareholders of the same class.

SHAREHOLDERS' RIGHT TO COMPEL A DIVIDEND

If the directors fail to declare a dividend, a shareholder may bring a suit in equity against them and the corporation to seek a mandatory injunction requiring the directors to declare a dividend. However, courts of equity are reluctant to order an injunction of this kind, for such a judgment involves substituting the court's business judgment for that of the directors elected by the shareholders. With respect to the directors' discretion regarding the declaration of dividends, a preferred shareholder having prior rights with respect to dividends is in the same position as the holder of common shares.

DODGE V. FORD MOTOR CO.

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN, 1919

204 MICH. 459, 170 N.W. 668

FACTS Ford Motor Company had made large profits for several years. Henry Ford, Ford's president and the dominant figure on its board of directors, declared that although it had paid special dividends in the past, Ford would not, as a matter of policy, pay any special dividends in the future but instead would reinvest the profits in the proposed expansion of the company. At the conclusion of Ford's most prosperous year, John and Horace Dodge, minority shareholders in Ford, brought this action against Ford's directors to compel the declaration of dividends and to enjoin the expansion of the business. The Dodges complained that the reinvestment of the profits was not in the best interests of Ford and its shareholders and that it was an arbitrary action of the directors. The trial court entered a decree requiring the directors to declare and pay a dividend of $19,275,385.96.

DECISION That part of the decree fixing and determining the specific amount to be distributed to stockholders affirmed; decree reversed in other respects.

OPINION Ostrander, J. The case for plaintiffs must rest upon the claim, and the proof in support of it, that the proposed expansion of the business of the corporation involving the further use of profits as capital, ought to be enjoined because inimical to the best interests of the company and its shareholders, and upon the further claim that in any event the withholding of the special dividend asked for by plaintiffs is arbitrary action of the directors requiring judicial interference.

The rule which will govern courts in deciding these questions is not in dispute. *** In [citation], it is stated:

Profits earned by a corporation may be divided among its shareholders; but it is not a violation of the charter if they are allowed to accumulate and remain invested in the company's business. The managing agents of a corporation are impliedly invested with a discretionary power with regard to the time and manner of distributing its profits. They may apply profits in payment of floating or funded debts, or in development of the company's business; and so long as they do not abuse their discretionary powers, or violate the company's charter, the courts cannot interfere.

But it is clear that the agents of a corporation, and even the majority, cannot arbitrarily withhold profits earned by the company, or apply them to any use which is not authorized by the company's charter. The nominal capital of a company does not necessarily limit the scope of its operations; a corporation may borrow money for the purpose of enlarging its business, and in many instances it may use profits for the same purpose. ***

When plaintiffs made their complaint and demand for further dividends the Ford Motor Company had concluded its most prosperous year of business. The demand for its cars at the price of the preceding year continued. It could make and could market in the year beginning August 1, 1916, more than 500,000 cars. Sales of parts and repairs would necessarily increase. The cost of materials was likely to advance, and perhaps the price of labor, but it reasonably might have expected a profit for the year of upwards of $60,000,000. It had assets of more than $132,000,000, a surplus of almost $112,000,000, and its cash on hand and municipal bonds were nearly $54,000,000. Its total liabilities, including capital stock, were a little over $20,000,000. It had declared no special dividend during the business year except the October, 1915, dividend. It had been the practice under similar circumstances, to declare larger dividends. Considering only these facts, a refusal to declare and pay further dividends appears to be not an exercise of discretion on the part of the directors, but an arbitrary refusal to do what the circumstances required to be done. ***

***

The record, and especially the testimony of Mr. Ford, convinces that he has to some extent the attitude towards shareholders of one who has dispensed and distributed to them large gains and that they should be content to take what he chooses to give. His testimony creates the impression, also, that he thinks the Ford Motor Company has made too much money; has had too large profits, and that although large profits might still be earned, a sharing of them with the public, by reducing the price of the output of the company, ought to be undertaken. We have no doubt that certain sentiments, philanthropic and altruistic, creditable to Mr. Ford, had large influence in determining the policy to be pursued by the Ford Motor Company—the policy which has been herein referred to. ***

These cases, after all, like all others in which the subject is treated, turn finally upon the point, the question, whether it appears that the directors were not acting for the best interest of the corporation. *** The difference between an incidental humanitarian expenditure of corporate funds for the benefit of the employees, like the building of a hospital for their use and the employment of agencies for the betterment of their condition, and a general purpose and plan to benefit mankind at the expense of others, is obvious. *** A business corporation is organized and carried on primarily for the profit of the stockholders. The powers of the directors are to be employed for that end. The discretion of directors is to be exercised in the choice of means to attain that end and does not extend to a change in the end itself, to the reduction of profits or to the nondistribution of profits among stockholders in order to devote them to other purposes. ***

INTERPRETATION The right of shareholders to receive a share of the corporation's profits may not be arbitrarily withheld by the directors.

ETHICAL QUESTION Was the court's decision fair to all of the parties? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Under what circumstances should a court override a decision by the board of directors not to declare a dividend? Explain.

EFFECT OF DECLARATION

Once lawfully and properly declared, a cash dividend is considered a debt the corporation owes to the shareholders. It follows from this debtor-creditor relationship that, once declared, a declaration of a cash dividend cannot be rescinded without the shareholders' consent; a stock dividend, however, may be revoked unless actually distributed.

this duty, a director is entitled to rely in good faith on financial statements presented by the corporation's officers, public accountants, or finance committee. Such statements must be prepared on the basis of "accounting practices and principles that are reasonable in the circumstances or on a fair valuation or other method that is reasonable in the circumstances." According to the Comments to the Revised Act, generally accepted accounting principles are always reasonable in the circumstances; other accounting principles may be acceptable under a general standard of reasonableness.

A shareholder's obligation to repay an illegally declared dividend depends on a variety of factors, which may include the faith, good or bad, in which the shareholder accepted the dividend; his knowledge of the facts; the solvency or insolvency of the corporation; and, in some instances, special statutory provisions. The existence of statutory liability on the part of directors does not relieve shareholders from the duty to make repayment.

A shareholder who receives illegal dividends with knowledge of their unlawful character is under a duty to refund them. When the corporation is insolvent, the shareholder may not retain even a dividend received in good faith. However, when an unsuspecting shareholder receives an illegal dividend from a solvent corporation, the majority rule is that the corporation cannot compel a refund.

Liability for Improper Dividends and Distributions

The Revised Act imposes personal liability on the directors of a corporation who vote for or assent to the declaration of a dividend or other distribution of corporate assets contrary to the incorporation statute or the articles of incorporation. The damages equal the amount of the dividend or distribution in excess of the amount that the corporation lawfully may have paid.

A director is not liable if she acted in accordance with the relevant standard of conduct: in good faith, with reasonable care, and in a manner she reasonably believed to be in the best interests of the corporation. (This standard of conduct is discussed in the next chapter.) In discharging

Questions

1. Olympic National Agencies was organized with an authorized capitalization of preferred stock and common stock. The articles of incorporation provided for a 7 percent annual dividend for the preferred stock. The articles further stated that the preferred stock would be given priority interests in the corporation's assets up to the par value of the stock. After some years, the shareholders voted to dissolve Olympic. Olympic's assets greatly exceeded its liabilities. The liquidating trustee petitioned the court for instructions on the respective rights of the shareholders in the assets of the corporation upon dissolution. The court ordered the trustee to distribute the corporate assets remaining after the preference of the preferred stock is satisfied to the common and preferred stockholders on a pro rata basis. Was the court correct in rendering this decision? Explain.

2. XYZ Corporation was duly organized on July 10. Its certificate of incorporation provides for a total authorized capital of $100,000, consisting of one thousand shares of common stock with a par value of $100 per share. The corporation issues for cash a total of fifty certificates, numbered one to fifty inclusive, representing various amounts of shares in the names of various individuals. The shares were all paid for in advance, so the certificates are all dated and mailed on the same day. The fifty certificates of stock represent a total of 1,050 shares. Certificate number forty-nine for thirty shares was issued to Jane Smith. Certificate number fifty for twenty-five shares was issued to William Jones. Is there any question concerning the validity of any of the stock thus issued? What are the rights of Smith and Jones?
3. Doris subscribed for two hundred shares of 12 percent cumulative, participating, redeemable, convertible, preferred shares of the Ritz Hotel Company with a par value of $100 per share. The subscription agreement provided that she was to receive a bonus of one share of common stock of $100 par value for each share of preferred stock. Doris fully paid her subscription agreement of $20,000 and received the two hundred shares of preferred stock and the bonus stock of two hundred shares of the par value common. The Ritz Hotel company later becomes insolvent. Ronald, the receiver of the corporation, brings suit for $20,000, the par value of the common stock. What judgment?
4. Hyperion Company has an authorized capital stock of one thousand shares with a par value of $100 per share, of which nine hundred shares, all fully paid, were outstanding. Having an ample surplus, Hyperion Company purchased from its shareholders one hundred shares at par. Subsequently, Hyperion, needing additional working capital, issued the two hundred shares in question to Alexander at $80 per share. Two years later, Hyperion Company was forced into bankruptcy. How much, if any, may the trustee in bankruptcy recover from Alexander?
5. For five years, Henry and James had been engaged as partners in building houses. They owned the equipment necessary to conduct the business and had an excellent reputation. In March, Joyce, who previously had been in the same kind of business, proposed that Henry, James, and Joyce form a corporation for the purpose of constructing medium-priced houses. They engaged attorney Portia, who did all the work required and caused the business to be incorporated under the name of Libra Corp.

The certificate of incorporation authorized one thousand shares of $100 par value stock. At the organizational meeting of the incorporators, Henry, James, and Joyce were elected directors, and Libra Corp. issued a total of six hundred and fifty shares of its stock. Henry and James each received two hundred shares in consideration for transferring to Libra Corp. the equipment and goodwill of their partnership, which had a combined value of more than $40,000. Joyce received two hundred shares as an inducement to work for Libra Corp. in the future, and Portia received fifty shares as compensation for the legal services she rendered in forming Libra Corp.

Later that year, Libra Corp. had a number of financial setbacks and in December ceased operations. What rights, if any, does Libra Corp. have against Henry, James, Joyce, and Portia in connection with the original issuance of its shares?
6. Paul Bunyan is the owner of noncumulative 8 percent preferred stock in the Broadview Corporation, which had no earnings or profits in 2008. In 2009, the corporation had large profits and a surplus from which it might properly have declared dividends. However, the directors refused to do so, using the surplus instead to purchase goods necessary for the corporation's expanding business. The corporation earned a small profit in 2010. The directors at the end of 2010 declared a 10 percent dividend on the common stock and an 8 percent dividend on the preferred stock without paying preferred dividends for 2009.
  - a. Is Bunyan entitled to dividends for 2008? For 2009?
  - b. Is Bunyan entitled to a dividend of 10 percent rather than 8 percent in 2010?
7. Alpha Corporation has outstanding four hundred shares of $100 par value common stock, which has been issued and sold at $105 per share for a total of $42,000. Alpha is incorporated in State X, which has adopted the earned surplus test for all distributions. At a time when the assets of the corporation amount to $65,000 and the liabilities to creditors total $10,000, the directors learn that Rachel, who holds one hundred of the four hundred shares of stock, is planning to sell her shares on the open market for $10,500. Believing that this will not be in the best interest of the corporation, the directors enter into an agreement with Rachel to buy the shares for $10,500. About six months later, when the assets of the corporation have decreased to $50,000 and its liabilities, not including its liability to Rachel, have increased to $20,000, the directors use $10,000 to pay a dividend to all of the shareholders. The corporation later becomes insolvent.
  - a. Does Rachel have any liability to the corporation or its creditors in connection with the corporation's reacquisition of the one hundred shares?
  - b. Was the payment of the $10,000 dividend proper?
8. Almega Corporation, organized under the laws of State S, has outstanding twenty thousand shares of $100 par value nonvoting preferred stock calling for noncumulative dividends of $5 per year; ten thousand shares of voting preferred stock of $50 par value, calling for cumulative dividends of $2.50 per year; and ten thousand shares of no par common stock. State S has adopted the earned surplus test for all distributions. As of the end of 2005, the corporation had no earned surplus. In 2006, the corporation had net earnings of $170,000; in 2007, $135,000; in 2008, $60,000; in 2009, $210,000; and in 2010, $120,000. The board of directors passed over all dividends during the four years from 2006 to 2009, as the company needed working capital for expansion purposes. In 2010, however, the directors declared a dividend of $5 per share on the noncumulative preferred shares, a dividend of $12.50 per share on the cumulative preferred shares, and a dividend of $30 per share on the common stock. The board submitted its declaration to the voting shareholders, and they ratified it. Before the dividends were paid, Payne, the record holder of five hundred shares of the noncumulative preferred stock, brought an appropriate action to restrain any payment to the cumulative preferred or common shareholders until the company paid a full dividend for the period from 2006 to 2010. Decision? What is the maximum lawful dividend that may be paid to the owner of each share of common stock?

9. Sayre learned that Adams, Boone, and Chase were planning to form a corporation for the purpose of manufacturing and marketing a line of novelties to wholesale outlets. Sayre had patented a self-locking gas tank cap but lacked the financial backing to market it profitably. He negotiated with Adams, Boone, and Chase, who agreed to purchase the patent rights for $5,000 in cash and two hundred shares of $100 par value preferred stock in a corporation to be formed.

The corporation was formed and Sayre's stock issued to him, but the corporation has refused to make the cash payment. It has also refused to declare dividends, although the business has been very profitable because of Sayre's patent and has a substantial earned surplus with a large cash balance on hand. It is selling the remainder of the originally authorized issue of preferred shares, ignoring Sayre's demand to purchase a proportionate number of these shares. What are Sayre's rights, if any?

Case Problems

10. Wood, the receiver of Stanton Oil Company, sued Stanton's shareholders to recover dividends paid to them for three years, claiming that at the time these dividends were declared, Stanton was in fact insolvent. Wood did not allege that the present creditors were also creditors when the dividends were paid. Were the dividends wrongfully paid? Explain.
11. International Distributing Export Company (IDE) was organized as a corporation on September 7, 2003, under the laws of New York and commenced business on November 1, 2003. IDE formerly had existed as a sole proprietorship. On October 31, 2003, the newly organized corporation had liabilities of $64,084. Its only assets, in the sum of $33,042, were those of the former sole proprietorship. The corporation, however, set up an asset on its balance sheet in the amount of $32,000 for goodwill. As a result of this entry, IDE had a surplus at the end of each of its fiscal years from 2004 until 2009. Cano, a shareholder, received $7,144 in dividends from IDE during the period from 2005 to 2010. May Fried, the trustee in bankruptcy of IDE, recover the amount of these dividends from Cano on the basis that they had been paid when IDE was insolvent or when its capital was impaired?

Chapter 36

MANAGEMENT STRUCTURE OF CORPORATIONS

The director is really a watch-dog, and the watch-dog has no right, without the knowledge of his master, to take a sop from a possible wolf.

CHIEF JUSTICE TIMOTHY BOWEN, 1892

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Compare the actual governance of closely held corporations, the actual governance of publicly held corporations, and the statutory model of corporate governance.
2. Explain the role of shareholders in the management of a corporation.
3. Explain the role of the board of directors in the management of a corporation.
4. Explain the role of officers in the management of a corporation.
5. Explain management's duties of loyalty, obedience, and diligence.

The corporate management structure, as required by state incorporation statutes, is pyramidal. At the base of the pyramid are the shareholders, who are the residual owners of the corporation. Basic to their role in controlling the corporation is the right to elect representatives to manage the ordinary business matters of the corporation and the right to approve all extraordinary matters.

The board of directors, as the shareholders' elected representatives, are delegated the power to manage the business of the corporation. Directors exercise dominion and control over the corporation, hold positions of trust and confidence, and determine questions of operating policy. Because they are not expected to devote their full time to the corporation's affairs, directors have broad authority to delegate power to agents and to officers, who hold their offices at the will of the board. These officers, in turn, hire and fire all necessary operating personnel and run the day-to-day affairs of the corporation. The pyramid structure of corporate management under the statutory model is illustrated in Figure 36-1 on page 740.

CORPORATE GOVERNANCE

The statutory model of corporate management, although required by most states, accurately describes the actual governance of only a few corporations. The great majority of corporations are closely held: they have a small number of stockholders and no ready market for their shares, and most of the shareholders actively participate in the management of the business. Typically, the shareholders of a closely held corporation are also its directors and officers. Figure 36-2 depicts the actual management structure of a typical closely held corporation.

Although the statutory model and the actual governance of closely held corporations diverge, in most states closely held corporations must adhere to the general corporate statutory model. One of the greatest burdens conventional general business corporation statutes impose on closely held corporations is a set of rigid corporate formalities. Although these formalities may be necessary and desirable in publicly held corporations having separate management and ownership, in a closely held corporation, where the owners are usually the managers, many of these formalities are unnecessary and meaningless. Consequently, shareholders in closely held corporations tend to disregard the formalities, sometimes forfeiting their limited liability as a result. In response to this problem, the 1969 amendments to the Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA), which were carried over to the Revised Act, included several liberalizing provisions for closely held corporations. Moreover, about twenty states have enacted special legislation to accommodate the needs of closely held corporations. These statutes vary considerably, but they are all optional and must be specifically elected by eligible corporations. Eligibility is generally based on the corporation's having fewer than a specified number of shareholders. These special close corporation statutes permit operation without a board of directors and authorize broad use of shareholder agreements, including their use in place of bylaws. Some prohibit courts from denying limited liability simply because an electing corporation engages in informal conduct.

As noted in Chapter 34, a Statutory Close Corporation Supplement (the Supplement) to the Model and Revised Acts has been promulgated. The Supplement relaxes most of the nonessential corporate formalities. It permits operation without a board of directors, authorizes broad use of shareholder agreements (including their use in place of bylaws), makes annual meetings optional, and authorizes one person to execute documents in more than one capacity. Most important, it prevents courts from denying limited liability simply because the corporation is a statutory close corporation. The general incorporation statute applies to closely held corporations except to the extent that it is inconsistent with the Supplement.

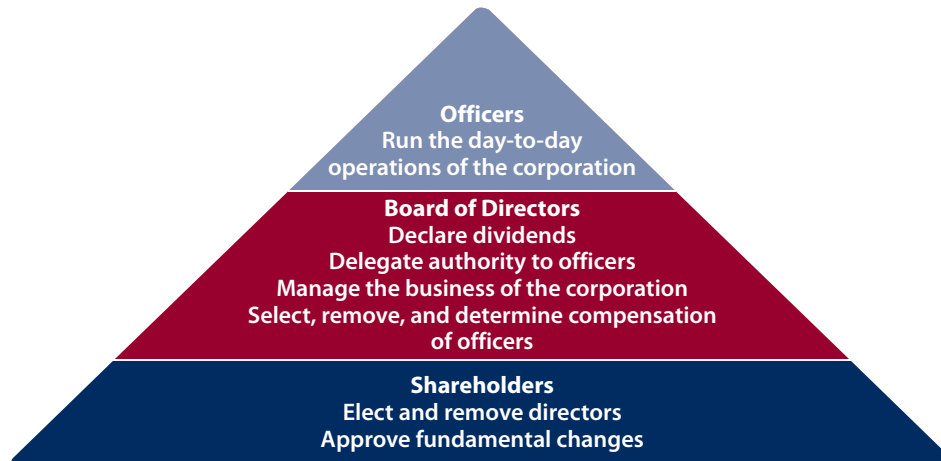

The Revised Act was amended to authorize shareholders in closely held corporations to adopt unanimous shareholders' agreements that depart from the statutory norms. This section of the Act requires that the agreement be set forth either (1) in the articles of incorporation or bylaws and approved by all persons who are shareholders at the time of the agreement or (2) in a written agreement that is signed by all persons who are shareholders at the time of the agreement and is made known to the corporation. Under this section, shareholder agreements are valid for ten years unless otherwise provided. The section specifically validates a number of provisions, including those (1) eliminating or restricting the powers of the board of directors; (2) establishing who shall be directors or officers; (3) specifying how directors or officers will be selected or removed; (4) governing the exercise or division of voting power by or between the shareholders and directors; (5) permitting the use of weighted voting rights or director proxies; (6) transferring the authority of the board of directors to one or more shareholders or other persons. The section also generally authorizes any provision that governs the exercise of the corporate powers or the management of the business and affairs of the corporation or the relationship among the shareholders, the directors and the corporation, or among any of them, so long as it is not contrary to public policy. There are limits, however, and a shareholder agreement that provides that the directors of the corporation have no duties of care or loyalty to the corporation or the shareholders would be beyond the authorization of the section. To the extent that an agreement authorized by this section limits the discretion or powers of the board of directors, it relieves the directors of liability while imposing that liability upon the person or persons in whom such discretion or powers are vested.

In sharp contrast is the large, publicly held corporation with a vast market for its shares. These shares typically are widely dispersed, and very few are owned by management. Approximately two-thirds are held by institutional investors (such as insurance companies, pension and retirement funds, mutual funds, and university endowments). The remaining shares are owned directly by individual investors. Whereas the great majority of institutional investors exercise their right to vote their shares, most individual investors do not. Nonetheless, virtually all shareholders who vote for the directors do so through the use of a proxy—an authorization by a shareholder to an agent (usually the chief executive officer of the corporation) to vote his shares. The majority of shareholders who return their proxies vote as management advises. As a result, the nominating committee of the board of directors actually determines the board's membership. Figure 36-3 illustrates the actual management structure of a typical large, publicly held corporation.

Thus, the five hundred to one thousand large, publicly held corporations—which own the great bulk of the industrial wealth of the United States—are controlled by a small group of corporate officers. This great concentration of the control over wealth, and the power that results from it, raises social, policy, and ethical issues concerning the governance of these corporations and the accountability of their management. The actions (or inactions) of these powerful corporations greatly affect the national economy, employment policies, the health and safety of the workplace and the environment, the quality of products, and the effects of overseas operations. Accordingly, the accountability of management is a critical issue.

In response to the business scandals involving companies such as Enron, WorldCom, Global Crossing, Adelphia, and Arthur Andersen, in 2002 Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which is discussed further in Chapter 40, Securities Regulation, as well as in Chapters 6 and 44. The legislation seeks to prevent these types of scandals by increasing corporate responsibility; adding new financial disclosure requirements; creating new criminal offenses; increasing the penalties for existing federal crimes; and creating a five-person Accounting Oversight Board with authority to review and discipline auditors. Several provisions of the Act impose governance requirements on publicly held corporations and will be discussed in this chapter.

The structure and governance of corporations must adhere to incorporation statute requirements. Therefore, in this chapter we will discuss the rights, duties, and liabilities of shareholders, directors, and officers under these statutes.

ROLE OF SHAREHOLDERS

The role of the shareholders in managing the corporation is generally restricted to the election of directors, the approval of certain extraordinary matters, the approval of corporate transactions that are void or voidable unless ratified, and the right to bring suits to enforce these rights.

Voting Rights of Shareholders

The shareholder's right to vote is fundamental to the concept of the corporation and its management structure. In most states today, a shareholder is entitled to one vote for each share of stock that she owns, unless the articles of incorporation provide otherwise; the articles may provide for more or less than one vote for any share. In addition, incorporation statutes generally permit the issuance of one or more classes of nonvoting stock, as long as at least one class of shares has voting rights.

SHAREHOLDER MEETINGS

Shareholders may exercise their voting rights at both annual and special shareholder meetings. Under the Revised Act, annual meetings are required and must be held at a time fixed by the corporation's bylaws. If the annual shareholder meeting is not held within the earlier of six months after the end of the corporation's fiscal year or fifteen months after its last annual meeting, any shareholder may petition and obtain a court order requiring that a meeting be held. By comparison, the Close Corporation Supplement provides that no annual meeting of shareholders need be held unless a shareholder makes a written request at least thirty days in advance of the date specified for the meeting. The date may be established in the articles of incorporation, the bylaws, or a shareholder agreement.

Special meetings may be called by the board of directors, by holders of at least 10 percent of the shares, or by other persons authorized to do so in the articles of incorporation. As amended, the Revised Act permits a corporation's articles of incorporation to lower or raise the 10 percent requirement, but the corporation cannot raise the requirement to more than 25 percent of the shares.

Written notice stating the date, time, and place of the meeting and, in the case of a special meeting, the purposes for which it is called must be given in advance. Notice, however, may be waived in writing by any shareholder entitled to notice.

A number of states permit shareholders to conduct business without a meeting if all the shareholders consent in writing to the action taken. Some states have further relaxed the formalities of shareholder action by permitting shareholders to act without a meeting with the written consent of only the number of shares required to act on the matter.

QUORUM AND VOTING

A quorum of shares must be presented at the meeting, either in person or by proxy. Unissued shares and treasury stock may not be voted or counted in determining whether a quorum exists. Decisions made at the meeting will have no effect if a quorum is not present. The majority view is that once a quorum is present at a meeting, it is deemed present for the rest of the meeting, even if shareholders withdraw in an effort to break it. Unless the articles of incorporation otherwise provide, a majority of shares entitled to vote constitutes a quorum. In most states and under the Model Act, a quorum may not consist of less than one-third of the shares entitled to vote; the Revised Act and some states do not contain a statutory minimum for a quorum. Because state statutes do not impose an upper limit upon a quorum, it may be set higher than a majority and may even require all the outstanding shares.

Most states require shareholder actions to be approved by a majority of the shares represented at the meeting and entitled to vote if a quorum exists. The Revised Act and some states, however, provide a different rule: if a quorum exists, a shareholder action (other than the election of directors) is approved if the votes cast for the action exceed the votes cast against it. Moreover, virtually all states permit the articles of incorporation to increase the percentage of shares required to take any action that is subject to shareholder approval. A provision that increases the voting requirements is commonly called a "supermajority provision." Close corporations frequently have used supermajority shareholder voting requirements to protect minority shareholders from oppression by the majority. Recently, some publicly held corporations have used them to defend against hostile takeover bids as well.

Practical Advice

If you are forming a close corporation and will hold a minority interest in it, consider including in the charter supermajority quorum and voting provisions for shareholder decisions to ensure that you will have veto power over specified managerial issues.

ELECTION OF DIRECTORS

The shareholders elect directors each year at the annual shareholders' meeting. Most states provide that when a corporation's board consists of nine or more directors, the charter or bylaws may provide for a classification or staggering of directors, that is, a division into two or three classes to be as nearly equal in number as possible and to serve for staggered terms. Under the Revised Act as amended there is no minimum-size board required. If the directors are divided into two classes, the members of each class are elected once a year in alternate years for a two-year term; if divided into three classes, they are elected for three-year terms. This permits one-half of the board to be elected every two years or one-third to be elected every three years, thus providing continuity in the board's membership. Moreover, given two or more classes of shares and the authorization for such an action in the articles of incorporation, each class may elect a specified number of directors.

Straight Voting Normally, each shareholder has one vote for each share owned, and under the Revised Act and many state statutes, directors are elected by a plurality of the votes. In other states directors are elected by a majority of the votes. The charter may increase the percentage of shares required for the election of directors. Thus, under straight voting shareholders owning a majority of the voting shares can always elect the entire board of directors.

Cumulative Voting In certain states shareholders electing directors have the right of cumulative voting. In most states, and under the Revised Act, cumulative voting is permissive, not mandatory. Cumulative voting entitles shareholders to multiply the number of votes they are entitled to cast by the number of directors for whom they are entitled to vote and to cast the product for a single candidate or distribute the product among two or more candidates. Cumulative voting permits a minority shareholder or a group of minority shareholders acting together to obtain minority representation on the board if they own a certain minimum number of shares. In the absence of cumulative voting, the holder or holders of 51 percent of the voting shares can elect all of the members of the board.

The formula for determining how many shares a minority shareholder with cumulative voting rights must own, or have proxies to vote, in order to secure representation on the board is as follows:

$$X = \frac{ac}{b+1} + 1$$

where

a = number of shares voting

b = number of directors to be elected

c = number of directors desired to be elected

X = number of shares necessary to elect the number of directors desired to be elected.

For example, Gray Corporation has two shareholders, Stephanie with sixty-four shares and Thomas with thirty-six shares. The board of directors of Gray Corporation consists of three directors. Under "straight" or noncumulative voting, Stephanie could cast sixty-four votes for each of her three candidates, and Thomas could cast thirty-six votes for his three candidates. As a result, all three of Stephanie's candidates would be elected. On the other hand, if cumulative voting were in force, Thomas could elect one director:

$$X = \frac{ac}{b+1} + 1$$

$$X = \frac{100(1)}{3+1} + 1 = 26 \text{ shares}$$

Because Thomas has the right to vote more than twenty-six shares, he would be able to elect one director. Stephanie, of course, with her sixty-four shares, could elect the remaining two directors.

Practical Advice

If you are forming a close corporation and will hold a minority interest in it, consider including in the charter a provision for cumulative voting to ensure you a position on the board of directors.

REMOVAL OF DIRECTORS

By a majority vote, shareholders may remove any director or the entire board of directors, with or without cause, in a meeting called for that purpose. In the case of a corporation having cumulative voting, however, removal of a director requires sufficient votes to prevent his election. We will discuss the removal of directors more fully later in this chapter.

APPROVAL OF FUNDAMENTAL CHANGES

The board of directors manages the ordinary business affairs of the corporation. Extraordinary matters involving fundamental changes in the corporation require shareholder approval; such matters include amendments to the articles of incorporation, a sale or lease of all or substantially all of the corporate assets not in the regular course of business, most mergers, consolidations, compulsory share exchanges, and dissolution. We will discuss fundamental changes in Chapter 37.

CONCENTRATIONS OF VOTING POWER

Certain devices enable groups of shareholders to combine their voting power for purposes such as obtaining or maintaining control or maximizing the impact of cumulative voting. The most important methods of concentrating voting power are proxies, voting trusts, and shareholder agreements.

Proxies A shareholder may vote either in person or by written proxy. As we mentioned earlier, a proxy is a shareholder's authorization to an agent to vote his shares at a particular meeting or on a particular question. Generally, proxies must be in writing to be effective, and statutes typically limit the duration of proxies to no more than eleven months, unless the proxy specifically provides otherwise. Some states limit all proxy appointments to a period of eleven months. Because a proxy is the appointment of an agent, it is revocable, as all agencies are, unless conspicuously stated to be irrevocable and coupled with an interest, such as shares held as collateral. The solicitation of proxies by publicly held corporations is also regulated by the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, as we will discuss in Chapter 40.

Voting Trusts Voting trusts, which are devices designed to concentrate corporate control in one or more persons, have been used in both publicly held and closely held corporations. A voting trust is a device by which one or more shareholders separate the voting rights of their shares from the ownership of them. Under a voting trust, one or more shareholders confer on a trustee the right to vote or otherwise act for them by signing an agreement setting out the provisions of the trust and transferring their shares to the trustee. In most states, voting trusts are permitted by statute but usually are limited in duration to ten years.

Shareholder Voting Agreements In most jurisdictions, shareholders may agree in writing to vote in a specified manner for the election or removal of directors or on any matter subject to shareholder approval. Unlike voting trusts, shareholder voting agreements are not limited in duration. Shareholder agreements are used frequently in closely held corporations, especially in conjunction with restrictions on the transfer of shares, in order to provide each shareholder with greater control and delectus personae (the right to choose those who will become shareholders).

Practical Advice

If you are forming a close corporation and will hold a minority interest in it, consider using a detailed shareholder agreement to provide fair treatment for all of the shareholders.

GALLER V. GALLER

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS, 1964
32 ILL.2D 16, 203 N.E.2D 577

FACTS In 1927, two brothers, Benjamin and Isadore Galler, incorporated the Galler Drug Co., a wholesale drug business that they had operated as equal partners since 1919. The company continued to grow, and in 1955 the two brothers and their wives, Emma and Rose Galler, entered into a written shareholder agreement to leave the corporation in equal control of each family after the death of either brother. Specifically, the agreement provided that the corporation should continue to provide income for the support and maintenance of their immediate families and that the parties should vote for directors so as to give the estate and heirs of a deceased shareholder the same representation as before.

Benjamin died in 1957, and shortly thereafter his widow, Emma, requested that Isadore, the surviving brother, comply with the terms of the agreement. When he refused and proposed that certain changes be made in the agreement, Emma brought this action seeking specific performance of the agreement. Isadore and his wife Rose defended on the ground that the shareholder agreement was against public policy and the state's corporation law. The trial court entered a decree of specific performance in favor of Emma. On appeal, the decree was reversed.

DECISION Judgment of appellate court reversed.

OPINION Underwood, J. *** [I]t should be emphasized that we deal here with a so-called close corporation.

Various attempts at definition of the close corporation have been made. [Citation.] For our purposes, a close corporation is one in which the stock is held in a few hands, or in a few families, and wherein it is not at all, or only rarely, dealt in by buying or selling. [Citation.] Moreover, it should be recognized that shareholder agreements similar to that in question here are often, as a practical consideration, quite necessary for the protection of those financially interested in the close corporation. While the shareholder of a public-issue corporation may readily sell his shares on the open market should management fail to use, in his opinion, sound business judgment, his counterpart of the close corporation often has a large total of his entire capital invested in the business and has no ready market for his shares should he desire to sell. He feels, understandably, that he is more than a mere investor and that his voice should be heard concerning all corporate activity. Without a shareholder agreement, specifically enforceable by the courts, insuring him a modicum of control, a large minority shareholder might find himself at the mercy of an oppressive or unknowledgeable majority. Moreover, as in the case at bar, the shareholders of a close corporation are often also the directors and officers thereof. With substantial shareholding interests abiding in each member of the board of directors, it is often quite impossible to secure, as in the large public-issue corporation, independent board judgment, free from personal motivations concerning corporate policy. For these and other reasons too voluminous to enumerate here, often the only sound basis for protection is afforded by a lengthy, detailed shareholder agreement securing the rights and obligations of all concerned.

***

*** While limiting voting trusts in 1947 to a maximum duration of 10 years, the legislature has indicated no similar policy regarding straight voting agreements although these have been common since prior to 1870. ***

***

We turn next to a consideration of the effect of the stated purpose of the agreement upon its validity. The pertinent provision is: "The said Benjamin A. Galler and Isadore A. Galler desire to provide income for the support and maintenance of their immediate families." Obviously, there is no evil inherent in a contract entered into for the reason that the persons originating the terms desired to so arrange their property as to provide post-death support for those dependent upon them. Nor does the fact that the subject property is corporate stock alter the situation so long as there exists no detriment to minority stock interests, creditors or other public injury.

***

The terms of the dividend agreement require a minimum annual dividend of $50,000, but this duty is limited by the subsequent provision that it shall be operative only so long as an earned surplus of $500,000 is maintained. It may be noted that in 1958, the year prior to commencement of this litigation, the corporation's net earnings after taxes amounted to $202,759 while its earned surplus was $1,543,270 and this was increased in 1958 to $1,680,079 while earnings were $172,964. The minimum earned surplus requirement is designed for the protection of the corporation and its creditors, and we take no exception to the contractual dividend requirements as thus restricted. [Citation.]

The salary continuation agreement is a common feature, in one form or another, of corporate executive employment. It requires that the widow should receive a total benefit, payable monthly over a five-year period, aggregating twice the amount paid her deceased husband in one year. This requirement was likewise limited for the protection of the corporation by being contingent upon the payments being income tax-deductible by the corporation. The charge made in those cases which have considered the validity of payment to the widow of an officer and shareholder in a corporation is that a gift of its property by a noncharitable corporation is in violation of the rights of its shareholders and ultra vires. Since there are no shareholders here other than the parties to the contract, this objection is not here applicable, and its effect, as limited, upon the corporation is not so prejudicial as to require its invalidation.

INTERPRETATION Written shareholder agreements are an important means of enabling minority shareholders in a close corporation to maintain delectus personae and control as well as otherwise protecting their interest in the corporation.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the court decide this case fairly? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What limitations, if any, should the law impose upon the types of provisions that may be included in a shareholder agreement in a close corporation? Explain.

RESTRICTIONS ON TRANSFER OF SHARES

In the absence of a specific agreement, shares of stock are freely transferable. Although free transferability of shares is usually considered an advantage of the corporate form, in some situations the shareholders may prefer to restrict the transfer of shares. In closely held corporations, for example, stock transfer restrictions are used to control who may become shareholders, thereby achieving the corporate equivalent of delectus personae (choice of the person). They are also used to maintain statutory close corporation status by restricting the number of persons who may become shareholders. In publicly held corporations, restrictions on the transfer of shares are used to preserve exemptions under state and federal securities laws. (These are discussed in Chapter 40.)

Most incorporation statutes have no provisions governing share transfer restrictions. The common law validates such restrictions if they are adopted for a lawful purpose and do not unreasonably restrain or prohibit transferability. In addition, the Uniform Commercial Code provides that an otherwise-valid share transfer restriction is ineffective against a person without actual knowledge of it unless the restriction is conspicuously noted on the share certificate.

The Revised Act and the statutes of several states permit the articles of incorporation, bylaws, or a shareholder agreement to impose transfer restrictions but require that the restriction be noted conspicuously on the stock certificate. The Revised Act authorizes restrictions for any reasonable purpose, including maintaining statutory close corporation status and preserving exemptions under federal and state securities law.

Practical Advice

To achieve delectus personae (choice of person) when organizing a close corporation, you should consider including in the charter a carefully drafted provision restricting the transfer of shares. If you do so, be sure to note such share transfer restriction on the share certificates.

Enforcement Rights of Shareholders

To protect a shareholder's interests in the corporation, the law provides shareholders with certain enforcement rights. These include the right to obtain information, the right to sue the corporation directly or to sue on the corporation's behalf, and the right to dissent.

RIGHT TO INSPECT BOOKS AND RECORDS

Most states have enacted statutory provisions granting shareholders the right to inspect, for a proper purpose, books and records in person or through an agent and to copy parts of them. The right generally covers all records relevant to the shareholder's legitimate interest. The Revised Act provides that every shareholder is entitled to examine specified corporate records upon prior written request if the demand is made in good faith, for a proper purpose, and during regular business hours at the corporation's principal office. Many states, however, limit this right to shareholders who own a minimum number of shares or to those who have been shareholders for a minimum period of time. For example, the Model Act requires that a shareholder either must own 5 percent of the outstanding shares or must have owned his shares for at least six months (though a court may order an inspection even when neither condition is met).

A proper purpose for inspection is one that is reasonably relevant to that shareholder's interest in the corporation. Proper purposes include determining the financial condition of the corporation, the value of shares, the existence of mismanagement, or the names of other shareholders in order to communicate with them about corporate affairs. The right of inspection is subject to abuse and will be denied a shareholder who is seeking proprietary information for an improper purpose. Examples of improper purposes include obtaining information for use by a competing company or obtaining a list of shareholders in order to offer it for sale.

COMPAQ COMPUTER CORP. V. HORTON

SUPREME COURT OF DELAWARE, 1993

631 A.2D 1

FACTS Charles E. Horton has beneficially owned 112 shares of common stock in Compaq Computer Corporation (Compaq), a Delaware corporation, continuously since December 6, 1990. On July 22, 1991, Horton and seventy-eight other parties sued Compaq, fifteen of its advisers, and certain management personnel, alleging that Compaq and its codefendants violated the Texas Security Act and the Texas Deceptive Trade Practices Consumer Protection Act as well as committing fraud and breaching their fiduciary duty. All these claims arise from the contention that Compaq misled the public regarding the true value of its stock at a time when members of management were selling their own shares.

On September 22, 1992, Horton delivered a letter demanding to inspect Compaq's stock ledger and related information for the period from October 1, 1990, to June 30, 1991. The demand letter stated that the purpose of the request was to enable Horton to communicate with other Compaq shareholders to inform them of the pending shareholders' suit and to ascertain whether any of them would desire to become associated with that suit or bring similar actions against Compaq and assume a pro rata share of the litigation expenses. On September 30, 1992, Compaq refused the demand, stating that the purpose described in the letter was not a "proper purpose" under Section 220(b) of the General Corporation Law of the state of Delaware.

Horton brought suit and the trial court concluded that the plaintiff's desire to contact other stockholders and solicit their involvement in the litigation was a purpose reasonably related to his interest as a stockholder. Accordingly, the trial court ordered Compaq to permit Horton to inspect and copy the stockholder lists and related stockholder information requested in his demand letter. Compaq appealed.

DECISION Judgment affirmed.

OPINION Moore, J. *** § 220(b)*** provides in pertinent part:

Any stockholder *** shall, upon written demand under oath stating the purpose thereof, have the right during the usual hours for business to inspect for any proper purpose the corporation's stock ledger. *** A proper purpose shall mean a purpose reasonably related to such person's interest as a stockholder. [Citation.]

Under Section 220, when a stockholder complies with the statutory requirements as to form and manner of making a demand, then the corporation bears the burden of proving that the demand is for an improper purpose. [Citation]. If there is any doubt, it must be resolved in favor of the statutory right of the stockholder to have an inspection. [Citation.]

Horton contends that this purpose is not only proper, but was earlier approved in State ex rel. Foster v. Standard Oil Co. of Kansas [citation]. The holding in Standard Oil has been interpreted by a number of authoritative treatises for the proposition Horton advances—that shareholders may inspect stocklists for the purpose of communicating with fellow shareholders, not only about pending litigation, but to solicit their interest in joining it. [Citations.] ***

Essentially, Horton alleges that it is in the interests of Compaq's shareholders to know that acts of mismanagement and fraud are continuing and cannot be overlooked. Thus, it is assumed that the resultant filing of a large number of individual damage claims might well discourage further acts of misconduct by the defendants. In this specific context, the antidotal effect of the Texas litigation may indeed serve a purpose reasonably related to Horton's current interest as a Compaq stockholder.

We recognize that even though a purpose may be reasonably related to one's interest as a stockholder, it cannot be adverse to the interests of the corporation. [Citations.] In this respect, it becomes clear that a stockholder's right to inspect and copy a stockholder list is not absolute. Rather, it is a qualified right depending on the facts presented. [Citation.]

Horton's ultimate objective, to solicit additional parties to the Texas litigation, may impose substantial expenses upon the company. Compaq argues, therefore, that such a purpose is per se improper as adverse to the interests of the corporation. ***

Horton, as a current stockholder of Compaq, has nothing to gain by harming the legitimate interests of the company. Moreover, as he argues, the prospect of the Texas litigation poses no legitimate threat to Compaq's interests. The Texas litigation is already pending with seventy-nine plaintiffs. The inclusion of more plaintiffs will not substantially increase Compaq's costs of defending the action. The real risk to Compaq is that any additional plaintiffs, who may join the suit, potentially increase the damage award against the company. Yet, insofar as law and policy require corporations and their agents to answer for the breaches of their duties to shareholders, Compaq has no legitimate interest in avoiding the payment of compensatory damages which it, its management or advisors may owe to those who own the enterprise. [Citation.] Thus, common sense and public policy dictate that a proper purpose may be stated in these circumstances, notwithstanding the lack of a direct benefit flowing to the corporation.

Equally important is the fact that if damages are assessed against Compaq in the Texas litigation, the company is entitled to seek indemnification from its co-defendant managers and advisors or to pursue its own claims against them. The availability of this diminishes the possibility that Compaq will suffer any harm at all. It is well settled that the mere prospect of harm to a corporate defendant is insufficient to deny relief under Section 220. [Citation.] *** Accordingly, we are satisfied that the purpose for which Horton seeks to inspect the stock ledger and related materials is not adverse to the legitimate interests of the company.

This conclusion does not suggest that Compaq's burden of showing an improper purpose is impossible to bear. Previous cases provide valuable examples of the degree to which a stated purpose is so indefinite, doubtful, uncertain or vexatious as to warrant denial of the right of inspection. In [citation], the trial court held that instituting annoying or harassing litigation against the corporation was an improper purpose. In [citation], the court ruled improper the stockholder's plan to use a stocklist in furtherance of a scheme to bring pressure on a third corporation. In [citation], it was recognized that obtaining a list for purposes of selling the stockholders' names was also improper. Finally, in [citation], the Court stated that neither conducting a "fishing expedition" nor satisfying idle curiosity were proper purposes to justify inspection. On the whole, a fair reading of these cases leads to the conclusion that where the person making demand is acting in bad faith or for reasons wholly unrelated to his or her role as a stockholder, access to the ledger will be denied. That simply is not the case here.

INTERPRETATION Upon demand, a stockholder has the right to inspect for a proper purpose the corporation's books and records. A proper purpose means a purpose reasonably related to that shareholder's interest in the corporation.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Can a proper purpose ever be adverse to the corporation's interests? Explain.

SHAREHOLDER SUITS

The ultimate recourse of a shareholder, short of selling his shares, is to bring suit against or on behalf of the corporation. Shareholder suits are essentially of two kinds: direct suits and derivative suits.

Direct Suits A shareholder may bring a direct suit to enforce a claim that she has against the corporation, based on her ownership of shares. Any recovery in a direct suit goes to the shareholder plaintiff. Examples of direct suits include shareholder actions to compel payment of dividends properly declared, to enforce the right to inspect corporate records, to enforce the right to vote, to protect preemptive rights, and to compel dissolution. A class suit is a direct suit in which one or more shareholders purport to act as a representative for a class of shareholders in order to recover for injuries to the entire class. Such a suit is a direct suit because the representative claims that all similarly situated shareholders were injured by an act that did not injure the corporation.

Derivative Suits A derivative suit is a cause of action brought by one or more shareholders on behalf of the corporation to enforce a right belonging to it. Shareholders may bring such an action when the board of directors refuses to so act on the corporation's behalf. Recovery usually goes to the corporation's treasury, so that all shareholders can benefit proportionately. Examples of derivative suits are actions to recover damages from management for an ultra vires act, to recover damages for a managerial breach of duty, and to recover improper dividends. In such situations, the board of directors may well be hesitant to bring suit against the corporation's officers or directors. Consequently, a shareholder derivative suit is the only recourse.

In most states, a shareholder must have owned his shares at the time the complained-of transaction occurred in order to bring a derivative suit. In addition, under the Revised Act and some state statutes, the shareholder must first make demand on the board of directors to enforce the corporate right. In a number of states, demand is excused in limited situations.

STROUGO V. BASSINI

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SECOND CIRCUIT, 2002
282 F.3D 162

<http://caselaw.lp.findlaw.com/cgi-bin/getcase.pl?court=2nd&navby=case&no=009303>

FACTS Strougo is a shareholder of the Brazilian Equity Fund, Inc. (the Fund), a nondiversified, publicly traded, closed-end investment company incorporated under the laws of Maryland. As a closed-end fund, it has a fixed number of outstanding shares, so that investors who wish to acquire shares in the Fund ordinarily must purchase them from a shareholder rather than, as in open-end funds, directly from the Fund itself. Shares in closed-end funds are traded in the same manner as are shares of corporate stock. Shares in the Fund are listed and traded on the New York Stock Exchange. The number of outstanding shares in the Fund are "fixed" because this number does not change on a daily basis as it would were the Fund open-ended, in which case the number of outstanding shares would change each time an investor invested new money in the fund, causing issuance of new shares, and each time a shareholder divested and thereby redeemed shares.

Although closed-end funds do not sell their shares to the public in the ordinary course of their business, there are methods available to them to raise new capital after their initial public offering. One such device is a “rights offering,” by which a fund offers shareholders the opportunity to purchase newly issued shares. Rights so offered may be transferable, allowing the current shareholder to sell them in the open market, or nontransferable, requiring the current shareholder to use them herself or lose their value when the rights expire.

On June 6, 1996, the Fund announced that it would issue one nontransferable “right” per outstanding share to every shareholder, and that every three rights would enable the shareholder to purchase one new share in the Fund. The subscription price per share was set at 90 percent of the lesser of (1) the average of the last reported sales price of a share of the Fund’s common stock on the New York Stock Exchange on August 16, 1996, the date on which the rights expired, and the four business days preceding, and (2) the per-share net asset value at the close of business on August 16.

At the close of business on August 16, 1996, the last day of the rights offering, the closing market price for the Fund’s shares was $12.38, and the Fund’s per-share net asset value was $17.24. The Fund’s shareholders purchased 70.3 percent of the new shares available at a subscription price set at $11.09 per share, 90 percent of the average closing price for the Fund on that and the preceding four days. Through the rights offering, the Fund raised $20.6 million in new capital.

On May 16, 1997, the plaintiff brought this class action against the Fund’s directors, senior officers, and investment advisor. The plaintiff asserted that this sort of rights offering is coercive because it penalized shareholders who did not participate. The introduction of new shares at a discount diluted the value of old shares. Because the rights could not be sold on the open market, a shareholder could avoid a consequent reduction in the value of his or her net equity position in the Fund only by purchasing new shares at the discounted price. Such purchases would, in turn, have tended to increase the management fee paid to defendant BEA Associates, the Fund’s investment advisor, because that fee is based on the Fund’s total assets.

The plaintiff’s complaint included three direct class-action claims on behalf of all shareholders. It alleges that the defendants, by approving the rights offering, breached their duties of loyalty and care at common law. It asserted that these breaches of duty resulted in four kinds of injury to shareholders: (1) loss of share value resulting from the underwriting and other transaction costs associated with the rights offering; (2) downward pressure on share prices resulting from the supply of new shares; (3) downward pressure on share prices resulting from the offering of shares at a discount; and (4) injury resulting from coercion, in that “shareholders were forced to either invest additional monies in the Fund or suffer a substantial dilution.”

The district court dismissed the direct claims on the ground that the injuries alleged “applied to the shareholders as a whole” and entered judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

DECISION The judgment of the district court is vacated, and the case is remanded.

OPINION Sack, J. In deciding whether a shareholder may bring a direct suit, the question the Maryland courts ask is not whether the shareholder suffered injury; if a corporation is injured those who own the corporation are injured too. The inquiry, instead, is whether the shareholders’ injury is “distinct” from that suffered by the corporation. [Citation.]

***

Thus, under Maryland law, when the shareholders of a corporation suffer an injury that is distinct from that of the corporation, the shareholders may bring direct suit for redress of that injury; there is shareholder standing. When the corporation is injured and the injury to its shareholders derives from that injury, however, only the corporation may bring suit; there is no shareholder standing. The shareholder may, at most, sue derivatively, seeking in effect to require the corporation to pursue a lawsuit to compensate for the injury to the corporation, and thereby ultimately redress the injury to the shareholders.

*** To sue directly under Maryland law, a shareholder must allege an injury distinct from an injury to the corporation, not from that of other shareholders.

Applying Maryland’s law of shareholder standing to the plaintiff’s four alleged injuries, we conclude that one that he alleges does not support direct claims under Maryland law. The remaining alleged injuries, however—describing the set of harms arising from the alleged coercion—do.

The plaintiff alleges a loss in share value resulting from the “substantial underwriting and other transactional costs associated with the Rights Offering.” *** Underwriter fees, advisory fees, and other transaction costs incurred by a corporation decrease share price primarily because they deplete the corporation’s assets, precisely the type of injury to the corporation that can be redressed under Maryland law only through a suit brought on behalf of the corporation. [Citation.]

The plaintiff’s remaining alleged injuries can be read to describe the set of harms resulting from the coercive nature of the rights offering. The particular harm allegedly suffered by an individual shareholder as a result of the coercion depends on whether or not that shareholder participated in the rights offering. For example, when read in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the alleged injury of “substantial downward pressure on the price of the Fund’s shares” resulting from the issuance of new shares describes the reduction in the net equity value of the shares owned by non-participating shareholders. [Citation.] Similarly, the alleged injury from the downward pressure on share prices resulting from the setting of the “exercise price of the rights ... at a steep discount from the pre-rights offering net asset value” can be read to refer to the involuntary dilution in equity value suffered by the non-participating shareholders. [Citation.]

*** On the other hand, participating shareholders may have suffered harm in the form of transaction costs in liquidating other assets to purchase the new shares, and the impairment of their right to dispose of their assets as they prefer if they purchased new shares to avoid dilution.

***

Thus, in the case of both the participating and non-participating shareholders, it would appear that the alleged injuries were to the shareholders alone and not to the Fund. These harms therefore constitute “distinct” injuries supporting direct shareholder claims under Maryland law. The corporation cannot bring the action seeking compensation for these injuries because they were suffered by its shareholders, not itself.

INTERPRETATION A class action is a direct suit against the corporation and seeks recovery for the shareholders as individuals. A derivative suit is brought by shareholders on behalf of the corporation and seeks recovery for the corporation so that all shareholders benefit proportionately.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION When should derivative suits be permitted? Explain.

SHAREHOLDER’S RIGHT TO DISSENT

A shareholder has the right to dissent from certain corporate actions that require shareholder approval. These actions include most mergers, consolidations, compulsory share exchanges, and a sale or exchange of all or substantially all the assets of the corporation not in the usual and regular course of business. We will discuss the shareholder’s right to dissent in Chapter 37.

administer the day-to-day operations of the corporation. Both the directors and officers of the corporation owe certain duties to the corporate entity as well as to the corporation's shareholders and are liable for breaching these duties.

In the following sections we will discuss the roles of corporate directors and officers. In some instances, controlling shareholders (those who own a number of shares sufficient to allow them effective control over the corporation) are held to the same duties as directors and officers, which we will discuss later in this chapter. Moreover, in close corporations, many courts impose upon all the shareholders a fiduciary duty similar to that imposed upon partners.

DONAHUE V. RODD ELECTROTYPE CO., INC.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME COURT, 1975

367 MASS. 578, 328 N.E.2D 505

FACTS Euphemia Donahue was a minority stockholder in the Rodd Electrotpe Company of New England, Inc. Rodd Electrotpe was, by definition, a close corporation. Members of the Rodd and Donahue families were the sole owners of the corporate stock, and no ready market for the shares existed. Moreover, the Rodds effectively controlled the corporation through their control of the chief management positions and their ownership of the majority of the stock. When Harry Rodd, a director, officer, and controlling stockholder of Rodd Electrotpe, retired from the business, Rodd Electrotpe purchased his shares in the corporation for $36,000. Donahue, who was not offered an equal opportunity to sell her shares to the corporation, brought an action against Rodd Electrotpe, Harry Rodd, and the present directors of the corporation, claiming that the defendants breached their fiduciary duty to her in causing the corporation to purchase the shares of Harry Rodd. She sought rescission of the purchase and repayment by Harry Rodd to Rodd Electrotpe of the purchase price of the shares plus interest. The trial court dismissed the case, and the appellate court affirmed.

DECISION Judgment reversed and relief granted to the plaintiff.

OPINION Tauro, C. J. We deem a close corporation to be typified by: (1) a small number of stockholders; (2) no ready market for the corporate stock; and (3) substantial majority stockholder participation in the management, direction and operations of the corporation.

As thus defined, the close corporation bears striking resemblance to a partnership. Commentators and courts have noted that the close corporation is often little more than an "incorporated" or "chartered" partnership. *** Just as in a partnership, the relationship among the stockholders must be one of trust, confidence and absolute loyalty if the enterprise is to succeed. Close corporations with substantial assets and with more numerous stockholders are no different from smaller close corporations in this regard. All participants rely on the fidelity and abilities of those stockholders who hold office. Disloyalty and self-seeking conduct on the part of any stockholder will engender bickering, corporate stalemates, and perhaps, efforts to achieve dissolution. ***

***

Although the corporate form provides *** advantages for the stockholders (limited liability, perpetuity, and so forth), it also supplies an opportunity for the majority stockholders to oppress or disadvantage minority stockholders. The minority is vulnerable to a variety of oppressive devices, termed "freeze-outs," which the majority may employ. [Citation.] An authoritative study of such "freeze-outs" enumerates some of the possibilities: "The squeezers [those who employ the freeze-out techniques] may refuse to declare dividends; they may drain off the corporation's earnings in the form of exorbitant salaries and bonuses to the majority shareholder officers and perhaps to their relatives, or in the form of high rent by the corporation for property leased from majority shareholders ***; they may deprive minority shareholders of corporate offices and of employment by the company; they may cause the corporation to sell its assets at an inadequate price to the majority shareholders. ***" [Citation.] In particular, the power of the board of directors, controlled by the majority, to declare or withhold dividends and to deny the minority employment is easily converted to a device to disadvantage minority stockholders. ***

***

The minority can, of course, initiate suit against the majority and their directors. Self-serving conduct by directors is proscribed by the director's fiduciary obligation to the corporation. [Citation.] However, in practice, the plaintiff will find difficulty in challenging dividend or employment policies. Such policies are considered to be within the judgment of the directors. This court has said: "The courts prefer not to interfere *** with the sound financial management of the corporation by its directors, but declare as a general rule that the declaration of dividends rests within the sound discretion of the directors, refusing to interfere with their determination unless a plain abuse of discretion is made to appear." ***

Thus, when these types of “freeze-outs” are attempted by the majority stockholders, the minority stockholders, cut off from all corporation-related revenues, must either suffer their losses or seek a buyer for their shares. Many minority stockholders will be unwilling or unable to wait for an alteration in majority policy. Typically, the minority stockholder in a close corporation has a substantial percentage of his personal assets invested in the corporation. [Citation.] The stockholder may have anticipated that his salary from his position with the corporation would be his livelihood. Thus, he cannot afford to wait passively. He must liquidate his investment in the close corporation in order to reinvest the funds in income-producing enterprises.

At this point, the true plight of the minority stockholder in a close corporation becomes manifest. He cannot easily reclaim his capital. In a large public corporation, the oppressed or dissident minority stockholder could sell his stock in order to extricate some of his invested capital. By definition, this market is not available for shares in the close corporation. In a partnership, a partner who feels abused by his fellow partners may cause dissolution by his “express will *** at any time” [citation] and recover his share of partnership assets and accumulated profits. *** To secure dissolution of the ordinary close corporation subject to [citation], the stockholder, in the absence of corporate deadlock, must own at least fifty per cent of the shares [citation] or have the advantage of a favorable provision in the articles of organization [citation]. The minority stockholder, by definition lacking fifty per cent of the corporate shares, can never “authorize” the corporation to file a petition for dissolution under [citation], by his own vote. He will seldom have at his disposal the requisite favorable provision in the articles of organization.

Thus, in a close corporation, the minority stockholders may be trapped in a disadvantageous situation. No outsider would knowingly assume the position of the disadvantaged minority. The outsider would have the same difficulties. To cut losses the minority stockholder may be compelled to deal with the majority. This is the capstone of the majority plan. Majority “freeze-out” schemes which withhold dividends are designed to compel the minority to relinquish stock at inadequate prices. *** When the minority stockholder agrees to sell out at less than fair value, the majority has won.

Because of the fundamental resemblance of the close corporation to the partnership, the trust and confidence which are essential to this scale and manner of enterprise, and the inherent danger to minority interests in the close corporation, we hold that stockholders in the close corporation owe one another substantially the same fiduciary duty in the operation of the enterprise that partners owe to one another. In our previous decisions, we have defined the standard of duty owed by partners to one another as the “utmost good faith and loyalty.” [Citations.] Stockholders in close corporations must discharge their management and stockholder responsibilities in conformity with this strict good faith standard. They may not act out of avarice, expediency or self-interest in derogation of their duty of loyalty to the other stockholders and to the corporation.

We contrast this strict good faith standard with the somewhat less stringent standard of fiduciary duty to which directors and stockholders of all corporations must adhere in the discharge of their corporate responsibilities. Corporate directors are held to a good faith and inherent fairness standard of conduct [citation] and are not “permitted to serve two masters whose interests are antagonistic.” [Citation] “Their paramount duty is to the corporation, and their personal pecuniary interests are subordinate to that duty.” [Citation.]

The more rigorous duty of partners and participants in a joint adventure, here extended to stockholders in a close corporation, was described by then Chief Judge Cardozo of the New York Court of Appeals in [citation]: “Joint adventurers, like copartners, owe to one another, while the enterprise continues, the duty of the finest loyalty. Many forms of conduct permissible in a workaday world for those acting at arm’s length, are forbidden to those bound by fiduciary ties. *** Not honesty alone, but the punctilio of an honor the most sensitive, is then the standard of behavior.”

***

Under settled Massachusetts law, a domestic corporation, unless forbidden by statute, has the power to purchase its own shares. When the corporation reacquiring its own stock is a close corporation, the purchase is subject to the additional requirement, in the light of our holding in this opinion, that the stockholders, who, as directors or controlling stockholders, caused the corporation to enter into the stock purchase agreement, must have acted with the utmost good faith and loyalty to the other stockholders.

To meet this test, if the stockholder whose shares were purchased was a member of the controlling group, the controlling stockholders must cause the corporation to offer each stockholder an equal opportunity to sell a ratable number of his shares to the corporation at an identical price. ***

The benefits conferred by the purchase are twofold: (1) provision of a market for shares; (2) access to corporate assets for personal use. By definition, there is no ready market for shares of a close corporation. The purchase creates a market for shares which previously had been unmarketable. It transforms a previously illiquid investment into a liquid one. If the close corporation purchases shares only from a member of the controlling group, the controlling stockholder can convert his shares into cash at a time when none of the other stockholders can. Consistent with its strict fiduciary duty, the controlling group may not utilize its control of the corporation to establish an exclusive market in previously unmarketable shares from which the minority stockholders are excluded. ***

The purchase also distributes corporate assets to the stockholder whose shares were purchased. Unless an equal opportunity is given to all stockholders, the purchase of shares from a member of the controlling group operates as a preferential distribution of assets. In exchange for his shares, he receives a percentage of the contributed capital and accumulated profits of the enterprise. The funds he so receives are available for his personal use. The other stockholders benefit from no such access to corporate property and cannot withdraw their shares of the corporate profits and capital in this manner unless the controlling group acquiesces. Although the purchase price for the controlling stockholder's shares may seem fair to the corporation and other stockholders under the tests established in the prior case law, the controlling stockholder whose stock has been purchased has still received a relative advantage over his fellow stockholders, inconsistent with his strict fiduciary duty—an opportunity to turn corporate funds to personal use.

The rule of equal opportunity in stock purchases by close corporations provides equal access to these benefits for all stockholders. We hold that, in any case in which the controlling stockholders have exercised their power over the corporation to deny the minority such equal opportunity, the minority shall be entitled to appropriate relief. ***

***

On its face, then, the purchase of Harry Rodd's shares by the corporation is a breach of the duty which the controlling stockholders, the Rodds, owed to the minority stockholders, the plaintiff and her son. The purchase distributed a portion of the corporate assets to Harry Rodd, a member of the controlling group, in exchange for his shares. The plaintiff and her son were not offered an equal opportunity to sell their shares to the corporation. In fact, their efforts to obtain an equal opportunity were rebuffed by the corporate representative. As the trial judge found, they did not, in any manner, ratify the transaction with Harry Rodd.

INTERPRETATION Recognizing the strong resemblance of a close corporation to a partnership, some courts impose upon all shareholders in a close corporation substantially the same fiduciary duty that partners owe each other.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the defendant act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Should close corporation law be separate and distinct from general corporation law? Explain.

Function of the Board of Directors

Although the shareholders elect directors to manage the corporation, directors are neither trustees nor agents of the shareholders or the corporation. They are, however, fiduciaries who must perform their duties in good faith, in the best interests of the corporation, and with due care.

Practical Advice

Do not agree to serve on a corporate board of directors unless you have sufficient time and energy to meet the requirements of the position.

The Revised Act and the statutes of many states provide that “[a]ll corporate powers shall be exercised by or under the authority of, and the business and affairs of the corporation managed under the direction of, its board of directors, subject to any limitation set forth in the articles of incorporation.” In some corporations, the board members are all actively involved in the management of the business. In these cases, the corporate powers are exercised by the board of directors. On the other hand, in publicly held corporations, a majority of board members often are not actively involved in management. Here, the corporate powers are exercised under the authority of the board, which formulates major management policy and monitors management's performance but does not involve itself in day-to-day management.

In publicly held corporations, the directors who are also officers or employees of the corporation are inside directors, while the directors who are not officers or employees are outside directors. Outside directors who have no business contacts with the corporation are unaffiliated directors; outside directors having business contacts—such as investment bankers, lawyers, or suppliers—are affiliated directors. Historically, the boards of many publicly held corporations consisted mainly or entirely of inside directors. During the past two decades, however, the number and influence of outside directors have increased substantially, and now boards of the great majority of publicly held corporations consist primarily of outside directors.

In those states with special close corporation statutes, electing corporations can operate without a board of directors. Moreover, under the Revised Act, as originally enacted, a corporation having fifty or fewer shareholders may dispense with or limit the authority of a board of directors by designating in its articles of incorporation those who will perform some or all of the duties of a board. The Revised Act as amended permits any corporation to dispense with a board of directors by a written agreement executed by all of the shareholders.

Practical Advice

To achieve greater flexibility, when organizing a close corporation you should consider including in the charter a provision eliminating the board of directors and assigning the board's duties to designated shareholders.

Under incorporation statutes the board has the responsibility for determining corporate policy in a number of areas, including (1) selecting and removing officers, (2) determining the corporation's capital structure, (3) initiating fundamental changes, (4) declaring dividends, and (5) setting management compensation.

SELECTION AND REMOVAL OF OFFICERS

In most states, the board of directors is responsible for choosing the corporation's officers and may remove any officer at any time. Officers are corporate agents who are delegated their responsibilities by the board of directors.

CAPITAL STRUCTURE

The board of directors determines the capital structure and financial policy of the corporation. For example, the board of directors has the power (1) to fix the selling price of newly issued shares, unless the articles of incorporation reserve to the shareholders the power to do so; (2) to determine the value of the consideration the corporation will receive in payment for the shares it issues; (3) to borrow money, issue notes, bonds, and other obligations, and secure any of the corporation's obligations; and (4) to sell, lease, or exchange assets of the corporation in the usual and regular course of business.

FUNDAMENTAL CHANGES

The board of directors has the power to amend or repeal the bylaws, unless the articles of incorporation reserve this power exclusively to the shareholders. In a few states directors may not repeal or amend bylaws adopted by the shareholders. In addition, the board initiates certain actions that require shareholder approval. For instance, the board initiates proceedings to amend the articles of incorporation; to effect a merger, consolidation, compulsory share exchange, or the sale or lease of all or substantially all of the assets of the corporation other than in the usual and regular course of business; and to dissolve the corporation.

DIVIDENDS

The board of directors declares the amount and type of dividends, subject to restrictions in the state incorporation statute; the articles of incorporation; and corporate loan and preferred stock agreements. The board also may purchase, redeem, or otherwise acquire shares of the corporation's equity securities.

MANAGEMENT COMPENSATION

The board of directors usually determines the compensation of officers. In addition, a number of states allow the board to fix the compensation of its members.

Election and Tenure of Directors

The incorporation statute, the articles of incorporation, and the bylaws determine the qualifications necessary to those who would be directors of the corporation. They also determine election procedures for and the number, tenure, and compensation of directors. Only individuals may serve as directors.

ELECTION, NUMBER, AND TENURE OF DIRECTORS

The initial board of directors generally is named in the articles of incorporation and serves until the first meeting of the shareholders at which directors are elected. Thereafter, directors are elected at annual meetings of the shareholders and hold office for one year unless their terms are staggered. However, if the shares represented at a meeting in person or by proxy are insufficient to constitute a quorum or if the shareholders are deadlocked and unable to elect a new board, the incumbent directors continue in office as "holdover" directors until their successors are duly elected and qualified. Though state statutes traditionally required each corporation to have three or more directors, most states permit the board to consist of one or more members. Moreover, the number of directors may be increased or decreased, within statutory limits, by amendment to the bylaws or charter.

VACANCIES AND REMOVAL OF DIRECTORS

The Revised Act provides that a vacancy in the board may be filled either by the shareholders or by the affirmative vote of a majority of the remaining directors, even if they should constitute less than a quorum of the board. The term of a director elected to fill a vacancy expires at the next shareholders' meeting at which directors are elected.

Some states have no statutory provision for the removal of directors, although a common law rule permits removal for cause by action of the shareholders. The Revised Act and an increasing number of other statutes permit the shareholders to remove one or more directors or the entire board, with or without cause, at a special meeting called for that purpose, subject to cumulative voting rights, if applicable. However, the Revised Act also permits the articles of incorporation to provide that directors may be removed only for cause.

COMPENSATION OF DIRECTORS

Traditionally, directors did not receive salaries for their directorial services, although they commonly received a fee or honorarium for their attendance at meetings. The Revised Act and many incorporation statutes now specifically authorize the board of directors to fix the compensation of directors, unless a contrary provision exists in the articles of incorporation or bylaws.

Under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, if a publicly held company is required to issue an accounting restatement due to a material violation of securities law, the chief executive officer and the chief financial officer must forfeit certain bonuses and compensation received, as well as any profit realized from the sale of the company's securities, during the twelve-month period following the original issuance of the noncomplying financial document.

