CASE IN POINT Patricia Ostolaza and José Diaz owned a home on which they had two mortgage loans and a home equity line of credit provided by Bank of America. Anthony Falcone called them and said that he could refinance their mortgages in a manner that would reduce their monthly payments. Falcone said that he represented Bank of America when in fact he represented Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. At the closing of the new loan, the homeowners were given all of the relevant documents, including the TILA disclosure statement. The documents accurately stated the monthly payment under the new loan, which was higher than the couple's original payments. The homeowners later filed a lawsuit against Falcone and Countrywide Bank, alleging fraud. The trial court dismissed the suit, and the appellate court upheld the dismissal because the homeowners had been given the opportunity to read all of the relevant documents, but had not done so.³

CONCEPT SUMMARY 2.2 Types of Courts

Type of Court	Description
Trial Courts	Trial courts are courts of original jurisdiction in which actions are initiated. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> State courts—Courts of general jurisdiction can hear any case that has not been specifically designated for another court; courts of limited jurisdiction include, among others, domestic relations courts, probate courts, municipal courts, and small claims courts. Federal courts—The federal district court is the equivalent of the state trial court. Federal courts of limited jurisdiction include the bankruptcy courts and others shown in Exhibit 2–2 on page 38.
Intermediate Appellate Courts	Courts of appeals are reviewing courts; generally, appellate courts do not have original jurisdiction. About three-fourths of the states have intermediate appellate courts; in the federal court system, the U.S. circuit courts of appeals are the intermediate appellate courts.
Supreme Courts	The highest state court is that state's supreme court, although it may be called by some other name. Appeal from state supreme courts to the United States Supreme Court is possible only if a federal question is involved. The United States Supreme Court is the highest court in the federal court system and the final arbiter of the Constitution and federal law.

9-2. Property Crimes Which, if any, of the following crimes necessarily involves illegal activity on the part of more than one person?

- (a) Bribery
- (b) Forgery
- (c) Embezzlement
- (d) Larceny
- (e) Receiving stolen property

9-3. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Cyber Scam.

Kayla, a student at Learnwell University, owes $20,000 in unpaid tuition. If Kayla does not pay the tuition, Learnwell will not allow her to graduate. To obtain the funds to pay the debt, she sends e-mail letters to people that she does not personally know asking for financial help to send Milo, her disabled child, to a special school. In reality, Kayla's children. Is this a crime?

9-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Credit Cards.

 Oleksiy Sharapka ordered merchandise online using stolen credit cards. He had the items sent to outlets of Mail Boxes, Etc., and then arranged for someone to deliver the items to his house. He subsequently shipped the goods overseas, primarily to Russia. Sharapka was indicted in a federal district court. At the time of his arrest, government agents found in his possession, among other things, more than three hundred stolen credit-card numbers, including numbers issued by American Express. There was evidence that he had used more than ten of the American Express numbers to buy goods worth between $400,000 and $1 million from at least fourteen vendors. Did Sharapka commit any crimes? If so, who were his victims? Explain. [United States v. Sharapka, 526 F.3d 58 (1st Cir. 2008)]

Preface to the Instructor

The study of business law and, more generally, the legal environment of business has universal applicability. A student entering any field of business must have at least a passing understanding of business law in order to function in the real world. Additionally, students preparing for a career in accounting, government and political science, economics, and even medicine can use much of the information they learn in a business law and legal environment course. In fact, every individual throughout his or her lifetime can benefit from a knowledge of contracts, real property law, landlord-tenant relationships, and other legal topics. Consequently, we have fashioned this text as a useful “tool for living” for all of your students (including those taking the CPA exam).

For the Twelfth Edition, we have spent a great deal of effort making this book more contemporary, exciting, and visually appealing than ever before. We have also added many new features and special pedagogical devices that focus on the legal, ethical, global, and corporate environments, while addressing core curriculum requirements.

WHAT IS NEW IN THE TWELFTH EDITION

Instructors have come to rely on the coverage, accuracy, and applicability of Business Law. To make sure that our text engages your students, solidifies their understanding of legal concepts, and provides the best teaching tools available, we now offer the following items either in the text or in conjunction with the text.

➤ New Shifting Legal Priorities for Business Features

For the Twelfth Edition, we have created this new feature that shows students how legal priorities are shifting in the business world. Special emphasis is given to sustainability, ethical trends, and changing managerial responsibilities. Each feature ends with a short section entitled Managerial

Implications that points out why the changing priorities discussed in the feature are significant to businesspersons. Topics examined in these features include:

- Prosecuting White-Collar Crime with the Honest-Services Fraud Law (Chapter 9)
- Fair Trade and Environmental Sustainability (Chapter 19)
- The National Export Initiative (Chapter 23)
- SEC Disclosures and Climate Change (Chapter 42)
- The Law of Building “Green”—Sustainable Real Estate Development (Chapter 50)

➤ New Case in Point Features

Many instructors use cases to illustrate how the law applies to business. For this edition, we have expanded our in-text discussion of case law by adding at least one new Case in Point feature in every chapter. These features present, in paragraph format, the facts and issues of an actual case and then describe the court’s decision and rationale. Citations to the cases are included for further reference. The Case in Point features are integrated throughout the text to help students better understand how courts apply the principles under discussion in the real world.

➤ New Debate This Features

To encourage student participation and motivate your students to think critically about the rationale underlying the law on a particular topic, we have created a special new feature for the Twelfth Edition. Entitled Debate This, it consists of a brief statement or question concerning the chapter material that can be used to spur lively classroom or small group discussions, or can be a written assignment. These features follow the Reviewing features (discussed shortly) at the end of each chapter. Suggested pro and con responses to the Debate This features can be found in both the Instructor’s Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text.

(The full title of this manual is Answers to Questions and Case Problems and Alternate Problem Sets with Answers.)

➤ New Chapter on Mortgages and Foreclosures after the Recession

For the Twelfth Edition, we have included an entirely new chapter (Chapter 31) entitled Mortgages and Foreclosures after the Recession. This chapter examines some of the mortgage lending practices that contributed to the latest recession and discusses the legal reforms enacted in response to it.

➤ New Video Questions

In response to popular demand, we have created eight new Video Questions for this edition. As discussed later in this preface, these questions refer students to the text's Web site to view a particular video clip prior to answering a series of questions in the book that relate the video to the chapter material. Some of the new videos are clips from actual movies or television series, such as Field of Dreams, Midnight Run, and Mary Tyler Moore. Others are from a new Real World Legal series of videos in the Business Law Digital Video Library (discussed later in this preface).

➤ New Insight into Ethics Features

For the Twelfth Edition, we have created many new Insight into Ethics features, which appear in selected chapters and examine the ethical implications of various topics. These features provide valuable insights into how the courts and the law are dealing with specific ethical issues. Each of these features ends with a critical-thinking question that explores some cultural, environmental, political, social, or technological aspect of the issue. The following are some of the topics explored in these features:

- Some Consequences of Caps on Medical Malpractice Awards (Chapter 7)
- How Much Information Must Employers Disclose to Prospective Employees? (Chapter 14)
- Warning Labels for Video Games (Chapter 22)
- Is the Business Judgment Rule Overly Protective? (Chapter 40)
- Should Pharmaceutical Companies Be Allowed to Tweet? (Chapter 44)

➤ Two Critical-Thinking Questions at the End of Nearly Every Case

In every chapter of the Eleventh Edition of Business Law, we included one longer case excerpt followed by two questions designed to guide students' analysis of the case and build their legal reasoning skills. For the Twelfth Edition, we continue to offer one longer excerpt—labeled an Extended Case—with two critical-thinking questions in every chapter. These Extended Cases may be used for case-briefing assignments and are also tied to the Special Case Analysis questions found in every unit of the text.

Because of the popularity of the case-ending questions, we've also included two questions for all cases. These questions may include:

- What If the Facts Were Different?
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law
- The Ethical Dimension
- The E-Commerce Dimension
- The Global Dimension
- The Legal Environment Dimension

Suggested answers to all questions following cases can be found in both the Instructor's Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text.

➤ Managerial Implications in Selected Cases

In addition to the critical-thinking questions, we have devised a special new item of case pedagogy for this edition. At the end of selected cases that have particular importance for business managers, we have included a new section entitled Managerial Implications. These sections point out the significance of the court's ruling in the case for business owners and managers.

➤ Emphasis on Critical Thinking and Legal Reasoning

Today's business leaders must often think "outside the box" when making business decisions. For this reason, we have included numerous critical-thinking elements in the Twelfth Edition that are designed to challenge students' understanding of the materials beyond simple retention. Your students' critical-thinking and legal reasoning skills will be increased as they work through the numerous pedagogical aids in the book. The new Debate This features (discussed previously) require critical thinking. In addition, nearly every feature and every case presented in the text conclude with some type of critical-thinking question. These questions include For Critical Analysis, What If the Facts Were Different? and the Ethical, E-Commerce, Global, and Legal Environment Dimension questions discussed previously. They also include the Special Case Analysis questions and the questions in the Reviewing features, which are described below.

➤ Special Case Analysis Questions

Through the years, instructors have frequently requested that we help them teach their business law students how to analyze case law. We discuss the fundamental topic of how to read and understand case law in Chapter 1 and cover How to Brief Cases and Analyze Case Problems in Appendix A. For every unit in the text, in the Questions and Case Problems at the end of selected chapters, we also provide a Special Case Analysis question that is based on the Extended Case excerpt in that chapter. These questions are designed to build students' analytical skills.

The Special Case Analysis questions test students' ability to perform IRAC (Issue, Rule, Application, and Conclusion) case analysis. Students must identify the legal issue presented in the chapter's Extended Case, understand the rule of law, determine how the rule applies to the facts of the case, and describe the court's conclusion. Instructors can assign these questions as homework or use them in class to elicit student participation and teach case analysis.

➤ Reviewing Features in Every Chapter

In the Twelfth Edition of Business Law, we continue to offer a Reviewing feature at the end of every chapter to help solidify students' understanding of the chapter materials. Each Reviewing feature presents a hypothetical scenario and then asks a series of questions that require students to identify the issues and apply the legal concepts discussed in the chapter. These features are designed to help students review the chapter topics in a simple and interesting way and see how the legal principles discussed in the chapter affect the world in which they live. An instructor can use these features as the basis for in-class discussion or can encourage students to use them for self-study prior to completing homework assignments. Suggested answers to the questions posed in the Reviewing features can be found in both the Instructor's Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text.

The Reviewing features are also tied to a set of questions for each chapter in the Web-based CengageNOW system, to be discussed next. Students can read through the scenario in the text and then answer the four Applications and Analysis questions online. By using the CengageNOW system, students can receive instant feedback on their answers to these questions, and instructors will obtain automatically graded assignments that enable them to assess students' understanding of the materials.

➤ Improved CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System

To help students learn how to identify and apply the legal principles they study, we have created an easy-to-use Web-based product for this text. The system provides interactive, automatically graded assignments for every chapter and unit. For each of the fifty-two chapters, we have devised several categories of multiple-choice questions that stress different aspects of the chapter materials. By using the optional CengageNOW system, students can complete the assignments from any location via the Internet and can receive instant feedback on why their answers to questions were incorrect or correct (if the instructor wishes to allow feedback). Instructors can customize the system to meet their own specifications and can track students' progress. CengageNOW offers all of the following:

- Chapter Review Questions—The first set of ten to fifteen questions reviews the basic concepts and principles discussed in the chapter. This set often includes questions based on the cases presented in the text.
- Brief Hypotheticals—The next group of seven to ten questions gives students practice in spotting the issue and rule of law in the context of a short factual scenario.
- Legal Reasoning—The third set contains five questions that require students to analyze the factual situation provided and apply the rules of law discussed in the chapter to arrive at an answer.
- IRAC Case Analysis—The next set of four questions for each chapter requires students to perform all the basic elements of legal reasoning (identify the issue, determine the rule of law, apply the rule to the facts presented, and arrive at a conclusion).

These questions are based on the Extended Case excerpts that appear in each chapter.

- Application and Analysis—The final set of four questions is linked to the Reviewing features (discussed previously) that appear in every chapter of the text. The student is required to read through the hypothetical scenario, analyze the facts presented, identify the issues in dispute, and apply the rules discussed in the chapter to answer the questions.
- Essay Questions—In addition to the multiple-choice questions available on CengageNOW, we now provide essay questions that allow students to compose and submit essays online. Students' essays are automatically recorded to the gradebook so that instructors can quickly and easily evaluate the essays and record grades.
- Video Questions—CengageNOW also provides links to the Business Law Digital Video Library so that students can access and view the video clips and answer questions related to the topics in the chapter.
- Cumulative Questions for Each Unit—In addition to the questions relating to each chapter, the CengageNOW system provides a set of cumulative questions, entitled “Synthesizing Legal Concepts,” for each of the ten units in the text.
- Additional Advantages of CengageNOW—Instructors can utilize the system to upload their course syllabi, create and customize homework assignments, keep track of their students' progress, communicate with their students about assignments and due dates, and create reports summarizing the data for an individual student or for the whole class.

➤ Aplia for Business Law: Online Homework and Gradebook System

Aplia is an online homework system dedicated to improving learning by increasing student effort and engagement. Aplia encourages business law students to read their text, stay engaged with course material, and master critical-thinking and legal reasoning skills that will serve them well in their future business careers.

Originally created by a professor to enhance his own courses, Aplia has been specially tailored to cover the topics in each chapter of this text. Immediate, detailed feedback for every question helps students learn and improves their performance. Aplia's numerous interactive features help students stay interested in business law, be more prepared for classes, and connect concepts across chapters. Aplia also allows instructors to spend more time teaching and less time reviewing and grading assignments. As your students complete assignments, their scores are imported automatically into your gradebook, where you can easily track class and individual student performance.

Aplia Text, an interactive textbook, contains all the contents of the printed textbook but takes advantage of the digital environment. Features such as flipbook-style navigation allow students to scan through the text easily. They can also highlight the text; listen to audio clips; and view movies, simulations, graphs, and slideshows.

➤ CourseMate

CourseMate brings business law concepts to life with interactive learning, study, and exam preparation tools that support the printed textbook. Built-in engagement tracking tools allow you to assess the study activities of your students. Additionally, CourseMate includes an interactive online textbook, which contains the complete content of the printed textbook enhanced by the many advantages of a digital environment.

➤ Improved Ethics Coverage

For the Twelfth Edition of Business Law, we have significantly revised and updated the chapter on ethics and business decision making (Chapter 5). The chapter now presents a more practical, realistic, case-study approach to business ethics and the dilemmas facing businesspersons today.

It also provides step-by-step guidance for making ethical business decisions. The emphasis on ethics is reiterated in materials throughout the text, particularly the Insight into Ethics features, the Focus on Ethics features that conclude every unit, and the pedagogy that accompanies selected cases and features. We also discuss corporate governance issues in the ethics chapter, the corporations chapters, and the Focus on Ethics feature at the end of Unit Eight, on business organizations. Finally, each chapter includes a Question of Ethics case problem that provides modern-day examples of the kinds of ethical issues faced by businesspersons and explores the ways that courts can resolve them.

In a number of places in this text, we discuss the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 and the corporate scandals that led to the passage of that legislation. For example, Chapter 5 contains a section examining the requirements of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act relating to confidential reporting systems. In Chapter 42, we discuss this act in the context of securities law and present an exhibit (Exhibit 42–4) containing some of the key provisions of the act relating to corporate accountability with respect to securities transactions. Finally, in Chapter 48, we again look at provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act as they relate to public accounting firms and accounting practices. We also discuss recent attacks on the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in the case Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Accounting Oversight Board in the Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature for Chapter 48.

Because the Sarbanes-Oxley Act is a topic of significant concern in today's business climate, we include excerpts and explanatory comments on the act as Appendix H. Students and instructors alike will find it useful to have the provisions of the act immediately available for reference.

BUSINESS LAW ON THE WEB

For the Twelfth Edition of Business Law, we offer a text Web site so that users can easily locate the resources they seek.

Resources at the Business Law Web Site

When you visit our Web site at www.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, you will find a broad array of teaching/learning resources, including the following:

- Sample answers to the Case Problem with Sample Answer, which appears in the Questions and Case Problems at the end of every chapter. This problem/answer set is designed to help your students learn how to answer case problems by acquainting them with model answers to selected problems. In addition, we offer the answers to the hypothetical Questions with Sample Answers on the Web site, as well as in the text (Appendix I).
- Videos referenced in the Video Questions that appear in selected chapters of this edition of Business Law.
- Internet exercises for every chapter in the text (at least two per chapter). These exercises have been refocused to provide more practical information to business law students on topics covered in the chapters and to acquaint students with the legal resources that are available online.
- Interactive quizzes for every chapter in this text.
- Legal reference materials including a "Statutes" page that offers links to the full text of selected statutes referenced in the text, a Spanish glossary, and links to other important legal resources available for free on the Web.

- Law on the Web features that provide links to URLs that discuss topics related to each chapter in the text.
- Link to our Business Law Digital Video Library that provides a compendium of more than seventy-five video scenarios and explanations (see below).
- Online Legal Research Guide that offers complete yet brief guidance to using the Internet and evaluating information obtained from the Internet as well as hyperlinks to the Web sites discussed.
- Court case updates that present summaries of new cases from various legal publications, are continually updated, and are specifically keyed to chapters in this text.

Business Law Digital Video Library

For this edition of Business Law, we have included special Video Questions at the end of selected chapters. Each of these questions directs students to the text's Web site at www.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson to view a video relevant to a topic covered in the chapter. This instruction is followed by a series of questions based on the video.

The videos can be used for homework assignments, discussion starters, or classroom demonstrations and are useful for generating student interest. Some of the videos are clips from actual movies or television series. By watching a video and answering the questions, students will gain an understanding of how the legal concepts they have studied in the chapter apply to the real-life situation portrayed in the video.

The videos are part of our Business Law Digital Video Library. An access code for the videos can be packaged with each new copy of this textbook for no additional charge. If Business Law Digital Video Library access did not come packaged with the textbook, students can purchase it online at www.cengage.com/blaw/dvl.

Suggested answers for all of the Video Questions are given in both the Instructor's Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text.

ADDITIONAL SPECIAL FEATURES OF THIS TEXT

We have included in Business Law, Twelfth Edition, a number of pedagogical devices and special features, including those discussed here.

Concept Summaries

Whenever key areas of the law need additional emphasis, we provide a Concept Summary. These summaries have always been a popular pedagogical tool in this text. The text now includes more than fifty of these summaries, many of which have been expanded or revised.

Exhibits

When appropriate, we also illustrate important aspects of the law in graphic form in exhibits. In all, more than one hundred exhibits are featured in Business Law, Twelfth Edition. Several of these exhibits are new, and we have modified existing exhibits to achieve better clarity.

Effective Case Formats

For this edition, we have carefully selected recent cases that not only provide on-point illustrations of the legal principles discussed in the chapter but also are of high interest to students. In all, more than 75 percent of the cases in the Twelfth Edition are from 2009 or 2010.

As mentioned, for this edition we have included one Extended Case per chapter that is presented entirely in the court's language and does not include any paraphrased section on the case's background and facts or the decision and remedy. The remaining cases in each chapter appear in our usual Business Law format, which now includes two case-ending questions (or one question and a Managerial Implication) for every case. We also provide bracketed definitions for any terms in the opinion that might be difficult for students to understand. Cases may include one or more of the following sections, a few of which have already been described:

- Company Profiles—Certain cases include a profile describing the history of the company involved to give students an awareness of the context of the case before the court. Some profiles include the URL for the company's Web site.
- What If the Facts Were Different?—One case in each chapter concludes with this question. The student is asked to decide whether a specified change in the facts of the case would alter its outcome. Suggested answers to these questions are included in both the Instructor's Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text.
- The Ethical [E-Commerce, Global, or Legal Environment] Dimension—As discussed previously, these questions ask students to explore different aspects of the issues of the case and help instructors meet core curriculum requirements for business law. Suggested answers to these questions are included in both the Instructor's Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text.

- Impact of This Case on Today's Law—Because many students are not aware of how some of the older cases presented in this text affect today's court rulings, we include a section at the end of selected landmark cases that clarifies the relevance of the case to modern law.
- Managerial Implications—These sections clarify the relevance of a case for business owners or managers.

Case Problems

Nearly every chapter in the Twelfth Edition includes a 2009 or 2010 case problem in the Questions and Case Problems that appear at the end of the chapter. These problems are designed to clarify how modern courts deal with the issues discussed in the chapter. In addition, at the request of instructors, we have added a label to every question and case problem that identifies the chapter topic to which the question relates. These labels make it easier for those who wish to assign only certain questions to their students.

Suggested answers to these questions are included in both the Instructor's Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text.

Two Test Banks Available

To provide instructors with even greater flexibility in teaching, we offer two separate Test Banks, each with a complete set of questions for every chapter of Business Law, Twelfth Edition. These two Test Banks have been significantly revised, and many new questions have been added. Instructors who would like to alternate the tests they give their students each semester can now do so without having to create additional testing materials. In addition, instructors now have twice as many options for questions in each category (true/false, multiple choice, essay) from which to choose.

Two Questions with Sample Answers in Each Chapter

In response to instructors who would like students to have sample answers available for some of the questions and case problems, we have included two questions with sample answers in each chapter. The Question with Sample Answer is a hypothetical question for which students can access a sample answer in Appendix I at the end of the text. Every chapter also has one Case Problem with Sample Answer that is based on an actual case and answered on the text's Web site.

THE MOST COMPLETE SUPPLEMENTS PACKAGE AVAILABLE TODAY

FOR USERS OF THE ELEVENTH EDITION

First of all, we want to thank you for helping make Business Law the best-selling business law text in America today. Second, we want to make you aware of the numerous additions and changes that we have made in this edition—many in response to comments from reviewers. For example, we have added more examples and new Case in Point features, and incorporated the latest United States Supreme Court decisions throughout the text as appropriate. We have substantially revised and reorganized the business organizations unit (Unit Eight), particularly the chapters on corporations (Chapter 39 through 41), which have been revised to be more in line with the reality of modern corporate law. We have simplified and streamlined the chapter on securities laws (Chapter 42), and we have revised and reorganized the property chapters (Chapters 49 and 50).

Significantly Revised Chapters

Every chapter of the Twelfth Edition has been revised as necessary to incorporate new developments in the law or to streamline the presentations. A number of new trends in business law are also addressed in the cases and special features of the Twelfth Edition. Other major changes and additions for this edition include the following:

- Chapter 4 (Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business)—This chapter has been thoroughly revised and updated to be more business oriented. New Case in Point features have been added throughout, and the privacy materials have been updated to include a new subsection on pretexting.
- Chapter 5 (Ethics and Business Decision Making)—This chapter has been significantly revised, and a new section on the ethical transgressions of financial institutions discusses well-known companies, such as American International Group (AIG). The chapter also provides step-by-step guidance on making ethical business decisions, materials on global business ethics, and a new video question concerning marketing strategies in the pharmaceutical industry. The 2010 United States Supreme Court case involving Jeffrey Skilling, former CEO of Enron Corporation, is presented in the chapter. Other topics include recent bribery scandals, bribery by foreign companies, and Internet attacks on corporate reputations. A new Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature titled Corporate Social Responsibility May Mean Outbehaving the Competition, has been added.
- Chapter 6 (Intentional Torts) and Chapter 7 (Negligence and Strict Liability)—Our torts coverage has been revised to be more up to date and business oriented. We have added new materials on tort reform, cyber torts, spam, and the U.S. Safe Web Act in Chapter 6. In Chapter 7, we have reorganized the presentation of causation and damages and included additional coverage on comparative negligence, as well as a new Insight into Ethics feature titled Some Consequences of Caps on Medical Malpractice Awards.
- Chapter 8 (Intellectual Property and Internet Law)—The materials on intellectual property rights have been thoroughly revised and updated to reflect the most current laws and trends. We have reworked our discussion of descriptive, generic, and suggestive trademarks for clarity and included an updated discussion of software and business process patents. We have also updated the materials on copyrights in digital information and added a description of cloud computing. The chapter also includes updates on international treaties protecting intellectual property and a Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature on the Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement.
- Chapter 9 (Criminal Law and Cyber Crime)—This chapter has been streamlined and updated. We have added discussions of criminal negligence and strict liability. A Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature titled Prosecuting White-Collar Crime with Honest-Services Fraud Law includes a discussion of how the Supreme Court limited the application of this federal law in 2010.
- Chapters 10 through 18 (the Contracts unit)—Throughout this unit, we have added more examples to clarify and enhance our already superb contract law coverage. We have also integrated our discussion of electronic contracts, or e-contracts, into all the chapters in this unit and have revised the text to improve clarity and reduce legalese. We have included up-to-date information and cases that will appeal to your students, such as a case involving the Comedy Club and another involving Amazon.com. Numerous new Case in Point features, including one involving Tom Selleck and another involving Mike Tyson, that are intended to garner student interest. Other interesting features include, Shifting Legal Priorities for Business features titled Fair Trade and Environmental Sustainability and How Much Information Must Employers Disclose to Prospective Employees?
- Chapters 19 through 23 (the unit on Domestic and International Sales and Lease Contracts)—We have streamlined and simplified our coverage of the Uniform Commercial Code. We have added numerous new Cases in Point and examples throughout the unit to increase student comprehension. We have also expanded our discussion of international sales and lease contracts and now include the International Law in a Global Economy chapter (Chapter 23) in this unit.

- Chapters 24 through 27 (the unit on Negotiable Instruments)—We have updated this entire unit, particularly Chapters 24 and 27, to accommodate the reality of digital banking and funds transfers. In Chapter 24, we added a Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature titled Person-to-Person Mobile Payments Aid in Sustainability. The Check-Clearing in the 21st Century Act (Check 21 Act) has been incorporated into the text. We have also reworked the text, especially in Chapter 26, to clarify and simplify difficult concepts for your students.
- Chapters 28 through 31 (the unit on Creditors' Rights and Bankruptcy)—This unit has been revised to be more up to date and comprehensible and streamlined to focus on materials that students need to know. Chapter 29 (Secured Transactions) was substantially reworked to clarify the general principles and exceptions. The bankruptcy law chapter (Chapter 30), which is based on law after the 2005 Reform Act, has been substantially revised and includes updated dollar amounts of various provisions of the Bankruptcy Code. Chapter 31 (Mortgages and Foreclosures after the Recession) is entirely new to this edition and provides a timely look at the mortgage crisis, predatory lending practices, and the laws enacted to address some of the problems that became evident during the recession.
- Chapter 34 (Employment, Immigration, and Labor Law) and Chapter 35 (Employment Discrimination)—These two chapters covering employment law have been thoroughly updated to include discussions of legal issues facing employers today. Chapter 34 includes new materials on immigration law, which is of increasing importance to employers. It also includes a new section on layoffs and the WARN Act, and covers recent amendments to FMLA leave. We have updated minimum wage figures, as well as Social Security and Medicare percentages, and include current information on privacy rights and genetic testing. A feature titled The Online Creation and Modification of Employment Contracts has been added. Chapter 35 includes the latest developments in age and disability discrimination and equal pay legislation. We discuss relevant United States Supreme Court decisions and have reworked the text to simplify and add clarity.
- Chapters 36 through 43 (the Business Organizations unit)—This unit has been substantially revised and updated to improve the flow and clarity and to provide more practical information and recent examples. We have worked to improve the comprehensibility of the materials throughout, including the addition of a new concept summary in Chapter 38. The most significant changes to the unit were made in the corporations chapters (Chapters 39 through 42), which have been revised to reflect modern trends in corporate law. Chapter 39 has been thoroughly revised and includes a new Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature, The Latest Recession Re-Ignites the Internet Taxation Debate. We have updated the materials on the Sarbanes-Oxley Act and added discussions of new e-proxy rules and shareholder access. An Insight into Ethics feature—Is the Business Judgment Rule Overly Protective?—appears in Chapter 40. The chapter on securities law (Chapter 42) was revamped to make this difficult topic more understandable to students. The chapter now includes a practical explanation of the Howey test. We have also revised the materials on the registration process to account for well-known seasoned issuers and updated the securities fraud coverage.
- Chapter 44 (Administrative Law)—This chapter has been reworked to underscore the practical significance of administrative law for businesspersons. We present the United States Supreme Court case on fleeting expletives in this chapter, and a feature explores the topic Should Pharmaceutical Companies Be Allowed to Tweet?
- Chapter 45 (Consumer Law)—The materials on food labeling and credit cards have been significantly updated. The chapter discusses the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, the new agency that was established by the 2010 financial reform package. A Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature titled New Health-Care Law Requires Caloric Information is included.
- Chapter 46 (Environmental Law)—The materials on air pollution and water pollution have been updated. New subsections discuss how environmental self-audits can help businesses minimize their liability and explain the innocent landowner, or third party, defense to Superfund liability.
- Chapter 47 (Antitrust Law)—We have added new examples and coverage of leading cases throughout the chapter, particularly in the discussions of price fixing, relevant product market, and relevant geographic market. Updated thresholds for interlocking directorates have been incorporated.

- Chapter 48 (Professional Liability and Accountability)—We have added a discussion of the adoption of global accounting rules by the United States and how that may affect an accountant’s duty of care in the near future. A Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature titled Attacking the Essence of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act appears in the chapter.

- Chapter 50 (Real Property and Landlord-Tenant Relationships)—This chapter has been revised to include more discussion of zoning and includes a new feature titled The Law of Building “Green”—Sustainable Real Estate Development.

Preface to the Student

Welcome to the world of business law and the legal environment. You are about to embark on the study of one of the most important topics you can master in today's changing world. A solid understanding of business law will, of course, help you if you are going into the world of business. If you decide on a career in accounting, economics, finance, political science, or history, understanding how the legal environment works is crucial.

Moreover, in your role as a consumer, you will be faced with some legal issues throughout your lifetime—renting an apartment, buying a house, obtaining a mortgage, and leasing a car, to mention only a few. In your role as an employee (if you don't go into business for yourself), you will need to know what rights you have and what rights you don't have. Even when you contemplate marriage, you will be faced with legal issues.

WHAT YOU WILL FIND IN THIS TEXT

As you thumb through the pages in this text, you will see that we have tried to make your study of business law and the legal environment as efficient and enjoyable as possible. To this end, you will find the following aids:

- Mastering Terminology—through key terms that are boldfaced, listed at the end of each chapter, and explained fully in the Glossary at the end of the book.
- Understanding Concepts—through numerous Concept Summaries and exhibits.
- Observing the Law in the Context of the Real World—through new Case in Point features within each chapter's text and the Reviewing features at the end of every chapter.
- Seeing How Legal Issues Can Arise—through Video Questions based on Web-available short videos, including some from Hollywood movies.
- Figuring Out How the Law Is Evolving—through a feature called Shifting Legal Priorities for Business.
- Determining How the Law Applies to Business Managers—through the new Managerial Implications sections that appear in selected features and cases.
- Gaining Insight into How the Law Affects or Is Affected by Ethical Issues—through Insight into Ethics features.

The above list, of course, is representative only. You will understand much more of what the law is about as you read through the court cases presented in this book, including Extended Case excerpts, which will give you a feel for how the courts really decide cases, in the courts' language.

IMPROVING YOUR ABILITY TO PERFORM LEGAL REASONING AND ANALYSIS

Although business law may seem to be a mass of facts, your goal in taking this course should also be an increased ability to use legal reasoning and analysis to figure out how legal situations will be resolved. To this end, you will find the following key learning features to assist you in mastering legal reasoning and analysis:

- Finding and Analyzing Case Law—In Chapter 1, you will find a section with this title that explains:
 - Legal citations.
 - The standard elements of a case.
 - The different types of opinions a court can issue.
 - How to read and understand cases.
- Briefing a Case—In Appendix A, you will see how to brief and analyze case problems. This explanation will teach you how to break down the elements of a case and will improve your ability to answer the Case Problems in each chapter.
- Questions with Sample Answers—At the end of each chapter, there is one hypothetical factual scenario that presents a legal question for which you can access a sample answer in Appendix I (and also on the text's Web site). This allows you to practice and to see if you are answering the hypothetical questions correctly.

- Case Problems with Sample Answers—Each chapter has a series of chapter-ending Case Problems. You can find an answer to one problem in each chapter on this book's companion student Web site. You can easily compare your answer to the court's opinion in each real case.
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law—Each case that is considered a landmark concludes with a short section that explains the relevance of older case law to the way courts reason today.
- What If the Facts Were Different?—This section, found at the end of selected cases, encourages you to think about how the outcome of a case might be different if the facts were altered.
- The Ethical [E-Commerce, Global, or Legal Environment] Dimension—Every case in this text concludes with two critical-thinking questions. These Dimension questions ask you to explore the law in a variety of contexts to help you meet the specific curriculum requirements for business law students.
- Managerial Implications—When a case has particular importance for business managers, we point out its significance in these special sections.

THE COMPANION STUDENT WEB SITE

The companion student Web site at www.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson provides you with short videos on various legal topics and with sample answers to selected case problems. In addition, you will find the following:

- Interactive quizzes for every chapter.
- A Glossary of boldfaced terms.
- Flashcards that provide an optional study tool for reviewing the key terms in every chapter.
- Appendix A: How to Brief and Analyze Case Problems that will help you analyze cases. This useful appendix in the book can also be downloaded from the Web site.

- Legal reference materials including a “Statutes” page that offers links to the full text of selected statutes referenced in the text, a Spanish glossary, and links to other important legal resources available free on the Web.
- Internet exercises for every chapter in the text (at least two per chapter) that help you learn how to research the law online.
- Law on the Web features that provide links to Web sites that discuss topics related to each chapter in the text.
- Online Legal Research Guide that offers complete yet brief guidance to using the Internet and evaluating information obtained from the Internet as well as hyperlinks to the Web sites discussed.
- Court case updates for follow-up on decisions presented in the text.

INTERACTIVE ASSIGNMENTS ON THE WEB

Some of you may have instructors who provide assignments using either of our interactive Web-based systems, Aplia or CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System.

Both Aplia and CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System allow you to improve your mastery of legal concepts and terminology, legal reasoning and analysis, and much more. Your instructor will give you further information if she or he decides to use a Web-based system.

Of course, whether or not you are using Aplia or CengageNOW, you will wish to consider purchasing the Study Guide, which can help you get a better grade in your course (see the inside cover for details).

The law is all around you—and will be for the rest of your life. We hope that you begin your first course in business law and the legal environment with the same high degree of excitement that we, the authors, always have when we work on improving this text, now in its Twelfth Edition. Business Law has withstood the test of time—several million students before you have already used and benefited from it.

Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

One of the important functions of law in any society is to provide stability, predictability, and continuity so that people can know how to order their affairs. If any society is to survive, its citizens must be able to determine what is legally right and legally wrong. They must know what sanctions will be imposed on them if they commit wrongful acts. If they suffer harm as a result of others' wrongful acts, they must know how they can seek redress. By setting forth the rights, obligations, and privileges of citizens, the law enables individuals to go about their business with confidence and a certain degree of predictability. The stability and predictability created by the law provide an essential framework for all civilized activities, including business activities.

What do we mean when we speak of "the law"? Although the law has various definitions, they are all based on the general observation that law consists of enforceable rules governing relationships among individuals and between individuals and their society. These "enforceable rules" may consist of unwritten principles of behavior established by a nomadic tribe. They may be set forth in a law code, such as the Code of Hammurabi in ancient Babylon (c. 1780 B.C.E.) or the law code of one of today's European nations. They may consist of written laws and court decisions created by modern legislative and judicial bodies, as in the United States. Regardless of how such rules are created, they all have one thing in common: they establish rights, duties, and privileges that are consistent with the values and beliefs of their society or its ruling group.

In this introductory chapter, we first look at an important question for any student reading this text: How does the legal environment affect business decision making? We next describe the major sources of American law, the common law tradition, and some basic schools of legal thought. We conclude the chapter with sections offering practical guidance on several topics, including how to find the sources of law discussed in this chapter (and referred to throughout the text) and how to read and understand court opinions.

BUSINESS ACTIVITIES AND THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT

As those entering the world of business will learn, laws and government regulations affect virtually all business activities—from hiring and firing decisions to workplace safety, the manufacturing and marketing of products, business financing, and more. To make good business decisions, a basic knowledge of the laws and regulations governing these activities is beneficial—if not essential. Realize also that in today's world, a knowledge of "black-letter" law is not enough. Businesspersons are also pressured to make ethical decisions. Thus, the study of business law necessarily involves an ethical dimension.

Many Different Laws May Affect a Single Business Transaction

As you will note, each chapter in this text covers a specific area of the law and shows how the legal rules in that area affect business activities. Though compartmentalizing the law in this fashion promotes conceptual clarity, it does not indicate the extent to which a number of different laws may apply to just one transaction.

Consider an example. Suppose that you are the president of NetSys, Inc., a company that creates and maintains computer network systems for business firms, and also markets related software. One day, Hernandez, an operations officer for Southwest Distribution Corporation (SDC), contacts you by e-mail about a possible contract concerning SDC's computer network. In deciding whether to enter into a contract with SDC, you should consider, among other things, the legal requirements for an enforceable contract. Are there different requirements for a contract for services and a contract for products? What are your options if SDC breaches (breaks, or fails to perform) the contract? The answers to these questions are part of contract law and sales law.

Other questions might concern payment under the contract. How can you ensure that NetSys will be paid? For example, if payment is made with a check that is returned for insufficient funds, what are your options? Answers to these questions can be found in the laws that relate to negotiable instruments (such as checks) and creditors' rights. Also, a dispute may occur over the rights to NetSys's software, or there may be a question of liability if the software is defective. Questions may even be raised as to whether you and Hernandez had the authority to make the deal in the first place. A disagreement may arise from other circumstances, such as an accountant's evaluation of the contract. Resolutions of these questions may be found in areas of the law that relate to intellectual property, e-commerce, torts, product liability, agency, business organizations, or professional liability.

Finally, if any dispute cannot be resolved amicably, then the laws and the rules concerning courts and court procedures spell out the steps of a lawsuit. Exhibit 1-1 illustrates the various areas of law that may influence business decision making.

Ethics and Business Decision Making

Merely knowing the areas of law that may affect a business decision is not sufficient in today's business world. Businesspersons must also take ethics into account. As you will learn in Chapter 5, ethics generally is defined as the study of what constitutes right or wrong behavior. Today, business decision makers need to consider not just whether a decision is legal, but also whether it is ethical.

Throughout this text, you will learn about the relationship between the law and ethics, as well as about some of the types of ethical questions that often arise in the business context. For example, the unit-ending Focus on Ethics features are devoted solely to the exploration of ethical questions pertaining to topics treated within the unit. We have also included Ethical Dimension questions for selected cases that stress the importance of ethical considerations in today's business climate and Insight into Ethics features that appear in selected chapters. A Question of Ethics case problem is included at the conclusion of every chapter to introduce you to the ethical aspects of specific cases involving real-life situations. Additionally, Chapter 5 offers a detailed look at the importance of ethical considerations in business decision making.

SOURCES OF AMERICAN LAW

There are numerous sources of American law. Primary sources of law, or sources that establish the law, include the following:

1. The U.S. Constitution and the constitutions of the various states.
2. Statutory law—including laws passed by Congress, state legislatures, or local governing bodies.
3. Regulations created by administrative agencies, such as the Food and Drug Administration.
4. Case law and common law doctrines.

We describe each of these important sources of law in the following pages.

Secondary sources of law are books and articles that summarize and clarify the primary sources of law. Examples include legal encyclopedias, treatises, articles in law reviews, and compilations of law, such as the Restatements of the Law (which will be discussed shortly). Courts often refer to secondary sources of law for guidance in interpreting and applying the primary sources of law discussed here.

Constitutional Law

The federal government and the states have separate written constitutions that set forth the general organization, powers, and limits of their respective governments. Constitutional law is the law as expressed in these constitutions.

According to Article VI of the U.S. Constitution, the Constitution is the supreme law of the land. As such, it is the basis of all law in the United States. A law in violation of the Constitution, if challenged, will be declared unconstitutional and will not be enforced, no matter what its source. Because of its importance in the American legal system, we present the complete text of the U.S. Constitution in Appendix B.

The Tenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution reserves to the states all powers not granted to the federal government. Each state in the union has its own constitution. Unless it conflicts with the U.S. Constitution or a federal law, a state constitution is supreme within the state's borders.

Statutory Law

Laws enacted by legislative bodies at any level of government, such as the statutes passed by Congress or by state legislatures, make up the body of law generally referred to as statutory law. When a legislature passes a statute, that statute ultimately is included in the federal code of laws or the relevant state code of laws (these codes are discussed later in this chapter).

Statutory law also includes local ordinances—statutes (laws, rules, or orders) passed by municipal or county governing units to govern matters not covered by federal or state law. Ordinances commonly have to do with city or county land use (zoning ordinances), building and safety codes, and other matters affecting the local community.

A federal statute, of course, applies to all states. A state statute, in contrast, applies only within the state's borders. State laws thus may vary from state to state. No federal statute may violate the U.S. Constitution, and no state statute or local ordinance may violate the U.S. Constitution or the relevant state constitution.

UNIFORM LAWS The differences among state laws were particularly notable in the 1800s, when conflicting state statutes frequently made trade and commerce among the states difficult. To counter these problems, in 1892 a group of legal scholars and lawyers formed the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL) to draft uniform laws, or model laws, for the states to consider adopting. The NCCUSL still exists today and continues to issue uniform laws.

Each state has the option of adopting or rejecting a uniform law. Only if a state legislature adopts a uniform law does that law become part of the statutory law of that state. Note that a state legislature may adopt all or part of a uniform law as it is written, or the legislature may rewrite the law however the legislature wishes. Hence, even though many states may have adopted a uniform law, those states' laws may not be entirely "uniform."

The earliest uniform law, the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, was completed by 1896 and adopted in every state by the early 1920s (although not all states used exactly the same wording). Over the following decades, other acts were drawn up in a similar manner. In all, more than two hundred uniform acts have been issued by the NCCUSL since its inception. The most ambitious uniform act of all, however, was the Uniform Commercial Code.

THE UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), which was created through the joint efforts of the NCCUSL and the American Law Institute,¹ was first issued in 1952. All fifty states,² the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands have adopted the UCC. It facilitates commerce among the states by providing a uniform, yet flexible, set of rules governing commercial transactions. The UCC assures businesspersons that their contracts, if validly entered into, normally will be enforced.

As you will read in later chapters, from time to time the NCCUSL revises the articles contained in the UCC and submits the revised versions to the states for adoption. During the 1990s, for example, four articles (Articles 3, 4, 5, and 9) were revised, and two new articles (Articles 2A and 4A) were added. Amendments to Article 1 were approved in 2001 and have now been adopted by a majority of the states. Because of its importance in the area of commercial law, we cite the UCC frequently in this text. We also present the UCC in Appendix C.

Administrative Law

Another important source of American law is administrative law, which consists of the rules, orders, and decisions of administrative agencies. An administrative agency is a federal, state, or local government agency established to perform a specific function. Administrative law and procedures, which will be examined in detail in Chapter 44, constitute a dominant element in the regulatory environment of business.

Rules issued by various administrative agencies now affect almost every aspect of a business's operations, including its capital structure and financing, its hiring and firing procedures, its relations with employees and unions, and the way it manufactures and markets its products. Regulations enacted to protect the environment often play a significant role in business operations. See this chapter's Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature on the following page for a discussion of the concept of sustainability and how some environmental regulations encourage it.

FEDERAL AGENCIES At the national level, the cabinet departments of the executive branch include numerous executive agencies. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration, for example, is an agency within the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. Executive agencies are subject to the authority of the president, who has the power to appoint and remove their officers. There are also major independent regulatory agencies at the federal level, such as the Federal Trade Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Federal Communications Commission. The president's power is less pronounced in regard to independent agencies, whose officers serve for fixed terms and cannot be removed without just cause.

STATE AND LOCAL AGENCIES There are administrative agencies at the state and local levels as well. Commonly, a state agency (such as a state pollution-control agency) is created as a parallel to a federal agency (such as the Environmental Protection Agency). Just as federal statutes take precedence over conflicting state statutes, so federal agency regulations take precedence over conflicting state regulations.

Case Law and Common Law Doctrines

The rules of law announced in court decisions constitute another basic source of American law. These rules include interpretations of constitutional provisions, of statutes enacted by legislatures, and of regulations created by administrative agencies. Today, this body of judge-made law is referred to as case law. Case law—the doctrines and principles announced in cases—governs all areas not covered by statutory law or administrative law and is part of our common law tradition. We look at the origins and characteristics of the common law tradition in some detail in the pages that follow.

See Concept Summary 1.1 on page 7 for a review of the sources of American law.

SHIFTING LEGAL PRIORITIES FOR BUSINESS

Sustainability and the Law

By now, almost everyone is aware that at the federal, state, and local levels there are numerous statutes that deal with the environment (environmental law will be discussed in Chapter 46). In the last few years, federal, state, and local statutes and administrative regulations have started to embrace the concept of sustainability.

What Does Sustainability Mean?

Although there is no one official definition, sustainability generally has been defined as economic development that meets the needs of the present while not compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs. By any definition, sustainability is a process rather than a tangible outcome. For business managers, it means that they should engage in long-range planning rather than focusing only on short-run profitability.

Federal Law and Sustainability

Certain provisions of federal environmental laws directly address the topic of sustainability. For example, the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act^a requires waste minimization as the preferred means of hazardous waste management. Facilities that generate or manage hazardous waste must certify that they have a waste minimization program that reduces the toxicity and quantity of the hazardous waste.

The Pollution Prevention Act (PPA)^b requires that facilities minimize or eliminate the release of pollutants into the environment whenever feasible. The PPA established a national policy to recycle any pollutants that cannot be prevented.

Finally, the federal Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has undertaken a major effort to encourage sustainability. The agency's Web site (www.epa.gov) devotes numerous pages to sustainability, sustainable development, and sustainable agriculture. The EPA also has a "sector strategies program" that seeks industry-wide environmental gains through innovative actions.

Other nations have enacted legislation that requires sustainability to be taken into account when protecting the environment. An example is the Environmental Protection and Bio-Diversity Conservation Act in Australia.^c

State Law and Sustainability

At least one state has legislatively committed itself to the concept of sustainable policies. More than a decade ago, the Oregon Sustainability Act was passed. This act officially defines sustainability as:

- 42 U.S.C. Sections 6901 et seq. (1976).
- 42 U.S.C. Sections 13101 et seq. (1990).
- This act became effective in 1999 and has been amended many times since.

Using, developing, and protecting resources in a manner that enables people to meet current needs and provides that future generations can also meet future needs, from the joint perspective of environmental, economic, and community objectives.

Oregon's seven-member sustainability board recommends and proposes sustainability legislation and also develops policies and programs related to sustainability.

Where Does the United States Rank in the World Sustainability Index?

Environmental experts from Yale and Columbia universities have created an Environmental Sustainability Index (ESI) that ranks countries according to how well they manage their environments, protect the global commons, and have the capacity to improve their environmental performance. Finland and Norway are at the top of the ESI. The United States ranks forty-fifth. This low ranking is due mainly to excessive waste generation and greenhouse gas emissions in this country.

Some Corporations Take the Lead by Creating the Position of a Chief Sustainability Officer

The giant chemical company DuPont has an official chief sustainability officer (CSO)—a position that did not exist a few years ago. This corporate officer is responsible not only for ensuring that the company complies with all federal, state, local, and international environmental regulations, but also for discovering so-called megatrends that can affect different markets.

DuPont, though best known as a chemical company, also sells agricultural seeds and crop-protection products. One megatrend that its CSO has identified is a growing world population that is going to require more production of corn, soybeans, and other crops from limited acreage. That is where sustainability comes in—producing more with less.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS

Managers cannot wait until the government tells them what sustainable business practices they must follow. A company that adopts sustainable business practices today not only will promote desirable economic, social, and environmental results, but at the same time will enhance productivity, reduce costs, and thereby increase profitability. A company that has a clear understanding of sustainability will be more competitive as increasing consumer demand for "green" products and global concerns about the environment put pressure on all producers.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 1.1

Sources of American Law

Source	Description
Constitutional Law	The law as expressed in the U.S. Constitution and the state constitutions. The U.S. Constitution is the supreme law of the land. State constitutions are supreme within state borders to the extent that they do not violate a clause of the U.S. Constitution or a federal law.
Statutory Law	Laws (statutes and ordinances) enacted by federal, state, and local legislatures and governing bodies. None of these laws may violate the U.S. Constitution or the relevant state constitution. Uniform laws, when adopted by a state, become statutory law in that state.
Administrative Law	The rules, orders, and decisions of federal, state, or local government administrative agencies.
Case Law and Common Law Doctrines	Judge-made law, including interpretations of constitutional provisions, of statutes enacted by legislatures, and of regulations created by administrative agencies.

THE COMMON LAW TRADITION

Because of our colonial heritage, much of American law is based on the English legal system, which originated in medieval England and continued to evolve in the following centuries. Knowledge of this system is necessary to understanding the American legal system today.

Early English Courts

The origins of the English legal system—and thus the U.S. legal system as well—date back to 1066, when the Normans conquered England. William the Conqueror and his successors began the process of unifying the country under their rule. One of the means they used to do this was the establishment of the king’s courts, or curiae regis. Before the Norman Conquest, disputes had been settled according to the local legal customs and traditions in various regions of the country. The king’s courts sought to establish a uniform set of customs for the country as a whole. What evolved in these courts was the beginning of the common law—a body of general rules that applied throughout the entire English realm. Eventually, the common law tradition became part of the heritage of all nations that were once British colonies, including the United States.

COURTS OF LAW AND REMEDIES AT LAW The early English king’s courts could grant only very limited kinds of remedies (the legal means to enforce a right or redress a wrong). If one person wronged another in some way, the king’s courts could award as compensation one or more of the following: (1) land, (2) items of value, or (3) money. The courts that awarded this compensation became known as courts of law, and the three remedies were called remedies at law. (Today, the remedy at law normally takes the form of monetary damages—an amount given to a party whose legal interests have been injured.) Even though the system introduced uniformity in the settling of disputes, when a complaining party wanted a remedy other than economic compensation, the courts of law could do nothing, so “no remedy, no right.”

COURTS OF EQUITY AND REMEDIES IN EQUITY

Equity is a branch of law—founded on what might be described as notions of justice and fair dealing—that seeks to supply a remedy when no adequate remedy at law is available. When individuals could not obtain an adequate remedy in a court of law, they petitioned the king for relief. Most of these petitions were decided by an adviser to the king, called a chancellor, who had the power to grant new and unique remedies. Eventually, formal chancery courts, or courts of equity, were established.

The remedies granted by the equity courts became known as remedies in equity, or equitable remedies. These remedies include specific performance (ordering a party to perform an agreement as promised), an injunction (ordering a party to cease engaging in a specific activity or to undo some wrong or injury), and rescission (the cancellation of a contractual obligation). We will discuss these and other equitable remedies in more detail at appropriate points in the chapters that follow, particularly in Chapter 18.

As a general rule, today's courts, like the early English courts, will not grant equitable remedies unless the remedy at law—monetary damages—is inadequate. Suppose that Ted forms a contract (a legally binding agreement—see Chapter 10) to purchase a parcel of land that he thinks will be just perfect for his future home. Further suppose that the seller breaches this agreement. Ted could sue the seller for the return of any deposits or down payment he might have made on the land, but this is not the remedy he really seeks. What Ted wants is to have the court order the seller to perform the contract. In other words, Ted wants the court to grant the equitable remedy of specific performance because monetary damages are inadequate in this situation.

EQUITABLE MAXIMS In fashioning appropriate remedies, judges often were (and continue to be) guided by so-called equitable maxims—propositions or general statements of equitable rules. Exhibit 1–2 lists some important equitable maxims. The last maxim listed in that exhibit—“Equity aids the vigilant, not those who rest on their rights”—merits special attention. It has become known as the equitable doctrine of laches (a term derived from the Latin laxus, meaning “lax” or “negligent”), and it can be used as a defense. A defense is an argument raised by the defendant (the party being sued) indicating why the plaintiff (the suing party) should not obtain the remedy sought. (Note that in equity proceedings, the party bringing a lawsuit is called the petitioner, and the party being sued is referred to as the respondent.)

The doctrine of laches arose to encourage people to bring lawsuits while the evidence was fresh.

What constitutes a reasonable time, of course, varies according to the circumstances of the case. Time periods for different types of cases are now usually fixed by statutes of limitations. After the time allowed under a statute of limitations has expired, no action (lawsuit) can be brought, no matter how strong the case was originally.

Legal and Equitable Remedies Today

The establishment of courts of equity in medieval England resulted in two distinct court systems: courts of law and courts of equity. The courts had different sets of judges and granted different types of remedies. During the nineteenth century, however, most states in the United States adopted rules of procedure that resulted in the combining of courts of law and equity. A party now may request both legal and equitable remedies in the same action, and the trial court judge may grant either or both forms of relief.

The distinction between legal and equitable remedies remains relevant to students of business law, however, because these remedies differ. To seek the proper remedy for a wrong, one must know what remedies are available. Additionally, certain vestiges of the procedures used when there were separate courts of law and equity still exist. For example, a party has the right to demand a jury trial in an action at law, but not in an action in equity. Exhibit 1–3 summarizes the procedural differences (applicable in most states) between an action at law and an action in equity.

The Doctrine of Stare Decisis

One of the unique features of the common law is that it is judge-made law. The body of principles and doctrines that form the common law emerged over time as judges decided legal controversies.

EXHIBIT 1–2 • Equitable Maxims

1. Whoever seeks equity must do equity. (Anyone who wishes to be treated fairly must treat others fairly.)
2. Where there is equal equity, the law must prevail. (The law will determine the outcome of a controversy in which the merits of both sides are equal.)
3. One seeking the aid of an equity court must come to the court with clean hands. (The plaintiff must have acted fairly and honestly.)
4. Equity will not suffer a wrong to be without a remedy. (Equitable relief will be awarded when there is a right to relief and there is no adequate remedy at law.)
5. Equity regards substance rather than form. (Equity is more concerned with fairness and justice than with legal technicalities.)
6. Equity aids the vigilant, not those who rest on their rights. (Equity will not help those who neglect their rights for an unreasonable period of time.)

EXHIBIT 1-3 • Procedural Differences between an Action at Law and an Action in Equity

PROCEDURE	ACTION AT LAW	ACTION IN EQUITY
Initiation of lawsuit	By filing a complaint	By filing a petition
Parties	Plaintiff and defendant	Petitioner and respondent
Decision	By jury or judge	By judge (no jury)
Result	Judgment	Decree
Remedy	Monetary damages	Injunction, specific performance, or rescission

CASE PRECEDENTS AND CASE REPORTERS When possible, judges attempted to be consistent and to base their decisions on the principles suggested by earlier cases. They sought to decide similar cases in a similar way and considered new cases with care because they knew that their decisions would make new law. Each interpretation became part of the law on the subject and served as a legal precedent—that is, a decision that furnished an example or authority for deciding subsequent cases involving identical or similar legal principles or facts.

In the early years of the common law, there was no single place or publication where court opinions, or written decisions, could be found. By the early fourteenth century, portions of the most important decisions from each year were being gathered together and recorded in Year Books, which became useful references for lawyers and judges. In the sixteenth century, the Year Books were discontinued, and other forms of case publication became available. Today, cases are published, or “reported,” in volumes called reporters, or reports. We describe today’s case reporting system in detail later in this chapter.

STARE DECISIS AND THE COMMON LAW TRADITION

The practice of deciding new cases with reference to former decisions, or precedents, became a cornerstone of the English and American judicial systems. The practice formed a doctrine known as stare decisis³ (a Latin phrase meaning “to stand on decided cases”).

Under this doctrine, judges are obligated to follow the precedents established within their jurisdictions. The term jurisdiction refers to a geographic area in which a court or courts have the power to apply the law—see Chapter 2. Once a court has set forth a principle of law as being applicable to a certain set of facts, that court and courts of lower rank (within the same jurisdiction) must adhere to that principle and apply it in future cases involving similar fact patterns. Thus, stare decisis has two aspects: first, that decisions made by a higher court are binding on lower courts; and second, that a court should not overturn its own precedents unless there is a compelling reason to do so.

Controlling precedents in a jurisdiction are referred to as binding authorities. A binding authority is any source of law that a court must follow when deciding a case. Binding authorities include constitutions, statutes, and regulations that govern the issue being decided, as well as court decisions that are controlling precedents within the jurisdiction. United States Supreme Court case decisions, no matter how old, remain controlling until they are overruled by a subsequent decision of the Supreme Court, by a constitutional amendment, or by congressional legislation (that has not been held unconstitutional).

STARE DECISIS AND LEGAL STABILITY The doctrine of stare decisis helps the courts to be more efficient because if other courts have carefully analyzed a similar case, their legal reasoning and opinions can serve as guides. Stare decisis also makes the law more stable and predictable. If the law on a given subject is well settled, someone bringing a case to court can usually rely on the court to make a decision based on what the law has been in the past.

DEPARTURES FROM PRECEDENT Although courts are obligated to follow precedents, sometimes a court will depart from the rule of precedent if it decides that the precedent should no longer be followed. If a court decides that a ruling precedent is simply incorrect or that technological or social changes have rendered the precedent inapplicable, the court might rule contrary to the precedent. Cases that overturn precedent often receive a great deal of publicity.

3. Pronounced ster-ay dih-si-ses.

CASE IN POINT The United States Supreme Court expressly overturned precedent when it concluded that separate educational facilities for whites and blacks, which it had previously upheld as constitutional,⁴ were inherently unequal.⁵ The Court's departure from precedent in this case received a tremendous amount of publicity as people began to realize the ramifications of this change in the law.

Note that judges do have some flexibility in applying precedents. For example, a lower court may avoid applying a precedent set by a higher court in its jurisdiction by distinguishing the two cases based on their facts. When this happens, the lower court's ruling stands unless it is appealed to a higher court and that court overturns the decision.

WHEN THERE IS NO PRECEDENT Occasionally, the courts must decide cases for which no precedents exist, called cases of first impression. For example, as you will read throughout this text, the extensive use of the Internet has presented many new and challenging issues for the courts to decide. In deciding cases of first impression, courts often look at persuasive authorities (precedents from other jurisdictions) for guidance. A court may also consider a number of factors, including legal principles and policies underlying previous court decisions or existing statutes, fairness, social values and customs, public policy (governmental policy based on widely held societal values), and data and concepts drawn from the social sciences. Which of these sources is chosen or receives the greatest emphasis depends on the nature of the case being considered and the particular judge or judges hearing the case.

Stare Decisis and Legal Reasoning

Legal reasoning is the reasoning process used by judges in deciding what law applies to a given dispute and then applying that law to the specific facts or circumstances of the case. Through the use of legal reasoning, judges harmonize their decisions with those that have been made before, as the doctrine of stare decisis requires.

Students of business law and the legal environment also engage in legal reasoning. For example, you may be asked to provide answers for some of the case problems that appear at the end of every chapter in this text. Each problem describes the facts of a particular dispute and the legal question at issue. If you are assigned a case problem, you will be asked to determine how a court would answer that question, and why. In other words, you will need to give legal reasons for whatever conclusion you reach.⁶ We look here at the basic steps involved in legal reasoning and then describe some forms of reasoning commonly used by the courts in making their decisions.

BASIC STEPS IN LEGAL REASONING At times, the legal arguments set forth in court opinions are relatively simple and brief. At other times, the arguments are complex and lengthy. Regardless of the length of a legal argument, however, the basic steps of the legal reasoning process remain the same. These steps, which you can also follow when analyzing cases and case problems, form what is commonly referred to as the IRAC method of legal reasoning. IRAC is an acronym formed from the first letters of the following words: Issue, Rule, Application, and Conclusion. To apply the IRAC method, you would ask the following questions:

1. What are the key facts and issues? Suppose that a plaintiff comes before the court claiming assault (the act of wrongfully and intentionally making another person fearful of immediate physical harm—part of a class of actions called torts). The plaintiff claims that the defendant threatened her while she was sleeping. Although the plaintiff was unaware that she was being threatened, her roommate heard the defendant make the threat. The legal issue, or question, raised by these facts is whether the defendant's action constitutes the tort of assault, given that the plaintiff was not aware of that action at the time it occurred.
2. What rules of law apply to the case? A rule of law may be a rule stated by the courts in previous decisions, a state or federal statute, or a state or federal administrative agency regulation. In our hypothetical case, the plaintiff alleges (claims) that the defendant committed a tort. Therefore, the applicable law is the common law of torts—specifically, tort law governing assault (see Chapter 6 for more detail on intentional torts). Case precedents involving similar facts and issues thus would be relevant. Often, more than one rule of law will be applicable to a case.

4. See Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, 16 S.Ct. 1138, 41 L.Ed. 256 (1896). A later section in this chapter explains how to read legal citations.

5. Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 347 U.S. 483, 74 S.Ct. 686, 98 L.Ed. 873 (1954).

6. See Appendix A for further instructions on how to analyze case problems.

3. How do the rules of law apply to the particular facts and circumstances of this case? This step is often the most difficult because each case presents a unique set of facts, circumstances, and parties. Although cases may be similar, no two cases are ever identical in all respects. Normally, judges (and lawyers and law students) try to find cases on point—previously decided cases that are as similar as possible to the one under consideration. (Because of the difficulty—and importance—of this step in the legal reasoning process, we discuss it in more detail in the next subsection.)
4. What conclusion should be drawn? This step normally presents few problems. Usually, the conclusion is evident if the previous three steps have been followed carefully.

FORMS OF LEGAL REASONING Judges use many types of reasoning when following the third step of the legal reasoning process—applying the law to the facts of a particular case. Three common forms of reasoning are deductive reasoning, linear reasoning, and reasoning by analogy.

Deductive Reasoning. Deductive reasoning is sometimes called syllogistic reasoning because it employs a syllogism—a logical relationship involving a major premise, a minor premise, and a conclusion. For example, consider the hypothetical case presented earlier. In deciding whether the defendant committed assault by threatening the plaintiff while she was sleeping, the judge might point out that “under the common law of torts, an individual must be aware of a threat of danger for the threat to constitute assault” (major premise); “the plaintiff in this case was unaware of the threat at the time it occurred” (minor premise); and “therefore, the circumstances do not amount to an assault” (conclusion).

Linear Reasoning. A second form of legal reasoning that is commonly employed might be thought of as “linear” reasoning because it proceeds from one point to another, with the final point being the conclusion. To understand this form of reasoning, imagine a knotted rope, with each knot tying together separate pieces of rope to form a tightly knotted length. As a whole, the rope represents a linear progression of thought logically connecting various points, with the last point, or knot, representing the conclusion. For example, a tenant in an apartment building sues the landlord for damages for an injury resulting from an allegedly inadequately lit stairway.

The court may engage in a reasoning process involving the following “pieces of rope”:

1. The landlord, who was on the premises the evening the injury occurred, testifies that none of the other nine tenants who used the stairway that night complained about the lights.
2. The fact that none of the tenants complained is the same as if they had said the lighting was sufficient.
3. That there were no complaints does not prove that the lighting was sufficient but does prove that the landlord had no reason to believe that it was not.
4. The landlord’s belief was reasonable because no one complained.
5. Therefore, the landlord acted reasonably and was not negligent with respect to the lighting in the stairway.

From this reasoning, the court concludes that the tenant is not entitled to compensation on the basis of the stairway’s allegedly insufficient lighting.

Reasoning by Analogy. Another important type of reasoning that judges use in deciding cases is reasoning by analogy. To reason by analogy is to compare the facts in the case at hand to the facts in previous cases and, to the extent that the patterns are similar, to apply the same rule of law to the present case. To the extent that the facts are unique, or “distinguishable,” different rules may apply. For example, in Case A, the court held that a driver who crossed a highway’s center line was negligent. Case B involves a driver who crossed the line to avoid hitting a child. In determining whether Case A’s rule applies in Case B, a judge would consider what the reasons were for the decision in A and whether B is sufficiently similar for those reasons to apply. If the judge holds that B’s driver is not liable, that judge must indicate why Case A’s rule is not relevant to the facts presented in Case B.

There Is No One “Right” Answer

Many people believe that there is one “right” answer to every legal question. In most legal controversies, however, there is no single correct result. Good arguments can often be made to support either side of a legal controversy. Quite often, a case does not involve a “good” person suing a “bad” person. In many cases, both parties have acted in good faith in some measure or in bad faith to some degree.

Additionally, each judge has her or his own personal beliefs and philosophy (see the discussion of schools of jurisprudential thought later in this chapter), which shape the process of legal reasoning, at least to some extent. This means that the outcome of a particular lawsuit before a court cannot be predicted with absolute certainty. In fact, in some cases, even though the weight of the law would seem to favor one party's position, judges, through creative legal reasoning, have found ways to rule in favor of the other party in the interests of preventing injustice.

Legal reasoning and other aspects of the common law tradition are reviewed in Concept Summary 1.2.

The Common Law Today

Today, the common law derived from judicial decisions continues to be applied throughout the United States. Common law doctrines and principles, however, govern only areas not covered by statutory or administrative law. In a dispute concerning a particular employment practice, for example, if a statute regulates that practice, the statute will apply rather than the common law doctrine that applied prior to the enactment of the statute.

COURTS INTERPRET STATUTES Even in areas governed by statutory law, though, judge-made law continues to be important because there is a significant interplay between statutory law and the common law. For example, many statutes essentially codify existing common law rules, and regulations issued by various administrative agencies usually are based, at least in part, on common law principles. Additionally, the courts, in interpreting statutory law, often rely on the common law as a guide to what the legislators intended.

Furthermore, how the courts interpret a particular statute determines how that statute will be applied. If you wanted to learn about the coverage and applicability of a particular statute, for example, you would necessarily have to locate the statute and study it. You would also need to see how the courts in your jurisdiction have interpreted and applied the statute. In other words, you would have to learn what precedents have been established in your jurisdiction with respect to that statute. Often, the applicability of a newly enacted statute does not become clear until a body of case law develops to clarify how, when, and to whom the statute applies.

RESTATEMENTS OF THE LAW CLARIFY AND ILLUSTRATE THE COMMON LAW

The American Law Institute (ALI) has drafted and published compilations of the common law called Restatements of the Law, which generally summarize the common law rules followed by most states. There are Restatements of the Law in the areas of contracts, torts, agency,

CONCEPT SUMMARY 1.2 The Common Law Tradition

Aspect	Description
Origins of the Common Law	The American legal system is based on the common law tradition, which originated in medieval England. Following the conquest of England in 1066 by William the Conqueror, king's courts were established throughout England, and the common law was developed in these courts.
Legal and Equitable Remedies	The distinction between remedies at law (money or items of value, such as land) and remedies in equity (including specific performance, injunction, and rescission of a contractual obligation) originated in the early English courts of law and courts of equity, respectively.
Case Precedents and the Doctrine of Stare Decisis	In the king's courts, judges attempted to make their decisions consistent with previous decisions, called precedents. This practice gave rise to the doctrine of stare decisis . This doctrine, which became a cornerstone of the common law tradition, obligates judges to abide by precedents established in their jurisdictions.
Stare Decisis and Legal Reasoning	Legal reasoning is the reasoning process used by judges in applying the law to the facts and issues of specific cases. Legal reasoning involves becoming familiar with the key facts of a case, identifying the relevant legal rules, applying those rules to the facts, and drawing a conclusion. In applying the legal rules to the facts of a case, judges may use deductive reasoning, linear reasoning, or reasoning by analogy.

trusts, property, restitution, security, judgments, and conflict of laws. The Restatements, like other secondary sources of law, do not in themselves have the force of law, but they are an important source of legal analysis and opinion on which judges often rely in making their decisions.

Many of the Restatements are now in their second, third, or fourth editions. We refer to the Restatements frequently in subsequent chapters of this text, indicating in parentheses the edition to which we are referring. For example, we refer to the third edition of the Restatement of the Law of Contracts as simply the Restatement (Third) of Contracts.

SCHOOLS OF JURISPRUDENTIAL THOUGHT

How judges apply the law to specific cases, including disputes relating to the business world, depends in part on their philosophical approaches to law. Part of the study of law, often referred to as jurisprudence, involves learning about different schools of jurisprudential thought and discovering how the approaches to law characteristic of each school can affect judicial decision making.

Clearly, a judge's function is not to make the laws—that is the function of the legislative branch of government—but to interpret and apply them. From a practical point of view, however, the courts play a significant role in defining the laws enacted by legislative bodies, which tend to be expressed in general terms. Judges thus have some flexibility in interpreting and applying the law. It is because of this flexibility that different courts can, and often do, arrive at different conclusions in cases that involve nearly identical issues, facts, and applicable laws.

The Natural Law School

An age-old question about the nature of law has to do with the finality of a nation's laws, such as the laws of the United States at the present time. For example, what if a particular law is deemed to be a “bad” law by a substantial number of that nation's citizens? Those who adhere to the natural law theory believe that a higher or universal law exists that applies to all human beings and that written laws should imitate these inherent principles. If a written law is unjust, then it is not a true (natural) law and need not be obeyed.

The natural law tradition is one of the oldest and most significant schools of jurisprudence. It dates back to the days of the Greek philosopher Aristotle (384–322 B.C.E.), who distinguished between natural law and the laws governing a particular nation. According to Aristotle, natural law applies universally to all humankind.

The notion that people have “natural rights” stems from the natural law tradition. Those who claim that a specific foreign government is depriving certain citizens of their human rights are implicitly appealing to a higher law that has universal applicability. The question of the universality of basic human rights also comes into play in the context of international business operations. For example, U.S. companies that have operations abroad often hire foreign workers as employees. Should the same laws that protect U.S. employees apply to these foreign employees? This question is rooted implicitly in a concept of universal rights that has its origins in the natural law tradition.

The Positivist School

In contrast, positive, or national, law (the written law of a given society at a particular point in time) applies only to the citizens of that nation or society. Those who adhere to legal positivism believe that there can be no higher law than a nation's positive law. According to the positivist school, there is no such thing as “natural rights.” Rather, human rights exist solely because of laws. If the laws are not enforced, anarchy will result. Thus, whether a law is “bad” or “good” is irrelevant. The law is the law and must be obeyed until it is changed—in an orderly manner through a legitimate lawmaking process. A judge with positivist leanings probably would be more inclined to defer to an existing law than would a judge who adheres to the natural law tradition.

The Historical School

The historical school of legal thought emphasizes the evolutionary process of law by concentrating on the origin and history of the legal system. This school looks to the past to discover what the principles of contemporary law should be. The legal doctrines that have withstood the passage of time—those that have worked in the past—are deemed best suited for shaping present laws. Hence, law derives its legitimacy and authority from adhering to the standards that historical development has shown to be workable. Adherents of the historical school are more likely than those of other schools to strictly follow decisions made in past cases.

Legal Realism

In the 1920s and 1930s, a number of jurists and scholars, known as legal realists, rebelled against the historical approach to law. Legal realism is based on the idea that law is just one of many institutions in society and that it is shaped by social forces and needs. The law is a human enterprise, and judges should take social and economic realities into account when deciding cases. Legal realists also believe that the law can never be applied with total uniformity. Given that judges are human beings with unique personalities, value systems, and intellects, different judges will obviously bring different reasoning processes to the same case.

Legal realism strongly influenced the growth of what is sometimes called the sociological school of jurisprudence. This school views law as a tool for promoting justice in society. In the 1960s, for example, the justices of the United States Supreme Court played a leading role in the civil rights movement by upholding long-neglected laws calling for equal treatment for all Americans, including African Americans and other minorities. Generally, jurists who adhere to this philosophy of law are more likely to depart from past decisions than are those jurists who adhere to the other schools of legal thought.

Concept Summary 1.3 reviews the schools of jurisprudential thought.

CLASSIFICATIONS OF LAW

The law may be broken down according to several classification systems. For example, one classification system divides law into substantive law and procedural law. Substantive law consists of all laws that define, describe, regulate, and create legal rights and obligations. Procedural law consists of all laws that delineate the methods of enforcing the rights established by substantive law. Other classification systems divide law into federal law and state law, private law (dealing with relationships between private entities) and public law (addressing the relationship between persons and their governments), and national law and international law. Here we look at still another classification system, which divides law into civil law and criminal law, as well as at what is meant by the term cyberlaw.

Civil Law and Criminal Law

Civil law spells out the rights and duties that exist between persons and between persons and their governments, as well as the relief available when a person's rights are violated. Typically, in a civil case, a private party sues another private party (although

Schools of Jurisprudential Thought

School of Thought	Description
Natural Law School	One of the oldest and most significant schools of legal thought. Those who believe in natural law hold that there is a universal law applicable to all human beings. This law is discoverable through reason and is of a higher order than positive (national) law.
Positivist School	A school of legal thought centered on the assumption that there is no law higher than the laws created by the government. Laws must be obeyed, even if they are unjust, to prevent anarchy.
Historical School	A school of legal thought that stresses the evolutionary nature of law and looks to doctrines that have withstood the passage of time for guidance in shaping present laws.
Legal Realism	A school of legal thought that advocates a less abstract and more realistic and pragmatic approach to the law and takes into account customary practices and the circumstances surrounding the particular transaction. Legal realism strongly influenced the growth of the sociological school of jurisprudence, which views law as a tool for promoting social justice.

the government can also sue a party for a civil law violation) to make that other party comply with a duty or pay for the damage caused by failure to comply with a duty. Much of the law that we discuss in this text is civil law. Contract law, for example, covered in Chapters 10 through 18, is civil law. The whole body of tort law (see Chapters 6 and 7) is also civil law.

Criminal law, in contrast, is concerned with wrongs committed against the public as a whole. Criminal acts are defined and prohibited by local, state, or federal government statutes. Criminal defendants are thus prosecuted by public officials, such as a district attorney (D.A.), on behalf of the state, not by their victims or other private parties. (See Chapter 9 for a further discussion of the distinction between civil law and criminal law.)

Cyberlaw

As mentioned, the use of the Internet to conduct business transactions has led to new types of legal issues. In response, courts have had to adapt traditional laws to situations that are unique to our age. Additionally, legislatures at both the federal and the state levels have created laws to deal specifically with such issues. Frequently, people use the term cyberlaw to refer to the emerging body of law that governs transactions conducted via the Internet. Cyberlaw is not really a classification of law, nor is it a new type of law. Rather, it is an informal term used to describe both new laws and modifications of traditional laws that relate to the online environment. Throughout this book, you will read how the law in a given area is evolving to govern specific legal issues that arise in the online context.

HOW TO FIND PRIMARY SOURCES OF LAW

This text includes numerous references, or citations, to primary sources of law—federal and state statutes, the U.S. Constitution and state constitutions, regulations issued by administrative agencies, and court cases. A citation identifies the publication in which a legal authority—such as a statute or a court decision or other source—can be found. In this section, we explain how you can use citations to find primary sources of law. Note that in addition to being published in sets of books, as described next, most federal and state laws and case decisions are available online.

Finding Statutory and Administrative Law

When Congress passes laws, they are collected in a publication titled United States Statutes at Large. When state legislatures pass laws, they are collected in similar state publications. Most frequently, however, laws are referred to in their codified form—that is, the form in which they appear in the federal and state codes. In these codes, laws are compiled by subject.

UNITED STATES CODE The United States Code (U.S.C.) arranges all existing federal laws by broad subject. Each of the fifty subjects is given a title and a title number. For example, laws relating to commerce and trade are collected in Title 15, “Commerce and Trade.” Titles are subdivided by sections. A citation to the U.S.C. includes both title and section numbers. Thus, a reference to “15 U.S.C. Section 1” means that the statute can be found in Section 1 of Title 15. (“Section” may be designated by the symbol §, and “Sections,” by §§.) In addition to the print publication of the U.S.C., the federal government provides a searchable online database of the United States Code at www.gpoaccess.gov/uscode.

Commercial publications of federal laws and regulations are also available. For example, West Group publishes the United States Code Annotated (U.S.C.A.). The U.S.C.A. contains the official text of the U.S.C., plus notes (annotations) on court decisions that interpret and apply specific sections of the statutes. The U.S.C.A. also includes additional research aids, such as cross-references to related statutes, historical notes, and library references. A citation to the U.S.C.A. is similar to a citation to the U.S.C.: “15 U.S.C.A. Section 1.”

STATE CODES State codes follow the U.S.C. pattern of arranging law by subject. They may be called codes, revisions, compilations, consolidations, general statutes, or statutes, depending on the preferences of the states. In some codes, subjects are designated by number. In others, they are designated by name. For example, “13 Pennsylvania Consolidated Statutes Section 1101” means that the statute can be found in Title 13, Section 1101, of the Pennsylvania code. “California Commercial Code Section 1101” means that the statute can be found under the subject heading “Commercial Code” of the California code in Section 1101. Abbreviations are often used. For example, “13 Pennsylvania Consolidated Statutes Section 1101” is abbreviated “13 Pa. C.S. § 1101,” and “California Commercial Code Section 1101” is abbreviated “Cal. Com. Code § 1101.”

ADMINISTRATIVE RULES Rules and regulations adopted by federal administrative agencies are initially published in the Federal Register, a daily publication of the U.S. government. Later, they are incorporated into the Code of Federal Regulations (C.F.R.). Like the U.S.C., the C.F.R. is divided into fifty titles. Rules within each title are assigned section numbers. A full citation to the C.F.R. includes title and section numbers. For example, a reference to “17 C.F.R. Section 230.504” means that the rule can be found in Section 230.504 of Title 17.

Finding Case Law

Before discussing the case reporting system, we need to look briefly at the court system (which will be discussed in detail in Chapter 2). There are two types of courts in the United States, federal courts and state courts. Both the federal and the state court systems consist of several levels, or tiers, of courts. Trial courts, in which evidence is presented and testimony given, are on the bottom tier (which also includes lower courts that handle specialized issues). Decisions from a trial court can be appealed to a higher court, which commonly is an intermediate court of appeals, or an appellate court. Decisions from these intermediate courts of appeals may be appealed to an even higher court, such as a state supreme court or the United States Supreme Court.

STATE COURT DECISIONS Most state trial court decisions are not published in books (except in New York and a few other states, which publish selected trial court opinions). Decisions from state trial courts are typically filed in the office of the clerk of the court, where the decisions are available for public inspection. Written decisions of the appellate, or reviewing, courts, however, are published and distributed (both in print and via the Internet). As you will note, most of the state court cases presented in this book are from state appellate courts. The reported appellate decisions are published in volumes called reports or reporters, which are numbered consecutively. State appellate court decisions are found in the state reporters of that particular state. Official reports are published by the state, whereas unofficial reports are privately published.

Regional Reporters. State court opinions appear in regional units of the National Reporter System, published by West Group. Most lawyers and libraries have the West reporters because they report cases more quickly and are distributed more widely than the state-published reporters. In fact, many states have eliminated their own reporters in favor of West’s National Reporter System. The National Reporter System divides the states into the following geographic areas: Atlantic (A. or A.2d), North Eastern (N.E. or N.E.2d), North Western (N.W. or N.W.2d), Pacific (P., P.2d, or P.3d), South Eastern (S.E. or S.E.2d), South Western (S.W., S.W.2d, or S.W.3d), and Southern (So., So.2d, or So.3d). (The 2d and 3d in the preceding abbreviations refer to Second Series and Third Series, respectively.) The states included in each of these regional divisions are indicated in Exhibit 1–4, which illustrates West’s National Reporter System.

Case Citations. After appellate decisions have been published, they are normally referred to (cited) by the name of the case; the volume, name, and page number of the state’s official reporter (if different from West’s National Reporter System); the volume, name, and page number of the National Reporter; and the volume, name, and page number of any other selected reporter. (Citing a reporter by volume number, name, and page number, in that order, is common to all citations; often, as in this book, the year the decision was issued will be included in parentheses, just after the citations to reporters.) When more than one reporter is cited for the same case, each reference is called a parallel citation.

Note that some states have adopted a “public domain citation system” that uses a somewhat different format for the citation. For example, in Wisconsin, a Wisconsin Supreme Court decision might be designated “2010 WI 40,” meaning that the case was decided in the year 2010 by the Wisconsin Supreme Court and was the fortieth decision issued by that court during that year. Parallel citations to the Wisconsin Reports and West’s North Western Reporter are still included after the public domain citation.

Consider the following case citation: State v. Favoccia, 119 Conn.App. 1, 986 A.2d 1081 (2010). We see that the opinion in this case can be found in Volume 119 of the official Connecticut Appellate Reports, on page 1. The parallel citation is to Volume 986 of the Atlantic Reporter, Second Series, page 1,081. In presenting appellate opinions in this text (starting in Chapter 2), in addition to the reporter, we give the name of the court hearing the case and the year of the court’s decision. Sample citations to state court decisions are explained in Exhibit 1–5 on pages 18–20.

a. The case names have been deleted from these citations to emphasize the publications. It should be kept in mind, however, that the name of a case is as important as the specific page numbers in the volumes in which it is found. If a citation is incorrect, the correct citation may be found in a publication's index of case names. In addition to providing a check on errors in citations, the date of a case is important because the value of a recent case as an authority is likely to be greater than that of older cases from the same court.

The official edition of the United States Supreme Court decisions is the United States Reports (U.S.), which is published by the federal government. Unofficial editions of Supreme Court cases include West's Supreme Court Reporter (S.Ct.) and the Lawyers' Edition of the Supreme Court Reports (L.Ed. or L.Ed.2d). Sample citations for federal court decisions are also listed and explained in Exhibit 1-5.

OLD CASE LAW On a few occasions, this text cites opinions from old, classic cases dating to the nineteenth century or earlier; some of these are from the English courts. The citations to these cases may not

HOW TO READ AND UNDERSTAND CASE LAW

The decisions made by the courts establish the boundaries of the law as it applies to almost all business relationships. It thus is essential that businesspersons know how to read and understand case law. The cases that we present in this text have been condensed from the full text of the courts' opinions and are presented in a special format. In approximately two-thirds of the cases, we have summarized the background and facts, as well as the court's decision and remedy, in our own words and have included only selected portions of the court's opinion ("in the language of the court"). In the remaining one-third of the cases, we have provided a longer excerpt from the court's opinion without summarizing the background and facts or decision and remedy. The following sections will provide useful insights into how to read and understand case law.

Case Titles and Terminology

The title of a case, such as Adams v. Jones, indicates the names of the parties to the lawsuit. The v. in the case title stands for versus, which means "against." In the trial court, Adams was the plaintiff—the person who filed the suit. Jones was the defendant. If the case is appealed, however, the appellate court will sometimes place the name of the party appealing the decision first, so the case may be called Jones v. Adams if Jones is appealing. Because some appellate courts retain the trial court order of names, it is often impossible to distinguish the plaintiff from the defendant in the title of a reported appellate court decision. You must carefully read the facts of each case to identify the parties. Otherwise, the discussion by the appellate court may be difficult to understand.

The following terms, phrases, and abbreviations are frequently encountered in court opinions and legal publications. Because it is important to understand what is meant by these terms, phrases, and abbreviations, we define and discuss them here.

PARTIES TO LAWSUITS As mentioned previously, the party initiating a lawsuit is referred to as the plaintiff or petitioner, depending on the nature of the action, and the party against whom a lawsuit is brought is the defendant or respondent. Lawsuits frequently involve more than one plaintiff and/or defendant.

When a case is appealed from the original court or jurisdiction to another court or jurisdiction, the party appealing the case is called the appellant. The appellee is the party against whom the appeal is taken. (In some appellate courts, the party appealing a case is referred to as the petitioner, and the party against whom the suit is brought or appealed is called the respondent.)

JUDGES AND JUSTICES The terms judge and justice are usually synonymous and represent two designations given to judges in various courts. All members of the United States Supreme Court, for example, are referred to as justices, and justice is the formal title often given to judges of appellate courts, although this is not always the case. In New York, a justice is a judge of the trial court (which is called the Supreme Court), and a member of the Court of Appeals (the state's highest court) is called a judge. The term justice is commonly abbreviated to J., and justices, to JJ. A Supreme Court case might refer to Justice Sotomayor as Sotomayor, J., or to Chief Justice Roberts as Roberts, C.J.

DECISIONS AND OPINIONS Most decisions reached by reviewing, or appellate, courts are explained in written opinions. The opinion contains the court's reasons for its decision, the rules of law that apply, and the judgment. When all judges or justices unanimously agree on an opinion, the opinion is written for the entire court and can be deemed a unanimous opinion. When there is not a unanimous agreement, a majority opinion is written; the majority opinion outlines the view supported by the majority of the judges or justices deciding the case.

Often, a judge or justice who wishes to make or emphasize a point that was not made or emphasized in the unanimous or majority opinion will write a concurring opinion. This means that the judge or justice agrees, or concurs, with the majority's decision, but for different reasons. When there is not a unanimous opinion, a dissenting opinion presents the views of one or more judges who disagree with the majority's decision. The dissenting opinion is important because it may form the basis of the arguments used years later in overruling the precedential majority opinion. Occasionally, a court issues a per curiam (Latin for "by the court") opinion, which does not indicate the judge or justice who authored the opinion.

A Sample Court Case

To illustrate the various elements contained in a court opinion, we present an annotated court opinion in Exhibit 1–6 on pages 23–25. The opinion is from an actual case decided by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in 2010.

BACKGROUND OF THE CASE Kevin T. Singer, an inmate at a Wisconsin correctional facility, was a devoted player of Dungeons and Dragons (D&D), a popular fantasy role-playing game. While incarcerated, Singer was able to order and possess D&D materials for two years. In November 2004, however, the prison’s gang expert received an anonymous letter stating that Singer and three other inmates were trying to recruit others to join a “gang” dedicated to playing D&D. Prison officials immediately searched Singer’s cell, confiscated all of his D&D materials and prohibited him and other inmates from playing D&D. Singer filed a lawsuit in federal district court against the Wisconsin prison alleging that these actions violated his free speech and due process rights. The district court found in favor of the prison when it concluded that the D&D ban was rationally related to a legitimate government interest. Singer appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

EDITORIAL PRACTICE You will note that triple asterisks () and quadruple asterisks (*) frequently appear in the opinion. The triple asterisks indicate that we have deleted a few words or sentences from the opinion for the sake of readability or brevity. Quadruple asterisks mean that an entire paragraph (or more) has been omitted. Additionally, when the opinion cites another case or legal source, the citation to the case or other source has been omitted to save space and to improve the flow of the text. These editorial practices are continued in the other court opinions presented in this book. In addition, whenever we present a court opinion that includes a term or phrase that may not be readily understandable, a bracketed definition or paraphrase has been added.

BRIEFING CASES Knowing how to read and understand court opinions and the legal reasoning used by the courts is an essential step in undertaking accurate legal research. A further step is “briefing,” or summarizing, the case. Legal researchers routinely brief cases by reducing the texts of the opinions to their essential elements. Generally, when you brief a case, you first summarize the background and facts of the case, as we have done for the cases presented within this text. You then indicate the issue (or issues) before the court. An important element in the case brief is, of course, the court’s decision on the issue and the legal reasoning used by the court in reaching that decision. Detailed instructions on how to brief a case are given in Appendix A, which also includes a briefed version of the sample court case presented in Exhibit 1–6.

THE SAMPLE COURT CASE STARTS ON THE FACING PAGE.

The court divides the opinion into three sections, each headed by a Roman numeral and an explanatory heading. The first section summarizes the factual background of the case.

I. Background

Kevin T. Singer is an inmate at Wisconsin’s Waupun Correctional Institution. He is also a devoted player of D&D [Dungeons and Dragons], a fantasy role-playing game in which players collectively develop a story around characters whose personae they adopt.

* * * Singer was able to order and possess his D&D materials without incident from June 2002 until November 2004. This all changed on or about November 14, 2004, when Waupun’s long-serving Disruptive Group Coordinator, Captain Bruce Muraski, received an anonymous letter from an inmate. The letter expressed concern that Singer and three other inmates were forming a D&D gang and were trying to recruit others to join by passing around their D&D publications and touting the “rush” they got from playing the game. Muraski, Waupun’s expert on gang activity, decided to heed the letter’s advice and “check into this gang before it gets out of hand.”

On November 15, 2004, Muraski ordered Waupun staff to search the cells of the inmates named in the letter. The search of Singer’s cell turned up twenty-one books, fourteen magazines, and Singer’s handwritten D&D manuscript, all of which were confiscated. * * * In a December 6, 2004, letter to Singer, Muraski informed Singer that “inmates are not allowed to engage in or possess written material that details rules, codes, dogma of games/activities such as ‘Dungeons and Dragons’ because it promotes fantasy role playing, competitive hostility, violence, addictive escape behaviors, and possible gambling.”

Muraski testified * * * that fantasy role-playing games like D&D have “been found to promote competitive hostility, violence, and addictive escape behavior, which can compromise not only the inmate’s rehabilitation and effects of positive programming, but endanger the public and jeopardize the safety and security of the institution.”

the organization of gangs and lead to the actual development

Thereof here means “of gangs.” → thereof. * * * At bottom, his testimony about this policy aim highlighted Waupun’s worries about cooperative activity among inmates, particularly that carried out in an organized,

Something that is organized by a rigid, ranked order—here, by a ranked order of inmates depending on who is winning the most. → hierarchical fashion * * *. He [also] testified that D&D can “foster an inmate’s obsession with escaping from the real life, correctional environment, fostering hostility, violence and escape behavior,” which in turn “can compromise not only the inmate’s rehabilitation and effects of positive programming but also endanger the public and jeopardize the safety and security of the institution.”

A trove is a collection or treasure. * * * *

An affiant is a person who swears to an affidavit. It is true that Singer procured an impressive trove of affidavit testimony, including some from role-playing game experts, but none of his affiants’ testimony addressed the inquiry at issue here. The question is not whether D&D has led to gang behavior in the past; the prison officials concede that it has not. The question is whether the prison officials are rational in their belief that, if left unchecked, D&D could lead to gang behavior among inmates and undermine prison security in the future. Singer’s affiants * * * lack the qualifications necessary to determine whether the relationship between the D&D ban and the maintenance of prison security is so remote as to render the policy arbitrary or irrational. In other words, none of them is sufficiently versed in prison security concerns to raise a genuine issue of material fact about their relationship to D&D.

In the third major section of the opinion, the court states its decision and gives its order. * * * *

A large quantum is a sizeable quantity. → III. Conclusion

To affirm a judgment is to declare that it is valid. Despite Singer’s large quantum of affidavit testimony * * *, he has failed to demonstrate a genuine issue of material fact concerning the reasonableness of the relationship between Waupun’s D&D ban and the prison’s clearly legitimate penological interests. The district court’s grant of summary judgment is therefore AFFIRMED.

REVIEWING

Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

Suppose that the California legislature passes a law that severely restricts carbon dioxide emissions from automobiles in that state. A group of automobile manufacturers files suit against the state of California to prevent the enforcement of the law. The automakers claim that a federal law already sets fuel economy standards nationwide and that fuel economy standards are essentially the same as carbon dioxide emission standards. According to the automobile manufacturers, it is unfair to allow California to impose more stringent regulations than those set by the federal law. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Who are the parties (the plaintiffs and the defendant) in this lawsuit?
2. Are the plaintiffs seeking a legal remedy or an equitable remedy?
3. What is the primary source of the law that is at issue here?
4. Where would you look to find the relevant California and federal laws?

DEBATE THIS: Under the doctrine of stare decisis, courts are obligated to follow the precedents established in their jurisdiction unless there is a compelling reason not to. Should U.S. courts continue to adhere to this common law principle, given that our government now regulates so many areas by statute?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

1-1. Sources of Law How does statutory law come into existence? How does it differ from the common law?

1-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Schools of Jurisprudential Thought.

After World War II, an international tribunal of judges convened at Nuremberg, Germany and convicted several Nazis of “crimes against humanity.” Assuming that these convicted war criminals had not disobeyed any law of their country and had merely been following their government’s orders, what law had they violated? Explain.

- For a sample answer to Question 1-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

1-3. Reading Citations Assume that you want to read the entire court opinion in the case of Pinard v. Dandy Lions, LLC, 119 Conn.App. 368, 987 A.2d 406 (2010). Refer to the subsection entitled “Finding Case Law” in this chapter, and then explain specifically where you would find the court’s opinion.

1-4. Sources of Law This chapter discussed a number of sources of American law. Which source of law takes priority in the following situations, and why?

- A federal statute conflicts with the U.S. Constitution.
- A federal statute conflicts with a state constitutional provision.
- A state statute conflicts with the common law of that state.
- A state constitutional amendment conflicts with the U.S. Constitution.

1-5. Stare Decisis In this chapter, we stated that the doctrine of stare decisis “became a cornerstone of the English and American judicial systems.” What does stare decisis mean, and why has this doctrine been so fundamental to the development of our legal tradition?

1-6. Court Opinions What is the difference between a concurring opinion and a majority opinion? Between a concurring opinion and a dissenting opinion? Why do judges and justices write concurring and dissenting opinions, given that these opinions will not affect the outcome of the case at hand, which has already been decided by majority vote?

1-7. The Common Law Tradition Courts can overturn precedents and thus change the common law. Should judges have the same authority to overrule statutory law? Explain.

1-8. Schools of Judicial Thought “The judge’s role is not to make the law but to uphold and apply the law.” Do you agree or disagree with this statement? Discuss fully the reasons for your answer.

1-9. Remedies Assume that Arthur Rabe is suing Xavier Sanchez for breaching a contract in which Sanchez promised to sell Rabe a painting by Vincent van Gogh for $3 million.

- In this lawsuit, who is the plaintiff and who is the defendant?

- Suppose that Rabe wants Sanchez to perform the contract as promised. What remedy would Rabe seek from the court?

- Now suppose that Rabe wants to cancel the contract because Sanchez fraudulently misrepresented the painting as an original Van Gogh when in fact it is a copy. What remedy would Rabe seek?

- Will the remedy Rabe seeks in either situation be a remedy at law or a remedy in equity? What is the difference between legal and equitable remedies?

- Suppose that the trial court finds in Rabe’s favor and grants one of these remedies. Sanchez then appeals the decision to a higher court. On appeal, which party will be the appellant (or petitioner), and which party will be the appellee (or respondent)?

1-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: The Common Law Tradition.

On July 5, 1884, Dudley, Stephens, and Brooks—“all able-bodied English seamen”—and a teenage English boy were cast adrift in a lifeboat following a storm at sea. They had no water with them in the boat, and all they had for sustenance were two one-pound tins of turnips. On July 24, Dudley proposed that one of the four in the lifeboat be sacrificed to save the others. Stephens agreed with Dudley, but Brooks refused to consent—and the boy was never asked for his opinion. On July 25, Dudley killed the boy, and the three men then fed on the boy’s body and blood. Four days later, a passing vessel rescued the men. They were taken to England and tried for the murder of the boy. If the men had not fed on the boy’s body, they would probably have died of starvation within the four-day period. The boy, who was in a much weaker condition, would likely have died before the rest. [Regina v. Dudley and Stephens, 14 Q.B.D. (Queen’s Bench Division, England) 273 (1884)]

- The basic question in this case is whether the survivors should be subject to penalties under English criminal law, given the men’s unusual circumstances. Were the defendants’ actions necessary but unethical? Explain your reasoning. What ethical issues might be involved here?

- Should judges ever have the power to look beyond the written “letter of the law” in making their decisions? Why or why not?

Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

Today, in the United States there are fifty-two court systems—one for each of the fifty states, one for the District of Columbia, and a federal system. Keep in mind that the federal courts are not superior to the state courts; they are simply an independent system of courts, which derives its authority from Article III, Section 2, of the U.S. Constitution. By the power given to it under Article I of the U.S. Constitution, Congress has extended the federal court system beyond the boundaries of the United States to U.S. territories such as Guam, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.¹ As we shall see, the United States Supreme Court is the final controlling voice over all of these fifty-two systems, at least when questions of federal law are involved.

Every businessperson will likely face a lawsuit at some time in his or her career. Thus, anyone involved in business needs to have an understanding of the American court systems, as well as the various methods of dispute resolution that can be pursued outside the courts. In this chapter, after examining the judiciary's role in the American governmental system, we discuss some basic requirements that must be met before a party may bring a lawsuit before a particular court. We then look at the court systems of the United States in some detail. We conclude the chapter with an overview of some alternative methods of settling disputes, including online dispute resolution.

1. In Guam and the Virgin Islands, territorial courts serve as both federal courts and state courts; in Puerto Rico, they serve only as federal courts.

THE JUDICIARY'S ROLE IN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

As you learned in Chapter 1, the body of American law includes the federal and state constitutions, statutes passed by legislative bodies, administrative law, and the case decisions and legal principles that form the common law. These laws would be meaningless, however, without the courts to interpret and apply them. This is the essential role of the judiciary—the courts—in the American governmental system: to interpret the laws and apply them to specific situations. (See this chapter's Insight into Ethics feature for a discussion of how the availability of “unpublished opinions” over the Internet is changing what some judges consider to be persuasive precedent.)

As the branch of government entrusted with interpreting the laws, the judiciary can decide, among other things, whether the laws or actions of the other two branches are constitutional. The process for making such a determination is known as judicial review. The power of judicial review enables the judicial branch to act as a check on the other two branches of government, in line with the system of checks and balances established by the U.S. Constitution.²

The power of judicial review is not mentioned in the U.S. Constitution (although many constitutional scholars conclude that the founders intended the judiciary to have this power). Rather, this power was explicitly established by the United States Supreme Court in 1803 by its decision in Marbury v. Madison.³ In that decision, the Court stated, “It is emphatically

2. In a broad sense, judicial review occurs whenever a court “reviews” a case or legal proceeding—as when an appellate court reviews a lower court's decision. When discussing the judiciary's role in American government, however, the term judicial review refers to the power of the judiciary to decide whether the actions of the other two branches of government violate the U.S. Constitution.

3. 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803).

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

How the Internet Is Expanding Precedent

The notion that courts should rely on precedents to decide the outcome of similar cases has long been a cornerstone of U.S. law. Nevertheless, the availability of “unpublished opinions” over the Internet is changing what the law considers to be precedent. An unpublished opinion is a decision made by an appellate court that is not intended for publication in a reporter (the bound books that contain court opinions).^a Courts traditionally have not considered unpublished opinions to be “precedent,” binding or persuasive, and attorneys often have not been allowed to refer to these decisions in their arguments.

Increased Online Availability

The number of court decisions not published in printed books has risen dramatically in recent years. Nearly 80 percent of the decisions of the federal appellate courts are unpublished, and the number is equally high in some state court systems. Even though certain decisions are not intended for publication, they are posted (“published”) almost immediately on online legal databases, such as Westlaw and Lexis. With the proliferation of free legal databases and court Web sites, the general public also has almost instant access to the unpublished decisions of most courts. This situation has caused many to question why these opinions have no precedential effect.

Should Unpublished Decisions Establish Precedent?

Before the advent of the Internet, not considering unpublished decisions as precedent might have been justified on the ground of fairness. How could lawyers know about unpublished decisions if they were not printed in the case reporters? Now that opinions are so readily available on the Web, however, this justification is no longer valid. Moreover, it now seems unfair not to consider these decisions as precedent, given that they are so publicly accessible. Some claim that unpublished decisions could make bad precedents because these decisions frequently are written by staff attorneys and law clerks rather than by judges, so the reasoning may be inferior. If an unpublished decision is considered merely as persuasive precedent, however, then judges who disagree with the reasoning are free to reject the conclusion.

- a. Recently decided cases that are not yet published are also sometimes called unpublished opinions, but because these decisions will eventually be printed in reporters, we do not include them here.

The United States Supreme Court Changed the Federal Rules on Unpublished Opinions

The United States Supreme Court made history in 2006 when it announced that it would allow lawyers to refer to (cite) unpublished decisions in all federal courts. Rule 32.1 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure states that federal courts may not prohibit or restrict the citation of federal judicial opinions that have been designated as “not for publication,” “non-precedential,” or “not precedent.” The rule applies only to federal courts and only to unpublished opinions issued after January 1, 2007. It does not specify the effect that a court must give to one of its unpublished opinions or to an unpublished opinion from another court. Basically, Rule 32.1 simply establishes a uniform rule for all of the federal courts that allows attorneys to cite—and judges to consider as persuasive precedent—unpublished decisions. The rule is a clear example of how technology—the availability of unpublished opinions over the Internet—has affected the law.

INSIGHT INTO THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT

Now that the United States Supreme Court is allowing unpublished decisions to form persuasive precedent in federal courts, should state courts follow? Why or why not?

the province and duty of the Judicial Department to say what the law is. . . . If two laws conflict with each other, the Courts must decide on the operation of each. . . . [I]f both [a] law and the Constitution apply to a particular case, . . . the Court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty.” Since the Marbury v. Madison decision, the power of judicial review has remained unchallenged. Today, this power is exercised by both federal and state courts.

BASIC JUDICIAL REQUIREMENTS

Before a lawsuit can be brought before a court, certain requirements must be met. These requirements relate to jurisdiction, venue, and standing to sue. We examine each of these important concepts here.

Jurisdiction

In Latin, juris means “law,” and diction means “to speak.” Thus, “the power to speak the law” is the literal meaning of the term jurisdiction. Before any court can hear a case, it must have jurisdiction over the person (or company) against whom the suit is brought (the defendant) or over the property involved in the suit. The court must also have jurisdiction over the subject matter of the dispute.

JURISDICTION OVER PERSONS OR PROPERTY

Generally, a particular court can exercise in personam* jurisdiction (personal jurisdiction) over any person or business that resides in a certain geographic area. A state trial court, for example, normally has jurisdictional authority over residents (including businesses) of a particular area of the state, such as a county or district. A state’s highest court (often called the state supreme court⁴) has jurisdictional authority over all residents within the state.

A court can also exercise jurisdiction over property that is located within its boundaries. This kind of jurisdiction is known as in rem* jurisdiction, or “jurisdiction over the thing.” For example, suppose that a dispute arises over the ownership of a boat in dry dock in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. The boat is owned by an Ohio resident, over whom a Florida court normally cannot exercise personal jurisdiction. The other party to the dispute is a resident of Nebraska. In this situation, a lawsuit concerning the boat could be brought in a Florida state court on the basis of the court’s in rem jurisdiction.

Long Arm Statutes. Under the authority of a state long arm statute, a court can exercise personal jurisdiction over certain out-of-state defendants based on activities that took place within the state. Before a court can exercise jurisdiction over an out-of-state defendant under a long arm statute, though, it must be demonstrated that the defendant had sufficient contacts, or minimum contacts, with the state to justify the jurisdiction.⁵ Generally, this means that the defendant must have enough of a connection to the state for the judge to conclude that it is fair for the state to exercise power over the defendant. For example, if an out-of-state defendant caused an automobile accident or sold defective goods within the state, a court usually will find that minimum contacts exist to exercise jurisdiction over that defendant. Similarly, a state may exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant who is sued for breaching a contract that was formed within the state.

CASE IN POINT An Xbox game system caught fire in Bonnie Broquet’s home in Texas and caused substantial personal injuries. Broquet filed a lawsuit in a Texas court against Ji-Haw Industrial Company, a nonresident company that made the Xbox components. Broquet alleged that Ji-Haw’s components were defective and had caused the fire. Ji-Haw argued that the Texas court lacked jurisdiction over it, but a state appellate court held that the Texas long arm statute authorized the exercise of jurisdiction over the out-of-state defendant.⁶

Corporate Contacts. Because corporations are considered legal persons, courts use the same principles to determine whether it is fair to exercise jurisdiction over a corporation.⁷ A corporation normally is subject to personal jurisdiction in the state in which it is incorporated, has its principal office, and/or is doing business. Courts apply the minimum-contacts test to determine if they can exercise jurisdiction over out-of-state corporations.

The minimum-contacts requirement is usually met if the corporation advertises or sells its products within the state, or places its goods into the “stream of commerce” with the intent that the goods be sold in the state. Suppose that a business is incorporated under the laws of Maine but has a branch office and manufacturing plant in Georgia. The corporation also advertises and sells its products in Georgia. These activities would likely constitute sufficient contacts with the state of Georgia to allow a Georgia court to exercise jurisdiction over the corporation.

Some corporations, however, do not sell or advertise products or place any goods in the stream of commerce. Determining what constitutes minimum contacts in these situations can be more difficult. In the following case, the defendant was a New Jersey corporation that performed machining services on component parts that it received from a North Carolina firm. The North Carolina firm claimed that the services were defective and wanted to sue for breach of contract in a North Carolina court. Did the New Jersey firm have minimum contacts with North Carolina?

4. As will be discussed shortly, a state’s highest court is often referred to as the state supreme court, but there are exceptions. For example, in New York the supreme court is a trial court.

5. The minimum-contacts standard was first established in International Shoe Co. v. State of Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 66 S.Ct. 154, 90 L.Ed. 95 (1945).

6. Ji-Haw Industrial Co. v. Broquet, 2008 WL 441822 (Tex.App.—San Antonio 2008).

7. In the eyes of the law, corporations are “legal persons”—entities that can sue and be sued. See Chapter 39.

EXTENDED CASE 2.1

Southern Prestige Industries, Inc. v. Independence Plating Corp.

Court of Appeals of North Carolina, 690 S.E.2d 768 (2010).

www.nccourts.org^a

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

CALABRIA, Judge.

* * * *

The facts in the instant case [the case before the court] are undisputed. Defendant (Independence Plating Corporation) is a New Jersey corporation that provides anodizing^b services. Defendant's only office and all of its personnel are located in the state of New Jersey. Defendant does not advertise or otherwise solicit business in North Carolina. Prior to July 2007, defendant had engaged in a long-standing business relationship with Kidde Aerospace ("Kidde"), a North Carolina company.

* * * *

Plaintiff and defendant engaged in frequent transactions between 27 July 2007 and 25 April 2008.

On 18 November 2008, plaintiff initiated an action for breach of contract in [a North Carolina state court]. Plaintiff alleged that defects caused by defendant's anodizing process caused plaintiff's machined parts to be rejected by Kidde. On 6 February 2009, defendant filed, with a supporting affidavit [a written statement, made under oath], a motion to dismiss pursuant to [North Carolina statutory law] for lack of personal jurisdiction. On 18 March 2009, plaintiff filed an affidavit, with supporting exhibits, challenging the assertions in defendant's motion to dismiss. On 4 May 2009, after reviewing the evidence submitted by the parties, the trial court entered an order denying defendant's motion to dismiss. Defendant appeals.

Defendant's only argument on appeal is that the trial court erred in denying its motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction. Specifically, defendant argues there are insufficient contacts to satisfy the due process of law requirements that are necessary to subject defendant to the personal jurisdiction of North Carolina's courts. We disagree.

* * * *

Neither party contests the findings of fact contained in the trial court's order. * * * Therefore, the only issue to be determined is "whether the trial court's findings of fact support its conclusion of law that the court has personal jurisdiction over defendant. We conduct our review of this issue de novo [anew]."

North Carolina courts utilize a two-prong analysis in determining whether personal jurisdiction against a nonresident is properly asserted. Under the first prong of the analysis, we determine if statutory authority for jurisdiction exists under our long-arm statute. If statutory authority exists, we consider under the second prong whether exercise of our jurisdiction comports [is in accordance] with standards of due process.

Defendant has conceded that the facts are sufficient to confer jurisdiction under the North Carolina long arm statute. Therefore, "the inquiry becomes whether plaintiffs' assertion of jurisdiction over defendants complies with due process."

In order to satisfy due process requirements, there must be "certain minimum contacts [between the nonresident defendant and the forum state—that is, the state in which the court is located] such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend 'traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.'" In order to establish minimum contacts with North Carolina, the defendant must have purposefully availed itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum state and invoked the benefits and protections of the laws of North Carolina. The relationship between the defendant and the forum state must be such that the defendant should reasonably anticipate being haled into a North Carolina court.

* * * *

* * * Our courts look at the following factors in determining whether minimum contacts exist: (1) the quantity of the contacts, (2) the nature and quality of the contacts, (3) the source and connection of the cause of action to the contacts, (4) the interest of the forum state, and (5) the convenience to the parties. [Emphasis added.]

In the instant case, the trial court found that the parties "had an ongoing business relationship characterized by frequent transactions between July 27, 2007, and April 25, 2008, as reflected by thirty-two purchase orders." Plaintiff would ship machined parts to defendant, who would then anodize the parts and return them to plaintiff in North Carolina. Defendant sent invoices totaling $21,018.70 to plaintiff in North Carolina, and these invoices were paid from plaintiff's corporate account at a North Carolina bank. Plaintiff filed a breach of contract action against defendant because the machined parts that were shipped to defendant from North Carolina and then anodized by defendant and shipped back to North Carolina were defective.

“It is generally conceded that a state has a manifest interest in providing its residents with a convenient forum for redressing injuries inflicted by out-of-state actors. Thus, North Carolina has a ‘manifest interest’ in providing the plaintiff ‘a convenient forum for redressing injuries inflicted by’ defendant, an out-of-state merchant.” As for the remaining factor, there is no evidence in the record that would indicate that it is more convenient for the parties to litigate this matter in a different forum.

“Litigation on interstate business transactions inevitably involves inconvenience to one of the parties. When [t]he inconvenience to defendant of litigating in North Carolina is no greater than would be the inconvenience of plaintiff of litigating in [the defendant’s state] . . . no convenience factors . . . are determinative[.]” [Emphasis added.]

Therefore, after examining the ongoing relationship between the parties, the nature of their contacts, the interest of the forum state, the convenience of the parties, and the cause of action, we conclude defendant has “purposely availed” itself of the benefits of doing business in North Carolina and “should reasonably anticipate being haled” into a North Carolina court. We hold that defendant has sufficient minimum contacts with North Carolina to justify the exercise of personal jurisdiction over defendant without violating the due process clause.

Affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. What are the factors that the court looked at in determining whether minimum contacts existed between the defendant and the state of North Carolina?
2. Why did the court state that the convenience of the parties was not “determinative” in this case?

JURISDICTION OVER SUBJECT MATTER Subject-matter jurisdiction refers to the limitations on the types of cases a court can hear. Certain courts are empowered to hear certain kinds of disputes.

General and Limited Jurisdiction. In both the federal and the state court systems, there are courts of general (unlimited) jurisdiction and courts of limited jurisdiction. A court of general jurisdiction can decide cases involving a broad array of issues. An example of a court of general jurisdiction is a state trial court or a federal district court. An example of a state court of limited jurisdiction is a probate court. Probate courts are state courts that handle only matters relating to the transfer of a person’s assets and obligations after that person’s death, including issues relating to the custody and guardianship of children. An example of a federal court of limited subject-matter jurisdiction is a bankruptcy court. Bankruptcy courts handle only bankruptcy proceedings, which are governed by federal bankruptcy law (see Chapter 30).

A court’s jurisdiction over subject matter is usually defined in the statute or constitution creating the court. In both the federal and the state court systems, a court’s subject-matter jurisdiction can be limited not only by the subject of the lawsuit but also by the sum in controversy, whether the case is a felony (a more serious type of crime) or a misdemeanor (a less serious type of crime), or whether the proceeding is a trial or an appeal.

Original and Appellate Jurisdiction. A court’s subject-matter jurisdiction is also frequently limited to hearing cases at a particular stage of the dispute. Courts in which lawsuits begin, trials take place, and evidence is presented are referred to as courts of original jurisdiction. Courts having original jurisdiction are courts of the first instance, or trial courts. In the federal court system, the district courts are trial courts. In the various state court systems, the trial courts are known by different names, as will be discussed shortly.

Courts having appellate jurisdiction act as reviewing courts, or appellate courts. In general, cases can be brought before appellate courts only on appeal from an order or a judgment of a trial court or other lower court. In other words, the distinction between courts of original jurisdiction and courts of appellate jurisdiction normally lies in whether the case is being heard for the first time.

JURISDICTION OF THE FEDERAL COURTS Because the federal government is a government of limited powers, the jurisdiction of the federal courts is limited. Federal courts have subject-matter jurisdiction in two situations.

Federal Questions. Article III of the U.S. Constitution establishes the boundaries of federal judicial power. Section 2 of Article III states that “the judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority.” In effect, this clause means that whenever a plaintiff’s cause of action is based, at least in part, on the U.S. Constitution, a treaty, or a federal law, a federal question arises. Any lawsuit involving a federal question comes under the judicial authority of the federal courts and can originate in a federal court. People who claim that their constitutional rights have been violated, for example, can begin their suits in a federal court. Note that in a case based on a federal question, a federal court will apply federal law.

Diversity of Citizenship. Federal district courts can also exercise original jurisdiction over cases involving diversity of citizenship. This term applies whenever a federal court has jurisdiction over a case that does not involve a question of federal law. The most common type of diversity jurisdiction has two requirements:⁸ (1) the plaintiff and defendant must be residents of different states, and (2) the dollar amount in controversy must exceed $75,000. For purposes of diversity jurisdiction, a corporation is a citizen of both the state in which it is incorporated and the state in which its principal place of business is located. A case involving diversity of citizenship can be filed in the appropriate federal district court. If the case starts in a state court, it can sometimes be transferred, or “removed,” to a federal court. A large percentage of the cases filed in federal courts each year are based on diversity of citizenship.

As noted, a federal court will apply federal law in cases involving federal questions. In a case based on diversity of citizenship, in contrast, a federal court will apply the relevant state law (which is often the law of the state in which the court sits).

8. Diversity jurisdiction also exists in cases between (1) a foreign country and citizens of a state or of different states and (2) citizens of a state and citizens or subjects of a foreign country. These bases for diversity jurisdiction are less commonly used.

EXCLUSIVE VERSUS CONCURRENT JURISDICTION

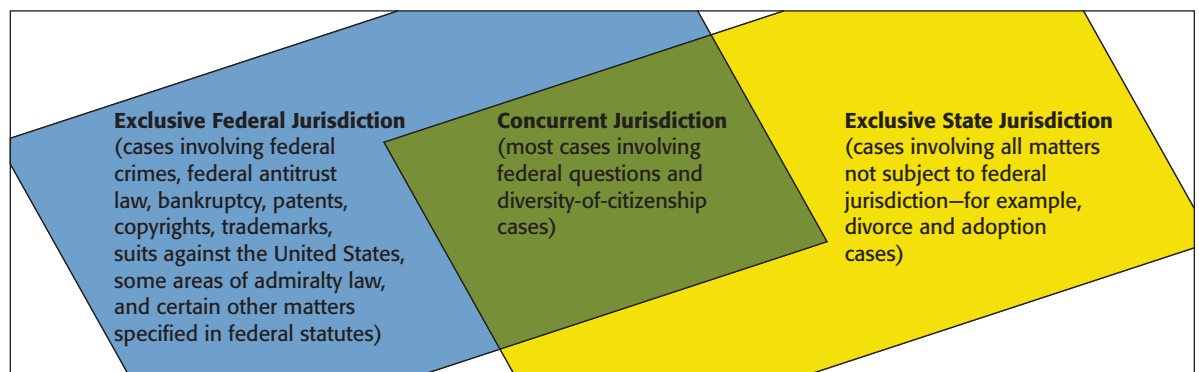

When both federal and state courts have the power to hear a case, as is true in suits involving diversity of citizenship, concurrent jurisdiction exists. When cases can be tried only in federal courts or only in state courts, exclusive jurisdiction exists. Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction in cases involving federal crimes, bankruptcy, and most patent and copyright claims; in suits against the United States; and in some areas of admiralty law (law governing transportation on ocean waters). State courts also have exclusive jurisdiction over certain subjects—for example, divorce and adoption.

When concurrent jurisdiction exists, a party may choose to bring a suit in either a federal court or a state court. A number of factors can affect a party’s decision to litigate in a federal versus a state court—such as the availability of different remedies, the distance to the respective courthouses, or the experience or reputation of a particular judge. For example, if the dispute involves a trade secret, a party might conclude that a federal court—which has exclusive jurisdiction over copyrights, patents, and trademarks—would have more expertise in the matter. A party might also choose a federal court over a state court if he or she is concerned about bias in a state court. In contrast, a plaintiff might choose to litigate in a state court if the court has a reputation for awarding substantial amounts of damages or if the judge is perceived as being pro-plaintiff. The concepts of exclusive and concurrent jurisdiction are illustrated in Exhibit 2-1.

Jurisdiction in Cyberspace

The Internet’s capacity to bypass political and geographic boundaries undercuts the traditional basis on which courts assert personal jurisdiction. This basis includes a party’s contacts with a court’s geographic jurisdiction. As already discussed, for a court to compel a defendant to come before it, there must be at least minimum contacts—the presence of a salesperson within the state, for example. Are there sufficient minimum contacts if the only connection to a jurisdiction is an ad on a Web site originating from a remote location?

THE “SLIDING-SCALE” STANDARD Gradually, the courts are developing a standard—called a “sliding-scale” standard—for determining when the exercise of personal jurisdiction over an out-of-state Internet-based defendant is proper. In developing this standard, the courts have identified three types of Internet business contacts: (1) substantial business conducted over the Internet (with contracts and sales, for example); (2) some interactivity through a Web site; and (3) passive advertising. Jurisdiction is proper for the first category, is improper for the third, and may or may not be appropriate for the second.⁹ An Internet communication is typically considered passive if people have to voluntarily access it to read the message and active if it is sent to specific individuals. In certain situations, even a single contact can satisfy the minimum-contacts requirement.

CASE IN POINT A Louisiana resident, Daniel Crummey, purchased a used recreational vehicle (RV) from sellers in Texas after viewing photos of it on eBay. The sellers’ statements on eBay claimed that “Everything works great on this RV and will provide comfort and dependability for years to come. This RV will go to Alaska and back without problems!” Crummey picked up the RV in Texas, but on the drive back to Louisiana, the RV quit working. He filed a suit in Louisiana against the sellers alleging that the vehicle was defective, but the sellers claimed that the Louisiana court lacked jurisdiction. Because the sellers had used eBay to market and sell the RV to a Louisiana buyer—and had regularly used eBay to sell vehicles to remote parties in the past—the court found that jurisdiction was proper.¹⁰

INTERNATIONAL JURISDICTIONAL ISSUES Because the Internet is international in scope, international jurisdictional issues have understandably come to the fore. The world’s courts seem to be developing a standard that echoes the requirement of minimum contacts applied by the U.S. courts. Most courts are indicating that minimum contacts—doing business within the jurisdiction, for example—are enough to compel a defendant to appear and that a physical presence is not necessary. The effect of this standard is that a business firm has to comply with the laws in any jurisdiction in which it targets customers for its products. This situation is complicated by the fact that many countries’ laws on particular issues—free speech, for example—are very different from U.S. laws.

CASE IN POINT Yahoo operated an online auction site on which Nazi memorabilia, among other things, were offered for sale. In France, the display of any objects depicting symbols of Nazi ideology is illegal and leads to both criminal and civil liability. The International League against Racism and Anti-Semitism filed a suit in Paris against Yahoo for displaying Nazi memorabilia and offering them for sale via its Web site. The French court asserted jurisdiction over Yahoo on the ground that the materials on the company’s U.S.-based servers could be viewed on a Web site accessible in France. The French court ordered Yahoo to eliminate all Internet access in France to the Nazi memorabilia offered for sale through its online auctions. Yahoo then took the case to a federal district court in the United States, claiming that the French court’s order violated the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Although the federal district court ruled in favor of Yahoo, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed. According to the appellate court, U.S. courts lacked personal jurisdiction over the French groups involved. The ruling leaves open the possibility that Yahoo, and anyone else who posts anything on the Internet, could be held answerable to the laws of any country in which the message might be received.¹¹

Jurisdiction

Type of Jurisdiction	Description
Personal	Exists when a defendant is located within the territorial boundaries within which a court has the right and power to decide cases. Jurisdiction may be exercised over out-of-state defendants under state long arm statutes. Courts have jurisdiction over corporate defendants that do business within the state, as well as corporations that advertise, sell, or place goods into the stream of commerce in the state.
Property	Exists when the property that is subject to a lawsuit is located within the territorial boundaries within which a court has the right and power to decide cases.
Subject Matter	Limits the court's jurisdictional authority to particular types of cases. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Limited jurisdiction—Exists when a court is limited to a specific subject matter, such as probate or divorce. 2. General jurisdiction—Exists when a court can hear cases involving a broad array of issues.
Original	Exists with courts that have the authority to hear a case for the first time (trial courts).
Appellate	Exists with courts of appeal and review. Generally, appellate courts do not have original jurisdiction.
Federal	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Federal questions—A federal court can exercise jurisdiction when the plaintiff's cause of action is based at least in part on the U.S. Constitution, a treaty, or a federal law. 2. Diversity of citizenship—A federal court can exercise jurisdiction in cases between citizens of different states when the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000 (or in cases between a foreign country and citizens of a state or of different states and in cases between citizens of a state and citizens or subjects of a foreign country).
Concurrent	Exists when both federal and state courts have authority to hear the same case.
Exclusive	Exists when only state courts or only federal courts have authority to hear a case.
Jurisdiction in Cyberspace	Because the Internet does not have physical boundaries, traditional jurisdictional concepts have been difficult to apply in cases involving activities conducted via the Web. Gradually, the courts are developing standards to use in determining when jurisdiction over a Web site owner or operator in another state is proper. Jurisdictional disputes involving international cyberspace transactions present a significant legal challenge.

example, two state courts (or two federal courts) may have the authority to exercise jurisdiction over a case, but it may be more appropriate or convenient to hear the case in one court than in the other.

Basically, the concept of venue reflects the policy that a court trying a case should be in the geographic neighborhood (usually the county) where the incident leading to the lawsuit occurred or where the parties involved in the lawsuit reside. Venue in a civil case typically is where the defendant resides, whereas venue in a criminal case normally is where the crime occurred. Pretrial publicity or other factors, though, may require a change of venue to another community, especially in criminal cases in which the defendant's right to a fair and impartial jury has been impaired.

Standing to Sue

In order to bring a lawsuit before a court, a party must have standing to sue, or a sufficient stake in a matter to justify seeking relief through the court system. In other words, to have standing, a party must have a legally protected and tangible interest at stake in the litigation. The party bringing the lawsuit must have suffered a harm or been threatened with a harm by the action about which she or he has complained. At times, a person can have standing to sue on behalf of another person. Suppose that a child suffers serious injuries as a result of a defectively manufactured toy. Because the child is a minor, another person, such as a parent or a legal guardian, can bring a lawsuit on the child's behalf.

Standing to sue also requires that the controversy at issue be a justiciable¹³ controversy—a controversy that is real and substantial, as opposed to hypothetical or academic.

CASE IN POINT James Bush went to the Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI's) office in San Jose, California, and filled out complaint forms indicating that he was seeking records under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA—see Chapter 45). When the FBI failed to provide the requested records, Bush filed a lawsuit against the U.S. Department of Justice. The court dismissed the suit, however, finding that no actual controversy existed for the court to decide. Bush had failed to comply with the requirements of the FOIA when he filled out the forms, so the FBI was not obligated to provide any records.¹⁴

In the following case—involving a suit between a state and an agency of the federal government—the court was asked to determine whether the state's allegations rose to the level of a “concrete, particularized, actual or imminent” injury against the state independent of any harm to private parties.

Oregon v. Legal Services Corp.

www.ca9.uscourts.gov^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • The federal government established the Legal Services Corporation (LSC) to provide federal funds to local legal assistance programs for individuals who cannot afford legal services. LSC restricts the use of the funds for some purposes, including participating in class-action lawsuits. The recipients must maintain legal, physical, and financial separation from organizations that engage in these activities. In 2005, in the interest of cutting costs, the state of Oregon directed legal assistance programs in the state to consolidate in situations in which separate organizations provided services in the same geographic area. LSC did not approve of the integration of programs that received its funds with programs that engaged in restricted activities. Oregon filed a suit in a federal district court against LSC, alleging that the state's ability to provide legal services to its citizens was frustrated. The court dismissed the suit “on the merits.” Oregon appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Milan D. SMITH, Jr., Circuit Judge:

* * * *

* * * In this case there is no burden or injury placed on Oregon. * * * Oregon has not accepted federal funds, nor is it bound by the accompanying restrictions. Oregon is not injured by the federal government's decision to subsidize certain private activities, even if the government attaches impermissible conditions, as is alleged, to the recipients of those funds. Oregon is only affected by virtue of its interest in the effect of the grant and the conditions on its citizens; it has no independent claim of injury. [Emphasis added.]

Oregon cannot claim injury simply on the basis that federal subsidies to private parties do not [complement] Oregon's policies. The state has no standing to sue the federal government to provide voluntary federal subsidies to private parties, and certainly has no standing to sue the federal government to change its conditions for those federal subsidies. [Emphasis added.]

Oregon argues * * * that it has been injured by LSC's regulations, which thwart Oregon's efforts at policy making with regards to Oregon's Legal Service Program. Oregon attempts to analogize [draw comparisons to] its situation to cases recognizing a state's standing to defend its statutes when they are alleged to be unconstitutional or pre-empted by federal regulation. However, those cases are distinguishable, because in this case there is no dispute over Oregon's ability to regulate its legal services program, and no claim that Oregon's laws have been invalidated as a result of the LSC restrictions.

The core of the dispute is whether Oregon should have the ability to control the conditions surrounding a voluntary grant of federal funds to specifically delineated private institutions. Because Oregon has no right, express or reserved, to do so, there is no judicially cognizable [able to be known] injury. Oregon may continue to regulate its legal service programs as it desires, but it cannot depend on voluntary financial support from LSC to * * * any * * * legal services provider within the state if it makes choices that conflict with the LSC * * * regulations.

* * * *

Oregon has failed to allege generalized facts sufficient to show an actual injury for the purposes of establishing its standing in this case. Oregon is not directly affected by the * * * LSC regulations, and is free to avoid any or all indirect effects of those regulations by simply increasing its own taxes to fund its desired policies. * * * Oregon * * * is, therefore, without standing to pursue its claims in this action.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit agreed that Oregon's complaint should be dismissed, but vacated the judgment and remanded the case for an entry of dismissal based on the plaintiff's lack of standing.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Under what circumstances might a state suffer an injury that would give it standing to sue to block the enforcement of restrictions on the use of federal funds?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Would it be ethical for a state to alter its policies to align with LSC's restrictions in order to continue the funding of local legal services programs? Explain.

THE STATE AND FEDERAL COURT SYSTEMS

As mentioned earlier in this chapter, each state has its own court system. Additionally, there is a system of federal courts. Although no two state court systems are exactly the same, the right-hand side of Exhibit 2–2 on the following page illustrates the basic organizational framework characteristic of the court systems in many states. The exhibit also shows how the federal court system is structured. We turn now to an examination of these court systems, beginning with the state courts.

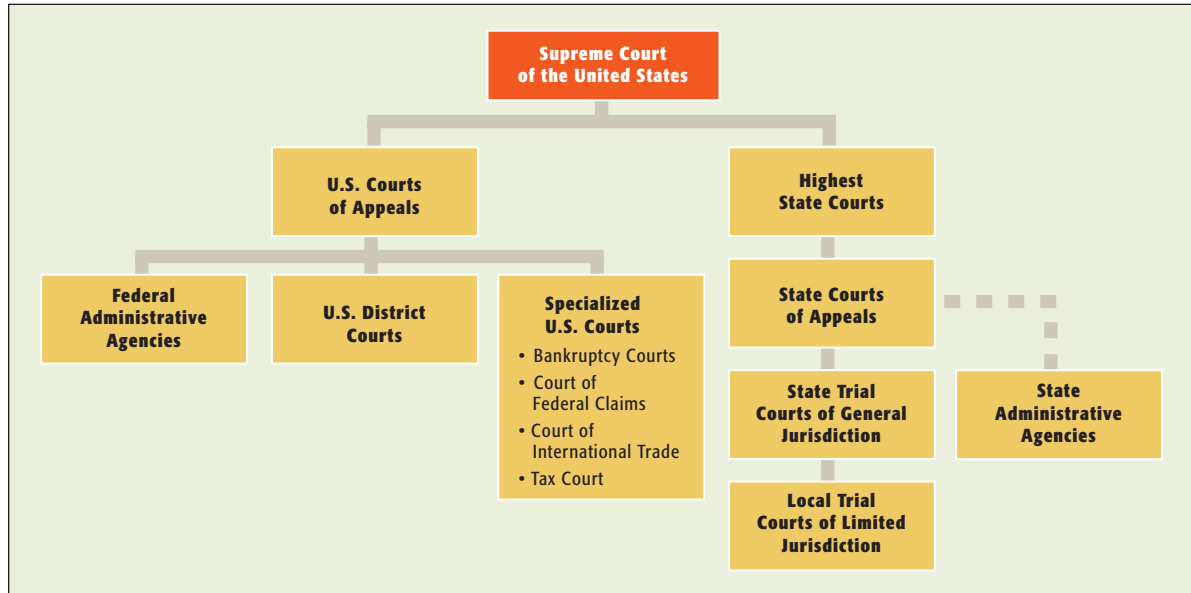

The State Court Systems

Typically, a state court system includes several levels, or tiers, of courts. As indicated in Exhibit 2–2 on the next page, state courts may include (1) local trial courts of limited jurisdiction, (2) state trial courts of general jurisdiction, (3) state courts of appeals (intermediate appellate courts), and (4) the state's highest court (often called the state supreme court). Generally, any person who is a party to a lawsuit has the opportunity to plead the case before a trial court and then, if he or she loses, before at least one level of appellate court. Finally, if the case involves a federal statute or federal constitutional issue, the decision of a state supreme court on that issue may be further appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

The states use various methods to select judges for their courts. Usually, voters elect judges, but in some states judges are appointed. For example, in Iowa, the governor appoints judges, and then the general population decides whether to confirm their appointment in the next general election. The states usually specify the number of years that judges will serve. In contrast, as you will read shortly, judges in the federal court system are appointed by the president of the United States and, if they are confirmed by the Senate, hold office for life—unless they engage in blatantly illegal conduct.

EXHIBIT 2-2 • The State and Federal Court Systems

TRIAL COURTS Trial courts are exactly what their name implies—courts in which trials are held and testimony is taken. State trial courts have either general or limited jurisdiction. Trial courts that have general jurisdiction as to subject matter may be called county, district, superior, or circuit courts.¹⁵ State trial courts of general jurisdiction have jurisdiction over a wide variety of subjects, including both civil disputes and criminal prosecutions. In some states, trial courts of general jurisdiction may hear appeals from courts of limited jurisdiction.

Courts of limited jurisdiction as to subject matter are often called special inferior trial courts or minor judiciary courts. Small claims courts are inferior trial courts that hear only civil cases involving claims of less than a certain amount, such as $5,000 (the amount varies from state to state). Suits brought in small claims courts are generally conducted informally, and lawyers are not required (in a few states, lawyers are not even allowed). Decisions of small claims courts and municipal courts may sometimes be appealed to a state trial court of general jurisdiction.

Other courts of limited jurisdiction include domestic relations courts, which handle primarily divorce actions and child-custody disputes; local municipal courts, which mainly deal with traffic cases; and probate courts, as mentioned earlier. A few states have also established Islamic law courts, which are courts of limited jurisdiction that serve the American Muslim community.¹⁶

APPELLATE, OR REVIEWING, COURTS Every state has at least one court of appeals (appellate court, or reviewing court), which may be an intermediate appellate court or the state's highest court. About three-fourths of the states have intermediate appellate courts. Generally, courts of appeals do not conduct new trials, in which evidence is submitted to the court and witnesses are examined. Rather, an appellate court panel of three or more judges reviews the record of the case on appeal, which includes a transcript of the trial proceedings, and then determines whether the trial court committed an error.

Usually, appellate courts focus on questions of law, not questions of fact. A question of fact deals with what really happened in regard to the dispute being tried—such as whether a party actually burned a flag. A question of law concerns the application or interpretation of the law—such as whether flag-burning is a form of speech protected by the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Only a judge, not a jury, can rule on questions of law. Appellate courts normally defer (or give weight) to the trial court's findings on questions of fact because the trial court judge and jury were in a better position to evaluate testimony—by directly observing witnesses’ gestures, demeanor, and other nonverbal behavior during the trial. At the appellate level, the judges review the written transcript of the trial, which does not include these nonverbal elements. Thus, an appellate court will not tamper with a trial court’s finding of fact unless it is clearly erroneous (contrary to the evidence presented at trial) or when there is no evidence to support the finding.

15. The name in Ohio and Pennsylvania is Court of Common Pleas; the name in New York is Supreme Court, Trial Division.

16. See, for example, Jabri v. Qaddura, 108 S.W.3d 404 (Tex.App.—Fort Worth 2003); Abd Alla v. Mourssi, 680 N.W.2d 569 (Minn. App. 2004).

HIGHEST STATE COURTS The highest appellate court in a state is usually called the supreme court but may be designated by some other name. For example, in both New York and Maryland, the highest state court is called the Court of Appeals. The highest state court in Maine and Massachusetts is the Supreme Judicial Court, and in West Virginia, it is the Supreme Court of Appeals.

The decisions of each state’s highest court on all questions of state law are final. Only when issues of federal law are involved can the United States Supreme Court overrule a decision made by a state’s highest court. For example, suppose that a city ordinance prohibits citizens from engaging in door-to-door advocacy without first registering with the mayor’s office and receiving a permit. Further suppose that a religious group sues the city, arguing that the law violates the freedoms of speech and religion guaranteed by the First Amendment. If the state supreme court upholds the law, the group could appeal the decision to the United States Supreme Court—because a constitutional (federal) issue is involved.

The Federal Court System

The federal court system is basically a three-tiered model consisting of (1) U.S. district courts (trial courts of general jurisdiction) and various courts of limited jurisdiction, (2) U.S. courts of appeals (intermediate courts of appeals), and (3) the United States Supreme Court.