Exercise of Directors' Functions

Though they are powerless to bind the corporation when acting individually, directors do have this power when acting as a board. The board may act only through a meeting of the directors or through written consent signed by all of the directors, if such consent without a directors' meeting is authorized by the incorporation statute and is not contrary to the charter or bylaws.

Meetings are either held at a regular time and place fixed in the bylaws or called at special times. Notice of meetings must be given as prescribed in the bylaws. A director's attendance at any meeting is a waiver of such notice, unless the director attends only to object to the holding of the meeting or to the transaction of business at it and does not vote for or assent to action taken at the meeting. Waiver of notice also may be given in a signed writing. Most modern statutes provide that meetings of the board may be held either in or outside of the state of incorporation.

QUORUM AND VOTING

A majority of the board members constitutes a quorum (the minimum number of members that must be present at a meeting in order to transact business). Although most states do not permit a quorum to be set at less than a majority, the Revised Act and some states allow the articles of incorporation or the bylaws to authorize a quorum consisting of as few as one-third of a board's members. In contrast, however, in all states the articles of incorporation or bylaws may require a number greater than a simple majority. If a quorum is present at any meeting, the act of a majority of the directors in attendance is the act of the board, unless the articles of incorporation or bylaws require the act of a greater number.

Closely held corporations sometimes use supermajority or unanimous quorum requirements. In addition, they may require a supermajority or unanimous vote of the board for some or all matters.

Practical Advice

If you are forming a close corporation and will hold a minority interest in it, consider including in the charter supermajority quorum and voting provisions for voting by the board of directors to ensure that you will have control over specified managerial issues.

By requiring a quorum to be present when "a vote is taken," the Revised Act makes it clear that the board may act only when a quorum is present. This rule is in contrast to the rule governing shareholder meetings: recall that once a quorum of shareholders is obtained, it cannot be broken by the withdrawal of shareholders. Many state statutes, however, do not have this provision. In any event, directors may not vote by proxy, although most states permit directors to participate in meetings through teleconference.

A director present at a board meeting at which action on any corporate matter is taken is deemed to have assented to such action unless, in addition to dissenting or abstaining from it, he (1) has his dissent or abstention entered in the minutes of the meeting, (2) files his written dissent or abstention to such action with the presiding officer before the meeting adjourns, or (3) delivers his written dissent or abstention to the corporation immediately after adjournment.

ACTION TAKEN WITHOUT A MEETING

The Revised Act and most states provide that unless the articles of incorporation or bylaws provide otherwise, any action the statute requires or permits to be taken at a meeting of the board may be taken without a meeting if consent in writing is signed by all of the directors.

DELEGATION OF BOARD POWERS

Unless otherwise provided by the articles of incorporation or the bylaws, the board of directors may, by majority vote of the full board, appoint one or more committees, all of whose members must be directors. Many state statutes permit committees only if the charter expressly authorizes their formation. The Revised Act as amended and some statutes permit a committee to have as few as one member, whereas the statutes of many states require that a committee consist of at least two directors. Committees may exercise all the authority of the board, except with regard to certain matters specified in the incorporation statute, such as declaring dividends and other distributions, filling vacancies on the board or on any of its committees, amending the bylaws, or proposing actions that require approval by shareholders. Delegating authority to a committee does not relieve any board member of his duties to the corporation. Commonly used committees include executive committees, audit committees (to recommend and oversee independent public accountants), compensation committees, finance committees, nominating committees, and investment committees.

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act confers on the audit committee of every publicly held corporation direct responsibility for the appointment, compensation, and oversight of the work of the public accounting firm employed by the company to perform audit services. Moreover, the public accounting firm must report directly to the audit committee, and the lead auditor must rotate every five years. Each member of the audit committee must be independent, and at least one member must qualify as a financial expert. The Act requires that the company provide appropriate funding for the audit committee to compensate the auditors, independent counsel, and other advisers. The audit committee is responsible for resolving disagreements between management and the auditor regarding the company's financial reporting. The audit committee must establish procedures for addressing complaints regarding accounting, internal accounting controls, or auditing matters.

DIRECTORS' INSPECTION RIGHTS

So that they can perform their duties competently and fully, directors have the right to inspect corporate books and records. This right is considerably broader than a share-holder's right to inspect.

Officers

The board of directors appoints the officers of a corporation to hold the offices provided for in the bylaws, which set forth the respective duties of each officer. Statutes generally require as a minimum that the officers consist of a president; one or more vice presidents, as prescribed by the bylaws; a secretary; and a treasurer. With the exception that the same person may not hold the office of president and secretary at the same time, a person may hold more than one office.

The Revised Act and other modern statutes permit every corporation to designate whatever officers it wants. Although the Act specifies no particular number of officers, one of them must be delegated responsibility to prepare the minutes of directors' and shareholders' meetings and to authenticate corporate records. The Revised Act permits the same individual to hold all of the offices of a corporation.

SELECTION AND REMOVAL OF OFFICERS

Most state statutes provide that officers be appointed by the board of directors and that they serve at the pleasure of the board. Accordingly, the board may remove officers with or without cause. Of course, if the officer has an employment contract that is valid for a specified time period, removing the officer without cause before the contract expires would constitute a breach of the employment contract. The board also determines the compensation of officers.

ROLE OF OFFICERS

The officers are, like the directors, fiduciaries to the corporation. On the other hand, unlike the directors, they are agents of the corporation. The roles of officers are set forth in the corporate bylaws.

AUTHORITY OF OFFICERS

The Revised Act provides that each officer has the authority provided in the bylaws or prescribed by the board of directors, to the extent that such prescribed authority is consistent with the bylaws. Like that of other agents, the authority of an officer to bind the corporation may be (1) actual express, (2) actual implied, or (3) apparent.

Actual Express Authority Actual express authority results from the corporation's manifesting to the officer its assent that the officer should act on the corporation's behalf. Actual express authority arises from the incorporation statute, the articles of incorporation, the bylaws, and resolutions of the board of directors. The latter provide the principal source of actual express authority. The Revised Act further provides that the board of directors may authorize an officer to prescribe the duties of other officers. This provision empowers officers to delegate authority to subordinates.

Actual Implied Authority Officers, as agents of the corporation, have actual implied authority to do what is reasonably necessary to perform their actual, delegated authority. In addition, a common question is whether officers possess implied authority merely by virtue of their positions. The courts have been cautious in granting such implied or inherent authority. However, any act requiring board approval, such as issuing stock, is clearly beyond the implied authority of any officer.

Apparent Authority Apparent authority arises from acts of the corporation that lead third parties to believe reasonably and in good faith that an officer has the required authority. Apparent authority might arise when a third party relies on the fact that an officer has exercised the same authority in the past with the consent of the board of directors.

Ratification A corporation may ratify the unauthorized acts of its officers. Equivalent to the corporation's having granted the officer prior authority, ratification relates back to the original transaction and may be either express or implied from the corporation's acceptance of the contract's benefits with full knowledge of the facts.

Practical Advice

When signing contracts in your capacity as an officer for a corporation, be sure to indicate your representative status.

Duties of Directors and Officers

Generally, directors and officers owe the duties of obedience, diligence, and loyalty to the corporation. These duties are for the most part judicially imposed. By imposing liability upon directors and officers for specific acts, state and federal statutes supplement the common law, which nonetheless remains the most significant source of duties.

A corporation may not recover damages from its directors and officers for losses resulting from their poor business judgments or honest mistakes of judgment. Directors and officers are not duty bound to ensure business success. They are required only to be obedient, reasonably diligent, and completely loyal. In 1999 an amendment to the Revised Act was adopted refining the act's standards of conduct and liability for directors.

DUTY OF OBEDIENCE

Directors and officers must act within their respective authority. For any loss the corporation suffers because of their unauthorized acts, they are held absolutely liable in some jurisdictions; in others, they are held liable only if they exceeded their authority intentionally or negligently.

DUTY OF DILIGENCE

In discharging their duties, directors and officers must exercise ordinary care and prudence. Some states interpret this standard to mean that directors and officers must exercise "the same degree of care and prudence that [those] promoted by self-interest generally exercise in their own affairs." The great majority of states, as well as the Revised Act, however, hold that the test requires a director or officer to discharge corporate duties (1) in good faith; (2) with the care an ordinarily prudent person in a like position would exercise under similar circumstances; and (3) in a manner the director or officer reasonably believes to be in the best interests of the corporation. A director or officer whose performance of her duties complies with these requirements is not liable for any action she takes as a director or officer or for any failure to act.

So long as the directors and officers act in good faith and with due care, the courts will not substitute their judgment for that of the board or officer—the so-called business judgment rule. Directors and officers will nevertheless be held liable for bad faith or negligent conduct. Moreover, they may be liable for failing to act. In one instance, a bank director, who in the five and one-half years that he had been on the board had never attended a board meeting or examined the institution's books and records, was held liable for losses resulting from the unsupervised acts of the president and cashier, who had made various improper loans and had permitted large overdrafts.

In 1999 an amendment to the Revised Act was adopted refining the Act's standards of conduct and liability for directors. It substituted a different duty of care standard for the second point above: When becoming informed in connection with their decision-making function or devoting attention to their oversight function, directors shall discharge their duties with the care that a person in a like position would reasonably believe appropriate under similar circumstances. While some aspects of a director's role will be performed individually, such as preparing for meetings, this reformulation explicitly recognizes that directors perform most of their functions as a unit.

Reliance on Others Directors and officers are permitted to entrust important work to others, and if they have selected employees with care, they are not personally liable for the negligent acts or willful wrongs of those selected. However, a reasonable amount of supervision is required; and an officer or director who knew or should have known or suspected that an employee was incurring losses through carelessness, theft, or embezzlement will be held liable for such losses.

A director also may rely in good faith on information provided him by officers and employees of the corporation; legal counsel, public accountants, or other persons as to matters the director reasonably believes are within the person's professional or expert competence; and a committee of the board of directors of which the director is not a member if the director reasonably believes the committee merits confidence. A director is not acting in good faith if he has knowledge concerning the matter in question that makes reliance unwarranted. The 1999 amendments to the Revised Act added a provision entitling a director to rely on the performance of board functions properly delegated by the board to officers, employees, or a committee of the board of directors of which the director is not a member unless the director has knowledge that makes reliance unwarranted.

An officer is also entitled to rely upon this information, but this right may, in many circumstances, be more limited than a director's because of the officer's greater familiarity with the affairs of the corporation.

Business Judgment Rule Directors and officers are continually called on to make decisions that require balancing benefits and risks to the corporation. Although hindsight may reveal that some of these decisions were not the best, the business judgment rule precludes imposing liability on the directors or officers for honest mistakes of judgment. To later benefit from the business judgment rule, a director or officer must make an informed decision, in good faith without any conflict of interests, and have a rational basis for believing it was in the corporation's best interests. (With respect to directors, the 1999 amendments to the Revised Act added a new provision codifying much of the business judgment rule and providing guidance as to its application.) Moreover, where this standard of conduct has not been met, the director's action (or inaction) must be shown to be the proximate cause of damage to the corporation.

Hasty or ill-advised action also can render directors liable. The Supreme Court of Delaware has held directors liable for approving the terms of a cash-out merger. In that case the court found that the directors did not adequately inform themselves of the company's intrinsic value and were grossly negligent in approving the terms of the merger upon two hours' consideration and without prior notice.

BREHM V. EISNER

SUPREME COURT OF DELAWARE, 2000

FACTS On October 1, 1995, Disney hired as its president Michael S. Ovitz, who was a long-time friend of Disney Chairman and CEO Michael Eisner. At the time, Ovitz was an important talent broker in Hollywood. Although he lacked experience managing a diversified public company, other companies with entertainment operations had been interested in hiring him for high-level executive positions. The employment agreement approved by the board of directors then in office (Old Board) had an initial term of five years and required that Ovitz "devote his full time and best efforts exclusively to the Company," with exceptions for volunteer work, service on the board of another company, and managing his passive investments. In return, Disney agreed to give Ovitz a base salary of $1 million per year, a discretionary bonus, and two sets of stock options (the "A" options and the "B" options) that collectively would enable Ovitz to purchase 5 million shares of Disney common stock. The "A" options were scheduled to vest in three annual increments of 1 million shares each, beginning at the end of the third full year of employment and continuing for the following two years. The agreement specifically provided that the "A" options would vest immediately if Disney granted Ovitz a nonfault termination of the employment agreement. The "B" options, consisting of 2 million shares, were scheduled to vest annually starting the year after the last “A” option would vest and were conditioned on Ovitz and Disney first having agreed to extend his employment beyond the five-year term of the employment agreement. In addition, Ovitz would forfeit the “B” options if his initial employment term of five years ended prematurely for any reason, even if from a nonfault termination.

The employment agreement provided three ways for Ovitz’ employment to end. He might serve his five years and Disney might decide against offering him a new contract. If so, Disney would owe Ovitz a $10 million termination payment. Before the end of the initial term, Disney could terminate Ovitz for “good cause” only if Ovitz committed gross negligence or malfeasance, or if Ovitz resigned voluntarily. Disney would owe Ovitz no additional compensation if it terminated him for “good cause.” Termination without cause (nonfault termination) would entitle Ovitz to the present value of his salary payments remaining under the agreement, a $10 million severance payment, an additional $7.5 million for each fiscal year remaining under the agreement, and the immediate vesting of the first 3 million stock options (the “A” Options).

Soon after Ovitz began work, problems surfaced and the situation continued to deteriorate during the first year of his employment. The deteriorating situation led Ovitz to begin seeking alternative employment and expressing his desire to leave the Company. On December 11, 1996, Eisner and Ovitz agreed to arrange for Ovitz to leave Disney on the nonfault basis provided for in the 1995 employment agreement. The board of directors then in office (New Board) approved this by authorizing a “nonfault termination” agreement with cash payments to Ovitz of almost $39 million and the immediate vesting of 3 million stock options with a value of $101 million.

Shareholders brought a derivative suit alleging that (1) the Old Board had breached its fiduciary duty in approving an extravagant and wasteful employment agreement and (2) the New Board had breached its fiduciary duty in agreeing to an extravagant and wasteful “nonfault” termination of the Ovitz employment agreement. The plaintiffs alleged that the Old Board had failed properly to inform itself about the total costs and incentives of the Ovitz employment agreement, especially the severance package, and failed to realize that the contract gave Ovitz an incentive to find a way to exit the Company via a nonfault termination as soon as possible because doing so would permit him to earn more than he could by fulfilling his contract. They alleged that the corporate compensation expert, Graef Crystal, who had advised Old Board in connection with its decision to approve the Ovitz employment agreement, stated two years later that the Old Board failed to consider the incentives and the total cost of the severance provisions. The defendants moved to dismiss, and the Court of Chancery granted the motion. The shareholders appealed.

DECISION Dismissal affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded.

OPINION Veasey, C. J. This is potentially a very troubling case on the merits. On the one hand, it appears from the Complaint that: (a) the compensation and termination payout for Ovitz were exceedingly lucrative, if not luxurious, compared to Ovitz’ value to the Company; and (b) the processes of the boards of directors in dealing with the approval and termination of the Ovitz Employment Agreement were casual, if not sloppy and perfunctory. [T]he processes of the Old Board and the New Board were hardly paradigms of good corporate governance practices. Moreover, the sheer size of the payout to Ovitz, as alleged, pushes the envelope of judicial respect for the business judgment of directors in making compensation decisions. Therefore, both as to the processes of the two Boards and the waste test, this is a close case.

This is a case about whether there should be personal liability of the directors of a Delaware corporation to the corporation for lack of due care in the decisionmaking process and for waste of corporate assets. This case is not about the failure of the directors to establish and carry out ideal corporate governance practices.

All good corporate governance practices include compliance with statutory law and case law establishing fiduciary duties. But the law of corporate fiduciary duties and remedies for violation of those duties are distinct from the aspirational goals of ideal corporate governance practices. Aspirational ideals of good corporate governance practices for boards of directors that go beyond the minimal legal requirements of the corporation law are highly desirable, often tend to benefit stockholders, sometimes reduce litigation and can usually help directors avoid liability. But they are not required by the corporation law and do not define standards of liability. [Citation.]

The inquiry here is not whether we would disdain the composition, behavior and decisions of Disney’s Old Board or New Board as alleged in the Complaint if we were Disney stockholders. In the absence of a legislative mandate, [citation], that determination is not for the courts. That decision is for the stockholders to make in voting for directors, urging other stockholders to reform or oust the board, or in making individual buy-sell decisions involving Disney securities. The sole issue that this Court must determine is whether the particularized facts alleged in this Complaint provide a reason to believe that the conduct of the Old Board in 1995 and the New Board in 1996 constituted a violation of their fiduciary duties.

Plaintiffs claim that the Court of Chancery erred when it concluded that a board of directors is “not required to be informed of every fact, but rather is required to be reasonably informed.” [Citation.] ***

The “reasonably informed” language used by the Court of Chancery here may have been a shorthand attempt to paraphrase the Delaware jurisprudence that, in making business decisions, directors must consider all material information reasonably available, and that the directors’ process is actionable only if grossly negligent. [Citation.] The question is whether the trial court’s formulation is consistent with our objective test of reasonableness, the test of materiality and concepts of gross negligence. We agree with the Court of Chancery that the standard for judging the informational component of the directors’ decisionmaking does not mean that the Board must be informed of every fact. The Board is responsible for considering only material facts that are reasonably available, not those that are immaterial or out of the Board’s reasonable reach. [Citation.]

Certainly in this case the economic exposure of the corporation to the payout scenarios of the Ovitz contract was material, particularly given its large size, for purposes of the directors’ decisionmaking process. [Court’s footnote: The term “material” is used in this context to mean relevant and of a magnitude to be important to directors in carrying out their fiduciary duty of care in decisionmaking.] And those dollar exposure numbers were reasonably available because the logical inference from plaintiffs’ allegations is that Crystal or the New Board could have calculated the numbers. Thus, the objective tests of reasonable availability and materiality were satisfied by this Complaint. But that is not the end of the inquiry for liability purposes.

***

*** The Complaint, fairly construed, admits that the directors were advised by Crystal as an expert and that they relied on his expertise. Accordingly, the question here is whether the directors are to be “fully protected” (i.e., not held liable) on the basis that they relied in good faith on a qualified expert [citation]. ***

*** Plaintiffs must rebut the presumption that the directors properly exercised their business judgment, including their good faith reliance on Crystal’s expertise. ***

*** [T]he complaint must allege particularized facts (not conclusions) that, if proved, would show, for example, that: (a) the directors did not in fact rely on the expert; (b) their reliance was not in good faith; (c) they did not reasonably believe that the expert’s advice was within the expert’s professional competence; (d) the expert was not selected with reasonable care by or on behalf of the corporation, and the faulty selection process was attributable to the directors; (e) the subject matter (in this case the cost calculation) that was material and reasonably available was so obvious that the board’s failure to consider it was grossly negligent regardless of the expert’s advice or lack of advice; or (f) that the decision of the Board was so unconscionable as to constitute waste or fraud. This Complaint includes no particular allegations of this nature, and therefore it was subject to dismissal as drafted.

***

We conclude that *** the Complaint *** as drafted, fails to create a reasonable doubt that the Old Board’s decision in approving the Ovitz Employment Agreement was protected by the business judgment rule. ***

***

Plaintiffs’ principal theory is that the 1995 Ovitz Employment Agreement was a “wasteful transaction for Disney ab initio” because it was structured to “incentivize” Ovitz to seek an early non-fault termination. The Court of Chancery correctly dismissed this theory as failing to meet the stringent requirements of the waste test, i.e., “an exchange that is so one sided that no business person of ordinary, sound judgment could conclude that the corporation has received adequate consideration.” Moreover, the Court concluded that a board’s decision on executive compensation is entitled to great deference. It is the essence of business judgment for a board to determine if “a ‘particular individual warrant[s] large amounts of money, whether in the form of current salary or severance provisions.’” [Citation.]

*** Irrationality is the outer limit of the business judgment rule. Irrationality may be the functional equivalent of the waste test or it may tend to show that the decision is not made in good faith, which is a key ingredient of the business judgment rule. [Court’s footnote: The business judgment rule has been well formulated by [citation] and other cases. (“It is a presumption that in making a business decision the directors *** acted on an informed basis, in good faith and in the honest belief that the action taken was in the best interests of the corporation.”) Thus, directors’ decisions will be respected by courts unless the directors are interested or lack independence relative to the decision, do not act in good faith, act in a manner that cannot be attributed to a rational business purpose or reach their decision by a grossly negligent process that includes the failure to consider all material facts reasonably available.]

The plaintiffs contend in this Court that Ovitz resigned or committed acts of gross negligence or malfeasance that constituted grounds to terminate him for cause. In either event, they argue that the Company had no obligation to Ovitz and that the directors wasted the Company’s assets by causing it to make an unnecessary and enormous payout of cash and stock options when it permitted Ovitz to terminate his employment on a “non-fault” basis. We have concluded, however, that the Complaint currently before us does not set forth particularized facts that he resigned or unarguably breached his Employment Agreement.

***

Construed most favorably to plaintiffs, the facts in the Complaint (disregarding conclusory allegations) show that Ovitz’ performance as president was disappointing at best, that Eisner admitted it had been a mistake to hire him, that Ovitz lacked commitment to the Company, that he performed services for his old company, and that he negotiated for other jobs (some very lucrative) while being required under the contract to devote his full time and energy to Disney.

All this shows is that the Board had arguable grounds to fire Ovitz for cause. But what is alleged is only an argument—perhaps a good one—that Ovitz' conduct constituted gross negligence or malfeasance. ***

The Complaint, in sum, contends that the Board committed waste by agreeing to the very lucrative payout to Ovitz under the non-fault termination provision because it had no obligation to him, thus taking the Board's decision outside the protection of the business judgment rule. Construed most favorably to plaintiffs, the Complaint contends that, by reason of the New Board's available arguments of resignation and good cause, it had the leverage to negotiate Ovitz down to a more reasonable payout than that guaranteed by his Employment Agreement. But the Complaint fails on its face to meet the waste test because it does not allege with particularity facts tending to show that no reasonable business person would have made the decision that the New Board made under these circumstances.

***

To rule otherwise would invite courts to become super-directors, measuring matters of degree in business decision-making and executive compensation. Such a rule would run counter to the foundation of our jurisprudence.

***

One can understand why Disney stockholders would be upset with such an extraordinarily lucrative compensation agreement and termination payout awarded a company president who served for only a little over a year and who underperformed to the extent alleged. That said, there is a very large—though not insurmountable—burden on stockholders who believe they should pursue the remedy of a derivative suit instead of selling their stock or seeking to reform or oust these directors from office.

INTERPRETATION In exercising their duties, all corporate directors must act in good faith, in the corporation's best interests, and on an informed basis with due care.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did Eisner, Ovitz, or the board of directors act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the court's decision in this case? Explain.

DUTY OF LOYALTY

The officers and directors of a corporation owe a duty of loyalty (a fiduciary duty) to the corporation and to its shareholders. The essence of a fiduciary duty is the subordination of self-interest to the interest of the person or persons to whom the duty is owing. It requires officers and directors to be constantly loyal to the corporation, which they both serve and control.

An officer or director is required to disclose fully to the corporation any financial interest he may have in any contract or transaction to which the corporation is a party. (This is a corollary to the rule that forbids fiduciaries from making secret profits.) His business conduct must be insulated from self-interest, and he may not advance his personal interest at the corporation's expense. Moreover, an officer or director may not represent conflicting interests; her duty is one of strict allegiance to the corporation.

The remedy for breach of fiduciary duty is a suit in equity by the corporation, or more often a derivative suit instituted by a shareholder, to require the fiduciary to pay to the corporation the profits she obtained through the breach. It need not be shown that the corporation could otherwise have made the profits that the fiduciary realized. The object of the rule is to discourage breaches of duty by taking from the fiduciary all of the profits she has made. Though the enforcement of the rule may result in a windfall to the corporation, this is incidental to the rule's deterrent objective. Whenever a director or officer breaches his fiduciary duty, he forfeits his right to compensation during the period he engaged in the breach.

Conflict of Interests A contract or other transaction between an officer or a director and the corporation inherently involves a conflict of interest. Contracts between officers and the corporation are covered under the law of agency. (See Chapter 29.) Early on, the common law viewed all director-corporation transactions as automatically void or voidable but eventually recognized that this rule was unreasonable because it would prevent directors from entering into contracts beneficial to the corporation. Now, therefore, if such a contract is honest and fair, the courts will uphold it. In the case of contracts between corporations having an interlocking directorate (corporations whose boards of directors share one or more members), the courts subject the contracts to scrutiny and will set them aside unless the transaction is shown to have been entirely fair and entered in good faith.

Most states and the original version of the Revised Act address these related problems by providing that such transactions are neither void nor voidable if, after full disclosure, they are approved by either the board of disinterested directors or the shareholders or if they are fair and reasonable to the corporation.

The Revised Act was amended in 1988 to adopt a more specific approach to a director's conflict-of-interest transactions. The Revised Act establishes more clearly prescribed safe harbors to validate conflict-of-interest transactions. The Revised Act provides two alternative safe harbors, each of which is available before or after the transaction: approval by "qualified" (disinterested) directors or approval by the shareholders. In either case, the interested director must make full disclosure to the approving group. If neither of these safe harbor provisions is satisfied, then the transaction is subject to appropriate judicial action unless the transaction is fair to the corporation.

Loans to Directors and Officers The Model Act and some states permit a corporation to lend money to its directors only with its shareholders' authorization for each loan. The statutes in most states permit such loans either on a general or limited basis. The Revised Act initially permitted such loans if each particular loan was approved (1) by a majority of disinterested shareholders or (2) by the board of directors after determining that the loan would benefit the corporation; however, the 1988 amendments to the Revised Act deleted this section, subjecting loans to directors to the procedure that applies to directors' conflicting-interest transactions.

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act prohibits any publicly held corporation from making personal loans to its directors or its executive officers, although it does provide certain limited exceptions.

Corporate Opportunity Directors and officers may not usurp any corporate opportunity that in all fairness should belong to the corporation. A corporate opportunity is one in which the corporation has a right, property interest, or expectancy; whether such an opportunity exists depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. A corporate opportunity should be promptly offered to the corporation, which, in turn, should promptly accept or reject it. Rejection may be based on one or more of several factors, such as the corporation's lack of interest in the opportunity, its financial inability to acquire the opportunity, legal restrictions on its ability to accept the opportunity, or a third party's unwillingness to deal with the corporation. A provision was added to the Revised Act to deal with business opportunities and to provide safe-harbor protection for directors considering involvement with a business opportunity that might be considered a corporate opportunity.

BEAM V. STEWART

COURT OF CHANCERY OF DELAWARE, NEW CASTLE, 2003
833 A.2D 961, AFFIRMED, 845 A.2D 1040

http://courts.delaware.gov/opinions/\(3trtgh55j1s2xv45plxhzp55\)/download.aspx?ID=13450/download.aspx?ID=13450)

FACTS Monica A. Beam, a shareholder of Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia, Inc. (MSO), brings a derivative action against the defendants, all current directors and a former director of MSO, and against MSO as a nominal defendant. MSO is a Delaware corporation that operates in the publishing, television, merchandising, and Internet industries marketing products bearing the "Martha Stewart" brand name. Defendant Martha Stewart (Stewart) is a director of the company and its founder, chairman, CEO, and by far its majority shareholder controlling roughly 94.4 percent of the shareholder vote. Stewart, a former stockbroker, has in the past twenty years become a household icon, known for her advice and expertise on virtually all aspects of cooking, decorating, entertaining, and household affairs generally.

The market for MSO products is uniquely tied to the personal image and reputation of its founder, Stewart. MSO retains "an exclusive, worldwide, perpetual royalty-free license to use [Stewart's] name, likeness, image, voice and signature for its products and services." In its initial public offering prospectus, MSO recognized that impairment of Stewart's services to the company, including the tarnishing of her public reputation, would have a material adverse effect on its business. Under the terms of her employment agreement, Stewart may be terminated for gross misconduct or felony conviction that results in harm to MSO's business or reputation but is permitted discretion over the management of her personal, financial, and legal affairs to the extent that Stewart's management of her own life does not compromise her ability to serve the company.

Stewart's alleged misadventures with ImClone arise in part out of a longstanding personal friendship with Samuel D. Waksal (Waksal). Waksal is the former CEO of ImClone as well as a former suitor of Stewart's daughter. Waksal and Stewart have provided one another with reciprocal investment advice and assistance, and they share a stockbroker, Peter E. Bacanovic (Bacanovic) of Merrill Lynch. The speculative value of ImClone stock was tied quite directly to the likely success of its application for U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) approval to market the cancer treatment drug Erbitux. On December 26, Waksal received information that the FDA was rejecting the application to market Erbitux. The following day, December 27, he tried to sell his own shares and tipped his father and daughter to do the same. Stewart also sold her shares on December 27. After the close of trading on December 28, ImClone publicly announced the rejection of its application to market Erbitux. The following day the trading price closed slightly more than 20 percent lower than the closing price on the date that Stewart had sold her shares. By mid-2002, these events had attracted the interest of the New York Times and other news agencies, federal prosecutors, and a committee of the U.S. House of Representatives. Stewart's publicized attempts to quell any suspicion were ineffective at best because they were undermined by additional information as it came to light and by the other parties' accounts of the events. Ultimately Stewart's prompt efforts to turn away unwanted media and investigative attention failed. Stewart eventually had to discontinue her regular guest appearances on CBS' The Early Show because of questioning during the show about her sale of ImClone shares. After barely two months of such adverse publicity, MSO's stock price had declined by slightly more than 65 percent. In January 2002, Stewart and the Martha Stewart Family Partnership sold 3 million shares of Class A stock to an investor group.

The complaint alleges that the director defendants breached their fiduciary duties by failing to ensure that Stewart would not conduct her personal, financial, and legal affairs in a manner that would harm the Company, its intellectual property, or its business. It also alleges that Stewart breached her fiduciary duty of loyalty, usurping a corporate opportunity by selling large blocks of MSO stock.

DECISION These counts of the complaint are dismissed for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.

OPINION Chandler, Chancellor. The "duty to monitor" has been litigated in other circumstances, generally where directors were alleged to have been negligent in monitoring the activities of the corporation, activities that led to corporate liability. *** That the Company is "closely identified" with Stewart is conceded, but it does not necessarily follow that the Board is required to monitor, much less control, the way Stewart handles her personal financial and legal affairs.

***

*** Regardless of Stewart's importance to MSO, she is not the corporation. And it is unreasonable to impose a duty upon the Board to monitor Stewart's personal affairs because such a requirement is neither legitimate nor feasible. Monitoring Stewart by, for example, hiring a private detective to monitor her behavior is more likely to generate liability to Stewart under some tort theory than to protect the Company from a decline in its stock price as a result of harm to Stewart's public image.

*** [This count] is dismissed for failure to state a claim.

The basic requirements for establishing usurpation of a corporate opportunity were articulated by the Delaware Supreme Court in Broz v. Cellular Information Systems, Inc.:

[A] corporate officer or director may not take a business opportunity for his own if: (1) the corporation is financially able to exploit the opportunity; (2) the opportunity is within the corporation's line of business; (3) the corporation has an interest or expectancy in the opportunity; and (4) by taking the opportunity for his own, the corporate fiduciary will thereby be placed in a position [inimical] to his duties to the corporation.

In this analysis, no single factor is dispositive. Instead the Court must balance all factors as they apply to a particular case. For purposes of the present motion, I assume that the sales of stock to ValueAct could be considered to be a "business opportunity." I now address each of the four factors articulated in Broz.

The amended complaint asserts that MSO was able to exploit this opportunity because the Company's certificate of incorporation had sufficient authorized, yet unissued, shares of Class A common stock to cover the sale to ValueAct. Defendants do not deny that the Company could have sold previously unissued shares to ValueAct. I therefore conclude that the first factor has been met.

An opportunity is within a corporation's line of business if it is "an activity as to which [the corporation] has fundamental knowledge, practical experience and ability to pursue." ***

*** MSO is a consumer products company, not an investment company. Simply stated, selling stock is not the same line of business as selling advice to homemakers. *** For the foregoing reasons, I therefore conclude that the sale of stock by Stewart *** was not within MSO's line of business.

A corporation has an interest or expectancy in an opportunity if there is "some tie between that property and the nature of the corporate business." *** Here, plaintiff does not allege any facts that would imply that MSO was in need of additional capital, seeking additional capital, or even remotely interested in finding new investors. ***

"The corporate opportunity doctrine is implicated only in cases where the fiduciary's seizure of an opportunity results in a conflict between the fiduciary's duties to the corporation and the self-interest of the director as actualized by the exploitation of the opportunity." Given that I have concluded that MSO had no interest or expectancy in the issuance of new stock to ValueAct, I fail to see, based on the allegations before me, how Stewart's *** sales placed [her] in a position inimical to their duties to the Company. Were I to decide otherwise, directors of every Delaware corporation would be faced with the ever-present specter of suit for breach of their duty of loyalty if they sold stock in the company on whose Board they sit.

Additionally, Delaware courts have recognized a policy that allows officers and directors of corporations to buy and sell shares of that corporation at will so long as they act in good faith. ***

***

On balancing the four factors, I conclude that plaintiff has failed to plead facts sufficient to state a claim that Stewart *** usurped a corporate opportunity for [herself] in violation of [her] fiduciary duty of loyalty to MSO. [This count] is dismissed in its entirety *** for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.

INTERPRETATION Corporate directors and officers may not usurp any opportunity in which the corporation has a right, property interest, or expectancy that in all fairness should belong to the corporation.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the defendants act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What should be the test for determining when an opportunity belongs to the corporation? Explain.

Transactions in Shares The issuance of shares at favorable prices to management by excluding other shareholders normally will constitute a violation of the fiduciary duty. So might the issuance of shares to a director at a fair price if the purpose of the issuance is to perpetuate corporate control rather than to raise capital or to serve some other corporate interest. Officers and directors have access to inside advance information, unavailable to the public, which may affect the future market value of the corporation's shares. Federal statutes have attempted to deal with this trading advantage by prohibiting officers and directors from purchasing or selling shares of their corporation's stock without adequately disclosing all material facts in their possession that may affect the stock's actual or potential value. We will discuss these matters more fully in Chapter 40.

Although state law has inconsistently imposed liability on officers and directors for secret, profitable use of inside information, the trend is toward holding them liable for breach of fiduciary duty to shareholders from whom they purchase stock without disclosing facts that give the stock added potential value. They are also held liable to the corporation for profits they realize on a sale of the stock when undisclosed conditions of the corporation make a substantial decline in value practically inevitable.

Duty Not to Compete As fiduciaries, directors and officers owe to the corporation the duty of undivided loyalty, which means that they may not compete with the corporation. A director or officer who breaches his fiduciary duty by competing with the corporation is liable for damages caused to the corporation. Although directors and officers may engage in their own business interests, courts will closely scrutinize any interest that competes with the corporation's business. Moreover, an officer or director may not use corporate personnel, facilities, or funds for her own benefit or disclose trade secrets of the corporation to others.

INDEMNIFICATION OF DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS

Directors and officers incur personal liability for breaching any of the duties they owe to the corporation and its shareholders. Under many modern incorporation statutes, a corporation may indemnify a director or officer for liability incurred if he acted in good faith and in a manner he reasonably believed to be in the best interests of the corporation, so long as he has not been judged negligent or liable for misconduct. The Revised Act provides for mandatory indemnification of directors and officers for reasonable expenses they incur in the wholly successful defense of any proceeding brought against them because they are or were directors or officers. These provisions, however, may be limited by the articles of incorporation. In addition, a corporation may purchase insurance to indemnify officers and directors for liability arising out of their corporate activities, including liabilities against which the corporation is not empowered to indemnify directly.

Practical Advice

Before agreeing to serve on a corporate board of directors, make sure that the company has sufficient director's liability insurance and determine what the policy covers.

Business Law in Action

In response to the spate of corporate and accounting scandals at the turn of the millennium, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act and new corporate governance rules adopted by the New York Stock Exchange and the National Association of Securities Dealers have changed the landscape for corporate directors' accountability, at least for the vast majority of publicly traded corporations.

Boards of directors that "rubber stamp" management's decisions are no longer acceptable. Instead, recent governance reforms have the purpose of reshaping boards of directors into true corporate monitors. The primary features of today's reconfigured boards are (1) a majority of independent directors with no business or personal ties to the company, (2) specialized committees of the board to address different corporate issues, especially an audit committee consisting exclusively of independent directors that oversees the firm's outside auditors, among other duties, and (3) a clear charter of board authority that is published, usually on the firm's website.

While the business judgment rule protects corporate directors from honest mistakes in judgment when making decisions for the corporation, it does not provide a shield for their inaction, malfeasance, or lack of supervision. Inattention by the board not only fails the business judgment rule, it may amount to "abdication," which is a breach of directors' duty of loyalty. Moreover, directors who are aware that they are not devoting sufficient attention to their duties are not acting in good faith and may not be able to take advantage of exculpatory charter provisions that exonerate directors who act in good faith and without the intent to inflict harm on the corporation. In such a case, directors may also lose the indemnity protection typically accorded them when sued by shareholders or others. This will mean personal liability for any resulting civil judgments.

In this new stricter corporate governance climate, directors will need to take greater pains to establish a strong foundation for trusting the honesty, integrity, and loyalty of the executives and managers upon whom they rely, as well as the expertise and independence of the company's outside auditors and other advisors. They should also demonstrate their independence and devote substantial, meaningful time and energy to their roles as both corporate policy makers and monitors.

LIABILITY LIMITATION STATUTES

Virtually all states have enacted legislation limiting the liability of directors. Most of these states, including Delaware, have authorized corporations—with shareholder approval—to limit or eliminate the liability of directors for some breaches of duty. (A few states permit shareholders to limit the liability of officers.) The Delaware statute provides that the articles of incorporation may contain a provision eliminating or limiting the personal liability of a director to the corporation or its stockholders for monetary damages for breach of directorial duty, provided that such provision does not eliminate or limit the liability of a director (1) for any breach of the director's duty of loyalty to the corporation or its stockholders, (2) for acts or omissions lacking good faith or involving intentional misconduct or a knowing violation of law, (3) for liability for unlawful dividend payments or redemptions, or (4) for any transaction from which the director derived an improper personal benefit.

A few states have directly limited personal liability for directors, subject to certain exceptions, without requiring an amendment to the articles of incorporation. A third approach, taken by some states, limits the amount of money damages that may be assessed against a director or officer.

The Revised Act authorizes the articles of incorporation to include a provision eliminating or limiting—with certain exceptions—the liability of a director to the corporation or its shareholders for any action he takes, or fails to take, as a director. The exceptions, for which his liability would not be affected, are (1) the amount of any financial benefit the director receives to which he is not entitled, such as a bribe, kickback, or profits from a usurped corporate opportunity; (2) an intentional infliction of harm on the corporation or the shareholders; (3) liability under Section 8.33 for unlawful distributions; and (4) an intentional violation of the criminal law.

Ethical Dilemma

Whom Does a Director Represent? What Are a Director's Duties?

Facts Maulington's, a large, publicly held food-processing company, is run by an old, dictatorial CEO, who is also chairman of the board—a board packed with inside directors and retired CEOs of other businesses. Industry analysts regard Maulington's as stodgy and unimaginative in its use of capital. Yet its profits are dependable, it pays a decent dividend, and its stock is widely held by conservative investors. In the city where the company has its headquarters, it is regarded as a good corporate citizen. Many community organizations depend on its charitable contributions.

Upon the unexpected death of a director, the remaining directors nominate a forty-year-old doctor and children's health advocate, Peter Maxwell-Deane, who has wide community connections but little business experience. The directors reason that the board could use some youth, at least for appearances. Dr. Maxwell-Deane is duly elected to the board. He knows the visibility will help his career. He also hopes to influence the company to donate to his favorite children's health projects.

After his election, Dr. Maxwell-Deane is approached by Carola Campbell, a woman he knows from his charitable work and whom, in fact, he once dated for several months. Campbell is the granddaughter of the company's founder, owns 1 percent of the company's shares, and is feuding with the current CEO. She says that the CEO has held Maulington's back, thereby hurting its share price, and that she thinks he should have retired long ago. She tells Maxwell-Deane that the board's compensation committee has improperly given stock options to the current CEO and other inside directors. Campbell, who has no friends on the board, appeals to Maxwell-Deane for help. Specifically, she asks him to sound out other outside directors to see whether they also find the stock option deals fishy. Finally, she tells him that she is thinking about requesting a list of shareholders from the board so that she can communicate directly with other shareholders about the management of the corporation. She wonders whether, if she has any trouble obtaining the list, Maxwell-Deane will help her.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. Does Dr. Maxwell-Deane, as a director, represent Carola Campbell? Should he quietly sound out the other directors as she asks? What risks would he run by doing so?
2. Does Maxwell-Deane have a duty to disclose to the board his previous relationship with Campbell? What details, if any, of his conversation with her should he report to the board?
3. What duty does Maxwell-Deane have to follow up on Campbell's allegation that stock options were improperly awarded to the CEO and other inside directors?
4. What should Maxwell-Deane do?

Questions

1. Brown, the president and director of a corporation engaged in owning and operating a chain of motels, was advised, on what seemed to be good authority, that a superhighway was to be constructed through the town of X, which would be a most desirable location for a motel. Brown presented these facts to the board of directors of the motel corporation and recommended that the corporation build a motel in the town of X at the location described. The board of directors agreed, and the new motel was constructed. However, the superhighway plans were changed after the motel was constructed, and the highway was never built. Later, a packinghouse was built on property adjoining the motel, and as a result the corporation sustained a considerable loss. The shareholders brought an appropriate action against Brown, charging that his proposal had caused the corporation a substantial loss. What is the result?
2. A, B, C, D, and E constituted the board of directors of the X Corporation. While D and E were out of town, A, B, and C held a special meeting of the board. Just as the meeting began, C became ill. He then gave a proxy to A and went home. A resolution was then adopted directing and authorizing the X Corporation's purchase of an adjoining piece of land owned by S as a site for an additional factory building. A and B voted for the resolution, and A, as C's proxy, cast C's vote in favor of the resolution. The X Corporation then made a contract with S for the purchase of the land. After the return of D and E, another special meeting of the board was held with all five directors present. A resolution was then unanimously adopted to cancel the contract with S. May S recover damages from X Corporation for breach of contract?
3. Bernard Koch was president of United Corporation, a closely held corporation. Koch, James Trent, and Henry Phillips made up the three-person board of directors. At a meeting of the board, Trent was elected president, replacing Koch. At the same meeting, Trent attempted to have the salary of the president increased. He was unable to obtain board approval of the increase because although Phillips voted for the increase, Koch voted against it. Trent was disqualified from voting by the charter. As a result, the directors, by a two-to-one vote, amended the bylaws to provide for the appointment of an executive committee composed of three reputable businesspersons to pass upon and fix all matters of salary for employees of the corporation. Subsequently, the executive committee, consisting of Jane Jones, James Black, and William Johnson, increased the salary of the president. Will Koch succeed in an appropriate action against the corporation, Trent, and Phillips to enjoin them from paying compensation to the president above that fixed by the board of directors? Explain.
4. Zenith Steel Company operates a prosperous business. In January, Zenith's CEO and president, Roe, who is also a member of the board of directors, was voted a $1 million bonus by the board of directors for valuable services he provided to the company during the previous year. Roe received an annual salary of $850,000 from the company. Black, Inc., a minority shareholder in Zenith Steel Company, brings an appropriate action to enjoin the payment by the company of the $1 million bonus. Explain whether Black will succeed in its attempt.

5. a. Smith, a director of the Sample Corporation, sells a piece of vacant land to the Sample Corporation for $500,000. The land cost him $200,000.
- b. Jones, a shareholder of the Sample Corporation, sells a used truck to the Sample Corporation for $8,400, although the truck is worth $6,000.

Raphael, a minority shareholder of the Sample Corporation, claims that these sales are void and should be annulled. Is he correct? Why?

6. X Corporation manufactures machine tools. Its two principal competitors are Y Corporation and Z Corporation. The five directors of X Corporation are Black, White, Brown, Green, and Crimson. At a duly called meeting of the board of directors of X Corporation in January, all five directors were present. A contract for the purchase of $10 million worth of steel from the D Company, of which Black, White, and Brown are directors, was discussed and approved by a unanimous vote. There was a lengthy discussion about entering into negotiations for the purchase of Q Corporation, which allegedly was about to be sold for around $150 million. By a three-to-two vote, it was decided not to open such negotiations.

Three months later, Green purchased Q Corporation for $150 million. Shortly thereafter, a new board of directors for X Corporation took office. X Corporation now brings actions to rescind its contract with D Company and to compel Green to assign to X Corporation his contract for the purchase of Q Corporation. Decisions as to each action?

7. Gore had been the owner of 1 percent of the outstanding shares of the Webster Company, a corporation since its organization ten years ago. Ratliff, the president of the company, was the owner of 70 percent of the outstanding shares. Ratliff used the shareholders' list to submit to the shareholders an offer of $50 per share for their stock. Gore, on receiving the offer, called Ratliff and told him that the offer was inadequate and advised that she was willing to offer $60 per share and for that purpose demanded a shareholders' list. Ratliff knew that Gore was willing and able to supply the funds necessary to purchase the stock, but he nevertheless refused to supply the list to Gore. Further, he did not offer to transmit Gore's offer to the shareholders of record. Gore then brought an action to compel the corporation to make the shareholders' list available to her. Will Gore be able to obtain a copy of the shareholders' list? Why?
8. Mitchell, Nelson, Olsen, and Parker, experts in manufacturing baubles, each owned fifteen of one hundred authorized shares of Baubles, Inc., a corporation of State X that does not permit cumulative voting. On July 7, 2003, the corporation sold forty shares to Quentin, an investor, for $1.5 million which it used to purchase a factory building. On July 8, 2003, Mitchell, Nelson, Olsen, and Parker contracted as follows:

All parties will act jointly in exercising voting rights as shareholders. In the event of a failure to agree, the question shall be submitted to George Yost, whose decision shall be binding upon all parties.

Until a meeting of shareholders on April 17, 2010, when a dispute arose, all parties to the contract had voted consistently and regularly for Nelson, Olsen, and Parker as directors. At that meeting, Yost considered the dispute and decided and directed that Mitchell, Nelson, Olsen, and Parker vote their shares for the latter three as directors. Nelson, Olsen, and Parker so voted. Mitchell and Quentin voted for themselves and Olsen as directors.

- a. Is the contract of July 8, 2003, valid, and, if so, what is its effect?
- b. Who were elected directors of Baubles, Inc., at the meeting of its shareholders on April 17, 2010?
9. Acme Corporation's articles of incorporation require cumulative voting for the election of its directors. The board of directors of Acme Corporation consists of nine directors, each elected annually.
  - a. Peter owns 24 percent of the outstanding shares of Acme Corporation. How many directors can he elect with his votes?
  - b. If Acme Corporation were to classify its board into three classes, each consisting of three directors elected every three years, how many directors would Peter be able to elect?
10. A bylaw of Betma Corporation provides that no shareholder can sell his shares unless he first offers them for sale to the corporation or its directors. The bylaw also states that this restriction shall be printed or stamped upon each stock certificate and shall bind all present or future owners or holders. Betma Corporation did not comply with this latter provision. Shaw, having knowledge of the bylaw restriction, nevertheless purchased twenty shares of the corporation's stock from Rice, without having Rice first offer them for sale to the corporation or its directors. When Betma Corporation refused to effectuate a transfer of the shares to her, Shaw sued to compel a transfer and the issuance of a new certificate to her. What is the result?

Case Problems

11. Neese, trustee in bankruptcy for First Trust Company, brings a suit against the directors of the company for losses the company sustained as a result of the directors' failure to use due care and diligence in the discharge of their duties. The specific acts of negligence alleged are (1) failure to give as much time and attention to the affairs of the company as its business interests required; (2) abdication of their control of the corporation by turning the entire management of the corporation over to its president, Brown; (3) failure to keep informed as to the affairs, condition, and management of the corporation; (4) taking no action to direct or control the corporation's affairs; (5) permitting large, open, unsecured loans to affiliated but financially unsound companies that were owned and controlled by Brown; (6) failure to examine financial reports that would have shown illegal diversions and waste of the corporation's funds; and (7) failure to supervise properly the corporation's officers and directors. Which, if any, of these allegations can constitute a breach of the duty of diligence?

- 12. Minority shareholders of Midwest Technical Institute Development Corporation, a closed-end investment company owning assets consisting principally of securities of companies in technological fields, brought a shareholder derivative suit against officers and directors of Midwest, seeking to recover on Midwest's behalf the profits the officers and directors realized through dealings in stock held in Midwest's portfolio in breach of their fiduciary duty. Approximately three years after commencement of the action, a new corporation, Midtex, was organized to acquire Midwest's assets. May the shareholders now add Midtex as a party defendant to their suit? Why?
- 13. Riffe, while serving as an officer of Wilshire Oil Company, received a secret commission for work he did on behalf of a competing corporation. Can Wilshire Oil recover these secret profits and, in addition, recover the compensation Wilshire Oil paid to Riffe during the period that he acted on behalf of the competitor? Explain.
- 14. Muller, a shareholder of SCM, brought an action against SCM over his unsuccessful negotiations to purchase some of SCM's assets overseas. He then formed a shareholder committee to challenge the position of SCM's management in that suit. In order to conduct a proxy battle for management control at the next election of directors, the committee sought to obtain the list of shareholders who would be eligible to vote. At the time, however, no member of the committee had owned stock in SCM for the six-month period required to gain access to such information. Then Lopez, a former SCM executive and a shareholder for more than one year, joined the committee and demanded to be allowed to inspect the minutes of SCM shareholder proceedings and to gain access to the current shareholder list. His stated reason for making the demand was to solicit proxies in support of the committee's nominees for positions as directors. Lopez brought this action after SCM rejected his demand. Will Lopez succeed?
- 15. Pritchard & Baird was a reinsurance broker. A reinsurance broker arranges contracts between insurance companies so that companies that have sold large policies may sell participations in these policies to other companies in order to share the risks. Pritchard & Baird was controlled for many years by Charles Pritchard, who died in December 2007. Prior to his death, he brought his two sons, Charles, Jr. and William, into the business. The pair assumed an increasingly dominant role in the affairs of the business during the elder Charles's later years. Starting in 2004, Charles, Jr. and William began to withdraw from the corporate account ever-increasing sums that were designated as "loans" on the balance sheet. These "loans," however, represented a significant misappropriation of funds belonging to the corporation's clients. By late 2009, Charles, Jr. and William had plunged the corporation into hopeless bankruptcy. A total of $12,333,514.47 in "loans" had accumulated by October of that year. Mrs. Lillian Pritchard, the widow of the elder Charles, was a member of the corporation's board of directors until her resignation in December 2009, the day before the corporation filed for bankruptcy. Francis, as trustee in the bankruptcy proceeding, brought suit against United Jersey Bank, the administrator of the estate of Charles, Sr. He also charged that Lillian Pritchard, as a director of the corporation, was personally liable for the misappropriated funds on the basis of negligence in discharging her duties as director. Is Francis correct?
- 16. Donald J. Richardson, Grove L. Cook, and Wayne Weaver were stockholders of Major Oil. They brought a direct action, individually and on behalf of all other stockholders of Major, against certain directors and other officers of the corporation. The complaint stated twelve causes of action. The first eight causes alleged some misappropriation of Major's assets by the defendants and sought to require the defendants to return the assets to Major. Three of the remaining four causes alleged breaches of fiduciary duty implicit in those fraudulent acts and sought compensatory or punitive damages for the injury that resulted. The final cause sought the appointment of a receiver. Richardson, Cook, and Weaver moved for an order certifying the suit as a class action. Decision?
- 17. Klinicki and Lundgren, both furloughed Pan Am pilots stationed in West Germany, decided to start their own charter airline company. They formed Berlinair, Inc., a closely held Oregon corporation. Lundgren was president and a director in charge of developing the business. Klinicki was vice president and a director in charge of operations and maintenance. Klinicki, Lundgren, and Lelco, Inc. (Lundgren's family business) each owned one-third of the stock. Klinicki and Lundgren, as representatives of Berlinair, met with BFR, a consortium of Berlin travel agents, to negotiate a lucrative air transportation contract. When Lundgren learned of the likelihood of actually obtaining the BFR contract, he formed his own solely owned company, Air Berlin Charter Company (ABC). Although he continued to negotiate for the BFR contract, he did so on behalf of ABC, not Berlinair. Eventually BFR awarded the contract to ABC. Klinicki commenced a derivative action on behalf of Berlinair and a suit against Lundgren individually for usurping a corporate opportunity of Berlinair. Lundgren claimed that Berlinair was not financially able to undertake the BFR contract and therefore no usurpation of corporate opportunity could occur. Who is correct? Explain.

FUNDAMENTAL CHANGES OF CORPORATIONS

The minority, in other words, should have the right to say to the majority, “we recognize your right to restructure the enterprise, provided you are willing to buy us out at a fair price if we object, so that we are not forced to participate in an enterprise other than the one we contemplated at the outset of our mutual association.”

M. EISENBERG, THE STRUCTURE OF THE CORPORATION, 1976

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Explain the procedure for amending the charter and list which amendments give rise to the appraisal remedy.
2. Identify which combinations do not require shareholder approval and which give dissenting shareholders an appraisal remedy.
3. Distinguish between a tender offer and a compulsory share exchange.
4. Compare and contrast a cash-out combination and a management buyout.
5. Identify the ways by which voluntary and involuntary dissolution may occur.

Certain extraordinary changes affect a corporation so fundamentally that they fall outside the authority of the board of directors and require shareholder approval. Such fundamental changes include charter amendments, mergers, consolidations, compulsory share exchanges, dissolution, and the sale or lease of all or substantially all of the corporation's assets (other than those in the regular course of business), all of which alter the corporation's basic structure. Although each of these actions is authorized by state incorporation statutes that impose specific procedural requirements, they are also subject to equitable limitations imposed by the courts. In 1999, substantial revisions were made to the Revised Act's treatment of fundamental changes.

As shareholder approval for fundamental changes usually does not need to be unanimous, such changes frequently will be approved despite opposition by minority shareholders. Shareholder approval means a majority (or some other specified fraction) of all votes entitled to be cast, rather than a majority (or other fraction) of votes represented at a shareholders' meeting at which a quorum is present. (The 1999 amendments to the Revised Act significantly changed the voting rule: fundamental changes need be approved by only a majority of the shares present at a meeting at which a quorum is present.) In some instances, minority shareholders have the right to dissent and to recover the fair value of their shares if they follow the prescribed procedure for doing so. This right is called the appraisal remedy. We will discuss the legal aspects of fundamental changes in this chapter.

Charter Amendments

Shareholders do not have a vested property right resulting from any provision in the articles of incorporation. Accordingly, the corporate charter may be amended by following proper procedures. The amended articles of incorporation, however, may contain only those provisions that might lawfully be contained in the articles of incorporation at the time of the amendment.

APPROVAL BY DIRECTORS AND SHAREHOLDERS

Under the Revised Act and most statutes, the typical procedure for amending the articles of incorporation requires the board of directors to adopt a resolution setting forth the proposed amendment, which must then be approved by a majority vote of the shareholders entitled to vote, although some older statutes require a two-thirds shareholder vote. In some states, shareholders may approve charter amendments without a prior board of directors' resolution. After the shareholders approve the amendment, the corporation executes articles of amendment and delivers them to the secretary of state for filing. The amendment does not affect the existing rights of nonshareholders.

Under the Revised Act, dissenting shareholders receive the appraisal remedy only if an amendment materially and adversely affects their rights by (1) altering or abolishing a preferential right of the shares; (2) creating, altering, or abolishing a right involving the redemption of the shares; (3) altering or abolishing a preemptive right of the holder of such shares; (4) excluding or limiting a shareholder's right to vote on any matter or to cumulate his votes; or (5) reducing to a fraction of a share the number of shares a shareholder owns, if the fractional share is to be acquired for cash. The 1999 amendments to the Revised Act eliminate the appraisal remedy for virtually all charter amendments.

Under the Revised Act, the shareholder approval required for an amendment depends upon the nature of the amendment. An amendment that would give rise to dissenters' rights must be approved by a majority of all votes entitled to be cast on the amendment, unless the act or the charter requires a greater vote. All other amendments must be approved by a majority of all votes cast on the amendment, unless the act or the charter requires a greater vote.

Practical Advice

If you are forming a close corporation and will hold a minority interest in it, consider including in the charter supermajority quorum and voting provisions for charter amendments to ensure that you will have veto power.

APPROVAL BY DIRECTORS

The Revised Act permits the board of directors to adopt certain amendments without shareholder action, unless the articles of incorporation provide otherwise. These amendments include (1) extending the duration of a corporation that was incorporated when limited duration was required by law, (2) changing each issued and unissued authorized share of an outstanding class into a greater number of whole shares if the corporation has only one class of shares, and (3) making minor name changes.

Combinations

Acquiring all or substantially all of the assets of another corporation or corporations may be both desirable and profitable for a corporation. To accomplish this, the corporation may (1) purchase or lease other corporations' assets, (2) purchase a controlling stock interest in other corporations, (3) merge with other corporations, or (4) consolidate with other corporations. A few states and the 1999 amendments to the Revised Act contain provisions authorizing a corporation to merge into another type of business organization, such as a limited partnership, limited liability company (LLC), or a limited liability partnership.

Any method of combination that involves issuing shares, proxy solicitations, or tender offers may be subject to federal securities regulation, as we will discuss in Chapter 40. Moreover, when a combination may have a detrimental effect on competition, federal antitrust laws, as discussed in Chapter 43, may apply.

PURCHASE OR LEASE OF ALL OR SUBSTANTIALLY ALL OF THE ASSETS

When one corporation purchases or leases all or substantially all of the assets of another corporation, the legal personality of neither corporation changes. The purchaser or lessee corporation simply acquires ownership or control of additional physical assets. The selling or lessor corporation, in exchange for its physical properties, receives cash, other property, or a stipulated rental. Each corporation continues its separate existence, having altered only the form or extent of its assets.

Generally, a corporation that purchases the assets of another corporation does not assume the other's liabilities unless (1) the purchaser expressly or impliedly agrees to assume the seller's liabilities; (2) the transaction amounts to a consolidation or merger of the two corporations; (3) the purchaser is a mere continuation of the seller; or (4) the sale is for the fraudulent purpose of avoiding the seller's liabilities. Some courts, as the next case illustrates, recognize a fifth exception (called the "product line" exception), which imposes strict tort liability upon the purchaser for defects in products manufactured and distributed by the seller corporation when the purchaser corporation continues the product line.

Practical Advice

Recognize that under some circumstances courts will treat the purchase of all the assets of a corporation as a de facto merger and make the purchaser liable for the debts of the seller.

RAY V. ALAD CORPORATION

SUPREME COURT OF CALIFORNIA, 1977
19 CAL.3D 22, 136 CAL.RPTR. 574, 560 P.2D 3

FACTS On March 24, 1969, Ray fell from a defective ladder while working for his employer. Ray brought suit in strict tort liability against the Alad Corporation (Alad II), which neither manufactured nor sold the ladder to Ray's employer. Prior to the accident, Alad II succeeded to the business of the ladder's manufacturer, the now-dissolved "Alad Corporation" (Alad I), through a purchase of Alad I's assets for an adequate cash consideration. Alad II acquired Alad I's plant, equipment, inventory, trade name, and goodwill and continued to manufacture the same line of ladders under the "Alad" name, using the same equipment, designs, and personnel. In addition, Alad II solicited through the same sales representatives with no outward indication of any change in the ownership of the business. The parties had no agreement, however, concerning Alad II's assumption of Alad I's tort liabilities. Ray appealed from a judgment for Alad II.

DECISION Judgment reversed.

OPINION Wright, J. Our discussion of the law starts with the rule ordinarily applied to the determination of whether a corporation purchasing the principal assets of another corporation assumes the other's liabilities. As typically formulated the rule states that the purchaser does not assume the seller's liabilities unless (1) there is an express or implied agreement of assumption, (2) the transaction amounts to a consolidation or merger of the two corporations, (3) the purchasing corporation is a mere continuation of the seller, or (4) the transfer of assets to the purchaser is for the fraudulent purpose of escaping liability for the seller's debts. [Citations.]

If this rule were determinative of Alad II's liability to plaintiff it would require us to affirm the summary judgment. None of the rule's four stated grounds for imposing liability on the purchasing corporation is present here. There was no express or implied agreement to assume liability for injury from defective products previously manufactured by Alad I. Nor is there any indication or contention that the transaction was prompted by any fraudulent purpose of escaping liability for Alad I's debts.

With respect to the second stated ground for liability, the purchase of Alad I's assets did not amount to a consolidation or merger. ***

***

We therefore conclude that the general rule governing succession to liabilities does not require Alad II to respond to plaintiff's claim. *** We must decide whether the policies underlying strict tort liability for defective products call for a special exception to the rule that would otherwise insulate the present defendant from plaintiff's claim. [Citations.]

The purpose of the rule of strict tort liability "is to insure that the costs of injuries resulting from defective products are borne by the manufacturers that put such products on the market rather than by the injured persons who are powerless to protect themselves." [Citation.] However, the rule "does not rest on the analysis of the financial strength or bargaining power of the parties to the particular action. It rests, rather, on the proposition that '[t]he cost of an injury and the loss of time or health may be an overwhelming misfortune to the person injured, and a needless one, for the risk of injury can be insured by the manufacturer and distributed among the public as a cost of doing business.' [Citations.]" Thus, "the paramount policy to be promoted by the rule is the protection of otherwise defenseless victims of manufacturing defects and the spreading throughout society of the cost of compensating them." (Italics added.) [Citation.] Justification for imposing strict liability upon a successor to a manufacturer under the circumstances here presented rests upon (1) the virtual destruction of the plaintiff's remedies against the original manufacturer caused by the successor's acquisition of the business, (2) the successor's ability to assume the original manufacturer's risk-spreading rule, and (3) the fairness of requiring the successor to assume a responsibility for defective products that was a burden necessarily attached to the original manufacturer's good will being enjoyed by the successor in the continued operation of the business. We turn to a consideration of each of these aspects in the context of the present case.

We must assume for purposes of the present proceeding that plaintiff was injured as a result of defects in a ladder manufactured by Alad I and therefore could assert strict tort liability against Alad I under the rule of [citation]. However, the practical value of this right of recovery against the original manufacturer was vitiated by the purchase of Alad I's tangible assets, trade name and good will on behalf of Alad II and the dissolution of Alad I within two months thereafter in accordance with the purchase agreement. The injury giving rise to plaintiff's claim against Alad I did not occur until more than six months after the filing of the dissolution certificate declaring that Alad I's "known debts and liabilities have been actually paid" and its "known assets have been distributed to its shareholders." This distribution of assets was perfectly proper as there was no requirement that provision be made for claims such as plaintiff's that had not yet come into existence. Thus, even if plaintiff could obtain a judgment on his claim against the dissolved and assetless Alad I he would face formidable and probably insuperable obstacles in attempting to obtain satisfaction of the judgment from former stockholders or directors. [Citations.]

***

While depriving plaintiff of redress against the ladder's manufacturer, Alad I, the transaction by which Alad II acquired Alad I's name and operating assets had the further effect of transferring to Alad II the resources that had previously been available to Alad I for meeting its responsibilities to persons injured by defects in ladders it had produced. These resources included not only the physical plant, the manufacturing equipment, and the inventories of raw material, work in process, and finished goods, but also the know-how available through the records of manufacturing designs, the continued employment of the factory personnel, and the consulting services of Alad I's general manager. With these facilities and sources of information, Alad II had virtually the same capacity as Alad I to estimate the risks of claims for injuries from defects in previously manufactured ladders for purposes of obtaining insurance coverage or planning self-insurance. [Citation.] ***

Finally, the imposition upon Alad II of liability for injuries from Alad I's defective products is fair and equitable in view of Alad II's acquisition of Alad I's trade name, good will, and customer lists, its continuing to produce the same line of ladders, and its holding itself out to potential customers as the same enterprise. ***

We therefore conclude that a party which acquires a manufacturing business and continues the output of its line of products under the circumstances here presented assumes strict tort liability for defects in units of the same product line previously manufactured and distributed by the entity from which the business was acquired. ***

INTERPRETATION If a purchaser of all of a corporation's assets continues the seller's product line, some courts impose upon the purchaser strict tort liability for defects in products previously manufactured by the seller corporation.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What are the policy arguments supporting and opposing the court's approach in this case? Explain.

Regular Course of Business If the sale or lease of all or substantially all of its assets is in the selling or lessor corporation's usual and regular course of business, approval by its board of directors is required but shareholder authorization is not. In addition, a mortgage or pledge of any or all of a corporation's property and assets—whether in the usual or regular course of business or not—also requires only the approval of the board of directors. The Revised Act considers a transfer of any or all of a corporation's assets to a wholly owned subsidiary to be a sale in the regular course of business.

Other Than in Regular Course of Business Shareholder approval is necessary only for a sale or lease of all or substantially all of a corporation's assets that is not in the usual and regular course of business. (The 1999 amendments to the Revised Act adopt an objective test for determining when shareholder approval is required.) The selling corporation, by liquidating its assets, or the lessor corporation, by placing its physical assets beyond its control, has significantly changed its position and perhaps its ability to carry on the type of business contemplated by its charter. For this reason, such a sale or lease must be approved not only by action of the directors but also by the affirmative vote of the holders of a majority of the corporation's shares entitled to be cast at a shareholders' meeting called for this purpose. In most states, dissenting shareholders of the selling corporation are given an appraisal remedy.

PURCHASE OF SHARES

An alternative to the purchase of another corporation's assets is the purchase of its stock. When one corporation acquires all of, or a controlling interest in, the stock of another corporation, the legal existence of neither corporation changes. The acquiring corporation acts through its board of directors, while the corporation that becomes a subsidiary does not act at all, because the decision to sell stock is made by the individual shareholders, not by the corporation itself. The capital structure of the subsidiary remains unchanged, and that of the parent is usually not altered unless financing the acquisition requires a change in capital. Because formal approval is required of neither corporation's shareholders, there is no appraisal remedy. See Figure 37-1.

Sale of Control When one or a few shareholders own a controlling interest, the shareholder(s) may privately negotiate a sale of such interest, although the courts require that these transactions be made with due care. The controlling shareholders must make a reasonable investigation so as not to transfer control to purchasers who wrongfully plan to steal or “loot” the corporation's assets or to act against its best interests. In addition, purchasers frequently are willing to pay a premium for a block of shares that conveys control. Although historically some courts have required that this so-called control premium inure to the benefit of the corporation, today virtually all courts permit the controlling shareholders to retain the full amount of the control premium.

Tender Offer When one or a few shareholders do not hold a controlling interest, the acquisition of a corporation through the purchase of shares may take the form of a tender offer. A tender offer is a general invitation to all shareholders of a target company to tender their shares for sale at a specified price. The offer may be for all of the target company's shares or for just a controlling interest. Tender offers for publicly held companies, which are subject to federal securities regulation, will be discussed in Chapter 40.

COMPULSORY SHARE EXCHANGE

The Revised Act and some states provide different procedures when a corporation acquires shares through a compulsory share exchange, a transaction by which the corporation becomes the owner of all the outstanding shares of one or more classes of shares of another corporation by an exchange that is compulsory on all owners of the acquired shares. The corporation may acquire the shares with its or any other corporation's shares, obligations, or other securities, or with cash or other property. For example, if A Corporation acquires all of B Corporation's outstanding shares through a compulsory exchange, B becomes a wholly owned subsidiary of A. A compulsory share exchange does not affect the separate existence of the corporate parties to the transaction. Although their results are similar to those of mergers, as discussed below, compulsory share exchanges are used instead of mergers when it is desirable that the acquired corporation remain in existence, as, for example, in the formation of holding company systems for insurance companies and banks.

A compulsory share exchange requires approval from the board of directors of each corporation and from the shareholders of the corporation whose shares are being acquired. Each class of shares included in the exchange must vote separately. The shareholders of the corporation acquiring the shares need not approve the transaction. After the shareholders adopt and approve the compulsory share exchange plan, it is binding on all who hold shares of the class to be acquired. Dissenting shareholders of the corporation whose shares are acquired are given an appraisal remedy.