Unlike state court judges, who are usually elected, federal court judges—including the justices of the Supreme Court—are appointed by the president of the United States, subject to confirmation by the U.S. Senate. All federal judges receive lifetime appointments under Article III of the U.S. Constitution, which states that federal judges “hold their offices during good Behaviour.” In the entire history of the United States, only seven federal judges have been removed from office through impeachment proceedings.

U.S. DISTRICT COURTS At the federal level, the equivalent of a state trial court of general jurisdiction is the district court. U.S. district courts have original jurisdiction in matters involving a federal question and concurrent jurisdiction with state courts when diversity jurisdiction exists. Federal cases typically originate in district courts. There are other federal courts with original, but special (or limited), jurisdiction, such as the federal bankruptcy courts and others shown in Exhibit 2–2.

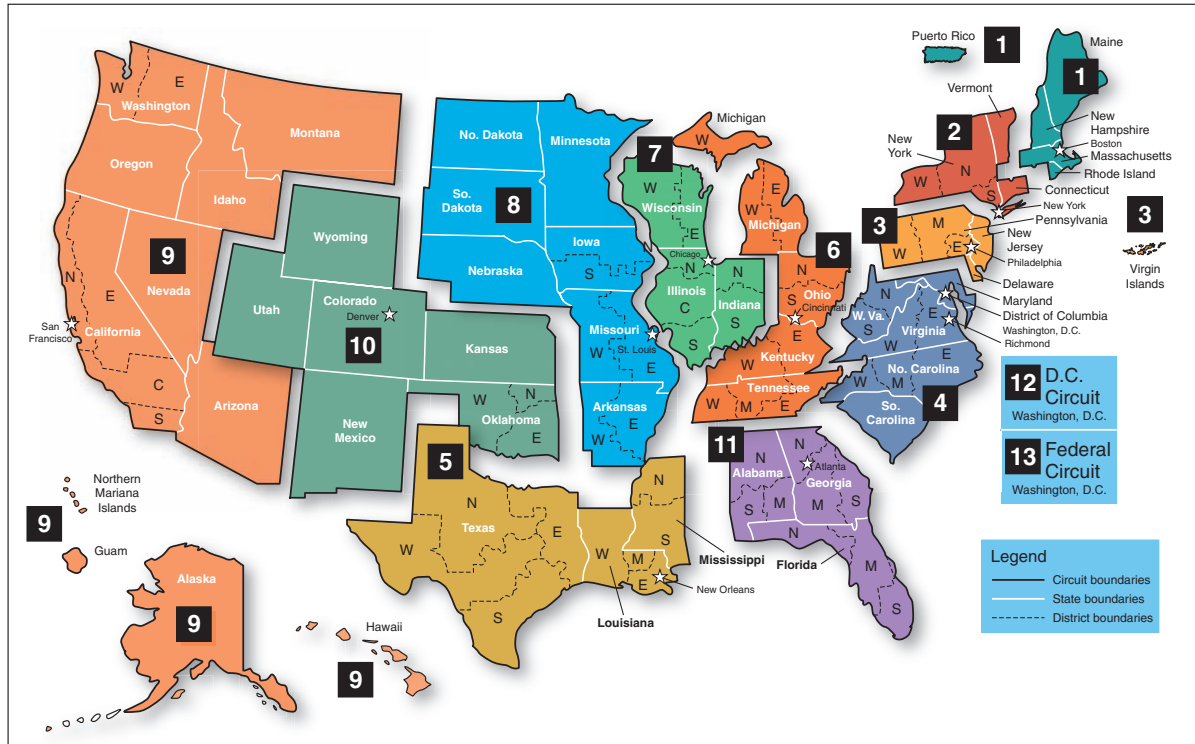

There is at least one federal district court in every state. The number of judicial districts can vary over time, primarily owing to population changes and corresponding changes in caseloads. Today, there are ninety-four federal judicial districts. Exhibit 2–3 on the following page shows the boundaries of both the U.S. district courts and the U.S. courts of appeals (discussed next).

U.S. COURTS OF APPEALS In the federal court system, there are thirteen U.S. courts of appeals—referred to as U.S. circuit courts of appeals. Twelve of the federal courts of appeals (including the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit) hear appeals from the federal district courts located within their respective judicial circuits, or geographic boundaries (shown in Exhibit 2–3).¹⁷ The Court of Appeals for the Thirteenth Circuit, called the Federal Circuit, has national appellate jurisdiction over certain types of cases, such as those involving patent law and those in which the U.S. government is a defendant. The decisions of a circuit court of appeals are binding on all courts within the circuit court’s jurisdiction and are final in most cases, but appeal to the United States Supreme Court is possible.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT At the highest level in the three-tiered federal court system is the United States Supreme Court. According to the language of Article III of the U.S. Constitution, there is only one national Supreme Court. All other courts in the federal system are considered “inferior.” Congress is empowered to create other inferior courts as it deems necessary. The inferior courts that Congress has created include the second tier in our model—the U.S. circuit courts of appeals—as well as the district courts and the various federal courts of limited, or specialized, jurisdiction.

17. Historically, judges were required to “ride the circuit” and hear appeals in different courts around the country, which is how the name “circuit court” came about.

EXHIBIT 2-3 • Geographic Boundaries of the U.S. Courts of Appeals and U.S. District Courts

Source: Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

The United States Supreme Court consists of nine justices. Although the Supreme Court has original, or trial, jurisdiction in rare instances (set forth in Article III, Sections 1 and 2), most of its work is as an appeals court. The Supreme Court can review any case decided by any of the federal courts of appeals, and it also has appellate authority over cases involving federal questions that have been decided in the state courts. The Supreme Court is the final arbiter of the Constitution and federal law.

Appeals to the Supreme Court. To bring a case before the Supreme Court, a party requests the Court to issue a writ of certiorari.¹⁸ A writ of certiorari is an order issued by the Supreme Court to a lower court requiring the latter to send it the record of the case for review. The Court will not issue a writ unless at least four of the nine justices approve of it. This is called the rule of four. Whether the Court will issue a writ of certiorari is entirely within its discretion, and most petitions for writs are denied. (Thousands of cases are filed with the Supreme Court each year, yet it hears, on average, fewer than one hundred of these cases.)¹⁹ A denial of the request to issue a writ of certiorari is not a decision on the merits of a case, nor does it indicate agreement with the lower court's opinion. Also, denial of the writ has no value as a precedent. Denial simply means that the lower court's decision remains the law in that jurisdiction.

Petitions Granted by the Court. Typically, the Court grants petitions in cases that raise important constitutional questions or when the lower courts have issued conflicting decisions on a significant issue. The justices, however, never explain their reasons for hearing certain cases and not others, so it is difficult to predict which type of case the Court might select.

See Concept Summary 2.2 to review the various types of courts in the federal and state court systems.

19. From the mid-1950s through the early 1990s, the Supreme Court reviewed more cases per year than it has since then. In the Court's 1982–1983 term, for example, the Court issued written opinions in 151 cases. In contrast, during the Court's 2009–2010 term, the Court issued written opinions in only 92 cases.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 2.2

Types of Courts

Type of Court	Description
Trial Courts	Trial courts are courts of original jurisdiction in which actions are initiated. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> State courts—Courts of general jurisdiction can hear any case that has not been specifically designated for another court; courts of limited jurisdiction include, among others, domestic relations courts, probate courts, municipal courts, and small claims courts. Federal courts—The federal district court is the equivalent of the state trial court. Federal courts of limited jurisdiction include the bankruptcy courts and others shown in Exhibit 2–2 on page 38.
Intermediate Appellate Courts	Courts of appeals are reviewing courts; generally, appellate courts do not have original jurisdiction. About three-fourths of the states have intermediate appellate courts; in the federal court system, the U.S. circuit courts of appeals are the intermediate appellate courts.
Supreme Courts	The highest state court is that state's supreme court, although it may be called by some other name. Appeal from state supreme courts to the United States Supreme Court is possible only if a federal question is involved. The United States Supreme Court is the highest court in the federal court system and the final arbiter of the Constitution and federal law.

ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION

Litigation—the process of resolving a dispute through the court system—is expensive and time consuming. Litigating even the simplest complaint is costly, and because of the backlog of cases pending in many courts, several years may pass before a case is actually tried. For these and other reasons, more and more businesspersons are turning to alternative dispute resolution (ADR) as a means of settling their disputes.

The great advantage of ADR is its flexibility. Methods of ADR range from the parties sitting down together and attempting to work out their differences to multinational corporations agreeing to resolve a dispute through a formal hearing before a panel of experts. Normally, the parties themselves can control how they will attempt to settle their dispute, what procedures will be used, whether a neutral third party will be present or make a decision, and whether that decision will be legally binding or nonbinding. ADR also offers more privacy than court proceedings and allows disputes to be resolved relatively quickly.

Today, more than 90 percent of civil lawsuits are settled before trial using some form of ADR. Indeed, most states either require or encourage parties to undertake ADR prior to trial. Many federal courts have instituted ADR programs as well. In the following pages, we examine the basic forms of ADR. Keep in mind, though, that new methods of ADR—and new combinations of existing methods—are constantly being devised and employed.

Negotiation

The simplest form of ADR is negotiation, a process in which the parties attempt to settle their dispute informally, with or without attorneys to represent them. Attorneys frequently advise their clients to negotiate a settlement voluntarily before they proceed to trial. Parties may even try to negotiate a settlement during a trial or after the trial but before an appeal. Negotiation traditionally involves just the parties themselves and (typically) their attorneys. The attorneys, though, are advocates—they are obligated to put their clients' interests first.

Mediation

In mediation, a neutral third party acts as a mediator and works with both sides in the dispute to facilitate a resolution. The mediator normally talks with the parties separately as well as jointly, emphasizes points of agreement, and helps the parties to evaluate their options. Although the mediator may propose a solution (called a mediator's proposal), he or she does not make a decision resolving the matter. The mediator, who need not be a lawyer, usually charges a fee for his or her services (which can be split between the parties). States that require parties to undergo ADR before trial often offer mediation as one of the ADR options or (as in Florida) the only option.

One of the biggest advantages of mediation is that it is less adversarial in nature than litigation. In mediation, the mediator takes an active role and attempts to bring the parties together so that they can come to a mutually satisfactory resolution. The mediation process tends to reduce the antagonism between the disputants, allowing them to resume their former relationship while minimizing hostility. For this reason, mediation is often the preferred form of ADR for disputes between business partners, employers and employees, or other parties involved in long-term relationships.

Arbitration

A more formal method of ADR is arbitration, in which an arbitrator (a neutral third party or a panel of experts) hears a dispute and imposes a resolution on the parties. Arbitration differs from other forms of ADR in that the third party hearing the dispute makes a decision for the parties. Exhibit 2-4 outlines the basic differences among the three traditional forms of ADR. Usually, the parties in arbitration agree that the third party's decision will be legally binding, although the parties can also agree to non-binding arbitration. (Arbitration that is mandated by the courts often is not binding on the parties.) In nonbinding arbitration, the parties can go forward with a lawsuit if they do not agree with the arbitrator's decision.

THE ARBITRATION PROCESS In some respects, formal arbitration resembles a trial, although usually the procedural rules are much less restrictive than those governing litigation. In a typical arbitration, the parties present opening arguments and ask for specific remedies. Evidence is then presented, and witnesses may be called and examined by both sides. The arbitrator then renders a decision, called an award.

An arbitrator's award is usually the final word on the matter. Although the parties may appeal an arbitrator's decision, a court's review of the decision will be much more restricted in scope than an appellate court's review of a trial court's decision. The general view is that because the parties were free to frame the issues and set the powers of the arbitrator at the outset, they cannot complain about the results. The award will be set aside only if the arbitrator's conduct or "bad faith" substantially prejudiced the rights of Arbitration	The parties present their arguments and evidence before an arbitrator at a hearing, and the arbitrator renders a decision resolving the parties' dispute. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. This ADR method is the most formal and resembles a court proceeding because some rules of evidence apply. 2. The parties are free to frame the issues and set the powers of the arbitrator. 3. one of the parties, if the award violates an established public policy, or if the arbitrator exceeded her or his powers (by arbitrating issues that the parties did not agree to submit to arbitration).

ARBITRATION CLAUSES AND STATUTES Almost any commercial matter can be submitted to arbitration. Frequently, parties include an arbitration clause in a contract (a written agreement—see Chapter 10) specifying that any dispute arising under the contract will be resolved through arbitration rather than through the court system. Parties can also agree to arbitrate a dispute after it arises.

Most states have statutes (often based, in part, on the Uniform Arbitration Act of 1955) under which arbitration clauses will be enforced, and some state statutes compel arbitration of certain types of disputes, such as those involving public employees. At the federal level, the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA), enacted in 1925, enforces arbitration clauses in contracts involving maritime activity and interstate commerce. Because of the breadth of the commerce clause (see Chapter 4), arbitration agreements involving transactions only slightly connected to the flow of interstate commerce may fall under the FAA. The FAA established a national policy favoring arbitration.

CASE IN POINT Buckeye Check Cashing, Inc., cashes personal checks for consumers in Florida. Buckeye would agree to delay submitting a consumer's check for payment if the consumer paid a "finance charge." For each transaction, the consumer signed an agreement that included an arbitration clause. A group of consumers filed a lawsuit claiming that Buckeye was charging an illegally high rate of interest in violation of state law. Buckeye filed a motion to compel arbitration, which the trial court denied, and the case was appealed. The plaintiffs argued that the entire contract—including the arbitration clause—was illegal and therefore arbitration was not required. The United States Supreme Court found that the arbitration provision was severable, or capable of being separated, from the rest of the contract. The Court held that when the challenge is to the validity of a contract as a whole, and not specifically to an arbitration clause within the contract, an arbitrator must resolve the dispute. This is true even if the contract later proves to be unenforceable, because the FAA established a national policy favoring arbitration and that policy extends to both federal and state courts.²⁰

THE ISSUE OF ARBITRABILITY When a dispute arises as to whether the parties to a contract with an arbitration clause have agreed to submit a particular matter to arbitration, one party may file a lawsuit to compel arbitration. The court before which the suit is brought will decide not the basic controversy but rather the issue of arbitrability—that is, whether the matter is one that must be resolved through arbitration. If the court finds that the subject matter in controversy is covered by the agreement to arbitrate, then a party may be compelled to arbitrate the dispute. Usually, a court will allow the claim to be arbitrated if the court, in interpreting the relevant statute (the state arbitration statute or the FAA), can find no legislative intent to the contrary.

No party, however, will be ordered to submit a particular dispute to arbitration unless the court is convinced that the party has consented to do so. Additionally, the courts will not compel arbitration if it is clear that the prescribed arbitration rules and procedures are inherently unfair to one of the parties.

The terms of an arbitration agreement can limit the types of disputes that the parties agree to arbitrate. When the parties do not specify limits, however, disputes can arise as to whether the particular matter is covered by the arbitration agreement, and it is up to the court to resolve the issue of arbitrability.

In the following case, the parties had previously agreed to arbitrate disputes involving their contract to develop software, but the dispute involved claims of copyright infringement (see Chapter 8). The question was whether the copyright infringement claims were beyond the scope of the arbitration clause.

NCR Corp. v. Korala Associates, Ltd.

United States Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 512 F.3d 807 (2008).

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 2.3 CONTINUED ♦ By an electric motor. By 1914, the company had developed one of the first automated credit systems. By the 1950s, NCR had branched out into transistorized business computers, and later it expanded into liquid crystal displays and data warehousing. Today, NCR is a worldwide provider of automated teller machines (ATMs), integrated hardware and software systems, and related maintenance and support services. More than 300,000 NCR ATMs are installed throughout the world.

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • To upgrade the security of its ATMs, NCR developed a software solution to install in all of its machines. At the same time, Korala Associates, Ltd. (KAL), claimed to have developed a similar security upgrade for NCR's ATMs. Indeed, KAL had entered into a contract with NCR in 1998 (the "1998 Agreement") to develop such software. To facilitate that process, NCR had loaned to KAL a proprietary ATM that contained copyrighted software called APTRA XFS. NCR alleged that KAL had "obtained access to, made unauthorized use of, and engaged in unauthorized copying of the APTRA XFS software." NCR further claimed that KAL had developed its version of the security upgrade only by engaging in this unauthorized activity. When NCR brought a suit claiming copyright infringement, KAL moved to compel arbitration under the terms of the 1998 Agreement. At trial, KAL prevailed. NCR appealed the order compelling arbitration.

Chief Justice BATCHELDER delivered the opinion of the court.

* * * *

The arbitration clause contained within the 1998 Agreement provides that:

Any controversy or claim arising out of or relating to this contract, or breach thereof, shall be settled by arbitration and judgment upon the award rendered by the arbitrator may be entered in any court having jurisdiction thereof. The arbitrator shall be appointed upon the mutual agreement of both parties failing which both parties will agree to be subject to any arbitrator that shall be chosen by the President of the Law Society.

The parties do not dispute that a valid agreement to arbitrate exists; rather the issue of contention is whether NCR's claims fall within the substantive scope of the agreement.

As a matter of federal law, any doubts concerning the scope of arbitrable issues should be resolved in favor of arbitration. Despite this strong presumption in favor of arbitration, "arbitration is a matter of contract between the parties, and one cannot be required to submit to arbitration a dispute which it has not agreed to submit to arbitration." When faced with a broad arbitration clause, such as one covering any dispute arising out of an agreement, a court should follow the presumption of arbitration and resolve doubts in favor of arbitration. Indeed, in such a case, only an express provision excluding a specific dispute, or the most forceful evidence of a purpose to exclude the claim from arbitration, will remove the dispute from consideration by the arbitrators. [Emphasis added.]

* * * It is sufficient that a court would have to reference the 1998 Agreement for part of NCR's direct [copyright] infringement claim. Under these circumstances, we find that the copyright infringement claim as to APTRA XFS falls within the scope of the arbitration agreement.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit affirmed the part of the district court's decision compelling arbitration of NCR's claims of direct copyright infringement relating to the APTRA XFS software.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Why did NCR not want its claims decided by arbitration?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Could NCR have a claim that KAL engaged in unfair competition because KAL engaged in unethical business practices? (Hint: Unfair competition may occur when one party deceives the public into believing that its goods are the goods of another.) Why or why not?

MANDATORY ARBITRATION IN THE EMPLOYMENT CONTEXT A significant question in the last several years has concerned mandatory arbitration clauses in employment contracts. Many claim that employees' rights are not sufficiently protected when they are forced, as a condition of being hired, to agree to arbitrate all disputes and thus waive their rights under statutes specifically designed to protect employees.

The United States Supreme Court, however, has held that mandatory arbitration clauses in employment contracts are generally enforceable.²¹

Compulsory arbitration agreements often spell out the rules for a mandatory proceeding. For example, an agreement may address in detail the amount and payment of filing fees and other expenses. Some courts have overturned provisions in employment-related agreements that require the parties to split the costs when an individual worker lacks the ability to pay.²²

Other Types of ADR

The three forms of ADR just discussed are the oldest and traditionally the most commonly used forms. As mentioned earlier, a variety of new types of ADR have emerged in recent years, including those described here.

1. In early neutral case evaluation, the parties select a neutral third party (generally an expert in the subject matter of the dispute) to evaluate their respective positions. The parties explain their positions to the case evaluator, and the case evaluator assesses the strengths and weaknesses of each party's claims.
2. In a mini-trial, each party's attorney briefly argues the party's case before the other and a panel of representatives from each side who have the authority to settle the dispute. Typically, a neutral third party (usually an expert in the area being disputed) acts as an adviser. If the parties fail to reach an agreement, the adviser renders an opinion as to how a court would likely decide the issue.
3. Numerous federal courts now hold summary jury trials, in which the parties present their arguments and evidence and the jury renders a verdict. The jury's verdict is not binding, but it does act as a guide to both sides in reaching an agreement during the mandatory negotiations that immediately follow the trial.
4. Other alternatives being employed by the courts include summary procedures for commercial litigation and the appointment of special masters to assist judges in deciding complex issues.

Providers of ADR Services

Both government agencies and private organizations provide ADR services. A major provider of ADR services is the American Arbitration Association (AAA), which was founded in 1926 and now handles more than 200,000 claims a year in its numerous offices around the country. Cases brought before the AAA are heard by an expert or a panel of experts in the area relating to the dispute and are usually settled quickly. Generally, about half of the panel members are lawyers. To cover its costs, the AAA charges a fee, paid by the party filing the claim. In addition, each party to the dispute pays a specified amount for each hearing day, as well as a special additional fee in cases involving personal injuries or property loss.

Hundreds of for-profit firms around the country also provide dispute-resolution services. Typically, these firms hire retired judges to conduct arbitration hearings or otherwise assist parties in settling their disputes. The judges follow procedures similar to those of the federal courts and use similar rules. Usually, each party to the dispute pays a filing fee and a designated fee for a hearing session or conference.

Online Dispute Resolution

An increasing number of companies and organizations are offering dispute-resolution services using the Internet. The settlement of disputes in these online forums is known as online dispute resolution (ODR). The disputes resolved in these forums have most commonly involved rights to domain names (Web site addresses—see Chapter 8) or the quality of goods sold via the Internet, including goods sold through Internet auction sites.

ODR may be best for resolving small- to medium-sized business liability claims, which may not be worth the expense of litigation or traditional ADR methods. Rules being developed in online forums, however, may ultimately become a code of conduct for everyone who does business in cyberspace. Most online forums do not automatically apply the law of any specific jurisdiction. Instead, results are often based on general, more universal legal principles. As with offline methods of dispute resolution, any party may appeal to a court at any time if the ODR is nonbinding arbitration.

Some cities use ODR as a means of resolving claims against them. For example, New York City hires an ODR provider called Cybersettle to resolve auto accident, sidewalk, and other personal-injury claims made against the city.

22. See, for example, Davis v. O'Melveny & Myers, LLC, 485 F.3d 1066 (9th Cir. 2007); and Nagrampa v. MailCoups, Inc., 469 F.3d 1257 (9th Cir. 2006).

INTERNATIONAL DISPUTE RESOLUTION

Businesspersons who engage in international business transactions normally take special precautions to protect themselves in the event that a party with whom they are dealing in another country breaches an agreement. Often, parties to international contracts include special clauses in their contracts providing for how disputes arising under the contracts will be resolved.

Forum-Selection and Choice-of-Law Clauses

As you will read in Chapter 19, parties to international transactions often include forum-selection and choice-of-law clauses in their contracts. These clauses designate the jurisdiction (court or country) where any dispute arising under the contract will be litigated and which nation's law will be applied. When an international contract does not include such clauses, any legal proceedings arising under the contract will be more complex and attended by much more uncertainty. For example, litigation may take place in two or more countries, with each country applying its own national law to the particular transactions.

Furthermore, even if a plaintiff wins a favorable judgment in a lawsuit litigated in the plaintiff's country, the defendant's country could refuse to enforce the court's judgment. As will be discussed in Chapter 23, for reasons of courtesy, the judgment may be enforced in the defendant's country, particularly if the defendant's country is the United States and the foreign court's decision is consistent with U.S. national law and policy. Other nations, however, may not be as accommodating as the United States, and the plaintiff may be left empty handed.

Arbitration Clauses

International contracts also often include arbitration clauses that require a neutral third party to decide any contract disputes. In international arbitration proceedings, the third party may be a neutral entity (such as the International Chamber of Commerce), a panel of individuals representing both parties' interests, or some other group or organization. The United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards²³—which has been implemented in more than 144 countries, including the United States—assists in the enforcement of arbitration clauses, as do provisions in specific treaties among nations. The American Arbitration Association provides arbitration services for international as well as domestic disputes.

REVIEWING

Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

Stan Garner resides in Illinois and promotes boxing matches for SuperSports, Inc., an Illinois corporation. Garner created the concept of "Ages" promotion—a three-fight series of boxing matches pitting an older fighter (George Foreman) against a younger fighter. The concept had titles for each of the three fights, including "Battle of the Ages." Garner contacted Foreman and his manager, who both reside in Texas, to sell the idea, and they arranged a meeting in Las Vegas, Nevada. During the negotiations, Foreman's manager signed a nondisclosure agreement prohibiting him from disclosing Garner's promotional concepts unless the parties signed a contract. Nevertheless, after negotiations fell through, Foreman used Garner's "Battle of the Ages" concept to promote a subsequent fight. Garner filed a suit against Foreman and his manager in a federal district court located in Illinois, alleging breach of contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. On what basis might the federal district court in Illinois exercise jurisdiction in this case?
2. Does the federal district court have original or appellate jurisdiction?
3. Suppose that Garner had filed his action in an Illinois state court. Could an Illinois state court exercise personal jurisdiction over Foreman or his manager? Why or why not?
4. Assume that Garner had filed his action in a Nevada state court. Would that court have had personal jurisdiction over Foreman or his manager? Explain.

DEBATE THIS: In this age of the Internet, when people communicate via e-mail, instant text messaging, tweeting, Facebook, and MySpace, is the concept of jurisdiction losing its meaning? Explain your answer.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

2-1. Standing Jack and Maggie Turton bought a house in Jefferson County, Idaho, located directly across the street from a gravel pit. A few years later, the county converted the pit to a landfill. The landfill accepted many kinds of trash that cause harm to the environment, including major appliances, animal carcasses, containers with hazardous content warnings, leaking car batteries, and waste oil. The Turtons complained to the county, but the county did nothing. The Turtons then filed a lawsuit against the county alleging violations of federal environmental laws pertaining to groundwater contamination and other pollution. Do the Turtons have standing to sue? Why or why not?

2-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Appellate Review.

The defendant in a lawsuit is appealing the trial court's decision in favor of the plaintiff. On appeal, the defendant claims that the evidence presented at trial to support the plaintiff's claim was so scanty that no reasonable jury could have found for the plaintiff. Therefore, argues the defendant, the appellate court should reverse the trial court's decision. Will an appellate court ever reverse a trial court's findings with respect to questions of fact? Discuss fully.

- For a sample answer to Question 2-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

2-3. Jurisdiction Marya Callais, a citizen of Florida, was walking along a busy street in Tallahassee, Florida, when a large crate flew off a passing truck and hit her, causing numerous injuries. She experienced a great deal of pain and suffering, incurred significant medical expenses, and could not work for six months. She wants to sue the trucking firm for $300,000 in damages. The firm's headquarters are in Georgia, although the company does business in Florida. In what court might Callais bring suit—a Florida state court, a Georgia state court, or a federal court? What factors might influence her decision?

2-4. Jurisdiction Xcentric Ventures, LLC, is an Arizona firm that operates the Web sites RipOffReport.com and BadBusinessBureau.com. Visitors to the sites can buy a copy of a book titled Do-It-Yourself Guide: How to Get Rip-Off Revenge. The price ($21.95) includes shipping to anywhere in the United States, including Illinois, to which thirteen copies have been shipped. The sites accept donations and feature postings by individuals who claim to have been “ripped off.” Some visitors posted comments about George S. May International Co., a management consulting firm. The postings alleged fraud, larceny, possession of child pornography, and possession of controlled substances (illegal drugs). May filed a suit in a federal district court in Illinois against Xcentric and others, charging, among other things, “false descriptions and representations.” The defendants filed a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. What is the standard for exercising jurisdiction over a party whose only connection to a jurisdiction is over the Web? How would that standard apply in this case? Explain. [George S. May International Co. v. Xcentric Ventures, LLC, 409 F.Supp.2d 1052 (N.D.Ill. 2006)]

2-5. Jurisdiction In 2001, Raul Leal, the owner and operator of Texas Labor Contractors in East Texas, contacted Poverty Point Produce, Inc., which operates a sweet potato farm in West Carroll Parish, Louisiana, and offered to provide field workers. Poverty Point accepted the offer. Jeffrey Brown, an owner of and field manager for the farm, told Leal the number of workers needed and gave him forms for them to fill out and sign. Leal placed an ad in a newspaper in Brownsville, Texas. Job applicants were directed to Leal's car dealership in Weslaco, Texas, where they were told the details of the work. Leal recruited, among others, Elias Moreno, who lives in the Rio Grande Valley in Texas, and transported Moreno and the others to Poverty Point's farm. At the farm, Leal's brother Jesse oversaw the work with instructions from Brown, lived with the workers in the on-site housing, and gave them their paychecks. When the job was done, the workers were returned to Texas. Moreno and others filed a suit in a federal district court against Poverty Point and others, alleging, in part, violations of Texas state law related to the work. Poverty Point filed a motion to dismiss the suit on the ground that the court did not have personal jurisdiction. All of the meetings between Poverty Point and the Leals occurred in Louisiana. All of the farmwork was done in Louisiana. Poverty Point has no offices, bank accounts, or phone listings in Texas. It does not advertise or solicit business in Texas. Despite these facts, can the court exercise personal jurisdiction? Explain. [Moreno v. Poverty Point Produce, Inc., 243 F.R.D. 275 (S.D.Tex. 2007)]

2-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Arbitration Clause.

Kathleen Lowden sued cellular phone company T-Mobile USA, Inc., contending that its service agreements were not enforceable under Washington state law. Lowden requested that the court allow a class-action suit, in which her claims would extend to similarly affected customers. She contended that T-Mobile had improperly charged her fees beyond the advertised price of service and charged her for roaming calls that should not have been classified as roaming. T-Mobile moved to force arbitration in accordance with the provisions that were clearly set forth in the service agreement. The agreement also specified that no class-action suit could be brought, so T-Mobile also asked the court to dismiss the request for a class-action suit. Was T-Mobile correct that Lowden's only course of action was to file arbitration personally? Why or why not? [Lowden v. T-Mobile USA, Inc., 512 F.3d 1213 (9th Cir. 2008)]

2-7. Arbitration Thomas Baker and others who bought new homes from Osborne Development Corp. sued for multiple defects in the houses they purchased. When Osborne sold the homes, it paid for them to be in a new home warranty program administered by Home Buyers Warranty (HBW). When the company enrolled a home with HBW, it paid a fee and filled out a form that stated the following: "By signing below, you acknowledge that you . . . CONSENT TO THE TERMS OF THESE DOCUMENTS INCLUDING THE BINDING ARBITRATION PROVISION contained therein." HBW then issued warranty booklets to the new homeowners that stated: "Any and all claims, disputes and controversies by or between the Homeowner, the Builder, the Warranty Insurer and/or HBW . . . shall be submitted to arbitration." Were the new homeowners bound by the arbitration agreement, or could they sue the builder, Osborne, in court? Explain. [Baker v. Osborne Development Corp., 159 Cal.App.4th 884, 71 Cal.Rptr.3d 854 (Cal.App. 2008)]

2-8. Arbitration PRM Energy Systems, Inc. (PRM), owned technology patents that it licensed to Primenergy to use and to sublicense in the United States. The agreement stated that all disputes would be settled by arbitration. Kobe Steel of Japan was interested in using the technology at its U.S. subsidiary. PRM directed Kobe to talk to Primenergy about that. Kobe talked to PRM directly about using the technology in Japan, but no agreement was reached. Primenergy then agreed to let Kobe use the technology in Japan without telling PRM. The dispute between PRM and Primenergy about Kobe went to arbitration, as required by the license agreement. In addition, PRM sued Primenergy for fraud and theft of trade secrets. PRM also sued Kobe for using the technology in Japan without its permission. The district court ruled that PRM had to take all complaints about Primenergy to arbitration. PRM also had to take its complaint about Kobe to arbitration because the complaint involved a sublicense Kobe was granted by Primenergy. PRM appealed, contending that the fraud and theft of trade secrets went beyond the license agreement with Primenergy and that Kobe had no right to demand arbitration because it never had a right to use the technology under a license from PRM. Is PRM correct, or must all matters go to arbitration? Why or why not? [PRM Energy Systems, Inc. v. Primenergy, 592 F.3d 830 (8th Cir. 2010)]

2-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Agreement to Arbitrate.

Nellie Lumpkin, who suffered from various illnesses, including dementia, was admitted to the Picayune Convalescent Center, a nursing home. Because of her mental condition, her daughter, Beverly McDaniel, filled out the admissions paperwork and signed the admissions agreement. It included a clause requiring parties to submit to arbitration any disputes that arose. After Lumpkin left the center two years later, she sued, through her husband, for negligent treatment and malpractice during her stay. The center moved to force the matter to arbitration. The trial court held that the arbitration agreement was not enforceable. The center appealed. [Covenant Health & Rehabilitation of Picayune, LP v. Lumpkin, 23 So.3d 1092 (Miss.App. 2009)]

- Should a dispute involving medical malpractice be forced into arbitration? This is a claim of negligent care, not a breach of a commercial contract. Is it ethical for medical facilities to impose such a requirement? Is there really any bargaining over such terms?
- Should a person with limited mental capacity be held to the arbitration clause agreed to by the next-of-kin who signed on behalf of that person?

Court Procedures

American and English courts follow the adversarial system of justice. Although parties are allowed to represent themselves in court (called pro se representation),¹ most parties to lawsuits hire attorneys to represent them. Each lawyer acts as his or her client's advocate, presenting the client's version of the facts in such a way as to convince the judge (or the judge and jury, in a jury trial) that this version is correct.

1. This right was definitively established in Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 95 S.Ct. 2525, 45 L.Ed.2d 562 (1975).

Most of the judicial procedures that you will read about in the following pages are rooted in the adversarial framework of the American legal system. In this chapter, after a brief overview of judicial procedures, we illustrate the steps involved in a lawsuit with a hypothetical civil case (criminal procedures will be discussed in Chapter 9).

PROCEDURAL RULES

The parties to a lawsuit must comply with the procedural rules of the court in which the lawsuit is filed. Although most people, when considering the outcome of a case, think of matters of substantive law, procedural law can have a significant impact on one's ability to assert a legal claim. Procedural rules provide a framework for every dispute and specify what must be done at each stage of the litigation process. Procedural rules are complex, and they vary from court to court and from state to state. There is a set of federal rules of procedure as well as various sets of rules for state courts. Additionally, the applicable procedures will depend on whether the case is a civil or criminal proceeding. All civil trials held in federal district courts are governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (FRCP).²

2. The United States Supreme Court has authority to establish these rules, as spelled out in 28 U.S.C. Sections 2071–2077. Generally, though, the federal judiciary appoints committees that make recommendations to the Supreme Court. The Court then publishes any proposed changes in the rules and allows for public comment before finalizing the rules.

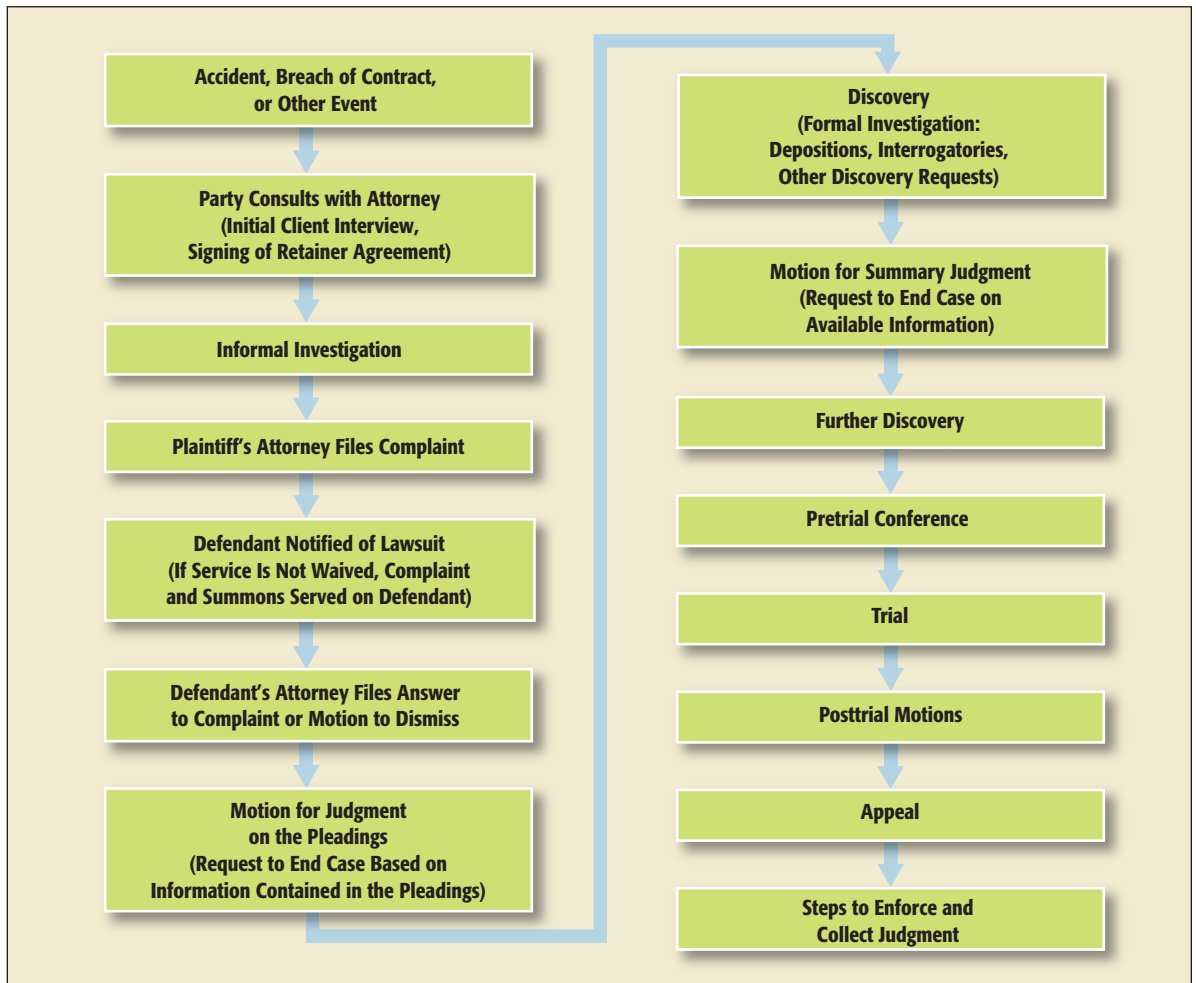

Stages of Litigation

Broadly speaking, the litigation process has three phases: pretrial, trial, and posttrial. Each phase involves specific procedures, as discussed throughout this chapter. Although civil lawsuits may vary greatly in terms of complexity, cost, and detail, they typically progress through the specific stages charted in Exhibit 3–1.

To illustrate the procedures involved in a civil lawsuit, we will use a simple hypothetical case. The case arose from an automobile accident, which occurred when a car driven by Antonio Carvello, a resident of New Jersey, collided with a car driven by Jill Kirby, a resident of New York. The accident took place at an intersection in New York City. Kirby suffered personal injuries, which caused her to incur medical and hospital expenses as well as lost wages for four months. In all, she calculated that the cost to her of the accident was $100,000.³ Carvello and Kirby have been unable to agree on a settlement, and Kirby now must decide whether to sue Carvello for the $100,000 compensation she feels she deserves.

3. In this example, we are ignoring damages for pain and suffering and for permanent disabilities. Often, plaintiffs in personal-injury cases seek such damages.

EXHIBIT 3-1 • Stages in a Typical Lawsuit

The First Step: Consulting with an Attorney

As mentioned, rules of procedure often affect the outcome of a dispute—a fact that highlights the importance of obtaining the advice of counsel. The first step taken by almost anyone contemplating a lawsuit is to seek the guidance of a qualified attorney.⁴ In the hypothetical Kirby-Carvello case, assume that Kirby consults with a lawyer. The attorney will advise her regarding what she can expect in a lawsuit, her probability of success at trial, and the procedures that will be involved. If more than one court would have jurisdiction over the matter, the attorney will also discuss the advantages and disadvantages of filing in a particular court. Depending on the court hearing the case, the attorney will give Kirby an idea of how much time it will take to resolve the dispute through litigation and provide an estimate of the costs involved.

The attorney will also inform Kirby of the legal fees that she will have to pay in an attempt to collect damages from the defendant, Carvello. Attorneys base their fees on such factors as the difficulty of a matter, the amount of time involved, the experience and skill of the attorney in the particular area of the law, and the cost of doing business. In the United States, legal fees range from $175 to $700 per hour or even higher (the average fee per hour is between $200 and $425). In addition, the client is also responsible for paying various expenses related to the case (called “out-of-pocket” costs), including court filing fees, travel expenses, depositions, and the cost of expert witnesses and investigators, for example.

TYPES OF ATTORNEYS' FEES For a particular legal matter, an attorney may charge one type of fee or a combination of several types. Fixed fees may be charged for the performance of such services as drafting a simple will. Hourly fees may be computed for matters that will involve an indeterminate period of time. Any case brought to trial, for example, may involve an expenditure of time that cannot be precisely estimated in advance. Contingency fees are fixed as a percentage (usually between 25 and 40 percent) of a client's recovery in certain types of lawsuits, such as a personal-injury lawsuit.⁵ If the lawsuit is unsuccessful, the attorney receives no fee, but the client will have to reimburse the attorney for any out-of-pocket costs incurred. Because Kirby's claim involves a personal injury, her lawyer will likely take the case on a contingency-fee basis, but she may have to pay an amount up front to cover the court costs. In some cases, the winning party may be able to recover at least some portion of her or his attorneys' fees from the losing party.

SETTLEMENT CONSIDERATIONS Once an attorney has been retained, the attorney is required to pursue a resolution of the matter on the client's behalf. Nevertheless, the amount of energy an attorney will spend on a given case is also determined by the time and funds the client wishes to devote to the process. If the client is willing to pay for a lengthy trial and one or more appeals, the attorney may pursue those actions. Often, however, after learning of the substantial costs that litigation entails, a client may decide to pursue a settlement of the claim. Attempts to settle the case may be ongoing throughout the litigation process.

Another important factor in deciding whether to pursue litigation is the defendant's ability to pay the damages sought. Even if Kirby is awarded damages, it may be difficult to enforce the court's judgment if, for example, the amount exceeds the limits of Carvello's automobile insurance policy. (We will discuss the problems involved in enforcing a judgment later in this chapter.)

SECTION 2 PRETRIAL PROCEDURES

The pretrial litigation process involves the filing of the pleadings, the gathering of evidence (called discovery), and possibly other procedures, such as a pretrial conference and jury selection.

The Pleadings

The complaint and answer (and other legal documents discussed below), taken together, are known as the pleadings. The pleadings inform each party of the other's claims and specify the issues (disputed questions) involved in the case. Because the rules of procedure vary depending on the jurisdiction of the court, the style and form of the pleadings may be different from those shown in this chapter.

THE PLAINTIFF'S COMPLAINT Kirby's action against Carvello commences when her lawyer files a complaint⁶ with the clerk of the appropriate court. The complaint contains a statement alleging (1) the facts showing that the court has subject-matter and personal jurisdiction, (2) the facts establishing the plaintiff's basis for relief, and (3) the remedy the plaintiff is seeking. Complaints can be lengthy or brief, depending on the complexity of the case and the rules of the jurisdiction.

Exhibit 3–2 illustrates how a complaint in the Kirby-Carvello case might appear. The complaint asserts facts indicating that the federal district court has subject-matter jurisdiction because of diversity of citizenship. It then gives a brief statement of the facts of the accident and alleges that Carvello negligently drove his vehicle through a red light, striking Kirby's car and causing serious personal injury and property damage. The complaint goes on to state that Kirby is seeking $100,000 in damages, although in some state civil actions the plaintiff need not specify the amount of damages sought.

Service of Process. Before the court can exercise personal jurisdiction over the defendant (Carvello)—in effect, before the lawsuit can begin—the court must have proof that the defendant was notified of the lawsuit. Formally notifying the defendant of a lawsuit is called service of process. The plaintiff must deliver, or serve, a copy of the complaint and a summons (a notice requiring the defendant to appear in court and answer the complaint) to the defendant. The summons notifies Carvello that he must file an answer to the complaint within a specified time period (twenty days in the federal courts) or suffer a default judgment against him. A default judgment in Kirby's favor

5. Note that attorneys may charge a contingency fee in only certain types of cases and are typically prohibited from entering into this type of fee arrangement in criminal cases, divorce cases, and cases involving the distribution of assets after death.

6. Sometimes, the document filed with the court is called a petition or a declaration instead of a complaint.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK		CIVIL NO. 9-1047
JILL KIRBY Plaintiff,
v.		COMPLAINT
ANTONIO CARVELLO
	Defendant.

The plaintiff brings this cause of action against the defendant, alleging as follows:

1. This action is between the plaintiff, who is a resident of the State of New York, and the defendant, who is a resident of the State of New Jersey. There is diversity of citizenship between the parties.
2. The amount in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeds the sum of $75,000.
3. On September 10th, 2011, the plaintiff, Jill Kirby, was exercising good driving habits and reasonable care in driving her car through the intersection of Boardwalk and Pennsylvania Avenue, New York City, New York, when the defendant, Antonio Carvello, negligently drove his vehicle through a red light at the intersection and collided with the plaintiff's vehicle.
4. As a result of the collision, the plaintiff suffered severe physical injury, which prevented her from working, and property damage to her car.

WHEREFORE, the plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant for the sum of $100,000 plus interest at the maximum legal rate and the costs of this action.

would mean that she would be awarded the damages alleged in her complaint because Carvello failed to respond to the allegations. A typical summons is shown in Exhibit 3-3 on the following page.

Method of Service. How service of process occurs depends on the rules of the court or jurisdiction in which the lawsuit is brought. Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, anyone who is at least eighteen years of age and is not a party to the lawsuit can serve process in federal court cases. In state courts, the process server is often a county sheriff or an employee of an independent company that provides process service in the local area. Usually, the server hands the summons and complaint to the defendant personally or leaves it at the defendant's residence or place of business. In some states, process can be served by mail if the defendant consents (accepts service). When the defendant cannot be reached, special rules provide for alternative means of service, such as publishing a notice in the local newspaper. In some situations, such as when the defendant is in a foreign country, courts have even allowed service of process via e-mail, as long as it

In cases involving corporate defendants, the summons and complaint may be served on an officer or on a registered agent (representative) of the corporation. The name of a corporation's registered agent can usually be obtained from the secretary of state's office in the state where the company incorporated its business (and, frequently, from the secretary of state's office in any state where the corporation does business).

Did the plaintiff in the following case effect proper service of the summons and the complaint on an out-of-state corporation?

Cruz v. Fagor America, Inc.

California Court of Appeal, Fourth District, 146 Cal.App.4th 488, 52 Cal.Rptr.3d 862 (2007).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

AARON, J. [Judge]

* * * *

[Alan] Cruz's parents purchased a pressure cooker from a vendor at the San Diego County Fair [in California] in the summer of 2001. On September 10, 2001, Cruz, who was 16 years old at the time, suffered burns on the left side of his torso and thigh when he attempted to take the lid off of the pressure cooker. Fagor [America, Inc.] is the American distributor of the pressure cooker.

On the date of the incident involving the pressure cooker, Cruz's parents sent an e-mail to Fagor to alert the company about what had occurred.

On June 2, 2003, [Fagor] notified Cruz that it was denying liability.

* * * *

Cruz filed a complaint [in a California state court] against Fagor on December 1, 2004, alleging causes of action for negligence and product liability. On December 14, 2004, Cruz, through his attorney, mailed the summons and complaint to Fagor by certified mail, return receipt requested. The envelope was addressed to “Patricio Barriga, Chairman of the Board, FAGOR AMERICA, INC., A Delaware Corporation, 1099 Wall Street, Lyndhurst, NJ 07071-3678.”

The return receipt indicates that it was signed by an individual named Tina Hayes on December 22. Fagor did not file an answer.

* * * *

A default judgment [a judgment entered against a defendant who fails to answer or respond to the plaintiff’s complaint] in the amount of $259,114.50 was entered against Fagor on May 31, 2005.

Fagor did not make an appearance in the matter until November 29, 2005, when Fagor’s attorneys * * * [filed] a motion to set aside the entry of default and default judgment.

* * * *

* * * On February 1, the trial court granted the motion. Cruz [appealed to a state intermediate appellate court] on February 16.

* * * *

* * * The trial court found that service was not effected because there was no proof that the summons and complaint (1) were served on Fagor’s designated agent for service; (2) were delivered to the president or other officer, manager, or person authorized to receive service in accordance with [California Civil Procedure Code Section] 416.10; or (3) were served in accordance with [California] Corporations Code Section 2110, which provides for service on a foreign corporation by hand delivery to an officer or designated agent for service of process.

* * * [But] the proofs of service demonstrate that Cruz served Fagor, an out-of-state corporation, in accordance with [California Civil Procedure Code Section] 415.40. Section 415.40 provides in pertinent part:

A summons may be served on a person outside this state in any manner provided by this article or by sending a copy of the summons and of the complaint to the person to be served by first-class mail, postage prepaid, requiring a return receipt.

Because Fagor is a corporate entity, Cruz was also required to comply with the mandates of Section 416.10. That section details how a plaintiff is to serve a summons on a corporate defendant and provides in relevant part:

A summons may be served on a corporation by delivering a copy of the summons and of the complaint: * * * To the president or other head of the corporation, a vice president, a secretary or assistant secretary, a treasurer or assistant treasurer, a general manager, or a person authorized by the corporation to receive service of process.

* * * *

A number of documents in the record establish that Cruz properly served Fagor with process pursuant to California’s statutory requirements. The first is a Judicial Counsel of California proof of service form, completed and signed by Cruz’s attorney, Harold Thompson. In that form, Thompson states that the summons and complaint were addressed and mailed to Patricio Barriga, the president of Fagor, at 1099 Wall Street, Lyndhurst, New Jersey 07071-3678, which is the address Fagor listed in 2003 with the New York State Department of State—Division of Corporations as its “service of process address.”

* * * Thompson’s declaration was properly executed because it shows that Cruz addressed the summons and complaint to a person to be served, as listed under Section 416.10. [Emphasis added.]

Cruz also submitted a signed return receipt to establish the fact of actual delivery. A return receipt attached to the proof of service form shows that the envelope was accepted at the Lyndhurst address. The receipt was signed by Hayes.

* * * *

* * * Cruz submitted the declaration of his attorney, Harold Thompson, in which Thompson states that he confirmed with a representative of the United States Postal Service in Lyndhurst, New Jersey, that Hayes regularly receives mail on behalf of Fagor at its Lyndhurst office. This is * * * sufficient to establish that an agent authorized to receive mail on the defendant’s behalf received the summons and complaint.

* * * *

* * * By virtue of her authority to accept mail on Fagor’s behalf, Hayes’s notice of the action is imputed to Fagor and its officers. Barriga’s statement that he did not receive the summons and complaint does not establish that service of process was invalid. Barriga had constructive knowledge of the existence of the action, and of the summons and complaint, once an individual authorized to receive corporate mail acknowledged service. To hold otherwise would be to ignore the realities of corporate life, in which the duty to sign for mail received often resides with a designated mailroom employee, a receptionist, a secretary, or an assistant. A plaintiff who has provided evidence that a person authorized to receive mail on behalf of a corporation in fact received an item that was mailed to an officer of the corporation should not be held responsible for any failure on the part of the corporate defendant to effectively distribute that mail. [Emphasis added.]

* * * Cruz has * * * satisfied all of the elements necessary to establish effective service.

* * * *

The order of the trial court is reversed.

EXTENDED CASE CONTINUES ▼

QUESTIONS

1. Suppose that Cruz had misaddressed the envelope but the summons had still reached Hayes, and Cruz could prove it. Would this have been sufficient to establish valid service? Explain.
2. Should a plaintiff be required to serve a defendant with a summons and a copy of a complaint more than once? Why or why not?

Waiver of Formal Service of Process. In many instances, the defendant is already aware that a lawsuit is being filed and is willing to waive (give up) her or his right to be served personally. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (FRCP) and many states' rules allow defendants to waive formal service of process, provided that certain procedures are followed. Kirby's attorney, for example, could mail to defendant Carvello a copy of the complaint, along with "Waiver of Service of Summons" forms for Carvello to sign. If Carvello signs and returns the forms within thirty days, formal service of process is waived. Moreover, under the FRCP, defendants who agree to waive formal service of process receive additional time to respond to the complaint (sixty days, instead of twenty days). Some states provide similar incentives to encourage defendants to waive formal service of process and thereby reduce associated costs and foster cooperation between the parties.

THE DEFENDANT'S RESPONSE Typically, the defendant's response to the complaint takes the form of an answer. In an answer, the defendant either admits or denies each of the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint and may also set forth defenses to those allegations. Under the federal rules, any allegations that are not denied by the defendant will be deemed by the court to have been admitted. If Carvello admits to all of Kirby's allegations in his answer, a judgment will be entered for Kirby. If Carvello denies Kirby's allegations, the matter will proceed further.

Affirmative Defenses. Carvello can also admit the truth of Kirby's complaint but raise new facts to show that he should not be held liable for Kirby's damages. This is called raising an affirmative defense. As will be discussed in subsequent chapters, defendants in both civil and criminal cases can raise affirmative defenses. For example, Carvello could assert Kirby's own negligence as a defense by alleging that Kirby was driving negligently at the time of the accident. In some states, a plaintiff's contributory negligence operates as a complete defense. In most states, however, the plaintiff's own negligence constitutes only a partial defense (see Chapter 7).

Counterclaims. Carvello could also deny Kirby's allegations and set forth his own claim that the accident occurred as a result of Kirby's negligence and that therefore she owes Carvello for damage to his car. This is appropriately called a counterclaim. If Carvello files a counterclaim, Kirby will have to submit an answer to the counterclaim.

Dismissals and Judgments before Trial

Many actions for which pleadings have been filed never come to trial. The parties may, for example, negotiate a settlement of the dispute at any stage of the litigation process. There are also numerous procedural avenues for disposing of a case without a trial. Many of them involve one or the other party's attempts to get the case dismissed through the use of various motions.

A motion is a procedural request submitted to the court by an attorney on behalf of her or his client. When one party files a motion with the court, that party must also send to, or serve on, the opposing party a notice of motion. The notice of motion informs the opposing party that the motion has been filed. Pretrial motions include the motion to dismiss, the motion for judgment on the pleadings, and the motion for summary judgment, as well as the other motions listed in Exhibit 3–4.

MOTION TO DISMISS Either party can file a motion to dismiss asking the court to dismiss the case for the reasons stated in the motion, although normally it is the defendant who requests dismissal. A defendant can file a motion to dismiss if the plaintiff's complaint fails to state a claim for which relief (a remedy) can be granted. Such a motion asserts that even if the facts alleged in the complaint are true, they do not give rise to any legal claim against the defendant. For example, if the allegations in Kirby's

EXHIBIT 3-4 • Pretrial Motions

MOTION TO DISMISS

A motion normally filed by the defendant in which the defendant asks the court to dismiss the case for a specified reason, such as improper service, lack of personal jurisdiction, or the plaintiff's failure to state a claim for which relief can be granted.

MOTION TO STRIKE

A motion filed by the defendant in which the defendant asks the court to strike (delete) certain paragraphs from the complaint. Motions to strike help to clarify the underlying issues that form the basis for the complaint by removing paragraphs that are redundant or irrelevant to the action.

MOTION TO MAKE MORE DEFINITE AND CERTAIN

A motion filed by the defendant to compel the plaintiff to clarify the basis of the plaintiff's cause of action. The motion is filed when the defendant believes that the complaint is too vague or ambiguous for the defendant to respond to it in a meaningful way.

MOTION FOR JUDGMENT ON THE PLEADINGS

A motion that may be filed by either party in which the party asks the court to enter a judgment in his or her favor based on information contained in the pleadings. A judgment on the pleadings will be made only if there are no facts in dispute and the only question is how the law applies to a set of undisputed facts.

MOTION TO COMPEL DISCOVERY

A motion that may be filed by either party in which the party asks the court to compel the other party to comply with a discovery request. If a party refuses to allow the opponent to inspect and copy certain documents, for example, the party requesting the documents may make a motion to compel production of those documents.

MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

A motion that may be filed by either party in which the party asks the court to enter judgment in his or her favor without a trial. Unlike a motion for judgment on the pleadings, a motion for summary judgment can be supported by evidence outside the pleadings, such as witnesses' affidavits, answers to interrogatories, and other evidence obtained prior to or during discovery.

complaint do not constitute negligence on Carvello's part, Carvello can move to dismiss the case for failure to state a claim. Defendant Carvello could also file a motion to dismiss on the grounds that he was not properly served, that the court lacked jurisdiction, or that the venue was improper.

If the judge grants the motion to dismiss, the plaintiff generally is given time to file an amended complaint. If the judge denies the motion, the suit will go forward, and the defendant must then file an answer. Note that if Carvello wishes to discontinue the suit because, for example, an out-of-court settlement has been reached, he can likewise move for dismissal. The court can also dismiss a case on its own motion.

MOTION FOR JUDGMENT ON THE PLEADINGS At the close of the pleadings, either party may make a motion for judgment on the pleadings, which asks the court to decide the issue solely on the pleadings without proceeding to trial. The judge will grant the motion only when there is no dispute over the facts of the case and the sole issue to be resolved is a question of law. For example, in the Kirby-Carvello case, if Carvello had admitted to all of Kirby's allegations in his answer and had raised no affirmative defenses, Kirby could file a motion for judgment on the pleadings.

In deciding a motion for judgment on the pleadings, the judge may consider only the evidence contained in the pleadings. In contrast, in a motion for summary judgment, discussed next, the court may consider evidence outside the pleadings, such as sworn statements and other materials that would be admissible as evidence at trial.

MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT Either party can file a motion for summary judgment, which asks the court to grant a judgment in that party's favor without a trial. As with a motion for judgment on the pleadings, a court will grant a motion for summary judgment only if it determines that no facts are in dispute and the only question is how the law applies to the facts. A motion for summary judgment can be made before or during a trial, but it will be granted only if, when the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to the other party, there clearly are no facts in contention.

To support a motion for summary judgment, a party can submit evidence obtained at any point before the trial that refutes the other party's factual claim. The evidence may consist of affidavits (sworn statements by parties or witnesses) or copies of documents, such as contracts, e-mails, and letters obtained through the course of discovery (discussed next). Of course, the evidence must be admissible evidence—that is, evidence that the court would allow to be presented during the trial. As mentioned, the use of additional evidence is one feature that distinguishes the motion for summary judgment from the motion to dismiss and the motion for judgment on the pleadings.

Discovery

Before a trial begins, the parties can use a number of procedural devices to obtain information and gather evidence about the case. Kirby, for example, will want to know how fast Carvello was driving, whether he had been drinking or was under the influence of any medication, and whether he was wearing corrective lenses if he was required by law to do so while driving. The process of obtaining information from the opposing party or from witnesses prior to trial is known as discovery. Discovery includes gaining access to witnesses, documents, records, and other types of evidence. In federal courts, the parties are required to make initial disclosures of relevant evidence to the opposing party.

Discovery prevents surprises at trial by giving both parties access to evidence that might otherwise be hidden. This allows the litigants to learn as much as they can about what to expect at a trial before they reach the courtroom. Discovery also serves to narrow the issues so that trial time is spent on the main questions in the case.

The main question in the following case was what a court could do when a plaintiff failed to identify and disclose the names of expert witnesses, even though the court deemed that such witnesses were necessary to establish the plaintiff's claim against the defendants.

Blankenship v. Collier

Supreme Court of Kentucky, 302 S.W.3d 665 (2010).

www.courts.ky.gov/supremecourt/minutes.htm^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In February 2004, Horace Collier was admitted to Caritas Medical Center with abdominal pain. The following day, after undergoing tests and being diagnosed by Dr. Robert Blankenship as having appendicitis, Collier had an appendectomy. One year later, Collier sued Blankenship and Caritas Health Services in a Kentucky state court, contending that they had been negligent because they had failed to evaluate and treat him in a timely manner. Specifically, Collier claimed that he had been ignored for several hours while awaiting treatment and had suffered severe abdominal pain, and that the X-ray of his abdomen had not been stored properly, causing further delay in his diagnosis and treatment. Collier alleged that as a result of the defendants' medical negligence, he had sustained permanent physical and mental injuries, prolonged pain and mental anguish, impairment of his power to earn income, and significant medical expenses. More than nine months later, Collier had not yet disclosed the identities of any expert witnesses who would testify on his behalf, and the court ordered him to do so by January 30, 2006. At Collier's request, this deadline was extended to February 28. Finally, on March 14, 2006, after Collier still had not disclosed any names, the defendants filed motions for summary judgment, arguing that there could be no issue of material fact in this medical malpractice^b case without expert testimony. The trial court granted the motions. Collier appealed, arguing that summary judgment was inappropriate in this instance because it was being used only as a sanctioning tool to punish him for failing to timely disclose his experts and that there was a "serious question" as to whether he would even need experts to prove his medical malpractice claim. The CASE 3.2 CONTINUED ♦ intermediate appellate court agreed and reversed the trial court’s decision. The defendants appealed the decision to the Supreme Court of Kentucky.

Opinion of the court by Justice ABRAMSON.

* * * Although a defendant is permitted to move for a summary judgment at any time, this Court has cautioned trial courts not to take up these motions prematurely and to consider summary judgment motions “only after the opposing party has been given ample opportunity to complete discovery.” Thus, even though an appellate court always reviews the substance of a trial court’s summary judgment ruling de novo [anew] * * * to determine whether the record reflects a genuine issue of material fact, a reviewing court must also consider whether the trial court gave the party opposing the motion an ample opportunity to respond and complete discovery before the court entered its ruling. In a medical malpractice action, where a sufficient amount of time has expired and the plaintiff has still “failed to introduce evidence sufficient to establish the respective applicable standard of care,” then the defendants are entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law. The trial court’s determination that a sufficient amount of time has passed and that it can properly take up the summary judgment motion for a ruling is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. [Emphasis added.]

In this case, the issue before this Court is not simply whether Collier had failed to establish a genuine issue of material fact at the time Dr. Blankenship and Caritas filed their summary judgment motions—without a doubt, there is no genuine issue of material fact in the record because Collier has no expert to support his claim of medical negligence. Rather, the more specific issue is whether the trial court was correct to take up the defendants’ summary judgment motions and enter a ruling when it did and, secondarily, whether the court was required first either to enter a separate order requiring Collier to obtain expert testimony or to enter an order sanctioning Collier for failing to meet the court’s expert disclosure deadline.

Having carefully reviewed the record, we conclude that the defendants’ summary judgment motions were properly before the trial court and it did not abuse its discretion in taking them up and deciding to rule on the motions approximately four months after they were filed and seventeen months after the lawsuit was initiated. Collier had completely failed to identify any expert witnesses and could not sustain his burden of proof without expert testimony and, thus, no material issue of fact existed in the record and the defendants were entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law. Because Collier never disputed that a medical expert was necessary to prove his claim of medical negligence and continually represented to the trial court that he would obtain an expert witness, no separate ruling stating the obvious—the need for an expert witness—was required before the court ruled on the defendants’ summary judgment motions. Further, * * * the trial court was not required to enter a sanctions order prior to granting the defendants’ summary judgment motions.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Supreme Court of Kentucky reversed the decision of the lower appellate court and reinstated the trial court’s decision. The trial court had not abused its discretion by granting summary judgment for the defendants.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Collier contended that there was a “serious question” as to whether he would even need experts to prove his medical malpractice claim. Is it fair to Collier to prevent the trial from proceeding, even though the lack of expert testimony might have made it difficult—if not impossible—for him to win the case? Explain.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • Business owners and managers should be aware that initiating discovery procedures and responding to discovery requests in a timely fashion are important in any litigation. Although the court in this case claimed that summary judgment was not a sanction imposed on the plaintiff for delays during discovery, one could argue (as a dissenting judge did) that it was indeed a sanction—and a very harsh one. Courts have also dismissed cases when the plaintiffs have caused undue delay by not meeting procedural deadlines.

DISCOVERY RULES The FRCP and similar state rules set forth the guidelines for discovery activity. Generally, discovery is allowed regarding any matter that is relevant to the claim or defense of any party. Discovery rules also attempt to protect witnesses and parties from undue harassment, and to safeguard privileged or confidential material from being disclosed. Only information that is relevant to the case at hand—or likely to lead to the discovery of relevant information—is discoverable. If a discovery request involves privileged or confidential business information, a court can deny the request and can limit the scope of discovery in a number of ways. For example, a court can require the party to submit the materials to the judge in a sealed envelope so that the judge can decide if they should be disclosed to the opposing party.

DEPOSITIONS Discovery can involve the use of depositions. A deposition is sworn testimony by a party to the lawsuit or by any witness, recorded by an authorized court official. The person deposed gives testimony and answers questions asked by the attorneys from both sides. The questions and answers are recorded, sworn to, and signed. These answers, of course, will help the attorneys prepare their cases. Depositions also give attorneys the opportunity to ask immediate follow-up questions and to evaluate how their witnesses will conduct themselves at trial. In addition, depositions can be employed in court to impeach (challenge the credibility of) a party or a witness who changes testimony at the trial. A deposition can also be used as testimony if the witness is not available at trial.

INTERROGATORIES Discovery can also involve interrogatories, which are written questions for which written answers are prepared and then signed under oath. The main difference between interrogatories and written depositions is that interrogatories are directed to a party to the lawsuit (the plaintiff or the defendant), not to a witness, and the party usually has thirty days to prepare answers. The party's attorney often drafts the answers to interrogatories in a manner calculated to give away as little information as possible. Whereas depositions are useful for eliciting candid responses and answers not prepared in advance, interrogatories are designed to obtain accurate information about specific topics, such as how many contracts were signed and when. The scope of interrogatories is also broader because parties are obligated to answer questions, even if that means disclosing information from their records and files. Note that a court can impose sanctions on a party who fails to answer interrogatories (or who refuses to respond to other discovery requests).

CASE IN POINT Computer Task Group, Inc. (CTG), hired William Brotby as an information technology consultant. As a condition of his employment, Brotby signed an agreement that restricted his ability to work for CTG's customers if he left CTG. Less than two years later, Brotby left CTG and began working for Alyeska Pipeline Service Company, a CTG client, in breach of the agreement. CTG sued Brotby. During discovery, Brotby refused to respond fully to CTG's interrogatories. He gave contradictory answers, made frivolous objections, filed baseless motions, and never disclosed all the information that CTG sought. The court ordered Brotby to comply with discovery requests five times, but Brotby continued to make excuses and changed his story repeatedly, making it impossible for CTG to establish basic facts with any certainty. Eventually, CTG requested and the court granted a default judgment against Brotby based on his failure to cooperate.⁸

REQUESTS FOR ADMISSIONS One party can serve the other party with a written request for an admission of the truth of matters relating to the trial. Any fact admitted under such a request is conclusively established as true for the trial. For example, Kirby can ask Carvello to admit that his driver's license was suspended at the time of the accident. A request for admission shortens the trial because the parties will not have to spend time proving facts on which they already agree.

REQUESTS FOR DOCUMENTS, OBJECTS, AND ENTRY UPON LAND A party can gain access to documents and other items not in her or his possession in order to inspect and examine them. Carvello, for example, can gain permission to inspect and copy Kirby's car repair bills. Likewise, a party can gain "entry upon land" to inspect the premises.

REQUESTS FOR EXAMINATIONS When the physical or mental condition of one party is in question, the opposing party can ask the court to order a physical or mental examination by an independent examiner. If the court agrees to make the order, the opposing party can obtain the results of the examination. Note that the court will make such an order only when the need for the information outweighs the right to privacy of the person to be examined.

ELECTRONIC DISCOVERY Any relevant material, including information stored electronically, can be the object of a discovery request. The federal rules and most state rules (as well as court decisions) specifically allow individuals to obtain discovery of electronic “data compilations.” Electronic evidence, or e-evidence, consists of all computer-generated or electronically recorded information, such as e-mail, voice mail, spreadsheets, word-processing documents, and other data. E-evidence can reveal significant facts that are not discoverable by other means. For example, computers automatically record certain information about files—such as who created the file and when, and who accessed, modified, or transmitted it—on their hard drives. This information can only be obtained from the file in its electronic format—not from printed-out versions.

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedures deals specifically with the preservation, retrieval, and production of electronic data. Although traditional means, such as interrogatories and depositions, are still used to find out whether e-evidence exists, a party usually must hire an expert to retrieve the evidence in its electronic format. The expert uses software to reconstruct e-mail exchanges to establish who knew what and when they knew it. The expert can even recover computer files that the user thought had been deleted. Reviewing back-up copies of documents and e-mail can provide useful—and often quite damaging—information about how a particular matter progressed over several weeks or months.

Electronic discovery, or e-discovery, has significant advantages over paper discovery, but it is also time consuming and expensive. These costs are amplified when the parties involved in the lawsuit are large corporations with many offices and employees. Who should pay the costs associated with e-discovery? For a discussion of how the courts are handling this issue, see this chapter’s Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature on the next page.

Pretrial Conference

After discovery has taken place and before the trial begins, the attorneys may meet with the trial judge in a pretrial conference, or hearing. Usually, the conference consists of an informal discussion between the judge and the opposing attorneys after discovery has taken place. The purpose of the conference is to explore the possibility of a settlement without trial and, if this is not possible, to identify the matters that are in dispute and to plan the course of the trial. In particular, the parties may attempt to establish ground rules to restrict the number of expert witnesses or discuss the admissibility or costs of certain types of evidence.

The Right to a Jury Trial

The Seventh Amendment to the U.S. Constitution guarantees the right to a jury trial for cases at law in federal courts when the amount in controversy exceeds $20. Most states have similar guarantees in their own constitutions (although the threshold dollar amount is higher than $20). The right to a trial by jury need not be exercised, and many cases are tried without a jury. In most states and in federal courts, one of the parties must request a jury, or the judge presumes the parties waive this right. If there is no jury, the judge determines the truth of the facts alleged in the case.

Jury Selection

Before a jury trial commences, a panel of jurors must be selected. Although some types of trials require twelve-person juries, most civil matters can be heard by six-person juries. The jury selection process is known as voir dire.⁹ During voir dire in most jurisdictions, attorneys for the plaintiff and the defendant ask prospective jurors oral questions to determine whether a potential jury member is biased or has any connection with a party to the action or with a prospective witness. In some jurisdictions, the judge may do all or part of the questioning based on written questions submitted by counsel for the parties.

During voir dire, a party may challenge a certain number of prospective jurors peremptorily—that is, ask that an individual not be sworn in as a juror without providing any reason. Alternatively, a party may challenge a prospective juror for cause—that is, provide a reason why an individual should not be sworn in as a juror. If the judge grants the challenge, the individual is asked to step down. A prospective juror, however, may not be excluded by the use of discriminatory challenges, such as those based on racial criteria or gender.

9. Pronounced vwaahr deehr. These verbs based on Old French mean “to speak the truth.” In legal language, the phrase refers to the process of questioning jurors to learn about their backgrounds, attitudes, and similar attributes.

SHIFTING LEGAL PRIORITIES FOR BUSINESS

The Duty to Preserve Electronic Evidence for Discovery

Today, less than 0.5 percent of new information is created on paper. Instead of sending letters and memos, people send e-mails and text messages, creating a massive amount of electronically stored information (ESI). The law requires parties to preserve ESI whenever there is a “reasonable anticipation of litigation.”

Why Companies Fail to Preserve Electronic Evidence

Preserving electronic evidence, or e-evidence, can be a challenge, particularly for large corporations that have electronic data scattered across multiple networks, servers, desktops, laptops, handheld devices, and even home computers. Although many companies have policies regarding back-up of office e-mail and computer systems, these may cover only a fraction of the e-discovery requested in a lawsuit.

Technological advances further complicate the situation. Users of BlackBerry devices, for example, can configure them so that messages are transmitted with limited or no archiving rather than going through a company’s servers and being recorded. How can a company preserve e-evidence that is never on its servers? In one case, the court held that a company had a duty to preserve transitory “server log data,” which exist only temporarily on a computer’s memory.^a

Potential Sanctions and Malpractice Claims

A court may impose sanctions (such as fines) on a party that fails to preserve e-evidence or to comply with e-discovery requests. A firm may be sanctioned if it provides e-mails without the attachments, does not produce all of the e-evidence requested, or fails to suspend its automatic e-mail deletion procedures.^b Nearly

25 percent of the reported opinions on e-discovery from 2008 involved sanctions for failure to preserve e-evidence.^c Attorneys who fail to properly advise their clients concerning the duty to preserve e-evidence also often face sanctions and malpractice claims.^d

Lessons from Intel Corporation

A party that fails to preserve e-evidence may even find itself at such a disadvantage that it will settle a dispute rather than continue litigation. For example, Advanced Micro Devices, Inc. (AMD), sued Intel Corporation, one of the world’s largest microprocessor suppliers, for violating antitrust laws. Immediately after the lawsuit was filed, Intel began collecting and preserving the ESI on its servers. Although the company instructed its employees to retain documents and e-mails related to competition with AMD, many employees saved only copies of the e-mails that they had received and not e-mails that they had sent.

In addition, Intel did not stop its automatic e-mail deletion system, causing other information to be lost. In the end, although Intel produced data that, on paper, would have been equivalent to “somewhere in the neighborhood of a pile 137 miles high,” its failure to preserve e-evidence led it to settle the dispute in 2008.^e

Clearly, companies can be accused of intentionally failing to preserve electronic data. As a manager, you have to weigh the cost of retaining data, such as e-mails, against the benefits of having those data available if your company is ever sued.

THE TRIAL

Various rules and procedures govern the trial phase of the litigation process. There are rules governing what kind of evidence will or will not be admitted during the trial, as well as specific procedures that the participants in the lawsuit must follow.

Opening Statements

At the beginning of the trial, both attorneys are allowed to make opening statements setting forth

CONCEPT SUMMARY 3.1

Pretrial Procedures

Procedure	Description
The Pleadings	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The plaintiff's complaint—The plaintiff's statement of the cause of action and the parties involved, filed with the court by the plaintiff's attorney. After the filing, the defendant is notified of the suit through service of process. 2. The defendant's response—The defendant's response to the plaintiff's complaint may take the form of an answer, in which the defendant admits or denies the plaintiff's allegations. The defendant may raise an affirmative defense and/or assert a counterclaim.
Pretrial Motions	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Motion to dismiss—May be made by either party; requests that the judge dismiss the case for reasons that are provided in the motion (such as failure to state a claim for which relief can be granted). 2. Motion for judgment on the pleadings—May be made by either party; will be granted only if no facts are in dispute and only questions of law are at issue. 3. Motion for summary judgment—May be made by either party; will be granted only if no facts are in dispute and only questions of law are at issue. Unlike the motion for judgment on the pleadings, the motion for summary judgment may be supported by evidence outside the pleadings, such as testimony and other evidence obtained during the discovery phase of litigation.
Discovery	The process of gathering evidence concerning the case; involves (1) depositions (sworn testimony by either party or any witness); (2) interrogatories (in which parties to the action write answers to questions with the aid of their attorneys); and (3) requests for admissions, documents, examinations, or other information relating to the case. Discovery may also involve electronically recorded information, such as e-mail, voice mail, and other data.
Pretrial Conference	A pretrial hearing, at the request of either party or the court, to identify the matters in dispute after discovery has taken place and to explore the possibility of settling the dispute without a trial. If no settlement is possible, the parties plan the course of the trial.
Jury Selection	In a jury trial, the selection of members of the jury from a pool of prospective jurors. During a process known as voir dire , the attorneys for both sides may challenge prospective jurors either for cause or peremptorily (for no cause).

the facts that they expect to prove during the trial. The opening statement provides an opportunity for each lawyer to give a brief version of the facts and the supporting evidence that will be used during the trial. Then the plaintiff's case is presented. In our hypothetical case, Kirby's lawyer would introduce evidence (relevant documents, exhibits, and the testimony of witnesses) to support Kirby's position.

Rules of Evidence

Whether evidence will be admitted in court is determined by the rules of evidence—a series of rules that have been created by the courts to ensure that any evidence presented during a trial is fair and reliable. The Federal Rules of Evidence govern the admissibility of evidence in federal courts.

EVIDENCE MUST BE RELEVANT TO THE ISSUES

Evidence will not be admitted in court unless it is relevant to the matter in question. Relevant evidence is evidence that tends to prove or disprove a fact in question or to establish the degree of probability of a fact or action. For example, evidence that the defendant's gun was in the home of another person when the victim was shot would be relevant—because it would tend to prove that the defendant did not shoot the victim.

HEARSAY EVIDENCE NOT ADMISSIBLE

Generally, hearsay is not admissible as evidence. Hearsay is testimony someone gives in court about a statement made by someone else who was not under oath at the time of the statement. Literally, it is what someone heard someone else say. For example, if a witness in the Kirby-Carvello case testified in court concerning what he or she heard another observer say about the accident, that testimony would be hearsay, or secondhand knowledge. Admitting hearsay into evidence carries many risks because, even though it may be relevant, there is no way to test its reliability.

In the following case, some of the plaintiff's evidence consisted of printouts of Web pages purporting to indicate how the pages appeared at a prior point in time. The defendant challenged this evidence as hearsay.

Novak v. Tucows, Inc.

United States District Court, Eastern District of New York, ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (2007).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In 1997, Robert Novak registered the domain name petswarehouse.com and began selling pet supplies and pets online. Within two years, the site had become one of the most popular sites for pet supplies in the United States. Novak obtained a trademark for the petswarehouse.com name and transferred its registration to Nitin Networks, Inc., which was owned by Tucows, Inc., a Canadian firm that is a domain registrar. In an unrelated matter, John Benn obtained a judgment against Novak in an Alabama state court. On May 1, 2003, on that court's order, Tucows transferred the domain name to the court to satisfy the judgment. After an Alabama intermediate appellate court reversed the judgment, the name was returned to Novak on October 1, 2004. Novak filed a suit in a federal district court against Tucows and Nitin, claiming that the transfer of the name out of his control for seventeen months destroyed his pet-supply business. Novak alleged that the defendants had committed several violations of federal and state law, including trademark infringement. Tucows responded with, among other things, a motion to strike some of Novak's exhibits.

Joseph F. BIANCO, District Judge.

* * * *

Defendants contend that plaintiff's Exhibits B, J, K, O–R, U and V, which are printouts of Internet pages, constitute inadmissible hearsay and do not fall within any acknowledged exception to the hearsay rule. * * * Defendants [also] objected to Plaintiff's Exhibit 1, as well as to Plaintiff's Exhibits N–R. Plaintiff's Exhibit 1 is a printout from "RegisterSite.com," Nitin's Web site, as it purportedly appeared in 2003. According to plaintiff, he obtained the printout through a Web site called the Internet Archive, which provides access to a digital library of Internet sites. The Internet Archive operates a service called the "Wayback Machine," which purports to allow a user to obtain an archived Web page as it appeared at a particular moment in time. The other contested exhibits include: Exhibit B, an online summary of plaintiff's past and pending lawsuits, obtained via the Wayback Machine; Exhibit J, printouts of comments on a Web message board by [Evgeniy] Pirogov [a Tucows employee]; Exhibit K, a news article from the Poughkeepsie Journal Web site featuring [Nitin] Agarwal [the chief executive officer and founder of Nitin]; Exhibit N, Novak's declaration regarding the authenticity of pages printed from the Wayback Machine; Exhibit O, pages printed from the Internet Archive Web site; Exhibit P, pages printed from the Wayback Machine Web site; Exhibits Q, R and U, all of which constitute pages printed from RegisterSite.com via the Wayback Machine; and Exhibit V, a news article from "The Register," a British Web site, regarding Tucows. Where postings from Internet Web sites are not statements made by declarants testifying at trial and are offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, such postings generally constitute hearsay under [the Federal Rules of Evidence]. [Emphasis added.]

Furthermore, in this case, such documents have not been properly authenticated pursuant to [the Federal Rules of Evidence].^a While plaintiff's declaration purports to cure his inability to authenticate the documents printed from the Internet, he in fact lacks the personal knowledge required to set forth with any certainty that the documents obtained via third-party Web sites

a. In this context, authentication refers to the requirement that sufficient evidence be introduced to show that these Web pages are what Novak claims.

CASE 3.3 CONTINUED ♦ are, in fact, what he proclaims them to be. This problem is even more acute in the case of documents procured through the Wayback Machine. Plaintiff states that the Web pages archived within the Wayback Machine are based upon “data from third parties who compile the data by using software programs known as crawlers,” who then “donate” such data to the Internet Archive, which “preserves and provides access to it.” Based upon Novak’s assertions, it is clear that the information posted on the Wayback Machine is only as valid as the third-party donating the page decides to make it—the authorized owners and managers of the archived Web sites play no role in ensuring that the material posted in the Wayback Machine accurately represents what was posted on their official Web sites at the relevant time. As Novak proffers neither testimony nor sworn statements attesting to the authenticity of the contested Web page exhibits by any employee of the companies hosting the sites from which plaintiff printed the pages, such exhibits cannot be authenticated as required under the [Federal] Rules of Evidence. Therefore, in the absence of any authentication of plaintiff’s Internet printouts, combined with the lack of any assertion that such printouts fall under a viable exception to the hearsay rule, defendants’ motion to strike Exhibits B, J, K, N–R, U and V is granted.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The court granted Tucows’s motion to strike Novak’s exhibits. Tucows also filed a motion to dismiss Novak’s suit altogether based on a clause in the parties’ domain name transfer agreement. The clause mandated that all related disputes be litigated in Ontario, Canada, according to Canadian law. The court determined that the clause was valid and reasonable, and granted Tucows’s motion to dismiss the suit.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Hearsay is literally what a witness says he or she heard another person say. What makes the admissibility of such evidence potentially unethical?

THE E-COMMERCE DIMENSION • In this case, the plaintiff offered as evidence printouts of Web pages that he claimed once appeared on others’ Web sites. What makes such evidence questionable until proved accurate?

Examination of Witnesses

Because Kirby is the plaintiff, she has the burden of proving that her allegations are true. Her attorney begins the presentation of Kirby’s case by calling the first witness for the plaintiff and examining, or questioning, the witness. (For both attorneys, the types of questions and the manner of asking them are governed by the rules of evidence.) This questioning is called direct examination. After Kirby’s attorney is finished, the witness is subject to cross-examination by Carvello’s attorney. Then Kirby’s attorney has another opportunity to question the witness in redirect examination, and Carvello’s attorney may follow the redirect examination with a re-cross-examination. When both attorneys have finished with the first witness, Kirby’s attorney calls the succeeding witnesses in the plaintiff’s case, each of whom is subject to examination by the attorneys in the manner just described.

EXPERT WITNESSES Both the plaintiff and the defendant may present testimony from one or more expert witnesses—such as forensic scientists, physicians, and psychologists—as part of their cases. An expert witness is a person who, by virtue of education, training, skill, or experience, has scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge in a particular area beyond that of an average person. In Kirby’s case, her attorney might hire an accident reconstruction specialist to establish Carvello’s negligence or a physician to confirm the extent of Kirby’s injuries.

Normally, witnesses can testify only about the facts of a case—that is, what they personally observed. When witnesses are qualified as experts in a particular field, however, they can offer their opinions and conclusions about the evidence in that field. Expert testimony is an important component of litigation today.

Because numerous experts are available for hire and expert testimony is powerful and effective with juries, there is tremendous potential for abuse. Therefore, in federal courts and most state courts, judges act as gatekeepers to ensure that the experts are qualified and that their opinions are based on scientific knowledge.¹⁰ If a party believes that the opponent’s witness is not qualified as an expert in the relevant field, that party can make a motion asking the judge to exclude this evidence and prevent the expert witness from testifying in front of the jury.

10. The requirement that judges act as gatekeepers is known as the Daubert standard, named after the case, Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 43 F.3d 1311 (9th Cir. 1995). A minority of jurisdictions still follow the Frye standard, which allows both sides to present all relevant evidence to the jury and then requires the jury to weigh the testimony of experts. See Paul C. Giannelli and Edward J. Imwinkelried. Scientific Evidence, 4th ed. (Newark, NJ: LexisNexis, 2007), Sections 1.06 and 1.16.

POTENTIAL MOTION AND JUDGMENT At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, the defendant's attorney has the opportunity to ask the judge to direct a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff has presented no evidence to support her or his claim. This is called a motion for a judgment as a matter of law (or a motion for a directed verdict in state courts). In considering the motion, the judge looks at the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and grants the motion only if there is insufficient evidence to raise an issue of fact. (Motions for directed verdicts at this stage of a trial are seldom granted.)

DEFENDANT'S EVIDENCE The defendant's attorney then presents the evidence and witnesses for the defendant's case. Witnesses are called and examined by the defendant's attorney. The plaintiff's attorney has the right to cross-examine them, and there may be a redirect examination and possibly a recross-examination. At the end of the defendant's case, either attorney can move for a directed verdict, and the test again is whether the jury can, through any reasonable interpretation of the evidence, find for the party against whom the motion has been made. After the defendant's attorney has finished introducing evidence, the plaintiff's attorney can present a rebuttal by offering additional evidence that refutes the defendant's case. The defendant's attorney can, in turn, refute that evidence in a rejoinder.

Closing Arguments, Jury Instructions, and Verdict

After both sides have rested their cases, each attorney presents a closing argument. In the closing argument, each attorney summarizes the facts and evidence presented during the trial and indicates why the facts and evidence support his or her client's claim. In addition to generally urging a verdict in favor of the client, the closing argument typically reveals the shortcomings of the points made by the opposing party during the trial.

Attorneys generally present closing arguments whether or not the trial was heard by a jury. If it was a jury trial, the attorneys will have met with the judge prior to closing arguments to determine how the jury will be instructed on the law. The attorneys can refer to these instructions in their closing arguments. After closing arguments are completed, the judge instructs the jury in the law that applies to the case (these instructions are often called charges), and the jury retires to the jury room to deliberate a verdict. In most civil cases, the standard of proof is a preponderance of the evidence.¹¹ In other words, the plaintiff (Kirby in our hypothetical case) need only show that her factual claim is more likely to be true than the defendant's. (As you will read in Chapter 9, in a criminal trial the prosecution has a higher standard of proof to meet—it must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt.)

Once the jury has reached a decision, it issues a verdict in favor of one party; the verdict specifies the jury's factual findings. In some cases, the jury also decides on the amount of the award (the compensation to be paid to the prevailing party). After the announcement of the verdict, which marks the end of the trial itself, the jurors are dismissed.

See Concept Summary 3.2 for a review of trial procedures.

SECTION 4 POSTTRIAL MOTIONS

After the jury has rendered its verdict, either party may make a posttrial motion. The prevailing party usually requests that the court enter a judgment in accordance with the verdict. The nonprevailing party frequently files one of the motions discussed next.

Motion for a New Trial

At the end of the trial, the losing party may make a motion to set aside the adverse verdict and any judgment and to hold a new trial. After looking at all the evidence, the judge will grant the motion for a new trial only if she or he believes that the jury was in error and that it is not appropriate to grant judgment for the other side. Usually, this occurs when the jury verdict is obviously the result of a misapplication of the law or a misunderstanding of the evidence presented at trial. A new trial can also be granted on the grounds of newly discovered evidence, misconduct by the participants during the trial (such as when a juror has made prejudicial and inflammatory remarks), or an error by the judge.

11. Note that some civil claims must be proved by "clear and convincing evidence," meaning that the evidence must show that the truth of the party's claim is highly probable. This standard is often applied in situations that present a particular danger of deception, such as allegations of fraud.

Trial Procedures

Procedure	Description
Opening Statements	Each party's attorney is allowed to present an opening statement indicating what the attorney will attempt to prove during the course of the trial.
Examination of Witnesses	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Plaintiff's introduction and direct examination of witnesses, cross-examination by defendant's attorney, possible redirect examination by plaintiff's attorney, and possible recross-examination by defendant's attorney. 2. Both the plaintiff and the defendant may present testimony from one or more expert witnesses. 3. At the close of the plaintiff's case, the defendant may make a motion for a directed verdict (or judgment as a matter of law), which, if granted by the court, will end the trial before the defendant presents witnesses. 4. Defendant's introduction and direct examination of witnesses, cross-examination by plaintiff's attorney, possible redirect examination by defendant's attorney, and possible recross-examination by plaintiff's attorney. 5. Possible rebuttal of defendant's argument by plaintiff's attorney, who presents more evidence. 6. Possible rejoinder by defendant's attorney to meet that evidence.
Closing Arguments, Jury Instructions, and Verdict	Each party's attorney argues in favor of a verdict for his or her client. The judge instructs (or charges) the jury as to how the law applies to the issue, and the jury retires to deliberate. When the jury renders its verdict, this brings the trial to an end.

Motion for Judgment N.O.V.

If Kirby wins, and if Carvello's attorney has previously moved for a directed verdict, then Carvello's attorney can now make a motion for judgment *n.o.v.—from the Latin non obstante veredicto, meaning “notwithstanding the verdict.” (Federal courts use the term judgment as a matter of law instead of judgment n.o.v.) Such a motion will be granted only if the jury's verdict was unreasonable and erroneous. If the judge grants the motion, then the jury's verdict will be set aside, and a judgment will be entered in favor of the opposing party (Carvello). If the motion is denied, Carvello may then appeal the case. (Kirby may also appeal the case, even though she won at trial. She might appeal, for example, if she received a smaller monetary award than she had sought.)

SECTION 5 THE APPEAL

Either party may appeal not only the jury's verdict but also the judge's ruling on any pretrial or post-trial motion. Many of the appellate court cases that appear in this text involve appeals of motions for summary judgment or other motions that were denied by trial court judges. Note that a party must have legitimate grounds to file an appeal (some legal error) and that few trial court decisions are reversed on appeal. Moreover, the expenses associated with an appeal can be considerable.¹²

Filing the Appeal

If Carvello decides to appeal the verdict in Kirby's favor, then his attorney must file a notice of appeal with the clerk of the trial court within a prescribed period of time. Carvello then becomes the appellant or petitioner. The clerk of the trial court sends to the reviewing court (usually an intermediate court of appeals) the record on appeal. The record contains all the pleadings, motions, and other documents filed with the court and a complete written transcript of the proceedings, including testimony, arguments, jury instructions, and judicial rulings.

Carvello's attorney will file an appellate brief with the reviewing court. The brief is a formal legal document outlining the facts and issues of the case, the judge's rulings or jury's findings that should be reversed or modified, the applicable law, and arguments on Carvello's behalf (citing applicable statutes and relevant cases as precedents). The attorney for the appellee (Kirby, in our hypothetical case) usually files an answering brief. Carvello's attorney can file a reply, although it is not required. The reviewing court then considers the case.

Appellate Review

As mentioned in Chapter 2, a court of appeals does not hear any evidence. Rather, it reviews the record for errors of law. Its decision concerning a case is based on the record on appeal and the briefs and arguments. The attorneys present oral arguments, after which the case is taken under advisement. The court then issues a written opinion. In general, appellate courts do not reverse findings of fact unless the findings are unsupported or contradicted by the evidence.

An appellate court has the following options after reviewing a case:

1. The court can affirm the trial court's decision. (Most decisions are affirmed.)
2. The court can reverse the trial court's judgment if it concludes that the trial court erred or that the jury did not receive proper instructions.

3. The appellate court can remand (send back) the case to the trial court for further proceedings consistent with its opinion on the matter.
4. The court might also affirm or reverse a decision in part. For example, the court might affirm the jury's finding that Carvello was negligent but remand the case for further proceedings on another issue (such as the extent of Kirby's damages).
5. An appellate court can also modify a lower court's decision. If the appellate court decides that the jury awarded an excessive amount in damages, for example, the court might reduce the award to a more appropriate, or fairer, amount.

Appellate courts apply different standards of review depending on the type of issue and the ruling involved. Generally, these standards require the reviewing court to give a certain amount of deference, or weight, to the findings of lower courts on specific issues. The following case illustrates how courts use standards of review.

Evans v. Eaton Corp. Long Term Disability Plan

United States Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit, 514 F.3d 315 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Eaton Corporation is a multinational manufacturing company that funds and administers a long-term disability benefits plan for its employees. Brenda Evans was an employee at Eaton. In 1998, due to severe rheumatoid arthritis, Evans quit her job at Eaton and filed for disability benefits. Eaton paid disability benefits to Evans without controversy prior to 2003, but that year, Evans's disability status became questionable. Her physician had prescribed a new medication that had dramatically improved Evans's arthritis. In addition, Evans had injured her spine in a car accident in 2002 and was claiming to be disabled by continuing back problems as well as arthritis. But diagnostic exams indicated that the injuries to Evans's back were not severe, and she could cook, shop, do laundry, wash dishes, and drive about seven miles a day. By 2004, medical opinion on Evans's condition was mixed. Some physicians who had examined Evans concluded that she was still disabled, but several other physicians had determined that Evans was no longer totally disabled and could work. On that basis, Eaton terminated her disability benefits. Evans filed a complaint in a federal district court alleging violations of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA, a federal law regulating pension plans that will be discussed in Chapter 34). The district court examined the evidence in great detail and concluded that Eaton had abused its discretion in failing to find Evans's examining physicians' opinions more credible. Eaton appealed.

WILKINSON, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

This case turns on a faithful application of the abuse of discretion standard of review, and so we begin with what is most crucial: a clear understanding of what that standard is, and what such standards are for. The purpose of standards of review

CASE 3.4 CONTINUED ♦ is to focus reviewing courts upon their proper role when passing on the conduct of other decision-makers. Standards of review are thus an elemental expression of judicial restraint, which, in their deferential varieties, safeguard the superior vantage points of those entrusted with primary decisional responsibility. * * * The clear error standard, for example, protects district courts' primacy as triers of fact. * * * Rational basis review protects the political choices of our government's elected branches. And trust law, to which ERISA is so intimately linked, uses the abuse of discretion standard to protect a fiduciary's [one whose relationship is based on trust] decisions concerning the trust funds in his care. [Emphasis added.]

The precise definitions of these various standards, the nuances separating them from one another, "cannot be imprisoned within any forms of words" * * *. But what these and other such standards share is the designation of a primary decision-maker other than the reviewing court, and the instrument, deference, with which that primacy is to be maintained.

* * * In [this] case, the Plan's language giving Eaton "discretionary authority to determine eligibility for benefits" and "the power and discretion to determine all questions of fact * * * arising in connection with the administration, interpretation and application of the Plan" is unambiguous, and Evans does not dispute the standard it requires. Thus the district court functions in this context as a * * * reviewing court with respect to the ERISA fiduciary's decision.

* * * *

At its immovable core, the abuse of discretion standard requires a reviewing court to show enough deference to a primary decision-maker's judgment that the court does not reverse merely because it would have come to a different result * * *. The trial judge has discretion in those cases where his ruling will not be reversed simply because an appellate court disagrees. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Under no formulation, however, may a court, faced with discretionary language like that in the plan instrument in this case, forget its duty of deference and its secondary rather than primary role in determining a claimant's right to benefits. The abuse of discretion standard in ERISA cases protects important values: the plan administrator's greater experience and familiarity with plan terms and provisions; the enhanced prospects of achieving consistent application of those terms and provisions that results; the desire of those who establish ERISA plans to preserve at least some role in their administration; and the importance of ensuring that funds which are not unlimited go to those who, according to the terms of the plan, are truly deserving.

* * * *

* * * Where an ERISA administrator rejects a claim to benefits on the strength of substantial evidence, careful and coherent reasoning, faithful adherence to the letter of ERISA and the language in the plan, and a fair and searching process, there can be no abuse of discretion—even if another, and arguably a better, decision-maker might have come to a different, and arguably a better, result.

* * * *

So standards of review do matter, for in every context they keep judges within the limits of their role and preserve other decision-makers' functions against judicial intrusion.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit reversed the district court's award of benefits to Evans and remanded the case with instructions that the district court enter a judgment in favor of Eaton. The district court had incorrectly applied the abuse of discretion standard when reviewing Eaton's termination of Evans's benefits.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • The appellate court noted in this case that the district court's decision—which granted benefits to Evans—might arguably have been a better decision under the facts. If the court believed that the district court's conclusion was arguably better, then why did it reverse the decision? What does this tell you about the standards for review that appellate judges use?

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that it was clear from the evidence on record that the ERISA administrator had not been careful and consistent and had rejected Evans's claim merely because of a personal dislike for Evans. How might this fact have changed the result in this case?

Higher Appellate Courts

If the reviewing court is an intermediate appellate court, the losing party may decide to appeal the decision to the state's highest court, usually called its supreme court. Although the losing party has a right to ask (petition) a higher court to review the case, the party does not have a right to have the case heard by the higher appellate court. Appellate courts normally have discretionary power and can accept or reject an appeal. Like the United States Supreme Court, state supreme courts generally deny most petitions for appeal.

If the petition is granted, new briefs must be filed before the state supreme court, and the attorneys may be allowed or requested to present oral arguments. Like the intermediate appellate courts, the supreme court can reverse or affirm the lower appellate court's decision or remand the case. At this point, the case typically has reached its end (unless a federal question is at issue and one of the parties has legitimate grounds to seek review by a federal appellate court).

Concept Summary 3.3 reviews the options that the parties may pursue after the trial.

ENFORCING THE JUDGMENT

The uncertainties of the litigation process are compounded by the lack of guarantees that any judgment will be enforceable. Even if the jury awards Kirby the full amount of damages requested ($100,000), for example, Carvello's auto insurance coverage might have lapsed, in which event the company would not pay any of the damages. Alternatively, Carvello's insurance policy might be limited to $50,000, meaning that Carvello personally would have to pay the remaining $50,000.

Requesting Court Assistance in Collecting the Judgment

If the defendant does not have the funds available to pay the judgment, the plaintiff can go back to the court and request that the court issue a writ of execution. A writ of execution is an order directing the sheriff to seize and sell the defendant's nonexempt assets, or property (certain assets are exempted by law from creditors' actions). The proceeds of the sale are

Posttrial Options

Procedure	Description
Posttrial Motions	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> Motion for a new trial—If the judge believes that the jury was in error but is not convinced that the losing party should have won, the motion normally is granted. It can also be granted on the basis of newly discovered evidence, misconduct by the participants during the trial, or error by the judge. Motion for judgment n.o.v. ("notwithstanding the verdict")—The party making the motion must have filed a motion for a directed verdict at the close of the presentation of evidence during the trial; the motion will be granted if the judge is convinced that the jury was in error.
Appeal	Either party can appeal the trial court's judgment to an appropriate court of appeals. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> Filing the appeal—The appealing party must file a notice of appeal with the clerk of the trial court, who forwards the record on appeal to the appellate court. Attorneys file appellate briefs. Appellate review—The appellate court does not hear evidence but bases its opinion, which it issues in writing, on the record on appeal and the attorneys' briefs and oral arguments. The court may affirm or reverse all (or part) of the trial court's judgment and/or remand the case for further proceedings consistent with its opinion. Most decisions are affirmed on appeal. Further review—In some cases, further review may be sought from a higher appellate court, such as a state supreme court. If a federal question is involved, the case may ultimately be appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

then used to pay the damages owed, and any excess proceeds are returned to the defendant. Alternatively, the nonexempt property itself could be transferred to the plaintiff in lieu of an outright payment. (Creditors' remedies, including those of judgment creditors, as well as exempt and nonexempt property, will be discussed in more detail in Chapter 28.)

Availability of Assets

The problem of collecting a judgment is less pronounced, of course, when a party is seeking to satisfy a judgment against a defendant with substantial assets that can be easily located, such as a major corporation. Usually, one of the factors considered by the plaintiff and his or her attorney before a lawsuit is initiated is whether the defendant has sufficient assets to cover the amount of damages sought. In addition, during the discovery process, attorneys routinely seek information about the location of the defendant's assets that might potentially be used to satisfy a judgment.

REVIEWING Court Procedures

Ronald Metzgar placed his fifteen-month-old son, Matthew, awake and healthy, in his playpen. Ronald left the room for five minutes and on his return found Matthew lifeless. A toy block had lodged in the boy's throat, causing him to choke to death. Ronald called 911, but efforts to revive Matthew were to no avail. There was no warning of a choking hazard on the box containing the block. Matthew's parents hired an attorney and sued Playskool, Inc., the manufacturer of the block, alleging that the manufacturer had been negligent in failing to warn of the block's hazard. Playskool filed a motion for summary judgment, arguing that the danger of a young child choking on a small block was obvious. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Suppose that the attorney the Metzgars hired agreed to represent them on a contingency-fee basis. What does that mean?
2. How would the Metzgars' attorney likely have served process (the summons and complaint) on Playskool, Inc.?
3. Should Playskool's request for summary judgment be granted? Why or why not?
4. Suppose that the judge denied Playskool's motion and the case proceeded to trial. After hearing all the evidence, the jury found in favor of the defendant. What options do the plaintiffs have at this point if they are not satisfied with the verdict?

 DEBATE THIS: Some consumer advocates argue that attorneys' high contingency fees—sometimes reaching 40 percent—unfairly deprive winning plaintiffs of too much of their awards. Should the government put a cap on contingency fees at, say, 20 percent of the award? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

3-1. Discovery Rules In the past, the rules of discovery were very restrictive, and trials often turned on elements of surprise. For example, a plaintiff would not necessarily know until the trial what the defendant's defense was going to be. In the last several decades, however, new rules of discovery have substantially changed this situation. Now each attorney can access practically all of the evidence that the other side intends to present at trial, with the exception of certain information—namely, the opposing attorney's work product. Work product is not a precise concept. Basically, it includes all of the attorney's thoughts on the case. Can you see any reason why such information should not be made available to the opposing attorney? Discuss fully.

3-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Motions.

When and for what purpose is each of the following motions made? Which of them would be appropriate if a defendant claimed that the only issue between the parties was a question of law and that the law was favorable to the defendant's position?

- (a) A motion for judgment on the pleadings.
 - (b) A motion for a directed verdict.
 - (c) A motion for summary judgment.
 - (d) A motion for judgment n.o.v.
- For a sample answer to Question 3-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

3-3. Motion for a New Trial Washoe Medical Center, Inc., admitted Shirley Swisher for the treatment of a fractured pelvis. During her stay, Swisher suffered a fatal fall from her hospital bed. Gerald Parodi, the administrator of her estate, and others filed an action against Washoe seeking damages for the alleged lack of care in treating Swisher. During voir dire, when the plaintiffs' attorney returned a few minutes late from a break, the trial judge led the prospective jurors in a standing ovation. The judge joked with one of the prospective jurors, whom he had known in college, about his fitness to serve as a judge and personally endorsed another prospective juror's business. After the trial, the jury returned a verdict in favor of Washoe. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial, but the judge denied the motion. The plaintiffs then appealed, arguing that the tone set by the judge during voir dire prejudiced their right to a fair trial. Should the appellate court agree? Why or why not?

3-4. Discovery Advance Technology Consultants, Inc. (ATC), contracted with RoadTrac, LLC, to provide software and client software systems for the products of global positioning satellite (GPS) technology being developed by RoadTrac. RoadTrac agreed to provide ATC with hardware with which ATC's software would interface. Problems soon arose, however. ATC claimed that RoadTrac's hardware was defective, making it difficult to develop the software. RoadTrac contended that its hardware was fully functional and that ATC had simply failed to provide supporting software. ATC told RoadTrac that it considered their contract terminated. RoadTrac filed a suit in a Georgia state court against ATC alleging breach of contract. During discovery, RoadTrac requested ATC's customer lists and marketing procedures. ATC objected to providing this information because RoadTrac and ATC had become competitors in the GPS industry. Should a party to a lawsuit have to hand over its confidential business secrets as part of a discovery request? Why or why not? What limitations might a court consider imposing before requiring ATC to produce this material?

3-5. Service of Process To establish a Web site, a person must have an Internet service provider or hosting company, register a domain name, and acquire domain name servicing. Pfizer, Inc., Pfizer Ireland Pharmaceuticals, and Warner-Lambert Co. (collectively, Pfizer) filed a suit in a federal district court against Domains By Proxy, Inc., and other persons alleged to be behind two Web sites—www.generclipitors.com and www.econopetcare.com. Among the defendants were an individual and a company that, according to Pfizer, were located in a foreign country. Without investigating other means of serving these two defendants, Pfizer asked the court for permission to accomplish service of process via e-mail. Under what circumstances is service via e-mail proper? Would it be appropriate in this case? Explain. [Pfizer, Inc. v. Domains By Proxy, ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (D.Conn. 2004)]

3-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Appellate Review.

BSH Home Appliances Corp. makes appliances under the Bosch, Siemens, Thermador, and Gaggenau brands. To make and market the "Pro 27 Stainless Steel Range," a restaurant-quality range for home use, BSH gave specifications for its burner to Detroit Radiant Products Co. and requested a price for 30,000 units. Detroit quoted $28.25 per unit, offering to absorb all tooling and research and development costs. In 2001 and 2003, BSH sent Detroit two purchase orders, for 15,000 and 16,000 units, respectively. In 2004, after Detroit had shipped 12,886 units, BSH stopped scheduling deliveries. Detroit filed a suit against BSH, alleging breach of contract. BSH argued, in part, that the second purchase order had not added to the first but had replaced it. After a trial, a federal district court issued its "Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law." The court found that the two purchase orders "required BSH to purchase 31,000 units of the burner at $28.25 per unit." The court ruled that Detroit was entitled to $418,261 for 18,114 unsold burners. BSH appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. Can an appellate court set aside a trial court's findings of fact? Can an appellate court come to its own conclusions of law? What should the court rule in this case? Explain. [Detroit Radiant Products Co. v. BSH Home Appliances Corp., 473 F.3d 623 (6th Cir. 2007)]

to recover for injuries to her head, neck, and shoulder. Peatie claimed that she had been struck two years earlier by a metal cylinder falling from a store ceiling. The parties agreed to nonbinding arbitration. Ten days before the hearing in January 2006, the plaintiff asked for, and was granted, four more months to conduct discovery. On the morning of the rescheduled hearing, she asked for more time, but the court denied this request. The hearing was held, and the arbitrator ruled in Wal-Mart's favor. Peatie filed a motion for a new trial, which was granted. Five months later, she sought through discovery to acquire any photos, records, and reports held by Wal-Mart regarding her alleged injury. The court issued a "protective order" against the request, stating that the time for discovery had long been over. On the day of the trial—four years after the alleged injury—the plaintiff asked the court to lift the order. Should the court do so? Why or why not? [Peatie v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 112 Conn.App. 8, 961 A.2d 1016 (2009)]

3-8. Jury Misconduct Michelle Fleshner worked for Pepose Vision Institute (PVI), a surgical practice. She was fired after she provided information to the Department of Labor about PVI's overtime pay policy. She sued for wrongful termination, and the jury awarded her $125,000. After the trial, a juror told PVI's attorneys that another juror had made anti-Semitic statements during jury deliberations. The comments concerned a witness who testified on PVI's behalf. According to the juror, the other juror said, about the witness: "She is a Jewish witch." "She is a penny-pinching Jew." "She was such a cheap Jew that she did not want to pay Plaintiff unemployment compensation." Another juror confirmed the remarks. PVI filed a motion for a new trial on the basis of juror misconduct. The trial judge held that the comments did not prevent a fair trial from occurring. PVI appealed. Do you think such comments are sufficient to require a new trial, or must a juror's bias be discovered during voir dire for it to matter? Explain. [Fleshner v. Pepose Vision Institute, 304 S.W.3d 81 (Mo. 2010)]

3-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Service of Process.

Narnia Investments, Ltd., filed a suit in a Texas state court against several defendants, including Harvestons Securities, Inc., a securities dealer. (Securities are documents evidencing the ownership of a corporation, in the form of stock, or debts owed by it, in the form of bonds.) Harvestons is registered with the state of Texas, and thus a party may serve a summons and a copy of a complaint on Harvestons by serving the Texas Securities Commissioner. In this case, the return of service indicated that process was served on the commissioner "by delivering to JoAnn Kocerek defendant, in person, a true copy of this [summons] together with the accompanying copy(ies) of the [complaint]." Harvestons did not file an answer, and Narnia obtained a default judgment against the defendant for $365,000, plus attorneys' fees and interest. Five months after this judgment, Harvestons filed a motion for a new trial, which the court denied. Harvestons appealed to a state intermediate appellate court, claiming that it had not been served in strict compliance with the rules governing service of process. [Harvestons Securities, Inc. v. Narnia Investments, Ltd., 218 S.W.3d 126 (Tex.App.—Houston 2007)]

- (a) Harvestons asserted that Narnia's service was invalid, in part, because "the return of service states that process was delivered to 'JoAnn Kocerek'" and did not show that she "had the authority to accept process on behalf of Harvestons or the Texas Securities Commissioner." Should such a detail, if it is required, be strictly construed and applied? Should it apply in this case? Explain.
- (b) Whose responsibility is it to see that service of process is accomplished properly? Was it accomplished properly in this case? Why or why not?

- (a) Issue: On what preliminary step to litigation does the issue in this case focus?
- (b) Rule of Law: What are the chief requirements for fulfilling the pretrial procedure at the center of the dispute in this case?
- (c) Applying the Rule of Law: In applying the rule of law in this case, what did the court infer, and what did that inference imply for the defendant?

CHAPTER 4

Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

The U.S. Constitution is the supreme law in this country!¹ As mentioned in Chapter 1, neither Congress nor any state may pass a law that conflicts with the Constitution. Laws that govern business have their origin in the lawmaking authority granted by this document.

1. See Appendix B for the full text of the U.S. Constitution.

In this chapter, we examine some basic constitutional concepts and clauses and their significance for businesspersons. We then look at certain freedoms guaranteed by the first ten amendments to the Constitution—the Bill of Rights—and discuss how these freedoms affect business activities.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS OF GOVERNMENT

Following the Revolutionary War, the states—through the Articles of Confederation—created a confederal form of government in which the states had the authority to govern themselves and the national government could exercise only limited powers. When problems arose because the nation was facing an economic crisis and state laws interfered with the free flow of commerce, a national convention was called, and the delegates drafted the U.S. Constitution. This document, after its ratification by the states in 1789, became the basis for an entirely new form of government.

A Federal Form of Government

The new government created by the U.S. Constitution reflected a series of compromises made by the convention delegates on various issues. Some delegates wanted sovereign power to remain with the states; others wanted the national government alone to exercise sovereign power. The end result was a compromise—a federal form of government in which the national government and the states share sovereign power.

The Constitution sets forth specific powers that can be exercised by the national government and provides that the national government has the implied power to undertake actions necessary to carry out its expressly designated powers (or enumerated powers). All other powers are expressly “reserved” to the states under the Tenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

As part of their inherent sovereignty, state governments have the authority to regulate affairs within their borders. As mentioned, this authority stems, in part, from the Tenth Amendment, which reserves all powers not delegated to the national government to the states or to the people. State regulatory powers are often referred to as police powers. The term does not relate solely to criminal law enforcement but rather refers to the broad right of state governments to regulate private activities to protect or promote the public order, health, safety, morals, and general welfare. Fire and building codes, antidiscrimination laws, parking regulations, zoning restrictions, licensing requirements, and thousands of other state statutes covering almost every aspect of life have been enacted pursuant to states’ police powers. Local governments, including cities, also exercise police powers.² Generally, state laws enacted pursuant to a state’s police powers carry a strong presumption of validity.

2. Local governments derive their authority to regulate their communities from the state, because they are creatures of the state. In other words, they cannot come into existence unless authorized by the state to do so.

Relations among the States

The U.S. Constitution also includes provisions concerning relations among the states in our federal system. Particularly important are the privileges and immunities clause and the full faith and credit clause.

THE PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES CLAUSE Article IV, Section 2, of the U.S. Constitution provides that the “Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States.” This clause is often referred to as the interstate privileges and immunities clause.³ It prevents a state from imposing unreasonable burdens on citizens of another state—particularly with regard to means of livelihood or doing business. When a citizen of one state engages in basic and essential activities in another state (the “foreign state”), the foreign state must have a substantial reason for treating the nonresident differently from its own residents. Basic activities include transferring property, seeking employment, or accessing the court system. The foreign state must also establish that its reason for the discrimination is substantially related to the state’s ultimate purpose in adopting the legislation or regulating the activity.⁴

THE FULL FAITH AND CREDIT CLAUSE Article IV, Section 1, of the U.S. Constitution provides that “Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State.” This clause, which is referred to as the full faith and credit clause, applies only to civil matters. It ensures that rights established under deeds, wills, contracts, and similar instruments in one state will be honored by other states. It also ensures that any judicial decision with respect to such property rights will be honored and enforced in all states.

The full faith and credit clause was originally included in the Articles of Confederation to promote mutual friendship among the people of the various states. In fact, it has contributed to the unity of American citizens because it protects their legal rights as they move about from state to state. It also protects the rights of those to whom they owe obligations, such as a person who is awarded monetary damages by a court. The ability to enforce such rights is extremely important for the conduct of business in a country with a very mobile citizenry.

The Separation of the National Government’s Powers

To guard against the possibility that the national government might use its power arbitrarily, the Constitution provided for three branches of government. The legislative branch makes the laws, the executive branch enforces the laws, and the judicial branch interprets the laws. Each branch performs a separate function, and no branch may exercise the authority of another branch.

Additionally, a system of checks and balances allows each branch to limit the actions of the other two branches, thus preventing any one branch from exercising too much power. Some examples of these checks and balances include the following:

1. The legislative branch (Congress) can enact a law, but the executive branch (the president) has the constitutional authority to veto that law.
2. The executive branch is responsible for foreign affairs, but treaties with foreign governments require the advice and consent of the Senate.
3. Congress determines the jurisdiction of the federal courts and the president appoints federal judges, with the advice and consent of the Senate, but the judicial branch has the power to hold actions of the other two branches unconstitutional.⁵

The Commerce Clause

To prevent states from establishing laws and regulations that would interfere with trade and commerce among the states, the Constitution expressly delegated to the national government the power to regulate interstate commerce. Article I, Section 8, of the U.S. Constitution explicitly permits Congress “[t]o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes.” This clause, referred to as the commerce clause, has had a greater impact on business than any other provision in the Constitution. The commerce clause provides the basis for the national government’s extensive regulation of state and even local affairs.

One of the early questions raised by the commerce clause was whether the word among in the phrase “among the several States” meant between the states or between and within the states. For some time, the courts interpreted the commerce clause to apply only to commerce between the states (interstate commerce) and not commerce within the states (intrastate commerce). In 1824, however, the United States Supreme Court decided the landmark case of Gibbons v. Ogden.⁶ The Court ruled that commerce within the states could also be regulated by the national government as long as the commerce substantially affected commerce involving more than one state.

THE EXPANSION OF NATIONAL POWERS UNDER THE COMMERCE CLAUSE In Gibbons v. Ogden, the Supreme Court expanded the commerce clause to cover activities that “substantially affect interstate commerce.” As the nation grew and faced new kinds of problems, the commerce clause became a vehicle for the additional expansion of the national government’s regulatory powers. Even activities that seemed purely local in nature came under the regulatory reach of the national government if those activities were deemed to substantially affect interstate commerce.

In 1942, for example, the Supreme Court held that wheat production by an individual farmer intended wholly for consumption on his own farm was subject to federal regulation.⁷ In Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States,⁸ a landmark case decided in 1964, the Supreme Court upheld the federal government’s authority to prohibit racial discrimination nationwide in public facilities, including local motels, based on its powers under the commerce clause. The Court noted that “if it is interstate commerce that feels the pinch, it does not matter how local the operation that applies the squeeze.”

THE COMMERCE CLAUSE TODAY Today, the national government continues to rely on the commerce clause for its constitutional authority to regulate business activities in the United States. The breadth of the commerce clause permits the national government to legislate in areas in which Congress has not explicitly been granted power. In the last twenty years, however, the Supreme Court has begun to curb somewhat the national government’s regulatory authority under the commerce clause. In 1995, the Court held—for the first time in sixty years—that Congress had exceeded its regulatory authority under the commerce clause. The Court struck down an act that banned the possession of guns within one thousand feet of any school because the act attempted to regulate an area that had “nothing to do with commerce.”⁹ Subsequently, the Court invalidated key portions of two other federal acts on the ground that they exceeded Congress’s commerce clause authority.¹⁰

MEDICAL MARIJUANA LAWS AND THE COMMERCE CLAUSE In one notable case, however, the Supreme Court did allow the federal government to regulate noncommercial activities taking place wholly within a state’s borders.

CASE IN POINT About a dozen states, including California, have adopted “medical marijuana” laws that legalize marijuana for medical purposes. Marijuana possession, however, is illegal under the federal Controlled Substances Act (CSA).¹¹ After the federal government seized the marijuana that two seriously ill California women were using on the advice of their physicians, the women filed a lawsuit. They argued that it was unconstitutional for the federal statute to prohibit them from using marijuana for medical purposes that were legal within the state. In 2005, however, the United States Supreme Court held that Congress has the authority to prohibit the intrastate possession and noncommercial cultivation of marijuana as part of a larger regulatory scheme (the CSA).¹² In other words, state laws that allow the use of medical marijuana do not insulate the users from federal prosecution.

THE “DORMANT” COMMERCE CLAUSE The United States Supreme Court has interpreted the commerce clause to mean that the national government has the exclusive authority to regulate commerce that substantially affects trade and commerce among the states. This express grant of authority to the national government, which is often referred to as the “positive” aspect of the commerce clause, implies a negative aspect—that the states do not have the authority to regulate interstate commerce.

8. 379 U.S. 241, 85 S.Ct. 348, 13 L.Ed.2d 258 (1964).

9. The Court held the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990 to be unconstitutional in United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 115 S.Ct. 1624, 131 L.Ed.2d 626 (1995).

12. Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1, 125 S.Ct. 2195, 162 L.Ed.2d 1 (2005).

This negative aspect of the commerce clause is often referred to as the “dormant” (implied) commerce clause.

The dormant commerce clause comes into play when state regulations affect interstate commerce. In this situation, the courts weigh the state’s interest in regulating a certain matter against the burden that the state’s regulation places on interstate commerce. Because courts balance the interests involved, it is difficult to predict the outcome in a particular case.

In the following case, the plaintiffs—a group of California wineries and others—contended that a 2006 Massachusetts statute discriminated against out-of-state wineries in violation of the dormant commerce clause. A federal district court agreed and enjoined (prevented) the enforcement of the statute. The commonwealth of Massachusetts appealed the trial court’s decision.

Family Winemakers of California v. Jenkins^a United States Court of Appeals, First Circuit, 592 F.3d 1 (2010).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

LYNCH, Chief Judge.

* * * *

The ratification of the Twenty-first Amendment ended Prohibition^c and gave states substantial control over the regulation of alcoholic beverages. Most states, including Massachusetts, then imposed a three-tier system to control the sale of alcoholic beverages within their territories. The hallmark of the three-tier system is a rigid, tightly regulated separation between producers, wholesalers, and retailers of alcoholic beverages. Producers can ordinarily sell alcoholic beverages only to licensed in-state wholesalers. Wholesalers then must obtain licenses to sell to retailers. Retailers, which include stores, taverns, restaurants, and bars, must in turn obtain licenses to sell to consumers or to serve alcohol on their premises. Recently, as to wine, Massachusetts has adjusted the separation between these three tiers * * * .

* * * *

of distribution because of its economic advantages, especially for wineries that do not rank among the fifty to one hundred largest producers. Direct shipping lets consumers directly order wines from the winery, with access to their full range of wines, not just those a wholesaler is willing to distribute. Direct shipping also avoids added steps in the distribution chain, eliminating wholesaler and retailer price markups.

Before 2005, Massachusetts’s * * * winery licensing law * * * allowed only in-state wineries to obtain licenses to combine distribution methods through wholesalers, retailers, and direct shipping to consumers. [After the United States Supreme Court] invalidated similar facially discriminatory state laws, [the 2005 Massachusetts law] was held to be invalid under the Commerce Clause.

In 2006, the Massachusetts legislature enacted [a new law regulating wineries, which] does not distinguish on its face between in-state and out-of-state wineries’ eligibility for direct shipping licenses, but instead distinguishes between “small” or “large” wineries through [a] 30,000 gallon cap.

* * * All wineries producing over 30,000 gallons of wine—all of which are located outside Massachusetts—can apply for a “large winery shipment license[.]” * * * “Large” wineries can either choose to remain completely within the three-tier system and distribute their wines solely through wholesalers, or they can completely opt out of the three-tier system and sell their wines in Massachusetts exclusively through direct shipping [to consumers]. They cannot do both. * * * By contrast, “small” wineries can simultaneously use the traditional wholesaler distribution method, direct distribution to retailers, and direct shipping to reach consumers.

* * * *

* * * *Discrimination under the Commerce Clause “means differential treatment of in-state and out-of-state economic interests that benefits the former and burdens the latter,” as opposed to state laws that “regulate * * * evenhandedly with only incidental effects on interstate commerce[.]”* [Emphasis added.]

point between “small” and “large” wineries, along with [a] production exception for fruit wine, has both a discriminatory effect and [a] purpose. The discriminatory effect is because [the law’s] definition of “large” wineries encompasses the wineries which produce 98 percent of all wine in the United States, all of which are located out-of-state and all of which are deprived of the benefits of combining distribution methods. All wines produced in Massachusetts, on the other hand, are from “small” wineries that can use multiple distribution methods. Plaintiffs also say that [the law] is discriminatory in purpose because the gallonage cap’s particular features, along with legislators’ statements and [the law’s] process of enactment, show that [the law’s] true purpose was to ensure that Massachusetts’s wineries obtained advantages over their out-of-state counterparts.

 * * * State laws that alter conditions of competition to favor in-state interests over out-of-state competitors in a market have long been subject to invalidation.
 * * * Here, the totality of the evidence introduced by plaintiffs demonstrates that [the law’s] preferential treatment of “small” wineries that produce 30,000 gallons or less of grape wine is discriminatory. Its effect is to significantly alter the terms of competition between in-state and out-of-state wineries to the detriment of the out-of-state wineries that produce 98 percent of the country’s wine.

[The 2006 law] confers a clear competitive advantage to “small” wineries, which include all Massachusetts’s wineries, and creates a comparative disadvantage for “large” wineries, none of which are in Massachusetts. “Small” wineries that obtain a * * * license can use direct shipping to consumers, retailer distribution, and wholesaler distribution simultaneously. Combining these distribution methods allows “small” wineries to sell their full range of wines at maximum efficiency because they serve complementary markets. “Small” wineries that produce higher-volume wines can continue distributing those wines through wholesaler relationships. They can obtain new markets for all their wines by distributing their wines directly to retailers, including individual bars, restaurants, and stores. They can also use direct shipping to offer their full range of wines directly to Massachusetts consumers, resulting in greater overall sales.

We conclude that [the 2006 law] altered the competitive balance to favor Massachusetts’s wineries and disfavor out-of-state competition by design.

* * * *

We affirm the judgment of the district court.

QUESTIONS

1. The court held that the Massachusetts statute discriminated against out-of-state wineries “by design” (intentionally). How can a court determine legislative intent?
2. Suppose that most “small” wineries, as defined by the 2006 Massachusetts law, were located out of state. How could the law be discriminatory in that situation?

The Supremacy Clause and Federal Preemption

Article VI of the U.S. Constitution, commonly referred to as the supremacy clause, provides that the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are “the supreme Law of the Land.” When there is a direct conflict between a federal law and a state law, the state law is rendered invalid. Because some powers are concurrent (shared by the federal government and the states), however, it is necessary to determine which law governs in a particular circumstance.

When Congress chooses to act exclusively in an area in which the federal government and the states have concurrent powers, preemption occurs. A valid federal statute or regulation will take precedence over a conflicting state or local law or regulation on the same general subject. Often, it is not clear whether Congress, in passing a law, intended to preempt an entire subject area against state regulation, and it is left to the courts to determine whether Congress intended to exercise exclusive power over a given area. No single factor is decisive as to whether a court will find preemption. Generally, congressional intent to preempt will be found if a federal law regulating an activity is so pervasive, comprehensive, or detailed that the states have no room to regulate in that area. Also, when a federal statute creates an agency to enforce the law, the agency’s rulings on matters that come within its jurisdiction will likely preempt state laws.

CASE IN POINT The United States Supreme Court heard a case involving a man who alleged that he had been injured by a faulty medical device (a balloon catheter that had been inserted into his artery following a heart attack). The Court found that the Medical Device Amendments of 1976 had included a preemption provision and that the device had passed the U.S. Food and Drug Administration's rigorous premarket approval process. Therefore, the Court ruled that the federal regulation of medical devices preempted the injured party's state common law claims for negligence, strict liability, and implied warranty¹³ (see Chapters 7 and 22).

The Taxing and Spending Powers

Article I, Section 8, of the U.S. Constitution provides that Congress has the "Power to lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts, and Excises." Section 8 further requires uniformity in taxation among the states, and thus Congress may not tax some states while exempting others. Traditionally, if Congress attempted to regulate indirectly, by taxation, an area over which it had no authority, the courts would invalidate the tax. Today, however, if a tax measure is reasonable, it generally is held to be within the national taxing power. Moreover, the expansive interpretation of the commerce clause almost always provides a basis for sustaining a federal tax.

Article I, Section 8, also gives Congress its spending power—the power "to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States." Congress can spend revenues not only to carry out its expressed powers but also to promote any objective it deems worthwhile, so long as it does not violate the Bill of Rights. The spending power necessarily involves policy choices, with which taxpayers may disagree.

BUSINESS AND THE BILL OF RIGHTS

The importance of a written declaration of the rights of individuals eventually caused the first Congress of the United States to submit twelve amendments to the U.S. Constitution to the states for approval. Ten of these amendments, commonly known as the Bill of Rights, were adopted in 1791 and embody a series of protections for the individual against various types of interference by the federal government.¹⁴ The protections guaranteed by these ten amendments are summarized in Exhibit 4–1 on the following page.¹⁵ Some of these constitutional protections apply to business entities as well. For example, corporations exist as separate legal entities, or legal persons, and enjoy many of the same rights and privileges as natural persons do.

Limits on Federal and State Governmental Actions

As originally intended, the Bill of Rights limited only the powers of the national government. Over time, however, the United States Supreme Court "incorporated" most of these rights into the protections against state actions afforded by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. That amendment, passed in 1868 after the Civil War, provides, in part, that "[n]o State shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." Starting in 1925, the Supreme Court began to define various rights and liberties guaranteed in the U.S. Constitution as constituting "due process of law," which was required of state governments under the Fourteenth Amendment. Today, most of the rights and liberties set forth in the Bill of Rights apply to state governments as well as the national government. In other words, neither the federal government nor state governments can deprive persons of those rights and liberties.

The rights secured by the Bill of Rights are not absolute. As you can see in Exhibit 4–1 on the next page, many of the rights guaranteed by the first ten amendments are set forth in very general terms. For example, the Second Amendment states that people have a right to keep and bear arms, but it does not explain the extent of this right. As the Supreme Court noted in 2008, this does not mean that people can "keep and carry any weapon whatsoever in any manner whatsoever and for whatever purpose."¹⁶ Legislatures can prohibit the carrying of concealed weapons or certain types of weapons, such as machine guns. Ultimately, it is the United States Supreme Court, as the final interpreter of the Constitution, that gives meaning to these rights and determines their boundaries.

Freedom of Speech

A democratic form of government cannot survive unless people can freely voice their political opinions and criticize government actions or policies.

First Amendment: Guarantees the freedoms of religion, speech, and the press and the rights to assemble peaceably and to petition the government.

Second Amendment: States that the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

Third Amendment: Prohibits, in peacetime, the lodging of soldiers in any house without the owner's consent.

Fourth Amendment: Prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures of persons or property.

Fifth Amendment: Guarantees the rights to indictment by grand jury, to due process of law, and to fair payment when private property is taken for public use; prohibits compulsory self-incrimination and double jeopardy (being tried again for an alleged crime for which one has already stood trial).

Sixth Amendment: Guarantees the accused in a criminal case the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury and with counsel. The accused has the right to cross-examine witnesses against him or her and to solicit testimony from witnesses in his or her favor.

Seventh Amendment: Guarantees the right to a trial by jury in a civil case involving at least twenty dollars.^a Eighth Amendment: Prohibits excessive bail and fines, as well as cruel and unusual punishment.

Ninth Amendment: Establishes that the people have rights in addition to those specified in the Constitution.

Tenth Amendment: Establishes that those powers neither delegated to the federal government nor denied to the states are reserved to the states and to the people.

a. Twenty dollars was forty days' pay for the average person when the Bill of Rights was written.

Freedom of speech, particularly political speech, is thus a prized right, and traditionally the courts have protected this right to the fullest extent possible.

Symbolic speech—gestures, movements, articles of clothing, and other forms of expressive conduct—is also given substantial protection by the courts. For example, the Supreme Court has held that the burning of the American flag as part of a peaceful protest is a constitutionally protected form of expression.¹⁷ Similarly, wearing a T-shirt with a photo of a presidential candidate is a constitutionally protected form of expression.

REASONABLE RESTRICTIONS Expression—oral, written, or symbolized by conduct—is subject to reasonable restrictions. A balance must be struck between a government's obligation to protect its citizens and those citizens' exercise of their rights. Reasonableness is analyzed on a case-by-case basis. If a restriction imposed by the government is content neutral, then a court may allow it. To be content neutral, the restriction must be aimed at combatting some societal problem, such as crime, and not be aimed at suppressing the expressive conduct or its message. Courts have often protected nude dancing as a form of symbolic expression but typically allow content-neutral laws that ban all public nudity.

CASE IN POINT Ria Ora was charged with dancing nude at an annual "anti-Christmas" protest in

Harvard Square in Cambridge, Massachusetts, under a statute banning public displays of open and gross lewdness. Ora argued that the statute was overbroad and unconstitutional, and a trial court agreed. On appeal, a state appellate court upheld the statute as constitutional in situations in which there was an unsuspecting or unwilling audience.¹⁸

CORPORATE POLITICAL SPEECH Political speech by corporations also falls within the protection of the First Amendment. For example, many years ago the United States Supreme Court struck down as unconstitutional a Massachusetts statute that prohibited corporations from making political contributions or expenditures that individuals were permitted to make.¹⁹ Similarly, the Court has held that a law forbidding a corporation from including inserts with its bills to express its views on controversial issues violates the First Amendment.²⁰ Corporate political speech continues to be given significant protection under the First Amendment. For example, in 2010 the Court overturned a twenty-year-old precedent when it ruled that corporations can spend freely to support or oppose candidates for president and Congress.²¹

COMMERCIAL SPEECH The courts also give substantial protection to commercial speech, which consists of communications—primarily advertising and marketing—made by business firms that involve only their commercial interests. The protection given to commercial speech under the First Amendment is less extensive than that afforded to noncommercial speech, however. A state may restrict certain kinds of advertising, for example, in the interest of preventing consumers from being misled. States also have a legitimate interest in roadside beautification and therefore may impose restraints on billboard advertising. For example, in one Florida case, the court found that a law preventing a nude dancing establishment from billboard advertising was constitutionally permissible because it directly advanced a substantial government interest in highway beautification and safety.²²

Generally, a restriction on commercial speech will be considered valid as long as it meets three criteria: (1) it must seek to implement a substantial government interest, (2) it must directly advance that interest, and (3) it must go no further than necessary to accomplish its objective.

At issue in the following case was whether a government agency had unconstitutionally restricted commercial speech when it prohibited the inclusion of a certain illustration on beer labels.

Bad Frog Brewery, Inc. v. New York State Liquor Authority

www.findlaw.com/casecode/index.html^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Bad Frog Brewery, Inc., makes and sells alcoholic beverages. Some of the beverages feature labels that display a drawing of a frog making the gesture generally known as “giving the finger.” Bad Frog’s authorized New York distributor, Renaissance Beer Company, applied to the New York State Liquor Authority (NYSLA) for brand label approval, as required by state law before the beer could be sold in New York. The NYSLA denied the application, in part, because “the label could appear in grocery and convenience stores, with obvious exposure on the shelf to children of tender age.” Bad Frog filed a suit in a federal district court against the NYSLA, asking for, among other things, an injunction against the denial of the application. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the NYSLA. Bad Frog appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

CASE 4.2 CONTINUED ♦ children, NYSLA's label prohibition might well be found to make a justifiable contribution to the material advancement of such an effort, but its currently isolated response to the perceived problem, applicable only to labels on a product that children cannot purchase, does not suffice. * * * A state must demonstrate that its commercial speech limitation is part of a substantial effort to advance a valid state interest, not merely the removal of a few grains of offensive sand from a beach of vulgarity.

* * * Even if we were to assume that the state materially advances its asserted interest by shielding children from viewing the Bad Frog labels, it is plainly excessive to prohibit the labels from all use, including placement on bottles displayed in bars and taverns where parental supervision of children is to be expected. Moreover, to whatever extent NYSLA is concerned that children will be harmfully exposed to the Bad Frog labels when wandering without parental supervision around grocery and convenience stores where beer is sold, that concern could be less intrusively dealt with by placing restrictions on the permissible locations where the appellant's products may be displayed within such stores.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed the judgment of the district court and remanded the case for the entry of a judgment in favor of Bad Frog. The NYSLA's ban on the use of the labels lacked a "reasonable fit" with the state's interest in shielding minors from vulgarity, and the NYSLA did not adequately consider alternatives to the ban.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • If Bad Frog had sought to use the offensive label to market toys instead of beer, would the court's ruling likely have been the same? Why or why not?

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Whose interests are advanced by the banning of certain types of advertising?

UNPROTECTED SPEECH The United States Supreme Court has made it clear that certain types of speech will not be protected under the First Amendment. Speech that violates criminal laws (threatening speech and pornography, for example) is not constitutionally protected. Other unprotected speech includes fighting words (speech that is likely to incite others to respond violently).

Speech that harms the good reputation of another, or defamatory speech (see Chapter 6), also is not protected under the First Amendment. To constitute defamation, the speech in question must be an assertion of fact and not merely an opinion. Unlike an opinion, a statement of purported fact can be proved true or false.