MERGER

A merger of two or more corporations is the combination of all of their assets. One of the corporations, known as the surviving corporation, receives title to all the assets. The other party or parties to the merger, known as the merged corporation or corporations, is merged into the surviving corporation and ceases to exist as a separate entity. Thus, if A Corporation and B Corporation combine into the A Corporation, A is the surviving corporation and B is the merged corporation. Under the Revised Act and most statutes, the shareholders of the merged corporation may receive stock or other securities issued by the surviving corporation or other consideration including cash, as provided in the merger agreement. Moreover, the surviving corporation assumes all debts and other liabilities of the merged corporation.

A merger requires the approval of each corporation's board of directors, as well as the affirmative vote of each corporation's holders of a majority of the shares entitled to vote. Dissenting shareholders of each corporation have an appraisal remedy. Many states and the 1999 amendments to the Revised Act permit the vote of the shareholders of the surviving corporation to be eliminated when a merger increases the number of outstanding shares by no more than 20 percent.

In a short-form merger, however, a corporation that owns a statutorily specified percent of the outstanding shares of each class of a subsidiary may merge the subsidiary into itself without approval by the shareholders of either corporation. The Revised Act and most states specify 90 percent. The parent's 90 percent ownership precludes the need to seek direct approval either from the shareholders or from the subsidiary's board of directors. All that is required is a resolution by the board of directors of the parent corporation.

Whereas the dissenting shareholders of the subsidiary have the right to obtain payment from the parent for their shares, the shareholders of the parent do not have this appraisal remedy, because the transaction has not materially changed their rights. Instead of indirectly owning 90 percent of the subsidiary's assets, the parent now directly owns 100 percent of the same assets.

CONSOLIDATION

A consolidation of two or more corporations is a combination of all of their assets, the title to which is taken by a newly created corporation known as the consolidated corporation. Each constituent corporation ceases to exist, and all of its debts and liabilities are assumed by the new corporation. The shareholders of each constituent corporation receive stock or other securities, not necessarily of the same class, issued to them by the new corporation, or other consideration provided in the plan of consolidation. A consolidation requires the approval of each corporation's board of directors, as well as the affirmative vote of each corporation's holders of a majority of the shares entitled to vote. Dissenting shareholders have an appraisal remedy. The Revised Act, however, has deleted all references to consolidations, because in modern corporate practice, ensuring the survival of one corporation is almost always advantageous.

DOMESTICATION AND CONVERSION

The Revised Act was amended in 2002 to provide for domestication and conversion into other entities without a merger. The domestication procedures permit a corporation to change its state of incorporation, thus allowing a domestic business corporation to become a foreign business corporation or a foreign business corporation to become a domestic business corporation. The conversion procedures permit a domestic business corporation to become a domestic or foreign partnership, LLC, or other entity, and also permit a domestic or foreign partnership, LLC, or other entity to become a domestic business corporation. In both of these transactions a domestic business corporation must be present immediately before or after the transaction.

GOING PRIVATE TRANSACTIONS

Corporate combinations are sometimes used to take a publicly held corporation private to eliminate minority interests, to reduce the burdens of certain provisions of the federal securities laws, or both. One method of going private is for the corporation or its majority shareholder to acquire the corporation's shares through purchases on the open market or through a tender offer for the shares. Other methods include a cash-out combination (a merger or a sale of assets) with a corporation controlled by the majority shareholder. If the majority shareholder is a corporation, it may arrange a cash-out combination with itself or, if it owns enough shares, may use a short-form merger. In recent years, a new type of going private transaction—a management buyout—has become much more frequent. In this section, we will examine cash-out combinations and management buyouts.

Cash-Out Combinations Cash-out combinations are used to eliminate minority shareholders by forcing them to accept cash or property for their shares. A cash-out combination often follows the acquisition, by a person, group, or company, of a large interest in a target company (T) through a tender offer. The tender offeror (TO) then seeks to eliminate all other shareholders, thereby achieving complete control of T. To do so, TO might form a new corporation (Corporation N) and take 100 percent of its stock. TO then arranges a cash-out merger of T into N, with all the shareholders of T, other than TO, to receive cash for their shares. Because TO owns all the stock of N and a controlling interest in T, the shareholders of both companies will approve the merger. Alternatively, TO could purchase for cash or notes the assets of T, leaving the minority shareholders with only an interest in the proceeds of the sale. The use of cash-out combinations has raised questions concerning both their purpose and their fairness to minority shareholders. Some states require that cash-out combinations have a valid business purpose and that they be fair to all concerned. Fairness, in this context, includes both fair dealing (which involves the procedural aspects of the transaction) and fair price (which involves the financial considerations of the merger). Other states require only that the transaction be fair.

ALPERT V. 28 WILLIAMS ST. CORP.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS, 1984
63 N.Y.2D 557, 483 N.Y.S.2D 667, 473 N.E.2D 19

FACTS 79 Realty Corporation owned a valuable seven-story office building in Manhattan. The plaintiffs in this action held 26 percent of the outstanding shares of 79 Realty Corporation. The defendants formed a limited partnership, Madison 28 Associates, to buy the building. This limited partnership created 28 Williams Street Corporation to act as the nominal purchaser. The defendants planned to achieve the purchase by means of a “two-step” merger in which Madison Associates would buy control of the majority shares of Realty Corporation and then merge Realty Corporation with Williams Street, “freezing out” the minority shareholders of Realty Corporation through a cash buyout. All shareholders of Realty Corporation were sent a statement of intent explaining the details of the proposed merger. Soon after the merger was approved, and in accordance with the merger plan, Realty Corporation, the surviving corporation, was dissolved, and title to the building passed to Madison Associates. The plaintiffs brought an action for equitable relief in the form of rescission of the merger. The trial court found for 28 Williams Street Corporation, and the appellate court affirmed.

DECISION Judgment for 28 Williams Street Corporation affirmed.

OPINION Cooke, C. J. In New York, two or more domestic corporations are authorized to “merge into a single corporation which shall be one of the constituent corporations,” known as the “surviving corporation” [citation]. The statute does not delineate substantive justifications for mergers, but only requires compliance with certain procedures: the adoption by the boards of each corporation of a plan of merger setting forth, among other things, the terms and conditions of the merger; a statement of any changes in the certificate of incorporation of the surviving corporation; the submission of the plan to a vote of shareholders pursuant to notice to all shareholders; and adoption of the plan by a vote of two thirds of the shareholders entitled to vote on it [citation].

Generally, the remedy of a shareholder dissenting from a merger and the offered “cash-out” price is to obtain the fair value of his or her stock through an appraisal proceeding [citation]. This protects the minority shareholder from being forced to sell at unfair values imposed by those dominating the corporation while allowing the majority to proceed with its desired merger [citations]. The pursuit of an appraisal proceeding generally constitutes the dissenting stockholder’s exclusive remedy [citations]. An exception exists, however, when the merger is unlawful or fraudulent as to that shareholder, in which event an action for equitable relief is authorized [citations]. Thus, technical compliance with the Business Corporation Law’s requirements alone will not necessarily exempt a merger from further judicial review.

*** In reviewing a freeze-out merger, the essence of the judicial inquiry is to determine whether the transaction, viewed as a whole, was “fair” as to all concerned. This concept has two principal components: the majority shareholders must have followed “a course of fair dealing toward minority holders” *** and they must also have offered a fair price for the minority’s stock. ***

***

Fair dealing is also concerned with the procedural fairness of the transaction, such as its timing, initiation, structure, financing, development, disclosure to the independent directors and shareholders, and how the necessary approvals were obtained. *** Basically, the courts must look for complete and candid disclosure of all the material facts and circumstances of the proposed merger known to the majority of directors, including their dual roles and events leading up to the merger proposal. ***

In determining whether there was a fair price, the court need not ascertain the precise “fair value” of the shares as it would be determined in an appraisal proceeding. It should be noted, however, that the factors used in an appraisal proceeding are relevant here. *** This would include but would not be limited to net asset value, book value, earnings, market value, and investment value. ***

In the context of a freeze-out merger, variant treatment of the minority shareholders—i.e., causing their removal—will be justified when related to the advancement of a general corporate interest. The benefit need not be great, but it must be for the corporation. For example, if the sole purpose of the merger is reduction of the number of profit sharers—in contrast to increasing the corporation’s capital or profits, or improving its management structure—there will exist no “independent corporate interest” [citation]. All of these purposes ultimately seek to increase the individual wealth of the remaining shareholders. What distinguishes a proper corporate purpose from an improper one is that, with the former, removal of the minority shareholders furthers the objective of conferring some general gain upon the corporation. Only then will the fiduciary duty of good and prudent management of the corporation serve to override the concurrent duty to treat all shareholders fairly [citation]. ***

In sum, in entertaining an equitable action to review a freeze-out merger, a court should view the transaction as a whole to determine whether it was tainted with fraud, illegality, or self-dealing, whether the minority shareholders were dealt with fairly, and whether there exists any independent corporate purpose for the merger.

Without passing on all of the business purposes cited by [the trial court] as underlying the merger, it is sufficient to note that at least one justified the exclusion of plaintiffs' interests: attracting additional capital to effect needed repairs of the building. There is proof that there was a good-faith belief that additional, outside capital was required. Moreover, this record supports the conclusion that this capital would not have been available through the merger had not plaintiffs' interest in the corporation been eliminated. Thus, the approval of the merger, which would extinguish plaintiffs' stock, was supported by a bona fide business purpose to advance this general corporate interest of obtaining increased capital.

INTERPRETATION In a cash-out merger, the directors and majority shareholders have a fiduciary duty to treat all shareholders fairly, the merger must have an independent business purpose, and the transaction must be conducted without fraud and illegality.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION When, if ever, should cash-out mergers be permitted? Explain.

Management Buyout A management buyout is a transaction by which existing management increases its ownership of a corporation while eliminating the entity's public shareholders. The typical procedure is as follows. The management of an existing company (Corporation A) forms a new corporation (Corporation B), in which the management owns some of the stock and institutional investors own the rest. Corporation B issues bonds to institutional investors to raise cash, with which it purchases the assets or stock of Corporation A. The assets of Corporation A are used as security for the bonds issued by Corporation B. Because of the extensive use of borrowed funds, a management buyout is commonly called a leveraged buyout (LBO). The result of this transaction is two-fold: the public shareholders of Corporation A no longer have any proprietary interest in the assets of Corporation A, and management's equity interest in Corporation B is greater than its interest was in Corporation A.

A critical issue is a management buyout's fairness to the shareholders of Corporation A. The transaction inherently presents a potential conflict of interest for those in management, who owe a fiduciary duty to represent the interests of the shareholders of Corporation A. As substantial shareholders of Corporation B, however, those in management have a personal and probably adverse financial interest in the transaction.

DISSENTING SHAREHOLDERS

The shareholder's right to dissent, a statutory right to obtain payment for shares, is accorded to shareholders who object to certain fundamental changes in the corporation.

Transactions Giving Rise to Dissenters' Rights States vary considerably with respect to which transactions give rise to dissenters' rights. Some include transactions not covered by the Revised Act, and other states omit transactions included in the Revised Act.

The Revised Act grants dissenters' rights to (1) dissenting shareholders of a corporation selling or leasing all or substantially all of its property or assets not in the usual or regular course of business; (2) dissenting shareholders of each corporation that is a party to a merger, except in short-form mergers, when only the dissenting shareholders of the subsidiary have dissenters' rights; (3) any plan of compulsory share exchange in which the corporation will be the one acquired; (4) any amendment to the articles of incorporation that materially and adversely affects the dissenter's rights with respect to shares; and (5) any other corporate action taken pursuant to a shareholder vote with respect to which the articles of incorporation, the bylaws, or a resolution of the board of directors provides that shareholders shall have a right to dissent and obtain payment for their shares. The 1999 amendments to the Revised Act narrowed the scope of the appraisal remedy: in a merger, only shareholders whose shares have been exchanged have dissenters' rights and the appraisal remedy for virtually all charter amendments has been eliminated.

Many states, however, have a stock market exception to the appraisal remedy. Under these statutes, the right to dissent does not exist if an established market, such as the New York Stock Exchange, exists for the shares. The Revised Act does not contain this exception, but the 1999 amendments to the Revised Act have added it.

Procedure The corporation must notify the shareholders of the existence of dissenters' rights before taking the vote on the corporate action. A shareholder who dissents and strictly complies with the provisions of the statute is entitled to receive the fair value of his shares. However, unless he makes written demand within the prescribed time period, he is not entitled to payment for his shares.

Appraisal Remedy A dissenting shareholder who complies with all applicable requirements is entitled to an appraisal remedy, which is the corporation's payment of the fair value of the shares, plus accrued interest. The fair value is that value immediately preceding the corporate action to which the dissenter objects, excluding any appreciation or depreciation that occurs in anticipation of such corporate action, unless such exclusion would be inequitable. The next case explains how fair value is determined.

Practical Advice

If you wish to dissent and obtain your appraisal remedy, be sure to follow all of the required procedures and do so in a timely manner.

IN RE VALUATION OF COMMON STOCK OF MCLOON OIL CO.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MAINE, 1989
565 A.2D 997

FACTS McLoon, Morse Bros., and T-M Oil Companies were closely held companies entirely owned by members of the Pescosolido family, under the leadership of Carl Pescosolido, Sr. His sons, Carl, Jr. and Richard, each held shares in McLoon, Morse Bros., and T-M. Together, their shares constituted 50 percent of the McLoon and Morse Bros. common stock and 14.3 percent of the T-M common stock. In December 1975, Carl, Sr. proposed to merge all of the family-held companies into Lido Inc., over which he would exercise sole voting control. Carl, Jr. and Richard (the dissenters) objected to the proposed merger. On December 6, 1976, the parties executed a merger agreement in which the dissenters expressly preserved their statutory appraisal rights. On December 15, 1976, the dissenters individually wrote to each of the three Maine companies and requested payment for their shares. Lido responded by offering each dissenter $128,685.55 for his combined interests in all three companies. Both dissenters rejected that offer.

On April 1, 1977, the dissenters filed a suit for valuation of their stock in all three companies. Ten years later, on May 22, 1987, the court appointed a referee to determine all the issues in the case, including the stock value. The referee held eight days of hearings. The dissenters offered two expert appraisal witnesses, who testified to the value of the real estate owned by the three companies and the companies' net asset value. One of Lido's expert witnesses countered by presenting a discounted cash analysis for T-M and McLoon and a net asset valuation for Morse Bros. The other expert for Lido testified about hypothetical returns on investments in comparable business properties. In his report, the referee weighed the discounted cash analysis and the net asset analysis for T-M and McLoon—75 percent and 25 percent, respectively—and accepted fully the net asset valuation of Morse Bros. The referee held that the fair value of each dissenter's stock was his proportionate share of the full value of each company, as determined from the expert testimony. Lido objected to the report, contending that the referee should discount the full value of each company because of the minority status and lack of marketability of the dissenters' stock. The court accepted the referee's report in full, ordering Lido to pay each dissenter $334,925 with 8 percent simple interest from December 6, 1976. Lido appealed.

DECISION Judgment affirmed.

OPINION McKusick, C. J. Ten years ago in the Libby case we ruled that a stock's fair value under section 909 could appropriately be determined by weighing three factors—the stock's market price, the company's net asset value, and the company's investment value—with the weight to be accorded each factor depending on its reliability as an indicator of fair value. [Citation.] We recognized that the reliability of each factor will vary with the particular facts and circumstances of each case, so that “[t]he weighing of these interdependent elements of fair value is more akin to an artistic composition than to a scientific process. A judicial determination of fair value cannot be computed according to any precise mathematical formula.” [Citation.] However, the court should in each case consider all three elements of fair value, even if only to find one or more of them unreliable in the circumstances. [Citation.]

***

The appraisal remedy has deep roots in equity. The traditional rule through much of the 19th century was that any corporate transaction that changed the rights of common shareholders required unanimous consent. The appraisal remedy for dissenting shareholders evolved as it became clear that unanimous consent was inconsistent with the growth and development of large business enterprises. By the bargain struck in enacting an appraisal statute, the shareholder who disapproves of a proposed merger or other major corporate change gives up his right of veto in exchange for the right to be bought out—not at market value, but at “fair value.” [Citations.] Methods used in valuing stock for tax, probate, ERISA, and like purposes in which market value is of the essence are inapposite to the determination of the fair value owed to dissenting shareholders. [Citation.] (“The purpose of applying these discount variables is to determine the investment value or fair market value of a minority interest in the context of a hypothetical sale between a willing seller and buyer, a situation that does not exist in the dissenting shareholder situation.”) In the statutory appraisal proceeding, the involuntary change of ownership caused by a merger requires as a matter of fairness that a dissenting shareholder be compensated for the loss of his proportionate interest in the business as an entity. The valuation focus under the appraisal statute is not the stock as a commodity, but rather the stock only as it represents a proportionate part of the enterprise as a whole. The question for the court becomes simple and direct: What is the best price a single buyer could reasonably be expected to pay for the firm as an entirety? The court then prorates that value for the whole firm equally among all shares of its common stock. The result is that all of those shares have the same fair value.

***

In the case at bar the referee explicitly held that discounting the value of the dissenters’ stock because they chose to dissent from the merger and to exercise their appraisal rights would be inconsistent with the concept of fair value under the appraisal statute. Relying on testimony by Lido’s own expert that no market exists for the stock, the referee found that market price has no reliability in the calculus of fair value in this case and accorded no weight to any market price factor. As a matter of law, the dissenters are entitled to their proportionate share of each Maine company at its full fair value.

INTERPRETATION In determining the fair value of shares in a close corporation for the appraisal remedy, the court should prorate among the shares the highest price a single buyer would reasonably pay for the whole enterprise.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree that fair value is not the same as market value? Explain.

A shareholder who has a right to obtain payment for her shares does not have the right to attack the validity of the corporate action that gives rise to the right to obtain payment or to have the action set aside or rescinded, except when the corporate action is unlawful or fraudulent with regard to the complaining shareholders or to the corporation. When the corporate action is not unlawful or fraudulent, the appraisal remedy is usually exclusive, and the shareholder may not challenge the action. Some states, however, make the appraisal remedy exclusive in all cases; others, in contrast, make it nonexclusive in certain cases.

COHEN V. MIRAGE RESORTS, INC.

SUPREME COURT OF NEVADA, 2003
62 P.3D 720, PETITION FOR REHEARING DENIED 2003

<http://caselaw.lp.findlaw.com/scripts/getcase.pl?court=nv&vol=119NevAdvOpNo1&invol=2>

FACTS Harvey Cohen was a minority shareholder in the Boardwalk, a small, publicly held casino on Las Vegas Boulevard (The Strip). The Boardwalk had 1,200 feet of Strip frontage located between the Bellagio and the Monte Carlo, large casinos in which the Mirage Resorts had an interest. Mirage also owned twenty-three acres of land adjacent to the Boardwalk. Mirage wished to acquire the Boardwalk as well as three parcels of land surrounding the Boardwalk. The three parcels were either owned by entities connected with the Boardwalk’s majority shareholders and directors or were subject to options to purchase in favor of the Boardwalk. Mirage sought to negate the Boardwalk’s options and acquire the adjacent properties for purposes of expansion.

Mirage made an offer to acquire the Boardwalk’s shares through a merger with a Mirage subsidiary, Acquisition. Prior to or contemporaneous with the merger, Mirage acquired the surrounding parcels. On May 27, 1998, the Boardwalk convened a special shareholder meeting to consider the offer. A majority of the shareholders approved the merger, and it was consummated on June 30, 1998. Cohen and other members of the class tendered their shares without challenging the merger’s validity or claiming statutory dissenters’ rights.

On September 28, 1999, a little over a year after the consummation of the merger, Cohen filed a suit for damages, alleging breach of fiduciary duty and/or loyalty by the Boardwalk's majority shareholders, board of directors, and financial advisors. Cohen asserts Mirage conspired with the Boardwalk's majority shareholders and directors to purchase the Boardwalk at an artificially low price by offering special transactions to majority shareholders and/or members of the Boardwalk's board of directors. Cohen claims that Mirage bought land or rights owned or controlled by majority shareholders or directors in properties around or involving the Boardwalk at inflated prices. Cohen contends that these shareholders and directors then agreed to approve or recommend the merger for an amount per share that was less than the fair value of the Boardwalk's stock. Finally, Cohen asserts that the directors mismanaged the Boardwalk, causing decreased profits, and that they or majority shareholders usurped corporate opportunities.

The district court dismissed the case, finding that all of Cohen's claims were derivative in nature and that Cohen and other ex-shareholders lacked standing to assert the claims. Cohen then appealed.

DECISION The order is affirmed as to the derivative causes of action; it is reversed as to the allegations of misconduct affecting the validity of the merger.

OPINION Becker, J. This case involves the rights of dissenting shareholders to challenge the validity of corporate mergers, issues of first impression in the State of Nevada. Under Nevada law, a corporate merger must be approved by a majority of the corporation's shareholders. The existing shareholders then substitute their stock ownership in the old corporation for stock ownership in the new merged corporation. [Citation.] Shareholders who oppose the merger are not forced to become stockholders in the new corporation. Instead, the statutes give such shareholders three choices: (1) accept the terms of the merger and exchange their existing shares for new shares; (2) dissent from the merger, compelling the merged corporation to purchase their shares pursuant to a judicial appraisal proceeding; and/or (3) challenge the validity of the merger based on unlawful or wrongful conduct committed during the merger process. [Citation.] ***

***

*** [T]he states and the Model Act *** recognize two circumstances when minority shareholders should be able to challenge the merger process. [Citation.] A merger may be challenged if it is unlawful, that is, procedurally deficient. For example, it may have been approved in a manner inconsistent with the articles of incorporation or there may have been irregularities in the voting process. [Citation.] In addition, minority shareholders may seek to stop a merger if fraud or material misrepresentation affected the shareholder vote on the merger; that is, the shareholders approved the merger based upon materially incorrect information. [Citation.] Under either theory, minority shareholders may bring suit to enjoin or rescind the merger or to recover monetary damages attributable to the loss of their shareholder interest caused by an invalid merger. They may also allege that the merger was accomplished through the wrongful conduct of majority shareholders, directors, or officers of the corporation and attempt to hold those individuals liable for monetary damages under theories of breach of fiduciary duty or loyalty. [Citation.]

Challenges to the validity of a merger based on fraud usually encompass either or both of the following: (1) lack of fair dealing or (2) lack of fair price. [Citation.] Both involve corporate directors' general duties to make independent, fully informed decisions when recommending a merger and to fully disclose material information to the shareholders before a vote is taken on a proposed merger. [Citation.] ***

Lack of fair dealing involves allegations that the board of directors did not make an independent, informed decision to recommend approval of the merger, [citation] or that the majority shareholders approved the merger at the expense of the minority shareholders. [Citation.] ***

Lack of fair price may involve similar allegations plus claims that the price per share was deliberately undervalued, but it can also include negligent conduct. [Citation.] For example, the directors may have hired incompetent or inexperienced persons to determine if the merger price was fair or to evaluate the fair value of the corporation's stock. [Citation.]

***

Shareholders who vote in favor of the merger generally have no standing to contest the validity of the merger. [Citations.] *** Misinformed shareholders [, however,] retain their right to challenge the merger regardless of their vote on the merger and a tender of their shares. [Citation.]

***

Former shareholders, however, cannot simply seek more money for their stock. They must assert and prove in an equitable action that the merger was improper. [Citation.] If this is proven, then they are entitled to any monetary damages they are able to prove were proximately caused by the improper merger. [Citation.] Moreover, damages are not limited to the surviving corporation. They may also be levied against the individuals whose wrongful conduct led to the approval of the merger or the unfair stock evaluation. [Citation.]

***

A claim brought by a dissenting shareholder that questions the validity of a merger as a result of wrongful conduct on the part of majority shareholders or directors is properly classified as an individual or direct claim. The shareholder has lost unique personal property—his or her interest in a specific corporation. [Citations.] Therefore, if the complaint alleges damages resulting from an improper merger, it should not be dismissed as a derivative claim.

[Citations.] On the other hand, if it seeks damages for wrongful conduct that caused harm to the corporation, it is derivative and should be dismissed. [Citation.] ***

We further conclude that the district court was correct in dismissing all of the derivative claims in the complaint, but erred in not permitting Cohen to amend the complaint to clarify that he was seeking rescission of the merger and/or monetary damages based upon the invalidity of the merger.

INTERPRETATION A shareholder who has a right to obtain payment for her shares does not have the right to attack the validity of the corporate action that gives rise to the right to obtain payment or to have the action set aside or rescinded, except when the corporate action is unlawful or fraudulent with regard to the complaining shareholders or to the corporation.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the defendants act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the court's decision? Explain.

Dissolution

Although a corporation may have perpetual existence, its life may be terminated in a number of ways. Incorporation statutes usually provide for both voluntary and involuntary dissolution. Dissolution itself does not terminate the corporation's existence but does require that the corporation wind up its affairs and liquidate its assets.

VOLUNTARY DISSOLUTION

A board of directors may effect a voluntary dissolution by a resolution approved by the affirmative vote of the holders of a majority of the corporation's shares entitled to vote at a shareholders' meeting duly called for this purpose. Although shareholders who object to dissolution usually have no right to dissent and recover the fair value of their shares, the Revised Act grants dissenters' rights in connection with a sale or exchange of all or substantially all of a corporation's assets not made in the usual or regular course of business, including a sale in dissolution. However, the act excludes such rights in sales by court order and in sales for cash on terms requiring that all or substantially all of the net proceeds be distributed to the shareholders within one year. In addition, in many states, but not the Revised Act, dissolution without action by the directors may be affected by unanimous consent of the shareholders.

The Revised Act authorizes shareholders in closely held corporations to adopt unanimous shareholders' agreements requiring dissolution of the corporation at the request of one or more shareholders or upon the occurrence of a specified event or contingency.

The Statutory Close Corporation Supplement gives shareholders who elect such a right in the articles of incorporation the power to dissolve the corporation. Unless the charter specifies otherwise, an amendment to include, modify, or delete a power to dissolve must be approved by all of the shareholders. The power to dissolve may be conferred upon any shareholder or holders of a specified number or percentage of shares of any class and may be exercised at will or upon the occurrence of a specified event or contingency.

Practical Advice

To achieve increased protection, when organizing a close corporation you should consider including in the charter a provision giving each shareholder the power to dissolve the corporation.

INVOLUNTARY DISSOLUTION

A corporation may be involuntarily dissolved by administrative dissolution or by judicial dissolution.

Administrative Dissolution The secretary of state may commence an administrative proceeding to dissolve a corporation if (1) the corporation does not pay within sixty days after they are due any franchise taxes or penalties; (2) the corporation does not deliver its annual report to the secretary of state within sixty days after it is due; (3) the corporation is without a registered agent or registered office in the state for sixty days or more; (4) the corporation does not notify the secretary of state within sixty days that it has changed its registered agent or registered office, that its registered agent has resigned, or that it has discontinued its registered office; or (5) the corporation's period of duration stated in its articles of incorporation expires.

Judicial Dissolution The state, a shareholder, or a creditor may bring a proceeding seeking judicial dissolution. A court may dissolve a corporation in a proceeding brought by the attorney general if it is proved that the corporation obtained its charter through fraud or has continued to exceed or abuse the authority conferred upon it by law.

A court may dissolve a corporation in a proceeding brought by a shareholder if it is established that (1) the directors are deadlocked in the management of the corporate affairs, the shareholders are unable to break the deadlock, and the corporation is threatened with or is suffering irreparable injury; (2) the acts of the directors or those in control of the corporation are illegal, oppressive, or fraudulent; (3) the corporate assets are being misapplied or wasted; or (4) the shareholders are deadlocked and have failed to elect directors for at least two consecutive annual meetings. The Revised Act as amended provides a closely held corporation or the remaining shareholders a limited right to purchase at fair value the shares of a shareholder who has brought a proceeding for involuntary dissolution.

A creditor may bring a court action to dissolve a corporation on showing that the corporation has become unable to pay its debts and obligations as they mature in the regular course of its business and that either (1) the creditor has reduced his claim to a judgment and an execution issued on it has been returned unsatisfied or (2) the corporation has admitted in writing that the claim of the creditor is due and owing.

LIQUIDATION

As we mentioned earlier, dissolution requires that the corporation devote itself to winding up its affairs and liquidating its assets. After dissolution, the corporation must cease carrying on its business except as is necessary to wind up. When a corporation is dissolved, its assets are liquidated and used first to pay the expenses of liquidation and its creditors according to their respective contract or lien rights. Any remainder is proportionately distributed to shareholders according to their respective contract rights; stock with a liquidation preference has priority over common stock. The board of directors, who serve as trustees, carries out voluntary liquidation; a court-appointed receiver may conduct involuntary liquidation.

Ethical Dilemma

What Rights Do Minority Shareholders Have?

FACTS Frank, James, and Thomas were fraternity brothers who graduated from college in the same year. Shortly after graduation they began a private security company incorporated as Secure, Inc. The company specialized in providing systems and personnel to improve retail loss prevention efforts. The company also offered electronic theft detection systems for both homes and businesses.

When the company was formed, Frank put up the majority of the capital and became a 60 percent shareholder. James and Thomas had gone through college on scholarships and had little capital to invest. They received minority interests of 20 percent each.

The business became successful. Frank was excellent at customer and personnel relations, accounting, and routine business management. James and Thomas, however, were the real brains behind the business. They developed innovative techniques and systems that were highly attractive to customers. Their innovations attracted attention in the business community, and the company was the focus of a feature article in a major newspaper.

Safety First, Inc. has made an offer that would merge Secure, Inc., into Safety First, Inc. Frank wants to accept the merger proposal, but James and Thomas are adamantly opposed. They believe that in the long run they will make considerably more money if they operate the business independently for at least five to ten more years before considering selling out. The initial intention of Secure, Inc. was to enable the three shareholders to operate an independent business. James and Thomas do not want their technology and systems sold to another company.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. What moral or fiduciary obligation does Frank have to James and Thomas? What obligations do James and Thomas have to Frank?
2. To what extent should initial expectations as to business goals and operations continue to bind business associates morally? To what extent should associates spell out their expectations in advance?
3. What types of legal remedies, if any, are necessary when business associates no longer agree on fundamental business plans? To what extent should the law intervene in private management disputes among members of closely held businesses?
4. If Frank pays James and Thomas the fair value of their shares and proceeds with a merger, will this provide sufficient compensation to James and Thomas? Who owns the technological advances?

PROTECTION OF CREDITORS

The statutory provisions governing dissolution and liquidation usually prescribe procedures to safeguard the interests of the corporation's creditors. Such procedures typically include the required mailing of notice to known creditors, a general publication of notice, and the preservation of claims against the corporation.

Chapter Summary

- Appraisal Remedy the right of a dissenter to receive the fair value of his shares (the value of shares immediately before the corporate action to which the dissenter objects takes place, excluding any appreciation or depreciation in anticipation of such corporate action unless such exclusion would be inequitable)

Dissolution

Voluntary Dissolution may be brought about by a resolution of the board of directors that is approved by the shareholders

Involuntary Dissolution may occur by administrative or judicial action taken (1) by the attorney general, (2) by shareholders under certain circumstances, and (3) by a creditor on a showing that the corporation has become unable to pay its debts and obligations as they mature in the regular course of its business

Questions

1. The stock in Hotel Management, Inc., a hotel management corporation, was divided equally between two families. For several years the two families had been unable to agree on or cooperate in the management of the corporation. As a result, no meeting of shareholders or directors had been held for five years. There had been no withdrawal of profits for

- five years, and last year the hotel operated at a loss. Although the corporation was not insolvent, such a state was imminent because the business was poorly managed and its properties were in need of repair. As a result, the owners of half the stock brought an action in equity for dissolution of the corporation. Will they succeed? Explain.
    - a. When may a corporation sell, lease, exchange, mortgage, or pledge all or substantially all of its assets in the usual and regular course of its business?
    - b. When may a corporation sell, lease, exchange, mortgage, or pledge all or substantially all of its assets other than in the usual and regular course of its business?
    - c. What are the rights of a shareholder who dissents from a proposed sale or exchange of all or substantially all of the assets of a corporation other than in the usual and regular course of its business?
  3. Cutler Company was duly merged into Stone Company. Yetta, a shareholder of the former Cutler Company, having paid only one-half of her subscription, is now sued by Stone Company for the balance of the subscription. Yetta, who took no part in the merger proceedings, denies liability on the ground that, inasmuch as Cutler Company no longer exists, all her rights and obligations in connection with Cutler Company have been terminated. Explain whether she is correct.
  4. Smith, while in the course of his employment with the Bee Corporation, negligently ran the company's truck into Williams, injuring him severely. Subsequently, the Bee Corporation and the Sea Corporation consolidated, forming the SeaBee Corporation. Williams filed suit against the SeaBee Corporation for damages, and the SeaBee Corporation argued the defense that the injuries Williams sustained were not caused by any of SeaBee's employees, that SeaBee was not even in existence at the time of the injury, and that the SeaBee Corporation was therefore not liable. What decision?
  5. Johnson Company, a corporation organized under the laws of State X, after proper authorization by the shareholders, sold its entire assets to Samson Company, also a State X corporation. Ellen, an unpaid creditor of Johnson Company, sues Samson Company on her claim. Is Sampson liable? Explain.
  6. Zenith Steel Company operates a prosperous business. The board of directors voted to spend $20 million of the company's surplus funds to purchase a majority of the stock of two other companies—Green Insurance Company and Blue Trust Company. Green Insurance Company is a thriving business whose stock is an excellent investment at the price at which it will be sold to Zenith Steel Company. The principal reasons for Zenith's purchase of Green Insurance stock are to invest surplus funds and to diversify its business. Blue Trust Company owns a controlling interest in Zenith Steel Company. The Blue Trust Company is subject to special governmental controls. The main purpose for Zenith's purchase of Blue Trust Company stock is to enable the present management and directors of Zenith Steel Company to continue their management of the company. Jones, a minority shareholder in Zenith Steel Company, brings an appropriate action to enjoin the purchase by Zenith Steel Company of the stock of either Green Insurance Company or of Blue Trust Company. What is the decision as to each purchase?
  7. Mildred, Deborah, and Bob each own one-third of the stock of Nova Corporation. On Friday, Mildred received an offer to merge Nova into Buyer Corporation. Mildred, who agreed to call a shareholders' meeting to discuss the offer on the following Tuesday, telephoned Deborah and Bob and informed them of the offer and the scheduled meeting. Deborah agreed to attend. Bob was unable to attend because he was leaving on a trip on Saturday and asked if the three of them could meet Friday night to discuss the offer. Mildred and Deborah agreed. The three shareholders met informally Friday night and agreed to accept the offer only if they received preferred stock of Buyer Corporation for their shares. Bob then left on his trip. On Tuesday, at the time and place appointed by Mildred, Mildred and Deborah convened the shareholders' meeting. After discussion, they concluded that the preferred stock payment limitation was unwise and passed a formal resolution to accept Buyer Corporation's offer without any such condition. Bob files suit to enjoin Mildred, Deborah, and the Nova Corporation from implementing this resolution. Explain whether the injunction should be issued.

Case Problems

8. Tretter alleged that his exposure over the years to asbestos products manufactured by Philip Carey Manufacturing Corporation caused him to contract asbestosis. Tretter brought an action against Rapid American Corporation, which was the surviving corporation of a merger between Philip Carey and Rapid American. Rapid American denied liability, claiming that immediately after the merger it had transferred its asbestos operations to a newly formed subsidiary corporation. Can Rapid avoid liability by such transfer? Explain.
9. Wilcox, CEO and chairman of the board of directors, owned 60 percent of the shares of Sterling Corporation. When the market price of Sterling's shares was $22 per share, Wilcox sold all of his shares in Sterling to Conrad for $29 per share. The minority shareholders of Sterling brought suit against Wilcox to demand a portion of the amount Wilcox received in excess of the market price. What is the result?

- 10. All Steel Pipe and Tube is a closely held corporation engaged in the business of selling steel pipes and tubes. Leo and Scott Callier are its two equal shareholders. Scott is Leo's uncle. Leo is one of the company's two directors and is president of the corporation. Scott is the general manager. Scott's father and Leo's grandfather, Felix, is the other director. Over the years, Scott and Leo have had differences of opinion about various aspects of the operation of the business. However, despite the deterioration of their relationship, the company has flourished. When negotiations aimed at the redemption of Scott's shares by Leo began, the parties could not reach an agreement. The discussion then turned to voluntary dissolution and liquidation of the corporation, but still no agreement could be reached. Finally, Leo fired Scott and began to wind down All Steel's business and to form a new corporation, Callier Steel Pipe and Tube. Leo then brought an action seeking a dissolution and liquidation of All Steel. Should the court order dissolution? Explain.
- 11. The shareholders of Endicott Johnson who had dissented from a proposed merger of Endicott with McDonough Corporation brought a proceeding to fix the fair value of their stock. At issue was the proper weight to be given the market price of the stock in fixing its fair value. The shareholders argued that the market value should not be considered because McDonough controlled 70 percent of Endicott's stock and the stock had been delisted from the New York Stock Exchange. Are the shareholders correct?
- 12. In early 1984, Royal Dutch Petroleum Company (Royal Dutch), through various subsidiaries, controlled approximately 70 percent of the outstanding common shares of Shell Oil Co. (Shell). On January 24, 1984, Royal Dutch announced its intention to merge Shell into SPNV Holdings, Inc. (Holdings), which is now Shell Petroleum, Inc., by offering the minority shareholders $55 per share. Shell's board of directors, however, rejected the offer as inadequate. Royal Dutch then withdrew the merger proposal and initiated a tender offer at $58 per share. As a result of the tender offer, Holdings' ownership interest increased to 94.6 percent of Shell's outstanding stock. Holdings then initiated a short-form merger. Under the terms of the merger, Shell's minority stockholders were to receive $58 per share. However, if before July 1, 1985, a shareholder waived his right to seek an appraisal, he would receive an extra $2 per share. In conjunction with the short-form merger, Holdings distributed several documents to the minority, including a document entitled "Certain Information About Shell" (CIAS).

The CIAS included a table of discounted future net cash flows (DCF) for Shell's oil and gas reserves. However, due to a computer programming error, the DCF failed to account for the cash flows from approximately 295 million barrel equivalents of U.S. proved oil and gas reserves. Shell's failure to include the reserves in its calculations resulted in an understatement of its DCF of approximately $993 million to $1.1 billion or $3.00 to $3.45 per share. Moreover, as a result of the error, Shell stated in the CIAS that there had been a slight decline in the value of its oil and gas reserves from 1984 to 1985. When properly calculated, the value of the reserves had actually increased over that time period.

Shell's minority shareholders sued in the Court of Chancery, asserting that the error in the DCF along with other alleged disclosure violations constituted a breach of Holdings' fiduciary "duty of candor." Was the error in the DCF material and misleading?

SECURED TRANSACTIONS AND SURETYSHIP

Neither a borrower nor a lender be: For loan oft loses both itself and friend, And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE, HAMLET

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Name and define the various types of collateral.
2. Explain the purposes, methods, and requirements of attachment and perfection.
3. Discuss the priorities among the various parties who may have competing interests in collateral and the rights and remedies of the parties to a security agreement after default by the debtor.
4. Explain the requirements for the formation of a suretyship relationship.
5. Explain the rights of a creditor against a surety and the rights of a surety, including those of a cosurety.

Shakespeare's well-known lines in Hamlet reflect an earlier view of debt, for today borrowed funds are both essential and honorable under our economic system. In fact, the absence of loans would severely restrict the availability of goods and services and would greatly limit the quantities consumers would be able to purchase.

The public policy and social issues created by today's enormous use of debt center on certain tenets, among which are the following:

1. The means by which debt is created and transferred should be as simple and as inexpensive as possible.
2. The risks to lenders should be minimized.
3. Lenders should have a way to collect unpaid debts.

A lender typically incurs two basic collection risks: the borrower could be unwilling to repay the loan even though he is able to, or the borrower could prove to be unable to repay the loan. In addition to the remedies dealing with the first of these risks, the law has developed several devices to maximize the likelihood of repayment. These devices, which we will discuss in this chapter, include consensual security interests (also called secured transactions) and suretyships.

In addition, debtors of all sorts—wage earners, sole proprietorships, partnerships, and corporations—sometimes accumulate debts far in excess of their assets or suffer financial reverses that make it impossible for them to meet their obligations. In such an event, it is an important policy of the law to treat all creditors fairly and equitably and to provide the debtor with relief from these debts so that he may continue to contribute to society. These are the two basic purposes of the federal bankruptcy law, which we will briefly discuss in this chapter and more fully in Chapter 39.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS IN PERSONAL PROPERTY

An obligation or debt can exist without security if the creditor deems adequate the integrity, reputation, and net worth of the debtor. Often, however, businesses or individuals cannot obtain credit without giving adequate security, or, in some cases, even if the borrower can obtain an unsecured loan, he can negotiate more favorable terms by giving security.

Transactions involving security in personal property are governed by Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). This chapter will cover revised Article 9, which is effective in all the states. The article provides a simple and unified structure within which a tremendous variety of secured financing transactions can take place with less cost and with greater certainty than was possible before the article's enactment. Moreover, the article's flexibility and simplified formalities allow new forms of secured financing to fit comfortably under its provisions. In addition, the new article recognizes and provides coverage for electronic commerce.

Essentials of Secured Transactions

Article 9 governs a secured transaction in personal property in which the debtor consents to provide a security interest in personal property to secure the payment of a debt. A security interest in property cannot exist apart from the debt it secures, and discharging the debt in any manner terminates the security interest in the property. Article 9 also applies to the sales of certain types of collateral (accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, and promissory notes). Article 9 does not apply to nonconsensual security interests that arise by operation of law, such as mechanics' or landlords' liens, although it does cover non-possessory statutory agricultural liens.

A common type of consensual secured transaction covered by Article 9 occurs when a person wanting to buy goods has neither the cash nor a sufficient credit standing to obtain the goods on open credit, and the seller, to secure payment of all or part of the price, obtains a security interest in the goods. Alternatively, the buyer may borrow the purchase price from a third party and pay the seller in cash. The third-party lender may then take a security interest in the goods to secure repayment of the loan.

Every consensual secured transaction involves a debtor, a secured party, collateral, a security agreement, and a security interest. Some Article 9 definitions follow:

- A security interest is “an interest in personal property or fixtures which secures payment or performance of an obligation.”
- A security agreement is an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest.
- Collateral is the property subject to a security interest or agricultural lien.
- A secured party is the person in whose favor a security interest in the collateral is created or provided for under a security agreement. The definition of a secured party includes lenders, credit sellers, consignors, purchasers of certain types of collateral (accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes), and other specified persons.
- A debtor is a person (1) having an interest in the collateral other than a security interest or lien, whether or not the person is an obligor; (2) a seller of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes; or (3) a consignee.
- An obligor is a person who, with respect to an obligation secured by a security interest in or an agricultural lien on the collateral, owes payment or other performance, has provided property other than the collateral to secure payment or performance, or is otherwise accountable for payment or performance.
- A secondary obligor is usually a guarantor or surety of the debt.
- A purchase money security interest (PMSI) is created in goods when a seller retains a security interest in the goods sold on credit by a security agreement. Similarly, a third-party lender who advances funds to enable the debtor to purchase goods has a PMSI in goods if she has a security agreement and the debtor in fact uses the funds to purchase the goods.

In most secured transactions, the debtor is an obligor with respect to the obligation secured by the security interest. Thus, a security interest is created when an automobile dealer sells and delivers a car to an individual (the debtor) under a retail installment contract (a security agreement) that provides that the dealer (the secured party) obtains a security interest (a PMSI) in the car (the collateral) until the price is paid. See Figure 38-1 for the fundamental rights of the secured party and the debtor.

Classification of Collateral

Although most of the provisions of Article 9 apply to all kinds of personal property, some provisions state special rules that apply only to particular kinds of collateral. Under the Code, collateral is classified according to its nature and its use. The classifications according to nature are (1) goods, (2) indispensable paper, and (3) intangibles.

Rights of Secured Party and Debtor*

GOODS

Goods are all things that are movable when a security interest attaches and include fixtures; standing timber to be cut; the unborn young of animals; crops grown, growing, or to be grown; and manufactured homes. The new Act also includes computer programs embedded in goods if the software becomes part of the goods. (When software maintains its separate state it is considered a general intangible.) Goods are further classified according to their use. Goods are subdivided into (1) consumer goods, (2) farm products, (3) inventory, (4) equipment, (5) fixtures, and (6) accessions. Depending on its primary use or purpose, the same item of goods may fall into different classifications. For example, a refrigerator purchased by a physician to store medicines in his office is classified as equipment but the same refrigerator would be classified as consumer goods if the physician purchased it for home use. In the hands of a refrigerator dealer or manufacturer, the refrigerator would be classified as inventory. If goods are used for multiple purposes, such as by a physician in both his office and his home, their classification is dependent upon their predominant use.

Consumer Goods Goods used or bought for use primarily for personal, family, or household purposes are consumer goods.

Farm Products The Code defines farm products as “goods, other than standing timber, which are part of a farming operation and which are crops grown, growing[,] or to be grown, including crops produced on trees, vines, and bushes and aquatic goods.” In addition, farm products also include livestock, born or unborn, including aquatic goods such as fish raised on a fish farm as well as supplies used or produced in a farming operation. Thus, farm products would include wheat growing on the farmer’s land; the farmer’s pigs, cows, and hens; and the hens’ eggs. When such products become the possessions of a person not engaged in farming operations, they cease to be farm products.

Inventory The term inventory includes nonfarm product goods (1) held for sale, held for lease, or to be furnished under a service contract; or (2) that consist of raw materials, work in process, or materials used or consumed in a business. Thus, a retailer’s or a wholesaler’s merchandise, as well as a manufacturer’s raw materials, are inventory.

Equipment Goods not included in the definition of inventory, farm products, or consumer goods are classified as equipment. This category is broad enough to include a lawyer’s library, a physician’s office furniture, or a factory’s machinery.

Fixtures Goods and personal property that have become so related to particular real property that an interest in them arises under real estate law are called fixtures. Thus, state law other than the Code determines whether and when goods become fixtures. In general terms, fixtures are goods so firmly affixed to real estate that they are considered part of such real estate. Examples are furnaces, central air-conditioning units, and plumbing fixtures. See Chapter 48 for a further discussion of fixtures. A security interest in fixtures may arise under Article 9, and, under certain circumstances, a perfected security interest in fixtures will have priority over a conflicting security interest or mortgage in the real property to which the goods are attached.

Accession Goods installed in or firmly affixed to personal property are accessions if the identity of the original goods is not lost. Thus, a new engine placed in an old car automobile is an accession.

INDISPENSABLE PAPER

Four kinds of collateral involve rights evidenced by indispensable paper: (1) chattel paper, (2) instruments, (3) documents, and (4) investment property.

Chattel Paper Chattel paper is a record or records that evidence both a monetary obligation and a security interest in or a lease of specific goods. A record is information inscribed on a tangible medium (written on paper) or stored in an electronic or other medium and is retrievable in perceivable form (electronically stored). Thus, chattel paper can be either tangible chattel paper or electronic chattel paper.

For example, Dealer sells goods on credit to Buyer, who uses the goods as equipment. Dealer retains a PMSI in the goods. Dealer then borrows against (or sells) the security agreement of Buyer along with Dealer's security interest in the collateral. The collateral provided by Dealer to his lender in this type of transaction (consisting of the security agreement and the security interest) is chattel paper.

Instruments The definition of an instrument includes negotiable instruments (drafts, checks, promissory notes, and certificate of deposits) as well as any other writing that evidences a right to payment of money that is transferable by delivery with any necessary indorsement or assignment and that is not of itself a security agreement or lease. Negotiable instruments are covered in Chapters 24 through 28. An instrument does not include an investment property, a letter of credit, or writings evidencing a right to payment from a credit or charge card.

Documents The term document includes documents of title, such as bills of lading and warehouse receipts, which may be either negotiable or nonnegotiable. A document of title is negotiable if by its terms the goods it covers are deliverable to the bearer or to the order of a named person. Any other document is nonnegotiable. Documents of title are covered in Chapter 48.

Investment Property The term investment property means an investment security, such as stocks and bonds, as well as securities accounts, commodity contracts, and commodity accounts. A certificated security is an investment security that is represented by a certificate. An uncertificated security is not represented by a certificate. A security entitlement refers to the rights and property interest of a person who holds securities or other financial assets through a securities intermediary such as a bank, broker, or clearinghouse, which in the ordinary course of business maintains security accounts for others. A security entitlement thus includes both the rights against the securities intermediary and an interest in the property held by the securities intermediary.

INTANGIBLES

The Code also recognizes two kinds of collateral that are neither goods nor indispensable paper, namely, accounts and general intangibles. These types of intangible collateral are not evidenced by any indispensable paper, such as a stock certificate or a negotiable bill of lading.

Accounts The term account includes the right to monetary payment, whether or not such right has been earned by performance, for (1) goods sold, leased, licensed, or otherwise disposed of; or (2) services rendered. Accounts include credit card receivables and health-care-insurance receivables. An example of an account is a business's accounts receivable.

General Intangibles The term general intangibles applies to any personal property other than goods, accounts, chattel paper, commercial tort claims, deposit accounts, documents, instruments, investment property, letter-of-credit rights, money, and oil, gas, and other minerals before extraction. Included in the definition are software, goodwill, literary rights, and interests in patents, trademarks, and copyrights to the extent they are not regulated by federal statute. Also included is a payment intangible, which is a general intangible under which the account debtor's principal obligation is the payment of money.

OTHER KINDS OF COLLATERAL

Proceeds include whatever is received upon the sale, lease, license exchange, or other disposition of collateral; whatever is collected on, or distributed on account of, collateral; or other rights arising out of collateral. For example, an automobile dealer grants a security interest in its inventory to the automobile manufacturer that sold the inventory. When the dealer sells a car to Henry and receives from Henry a used car and the remainder of the purchase price in a monetary payment, the used car and the money are both proceeds from the sale of the new car. Unless otherwise agreed, a security agreement gives the secured party (the manufacturer in this example) the rights to proceeds.

Additional types of collateral include timber to be cut, minerals, motor vehicles, mobile goods (goods used in more than one jurisdiction), and money. Revised Article 9 also adds the following kinds of collateral: commercial tort claim, letter-of-credit rights, and deposit accounts (a demand, savings, time, or similar account maintained with a bank). In consumer transactions, however, deposit accounts may not be taken as original collateral.

Attachment

Attachment is the Code's term to describe the creation of a security interest that is enforceable against the debtor. Attachment is also a prerequisite to rendering a security interest enforceable against third parties, though in some instances attachment in itself is sufficient to create such enforceability. Perfection, which provides the greatest enforceability against third parties who assert competing interests in the collateral, is discussed below.

Until a security interest “attaches,” it is ineffective against the debtor. Under the Code, the security interest created by a security agreement attaches to the described collateral once the following events have occurred:

1. the secured party has given value;
2. the debtor has acquired rights in the collateral or has the power to transfer such rights to a secured party; and
3. the debtor and secured party have an agreement, which in most instances must be authenticated by the debtor although in some cases alternative evidence, such as possession by the secured party pursuant to agreement, will suffice.

The parties may, however, by explicit agreement postpone the time of attachment.

VALUE

The term value is broadly defined and includes consideration under contract law, a binding commitment to extend credit, and an antecedent debt. For example, Buyer purchases equipment from Seller on credit. When Buyer fails to make timely payment, Seller and Buyer enter into a security agreement that grants Seller a security interest in the equipment. By entering the agreement, Seller has given value, even though he relies upon an antecedent debt—the original transfer of goods to Buyer—instead of providing new consideration. Moreover, Seller is not limited to acquiring a security interest in the equipment he sold to Buyer but also may obtain a security interest in other personal property of Buyer.

DEBTOR’S RIGHTS IN COLLATERAL

The elusive concept of the debtor’s rights in collateral is not specifically defined by the Code. As a general rule, the debtor is deemed to have rights in collateral that he owns or is in possession of as well as in those items that he is in the process of acquiring from the seller. For example, if Adrien borrows money from Richard and grants him a security interest in corporate stock that she owns, then Adrien had rights in the collateral before entering into the secured transaction. Likewise, if Sally sells goods to Benjamin on credit and he provides Sally a security interest in the goods, Benjamin will acquire rights in the collateral upon identification of the goods to the contract. In addition, the Revised Code added the words “or the power to transfer rights in the collateral to a secured party.” The comments to this section state, “[h]owever, in accordance with basic personal property conveyancing principles, the baseline rule is that a security interest attaches only to whatever rights a debtor may have, broad or limited as those rights may be.”

BORDER STATE BANK OF GREENBUSH V. BAGLEY LIVESTOCK EXCHANGE, INC.

COURT OF APPEALS OF MINNESOTA, 2004
690 N.W.2D 326

<http://caselaw.lp.findlaw.com/scripts/getcase.pl?court=mn&vol=apppub\0412\opa031973-1214&invol=1>

FACTS In December 1997, Bert Johnson, doing business as Johnson Farms, and Hal Anderson entered into an oral cattle-sharing contract. Approximately one month later, they put their oral contract into written form. Under the written agreement, Anderson agreed to care for and breed cattle owned by Johnson and in return Johnson would receive a “guaranteed” percentage of the annual calf crop. The contract further provided that the cattle Johnson placed with Anderson were “considered to be owned by Johnson Farms and any offspring is to be sold under Johnson Farms’ name.” The contract required Johnson Farms and Anderson mutually to agree when the calves would be sold and within thirty days of receiving money for the sale, Johnson Farms was to pay the “remainder” to Anderson “for his keeping of [the] cattle.” In the fall of 1998 and 1999, calves bred under the contract were sold under the provisions of the written contract. Anderson testified that, in October 1999, Johnson asked him to care for additional cattle on the same terms. Anderson initially declined, although he claims they eventually agreed to continue based on certain modifications: (1) the share percentage would be a straight 40/60 split, without Johnson’s “guaranteed” percentage; (2) Johnson would provide feed, including beet tailings; (3) Johnson would provide additional pasture; and (4) the agreement would include approximately five hundred cattle, instead of the original 151 cattle. Johnson testified that he discussed the cattle-sharing agreement with Anderson in October 1999 and that he agreed to send Anderson beet tailings, which were free to him, so long as Anderson paid the cost of shipping. Johnson also testified that he and Anderson agreed that approximately five hundred cattle would be cared for under the cattle-sharing agreement, rather than the original 151 cattle. But Johnson denied that he had agreed to provide feed, other than the beet tailings, and denied that he had agreed to change the provision that “guaranteed” that his percentage of the calf crop would be calculated on the initial number of cows regardless of whether each produced a calf that survived.

In March 2000, Anderson negotiated with Border State Bank for loans totaling $155,528. To secure these loans, Anderson granted Border State Bank a security interest in, among other things, all of Anderson’s “rights, title and interest” in all “livestock” then owned or thereafter acquired. In November 2000, Anderson encountered difficulty caring for the cattle due to heavy rainfall and lack of feed. The cattle were reclaimed by Johnson, but the calves remained with Anderson for sale. At trial, Anderson testified that some of the cattle that Johnson reclaimed were actually Anderson’s cattle or were cattle that belonged to Evonne Stephens, another person with whom Anderson had a cattle-sharing contract.

In December 2000, 289 calves that had remained with Anderson were sold at Bagley Livestock Exchange. The livestock exchange knew of Border State’s security interest in Anderson’s livestock but, after discussing the agreement with Johnson, determined the security interest did not attach to the calves. The livestock exchange issued a check to Johnson Farms in the amount of $119,403. Thereafter, Johnson gave Anderson a check for $19,404, representing Anderson’s share of the sale proceeds, less $55,000 that Johnson claimed as repayment for money advanced to Anderson to purchase feed. Border State Bank sued Bagley Livestock Exchange and Johnson, contending that they had converted Border State Bank’s perfected security interest in the calves sold in December 2000. In addition, Anderson filed a claim against Johnson, asserting breach of contract. The district court granted Johnson’s and Bagley’s motion for directed verdict, finding that, under the cattle-sharing agreement, Johnson did not “grant” Anderson an “ownership interest” in the calves. Border State Bank appealed.

DECISION Reversed and remanded.

OPINION Lansing, J. Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code, incorporated into Minnesota law, provides that a security interest attaches to collateral, and is enforceable against the debtor or third parties, when (1) value has been given; (2) the debtor “has rights in the collateral or the power to transfer rights”; and (3) the debtor has signed a security agreement that contains a description of the collateral. [UCC] 9-203(b). To perfect the security interest, both the security agreement and financing statement must contain an adequate description of the collateral. [Citation.] We liberally construe descriptions in the security agreement and financing statement because their essential purpose is to provide notice, not to definitively describe each item of collateral. [Citation.]

The parties do not dispute that Anderson signed a security agreement and that value was given. The security agreement stated that the collateral included, in part, “all livestock owned or hereafter acquired” and Anderson’s “rights, title and interest” in such livestock. The financing statements covered “all livestock,” whether “now owned or hereafter acquired, together with the proceeds from the sale thereof.” The parties also do not dispute the validity of these descriptions or the assertion that “livestock” includes cattle and calves. What is disputed is whether the bank’s security interest attached to the 289 calves sold in December 2000 under Anderson and Johnson’s cattle-sharing agreement. [Citation.]

*** The district court stated on the record that the cattle-sharing contract had not “granted” Anderson an “ownership interest” in the calves, specifically finding that “the modifications testified to by Mr. Anderson in the light most favorable to Border State Bank do not modify the terms of the agreement such that an ownership interest is granted.” Based on the arguments presented, the district court apparently determined that, for Border State Bank’s security interest to attach, Johnson would have had to grant Anderson an interest equivalent to ownership.

The provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code’s Article 9, incorporated into Minnesota law, refer to “rights in the collateral,” not solely the “ownership” of the collateral. [UCC]. § 9-203(b)(2) (stating security interest may attach to collateral if “the debtor has rights in the collateral or the power to transfer rights in the collateral”). Rights in the collateral, as the term is used in Article 9, include full ownership and limited rights that fall short of full ownership. [UCC]§ 9-203 U.C.C. cmt., para. 6 [Citations.] Simply stated, the UCC “does not require that collateral be owned by the debtor.” [Citation.]

*** For purposes of the UCC, “sufficient rights” arise with far less than full ownership. [Citation.] Ownership or title is not the relevant concern under Article 9; “the issue is whether the debtor has acquired sufficient rights in the collateral so that the security interest would attach.” [Citation.] The “rights in the collateral” language is a “gateway through which one looks to other law to determine the extent of the debtor’s rights.” [Citation.]. Thus, “[a]ll or some of owner’s rights can be transferred by way of sale, lease, or license [and a] person with transferable rights can grant an enforceable security interest in those rights.” [Citation.] A “security interest will attach to the collateral only to the extent of the debtor’s rights in the collateral”; mere possession of the collateral is insufficient to support an attachment, but the debtor need not have full ownership. [Citation.]. ***

The district court did not analyze the modified cattle-sharing contract to determine the nature of Anderson’s rights in the calves or whether Anderson’s interests or rights were sufficient to permit attachment of a security interest. We conclude that the standard relied on by the district court is inconsistent with Minnesota law. The application of the incorrect standard prematurely terminated the analysis of the cattle-sharing agreement, which is necessary to determine whether Anderson's rights in the collateral were sufficient for the bank's security interest to attach. *** Because the district court applied a standard of ownership that is inconsistent with Minnesota law, its finding that the security interest did not attach was influenced by an error of law.

*** On remand, the district court shall consider the cattle-sharing agreement to determine whether Anderson had "rights" in the calves, to which the bank's security interest attached.

INTERPRETATION A security agreement attaches to the described collateral once the following events have occurred: (1) the secured party has given value; (2) the debtor has acquired rights in the collateral or has the power to transfer such rights to a secured party; and (3) the debtor and secured party have an agreement, which in most instances must be authenticated by the debtor.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the court fairly decide this case? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What rights in collateral beyond mere possession should be considered sufficient for a security interest to attach to the collateral? Explain.

SECURITY AGREEMENT

A security interest cannot attach unless an agreement (contract) between the debtor and creditor creates or provides the creditor with a security interest in the debtor's collateral. With certain exceptions (discussed below), the agreement must (1) be authenticated by the debtor and (2) contain a reasonable description of the collateral. In addition, if the collateral is timber to be cut, the agreement must contain a reasonable description of the land concerned. A description of personal or real property is sufficient if it reasonably identifies what is described. A description of personal property may identify the collateral by specific listing, category, or in most cases, a type of collateral defined in the Code (e.g., inventory or farm equipment). The description, however, may not be a super-generic description, such as "all my personal property."

The Code provides the parties with a great deal of freedom to draft the security agreement, although this freedom is limited by good faith, diligence, reasonableness, and care. Moreover, security agreements frequently contain a provision for acceleration at the secured party's option of all payments upon the default in any payment by the debtor, the debtor's bankruptcy or insolvency, or the debtor's failure to meet other requirements of the agreement. Sometimes security agreements require the debtor to furnish additional collateral if the secured party becomes insecure about the prospects of future payments.

Authenticating Record In most instances there must be a record of the security agreement authenticated by the debtor. Authentication can occur in one of two ways. First, the debtor can sign a written security agreement. A writing can include any printing, typewriting, or other intentional reduction to tangible form. To sign includes any symbol executed or adopted by a party with the present intention to authenticate a writing. (Revised Article 1 substitutes "adopt or accept" for "authenticate.") Second, in recognition of e-commerce and electronic security agreements, Revised Article 9 provides that a debtor can authenticate a security agreement by executing or otherwise adopting a symbol, or by encrypting or similarly processing a record in whole or in part, with the present intent of the authenticating party to adopt or accept the record. As already mentioned, a record means information (1) on a tangible medium or (2) that is stored in an electronic or other medium and is retrievable in perceivable form. According to the Code, "examples of current technologies commercially used to communicate or store information include, but are not limited to, magnetic media, optical discs, digital voice messaging systems, electronic mail, audio tapes, and photographic media, as well as paper. 'Record' is an inclusive term that includes all of these methods." It does not, however, include any oral or other communication that is not stored or preserved.

Authenticating Record Not Required Under the Code, a record of a security agreement is not mandated in some situations. A record of a security agreement is not required when some types of collateral are pledged or are in the possession of the secured party pursuant to an agreement. This rule applies to a security interest in negotiable documents, goods, instruments, money, and tangible chattel paper. A pledge is the delivery of personal property to a creditor as security for the payment of a debt. A pledge requires that the secured party (the pledgee) and the debtor agree to the pledge of the collateral and that the collateral be delivered to the pledgee. Other situations in which a secured party does not need a record authenticated by the debtor include the following: (1) the collateral is a certificated security in registered form that has been delivered to the secured party, or (2) the collateral is a deposit account, electronic chattel paper, investment property, or letter-of-credit rights; the secured party has control over the collateral. Control is discussed later.

Consumer Goods Federal regulation prohibits a credit seller or lender from obtaining a consumer's grant of a nonpossessory security interest in household goods. This rule does not apply to PMSIs or to pledges. Rather, it prevents a lender or seller from obtaining a non-PMSI covering the consumer's household goods, which are defined to include clothing, furniture, appliances, kitchenware, personal effects, wedding rings, one radio, and one television. (These hard-to-sell items are also referred to as "junk" collateral.) The definition of household goods specifically excludes works of art, other electronic entertainment equipment, antiques, and jewelry.

After-Acquired Property "[A] security agreement may create or provide for a security interest in after-acquired collateral." After-acquired property is property that the debtor presently does not own or have rights to but may acquire at some time. For example, an after-acquired property clause in a security agreement may include all present and subsequently acquired inventory, accounts, or equipment of the debtor. This clause would provide the secured party with a valid security interest not only in the typewriter, desk, and file cabinet that the debtor currently owns, but also in a personal computer she purchases later. Article 9 therefore accepts the concept of a "continuing general lien," or a floating lien, though the Code limits the operation of an after-acquired property clause against consumers by providing that no such interest can be claimed as additional security in consumer goods, except accessions, if the goods are acquired more than ten days after the secured party gives value.

Future Advances The obligations covered by a security agreement may include future advances. Frequently, a debtor obtains a line of credit from a creditor for advances to be made at some later time. For instance, a manufacturer may provide a retailer with a $60,000 line of credit, only $20,000 of which the retailer initially uses. Nevertheless, the manufacturer and the retailer may enter a security agreement granting to the manufacturer a security interest in the retailer's inventory that covers not only the initial $20,000 advance but also any future advances.

Perfection

To be effective against third parties who assert competing interests in the collateral (including other creditors of the debtor, the debtor's trustee in bankruptcy, and transferees of the debtor), the security interest must be perfected. Perfection of a security interest occurs when it has attached and when all the applicable steps required for perfection have been satisfied. If these steps precede attachment, the security interest is perfected at the time it attaches. Once a security interest becomes perfected, it "may still be or become subordinate to other interests ... [h]owever, in general, after perfection the secured party is protected against creditors and transferees of the debtor and, in particular, against any representative of creditors in insolvency proceedings instituted by or against the debtor." Thus, in most instances a perfected secured party will prevail over a subsequent perfected security interest, a subsequent lien creditor or a representative or creditors (e.g., a trustee in bankruptcy), and subsequent buyers of the collateral.

Depending on the type of collateral, a security interest may be perfected:

1. by the secured party filing a financing statement in the designated public office;
2. by the secured party taking or retaining possession of the collateral;
3. automatically, on the attachment of the security interest;
4. temporarily, for a period specified by the Code; or
5. by the secured party taking control of the collateral.

A security interest or agricultural lien is perfected continuously if it is originally perfected by one method and is later perfected by another if there is no intermediate period when it was unperfected.

Many states have adopted certificate of title statutes for automobiles, trailers, mobile homes, boats, and farm tractors. A certificate of title is an official representation of ownership. In these states, Article 9's filing requirements do not apply to perfecting a security interest in such collateral except when the collateral is inventory held by a dealer for sale. See Concept Review 38-1 on page 799 for an overview of the requisites for attachment and perfection.

Practical Advice

As a creditor, make sure that you properly perfect any security interest that you acquire.

FILING A FINANCING STATEMENT

Filing a financing statement is the most common method of perfecting a security interest under Article 9. Filing is required to perfect a security interest in general intangibles and accounts except for assignments of isolated accounts. Filing may be used to perfect a security interest in any other kind of collateral, with the general exception of deposit accounts, letter-of-credit rights, and money. A financing statement may be filed before or after the security interest attaches. The form of the financing statement, which is filed to give public notice of the security interest, may vary from state to state.

What to File The Revised Act continues to adopt a system of “notice filing”: it indicates merely that a person may have a security interest in the collateral. It also authorizes and encourages filing financing statements electronically. Though it need not be highly detailed, the financing statement must include the name of the debtor, the name of the secured party or a representative of the secured party, and an indication of the collateral covered by the financing statement. If the financing statement substantially complies with these requirements, minor errors that do not seriously mislead will not render the financing statement ineffective. Significantly, the Revised Act no longer requires the debtor’s signature on the financing statement in order to facilitate paperless or electronic filing. Since a signature is not required, the Revised Act attempts to deter unauthorized filings by imposing statutory damages of $500 in addition to damages for any loss caused.

Financing statements are indexed under the debtor’s name so it is particularly important that the financing statement provide the debtor’s name. The Code provides rules for what names must appear for registered organizations (such as corporations, limited partnerships, and limited liability companies), trusts, and other organizations. If the organization does not have a name, the names of the partners, members, associates, or other persons comprising the debtor are the names used. A financing statement that includes only the trade name is insufficient. A financing statement that does not comply with these requirements is considered to be seriously misleading.

The description of the collateral is sufficient if it meets the requirements for a security agreement discussed earlier or if it indicates that the financing statement covers all assets or all personal property. Thus, the use of super-generic descriptions is permitted in financing statements but is not permitted in security agreements. In real-property-related filings (collateral involving fixtures, timber to be cut, or minerals to be extracted), a description of the real property must be included sufficient to reasonably identify the real property.

Duration of Filing A financing statement is generally effective for five years from the date of filing. A continuation statement filed by the secured party within six months prior to expiration will extend the effectiveness of the filing for another five years. If the financing statement lapses, the security interest is no longer perfected unless it is perfected by another method.

In many states, security interests in motor vehicles and other specified collateral must be perfected by making a notation on the certificate of title rather than by filing a financing statement. Nevertheless, as previously indicated, certificate of title laws do not apply if a dealer holds the collateral as inventory for sale.

Place of Filing Except for real-estate-related collateral, financing statements must be filed in a central location designated by the state. With respect to real-estate-related collateral, the financing statement is to be filed in the office designated for the filing or recording of mortgages on the related real property, which is usually local. If the debtor is an individual, the financing statement is to be filed in the state of the individual’s principal residence; for a registered organization, the place of filing is the state where the debtor is organized.

Subsequent Change of Debtor’s Location After a secured party has properly filed a financing statement, the debtor may change the place of his residence or business or the location or use of the collateral and thus render the information in the filing incorrect. A change in the use of the collateral or a move within the state (intrastate) does not impair the effectiveness of the original filing. If the debtor moves to another state after the initial filing, the security interest remains perfected until the earliest of (1) the time the security interest would have terminated in the state in which perfection occurred; (2) four months after the debtor moved to the new state; or (3) the expiration of one year after the debtor transfers the collateral to a person in another state who becomes the debtor.

POSSESSION

Possession by the secured party perfects a security interest in goods (e.g., those in the possession of pawnbrokers), instruments, money, negotiable documents, or tangible chattel paper. Moreover, a secured party may perfect a security interest in a certificated security by taking delivery of it. Possession is not available, however, as a means of perfecting a security interest in accounts, commercial tort claims, deposit accounts, other types of investment property, letter-of-credit rights, or oil, gas, and other minerals before extraction.

A pledge, which is a possessory security interest, is the delivery of personal property to a creditor or to a third party acting as an agent or bailee for the creditor as security for the payment of a debt. No pledge occurs where the debtor retains possession of the collateral. In making a pledge, the debtor is not legally required to sign a written security agreement; an oral agreement granting the secured party a security interest is sufficient. In any situation not involving a pledge, however, the Code requires an authenticated record of the security agreement.

One type of pledge is the field warehouse. This common arrangement for financing inventory allows the debtor access to the pledged goods and provides the secured party with control over the pledged property at the same time. In this arrangement, a professional warehouseman generally establishes a warehouse on the debtor’s premises—usually by enclosing a portion of those premises and posting appropriate signs—to store the debtor’s unsold inventory. The warehouseman then typically issues nonnegotiable receipts for the goods to the secured party, who may then authorize the warehouseman to release a portion of the goods to the debtor as the goods are sold, at a specified quantity per week, or at any rate on which the parties agree. Thus, the secured party legally possesses the goods while allowing the debtor easy access to her inventory.

Practical Advice

Field warehousing is a useful way for a creditor to perfect her security interest while providing the debtor with easy access to his inventory.

AUTOMATIC PERFECTION

In some situations, a security interest is automatically perfected on attachment. The most important situation to which automatic perfection applies is a PMSI in consumer goods. A partial or isolated assignment of accounts that transfers a less-than-significant portion of the assignor’s outstanding accounts is also automatically perfected.

A PMSI in consumer goods, with the exception of motor vehicles, is perfected automatically upon attachment; filing a financing statement is unnecessary. For example, Doris purchases a refrigerator from Carol on credit for Doris’s personal, family, or household use. Doris takes possession of the refrigerator and then grants Carol a security interest in the refrigerator pursuant to a written security agreement. Upon Doris’s granting Carol the security interest, Carol’s security interest attaches and is automatically perfected. The same would be true if Doris purchased the refrigerator for cash but borrowed the money from Logan, to whom Doris granted a security interest in the refrigerator pursuant to a written security agreement. Logan’s security interest would attach and would be automatically perfected when she received the security agreement from Doris. Nevertheless, because an automatically perfected PMSI in consumer goods protects the secured party less fully than a filed PMSI, secured parties frequently file a financing statement rather than rely solely on automatic perfection.

KIMBRELL’S OF SANFORD, INC. v. KPS, INC.

COURT OF APPEALS OF NORTH CAROLINA, 1994
113 N.C.APP. 830, 440 S.E. 2D 329

FACTS The defendant, Burns, purchased a VCR at Kimbrell’s of Sanford. At the time of sale, Burns signed a purchase money security agreement with Kimbrell’s. However, Kimbrell’s did not file a financing statement to perfect its purchase money security interest. Burns immediately pawned the VCR to KPS, Inc. After Burns defaulted on the security agreement, Kimbrell’s filed suit in small claims court to recover the VCR. The magistrate entered judgment denying recovery. On appeal to the district court, the judgment was affirmed. Kimbrell’s appeals.

DECISION Judgment reversed.

OPINION McCrodden, J. Plaintiff offers one argument raising the issue of whether it was entitled to recover from defendant pawn shop a VCR plaintiff had sold to defendant Burns under a purchase money security agreement.
* * *

Plaintiff argues that the judgment denying it recovery of the VCR contravened Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code, [citation.] We agree.

At the time defendant Burns purchased the VCR from plaintiff, he signed a purchase money security agreement, thereby granting plaintiff a purchase money security interest in the VCR. [UCC] § 9–107. Since a VCR is a consumer good, [UCC] § 9–109(1), plaintiff did not have to file a financing statement in order to perfect its purchase money security interest in the VCR. [UCC] § 9–302(1)(d). Defendant Burns failed to make any further payments for the VCR and defaulted on the security agreement. Therefore, plaintiff was entitled to recover possession of the VCR when it filed its action in small claims court. [UCC] §§ 9–501, 9–503. Accordingly, we hold that the trial court erred in dismissing plaintiff’s claim to recover possession of the VCR.

INTERPRETATION A purchase money security interest in consumer goods, with the exception of motor vehicles, is perfected automatically on attachment.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION When, if ever, should the law make a security interest automatically perfected? Explain.

TEMPORARY PERFECTION

Security interests in certain types of collateral are automatically, but only temporarily, perfected. The Code provides that a security interest in a certificated security, negotiable document, or instrument is perfected upon attachment for a period of twenty days. This provision, however, is applicable only to the extent that the security interest arises for new value given under an authenticated security agreement. A perfected security interest in a certificated security or an instrument also remains perfected for twenty days if the secured party delivers the security certificate or instrument to the debtor for the purpose of (1) sale or exchange or (2) presentation, collection, enforcement, renewal, or registration of transfer. After the temporary period expires, the security interest becomes unperfected unless it is perfected by other means.

PERFECTION BY CONTROL

A security interest in investment property, deposit accounts (not including consumer deposit accounts), electronic chat-tel paper, and letter-of-credit rights may be perfected by control of the collateral. A security interest in deposit accounts and letter-of-credit rights may be perfected only by control. What constitutes control varies with the type of collateral involved. For example, control of a commercial deposit account (e.g., a checking account) is acquired if (1) the secured party is the bank with which the checking account is maintained or (2) the debtor, secured party, and bank agree in an authenticated record that the bank will comply with the secured party's instructions. The rules for control for other collateral are somewhat different as provided in the following sections: investment property, electronic chattel paper, and letter-of-credit rights.

Priorities among Competing Interests

As previously noted, a security interest must be perfected to be most effective against the debtor's other creditors, her trustee in bankruptcy, and her transferees. Nonetheless,

Requisites for Enforceability of Security Interests

Attachment

- A. Value given by secured party
- B. Debtor has rights in collateral
- C. Agreement
  1. record authenticated by debtor (except for most pledges)
  2. providing a security interest
  3. in described collateral

Perfection

- A. Secured party files a financing statement
- B. Secured party takes possession
- C. Automatically
- D. Temporarily, or
- E. Control

perfection of a security interest does not provide the secured party with a priority over all third parties with an interest in the collateral. On the other hand, even an unperfected but attached security interest has priority over a limited number of third parties and is enforceable against the debtor. Article 9 establishes a complex set of rules that determine the relative priorities among these parties.

AGAINST UNSECURED CREDITORS

Once a security interest attaches, it has priority over claims of other creditors who do not have a security interest or a lien. This priority does not depend upon perfection. If a security interest does not attach, the creditor is merely an unsecured or general creditor of the debtor.

AGAINST OTHER SECURED CREDITORS

The rights of a secured creditor against other secured creditors depend upon the security interests perfected, when they are perfected, and the type of collateral. Notwithstanding the rules of priority, a secured party entitled to priority may subordinate her interest to that of another secured creditor. The parties may do this by agreement, and nothing need be filed.

Perfected versus Unperfected A creditor with a perfected security interest or agricultural lien has superior rights in the collateral than a creditor with an unperfected security interest or agricultural lien, whether or not the unperfected security interest has attached.

Perfected versus Perfected Two parties each having a perfected security interest or agricultural lien rank according to priority in time of filing or perfection. This general rule is stated in the Code, which provides:

Conflicting perfected security interests and agricultural liens rank according to priority in time of filing or perfection. Priority dates from the earlier of the time a filing covering the collateral is first made or the security interest or agricultural lien is first perfected, if there is no period thereafter when there is neither filing nor perfection.

This rule favors filing, because it can occur prior to attachment and thus grant priority from a time that may precede perfection. Generally, the original time for filing or perfection of a security interest in collateral is also the time of filing or perfection for a security interest in proceeds from that collateral.

Practical Advice

If perfecting by filing, file your financing statement as soon as possible.

Practical Advice

Before accepting personal property as collateral, check the public records to ensure that there are no prior filings against that property.

For example, Debter Store and Leynder Bank enter into a loan agreement (assume there is no binding commitment to extend credit) under the terms of which Leynder agrees to lend $5,000 on the security of Debter's existing store equipment. A security agreement is executed and a financing statement is filed, but no funds are advanced. One week later, Debter enters into a loan agreement with Reserve Bank, and Reserve agrees to lend $5,000 on the security of the same store equipment. The funds are advanced, a security agreement is executed, and a financing statement is filed. One week later, Leynder Bank advances the agreed sum of $5,000. Debter Store defaults on both loans. Between Leynder Bank and Reserve Bank, Leynder has priority because priority among security interests perfected by filing is determined by the order in which they were filed. Reserve Bank should have checked the financing statements on file. Had it done so, it would have discovered that Leynder Bank claimed a security interest in the equipment. Conversely, after filing its financing statement, with no prior secured party of record, Leynder had no need to check the files before advancing funds to Debter Store in accordance with its loan commitment.

To further illustrate, assume that Marc grants a security interest in a Chagall painting to Miro Bank and that the bank advances funds to Marc in accordance with the loan agreement. A financing statement is filed. Later, Marc wants more money and goes to Brague, an art dealer, who advances funds to Marc upon a pledge of the painting. Marc defaults on both loans. Between Miro and Brague, Miro has priority because its financing statement was filed before Brague's perfection by possession. By checking the financing statement on file, Brague would have discovered that Miro had a prior security interest in the painting.

There are several exceptions to the general rules just discussed:

1. A purchase money security interest in noninventory goods (except livestock) takes priority over a conflicting security interest if the PMSI is perfected when the debtor receives possession of the collateral or within twenty days of receiving possession. Thus, the secured party has a twenty-day grace period in which to perfect.

For example, Dawkins Manufacturing Co. enters into a loan contract with Larkin Bank, which loans money to Dawkins on the security (as provided in the security agreement) of Dawkins's existing and future equipment and files a financing statement stating that the collateral is "all equipment presently owned and subsequently acquired" by Dawkins. At a later date, Dawkins buys new equipment from Parker Supply Co., paying 25 percent of the purchase price, with Parker retaining a security interest (as provided in the security agreement) in the equipment to secure the remaining balance. If Parker files a financing statement within ten days of Dawkins's obtaining possession of the equipment, Parker's PMSI in the new equipment purchased from Parker has priority over Larkin's interest. If, however, Parker files one day beyond the statutory grace period, Parker's interest is subordinate to Larkin's.

2. A purchase money security interest in inventory has priority over earlier-filed security interests in inventory if the following four requirements are met. The purchase money security holder must (a) perfect his interest in the inventory at the time the debtor receives the inventory; (b) send an authenticated notification to the holder of a conflicting security interest; (c) the holder of the conflicting security interest receives the notification within five years before the debtor receives possession of the inventory; and (d) the notification states that the person sending the notification has or will acquire a PMSI in inventory of the debtor and describes the inventory.

For example, Dodger Store and Lyons Bank enter into a loan agreement in which Lyons agrees to finance Dodger's entire inventory of stoves, refrigerators, and other kitchen appliances. A security agreement is executed and a financing statement is filed, and Lyons advances funds to Dodger. Subsequently, Dodger enters into an agreement under which Dodger Stove Co. will supply Dodger with stoves, retaining a PMSI in this inventory. Dodger will have priority as to the inventory it supplies to Dodger provided that Dodger files a financing statement by the time Dodger receives the goods and notifies Lyons that it is going to engage in this purchase money financing of the described stoves. If Dodger fails either to give the required notice or to file timely a financing statement, Lyons will have priority over Dodger as to the stoves Dodger supplies to Dodger. As noted, the Code adopts a system of notice filing, and secured parties who fail to check the financing statements on file proceed at their peril.

3. A security interest perfected by control in deposit accounts, letter-of-credit rights, or investment property has priority over a conflicting perfected security interest held by a secured party who does not have control. If both conflicting security interests are perfected by control, they rank according to priority in time of obtaining control.

Unperfected versus Unperfected If neither security interest or agricultural lien is perfected, then the first to attach has priority. If neither attaches, both of the creditors are general, unsecured creditors.

AGAINST BUYERS

A security interest or agricultural lien continues even in collateral that is sold, leased, licensed, exchanged, or otherwise disposed of unless the secured party authorizes the sale. Thus, following a sale, lease, license, exchange, or other disposition of collateral, a secured party who did not authorize the transaction does not have to file a new financing statement to continue her perfected interest. The security interest also attaches to any identifiable proceeds from the sale, including proceeds in consumer deposit accounts.

In many instances, however, buyers of collateral sold without the secured party's authorization take it free of an unperfected security interest. A buyer of goods, tangible chattel paper, documents, instruments, or certificated securities who gives value and receives delivery of the collateral without knowledge of the security interest before it is perfected takes free of the security interest. Similarly, a buyer of accounts, electronic chattel paper, general intangibles, or investment property other than certificated securities takes free of a security interest if the buyer gives value without knowledge of the security interest and does so before it is perfected. Thus, with respect to all of these types of collateral, an unperfected security interest prevails over a buyer who does not give value or has knowledge of the security interest.

In addition, in some instances, purchasers take the collateral free of a perfected security interest. The most significant of these instances are discussed here.

Buyers in the Ordinary Course of Business A buyer in the ordinary course of business takes collateral (other than farm products) free of any security interest created by the buyer's seller, even if the security interest is perfected and the buyer knows of its existence. A buyer in the ordinary course of business is a person who, without knowledge that a sale will violate a security interest of a third party, buys in good faith and in ordinary course from a person in the business of selling goods of that kind. Thus, this rule applies primarily to purchasers of inventory. For example, a consumer who purchases a sofa from a furniture dealer and the dealer who purchases the sofa from another dealer are both buyers in the ordinary course of business. On the other hand, a person who purchases a sofa from a dentist who used the sofa in his waiting room or from an individual who used the sofa in his home is not a buyer in the ordinary course of business.

To illustrate further, a person who in the ordinary course of business buys an automobile from an automobile dealership will take free and clear of a security interest created by the dealer from whom she purchased the car. That same buyer in the ordinary course of business will not, however, take clear of a security interest created by any person who owned the automobile prior to the dealer.

Buyers of Farm Products Buyers in the ordinary course of business of farm products, although not protected by the Code, may be protected by the Federal Food Security Act. This Act defines a buyer in the ordinary course of business as “a person who, in the ordinary course of business, buys farm products from a person engaged in farming operations who is in the business of selling farm products.” The Act provides that such a buyer shall take free of most security interests created by the seller, even if the security interest is perfected and the buyer knows of its existence.

Buyers of Consumer Goods In the case of consumer goods, a buyer who buys without knowledge of a security interest, for value, and primarily for personal, family, or household purposes takes the goods free of any PMSI automatically perfected but takes the goods subject to a security interest perfected by filing. For example, Ann purchases on credit a refrigerator from Sean for use in her home and grants Sean a security interest in the refrigerator. Sean does not file a financing statement but has a security interest perfected by attachment. Ann subsequently sells the refrigerator to her neighbor, Juwan, for use in his home. Juwan does not know of Sean's security interest and therefore takes the refrigerator free of that interest. If Sean had filed a financing statement, however, his security interest would continue in the collateral, even in Juwan's hands.

Buyers of Other Collateral To the extent provided by UCC Articles 3, 7, and 8, a secured party who has a perfected security interest in a negotiable instrument, a negotiable document of title, or a security has a subordinate interest to a purchaser of (1) the instrument who has the rights of a holder in due course, (2) the document of title to whom it has been duly negotiated, or (3) the security who is a protected purchaser. In addition, in certain instances a secured party who has a perfected security interest in chattel paper also may have subordinate rights to a purchaser of such collateral.

AGAINST LIEN CREDITORS

A lien creditor is a creditor who has acquired a lien in the property by judicial decree (“attachment garnishment, or the like”), an assignee for the benefit of creditors, a receiver in equity, or a trustee in bankruptcy. (A trustee in bankruptcy is a representative of an estate in bankruptcy who is responsible for collecting, liquidating, and distributing the debtor's assets.) Whereas a perfected security interest or agricultural lien has priority over lien creditors who acquire their liens after perfection, an unperfected security interest or agricultural lien is subordinate to the rights of one who becomes a lien creditor before (1) its perfection or (2) a financing statement covering the collateral is filed and either (a) the debtor has authenticated a properly drawn security agreement, (b) if the collateral is a certificated security, the certificate has been delivered to the secured party, or (c) if the collateral is an uncertificated security, it is in possession of the secured party. If a secured party files with respect to a PMSI within twenty days after the debtor receives possession of the collateral, however, the secured party takes priority over the rights of a lien creditor that arise between the time the security interest attaches and the time of filing. Nonetheless, a lien securing claims arising from services or materials furnished in the ordinary course of a person's business with respect to goods (an artisan's or mechanic's lien) has priority over a security interest in the goods unless the lien is created by a statute that expressly provides otherwise.

AGAINST TRUSTEE IN BANKRUPTCY

The Bankruptcy Code empowers a trustee in bankruptcy to invalidate secured claims in certain instances. It also imposes some limitations on the rights of secured parties. This section will examine the power of a trustee in bankruptcy to (1) take priority over an unperfected security interest and (2) avoid preferential transfers.

Priority over Unperfected Security Interest A trustee in bankruptcy may invalidate any security interest that is voidable by a creditor who obtained a judicial lien on the date the bankruptcy petition was filed. Under the UCC and the Bankruptcy Code, the trustee, as a hypothetical lien creditor, has priority over a creditor whose security interest was not perfected when the bankruptcy petition was filed. A creditor with a PMSI who files within the UCC's statutory grace period of twenty days after the debtor receives the collateral will defeat the trustee, even if the bankruptcy petition is filed before the creditor perfects and after the security interest is created. For example, David borrowed $5,000 from Cynthia on September 1 and gave her a security interest in the equipment he purchased with the borrowed funds. On October 3, before Cynthia perfected her security interest, David filed for bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy can invalidate Cynthia's security interest because it was unperfected when the bankruptcy petition was filed. If, however, David had filed for bankruptcy on September 8 and Cynthia had perfected the security interest within the UCC's statutory grace period of twenty days, Cynthia would prevail.

Avoidance of Preferential Transfers The Bankruptcy Code provides that a trustee in bankruptcy may invalidate any transfer of property—including the granting of a security interest—from the debtor, provided that the transfer (1) was to or for the benefit of a creditor; (2) was made on account of an antecedent debt; (3) was made when the debtor was insolvent; (4) was made on the date of or within ninety days before the filing of the bankruptcy petition or, if made to an insider, was made within one year before the date of the filing; and (5) enabled the transferee to receive more than he would have received in bankruptcy. (An insider includes a relative or general partner of a debtor, as well as a partnership in which the debtor is a general partner or a corporation of which the debtor is a director, officer, or person in control.) In determining whether the debtor is insolvent, the Bankruptcy Code establishes a rebuttable presumption of insolvency for the ninety days prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition.

To avoid a transfer to an insider that occurred more than one year before bankruptcy, the trustee must prove that the debtor was insolvent when the transfer was made. If a security interest is invalidated as a preferential transfer, the creditor may still make a claim for the unpaid debt, but the creditor's claim is unsecured.

To illustrate the operation of this rule, consider the following. On May 1, Debra bought and received merchandise from Stuart and gave him a security interest in the goods for the unpaid price of $20,000. On June 5, Stuart filed a financing statement. On August 1, Debra filed a petition for bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy may avoid the perfected security interest as a preferential transfer because (1) the transfer of the perfected security interest on June 5 was to benefit a creditor (Stuart); (2) the transfer was on account of an antecedent debt (the $20,000 owed from the sale of the merchandise); (3) the debtor was insolvent at the time (the Bankruptcy Code presumes that the debtor is insolvent for the ninety days preceding the date the bankruptcy petition was filed—August 1); (4) the transfer was made within ninety days of bankruptcy (June 5 is less than ninety days before August 1); and (5) the transfer enabled the creditor to receive more than he would have received in bankruptcy (Stuart would have a secured claim on which he would recover more than he would on an unsecured claim).

Nevertheless, not all transfers made within ninety days of bankruptcy are voidable. As amended in 2005, the Bankruptcy Code makes exceptions for certain prebankruptcy transfers. If the creditor gives the debtor new value that the debtor uses to acquire property in which he grants the creditor a security interest, the resulting PMSI is not voidable if the creditor perfects it within thirty days after the debtor receives possession of the property. For example, if within ninety days of the filing of the petition, the debtor purchases a refrigerator on credit and grants the seller or lender a PMSI in the refrigerator, the transfer of that interest is not voidable if the secured party perfects within thirty days after the debtor receives possession of the property.

See Concept Review 38-3 for a summary of the rules of priorities.

Default

Because the Code does not define or specify what constitutes default, general contract law or the agreement between the parties will determine when a default occurs. After default, the security agreement and the applicable provisions of the Code govern the rights and remedies of the parties. In general, the secured party may reduce his claim to judgment, foreclose, or otherwise enforce the claim, security interest, or agricultural lien by any available judicial procedure. If the collateral consists of documents, the secured party may proceed against the documents or the goods they cover. These rights and remedies of the creditor are cumulative.

Practical Advice

Provide in your security agreement which events place the debtor in default and what remedies the creditor will have in the event of default.

Unless the debtor has waived his rights in the collateral after default, he has a right of redemption (to free the collateral of the security interest by fulfilling all obligations securing the collateral and paying reasonable expenses and attorneys' fees) at any time before the secured party has collected the collateral, has disposed of the collateral, has entered a contract to dispose of it, or has discharged the obligation by accepting the collateral.

REPOSSESSION OF COLLATERAL

Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, the secured party may take possession of the collateral on default. If it can be done without a breach of the peace, such taking may occur without judicial process. The Code leaves the term breach of the peace for the courts to define. Some states have defined such a breach to require either the use of violence or the threat of violence while others require merely an entry without consent. Most states require permission for entry to a residence or garage. On the other hand, the courts do permit the repossession of motor vehicles from driveways or streets. Some courts, however, do not permit a creditor to repossess if the debtor has orally protested the repossession.

After default, instead of removing the collateral, the secured party may render it unusable and leave it on the debtor's premises until disposing of it. It also may be done without judicial process if accomplished without a breach of peace.

Business Law in Action

Like many businesses, Birdwell Industrial has an operating line of credit with a bank. In addition to personal guaranties signed by Birdwell's owners, the revolving loan is collateralized by a security interest in all of Birdwell's accounts receivable, inventory, and business equipment, as well as any after-acquired property in which Birdwell may later obtain rights. The bank's lien was properly perfected.

Some time later Birdwell purchased a new telephone system for its offices, costing nearly $4,500. The telephone vendor agreed to extend credit, but only if Birdwell would grant a security interest in the telephone system until the purchase money was paid in full. Birdwell agreed, and this lien was perfected shortly after the security interest was signed and just before the equipment was delivered to Birdwell.

By granting a "purchase money security interest" in the telephone system to the vendor, Birdwell has given two liens in the same collateral. This is because by definition the telephone system is "after-acquired property," subject to the bank's preexisting security interest. In the event of Birdwell's bankruptcy or default on either creditor's loan, the two liens are competing for the same collateral. Which creditor will have a superior right to the telephone system must be determined by reference to Article 9's priority rules, which provide that a purchase money security interest in noninventory goods takes priority over a conflicting security interest if the purchase money security interest is perfected when the debtor receives possession of the collateral or within twenty days of receiving possession. In this case, the vendor timely perfected its lien and therefore will prevail.

The rules awarding a superior interest in the collateral to one who grants credit for purchase money serve two related purposes. First, they prevent a single creditor, such as the bank in this case, from cutting off all future sources of credit for the debtor and thereby preventing the debtor from obtaining additional inventory or equipment that is needed to maintain a viable business. Second, they make it possible for a later supplier to have the first claim against only the goods it supplied and only until the purchase price is fully paid. This way, earlier creditors are protected, but not at the expense of subsequent creditors, whose purchase money enables the debtor to maintain its business and eventually to pay off all creditors.

CHAPA V. TRACIERS & ASSOCIATES

COURT OF APPEALS OF TEXAS, HOUSTON (14TH DIST.), 2008
267 S.W.3D 386, 66 UCC REP.SERV.2D 451

<http://www.14thcoa.courts.state.tx.us/opinions/HTMLopinion.asp?OpinionID=84777>

FACTS Ford Motor Credit Corp. (FMCC) hired Traciers & Associates (Traciers) to repossess a white 2002 Ford Expedition owned by Marissa Chapa, who was in default on her loan. Traciers assigned the job to its field manager, Paul Chambers, and gave him an address where the vehicle could be found. FMCC, Traciers, and Chambers were unaware that the address was that of Marissa's brother, Carlos Chapa. Coincidentally, Carlos and his wife Maria Chapa also had purchased a white Ford Expedition financed by FMCC. Their vehicle, however, was a 2003 model, and Carlos and Maria were not in default. On the night of February 6, 2003, Chambers went to the address and observed a white Ford Expedition. The license number of the vehicle did not match that of the vehicle he was told to repossess, and he did not see the vehicle's vehicle identification number (VIN), which was obscured. Chambers returned early the next morning and still could not see the Expedition's VIN. He returned to his own vehicle, which was parked two houses away. Unseen by Chambers, Maria Chapa left the house and helped her two sons, ages ten and six, into the Expedition for the trip to school. Her mother-in-law's vehicle was parked behind her, so Maria backed her mother-in-law's vehicle into the street, then backed her Expedition out of the driveway and parked on the street. She left the keys to her car in the ignition with the motor running while she parked her mother-in-law's car back in the driveway and reentered the house to return her mother-in-law's keys. After Chambers saw Maria park the Expedition on the street and return to the house, it took him only thirty seconds to back his tow truck to the Expedition, hook it to his truck, and drive away. Chambers did not know the Chapa children were inside. When Maria emerged from the house, the Expedition, with her children, was gone. Maria began screaming, telephoned 911, and called her husband at work to tell him the children were gone. Shortly after taking the car, Chambers noticed that the Expedition's wheels were turning, indicating to him that the vehicle's engine was running. He stopped the tow truck and heard a sound from the Expedition. Looking inside, he discovered the two Chapa children. After he persuaded one of the boys to unlock the vehicle, Chambers drove the Expedition back to the Chapas' house. He returned the keys to Maria, who was outside her house, crying. By the time emergency personnel and Carlos Chapa arrived, the children were back home and Chambers had left the scene.

The Chapas filed suit against the financing company, the repossession company it hired, and the repossession agent who towed the vehicle. They asserted claims for mental anguish and its physical manifestations. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment.

DECISION The trial court's decision is affirmed.

OPINION Guzman, J. The Chapas first argue that the trial court erred in granting summary judgment against them on their claim that appellees are liable under [UCC] section 9.609. This statute provides in pertinent part:

- (a) After default, a secured party:
  - (1) may take possession of the collateral;
- (b) A secured party may proceed under Subsection (a):
  - ...
  - (2) without judicial process, if it proceeds without breach of the peace. [Citation.]

The Chapas correctly point out that this statute imposes a duty on secured creditors to take precautions for public safety when repossessing property. [Citation.] Thus, the creditor who elects to pursue nonjudicial repossession assumes the risk that a breach of the peace might occur. [Citation.] A secured creditor "remains liable for breaches of the peace committed by its independent contractor." [Citation.] Thus, a creditor cannot escape liability by hiring an independent contractor to repossess secured property.

The Chapas assert that FMCC and Traciers, who employed Chambers as a repossession agent, are liable for any physical or mental injuries sustained by Carlos and Maria as a result of Chambers's breach of the peace. But this argument presupposes that a breach of peace occurred. ***

Most frequently, the expression "breach of the peace" as used in the Uniform Commercial Code "connotes conduct that incites or is likely to incite immediate public turbulence, or that leads to or is likely to lead to an immediate loss of public order and tranquility." [Citations] ("[S]ecured creditor, in exercising privilege to enter upon premises of another to repossess collateral, may not perpetrate '[a]ny act or action manifesting force or violence, or naturally calculated to provide a breach of peace'") [[Citations.]] ("[A]lthough actual violence is not required to find 'breach of the peace,' within meaning of self-help repossession statute, disturbance or violence must be reasonably likely, and not merely a remote possibility."); [citation] (no breach of peace when vehicle repossessed from public street while debtor inside house). In addition, "[b]reach of the peace ... refers to conduct at or near and/or incident to seizure of property." [Citations] ("[E]ven in attempted repossession of a chattel off a street, parking lot or unenclosed space, if repossession is verbally or otherwise contested at actual time of and in immediate vicinity of attempted repossession by defaulting party or other person in control of chattel, secured party must desist and pursue his remedy in court.").

Here, there is no evidence that Chambers proceeded with the attempted repossession over an objection communicated to him at, near, or incident to the seizure of the property. To the contrary, Chambers immediately "desisted" repossession efforts and peaceably returned the vehicle and the children when he learned of their presence. Moreover, Chambers actively avoided confrontation. By removing an apparently unoccupied vehicle from a public street when the driver was not present, he reduced the likelihood of violence or other public disturbance.

In sum, the Chapas have not identified and we have not found any case in which the repossession of a vehicle from a public street, without objection or confrontation, has been held to constitute a breach of the peace. [Citation] (deputy sheriff did not breach the peace when he repossessed debtor's truck because, even if he violated traffic regulation when he drove away, he did so before debtor had an opportunity to confront him); [citation] (no breach of the peace occurred when repossession from parking lot was not verbally or otherwise contested). We therefore conclude that Chambers's conduct did not violate a duty imposed by [UCC] section 9.609.

INTERPRETATION A secured party may take possession of the collateral on default without judicial process if it can be done without a breach of the peace.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the court fairly decide this case? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Is it important for creditors to have the right to repossess? Explain why or why not.

SALE OF COLLATERAL

The secured party may sell, lease, license, or otherwise dispose of any collateral in its existing condition at the time of default or following any commercially reasonable preparation or processing. A secured party's disposition of the collateral after default (1) transfers to a transferee for value all of the debtor's rights in the collateral, (2) discharges the security interest under which the disposition occurred, and (3) discharges any subordinate security interests and liens.

The collateral may be disposed of at public sale (auction) or private sale, so long as all aspects of the disposition, including its method, manner, time, place, and other terms, are "commercially reasonable." The secured party may buy at a public sale and at a private sale if the collateral is customarily sold in a recognized market or is the subject of widely distributed standard price quotations. The collateral, if it is commercially reasonable, may be disposed of by one or more contracts or as a unit or in parcels. The Code favors private sales since they generally garner a higher price for the collateral. The fact that the secured party could have received a greater amount is not of itself sufficient to establish that the sale was not made in a commercially reasonable manner. Unless the collateral is perishable or threatens to decline speedily in value or is of a type customarily sold on a recognized market, the secured party must send a reasonable authenticated notification of disposition to the debtor, any secondary obligor (surety or guarantor), and, except in the case of consumer goods, other parties who have sent an authenticated notice of a claim, or any secured party or lienholder who has filed a financing statement at least ten days before the notification date.

The Code provides that the proceeds from the sale of the collateral are to be applied in the following order:

1. paying the reasonable expenses of retaking and disposing of the collateral,
2. paying the debt owed to the secured party,
3. paying any subordinate interests in the collateral, and
4. paying a secured party that is a consignor.

The debtor is entitled to any surplus and is liable for any deficiency, except in the case of a sale of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes for which he is neither entitled nor liable unless the security agreement so provides. If the goods are consumer goods, the secured party must give the debtor an explanation of how the surplus or deficiency was calculated.

ACCEPTANCE OF COLLATERAL

Acceptance of collateral (strict foreclosure) is a way for a secured party to acquire the debtor's interests without the need for a sale or other disposition. The secured party may, after default and repossession if the debtor consents in a record authenticated after default, keep the collateral in full or partial satisfaction of the obligation. In addition, the secured party may accept the collateral in full satisfaction of the obligation if she sends an unconditional proposal to the debtor to accept the collateral in full satisfaction of the obligation and if she does not receive a notice of objection authenticated by the debtor within twenty days. If there is an objection, however, the secured party must dispose of the collateral as provided in the Code. Silence is not consent to a partial satisfaction of the obligation. The debtor's consent, however, will not permit the secured party to accept the collateral in satisfaction of the obligation if a person holding a junior interest (secured party or lienholder) lodges a proper objection to the proposal.

In the case of consumer goods, if the debtor has paid 60 percent or more of the obligation, the secured party who has taken possession of the collateral must dispose of it by sale within ninety days after repossession unless the debtor and all secondary obligors have agreed in a record authenticated after default to a longer period of time. Additionally, with a consumer debt, the secured party may not accept collateral in partial satisfaction of the obligation it secures.

The acceptance of collateral in full or partial satisfaction discharges the obligation to the extent consented to by the debtor, transfers all of the debtor's rights to the secured party, and terminates all subordinate interests in the collateral.

SURETYSHIP

In many business transactions involving the extension of credit, the creditor will require that someone in addition to the debtor promise to fulfill the obligation. This promisor generally is known as a surety. In a contract involving a minor, a surety commonly acts as a party with full contractual capacity who can be held responsible for the obligations arising from the contract. Sureties are often used in addition to security to further reduce the risks involved in the extension of credit and are used instead of security interests when security is unavailable or when the use of a secured transaction is too expensive or inconvenient. Employers frequently use sureties to protect against losses caused by employees' embezzlement, and property owners use sureties to bond the performance of contracts for the construction of commercial buildings. Similarly, statutes commonly require that contracts for work to be done for governmental entities have the added protection of a surety. Premiums for compensated sureties exceed $1 billion annually in the United States.

Nature and Formation

A surety promises to answer for the payment of a debt or the performance of a duty owed to one person (called the creditor) by another (the principal debtor) on the principal debtor's failure to make payment or otherwise to perform the obligation. Thus, the suretyship relationship involves three parties—the principal debtor, the creditor, and the surety—and three contractual obligations, as illustrated by Figure 38-3. Two or more persons bound for the same debt of a principal debtor are cosureties.

The creditor's rights against the principal debtor are determined by the contract between them. The creditor also may take action on any collateral that the creditor or the surety holds to secure the principal debtor's performance. In addition, the creditor may proceed against the surety if the principal debtor defaults. If the surety is an absolute surety, the creditor may hold the surety liable as soon as the principal debtor defaults. The creditor need not proceed first against the principal debtor. In contrast, a surety who is a conditional guarantor of collection is liable only when the creditor exhausts his legal remedies against the principal debtor. Thus, a conditional guarantor of collection is liable if the creditor first obtains, but is unable to collect, a judgment against the principal debtor.

A surety who is required to pay the creditor is entitled to be exonerated (relieved of liability) and reimbursed by the principal debtor. In addition, the surety is subrogated to (assumes) the rights of the creditor and has a right to contribution from cosureties (see Figure 38-3). The rights of sureties will be discussed more fully later in this chapter.

Although in theory a distinction exists between a surety and a guarantor, the two terms are almost synonymous in common usage. Strictly speaking, a surety is bound with the principal debtor as a primary obligor, usually, although not necessarily, on the same instrument, whereas the guarantor is separately or collaterally bound to pay if the principal debtor does not. For convenience, and because the rights and duties of a surety and a guarantor are almost indistinguishable, the term surety will be used to include both of these terms.

TYPES OF SURETIES

A suretyship arrangement is frequently used by creditors seeking to reduce the risk of default by their debtors. For example, Philco Developers, a closely held corporation, applies to Caldwell Bank, a lending institution, for a loan. After scrutinizing Philco's assets and financial prospects, the lender refuses to extend credit unless Simpson, Philco's sole shareholder, promises to repay the loan if Philco does not. Simpson agrees, and Caldwell Bank makes the loan. Simpson's undertaking is that of a surety. Similarly, Philco Developers wishes to purchase goods on credit from Bird Enterprises, the seller, who agrees to extend credit only if Philco Developers obtains an acceptable surety. Simpson agrees to pay Bird Enterprises for the goods if Philco Developers does not. Simpson is a surety. In each of these examples, the surety's promise gives the creditor recourse for payment against two persons—the principal debtor and the surety—instead of one, thereby reducing the creditor's risk of loss.

Another common suretyship relation arises when an owner of property subject to a mortgage sells the property to a purchaser who assumes the mortgage. Although by assuming the obligation, the purchaser becomes the principal debtor and therefore personally obligated to pay the seller's debt to the lender, the seller nevertheless remains liable to the lender and is a surety on the obligation the purchaser has assumed (Figure 38-4). However, a purchaser who does not assume the mortgage, but simply

Suretyship Relationship

Assumption of Mortgage

takes the property subject to the mortgage, is not personally liable for the mortgage; nor is he a surety for the mortgage obligation. In this case, the purchaser's potential loss is limited to the value of the property, for although the mortgagee creditor may foreclose against the property, she may not hold the purchaser personally liable for the debt.

Practical Advice

If you sell your house and the purchaser assumes the mortgage, recognize that you are a surety and are liable to the lender if the purchaser defaults on the mortgage.

In addition to the more general kinds of sureties, there are numerous specialized kinds of suretyship, the most important of which are (1) fidelity, (2) performance, (3) official, and (4) judicial. A surety undertakes a fidelity bond to protect an employer against employee dishonesty. Performance bonds guarantee the performance of the terms and conditions of a contract. These bonds are used frequently in the construction industry to protect an owner from losses that may result from a contractor's failure to perform a building contract. Official bonds arise from statutes requiring public officers to furnish bonds for the faithful performance of their duties. Such bonds obligate a surety for all losses an officer causes through negligence or through non-performance of her duties. Judicial bonds, provided on behalf of a party to a judicial proceeding, cover losses caused by delay or by the deprivation of the use of property resulting from the institution of the action. In criminal proceedings, the purpose of a judicial bond, called a bail bond, is to ensure the appearance of the defendant in court.

FORMATION

The suretyship relationship is contractual and must satisfy all of the usual elements of a contract. No particular words are required to constitute a contract of suretyship or guaranty.

As we discussed in Chapter 15, under the statute of frauds, the contractual promise of a surety to the creditor must be in writing to be enforceable. This requirement, which applies only to collateral promises, is subject to the exception known as the main purpose doctrine. Under this doctrine, if the leading object, or main purpose, of the promisor (surety) is to obtain an economic benefit that he did not previously enjoy, the promise is not within the statute of frauds.

The promise of a surety is not binding without consideration. Because the surety generally makes her promise to induce the creditor to confer a benefit on the principal debtor, the consideration that supports the principal debtor's promise usually supports the surety's promise as well. Thus, if Constance lends money to Philip on Sally's promise to act as a surety, Constance's extension of credit is the consideration to support not only Philip's promise to repay the loan but also Sally's suretyship undertaking. However, a surety's promise made after the principal debtor's receipt of the creditor's consideration must be supported by new consideration. Accordingly, if Constance has already sold goods on credit to Philip, a subsequent guaranty by Sally will not be binding unless new consideration is given.

Practical Advice

If you seek the additional security of a surety, obtain the surety's promise in writing. If you have already lent money to a debtor and then obtain a surety, new consideration must be given to the surety to make the promise binding.

Rights of Surety

A surety whose principal debtor defaults has certain rights against the principal debtor, third parties, and cosureties. These rights include (1) exoneration, (2) reimbursement, (3) subrogation, and (4) contribution. As discussed above, a surety or absolute guarantor has no right to compel the creditor to collect from the principal debtor or to take action on collateral provided by the principal debtor. Nor is the creditor required to give the surety notice of the principal debtor's default unless the contract of suretyship provides otherwise. A conditional guarantor of collection, on the other hand, has no liability until the creditor exhausts his legal remedies of collection against the principal debtor.

EXONERATION

The ordinary expectation in a suretyship relation is that the principal debtor will perform the obligation and the surety will not be required to perform. Therefore, the surety has the right to require that her principal debtor pay the creditor when the obligation is due. This right of the surety against the principal debtor, called the right of exoneration, is enforceable at equity. If the principal debtor fails to pay the creditor when the debt is due, the surety may obtain a decree ordering the principal debtor to pay the creditor. However, this remedy in no way affects the creditor's right to proceed against the surety.

A surety also has a right of exoneration against his cosureties. When the principal debtor's obligation becomes due, each surety owes every other cosurety the duty to pay her proportionate share of the principal debtor's obligation to the creditor. Accordingly, a surety may bring an action in equity to obtain an order requiring his cosureties to pay their share of the debt.

REIMBURSEMENT

When, on the default of the principal debtor, a surety pays the creditor, the surety has the right of reimbursement (repayment) against the principal debtor. This right arises, however, only when the surety actually has made payment and then applies only to the extent of the payment. Thus, a surety who advantageously negotiates a defaulted obligation and settles it at a compromise figure less than the original sum may recover from the principal debtor only the sum the surety actually paid, not the sum before negotiation.

SUBROGATION

On payment of the principal debtor's entire obligation, the surety "steps into the shoes" of the creditor. Called subrogation, this confers on the surety all the rights the creditor has against or through the principal debtor. These include the creditor's rights

1. against the principal debtor, including the creditor's priorities in a bankruptcy proceeding;
2. in security of the principal debtor;
3. against third parties such as comakers, who also are obligated on the principal debtor's obligation; and
4. against cosureties.

CONTRIBUTION

Up to the amount of each surety's undertaking, cosureties are jointly and severally liable for the principal debtor's default. The creditor may proceed against any or all of the cosureties and collect from any of them the amount that that surety has agreed to guarantee, up to and including the entire amount of the principal debtor's obligation.

A surety who pays her principal debtor's obligation may require the cosureties to pay to her their proportionate shares of the obligation she paid. This right of contribution arises when a surety has paid more than her proportionate share of a debt, even though the cosureties originally were unaware of each other or were bound on separate instruments. They need be sureties only for the same principal debtor and the same obligation. The contractual agreement among the cosureties determines the right and extent of contribution for each. If no such agreement exists, sureties obligated for equal amounts share equally; when they are obligated for varying amounts, the proportion of the debt that each surety must contribute is determined by proration according to each surety's undertaking. For example, if X, Y, and Z are cosureties for PD to C in the amounts of $5,000, $10,000, and $15,000, respectively, which totals $30,000, then X's share of the total is one-sixth ( $$5,000/$30,000$ ), Y's share is one-third ( $$10,000/$30,000$ ), and Z's share is one-half ( $$15,000/$30,000$ ).

Defenses of Surety and Principal Debtor

The obligations the principal debtor and the surety owe to the creditor arise out of contracts. Accordingly, the usual contractual defenses apply, such as those that result from (1) the nonexistence of the principal debtor's obligation, (2) a discharge of the principal debtor's obligation, (3) a modification of the principal debtor's contract, or (4) a variation of the surety's risk. Some of these defenses are available only to the principal debtor, some only to the surety, and others to both parties (see Figure 38-5).

Personal Defenses of Principal Debtor

The defenses available only to a principal debtor are known as the personal defenses of principal debtor. For example, incapacity due to infancy or mental incompetency may serve as a defense for the principal debtor but not for the surety. If, however, the principal debtor disaffirms the contract and returns the consideration he received from the creditor, the surety is discharged from his liability. A discharge of the principal debtor's obligation in bankruptcy, by comparison, does not discharge the surety's liability to the creditor on that obligation. In addition, the surety may not use as a setoff any claim that the principal debtor has against the creditor.

PERSONAL DEFENSES OF SURETY

Those defenses that only the surety may assert are called personal defenses of surety. The surety may use, as a defense, his own incapacity, noncompliance with the statute of frauds, or the absence of mutual assent or consideration to support his obligation. Fraud or duress practiced by the creditor on the surety is also a defense. Although, as a general rule, the creditor's nondisclosure of material facts to the surety is not fraud, there are two important exceptions. If a prospective surety requests information, the creditor must disclose it; the concealment of material facts will constitute fraud. Second, a creditor who knows, or who should know, that a surety is being deceived is under a duty to disclose this information; nondisclosure is considered fraud upon the surety. Fraud on the part of the principal debtor may not be asserted against the creditor if the creditor is unaware of such fraud. Similarly, duress exerted by the principal debtor on the surety is not a defense against the creditor.

AMERICAN MANUFACTURING MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY v. TISON HOG MARKET, INC.

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS, ELEVENTH CIRCUIT, 1999
182 F.3D 1284, CERT. DENIED, 531 U.S. 819, 121 S. CT. 59, 148 L. ED. 2D 26, 2000

<http://www.law.emory.edu/11circuit/aug99/98-8506.man.html>

FACTS Every livestock dealer must execute and maintain a reasonable bond to secure the performance of its obligations. Thurston Paulk, doing business as Paulk

Livestock Company (Paulk Livestock), and Coffee County Stockyard, Incorporated (Coffee County Livestock), both livestock dealers, applied to plaintiff

American Manufacturing Mutual Insurance Company (American) to serve as a surety and issue bonds for them to meet their legal requirements. The applications for both bonds contained agreements to indemnify American for any losses that it might incur as a result of their issuance. The principal debtor on the first bond was Thurston Paulk, doing business as Paulk Livestock. The application was signed by Thurston Paulk in his role as the sole proprietor of Paulk Livestock. The indemnification agreement contained the purported signatures of Thurston Paulk and Betty Paulk. The principal debtor on the second bond was Coffee County Livestock. This application contained the signature of Thurston Paulk in his role as president of Coffee County Livestock and contained the purported signatures of Thurston Paulk, Betty Paulk, and Ashley Paulk.

After the bonds were issued, Paulk Livestock and Coffee County Livestock purchased numerous hogs from defendants Tison Hog Market, Inc.; Gainesville Livestock Market, Inc.; Townsend Livestock Market; South Carolina Farm Bureau Marketing Association; and Georgia Farm Bureau Marketing Association, Inc. When the defendant hog sellers did not receive payment for the hogs, they made claims against American on the surety bonds for the purchase money that they were owed. American conducted an investigation and learned that the bonds' indemnification agreements contained forged signatures of Ashley Paulk and Betty Paulk. American claimed that it would not have issued the bonds had it known that Betty and Ashley Paulk had not agreed to indemnify it, and it declared the bonds rescinded and returned all the premiums.

American then brought an action seeking a declaratory judgment relieving it from liability to the defendants on the ground that the bonds were void under Georgia insurance law due to the fraudulent and material misrepresentations of the bonds' principals. American argued that the principals had forged the signatures of Betty and Ashley Paulk on the indemnification agreements. The district court granted American's motion for summary judgment.

DECISION Summary judgment vacated and remanded for trial.

OPINION Cox, J. *** It is well established under the common law of suretyship that "fraud or misrepresentation practiced by the principal alone on the surety, without any knowledge or participation on the part of the creditor or obligee, in inducing the surety to enter into the suretyship contract will not affect the liability of the surety." [Citations.] From a practical standpoint, this common law treatment of a principal's fraud is the only one that makes sense. A creditor does business with a principal in reliance upon the existence of a bond. The bond provides security for the creditor because normally the creditor would have no way of knowing whether the principal is insolvent or otherwise an unreliable party with which to engage in business. [Citation.] If the creditor's ability to recover on a bond was dependent on the accuracy of the principal's representations to the surety, then the value of the bond to the creditor would be greatly lessened because the creditor would have no way of knowing what representations were made in the procurement of the bond. More importantly for the case at bar, this common law approach *** enables a livestock seller to deal freely with livestock dealers knowing that the required bond will protect them in the event of a default even if the principal hid facts from the surety when obtaining the bond

Instead of applying *** insurance law, however, the district court should have applied Georgia surety law. The surety bonds in this case are surety contracts that are not governed exclusively by the insurance law of Georgia. ***

The Georgia Code contains an entirely separate title that applies to suretyship contracts. [Citation.] The chapter defines a contract of suretyship as one "whereby a person obligates himself to pay the debt of another in consideration of a benefit flowing to the surety ***" [Citation.] This is the commonly understood definition of a surety relationship and describes the situation that we have in the case at bar. The Georgia Code does not contain a statement as to the effect of a principal's fraud on a surety's liability to the creditor. Georgia courts, however, have applied the common law and held that a surety is still liable to a creditor even if the principal commits fraud so long as the creditor does not participate in the fraud. [Citation.] ***

Applying the common law to the case at bar, there is no evidence that the defendants participated in any fraud. The fraud was committed solely by the principals. Under these circumstances, American is not relieved of liability on the bonds.

INTERPRETATION Fraud on the part of the principal debtor does not relieve the surety of its liability to the creditor on a surety bond if the creditor is unaware of such fraud.

ETHICAL QUESTION Is the court's decision fair to the surety? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Should the fraud of the principal debtor relieve the surety of its obligation on the surety bond? Explain.

A surety is not liable if an intended cosurety, as named in the contract instrument, does not sign. A surety may set off his claims against a solvent creditor. Against an insolvent creditor, the surety may use his claim only if the principal debtor is also insolvent.

If a principal debtor and a creditor enter into a binding modification of their contract, a surety who does not assent to such modification may be discharged. The courts vary in their approach to modifications made without the surety's assent. An uncompensated surety (an accommodation surety) is more likely to be discharged for any material modification, even one that does not prejudice his rights. In contrast, when contemplating the discharge of a compensated surety, a number of courts require the alteration to be both material and prejudicial to the surety's interests.

Modifications possibly leading to a surety's discharge include valid and binding extensions of the time of payment unless the creditor expressly reserves his rights against the surety. An extension of time with reservation is construed only as an agreement by the creditor not to sue the principal debtor for the period of the extension. Accordingly, the surety's rights of exoneration, reimbursement, and subrogation are not postponed. Thus, the surety's risk is not changed and he is not discharged.

If the creditor releases or impairs the value of the security, the surety is discharged to the extent of the value of the security released or impaired. Similarly, if the creditor releases a cosurety, the other cosureties are discharged to the extent of the released surety's contributive share. If the creditor reserves his rights against the remaining cosureties, however, the release is considered a promise not to sue. As a result, the remaining cosureties are not discharged.

DEFENSES OF BOTH SURETY AND PRINCIPAL DEBTOR

A number of defenses are available to both the surety and the principal debtor. If the principal debtor's signature on an instrument is forged or if the creditor has exerted fraud or duress on the principal debtor, neither the principal debtor nor the surety is liable. Likewise, if the creditor has fraudulently and materially altered the contract instrument, both the principal debtor and the surety are discharged.

The absence of mutual assent or consideration to support the principal debtor's obligation is a defense for both the principal debtor and the surety. In addition, both may assert as defenses the illegality and the impossibility of performance of the principal debtor's contract.

Payment or performance of the principal debtor's obligation discharges both the principal debtor and the surety. If the principal debtor owes several debts to the

What Price Is "Reasonable" in Terms of Repossession?

FACTS On credit, Jill Carr purchased a $1,000 television set at Ryko Appliance Store. The store's credit policy required Jill to give Ryko a security interest in the television set to secure her payment of the purchase price. Though she did not clearly comprehend the repossession procedures, Jill basically understood the terms; and she signed the credit slip and the security agreement on the reverse side.

Jill's payments to Ryko, $40 per month, were to extend for three years. Jill made the first six payments without a problem, but then, beset with large medical bills, she defaulted on the seventh payment. Her payments up to that point had reduced her principal balance by approximately $180. Ryko exercised its option to repossess the set.

Ryko's standard operating procedure was to offer repossessed sets at a special sale, to take the best price offered, and to make arrangements for the defaulting customer to pay any deficiency between the resale price and the balance due on the original selling price. But Marge Glass, the store manager, saw Jill's set and realized that it was just the type her husband wanted. She also knew that if she paid even a minimal price for the set, Ryko would eventually get the rest of the money from Jill. Thus, Marge paid Ryko $100 for the set and the store proceeded to make arrangements to collect the balance from Jill. Marge stated that $100 was the highest price anyone would have offered for the set and that her actions were, therefore, commercially reasonable.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. Is a store responsible for ensuring a customer's understanding of the nature and consequences of a sales transaction? Why? Why not?
2. Did Marge and Ryko act ethically or legally? Explain. In what ways would Jill's full understanding of the repossession process change your answer?
3. What ethical or social implications does Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code have in this situation?

creditor and makes a payment to the creditor without specifying the debt to which the payment should apply, the creditor is free to apply it to any one of them. For example, Pam owes Charles two debts, one for $5,000 and another for $10,000. Susan is a surety on the $10,000 debt. Pam sends Charles a payment in the amount of $3,500. If Pam directs Charles to apply the payment to the $10,000 debt, Charles must do so. Otherwise, Charles may, if he pleases, apply the payment to the $5,000 debt.

If the creditor releases the principal debtor, the surety is also discharged unless the surety consents to the release of the principal debtor. If the creditor reserves his rights against the surety, however, the surety is not discharged. Such a release with reservation is construed as a promise not to sue, which leaves the surety's rights against the principal debtor unimpaired. Therefore, the surety is not discharged.

The creditor's refusal to accept tender of payment or performance by either the principal debtor or the surety completely discharges the surety. However, the creditor's refusal to accept a tender of payment by the principal debtor does not discharge the principal debtor. Rather, such refusal stops further accrual of interest on the debt and deprives the creditor of court costs on a subsequent suit by him to recover the amount due.

Questions

- Victor sells to Bonnie a refrigerator for $600 payable in monthly installments of $30 for twenty months. Bonnie signs a security agreement granting Victor a security interest in the refrigerator. The refrigerator is installed in the kitchen of Bonnie's apartment. There is no filing of any financing statement. Assume that after Bonnie has made the first three monthly payments:
  - Bonnie moves from her apartment and sells the refrigerator in place to the new occupant for $350 cash. What are the rights of Victor?
  - Bonnie is adjudicated bankrupt, and her trustee in bankruptcy claims the refrigerator. What are the rights of the parties?
- On January 2, Burt asked Logan to loan him money "against my diamond ring." Logan agreed to do so. To guard against intervening liens, Logan received permission to file a financing statement, and Burt and Logan signed a security agreement giving Logan an interest in the ring. Burt also signed a financing statement that Logan properly filed on January 3. On January 4, Burt borrowed money from Tillo, pledging his ring to secure the debt. Tillo took possession of the ring and paid Burt the money on the same day. The next day, January 5, Logan loaned Burt the money under the assumption that Burt still had the ring. Who has priority, Logan or Tillo? Explain.
- Joanna takes a security interest in the equipment in Jason Store and files a financing statement claiming "equipment and all after-acquired equipment." Berkeley later sells Jason Store a cash register, taking a security interest in the register and (a) files nine days after Jason receives the register, or (b) files twenty-five days after Jason receives the register. If Jason fails to pay both Joanna and Berkeley and they foreclose their security interests, who has priority on the cash register?
- Finley Motor Company sells an automobile to Sara and retains a security interest in it. The automobile is insured, and Finley is named beneficiary. Three days after the automobile is totally destroyed in an accident, Sara files a petition in bankruptcy. As between Finley and Sara's trustee in bankruptcy, who is entitled to the insurance proceeds?
- On September 5, Wanda, a widow who occasionally teaches piano and organ in her home, purchased an electric organ from Murphy's music store for $4,800, trading in her old organ for $1,200 and promising in writing to pay the balance at $120 per month and granting to Murphy a security interest in the property in terms consistent with and incorporating provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code. A financing statement covering the transaction was also properly filled out and signed, and Murphy properly filed it. After Wanda failed to make the December or January payments, Murphy went to her home to collect the payments or take the organ. Finding no one home and the door unlocked, he went in and took the organ. Two hours later, Tia, a third party and the present occupant of the house, who had purchased the organ for her own use, stormed into Murphy's store, demanding the return of the organ. She showed Murphy a bill of sale from Wanda to her, dated December 15, that listed the organ and other furnishings in the house.
  - What are the rights of Murphy, Tia, and Wanda?
  - Would your answer change if Murphy had not filed a financing statement? Why?
  - Would your answer change if the organ had been principally used to give lessons?
- On May 1, Lincoln lends Donaldson $200,000 and receives from Donaldson his agreement to pay this amount in two years and takes a security interest in the machinery and equipment in Donaldson's factory. A proper financing statement is filed with respect to the security agreement. On August 1, upon Lincoln's request, Donaldson executes an addendum to the security agreement covering after-acquired machinery and equipment in Donaldson's factory. A second financing statement covering the addendum is filed. In September, Donaldson acquires $50,000 worth of new equipment from Thompson, which Donaldson installs in his factory. In December, Carter, a judgment creditor of Donaldson, causes an attachment to issue against the new equipment. What are the rights of Lincoln, Donaldson, Carter, and Thompson? What can the parties do to best protect themselves?
- Anita bought a television set from Bertrum for her personal use. Bertrum, who was out of security agreement forms, showed Anita a form he had executed with Nathan, another consumer. Anita and Bertrum orally agreed to the terms of the form. Anita subsequently defaulted on payment, and Bertrum sought to repossess the television. (a) Decision? (b) Would the result differ if Bertrum had filed a financing statement? (c) What if Anita subsequently sent Bertrum an e-mail that met all the requirements of an effective security agreement?

8. Aaron bought a television set for personal use from Penny. Aaron properly signed a security agreement and paid Penny $125 down, as their agreement required. Penny did not file, and subsequently Aaron sold the television for $800 to Clark, his neighbor, for use in Clark's hotel lobby.

When Aaron fails to make the January and February payments, may Penny repossess the television from Clark?

  - a. What if, instead of Aaron's selling the television set to Clark, a judgment creditor levied (sought possession) on the television? Who would prevail?
  - b. What if Clark intended to use the television set in his home? Who would prevail?
9. Jones bought a used car from the A-Herts Car Rental System, which regularly sold its used equipment at the end of its fiscal year. First National Bank of Roxboro had previously obtained a perfected security interest in the car based upon its financing of A-Herts's automobiles. Upon A-Herts's failure to pay, First National is seeking to repossess the car from Jones. Does First National have an enforceable security interest in the car against Jones? Explain.
10. Allen, Barker, and Cooper are cosureties on a $750,000 loan by Durham National Bank to Kingston Manufacturing Co., Inc. The maximum liability of the sureties is as follows: Allen—$750,000, Barker—$300,000, and Cooper—$150,000. If Kingston defaults on the entire $750,000 loan, what are the liabilities of Allen, Barker, and Cooper?
11. Peter Diamond owed Carter $500,000 secured by a first mortgage on Diamond's plant and land. Stephens was a surety on this obligation in the amount of $250,000. After Diamond defaulted on the debt, Carter demanded and received payment of $250,000 from Stephens. Carter then foreclosed upon the mortgage and sold the property for $375,000. What rights, if any, does Stephens have in the proceeds from the sale of the property?
12. Paula Daniels purchased an automobile from Carey on credit. At the time of the sale, Scott agreed to be a surety for Paula, who is sixteen years old. The automobile's odometer stated fifty-two thousand miles, but Carey had turned it back from seventy-two thousand miles. Paula refuses to make any payments due on the car. Carey proceeds against Paula and Scott. What defenses, if any, are available to (a) Paula and (b) Scott?
13. Stafford Surety Co. agreed to act as the conditional guarantor of collection on a debt owed by Preston Decker to Cole. Stafford was paid a premium by Preston to serve as surety. Preston defaults on the obligation. What are Cole's rights against Stafford Surety Co.?
14. Campbell loaned Perry Dixon $70,000, which was secured by a possessory security interest in stock owned by Perry. The stock had a market value of $40,000. In addition, Campbell insisted that Perry obtain a surety. For a premium, Sutton Surety Co. agreed to act as a surety for the full amount of the loan. Prior to the due date of the loan, Perry convinced Campbell to return the stock because its value had increased and he wished to sell it to realize the gain. Campbell released the stock and Perry subsequently defaulted. Is Sutton released from his liability?
15. Pamela Darden owed Clark $50,000 on an unsecured loan. On May 1, Pamela approached Clark for an additional loan of $30,000. Clark agreed to make the loan only if Pamela could obtain a surety. On May 5, Simpson agreed to be a surety on the $30,000 loan, which was granted that day. Both loans were due on October 1. On June 15, Pamela sent $10,000 to Clark but did not provide any instructions.
  - a. What are Clark's rights?
  - b. What are Simpson's rights?
16. Patrick Dillon applied for a $100,000 loan from Carlton Savings & Loan. Carlton required him to obtain a surety. Patrick approached Sinclair Surety Co., which insisted that Patrick provide it with a financial statement. Patrick did so, but the statement was materially false. In reliance upon the financial statement and in return for a premium, Sinclair agreed to act as surety. Upon Sinclair's commitment to act as surety, Carlton loaned Patrick the $100,000. After one payment of $4,000, Patrick defaulted. He then filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy. Does Sinclair have any valid defense against Carlton?
17. On June 1, Smith contracted with Martin doing business as Martin Publishing Company to distribute Martin's newspapers and to account for the proceeds. As part of the contract, Smith agreed to furnish Martin a bond in the amount of $10,000 guaranteeing the payment of the proceeds. At the time the contract was executed and the credit extended, the bond was not furnished, and no mention was made as to the prospective sureties. On July 1, Smith signed the bond with Black and Blue signing as sureties. The bond recited the awarding of the contract for distribution of the newspapers as consideration for the bond.

On December 1, payment was due from Smith to Martin the sum of $3,600 under the distributor's contract. Demand for payment was made, but Smith failed to make payment. As a result, Martin brought an appropriate action against Black and Blue to recover the $3,600. What result?
18. Diggitt Construction Company was the low bidder on a well-digging job for the Village of Drytown. On April 15, Diggitt signed a contract with Drytown for the job at a price of $40,000. At the same time, pursuant to the notice of bidding, Diggitt prevailed upon Ace Surety Company to execute a performance bond indemnifying Drytown on the contract. On May 1, after Diggitt had put in three days on the job, the president of the company refigured his bid and realized that if his company were to complete the job it would lose $10,000. Accordingly, Diggitt notified Dry-town that it was canceling the contract, effective immediately. What are the rights and duties of Ace Surety Company?

Case Problems

- 19. Standridge purchased a Chevrolet automobile from Billy Deavers, an agent of Walker Motor Company. According to the sales contract, the balance due after the trade-in allowance was $2,282.50, to be paid in twelve weekly installments. Standridge claims that he was unable to make the second payment and that Billy Deavers orally agreed that he could make two payments the next week. The day after the double payment was due, Standridge still had not paid. That day Ronnie Deavers, Billy's brother, went to Standridge's place of employment to repossess the car, which the Walker Motor contract permitted. Rather than consenting to the repossession, Standridge drove the car to the Walker Motor Company's place of business and tendered the overdue payments. The Deavers refused to accept the late payment and instead demanded the entire unpaid balance. Standridge could not pay it. The Deavers then blocked Standridge's car with another car and told him he could just "walk his ... home." Standridge brought suit, seeking damages for the Deavers's wrongful repossession of his car. The Deavers deny that they granted Standridge permission to make a double payment, that Standridge tendered the double payment, and that they rejected it. They claim that he made no payment and that, therefore, they were entitled to repossess the car. Discuss whether the car was properly repossessed.
- 20. National Acceptance Company loaned Ultra Precision Industries $692,000, and to secure repayment of the loan, Ultra executed a chattel mortgage security agreement on National's behalf on March 7, 2008. National perfected the security interest by timely filing a financing statement. Although the security interest covered specifically described equipment of Ultra, both the security agreement and the financing statement contained an after-acquired property clause that did not refer to any specific equipment.

Later in 2008 and in 2009, Ultra placed three separate orders for machines from Wolf Machinery Company. In each case it was agreed that after the machines had been shipped to Ultra and installed, Ultra would be given an opportunity to test them in operation for a reasonable period. If the machines passed inspection, Wolf would then provide financing that was satisfactory to Ultra and properly filed its financing statement. In all three cases, financing was arranged with Community Bank (Bank) and accepted, and a security interest was given in the machines. Furthermore, in each case a security agreement was entered into, and a financing statement was then filed by the secured parties
- within ten days. Ultra became bankrupt on October 7, 2010. National claimed that its security interest in the after-acquired machines should take priority over those of Wolf and Bank because their interests were not perfected by timely filed financing statements. Discuss who has priority in the disputed collateral.
- 21. Elizabeth Tilleraas received three student loans totaling $35,500 under the Federal Insured Student Loan Program (FISLP) of the Higher Education Act. These loans were secured by three promissory notes executed in favor of Dakota National Bank & Trust Co., Fargo, North Dakota. Under the terms of these student loans, periodic payments were required beginning twelve months after Tilleraas ceased to carry at least one-half of a full-time academic workload at an eligible institution. Her student status terminated on January 28, 2006, and the first installment payment thus became due January 28, 2007. She never made any payment on any of her loans. Under the provisions of the FISLP, the United States assured the lender bank repayment in event of any failure to pay by the borrower. The first payment due on the loans was in "default" on July 27, 2007, one hundred and eighty days after the failure to make the first installment payment. On December 17, 2007, Dakota National Bank & Trust sent notice of its election under the provisions of the loan to accelerate the maturity of the note. The bank demanded payment in full by December 27, 2008. It then filed FISLP insurance claims against the United States on May 6, 2009, and assigned the three Tilleraas notes to the United States on May 10, 2009. The government, in turn, paid the bank's claim in full on July 5, 2009. The government subsequently filed suit against Tilleraas. Discuss whether the United States will prevail.
- 22. New West Fruit Corporation (New West) and Coastal Berry Corporation are both brokers of fresh strawberries. In the second half of 2008, New West's predecessor, Monc's Consolidated Produce, Inc., loaned money and strawberry plants to a group of strawberry growers known as Cooperativa La Paz (La Paz). In September 2008, Monc's and La Paz signed a "Sales and Marketing Agreement" to allow Monc's the exclusive right to market the strawberries grown by La Paz during the 2008–2009 season. The agreement did not mention the advances of money or plants, but did give Monc's a security interest in all crops and proceeds on specified property in the 2008–2009 season. The financing statement was properly signed and filed. Monc's closed down in January 2009, and its assets were assigned to New West. In April, New West learned that La Paz had agreed to market its 2009 crop through Coastal Berry. New West immediately arranged a meeting to advise the Coastal Berry officers of its contract with the growers. New West requested that Coastal Berry either pay New West the amounts owed by the growers or allow New West to market the berries to recover the money. Coastal Berry did not respond. After Coastal Berry began marketing the berries, New West sent letters demanding payment of the proceeds. In August 2009, New West filed suit against Coastal Berry, La Paz, the individual growers, and a berry freezing company asserting that its security interest was valid and that it had duly notified Coastal Berry both through the financing statement on file and through the letters it had sent to Coastal Berry directly. Coastal Berry claimed that the security agreement was not effective because it did not specifically identify the debt (money and plants) being secured. Discuss.

23. James Koontz agreed to purchase a Plymouth Sundance from Chrysler Credit Corporation (Chrysler) in exchange for sixty payments of $185.92. Koontz soon thereafter defaulted and Chrysler notified Koontz that, unless he made the payments, it would repossess the vehicle. Koontz responded by notifying Chrysler that he would make every effort to make up missed payments, that he did not want the car repossessed, and that Chrysler was not to enter his private property to repossess the vehicle. A few weeks later, Chrysler sent the M & M Agency to repossess the vehicle. Koontz, dressed only in his underwear, came outside and yelled, "Don't take it!" The reposessor ignored him and took the car anyway. Koontz did not physically challenge or threaten the reposessor. Discuss whether Chrysler legally repossessed the automobile.

BANKRUPTCY

Always pay; for first or last you must pay your entire debt.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON, 1841

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Explain (a) the requirements for voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy cases, (b) the priorities of creditors' claims, (c) the debtor's exemptions, and (d) the debts that are not dischargeable in bankruptcy.
2. Explain the duties of a trustee and his rights (a) as a lien creditor, (b) to avoid preferential transfers, (c) to avoid fraudulent transfers, and (d) to avoid statutory liens.
3. Explain the procedure followed in distributing the debtor's estate under Chapter 7.
4. Compare the adjustment of debt proceedings under Chapters 11 and 13.
5. Identify and define the nonbankruptcy compromises between debtors and creditors.