Obscene Speech. The First Amendment, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, also does not protect obscene speech. Establishing an objective definition of obscene speech has proved difficult, however, and the Court has grappled from time to time with this problem. In Miller v. California,²³ the Supreme Court created a test for legal obscenity, including a set of requirements that must be met for material to be legally obscene. Under this test, material is obscene if (1) the average person finds that it violates contemporary community standards; (2) the work taken as a whole appeals to a prurient (arousing or obsessive) interest in sex; (3) the work shows patently offensive sexual conduct; and (4) the work lacks serious redeeming literary, artistic, political, or scientific merit.

Because community standards vary widely, the Miller test has had inconsistent applications, and obscenity remains a constitutionally unsettled issue. Numerous state and federal statutes make it a crime to disseminate obscene materials, including child pornography.

Online Obscenity. In 2000, Congress enacted the Children's Internet Protection Act (CIPA),²⁴ which requires public schools and libraries to install filtering software on computers to keep children from accessing adult content. Such software is designed to prevent persons from viewing certain Web sites based on a site's Internet address or its meta tags, or key words. The CIPA was challenged on constitutional grounds, but in 2003 the Supreme Court held that the act does not violate the First Amendment. The Court concluded that because libraries can disable the filters for any patrons who ask, the system is reasonably flexible

Due to the difficulties of policing the Internet as well as the constitutional complexities of prohibiting online obscenity through legislation, online obscenity remains a continuing problem in the United States (and worldwide). In 2005, the Federal Bureau of Investigation established an Anti-Porn Squad to target and prosecute companies that distribute child pornography in cyberspace. The Federal Communications Commission has also established new obscenity regulations for television networks. See this chapter's Insight into Ethics feature for a discussion of some problems surrounding virtual child pornography.

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

Is It Illegal to Distribute Virtual Pornography?

Millions of pornographic images of children are available on the Internet. Some are images of actual children engaged in sexual activity. Others are virtual (computer-generated) pornography—that is, images made to look like children engaged in sexual acts. Whereas child pornography is illegal, the Supreme Court has ruled that virtual pornography is legally protected under the First Amendment because it does not involve the exploitation of real children.^a

This ruling and the difficulty in distinguishing between real and virtual pornography have created problems for prosecutors. Before they can convict someone of disseminating child pornography on the Internet, they must prove that the images depict real children. To help remedy this problem, Congress enacted the Protect Act of 2003 (here, Protect stands for “Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to end the Exploitation of Children Today”).^b

The Protect Act’s Pandering Provisions

One of the Protect Act’s many provisions prohibits misrepresenting virtual child pornography as actual child pornography. The act’s “pandering” provision makes it a crime to knowingly advertise, present, distribute, or solicit “any material or purported material in a manner that reflects the belief, or that is intended to cause another to believe, that the material or purported material” is illegal child pornography.^c Thus, it may be a crime to intentionally distribute virtual child pornography.

This “pandering” provision was challenged in a 2008 case, United States v. Williams.^d The defendant, Michael Williams, sent a message to an Internet chat room that read “Dad of Toddler has ‘good’ pics of her an [sic] me for swap of your toddler pics.” A law enforcement agent responded by sending Williams a private message that contained photos of a college-aged female, which were computer altered to look like photos of a ten-year-old girl. Williams requested explicit photos of the girl, but the agent did not respond. After that, Williams sent another public message that accused the agent of being a cop and included a hyperlink containing seven pictures of minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct.

Williams was arrested and charged with possession of child pornography and pandering material that appeared to be child pornography. He claimed that the Protect Act’s pandering provision was unconstitutionally overbroad and vague. (He later pleaded guilty to the charges but preserved the issue of constitutionality for appeal.)

Is the Protect Act Constitutional?

On appeal, the federal appellate court held that the pandering provision of the Protect Act was unconstitutional because it criminalized speech regarding child pornography. The United States Supreme Court reversed that decision, ruling that the Protect Act was neither unconstitutionally overbroad nor impermissibly vague. The Court held that the statute was valid because it does not prohibit a substantial amount of protected speech. Rather, the act generally prohibits offers to provide, and requests to obtain, child pornography—both of which are unprotected speech. Thus, the act’s pandering provision remedied the constitutional defects of its predecessor, which had made it illegal to possess virtual child pornography.

INSIGHT INTO THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT

Why should it be illegal to “pander” virtual child pornography when it is not illegal to possess it?

Freedom of Religion

The First Amendment states that the government may neither establish any religion nor prohibit the free exercise of religious practices. The first part of this constitutional provision is referred to as the establishment clause, and the second part is known as the free exercise clause. Government action, both federal and state, must be consistent with this constitutional mandate.

THE ESTABLISHMENT CLAUSE The establishment clause prohibits the government from establishing a state-sponsored religion, as well as from passing laws that promote (aid or endorse) religion or that show a preference for one religion over another. Although the establishment clause involves the separation of church and state, it does not require a complete separation. Rather, it requires the government to accommodate religions. Federal or state laws that do not promote or place a significant burden on religion are constitutional even if they have some impact on religion. For a government law or policy to be constitutional, it must not have the primary effect of promoting or inhibiting religion.

Can a secular court resolve an internal church dispute over property ownership without becoming impermissibly entangled with questions of religion? The court in the following case faced that question.

In re Episcopal Church Cases

California Supreme Court, 45 Cal.4th 467, 87 Cal.Rptr.3d 275 (2009).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • The Episcopal Church of the United States is divided into regions called dioceses. In 2003, an openly gay man was ordained as bishop of an Episcopal diocese in New Hampshire. Some members of St. James Parish—an Episcopal parish in Los Angeles, California—did not agree with this ordination. The parish’s vestry (a board of elected laypersons that, with a rector, governs an Episcopal parish) voted to end its affiliation with the Episcopal Church and to affiliate with the Anglican Church of Uganda. After the disaffiliation, a dispute arose as to who owned the church building that the parish used for worship and the property on which the building stands. To resolve this dispute, the Episcopal Church and others filed a suit in a California state court against St. James and others, with both sides claiming ownership. The court ruled that the parish owned the building and the property, but a state intermediate appellate court reversed this judgment. St. James appealed to the California Supreme Court, arguing, in part, that the parish’s name was on the deed to the property.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

CHIN, J. [Justice]

* * * *

* * * State courts must not decide questions of religious doctrine; those are for the church to resolve. Accordingly, if resolution of a property dispute involves a point of doctrine, the court must defer to the position of the highest ecclesiastical authority that has decided the point. *But to the extent the court can resolve a property dispute without reference to church doctrine, it should apply neutral principles of law. The court should consider sources such as the deeds to the property in dispute, * * * the general church’s constitution, canons, and rules, and relevant statutes * * . [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

St. James Parish holds * * * title to the property in question. That is the fact that defendants rely on most heavily in claiming ownership. On the other hand, from the beginning of its existence, St. James Parish promised to be bound by the constitution and canons of the Episcopal Church. Such commitment is found in the original application to the higher church authorities to organize as a parish * * * .

* * * *

* * * The Episcopal Church’s adoption of Canon I.7.4 * * * strongly supports the conclusion that, once defendants left the general church, the property reverted to the general church.

* * * *

[A California state statute] permits the governing instruments of the general church to create an express trust in church property, which Canon I.7.4 does. * * * This statute also compels CASE 4.3 CONTINUED ♦ the conclusion that the general church owns the property now that defendants have left the general church.

Defendants state that, over the years, St. James Parish “purchased additional parcels of property in its own name, with funds donated exclusively by its members.” They contend that it would be unjust and contrary to the intent of the members * * * to cause the local parish to “lose its property simply because it has changed its spiritual affiliation.” But the matter is not so clear. * * * Did they act over the years intending to contribute to a church that was part of the Episcopal Church or to contribute to St. James Parish even if it later joined a different church? It is impossible to say for sure. Probably different contributors over the years would have had different answers if they had thought about it and were asked. The only intent a secular court can effectively discern is that expressed in legally cognizable documents.

* * * The individual defendants are free to disassociate themselves from the parish and the Episcopal Church and to affiliate themselves with another religious denomination. No court can interfere with or control such an exercise of conscience. The problem lies in defendants’ efforts to take the church property with them. This they may not do.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The California Supreme Court affirmed the appellate court’s judgment. The state supreme court applied “neutral principles of law” and concluded that the Episcopal Church, not St. James Parish, owned the property in question.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Should the court have considered whether the Episcopal Church had abandoned or departed from the tenets of faith and practice that it had held at the time of St. James’s affiliation? Why or why not?

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that before this property dispute was finally resolved, the church’s rules were changed to declare that “all property is held in trust for the local churches.” Would the result in this case have been different? Explain.

THE FREE EXERCISE CLAUSE The free exercise clause guarantees that a person can hold any religious belief that she or he wants, or a person can have no religious belief. This constitutional guarantee generally prevents the government from compelling a person to do something that is contrary to her or his religious beliefs. (Note that the clause applies only to the government—not to individuals and private businesses. See Chapter 35 for a discussion of laws that promote religious freedom in the employment context.)

When religious practices work against public policy and the public welfare, though, the government can act. For example, the government can require that a child receive certain types of vaccinations or medical treatment if his or her life is in danger—regardless of the child’s or parent’s religious beliefs. When public safety is an issue, an individual’s religious beliefs often have to give way to the government’s interest in protecting the public. The government’s interest must be sufficiently compelling, however.

CASE IN POINT A religious sect in New Mexico follows the practices of a Brazil-based church. Its members ingest hoasca tea as part of a ritual to connect with and better understand God. Hoasca tea, which is brewed from plants native to the Amazon rain forest, contains an illegal hallucinogenic drug. When federal drug agents confiscated the church’s shipment of hoasca tea as it entered the country, the church filed a lawsuit claiming that the government had violated its members’ right to freely exercise their religion. Ultimately, the Supreme Court ruled that the government had failed to demonstrate a sufficiently compelling interest in barring the sect’s sacramental use of hoasca.²⁶

Searches and Seizures

The Fourth Amendment protects the “right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects.” Before searching or seizing private property, law enforcement officers must usually obtain a search warrant—an order from a judge or other public official authorizing the search or seizure.

SEARCH WARRANTS AND PROBABLE CAUSE To obtain a search warrant, law enforcement officers must convince a judge that they have reasonable grounds, or probable cause, to believe a search will reveal evidence of a specific illegality. To establish probable cause, the officers must have trustworthy evidence that would convince a reasonable person that the proposed search or seizure is more likely justified than not. Furthermore, the Fourth Amendment prohibits general warrants. It requires a particular description of whatever is to be searched or seized. General searches through a person's belongings are impermissible. The search cannot extend beyond what is described in the warrant. Although search warrants require specificity, if a search warrant is issued for a person's residence, items that are in that residence may be searched even if they do not belong to that individual.

CASE IN POINT Paycom Billing Services, Inc., an online payment service, stores vast amounts of customer credit-card information. Christopher Adjani, a former Paycom employee, threatened to sell Paycom's confidential client information if the company did not pay him $3 million. Pursuant to an investigation, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) obtained a search warrant to search Adjani's person, automobile, and residence, including computer equipment. When the FBI agents served the warrant, they discovered evidence of the criminal scheme in the e-mail communications on a computer in Adjani's residence that belonged to Adjani's live-in girlfriend. The court held that the search of the computer was proper given the involvement of computers in the alleged crime.²⁷

SEARCHES AND SEIZURES IN THE BUSINESS CONTEXT Because of the strong governmental interest in protecting the public, a warrant normally is not required for seizures of spoiled or contaminated food. Nor are warrants required for searches of businesses in such highly regulated industries as liquor, guns, and strip mining. The standard used for highly regulated industries is sometimes applied in other contexts as well, such as screening for airline travel.

CASE IN POINT Christian Hartwell was attempting to board a flight from Philadelphia to Phoenix, Arizona. When he walked through the security checkpoint, he set off the alarm. Airport security took him aside and eventually discovered that he had two packages of crack cocaine in his pocket. When Hartwell was convicted of possession of drugs, he appealed, claiming that the airport search was suspicionless and violated his Fourth Amendment rights. A federal appellate court held that airports can be treated as highly regulated industries and that suspicionless checkpoint screening of airline passengers is constitutional.²⁸

Generally, government inspectors do not have the right to enter business premises without a warrant, although the standard of probable cause is not the same as that required in nonbusiness contexts. The existence of a general and neutral enforcement plan will normally justify issuance of the warrant. Lawyers and accountants frequently possess the business records of their clients, and inspecting these documents while they are out of the hands of their true owners also requires a warrant.

Self-Incrimination

The Fifth Amendment guarantees that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." Thus, in any federal or state (because the due process clause extends the protection to state courts) proceeding, an accused person cannot be forced to give testimony that might subject him or her to any criminal prosecution.

The Fifth Amendment's guarantee against self-incrimination extends only to natural persons. Therefore, neither corporations nor partnerships receive Fifth Amendment protection. When a partnership is required to produce business records, it must do so even if the information provided incriminates the individual partners of the firm. In contrast, sole proprietors and sole practitioners (those who fully own their businesses) cannot be compelled to produce their business records. These individuals have full protection against self-incrimination because they function in only one capacity; there is no separate business entity.

DUE PROCESS AND EQUAL PROTECTION

Other constitutional guarantees of great significance to Americans are mandated by the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments and the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

27. United States v. Adjani, 452 F.3d 1140 (9th Cir. 2006); cert. denied, 549 U.S. 1025, 127 S.Ct. 568, 166 L.Ed.2d 420 (2006).

28. United States v. Hartwell, 436 F.3d 174 (3d Cir. 2006).

Due Process

Both the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments provide that no person shall be deprived “of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.” The due process clause of these constitutional amendments has two aspects—procedural and substantive. Note that the due process clause applies to “legal persons” (that is, corporations), as well as to individuals.

PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS Procedural due process requires that any government decision to take life, liberty, or property must be made equitably; that is, the government must give a person proper notice and an opportunity to be heard. Fair procedures must be used in determining whether a person will be subjected to punishment or have some burden imposed on her or him. Fair procedure has been interpreted as requiring that the person have at least an opportunity to object to a proposed action before an impartial, neutral decision maker (which need not be a judge). Thus, for example, if a driver’s license is construed as a property interest, the state must provide some sort of opportunity for the driver to object before suspending or terminating the person’s license.

SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS Substantive due process protects an individual’s life, liberty, or property against certain government actions regardless of the fairness of the procedures used to implement them. Substantive due process limits what the government may do in its legislative and executive capacities. Legislation must be fair and reasonable in content and must further a legitimate governmental objective. Only when state conduct is arbitrary, or shocks the conscience, however, will it rise to the level of violating substantive due process.²⁹

If a law or other governmental action limits a fundamental right, the state must have a legitimate and compelling interest to justify its action. Fundamental rights include interstate travel, privacy, voting, marriage and family, and all First Amendment rights. Thus, a state must have a substantial reason for taking any action that infringes on a person’s free speech rights.

In situations not involving fundamental rights, a law or action does not violate substantive due process if it rationally relates to any legitimate government purpose. Under this test, almost any business regulation will be upheld as reasonable.

Equal Protection

Under the Fourteenth Amendment, a state may not “deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.” The United States Supreme Court has interpreted the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment to make the equal protection clause applicable to the federal government as well. Equal protection means that the government cannot enact laws that treat similarly situated individuals differently.

Both substantive due process and equal protection require review of the substance of the law or other governmental action rather than review of the procedures used. When a law or action limits the liberty of all persons to do something, it may violate substantive due process; when a law or action limits the liberty of some persons but not others, it may violate the equal protection clause. Thus, for example, if a law prohibits all advertising on the sides of trucks, it raises a substantive due process question; if it makes an exception to allow truck owners to advertise their own businesses, it raises an equal protection issue.

In an equal protection inquiry, when a law or action distinguishes between or among individuals, the basis for the distinction, or classification, is examined. Depending on the classification, the courts apply different levels of scrutiny, or “tests,” to determine whether the law or action violates the equal protection clause. The courts use one of three standards: strict scrutiny, intermediate scrutiny, or the “rational basis” test.

STRICT SCRUTINY If a law or action prohibits or inhibits some persons from exercising a fundamental right, the law or action will be subject to “strict scrutiny” by the courts. Under this standard, the classification must be necessary to promote a compelling state interest. Also, if the classification is based on a suspect trait—such as race, national origin, or citizenship status—it must be necessary to promote a compelling government interest.³⁰

Compelling state interests include remedying past unconstitutional or illegal discrimination but do not include correcting the general effects of “society’s discrimination.” For instance, for a city to give preference to minority applicants in awarding construction contracts, it normally must identify past unconstitutional or illegal discrimination against minority construction firms. Because the policy is based on suspect traits (race and national origin), it will violate the equal protection clause unless it is necessary to promote a compelling state interest. Generally, few laws or actions survive strict-scrutiny analysis by the courts.

29. See, for example, Breen v. Texas A&M University, 485 F.3d 325 (5th Cir. 2007); Hart v. City of Little Rock, 432 F.3d 801 (8th Cir. 2005); and County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 118 S.Ct. 1708, 140 L.Ed.2d 1043 (1998).

30. See, for example, Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 125 S.Ct. 1141, 160 L.Ed.2d 949 (2005).

INTERMEDIATE SCRUTINY Another standard, that of intermediate scrutiny, is applied in cases involving discrimination based on gender or legitimacy. Laws using these classifications must be substantially related to important government objectives. For example, an important government objective is preventing illegitimate teenage pregnancies. Therefore, because males and females are not similarly situated in this regard—only females can become pregnant—a law that punishes men but not women for statutory rape will be upheld, even though it treats men and women unequally.

The state also has an important objective in establishing time limits (called statutes of limitation) for how long after an event a particular type of action can be brought. Such limits prevent persons from bringing fraudulent and stale (outdated) claims.

THE “RATIONAL BASIS” TEST In matters of economic or social welfare, a classification will be considered valid if there is any conceivable rational basis on which the classification might relate to a legitimate government interest. It is almost impossible for a law or action to fail the rational basis test. Thus, for example, a city ordinance that in effect prohibits all pushcart vendors, except a specific few, from operating in a particular area of the city will be upheld if the city provides a rational basis—such as reducing the traffic in the particular area—for the ordinance. In contrast, a law that provides unemployment benefits only to people over six feet tall would clearly fail the rational basis test because it could not further any legitimate government objective.

SECTION 4 PRIVACY RIGHTS

The U.S. Constitution does not explicitly mention a general right to privacy. In a 1928 Supreme Court case, Olmstead v. United States,³¹ Justice Louis

31. 277 U.S. 438, 48 S.Ct. 564, 72 L.Ed. 944 (1928).

Brandeis stated in his dissent that the right to privacy is “the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men.” The majority of the justices at that time, however, did not agree with Brandeis. It was not until the 1960s that the Supreme Court endorsed the view that the Constitution protects individual privacy rights. In a landmark 1965 case, Griswold v. Connecticut,³² the Supreme Court held that a constitutional right to privacy was implied by the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Amendments.

Federal Statutes Affecting Privacy Rights

In the 1960s, Americans were sufficiently alarmed by the accumulation of personal information in government files that they pressured Congress to pass laws permitting individuals to access their files. Congress responded in 1966 with the Freedom of Information Act, which allows any person to request copies of any information on her or him contained in federal government files. In 1974, Congress passed the Privacy Act, which also gives persons the right to access such information. Since then, Congress has passed numerous other laws protecting individuals’ privacy rights with respect to financial transactions, electronic communications, and other activities in which personal information may be gathered and stored by organizations.

Since the 1990s, one of the major concerns of individuals has been how to protect privacy rights in cyberspace and to safeguard private information that may be revealed online (including credit-card numbers and financial information). The increasing value of personal information for online marketers—who are willing to pay a high price for such information to those who collect it—has exacerbated the situation.

PRETEXTING A pretext is a false motive put forth to hide the real motive, and pretexting is the process of obtaining information by false means. Pretexters may try to obtain personal data by claiming that they are taking a survey for a research firm, a political party, or even a charity. Congress passed the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act,³³ which made pretexting to obtain financial information illegal. Initially, it was not clear whether that law prohibited lying to obtain nonfinancial information for purposes other than identity theft.

32. 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965).

33. Also known as the Financial Services Modernization Act, Pub. L. No. 106-102 (1999), 113 Stat. 1338, codified in numerous sections of 12 U.S.C.A. and 15 U.S.C.A.

This gray area in the law led to a highly publicized scandal involving Patricia C. Dunn, who was then chair of Hewlett-Packard. To find out who had leaked confidential company information to the press, Dunn hired private investigators who used false pretenses to access individuals' personal cell phone records. Dunn claimed that she had not been aware of the investigators' methods and had assumed that they had obtained the information from a public record. Although she was indicted in 2006 for her role in the pretexting, the criminal charges were later dropped. Several civil lawsuits followed. In 2007, the company paid $14.5 million in fines to settle a lawsuit filed by the California attorney general. In 2008, Hewlett-Packard reached a settlement with the New York Times Company and three BusinessWeek magazine journalists in connection with the scandal.

To clarify the law on pretexting to gain access to phone records, Congress enacted the Telephone Records and Privacy Protection Act.³⁴ This act makes it a federal crime to pretend to be someone else or to make false representations for the purpose of obtaining another person's confidential phone records. The Federal Trade Commission investigates and prosecutes violators, who can be fined and sentenced to up to ten years in prison.

MEDICAL INFORMATION Responding to the growing need to protect the privacy of individuals' health records—particularly computerized records—Congress passed the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA) of 1996.³⁵ This act defines and limits the circumstances in which an individual's "protected health information" may be used or disclosed.

HIPAA also requires health-care providers and health-care plans, including certain employers who sponsor health plans, to inform patients of their privacy rights and of how their personal medical information may be used. The act also states that a person's medical records generally may not be used for purposes unrelated to health care—such as marketing, for example—or disclosed to others without the individual's permission. Covered entities must formulate written privacy policies, designate privacy officials, limit access to computerized health data, physically secure medical records with lock and key, train employees and volunteers on their privacy policies, and sanction those who violate the policies.

THE USA PATRIOT ACT Today, individuals face additional concerns about government intrusions into their privacy. The USA Patriot Act was passed by Congress in the wake of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, and then reauthorized in 2006.³⁶ The Patriot Act has given government officials increased authority to monitor Internet activities (such as e-mail and Web site visits) and to gain access to personal financial information and student information. Law enforcement officials may now track the telephone and e-mail communications of one party to find out the identity of the other party or parties. To gain access to these communications, the government must certify that the information likely to be obtained by such monitoring is relevant to an ongoing criminal investigation but does not need to provide proof of any wrongdoing.³⁷ Privacy advocates argue that this law adversely affects the constitutional rights of all Americans, and it has been widely criticized in the media.

Other Laws Affecting Privacy

State constitutions and statutes also protect individuals' privacy rights, often to a significant degree. Privacy rights are also protected under tort law (see Chapter 6). Additionally, the Federal Trade Commission has played an active role in protecting the privacy rights of online consumers (see Chapter 45). The protection of employees' privacy rights, particularly with respect to electronic monitoring practices, is an area of growing concern (see Chapter 34).

35. HIPAA was enacted as Pub. L. No. 104-191 (1996) and is codified in 29 U.S.C.A. Sections 1181 et seq.

36. The Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001, also known as the USA Patriot Act, was enacted as Pub. L. No. 107-56 (2001) and reauthorized by Pub. L. No. 109-173 (2006).

37. See, for example, American Civil Liberties Union v. National Security Agency, 493 F.3d 644 (6th Cir. 2007), in which a federal appeals court upheld the government's warrantless monitoring of electronic communications.

REVIEWING

Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

A state legislature enacted a statute that required any motorcycle operator or passenger on the state's highways to wear a protective helmet. Jim Alderman, a licensed motorcycle operator, sued the state to block enforcement of the law. Alderman asserted that the statute violated the equal protection clause because it placed requirements on motorcyclists that were not imposed on other motorists. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Why does this statute raise equal protection issues instead of substantive due process concerns?
2. What are the three levels of scrutiny that the courts use in determining whether a law violates the equal protection clause?
3. Which standard of scrutiny, or test, would apply to this situation? Why?
4. Applying this standard, or test, is the helmet statute constitutional? Why or why not?

 DEBATE THIS: Legislation aimed at “protecting people from themselves” concerns the individual as well as the public in general. Protective helmet laws are just one example of such legislation. Should individuals be allowed to engage in unsafe activities if they choose to do so?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

4-1. Commerce Clause A Georgia state law requires the use of contoured rear-fender mudguards on trucks and trailers operating within Georgia state lines. The statute further makes it illegal for trucks and trailers to use straight mudguards. In approximately thirty-five other states, straight mudguards are legal. Moreover, in Florida, straight mudguards are explicitly required by law. There is some evidence suggesting that contoured mudguards might be a little safer than straight mudguards. Discuss whether this Georgia statute violates any constitutional provisions.

4-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Freedom of Religion.

Thomas worked in the nonmilitary operations of a large firm that produced both military and nonmilitary goods. When the company discontinued the production of nonmilitary goods, Thomas was transferred to a plant producing military equipment. Thomas left his job, claiming that it violated his religious principles to participate in the manufacture of goods to be used in destroying life. In effect, he argued, the transfer to the military equipment plant forced him to quit his job. He was denied unemployment compensation by the state because he had not been effectively “discharged” by the employer but had voluntarily terminated his employment. Did the state’s denial of unemployment benefits to Thomas violate the free exercise clause of the First Amendment? Explain.

- For a sample answer to Question 4-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

4-3. Equal Protection With the objectives of preventing crime, maintaining property values, and preserving the quality of urban life, New York City enacted an ordinance to regulate the locations of commercial establishments that featured adult entertainment. The ordinance expressly applied to female, but not male, topless entertainment. Adele Buzzetti owned the Cozy Cabin, a New York City cabaret that featured female topless dancers. Buzzetti and an anonymous dancer filed a suit in a federal district court against the city, asking the court to block the enforcement of the ordinance. The plaintiffs argued, in part, that the ordinance violated the equal protection clause. Under the equal protection clause, what standard applies to the court's consideration of this ordinance? Under this test, how should the court rule? Why?

4-4. Freedom of Speech Henry Mishkoff is a Web designer whose firm does business as “Webfeats.” When Taubman Co. began building a mall called “The Shops at Willow Bend” near Mishkoff’s home, Mishkoff registered the domain name “shopsatwillowbend.com” and created a Web site with that address. The site featured information about the mall, a disclaimer indicating that Mishkoff’s site was unofficial, and a link to the mall’s official site. Taubman discovered Mishkoff’s site and filed a suit in a federal district court against him. Mishkoff then registered various other names, including “taubmansucks.com,” with links to a site documenting his battle with Taubman. (A Web name with a “sucks.com” moniker attached to it is known as a complaint name, and the process of registering and using such names is known as cybergripping.) Taubman asked the court to order Mishkoff to stop using all of these names. Should the court grant Taubman’s request? On what basis might the court protect Mishkoff’s use of the names? [Taubman Co. v. Webfeats, 319 F.3d 770 (6th Cir. 2003)]

4-5. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Privacy.

To protect the privacy of individuals identified in information systems maintained by federal agencies, the Privacy Act of 1974 regulates the use of the information. The statute provides for a minimum award of $1,000 for “actual damages sustained” caused by “intentional or willful actions” to the “person entitled to recovery.” Buck Doe filed for certain disability benefits with an office of the U.S. Department of Labor (DOL). The application form asked for Doe’s Social Security number, which the DOL used to identify his claim on documents sent to groups of claimants, their employers, and the lawyers involved in their cases. This disclosed Doe’s Social Security number beyond the limits set by the Privacy Act. Doe filed a suit in a federal district court against the DOL, alleging that he was “torn . . . all to pieces” and “greatly concerned and worried” because of the disclosure of his Social Security number and its potentially “devastating” consequences. He did not offer any proof of actual injury, however. Should damages be awarded in such circumstances solely on the basis of the agency’s conduct, or should proof of some actual injury be required? Why? [Doe v. Chao, 540 U.S. 614, 124 S.Ct. 1204, 157 L.Ed.2d 1122 (2004)]

4-6. Supremacy Clause The Federal Communications Act of 1934 grants the right to govern all interstate telecommunications to the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) and the right to regulate all intra-state telecommunications to the states. The federal Telephone Consumer Protection Act of 1991, the Junk Fax Protection Act of 2005, and FCC rules permit a party to send unsolicited fax ads to recipients with whom the party has an “established business relationship” if those ads include an “opt-out” alternative. Section 17538.43 of California’s Business and Professions Code (known as “SB 833”) was enacted in 2005 to provide the citizens of California with greater protection than that afforded under federal law. SB 833 omits the “established business relationship” exception and requires a sender to obtain a recipient’s express consent (an “opt-in” provision) before faxing an ad to that party into or out of California. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States filed a suit against Bill Lockyer, California’s state attorney general, seeking to block the enforcement of SB 833. What principles support the plaintiff’s position? How should the court resolve the issue? Explain. [Chamber of Commerce of the United States v. Lockyer, 463 F.3d 1076 (E.D.Cal. 2006)]

4-7. Freedom of Speech For decades, New York City has had to deal with the vandalism and defacement of public property caused by unauthorized graffiti. Among other attempts to stop the damage, in December 2005 the city banned the sale of aerosol spray-paint cans and broad-tipped indelible markers to persons under twenty-one years of age and prohibited them from possessing such items on property other than their own. By May 1, 2006, five people—all under age twenty-one—had been cited for violations of these regulations, and 871 individuals had been arrested for actually making graffiti. Artists who wished to create graffiti on legal surfaces, such as canvas, wood, and clothing, included college student Lindsey Vincenty, who was studying visual arts. Unable to buy her supplies in the city or to carry them in the city if she bought them elsewhere, Vincenty and others filed a suit in a federal district court on behalf of themselves and other young artists against Michael Bloomberg, the city’s mayor, and others. The plaintiffs claimed that, among other things, the new rules violated their right to freedom of speech. They asked the court to enjoin the enforcement of the rules. Should the court grant this request? Why or why not? [Vincenty v. Bloomberg, 476 F.3d 74 (2d Cir. 2007)]

4-8. Due Process In 2006, at the Russ College of Engineering and Technology of Ohio University, a university investigative report found “rampant and flagrant plagiarism” in the theses of mechanical engineering graduate students. Faculty singled out for “ignoring their ethical responsibilities and contributing to an atmosphere of negligence toward issues of academic misconduct” included Jay Gunasekera, professor of mechanical engineering and chair of the department. These findings were publicized in a press conference on May 31. The university prohibited Gunasekera from advising graduate students. He filed a suit in a federal district court against Dennis Irwin, the dean of Russ College, and others, for violating his “due-process rights when they publicized accusations about his role in plagiarism by his graduate student advisees without providing him with a meaningful opportunity to clear his name” in public. Irwin asked the court to dismiss the suit. What does due process require in these circumstances? Why? [Gunasekera v. Irwin, 551 F.3d 461 (6th Cir. 2009)]

4–9. Commerce Clause Under the federal Sex Offender Registration and Notification Act (SORNA), sex offenders must register as sex offenders and update their registration when they travel from one state to another. David Hall, a convicted sex offender in New York, moved from New York to Virginia, lived there for part of a year, and then returned to New York. When he returned, he was charged with the federal offense of failing to register as a sex offender while in Virginia, as required by SORNA. In his defense, he claimed that SORNA was unconstitutional because Congress had no authority to criminalize interstate travel where no commerce was involved. The federal district court dismissed the indictment. The government appealed, contending that the statute is valid under the commerce clause. Does that contention seem reasonable? Why or why not? [United States v. Hall, 591 F.3d 83 (2d Cir. 2010)]

4–10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Defamation.

Aric Toll owns and manages the Balboa Island Village Inn, a restaurant and bar in Newport Beach, California. Anne Lemen owns the “Island Cottage,” a residence across an alley from the Inn. Lemen often complained to the authorities about excessive noise and the behavior of the Inn’s customers, whom she called “drunks” and “whores.” Lemen referred to Theresa Toll, Aric’s wife, as “Madam Whore.” Lemen told the Inn’s bartender Ewa Cook that Cook “worked for Satan,” was “Satan’s wife,” and was “going to have Satan’s children.” She told the Inn’s neighbors that it was “a whorehouse” with “prostitution going on inside” and that it sold illegal drugs, sold alcohol to minors, made “sex videos,” was involved in child pornography, had “Mafia connections,” encouraged “lesbian activity,” and stayed open until 6:00 A.M. Lemen also voiced her complaints to potential customers, and the Inn’s sales dropped more than 20 percent. The Inn filed a suit in a California state court against Lemen, asserting defamation and other claims. [Balboa Island Village Inn, Inc. v. Lemen, 40 Cal.4th 1141, 156 P.3d 339 (2007)]

- (a) Are Lemen’s statements about the Inn’s owners, customers, and activities protected by the U.S. Constitution? Should such statements be protected? In whose favor should the court rule? Why?
- (b) Did Lemen behave unethically in the circumstances of this case? Explain.

Ethics and Business Decision Making

In the early part of the first decade of the 2000s, ethics scandals erupted throughout corporate America. Heads of major corporations (some of which no longer exist) were tried for fraud, conspiracy, conspiracy to commit securities fraud, grand larceny, and obstruction of justice. Former multimillionaires (and even billionaires) who once ran multinational corporations are now serving sentences in federal penitentiaries. The giant energy company Enron in particular dominated headlines. Its investors lost around $60 billion when the company ceased to exist.

Fast-forward to 2009. One man, Bernard Madoff, was convicted of bilking investors out of more than $50 billion through a Ponzi scheme¹ that he had perpetrated for decades. Madoff's victims included not only naïve retirees but also some of the world's biggest and best-known financial institutions, including the Royal Bank of Scotland, France's BNP Paribas, Spain's Banco Santander, and Japan's Nomura. But ethical lapses were not limited to Madoff. Ethical problems in many financial institutions contributed to the onset of the deepest recession since the Great Depression of the 1930s. Not only did some $9 trillion in investment capital evaporate, but millions of workers lost their jobs. The point is clear: the scope and scale of corporate unethical behavior, especially in the financial sector, skyrocketed in the first decade of the twenty-first century—with enormous repercussions for everyone.

The ethics scandals of the last fifteen years have taught businesspersons all over the world that business ethics cannot be taken lightly. Acting ethically in a business context can mean billions of dollars—made or lost—for corporations, shareholders, and employees and can have far-reaching effects on society and the global economy.

SECTION 1 BUSINESS ETHICS

As you might imagine, business ethics is derived from the concept of ethics. Ethics can be defined as the study of what constitutes right or wrong behavior. It is a branch of philosophy focusing on morality and the way moral principles are derived. Ethics has to do with the fairness, justness, rightness, or wrongness of an action.

Business ethics focuses on what is right and wrong behavior in the business world. It has to do with how businesses apply moral and ethical principles to situations that arise in the workplace. Because business decision makers often address more complex ethical issues than they face in their personal lives, business ethics may be more complicated than personal ethics.

Why Is Business Ethics Important?

All of the corporate executives who are sitting behind bars could have avoided these outcomes had they engaged in ethical decision making during their careers. As a result of their crimes, all of their companies suffered losses, and some, such as Enron, were forced to enter bankruptcy, causing thousands of workers to lose their jobs. The corporations, shareholders, and employees who suffered because of those individuals' unethical and criminal behavior certainly paid a high price. Thus, an in-depth understanding of business ethics is important to the long-run viability of any corporation today.

It is also important to the well-being of individual officers and directors and to the firm's employees. Finally, unethical corporate decision making can negatively affect suppliers, consumers, the community, and society as a whole.

At the end of every unit in this book, a series of ethical issues will be presented in features called Focus on Ethics. In each of these unit-ending features, we expand on the concepts of business ethics that we present in this chapter.

The Moral Minimum

The minimum acceptable standard for ethical business behavior—known as the moral minimum—is normally considered to be compliance with the law. In many corporate scandals, had most of the businesspersons involved simply followed the law, they would not have gotten into trouble. Note, though, that in the interest of preserving personal freedom, as well as for practical reasons, the law does not—and cannot—codify all ethical requirements.

As they make business decisions, businesspersons must remember that just because an action is legal does not necessarily make it ethical. For instance, no law specifies the salaries that publicly held corporations can pay their officers. Nevertheless, if a corporation pays its officers an excessive amount relative to other employees, or relative to what officers at other corporations are paid, the executives' compensation might be challenged as unethical. (Executive bonuses can also present ethical problems—see the discussion later in this chapter.)

“Gray Areas” in the Law

In many situations, business firms can predict with a fair amount of certainty whether a given action would be legal. For instance, firing an employee solely because of that person's race or gender would clearly violate federal laws prohibiting employment discrimination. In some situations, though, the legality of a particular action may be less clear. In part, this is because there are so many laws regulating business that it is increasingly possible to violate one of them without realizing it. The law also contains numerous “gray areas,” making it difficult to predict with certainty how a court will apply a given law to a particular action.

In addition, many rules of law require a court to determine what is “foreseeable” or “reasonable” in a particular situation. Because a business has no way of predicting how a specific court will decide these issues, decision makers need to proceed with caution and evaluate an action and its consequences from an ethical perspective. The same problem often occurs in cases involving the Internet because it is often unclear how a court will apply existing laws in the context of cyberspace. Generally, if a company can demonstrate that it acted in good faith and responsibly under the circumstances, it has a better chance of successfully defending its action in court or before an administrative law judge in an agency hearing.

Short-Run Profit Maximization

Some people argue that a corporation's only goal should be profit maximization, which will be reflected in a higher market value. When all firms strictly adhere to the goal of profit maximization, resources tend to flow to where they are most highly valued by society. Ultimately, profit maximization, in theory, leads to the most efficient allocation of scarce resources.

Corporate executives and employees have to distinguish, though, between short-run and long-run profit maximization. In the short run, a company may increase its profits by continuing to sell a product, even though it knows that the product is defective. In the long run, however, because of lawsuits, large settlements, and bad publicity, such unethical conduct will cause profits to suffer. Thus, business ethics is consistent only with long-run profit maximization. An overemphasis on short-term profit maximization is the most common reason that ethical problems occur in business.

CASE IN POINT When the powerful narcotic painkiller OxyContin was first marketed, its manufacturer, Purdue Pharma, claimed that it was unlikely to lead to drug addiction or abuse. Internal company documents later showed that the company's executives knew that OxyContin could be addictive, but kept this risk a secret to boost sales and maximize short-term profits. In 2007, Purdue Pharma and three former executives pleaded guilty to criminal charges that they misled regulators, patients, and physicians about OxyContin's risks of addiction. Purdue Pharma agreed to pay $600 million in fines and other payments. The three former executives agreed to pay $34.5 million in fines and were barred from federal health programs for a period of fifteen years—a ruling that was upheld by an administrative law judge in 2009. Thus, the company's focus on maximizing profits in the short run led to unethical conduct that hurt profits in the long run.

The following case provides an example of unethical—and illegal—conduct that was designed to enhance a company's short-term outlook but in the end destroyed the firm.

CASE 5.1 Skilling v. United States

Supreme Court of the United States ___ U.S. ___, ___ S.Ct. ___, ___ L.Ed.2d ___ (2010).

COMPANY PROFILE • In the 1990s, Enron Corporation was an international, multibillion-dollar enterprise consisting of four businesses that bought and sold energy, owned energy networks, and bought and sold bandwidth capacity. “Wholesale,” the division that bought and sold energy, was the most profitable and accounted for 90 percent of Enron’s revenues. Jeffrey Skilling—Enron’s president, its chief operating officer, and a member of its board of directors—boasted at a conference with financial analysts in January 2001 that Enron’s retail energy and bandwidth sales divisions had “sustainable high earnings power.” Skilling became Enron’s chief executive officer in February 2001.

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In August 2001, Jeffrey Skilling resigned his position as Enron’s CEO. Four months later, Enron filed for bankruptcy. An investigation uncovered a conspiracy to deceive investors about Enron’s finances to ensure that its stock price remained high. Among other things, Skilling had shifted more than $2 billion in losses from Enron’s struggling divisions to Wholesale. He had overstated Enron’s profits in telephone calls to investors and in press releases. To hide more losses, he had arranged deals between Enron’s executives and third parties, which he falsely portrayed to Enron’s accountants and to the Securities and Exchange Commission as producing income. Skilling was convicted in a federal district court of various crimes, including conspiracy to commit fraud to deprive Enron and its shareholders of the “honest services” of its employees. He was sentenced to 292 months in prison and three years of supervised release, and was ordered to pay $45 million in restitution. Skilling appealed, and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the trial court’s ruling. Skilling appealed to the United States Supreme Court, arguing, among other things, that the honest-services statute is unconstitutionally vague or, in the alternative, that his conduct did not fall within the statute’s compass.

Justice GINSBURG delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

[In 1988,] Congress enacted a new statute “specifically to cover * * * the intangible right of honest services” [as a “scheme or artifice to defraud” in laws prohibiting mail and wire fraud].

* * * *

[Before 1988,] the “vast majority” of the honest-services cases involved offenders who, in violation of a fiduciary duty participated in bribery or kickback schemes.

* * * The honest-services doctrine had its genesis [origin] in prosecutions involving bribery allegations.

In view of this history, there is no doubt that Congress intended [the law] to reach at least bribes and kickbacks. Reading the statute to proscribe [rule out] a wider range of offensive conduct, we acknowledge, would raise the due process concerns underlying the vagueness doctrine. To preserve the statute without transgressing [breaching] constitutional limitations, we now hold that [the statute] criminalizes only the bribe-and-kickback core of the [case law prior to 1988]. [Emphases added by the Court.]

* * * *

The government did not, at any time, allege that Skilling solicited or accepted side payments from a third party in exchange for making * * * misrepresentations [concerning Enron’s fiscal health]. It is therefore clear that, as we read [the statute], Skilling did not commit honest-services fraud.

Because the indictment alleged three objects of the conspiracy—honest-services wire fraud, money-or-property wire fraud, and securities fraud—Skilling’s conviction is flawed. This determination, however, does not necessarily require reversal of the conspiracy conviction * * *. We leave this dispute for resolution on remand.

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 5.1 CONTINUED ♦ DECISION AND REMEDY • The United States Supreme Court vacated the appellate court's ruling that Skilling's actions had violated the honest-services statute. The Court remanded the case for further proceedings to determine how its decision would affect the other charges against Skilling.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • During Skilling's tenure at Enron, the mood among the employees must have been upbeat because the company's situation would have appeared "rosy." Is there anything unethical about this situation? Discuss.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • Just because the Court has reduced the scope of the honest-services fraud doctrine does not mean that federal prosecutors will be unable to indict businesspersons who egregiously violate ethical business practices. There are more than four thousand federal crimes on the books today. Consequently, the federal government will continue to pursue actions that it deems are illegal business practices. The government will simply charge those who are its targets with other federal crimes.

The Importance of Ethical Leadership

Talking about ethical business decision making is meaningless if management does not set standards. Furthermore, managers must apply the same standards to themselves as they do to the company's employees.

ATTITUDE OF TOP MANAGEMENT One of the most important ways to create and maintain an ethical workplace is for top management to demonstrate its commitment to ethical decision making. A manager who is not totally committed to an ethical workplace rarely succeeds in creating one. Management's behavior, more than anything else, sets the ethical tone of a firm. Employees take their cues from management. For example, an employee who observes a manager cheating on her expense account quickly learns that such behavior is acceptable.

Managers who set unrealistic production or sales goals increase the probability that employees will act unethically. If a sales quota can be met only through high-pressure, unethical sales tactics, employees will try to act "in the best interest of the company" and will continue to behave unethically.

A manager who looks the other way when he knows about an employee's unethical behavior also sets an example—one indicating that ethical transgressions will be accepted. Managers have found that discharging even one employee for ethical reasons has a tremendous impact as a deterrent to unethical behavior in the workplace.

BEHAVIOR OF OWNERS AND MANAGERS Business owners and managers sometimes take more active roles in fostering unethical and illegal conduct. This may indicate to their co-owners, co-managers, employees, and others that unethical business behavior will be tolerated.

Business owners' misbehavior can have negative consequences for themselves and their business. Not only can a court sanction the business owners and managers, but it can also issue an injunction that prevents them from engaging in similar patterns of conduct in the future.

CASE IN POINT Douglas and Brian Baum, along with their father, ran an asset recovery business. The Baums researched various unclaimed funds, tried to locate the rightful owners, and received either a finder's fee or the right to some or all of the funds recovered. The Baums convinced investors—through misrepresentation—to file a meritless lawsuit in a federal district court in Texas. The court later determined that the Baums had maliciously attempted to extort funds and sanctioned them for pretending to be lawyers, lying to the parties and the court, and generally abusing the judicial system. The judge also issued a permanent injunction against all three Baums to prohibit them from filing claims related to the same case without express permission from the judge. When the Baums continued their business in the same manner, the judge expanded the injunction to apply to all claims filed in Texas. The Baums appealed, claiming that the court lacked the power to expand the injunction. The appellate court ruled that federal courts have the power to enjoin (prevent) plaintiffs from future filings when those plaintiffs consistently abuse the court system and harass their opponents.²

The following case shows how a manager's sexist attitudes and actions affected the workplace environment. The case also underscores the limitations of the law with respect to this type of unethical business behavior.

* * * EXTENDED CASE 5.2 * * *

Krasner v. HSH Nordbank AG^a

United States District Court, Southern District of New York, 680 F.Supp.2d 502 (2010).

Gerard E. LYNCH, Circuit Judge.

Plaintiff David Krasner brings this action against his former employer, HSH Nordbank AG (“HSH”), and his supervisor while employed there, Roland Kiser, alleging [among other things] sexual discrimination * * * in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.^b

* * * *

Defendant HSH is an international commercial bank, headquartered in Germany, and has offices worldwide, including a branch in New York City.

There, Krasner alleges, he encountered an atmosphere infected with overt sexism, where career “advancement based on sexual favoritism” was accepted, and where male supervisors promoted a sexist and demeaning image of women in the workplace in which women’s advancement was governed by a “casting couch.” * * * Kiser also pressured male subordinates, such as Krasner, to go to strip clubs with him when on business trips abroad.

* * * *

* * * The primary offender in Krasner’s estimation is Kiser, and what takes center stage in the complaint are allegations of a relationship between Kiser and a woman named Melissa Campfield * * *. Kiser, it is alleged, “advance[ed] and promot[ed]” Campfield’s career “at the expense of the career advancement and reputations of other far more senior and qualified employees,” Krasner included.

* * * *

* * * On September 6, 2007, Krasner lodged a verbal, in-person complaint with * * * the Head of Human Resources, articulating his belief that “Kiser was violating [HSH’s] ethics policy by creating a personal conflict of interest” and generally “creating an unprofessional environment.”

* * * *

* * * On September 19, Krasner again turned to the Human Resources department, this time with a written complaint, reiterating his belief that Kiser was violating the company’s ethics policy and creating an unprofessional environment through his relationship with Campfield.

* * * *

On October 3, HSH concluded its internal investigation of Krasner’s complaints and found no violation of law or internal ethics policy. A month later, on November 5, 2007, Krasner was summarily terminated * * *.

Krasner subsequently sought and received a right to sue letter from the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (“EEOC”) and thereafter commenced this lawsuit * * *. Defendants—HSH and Kiser—move to dismiss.

* * * *

The substantive anti-discrimination provision of Title VII prohibits employers from “discriminat[ing] against any individual with respect to his compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, because of such individual’s * * * sex. One form of gender discrimination prohibited by Title VII is sexual harassment that results in a ‘hostile or abusive work environment.’” Under this doctrine, even if an “employee does not experience a specific negative action,” he may have a viable claim under Title VII for sexual discrimination where “the harassment is so pervasive that it changes the conditions of employment.” [Emphasis added.]

Krasner’s discrimination claim is founded on allegations that he was subject to a sexually hostile work environment through a combination of “(1) widespread sexual favoritism resulting from Kiser’s affair with Campfield; (2) widespread sexual favoritism resulting from other affairs at [HSH]; and (3) sexually harassing and offensive conduct perpetrated by Kiser * * * unrelated to sexual affairs.” In addressing these contentions, the parties argue as though a hostile environment is something that exists in some absolute way, like poisonous chemicals in the air, affecting everyone who comes in contact with it. In doing so, the parties all but ignore the prohibited causal factor requirement, which is critical to liability.

Title VII does not prohibit employers from maintaining nasty, unpleasant workplaces, or even ones that are unpleasant for reasons that are sexual in nature. Rather, it prohibits employers from discriminating against an employee (including by subjecting him or her to hostile working conditions) “because of such individual’s * * * sex.”

* * * *

An examination of Krasner’s allegations reveals that he does not contend that he was disparaged or badly treated or subjected to an unpleasant work atmosphere in any way because he is a man. Rather, his complaint is primarily

a. AG stands for Actiengesellschaft, a German term denoting a corporation.

b. Title VII of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of race, color, national origin, religion, or gender—see Chapter 35.

that Kiser and other supervisors advanced a demeaning view of women in the workplace, which Krasner was exposed to and found “objectionable,” and which denied “him the opportunity to work in an employment setting free of unlawful harassment.”

* * * *

* * * Krasner’s claim fails because “none of the alleged acts of harassment committed directly against [Krasner]”—either when viewed in isolation or in conjunction with any potential discrimination against women—“support a claim that [he] is being harassed because he is a male employee.”

The primary animator of the complaint is what Krasner terms the “egregious effects of Kiser’s favoritism” towards Campfield upon plaintiff himself.

Assuming that these actions * * * systematically and pervasively altered the conditions of Krasner’s working environment sufficiently to satisfy the objective component of a hostile environment claim, the claim must nevertheless fail because the complaint does not allege that these incidents are in any way related to his gender. Krasner does not allege, and proffers [presents or offers] no facts that remotely suggest, that a female supervisor in his position would not have experienced exactly the same consequences from Kiser’s preferential treatment of Campfield.

* * * *

For the foregoing reasons, defendants’ motions to dismiss the complaint * * * are granted.

SO ORDERED.

QUESTIONS

1. Why did the court conclude that Krasner did not have a valid claim for “hostile environment” discrimination?
2. Suppose that a female employee had experienced the same type of treatment that Krasner had. Would the female employee succeed in a Title VII claim of gender-based discrimination? Why or why not?

Creating Ethical Codes of Conduct

One of the most effective ways of setting a tone of ethical behavior within an organization is to create an ethical code of conduct. A well-written code of ethics explicitly states a company’s ethical priorities and demonstrates the company’s commitment to ethical behavior.

The code of conduct indicates the company’s commitment to legal compliance, as well as to the welfare of its customers or clients, its employees, and its suppliers. The code also details some specific ways in which the interests and welfare of these different groups will be protected.

ETHICS TRAINING FOR EMPLOYEES For an ethical code to be effective, its provisions must be clearly communicated to employees. Most large companies have implemented ethics training programs, in which managers discuss with employees on a face-to-face basis the firm’s policies and the importance of ethical conduct. Some firms hold periodic ethics seminars during which employees can openly discuss any ethical problems that they may be experiencing and learn how the firm’s ethical policies apply to those specific problems. Smaller firms should also offer some form of ethics training to employees because if a firm is accused of an ethics violation, the court will consider the presence or absence of such training in evaluating the firm’s conduct.

THE SARBANES-OXLEY ACT The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002³ requires companies to set up confidential systems so that employees and others can “raise red flags” about suspected illegal or unethical auditing and accounting practices. (The Sarbanes-Oxley Act will be discussed in more detail in Chapters 42 and 48, and excerpts from and explanatory comments on this important law appear in Appendix H of this text.)

Some companies have implemented online reporting systems to accomplish this goal. In one such system, employees can click on an icon on their computers that anonymously links them with EthicsPoint, an organization based in Portland, Oregon. Through EthicsPoint, employees can report suspicious accounting practices, sexual harassment, and other possibly unethical behavior. EthicsPoint, in turn, alerts management personnel or the audit committee at the designated company to the possible problem. Those who have used the system say that it is less inhibiting than calling a company’s toll-free number.

ETHICAL TRANSGRESSIONS BY FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

One of the best ways to learn the ethical responsibilities inherent in operating a business is to look at the mistakes made by other companies. In the following subsections, we describe some of the worst ethical failures of financial institutions during the latter part of the first decade of the 2000s. Many of these ethical wrongdoings received wide publicity and raised public awareness of the need for ethical leadership in all businesses.

Corporate Stock Buybacks

By now, you are probably aware that many of the greatest financial companies in the United States have either gone bankrupt, been taken over by the federal government, or been bailed out by U.S. taxpayers. What most people do not know is that those same corporations were using their own cash funds to prop up the value of their stock in the years just before the economic crisis that started in 2008.

THE RATIONALE UNDERLYING BUYBACKS The theory behind a stock buyback is simple—the management of a corporation believes that the market price of its shares is “below their fair value.” Therefore, instead of issuing dividends to shareholders or reinvesting profits, management uses the company’s funds to buy its shares in the open market, thereby boosting the price of the stock.

Who benefits from stock buybacks? Although all shareholders benefit somewhat, the main individual beneficiaries are often corporate executives who have been given stock options, which enable them to buy shares of the corporation’s stock at a set price. When the market price rises above that level, the executives can profit by selling their shares. Although stock buybacks are legal and can serve legitimate purposes, they can easily be abused if managers use them just to increase the stock price in the short term so that they can profit from their options without considering the long-term needs of the company.

THE PREVALENCE OF BUYBACKS From 2005 to 2007, stock buybacks for the top five hundred U.S. corporations added up to $1.4 trillion. From 2003 to 2007, the five largest U.S. banks bought back close to $100 billion in stock. Bank of America Corporation alone bought back $40 billion of its stock (nearly 40 percent of its common stock equity at the end of 2009) during that time period.⁴

In the investment banking business, which almost disappeared entirely in the latter half of 2008, stock buybacks were particularly egregious. In the first half of 2008, Lehman Brothers Holdings was buying back its own stock—in September of that year, it filed for bankruptcy. According to financial writer Liam Denning, Lehman’s buybacks were “akin to giving away the fire extinguisher even as your house begins to fill with smoke.” Goldman Sachs, another investment bank, bought back $15 billion of its stock in 2007. By the end of 2008, U.S. taxpayers had provided $10 billion in bailout funds to that same company.

Startling Executive Decisions at American International Group

For years, American International Group (AIG) was a respected, conservative, worldwide insurance company based in New York. Then, during the first decade of the 2000s, its managers decided to enter an area in which they had little expertise—the issuance of insurance contracts guaranteeing certain types of complicated financial contracts. When many of those insured contracts failed, AIG experienced multibillion-dollar losses. Ultimately, the company sought a federal bailout that eventually amounted to almost $200 billion of U.S. taxpayers’ funds.

While some company executives were testifying before Congress after receiving the funds, other AIG executives spent almost $400,000 on a weeklong retreat at a resort in Monarch Beach, California. In essence, U.S. taxpayers were footing the bill. To most observers, such arrogance was as incomprehensible as it was unethical.

Executive Bonuses

Until the economic crisis began in the latter half of the first decade of the 2000s, the bonuses paid in the financial industry did not make headlines. After all, times were good, and why shouldn’t those responsible for record company earnings be rewarded? When investment banks and commercial banks began to fail, however, or had to be bailed out or taken over by the federal government, executive bonuses became an issue of paramount importance.

4. This amount was almost as much as the $45 million that Bank of America received from the government bailout under the Troubled Asset Relief Program.

Certainly, the system of rewards in banking became perverse. Executives and others in the industry were paid a percentage of their firm's profits, no matter how risky their investment actions had been. In other words, commissions and bonuses were based on profits from transactions involving risky assets, such as collateralized debt obligations and securities based on subprime and other low-quality mortgages. In some instances, the assets were sold off to investors, but sometimes the firms themselves invested in the risky assets, which in the short run provided high returns. When the subprime mortgage crisis started in 2007, the worldwide house of cards came tumbling down, but those who had created and sold those risky assets suffered no liability—and even received bonuses. Of course, some of those firms that had enjoyed high short-run returns from their risky investments—and paid bonuses based on those profits—found themselves facing bankruptcy.

Consider Lehman Brothers before its bankruptcy. Its chief executive officer, Richard Fuld, Jr., earned almost $500 million between 2000 and the firm's demise in 2008. Even after Lehman Brothers entered into bankruptcy, its new owners, Barclays and Nomura, legally owed $3.5 billion in bonuses to employees still on the payroll. In 2006, Goldman Sachs awarded its employees a total of $16.5 billion in bonuses, or an average of almost $750,000 for each employee.

By 2007, profits on Wall Street had already begun to drop—sometimes dramatically. Citigroup's profits, for example, were down 83 percent from the previous year. Bonuses, in contrast, declined by less than 5 percent. The bonus payout in 2007 for all Wall Street firms combined was $33.2 billion.

APPROACHES TO ETHICAL REASONING

Each individual, when faced with a particular ethical dilemma, engages in ethical reasoning—that is, a reasoning process in which the individual examines the situation at hand in light of his or her moral convictions or ethical standards. Businesspersons do likewise when making decisions with ethical implications.

How do business decision makers decide whether a given action is the “right” one for their firms? What ethical standards should be applied? Broadly speaking, ethical reasoning relating to business traditionally has been characterized by two fundamental approaches. One approach defines ethical behavior in terms of duty, which also implies certain rights. The other approach determines what is ethical in terms of the consequences, or outcome, of any given action. We examine each of these approaches here.

In addition to the two basic ethical approaches, a few theories have been developed that specifically address the social responsibility of corporations. Because these theories also influence today's business decision makers, we conclude this section with a short discussion of the different views of corporate social responsibility.

Duty-Based Ethics

Duty-based ethical standards often are derived from revealed truths, such as religious precepts. They can also be derived through philosophical reasoning.

RELIGIOUS ETHICAL STANDARDS In the Judeo-Christian tradition, which is the dominant religious tradition in the United States, the Ten Commandments of the Old Testament establish fundamental rules for moral action. Other religions have their own sources of revealed truth. Religious rules generally are absolute with respect to the behavior of their adherents. For example, the commandment “Thou shalt not steal” is an absolute mandate for a person who believes that the Ten Commandments reflect revealed truth. Even a benevolent motive for stealing (such as Robin Hood's) cannot justify the act because the act itself is inherently immoral and thus wrong.

KANTIAN ETHICS Duty-based ethical standards may also be derived solely from philosophical reasoning. The German philosopher Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), for example, identified some general guiding principles for moral behavior based on what he believed to be the fundamental nature of human beings. Kant believed that human beings are qualitatively different from other physical objects and are endowed with moral integrity and the capacity to reason and conduct their affairs rationally. Therefore, a person's thoughts and actions should be respected. When human beings are treated merely as a means to an end, they are being treated as the equivalent of objects and are being denied their basic humanity.

A central theme in Kantian ethics is that individuals should evaluate their actions in light of the consequences that would follow if everyone in society acted in the same way. This categorical imperative can be applied to any action. Suppose that you are deciding whether to cheat on an examination. If you have adopted Kant's categorical imperative, you will decide not to cheat because if everyone cheated, the examination (and the entire education system) would be meaningless.

THE PRINCIPLE OF RIGHTS Because a duty cannot exist without a corresponding right, duty-based ethical standards imply that human beings have basic rights. The principle that human beings have certain fundamental rights (to life, freedom, and the pursuit of happiness, for example) is deeply embedded in Western culture. As discussed in Chapter 1, the natural law tradition embraces the concept that certain actions (such as killing another person) are morally wrong because they are contrary to nature (the natural desire to continue living). Those who adhere to this principle of rights, or "rights theory," believe that a key factor in determining whether a business decision is ethical is how that decision affects the rights of others. These others include the firm's owners, its employees, the consumers of its products or services, its suppliers, the community in which it does business, and society as a whole.

A potential dilemma for those who support rights theory, however, is that they may disagree on which rights are most important. When considering all those affected by a business decision, for example, how much weight should be given to employees relative to shareholders, customers relative to the community, or employees relative to society as a whole?

In general, rights theorists believe that whichever right is stronger in a particular circumstance takes precedence. Suppose that a firm can either keep a plant open, saving the jobs of twelve workers, or shut the plant down and avoid contaminating a river with pollutants that would endanger the health of thousands of people. In this situation, a rights theorist can easily choose which group to favor. (Not all choices are so clear-cut, however.)

Outcome-Based Ethics: Utilitarianism

"The greatest good for the greatest number" is a paraphrase of the major premise of the utilitarian approach to ethics. Utilitarianism is a philosophical theory developed by Jeremy Bentham (1748–1832) and modified by John Stuart Mill (1806–1873)—both British philosophers. In contrast to duty-based ethics, utilitarianism is outcome oriented. It focuses on the consequences of an action, not on the nature of the action itself or on any set of preestablished moral values or religious beliefs.

Under a utilitarian model of ethics, an action is morally correct, or "right," when, among the people it affects, it produces the greatest amount of good for the greatest number. When an action affects the majority adversely, it is morally wrong. Applying the utilitarian theory thus requires (1) a determination of which individuals will be affected by the action in question; (2) a cost-benefit analysis, which involves an assessment of the negative and positive effects of alternative actions on these individuals; and (3) a choice among alternative actions that will produce maximum societal utility (the greatest positive net benefits for the greatest number of individuals).

Corporate Social Responsibility

For many years, groups concerned with civil rights, employee safety and welfare, consumer protection, environmental preservation, and other causes have pressured corporate America to behave in a responsible manner with respect to these causes. Thus was born the concept of corporate social responsibility—the idea that those who run corporations can and should act ethically and be accountable to society for their actions. Just what constitutes corporate social responsibility has been debated for some time, and there are a number of different theories today.

STAKEHOLDER APPROACH One view of corporate social responsibility stresses that corporations have a duty not just to shareholders, but also to other groups affected by corporate decisions ("stakeholders"). Under this approach, a corporation would consider the impact of its decision on the firm's employees, customers, creditors, suppliers, and the community in which the corporation operates. The reasoning behind this "stakeholder view" is that in some circumstances, one or more of these other groups may have a greater stake in company decisions than the shareholders do. Although this may be true, it is often difficult to decide which group's interests should receive greater weight if the interests conflict.

CORPORATE CITIZENSHIP Another theory of social responsibility argues that corporations should behave as good citizens by promoting goals that society deems worthwhile and taking positive steps toward solving social problems. The idea is that because business controls so much of the wealth and power of this country, business in turn has a responsibility to society to use that wealth and power in socially beneficial ways. Under a corporate citizenship view, companies are judged on how much they donate to social causes, as well as how they conduct their operations with respect to employment discrimination, human rights, environmental concerns, and similar issues.

Some corporations publish annual social responsibility reports, which may also be called corporate sustainability (sustainability refers to the capacity to endure) or citizenship reports. For example, the Hitachi Group releases an Annual Corporate Social Responsibility Report that outlines its environmental strategy, including its attempts to reduce carbon dioxide emissions (so-called greenhouse gases). It typically discusses human rights policy and its commitment to human rights awareness. The software company Symantec Corporation issued its first corporate responsibility report in September 2008 to demonstrate its focus on critical environmental, social, and governance issues. Among other things, Symantec pointed out that it had adopted the Calvert Women's Principles, the first global code of corporate conduct designed to empower, advance, and invest in women worldwide.

In the following case, a corporation's board of directors focused solely on the shareholders' profits and failed to check the actions of the firm's chief executive officer. If the board had applied a different set of priorities, the shareholders might have been in a better financial position.

Fog Cutter Capital Group, Inc. v. Securities and Exchange Commission

United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, 474 F.3d 822 (2007).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • The National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD) operates the Nasdaq, an electronic securities exchange, on which Fog Cutter Capital Group was listed.^a Andrew Wiederhorn had founded Fog Cutter in 1997 to manage a restaurant chain and make other investments. With family members, Wiederhorn controlled more than 50 percent of Fog Cutter's stock. The firm agreed that if Wiederhorn was terminated "for cause," he was entitled only to his salary through the date of termination. If terminated "without cause," he would be owed three times his $350,000 annual salary, three times his largest annual bonus from the previous three years, and any unpaid salary and bonus. "Cause" included the conviction of a felony. In 2001, Wiederhorn became the target of an investigation into the collapse of Capital Consultants, LLC. Fog Cutter then redefined "cause" in his termination agreement to cover only a felony involving Fog Cutter. In June 2004, Wiederhorn agreed to plead guilty to two felonies, serve eighteen months in prison, pay a $25,000 fine, and pay $2 million to Capital Consultants. The day before he entered his plea, Fog Cutter agreed that while he was in prison, he would keep his title, responsibilities, salary, bonuses, and other benefits. It also agreed to a $2 million "leave-of-absence payment." In July, the NASD delisted Fog Cutter from the Nasdaq. Fog Cutter appealed this decision to the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), which dismissed the appeal. Fog Cutter petitioned the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit for review.

RANDOLPH, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

Fog Cutter's main complaint is that the Commission failed to take into account the company's sound business reasons for acting as it did. The decision to enter into the leave-of-absence agreement was, Fog Cutter argues, in the best interest of its shareholders. The company tells us that Wiederhorn's continuing commitment to the company and his return to an active role in the company after his incarceration were essential to preserving Fog Cutter's core business units.

* * * *

* * * Fog Cutter made a deal with Wiederhorn that cost the company $4.75 million in a year in which it reported a $3.93 million net loss. We know as well that Fog Cutter handed

- a. Securities (stocks and bonds) can be bought and sold through national exchanges. Whether a security is listed on an exchange is subject to the discretion of the organization that operates it. The Securities and Exchange Commission oversees the securities exchanges.

CASE 5.3 CONTINUED ♦ Wiederhorn a $2 million bonus right before he went off to prison, a bonus stemming directly from the consequences of Wiederhorn's criminal activity.

Here there was ample evidence supporting the NASD's grounds for taking action against Fog Cutter: Wiederhorn's guilty plea, the leave-of-absence deal and its cost to the company, the Board's determination that Wiederhorn should retain his positions with Fog Cutter, and the concern that Wiederhorn would continue to exert influence on company affairs even while he was in prison. The decision was in accordance with NASD rules giving the organization broad discretion to determine whether the public interest requires delisting securities in light of events at a company. That rule is obviously consistent with the [law], and NASD's decision did not burden competition. [Emphasis added.]

Fog Cutter claims that it had to pay Wiederhorn and retain him because if it fired him in light of his guilty plea, it would have owed him $6 million. This scarcely speaks well for the company's case. The potential obligation is a result of an amendment the Board granted Wiederhorn in 2003 while he was under investigation. * * * Before the amendment to Wiederhorn's employment agreement in 2003, termination "for cause" included the conviction of any felony other than a traffic offense. In the 2003 amendment, the relevant provision allowed the Board to terminate Wiederhorn "for cause" upon conviction of a felony involving Fog Cutter. The Board had known about the investigation of Wiederhorn in connection with Capital Consultants for more than two years when it agreed to this amendment.

Fog Cutter thinks NASD's action was "unfair." But it was the company that bowed to Wiederhorn's demand for an amendment to his employment agreement, knowing full well that it was dramatically increasing the cost of firing him. Now it argues that terminating Wiederhorn would have been too expensive. One is reminded of the old saw about the child who murders his parents and then asks for mercy because he is an orphan. The makeup of Fog Cutter's Board was virtually unchanged between the time it amended the employment agreement and entered into the leave-of-absence agreement. It was, to say the least, not arbitrary or capricious for the Commission to find that Wiederhorn exercised thorough control over the Board, and to find this troubling. We agree that the Board provided little or no check on Wiederhorn's conduct, and that the Board's actions only aggravated the concerns Wiederhorn's conviction and imprisonment raised.

That Fog Cutter did not itself violate the [law] and that it disclosed the relevant events does not demonstrate any error in the delisting decision. The NASD's rules state that it may apply criteria more stringent than the minimum [legal] standards for listing. Fog Cutter's disclosure of its arrangements with Wiederhorn did not change the nature of those arrangements, which is what led the NASD to find that the company's actions were contrary to the public interest and a threat to public confidence in the Nasdaq exchange.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit denied Fog Cutter's petition for review of the SEC's decision. The NASD was concerned with "the integrity and the public's perception of the Nasdaq exchange" in light of Wiederhorn's legal troubles and the Fog Cutter board's acquiescence to his demands. The SEC "amply supported these concerns and was well within its authority to dismiss Fog Cutter's" appeal.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Should more consideration have been given to the fact that Fog Cutter was not convicted of a violation of the law? Why or why not?

THE GLOBAL DIMENSION • What does the decision in this case suggest to foreign investors who may be considering investments in securities listed on U.S. exchanges?

A WAY OF DOING BUSINESS A survey of U.S. executives undertaken by the Boston College Center for Corporate Citizenship found that more than 70 percent of those polled agreed that corporate citizenship must be treated as a priority. More than 60 percent said that good corporate citizenship added to their companies' profits. Strategist Michelle Bernhart has argued that corporate social responsibility cannot attain its maximum effectiveness unless it is treated as a way of doing business rather than as a special program.

Not all socially responsible activities can benefit a corporation, however. Corporate responsibility is most successful when a company undertakes activities that are relevant and significant to its stakeholders and related to its business operations. For example, the Brazilian firm Companhia Vale do Rio Doce is one of the world's largest diversified metals and mining companies. In 2008, it invested more than $150 million in social projects involving health care, infrastructure, and education. At the same time, it invested more than $300 million in environmental protection. One of its projects involves the rehabilitation of native species in the Amazon Valley. To that end, the company is planting almost 200 million trees in an attempt to restore 1,150 square miles of land where cattle breeding and farming have caused deforestation.

EMPLOYEE RECRUITING AND RETENTION A key corporate stakeholder is a company's workforce, which may include potential employees—job seekers. Surveys of college students about to enter the job market confirm that young people are looking for socially responsible employers. Younger workers are generally altruistic. They want to work for a company that allows them to participate in community projects.

Corporations that engage in meaningful social activities retain workers longer, particularly younger ones. At the accounting firm PKF Texas, for instance, employees support a variety of business, educational, and philanthropic organizations. As a result, this company is able to recruit and retain a younger workforce. Its turnover rate is half the industry average.

MAKING ETHICAL BUSINESS DECISIONS

As Dean Krehmeyer, executive director of the Business Roundtable's Institute for Corporate Ethics, once said, "Evidence strongly suggests being ethical—doing the right thing—pays." Instilling ethical business decision making into the fabric of a business organization is no small task, even if ethics "pays." The job is to get people to understand that they have to think more broadly about how their decisions will affect employees, shareholders, customers, and even the community. Great companies, such as Enron and the worldwide accounting firm Arthur Andersen, were brought down by the unethical behavior of a few. A two-hundred-year-old British investment banking firm, Barings Bank, was destroyed by the actions of one employee and a few of his friends. Clearly, ensuring that all employees get on the ethical business decision-making "bandwagon" is crucial in today's fast-paced world.

The George S. May International Company has provided six basic guidelines to help corporate employees judge their actions. Each employee—no matter what her or his level in the organization—should evaluate every action using the following six guidelines:

1. The law. Is the action you are considering legal? If you do not know the laws governing the action, then find out. Ignorance of the law is no excuse.
2. Rules and procedures. Are you following the internal rules and procedures that have already been laid out by your company? They have been developed to avoid problems. Is what you are planning to do consistent with your company's policies and procedures? If not, stop.
3. Values. Laws and internal company policies reinforce society's values. You might wish to ask yourself whether you are attempting to find a loophole in the law or in your company's policies. Next, you have to ask yourself whether you are following the "spirit" of the law as well as the letter of the law or the internal policy.
4. Conscience. If you feel any guilt, let your conscience be your guide. Alternatively, ask yourself whether you would be happy to be interviewed by national news media about the action you are going to take.
5. Promises. Every business organization is based on trust. Your customers believe that your company will do what it is supposed to do. The same is true for your suppliers and employees. Will your action live up to the commitments you have made to others, both inside the business and outside?
6. Heroes. We all have heroes who are role models for us. Is what you are planning on doing an action that your "hero" would take? If not, how would your hero act? That is how you should be acting.

Globalization makes it increasingly difficult for major corporations to differentiate themselves from the competition based solely on their products. See this chapter's Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature for another way that corporations may gain an edge over their competitors.

SHIFTING LEGAL PRIORITIES FOR BUSINESS Corporate Social Responsibility and “Outbehaving” the Competition

The worldwide explosion of information technology has made socially responsible behavior more important simply because it has become increasingly difficult to hide bad corporate behavior. In our transparent global economy, corporations that “outbehave” their competition ethically may also outperform them financially.

The Difficulty of Managing a Company’s Reputation

Before the advent of the Internet, a corporation that faced an ugly public relations situation—a product that had injured several consumers, for example—simply hired crisis-management consultants and then hid behind lawyers. Today, corporations can no longer manage their reputations the old-fashioned way. Now, when customers are unhappy or employees are disgruntled, they let the entire world know by dashing off a blog posting or putting a video clip on YouTube. In this online environment, corporations cannot control their stories. They can, however, control the way management operates.

Differentiation through “Doing Good”

In today’s global economy, companies need to find ways other than through their products or services to differentiate themselves from their competitors. Even if they produce a quality product, chances are that another company somewhere in the world will copy it and sell it for less. Companies must now compete in other areas, including how responsible their behavior is. For instance, how does the company treat its customers and employees?

A key component of responsible behavior is the creation of trust between companies and their customers, employees, and suppliers. Companies that build trust also enjoy higher profits. Numerous studies have shown a strong correlation between the cost of obtaining supplies and the level of trust between the buyer of those raw materials and the seller. The less trust there is between the purchaser and the seller, the higher the procurement costs—and sometimes by a significant margin.

Online Access to the Best Leadership Practices

Fortunately, managers no longer have to create from scratch the best socially responsible leadership practices. The Boston College Center for Corporate Citizenship sponsors an online community where member companies share their best practices for corporate social responsibility. This online community offers user-generated advice and access to numerous business case studies from Boston College’s Carroll School of Management. Some of this advice is particularly useful for companies attempting to expand into other countries. Their managers need to understand what social issues matter most in those countries. They can obtain this information from the Center for Corporate Citizenship.

Sustainability Counts, Too

MIT’s Sloan School of Management offers custom courses on sustainability. These courses can help managers understand that sustainability is a business opportunity and how to integrate sustainability into their evaluation of risk. One of the first companies to send its executives and directors to this course was Itaú Unibanco S.A., a large Brazilian financial services corporation.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS

We live in a small world, and it is getting smaller. Managers must recognize that everything they and their co-workers do can be instantaneously communicated around the world. Whenever a manager considers acting in a socially irresponsible way, he or she should envision a YouTube video exposing those actions to millions of viewers.

SECTION 5 PRACTICAL SOLUTIONS TO CORPORATE ETHICS QUESTIONS

Corporate ethics officers and ethics committees require a practical method to investigate and solve specific ethics problems. Ethics consultant Leonard H. Bucklin of Corporate-Ethics.US™ has devised a procedure that he calls Business Process Pragmatism™. It involves five steps:

1. Inquiry. Of course, the process must begin with an understanding of the facts. The parties involved might include the mass media, the public, employees, or customers. At this stage, the ethical problem or problems are specified. A list of relevant ethics principles is created.
2. Discussion. Here, a list of action options is developed. Each option carries with it certain ethical principles. In addition, resolution goals should be listed.

3. Decision. In this step, those participating in the process craft a consensus decision, or a consensus plan of action, for the corporation.
4. Justification. Will the consensus solution withstand moral scrutiny? At this point in the process, reasons should be attached to each proposed action or series of actions. Will the stakeholders involved accept these reasons?
5. Evaluation. Do the solutions to the corporate ethics issue satisfy corporate values, community values, and individual values? Ultimately, can the consensus resolution withstand moral scrutiny of the decisions made and the process used to reach those decisions?

BUSINESS ETHICS ON A GLOBAL LEVEL

Given the various cultures and religions throughout the world, conflicts in ethics frequently arise between foreign and U.S. businesspersons. For example, in certain countries the consumption of alcohol and specific foods is forbidden for religious reasons. Under such circumstances, it would be thoughtless and imprudent for a U.S. businessperson to invite a local business contact out for a drink.

The role played by women in other countries may also present some difficult ethical problems for firms doing business internationally. Equal employment opportunity is a fundamental public policy in the United States, and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits discrimination against women in the employment context (see Chapter 35). Some other countries, however, offer little protection for women against gender discrimination in the workplace, including sexual harassment.

We look here at how the employment practices that affect workers in other countries, particularly developing countries, have created some difficult ethical problems for U.S. sellers of goods manufactured in foreign nations. We also examine some of the ethical ramifications of the U.S. law prohibiting bribery of foreign officials.

The Monitoring of Employment Practices of Foreign Suppliers

Many U.S. businesses contract with companies in developing nations to produce goods, such as shoes and clothing, because the wage rates in those nations are significantly lower than those in the United States. Yet what if a foreign company hires women and children at below-minimum-wage rates, for example, or requires its employees to work long hours in a workplace full of health hazards? What if the company's supervisors routinely engage in workplace conduct that is offensive to women?

Given today's global communications network, few companies can assume that their actions in other nations will go unnoticed by "corporate watch" groups that discover and publicize unethical corporate behavior. As a result, U.S. businesses today usually take steps to avoid such adverse publicity—either by refusing to deal with certain suppliers or by arranging to monitor their suppliers' workplaces to make sure that the employees are not being mistreated.

By providing a forum for complaints, the Internet has increased the potential for damage to the reputation of any major (or minor) corporation at the hands of disgruntled employees or consumers, as well as special interest groups. Wal-Mart and Nike in particular have been frequent targets for advocacy groups that believe that those corporations exploit their workers. Although some of these complaints may be unfounded or exaggerated, the courts generally have refused to consider them defamatory (the tort of defamation will be discussed in Chapter 6). Most courts have regarded online attacks as simply the expression of opinion and therefore a form of speech protected by the First Amendment.

The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act

Another ethical problem in international business dealings has to do with the legitimacy of certain side payments to government officials. In the United States, the majority of contracts are formed within the private sector. In many foreign countries, however, government officials make the decisions on most major construction and manufacturing contracts because of extensive government regulation and control over trade and industry. Side payments to government officials in exchange for favorable business contracts are not unusual in such countries, nor are they considered to be unethical. In the past, U.S. corporations doing business in these nations largely followed the dictum "When in Rome, do as the Romans do."

In the 1970s, however, the U.S. media uncovered a number of business scandals involving large side payments by U.S. corporations to foreign representatives for the purpose of securing advantageous international trade contracts. In response to this unethical behavior, in 1977 Congress passed the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act⁵ (FCPA), which prohibits U.S. businesspersons from bribing foreign officials to secure beneficial contracts.

PROHIBITION AGAINST THE BRIBERY OF FOREIGN OFFICIALS The first part of the FCPA applies to all U.S. companies and their directors, officers, shareholders, employees, and agents. This part prohibits the bribery of most officials of foreign governments if the purpose of the payment is to get the official to act in his or her official capacity to provide business opportunities.

The FCPA does not prohibit payment of substantial sums to minor officials whose duties are ministerial. These payments are often referred to as “grease,” or facilitating payments. They are meant to accelerate the performance of administrative services that might otherwise be carried out at a slow pace. Thus, for example, if a firm makes a payment to a minor official to speed up an import licensing process, the firm has not violated the FCPA. Generally, the act, as amended, permits payments to foreign officials if such payments are lawful within the foreign country. The act also does not prohibit payments to private foreign companies or other third parties unless the U.S. firm knows that the payments will be passed on to a foreign government in violation of the FCPA.

U.S. companies that allegedly bribed foreign officials. More recently, the act has become an instrument for prosecuting foreign companies suspected of bribing officials outside the United States. The U.S. Department of Justice estimates that more than fifty such cases are under investigation or prosecution within this country. Today, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has a five-member team to examine possible violations of U.S. laws by foreign corporations in their attempts to secure business.

ACCOUNTING REQUIREMENTS In the past, bribes were often concealed in corporate financial records. Thus, the second part of the FCPA is directed toward accountants. All companies must keep detailed records that “accurately and fairly” reflect their financial activities. In addition, all companies must have accounting systems that provide “reasonable assurance” that all transactions entered into by the companies are accounted for and legal. These requirements assist in detecting illegal bribes. The FCPA further prohibits any person from making false statements to accountants or false entries in any record or account.

PENALTIES FOR VIOLATIONS The FCPA provides that business firms that violate the act may be fined up to $2 million. Individual officers or directors who violate the FCPA may be fined up to $100,000 (the fine cannot be paid by the company) and may be imprisoned for up to five years.

REVIEWING

Ethics and Business Decision Making

Isabel Arnett was promoted to chief executive officer (CEO) of Tamik, Inc., a pharmaceutical company that manufactures a vaccine called Kafluk, which supposedly provides some defense against bird flu. The company began marketing Kafluk throughout Asia. After numerous media reports that bird flu could soon become a worldwide epidemic, the demand for Kafluk increased, sales soared, and Tamik earned record profits. Tamik’s CEO, Arnett, then began receiving disturbing reports from Southeast Asia that in some patients, Kafluk had caused psychiatric disturbances, including severe hallucinations, and heart and lung problems. Arnett was informed that six children in Japan had committed suicide by jumping out of windows after receiving the vaccine. To cover up the story and prevent negative publicity, Arnett instructed Tamik’s partners in Asia to offer cash to the Japanese families whose children had died in exchange for their silence. Arnett also refused to authorize additional research within the company to study the potential side effects of Kafluk. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. This scenario illustrates one of the main reasons why ethical problems occur in business. What is that reason?

REVIEWING CONTINUES ▶

Ethics and Business Decision Making, Continued

2. Would a person who adheres to the principle of rights consider it ethical for Arnett not to disclose potential safety concerns and to refuse to perform additional research on Kafluk? Why or why not?
3. If Kafluk prevented fifty Asian people who were infected with bird flu from dying, would Arnett's conduct in this situation be ethical under a utilitarian model of ethics? Why or why not?
4. Did Tamik or Arnett violate the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in this scenario? Why or why not?

DEBATE THIS: Executives in large corporations are ultimately rewarded if their companies do well, particularly as evidenced by rising stock prices. Consequently, shouldn't we just let those who run corporations decide what level of negative side effects of their goods or services is "acceptable"?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

5-1. Business Ethics Jason Trevor owns a commercial bakery in Blakely, Georgia, that produces a variety of goods sold in grocery stores. Trevor is required by law to perform internal tests on food produced at his plant to check for contamination. On three occasions, the tests of food products containing peanut butter were positive for salmonella contamination. Trevor was not required to report the results to U.S. Food and Drug Administration officials, however, so he did not. Instead, Trevor instructed his employees to simply repeat the tests until the results were negative. Meanwhile, the products that had originally tested positive for salmonella were shipped out to retailers. Five people who ate Trevor's baked goods that year became seriously ill, and one person died from a salmonella infection. Even though Trevor's conduct was legal, was it unethical for him to sell goods that had once tested positive for salmonella? If Trevor had followed the six basic guidelines for making ethical business decisions, would he still have sold the contaminated goods? Why or why not?

5-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Approaches to Ethical Reasoning.

Shokun Steel Co. owns many steel plants. One of its plants is much older than the others. Equipment at the old plant is outdated and inefficient, and the costs of production at that plant are now twice as high as at any of Shokun's other plants. Shokun cannot increase the price of its steel because of competition, both domestic and international. The plant employs more than a thousand workers; it is located in Twin Firs, Pennsylvania, which has a population of about forty-five thousand. Shokun is contemplating whether to close the plant. What factors should the firm consider in making its decision? Will the firm violate any ethical duties if it closes the plant? Analyze these questions from the two basic perspectives on ethical reasoning discussed in this chapter.

5-3. Ethical Conduct Unable to pay more than $1.2 billion in debt, Big Mountain Metals, Inc., filed a petition to declare bankruptcy in a federal bankruptcy court in July 2009. Among Big Mountain's creditors were several banks, including Bank of New London and Suzuki Bank. The court appointed Morgan Crawford to work as a "disinterested" (neutral) party with Big Mountain and the creditors to resolve their disputes; the court set an hourly fee as Crawford's compensation. Crawford told the banks that he wanted them to pay him an additional percentage fee based on his "success" in finding "new value" to pay Big Mountain's debts. He said that without such a deal, he would not perform his mediation duties. Suzuki Bank agreed; the other banks disputed the deal, but no one told the court. In October 2010, Crawford asked the court for nearly $2.5 million in compensation, including the hourly fees, which totaled about $531,000, and the percentage fees. Big Mountain and others asked the court to deny Crawford any fees on the basis that he had improperly negotiated “secret side agreements.” How did Crawford violate his duties as a “disinterested” party? Should he be denied compensation? Why or why not?

5-4. Ethical Conduct Ernest Price suffered from sickle-cell anemia. In 1997, Price asked Dr. Ann Houston, his physician, to prescribe OxyContin, a strong narcotic, for the pain. Over the next several years, Price saw at least ten different physicians at ten different clinics in two cities, and used seven pharmacies in three cities, to obtain and fill simultaneous prescriptions for OxyContin. In March 2001, when Houston learned of these activities, she refused to write more prescriptions for Price. As other physicians became aware of Price’s actions, they also stopped writing his prescriptions. Price filed a suit in a Mississippi state court against Purdue Pharma Co. and other producers and distributors of OxyContin, as well as his physicians and the pharmacies that had filled the prescriptions. Price alleged negligence, among other things, claiming that OxyContin’s addictive nature caused him injury and that this was the defendants’ fault. The defendants argued that Price’s claim should be dismissed because it arose from his own wrongdoing. Who should be held legally liable? Should any of the parties be considered ethically responsible? Why or why not? [Price v. Purdue Pharma Co., 920 So.2d 479 (Miss. 2006)]

5-5. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Ethical Leadership.

In 1999, Andrew Fastow, chief financial officer of Enron Corp., asked Merrill Lynch, an investment firm, to participate in a bogus sale of three barges so that Enron could record earnings of $12.5 million from the sale. Through a third entity, Fastow bought the barges back within six months and paid Merrill for its participation. Five Merrill employees were convicted of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, in part, on an “honest-services” theory. Under this theory, an employee deprives his or her employer of “honest services” when the employee promotes his or her own interests, rather than the interests of the employer. Four of the employees appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, arguing that this charge did not apply to the conduct in which they engaged. The court agreed, reasoning that the barge deal was conducted to benefit Enron, not to enrich the Merrill employees at Enron’s expense. Meanwhile, Kevin Howard, chief financial officer of Enron Broadband Services (EBS), engaged in “Project Braveheart,” which enabled EBS to show earnings of $111 million in 2000 and 2001. Braveheart involved the sale of an interest in the future revenue of a video-on-demand venture to nCube, a small technology firm, which was paid for its help when EBS bought the interest back. Howard was convicted of wire fraud, in part, on the “honest-services” theory. He filed a motion to vacate his conviction on the same basis that the Merrill employees had argued. Did Howard act unethically? Explain. Should the court grant his motion? Discuss. [United States v. Howard, 471 F.Supp.2d 772 (S.D.Tex. 2007)]

5-6. Corporate Social Responsibility Methamphetamine (meth) is an addictive, synthetic drug made chiefly in small toxic labs (STLs) in homes, tents, barns, or hotel rooms. The manufacturing process is dangerous and often results in explosions, burns, and toxic fumes. The government has spent considerable resources to find and eradicate STLs, imprison meth dealers and users, treat addicts, and provide services for families affected by these activities. Meth cannot be made without ephedrine or pseudoephedrine, which are ingredients in cold and allergy medications. Arkansas has one of the highest numbers of STLs in the United States. In an effort to recoup the costs of dealing with the meth epidemic, twenty counties in Arkansas filed a suit in a federal district court against Pfizer, Inc., and other companies that make or distribute cold and allergy medications. What is the defendants’ ethical responsibility in this case, and to whom do they owe it? Why? [Ashley County, Arkansas v. Pfizer, Inc., 552 F.3d 659 (8th Cir. 2009)]

5-7. Business Ethics on a Global Scale In the 1990s, Pfizer, Inc., developed a new antibiotic called Trovan (trovafloxacin mesylate). Tests showed that in animals Trovan had life-threatening side effects, including joint disease, abnormal cartilage growth, liver damage, and a degenerative bone condition. In 1996, an epidemic of bacterial meningitis swept across Nigeria. Pfizer sent three U.S. physicians to test Trovan on children who were patients in Nigeria’s Infectious Disease Hospital. Pfizer did not obtain the patients’ consent, alert them to the risks, or tell them that Médecins Sans Frontières (Doctors Without Borders) was providing an effective conventional treatment at the same site. Eleven children died in the experiment, and others were left blind, deaf, paralyzed, or brain damaged. Rabi Abdullahi and other Nigerian children filed a suit in a U.S. federal district court against Pfizer, alleging a violation of a customary international law norm prohibiting involuntary medical experimentation on humans. Did Pfizer violate any ethical standards? What might Pfizer have done to avert the consequences? Explain. [Abdullahi v. Pfizer, Inc., 562 F.3d 163 (2d Cir. 2009)]

5-8. Violation of Internal Ethical Codes Havensure, LLC, an insurance broker, approached York International to determine whether it could provide insurance for York at a better rate. At the time, York was obtaining its group insurance from Prudential Insurance Co. through Universal Life Resources (ULR), another insurance broker. York allowed Havensure to study its policies. Havensure discovered that the premium Prudential charged included a hidden broker’s fee that it used to pay ULR. When Havensure claimed that it could get the insurance at a lower price, York agreed that Havensure could send requests for proposals to various insurance companies. To keep York's business, Prudential offered to match the lowest rate quoted. Prudential also informed York that it must continue to buy the policy through ULR, not through Havensure. York agreed. Havensure then sued Prudential for wrongful interference with a business relationship (a tort that will be discussed in Chapter 6). The trial court held for Prudential. Havensure appealed. The appeals court held that although Prudential had violated its own code of ethics by having a hidden fee for a broker, and might have violated New York insurance law, Havensure still had no case. Why would a court find that a firm that violated its own rules, and might have violated the law, had no obligation for the loss it might have imposed on another firm trying to compete for business? Does this ruling make sense? Why or why not? [Havensure, LLC v. Prudential Insurance Co. of America, 595 F.3d 312 (6th Cir. 2010)]

5-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Copyrights.

Steven Soderbergh is the Academy Award-winning director of Erin Brockovich, Traffic, and many other films. CleanFlicks, LLC, filed a suit in a federal district court against Soderbergh, fifteen other directors, and the Directors Guild of America. The plaintiff asked the court to rule that it had the right to sell DVDs of the defendants' films altered without the defendants' consent to delete scenes of "sex, nudity, profanity and gory violence." CleanFlicks sold or rented the edited DVDs under the slogan "It's About Choice" to consumers, sometimes indirectly through retailers. It would not sell to retailers that made unauthorized copies of the edited films. The defendants, with DreamWorks, LLC, and seven other movie studios that own the copyrights to the films, filed a counterclaim against CleanFlicks and others engaged in the same business, alleging copyright infringement. Those filing the counterclaim asked the court to prevent CleanFlicks and the others from making and marketing altered versions of the films. [CleanFlicks of Colorado, LLC v. Soderbergh, 433 F.Supp.2d 1236 (D.Colo. 2006)]

- (a) Movie studios often edit their films to conform to content and other standards and sell the edited versions to network television and other commercial buyers. In this case, however, the studios objected when CleanFlicks edited the films and sold the altered versions directly to consumers. Similarly,

CleanFlicks made unauthorized copies of the studios' DVDs to edit the films, but objected to others' making unauthorized copies of the altered versions. Is there anything unethical about these apparently contradictory positions? Why or why not?

- (b) CleanFlicks and its competitors asserted, among other things, that they were making "fair use" of the studios' copyrighted works. They argued that by their actions "they are criticizing the objectionable content commonly found in current movies and that they are providing more socially acceptable alternatives to enable families to view the films together, without exposing children to the presumed harmful effects emanating from the objectionable content." If you were the judge, how would you view this argument? Is a court the appropriate forum for making determinations of public or social policy? Explain.

Then answer the following questions.

- (a) In Scene 1, two employees discuss whether to market their company's drug as a treatment for other conditions—even though the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) approved the drug for treating only epilepsy. One employee argues that marketing the drug for more than the one treatment will increase the company's short-term profits and that obtaining the FDA approval for the other treatments will take too long. What theory describes this employee's perspective?
- (b) In Scene 2, a new sales rep discusses the company's off-label marketing strategy with a veteran sales rep. Is it unethical or illegal for a sales rep to represent that he is a doctor when he has a doctorate in chemistry but is not actually a physician? Explain.
- (c) In Scene 2, when the new sales rep suggests that they talk with the corporation's legal or human resources department about the drug's safety for off-label uses, how does the woman respond? Does her response encourage ethical conduct? Discuss fully.

UNIT ONE • FOCUS ON ETHICS

Ethics and the Legal Environment of Business

In Chapter 5, we examined the importance of ethical standards in the business context. We also offered suggestions on how business decision makers can create an ethical workplace. Certainly, it is not wrong for a businessperson to try to increase his or her firm's profits. But there are limits, both ethical and legal, to how far businesspersons can go. In preparing for a career in business, you will find that a background in business ethics and a commitment to ethical behavior are just as important as a knowledge of the specific laws that are covered in this text. Of course, no textbook can give an answer to each and every ethical question that arises in the business environment. Nor can it anticipate the types of ethical questions that will arise in the future, as technology and globalization continue to transform the workplace and business relationships.

The most we can do is examine the types of ethical issues that businesspersons have faced in the past and that they are facing today. In the Focus on Ethics sections in this book, we provide examples of specific ethical issues that have arisen in various areas of business activity.

In this initial Focus on Ethics feature, we look first at the relationship between business ethics and business law. We then examine various obstacles to ethical behavior in the business context. We conclude the feature by exploring the parameters of corporate social responsibility through a discussion of whether corporations have an ethical duty to the community or society at large.

Business ethics and business law are closely intertwined because ultimately the law rests on social beliefs about right and wrong behavior in the business world. Thus, businesspersons, by complying with the law, are acting ethically. Mere legal compliance (the "moral minimum" in terms of business ethics), however, is often not enough. This is because the law does not—and cannot—provide the answers for all ethical questions.

In the business world, numerous actions may be unethical but not necessarily illegal. Consider an example. Suppose that a pharmaceutical company is banned from marketing a particular drug in the United States because of the drug's possible adverse side effects. Yet no law prohibits the company from selling the drug in foreign markets—even though some consumers in those markets may suffer serious health problems as a result of using the drug. At issue here is not whether it would be legal to market the drug in other countries but whether it would be ethical to do so. In other words, the law has its limits—it cannot make all ethical decisions for us. Rather, the law assumes that those in business will behave ethically in their day-to-day dealings. If they do not, the courts will not come to their assistance.

Obstacles to Ethical Business Behavior

People sometimes behave unethically in the business context, just as they do in their private lives. Some businesspersons knowingly engage in unethical behavior because they think that they can "get away with it"—that is, no one will ever learn of their unethical actions.

Examples of this kind of unethical behavior include padding expense accounts, casting doubts on the integrity of a rival co-worker to gain a job promotion, stealing company supplies or equipment, and so on. Obviously, these acts are unethical, and many of them are illegal as well. In some situations, however, businesspersons who would choose to act ethically may be deterred from doing so because of situational circumstances or external pressures.

Ethics and the Corporate Environment Individuals in their personal lives normally are free to decide ethical issues as they wish and to follow through on those decisions. In the business world, and particularly in the corporate environment, rarely is such a decision made by one person. If you are an officer or a manager of a large company, for example, you will find that the decision as to what is right or wrong for the company is not totally yours to make. Your input may weigh in the decision, but ultimately a corporate decision is a collective undertaking.

Additionally, collective decision making, because it places emphasis on consensus and unity of opinion, tends to hinder individual ethical assertiveness. For example, suppose that a director has ethical misgivings about a planned corporate venture that promises to be highly profitable. If the other directors have no such misgivings, the director who does may be swayed by the others' enthusiasm for the project and downplay her or his own criticisms.

Furthermore, just as no one person makes a collective decision, so no one person (normally) is held accountable for the decision. The corporate enterprise thus tends to shield corporate personnel from both individual exposure to the consequences of their decisions (such as direct contact with someone who suffers harm from a corporate product) and personal accountability for those decisions.

Ethics and Management Much unethical business behavior occurs simply because management does not always make clear what ethical standards and behaviors are expected of the firm's employees. Although most firms now issue ethical policies or codes of conduct, these policies and codes are not always effective in creating an ethical workplace. At times, this is because the firm's ethical policies are not communicated clearly to employees or do not bear on the real ethical issues confronting decision makers. Additionally, particularly in a large corporation, unethical behavior in one corporate department may simply escape the attention of those in control of the corporation or the corporate officials responsible for implementing and monitoring the company's ethics program.

FOCUS ON ETHICS CONTINUES ▶

Unethical behavior may also occur when corporate management, by its own conduct, indicates that ethical considerations take a second seat. If management makes no attempt to deter unethical behavior—through reprimands or employment terminations, for example—it will be obvious to employees that management is not very serious about ethics. Likewise, if a company gives promotions or salary increases to those who clearly use unethical tactics to increase the firm's profits, then employees who do not resort to such tactics will be at a disadvantage. An employee in this situation may decide that because "everyone else does it," he or she might as well do it too.

Of course, an even stronger encouragement of unethical behavior occurs when employers engage in blatantly unethical or illegal conduct and expect their employees to do so as well. An employee in this situation faces two options, neither of which is satisfactory: participate in the conduct or "blow the whistle" on (inform authorities of) the employer's actions—and, of course, risk being fired. (See Chapter 34 for a more detailed discussion of whistleblowing and its consequences for employees.)

Corporate Social Responsibility

As discussed in Chapter 5, just what constitutes corporate social responsibility has been debated for some time. In particular, questions arise concerning a corporation's ethical obligations to its community and to society as a whole.

A Corporation's Duty to the Community In some circumstances, the community in which a business enterprise is located is greatly affected by corporate decisions and therefore may be considered a stakeholder. Assume, for example, that a company employs two thousand workers at one of its plants. If the company decides that it would be profitable to close the plant, the employees—and the community—would suffer as a result. To be considered ethical in that situation (and, in some circumstances, to comply with laws governing plant shutdowns), a corporation must take both the employees' needs and the community's needs into consideration when making its decision.

Another ethical question sometimes arises when a firm moves into a community. Does the company have an obligation to evaluate first how its presence will affect that community (even though the community is not a stakeholder yet)? This question has surfaced in regard to the expansion of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., into smaller communities. Generally, most people in such communities welcome the lower prices and wider array of goods that Wal-Mart offers relative to other, smaller stores in the area. A vocal minority of people in some communities, however, claim that smaller stores often find it impossible to compete with Wal-Mart's prices and thus are forced to go out of business. Many of these smaller stores have existed for years and, according to Wal-Mart's critics, enhance the quality of community life. These critics claim that it is unethical of Wal-Mart to disregard a town's interest in the quality and character of its community life.

In addition to expanding, Wal-Mart has been consolidating some of its smaller stores into large "superstores." As it consolidates, Wal-Mart is closing stores in some of the very towns in which it drove its smaller competitors out of business. This development raises yet another ethical question: Does a store such as Wal-Mart have an obligation to continue operations in a community once it has driven its competitors out of business?

A Corporation's Duty to Society Perhaps the most disputed area of corporate social responsibility is the nature of a corporation's duty to society at large. Those who contend that corporations should first and foremost attend to the goal of profit maximization would argue that it is by generating profits that a firm can best contribute to society. Society benefits from profit-making activities because profits can only be realized when a firm markets products or services that are desired by society. These products and services enhance the standard of living, and the profits accumulated by successful business firms generate national wealth. Our laws and court decisions promoting trade and commerce reflect the public policy that the fruits of commerce (wealth) are desirable and good. Because our society values wealth as an ethical goal, corporations, by contributing to that wealth, automatically are acting ethically.

Those arguing for profit maximization as a corporate goal also point out that it would be inappropriate to use the power of the corporate business world to further society's goals by promoting social causes. Determinations as to what exactly is in society's best interest involve questions that are essentially political, and therefore the public, through the political process, should have a say in making those determinations. Thus, the legislature—not the corporate boardroom—is the appropriate forum for making such decisions.

Critics of the profit-maximization view believe that corporations should become actively engaged in seeking and furthering solutions to social problems. Because so much of the wealth and power of this country is controlled by business, business in turn has a responsibility to society to use that wealth and power in socially beneficial ways. Corporations should therefore promote human rights, strive for equal treatment of minorities and women in the workplace, take steps to preserve the environment, and generally not profit from activities that society has deemed unethical. The critics also point out that it is ethically irresponsible to leave decisions concerning social welfare up to the government, because many social needs are not being met sufficiently through the political process.

It Pays to Be Ethical

Most corporations today have learned that it pays to be ethically responsible—even if this means less profit in the short run (and it often does). Today's corporations are subject to more intensive scrutiny—by both government agencies and the public—than corporations of the past. "Corporate watch" groups monitor the activities of U.S. corporations, including activities conducted in foreign countries. Through the Internet, complaints about a corporation's practices can easily be disseminated to a worldwide audience. Similarly, dissatisfied customers and employees can voice their complaints about corporate policies, products, or services in Internet chat rooms and other online forums. Thus, if a corporation fails to conduct its operations ethically or to respond quickly to an ethical crisis, its goodwill and reputation (and future profits) will likely suffer as a result.

There are other reasons as well for a corporation to behave ethically. For example, companies that demonstrate a commitment to ethical behavior—by implementing ethical programs, complying with environmental regulations, and promptly investigating product complaints, for example—often receive more lenient treatment from government agencies and the courts. Additionally, investors may shy away from a corporation's stock if the corporation is perceived to be socially irresponsible. Finally, unethical (and/or illegal) corporate behavior may result in government action, such as new laws imposing further requirements on corporate entities.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. What might be some other deterrents to ethical behavior in the business context, besides those discussed in this Focus on Ethics feature?
2. Can you think of a situation in which a business firm may be acting ethically but not in a socially responsible manner? Explain.
3. Why are consumers and the public generally more concerned with ethical and socially responsible business behavior today than they were, say, fifty years ago?
4. Suppose that an automobile manufacturing company has to choose between two alternatives: contributing $1 million annually to the United Way or reinvesting the $1 million in the company. In terms of ethics and social responsibility, which is the better choice?
5. Have Internet chat rooms and online forums affected corporate decision makers' willingness to consider the community and public interest when making choices? Are corporate decision makers more apt to make ethical choices in the cyber age? Explain.

Intentional Torts and Privacy

Part of doing business today—and, indeed, part of everyday life—is the risk of being involved in a lawsuit. The list of circumstances in which businesspersons can be sued is long and varied. A customer who is injured by a security guard at a business establishment, for example, may attempt to sue the business owner, claiming that the security guard's conduct was wrongful. Any time that one party's allegedly wrongful conduct causes injury to another, an action may arise under the law of torts (the word tort is French for “wrong”). Through tort law, society compensates those who have suffered injuries as a result of the wrongful conduct of others.

Many of the lawsuits brought by or against business firms are based on the tort theories discussed in this chapter, which covers intentional torts, and the next chapter, which discusses unintentional torts. Intentional torts arise from intentional acts, whereas unintentional torts often result from carelessness (as when an employee at a store knocks over a display case, injuring a customer). In addition, this chapter discusses how tort law applies to wrongful actions in the online environment. Tort theories also come into play in the context of product liability (liability for defective products), which will be discussed in detail in Chapter 22.

THE BASIS OF TORT LAW

Two notions serve as the basis of all torts: wrongs and compensation. Tort law is designed to compensate those who have suffered a loss or injury due to another person's wrongful act. In a tort action, one person or group brings a lawsuit against another person or group to obtain compensation (monetary damages) or other relief for the harm suffered.

The Purpose of Tort Law

The basic purpose of tort law is to provide remedies for the invasion of various protected interests. Society recognizes an interest in personal physical safety, and tort law provides remedies for acts that cause physical injury or that interfere with physical security and freedom of movement. Society recognizes an interest in protecting property, and tort law provides remedies for acts that cause destruction of or damage to property. Society also recognizes an interest in protecting certain intangible interests, such as personal privacy, family relations, reputation, and dignity, and tort law provides remedies for invasion of these interests.

Damages Available in Tort Actions

Because the purpose of tort law is to compensate the injured party for the damage suffered, you need to have an understanding of the types of damages that plaintiffs seek in tort actions.

COMPENSATORY DAMAGES Compensatory damages are intended to compensate or reimburse a plaintiff for actual losses—that is, to make the plaintiff whole and put her or him in the same position that she or he would have been in had the tort not occurred. Compensatory damages awards are often broken down into special damages and general damages.

Special damages compensate the plaintiff for quantifiable monetary losses, such as medical expenses, lost wages and benefits (now and in the future), extra costs, the loss of irreplaceable items, and the costs of repairing or replacing damaged property.

CASE IN POINT Seaway Marine Transport operates the Enterprise, a large cargo ship, which has twenty-two hatches for storing coal. When the Enterprise positioned itself to receive a load of coal on the shores of Lake Erie in Ohio, it struck a land-based coal-loading machine operated by Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad Company. A federal court found Seaway liable for negligence and awarded $522,000 in special damages to compensate Bessemer for the cost of repairing the damage to the loading boom.¹

General damages compensate individuals (not companies) for the nonmonetary aspects of the harm suffered, such as pain and suffering. A court might award general damages for physical or emotional pain and suffering, loss of companionship, loss of consortium (losing the emotional and physical benefits of a spousal relationship), disfigurement, loss of reputation, or loss or impairment of mental or physical capacity.

PUNITIVE DAMAGES Occasionally, the courts may also award punitive damages in tort cases to punish the wrongdoer and deter others from similar wrongdoing. Punitive damages are appropriate only when the defendant's conduct was particularly egregious or reprehensible. Usually, this means that punitive damages are available mainly in intentional tort actions and only rarely in negligence lawsuits (negligence actions will be discussed in Chapter 7). They may be awarded, however, in suits involving gross negligence, which can be defined as an intentional failure to perform a manifest duty in reckless disregard of the consequences of such a failure for the life or property of another.

Courts exercise great restraint in granting punitive damages to plaintiffs in tort actions because punitive damages are subject to the limitations imposed by the due process clause of the U.S. Constitution (see Chapter 2). The United States Supreme Court has held that to the extent an award of punitive damages is grossly excessive, it furthers no legitimate purpose and violates due process requirements.² Consequently, an appellate court will sometimes reduce the amount of punitive damages awarded to a plaintiff on the ground that it is excessive and thereby violates the due process clause.³

2. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. v. Campbell, 538 U.S. 408, 123 S.Ct. 1513, 155 L.Ed.2d 585 (2003).

3. See, for example, Buell-Wilson v. Ford Motor Co., 160 Cal.App.4th 1107, 73 Cal.Rptr.3d 277 (2008).

Tort Reform

Critics of the current tort law system contend that it encourages trivial and unfounded lawsuits, which clog the courts, and is unnecessarily costly. In particular, they say, damages awards are often excessive and bear little relationship to the actual damage suffered. Such large awards encourage plaintiffs and their lawyers to bring frivolous suits. The result, in the critics' view, is a system that disproportionately rewards a few plaintiffs while imposing a "tort tax" on business and society as a whole. Furthermore, the tax manifests itself in other ways. Because physicians, hospitals, and pharmaceutical companies are worried about medical malpractice suits, they have changed their behavior. Physicians, for example, order more tests than necessary, adding to the nation's health-care costs.

The federal government and a number of states have begun to take some steps toward tort reform. At the federal level, the Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA) of 2005⁴ shifted jurisdiction over large interstate tort and product liability class-action lawsuits from the state courts to the federal courts. The intent was to prevent plaintiffs' attorneys from forum shopping—looking for a state court known to be sympathetic to their clients' cause and predisposed to award large damages in class-action suits, even though the case might have only a tenuous connection to that jurisdiction.

At the state level, more than half of the states have placed caps ranging from $250,000 to $750,000 on noneconomic (general) damages (for example, pain and suffering), especially in medical malpractice suits. More than thirty states have limited punitive damages, with some imposing outright bans.

INTENTIONAL TORTS AGAINST PERSONS

An intentional tort, as the term implies, requires intent. The tortfeasor (the one committing the tort) must intend to commit an act, the consequences of which interfere with the personal or business interests of another in a way not permitted by law. An evil or harmful motive is not required—in fact, the actor may even have a beneficial motive for committing what turns out to be a tortious act. In tort law, intent means only that the actor intended the consequences of his or her act or knew with substantial certainty that specific consequences would result from the act. The law generally assumes that individuals intend the normal consequences of their actions. Thus, forcefully pushing another—even if done in jest and without any evil motive—is an intentional tort (if injury results), because the object of a strong push can ordinarily be expected to be abruptly displaced.

Intentional torts against persons include assault and battery, false imprisonment, infliction of emotional distress, defamation, invasion of privacy, appropriation, fraudulent misrepresentation, and torts related to misuse of litigation. We discuss these torts in the following subsections.

Assault and Battery

An assault is any intentional and unexcused threat of immediate harmful or offensive contact, including words or acts that create in another person a reasonable apprehension of harmful contact. An assault can be completed even if there is no actual contact with the plaintiff, provided that the defendant's conduct creates a reasonable apprehension of imminent harm in the plaintiff. Tort law aims to protect individuals from having to expect harmful or offensive contact.

The completion of the act that caused the apprehension, if it results in harm to the plaintiff, is a battery, which is defined as an unexcused and harmful or offensive physical contact intentionally performed. For example, Ivan threatens Jean with a gun, then shoots her. The pointing of the gun at Jean is an assault; the firing of the gun (if the bullet hits Jean) is a battery. The contact can be harmful, or it can be merely offensive (such as an unwelcome kiss). Physical injury need not occur. The contact can involve any part of the body or anything attached to it—for example, a hat or other item of clothing, a purse, or a chair in which one is sitting. Whether the contact is offensive is determined by the reasonable person standard.⁵ The contact can be made by the defendant or by some force that the defendant sets in motion—for example, a thrown rock or distributing poisoned food.

If the plaintiff shows that there was contact, and the jury (or judge, if there is no jury) agrees that the contact was offensive, then the plaintiff has a right to compensation. A plaintiff may be compensated for the emotional harm or loss of reputation resulting from a battery, as well as for physical harm. A defendant may raise a number of legally recognized defenses (reasons why the plaintiff should not obtain damages) that justify his or her conduct, including self-defense and defense of others.

False Imprisonment

False imprisonment is the intentional confinement or restraint of another person's activities without justification. False imprisonment interferes with the freedom to move without restraint. The confinement can be accomplished through the use of physical barriers, physical restraint, or threats of physical force. Moral pressure does not constitute false imprisonment. It is essential that the person being restrained not agree to the restraint.

Businesspersons often face suits for false imprisonment after they have attempted to confine a suspected shoplifter for questioning. Under the "privilege to detain" granted to merchants in most states, a merchant can use reasonable force to detain or delay persons suspected of shoplifting and hold them for the police. Although laws vary from state to state, most states require that any detention be conducted in a reasonable manner and for only a reasonable length of time. Undue force or unreasonable detention can lead to liability for the business.

Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress

The tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress is an intentional act that amounts to extreme and outrageous conduct resulting in severe emotional distress to another. To be actionable (capable of serving as the ground for a lawsuit), the act must be extreme and outrageous to the point that it exceeds the bounds of decency accepted by society.

CASE IN POINT Michael Perkins, an off-duty police officer, went to Wal-Mart to purchase a few items, including a $20 ink cartridge. The cashier, Alicia Jackson, was an acquaintance and apparently scanned the cartridge but then voided it out, so he was not charged for it. Soon after, Wal-Mart's theft prevention staff discovered that Jackson had been involved in an illegal "under-ringing" scheme for some time. In this scheme, a cashier either fails to "ring up" (charge for) merchandise or she scans an item and then voids the transaction. (This allows the cashier's friends to obtain merchandise for free.) Elijah Wilson, the police officer who questioned Jackson, disliked Perkins, and after learning of Perkins's connection to the case, encouraged her to implicate him in the criminal scheme, which she did. Despite claiming no knowledge of the scheme, Perkins was disciplined at work and charged with a crime; he was later acquitted. The court held that Perkins might be able to prove an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim against Wilson.⁶

5. The reasonable person standard is an "objective" test of how a reasonable person would have acted under the same circumstances. See the subsection entitled "The Duty of Care and Its Breach" in Chapter 7 on pages 137–139.

Courts in most jurisdictions are wary of emotional distress claims and confine them to situations involving truly outrageous behavior. Acts that cause indignity or annoyance alone usually are not sufficient, but repeated annoyances (such as those experienced by a person who is being stalked), coupled with threats, are enough. When the outrageous conduct consists of speech about a public figure, the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech also limits emotional distress claims.

CASE IN POINT Hustler magazine once printed a false advertisement that showed a picture of the late Reverend Jerry Falwell and described him as having lost his virginity to his mother in an out-house while he was drunk. Falwell sued the magazine for intentional infliction of emotional distress and won, but the United States Supreme Court overturned the decision. The Court held that creators of parodies of public figures are protected under the First Amendment from intentional infliction of emotional distress claims. (The Court used the same standards that apply to public figures in defamation lawsuits, discussed next.)⁷

6. Perkins v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., ___ So.3d ___, 2010 WL 610627 (Miss.App. 2010).
7. Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46, 108 S.Ct. 876, 99 L.Ed.2d 41 (1988). For another example of how the courts protect parody, see Busch v. Viacom International, Inc., 477 F.Supp.2d 764 (N.D.Tex. 2007), involving a false endorsement of televangelist Pat Robertson's diet shake.

Defamation

As discussed in Chapter 4, the freedom of speech guaranteed by the First Amendment is not absolute. In interpreting the First Amendment, the courts must balance the vital guarantee of free speech against other pervasive and strong social interests, including society's interest in preventing and redressing attacks on reputation.

Defamation of character involves wrongfully hurting a person's good reputation. The law imposes a general duty on all persons to refrain from making false, defamatory statements of fact about others. Breaching this duty in writing or other permanent form (such as a digital recording) involves the tort of libel. Breaching this duty orally involves the tort of slander. The tort of defamation also arises when a false statement of fact is made about a person's product, business, or legal ownership rights to property.

Often at issue in defamation lawsuits (including online defamation, which will be discussed later in this chapter) is whether the defendant made a statement of fact or a statement of opinion. Statements of opinion normally are not actionable because they are protected under the First Amendment. In other words, making a negative statement about another person is not defamation unless the statement is false and represents something as a fact (for example, "Lane cheats on his taxes") rather than a personal opinion (for example, "Lane is a jerk").

Whether an attorney's statement to a reporter about another attorney constituted fact or opinion was at issue in the following case.

Orlando v. Cole

Appeals Court of Massachusetts, 76 Mass.App.Ct. 1112, 921 N.E.2d 566 (2010).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

By the Court
(McHUGH, VUONO & MEADE, JJ. [Justices]).
* * *

The plaintiff, Joseph M. Orlando, a lawyer, filed a one-count complaint for slander against Garrick F. Cole, who is also a lawyer. The complaint alleges that Orlando suffered harm to his reputation as an attorney as a result of comments made by Cole to newspaper reporters about Orlando's role in a criminal investigation involving Cole's client. Cole filed a motion to dismiss the complaint * * *, which was allowed.

* * * Orlando's complaint and the exhibits attached thereto assert the following facts. In February 2005, Orlando was representing a seventeen-year-old high school student who claimed that her basketball coach, Thomas A. Atwater, sexually assaulted her. Atwater apparently was an acquaintance of Orlando's. After the alleged incident, Atwater, then unrepresented, approached Orlando, admitted that he committed the act, signed an affidavit to that effect, and then went to the police and made a full confession.

* * * A few days later, Orlando spoke to two newspaper reporters, gave them a copy of Atwater's affidavit, and explained the circumstances under which Atwater gave the affidavit. Before publishing their article, the reporters approached Cole, who by this time was representing Atwater in the criminal matter, and asked for Cole's comments. Cole responded that "the affidavit is 'inaccurate' and called Orlando's actions 'deceitful' and 'fraudulent.'" The article further stated, "Cole would not say what he thought was inaccurate in the affidavit." Both Orlando's and Cole's comments were reported together in various publications. Orlando then sued Cole for slander. The complaint alleged that Cole's comments were false, "described conduct by [Orlando] undertaken in his profession and business, and impute an unfitness for or a misconduct in his office or employment."

* * * The standard by which a complaint is measured on a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim is a lenient one. "The allegations of the complaint, as well as such inferences as may be drawn therefrom in the plaintiff's favor, are to be taken as true." Doubts are resolved in favor of the plaintiff, and the motion must be denied unless it is certain that no set of provable facts could entitle the plaintiff to relief.

We begin with a threshold inquiry into whether the comments are "reasonably susceptible of a defamatory connotation [implication],' so as to warrant their submission to a jury to determine if in fact the defamatory connotation was conveyed. A statement is defamatory in the circumstances if it discredits a person in the minds of any considerable and respectable class of the community." We conclude that the comments at issue are susceptible of a defamatory connotation because each of the terms used—"inaccurate," "fraudulent," and "deceitful"—impl[ies] misconduct. [Emphasis added.]

We now turn to whether Cole's statements were ones of fact, or opinion, or a combination of both. "The determination whether a statement is one of fact or opinion is generally considered a question of law." The distinction is critical because "under the First Amendment, there is no such thing as a false idea. However pernicious [destructive] an opinion may seem, we depend for its correction not on the conscience of judges and juries but on the competition of other ideas. But there is no constitutional value in false statements of fact."

To determine whether a statement is opinion, a court must "examine the statement in its totality in the context in which it was uttered or published." In doing so, "the court must consider all the words used, not merely a particular phrase or sentence. In addition, the court must give weight to cautionary terms used by the person publishing the statement. Finally, the court must consider all of the circumstances surrounding the statement, including the medium by which the statement is disseminated and the audience to which it is published." If the "average reader" could understand the allegedly libelous statements as either fact or opinion, the determination is for the jury.

Cole's allegations that the affidavit signed by Atwater was "inaccurate" and that Orlando's conduct was "fraudulent" and "deceitful" are factual because they are capable of being proved false. These comments were not presented as opinions nor accompanied by any cautionary language. Even if we were to conclude that these statements were an expression of opinion, they appear to be based on undisclosed defamatory facts, namely the unreported private communications between Cole and his new client, Atwater. "Defamation can occur by innuendo as well as by explicit assertion." As previously noted, the terms imply misconduct. Because, within the context of the article, a reader could view Cole's comments as based on undisclosed defamatory facts, they are not protected under the First Amendment. [Emphasis added.]

In short, dismissal * * * was premature. * * * We reverse the judgment and remand the case to the [trial court] for further proceedings consistent with this [court's opinion].

QUESTIONS

1. Orlando sued Cole for slander. Why didn't he sue for libel, given that the comments were reported in various news publications?
2. What did the court mean when it stated that "under the First Amendment there is no such thing as a false idea"?

THE PUBLICATION REQUIREMENT The basis of the tort of defamation is the publication of a statement or statements that hold an individual up to contempt, ridicule, or hatred. Publication here means that the defamatory statements are communicated (either intentionally or accidentally) to persons other than the defamed party. If Rodriques writes Andrews a private letter falsely accusing him of embezzling funds, the action does not constitute libel. If Peters falsely states that Gordon is dishonest and incompetent when no one else is around, the action does not constitute slander. In neither case was the message communicated to a third party.

The courts usually have held that even dictating a letter to a secretary constitutes publication, although the publication may be privileged (a concept that will be explained shortly). Moreover, if a third party merely overhears defamatory statements by chance, the courts usually hold that this also constitutes publication. Defamatory statements made via the Internet are actionable as well. Note also that any individual who repeats or republishes defamatory statements normally is liable even if that person reveals the source of the statements.

DAMAGES FOR LIBEL Once a defendant's liability for libel is established, general damages are presumed as a matter of law. General damages are designed to compensate the plaintiff for nonspecific harms such as disgrace or dishonor in the eyes of the community, humiliation, injured reputation, and emotional distress—harms that are difficult to measure. In other words, to recover damages in a libel case, the plaintiff need not prove that he or she was actually injured in any way as a result of the libelous statement.

DAMAGES FOR SLANDER In contrast to cases alleging libel, in a case alleging slander, the plaintiff must prove special damages to establish the defendant's liability. The plaintiff must show that the slanderous statement caused her or him to suffer actual economic or monetary losses. Unless this initial hurdle of proving special damages is overcome, a plaintiff alleging slander normally cannot go forward with the suit and recover any damages. This requirement is imposed in slander cases because oral statements have a temporary quality. In contrast, a libelous (written) statement has the quality of permanence, can be circulated widely, and usually results from some degree of deliberation on the part of the author.

Exceptions to the burden of proving special damages in cases alleging slander are made for certain types of slanderous statements. If a false statement constitutes "slander per se," no proof of special damages is required for it to be actionable. In most states, the following four types of utterances are considered to be slander per se:

1. A statement that another has a particular type of disease (historically, leprosy and sexually transmitted diseases, but now also including allegations of mental illness).
2. A statement that another has committed improprieties while engaging in a profession or trade.
3. A statement that another has committed or has been imprisoned for a serious crime.
4. A statement that a person (usually only an unmarried person and sometimes only a woman) is unchaste or has engaged in serious sexual misconduct.

DEFENSES TO DEFAMATION Truth normally is an absolute defense against a defamation charge. In other words, if a defendant in a defamation case can prove that the allegedly defamatory statements of fact were true, normally no tort has been committed. Other defenses to defamation may exist if the speech is privileged or concerns a public figure. Note that the majority of defamation actions are filed in state courts, and state laws differ somewhat in the defenses they allow, such as privilege (discussed next).

Privileged Speech. In some circumstances, a person will not be liable for defamatory statements because she or he enjoys a privilege, or immunity. With respect to defamation, privileged communications are of two types: absolute and qualified.⁸ Only in judicial proceedings and certain government proceedings is an absolute privilege granted. For example, statements made by attorneys and judges in the courtroom during a trial are absolutely privileged. So are statements made by government officials during legislative debate, even if the legislators make such statements maliciously—that is, knowing them to be untrue. An absolute privilege is granted in these situations because judicial and government personnel deal with matters that are so much in the public interest that the parties involved should be able to speak out fully and freely and without restriction.

In other situations, a person will not be liable for defamatory statements because he or she has a qualified, or conditional, privilege. An employer's statements in written evaluations of employees, for example, are protected by qualified privilege. Generally, if the statements are made in good faith and the publication is limited to those who have a legitimate interest in the communication, the statements fall within the area of qualified privilege. The concept of conditional privilege rests on the common law assumption that in some situations, the right to know or speak is equal in importance to the right not to be defamed. If a communication is conditionally privileged, a plaintiff can recover damages only by showing that the privilege was abused.

Public Figures. Public officials who exercise substantial governmental power and any persons in the public limelight are considered public figures. In general, public figures are considered "fair game," and false and defamatory statements about them

8. Note that the term privileged communication in this context is not the same as privileged communication between a professional, such as an attorney, and his or her client. The latter type of privilege will be discussed in Chapter 48, in the context of the liability of professionals.

that are published in the media will not constitute defamation unless the statements are made with actual malice. To be made with actual malice, a statement must be made with either knowledge of its falsity or a reckless disregard of the truth.⁹

Statements made about public figures, especially when they are communicated via a public medium, usually are related to matters of general public interest. Some public figures, such as politicians, are people who substantially affect all of us. Furthermore, public figures generally have some access to a public medium for answering disparaging falsehoods about themselves; private individuals do not. For these reasons, public figures have a greater burden of proof in defamation cases (they must prove actual malice) than do private individuals.

CASE IN POINT Lynne Spears, the mother of pop star Britney Spears, wrote a book in which she claimed that Sam Lutfi, Britney's former business manager, contributed to a mental breakdown that Britney experienced in 2008. Among other things, the book stated that Lutfi hid psychiatric drugs in Britney's food, disabled her cars and phones, and stole funds from her bank accounts. Lutfi filed a lawsuit for defamation and asserted that Lynne's statements were untrue, disparaging, and made with actual malice. A Los Angeles trial court found that Lutfi was a public figure and had alleged enough evidence in his complaint for the case to go forward to trial. Lynne has appealed that ruling. If the case goes to trial, a central issue will be whether Lynne believed in the truth of her statements or made them with reckless disregard for the truth.¹⁰

Invasion of Privacy

A person has a right to solitude and freedom from prying public eyes—in other words, to privacy. As mentioned in Chapter 4, the courts have held that certain amendments to the U.S. Constitution imply a right to privacy. Some state constitutions explicitly provide for privacy rights, as do a number of federal and state statutes. Tort law also safeguards these rights through the tort of invasion of privacy. Generally, to successfully sue for an invasion of privacy, a person must have a reasonable expectation of privacy, and the invasion must be highly offensive. Four acts can qualify as invasions of privacy:

1. Appropriation of identity. Under the common law, using a person's name, picture, or other likeness for commercial purposes without permission is a tortious invasion of privacy. Most states today have also enacted statutes prohibiting appropriation (discussed further in the next subsection).
2. Intrusion into an individual's affairs or seclusion. For example, invading someone's home or searching someone's personal computer without authorization is an invasion of privacy. This tort has been held to extend to eavesdropping by wiretap, unauthorized scanning of a bank account, compulsory blood testing, and window peeping. One court found that a man who had repeatedly followed a woman (the wife of his girlfriend's former husband), photographed her, and made obscene gestures at her had intruded into her privacy.¹¹
3. False light. The publication of information that places a person in a false light is another category of invasion of privacy. This could be a story attributing to someone ideas not held or actions not taken by that person. (The publication of such a story could involve the tort of defamation as well.)
4. Public disclosure of private facts. This type of invasion of privacy occurs when a person publicly discloses private facts about an individual that an ordinary person would find objectionable or embarrassing. A newspaper account of a private citizen's sex life or financial affairs could be an actionable invasion of privacy, even if the information revealed is true, because it is not of public concern.

Appropriation

The use of another person's name, likeness, or other identifying characteristic, without permission and for the benefit of the user, constitutes the tort of appropriation (sometimes referred to as the right of publicity). Under the law, normally an individual's right to privacy includes the right to the exclusive use of his or her identity.

CASE IN POINT In one early case, Vanna White, the hostess of the popular Wheel of Fortune game show, brought a case against Samsung Electronics America, Inc. Without White's permission, Samsung had included in an advertisement a robotic image dressed in a wig, gown, and jewelry, in a setting that resembled the Wheel of Fortune set, in a stance for which White is famous. The court ruled in White's favor, holding that the tort of appropriation does not require the use of a celebrity's name or actual likeness. The court stated that Samsung's robot ad left "little doubt" as to the identity of the celebrity that the ad was meant to depict.¹²

10. Lutfi v. Spears, No. BC 406904 (Sup.Ct.—Los Angeles, Dept. 23, July 7, 2009).

DEGREE OF LIKENESS Courts may differ as to the degree of likeness that is required to impose liability for the tort of appropriation. This is particularly true when the plaintiff is claiming appropriation based on a depiction in an animated film or video game.

CASE IN POINT Anthony "Tony" Twist, a former professional hockey player with a reputation for fighting, sued the publishers of the comic book Spawn, because it included an evil character named Anthony "Tony Twist" Twistelli. The Missouri Supreme Court held that the use of Tony Twist's name alone was sufficient proof of likeness to support a misappropriation claim.¹³ Ultimately, Twist was awarded $15 million in damages.¹⁴

CASE IN POINT The Naked Cowboy, Robert Burck, has been a street entertainer in New York City's Times Square for more than ten years. He performs for tourists wearing only a white cowboy hat, white cowboy boots, and white underwear and carrying a guitar strategically placed to give the illusion of nudity. Burck has become a well-known persona, appearing in television shows, movies, and video games, and has licensed his name and likeness to certain companies, including Chevrolet. When Mars, Inc., the maker of M&Ms candy, began using a video on billboards in Times Square that depicted a blue M&M dressed exactly like The Naked Cowboy, Burck sued for appropriation. The court held that Mars's creation of a cartoon character dressed in The Naked Cowboy's signature costume did not amount to appropriation by use of Burck's "portrait or picture."¹⁵

of appropriation has become known as the right of publicity.¹⁶ Rather than being aimed at protecting a person's right to be left alone (privacy), this right aims to protect an individual's pecuniary (financial) interest in the commercial exploitation of his or her identity. In other words, this right allows public figures, celebrities, and entertainers to sue anyone who uses their images for commercial benefit without their permission.

Cases involving the right of publicity generally turn on whether the use was commercial. For instance, if a television news program reports on a celebrity and shows an image of the person, the use likely would not be classified as commercial; in contrast, including the celebrity's image on a poster without his or her permission would be a commercial use.

Because the right of publicity is similar to a property right, most states have concluded that the right is inheritable and survives the death of the person who held the right. Normally, though, the person must provide for the passage of the right to another in her or his will.

Fraudulent Misrepresentation

A misrepresentation leads another to believe in a condition that is different from the condition that actually exists. This is often accomplished through a false or an incorrect statement. Although persons sometimes make misrepresentations accidentally because they are unaware of the existing facts, the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation, or fraud, involves intentional deceit for personal gain. The tort includes several elements:

1. A misrepresentation of material facts or conditions with knowledge that they are false or with reckless disregard for the truth.
2. An intent to induce another party to rely on the misrepresentation.
3. A justifiable reliance on the misrepresentation by the deceived party.
4. Damages suffered as a result of that reliance.
5. A causal connection between the misrepresentation and the injury suffered.

For fraud to occur, more than mere puffery, or seller's talk, must be involved. Fraud exists only when a person represents as a fact something he or she knows is untrue. For example, it is fraud to claim that the roof of a building does not leak when one knows that it does. Facts are objectively ascertainable, whereas seller's talk—such as “I am the best accountant in town”—is not, because the speaker is representing a subjective view.

13. Doe v. TCI Cablevision, 110 S.W.3d 363 (Mo. 2003).

14. The amount of damages was appealed and subsequently affirmed. See Doe v. McFarlane, 207 S.W.3d 52 (Mo.App. 2006).

15. Note that Burck was allowed to continue his lawsuit against Mars for violation of trademark law—see Chapter 8. Burck v. Mars, Inc., 571 F.Supp.2d 446 (S.D.N.Y. 2008). See also Kirby v. Sega of America, Inc., 144 Cal.App.4th 47, 50 Cal.Rptr.3d 607 (2006).

Normally, the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation occurs only when there is reliance on a statement of fact. Sometimes, however, reliance on a statement of opinion may involve the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation if the individual making the statement of opinion has superior knowledge of the subject matter. For example, when a lawyer makes a statement of opinion about the law in a state in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, a court would construe reliance on the statement to be equivalent to reliance on a statement of fact.

Abusive or Frivolous Litigation

Persons or businesses generally have a right to sue when they have been injured. In recent years, however, an increasing number of meritless lawsuits have been filed simply to harass the defendants. Defending oneself in any legal proceeding can be costly, time consuming, and emotionally draining. Tort law recognizes that people have a right not to be sued without a legally just and proper reason. It therefore protects individuals from the misuse of litigation. Torts related to abusive litigation include malicious prosecution and abuse of process.

If the party that initiated a lawsuit did so out of malice and without probable cause (a legitimate legal reason), and ended up losing that suit, the party can be sued for malicious prosecution. In some states, the plaintiff (who was the defendant in the first proceeding) must also prove injury other than the normal costs of litigation, such as lost profits.

Abuse of process can apply to any person using a legal process against another in an improper manner or to accomplish a purpose for which the process was not designed. The key difference between the torts of abuse of process and malicious prosecution is the level of proof. Abuse of process does not require the plaintiff to prove malice or show that the defendant (who was previously the plaintiff) lost in a prior legal proceeding.¹⁷ In addition, abuse of process is not limited to prior litigation. It can be based on the wrongful use of subpoenas, court orders to attach or seize real property, or other types of formal legal process.

SECTION 3 BUSINESS TORTS

Most torts can occur in any context, but a few torts, referred to as business torts, apply only to wrongful interferences with the business rights of others. Business torts generally fall into two categories—interference with a contractual relationship and interference with a business relationship.

Wrongful Interference with a Contractual Relationship

Three elements are necessary for wrongful interference with a contractual relationship to occur:

1. A valid, enforceable contract must exist between two parties.
2. A third party must know that this contract exists.
3. This third party must intentionally induce a party to the contract to breach the contract.

CASE IN POINT A landmark case in this area involved an opera singer, Joanna Wagner, who was under contract to sing for a man named Lumley for a specified period of years. A man named Gye, who knew of this contract, nonetheless “enticed” Wagner to refuse to carry out the agreement, and Wagner began to sing for Gye. Gye’s action constituted a tort because it interfered with the contractual relationship between Wagner and Lumley. (Of course, Wagner’s refusal to carry out the agreement also entitled Lumley to sue Wagner for breach of contract.)¹⁸

The body of tort law relating to wrongful interference with a contractual relationship has increased greatly in recent years. In principle, any lawful contract can be the basis for an action of this type. The contract could be between a firm and its employees or a firm and its customers. Sometimes, a competitor of a firm draws away one of the firm’s key employees. Only if the original employer can show that the competitor knew of the contract’s existence, and intentionally induced the breach, can damages be recovered from the competitor.