A debt is an obligation to pay money owed by a debtor to a creditor. Debts are created daily by countless purchasers of goods at the consumer level; by retailers of goods in buying merchandise from a manufacturer, wholesaler, or distributor; by borrowers of funds from various lending institutions; and through the issuance and sale of debentures, corporate mortgage bonds, and other types of debt securities. Multitudes of business transactions are entered into daily on a credit basis. Commercial activity would be greatly restricted if credit were not readily obtainable or if needed funds were unavailable for lending.

Fortunately, most debts are paid when due, thus justifying the extension of credit and encouraging its continuation. Although defaults may create credit and collection problems, normally the total amount in default represents a very small percentage of the total amount of outstanding indebtedness. Nevertheless, both individuals and corporations encounter financial crises and business misfortune. An accumulation of debts that exceeds total assets may confront an individual as well as a business. Or these debtors might have assets in excess of total indebtedness but in such noncash form that they are unable to pay their debts as they mature. For both businesses and individuals, relief from pressing debt and from the threat of impending lawsuits by creditors is frequently necessary for economic survival.

The conflict between creditor rights and debtor relief has engendered various solutions, such as compromises requiring installment payments to creditors over a period of time during which they agree to withhold legal action. Other voluntary methods include compositions and assignments of assets by a debtor to a trustee or assignee for the benefit of creditors. In addition, creditors sometimes file equity receiverships or insolvency proceedings in a state court, according to statute. Nonetheless, the most adaptable and frequently used method of debtor relief—one that also affords protection to creditors—is a proceeding in a federal court under federal bankruptcy law.

FEDERAL BANKRUPTCY LAW

U.S. bankruptcy law serves a dual purpose: (1) to bring about a quick, equitable distribution of the debtor's property among her creditors and (2) to discharge the debtor from her debts, enabling the debtor to rehabilitate herself and to start afresh. Other purposes are to provide uniform treatment of similarly situated creditors, to preserve existing business relations, and to stabilize commercial usages.

The U.S. Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (2005 Act) contains the most extensive amendments to federal bankruptcy law since 1978. The U.S. Bankruptcy Code consists of nine chapters: eight odd-numbered chapters and one even-numbered chapter. Chapters 7, 9, 11, 12, and 13 provide five different types of proceedings; Chapters 1, 3, and 5 apply to those five proceedings unless otherwise specified. Straight, or ordinary, bankruptcy (Chapter 7) provides for the liquidation of the debtor's property, whereas the other proceedings provide for the reorganization and adjustment of the debtor's debts and, in the case of a business debtor, the continuance of the debtor's business. In reorganization cases, the creditors usually look to the debtor's future earnings, whereas in liquidation cases, the creditors look to the debtor's property at the commencement of the bankruptcy proceeding. Chapters 7, 11, 12, and 13 have provisions governing transfer of a case under that chapter to another chapter. The 2005 Act added Chapter 15 to the Bankruptcy Code for cross-border insolvency cases. Chapter 1 and certain sections of Chapters 3 and 5 apply to proceedings under Chapter 15.

1. Chapter 7 applies to all debtors, with the exception of railroads, insurance companies, banks, savings and loan associations, homestead associations, licensed small business investment companies, and credit unions. Moreover, Chapter 7 has special provisions for liquidating the estates of stockbrokers and commodity brokers. (Historically, approximately 70 percent of bankruptcies have been filed under Chapter 7.) The 2005 Act, however, imposed a means test limiting individual debtors' access to Chapter 7, which has forced more debtors to file under Chapter 13. Since 2005, approximately 60 percent of bankruptcies have been filed under Chapter 7.

2. Chapter 11 applies to railroads and any person who may be a debtor under Chapter 7 (except a stockbroker or a commodity broker). (Less than 1 percent of bankruptcies are filed under Chapter 11.)
3. Chapter 9 applies only to municipalities that are generally authorized to be debtors under that chapter, that are insolvent, and that desire to effect plans to adjust their debts.
4. Chapter 12 applies to individuals, or individuals and their spouses, engaged in farming if 50 percent of their gross income is from farming, their aggregate debts do not exceed $3,544,525, and at least 50 percent of their debts arise from farming operations. (Less than one-tenth of 1 percent of bankruptcies are filed under Chapter 12.) Corporations or partnerships may also qualify for Chapter 12. The 2005 Act made Chapter 12 permanent and extended its coverage to certain family fishermen if 50 percent of their gross income is from commercial fishing, their aggregate debts do not exceed $1,642,500, and at least 80 percent of their debts arise out of commercial fishing operations.
5. Chapter 13 applies to individuals with regular income who owe liquidated unsecured debts of less than $336,900 and secured debts of less than $1,010,650. (Historically, approximately 30 percent of bankruptcies have been filed under Chapter 13.) The 2005 Act, however, imposed a means test limiting individual debtors' access to Chapter 7, which has forced more debtors to file under Chapter 13. Since 2005, approximately 40 percent of bankruptcies have been filed under Chapter 13.
6. Chapter 15 covers cross-border (transnational) insolvencies and incorporates the Model Law on Cross-Border Insolvency, promulgated by the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL). These changes are intended to make cross-border filings easier to accomplish and to provide greater predictability. Chapter 15 encourages cooperation between the United States and foreign countries with respect to transnational insolvency cases.

This text will not further cover Chapters 9, 12, and 15.

The 1994 amendments to the Bankruptcy Act require that every three years, beginning in 1998, the U.S. Judicial Conference adjust for inflation the dollar amounts of certain provisions including eligibility for Chapters 12 and 13, requirements for filing involuntary cases, priorities, exemptions, and exceptions to discharge.

The Bankruptcy Code grants to U.S. District Courts original and exclusive jurisdiction over all bankruptcy cases and original, but not exclusive, jurisdiction over civil proceedings arising under bankruptcy cases. The district court must, however, abstain from related matters that, except for their relationship to bankruptcy, could not have been brought in a federal court. The district court in which a bankruptcy case is commenced has exclusive jurisdiction over all of the debtor's property. In addition, within each federal district court is established a bankruptcy court staffed by bankruptcy judges. Bankruptcy courts are authorized to hear certain matters specified by the Bankruptcy Code and to enter appropriate orders and judgments subject to review by the district court or, when established, by a panel of three bankruptcy judges. The federal circuit court of appeals has jurisdiction over appeals from the district court or panel. In all other matters, unless the parties agree otherwise, only the district court may issue a final order or judgment based on proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law submitted to the court by the bankruptcy judge.

The U.S. trustees are government officials appointed by the U.S. Attorney General with administrative responsibilities in bankruptcy cases in almost all of the districts. For example, the U.S. trustee selects bankruptcy trustees and, in Chapter 11 proceedings, appoints the members of the unsecured creditors' committee. The 2005 Act gives the U.S. trustees added responsibilities in a number of areas.

Case Administration—Chapter 3

Chapter 3 of the Bankruptcy Code contains provisions dealing with the commencement of a case in bankruptcy, the meetings of creditors, the officers who administer the case, and the officers' administrative powers.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE CASE

The filing of a voluntary or involuntary petition commences a bankruptcy case thereby beginning the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court and the operation of the bankruptcy laws.

Voluntary Petitions More than 99 percent of all bankruptcy petitions are filed voluntarily. Any person eligible to be a debtor under a given bankruptcy proceeding may file a voluntary petition under that chapter and need not be insolvent to do so. The commencement of a voluntary case constitutes an automatic order for relief. The petition must include a list of all creditors (secured and unsecured), a list of all property the debtor owns, a list of property that the debtor claims is exempt, and a statement of the debtor's affairs.

The 2005 Act added a requirement that all individual debtors receive credit counseling from an approved non-profit budget and credit counseling agency within the one-hundred-and-eighty-day period before filing the petition. This requirement does not apply to a debtor who (1) is exempted by the court or (2) resides in a district for which the U.S. trustee or the bankruptcy administrator determines that approved nonprofit budget and credit counseling agencies are not reasonably able to provide adequate services to the additional individuals who would seek required credit counseling. The role of the credit counseling agencies is to analyze the client's current financial condition, the factors that caused the financial distress, and how the client can develop a plan to respond to these problems.

Involuntary Petitions An involuntary petition in bankruptcy may be filed only under Chapter 7 (liquidation) or Chapter 11 (reorganization). It may be filed (1) by three or more creditors who have undisputed unsecured claims that total $13,475 or more or (2) if the debtor has fewer than twelve creditors, by one or more creditors whose total undisputed unsecured claims equal $13,475 or more. An involuntary petition may not be filed against a farmer or against a banking, insurance, or nonprofit corporation.

Like a voluntary petition, the filing of an involuntary petition commences a case, but unlike a voluntary petition, it does not operate as an order for relief. The debtor has the right to answer. If the debtor does not timely contest the involuntary petition, the court will enter an order for relief against the debtor. However, if the debtor timely opposes the petition, the court may enter an order of relief only (1) if the debtor is generally not paying his debts as they become due or (2) if, within one hundred and twenty days before the filing of the petition, a custodian, assignee, or general receiver was appointed or took possession of substantially all of the debtor's property.

DISMISSAL

The court may dismiss a Chapter 7 case for cause after notice and a hearing. In a case filed by an individual debtor whose debts are primarily consumer debts, the court may dismiss the case or, with the debtor's consent, convert the case to one under Chapter 11 or 13, if the court finds that granting relief would be an abuse of the provisions of Chapter 7. A court can find abuse in one of two ways: (1) on general grounds based on whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith or the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse or (2) an un rebutted presumption of abuse based on the means test established by the 2005 Act. We will discuss the means test later in this chapter.

Under Chapter 11, the court may dismiss a case for cause after notice and a hearing. Under Chapter 13, the debtor has an absolute right to have his case dismissed. Under Chapter 13, if a motion to dismiss is filed by an interested party other than the debtor, the court may dismiss the case only for cause after notice and a hearing.

AUTOMATIC STAYS

The filing of a voluntary or involuntary petition operates as a stay against (i.e., it prevents) attempts by creditors to begin or continue to recover claims against the debtor, to enforce judgments against the debtor, or to create or enforce liens against property of the debtor. This stay applies to both secured and unsecured creditors, although a secured creditor may petition the court to terminate the stay as to her security on showing that she lacks adequate protection in the secured property. An automatic stay ends when the bankruptcy case is closed or dismissed or when the debtor receives a discharge.

Practical Advice

If you file a bankruptcy petition, you are protected from creditors' pursuing their claims against you except through the bankruptcy proceeding; this may be advantageous in that it requires all claims to be heard in one court at one time.

TRUSTEES

A trustee is the representative of an estate and has the capacity to sue and be sued on behalf of the estate. In proceedings under Chapter 7, trustees are selected by a vote of the creditors. The 1994 amendments allow the creditors to elect a trustee in a Chapter 11 proceeding if the court orders the appointment of a trustee for cause. In Chapter 13 the trustee is appointed. Responsible, under Chapter 7, for collecting, liquidating, and distributing the debtor's estate, the trustee has, among others, the following duties and powers: (1) collecting the property of the estate; (2) challenging certain transfers of property of the estate; (3) using, selling, or leasing property of the estate; (4) depositing or investing money of the estate; (5) employing attorneys, accountants, appraisers, or auctioneers; (6) assuming or rejecting any executory contract or unexpired lease of the debtor; (7) objecting to creditors' claims that are improper; and (8) opposing, if advisable, the debtor's discharge. Trustees under Chapters 11 and 13 perform some but not all of the duties of a Chapter 7 trustee.

MEETINGS OF CREDITORS

Within a reasonable time after relief is ordered, a meeting of creditors must be held. Although the court may not attend this meeting, the debtor must appear and submit to an examination of his financial situation by the creditors and the trustee. In a proceeding under Chapter 7, qualified creditors at this meeting elect a permanent trustee.

Creditors, the Debtor, and the Estate—Chapter 5

CREDITORS

The Bankruptcy Code defines a creditor as any entity having a claim against the debtor that arose at the time of or before the order for relief. A claim is a right to payment.

Proofs of Claim Creditors who wish to participate in the distribution of the debtor's estate may file a proof of claim. If a creditor does not do so in a timely manner, the debtor or trustee may file a proof of such claim. By doing this, the debtor may prevent a claim from becoming non-dischargeable. Filed claims are allowed unless a party who has an interest objects. If an objection is made, the court determines, after a hearing, the amount and validity of the claim. The court will not allow any claim that (1) is unenforceable against the debtor or her property, (2) is for unmatured interest, (3) may be offset against a debt owing the debtor, or (4) is for insider or attorney services in excess of the reasonable value of such services. An insider includes a relative or general partner of a debtor, as well as a partnership in which the debtor is a general partner or a corporation of which the debtor is a director, officer, or person in control.

Practical Advice

If you are a debtor in a bankruptcy proceeding, file a proof of claim for any creditor who does not file on her own. Such a filing may enable you to receive a discharge from that claim.

Secured and Unsecured Claims A lien is a charge or interest in property to secure payment of an obligation and must be satisfied before the property is available to satisfy the claims of unsecured creditors. An allowed claim of a creditor who has a lien on property of the estate is a secured claim to the extent of the value of the creditor's interest in the property. The creditor's claim is unsecured to the extent of the difference between the value of his secured interest and the allowed amount of his claim. Thus, if Alice has an allowed claim of $5,000 against the estate of debtor Bart and has a security interest in property of the estate that is valued at $3,000, Alice has a secured claim in the amount of $3,000 and an unsecured claim for $2,000.

A lien or secured claim can arise by agreement, judicial proceeding, common law, or statute. Consensual security interests in personal property are governed by Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) and are discussed in Chapter 38. Consensual security interests in real property, called mortgages or deeds of trust, are covered in Chapter 50. A judicial lien is obtained by a judgment, a levy, or some other legal or equitable process. The common law grants to certain creditors, including innkeepers and common carriers, a possessory lien on property of their debtors that is in creditor's possession or on their premises. Finally, a number of federal and state statutes grant liens to specified creditors.

Priority of Claims After secured claims have been satisfied, the remaining assets are distributed among creditors with unsecured claims. Certain classes of unsecured claims, however, have a priority, which means that they must be paid in full before any distribution is made to claims of lesser rank. Each claimant within a priority class shares pro rata if the assets are insufficient to satisfy all claims in that class. The claims having a priority and the order of their priority are as follows:

1. Domestic support obligations (debts owed to a spouse, former spouse, or child of the debtor in the nature of alimony, maintenance, or support) subject to the expenses of a trustee in administering assets that otherwise can be used to pay support obligation;
2. Expenses of administration of the debtor's estate, including the filing fees paid by creditors in involuntary cases, the expenses of creditors in recovering concealed assets for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate, the trustee's necessary expenses, and reasonable compensation to receivers, trustees, and their attorneys, as allowed by the court;
3. Unsecured claims in an involuntary case arising in the ordinary course of the debtor's business after the commencement of the case but before the earlier of either the appointment of the trustee or the entering of the order for relief (such claimants are referred to as "gap" creditors);
4. Allowed, unsecured claims up to $10,950 for wages, salaries, or commissions earned within one hundred and eighty days before the filing of the petition or before the date on which the debtor's business ceases, whichever comes first;
5. Allowed, unsecured claims for contributions to employee benefit plans arising from services rendered within one hundred and eighty days before the filing of the petition or the cessation of the debtor's business, whichever occurs first, but limited to $10,950 multiplied by the number of employees covered by the plan, less the aggregate amount paid to such employees under number 3 above;

6. Allowed, unsecured claims up to $5,400 for grain or fish producers against a storage facility;
7. Allowed, unsecured claims up to $2,425 for consumer deposits; that is, moneys deposited in connection with the purchase, lease, or rental of property or the purchase of services for personal, family, or household use;
8. Specified income, property, employment, or excise taxes owed to governmental units;
9. Allowed claims for death or personal injuries resulting from the debtor's operation of a motor vehicle or vessel while legally intoxicated from using alcohol, a drug, or other substance.

After creditors with secured claims and creditors with claims having a priority have been satisfied, creditors with allowed, unsecured claims share proportionately in any remaining assets.

Subordination of Claims A subordination agreement is enforceable under the Bankruptcy Code to the same extent that it is enforceable under nonbankruptcy law. In addition to statutory and contract priorities, the bankruptcy court itself can, at its discretion in proper cases, apply equitable priorities. The court accomplishes this through the doctrine of subordination of claims, whereby, assuming two claims of equal statutory priority, the court declares that one claim must be paid in full before the other claim can be paid anything. Bankruptcy courts apply subordination when allowing a claim in full, such as the inflated salary claims of officers in a closely held corporation, would be unfair and inequitable to other creditors. In such cases, the court does not disallow the claim but merely orders that it be paid after all other claims are paid in full. For example, the court may subordinate the claim of a parent corporation against its bankrupt subsidiary to the claims of the subsidiary's other creditors if the parent has so mismanaged the subsidiary to the detriment of its innocent creditors that this unconscionable conduct precludes the parent from seeking the court's aid.

DEBTORS

As previously indicated, the purpose of the Bankruptcy Code is to bring about an equitable distribution of the debtor's assets and to provide him a discharge. Accordingly, the Code explicitly subjects the debtor to specified duties, while exempting some of his property and discharging most of his debts.

Debtor's Duties Under the Bankruptcy Code, the debtor must file a list of creditors, a schedule of assets and liabilities, a schedule of current income and expenditures, and a statement of her financial affairs. In any case in which a trustee is serving, the debtor must cooperate with the trustee and surrender to the trustee all property of the estate and all records relating to such property.

Debtor's Exemptions The Bankruptcy Code exempts specified property of an individual debtor from bankruptcy proceedings, including the following: (1) up to $20,200 in equity in property used as a residence or burial plot; (2) up to $3,225 in equity in one motor vehicle; (3) up to $525 for any particular item of household furnishings, household goods, wearing apparel, appliances, books, animals, crops, or musical instruments that are primarily for personal, family, or household use with an aggregate limitation of $10,775; (4) up to $1,350 in jewelry; (5) any property up to $1,075 plus up to $10,125 of any unused amount of the first exemption; (6) up to $2,025 in implements, professional books, or tools of the debtor's trade; (7) unmaturing life insurance contracts owned by the debtor, other than a credit life insurance contract; (8) professionally prescribed health aids; (9) social security, veteran's, and disability benefits; (10) unemployment compensation; (11) alimony and support payments, including child support; (12) payments from pension, profit-sharing, and annuity plans; (13) tax-exempt retirement funds; and (14) payments from an award under a crime victim's reparation law, a wrongful death award, and up to $20,200, not including compensation for pain and suffering or for actual pecuniary loss, from a personal injury award. In addition, the debtor may avoid judicial liens on any exempt property and nonpossessory, nonpurchase money security interests on certain household goods, tools of the trade, and professionally prescribed health aids.

The debtor has the option of using either the exemptions provided by the Bankruptcy Code or those available under state law. Nevertheless, a state may, by specific legislative action, limit its citizens to the exemptions provided by state law. More than three-quarters of the states have enacted such legislation. The 2005 Act specifies that a debtor's exemption is governed by the law of the state where the debtor was domiciled for 730 days immediately before filing. If the debtor did not maintain a domicile in a single state for the seven-hundred-and-thirty-day period, then the governing law is of the state where the debtor was domiciled for one hundred and eighty days immediately preceding the seven-hundred-and-thirty-day period (or for a longer portion of such one-hundred-and-eighty-day period than in any other state).

Whether or not federal or state exemptions apply, the 2005 Act provides that tax-exempt retirement accounts are exempt. Individual retirement accounts (IRAs) are subject to a $1,095,000 cap periodically adjusted for inflation. Nevertheless, the 2005 Act makes exempt property liable for nondischargeable domestic support obligations.

The 2005 Act also imposes limits on the use of state homestead exemptions. First, to the extent that the homestead was obtained through fraudulent conversion of non-exempt assets during the ten-year period before filing the petition, the exemption is reduced by that amount. Second, regardless of the level of the state exemption, a debtor may only exempt up to $136,875 of an interest in a homestead that was acquired during the 1,215-day period prior to the filing, but this limitation does not apply to any equity that has been transferred from the debtor's principal residence acquired more than 1,215 days before filing to the debtor's current principal residence if both residences are located in the same state. Third, a debtor may not exempt more than $136,875 if (1) the debtor has been convicted of a felony which under the circumstances demonstrates that the filing of the case was an abuse of the Bankruptcy Code or (2) the debtor owes a debt arising from (a) any violation of state or federal securities laws; (b) fraud, deceit, or manipulation in a fiduciary capacity or in connection with the purchase or sale of securities registered under the Securities Exchange Act of 1934; or (c) any criminal act, intentional tort, or willful or reckless misconduct that caused serious physical injury or death to another individual in the preceding five years. The $136,875 limitation is to be adjusted periodically for inflation.

Practical Advice

If you intend to enter bankruptcy, determine what property is exempt from the debtor's estate in your state and take appropriate action.

Discharge Discharge relieves the debtor from liability for all his dischargeable debts. A discharge of a debt voids any judgment obtained at any time concerning that debt and operates as an injunction against the commencement or continuation of any action to recover it.

No private employer may terminate the employment of, or discriminate with respect to employment against, an individual who is or has been a debtor under the Bankruptcy Code solely because such debtor (1) is or has been such a debtor; (2) has been insolvent before the commencement of a case or during the case; or (3) has not paid a debt that is dischargeable in a case under the Bankruptcy Code.

A reaffirmation agreement between a debtor and a creditor permitting the creditor to enforce a discharged debt is enforceable to the extent state law permits but only if (1) the agreement was made before the discharge has been granted; (2) the debtor received the required disclosures, which must be written, clear, and conspicuous, at or before the time at which the debtor signed the agreement; (3) the agreement has been filed with the court, accompanied, if applicable, by a declaration or an affidavit of the attorney who represented the debtor during the course of negotiating the agreement, which states that such agreement represents a fully informed and voluntary agreement by the debtor and imposes no undue hardship on her; (4) the debtor has not rescinded the agreement at any time prior to discharge or within sixty days after the agreement is filed with the court, whichever occurs later; (5) the court has informed a debtor who is an individual that he is not required to enter into such an agreement and has explained the legal effect of the agreement; and (6) in a case concerning an individual who was not represented by an attorney during the course of negotiating the agreement, the court has approved such agreement as imposing no undue hardship on the debtor and being in her best interests.

The Bankruptcy Code provides that certain debts of an individual are not dischargeable in bankruptcy. This provision applies to individuals receiving discharges under Chapters 7, 11, and, as discussed later in this chapter, the “hardship discharge” provision of Chapter 13. (The 2005 Act makes most of these apply to the standard discharge provision of Chapter 13.) The nondischargeable debts are

1. Certain taxes and customs duties and debt incurred to pay such taxes or custom duties
2. Legal liabilities resulting from obtaining money, property, or services by false pretenses, false representations, or actual fraud
3. Legal liability for willful and malicious injuries to the person or property of another
4. Domestic support obligations and property settlements arising from divorce or separation proceedings
5. Debts not scheduled, unless the creditor knew of the bankruptcy
6. Debts the debtor created by fraud or embezzlement while acting in a fiduciary capacity
7. Student loans unless excluding the debt from discharge would impose undue hardship
8. Debts that were or could have been listed in a previous bankruptcy in which the debtor waived or was denied a discharge
9. Consumer debts for luxury goods or services in excess of $550 per creditor, if incurred by an individual debtor on or within ninety days before the order for relief, are presumed to be nondischargeable
10. Cash advances aggregating more than $825 obtained by an individual debtor under an open-ended credit plan within seventy days before the order for relief are presumed to be nondischargeable

11. Liability for death or personal injury based upon the debtor’s operation of a motor vehicle, vessel, or aircraft while legally intoxicated
12. Fines, penalties, or forfeitures owed to a governmental entity
13. Certain debts incurred for violations of securities fraud law (This provision was added by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.)

The following illustrates the operation of discharge. Donaldson files a petition in bankruptcy. Donaldson owes Anders $1,500, Boynton $2,500, and Conroy $3,000. Assume that Anders’s claim is not dischargeable in bankruptcy, while Boynton’s and Conroy’s are. Anders receives $180 from the liquidation of Donaldson’s bankruptcy estate, Boynton receives $300, and Conroy receives $360. If Donaldson receives a bankruptcy discharge, Boynton and Conroy will be precluded from pursuing Donaldson for the remainder of their claims ($2,200 and $2,640, respectively). Anders, on the other hand, because his debt is not dischargeable, may pursue Donaldson for the remaining $1,320, subject to the applicable statute of limitations. If Donaldson does not receive a discharge, Anders, Boynton, and Conroy may all pursue Donaldson for the unpaid portions of their claims.

THE ESTATE

The commencement of a bankruptcy case creates an estate, which is treated as a separate legal entity, distinct from the debtor. The estate consists of all legal and equitable interests of the debtor in nonexempt property at that time. The estate also includes property that the debtor acquires, within one hundred and eighty days after the filing of the petition, by inheritance, by a property settlement, by divorce decree, or as a beneficiary of a life insurance policy. In addition, the estate includes proceeds, rents, and profits from property of the estate and any interest in property that the estate acquires after the case commences. The 2005 Act excludes from the estate savings for postsecondary education through education IRAs and 529 plans if certain criteria are met. Finally, the estate includes property that the trustee recovers under her powers (1) as a lien creditor, (2) to avoid voidable preferences, (3) to avoid fraudulent transfers, and (4) to avoid statutory liens. Although in a Chapter 7 case the estate does not include earnings from services an individual debtor performs after the case commences, it does include, in a Chapter 11 or 13 case, wages an individual debtor earns and property she acquires after the case commences.

Trustee as Lien Creditor When the case commences, the trustee gains the rights and powers of any creditor with a judicial lien against the debtor that is returned unsatisfied, whether such a creditor exists or not. The trustee is made an ideal creditor possessing every right and power conferred by the law of the state on its most favored creditor who has acquired a lien by legal or equitable proceedings. Because the trustee assumes the rights and powers of a purely hypothetical lien creditor, she need not locate an actual existing lien creditor.

Thus, under the UCC and the Bankruptcy Code, the trustee, as a hypothetical lien creditor, has priority over a creditor with a security interest that was not perfected when the bankruptcy petition was filed. A creditor with a purchase money security interest who files within the grace period allowed under state law, which in most states is twenty days after the debtor receives the collateral, however, will defeat the trustee, even if the petition is gap-filed before the creditor perfects and after the security interest is created. For example, Donald borrows $5,000 from Cathy on September 1 and gives her a security interest in the equipment he purchases with the borrowed funds. On October 3, before Cathy perfects her security interest, Donald files for bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy can invalidate Cathy's security interest because it was unperfected when the bankruptcy petition was filed. Cathy would be able to assert a claim as an unsecured creditor. If, however, Donald had filed for bankruptcy on September 18 and Cathy had perfected the security interest on September 19, Cathy would prevail because she perfected her purchase money security interest within twenty days after Donald received the equipment.

Voidable Preferences The Bankruptcy Code invalidates certain preferential transfers from the debtor to favored creditors before the date of bankruptcy. A creditor who has received a transfer invalidated as preferential may still make a claim for the unpaid debt, but the property he received under the preferential transfer becomes a part of the debtor's estate to be shared by all creditors. The trustee may recover any transfer of the debtor's property (1) to or for the benefit of a creditor; (2) for or on account of an antecedent debt the debtor owed before the transfer was made; (3) made while the debtor was insolvent; (4) made on or within ninety days before the date of the filing of the petition or, if the creditor was an "insider" (as defined earlier), within one year of the date of the filing of the petition; and (5) that enables such creditor to receive more than he would have received under Chapter 7.

A transfer is any means, direct or indirect, voluntary or involuntary, of disposing of property or an interest in property, including the retention of title as a security interest. The Bankruptcy Code presumes that the debtor has been insolvent on and during the ninety days immediately preceding the date of the filing of the petition. Insolvency is a financial condition such that the sum of one's debts exceeds the sum of all one's property at fair valuation.

For example, on March 3, David borrows $15,000 from Carla, promising to repay the loan on April 3. David repays Carla on April 3. Then, on June 1, David files a petition in bankruptcy. His assets are sufficient to pay general creditors only $0.40 on the dollar. David's repayment of the loan is a voidable preference, which the trustee may recover from Carla. The transfer (repayment) on April 3 (1) was to a creditor (Carla); (2) was on account of an antecedent debt (the $15,000 loan made on March 3); (3) was made while the debtor was insolvent (the debtor is presumed insolvent for the ninety days preceding the filing of the bankruptcy petition—June 1); (4) was made within ninety days of bankruptcy (April 3 is less than ninety days before June 1); and (5) enabled the creditor to receive more than she would have received under Chapter 7 (Carla received $15,000; she would have received  $0.40 \times $15,000 = $6,000$  in bankruptcy). After returning the property to the trustee, Carla would have an unsecured claim of $15,000 against David's estate in bankruptcy, for which she would receive $6,000.

Consider another example. On April 16, Debra buys and receives merchandise from Stuart and gives him a security interest in the goods for the unpaid price of $20,000. On May 25, Stuart files a financing statement. On August 1, Debra files a petition for bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy may avoid the perfected security interest as a preferential transfer. (1) The transfer of the perfected security interest on May 25 was to benefit a creditor (Stuart); (2) the transfer was on account of an antecedent debt (the $20,000 owed from the sale of the merchandise); (3) the debtor was insolvent at the time (the debtor's insolvency is presumed for the ninety days preceding the filing of the bankruptcy petition—August 1); (4) the transfer was made within ninety days of bankruptcy (May 25 is less than ninety days before August 1); and (5) the transfer enabled the creditor to receive more than he would have received in bankruptcy (on his secured claim, Stuart would recover more than he would on an unsecured claim).

Nevertheless, not all transfers made within ninety days of bankruptcy are voidable. The Bankruptcy Code makes exceptions for certain prebankruptcy transfers, including

1. Exchanges for new value. If, for example, within ninety days before the petition is filed, the debtor purchases an automobile for $9,000, this transfer of property (i.e., the $9,000) is not voidable because it was not made for an antecedent debt but as a substantially contemporaneous exchange for new value.

2. Enabling security interests. If the creditor gives the debtor new value that the debtor uses to acquire property in which he grants the creditor a security interest, the security interest is not voidable if the creditor perfects it within thirty days after the debtor receives possession of the property. For example, if within ninety days of the filing of the petition, the debtor purchases a refrigerator on credit and grants the seller or lender a security interest in the refrigerator, the transfer of that interest is not voidable if the secured party perfects within thirty days after the debtor receives possession of the property.
3. Payments in ordinary course. The trustee may not avoid a transfer in payment of a debt incurred in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the debtor and the transferee and either (a) made in the ordinary course of business or financial affairs of the debtor and transferee or (b) made according to ordinary business terms.
4. Consumer debts. If the debtor is an individual whose debts are primarily consumer debts, the trustee may not avoid any transfer of property valued at less than $600.
5. Nonconsumer debts. In a case filed by a debtor whose debts are not primarily consumer debts, the trustee may not avoid any transfer of property valued at less than $5,475.
6. Domestic support obligations. The trustee may not avoid any transfer that is a bona fide payment of a debt for a domestic support obligation.

Fraudulent Transfers The trustee may avoid fraudulent transfers made on or within two years before the date of the filing of the petition. One type of fraudulent transfer consists of the debtor's transferring property with the actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud any of her creditors. Another consists of the debtor's transferring property for less than a reasonably equivalent consideration when she is insolvent or when the transfer would make her so. For example, Carol, who is in debt, transfers title to her house to Wallace, her father, without any payment by Wallace to Carol and with the understanding that when the house is no longer in danger of seizure by creditors, Wallace will reconvey it to Carol. Carol's transfer of the house is a fraudulent transfer. The 2005 Act specifies that a fraudulent transfer includes a payment to an insider under an employment contract that is not in the ordinary course of business. A 1998 amendment to the Bankruptcy Code provides that a transfer of a charitable contribution to a qualified religious or charitable entity or organization will not be considered a fraudulent transfer if the amount of that contribution does not exceed 15 percent of the gross annual income of the debtor for the year in which the transfer is made. Transfers that exceed 15 percent are protected if they are "consistent with the practices of the debtor in making charitable contributions."

In addition, the trustee may avoid transfers of the debtor's property if the transfer is voidable under state law by a creditor with an allowable, unsecured claim. This section allows a trustee to avoid transfers that violate state fraudulent conveyance statutes which make it illegal to transfer property to another party in order to defer, hinder, or defraud creditors. These statutes generally provide a three- to six-year limitations period, which the trustee can utilize. At least forty-three states have adopted the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act, which has a four-year statute of limitations.

Statutory Liens A statutory lien arises solely by force of a statute and does not include a security interest or judicial lien. The trustee may avoid a statutory lien on property of the debtor if the lien (1) first becomes effective when the debtor becomes insolvent, (2) is not perfected or enforceable against a bona fide purchaser on the date the petition was filed, or (3) is for rent.

Liquidation—Chapter 7

To accomplish its dual goals of distributing the debtor's property fairly and providing the debtor with a fresh start, the Bankruptcy Code has established two approaches: liquidation and adjustment of debts. Chapter 7 uses liquidation, whereas Chapters 11 and 13, discussed later, use the adjustment of debts. Liquidation involves terminating the business of the debtor, distributing his nonexempt assets, and, usually, discharging all his dischargeable debts.

PROCEEDINGS

Proceedings under Chapter 7 apply to all debtors except railroads, insurance companies, banks, savings and loan associations, homestead associations, and credit unions. A petition commencing a case under Chapter 7 may be either voluntary or involuntary. After the order for relief, an interim trustee is appointed, who serves until the creditors select a permanent trustee. If the creditors do not elect a trustee, the interim trustee becomes the permanent trustee. Under Chapter 7, the trustee collects and reduces to money the property of the estate; accounts for all property received; investigates the financial affairs of the debtor; examines and, if appropriate, challenges proofs of claims; opposes, if advisable, the discharge of the debtor; and makes a final report of the administration of the estate.

The creditors also may elect a committee of not fewer than three and not more than eleven unsecured creditors to consult with the trustee, to make recommendations to him, and to submit questions to the court.

CONVERSION

The debtor may convert a case under Chapter 7 to Chapter 11 or 13; however any waiver of this right is unenforceable. Moreover, on request of a party in interest and after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under Chapter 7 to Chapter 11. The court may also convert a case under Chapter 7 to Chapter 13, but this can occur only upon the debtor's request. Any conversion to another chapter can only occur if the debtor may also be a debtor under that chapter.

MARRAMA V. CITIZENS BANK

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, 2007
549 U.S. 365, 127 S. CT. 1105, 166 L. ED. 2D 956

<http://www.supremecourtus.gov/opinions/06pdf/05-996.pdf>

FACTS Robert Marrama filed a voluntary bankruptcy petition under Chapter 7. In the filing, Marrama made a number of statements about his principal asset, a house in Maine, that were misleading or inaccurate. He reported that he was the sole beneficiary of the trust that owned the property and he listed its value as zero. He also denied that he had transferred any property other than in the ordinary course of business during the year preceding the filing of his petition. In fact, the Maine property had substantial value, and Marrama had transferred it into the newly created trust for no consideration seven months prior to filing his petition. Marrama later admitted that the purpose of the transfer was to protect the property from his creditors.

The trustee stated that he intended to recover the Maine property as an asset of the estate. Thereafter, Marrama sought to convert to Chapter 13, but both the trustee and Marrama's principal creditor objected, contending that the request to convert was made in bad faith and would constitute an abuse of the bankruptcy process.

The bankruptcy judge rejected the debtor's arguments, ruled that the facts established a "bad faith" case, and denied the request for conversion. Marrama's principal argument on appeal to the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the First Circuit was that he had an absolute right to convert his case from Chapter 7 to Chapter 13 under the language of Section 706(a) of the Code. The panel affirmed the decision of the bankruptcy court and the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit affirmed this ruling. The Supreme Court granted certiorari.

DECISION The judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

OPINION Stevens, J. The principal purpose of the Bankruptcy Code is to grant a "fresh start" to the "honest but unfortunate debtor." Both Chapter 7 and Chapter 13 of the Code permit an insolvent individual to discharge certain unpaid debts toward that end. Chapter 7 authorizes a discharge of prepetition debts following the liquidation of the debtor's assets by a bankruptcy trustee, who then distributes the proceeds to creditors. Chapter 13 authorizes an individual with regular income to obtain a discharge after the successful completion of a payment plan approved by the bankruptcy court. Under Chapter 7 the debtor's non-exempt assets are controlled by the bankruptcy trustee; under Chapter 13 the debtor retains possession of his property. A proceeding that is commenced under Chapter 7 may be converted to a Chapter 13 proceeding and vice versa. §§ 706(a), 1307(a) and (c).

An issue that has arisen with disturbing frequency is whether a debtor who acts in bad faith prior to, or in the course of, filing a Chapter 13 petition by, for example, fraudulently concealing significant assets, thereby forfeits his right to obtain Chapter 13 relief. The issue may arise at the outset of a Chapter 13 case in response to a motion by creditors or by the United States trustee either to dismiss the case or to convert it to Chapter 7, see § 1307(c). It also may arise in a Chapter 7 case when a debtor files a motion under § 706(a) to convert to Chapter 13. In the former context, despite the absence of any statutory provision specifically addressing the issue, the federal courts are virtually unanimous that prepetition bad-faith conduct may cause a forfeiture of any right to proceed with a Chapter 13 case. In the latter context, however, some courts have suggested that even a bad-faith debtor has an absolute right to convert at least one Chapter 7 proceeding into a Chapter 13 case even though the case will thereafter be dismissed or immediately returned to Chapter 7. ***

***

The class of honest but unfortunate debtors who do possess an absolute right to convert their cases from Chapter 7 to Chapter 13 includes the vast majority of the hundreds of thousands of individuals who file Chapter 7 petitions each year. Congress sought to give these individuals the chance to repay their debts should they acquire the means to do so. Moreover, as the Court of Appeals observed, the reference in § 706(a) to the unenforceability of a waiver of the right to convert functions "as a consumer protection provision against adhesion contracts, whereby a debtor's creditors might be precluded from attempting to prescribe a waiver of the debtor's right to convert to chapter 13 as a non-negotiable condition of its contractual agreements." [Citation.]

A statutory provision protecting a borrower from waiver is not a shield against forfeiture. Nothing in the text of either § 706 or § 1307(c) (or the legislative history of either provision) limits the authority of the court to take appropriate action in response to fraudulent conduct by the atypical litigant who has demonstrated that he is not entitled to the relief available to the typical debtor. On the contrary, the broad authority granted to bankruptcy judges to take any action that is necessary or appropriate "to prevent an abuse of process" described in § 105(a) of the Code, is surely adequate to authorize an immediate denial of a motion to convert filed under § 706 in lieu of a conversion order that merely postpones the allowance of equivalent relief and may provide a debtor with an opportunity to take action prejudicial to creditors.

INTERPRETATION Perpetration bad-faith conduct may cause a forfeiture of the right to convert a Chapter 7 proceeding into a Chapter 13 case.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the Court's reasoning and its policy arguments? Explain.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the debtor act ethically? If he did not, should he be entitled to any relief under the Bankruptcy Code? Explain.

DISMISSAL

The court may dismiss a Chapter 7 case for cause after notice and a hearing. In a case filed by an individual debtor whose debts are primarily consumer debts the court may dismiss a case, or, with the debtor's consent, convert the case to one under Chapter 11 or 13, if the court finds that granting relief would be an abuse of the provisions of Chapter 7. A court can find abuse based on (1) general grounds based on whether the debtor filed the petition in bad faith or the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation demonstrates abuse or (2) an un rebutted presumption of abuse based on a new means test established by the 2005 Act.

Under the means test, abuse is presumed (i.e., the debtor is not eligible for Chapter 7) for an individual debtor whose net current monthly income is greater than the state median income and if either (1) the debtor has available net income (income after deducting allowed expenses) for repayment to creditors over five years totaling at least $10,000; or (2) the available net income for repayment to creditors over five years is between $6,000 and $10,000 and such available net income is at least 25 percent of nonpriority unsecured claims. The means test can be explained by the following scenarios:

1. If the debtor's net current monthly income is less than or equal to the state median income, no presumption of abuse arises.
2. If the debtor's net current monthly income is greater than the state median income and the debtor's current monthly income less allowed expenses is less than $100 per month, no presumption of abuse arises.
3. If the debtor's net current monthly income is greater than the state median income and the debtor's current monthly income less allowed expenses is at least $100 per month, a presumption of abuse arises if the current monthly income less allowed expenses is sufficient to pay 25 percent of the debtor's nonpriority unsecured claims over sixty months.

4. If the debtor's net current monthly income is greater than the state median income and the debtor's current monthly income less allowed expenses is at least $166.67 per month, a presumption of abuse arises without regard to the amount of nonpriority unsecured claims.

For example, Debra's net current monthly income is greater than the state median income. After deducting allowed expenses her monthly income is $150, which places her in the third situation. If her nonpriority unsecured claims are $35,000, a presumption of abuse will arise because $150 multiplied by sixty equals $9,000, which is greater than 25 percent of $35,000, which equals $8,750. On the other hand, Debra would be eligible to file under Chapter 7 if her nonpriority unsecured claims are $36,100, because $150 multiplied by sixty equals $9,000, which is less than 25 percent of $36,100, which equals $9,025.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE ESTATE

After the trustee has collected all the assets of the debtor's estate, she distributes them to the creditors (and, if any assets remain, to the debtor) in the following order:

1. Secured creditors, on their security interests;
2. Creditors entitled to a priority, in the order provided;
3. Unsecured creditors who filed their claims on time (or tardily, if they did not have notice or actual knowledge of the bankruptcy);

APPLYING THE LAW

Bankruptcy

Facts Maria and Trent Jordan have accumulated $356,327 in unsecured debt on fifty-nine different credit cards, in several cases on six or seven different cards issued by the same financial institutions. Their large debt stems almost exclusively from remodeling their home. While most of the charges relate to purchases of materials, a substantial portion of the total credit card balance represents accrued interest and large cash advances they obtained from some of the cards to enable them to make minimum payments on other cards.

Maria is employed as a nurse, making $45,000 a year. Trent is a carpenter by trade. Though he is healthy and able, for the last three years he has not had outside employment, instead working exclusively on the remodeling project and managing the couple's finances. The median annual income for a two-person family in Florida, where they live, is approximately $47,000.

At this point, the annual interest accruing on the Jordans' credit card balances is about $36,000. They have never made a late payment on any of the credit cards, and they stopped using them six months ago. Their home is still only partially remodeled and is valued at about $115,000, with an outstanding mortgage of approximately $102,000. When the remodeling is complete, the home will be worth in excess of $350,000. However, given its partially completed state, the Jordans' current equity in the house is far less than Florida's homestead exemption. They own two modest automobiles that are subject to purchase money security interests, and they have no other assets of any value.

Earlier this year, the Jordans filed a petition for Chapter 7 bankruptcy relief. The U.S. trustee has now filed a motion to dismiss their case for abuse.

Issue Will the Jordans' petition in bankruptcy be dismissed?

Rule of Law If the court finds that granting relief to an individual debtor with primarily consumer debts would be an abuse of Chapter 7's provisions, the court may dismiss the debtor's bankruptcy case after notice and a hearing. Abuse may be established in one of three situations. First, the debtor may be unable to rebut a statutory presumption of abuse based on the means test established by the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (2005 Act). The statutory presumption of abuse, however, does not arise in a case in which the debtor's income is less than the applicable state median income figure. Second, the court may dismiss the debtor's case for abuse if the filing was made in bad faith. Finally, the court might dismiss the bankruptcy case if the totality of the circumstances of the debtor's financial situation reflects abuse.

Application The Jordans are clearly unable to pay their debts, as the annual interest on their credit cards alone nearly engulfs their annual income. Nonetheless, their case may be subject to dismissal for abuse. The first possibility is the statutory presumption of abuse, but because their annual income of $45,000 is less than the state median income of $47,000, the statutory presumption under the 2005 Act does not arise. Next we assess the Jordans' good or bad faith in seeking bankruptcy relief. Their debt does appear to be voluntarily and deliberately incurred; it is not the result of a personal calamity like uninsured illness, involuntary loss of employment, or gambling compulsion. On the other hand, there is no evidence the Jordans made large "eve of bankruptcy" purchases or repeated bankruptcy filings, nor is there any indication they have misrepresented their income or expenses. Therefore, there does not seem to be any basis for a finding of bad faith.

The third potential basis for dismissal is the totality of the debtor's financial circumstances. The Jordans have clearly put themselves in an impossible financial situation. For at least three years before filing they systematically extended themselves far beyond their means. While it belies common sense that any credit card issuer would continue to extend credit to them under their financial circumstances, the fact remains that the Jordans took advantage of credit applications—solicited or unsolicited—to request and obtain fifty-nine different credit card accounts, carefully sustaining only the short-term obligations of each while somehow running up total unsecured debt of eight times their annual income.

A court could certainly find that these debtors are using bankruptcy as part of a scheme to avoid obligations they never intended to satisfy. They appear to have made no significant attempt to address their enormous financial obligation. Indeed, it appears as though Mr. Jordan's management of the couple's finances may have become something of a complex game, using a combination of meager income and new cards with available cash advances to placate the demands of growing balances on older cards. Moreover, the couple has sought bankruptcy protection at a time when their remodeling project is still incomplete and their home's potential equity is still unavailable to satisfy the unsecured creditors. While Chapter 7 bankruptcy is a solution for the honest debtor who is hopelessly indebted, bankruptcy for the Jordans instead seems to be just the final step of a calculated process to avoid meaningful financial responsibility.

Conclusion A finding of substantial abuse due to the "totality of the debtor's financial circumstances" is within the discretion of the court. Here, it is likely that a court would dismiss the Jordans' bankruptcy case based on a finding that their intentional, irresponsible choices constitute abuse.

4. Unsecured creditors who filed their claims late;
5. Claims for fines and multiple, exemplary, or punitive damages;
6. Interest at the legal rate from the date of the filing of the petition, to all of the above claimants; and
7. Whatever property remains, to the debtor.

Claims of the same rank are paid proportionately. For example, Donley has filed a petition for a Chapter 7 proceeding. The total value of Donley's estate after paying the expenses of administration is $25,000. Evans, who is owed $15,000, has a security interest in property valued at $10,000. Fishel has an unsecured claim of $6,000, which is entitled to a priority of $2,000. The United States has a claim for income taxes of $4,000. Green has an unsecured claim of $9,000 that was filed on time. Hiller has an unsecured claim of $12,000 that was filed on time. Jerdee has a claim of $8,000 that was filed late. The distribution would be as follows: (1) Evans receives $11,500; (2) Fishel receives $3,200; (3) the United States receives $4,000; (4) Green receives $2,700; (5) Hiller receives $3,600; and (6) Jerdee receives $0.

Let us analyze this distribution: Evans receives $10,000 as a secured creditor and has an unsecured claim of $5,000. Fishel receives $2,000 on the portion of his claim entitled to a priority and has an unsecured claim of $4,000. The United States has a priority of $4,000. After paying $10,000 to Evans, $2,000 to Fishel, and $4,000 to the United States, there remains $9,000 ($25,000 – $10,000 – $2,000 – $4,000) to be distributed pro rata to unsecured creditors who filed on time. Their claims total $30,000 (Evans = $5,000, Fishel = $4,000, Green = $9,000, and Hiller = $12,000). Therefore, each will receive $9,000/$30,000, or $0.30 on the dollar. Accordingly, Evans receives an additional $1,500, Fishel receives an additional $1,200, Green receives $2,700, and Hiller receives $3,600. Because the assets were insufficient to pay all unsecured claimants who filed on time, Jerdee, who filed tardily, receives nothing. However, if Jerdee's claim were filed late because Donley had failed to schedule the claim, Donley's debt to Jerdee would not be discharged unless Jerdee knew or had notice of the bankruptcy.

DISCHARGE

A discharge under Chapter 7 relieves the debtor of all debts that arose before the date of the order for relief, except for those debts that are not dischargeable. After distribution of the estate, the court will grant the debtor a discharge unless the debtor (1) is not an individual (partnerships and corporations may not receive a discharge under Chapter 7); (2) has destroyed, falsified, concealed, or failed to keep records and books of account; (3) has knowingly and fraudulently made a false oath or account, presented or used a false claim, or given or received bribes; (4) has transferred, removed, destroyed, or concealed any of his property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors within twelve months before the filing of the bankruptcy petition; (5) has within eight years before the bankruptcy been granted a discharge under Chapter 7 or 11; (6) has refused to obey any lawful order of the court or to answer any question approved by the court; (7) has failed to explain satisfactorily any losses of assets or any deficiency of assets to meet his liabilities; or (8) has executed a written waiver of discharge approved by the court. A debtor also will be denied a discharge under Chapter 7 if she received a discharge under Chapter 13 within the past six years, unless payments under that chapter's plan totaled at least (1) 100 percent of the allowed unsecured claims or (2) 70 percent of such claims and the plan was the debtor's best effort.

The 2005 Act denies a discharge to an individual debtor who fails to complete a personal financial management course. This provision, however, does not apply if the debtor resides in a district for which the U.S. trustee or the bankruptcy administrator has determined that the approved instructional courses are not adequate to service the additional individuals who would be required to complete these instructional courses.

On request of the trustee or a creditor and after notice and a hearing, the court may revoke within one year a discharge the debtor obtained through fraud.

Reorganization—Chapter 11

Reorganization is the process of correcting or eliminating the factors that caused the distress of a business enterprise and thereby preserving both the enterprise and its value as a going concern. Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code governs reorganization of eligible debtors—including partnerships, corporations, and individuals—and permits the restructuring of their finances. A number of large corporations have made use of Chapter 11, including WorldCom, Enron, Kmart, Texaco, A. H. Robins, Johns Manville, Allied Stores, and Global Crossing. The main objective of a reorganization proceeding is to develop and carry out a fair, equitable, and feasible plan of reorganization.

After a plan has been prepared and filed, a hearing held before the court determines whether or not it will be confirmed. Chapter 11 permits but does not require a sale of assets. Rather, it contemplates that the debtor will keep its assets and use them to generate earnings that will pay creditors under the terms of the plan confirmed by the court.

The 1994 and 2005 amendments provide for streamlined and more flexible procedures in a small business case, which is any case under Chapter 11 filed by a small business. The amendments define small business to include (1) persons engaged in commercial or business activities whose aggregate, noncontingent, liquidated debts do not exceed $2,190,000 (subject to periodic adjustments for inflation); and (2) cases in which the U.S. trustee has not appointed a committee of unsecured creditors or the court has determined that the committee of unsecured creditors is not sufficiently active and representative to provide effective oversight of the debtor. Under a small business case the U.S. trustee has additional oversight duties, the debtor has additional reporting requirements, while the plan process can be simpler and the time periods and deadlines are different.

PROCEEDINGS

Any person who may be a debtor under Chapter 7 (except a stockbroker or a commodity broker) and railroads may be debtors under Chapter 11. Petitions may be voluntary or involuntary. See In Re Johns Manville Corporation later in this chapter.

As soon as possible after the order for relief, a committee of unsecured creditors (usually those who hold the seven largest unsecured claims against the debtor) is appointed. In addition, the court may order the appointment of additional committees of creditors or of equity security holders, if necessary, to ensure adequate representation. The committee may, with the court's approval, employ attorneys, accountants, and other agents to represent or perform services for the committee. The committee should consult with the debtor or trustee concerning the administration of the case and may investigate the debtor's affairs and participate in formulating a reorganization plan.

The debtor remains in possession and management of the property of the estate unless the court orders the appointment of a trustee, who may then operate the debtor's business. The court orders the appointment of a trustee only for cause (including fraud, dishonesty, incompetence, or gross mismanagement of the debtor's affairs) or if the appointment is in the interests of creditors or equity security holders. The 1994 amendments allow the creditors to elect the trustee.

The duties of a trustee in a case under Chapter 11 include the following: (1) to be accountable for all property received; (2) to examine proofs of claims; (3) to furnish information to all parties with an interest; (4) to provide the court and taxing authorities with financial reports of the debtor's business operations; (5) to make a final report and account of the administration of the estate; (6) to investigate the debtor's financial condition and to determine whether continuing the debtor's business is desirable; and (7) to file a plan or to file a report explaining why there will be no plan or to recommend either dismissal of the case or its conversion to Chapter 7.

At any time before confirming a plan, the court may terminate the trustee's appointment and restore the debtor to possession and management of the estate property and the operation of the debtor's business. When a trustee has not been appointed, which is usually the case, the debtor in possession performs many of the functions and duties of a trustee, with the principal exception of (self-)investigation.

The Bankruptcy Code provides that subsequent to filing and prior to seeking the rejection of union-drafted collective bargaining agreements, the trustee or debtor-in-possession must propose the necessary labor contract modifications that will enable the debtor to reorganize and that will also provide for the fair and equitable treatment of all parties concerned. The Code also requires that good faith meetings to reach a mutually satisfactory agreement be held between management and the union. It authorizes the court to approve rejection of the collective bargaining agreement only if the court finds that the proposal for rejection was made in accordance with these conditions, that the union refused the proposal without good cause, and that the balance of equities clearly favors rejection.

PLAN OF REORGANIZATION

The debtor may file a plan at any time and has the exclusive right to file a plan during the one hundred and twenty days after the order for relief, unless a trustee has been appointed. Then other parties in interest, including the trustee, if one has been appointed, or a creditors' committee, may file a plan. On request of an interested party and after notice and a hearing, the court may for cause reduce or increase the one-hundred-and-twenty-day or one-hundred-and-eighty-day periods. The 2005 Act provides, however, that the one-hundred-and-twenty-day period may not be extended beyond eighteen months and the one-hundred-and-eighty-day period may not be extended beyond twenty months.

A plan of reorganization must divide creditors' claims and shareholders' interests into classes, specify how each class will be treated, deal with claims within each class equally, and provide adequate means for implementing the plan. After a plan has been filed, the plan and a written disclosure statement approved by the court as containing adequate information must be transmitted to each holder of a claim before seeking acceptance or rejection of the plan. Adequate information is that which would enable a hypothetical reasonable investor to make an informed judgment about the plan.

ACCEPTANCE OF PLAN

Each class of claims and interests has the opportunity to accept or reject the proposed plan. To be accepted by a class of claims, a plan must be accepted by creditors that hold at least two-thirds in amount and more than one-half in number of the allowed claims of such class that actually voted on the plan. Acceptance of a plan by a class of interests, such as shareholders, requires acceptance by holders of at least two-thirds in amount of the allowed interests of such class that actually voted on the plan.

A class that is not impaired under a plan is deemed to have accepted the plan. Basically, a class is not impaired if the plan leaves unaltered the legal, equitable, and contractual rights to which the holder of such claim or interest is entitled. However, a class that will receive no distribution under a plan is automatically deemed not to have accepted the plan.

CONFIRMATION OF PLAN

The court must confirm a plan before it is binding on any parties, and a court will confirm only a plan that meets all the requirements of the Bankruptcy Code. The following requirements are the most important:

1. The plan must have been proposed in good faith.
2. The court must find that confirmation of the plan is feasible and not likely to be followed by the debtor's liquidation or by its need for further financial reorganization.
3. Unless the claim holder agrees otherwise, certain priority creditors must have their allowed claims paid in full in cash immediately or, in some instances, on a deferred basis. These priority claims include domestic support obligations, the expenses of administration, gap creditors, claims for wages and salaries, employee benefits, and consumer deposits.
4. The plan must be accepted by at least one class of claims, and with respect to each class, each holder must either accept the plan or receive not less than the amount he would have received under Chapter 7. In addition, each class must accept the plan or be unimpaired by it. Nonetheless, under certain circumstances, the court may confirm a plan that is not accepted by all impaired classes by determining that the plan does not discriminate unfairly and that it is fair and equitable. Under these circumstances, a class of claims or interests may, despite its objections, be subjected to the provisions of a plan. "Fair and equitable" with respect to secured creditors requires that (1) they either retain their security interest and receive deferred cash payments, the present value of which is at least equal to their claims, or (2) they realize the "indubitable equivalent" of their claims. Fair and equitable with respect to unsecured creditors means that such creditors are to receive property of value equivalent to the full amount of their claim or that no junior claim or interest is to receive anything. With respect to a class of interests, a plan is fair and equitable if the holders receive full value or if no junior interest receives anything at all.

In the case of a debtor who is an individual, the 2005 Act requires that the plan provide for payments to be made out of the debtor's future earnings from personal services or other future income. It also imposes an additional requirement for confirmation if an unsecured creditor objects to confirmation of the plan: the value of property distributed on account of that claim must not be less than (1) the amount of that claim or (2) the debtor's projected disposable income to be received during the longer of (a) the five-year period beginning on the first payment due date or (b) the plan's term.

EFFECT OF CONFIRMATION

After its confirmation, the plan governs the debtor's performance obligations. The plan binds the debtor and any creditor, equity security holder, or general partner of the debtor. After the entry of a final decree closing the proceedings, a debtor that is not an individual is discharged from all of its debts and liabilities that arose before the date the plan was confirmed, except as otherwise provided in the plan, the order of confirmation, or the Bankruptcy Code. Unlike Chapter 7, partnerships and corporations may receive a discharge under Chapter 11 unless the plan calls for the liquidation of the business entity's property and termination of its business. The 2005 Act excepts from the discharge of any corporate debtor any debt (1) owed to the government as a result of fraud or (2) arising from a fraudulent tax return or willful evasion of taxes.

An individual debtor is not discharged until all plan payments have been made. However, if the debtor fails to make all payments, the court may, after a hearing, grant a "hardship discharge" if the value of property actually distributed is not less than what the creditors would have received under Chapter 7 and modification of the plan is not practicable. A discharge under Chapter 11 does not discharge an individual debtor from debts that are not dischargeable.

IN RE JOHNS MANVILLE CORPORATION

36 B.R. 727, APPEAL DENIED, 39 B.R. 234

FACTS Johns Manville Corporation and its affiliated companies (Manville) were highly successful industrial enterprises among the nation's Fortune 500. As of August 26, 1982, Manville had some sixteen thousand asbestos-related health suits pending against it because of its long-time use of products containing this deadly substance. The number of lawsuits was expected to multiply over the next two or three decades as individuals who had been exposed to asbestos began to develop asbestos-related diseases.

Moreover, the insurance industry had generally disclaimed any liability to Manville on policies written for this purpose. Therefore, as a result of this mammoth economic burden, Manville filed for protection under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on August 26, 1982. Four separate motions to dismiss Manville's petition were lodged before the court.

DECISION Motions to dismiss the Manville petition denied.

OPINION Lifland, Bkrcty. J. Preliminarily, *** it should also be noted that [no] *** provision relating to voluntary petitions by companies contains any insolvency requirement. ***

***

A “principal goal” of the Bankruptcy Code is to provide “open access” to the “bankruptcy process.” [Citation.] The rationale behind this “open access” policy is to provide access to bankruptcy relief which is as “open” as “access to the credit economy.” [Citation.] Thus, Congress intended that “there, should be no legal barrier to voluntary petitions.” [Citation.] Another major goal of the Code, that of “rehabilitation of debtors,” requires that relief for debtors must be “timely.” [Citation.] ***

Accordingly, the drafters of the Code envisioned that a financially beleaguered debtor with real debt and real creditors should not be required to wait until the economic situation is beyond repair in order to file a reorganization petition. The “Congressional purpose” in enacting the Code was to encourage resort to the bankruptcy process. [Citation.] This philosophy not only comports with the elimination of an insolvency requirement, but also is a corollary of the key aim of Chapter 11 of the Code, that of avoidance of liquidation. The drafters of the Code announced this goal, declaring that reorganization is more efficient than liquidation because “assets that are used for production in the industry for which they were designed are more valuable than those same assets sold for scrap.” [Citation.] Moreover, reorganization also fosters the goals of preservation of jobs in the threatened entity. [Citation.]

In the instant case, not only would liquidation be wasteful and inefficient in destroying the utility of valuable assets of the companies as well as jobs, but, more importantly, liquidation would preclude just compensation of some present asbestos victims and all future asbestos claimants. This unassailable reality represents all the more reason for this Court to adhere to this basic potential liquidation avoidance aim of Chapter 11 and deny the motions to dismiss. Manville must not be required to wait until its economic picture has deteriorated beyond salvation to file for reorganization.

In [this case] it is undeniable that there has been no sham or hoax perpetrated on the Court in that Manville is a real business with real creditors in pressing need of economic reorganization. Indeed, the Asbestos Committee has belied its own contention that Manville has no debt and no real creditors by quantifying a benchmark settlement demand approaching one billion dollars for compensation of approximately 15,500 prepetition asbestos claimants, during the course of negotiations pitched toward achieving a consensual plan. This huge asserted liability does not even take into account the estimated 6,000 new asbestos health claims which have arisen in only the first 16 months since the filing date. The number of post-filing claims increases each day as “future claims back into the present.” ***

Moreover, asbestos related property damage claims present another substantial contingent and unliquidated liability. Prior to the filing date, various schools initiated litigation seeking compensatory and punitive damages from *** Manville for their unknowing use of asbestos-containing products in ceilings, walls, structural members, piping, ductwork and boilers in school buildings. ***

***

In short, there was justification for Manville to elect a course contemplating a viable court-supervised rehabilitation of the real debt owed by Manville to its real creditors. Manville’s filing did not in the appropriate sense abuse the jurisdiction of this Court and it is indeed, like the debtor in (citation), a “once viable business supporting employees and unsecured creditors (which) has more recently been burdened with judgments (and suits) that threaten to put it out of existence.” *** [Citation.] Thus, its petition must be sustained.

INTERPRETATION The main objective of a Chapter 11 proceeding is to effect a reorganization of the debtor so as to preserve the enterprise and its value as a going concern.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did Johns Manville Corporation act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the court’s decision? Explain.

Adjustment of Debts of Individuals—Chapter 13

Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code permits an individual debtor to file a repayment plan that, if confirmed by the court, will discharge him from almost all of his debts upon completion of the payments under the plan. If, as occurs in many cases, the debtor does not make the required payments under the plan, the case will be converted to Chapter 7 or dismissed.

PROCEEDINGS

Chapter 13 provides a procedure for the adjustment of debts of an individual with regular income who owes liquidated, unsecured debts of less than $336,900 and secured debts of less than $1,010,650. Sole proprietorships that meet these debt limitations are also eligible; partnerships and corporations are not. Only a voluntary petition may initiate a case under Chapter 13, and a trustee is appointed in every Chapter 13 case. Property of the estate in Chapter 13 includes wages the debtor earned and property she acquired after the Chapter 13 filing.

CONVERSION OR DISMISSAL

The debtor may convert a case under Chapter 13 to Chapter 7. On request of the debtor, if the case has not been previously converted from Chapter 7 or 11, the court shall dismiss a case under Chapter 13. On request of a party in interest or the U.S. trustee, and after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under Chapter 13 to Chapter 7 or may dismiss a case under Chapter 13, whichever is in the best interests of creditors and the estate, for cause, including (1) unreasonable delay by the debtor; (2) failure of the debtor to file a plan timely; (3) denial of confirmation of a plan; or (4) material default by the debtor with respect to a term of a confirmed plan. Before the confirmation of a plan, on request of a party in interest or the U.S. trustee and after notice and a hearing, the court may convert a case under Chapter 13 to Chapter 11. Nonetheless, a case may not be converted to another chapter unless the debtor may be a debtor under that chapter.

THE PLAN

The debtor files the plan and may modify it at any time before confirmation. The plan must meet three requirements:

1. It must require the debtor to submit all or any portion of her future earnings or income, as is necessary for the execution of the plan, to the trustee's supervision and control.
2. It must provide for full payment on a deferred basis of all claims entitled to a priority unless a holder of a claim agrees to a different treatment of such claim.
3. If the plan classifies claims, it must provide the same treatment for each claim in the same class.

In addition, the plan may modify the rights of unsecured creditors and the rights of secured creditors, except those secured only by a security interest in the debtor's principal residence. If the debtor's net current monthly income is equal to or greater than the state median income, the plan may not provide for payments over a period longer than five years. If the debtor's net current monthly income is less than the state median income, the plan may not provide for payments over a period longer than three years, unless the court approves, for cause, a longer period not to exceed five years.

CONFIRMATION

To be confirmed by the court, the plan must meet certain requirements. First, the filing of the case must have been in good faith, and the plan must comply with applicable law and be proposed in good faith. Second, the present value of the property to be distributed to unsecured creditors must not be less than the amount they would receive under Chapter 7. Third, either the secured creditors must accept the plan, the plan must provide that the debtor will surrender the collateral to the secured creditors, or the plan must permit the secured creditors to retain their security interests and the present value of the property to be distributed to them is not less than the allowed amount of their claim. Fourth, the debtor must be able to make all payments and comply with the plan. Fifth, if the trustee or the holder of an unsecured claim objects to the plan's confirmation, then the plan must either provide for payments the present value of which is not less than the amount of that claim or provide that all of the debtor's disposable income for three years will be paid to unsecured creditors under the plan. If, however, the debtor's net current monthly income is equal to or greater than the state median income, the debtor's disposable income for not less than five years must be committed to pay unsecured creditors. For purposes of this provision, disposable income means current monthly income received by the debtor that is not reasonably necessary for the maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent of the debtor, for domestic support obligations, and, if the debtor is engaged in business, for the payment of expenditures necessary for continuing, preserving, and operating the business. Sixth, if a debtor is required by judicial or administrative order or statute to pay a domestic support obligation, then the debtor must pay all such obligations that became payable after the filing.

EFFECT OF CONFIRMATION

The provisions of a confirmed plan bind the debtor and all of her creditors. The confirmation of a plan vests in the debtor all property of the estate free and clear of any creditor's claim or interest for which the plan provides, except as otherwise provided in the plan or in the order confirming the plan. A plan may be modified after confirmation at the request of the debtor, the trustee, or a holder of an unsecured claim.

DISCHARGE

Before the 2005 Act, the discharge under Chapter 13 was considerably more extensive than that granted under Chapter 7. The 2005 Act, however, made the discharge of

TILL V. SCS CREDIT CORPORATION

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, 2004
541 U.S. 465, 124 S. CT., 1951, 158 L. ED. 2D 787

<http://laws.findlaw.com/us/000/02-1016.html>

FACTS To qualify for court approval under the so-called cram down option of Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, an individual debtor's proposed debt adjustment plan must accommodate each allowed, secured creditor by providing the creditor both a lien securing the claim and a promise of future property distributions (such as deferred cash payments) whose total "value, as of the effective date of the plan, ... is not less than the allowed amount of such claim." When such plans provide for installment payments over a period of years rather than a single payment, the amount of each installment must be calibrated to ensure that, over time, the creditor receives disbursements whose total present value equals or exceeds that of the allowed claim.

On October 2, 1998, The Tills, Lee and Amy, residents of Kokomo, Indiana, purchased a used truck from Instant Auto Finance for $6,395 plus $330.75 in fees and taxes. They made a $300 down payment and financed the balance of the purchase price by entering into a retail installment contract that Instant Auto immediately assigned to SCS Credit Corporation (SCS). The Tills' initial indebtedness amounted to $8,285.24—the $6,425.75 balance of the truck purchase plus a finance charge of 21 percent per year for 136 weeks, or $1,859.49. Under the contract, the Tills agreed to make sixty-eight biweekly payments. SCS obtained a purchase money security interest that gave it the right to repossess the truck if the Tills defaulted.

On October 25, 1999, the Tills, by then in default on their payments to SCS, filed a joint petition for relief under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. At the time of the filing, SCS's outstanding claim amounted to $4,894.89, but the parties agreed that the truck securing the claim was worth only $4,000. In accordance with the Bankruptcy Code, therefore, SCS's secured claim was limited to $4,000, and the $894.89 balance was unsecured.

The Tills' proposed debt adjustment plan called for them to submit their future earnings to the supervision and control of the bankruptcy court for three years, and to assign $740 of their wages to the trustee each month. The plan charged the trustee with distributing these monthly wage assignments to pay, in order of priority: (1) administrative costs; (2) the IRS's priority tax claim; (3) secured creditors' claims; and finally, (4) unsecured creditors' claims.

The proposed plan also provided that the Tills would pay interest on the secured portion of SCS's claim at a rate of 9.5 percent per year. The Tills arrived at this "prime-plus" or "formula rate" by augmenting the national prime rate of approximately 8 percent (applied by banks when making low-risk loans) to account for the risk of nonpayment posed by borrowers in their financial position. SCS objected to the proposed rate, contending that the company was entitled to interest at the rate of 21 percent, which is the rate it would obtain if it could foreclose on the vehicle and reinvest the proceeds in loans of equivalent duration and risk as the loan originally made to the Tills.

The bankruptcy court overruled SCS's objection and confirmed the proposed plan. The District Court reversed, ruling that bankruptcy courts must set cram down interest rates at the level the creditor could have obtained if it had foreclosed on the loan. Citing SCS's un rebutted testimony about the market for subprime loans, the court concluded that 21 percent was the appropriate rate.

On appeal, the Seventh Circuit endorsed a slightly modified version of the District Court's "coerced" or "forced loan" approach. The majority held that the original contract rate should serve as a presumptive cram down rate, which either the creditor or the debtor could challenge with evidence that a higher or lower rate should apply. The dissenting judge advocated either the bankruptcy court's formula approach or a "straightforward ... cost of funds" approach that would simply ask "what it would cost the creditor to obtain the cash equivalent of the collateral from an alternative source." The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari.

DECISION The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded.

OPINION Stevens, J. The Bankruptcy Code provides little guidance as to which of the rates of interest advocated by the four opinions in this case—the formula rate, the coerced loan rate, the presumptive contract rate, or the cost of funds rate—Congress had in mind when it adopted the cram down provision. That provision, [citation], does not mention the term "discount rate" or the word "interest." Rather, it simply requires bankruptcy courts to ensure that the property to be distributed to a particular secured creditor over the life of a bankruptcy plan has a total "value, as of the effective date of the plan," that equals or exceeds the value of the creditor's allowed secured claim—in this case, $4,000. [Citation.]

That command is easily satisfied when the plan provides for a lump-sum payment to the creditor. Matters are not so simple, however, when the debt is to be discharged by a series of payments over time. A debtor's promise of future payments is worth less than an immediate payment of the same total amount because the creditor cannot use the money right away, inflation may cause the value of the dollar to decline before the debtor pays, and there is always some risk of nonpayment. The challenge for bankruptcy courts reviewing such repayment schemes, therefore, is to choose an interest rate sufficient to compensate the creditor for these concerns.

Three important considerations govern that choice. First, the Bankruptcy Code includes numerous provisions that, like the cram down provision, require a court to "discount[t] ... [a] stream of deferred payments back to the[ir] present dollar value," [citation], to ensure that a creditor receives at least the value of its claim. We think it likely that Congress intended bankruptcy judges and trustees to follow essentially the same approach when choosing an appropriate interest rate under any of these provisions. Moreover, we think Congress would favor an approach that is familiar in the financial community and that minimizes the need for expensive evidentiary proceedings.

Second, Chapter 13 expressly authorizes a bankruptcy court to modify the rights of any creditor whose claim is secured by an interest in anything other than "real property that is the debtor's principal residence." [Citation.] Thus, in cases like this involving secured interests in personal property, the court's authority to modify the number, timing, or amount of the installment payments from those set forth in the debtor's original contract is perfectly clear. ***

Third, *** [T]he court should aim to treat similarly situated creditors similarly and to ensure that an objective economic analysis would suggest the debtor's interest payments will adequately compensate all such creditors for the time value of their money and the risk of default.

These considerations lead us to reject the coerced loan, presumptive contract rate, and cost of funds approaches. Each of these approaches is complicated, imposes significant evidentiary costs, and aims to make each individual creditor whole rather than to ensure the debtor's payments have the required present value. ***

***

The formula approach has none of these defects. Taking its cue from ordinary lending practices, the approach begins by looking to the national prime rate, reported daily in the press, which reflects the financial market's estimate of the amount a commercial bank should charge a credit-worthy commercial borrower to compensate for the opportunity costs of the loan, the risk of inflation, and the relatively slight risk of default. Because bankrupt debtors typically pose a greater risk of nonpayment than solvent commercial borrowers, the approach then requires a bankruptcy court to adjust the prime rate accordingly. The appropriate size of that risk adjustment depends, of course, on such factors as the circumstances of the estate, the nature of the security, and the duration and feasibility of the reorganization plan. *** Moreover, starting from a concededly low estimate and adjusting upward places the evidentiary burden squarely on the creditors, who are likely to have readier access to any information absent from the debtor's filing ***.

Thus, *** the resulting "prime-plus" rate of interest depends only on the state of financial markets, the circumstances of the bankruptcy estate, and the characteristics of the loan, not on the creditor's circumstances or its prior interactions with the debtor. For these reasons, the prime-plus or formula rate best comports with the purposes of the Bankruptcy Code.

*** Together with the cram down provision, this requirement obligates the court to select a rate high enough to compensate the creditor for its risk but not so high as to doom the plan. If the court determines that the likelihood of default is so high as to necessitate an "eye-popping" interest rate, [citation], the plan probably should not be confirmed.

INTERPRETATION Under the so-called cram down option of Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code, the appropriate interest rate is calculated under a formula approach in which the bankruptcy court would adjust the national prime rate of interest charged to creditworthy commercial borrowers upward to reflect the greater risk of nonpayment by bankrupt debtors.

debts under Chapter 13 less extensive than previously. As a result Chapter 13 discharges only a few types of debts that are not also discharged under Chapter 7.

After a debtor completes all payments under the plan and of certain postpetition domestic support obligations, the court will grant him a discharge of all debts for which the plan provides, except the nondischargeable debts for

(1) unfiled, late-filed, and fraudulent tax returns; (2) legal liabilities resulting from obtaining money, property, or services by false pretenses, false representations, or actual fraud; (3) legal liability for willful or malicious conduct that caused personal injury to an individual; (4) domestic support obligations; (5) debts not scheduled unless the creditor knew of the bankruptcy; (6) debts the debtor

Even if the debtor fails to make all payments, the court may, after a hearing, grant a "hardship discharge" if the debtor's failure is due to circumstances for which the debtor is not justly accountable, the value of property actually distributed is not less than what the creditors would have received under Chapter 7, and modification of the plan is not practicable. This discharge is subject, however, to the same exceptions for nondischargeable debts as a discharge under Chapter 7.

The 2005 Act denies a discharge under Chapter 13 to a debtor who has received a discharge (1) in a prior Chapter 7 or 11 case filed during the four-year period preceding the filing of the Chapter 13 case or (2) in a prior Chapter 13 case filed during the two-year period preceding the date of filing the subsequent Chapter 13 case. It also denies a discharge to a debtor who fails to complete a personal financial management course. This provision, however, does not apply if the debtor resides in a district for which the U.S. trustee or the bankruptcy administrator has determined that the approved instructional courses are not adequate to service the additional individuals who would be required to complete these required instructional courses.

CREDITORS' RIGHTS AND DEBTORS' RELIEF OUTSIDE OF BANKRUPTCY

The rights and remedies of debtors and creditors outside of bankruptcy are governed mainly by state law. Because of the expense and notoriety associated with bankruptcy, resolving claims outside of a bankruptcy proceeding is often in the best interests of both debtor and creditor. Accordingly, bankruptcy is usually considered a last resort.

Outside of bankruptcy, the rights and remedies of creditors are varied. In the first part of this section, we will examine the basic right of all creditors to pursue their overdue claims to judgment and to satisfy that judgment out of property belonging to the debtor. (Other rights and remedies are discussed elsewhere in this book.) The second part of this section will describe the various forms of non-bankruptcy compromises that provide relief to debtors who have become overextended and who are unable to pay all of their creditors.

Creditors' Rights

When a debtor fails to pay a debt, the creditor may file suit to collect it. The goal is to obtain a judgment against the debtor and to collect on that judgment.

PREJUDGMENT REMEDIES

Because litigation takes time, a creditor attempting to collect on a claim through the judicial process almost always experiences delay in obtaining judgment. To prevent the debtor from meanwhile disposing of his assets, the creditor may use, when available, certain prejudgment remedies. The most important of these is attachment, the process of seizing property, through a judicial order, and bringing the property into the court's custody to secure satisfaction of the judgment ultimately to be entered in the action. Most states limit attachment to specified grounds and provide the debtor an opportunity for a hearing before a judge prior to the issuance of a writ of execution. In addition, the plaintiff generally must post a bond to compensate the defendant for loss should the plaintiff not prevail in the cause of action.

Similar in purpose is the remedy of prejudgment garnishment, which is a statutory proceeding directed at a third person who owes a debt to the debtor or who has property belonging to the debtor. Garnishment is most commonly used against the debtor's employer and the bank in which the debtor has a savings or checking account. Garnished property remains in the hands of the third party pending the outcome of the suit.

POSTJUDGMENT REMEDIES

If the debtor still has not paid the claim, the creditor may proceed to trial and try to obtain a court judgment against the debtor. Although necessary, obtaining a judgment is, nevertheless, only the first step. If the debtor does not voluntarily pay the judgment, the creditor will have to take additional steps to collect on it. These steps are called postjudgment remedies.

First, the judgment creditor will have the court clerk issue a writ of execution demanding payment of the judgment, which is served by the sheriff upon the defendant debtor. Upon return of the writ "unsatisfied," the judgment creditor may post bond or other security and order a levy on and sale of specified nonexempt property belonging to the defendant debtor, which is then seized by the sheriff, advertised for sale, and sold at public sale under the writ of execution.

The writ of execution is limited to nonexempt property of the debtor. All states restrict creditors from recourse to certain property, the type and amount of which varies greatly from state to state.

If the proceeds of the sale do not produce funds sufficient to pay the judgment, the creditor may institute a supplementary proceeding in an attempt to locate money or other property belonging to the defendant. She may also proceed by garnishment against the debtor's employer or against a bank in which the debtor has an account. As we discuss in Chapter 45, state and federal statutes contain exemption provisions which limit the amount of wages subject to garnishment.

Debtors' Relief

The rights of creditors and the debtor's need for relief involve inherent conflicts arising from the following: (1) the right of diligent creditors to pursue their claims to judgment and to satisfy their judgments by sale of property of the debtor; (2) the right of unsecured creditors who have refrained from suing the debtor; and (3) the social policy of giving relief to a debtor who has contracted debts beyond his ability to pay and who therefore may carry a lifetime burden. Various forms of nonbankruptcy compromises have been developed to resolve these conflicts.

COMPOSITIONS

A common law or nonstatutory composition (or "work-out") is an ordinary contract or agreement between the debtor and two or more of her creditors under which the creditors receive a proportional part of their claims and the debtor is discharged from the balance of the claims. A composition is the state law analogue of Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Act. As a contract, it requires contractual formalities. For example, debtor D, owing debts of $5,000 to A, $2,000 to B, and $1,000 to C, offers to settle these claims by paying a total of $4,000 to A, B, and C. If A, B, and C accept the offer, a composition results, with A receiving $2,500, B $1,000, and C $500. The consideration for the promise of A to forgive the balance of his claim consists of the promises of B and C to forgive the balance of their claims. By avoiding a conflict among themselves to obtain the debtor's limited assets, all the creditors benefit.

We should note, however, that the debtor in a composition is discharged from liability only on the claims of those creditors who voluntarily consent to the composition. If, in this illustration, C had refused to accept the offer of composition and had refused to take the $500, he could attempt to collect his full $1,000 claim. Likewise, if D owed additional debts to X, Y, and Z, these creditors would not be bound by the agreement between D and A, B, and C. Another disadvantage of the composition is the fact that any creditor can attach the debtor's assets during the bargaining period that usually precedes the execution of the composition agreement. For instance, once D had advised A, B, and C that he was offering to compose the claims, any one of the creditors could seize D's property.

For a Company Contemplating Bankruptcy, When Is Disclosure the Best Policy?

FACTS Doris Williams is a senior executive for Foundation Insurance Corporation, a publicly held insurance company that issues a broad range of policies. Early in January, Williams was appointed to serve on a management team composed of herself and four other executive officers. The team reviews and finalizes recommendations for establishing loss reserves, recommendations regarding dividend payments to shareholders, and proposals for press releases.

For the past few years, Foundation has experienced increasingly alarming financial difficulties. Ten years ago, in order to compete with alternative investments, the company developed many innovative life insurance products to provide both traditional insurance and an attractive savings vehicle for the insured. However, to meet the high interest payments on these new insurance products, management invested in risky real estate ventures that promised—but often failed to deliver—high returns. Foundation’s property and casualty lines also experienced increased losses due to poor actuarial decisions and an unexpected rise in workers’ compensation claims.

Toward the end of the first quarter, during the management team’s review of dividend payments, Williams recommended slashing dividend payments, bolstering loss reserves, and publicly disclosing the company’s growing financial problems. The four other committee members disagreed. They feared that the public would panic and that the effect on the market would be disastrous. They wanted more time to attempt to turn around the business. Williams went along with the committee for the first and second quarters. By the third quarter, however, the committee could no longer avoid recommending an unprecedented reduction in dividends and a dramatic increase in reserves. By the end of the year, the company, having become insolvent, filed for bankruptcy protection. The current management team now wishes to reorganize the company.

Social, Political, and Ethical Considerations

1. Was it ethical for Williams to acquiesce with regard to the first and second quarters? Consider the interests of the consumer/policyholder, the company, the shareholders, and the members of the committee. Was there merit to the committee’s request for more time to remedy the company’s problems?
2. Should bankrupt insurers be treated differently from other bankrupt corporations? What role, if any, should government play in insuring insurance companies?
3. Should the old management team be allowed to retain control of Foundation? Why? Why not?

A variation of the composition is an extension agreement, developed by the debtor and two or more of her creditors, that provides an extended period of time for payment of her debts either in full or proportionately reduced.

ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS

A common law or nonstatutory assignment for the benefit of creditors, or a general assignment, as it is sometimes called, is a debtor’s voluntary transfer of her property to a trustee, who applies the property to the payment of all the debtor’s debts. For instance, debtor D transfers title to her property to trustee T, who converts the property into money and pays it to all of the creditors on a pro rata basis. An assignment for the benefit of creditors is a state law analogue of Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Act.

In most states, statutes now govern assignments for the benefit of creditors. These statutes typically require recording of the assignment, filing schedules of assets and liabilities, and providing notice to the creditors. Almost all of the statutes require that all creditors be treated equally, except those with liens or statutorily created priorities.

The advantage of an assignment over a composition is that it prevents the debtor’s assets from being attached or executed and halts diligent creditors in their race to attach. An assignment does not require the creditors’ consent, and the trustee’s payment of part of the claims does not discharge the debtor from the balance of them. Thus, in the previous example, even after T pays A $2,500, B $1,000, and C $500 (and makes appropriate payments to all other creditors), A, B, and C and the other creditors may still attempt to collect the balance of their claims. Moreover, an assignment for the benefit of creditors is a ground for sustaining an involuntary petition for bankruptcy.

Because assignments benefit creditors by protecting the debtor’s assets from attachment, some statutory enactments have endeavored to combine the idea of the assignment with a corresponding benefit that would discharge the debtor from the balance of his debts. However, because the U.S. Constitution prohibits a state from impairing a contractual obligation between private citizens, it is impossible for a state to force all creditors to discharge a debtor on a pro rata distribution of assets, although, as previously discussed, the federal government does have such power and exercises it in the Bankruptcy Code. Accordingly, the states generally have enacted assignment statutes permitting the debtor to obtain voluntary releases of the balance of claims from creditors who accept partial payments, thus combining the advantages of common law compositions and assignments.

EQUITY RECEIVERSHIPS

One of the oldest remedies in equity is the court's appointment of a receiver, a disinterested person who collects and preserves the debtor's assets and income and disposes of them at the court's direction. The court may instruct the receiver (1) to liquidate the assets by public or private sale; (2) to operate the business as a going concern temporarily; or (3) to conserve the assets until final disposition of the matter before the court.

A receiver will be appointed on the petition (1) of a secured creditor seeking foreclosure of his security; (2) of a judgment creditor who has exhausted legal remedies to satisfy the judgment; or (3) of a shareholder of a corporate debtor whose assets will likely be dissipated by fraud or mismanagement. The receiver is always appointed at the discretion of the court. Insolvency, in the equity sense of the debtor's inability to pay her debts as they mature, is one of the factors the court considers in appointing a receiver.

Purpose to permit an individual debtor to file a repayment plan that will discharge her from most debts

Conversion or Dismissal a Chapter 13 case may be voluntarily or involuntarily dismissed or converted to Chapter 7 or 11

Confirmation of Plan requires (1) that it be made in good faith; (2) that the present value of property distributed to unsecured creditors not be less than the amount that would be paid them under Chapter 7; (3) that secured creditors accept the plan, keep their collateral, or retain their security interest, and the present value of the property to be distributed to them is not less than the allowed amount of their claim; and (4) that the debtor be able to make all payments and comply with the plan

Discharge after a debtor completes all payments under the plan

CREDITORS' RIGHTS AND DEBTORS' RELIEF OUTSIDE BANKRUPTCY

Creditors' Rights

Prejudgment Remedies include attachment and garnishment

Postjudgment Remedies include writ of execution and garnishment

Debtors' Relief

Compositions agreement between debtor and two or more of her creditors that each will take a portion of his claim as full payment

Assignment for Benefit of Creditors voluntary transfer by the debtor of his property to a trustee, who applies the property to the payment of all the debtor's debts

Equity Receivership receiver is a disinterested person appointed by the court to collect and preserve the debtor's assets and income and to dispose of them at the direction of the court

Questions

1. a. Benson goes into bankruptcy. His estate is not sufficient to pay all taxes owed. Are Benson's taxes discharged by the proceedings?
  - b. Benson obtained property from Anderson on credit by representing that he was solvent when in fact he knew he was insolvent. Is Benson's debt to Anderson discharged by Benson's discharge in bankruptcy?
2. Bradley goes into bankruptcy under Chapter 7 owing $25,000 as wages to his four employees. There is enough in his estate to pay all costs of administration and enough to pay his employees, but nothing will be left for general creditors. Do the employees take all the estate? If so, under what conditions? If the general creditors received nothing at all, would these debts be discharged?
3. Jessica sold goods to Stacy for $2,500 and retained a security interest in them. Two months later, Stacy filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy under Chapter 7. At this time, Stacy still owed Jessica $2,000 for the purchase price of the goods, the value of which was $1,500.
  - a. May the trustee invalidate Jessica's security interest? If so, under what provision?
  - b. If the security interest is invalidated, what is Jessica's status in the bankruptcy proceeding?
  - c. If the security interest is not invalidated, what is Jessica's status in the bankruptcy proceeding?
4. A debtor went through bankruptcy under Chapter 7 and received his discharge. Which of the following debts were completely discharged, and which remain as future debts against him?
  - a. A claim of $9,000 for wages earned within five months immediately prior to bankruptcy.
  - b. A judgment of $3,000 against the debtor for breach of contract.
  - c. Sales taxes of $1,800.
  - d. $1,000 for past domestic support obligations.
  - e. A judgment of $4,000 for injuries received because of the debtor's negligent operation of an automobile.
5. Rosinoff and his wife, who were business partners, entered bankruptcy. A creditor, Baldwin, objected to their discharge in bankruptcy on the grounds that
  - a. the partners had obtained credit from Baldwin on the basis of a false financial statement;
  - b. the partners had failed to keep books of account and records from which their financial condition could be determined; and
  - c. Rosinoff had falsely sworn that he had taken $70 from the partnership account when he had actually taken $700.

Were the debtors entitled to a discharge?
6. X Corporation is a debtor in a reorganization proceeding under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. By fair and proper valuation, its assets are worth $100,000. The indebtedness of the corporation is $105,000, and it has outstanding preferred stock of par value of $20,000 and common stock of par value of $75,000. The plan of reorganization submitted by the trustees would eliminate the common shareholders and issue new bonds of the face amount of $5,000 to the creditors and common stock in the ratio of 84 percent to the creditors and 16 percent to the preferred shareholders. Should this plan be confirmed?
7. Alex is a wage earner with a regular income. He has unsecured debts of $42,000 and secured debts owing to Betty, Connie, David, and Eunice totaling $120,000. Eunice's debt is secured only by a mortgage on Alex's house. Alex files a petition under Chapter 13 and a plan providing payment as follows: (a) 60 percent of all taxes owed; (b) 35 percent of all unsecured debts; and (c) $100,000 in total to Betty, Connie, David, and Eunice. Should the court confirm the plan? If not, how must the plan be modified or what other conditions must be satisfied?
8. John Bunker has assets of $130,000 and liabilities of $185,000 owed to nine creditors. Nonetheless, his cash flow is positive and he is making payment on all of his obligations as they become due. I. M. Flintheart, who is owed $22,000 by Bunker, files an involuntary petition in bankruptcy under Chapter 7 against Bunker. Bunker contests the petition. What will be the result? Explain.

9. Karen has filed a voluntary petition for a Chapter 7 proceeding. The total value of Karen's estate is $35,000. Ben, who is owed $18,000, has a security interest in property valued at $12,000. Lauren has an unsecured claim of $9,000, which is entitled to a priority of $2,000. The United States has a claim for income taxes of $7,000. Steve has an unsecured claim of $10,000 that was filed on time. Sarah has an unsecured claim of $17,000 that was filed on time. Wally has a claim of $14,000 that he filed late, even though Wally was aware of the bankruptcy proceedings. What should each of the creditors receive in a distribution under Chapter 7?

Case Problems

10. Landmark at Plaza Park, Ltd., filed a plan of reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. Landmark is a limited partnership whose only substantial asset is a two-hundred-unit garden apartment complex. City Federal holds the first mortgage on the property in the face amount of $2,250,000. The mortgage is due and payable on October 1, 2013.

Landmark has proposed a plan of reorganization under which the property now in possession of City Federal would be returned. Landmark will then deliver a nonrecourse note, payable in three years, in the face amount of $2,705,820.31 to City Federal in substitution of all of the partnership's existing liabilities. On the sixteenth month through the thirty-sixth month after the effective date of the plan, Landmark will make monthly interest payments computed on a property value of $2,260,000 at a rate of 3 percent above the original mortgage rate but 2.5 percent below the market rate for loans of similar risk. Finally, the note will be secured by the existing mortgage. Landmark's theory is that the note will be paid off at the end of thirty-six months by a combination of refinancing and accumulation of cash from the project. The key is Landmark's proposal to obtain a new first mortgage in three years in the face amount of $2,400,000.

City Federal is a first mortgagee without recourse that has been collecting rents pursuant to a rent assignment agreement since the default on the mortgage eleven months ago. City Federal is impaired by the plan and has rejected it. May it complete its foreclosure action? Explain.

11. Freelin Conn filed a voluntary petition under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code on September 30, 2009. Conn listed BancOhio National Bank as having a claim incurred in October of 2008 in the amount of $4,000 secured by a 2001 Oldsmobile. The car is listed as having a market value of $4,100. During the period from June 30, 2009, to September 30, 2009, Conn made three payments totaling $439.17 to BancOhio. May the trustee in bankruptcy set aside those three payments as voidable preferences? Explain.
12. David files a bankruptcy petition under Chapter 13. After the claims of secured and priority creditors have been satisfied, David's remaining bankruptcy estate has a value of $100,000. David's creditors with allowed unsecured claims are owed $250,000 in total. Chris, an unsecured creditor, is owed $13,500. David's Chapter 13 plan proposes to pay

Chris $150 per month for three years. Should the bankruptcy court confirm David's plan? Explain.

13. Yolanda Christophe filed under Chapter 13 on April 19. Her scheduled debts consist of $11,100 of secured debt, $9,300 owed on an unsecured student loan, and $6,960 of other unsecured debt. Christophe asserts that the student loan is nondischargeable and that assertion has not been questioned. Christophe's proposed amended Chapter 13 plan calls for fifty-six monthly payments of $440 a month. The questioned provision in that plan is the division of the unsecured creditors into two classes. Under Christophe's proposed plan, the general unsecured creditors would receive 32 percent and the separately classified student loan creditor would receive 100 percent. Should this plan be confirmed?
14. On December 17 ZZZZ Best Co., Inc. (the debtor), borrowed $7 million from Union Bank (the bank). On July 8 of the following year the debtor filed a voluntary petition for bankruptcy under Chapter 7. During the preceding ninety days, the debtor had made interest payments of $100,000 to the bank on the loan. The trustee of the debtor's estate filed a complaint against the bank to recover those payments as a voidable preference. The bank asserts that the payments were not voidable because they came within the ordinary course of business exception. The trustee maintains that the exception applies only to short-term, not long-term, debt. Who is correct? Explain.
15. A landlord owned several residential properties, one of which was subject to a local rent control ordinance. The local rent control administrator determined that the landlord had been charging rents above the levels permitted by the ordinance and ordered him to refund the wrongfully collected rents to the affected tenants. The landlord did not comply with the order. The landlord subsequently filed for relief under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code, seeking to discharge his debts. The tenants filed an adversary proceeding against the landlord in the bankruptcy court, arguing that the debt owed to them arose from rent payments obtained by "actual fraud" and that the debt was therefore nondischargeable under the Bankruptcy Code. They also sought treble damages and attorneys' fees and costs pursuant to the state Consumer Fraud Act. The bankruptcy court ruled in favor of the tenants, finding that the landlord had committed “actual fraud” and that his conduct violated state law. The court therefore awarded the tenants treble damages totaling $94,147.50. Does the Bankruptcy Code bar the discharge of treble damages awarded on account of the debtor’s fraud? Explain.

- 16. Leonard and Arlene Warner sold the Warner Manufacturing Company to Elliott and Carol Archer for $610,000. A few months later the Archers sued the Warners in a state court for fraud connected with the sale. The parties settled the lawsuit for $300,000. The Warners paid the Archers $200,000 and executed a promissory note for the remaining $100,000. After the Warners failed to make the first payment on the $100,000 promissory note, the Archers sued for the payment in state court. The Warners then filed for bankruptcy under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. The Archers asked the bankruptcy court to find the $100,000 debt nondischargeable arguing that the promissory note debt was nondischargeable because it was for “money obtained by fraud.” Arlene Warner argued that the $100,000 debt was dischargeable in bankruptcy because it was a new debt for money promised in a settlement contract and that it was not a debt for money obtained by fraud. Explain whether the debt is dischargeable in bankruptcy.

SECURITIES REGULATION

The merchandise of securities is really traffic in the economic and social welfare of our people. Such traffic demands the utmost good and fair dealing on the part of those engaged in it. If the country is to flourish, capital must be invested in the enterprise.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Explain the disclosure requirements of the 1933 Act, including which securities and transactions are exempt from these disclosure requirements.
2. Explain the potential civil liabilities under the 1933 Act.
3. List which provisions of the 1934 Act apply only to publicly held companies and which apply to all companies.
4. Explain the disclosure requirements of the 1934 Act.
5. Explain the potential civil liabilities under the 1934 Act.

The primary purpose of federal securities regulation is to prevent fraudulent practices in the sale of securities and thereby to foster public confidence in the securities market. Federal securities law consists principally of two statutes: the Securities Act of 1933, which focuses on the issuance of securities, and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, which deals mainly with trading in issued securities. These “secondary” transactions greatly exceed in number and dollar value the original offerings by issuers.

Both statutes are administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), an independent, quasi-judicial agency consisting of five commissioners. In 1996 Congress enacted legislation requiring the SEC, when making rules under either of the securities statutes, to consider, in addition to the protection of investors, whether its action will promote efficiency, competition, and capital formation. The SEC has the power to seek civil injunctions in a federal district court against violation of the statutes; to recommend that the Justice Department bring criminal prosecutions; and to issue orders censuring, suspending, or expelling broker-dealers, investment advisers, and investment companies. The Securities Enforcement Remedies and Penny Stock Reform Act of 1990 granted the SEC the power to issue cease and desist orders and to impose administrative, civil penalties up to $725,000. Congress enacted the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995 (Reform Act) to amend both the 1933 Act and the 1934 Act. One of its provisions grants authority to the SEC to bring civil actions for specified violations of the 1934 Act against aiders and abettors (those who knowingly provide substantial assistance to a person who violates the statute).

The Reform Act sought to prevent abuses in private securities fraud lawsuits. To prevent certain state private securities class action lawsuits alleging fraud from being used to frustrate the objectives of the Reform Act, Congress enacted the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act of 1998. The Act sets national standards for securities class action lawsuits involving nationally traded securities while it preserves the appropriate enforcement powers of state securities regulators but does not change the current treatment of individual lawsuits. The 1998 Act amends both the 1933 Act and the 1934 Act by prohibiting any private class action suit in state or federal court by any private party based upon state statutory or common law alleging (1) an untrue statement or omission in connection with the purchase or sale of a covered security or (2) that the defendant used any manipulative or deceptive device in connection with such a transaction.

In response to the business scandals involving companies such as Enron, WorldCom, Global Crossing, Adelphia, and Arthur Andersen in 2002, Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which amends the securities acts in a number of significant respects. The Act allows the SEC to add civil penalties to a disgorgement fund for the benefit of victims of violations of the 1933 Act or the 1934 Act. Other provisions of the Act are discussed later in this chapter as well as in Chapters 6, 36, and 44.

The 1933 Act has two basic objectives: (1) to provide investors with material information concerning securities offered for sale to the public and (2) to prohibit misrepresentation, deceit, and other fraudulent acts and unfair practices in the sale of securities generally, whether or not they are required to be registered.

The 1934 Act extends protection to investors trading in securities that are already issued and outstanding. The 1934 Act also imposes disclosure requirements on publicly held corporations and regulates tender offers and proxy solicitations.

The SEC has recognized that the “use of electronic media also enhances the efficiency of the securities markets by allowing for the rapid dissemination of information to investors and financial markets in a more cost-efficient, widespread, and equitable manner than traditional paper-based methods.” The SEC has provided interpretative guidance for the use of electronic media for the delivery of information required by the federal securities laws. The SEC defined electronic media to include audiotapes, videotapes, facsimiles, CD-ROM, electronic mail, bulletin boards, Internet websites, and computer networks. Basically, electronic delivery must provide notice, access, and evidence of delivery comparable to that provided by paper delivery.

The SEC has established the EDGAR (Electronic Data Gathering, Analysis, and Retrieval) computer system, which performs automated collection, validation, indexing, acceptance, and dissemination of reports required to be filed with the SEC. Its primary purpose is to increase the efficiency and fairness of the securities market for the benefit of investors, corporations, and the economy by speeding up the receipt, acceptance, dissemination, and analysis of corporate information filed with the SEC. The SEC requires all public domestic companies to make their filings on EDGAR, except filings exempted for hardship. EDGAR filings are posted at the SEC’s website twenty-four hours after the date of filing.

In addition to the federal laws regulating the sale of securities, each state has its own laws regulating such sales within its borders. Commonly called Blue Sky Laws, these statutes all have provisions prohibiting fraud in the sale of securities. In addition, most states require the registration of securities and regulate brokers and dealers. The Uniform Securities Act of 1956 has been adopted at one time or another, in whole or in part, by 37 jurisdictions, whereas the Revised Uniform Securities Act of 1985 has been adopted in only a few states. Both Acts, however, have been preempted in part by the National Securities Markets Improvement Act of 1996 and the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act of 1998. In 2002 the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws promulgated a new Uniform Securities Act, which has been adopted by at least thirteen states. The 2002 Uniform Securities Act seeks to give states regulatory and enforcement authority that minimizes duplication of regulatory resources and that blends with federal regulation and enforcement.

Any person who sells securities must comply with the federal securities laws as well as with the securities laws of each state in which he intends to offer his securities. However, in 1996 Congress enacted the National Securities Markets Improvements Act, which preempted state regulation of many offerings of securities. Because state securities laws vary greatly, we will discuss only the 1933 Act and the 1934 Act in this chapter.

THE SECURITIES ACT OF 1933

The 1933 Act, also called the “Truth in Securities Act,” requires that a registration statement be filed with the SEC and that it become effective before any securities may be offered for sale to the public, unless either the transaction in which the securities are offered or the securities themselves are exempt from registration. The purpose of registration is to disclose financial and other information about the issuer and those who control it, so that potential investors may consider the merits of the securities. The 1933 Act also requires that potential investors be furnished with a prospectus (a document offering the securities for sale to interested buyers) containing the important data set forth in the registration statement. The 1933 Act prohibits fraud in all sales of securities involving interstate commerce or the mails, even if the securities are exempt from the 1933 Act's registration and disclosure requirements. Civil and criminal liability may be imposed for violations of the 1933 Act.

The National Securities Markets Improvements Act of 1996 broadly authorized the SEC to issue regulations or rules exempting any person, security, or transaction from any of the provisions of the 1933 Act or the SEC's rules promulgated under that Act. This authorization extends so far as such exemption is necessary or appropriate in the public interest and is consistent with the protection of investors.

Definition of a Security

The 1933 Act defines the term security to include any note; stock; bond; debenture; evidence of indebtedness; preorganization certificate or subscription; investment contract; voting-trust certificate; fractional undivided interest in oil, gas, or other mineral rights; or, in general, any interest or instrument commonly known as a security. This definition broadly includes the many types of instruments that fall within the ordinary concept of a security. Furthermore, the courts generally have interpreted the statutory definition to include nontraditional forms of investments. The Supreme Court, more specifically, employs a two-tier analysis to identify securities. Under this analysis, the Court will presumptively treat as a security a financial instrument designated as a note, stock, bond, or other instrument specifically named in the Act.

On the other hand, if a financial transaction lacks the traditional characteristics of an instrument specifically named in the Act, the Court has used a three-part test, derived from Securities and Exchange Commission v. W. J. Howey Co., to determine whether that financial transaction constitutes an investment contract and thus a security. Under the Howey test, a financial instrument or transaction constitutes an investment contract if it involves (1) an investment in a common venture (2) premised on a reasonable expectation of profit (3) to be derived from the entrepreneurial or managerial efforts of others. Thus, limited partnership interests are usually considered securities because limited partners may not participate in management or control of the limited partnership. On the other hand, general partnership interests are usually held not to be securities because general partners have the right to participate in management of the general partnership. Thus, interests in limited liability companies (LLCs) are considered securities when the members do not take part in management (manager-managed LLCs) but are not deemed securities when the members exercise control of the company (member-managed LLCs). In certain circumstances, investments in citrus groves, whiskey warehouse receipts, real estate condominiums, cattle, franchises, and pyramid schemes have been held to be securities under the Howey test.

Practical Advice

Because securities are so broadly defined, if you plan to sell any type of financial investment, be sure to obtain legal counsel to assist you in complying with the requirements of the securities laws.

SEC V. EDWARDS

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, 2004

FACTS Charles Edwards was the chairman, CEO, and sole shareholder of ETS Payphones, Inc. (ETS), which sold payphones to the public via independent distributors. The payphones were offered with a site lease, a five-year leaseback and management agreement, and a buyback agreement. The purchase price for the payphone packages was approximately $7,000. Under the leaseback and management agreement, purchasers received $82 per month, a 14 percent annual return. Purchasers were not involved in the day-to-day operation of the payphones they owned as

ETS selected the site for the phone, installed the equipment, arranged for connection and long-distance service, collected coin revenues, and maintained and repaired the phones. Under the buyback agreement, ETS promised to refund the full purchase price of the package at the end of the lease or within one hundred and eighty days of a purchaser's request.

In its marketing materials and on its website, ETS trumpeted the “incomparable pay phone” as “an exciting business opportunity,” in which recent deregulation had “open[ed] the door for profits for individual pay phone owners and operators.” According to ETS, very “few business opportunities can offer the potential for ongoing revenue generation that is available in today's pay telephone industry.” Ten thousand people invested a total of $300 million in the payphone sale-and-leaseback arrangements.

The payphones did not generate enough revenue for ETS to make the payments required by the leaseback agreements, so the company depended on funds from new investors to meet its obligations. After ETS filed for bankruptcy protection, the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) brought this civil enforcement action. It alleged that Edwards and ETS had violated the registration requirements and antifraud provisions of the Securities Act of 1933, as well as Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and Rule 10b-5 under that section.

The district court concluded that the payphone sale-and-leaseback arrangement was an investment contract within the meaning of, and therefore was subject to, the federal securities laws. The Court of Appeals reversed holding that respondent's scheme was not an investment contract.

DECISION The judgment of the U.S. Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded.

OPINION O'Connor, J. “Congress' purpose in enacting the securities laws was to regulate investments, in whatever form they are made and by whatever name they are called.” [Citation.] To that end, it enacted a broad definition of “security,” sufficient “to encompass virtually any instrument that might be sold as an investment.” [Citation.] *** [The 1993 Act and the 1934 Act] define “security” to include “any note, stock, treasury stock, security future, bond, debenture, ... investment contract, ... [or any] instrument commonly known as a ‘security’.” “Investment contract” is not itself defined.

The test for whether a particular scheme is an investment contract was established in our decision in SEC v. W. J. Howey Co., [citation]. We look to “whether the scheme involves an investment of money in a common enterprise with profits to come solely from the efforts of others.” [Citation.] This definition “embodies a flexible rather than a static principle, one that is capable of adaptation to meet the countless and variable schemes devised by those who seek the use of the money of others on the promise of profits.” [Citation.]

* * * Thus, when we held that “profits” must “come solely from the efforts of others,” we were speaking of the profits that investors seek on their investment, not the profits of the scheme in which they invest. We used “profits” in the sense of income or return, to include, for example, dividends, other periodic payments, or the increased value of the investment.

There is no reason to distinguish between promises of fixed returns and promises of variable returns for purposes of the test, so understood. In both cases, the investing public is attracted by representations of investment income, as purchasers were in this case by ETS' invitation to “watch the profits add up.” [Citation.] Moreover, investments pitched as low-risk (such as those offering a “guaranteed” fixed return) are particularly attractive to individuals more vulnerable to investment fraud, including older and less sophisticated investors. [Citation.] Under the reading respondent advances, unscrupulous marketers of investments could evade the securities laws by picking a rate of return to promise. We will not read into the securities laws a limitation not compelled by the language that would so undermine the laws' purposes.

We hold that an investment scheme promising a fixed rate of return can be an “investment contract” and thus a “security” subject to the federal securities laws. * * *

INTERPRETATION An investment scheme promising a fixed rate of return can be an “investment contract” and thus a “security” subject to the federal securities laws.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION How would you define a security? Explain.

Registration of Securities

The 1933 Act prohibits the offer or sale of any security through the use of the mails or any means of interstate commerce unless a registration statement for the securities being offered is in effect or the issuer secures an exemption from registration. The purpose of registration is to adequately and accurately disclose financial and other information on which investors may judge the merits of securities. However, registration does not insure investors against loss—the SEC does not judge the financial merits of any security. Moreover, the SEC does not guarantee the accuracy of the information presented in the registration statement.

Practical Advice

When deciding whether to invest in a publicly offered security, keep in mind that the SEC does not pass on the merits of the securities nor does it guarantee the accuracy of the statements made in the registration statement or prospectus.

DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS

In general, registration (Form S-1) calls for disclosure of information such as (1) a description of the registrant's properties, business, and competition; (2) a description of the significant provisions of the security to be offered for sale and its relationship to the registrant's other capital securities; (3) information about the management of the registrant; and (4) financial statements certified by independent public accountants. In 1992, the SEC imposed new disclosure requirements regarding compensation paid to senior executives and directors. In 2006 the SEC amended these rules to mandate clearer and more complete disclosure of compensation paid to directors, the chief executive officer (CEO), the chief financial officer (CFO), and the three other highest paid executive officers. The registration statement must be signed by the issuer, its CEO, its CFO, its chief accounting officer, and a majority of its board of directors.

A registration statement and the prospectus become public immediately on filing with the SEC, and investors can access them using EDGAR. The effective date of a registration statement is the twentieth day after filing, although the commission, at its discretion, may advance the effective date or require an amendment to the filing, which will begin a new twenty-day period. After the effective date, the issuer may make sales, provided the purchaser has received a final prospectus. The SEC has adopted rules to provide for an "access equals delivery" prospectus delivery model: the final prospectus delivery obligations are satisfied without printing and actually delivering final prospectuses if the issuer timely filed a final prospectus with the SEC.

In 1998 the SEC issued a rule requiring issuers to write and design the cover page, summary, and risk factors section of their prospectuses in plain English. In these sections, issuers must use short sentences; definite, concrete, everyday language; tabular presentation of complex information; no legal or business jargon; and no multiple negatives. Issuers also must design these sections to make them inviting to the reader and free from legalese and repetition that blur important information.

INTEGRATED DISCLOSURE

The disclosure system under the 1933 Act developed independently of that required by the 1934 Act, which we will discuss later in this chapter. As a result, issuers subject to both statutes were compelled to provide duplicative or overlapping disclosure. Then, in 1982, the SEC, in an effort to reduce or eliminate unnecessary duplication of corporate reporting, adopted an integrated system that provides for different levels of disclosure, depending on the issuer's reporting history and market following. All issuers may use the detailed form (Form S-1) described previously. The SEC has amended these rules to recognize four categories of issuers: non-reporting issuers, unseasoned issuers, seasoned issuers, and well-known seasoned issuers.

1. A non-reporting issuer is an issuer that is not required to file reports under the 1934 Act. Such an issuer must use Form S-1.
2. An unseasoned issuer is an issuer that has reported continuously under the 1934 Act for at least three years. Such an issuer must use Form S-1 but is permitted to disclose less detailed information and to incorporate some information by reference to reports filed under the 1934 Act.
3. A seasoned issuer is an issuer that has filed continuously under the 1934 Act for at least one year and has a minimum market value of publicly held voting and nonvoting stock of $75 million. Such an issuer is permitted to use Form S-3, thus disclosing even less detail in the 1933 Act registration and incorporating even more information by reference to 1934 Act reports. Effective on January 28, 2008, an issuer that does not meet the $75 million public float requirement can use Form S-3 if it (a) has a class of common equity securities listed and registered on a national securities exchange, (b) has a class of securities registered under the 1934 Act, (c) has filed continuously under the 1934 Act for at least one year, and (d) does not sell more than the equivalent of one-third of its public float in primary offerings over any period of twelve calendar months. "Public float" means the value of a company's outstanding shares that is in the hands of public investors, as opposed to company officers, directors, or controlling-interest investors.
4. A well-known seasoned issuer is an issuer that has filed continuously under the 1934 Act for at least one year and has either (a) a minimum worldwide market value of its outstanding publicly held voting and nonvoting stock of $700 million or (b) $1 billion of nonconvertible debt or preferred stock that have been issued for cash in a registered offering within the preceding three years. A well-known seasoned issuer is also eligible to use Form S-3.

In 1992, the SEC established an integrated registration and reporting system for small business issuers. These rules are intended to facilitate access to the public financial markets for startup and developing companies and to reduce costs for small business issuers wishing to have their securities traded in public markets. As amended in 2008, the rules define a small business issuer as a noninvestment company with less than $75 million in public float. When a company is unable to calculate public float, however, the standard is less than $50 million in revenue in the last fiscal year.

SHELF REGISTRATIONS

As amended in 2005, shelf registrations permit seasoned and well-known seasoned issuers to register unlimited amounts of securities that are to be offered and sold “off the shelf” on a delayed or continuous basis in the future. The information in the original registration must be kept accurate and current and the issuer must reasonably expect that the securities will be sold within three years of the effective date of the registration. Well-known seasoned issuers are eligible for a more streamlined shelf-registration process and automatic effectiveness of shelf registration statements upon filing. Shelf registrations allow issuers to respond more quickly to market conditions such as changes in stock prices and interest rates.

COMMUNICATIONS

The SEC’s 2005 revisions greatly liberalize the rules regarding written communications before and during registered securities offerings. These rules create a new type of written communication, called a “free-writing prospectus,” which is any written offer, including electronic communications, other than a statutory prospectus. The flexibility provided under the new rules depends upon the characteristics of the issuer, including the type of issuer, the issuer’s history of reporting, and the issuer’s market capitalization.

1. Well-known seasoned issuers may engage at any time in oral and written communications, including a free-writing prospectus, subject to certain conditions.
2. All reporting issuers (unseasoned issuers, seasoned issuers, and well-known seasoned issuers) may at any time continue to publish regularly released factual business information and forward-looking information (predictions).
3. Non-reporting issuers may at any time continue to publish factual business information that is regularly released and intended for use by persons other than in their capacity as investors or potential investors.
4. Communications by issuers more than thirty days before filing a registration statement are permitted so long as they do not refer to a securities offering that is the subject of a registration statement.
5. All issuers may use a free-writing prospectus after the filing of the registration statement, subject to certain conditions.

Exempt Securities

The 1933 Act exempts a number of specific securities (called exempt securities) from its registration requirements. Because these exemptions apply to the securities themselves, they also may be resold without registration.

SHORT-TERM COMMERCIAL PAPER

The Act exempts any note, draft, or bankers’ acceptance (a draft accepted by a bank), issued for working capital, that has a maturity of not more than nine months when issued. This exemption is not available, however, if the proceeds are to be used for permanent purposes, such as the acquisition of a plant, or if the paper is of a type not ordinarily purchased by the general public.

OTHER EXEMPT SECURITIES

The 1933 Act also exempts the following kinds of securities from registration: (1) securities issued or guaranteed by domestic governmental organizations, such as municipal bonds; (2) securities of domestic banks and savings and loan associations; (3) securities of nonprofit charitable organizations; (4) certain securities issued by federally regulated common carriers; and (5) insurance policies and annuity contracts issued by state-regulated insurance companies.

Exempt Transactions for Issuers

In addition to exempting specific types of securities, the 1933 Act also exempts issuers from the registration requirements for certain kinds of transactions. These exempt transactions include (1) private placements (Rule 506), (2) limited offers not exceeding $5 million (Rule 505), (3) limited offers not exceeding $1 million (Rule 504), and (4) limited offers solely to accredited investors (Section 4(6)). Except for some issuances under Rule 504, these registration exemptions apply only to the transaction in which the securities are issued; therefore, any resale must be made by registration, unless the resale qualifies as an exempt transaction.

In addition, the 1933 Act identifies a number of securities exemptions that are in effect transaction exemptions. These include intrastate issues, exchanges between an issuer and its security holders, and reorganization securities issued and exchanged with court or other governmental approval. Moreover, the Bankruptcy Act exempts securities issued by a debtor if they are offered under a reorganization plan in exchange for a claim or interest in the debtor. These exemptions apply only to the original issuance, and resales may be made only by registration, unless the resale qualifies as an exempt transaction.

Another transaction exemption is Regulation A, which permits an issuer to sell a limited amount of securities in an unregistered public offering, if certain conditions are met. Unlike other transaction exemptions, Regulation A places no restrictions upon the resale of securities issued pursuant to it.

Practical Advice

If you plan to issue securities, carefully explore the possibility of using a transaction that is exempt from registration.

LIMITED OFFERS

The 1933 Act exempts, or authorizes the SEC to exempt, transactions that do not require the protection of registration because they either involve a small amount of money or are made in a limited manner. Promulgated in 1982 to simplify and clarify the transaction exemptions relating to small issues and small issuers, Regulation D contains three separate exemptions (Rules 504, 505, and 506), each involving limited offers. Section 4(6), also aimed at small issues, is a companion section to the exemptions under Regulation D. Each of these exemptions requires the issuer to file a Form D with the SEC. Effective September 15, 2008, the information required by Form D may be filed electronically. After a phase-in period, electronic filing will be mandatory.

Securities sold pursuant to these exemptions (with the exception of some sold pursuant to Rule 504) are considered restricted securities and may be resold only by registration or in another transaction exempt from registration. An issuer who uses these exemptions must take reasonable care to prevent nonexempt, unregistered resales of restricted securities. Reasonable care includes, but is not limited to, the following: (1) making a reasonable inquiry to determine whether the purchaser is acquiring the securities for herself or for other persons; (2) providing written disclosure, prior to the sale to each purchaser, that the securities have not been registered and therefore cannot be resold unless they are registered or unless an exemption from registration is available; and (3) placing a legend on the securities certificate stating that the securities have not been registered and that they are restricted securities.

Private Placements The most important transaction exemption for issuers is the so-called private placement provision of the Act, which exempts “transactions by an issuer not involving any public offering.” SEC Rule 506 establishes for all issuers a nonexclusive safe harbor for limited offers and sales without regard to the dollar amount of the offering. Satisfying the rule ensures the exemption, but there is no presumption that the exemption is unavailable for transactions that do not comply with the rule.

Securities sold under this exemption are restricted securities and may be resold only by registration or in a transaction exempt from registration. General advertising or solicitation is not permitted. The issue may be purchased by an unlimited number of “accredited investors” and by no more than thirty-five other purchasers. Accredited investors include banks, insurance companies, investment companies, executive officers or directors of the issuer, savings and loan associations, registered broker-dealers, certain employee benefit plans with total assets in excess of $5 million, any person whose net worth exceeds $1 million, and any person whose income exceeded $200,000 in each of the two preceding years and who reasonably expects an income in excess of $200,000 in the current year. If the sale involves any nonaccredited investors, the issuer must, before the sale, give such purchasers specified material information about the issuer, its business, and the securities being offered. If all the purchasers are accredited investors, such disclosure is not mandatory. The issuer must reasonably believe that each purchaser who is not an accredited investor has sufficient knowledge and experience in financial and business matters to evaluate the merits and risks of the investment or has the services of a representative who possesses such knowledge and experience. The issuer must notify the SEC of sales made under the exemption and must take precautions against nonexempt, unregistered resales.

Limited Offers Not Exceeding $5 Million SEC Rule 505 exempts from registration those offerings by noninvestment company issuers that do not exceed $5 million over twelve months. Securities sold under this exemption are restricted securities and may be resold only by registration or in a transaction exempt from registration. General advertising or general solicitation is not permitted. The issue may be purchased by an unlimited number of accredited investors and by no more than thirty-five other purchasers. If the sale involves any nonaccredited investors, the issuer must, before the sale, give them specified material information about the issuer, its business, and the securities being offered; otherwise, such disclosure is not required. Unlike the issuer under Rule 506, however, the issuer under Rule 505 is not required to believe reasonably that each nonaccredited investor, either alone or with his representative, has sufficient knowledge and experience in financial matters to be capable of evaluating the investment’s merits and risks. As under Rule 506, the issuer must take precautions against nonexempt, unregistered resales and must notify the SEC of sales made under the exemption.

Limited Offers Not Exceeding $1 Million As amended in 1999, SEC Rule 504 provides private, noninvestment company issuers with an exemption from registration for issues not exceeding $1 million within twelve months. (Issuers required to report under the 1934 Act and investment companies may not use Rule 504.) The issuer is to notify the SEC of sales under the rule, which permits sales to an unlimited number of investors and does not require the issuer to furnish any information to them.

If the issuance meets certain conditions, Rule 504 permits general solicitations, and acquired shares are freely transferable. The conditions are that the issuance is either (1) registered under state law requiring public filing and delivery of a disclosure document to investors before sale or (2) exempted under state law permitting general solicitation and advertising so long as sales are made only to accredited investors.

If the issuance does not meet these conditions, general solicitation and advertising are not permitted. Moreover, the securities issued are restricted, and the issuer must take precautions against nonexempt, unregistered resales.

Limited Offers Solely to Accredited Investors In 1980, Congress added Section 4(6), which provides an exemption for offers and sales, not in excess of $5 million, made by an issuer solely to accredited investors. General advertising or public solicitation is not permitted. As with Rules 505 and 506, an unlimited number of accredited investors may purchase the issue; however, Section 4(6) allows no unaccredited investors to purchase. No information is required to be furnished to the purchasers. Securities sold under this exemption are restricted securities and may be resold only by registration or in a transaction exempt from registration. The issuer must notify the SEC of sales made under the exemption and must take precautions against nonexempt, unregistered resales.

REGULATION A

As amended in 1992, Regulation A permits an issuer to offer up to $5 million of securities in any twelve-month period without registering them, provided that the issuer files an offering statement with the SEC prior to the sale of the securities. An offering circular must also be provided to offerees and purchasers. The issuer may make offers upon filing the offering statement but may make sales only after the SEC has qualified it. (Issuers required to report under the 1934 Act and investment companies may not use Regulation A.) Regulation A filings are less detailed and time consuming than full registration statements, and the required financial statements are simpler and need not be audited unless the issuer has audited financial statements prepared for other purposes. now may use an optional, simplified question-and-answer disclosure document.

Regulation A sets no restrictions regarding the number or qualifications of investors who may purchase securities under its provisions. Furthermore, securities sold under Regulation A may be resold freely after they are issued.

INTRASTATE ISSUES

The 1933 Act also exempts from registration any security that is a part of an issue offered and sold only to persons who live in a single state where the issuer of such security is a resident and doing business. This exemption is intended to apply to local issues representing local financing carried out by local persons through local investments. The exemption does not apply if any offeree, who need not become a purchaser, is not a resident of the state in which the issuer is a resident.

Rule 147, promulgated by the SEC, provides a non-exclusive safe harbor for securing the intrastate exemption. Although satisfying the rule ensures the exemption, the exemption is not presumed to be unavailable for transactions that do not comply with the rule. Rule 147 requires that (1) the issuer be incorporated or organized in the state in which the issuance occurs; (2) the issuer be doing business principally in that state, meaning that the issuer must derive 80 percent of its gross revenues from that state, 80 percent of its assets must be located in that state, and 80 percent of the net proceeds from the issue must be used in that state; (3) all of the offerees and purchasers be residents of that state; (4) no resales to nonresidents be made during the period of sale and for nine months after the last sale; and (5) the issuer take precautions against interstate distributions. Such precautions include (1) placing on the security certificate a legend stating that the securities have not been registered and that resales can be made only to residents of the state and (2) obtaining a written statement of residence from each purchaser.

See Concept Review 40-1.

Exempt Transactions for Non-Issuers

The 1933 Act requires registration for any sale by any person (including non-issuers) of any nonexempt security, unless a statutory exemption can be found for the transaction. The act, however, provides a transaction exemption for any person other than an issuer, underwriter, or dealer. In addition, the Act exempts most transactions by dealers and brokers. These three provisions exempt from the registration requirements of the 1933 Act most secondary transactions, that is, the numerous resales that occur on an exchange or in the over-the-counter market. Nevertheless, these exemptions do not extend to some situations involving resales by non-issuers, in particular to (1) resales of restricted securities acquired under Regulation D (Rules 506, 505, or 504) or Section 4(6) and (2) sales of restricted or non-restricted securities by affiliates. Such sales must be made pursuant to registration, Rule 144, or Regulation A, subject to the limited exception provided to some issuances by Rule 504. An affiliate is a person who controls, is controlled by, or is under common control with the issuer. Control is the direct or indirect possession of the power to direct the management and policies of a person through ownership of securities, by contract, or otherwise.

Practical Advice

If you acquire restricted securities, do not resell them until you register them—which is rarely feasible—or you comply with an exemption for non-issuers.

RULE 144

Rule 144 of the SEC sets forth conditions that, if met by an affiliate or by any person selling restricted securities, exempt her from registering such securities. As amended in 2008, the rule imposes less strict requirements on resales of securities of issuers that are subject to the reporting requirements of the 1934 Act than on resales of securities of non-reporting issuers.

Non-Reporting Issuers Amended Rule 144 requires for an affiliate selling restricted securities that there be adequate current public information about the issuer, that the affiliate selling under the rule have owned the restricted securities for at least one year, that she sell them only in limited amounts in unsolicited brokers' transactions, and that notice of the sale be provided to the SEC. An affiliate selling non-restricted securities is subject to the same requirements except that the one-year holding period is not applicable.

A person who is not an affiliate of the issuer when the restricted securities are sold and who has owned the restricted securities for at least one year, may sell them in unlimited amounts and is not subject to any of the other requirements of Rule 144.

Reporting Issuers Amended Rule 144 requires for an affiliate selling restricted securities that there be adequate current public information about the issuer, that the affiliate selling under the rule have owned the restricted securities for at least six months, that he sell them only in limited amounts in unsolicited brokers' transactions, and that notice of the sale be provided to the SEC. An affiliate selling non-restricted securities is subject to the same requirements except there is no holding period.

If there is adequate current public information about the issuer, a person who is not an affiliate of the issuer when the restricted securities are sold and has owned the restricted securities for at least six months may sell them in unlimited amounts and is not subject to any of the other requirements of Rule 144. After one year, the non-affiliate selling restricted securities need not comply with the current information requirement of Rule 144.

REGULATION A

Regulation A, in addition to providing issuers an exemption from registration for securities up to $5 million, also provides an exemption for non-issuers. The regulation places a $1.5 million limit on the total amount of securities sold by all non-issuers in any twelve-month period. Use of this exemption requires compliance with all of the conditions Regulation A imposes upon issuers, as discussed previously.

Liability

To implement its objectives of providing full disclosure and preventing fraud in the sale of securities, the 1933 Act imposes a number of sanctions for noncompliance with its requirements. These sanctions include administrative remedies by the SEC, civil liability to injured investors, and criminal penalties. In addition, the court may award attorneys' fees against any party who brings suit or asserts a defense without merit.

The Reform Act provides “forward-looking” statements (predictions) a “safe harbor” under the 1933 Act from civil liability that is based on an untrue statement of material fact or an omission of a material fact necessary to make the statement not misleading. The safe harbor applies only to issuers required to report under the 1934 Act. The safe harbor eliminates civil liability if a forward-looking statement is (1) immaterial, (2) made without actual knowledge that it was false or misleading, or (3) identified as a forward-looking statement and is accompanied by meaningful cautionary statements identifying important factors that could cause actual results to differ materially from those predicted. “Forward-looking” statements include projections of revenues, income, earnings per share, capital expenditures, dividends, or capital structure; management's plans and objectives for future operations; and statements of future economic performance. The safe harbor provision, however, does not cover statements made in connection with an initial public offering, a tender offer, a going private transaction, or offerings by a partnership or an LLC.

UNREGISTERED SALES

Section 12(a)(1) of the Act imposes express civil liability for the sale of an unregistered security that is required to be registered, the sale of a registered security without delivery of a prospectus, the sale of a security by use of an outdated prospectus, or the offer of a sale before the filing of the registration statement. Liability is strict or absolute, because there are no defenses. The person who purchases a security sold in violation of this provision has the right to tender it back to the seller and recover the purchase price. If the purchaser no longer owns the security, he may recover monetary damages from the seller.

FALSE REGISTRATION STATEMENTS

When securities have been sold subject to a registration statement, Section 11 of the Act imposes express liability on those who have included any untrue statement of a material fact in the registration statement or who have omitted any material fact from it. Material matters are those to which a reasonable investor would be substantially likely to attach importance in determining whether to purchase the security registered. Usually, proof of reliance upon the misstatement or omission is not required. The section imposes liability on (1) the issuer; (2) all persons who signed the registration statement, including the principal executive officer, principal financial officer, and principal accounting officer; (3) every person who was a director or partner; (4) every accountant, engineer, appraiser, or expert who prepared or certified any part of the registration statement; and (5) all underwriters. These persons generally are jointly and severally liable for the amount paid for the security, less either its value at the time of suit or the price for which it was sold, to any person who acquires the security without knowledge of the untruth or omission. A defendant is not liable for any or the entire amount otherwise recoverable under Section 11 that the defendant proves was caused by something other than the defective disclosure.

An expert is liable only for misstatements or omissions in the portion of the registration that she prepared or certified. Moreover, any defendant, other than the issuer (who has strict liability), may assert the defense of due diligence. The due diligence defense generally requires the defendant to show that he had reasonable grounds to believe and did believe that there were no untrue statements or material omissions. In some instances, due diligence requires a reasonable investigation to determine grounds for belief. The standard of reasonableness for such investigation and such grounds is that required of a prudent person in the management of his own property.

ESCOTT V. BARCHRIS CONST. CORP.

U.S. DISTRICT COURT, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK, 1968
283 F.SUPP. 643

FACTS BarChris Construction Corporation sold shares of common stock to the public in December 1959. By early 1961, BarChris needed additional working capital and sold debentures to meet this need. A registration statement was filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) in March 1961, with amendments filed in May. By the time BarChris received the net proceeds of this sale, it was experiencing financial difficulties. Eventually BarChris filed for bankruptcy. Escott, a purchaser of the debentures, brought suit under the Securities Act of 1933 against BarChris, the underwriters, the company's auditors (Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co.), and the persons who signed the registration, alleging that the registration statement contained materially false statements and material omissions. The defendants denied the falsity of the statements and their materiality. Furthermore, all of the defendants, except BarChris, claimed that they individually had exercised due diligence in connection with the statement so as to be free from liability under the statute.

DECISION Judgment for Escott granted.

OPINION McLean, J. It is a prerequisite to liability under Section 11 of the Act that the fact which is falsely stated in a registration statement, or the fact that is omitted when it should have been stated to avoid misleading, be "material." The regulations of the Securities and Exchange Commission pertaining to the registration of securities define the word as follows:

The term "material," when used to qualify a requirement for the furnishing of information as to any subject, limits the information required to those matters as to which an average prudent investor ought reasonably to be informed before purchasing the security registered.

***

The average prudent investor is not concerned with minor inaccuracies or with errors as to matters which are of no interest to him. The facts which tend to deter him from purchasing a security are facts which have an important bearing upon the nature or condition of the issuing corporation or its business.

Judged by this test, there is no doubt that many of the misstatements and omissions in this prospect were material. ***

***

Section 11(b) of the Act provides that:

*** no person, other than the issuer, shall be liable *** who shall sustain the burden of proof—

***

(3) that (A) as regards any part of the registration statement not purporting to be made on the authority of an expert *** he had, after reasonable investigation, reasonable ground to believe and did believe, at the time such part of the registration statement became effective, that the statements therein were true and that there was no omission to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading; *** and (C) as regards any part of the registration statement purporting to be made on the authority of an expert (other than himself) *** he had no reasonable ground to believe and did not believe, at the time such part of the registration statement became effective, that the statements therein were untrue or that there was an omission to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading ***

Section 11(c) defines “reasonable investigation” as follows:

In determining, for the purposes of paragraph (3) of subsection (b) of this section, what constitutes reasonable investigation and reasonable ground for belief, the standard of reasonableness shall be that required of a prudent man in the management of his own property.

Every defendant, except BarChris itself, to whom, as the issuer, these defenses are not available, and except Peat, Marwick, whose position rests on a different statutory provision, has pleaded these affirmative defenses. Each claims that (1) as to the part of the registration statement purporting to be made on the authority of an expert (which, for convenience, I shall refer to as the “expertised portion”), he had no reasonable ground to believe and did not believe that there were any untrue statements or material omissions, and (2) as to the other parts of the registration statement, he made a reasonable investigation, as a result of which he had reasonable ground to believe and did believe that the registration statement was true and that no material fact was omitted. As to each defendant, the question is whether he has sustained the burden of proving these defenses. Surprising enough, there is little or no judicial authority on this question. No decisions directly in point under Section 11 have been found.

Before considering the evidence, a preliminary matter should be disposed of. The defendants do not agree among themselves as to who the “experts” were or as to the parts of the registration statement which were expertised.

***

*** Neither the lawyer for the company nor the lawyer for the underwriters is an expert within the meaning of Section 11. The only expert, in the statutory sense, was Peat, Marwick, and the only parts of the registration statement which purported to be made upon the authority of an expert were the portions which purported to be made on Peat, Marwick’s authority.

[The court found that none of the defendants had sustained the burden of proving the due diligence defense.]

INTERPRETATION The 1933 Act imposes liability for material misstatements and omissions in a registration statement on the issuer, the directors, certain officers, experts, and the underwriters. These parties, except the issuer, may avoid liability by proving that they exercised due diligence in executing their duties with respect to the registration process.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the court’s decision? Explain.

ANTIFRAUD PROVISIONS

The 1933 Act also contains two antifraud provisions: Section 12(a)(2) and Section 17(a). In addition, Rule 10b–5 of the 1934 Act applies to the issuance or sale of all securities, even those exempted by the 1933 Act. Rule 10b–5 is discussed later in this chapter.

Section 12(a)(2) imposes express liability on any person who offers or sells a security by means of a prospectus or oral communication that contains an untrue statement of material fact or omits a material fact. This liability extends only to the immediate purchaser, provided she did not know of the untruth or omission. The seller may avoid liability by proving that he did not know, and in the exercise of reasonable care could not have known, of the untrue statement or omission. The seller is liable to the purchaser for the amount paid on tender of the security. If the purchaser no longer owns the security, she may recover damages from the seller. A defendant is not liable for any portion of or the entire amount otherwise recoverable under Section 12(a)(2) that the defendant proves was caused by something other than the defective disclosure.

Section 17(a) makes it unlawful for any person in the offer or sale of any securities, whether registered or not, to do any of the following when using any means of transportation or communication in interstate commerce or the mails: (1) employ any device, scheme, or artifice to defraud; (2) obtain money or property by means of any untrue statement of a material fact or any statement that omits a material fact, without which the information is misleading; or (3) engage in any transaction, practice, or course of business that operates or would operate as a fraud or deceit upon the purchaser. There is considerable doubt whether the courts may imply a private right of action for persons injured by violations of this section. The Supreme Court has reserved this question, and most lower courts have denied the existence of a private remedy. The SEC may, however, bring enforcement actions under Section 17(a).

CRIMINAL SANCTIONS

The 1933 Act imposes criminal sanctions on any person who willfully violates any of the provisions of the Act or the rules and regulations promulgated by the SEC pursuant to the Act. Conviction may carry a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment of not more than five years, or both.

The registration and liability provisions of the 1933 Act are summarized in Figure 40-2.

THE SECURITIES EXCHANGE ACT OF 1934

The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 deals mainly with the secondary distribution (resale) of securities. The 1934 Act’s definition of a security is substantially the same as that of the 1933 Act. The 1934 Act seeks to ensure fair and orderly securities markets by establishing rules for market operations and by prohibiting fraudulent and manipulative practices. It protects holders of all securities listed on national exchanges, as well as holders of equity securities of companies traded over the counter whose corporate assets exceed $10 million and whose equity securities include a class with five hundred or more shareholders. Companies must register such securities and are subject to the 1934 Act’s periodic reporting requirements, short-swing profits provision, tender offer provisions, and proxy solicitation provisions, as well as the internal control and recordkeeping requirements of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. In addition, issuers of securities, whether registered under the 1934 Act or not, must comply with the antifraud and antibribery provisions of the Act. Figure 40-3 illustrates the applicability of the 1934 Act's provisions to different types of issuers.

The National Securities Markets Improvements Act of 1996 broadly authorized the SEC to issue regulations, rules, or orders exempting any person, security, or transaction from any of the provisions of the 1934 Act or the SEC's rules promulgated under that Act. This authorization extends so far as such exemption is necessary or appropriate in the public interest and is consistent with the protection of investors. This exemptive authority does not, however, extend to the regulation of government securities broker-dealers.

Disclosure

The 1934 Act imposes significant disclosure requirements upon reporting companies. These include the filing of securities registrations, periodic reports, disclosure statements for proxy solicitations, and disclosure statements for tender offers, as well as complying with the accounting requirements imposed by the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. As part of its integrated registration and reporting system for small business issuers, in 1992 the SEC developed a new series of forms for qualifying issuers to use for registration and periodic reporting under the 1934 Act. Also in 1992, the SEC required disclosure of the compensation paid to senior executives and directors in registration statements, periodic reports, and proxy statements. As previously noted, in 2006 the SEC amended these rules to mandate clearer and more complete disclosure of compensation paid to directors, the CEO, the CFO, and the three other highest-paid executive officers. The issuer must disclose executive compensation over the last three years including salary, bonus, a dollar value for stock and option awards, amount of compensation under non-equity incentive plans, annual change in present value of accumulated pension benefits and above-market earnings on nonqualified deferred compensation, and all other compensation including perquisites. Similar disclosure is required for director compensation for the last fiscal year. Effective in 2000, a plain English summary term sheet is required in all tender offers, mergers, and going private transactions.

REGISTRATION REQUIREMENTS FOR SECURITIES

The 1934 Act requires all regulated publicly held companies to register with the SEC. These one-time registrations apply to an entire class of securities. Thus, they differ from registrations under the Securities Act of 1933, which relate only to the securities involved in a specific offering. Registration requires disclosure of information such as the organization, financial structure, and nature of the business; the terms, positions, rights, and privileges of the different classes of outstanding securities; the names of the directors, officers, and underwriters and of each security holder owning more than 10 percent of any class of nonexempt equity security; bonus and profit-sharing arrangements; and balance sheets and profit-and-loss statements for the three preceding fiscal years.

PERIODIC REPORTING REQUIREMENTS

Following registration, an issuer must file specified annual and periodic reports to update the information contained in the original registration. The SEC has adopted rules under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act requiring an issuer's CEO and CFO to certify the financial and other information contained in the issuer's annual and quarterly reports. Moreover, the Act requires that each periodic report shall be accompanied by a written statement by the CEO and the CFO of the issuer certifying that the periodic report fully complies with the requirements of the 1934 Act and that information contained in the periodic report fairly presents, in all material respects, the financial condition and results of operations of the issuer. A CEO or CFO who certifies while knowing that the report does not comply with the Act is subject to a fine of not more than $1 million or imprisonment of not more than ten years, or both. A CEO or CFO who willfully certifies a statement knowing it does not comply with the Act shall be fined not more than $5 million or imprisoned not more than twenty years, or both.