CASE IN POINT Office Machines, Inc., an office-supply company in Arkansas, filed a lawsuit against Bruce Mitchell and others for wrongful interference with a contractual relationship. Mitchell and the others were former employees of Office Machines

Intentional Torts against Persons

Name of Tort	Description
Assault and Battery	Any unexcused and intentional act that causes another person to be apprehensive of immediate harm is an assault. An assault resulting in physical contact is a battery.
False Imprisonment	An intentional confinement or restraint of another person's movement without justification.
Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress	An intentional act that amounts to extreme and outrageous conduct resulting in severe emotional distress to another.
Defamation (Libel or Slander)	A false statement of fact, not made under privilege, that is communicated to a third person and that causes damage to a person's reputation. For public figures, the plaintiff must also prove that the statement was made with actual malice.
Invasion of Privacy	Publishing or otherwise making known or using information relating to a person's private life and affairs, with which the public has no legitimate concern, without that person's permission or approval.
Appropriation	The use of another person's name, likeness, or other identifying characteristic without permission and for the benefit of the user.
Fraudulent Misrepresentation (Fraud)	A false representation made by one party, through misstatement of facts or through conduct, with the intention of deceiving another and on which the other reasonably relies to his or her detriment.
Abusive or Frivolous Litigation	The filing of a lawsuit without legitimate grounds and with malice. Alternatively, the use of a legal process in an improper manner.

who had been negotiating a deal to buy the business. When the deal fell through, the employees quit and started a competing office supply business, hiring several more of Office Machines' employees to work for their competing firm. The court held that hiring workers from a competitor's business did not constitute wrongful interference with a contractual relationship in this situation because the workers had not breached any employment contracts with their former employer.¹⁹

Wrongful Interference with a Business Relationship

Businesspersons devise countless schemes to attract customers. They are prohibited, however, from unreasonably interfering with another's business in their attempts to gain a greater share of the market.

There is a difference between competitive practices and predatory behavior—actions undertaken with the intention of unlawfully driving competitors completely out of the market. Attempting to attract customers in general is a legitimate business practice, whereas specifically targeting the customers of a competitor is more likely to be predatory. For example, the mall contains two athletic shoe stores: Joe's and Sprint. Joe's cannot station an employee at the entrance to Sprint to divert customers to Joe's by telling them that Joe's will beat Sprint's prices. Doing this would constitute the tort of wrongful interference with a business relationship because it would interfere with a prospective economic advantage; such behavior is commonly considered to be an unfair trade practice. If this type of activity were permitted, Joe's would reap the benefits of Sprint's advertising.

Although state laws vary on wrongful interference with a business relationship, generally a plaintiff must prove that the defendant used predatory methods to intentionally harm an established business relationship or prospective economic advantage. The plaintiff must also prove that the defendant's interference caused the plaintiff to suffer economic harm.

Defenses to Wrongful Interference

A person will not be liable for the tort of wrongful interference with a contractual or business relationship if it can be shown that the interference was justified, or permissible. Bona fide competitive behavior is a permissible interference even if it results in the breaking of a contract.

For example, if Jerrod's Meats advertises so effectively that it induces Sam's Restaurant to break its contract with Burke's Meat Company, Burke's Meat Company will be unable to recover against Jerrod's Meats on a wrongful interference theory. After all, the public policy that favors free competition through advertising outweighs any possible instability that such competitive activity might cause in contractual relations. Although luring customers away from a competitor through aggressive marketing and advertising strategies obviously interferes with the competitor's relationship with its customers, courts typically allow such activities in the spirit of competition.

INTENTIONAL TORTS AGAINST PROPERTY

Intentional torts against property include trespass to land, trespass to personal property, conversion, and disparagement of property. These torts are wrongful actions that interfere with individuals' legally recognized rights with regard to their land or personal property. The law distinguishes real property from personal property (see Chapters 49 and 50). Real property is land and things permanently attached to the land. Personal property consists of all other items, which are basically movable. Thus, a house and lot are real property, whereas the furniture inside a house is personal property. Cash and securities are also personal property.

Trespass to Land

The tort of trespass to land occurs any time a person, without permission, enters onto, above, or below the surface of land that is owned by another; causes anything to enter onto the land; or remains on the land or permits anything to remain on it. Actual harm to the land is not an essential element of this tort because the tort is designed to protect the right of an owner to exclusive possession. Common types of trespass to land include walking or driving on another's land; shooting a gun over another's land; throwing rocks at or spraying water on a building that belongs to someone else; building a dam across a river, thereby causing water to back up on someone else's land; and constructing one's building so that it extends onto an adjoining landowner's property.

TRESPASS CRITERIA, RIGHTS, AND DUTIES Before a person can be a trespasser, the real property owner (or other person in actual and exclusive possession of the property, such as a person who is leasing the property) must establish that person as a trespasser. For example, "posted" trespass signs expressly establish as a trespasser a person who ignores these signs and enters onto the property. Any person who enters onto another's property to commit an illegal act (such as a thief entering a lumberyard at night to steal lumber) is established impliedly as a trespasser, without posted signs.

At common law, a trespasser is liable for damages caused to the property and generally cannot hold the owner liable for injuries that the trespasser sustains on the premises. This common law rule is being abandoned in many jurisdictions, however, in favor of a reasonable duty of care rule that varies depending on the status of the parties. For example, a landowner may have a duty to post a notice that guard dogs patrol the property. Also, under the "attractive nuisance" doctrine, a landowner may be held liable for injuries sustained by young children on the landowner's property if the children were attracted to the premises by some object, such as a swimming pool or an abandoned building. Finally, an owner can remove a trespasser from the premises—or detain a trespasser on the premises for a reasonable time—through the use of reasonable force without being liable for assault, battery, or false imprisonment.

DEFENSES AGAINST TRESPASS TO LAND Trespass to land involves wrongful interference with another person's real property rights. If it can be shown that the trespass was warranted, however, as when a trespasser enters to assist someone in danger, a defense exists. Another defense exists when the trespasser can show that he or she had a license to come onto the land. A licensee is one who is invited (or allowed to enter) onto the property of another for the licensee's benefit. A person who enters another's property to read an electric meter, for example, is a licensee. When you purchase a ticket to attend a movie or sporting event, you are licensed to go onto the property of another to view that movie or event. Note that licenses to enter onto another's property are revocable by the property owner. If a property owner asks an electric meter reader to leave and she or he refuses to do so, the meter reader at that point becomes a trespasser.

Trespass to Personal Property

Whenever any individual wrongfully takes or harms the personal property of another or otherwise interferes with the lawful owner's possession and enjoyment of personal property, trespass to personal property occurs. This tort may also be called trespass to chattels or trespass to personality.²⁰ In this context, harm means not only destruction of the property, but also anything that diminishes its value, condition, or quality. Trespass to personal property involves intentional meddling with a possessory interest (one arising from possession), including barring an owner's access to personal property. If Kelly takes Ryan's business law book as a practical joke and hides it so that Ryan is unable to find it for several days before the final examination, Kelly has engaged in a trespass to personal property.

If it can be shown that trespass to personal property was warranted, then a complete defense exists. Most states, for example, allow automobile repair shops to hold a customer's car (under what is called an artisan's lien, discussed in Chapter 28) when the customer refuses to pay for repairs already completed.

Conversion

Whenever a person wrongfully possesses or uses the personal property of another without permission, the tort of conversion occurs. Any act that deprives an owner of personal property or of the use of that property without that owner's permission and without just cause can be conversion. Even the taking of electronic records and data may form the basis of a common law conversion claim.²¹

Often, when conversion occurs, a trespass to personal property also occurs because the original taking of the personal property from the owner was a trespass, and wrongfully retaining it is conversion. Conversion is the civil side of crimes related to theft, but it is not limited to theft. Even when the rightful owner consented to the initial taking of the property, so no theft or trespass occurred, a failure to return the property may still be conversion. For example, Chen borrows Mark's iPad to use while traveling home from school for the holidays. When Chen returns to school, Mark asks for his iPad back, but Chen says that he gave it to his little brother for Christmas. In this situation, Mark can sue Chen for conversion, and Chen will have to either return the iPad or pay damages equal to its value.

Note that conversion can occur even when a person mistakenly believed that she or he was entitled to the goods. In other words, good intentions are not a defense against conversion. Someone who buys stolen goods, for example, has committed the tort of conversion even if he or she did not know the goods were stolen. If the true owner brings a tort action against the buyer, the buyer must either return the property to the owner or pay the owner the full value of the property (despite having already paid the purchase price to the thief).

The following case involved a university's conversion of the fruits of a professor's work—property created and accumulated over several years. The question before the court was how to make a fair estimate of the property's value.

Trustees of University of District of Columbia v. Vossoughi

District of Columbia Court of Appeals, 963 A.2d 1162 (2009).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Jafar Vossoughi is an expert in applied mechanics and experimental biomechanics, which encompasses the testing of mechanical theories and the creation and use of experimental devices for biomechanical research. In the 1990s, while teaching at the University of the District of Columbia (UDC), Vossoughi set up a laboratory to conduct research. When his employment contract expired, he remained on campus and continued his research. In 2000, without Vossoughi's knowledge, UDC cleaned out the laboratory and threw away most of its contents. Vossoughi filed a suit in a District of Columbia court against UDC, seeking damages for the loss of his course materials, unpublished research data, unique scientific instruments, and other items. He personally testified as

GLICKMAN, Associate Judge:

* * *

The usual and traditional measure of damages for conversion of property is the fair market value of the property at the time of the conversion. * * * But fair market value is not always the test. Sometimes fair market value cannot be determined, or would be inadequate, as when, for example, the article destroyed was unique or possessed qualities the special nature of which could only be appreciated by the owner. Accordingly, for purposes of awarding adequate compensation for the destruction of property, value means exchange value or the value to the owner if this is greater than the exchange value. In general, therefore, a person tortiously deprived of property is entitled to damages based upon its special value to him if that is greater than its market value. Where the lost property in such cases is replaceable, it is appropriate to measure damages for its loss by the cost of replacement. [Emphasis added.]

* * * Dr. Vossoughi’s course materials, unpublished research and fabricated instruments * * * had great use value to Dr. Vossoughi but no comparable (if any) market value.

* * * Dr. Vossoughi based his estimates of the value of the property on the time it would take him to replicate it. This was a conceptually reasonable approach * * *. UDC complains of the vagueness of Dr. Vossoughi’s testimony: for example, his estimates were rough approximations, and he did not specify exactly how he valued his or others’ time * * *. But our cases have held that an owner is qualified to estimate the value of his property based on his familiarity with its quality and condition * * *. In this case, Dr. Vossoughi certainly had the requisite [necessary] familiarity, and given his experience as a fabricator of instruments, a teacher, a researcher, and a grant recipient, he also had considerable expertise to draw on. His opinions clearly were informed ones. There is nothing to show that his estimates were unrealistic; on the contrary, they were corroborated [substantiated] by [Vossoughi’s expert witnesses] Dr. Conway and Dr. Saha.

UDC further argues that Dr. Vossoughi’s valuation of his course materials was flawed in [two] respects. First, Dr. Vossoughi admitted his course materials were not salable (“Nobody would buy somebody else’s [teaching] notes. It’s useless [except] for that particular class.”). But * * * the absence of an exchange value does not mean the course materials had no compensable use value to Dr. Vossoughi. Second, Dr. Vossoughi acknowledged having been compensated by * * * UDC from his teaching salary to prepare the course materials and teach the courses. But this fact does not diminish the value of his course materials to Dr. Vossoughi; if anything, it confirms their value.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The District of Columbia Court of Appeals affirmed the award. Vossoughi’s evidence was “not speculative and unreliable.” His lost property was difficult to value, but the evidence allowed the jury to make a fair estimate of its worth.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Should plaintiffs be required to prove the amount of their damages with certainty and exactitude? Why or why not?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Did Vossoughi have an ethical duty to reduce the amount of his damages by, for example, retrieving from the trash as much of his property as he could? Discuss.

Disparagement of Property

Disparagement of property occurs when economically injurious falsehoods are made about another’s product or property rather than about another’s reputation (as in the tort of defamation). Disparagement of property is a general term for torts that can be more specifically referred to as slander of quality or slander of title.

SLANDER OF QUALITY The publication of false information about another’s product, alleging that it is not what its seller claims, constitutes the tort of slander of quality, or trade libel. To establish trade libel, the plaintiff must prove that the improper publication caused a third person to refrain from dealing with the plaintiff and that the plaintiff sustained economic damages (such as lost profits) as a result.

An improper publication may be both a slander of quality and a defamation of character. For example, a statement that disparages the quality of a product may also, by implication, disparage the character of a person who would sell such a product.

SLANDER OF TITLE When a publication falsely denies or casts doubt on another's legal ownership of property, resulting in financial loss to the property's owner, the tort of slander of title occurs. Usually, this is an intentional tort in which someone knowingly publishes an untrue statement about another's ownership of certain property with the intent of discouraging a third person from dealing with the person slandered. For example, it would be difficult for a car dealer to attract customers after competitors published a notice that the dealer's stock consisted of stolen automobiles.

See Concept Summary 6.2 for a review of intentional torts against property.

SECTION 5 CYBER TORTS

Torts can also be committed in the online environment. Torts committed via the Internet are often called cyber torts. Over the years, the courts have had to decide how to apply traditional tort law to torts committed in cyberspace. To date, most cyber torts have involved defamation, so this discussion will focus on how the traditional tort law concerning defamation is being adapted to apply to online defamation.

Identifying the Author of Online Defamation

An initial issue raised by online defamation was simply discovering who was committing it. In the real world, identifying the author of a defamatory remark generally is an easy matter, but suppose that a business firm has discovered that defamatory statements about its policies and products are being posted in an online forum. Such forums allow anyone—customers, employees, or crackpots—to complain about a firm that they dislike while remaining anonymous.

Therefore, a threshold barrier to anyone who seeks to bring an action for online defamation is discovering the identity of the person who posted the defamatory message. An Internet service provider (ISP)—a company that provides connections to the Internet—can disclose personal information about its customers only when ordered to do so by a court. Consequently, businesses and individuals are increasingly bringing lawsuits against “John Does” (John Doe, Jane Doe, and the like are fictitious names used in lawsuits when the identity of a party is not known or when a party wishes to conceal his or her name for privacy reasons). Then, using the authority of the courts, the plaintiffs can obtain from the ISPs the identity of the persons responsible for the defamatory messages.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 6.2 Intentional Torts against Property

Name of Tort	Description
Trespass to Land	The invasion of another's real property without consent or privilege. Once a person is expressly or impliedly established as a trespasser, the property owner has specific rights, which may include the right to detain or remove the trespasser.
Trespass to Personal Property	The intentional interference with an owner's right to use, possess, or enjoy his or her personal property without the owner's consent.
Conversion	The wrongful possession or use of another person's personal property without just cause.
Disparagement of Property	Any economically injurious falsehood that is made about another's product or property; an inclusive term for the torts of slander of quality and slander of title .

Liability of Internet Service Providers

Recall from the discussion of defamation earlier in this chapter that one who repeats or otherwise republishes a defamatory statement is subject to liability as if he or she had originally published it. Thus, newspapers, magazines, and television and radio stations may be subject to liability for defamatory content that they publish or broadcast, even though the content was prepared or created by others. Applying this rule to cyberspace, however, raises an important issue: Should ISPs be regarded as publishers and therefore be held liable for defamatory messages that are posted by their users in online forums or other arenas?

Before 1996, the courts grappled with this question. Then Congress passed the Communications Decency Act (CDA), which states that “[n]o provider or user of an interactive computer service shall be treated as the publisher or speaker of any information provided by another information content provider.”²² Thus, under the CDA, ISPs generally are treated differently from publishers in print and other media and are not liable for publishing defamatory statements that come from a third party.²³

Although the courts generally have construed the CDA as providing a broad shield to protect ISPs from liability for third-party content, some courts have started establishing some limits to CDA immunity. In the following case, the court considered the scope of immunity that could be accorded to an online roommate-matching service under the CDA.

Fair Housing Council of San Fernando Valley v. Roommate.com, LLC

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 521 F.3d 1157 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Roommate.com, LLC, operates an online roommate-matching Web site at www.roommates.com. (The company uses the singular Roommate for its name but the plural roommates for its Web site.) The site helps individuals find roommates based on their descriptions of themselves and their roommate preferences. The site has approximately 150,000 active listings and receives about a million user views per day. To become members of Roommate, users respond to a series of online questions, choosing from answers in drop-down and select-a-box menus. Users disclose information about themselves and their roommate preferences based on age, gender, and other characteristics, and on whether children will live in the household. Members can create personal profiles, search lists of compatible roommates, and send “roommail” messages to other members. Roommate also e-mails newsletters to members seeking housing, listing compatible members who have places to rent. The Fair Housing Councils of San Fernando Valley and San Diego, California, filed a suit in a federal district court against Roommate, claiming that the defendant had violated the Fair Housing Act (FHA). The court held that the Communications Decency Act (CDA) barred this claim and dismissed it. The councils appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

KOZINSKI, Chief Judge.

* * * *

Section 230 of the CDA immunizes providers of interactive computer services against liability arising from content created by third parties[.] * * * This grant of immunity applies only if the interactive computer service provider is not also an “information content provider,” which is defined as someone who is “responsible, in whole or in part, for the creation or development of” the offending content. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

In passing Section 230, Congress sought to [allow] interactive computer services * * * to perform some editing on user-generated content without thereby becoming liable for all defamatory or otherwise unlawful messages that they didn’t edit or delete. In other words, Congress sought to immunize the removal of user-generated content, not the creation of content: “Section CASE 6.3 CONTINUED ♦ [230] provides ‘Good Samaritan’ protections from civil liability for providers * * * of an interactive computer service for actions to restrict * * * access to objectionable material.”

* * * Councils allege that requiring subscribers to disclose their sex, family status and sexual orientation “indicates” an intent to discriminate against them, and thus runs afoul [of the FHA]. Roommate created the questions and choice of answers, and designed its website registration process around them. Therefore, Roommate is undoubtedly the “information content provider” as to the questions and can claim no immunity for posting them on its website, or for forcing subscribers to answer them as a condition of using its services.

* * * *

Councils also claim that requiring subscribers to answer the questions as a condition of using Roommate’s services unlawfully “cause[s]” subscribers to make a “statement * * * with respect to the sale or rental of a dwelling that indicates [a] preference, limitation, or discrimination,” in violation of [the Fair Housing Act]. The CDA does not grant immunity for inducing third parties to express illegal preferences. Roommate’s own acts—posting the questionnaire and requiring answers to it—are entirely its doing and thus Section 230 of the CDA does not apply to them. Roommate is entitled to no immunity.

Councils also charge that Roommate’s development and display of subscribers’ discriminatory preferences [are] unlawful. Roommate publishes a “profile page” for each subscriber on its website.

* * * *

Here, the part of the profile that is alleged to offend the Fair Housing Act * * * —the information about sex, family status and sexual orientation—is provided by subscribers in response to Roommate’s questions, which they cannot refuse to answer if they want to use defendant’s services. By requiring subscribers to provide the information as a condition of accessing its service, and by providing a limited set of [available] answers, Roommate becomes much more than a passive transmitter of information provided by others; it becomes the developer, at least in part, of that information. And Section 230 provides immunity only if the interactive computer service does not “creat[e] or develop” the information “in whole or in part.”

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit concluded that the CDA does not immunize Roommate for all of the content on its Web site and in its e-mail newsletters. The appellate court reversed the lower court’s summary judgment and remanded the case for a determination of whether Roommate’s nonimmune publication and distribution of information violate the FHA.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Do Internet service providers (ISPs) have an ethical duty to advise their users if the information that the users provide for distribution through the ISPs might violate the law? Explain.

THE E-COMMERCE DIMENSION • Should the courts continue to regard the CDA’s grant of immunity to ISPs as “quite robust”? Why or why not?

The Spread of Spam

Businesses and individuals alike are targets of spam. Spam refers to the unsolicited “junk e-mails” that flood virtual mailboxes with advertisements, solicitations, and other messages.²⁴ Considered relatively harmless in the early days of the Internet’s popularity, by 2010 spam accounted for roughly 75 percent of all e-mails.

24. The term spam is said to come from a Monty Python song with the lyrics, “Spam spam spam spam, spam spam spam spam, lovely spam, wonderful spam.” Like these lyrics, spam online is often considered to be a repetition of worthless text.

STATE REGULATION OF SPAM In an attempt to combat spam, thirty-six states have enacted laws that prohibit or regulate its use. Many state laws that regulate spam require the senders of e-mail ads to instruct the recipients on how they can “opt out” of further e-mail ads from the same sources. For instance, in some states an unsolicited e-mail ad must include a toll-free phone number or return e-mail address through which the recipient can contact the sender to request that no more ads be e-mailed. Responding to complaints from overwhelmed constituents, a number of jurisdictions have started to pass anti-spamming laws.

THE FEDERAL CAN-SPAM ACT In 2003, Congress enacted the Controlling the Assault of Non-Solicited Pornography and Marketing (CAN-SPAM) Act. The legislation applies to any “commercial electronic mail messages” that are sent to promote a commercial product or service. Significantly, the statute preempts state antispam laws except for those provisions in state laws that prohibit false and deceptive e-mailing practices.

Generally, the act permits the sending of unsolicited commercial e-mail but prohibits certain types of spamming activities, including the use of a false return address and the use of false, misleading, or deceptive information when sending e-mail. The statute also prohibits the use of “dictionary attacks”—sending messages to randomly generated e-mail addresses—and the “harvesting” of e-mail addresses from Web sites through the use of specialized software.

CASE IN POINT In 2007, federal officials arrested Robert Alan Soloway, who was known as the “Spam King” and considered one of the world’s most prolific spammers. Soloway had been using botnets (networks of software robots, or bots, that run automatically) to send out hundreds of millions of unwanted e-mails. He was charged under anti-identity theft laws for the appropriation of other people’s domain names, among other crimes. Soloway pleaded guilty to mail fraud, spam, and failure to pay taxes.²⁵

Arresting prolific spammers, however, has done little to curb spam, which continues to flow at a rate of 70 billion messages per day.

THE U.S. SAFE WEB ACT After the CAN-SPAM Act of 2003 prohibited false and deceptive e-mails originating in the United States, spamming from servers located in other nations increased. These cross-border spammers generally were able to escape detection and legal sanctions because the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) lacked the authority to investigate foreign spamming.

Congress sought to rectify the situation by enacting the U.S. Safe Web Act of 2006 (also known as the Undertaking Spam, Spyware, and Fraud Enforcement with Enforcers Beyond Borders Act). The act allows the FTC to cooperate and share information with foreign agencies in investigating and prosecuting those involved in spamming, spyware, and various Internet frauds and deceptions. It also provides ISPs with a “safe harbor” (immunity from liability) for supplying information to the FTC concerning possible unfair or deceptive conduct in foreign jurisdictions.

REVIEWING Intentional Torts and Privacy

Two sisters, Darla and Irene, are partners in an import business located in a small town in Rhode Island. Irene is married to a well-known real estate developer and is campaigning to be the mayor of their town. Darla is in her mid-thirties and has never been married. Both sisters travel to other countries to purchase the goods they sell at their retail store. Irene buys Indonesian goods, and Darla buys goods from Africa. After a tsunami destroys many of the cities in Indonesia to which Irene usually travels, she phones one of her contacts there and asks him to procure some items and ship them to her. He informs her that it will be impossible to buy these items now because the townspeople are being evacuated due to a water shortage. Irene is angry and tells the man that if he cannot purchase the goods, he should just take them without paying for them after the town has been evacuated. Darla overhears her sister’s instructions and is outraged. They have a falling-out, and Darla decides that she no longer wishes to be in business with her sister. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Suppose that Darla tells several of her friends about Irene’s instructing the man to take goods without paying for them after the tsunami disaster. If Irene files a tort action against Darla alleging slander, will her suit be successful? Why or why not?
2. Now suppose that Irene wins the election and becomes the city’s mayor. Darla then writes a letter to the editor of the local newspaper disclosing Irene’s misconduct. If Irene accuses Darla of committing libel, what defenses could Darla assert?

3. If Irene accepts goods shipped from Indonesia that were wrongfully obtained, has she committed an intentional tort against property? Explain.
4. Suppose now that Irene, who is angry with her sister for disclosing her business improprieties, writes a letter to the editor falsely accusing Darla of having sexual relations with her neighbor's thirteen-year-old son. For what intentional tort or torts could Darla sue Irene in this situation?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

6-1. Defamation Richard is an employee of the Dun Construction Corp. While delivering materials to a construction site, he carelessly backs Dun's truck into a passenger vehicle driven by Green. This is Richard's second accident in six months. When the company owner, Dun, learns of this latest accident, a heated discussion ensues, and Dun fires Richard. Dun is so angry that he immediately writes a letter to the union of which Richard is a member and to all other construction companies in the community, stating that Richard is the "worst driver in the city" and that "anyone who hires him is asking for legal liability." Richard files a suit against Dun, alleging libel on the basis of the statements made in the letters. Discuss the results.

6-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Wrongful Interference.

Lothar owns a bakery. He has been trying to obtain a long-term contract with the owner of Martha's Tea Salons for some time. Lothar starts a local advertising campaign on radio and television and in the newspaper. This advertising campaign is so persuasive that Martha decides to break the contract she has had with Harley's Bakery so that she can patronize Lothar's bakery. Is Lothar liable to Harley's Bakery for the tort of wrongful interference with a contractual relationship? Is Martha liable for this tort?

- For a sample answer to Question 6-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

6-3. Intentional Torts against Property Gerrit is a former employee of ABC Auto Repair Co. He enters ABC's repair shop, claiming that the company owes him $800 in back wages. Gerrit argues with ABC's general manager, Steward, and Steward orders him off the property. Gerrit refuses to leave, and Steward tells two mechanics to throw him off the property. Gerrit runs to his truck, but on the way, he grabs some tools valued at $800; then he drives away. Gerrit refuses to return the tools.

- (a) Discuss whether Gerrit has committed any torts.
- (b) If the mechanics had thrown Gerrit off the property, would ABC be guilty of assault and battery? Explain.

6-4. Trespass to Property America Online, Inc. (AOL), provides services to its customers or members, including the transmission of e-mail to and from other members and across the Internet. To become a member, a person must agree not to use AOL's computers to send bulk, unsolicited, commercial e-mail (spam). AOL uses filters to block spam, but bulk e-mailers sometimes use other software to thwart the filters. National Health Care Discount, Inc. (NHCD), sells discount optical and dental service plans. To generate leads for NHCD's products, sales representatives, who included AOL members, sent more than 300 million pieces of spam through AOL's computer system. Each item cost AOL an estimated $0.00078 in equipment expenses. Some of the spam used false headers and other methods to hide the source. After receiving more than 150,000 complaints from its members, AOL asked NHCD to stop. When the spam continued, AOL filed a suit in a federal district court against NHCD, alleging, in part, trespass to chattels—an unlawful interference with another's rights to possess personal property. AOL asked the court for a summary judgment on this claim. Did the spamming constitute trespass to chattels? Explain. [America Online, Inc. v. National Health Care Discount, Inc., 121 F.Supp.2d 1255 (N.D. Iowa 2000)]

6-5. Intentional Torts against Property Gary Kremen registered the domain name "sex.com" with Network Solutions, Inc., to the name of Kremen's business, Online Classifieds. Later, Stephen Cohen sent Network Solutions a letter that he claimed to have received from Online Classifieds. It stated that "we have no objections to your use of the domain name sex.com and this letter shall serve as our authorization to the Internet registrar to transfer sex.com to your corporation." Without contacting Kremen, Network Solutions transferred the name to Cohen, who subsequently turned sex.com into a lucrative business. Kremen filed a suit in a federal district court against Cohen and others, seeking the name and Cohen's profits. The court ordered Cohen to return the name to Kremen and pay $65 million in damages. Cohen ignored the order and disappeared. Against what other parties might Kremen attempt to obtain relief? Under which theory of intentional torts against property might Kremen be able to file an action? What is the likely result, and why? [Kremen v. Cohen, 337 F.3d 1024 (9th Cir. 2003)]

6-6. Invasion of Privacy During the spring and summer of 1999, Edward and Geneva Irvine received numerous "hang-up" phone calls, including three calls in the middle of the night. With the help of their local phone company, the Irvines learned that many of the calls were from the telemarketing department of the Akron Beacon Journal in Akron, Ohio. The Beacon's sales force was equipped with an automatic dialing machine. During business hours, the dialer was used to maximize productivity by calling multiple phone numbers at once and connecting a call to a sales representative only after it was answered. After business hours, the Beacon programmed its dialer to dial a list of disconnected numbers to determine whether they had been reconnected. If the dialer detected a ring, it recorded the information and dropped the call. If the automated dialing system crashed, which happened frequently, it redialed the entire list. The Irvines filed a suit in an Ohio state court against the Beacon and others, alleging, among other things, an invasion of privacy. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [Irvine v. Akron Beacon Journal, 147 Ohio App.3d 428, 770 N.E.2d 1105 (9 Dist. 2002)]

6-7. Defamation Lydia Hagberg went to her bank, California Federal Bank, FSB, to cash a check made out to her by Smith Barney (SB), an investment services firm. Nolene Showalter, a bank employee, suspected that the check was counterfeit. Showalter called SB and was told that the check was not valid. As she phoned the police, Gary Wood, a bank security officer, contacted SB again and was informed that its earlier statement was "erroneous" and that the check was valid. Meanwhile, a police officer arrived, drew Hagberg away from the teller's window, spread her legs, patted her down, and handcuffed her. The officer searched her purse, asked her whether she had any weapons and whether she was driving a stolen vehicle, and arrested her. Hagberg filed a suit in a California state court against the bank and others, alleging slander. Should the absolute privilege for communications made in judicial or other official proceedings apply to statements made when a citizen contacts the police to report suspected criminal activity? Why or why not? [Hagberg v. California Federal Bank, FSB, 32 Cal.4th 350, 7 Cal.Rptr.3d 803 (2004)]

6-8. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Emotional Distress.

Between 1996 and 1998, Donna Swanson received several anonymous, handwritten letters that, among other things, accused her husband Alan of infidelity. In 1998, John Grisham, Jr., the author of The Firm and many other best-selling novels, received an anonymous letter that appeared to have been written by the same person. Grisham and the Swansons suspected Katherine Almy, who soon filed a suit in a Virginia state court against them, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress. According to Almy, Grisham had said that he "really, really wanted to make [her] suffer for writing those letters," and the three devised a scheme to falsely accuse her. They gave David Liebman, a handwriting analyst, samples of Almy's handwriting. These included copies of confidential documents from her children's files at St. Anne's-Belfield School in Charlottesville, Virginia, where Alan Swanson taught and Grisham served on the board of directors. In Almy's view, Grisham influenced Liebman to report that Almy might have written the letters and misrepresented this report as conclusive, which led the police to confront Almy. She claimed that she then suffered severe emotional distress and depression, causing "a complete disintegration of virtually every aspect of her life" and requiring her "to undergo extensive therapy." In response, the defendants asked the court to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim. Should the court grant this request? Explain. [Almy v. Grisham, 273 Va. 68, 639 S.E.2d 182 (2007)]

6–9. Libel and Invasion of Privacy The Northwest Herald, a newspaper in Illinois, regularly received e-mail reports from area police departments about criminal arrests. The paper published the information, which is proper because the reports are public records. One day, the Herald received an e-mail stating that Carolene Eubanks had been charged with theft and obstruction of justice. The paper put that information into an issue that was to be published four days later. Several hours after the original e-mail had been received, the police issued another e-mail, explaining that Eubanks had not been charged with anything; the correct name was Barbara Bradshaw. Due to a long weekend, no one at the Herald noticed the e-mail until after the paper had been published. The following day, five days after the e-mails had been received, the paper published a correction. Eubanks sued the Herald for libel and for invasion of privacy. Does Eubanks have a good case for either tort? Why or why not? [Eubanks v. Northwest Herald Newspapers, 922 N.E.2d 1196 (App.Ct.Ill. 2010)]

6–10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Wrongful Interference with a Contractual Relationship.

White Plains Coat & Apron Co. is a New York–based linen rental business. Cintas Corp. is a nationwide business that rents similar products.

White Plains had five-year exclusive contracts with some of its customers. As a result of Cintas’s soliciting of business, dozens of White Plains’ customers breached their contracts and entered into rental agreements with Cintas. White Plains demanded that Cintas stop its solicitation of White Plains’ customers. Cintas refused. White Plains filed a suit in a federal district court against Cintas, alleging wrongful interference with existing contracts. Cintas argued that it had no knowledge of any contracts with White Plains and had not induced any breach. The court dismissed the suit, ruling that Cintas had a legitimate interest as a competitor to solicit business and make a profit. White Plains appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. [White Plains Coat & Apron Co. v. Cintas Corp., 8 N.Y.3d 422, 867 N.E.2d 381 (2007)]

- What are the two important policy interests at odds in wrongful interference cases? Which of these interests should be accorded priority?
- The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit asked the New York Court of Appeals to answer a question: Is a general interest in soliciting business for profit a sufficient defense to a claim of wrongful interference with a contractual relationship? What do you think? Why?

Negligence and Strict Liability

The intentional torts discussed in Chapter 6 all involve acts that the tortfeasor (the one committing the tort) intended to commit. In this chapter, we examine the tort of negligence, which involves acts that depart from a reasonable standard of care and therefore create an unreasonable risk of harm to others.

Negligence suits are probably the most prevalent type of lawsuits brought against businesses today. It is therefore essential that businesspersons understand their potential liability for negligent acts. In the concluding pages of this chapter, we also look at another basis for liability in tort—strict liability. Under this tort doctrine, liability depends not on the actor's negligence or intent to harm but on the breach of an absolute duty to make something safe.

SECTION 1 NEGLIGENCE

The tort of negligence occurs when someone suffers injury because of another's failure to live up to a required duty of care. In contrast to intentional torts, in torts involving negligence, the tortfeasor neither wishes to bring about the consequences of the act nor believes that they will occur. The actor's conduct merely creates a risk of such consequences. If no risk is created, there is no negligence. Moreover, the risk must be foreseeable; that is, it must be such that a reasonable person engaging in the same activity would anticipate the risk and guard against it. In determining what is reasonable conduct, courts consider the nature of the possible harm. Creating a very slight risk of a dangerous explosion might be unreasonable, whereas creating a distinct possibility of someone's burning his or her fingers on a stove might be reasonable.

Many of the actions discussed in the chapter on intentional torts constitute negligence if the element of intent is missing (or cannot be proved). Suppose that Juarez walks up to Maya and intentionally shoves her. Maya falls and breaks her arm as a result. In this situation, Juarez committed an intentional tort (battery). If Juarez carelessly bumps into Maya, however, and she falls and breaks her arm as a result, Juarez's action constitutes negligence. In either situation, Juarez has committed a tort.

To succeed in a negligence action, the plaintiff must prove each of the following:

1. Duty. That the defendant owed a duty of care to the plaintiff.
2. Breach. That the defendant breached that duty.
3. Causation. That the defendant's breach caused the plaintiff's injury.
4. Damages. That the plaintiff suffered a legally recognizable injury.

We discuss each of these four elements of negligence on the following pages.

The Duty of Care and Its Breach

Central to the tort of negligence is the concept of a duty of care. This concept arises from the notion that if we are to live in society with other people, some actions can be tolerated and some cannot, and some actions are reasonable and some are not. The basic principle underlying the duty of care is that people are free to act as they please so long as their actions do not infringe on the interests of others.

When someone fails to comply with the duty to exercise reasonable care, a potentially tortious act may have been committed. Failure to live up to a standard of care may be an act (accidentally setting fire to a building) or an omission (neglecting to put out a campfire). It may be a careless act or a carefully performed but nevertheless dangerous act that results in injury. Courts consider the nature of the act (whether it is outrageous or commonplace), the manner in which the act is performed (heedlessly versus cautiously), and the nature of the injury (whether it is serious or slight) in determining whether the duty of care has been breached.

CASE IN POINT Stella Liebeck, an eighty-year-old woman, purchased a cup of coffee at a McDonald's drive-through window. As she removed the lid, Liebeck held the cup between her legs and accidentally spilled the coffee on herself, causing third degree burns. She was hospitalized for eight days and underwent skin grafts but suffered permanent scars. At trial, evidence showed that McDonald's required its restaurants to serve their coffee at 180 to 190 degrees Fahrenheit—10 to 30 degrees hotter than competitors' restaurants. At that temperature, the coffee would cause third-degree burns in two to seven seconds. Based on this evidence, a jury found that McDonald's had breached its duty of care and awarded Liebeck a famously large amount of compensatory and punitive damages.¹ As a result of this case, restaurants have reduced the temperature at which they serve coffee to their customers.

THE REASONABLE PERSON STANDARD Tort law measures duty by the reasonable person standard. In determining whether a duty of care has been breached, for example, the courts ask how a reasonable person would have acted in the same circumstances. The reasonable person standard is said to be (though in an absolute sense it cannot be) objective. It is not necessarily how a particular person would act. It is society's judgment of how an ordinarily prudent person should act. If the so-called reasonable person existed, he or she would be careful, conscientious, even tempered, and honest. That individuals are required to exercise a reasonable standard of care in their activities is a pervasive concept in business law, and many of the issues dealt with in subsequent chapters of this text have to do with this duty.

In negligence cases, the degree of care to be exercised varies, depending on the defendant's occupation or profession, her or his relationship with the plaintiff, and other factors. Generally, whether an action constitutes a breach of the duty of care is determined on a case-by-case basis. The outcome depends on how the judge (or jury, if it is a jury trial) decides a reasonable person in the position of the defendant would have acted in the particular circumstances of the case. In the following subsections, we examine the degree of care typically expected of landowners and professionals.

THE DUTY OF LANDOWNERS Landowners are expected to exercise reasonable care to protect individuals coming onto their property from harm. In some jurisdictions, landowners may even have a duty to protect trespassers against certain risks. Landowners who rent or lease premises to tenants are expected to exercise reasonable care to ensure that the tenants and their guests are not harmed in common areas, such as stairways, entryways, and laundry rooms (see Chapter 50).

Landowners who rent or lease premises to tenants also have a duty to supply correct information to tenants. If they breach this duty, landowners can be held liable for negligent misrepresentation. Unlike intentional misrepresentation, or fraud, negligent misrepresentation requires only that the person making the statement or omission did not have a reasonable basis for believing its truthfulness.

In the following case, a commercial tenant claimed that the landlord made negligent misrepresentations about the size of a leased space.

1. Liebeck v. McDonald's Restaurants, No. D-202-CV 9302419, 1995 WL 360309 (N.M. Dist.Ct. 1994). The jury awarded $200,000 in compensatory damages and $2.7 million in punitive damages, which the court reduced to $480,000 ($680,000 total). The parties appealed, but then entered into an out-of-court settlement for an undisclosed amount less than $600,000. See also Boyle v. Christensen, 219 P.3d 58 (Utah App. 2009).

Court of Appeal of California, Second District, 159 Cal.App.4th 784, 71 Cal.Rptr.3d 885 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Kelly McClain operates a business known as “A+ Teaching Supplies.” Ted and Wanda Charanian are the principals of Octagon Plaza, LLC, which owns and manages CASE 7.1 CONTINUED ♦ a shopping center in Valencia, California. On February 28, 2003, McClain agreed to lease commercial space in the shopping center. The lease described the size of the unit leased by McClain as “approximately 2,624 square feet,” and attached to the lease was a diagram of the shopping center that represented the size of the unit as 2,624 square feet. Because the base rent in the shopping center was $1.45 per square foot per month, McClain’s total base rent was $3,804 per month. Moreover, because the unit presumably occupied 23 percent of the shopping center, McClain was responsible for this share of the common expenses. McClain filed a suit, claiming that the Charanians knew that the representations were materially inaccurate. As a result of Octagon’s misrepresentations, McClain was induced to enter into a lease that obliged her to pay excess rent. At trial, the Charanians prevailed. McClain appealed.

CASE CONTINUES ▶

MANELLA, J. [Judge]

* * * *

McClain contends that the [first amended claim at trial] adequately alleges a claim for fraud in the inducement, that is, misrepresentation involving a contract in which “the promisor knows what he or she is signing but consent is induced by fraud.” We agree. Generally, “[t]he elements of fraud, which give rise to the tort action for deceit, are (a) misrepresentation (false representation, concealment, or nondisclosure); (b) knowledge of falsity (or ‘scienter’); (c) intent to defraud, i.e., to induce reliance; (d) justifiable reliance; and (e) resulting damage.” Claims for negligent misrepresentation deviate from this set of elements. “The tort of negligent misrepresentation does not require scienter or intent to defraud. It encompasses ‘the assertion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who has no reasonable ground for believing it to be true’, and ‘the positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true.’” [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

It is well established that the kind of disclaimer in Paragraph 2.4 [of the commercial lease], which asserts that McClain had an adequate opportunity to examine the leased unit, does not insulate Octagon from liability for fraud or prevent McClain from demonstrating justified reliance on the Charanians’ representations.

* * * *

Here, McClain alleges that the Charanians exaggerated the size of her unit by 186 square feet, or 7.6 percent of its actual size, and increased her share of the common expenses by 4 percent through a calculation that understated the size of the shopping center by 965 square feet, or 8.1 percent of its actual size. [These discrepancies] operated to increase the rental payments incurred by McClain’s retail business by more than $90,000 over the term of the lease.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court reversed the trial court’s judgment with respect to McClain’s claim for misrepresentation.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • At what point do the misrepresentations about the size of the leased space become unethical—at 1 percent, 2 percent, or more?

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • What defense could the shopping center owners raise to counter McClain’s claim?

The Duty to Warn Business Invitees of Risks.

Retailers and other firms that explicitly or implicitly invite persons to come onto their premises are usually charged with a duty to exercise reasonable care to protect these business invitees. For example, if you entered a supermarket, slipped on a wet floor, and sustained injuries as a result, the owner of the supermarket would be liable for damages if, when you slipped, there was no sign warning that the floor was wet. A court would hold that the business owner was negligent because the owner failed to exercise a reasonable degree of care in protecting the store’s customers against foreseeable risks about which the owner knew or should have known. That a patron might slip on the wet floor and be injured as a result was a foreseeable risk, and the owner should have taken care to avoid this risk or warn the customer of it (by posting a sign or setting out orange cones, for example).

The landowner also has a duty to discover and remove any hidden dangers that might injure a customer or other invitee. Store owners have a duty to protect customers from slipping and injuring themselves on merchandise that has fallen off the shelves, for example. Thus, the owners of business premises should evaluate and frequently reassess potential hazards on the property to ensure the safety of business invitees.

Obvious Risks Provide an Exception. Some risks, of course, are so obvious that an owner need not warn of them. For example, a business owner does not need to warn customers to open a door before attempting to walk through it. Other risks, however, even though they may seem obvious to a business owner, may not be so in the eyes of another, such as a child. In addition, even if a risk is obvious, that does not necessarily excuse a business owner from the duty to protect its customers from foreseeable harm.

CASE IN POINT Giorgio's Grill in Hollywood, Florida, is a restaurant that becomes a nightclub after certain hours. At those times, as the manager of Giorgio's knew, the staff and customers traditionally threw paper napkins into the air as the music played. The napkins landed on the floor, but no one picked them up. One night, Jane Izquierdo went to Giorgio's. She had been to the club on prior occasions and knew about the napkin-throwing tradition. Not long after arriving, Izquierdo slipped and fell, breaking her leg. She required surgery and three months of recovery in a wheelchair. She sued Giorgio's for negligence, but lost at trial because a jury found that the risk of slipping on the napkins was obvious. A state appellate court reversed the lower court's decision, however. The court held that the obviousness of a risk does not discharge a business owner's duty to maintain the premises in a safe condition (although it does discharge the duty to warn).²

THE DUTY OF PROFESSIONALS If an individual has knowledge or skill superior to that of an ordinary person, the individual's conduct must be consistent with that status. Professionals—including physicians, dentists, architects, engineers, accountants, and lawyers, among others—are required to have a standard minimum level of special knowledge and ability. Therefore, in determining what constitutes reasonable care in the case of professionals, the law takes their training and expertise into account. Thus, an accountant's conduct is judged not by the reasonable person standard, but by the reasonable accountant standard.

If a professional violates his or her duty of care toward a client, the client may bring a suit against the professional, alleging malpractice, which is essentially professional negligence. For example, a patient might sue a physician for medical malpractice. A client might sue an attorney for legal malpractice. The liability of professionals will be examined in further detail in Chapter 48.

NO DUTY TO RESCUE Although the law requires individuals to act reasonably and responsibly in their relations with one another, a person will not be considered negligent for failing to come to the aid of a stranger in peril. For example, assume that you are walking down a city street and see a pedestrian about to step directly in front of an oncoming bus. You realize that the person has not seen the bus and is unaware of the danger. Do you have a legal duty to warn that individual? No. Although most people would probably concede that, in this situation, the observer has an ethical duty to warn, tort law does not impose a general duty to rescue others in peril.

People involved in special relationships, however, have been held to have a duty to rescue other parties within the relationship. A person has a duty to rescue his or her child or spouse if either is in danger, for example. Other special relationships, such as those between teachers and students or hiking and hunting partners, may also give rise to a duty to rescue. In addition, if a person who has no duty to rescue undertakes to rescue another, then the rescuer is charged with a duty to follow through with due care in the rescue attempt. Most states also have laws that require motorists involved in an automobile accident to stop and render aid. Failure to do so is both a tort and a crime.

Causation

Another element necessary to a negligence action is causation. If a person breaches a duty of care and someone suffers injury, the person's act must have caused the harm for it to constitute the tort of negligence.

In deciding whether the requirement of causation is met, the court must address two questions:

1. Is there causation in fact? Did the injury occur because of the defendant's act, or would it have occurred anyway? If the injury would not have occurred without the defendant's act, then there is causation in fact. Causation in fact usually can be determined by use of the but for test: "but for" the wrongful act, the injury would not have occurred. This test determines whether there was an actual cause-and-effect relationship between the act and the injury suffered. In theory, causation in fact is limitless. One could claim, for example, that “but for” the creation of the world, a particular injury would not have occurred. Thus, as a practical matter, the law has to establish limits, and it does so through the concept of proximate cause.

2. Was the act the proximate, or legal, cause of the injury?

Proximate cause, or legal cause, exists when the connection between an act and an injury is strong enough to justify imposing liability. Proximate cause asks whether the injuries sustained were foreseeable or too remotely connected to the incident to trigger liability. Judges use proximate cause to limit the scope of the defendant’s liability to a subset of the total number of potential plaintiffs that might have been harmed by the defendant’s actions. Consider an example. Ackerman carelessly leaves a campfire burning. The fire not only burns down the forest but also sets off an explosion in a nearby chemical plant that spills chemicals into a river, killing all the fish for a hundred miles downstream and ruining the economy of a tourist resort. Should Ackerman be liable to the resort owners? To the tourists whose vacations were ruined? These are questions of proximate cause that a court must decide.

Both of these causation questions must be answered in the affirmative for liability in tort to arise. If a defendant’s action constitutes causation in fact but a court decides that the action is not the proximate cause of the plaintiff’s injury, the causation requirement has not been met—and the defendant normally will not be liable to the plaintiff.

Questions of proximate cause are linked to the concept of foreseeability because it would be unfair to impose liability on a defendant unless the defendant’s actions created a foreseeable risk of injury. Probably the most cited case on the concept of foreseeability and proximate cause is the Palsgraf case, which is presented next.

Palsgraf v. Long Island Railroad Co.

Court of Appeals of New York, 248 N.Y. 339, 162 N.E. 99 (1928).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • The plaintiff, Helen Palsgraf, was waiting for a train on a station platform. A man carrying a package was rushing to catch a train that was moving away from a platform across the tracks from Palsgraf. As the man attempted to jump aboard the moving train, he seemed unsteady and about to fall. A railroad guard on the car reached forward to grab him, and another guard on the platform pushed him from behind to help him board the train. In the process, the man’s package, which (unknown to the railroad guards) contained fireworks, fell on the railroad tracks and exploded. There was nothing about the package to indicate its contents. The repercussions of the explosion caused scales at the other end of the train platform to fall on Palsgraf, causing injuries for which she sued the railroad company. At the trial, the jury found that the railroad guards had been negligent in their conduct. The railroad company appealed. The appellate court affirmed the trial court’s judgment, and the railroad company appealed to New York’s highest state court.

CARDOZO, C.J. [Chief Justice]

* * * *

The conduct of the defendant’s guard, if a wrong in its relation to the holder of the package, was not a wrong in its relation to the plaintiff, standing far away. Relatively to her it was not negligence at all.

* * * *

* * * What the plaintiff must show is “a wrong” to herself; i.e., a violation of her own right, and not merely a wrong to someone else[.] * * * The risk reasonably to be perceived defines the duty to be obeyed[.] * * * Here, by concession, there was nothing in the situation to suggest to the most cautious mind that the parcel wrapped in newspaper would spread wreckage through the station. If the guard had thrown it down knowingly and willfully, he would not have threatened the plaintiff’s safety, so far as appearances could warn him. His conduct would not have

CASE 7.2 CONTINUED ♦ involved, even then, an unreasonable probability of invasion of her bodily security. Liability can be no greater where the act is inadvertent. [Emphasis added.]

* * * One who seeks redress at law does not make out a cause of action by showing without more that there has been damage to his person. If the harm was not willful, he must show that the act as to him had possibilities of danger so many and apparent as to entitle him to be protected against the doing of it though the harm was unintended. * * * The victim does not sue * * * to vindicate an interest invaded in the person of another. * * * He sues for breach of a duty owing to himself.

* * * [To rule otherwise] would entail liability for any and all consequences, however novel or extraordinary.

DECISION AND REMEDY • Palsgraf's complaint was dismissed. The railroad had not been negligent toward her because injury to her was not foreseeable. Had the owner of the fireworks been harmed, and had he filed suit, there could well have been a different result.

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY'S LAW • The Palsgraf case established foreseeability as the test for proximate cause. Today, the courts continue to apply this test in determining proximate cause—and thus tort liability for injuries. Generally, if the victim or the consequences of a harm done were unforeseeable, there is no proximate cause. Note, though, that in the online environment, distinctions based on physical proximity, such as that used by the court in this case, are largely inapplicable.

INTERNATIONAL DIMENSION Differing Standards of Proximate Cause • The concept of proximate cause is common among nations around the globe, but its application differs from country to country. French law uses the phrase “adequate cause.” An event breaks the chain of adequate cause if the event is both unforeseeable and irresistible. England has a “nearest cause” rule that attributes liability based on which event was nearest in time and space. Mexico bases proximate cause on the foreseeability of the harm but does not require that an event be reasonably foreseeable.

THE GLOBAL DIMENSION • What would be the advantages and disadvantages of a universal principle of proximate cause applied everywhere by all courts in all relevant cases? Discuss.

The Injury Requirement and Damages

For a tort to have been committed, the plaintiff must have suffered a legally recognizable injury. To recover damages (receive compensation), the plaintiff must have suffered some loss, harm, wrong, or invasion of a protected interest. Essentially, the purpose of tort law is to compensate for legally recognized harms and injuries resulting from wrongful acts. If no harm or injury results from a given negligent action, there is nothing to compensate—and no tort exists.

For example, if you carelessly bump into a passerby, who stumbles and falls as a result, you may be liable in tort if the passerby is injured in the fall. If the person is unharmed, however, there normally can be no suit for damages because no injury was suffered.

Compensatory damages are the norm in negligence cases. Occasionally, though, a court will award punitive damages if the defendant's conduct was grossly negligent, meaning that the defendant intentionally failed to perform a duty with reckless disregard of the consequences to others.

SECTION 2 DEFENSES TO NEGLIGENCE

Defendants often defend against negligence claims by asserting that the plaintiffs have failed to prove the existence of one or more of the required elements for negligence. Additionally, there are three basic affirmative defenses in negligence cases (defenses that a defendant can use to avoid liability even if the facts are as the plaintiff states): assumption of risk, superseding cause, and contributory and comparative negligence.

Note that when a state has enacted a law that places a cap on the amount of noneconomic damages that can be awarded, this law can be similar to a defense because it limits the plaintiff's recovery. This chapter's Insight into Ethics feature on the next page discusses some effects of such limitations on damages.

Assumption of Risk

A plaintiff who voluntarily enters into a risky situation, knowing the risk involved, will not be

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

Some Consequences of Caps on Medical Malpractice Awards

As discussed in Chapter 6, as part of the effort to curb excessive tort litigation, many states have enacted limits on the amount of general noneconomic damages that can be awarded. (Noneconomic damages include damages for pain and suffering, emotional distress, inconvenience, physical impairment, disfigurement, and the like.) Some states also specifically limit damage awards in medical malpractice (professional negligence) cases.

Limitations on Damages

Although placing such caps on damage awards may seem a logical way to reduce the number of negligence cases filed, it raises issues of fairness. Why should a plaintiff who loses a limb, for example, not be able to obtain adequate monetary damages for the mental anguish associated with such an injury? The limits also encourage plaintiffs' attorneys to find ways to avoid these caps, such as by suing other defendants (including nurses and additional health-care professionals) to whom the caps do not apply.

More than half of the states now limit damage awards in medical malpractice cases. For example, California caps noneconomic damages in medical malpractice cases at $250,000—even if the plaintiff dies.^a States hope that these limitations will reduce the frequency and severity of malpractice claims and thereby reduce health-care expenditures, although there is no definitive scientific evidence showing that damages caps lower health-care costs.^b

Michigan Nurse Sued for Negligence

As an example of how ethical issues can result from placing caps on medical malpractice claims, consider what happened in one Michigan case. A fifty-two-year-old Michigan farmer developed a blood clot in his leg and underwent emergency surgery at a hospital to remove it. After the surgery, a health-care professional removed the epidural catheter (a tube that enables painkillers to pass into the space surrounding the spinal cord). Eleven minutes later, a nurse came in and gave him a blood thinner called Heparin. According to the standard of care for this procedure, Heparin should not be given until at least one hour after the epidural catheter has been removed to ensure that the catheter site has sufficient time to coagulate and stop bleeding.

In this situation, the Heparin was given too soon and was given continuously for the next twenty-four hours. As a result, the patient experienced bleeding into the epidural space under his skin, and pressure built up in his spinal column. The hospital physicians and nurses failed to recognize the problem, and he was left with a permanent spinal cord injury and paralysis. Because of Michigan's cap on malpractice awards,^c though, the negligent physician and the hospital responsible for his lifelong injuries were able to settle the claims against them for the legislatively mandated maximum of $717,000 for pain and suffering (and $1.1 million in economic damages).

c. Michigan Compiled Laws Section 600.1483.

allowed to recover. This is the defense of assumption of risk. The requirements of this defense are (1) knowledge of the risk and (2) voluntary assumption of the risk. This defense is frequently asserted when the plaintiff was injured during recreational activities that involve known risk, such as skiing and skydiving. Note that assumption of risk can apply not only to participants in sporting events, but also to spectators and bystanders who are injured while attending those events.

CASE IN POINT Delinda Taylor, who was a Seattle Mariners fan, took her sons to see a Mariners baseball game. They arrived early so that they could watch the players warm up and get their autographs. Taylor was standing by her seat near the foul line watching Mariners' pitcher Freddie Garcia throwing the ball with another player. When she looked away from the field, an errant ball got past Garcia and struck Taylor in the face, causing serious injuries. She filed a negligence lawsuit against the Mariners (Baseball Club of Seattle) to recover for her injuries. The Mariners asserted the defense of assumption of risk. The court ruled that Taylor was familiar with baseball and that she knew about and had voluntarily assumed the risk of getting hit by a thrown baseball.³

ASSUMPTION OF RISK CAN BE EXPRESS OR IMPLIED The risk can be assumed by express agreement, or the assumption of risk can be implied by the plaintiff's knowledge of the risk and subsequent conduct. For example, a driver, Bryan Stewart, knows that there is a risk of being killed or injured in a crash whenever he enters a race. Therefore, a court will deem that Stewart has assumed the risk of racing. Of course, a person does not assume a risk different from or greater than the risk normally carried by the activity. Thus, Stewart does not assume the risk that the banking in the curves of the racetrack will give way during the race because of a construction defect.

In the following case, the plaintiff was driving a beverage cart on a golf course during a golfing event. Does this mean that she was a "participant" in the sport and thus assumed the risk of being hit by a golf ball? That was the issue before the court.

Pfennig v. Lineman

Court of Appeals of Indiana, 922 N.E.2d 45 (2010).

DARDEN, Judge.

* * * *

* * * Whitey's [31 Club], a bar, sponsored a golf scramble at the Elks' golf course in Marion, [Indiana,] on August 19, 2006. * * * Jerry Jones * * * signed up to drive a beverage cart.

The morning of the scramble, Jones invited [his] then-sixteen-year-old [granddaughter, Cassie] Pfennig, to ride in a beverage cart with him during the tournament. With her mother's permission, Pfennig agreed to join Jones.

Upon arriving at the golf course, Jones retrieved a beverage cart for his and Pfennig's use * * *. The cart had a large cooler in the back for drinks but no roof or windshield. Pfennig received no instructions regarding how or where to operate the cart; she was unfamiliar with golf etiquette and had been to a golf course only once before in 1997.

Prior to the start of the scramble, Jones decided to join one of the teams playing in the scramble as it was short a player. He therefore left Pfennig with his sister, Lottie Kendall. Kendall and Pfennig drove the beverage cart together for a short period of time until Kendall also decided to play in a foursome. Christie Edwards, a Whitey's employee, therefore took Kendall's place in the beverage cart. Pfennig drove the cart, and Edwards dispensed the beverages to the scramble's participants.

Approximately three hours into the tournament, [Joseph] Lineman, a participant in the scramble, hit a drive from the sixteenth hole's tee. * * * Pfennig, who was driving the beverage cart on a cart path near the eighteenth hole, did not hear any warning regarding the ball's approach. After traveling more than two hundred feet, the ball struck Pfennig in the mouth, causing injuries to her mouth, jaw, and teeth.

On February 7, 2007, Pfennig filed a complaint against the Defendants [Lineman, Whitey's, the Elks Club, and others]. She alleged [that the defendants were negligent in failing to exercise reasonable care for her safety while on the golf course.]

* * * *

As a direct and proximate result of the Defendants' negligent conduct, [Pfennig] suffered painful and permanent injuries and incurred significant medical and dental expenses. Several of [her] teeth were destroyed and her teeth remain missing and/or disfigured.

As a direct and proximate result of the Defendants' negligent conduct, [Pfennig] suffered mental and emotional pain and anguish.

As a direct and proximate result of the Defendants' negligent conduct, [Pfennig]'s ability to function as a whole person has been impaired. The quality of [her] life has been significantly diminished as a result of the Defendants' negligent conduct.

judgment in favor of the Defendants. She argues that the Defendants owed her a duty to prevent her from being injured and were negligent in breaching that duty.

* * * *

This court had consistently held that “there is no duty from one participant in a sports activity to another to prevent injury resulting from an inherent risk of the sport.” [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Here, Pfenning maintains that she was not a participant in the golf scramble because “she was not playing; she was not watching the event; she was not signed up on a team; nor was she doing anything related to the activity of golf.” Thus, she argues that the Defendants owed her a duty to prevent her injury. We disagree.

Pfenning’s presence on the golf course was due to the fact there was a golf scramble; she had agreed to function as a driver or rider in a beverage cart provided for the golf scramble; and she performed this function and assisted in providing beverages to players in the golf scramble. If not for the golf scramble, Pfenning would not have been on the golf course the day of the incident. Although not a player herself, she clearly was “part of the sporting event * * * involved[.]”

Pfenning, however, also seems to argue that she could not have consented to the inherent risks of golf as “she knew nothing about golf and could not appreciate any risk involved with being near a golf course.” We find this argument unavailing [failing to achieve the desired result].

* * * *

Even if we were to assume that Pfenning arrived at the golf course utterly ignorant of the game, the undisputed facts show that Pfenning had been participating in the golf scramble event for approximately three hours prior to being struck by the golf ball. Over this extended time period, she had been delivering beverages to foursomes during play. We find that this supports an inference that Pfenning was aware of the inherent risks of golf; namely, that it involves players hitting golf balls long distances and that some, if not many, of these balls invariably fail to land where intended

Given Pfenning’s status as a participant in the golf scramble, with its inherent risks, we find that the Defendants did not owe her a duty.

* * * *

Finding no issues of material fact and that the Defendants are entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law, we conclude that the trial court properly granted summary judgment in favor of the Defendants.

Affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. Should the courts distinguish between different levels of participation in a sporting event when determining liability? Explain.
2. Suppose that Pfenning had been riding in the beverage cart with her grandfather when she was struck by the golf ball. In that situation, would the outcome of this case have been any different? Why or why not?

WHEN COURTS DO NOT APPLY ASSUMPTION OF RISK Courts do not apply the assumption of risk doctrine in emergency situations. Nor does it apply when a statute protects a class of people from harm and a member of the class is injured by the harm. For instance, because federal and state statutes protect employees from harmful working conditions, employees do not assume the risks associated with the workplace. An employee who is injured generally will be compensated regardless of fault under state workers’ compensation statutes (discussed in Chapter 34).

Superseding Cause

An unforeseeable intervening event may break the causal connection between a wrongful act and an injury to another. If so, the intervening event acts as a superseding cause—that is, it relieves a defendant of liability for injuries caused by the intervening event. For example, Derrick, while riding his bicycle, negligently hits Julie, who is walking on the sidewalk. As a result of the impact, Julie falls and fractures her hip. While she is waiting for help to arrive, a small aircraft crashes nearby and explodes, and some of the fiery debris hits her, causing her to sustain severe burns. Derrick will be liable for the damages related to Julie’s fractured hip, but normally he will not be liable for the injuries caused by the plane crash—because the risk of a plane crashing nearby and injuring Julie was not foreseeable.

Contributory and Comparative Negligence

All individuals are expected to exercise a reasonable degree of care in looking out for themselves.

In the past, under the common law doctrine of contributory negligence, a plaintiff who was also negligent (failed to exercise a reasonable degree of care) could not recover anything from the defendant. Under this rule, no matter how insignificant the plaintiff's negligence was relative to the defendant's negligence, the plaintiff would be precluded from recovering any damages. Today, only a few jurisdictions still hold to this doctrine.

In most states, the doctrine of contributory negligence has been replaced by a comparative negligence standard. The comparative negligence standard enables both the plaintiff's and the defendant's negligence to be computed and the liability for damages distributed accordingly. The plaintiff's financial recovery may be reduced, or even prohibited, depending on whether the state has a pure or modified comparative negligence system.

“PURE” COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE STATES Some jurisdictions, including California and New York, have adopted a “pure” form of comparative negligence that allows the plaintiff to recover damages even if her or his fault is greater than that of the defendant. Under a pure comparative negligence system, a judge or jury assigns a percentage of fault to each responsible party and then apportions the damages award accordingly.

In states with such systems, even if the plaintiff's percentage of fault is very large, he or she will still be entitled to collect a share of damages from the other responsible party or parties. For example, Jill sustains injuries when her car is struck by Carson's truck. She files a lawsuit. At trial, the jury determines that Jill was also negligent and that Carson was only 20 percent at fault for the accident that caused Jill's injuries. Because they live in a pure comparative negligence state, Jill is entitled to recover 20 percent of the damages she sustained from Carson.

MODIFIED COMPARATIVE FAULT STATES Most jurisdictions in the United States have adopted a modified comparative fault system under which plaintiffs who are largely responsible for their own injuries are not allowed to recover damages. There are two variations of modified comparative fault systems: those that follow a “50 percent rule” and those that follow a “51 percent rule.”

Under the 50 percent rule, the plaintiff in a negligence action recovers nothing if she or he was 50 percent or more at fault. Thus, an injured party can recover only if it is determined that his or her responsibility for the injury is 49 percent or less. If the injured party's level of fault reaches 50 percent, he or she cannot recover any damages.

Under the 51 percent rule, the plaintiff in a negligence action recovers nothing if she or he was responsible for more than half (51 percent or more) of the accident. Thus, if the plaintiff was 50 percent at fault in causing the injury, then she or he can still recover, but once the plaintiff's level of fault reaches 51 percent, recovery is barred.

SECTION 3 SPECIAL NEGLIGENCE DOCTRINES AND STATUTES

A number of special doctrines and statutes relating to negligence are also important. We examine a few of them here.

Res Ipsa Loquitur

Generally, in lawsuits involving negligence, the plaintiff has the burden of proving that the defendant was negligent. In certain situations, however, the courts may presume that negligence has occurred, in which case the burden of proof rests on the defendant—that is, the defendant must prove that he or she was not negligent. The presumption of the defendant's negligence is known as the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur,⁴ which translates as “the facts speak for themselves.” This doctrine is applied only when the event creating the damage or injury is one that ordinarily does not occur in the absence of negligence.

CASE IN POINT Mary Gubbins underwent abdominal surgery and, following the surgery, suffered nerve damage in her spine near the area of the operation. She was unable to walk or stand for months, and even though she regained some use of her legs through physical therapy, her mobility was impaired and she experienced pain. In her subsequent negligence lawsuit, Gubbins asserted res ipsa loquitur, because the injury never would have occurred in the absence of the surgeon's negligence.⁵

For the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to apply, the event must have been within the defendant's power to control, and it must not have been due to any voluntary action or contribution on the part of the plaintiff.

4. Pronounced rayz ihp-suh low-kwuh-tuhr.

5. See, for example, Gubbins v. Hurson, 885 A.2d 269 (D.C. 2005).

Negligence Per Se

Certain conduct, whether it consists of an action or a failure to act, may be treated as negligence per se (“in or of itself”). Negligence per se may occur if an individual violates a statute or an ordinance providing for a criminal penalty and that violation causes another to be injured. The statute must be designed to prevent the type of injury that the plaintiff suffered, and it must clearly set out what standard of conduct is expected, when and where it is expected, and of whom it is expected. The standard of conduct required by the statute is the duty that the defendant owes to the plaintiff, and a violation of the statute is the breach of that duty.

CASE IN POINT A Delaware statute states that anyone “who operates a motor vehicle and who fails to give full time and attention to the operation of the vehicle” is guilty of inattentive driving. Michael Moore was cited for inattentive driving after he collided with Debra Wright’s car when he backed a truck out of a parking space. Moore paid the ticket, which meant that he pleaded guilty to violating the statute. The day after the accident, Wright began having back pain, which eventually required surgery. She sued Moore for damages, alleging negligence per se. The Delaware Supreme Court ruled that the inattentive driving statute sets forth a sufficiently specific standard of conduct to warrant application of negligence per se.⁶

“Danger Invites Rescue” Doctrine

Sometimes, a person who is trying to avoid harm—such as an individual who swerves to avoid a head-on collision with a drunk driver—ends up causing harm to another (such as a cyclist riding in the bike lane) as a result. In those situations, the original wrongdoer (the drunk driver in this scenario) is liable to anyone who is injured, even if the injury actually resulted from another person’s attempt to escape harm. The “danger invites rescue” doctrine extends the same protection to a person who is trying to rescue another from harm—the original wrongdoer is liable for injuries to the individual attempting a rescue.

Under the “danger invites rescue” doctrine, a person who is injured while going to someone else’s rescue can sue the person who caused the dangerous situation. The idea is that the rescuer should not be held liable for any damages because he or she did not cause the danger and because danger invites rescue. For example, Ludlam drives down a street and fails to see a stop sign because he is trying to end a squabble between his two young children in the car’s backseat. Salter, on the curb near the stop sign, realizes that Ludlam is about to hit a pedestrian walking across the street at the intersection. Salter runs into the street to push the pedestrian out of the way, and Ludlam’s vehicle hits Salter instead. Ludlam will be liable for Salter’s injury as the rescuer, as well as for any injuries the other pedestrian (or any bystanders) may have sustained.

Special Negligence Statutes

A number of states have enacted statutes prescribing duties and responsibilities in certain circumstances. For example, most states now have what are called Good Samaritan statutes.⁷ Under these statutes, someone who is aided voluntarily by another cannot turn around and sue the “Good Samaritan” for negligence. These laws were passed largely to protect physicians and medical personnel who volunteer their services in emergency situations to those in need, such as individuals hurt in car accidents.⁸ Indeed, the California Supreme Court has interpreted that state’s Good Samaritan statute to mean that a person who renders nonmedical aid is not immune from liability.⁹ Thus, only medical personnel and persons rendering medical aid in emergencies are protected in California.

Many states have also passed dram shop acts,¹⁰ under which a tavern owner or bartender may be held liable for injuries caused by a person who became intoxicated while drinking at the bar or

7. These laws derive their name from the Good Samaritan story in the Bible. In the story, a traveler who had been robbed and beaten lay along the roadside, ignored by those passing by. Eventually, a man from the region of Samaria (the “Good Samaritan”) stopped to render assistance to the injured person.

8. See, for example, the discussions of various state statutes in Chamley v. Khokha, 730 N.W.2d 864 (N.D. 2007), and Mueller v. McMillian Warner Insurance Co., 2006 WI 54, 290 Wis.2d 571, 714 N.W.2d 183 (2006).

9. Van Horn v. Watson, 45 Cal.4th 322, 197 P.3d 164, 86 Cal. Rptr.3d 350 (2008).

10. Historically, a dram was a small unit of liquid, and distilled spirits (strong alcoholic liquor) were sold in drams. Thus, a dram shop was a place where liquor was sold in drams.

6. Wright v. Moore, 931 A.2d 405 (Del.Supr. 2007).

who was already intoxicated when served by the bartender. Some states' statutes also impose liability on social hosts (persons hosting parties) for injuries caused by guests who became intoxicated at the hosts' homes. Under these statutes, it is unnecessary to prove that the tavern owner, bartender, or social host was negligent. Thus, if Jane hosts a Super Bowl party at which Brett, a minor, sneaks alcoholic drinks, Jane is potentially liable for damages resulting from Brett's drunk driving after the party.

SECTION 4 STRICT LIABILITY

Another category of torts is called strict liability, or liability without fault. Intentional torts and torts of negligence involve acts that depart from a reasonable standard of care and cause injuries. Under the doctrine of strict liability, a person who engages in certain activities can be held responsible for any harm that results to others even if the person used the utmost care. Liability for injury is imposed for reasons other than fault.

Development of Strict Liability

The modern concept of strict liability traces its origins, in part, to the 1868 English case of Rylands v. Fletcher.¹¹ In the coal-mining area of Lancashire, England, the Rylands, who were mill owners, had constructed a reservoir on their land. Water from the reservoir broke through a filled-in shaft of an abandoned coal mine nearby and flooded the connecting passageways in an active coal mine owned by Fletcher. Fletcher sued the Rylands, and the court held that the defendants (the Rylands) were liable, even though the circumstances did not fit within existing tort liability theories. The court held that a “person who for his own purposes brings on his land and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes . . . is *prima facie*¹² answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape.”

British courts liberally applied the doctrine that emerged from the Rylands v. Fletcher case. Initially, few U.S. courts accepted this doctrine, presumably because the courts were worried about its effect on the expansion of American business. Today, however, the doctrine of strict liability is the norm rather than the exception.

Abnormally Dangerous Activities

Strict liability for damages proximately caused by an abnormally dangerous, or ultrahazardous, activity is one application of strict liability. Courts apply the doctrine of strict liability in these situations because of the extreme risk of the activity. Abnormally dangerous activities are those that involve a high risk of serious harm to persons or property that cannot be completely guarded against by the exercise of reasonable care—activities such as blasting or storing explosives. Even if blasting with dynamite is performed with all reasonable care, there is still a risk of injury. Balancing that risk against the potential for harm, it seems reasonable to ask the person engaged in the activity to pay for injuries caused by that activity. Although there is no fault, there is still responsibility because of the dangerous nature of the undertaking.

Other Applications of Strict Liability

Persons who keep wild animals are strictly liable for any harm inflicted by the animals. The basis for applying strict liability is that wild animals, should they escape from confinement, pose a serious risk of harm to people in the vicinity. An owner of domestic animals (such as dogs, cats, cows, or sheep) may be strictly liable for harm caused by those animals if the owner knew, or should have known, that the animals were dangerous or had a propensity to harm others.

A significant application of strict liability is in the area of product liability—liability of manufacturers and sellers for harmful or defective products. Liability here is a matter of social policy and is based on two factors: (1) the manufacturing company can better bear the cost of injury because it can spread the cost throughout society by increasing prices of goods, and (2) the manufacturing company is making a profit from its activities and therefore should bear the cost of injury as an operating expense. We will discuss product liability in greater detail in Chapter 22. Strict liability is also applied in certain types of bailments (a bailment exists when goods are transferred temporarily into the care of another—see Chapter 49).

11. 3 L.R.-E & I App. [Law Reports, English & Irish Appeal Cases] (H.L. [House of Lords] 1868).

12. Prima facie is Latin for “at first sight.” Legally, it refers to a fact that is presumed to be true unless contradicted by evidence.

REVIEWING

Negligence and Strict Liability

Elaine Sweeney went to Ragged Mountain Ski Resort in New Hampshire with a friend. Elaine went snow tubing down a snow-tube run designed exclusively for snow tubers. There were no Ragged Mountain employees present in the snow-tube area to instruct Elaine on the proper use of a snow tube. On her fourth run down the trail, Elaine crossed over the center line between snow-tube lanes, collided with another snow tuber, and was injured. Elaine filed a negligence action against Ragged Mountain seeking compensation for the injuries that she sustained. Two years earlier, the New Hampshire state legislature had enacted a statute that prohibited a person who participates in the sport of skiing from suing a ski-area operator for injuries caused by the risks inherent in skiing. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What defense will Ragged Mountain probably assert?
2. The central question in this case is whether the state statute establishing that skiers assume the risks inherent in the sport bars Elaine's suit. What would your decision be on this issue? Why?
3. Suppose that the court concludes that the statute applies only to skiing and not to snow tubing. Will Elaine's lawsuit be successful? Explain.
4. Now suppose that the jury concludes that Elaine was partly at fault for the accident. Under what theory might her damages be reduced in proportion to the degree to which her actions contributed to the accident and her resulting injuries?

 DEBATE THIS: Each time a state legislature enacts a law that applies the assumption of risk doctrine to a particular sport, participants in that sport suffer.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

7-1. Negligence Shannon's physician gives her some pain medication and tells her not to drive after she takes it, as the medication induces drowsiness. In spite of the doctor's warning, Shannon decides to drive to the store while on the medication. Owing to her lack of alertness, she fails to stop at a traffic light and crashes into another vehicle, causing a passenger in that vehicle to be injured. Is Shannon liable for the tort of negligence? Explain fully.

7-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Duty of Care.

Ruth carelessly parks her car on a steep hill, leaves the car in neutral, and fails to engage the parking brake. The car rolls down the hill and knocks down a power line. The sparks from the broken line ignite a grass fire. The fire spreads until it reaches a barn one mile away. The barn houses dynamite, and the burning barn explodes, causing part of the roof to fall on and injure Jim, a passing motorist. Which element of negligence is of the greatest concern here? What legal doctrine resolves this issue? Will Jim be able to recover damages from Ruth? Explain your answer.

• For a sample answer to Question 7-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

7-3. Strict Liability Danny and Marion Klein were injured when part of a fireworks display went astray and exploded near them. They sued Pyrodyne Corp., the pyrotechnic company that was hired to set up and discharge the fireworks, alleging, among other things, that the company should be strictly liable for damages caused by the fireworks display. Will the court agree with the Kleins? What factors will the court consider in making its decision? Discuss fully.

7-4. Negligence Per Se A North Carolina Department of Transportation regulation prohibits the placement of telephone booths within a public right-of-way. Despite this regulation, GTE South, Inc., placed a booth in the right-of-way near the intersection of Hillsborough and Sparger Roads in Durham County. A pedestrian, Laura Baldwin, was using the booth when an accident at the intersection caused a dump truck to cross the right-of-way and smash into the booth. Was Baldwin within the class of persons protected by the regulation? If so, did GTE's placement of the booth constitute negligence per se? Explain.

7-5. Negligence In July 2004, Emellie Anderson hired Kenneth Whitten, a licensed building contractor, to construct a two-story addition to her home. The bottom floor was to be a garage and the second floor a home office. In August, the parties signed a second contract under which Whitten agreed to rebuild a deck and railing attached to the house and to further improve the office. A later inspection revealed gaps in the siding on the new garage, nails protruding from incomplete framing, improper support for a stairway to the office, and gaps in its plywood flooring. One post supporting the deck was cracked; another was too short. Concrete had not been poured underneath the old posts. A section of railing was missing, and what was installed was warped, with gaps at the joints. Anderson filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Whitten, alleging that his work was “substandard, not to code, unsafe and not done in a [workmanlike] manner.” Anderson claimed that she would have to pay someone else to repair all of the work. Does Whitten’s “work” satisfy the requirements for a claim grounded in negligence? Should Anderson’s complaint be dismissed, or should she be awarded damages? Explain. [Anderson v. Whitten, 100 Conn.App. 730, 918 A.2d 1056 (2007)]

7-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Defenses to Negligence.

Neal Peterson’s entire family skied, and Peterson started skiing at the age of two. In 2000, at the age of eleven, Peterson was in his fourth year as a member of a ski race team. After a race one morning in February, Peterson continued to practice his skills through the afternoon. Coming down a slope very fast, at a point at which his skis were not touching the ground, Peterson collided with David Donahue. Donahue, a forty-three-year-old advanced skier, was skating (skiing slowly) across the slope toward the parking lot. Peterson and Donahue knew that falls, collisions, accidents, and injuries were possible with skiing. Donahue saw Peterson “split seconds” before the impact, which knocked Donahue out of his skis and down the slope ten or twelve feet. When Donahue saw Peterson lying motionless nearby, he immediately sought help. To recover for his injuries, Peterson filed a suit in a Minnesota state court against Donahue, alleging negligence. Based on these facts, which defense to a claim of negligence is Donahue most likely to assert? How is the court likely to apply that defense and rule on Peterson’s claim? Why? [Peterson ex rel. Peterson v. Donahue, 733 N.W.2d 790 (Minn.App. 2007)]

7-7. Negligence Mitsubishi Motors North America, Inc., operates an auto plant in Normal, Illinois. In 2003, TNT Logistics Corp. coordinated deliveries of auto parts to the plant, and DeKeyser Express, Inc., transported the parts. On January 21, TNT told DeKeyser to transport three pallets of parts from Trelleborg YSH, Inc., to the plant. DeKeyser dispatched its driver Lola Camp. At Trelleborg’s loading dock, Camp noticed that the pallets would fit inside the trailer only if they were stacked. Camp was concerned that the load might shift during transport. DeKeyser dispatcher Ken Kasprzak and TNT supervisor Alan Marten told her that she would not be liable for any damage. Trelleborg loaded the pallets, and Camp drove to TNT’s dock in Normal. When she opened the trailer door, the top pallet slipped. As Camp tried to close the door to prevent the pallet from falling, she injured her shoulder and arm. She filed a suit against TNT and Trelleborg, claiming negligence. What is their defense? Discuss. [Camp v. TNT Logistics Corp., 553 F.3d 502 (7th Cir. 2009)]

7-8. Negligence and Multiparty Liability Alice Banks was injured when a chair she was sitting on at an Elks club collapsed. As a result of her injury, Dr. Robert Boyce performed the surgery on her back, fusing certain vertebrae. However, Boyce fused the wrong vertebrae and then had to perform a second surgery to correct the error. Then, during rehabilitation at a nursing home, Banks developed a serious staph infection that required additional surgeries and extensive care and treatment. She sued the Elks club and Boyce for negligence. The Elks club and Boyce filed motions against each other and also sued the nursing home. After complicated holdings by lower courts, the Tennessee Supreme Court reviewed the matter. Did the Elks club have primary liability for all of the injuries suffered by Banks after the initial accident, or did each defendant alone contribute to Banks’s injuries? Explain. [Banks v. Elks Club Pride of Tennessee, 301 S.W.3d 214 (Sup.Ct.Tenn. 2010)]

7-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Dram Shop Acts.

Donald and Gloria Bowden hosted a late afternoon cookout at their home in South Carolina, inviting mostly business acquaintances. Justin Parks, who was nineteen years old, attended the party. Alcoholic beverages were available to all of the guests, even those who, like Parks, were not minors but were underage. Parks consumed alcohol at the party and left with other guests. One of these guests detained Parks at the guest's home to give Parks time to "sober up." Parks then drove himself from this guest's home and was killed in a one-car accident. At the time of death, he had a blood alcohol content of 0.291 percent, which exceeded the state's limit for driving a motor vehicle. Linda Marcum, Parks's mother, filed a suit in a South Carolina state court against the Bowdens and others, alleging that they were negligent. [Marcum v. Bowden, 372 S.C. 452, 643 S.E.2d 85 (2007)]

- (a) Considering the principles discussed in this chapter, what are arguments in favor of, and against, holding social hosts liable in this situation? Explain.
- (b) The states vary widely in assessing liability and imposing sanctions in the circumstances described in this problem. In other words, justice is not equal for parents and other social hosts who serve alcoholic beverages to underage individuals. Why is that?

Intellectual Property and Internet Law

Of significant concern to businesspersons is the need to protect their rights in intellectual property, which in today's world may exceed the value of physical property, such as machines and buildings. Intellectual property is any property that results from intellectual, creative processes—that is to say, the products of an individual's mind. Although it is an abstract term for an abstract concept, intellectual property is nonetheless familiar to almost everyone. The information contained in books and computer files is intellectual property. The software you use, the movies you see, and the music you listen to are all forms of intellectual property.

The need to protect creative works was recognized by the framers of the U.S. Constitution more than two hundred years ago: Article I, Section 8, of the U.S. Constitution authorized Congress "[t]o promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries." Laws protecting patents, trademarks, and copyrights are explicitly designed to protect and reward inventive and artistic creativity.

In today's global economy, however, protecting intellectual property in one country is no longer sufficient. Therefore, the United States participates in international agreements to secure ownership rights in intellectual property in other nations. We discuss some of these international agreements at the end of this chapter.

TRADEMARKS AND RELATED PROPERTY

A trademark is a distinctive mark, motto, device, or implement that a manufacturer stamps, prints, or otherwise affixes to the goods it produces so that they can be identified on the market and their origins made known. In other words, a trademark is a source indicator. At common law, the person who used a symbol or mark to identify a business or product was protected in the use of that trademark. Clearly, by using another's trademark, a business could lead consumers to believe that its goods were made by the other business. The law seeks to avoid this kind of confusion. In this section, we examine various aspects of the law governing trademarks.

In the following classic case concerning Coca-Cola, the defendants argued that the Coca-Cola trademark was entitled to no protection under the law because the term did not accurately represent the product.

The Coca-Cola Co. v. The Koke Co. of America

Supreme Court of the United States, 254 U.S. 143, 41 S.Ct. 113, 65 L.Ed. 189 (1920).
www.findlaw.com/casecode/supreme.html^a

COMPANY PROFILE • John Pemberton, an Atlanta pharmacist, invented a caramel-colored, carbonated soft drink in 1886. His bookkeeper, Frank Robinson, named the beverage Coca-Cola after two of the ingredients, coca leaves and kola nuts. Asa Candler bought the Coca-Cola Company (www.thecoca-colacompany.com) in 1891, and within seven years, he had made the soft drink available throughout the United States, as well as in parts of Canada and Mexico. Candler continued to sell Coke aggressively and to open up new markets, reaching Europe before 1910. In doing so, however, he attracted numerous competitors, some of which tried to capitalize directly on the Coke name.

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • The Coca-Cola Company sought to enjoin (prevent) the Koke Company of America and other beverage companies from, among other things, using the word Koke for their products. The Koke Company of America and other beverage companies contended that the Coca-Cola trademark was a fraudulent representation and that Coca-Cola was therefore not entitled to any help from the courts. The Koke Company and the other defendants alleged that the Coca-Cola Company, by its use of the Coca-Cola name, represented that the beverage contained cocaine (from coca leaves), which it no longer did. The trial court granted the injunction against the Koke Company, but the appellate court reversed the lower court's ruling. Coca-Cola then appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. Justice HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

* * * Before 1900 the beginning of [Coca-Cola's] good will was more or less helped by the presence of cocaine, a drug that, like alcohol or caffeine or opium, may be described as a deadly poison or as a valuable [pharmaceutical item, depending on the speaker's purposes]. The amount seems to have been very small,^b but it may have been enough to begin a bad habit and after the Food and Drug Act of June 30, 1906, if not earlier, long before this suit was brought, it was eliminated from the plaintiff's compound.

* * * Since 1900 the sales have increased at a very great rate corresponding to a like increase in advertising. The name now characterizes a beverage to be had at almost any soda fountain. It means a single thing coming from a single source, and well known to the community. It hardly would be too much to say that the drink characterizes the name as much as the name the drink. In other words Coca-Cola probably means to most persons the plaintiff's familiar product to be had everywhere rather than a compound of particular substances. * * * Before this suit was brought the plaintiff had advertised to the public that it must not expect and would not find cocaine, and had eliminated everything tending to suggest cocaine effects except the name and the picture of [coca] leaves and nuts, which probably conveyed little or nothing to most who saw it. It appears to us that it would be going too far to deny the plaintiff relief against a palpable [readily evident] fraud because possibly here and there an ignorant person might call for the drink with the hope for incipient cocaine intoxication. The plaintiff's position must be judged by the facts as they were when the suit was begun, not by the facts of a different condition and an earlier time. [Emphasis added.]

DECISION AND REMEDY • The district court's injunction was allowed to stand. The competing beverage companies were enjoined from calling their products Koke.

- In reality, until 1903 the amount of active cocaine in each bottle of Coke was equivalent to one "line" of cocaine.

CASE 8.1 CONTINUED ♦ IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY'S LAW • In this early case, the United States Supreme Court made it clear that trademarks and trade names (and nicknames for those marks and names, such as the nickname “Coke” for “Coca-Cola”) that are in common use receive protection under the common law. This holding is significant historically because it is the predecessor to the federal statute later passed to protect trademark rights—the Lanham Act of 1946, to be discussed next. In many ways, this act represented a codification of common law principles governing trademarks.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that Coca-Cola had been trying to make the public believe that its product contained cocaine. Would the result in this case likely have been different? Why or why not?

Statutory Protection of Trademarks

Statutory protection of trademarks and related property is provided at the federal level by the Lanham Act of 1946.¹ The Lanham Act was enacted, in part, to protect manufacturers from losing business to rival companies that used confusingly similar trademarks. The Lanham Act incorporates the common law of trademarks and provides remedies for owners of trademarks who wish to enforce their claims in federal court. Many states also have trademark statutes.

TRADEMARK DILUTION Before 1995, federal trademark law prohibited only the unauthorized use of the same mark on competing—or on noncompeting but “related”—goods or services. Protection was given only when the unauthorized use would likely confuse consumers as to the origin of those goods and services. In 1995, Congress amended the Lanham Act by passing the Federal Trademark Dilution Act,² which allowed trademark owners to bring suits in federal court for trademark dilution. Trademark dilution laws protect “distinctive” or “famous” trademarks (such as Jergens, McDonald’s, Dell, and Apple) from certain unauthorized uses even when the use is on noncompeting goods or is unlikely to confuse. More than half of the states have also enacted trademark dilution laws.

SIMILAR MARKS MAY CONSTITUTE TRADEMARK DILUTION A famous mark may be diluted not only by the use of an identical mark but also by the use of a similar mark.³ A similar mark is more likely to lessen the value of a famous mark when the companies using the marks provide related goods or compete against each other in the same market.

CASE IN POINT Samantha Lundberg operated “Sambuck’s Coffeehouse,” a small business in Astoria, Oregon, even though she knew that “Starbucks” is one of the largest coffee chains in the nation. When Starbucks Corporation filed a dilution lawsuit, the federal court ruled that use of the “Sambuck’s” mark constituted trademark dilution because it created confusion for consumers. Not only was there a “high degree” of similarity between the marks, but also both companies provided coffee-related services and marketed their services through “stand-alone” retail stores. Therefore, the use of the similar mark (Sambuck’s) reduced the value of the famous mark (Starbucks).⁴

Trademark Registration

Trademarks may be registered with the state or with the federal government. To register for protection under federal trademark law, a person must file an application with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office in Washington, D.C. Under current law, a mark can be registered (1) if it is currently in commerce or (2) if the applicant intends to put it into commerce within six months.

In special circumstances, the six-month period can be extended by thirty months, giving the applicant a total of three years from the date of notice of trademark approval to make use of the mark and file the required use statement. Registration is postponed until the mark is actually used. Nonetheless, during this waiting period, any applicant can legally protect his or her trademark against a third party who previously has neither used the mark nor filed an application for it. Registration is renewable between the fifth and sixth years after the initial registration and every ten years thereafter (every twenty years for those trademarks registered before 1990).

Trademark Infringement

Registration of a trademark with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office gives notice on a nationwide basis that the trademark belongs exclusively to the registrant. The registrant is also allowed to use the symbol ® to indicate that the mark has been registered. Whenever that trademark is copied to a substantial degree or used in its entirety by another, intentionally or unintentionally, the trademark has been infringed (used without authorization).

When a trademark has been infringed, the owner of the mark has a cause of action against the infringer. To succeed in a trademark infringement action, the owner must show that the defendant's use of the mark created a likelihood of confusion about the origin of the defendant's goods or services. The owner need not prove that the infringer acted intentionally or that the trademark was registered (although registration does provide proof of the date of inception of the trademark's use).

The most commonly granted remedy for trademark infringement is an injunction to prevent further infringement. Under the Lanham Act, a trademark owner that successfully proves infringement can recover actual damages, plus the profits that the infringer wrongfully received from the unauthorized use of the mark. A court can also order the destruction of any goods bearing the unauthorized trademark. In some situations, the trademark owner may also be able to recover attorneys' fees.

Distinctiveness of Mark

A trademark must be sufficiently distinct to enable consumers to identify the manufacturer of the goods easily and to distinguish between those goods and competing products.

STRONG MARKS Fanciful, arbitrary, or suggestive trademarks are generally considered to be the most distinctive (strongest) trademarks. Marks that are fanciful, arbitrary, or suggestive are protected as inherently distinctive without demonstrating secondary meaning. These marks receive automatic protection because they serve to identify a particular product's source, as opposed to describing the product itself.

Fanciful and Arbitrary Trademarks. Fanciful trademarks are inherently distinctive and include invented words, such as "Xerox" for one manufacturer's copiers and "Kodak" for another company's photographic products. Arbitrary trademarks are those that use common words in an uncommon way that is nondescriptive, such as "Dutch Boy" as a name for paint. Even a single letter used in a particular style can be an arbitrary trademark.

CASE IN POINT Sports entertainment company ESPN sued Quiksilver, Inc., a maker of surfer clothing, alleging trademark infringement. ESPN claimed that Quiksilver's clothing had used the stylized "X" mark that ESPN uses in connection with the "X Games," a competition focusing on extreme action sports. Quiksilver filed counterclaims for trademark infringement and dilution, arguing that it had a long history of using the stylized X on its products. ESPN created the X Games in the mid-1990s, and Quiksilver has been using the X mark since 1994. ESPN, which has trademark applications pending for the stylized X, asked the court to dismiss Quiksilver's counterclaims. A federal district court ruled that the X on Quiksilver's clothing is clearly an arbitrary mark. Noting that "the two Xs are similar enough that a consumer might well confuse them," the court refused to dismiss Quiksilver's claims and allowed the dispute to go to trial.⁵

Suggestive Trademarks. Suggestive trademarks suggest something about a product's nature, quality, or characteristics, without describing the product directly. These marks require imagination on the part of the consumer to identify the characteristic. For example, "Dairy Queen" suggests an association between its products and milk, but it does not directly describe ice cream. "Blu-ray" is a suggestive mark that is associated with the high-quality, high-definition video contained on a particular optical data storage disc. Although blue-violet lasers are used to read blu-ray discs, the term blu-ray does not directly describe the disc.

SECONDARY MEANING Descriptive terms, geographic terms, and personal names are not inherently distinctive and do not receive protection under the law until they acquire a secondary meaning. A secondary meaning may arise when customers begin to associate a specific term or phrase (such as London Fog) with specific trademarked items (coats with "London Fog" labels) made by a particular company.

a clown character on it that is similar to the clowns on Frosty Treats' trucks. In the last game of the series, the truck bears the label "Frosty Treats." Frosty sued the video game maker for trademark infringement, but the court held that "Frosty Treats" is a descriptive term and is not protected by trademark law unless it has acquired a secondary meaning. To establish secondary meaning, Frosty Treats would have had to show that the public recognized its trademark and associated it with a single source. Because Frosty Treats failed to do so, the court entered a judgment in favor of the video game producer.⁶

Once a secondary meaning is attached to a term or name, a trademark is considered distinctive and is protected. Even a color can qualify for trademark protection, as did the color schemes used by some state university sports teams, including Ohio State University and Louisiana State University.⁷

GENERIC TERMS Generic terms that refer to an entire class of products, such as bicycle and computer, receive no protection, even if they acquire secondary meanings.⁸ A particularly thorny problem arises when a trademark acquires generic use. For example, aspirin and thermos were originally the names of trademarked products, but today the words are used generically. Other trademarks that have acquired generic use are escalator, trampoline, raisin bran, dry ice, lanolin, linoleum, nylon, and corn flakes.

Service, Certification, and Collective Marks

A service mark is essentially a trademark that is used to distinguish the services (rather than the products) of one person or company from those of another. For example, each airline has a particular mark or symbol associated with its name. Titles and character names used in radio and television are frequently registered as service marks.

Other marks protected by law include certification marks and collective marks. A certification mark is used by one or more persons, other than the owner, to certify the region, materials, mode of manufacture, quality, or other characteristic of specific goods or services. When used by members of a cooperative, association, or other organization, it is referred to as a collective mark. Examples of certification marks are the phrases "Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval" and "UL Tested." Collective marks appear at the ends of motion picture credits to indicate the various associations and organizations that participated in the making of the films. The union marks found on the tags of certain products are also collective marks.

Trade Dress

The term trade dress refers to the image and overall appearance of a product. Trade dress is a broad concept and can include either all or part of the total image or overall impression created by a product or its packaging. For example, the distinctive decor, menu, layout, and style of service of a particular restaurant may be regarded as trade dress. Trade dress can also include the layout and appearance of a catalogue, the use of a lighthouse as part of the design of a golf hole, the fish shape of a cracker, or the G-shaped design of a Gucci watch.

Basically, trade dress is subject to the same protection as trademarks. In cases involving trade dress infringement, as in trademark infringement cases, a major consideration is whether consumers are likely to be confused by the allegedly infringing use.

Counterfeit Goods

Counterfeit goods copy or otherwise imitate trademarked goods, but they are not the genuine trademarked goods. The importation of goods that bear counterfeit (fake) trademarks poses a growing problem for U.S. businesses, consumers, and law enforcement. In addition to the negative financial effects on legitimate businesses, certain counterfeit goods, such as pharmaceuticals and nutritional supplements, can present serious public health risks. It is estimated that nearly 7 percent of the goods imported into the United States from abroad are counterfeit.

THE STOP COUNTERFEITING IN MANUFACTURED GOODS ACT The Stop Counterfeiting in Manufactured Goods Act⁹ (SCMGA) was enacted to combat counterfeit goods. The act makes it a crime to traffic intentionally in or attempt to traffic in counterfeit goods or services, or to knowingly use a counterfeit mark on or in connection with goods or services. Before this act, the law did not prohibit the creation or shipment of counterfeit labels that were not attached to any product. Therefore, counterfeiters would make labels and packaging bearing another's trademark, ship the labels to another location, and then affix them to an inferior product to deceive buyers. The SCMGA closed this loophole by making it a crime to knowingly traffic in counterfeit labels, stickers, packaging, and the like, regardless of whether the item is attached to any goods.

COUNTERFEITING PENALTIES Persons found guilty of violating the SCMGA may be fined up to $2 million or imprisoned for up to ten years (or more if they are repeat offenders). If a court finds that the statute was violated, it must order the defendant to forfeit the counterfeit products (which are then destroyed), as well as any property used in the commission of the crime. The defendant must also pay restitution to the trademark holder or victim in an amount equal to the victim's actual loss.

CASE IN POINT Wajdi Beydoun pleaded guilty to conspiring to import cigarette-rolling papers from Mexico that were falsely marked as "Zig-Zags" and selling them in the United States. The court sentenced Beydoun to prison and ordered him to pay $566,267 in restitution. On appeal, the court affirmed the prison sentence but reversed the restitution because the amount exceeded the actual loss suffered by the legitimate sellers of Zig-Zag rolling papers.¹⁰

Trade Names

Trademarks apply to products. The term trade name is used to indicate part or all of a business's name, whether the business is a sole proprietorship, a partnership, or a corporation. Generally, a trade name is directly related to a business and its goodwill. A trade name may be protected as a trademark if the trade name is also the name of the company's trademarked product—for example, Coca-Cola. Unless it is also used as a trademark or service mark, a trade name cannot be registered with the federal government. Trade names are protected under the common law, but only if they are unusual or fancifully used. The word Safeway, for example, was sufficiently fanciful to obtain protection as a trade name for a grocery chain.

10. United States v. Beydoun, 469 F.3d 102 (5th Cir. 2006).

SECTION 2 CYBER MARKS

In cyberspace, trademarks are sometimes referred to as cyber marks. We turn now to a discussion of how new laws and the courts address trademark-related issues in cyberspace.

Domain Names

As e-commerce expanded worldwide, one issue that emerged involved the rights of a trademark owner to use the mark as part of a domain name. A domain name is part of an Internet address—for example, "westlaw.com." Every domain name ends with a generic top level domain (TLD), which is the part of the name to the right of the period that indicates the type of entity that operates the site. For example, com is an abbreviation for commercial, and edu is short for education.

The second level domain (SLD)—the part of the name to the left of the period—is chosen by the business entity or individual registering the domain name. Competition for SLDs among firms with similar names and products has led to numerous disputes. By using an identical or similar domain name, parties have attempted to profit from a competitor's goodwill, sell pornography, offer for sale another party's domain name, or otherwise infringe on others' trademarks.

The Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN), a nonprofit corporation, oversees the distribution of domain names and operates an online arbitration system. Due to numerous complaints, ICANN completely overhauled the domain name distribution system and began using a new system in 2009. One of the goals of the new system is to alleviate the problem of cybersquatting. Cybersquatting occurs when a person registers a domain name that is the same as, or confusingly similar to, the trademark of another and then offers to sell the domain name back to the trademark owner.

Anticybersquatting Legislation

During the 1990s, cybersquatting led to so much litigation that Congress passed the Anticybersquatting Consumer Protection Act (ACPA) of 1999,¹¹ which amended the Lanham Act—the federal law protecting trademarks discussed earlier. The ACPA makes it illegal for a person to “register, traffic in, or use” a domain name (1) if the name is identical or confusingly similar to the trademark of another and (2) if the one registering, trafficking in, or using the domain name has a “bad faith intent” to profit from that trademark.

THE ONGOING PROBLEM OF CYBERSQUATTING The ACPA was intended to stamp out cybersquatting, but the practice continues to present a problem for businesses today, largely because more TLDs are available and many more companies are registering domain names. Domain name registrars have also proliferated. They charge a fee to businesses and individuals to register new names and to renew annual registrations (often through automated software). Many of these companies also buy and sell expired domain names. All domain name registrars are supposed to relay information about these transactions to ICANN and other companies that keep a master list of domain names. This information is not always transmitted, however. The speed at which domain names change hands and the difficulty in tracking mass automated registrations have created an environment where cybersquatting can flourish.

TYPOSQUATTING Cybersquatters have also developed new tactics, such as typosquatting, or registering a name that is a misspelling of a popular brand, such as hotmai.com or mysypac.com. Because many Internet users are not perfect typists, Web pages using these misspelled names receive a lot of traffic. More traffic generally means increased profit (advertisers often pay Web sites based on the number of unique visits, or hits), which in turn provides incentive for more cybersquatters. Also, if the misspelling is significant, the trademark owner may have difficulty proving that the name is identical or confusingly similar to the trademark of another as the ACPA requires.

Cybersquatting is costly for businesses, which must attempt to register all variations of a name to protect their domain name rights from would-be cybersquatters and typosquatters. Large corporations may have to register thousands of domain names across the globe just to protect their basic brands and trademarks.

APPLICABILITY AND SANCTIONS OF THE ACPA The ACPA applies to all domain name registrations of trademarks. Successful plaintiffs in suits brought under the act can collect actual damages and profits, or they can elect to receive statutory damages ranging from $1,000 to $100,000.

Although some successful lawsuits have been brought under the ACPA, plaintiffs may encounter roadblocks. Some domain name registrars offer privacy services that hide the true owners of Web sites, making it difficult for trademark owners to identify cybersquatters. Thus, before a trademark owner can bring a suit, he or she has to ask the court for a subpoena to discover the identity of the owner of the infringing Web site. Because of the high costs of court proceedings, discovery, and even arbitration, many disputes over cybersquatting are settled out of court.

Meta Tags

Search engines compile their results by looking through a Web site’s key-word field. Meta tags, or key words, may be inserted into this field to increase the likelihood that a site will be included in search engine results, even though the site may have nothing to do with the inserted words. Using this same technique, one site may appropriate the key words of other sites with more frequent hits so that the appropriating site will appear in the same search engine results as the more popular sites. Using another’s trademark in a meta tag without the owner’s permission, however, normally constitutes trademark infringement. Some uses of another’s trademark as a meta tag may be permissible if the use is reasonably necessary and does not suggest that the owner authorized or sponsored the use.

CASE IN POINT Terri Welles, a former model who had been “Playmate of the Year” in Playboy magazine, established a Web site that used the terms Playboy and Playmate as meta tags. Playboy Enterprises, Inc. (PEI), which publishes Playboy, filed a suit seeking to prevent Welles from using these meta tags. The court determined that Welles’s use of PEI’s meta tags to direct users to her Web site was permissible because it did not suggest sponsorship and there were no descriptive substitutes for the terms Playboy and Playmate.¹²

Dilution in the Online World

As discussed earlier, trademark dilution occurs when a trademark is used, without authorization, in a way that diminishes the distinctive quality of the mark. Unlike trademark infringement, a claim of dilution does not require proof that consumers are likely to be confused by a connection between the unauthorized use and the mark. For this reason, the products involved need not be similar.

12. Playboy Enterprises, Inc. v. Welles, 279 F.3d 796 (9th Cir. 2002). See also Canfield v. Health Communications, Inc., 2008 WL 961318 (C.D.Cal. 2008).

CASE IN POINT In the first case alleging dilution on the Web, a court precluded the use of “candyland.com” as the URL for an adult site. The lawsuit was brought by the company that manufactures the Candyland children’s game and owns the “Candyland” mark. Although consumers were not likely to connect candyland.com with the children’s game, the court reasoned that the sexually explicit adult site would dilute the value of the “Candyland” mark.¹³

Licensing

One way to avoid litigation and still make use of another’s trademark or other form of intellectual property is to obtain a license to do so. A license in this context is essentially an agreement, or contract, permitting the use of a trademark, copyright, patent, or trade secret for certain purposes. The party that owns the intellectual property rights and issues the license is the licensor, and the party obtaining the license is the licensee.

A license grants only the rights expressly described in the license agreement. A licensor might, for example, allow the licensee to use the trademark as part of its company name, or as part of its domain name, but not otherwise use the mark on any products or services. Disputes frequently arise over licensing agreements, particularly when the license involves Internet uses.

CASE IN POINT Perry Ellis International (PEI) owns the “Perry Ellis America” registered trademark (the PEA trademark), which is distinctive and known worldwide as a mark of quality apparel. In 2006, PEI granted URI Corporation an exclusive license to manufacture and distribute footwear using the PEA trademark in Mexico. The agreement required URI to comply with numerous conditions regarding the manufacturing and distribution of the licensed footwear and to sell the shoes only in certain (listed) high-quality stores. URI was not permitted to authorize any other party to use the PEA trademark. Despite this explicit licensing agreement, PEI discovered that footwear bearing its PEA trademark was being sold in discount stores in Mexico. PEI terminated the agreement and filed a lawsuit in a federal district court against URI. PEI was awarded more than $1 million in damages.¹⁴

Software creators typically license, rather than sell, their software to others. Software licensing agreements frequently include restrictions that prohibit licensees from sharing the software and using it to create similar software. Restrictive licenses enable creators to retain greater control over proprietary software and may offer more protection than intellectual property laws.

SECTION 3 PATENTS

A patent is a grant from the government that gives an inventor the right to exclude others from making, using, or selling his or her invention for a period of twenty years from the date of filing the application for a patent. Patents for designs, as opposed to those for inventions, are given for a fourteen-year period. The applicant must demonstrate to the satisfaction of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office that the invention, discovery, process, or design is novel, useful, and not obvious in light of current technology.

In contrast to patent law in many other countries, in the United States the first person to invent a product or process gets the patent rights rather than the first person to file for a patent on that product or process. Because it can be difficult to prove who invented an item first, however, the first person to file an application is often deemed the first to invent (unless the inventor has detailed prior research notes or other evidence). An inventor can publish the invention or offer it for sale before filing a patent application but must apply for a patent within one year of doing so or forfeit the patent rights.

The period of patent protection begins on the date the patent application is filed, rather than when the patent is issued, which may sometimes be years later. After the patent period ends (either fourteen or twenty years later), the product or process enters the public domain, and anyone can make, sell, or use the invention without paying the patent holder.

Searchable Patent Databases

A significant development relating to patents is the availability online of the world’s patent databases. The Web site of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (www.uspto.gov) provides searchable databases covering U.S. patents granted since 1976. The Web site of the European Patent Office (www.epo.org) provides online access to 50 million patent documents in more than seventy nations through a searchable network of databases. Businesses use these searchable databases in many ways. Because patents are valuable assets, businesses may need to perform patent searches to list or inventory their assets. Patent searches may also be conducted to study trends and patterns in a specific technology or to gather information about competitors in the industry.

What Is Patentable?

Under federal law, “[w]hoever invents or discovers any new and useful process, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement thereof, may obtain a patent therefor, subject to the conditions and requirements of this title.”¹⁵ Thus, to be patentable, the item must be novel and not obvious.

In sum, almost anything is patentable, except (1) the laws of nature, (2) natural phenomena, and (3) abstract ideas (including algorithms¹⁶). Even artistic methods, certain works of art, and the structure of storylines are patentable, provided that they are novel and not obvious. Plants that are reproduced asexually (by means other than from seed), such as hybrid or genetically engineered plants, are patentable in the United States, as are genetically engineered (or cloned) microorganisms and animals.

In the following case, the focus was on the application of the test for proving whether a patent claim was “obvious.”

15. 35 U.S.C. Section 101.

16. An algorithm is a step-by-step procedure, formula, or set of instructions for accomplishing a specific task—such as the set of rules used by a search engine to rank the listings contained within its index in response to a particular query.

EXTENDED CASE 8.2

KSR International Co. v. Teleflex, Inc.

Supreme Court of the United States, 550 U.S. 398, 127 S.Ct. 1727, 167 L.Ed.2d 705 (2007).

Justice KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

Teleflex Incorporated * * * sued KSR International Company [in a federal district court] for patent infringement. The patent at issue is entitled “Adjustable Pedal Assembly With Electronic Throttle Control.” The patentee is Steven J. Engelgau, and the patent is referred to as “the Engelgau patent.” Teleflex holds the exclusive license to the patent.

Claim 4 of the Engelgau patent describes a mechanism for combining an electronic sensor with an adjustable automobile pedal so the pedal’s position can be transmitted to a computer that controls the throttle in the vehicle’s engine. [KSR designed a pedal assembly for General Motors Corporation (GMC) to use in its Chevrolet and GMC light trucks.] When Teleflex accused KSR of infringing the Engelgau patent * * *, KSR countered that claim 4 was invalid * * * because its subject matter was obvious.

* * * * Seeking to resolve the question of obviousness with * * * uniformity and consistency, [the courts have] employed an approach referred to by the parties as the “teaching, suggestion, or motivation” test (TSM test), under which a patent claim is only proved obvious if some motivation or suggestion to combine the prior art teachings can be found in the prior art, the nature of the problem, or the knowledge of a person having ordinary skill in the art. KSR challenges that test, or at least its application in this case.

* * * * Important for this case are two adjustable pedals disclosed in [other patents]. The Asano patent reveals a support structure that houses the pedal so that even when the pedal location is adjusted relative to the driver, one of the pedal’s pivot points stays fixed. * * * The Redding patent reveals a different, sliding mechanism where both the pedal and the pivot point are adjusted.

[Also important for this case are two] patents involving electronic pedal sensors for computer-controlled throttles. These inventions * * * taught that it was preferable to detect the pedal’s position in the pedal assembly, not in the engine. The [Smith] patent disclosed a pedal with an electronic sensor on a pivot point in the pedal assembly.

* * * * The [Rixon patent] discloses an adjustable pedal assembly with an electronic sensor for detecting the pedal’s position.

* * * *

The District Court granted summary judgment in KSR's favor.

* * * *
 * * * The court compared the teachings of the prior art to the claims of Engelgau. It found "little difference." [The] Asano [patent] taught everything contained in claim 4 except the use of a sensor to detect the pedal's position and transmit it to the computer controlling the throttle. That additional aspect was revealed in sources such as * * * sensors [previously] used by Chevrolet.

* * * The District Court [also] held KSR had satisfied the [TSM] test. It reasoned (1) the state of the industry would lead inevitably to combinations of electronic sensors and adjustable pedals, (2) Rixon provided the basis for these developments, and (3) Smith taught a solution to the wire chafing problems in Rixon, namely locating the sensor on the fixed structure of the pedal.

* * * *
 * * * [The U.S.] Court of Appeals [for the Federal Circuit] reversed. It ruled the District Court had not been strict enough in applying the [TSM] test, having failed to make "finding[s] as to the specific understanding or principle within the knowledge of a skilled artisan that would have motivated one with no knowledge of [the] invention * * * to attach an electronic control to the support bracket of the Asano assembly."

Here, the Court of Appeals found, the Asano pedal was designed to solve the "constant ratio problem"—that is, to ensure that the force required to depress the pedal is the same no matter how the pedal is adjusted—whereas Engelgau sought to provide a simpler, smaller, cheaper adjustable electronic pedal. As for Rixon, the court explained, that pedal suffered from the problem of wire chafing but was not designed to solve it. In the court's view Rixon did not teach anything helpful to Engelgau's purpose. Smith, in turn, did not relate to adjustable pedals and did not "necessarily go to the issue of motivation to attach the electronic control on the support bracket of the pedal assembly."

* * * *
 We begin by rejecting the rigid approach of the Court of Appeals. Throughout this Court's engagement with the question of obviousness, our cases have set forth an expansive and flexible approach inconsistent with the way the Court of Appeals applied its TSM test here.

* * * *For over a half century, the Court has held that a patent for a combination which only unites old elements with no change in their respective functions * * * obviously withdraws what is already known into the field of its monopoly and diminishes the resources available to skillful [persons].* * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * If a technique has been used to improve one device, and a person of ordinary skill in the art would recognize that it would improve similar devices in the same way, using the technique is obvious unless its actual application is beyond his or her skill.

* * * *

The first error of the Court of Appeals in this case was to * * * [hold] that courts and patent examiners should look only to the problem the patentee was trying to solve.

The second error of the Court of Appeals lay in its assumption that a person of ordinary skill attempting to solve a problem will be led only to those elements of prior art designed to solve the same problem.

* * * *

When we apply the standards we have explained to the instant facts, claim 4 must be found obvious. * * * We see little difference between the teachings of Asano and Smith and the adjustable electronic pedal disclosed in claim 4 of the Engelgau patent. A person having ordinary skill in the art could have combined Asano with a pedal position sensor in a fashion encompassed by claim 4, and would have seen the benefits of doing so.

* * * *

* * * The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

QUESTIONS

1. Suppose that a person of ordinary skill creates an item by implementing a predictable variation of another's patented invention. Does the Court's opinion indicate that the item is likely or unlikely to be patentable? Discuss.
2. Based on the Court's reasoning, what other factors should be considered in determining the obviousness of a patent?

PATENTS FOR SOFTWARE At one time, it was difficult for developers and manufacturers of software to obtain patent protection because many software products simply automate procedures that can be performed manually. In other words, it was thought that computer programs did not meet the "novel" and "not obvious" requirements previously mentioned. Also, the basis for software is often a mathematical equation or formula, which is not patentable. In 1981, however, the United States

Supreme Court opened the way for software products to receive patents when it held that it is possible to obtain a patent for a process that incorporates a computer program.¹⁷

PATENTS FOR BUSINESS PROCESSES In a landmark case, State Street Bank & Trust Co. v. Signature Financial Group, Inc.,¹⁸ a federal appellate court ruled that business processes were patentable. After the decision in the State Street case, numerous technology firms applied for and received patents on business processes or methods. Walker Digital obtained a business process patent for its “Dutch auction” system, which allows Priceline.com users to name their own price for airline tickets and hotels. Amazon.com patented its “one-click” online payment system.

In 2008, however, the court that had decided the State Street case made it significantly more difficult to obtain patents for business processes when it reversed its earlier decision and invalidated “pure” business process patents.

CASE IN POINT Two individuals applied to patent a process that used transactions to hedge the risk in commodity trading. The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office denied their application because it was not limited to a machine and did not describe any methods for working out which transactions to perform. The applicants appealed. After soliciting input from numerous interest groups, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit established a new test for business process patents. Under this test, a business process patent is valid only if it is tied to a particular machine or apparatus or transforms a particular article into a different state or object. Because the process in question failed to meet the machine-or-transformation test, the court upheld the denial of a patent.¹⁹

Patent Infringement

If a firm makes, uses, or sells another’s patented design, product, or process without the patent owner’s permission, that firm commits the tort of patent infringement. Patent infringement may occur even though the patent owner has not put the patented product into commerce. Patent infringement may also occur even though not all features or parts of a product are copied. (With respect to a patented process, however, all steps or their equivalent must be copied for infringement to exist.)

Note that, as a general rule, under U.S. law no patent infringement occurs when a patented product is made and sold in another country. The United States Supreme Court has narrowly construed patent infringement as it applies to exported software.

CASE IN POINT AT&T Corporation holds a patent on a device used to digitally encode, compress, and process recorded speech. AT&T brought an infringement case against Microsoft Corporation, which admitted that its Windows operating system incorporated software code that infringed on AT&T’s patent. The case reached the United States Supreme Court on the question of whether Microsoft’s liability extended to computers made in another country. The Court held that it did not. Microsoft was liable only for infringement in the United States and not for the Windows-based computers produced in foreign locations. The Court reasoned that Microsoft had not “supplied” the software for the computers but had only electronically transmitted a master copy, which the foreign manufacturers then copied and loaded onto the computers.²⁰

Remedies for Patent Infringement

If a patent is infringed, the patent holder may sue for relief in federal court. The patent holder can seek an injunction against the infringer and can also request damages for royalties and lost profits. In some cases, the court may grant the winning party reimbursement for attorneys’ fees and costs. If the court determines that the infringement was willful, the court can triple the amount of damages awarded (treble damages).

In the past, permanent injunctions were routinely granted to prevent future infringement. In 2006, however, the United States Supreme Court ruled that patent holders are not automatically entitled to a permanent injunction against future infringing activities—the courts have discretion to decide whether equity requires it. According to the Court, a patent holder must prove that it has suffered irreparable injury and that the public interest would not be disserved by a permanent injunction.²¹ This decision gives courts discretion to decide what is equitable in the circumstances and allows them to consider what is in the public interest rather than just the interests of the parties.

CASE IN POINT In the first case applying this rule, a court found that although Microsoft had infringed on the patent of a small software company, the latter was not entitled to an injunction. According to the court, the small company was not irreparably harmed and could be adequately compensated by damages. Also, the public might suffer negative effects from an injunction because the infringement involved part of Microsoft's widely used Office suite software.²²

SECTION 4 COPYRIGHTS

A copyright is an intangible property right granted by federal statute to the author or originator of a literary or artistic production of a specified type. The Copyright Act of 1976,²³ as amended, governs copyrights. Works created after January 1, 1978, are automatically given statutory copyright protection for the life of the author plus 70 years. For copyrights owned by publishing houses, the copyright expires 95 years from the date of publication or 120 years from the date of creation, whichever comes first. For works by more than one author, the copyright expires 70 years after the death of the last surviving author.²⁴

Copyrights can be registered with the U.S. Copyright Office in Washington, D.C. A copyright owner no longer needs to place the symbol © or the term Copr. or Copyright on the work to have the work protected against infringement. Chances are that if somebody created it, somebody owns it.

What Is Protected Expression?

Works that are copyrightable include books, records, films, artworks, architectural plans, menus, music videos, product packaging, and computer software. To be protected, a work must be “fixed in a durable medium” from which it can be perceived, reproduced, or communicated. Protection is automatic. Registration is not required.

To obtain protection under the Copyright Act, a work must be original and fall into one of the following categories:

1. Literary works (including newspaper and magazine articles, computer and training manuals, catalogues, brochures, and print advertisements).
2. Musical works and accompanying words (including advertising jingles).
3. Dramatic works and accompanying music.
4. Pantomimes and choreographic works (including ballets and other forms of dance).
5. Pictorial, graphic, and sculptural works (including cartoons, maps, posters, statues, and even stuffed animals).
6. Motion pictures and other audiovisual works (including multimedia works).
7. Sound recordings.
8. Architectural works.

SECTION 102 EXCLUSIONS It is not possible to copyright an idea. Section 102 of the Copyright Act specifically excludes copyright protection for any “idea, procedure, process, system, method of operation, concept, principle, or discovery, regardless of the form in which it is described, explained, illustrated, or embodied.” Thus, anyone can freely use the underlying ideas or principles embodied in a work. What is copyrightable is the particular way in which an idea is expressed. Whenever an idea and an expression are inseparable, the expression cannot be copyrighted. Generally, anything that is not an original expression will not qualify for copyright protection. Facts widely known to the public are not copyrightable. Page numbers are not copyrightable because they follow a sequence known to everyone. Mathematical calculations are not copyrightable.

COMPILATIONS OF FACTS Unlike ideas, compilations of facts are copyrightable. Under Section 103 of the Copyright Act, a compilation is “a work formed by the collection and assembling of preexisting materials or data that are selected, coordinated, or arranged in such a way that the resulting work as a whole constitutes an original work of authorship.” The key requirement in the copyrightability of a compilation is originality. If the facts are selected, coordinated, or arranged in an original way, they can qualify for copyright protection. Therefore, the White Pages of a telephone directory do not qualify for copyright protection because the facts (names, addresses, and telephone numbers) are listed in alphabetical order rather than being selected, coordinated, or arranged in an original way. The Yellow Pages of a telephone directory, in contrast, may be copyrightable, provided the information is selected, coordinated, or arranged in an original way. Similarly, a compilation of information about yachts listed for sale has qualified for copyright protection.²⁵

24. These time periods reflect the extensions of the length of copyright protection enacted by Congress in the Copyright Term Extension Act of 1998, 17 U.S.C.A. Section 302. The United States Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the act in 2003. See Eldred v. Ashcroft, 537 U.S. 186, 123 S.Ct. 769, 154 L.Ed.2d 683 (2003).

Copyright Infringement

Whenever the form or expression of an idea is copied, an infringement of copyright has occurred. The reproduction does not have to be exactly the same as the original, nor does it have to reproduce the original in its entirety. If a substantial part of the original is reproduced, the copyright has been infringed.

REMEDIES FOR COPYRIGHT INFRINGEMENT Those who infringe copyrights may be liable for damages or criminal penalties. These range from actual damages or statutory damages, imposed at the court's discretion, to criminal proceedings for willful violations. Actual damages are based on the harm caused to the copyright holder by the infringement, while statutory damages, not to exceed $150,000, are provided for under the Copyright Act. Criminal proceedings may result in fines and/or imprisonment. A court can also issue a permanent injunction against a defendant when the court deems it necessary to prevent future copyright infringement.

CASE IN POINT Rusty Carroll operated an online term paper business, R2C2, Inc., that offered up to 300,000 research papers for sale at nine different Web sites. Individuals whose work was posted on these Web sites without their permission filed a lawsuit against Carroll for copyright infringement. A federal district court in Illinois ruled that an injunction was proper because the plaintiffs had shown that they had suffered irreparable harm and that monetary damages were inadequate to compensate them. Because Carroll had repeatedly failed to comply with court orders regarding discovery, the court found that the copyright infringement was likely to continue unless an injunction was issued. The court therefore issued a permanent injunction prohibiting Carroll and R2C2 from selling any term paper without sworn documentary evidence that the paper's author had given permission.²⁶

THE "FAIR USE" EXCEPTION An exception to liability for copyright infringement is made under the "fair use" doctrine. In certain circumstances, a person or organization can reproduce copyrighted material without paying royalties (fees paid to the copyright holder for the privilege of reproducing the copyrighted material). Section 107 of the Copyright Act provides as follows:

[T]he fair use of a copyrighted work, including such use by reproduction in copies or phonorecords or by any other means specified by [Section 106 of the Copyright Act], for purposes such as criticism, comment, news reporting, teaching (including multiple copies for classroom use), scholarship, or research, is not an infringement of copyright. In determining whether the use made of a work in any particular case is a fair use the factors to be considered shall include—

- (1) the purpose and character of the use, including whether such use is of a commercial nature or is for nonprofit educational purposes;
- (2) the nature of the copyrighted work;
- (3) the amount and substantiality of the portion used in relation to the copyrighted work as a whole; and
- (4) the effect of the use upon the potential market for or value of the copyrighted work.

WHAT IS FAIR USE? Because these guidelines are very broad, the courts determine whether a particular use is fair on a case-by-case basis. Thus, even if a person who reproduces copyrighted material believes the fair use exception applies, that person may still be committing a violation. In determining whether a use is fair, courts have often considered the fourth factor to be the most important.

CASE IN POINT The owner of copyrighted music, BMG Music Publishing, granted a license to Leadsinger, Inc., a manufacturer of karaoke devices. The license gave Leadsinger permission to reproduce the sound recordings, but not to reprint the song lyrics, which appeared at the bottom of a TV screen when the karaoke device was used. BMG demanded that Leadsinger pay a "lyric reprint" fee and a "synchronization" fee. Leadsinger refused to pay, claiming that its use of the lyrics was educational and thus did not constitute copyright infringement under the fair use exception. A federal appellate court disagreed. The court held that Leadsinger's display of the lyrics was not a fair use because it would have a negative effect on the value of the copyrighted work.²⁷

Copyright Protection for Software

In 1980, Congress passed the Computer Software Copyright Act, which amended the Copyright Act of 1976 to include computer programs in the list of creative works protected by federal copyright law.²⁸ Generally, the courts have extended copyright protection to those parts of a computer program that can be read by humans, such as the “high-level” language of a source code, and to the binary-language object code, which is readable only by the computer. Additionally, such elements as the overall structure, sequence, and organization of a program have been deemed copyrightable. Not all aspects of software are protected, however. For the most part, courts have not extended copyright protection to the “look and feel”—the general appearance, command structure, video images, menus, windows, and other screen displays—of computer programs.

COPYRIGHTS IN DIGITAL INFORMATION

Copyright law is probably the most important form of intellectual property protection on the Internet. This is because much of the material on the Internet (including software and database information) is copyrighted, and in order to transfer that material online, it must be “copied.” Generally, whenever a party downloads software or music into a computer’s random access memory, or RAM, without authorization, a copyright is infringed. Technology has vastly increased the potential for copyright infringement.

CASE IN POINT A musical group used only a few seconds from the guitar solo of another group’s copyrighted sound recording, without permission, while recording a rap song that was included in the sound track of a movie. Nevertheless, a federal appellate court held that digitally sampling a copyrighted sound recording of any length constitutes copyright infringement.²⁹

Initially, criminal penalties for copyright violations could be imposed only if unauthorized copies were exchanged for financial gain. Yet much piracy of copyrighted materials online was “altruistic” in nature; unauthorized copies were made simply to be shared with others. Then, Congress amended the law and extended criminal liability for the piracy of copyrighted materials to persons who exchange unauthorized copies of copyrighted works without realizing a profit.

Digital Millennium Copyright Act

In 1998, Congress passed further legislation to protect copyright holders—the Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA).³⁰ The DMCA gave significant protection to owners of copyrights in digital information.³¹ Among other things, the act established civil and criminal penalties for anyone who circumvents (bypasses) encryption software or other technological antipiracy protection. Also prohibited are the manufacture, import, sale, and distribution of devices or services for circumvention.

The DMCA provides for exceptions to fit the needs of libraries, scientists, universities, and others. In general, the law does not restrict the “fair use” of circumvention methods for educational and other noncommercial purposes. For example, circumvention is allowed to test computer security, to conduct encryption research, to protect personal privacy, and to enable parents to monitor their children’s use of the Internet. The exceptions are to be reconsidered every three years.

The DMCA also limits the liability of Internet service providers (ISPs). Under the act, an ISP is not liable for copyright infringement by its customer unless the ISP is aware of the subscriber’s violation. An ISP may be held liable only if it fails to take action to shut down the subscriber after learning of the violation. A copyright holder must act promptly, however, by pursuing a claim in court, or the subscriber has the right to be restored to online access.

MP3 and File-Sharing Technology

Soon after the Internet became popular, a few enterprising programmers created software to compress large data files, particularly those associated with music. The best-known compression and decompression system is MP3, which enables music fans to download songs or entire CDs onto their computers or onto portable listening devices, such as iPods or iPhones. The MP3 system also made it possible for music fans to access other music fans’ files by engaging in file-sharing via the Internet.

28. Pub. L. No. 96-517 (1980), amending 17 U.S.C. Sections 101, 117.

31. This act implemented the World Intellectual Property Organization Copyright Treaty of 1996, which will be discussed later in this chapter on page 169.

File-sharing is accomplished through peer-to-peer (P2P) networking. The concept is simple. Rather than going through a central Web server, P2P networking uses numerous personal computers (PCs) that are connected to the Internet. Individuals on the same network can access files stored on one another's PCs through a distributed network. Parts of the network may be distributed all over the country or the world, which offers an unlimited number of uses. Persons scattered throughout the country or the world can work together on the same project by using file-sharing programs.

A newer method of sharing files via the Internet is cloud computing, which is essentially a subscription-based or pay-per-use service that extends a computer's software or storage capabilities. Cloud computing can deliver a single application through a browser to multiple users, or it might be a utility program to pool resources and provide data storage and virtual servers that can be accessed on demand. Amazon, Facebook, Google, IBM, and Sun Microsystems are using and developing more cloud computing services.

SHARING STORED MUSIC FILES When file-sharing is used to download others' stored music files, copyright issues arise. Recording artists and their labels stand to lose large amounts of royalties and revenues if relatively few CDs are purchased and then made available on distributed networks, from which anyone can get them for free.

CASE IN POINT The issue of file-sharing infringement has been the subject of an ongoing debate since the highly publicized case of *A&M Records, Inc. v. Napster, Inc.*³² Napster, Inc., operated a Web site with free software that enabled users to copy and transfer MP3 files via the Internet. When firms in the recording industry sued Napster, the court held that Napster was liable for contributory and vicarious³³ (indirect) copyright infringement because it had assisted others in obtaining unauthorized copies of copyrighted music.

In the following case, a group of recording companies sued an Internet user who had downloaded a number of copyrighted songs from the Internet. The user then shared the audio files with others via a P2P network. One of the issues before the court was whether the user was an "innocent infringer"—that is, whether she was innocent of copyright infringement because she was unaware that the works were copyrighted.

32. 239 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2001).

33. Vicarious (indirect) liability exists when one person is subject to liability for another's actions. A common example occurs in the employment context, when an employer is held vicariously liable by third parties for torts committed by employees in the course of their employment.

CASE 8.3

Maverick Recording Co. v. Harper

United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, 598 F.3d 193 (2010).
www.ca5.uscourts.gov/Opinions/asp#a COMPANY PROFILE • Recording star Madonna, others in the music business, and Time Warner created Maverick Records in 1992. Initially, the company saw great success with Alanis Morissette, The Prodigy, Candlebox, and the Deftones. It also created the sound track for the movie The Matrix. In a dispute over management of the company, Madonna and another co-owner were bought out. Today, Maverick is a wholly owned subsidiary of Warner Music Group.

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Maverick Recording Company and several other music-recording firms (the plaintiffs) hired MediaSentry to investigate the infringement of their copyrights over the Internet. During its investigation, MediaSentry discovered that Whitney Harper was using a file-sharing program to share digital audio files with other users of a peer-to-peer network. The shared audio files included a number of the plaintiffs' copyrighted works. The plaintiffs brought an action in a federal court against Harper for copyright infringement. They sought $750 per infringed work, the minimum amount of damages set forth in Section 504(c)(1) of the Copyright Act. Harper asserted that her infringement was "innocent" and that therefore Section 504(c)(2) of the Copyright Act should CASE 8.3 CONTINUED ♦ apply. That section provides that when an infringer was not aware, and had no reason to believe, that his or her acts constituted copyright infringement, “the court in its discretion may reduce the award of statutory damages to a sum of not less than $200.” The trial court granted summary judgment for the plaintiffs on the issue of copyright infringement and enjoined Harper from further downloading and sharing of copyrighted works. The court, however, awarded the plaintiffs only $200 per infringed work. Both parties appealed. Harper claimed that there was insufficient evidence of copyright infringement. The plaintiffs argued that the district court had erred by failing to rule out the innocent infringer defense as a matter of law.

Edith Brown CLEMENT, Circuit Judge:

* * * *

The uncontroverted [undisputed] evidence is more than sufficient to compel a finding that Harper had downloaded the files: there was no evidence from which a fact-finder could draw a reasonable inference that Harper had not downloaded them or that they were something other than audio files. * * * The district court properly rejected Harper’s argument that the evidence of infringement was insufficient.

* * * *

* * * The district court held that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Harper was an innocent infringer. * * * Harper averred [asserted] in an affidavit that she did not understand the nature of file-sharing programs and that she believed that listening to music from file-sharing networks was akin to listening to a noninfringing Internet radio station. The district court ruled that this assertion created a triable [capable of being tried before a judge or a jury] issue as to whether Harper’s infringement was “innocent” under [Section 504(c)(2) of the Copyright Act].

* * * We hold that the defense was unavailable to her as a matter of law. *The innocent infringer defense is limited by [Section 402(d) of the Copyright Act]: with one exception not relevant here, when a proper copyright notice “appears on the published * * * phonorecords to which a defendant * * * had access, then no weight shall be given to such a defendant’s interposition of a defense based on innocent infringement in mitigation of actual or statutory damages.”* [Emphasis added.]

The district court acknowledged that Plaintiffs provided proper notice on each of the published phonorecords from which the audio files were taken. * * * Harper contended only that she was too young and naive to understand that the copyrights on published music applied to downloaded music.

These arguments are insufficient to defeat the interposition [interference] of the [Section 402(d)] limitation on the innocent infringer defense. Harper’s reliance on her own understanding of copyright law—or lack thereof—is irrelevant in the context of [Section 402(d)]. The plain language of the statute shows that the infringer’s knowledge or intent does not affect its application. Lack of legal sophistication cannot overcome a properly asserted [Section 402(d)] limitation to the innocent infringer defense. [Emphasis added.]

In short, the district court found a genuine issue of fact as to whether Harper intended to infringe Plaintiffs’ copyrights, but that issue was not material: [Section 402(d)] forecloses, as a matter of law, Harper’s innocent infringer defense. Because the defense does not apply, Plaintiffs are entitled to statutory damages. And because Plaintiffs requested the minimum statutory damages under [Section 504(c)(1)], Harper’s culpability is not an issue and there are no issues left for trial. Plaintiffs must be awarded statutory damages of $750 per infringed work.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the trial court’s finding of copyright liability, reversed its finding that the innocent infringer defense presented an issue for trial, and remanded the case for further proceedings consistent with the court’s opinion. The appellate court concluded that the district court had erred by awarding damages of $200 per infringement because Harper was not an innocent infringer.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • In this and other cases involving similar rulings, the courts have held that when the published phonorecordings from which audio files were taken contained copyright notices, the innocent infringer defense does not apply. It is irrelevant that the notice is not provided in the online file. Is this fair? Explain.

CASE 8.3 CONTINUED ♦ MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • Owners and managers of firms in the business of recording and distributing music face a constant challenge in protecting their copyrights. This is particularly true for audio files in the online environment, where Internet users can easily download a copyrighted song and make it available to P2P file-sharing networks. Among other things, this means that recording companies must be ever vigilant in searching the Web to find infringing uses of works distributed online. Today, it is not uncommon for companies to hire antipiracy firms to investigate the illegal downloading of their copyrighted materials.

THE EVOLUTION OF FILE-SHARING TECHNOLOGIES

After the Napster decision, the recording industry filed and won numerous lawsuits against companies that distribute online file-sharing software. Other companies then developed technologies that allow P2P network users to share stored music files, without paying a fee, more quickly and efficiently than ever. Software such as Morpheus, KaZaA, and LimeWire, for example, provides users with an interface that is similar to a Web browser.³⁴ When a user performs a search, the software locates a list of peers that have the file available for downloading.

Because of the automated procedures, the companies do not maintain a central index and are unable to determine whether users are exchanging copyrighted files. Nevertheless, the United States Supreme Court has held that companies that distribute file-sharing software intending that it be used to violate copyright laws can be liable for users' copyright infringement.

CASE IN POINT In Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Inc. v. Grokster, Ltd.,³⁵ music and film industry organizations sued Grokster, Ltd., and StreamCast Networks, Inc., for contributory and vicarious copyright infringement. The Supreme Court held that anyone who distributes file-sharing software "with the object of promoting its use to infringe copyright, as shown by clear expression or other affirmative steps taken to foster infringement, . . . is liable for the resulting acts of infringement by third parties."

DVDS AND FILE-SHARING File-sharing also creates problems for the motion picture industry, which has lost significant amounts of revenue as a result of pirated DVDs. Nearly one-third of the people in the United States—many of them young men—have illegally copied a movie onto a DVD in violation of copyright laws.³⁶ Numerous Web sites offer software that facilitates the illegal copying of movies, such as BitTorrent, which enables users to download high-quality files from the Internet.

CASE IN POINT TorrentSpy, a popular BitTorrent indexing Web site, enabled users to locate and exchange files. The Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA) and Columbia Pictures Industries, brought a lawsuit against the operators of TorrentSpy for facilitating copyright infringement. The MPAA also claimed that the operators had destroyed evidence that would reveal the identity of individual infringers. The operators had ignored a court order to keep server logs of the Internet addresses of people who facilitated the trading of files via the site. Because TorrentSpy's operators had willfully destroyed evidence, a federal court found in favor of the MPAA and ordered the defendants to pay a judgment of $111 million.³⁷

TRADE SECRETS

The law of trade secrets protects some business processes and information that are not, or cannot be, patented, copyrighted, or trademarked against appropriation by competitors. A trade secret is basically information of commercial value. Trade secrets may include customer lists, plans, research and development, pricing information, marketing methods, production techniques, and generally anything that makes an individual company unique and that would have value to a competitor.

34. In 2005, KaZaA entered into a settlement agreement with four major music companies that had alleged copyright infringement. KaZaA agreed to offer only legitimate, fee-based music downloads. Note also that although the publisher of Morpheus is no longer in business, the software is still available.

35. 545 U.S. 913, 125 S.Ct. 2764, 162 L.Ed.2d 781 (2005). Grokster, Ltd., later settled this dispute out of court and stopped distributing its software.

Unlike copyright and trademark protection, protection of trade secrets extends both to ideas and to their expression. (For this reason, and because a trade secret involves no registration or filing requirements, trade secret protection may be well suited for software.) Of course, the secret formula, method, or other information must be disclosed to some persons, particularly to key employees. Businesses generally attempt to protect their trade secrets by having all employees who use a process or information agree in their contracts, or in confidentiality agreements, never to divulge it.³⁸

State and Federal Law on Trade Secrets

Under Section 757 of the Restatement of Torts, those who disclose or use another's trade secret, without authorization, are liable to that other party if (1) they discovered the secret by improper means or (2) their disclosure or use constitutes a breach of a duty owed to the other party. The theft of confidential business data by industrial espionage, as when a business taps into a competitor's computer, is a theft of trade secrets without any contractual violation and is actionable in itself.

Trade secrets were protected under the common law, but the protection provided varied from state to state. Today, most states' laws are based on the Uniform Trade Secrets Act,³⁹ which has been adopted in forty-seven states. Additionally, in 1996 Congress passed the Economic Espionage Act,⁴⁰ which made the theft of trade secrets a federal crime. We will examine the provisions and significance of this act in Chapter 9, in the context of crimes related to business.

Trade Secrets in Cyberspace

Computer technology is undercutting many business firms' ability to protect their confidential information, including trade secrets.⁴¹ For example, a dishonest employee could e-mail trade secrets in a company's computer to a competitor or a future employer. If e-mail is not an option, the employee might walk out with the information on a flash pen drive.

For a comprehensive summary of trade secrets and the other forms of intellectual property discussed in this chapter, see Exhibit 8-1.

SECTION 7 INTERNATIONAL PROTECTION FOR INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY

For many years, the United States has been a party to various international agreements relating to intellectual property rights. For example, the Paris Convention of 1883, to which about 172 countries are signatory, allows parties in one country to file for patent and trademark protection in any of the other member countries. Other international agreements in this area include the Berne Convention; the Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights, or, more simply, the TRIPS agreement; and the Madrid Protocol. To learn about a new international treaty being negotiated that will affect international property rights, see this chapter's Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature on page 170.

The Berne Convention

Under the Berne Convention of 1886 (an international copyright agreement), as amended, if a U.S. citizen writes a book, every country that has signed the convention must recognize the U.S. author's copyright in the book. Also, if a citizen of a country that has not signed the convention first publishes a book in one of the 170 countries that have signed, all other countries that have signed the convention must recognize that author's copyright. Copyright notice is not needed to gain protection under the Berne Convention for works published after March 1, 1989.

The laws of many countries, as well as international laws, are being updated to reflect changes

39. The Uniform Trade Secrets Act, as drafted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, (NCCUSL), can be found at www.nccusl.org. As with all uniform laws, each state has codified the law within its own state statutory code.

40. 18 U.S.C. Sections 1831–1839.

41. Note that in at least one case, a court has held that customers' e-mail addresses may constitute trade secrets. See T-N-T Motorsports, Inc. v. Hennessey Motorsports, Inc., 965 S.W.2d 18 (Tex.App.—Houston 1998); rehearing overruled (1998); petition dismissed (1998).

EXHIBIT 8-1 • Forms of Intellectual Property

FORM	DEFINITION	HOW ACQUIRED	DURATION	REMEDY FOR INFRINGEMENT
Patent	A grant from the government that gives an inventor exclusive rights to an invention.	By filing a patent application with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office and receiving its approval.	Twenty years from the date of the application; for design patents, fourteen years.	Monetary damages, including royalties and lost profits, plus attorneys' fees. Damages may be tripled for intentional infringements.
Copyright	The right of an author or originator of a literary or artistic work, or other production that falls within a specified category, to have the exclusive use of that work for a given period of time.	Automatic (once the work or creation is put in tangible form). Only the expression of an idea (and not the idea itself) can be protected by copyright.	For authors: the life of the author, plus 70 years. For publishers: 95 years after the date of publication or 120 years after creation.	Actual damages plus profits received by the party who infringed or statutory damages under the Copyright Act, plus costs and attorneys' fees in either situation.
Trademark (Service Mark and Trade Dress)	Any distinctive word, name, symbol, or device (image or appearance), or combination thereof, that an entity uses to distinguish its goods or services from those of others. The owner has the exclusive right to use that mark or trade dress.	1. At common law, ownership created by use of the mark. 2. Registration with the appropriate federal or state office gives notice and is permitted if the mark is currently in use or will be within the next six months.	Unlimited, as long as it is in use. To continue notice by registration, the owner must renew by filing between the fifth and sixth years, and thereafter, every ten years.	1. Injunction prohibiting the future use of the mark. 2. Actual damages plus profits received by the party who infringed (can be increased under the Lanham Act). 3. Destruction of articles that infringed. 4. Plus costs and attorneys' fees.
Trade Secret	Any information that a business possesses and that gives the business an advantage over competitors (including formulas, lists, patterns, plans, processes, and programs).	Through the originality and development of the information and processes that constitute the business secret and are unknown to others.	Unlimited, so long as not revealed to others. Once revealed to others, it is no longer a trade secret.	Monetary damages for misappropriation (the Uniform Trade Secrets Act also permits punitive damages if willful), plus costs and attorneys' fees.

in technology and the expansion of the Internet. Copyright holders and other owners of intellectual property generally agree that changes in the law are needed to stop the increasing international piracy of their property. The World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) Copyright Treaty of 1996, a special agreement under the Berne Convention, attempts to update international law governing copyright protection to include more safeguards against copyright infringement via the Internet. The United States signed the WIPO treaty in 1996 and implemented its terms in the Digital Millennium Copyright Act of 1998, which was discussed earlier in this chapter on page 164.

This convention and other international agreements have given some protection to intellectual property on a worldwide level. None of them, however, has been as significant and far reaching in scope as the agreement discussed next.

The TRIPS Agreement

Representatives from more than one hundred nations signed the TRIPS agreement in 1994. The agreement established, for the first time, standards for the international protection of intellectual property rights, including patents, trademarks, and copyrights for movies, computer programs, books, and

SHIFTING LEGAL PRIORITIES FOR BUSINESS

The Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement

In 2008, the United States began negotiating a new international treaty with the European Union, Japan, and Switzerland. By 2010, Australia, Canada, Jordan, Mexico, Morocco, New Zealand, Singapore, South Korea, and the United Arab Emirates had joined in the negotiations. The proposed treaty, called the Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement, would establish its own governing body that is separate and distinct from existing groups, including the World Trade Organization and the World Intellectual Property Organization.

The Goal of the Proposed Treaty

The treaty will apply not only to counterfeit physical goods, such as medications, but also to pirated copyrighted works being distributed via the Internet and other information technology. The goal is to create a new higher standard of enforcement for intellectual property rights that goes beyond the Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights (TRIPS) agreement and encourages international cooperation and information sharing among the signatory countries.

Provisions Being Considered

The specific terms of the treaty have not yet been publicly disclosed, but there is considerable speculation about what it may contain. According to some media reports, one provision may authorize random border searches of electronic devices, such as laptops and iPods, for infringing content. Another provision supposedly would require Internet service providers to provide information about suspected copyright infringers without a warrant. Remember, though, that at this point the actual terms of the treaty are unknown, and the final provisions may differ considerably from the preliminary reports. The impact of the global financial crisis may also have an effect on the negotiations, which finished their seventh round in January 2010.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS

Managers in companies that create intellectual property for sale must become familiar with the final version of the Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement. Among other things, the agreement may provide additional protection for intellectual property that is downloadable through the Internet.

music. The TRIPS agreement provides that each member country of the World Trade Organization must include in its domestic laws broad intellectual property rights and effective remedies (including civil and criminal penalties) for violations of those rights.

NO DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FOREIGN INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY OWNERS Generally, the TRIPS agreement forbids member nations from discriminating against foreign owners of intellectual property rights (in the administration, regulation, or adjudication of such rights). In other words, a member nation cannot give its own nationals (citizens) favorable treatment without offering the same treatment to nationals of all other member countries. For instance, if a U.S. software manufacturer brings a suit for the infringement of intellectual property rights under Germany's national laws, the U.S. manufacturer is entitled to receive the same treatment as a German manufacturer because Germany is a member of the agreement. Each member nation must also ensure that legal procedures are available for parties who wish to bring actions for infringement of intellectual property rights. Additionally, a related document established a mechanism for settling disputes among member nations.

TYPES OF COVERED INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY

Particular provisions of the TRIPS agreement relate to patent, trademark, and copyright protection for intellectual property. The agreement specifically provides copyright protection for computer programs by stating that compilations of data, databases, and other materials are “intellectual creations” and are to be protected as copyrightable works. Other provisions relate to trade secrets and the rental of computer programs and cinematographic works.

The Madrid Protocol

In the past, one of the difficulties in protecting U.S. trademarks internationally was the time and expense required to apply for trademark registration in foreign countries. The filing fees and procedures for trademark registration vary significantly among individual countries. The Madrid Protocol, which was signed into law in 2003, may help to resolve these problems. The Madrid Protocol is an international treaty that has been signed by seventy-nine countries. Under its provisions, a U.S. company wishing to register its trademark abroad can submit a single application and designate other member countries in which the company would like to register its mark. The treaty is designed to reduce the costs of international trademark protection by more than 60 percent, according to proponents.

Although the Madrid Protocol may simplify and reduce the cost of trademark registration in foreign countries, it remains to be seen whether it will provide significant benefits to trademark owners. Even with a similar registration process, there is still a question as to whether member countries will enforce the law and protect the mark. Moreover, the cost savings of using the Madrid Protocol may be negated by its requirement that a trademark owner use local agents in the applicable jurisdiction if problems arise.

REVIEWING

Intellectual Property and Internet Law

Two computer science majors, Trent and Xavier, have an idea for a new video game, which they propose to call “Hallowed.” They form a business and begin developing their idea. Several months later, Trent and Xavier run into a problem with their design and consult with a friend, Brad, who is an expert in designing computer source codes. After the software is completed but before Hallowed is marketed, a video game called Halo 2 is released for both the Xbox and the Playstation 3 systems. Halo 2 uses source codes similar to those of Hallowed and imitates Hallowed’s overall look and feel, although not all the features are alike. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would the name Hallowed receive protection as a trademark or as trade dress? Explain.
2. If Trent and Xavier had obtained a business process patent on Hallowed, would the release of Halo 2 have infringed on their patent? Why or why not?
3. Based only on the facts described above, could Trent and Xavier sue the makers of Halo 2 for copyright infringement? Why or why not?
4. Suppose that Trent and Xavier discover that Brad took the idea of Hallowed and sold it to the company that produced Halo 2. Which type of intellectual property issue does this raise?

 DEBATE THIS: Congress has amended copyright law several times. Copyright holders now have protection for many decades. Was Congress right in extending these copyright time periods? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

8-1. Fair Use Professor Wise is teaching a summer seminar in business torts at State University. Several times during the course, he makes copies of relevant sections from business law texts and distributes them to his students. Wise does not realize that the daughter of one of the textbook authors is a member of his seminar. She tells her father about Wise’s copying activities, which have taken place without her father's or his publisher's permission. Her father sues Wise for copyright infringement. Wise claims protection under the fair use doctrine. Who will prevail? Explain.

8-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Copyright Infringement.

In which of the following situations would a court likely hold Ursula liable for copyright infringement?

- (a) Ursula goes to the library and photocopies ten pages from a scholarly journal relating to a topic on which she is writing a term paper.
 - (b) Ursula makes blouses, dresses, and other clothes and sells them in her small shop. She advertises some of the outfits as Guest items, hoping that customers might mistakenly assume that they were made by Guess, the well-known clothing manufacturer.
 - (c) Ursula teaches Latin American history at a small university. She has a digital video recorder and frequently records television programs relating to Latin America and puts them on DVDs. She then takes the DVDs to her classroom so that her students can watch them.
- For a sample answer to Question 8-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

8-3. Trademark Infringement Sync Computers, Inc., makes computer-related products under the brand name “Sync,” which the company registers as a trademark. Without Sync’s permission, E-Product Corp. embeds the Sync mark in E-Product’s Web site, in black type on a blue background. This tag causes the E-Product site to be returned at the top of the list of results on a search engine query for “Sync.” Does E-Product’s use of the Sync mark as a meta tag without Sync’s permission constitute trademark infringement? Explain.

8-4. Patent Infringement As a cattle rancher in Nebraska, Gerald Gohl used handheld searchlights to find and help calving animals (animals giving birth) in harsh blizzard conditions. Gohl thought that it would be more helpful to have a portable searchlight mounted on the outside of a vehicle and remotely controlled. He and Al Gebhardt developed and patented practical applications of this idea—the Golight and the wireless, remote-controlled Radio Ray, which could rotate 360 degrees—and formed Golight, Inc., to make and market these products. In 1997, Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., began selling a portable, wireless, remote-controlled searchlight that was identical to the Radio Ray except for a stop piece that prevented the light from rotating more than 351 degrees. Golight sent Wal-Mart a letter claiming that its device infringed Golight’s patent. Wal-Mart sold its remaining inventory of the devices and stopped carrying the product. Golight filed a suit in a federal district court against Wal-Mart, alleging patent infringement. How should the court rule? Explain. [Golight, Inc. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 355 F.3d 1327 (Fed.Cir. 2004)]

8-5. Trade Secrets Briefing.com offers Internet-based analyses of investment opportunities to investors. Richard Green is the company’s president. One of Briefing.com’s competitors is StreetAccount, LLC (limited liability company), whose owners include Gregory Jones and Cynthia Dietzmann. Jones worked for Briefing.com for six years until he quit in March 2003 and was a member of its board of directors until April 2003. Dietzmann worked for Briefing.com for seven years until she quit in March 2003. As Briefing.com employees, Jones and Dietzmann had access to confidential business data. For instance, Dietzmann developed a list of contacts through which Briefing.com obtained market information to display online. When Dietzmann quit, she did not return all of the contact information to the company. Briefing.com and Green filed a suit in a federal district court against Jones, Dietzmann, and StreetAccount, alleging that they had appropriated these data and other “trade secrets” to form a competing business. What are trade secrets? Why are they protected? Under what circumstances is a party liable at common law for their appropriation? How should these principles apply in this case? [Briefing.com v. Jones, 2006 WY 16, 126 P.3d 928 (2006)]

8-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Trademarks.

In 1969, Jack Masquelier, a professor of pharmacology, discovered a chemical antioxidant made from the bark of a French pine tree. The substance supposedly assists in nutritional distribution and blood circulation. Horphag Research, Ltd., began to sell the product under the name Pycnogenol, which Horphag registered as a trademark in 1993. Pycnogenol became one of the fifteen best-selling herbal supplements in the United States. In 1999, through the Web site www.healthierlife.com, Larry Garcia began to sell Masquelier’s Original OPCs, a supplement derived from grape pits. Claiming that this product was the “true Pycnogenol,” Garcia used the mark as a meta tag and a generic term, attributing the results of research on Horphag’s product to Masquelier’s and altering quotations from scientific literature to substitute the name of Masquelier’s product for Horphag’s. Customers who purchased Garcia’s product contacted Horphag about it, only to learn that they had not bought Horphag’s product. Others called Horphag to ask whether Garcia “was selling . . . real Pycnogenol.” Horphag filed a suit in a federal district court against Garcia, alleging, among other things, that he was diluting Horphag’s mark. What is trademark dilution? Did it occur here? Explain. [Horphag Research, Ltd. v. Garcia, 475 F.3d 1029 (9th Cir. 2007)]

8-7. Copyright Redwin Wilchcombe is a musician and music producer. In 2002, Wilchcombe met Jonathan Smith, known as Lil Jon, a member of Lil Jon & The East Side Boyz (LJESB). Lil Jon and LJESB are under contract to give TeeVee Toons, Inc. (TVT), all rights to LJESB’s recordings and Lil Jon’s songs. Wilchcombe composed, performed, and recorded a song titled Tha Weedman at Lil Jon’s request, based on his idea, and with his suggestions for LJESB’s album Kings of Crunk. They did not discuss payment and Wilchcombe was not paid, but he was given credit on the album as a producer. By 2005, the album had sold 2 million copies. Wilchcombe filed a suit in a federal district court against TVT and the others, alleging copyright infringement. The defendants asserted that they had a license to use the song. Wilchcombe argued that he had never granted a license to anyone. Do these facts indicate that the defendants had a license to use Wilchcombe's song? If so, what does that mean for Wilchcombe's cause? Explain. [Wilchcombe v. TeeVee Toons, Inc., 555 F.3d 949 (11th Cir. 2009)]

8-8. Trade Secrets Peggy Hamilton was a major shareholder in Carbon Processing and Reclamation (CPR), LLC. After a dispute, she sold her interest in the company and signed a confidentiality agreement not to divulge company business to anyone. A year later, when William Jones, the owner of CPR, left on a trip, he let an employee, Jesse Edwards, drive his company car. There were boxes containing some detailed company records in the car. Edwards and his wife, Channon, were in the middle of a divorce, and she suspected him of hiding financial information from her. When Channon saw the boxes in the car her husband was driving, she got a car key from Hamilton, who still had one from when she was an owner. Channon used the key to get into the boxes of company information. Jones then sued Hamilton for breach of the confidentiality agreement, contending that allowing Channon to have access to the files was assisting in the theft of trade secrets. The trial court dismissed the claim, but Jones appealed. Could Hamilton's actions be the basis for a claim of trade secret violation? What factors should be taken into consideration? [Jones v. Hamilton, ___ So.3d ___ (Ala.Civ.App. 2010)]

8-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Copyright Infringement.

Custom Copies, Inc., in Gainesville, Florida, is a copy shop that, on request, reproduces and distributes, for profit, material published and owned by others. One of the copy shop's primary activities is the preparation and sale of coursepacks, which contain compilations of readings for college courses. For a particular coursepack, a teacher selects the readings and delivers a syllabus to the copy shop, which obtains the materials from a library, copies them, and then binds and sells the copies. Blackwell Publishing, Inc., in Malden, Massachusetts, publishes books and journals in medicine and other fields and owns the copyrights to these publications. Blackwell and others filed a suit in a federal district court against Custom Copies, alleging copyright infringement for its "routine and systematic reproduction of materials from plaintiffs' publications, without seeking permission," to compile coursepacks for classes at the University of Florida. The plaintiffs asked the court to issue an injunction and award them damages, as well the profit from the infringement. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss the complaint. [Blackwell Publishing, Inc. v. Custom Copies, Inc., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (N.D.Fla. 2007)]

- Custom Copies argued, in part, that creating and selling did not "distribute" the coursepacks. Does a copy shop violate copyright law if it only copies materials for coursepacks? Does the copying fall under the "fair use" exception? Should the court grant the defendant's motion? Why or why not?
- What is the potential impact if copies of a book or journal are created and sold without the permission of, and the payment of royalties or a fee to, the copyright owner? Explain.

8-10. VIDEO QUESTION: Protecting Ideas.

Go to this text's Web site at www.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 8." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled The Jerk. Then answer the following questions.

- In the video, Navin (Steve Martin) creates a special handle for Mr. Fox's (Bill Macy's) glasses. Can Navin obtain a patent or a copyright protecting his invention? Explain your answer.
- Suppose that after Navin legally protects his idea, Fox steals it and decides to develop it for himself, without Navin's permission. Has Fox committed infringement? If so, what kind—trademark, patent, or copyright?
- Suppose that after Navin legally protects his idea, he realizes he doesn't have the funds to mass-produce the glasses' special handle. Navin therefore agrees to allow Fox to manufacture the product. Has Navin granted Fox a license? Explain.
- Assume that Navin is able to manufacture his invention. What might Navin do to ensure that his product is identifiable and can be distinguished from other products on the market?

Criminal Law and Cyber Crime

The law imposes various sanctions in an effort to ensure that individuals engaged in business in our society can compete and flourish. These sanctions include those imposed by civil law, such as damages for various types of tortious conduct (see Chapters 6 and 7), damages for breach of contract (see Chapter 18), and the equitable remedies (see Chapters 1 and 18). Additional sanctions are imposed under criminal law. Indeed, many statutes regulating business provide for criminal as well as civil penalties. Therefore, criminal law joins civil law as an important element in the legal environment of business.

In this chapter, after explaining some essential differences between criminal law and civil law, we look at how crimes are classified and at the elements that must be present for criminal liability to exist. We then examine the various categories of crimes, the defenses that can be raised to avoid criminal liability, and the rules of criminal procedure. We conclude the chapter with a discussion of crimes that occur in cyberspace, which are often called cyber crimes. Generally, cyber crime refers more to the way in which particular crimes are committed rather than to a new category of crimes.

CIVIL LAW AND CRIMINAL LAW

Recall from Chapter 1 that civil law pertains to the duties that exist between persons or between persons and their governments. Criminal law, in contrast, has to do with crime. A crime can be defined as a wrong against society proclaimed in a statute and punishable by a fine and/or imprisonment—or, in some cases, death. As mentioned in Chapter 1, because crimes are offenses against society as a whole, they are prosecuted by a public official, such as a district attorney (D.A.) or an attorney general (A.G.), not by the victims. Once a crime has been reported, the D.A. typically has the discretion to decide whether to file criminal charges and also determines to what extent to pursue the prosecution or carry out additional investigation.

Major Differences between Civil Law and Criminal Law

Because the state has extensive resources at its disposal when prosecuting criminal cases, there are numerous procedural safeguards to protect the rights of defendants. We look here at one of these safeguards—the higher burden of proof that applies in a criminal case—as well as the harsher sanctions for criminal acts compared with those for civil wrongs. Exhibit 9–1 summarizes these and other key differences between civil law and criminal law.

BURDEN OF PROOF In a civil case, the plaintiff usually must prove his or her case by a preponderance of the evidence. Under this standard, the plaintiff must convince the court that based on the evidence presented by both parties, it is more likely than not that the plaintiff's allegation is true.

EXHIBIT 9-1 • Key Differences between Civil Law and Criminal Law

ISSUE	CIVIL LAW	CRIMINAL LAW
Party who brings suit	The person who suffered harm.	The state.
Wrongful act	Causing harm to a person or to a person's property.	Violating a statute that prohibits some type of activity.
Burden of proof	Preponderance of the evidence.	Beyond a reasonable doubt.
Verdict	Three-fourths majority (typically).	Unanimous (almost always).
Remedy	Damages to compensate for the harm or a decree to achieve an equitable result.	Punishment (fine, imprisonment, or death).

In a criminal case, in contrast, the state must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. If the jury views the evidence in the case as reasonably permitting either a guilty or a not guilty verdict, then the jury's verdict must be not guilty. In other words, the government (prosecutor) must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant has committed every essential element of the offense with which she or he is charged. If the jurors are not convinced of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, they must find the defendant not guilty. Note also that in a criminal case, the jury's verdict normally must be unanimous—agreed to by all members of the jury—to convict the defendant. (In a civil trial by jury, in contrast, typically only three-fourths of the jurors need to agree.)

CRIMINAL SANCTIONS The sanctions imposed on criminal wrongdoers are also harsher than those that are applied in civil cases. Remember from Chapters 6 and 7 that the purpose of tort law is to enable a person harmed by the wrongful act of another to obtain compensation from the wrongdoer, rather than to punish the wrongdoer. In contrast, criminal sanctions are designed to punish those who commit crimes and to deter others from committing similar acts in the future. Criminal sanctions include fines as well as the much harsher penalty of the loss of one's liberty by incarceration in a jail or prison. Most criminal sanctions also involve probation and sometimes require performance of community service, completion of an educational or treatment program, or payment of restitution. The harshest criminal sanction is, of course, the death penalty.

Civil Liability for Criminal Acts

Some torts, such as assault and battery, provide a basis for a criminal prosecution as well as a civil action in tort. Suppose that Jonas is walking down the street, minding his own business, when a person attacks him. In the ensuing struggle, the attacker stabs Jonas several times, seriously injuring him. A police officer restrains and arrests the assailant. In this situation, the assailant may be subject both to criminal prosecution by the state and to a tort lawsuit brought by Jonas to obtain compensation for his injuries. Exhibit 9-2 on the following page illustrates how the same wrongful act can result in both a civil (tort) action and a criminal action against the wrongdoer.

Classification of Crimes

Depending on their degree of seriousness, crimes are classified as felonies or misdemeanors. Felonies are serious crimes punishable by death or by imprisonment for more than one year.¹ Many states also define different degrees of felony offenses and vary the punishment according to the degree.² For example, most jurisdictions punish a burglary that involves a forced entry into a home at night more harshly than a burglary that takes place during the day and involves a nonresidential building or structure.

Misdemeanors are less serious crimes, punishable by a fine or by confinement for up to a year. In most jurisdictions, petty offenses are considered to be a subset of misdemeanors. Petty offenses are minor violations, such as jaywalking or violations of building codes. Even for petty offenses, however, a

1. Some states, such as North Carolina, consider felonies to be punishable by incarceration for at least two years.
2. Although the American Law Institute issued the Model Penal Code in 1962, it is not a uniform code, and each state has developed its own set of laws governing criminal acts. Thus, types of crimes and prescribed punishments may differ from one jurisdiction to another.

EXHIBIT 9-2 • Civil (Tort) Lawsuit and Criminal Prosecution for the Same Act guilty party can be put in jail for a few days, fined, or both, depending on state or local law. Whether a crime is a felony or a misdemeanor can determine in which court the case is tried and, in some states, whether the defendant has a right to a jury trial.

SECTION 2 CRIMINAL LIABILITY

Two elements normally must exist for a person to be convicted of a crime: (1) the performance of a prohibited act and (2) a specified state of mind, or intent, on the part of the actor. Additionally, to establish criminal liability, there usually must be a concurrency between the act and the intent. In other words, these two elements must occur together.

For example, a woman intends to kill her husband by poisoning him. On the day she plans to do so, she is driving her husband home from work and swerves to avoid hitting a cat crossing the road. As a result, the car crashes into a tree, killing her husband. Even though she had planned to murder her husband, the woman is not guilty of murder in this situation because the two elements did not occur together. The woman did not intend to kill her husband by driving the car into a tree.

The Criminal Act

Every criminal statute prohibits certain behavior. Most crimes require an act of commission—that is, a person must do something in order to be accused of a crime. In criminal law, a prohibited act is referred to as the actus reus,³ or guilty act. In some instances, an act of omission can be a crime, but only when a person has a legal duty to perform the omitted act, such as filing a tax return.

The guilty act requirement is based on one of the premises of criminal law—that a person should be punished for harm done to society. For a crime to exist, the guilty act must cause some harm to a person or to property. Thinking about killing someone or about stealing a car may be morally wrong, but the thoughts do no harm until they are translated into action. Of course, a person can be punished for attempting murder or robbery, but normally only if he or she has taken substantial steps toward the criminal objective.

3. Pronounced ak-tuhs ray-uhs.

State of Mind

A wrongful mental state (mens rea)⁴ is also typically required to establish criminal liability. The required mental state, or intent, is indicated in the applicable statute or law. Murder, for example, involves the guilty act of killing another human being, and the guilty mental state is the desire, or intent, to take another's life. For theft, the guilty act is the taking of another person's property, and the mental state involves both the awareness that the property belongs to another and the desire to deprive the owner of it.

CRIMINAL NEGLIGENCE OR RECKLESSNESS A court can also find that the required mental state is present when a defendant's acts are reckless or criminally negligent. A defendant is criminally reckless if he or she consciously disregards a substantial and unjustifiable risk. Criminal negligence involves the mental state in which the defendant deviates from the standard of care that a reasonable person would use under the same circumstances. The defendant is accused of taking an unjustified, substantial, and foreseeable risk that resulted in harm. Under the Model Penal Code, criminal negligence has occurred if the defendant should have foreseen the risk, even if she or he was not actually aware of it.⁵

A homicide is classified as involuntary manslaughter when it results from an act of criminal negligence and there is no intent to kill. For example, in 2010, Dr. Conrad Murray, the personal physician of pop star Michael Jackson, was charged with involuntary manslaughter after a coroner determined that Jackson's sudden death in 2009 was the result of drug intoxication. Murray had given Jackson propofol, a powerful anesthetic normally used in surgery, as a sleep aid on the night of his death, even though he knew that Jackson had already taken other sedatives.

STRICT LIABILITY AND OVERCRIMINALIZATION In recent years, an increasing number of laws and regulations have imposed criminal sanctions for strict liability crimes—that is, offenses that do not require a wrongful mental state to establish criminal liability. The federal criminal code now lists more than four thousand criminal offenses, many of which do not require a specific mental state. There are also at least ten thousand federal rules that can be enforced through criminal sanctions, and many of these rules do not require intent. Strict liability crimes are particularly common in environmental laws, laws aimed at combatting illegal drugs, and other laws affecting public health, safety, and welfare. Under federal law, for example, tenants can be evicted from public housing if one of their relatives or guests used illegal drugs—regardless of whether the tenant knew or should have known about the drug activity.⁶

Many states have also enacted laws that punish behavior as criminal without the need to show criminal intent. Under Arizona law, for instance, a hunter who shoots an elk outside the area specified by the permit has committed a crime, regardless of the hunter's intent or knowledge of the law.⁷

Although proponents of such laws argue that they are necessary to protect the public and the environment, critics say laws that criminalize conduct without any required intent have led to overcriminalization, or the use of criminal law as the main tool to solve social problems, such as illegal drug use. These critics argue that the removal of the requirement of intent, or malice, from criminal offenses increases the likelihood of people committing crimes unknowingly—and perhaps even innocently. When an honest mistake can lead to a criminal conviction, the idea that crimes are a wrong against society is undermined.

Corporate Criminal Liability

As will be discussed in Chapter 39, a corporation is a legal entity created under the laws of a state. At one time, it was thought that a corporation could not incur criminal liability because, although a corporation is a legal person, it can act only through its agents (corporate directors, officers, and employees). Therefore, the corporate entity itself could not “intend” to commit a crime. Over time, this view has changed. Obviously, corporations cannot be imprisoned, but they can be fined or denied certain legal privileges (such as a license).

LIABILITY OF THE CORPORATE ENTITY Today, corporations normally are liable for the crimes committed by their agents and employees within the course and scope of their employment.⁸ For such criminal liability to be imposed, the prosecutor generally must show that the corporation could have prevented the act or that there was authorized consent to, or knowledge of, the act by persons in supervisory positions within the corporation. In addition, corporations can be criminally liable for failing to perform specific duties imposed by law (such as duties under environmental laws or securities laws).

LIABILITY OF THE CORPORATE OFFICERS AND DIRECTORS Corporate directors and officers are personally liable for the crimes they commit, regardless of whether the crimes were committed for their private benefit or on the corporation's behalf. Additionally, corporate directors and officers may be held liable for the actions of employees under their supervision. Under the responsible corporate officer doctrine, a court may impose criminal liability on a corporate officer despite whether he or she participated in, directed, or even knew about a given criminal violation.

TYPES OF CRIMES

Numerous actions are designated as criminal. Federal, state, and local laws provide for the classification and punishment of hundreds of thousands of different criminal acts. Generally, though, criminal acts can be grouped into five broad categories: violent crime (crimes against persons), property crime, public order crime, white-collar crime, and organized crime. Cyber crime—which consists of crimes committed in cyberspace with the use of computers—is, as mentioned earlier in this chapter, less a category of crime than a new way to commit crime. We will examine cyber crime later in this chapter.

Violent Crime

Certain crimes are called violent crimes, or crimes against persons, because they cause others to suffer harm or death. Murder is a violent crime. So is sexual assault, or rape. Assault and battery, which were discussed in Chapter 6 in the context of tort law, are also classified as violent crimes. Robbery—defined as the taking of money, personal property, or any other article of value from a person by means of force or fear—is also a violent crime. Typically, states have more severe penalties for aggravated robbery—robbery with the use of a deadly weapon.

Each of these violent crimes is further classified by degree, depending on the circumstances surrounding the criminal act. These circumstances include the intent of the person committing the crime, whether a weapon was used, and (for crimes other than murder) the level of pain and suffering experienced by the victim.

Property Crime

The most common type of criminal activity is property crime, in which the goal of the offender is some form of economic gain or the damaging of property. Robbery is a form of property crime, as well as a violent crime, because the offender seeks to gain the property of another. We look here at a number of other crimes that fall within the general category of property crime.

BURGLARY Traditionally, burglary was defined as breaking and entering the dwelling of another at night with the intent to commit a felony. Originally, the definition was aimed at protecting an individual's home and its occupants. Most state statutes have eliminated some of the requirements found in the common law definition. The time of day at which the breaking and entering occurs, for example, is usually immaterial. State statutes frequently omit the element of breaking, and some states do not require that the building be a dwelling. When a deadly weapon is used in a burglary, the perpetrator can be charged with aggravated burglary and punished more severely.

LARCENY Under the common law, the crime of larceny involved the unlawful taking and carrying away of someone else's personal property with the intent to permanently deprive the owner of possession. Put simply, larceny is stealing, or theft. Whereas robbery involves force or fear, larceny does not. Therefore, picking pockets is larceny, not robbery. Similarly, taking an employer's products and supplies home for personal use without permission is larceny. (Note that a person who commits larceny generally can also be sued under tort law because the act of taking possession of another's property involves a trespass to personal property.)

Most states have expanded the definition of property that is subject to larceny statutes. Stealing computer programs may constitute larceny even though the "property" consists of magnetic impulses. The theft of natural gas or Internet and television cable service may also be considered larceny. Trade secrets can be subject to larceny statutes.

The common law distinguished between grand and petit larceny depending on the value of the property taken. Many states have abolished this distinction, but in those that have not, grand larceny (or theft of an item having a value greater than a certain amount) is a felony, and petit larceny is a misdemeanor.

ARSON The willful and malicious burning of a building (and, in some states, personal property) owned by another is the crime of arson. At common law, arson applied only to burning down another person's house. The law was designed to protect human life. Today, arson statutes have been extended to cover the destruction of any building, regardless of ownership, by fire or explosion. Every state has a special statute that covers the act of burning a building for the purpose of collecting insurance. (Of course, the insurer need not pay the claim when insurance fraud is proved.)

RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS It is a crime to receive stolen goods. The recipient of such goods need not know the true identity of the owner or the thief. All that is necessary is that the recipient knows or should know that the goods are stolen, which implies an intent to deprive the owner of those goods.

FORGERY The fraudulent making or altering of any writing (including electronic records) in a way that changes the legal rights and liabilities of another is forgery. If, without authorization, Severson signs Bennett's name to the back of a check made out to Bennett, Severson is committing forgery. Forgery also includes changing trademarks, falsifying public records, counterfeiting, and altering a legal document.

OBTAINING GOODS BY FALSE PRETENSES It is a criminal act to obtain goods by false pretenses, such as buying groceries with a check knowing that one has insufficient funds to cover it. Purchasing goods with someone else's credit-card number without authorization is another example of obtaining goods by false pretenses. Statutes dealing with such illegal activities vary widely from state to state.

Public Order Crime

Historically, societies have always outlawed activities that are considered contrary to public values and morals. Today, the most common public order crimes include public drunkenness, prostitution, gambling, and illegal drug use. These crimes are sometimes referred to as victimless crimes because they normally harm only the offender. From a broader perspective, however, they are deemed detrimental to society as a whole because they may create an environment that gives rise to property and violent crimes.

White-Collar Crime

Crimes occurring in the business context are popularly referred to as white-collar crimes. Although there is no official definition of white-collar crime, the term is commonly used to mean an illegal act or series of acts committed by an individual or business entity using some nonviolent means to obtain a personal or business advantage. Usually, this kind of crime takes place in the course of a legitimate business occupation. Corporate crimes fall into this category. Certain property crimes, such as larceny and forgery, may also be white-collar crimes if they occur within the business context. The crimes discussed next normally occur only in the business context.

EMBEZZLEMENT When a person entrusted with another person's property or funds fraudulently appropriates that property or those funds, embezzlement occurs. Typically, embezzlement is carried out by an employee who steals funds. Banks are particularly prone to this problem, but embezzlement can occur in any firm. In a number of businesses, corporate officers or accountants have fraudulently converted funds for their own benefit and then "fixed" the books to cover up their crime. Embezzlement is not larceny because the wrongdoer does not physically take the property from the possession of another, and it is not robbery because no force or fear is used.

Embezzlement Takes Many Forms. It does not matter whether the embezzler takes the funds from the victim or from a third person. If the financial officer of a large corporation pockets a certain number of checks from third parties that were given to her to deposit into the corporate account, she is embezzling. Even an employer's failure to remit state withholding taxes collected from employees can constitute embezzlement.

CASE IN POINT Dr. Francis H. George owned and operated a medical practice in Virginia. He employed numerous individuals, including nursing assistants, nurse practitioners, and a pediatrician. George withheld funds from his employees' salaries—funds that represented state income taxes owed to Virginia—and deposited them into a bank account that he used to pay his personal and business expenses. He then failed to file withholding tax returns as required by state law and did not send the withheld funds to the state. He was convicted of embezzlement.⁹

Frequently, an embezzler takes a relatively small amount at one time but does so repeatedly over a long period. This might be done by underreporting income or deposits and embezzling the remaining amount, for example, or by creating fictitious persons or accounts and writing checks to them from the corporate account.

Problems with Prosecution. As a practical matter, an embezzler who returns what has been taken may not be prosecuted because the owner is unwilling to take the time to make a complaint, cooperate with the state’s investigative efforts, and appear in court. Also, the owner may not want the crime to become public knowledge. Nevertheless, the intent to return the embezzled property—or its actual return—is not a defense to the crime of embezzlement, as the following case illustrates.

People v. Sisuphan

Court of Appeal of California, First District, 181 Cal.App.4th 800, 104 Cal.Rptr.3d 654 (2010).

JENKINS, J. [Judge]

* * * *

As the Director of Finance at Toyota of Marin (the dealership), [Appellant Lou Surivan] Sisuphan managed the financing contracts for vehicle sales and worked with lenders to obtain payment for these transactions. * * * Sisuphan complained repeatedly to management about the performance and attitude of one of the finance managers, Ian McClelland (McClelland). * * * General manager Michael Christian (Christian) opted not to terminate McClelland “because he brought a lot of money into the dealership.”

On July 3, 2007, McClelland accepted a large payment from customer Jill Peacock for the vehicle she purchased. Peacock gave him $22,600 in cash and two checks totaling $7,275.51. McClelland prepared a receipt, placed the cash, both checks, and a copy of the receipt in a large manila envelope, and took the envelope to the company safe in Sisuphan’s office. McClelland placed the envelope into the hopper at the top of the safe and turned the handle to rotate the hopper and drop its contents down into the safe. The envelope, which was stuffed with a large amount of cash, did not drop all the way down into the safe and became lodged, with a portion “sticking out.” McClelland could not retrieve the envelope or push it completely into the safe, so he decided to cut it and transfer the contents to two envelopes. He * * * asked Sisuphan to keep an eye on the envelope while he went to the showroom. While McClelland was gone, Sisuphan “wiggled” the envelope free, extracted it from the safe, and kept it. When McClelland returned, Sisuphan told him “Hey, no problem, [the envelope] dropped into the safe.”

Dealership bookkeepers regularly collected payments from the safe and cross-checked these against carbon copies of the receipts in the receipt book. On the morning of July 5, 2007, one of the bookkeepers discovered in this manner that the payment for the Peacock purchase was missing. She placed a post-it note for Sisuphan on the corresponding page of the receipt book, inquiring, “Where’s money?” She also notified the controller, the general sales manager, and Christian that a payment was missing. When she asked Sisuphan about the missing payment, “he said they were looking into it.”

* * * Christian followed up with the customer, made a police report, and filed a claim with the dealership’s insurer. He called all the managers together and told them he would not bring criminal charges if the money was returned within twenty-four hours.

On the evening of July 18, 2007, * * * Sisuphan [went] to Christian’s office and admitted that he had taken the money. He claimed he had no intention of stealing it and had taken it to get McClelland fired. He said he had not returned the money during the twenty-four-hour amnesty period because he did not believe Christian’s assurance that no punitive action would be taken.

The next day, Christian terminated Sisuphan’s employment. He prepared a separation report with a narrative that set out the events relating to the missing money and included a summary of Sisuphan's confession. Sisuphan reviewed and signed the report without making any changes and repaid the entire sum of cash he had taken. * * * However, "the checks were lost [and] not returned." The customer stopped payment on both checks and reissued them.

A week later, the district attorney filed a criminal complaint against Sisuphan, asserting a felony offense of embezzlement by an employee of property valued in excess of $400 * * *. The matter proceeded to a jury trial on April 15, 2008, and the jury returned a guilty verdict. In June 2008, the trial court sentenced Sisuphan to 120 days in custody and three years probation. Sisuphan filed a timely notice of appeal from the judgment of conviction.

* * * *

The trial court excluded evidence that Sisuphan returned the money to the dealership, concluding it was not relevant, because return of the property is not a defense to embezzlement. Sisuphan contends that evidence of repayment was relevant to show he lacked fraudulent intent at the time he took the money and asserts, for this reason, that the trial court's ruling violated his Fifth Amendment right to present a defense and "all pertinent evidence of significant value to that defense." [Emphasis added.]

Fraudulent intent is an essential element of embezzlement. Although restoration of the property is not a defense, evidence of repayment may be relevant to the extent it shows that a defendant's intent at the time of the taking was not fraudulent. Such evidence is admissible "only when [a] defendant shows a relevant and probative [tending to prove] link in his subsequent actions from which it might be inferred his original intent was innocent." The question before us, therefore, is whether evidence that Sisuphan returned the money reasonably tends to prove he lacked the requisite intent at the time of the taking. [Emphasis added.]

Section 508 [of the California Penal Code], which sets out the offense of which Sisuphan was convicted, provides: "Every clerk, agent, or servant of any person who fraudulently appropriates to his own use, or secretes with a fraudulent intent to appropriate to his own use, any property of another which has come into his control or care by virtue of his employment * * * is guilty of embezzlement." Sisuphan denies he ever intended "to use the [money] to financially better himself, even temporarily" and contends the evidence he sought to introduce showed "he returned the [money] without having appropriated it to his own use in any way." He argues that this evidence negates fraudulent intent because it supports his claim that he took the money to get McClelland fired and acted "to help his company by drawing attention to the inadequacy and incompetency of an employee." We reject these contentions.

In determining whether Sisuphan's intent was fraudulent at the time of the taking, the issue is not whether he intended to spend the money, but whether he intended to use it for a purpose other than that for which the dealership entrusted it to him. The offense of embezzlement contemplates a principal's entrustment of property to an agent for certain purposes and the agent's breach of that trust by acting outside his authority in his use of the property. * * * Sisuphan's undisputed purpose—to get McClelland fired—was beyond the scope of his responsibility and therefore outside the trust afforded him by the dealership. Accordingly, even if the proffered [submitted] evidence shows he took the money for this purpose, it does not tend to prove he lacked fraudulent intent, and the trial court properly excluded this evidence. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The judgment is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. Given that Sisuphan returned the cash, was it fair of the dealership's general manager to terminate Sisuphan's employment? Why or why not?
2. Why was Sisuphan convicted of embezzlement instead of larceny? What is the difference between these two crimes?

MAIL AND WIRE FRAUD One of the most potent weapons against white-collar criminals is the Mail Fraud Act of 1990.¹⁰ Under this act, it is a federal crime to use the mails to defraud the public. Illegal use of the mails must involve (1) mailing or causing someone else to mail a writing—something written, printed, or photocopied—for the purpose of executing a scheme to defraud and (2) contemplating or organizing a scheme to defraud by false pretenses. If, for example, Johnson advertises by mail the sale of a cure for cancer that he knows to be fraudulent because it has no medical validity, he can be prosecuted for fraudulent use of the mails.

Federal law also makes it a crime (wire fraud) to use wire, radio, or television transmissions to defraud.¹¹ Violators may be fined up to $1,000, imprisoned for up to twenty years, or both. If the violation affects a financial institution, the violator may be fined up to $1 million, imprisoned for up to thirty years, or both.

CASE IN POINT Gabriel Sanchez and Timothy Lyons set up six charities and formed a fund-raising company, North American Acquisitions (NAA), to solicit donations on the charities' behalf through telemarketing. NAA raised more than $6 million, of which less than $5,000 was actually spent on charitable causes. The telemarketers kept 80 percent of the donated funds as commissions, the NAA took 10 percent, and most of the rest of the funds went to Sanchez, who spent it on himself. Lyons and Sanchez were both prosecuted for mail fraud and sentenced to serve fifteen years in prison. They appealed. A federal appellate court affirmed their convictions, ruling that the government can use these antifraud laws to prohibit professional fund-raisers from obtaining funds through false pretenses or by making false statements.¹²

Although most fraudulent schemes involve cheating the victim out of tangible property (funds), it can also be a crime to deprive a person of an intangible right to another's honest services. For a discussion of how federal prosecutors are increasingly charging white-collar criminals with "honest-services fraud," and some recent cases on the topic, see this chapter's Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature.

BRIBERY The crime of bribery involves offering to give something of value to a person in an attempt to influence that person, who usually is (but not always) a public official, to act in a way that serves a private interest. Three types of bribery are considered crimes: bribery of public officials, commercial bribery, and bribery of foreign officials. As an element of the crime of bribery, intent must be present and proved. The bribe itself can be anything the recipient considers to be valuable. Realize that the crime of bribery occurs when the bribe is offered—it is not required that the bribe be accepted. Accepting a bribe is a separate crime.

Commercial bribery involves corrupt dealings between private persons or businesses. Typically, people make commercial bribes to obtain proprietary information, cover up an inferior product, or secure new business. Industrial espionage sometimes involves commercial bribes. For example, a person in one firm may offer an employee in a competing firm some type of payoff in exchange for trade secrets or pricing schedules. So-called kickbacks, or payoffs for special favors or services, are a form of commercial bribery in some situations.

Bribing foreign officials to obtain favorable business contracts is a crime. This crime was discussed in Chapter 5, along with the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977, which was passed to curb the use of bribery by U.S. businesspersons in securing foreign contracts.

BANKRUPTCY FRAUD Federal bankruptcy law (see Chapter 30) allows individuals and businesses to be relieved of oppressive debt through bankruptcy proceedings. Numerous white-collar crimes may be committed during the many phases of a bankruptcy action. A creditor, for example, may file a false claim against the debtor, which is a crime. Also, a debtor may fraudulently transfer assets to favored parties before or after the petition for bankruptcy is filed. For instance, a company-owned automobile may be "sold" at a bargain price to a trusted friend or relative. Closely related to the crime of fraudulent transfer of property is the crime of fraudulent concealment of property, such as the hiding of gold coins.

INSIDER TRADING An individual who obtains "inside information" about the plans of a publicly listed corporation can often make stock-trading profits by purchasing or selling corporate securities based on this information. Insider trading is a violation of securities law and will be considered more fully in Chapter 42. Basically, securities law prohibits a person who possesses inside information and has a duty not to disclose it to outsiders from trading on that information. He or she may not profit from the purchase or sale of securities based on inside information until the information is made available to the public.

THEFT OF OTHER INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY As discussed in Chapter 8, trade secrets constitute a form of intellectual property that for many businesses can be extremely valuable. The Economic Espionage Act of 1996¹³ makes the theft of trade secrets a federal crime. The act also makes it a federal crime to buy or possess another person's trade secrets, knowing that the trade secrets were stolen or otherwise acquired without the owner's authorization.

SHIFTING LEGAL PRIORITIES FOR BUSINESS

Prosecuting White-Collar Crime with the Honest-Services Fraud Law

What do former Enron chief executive officer (CEO) Jeffrey Skilling, former Hollinger International CEO Conrad Black, and former Illinois governor Rod Blagojevich have in common? They, along with thousands of other individuals, have been charged under the “honest-services fraud” law. Indeed, 95 percent of the high-profile, white-collar crime cases in recent years have involved individuals who have been charged under this law.

What Is the Honest-Services Fraud Law?

The honest-services fraud law dates back to 1988 and consists of only twenty-eight words. It is known as Section 1346, which refers to the section of Title XVIII of the United States Code that defines the offense. The law is broad enough to encompass just about every conceivable white-collar criminal act. Consequently, it has allowed federal prosecutors to attempt to impose criminal penalties on a broad swath of misconduct by public officials and employees, as well as private employees and corporate directors and officers. The key to the law is that it requires individuals to provide the “intangible right of honest services” to their employers. Critics point out that the law is used when the purported crime committed is “fuzzy.” When a businessperson is charged with honest-services fraud, there is often a nagging question as to whether the actions involved were truly a crime or just aggressive business behavior.

How Congress Got Involved

Under the U.S. Constitution, the federal government does not have the power to punish fraud directly, but it does have the power to regulate the U.S. mails and interstate commerce. In the 1970s, federal prosecutors started using the federal laws against mail and wire fraud whenever such actions deprived someone of funds or property. Then, a federal prosecutor used the legal theory that a fraudulent action to deprive the public of “honest services” is equivalent to a theft of intangible rights. In 1987, however, the United States Supreme Court rejected this concept of honest services.^a

Not happy with the Court’s ruling, federal prosecutors pleaded with Congress to pass a law. Congress subsequently created a law stating that any scheme to deprive another of honest services will be considered a scheme to defraud. Courts have at times described honest-services fraud as simply the situation in which the public does not get what it wants and deserves—that is, honest, faithful, disinterested services from employees, whether they be public or private.

Interestingly, criminal fraud requires that a victim be cheated out of tangible property, such as money. Honest-services fraud changes that concept. It involves depriving the victim of an intangible right to another’s honest services.

a. McNally v. United States, 483 U.S. 350, 107 S.Ct. 2875, 97 L.Ed.2d 292 (1987).

The Law Has Been Applied Widely

Federal prosecutors have used the honest-services fraud law since 1988 in a variety of situations. In Texas, federal prosecutors successfully brought a charge against three coaches at Baylor University (a private school) for scheming to obtain scholarships for players. In California, federal prosecutors have used the honest-services legal theory to investigate the hierarchy of the Catholic Archdiocese of Los Angeles. Top church officials are being accused of covering up sexual abuse of minors by priests.

The U.S. Supreme Court Decides

In 2010, the United States Supreme Court issued a ruling that could have a major impact on white-collar crime and political fraud cases in the future. The Court ruled that the honest-services fraud law could not be used against Jeffrey Skilling, who had been convicted for his role in the collapse of Enron.^b According to the Court, honest-services fraud can only be applied in cases that involve bribes and kickbacks. Because there was no evidence that Skilling had solicited or accepted side payments from a third party in exchange for making misrepresentations about the company, he did not commit honest-services fraud.

The Court did not overturn Skilling’s conviction, however. Instead, the Court left it up to the lower court to determine whether Skilling’s conviction could be upheld on other grounds. In addition, the Court remanded the honest-services fraud conviction of Conrad Black—the newspaper executive who defrauded his media company—for the same reason.^c In fact, the Court remanded numerous other honest-services fraud cases for reconsideration in light of its decision.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS

Although the Court did not strike down the entire honest-services fraud law, the justices significantly narrowed its scope to prevent it from being unconstitutionally vague. Federal prosecutors can still prosecute businesspersons and managers who solicit or accept bribes or kickbacks for honest-services fraud, though. There are also many other federal and state laws that criminalize fraud and certain wrongful business conduct.

Violations of the Economic Espionage Act can result in steep penalties: imprisonment for up to ten years and a fine of up to $500,000. A corporation or other organization can be fined up to $5 million. Additionally, the law provides that any property acquired as a result of the violation, such as airplanes and automobiles, and any property used in the commission of the violation, such as computer servers and other electronic devices, is subject to criminal forfeiture—meaning that the government can take the property. A theft of trade secrets conducted via the Internet, for example, could result in the forfeiture of every computer or other device used to commit or facilitate the violation as well as any assets gained.

The unauthorized copying and use of intellectual property, such as books, films, music, and software—commonly known as pirating—is also a crime under federal law. It has been estimated that 35 percent of all business software is pirated, as is nearly 90 percent of downloaded music. In the United States, digital pirates can be criminally prosecuted under the Digital Millennium Copyright Act.¹⁴ An individual who violates the act for purposes of financial gain can be imprisoned for up to five years and fined up to $500,000 on a first offense. The punishment doubles for any subsequent offense.

Organized Crime

White-collar crime takes place within the confines of the legitimate business world. Organized crime, in contrast, operates illegitimately by, among other things, providing illegal goods and services. Traditionally, the preferred markets for organized crime have been gambling, prostitution, illegal narcotics, and loan sharking (lending funds at higher-than-legal interest rates), along with more recent ventures into counterfeiting and credit-card scams.

MONEY LAUNDERING The profits from organized crime and illegal activities amount to billions of dollars a year. These profits come from illegal drug transactions and, to a lesser extent, from racketeering, prostitution, and gambling. Under federal law, banks, savings and loan associations, and other financial institutions are required to report currency transactions involving more than $10,000. Consequently, those who engage in illegal activities face difficulties in depositing their cash profits from illegal transactions.

As an alternative to storing cash from illegal transactions in a safe-deposit box, wrongdoers and racketeers have invented ways to launder “dirty” money to make it “clean.” This money laundering is done through legitimate businesses. For example, Harris, a successful drug dealer, becomes a partner with a restaurateur. Little by little, the restaurant shows increasing profits. As a partner in the restaurant, Harris is able to report the “profits” of the restaurant as legitimate income on which he pays federal and state taxes. He can then spend those funds without worrying that his lifestyle may exceed the level possible with his reported income.

RICO In 1970, in an effort to curb the entry of organized crime into the legitimate business world, Congress passed the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) as part of the Organized Crime Control Act.¹⁵ The statute makes it a federal crime to (1) use income obtained from racketeering activity to purchase any interest in an enterprise, (2) acquire or maintain an interest in an enterprise through racketeering activity, (3) conduct or participate in the affairs of an enterprise through racketeering activity, or (4) conspire to do any of the preceding activities.

The broad language of RICO has allowed it to be applied in cases that have little or nothing to do with organized crime. In fact, today the statute is used to attack white-collar crimes more often than organized crime. In addition, RICO creates civil as well as criminal liability.

Criminal Provisions. RICO incorporates by reference twenty-six separate types of federal crimes and nine types of state felonies, including many business-related crimes, such as bribery, embezzlement, forgery, mail and wire fraud, and securities fraud.¹⁶ To prove a “pattern of racketeering activity” for purposes of RICO, prosecutors must show that the defendant committed at least two of these offenses. Any individual who is found guilty is subject to a fine of up to $25,000 per violation, imprisonment for up to twenty years, or both. Additionally, the statute provides that those who violate RICO may be required to forfeit (give up) any assets, in the form of property or cash, that were acquired as a result of the illegal activity or that were “involved in” or an “instrumentality of” the activity.

14. 17 U.S.C. Sections 2301 et seq.

Civil Liability. In the event of a RICO violation, the government can seek civil penalties, including the divestiture of a defendant's interest in a business (called forfeiture) or the dissolution of the business. Moreover, in some cases, the statute allows private individuals to sue violators and potentially recover three times their actual losses (treble damages), plus attorneys' fees, for business injuries caused by a violation of the statute. This is perhaps the most controversial aspect of RICO and one that continues to cause debate in the nation's federal courts. The prospect of receiving treble damages in civil RICO lawsuits has given plaintiffs a financial incentive to pursue businesses and employers for violations.

CASE IN POINT Mohawk Industries, Inc., one of the largest carpeting manufacturers in the United States, was sued by a group of its employees for RICO violations. The employees claimed that Mohawk conspired with recruiting agencies to hire illegal immigrants in an effort to keep labor costs low. The employees argued that this pattern of illegal hiring expanded Mohawk's hourly workforce and resulted in lower wages for the plaintiffs. Mohawk filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that its conduct had not violated RICO. In 2006, however, a federal appellate court ruled that the plaintiffs had presented sufficient evidence of racketeering activity for the case to go to trial.¹⁷

RICO provides for both civil and criminal liability.

SECTION 4

DEFENSES TO CRIMINAL LIABILITY

Persons charged with crimes may be relieved of criminal liability if they can show that their criminal actions were justified under the circumstances. In certain situations, the law may also allow a person to be excused from criminal liability because she or he lacks the required mental state. We look at several defenses to criminal liability here.

Note that procedural violations (such as obtaining evidence without a valid search warrant) may also operate as defenses. Evidence obtained in violation of a defendant's constitutional rights may not be admitted in court. If the evidence is suppressed, then there may be no basis for prosecuting the defendant.

Justifiable Use of Force

Probably the best-known defense to criminal liability is self-defense. Other situations, however, also justify the use of force: the defense of one's dwelling, the defense of other property, and the prevention of a crime. In all of these situations, it is important to distinguish between deadly and nondeadly force. Deadly force is likely to result in death or serious bodily harm. Nondeadly force is force that reasonably appears necessary to prevent the imminent use of criminal force.

Generally speaking, people can use the amount of nondeadly force that seems necessary to protect themselves, their dwellings, or other property, or to prevent the commission of a crime. Deadly force can be used in self-defense only when the defender reasonably believes that imminent death or grievous bodily harm will otherwise result and has no other means of escaping or avoiding the situation. Deadly force normally can be used to defend a dwelling only if the unlawful entry is violent and the person believes deadly force is necessary to prevent imminent death or great bodily harm. In some jurisdictions, however, deadly force can also be used if the person believes it is necessary to prevent the commission of a felony in the dwelling. Note, too, that many states are expanding the situations in which the use of deadly force can be justified.¹⁸

Necessity

Sometimes, criminal defendants can be relieved of liability by showing that a criminal act was necessary to prevent an even greater harm. Suppose that Jack Trevor is a convicted felon and, as such, is legally prohibited from possessing a firearm. While he and his wife are in a convenience store, a man draws a gun, points it at the cashier, and demands all the cash in the register. Afraid that the man will start shooting, Trevor grabs the gun and holds onto it until police arrive. In this situation, if Trevor is charged with possession of a firearm, he can assert the defense of necessity.

Insanity

A person who suffers from a mental illness may be incapable of the state of mind required to commit a crime. Thus, insanity may be a defense to a criminal charge. Note that an insanity defense does not enable a person to avoid imprisonment. It simply means that if the defendant successfully proves insanity, she or he will be placed in a mental institution.

The courts have had difficulty deciding what the test for legal insanity should be, and psychiatrists as well as lawyers are critical of the tests used. Almost all federal courts and some states use the relatively liberal substantial-capacity test set forth in the Model Penal Code:

A person is not responsible for criminal conduct if at the time of such conduct as a result of mental disease or defect he or she lacks substantial capacity either to appreciate the wrongfulness of his [or her] conduct or to conform his [or her] conduct to the requirements of the law.

Some states use the M'Naghten test,¹⁹ under which a criminal defendant is not responsible if, at the time of the offense, he or she did not know the nature and quality of the act or did not know that the act was wrong. Other states use the irresistible-impulse test. A person operating under an irresistible impulse may know an act is wrong but cannot refrain from doing it. Under any of these tests, proving insanity is extremely difficult. For this reason, the insanity defense is rarely used and usually is not successful.

Mistake

Everyone has heard the saying "Ignorance of the law is no excuse." Ordinarily, ignorance of the law or a mistaken idea about what the law requires is not a valid defense. A mistake of fact, however, as opposed to a mistake of law, can excuse criminal responsibility if it negates the mental state necessary to commit a crime. If, for example, Oliver Wheaton mistakenly walks off with Julie Tyson’s briefcase because he thinks it is his, there is no theft. Theft requires knowledge that the property belongs to another. (If Wheaton’s act causes Tyson to incur damages, however, she may sue him in a civil action for trespass to personal property or conversion—torts that were discussed in Chapter 6.)

Duress

Duress exists when the wrongful threat of one person induces another person to perform an act that he or she would not otherwise have performed. In such a situation, duress is said to negate the mental state necessary to commit a crime because the defendant was forced or compelled to commit the act. Duress can be used as a defense to most crimes except murder. Both the definition of duress and the types of crimes that it can excuse vary among the states, however. Generally, to successfully assert duress as a defense, the defendant must reasonably have believed that he or she was in immediate danger, and the jury (or judge) must conclude that the defendant’s belief was reasonable.

Entrapment

Entrapment is a defense designed to prevent police officers or other government agents from enticing persons to commit crimes in order to later prosecute them for those crimes. In the typical entrapment case, an undercover agent suggests that a crime be committed and somehow pressures or induces an individual to commit it. The agent then arrests the individual for the crime. For entrapment to be considered a defense, both the suggestion and the inducement must take place. The defense is not intended to prevent law enforcement agents from setting a trap for an unwary criminal; rather, its purpose is to prevent them from pushing the individual into a criminal act. The crucial issue is whether the person who committed a crime was predisposed to commit the illegal act or did so only because the agent induced it.

Statute of Limitations

With some exceptions, such as the crime of murder, statutes of limitations apply to crimes just as they do to civil wrongs. In other words, the state must initiate criminal prosecution within a certain number of years. If a criminal action is brought after the statutory time period has expired, the accused person can raise the statute of limitations as a defense.

The running of the time period in a statute of limitations may be tolled—that is, suspended or stopped temporarily—if the defendant is a minor or is not in the jurisdiction. When the defendant reaches the age of majority or returns to the jurisdiction, the statute revives, meaning that its time period begins to run or to run again.

Immunity

At times, the state may wish to obtain information from a person accused of a crime. Accused persons are understandably reluctant to give information if it will be used to prosecute them, and they cannot be forced to do so. The privilege against self-incrimination is guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which reads, in part, “nor shall [any person] be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.” In cases in which the state wishes to obtain information from a person accused of a crime, the state can grant immunity from prosecution or agree to prosecute for a less serious offense in exchange for the information. Once immunity is given, the person has an absolute privilege against self-incrimination and therefore can no longer refuse to testify on Fifth Amendment grounds.

Often, a grant of immunity from prosecution for a serious crime is part of the plea bargaining between the defending and prosecuting attorneys. The defendant may be convicted of a lesser offense, while the state uses the defendant’s testimony to prosecute accomplices for serious crimes carrying heavy penalties.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURES

Criminal law brings the force of the state, with all of its resources, to bear against the individual. Criminal procedures are designed to protect the constitutional rights of individuals and to prevent the arbitrary use of power on the part of the government.

The U.S. Constitution provides specific safeguards for those accused of crimes. The United States Supreme Court has ruled that most of these safeguards apply not only in federal court but also in state courts by virtue of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. These protections include the following:

1. The Fourth Amendment protection from unreasonable searches and seizures.

2. The Fourth Amendment requirement that no warrant for a search or an arrest be issued without probable cause.
3. The Fifth Amendment requirement that no one be deprived of “life, liberty, or property without due process of law.”
4. The Fifth Amendment prohibition against double jeopardy (trying someone twice for the same criminal offense).²⁰
5. The Fifth Amendment requirement that no person be required to be a witness against (incriminate) himself or herself.
6. The Sixth Amendment guarantees of a speedy trial, a trial by jury, a public trial, the right to confront witnesses, and the right to a lawyer at various stages in some proceedings.
7. The Eighth Amendment prohibitions against excessive bail and fines and against cruel and unusual punishment.

20. The prohibition against double jeopardy means that once a criminal defendant is found not guilty of a particular crime, the government may not indict that person again and retry him or her for the same crime. The prohibition does not preclude the crime victim from bringing a civil suit against that same person to recover damages, however. Additionally, a state’s prosecution of a crime will not prevent a separate federal prosecution of the same crime, and vice versa.

The Exclusionary Rule

Under what is known as the exclusionary rule, any evidence obtained in violation of the constitutional rights spelled out in the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments generally is not admissible at trial. All evidence derived from the illegally obtained evidence is known as the “fruit of the poisonous tree,” and such evidence normally must also be excluded from the trial proceedings. For example, if a confession is obtained after an illegal arrest, the arrest is the “poisonous tree,” and the confession, if “tainted” by the arrest, is the “fruit.”

The purpose of the exclusionary rule is to deter police from conducting warrantless searches and engaging in other misconduct. The rule is sometimes criticized because it can lead to injustice. Many a defendant has “gotten off on a technicality” because law enforcement personnel failed to observe procedural requirements. Even though a defendant may be obviously guilty, if the evidence of that guilt was obtained improperly (without a valid search warrant, for example), it normally cannot be used against the defendant in court.

If a suspect is arrested on the basis of a police officer’s mistaken belief that there is an outstanding arrest warrant for that individual, should evidence found during a search incident to the arrest be excluded from the trial? This question arose in the following case.

Herring v. United States

Supreme Court of the United States, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 695, 172 L.Ed.2d 496 (2009).

www.findlaw.com/casecode/supreme.html^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • The sheriff’s office in Dale County, Alabama, maintains copies of arrest warrants in a computer database. When a warrant is recalled, Sharon Morgan, the warrant clerk, enters this information in the database and discards the physical copy of the warrant. In July 2004, Sandy Pope, the warrant clerk in the sheriff’s department in neighboring Coffee County, asked Morgan if there were any outstanding arrest warrants for Bennie Herring. Morgan checked her database and told Pope that there was a warrant. Coffee County officers then arrested Herring. A search revealed methamphetamine in his pocket and an illegal gun in his truck. Meanwhile, Morgan discovered that a mistake had been made: the warrant had been recalled. Herring was charged in a federal district court with illegal possession of a gun and drugs. He filed a motion to exclude the evidence on the ground that his arrest had been illegal. The court denied the motion, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the denial, and Herring appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

Chief Justice ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

* * * We have repeatedly rejected the argument that exclusion [of evidence] is a necessary consequence of a Fourth Amendment violation. Instead we have focused on the efficacy [effectiveness] of the rule in deterring Fourth Amendment violations in the future.

In addition, the benefits of deterrence must outweigh the costs. * * * The principal cost of applying the rule is, of course, letting guilty and possibly dangerous defendants go free.

* * * *

* * * Evidence should be suppressed only if it can be said that the law enforcement officer had knowledge, or may properly be charged with knowledge, that the search was unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Indeed, the abuses that gave rise to the exclusionary rule featured intentional conduct that was patently unconstitutional. [Emphasis added.]

* * * An error that arises from nonrecurring and attenuated [diluted] negligence is * * * far removed from the core concerns that led us to adopt the rule in the first place.

To trigger the exclusionary rule, police conduct must be sufficiently deliberate that exclusion can meaningfully deter it, and sufficiently culpable [blameworthy] that such deterrence is worth the price paid by the justice system. As laid out in our cases, the exclusionary rule serves to deter deliberate, reckless, or grossly negligent conduct, or in some circumstances recurring or systemic negligence. The error in this case does not rise to that level.

* * * [In a previous case, we held that] negligent police miscommunications in the course of acquiring a warrant do not provide a basis to rescind a warrant and render a search or arrest invalid. Here, the miscommunications occurred in a different context—after the warrant had been issued and recalled—but that fact should not require excluding the evidence obtained.

* * * *

We do not suggest that all recordkeeping errors by the police are immune from the exclusionary rule. In this case, however, the conduct at issue was not so objectively culpable as to require exclusion.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The United States Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's judgment. The exclusionary rule does not apply when a police mistake leading to an unlawful search is the result of an isolated instance of negligence.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the warrant for Herring's arrest had still been outstanding but had been based on false information. Should the standards applied in this case apply in those circumstances? Explain.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • What does the decision in this case mean for businesses that are subjected to searches by law enforcement personnel?

The Miranda Rule

In regard to criminal procedure, one of the questions many courts faced in the 1950s and 1960s was not whether suspects had constitutional rights—that was not in doubt—but how and when those rights could be exercised. Could the right to be silent (under the Fifth Amendment's protection against self-incrimination) be exercised during pretrial interrogation proceedings or only during the trial?

Were confessions obtained from suspects admissible in court if the suspects had not been advised of their right to remain silent and other constitutional rights?

To clarify these issues, the United States Supreme Court issued a landmark decision in 1966 in Miranda v. Arizona, which we present here. Today, the procedural rights required by the Court in this case are familiar to almost every American.

Miranda v. Arizona

Supreme Court of the United States, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S.Ct. 1602, 16 L.Ed.2d 694 (1966).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • On March 13, 1963, Ernesto Miranda was arrested at his home for the kidnapping and rape of an eighteen-year-old woman. Miranda was taken to a Phoenix, Arizona, police station and questioned by two officers. Two hours later, the officers emerged from the interrogation room with a written confession signed by Miranda. A paragraph at the top of the confession stated that the confession had been made voluntarily, without threats or promises of immunity, and “with full knowledge of my legal rights, understanding any statement I make may be used against me.” Miranda was at no time advised that he had a right to remain silent and a right to have a lawyer present. The confession was admitted into evidence at the trial, and Miranda was convicted and sentenced to prison for twenty to thirty years. Miranda appealed the decision, claiming that he had not been informed of his constitutional rights. The Supreme Court of Arizona held that Miranda’s constitutional rights had not been violated and affirmed his conviction. The Miranda case was subsequently reviewed by the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Mr. Chief Justice WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The cases before us raise questions which go to the roots of our concepts of American criminal jurisprudence; the restraints society must observe consistent with the Federal Constitution in prosecuting individuals for crime.

* * * *

At the outset, if a person in custody is to be subjected to interrogation, he must first be informed in clear and unequivocal terms that he has the right to remain silent.

* * * *

The warning of the right to remain silent must be accompanied by the explanation that anything said can and will be used against the individual in court. This warning is needed in order to make him aware not only of the privilege, but also of the consequences of forgoing it. * * * [Emphasis added.]

The circumstances surrounding in-custody interrogation can operate very quickly to overbear the will of one merely made aware of his privilege by his interrogators. Therefore the right to have counsel present at the interrogation is indispensable to the protection of the Fifth Amendment privilege under the system we delineate today.

In order fully to apprise a person interrogated of the extent of his rights under this system then, it is necessary to warn him not only that he has the right to consult with an attorney, but also that if he is indigent [without funds] a lawyer will be appointed to represent him. * * * The warning of a right to counsel would be hollow if not couched in terms that would convey to the indigent—the person most often subjected to interrogation—the knowledge that he too has a right to have counsel present.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The United States Supreme Court held that Miranda could not be convicted of the crime on the basis of his confession because his confession was inadmissible as evidence. For any statement made by a defendant to be admissible, the defendant must be informed of certain constitutional rights prior to police interrogation. If the accused waives his or her rights to remain silent and to have counsel present, the government must demonstrate that the waiver was made knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently.

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY’S LAW • Despite considerable criticism and later attempts to overrule the Miranda decision through legislation, the requirements stated in this case continue to provide the benchmark by which criminal procedures are judged today. Police officers routinely advise suspects of their “Miranda rights” on arrest. When Ernesto Miranda himself was later murdered, the suspected murderer was “read his Miranda rights.”

CASE 9.3 CONTINUED ♦ THE GLOBAL DIMENSION • The right to remain silent has long been a legal hallmark in Great Britain as well as in the United States. In 1994, however, the British Parliament passed an act that provides that a criminal defendant's silence may be interpreted as evidence of his or her guilt. British police officers are now required, when making an arrest, to inform the suspect, "You do not have to say anything. But if you do not mention now something which you later use in your defense, the court may decide that your failure to mention it now strengthens the case against you. A record will be made of everything you say, and it may be given in evidence if you are brought to trial." Should U.S. law also change to allow a defendant's silence during questioning to be considered as an indication of guilt? Why or why not?

Exceptions to the Miranda Rule

Although the Supreme Court's decision in the Miranda case was controversial, it has survived several attempts by Congress to overrule it.²¹ Over time, however, as part of a continuing attempt to balance the rights of accused persons against the rights of society, the Supreme Court has made a number of exceptions to the Miranda ruling. For example, the Court has recognized a "public safety" exception, holding that certain statements—such as statements concerning the location of a weapon—are admissible even if the defendant was not given Miranda warnings. Additionally, a suspect must unequivocally and assertively ask to exercise her or his right to counsel in order to stop police questioning. Saying, "Maybe I should talk to a lawyer" during an interrogation after being taken into custody is not enough. Police officers are not required to decipher the suspect's intentions in such situations.

Criminal Process

As mentioned earlier in this chapter, a criminal prosecution differs significantly from a civil case in several respects. These differences reflect the desire to safeguard the rights of the individual against the state. Exhibit 9–3 on the next page summarizes the major steps in processing a criminal case. We now discuss three phases of the criminal process—arrest, indictment or information, and trial—in more detail.

ARREST Before a warrant for arrest can be issued, there must be probable cause to believe that the individual in question has committed a crime. As discussed in Chapter 4, probable cause can be defined as a substantial likelihood that the person has committed or is about to commit a crime. Note that probable cause involves a likelihood, not just a possibility. Arrests can be made without a warrant if there is no time to get one, but the action of the arresting officer is still judged by the standard of probable cause.

INDICTMENT OR INFORMATION Individuals must be formally charged with having committed specific crimes before they can be brought to trial. If issued by a grand jury, such a charge is called an indictment.²² A grand jury does not determine the guilt or innocence of an accused party; rather, its function is to hear the state's evidence and to determine whether a reasonable basis (probable cause) exists for believing that a crime has been committed and that a trial ought to be held.

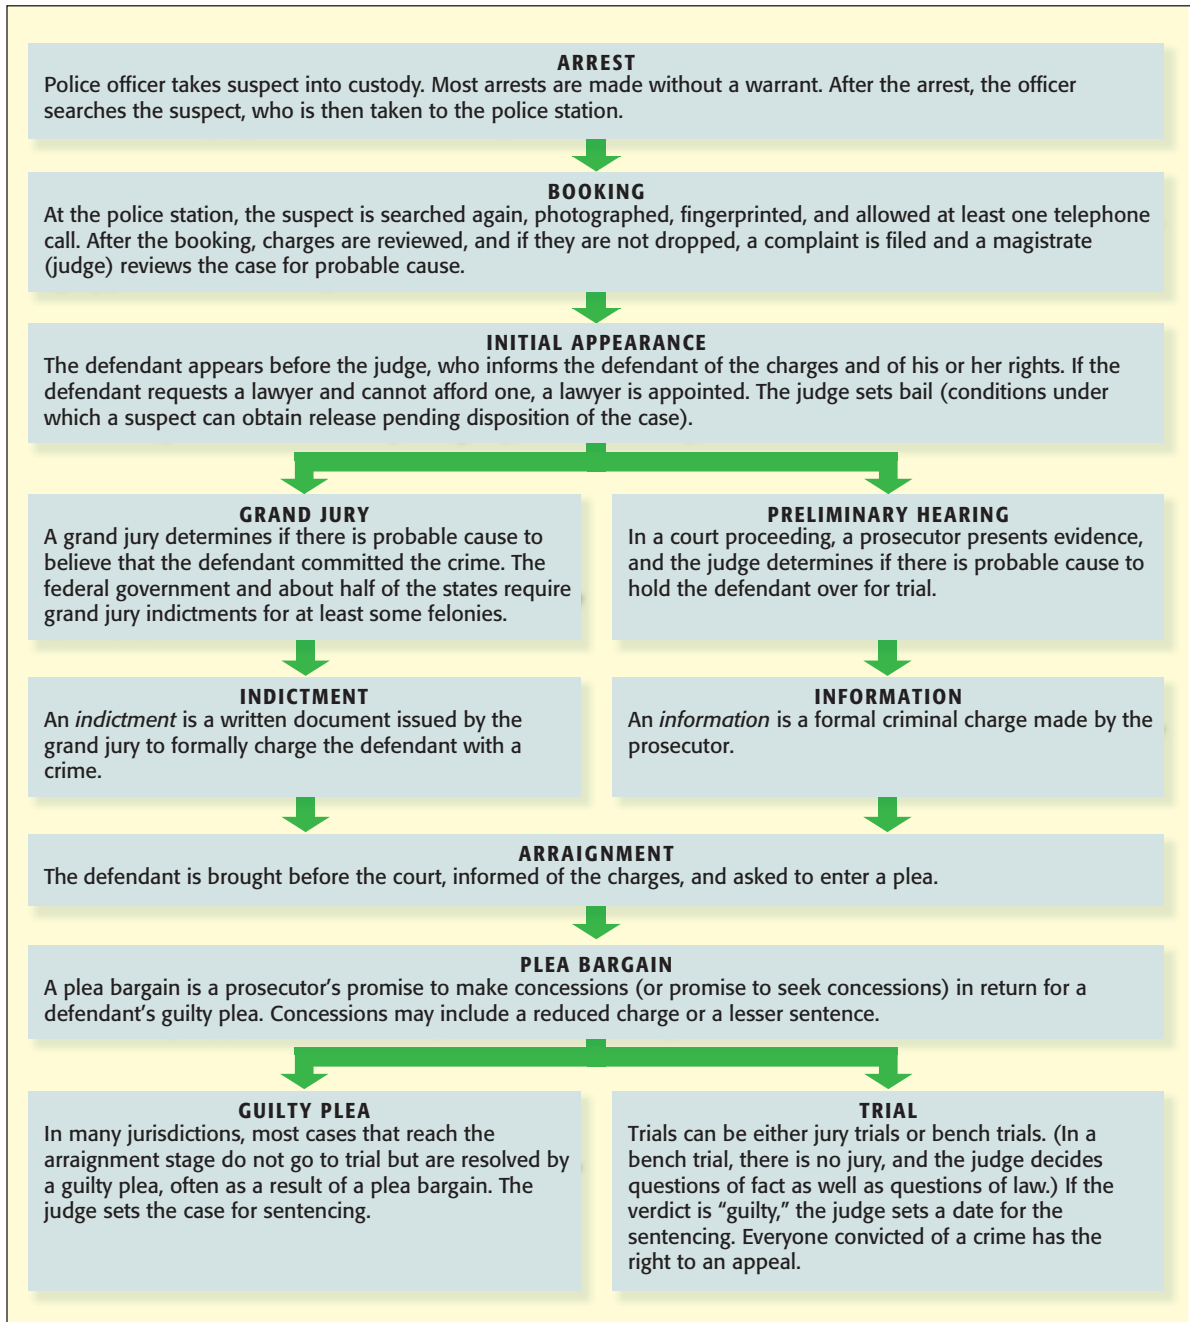

Usually, grand juries are called in cases involving serious crimes, such as murder. For lesser crimes, an individual may be formally charged with a crime by an information, or criminal complaint. An information will be issued by a government prosecutor if the prosecutor determines that there is sufficient evidence to justify bringing the individual to trial.

TRIAL At a criminal trial, the accused person does not have to prove anything; the entire burden of proof is on the prosecutor (the state). As discussed at the beginning of this chapter, the burden of proof is higher in a criminal case than in a civil case. The prosecution must show that, based on all the evidence, the defendant's guilt is established beyond a reasonable doubt. If there is reasonable doubt as to whether a criminal defendant did, in fact, commit the crime with which she or he has been charged, then the verdict must be "not guilty." Note that giving a verdict of "not guilty" is not the same as stating that the defendant is innocent; it merely means that not enough evidence was properly presented to the court to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

Courts have complex rules about what types of evidence may be presented and how the evidence may be brought out in criminal cases, especially in jury trials. These rules are designed to ensure that evidence presented at trials is relevant, reliable, and not prejudicial toward the defendant.

Federal Sentencing Guidelines

In 1984, Congress passed the Sentencing Reform Act. This act created the U.S. Sentencing Commission, which was charged with the task of standardizing sentences for federal crimes. The commission's guidelines, which became effective in 1987, established a range of possible penalties for each federal crime and required the judge to select a sentence from within that range. In other words, the guidelines originally established a mandatory system because judges were not allowed to deviate from the specified sentencing range. Some federal judges felt uneasy about imposing the long prison sentences required by the guidelines on certain criminal defendants, particularly first-time offenders and those convicted in illegal substances cases involving small quantities of drugs.²³

SHIFT AWAY FROM MANDATORY SENTENCING In 2005, the United States Supreme Court held that certain provisions of the federal sentencing guidelines were unconstitutional.

CASE IN POINT Freddie Booker was arrested with 92.5 grams of crack cocaine in his possession. Booker admitted to police that he had sold an additional 566 grams of crack cocaine, but he was never charged with, or tried for, possession of this additional quantity. Nevertheless, under the federal sentencing guidelines the judge was required to sentence Booker to twenty-two years in prison. The Court ruled that this sentence was unconstitutional because a jury did not find beyond a reasonable doubt that Booker had possessed the additional 566 grams of crack.²⁴

Essentially, the Court's ruling changed the federal sentencing guidelines from mandatory to advisory. Depending on the circumstances of the case, a federal trial judge may now depart from the guidelines if she or he believes that it is reasonable to do so.

INCREASED PENALTIES FOR CERTAIN CRIMINAL VIOLATIONS Sentencing guidelines still exist and provide for enhanced punishment for certain types of crimes, including white-collar crimes, violations of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act (discussed in Chapter 5), and violations of securities laws.²⁵

In 2009, the Supreme Court considered the sentencing guidelines again and held that a sentencing judge cannot presume that a sentence within the applicable guidelines is reasonable.²⁶ Before concluding that a particular sentence is reasonable, the court must take into account the various sentencing factors that apply to an individual defendant. When the defendant is a business firm, these factors include the company's history of past violations, management's cooperation with federal investigators, and the extent to which the firm has undertaken specific programs and procedures to prevent criminal activities by its employees.

SECTION 6 CYBER CRIME

The U.S. Department of Justice broadly defines computer crime as any violation of criminal law that involves knowledge of computer technology for its perpetration, investigation, or prosecution. A number of the white-collar crimes discussed earlier in this chapter, such as fraud, embezzlement, and the theft of intellectual property, are now committed with the aid of computers and are thus considered computer crimes.

Many computer crimes fall under the broad label of cyber crime, which describes any criminal activity occurring via a computer in the virtual community of the Internet. Most cyber crimes are not "new" crimes. Rather, they are existing crimes in which the Internet is the instrument of wrongdoing. Here we look at several types of activity that constitute cyber crimes against persons or property. Other cyber crimes will be discussed in later chapters as they relate to particular topics, such as banking or consumer law.

Cyber Fraud

As pointed out in Chapter 6, fraud is any misrepresentation knowingly made with the intention of deceiving another and on which a reasonable person would and does rely to her or his detriment. Cyber fraud, then, is fraud committed over the Internet. Frauds that were once conducted solely by mail or phone can now be found online, and new technology has led to increasingly creative ways to commit fraud.

Sometimes, Internet fraud is just an electronic version of frauds formerly perpetrated by sending letters. For example, the "Nigerian letter fraud scam" is perhaps the longest-running Internet fraud. In this swindle, con artists send e-mails promising the recipients a percentage if they will send funds to help fictitious officials from the African country transfer millions of nonexistent dollars to Western banks. Some versions of the scam reflect current events. In these updated scams, the e-mails may ask for financial help in retrieving the fortune of a loved one or an associate who perished in the conflict in Iraq or Afghanistan or during the earthquake in Haiti.

ONLINE AUCTION FRAUD Online auction fraud, in its most basic form, is a simple process. A person puts up an expensive item for auction, on either a legitimate or a fake auction site, and then refuses to send the product after receiving payment. Or, as a variation, the wrongdoer may provide the purchaser with an item that is worth less than the one offered in the auction. The larger online auction sites, such as eBay, try to protect consumers against such schemes by providing warnings about deceptive sellers or offering various forms of insurance. The nature of the Internet, however, makes it nearly impossible to completely block fraudulent auction activity. Because users can assume multiple identities, it is very difficult to pinpoint fraudulent sellers—they will simply change their screen names with each auction.

ONLINE RETAIL FRAUD Somewhat similar to online auction fraud is online retail fraud, in which consumers pay directly (without bidding) for items that are never delivered. Because most consumers will purchase items only from reputable, well-known sites such as Amazon.com, criminals have had to take advantage of some of the complexities of cyberspace to lure unknowing customers. As with other forms of online fraud, it is difficult to determine the actual extent of online sales fraud, but anecdotal evidence suggests that it is a substantial problem.

CASE IN POINT Jeremy Jaynes grossed more than $750,000 per week selling nonexistent or worthless products such as “penny stock pickers” and “Internet history erasers.” By the time he was arrested, he had amassed an estimated $24 million from his various fraudulent schemes.²⁷

Cyber Theft

In cyberspace, thieves are not subject to the physical limitations of the “real” world. A thief can steal data stored in a networked computer with Internet access from anywhere on the globe. Only the speed of the connection and the thief’s computer equipment limit the quantity of data that can be stolen.

IDENTITY THEFT Not surprisingly, there has been a marked increase in identity theft in recent years. Identity theft occurs when the wrongdoer steals a form of identification—such as a name, date of birth, or Social Security number—and uses the information to access the victim’s financial resources. This crime existed to a certain extent before the widespread use of the Internet. Thieves would rifle through garbage to find credit-card or bank account numbers and then use those numbers to purchase goods or to withdraw funds from the victims’ accounts.

The Internet has provided even easier access to private data. Frequent Web surfers surrender a wealth of information about themselves without knowing it. Many Web sites use “cookies” to collect data on those who visit their sites. The data may include the areas of the site the user visits and the links on which the user clicks. Furthermore, Web browsers often store information such as the consumer’s name and e-mail address. Finally, every time a purchase is made online, the item is linked to the purchaser’s name, allowing Web retailers to amass a database of who is buying what.

PHISHING A distinct form of identity theft known as phishing has added a different wrinkle to the practice. In a phishing attack, the perpetrator “fishes” for financial data and passwords from consumers by posing as a legitimate business, such as a bank or credit-card company. The “phisher” sends an e-mail asking the recipient to update or confirm vital information, often with the threat that an account or some other service will be discontinued if the information is not provided. Once the unsuspecting individual enters the information, the phisher can use it to masquerade as that person or to drain his or her bank or credit account.

VISHING When phishing involves some form of voice communication, the scam is known as vishing. In one variation, the consumer receives an e-mail saying that there is a problem with an account and that she or he should call a certain telephone number to resolve the problem. Sometimes, the e-mail even says that a telephone call is being requested so that the recipient will know that this is not a phishing attempt. Of course, the goal is to get the consumer to divulge passwords and account information during the call. In one scheme, e-mails seemingly from the Federal Bureau of Investigation asked recipients to call a special telephone number and provide account information. The perpetrators of vishing scams use Voice over Internet Protocol (VoIP) service, which enables telephone calls to be made over the Internet, because it is inexpensive and enables them to easily hide their identity.

EMPLOYMENT FRAUD Cyber criminals also look for victims at online job-posting sites. Claiming to be an employment officer in a well-known company, the criminal sends bogus e-mail messages to job seekers. The messages ask the unsuspecting job seekers to reveal enough information to allow for identity theft. As the recession dragged on into 2010 and the unemployment rate continued to rise, opportunities for employment fraud were also on the increase. For example, the job site Monster.com had to ask its 4.5 million users to change their passwords because cyber thieves had broken into its databases and stolen user identities, passwords, and other data. This theft of personal information was one of Britain's largest cyber theft cases.²⁸

CREDIT-CARD CRIME ON THE WEB Credit-card theft was mentioned previously in connection with identity theft. An important point to note, however, is that stolen credit cards are much more likely to hurt merchants and credit-card issuers (such as banks) than consumers. In most situations, the legitimate holders of credit cards are not held responsible for the costs of purchases made with a stolen number (see Chapter 45). That means the financial burden must be borne either by the merchant or by the credit-card company. Most credit-card issuers require merchants to cover the costs—especially if the address to which the goods are sent does not match the billing address of the credit card.

Additionally, companies take risks by storing their online customers' credit-card numbers. In doing so, companies provide quicker service; the consumer can make a purchase by providing a code or clicking on a particular icon without entering a lengthy card number. These electronic warehouses are, however, quite tempting to cyber thieves. Several years ago, for example, an unknown person was able to gain access to computerized records at CardSystems Solutions, a company in Tucson, Arizona, that processes credit-card transactions for small Internet businesses. The breach exposed 40 million credit-card numbers.²⁹

Hacking

A hacker is someone who uses one computer to break into another. The danger posed by hackers has increased significantly because of botnets, or networks of computers that have been appropriated by hackers without the knowledge of their owners. A hacker will secretly install a program on thousands, if not millions, of personal computer “robots,” or “bots,” that allows him or her to forward transmissions to an even larger number of systems.

MALWARE Botnets are one of the latest forms of malware, a term that refers to any program that is harmful to a computer or, by extension, a computer user. A worm, for example, is a software program that is capable of reproducing itself as it spreads from one computer to the next. In 2009, in under three weeks, the computer worm called “Conflicker” spread to more than one million personal computers around the world. It was transmitted to some computers through the use of Facebook and Twitter. This worm also infected servers and devices plugged into infected computers via USB ports, such as iPods and pen drives.

A virus, another form of malware, is also able to reproduce itself, but must be attached to an “infested” host file to travel from one computer network to another. For example, hackers are now capable of corrupting banner ads that use Adobe's Flash Player. When an Internet user clicks on the banner ad, a virus is installed. Worms and viruses can be programmed to perform a number of functions, such as prompting host computers to continually “crash” and reboot, or otherwise infect the system.

NEW SERVICE-BASED HACKING AVAILABLE AT LOW COST A recent trend in business computer applications is the use of “software as a service.” Instead of buying software to install on a computer, the user connects to Web-based software. The user can write e-mails, edit spreadsheets, and the like using his or her Web browser. Cyber criminals have adapted this method and now offer “crimeware as a service.”

A would-be thief no longer has to be a computer hacker to create a botnet or steal banking information and credit-card numbers. He or she can rent the online services of cyber criminals to do the work on such sites as NeoSploit. The thief can even target individual groups, such as U.S. physicians or British attorneys. The cost of renting a Web site to do the work is only a few cents per target computer.

29. The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) brought charges against the company, which ultimately reached a settlement with the FTC.

CYBERTERRORISM Hackers who break into computers without authorization often commit cyber theft, but sometimes their principal aim is to prove how smart they are by gaining access to others' password-protected computers. Cyberterrorists are hackers who, rather than trying to gain attention, strive to remain undetected so that they can exploit computers for a serious impact. Just as "real" terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center towers and a portion of the Pentagon on September 11, 2001, cyberterrorists might explode "logic bombs" to shut down central computers. Such activities obviously can pose a danger to national security.

Cyberterrorists as well as hackers may target businesses. The goals of a hacking operation might include a wholesale theft of data, such as a merchant's customer files, or the monitoring of a computer to discover a business firm's plans and transactions. A cyberterrorist might also want to insert false codes or data. For example, the processing control system of a food manufacturer could be changed to alter the levels of ingredients so that consumers of the food would become ill.

A cyberterrorist attack on a major financial institution, such as the New York Stock Exchange or a large bank, could leave securities or money markets in flux and seriously affect the daily lives of millions of citizens. Similarly, any prolonged disruption of computer, cable, satellite, or telecommunications systems due to the actions of expert hackers would have serious repercussions on business operations—and national security—on a global level.

Prosecution of Cyber Crime

The "location" of cyber crime (cyberspace) has raised new issues in the investigation of crimes and the prosecution of offenders. A threshold issue is, of course, jurisdiction. A person who commits an act against a business in California, where the act is a cyber crime, might never have set foot in California but might instead reside in New York, or even in Canada, where the act may not be a crime. If the crime was committed via e-mail, the question arises as to whether the e-mail would constitute sufficient minimum contacts (see Chapter 2) for the victim's state to exercise jurisdiction over the perpetrator.

Identifying the wrongdoer can also be difficult. Cyber criminals do not leave physical traces, such as fingerprints or DNA samples, as evidence of their crimes. Even electronic "footprints" can be hard to find and follow. For example, e-mail may be sent through a remailer, an online service that guarantees that a message cannot be traced to its source.

For these reasons, laws written to protect physical property are often difficult to apply in cyberspace. Nonetheless, governments at both the state and the federal level have taken significant steps toward controlling cyber crime, both by applying existing criminal statutes and by enacting new laws that specifically address wrongs committed in cyberspace.

The Computer Fraud and Abuse Act

Perhaps the most significant federal statute specifically addressing cyber crime is the Counterfeit Access Device and Computer Fraud and Abuse Act of 1984 (commonly known as the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, or CFAA).³⁰ Among other things, this act provides that a person who accesses a computer online, without authority, to obtain classified, restricted, or protected data (or attempts to do so) is subject to criminal prosecution. Such data could include financial and credit records, medical records, legal files, military and national security files, and other confidential information in government or private computers. The crime has two elements: accessing a computer without authority and taking the data.

This theft is a felony if it is committed for a commercial purpose or for private financial gain, or if the value of the stolen data (or computer time) exceeds $5,000. Penalties include fines and imprisonment for up to twenty years. A victim of computer theft can also bring a civil suit against the violator to obtain damages, an injunction, and other relief.

REVIEWING

Criminal Law and Cyber Crime

Edward Hanousek worked for Pacific & Arctic Railway and Navigation Company (P&A) as a roadmaster of the White Pass & Yukon Railroad in Alaska. Hanousek was responsible "for every detail of the safe and efficient maintenance and construction of track, structures and marine facilities of the entire railroad," including special projects. One project was a rock quarry, known as "6-mile," above the Skagway River. Next to the quarry, and just beneath the surface, ran a high-pressure oil pipeline owned by Pacific & Arctic Pipeline, Inc., P&A's sister company. When the quarry's backhoe operator punctured the pipeline, an estimated 1,000 to 5,000 gallons of oil were discharged into the river. Hanousek was charged with negligently discharging a harmful quantity of oil into a navigable water of the United States in violation of the criminal provisions of the Clean Water Act (CWA). Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did Hanousek have the required mental state (mens rea) to be convicted of a crime? Why or why not?
2. Which theory discussed in the chapter would enable a court to hold Hanousek criminally liable for violating the statute regardless of whether he participated in, directed, or even knew about the specific violation?
3. Could the backhoe operator who punctured the pipeline also be charged with a crime in this situation? Explain.
4. Suppose that at trial, Hanousek argued that he should not be convicted because he was not aware of the requirements of the CWA. Would this defense be successful? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

9-1. Types of Cyber Crimes The following situations are similar, but each represents a variation of a particular crime. Identify the crime and point out the differences in the variations.

- (a) Chen, posing fraudulently as Diamond Credit Card Co., sends an e-mail to Emily, stating that the company has observed suspicious activity in her account and has frozen the account. The e-mail asks her to reregister her credit-card number and password to reopen the account.
- (b) Claiming falsely to be Big Buy Retail Finance Co., Conner sends an e-mail to Dino, asking him to confirm or update his personal security information to prevent his Big Buy account from being discontinued.
- (c) Felicia posts her résumé on GotWork.com, an online job-posting site, seeking a position in business and managerial finance and accounting. Hayden, who misrepresents himself as an employment officer with International Bank & Commerce Corp., sends her an e-mail asking for more personal information.

9-2. Property Crimes Which, if any, of the following crimes necessarily involves illegal activity on the part of more than one person?

- (a) Bribery
- (b) Forgery
- (c) Embezzlement
- (d) Larceny
- (e) Receiving stolen property

9-3. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Cyber Scam.

Kayla, a student at Learnwell University, owes $20,000 in unpaid tuition. If Kayla does not pay the tuition, Learnwell will not allow her to graduate. To obtain the funds to pay the debt, she sends e-mail letters to people that she does not personally know asking for financial help to send Milo, her disabled child, to a special school. In reality, Kayla has no children. Is this a crime? If so, which one?

- For a sample answer to Question 9-3, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

9-4. Exclusionary Rule While Charles McFarland was incarcerated in a state prison, two officers questioned him about his connection to a handgun that had been used to shoot two other officers. McFarland was advised of his rights but was not asked whether he was willing to waive those rights. Instead, to induce McFarland to speak, the officers deceived him into believing that “[n]obody is going to give you charges.” McFarland made incriminating admissions and was indicted for possessing a handgun as a convicted felon. Should McFarland’s statements be suppressed—that is, not be treated as admissible evidence at trial—because he was not asked whether he was willing to waive his rights prior to making his self-incriminating statements? Why or why not? [United States v. McFarland, 424 F.Supp.2d 427 (N.D.N.Y. 2006)]

9-5. White-Collar Crime Helm Instruction Co. in Maumee, Ohio, makes custom electrical control systems. In September 1998, Helm hired Patrick Walsh to work as comptroller. Walsh soon developed a close relationship with Richard Wilhelm, Helm’s president, who granted Walsh’s request to hire Shari Price as an assistant. Wilhelm was not aware that Walsh and Price were engaged in an extramarital affair. Over the next five years, Walsh and Price spent more than $200,000 of Helm’s money on themselves. Among other things, Walsh drew unauthorized checks on Helm’s accounts to pay his personal credit cards and issued to Price and himself unauthorized salary increases, overtime payments, and tuition reimbursement payments, altering Helm’s records to hide the payments. After an investigation, Helm officials confronted Walsh. He denied the affair with Price, claimed that his unauthorized use of Helm’s funds was an “interest-free loan,” and argued that it was less of a burden on the company to pay his credit cards than to give him the salary increases to which he felt he was entitled. Did Walsh commit a crime? If so, what crime did he commit? Discuss. [State v. Walsh, 113 Ohio App.3d 1515, 866 N.E.2d 513 (6 Dist. 2007)]

9-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Credit Cards.

9-7. Intellectual Property Jiri Klimecek was a member of a group that overrode copyright protection in movies, video games, and software, and made them available for download online. Klimecek bought and installed hardware and software to set up a computer server and paid half of the monthly service charges to connect the server to the Internet. He knew that users around the world could access the server to upload and download copyrighted works. He obtained access to Czech movies and music to make them available. Klimecek was indicted in a federal district court for copyright infringement. He claimed that he did not understand the full scope of the operation. Did Klimecek commit a crime? If so, was he a “minor participant” entitled to a reduced sentence? Explain. [United States v. Klimecek, ___ F.3d ___ (7th Cir. 2009)]

9-8. Fourth Amendment Three police officers, including Maria Trevizo, were on patrol in Tucson, Arizona, near a neighborhood associated with the Crips gang, when they pulled over a car with suspended registration. Each officer talked to one of the three occupants. Trevizo spoke with Lemon Johnson, who was wearing clothing consistent with Crips membership. Visible in his jacket pocket was a police scanner, and he said that he had served time in prison for burglary. Trevizo asked him to get out of the car and patted him down “for officer safety.” She found a gun. Johnson was charged in an Arizona state court with illegal possession of a weapon. What standard should apply to an officer’s patdown of a passenger during a traffic stop? Should a search warrant be required? Could a search proceed solely on the basis of probable cause? Would a reasonable suspicion short of probable cause be sufficient? Discuss. [Arizona v. Johnson, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 781, 172 L.Ed.2d 694 (2009)]

9-9. Sentencing Guidelines Paul Wilkinson worked for a company that sold fuel to various military bases. He paid an employee of a competitor to provide him with information about bids for contracts for which both companies were bidding. The information enabled Wilkinson to rig the bids and win contracts. When the scam was uncovered, he was indicted for conspiracy to defraud the government, to commit wire fraud, and to steal trade secrets. He pleaded guilty to the charges under a plea arrangement. Given the nature of the offenses, the federal sentencing guidelines provide for a prison term of fifty-one to sixty-three months with no possibility of probation. Due to Wilkinson's cooperation, the prosecution recommended fifty-one months. His attorney argued for a term of ten to sixteen months. The judge sentenced Wilkinson to three years' probation and eight hundred hours of community service, but no prison term. The government appealed, arguing that the sentence was too light in violation of the sentencing guidelines. Can a trial judge give such a light sentence under the sentencing guidelines? Explain your answer. [United States v. Wilkinson, 590 F.3d 259 (4th Cir. 2010)]

9–10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Identity Theft.

*Davis Omole had good grades in high school, played on the football and chess teams, and went on to college. Twenty-year-old Omole was also one of the chief architects of a scheme through which more than one hundred individuals were defrauded. Omole worked at a cell phone store where he stole customers' personal information. He and others used the stolen identities to create one hundred different accounts on eBay, through which they held more than three hundred auctions listing for sale items that they did not own and did not intend to sell—cell phones, plasma televisions, stereos, and more. They collected $90,000 through these auctions. To avoid getting caught, they continuously closed and opened the eBay accounts, activated and deactivated cell phone and e-mail accounts, and changed mailing addresses and post office boxes. Omole, who had previously been convicted in a state court for Internet fraud, was convicted in a federal district court of identity theft and wire fraud. [United States v. Omole, 523 F.3d 691 (7th Cir. 2008)]*

- (a) Before Omole's trial, he sent e-mails to his victims ridiculing them and calling them stupid for having been cheated. During his trial, he displayed contempt for the court. What do these factors show about Omole's ethics?
- (b) Under the federal sentencing guidelines, Omole could have been imprisoned for more than eight years, but he received a sentence of only three years, two of which were the mandatory sentence for identity theft. Was this sentence too lenient? Explain.

Go to this text's Web site at www.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 9." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Twelve Angry Men. Then answer the following questions.

- (a) The jurors are deliberating on whether to convict the defendant. One juror says that at the beginning of the trial he felt that the defendant was guilty and that "nobody proved otherwise." Does a criminal defendant have to offer evidence of his or her innocence? What must the prosecution show to establish that a defendant is guilty? How does the burden of proof differ in criminal and civil cases?
- (b) It is clear that all of the jurors except one (Henry Fonda) believe that the defendant is guilty. How many jurors does it usually take to render a verdict in a criminal case?
- (c) When the holdout juror says that under the U.S. Constitution "the defendant does not even have to open his mouth," to which provision is he referring?
- (c) Is it wrong for a group of jurors to bully or persuade another juror of the defendant's guilt or innocence? Explain.

UNIT TWO • FOCUS ON ETHICS

Ethics and Torts and Crimes

Ethical and legal concepts are often closely intertwined. This is because the common law, as it evolved in England and then in America, reflected society's values and customs. This connection between law and ethics is clearly evident in the area of tort law, which provides remedies for harms caused by actions that society has deemed wrongful. Criminal law is also rooted in common law concepts of right and wrong behavior, although common law concepts governing criminal acts are now expressed in, or replaced by, federal, state, and local criminal statutes. The number of torts and crimes has continued to expand as new ways to commit wrongs have been discovered.

The laws governing torts, crimes, and intellectual property—the areas of law covered in this unit—constitute an important part of the legal environment of business. In each of these areas, new legal (and ethical) challenges have emerged as a result of developments in technology. Today, we are witnessing some of the challenges posed by the use of new communications networks, particularly the Internet. In this Focus on Ethics feature, we look at the ethical dimensions of selected topics discussed in the preceding chapters, including some issues that are unique to the cyber age.

Privacy Rights in an Online World

Privacy rights are protected under constitutional law, tort law, and various federal and state statutes. How to protect privacy rights in the online world, though, has been a recurring problem over the past decade. One difficulty is that individuals today often are not even aware that information about their personal lives and preferences is being collected by Internet companies and other online users. Nor do they know how that information will be used. "Cookies" installed in computers may allow users' Web movements to be tracked. Google now offers a Gmail service that automatically scans and saves information about its users. Persons who purchase goods from online merchants or auctions inevitably must reveal some personal information, often including their credit-card numbers.

The Increased Value of Personal Information One of the major concerns of consumers in recent years has been the collection and sale of their personal information—sometimes even by third parties with whom the consumers have never had dealings. This information has become increasingly valuable to online marketers, who are willing to pay a high price to those who collect and sell it. Because of consumers' concerns—and the possibility of lawsuits based on privacy laws—businesses marketing goods online need to exercise care. Today, many online businesses create and post on their Web sites a privacy policy disclosing how any information obtained from their customers will be used.

Privacy Rights in the Workplace Another area of concern is the extent to which employees' privacy rights should be protected in the workplace. Traditionally, employees have been afforded a certain "zone of privacy" in the workplace. For example, the courts have concluded that employees have a reasonable expectation of privacy with respect to personal items contained in their desks or in their lockers. Should this zone of privacy extend to personal e-mail sent via the employer's computer system? This question and others relating to employee privacy rights in today's cyber age will be discussed in greater detail in Chapter 34, in the context of employment law.

Should Civil Liberties Be Sacrificed to Control Crime and Terrorist Activities in the Cyber Age?

In an era when criminal conspirators and terrorists use the Internet to communicate and even to recruit new members, an issue that has come to the forefront is whether it is possible to control many types of crime and terrorist activities without sacrificing some civil liberties. Governments in certain countries, such as Russia, have succeeded in controlling online criminal communications to some extent by monitoring the e-mail and other electronic transmissions of users of specific Internet service providers. In the United States, however, any government attempt to monitor Internet use to detect criminal conspiracies or terrorist activities does not sit well with the American people. The traditional attitude has been that civil liberties must be safeguarded to the greatest extent feasible.

After the terrorist attacks in September 2001, Congress enacted legislation—including the USA Patriot Act, mentioned in Chapter 4—that gave law enforcement personnel more authority to conduct electronic surveillance, such as monitoring Web sites and e-mail exchanges. For a time, it seemed that the terrorist attacks might have made Americans more willing to trade off some of their civil liberties for greater national security. Today, though, many complain that this legislation has gone too far in curbing traditional civil liberties guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. As terrorists find more ways of using the Internet for their purposes, determining the degree to which individuals should sacrifice personal freedoms in exchange for greater protection will likely become even more difficult.

Global Companies and Censorship Issues—Google China

Doing business on a global level can sometimes involve serious ethical challenges. Consider the ethical firestorm that erupted when Google, Inc., decided to market "Google China" (Google.cn) in 2006. This version of Google's widely used search engine was tailored to the Chinese government's censorship requirements. In China, Web sites that offer pornography, criticism of the government, or information on sensitive topics, such as the Tiananmen Square massacre in 1989, are censored—that is, they cannot be accessed by Web users. Government agencies enforce the censorship and encourage citizens to inform on one another. Thousands of Web sites are shut down each year, and the sites' operators are subject to potential imprisonment.

The Chinese government insists that in restricting access to certain Web sites, it is merely following the lead of other national governments, which also impose controls on information access. As an example, it cites France, which bans access to any Web sites selling or displaying Nazi paraphernalia. The United States itself prohibits the dissemination of certain types of materials, such as child pornography, over the Internet. Furthermore, the U.S. government monitors Web sites and e-mail communications to protect against terrorist threats. How, ask Chinese officials, can other nations point their fingers at China for engaging in a common international practice?

Censorship—The Lesser of Two Evils? Human rights groups came out strongly against Google's decision, maintaining that the company was seeking profits in a lucrative marketplace at the expense of assisting the Chinese Communist Party in suppressing free speech. Google defended its actions by pointing out that its Chinese search engine at least lets users know which sites are being censored. Google China includes the links to censored sites, but when a user tries to access a link, the program states that it is not accessible.

Google claimed that its approach was essentially the "lesser of two evils": if U.S. companies did not cooperate with the Chinese government, Chinese residents would have less user-friendly Internet access. Moreover, Google asserted that providing Internet access, even if censored, is a step toward more open access in the future because technology is, in itself, a revolutionary force.

China's Cyberattack and Google's Response

Google's attitude changed in late 2009 when it discovered that its software had been the target of a cyber-attack that apparently originated in China. David Drummond, senior vice president of corporate development and Google's chief legal officer, informed the public about the attack in an article on the official Google blog on January 12, 2010. Drummond described the attack as "highly sophisticated" and said that it was not limited to Google—some twenty other large companies were similarly targeted. According to Drummond, a primary goal of the attackers apparently was to access the Gmail accounts of Chinese human rights activists. Google also discovered that the accounts of dozens of human rights advocates in the United States, China, and Europe had routinely been accessed by third parties.

Drummond said that the attacks and the surveillance that the investigation has uncovered have led Google to announce a change in its China policy: "We have decided we are no longer willing to continue censoring our results on Google.cn . . . We recognize that this may well mean having to shut down Google.cn."¹ In March 2010, Google stopped operating Google.cn and automatically redirected users to its Hong Kong servers at Google.com.hk for search services in Chinese.

Although the Chinese government censors results on Google's Hong Kong servers, it nonetheless found Google's auto-redirect policy unacceptable and threatened to revoke Google's license. In June 2010, Google again revised its policy so that it no longer auto-redirects Chinese users to the Hong Kong servers. Instead, Google directs Chinese users to a Web page at which they must elect to use the Hong Kong servers. In addition, Google reopened Google China to host minimal searches for content that does not require censorship—such as for maps, music, and translation services.

Proponents of human rights applauded Google's efforts to avoid censorship of its search content, but others are not so sure. If Google and similar companies refuse to cooperate with governments that engage in censorship, will this transform the World Wide Web? Will the information highway of the future be forced to stop at national borders?

Do Gun Makers Have a Duty to Warn?

One of the issues facing today's courts is how tort law principles apply to harms caused by guns. Across the nation, many plaintiffs have filed negligence actions against gun manufacturers, claiming that gun makers have a duty to warn users of their products of the dangers associated with gun use. Would it be fair to impose such a requirement on gun manufacturers? Some say no, because such dangers are open and obvious. (Recall from Chapter 7 that, generally, there is no duty to warn of open and obvious dangers.) Others contend that warnings could prevent numerous gun accidents.

State courts addressing this issue generally have ruled that manufacturers have no duty to warn users of the obvious risks associated with gun use. For example, New York's highest court has held that a gun manufacturer's duty of care does not extend to those who are injured by the illegal use of handguns.² Some courts, however, have held that gun makers whose marketing or sales practices cause a large influx of guns into the illegal secondary market could be liable under a public nuisance theory.³

Pharmacies and the Duty of Care

A significant issue that has surfaced in recent years has to do with whether pharmacies should have a duty of care to third parties. In other words, should pharmacies that dispense mind-altering drugs to known drug abusers be liable to third parties who are injured as a result of the drug users' actions?

The Sanchez Case This question came to the fore in a case heard by the Nevada Supreme Court in 2009. The case involved a woman, Patricia Copening, who, while under the influence of the psychotropic drug hydrocodone, caused a car accident that killed Gregory Sanchez, Jr., and seriously injured another person. Copening was arrested and spent nine months in jail.

The families of Sanchez and the injured person sued Copening and, among others, several pharmacies that had filled her prescriptions. These pharmacies had all been notified earlier by the Nevada Prescription Controlled Substance Abuse Prevention Task Force that Copening had obtained approximately 4,500 hydrocodone pills at thirteen different pharmacies between May 2002 and May 2003. The families argued that this notification had created a duty of care on the part of the pharmacies and that they had breached this duty by filling Copening's prescriptions. The trial court disagreed and granted summary judgment for the defendant pharmacies. On appeal, the Nevada Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's decision—the pharmacists owed no duty to third parties.⁴

The Controversy Continues The Nevada Supreme Court's opinion did little to stem the controversy over this issue. For those who argue that such a duty should be imposed, however, Nevada's high court did hold out some hope. In a footnote to the opinion, the court noted that at the time of the accident in 2004, the task force had never advised pharmacies what, if anything, they should do with the information they received about potential drug abusers. In 2006, however, the Nevada Board of Pharmacy amended its regulations to add detailed instructions on what pharmacists should do in similar situations. The court stated that this change in the regulations "may have created a special relationship that could justify imposing a duty in favor of third parties."

Those who argue against such a duty include, of course, pharmacists and pharmacies. According to Jesse Vivian, a professor in the Department of Pharmacy Practice at Wayne State University in Detroit, had the court held that pharmacies owe a specific duty to protect the general public from the actions of drug-abusing patients, this would have created a zone of risk that would be impossible to define. Such a decision would open the door to unimaginable claims against pharmacies.

Trademark Protection versus Free Speech Rights

Another legal issue involving questions of fairness pits the rights of trademark owners against the right to free speech. The issue is whether a company's ownership rights in a trademark used as a domain name outweigh the free speech rights of others who use a similar domain name to criticize or parody the company. A common tactic of those critical of a company's goods or services is to add the word sucks or stinks (or some other disparaging term) to the trademark owner's domain name.

A number of companies have sued the owners of such sites for trademark infringement in the hope that a court or an arbitrating panel will order the site owner to cease using the domain name. To date, though, companies have had little success pursuing this alternative. After all, one of the primary reasons trademarks are protected under U.S. law is to prevent customers from becoming confused about the origin of the goods for sale—and a "sucks" site certainly does not create such confusion.

Furthermore, U.S. courts and arbitrators give extensive protection to free speech rights, including the right to express opinions about companies and their products.⁵ Even international arbitration panels, when hearing disputes between U.S. parties, give U.S. constitutional law protecting speech significant weight. Consider a case brought before an arbitrating panel of the WIPO (World Intellectual Property Organization) Arbitration and Mediation Center in 2009. In that case, a Web site was created to parody the Sutherland Institute, a Utah public-policy think tank using the domain name sutherlandinstitute.org.

The parodying site's Web site was at sutherlandinstitute.com, and its home page closely resembled that of the Sutherland Institute. Even though the parodying site's domain name and parts of its Web site were confusingly similar to those of the Sutherland Institute, the WIPO panelists refused to transfer the domain name to the institute. The panelists stated that they "would not rule that the domain name was used in bad faith because the two organizations were from the United States and the U.S. Constitution protects the right to free speech."⁶

Trade Secrets versus Free Speech Rights

Another ongoing issue with ethical dimensions involves the point at which free speech rights come into conflict with the right of copyright holders to protect their property by using encryption technology. This issue came before the California Supreme Court in the case of DVD Copy Control Association v. Bunner.⁷ Trade associations in the movie industry sued an Internet Web site operator who had posted the code of a computer program that cracked technology used to encrypt DVDs. This posed a significant threat to the movie industry because, by using the code-cracking software, users would be able to duplicate the copyrighted movies stored on the DVDs.

In their suit, the trade associations claimed that the Web site operator had misappropriated trade secrets. The defendant argued that software programs designed to break encryption programs were a form of constitutionally protected speech. When the case reached the California Supreme Court, the court held that although the First Amendment applies to computer code, computer code is not a form of "pure speech," and the courts can therefore protect it to a lesser extent. The court reinstated a trial court order that enjoined (prevented) the Web site operator from continuing to post the code.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Some observers maintain that privacy rights are quickly becoming a thing of the past. In your opinion, is it possible to protect privacy rights in today's online world?
2. Many argue that the federal government should not be allowed to monitor the Internet activities and e-mail exchanges of its citizens without obtaining a warrant. Yet others maintain that in some situations, when time is of the essence, such monitoring may be necessary to keep Americans safe from terrorists. Where should the line be drawn between justifiable and unjustifiable governmental interference with American citizens' civil liberties?
3. Do companies that do business on a global level, such as Google, have an ethical duty to foreign citizens not to suppress free speech, or is it acceptable to censor the information that they provide in other nations at the request of a foreign government?
4. In your opinion, should gun manufacturers have a duty to warn gun users of the dangers of using guns? Would such a warning be effective in preventing gun-related accidents?
5. Generally, do you believe that the law has struck a fair balance between the rights of intellectual property owners and the rights of the public?

CHAPTER 10

Nature and Terminology

The noted legal scholar Roscoe Pound once said that “[t]he social order rests upon the stability and predictability of conduct, of which keeping promises is a large item.”¹ Contract law deals with, among other things, the formation and keeping of promises. A promise is a person’s manifestation of an intent to act or refrain from acting in a specified way.

1. Roscoe Pound, Jurisprudence, Vol. 3 (St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co., 1959), p. 162.

Like other types of law, contract law reflects our social values, interests, and expectations at a given point in time. It shows, for example, to what extent our society allows people to make promises or commitments that are legally binding. It distinguishes between promises that create only moral obligations (such as a promise to take a friend to lunch) and promises that are legally binding (such as a promise to pay for merchandise purchased).

Contract law also demonstrates which excuses our society accepts for breaking certain types of promises. In addition, it indicates which promises are considered to be contrary to public policy—against the interests of society as a whole—and therefore legally invalid. When the person making a promise is a child or is mentally incompetent, for example, a question will arise as to whether the promise should be enforced. Resolving such questions is the essence of contract law.

AN OVERVIEW OF CONTRACT LAW

Before we look at the numerous rules that courts use to determine whether a particular promise will be enforced, it is necessary to understand some fundamental concepts of contract law. In this section, we describe the sources and general function of contract law and introduce the objective theory of contracts.

Sources of Contract Law

The common law governs all contracts except when it has been modified or replaced by statutory law, such as the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC),² or by administrative agency regulations. Contracts relating to services, real estate, employment, and insurance, for example, generally are governed by the common law of contracts.

Contracts for the sale and lease of goods, however, are governed by the UCC—to the extent that the UCC has modified general contract law. The relationship between general contract law and the law governing sales and leases of goods will be explored in detail in Chapter 19. In the discussion of general contract law that follows, we indicate in footnotes the areas in which the UCC has significantly altered common law contract principles.

The Function of Contract Law

No aspect of modern life is entirely free of contractual relationships. You acquire rights and obligations, for example, when you borrow funds, when you buy or lease a house, when you obtain insurance, and when you purchase goods or services. Contract law is designed to provide stability and predictability, as well as certainty, for both buyers and sellers in the marketplace.

Contract law deals with, among other things, the formation and enforcement of agreements between parties (in Latin, pacta sunt servanda—“agreements shall be kept”). Clearly, many promises are kept because the parties involved feel a moral obligation to keep them or because keeping a promise is in their mutual self-interest. The promisor (the person making the promise) and the promisee (the person to whom the promise is made) may also decide to honor their agreement for other reasons. In business agreements, the rules of contract law are often followed to avoid potential disputes.

By supplying procedures for enforcing private contractual agreements, contract law provides an essential condition for the existence of a market economy. Without a legal framework of reasonably assured expectations within which to make long-run plans, businesspersons would be able to rely only on the good faith of others. Duty and good faith are usually sufficient to obtain compliance with a promise, but when price changes or adverse economic factors make compliance costly, these elements may not be enough. Contract law is necessary to ensure compliance with a promise or to entitle the innocent party to some form of relief.

The Definition of a Contract

A contract is “a promise or a set of promises for the breach of which the law gives a remedy, or the performance of which the law in some way recognizes as a duty.”³ Put simply, a contract is a legally binding agreement between two or more parties who agree to perform or to refrain from performing some act now or in the future. Generally, contract disputes arise when there is a promise of future performance. If the contractual promise is not fulfilled, the party who made it is subject to the sanctions of a court (see Chapter 18). That party may be required to pay damages for failing to perform the contractual promise; in a few instances, the party may be required to perform the promised act.

3. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 1. As mentioned in Chapter 1, Restatements of the Law are scholarly books that restate the existing common law principles distilled from court opinions as a set of rules on a particular topic. Courts often refer to the Restatements for guidance. The Restatement of the Law of Contracts was compiled by the American Law Institute in 1932. The Restatement, which is now in its second edition (a third edition is being drafted), will be referred to throughout the following chapters on contract law.

The Objective Theory of Contracts

In determining whether a contract has been formed, the element of intent is of prime importance. In contract law, intent is determined by what is called the objective theory of contracts, not by the personal or subjective intent, or belief, of a party. The theory is that a party's intention to enter into a legally binding agreement, or contract, is judged by outward, objective facts as interpreted by a reasonable person, rather than by the party's own secret, subjective intentions. Objective facts include (1) what the party said when entering into the contract, (2) how the party acted or appeared (intent may be manifested by conduct as well as by oral or written words), and (3) the circumstances surrounding the transaction.

CASE IN POINT Linear Technology Corporation (LTC) makes and sells integrated circuits for use in cell phones and computers. LTC sued its competitor, Micrel, Inc., for patent infringement of a particular chip. In its defense, Micrel claimed that LTC's patent was invalid because LTC had offered to sell the chip commercially before the date on which it could be legally sold. The issue was whether LTC had entered into sales contracts when it solicited input on pricing and accepted distributors' purchase orders using a “will advise” procedure before the critical date. The court ruled that under the objective theory of contracts, no reasonable customer could interpret LTC's requests for information about pricing and potential orders as an offer that could bind LTC to a sale. Therefore, LTC did not violate the ban on sales and could continue its suit against Micrel for patent infringement.⁴

We will also look at the objective theory of contracts in Chapter 11, in the context of contract formation.

SECTION 2 ELEMENTS OF A CONTRACT

The many topics that will be discussed in the following chapters on contract law require an understanding of the basic elements of a valid contract and the way in which a contract is created. It is also necessary to understand the types of circumstances in which even legally valid contracts will not be enforced.

4. Linear Technology Corp. v. Micrel, Inc., 275 F.3d 1040 (Fed.Cir. 2001).

Requirements of a Valid Contract

The following list briefly describes the four requirements that must be met before a valid contract exists. If any of these elements is lacking, no contract will have been formed. (Each requirement will be explained more fully in subsequent chapters.)

1. Agreement. An agreement to form a contract includes an offer and an acceptance. One party must offer to enter into a legal agreement, and another party must accept the terms of the offer.
2. Consideration. Any promises made by the parties to the contract must be supported by legally sufficient and bargained-for consideration (something of value received or promised, such as money, to convince a person to make a deal).
3. Contractual capacity. Both parties entering into the contract must have the contractual capacity to do so; the law must recognize them as possessing characteristics that qualify them as competent parties.
4. Legality. The contract's purpose must be to accomplish some goal that is legal and not against public policy.

Defenses to the Enforceability of a Contract

Even if all of the requirements listed above are satisfied, a contract may be unenforceable if the following requirements are not met. These requirements typically are raised as defenses to the enforceability of an otherwise valid contract.

1. Voluntary consent. The consent of both parties must be voluntary. For example, if a contract was formed as a result of fraud, undue influence, mistake, or duress, the contract may not be enforceable (see Chapter 14).

2. Form. The contract must be in whatever form the law requires; for example, some contracts must be in writing to be enforceable (see Chapter 15).

SECTION 3 TYPES OF CONTRACTS

There are many types of contracts. In this section, you will learn that contracts can be categorized based on legal distinctions as to formation, performance, and enforceability.

Contract Formation

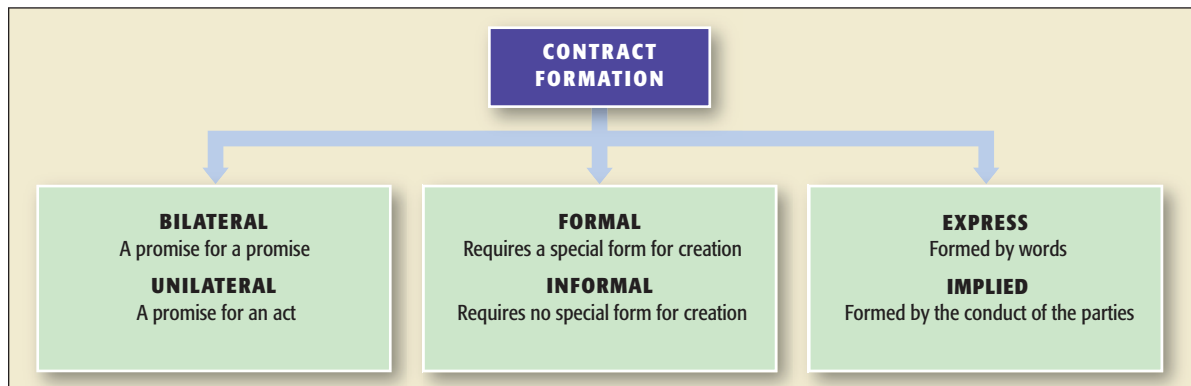

Contracts can be classified according to how and when they are formed. Exhibit 10–1 shows three such classifications, and the following subsections explain them in greater detail.

BILATERAL VERSUS UNILATERAL CONTRACTS Every contract involves at least two parties. The offeror is the party making the offer. The offeree is the party to whom the offer is made. Whether the contract is classified as bilateral or unilateral depends on what the offeree must do to accept the offer and bind the offeror to a contract.

Bilateral Contracts. If the offeree can accept simply by promising to perform, the contract is a bilateral contract. Hence, a bilateral contract is a “promise for a promise.” No performance, such as payment of funds or delivery of goods, need take place for a bilateral contract to be formed. The contract comes into existence at the moment the promises are exchanged.

For example, Javier offers to buy Ann’s digital camcorder for $200. Javier tells Ann that he will give her the $200 for the camcorder next Friday, when he gets paid. Ann accepts Javier's offer and promises to give him the camcorder when he pays her on Friday. Javier and Ann have formed a bilateral contract.

Unilateral Contracts. If the offer is phrased so that the offeree can accept the offer only by completing the contract performance, the contract is a unilateral contract. Hence, a unilateral contract is a “promise for an act.”⁵ In other words, the time of contract formation in a unilateral contract is not the moment when promises are exchanged but the moment when the contract is performed. For example, Reese says to Celia, “If you drive my car from New York to Los Angeles, I’ll give you $1,000.” Only on Celia’s completion of the act—bringing the car to Los Angeles—does she fully accept Reese’s offer to pay $1,000. If she chooses not to accept the offer to drive the car to Los Angeles, there are no legal consequences.

CASE IN POINT Applicants for vacancies in the police department in Providence, Rhode Island, first completed a series of tests. The city then sent the most qualified applicants a letter that said it was “a conditional offer of employment” and informed the applicants that they could attend the police training academy if they passed a medical exam. Meanwhile, a new chief of police revised the selection process and rejected some of those who had received this letter. The rejected applicants sued, claiming that the city had breached its contract. The court held that the letter was a unilateral offer that the plaintiffs had accepted by passing the required medical exam. As a remedy for the breach, the court ordered the city to allow the plaintiffs to attend the police academy.⁶

5. Clearly, a contract cannot be one sided, because by definition an agreement implies the existence of two or more parties. Therefore, the phrase unilateral contract, if read literally, is a contradiction in terms. As traditionally used in contract law, however, the phrase refers to the kind of contract that results when only one promise is being made (the promise made by the offeror in return for the offeree’s performance).

Contests, lotteries, and other competitions involving prizes are examples of offers to form unilateral contracts. If a person complies with the rules of the contest—such as by submitting the right lottery number at the right place and time—a unilateral contract is formed, binding the organization offering the prize to a contract to perform as promised in the offer. If the person fails to comply with the contest rules, however, no binding contract is formed. See this chapter’s Insight into Ethics feature for a discussion of whether a company can change the advertised prize after the contestants have completed the contest.

6. Ardito v. City of Providence, 263 F.Supp.2d 358 (D.R.I. 2003).

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

Is It Right for a Company to Change the Prize Offered in a Contest?

Courts have historically treated contests as unilateral contracts. Unilateral contracts typically cannot be modified by the offeror after the offeree has begun to perform. But this principle may not apply to contest terms if the company sponsoring the contest reserves the right to cancel the contest or change its terms at any time, as Donna Englert learned to her dismay.

Englert entered the “Quarter Million Dollar Challenge” contest sponsored by Nutritional Sciences, LLC. Contestants were to use Nutritional Sciences’ products and training plans for thirteen weeks to lose weight and get fit. A panel of judges would then pick winners in certain categories based on their success in transforming their bodies. When Englert was chosen as female runner-up in her age group, she thought that she would receive the advertised prize of $1,500 cash and $500 worth of Nutritional Sciences’ products. Instead, the company sent her a “challenge winner agreement” for $250 cash and $250 worth of products. Englert refused to sign the agreement and filed a lawsuit alleging breach of contract. The state trial court dismissed her claim, and she appealed.

The state appellate court observed that the contestant’s compliance with the rules of a contest is necessary to form a binding unilateral contract. Here, the contest rules stipulated that “all winners must agree to the regulations outlined specifically for winners before claiming championship or money.” Next to this statement was an asterisk corresponding to a note reserving the right of Nutritional Sciences to cancel the contest or alter its terms at any time. Because of this provision, the court ruled that Nutritional Sciences did not breach the contract when it changed the cash prize from $1,500 to $250.^a

INSIGHT INTO THE SOCIAL ENVIRONMENT

Why would a company that changes its advertised prizes have to worry about its reputation?

a. Englert v. Nutritional Sciences, LLC, 2008 WL 4416597 (Ohio App. 2008).

Revocation of Offers for Unilateral Contracts.

A problem arises in unilateral contracts when the promisor attempts to revoke (cancel) the offer after the promisee has begun performance but before the act has been completed. The promisee can accept the offer only on full performance, and under traditional contract principles, an offer may be revoked at any time before the offer is accepted. The present-day view, however, is that an offer to form a unilateral contract becomes irrevocable—cannot be revoked—once performance has begun. Thus, even though the offer has not yet been accepted, the offeror is prohibited from revoking it for a reasonable time period.

For instance, recall the earlier example in which a car is to be driven from New York to Los Angeles. Now suppose that Celia is driving through Nevada and is only a few hundred miles from Los Angeles when Reese calls her on her cell phone and says, “I revoke my offer.” Under traditional contract law, Reese’s revocation would terminate the offer. Under the modern view of unilateral contracts, however, Reese will not be able to revoke his offer because Celia has undertaken performance and has driven more than 2,500 miles. In these circumstances, Celia can finish driving to Los Angeles and bind Reese to the contract.

FORMAL VERSUS INFORMAL CONTRACTS Another classification system divides contracts into formal contracts and informal contracts. Formal contracts are contracts that require a special form or method of creation (formation) to be enforceable.⁷ One example is negotiable instruments, which include checks, drafts, promissory notes, and certificates of deposit (as will be discussed in Chapter 24). Negotiable instruments are formal contracts because, under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), a special form and language are required to create them. Letters of credit, which are frequently used in international sales contracts (see Chapter 23), are another type of formal contract. Letters of credit are agreements to pay contingent on the purchaser’s receipt of invoices and bills of lading (documents evidencing receipt of, and title to, goods shipped).

Informal contracts (also called simple contracts) include all other contracts. No special form is required (except for certain types of contracts that must be in writing), as the contracts are usually based on their substance rather than their form.

Typically, businesspersons put their contracts in writing to ensure that there is some proof of a contract’s existence should disputes arise.

EXPRESS VERSUS IMPLIED CONTRACTS Contracts may also be categorized as express or implied. We look here at the differences between these two types of contracts.

Express Contracts. In an express contract, the terms of the agreement are fully and explicitly stated in words, oral or written. A signed lease for an apartment or a house is an express written contract. If one classmate calls another on the phone and agrees to buy his textbooks from last semester for $300, an express oral contract has been made.

Implied Contracts. A contract that is implied from the conduct of the parties is called an implied contract or an implied-in-fact contract. This type of contract differs from an express contract in that the conduct of the parties, rather than their words, creates and defines the terms of the contract. (Note that a contract may be a mixture of an express contract and an implied contract. In other words, a contract may contain some express terms, while others are implied.)

CASE IN POINT Lamar Hopkins hired Uhrhahn Construction & Design, Inc., for several projects in building his home. For each project, the parties signed a written contract that was based on a cost estimate and specifications and that required changes to the agreement to be in writing. While the work was in progress, however, Hopkins repeatedly asked Uhrhahn to deviate from the contract specifications, which Uhrhahn did. None of these requests was made in writing. One day, Hopkins asked Uhrhahn to use Durisol blocks instead of the cinder blocks specified in the original contract, indicating that the cost would be the same. Uhrhahn used the Durisol blocks but demanded extra payment when it became clear that the Durisol blocks were more complicated to use. Although Hopkins had paid for the other deviations from the contract that he had orally requested, he refused to pay Uhrhahn for the substitution of the Durisol blocks. Uhrhahn sued for breach of contract. The court found that Hopkins, through his conduct, had waived the provision requiring written contract modification and created an implied contract to pay the extra cost of installing the Durisol blocks.⁸

7. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 6, which explains that formal contracts include (1) contracts under seal, (2) recognizances, (3) negotiable instruments, and (4) letters of credit.

8. Uhrhahn Construction & Design, Inc. v. Hopkins, 179 P.3d 808 (Utah App. 2008).

Requirements for Implied Contracts. For an implied contract to arise, certain requirements must be met. Normally, if the following conditions exist, a court will hold that an implied contract was formed:

1. The plaintiff furnished some service or property.
2. The plaintiff expected to be paid for that service or property, and the defendant knew or should have known that payment was expected.
3. The defendant had a chance to reject the services or property and did not.

Suppose that you need an accountant to complete your tax return this year. You’ve noticed that there is an accountant’s office in your neighborhood. You drop by the firm’s office, explain your problem to an accountant, and learn what fees will be charged. The next day, you return and give the receptionist all of the necessary information and documents, such as W-2 forms. Then you walk out the door without saying anything expressly to the accountant. In this situation, you have entered into an implied contract to pay the accountant the usual and reasonable fees for her services. The contract is implied by your conduct and by hers. She expects to be paid for completing your tax return, and by bringing in the records she will need to do the work, you have implied an intent to pay her.