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act requires that issuers disclose in plain English to the public on a rapid and current basis such additional information concerning material changes in the financial condition or operations of the issuer as the SEC determines is necessary or useful for the protection of investors and in the public interest.

The 1934 Act also requires that each director, each officer, and any person who owns more than 10 percent of a registered equity security file reports with the SEC for any month in which changes in his ownership of such equity securities have occurred. Previously, such transactions were required to be reported within ten days after the end of that month. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act now requires that these reports be filed before the end of the second business day following the day on which the transaction was executed unless the SEC establishes a different deadline. The Act also requires that these filings be made electronically on EDGAR, that the SEC make them publicly available on its Internet site, and that issuers make them available on their corporate Web sites if they maintain one.

Practical Advice

If you are a director, officer, or own more than 10 percent of a registered security, be sure to report to the SEC any sales or purchases you make of the company's equity securities.

PROXY SOLICITATIONS

A proxy is a writing signed by a shareholder authorizing a named person to vote his shares of stock at a specified shareholders' meeting. To ensure that shareholders have adequate information upon which to vote, the 1934 Act regulates the proxy solicitation process. The Act makes it unlawful for any person to solicit any proxy concerning any registered security "in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe." Solicitation includes any request for a proxy, any request not to execute a proxy, or any request to revoke a proxy. The SEC has issued comprehensive and detailed rules prescribing the solicitation process and the disclosure of information about the issuer.

Proxy Statements The 1934 Act prohibits solicitation of a proxy unless each person solicited has been furnished with a written proxy statement containing specified information. An issuer making solicitations must furnish security holders with a proxy statement describing all material facts concerning the matters being submitted to their vote, together with a proxy form on which the security holders can indicate their approval or disapproval of each proposal to be presented. Even a company that does not solicit proxies from its shareholders but submits a matter to their vote must provide them with information substantially equivalent to that which would appear in a proxy statement. With few exceptions, the issuer must file preliminary copies of a proxy statement and proxy form with the SEC at least ten days prior to the first date on which the forms are to be sent. In addition, in an election of directors, solicitations of proxies by a person other than the issuer are subject to similar disclosure requirements. The issuer in such an election also must include an annual report with the proxy statement.

Effective March 30, 2007, the SEC amended its proxy rules to provide an alternative method for issuers and other persons to furnish materials to shareholders: posting them on an Internet proxy website and providing shareholders with notice of the availability of the proxy materials. Issuers must make paper or e-mail copies of the proxy materials available without charge to shareholders on request.

Shareholder Proposals When management makes a solicitation, any security holder entitled to vote has the opportunity to communicate with other security holders. On written request, the corporation must mail the communication at the security holder's expense or, at its option, promptly furnish to that security holder a current list of security holders.

If an eligible security holder entitled to vote submits a timely and appropriate proposal for action at a forthcoming meeting, management must include the proposal in its proxy statement along with a brief statement explaining the shareholder's reasons for making the proposal. Management may omit a proposal if, among other things, (1) under state law it is not a proper subject for shareholder action, (2) it would require the company to violate any law, (3) it is beyond the issuer's power or authority to accomplish, (4) it relates to the conduct of the issuer's ordinary business operations, or (5) it relates to a nomination or an election for membership on the issuer's board of directors or to a procedure for such nomination or election.

TENDER OFFERS

A tender offer is a general invitation to a company's shareholders to purchase their shares at a specified price for a specified time. In 1968, Congress enacted the Williams Act, which amended the 1934 Act to extend reporting and disclosure requirements to tender offers and other block acquisitions. The purpose of the Williams Act is to provide public shareholders with full disclosure by both the bidder and the target company so that the shareholders may make an informed decision.

Disclosure Requirements The 1934 Act imposes disclosure requirements in three situations: (1) when a person or group acquires more than 5 percent of a class of voting securities registered under the 1934 Act, (2) when a person makes a tender offer for more than 5 percent of a class of registered equity securities, or (3) when the issuer makes an offer to repurchase its own registered shares. Although different rules govern each situation, the disclosure required is substantially the same. The acquiring entity must file with the SEC a statement containing (1) the acquirer's background; (2) the source of the funds it will use to acquire the securities; (3) the purpose of the acquisition, including any plans to liquidate the company or to make major changes in the corporate structure; (4) the number of shares the acquirer owns; (5) the terms of the transaction; and (6) any relevant contracts, arrangements, or understandings. This disclosure is also required of anyone soliciting shareholders to accept or reject a tender offer. A copy of the statement must be furnished to each offeree and sent to the issuer.

The target company has ten days in which to respond to the bidder's tender offer by (1) recommending acceptance or rejection, (2) expressing no opinion and remaining neutral, or (3) stating that it is unable to take a position. The target company's response must include the reasons for the position it takes.

Required Practices A tender offer either by a third party or by the issuer is subject to the following rules: the initial tender offer must be kept open for at least twenty business days and for at least ten days after any change in terms. Shareholders who tender their shares may withdraw them at any time during the offering period. The tender offer must be open to all holders of the class of shares subject to the offer. All shares tendered must be purchased for the same price; thus, if an offering price is increased, both those who have tendered and those who have yet to tender will receive the benefit of the increase. A tender offeror who offers to purchase fewer than all of the outstanding securities of the target must accept, on a pro rata basis, securities tendered during the offer. During the tender offer, the bidder may buy shares of the target only through that tender offer. Effective in 2000, in a tender offer for all outstanding shares of a class, a tender offeror may provide a subsequent offering period of three to twenty days after completion of a tender offer, during which time security holders can tender shares without withdrawal rights.

Defensive Tactics When confronted by an uninvited takeover bid—or by a potential uninvited bid—management of the target company may decide either to oppose the bid or to seek to prevent it. The defensive tactics management employs to prevent or defend against undesired tender offers have developed (and are still evolving) into a highly ingenious, and metaphorically named, set of maneuvers, some of which require considerable planning—and some of which are of questionable legality.

State Regulation More than forty states have enacted statutes regulating tender offers. Although they vary greatly, most of these statutes tend to protect the target company from an unwanted tender offer. Some empower the state to review the merits of the offer or the adequacy of disclosure. Many impose waiting periods before the tender offer becomes effective. The state statutes generally require disclosures more detailed than those the Williams Act requires, and many of them exempt tender offers supported by the target company's management. A number of states have adopted fair price statutes, which require the acquirer to pay to all shareholders the highest price paid to any shareholder. Some states have enacted business combination statutes prohibiting transactions with an acquirer for a specified period after a change in control, unless disinterested shareholders approve.

FOREIGN CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT

In 1977, Congress enacted the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA) as an amendment to the 1934 Act. Amended in 1988, the FCPA imposes internal control requirements on companies with securities registered under the 1934 Act and prohibits all domestic concerns from bribing foreign governmental or political officials (an activity we will discuss later in this chapter). The accounting requirements of the FCPA reflect the ideas that accurate recordkeeping is essential to managerial responsibility and that investors should be able to rely on the financial reports they receive. Accordingly, the accounting requirements were enacted (1) to ensure that an issuer's books accurately reflect financial transactions, (2) to protect the integrity of independent audits of financial statements, and (3) to promote the reliability of financial information required by the 1934 Act.

Liability

To implement its objectives, the 1934 Act imposes sanctions for noncompliance with its disclosure and antifraud requirements. These sanctions include civil liability to injured investors and issuers, civil penalties, and criminal penalties.

The Reform Act contains several provisions that affect civil liability under the 1934 Act. First, the Reform Act imposes on a plaintiff in any private action under the 1934 Act the burden of proving that the defendant's alleged violation of the 1934 Act caused the loss for which the plaintiff seeks to recover damages. Second, the Reform Act imposes a limit on the amount of damages a plaintiff can recover in any private action under the 1934 Act based on a material misstatement or omission in which she seeks to establish damages by reference to the market price of a security. The plaintiff may not recover damage in excess of the difference between the purchase or sale price she paid or received for the security and the mean trading price of that security during the ninety-day period beginning on

Business Law in Action

Since late 1995, U.S. corporations have been covered by the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act's "safe harbor," which enables publicly traded companies to publish their forward-looking statements without fear of liability for securities fraud in the event their well-grounded predictions do not materialize. Using the safe harbor, companies that report to the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) under the 1934 Act can now safely script their public statements—conference calls with securities analysts and shareholders, executives' interviews with financial news programs or magazines, annual reports to shareholders, and paper or Web-based press releases—to include forward-looking statements like earnings estimates and plans for new products or business combinations.

The safe harbor reflects two competing premises. On the one hand, predictions by management can be very valuable to the capital markets. On the other, this type of information also poses the risk that it will be misinterpreted as fact. Therefore, to proactively insulate qualifying forward-looking statements under the safe harbor, the company must identify its predictions and projections as forward-looking and must accompany them with meaningful cautionary language identifying important factors that could cause actual results to differ materially from those predicted.

Many companies therefore are now routinely including so-called safe harbor warnings in their public statements. To satisfy the law, a company's public disclosure refers expressly to the statute and many then delineate the topics of the statement that might include forward-looking information. Some companies caution that the use of words similar to "should," "expect," and "see" indicates forward-looking information. To provide the necessary "meaningful cautionary language," the safe harbor warnings then articulate at great length those risk factors or uncertainties that could cause the company's actual performance or achievements to differ materially from those anticipated. For these risk factors effectively to protect the forward-looking statements, they must be carefully tailored to the specific disclosures being made.

the date when the information correcting the misstatement or omission is disseminated to the market. Third, the Reform Act provides a "safe harbor" under the 1934 Act from civil liability based on an untrue statement of material fact or an omission of a material fact necessary to make the statement not misleading. The safe harbor applies to issuers required to report under the 1934 Act and who make "forward-looking" statements (predictions) if the statements meet specified requirements. The requirements of the safe harbor and the transactions to which it does not apply were discussed earlier in this chapter.

MISLEADING STATEMENTS IN REPORTS

Section 18 imposes express civil liability upon any person who makes or causes to be made any false or misleading statement with respect to any material fact in any application, report, document, or registration filed with the SEC under the 1934 Act. Any person who purchased or sold a security in reliance upon such a false or misleading statement without knowing that it was false or misleading may recover under this section. A person is not liable, however, if she proves that she acted in good faith and had no knowledge that such statement was false or misleading. The court may award attorney's fees against either the plaintiff or the defendant.

SHORT-SWING PROFITS

Section 16(b) of the 1934 Act imposes express liability upon insiders—directors, officers, and any person owning more than 10 percent of the stock of a corporation listed on a national stock exchange or registered with the SEC—for all profits resulting from their "short-swing" trading in such stock. If any insider sells such stock within six months from the date of its purchase or purchases such stock within six months from the date of a sale of the stock, the corporation is entitled to recover any and all profit the insider realizes from these transactions. The "profit" recoverable is calculated by matching the highest sale price against the lowest purchase price within the relevant six-month period. Losses cannot be offset against profits. Suit to recover such profit may be brought by the issuer or by the owner of any security of the issuer in the name and on behalf of the issuer if the issuer fails or refuses to bring such suit within sixty days of the owner's request.

ANTIFRAUD PROVISION

Section 10(b) of the 1934 Act and SEC Rule 10b-5 make it unlawful for any person using the mails or facilities of interstate commerce in connection with the purchase or sale of any security (1) to employ any device, scheme, or artifice to defraud; (2) to make any untrue statement of a material fact; (3) to omit to state a material fact necessary to make the statements made not misleading; or (4) to engage in any act, practice, or course of business that operates or would operate as a fraud or deceit upon any person.

Rule 10b-5 applies to any purchase or sale of any security, whether it is registered under the 1934 Act or not, whether it is publicly traded or closely held, whether it is listed on an exchange or sold over the counter, or whether it is part of an initial issuance or a secondary distribution. There are no exemptions. The implied liability under Rule 10b-5 applies to purchaser as well as seller misconduct and allows both defrauded sellers and buyers to recover.

Requisites of Rule 10b-5 Recovery of damages under Rule 10b-5 requires proof of (1) a misstatement or omission (2) that is material, (3) made with scienter, (4) relied upon (5) in connection with the purchase or sale of a security, and (6) that causes economic loss. This rule differs from common law fraud in that Rule 10b-5 imposes an affirmative duty of disclosure. A misstatement or omission is material if there is a substantial likelihood that a reasonable investor would consider it important in deciding whether to purchase or sell the security. Examples of material facts include substantial changes in dividends or earnings, significant misstatements of asset value, and the fact that the issuer is about to become a target of a tender offer. In an action for damages under Rule 10b-5, it must be shown that the violation was committed with scienter, or intentional misconduct. Negligence is not sufficient. Although the Supreme Court has not yet decided whether reckless conduct is sufficient to satisfy the requirement of scienter, the vast majority of circuit and district courts have held recklessness to be sufficient. Reliance upon the misstatement or omission is required, although in some circumstances it may be satisfied by the presumption of reliance upon the marketplace.

Remedies for Rule 10b-5 violations include rescission, damages, and injunctions. The courts, however, are divided over the measure of damages to impose.

STONERIDGE INV. PARTNERS, LLC v. SCIENTIFIC-ATLANTA

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, 2008
552 U.S. 148, 128 S. CT. 761, 169 L. ED. 2D 627

<http://caselaw.lp.findlaw.com/scripts/getcase.pl?court=US&vol=000&invol=06-43>

FACTS Investors filed a class-action suit against Charter Communications, Inc. Additional defendants included (1) some of Charter's executives, (2) Arthur Andersen LLP, Charter's independent auditor, and (3) Scientific-Atlanta, Inc. and Motorola, Inc. which were suppliers, and later customers, of Charter. The plaintiffs alleged that Charter, a cable operator, engaged in a variety of fraudulent practices so its quarterly reports were exaggerated in order to meet Wall Street expectations for cable subscriber growth and operating cash flow. The fraud included misclassification of its customer base; delayed reporting of terminated customers; improper capitalization of costs that should have been shown as expenses; and manipulation of the company's billing cutoff dates to inflate reported revenues. In late 2000, Charter executives realized that, despite these efforts, the company would miss projected operating cash flow numbers by $15 to $20 million. To help meet the shortfall, Charter decided to alter its existing arrangements with Scientific-Atlanta and Motorola (the defendants).

The defendants Scientific-Atlanta and Motorola (defendant suppliers) supplied Charter with the digital cable converter (set top) boxes that Charter furnished to its customers. Charter arranged to overpay the defendants $20 for each set top box it purchased until the end of the year, with the understanding that the defendants would return the overpayment by purchasing advertising from Charter. The transactions had no economic substance; but, because Charter would then record the advertising purchases as revenue and capitalize its purchase of the set top boxes, in violation of generally accepted accounting principles, the transactions would enable Charter to mislead its auditor into approving a financial statement showing it met projected revenue and operating cash flow numbers. So that Arthur Andersen would not discover the link between Charter's increased payments for the boxes and the advertising purchases, the companies drafted documents to make it appear the transactions were unrelated and conducted in the ordinary course of business. The new set top box agreements with the inflated price were backdated to make it appear that they were negotiated a month before the inflated advertising agreements. The backdating was important to convey the impression that the negotiations were unconnected, a point Arthur Andersen considered necessary for separate treatment of the transactions. Charter recorded the advertising payments to inflate revenue and operating cash flow by approximately $17 million.

The inflated number was shown on financial statements filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and reported to the public.

Scientific-Atlanta and Motorola had no role in preparing or disseminating Charter's financial statements. Their own financial statements booked the transactions as a wash, under generally accepted accounting principles. The plaintiffs filed a securities fraud class action on behalf of purchasers of Charter stock alleging that, by participating in the transactions, the defendants violated Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5. The district court granted Scientific-Atlanta and Motorola's motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit affirmed. The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari.

DECISION The judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

OPINION Kennedy, J. Though the text of the Securities Exchange Act does not provide for a private cause of action for § 10(b) violations, the Court has found a right of action implied in the words of the statute and its implementing regulation. [Citation.] In a typical § 10(b) private action a plaintiff must prove (1) a material misrepresentation or omission by the defendant; (2) scienter; (3) a connection between the misrepresentation or omission and the purchase or sale of a security; (4) reliance upon the misrepresentation or omission; (5) economic loss; and (6) loss causation. [Citation.]

***

The § 10(b) implied private right of action does not extend to aiders and abettors. The conduct of a secondary actor must satisfy each of the elements or preconditions for liability; and we consider whether the allegations here are sufficient to do so.

***

Reliance by the plaintiff upon the defendant's deceptive acts is an essential element of the § 10(b) private cause of action. It ensures that, for liability to arise, the "requisite causal connection between a defendant's misrepresentation and a plaintiff's injury" exists as a predicate for liability.

[Citations.] We have found a rebuttable presumption of reliance in two different circumstances. First, if there is an omission of a material fact by one with a duty to disclose, the investor to whom the duty was owed need not provide specific proof of reliance. [Citation.]. Second, under the fraud-on-the-market doctrine, reliance is presumed when the statements at issue become public. The public information is reflected in the market price of the security. Then it can be assumed that an investor who buys or sells stock at the market price relies upon the statement. [Citation.]

Neither presumption applies here. Respondents had no duty to disclose; and their deceptive acts were not communicated to the public. No member of the investing public had knowledge, either actual or presumed, of respondents' deceptive acts during the relevant times. Petitioner, as a result, cannot show reliance upon any of respondents' actions except in an indirect chain that we find too remote for liability.

As stated above, reliance is tied to causation, leading to the inquiry whether respondents' acts were immediate or remote to the injury. *** In all events we conclude respondents' deceptive acts, which were not disclosed to the investing public, are too remote to satisfy the requirement of reliance. It was Charter, not respondents, that misled its auditor and filed fraudulent financial statements; nothing respondents did made it necessary or inevitable for Charter to record the transactions as it did.

INTERPRETATION The implied right of action under Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5 does not reach aiders and abettors unless their conduct satisfies all of the elements of Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5; in this case there is no liability because the investors did not rely upon statements or representations made by the aiders and abettors.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Had the Court extended liability under Rule 10b-5 to suppliers, what effect might this decision have had on global supply chains?

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the suppliers act unethically? Explain.

Insider Trading Rule 10b-5 applies to sales or purchases of securities made by an "insider" who possesses material information that is not available to the general public. An insider who fails to disclose such information before trading on it will be liable under Rule 10b-5 unless he waits for the information to become public. Under SEC Rule 10b5-1, a purchase or sale of an issuer's security is based on material nonpublic information about that security or issuer if the person making the purchase or sale was aware of the information when the person entered into the transaction. Insiders, for the purpose of Rule 10b-5, include directors, officers, employees, and agents of the security issuer, as well as those with whom the issuer has entrusted information solely for corporate purposes, such as underwriters, accountants, lawyers, and consultants. In some instances, the rule also precludes persons who receive material, nonpublic information from insiders—tippees—from trading on that information. A tippee is under a duty not to trade on inside information from an insider who has breached his fiduciary duty to the shareholders by disclosing the information to the tippee, who knows or should know that such a breach has occurred. (See Figure 40-4, which illustrates which parties are forbidden to trade on inside information.) In the case that follows, United States v. O'Hagan, the U.S. Supreme Court upholds the misappropriation theory as an additional and complementary basis for imposing liability for insider trading. Under this theory, a person who trades in securities for personal profit using confidential information misappropriated in breach of a fiduciary duty to the source of the information may be held liable for insider trading under Rule 10b-5. This liability applies even though the source of information is not the issuer of the securities that were traded. SEC Rule 10b5-2 adopts the misappropriation theory of liability: A violation of Section 10(b) includes the purchase or sale of a security of an issuer on the basis of material nonpublic information about that security or issuer in breach of trust or confidence that is owed to the issuer, the shareholders of that issuer, or any other person who is the source of the material nonpublic information. Under SEC Rule 10b5-2, a person has a duty of trust or confidence for purposes of the misappropriation theory of liability when (1) a person agrees to maintain information in confidence; (2) two people have a history, pattern, or practice of sharing confidences such that the recipient of the information knows or reasonably should know that the person communicating the material nonpublic information expects that the recipient will maintain its confidentiality; or (3) a person receives or obtains material nonpublic information from his or her spouse, parent, child, or sibling.

Under SEC Regulation FD (for “fair disclosure”), regulated issuers who disclose material nonpublic information to specified persons (primarily securities market professionals such as analysts and mutual fund managers) must make public disclosure of that information. If the selective disclosure was intentional or reckless, the issuer must make public disclosure simultaneously; for a nonintentional disclosure, the issuer must make public disclosure promptly, usually within twenty-four hours. With a few exceptions, Regulation FD does not apply to disclosures made in connection with securities offering registered under the 1933 Act. The SEC can enforce this rule by bringing an administrative action seeking a cease and desist order or a civil action seeking an injunction and/or civil money penalties.

Although both Section 16(b) and Rule 10b-5 address the problem of insider trading and both may apply to the same transaction, they differ in several respects. First, Section 16(b) applies only to transactions involving registered equity securities; Rule 10b-5 applies to all securities. Second, the definition of insider under Rule 10b-5 extends beyond directors, officers, and owners of more than 10 percent of a company’s stock, whereas the definition under Section 16(b) does not. Third, Section 16(b) does not require that the insider possess material, nonpublic information; liability is strict. Rule 10b-5 applies to insider trading only when such information is not disclosed. Fourth, Section 16(b) applies only to transactions occurring within six months of each other; Rule 10b-5 has no such limitation. Fifth, under Rule 10b-5, injured investors may recover damages on their own behalf; under Section 16(b), although shareholders may bring suit, any recovery is on behalf of the corporation.

UNITED STATES V. O'HAGAN

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, 1997

521 U.S. 642, 117 S. CT. 2199, 138 L. ED. 2D 724

<http://laws.findlaw.com/US/000/96-842.html>

FACTS James Herman O'Hagan was a partner in the law firm of Dorsey & Whitney in Minneapolis, Minnesota. In July 1988, Grand Metropolitan PLC (Grand Met), a company based in London, England, retained Dorsey & Whitney as local counsel to represent Grand Met regarding a potential tender offer for the common stock of the Pillsbury Company, headquartered in Minneapolis. Both Grand Met and Dorsey & Whitney took precautions to protect the confidentiality of Grand Met's tender offer plans. O'Hagan did no work on the Grand Met representation. On August 18, 1988, O'Hagan began purchasing call options for Pillsbury stock. Each option gave him the right to purchase one hundred shares of Pillsbury stock by a specified date in September 1988. Later in August and in September, O'Hagan made additional purchases of Pillsbury call options. By the end of September, he owned two thousand five hundred unexpired Pillsbury options, apparently more than any other individual investor. O'Hagan also purchased, in September 1988, some five thousand shares of Pillsbury common stock, at a price just under $39 per share. When Grand Met announced its tender offer in October, the price of Pillsbury stock rose to nearly $60 per share. O'Hagan then sold his Pillsbury call options and common stock, making a profit of more than $4.3 million.

The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) initiated an investigation into O'Hagan's transactions, resulting in an indictment alleging that O'Hagan defrauded his law firm and its client, Grand Met, by using for his own trading purposes material, nonpublic information regarding Grand Met's planned tender offer in violation of Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5. A jury convicted O'Hagan and he was sentenced to a forty-one-month term of imprisonment. A divided panel of the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit reversed O'Hagan's conviction, holding that liability under Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5 may not be grounded on the "misappropriation theory" of securities fraud on which the prosecution relied.

DECISION Judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit is reversed and remanded.

OPINION Ginsburg, J. Under the "traditional" or "classical theory" of insider trading liability, § 10(b) and Rule 10b-5 are violated when a corporate insider trades in the securities of his corporation on the basis of material, nonpublic information. Trading on such information qualifies as a "deceptive device" under § 10(b), we have affirmed, because "a relationship of trust and confidence [exists] between the shareholders of a corporation and those insiders who have obtained confidential information by reason of their position with that corporation." [Citation.] That relationship, we recognized, "gives rise to a duty to disclose [or to abstain from trading] because of the 'necessity of preventing a corporate insider from *** tak[ing] unfair advantage of *** uninformed *** stockholders.'" [Citation.] The classical theory applies not only to officers, directors, and other permanent insiders of a corporation, but also to attorneys, accountants, consultants, and others who temporarily become fiduciaries of a corporation. [Citation.]

The "misappropriation theory" holds that a person commits fraud "in connection with" a securities transaction, and thereby violates § 10(b) and Rule 10b-5, when he misappropriates confidential information for securities trading purposes, in breach of a duty owed to the source of the information. [Citation.] Under this theory, a fiduciary's undisclosed, self-serving use of a principal's information to purchase or sell securities, in breach of a duty of loyalty and confidentiality, defrauds the principal of the exclusive use of that information. In lieu of premising liability on a fiduciary relationship between company insider and purchaser or seller of the company's stock, the misappropriation theory premises liability on a fiduciary-turned-trader's deception of those who entrusted him with access to confidential information.

The two theories are complementary, each addressing efforts to capitalize on nonpublic information through the purchase or sale of securities. The classical theory targets a corporate insider's breach of duty to shareholders with whom the insider transacts; the misappropriation theory outlaws trading on the basis of nonpublic information by a corporate "outsider" in breach of a duty owed not to a trading party, but to the source of the information. The misappropriation theory is thus designed to "protect the integrity of the securities markets against abuses by 'outsiders' to a corporation who have access to confidential information that will affect th[e] corporation's security price when revealed, but who owe no fiduciary or other duty to that corporation's shareholders." [Citation.]

In this case, the indictment alleged that O'Hagan, in breach of a duty of trust and confidence he owed to his law firm, Dorsey & Whitney, and to its client, Grand Met, traded on the basis of nonpublic information regarding

Grand Met's planned tender offer for Pillsbury common stock. This conduct, the Government charged, constituted a fraudulent device in connection with the purchase and sale of securities. [Court's footnote: The Government could not have prosecuted O'Hagan under the classical theory, for O'Hagan was not an "insider" of Pillsbury, the corporation in whose stock he traded.***]

We agree with the Government that misappropriation, as just defined, satisfies § 10(b)'s requirement that chargeable conduct involve a "deceptive device or contrivance" used "in connection with" the purchase or sale of securities. We observe, first, that misappropriators, as the Government describes them, deal in deception. A fiduciary who "[pretends] loyalty to the principal while secretly converting the principal's information for personal gain," [citation], "duplicates" or defrauds the principal. [Citation.]

*** Because the deception essential to the misappropriation theory involves feigning fidelity to the source of information, if the fiduciary discloses to the source that he plans to trade on the nonpublic information, there is no "deceptive device" and thus no § 10(b) violation—although the fiduciary-turned-trader may remain liable under state law for breach of a duty of loyalty.

***

*** Although informational disparity is inevitable in the securities markets, investors likely would hesitate to venture their capital in a market where trading based on misappropriated nonpublic information is unchecked by law. An investor's informational disadvantage vis-a-vis a misappropriator with material, nonpublic information stems from contrivance, not luck; it is a disadvantage that cannot be overcome with research or skill. [Citation.]

In sum, considering the inhibiting impact on market participation of trading on misappropriated information, and the congressional purposes underlying § 10(b), it makes scant sense to hold a lawyer like O'Hagan a § 10(b) violator if he works for a law firm representing the target of a tender offer, but not if he works for a law firm representing the bidder. The text of the statute requires no such result. The misappropriation at issue here was properly made the subject of a § 10(b) charge because it meets the statutory requirement that there be "deceptive" conduct "in connection with" securities transactions.

INTERPRETATION A person who trades in securities for personal profit using confidential information misappropriated in breach of a fiduciary duty to the source of the information may be held liable for insider trading under Rule 10b-5.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the defendant act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What are the arguments for and against the misappropriation theory? With which position do you agree? Explain.

EXPRESS INSIDER TRADING LIABILITY

Section 20A imposes express civil liability upon any person who violates the Act by purchasing or selling a security while in possession of material, nonpublic information. Any person who contemporaneously sold or purchased securities of the same class as those improperly traded may bring a private action against the trader to recover damages for the violation. The total amount of damages may not exceed the profit gained or loss avoided by the violation, diminished by any amount the violator disgorges to the SEC pursuant to a court order. The action must be brought within five years after the date of the last transaction that is the subject of the violation. Tippees are jointly and severally liable with tippees who commit a violation by trading on the inside information.

CIVIL PENALTIES FOR INSIDER TRADING

In addition to the remedies discussed above, the SEC is authorized to bring an action in a U.S. district court to have a civil penalty imposed upon any person who purchases or sells a security while in possession of material, nonpublic information. Liability also extends to any person who by communicating material, nonpublic information aids and abets another person in such a violation. Liability may also be imposed on any person who directly or indirectly controlled a person who ultimately committed a violation if the controlling person knew or recklessly disregarded the likelihood that the controlled person would commit a violation and consequently failed to take appropriate steps to prevent the transgression. Under this provision, law firms, accounting firms, issuers, financial printers, news media, and others must implement policies to prevent insider trading. The violating transaction must be on or through the facilities of a national securities exchange or from or through a broker or dealer. Purchases that are part of a public offering by an issuer of securities are not subject to this provision.

The civil penalty for a person who trades on inside information is determined by the court in light of the facts and circumstances but may not exceed three times the profit gained or loss avoided as a result of the unlawful purchase or sale. The maximum amount that may be imposed upon a controlling person is the greater of $1,425,000 or three times the profit gained or loss avoided as a result of the controlled person's violation. If that violation consists of tipping inside information, the court measures the controller's liability by the profit gained or loss avoided by the person to whom the controlled person directed the tip. For the purpose of this provision, "profit gained" or "loss avoided" is "the difference between the purchase or sale price of the security and the value of that security as measured by the trading price of the security a reasonable period after public dissemination of the non-public information."

Civil penalties for insider trading are payable into the U.S. Treasury. The SEC is authorized to award bounties of up to 10 percent of a recovered penalty to informants who provided information leading to the imposition of the penalty. An action to recover a penalty must be brought within five years after the date of the purchase or sale.

Practical Advice

If you confidentially acquire any nonpublic information about a company, do not trade in that company's securities until that information has become public.

MISLEADING PROXY STATEMENTS

Any person who distributes a materially false or misleading proxy statement may be liable to a shareholder who relies upon the statement in purchasing or selling a security and consequently suffers a loss. In this context, a misstatement or omission is material if there is a substantial likelihood that a reasonable shareholder would consider it important in deciding how to vote. A number of courts have held that negligence is sufficient for an action under the proxy rule's antifraud provisions. In addition, when the proxy disclosure or filing requirement has been violated, a court may, if appropriate, enjoin a shareholder meeting or any action taken at that meeting. Other remedies are rescission, damages, and attorneys' fees. Since a proxy statement is filed with the SEC, a materially false or misleading proxy statement may also give rise to liability under Section 18, discussed above. In addition, Rule 10b-5 also applies to misstatements in proxy statements. Moreover, most proxy statements used with mergers and sales of assets are also considered 1933 Act registration statements subject to civil liability under Section 11 of the 1933 Act.

FRAUDULENT TENDER OFFERS

Section 14(e) makes it unlawful for any person to make any untrue statement of material fact, to omit to state any material fact, or to engage in any fraudulent, deceptive, or manipulative practices in connection with any tender offer. This provision applies even if the target company is not subject to the 1934 Act's reporting requirements. Insider trading during a tender offer is prohibited by Rule 14e-3, which has been upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court in the United States v. O'Hagan case above.

Some courts have implied civil liability for violations of Section 14(e). Because of the small number of cases, however, the requirements for such an action are not entirely clear. A target company may seek an injunction, and a shareholder of the target may be able to recover damages or obtain rescission. The courts are likely to require scienter.

SCHREIBER V. BURLINGTON NORTHERN, INC.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, 1985

472 U.S. 1, 105 S. CT. 2458, 86 L. ED. 2D 1

<http://laws.findlaw.com/US/472/1.html>

FACTS On December 21, 1982, Burlington Northern, Inc., made a hostile tender offer for El Paso Gas Co., proposing to purchase 25.1 million El Paso shares at $24 per share. The shareholders of El Paso fully subscribed the offer by the December 30, 1982, deadline. Burlington refused to accept those tendered shares and instead announced the terms of a new and friendly takeover agreement on January 10, 1983. Under this agreement, Burlington withdrew the December tender offer and substituted a new tender offer for 21 million shares at $24 per share. More than 40 million shares were tendered in response to this offer. Thus, the new offer disadvantaged those shareholders who had tendered during the first offer, for those who retendered were subject to substantial proration and hence received a diminished payment. Barbara Schreiber, one of the disadvantaged shareholders, brought an action against Burlington, El Paso, and members of El Paso's board, claiming that Burlington's rescission of the first tender offer and substitution of the new one was a “manipulative” distortion of the market for El Paso stock, which is prohibited by Section 14(e) of the Securities Exchange Act. The district court dismissed the suit for failure to state a claim, and the Court of Appeals affirmed.

DECISION Judgment of the Court of Appeals affirmed.

OPINION Burger, C. J. We are asked in this case to interpret § 14(e) of the Securities Exchange Act, [citation]. The starting point is the language of the statute. Section 14(e) provides:

It shall be unlawful for any person to make any untrue statement of a material fact or omit to state any material fact necessary in order to make the statements made, in the light of the circumstances under which they are made, not misleading, or to engage in any fraudulent, deceptive or manipulative acts or practices, in connection with any tender offer or request or invitation for tenders, or any solicitation of security holders in opposition to or in favor of any such offer, request, or invitation. The Commission shall, for the purposes of this subsection, by rules and regulations define, and prescribe means reasonably designed to prevent, such acts and practices as are fraudulent, deceptive, or manipulative. [Citation.]

*** Petitioner reads the phrase “fraudulent, deceptive or manipulative acts or practices” to include acts which, although fully disclosed, “artificially” affect the price of the takeover target’s stock. Petitioner’s interpretation relies on the belief that § 14(e) is directed at purposes broader than providing full and true information to investors.

Petitioner’s reading of the term “manipulative” conflicts with the normal meaning of the term. We have held in the context of an alleged violation of § 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act:

Use of the word “manipulative” is especially significant. It is and was virtually a term of art when used in connection with the securities markets. It connotes intentional or willful conduct designed to deceive or defraud investors by controlling or artificially affecting the price of securities. Ernst & Ernst v. Hochfelder, [see Chapter 44].

*** The meaning the Court has given the term “manipulative” is consistent with the use of the term at common law, and with its traditional dictionary definition.

***

Our conclusion that “manipulative” acts under § 14(e) require misrepresentation or nondisclosure is buttressed by the purpose and legislative history of the provision. Section 14(e) was originally added to the Securities Exchange Act as part of the Williams Act, [citation]. “The purpose of the Williams Act is to insure that public shareholders who are confronted by a cash tender offer for their stock will not be required to respond without adequate information.” [Citation.]

***

Section 14(e) adds a “broad antifraud prohibition,” [citation], modeled on the antifraud provisions of § 10(b) of the Act and Rule 10b–5, [citation]. It supplements the more precise disclosure provisions found elsewhere in the Williams Act, while requiring disclosure more explicitly addressed to the tender offer context than that required by § 10(b).

*** Nowhere in the legislative history is there the slightest suggestion that § 14(e) serves any purpose other than disclosure, or that the term “manipulative” should be read as an invitation to the courts to oversee the substantive fairness of tender offers; the quality of any offer is a matter for the marketplace.

We hold that the term “manipulative” as used in § 14(e) requires misrepresentation or nondisclosure. It connotes “conduct designed to deceive or defraud investors by controlling or artificially affecting the price of securities.” Ernst & Ernst v. Hochfelder [see Chapter 44]. Without misrepresentation or nondisclosure 14(e) has not been violated.

INTERPRETATION Shareholders have a right to full and accurate disclosure of information from those making tender offers to them.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did the defendants act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the Court’s interpretation of “manipulative”? Explain.

ANTIBRIBERY PROVISION OF FCPA

The FCPA makes it unlawful for any domestic concern or any of its officers, directors, employees, or agents to offer or give anything of value directly or indirectly to any foreign official, political party, or political official for the purpose of (1) influencing any act or decision of that person or party in his, or its, official capacity; (2) inducing an act or omission in violation of his, or its, lawful duty; or (3) inducing such person or party to use his, or its, influence to affect a decision of a foreign government in order to assist the domestic concern in obtaining or retaining business. An offer or promise to make a prohibited payment is a violation even if the offer is not accepted or the promise is not performed. The 1988 amendments to the Act explicitly excluded routine governmental action not involving the official's discretion, such as obtaining permits or processing applications. They also added an affirmative defense for payments that are lawful under the written laws or regulations of the foreign officials' country.

Violations can result in fines of up to $2 million for companies; individuals may be fined a maximum of $100,000 or be imprisoned for up to five years, or both. Fines imposed upon individuals may not be paid directly or indirectly by the domestic concern on whose behalf they acted. In addition, civil penalties up to $16,000 may be imposed.

In 1997, the United States signed the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development Convention on Combating Bribery of Foreign Public Officials in International Business Transactions (OECD Convention). The OECD Convention has been adopted by at least thirty-eight nations. In 1998 Congress enacted the International Anti-Bribery and Fair Competition Act of 1998 to conform the FCPA to the Convention. The 1998 Act expands the FCPA to include (1) payments made to "secure any improper advantage" from foreign officials, (2) all foreign persons who commit an act in furtherance of a foreign bribe while in the United States, and (3) officials of public international organizations within the definition of a "foreign official." A public international organization is defined as either an organization designated by executive order pursuant to the International Organizations Immunities Act, or any other international organization designated by executive order of the president.

CRIMINAL SANCTIONS

Section 32 of the 1934 Act imposes criminal sanctions on any person who willfully violates any provision of the Act (except the antibribery provision) or the rules and regulations promulgated by the SEC pursuant to the Act. As amended by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, for individuals, conviction may carry a fine of not more than $5 million or imprisonment of not more than twenty years, or both, with one exception: a person who proves she had no knowledge of the rule or regulation is not subject to imprisonment. If the person, however, is not a natural person (e.g., a corporation), a fine not exceeding $25 million may be imposed.

Ethical Dilemma

What Information May a Corporate Employee Disclose?

FACTS Sam Thompson is the director of tax research in the tax department of Anna Louise, Inc., a publicly traded clothing manufacturer. Formed by James and Anna Louise around the turn of the century, the corporation has been managed ever since by family members, who still own a controlling interest.

While studying certain tax matters in connection with a highly sensitive marketing project, Sam learned that an international company had offered to purchase a controlling interest in Anna Louise. Later, while he was having lunch with Mike, his good friend and stockbroker, Mike began pressuring Sam for information about the offer. Mike is ambitious and is attempting to build a solid client base. He is a diligent worker, performs extensive research to support recommendations to clients, and socializes a great deal with the business community. Mike told Sam that he could tell something special was going on at Sam's office. Sam had been working overtime and for the past two weeks had been unable to meet Mike as usual on Friday evening for drinks after work.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. What are Sam's ethical responsibilities to his employer with regard to information he obtains at work? How should he respond to Mike's requests for information?
2. If Sam took Mike into his confidence, what ethical responsibilities would Mike have to Sam to keep the information to himself?
3. Does Mike have any duties of loyalty to Sam's employer?
4. As a practical matter, to what extent must one keep in confidence information obtained in one's employment? Is it "safe" for example, to discuss matters with one's closest friends or one's spouse?

Questions

1. Acme Realty, a real estate development company, is a limited partnership organized in Georgia. It is planning to develop a two-hundred-acre parcel of land for a regional shopping center and needs to raise $1.25 million. As part of its financing, Acme plans to offer $1.25 million worth of limited partnership interests to about one hundred prospective investors in the southeastern United States. It anticipates that about forty to fifty private investors will purchase the limited partnership interests.
  - a. Must Acme register this offering? Why or why not?
  - b. If Acme must register but fails to do so, what are the legal consequences?
2. Bigelow Corporation has total assets of $850,000, sales of $1,350,000, and one class of common stock with 375 shareholders and a class of preferred stock with 250 shareholders, both of which are traded over the counter. Which provisions of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 apply to Bigelow Corporation?
3. Capricorn, Inc., is planning to “go public” by offering its common stock, which previously had been owned by only three shareholders. The company intends to limit the number of purchasers to twenty-five persons resident in the state of its incorporation. All of Capricorn’s business and all of its assets are located in its state of incorporation. Based on these facts, what exemptions from registration, if any, are available to Capricorn, and what conditions would each of these available exemptions impose on the terms of the offer?
4. The boards of directors of DuMont Corp. and Epsot, Inc., agreed to enter into a friendly merger, with DuMont Corp. to be the surviving entity. The stock of both corporations was listed on a national stock exchange. In connection with the merger, both corporations distributed to their shareholders proxy statements seeking approval of the proposed merger. The shareholders of both corporations voted to approve the merger. About three weeks after the merger was consummated, the price of DuMont stock fell from $25 to $13 as a result of the discovery that Epsot had entered into several unprofitable long-term contracts two months before the merger had been proposed. The contracts will result in substantial losses from Epsot’s operations for at least the next four years. The existence and effect of these contracts, although known to both corporations at the time of the proposed merger, were not disclosed in the proxy statements of either corporation. Can the shareholders of DuMont recover in a suit against DuMont under the 1934 Act? Explain.
5. Farthing is a director and vice president of Garp, Inc., whose common stock is listed on the New York Stock Exchange. Farthing engaged in the following transactions in the same calendar year: on January 2, Farthing sold five hundred shares at $30 per share; on January 15, she purchased three hundred shares at $30 per share; on February 1, she purchased two hundred shares at $45 per share; on March 1, she purchased three hundred shares at $60 per share; on March 15, she sold two hundred shares at $55 per share; and on April 1, she sold one hundred shares at $40 per share. Howell brings suit on behalf of Garp, alleging that Farthing has violated the Securities Act of 1934. Farthing defends on the ground that she lost money on the transactions in question. Is Farthing liable? If so, under which provisions and for what amount of money?
6. Intercontinental Widgets, Inc., had applied for a patent for a new state-of-the-art widget that, if patented, would significantly increase the value of Intercontinental’s shares. On September 1, the Patent Office notified Jackson, the attorney for Intercontinental, that the patent application had been approved. After informing Kingsley, the company’s president, of the good news, Jackson called his broker and purchased one thousand shares of Intercontinental at $18 per share. He also told his partner, Lucas, who immediately proceeded to purchase five hundred shares at $19 per share. Lucas then called his brother-in-law, Mammon, and told him the news. On September 3, Mammon bought four thousand shares at $21 per share. On September 4, Kingsley issued a press release that accurately reported that a patent had been granted to Intercontinental. On the next day, Intercontinental’s stock soared to $38 per share. A class action suit is brought against Jackson, Lucas, Mammon, and Intercontinental for violations of Rule 10b–5. Who, if anyone, is liable?
7. Nova, Inc., sought to sell a new issue of common stock. It registered the issue with the Securities and Exchange Commission but included false information in both the registration statement and the prospectus. The issue was underwritten by Omega & Sons and was sold in its entirety by Periwinkle, Rameses, and Sheffield, Inc., a securities broker-dealer. Telford, who was unaware of the falsity of this information, purchased five hundred shares at $6 per share. Three months later, the falsity of the information contained in the prospectus was made public, and the price of the shares fell to $1 per share. The following week, Telford brought suit against Nova, Inc.; Omega & Sons; Periwinkle, Rameses, and Sheffield, Inc., under the Securities Act of 1933.
  - a. Who, if anyone, is liable under the 1933 Act? If liable, under which provisions?
  - b. What defenses, if any, are available to the various defendants?
8. Tanaka, a director and officer of Deep Hole Oil Company, telephoned Romani for the purpose of buying two hundred shares of Deep Hole Company stock owned by Romani. During the period of negotiations, Tanaka concealed his identity and did not disclose the fact that earlier in the day he had received a report of two rich oil strikes on the oil company's property. Romani sold his two hundred shares to Tanaka for $10 per share. Taking into consideration the new strikes, the fair value of the stock was approximately $20 per share. Romani sues Tanaka to recover damages. Is Tanaka liable? If so, under which provisions and for what amount of money?

9. Venable Corporation has 750,000 shares of common stock outstanding, which are owned by 640 shareholders. The assets of Venable Corporation are valued at more than $10 million. In March, Underhill began purchasing shares of Venable's common stock in the open market. By April, he had acquired forty thousand shares at prices ranging from $12 to $14. Upon discovering Underhill's activities in late April, the directors of Venable had the corporation purchase the forty thousand shares from Underhill for $18 per share. Which provisions of the 1934 Act, if any, have been violated?

Case Problems

10. Dirks was an officer of a New York broker-dealer firm who specialized in providing investment analysis of insurance company securities to institutional investors. On March 6, Dirks received information from Ronald Secrist, a former officer of Equity Funding of America. Secrist alleged that the assets of Equity Funding, a diversified corporation primarily engaged in selling life insurance and mutual funds, were vastly overstated as the result of fraudulent corporate practices. Dirks decided to investigate the allegations. He visited Equity Funding's headquarters in Los Angeles and interviewed several officers and employees of the corporation. The senior management denied any wrongdoing, but certain corporation employees corroborated the charges of fraud. Neither Dirks nor his firm owned or traded any Equity Funding stock, but throughout his investigation he openly discussed the information he had obtained with a number of clients and investors. Some of these persons sold their holdings of Equity Funding securities, including five investment advisers who liquidated holdings of more than $16 million.

While Dirks was in Los Angeles, he was in touch regularly with William Blundell, The Wall Street Journal's Los Angeles bureau chief. Dirks urged Blundell to write a story on the fraud allegations. Blundell did not believe, however, that such a massive fraud could go undetected and declined to write the story. He feared that publishing such damaging hearsay might be libelous.

During the two-week period in which Dirks pursued his investigation and spread word of Secrist's charges, the price of Equity Funding stock fell from $26 per share to less than $15 per share. This led the New York Stock Exchange to halt trading on March 27. Shortly thereafter, California insurance authorities impounded Equity Funding's records and uncovered evidence of the fraud. Only then did the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) file a complaint against Equity Funding.

The SEC began an investigation into Dirks's role in the exposure of the fraud. After a hearing by an administrative law judge, the SEC found that Dirks had aided and abetted violations of Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5 by repeating the allegations of fraud to members of the investment community who later sold their Equity Funding stock. Has Dirks violated Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5? Explain.

11. Texas Gulf Sulphur Company (TGS) was a corporation engaged in exploring for and mining certain minerals. A particular tract of Canadian land looked very promising as a source of desired minerals, and TGS drilled a test hole on November 8. Because the core sample of the hole contained minerals of amazing quality, TGS began to acquire surrounding tracts of land. Stevens, the president of TGS, instructed all on-site personnel to keep the find a secret. Because subsequent test drillings were performed, the amount of activity surrounding the drilling had resulted in rumors as to the size and quality of the find. To counteract these rumors, Stevens authorized a press release denying the validity of the rumors and describing them as excessively optimistic. The release was issued on April 12 of the following year, though drilling continued through April 15. In the meantime, several officers, directors, and employees had purchased or accepted options to purchase additional TGS stock on the basis of the information concerning the drilling. They also recommended similar purchases to outsiders without divulging the inside information to the public. At 10:00 a.m. on April 16, an accurate report on the find was finally released to the American financial press. The Securities and Exchange Commission brought this action against TGS and several of its officers, directors, and employees to enjoin conduct alleged to violate Section 10(b) of the Securities Act of 1934 and to compel rescission by the individual defendants of securities transactions assertedly conducted in violation of Rule 10b-5. Have any of the defendants violated Section 10(b)? Explain.
12. W. J. Howey Co. and Howey-in-the-Hills Service, Inc. were Florida corporations under direct common control and management. The Howey Company owned large tracts of citrus acreage in Florida. The service company cultivated, harvested, and marketed the crops. For several years, Howey Company offered one-half of its planted acreage to the public to help it "finance additional development." Each prospective customer was offered both a land sales contract and a service contract with Howey-in-the-Hills after being told that it was not feasible to invest in the grove without a service arrangement. Upon payment of the purchase price, the land was conveyed by warranty deed. The service company was given full discretion over cultivating and marketing the crop. The purchaser had no right of entry to market the crop. The service company also was accountable only for an allocation of the net profits after the companies pooled the produce. The purchasers were predominantly nonresident businesspersons attracted by the expectation of substantial profits. Contending that this arrangement was an investment contract within the coverage of the Securities Act of 1933, the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) brought an action against the two companies to restrain them from using the mails and instrumentalities of interstate commerce in the offer and sale of unregistered and nonexempt securities. Should the SEC succeed?

- 13. Basic, Inc. was a publicly traded company engaged in the business of manufacturing chemical refractories for the steel industry. Beginning in September, Combustion Engineering, Inc., and Basic began discussions concerning the possibility of a merger of the two companies. Nevertheless, during the next two years, Basic made three public statements denying that it was engaged in merger negotiations. In December of the second year, Basic asked the New York Stock Exchange to suspend trading in its shares and issued a statement saying that it had been “approached” by another company concerning a merger. Two days later, Basic publicly announced its approval of Combustion’s offer for all its outstanding shares. The plaintiffs were former owners of Basic stock who sold their shares after Basic publicly denied that it was engaged in merger negotiation situations. The plaintiffs brought a class action suit against Basic and its directors, alleging that they had released false or misleading information in violation of Section 10(b) of the 1934 Act and in violation of Rule 10b–5. The plaintiffs claimed that they were injured by selling their shares at prices that were artificially depressed as a consequence of Basic’s misleading public statements. The defendants claimed that the plaintiffs had not proven that they had, in fact, relied upon the misleading statements in selling their stock. Should the plaintiffs be able to recover?

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY

And he that invents a machine augments the power of a man and the well-being of mankind.

HENRY WARD BEECHER, 1870

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. Explain what trade secrets protect and how they may be infringed.
2. Distinguish among the various types of trade symbols.
3. Explain the extent to which trade names are protected.
4. Explain what copyrights protect and the remedies for infringement.
5. Explain what patents protect and the remedies for infringement.

Intellectual property is an economically significant type of intangible personal property that includes trade secrets, trade symbols, copyrights, and patents. These interests are protected from infringement, or unauthorized use, by others. Such protection is essential to the conduct of business. For example, a company would be far less willing to invest considerable resources in research and development if resulting discoveries, inventions, and processes were not protected by patents and by regulations safeguarding trade secrets. Similarly, a company would not be secure in devoting time and money to marketing its products and services without laws to defend its trade symbols and trade names. Moreover, without copyright protection, the publishing, entertainment, and computer software industries would be vulnerable to piracy, both by competitors and by the general public. In this chapter, we will discuss the law protecting (1) trade secrets; (2) trade symbols, including trademarks, service marks, certification marks, collective marks, and trade names; (3) copyrights; and (4) patents.

Trade Secrets

Every business has secret information. Such information may include customer lists or contracts with suppliers and customers; it may also consist of secret formulas, processes, and production methods that are vital to the successful operation of the business. A business may disclose a trade secret in confidence to an employee with the understanding that the employee will not, in turn, reveal the information. To the extent the owner of the information obtains a patent on it, it is no longer a trade secret but is protected by patent law. Some businesses, however, choose not to obtain a patent because it provides protection for only a limited time, whereas state trade secret law protects a trade secret as long as it is kept secret. Moreover, if the courts invalidate a patent, the information will have been disclosed to competitors without the owner of the information obtaining any benefit. The Uniform Trade Secrets Act, promulgated in 1979 and amended in 1985, has been adopted by almost all of the states.

DEFINITION

Basically, a trade secret is commercially valuable information that is guarded from disclosure and is not general knowledge. The Uniform Trade Secrets Act defines a trade secret as information, including a formula, pattern, compilation, program, device, method, technique, or process that:

- i. derives independent economic value, actual or potential, from not being generally known to, and not being readily ascertainable by proper means by, other persons who can obtain economic value from its disclosure or use, and
- ii. is the subject of efforts that are reasonable under the circumstances to maintain its secrecy.

A famous example of a trade secret is the formula for Coca-Cola.

MISAPPROPRIATION

Misappropriation of a trade secret is the wrongful use of a trade secret. A person misappropriates a trade secret of another (1) by knowingly acquiring it through improper means or (2) by disclosing or using it without consent, if his knowledge of the trade secret came under circumstances giving rise to a duty to maintain secrecy or came from a person who used improper means or who owed the owner of the trade secret a duty to maintain secrecy. Trade secrets are most frequently misappropriated in two ways: (1) an employee wrongfully uses or discloses such secrets or (2) a competitor wrongfully obtains them.

An employee is under a duty of loyalty to his employer, which, among other things, charges the employee not to disclose trade secrets to competitors. It is wrongful, in turn, for a competitor to obtain vital secret trade information from an employee through bribery or other means. Besides breaching the duty of loyalty, the faithless employee who divulges secret trade information also commits a tort. In the absence of a contract restriction, an employee is under no duty upon termination of her employment to refrain from working for a competitor of, or competing with, a former employer; however, she may not use trade secrets or disclose them to third persons. The employee is entitled, nevertheless, to use the skill, knowledge, and general information she acquired during the previous employment relationship.

Another improper method of acquiring trade secrets is industrial espionage conducted through methods such as electronic surveillance or spying. Improper means of acquiring another person's trade secrets also include theft, bribery, fraud, unauthorized interception of communications, and inducement or knowing participation in a breach of confidence. In the broadest sense, discovering another's trade secrets by any means other than independent research or personal inspection of the publicly available finished product is improper unless the other party voluntarily discloses the secret or fails to take reasonable precautions to protect its secrecy.

Practical Advice

Before disclosing a trade secret to another, require that person to sign a nondisclosure agreement.

REMEDIES

Remedies for misappropriation of trade secrets are damages and, when appropriate, injunctive relief. Damages are awarded in the amount of either the pecuniary loss to the plaintiff caused by the misappropriation or the pecuniary gain to the defendant, whichever is greater. A court will grant an injunction to prevent a continuing or threatened misappropriation of a trade secret for as long as is necessary to protect the plaintiff from any harm attributable to the misappropriation and to deprive the defendant of any economic advantage attributable to the misappropriation.

ED NOWOGROSKI INSURANCE, INC. V. RUCKER

SUPREME COURT OF WASHINGTON, 1999
137 WASH.2D 427, 971 P.2D 936

<http://caselaw.findlaw.com/scripts/getcase.pl?court=wa&vol=662240&invol=o01>

FACTS Ed Nowogroski Insurance, Inc. (Nowogroski Inc.), owned by the Rupp family, sued its former employees, Michael Rucker, Darwin Rieck, and Jerry Kiser, for soliciting its clients using confidential information. The employees had worked for Nowogroski Inc. as insurance salesmen and servicers of insurance business. Nowogroski

Inc. also sued Potter, Leonard and Cahan, Inc., a rival insurance agency, for which employees Rucker, Rieck, and Kiser commenced work when they left their employment with Nowogroski Inc. Following a bench trial, the trial court found that the employees had misappropriated Nowogroski Inc.'s trade secrets by retaining and using confidential client lists and other information. However, the court did not award damages for one employee's solicitation of clients through the use of memorized client information. Nowogroski Inc. appealed. The Washington Court of Appeals held that there was no legal distinction between written and memorized information under the Washington Uniform Trade Secrets Act and remanded for a recalculation of damages. The Supreme Court of Washington granted this review.

DECISION Court of Appeals' decision affirmed.

OPINION Guy, C. J. As a general rule, an employee who has not signed an agreement not to compete is free, upon leaving employment, to engage in competitive employment. In so doing, the former employee may freely use general knowledge, skills, and experience acquired under his or her former employer. However, the former employee, even in the absence of an enforceable covenant not to compete, remains under a duty not to use or disclose, to the detriment of the former employer, trade secrets acquired in the course of previous employment. Where the former employee seeks to use the trade secrets of the former employer in order to obtain a competitive advantage, then competitive activity can be enjoined or result in an award of damages. [Citation.]

Once a common law concept, trade secret protection is now governed by statutes in most states, including Washington. [Citation.] Forty-one states and the District of Columbia have adopted the Uniform Trade Secrets Act. [Citation.] ***. [Citations.] The Act codifies the basic principles of common law trade secret protection. [Citation.] A purpose of trade secrets law is to maintain and promote standards of commercial ethics and fair dealing in protecting those secrets. [Citation.]

The Uniform Trade Secrets Act defines trade secret as follows:

"Trade secret" means information, including a *** compilation *** that:

- a. Derives independent economic value, actual or potential, from not being generally known to, and not being readily ascertainable by proper means by, other persons who can obtain economic value from its disclosure or use; and
- b. Is the subject of efforts that are reasonable under the circumstances to maintain its secrecy.

[Citation.]

In determining whether information has "independent economic value" under the Uniform Trade Secrets Act, one of the key factors used by the courts is the effort and expense that was expended on developing the information. [Citation.] A plaintiff seeking damages for misappropriation of a trade secret under the Uniform Trade Secrets Act has the burden of proving that legally protectable secrets exist. [Citation.]

In this case, the trial court found that the insurance information, including the customer lists: (1) derived independent economic value from not being known or readily ascertainable by proper means by other persons who can obtain economic value from its disclosure or use, and (2) that the plaintiff's efforts to keep the customer files secret by educating its staff and by providing employment manuals and employment agreements had been reasonable.

The portion of the Act's definition of "misappropriation" which applies here proscribes the disclosure or use of a trade secret of another without express or implied consent by a person who, at the time of disclosure or use, knew or had reason to know his or her knowledge of the trade secret was acquired under circumstances giving rise to a duty to maintain its secrecy or limit its use. [Citation.]

The nature of the employment relationship imposes a duty on employees and former employees not to use or disclose the employer's trade secrets. [Citation.] The Petitioners in the present case do not argue that the trial court erred in concluding that they "misappropriated" a trade secret; rather, they argue that information in the memory of the employee about a customer list is not a trade secret.

A customer list is one of the types of information which can be a protected trade secret if it meets the criteria of the Trade Secrets Act. [Citations.]

Trade secret protection will not generally attach to customer lists where the information is readily ascertainable. [Citations.] If information is readily ascertainable from public sources such as trade directories or phone books, then customer lists will not be considered a trade secret and a prior employee, not subject to a noncompetition agreement, would be free to solicit business after leaving employment. [Citation.] ***

Briefly expressed, whether a customer list is protected as a trade secret depends on three factual inquiries: (1) whether the list is a compilation of information; (2) whether it is valuable because unknown to others; and (3) whether the owner has made reasonable attempts to keep the information secret. There is no dispute in this case that the customer names, expiration dates, coverage information and related information is a compilation of information. The trial court found that the customer list and associated information derived independent economic value from not being known, or readily ascertainable by proper means, by other persons who can obtain economic value from its disclosure or use and that Nowogroski Inc. undertook reasonable steps to protect its secrecy.

The question before us is whether the fact that the customer information was in one of the employee's memory allows him to use with impunity the information which was otherwise a trade secret under our statute.

***

The Uniform Trade Secrets Act does not distinguish between written and memorized information. The Act does not require a plaintiff to prove actual theft or conversion of physical documents embodying the trade secret information to prove misappropriation. [Citations.] The Washington Uniform Trade Secrets Act defines a "trade secret" to include compilations of information which have certain characteristics without regard to the form that such information might take. The definition of "misappropriation" includes unauthorized "disclosure or use." [Citation.] As the Court of Appeals noted, two types of information mentioned in the Uniform Trade Secrets Act as examples of trade secrets include "method" and "technique;" these do not imply the requirement of written documents. [Citation.]

***

If an employee was privy to a secret formula of a manufacturing company, which was valuable and kept secret, it should not cease to be a trade secret if an employee committed it to memory. [Citation.] While customer lists may or may not be trade secrets depending on the facts of the case, we conclude that trade secret protection does not depend on whether the list is taken in written form or memorized.

INTERPRETATION Although a former employee may use general knowledge, skills, and experience acquired during the prior employment in competing with a former employer, the employee may not use or disclose trade secrets belonging to the former employer to actively solicit customers from a confidential customer list, whether written or memorized.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did any of the parties act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION What factors should be considered in determining whether a trade secret exists? Explain.

CRIMINAL PENALTIES

In 1996, Congress enacted the Economic Espionage Act of 1996 prohibiting the theft of trade secrets and providing criminal penalties for violations. (The statute does not provide any civil remedies.) The statute defines trade secrets to mean [A]ll forms and types of financial, business, scientific, technical, economic, or engineering information, including patterns, plans, compilations, program devices, formulas, designs, prototypes, methods, techniques, processes, procedures, programs, or codes, whether tangible or intangible, and whether or how stored, compiled, or memorialized physically, electronically, graphically, photographically, or in writing if (a) the owner thereof has taken reasonable measures to keep such information secret; and (b) the information derives independent economic value, actual or potential, from not being generally known to, and not being readily ascertainable through proper means by the public.

The act broadly defines theft to include all types of conversion of trade secrets, including

1. stealing, obtaining by fraud, or concealing such information;
2. without authorization copying, duplicating, sketching, drawing, photographing, downloading, uploading, photocopying, mailing, or conveying such information; and
3. purchasing or possessing a trade secret with knowledge that it has been stolen.

The Act punishes thefts of trade secrets, as well as attempts and conspiracies to steal secrets, with fines of up to $500,000, imprisonment for up to ten years, or both. Organizations that violate the Act are subject to fines of up to $5 million.

Trade Symbols

One of the earliest forms of unfair competition was the fraudulent marketing of one person's goods as those of another. Still common today, this unlawful practice is sometimes referred to as "passing off" or "palming off." Basically, "cashing in" fraudulently on the goodwill, good name, and reputation of a competitor and his products deceives the public and deprives honest businesses of trade. Section 43(a) of the Federal Trademark Act (the Lanham Act) prohibits a person from using a false designation of origin in connection with any goods or services in interstate commerce. This section also prohibits a person from making a false or misleading description or representation of her own goods, services, or commercial activities. In 1988, Congress amended this section to prohibit the misrepresentation of another person's goods, services, or commercial activities. As a result Section 43(a) also forbids "reverse palming off," by which a producer misrepresents someone else's goods as his own. Accordingly, James would violate Section 43(a) by passing off his product as Sally's or by reverse passing off Sally's product as his. A violator of Section 43(a) is liable in a civil action to any person who is, or is likely to be, injured by the violation. The remedies are (1) injunctive relief, (2) an accounting for profits, (3) damages, (4) destruction of infringing articles, (5) costs, and (6) attorneys' fees in exceptional cases.

The Lanham Act also established federal registration of trade symbols and protection against misuse or infringement by injunctive relief and a right of action for damages against the infringer. An infringement involves passing off one's goods or services as those of the owner of the mark in a manner that deceives the public and constitutes unfair competition. Thus, trade symbol infringement law protects both consumers from being misled by the use of infringing trade symbols as well as producers from unfair practices by competitors.

TYPES OF TRADE SYMBOLS

The Lanham Act recognizes four types of trade symbols or marks. A trademark is a distinctive symbol, word, name, device, letter, number, design, picture, or combination in any arrangement that a person adopts or uses to identify the goods he manufactures or sells, as well as to distinguish them from those manufactured or sold by others. Examples of trademarks include Kodak, Xerox, and the rainbow apple logo on Apple computers. A trademark can also consist of goods' "trade dress," which is the appearance or image of goods as presented to prospective purchasers. Trade dress would include the distinctive but nonfunctional design of packaging labels, containers, and the product itself or its features. Examples include the Campbell Soup label and the shape of the Coca-Cola bottle. Internet domain names that are used to identify and distinguish the goods or services of one person from the goods or services of others and to indicate the source of the goods and services may be registered as a trademark. To qualify, an applicant must show that it offers services via the Internet and that it uses the Internet domain name as a source identifier.

Some trademarks are embodied in sounds, scents, and other formats that cannot be represented by a drawing. Examples of distinctive sound marks are MGM's lion's roar, NBC's chimes, the Harlem Globetrotters' theme song "Sweet Georgia Brown," Intel's chimes, and Lucasfilm's THX logo theme.

Similar in function to the trademark, which identifies tangible goods and products, is a service mark, used to identify and distinguish the services of one person from those of others. For example, the titles, character names, and other distinctive elements of radio and television shows may be registered as service marks. Service marks may also consist of trade dress such as the décor or shape of buildings in which services are provided. Examples include the Fotomat kiosk and Howard Johnson's orange roof.

A certification mark is used on or in connection with goods or services to certify their regional or other origin, composition, mode of manufacture, quality, accuracy, or other characteristics, or that the work or labor in the goods or services was performed by members of a union or other organization. The marks "Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval" and "Underwriter's Laboratory" are examples of certification marks. The owner of the certification mark does not produce or provide the goods or services with which the mark is used.

A collective mark is a distinctive mark or symbol used to indicate either that the producer or provider belongs to a trade union, trade association, fraternal society, or other organization, or that members of a collective group produce the goods or services. Like the owner of a certification mark, the owner of a collective mark is not the producer or provider but rather is the group of which the producer or provider is a member. An example of a collective mark is the union mark that indicates a product's manufacture by a unionized company.

REGISTRATION

To be protected by the Lanham Act, a mark must be distinctive enough to identify clearly the origin of goods or services; it may not be immoral, deceptive, or scandalous. A trade symbol may satisfy the distinctiveness requirement in either of two ways. First, it may be inherently distinctive if prospective purchasers are likely to associate it with the product or service it designates because of the nature of the designation and the context in which it is used. Fanciful, arbitrary, or suggestive marks satisfy the distinctiveness requirement. In contrast, a descriptive or geographic designation is not inherently distinctive. Such a designation is one that is likely to be perceived by prospective purchasers as merely descriptive of the nature, qualities, or other characteristics of the goods or service with which it is used. Thus, the word Apple cannot be a trademark for apples, although it may be a trademark for computers.

Descriptive or geographic designations may, however, satisfy the distinctiveness requirement through the second method: acquiring distinctiveness through a "secondary meaning." A designation acquires a secondary meaning when a substantial number of prospective purchasers associate the designation with the product or service it identifies. The trademark office may accept proof of substantially exclusive and continuous use of a mark for five years as prima facie evidence of secondary meaning.

A generic name is one that is understood by prospective purchasers to denominate the general category, type, or class of goods or services with which it is used. A user cannot acquire rights in a generic name as a trade symbol. Moreover, a trade symbol will lose its eligibility for protection if prospective purchasers come to perceive a trade symbol primarily as a generic name for the category, type, or class of goods or services with which it is used. Under the Lanham Act, the test for when this has occurred is “the primary significance of the registered mark to the relevant public rather than purchaser motivation.” Examples of marks that have lost protection because they became generic include “aspirin,” “thermos,” “escalator,” and “cellophane.”

Practical Advice

Guard against losing your trade symbol’s distinctiveness by advertising the proper use of them, as the owners of Teflon, Kleenex, and Xerox have done.

Federal registration is denied to marks that are immoral, deceptive, or scandalous. Marks may not be registered if they disparage or falsely suggest a connection with persons, living or dead; institutions; beliefs; or national symbols. In addition, a trademark may not consist of the flag, coat of arms, or other insignia of the United States or of any state, municipality, or foreign nation. Moreover, a mark will not be registered if it so resembles a registered or previously used mark such that it would be likely to cause confusion, mistake, or deceit.

To obtain federal protection, which has a ten-year term with unlimited ten-year renewals, the mark must be registered with the Patent and Trademark Office. The registrant must either (1) have actually used the mark in commerce or (2) demonstrate a bona fide intent to use the mark in commerce and actually use it within six months, which period may be extended.

Federal registration is not required to establish rights in a mark, nor is it required to begin using a mark. Registration, however, provides numerous advantages. It gives nationwide constructive notice of the mark to all later users. It permits the registrant to use the federal courts to enforce the mark and constitutes prima facie evidence of the registrant’s exclusive right to use the mark. This right becomes incontestable, subject to certain specified limitations, after five years. Finally, registration provides the registrant with Customs Bureau protection against imports that threaten to infringe upon the mark. A U.S. trade symbol registration provides protection only in the United States. However, in 2002 Congress enacted legislation implementing the Madrid Protocol, a procedural agreement allowing U.S. trademark owners to file for registration in more than 75 member countries by filing a single application.

Practical Advice

Give notice of your registered marks by displaying with the mark the words “Registered in U.S. Patent and Trademark Office” or the abbreviation “Reg. U.S. Pat. & Tm. Off.” or the symbol ®.

To retain trademark protection, the owner of a mark must not abandon it by failing to make bona fide use of it in the ordinary course of trade. Abandonment occurs when an owner does not use a mark and no longer intends to use it. Three years of nonuse raises a presumption of abandonment, which the owner may rebut by proving her intent to resume use.