Contract Performance

Contracts are also classified according to the degree to which they have been performed. A contract that has been fully performed on both sides is called an executed contract. A contract that has not been fully performed by the parties is called an executory contract. If one party has fully performed but the other has not, the contract is said to be executed on the one side and executory on the other, but the contract is still classified as executory.

For example, Jackson, Inc., agreed to buy ten tons of coal from the Northern Coal Company. Northern delivered the coal to Jackson’s steel mill, where it is being burned. At this point, the contract is executed on the part of Northern and executory on Jackson’s part. After Jackson pays Northern, the contract will be executed on both sides.

Contract Enforceability

A valid contract has the elements necessary to entitle at least one of the parties to enforce it in court. Those elements, as mentioned earlier, consist of (1) an agreement, including an offer and an acceptance of that offer; (2) support by legally sufficient consideration; (3) parties who have the legal capacity to enter into the contract; and (4) a legal purpose. As you can see in Exhibit 10–2, valid contracts may be enforceable, voidable, or unenforceable. Additionally, a contract may be referred to as a void contract. We look next at the meaning of the terms voidable, unenforceable, and void in relation to contract enforceability.

VOIDABLE CONTRACTS A voidable contract is a valid contract but one that can be avoided at the option of one or both of the parties. The party having the option can elect either to avoid any duty to perform or to ratify (make valid) the contract. If the contract is avoided, both parties are released from it. If it is ratified, both parties must fully perform their respective legal obligations.

As you will read in Chapter 13, contracts made by minors, mentally incompetent persons, and intoxicated persons may be voidable. For example, contracts made by minors generally are voidable at the option of the minor (with certain exceptions). Additionally, contracts entered into under fraudulent conditions are voidable at the option of the defrauded party. Contracts entered into under legally defined duress or undue influence are also voidable (see Chapter 14).

UNENFORCEABLE CONTRACTS An unenforceable contract is one that cannot be enforced because of certain legal defenses against it. It is not unenforceable because a party failed to satisfy a legal requirement of the contract; rather, it is a valid contract rendered unenforceable by some statute or law. For example, certain contracts must be in writing (see Chapter 15), and if they are not, they will not be enforceable except in certain exceptional circumstances.

VOID CONTRACTS A void contract is no contract at all. The terms void and contract are contradictory. A void contract produces no legal obligations on any of the parties. For example, a contract can be void because one of the parties was adjudged by a court to be legally insane (and thus lacked the legal capacity to enter into a contract—see Chapter 13) or because the purpose of the contract was illegal.

To review the various types of contracts, see Concept Summary 10.1.

SECTION 4 QUASI CONTRACTS

Express contracts and implied contracts are actual or true contracts formed by the words or actions of the parties. Quasi contracts, or contracts implied in law, are not actual contracts. The word quasi is Latin for “as if” or “analogous to.” Quasi contracts are not true contracts because they do not arise from any agreement, express or implied, between the parties themselves. Rather, quasi contracts are fictional contracts that courts can impose on the parties “as if” the parties had entered into an actual contract. They are equitable rather than legal contracts.

Usually, quasi contracts are imposed to avoid the unjust enrichment of one party at the expense of another. The doctrine of unjust enrichment is based on the theory that individuals should not be allowed to profit or enrich themselves inequitably at the expense of others. When the court imposes a quasi contract, a plaintiff may recover in quantum meruit,⁹ a Latin phrase meaning “as much as he or she deserves.” Quantum meruit essentially describes the extent of compensation owed under a contract implied in law.

For example, a vacationing physician is driving down the highway and finds Potter lying unconscious on the side of the road. The physician renders medical aid that saves Potter’s life. Although the injured, unconscious Potter did not solicit the medical aid and was not aware that the aid had been rendered, Potter received a valuable benefit, and the requirements for a quasi contract were fulfilled. In such a situation, the law will impose a quasi contract, and Potter normally will have to pay the physician for the reasonable value of the medical services rendered.

The following case illustrates an application of the principle of quantum meruit.

CASE 10.1 Scheerer v. Fisher

www.nccourts.org^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In January 2007, David Scheerer, a licensed real estate agent, told Jack Fisher, the manager of Renaissance Ventures, LLC, that two parcels of property were for sale. Fisher asked Scheerer to investigate the costs of developing the properties, which Scheerer did. After Scheerer had negotiated the terms of sale with the owners of the properties, Fisher executed purchase contracts for the properties for a combined price of $20 million. The contracts stated that the sellers of the properties would pay Scheerer a 2 percent commission. Fisher, who had previously dealt with Scheerer, orally promised to pay Scheerer a 2 percent commission for his role as Fisher’s buying agent. In April 2007, through no fault of Scheerer or the sellers, Fisher and Renaissance rescinded (canceled) the offers to buy the properties. Shortly thereafter, Fisher arranged for Anthony Antonio to purchase the properties for substantially less than $20 million and then assign the new purchase contracts to Fisher. (To assign is to transfer rights to another—see Chapter 16.) Scheerer and the property sellers had no knowledge of the relationship between Fisher and Antonio. Indeed, during this time, Fisher continued to discuss with Scheerer the amount Fisher would subsequently offer the original sellers for the purchase of the properties and the timing of this subsequent offer. After Antonio bought the properties, he assigned the contracts to Fisher, at which point, Scheerer learned of the relationship. Scheerer, who received no commission from the buyers, only from the sellers, sued Fisher for breach of implied contract and to recover in quantum meruit for his services. The trial court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim, and Scheerer appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

CALABRIA, Judge.

* * * *

Plaintiffs [Scheerer and his real estate company] argue that the trial court erred in dismissing their claim of quantum meruit for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. We agree.

* * * *

“Recovery in quantum meruit will not be denied where a contract may be implied from the proven facts but the express contract alleged is not proved.” The rationale for allowing a plaintiff to plead both breach of express contract and breach of implied contract is that if the plaintiff “fail[s] to prove the existence of an express contract, [he or] she is not foreclosed from recovery in quantum meruit if a contract can be implied and the reasonable value of [his or] her services can be drawn from the evidence.”

To recover in quantum meruit, plaintiff[s] must show: (1) services were rendered to defendants; (2) the services were knowingly and voluntarily accepted; and (3) the services were not given gratuitously. In short, if plaintiff[s] alleged and proved acceptance of services and the value of those services, [they were] entitled to go to the jury on quantum meruit. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The allegations stated by plaintiffs * * *, taken as true, show: (1) plaintiffs provided services to defendants; (2) defendants knowingly and voluntarily accepted the services; (3) plaintiffs did not perform these services gratuitously; (4) defendants were ready, willing and able buyers and in fact closed on the properties after rescinding the first contract and arranging for Antonio to purchase and assign the properties. More importantly, after rescinding the contract but prior to closing, defendant Fisher continued to mislead plaintiffs by continuing discussions for submitting subsequent offers to purchase the properties. The undisputed facts establish conduct demonstrating that defendants took action to deny Scheerer compensation that was earned for the services he rendered. Although the original contract he negotiated failed to close, the law implies a promise to pay some reasonable compensation for services rendered. Plaintiffs' allegations state a valid claim for relief in quantum meruit.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The North Carolina appellate court reversed the trial court's decision and reinstated the case. The plaintiffs had stated a valid claim for recovery in quantum meruit.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that Fisher had not ultimately obtained the properties (through Antonio and the assignment) and had shown no further interest in the properties after he had rescinded the first contract. Would Scheerer still have had a valid claim against Fisher for recovery in quantum meruit? Why or why not?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Was Fisher's unethical behavior (in misleading Scheerer into believing that he was still interested in making a subsequent offer on the properties) a factor in the court's decision? Explain.

Limitations on Quasi-contractual Recovery

Although quasi contracts exist to prevent unjust enrichment, the party obtaining the enrichment is not held liable in some situations. Basically, a party who has conferred a benefit on someone else unnecessarily or as a result of misconduct or negligence cannot invoke the principle of quasi contract. The enrichment in those situations will not be considered “unjust.”

CASE IN POINT Qwest Wireless, LLC, provides wireless phone services in Arizona and thirteen other states. Qwest marketed and sold handset insurance to its customers, although it did not have a license to sell insurance in Arizona or in any other state. Patrick and Vicki Van Zanen sued Qwest for unjust enrichment based on its receipt of sales commissions for the handset insurance. The court agreed that Qwest had violated the insurance-licensing statute, but found that the commissions did not constitute unjust enrichment because the customers had, in fact, received the insurance. Qwest had not retained a benefit (the commissions) without paying for it

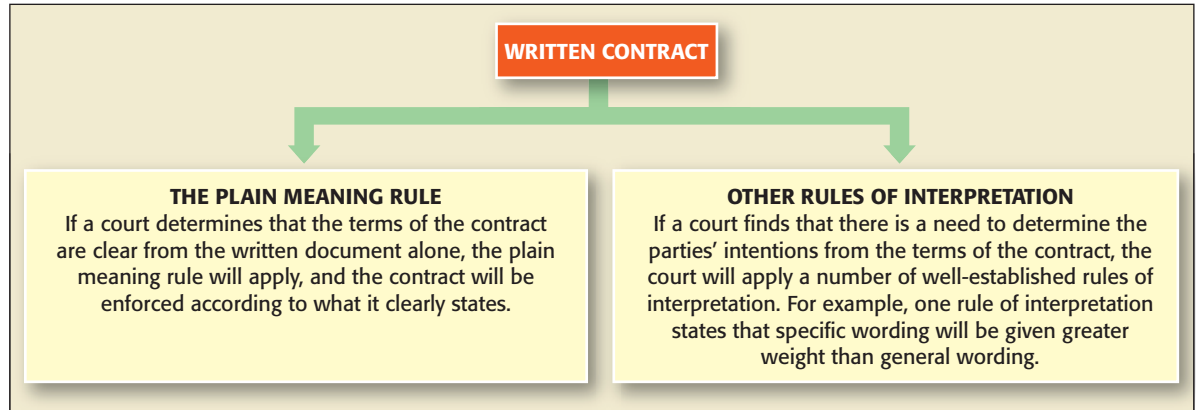

(providing insurance); thus, the Van Zanens and other customers did not suffer unfair detriment.¹⁰

When an Actual Contract Exists

The doctrine of quasi contract generally cannot be used when there is an actual contract that covers the matter in controversy. A remedy already exists if a party is unjustly enriched as a result of a breach of contract: the nonbreaching party can sue the breaching party for breach of contract. For example, Fung contracts with Cameron to deliver a furnace to a building owned by Grant. Fung delivers the furnace, but Cameron never pays Fung. Grant has been unjustly enriched in this situation, to be sure. Fung, however, cannot recover from Grant in quasi contract because Fung had an actual contract with Cameron. Fung already has a remedy—he can sue for breach of contract to recover the price of the furnace from Cameron. The court does not need to impose a quasi contract in this situation to achieve justice.

EXHIBIT 10-3 • Rules of Contract Interpretation

INTERPRETATION OF CONTRACTS

Sometimes, parties agree that a contract has been formed but disagree on its meaning or legal effect. One reason this may happen is that one of the parties is not familiar with the legal terminology used in the contract. To an extent, plain language laws (enacted by the federal government and a majority of the states) have helped to avoid this difficulty. Sometimes, though, a dispute may arise over the meaning of a contract simply because the rights or obligations under the contract are not expressed clearly—no matter how “plain” the language used.

In this section, we look at some common law rules of contract interpretation. These rules, which have evolved over time, provide the courts with guidelines for deciding disputes over how contract terms or provisions should be interpreted. Exhibit 10-3 provides a brief graphic summary of how these rules are applied.

The Plain Meaning Rule

When a contract’s writing is clear and unequivocal, a court will enforce it according to its obvious terms. The meaning of the terms must be determined from the face of the instrument—from the written document alone. This is sometimes referred to as the plain meaning rule.

Under this rule, if a contract’s words appear to be clear and unambiguous, a court cannot consider extrinsic evidence—that is, any evidence not contained in the document itself. If a contract’s terms are unclear or ambiguous, however, extrinsic evidence may be admissible to clarify the meaning of the contract. The admissibility of such evidence can significantly affect the court’s interpretation of ambiguous contractual provisions and thus the outcome of litigation. The following case illustrates these points.

* EXTENDED CASE 10.2 *

Wagner v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc.

California Court of Appeal, Second District, 146 Cal.App.4th 586, 52 Cal.Rptr.3d 898 (2007).

JOHNSON, Acting P.J.

Robert Wagner and Natalie Wood

(the “Wagners”) entered into an agreement with Spelling-Goldberg Productions (SGP) “relating to ‘Charlie’s Angels’ (herein called the ‘series’).” The contract entitled the Wagners to 50 percent of the net profits SGP received as consideration series to defendant Columbia Pictures [Industries, Inc.]. Thirteen years later Columbia contracted to obtain the motion picture rights to the series from * * * the show's writers, Ivan Goff and Ben Roberts. In 2000 and 2003 Columbia produced and distributed two "Charlie's Angels" films based on the TV series.

Wagner contends the "subsidiary rights" provision in the agreement with SGP entitles him * * * to 50 percent of the net profits from the two "Charlie's Angels" films.

Wagner brought this action [in a California state court] against Columbia for breach of contract * * *. Columbia answered and moved for summary [judgment] * * *. The trial court granted that motion * * *. [Wagner appealed this judgment to a state intermediate appellate court.]

Wagner introduced evidence of the history of the negotiations underlying the "Charlie's Angels" contract in support of his [contention].

This history begins with a contract the Wagners entered into with SGP to star in a television movie-of-the-week, "Love Song." As compensation for Wagner and Wood acting in "Love Song," SGP agreed to pay them a fixed amount plus one-half the net profits * * *.

In the * * * "Love Song" contract net profits were not limited to monies received "for the right to exhibit the Photoplay." Instead they were defined as the net of "all monies received by Producer as consideration for the right to exhibit the Photoplay, and exploitation of all ancillary, music and subsidiary rights in connection therewith."

Wagner's argument is simple and straightforward. The net profits provision in the "Love Song" agreement was intended to give the Wagners a one-half share in the net profits received by SGP "from all sources" without limitation as to source or time. The "Charlie's Angels" agreement was based on the "Love Song" agreement and defines net profits in identical language. Therefore, the "Charlie's Angels" agreement should also be interpreted as providing the Wagners with a 50 percent share in SGP's income "from all sources" without limitation as to source or time. Since Columbia admits it stands in SGP's shoes with respect to SGP's obligations under the "Charlie's Angels" agreement, Columbia is obligated to pay Wagner * * * 50 percent of the net profits derived from the "Charlie's Angels" movies.

The problem with Wagner's extrinsic evidence is that it does not explain the ["Charlie's Angels"] contract language, it contradicts it. Under the parol evidence rule,^a extrinsic evidence is not admissible to contradict express terms in a written contract or to explain what the agreement was. The agreement is the writing itself. Parol evidence cannot be admitted to show intention independent of an unambiguous written instrument. [Emphasis added.]

Even if the Wagners and SGP intended the Wagners would share in the net profits "from any and all sources" they did not say so in their contract. What they said in their contract was the Wagners would share in "all monies actually received by Producer, as consideration for the right to exhibit photoplays of the series, and from the exploitation of all ancillary, music and subsidiary rights in connection therewith." For a right to be "subsidiary" or "ancillary," meaning supplementary or subordinate, there must be a primary right to which it relates. The only primary right mentioned in the contract is "the right to exhibit photoplays of the series." Thus the Wagners were entitled to share in the profits from the exploitation of the movie rights to "Charlie's Angels" if those rights were exploited by Columbia as ancillary or subsidiary rights of its primary "right to exhibit photoplays of the series" but not if those rights were acquired by Columbia independently from its right to exhibit photoplays.

To understand how the producer of a television series acquires the motion picture rights in the series it is necessary to understand the Writers Guild of America Minimum Basic Agreement (MBA).^b

The contract between Goff and Roberts and SGP * * * stated: "The parties acknowledge that this agreement is subject to all of the terms and provisions of the applicable [MBA] * * *."

Article 16B of the MBA entitled "Separation of Rights" provided * * *: "[Producer] shall own the exclusive film television rights in the literary material * * *. Writer shall retain all other rights * * * including but not limited to * * * theatrical motion picture * * * rights."

Despite the provision in the MBA conferring the motion picture rights in a teleplay on the writers of the teleplay the producer retained a "limited interest in such rights." As relevant here, this "limited interest" consisted of the right of first refusal should the writer decide to offer the movie rights for sale within five years from the date the writer delivered the teleplay to the producer. After the five-year period expired the producer could still purchase the movie rights but it had to do so on the open market and in competition with any other producer who wanted to purchase those rights.

Consequently, if Columbia had produced “Charlie’s Angels” movies based on motion picture rights

* * * SGP had acquired from Goff and Roberts under SGP’s right of first refusal Columbia could be said to have “exploited” an ancillary or subsidiary right, i.e., movie-making, in connection with “the right to exhibit photoplays of the series,” and the Wagners would be entitled to a share of the movies’ profits.

However, * * * there is no evidence SGP ever acquired the motion picture rights to “Charlie’s Angels” by exercising its right of first refusal or in any other way connected to its right to exhibit photoplays of the series.

* * * *

The judgment is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. How might the result in this case have been different if the court had admitted the Wagners’ evidence of the Love Song contract?
2. Under what circumstances would the Wagners have been entitled to a share of the profits from the Charlie’s Angels movies even though the evidence of the Love Song contract was irrelevant?

Other Rules of Interpretation

Generally, a court will interpret the language to give effect to the parties’ intent as expressed in their contract. This is the primary purpose of the rules of interpretation—to determine the parties’ intent from the language used in their agreement and to give effect to that intent. A court normally will not make or remake a contract, nor will it interpret the language according to what the parties claim their intent was when they made it. The courts use the following rules in interpreting contractual terms:

1. Insofar as possible, a reasonable, lawful, and effective meaning will be given to all of a contract’s terms.
2. A contract will be interpreted as a whole; individual, specific clauses will be considered subordinate to the contract’s general intent. All writings that are a part of the same transaction will be interpreted together.
3. Terms that were the subject of separate negotiation will be given greater consideration than standardized terms and terms that were not negotiated separately.
4. A word will be given its ordinary, commonly accepted meaning, and a technical word or term will be given its technical meaning, unless the parties clearly intended something else.¹¹
5. Specific and exact wording will be given greater consideration than general language.
6. Written or typewritten terms will prevail over preprinted ones.
7. Because a contract should be drafted in clear and unambiguous language, a party who uses ambiguous expressions is held to be responsible for the ambiguities. Thus, when the language has more than one meaning, it will be interpreted against the party who drafted the contract.
8. Evidence of usage of trade, course of dealing, and course of performance may be admitted to clarify the meaning of an ambiguously worded contract. (These terms will be defined and discussed in more detail in Chapter 19.) When considering custom and usage, a court will look at what is common to the particular business or industry and to the locale where the contract was made or is to be performed. Express terms (terms expressly stated in the contract) are given the greatest weight, followed by course of performance, course of dealing, and custom and usage of trade—in that order.

In the following case, the court was asked to interpret the phrase “increase of hazard” as it appeared in an insurance policy.

11. See, for example, Citizens Communications Co. v. Trustmark Insurance, 303 F.Supp.2d 197 (D.Conn. 2004).

CASE 10.3

U.S. Bank, N.A.^a v. Tennessee Farmers Mutual Insurance Company

Tennessee Supreme Court, 277 S.W.3d 381 (2009).

www.tsc.state.tn.us^b

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Jessica Robbins bought a house in Humboldt, Tennessee. U.S. Bank, N.A., financed the purchase. Tennessee Farmers Mutual Insurance Company issued the homeowner's insurance policy. The policy included a "standard mortgage clause" that promised payment to the bank unless the house was lost due to an "increase in hazard" that the bank knew of but did not tell the insurer. When Robbins fell behind on her mortgage payments, the bank started foreclosure proceedings. No one told the insurer. Robbins filed for bankruptcy, which postponed the foreclosure (see Chapters 30 and 31 for detailed discussions of bankruptcy, mortgages, and foreclosures). Meanwhile, the house "blew up," in Robbins's words, and was destroyed in a fire caused by chemicals used to make methamphetamine. The bank filed a claim under the policy. The insurer refused to pay. The bank filed a suit in a Tennessee state court against the insurer claiming breach of contract. The insurer argued that it had not been told by the bank of an "increase in hazard"—the foreclosure. The court ruled in favor of the bank, an intermediate appellate court reversed in favor of the insurer, and the bank appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Sharon G. LEE, J. [Justice]

* * * *

Insurance contracts, being subject to the same rules of construction as contracts generally, should be interpreted and enforced as written. Absent fraud or mistake, the terms of a contract should be given their plain and ordinary meaning, for the primary rule of contract interpretation is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the parties. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The insurance policy at issue in this case contains a standard mortgage clause. * * * Our task is to interpret the policy language and determine whether this language required the Bank to notify Tennessee Farmers of the commencement of foreclosure proceedings. The precise issue before us is whether the commencement of foreclosure proceedings constitutes an "increase in hazard" which the Bank must report to the insurer or risk invalidation of the policy.

* * * No Tennessee case has squarely addressed the precise issue presented.

* * * *

In similar cases involving standard mortgage clauses requiring notice of an "increase of hazard," courts [in other jurisdictions] have found that the plain meaning of those words do not include an event such as a foreclosure proceeding, but rather, refer to physical conditions on the insured property posing a more hazardous risk to the property.

* * * *

We conclude that the Bank was not required to give notice to Tennessee Farmers of the initiation of foreclosure proceedings, and therefore, the lack of notice does not invalidate the insurance coverage in this case. First, we decline to assume that the mere commencement of foreclosure proceedings, by itself, automatically constitutes an increase in hazard * * *. Notably, the property at issue in this case burned not because of an impending foreclosure sale, but rather due to a mishap during an occupant's production of an illegal substance. Further, the foreclosure that was commenced was stayed pursuant to an order of the bankruptcy court. Therefore, at the time of the fire, there was no ongoing foreclosure proceeding. [Emphasis added.]

Second, we decline to read into this policy an obligation to notify the insurer of the commencement of foreclosure. In our view, the insurer is essentially asking us to write a new contract for the parties in accordance with its idea of what the policy should have said. This we decline to do, as our duty is to construe and enforce the policy as written, not make a new contract for the parties on different terms.

CASE 10.3 CONTINUED ♦ DECISION AND REMEDY • The Tennessee Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the appellate court and remanded the case to the trial court. The failure to notify the insurer of the foreclosure did not breach the terms of the policy because the phrase “increase of hazard,” by its ordinary meaning, does not include the commencement of foreclosure proceedings.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Is it ethical for an insurer to refuse to pay a claim under the terms of a policy that the insurer drafted? Discuss.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that Tennessee Farmers’ policy had provided that foreclosure proceedings either voided the coverage or required notification to continue it. Would the result have been different? Explain.

REVIEWING

Nature and Terminology

Mitsui Bank hired Ross Duncan as a branch manager in one of its Southern California locations. At that time, Duncan received an employee handbook informing him that Mitsui would review his performance and salary level annually. In 2008, Mitsui decided to create a new lending program to help financially troubled businesses stay afloat. Duncan was appointed to be the credit development officer (CDO) for the new program and was given a written compensation plan. According to the plan, his compensation would be based on the program’s success and would include bonuses and commissions based on the volume of loans and sales. The written plan also stated, “This compensation plan will be reviewed and potentially amended after one year and will be subject to such review and amendment annually thereafter.” Duncan’s efforts as CDO were successful, and the business-lending program he developed grew to represent 25 percent of Mitsui’s business in 2009 and 40 percent in 2010. Nevertheless, Mitsui refused to give Duncan a raise in 2009. In fact, Mitsui amended his compensation plan to reduce his compensation significantly and to change his performance evaluation schedule to every six months. When he had still not received a raise by 2011, Duncan resigned as CDO and filed a lawsuit alleging breach of contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What are the four requirements of a valid contract?
2. Did Duncan have a valid contract with Mitsui for employment as CDO? If so, was it a bilateral or a unilateral contract?
3. What are the requirements of an implied contract?
4. Can Duncan establish an implied contract based on the employment manual or the written compensation plan? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

10-1. Express versus Implied Contracts

Everett McCleskey, a local businessperson, is a good friend of Al Miller, the owner of a local candy store. Every day on his lunch hour, McCleskey goes into Miller's candy store and stays about five minutes. After looking at the candy and talking with Miller, McCleskey usually buys one or two candy bars. One afternoon, McCleskey goes into Miller's candy shop, looks at the candy, and picks up a $1 candy bar. Seeing that Miller is very busy, he waves the candy bar at Miller without saying a word and walks out. Is there a contract? If so, classify it within the categories presented in this chapter.

10-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Implied Contract.

Janine was hospitalized with severe abdominal pain and placed in an intensive care unit. Her doctor told the hospital personnel to order around-the-clock nursing care for Janine. At the hospital's request, a nursing services firm, Nursing Services Unlimited, provided two weeks of in-hospital care and, after Janine was sent home, an additional two weeks of at-home care. During the at-home period of care, Janine was fully aware that she was receiving the benefit of the nursing services. Nursing Services later billed Janine $4,000 for the nursing care, but Janine refused to pay on the ground that she had never contracted for the services, either orally or in writing. In view of the fact that no express contract was ever formed, can Nursing Services recover the $4,000 from Janine? If so, under what legal theory? Discuss.

10-3. Types of Contracts Burger Baby restaurants engaged Air Advertising to fly an advertisement above the Connecticut beaches. The advertisement offered $1,000 to any person who could swim from the Connecticut beaches to Long Island in less than a day. At 10:00 A.M. on October 10, Air Advertising's pilot flew a sign above the Connecticut beaches that read: "Swim across the Sound and Burger Baby pays $1,000." On seeing the sign, Davison dived in. About four hours later, when he was about halfway across the Sound, Air Advertising flew another sign over the Sound that read: "Burger Baby revokes." Davison completed the swim in another six hours. Is there a contract between Davison and Burger Baby? Can Davison recover anything?

10-4. Interpretation of Contracts East Mill Associates (EMA) was developing residential "units" in East Brunswick, New Jersey, within the service area of the East Brunswick Sewerage Authority (EBSA). The sewer system required an upgrade to the Ryder's Lane Pumping Station to accommodate the new units. EMA agreed to pay "fifty-five percent (55%) of the total cost" of the upgrade. At the time, the estimated cost to EMA was $150,000 to $200,000. Impediments to the project arose, however, substantially increasing the cost. Among other things, the pumping station had to be moved to accommodate a widened road nearby. The upgrade was delayed for almost three years. When it was completed, EBSA asked EMA for $340,022.12, which represented 55 percent of the total cost. EMA did not pay. EBSA filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against EMA for breach of contract. What rule should the court apply to interpret the parties' contract? How should that rule be applied? Why? 10-5. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Contract Enforceability.

California's Subdivision Map Act (SMA) prohibits the sale of real property until a map of its subdivision is filed with, and approved by, the appropriate state agency. In November 2004, Black Hills Investments, Inc., entered into two contracts with Albertson's, Inc., to buy two parcels of property in a shopping center development. Each contract required that "all governmental approvals relating to any lot split [or] subdivision" be obtained before the sale but permitted Albertson's to waive this condition. Black Hills made a $133,000 deposit on the purchase. A few weeks later, before the sales were complete, Albertson's filed with a local state agency a map that subdivided the shopping center into four parcels, including the two that Black Hills had agreed to buy. In January 2005, Black Hills objected to concessions that Albertson's had made to a buyer of one of the other parcels, told Albertson's that it was terminating its deal, and asked for a return of its deposit. Albertson's refused. Black Hills filed a suit in a California state court against Albertson's, arguing that the contracts were void. Are these contracts valid, voidable, unenforceable, or void? Explain. [Black Hills Investments, Inc. v. Albertson's, Inc., 146 Cal.App.4th 883, 53 Cal.Rptr.3d 263 (4 Dist. 2007)]

10-6. Interpretation of Contracts Lisa and Darrell Miller married in 1983 and had two children, Landon and Spencer. The Millers divorced in 2003 and entered into a joint custody implementation plan (JCIP). Under the JCIP, Darrell agreed to "begin setting funds aside for the minor children to attend post-secondary education necessary to pay tuition, books, supplies, and room and board not to exceed four (4) years." After Landon's eighteenth birthday, Darrell filed a petition to reduce the amount of the child support that he was paying to Lisa. In response, she asked the court to order Darrell to pay the boys' college expenses but offered no evidence to support the request. Darrell contended that the JCIP was not clear on this point. Do the rules of contract interpretation, applied to the phrasing of the Millers' JCIP, support Lisa's request or Darrell's contention? Explain. [Miller v. Miller, 1 So.3d 815 (La.App. 2009)]

10-7. Quantum Meruit Robert Gutkowski, a sports marketing expert, met numerous times with George Steinbrenner, the owner of the New York Yankees, and other Yankees executives over a ten-year period to help launch the Yankees Entertainment and Sports Network (YES Network). He was a paid consultant during that time. When the parties quit working together, Gutkowski sued, contending that he had been promised an ownership share in YES as part of the compensation for his work. While he was a paid consultant, he was not given a share of YES or hired as a regular executive. He contended that, by industry standards, a reasonable value for his services would be a 2 to 3 percent ownership share. There was no written contract for such a share, but Gutkowski claimed he was due that to prevent unjust enrichment of the Yankees for exploiting his expertise. Does Gutkowski have a good claim for payment based on quantum meruit? Explain. [Gutkowski v. Steinbrenner, 680 F.Supp.2d 602 (S.D.N.Y. 2010)]

10-8. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Unilateral Contracts.

International Business Machines Corp. (IBM) hired Niels Jensen in 2000 as a software sales representative. In 2001, IBM presented a new "Software Sales Incentive Plan" (SIP) at a conference for its sales employees. A brochure given to the attendees stated, "There are no caps to your earnings; the more you sell, . . . the more earnings for you." The brochure outlined how the plan worked and referred the employees to the "Sales Incentives" section of IBM's corporate intranet for more details. Jensen was given a "quota letter" that said he would be paid $75,000 as a base salary and, if he attained his quota, an additional $75,000 as incentive pay. In September, Jensen closed a deal with the Internal Revenue Service that was worth more than $24 million to IBM. Relying on the SIP brochure, Jensen estimated his commission to be $2.6 million. IBM paid him less than $500,000, however. Jensen filed a suit in a federal district court, contending that the SIP brochure and quota letter constituted a unilateral offer that became a binding contract when Jensen closed the sale. In view of these facts, consider the following questions. [Jensen v. International Business Machines Corp., 454 F.3d 382 (4th Cir. 2006)]

- Would it be fair to the employer in this case to hold that the SIP brochure and the quota letter created a unilateral contract if IBM did not intend to create such a contract? Would it be fair to the employee to hold that no contract was created? Explain.
- The "Sales Incentives" section of IBM's intranet included a clause providing that "management will decide if an adjustment to the payment is appropriate" when an employee closes a large transaction. Jensen's quota letter stated, "[The SIP] program does not constitute a promise by IBM to make any distributions under it. IBM reserves the right to adjust the program terms or to cancel or otherwise modify the program at any time." How do these statements affect your answers to the above questions? From an ethical perspective, would it be fair to hold that a contract exists despite these statements?

- Rule of Law: What rule concerning the interpretation of a contract and the admission of evidence did the court apply in this case?
- Applying the Rule of Law: How did the intent of the contracting parties and the language in their contract affect the application of the rule of law?
- Conclusion: Did the court resolve the dispute in the plaintiff's favor? Why or why not?

CHAPTER 11

Agreement in Traditional and E-Contracts

Contract law developed over time, through the common law tradition, to meet society's need to know with certainty what kinds of promises, or contracts, will be enforced and the point at which a valid and binding contract is formed. For a contract to be considered valid and enforceable, the requirements listed in Chapter 10 must be met. In this chapter, we look closely at the first of these requirements, agreement.

Agreement is required to form a contract, regardless of whether it is formed in the traditional way, through the exchange of paper documents, or online, through the exchange of electronic messages or documents. In today's world, many contracts are formed via the Internet. We discuss online offers and acceptances and examine some laws that have been created to apply to electronic contracts, or e-contracts, in the latter part of this chapter.

AGREEMENT

An essential element for contract formation is agreement—the parties must agree on the terms of the contract and manifest to each other their mutual assent (agreement) to the same bargain. Ordinarily, agreement is evidenced by two events: an offer and an acceptance. One party offers a certain bargain to another party, who then accepts that bargain. The agreement does not necessarily have to be in writing. Both parties, however, must manifest their assent, or voluntary consent, to the same bargain. Once an agreement is reached, if the other elements of a contract are present (consideration, capacity, and legality—discussed in subsequent chapters), a valid contract is formed, generally creating enforceable rights and duties between the parties.

Because words often fail to convey the precise meaning intended, the law of contracts generally adheres to the objective theory of contracts, as discussed in Chapter 10. Under this theory, a party's words and conduct are held to mean whatever a reasonable person in the offeree's position would think they meant.

Requirements of the Offer

An offer is a promise or commitment to do or refrain from doing some specified action in the future. As mentioned in Chapter 10, the parties to a contract are the offeror, the one who makes an offer or proposal to another party, and the offeree, the one to whom the offer or proposal is made. Under the common law, three elements are necessary for an offer to be effective:

1. The offeror must have a serious intention to become bound by the offer.
2. The terms of the offer must be reasonably certain, or definite, so that the parties and the court can ascertain the terms of the contract.
3. The offer must be communicated to the offeree.

Once an effective offer has been made, the offeree's acceptance of that offer creates a legally binding contract (providing the other essential elements for a valid and enforceable contract are present).

INTENTION The first requirement for an effective offer is a serious intent on the part of the offeror. Serious intent is not determined by the subjective intentions, beliefs, and assumptions of the offeror.

Rather, it is determined by what a reasonable person in the offeree's position would conclude that the offeror's words and actions meant. Offers made in obvious anger, jest, or undue excitement do not meet the serious-and-objective-intent test because a reasonable person would realize that a serious offer was not being made. Because these offers are not effective, an offeree's acceptance does not create an agreement.

Suppose that Linda and Dena ride to school each day in Dena's new automobile, which has a market value of $20,000. One cold morning, they get into the car, but Dena cannot get the car started. She yells in anger, "I'll sell this car to anyone for $500!" Linda drops $500 on Dena's lap. A reasonable person—taking into consideration Dena's frustration and the obvious difference in value between the market price of the car and the proposed purchase price—would realize that Dena's offer was not made with serious and objective intent. No agreement was formed.

In the classic case presented next, the court considered whether an offer made "after a few drinks" met the serious-and-objective-intent requirement.

CASE 11.1 Lucy v. Zehmer

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, 196 Va. 493, 84 S.E.2d 516 (1954).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • W.O. Lucy, the plaintiff, filed a suit against A. H. and Ida Zehmer, the defendants, to compel the Zehmers to transfer title of their property, known as the Ferguson Farm, to the Lucys (W.O. and his wife) for $50,000, as the Zehmers had allegedly agreed to do. Lucy had known A.H. Zehmer for fifteen or twenty years and for the last eight years or so had been anxious to buy the Ferguson Farm from him. One night, Lucy stopped in to visit the Zehmers in the combination restaurant, filling station, and motor court they operated. While there, Lucy tried to buy the Ferguson Farm once again. This time he tried a new approach. According to the trial court transcript, Lucy said to Zehmer, "I bet you wouldn't take $50,000 for that place." Zehmer replied, "Yes, I would too; you wouldn't give fifty." Throughout the evening, the conversation returned to the sale of the Ferguson Farm for $50,000. At the same time, the men continued to drink whiskey and engage in light conversation. Eventually, Lucy enticed Zehmer to write up an agreement to the effect that the Zehmers would sell the Ferguson Farm to Lucy for $50,000 complete. Later, Lucy sued Zehmer to compel him to go through with the sale. Zehmer argued that he had been drunk and that the offer had been made in jest and hence was unenforceable. The trial court agreed with Zehmer, and Lucy appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

BUCHANAN, J. [Justice] delivered the opinion of the court.

* * * * *

In his testimony, Zehmer claimed that he "was high as a Georgia pine," and that the transaction "was just a bunch of two doggoned drunks bluffing to see who could talk the biggest and say the most." That claim is inconsistent with his attempt to testify in great detail as to what was said and what was done.

* * * * *

The appearance of the contract, the fact that it was under discussion for forty minutes or more before it was signed; Lucy's objection to the first draft because it was written in the singular, and he wanted Mrs. Zehmer to sign it also; the rewriting to meet that objection and the signing by Mrs. Zehmer; the discussion of what was to be included in the sale, the provision for the examination of the title, the completeness of the instrument that was executed, the taking possession of it by Lucy with no request or suggestion by either of the defendants that he give it back, are facts which furnish persuasive evidence that the execution of the contract was a serious business transaction rather than a casual, jesting matter as defendants now contend.

* * * * *

In the field of contracts, as generally elsewhere, we must look to the outward expression of a person as manifesting his intention rather than to his secret and unexpressed intention. The law

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 11.1 CONTINUED ➤ imputes to a person an intention corresponding to the reasonable meaning of his words and acts. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Whether the writing signed by the defendants and now sought to be enforced by the complainants was the result of a serious offer by Lucy and a serious acceptance by the defendants, or was a serious offer by Lucy and an acceptance in secret jest by the defendants, in either event it constituted a binding contract of sale between the parties.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia determined that the writing was an enforceable contract and reversed the ruling of the lower court. The Zehmers were required by court order to follow through with the sale of the Ferguson Farm to the Lucys.

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY'S LAW • This is a classic case in contract law because it illustrates so clearly the objective theory of contracts with respect to determining whether a serious offer was intended. Today, the courts continue to apply the objective theory of contracts and routinely cite Lucy v. Zehmer as a significant precedent in this area.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the day after Lucy signed the purchase agreement for the farm, he decided that he did not want it after all, and Zehmer sued Lucy to perform the contract. Would this change in the facts alter the court's decision that Lucy and Zehmer had created an enforceable contract? Why or why not?

The concept of intention can be further clarified through an examination of the types of expressions and statements that are not offers. We look at these expressions and statements in the subsections that follow.

Expressions of Opinion. An expression of opinion is not an offer. It does not indicate an intention to enter into a binding agreement.

CASE IN POINT George Hawkins took his son to Edward McGee, a physician, and asked McGee to operate on the son's hand. McGee said that the boy would be in the hospital three or four days and that the hand would probably heal a few days later. The son's hand did not heal for a month, but the father did not win a suit for breach of contract. The court held that McGee had not made an offer to heal the son's hand in a few days. He had merely expressed an opinion as to when the hand would heal.¹

Statements of Future Intent. A statement of an intention to do something in the future is not an offer. If Samir says, "I plan to sell my stock in Novation, Inc., for $150 per share," no contract is created if John "accepts" and tenders the $150 per share for the stock. Samir has merely expressed his intention to enter into a future contract for the sale of the stock. If John accepts and tenders the $150 per share, no contract is formed because a reasonable person would conclude that Samir was only thinking about selling his stock, not promising to sell it.

Preliminary Negotiations. A request or invitation to negotiate is not an offer. It only expresses a willingness to discuss the possibility of entering into a contract. Statements such as "Will you sell Blythe Estate?" or "I wouldn't sell my car for less than $5,000" are examples. A reasonable person in the offeree's position would not conclude that these statements indicated an intention to enter into a binding obligation. Likewise, when the government or private firms require construction work, they invite contractors to submit bids. The invitation to submit bids is not an offer, and a contractor does not bind the government or private firm by submitting a bid. (The bids that the contractors submit are offers, however, and the government or private firm can bind the contractor by accepting the bid.)

Advertisements. In general, advertisements (including representations made in mail-order catalogues, price lists, and circulars) are treated not as offers to contract but as invitations to negotiate.²

CASE IN POINT An advertisement on the Science NOW Web site asked readers to submit "news tips," which the organization would then investigate for possible inclusion in its magazine or on the Web site. Erik Trell, a professor and physician, submitted a manuscript in which he claimed to have solved a famous mathematical problem. When Science NOW did not publish the information, Trell filed a lawsuit for breach of contract. He claimed that the Science NOW ad was an offer, which he had accepted by submitting his manuscript. The court dismissed Trell's suit, holding that the ad was not an offer, but merely an invitation.³

1. Hawkins v. McGee, 84 N.H. 114, 146 A. 641 (1929).

2. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 26, Comment b.

Price lists are another form of invitation to negotiate or trade. A seller's price list is not an offer to sell at that price; it merely invites the buyer to offer to buy at that price. In fact, the seller usually puts "prices subject to change" on the price list. Only in rare circumstances will a price quotation be construed as an offer.

Although most advertisements and the like are treated as invitations to negotiate, this does not mean that an advertisement can never be an offer. On some occasions, courts have construed advertisements to be offers because the ads contained definite terms that invited acceptance (such as an ad offering a reward for the return of a lost dog).

Auctions. In an auction, a seller "offers" goods for sale through an auctioneer, but this is not an offer to form a contract. Rather, it is an invitation asking bidders to submit offers. In the context of an auction, a bidder is the offeror, and the auctioneer is the offeree. The offer is accepted when the auctioneer strikes the hammer. Before the fall of the hammer, a bidder may revoke (take back) her or his bid, or the auctioneer may reject that bid or all bids. Typically, an auctioneer will reject a bid that is below the price the seller is willing to accept.

When the auctioneer accepts a higher bid, he or she rejects all previous bids. Because rejection terminates an offer (as will be discussed later), those bids represent offers that have been terminated. Thus, if the highest bidder withdraws her or his bid before the hammer falls, none of the previous bids is reinstated. If the bid is not withdrawn or rejected, the contract is formed when the auctioneer announces, "Going once, going twice, sold!" (or something similar) and lets the hammer fall.

Auctions with and without Reserve. Auctions traditionally have been referred to as either "with reserve" or "without reserve." In an auction with reserve, the seller (through the auctioneer) may withdraw the goods at any time before the auctioneer closes the sale by announcement or by the fall of the hammer. All auctions are assumed to be auctions with reserve unless the terms of the auction are explicitly stated to be without reserve. In an auction without reserve, the goods cannot be withdrawn by the seller and must be sold to the highest bidder. In auctions with reserve, the seller may reserve the right to confirm or reject the sale even after "the hammer has fallen." In this situation, the seller is obligated to notify those attending the auction that sales of goods made during the auction are not final until confirmed by the seller.⁴

Agreements to Agree. Traditionally, agreements to agree—that is, agreements to agree to the material terms of a contract at some future date—were not considered to be binding contracts. The modern view, however, is that agreements to agree may be enforceable agreements (contracts) if it is clear that the parties intended to be bound by the agreements. In other words, under the modern view the emphasis is on the parties' intent rather than on form.

CASE IN POINT After a person was injured and nearly drowned on a water ride at one of its amusement parks, Six Flags, Inc., filed a lawsuit against the manufacturer that had designed that ride. The defendant-manufacturer claimed that there was no binding contract between the parties, only preliminary negotiations that were never formalized into a construction contract. The court, however, held that a faxed document specifying the details of the water ride, along with the parties' subsequent actions—such as beginning construction and handwriting notes on the fax—was sufficient to show an intent to be bound. Because of the court's finding, the manufacturer was required to provide insurance for the water ride at Six Flags, and its insurer was required to defend Six Flags in the personal-injury lawsuit that arose out of the incident.⁵

Increasingly, the courts are holding that a preliminary agreement constitutes a binding contract if the parties have agreed on all essential terms and no disputed issues remain to be resolved.⁶ In contrast, if the parties agree on certain major terms but leave other terms open for further negotiation, a preliminary agreement is binding only in the sense that the parties have committed themselves to negotiate the undecided terms in good faith in an effort to reach a final agreement.⁷

The following case concerned a dispute over an agreement to settle a case during a trial. One party claimed that the agreement, which was formed via e-mail, was binding, and the other party claimed that it was merely an agreement to agree or to work out the terms of a settlement in the future. Can an exchange of e-mails create a complete and unambiguous agreement?

CASE 11.2

Basis Technology Corp. v. Amazon.com, Inc.

Appeals Court of Massachusetts, 71 Mass.App.Ct. 29, 878 N.E.2d 952 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Basis Technology Corporation created software and provided technical services for Amazon.com, Inc.'s, Japanese-language Web site. The agreement between the two companies allowed for separately negotiated contracts for additional services that Basis might provide to Amazon. At the end of 1999, Basis and Amazon entered into stock-purchase agreements. Later, Amazon objected to certain actions related to the securities that Basis sold. Basis sued Amazon for various claims involving these securities and for failing to pay for services performed by Basis that were not included in the original agreement. During the trial, the two parties appeared to reach an agreement to settle out of court via a series of e-mail exchanges outlining the settlement. When Amazon reneged, Basis served a motion to enforce the proposed settlement. The trial judge entered a judgment against Amazon, which appealed.

SIKORA, J. [Judge]

* * * *

* * * On the evening of March 23, after the third day of evidence and after settlement discussions, Basis counsel sent an e-mail with the following text to Amazon counsel:

[Amazon counsel]—This e-mail confirms the essential business terms of the settlement between our respective clients * * *. Basis and Amazon agree that they promptly will take all reasonable steps to memorialize in a written agreement, to be signed by individuals authorized by each party, the terms set forth below, as well as such other terms that are reasonably necessary to make these terms effective.

* * * *

[Amazon counsel], please contact me first thing tomorrow morning if this e-mail does not accurately summarize the settlement terms reached earlier this evening. See you tomorrow morning when we report this matter settled to the Court.

At 7:26 A.M. on March 24, Amazon counsel sent an e-mail with a one-word reply: “correct.” Later in the morning, in open court and on the record, both counsel reported the result of a settlement without specification of the terms.

On March 25, Amazon’s counsel sent a facsimile of the first draft of a settlement agreement to Basis’s counsel. The draft comported with all the terms of the e-mail exchange, and added some implementing and boilerplate [standard contract provisions] terms.

* * * *

[Within a few days, though,] the parties were deadlocked. On April 21, Basis served its motion to enforce the settlement agreement. Amazon opposed. * * * The motion and opposition presented the issues whether the e-mail terms were sufficiently complete and definite to form an agreement and whether Amazon had intended to be bound by them.

* * * *

We examine the text of the terms for the incompleteness and indefiniteness charged by Amazon. Provisions are not ambiguous simply because the parties have developed different interpretations of them. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

CASE 11.2 CONTINUED ♦ We must interpret the document as a whole. In the preface to the enumerated terms, Basis counsel stated that the “e-mail confirms the essential business terms of the settlement between our respective clients,” and that the parties “agree that they promptly will take all reasonable steps to memorialize” those terms. Amazon counsel concisely responded, “correct.” Thus the “essential business terms” were resolved. The parties were proceeding to “memorialize” or record the settlement terms, not to create them.

* * * *

To ascertain intent, a court considers the words used by the parties, the agreement taken as a whole, and surrounding facts and circumstances. The essential circumstance of this disputed agreement is that it concluded a trial.

* * * As the trial judge explained in her memorandum of decision, she “terminated” the trial; she did not suspend it for exploratory negotiations. She did so in reliance upon the parties’ report of an accomplished agreement for the settlement of their dispute.

* * * *

In sum, the deliberateness and the gravity attributable to a report of a settlement, especially during the progress of a trial, weigh heavily as circumstantial evidence of the intention of a party such as Amazon to be bound by its communication to the opposing party and to the court.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Appeals Court of Massachusetts affirmed the trial court’s finding that Amazon intended to be bound by the terms of the March 23 e-mail. That e-mail constituted a complete and unambiguous statement of the parties’ desire to be bound by the settlement terms.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the attorneys for both sides had simply had a phone conversation that included all of the terms to which they actually agreed in their e-mail exchanges. Would the court have ruled differently? Why or why not?

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • What does the result in this case suggest that a businessperson should do before she or he agrees to a settlement of a legal dispute?

DEFINITENESS OF TERMS The second requirement for an effective offer involves the definiteness of its terms. An offer must have reasonably definite terms so that a court can determine if a breach has occurred and give an appropriate remedy. The specific terms required depend, of course, on the type of contract. Generally, a contract must include the following terms, either expressed in the contract or capable of being reasonably inferred from it:

1. The identification of the parties.
2. The identification of the object or subject matter of the contract (also the quantity, when appropriate), including the work to be performed, with specific identification of such items as goods, services, and land.
3. The consideration to be paid.
4. The time of payment, delivery, or performance.

An offer may invite an acceptance to be worded in such specific terms that the contract is made definite. For example, Marcus Business Machines contacts Best Corporation and offers to sell “from one to ten MacCool copying machines for $1,600 each; state the number desired in acceptance.” Best Corporation agrees to buy two copiers. Because the quantity is specified in the acceptance, the terms are definite and the contract is enforceable.

When the parties have clearly manifested an intent to form a contract, courts sometimes are willing to supply a missing term in a contract, especially a sales contract.⁸ But a court will not rewrite a contract if the parties’ expression of intent is too vague or uncertain to be given any precise meaning.

COMMUNICATION The third requirement for an effective offer is communication—the offer must be communicated to the offeree. Ordinarily, one cannot agree to a bargain without knowing that it exists. For example, Tolson advertises a reward for the return of her lost cat. Dirk, not knowing of the reward, finds the cat and returns it to Tolson. Usually, Dirk cannot

8. See Chapter 19 and UCC 2–204. Note that Article 2 of the UCC specifies different rules relating to the definiteness of terms used in a contract for the sale of goods. In essence, Article 2 modifies general contract law by requiring less specificity.

recover the reward because an essential element of a reward contract is that the one who claims the reward must have known it was offered. A few states would allow recovery of the reward, but not on contract principles—Dirk would be allowed to recover on the basis that it would be unfair to deny him the reward just because he did not know about it.

The following case illustrates the importance of the communication requirement in contract formation.

★ EXTENDED CASE 11.3 ★

Alexander v. Lafayette Crime Stoppers, Inc.

Court of Appeal of Louisiana, Third District, 28 So.3d 1253 (2010).

www.la3circuit.org/opinions.htm^a

AMY, Judge.

* * * *

In the summer of 2002, after several South Louisiana women had been murdered, the Multi Agency Homicide Task Force (Task Force) was established to investigate these murders, believed to be committed by the same individual referred to as the South Louisiana Serial Killer. In April 2003, the Baton Rouge Crime Stoppers (BRCS) began publicizing a reward offer in newspapers, television stations, and billboards around the Baton Rouge area regarding the South Louisiana Serial Killer. A short time later, Lafayette Crime Stoppers (LCS) also publicized a reward offer. Both reward offers provided an expiration date of August 1, 2003.

According to the plaintiffs' petition, on July 9, 2002, Dianne Alexander was attacked in her home in St. Martin Parish. Ms. Alexander's son, Herman Alexander, arrived home during the attack and chased the attacker from the property. Ms. Alexander reported the attack to local police and, later, both Ms. Alexander and her son described the attacker to the St. Martin Sheriff's Department.

According to his investigative report, Lieutenant Boyd, the lead investigator on Ms. Alexander's attack, began to suspect that Ms. Alexander's attacker could be the same man identified as the South Louisiana Serial Killer, after investigators linked the death of a Lafayette woman to the suspected serial killer. In May 2003, Lieutenant Boyd shared information regarding Ms. Alexander's attack with the Lafayette Sheriff's Department, who in turn shared the information with the Task Force.

On May 22, 2003, Ms. Alexander was interviewed by an FBI agent assisting the Task Force. Based upon that interview, a composite sketch was drawn and released to the public on May 23, 2003. Investigators believed the composite sketch matched the description of a possible suspect in an investigation being handled by the Louisiana Attorney General's Office and the Zachary Police Department. On May 25, 2003, a photo lineup was prepared and presented to Ms. Alexander, who identified her attacker as the same man suspected in the Zachary investigation, Derrick Todd Lee.

On or about August 14, 2003, Ms. Alexander contacted LCS and sought to collect the advertised award; however, LCS informed her she was ineligible to receive the award. On February 22, 2006, Ms. Alexander and her son filed a lawsuit against BRCS and LCS, alleging that the defendants owed them $100,000 and $50,000, respectively, for the information they provided to the defendants. The defendants filed motions for summary judgment asserting that a valid contract never existed between the parties. Specifically, the defendants argued that the plaintiffs never provided information to Crime Stoppers via the tipster hotline and thus did not comply with the "form, terms, or conditions required by the Crime Stoppers' offers[.]" The trial court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment, finding that the offer from Crime Stoppers was conditioned on the information being provided to the defendant entities rather than law enforcement.

The plaintiffs appeal, asserting that there is a genuine issue of material fact that the LCS and BRCS offers contained a requirement that acceptance of the reward must be done through the Crime Stoppers' tipline.

* * * *

The offer made by LCS in a May 14, 2003 press release, reads [in part] as follows:

* * * *

In order to qualify for the reward, the tipster must provide information which leads to the arrest, DNA match, and the formal filing of charges against a suspect through grand jury indictment or Bill of Information. In addition, the qualifying tip must be received prior to midnight, August 1, 2003.

The offer from BRCS, as published in the Morning Advocate, reads [in part] as follows:

Crime Stoppers, Inc. $100,000 reward for information on the South Louisiana Serial Killer. A $100,000 reward will be given for information leading to the arrest and indictment of the South Louisiana Serial Killer.

Both LCS and BRCS offers were irrevocable offers because they specified a period of time for acceptance. Louisiana Civil Code Article 1934 provides that “acceptance of an irrevocable offer is effective when received by the offeror.” Acceptance is received when it comes into the possession of a person authorized by the offeror to receive it, or when it is deposited in a place the offeror has indicated as the place where communications of that kind are to be deposited for him. [Emphasis added.]

The plaintiffs argue that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether they accepted the Crime Stoppers’ reward offers; however, the plaintiffs admit that they did not contact either Crime Stopper organization before August 1, 2003. The plaintiffs argue that they accepted the offers by performance when they provided information about the serial killer to law enforcement. Further, the plaintiffs contend that this performance is a customary manner of accepting reward offers from Crime Stopper organization[s].

In the present matter, the plaintiffs’ acceptance of the reward offers must have been received by the defendants (offerors) by the time prescribed in the offer (August 1, 2003) in the place where communications of that kind were to be deposited (the phone number cited in the offers). The record contains no evidence indicating the defendants were notified by the plaintiffs in the time and manner indicated in the offer. While the plaintiffs may have provided information related to the arrest or indictment of Derrick Todd Lee to local law enforcement and the Task Force, there is no indication in the offer that either of those parties were the offerors of the reward or persons authorized to receive acceptance on their behalf.

* * * [As to the plaintiffs’ argument that providing information to law enforcement is a customary manner of accepting reward offers from Crime Stoppers,] [w]hile acceptance may be valid if customary in similar transactions, according to [Louisiana law], it must be “customary in similar transactions at the time and place the offer is received.” (Emphasis added [by the court].) As indicated above, there is no evidence in the record that the defendants received any acceptance of the offer. Accordingly, no contract was formed between the parties.

* * * *

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment granting the defendants’ motions for summary judgment is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. Suppose that the plaintiffs had learned about the reward offer after the killer had already been arrested and indicted due to their assistance but before the August 1, 2003, deadline. If they had then called in their information on the tip line, would they have been legally entitled to claim the reward in this circumstance? Explain.
2. The plaintiffs argued that “providing information to law enforcement is a customary manner of accepting reward offers from Crime Stoppers.” How did the court respond to this argument?

Termination of the Offer

The communication of an effective offer to an offeree gives the offeree the power to transform the offer into a binding, legal obligation (a contract) by an acceptance. This power of acceptance does not continue forever, though. It can be terminated either by the action of the parties or by operation of law.

TERMINATION BY ACTION OF THE PARTIES An offer can be terminated by the action of the parties in any of three ways: by revocation, by rejection, or by counteroffer.

Revocation of the Offer by the Offeror. The offeror’s act of withdrawing (revoking) an offer is known as revocation. Unless an offer is irrevocable (discussed shortly), the offeror usually can revoke the offer (even if he or she has promised to keep it open) as long as the revocation is communicated to the offeree before the offeree accepts. Revocation may be accomplished by express repudiation of the offer (for example, with a statement such as “I withdraw my previous offer of October 17”) or by performance of acts that are inconsistent with the existence of the offer and are made known to the offeree (for example, selling the offered property to another person in the presence of the offeree).

The general rule followed by most states is that a revocation becomes effective when the offeree or the offeree’s agent (a person acting on behalf of the offeree) actually receives it. Therefore, a letter of revocation mailed on April 1 and delivered at the offeree's residence or place of business on April 3 becomes effective on April 3.

An offer made to the general public can be revoked in the same manner that the offer was originally communicated. Suppose that an electronics retailer offers a $10,000 reward to anyone providing information leading to the apprehension of the persons who burglarized the store's downtown branch. The offer is published in three local papers and four papers in neighboring communities. To revoke the offer, the retailer must publish the revocation in all seven of the papers in which it published the offer. The revocation is then accessible to the general public, even if some particular offeree does not know about it.

Irrevocable Offers. Although most offers are revocable, some can be made irrevocable—that is, they cannot be revoked. Increasingly, courts refuse to allow an offeror to revoke an offer when the offeree has changed position because of justifiable reliance on the offer (under the doctrine of detrimental reliance, or promissory estoppel, which will be discussed in Chapter 12). In some circumstances, “firm offers” made by merchants may also be considered irrevocable—see the discussion of the “merchant’s firm offer” in Chapter 19.

Another form of irrevocable offer is an option contract. An option contract is created when an offeror promises to hold an offer open for a specified period of time in return for a payment (consideration) given by the offeree. An option contract takes away the offeror's power to revoke the offer for the period of time specified in the option.

Option contracts are also frequently used in conjunction with the sale or lease of real estate. For example, Tyrell agrees to lease a house from Jackson, the property owner. Included in the lease contract is a clause stating that Tyrell is paying an additional $15,000 for an option to purchase the property within a specified period of time. If Tyrell decides not to purchase the house after the specified period has lapsed, he loses the $15,000, and Jackson is free to sell the property to another buyer.

Rejection of the Offer by the Offeree. If the offeree rejects the offer—by words or by conduct—the offer is terminated. Any subsequent attempt by the offeree to accept will be construed as a new offer, giving the original offeror (now the offeree) the power of acceptance. As with a revocation, a rejection of an offer is effective only when it is actually received by the offeror or the offeror's agent.

Merely inquiring about an offer does not constitute rejection. Suppose that Raymond offers to buy Francie's PlayStation 3 with the stereoscopic 3D update for $300, and Francie responds, “Is that your best offer?” or “Will you pay me $375 for it?” A reasonable person would conclude that Francie did not reject the offer but simply made an inquiry for further consideration of the offer. She can still accept and bind Raymond to the $300 purchase price. When the offeree merely inquires as to the firmness of the offer, there is no reason to presume that he or she intends to reject it.

Counteroffer by the Offeree. A counteroffer is a rejection of the original offer and the simultaneous making of a new offer. Suppose that Burke offers to sell his home to Lang for $270,000. Lang responds, “Your price is too high. I'll offer to purchase your house for $250,000.” Lang's response is called a counteroffer because it rejects Burke's offer to sell at $270,000 and creates a new offer by Lang to purchase the home at a price of $250,000.

At common law, the mirror image rule requires the offeree's acceptance to match the offeror's offer exactly—to mirror the offer. Any change in, or addition to, the terms of the original offer automatically terminates that offer and substitutes the counteroffer. The counteroffer, of course, need not be accepted; but if the original offeror does accept the terms of the counteroffer, a valid contract is created.⁹

TERMINATION BY OPERATION OF LAW The power of the offeree to transform the offer into a binding, legal obligation can be terminated by operation of law through the occurrence of any of the following events:

1. Lapse of time.
2. Destruction of the specific subject matter of the offer.
3. Death or incompetence of the offeror or the offeree.
4. Supervening illegality of the proposed contract.

Lapse of Time. If the offer states that it will be left open until a particular date, then the offer will terminate at midnight on that day. If the offer states that it will be left open for a number of days, such as ten days, this time period normally begins to run when the offer is actually received by the offeree, not when it is formed or sent. When the offer is delayed (through the misdelivery of mail, for example), the period begins to run from the date the offeree would have received the offer, but only if the offeree knows or should know that the offer is delayed.¹⁰

If the offer does not specify a time for acceptance, the offer terminates at the end of a reasonable period of time. What constitutes a reasonable period of time depends on the subject matter of the contract, business and market conditions, and other relevant circumstances. An offer to sell farm produce, for example, will terminate sooner than an offer to sell farm equipment because farm produce is perishable and subject to greater fluctuations in market value.

Destruction of the Subject Matter. An offer is automatically terminated if the specific subject matter of the offer is destroyed before the offer is accepted.¹¹ If Johnson offers to sell his prize greyhound to Rizzo, for example, but the dog dies before Rizzo can accept, the offer is automatically terminated. Johnson does not have to tell Rizzo that the animal has died for the offer to terminate.

10. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 49.

11. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 36.

Death or Incompetence of the Offeror or Offeree. An offeree's power of acceptance is terminated when the offeror or offeree dies or is deprived of legal capacity to enter into the proposed contract, unless the offer is irrevocable. A revocable offer is personal to both parties and cannot pass to the heirs, guardian, or estate of either. This rule applies whether or not the other party had notice of the death or incompetence.

Supervening Illegality of the Proposed Contract. A statute or court decision that makes an offer illegal automatically terminates the offer.¹² For example, Lee offers to lend Kim $10,000 at an annual interest rate of 15 percent. Before Kim can accept the offer, a law is enacted that prohibits interest rates higher than 12 percent. Lee's offer is automatically terminated. (If the statute is enacted after Kim accepts the offer, a valid contract is formed, but the contract may still be unenforceable—see Chapter 13.)

Concept Summary 11.1 provides a review of the ways in which an offer can be terminated.

12. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 36.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 11.1

Methods by Which an Offer Can Be Terminated

By Action of the Parties—

1. Revocation—Unless the offer is irrevocable, it can be revoked at any time before acceptance without liability. Revocation is not effective until received by the offeree or the offeree's agent. Some offers, such as a merchant's firm offer and option contracts, are irrevocable. Also, in some situations, an offeree's detrimental reliance or partial performance will cause a court to rule that the offeror cannot revoke the offer.
2. Rejection—Accomplished by words or actions that demonstrate a clear intent not to accept the offer; not effective until received by the offeror or the offeror's agent.
3. Counteroffer—A rejection of the original offer and the making of a new offer.

By Operation of Law—

1. Lapse of time—The offer terminates at the end of the time period specified in the offer or, if no time period is stated in the offer, at the end of a reasonable time period.
2. Destruction of the subject matter—When the specific subject matter of the offer is destroyed before the offer is accepted, the offer automatically terminates.
3. Death or incompetence of the offeror or offeree—If the offeror or offeree dies or becomes incompetent, this offer terminates (unless the offer is irrevocable).
4. Supervening illegality—When a statute or court decision makes the proposed contract illegal, the offer automatically terminates.

Acceptance

Acceptance is a voluntary act by the offeree that shows assent (agreement) to the terms of an offer. The offeree's act may consist of words or conduct. The acceptance must be unequivocal and must be communicated to the offeror.

UNEQUIVOCAL ACCEPTANCE To exercise the power of acceptance effectively, the offeree must accept unequivocally. This is the mirror image rule previously discussed. If the acceptance is subject to new conditions or if the terms of the acceptance change the original offer, the acceptance may be deemed a counteroffer that implicitly rejects the original offer.

An acceptance may be unequivocal even though the offeree expresses dissatisfaction with the contract. For example, "I accept the offer, but I wish I could have gotten a better price" is an effective acceptance. So, too, is "I accept, but can you shave the price?" In contrast, the statement "I accept the offer but only if I can pay on ninety days' credit" is not an unequivocal acceptance and operates as a counteroffer, rejecting the original offer.

Certain terms, when included in an acceptance, will not change the offer sufficiently to constitute rejection. Suppose that in response to an art dealer's offer to sell a painting, the offeree, Ashton Gibbs, replies, "I accept; please send a written contract." Gibbs is requesting a written contract but is not making it a condition for acceptance. Therefore, the acceptance is effective without the written contract. In contrast, if Gibbs replies, "I accept if you send a written contract," the acceptance is expressly conditioned on the request for a writing, and the statement is not an acceptance but a counteroffer. (Notice how important each word is!)¹³

SILENCE AS ACCEPTANCE Ordinarily, silence cannot constitute acceptance, even if the offeror states, "By your silence and inaction, you will be deemed to have accepted this offer." This general rule applies because an offeree should not be obligated to act affirmatively to reject an offer when no consideration has passed to the offeree to impose such a duty.

In some instances, however, the offeree does have a duty to speak. In these situations, her or his silence or inaction will operate as an acceptance.

Silence may be an acceptance when an offeree takes the benefit of offered services even though he or she had an opportunity to reject them and knew that they were offered with the expectation of compensation. For example, John is a student who earns extra income by washing store windows. John taps on the window of a store, catches the attention of the store's manager, and points to the window and raises his cleaner, signaling that he will be washing the window. The manager does nothing to stop him. Here, the store manager's silence constitutes an acceptance, and an implied contract is created. The store is bound to pay a reasonable value for John's work.

Silence can also operate as acceptance when the offeree has had prior dealings with the offeror. Suppose that a business routinely receives shipments from a certain supplier and always notifies that supplier when defective goods are rejected. In this situation, silence regarding a shipment will constitute acceptance.

COMMUNICATION OF ACCEPTANCE In a bilateral contract, communication of acceptance is necessary because acceptance is in the form of a promise (not performance), and the contract is formed when the promise is made (rather than when the act is performed). Communication of acceptance is not necessary if the offer dispenses with the requirement, however, or if the offer can be accepted by silence.

Because a unilateral contract calls for the full performance of some act, acceptance is usually evident, and notification is therefore unnecessary. Nevertheless, exceptions do exist, such as when the offeror requests notice of acceptance or has no way of determining whether the requested act has been performed.

MODE AND TIMELINESS OF ACCEPTANCE In bilateral contracts, acceptance must be timely. The general rule is that acceptance in a bilateral contract is timely if it is made before the offer is terminated. Problems may arise, though, when the parties involved are not dealing face to face. In such situations, the offeree should use an authorized mode of communication.

The Mailbox Rule. Acceptance takes effect, thus completing formation of the contract, at the time the offeree sends or delivers the communication via the mode expressly or impliedly authorized by the offeror. This is the so-called mailbox rule, which the majority of courts follow. Under this rule, if the authorized mode of communication is the mail, then an acceptance becomes valid when it is dispatched (placed in the control of the U.S. Postal Service)—not when it is received by the offeror. (Note, however, that if the offer stipulates when acceptance will be effective, then the offer will not be effective until the time specified.)

13. As noted in Footnote 9, in regard to sales contracts, the UCC provides that an acceptance may still be valid even if some terms are added. The new terms are simply treated as proposed additions to the contract.

The mailbox rule does not apply to instantaneous forms of communication, such as when the parties are dealing face to face, by telephone, or by fax. There is still some uncertainty in the courts as to whether e-mail should be considered an instantaneous form of communication to which the mailbox rule does not apply. If the parties have agreed to conduct transactions electronically and if the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA—discussed later in this chapter) applies, then e-mail is considered sent when it either leaves the control of the sender or is received by the recipient. This rule takes the place of the mailbox rule when the UETA applies but essentially allows an e-mail acceptance to become effective when sent (as it would if sent by U.S. mail).

Authorized Means of Acceptance. A means of communicating acceptance can be expressly authorized by the offeror or impliedly authorized by the facts and circumstances surrounding the situation or by law.¹⁴ An acceptance sent by means not expressly or impliedly authorized normally is not effective until it is received by the offeror.

When an offeror specifies how acceptance should be made (for example, by overnight delivery), express authorization is said to exist, and the contract is not formed unless the offeree uses that specified mode of acceptance. Moreover, both offeror and offeree are bound in contract the moment this means of acceptance is employed. For example, Shaylee & Perkins, a Massachusetts firm, offers to sell a container of antique furniture to Leaham’s Antiques in Colorado. The offer states that Leaham’s must accept the offer via FedEx overnight delivery. The acceptance is effective (and a binding contract is formed) the moment that Leaham’s gives the overnight envelope containing the acceptance to the FedEx driver.

If the offeror does not expressly authorize a certain mode of acceptance, then acceptance can be made by any reasonable means.¹⁵ Courts look at the prevailing business usages and the surrounding circumstances to determine whether the mode of acceptance used was reasonable. Usually, the offeror’s choice of a particular means in making the offer implies that the offeree can use the same or a faster means for acceptance. Thus, if the offer is made via priority mail, it would be reasonable to accept the offer via priority mail or by a faster method, such as by fax or FedEx.

Substitute Method of Acceptance. If the offeror authorizes a particular method of acceptance, but the offeree accepts by a different means, the acceptance may still be effective if the substituted method serves the same purpose as the authorized means. The acceptance is not effective on dispatch, though, and no contract will be formed until the acceptance is received by the offeror. For example, an offer specifies acceptance by FedEx overnight delivery, but the offeree instead accepts by UPS overnight delivery. The substitute method of acceptance will still be effective, but the contract will not be formed until the offeror receives the UPS delivery (rather than the day before, when the letter was given to the carrier).

AGREEMENT IN E-CONTRACTS

As previously noted, numerous contracts are formed online. Electronic contracts, or e-contracts, must meet the same basic requirements (agreement, consideration, contractual capacity, and legality) as paper contracts. Disputes concerning e-contracts, however, tend to center on contract terms and whether the parties voluntarily agreed to those terms.

Online contracts may be formed not only for the sale of goods and services but also for licensing. The “sale” of software generally involves a license, or a right to use the software, rather than the passage of title (ownership rights) from the seller to the buyer. For example, Galynn wants to obtain software that will allow her to work on spreadsheets on her BlackBerry. She goes online and purchases GridMagic. During the transaction, she has to click on several on-screen “I agree” boxes to indicate that she understands that she is purchasing only the right to use the software and will not obtain any ownership rights. After she agrees to these terms (the licensing agreement), she can download the software.

14. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 30, provides that an offer invites acceptance “by any medium reasonable in the circumstances,” unless the offer is specific about the means of acceptance.

15. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 30. This is also the rule under UCC 2–206(1)(a).

As you read through the following subsections, keep in mind that although we typically refer to the offeror and the offeree as a seller and a buyer, in many online transactions these parties would be more accurately described as a licensor and a licensee.

Online Offers

Sellers doing business via the Internet can protect themselves against contract disputes and legal liability by creating offers that clearly spell out the terms that will govern their transactions if the offers are accepted. All important terms should be conspicuous and easy to view.

DISPLAYING THE OFFER The seller's Web site should include a hypertext link to a page containing the full contract so that potential buyers are made aware of the terms to which they are assenting. The contract generally must be displayed online in a readable format, such as a twelve-point typeface. All provisions should be reasonably clear. Suppose that Netquip sells a variety of heavy equipment, such as trucks and trailers, on its Web site. Because Netquip's pricing schedule is very complex, the schedule must be fully provided and explained on the Web site. In addition, the terms of the sale (such as any warranties and the refund policy) must be fully disclosed.

PROVISIONS TO INCLUDE An important rule to keep in mind is that the offeror (the seller) controls the offer and thus the resulting contract. The seller should therefore anticipate the terms he or she wants to include in a contract and provide for them in the offer. In some instances, a standardized contract form may suffice. At a minimum, an online offer should include the following provisions:

1. Acceptance of terms. A clause that clearly indicates what constitutes the buyer's agreement to the terms of the offer, such as a box containing the words "I accept" that the buyer can click. (Mechanisms for accepting online offers will be discussed in detail later in the chapter.)
2. Payment. A provision specifying how payment for the goods (including any applicable taxes) must be made.
3. Return policy. A statement of the seller's refund and return policies.
4. Disclaimer. Disclaimers of liability for certain uses of the goods. For example, an online seller of business forms may add a disclaimer that the seller does not accept responsibility for the buyer's reliance on the forms rather than on an attorney's advice.

5. Limitation on remedies. A provision specifying the remedies available to the buyer if the goods are found to be defective or if the contract is otherwise breached. Any limitation of remedies should be clearly spelled out.
6. Privacy policy. A statement indicating how the seller will use the information gathered about the buyer.
7. Dispute resolution. Provisions relating to dispute settlement, such as an arbitration clause or a forum-selection clause (discussed next).

DISPUTE-SETTLEMENT PROVISIONS Online offers frequently include provisions relating to dispute settlement. For example, the offer might include an arbitration clause specifying that any dispute arising under the contract will be arbitrated in a designated forum.

Many online contracts contain a forum-selection clause indicating the forum, or location (such as a court or jurisdiction), in which contract disputes will be resolved. As discussed in Chapter 2, significant jurisdictional issues may arise when parties are at a great distance, as they often are when they form contracts via the Internet. A forum-selection clause will help to avert future jurisdictional problems and also help to ensure that the seller will not be required to appear in court in a distant state.

CASE IN POINT Before advertisers can place ads through Google, Inc., they must agree to certain terms that are displayed in an online window. These terms include a forum-selection clause, which provides that any dispute is to be "adjudicated in Santa Clara County, California." Lawrence Feldman, who advertised through Google, complained that he was overcharged and filed a lawsuit against Google in a federal district court in Pennsylvania. The court held that Feldman had agreed to the forum-selection clause in Google's online contract and transferred the case to a court in Santa Clara County.¹⁶

Some online contracts might also include a choice-of-law clause in which the parties specify that any dispute arising out of the contract will be settled in accordance with the law of a particular jurisdiction, such as a state or country. As will be discussed in Chapter 23, choice-of-law clauses are particularly common in international contracts, but they may also appear in e-contracts to specify which state's laws will govern in the United States.

16. Feldman v. Google, Inc., 513 F.Supp.2d 229 (E.D.Pa. 2007).

Online Acceptances

The Restatement (Second) of Contracts, which, as noted earlier, is a compilation of common law contract principles, states that parties may agree to a contract “by written or spoken words or by other action or by failure to act.”¹⁷ The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), which governs sales contracts, has a similar provision. Section 2–204 of the UCC states that any contract for the sale of goods “may be made in any manner sufficient to show agreement, including conduct by both parties which recognizes the existence of such a contract.”

CLICK-ON AGREEMENTS The courts have used the Restatement and UCC provisions to conclude that a binding contract can be created by conduct, including the act of clicking on a box indicating “I accept” or “I agree” to accept an online offer. The agreement resulting from such an acceptance is often called a click-on agreement (sometimes referred to as a click-on license or click-wrap agreement). Exhibit 11–1 shows a portion of a typical click-on agreement that accompanies a software package.

Generally, the law does not require that the parties have read all of the terms in a contract for it to be effective. Therefore, clicking on a box that states “I agree” to certain terms can be enough. The terms may be contained on a Web site through which the buyer is obtaining goods or services, or they may appear on a computer screen when software is loaded from a CD-ROM or DVD or downloaded from the Internet.

SHRINK-WRAP AGREEMENTS With a shrink-wrap agreement (or shrink-wrap license), the terms are expressed inside the box in which the goods are packaged. (The term shrink-wrap refers to the plastic that covers the box.) Usually, the party who opens the box is told that she or he agrees to the terms by keeping whatever is in the box. Similarly, when a purchaser opens a software package, he or she agrees to abide by the terms of the limited license agreement. In most instances, a shrink-wrap agreement is not between a retailer and a buyer, but between the manufacturer of the hardware or software and the ultimate buyer-user of the product. The terms generally concern warranties, remedies, and other issues associated with the use of the product.

17. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 19.

EXHIBIT 11–1 • A Click-On Agreement Sample

This exhibit illustrates an online offer to form a contract. To accept the offer, the user simply clicks on the “I Accept” button.

Shrink-Wrap Agreements and Enforceable Contract Terms. In some cases, the courts have enforced the terms of shrink-wrap agreements in the same way as the terms of other contracts. These courts have reasoned that by including the terms with the product, the seller proposed a contract. The buyer could accept this contract by using the product after having an opportunity to read the terms. Thus, a buyer’s failure to object to terms contained within a shrink-wrapped software package may constitute an acceptance of the terms by conduct. Also, it seems practical from a business’s point of view to enclose a full statement of the legal terms of a sale with the product rather than to read the statement over the phone, for example, when a buyer calls to order the product.

Shrink-Wrap Terms That May Not Be Enforced. Nevertheless, the courts have sometimes refused to enforce certain terms included in shrink-wrap agreements because the buyers did not expressly consent to them. One factor that courts consider important is whether the parties form their contract before or after the seller communicates the terms of the shrink-wrap agreement to the buyer. If a buyer orders a product over the telephone, for instance, and is not informed of an arbitration clause or forum-selection clause at that time, the buyer clearly has not expressly agreed to these terms. If the buyer discovers the clauses after the parties entered into their contract, a court may conclude that those terms were proposals for additional terms and were not part of the contract.

BROWSE-WRAP TERMS Like the terms of click-on agreements, browse-wrap terms can occur in transactions conducted over the Internet. Unlike click-on agreements, however, browse-wrap terms do not require Internet users to assent to the terms before, say, downloading or using certain software. In other words, a person can install the software without clicking “I agree” to the terms of a license. Browse-wrap terms are often unenforceable because they do not satisfy the agreement requirement of contract formation.¹⁸

CASE IN POINT Netscape Communications Corporation provided free downloadable software called “SmartDownload” on its Web site to those who indicated, by clicking on a designated box, that they wished to obtain it. On the Web site’s download page was a reference to a license agreement that the user could view only by scrolling to the next screen. In other words, the user did not have to agree to the terms of the license before downloading the software. One of the terms required all disputes to be submitted to arbitration in California. When a group of users filed a lawsuit against Netscape in New York, the court held that the arbitration clause in the browse-wrap license agreement was unenforceable because users were not required to indicate their assent to the agreement.¹⁹

E-Signature Technologies

Today, numerous technologies allow electronic documents to be signed. An e-signature has been defined as “an electronic sound, symbol, or process attached to or logically associated with a record and executed or adopted by a person with the intent to sign the record.”²⁰ Thus, e-signatures include encrypted digital signatures, names (intended as signatures) at the ends of e-mail messages, and clicks on a Web page (if the clicks include some means of identification). The technologies for creating e-signatures generally fall into one of two categories, digitized handwritten signatures and public-key-infrastructure-based digital signatures.

A digitized signature is a graphical image of a handwritten signature. Often, a person creates such a signature using a digital pen and pad, such as an ePad, and special software. For security reasons, the strokes of a person’s signature can be measured by software to authenticate the identity of the person signing (this is referred to as signature dynamics).

In a public-key infrastructure (such as an asymmetric cryptosystem), two mathematically linked but different keys are generated—a private signing key and a public validation key. A digital signature is created when the signer uses the private key to create a unique mark on an electronic document. The appropriate software enables the recipient of the document to use the public key to verify the identity of the signer. A cybernotary, or legally recognized certification authority, issues the key pair, identifies the owner of the keys, and certifies the validity of the public key. The cybernotary also serves as a repository for public keys.

State Laws Governing E-Signatures

Most states have laws governing e-signatures. The problem is that state e-signature laws are not uniform. Some states—California is a notable example—prohibit many types of documents from being signed with e-signatures, whereas other states are more permissive. Some states recognize only digital signatures as valid, while others permit additional types of e-signatures.

In an attempt to create more uniformity among the states, in 1999 the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws and the American Law Institute promulgated the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA). To date, the UETA has been adopted, at least in part, by forty-eight states. Among other things, the UETA declares that a signature may not be denied legal effect or enforceability solely because it is in electronic form. (The provisions of the UETA will be discussed in more detail shortly.)

Federal Law on E-Signatures and E-Documents

In 2000, Congress enacted the Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (E-SIGN Act),²¹ which provides that no contract, record, or signature may be “denied legal effect” solely because it is in electronic form. In other words, under this law, an electronic signature is as valid as a signature on paper, and an e-document can be as enforceable as a paper one.

For an e-signature to be enforceable, the contracting parties must have agreed to use electronic signatures. For an electronic document to be valid, it must be in a form that can be retained and accurately reproduced.

18. See, for example, Jesmer v. Retail Magic, Inc., 863 N.Y.S.2d 737 (2008).

19. Specht v. Netscape Communications Corp., 306 F.3d 17 (2d Cir. 2002).

20. This definition is from the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act, which will be discussed later in this chapter.

21. 15 U.S.C. Sections 7001 et seq.

The E-SIGN Act does not apply to all types of documents. Contracts and documents that are exempt include court papers, divorce decrees, evictions, foreclosures, health-insurance terminations, prenuptial agreements, and wills. Also, the only agreements governed by the UCC that fall under this law are those covered by Articles 2 and 2A (sales and lease contracts) and UCC 1–107 and 1–206. Despite these limitations, the E-SIGN Act significantly expanded the possibilities for contracting online.

Partnering Agreements

One way that online sellers and buyers can prevent disputes over signatures in their e-contracts, as well as disputes over the terms and conditions of those contracts, is to form partnering agreements. In a partnering agreement, a seller and a buyer who frequently do business with each other agree in advance on the terms and conditions that will apply to all transactions subsequently conducted electronically. The partnering agreement can also establish special access and identification codes to be used by the parties when transacting business electronically.

A partnering agreement reduces the likelihood that disputes will arise under the contract, because the buyer and the seller have agreed in advance to the terms and conditions that will accompany each sale. Furthermore, if a dispute does arise, a court or arbitration forum will be able to refer to the partnering agreement when determining the parties' intent.

THE UNIFORM ELECTRONIC TRANSACTIONS ACT

As noted earlier, the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA) was set forth in 1999. It represents one of the first comprehensive efforts to create uniform laws pertaining to e-commerce.

The primary purpose of the UETA is to remove barriers to e-commerce by giving the same legal effect to electronic records and signatures as is currently given to paper documents and signatures. As mentioned earlier, the UETA broadly defines an e-signature as “an electronic sound, symbol, or process attached to or logically associated with a record and executed or adopted by a person with the intent to sign the record.”²² A record is “information that is inscribed on a tangible medium or that is stored in an electronic or other medium and is retrievable in perceivable [visual] form.”²³

The Scope and Applicability of the UETA

The UETA does not create new rules for electronic contracts but rather establishes that records, signatures, and contracts may not be denied enforceability solely due to their electronic form. The UETA does not apply to all writings and signatures. It covers only electronic records and electronic signatures relating to a transaction. A transaction is defined as an interaction between two or more people relating to business, commercial, or governmental activities.²⁴

The act specifically does not apply to wills or testamentary trusts (see Chapter 52) or to transactions governed by the UCC (other than those covered by Articles 2 and 2A).²⁵ In addition, the provisions of the UETA allow the states to exclude its application to other areas of law.

The UETA does not apply to a transaction unless each of the parties has previously agreed to conduct transactions by electronic means. The agreement need not be explicit, however; it can be implied by the conduct of the parties and the surrounding circumstances.²⁶ For example, a party's agreement can be inferred from a letter or other writing or from some verbal communication. Furthermore, a person who has previously agreed to an electronic transaction can also withdraw his or her consent and refuse to conduct further business electronically. The parties can also agree to opt-out of all or some of the terms of the UETA, but if they do not, then the UETA terms will govern their electronic transactions.

The Federal E-SIGN Act and the UETA

As described earlier, Congress passed the E-SIGN Act in 2000, a year after the UETA was presented to the states for adoption. Thus, a significant issue was to what extent the federal E-SIGN Act preempted the UETA as adopted by the states.

The E-SIGN Act²⁷ refers explicitly to the UETA and provides that if a state has enacted the uniform version of the UETA, it is not preempted by the E-SIGN Act. In other words, if the state has enacted the UETA without modification, state law will govern.

22. UETA 102(8).

23. UETA 102(15).

24. UETA 2(12) and 3.

25. UETA 3(b).

26. UETA 5(b), and Comment 4B.

27. 15 U.S.C. Section 7002(2)(A)(i).

The problem is that many states have enacted non-uniform (modified) versions of the UETA, largely for the purpose of excluding other areas of state law from the UETA's terms. The E-SIGN Act specifies that those exclusions will be preempted to the extent that they are inconsistent with the E-SIGN Act's provisions.

The E-SIGN Act explicitly allows the states to enact alternative requirements for the use of electronic records or electronic signatures. Generally, however, the requirements must be consistent with the provisions of the E-SIGN Act, and the state must not give greater legal status or effect to one specific type of technology. Additionally, if a state enacts alternative requirements after the E-SIGN Act was adopted, the state law must specifically refer to the E-SIGN Act. The relationship between the UETA and the E-SIGN Act is illustrated in Exhibit 11–2.

Attributing Electronic Signatures

Under the UETA, if an electronic record or signature is the act of a particular person, the record or signature may be attributed to that person. If a person typed her or his name at the bottom of an e-mail purchase order, that name would qualify as a “signature” and be attributed to the person whose name appeared. Just as in paper contracts, one may use any relevant evidence to prove that the record or signature is or is not the act of the person.²⁸

28. UETA 9.

If any issues arise relating to agency, authority, forgery, or contract formation, the UETA provides that other state laws control. Also, if state laws require a document to be notarized, the UETA allows the electronic signature of a notary public to fulfill this requirement.

The Effect of Errors

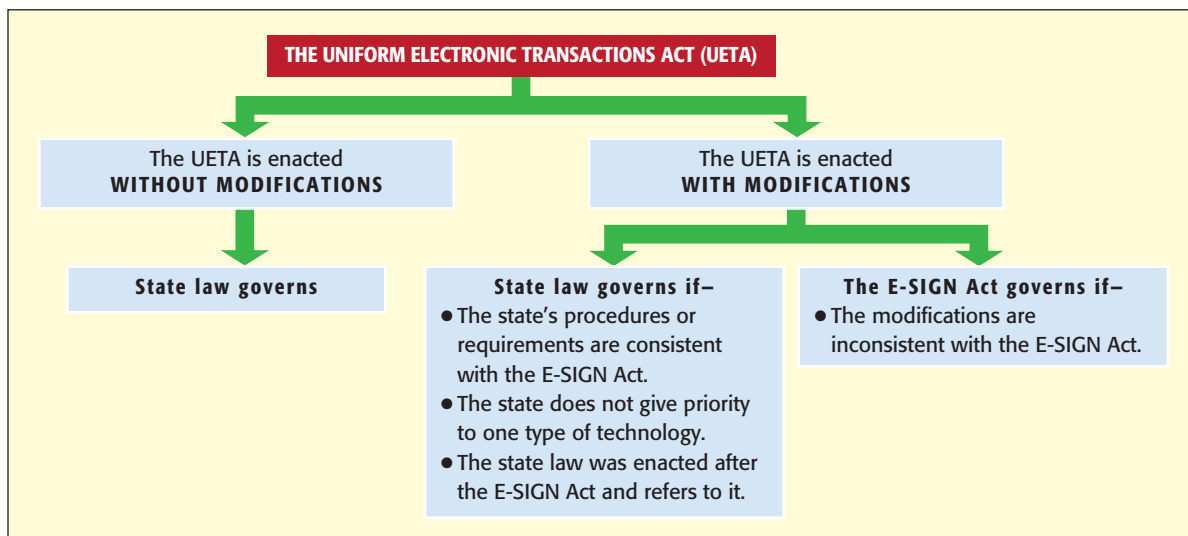

The UETA encourages, but does not require, the use of security procedures (such as encryption) to verify changes to electronic documents and to correct errors. If the parties have agreed to a security procedure and one party does not detect an error because he or she did not follow the procedure, the conforming party can legally avoid the effect of the change or error. If the parties have not agreed to use a security procedure, then other state laws (including contract law governing mistakes—see Chapter 14) will determine the effect of the error on the parties' agreement.

To avoid the effect of errors, a party must promptly notify the other party of the error and of her or his intent not to be bound by the error. In addition, the party must take reasonable steps to return any benefit received: parties cannot avoid a transaction if they have benefited.

Timing

Section 15 of the UETA sets forth provisions relating to the sending and receiving of electronic records. These provisions apply unless the parties agree to different terms. Under Section 15, an electronic record is considered sent when it is properly directed to the intended recipient in a form readable by the recipient's computer system. Once the electronic record leaves the control of the sender or comes under the control of the recipient, the UETA deems it to have been sent. An electronic record is considered received when it enters the recipient's processing system in a readable form—even if no individual is aware of its receipt.

Additionally, the UETA provides that, unless otherwise agreed, an electronic record is to be sent from or received at the party's principal place of business. If a party has no place of business, the provision authorizes the place of sending or receipt to be the party's residence. If a party has multiple places of business, the record should be sent from or received at the location that has the closest relationship to the underlying transaction.

United States. The preeminence of U.S. law in this area is likely to be challenged in the future, however, as Internet use continues to expand worldwide. Already, several international organizations have created their own regulations for global Internet transactions.

For example, the United Nations Convention on the Use of Electronic Communications in International Contracts was completed in 2005. A major goal of this convention is to improve commercial certainty by determining an Internet user's location for legal purposes. The convention also establishes standards for creating functional equivalence between electronic communications and paper documents. The convention also provides that e-signatures will be treated as the equivalent of signatures on paper documents.

Another treaty relevant to e-contracts is the Hague Convention on the Choice of Court Agreements. Although this convention does not specifically address e-commerce and applies only to business-to-business transactions, not business-to-consumer transactions, it will provide more certainty regarding jurisdiction and recognition of judgments by other nations' courts. Such matters are important to both offline and online transactions, so the convention should enhance e-commerce as well as other forms of international trade.

INTERNATIONAL TREATIES AFFECTING E-CONTRACTS

Today, much of the e-commerce conducted on a worldwide basis involves buyers and sellers from the

REVIEWING

Agreement in Traditional and E-Contracts

Shane Durbin wanted to have a recording studio custom-built in his home. He sent invitations to a number of local contractors to submit bids on the project. Rory Amstel submitted the lowest bid, which was $20,000 less than any of the other bids Durbin received. Durbin called Amstel to ascertain the type and quality of the materials that were included in the bid and to find out if he could substitute a superior brand of acoustic tiles for the same bid price. Amstel said he would have to check into the price difference. The parties also discussed a possible start date for construction. Two weeks later, Durbin changed his mind and decided not to go forward with his plan to build a recording studio. Amstel filed a suit against Durbin for breach of contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did Amstel's bid meet the requirements of an offer? Explain.
2. Was there an acceptance of the offer? Why or why not?
3. Suppose that the court determines that the parties did not reach an agreement. Further suppose that Amstel, in anticipation of building Durbin's studio, had purchased materials and refused other jobs so that he would have time in his schedule for Durbin's project. Under what theory discussed in the chapter might Amstel attempt to recover these costs?
4. How is an offer terminated? Assuming that Durbin did not inform Amstel that he was rejecting the offer, was the offer terminated at any time described here? Explain.

 DEBATE THIS: The terms and conditions in click-on agreements are so long and detailed that no one ever reads the agreement. Therefore, the act of clicking on "Yes, I agree" is not really an acceptance.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

11-1. Agreement Ball writes to Sullivan and inquires how much Sullivan is asking for a specific forty-acre tract of land Sullivan owns. In a letter received by Ball, Sullivan states, "I will not take less than $60,000 for the forty-acre tract as specified." Ball immediately sends Sullivan a fax stating, "I accept your offer for $60,000 for the forty-acre tract as specified." Discuss whether Ball can hold Sullivan to a contract for the sale of the land.

11-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Offer and Acceptance.

Schmidt, operating a sole proprietorship, has a large piece of used farm equipment for sale. He offers to sell the equipment to Barry for $10,000. Discuss the legal effects of the following events on the offer:

ing events on the offer:

- (a) Schmidt dies prior to Barry's acceptance, and at the time he accepts, Barry is unaware of Schmidt's death.
- (b) The night before Barry accepts, fire destroys the equipment.
- (c) Barry pays $100 for a thirty-day option to purchase the equipment. During this period, Schmidt dies, and later Barry accepts the offer, knowing of Schmidt's death.
- (d) Barry pays $100 for a thirty-day option to purchase the equipment. During this period, Barry dies, and Barry's estate accepts Schmidt's offer within the stipulated time period.

- For a sample answer to Question 11-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

11-3. Online Acceptance Anne is a reporter for Daily Business Journal, a print publication consulted by investors and other businesspersons. She often uses the Internet to perform research for the articles that she writes for the publication. While visiting the Web site of Cyberspace Investments Corp., Anne reads a pop-up window that states, "Our business newsletter, E-Commerce Weekly, is available at a one-year subscription rate of $5 per issue. To subscribe, enter your e-mail address below and click 'SUBSCRIBE.' By subscribing, you agree to the terms of the subscriber's agreement. To read this agreement, click 'AGREEMENT.'" Anne enters her e-mail address, but does not click on "AGREEMENT" to read the terms. Has Anne entered into an enforceable contract to pay for E-Commerce Weekly? Explain.

11-4. Revocation On Thursday, Dennis mailed a letter to Tanya's office offering to sell his car to her for $3,000. On Saturday, having changed his mind, Dennis sent a fax to Tanya's office revoking his offer. Tanya did not go to her office over the weekend and thus did not learn about the revocation until Monday morning, just a few minutes after she had mailed a letter of acceptance to Dennis. When Tanya demanded that Dennis sell his car to her as promised, Dennis claimed that no contract existed because he had revoked his offer prior to Tanya's acceptance. Is Dennis correct? Explain.

11-5. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Offer.

In August 2000, in California, Terry Reigelsperger sought treatment for pain in his lower back from chiropractor James Siller. Reigelsperger felt better after the treatment and did not intend to return for more, although he did not mention this to Siller. Before leaving the office, Reigelsperger signed an "informed consent" form that read, in part, "I intend this consent form to cover the entire course of treatment for my present condition and for any future condition(s) for which I seek treatment." He also signed an agreement that required the parties to submit to arbitration "any dispute as to medical malpractice. . . . This agreement is intended to bind the patient and the health care provider . . . who now or in the future treat[s] the patient." Two years later, Reigelsperger sought treatment from Siller for a different condition relating to his cervical spine and shoulder. Claiming malpractice with respect to the second treatment, Reigelsperger filed a suit in a California state court against Siller. Siller asked the court to order the dispute to be submitted to arbitration. Did Reigelsperger's lack of intent to return to Siller after his first treatment affect the enforceability of the arbitration agreement and consent form? Why or why not? [Reigelsperger v. Siller, 40 Cal.4th 574, 150 P.3d 764, 53 Cal.Rptr.3d 887 (2007)]

11-6. Online Acceptances Internet Archive (IA) is devoted to preserving a record of resources on the Internet for future generations. IA uses the “Wayback Machine” to automatically browse Web sites and reproduce their contents in an archive. IA does not ask the owners’ permission before copying their material but will remove it on request. Suzanne Shell, a resident of Colorado, owns www.profane-justice.org, which is dedicated to providing information to individuals accused of child abuse or neglect. The site warns, “IF YOU COPY OR DISTRIBUTE ANYTHING ON THIS SITE YOU ARE ENTERING INTO A CONTRACT.” The terms, which can be accessed only by clicking on a link, include, among other charges, a fee of $5,000 for each page copied “in advance of printing.” Neither the warning nor the terms require a user to indicate assent. When Shell discovered that the Wayback Machine had copied the contents of her site—approximately eighty-seven times between May 1999 and October 2004—she asked IA to remove the copies from its archive and pay her $100,000. IA removed the copies and filed a suit in a federal district court against Shell, who responded, in part, with a counterclaim for breach of contract. IA filed a motion to dismiss this claim. Did IA contract with Shell? Explain. [Internet Archive v. Shell, 505 F.Supp.2d 755 (D.Colo. 2007)]

11-7. Acceptance Evelyn Kowalchuk, an eighty-eight-year-old widow, and her son, Peter, put their savings into accounts managed by Matthew Stroup. Later, they initiated an arbitration proceeding before the National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD), asserting that Stroup fraudulently or negligently handled their accounts. They asked for an award of $832,000. After the hearing, but before a decision was rendered, Stroup offered to pay the Kowalchuks $285,000, and they e-mailed their acceptance. Stroup signed a settlement agreement and faxed it to the Kowalchuks for their signatures. Meanwhile, the NASD issued an award in the Kowalchuks’ favor for $88,788. Stroup immediately told them that he was withdrawing his settlement “offer.” When Stroup did not pay according to its terms, the Kowalchuks filed a suit in a New York state court against him for breach of contract. Did these parties have a contract? Why or why not? [Kowalchuk v. Stroup, 873 N.Y.S.2d 43 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept. 2009)]

11-8. Offer and Acceptance In 1996, Troy Blackford was gambling at Prairie Meadows Casino when he destroyed a slot machine. After pleading guilty to criminal mischief, Blackford was banned from the casino. In 1998, Blackford was found in the casino, escorted out, and charged with trespass. In 2006, he gambled at the casino again and won $9,387. When Blackford went to collect his winnings, casino employees learned who he was and refused to pay. He sued for breach of contract, contending that he and the casino had an enforceable contract because he had accepted its offer to gamble. The casino argued that it had not made an offer and in fact had banned Blackford from the premises. The trial court held in favor of the casino. The appellate court reversed and ordered a new trial. The casino appealed to the Iowa high court for review. Did the casino make a valid offer to Blackford to gamble and thus create an enforceable contract between them? Explain your answer. [Blackford v. Prairie Meadows Racetrack and Casino, 778 N.W.2d 184 (Sup.Ct. Iowa 2010)]

11-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: E-Contract Disputes.

In 2000 and 2001, Dewayne Hubbert, Elden Craft, Chris Grout, and Rhonda Byington bought computers from Dell Corp. through its Web site. Before buying, Hubbert and the others configured their own computers. To make a purchase, each buyer completed forms on five Web pages. On each page, Dell’s “Terms and Conditions of Sale” were accessible by clicking on a blue hyperlink. A statement on three of the pages read, “All sales are subject to Dell’s Term[s] and Conditions of Sale,” but a buyer was not required to click an assent to the terms to complete a purchase. The terms were also printed on the backs of the invoices and on separate documents contained in the shipping boxes with the computers. Among those terms was a “Binding Arbitration” clause. The computers contained Pentium 4 microprocessors, which Dell advertised as the fastest, most powerful Intel Pentium processors available. In 2002, Hubbert and the others filed a suit in an Illinois state court against Dell, alleging that this marketing was false, misleading, and deceptive. The plaintiffs claimed that the Pentium 4 microprocessor was slower and less powerful, and provided less performance, than either a Pentium III or an AMD Athlon, and at a greater cost. Dell asked the court to compel arbitration. [Hubbert v. Dell Corp., 359 Ill.App.3d 976, 835 N.E.2d 113, 296 Ill.Dec. 258 (5 Dist. 2005)]

- Should the court enforce the arbitration clause in this case? If you were the judge, how would you rule on this issue?
- In your opinion, do shrink-wrap, click-on, and browse-wrap terms impose too great a burden on purchasers? Why or why not?
- An ongoing complaint about shrink-wrap, click-on, and browse-wrap terms is that sellers (often large corporations) draft them and buyers (typically individual consumers) do not read them. Should purchasers be bound in contract by terms that they have not even read? Why or why not?

Go to this text’s Web site at www.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select “Chapter 11.” Click on “Video Questions” and view the video titled Real World Legal: Jack’s Restaurant, Scene 2. Then answer the following questions.

- In regards to the sale of Jack’s Restaurant, Jack (the seller) says that he is going to retain the rights to the restaurant’s frozen food line. The buyers, however, thought that their sales agreement included the rights to all of the restaurant’s signature dishes—whether fresh or frozen. Did the parties have an - “agreement to agree” on the terms of the sale of the restaurant? Why or why not?

- (b) Suppose that Jack previously offered to sell the restaurant to these particular buyers and they had all agreed on the price and date for delivery. Would such an offer meet the definiteness requirement, even if no terms pertained to the frozen food line? Explain.
- (c) Does Jack’s statement that he intended to retain his rights to the frozen food line revoke any earlier offer he may have made to sell the restaurant to these individuals? Why or why not?
- (d) Did the buyers unequivocally accept the terms of the offer that Jack expressed in this scene? Explain.

CHAPTER 12

Consideration

The fact that a promise has been made does not mean the promise can or will be enforced.

Under Roman law, a promise was not enforceable without some sort of causa—that is, a reason for making the promise that was also deemed to be a sufficient reason for enforcing it. Under the common law, a primary basis for the enforcement of promises is consideration. Consideration usually is defined as the value (such as cash) given in return for a promise (in a bilateral contract) or in return for a performance (in a unilateral contract).

SECTION 1

ELEMENTS OF CONSIDERATION

Often, consideration is broken down into two parts: (1) something of legally sufficient value must be given in exchange for the promise; and (2) usually, there must be a bargained-for exchange.

Legal Value

The “something of legally sufficient value” may consist of (1) a promise to do something that one has no prior legal duty to do, (2) the performance of an action that one is otherwise not obligated to undertake, or (3) the refraining from an action that one has a legal right to undertake (called a forbearance). Consideration in bilateral contracts normally consists of a promise in return for a promise, as explained in Chapter 10. For example, in a contract for the sale of goods, the seller promises to ship specific goods to the buyer, and the buyer promises to pay for those goods when they are received. Each of these promises constitutes consideration for the contract.

In contrast, unilateral contracts involve a promise in return for a performance. Suppose that Anita said to her neighbor, “When you finish painting the garage, I will pay you $100.” Anita’s neighbor paints the garage. The act of painting the garage is the consideration that creates Anita’s contractual obligation to pay her neighbor $100.

What if, in return for a promise to pay, a person refrains from pursuing harmful habits (a forbearance), such as the use of tobacco and alcohol? Does such forbearance constitute legally sufficient consideration? This was the issue before the court in the following case, which is one of the classics in contract law with respect to consideration.

Hamer v. Sidway

Court of Appeals of New York, Second Division, 124 N.Y. 538, 27 N.E. 256 (1891).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • William E. Story, Sr., was the uncle of William E. Story II. In the presence of family members and guests invited to a family gathering, the elder Story promised to pay his nephew $5,000 ($72,000 in today’s dollars) if he would refrain from drinking, using tobacco, swearing, and playing cards or billiards for money until he reached the age of twenty-one. (Note that in 1869, when this contract was formed, it was legal in New York to drink and play cards for money before the CASE 12.1 CONTINUED ♦ (age of twenty-one.) The nephew agreed and fully performed his part of the bargain. When he reached the age of twenty-one, he wrote and told his uncle that he had kept his part of the agreement and was therefore entitled to $5,000. The uncle replied that he was pleased with his nephew's performance, writing, "I have no doubt but you have, for which you shall have five thousand dollars, as I promised you. I had the money in the bank the day you was twenty-one years old that I intend for you, and you shall have the money certain. . . . P.S. You can consider this money on interest." The nephew received his uncle's letter and thereafter consented that the money should remain with his uncle according to the terms and conditions of the letter. The uncle died about twelve years later without having paid his nephew any part of the $5,000 and interest. The executor of the uncle's estate (Sidway, the defendant in this action) claimed that there had been no valid consideration for the promise and therefore refused to pay the $5,000 (plus interest) to Hamer, a third party to whom the nephew had transferred his rights in the note. The court reviewed the case to determine whether the nephew had given valid consideration under the law.

* * * Courts will not ask whether the thing which forms the consideration does in fact benefit the promisee or a third party, or is of any substantial value to any one. It is enough that something is promised, done, forbore, or suffered by the party to whom the promise is made as consideration for the promise made to him. In general a waiver of any legal right at the request of another party is a sufficient consideration for a promise. Any damage, or suspension, or forbearance of a right will be sufficient to sustain a promise. * * * Now, applying this rule to the facts before us, the promisee used tobacco, occasionally drank liquor, and he had a legal right to do so. That right he abandoned for a period of years upon the strength of the promise of the testator [his uncle] that for such forbearance he would give him $5,000. We need not speculate on the effort which may have been required to give up the use of those stimulants. It is sufficient that he restricted his lawful freedom of action within certain prescribed limits upon the faith of his uncle's agreement * * *. [Emphasis added.]

DECISION AND REMEDY • The court ruled that the nephew had provided legally sufficient consideration by giving up smoking, drinking, swearing, and playing cards or billiards for money until he reached the age of twenty-one and was therefore entitled to the funds.

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY'S LAW • Although this case was decided more than a century ago, the principles enunciated in the case remain applicable to contracts formed today, including online contracts. For a contract to be valid and binding, consideration must be given, and that consideration must be something of legally sufficient value.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • If the nephew had not had a legal right to engage in the behavior that he agreed to forgo, would the result in this case have been different? Explain.

Bargained-for Exchange

The second element of consideration is that it must provide the basis for the bargain struck between the contracting parties. The item of value must be given or promised by the promisor (offeror) in return for the promisee's promise, performance, or promise of performance.

This element of bargained-for exchange distinguishes contracts from gifts. For example, Roberto says to his son, "In consideration of the fact that you are not as wealthy as your brothers, I will pay you $5,000." The fact that the word consideration is used does not, by itself, mean that consideration has been given. Indeed, this is not an enforceable promise because the son does not have to do anything in order to receive the promised $5,000. Because the son does not need to give Roberto something of legal value in return for his promise, there is no bargained-for exchange. Rather, Roberto has simply stated his motive for giving his son a gift.

ADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION

Legal sufficiency of consideration involves the requirement that consideration be something of legally sufficient value in the eyes of the law. Adequacy of consideration involves how much consideration is given. Essentially, adequacy of consideration concerns the fairness of the bargain.

Courts Typically Will Not Consider Adequacy

On the surface, when the items exchanged are of unequal value, fairness would appear to be an issue. In general, however, a court will not question the adequacy of consideration based solely on the comparative value of the things exchanged. In other words, the determination of whether consideration exists does not depend on a comparison of the values of the things exchanged. Something need not be of direct economic or financial value to be considered legally sufficient consideration. In many situations, the exchange of promises and potential benefits is deemed sufficient as consideration.

Under the doctrine of freedom of contract, courts leave it up to the parties to decide what something is worth, and parties are usually free to bargain as they wish. If people could sue merely because they had entered into an unwise contract, the courts would be overloaded with frivolous suits.

Inadequate Consideration May Cause a Court to Examine Whether Voluntary Consent Was Lacking

When there is a large disparity in the amount or value of the consideration exchanged, the inadequate consideration may raise a red flag for a court to look more closely at the bargain. This is because shockingly inadequate consideration can indicate that fraud, duress, or undue influence was involved or that the element of bargained-for exchange was lacking. It may also cause a judge to question whether the contract is so one sided that it is unconscionable,¹ a concept that will be discussed further in Chapter 13.

Judges are troubled about enforcing unequal bargains, and it is the courts' task to police contracts and make sure that there was not some defect in a contract's formation that negates mutual assent. If an elderly person sells her Mercedes-Benz convertible to her neighbor for $5,000 even though it is worth well over $50,000, the disparity in value may indicate that the sale involved undue influence or fraud. A judge would thus want to make sure that the person voluntarily entered into this agreement.

SECTION 3

AGREEMENTS THAT LACK CONSIDERATION

Sometimes, one of the parties (or both parties) to an agreement may think that consideration has been exchanged when in fact it has not. Here, we look at some situations in which the parties' promises or actions do not qualify as contractual consideration.

Preexisting Duty

Under most circumstances, a promise to do what one already has a legal duty to do does not constitute legally sufficient consideration.² The preexisting legal duty may be imposed by law or may arise out of a previous contract. A sheriff, for example, cannot collect a reward for providing information leading to the capture of a criminal if the sheriff already has a legal duty to capture the criminal.

Likewise, if a party is already bound by contract to perform a certain duty, that duty cannot serve as consideration for a second contract.³ For example, Bauman-Bache, Inc., begins construction on a seven-story office building and after three months demands an extra $75,000 on its contract. If the extra $75,000 is not paid, the contractor will stop working. The owner of the land, finding no one else to complete the construction, agrees to pay the extra $75,000. The agreement is unenforceable because it is not supported by legally sufficient consideration; Bauman-Bache had a preexisting contractual duty to complete the building.

UNFORESEEN DIFFICULTIES The rule regarding pre-existing duty is meant to prevent extortion and the so-called holdup game. What happens, though, when an honest contractor who has contracted with a landowner to construct a building runs into extraordinary difficulties that were totally unforeseen at the time the contract was formed? In the interests of fairness and equity, the courts sometimes allow exceptions to the preexisting duty rule. Therefore, if a landowner agrees to pay extra compensation to the contractor for overcoming unforeseen difficulties (such as having to use special digging equipment to remove an unforeseen obstacle), the court may refrain from applying the preexisting duty rule and enforce the agreement. When the unforeseen difficulties that give rise to a contract modification are the types of risks ordinarily assumed in business, however, the courts will usually assert the preexisting duty rule.

RESCISSION AND NEW CONTRACT The law recognizes that two parties can mutually agree to rescind, or cancel, their contract, at least to the extent that it is executory (still to be carried out). Rescission⁴ is the unmaking of a contract so as to return the parties to the positions they occupied before the contract was made. Sometimes, parties rescind a contract and make a new contract at the same time. When this occurs, it is often difficult to determine whether there was consideration for the new contract, or whether the parties had a preexisting duty under the previous contract. If a court finds there was a preexisting duty, then the new contract will be invalid because there was no consideration.

Past Consideration

Promises made in return for actions or events that have already taken place are unenforceable. These promises lack consideration in that the element of bargained-for exchange is missing. In short, you can bargain for something to take place now or in the future but not for something that has already taken place. Therefore, past consideration is no consideration.

Suppose that Elsie, a real estate agent, does her friend Judy a favor by selling Judy's house and not charging a commission. Later, Judy says to Elsie, "In return for your generous act, I will pay you $3,000." This promise involves past consideration. Consequently, a court would not enforce it. Judy is simply creating a situation in which she presents a gift to Elsie.

CASE IN POINT Jamil Blackmon became friends with Allen Iverson when Iverson was a high school student who showed tremendous promise as an athlete. One evening, Blackmon suggested that Iverson use "The Answer" as a nickname in the summer league basketball tournaments. Blackmon said that Iverson would be "The Answer" to all of the National Basketball Association's woes. Later that night, Iverson said that he would give Blackmon 25 percent of any proceeds from the merchandising of products that used "The Answer" as a logo or a slogan. Because Iverson's promise was made in return for past consideration, it was unenforceable; in effect, Iverson stated his intention to give Blackmon a gift.⁵

As you will read in Chapter 13, an employer will often ask an employee to sign a noncompete agreement, also called a covenant not to compete. Under such an agreement, the employee agrees not to work for competitors of the employer for a certain period of time after the employment relationship ends. In the following case, the court had to decide if continued employment constituted valid consideration for a noncompete agreement or if it was past consideration.

Access Organics, Inc. v. Hernandez

Supreme Court of Montana, 341 Mont. 73, 175 P.3d 899 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Bonnie Poux hired Andy Hernandez to sell organic produce for her sole proprietorship, Access Organics, Inc. Four months later, he was promoted to sales manager. Soon after, he signed a noncompete agreement in which he agreed "not to directly or indirectly compete with the business . . . for a period of two years following termination of employment." Later, the business encountered financial difficulties. Hernandez left and went into business with another former employee to compete with Access Organics in the sale of produce in the same part of Montana. Poux then sued to enforce the noncompete agreement. The trial court found that Hernandez had violated the noncompete agreement and ordered him not to compete directly with Access Organics for the CASE 12.2 CONTINUED ♦ two-year period called for in the agreement. The court held that the agreement was valid because it was supported by consideration, which was continued employment at Access Organics at the time the agreement was signed. Hernandez appealed.

* * * *

Hernandez argues that the non-compete agreement is invalid and unenforceable, because it is not supported by good consideration. Access Organics contends that Hernandez's salary and continued employment supplied sufficient consideration.

Consideration exists if the employee enters into the non-compete agreement at the time of hiring. During pre-employment negotiations, the employee and the employer engage in a bargained-for exchange: the employer obtains the desired non-compete agreement, and in return, the employee receives employment. The non-compete agreement is simply a condition of employment which the employee takes into account when accepting or rejecting the employment offer. Here, the agreement purports to offer employment in exchange for Hernandez's promise not to compete: "as an inducement for Access Organics * * * to employ Andy Hernandez, he * * * hereby agrees not to * * * compete * * *."

However, Hernandez signed the agreement more than four months after accepting his initial employment offer from Access Organics. The record clearly shows that the agreement was not signed as part of Access Organics's pre-employment negotiations with Hernandez. The basic precepts of black letter contract law teach us that "past consideration is not sufficient to support a promise." Thus, prior work may not serve as consideration. Access Organics's initial offer of employment to Hernandez is past consideration and may not serve as consideration for the non-compete agreement signed four months later. [Emphasis added.]

However, "afterthought agreements"—non-compete agreements signed by employees after the date of hire—are not automatically invalid. Non-compete agreements entered into by existing employees may be supported by independent consideration. For example, an employer may provide an employee with a raise or promotion in exchange for signing a non-compete agreement. In such instances, the salary increase or promotion serves as good consideration. Access to trade secrets or other confidential information may also suffice as a form of good consideration. In each of these examples, the employee receives a benefit which constitutes good consideration in exchange for his or her promise not to compete. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

When a current employee is required to sign a non-compete agreement, the employer and employee are not on equal bargaining ground: the employee is vulnerable to heavy economic pressure to sign the agreement in order to keep his job. Thus, in the context of non-compete agreements, we require clear evidence that the employee received good consideration in exchange for bargaining away some of his post-employment freedom to practice the profession or trade of his choice.

* * * *

We conclude that the covenant not to compete between Andy Hernandez and Access Organics is unenforceable for lack of consideration. Thus, the District Court erred in determining that the agreement was enforceable as a matter of law. Since the agreement is unenforceable as a matter of law, the District Court also erred in granting the preliminary injunction against Hernandez. Thus, we reverse and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

DECISION AND REMEDY • Montana's highest court held that the noncompete agreement between the employer and the employee was invalid because it was not supported by consideration. Because no contract had been formed, the trial court's injunction enforcing the agreement against Hernandez was removed.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • How could Access Organics have obtained a noncompete agreement from Hernandez that would have been enforced?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Would an economic recession and global financial crisis excuse a former employee from having to comply with a noncompete clause that he or she had signed? Why or why not?

Illusory Promises

If the terms of the contract express such uncertainty of performance that the promisor has not definitely promised to do anything, the promise is said to be illusory—without consideration and unenforceable. A promise is illusory when it fails to bind the promisor. For example, the president of Tuscan Corporation says to her employees, “All of you have worked hard, and if profits continue to remain high, a 10 percent bonus at the end of the year will be given—if management thinks it is warranted.” The employees continue to work hard, and profits remain high, but no bonus is given. This is an illusory promise, or no promise at all, because performance depends solely on the discretion of the president (the management). There is no bargained-for consideration. The statement indicates only that management may or may not do something in the future. The president is not obligated now or later.

OPTION-TO-CANCEL CLAUSES Sometimes, option-to-cancel clauses in term contracts present problems in regard to consideration. When the promisor has the option to cancel the contract before performance has begun, then the promise is illusory. For example, Abe contracts to hire Chris for one year at $5,000 per month, reserving the right to cancel the contract at any time. On close examination of these words, you can see that Abe has not actually agreed to hire Chris, as Abe could cancel without liability before Chris started performance. This contract is therefore illusory.

But if Abe instead reserves the right to cancel the contract at any time after Chris has begun performance by giving Chris thirty days’ notice, the promise is not illusory. Abe, by saying that he will give Chris thirty days’ notice, is relinquishing the opportunity (legal right) to hire someone else instead of Chris for a thirty-day period. If Chris works for one month, at the end of which Abe gives him thirty days’ notice, Chris has an enforceable claim for $10,000 in salary.⁶

REQUIREMENTS AND OUTPUT CONTRACTS Problems with consideration may also arise in other types of contracts because of uncertainty of performance.⁷ Uncertain performance is characteristic of requirements and output contracts, for example. In a requirements contract, a buyer and a seller agree that the buyer will purchase from the seller all of the goods of a designated type that the buyer needs, or requires. In an output contract, the buyer and seller agree that the buyer will purchase from the seller all of what the seller produces, or the seller’s output. These types of contracts will be discussed further in Chapter 19.

Concept Summary 12.1 provides a convenient summary of the main aspects of consideration.

6. For another example, see Vanegas v. American Energy Services, 302 S.W.3d 299 (Tex. 2009).

7. See, for example, Johnson Controls, Inc. v. TRW Vehicle Safety Systems, 491 F.Supp.2d 707 (E.D.Mich. 2007).

CONCEPT SUMMARY 12.1

Consideration

Elements of Consideration	Consideration is the value given in exchange for a promise. A contract cannot be formed without sufficient consideration. Consideration is often broken down into two elements: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Legal value—Something of legally sufficient value must be given in exchange for a promise. This may consist of a promise, a performance, or a forbearance. 2. Bargained-for exchange—There must be a bargained-for exchange.
Adequacy of Consideration	Adequacy of consideration relates to how much consideration is given and whether a fair bargain was reached. Courts will inquire into the adequacy of consideration (if the consideration is legally sufficient) only when fraud, undue influence, duress, or the lack of a bargained-for exchange may be involved.
Agreements That Lack Consideration	Consideration is lacking in the following situations: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Preexisting duty—Consideration is not legally sufficient if one is either by law or by contract under a preexisting duty to perform the action being offered as consideration for a new contract. 2. Past consideration—Actions or events that have already taken place do not constitute legally sufficient consideration. 3. Illusory promises—When the nature or extent of performance is too uncertain, the promise is rendered illusory and unenforceable.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS

Businesspersons and others often enter into contracts to settle legal claims. It is important to understand the nature of consideration given in these kinds of settlement agreements, or contracts. Claims are commonly settled through an accord and satisfaction, in which a debtor offers to pay a lesser amount than the creditor purports to be owed. Claims may also be settled by the signing of a release or a covenant not to sue.

Accord and Satisfaction

In an accord and satisfaction, a debtor offers to pay, and a creditor accepts, a lesser amount than the creditor originally claimed was owed. The accord is the agreement under which one of the parties undertakes to give or perform, and the other to accept, in satisfaction of a claim, something other than that on which the parties originally agreed. Satisfaction is the performance (usually payment) that takes place after the accord is executed. A basic rule is that there can be no satisfaction unless there is first an accord. For accord and satisfaction to occur, the amount of the debt must be in dispute.

LIQUIDATED DEBTS If a debt is liquidated, accord and satisfaction cannot take place. A liquidated debt is one whose amount has been ascertained, fixed, agreed on, settled, or exactly determined. For example, Barbara Kwan signs an installment loan contract with her banker in which she agrees to pay a specified rate of interest on a specified amount of borrowed funds at monthly intervals for two years. Because the total obligation is precisely known to both parties, it is a liquidated debt.

Suppose that Kwan has missed her last two payments on the loan and the creditor demands that she pay the overdue debt. Kwan makes a partial payment and states that she believes this payment is all she should have to pay and that the debt will be satisfied if the creditor accepts the payment. In the majority of states, acceptance of a lesser sum than the entire amount of a liquidated debt is not satisfaction, and the balance of the debt is still legally owed. The reason for this rule is that the debtor has given no consideration to satisfy the obligation of paying the balance to the creditor—because the debtor has a preexisting legal obligation to pay the entire debt.

UNLIQUIDATED DEBTS An unliquidated debt is the opposite of a liquidated debt. The amount of the debt is not settled, fixed, agreed on, ascertained, or determined, and reasonable persons may differ over the amount owed. In these circumstances, acceptance of payment of a lesser sum operates as satisfaction, or discharge, of the debt because there is valid consideration—the parties give up a legal right to contest the amount in dispute.

Release

A release is a contract in which one party forfeits the right to pursue a legal claim against the other party. It bars any further recovery beyond the terms stated in the release. Releases will generally be binding if they are (1) given in good faith, (2) stated in a signed writing (which is required in many states), and (3) accompanied by consideration.⁸

Clearly, an individual is better off knowing the extent of his or her injuries or damages before signing a release. For example, Lucy's car is damaged in an automobile accident caused by Donovan's negligence. Donovan offers to give her $3,000 if she will release him from further liability resulting from the accident. Lucy believes that this amount will cover her damage, so she agrees and signs the release. Later, Lucy discovers that it will cost $4,200 to repair her car. Can Lucy collect the balance from Donovan?

The answer normally is no; Lucy is limited to the $3,000 specified in the release. Why? The reason is that a valid contract existed. Lucy and Donovan both voluntarily agreed to the terms in the release, and sufficient consideration was present. The consideration was the legal right Lucy forfeited to sue to recover damages, should they be more than $3,000, in exchange for Donovan's promise to give her $3,000.

Covenant Not to Sue

Unlike a release, a covenant not to sue does not always bar further recovery. The parties simply substitute a contractual obligation for some other type of legal action based on a valid claim. Suppose (continuing the earlier example) that Lucy agrees with Donovan not to sue for damages in a tort action if he will pay for the damage to her car. If Donovan fails to pay, Lucy can bring an action against him for breach of contract.

8. Under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), a written, signed waiver or renunciation by an aggrieved party discharges any further liability for a breach, even without consideration.

SECTION 5

EXCEPTIONS TO THE CONSIDERATION REQUIREMENT

There are some exceptions to the rule that only promises supported by consideration are enforceable. The following types of promises may be enforced despite the lack of consideration:

1. Promises that induce detrimental reliance, under the doctrine of promissory estoppel.
2. Promises to pay debts that are barred by a statute of limitations.
3. Promises to make charitable contributions.

Promissory Estoppel

Under the doctrine of promissory estoppel (also called detrimental reliance), a person who has reasonably and substantially relied on the promise of another may be able to obtain some measure of recovery. This doctrine is applied in a wide variety of contexts in which a promise is otherwise unenforceable, such as when a promise is not supported by consideration. Under this doctrine, a court may enforce an otherwise unenforceable promise to avoid the injustice that would otherwise result.

REQUIREMENTS TO STATE A CLAIM For the promissory estoppel doctrine to be applied, the following elements are required:

1. There must be a clear and definite promise.
2. The promisor should have expected that the promisee would rely on the promise.
3. The promisee reasonably relied on the promise by acting or refraining from some act.
4. The promisee's reliance was definite and resulted in substantial detriment.
5. Enforcement of the promise is necessary to avoid injustice.

If these requirements are met, a promise may be enforced even though it is not supported by consideration.⁹ In essence, the promisor will be estopped (prevented) from asserting the lack of consideration as a defense.

Promissory estoppel is similar in some ways to the doctrine of quasi contract that was discussed in Chapter 10. In both situations, a court is acting in the interests of equity and imposes contract obligations on the parties to prevent unfairness even though no actual contract exists. The difference is that with quasi contracts, no promise was made at all; whereas with promissory estoppel, a promise was made and relied on, but it was unenforceable.

APPLICATION OF THE DOCTRINE Promissory estoppel was originally applied to situations involving gifts (I promise to pay you $1,000 a week so that you will not have to work) and donations to charities (I promise to contribute $50,000 a year to the Raising Giants orphanage). Later, courts began to apply the doctrine to avoid inequity or hardship in other situations, including business transactions.

CASE IN POINT The U.S. Air Force solicited bids for construction of a new building in Anchorage, Alaska. A general contractor, Vern Hickel, contacted eight different subcontractors to find the lowest price on electrical work. Alaska Bussell Electric Company, an electrical subcontractor, told Hickel that it would do the work for $477,498. Hickel reasonably relied on this amount when he submitted his primary bid for the entire project to the Air Force and won the contract. Subsequently, Alaska Bussell realized that it had made a mistake and refused to perform the work for Hickel for $477,498. Hickel had to hire another subcontractor at a substantially higher cost. Under the doctrine of promissory estoppel, Hickel can sue Alaska Bussell for the cost difference because he had detrimentally relied on Alaska Bussell's bid, even though there was no consideration for Alaska Bussell's promise to do the work for $477,498.¹⁰

In the following case, a tenant of a shopping plaza informed the plaza's owner that it wished to expand its business and to lease more space. After the plaza owner had spent a considerable amount of time and funds to accommodate the tenant, the tenant refused to lease the additional space. Whether the plaza owner could recover its costs under a theory of promissory estoppel was the issue before the court.

1861 Group, LLC v. Wild Oats Markets, Inc.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Missouri, ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (2010).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Donald J. STOHR,
District Judge.

* * * *

Plaintiff is a company that owns a shopping plaza called Lammert Center located at 8801–8845 Ladue Road, St. Louis, Missouri. Defendant leased a portion of Lammert Center and operated a grocery business out of that space.

In March 2000, defendant advised plaintiff that it wanted to expand its operations and lease additional space in Lammert Center. At that time, defendant occupied its portion of Lammert Center pursuant to a sublease with Schnuck Markets, Inc. In response to defendant's interest in leasing additional space, plaintiff advised defendant that it would need to relocate other existing Lammert Center tenants to accommodate defendant's plan, which would in turn require plaintiff to terminate or modify existing leases. Plaintiff also advised defendant that it would need to negotiate modifications to lease agreements with several new tenants that were on the verge of agreeing to lease space at Lammert Center. Plaintiff advised defendant that it would incur substantial costs and lost rent to accommodate defendant's plan. Plaintiff advised defendant that expansion into new space would require defendant to terminate its sublease and sign a new lease. Plaintiff advised defendant that by terminating the sublease and signing a new lease plaintiff would incur substantial costs and the loss of valuable corporate guarantees backing defendant's sublease.

As a result of its communications with plaintiff, defendant knew that plaintiff would incur significant costs, lost rents, and other losses in order to accommodate defendant's plan to expand. Defendant promised plaintiff on several occasions that it would continue to negotiate in good faith to enter, ultimately, into a new lease. Plaintiff relied on defendant's promises that it would negotiate in good faith and sign a lease in relocating two existing Lammert Center tenants, incurring costs associated with reconfiguring the rental spaces, terminating leases, and forgiving amounts owed to plaintiff in the process. In addition to relocating other tenants, plaintiff incurred costs in connection with efforts to rework defendant's sublease.

In January 2001, plaintiff, defendant, and Schnuck Markets entered into a termination agreement, in which defendant's sublease with Schnuck Markets and Schnuck Markets's lease with plaintiff would terminate if plaintiff and defendant were able to agree to a new lease by April 30, 2001. The parties agreed to extend that deadline to June 30, 2001, on April 17, 2001, but then on April 20, 2001, defendant cancelled its agreement to extend the deadline. On April 24, 2001, defendant advised plaintiff that it was not going forward with its plan to expand and that it did not intend to enter into a new lease. Defendant also orally advised plaintiff that its plan to expand was only temporarily postponed and that it would like plaintiff to reintroduce the issue of a new lease in one year. Approximately one year later, plaintiff approached defendant about the plan to expand and defendant's promise to negotiate a new lease. Defendant indicated orally that it was not yet ready to expand but would revisit the issue at some point in the future. Ultimately, plaintiff and defendant never agreed to a new lease, and plaintiff alleges that it is entitled to an award of damages of not less than $1,350,000 plus interest, attorney fees, expenses, and costs incurred as a result of its reliance on defendant's promises.

* * * *

In its instant motion [the motion before the court], defendant moves the Court to dismiss Count VII, which is labeled as a claim for promissory estoppel by plaintiff.

Under Missouri law, to state a claim for promissory estoppel, a plaintiff must allege (1) a promise, (2) on which the plaintiff relied to its detriment, (3) in a way the promisor expected or should have expected, and (4) the reliance resulted in an injustice which can be cured only by enforcement of the promise. The promise giving rise to the cause of action must be definite, and the promise must be made in a contractual sense. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * [The plaintiff] has alleged that: (1) defendant promised that if plaintiff made additional space in Lammert Center available to accommodate an expansion, defendant would enter into a new lease with plaintiff after a good faith negotiation of the terms; (2) plaintiff relied on this promise to its detriment when it incurred various costs to make the expanded space available to defendant; (3) defendant was aware of plaintiff's actions to make the expanded space available and was aware that plaintiff's actions were in response to defendant's promise; and (4) plaintiff would suffer the injustice of uncompensated expenditures made in reliance on defendant's promise if defendant's promise is not enforced. The Court finds that such allegations support each of the elements of a claim of promissory estoppel * * * .

* * * *

[Defendant argues] that a promise to negotiate is not definite or certain enough to permit recovery. * * * Under Missouri law, for a promise to be actionable under a theory of promissory estoppel, it must be definite and made in a contractual sense. That is, it must be “as definite and delineated as an offer under contract law.” [Emphasis added.]

In this case, * * * the Court reads the allegations such that defendant promised that it would enter into a new lease if plaintiff made the necessary changes to Lammert Center. That promise was only limited by the requirement that both parties negotiate the terms of the lease in good faith, which is to say that defendant was not promising to sign any lease that plaintiff put in front of it. Rather, once defendant promised it would enter a new lease if plaintiff made the new space available, it was bound to make a good faith effort to reach an agreement on the terms of the lease. Under these allegations, the Court finds that the alleged promise was sufficiently definite to support a claim for promissory estoppel.

* * * *

For the above stated reasons, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that defendant’s motion to dismiss Count VII of plaintiff’s complaint is denied.

QUESTIONS

1. The defendant argued that the promise to renew the lease was not sufficiently definite to support a claim for promissory estoppel. How did the court respond to this argument?
2. Suppose that the plaintiff’s costs in accommodating the defendant’s request had been $5,000 instead of $1,350,000. Would the outcome of this case have been any different? Why or why not?

Promises to Pay Debts Barred by a Statute of Limitations

Statutes of limitations in all states require a creditor to sue within a specified period to recover a debt. If the creditor fails to sue in time, recovery of the debt is barred by the statute of limitations. A debtor who promises to pay a previous debt even though recovery is barred by the statute of limitations makes an enforceable promise. The promise needs no consideration. (Some states, however, require that it be in writing.) In effect, the promise extends the limitations period, and the creditor can sue to recover the entire debt or at least the amount promised. The promise can be implied if the debtor acknowledges the barred debt by making a partial payment.

Charitable Subscriptions

Subscriptions to religious, educational, and charitable institutions are promises to make gifts. Traditionally, these promises were unenforceable because they are not supported by legally sufficient consideration. A gift, after all, is the opposite of bargained-for consideration. The modern view, however, is to make exceptions to the general rule by applying the doctrine of promissory estoppel.

For example, a church solicits and receives pledges (commitments to contribute funds) from church members to erect a new church building. On the basis of these pledges, the church purchases land, hires architects, and makes other contracts that change its position. Because of the church’s detrimental reliance, a court may enforce the pledges under the theory of promissory estoppel. Alternatively, a court may find consideration in the fact that each promise was made in reliance on the other promises of support or that the trustees, by accepting the subscriptions, impliedly promised to complete the proposed undertaking.

REVIEWING Consideration

John operates a motorcycle repair shop from his home but finds that his business is limited by the small size of his garage. Driving by a neighbor’s property, he notices a for-sale sign on a large, metal-sided garage. John contacts the neighbor and offers to buy the building, hoping that it can be dismantled and moved to his own property. The neighbor accepts John’s payment and makes a generous offer in return: if John will help him dismantle the garage, which will take a substantial amount of time, he will help John reassemble it after it has been transported to John's property. They agree to have the entire job completed within two weeks. John spends every day for a week working with his neighbor to disassemble the building. In his rush to acquire a larger workspace, he turns down several lucrative repair jobs. Once the disassembled building has been moved to John's property, however, the neighbor refuses to help John reassemble it as he originally promised. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Are the basic elements of consideration present in the neighbor's promise to help John reassemble the garage? Why or why not?
2. Suppose that the neighbor starts to help John but then realizes that, because of the layout of John's property, putting the building back together will take much more work than dismantling it took. Under which principle discussed in the chapter might the neighbor be allowed to ask for additional compensation?
3. What if John's neighbor made his promise to help reassemble the garage at the time he and John were moving it to John's property, saying, "Since you helped me take it down, I will help you put it back up." Would John be able to enforce this promise? Why or why not?
4. Under what doctrine discussed in the chapter might John seek to recover the profits he lost when he declined to do repair work for one week?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

12-1. Preexisting Duty Tabor is a buyer of file cabinets manufactured by Martin. Martin's contract with Tabor calls for delivery of fifty file cabinets at $40 per cabinet in five equal installments. After delivery of two installments (twenty cabinets), Martin informs Tabor that because of inflation, Martin is losing money and will promise to deliver the remaining thirty cabinets only if Tabor will pay $50 per cabinet. Tabor agrees in writing to do so. Discuss whether Martin can legally collect the additional $100 on delivery to Tabor of the next installment of ten cabinets.

12-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Preexisting Duty.

Bernstein owns a lot and wants to build a house according to a particular set of plans and specifications. She solicits bids from building contractors and receives three bids: one from Carlton for $160,000, one from Friend for $158,000, and one from Shade for $153,000. She accepts Shade's bid. One month after beginning construction of the house, Shade contacts Bernstein and informs her that because of inflation and a recent price hike for materials, he will not finish the house unless Bernstein agrees to pay an extra $13,000. Bernstein reluctantly agrees to pay the additional sum. After the house is finished, however, Bernstein refuses to pay the extra $13,000. Discuss whether Bernstein is legally required to pay this additional amount.

12-3. Consideration Daniel, a recent college graduate, is on his way home for the Christmas holidays from his new job. He gets caught in a snowstorm and is taken in by an elderly couple, who provide him with food and shelter. After the snowplows have cleared the road, Daniel proceeds home. Daniel's father, Fred, is most appreciative of the elderly couple's action and in a letter promises to pay them $500. The elderly couple, in need of funds, accept Fred's offer. Then, because of a dispute between Daniel and Fred, Fred refuses to pay the elderly couple the $500. Discuss whether the couple can hold Fred liable in contract for the services rendered to Daniel.

12-4. Illusory Promises Costello hired Sagan to drive his racing car in a race. Sagan's friend Gideon promised to pay Sagan $3,000 if she won the race. Sagan won the race, but Gideon refused to pay the $3,000. Gideon contended that no legally binding contract had been formed because he had received no consideration from Sagan in exchange for his promise to pay. Sagan sued Gideon for breach of contract, arguing that winning the race was the consideration given in exchange for Gideon's promise to pay. What rule of law discussed in this chapter supports Gideon's claim?

12-5. Accord and Satisfaction Merrick grows and sells blueberries. Maine Wild Blueberry Co. agreed to buy all of Merrick's crop under a contract that left the price unliquidated. Merrick delivered the berries, but a dispute arose over the price. Maine Wild sent Merrick a check with a letter stating that the check was the "final settlement." Merrick cashed the check but filed a suit for breach of contract, claiming that he was owed more. What will the court likely decide in this case? Why?

12-6. Consideration In 1995, Helikon Furniture Co. appointed Tom Gaede as an independent sales agent for the sale of its products in parts of Texas. The parties signed a one-year contract that specified, among other things, the commissions that Gaede would receive. More than a year later, although the parties had not signed a new contract, Gaede was still representing Helikon when it was acquired by a third party. Helikon's new management allowed Gaede to continue to perform for the same commissions and sent him a letter stating that it would make no changes in its sales representatives "for at least the next year." Three months later, in December 1997, the new managers sent Gaede a letter proposing new terms for a contract. Gaede continued to sell Helikon products until May 1997, when he received a letter effectively reducing the amount of his commissions. Gaede filed a suit in a Texas state court against Helikon, alleging breach of contract. Helikon argued, in part, that there was no contract because there was no consideration. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [Gaede v. SK Investments, Inc., 38 S.W.3d 753 (Tex.App.—Houston [14 Dist.] 2001)]

12-7. Settlement of Claims Shoreline Towers Condominium Owners Association in Gulf Shores, Alabama, authorized Resort Development, Inc. (RDI), to manage Shoreline's property. On Shoreline's behalf, RDI obtained a property insurance policy from Zurich American Insurance Co. In October 1995, Hurricane Opal struck Gulf Shores. RDI filed claims with Zurich regarding damage to Shoreline's property. Zurich determined that the cost of the damage was $334,901. Zurich then subtracted an applicable $40,000 deductible and sent checks to RDI totaling $294,901. RDI disputed the amount. Zurich eventually agreed to issue a check for an additional $86,000 in return for RDI's signing a "Release of All Claims." Later, contending that the deductible had been incorrectly applied and that this was a breach of contract, among other things, Shoreline filed a suit against Zurich in a federal district court. How, if at all, should the agreement reached by RDI and Zurich affect Shoreline's claim? Explain. [Shoreline Towers Condominium Owners Association, Inc. v. Zurich American Insurance Co., 196 F.Supp.2d 1210 (S.D.Ala. 2002)]

12-8. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Adequacy of Consideration.

*As a child, Martha Carr once visited her mother's 108-acre tract of unimproved land in Richland County, South Carolina. In 1968, Betty and Raymond Campbell leased the land. Carr, a resident of New York, was diagnosed as having schizophrenia and depression in 1986, was hospitalized five or six times, and subsequently took prescription drugs for the illnesses. In 1996, Carr inherited the Richland property and, two years later, contacted the Campbells about selling the land. Carr asked Betty about the value of the land, and Betty said that the county tax assessor had determined that the land's agricultural value was $54,000. The Campbells knew at the time that the county had assessed the total property value at $103,700 for tax purposes. A real estate appraiser found that the real market value of the property was $162,000. On August 6, Carr signed a contract to sell the land to the Campbells for $54,000. Believing the price to be unfair, however, Carr did not deliver the deed. The Campbells filed a suit in a South Carolina state court against Carr, seeking specific performance of the contract. At trial, an expert real estate appraiser testified that the real market value of the property was $162,000 at the time of the contract. Under what circumstances will a court examine the adequacy of consideration? Are those circumstances present in this case? Should the court enforce the contract between Carr and the Campbells? Explain. [Campbell v. Carr, 361 S.C. 258, 603 S.E.2d 625 (S.C.App. 2004)]*

12-9. Rescission In 2002, Farrokh and Scheherezade Sharabianlou were looking for a location for a printing business. They signed a purchase agreement to buy a building owned by Berenstein Associates for $2 million and deposited $115,000 in escrow until the time of the final purchase. The agreement contained a clause requiring an environmental assessment of the property. This study indicated the presence of trichloroethene and other chemicals used in dry cleaning, and it recommended further study of the contamination. Because of this issue, the bank would not provide financing for the purchase. When the deal fell apart, the Berensteins sued for breach of contract. The Sharabianlous sought the return of their $115,000 deposit and rescission of the contract. The trial court awarded the Berensteins $428,660 in damages due to the reduced value of their property when it was later sold to another party at a lower price. The Sharabianlous appealed. Do they have a good argument for rescission? Explain your answer. [Sharabianlou v. Karp, 181 Cal.App.4th 1133, 105 Cal. Rptr.3d 300 (1st Dist. 2010)]

12-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Promissory Estoppel.

John Sasson and Emily Springer met in January 2002. John worked for the U.S. Army as an engineer. Emily was an attorney with a law firm. Six months later, John bought a townhouse in Randolph, New Jersey, and asked Emily to live with him. She agreed but retained the ownership of her home in Monmouth Beach. John paid the mortgage and the other expenses on the townhouse. He urged Emily to quit her job and work from “our house.” In May 2003, Emily took John’s advice and started her own law practice. In December, John made her the beneficiary of his $150,000 individual retirement account (IRA) and said that he would give her his 2002 BMW M3 car before the end of the next year. He proposed to her in September 2004, giving her a diamond engagement ring and promising to “take care of her” for the rest of her life. Less than a month later, John was critically injured by an accidental blow to his head during a basketball game and died. On behalf of John’s estate, which was valued at $1.1 million, his brother Steven filed a complaint in a New Jersey state court to have Emily evicted from the townhouse. Given these facts, consider the following questions. [In re Estate of Sasson, 387 N.J. Super. 459, 904 A.2d 769 (App.Div. 2006)]

- (a) Based on John’s promise to “take care of her” for the rest of her life, Emily claimed that she was entitled to the townhouse, the BMW, and an additional portion of John’s estate. Under what circumstances would such a promise constitute a valid, enforceable contract? Does John’s promise meet these requirements? Why or why not?
- (b) Whether or not John’s promise is legally binding, is there an ethical basis on which it should be enforced? Is there an ethical basis for not enforcing it? Are there any circumstances under which a promise of support should be—or should not be—enforced? Discuss.

Contract Consideration in Canada

Capacity and Legality

In addition to agreement and consideration, for a contract to be deemed valid the parties to the contract must have contractual capacity—the legal ability to enter into a contractual relationship. Courts generally presume the existence of contractual capacity, but in some situations, when a person is young or mentally incompetent, capacity is lacking or may be questionable. Similarly, contracts calling for the performance of an illegal act are illegal and thus void—they are not contracts at all. In this chapter, we examine contractual capacity and some aspects of illegal bargains.

Realize that capacity and legality are not inherently related other than that they are both contract requirements. We treat these topics in one chapter merely for convenience and reasons of space.

SECTION 1 CONTRACTUAL CAPACITY

Historically, the law has given special protection to those who bargain with the inexperience of youth and those who lack the degree of mental competence required by law. A person who has been determined by a court to be mentally incompetent, for example, cannot form a legally binding contract with another party. In other situations, a party may have the capacity to enter into a valid contract but also have the right to avoid liability under it. For example, minors—or infants, as they are commonly referred to in legal terminology—usually are not legally bound by contracts. In this section, we look at the effect of youth, intoxication, and mental incompetence on contractual capacity.

Minors

Today, in almost all states, the age of majority (when a person is no longer a minor) for contractual purposes is eighteen years.¹ In addition, some states provide for the termination of minority on marriage. Minority status may also be terminated by a minor's emancipation, which occurs when a child's parent or legal guardian relinquishes the legal right to exercise control over the child. Normally, minors who leave home to support themselves are considered emancipated. Several jurisdictions permit minors to petition a court for emancipation themselves. For business purposes, a minor may petition a court to be treated as an adult.

1. The age of majority may still be twenty-one for other purposes, such as the purchase and consumption of alcohol.

The general rule is that a minor can enter into any contract that an adult can, provided that the contract is not one prohibited by law for minors (for example, the sale of tobacco or alcoholic beverages). A contract entered into by a minor, however, is voidable at the option of that minor, subject to certain exceptions. To exercise the option to avoid a contract, a minor need only manifest an intention not to be bound by it. The minor avoids the contract by disaffirming it.

A MINOR'S RIGHT TO DISAFFIRM The legal avoidance, or setting aside, of a contractual obligation is referred to as disaffirmance. To disaffirm, a minor must express his or her intent, through words or conduct, not to be bound to the contract. The minor must disaffirm the entire contract, not merely a portion of it. For example, the minor cannot decide to keep part of the goods purchased under a contract and return the remaining goods.

A contract can ordinarily be disaffirmed at any time during minority² or for a reasonable period after reaching majority. What constitutes a “reasonable” time may vary. Two months would probably be considered reasonable, but except in unusual circumstances, a court may not find it reasonable for a minor to wait a year or more after coming of age to disaffirm. If an individual fails to disaffirm an executed contract within a reasonable time after reaching the age of majority, a court will likely hold that the contract has been ratified (ratification will be discussed shortly).

Note that an adult who enters into a contract with a minor cannot avoid his or her contractual duties on the ground that the minor can do so. Unless the minor exercises the option to disaffirm the contract, the adult party normally is bound by it.

A MINOR'S OBLIGATIONS ON DISAFFIRMANCE

Although all states' laws permit minors to disaffirm contracts (with certain exceptions), states differ on the extent of a minor's obligations on disaffirmance. Courts in most states hold that the minor need only return the goods (or other consideration) subject to the contract, provided the goods are in the minor's possession or control. Even if the minor returns damaged goods, the minor often is entitled to disaffirm the contract and obtain a full refund of the purchase price.

A growing number of states place an additional duty on the minor to restore the adult party to the position she or he held before the contract was made. These courts may hold a minor responsible for damage, ordinary wear and tear, and depreciation of goods that the minor used prior to disaffirmance.

CASE IN POINT Sixteen-year-old Joseph Dodson bought a pickup truck from a used-car dealer. Although the truck developed mechanical problems nine months later, Dodson continued to drive it until it stopped running altogether. Then Dodson disaffirmed the contract and attempted to return the truck to the dealer for a full refund. The dealer refused to accept the pickup or refund the purchase price. Dodson filed a suit. Ultimately, the Tennessee Supreme Court allowed Dodson to disaffirm the contract but required him to compensate the seller for the depreciated value—not the purchase price—of the pickup.³

2. In some states, however, a minor who enters into a contract for the sale of land cannot disaffirm the contract until she or he reaches the age of majority.

3. Dodson v. Shrader, 824 S.W.2d 545 (Tenn.Sup.Ct. 1992) is a seminal case on this subject. See also Restatement (Third) of Restitution, Sections 16 and 33.

EXCEPTIONS TO A MINOR'S RIGHT TO DISAFFIRM

State courts and legislatures have carved out several exceptions to the minor's right to disaffirm. Some contracts, such as marriage contracts and contracts to enlist in the armed services, cannot be avoided as a matter of law, on the ground of public policy. Other contracts may not be disaffirmed for other reasons, including those discussed here.

Misrepresentation of Age. Suppose that a minor tells a seller that she is twenty-one years old when she is really seventeen. Ordinarily, minors can disaffirm contracts even when they have misrepresented their age. Nevertheless, a growing number of states have enacted laws to prohibit disaffirmance in such situations. In some states, misrepresentation of age is enough to prohibit disaffirmance. Other states prohibit disaffirmance by minors who misrepresented their age while engaged in business as an adult. Still other states prevent minors who misrepresented their age from disaffirming a contract unless they can return the consideration received.

Contracts for Necessaries. A minor who enters into a contract for necessities may disaffirm the contract but remains liable for the reasonable value of the goods. Necessaries include whatever is reasonably needed to maintain the minor's standard of living. In general, food, clothing, shelter, and medical services are necessities. What is a necessary for one minor, however, may be a luxury for another, depending on the minors' customary living standard. In addition, what a court considers to be a necessary may depend on what the minor's parents provide. For example, if Shannon is a minor whose parents provide her with a residence, then a contract that Shannon enters to lease an apartment normally will not be classified as a contract for necessities.

Generally, then, for a contract to qualify as a contract for necessities, (1) the item contracted for must be necessary for the minor's subsistence, (2) the value of the necessary item must be appropriate to maintain the minor's standard of living, and (3) the minor must not be under the care of a parent or guardian who is required to supply this item. Unless these three criteria are met, the minor can disaffirm the contract without being liable for the reasonable value of the goods used.

CASE IN POINT Harun Fountain, a minor, was accidentally shot in the back of the head by a playmate and suffered serious injuries, for which he was awarded damages. Fountain received extensive life-saving medical services from Yale Diagnostic Radiology, but his mother refused to pay the $17,694 bill for those services. Yale Diagnostic therefore filed a lawsuit against Fountain directly. The court held that when necessary medical services are rendered to a minor whose parents do not pay for them, equity and justice demand that the minor be responsible for payment of these necessary services.⁴

RATIFICATION In contract law, ratification is the act of accepting and giving legal force to an obligation that previously was not enforceable. A minor who has reached the age of majority can ratify a contract expressly or impliedly. Express ratification takes place when the individual, on reaching the age of majority, states orally or in writing that he or she intends to be bound by the contract. Implied ratification takes place when the minor, on reaching the age of majority, indicates an intent to abide by the contract.

For example, Lin enters into a contract to sell her laptop to Andrew, a minor. If, on reaching the age of majority, Andrew writes a letter to Lin stating that he still agrees to buy the laptop, he has expressly ratified the contract. If, instead, Andrew takes possession of the laptop as a minor and continues to use it well after reaching the age of majority, he has impliedly ratified the contract.

If a minor fails to disaffirm a contract within a reasonable time after reaching the age of majority, then the court must determine whether the conduct constitutes ratification or disaffirmance. Generally, a contract that is executed (fully performed by both parties) is presumed to be ratified. A contract that is still executory (not yet fully performed by both parties) normally is considered to be disaffirmed.

PARENTS' LIABILITY As a general rule, parents are not liable for contracts made by minor children acting on their own. This is why businesses ordinarily require parents to cosign any contract made with a minor. The parents then become personally obligated under the contract to perform the conditions of the contract, even if their child avoids liability. (Although minors normally are personally liable for their own torts, in some states parents can also be held liable for a minor's torts, especially if they failed to exercise proper parental control.)

Concept Summary 13.1 reviews the rules relating to contracts by minors.

Intoxication

Intoxication is a condition in which a person's normal capacity to act or think is inhibited by alcohol or some other drug. A contract entered into by an intoxicated person can be either voidable or valid (and thus enforceable).⁵ If the person was sufficiently intoxicated to lack mental capacity, then

5. Note that if an alcoholic makes a contract while sober, there is no lack of capacity. See Wright v. Fisher, 32 N.W. 605 (Mich. 1887).

CONCEPT SUMMARY 13.1

Contracts by Minors

Concept	Description
General Rule	Contracts entered into by minors are voidable at the option of the minor.
Rules of Disaffirmance	A minor may disaffirm the contract at any time while still a minor and within a reasonable time after reaching the age of majority. Most states do not require restitution.
Exceptions to Basic Rules of Disaffirmance	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Misrepresentation of age (or fraud)—In many jurisdictions, misrepresentation of age prohibits the right of disaffirmance. 2. Necessaries—Minors remain liable for the reasonable value of necessaries (goods and services). 3. Ratification—After reaching the age of majority, a person can ratify a contract that he or she formed as a minor, becoming fully liable thereon.

the agreement may be voidable even if the intoxication was purely voluntary. If, despite intoxication, the person understood the legal consequences of the agreement, the contract will be enforceable. Courts look at objective indications of the situation to determine if the intoxicated person possessed or lacked the required capacity.

For the contract to be voidable, the person must prove that the intoxication impaired her or his reason and judgment so severely that she or he did not comprehend the legal consequences of entering into the contract. In addition, the person claiming intoxication must be able to return all consideration received. As a practical matter, courts rarely permit contracts to be avoided on the ground of intoxication because it is difficult to determine whether a party was sufficiently intoxicated to avoid legal duties.

DISAFFIRMANCE If a contract is voidable because one party was intoxicated, that person has the option of disaffirming it while intoxicated and for a reasonable time after becoming sober (just as a minor may disaffirm during minority and for a reasonable period thereafter). To avoid the contract in most states, the person claiming intoxication must be able to return all consideration received unless the contract involves necessities. Contracts for necessities are voidable, but the intoxicated person is liable in quasi contract for the reasonable value of the consideration received (see Chapter 12).

RATIFICATION An intoxicated person, after becoming sober, may ratify a contract expressly or impliedly, just as a minor may do on reaching majority. Implied ratification occurs when a person enters into a contract while intoxicated and fails to disaffirm the contract within a reasonable time after becoming sober. Acts or conduct inconsistent with an intent to disaffirm—such as the continued use of property purchased under a voidable contract—will also ratify the contract.

See Concept Summary 13.2 for a review of the rules relating to contracts by intoxicated persons.

Mental Incompetence

Contracts made by mentally incompetent persons can be void, voidable, or valid. We look here at the circumstances that determine which of these classifications apply.

WHEN THE CONTRACT WILL BE VOID If a court has previously determined that a person is mentally incompetent and has appointed a guardian to represent the individual, any contract made by the mentally incompetent person is void—no contract exists. Only the guardian can enter into binding legal obligations on behalf of the mentally incompetent person.

WHEN THE CONTRACT WILL BE VOIDABLE If a court has not previously judged a person to be mentally incompetent but in fact the person was incompetent at the time the contract was formed, the contract may be voidable. A contract is voidable if the person did not know he or she was entering into

Contracts by Intoxicated Persons

Concept	Description
General Rules	If a person was sufficiently intoxicated to lack the mental capacity to comprehend the legal consequences of entering into the contract, the contract may be voidable at the option of the intoxicated person. If, despite intoxication, the person understood these legal consequences, the contract will be enforceable.
Disaffirmance	An intoxicated person may disaffirm the contract at any time while intoxicated and for a reasonable time after becoming sober but must make full restitution. Contracts for necessities are voidable, but the intoxicated person is liable for the reasonable value of the goods or services.
Ratification	After becoming sober, a person can ratify a contract that she or he formed while intoxicated, becoming fully liable thereon.

the contract or lacked the mental capacity to comprehend its nature, purpose, and consequences. The contract can be avoided only by the mentally incompetent person, not by the other party. The contract may then be disaffirmed or ratified (if the person regains mental competence). Like intoxicated persons, mentally incompetent persons must return any consideration and pay for the reasonable value of any necessities they receive.

For example, Milo, who had not been previously declared incompetent by a judge, agrees to sell twenty lots in a prime residential neighborhood to Anastof. At the time of entering into the contract, Milo is mentally incompetent and is confused over which lots he is selling and how much they are worth. As a result, he contracts to sell the properties for substantially less than their market value. If the court finds that Milo was unable to understand the nature and consequences of the contract, Milo can avoid the sale, provided that he returns any consideration he received.

WHEN THE CONTRACT WILL BE VALID A contract entered into by a mentally incompetent person (whom a court has not previously declared incompetent) may also be valid if the person had capacity at the time the contract was formed. An otherwise incompetent person who understands the nature, purpose, and consequences of a contract at the time of entering into it is bound by it. Some people who are incompetent due to age or illness have lucid intervals—temporary periods of sufficient intelligence, judgment, and will—during which they will be considered to have legal capacity to enter into contracts.

See Concept Summary 13.3 for a review of the rules relating to contracts entered into by mentally incompetent persons.

Legality is the fourth requirement for a valid contract to exist. For a contract to be valid and enforceable, it must be formed for a legal purpose. A contract to do something that is prohibited by federal or state statutory law is illegal and, as such, void from the outset and thus unenforceable. A contract or a clause in a contract can also be illegal even in the absence of a specific statute prohibiting the action promised by the contract. Additionally, a contract to commit a tortious act—such as an agreement to engage in fraudulent misrepresentation (see Chapter 6)—is contrary to public policy and therefore illegal and unenforceable.

Contracts Contrary to Statute

Statutes often set forth rules specifying which terms and clauses may be included in contracts and which are prohibited. We now examine several ways in which contracts may be contrary to statute and thus illegal.

CONTRACTS TO COMMIT A CRIME Any contract to commit a crime is a contract in violation of a statute. Thus, a contract to sell illegal drugs in violation of criminal laws is unenforceable, as is a contract to cover up a corporation's violation of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act (see Chapter 5). Similarly, a contract to smuggle undocumented workers from another country into the United States for an employer is illegal (see Chapter 34), as is a contract to dump hazardous waste in violation of environmental laws (see Chapter 46). If the object or performance of the contract is rendered illegal by statute after the contract has been

Contracts by Mentally Incompetent Persons

Concept	Description
Void	If a court has declared a person to be mentally incompetent and has appointed a legal guardian, any contract made by that person is void from the outset.
Voidable	If a court has not declared a person mentally incompetent, but that person lacked the capacity to comprehend the subject matter, nature, and consequences of the agreement, then the contract is voidable at that person's option.
Valid	If a court has not declared a person mentally incompetent and that person was able to understand the nature and effect of the contract at the time it was formed, then the contract is valid and enforceable.

entered into, the contract is considered to be discharged by law. (See the discussion of impossibility or impracticability of performance in Chapter 17.)

USURY Almost every state has a statute that sets the maximum rate of interest that can be charged for different types of transactions, including ordinary loans. A lender who makes a loan at an interest rate above the lawful maximum commits usury. Although usurious contracts are illegal, most states simply limit the interest that the lender may collect on the contract to the lawful maximum interest rate in that state. In a few states, the lender can recover the principal amount of the loan but no interest.

Usury statutes place a ceiling on allowable rates of interest, but states can make exceptions to facilitate business transactions. For example, many states exempt corporate loans from the usury laws, and nearly all states allow higher interest rate loans for borrowers who could not otherwise obtain funds.

In reaction to the latest economic recession, the Federal Reserve System (see Chapter 27) instituted wide-ranging restrictions on the way banks and other credit-card issuers can price their products and adjust those prices to changing credit conditions. These federal regulations established a system of price controls that are analogous to a federal usury law because they establish upper limits on prices—that is, on interest rates and fees on credit cards.⁶

GAMBLING Gambling is the creation of risk for the purpose of assuming it. Any scheme that involves the distribution of property by chance among persons who have paid valuable consideration for the opportunity (chance) to receive the property is gambling. Traditionally, the states have deemed gambling contracts illegal and thus void. It is sometimes difficult, however, to distinguish a gambling contract from the risk sharing inherent in almost all contracts.

All states have statutes that regulate gambling, and many states allow certain forms of gambling, such as horse racing, poker machines, and charity-sponsored bingo. In addition, nearly all states allow state-operated lotteries and gambling on Native American reservations. Even in states that permit certain types of gambling, though, courts often find that gambling contracts are illegal.

CASE IN POINT Casino gambling is legal in Louisiana, as are video poker machines. Nevertheless, Louisiana courts refused to enforce certain contracts relating to the installation of video poker machines. Gaming Venture, Inc. (GVI), had entered into two contracts with Tastee Restaurant Corporation: a licensing agreement and an agreement that authorized GVI to install poker machines in various Tastee locations. When several Tastee restaurants refused to install the machines, GVI sued for breach of contract. The state appellate court held that the two agreements were illegal gambling contracts and therefore void because GVI had failed to get the prior approval of the state video gaming commission.⁷

ONLINE GAMBLING In the past, this “mixed bag” of gambling laws presented a legal quandary: Can citizens in a state that does not allow gambling place bets through a Web site located in a state that does? After all, states have no constitutional authority over activities that take place in other states. Complicating the problem was the fact that many Internet gambling sites are located outside the United States in countries where Internet gambling is legal, and no state government has authority over activities that take place in other countries.

In 2006, Congress, concerned about money laundering stemming from online gambling, the problem of addiction, and underage gambling, passed legislation that greatly strengthened efforts to reduce online gaming. The Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act of 2006 cuts off the cash flow to Internet gambling sites by barring electronic payments, such as credit-card transactions, at those sites.⁸ The reaction by the online gambling industry was swift and dramatic. After the passage of this bill, many foreign-based companies suspended the use of real money on the Web sites serving the United States. Without the incentive of playing for cash, the sites have lost their appeal for most clients.

Property, including funds, involved in illegal gambling can be seized under federal law through a civil forfeiture action. A defendant may assert a defense to reclaim the property, but should a criminal fugitive—a person who is evading custody in a criminal proceeding—be entitled to file such a claim? That was the question in the following case.

6. The Credit Card Accountability, Responsibility, and Disclosure Act of 2009, Pub. L. No. 111-24, 123 Stat. 1734. This law, which codifies many of the Federal Reserve’s regulations, will be discussed in Chapter 45 in the context of consumer law.

CASE 13.1

United States v. $6,976,934.65, Plus Interest Deposited into Royal Bank of Scotland International

United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, 554 F.3d 123 (2009).
www.cad.c.uscourts.gov/internet/home.nsf

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • William Scott operated World Wide Tele-Sports, an Internet sports–betting service based on a Caribbean island. In 1998, the United States charged Scott with soliciting and accepting wagers from U.S. residents through illegal offshore Web sites. Unable to arrest Scott, who lived abroad, the government followed some of the proceeds from the enterprise to an account at the Royal Bank of Scotland International (RBSI) held by Soulbury Limited, a British corporation of which Scott was the majority shareholder. The United States filed a civil action in a federal district court, seeking the forfeiture of $6,976,934.65, plus interest, from RBSI’s account with a U.S. bank. Soulbury denied that the funds were linked to Scott and filed a claim for the funds. Meanwhile, in 2005, Scott was indicted on money laundering charges related to the gambling violations. Under the Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act, also known as the fugitive disentitlement statute, a court can dismiss a claim in a civil forfeiture case based on a defendant’s evasion of a separate criminal proceeding. The government filed a motion to dismiss Soulbury’s claim under the fugitive disentitlement statute. The court issued a summary judgment in the government’s favor. Soulbury appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

GRIFFITH, Circuit Judge:

* * * *

[One issue in the application of the fugitive disentitlement statute is] whether the civil forfeiture action is “related” to the criminal prosecution being evaded.

* * * *

We think [the] standard to govern the “related” element * * * is found in the statute that provides for civil forfeiture of property related to a criminal prosecution. That statute specifies the circumstances in which the government may bring a civil forfeiture action to recover property related to a crime. The natural reading of “related” in the fugitive disentitlement statute is that the civil forfeiture action must be one in which the government is proceeding * * * to recover property “involved in,” “derived from,” “traceable to,” “obtained by,” or “used to facilitate” a crime for which the defendant is evading prosecution. In other words, the question is whether the facts that underlie the prosecution being evaded also form the basis for the forfeiture action. [Emphasis added.]

Applying that test, both the 1998 and 2005 prosecutions of Scott are unquestionably “related” to this forfeiture action. The 1998 criminal complaint charged Scott with * * * [illegally] “using a wire communication facility for the transmission in interstate and foreign commerce of bets and wagers on sporting events and contests, and for the transmission of a wire communication which entitled the recipient to receive money and credit as a result of bets and wagers.” The charge was based on Scott’s operation of an Internet sports betting service called World Wide Tele-Sports from 1997 to 1998. The 2005 indictment included the same charge against Scott * * * and also charged [him] with international money laundering. The civil forfeiture complaint * * * is based on, inter alia [among other things], charges of international money laundering with intent to promote a specified unlawful activity. The “specified unlawful activity” being promoted is the * * * violation alleged in the 1998 criminal complaint.

Soulbury has not raised a genuine issue of material fact as to the relation between the two criminal prosecutions and this civil forfeiture case. Thus, * * * the district court * * * correctly granted summary judgment as to this element.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The federal appellate court found that the indictments against Scott were sufficiently “related” to the civil forfeiture action for the fugitive disentitlement statute to LICENSING STATUTES All states require members of certain professions—including physicians, lawyers, real estate brokers, accountants, architects, electricians, and stockbrokers—to have licenses. Some licenses are obtained only after extensive schooling and examinations, which indicate to the public that a special skill has been acquired. Others require only that the applicant be of good moral character and pay a fee.

Whether a contract with an unlicensed person is legal and enforceable depends on the purpose of the licensing statute. If the statute's purpose is to protect the public from unauthorized practitioners (such as unlicensed attorneys and electricians, for example), then a contract involving an unlicensed practitioner is generally illegal and unenforceable. If the statute's purpose is merely to raise government revenues, however, a contract with an unlicensed person (such as a landscape architect or a massage therapist) may be enforced and the unlicensed practitioner fined.

Contracts Contrary to Public Policy

Although contracts involve private parties, some are not enforceable because of the negative impact they would have on society. Examples include a contract to commit a tortious act, such as invading another person's privacy; a contract to commit an immoral act, such as selling a child; and a contract that prohibits marriage. We look here at certain types of business contracts that are often said to be contrary to public policy.

CONTRACTS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE Contracts in restraint of trade (anticompetitive agreements) usually adversely affect the public policy that favors competition in the economy. Typically, such contracts also violate one or more federal or state antitrust statutes.⁹ An exception is recognized when the restraint is reasonable and is contained in an ancillary (secondary, or subordinate) clause in a contract. Such restraints often are included in contracts for the sale of an ongoing business and employment contracts.

9. Federal statutes include the Sherman Antitrust Act, the Clayton Act, and the Federal Trade Commission Act (see Chapter 47).

Covenants Not to Compete and the Sale of an Ongoing Business. Many contracts involve a type of restraint called a covenant not to compete, or a restrictive covenant (promise). A covenant not to compete may be created when a seller agrees not to open a new store in a certain geographic area surrounding the old store. Such an agreement enables the seller to sell, and the purchaser to buy, the goodwill and reputation of an ongoing business without having to worry that the seller will open a competing business a block away. Provided the restrictive covenant is reasonable and is an ancillary part of the sale of an ongoing business, it is enforceable.

Covenants Not to Compete in Employment Contracts. Sometimes, agreements not to compete (also referred to as noncompete agreements) are included in employment contracts. People in middle- or upper-level management positions commonly agree not to work for competitors or not to start competing businesses for a specified period of time after termination of employment. Such agreements are legal in most states so long as the specified period of time (of restraint) is not excessive in duration and the geographic restriction is reasonable. What constitutes a reasonable time period may be shorter in the online environment than in conventional employment contracts because the restrictions apply worldwide. To be reasonable, a restriction on competition must protect a legitimate business interest and must not be any greater than necessary to protect that interest.

CASE IN POINT Safety and Compliance Management, Inc. (S&C), provides drug- and alcohol-testing services. S&C hired Angela Burgess primarily to retrieve specimens from clients and transport them to the lab. She signed a covenant not to compete “in any area of business” conducted by S&C for a period of two years from the date of termination. When Burgess quit her job at S&C and went to work at a nearby hospital as a medical assistant, S&C filed a lawsuit claiming that she had breached the non-compete agreement. The hospital also offered drug-testing services, and Burgess sometimes collected specimens from patients. The court, however, found that because S&C's noncompete agreement failed to specify the activities that Burgess was prohibited from performing, it was too broad and indefinite to be enforceable. The agreement was unreasonable because it imposed a greater limitation on Burgess than was necessary for S&C's protection.¹⁰

The contract in the following case provided an exclusive license to open and operate comedy clubs under a certain famous trademark. It included a covenant not to compete. The question was whether the restraint was reasonable.

CASE 13.2

Comedy Club, Inc. v. Improv West Associates

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 553 F.3d 1277 (2009).

www.ca9.uscourts.gov^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Improv West Associates is the founder of the Improv Comedy Club and owner of the “Improv” trademark. Comedy Club, Inc. (CCI), owns and operates restaurants and comedy clubs. Improv West granted CCI an exclusive license to open four Improv clubs per year in 2001, 2002, and 2003. Their agreement prohibited CCI from opening any non-Improv comedy clubs “in the contiguous United States” until 2019. When CCI failed to open eight clubs by the end of 2002, Improv West commenced arbitration. The arbitrator’s award in 2005 stated that CCI had forfeited its right to open Improv clubs but that the parties’ agreement had not terminated and the covenant not to compete was enforceable—CCI could not open any new comedy clubs for its duration. A federal district court confirmed the award, and CCI appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

GOULD, Circuit Judge:

* * * *

The basic outline of what the arbitrator did, terminating an exclusive right to open Improv clubs nationwide, because of contractually inadequate performance contrary to the agreed schedule, while keeping in force the restrictive covenant makes sense in so far as CCI should not have an exclusive license on Improv clubs absent complying with designated performance. And so long as CCI was running some Improv clubs, a restrictive covenant to some degree could protect Improv West from damage caused by improper competition. Because we cannot say that there is no basis in the record for the arbitrator’s decision, we hold that the arbitrator’s award is not completely irrational.

* * * *

CCI’s “business” is operating full-service comedy clubs. CCI currently operates at least seven Improv clubs. As interpreted by the arbitrator, the * * * covenant not to compete applies geographically to the contiguous United States, and does not end until 2019. Thus, the covenant not to compete has dramatic geographic and temporal [time-related] scope. Combined with the arbitrator’s ruling that CCI forfeited its rights to use the Improv marks license in any new location, the practical effect of the arbitrator’s award * * * is that for more than fourteen years the entire contiguous United States comedy club market, except for CCI’s current Improv clubs, is off limits to CCI. This forecloses competition in a substantial share of the comedy club business.

* * * *

* * * The economic restraint of [this covenant] on competition is too broad to be countenanced [tolerated] * * *. The covenant not to compete must be more narrowly tailored to relate to the areas in which CCI is operating Improv clubs under the license agreement. [Emphasis added.]

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit maintains this Web site.

CASE 13.2 CONTINUED ♦ However, we do not void the entire * * * covenant not to compete. * * * We weigh CCI's right to operate its business against Improv West's interest to protect and maintain its trademark, trade name and goodwill. This balance tilts in favor of Improv West with regard to counties where CCI is operating an Improv club.

Therefore, we hold that the district court should vacate [set aside] the arbitrator's [award] as to any county where CCI does not currently operate an Improv club, but uphold [the covenant] in those counties where CCI currently operates Improv clubs. Nationwide CCI may open and operate non-Improv comedy clubs in all those counties where it does not currently operate an Improv club. However, CCI may not open or operate any non-Improv clubs in those counties where it currently owns or operates Improv clubs.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The federal appellate court reversed part of the lower court's confirmation of the award and remanded the case. A covenant not to compete in the comedy club business for fourteen years in forty-eight states is too broad to be enforced.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Should companies or any subsidiaries affiliated with CCI be subject to the covenant not to compete? Would it be unethical to impose such a requirement? Discuss.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Why would a business such as Improv West include a covenant not to compete in such an agreement as the contract at issue in this case? Explain.

Enforcement Problems. The laws governing the enforceability of covenants not to compete vary significantly from state to state. In some states, such as Texas, such a covenant will not be enforced unless the employee has received some benefit in return for signing the noncompete agreement. This is true even if the covenant is reasonable as to time and area. If the employee receives no benefit, the covenant will be deemed void. California prohibits altogether the enforcement of covenants not to compete.

Occasionally, depending on the jurisdiction, courts will reform covenants not to compete. If a covenant is found to be unreasonable in time or geographic area, the court may convert the terms into reasonable ones and then enforce the reformed covenant. This presents a problem, however, in that the judge has implicitly become a party to the contract. Consequently, courts usually resort to contract reformation only when necessary to prevent undue burdens or hardships.

UNCONSCIONABLE CONTRACTS OR CLAUSES A court does not ordinarily look at the fairness or equity of a contract. For example, the courts generally do not inquire into the adequacy of consideration (as discussed in Chapter 12). Persons are assumed to be reasonably intelligent, and the courts will not come to their aid just because they have made an unwise or foolish bargain. In certain circumstances, however, bargains are so oppressive that the courts relieve innocent parties of part or all of their duties. Such bargains are deemed unconscionable because they are so unscrupulous or grossly unfair as to be “void of conscience.”¹¹ A contract can be unconscionable on either procedural or substantive grounds, as discussed in the following subsections and illustrated graphically in Exhibit 13–1 on the following page.

Procedural Unconscionability. Procedural unconscionability often involves inconspicuous print, unintelligible language (“legalese”), or the lack of an opportunity to read the contract or ask questions about its meaning. This type of unconscionability typically arises when a party's lack of knowledge or understanding of the contract terms deprived him or her of any meaningful choice.

Procedural unconscionability can also occur when there is such disparity in bargaining power between the two parties that the weaker party's consent is not voluntary. This type of situation often involves an adhesion contract (see Chapter 14), which is a contract written exclusively by one party (the dominant party, usually the seller or creditor) and presented to the other (the adhering party, usually the buyer

11. The Uniform Commercial Code incorporated the concept of unconscionability in Sections 2–302 and 2A–108. These provisions, which apply to contracts for the sale or lease of goods, will be discussed in Chapter 19.

EXHIBIT 13-1 • Unconscionability or borrower) on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.¹² In other words, the adhering party has no opportunity to negotiate the terms of the contract. Not all adhesion contracts are unconscionable, only those that unreasonably favor the drafter.¹³

Substantive Unconscionability. Substantive unconscionability characterizes those contracts, or portions of contracts, that are oppressive or overly harsh. Courts generally focus on provisions that deprive one party of the benefits of the agreement or leave that party without a remedy for nonperformance by the other. For example, a person with little income and only a fourth-grade education agrees to purchase a refrigerator for $4,500 and signs a two-year installment contract. The same type of refrigerator usually sells for $900 on the market. Despite the general rule that the courts will not inquire into the adequacy of consideration, some courts have held that this type of contract is unconscionable because the contract terms are so oppressive as to “shock the conscience” of the court.¹⁴

Substantive unconscionability can arise in a wide variety of business contexts. For example, a contract clause that gives the business entity free access to the courts but requires the other party to arbitrate any dispute with the firm may be unconscionable.¹⁵ Similarly, an arbitration clause in a credit-card agreement that prevents credit cardholders from obtaining relief for abusive debt-collection practices under consumer law may be unconscionable.¹⁶ Contracts drafted by insurance companies and cell phone providers have been struck down as substantively unconscionable when they included provisions that were overly harsh or one sided.¹⁷

In the following case, the question was whether an arbitration clause was both procedurally and substantively unconscionable.

SIGGINS, J. [Judge]

* * * *

Jason Lhotka was thirty-seven years old when he died of an altitude-related illness while on a GeoEx [Geographic Expeditions, Inc.] expedition up Mount Kilimanjaro with his mother, plaintiff Sandra Menefee. GeoEx's limitation of liability and release form, which both Lhotka and Menefee signed as a requirement of participating in the expedition, provided that each of them released GeoEx from all liability in connection with the trek and waived any claims for liability "to the maximum extent permitted by law." The release * * * reads: "I understand that all Trip Applications are subject to acceptance by GeoEx in San Francisco, California, USA. I agree that in the unlikely event a dispute of any kind arises between me and GeoEx, the following conditions will apply: (a) the dispute will be submitted to a neutral third-party mediator in San Francisco, California, with both parties splitting equally the cost of such mediator. If the dispute cannot be resolved through mediation, then (b) the dispute will be submitted for binding arbitration to the American Arbitration Association in San Francisco, California; (c) the dispute will be governed by California law; and (d) the maximum amount of recovery to which I will be entitled under any and all circumstances will be the sum of the land and air cost of my trip with GeoEx. I agree that this is a fair and reasonable limitation on the damages, of any sort whatsoever, that I may suffer. I agree to fully indemnify [compensate] GeoEx for all of its costs (including attorneys' fees) if I commence an action or claim against GeoEx based upon claims I have previously released or waived by signing this release." Menefee paid $16,831 for herself and Lhotka to go on the trip.

A letter from GeoEx president James Sano that accompanied the limitation of liability and release explained that the form was mandatory and that, on this point, "our lawyers, insurance carriers and medical consultants give us no discretion. A signed, unmodified release form is required before any traveler may join one of our trips. * * * My review of other travel companies' release forms suggests that our forms are not a whole lot different from theirs."

After her son's death, Menefee sued GeoEx for wrongful death and alleged various theories of liability including fraud, gross negligence and recklessness, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. GeoEx moved to compel arbitration.

The trial court found the arbitration provision was unconscionable * * * and on that basis denied the motion. It ruled: "The agreement at issue is both procedurally and substantively unconscionable * * * .

This appeal timely followed.

* * * *

We turn * * * to GeoEx's contention that the court erred when it found the arbitration agreement unconscionable. Although the issue arises here in a relatively novel setting, the basic legal framework is well established.

"Unconscionability has generally been recognized to include an absence of meaningful choice on the part of one of the parties together with contract terms which are unreasonably favorable to the other party. Phrased another way, *unconscionability has both a procedural and a substantive element. The procedural element requires oppression or surprise. * * * The substantive element concerns whether a contractual provision reallocates risks in an objectively unreasonable or unexpected manner.*" * * * [Emphasis added.]

GeoEx argues the arbitration agreement involved neither the oppression nor surprise aspects of procedural unconscionability. GeoEx argues the agreement was not oppressive because plaintiffs made no showing of an "industry-wide requirement that travel clients must accept an agreement's terms without modification" and "they fail[ed] even to attempt to negotiate" with GeoEx. We disagree. GeoEx's argument cannot reasonably be squared with its own statements advising participants that they must sign an unmodified release form to participate in the expedition; that GeoEx's "lawyers, insurance carriers and medical consultants give [it] no discretion" on that point; and that other travel companies were no different. In other words, GeoEx led the plaintiffs to understand not only that its terms and conditions were nonnegotiable, but that plaintiffs would encounter the same requirements with any other travel company. This is a sufficient basis for us to conclude the plaintiffs lacked bargaining power.

GeoEx also contends its terms were not oppressive, apparently as a matter of law, because Menefee and Lhotka could have simply decided not to trek up Mount Kilimanjaro. It argues that contracts for recreational activities can never be unconscionably oppressive because, unlike agreements for necessities such as medical care or employment, a consumer of recreational activities always has the option of [forgoing] the activity. The argument has some initial resonance [significance], but on closer inspection we reject it as unsound.

* * * *

Here, certainly, plaintiffs could have chosen not to sign on with the expedition. That option, like any availability of market alternatives, is relevant to the existence, and degree, of oppression. But we must also consider the other circumstances surrounding the execution of the agreement. GeoEx presented its limitation of liability and release form as mandatory and unmodifiable, and essentially told plaintiffs that any other travel provider would impose the same terms. “Oppression arises from an inequality of bargaining power which results in no real negotiation and an absence of meaningful choice * * *.” GeoEx presented its terms as both nonnegotiable and no different than what plaintiffs would find with any other provider. Under these circumstances, plaintiffs made a sufficient showing to establish at least a minimal level of oppression to justify a finding of procedural unconscionability. [Emphasis in original.]

* * * [We now] address whether the substantive unconscionability of the GeoEx contract warrants the trial court’s ruling.

* * * *

The arbitration provision in GeoEx’s release * * * guaranteed that plaintiffs could not possibly obtain anything approaching full recompense for their harm by limiting any recovery they could obtain to the amount they paid GeoEx for their trip. In addition to a limit on their recovery, plaintiffs, residents of Colorado, were required to mediate and arbitrate in San Francisco—all but guaranteeing both that GeoEx would never be out more than the amount plaintiffs had paid for their trip, and that any recovery plaintiffs might obtain would be devoured by the expense they incur in pursuing their remedy. The release also required plaintiffs to indemnify GeoEx for its costs and attorney fees for defending any claims covered by the release of liability form. Notably, there is no reciprocal limitation on damages or indemnification obligations imposed on GeoEx. Rather than providing a neutral forum for dispute resolution, GeoEx’s arbitration scheme provides a potent disincentive for an aggrieved client to pursue any claim, in any forum—and may well guarantee that GeoEx wins even if it loses. Absent reasonable justification for this arrangement—and none is apparent—we agree with the trial court that the arbitration clause is so one-sided as to be substantively unconscionable.

* * * *

The order denying GeoEx’s motion to compel arbitration is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. What did the judge mean when he said that GeoEx’s one-sided arbitration scheme “may well guarantee that GeoEx wins even if it loses”?
2. Did the fact that the terms of the release were nonnegotiable contribute to its procedural unconscionability or its substantive unconscionability? Explain.

EXCULPATORY CLAUSES Often closely related to the concept of unconscionability are exculpatory clauses, which release a party from liability in the event of monetary or physical injury no matter who is at fault. Indeed, courts sometimes refuse to enforce such clauses on the ground that they are unconscionable. Exculpatory clauses found in rental agreements for commercial property are frequently held to be contrary to public policy, and such clauses are almost always unenforceable in residential property leases. Courts also usually hold that exculpatory clauses are against public policy in the employment context. Thus, employers frequently cannot enforce exculpatory clauses in contracts with employees or independent contractors (see Chapter 32) to avoid liability for work-related injuries.¹⁸

Although courts view exculpatory clauses with disfavor, they do enforce such clauses when they do not contravene public policy, are not ambiguous, and do not claim to protect parties from liability for intentional misconduct. Businesses such as health clubs, racetracks, amusement parks, skiing facilities, horse-rental operations, golf-cart concessions, and skydiving organizations frequently use exculpatory clauses to limit their liability for patrons’ injuries.

18. See, for example, Speedway SuperAmerica, LLC v. Erwin, 250 S.W.3d 339 (2008).

Because these services are not essential, the firms offering them are sometimes considered to have no relative advantage in bargaining strength, and anyone contracting for their services is considered to do so voluntarily.

DISCRIMINATORY CONTRACTS Contracts in which a party promises to discriminate on the basis of race, color, national origin, religion, gender, age, or disability are contrary to both statute and public policy. They are also unenforceable.¹⁹ For example, if a property owner promises in a contract not to sell the property to a member of a particular race, the contract is unenforceable. The public policy underlying these prohibitions is very strong, and the courts are quick to invalidate discriminatory contracts.

Exhibit 13–2 illustrates the types of contracts that may be illegal because they are contrary to statute or public policy.

Effect of Illegality

In general, an illegal contract is void—that is, the contract is deemed never to have existed, and the courts will not aid either party. In most illegal contracts, both parties are considered to be equally at fault—in pari delicto.²⁰ If the contract is executory (not yet fulfilled), neither party can enforce it. If it has been executed, neither party can recover damages.

19. The major federal statute prohibiting discrimination is the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. Sections 2000e–2000e-17. For a discussion of this act and other acts prohibiting discrimination in the employment context, see Chapter 35.

Generally, the courts are not concerned if one wrongdoer in an illegal contract is unjustly enriched at the expense of the other—except under certain circumstances. The main reason for this hands-off attitude is the belief that a plaintiff who has broken the law by entering into an illegal bargain should not be allowed to obtain help from the courts. Another justification is the hoped-for deterrent effect: a plaintiff who suffers a loss because of an illegal bargain will presumably be deterred from entering into similar illegal bargains in the future.

There are exceptions to the general rule that neither party to an illegal bargain can sue for breach and neither party can recover for performance rendered. We look at these exceptions next.

JUSTIFIABLE IGNORANCE OF THE FACTS When one of the parties is relatively innocent (has no reason to know that the contract is illegal), that party can often recover any benefits conferred in a partially

USURIOUS LOANS Illegal if the interest rate exceeds legal limit	CONTRACTS BY UNLICENSED PERSONS May not be enforceable depending on the purpose of the statute	CONTRACTS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE Normally unenforceable, unless the restraint is reasonable under the circumstances, such as in some covenants not to compete	ADHESION CONTRACTS May be unenforceable if entered into because of one party's superior bargaining power
GAMBLING CONTRACTS Illegal depending on state statute		CONTRACTS TO COMMIT A TORT Always unenforceable	EXCULPATORY CLAUSES May be deemed unconscionable
CONTRACTS TO COMMIT A CRIME Always illegal		UNCONSCIONABLE CONTRACTS Must not be so unfair as to be oppressive	DISCRIMINATORY CONTRACTS Illegal when discrimination is based on race, religion, national origin, or gender

executed contract. In this situation, the courts will not enforce the contract but will allow the parties to return to their original positions.

A court may sometimes permit an innocent party who has fully performed under the contract to enforce the contract against the guilty party. For example, a trucking company contracts with Gillespie to carry crates filled with goods to a specific destination for the normal fee of $5,000. The trucker delivers the crates and later finds out that they contained illegal goods. Although the law specifies that the shipment, use, and sale of the goods were illegal, the trucker, being an innocent party, can still legally collect the $5,000 from Gillespie.

MEMBERS OF PROTECTED CLASSES When a statute is clearly designed to protect a certain class of people, a member of that class can enforce a contract in violation of the statute even though the other party cannot. For example, flight attendants and pilots are subject to a federal statute that prohibits them from flying more than a certain number of hours every month. If an attendant or a pilot exceeds the maximum, the airline must nonetheless pay for those extra hours of service.

Other examples of statutes designed to protect a particular class of people are state statutes that regulate the sale of insurance. If an insurance company violates a statute when selling insurance, the purchaser can still enforce the policy and recover from the insurer.

WITHDRAWAL FROM AN ILLEGAL AGREEMENT If the illegal part of a bargain has not yet been performed, the party rendering performance can withdraw from the contract and recover the performance or its value. For example, Sam and Jim decide to wager (illegally) on the outcome of a boxing match. Each deposits cash with a stakeholder, who agrees to pay the winner of the bet. At this point, each party has performed part of the agreement, but the illegal element of the agreement will not occur until the funds are paid to the winner. Before that payment occurs, either party is entitled to withdraw from the bargain by giving notice of repudiation to the stakeholder.

CONTRACT ILLEGAL THROUGH FRAUD, DURESS, OR UNDUE INFLUENCE Often, one party to an illegal contract is more at fault than the other. When a party has been induced to enter into an illegal bargain by fraud, duress, or undue influence on the part of the other party to the agreement, that party will be allowed to recover for the performance or its value.

SEVERABLE, OR DIVISIBLE, CONTRACTS A contract that is severable, or divisible, consists of distinct parts that can be performed separately, with separate consideration provided for each part. With an indivisible contract, in contrast, complete performance by each party is essential, even if the contract contains a number of seemingly separate provisions.

If a contract is divisible into legal and illegal portions, a court may enforce the legal portion but not the illegal one, so long as the illegal portion does not affect the essence of the bargain. This approach is consistent with the courts' basic policy of enforcing the legal intentions of the contracting parties whenever possible. For example, Cole signs an employment contract that includes an overly broad and thus illegal covenant not to compete. In that situation, a court might allow the employment contract to be enforceable but reform the unreasonably broad covenant by converting its terms into reasonable ones. Alternatively, the court could declare the covenant illegal (and thus void) and enforce the remaining employment terms.

REVIEWING

Capacity and Legality

Renee Beaver started racing go-karts competitively in 2007, when she was fourteen. Many of the races required her to sign an exculpatory clause to participate, which she or her parents regularly signed. In 2010, she participated in the annual Elkhart Grand Prix, a series of races in Elkhart, Indiana. During the event in which she drove, a piece of foam padding used as a course barrier was torn from its base and ended up on the track. A portion of the padding struck Beaver in the head, and another portion was thrown into oncoming traffic, causing a multikart collision during which she sustained severe injuries.

Beaver filed an action against the race organizers for negligence. The organizers could not locate the exculpatory clause that Beaver had supposedly signed. Race organizers argued that she must have signed one to enter the race, but even if she had not signed one, her actions showed her intent to be bound by its terms. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did Beaver have the contractual capacity to enter a contract with an exculpatory clause? Why or why not?
2. Assuming that Beaver did, in fact, sign the exculpatory clause, did she later disaffirm or ratify the contract? Explain.
3. Now assume that Beaver stated that she was eighteen years old at the time that she signed the exculpatory clause. How might this affect Beaver's ability to disaffirm or ratify the contract?
4. If Beaver did not actually sign the exculpatory clause, could a court conclude that she impliedly accepted its terms by participating in the race? Why or why not?

 DEBATE THIS: After agreeing to an exculpatory clause or purchasing some item, such as a computer, minors often seek to avoid the contracts. Today's minors are far from naïve and should not be allowed to avoid their contractual obligations.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

13-1. Intoxication After Kira had had several drinks one night, she sold Charlotte a diamond necklace worth thousands of dollars for just $100. The next day, Kira offered the $100 to Charlotte and requested the return of her necklace. Charlotte refused to accept the $100 or return the necklace, claiming that there was a valid contract of sale. Kira explained that she had been intoxicated at the time the bargain was made and thus the contract was voidable at her option. Was Kira correct? Explain.

13-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Covenants Not to Compete.

 A famous New York City hotel, Hotel Lux, is noted for its food as well as its luxury accommodations. Hotel Lux contracts with a famous chef, Chef Perlee, to become its head chef at $10,000 per month. The contract states that should Perlee leave the employment of Hotel Lux for any reason, he will not work as a chef for any hotel or restaurant in New York, New Jersey, or Pennsylvania for a period of one year. During the first six months of the contract, Hotel Lux heavily advertises Perlee as its head chef, and business at the hotel is excellent. Then a dispute arises between the hotel management and Perlee, and Perlee terminates his employment. One month later, he is hired by a famous New Jersey restaurant just across the New York state line. Hotel Lux learns of Perlee's employment through a large advertisement in a New York City newspaper. It seeks to enjoin (prevent) Perlee from working in that restaurant as a chef for one year. Discuss how successful Hotel Lux will be in its action.

13-3. Capacity Joanne is a seventy-five-year-old widow who survives on her husband's small pension. Joanne has become increasingly forgetful, and her family worries that she may have Alzheimer's disease (a brain disorder that seriously affects a person's ability to carry out daily activities). No physician has diagnosed her, however, and no court has ruled on Joanne's legal competence. One day while she is out shopping, Joanne stops by a store that is having a sale on pianos and enters into a fifteen-year installment contract to buy a grand piano. When the piano arrives the next day, Joanne seems confused and repeatedly asks the delivery person why a piano is being delivered. Joanne claims that she does not recall buying a piano. Explain whether this contract is void, voidable, or valid. Can Joanne avoid her contractual obligation to buy the piano? If so, how?

13-4. Unconscionability Frank Rodziewicz was driving a Volvo tractor-trailer on Interstate 90 in Lake County, Indiana, when he struck a concrete barrier. His tractor-trailer became stuck on the barrier, and the Indiana State Police contacted Waffco Heavy Duty Towing, Inc., to assist in the recovery of the truck. Before beginning work, Waffco told Rodziewicz that it would cost $275 to tow the truck. There was no discussion of labor or any other costs. Rodziewicz told Waffco to take the truck to a local Volvo dealership. Within a few minutes, Waffco pulled the truck off the barrier and towed it to Waffco's nearby towing yard. Rodziewicz was soon notified that, in addition to the $275 towing fee, he would have to pay $4,070 in labor costs and that Waffco would not release the truck until payment was made. Rodziewicz paid the total amount. Disputing the labor charge, however, he filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Waffco, alleging, in part, breach of contract. Was the towing contract unconscionable? Would it make a difference if the parties had discussed the labor charge before the tow? Explain. [Rodziewicz v. Waffco Heavy Duty Towing, Inc., 763 N.E.2d 491 (Ind.App. 2002)]

13-5. Covenant Not to Compete Gary Forsee was an executive officer with responsibility for the U.S. operations of BellSouth Corp., a company providing global telecommunications services. Under a covenant not to compete, Forsee agreed that for a period of eighteen months after termination from employment, he would not "provide services . . . in competition with [BellSouth] . . . to any person or entity which provides products or services identical or similar to products and services provided by [BellSouth] . . . within the territory." Territory was defined to include the geographic area in which Forsee provided services to BellSouth. The services included "management, strategic planning, business planning, administration, or other participation in or providing advice with respect to the communications services business." Forsee announced his intent to resign and accept a position as chief executive officer of Sprint Corp., a competitor of BellSouth. BellSouth filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Forsee, claiming, in part, that his acceptance of employment with Sprint would violate the covenant not to compete. Is the covenant legal?

Should it be enforced? Why or why not? [BellSouth Corp. v. Forsee, 265 Ga.App. 589, 595 S.E.2d 99 (2004)]

13-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Misrepresentation of Age.

Millennium Club, Inc., operates a tavern in South Bend, Indiana. In January 2003, Pamela Avila and other minors gained admission by misrepresenting themselves to be at least twenty-one years old. According to the club's representatives, the minors used false driver's licenses, "fraudulent transfer of a stamp used to gain admission by another patron or other means of false identification." To gain access, the minors also signed affidavits falsely attesting to the fact that they were aged twenty-one or older. When the state filed criminal charges against the club, the club filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Avila and more than two hundred others, charging that they had misrepresented their ages and seeking damages of $3,000 each. The minors filed a motion to dismiss the complaint. Should the court grant the motion? What are the competing policy interests in this case? If the club was not careful in checking minors' identification, should it be allowed to recover? If the club reasonably relied on the minors' representations, should the minors be allowed to avoid liability? Discuss. [Millennium Club, Inc. v. Avila, 809 N.E.2d 906 (Ind.App. 2004)]

13-7. Licensing Statutes Under California law, a contract to manage a professional boxer must be in writing, and the manager must be licensed by the State Athletic Commission. Marco Antonio Barrera is a professional boxer and two-time world champion. In May 2003, José Castillo, who was not licensed by the state, orally agreed to assume Barrera's management. He "understood" that he would be paid in accord with the "practice in the professional boxing industry, but in no case less than ten percent (10%) of the gross revenue" that Barrera generated as a boxer and through endorsements. Among other accomplishments, Castillo negotiated an exclusive promotion contract for Barrera with Golden Boy Promotions, Inc., which is owned and operated by Oscar De La Hoya. Castillo also helped Barrera settle three lawsuits and resolve unrelated tax problems so that Barrera could continue boxing. Castillo did not train Barrera, pick his opponents, or arrange his fights, however. When Barrera abruptly stopped communicating with Castillo, Castillo filed a suit in a California state court against Barrera and others, alleging breach of contract. Under what circumstances is a contract with an unlicensed practitioner enforceable? Is the alleged contract in this case enforceable? Why or why not? [Castillo v. Barrera, 146 Cal.App.4th 1317, 53 Cal.Rptr.3d 494 (2 Dist. 2007)]

13-8. Unconscionable Contracts or Clauses Roberto Basulto and Raquel Gonzalez, who did not speak English, responded to an ad on Spanish-language television sponsored by Hialeah Automotive, LLC, which does business as Potamkin Dodge. Potamkin's staff understood that Basulto and Gonzalez did not speak or read English and conducted the entire transaction in Spanish. They explained the English-language contract, but did not explain an accompanying arbitration agreement. This agreement limited the amount of damages that the buyers could seek in court to less than $5,000, but did not limit Potamkin's right to pursue greater damages. Basulto and Gonzalez bought a Dodge Caravan and signed the contract in blank (meaning that some parts were left blank). Potamkin later filled in a lower trade-in allowance than agreed and refused to change it. The buyers returned the van—having driven it a total of seven miles—and asked for a return of their trade-in vehicle, but it had been sold. The buyers filed a suit in a Florida state court against Potamkin. The dealer sought arbitration. Was the arbitration agreement unconscionable? Why or why not? [Hialeah Automotive, LLC v. Basulto, 156 Fla. 92, 22 So.3d 586 (3 Dist. 2009)]

13-9. Substantive Unconscionability Erica Bishop lived in public housing with her children. Her lease stated that only she and her children, who were listed on the lease, could live in the apartment, and that she was responsible for the actions of all household members. Any violations of the lease by any household member, including criminal activity, would be grounds for eviction. Bishop's son Derek committed an armed robbery at a store next to the apartment building. Bishop was given thirty days to vacate the apartment due to breach of the lease. She sued, arguing that Derek had moved out of the apartment months before the robbery, but she admitted he had been in the apartment right before the robbery. The trial court held that since Derek had visited the apartment right before the robbery, he was a household member and Bishop had to vacate. She appealed, contending that the lease was invalid because it was substantively unconscionable. Does Erica have grounds for a reversal in her favor? Discuss. [Bishop v. Housing Authority of South Bend, 920 N.E.2d 772 (Ind.App. 2010)]

13-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Covenants Not to Compete.

Retina Consultants, P.C., is a medical practice that specializes in retina eye surgery. This company hired Brendan Coleman as a software engineer in 2000. Prior to his hiring at Retina Consultants, Coleman had created and marketed a software billing program called Clinex. During his stay with Retina Consultants, physicians worked with Coleman to modify his Clinex program to better suit the company's needs. The new program was called Clinex-RE. While employed, Coleman signed an agreement which stated ownership of Clinex remained with Coleman while that of Clinex-RE remained with Retina Consultants. Within the document was the following sentence: "Coleman will not distribute, vend or license to any ophthalmologist or optometrist the Clinex software or any computer application competitive with the Clinex-RE software without the written consent of Retina Consultants." In essence, Coleman agreed to a covenant not to compete (noncompete clause). After quitting his job with Retina Consultants, Coleman attempted to license Clinex and Clinex-RE to other ophthalmologists. He also refused to provide the necessary passwords for Retina Consultants to use Clinex and Clinex-RE. Furthermore, he used the company's trade secrets and withdrew funds from a company banking account, among other actions. At trial, the court entered a judgment enjoining Coleman from marketing the software that was in competition with the software he had developed for Retina Consultants. The court also obligated Coleman to return the funds taken from the company's bank account. Coleman appealed. [Coleman v. Retina Consultants, P.C., 286 Ga. 317, 687 S.E.2d 457 (2009)]

- Should the court uphold the noncompete clause? If so, why? If not, why not?
- Should the court require Coleman to return the funds he withdrew from the company's accounts? Discuss fully.
- Did Coleman's behavior after he left the company influence the court's decision? Explain your answer.

CHAPTER 14

Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent

An otherwise valid contract may still be unenforceable if the parties have not genuinely agreed to its terms. As mentioned in Chapter 10, a lack of voluntary consent (assent) can be used as a defense to the contract's enforceability.

Voluntary consent may be lacking because of a mistake, misrepresentation, undue influence, or duress—in other words, because there is no true “meeting of the minds.” Generally, a party who demonstrates that he or she did not truly agree to the terms of a contract can choose either to carry out the contract or to rescind (cancel) it and thus avoid the entire transaction. In this chapter, we examine the kinds of factors that may indicate a lack of voluntary consent.

SECTION 1 MISTAKES

We all make mistakes, so it is not surprising that mistakes are made when contracts are formed. In certain circumstances, contract law allows a contract to be avoided on the basis of mistake. It is important to distinguish between mistakes of fact and mistakes of value or quality. Only a mistake of fact makes a contract voidable.

Mistakes of Fact

Mistakes of fact occur in two forms—bilateral and unilateral. A bilateral, or mutual, mistake is made by both of the contracting parties. A unilateral mistake is made by only one of the parties. We look next at these two types of mistakes and illustrate them graphically in Exhibit 14–1.

BILATERAL (MUTUAL) MISTAKES OF FACT A bilateral mistake of fact is a “mutual misunderstanding concerning a basic assumption on which the contract was made.”¹ When both parties are mistaken about the same material fact, the contract can be rescinded by either party. Normally, the contract is voidable by the adversely affected party. For example, Gilbert contracts to sell Magellan three tracts of undeveloped land for $6 million on the basis of a surveyor's report showing the layout and acreage. After agreeing to the price, the parties discover that the surveyor made an error and that the tracts actually contain 10 percent more acreage than reported. In this situation, Gilbert can seek rescission (cancellation) of the contract based on mutual mistake. The same result—rescission—would occur if both parties had mistakenly believed that the tracts of land were adjoining but they were not.²

A word or term in a contract may be subject to more than one reasonable interpretation. If the parties to the contract attach materially different meanings to the term, a court may allow the contract to be rescinded because there has been no true “meeting of the minds.”³

1. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 152.

2. See, for example, Rawson v. UMLIC VP, LLC, 933 So.2d 1206 (Fla.App. 2006).

3. The only way for a court to find out the meaning that each party attached to the contract term is to allow the parties to introduce parol evidence, which is basically oral testimony about the terms of their agreement. Parol evidence will be discussed in Chapter 15.

EXHIBIT 14-1 • Mistakes of Fact

CASE IN POINT In 1864, Wichelhaus agreed to buy a shipment of Surat cotton from Raffles, “to arrive ‘Peerless’ from Bombay.” There were two ships named Peerless sailing from Bombay, India, however. Wichelhaus was referring to the Peerless that sailed in October; Raffles meant a different Peerless that sailed in December. When Raffles tried to deliver the goods in December, Wichelhaus refused to accept them, and a lawsuit followed. The court held in favor of Wichelhaus, concluding that a mutual mistake had been made because the parties had attached materially different meanings to an essential term of the contract.⁴

In the following case, the court had to grapple with the question of whether a mutual mistake of fact had occurred.

4. Raffles v. Wichelhaus, 159 Eng.Rep. 375 (1864).

CASE 14.1

Inkel v. Pride Chevrolet-Pontiac, Inc.

Supreme Court of Vermont, 945 A.2d 855 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Normand and Brandy Inkel, who live in Vermont, called Pride Chevrolet-Pontiac, Inc., in Boston about buying a new Chevy Tahoe. They said that they would trade in a high-mileage vehicle they had leased. The sales representative told them that the high-mileage penalty would probably not apply as the lease was from a bank, not a dealership. When the Inkel took delivery of the new Tahoe and left their old vehicle at Pride, the price on the contract was $41,200. In small print on the back of the agreement was a provision that the buyer was responsible for any problems with the trade-in vehicle. A month after the sale, Pride told the Inkel they owed another $16,435 because of a misunderstanding with the leasing company about the high-mileage charge. The Inkel refused to pay. Pride demanded that they return the Tahoe and wanted to cancel the deal; the Inkel refused. The Inkel then sued Pride for breach of contract and other claims. A Vermont trial court held that a mutual mistake had been made in the contract and that the Inkel should have agreed to undo the deal. The court granted summary judgment for Pride and ordered the Inkel to pay damages. They appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

BURGESS, Justice.

* * * *

The evidence submitted in connection with the parties’ cross motions for summary judgment does not establish what happened in the instant case [the case under discussion]. Although the superior court [the trial court] stated in a footnote that it

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 14.1 CONTINUED ♦ was undisputed that the Chittenden Bank was negligent in giving Pride Chevrolet an incorrect payoff amount, Mr. Inkel testified in his deposition that a bank employee told him that Pride Chevrolet had asked for the wrong payoff amount. Thus, it is not clear whether the Pride Chevrolet employee asked for the wrong information or the bank provided the wrong information. In short, the evidentiary record does not make it clear how the “mistake” occurred or even whether there was a mistake. Further, the principal facts that the superior court apparently relied on in ruling in favor of Pride Chevrolet—that the Inkels knew they had substantial negative equity in their vehicle and that another dealership had recently declined to negotiate with them because of the substantial negative equity in the vehicle—do not necessarily undercut the Inkels’ allegation that Pride Chevrolet made, even if [in] good-faith, false and misleading representations * * * by telling them that their lien holder would not seek over-mileage payments on their trade-in.

* * * *

Moreover, we reject Pride Chevrolet’s argument that the Inkels “affirmed” the vehicle purchase contract by refusing to accept its offer to “wash the deal” [rescind the contract] after learning of the parties’ mutual mistake. Pride Chevrolet offers no direct legal support for this proposition, and, in any event, the evidence does not conclusively prove mutual mistake. “A mutual mistake must be a mistake reciprocally involving both parties, a mistake independently made by both parties.” “A mistake by one party coupled with ignorance thereof does not constitute mutual mistake.” [Emphasis added.]

Given the current state of the record, whether the Inkels merely accepted Pride Chevrolet’s statements as true or took advantage of the dealer’s mistaken beliefs, the existence of mutual mistake is questionable at best. Further, even assuming that the parties’ mistake was mutual, Pride Chevrolet failed to demonstrate that the offer to “wash the deal” was a legitimate offer to rescind the contract. Pride Chevrolet presented no evidence indicating precisely when the offer was made, who made the offer, or what terms, if any, were offered.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Vermont high court reversed in favor of the Inkels, holding that it was not clear that a mutual mistake was made. For a court to find that a mutual mistake occurred, evidence would have to be produced at trial to show that both parties were mistaken about the same facts.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • If a Pride sales representative led the Inkels to believe that the dealership did not care about the excessive miles on the trade-in vehicle, should Pride be willing to incur the loss? Why or why not?

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the provision making the buyers responsible for any problems with the trade-in vehicle was clearly visible on the face of the contract that the Inkels signed (rather than being in small print on the back). How might this have changed the outcome of this case?

UNILATERAL MISTAKES OF FACT A unilateral mistake occurs when only one of the contracting parties is mistaken about a material fact. Generally, a unilateral mistake does not afford the mistaken party any right to relief from the contract. Normally, the contract is enforceable. For example, DeVinck intends to sell his motor home for $32,500. When he learns that Benson is interested in buying a used motor home, DeVinck faxes Benson an offer to sell the vehicle to him. When typing the fax, however, DeVinck mistakenly keys in the price of $23,500. Benson immediately sends DeVinck a fax accepting DeVinck’s offer. Even though DeVinck intended to sell his motor home for $32,500, his unilateral mistake falls on him. He is bound in contract to sell the motor home to Benson for $23,500.

There are at least two exceptions to this general rule.⁵ First, if the other party to the contract knows or should have known that a mistake of fact was made, the contract may not be enforceable. In the above example, if Benson knew that DeVinck intended to sell his motor home for $32,500, then DeVinck’s unilateral mistake (stating $23,500 in his offer) can render the resulting contract unenforceable.

5. The Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 153, liberalizes the general rule to take into account the modern trend of allowing avoidance even though only one party has been mistaken.

The second exception arises when a unilateral mistake of fact was due to a mathematical mistake in addition, subtraction, division, or multiplication and was made inadvertently and without gross (extreme) negligence. The clerical error must be readily provable, though. If a contractor's bid was significantly low because he or she made a mistake in addition when totaling the estimated costs, any contract resulting from the bid normally may be rescinded. Of course, in both situations, the mistake must still involve some material fact.

Mistakes of Value

If a mistake concerns the future market value or quality of the object of the contract, the mistake is one of value, and the contract normally is enforceable. Mistakes of value can be bilateral or unilateral, but either way, they do not serve as a basis for avoiding a contract. For example, Renée buys a violin from Ian for $250. Although the violin is very old, neither party believes that it is particularly valuable. Later, however, an antiques dealer informs the parties that the violin is rare and worth thousands of dollars. Here, both parties were mistaken, but the mistake is a mistake of value rather than a mistake of fact that would justify contract rescission. This would be true even if, at the time of contracting, only Ian believed that the violin was not particularly valuable (a unilateral mistake) and Renée thought it was rare and worth more than $250.

The reason that mistakes of value or quality have no legal significance is that value is variable. Depending on the time, place, and other circumstances, the same item may be worth considerably different amounts. When parties form a contract, their agreement establishes the value of the object of their transaction—for the moment. Each party is considered to have assumed the risk that the value will change in the future or prove to be different from what he or she thought. Without this rule, almost any party who did not receive what she or he considered a fair bargain could argue mistake.

FRAUDULENT MISREPRESENTATION

Although fraud is a tort (see Chapter 6), it also affects the authenticity of the innocent party's consent to the contract. When an innocent party is fraudulently induced to enter into a contract, the contract normally can be avoided because that party has not voluntarily consented to its terms.⁶ Ordinarily, the innocent party can either rescind the contract and be restored to her or his original position or enforce the contract and seek damages for any harms resulting from the fraud.

Generally, fraudulent misrepresentation refers only to misrepresentation that is consciously false and is intended to mislead another. The person making the fraudulent misrepresentation knows or believes that the assertion is false or knows that she or he does not have a basis (stated or implied) for the assertion.⁷ Typically, fraudulent misrepresentation consists of the following elements:

1. A misrepresentation of a material fact must occur.
2. There must be an intent to deceive.
3. The innocent party must justifiably rely on the misrepresentation.

Additionally, to collect damages, a party must have been harmed as a result of the misrepresentation.

Misrepresentation Has Occurred

The first element of proving fraud is to show that misrepresentation of a material fact has occurred. This misrepresentation can occur by words or actions. For example, the statement "This sculpture was created by Michelangelo" is a misrepresentation of fact if another artist sculpted the statue. Similarly, if a customer asks to see only paintings by the decorative artist Paul Wright and the owner immediately leads the customer over to paintings that were not done by Wright, the owner's actions can be a misrepresentation.

STATEMENT OF FACT VERSUS OPINION To constitute fraud, the misrepresentation must involve a material fact. What if a party to the contract is merely stating her or his opinion?

Statements of Opinion Do Not Qualify. Statements of opinion and representations of future facts (predictions) generally are not subject to claims of fraud. Every person is expected to exercise care and judgment when entering into contracts, and the law will not come to the aid of one who simply makes an unwise bargain. Statements such as "This land will be worth twice as much next year" or "This car

6. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Sections 163 and 164.

7. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 162.

will last for years and years” are statements of opinion, not fact. Contracting parties should recognize them as opinions and not rely on them. A fact is objective and verifiable; an opinion is usually subject to debate. Therefore, a seller of goods is allowed to use puffery to sell his or her wares without liability for fraud.

Opinions from Experts Can Qualify. In certain situations, such as when a naïve purchaser relies on an opinion from an expert, the innocent party may be entitled to rescission or reformation. (Reformation is an equitable remedy granted by a court in which the terms of a contract are altered to reflect the true intentions of the parties—see Chapter 18.)

CASE IN POINT Audrey E. Vokes, a widow without family, attended a dance party at an Arthur Murray dance school in 1961. The dance instructor praised Vokes’s grace and poise, and convinced her that she had the potential to become an accomplished dancer. Over a period of sixteen months, the instructor sold her 2,302 hours of dancing lessons for a total amount of $31,090.45 (equivalent to $140,000 in 2011). When it became clear to Vokes that she did not, in fact, have the potential to be an excellent dancer, she filed a suit against the school, alleging fraudulent misrepresentation. The court held that because the dance school had superior knowledge about a person’s dance potential, the instructor’s statements could be considered statements of fact rather than opinion.⁸

MISREPRESENTATION BY CONDUCT Misrepresentation also arises when a party takes specific action to conceal a fact that is material to the contract.⁹ Therefore, if a seller, by her or his actions, prevents a buyer from learning of some fact that is material to the contract, such behavior constitutes misrepresentation by conduct.

CASE IN POINT Actor Tom Selleck contracted to purchase a horse named Zorro for his daughter from Dolores Cuenca. Cuenca acted as though Zorro was fit to ride in competitions, when in reality the horse suffered from a medical condition. Selleck filed a lawsuit against Cuenca for wrongfully concealing the horse’s condition and won. In 2009, a jury awarded Selleck more than $187,000 for Cuenca’s misrepresentation by conduct.¹⁰

10. Selleck v. Cuenca, Case No. GIN056909, North County of San Diego, California, decided September 9, 2009.

MISREPRESENTATION OF LAW Misrepresentation of law ordinarily does not entitle a party to relief from a contract. For example, Camara has a parcel of property that she is trying to sell to Pike. Camara knows that a local ordinance prohibits the construction of anything higher than ten stories on the property. Nonetheless, she tells Pike, “You can build a condominium one hundred stories high if you want to.” Pike buys the land and later discovers that Camara’s statement was false. Normally, Pike cannot avoid the contract, because under the common law, people are assumed to know state and local laws. Additionally, a layperson should not rely on a statement made by a nonlawyer about a point of law.

Exceptions to this rule occur when the misrepresenting party is in a profession that is known to require greater knowledge of the law than the average citizen possesses. For example, if Camara, in the preceding example, had been a lawyer or a real estate broker, her misrepresentation of the area’s zoning laws probably would have constituted fraud.

MISREPRESENTATION BY SILENCE Ordinarily, neither party to a contract has a duty to come forward and disclose facts. Therefore, courts typically do not set aside contracts because a party did not volunteer pertinent information. Suppose that Jim is selling a car that has been in an accident and has been repaired. He does not need to volunteer this information to a potential buyer. If, however, the purchaser asks Jim if the car has had extensive bodywork and he lies, he has committed a fraudulent misrepresentation.

Nevertheless, if a seller knows of a serious potential problem that the buyer cannot reasonably be expected to discover, the seller may have a duty to speak. Generally, the seller must disclose only latent defects—that is, defects that could not readily be ascertained. Thus, termites in a house may not be a latent defect, because a buyer could discover their presence through a termite inspection. Also, when the parties are in a fiduciary relationship (a relationship founded on trust and confidentiality, such as between a physician and patient or attorney and client), there is a duty to disclose material facts. Failure to do so may constitute fraud.

In the following case, a student sought to rescind a pair of mortgages on a New York condominium on the ground that the apartment had been a gift and that she had been defrauded into signing the loan documents.

Rosenzweig v. Givens

New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, 62 A.D.3d 1, 879 N.Y.S.2d 387 (2009).
www.courts.state.ny.us/decisions/index.shtml^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Radiah Givens, a student, was involved in a romantic relationship with Joseph Rosenzweig, an attorney nineteen years her senior. In 2002, she moved into an apartment on which he made the down payment and acted as the lender for two mortgages totaling $285,300. His attorney had her sign the mortgage documents, but Rosenzweig made the payments and paid the household expenses. In 2004, Givens and Rosenzweig married in Jamaica. A year later, he forged her signature to obtain a bank loan for $150,000. She soon learned of the forgery and discovered that from the beginning of their relationship he had been married to someone else, with whom he had children. The Givens-Rosenzweig marriage was annulled. Rosenzweig then filed a suit in a New York state court against Givens to collect on the mortgages. The court issued a summary judgment in Rosenzweig’s favor. Givens appealed, claiming that the apartment had been a gift.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

MOSKOWITZ, J. [Justice]

* * * *

Defendant contends that the apartment was a gift to her from plaintiff. She contends that she was a student at the time of the transaction and that plaintiff knew she could not make the monthly payments. * * * Defendant explains that plaintiff induced her to sign the mortgage documents by claiming her signature was necessary to effectuate the gift. She says she never questioned this because he was a lawyer and she loved and trusted him.

* * * *

* * * Agreements between spouses * * * involve a fiduciary relationship requiring the utmost of good faith. * * * Although the parties were not married on the day defendant signed the mortgage agreements, their relationship, as their eventual marriage demonstrates, was sufficiently analogous [equivalent] to at least raise a question as to whether or not a fiduciary relationship existed to raise the level of scrutiny of this transaction * * *. Thus, defendant has detailed circumstances that raise an issue of fact about whether a fiduciary relationship existed between the parties, including their romantic involvement that resulted in a marriage (albeit a sham one because plaintiff was a bigamist), their age difference and that plaintiff was a lawyer. [Emphasis added.]

Reasoning that these were mortgage documents, the [lower] court, without discovery, dismissed defendant’s claims that she was fraudulently induced to sign them on the ground that her allegations did not rise to the level of fraud. However, this analysis fails to take into account the highly unusual circumstances of this case * * *. Given the surrounding circumstances, especially the nature of the parties’ relationship, defendant has sufficiently raised an issue of fact about whether plaintiff tricked her into signing the mortgage documents by claiming they were merely a formality to effectuate his gift to her. That defendant did not have her own lawyer, but relied on a friend of plaintiff, further raises questions about this transaction.

* * * *

The record also contains indications that plaintiff did intend the apartment as a gift. For example, plaintiff did not demand payment from defendant for three years and then not until their relationship was disintegrating because defendant had discovered that plaintiff had forged her signature on a loan application and had another wife. * * * Moreover, it would be unusual for someone who intended to make a loan to also provide the down payment, pay the maintenance and pay most other household expenses. * * * Given that the marriage was a sham and that plaintiff forged defendant’s signature on a loan application for $150,000, it is plausible that plaintiff did trick defendant into thinking he was gifting her the apartment. [Emphasis added.]

CASE 14.2 CONTINUED ♦ DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court reversed the lower court's judgment and remanded the case for discovery and trial. Rosenzweig could have committed fraud against Givens.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the difference in the parties' ages was reversed so that Rosenzweig was nineteen years Givens's junior. Should this affect the outcome in the case? Explain.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Could Rosenzweig be characterized as a scoundrel? If so, should this influence the decision in this case? Discuss.

Intent to Deceive

The second element of fraud is knowledge on the part of the misrepresenting party that facts have been falsely represented. This element, normally called scienter,¹¹ or “guilty knowledge,” signifies that there was an intent to deceive. Scienter clearly exists if a party knows a fact is not as stated. Scienter also exists if a party makes a statement that he or she believes is not true or makes a statement recklessly, without regard to whether it is true or false. Finally, this element is met if a party says or implies that a statement is made on some basis, such as personal knowledge or personal investigation, when it is not.

CASE IN POINT Robert Sarvis, a convicted felon, applied for a position as an adjunct professor two weeks after his release from prison. On his résumé, he lied about his work history by representing that he had been the president of a corporation for fourteen years and had taught business law at another college. After he was hired and began working, Sarvis's probation officer alerted the school to his criminal history. The school immediately fired Sarvis, and he brought a lawsuit against the school for breaching his employment contract. The court held in the school's favor because Sarvis had not fully disclosed his personal history, he clearly had an intent to deceive, and the school had justifiably relied on his misrepresentations.¹²

INNOCENT MISREPRESENTATION If a person makes a statement that she or he believes to be true but that actually misrepresents material facts, the person is guilty only of an innocent misrepresentation, not of fraud. When an innocent misrepresentation occurs, the aggrieved party can rescind the contract but usually cannot seek damages. For example, Parris tells Roberta that a tract of land contains 250 acres. Parris is mistaken—the tract contains only 215 acres—but Parris had no knowledge of the mistake. Roberta relies on the statement and contracts to buy the land. Even though the misrepresentation is innocent, Roberta can avoid the contract if the misrepresentation is material.

In the following case, a party sought to rescind a deed based on misrepresentation. The issue before the court was whether an intent to deceive is necessary for fraudulent misrepresentation to occur.

✦ EXTENDED CASE 14.3 ✦

Eaton v. Waldrop

Court of Civil Appeals of Alabama, ___ So.3d ___ (2010).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

MOORE, Judge.

* * * *

On December 16, 2005, James M.

Eaton, Jr., and Marguerite Eaton [his mother] * * * filed a complaint against [Bobby Joe] Waldrop alleging, among other things, that Waldrop had fraudulently induced James to deed certain property situated in Jefferson County (“the property”) to Waldrop and Marguerite, jointly with a right of survivorship, and that Waldrop had subsequently fraudulently induced Marguerite to transfer her interest in the property to Waldrop. James and Marguerite requested that the court set aside the deed executed by James transferring the property to Marguerite and Waldrop * * *. Marguerite subsequently died, and James, as the executor of her estate [the person designated in her will to handle her affairs on her death], was substituted as a plaintiff.

* * * The trial court conducted a bench [without a jury] trial on June 11, 2009. At the conclusion of James's case-in-chief, Waldrop moved for a judgment as a matter of law, arguing that James had failed to prove that Waldrop had made a representation "with intent to deceive." The trial court granted that motion, and * * * James filed his notice of appeal * * *.

On appeal, James * * * argues that the trial court erred in granting Waldrop's motion * * * because, he says, the law does not require him to prove an intent to deceive in order to obtain a rescission of a deed based on fraud.

James cites [Alabama Code 1975, Section 6-5-101 and a previous case] in support of his argument that intent to deceive is not a necessary element of fraud. Section 6-5-101 provides: "Misrepresentations of a material fact made willfully to deceive, or recklessly without knowledge, and acted on by the opposite party, or if made by mistake and innocently and acted on by the opposite party, constitute legal fraud." (Emphasis added [by the court].)

* * * The Alabama Supreme Court, citing [Section] 6-5-101 stated that "a false representation, even if made innocently or by mistake, operates as a legal fraud if it is a material fact that is acted upon with belief in its truth." We also note that our [state] supreme court has applied [Section] 6-5-101 in an action to set aside a deed. * * * Accordingly, we conclude that Alabama law does not require a plaintiff seeking rescission of a deed based on an allegation of fraud to prove intent to deceive.

In this case, James presented evidence indicating that Marguerite, his mother, had deeded him certain real property. Marguerite and Waldrop then moved into a mobile home on that property with the permission of James. Waldrop soon began requesting that James deed to Waldrop and Marguerite the parcel of property on which the mobile home rested. James consented to Waldrop's request only after Waldrop had represented that he and Marguerite had married, which was not true. James testified that he never would have executed the deed transferring the property jointly to Marguerite and Waldrop * * * if he had known the truth. In the present context, that evidence presented a prima facie case [a case in which the evidence compels the plaintiff's conclusion if the defendant produces no evidence to disprove it] of misrepresentation without further proof of Waldrop's intent to deceive. Thus, the trial court erred in granting Waldrop's motion * * *.

* * * *
Based on the foregoing, we reverse the trial court's judgment * * * and remand this cause for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

QUESTIONS

1. Why was James arguing on appeal that intent to deceive was not a requirement for fraud? Given that Waldrop had told James that he and Marguerite were married, when in fact they weren't, couldn't intent to deceive be inferred? Discuss.
2. Recall from Chapter 1 that there are two types of remedies: equitable remedies and remedies at law. Is rescission an equitable remedy or a remedy at law? Why is rescission an appropriate remedy in this case?

NEGLIGENT MISREPRESENTATION Sometimes, a party makes a misrepresentation through carelessness, believing the statement is true. If the party fails to exercise reasonable care in uncovering or disclosing the facts or does not use the skill and competence that her or his business or profession requires, such a misrepresentation may constitute negligent misrepresentation. For example, an operator of a weight scale certifies the weight of Sneed's commodity, even though the scale's accuracy has not been checked in more than a year.

In almost all states, such negligent misrepresentation is equal to scienter, or knowingly making a misrepresentation. In effect, negligent misrepresentation is treated as fraudulent misrepresentation, even though the misrepresentation was not purposeful. In negligent misrepresentation, culpable ignorance of the truth supplies the intention to mislead, even if the defendant can claim, "I didn't know."

Reliance on the Misrepresentation

The third element of fraud is reasonably justifiable reliance on the misrepresentation of fact. The deceived party must have a justifiable reason for relying on the misrepresentation, and the misrepresentation must be an important factor (but not necessarily the sole factor) in inducing that party to enter into the contract. Suppose that to rent a car, an eighteen-year-old misrepresents his age and presents a false driver's license listing his age as twenty-two. In this situation, the car rental agency would be justified in relying on the misrepresentation (provided that the proof of identity was not visibly false).¹³

Reliance is not justified if the innocent party knows the true facts or relies on obviously extravagant statements. If a used-car dealer says, “This old Cadillac will get fifty miles to the gallon,” the potential buyer normally will not be justified in relying on the statement. Suppose, however, that Merkel, a bank director, induces O’Connell, a co-director, to sign a statement that the bank has sufficient assets to meet its liabilities by telling O’Connell, “We have plenty of assets to satisfy our creditors.” This statement is false. If O’Connell knows the true facts or, as a bank director, should know the true facts, he is not justified in relying on Merkel’s statement. If O’Connell does not know the true facts, however, and has no way of finding them out, he may be justified in relying on the statement.

The same rule applies to defects in property sold. If the defects are of the kind that would be obvious on inspection, the buyer cannot justifiably rely on the seller’s representations. If the defects are hidden or latent, as previously discussed, the buyer is justified in relying on the seller’s statements.

Should employers also be held liable for misrepresentations they make to prospective employees? See this chapter’s Insight into Ethics feature for a discussion of this issue.

Injury to the Innocent Party

Most courts do not require a showing of injury when the action is to rescind the contract. These courts hold that because rescission returns the parties to the positions they held before the contract was made, a showing of injury to the innocent party is unnecessary.

To recover damages caused by fraud, however, proof of harm is universally required. The measure of damages is ordinarily equal to the property’s value had it been delivered as represented, less the actual price paid for the property. Additionally, because fraud actions necessarily involve wrongful conduct, courts may also award punitive damages, or exemplary damages.¹⁴ As discussed in Chapter 6,

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

How Much Information Must Employers Disclose to Prospective Employees?

One of the problems employers face is that it is not always clear what information they should disclose to prospective employees. To lure qualified workers, employers are often tempted to “promise the moon” and paint their companies’ prospects as bright. Employers must be careful, though, to avoid any conduct that could be interpreted by a court as intentionally deceptive. In particular, they must avoid making any statements about their companies’ future prospects or financial health that they know to be false. If they do make a false statement on which a prospective employee relies to her or his detriment, they may be sued for fraudulent misrepresentation.

In one case, for example, an employee accepted a job with a brokerage firm because he relied on assurances that the firm was not about to be sold. In fact, negotiations to sell the firm were under way at the time he was hired. The employee filed a fraud claim against the firm and won, and the trial court awarded him more than $6 million in damages.^a

a. McConkey v. AON Corp., 354 N.J.Super. 25, 804 A.2d 572 (A.D. 2002).

In another case, Kevin Helmer filed a fraud lawsuit against Bingham Toyota Isuzu and Bob Clark, his supervisor at the firm. Helmer claimed that he was fraudulently induced to leave a prior job with another Toyota dealership due to false promises made to him by Clark concerning the amount of compensation that he would receive at Bingham Toyota. A jury found in Helmer’s favor, awarding him $450,913 in compensatory damages and $1.5 million in punitive damages. (Later, the court reduced the punitive damages award to $675,000.)^b

INSIGHT INTO THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT

Why would an employer risk the possibility of a lawsuit by providing a prospective employee with false information?

punitive damages are intended to punish the defendant and are granted to a plaintiff over and above compensation for the proved, actual loss. Because of the potential for punitive damages, which normally are not available in contract actions, plaintiffs often include a claim for fraudulent misrepresentation in their contract disputes.

SECTION 3 UNDUE INFLUENCE

Undue influence arises from special kinds of relationships in which one party can greatly influence another party, thus overcoming that party's free will. A contract entered into under excessive or undue influence lacks voluntary consent and is therefore voidable.¹⁵

How Undue Influence May Occur

There are various types of relationships in which one party may dominate another party, thus unfairly influencing him or her. Minors and elderly people, for example, are often under the influence of guardians (persons who are legally responsible for another). If a guardian induces a young or elderly ward (a person whom the guardian looks after) to enter into a contract that benefits the guardian, the guardian may have exerted undue influence. Undue influence can arise from a number of fiduciary relationships, such as physician-patient, parent-child, husband-wife, or guardian-ward.

The essential feature of undue influence is that the party being taken advantage of does not, in reality, exercise free will in entering into a contract. It is not enough that a person is elderly or suffers from some physical or mental impairment. There must be clear and convincing evidence that the person did not act out of her or his free will.¹⁶ Similarly, the existence of a fiduciary relationship alone is insufficient to prove undue influence.¹⁷

The Presumption of Undue Influence

When the dominant party in a fiduciary relationship benefits from that relationship, a presumption of undue influence arises. In a relationship of trust and confidence, such as that between an attorney and a client, the dominant party (the attorney) must exercise the utmost good faith in dealing with the other party. When a contract enriches the dominant party, the court will often presume that the contract was made under undue influence.

For example, if a guardian enters into a contract on behalf of the ward that financially benefits the guardian and the ward challenges the contract, a presumption arises that the guardian has taken advantage of the ward. To rebut (refute) this presumption successfully, the guardian has to show that full disclosure was made to the ward, that consideration was adequate, and that the ward received, if available, independent and competent advice before completing the transaction. Unless the presumption can be rebutted, the contract will be rescinded.

SECTION 4 DURESS

Agreement to the terms of a contract is not voluntary if one of the parties is forced into the agreement. The use of threats to force a party to enter into a contract is referred to as duress. In addition, blackmail or extortion to induce consent to a contract constitutes duress. Duress is both a defense to the enforcement of a contract and a ground for the rescission of a contract.

The Threatened Act Must Be Wrongful or Illegal

To establish duress, there must be proof of a threat to do something that the threatening party has no right to do. Generally, for duress to occur, the threatened act must be wrongful or illegal and it must render the person incapable of exercising free will. A threat to exercise a legal right, such as the right to sue someone, ordinarily does not constitute duress.

For example, Joan accidentally drives into Olin's car at a stoplight. Joan has no automobile insurance, but she has substantial assets. At the scene, Olin claims to have suffered whiplash and tells Joan that he will agree not to file a lawsuit against her if she pays him $5,000. Joan initially refuses, but Olin says, "If you don't pay me $5,000 right now, I'm going to sue you for $25,000." Joan then gives Olin a check for $5,000 to avoid the lawsuit. The next day, Joan stops payment on the check. When Olin later sues to enforce their oral settlement agreement for $5,000, Joan claims duress as a defense to its enforcement. In this situation, because Olin had a right to sue Joan, his threat to sue her does not constitute duress. A court would not consider the threat of a civil suit to be duress.

15. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 177.

16. See, for example, Bailey v. Turnbow, 273 Va. 262, 639 S.E.2d 291 (2007); and Hooten v. Jensen, 94 Ark.App. 130, 227 S.W.3d 431 (2006).

17. See, for example, Landers v. Sgouros, 224 S.W.3d 651 (Mo.App. 2007); and Ware v. Ware, 161 P.3d 1188 (Alaska 2007).

Economic Duress

Economic need generally is not sufficient to constitute duress, even when one party exacts a very high price for an item that the other party needs. If the party exacting the price also creates the need, however, economic duress may be found.

For example, the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) assesses a large tax and penalty against Weller. Weller retains Eyman, the accountant who prepared the tax returns on which the assessment was based, to challenge the assessment. Two days before the deadline for filing a reply with the IRS, Eyman declines to represent Weller unless he signs a very high contingency-fee agreement for the services. In this situation, a court might find that the agreement was unenforceable because of economic duress. Although Eyman has threatened only to withdraw his services, something that he is legally entitled to do, he is responsible for delaying the withdrawal until the last days before the deadline. Because it would be impossible at that late date to obtain adequate representation elsewhere, Weller would be forced either to sign the contract or to lose his right to challenge the IRS assessment.

ADHESION CONTRACTS AND UNCONSCIONABILITY

Questions concerning voluntary consent may arise when the terms of a contract are dictated by a party with overwhelming bargaining power and the signer must agree to those terms or go without the commodity or service in question. As explained in Chapter 13, such contracts, which are written exclusively by one party and presented to the other party on a take-it-or-leave-it basis, are often referred to as adhesion contracts. These contracts often use standard forms, which give the adhering party no opportunity to negotiate the contract terms.

Standard-Form Contracts

Standard-form contracts often contain fine-print provisions that shift a risk ordinarily borne by one party to the other. A variety of businesses use such contracts. Life insurance policies, residential leases, loan agreements, and employment agency contracts are often standard-form contracts. To avoid enforcement of the contract or of a particular clause, the aggrieved party must show that the parties had substantially unequal bargaining positions and that enforcement would be manifestly unfair or oppressive. If the required showing is made, the contract or particular term is deemed unconscionable and is not enforced.

CASE IN POINT Sherry Simpson signed a standard-form contract with Addy's Harbor Dodge, a car dealership, when she traded in her automobile for a new vehicle. Above the signature line was a statement indicating that there were additional terms and conditions on the opposite page. Simpson did not read these terms, which contained an arbitration clause that also limited the damages she could recover in the event of a dispute. Simpson later filed a lawsuit, claiming that Addy's had misrepresented the trade-in value of her vehicle, artificially increased the purchase price, and failed to provide all promised rebates. Addy's filed a motion to compel arbitration, which the court denied. The court refused to enforce the arbitration provision on the ground that it was unconscionable. Not only was it oppressive, one sided, and inconspicuous, but it also required Simpson to give up statutory remedies.¹⁸

Unconscionability and the Courts

Technically, unconscionability under Section 2–302 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) applies only to contracts for the sale of goods. Many courts, however, have broadened the concept and applied it in other situations.

Although unconscionability was discussed in Chapter 13, it is important to note here that the UCC gives courts a great degree of discretion to invalidate or strike down a contract or clause as being unconscionable. As a result, some states have not adopted Section 2–302 of the UCC. In those states, the legislature and the courts prefer to rely on traditional notions of fraud, undue influence, and duress.

See Concept Summary 14.1 for a review of all of the factors that may indicate a lack of voluntary consent.

REVIEWING

Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent

Chelene had been a caregiver for Marta's eighty-year-old mother, Janis, for nine years. Shortly before Janis passed away, Chelene convinced her to buy Chelene's house for Marta. The elderly woman died before the papers were signed, however. Four months later, Marta used her inheritance to buy Chelene's house without having it inspected. The house was built in the 1950s, and Chelene said it was in "perfect condition." Nevertheless, one year after the purchase, the basement started leaking. Marta had the paneling removed from the basement walls and discovered that the walls were bowed inward and cracked. Marta then had a civil engineer inspect the basement walls, and he found that the cracks had been caulked and painted over before the paneling was installed. He concluded that the "wall failure" had existed "for at least thirty years" and that the basement walls were "structurally unsound." Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Can Marta obtain rescission of the contract based on undue influence? If the sale to Janis had been completed before her death, could Janis have obtained rescission based on undue influence? Explain.

 Grano owns a forty-room motel on Highway 100. Tanner is interested in purchasing the motel. During the course of negotiations, Grano tells Tanner that the motel netted $30,000 during the previous year and that it will net at least $45,000 the next year. The motel books, which Grano turns over to Tanner before the purchase, clearly show that Grano's motel netted only $15,000 the previous year. Also, Grano fails to tell Tanner that a bypass to Highway 100 is being planned that will redirect most traffic away from the front of the motel. Tanner purchases the motel. During the first year under Tanner's operation, the motel nets only $18,000. At this time, Tanner learns of the previous low profitability of the motel and the planned bypass. Tanner wants Grano to return the purchase price. Discuss fully Tanner's probable success in getting his funds back.

14-3. Voluntary Consent Discuss whether either of the following contracts will be unenforceable on the ground that voluntary consent is lacking:

- (a) Simmons finds a stone in his pasture that he believes to be quartz. Jenson, who also believes that the stone is quartz, contracts to purchase it for $10. Just before delivery, the stone is discovered to be a diamond worth $1,000.
- (b) Jacoby's barn is burned to the ground. He accuses Goldman's son of arson and threatens to have the prosecutor bring a criminal action unless Goldman agrees to pay him $5,000. Goldman agrees to pay.

14-4. Negligent Misrepresentation Cleveland Chiropractic College (CCC) promised prospective students that CCC would provide clinical training and experience—a critical part of a chiropractic education and a requirement for graduation and obtaining a license to practice. Specifically, CCC expressly promised that it would provide an ample variety of patients. CCC knew, however, that it did not have the ability to provide sufficient patients, as evidenced by its report to the Council on Chiropractic Education, an accreditation body through which chiropractic colleges monitor and certify themselves. In that report, CCC said that patient recruitment was the “joint responsibility” of the college and the student. During the 1990s, most of the “patients” that students saw were healthy persons whom the students recruited to be stand-in patients. After graduating and obtaining licenses to practice, Michael Troknya and nineteen others filed a suit in a federal district court against CCC, alleging, among other things, negligent misrepresentation. What are the elements of this cause of action? Are they satisfied in this case? Why or why not? [Troknya v. Cleveland Chiropractic Clinic, 280 F.3d 1200 (8th Cir. 2002)]

14-5. Duress The law firm of Traystman, Coric and Keramidas represented Andrew Daigle in a divorce in Norwich, Connecticut. Scott McGowan, an attorney with the firm, handled the two-day trial. After the first day of the trial, McGowan told Daigle to sign a promissory note in the amount of $26,973, which represented the amount that Daigle then owed to the firm, or McGowan would withdraw from the case and Daigle would be forced to get another attorney or to continue the trial by himself. Daigle said that he wanted another attorney, Martin Rutchik, to see the note. McGowan urged Daigle to sign it and assured him that a copy would be sent to Rutchik. Feeling that he had no other choice, Daigle signed the note. When he did not pay, the law firm filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against him. Daigle asserted that the note was unenforceable because he had signed it under duress. What are the requirements for the use of duress as a defense to a contract? Are the requirements met here? What might the law firm argue in response to Daigle's assertion? Explain. [Traystman, Coric and Keramidas v. Daigle, 84 Conn.App. 843, 855 A.2d 996 (2004)]

14-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Fraudulent Misrepresentation.

According to the student handbook at Cleveland Chiropractic College (CCC) in Missouri, academic misconduct includes “selling . . . any copy of any material intended to be used as an instrument of academic evaluation in advance of its initial administration.” Leonard Verni was enrolled at CCC in Dr. Aleksandr Makarov's dermatology class. Before the first examination, Verni was reported to be selling copies of the test. CCC investigated and concluded that Verni had committed academic misconduct. He was dismissed from CCC, which informed him of his right to an appeal. According to the handbook, at the hearing on appeal a student could have an attorney or other adviser, present witnesses' testimony and other evidence, and “question any testimony . . . against him/her.” At his hearing, however, Verni did not bring his attorney, present evidence on his behalf, or question any adverse witnesses. When the dismissal was upheld, Verni filed a suit in a Missouri state court against CCC and others, claiming, in part, fraudulent misrepresentation. Verni argued that because he “relied” on the handbook's “representation” that CCC would follow its appeal procedure, he was unable to properly refute the charges against him. Can Verni succeed with this argument? Explain. [Verni v. Cleveland Chiropractic College, 212 S.W.3d 150 (Mo. 2007)]

14-7. Fraudulent Misrepresentation Peggy Williams helped eighty-seven-year-old Melvin Kaufman care for Elsie Kaufman, his wife and Williams's great aunt, for several years before her death. Melvin then asked Williams to “take care of him the rest of his life.” He conveyed his house to her for “Ten and No/100 Dollars ($10.00), and other good and valuable consideration,” according to the deed, and executed a power of attorney in her favor. When Melvin returned from a trip to visit his brother, however, Williams had locked him out of the house. He filed a suit in a Texas state court, alleging fraud. He claimed that he had deeded the house to her in exchange for her promise of care, but that she had not taken care of him and had not paid him the ten dollars. Williams admitted that she had not paid the ten dollars, but argued that she had made no such promise, that Melvin had given her the house when he had been unable to sell it, and that his trip had been intended as a move. Do these facts show fraud? If so, what would be the appropriate remedy? Explain. [Williams v. Kaufman, 275 S.W.3d 637 (Tex.App.—Beaumont 2009)]

14-8. Fraudulent Misrepresentation Ricky and Sherry Wilcox hired Esprit Log and Timber Frame Homes to build a log house, which the Wilcoxes intended to sell. They paid Esprit $125,260 for materials and services. They eventually sold the home for $1,620,000 but sued Esprit due to construction delays. The logs were supposed to arrive at the construction site pre-cut and pre-drilled, but that did not happen. So it took five extra months to build the house while the logs were cut and drilled one by one. The Wilcoxes claimed that the interest they paid on a loan for the extra construction time cost them about $200,000. The jury agreed and awarded them that much in damages, plus $250,000 in punitive damages and $20,000 in attorneys' fees. Esprit appealed, claiming that the evidence did not support the verdict because the Wilcoxes had sold the house for a good price. Is Esprit's argument credible? Why or why not? How should the court rule? [Esprit Log and Timber Frame Homes, Inc. v. Wilcox, 302 Ga.App. 550, 691 S.E.2d 344 (2010)]

14-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Mistake.

On behalf of BRJM, LLC, Nicolas Kepple offered Howard Engelsen $210,000 for a parcel of land known as lot five on the north side of Barnes Road in Stonington, Connecticut. Engelsen's company, Output Systems, Inc., owned the land. Engelsen had the lot surveyed and obtained an appraisal. The appraiser valued the property at $277,000, after determining that it was 3.0 acres in size and thus could not be subdivided because it did not meet the town's minimum legal requirement of 3.7 acres for subdivision. Engelsen responded to Kepple's offer with a counteroffer of $230,000, which Kepple accepted. On May 3, 2002, the parties signed a contract. When Engelsen refused to go through with the deal, BRJM filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Output, seeking specific performance and other relief. The defendant asserted the defense of mutual mistake on at least two grounds. [BRJM, LLC v. Output Systems, Inc., 100 Conn.App. 143, 917 A.2d 605 (2007)]

(a) In the counteroffer, Engelsen asked Kepple to remove from their contract a clause requiring written confirmation of the availability of a "free split," which meant that the property could be subdivided without the town's prior approval. Kepple agreed. After signing the contract, Kepple learned that the property was not entitled to a free split. Would this circumstance qualify as a mistake on which the defendant could avoid the contract? Discuss.

(b) After signing the contract, Engelsen obtained a second appraisal that established the size of lot five as 3.71 acres, which meant that it could be subdivided, and valued the property at $490,000. Can the defendant avoid the contract on the basis of a mistake in the first appraisal? Explain.

CHAPTER 15

The Statute of Frauds— Writing Requirement and Electronic Records

As discussed in Chapter 14, a contract that is otherwise valid may still be unenforceable if the parties have not voluntarily consented to its terms. An otherwise valid contract may also be unenforceable for another reason—because it is not in the proper form. For example, certain types of contracts are required to be in writing or evidenced by a memorandum, note, or electronic record (record was defined in Chapter 11 on page 237). The writing requirement does not mean that an agreement must be a formal written contract. All that is necessary is some written proof that a contract exists, such as an e-mail exchange evidencing the agreement. Under what is called the Statute of Frauds, certain agreements are required by law to be in writing or evidenced by a record. If there is no written evidence of the contract, it may not be enforceable.

In this chapter, we examine the kinds of contracts that require a writing under the Statute of Frauds and some exceptions to the writing requirement. We also discuss the parol evidence rule, which courts follow when determining whether evidence that is extraneous, or external, to written contracts may be admissible at trial. Though not inherently related to the Statute of Frauds, the parol evidence rule has general application in contract law. We cover these topics within this one chapter primarily for reasons of convenience and space.

SECTION 1

THE ORIGINS OF THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS

At early common law, parties to a contract were not allowed to testify. This led to the practice of hiring third party witnesses. As early as the seventeenth century, the English recognized the many problems presented by this practice and enacted a statute to help deal with them. The statute, passed by the English Parliament in 1677, was known as “An Act for the Prevention of Frauds and Perjuries.” The act established that certain types of contracts, to be enforceable, had to be evidenced by a writing and signed by the party against whom enforcement was sought. The primary purpose of the statute was to ensure that, for certain types of contracts, there was reliable evidence of the contracts and their terms.

Today, every state has a statute, modeled after the English act, that stipulates what types of contracts must be in writing or evidenced by a writing.

Although the statutes vary slightly from state to state, all states require certain types of contracts to be in writing or evidenced by a written (or electronic) memorandum signed (or acknowledged) by the party against whom enforcement is sought, unless certain exceptions apply. (These exceptions will be discussed later in this chapter.) In this text, we refer to these statutes collectively as the Statute of Frauds. The actual name of the Statute of Frauds is misleading because it neither applies to fraud nor invalidates any type of contract. Rather, it denies enforceability to certain contracts that do not comply with its requirements.

SECTION 2

CONTRACTS THAT FALL WITHIN THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS

The following types of contracts are said to fall “within” or “under” the Statute of Frauds and therefore are required to be in writing or evidenced by a written memorandum or record:

1. Contracts involving interests in land.
2. Contracts that cannot by their terms be performed within one year from the day after the date of formation.
3. Collateral, or secondary, contracts, such as promises to answer for the debt or duty of another and promises by the administrator or executor of an estate to pay a debt of the estate personally—that is, out of her or his own pocket.
4. Promises made in consideration of marriage.
5. Under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC—see Chapter 19), contracts for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more.

Contracts Involving Interests in Land

A contract calling for the sale of land is not enforceable unless it is in writing or evidenced by a written memorandum. Land is real property and includes all physical objects that are permanently attached to the soil, such as buildings, fences, trees, and the soil itself (see Chapter 50). The Statute of Frauds operates as a defense to the enforcement of an oral contract for the sale of land. For example, if Sam contracts orally to sell Fair Oaks to Beth but later decides not to sell, under most circumstances Beth cannot enforce the contract.

The Statute of Frauds also requires written evidence of contracts for the transfer of other interests in land. For example, mortgage agreements and leases (see Chapter 31) normally must be written. Similarly, an agreement that includes an option to purchase real property must be in writing for the option to be enforced.¹

Generally, for a land sale contract to be enforceable under the Statute of Frauds, the contract must describe the property being transferred with sufficient certainty. Whether a contract for the sale of land met this requirement was at issue in the following case.

1. See, for example, Stickney v. Tullis-Vermillion, 165 Ohio App.3d 480, 847 N.E.2d 29 (2006).

EXTENDED CASE 15.1

Salim v. Solaiman

Court of Appeals of Georgia, 302 Ga.App. 607, 691 S.E.2d 389 (2010).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

ADAMS, Judge.

* * * *

Mohammad Salim bought * * * a convenience store and gas station * * *. He made some improvements to the property and then offered it for sale. Talat Solaiman and Sabina Chowdhury approached Salim about buying the property in December 2006. After negotiating a purchase price of $975,000, the parties signed a handwritten document memorializing the terms of the agreement and on December 26, signed a more formal, typewritten “Purchase and Sale Agreement” prepared by Solaiman and Chowdhury.

The typed agreement * * * described [the property] simply as “the property and business (known as BP Food Mart) located at 199 Upper Riverdale Road, Jonesboro, GA 30236.” The agreement set a closing date of January 5, 2007 and required Solaiman and Chowdhury to pay a $25,000 “security deposit” to be applied toward the down payment. But the agreement did not specify what would happen to the security deposit in the event the sale failed to close.

* * * Solaiman and Chowdhury conducted due diligence [investigation], including visiting the store and speaking to store clerks, vendors and customers. They also ordered a title search on the property and paid $2,000 for an application to renew the store’s alcoholic beverage license in their name.

* * * The closing did not occur on January 5. And after receiving the title report in mid-January, Solaiman and Chowdhury decided that they no longer wanted to buy the property. They notified

Salim of their decision and asked for reimbursement of the security deposit and the alcohol license renewal fee. * * * Salim refused to repay the funds, and Solaiman and Chowdhury filed this action [for breach of contract] in December 2007.

The trial court issued judgment in favor of Solaiman and Chowdhury after finding the parties’ purchase agreement to be unenforceable because “it does not sufficiently describe the real property to be purchased.”

* * * *

The requirement that a contract to purchase real property include an adequate property description arises under the Statute of Frauds. To comply with the Statute, an agreement for the sale of land “must be in writing and must provide a sufficiently definite description of the property to be sold. Specifically, such a contract must describe the property * * * with the same degree of certainty as that required in a deed conveying realty.” The property description must demonstrate “with sufficient certainty” the grantor’s intention with regard to the quantity and location of the land to be conveyed, “so that its identification is practicable * * * .” To be enforceable, therefore, the purchase agreement in this case was required to either “describe the particular tract or provide a key by which it may be located with the aid of extrinsic [outside] evidence.” To suffice as a key, the description “must open the door to extrinsic [outside] evidence which leads unerringly to the land in question.” But if the words in the agreement, “when aided by extrinsic evidence, fail to locate and identify a certain tract of land, the description fails and the instrument is void.” [Emphasis added.]

The property description contained in the four corners of the purchase agreement clearly fails to identify the land at issue with the requisite certainty as it merely provides a street address.

* * * *

Accordingly, we affirm the trial court’s holding that the parties’ purchase agreement was void for lack of an adequate property description.

QUESTIONS

1. Why was Salim arguing that the contract should be deemed enforceable when he was being sued for breach of contract?
2. What might Salim have done to ensure that the sales contract would be enforceable?

The One-Year Rule

Contracts that cannot, by their own terms, be performed within one year from the day after the contract is formed must be in writing to be enforceable.² Suppose that Superior University forms a contract with Kimi San stating that San will teach three courses in history during the coming academic year (September 15 through June 15). If the contract is formed in March, it must be in writing to be enforceable—because it cannot be performed within one year. If the contract is not formed until July, however, it does not have to be in writing to be enforceable—because it can be performed within one year.

The key for determining whether an oral contract is enforceable under the one-year rule is whether performance is possible within one year from the day after the date of contract formation—not whether the agreement is likely to be performed within one year. When performance of a contract is objectively impossible during the one-year period, the oral contract will be unenforceable. When performance is objectively possible within a year, the contract does not fall within the Statute of Frauds. For example, an oral contract for lifetime employment does not fall within the Statute of Frauds because an employee who is hired “for life” can die within a year, so the contract can be performed within one year.³ Exhibit 15–1 on the following page graphically illustrates the one-year rule.

2. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 130.

3. See, for example, Gavegnano v. TLT Construction Corp., 67 Mass. App.Ct. 1102, 851 N.E.2d 1133 (2006).

CASE IN POINT Babyback’s International, Inc., makes ready-to-eat barbecue foods that are sold in grocery stores. Babyback’s and the Coca-Cola Company were involved in a co-marketing arrangement in which their products were placed together in stores in the Indianapolis area. Because of the success of the Indianapolis program, the parties began to negotiate another co-marketing contract for the Louisville area. Babyback’s faxed a proposed contract to Coca-Cola that summarized their oral agreement, but Coca-Cola did not sign the agreement, which was to continue for multiple years. Because the agreement could not be performed within a year and because Coca-Cola had not signed the fax, the court ruled that the oral agreement was unenforceable.⁴

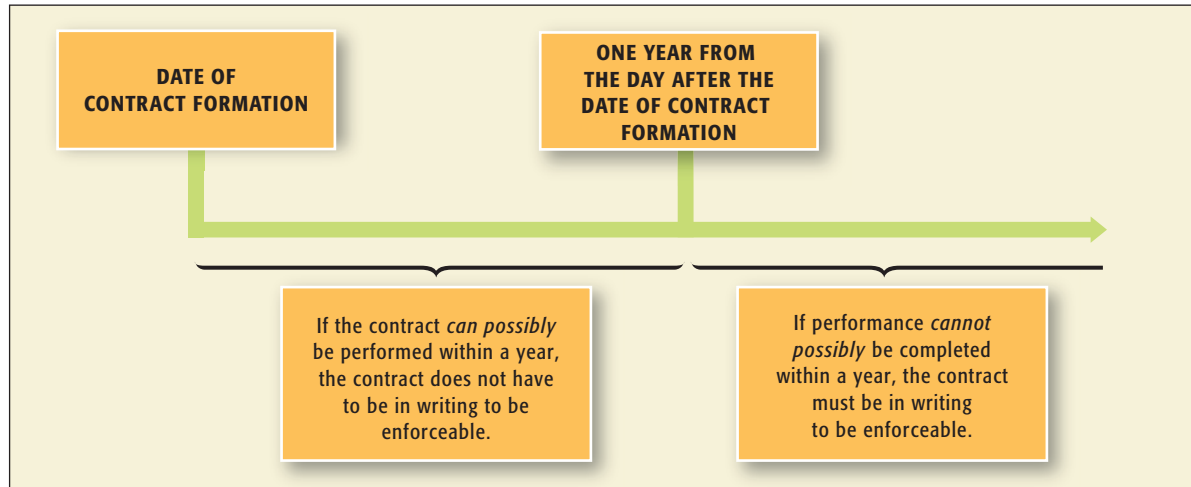

Collateral Promises

A collateral promise, or secondary promise, is one that is ancillary (subsidiary) to a principal transaction or primary contractual relationship. In other words, a collateral promise is one made by a third party to assume the debts or obligations of a primary party to a contract if that party does not perform. Any collateral promise of this nature falls under the Statute of Frauds and therefore must be in writing to be enforceable. To understand this concept, it is important to distinguish between primary and secondary promises and obligations.

4. Coca-Cola Co. v. Babyback’s International, Inc., 841 N.E.2d 557 (Ind. 2006).

EXHIBIT 15-1 • The One-Year Rule

Under the Statute of Frauds, contracts that by their terms are impossible to perform within one year from the day after the date of contract formation must be in writing to be enforceable. Put another way, if it is at all possible to perform an oral contract within one year from the day after the contract is made, the contract will fall outside the Statute of Frauds and be enforceable.

PRIMARY VERSUS SECONDARY OBLIGATIONS As a general rule, a contract in which a party assumes a primary obligation does not need to be in writing to be enforceable. For example, Bancroft forms an oral contract with Corrine's Flowers to send his mother a dozen roses for Mother's Day. Bancroft's oral contract with Corrine's provides that he will pay for the roses when he receives the bill for the flowers. Bancroft is a direct party to this contract and has incurred a primary obligation under the contract. Because he is a party to the contract and has a primary obligation to Corrine's, this contract does not fall under the Statute of Frauds and does not have to be in writing to be enforceable. If Bancroft fails to pay the florist and the florist sues him for payment, Bancroft cannot raise the Statute of Frauds as a defense.

In contrast, a contract in which a party assumes a secondary obligation does have to be in writing to be enforceable. For example, Bancroft's mother borrows $10,000 from the International Bank on a promissory note payable six months later. Bancroft promises the bank officer handling the loan that he will pay the $10,000 only if his mother does not pay the loan on time. Bancroft, in this situation, becomes what is known as a guarantor on the loan—that is, he is guaranteeing to the bank that he will pay back the loan if his mother fails to do so—and has incurred a secondary obligation. This kind of collateral promise, in which the guarantor states that he or she will become responsible only if the primary party does not perform, must be in writing to be enforceable.

Exhibit 15-2 illustrates the concept of a collateral promise. (We will return to the concept of guaranty and the distinction between primary and secondary obligations in Chapter 28, in the context of creditors' rights.)

AN EXCEPTION—THE "MAIN PURPOSE" RULE An oral promise to answer for the debt of another is covered by the Statute of Frauds unless the guarantor's main purpose in incurring a secondary obligation is to secure a personal benefit. This type of contract need not be in writing.⁵ The assumption is that a court can infer from the circumstances of a particular case whether the "leading objective" of the promisor was to secure a personal benefit and thus, in effect, to answer for her or his own debt.

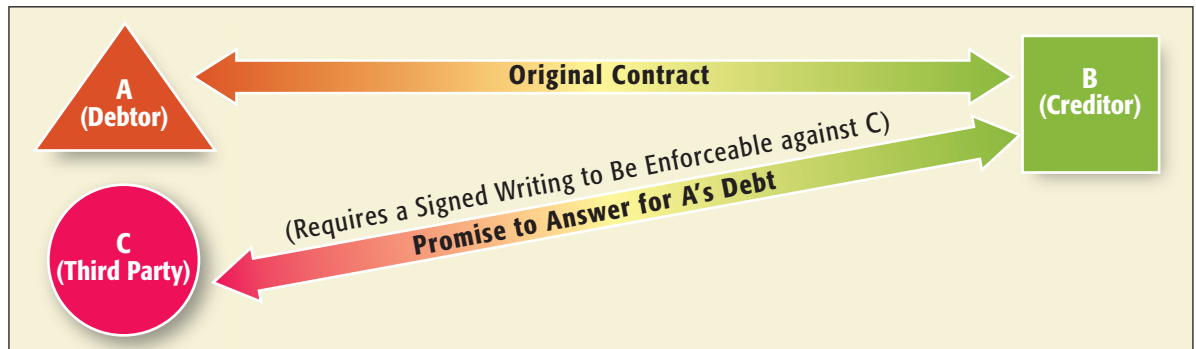

Consider an example. Braswell contracts with Custom Manufacturing Company to have some machines custom-made for Braswell's factory. She promises Newform Supply, Custom's supplier, that if Newform continues to deliver the materials to Custom for the production of the custom-made machines, she will guarantee payment. This promise need not be in writing, even though the effect may be to pay the debt of another. This is because Braswell's main purpose in forming the contract is to secure a benefit for herself (her factory).

Another typical application of the main purpose rule occurs when one creditor guarantees a debtor's

5. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 116.

EXHIBIT 15-2 • Collateral Promises

A collateral (secondary) promise is one made by a third party (C, in this exhibit) to a creditor (B, in this exhibit) to pay the debt of another (A, in this exhibit), who is primarily obligated to pay the debt. Under the Statute of Frauds, collateral promises must be in writing to be enforceable.

debt to another creditor to forestall litigation. A creditor might do this because it allows the debtor to remain in business long enough to generate profits sufficient to pay both creditors. In this situation, the guaranty does not need to be in writing to be enforceable.

Promises Made in Consideration of Marriage

A unilateral promise to make a monetary payment or to give property in consideration of a promise to marry must be in writing. Baumann promises to pay Villard $10,000 if Villard marries Baumann's daughter. Because the promise is in consideration of marriage, it must be in writing to be enforceable.

The same rule applies to prenuptial agreements—agreements made before marriage that define each partner's ownership rights in the other partner's property. A couple might make such an agreement if, for example, a prospective wife wishes to limit the amount her prospective husband can obtain if the marriage ends in divorce. Prenuptial agreements must be in writing to be enforceable. In addition, most states will not enforce a premarital agreement against a person unless she or he voluntarily entered into the agreement after the other party reasonably disclosed his or her assets.⁶

6. In 1983, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws issued the Uniform Prenuptial Agreements Act (UPAA) and the act has now been adopted by a majority of states. The act provides that when a prenuptial agreement was voluntarily entered into in writing after a fair and reasonable disclosure of assets, it is enforceable in every state, not just the state in which the parties married.

Contracts for the Sale of Goods

The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) includes Statute of Frauds provisions that require written evidence or an electronic record of a contract for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more. A writing that will satisfy the UCC requirement need only state the quantity term; other terms agreed on can be omitted or even stated imprecisely in the writing, as long as they adequately reflect both parties' intentions. A written memorandum or series of communications evidencing a contract will suffice.

The sales contract will not be enforceable for any quantity greater than that set forth in the writing. In addition, the writing must have been signed by the person against whom enforcement is sought—that is, by the person who refuses to perform or the one being sued. Beyond these two requirements, the writing normally need not designate the buyer or the seller, the terms of payment, or the price. Requirements of the Statute of Frauds under the UCC will be discussed in more detail in Chapter 19.

Exceptions to the Statute of Frauds

Exceptions to the applicability of the Statute of Frauds are made in certain circumstances. We describe those situations here.

PARTIAL PERFORMANCE A court may grant specific performance (performance of the contract according to its precise terms) of an oral contract to transfer an interest in land when the contract has been partially performed. For instance, when the purchaser has paid part of the price, taken possession of the property, and made permanent improvements to it, the parties clearly cannot be returned to the positions they occupied before the contract was formed. Whether a court will enforce an oral contract for an interest in land when partial performance has taken place usually is determined by the degree of harm that would be suffered if the court chose not to enforce the oral contract. In some states, mere reliance on certain types of oral contracts is enough to remove them from the Statute of Frauds.⁷

7. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 129.

Under the UCC, an oral contract for the sale of goods is enforceable to the extent that a seller accepts payment or a buyer accepts delivery of the goods.⁸ The existence and extent of a contract to supply computer kiosks for use in school cafeterias were in dispute in the following case.

8. UCC 2–201(3)(c). See Chapter 19.

CASE 15.2

School-Link Technologies, Inc. v. Applied Resources, Inc.

United States District Court, District of Kansas, 471 F.Supp.2d 1101 (2007).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Applied Resources, Inc. (ARI), makes computer hardware for point-of-sale systems—kiosks consisting of computers encased in chassis on which card readers or other payment devices are mounted. School-Link Technologies, Inc. (SLT), sells food-service technology to schools. In August 2003, the New York City Department of Education (NYCDOE) asked SLT to propose a cafeteria payment system that included kiosks. SLT asked ARI to participate in a pilot project, orally promising ARI that it would be the exclusive supplier of as many as 1,500 kiosks if the NYCDOE awarded the contract to SLT. ARI agreed. SLT intended to cut ARI out of the deal, however, and told the NYCDOE that SLT would be making its own kiosks. Meanwhile, SLT paid ARI in advance for a certain number of goods but insisted on onerous terms for a written contract, to which ARI would not agree. ARI suspended production of the prepaid items and refused to refund more than $55,000 that SLT had paid. SLT filed a suit in a federal district court against ARI. ARI responded with, among other things, a counterclaim for breach of contract, asserting that SLT had failed to use ARI as an exclusive supplier as promised. ARI sought to recover the expenses it had incurred for the pilot project and the amount of profit that it would have realized on the entire deal. SLT filed a motion for summary judgment on this claim.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

John W. LUNGSTRUM, United States District Judge.

* * * *

SLT raises several arguments as to why it is entitled to summary judgment on ARI's breach of * * * contract claim. SLT relies, first, on the statute of frauds. Contracts for the sale of goods over $500 generally must be in writing and must be signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. Because the NYCDOE contract undisputedly involved the sale of goods in excess of $500, the parties' oral contract that ARI would be the exclusive supplier of kiosks for the project is not enforceable in the absence of an applicable exception to this general rule.

ARI contends that the statute of frauds does not apply with respect to goods which have been received and accepted * * *. *[Under] one of the exceptions to the statute of frauds * * * a contract which would otherwise be unenforceable for lack of a writing but which is valid in other respects is enforceable * * * with respect to goods for which payment has been made and accepted or which have been received and accepted.* This exception allows partial performance to serve as a substitute for the required writing, but only for goods which have been received and accepted or for which payment has been made and accepted. Here, the goods which arguably fall within that definition are those supplied by ARI for the pilot project with the NYCDOE because those goods were received and accepted by SLT. Consequently, SLT's motion for summary judgment based on the statute of frauds is denied with respect to those goods. [Emphasis added.]

SLT's motion based on the statute of frauds is granted, however, with respect to ARI's claim that it was to be the exclusive supplier for 1,500 kiosks for the NYCDOE project. * * * The non-

CASE 15.2 CONTINUED ♦ pilot program kiosks do not fall within the ambit [realm] of [the partial performance exception to the Statute of Frauds] because those goods were not received and accepted, nor was payment made and accepted for them. ARI has not directed the court’s attention to any other evidence which demonstrates a genuine issue of material fact with respect to any other statute of frauds exception. Accordingly, the court’s analysis of ARI’s breach of oral contract claim is narrowed to the goods ARI supplied for SLT’s pilot project with the NYCDOE, as the remaining aspect of that claim is barred by the statute of frauds.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The court denied SLT’s motion for summary judgment on ARI’s counterclaim for breach of contract “with respect to goods which SLT already received and accepted, the goods for the pilot program with the NYCDOE.” Under the partial performance exception to the Statute of Frauds, an oral contract for a sale of goods that would otherwise be unenforceable for the lack of a writing is enforceable to the extent that the seller delivers the goods and the buyer accepts them.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • On what additional theories could ARI’s request for relief be based in this case? What common thread underlies these theories?

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Could ARI have successfully asserted a claim against SLT based on fraudulent misrepresentation? Explain.

ADMISSIONS In some states, if a party against whom enforcement of an oral contract is sought “admits” in pleadings, testimony, or otherwise in court that a contract for sale was made, the contract will be enforceable.⁹ A contract subject to the UCC will be enforceable, but only to the extent of the quantity admitted.¹⁰ For example, the president of Ashley Corporation admits under oath that an oral agreement was made with Com Best to buy certain business equipment for $10,000. In this situation, a court will enforce the agreement only to the extent admitted (the $10,000), even if Com Best claims that the agreement involved $20,000 of equipment.

PROMISSORY ESTOPPEL In some states, an oral contract that would otherwise be unenforceable under the Statute of Frauds may be enforced under the doctrine of promissory estoppel. Recall from Chapter 12 that if a promisor makes a promise on which the promisee justifiably relies to his or her detriment, a court may estop (prevent) the promisor from denying that a contract exists. Section 139 of the Restatement (Second) of Contracts provides that in these circumstances, an oral promise can be enforceable notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds. For the promise to be enforceable, the promisee must have justifiably relied on it to her or his detriment, the reliance must have been foreseeable to the person making the promise, and enforcing the promise must be the only way to avoid injustice.

(Note the similarities between this exception and the doctrine of partial performance discussed previously: both require reasonable reliance and operate to estop a party from claiming that no contract exists.)

SPECIAL EXCEPTIONS UNDER THE UCC Special exceptions to the applicability of the Statute of Frauds apply to sales contracts. Oral contracts for customized goods may be enforced in certain circumstances. Another exception has to do with oral contracts between merchants that have been confirmed in a written memorandum. We will examine these exceptions in more detail in Chapter 19, when we discuss the UCC provisions regarding the Statute of Frauds.

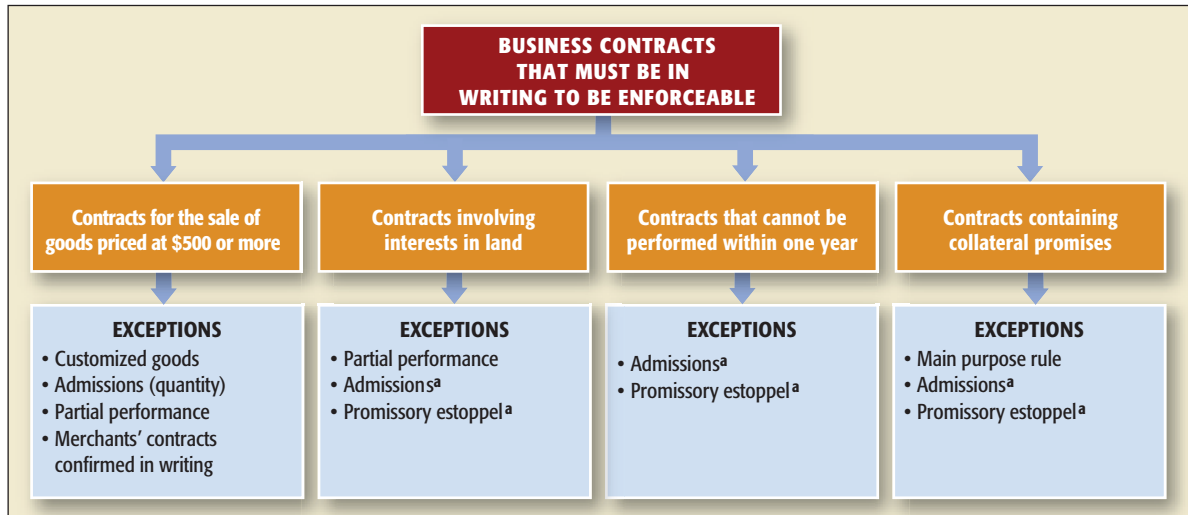

Exhibit 15–3 on the next page graphically summarizes the types of contracts that fall under the Statute of Frauds and the various exceptions that apply.

SECTION 3 SUFFICIENCY OF THE WRITING

A written contract will satisfy the writing requirement of the Statute of Frauds. A written memorandum (written or electronic evidence of the oral contract) signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought will also satisfy the writing requirement. The signature need not be placed at the end of the document but can be anywhere in the writing; it can even be initials rather than the full name. As discussed in Chapter 11, there are many ways to create signatures electronically, and electronic signatures, such as a person's name typed at the bottom of an e-mail message, generally satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

What Constitutes a Writing?

A writing can consist of any order confirmation, invoice, sales slip, check, fax, or e-mail—or such items in combination. The written contract need not consist of a single document to constitute an enforceable contract. One document may incorporate another document by expressly referring to it. Several documents may form a single contract if they are physically attached, such as by staple, paper clip, or glue. Several documents may form a single contract even if they are only placed in the same envelope.

For example, Simpson orally agrees to sell some land next to a shopping mall to Terro Properties. Simpson gives Terro an unsigned memo that contains a legal description of the property, and Terro gives Simpson an unsigned first draft of their contract. Simpson sends Terro a signed letter that refers to the memo and to the first and final drafts of the contract. Terro sends Simpson an unsigned copy of the final draft of the contract with a signed check stapled to it. Together, the documents can constitute a writing sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds and bind both parties to the terms of the contract as evidenced by the writings.

What Must Be Contained in the Writing?

A memorandum or note evidencing the oral contract need only contain the essential terms of the contract, not every term. There must, of course, also be some indication that the parties voluntarily agreed to the terms. A faxed memo of the terms of an agreement could be sufficient if it showed that there was a meeting of the minds and that the faxed terms were not just part of the preliminary negotiations.¹¹

As mentioned earlier, under the UCC, a writing evidencing a contract for the sale of goods need only state the quantity and be signed by the party to be charged. Under most state Statute of Frauds provisions, the writing must also name the parties and identify the subject matter, the consideration, and the essential terms with reasonable certainty. In addition, contracts for the sale of land often are required to state the price and describe the property with sufficient clarity to allow them to be determined without reference to outside sources.

Note that because only the party against whom enforcement is sought must have signed the writing, a contract may be enforceable by one of its parties but not by the other. For example, Rock orally agrees to buy Betty Devlin's lake house and lot for

11. See, for example, Coca-Cola Co. v. Babyback's International, Inc., cited in Footnote 4.

$150,000. Devlin writes Rock a letter confirming the sale by identifying the parties and the essential terms of the sales contract—price, method of payment, and legal address—and signs the letter. Devlin has made a written memorandum of the oral land contract. Because she has signed the letter, she normally can be held to the oral contract by Rock. Devlin cannot enforce the contract against Rock, however, because he has not signed or entered into a written contract or memorandum and can assert the Statute of Frauds as a defense.