Anyone who claims rights in a mark may use the <sup>TM</sup> (trademark) or <sup>SM</sup> (service mark) designation, even if the mark is not registered. Only owners of registered marks may use the symbol ®.

WAL-MART STORES, INC. v. SAMARA BROTHERS, INC.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, 2000
529 U.S. 205, 120 S. CT. 1339, 146 L. ED. 2D 182

<http://caselaw.findlaw.com/cgi-bin/getcase.pl?court=US&navby=case&vol=000&invol=99-150>

FACTS Samara Brothers, Inc. designs and manufactures children’s clothing. Its primary product is a line of spring/summer one-piece seersucker outfits decorated with appliques of hearts, flowers, fruits, and the like. A number of chain stores, including JCPenney, sell this line of clothing under contract with Samara. In 1995, Wal-Mart contracted with one of its suppliers, Judy-Philippine, Inc., to manufacture a line of children’s outfits for sale in the 1996 spring/summer season. Wal-Mart sent Judy-Philippine photographs of a number of garments from Samara's line, on which Judy-Philippine's garments were to be based; Judy-Philippine duly copied, with only minor modifications, sixteen of Samara's garments, many of which contained copyrighted elements. In 1996, Wal-Mart briskly sold the so-called knockoffs, generating more than $1.15 million in gross profits. Samara officials launched an investigation, which disclosed that Wal-Mart and several other major retailers—Kmart, Caldor, Hills, and Goody's—were selling the knockoffs of Samara's outfits produced by Judy-Philippine.

After sending cease and desist letters, Samara brought an action against Wal-Mart, Judy-Philippine, Kmart, Caldor, Hills, and Goody's for copyright infringement under federal law and infringement of unregistered trade dress under Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act. All of the defendants except Wal-Mart settled before trial. After a weeklong trial, the jury found in favor of Samara on all of its claims. The district court awarded Samara damages, interest, costs, and fees totaling almost $1.6 million, together with injunctive relief. The Second Circuit affirmed, and the U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari.

DECISION Judgment of Court of Appeals reversed and case remanded.

OPINION Scalia, J. The Lanham Act provides for the registration of trademarks, which it defines *** to include “any word, name, symbol, or device, or any combination thereof [used or intended to be used] to identify and distinguish [a producer's] goods *** from those manufactured or sold by others and to indicate the source of the goods***.” [Citation.]. Registration of a mark under the Act, [citation], enables the owner to sue an infringer, [citation]; it also entitles the owner to a presumption that its mark is valid, [citation], and ordinarily renders the registered mark incontestable after five years of continuous use, [citation]. In addition to protecting registered marks, the Lanham Act, in § 43(a), gives a producer a cause of action for the use by any person of “any word, term, name, symbol, or device, or any combination thereof *** which *** is likely to cause confusion *** as to the origin, sponsorship, or approval of his or her goods***.” [Citation.] ***

The breadth of the definition of marks registrable [under the Act], and of the confusion-producing elements recited as actionable by § 43(a), has been held to embrace not just word marks, such as “Nike,” and symbol marks, such as Nike's “swoosh” symbol, but also “trade dress”—a category that originally included only the packaging, or “dressing,” of a product, but in recent years has been expanded by many courts of appeals to encompass the design of a product. [Citations.] These courts have assumed, often without discussion, that trade dress constitutes a “symbol” or “device” for purposes of the relevant sections, and we conclude likewise. ***

The text of § 43(a) provides little guidance as to the circumstances under which unregistered trade dress may be protected. It does require that a producer show that the allegedly infringing feature is not “functional,” [citation], and is likely to cause confusion with the product for which protection is sought, [citation]. Nothing in § 43(a) explicitly requires a producer to show that its trade dress is distinctive, but courts have universally imposed that requirement, since without distinctiveness the trade dress would not “cause confusion *** as to the origin, sponsorship, or approval of [the] goods,” as the section requires. ***

In evaluating the distinctiveness of a mark ***, courts have held that a mark can be distinctive in one of two ways. First, a mark is inherently distinctive if “[its] intrinsic nature serves to identify a particular source.” [Citation.] In the context of word marks, courts have applied the now-classic test ***, in which word marks that are “arbitrary” (“Camel” cigarettes), “fanciful” (“Kodak” film), or “suggestive” (“Tide” laundry detergent) are held to be inherently distinctive. [Citation.] Second, a mark has acquired distinctiveness, even if it is not inherently distinctive, if it has developed secondary meaning, which occurs when, “in the minds of the public, the primary significance of a [mark] is to identify the source of the product rather than the product itself.” [Citation.]

The judicial differentiation between marks that are inherently distinctive and those that have developed secondary meaning has solid foundation in the statute itself. [The Act] requires that registration be granted to any trademark “by which the goods of the applicant may be distinguished from the goods of others”—subject to various limited exceptions. [Citation.] It also provides, again with limited exceptions, that “nothing in this chapter shall prevent the registration of a mark used by the applicant which has become distinctive of the applicant's goods in commerce”—that is, which is not inherently distinctive but has become so only through secondary meaning. [Citation.] Nothing in [the Act], however, demands the conclusion that every category of mark necessarily includes some marks “by which the goods of the applicant may be distinguished from the goods of others” without secondary meaning—that in every category some marks are inherently distinctive.

Indeed, with respect to at least one category of mark—colors—we have held that no mark can ever be inherently distinctive. *** We held that a color could be protected as a trademark, but only upon a showing of secondary meaning. ***

It seems to us that design, like color, is not inherently distinctive. The attribution of inherent distinctiveness to certain categories of word marks and product packaging derives from the fact that the very purpose of attaching a particular word to a product, or encasing it in a distinctive packaging, is most often to identify the source of the product. Although the words and packaging can serve subsidiary functions—a suggestive word mark (such as “Tide” for laundry detergent), for instance, may invoke positive connotations in the consumer’s mind, and a garish form of packaging (such as Tide’s squat, brightly decorated plastic bottles for its liquid laundry detergent) may attract an otherwise indifferent consumer’s attention on a crowded store shelf—their predominant function remains source identification. Consumers are therefore predisposed to regard those symbols as indication of the producer, which is why such symbols “almost automatically tell a customer that they refer to a brand,” [citation], and “immediately *** signal a brand or a product ‘source,’” [citation]. And where it is not reasonable to assume consumer predisposition to take an affixed word or packaging as indication of source—where, for example, the affixed word is descriptive of the product (“Tasty” bread) or of a geographic origin (“Georgia” peaches)—inherent distinctiveness will not be found. That is why the statute generally excludes, from those word marks that can be registered as inherently distinctive, words that are “merely descriptive” of the goods, [citation], or “primarily geographically descriptive of them,” [citation]. In the case of product design, as in the case of color, we think consumer predisposition to equate the feature with the source does not exist. Consumers are aware of the reality that, almost invariably, even the most unusual of product designs—such as a cocktail shaker shaped like a penguin—is intended not to identify the source, but to render the product itself more useful or more appealing.

*** To the extent there are close cases, we believe that courts should err on the side of caution and classify ambiguous trade dress as product design, thereby requiring secondary meaning. The very closeness will suggest the existence of relatively small utility in adopting an inherent-distinctiveness principle, and relatively great consumer benefit in requiring a demonstration of secondary meaning.

***

We hold that, in an action for infringement of unregistered trade dress under § 43(a) of the Lanham Act, a product’s design is distinctive, and therefore protectible, only upon a showing of secondary meaning.

INTERPRETATION Unregistered trade dress is protected in a Section 43(a) action for infringement only upon a showing of secondary meaning for the product’s design.

ETHICAL QUESTION Did any of the parties act unethically? Explain.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Do you agree with the Court’s decision? Explain.

INFRINGEMENT

Infringement of a mark occurs when a person without authorization uses an identical or substantially indistinguishable mark that is likely to cause confusion, to cause mistake, or to deceive. The intention to confuse is not required, nor is proof of actual confusion, although likelihood of confusion may be inferred from either. In a case involving consumer confusion, infringement occurs if an appreciable number of ordinarily prudent purchasers are likely to be misled or confused as to the source of the goods or services. In deciding whether infringement has occurred, the courts consider various factors, including the strength of the mark, the intent of the unauthorized user, the degree of similarity between the two marks, the relation between the two products or services the marks identify, and the marketing channels through which the goods or services are purchased.

The Federal Trademark Dilution Act of 1995 amended the Lanham Act to protect famous marks from dilution of their distinctive quality. The term dilution means the lessening of the capacity of a famous mark to identify and distinguish goods or services even if (1) there is no competition between the owner of the famous mark and the other party using the mark or (2) the other party’s use of the mark does not result in the likelihood of confusion, mistake, or deception. Examples of dilution would include Microsoft shoes, Toyota aspirin, and Rolex cameras. In determining whether a mark is distinctive and famous, a court may consider factors such as (1) the degree of inherent or acquired distinctiveness of the mark; (2) the degree of recognition of the mark; (3) the duration and extent of the use, advertising, and publicity of the mark; (4) the geographical extent of the trading area in which the mark is used; and (5) the channels of trade for the goods or services with which the mark is used. The amendment exempts fair use of a famous mark in comparative commercial advertising, noncommercial use of a mark, and mention of a famous mark in news reporting.

The Trademark Cyberpiracy Prevention Act of 1999 amended the Lanham Act to protect the owner of a trademark or service mark from any person who, with a bad faith intent to profit from the mark, registers, traffics in, or uses a domain name which, at the time of its registration, is (1) identical or confusingly similar to a distinctive mark, (2) dilutive of a famous mark, or (3) is a protected trademark, word, or name. The Act specifies factors a court may consider in determining bad faith intent but prohibits such a determination if the defendant believed, with reasonable grounds, that the use of the domain name was fair or otherwise lawful. It further authorizes a court to order cancellation of the domain name or its transfer to the owner of the mark. In addition to injunctive relief, the Act makes available remedies that include recovery of the defendant's profits, actual damages, attorneys' fees, and court costs. It also provides for statutory damages in an amount of at least $1,000 and up to $100,000 per domain name. The Act shields a registrar, registry, or other registration authority from liability for damages for the registration or maintenance of a domain name for another, unless there is a showing of bad faith intent to profit from such registration or maintenance of the domain name registration.

REMEDIES

The Lanham Act provides several remedies for infringement: (1) injunctive relief, (2) an accounting for profits, (3) damages, (4) destruction of infringing articles, (5) attorneys' fees in exceptional cases, and (6) costs. In assessing profits, the plaintiff has only to prove the gross sales made by the defendant; the defendant, in contrast, must prove any costs to be deducted in determining profits. If the court finds that the amount of recovery based on profits is either inadequate or excessive, the court may, in its discretion, award an amount it determines to be just. In assessing damages, the court may award up to three times the actual damages, according to the circumstances of the case. When an infringement is knowing and intentional, the court shall award attorneys' fees plus the greater of treble profits or treble damages, unless there are extenuating circumstances. In an action under the Federal Trademark Dilution Act of 1995, the owner of the famous mark can obtain only injunctive relief unless the person against whom the injunction is sought willfully intended to trade on the owner's reputation or to cause dilution of the famous mark. If willful intent is proven, the owner of the famous mark may also obtain the other remedies discussed.

When a person intentionally traffics in goods or services known to bear a counterfeit mark, both civil and criminal remedies are available. In addition, goods bearing the counterfeit mark may be seized and destroyed. A counterfeit mark means a spurious mark that is identical with, or substantially indistinguishable from, a registered mark and the use of which is likely to cause confusion, to cause mistake, or to deceive. In assessing damages for trademark counterfeiting the court shall, unless it finds extenuating circumstances, enter judgment for three times the defendant's profits or the plaintiff's damages, whichever is greater, plus reasonable attorneys' fees. Instead of actual damages and profits, the plaintiff may elect to receive an award of statutory damages, in an amount the court considers just, between $500 and $100,000 per counterfeit mark or, if the use of the counterfeit mark was willful, not more than $1 million per counterfeit mark. Criminal sanctions include a fine of up to $2 million or imprisonment of up to ten years, or both. For a repeat offense, the limits are $5 million and twenty years, respectively. For an offender who is not an individual (e.g., a corporation), the fine may be up to $5 million for a first offense and up to $15 million for a repeat offense.

Trade Names

A trade name is any name used to identify a business, vocation, or occupation. Descriptive and generic words, and personal and generic names, although not proper trademarks, may become protected as trade names upon acquiring a special significance in the trade. A name acquires such significance, frequently referred to as a "secondary meaning," through its continuing and extended use in connection with specific goods or services, whereby the name's acquired meaning eclipses its primary meaning in the minds of many purchasers or users. Although they may not be federally registered under the Lanham Act, trade names are protected, and a person who palms off her goods or services under the trade name of another is liable in damages and also may be enjoined from doing so.

Copyrights

Copyright is a form of protection provided by the Federal Copyright Act to authors of original works, which include literary, musical, and dramatic works; pantomimes; choreographic works; pictorial, graphic, and sculptural works; motion picture and other audiovisual works; sound recordings; and architectural works. This listing is illustrative but not exhaustive; the Act extends copyright protection to "original works of authorship in any tangible medium of expression, now known or later developed." Moreover, in 1980, the Copyright Act was amended to extend copyright protection to computer programs. Furthermore, the Semiconductor Chip Protection Act of 1984 extended protection for ten years to safeguard mask works embodied in a semiconductor chip product.

On March 1, 1989, the United States joined the Berne Convention, an international treaty protecting copyrighted works. In 1998 Congress enacted the Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA), which amended the Copyright Act to implement the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) Copyright Treaty and the WIPO Performances and Phonograms Treaty of 1996 by extending U.S. copyright protection to works required to be protected under these two treaties. The WIPO treaty called for adequate legal protection and effective legal remedies against the circumvention of effective technological measures that are used by copyright owners to prevent unauthorized exercise of their copyrights. The DMCA contains three principal anticircumvention provisions.

The first provision of the DMCA prohibits the Act of circumventing a technological protection measure put in place by a copyright owner to control access to a copyrighted work. Under the DMCA, “to circumvent a technological measure” means “to descramble a scrambled work, to decrypt an encrypted work, or otherwise to avoid, bypass, remove, deactivate, or impair a technological measure, without the authority of the copyright owner.” The second provision prohibits creating or making available technologies developed or advertised to defeat technological protections against unauthorized access to a copyrighted work. The third provision prohibits creating or making available technologies developed or advertised to defeat technological protections against unauthorized copying or other infringements of the exclusive rights of the copyright owner in a copyrighted work. Thus, the first two prohibitions deal with access controls while the third prohibition deals with copy controls. They make it illegal, for example, to create or distribute a computer program that can break the access or copy protection security code on an electronic book or a DVD movie. The Act provides civil remedies including injunctions, damages (actual and statutory), attorneys’ fees, and destruction of the offending device. It also imposes criminal penalties of fines or imprisonment or both.

In no case does the copyright protection for an original work of authorship protect also any idea, procedure, process, system, method of operation, concept, principle, or discovery, regardless of the form in which it is described, explained, illustrated, or embodied in such work. Copyright protection extends only to an original expression of an idea. For example, the idea of interfamily feuding cannot be copyrighted, but a particular expression of that idea in the form of a novel, drama, movie, or opera may be thus protected.

PROCEDURE

Copyright applications are filed with the Register of Copyrights in Washington, D.C. Although registration of the copyright is not required, because copyright protection begins automatically as soon as the work is fixed in a tangible medium, registration is advisable, being a condition of the remedies of statutory damages and attorneys’ fees for copyright infringement. When a work is published, it is advisable, though no longer required, to place a copyright notice on all publicly distributed copies, so as to notify users about the copyright claim. If proper notice appears on the published copies to which a defendant in a copyright infringement case had access, the defendant will be unable to mitigate actual or statutory damages by asserting a defense of innocent infringement. Innocent infringement occurs when the infringer did not realize that the work was protected.

Practical Advice

You should register your copyrights and place a copyright notice on all publicly distributed copies. Notice consists of three elements: (1) the symbol © or the word Copyright or the abbreviation Copr.; (2) the year of first publication of the work; and (3) the name of the owner of the copyright in the work.

RIGHTS

As amended in 1998 by the Sonny Bono Copyright Extension Act, in most instances, copyright protection lasts the duration of the author’s life plus an additional seventy years. The Copyright Act gives the copyright owner the exclusive right, and the right to authorize others, to reproduce the copyrighted work, prepare derivative works based upon the copyrighted work, distribute copies or recordings of the copyrighted work, perform the work publicly, and display the work publicly.

These broad rights are subject, however, to several limitations, the most important of which are “compulsory licenses” and “fair use.” Compulsory licenses permit certain limited uses of copyrighted material upon the payment of specified royalties and compliance with statutory conditions. The Copyright Act provides that the fair use of a copyrighted work for purposes such as criticism, comment, news reporting, teaching (including multiple copies for classroom use), scholarship, or research is not an infringement of copyright. In determining whether the use made of a work in any particular case is fair, the courts consider the following factors: (1) the purpose and character of the use, including whether such use is of a commercial nature or is for nonprofit educational purposes; (2) the nature of the copyrighted work; (3) the amount and substantiality of the portion used in relation to the copyrighted work as a whole; and (4) the effect of the use upon the potential market for or value of the copyrighted work.

OWNERSHIP

The author of a creative work owns the entire copyright. Although the actual creator of a work is usually the author, in two situations under the doctrine of works for hire, she is not considered the author. First, if an employee prepares a work within the scope of her employment, her employer is considered the author of the work. Second, if a work is specially ordered or commissioned for certain purposes specified in the copyright statute and the parties expressly agree in writing that the work shall be considered a work for hire, the person commissioning the work is deemed to be the author. The kinds of works subject to becoming works for hire by commission include contributions to collective works; parts of motion pictures or other audiovisual works; translations; supplementary works such as prefaces, illustrations, or afterwords; compilations; instructional texts; and tests. In a work made for hire, the copyright lasts for a term of ninety-five years from the year of its first publication, or a term of one hundred and twenty years from the year of its creation, whichever expires first.

The ownership of a copyright may be transferred in whole or in part by conveyance, will, or intestate succession. However, a transfer of copyright ownership, other than by operation of law, is not valid unless a note or memorandum chronicles the transfer in writing and is signed by the owner of the rights conveyed or by the owner's duly authorized agent. An author may terminate any transfer of copyright ownership, other than that of a work for hire, during the five-year period beginning thirty-five years after the transfer was granted.

Ownership of a copyright, or of any of the exclusive rights under a copyright, is distinct from the ownership of any material object that embodies the work. The transfer of ownership of any material object, including the copy or recording in which the work was first fixed, does not in itself convey any rights in the copyrighted work the object embodies; nor, in the absence of an agreement, does the transfer of copyright ownership or of any exclusive rights under a copyright convey property rights in any material object. Thus, the purchase of this textbook neither affects the publisher's copyright nor authorizes the purchaser to make and sell copies of the book, though the purchaser may rent, lend, or resell it. Were this a recorded text, however, the purchaser's latter rights would be somewhat more limited: in 1990, amendments to the Copyright Act prohibited the rental, lease, or commercial lending of sound recordings and computer programs unless authorized by the copyright owner.

INFRINGEMENT AND REMEDIES

Infringement occurs whenever somebody exercises, without authorization, the rights exclusively reserved for the copyright owner. Infringement need not be intentional. To prove infringement, the plaintiff must simply establish that he owns the copyright and that the defendant violated one or more of the plaintiff's exclusive rights under the copyright. Proof of infringement usually consists of showing that the allegedly infringing work is substantially similar to the copyrighted work and that the alleged infringer had access to the copyrighted work. The DMCA amended the Copyright Act to create limitations on the liability of online providers for copyright infringement when engaging in certain activities.

METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER STUDIOS INC. v. GROKSTER, LTD.

545 U.S. 913, 125 S. CT. 2764, 162 L. ED. 2D 781

<http://laws.findlaw.com/us/000/04-480.html>

FACTS Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer (MGM) and the other plaintiffs—including the Recording Industry Association of America, the Motion Picture Association of America, and a class of 27,000 music publishers and songwriters (MGM)—brought this suit against Grokster, Ltd. and StreamCast Networks (respondents) alleging vicarious and contributory copyright infringement for distributing peer-to-peer file-sharing software. Peer-to-peer networks allow computers to communicate directly with each other, not through central servers. Although such networks can be used to share any type of digital file, recipients of respondents' software have used them mostly to share copyrighted music and video files without authorization. According to MGM, more than 90 percent of the material exchanged using respondents' file-sharing software is copyrighted material. MGM contends that respondents contribute to this infringement by making the file-sharing software available to the public. Billions of files are shared across peer-to-peer networks each month. Respondents are aware that users employ their software primarily to download copyrighted files, although the decentralized networks do not reveal which files are copied, and when.

When respondents began to distribute their free software, they clearly voiced the objective that recipients use the software to download copyrighted works and took active steps to encourage infringement. After the file-sharing service, Napster, was sued by copyright holders for facilitating copyright infringement, both respondents promoted and marketed themselves as Napster alternatives. They receive no revenue from users, but instead generate income by selling advertising space, then streaming the advertising to their users. As the number of users increases, advertising revenues increase. Neither respondent made any effort to filter copyrighted material from users' downloads or otherwise to impede the sharing of copyrighted files.

The district court held that those who used the software to download copyrighted media files directly infringed MGM's copyrights, but the court nonetheless granted summary judgment in favor of Grokster and StreamCast as to any liability arising from distribution of their software. The Court of Appeals affirmed.

DECISION The judgment of the Court of Appeals is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion.

OPINION Souter, J. The argument for imposing indirect liability in this case is, however, a powerful one, given the number of infringing downloads that occur every day using StreamCast's and Grokster's software. When a widely shared service or product is used to commit infringement, it may be impossible to enforce rights in the protected work effectively against all direct infringers, the only practical alternative being to go against the distributor of the copying device for secondary liability on a theory of contributory or vicarious infringement. [Citation.]

One infringes contributorily by intentionally inducing or encouraging direct infringement, [citation], and infringes vicariously by profiting from direct infringement while declining to exercise a right to stop or limit it, [citation]. ***

***

*** [W]here an article is "good for nothing else" but infringement, [citation], there is no legitimate public interest in its unlicensed availability, and there is no injustice in presuming or imputing an intent to infringe, [citation]. Conversely, the doctrine absolves the equivocal conduct of selling an item with substantial lawful as well as unlawful uses, and limits liability to instances of more acute fault than the mere understanding that some of one's products will be misused. ***

***

*** Evidence of "active steps ... taken to encourage direct infringement," [citation], such as advertising an infringing use or instructing how to engage in an infringing use, show an affirmative intent that the product be used to infringe, and a showing that infringement was encouraged overcomes the law's reluctance to find liability when a defendant merely sells a commercial product suitable for some lawful use, [citations]. ***

***

We *** [hold] that one who distributes a device with the object of promoting its use to infringe copyright, as shown by clear expression or other affirmative steps taken to foster infringement, is liable for the resulting acts of infringement by third parties. We are, of course, mindful of the need to keep from trenching on regular commerce or discouraging the development of technologies with lawful and unlawful potential. Accordingly, *** mere knowledge of infringing potential or of actual infringing uses would not be enough here to subject a distributor to liability. Nor would ordinary acts incident to product distribution, such as offering customers technical support or product updates, support liability in themselves. The inducement rule, instead, premises liability on purposeful, culpable expression and conduct, and thus does nothing to compromise legitimate commerce or discourage innovation having a lawful promise.

The only apparent question about treating MGM's evidence as sufficient to withstand summary judgment under the theory of inducement goes to the need on MGM's part to adduce evidence that StreamCast and Grokster communicated an inducing message to their software users. The classic instance of inducement is by advertisement or solicitation that broadcasts a message designed to stimulate others to commit violations. MGM claims that such a message is shown here. ***

*** Here, the *** record is replete with *** evidence that Grokster and StreamCast *** acted with a purpose to cause copyright violations by use of software suitable for illegal use. ***

Three features of this evidence of intent are particularly notable. First, each company showed itself to be aiming to satisfy a known source of demand for copyright infringement, the market comprising former Napster users. ***

Second, this evidence of unlawful objective is given added significance by MGM's showing that neither company attempted to develop filtering tools or other mechanisms to diminish the infringing activity using their software. While the Ninth Circuit treated the defendants' failure to develop such tools as irrelevant because they lacked an independent duty to monitor their users' activity, we think this evidence underscores Grokster's and StreamCast's intentional facilitation of their users' infringement.

Third, there is a further complement to the direct evidence of unlawful objective. It is useful to recall that StreamCast and Grokster make money by selling advertising space, by directing ads to the screens of computers employing their software. As the record shows, the more the software is used, the more ads are sent out and the greater the advertising revenue becomes. Since the extent of the software's use determines the gain to the distributors, the commercial sense of their enterprise turns on high-volume use, which the record shows is infringing.

This evidence alone would not justify an inference of unlawful intent, but viewed in the context of the entire record its import is clear.

The unlawful objective is unmistakable.

In addition to intent to bring about infringement and distribution of a device suitable for infringing use, the inducement theory of course requires evidence of actual infringement by recipients of the device, the software in this case. As the account of the facts indicates, there is evidence of infringement on a gigantic scale, and there is no serious issue of the adequacy of MGM's showing on this point in order to survive the companies' summary judgment requests. ***

***

There is substantial evidence in MGM's favor on all elements of inducement, and summary judgment in favor of Grokster and StreamCast was error. On remand, reconsideration of MGM's motion for summary judgment will be in order.

INTERPRETATION One who distributes a device with the object of promoting its use to infringe copyright, as shown by clear expression or other affirmative steps taken to foster infringement, is liable for the resulting acts of infringement by third parties.

CRITICAL THINKING QUESTION Should digital files be permitted to be shared free of charge?

In order for the owner to sue for infringement, the copyright must be registered with the Copyright Office, unless the work is a Berne Convention work whose country of origin is not the United States. For an infringement occurring after registration, the following remedies are available: (1) injunction; (2) impoundment and possible destruction of infringing articles; (3) actual damages plus profits made by the infringer that are additional to those damages, or statutory damages of at least $750 but no more than $30,000 (though the ceiling may reach $150,000 if the infringement is willful), according to what the court determines to be just; (4) in the court's discretion, costs including reasonable attorneys' fees to the prevailing party; or (5) criminal penalties of a fine and/or up to one year's imprisonment for willful infringement for purposes of commercial advantage or private financial gain.

In 1997 Congress enacted the No Electronic Theft Act (NET Act) to close a loophole in the Copyright Act, which permitted infringers to pirate copyrighted works willfully and knowingly, so long as they did not do so for profit. The NET Act amended federal copyright law to define "financial gain" to include the receipt of anything of value, including the receipt of other copyrighted works. The NET Act also clarified that when Internet users or any other individuals distribute copyrighted works broadly, even if they do not intend to profit personally, they have violated the Copyright Act. The Act accomplished this by imposing penalties for willfully infringing a copyright (1) for purposes of commercial advantage or private financial gain or (2) by reproducing or distributing, including by electronic means, during any 180-day period, one or more copies of one or more copyrighted works with a total retail value of more than $1,000. It also extended the statute of limitations for criminal copyright infringement from three to five years. Finally, it increased criminal penalties for certain copyright violations. Imprisonment for up to five years (ten years for subsequent offenses) may be imposed for willful infringement if at least ten copies with a total retail value of more than $2,500 in a 180-day period are reproduced or distributed.

The Family Entertainment and Copyright Act of 2005 established criminal penalties for willful copyright infringement by the distribution of a computer program, musical work, motion picture or other audiovisual work, or sound recording being prepared for commercial distribution by making it available on a computer network accessible to members of the public, if the person knew or should have known that the work was intended for commercial distribution. In essence, it prohibits (1) bootlegging of copyrighted audio and video material or (2) recording a cinema-released film on videotape from the audience (the primary way bootleggers make illegal copies of recently released movies). The bill does, however, allow for the sale and use of technology that can skip content of films in order to edit out language, violence, or sex. The criminal penalties are a fine and/or imprisonment for up to three years (six years for subsequent offenses), but if the infringement was for purposes of commercial advantage or private financial gain, then imprisonment may be imposed for up to five years (ten years for subsequent offenses).

The Anti-counterfeiting Amendments Act of 2004 prohibits knowingly trafficking in (1) a counterfeit or illicit label of a copy of a computer program, motion picture (or other audiovisual work), literary work, or pictorial, graphic, or sculptural work, a phonorecord, a work of visual art, or documentation or packaging; or (2) counterfeit documentation or packaging. Violators are subject to fines and/or imprisonment of up to five years. In addition, a copyright owner who is injured, or threatened with injury, may bring a civil action to obtain (1) an injunction; (2) impoundment and possible destruction of infringing articles; (3) reasonable attorneys' fees and costs; and (4) actual damages and any additional profits of the violator or statutory damages of at least $2,500 but no more than $25,000. Moreover, the court may increase an award of damages by three times the amount that would otherwise be awarded for a violation occurring within three years after a final judgment was entered for a previous violation.

Patents

Through a patent, the federal government grants an inventor a monopolistic right to make, use, or sell an invention to the absolute exclusion of others for the period of the patent. The patent owner may also profit by selling the patent or by licensing others to use the patent on a royalty basis. However, the patent may not be renewed: upon expiration, the invention enters the "public domain," and anyone may then use it.

PATENTABILITY

The Patent Act specifies those inventions that may be patented as utility patents: any new and useful process, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter or any new and useful improvement thereof. Thus, naturally occurring substances are not patentable, as the invention must be made or modified by humans. For example, the discovery of a bacterium with useful properties is not patentable, whereas the manufacture of a genetically engineered bacterium is. By the same token, laws of nature, principles, bookkeeping systems, fundamental truths, calculation methods, and ideas are not patentable. Accordingly, Einstein could not have patented his law that  $E = mc^2$ ; nor could Newton have patented the law of gravity. Similarly, isolated computer programs are not patentable, although, as we mentioned above, they may be copyrighted.

To be patentable as a utility patent, the process, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter must meet three criteria: (1) novelty, (2) utility, and (3) nonobviousness.

In addition to utility patents, the Patent Act provides for plant patents and design patents. A plant patent protections the exclusive right to reproduce a new and distinctive variety of asexually producing plant. Asexually propagated plants are those that are reproduced by means other than from seeds, such as by the rooting of cuttings as well as by layering, budding, or grafting. Plant patents require (1) novelty, (2) distinctiveness, and (3) nonobviousness. A design patent protects a new, original, ornamental design for an article of manufacture. A design patent protects only the appearance of an article but not its structural or functional features. Design patents require (1) novelty, (2) ornamentality, and (3) nonobviousness.

Utility and plant patents have a term that begins on the date of the patent's grant and ends twenty years from the date of application, subject to extensions for statutorily specified delays. Design patents have a term of fourteen years from the date of grant.

PROCEDURE

The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office issues a patent upon the basis of a patent application containing a specification, which describes how the invention works, and claims, which describe the features that make the invention patentable. The applicant must be the inventor. Before granting a patent, the Patent Office carefully and thoroughly examines the prior art and determines whether the submitted invention has novelty (does not conflict with a prior pending application or a previously issued patent) and utility, and is nonobvious. A patent application is confidential, and the Patent Office will not divulge its contents. This confidentiality ends, however, upon the granting of the patent. Unlike rights under a copyright, no monopoly rights arise until the Patent Office actually issues a patent. Therefore, anyone is free to make, use, and sell an invention for which a patent application is filed until the patent has been granted.

The rights granted by a U.S. patent extend only to the United States. A person desiring a patent in another country must apply for a patent in that country. The Patent Cooperation Treaty, adhered to by the United States and more than 135 other countries, facilitates the filing of applications for patents on the same invention in member countries by providing for centralized filing procedures and a standardized application format.

Congress recently amended the Patent Act to require the publication of certain utility and plant patent applications eighteen months after filing even if the patent has not yet been granted. This requirement applies only to those patent applications that are filed in other countries that require publication after eighteen months or under the Patent Cooperation Treaty. An applicant may obtain a reasonable royalty from a third party who between publication and issuance of the patent infringes it,

INFRINGEMENT

Anyone who, without permission, makes, uses, or sells a patented invention is a direct infringer, whereas a person who actively encourages another to make, use, offer to sell, or sell a patented invention without permission is an indirect infringer. A contributory infringer is one who knowingly sells, or offers to sell, a part or component of a patented invention, unless the component is a staple or commodity or is suitable for a substantial noninfringing use. Though good faith and ignorance are defenses to contributory infringement, they are not defenses to direct infringement. To recover damages, a patent owner must mark a patented article with the word "Patent" and the number of the patent or give actual notice to an infringer.

Practical Advice

Give notice of your patented articles by fixing on them the word patent or the abbreviation pat., together with the number of the patent.

REMEDIES

If a patent is infringed, the patent owner may sue for relief in federal court. The remedies for infringement under the Patent Act are (1) injunctive relief; (2) damages adequate to compensate the plaintiff but "in no event less than a reasonable royalty for the use made of the invention by the infringer"; (3) treble damages, when appropriate; (4) attorneys' fees in exceptional cases, such as those that involve knowing infringement; and (5) costs.

Ethical Dilemma

Who Holds the Copyright on Lecture Notes?

FACTS Tom Rigsby considers himself a young, aspiring entrepreneur. At twenty-three, he has already established a highly successful small business, Take Note, which provides students at the University of the Midwest with detailed class notes for approximately seventy-five university courses, covering subjects that range from business law to modern literature. For each of his note sets, Rigsby charges $35.

He also offers, for $25, an exam package that includes summary notes as well as exam questions that professors have used in the past, which many fraternities on campus already keep on file exclusively for their members.

To make a profit, Rigsby has concentrated on the university's more popular courses, which often pack up to five hundred students into a single lecture hall. At present, he is grossing about $400,000 a year.

Most students who have used Rigsby's notes consider them to be of exceptionally high quality. Many believe that the notes have made the difference between an "A" and a "B" in their courses.

Rigsby received his degree from the University of the Midwest, where he graduated summa cum laude. Until recently, when he expanded his business, he based his Take Note packages either on notes he had taken while a regular student or on notes from classes he audited after he graduated. Now, he has hired two additional notetakers, both 4.0 students at the university. He pays them each a small salary plus royalties of 12 percent on every sale of their notes that he makes.

To the dismay of many professors at the university, though, Rigsby has never sought their permission to distribute notes of their classes. He does not see why he should. In fact, he believes that any question of copyright here should be answered in favor of the notetaker, not the professor. He acknowledges that in other states, businesses such as his pay royalties to professors, but he thinks such expenditures unnecessary.

Now, on behalf of the University of the Midwest and its professors, lawyers for the university have sued Rigsby for copyright infringement. He, in turn, has filed a countersuit, charging disparagement. Rigsby was planning to expand his business to three other midwestern states, but now he says the university has disrupted his business with false accusations.

Social, Policy, and Ethical Considerations

1. Who does hold the copyright in this case? Did Rigsby act ethically in not seeking the professors' permission? Should he be required to share a part of his profits as royalties with the professors whose classes are covered by his Take Note packages?
2. Are the students acting ethically in buying Rigsby's Take Note packages? Does using one of Rigsby's exam packages constitute cheating? Does employing someone else's notes or old exam questions to study for an exam differ from using someone else's notes or outline to write a term paper?
3. Is the University of the Midwest acting responsibly in scheduling such large classes? What responsibility does it have to protect students from an impersonal or inadequate education? Is the university acting responsibly toward its professors? How should the university protect a professor's intellectual work?

Questions

1. Keller, a professor of legal studies at Rhodes University, is a diligent instructor. Late one night, while reading a newly published, copyrighted treatise of 1,800 pages written by Gilbert, he came across a three-page section discussing the subject matter he intended to cover in class the next day. Keller considered the treatment to be illuminating and therefore photocopied the three pages and distributed the copies to his class. One of Keller's students is a second cousin of Gilbert, the author of the treatise, and she showed Gilbert the copies. May Gilbert recover from Keller for copyright infringement? Explain.

2. Jennings conceived a secret process for the continuous freeze-drying of foodstuffs and related products and constructed a small pilot plant that practiced the process. However, Jennings lacked the financing necessary to develop the commercial potential of the process and, in hopes of obtaining a contract for its development and the payment of royalties, disclosed it in confidence to Merrick, a coffee manufacturer, who signed an agreement not to disclose it to anyone else. At the same time, Jennings signed an agreement not to disclose the process to any other person as long as Jennings and Merrick were considering a contract for its development. Upon Jennings's disclosure of the process, Merrick became extremely interested and offered to pay Jennings the sum of $1.75 million if, upon further development, the process proved to be commercially feasible. While negotiations between Jennings and Merrick were in progress, Nelson, a competitor of Merrick, learned of the process and requested a disclosure from Jennings, who informed Nelson that the process could not be disclosed to anyone unless negotiations with Merrick were broken off. Nelson offered to pay Jennings $2.5 million for the process, provided it met certain defined objective performance criteria. A contract was prepared and executed between Jennings and Nelson on this basis, without any prior disclosure of the process to Nelson. Upon the making of this contract, Jennings rejected Merrick's offer. The process was thereupon disclosed to Nelson, and demonstration runs of the pilot plant in the presence of Nelson representatives were conducted under varying conditions. After three weeks of observing experimental demonstrations, compiling data, and analyzing results, Nelson informed Jennings that the process did not meet the performance criteria in the contract and that for this reason Nelson was rejecting the process. Two years later, Nelson placed on the market freeze-dried coffee that resembled in color, appearance, and texture the product of Jennings's pilot plant. What are the rights of the parties?
3. Stella, a chemist, was employed by Johnson, a manufacturer, to work on a secret process for Johnson's product under an exclusive three-year contract. Johnson employed Dabney, a salesperson, on a week-to-week basis. Stella and Dabney resigned their employment with Johnson and accepted employment in their respective capacities with Washington, a rival manufacturer. Dabney began soliciting patronage from Johnson's former customers, whose names he had memorized. What are the rights of the parties in (a) a suit by Johnson to enjoin Stella from working for Washington and (b) a suit by Johnson to enjoin Dabney from soliciting Johnson's customers?
4. Conrad and Darby were competitors in the business of dehairing raw cashmere, the fleece of certain Asiatic goats. Dehairing is the process of separating the commercially valuable soft down from the matted mass of raw fleece, which contains long coarse guard hairs and other impurities. Machinery for this process is not readily available on the open market. Each company in the business designed and built its own machinery and kept the nature of its process secret. Conrad contracted with Lawton, the owner of a small machine shop, to build and install new improved dehairing machinery of increased efficiency for which Conrad furnished designs, drawings, and instructions. Lawton, who knew that the machinery design was confidential, agreed that he would manufacture the machinery exclusively for Conrad and that he would not reproduce the machinery or any of its essential parts for anyone else. Darby purchased from Lawton a copy of the dehairing machinery that Conrad had specially designed. What are Conrad's rights, if any, against (a) Darby and (b) Lawton? Explain.
5. Sally, having filed locally an affidavit required under the assumed name statute, has been operating and advertising her exclusive toy store for twenty years in Centerville, Illinois. Her advertising has consisted of large signs on her premises reading "The Toy Mart." Bob, after operating a store in Chicago under the name of "The Chicago Toy Mart," relocated in Centerville, Illinois, and erected a large sign reading "TOY MART" with the word "Centerville" written underneath in substantially smaller letters. Thereafter, Sally's sales declined, and many of Sally's customers patronized Bob's store, thinking it to be a branch of Sally's business. What are the rights of the parties?
6. Ryan Corporation manufactures and sells a variety of household cleaning products in interstate commerce. On national television, Ryan falsely advertises that its laundry liquid is biodegradable. Has Ryan violated the Lanham Act?
7. Gibbons, Inc., and Marvin Corporation are manufacturers who sell a variety of household cleaning products in interstate commerce. On national television Gibbons states that its laundry liquid is biodegradable and that Marvin's is not. In fact, both products are biodegradable. Has Gibbons violated the Lanham Act?
8. George McCoy of Florida has been manufacturing and distributing a cheesecake for more than five years, labeling his product with a picture of a cheesecake, which serves as a background for a Florida bathing beauty and under which is written the slogan "McCoy All Spice Florida Cheese Cake." George McCoy has not registered his trademark. Subsequently, Leo McCoy of California begins manufacturing a similar product on the West Coast using a label similar in appearance to that of George McCoy, containing a picture of a Hollywood star and the words "McCoy's All Spice Cheese Cake." Leo McCoy begins marketing his products in the eastern United States, using labels with the word "Florida" added, as in George McCoy's label. Leo McCoy has registered his product under the Federal Trademark Act. To what relief, if any, is George McCoy entitled?

Case Problems

9. Sony Corporation manufactured and sold home video recorders, specifically Betamax videotape recorders (VTRs). Universal City Studios, Inc. (Universal) owned the copyrights on some programs aired on commercially sponsored television. Individual Betamax owners frequently used the device to record some of Universal's copyrighted television programs for their own noncommercial use. Universal brought suit, claiming that the sale of the Betamax VTRs to the general public violated its rights under the Copyright Act. It sought no relief against any Betamax consumer. Instead, Universal sued Sony for contributory infringement of its copyrights, seeking money damages, an equitable accounting of profits, and an injunction against the manufacture and sale of Betamax VTRs. Explain whether Universal will prevail in its action.
10. The Coca-Cola Company manufactures a carbonated beverage, Coke, made from coca leaves and cola nuts. The Koke Company of America introduced into the beverage market a similar product named Koke. The Coca-Cola Company brought a trademark infringement action against Koke. Coca-Cola claimed unfair competition within the beverage business due to Koke's imitation of the Coca-Cola product and Koke's attempt to reap the benefit of consumer identification with the Coke name. Should Coca-Cola succeed? Why?
11. Vuitton, a French corporation, manufactures high-quality handbags, luggage, and accessories. Crown Handbags, a New York corporation, manufactures and distributes ladies' handbags. Vuitton handbags are sold exclusively in expensive department stores, and distribution is strictly controlled to maintain a certain retail selling price. The Vuitton bags bear a registered trademark and a distinctive design. Crown's handbags appear identical to the Vuitton bags but are of inferior quality. May Vuitton recover from Crown for manufacturing counterfeit handbags and selling them at a discount? Explain.
12. T.G.I. Friday's, a New York corporation and registered service mark, entered into an exclusive licensing agreement with Tiffany & Co. that allowed Tiffany to open a Friday's restaurant in Jackson, Mississippi. International Restaurant Group, operated by the owners of Tiffany, applied for a license to open a Friday's in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, but was refused. In Baton Rouge, International then opened a restaurant, called E.L. Saturday's, or Ever Lovin' Saturday's, which had the same type of menu and decor as Friday's. Friday's sues International for trademark infringement. Will Friday's prevail? Why?
13. As part of its business, Kinko's Graphics Corporation (Kinko's) copied excerpts from books, compiled them in "packets," and sold the packets to college students. Kinko's did this without permission from the owners of the copyrights to the books and without paying copyright fees or royalties. Kinko's has more than two hundred stores nationwide and reported $15 million in assets and $3 million in profits for 1989. Basic Books, Harper & Row, John Wiley & Sons, and others (plaintiffs) sued Kinko's for violation of the Copyright Act. The plaintiffs owned copyrights to the works copied and sold by Kinko's and derived substantial income from royalties. They argued that Kinko's had infringed on their copyrights by copying excerpts from their books and selling the copies to college students for profit. Kinko's admitted that it had copied excerpts without permission and had sold them in packets to students, but it contended that its actions constituted a fair use of the works in question under the Copyright Act. What is the result? Explain.
14. In 1967, a Chicago brewer, Meister Brau, Inc., began making and selling a reduced-calorie, reduced-carbohydrate beer under the name "LITE." Late in 1968, that company filed applications to register "LITE" as a trademark in the U.S. Patent Office, which ultimately approved three registrations of labels containing the name "LITE" for "beer with no available carbohydrates." In 1972, Meister Brau sold its interest in the "LITE" trademarks and the accompanying goodwill to Miller Brewing Company. Miller decided to expand its marketing of beer under the brand "LITE." It developed a modified recipe, which resulted in a beer lower in calories than Miller's regular beer but not without available carbohydrates. The label was revised, and one of the registrations was amended to show "LITE" printed rather than in script. In addition, Miller undertook an extensive advertising campaign. From 1973 through 1976, Miller expanded its annual sales of "LITE" from 50,000 barrels to 4 million barrels and increased its annual advertising expenditures from $500,000 to more than $12,000,000.
Beginning in early 1975, a number of other brewers, including G. Heileman Brewing Company, introduced reduced-calorie beers labeled or described as "light." In response, Miller began filing trademark infringement actions against competitors to enjoin the use of the word "light." Should Miller be granted the injunction? Explain.
15. B. C. Ziegler and Company (Ziegler) was a securities company located in West Bend. It had established an internal procedure by which its customer lists were treated confidentially. This procedure included burning or shredding any paper to be disposed of that contained a customer name or information. Nonetheless, Ziegler delivered a number of boxes of unshredded scrap paper to Lynn's Waste Paper Company for disposal. One of Lynn's employees, Ehren, who had been in the securities business and had worked for two of Ziegler's competitors, noticed the information contained in the delivery from Ziegler and purchased six boxes of the Ziegler wastepaper for $16.75 from Lynn's. Shortly thereafter, Ehren and his daughter sorted through the information and ultimately obtained 11,600 envelopes of information on Ziegler's customers, including names, account summaries, and other information. Ehren sold this information to Thorson, a broker in competition with Ziegler. Thorson then sent a mailing to the Ziegler customers to solicit security sales for his firm and obtained an abnormally high response rate as a result. Ziegler, with the help of the West Bend Police Department, traced the dissemination of this information to Ehren and sought from the court a permanent injunction against Ehren using or disclosing the information regarding Ziegler's clients. What is the result?

- 16. Since the 1950s, Qualitex Company has used a special shade of green-gold color on the pads that it makes and sells to dry cleaning firms for use on dry cleaning presses. In 1989 Jacobson Products (a Qualitex rival) began to sell its own press pads to dry cleaning firms, and it colored those pads a similar green-gold. In 1991 Qualitex registered the special green-gold color on press pads with the Patent and Trademark Office as a trademark. Qualitex sued Jacobson for trademark infringement. Jacobson argues that the Lanham Act does not permit registering "color alone" as a trademark. Explain whether a trademark violation has been committed.
- 17. Napster, Inc. (Napster), facilitates the transmission of MP3 files between and among its users. Through a process commonly called "peer-to-peer" file sharing, Napster allows its users to (1) make MP3 music files stored on individual computer hard drives available for copying by other Napster users; (2) search for MP3 music files stored on other users' computers; and (3) transfer exact copies of the contents of other users' MP3 files from one computer to another via the Internet. These functions are made possible by Napster's MusicShare software, available free of charge from Napster's Internet site, and Napster's network servers and server-side software. The plaintiffs include A&M Records, Geffen Records, Sony Music Entertainment, MCA Records, Atlantic Recording Corporation, Motown Record Company, and Capitol Records. The plaintiffs are engaged in the commercial recording, distribution, and sale of copyrighted musical compositions and sound recordings. The plaintiffs allege that Napster is a contributory and vicarious copyright infringer. Explain whether Napster should be enjoined "from engaging in, or facilitating others in copying, downloading, uploading, transmitting, or distributing plaintiffs' copyrighted musical compositions and sound recordings, protected by either federal or state law, without express permission of the rights owner."

EMPLOYMENT LAW

I'm sticking to the union till the day I die.

FROM "UNION MAID," WRITTEN BY WOODY GUTHRIE, 1946

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

1. List and describe the major labor law statutes.
2. List and describe the major laws prohibiting employment discrimination.
3. Discuss the defenses available to employers under the various laws prohibiting discrimination in employment.
4. Explain the doctrine of employment at will and the laws protecting employee privacy.
5. Explain (a) the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) and the Occupational Safety and Health Act, (b) workers' compensation, (c) unemployment compensation, (d) Social Security, (e) the Fair Labor Standards Act, (f) the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act, and (g) the Family and Medical Leave Act.

Though the common law originally governed the relationship between employer and employee in terms of tort and contract duties (rules that are a part of the law of agency, as discussed in Chapter 29, Relationship of Principal and Agent), this common law has been supplemented—and in some instances replaced—by statutory enactments, principally at the federal level. In fact, government regulation now affects the balance and working relationship between employers and employees in three principal areas. First, the general framework in which management and labor negotiate the terms of employment is regulated by federal statutes designed to promote both labor-management harmony and the welfare of society at large. Second, federal law has been enacted to prohibit employment discrimination based upon race, sex, religion, age, disability, or national origin. Finally, Congress, in response to the changing nature of American industry and the tremendous number of industrial accidents, has intervened by mandating that employers provide their employees with a safe and healthy work environment. Moreover, all of the states have adopted workers' compensation acts to provide compensation to employees injured during the course of employment.

In this chapter, we will focus on these three categories of government regulation of the employment relationship: (1) labor law, (2) employment discrimination law, and (3) employee protection.

Labor Law

Traditionally, labor law opposed concerted activities by workers (such as strikes, picketing, and refusals to deal) to obtain higher wages and better working conditions. At various times, such activities were found to constitute criminal conspiracy, tortious conduct, and violation of antitrust law. Eventually, public pressure in response to the adverse treatment accorded labor forced Congress to intervene.

NORRIS–LA GUARDIA ACT

Congress enacted the Norris–La Guardia Act in 1932 in response to growing criticism of the use of injunctions in peaceful labor disputes. The Act withdrew from the federal courts the power to issue injunctions in nonviolent labor disputes, broadly defined to include any controversy concerning terms or conditions of employment or union representation, regardless of whether the parties stood in an employer-employee relationship. More significantly, the Act declared it to be U.S. policy that labor was to have full freedom to form unions, without employer interference. Accordingly, the Act prohibited the so-called yellow dog contracts through which employers coerced their employees into promising that they would not join a union.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

Enacted in 1935, the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), or the Wagner Act, marked the federal government's effort to support collective bargaining and unionization. The Act provides that “the right to self-organization, to form, join or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection” is, for workers, a federally protected right. Thus, the Act gave employees the right to union representation when negotiating employment terms with their employers.

Moreover, the Act sought to enforce the collective bargaining right by prohibiting certain employer and union activities deemed to be unfair labor practices. For example, the Act identifies the following activities as unfair employer practices: (1) to interfere with employees' rights to unionize and bargain collectively; (2) to dominate the union; (3) to discriminate against union members; (4) to discriminate against an employee who has filed charges or testified under the NLRA; and (5) to refuse to bargain in good faith with duly established employee representatives.

Practical Advice

Treat all employees with appropriate respect and dignity.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT

Following the passage of the National Labor Relations Act, the country underwent a tremendous increase in union membership and labor unrest. In response to this trend, Congress passed the Labor-Management Relations Act (the LMRA, or Taft-Hartley Act) in 1947. The Act prohibits certain unfair union practices and separates the prosecutorial and adjudicative functions of the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB). More specifically, the Act amended the NLRA by declaring the following seven union activities of the NLRB to be unfair labor practices: (1) coercing an employee to join a union, (2) causing an employer to discharge or discriminate against a nonunion employee, (3) refusing to bargain in good faith, (4) levying excessive or discriminatory dues or fees, (5) causing an employer to pay for work not performed (“featherbedding”), (6) picketing an employer to require it to recognize an uncertified union, and (7) engaging in secondary activities. A secondary activity is a boycott, strike, or picketing of an employer with whom a union has no labor dispute in order to persuade the employer to cease doing business with the company that is the target of the labor dispute. For example, assume that a union is engaged in a labor dispute with Anderson Company. To coerce Anderson into resolving the dispute in the union's favor, the union organizes a strike against Brooking Company, with which the union has no labor dispute. The union agrees to cease striking Brooking Company if Brooking agrees to cease doing business with Anderson. The strike against Brooking is a secondary activity prohibited as an unfair labor practice. See Concept Review 42-1 for a summary of union and employer unfair labor practices.

In addition to prohibiting unfair union practices, the Act also fosters employer free speech by declaring that unions or employees wishing to identify an employer's labor practice as unfair cannot use as proof any employer statement of opinion or argument that contains no threat of reprisal.

The LMRA also prohibits the closed shop but permits union shops, unless a state right-to-work law prohibits the latter. A closed shop contract requires the employer to hire only union members. A union shop contract permits the employer to hire nonunion members but requires the employee to become a union member within a specified time after gaining employment and to remain a member in good standing as a condition of employment. A

Unfair Labor Practices

Unfair Employer Practices

Interfering with right to unionize
 Refusing to bargain in good faith
 Discriminating against union members
 Dominating the union
 Discriminating against an employee

Unfair Union Practices

Coercing an employee to join the union
 Refusing to bargain in good faith
 Causing an employer to discriminate against a nonunion employee
 Featherbedding
 Picketing an employer to require recognition of an uncertified union
 Engaging in secondary activity
 Levying excessive or discriminatory dues right-to-work law is a state statute that prohibits union shop contracts. However, most states permit the existence of union shops.

Finally, the Act reinstates the availability of civil injunctions in labor disputes if requested of the NLRB in order to prevent an unfair labor practice. The Act also empowers the president of the United States to obtain an injunction for an eighty-day cooling-off period for a strike that is likely to endanger the national health or safety.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT

The Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, also known as the Landrum-Griffin Act, is aimed at eliminating corruption in labor unions. The Act attempts to eradicate corruption through an elaborate reporting system and a union “bill of rights” designed to make unions more democratic. The latter provides union members with the right to nominate candidates for union offices, to vote in elections, to attend membership meetings, to participate in union business, to express themselves freely at union meetings and conventions, and to be accorded a full and fair hearing before the union takes any disciplinary action against them.

Employment Discrimination Law

A number of federal statutes prohibit discrimination in employment on the basis of race, sex, religion, national origin, age, and disability. The cornerstone of federal employment discrimination law is Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, but other statutes and regulations are significant as well, including the Civil Rights Act of 1991 and the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). In addition, most states have enacted similar laws prohibiting discrimination based on race, sex, religion, national origin, and disability. The Civil Rights Act of 1991 extended the coverage of both Title VII and the ADA to include U.S. citizens working for U.S.-owned or U.S.-controlled companies in foreign countries.

EQUAL PAY ACT

The Equal Pay Act prohibits an employer from discriminating between employees on the basis of gender by paying unequal wages for the same work. The Act forbids an employer from paying wages at a rate less than the rate at which he pays wages to employees of the opposite sex for equal work at the same establishment. Most courts define equal work to mean “substantially equal” rather than identical. The burden of proof is on the claimant to make a prima facie showing that the employer pays unequal wages for work requiring equal skill, effort, and responsibility under similar working conditions. Once the employee has demonstrated that the employer pays unequal wages for equal work to members of the opposite sex, the burden shifts to the employer to prove that the pay differential is based on (1) a seniority system, (2) a merit system, (3) a system that measures earnings by quantity or quality of production, or (4) any factor except gender.

Remedies include awarding back pay, awarding liquidated damages (an additional amount equal to back pay), and enjoining the employer from further unlawful conduct. Though the Department of Labor is the federal agency designated by the statute to interpret and enforce the Act, these functions were subsequently transferred to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of race, color, gender, religion, or national origin in hiring, firing, compensating, promoting, training, and other employment-related processes. The definition of “religion” includes all aspects of religious observance and practice; the statute provides that an employer must make reasonable efforts to accommodate an employee’s religious belief. The Act applies to employers engaged in an industry affecting commerce and having fifteen or more employees. The Act also covers federal, state, and local governments as well as labor organizations with fifteen or more members. The Act contains an antiretaliation provision that forbids an employer from discriminating against an employee who has brought a claim or proceeding under Title VII or who has testified, assisted, or participated in such an action.

BURLINGTON NORTHERN & SANTA FE RAILWAY COMPANY V. WHITE

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, 2006
548 U.S. 53, 126 S.C.T. 2405, 165 L.ED.2D 345

<http://www.supremecourtus.gov/opinions/05pdf/05-259.pdf>

FACTS Sheila White (White) was hired by Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Railway Company (Burlington) in June 1997 as a “track laborer,” a job that involves removing and replacing track components, transporting track material, cutting brush, and clearing litter and cargo spillage from the right-of-way. White’s primary responsibility soon became operating a forklift; however, she also performed some of the track laborer tasks. White was the only woman working in the Maintenance of Way department. In September of 1997, White reported to Burlington officials that Bill Joiner (Joiner), her immediate supervisor, had repeatedly told her that women should not be working in the Maintenance of Way department and also had made insulting and inappropriate remarks to her in front of other colleagues. After Burlington conducted an internal investigation, White was suspended for ten days and required to attend sexual-harassment training. Marvin Brown, a Burlington manager, then reassigned White to standard track laborer tasks and completely removed her from forklift duty. Brown explained that the reassignment reflected coworker’s complaints that, in fairness, a “more senior man” should have the “less arduous and cleaner job” of forklift operator.

On October 10, White filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). She claimed that the reassignment of her duties amounted to unlawful gender-based discrimination and retaliation for her having earlier complained about Joiner. In early December, White filed a second retaliation charge with the Commission, claiming that Brown had placed her under surveillance and was monitoring her daily activities. A few days later, White and her immediate supervisor, Percy Sharkey, had a disagreement. Sharkey told Brown that White had been insubordinate. Brown suspended White without pay prompting White to initiate internal grievance procedures that eventually led Burlington to conclude White had not been insubordinate. White was reinstated, with thirty-seven days’ back pay for the time she was suspended. Based on the suspension she then filed another EEOC charge for retaliation.

White filed a Title VII action against Burlington in federal court. A jury found in White’s favor awarding her $43,500 in damages for her claims of unlawful retaliation. Burlington appealed arguing White did not suffer any harm from these acts of retaliation since she received back pay. The Sixth Circuit affirmed the district court’s judgment for White. The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari.

DECISION Judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

OPINION Breyer, J. Title VII’s anti-retaliation provision forbids employer actions that “discriminate against” an employee (or job applicant) because he has “opposed” a practice that Title VII forbids or has “made a charge, testified, assisted, or participated in” a Title VII “investigation, proceeding, or hearing.” [Citation.] No one doubts that the term “discriminate against” refers to distinctions or differences in treatment that injure protected individuals. [Citation.] But different Circuits have come to different conclusions about whether the challenged action has to be employment or workplace related and about how harmful that action must be to constitute retaliation.

***

*** The anti-discrimination provision seeks a workplace where individuals are not discriminated against because of their racial, ethnic, religious, or gender-based status. [Citation.]. The anti-retaliation provision seeks to secure that primary objective by preventing an employer from interfering (through retaliation) with an employee’s efforts to secure or advance enforcement of the Act’s basic guarantees. The substantive provision seeks to prevent injury to individuals based on who they are, i.e., their status. The anti-retaliation provision seeks to prevent harm to individuals based on what they do, i.e., their conduct.

To secure the first objective, Congress did not need to prohibit anything other than employment-related discrimination. The substantive provision’s basic objective of “equality of employment opportunities” and the elimination of practices that tend to bring about “stratified job environments,” [citation], would be achieved were all employment-related discrimination miraculously eliminated.

But one cannot secure the second objective by focusing only upon employer actions and harm that concern employment and the workplace. Were all such actions and harms eliminated, the anti-retaliation provision’s objective would not be achieved. An employer can effectively retaliate against an employee by taking actions not directly related to his employment or by causing him harm outside the workplace. [Citations.] A provision limited to employment-related actions would not deter the many forms that effective retaliation can take. Hence, such a limited construction would fail to fully achieve the anti-retaliation provision’s “primary purpose,” namely, “[m]aintaining unfettered access to statutory remedial mechanisms.” [Citation.]

Thus, purpose reinforces what language already indicates, namely, that the anti-retaliation provision, unlike the substantive provision, is not limited to discriminatory actions that affect the terms and conditions of employment. [Citation.]

*** [W]e conclude that Title VII’s substantive provision and its anti-retaliation provision are not coterminous. The scope of the anti-retaliation provision extends beyond workplace-related or employment-related retaliatory acts and harm. ***

The anti-retaliation provision protects an individual not from all retaliation, but from retaliation that produces an injury or harm. *** In our view, a plaintiff must show that a reasonable employee would have found the challenged action materially adverse, “which in this context means it well might have ‘dissuaded a reasonable worker from making or supporting a charge of discrimination.’” [Citation.]

The anti-retaliation provision seeks to prevent employer interference with “unfettered access” to Title VII’s remedial mechanisms. [Citation.] It does so by prohibiting employer actions that are likely “to deter victims of discrimination from complaining to the EEOC,” the courts, and their employers. [Citation.] And normally petty slights, minor annoyances, and simple lack of good manners will not create such deterrence. [Citation.]

We refer to reactions of a reasonable employee because we believe that the provision’s standard for judging harm must be objective. An objective standard is judicially administrable. It avoids the uncertainties and unfair discrepancies that can plague a judicial effort to determine a plaintiff’s unusual subjective feelings. ***

We phrase the standard in general terms because the significance of any given act of retaliation will often depend upon the particular circumstances. Context matters. ***

***

Applying this standard to the facts of this case, we believe that there was a sufficient evidentiary basis to support the jury’s verdict on White’s retaliation claim. [Citation.] The jury found that two of Burlington’s actions amounted to retaliation: the reassignment of White from forklift duty to standard track laborer tasks and the 37-day suspension without pay.

*** Our holding today makes clear that the jury was not required to find that the challenged actions were related to the terms or conditions of employment. And insofar as the jury also found that the actions were “materially adverse,” its findings are adequately supported.

***

To be sure, reassignment of job duties is not automatically actionable. Whether a particular reassignment is materially adverse depends upon the circumstances of the particular case, and “should be judged from the perspective of a reasonable person in the plaintiff’s position, considering ‘all the circumstances.’” [Citation.] But here, the jury had before it considerable evidence that the track labor duties were “by all accounts more arduous and dirtier”; that the “forklift operator position required more qualifications, which is an indication of prestige”; and that “the forklift operator position was objectively considered a better job and the male employees resented White for occupying it.” [Citation.] Based on this record, a jury could reasonably conclude that the reassignment of responsibilities would have been materially adverse to a reasonable employee.

***

*** White did receive backpay. But White and her family had to live for 37 days without income. They did not know during that time whether or when White could return to work. Many reasonable employees would find a month without a paycheck to be a serious hardship. And White described to the jury the physical and emotional hardship that 37 days of having “no income, no money” in fact caused. [Citation.] Indeed, she obtained medical treatment for her emotional distress. A reasonable employee facing the choice between retaining her job (and paycheck) and filing a discrimination complaint might well choose the former. That is to say, an indefinite suspension without pay could well act as a deterrent, even if the suspended employee eventually received backpay. [Citation.] Thus, the jury’s conclusion that the 37-day suspension without pay was materially adverse was a reasonable one.

INTERPRETATION Title VII’s antiretaliation provision forbids employer actions against an employee that are materially adverse, and this prohibition extends beyond workplace-related or employment-related retaliatory acts and harm.

CRITICAL THINKING Do you agree with the rationale for the antiretaliation provision’s extending beyond the antidiscrimination provision? Explain.

When Congress passed the Pregnancy Discrimination Act, it extended the benefits of Title VII to pregnant women. Under the Act, an employer cannot refuse to hire a pregnant woman, fire her, or force her to take maternity leave unless the employer can establish a bona fide occupational qualification defense (discussed later in this section). The Act, which protects the job reinstatement rights of women returning from maternity leave, requires employers to treat pregnancy as they would a temporary disability.

The enforcement agency for Title VII is the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). The EEOC is empowered (1) to file legal actions in its own name or to intervene in actions filed by third parties; (2) to attempt to resolve alleged violations through informal means prior to bringing suit; (3) to investigate all charges of discrimination; and (4) to issue guidelines and regulations concerning enforcement policy. See Figure 42-1 for the number of charges filed with the EEOC in 2006, 2007, and 2008. It should be noted that the number of charges filed in 2008 was significantly higher than in any of the previous ten years.

Practical Advice

Issue a strong company policy against all types of prohibited discrimination and ensure that all business decisions comply with your policy.

Proving Discrimination Each of the following constitutes discriminatory conduct prohibited by the Act:

1. Disparate Treatment. An individual shows that an employer used a prohibited criterion in making an employment decision by treating some people less favorably than others. Liability is based on proving that the employer's decision was motivated by the protected characteristic or trait. The Supreme Court has held that the plaintiff will have shown a prima facie case of discrimination if (a) she is within a protected class, (b) she had applied for an open position, (c) she was qualified for the position, (d) she was denied the job, and (e) the employer continued to try to fill the position from a pool of applicants with the complainant's qualifications. Once the plaintiff establishes a prima facie case, the burden shifts to the defendant to "articulate legitimate and non-discriminatory reasons for the plaintiff's rejection." If the defendant so rebuts, the plaintiff then has the opportunity to demonstrate that the employer's stated reason was merely a pretext.

If the employer's decision was based on a "mixed motive" (the employer used both lawful and unlawful reasons in making its decision), the courts employ a shifting burden of proof standard. First, the plaintiff must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the employer used the protected characteristic as a motivating factor. The defendant, however, can limit the remedies available to the plaintiff by proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant would have made the same decision even without the forbidden motivating factor. If the defendant sustains its burden of proof, under the Civil Rights Act of 1991 the remedies are limited to declaratory relief, certain types of injunctive relief, and attorneys' fees and costs.

2. Present Effects of Past Discrimination. Such effects result when an employer engages in conduct that on its face is "neutral"—that is, nondiscriminatory—but that actually perpetuates past discriminatory practices. For example, it has been held illegal for a union that previously had limited its membership to whites to adopt a requirement that new members be related to or recommended by existing members.
3. Disparate Impact. This occurs when an employer adopts "neutral" rules that adversely affect a protected class and that are not justified as being necessary to the business. Despite the employee's proof of disparate impact, the employer may prevail if it can demonstrate that the challenged practice is "job related for the position in question and consistent with business necessity."

Thus, all requirements that might have a disparate impact upon women, such as height and weight requirements, must be shown to be job related. Nevertheless, under the Civil Rights Act of 1991, even if the employer can demonstrate the business necessity of the questioned practice, the complainant will still prevail if she shows that a nondiscriminatory alternative practice exists.

RICCI V. DESTEFANO

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, 2009

— U.S. — S.C.T. —, 2009 WL 1835138

FACTS In 2003, one hundred eighteen New Haven, Connecticut firefighters took examinations to qualify for promotion to the rank of lieutenant or captain. Promotion examinations in New Haven were infrequent, so it was extremely important that applicants performed well on the test. The results would determine which firefighters would be considered for promotions during the next two years, and the order in which they would be considered. The City went to great lengths to ensure that the tests were fair and were not in any way racially biased. Many firefighters studied for months, at considerable personal and financial cost. When results from the test showed that white candidates outperformed minority candidates, a rancorous public debate ensued. Some firefighters argued the tests should be discarded because the results showed the tests to be discriminatory. They threatened a discrimination lawsuit if the City made promotions based on the tests. Other firefighters said the exams were neutral and fair. Confronted with these arguments, the City threw out the results based on the statistical racial disparity. Petitioners, white and Hispanic firefighters who passed the exams but were denied a chance at promotions by the City's refusal to certify the test results, sued the City alleging that discarding the test results discriminated against them based on their race in violation of the Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The defendants responded that had they certified the test results, they could have faced Title VII liability for adopting a practice having a disparate impact on minority firefighters. The District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and the Second Circuit affirmed.

DECISION The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed because the City's action in discarding the tests violated Title VII.

OPINION Kennedy, J.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, [citation], prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. Title VII prohibits both intentional discrimination (known as "disparate treatment") as well as, in some cases, practices that are not intended to discriminate but in fact have a disproportionately adverse effect on minorities (known as "disparate impact"). As enacted in 1964, Title VII's principal nondiscrimination provision held employers liable only for disparate treatment. That section retains its original wording today. It makes it unlawful for an employer "to fail or refuse to hire or to discharge any individual, or otherwise to discriminate against any individual with respect to his compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin." [Citation.] Disparate-treatment cases present "the most easily understood type of discrimination," [citation] and occur where an employer has "treated [a] particular person less favorably than others because of" a protected trait. [Citation.] A disparate-treatment plaintiff must establish "that the defendant had a discriminatory intent or motive" for taking a job-related action. [Citation.]

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 did not include an express prohibition on policies or practices that produce a disparate impact. But in Griggs v. Duke Power Co., [citation], the Court interpreted the Act to prohibit, in some cases, employers' facially neutral practices that, in fact, are "discriminatory in operation." [Citation.] The Griggs Court stated that the "touchstone" for disparate impact liability is the lack of "business necessity": "If an employment practice which operates to exclude [minorities] cannot be shown to be related to job performance, the practice is prohibited." [Citations.]