THE PAROL EVIDENCE RULE

Sometimes, a written contract does not include—or contradicts—an oral understanding reached by the parties before or at the time of contracting. For instance, a landlord might tell a person who agrees to rent an apartment that she or he can have a cat, whereas the lease contract clearly states that no pets are allowed. If a dispute later arises over whether or not the tenant can have a cat, can the landlord's oral statements be introduced into evidence? In determining the outcome of such disputes, the courts look to a common law rule governing the admissibility in court of oral evidence, or parol evidence.

Under the parol evidence rule, if a court finds that the parties intended their written contract to be a complete and final statement of their agreement, then it will not allow either party to present parol evidence (testimony or other evidence of communications between the parties that are not contained in the contract itself).¹²

CASE IN POINT Pittsburgh Steelers Sports, Inc., sent Ronald Yocca a brochure that offered to sell stadium builder licenses (SBLs), which granted the right to buy season tickets to the Pittsburgh Steelers football games. Prices varied, depending on the seats' locations, which were indicated by small diagrams. Yocca applied for an SBL, listing his seating preferences. The Steelers sent him a letter notifying him where his seat was located, but the diagram showed different seating sections than were shown in the SBL brochure. The Steelers also sent Yocca documents setting forth the terms of the SBL agreement, which included a clause that read, "This Agreement contains the entire agreement of the parties." Yocca signed the documents as required. When Yocca went to the stadium and discovered that his seat was not where he expected it to be, based on the brochure, he filed a lawsuit for breach of contract. The court, however, concluded that the brochure was not part of the parties' contract and dismissed the suit. The SBL documents that Yocca had signed constituted the parties' entire contract and, under the parol evidence rule, could not be supplemented by previous negotiations or agreements.¹³

Exceptions to the Parol Evidence Rule

Because of the rigidity of the parol evidence rule, the courts have created the following exceptions:

1. Contracts subsequently modified. Evidence of any subsequent modification (oral or written) of a written contract can be introduced into court. Keep in mind that the oral modifications may not be enforceable if they come under the Statute of Frauds—for example, if they increase the price of the goods for sale to $500 or more or increase the term for performance to more than one year. Also, oral modifications will not be enforceable if the original contract provides that any modification must be in writing.¹⁴
2. Voidable or void contracts. Oral evidence can be introduced in all cases to show that the contract was voidable or void (for example, induced by mistake, fraud, or misrepresentation). The reason is simple: if deception led one of the parties to agree to the terms of a written contract, oral evidence attesting to the fraud should not be excluded. Courts frown on bad faith and are quick to allow such evidence when it establishes fraud.
3. Contracts containing ambiguous terms. When the terms of a written contract are ambiguous and require interpretation, evidence is admissible to show the meaning of the terms.
4. Incomplete contracts. When the written contract is incomplete in that it lacks one or more of the essential terms, the courts allow evidence to "fill in the gaps."
5. Prior dealing, course of performance, or usage of trade. Under the UCC, evidence can be introduced to explain or supplement a written contract by showing a prior dealing, course of performance, or usage of trade.¹⁵ This is because when buyers and sellers deal with each other over extended periods of time, certain customary practices develop. These practices are often overlooked in the writing of the contract, so courts allow the introduction of evidence to show how the parties have acted in the past. Usage of trade—practices and customs generally followed in a particular industry—can also shed light on the meaning of certain contract provisions, and thus evidence of trade usage may be admissible. We will discuss these terms in further detail in Chapter 19, in the context of sales contracts.

6. Contracts subject to an orally agreed-on condition precedent. As you will read in Chapter 17, sometimes the parties agree that a condition must be fulfilled before a party is required to perform the contract. This is called a condition precedent. If the parties have orally agreed on a condition precedent and the condition does not conflict with the terms of a written agreement, then a court may allow parol evidence to prove the oral condition. The parol evidence rule does not apply here because the existence of the entire written contract is subject to an orally agreed-on condition. Proof of the condition does not alter or modify the written terms but affects the enforceability of the written contract.

CASE IN POINT A city has a renewable contract to lease property for an airport from a business. After a dispute arises, the parties agree to settle it by amending the lease agreement subject to the approval of the city council. The city amends the lease, but the business refuses to sign it, contending that the council has not approved it. Because the council's approval is a condition precedent to the formation of the settlement contract, the parol evidence rule does not apply. Thus, oral evidence is admissible to show that no agreement exists as to the terms of the settlement.¹⁶

7. Contracts with an obvious or gross clerical (or typographic) error that clearly would not represent the agreement of the parties. Parol evidence is admissible to correct an obvious typographic error. Suppose that Davis agrees to lease 1,000 square feet of office space from Stone Enterprises at the current monthly rate of $3 per square foot. The signed written lease provides for a monthly lease payment of $300 rather than the $3,000 agreed to by the parties. Because the error is obvious, Stone Enterprises would be allowed to admit parol evidence to correct the mistake.

In the following case, the court addressed the issue of whether parol evidence could be admitted to clarify the parties' intent in a sale of property.

CASE 15.3

Watkins v. Schexnider

Court of Appeal of Louisiana, Third Circuit, 31 So.3d 609 (2010).
www.la3circuit.org/opinions.htm^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In 2000, Pamela Watkins purchased a home from Sandra Schexnider. The home purchase agreement stated, among other things, that Watkins would pay off the balance of the mortgage in monthly payments until the note was paid in full. “Then the house will be hers.” The agreement also stipulated that Watkins would pay for insurance on the property. Watkins regularly paid the note and insurance. The home was destroyed following Hurricane Rita in 2005, and the mortgage was satisfied by the insurance proceeds. Watkins claimed that she owned the land, but Schexnider refused to transfer title to her. Schexnider asserted that she had sold only the house to Watkins, not the land. Watkins filed a petition in a Louisiana state court for specific performance of the agreement.^b The trial court denied her claim for specific performance, concluding that the “clear wording of the contract” indicated that Watkins was purchasing only the house, not the land. Because the contract was clear on its face, the court refused to admit parol evidence to the contrary. Watkins appealed.

GREMILLION, Judge.

* * * *

Although the general rule is that parol evidence will not be allowed in interpreting a contract, it has been allowed in many instances in order to discern the intention of the parties in contracts to sell immovable property. * * * A panel of this court recently summarized the pertinent law regarding contract interpretation:

* * * *

 * * When the words of a contract are clear, explicit, and lead to no absurd consequences, the contract must be interpreted within its four corners and cannot be explained or contradicted by parol evidence. However, when a word in a contract is not clear, testimony or other evidence may be considered to determine the parties' intent and interpret the contract * * . [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Admittedly, the contract itself refers to the “home” and “house” multiple times. However, it references “the property” in terms of maintaining an insurance policy. The agreement was drafted by a lay person. * * * The fact that Schexnider, the person who wrote the contract, is claiming that the agreement only conveyed the house, yet failed to put any such provision in the contract, can only be interpreted as ambiguous. It seems clear that if a party intends to sell only a house and not the land on which it sits, she would so note and provide for the details of the manner in which the underlying land is to be used. Otherwise, the home buyer is left in a quandary of having no idea what the terms of the land rental agreement is, such as when it begins, the cost, the limitations on the land, and various other matters pertaining to use of another person’s land. This situation surely leads to absurd consequences as it leaves a buyer susceptible [vulnerable] to the landowner’s whim and further leads to instability of transactions involving immovables [real property].

Accordingly, we find that parol evidence should have been allowed to determine the true intent of the parties regarding the underlying land. We now consider the evidence adduced [used as a means of proof in an argument] at trial.

Watkins testified that, as of the time of trial, she had resided in the home for eight years. Watkins testified that Schexnider always indicated that the sale included the house, its contents, and the land. * * * She stated that Schexnider walked her around the property indicating the boundary lines. Watkins stated that Schexnider always indicated that the sale included the land and that she would have never purchased a home that sat on someone else’s land.

* * * Watkins testified that * * * the house was completely destroyed following Hurricane Rita’s landfall in September 2005, but that she and her husband returned to the property the following February and lived in a FEMA [Federal Emergency Management Agency] trailer. She testified that she and her husband began repairing the property. She estimates that they spent approximately $15,000 repairing the property, but could only provide $9,000 worth of receipts. Pictures of the remodeled barn that Watkins converted into a living area were admitted into evidence.

* * * *

Marla Raffield, Watkins’ daughter-in-law, testified that she was present the day that Schexnider pointed out the whole property line. Raffield said that Schexnider indicated a survey would be done once the land was paid for so that Watkins could “verify her land with the court.” Raffield said that Schexnider never indicated that she was only selling the house.

Having reviewed all of the evidence, we are certain that, at the time Watkins and Schexnider confected [prepared] the “Home Purchase Agreement” the land was included as part of the sale.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Court of Appeal of Louisiana held that parol evidence should have been admitted to clarify the meaning of the contract. In light of the parol evidence, the court concluded that the parties intended to transfer ownership of both the house and the land, and ordered that title to the property be transferred to Watkins.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • The parol evidence rule is centuries old and is an important rule of contract law. Why should the courts allow exceptions to this rule?

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 15.3 CONTINUED • MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • Although the contract at issue in this case was written in simple terms by a party with only a high school education, the case contains an important message for businesspersons. No matter how sophisticated and complex the agreement, it is important to make sure that your intentions are made clear by the written words. Otherwise, a judge may determine the issue, and you may not agree with the judge's conclusion. Additionally, if the party you are contracting with states a term or condition orally, and you agree to it, always make sure that the term or condition is included in the written contract. Finally, as you will read shortly, parties can add a clause to their contract stating that the contract is fully integrated, meaning that the contract represents a complete and final record of the parties' agreement. When a contract is fully integrated, parol evidence normally is not admissible.

Integrated Contracts

The key in determining whether parol evidence will be allowed is whether the written contract is intended to be a complete and final statement of the terms of the agreement. If it is so intended, it is referred to as an integrated contract, and extraneous evidence (evidence derived from sources outside the contract itself) is excluded.

An integrated contract can be either completely or partially integrated. If it contains all of the terms of the parties' agreement, then it is completely integrated. If it contains only some of the terms that the parties agreed on and not others, it is partially integrated. If the contract is only partially integrated, evidence of consistent additional terms is admissible to supplement the written agreement.¹⁷ Note that for both complete and partially integrated contracts, courts exclude any evidence that contradicts the writing and allow parol evidence only to add to the terms of a partially integrated contract. Exhibit 15-4 illustrates the relationship between integrated contracts and the parol evidence rule.

17. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 216; and UCC 2-202.

SECTION 5 THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS IN THE INTERNATIONAL CONTEXT

As you will read in Chapter 19, the Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG) governs international sales contracts between citizens of countries that have ratified the convention (agreement). Article 11 of the CISG does not incorporate any Statute of Frauds provisions. Rather, it states that a "contract for sale need not be concluded in or evidenced by writing and is not subject to any other requirements as to form."

EXHIBIT 15-4 • The Parol Evidence Rule

Article 11 accords with the legal customs of most nations, which no longer require contracts to meet certain formal or writing requirements to be enforceable. Ironically, even England, the nation that created the original Statute of Frauds in 1677, has repealed all of it except the provisions relating to collateral promises and to transfers of interests in land. Many other countries that once had such statutes have also repealed all or parts of them. Some countries, such as France, have never required certain types of contracts to be in writing.

REVIEWING

The Statute of Frauds—Writing Requirement and Electronic Records

Charter Golf, Inc., manufactures and sells golf apparel and supplies. Ken Odin had worked as a Charter sales representative for six months when he was offered a position with a competing firm. Charter's president, Jerry Montieth, offered Odin a 10 percent commission "for the rest of his life" if Ken would turn down the offer and stay on with Charter. He also promised that Odin would not be fired unless he was dishonest. Odin turned down the competitor's offer and stayed with Charter. Three years later, Charter fired Odin for no reason. Odin sued, alleging breach of contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would a court likely decide that Odin's employment contract falls within the Statute of Frauds? Why or why not?
2. Assume that the court does find that the contract falls within the Statute of Frauds and that the state in which the court sits recognizes every exception to the Statute of Frauds discussed in the chapter. What exception provides Odin with the best chance of enforcing the oral contract in this situation?
3. Now suppose that Montieth had taken out a pencil, written "10 percent for life" on the back of a register receipt, and handed it to Odin. Would this satisfy the Statute of Frauds? Why or why not?
4. Assume that Odin had signed a written employment contract at the time he was hired to work for Charter, but it was not completely integrated. Would a court allow Odin to present parol evidence of Montieth's subsequent promises?

 DEBATE THIS: Many countries have eliminated the Statute of Frauds except for sales of real estate. The United States should do the same.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

15-1. The One-Year Rule On May 1, by telephone, Yu offers to hire Benson to perform personal services. On May 5, Benson returns Yu's call and accepts the offer. Discuss fully whether this contract falls under the Statute of Frauds in the following circumstances:

- (a) The contract calls for Benson to be employed for one year, with the right to begin performance immediately.
- (b) The contract calls for Benson to be employed for nine months, with performance of services to begin on September 1.

- (c) The contract calls for Benson to submit a written research report, with a deadline of two years for submission.

15-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Collateral Promises.

Mallory promises a local hardware store that she will pay for a lawn mower that her brother is purchasing on credit if the brother fails to pay the debt. Must this promise be in writing to be enforceable? Why or why not?

- For a sample answer to Question 15-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

15-3. The One-Year Rule On January 1, Damon, for consideration, orally promised to pay Gary $300 a month for as long as Gary lived, with the payments to be made on the first day of every month. Damon made the payments regularly for nine months and then made no further payments. Gary claimed that Damon had breached the oral contract and sued Damon for damages. Damon contended that the contract was unenforceable because, under the Statute of Frauds, contracts that cannot be performed within one year must be in writing. Discuss whether Damon will succeed in this defense.

15-4. Collateral Promises Jeremy took his mother on a special holiday to Mountain Air Resort. Jeremy was a frequent patron of the resort and was well known by its manager. The resort required each of its patrons to make a large deposit to ensure payment of the room rental. Jeremy asked the manager to waive the requirement for his mother and told the manager that if his mother for any reason failed to pay the resort for her stay there, he would cover the bill. Relying on Jeremy's promise, the manager waived the deposit requirement for Jeremy's mother. After she returned home from her holiday, Jeremy's mother refused to pay the resort bill. The resort manager tried to collect the sum from Jeremy, but Jeremy also refused to pay, stating that his promise was not enforceable under the Statute of Frauds. Is Jeremy correct? Explain.

15-5. Oral Contracts Jason Knapp, doing business as Knapp Associates, hired Barbara Meade as an independent contractor in March 2009. The parties orally agreed on the terms of employment, including payment to Meade of a share of the company's income, but they did not put anything in writing. In March 2011, Meade quit. Knapp then told Meade that she was entitled to $9,602.17—25 percent of the difference between the accounts receivable and the accounts payable as of Meade's last day. Meade disagreed and demanded more than $63,500—25 percent of the revenue from all invoices, less the cost of materials and outside processing, for each of the years that she worked for Knapp. Knapp refused. Meade filed a lawsuit in a state court against Knapp, alleging breach of contract. In Knapp's response and at the trial, he testified that the parties had an oral contract under which Meade was entitled to 25 percent of the difference between accounts receivable and payable as of the date of Meade's termination. Did the parties have an enforceable contract? How should the court rule, and why?

15-6. Interests in Land Sierra Bravo, Inc., and Shelby's, Inc., entered into a written "Waste Disposal Agreement" under which Shelby's allowed Sierra to deposit on Shelby's land waste products, harmful materials, and debris removed by Sierra in the construction of a highway. Later, Shelby's asked Sierra why it had not constructed a waterway and a building pad suitable for a commercial building on the property, as they had orally agreed. Sierra denied any such agreement. Shelby's filed a suit in a Missouri state court against Sierra, alleging breach of contract. Sierra contended that any oral agreement was unenforceable under the Statute of Frauds. Sierra argued that because the right to remove minerals from land is considered a contract for the sale of an interest in land to which the Statute of Frauds applies, the Statute of Frauds should apply to the right to deposit soil on another person's property. How should the court rule, and why? [Shelby's, Inc. v. Sierra Bravo, Inc., 68 S.W.3d 604 (Mo.App.S.D. 2002)]

15-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: The Parol Evidence Rule.

Novell, Inc., owned the source code for DR DOS, a computer operating system that Microsoft Corp. targeted with allegedly anticompetitive practices in the early 1990s. Novell worried that if it filed a suit, Microsoft would retaliate with further alleged unfair practices. Consequently, Novell sold DR DOS to Canopy Group, Inc., a Utah corporation. The purposes of the sale were to obligate Canopy to bring an action against Microsoft and to allow Novell to share in the recovery without revealing its role. Novell and Canopy signed two documents—a contract of sale, obligating Canopy to pay $400,000 for rights to the source code, and a temporary license, obligating Canopy to pay at least $600,000 in royalties, which included a percentage of any recovery from the suit. Canopy settled the dispute with Microsoft, deducted its expenses, and paid Novell the remainder of what was due. Novell filed a suit in a Utah state court against Canopy, alleging breach of contract for Canopy's deduction of expenses. Canopy responded that it could show that the parties had an oral agreement on this point. On what basis might the court refuse to consider this evidence? Is that the appropriate course in this case? Explain. [Novell, Inc. v. Canopy Group, Inc., 2004 UT App. 162, 92 P.3d 768 (2004)]

15-8. Contract for a Sale of Goods Milton Blankenship agreed in writing to buy 15 acres of Ella Mae Henry's junkyard property for $15,000 per acre with a ten-year option to buy the remaining 28.32 acres. Blankenship orally agreed to (1) begin operating a car skeleton-processing plant within six to fifteen months; (2) buy as many car skeletons generated by the yard as Henry wanted to sell him, at a certain premium over the market price; and (3) allow all junk vehicles on the property to remain until they were processed at the new plant. Blankenship never operated such a plant, never bought any vehicles from the yard, and demanded that all vehicles be removed from the property. To obtain the remaining 28.32 acres, Blankenship filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Henry, who responded with a counterclaim for breach of contract. Under oath during discovery, Henry testified that their oral agreement allowed him to sell “as many of the car skeletons generated by the Henry junkyard” as he wished, and Blankenship testified that he had agreed to buy as many skeletons as Henry was willing to sell. Does the Statute of Frauds undercut or support Henry’s counterclaim? Explain. [Henry v. Blankenship, 284 Ga.App. 578, 644 S.E.2d 419 (2007)]

15-9. The Parol Evidence Rule When Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast in 2005, Evangel Temple Assembly of God in Wichita Falls, Texas, contacted Wood Care Centers, Inc., about leasing a facility it owned to house evacuees from the hurricane. Evangel and Wood Care reached an agreement and signed a twenty-year lease at $10,997 per month. One clause said that Evangel could terminate the lease at any time by giving Wood Care notice and paying 10 percent of the balance remaining on the lease. Another clause stated that if the facility was not given a property tax exemption, Evangel had the option to terminate the lease. Nine months later, the last of the evacuees left the facility, and Evangel notified Wood Care that it would end the lease. Wood Care demanded the 10 percent payment. Evangel claimed that it did not need to make the payment because if the facility converted back to a “non-church” use, it would lose its tax-exempt status and Evangel could simply terminate the lease. Evangel’s pastor testified that the parties understood that this would be the scenario at the time the lease was signed. The trial court held that Evangel owed nothing. Wood Care appealed, contending that the trial court improperly allowed parol evidence to interpret the contract. Was the trial court’s acceptance of parol evidence correct? Why or why not? [Wood Care Centers, Inc. v. Evangel Temple Assembly of God of Wichita Falls, 307 S.W.3d 816303 (Tex.App.—Fort Worth 2010)]

15-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: The Parol Evidence Rule.

William Williams is an attorney in Birmingham, Alabama. In 1997, Robert Shelborne asked Williams to represent him in a deal in London, England, from which Shelborne expected to receive *$31 million. Shelborne agreed to pay Williams a fee of $1 million. Their overseas contact was Robert Tundy, who said that he was with the “Presidency” in London. Tundy said that a tax of $100,010 would have to be paid for Shelborne to receive the $31 million. Shelborne asked James Parker, a former co-worker, to lend him $50,000. Shelborne signed a note agreeing to pay Parker $100,000 within seventy-two hours. Parker, Shelborne, and Williams wired the $50,000 to an account at Chase Manhattan Bank. They never heard from Tundy again. No $31 million was transferred to Shelborne, who soon disappeared. Williams then learned that no “Presidency” existed in London. Whenever Parker asked Williams about the note, Williams assured him that he would be paid. On Parker’s behalf, Williams filed a suit in an Alabama state court against Shelborne, seeking the amount due on the note and damages. The court entered a judgment against the defendant for $200,000, but there were no assets from which to collect it. [Parker v. Williams, 977 So.2d 476 (Ala. 2007)]*

- (a) Parker filed a suit in an Alabama state court against Williams, alleging, among other things, breach of contract. Parker offered as evidence a tape recording of a phone conversation in which Williams guaranteed Shelborne’s loan. Is the court likely to rule in Parker’s favor on the contract claim? Why or why not?
- (b) In response to Parker’s suit, Williams filed a counterclaim, seeking unpaid attorneys’ fees relating to the suit that Williams filed against Shelborne on Parker’s behalf. The court ruled against Williams on this claim. He appealed to the Alabama Supreme Court but failed to supply a transcript of the trial on his counterclaim, as it was his duty to do. Is the appellate court likely to rule in his favor? Why or why not?
- (c) The sham deal at the center of this case is known to law enforcement authorities as advance fee fraud, commonly referred to as a “419 scam.” The victim is promised a transfer of funds from an overpaid contract, or some other suspect source, but is asked to pay a tax or other fee first. Among the parties attracted by the 419 scam in this case, who, if any one, behaved ethically? Discuss.

Third Party Rights

Once it has been determined that a valid and legally enforceable contract exists, attention can turn to the rights and duties of the parties to the contract. A contract is a private agreement between the parties who have entered into it, and traditionally these parties alone have rights and liabilities under the contract. This principle is referred to as privity of contract. A third party—one who is not a direct party to a particular contract—normally does not have rights under that contract.

There are exceptions to the rule of privity of contract. For example, privity of contract between a seller and a buyer is no longer a requirement to recover damages under product liability laws (see Chapter 22). In this chapter, we look at two other exceptions. One exception allows a party to a contract to transfer the rights or duties arising from the contract to another person through an assignment (of rights) or a delegation (of duties). The other exception involves a third party beneficiary contract—a contract in which the parties to the contract intend that the contract benefit a third party.

ASSIGNMENTS AND DELEGATIONS

In a bilateral contract, the two parties have corresponding rights and duties. One party has a right to require the other to perform some task, and the other has a duty to perform it. The transfer of contractual rights to a third party is known as an assignment. The transfer of contractual duties to a third party is known as a delegation. An assignment or a delegation occurs after the original contract was made.

Assignments

Assignments are important because they are involved in many types of business financing. Banks, for example, frequently assign their rights to receive payments under their loan contracts to other firms, which pay for those rights. If Tia obtains a loan from a bank to purchase a car, she may later receive a notice from the bank stating that it has transferred (assigned) its rights to receive payments on the loan to another firm. When it is time to repay the loan, Tia must make the payments to that other firm.

Financial institutions that make mortgage loans (loans to enable prospective home buyers to purchase land or a home) often assign their rights to collect the mortgage payments to a third party, such as GMAC Mortgage. Following the assignment, the home buyers are notified that they must make future payments not to the bank that loaned them the funds but to the third party. Millions of dollars change hands daily in the business world in the form of assignments of rights in contracts. If it were not possible to transfer contractual rights, many businesses could not continue to operate.

TERMINOLOGY In an assignment, the party assigning the rights to a third party is known as the assignor,¹ and the party receiving the rights is the assignee.² Other traditional terms used to describe the parties in assignment relationships are obligee (the person to whom a duty, or obligation, is owed) and obligor (the person who is obligated to perform the duty).

1. Pronounced uh-sye-nore.
2. Pronounced uh-sye-nee.

THE EFFECT OF AN ASSIGNMENT When rights under a contract are assigned unconditionally, the rights of the assignor are extinguished.³ The third party (the assignee) has a right to demand performance from the other original party to the contract. The assignee takes only those rights that the assignor originally had, however.

Suppose that Brower is obligated by contract to pay Horton $1,000. In this situation, Brower is the obligor because she owes an obligation, or duty, to Horton. Horton is the obligee, the one to whom the obligation, or duty, is owed. Now suppose that Horton assigns his right to receive the $1,000 to Kuhn. Horton is the assignor, and Kuhn is the assignee. Kuhn now becomes the obligee because Brower owes Kuhn the $1,000. Here, a valid assignment of a debt exists. Kuhn (the assignee-obligee) is entitled to enforce payment in court if Brower (the obligor) does not pay him the $1,000. These concepts are illustrated in Exhibit 16–1.

RIGHTS ASSIGNED ARE SUBJECT TO THE SAME DEFENSES The assignee's rights are subject to the defenses that the obligor has against the assignor. Assume that in the preceding scenario, Brower owes Horton the $1,000 under a contract in which Brower agreed to buy Horton's MacBook Pro laptop. When Brower decided to purchase the laptop, she relied on Horton's fraudulent misrepresentation that the computer had eight megabytes of memory. When Brower discovers that the computer has only four megabytes of memory, she tells Horton that she is going to return the laptop to him and cancel the contract. Even though Horton has assigned his "right" to receive the $1,000 to Kuhn, Brower need not pay Kuhn the $1,000—Brower can raise the defense of Horton's fraudulent misrepresentation to avoid payment.

FORM OF THE ASSIGNMENT In general, an assignment can take any form, oral or written. Naturally, it is more difficult to prove that an oral assignment occurred, so it is practical to put all assignments in writing. Of course, assignments covered by the Statute of Frauds must be in writing to be enforceable. For example, an assignment of an interest in land must be in writing to be enforceable. In addition, most states require contracts for the assignment of wages to be in writing.⁴

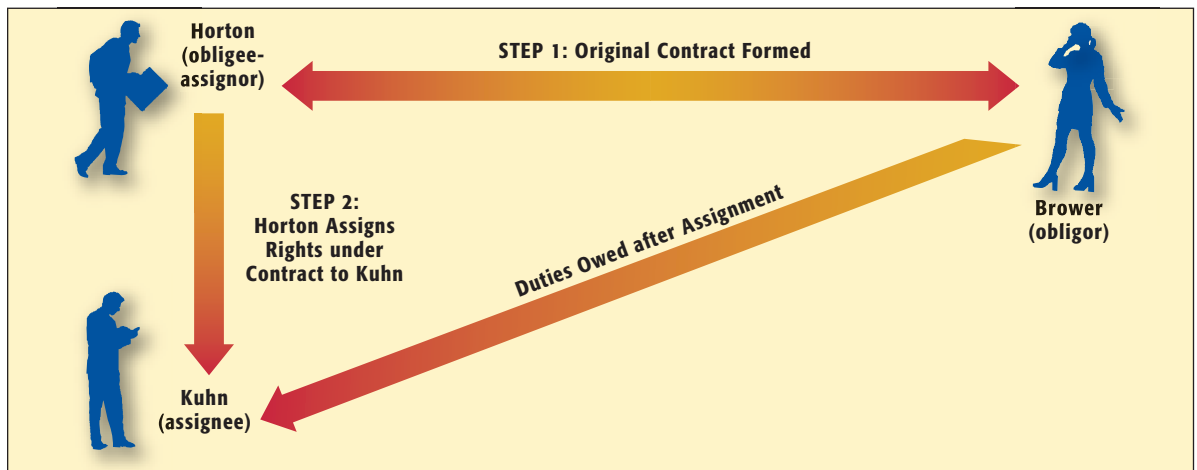

The circumstances in the following case illustrate some of the problems that can arise with oral assignments. The case also stands for the principle that an assignment, like any contract, must have consideration—in this case, a dance center's assumption of a choreographer's legal and financial duties associated with her choreography.

3. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 317.

4. See, for example, California Labor Code Section 300. There are other assignments that must be in writing as well.

EXHIBIT 16–1 • Assignment Relationships

In the assignment relationship illustrated here, Horton assigns his rights under a contract that he made with Brower to a third party, Kuhn. Horton thus becomes the assignor and Kuhn the assignee of the contractual rights. Brower, the obligor, now owes performance to Kuhn instead of Horton. Horton's original contract rights are extinguished after assignment.

CASE 16.1

Martha Graham School and Dance Foundation, Inc. v.
Martha Graham Center of Contemporary Dance, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 380 F.3d 624 (2004).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Martha Graham's career as a dancer, dance instructor, and choreographer began in the first third of the twentieth century. In the 1920s, she started a dance company and a dance school and choreographed works on commission. In the 1940s, she funded the Martha Graham Center of Contemporary Dance, Inc. (the Center). She sold her school to the Martha Graham School of Contemporary Dance, Inc. (the School), in 1956. By 1980, the Center encompassed the School. In 1989, two years before her death, Graham executed a will in which she gave Ronald Protas, the Center's general director, "any rights or interests" in "dance works, musical scores [and] scenery sets." After her death, Protas asserted ownership of all of Graham's dances and related property. In 1999, the Center's board removed Protas and, due to financial problems, suspended operations. Meanwhile, Protas founded the Martha Graham School and Dance Foundation, Inc., and began licensing Graham's dances. When the School reopened in 2001, Protas and his foundation filed a suit in a federal district court against the Center and others to enjoin their use of, among other things, seventy of the dances. The Center responded, in part, that Graham had assigned the dances to it. The court ruled that twenty-one of the dances had been assigned to the Center. The plaintiffs appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Jon O. NEWMAN, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

The Appellants contend that the District Court erred in finding that Graham assigned to the Center 21 dances, * * * which were created before 1956, unpublished at the time of assignment, and not commissioned. We disagree.

* * * *

Although there is no document memorializing Graham's assignment of copyright in her pre-1956 dances to the Center, the District Court was entitled to find that Graham assigned to the Center, orally or in writing, her copyrights in her noncommissioned pre-1956 dances that were not published at the time she assigned them.

The District Court relied on several items of evidence to reach its conclusion. For example, Jeannette Roosevelt, former President of the Center's board of directors, testified that Graham had given the dances to the Center prior to 1965 or 1966, when she joined the board. There was additional evidence that the Center acted as the owner of the dances by entering into contracts with third parties, and that Graham was aware of this and did not object. Other evidence showed that the Center received royalties for the dances and treated them as its assets. However, the only evidence that Graham had assigned the entire group of her pre-1956 dances (noncommissioned and unpublished) to the Center are two letters from Lee Leatherman, the Center's Executive Administrator at that time, written in 1968 and 1971. These letters indicated that "[r]ecently Miss Graham assigned performing rights to all of her works to the Martha Graham Center of Contemporary Dance, Inc.," and that "Martha has assigned all rights to all of her works to the Martha Graham Center, Inc." The Appellants contend that these letters are hearsay^a and were impermissibly considered

These two letters, both in existence 20 years or more at the time they were offered as evidence, were authenticated * * *. There was no reason to suspect their authenticity. Moreover, Linda Hodes, a witness with relevant knowledge, testified that the letters were what they purported to be. The letters were therefore exceptions to the hearsay rule [under which the letters would otherwise be inadmissible]. The District Court did not err in admitting and relying on these letters. [Emphasis added.]

Under New York law, an assignment * * * may be made without writing or delivery of any written statement of the claim assigned, * * * provided only that the assignment is founded on

a. Hearsay is testimony given in court about a statement made by someone else, as was discussed in Chapter 3.

CASE 16.1 CONTINUED ♦ a valid consideration between the parties. The District Court was entitled to find that Graham received consideration for the assignment of her pre-1956 dances. Graham benefited from the Center's assumption of the legal and financial duties associated with her choreography; assigning to the Center the copyrights in her dances gave her what she wished—freedom from the responsibilities of copyright registration and renewal, licensing, collection of royalties, and archival tasks. [Emphasis added.]

The District Court was entitled to find that Graham assigned her pre-1956 dances * * * to the Center sometime between 1957 and the mid-1960s.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed the lower court's judgment on this issue, "commend[ing] the District Court for its careful rulings on the many issues in this complicated case." The appellate court held that Graham had received consideration for her assignment of certain dances and that, although the assignment had been oral, it had been reliably proved by written testimony.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that Graham had not benefited from the Center's assumption of the duties associated with her choreography. Would the alleged assignment have been valid? Why or why not?

THE E-COMMERCE DIMENSION • If Graham's dances had existed as part of a database available only over the Internet, would the principles applied in this case, and the way in which they were applied, have been different? Why or why not?

RIGHTS THAT CANNOT BE ASSIGNED As a general rule, all rights can be assigned. Exceptions are made, however, under certain circumstances. Some of these exceptions are described next.

When a Statute Prohibits Assignment. When a statute expressly prohibits assignment of a particular right, that right cannot be assigned. Suppose that Quincy is an employee of Specialty Computer, Inc. Specialty Computer is an employer under workers' compensation statutes in this state, and thus Quincy is a covered employee. Quincy is injured on the job and begins to collect monthly workers' compensation checks (see Chapter 34 for a discussion of workers' compensation laws). In need of a loan, Quincy borrows from Draper, assigning to Draper all of her future workers' compensation benefits. A state statute prohibits the assignment of future workers' compensation benefits, and thus such rights cannot be assigned.

When a Contract Is Personal in Nature. If a contract is for personal services, the rights under the contract normally cannot be assigned unless all that remains is a monetary payment.⁵ For example, Brower signs a contract to be a tutor for Horton's children. Horton then attempts to assign to Kuhn his right to Brower's services. Kuhn cannot enforce the contract against Brower. Kuhn's children may be more difficult to tutor than Horton's; thus, if Horton could assign his rights to Brower's services to Kuhn, it would change the nature of Brower's obligation. Because personal services are unique to the person rendering them, rights to receive personal services are likewise unique and cannot be assigned.

Note that when legal actions involve personal rights, they are considered personal in nature and cannot be assigned. For instance, personal-injury tort claims generally are nonassignable as a matter of public policy. If Elizabeth is injured by Randy's defamation, she cannot assign her right to sue Randy for damages to someone else.

CASE IN POINT Accrued Financial Services, Inc. (AFS), conducts audits on behalf of tenants in commercial buildings to determine if the landlords have overcharged the tenants. As part of AFS's standard contract, the tenants assign their rights to file lawsuits against the landlord to AFS. AFS performed an audit for tenants of Prime Retail, Inc., and subsequently brought a lawsuit against Prime Retail. The court, however, held that it was against public policy to allow tenants to assign their right to file legal claims against their landlord to AFS. Therefore, the purported assignment was illegal, and the contract was unenforceable.⁶

5. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Sections 317 and 318.

6. Accrued Financial Services, Inc. v. Prime Retail, Inc., 298 F.3d 291 (4th Cir. 2002).

When an Assignment Will Significantly Change the Risk or Duties of the Obligor. A right cannot be assigned if the assignment will significantly increase or alter the risks to or the duties of the obligor (the party owing performance under the contract).⁷ For example, Horton has a hotel, and to insure it, he takes out a policy with Southeast Insurance. The policy insures against fire, theft, floods, and vandalism. Horton attempts to assign the insurance policy to Kuhn, who also owns a hotel. The assignment is ineffective because it substantially alters Southeast Insurance's duty of performance. An insurance company evaluates the particular risk of a certain party and tailors its policy to fit that risk. If the policy is assigned to a third party, the insurance risk is materially altered because the insurance company may have no information on the third party. Therefore, the assignment will not operate to give Kuhn any rights against Southeast Insurance.

When the Contract Prohibits Assignment.

When a contract specifically stipulates that a right cannot be assigned, then ordinarily it cannot be assigned. Whether an antiassignment clause is effective depends, in part, on how it is phrased. A contract that states that any assignment is void effectively prohibits any assignment. Note that restraints on the power to assign operate only against the parties themselves. They do not prohibit an assignment by operation of law, such as an assignment pursuant to bankruptcy or death.

The general rule that a contract can prohibit assignment has several exceptions.

1. A contract cannot prevent an assignment of the right to receive funds. This exception exists to encourage the free flow of funds and credit in modern business settings.
2. The assignment of rights in real estate often cannot be prohibited because such a prohibition is contrary to public policy in most states. Prohibitions of this kind are called restraints against alienation (transfer of land ownership).
3. The assignment of negotiable instruments (see Chapter 24) cannot be prohibited.
4. In a contract for the sale of goods, the right to receive damages for breach of contract or payment of an account owed may be assigned even though the sales contract prohibits such an assignment.⁸

NOTICE OF ASSIGNMENT Once a valid assignment of rights has been made, the assignee (the third party to whom the rights have been assigned) should notify the obligor (the one owing performance) of the assignment. For instance, in the previously discussed example, when Horton assigns to Kuhn his right to receive the $1,000 from Brower, Kuhn should notify Brower, the obligor, of the assignment. Giving notice is not legally necessary to establish the validity of the assignment: an assignment is effective immediately, whether or not notice is given. Two major problems arise, however, when notice of the assignment is not given to the obligor.

1. If the assignor assigns the same right to two different persons, the question arises as to which one has priority—that is, which one has the right to the performance by the obligor. Although the rule most often observed in the United States is that the first assignment in time is the first in right, some states follow the English rule, which basically gives priority to the first assignee who gives notice.
2. Until the obligor has notice of an assignment, the obligor can discharge his or her obligation by performance to the assignor (the obligee), and performance by the obligor to the assignor (obligee) constitutes a discharge to the assignee. Once the obligor receives proper notice, however, only performance to the assignee can discharge the obligor's obligations. In the Horton-Brower-Kuhn example, assume that Brower, the obligor, is not notified of Horton's assignment of his rights to Kuhn. Brower subsequently pays Horton the $1,000. Although the assignment was valid, Brower's payment to Horton discharges the debt. Kuhn's failure to give notice to Brower of the assignment has caused Kuhn to lose the right to collect the cash from Brower. If, however, Kuhn had given Brower notice of the assignment, Brower's payment to Horton would not have discharged the debt, and Kuhn would have had a legal right to require payment from Brower.

Delegations

Just as a party can transfer rights through an assignment, a party can also transfer duties. Duties are not assigned, however; they are delegated. Normally, a delegation of duties does not relieve the party making the delegation (the delegator) of the obligation to perform in the event that the party to whom the duty has been delegated (the delegatee) fails to perform. No special form is required to create a valid delegation of duties. As long as the delegator expresses an intention to make the delegation, it is effective; the delegator need not even use the word delegate. Exhibit 16–2 illustrates delegation relationships.

7. Section 2–210(2) of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

8. UCC 2–210(2).

DUTIES THAT CANNOT BE DELEGATED As a general rule, any duty can be delegated. There are, however, some exceptions to this rule. Delegation is prohibited in the circumstances discussed next.

When the Duties Are Personal in Nature.

When special trust has been placed in the obligor or when performance depends on the personal skill or talents of the obligor, contractual duties cannot be delegated. For example, Horton, who is impressed with Brower's ability to perform veterinary surgery, contracts with Brower to have her perform surgery on Horton's prize-winning stallion in July. Brower later decides that she would rather spend the summer at the beach, so she delegates her duties under the contract to Kuhn, who is also a competent veterinary surgeon. The delegation is not effective without Horton's consent, no matter how competent Kuhn is, because the contract is for personal performance.

In contrast, nonpersonal duties may be delegated. Assume that Brower contracts with Horton to pick up and deliver heavy construction machinery to Horton's property. Brower delegates this duty to Kuhn, who is in the business of delivering heavy machinery. This delegation is effective because the performance required is of a routine and nonpersonal nature.

When Performance by a Third Party Will Vary Materially from That Expected by the Obligee.

When performance by a third party will vary materially from that expected by the obligee under the contract, contractual duties cannot be delegated. Suppose that Alex Payton is a wealthy philanthropist who recently established a charitable foundation. Payton has known Brent Murdoch for twenty years and knows that Murdoch shares his beliefs on many humanitarian issues. He contracts with Murdoch to be in charge of allocating funds among various charitable causes. Six months later, Murdoch is experiencing health problems and delegates his duties to Drew Cole. Payton does not approve of Cole as a replacement. In this situation, Payton can claim the delegation was not effective because it materially altered his expectations under the contract. Payton had reasonable expectations about the types of charities to which Murdoch would give the foundation's funds, and the substitution of Cole's performance materially changed those expectations.

When the Contract Prohibits Delegation.

When the contract expressly prohibits delegation by including an antidelegation clause, the duties cannot

EXHIBIT 16–2 • Delegation Relationships

In the delegation relationship illustrated here, Brower delegates her duties under a contract that she made with Horton to a third party, Kuhn. Brower thus becomes the delegator and Kuhn the delegatee of the contractual duties. Kuhn now owes performance of the contractual duties to Horton. Note that a delegation of duties normally does not relieve the delegator (Brower) of liability if the delegatee (Kuhn) fails to perform the contractual duties.

be delegated. R.W. Stern Company contracts with Jan Pearson, a certified public accountant, to perform its annual audits for the next five years. If the contract prohibits delegation, then Pearson cannot delegate her duty to perform the audit to another accountant at the same firm. In some situations, however, when the duties are completely impersonal in nature, courts have held that the duties can be delegated notwithstanding an antidelegation clause.

EFFECT OF A DELEGATION If a delegation of duties is enforceable, the obligee must accept performance from the delegatee. Consider again the example in which Brower delegates to Kuhn the duty to pick up and deliver heavy construction machinery to Horton's property. In that situation, Horton (the obligee) must accept performance from Kuhn (the delegatee) because the delegation was effective. The obligee can legally refuse performance from the delegatee only if the duty is one that cannot be delegated.

As noted, a valid delegation of duties does not relieve the delegator of obligations under the contract. Thus, in the above example, if Kuhn (the delegatee) fails to perform, Brower (the delegator) is still liable to Horton (the obligee). The obligee can also hold the delegatee liable if the delegatee made a promise of performance that will directly benefit the obligee. In this situation, there is an "assumption of duty" on the part of the delegatee, and breach of this duty makes the delegatee liable to the obligee. For example, if Kuhn (the delegatee) promises Brower (the delegator), in a contract, to pick up and deliver the construction equipment to Horton's property but fails to do so, Horton (the obligee) can sue Brower, Kuhn, or both. Although there are many exceptions, the general rule today is that the obligee can sue both the delegatee and the delegator.

Concept Summary 16.1 outlines the basic principles of the laws governing assignments and delegations.

Assignment of "All Rights"

When a contract provides for an "assignment of all rights," this wording may create both an assignment of rights and a delegation of duties.⁹ Therefore, when general words are used (for example, "I assign the contract" or "I assign all my rights under the contract"), the contract normally is construed as implying both an assignment of the assignor's rights and a delegation of any duties of performance owed by the assignor under the contract being assigned. Thus, the assignor remains liable if the assignee fails to perform the contractual obligations.

9. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 328; UCC 2-210(3), (4).

SECTION 2 THIRD PARTY BENEFICIARIES

Another exception to the doctrine of privity of contract arises when the contract is intended to benefit a third party. When the original parties to the contract agree that the contract performance should be rendered to or directly benefit a third person, the third person becomes an intended third party beneficiary of the contract. As the intended beneficiary of the contract, the third party has legal rights and can sue the promisor directly for breach of the contract.

Who, though, is the promisor? In a bilateral contract, both parties to the contract make promises that can be enforced, so the court has to determine which party made the promise that benefits the third party—that person is the promisor. Allowing a third party to sue the promisor directly in effect circumvents the “middle person” (the promisee) and thus reduces the burden on the courts. Otherwise, the third party would sue the promisee, who would then sue the promisor.

CASE IN POINT The classic case that gave third party beneficiaries the right to bring a suit directly against a promisor was decided in 1859. The case involved three parties—Holly, Lawrence, and Fox. Holly had borrowed $300 from Lawrence. Shortly thereafter, Holly loaned $300 to Fox, who in return promised Holly that he would pay Holly's debt to Lawrence on the following day. When Lawrence failed to obtain the $300 from Fox, he sued Fox to recover the funds. The court had to decide whether Lawrence could sue Fox directly (rather than suing Holly). The court held that when “a promise [is] made for the benefit of another, he for whose benefit it is made may bring an action for its breach.”¹⁰

Types of Intended Beneficiaries

The law distinguishes between intended beneficiaries and incidental beneficiaries. Only intended beneficiaries acquire legal rights in a contract.

CREDITOR BENEFICIARY One type of intended beneficiary is a creditor beneficiary. Like the plaintiff in the Case in Point just discussed, a creditor beneficiary benefits from a contract in which one party (the promisor) promises another party (the promisee) to pay a debt that the promisee owes to a third party (the creditor beneficiary).

For example, Jay Carrera owns a business firm that is making monthly payments on equipment bought from Speedwell. Carrera sells the firm to Miller, who agrees in their contract to take over the payments to Speedwell for the equipment. Speedwell is a creditor beneficiary and can sue Miller directly to enforce the contract and obtain payment on the debt.

In the following case, the court had to decide whether an aggrieved owner of a condominium unit was an intended third party beneficiary of another owner's contract with the condominium association.

The jury found for Allan on her claims for breach of contract against Koraev * * *. Koraev moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, asserting Allan failed to prove as a matter of law the existence of a contract between her and Koraev. The trial court granted the motion[.]

* * * *

* * * Allan contends the trial court erred by rendering judgment notwithstanding the verdict on her breach of contract claim.

* * * *

Allan asserted that the [governing documents of the condominium] formed a contract between each unit owner and the Owners' Association. [The governing documents] * * * required Koraev to comply with the terms of the governing documents, and the Bylaws and Rules and Regulations made Koraev liable for any damage he caused to another unit.

* * * *

* * * Because Allan was not in privity of contract with Koraev, she has standing to bring a breach of contract claim only if she demonstrated she was a third-party beneficiary.

A third party, such as Allan, may sue to enforce a contract as a third-party beneficiary only if the contracting parties entered into the contract directly and primarily for the third party's benefit.

* * * There are three types of third-party beneficiaries—donee, creditor, and incidental. * * * A party is a creditor beneficiary if no intent to make a gift appears from the contract, but performance will satisfy an actual or asserted duty of the promisee to the beneficiary, such as an indebtedness, contractual obligation, or other legally enforceable commitment to the third party, and the promisee must intend that the beneficiary will have the right to enforce the contract. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * Paragraph 19 of the Declaration [one of the governing documents] stated, "Each Owner shall comply strictly with the provisions of the [governing documents.] * * * Failure to comply with any of the same shall be grounds for an action to recover sums due, for damages or injunctive relief or both, and for reimbursement of all attorneys' fees incurred in connection therewith, which action shall be maintainable by the Managing Agent or Board of Directors in the name of the Association, in behalf of the Owners or, in a proper case, by an aggrieved owner." [Emphasis added.]

* * * Allan's testimony about the damages she suffered as a result of Koraev and his tenants' breach of the governing documents established that she was an aggrieved owner.

* * * *

* * * Koraev's failure to perform the contract between himself and the Association was a breach of his duty not to cause damage to Allan's unit. As an intended creditor beneficiary, Allan had standing to bring suit against Koraev for his breach of the governing documents.

We conclude the governing documents made Allan an intended creditor beneficiary of the contract between Koraev and the Association and granted her authority to bring suit for Koraev's breach of those documents. Accordingly, we conclude the trial court erred by granting Koraev's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict on Allan's claim for breach of contract.

QUESTIONS

1. Why did the court use the term creditor beneficiary to describe Allan?
2. Suppose that Allan had sued Koraev for negligence. Would she have been successful? Discuss your answer.

DONEE BENEFICIARY Another type of intended beneficiary is a donee beneficiary. When a contract is made for the express purpose of giving a gift to a third party, the third party (the donee beneficiary) can sue the promisor directly to enforce the promise.¹¹ The most common donee beneficiary contract is a life insurance contract. Suppose that Akins (the promisee) pays premiums to Standard Life, a life insurance company, and Standard Life (the promisor) promises to pay a certain amount on Akins's death to anyone Akins designates as a beneficiary.

The designated beneficiary is a donee beneficiary under the life insurance policy and can enforce the promise made by the insurance company to pay her or him on Akins's death.

Most third party beneficiaries do not fit neatly into either the creditor beneficiary or the donee beneficiary category. Thus, the modern view adopted by the Restatement (Second) of Contracts does not draw clear lines between the types of intended beneficiaries. Today, courts frequently distinguish only between intended beneficiaries (who can sue to enforce contracts made for their benefit) and incidental beneficiaries (who cannot sue, as will be discussed shortly).

11. This principle was first enunciated in Seaver v. Ransom, 224 N.Y. 233, 120 N.E. 639 (1918).

When the Rights of an Intended Beneficiary Vest

An intended third party beneficiary cannot enforce a contract against the original parties until the rights of the third party have vested, which means the rights have taken effect and cannot be taken away. Until these rights have vested, the original parties to the contract—the promisor and the promisee—can modify or rescind the contract without the consent of the third party.

When do the rights of third parties vest? The majority of courts hold that the rights vest when any of the following occurs:

1. The third party materially changes his or her position in justifiable reliance on the promise.
2. The third party brings a lawsuit on the promise.
3. The third party demonstrates her or his consent to the promise at the request of the promisor or promisee.¹²

If the contract expressly reserves to the contracting parties the right to cancel, rescind, or modify the contract, the rights of the third party beneficiary are subject to any changes that result. If the original contract reserves the right to revoke the promise or change the beneficiary, the vesting of the third party's rights does not terminate that power.¹³ For example, in most life insurance contracts, the policyholder reserves the right to change the designated beneficiary.

Intended versus Incidental Beneficiaries

The benefit that an incidental beneficiary receives from a contract between two parties is unintentional. Because the benefit is unintentional, an incidental beneficiary cannot sue to enforce the contract. Exhibit 16-3 illustrates the distinction between intended beneficiaries and incidental beneficiaries.

In determining whether a third party beneficiary is an intended or an incidental beneficiary, the courts focus on intent, as expressed in the contract language and implied by the surrounding circumstances. Any beneficiary who is not deemed an intended beneficiary is considered incidental. Although no single test can embrace all possible situations, courts often apply the reasonable person test: Would a reasonable person in the position of the beneficiary believe that the promisee intended to confer on the beneficiary the right to enforce the contract? In addition, the presence of one or more of the following factors strongly indicates that the third party is an intended beneficiary to the contract:

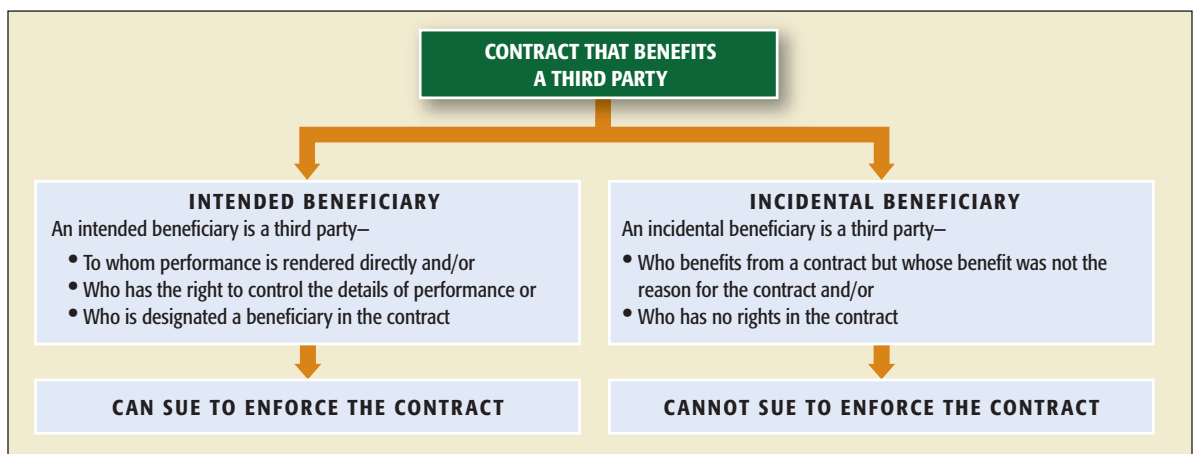

1. Performance is rendered directly to the third party.
2. The third party has the right to control the details of performance.
3. The third party is expressly designated as a beneficiary in the contract.

In the following case, a national beauty pageant organization and one of its state affiliates agreed that the national organization would accept the winner of the state contest as a competitor in the national pageant. When the state winner was asked to resign her title, she filed a suit to enforce the agreement to have herself declared a contestant in the national pageant. The national organization argued that she was an incidental, not an intended, beneficiary of the agreement.

Revels v. Miss America Organization

Court of Appeals of North Carolina, 182 N.C.App. 334, 641 S.E.2d 721 (2007).
www.aoc.state.nc.us/www/public/html/opinions.htm^a COMPANY PROFILE • In 1921, businesses in Atlantic City, New Jersey, sponsored a “Miss America” contest as a publicity stunt to extend the summer tourist season. The stunt soon evolved into an event with contestants from all the states vying for the title of Miss America. More than twelve thousand women participate each year in the local and state events that culminate in the selection of the fifty-two national finalists. To succeed requires commitment, hard work, and talent. In 1945, the nonprofit Miss America Organization (MAO) offered its first scholarship. Today, MAO is the largest provider of scholarships to young women in the world, awarding more than $45 million in cash and tuition assistance annually.

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Miss North Carolina Pageant Organization, Inc. (MNCPO), is a franchisee of Miss America Organization (MAO). Under the Miss America Organization Official Franchise Agreement, MNCPO conducts a public contest (the State Finals) to select Miss North Carolina and to prepare Miss North Carolina for participation in the Miss America pageant (the National Finals).^b In return, MAO “accepts the winner of the State Finals . . . as a contestant in the National Finals.” On June 22, 2002, MNCPO designated Rebekah Revels “Miss North Carolina 2002.” On July 19, MAO received an anonymous e-mail (which was later determined to have been sent by Revels’s ex-boyfriend) implying that she had formerly cohabited with a “male non-relative” and that nude photos of her existed. Revels confirmed the existence of the photos. On July 22, MAO and MNCPO asked Revels to resign as Miss North Carolina and told her that if she refused, she would be excluded from competing in the National Finals. On July 23, she resigned. She then filed a suit in a North Carolina state court against MAO, MNCPO, and others, asserting, among other things, breach of contract. The court issued a summary judgment in MAO’s favor. Revels appealed this judgment to a state intermediate appellate court.

McCULLOUGH, Judge.

Plaintiff contends on appeal that there was sufficient evidence that she is a third-party beneficiary under the franchise agreement between MAO and MNCPO to establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact [and thus for her claim to proceed to trial].

In order to assert rights as a third-party beneficiary under the franchise agreement, plaintiff must show she was an intended beneficiary of the contract. This Court has held that in order to establish a claim as a third-party beneficiary, plaintiff must show: (1) that a contract exists between two persons or entities; (2) that the contract is valid and enforceable; and (3) that the contract was executed for the direct, and not incidental, benefit of the third party. A person is a direct beneficiary of the contract if the contracting parties intended to confer a legally enforceable benefit on that person. It is not enough that the contract, in fact, benefits the third party, if, when the contract was made, the contracting parties did not intend it to benefit the third party directly. In determining the intent of the contracting parties, the court should consider the circumstances surrounding the transaction as well as the actual language of the contract. When a third person seeks enforcement of a contract made between other parties, the contract must be construed strictly against the party seeking enforcement. [Emphasis added.]

There was insufficient evidence before the trial court to support a conclusion that plaintiff was an intended beneficiary under the franchise agreement. Plaintiff was not designated as a beneficiary under the franchise agreement and there is absolutely no evidence that the

- A franchise is an arrangement by which the owner of a trademark or other intellectual property licenses the use of the mark to another party under specific conditions.

CASE 16.3 CONTINUED ♦ franchise agreement was executed for her direct benefit. The franchise agreement does provide that MAO will accept the winner of the North Carolina pageant as a contestant in the national finals. However, this evidence is insufficient to establish a showing of intent on the parties to make plaintiff an intended beneficiary. Further, the evidence adduced tended to show that the primary intent of the franchise agreement was to ensure uniformity among all franchisees and it provided the incidental benefit of allowing the winner of MNCPO's contest to compete in the national finals.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The court affirmed the lower court's judgment in favor of MAO. Revels was an incidental beneficiary of the agreement between MAO and MNCPO. That the agreement provided that MAO would accept the winner of the State Finals as a contestant in the National Finals did not establish that the two organizations intended to make the winner a direct beneficiary of the agreement. Because Revels was not an intended beneficiary, she could not maintain an action against MAO based on the agreement.

THE GLOBAL DIMENSION • If the agreement between MAO and MNCPO had involved a third party—an international pageant organization—would this have been a basis for concluding that Revels was an intended third party beneficiary? Why or why not?

THE E-COMMERCE DIMENSION • How might Revels's third party status with respect to the agreement between MAO and MNCPO have been affected if the contracting parties had conducted their business online? Explain.

REVIEWING

Third Party Rights

Myrtle Jackson owns several commercial buildings that she leases to businesses, one of which is a restaurant. The lease states that tenants are responsible for securing all necessary insurance policies but the landlord is obligated to keep the buildings in good repair. The owner of the restaurant, Joe McCall, tells his restaurant manager to purchase insurance, but the manager never does so. Jackson tells her son-in-law, Rob Dunn, to perform any necessary maintenance for the buildings. Dunn knows that the ceiling in the restaurant needs repair but fails to do anything about it. One day a customer, Ian Faught, is dining in the restaurant when a chunk of the ceiling falls on his head and fractures his skull. Faught files suit against the restaurant and discovers that there is no insurance policy in effect. Faught then files a suit against Jackson, arguing that he is an intended third party beneficiary of the lease provision requiring insurance and thus can sue Jackson for failing to enforce the lease (which requires the restaurant to carry insurance). Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Can Jackson delegate her duty to maintain the buildings to Dunn? Why or why not?
2. Who can be held liable for Dunn's failure to fix the ceiling, Jackson or Dunn?
3. Was Faught an intended third party beneficiary of the lease between Jackson and McCall? Why or why not?
4. Suppose that Jackson tells Dan Stryker, a local builder to whom she owes $50,000, that he can collect the rents from the buildings' tenants until the debt is satisfied. Is this a valid assignment? Why or why not?

 DEBATE THIS: As a matter of public policy, personal-injury tort claims cannot be assigned. This public policy is wrong and should be changed.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

16-1. Third Party Beneficiary Alexander has been accepted as a freshman at a college two hundred miles from his home for the fall semester. Alexander's wealthy uncle, Michael, decides to give Alexander a car for Christmas. In November, Michael makes a contract with Jackson Auto Sales to purchase a new car for $18,000 to be delivered to Alexander just before the Christmas holidays, in mid-December. The title to the car is to be in Alexander's name. Michael pays the full purchase price, calls Alexander and tells him about the gift, and takes off for a six-month vacation in Europe. Is Alexander an intended third party beneficiary of the contract between Michael and Jackson Auto Sales? Suppose that Jackson Auto Sales never delivers the car to Alexander. Does Alexander have the right to sue Jackson Auto Sales for breaching its contract with Michael? Explain.

16-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Assignment.

Five years ago, Hensley purchased a house. At that time, being unable to pay the full purchase price, she borrowed funds from Thrift Savings and Loan, which in turn took a mortgage at 6.5 percent interest on the house. The mortgage contract did not prohibit the assignment of the mortgage. Then Hensley secured a new job in another city and sold the house to Sylvia. The purchase price included payment to Hensley of the value of her equity and the assumption of the mortgage debt still owed to Thrift. At the time the contract between Hensley and Sylvia was made, Thrift did not know about or consent to the sale. On the basis of these facts, if Sylvia defaults in making the house payments to Thrift, what are Thrift's rights? Discuss.

16-3. Assignment Marsala, a college student, signs a one-year lease agreement that runs from September 1 to August 31. The lease agreement specifies that the lease cannot be assigned without the landlord's consent. In late May, Marsala decides not to go to summer school and assigns the balance of the lease (three months) to a close friend, Fred. The landlord objects to the assignment and denies Fred access to the apartment. Marsala claims that Fred is financially sound and should be allowed the full rights and privileges of an assignee. Discuss fully who is correct, the landlord or Marsala.

16-4. Delegation Inez has a specific set of plans to build a sailboat. The plans are detailed, and any boatbuilder can construct the boat. Inez secures bids, and the low bid is made by the Whale of a Boat Corp. Inez contracts with Whale to build the boat for $4,000. Whale then receives unexpected business from elsewhere. To meet the delivery date in the contract with Inez, Whale delegates its obligation to build the boat, without Inez's consent, to Quick Brothers, a reputable boatbuilder. When the boat is ready for delivery, Inez learns of the delegation and refuses to accept delivery, even though the boat is built to her specifications. Discuss fully whether Inez is obligated to accept and pay for the boat. Would your answer be any different if Inez had not had a specific set of plans but had instead contracted with Whale to design and build a sailboat for $4,000? Explain.

16-5. Third Party Beneficiary Acciai Speciali Terni USA, Inc. (AST), hired a carrier to ship steel sheets and coils from Italy to the United States on the M/V Berane. The ship's receipt for the goods included a forum-selection clause, which stated that any dispute would be "decided in the country where the carrier has his principal place of business." The receipt also contained a "Himalaya" clause, which extended "every right, exemption from liability, defense and immunity" that the carrier enjoyed to those acting on the carrier's behalf. Transcom Terminals, Ltd., was the U.S. stevedore—that is, Transcom off-loaded the vessel and stored the cargo for eventual delivery to AST. Finding the cargo damaged, AST filed a suit in a federal district court against Transcom and others, charging, among other things, negligence in the off-loading. Transcom filed a motion to dismiss on the basis of the forum-selection clause. Transcom argued that it was an intended third party beneficiary of this provision through the Himalaya clause. Is Transcom correct? What should the court rule? Explain. [Acciai Speciali Terni USA, Inc. v. M/V Berane, 181 F.Supp.2d 458 (D.Md. 2002)]

16-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Intended versus Incidental Beneficiaries.

The National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) regulates intercollegiate amateur athletics among the more than 1,200 colleges and universities with whom it contracts. Among other things, the NCAA maintains rules of eligibility for student participation in intercollegiate athletic events. Jeremy Bloom, a high school football and track star, was recruited to play football at the University of Colorado (CU). Before enrolling, he competed in Olympic and professional World Cup skiing events, becoming the World Cup champion in freestyle moguls. During the Olympics, Bloom appeared on MTV and was offered other paid entertainment opportunities, including a chance to host a show on Nickelodeon. Bloom was also paid to endorse certain ski equipment and contracted to model clothing for Tommy Hilfiger. On Bloom's behalf, CU asked the NCAA to waive its rules restricting student-athlete endorsement and media activities. The NCAA refused, and Bloom quit the activities to play football for CU. He filed a suit in a Colorado state court against the NCAA, however, asserting breach of contract on the ground that its rules permitted these activities if they were needed to support a professional athletic career. The NCAA responded that Bloom did not have standing to pursue this claim. What contract has allegedly been breached in this case? Is Bloom a party to this contract? If not, is he a third party beneficiary of it, and if so, is his status intended or incidental? Explain. [Bloom v. National Collegiate Athletic Association, 93 P.3d 621 (Colo.App. 2004)]

16-7. Third Party Beneficiary The National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing, Inc. (NASCAR), sanctions stock car races. NASCAR and Sprint Nextel Corp. agreed that Sprint would become the official series sponsor of the NASCAR NEXTEL Cup Series in 2004. The agreement granted sponsorship exclusivity to Sprint and contained a list of competitors that were barred from sponsoring series events. Excepted were existing sponsorships: in "Driver and Car Owner Agreements" between NASCAR and the cars' owners, NASCAR promised to "preserve and protect" those sponsorships, which could continue and be renewed at the owners' option, despite Sprint's exclusivity. RCR Team #31, LLC, owns the #31 Car in the series. Cingular Wireless LLC (a Sprint competitor), had been #31 Car's primary sponsor since 2001. In 2007, Cingular changed its name to AT&T Mobility, LLC, and proposed a new paint scheme for the #31 Car that called for the Cingular logo to remain on the hood while the AT&T logo would be added on the rear quarter panel. NASCAR rejected the proposal. AT&T filed a suit in a federal district court against NASCAR, claiming, in part, that NASCAR was in breach of its Driver and Car Owner Agreement with RCR. Can AT&T maintain an action against NASCAR based on this agreement? Explain.

16-8. Assignment and Delegation Bruce Albea Contracting, Inc., was the general contractor on a state highway project. Albea and the companies that agreed to guarantee the financial liabilities involved here (called sureties) agreed to be liable for all work on the project. Albea subcontracted with APAC-Southeast, Inc., an asphalt company. The contract stated that it could not be assigned without Albea's consent. Later, Albea and APAC got into a dispute because APAC wanted to be paid more for its asphalt. APAC then sold and assigned its assets, including the contract, to Matthews Contracting Company. Albea was informed of the assignment and did not approve it but allowed Matthews to work. Matthews demanded higher payments for asphalt, and Albea agreed because no other contractor would step in at the original price. Albea suffered a loss on the job and could not pay its bills, so Albea's sureties paid Matthews $2.7 million for work performed. APAC sued Albea and its sureties for $1.2 million for work it had performed before the contract was delegated to Matthews. The trial court granted APAC $1.2 million. On appeal, the defendants argued that APAC had breached the contract by assignment without consent. Did APAC breach the contract with Albea? Did Albea owe APAC anything? Explain your answers. 16-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Assignment.

In 1984, James Grigg's mother was killed in a car accident. Royal Insurance Co. of America agreed to pay Grigg a number of monthly payments, as well as two lump-sum payments of $50,000 due May 1, 1995, and May 1, 2005. Royal contracted with Safeco Life Insurance Co. to make the payments. In 1997, Grigg assigned the 2005 payment of $50,000 to Howard Foley for $10,000. Neither Grigg nor Foley notified Safeco or Royal. Four years later, Grigg offered to sell Settlement Capital Corp. (SCC) his interest in the 2005 payment. On SCC's request, an Idaho state court approved the transfer. Foley later notified Safeco of his interest in the payment, and in 2005, the court approved an arrangement by which Foley and SCC would share the $50,000. Shortly before the 2005 payment was made, however, it was revealed that Grigg had also tried to sell his interest to Canco Credit Union, whose manager, Timothy Johnson, had paid Grigg for it. Later, Johnson assigned the interest to Robert Chris, who used it as collateral for a loan from Canco. Foley filed a suit in an Idaho state court against Grigg, asking the court to determine who, among these parties, was entitled to the 2005 payment. [Foley v. Grigg, 144 Idaho 530, 164 P.3d 180 (2007)]

- If the court applies the rule most often observed in the United States, who is likely to be awarded the $50,000? If the court applies the English rule, who will have priority to the payment?
- Regardless of the legal principles to be applied, was there a violation of ethics in these circumstances? Explain.

CHAPTER 17

Performance and Discharge in Traditional and E-Contracts

Just as rules are necessary to determine when a legally enforceable contract exists, so also are they required to determine when one of the parties can justifiably say, “I have fully performed, so I am now discharged from my obligations under this contract.” The legal environment of business requires the identification of some point at which the parties can reasonably know that their duties have ended.

The most common way to discharge, or terminate, one’s contractual duties is by the performance of those duties. For example, a buyer and seller enter into an agreement via e-mail for the sale of a 2011 Lexus for $39,000. This contract will be discharged by performance when the buyer pays $39,000 to the seller and the seller transfers possession of the Lexus to the buyer.

The duty to perform under any contract (including e-contracts) may be conditioned on the occurrence or nonoccurrence of a certain event, or the duty may be absolute. In the first part of this chapter, we look at conditions of performance and the degree of performance required. We then examine some other ways in which a contract can be discharged, including discharge by agreement of the parties and discharge by operation of law.

SECTION 1 CONDITIONS

In most contracts, promises of performance are not expressly conditioned or qualified. Instead, they are absolute promises. They must be performed, or the parties promising the acts will be in breach of contract. In some situations, however, performance is contingent on the occurrence or nonoccurrence of a certain event. A condition is a possible future event, the occurrence or nonoccurrence of which will trigger the performance of a legal obligation or terminate an existing obligation under a contract.¹ If this condition is not satisfied, the obligations of the parties are discharged. Suppose that Alfonso offers to purchase a painting from Jerome only if an independent appraisal indicates that it is worth at least $10,000. Jerome accepts Alfonso’s offer. Their obligations (promises) are conditioned on the outcome of the appraisal. Should the condition not be satisfied (for example, if the appraiser deems the market value of the painting to be only $5,000), the parties’ obligations to each other are discharged and cannot be enforced.

1. The Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 224, defines a condition as “an event, not certain to occur, which must occur, unless its nonoccurrence is excused, before performance under a contract becomes due.”

Three types of conditions can be present in contracts: conditions precedent, conditions subsequent, and concurrent conditions. Conditions are also classified as express or implied.

Conditions Precedent

A condition that must be fulfilled before a party’s performance can be required is called a condition precedent. The condition precedes the absolute duty to perform, as in the Jerome-Alfonso example just discussed. Real estate contracts frequently are conditioned on the buyer’s ability to obtain financing. For example, Fisher promises to buy Calvin’s house if Salvation Bank approves Fisher’s mortgage application. The Fisher-Calvin contract is therefore subject to a condition precedent—the bank’s approval of Fisher’s mortgage application. If the bank does not approve the application, the contract will fail because the condition precedent was not met. Insurance contracts frequently specify that certain conditions, such as passing a physical examination, must be met before the insurance company will be obligated to perform under the contract.

Conditions Subsequent

When a condition operates to terminate a party's absolute promise to perform, it is called a condition subsequent. The condition follows, or is subsequent to, the time that the absolute duty to perform arose. If the condition occurs, the party's duty to perform is discharged. For example, a law firm hires Julie Koker, a recent law school graduate and newly licensed attorney. Their contract provides that the firm's obligation to continue employing Koker is discharged if Koker fails to maintain her license to practice law. This is a condition subsequent because a failure to maintain the license would discharge a duty that has already arisen.

Generally, conditions precedent are common; conditions subsequent are rare. The Restatement (Second) of Contracts does not use the terms condition subsequent and condition precedent but refers to both simply as conditions.²

Concurrent Conditions

When each party's performance is conditioned on the other party's performance or tender of performance (offer to perform), there are concurrent conditions. Concurrent conditions occur only when the contract calls for the parties to perform their respective duties simultaneously. For example, if a buyer promises to pay for goods when the seller delivers them, the parties' promises to perform are mutually dependent. The buyer's duty to pay for the goods does not become absolute until the seller either delivers or tenders the goods. Likewise, the seller's duty to deliver the goods does not become absolute until the buyer tenders or actually makes payment. Therefore, neither can recover from the other for breach without first tendering performance.

Express and Implied Conditions

Conditions can also be classified as express or implied in fact. Express conditions are provided for by the parties' agreement. Although no particular words are necessary, express conditions are normally prefaced by the words if, provided, after, or when.

2. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 224.

CASE IN POINT Alejandro Alvarado's automobile insurance policy stated that, if involved in an accident, the insured must cooperate with the insurance company in the defense of any claim or lawsuit. When Alvarado was involved in an accident, he notified the insurance company that a negligence lawsuit had been filed against him, but then failed to cooperate in his defense and did not appear in court for the trial. The court entered a judgment against him, which prejudiced the rights of the insurance company. In this situation, a Texas appellate court found that the cooperation clause was a condition precedent to coverage under the policy. Because Alvarado did not cooperate with the insurer, the accident was not covered under the policy, and the company was not liable for the damages awarded.³

Implied conditions are understood to be part of the agreement, but they are not found in the express language of the agreement. Courts may imply conditions from the purpose of the contract or from the intent of the parties. Conditions are often implied when they are necessarily inherent in the actual performance of the contract.

SECTION 2 DISCHARGE BY PERFORMANCE

The great majority of contracts are discharged by performance. The contract comes to an end when both parties fulfill their respective duties by performing the acts they have promised. Performance can also be accomplished by tender. Tender is an unconditional offer to perform by a person who is ready, willing, and able to do so. Therefore, a seller who places goods at the disposal of a buyer has tendered delivery and can demand payment. A buyer who offers to pay for goods has tendered payment and can demand delivery of the goods. Once performance has been tendered, the party making the tender has done everything possible to carry out the terms of the contract. If the other party then refuses to perform, the party making the tender can sue for breach of contract.

Types of Performance

There are two basic types of performance—complete performance and substantial performance. A contract may stipulate that performance must meet the personal satisfaction of either the contracting party or a third party. Such a provision must be considered in determining whether the performance rendered satisfies the contract.

3. Progressive County Mutual Insurance Co. v. Trevino, 202 S.W.3d 811 (Tex.App.—San Antonio 2006).

COMPLETE PERFORMANCE When a party performs exactly as agreed, there is no question as to whether the contract has been performed. When a party's performance is perfect, it is said to be complete.

Normally, conditions expressly stated in a contract must be fully satisfied for complete performance to take place. For example, most construction contracts require the builder to meet certain specifications. If the specifications are conditions, complete performance is required to avoid material breach (material breach will be discussed shortly). If the conditions are met, the other party to the contract must then fulfill her or his obligation to pay the builder. If the specifications are not conditions and if the builder, without the other party's permission, fails to comply with the specifications, performance is not complete. What effect does such a failure have on the other party's obligation to pay? The answer is part of the doctrine of substantial performance.

SUBSTANTIAL PERFORMANCE A party who in good faith performs substantially all of the terms of a contract can enforce the contract against the other party under the doctrine of substantial performance. Note that good faith is required. Intentional failure to comply with the terms is a breach of the contract.

Confers Most of the Benefits Promised. Generally, to qualify as substantial, the performance must not vary greatly from the performance promised in the contract, and it must create substantially the same benefits as those promised in the contract. If the omission, variance, or defect in performance is unimportant and can easily be compensated for by awarding damages, a court is likely to hold that the contract has been substantially performed.

Courts decide whether the performance was substantial on a case-by-case basis, examining all of the facts of the particular situation. For example, in a construction contract, a court would look at the intended purpose of the structure and the expense required to bring the structure into complete compliance with the contract. Thus, the exact point at which performance is considered substantial varies.

Entitles the Other Party to Damages. Because substantial performance is not perfect, the other party is entitled to damages to compensate for the failure to comply with the contract. The measure of the damages is the cost to bring the object of the contract into compliance with its terms, if that cost is reasonable under the circumstances. If the cost is unreasonable, the measure of damages is the difference in value between the performance that was rendered and the performance that would have been rendered if the contract had been performed completely.

The following classic case emphasizes that there is no exact formula for deciding when a contract has been substantially performed.

The work of construction ceased in June, 1914, and the defendant then began to occupy the dwelling. There was no complaint of defective performance until March, 1915. One of the specifications for the plumbing work provides that—

All wrought-iron pipe must be well galvanized, lap welded pipe of the grade known as "standard pipe" of Reading manufacture.

The defendant learned in March, 1915, that some of the pipe, instead of being made in Reading, was the product of other factories. The plaintiff was accordingly directed by the architect to do the work anew. The plumbing was then encased within the walls except in a few places where it had to be exposed. Obedience to the order meant more than the substitution of other pipe. It meant the demolition at great expense of substantial parts of the completed structure. The plaintiff left the work untouched, and asked for a certificate that the final payment was due. Refusal of the certificate was followed by this suit [in a New York state court].

The evidence sustains a finding that the omission of the prescribed brand of pipe was neither fraudulent nor willful. It was the result of the oversight and inattention of the plaintiff's subcontractor. Reading pipe is distinguished from Cohoes pipe and other brands only by the name of the manufacturer stamped upon it at intervals of between six and seven feet. Even the defendant's architect, though he inspected the pipe upon arrival, failed to notice the discrepancy. The plaintiff tried to show that the brands installed, though made by other manufacturers, were the same in quality, in appearance, in market value, and in cost as the brand stated in the contract—that they were, indeed, the same thing, though manufactured in another place. The evidence was excluded, and a verdict directed for the defendant. The [state intermediate appellate court] reversed, and granted a new trial.

We think the evidence, if admitted, would have supplied some basis for the inference that the defect was insignificant in its relation to the project. The courts never say that one who makes a contract fills the measure of his duty by less than full performance. They do say, however, that an omission, both trivial and innocent, will sometimes be atoned for by allowance of the resulting damage, and will not always be the breach of a condition * * * . [Emphasis added.]

* * * Where the line is to be drawn between the important and the trivial cannot be settled by a formula. In the nature of the case precise boundaries are impossible. The same omission may take on one aspect or another according to its setting. Substitution of equivalents may not have the same significance in fields of art on the one side and in those of mere utility on the other. Nowhere will change be tolerated, however, if it is so dominant or pervasive as in any real or substantial measure to frustrate the purpose of the contract. There is no general license to install whatever, in the builder's judgment, may be regarded as "just as good." The question is one of degree, to be answered, if there is doubt, by the triers of the facts, and, if the inferences are certain, by the judges of the law. We must weigh the purpose to be served, the desire to be gratified, the excuse for deviation from the letter, the cruelty of enforced adherence. Then only can we tell whether literal fulfillment is to be implied by law as a condition. [Emphasis added.]

In the circumstances of this case, we think the measure of the allowance is not the cost of replacement, which would be great, but the difference in value, which would be either nominal or nothing. Some of the exposed sections might perhaps have been replaced at moderate expense. The defendant did not limit his demand to them, but treated the plumbing as a unit to be corrected from cellar to roof. In point of fact, the plaintiff never reached the stage at which evidence of the extent of the allowance became necessary. The trial court had excluded evidence that the defect was unsubstantial, and in view of that ruling there was no occasion for the plaintiff to go further with an offer of proof. We think, however, that the offer, if it had been made, would not of necessity have been defective because directed to difference in value. It is true that in most cases the cost of replacement is the measure. The owner is entitled to the money which will permit him to complete, unless the cost of completion is grossly and unfairly out of proportion to the good to be attained. When that is true, the measure is the difference in value. * * * The rule that gives a remedy in cases of substantial performance with compensation for defects of trivial or inappreciable importance has been developed by the courts as an instrument of justice. The measure of the allowance must be shaped to the same end.

The order should be affirmed, and judgment absolute directed in favor of the plaintiff upon the stipulation, with costs in all courts.

QUESTIONS

1. The New York Court of Appeals found that Jacob & Youngs had substantially performed the contract. To what, if any, remedy was Kent entitled?
2. A requirement of substantial performance is good faith. Did Jacob & Youngs substantially perform all of the terms of the contract in good faith? Why or why not?

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY'S LAW • At the time of the Jacob & Youngs case, some courts did not apply the doctrine of substantial performance to disputes involving breaches of contract. This landmark decision contributed to a developing trend toward equity and fairness in those circumstances. Today, an unintentional and trivial deviation from the terms of a contract will not prevent its enforcement but will permit an adjustment in the value of its performance.

PERFORMANCE TO THE SATISFACTION OF ANOTHER

Contracts often state that completed work must personally satisfy one of the parties or a third person. The question then is whether this satisfaction becomes a condition precedent, requiring actual personal satisfaction or approval for discharge, or whether the performance need only satisfy a reasonable person (substantial performance).

When the Contract Is Personal. When the subject matter of the contract is personal, a contract to be performed to the satisfaction of one of the parties is conditioned, and performance must actually satisfy that party. For example, contracts for portraits, works of art, and tailoring are considered personal. Therefore, only the personal satisfaction of the party fulfills the condition—unless a court finds that the party is expressing dissatisfaction simply to avoid payment or otherwise is not acting in good faith.

Reasonable Person Standard. Most other contracts need to be performed only to the satisfaction of a reasonable person unless they expressly state otherwise. When such contracts require performance to the satisfaction of a third party (for example, “to the satisfaction of Robert Ames, the supervising engineer”), the courts are divided. A majority of courts require the work to be satisfactory to a reasonable person, but some courts hold that the personal satisfaction of the third party designated in the contract (Robert Ames, in this example) must be met. Again, the personal judgment must be made honestly, or the condition will be excused.

When a contract requires one party to meet the other party’s demand, what percentage of compliance constitutes substantial performance? Does the duty of good faith require that this demand be put ahead of other customers’ needs? Those were the questions in the following case.

CASE 17.2

Wisconsin Electric Power Co. v. Union Pacific Railroad Co.

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 557 F.3d 504 (2009).
www.ca7.uscourts.gov^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In 1999, Wisconsin Electric Power Company (WEPCO) contracted with Union Pacific Railroad to transport coal to WEPCO’s plants from mines in Colorado. Each month, WEPCO was to inform Union Pacific how many tons of coal (within a certain maximum) it wanted shipped the next month. Union Pacific was to make “good faith reasonable efforts” to meet the schedule. The contract also required WEPCO to supply the railcars. When WEPCO did not supply the railcars, however, Union Pacific used its own railcars and delivered 84 percent of the requested coal. Claiming that the minimum percentage should have exceeded 90 percent and that Union Pacific was shipping less than that because other customers paid higher rates, WEPCO filed a suit in a federal district court against Union Pacific for breach of contract. The court issued a summary judgment in the defendant’s favor. WEPCO appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

The contract required WEPCO to notify the railroad monthly of how many tons of coal (within the maximum tonnage specified by the contract) it wanted shipped the next month, and “the parties agree to make good faith reasonable efforts to meet the Monthly Shipping Schedule.” Nowhere did the contract require the railroad to comply with the schedule; it merely had to make, in good faith, a reasonable effort to do so. [The contract] did require the railroad to transport tonnages specified by WEPCO, but only if WEPCO supplied the railcars for the shipment, and it did not; the railroad did; during the period in which WEPCO charges that the railroad was acting in bad faith, the railroad transported in its own cars 84 percent of the total shipments of coal requested by WEPCO.

Not enough, argues WEPCO. Without specifying the minimum percentage that would have demonstrated good faith, it argues that it would have exceeded 90 percent. It says that the railroad shipped less because it had other customers who paid higher rates. WEPCO invokes the legal duty of good faith in the performance of a contract. The duty entails the avoidance of conduct such as evasion of the spirit of the bargain, lack of diligence and slacking off, willful rendering

But the duty of good faith does not require your putting one of your customers ahead of the others, even if the others are paying you more. Parties are not prevented from protecting their respective economic interests.

* * * A duty of good faith does not mean that a party vested with a clear right is obligated to exercise that right to its own detriment for the purpose of benefiting another party to the contract. And it certainly doesn't mean exercising that right to the detriment of another party with which it has a contract. * * * WEPCO invites the court to undertake an unmanageable judicial task—that of working out an equitable allocation of Union Pacific's railcars among its various customers. [Emphasis added.]

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed the lower court's judgment. Union Pacific did not breach its duty of good faith. In this instance, "84 percent" constituted substantial performance of the contract.

THE ECONOMIC DIMENSION • Why would a different customer have paid a higher rate than WEPCO to Union Pacific for the transport of resources or other products?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Should a contracting party relax the terms of the contract if the other party has trouble performing them? Discuss.

Material Breach of Contract

A breach of contract is the nonperformance of a contractual duty. The breach is material when performance is not at least substantial.⁴ If there is a material breach, then the nonbreaching party is excused from the performance of contractual duties and can sue for damages resulting from the breach. If the breach is minor (not material), the nonbreaching party's duty to perform can sometimes be suspended until the breach has been remedied, but the duty to perform is not entirely excused. Once the minor breach has been cured, the nonbreaching party must resume performance of the contractual obligations.

Any breach entitles the nonbreaching party to sue for damages, but only a material breach discharges the nonbreaching party from the contract. The policy underlying these rules allows contracts to go forward when only minor problems occur but allows them to be terminated if major difficulties arise.

CASE IN POINT Su Yong Kim sold an apartment building in Portland, Oregon. At the time of the sale, the building's plumbing violated the city's housing code. Therefore, a clause in the contract stated that the seller (Kim) would correct the violations within eight months. A year later, Kim still had not made the necessary repairs. The buyers stopped making the payments due under the contract, and the dispute ended up in court. The court found that the seller's failure to make the required repairs was a material breach because it defeated the purpose of the contract. The buyers had purchased the building to lease it to tenants, but instead they were losing tenants and being fined by the city due to the substandard plumbing. Because Kim's breach was material, the buyers did not have to continue to perform their obligation to make payments under the contract.⁵

Anticipatory Repudiation

Before either party to a contract has a duty to perform, one of the parties may refuse to carry out his or her contractual obligations. This is called anticipatory repudiation⁶ of the contract. When an anticipatory repudiation occurs, it is treated as a material breach of the contract, and the nonbreaching party is permitted to bring an action for damages immediately, even though the scheduled time for performance under the contract may still be in the future. Until the nonbreaching party treats an early repudiation as a breach, however, the repudiating party can retract her or his anticipatory repudiation by proper notice and restore the parties to their original obligations.⁷

6. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 253; Section 2–610 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

7. See UCC 2–611.

4. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 241.

RATIONALE FOR TREATING REPUDIATION AS BREACH An anticipatory repudiation is treated as a present, material breach for two reasons. First, the nonbreaching party should not be required to remain ready and willing to perform when the other party has already repudiated the contract. Second, the nonbreaching party should have the opportunity to seek a similar contract elsewhere and may have a duty to do so to minimize his or her loss.⁸

ANTICIPATORY REPUDIATION AND MARKET PRICES Quite often, anticipatory repudiation occurs when performance of the contract would be extremely unfavorable to one of the parties because of a sharp fluctuation in market prices.

For example, Martin Corporation enters into an e-contract to manufacture and sell 100,000 personal computers to ComAge, a retailer of computer equipment. Delivery is to be made two months from the date of the contract. One month later, three inventory suppliers raise their prices to Martin. Because of these higher prices, Martin stands to lose $500,000 if it sells the computers to ComAge at the contract price. Martin immediately e-mails ComAge, stating that it cannot deliver the 100,000 computers at the contract price. Even though you may sympathize with Martin, its e-mail is an anticipatory repudiation of the contract. ComAge can treat the repudiation as a material breach and immediately pursue remedies, even though the contract delivery date is still a month away.

Time for Performance

If no time for performance is stated in the contract, a reasonable time is implied.⁹ If a specific time is stated, the parties must usually perform by that time. Unless time is expressly stated to be vital, however, a delay in performance will not destroy the performing party's right to payment.¹⁰ When time is expressly stated to be "of the essence" or vital, the parties normally must perform within the stated time period because the time element becomes a condition. Even when the contract states that time is of the essence, a court may find that a party who fails to complain about the other party's delay has waived the breach of the time provision.

SECTION 3 DISCHARGE BY AGREEMENT

Any contract can be discharged by agreement of the parties. The agreement can be contained in the original contract, or the parties can form a new contract for the express purpose of discharging the original contract.

Discharge by Rescission

As mentioned in previous chapters, rescission is the process by which a contract is canceled or terminated and the parties are returned to the positions they occupied prior to forming it. For mutual rescission to take place, the parties must make another agreement that also satisfies the legal requirements for a contract. There must be an offer, an acceptance, and consideration. Ordinarily, if the parties agree to rescind the original contract, their promises not to perform the acts stipulated in the original contract will be legal consideration for the second contract (the rescission).

Agreements to rescind most executory contracts (in which neither party has performed) are enforceable, even if the agreement is made orally and even if the original agreement was in writing. Under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), however, agreements to rescind a contract for the sale of goods, regardless of price, must be in writing (or contained in an electronic record) when the contract requires a written rescission.¹¹ Agreements to rescind contracts involving transfers of realty also must be evidenced by a writing or other record.

When one party has fully performed, an agreement to cancel the original contract normally will not be enforceable unless there is additional consideration. Because the performing party has received no consideration for the promise to call off the original bargain, additional consideration is necessary to support a rescission contract.

Discharge by Novation

A contractual obligation may also be discharged through novation. A novation occurs when both of the parties to a contract agree to substitute a third party for one of the original parties. The requirements of a novation are as follows:

8. The doctrine of anticipatory repudiation first arose in the landmark case of Hochster v. De La Tour, 2 Ellis and Blackburn Reports 678 (1853), when an English court recognized the delay and expense inherent in a rule requiring a nonbreaching party to wait until the time of performance before suing on an anticipatory repudiation.

9. See UCC 2-204.

10. See, for example, Manganaro Corp. v. Hitt Contracting, Inc., 193 F.Supp.2d 88 (D.D.C. 2002).

1. A previous valid obligation.
2. An agreement by all parties to a new contract.
3. The extinguishing of the old obligation (discharge of the prior party).
4. A new contract that is valid.

For example, Union Corporation contracts to sell its pharmaceutical division to British Pharmaceuticals, Ltd. Before the transfer is completed, Union, British Pharmaceuticals, and a third company, Otis Chemicals, execute a new agreement to transfer all of British Pharmaceuticals' rights and duties in the transaction to Otis Chemicals. As long as the new contract is supported by consideration, the novation will discharge the original contract (between Union and British Pharmaceuticals) and replace it with the new contract (between Union and Otis Chemicals).

A novation expressly or impliedly revokes and discharges a prior contract. The parties involved may expressly state in the new contract that the old contract is now discharged. If the parties do not expressly discharge the old contract, it will be impliedly discharged if the new contract's terms are inconsistent with the old contract's terms. It is this immediate discharge of the prior contract that distinguishes a novation from both an accord and satisfaction, which will be discussed shortly, and an assignment of all rights, discussed in Chapter 16 on pages 310 and 311.

Discharge by Settlement Agreement

A compromise, or settlement agreement, that arises out of a genuine dispute over the obligations under an existing contract will be recognized at law. Such an agreement will be substituted as a new contract, and it will either expressly or impliedly revoke and discharge the obligations under any prior contract. In contrast to a novation, a substituted agreement does not involve a third party. Rather, the two original parties to the contract form a different agreement to substitute for the original one.

Discharge by Accord and Satisfaction

For a contract to be discharged by accord and satisfaction, the parties must agree to accept performance that is different from the performance originally promised. As discussed in Chapter 12, an accord is a contract to perform some act to satisfy an existing contractual duty that is not yet discharged.¹² A satisfaction is the performance of the accord agreement. An accord and its satisfaction discharge the original contractual obligation.

Once the accord has been made, the original obligation is merely suspended. The obligor (the one owing the obligation) can discharge the obligation by performing either the obligation agreed to in the accord or the original obligation. If the obligor refuses to perform the accord, the obligee (the one to whom performance is owed) can bring an action on the original obligation or seek a decree compelling specific performance on the accord.

For example, Frazer has a judgment against Ling for $8,000. Later, both parties agree that the judgment can be satisfied by Ling's transfer of his automobile to Frazer. This agreement to accept the auto in lieu of $8,000 in cash is the accord. If Ling transfers the car to Frazer, the accord is fully performed, and the debt is discharged. If Ling refuses to transfer the car, the accord is breached. Because the original obligation is merely suspended, Frazer can sue Ling to enforce the original judgment for $8,000 in cash or bring an action for breach of the accord.

DISCHARGE BY OPERATION OF LAW

Under certain circumstances, contractual duties may be discharged by operation of law. These circumstances include material alteration of the contract, the running of the statute of limitations, bankruptcy, and the impossibility or impracticability of performance.

Alteration of the Contract

To discourage parties from altering written contracts, the law operates to allow an innocent party to be discharged when the other party has materially altered a written contract without consent. For example, a party alters a material term of a contract, such as the stated quantity or price, without the knowledge or consent of the other party. In this situation, the party who was unaware of the alteration can treat the contract as discharged or terminated.

Statutes of Limitations

As mentioned earlier in this text, statutes of limitations restrict the period during which a party can sue on a particular cause of action. After the applicable limitations period has passed, a suit can no longer be brought. For example, the limitations period for bringing suits for breach of oral contracts usually is two to three years; for written or otherwise recorded contracts, four to five years; and for recovery of amounts awarded in judgments, ten to twenty years, depending on state law. Lawsuits for breach of a contract for the sale of goods generally must be brought within four years after the cause of action has accrued.¹³ By their original agreement, the parties can reduce this four-year period to not less than one year, but they cannot agree to extend it.

12. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 281.

Bankruptcy

A proceeding in bankruptcy attempts to allocate the debtors' assets to the creditors in a fair and equitable fashion. Once the assets have been allocated, the debtor receives a discharge in bankruptcy. A discharge in bankruptcy will ordinarily bar enforcement of most of the debtor's contracts by the creditors. Partial payment of a debt after discharge in bankruptcy will not revive the debt. (Bankruptcy will be discussed in detail in Chapter 30.)

Impossibility or Impracticability of Performance

After a contract has been made, supervening events (such as a fire) may make performance impossible in an objective sense. This is known as impossibility of performance and can discharge a contract.¹⁴ Performance may also become so difficult or costly due to some unforeseen event that a court will consider it commercially unfeasible, or impracticable.

OBJECTIVE IMPOSSIBILITY OF PERFORMANCE

Objective impossibility ("It can't be done") must be distinguished from subjective impossibility ("I'm sorry, I simply can't do it"). For example, subjective impossibility occurs when a party cannot deliver goods on time because of freight car shortages or cannot make payment on time because the bank is closed. In effect, in each of these situations the party is saying, "It is impossible for me to perform," not "It is impossible for anyone to perform." Accordingly, such excuses do not discharge a contract, and the nonperforming party is normally held in breach of contract.

Note that to justify nonperformance of the contract, the supervening event must have been unforeseeable at the time of the contract's formation. Parties are supposed to consider foreseeable events, such as floods in a flood zone, at the time of contracting and allocate those risks accordingly through insurance and other means. Three basic types of situations, however, may qualify as grounds for the discharge of contractual obligations based on impossibility of performance:¹⁵

1. When one of the parties to a personal contract dies or becomes incapacitated prior to performance. For example, Fred, a famous dancer, contracts with Ethereal Dancing Guild to play a leading role in its new ballet. Before the ballet can be performed, Fred becomes ill and dies. His personal performance was essential to the completion of the contract. Thus, his death discharges the contract and his estate's liability for his nonperformance.
2. When the specific subject matter of the contract is destroyed. For example, A-1 Farm Equipment agrees to sell Gudge the green tractor on its lot and promises to have it ready for Gudge to pick up on Saturday. On Friday night, however, a truck veers off the nearby highway and smashes into the tractor, destroying it beyond repair. Because the contract was for this specific tractor, A-1's performance is rendered impossible owing to the accident.
3. When a change in law renders performance illegal. For example, a contract to build an apartment building becomes impossible to perform when the zoning laws are changed to prohibit the construction of residential rental property at the planned location. A contract to paint a bridge using lead paint becomes impossible when the government passes new regulations forbidding the use of lead paint on bridges.¹⁶

TEMPORARY IMPOSSIBILITY An occurrence or event that makes performance temporarily impossible operates to suspend performance until the impossibility ceases. Then, ordinarily, the parties must perform the contract as originally planned. If, however, the lapse of time and the change in circumstances surrounding the contract make it substantially more burdensome for the parties to perform the promised

13. Section 2-725 of the UCC contains this four-year limitation period. A cause of action in sales contracts generally accrues when the breach occurs, regardless of the aggrieved party's lack of knowledge of the breach. A breach of warranty normally occurs when the seller delivers the goods to the buyer.

15. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Sections 262-266; UCC 2-615.

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

When Is Impossibility of Performance a Valid Defense?

The doctrine of impossibility of performance is applied only when the parties could not have reasonably foreseen, at the time the contract was formed, the event or events that rendered performance impossible. In some cases, the courts may seem to go too far in holding that the parties should have foreseen certain events or conditions, thus precluding the parties from avoiding contractual obligations under the doctrine of impossibility of performance.

Actually, courts today are more likely to allow parties to raise this defense than courts in the past, which rarely excused parties from performance under this doctrine. Indeed, until the latter part of the nineteenth century, courts were reluctant to discharge a contract even when performance appeared to be impossible. Generally, the courts must balance the freedom of parties to contract (and thereby assume the risks involved) against the injustice that may result when certain contractual obligations are enforced. If the courts allowed parties to raise impossibility of performance as a defense to contractual obligations more often, freedom of contract would suffer.

CRITICAL THINKING

INSIGHT INTO THE SOCIAL ENVIRONMENT

Why might those entering into contracts be worse off in the long run if the courts increasingly accept impossibility of performance as a defense?

acts, the contract is discharged.¹⁷ Sometimes, it can be difficult to predict how a court will—or should—rule in a particular situation, as discussed in this chapter's Insight into Ethics feature.

CASE IN POINT Keefe Hurwitz contracted to sell his home in Madisonville, Louisiana, to Wesley and Gwendolyn Payne for a price of $241,500 on August 22, 2005. Four days later, Hurricane Katrina made landfall and caused extensive damage to the house. When Hurwitz refused to pay the cost of the necessary repairs, estimated at $60,000, the Paynes filed a lawsuit to enforce the contract. Hurwitz claimed that Hurricane Katrina had made it impossible for him to perform and had discharged his duties under the contract. The court, however, ruled that Hurricane Katrina had caused only a temporary impossibility. Hurwitz was required to pay for the necessary repairs and to perform the contract as written. In other words, he could not obtain a higher purchase price to offset the cost of the repairs.¹⁸

COMMERCIAL IMPRACTICABILITY When a supervening event does not render performance objectively impossible, but does make it much more difficult or expensive to perform than the parties originally contemplated, the courts may excuse the parties' obligations under the contract. For someone to invoke the doctrine of commercial impracticability successfully, however, the anticipated performance must become extremely difficult or costly.¹⁹

The added burden of performance not only must be extreme but also must not have been known by the parties when the contract was made. In one classic case, for example, a court held that a contract could be discharged because a party would otherwise have to pay ten times more than the original estimate to excavate a certain amount of gravel.²⁰ In another case, the court allowed a party to rescind a contract for the sale of land because of a potential problem with contaminated groundwater under the land. The court found that “the potential for substantial and unbargained-for” liability made contract performance economically impracticable.²¹

In the following case, a contract called for an illegal act, although the parties did not know this at the time the contract was formed. Given that the contract could not be performed legally, could performance be excused on the basis of impossibility of performance or commercial impracticability, or was the contract void from the outset? These were the questions before the court.

17. For a leading case involving temporary impossibility, see Autry v. Republic Productions, 30 Cal.2d 144, 180 P.2d 888 (1947). An actor's contract became temporarily impossible to perform when he was drafted to serve in World War II. After he returned, his duty to perform was discharged because the value of the dollar had declined, making performance substantially burdensome to him.

Merry Homes, Inc. v. Chi Hung Luu

Court of Appeals of Texas, Houston, ___ S.W.3d ___ (2010).
www.morelaw.com/verdicts^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Chi Hung Luu leased premises in Houston, Texas, from Merry Homes, Inc., with the intention of opening a bar and nightclub on the property. The lease provided that Luu could only use the premises for operating a nightclub or bar and for no other purpose. The lease also prohibited Luu from using the premises for, among other things, “any activity that violated any applicable federal, state, or local law.” After he signed the lease, Luu submitted an application for a liquor license to the city of Houston. The city denied the application because a city ordinance prohibited the sale of alcoholic beverages where the premises were located, which was fewer than three hundred feet from a public school. The city suggested that Luu take advantage of the “restaurant exception” to the law, which allowed restaurants in such areas to serve alcoholic beverages. Luu considered the restaurant possibility but decided that it would not be financially feasible. When Merry Homes refused to cancel the lease and refund Luu’s $6,000 security deposit, Luu brought an action against Merry Homes in a Texas state court. Luu sought a declaratory judgment that the lease was void because it could not be performed legally. Merry Homes counterclaimed for breach of contract and sought to recover eight months of unpaid rent. The trial court declared the lease void, and Merry Homes appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Jane BLAND, Justice.

* * * *

* * * The Texas Alcoholic Beverages Code authorizes counties and cities to adopt regulations prohibiting the sale of alcohol within 300 feet of a public school. The City of Houston has adopted such a regulation.

Although the lease, on its face, does not require violation of the law, the only permissible use of the premises under the lease’s terms is impossible and illegal, given the location of the premises relative to a school. As Luu cannot obtain a liquor license and therefore cannot perform under the lease without violating the statute and ordinance, the trial court properly determined that this lease is void for illegality.

Merry Homes [argues] * * * that Luu unconditionally bound himself to perform under the lease, and thus the City of Houston’s refusal to grant a liquor license should not excuse his performance, especially because the City’s denial is a contingency that Luu should have anticipated.

* * * *

* * * Merry Homes contends that the trial court’s decision to declare the lease void cannot be affirmed on the basis of impossibility of performance. Merry Homes relies on Section 10(c) of the lease, which provides that Luu will satisfy himself that the premises can be used for the intended purposes, and thus is bound to perform. We first note that Section 261 of the [Restatement (Second) of Contracts] only applies to supervening events [events occurring after the contract’s formation] that render performance impracticable, not preexisting conditions and events. The trial court found that the ordinance prohibiting the sale of alcohol on Luu’s premises[,] which renders Luu’s performance illegal and impracticable[,] existed before the parties executed the lease, and therefore Section 266 of the Restatement applies. [Emphasis added.]

Section 266(1) provides:

Where, at the time a contract is made, a party’s performance under it is impracticable without his fault because of [a] fact of which he has no reason to know and the nonexistence of which is a basic assumption on which the contract is made, no duty to render that performance arises, unless the language or circumstances indicate the contrary.

CASE 17.3 CONTINUED ♦ * * * Although Section 266 excuses performance as impracticable based upon a preexisting condition “of which [the party] has no reason to know,” we previously held that “a contract to do a thing which cannot be performed without a violation of the law is void, whether the parties knew the law or not.” (Emphasis added [by the court].) The Texas Supreme Court “has long recognized Texas’[s] strong public policy in favor of preserving the freedom of contract.” Freedom of contract, however, is not unlimited: “As a rule, parties have the right to contract as they see fit as long as their agreement does not violate the law or public policy.” Merry Homes cannot indirectly receive benefits—monthly rental payments—from what the law says it cannot do directly.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Court of Appeals of Texas affirmed the trial court’s judgment. The lease was void and unenforceable because it could not be performed without violating the law.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that Luu had decided to use the premises for a restaurant, but the wording of the lease had not changed. In this situation, if Luu sought to cancel the lease, would Merry Homes succeed in a suit for breach of contract? Discuss your answer.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • “Ignorance of the law is no excuse.” How does this case affirm that adage?

FRUSTRATION OF PURPOSE A theory closely allied with the doctrine of commercial impracticability is the doctrine of frustration of purpose. In principle, a contract will be discharged if supervening circumstances make it impossible to attain the purpose both parties had in mind when they made the contract. As with commercial impracticability and impossibility, the supervening event must not have been reasonably foreseeable at the time the contract was formed. In contrast to impracticability, which usually involves an event that increases the cost or difficulty of performance, frustration of purpose typically involves an event that decreases the value of what a party receives under the contract.²²

See Exhibit 17–1 for a summary of the ways in which a contract can be discharged.

REVIEWING

Performance and Discharge in Traditional and E-Contracts

Val's Foods signs a contract to buy 1,500 pounds of basil from Sun Farms, a small organic herb grower, as long as an independent organization inspects the crop and certifies that it contains no pesticide or herbicide residue. Val's has a contract with several restaurant chains to supply pesto and intends to use Sun Farms' basil in the pesto to fulfill these contracts. While Sun Farms is preparing to harvest the basil, an unexpected hailstorm destroys half the crop. Sun Farms attempts to purchase additional basil from other farms, but it is late in the season and the price is twice the normal market price. Sun Farms is too small to absorb this cost and immediately notifies Val's that it will not fulfill the contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Suppose that the basil does not pass the chemical-residue inspection. Which concept discussed in the chapter might allow Val's to refuse to perform the contract in this situation?
2. Under which legal theory or theories might Sun Farms claim that its obligation under the contract has been discharged by operation of law? Discuss fully.
3. Suppose that Sun Farms contacts every basil grower in the country and buys the last remaining chemical-free basil anywhere. Nevertheless, Sun Farms is able to ship only 1,475 pounds to Val's. Would this fulfill Sun Farms' obligations to Val's? Why or why not?
4. Now suppose that Sun Farms sells its operations to Happy Valley Farms. As a part of the sale, all three parties agree that Happy Valley will provide the basil as stated under the original contract. What is this type of agreement called?

 DEBATE THIS: The doctrine of commercial impracticability should be abolished.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

17-1. Conditions of Performance The Caplans own a real estate lot, and they contract with Faithful Construction, Inc., to build a house on it for $360,000. The specifications list “all plumbing bowls and fixtures . . . to be Crane brand.” The Caplans leave on vacation, and during their absence Faithful is unable to buy and install Crane plumbing fixtures. Instead, Faithful installs Kohler brand fixtures, an equivalent in the industry. On completion of the building contract, the Caplans inspect the work, discover the substitution, and refuse to accept the house, claiming Faithful has breached the conditions set forth in the specifications. Discuss fully the Caplans' claim.

17-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Discharge by Agreement.

Junior owes creditor Iba $1,000, which is due and payable on June 1. Junior has been in a car accident, has missed a great deal of work, and consequently will not have the funds on June 1. Junior's father, Fred, offers to pay Iba $1,100 in four equal installments if Iba will discharge Junior from any further liability on the debt. Iba accepts. Is this transaction a novation or an accord and satisfaction? Explain.

- For a sample answer to Question 17-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

17-3. Anticipatory Repudiation ABC Clothiers, Inc., has a contract with Taylor & Sons, a retailer, to deliver one thousand summer suits to Taylor's place of business on or before May 1. On April 1, Taylor senior receives a letter from ABC informing him that ABC will not be able to make the delivery as scheduled. Taylor is very upset, as he had planned a big ad campaign. He wants to file a suit against ABC immediately (on April 2). Taylor's son Tom tells his father that filing a lawsuit is not proper until ABC actually fails to deliver the suits on May 1. Discuss fully who is correct, Taylor or Tom.

17-4. Impossibility of Performance In the following situations, certain events take place after the contracts are formed. Discuss whether each of these contracts is discharged because the events render the contracts impossible to perform.

- Jimenez, a famous singer, contracts to perform in your nightclub. He dies prior to performance.
- Raglione contracts to sell you her land. Just before title is to be transferred, she dies.
- Oppenheim contracts to sell you one thousand bushels of apples from her orchard in the state of Washington. Because of a severe frost, she is unable to deliver the apples.
- Maxwell contracts to lease a service station for ten years. His principal income is from the sale of gasoline. Because of an oil embargo by foreign oil-producing nations, gasoline is rationed, cutting sharply into Maxwell's gasoline sales. He cannot make his lease payments.

17-5. Implied Conditions Heublein, Inc., makes wines and distilled spirits. Tarrant Distributors, Inc., agreed to distribute Heublein brands. When problems arose, the parties entered mediation. Under a settlement agreement, Heublein agreed to pay Tarrant the amount of its "net loss" as determined by Coopers & Lybrand, an accounting firm, according to a specified formula. The parties agreed that Coopers & Lybrand's calculation would be "final and binding." Heublein disagreed with Coopers & Lybrand's calculation, however, and refused to pay. The parties asked a court to rule on the dispute. Heublein argued that the settlement agreement included an implied condition precedent that Coopers & Lybrand would correctly apply the specified formula before Heublein would be obligated to pay. Tarrant pointed to the clause stating that the calculation would be "final and binding." With whom will the court agree, and why?

17-6. Frustration of Purpose Train operators and other railroad personnel use signaling systems to ensure safe train travel. Reading Blue Mountain & Northern Railroad Co. (RBMN) and Norfolk Southern Railway Co. entered into a contract for the maintenance of a signaling system that serviced a stretch of track near Jim Thorpe, Pennsylvania. The system included a series of poles, similar to telephone poles, suspending wires above the tracks. The contract provided that "the intent of the parties is to maintain the existing . . . facilities" and split the cost equally. In December 2002, a severe storm severed the wires and destroyed most of the poles. RBMN and Norfolk discussed replacing the old system, which they agreed was antiquated, inefficient, dangerous to rebuild, and expensive, but they could not agree on an alternative. Norfolk installed an entirely new system and filed a suit in a federal district court against RBMN to recover half of the cost. RBMN filed a motion for summary judgment, asserting, in part, the doctrine of frustration of purpose. What is this doctrine? Does it apply in this case? How should the court rule on RBMN's motion? Explain. [Norfolk Southern Railway Co. v. Reading Blue Mountain & Northern Railroad Co., 346 F.Supp.2d 720 (M.D.Pa. 2004)]

17-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Material Breach.

Kermit Johnson formed FB&I Building Products, Inc., in Watertown, South Dakota, to sell building materials. In December 1998, FB&I contracted with Superior Truss & Components in Minneota, Minnesota, "to exclusively sell Superior's open-faced wall panels, floor panels, roof trusses and other miscellaneous products." In March 2000, FB&I agreed to exclusively sell Component Manufacturing Co.'s building products in Colorado. Two months later, Superior learned of FB&I's deal with Component and terminated its contract with FB&I. That contract provided that on cancellation, "FB&I will be entitled to retain the customers that they continue to sell and service with Superior products." Superior refused to honor this provision. Between the cancellation of FB&I's contract and 2004, Superior made $2,327,528 in sales to FB&I customers without paying a commission. FB&I filed a suit in a South Dakota state court against Superior, alleging, in part, breach of contract and seeking the unpaid commissions. Superior insisted that FB&I had materially breached their contract, excusing Superior from performing. In whose favor should the court rule and why? [FB&I Building Products, Inc. v. Superior Truss & Components, a Division of Banks Lumber, Inc., 2007 SD 13, 727 N.W.2d 474 (S.D. 2007)]

17-8. Material Breach Roger Bannister was the director of technical and product development for Bemis Co. He signed a covenant not to compete that prohibited him from working for a "conflicting organization" for eighteen months following his termination, but required Bemis to pay his salary if he was unable to find a job "consistent with his abilities and education." Bemis terminated Bannister. Mondi Packaging, a Bemis competitor, told him that it would like to offer him a job but could not do so because of the the noncompete agreement. Bemis released Bannister from the agreement with respect to "all other companies than Mondi" and refused to pay his salary. Nine months later, Bannister accepted a position with Bancroft Bag, Inc., another Bemis competitor. He filed a suit in a federal district court against his former employer. Do these facts show a material breach of contract? If so, what is the appropriate remedy? Explain. [Bannister v. Bemis Co., Inc., 556 F.3d 882 (8th Cir. 2009)]

17-9. Condition Precedent Just Homes, LLC (JH), hired Mike Building & Contracting, Inc., to do $1.35 million worth of renovation work on three homes. Community Preservation Corporation (CPC) supervised Mike's work on behalf of JH. The contract stated that in the event of a dispute, JH would have to obtain the project architect's certification to justify terminating Mike. As construction progressed, relations between Mike and CPC worsened. At a certain point in the project, Mike requested partial payment, and CPC recommended that JH not make it. Mike refused to continue work without further payment. JH evicted Mike from the project. Mike sued for breach of contract. JH contended that it had the right to terminate the contract due to CPC's negative reports and Mike's failure to agree with the project's engineer. Mike moved for summary judgment for the amounts owed for work performed, claiming that JH had not fulfilled the condition precedent—that is, JH never obtained the project architect's certification for Mike's termination. Which of the two parties involved breached the contract? Explain your answer. [Mike Building & Contracting, Inc. v. Just Homes, LLC, 27 Misc.3d 833, 901 N.Y.S.2d 458 (2010)]

17-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Conditions.

King County, Washington, hired Frank Coluccio Construction Co. (FCCC) to act as general contractor for a public works project involving the construction of a small utility tunnel under the Duwamish Waterway. FCCC hired Donald B. Murphy Contractors, Inc. (DBM), as a subcontractor. DBM was responsible for constructing an access shaft at the eastern end of the tunnel. Problems arose during construction, including a “blow-in” of the access shaft that caused it to fill with water, soil, and debris. FCCC and DBM incurred substantial expenses from the repairs and delays. Under the project contract, King County was supposed to buy an insurance policy to “insure against physical loss or damage by perils included under an ‘All-Risk’ Builder’s Risk policy.” Any claim under this policy was to be filed through the insured. King County, which had general property damage insurance, did not obtain an all-risk builder’s risk policy. For the losses attributable to the blow-in, FCCC and DBM submitted builder’s risk claims, which the county denied. FCCC filed a suit in a Washington state court against King County, alleging, among other claims, breach of contract. [Frank Coluccio Construction Co., Inc. v. King County, 136 Wash.App. 751, 150 P.3d 1147 (Div. 1 2007)]

- (a) King County’s property damage policy specifically excluded, at the county’s request, coverage of tunnels. The county drafted its contract with FCCC to require the all-risk builder’s risk policy and authorize itself to “sponsor” claims. When FCCC and DBM filed their claims, the county secretly colluded with its property damage insurer to deny payment. What do these facts indicate about the county’s ethics and legal liability in this situation?
- (b) Could DBM, as a third party to the contract between King County and FCCC, maintain an action on the contract against King County? Discuss.
- (c) All-risk insurance is a promise to pay on the “fortuitous” happening of a loss or damage from any cause except those that are specifically excluded. Payment usually is not made on a loss that, at the time the insurance was obtained, the claimant subjectively knew would occur. If a loss results from faulty workmanship on the part of a contractor, should the obligation to pay under an all-risk policy be discharged? Explain.

CHAPTER 18

Breach of Contract and Remedies

When one party breaches a contract, the other party—the nonbreaching party—can choose one or more of several remedies. A remedy is the relief provided for an innocent party when the other party has breached the contract. It is the means employed to enforce a right or to redress an injury.

The most common remedies available to a nonbreaching party include damages, rescission and restitution, specific performance, and reformation. As discussed in Chapter 1, a distinction is made between remedies at law and remedies in equity. Today, the remedy at law normally is monetary damages, which are discussed in the first part of this chapter.

Equitable remedies include rescission and restitution, specific performance, and reformation, all of which will be examined later in the chapter. Usually, a court will not award an equitable remedy unless the remedy at law is inadequate. Special legal doctrines and concepts relating to remedies will be discussed in the final pages of this chapter.

SECTION 1 DAMAGES

A breach of contract entitles the nonbreaching party to sue for monetary damages. As discussed in Chapter 6, tort law damages are designed to compensate a party for harm suffered as a result of another's wrongful act. In the context of contract law, damages compensate the nonbreaching party for the loss of the bargain. Often, courts say that innocent parties are to be placed in the position they would have occupied had the contract been fully performed.¹

Realize at the outset, though, that collecting damages through a court judgment requires litigation, which can be expensive and time consuming. Also keep in mind that court judgments are often difficult to enforce, particularly if the breaching party does not have sufficient assets to pay the damages awarded (as discussed in Chapter 3). For these reasons, most parties settle their lawsuits for damages (or other remedies) prior to trial.

1. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 347.

Types of Damages

There are four broad categories of damages:

1. Compensatory (to cover direct losses and costs).
2. Consequential (to cover indirect and foreseeable losses).
3. Punitive (to punish and deter wrongdoing).
4. Nominal (to recognize wrongdoing when no monetary loss is shown).

Compensatory and punitive damages were discussed in Chapter 6 in the context of tort law. Here, we look at these types of damages, as well as consequential and nominal damages, in the context of contract law.

COMPENSATORY DAMAGES Damages that compensate the nonbreaching party for the loss of the bargain are known as compensatory damages. These damages compensate the injured party only for damages actually sustained and proved to have arisen directly from the loss of the bargain caused by the breach of contract. They simply replace what was lost because of the wrong or damage and, for this reason, are often said to “make the person whole.”

The standard measure of compensatory damages is the difference between the value of the breaching party's promised performance under the contract and the value of her or his actual performance. This amount is reduced by any loss that the injured party has avoided, however.

To illustrate: Wilcox contracts to perform certain services exclusively for Hernandez during the month of March for $4,000. Hernandez cancels the contract and is in breach. Wilcox is able to find another job during the month of March but can earn only $3,000. He can sue Hernandez for breach and recover $1,000 as compensatory damages. Wilcox can also recover from Hernandez the amount that he spent to find the other job. Expenses that are caused directly by a breach of contract—such as those incurred to obtain performance from another source—are known as incidental damages.

The measurement of compensatory damages varies by type of contract. Certain types of contracts deserve special mention. They are contracts for the sale of goods, land contracts, and construction contracts.

Sale of Goods. In a contract for the sale of goods, the usual measure of compensatory damages is an amount equal to the difference between the contract price and the market price.² For example, Medik Laboratories contracts to buy ten model UTS network servers from Cal Industries for $4,000 each. Cal Industries, however, fails to deliver the ten servers to Medik. The market price of the servers at the time Medik learns of the breach is $4,500. Therefore, Medik's measure of damages is $5,000 ($10 \times \500), plus any incidental damages (expenses) caused by the breach. When the buyer breaches and the seller has not yet produced the goods, compensatory damages normally equal lost profits on the sale, not the difference between the contract price and the market price.

Sale of Land. Ordinarily, because each parcel of land is unique, the remedy for a seller's breach of a contract for a sale of real estate is specific performance—that is, the buyer is awarded the parcel of property for which she or he bargained (specific performance will be discussed more fully later in this chapter). When this remedy is unavailable (because the seller has sold the property to someone else, for example) or when the buyer is the party in breach, the measure of damages is typically the difference between the contract price and the market price of the land. The majority of states follow this rule.

A minority of states follow a different rule when the seller breaches the contract and the breach is not deliberate.³ When the breach was not willful, these states limit the prospective buyer's damages to a refund of any down payment made plus any expenses incurred (such as fees for title searches, attorneys, and escrows). This rule effectively returns purchasers to the positions they occupied prior to the sale, rather than giving them the benefit of the bargain.

Construction Contracts. The measure of damages in a building or construction contract varies depending on which party breaches and when the breach occurs. The owner can breach at three different stages—before performance has begun, during performance, or after performance has been completed.

If the owner breaches before performance has begun, the contractor can recover only the profits that would have been made on the contract (that is, the total contract price less the cost of materials and labor). If the owner breaches during performance, the contractor can recover the profits plus the costs incurred in partially constructing the building. If the owner breaches after the construction has been completed, the contractor can recover the entire contract price, plus interest.

When the construction contractor breaches the contract—either by failing to undertake construction or by stopping work partway through the project—the measure of damages is the cost of completion, which includes reasonable compensation for any delay in performance. If the contractor finishes late, the measure of damages is the loss of use. The rules concerning the measurement of damages in breached construction contracts are summarized in Exhibit 18–1 on the following page.

Construction Contracts and Economic Waste. If the contractor substantially performs, a court may use the cost-of-completion formula, but only

2. More specifically, the amount is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place at which the goods were to be delivered or tendered. See UCC [Uniform Commercial Code] 2–708 and 2–713.

3. “Deliberate” breaches include the seller's failure to convey (transfer title) the land because the market price has gone up. “Nondeliberate” breaches include the seller's failure to convey the land because of a problem with the title, such as the discovery of an unknown easement that gives another a right of use over the property (see Chapter 50).

EXHIBIT 18-1 • Measurement of Damages—Breach of Construction Contracts

PARTY IN BREACH	TIME OF BREACH	MEASUREMENT OF DAMAGES
Owner	Before construction has begun.	Profits (contract price less cost of materials and labor).
Owner	During construction.	Profits, plus costs incurred up to time of breach.
Owner	After construction is completed.	Full contract price, plus interest.
Contractor	Before construction has begun.	Cost in excess of contract price to complete work.
Contractor	Before construction is completed.	Generally, all costs incurred by owner to complete.

if requiring completion will not entail unreasonable economic waste. Economic waste occurs when the cost of repairing or completing the performance as required by the contract greatly outweighs the benefit to the owner. Suppose that a contractor discovers that it will cost $20,000 to move a large coral rock eleven inches as specified in the contract. Because changing the rock's position will alter the appearance of the project only a trifle, a court would likely conclude that full completion would involve economic waste. Thus, the contractor will not be required to pay the entire $20,000 to complete performance.

CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES Foreseeable damages that result from a party's breach of contract are called consequential damages, or special damages. They differ from compensatory damages in that they are caused by special circumstances beyond the contract itself. They flow from the consequences, or results, of a breach.

When a seller fails to deliver goods, knowing that the buyer is planning to use or resell those goods immediately, a court may award consequential damages for the loss of profits from the planned resale. (The buyer will also recover compensatory damages for the difference between the contract price and the market price of the goods.)

To recover consequential damages, the breaching party must know (or have reason to know) that special circumstances will cause the non-breaching party to suffer an additional loss. This rule was enunciated in the following classic case. In reading this decision, it is helpful to understand that in the mid-nineteenth century, large flour mills customarily kept more than one main crankshaft on hand in the event that one broke and had to be repaired.

CASE 18.1*Hadley v. Baxendale

Court of Exchequer, 156 Eng.Rep. 145 (1854).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • The Hadleys (the plaintiffs) ran a flour mill in Gloucester, England. The main crankshaft attached to the steam engine in the mill broke, causing the mill to shut down. The crankshaft had to be sent to a foundry located in Greenwich so that a new shaft could be made to fit the other parts of the engine. Baxendale, the defendant, was a common carrier that transported the shaft from Gloucester to Greenwich. The freight charges were collected in advance, and Baxendale promised to deliver the shaft the following day. It was not delivered for a number of days, however. As a consequence, the mill was closed for several days. The Hadleys sued to recover the profits lost during that time. Baxendale contended that the loss of profits was “too remote” to be recoverable. The court held for the plaintiffs, and the jury was allowed to take into consideration the lost profits. The defendant appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

ALDERSON, J. [Judge]

* * * *

* * * Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, [that

CASE 18.1 CONTINUED ♦ is,] according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. Now, if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract, which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated. * * * Now, in the present case, if we are to apply the principles above laid down, we find that the only circumstances here communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants at the time the contract was made, were, that the article to be carried was the broken shaft of a mill, and that the plaintiffs were the millers of that mill. * * * Special circumstances were here never communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants. It follows, therefore, that the loss of profits here cannot reasonably be considered such a consequence of the breach of contract as could have been fairly and reasonably contemplated by both the parties when they made this contract. [Emphasis added.]

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Court of Exchequer ordered a new trial. According to the court, to collect consequential damages, the plaintiffs would have to have given express notice of the special circumstances that caused the loss of profits.

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY'S LAW • This case established the rule that when damages are awarded, compensation is given only for those injuries that the defendant could reasonably have foreseen as a probable result of the usual course of events following a breach. Today, the rule enunciated by the court in this case still applies. To recover consequential damages, the plaintiff must show that the defendant had reason to know or foresee that a particular loss or injury would occur.

THE E-COMMERCE DIMENSION • If a Web merchant loses business due to a computer system's failure that can be attributed to malfunctioning software, can the merchant recover the lost profits from the software maker? Explain.

PUNITIVE DAMAGES Punitive, or exemplary, damages generally are not recoverable in contract law, even for an intentional breach of contract. Because punitive damages are designed to punish a wrongdoer and set an example to deter similar conduct in the future, they have no legitimate place in contract law. A contract is simply a civil relationship between the parties, so breaching a contract is not a crime; nor does it necessarily harm society (as torts do). Thus, a court will not award punitive damages but will compensate one party for the loss of the bargain—no more and no less.

In a few situations, however, when a person's actions constitute both a breach of contract and a tort, punitive damages may be available. For example, some parties, such as an engineer and her client, may establish by contract a certain reasonable standard or duty of care. Failure to live up to that standard is a breach of contract, and the act itself may constitute negligence. Similarly, some intentional torts, such as fraud, may be tied to a breach of the terms of a contract and enable the injured party to seek punitive damages. Additionally, when an insurance company exhibits bad faith in failing to settle a claim on behalf of the insured party, courts may award punitive damages. Overall, though, punitive damages are almost never available in contract disputes.

NOMINAL DAMAGES When no actual damage or financial loss results from a breach of contract and only a technical injury is involved, the court may award nominal damages to the innocent party. Awards of nominal damages are often small, such as one dollar, but they do establish that the defendant acted wrongfully. Most lawsuits for nominal damages are brought as a matter of principle under the theory that a breach has occurred and some damages must be imposed regardless of actual loss.

Assume that Jackson contracts to buy potatoes from Stanley at fifty cents a pound. Stanley breaches the contract and does not deliver the potatoes. In the meantime, the price of potatoes has fallen. Jackson is able to buy them in the open market at half the price he contracted for with Stanley. He is clearly better off because of Stanley's breach. Thus, because Jackson sustained only a technical injury and suffered no monetary loss, he is likely to be awarded only nominal damages if he brings a suit for breach of contract.

Mitigation of Damages

In most situations, when a breach of contract occurs, the innocent injured party is held to a duty to mitigate, or reduce, the damages that he or she suffers. Under this doctrine of mitigation of damages, the duty owed depends on the nature of the contract.

For example, some states require a landlord to use reasonable means to find a new tenant if a tenant abandons the premises and fails to pay rent. If an acceptable tenant is found, the landlord is required to lease the premises to this tenant to mitigate the damages recoverable from the former tenant. The former tenant is still liable for the difference between the amount of the rent under the original lease and the rent received from the new tenant. If the landlord has not taken the reasonable steps necessary to find a new tenant, a court will likely reduce any award made by the amount of rent the landlord could have received had such reasonable means been used.

In the majority of states, a person whose employment has been wrongfully terminated owes a duty to mitigate the damages suffered because of the employer's breach of the employment contract. In other words, a wrongfully terminated employee has a duty to take a similar job if one is available. If the employee fails to do this, the damages awarded will be equivalent to the person's salary less the income he or she would have received in a similar job obtained by reasonable means. The employer has the burden of proving that such a job existed and that the employee could have been hired. Normally, the employee is under no duty to take a job of a different type and rank.

Liquidated Damages Provisions

A liquidated damages provision in a contract specifies that a certain dollar amount is to be paid in the event of a future default or breach of contract. (Liquidated means determined, settled, or fixed.) For example, a provision requiring a construction contractor to pay $300 for every day he or she is late in completing the project is a liquidated damages provision.

Liquidated damages provisions are frequently used in construction contracts. They are also common in contracts for the sale of goods.⁴ In addition, contracts with entertainers and professional athletes often include liquidated damages provisions. For example, in 2010 a television network settled its contract dispute with The Tonight Show host Conan O'Brien for $33 million—somewhat less than the $40 million he would have potentially received in liquidated damages if the dispute had gone to court and he had prevailed.

LIQUIDATED DAMAGES VERSUS PENALTIES Liquidated damages differ from penalties. A penalty specifies a certain amount to be paid in the event of a default or breach of contract and is designed to penalize the breaching party. Liquidated damages provisions usually are enforceable. In contrast, if a court finds that a provision calls for a penalty, the agreement as to the amount will not be enforced, and recovery will be limited to actual damages.

In the following case, the issue before the court was whether a clause in a contract was an enforceable liquidated damages provision or an unenforceable penalty.

4. Section 2-718(1) of the UCC specifically authorizes the use of liquidated damages provisions.

✪ EXTENDED CASE 18.2 ✪

B-Sharp Musical Productions, Inc. v. Haber

New York Supreme Court, 27 Misc.3d 41, 899 N.Y.S.2d 792 (2010).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

PER CURIAM [By the whole court].

* * * *

Plaintiff [B-Sharp Musical Productions, Inc.,] and defendant James

Haber entered into a contract pursuant to which plaintiff agreed to provide a designated 16-piece band on a specified date to perform at Mr.

Haber's son's bar mitzvah. Mr. Haber was to pay approximately $30,000 for the band's services. The contract contained a liquidated damages clause stating, in pertinent part, "If [the contract] is terminated in writing by [Mr. Haber] for any reason within ninety (90) days prior to the engagement, the remaining balance of the contract will be immediately due and payable. If [the contract] is terminated in writing by [Mr. Haber] for any reason before the ninety (90) days period, 50 percent of the balance will be immediately due and payable."

Less than 90 days prior to the date of the bar mitzvah, Mr. Haber sent a letter to plaintiff notifying it that he was canceling the contract. After Mr. Haber refused plaintiff's demand that he pay the remaining amount due under the contract—approximately $25,000—plaintiff commenced this action against Mr. Haber and his wife, defendant Jill Haber. Civil Court granted plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on its cause of action to enforce the liquidated damages clause and denied defendants' cross motion for partial summary judgment dismissing that cause of action and the complaint as against Mrs. Haber.

Given the nature of the contract and the particular circumstances underlying this case, Civil Court correctly determined that the subject provision of the contract is an enforceable liquidated damages clause, not an unenforceable penalty. "The clause, which in effect uses an estimate of [plaintiff's] chances of rebooking the [band] as the measure of [its] probable loss in the event of a cancellation, reflects an understanding that although the expense and possibility of rebooking a canceled [performance] could not be ascertained [determined] with certainty, as a practical matter the expense would become greater, and the possibility would become less, the closer to the [performance] the cancellation was made, until a point was reached, [90] days before [the performance], that any effort to rebook could not be reasonably expected." [Emphasis added.]

Defendants' argument that the cause of action to enforce the liquidated damages clause must be dismissed because the clause does not comply with the type size requirement of CPLR [New York's Civil Practice Law Rules] 4544 is without merit. In an effort to demonstrate that the clause did not comply with the statutory type size requirement, defendants submitted a copy of the contract with the image of a ruler imprinted in the margin. However, defendants failed to establish that the type size of the copy they submitted is identical to that of the original contract, a critical failure given the precision with which type size must be measured and calculated. Therefore, defendants failed to raise a triable [one that could go before a judge or jury] issue as to whether the clause violated the statutory type size requirement.

We agree with defendants that the complaint should be dismissed against Mrs. Haber. The contract was signed only by Mr. Haber, and no triable issue exists as to whether Mr. Haber executed the contract as Mrs. Haber's agent. We note in this connection that an agency relationship may not be implied or inferred solely by reason of the marital relationship of the couple.

This constitutes the decision and order of the court.

QUESTIONS

1. In deciding whether a clause provides for liquidated damages or a penalty, should the courts ever consider the circumstances that caused the nonperforming party to breach the contract? Explain.
2. Why did the court determine that the contract clause at issue was an enforceable liquidated damages clause and not an unenforceable penalty clause?

ENFORCEABILITY To determine if a particular provision is for liquidated damages or for a penalty, a court asks two questions:

1. When the contract was entered into, was it apparent that damages would be difficult to estimate in the event of a breach?
2. Was the amount set as damages a reasonable estimate and not excessive?⁵

If the answers to both questions are yes, the provision normally will be enforced. If either answer is no, the provision usually will not be enforced.

CASE IN POINT Winthrop Resources Corporation leased nearly $9 million worth of computer equipment to Eaton Hydraulics. When Eaton failed to meet its payment obligations and did not take proper care of the leased equipment, Winthrop filed a lawsuit for breach of the contract. The contract included a liquidated damages provision that valued the computer equipment at more than four times its market value. Eaton challenged the provision, claiming that it called for an unenforceable penalty. According to the court, the amount of actual damages was difficult to ascertain at the time the contract was formed because of the "speculative nature of the value of computers at termination of lease schedules." Therefore, the court ruled that the liquidated damages clause was enforceable and required Eaton to pay nearly $4 million to Winthrop.⁶

SECTION 2EQUITABLE REMEDIES

Sometimes, damages are an inadequate remedy for a breach of contract. In these situations, the non-breaching party may ask the court for an equitable remedy. Equitable remedies include rescission and restitution, specific performance, and reformation.

5. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 356(1).

6. Winthrop Resources Corp. v. Eaton Hydraulics, Inc., 361 F.3d 465 (8th Cir. 2004).

Rescission and Restitution

As discussed in Chapter 17 on page 325, rescission is essentially an action to undo, or terminate, a contract—to return the contracting parties to the positions they occupied prior to the transaction.⁷ When fraud, a mistake, duress, undue influence, misrepresentation, or lack of capacity to contract is present, unilateral rescission is available. Rescission may also be available by statute.⁸ The failure of one party to perform entitles the other party to rescind the contract. The rescinding party must give prompt notice to the breaching party.

RESTITUTION Generally, to rescind a contract, both parties must make restitution to each other by returning goods, property, or funds previously conveyed.⁹ If the property or goods can be returned, they must be. If the goods or property have been consumed, restitution must be made in an equivalent dollar amount.

Essentially, restitution involves the plaintiff's recapture of a benefit conferred on the defendant that has unjustly enriched her or him. For example, Katie pays $10,000 to Bob in return for Bob's promise to design a house for her. The next day, Bob calls Katie and tells her that he has taken a position with a large architectural firm in another state and cannot design the house. Katie decides to hire another architect that afternoon. Katie can obtain restitution of the $10,000.

RESTITUTION IS NOT LIMITED TO RESCISSION CASES Restitution may be appropriate when a contract is rescinded, but the right to restitution is not limited to rescission cases. Because an award of restitution basically returns something to its rightful owner, a party can seek restitution in actions for breach of contract, tort actions, and other types of actions. For example, restitution can be obtained when funds or property have been transferred by mistake or because of fraud or incapacity. Similarly, restitution might be available when there has been misconduct by a party in a confidential or other special relationship. Even in criminal cases a court can order restitution of funds or property obtained through embezzlement, conversion, theft, or copyright infringement.

Specific Performance

The equitable remedy of specific performance calls for the performance of the act promised in the contract. This remedy is attractive to a nonbreaching party because it provides the exact bargain promised in the contract. It also avoids some of the problems inherent in a suit for damages, such as collecting a judgment and arranging another contract. In addition, the actual performance may be more valuable than the monetary damages.

Normally, however, specific performance will not be granted unless the party's legal remedy (monetary damages) is inadequate.¹⁰ For this reason, contracts for the sale of goods rarely qualify for specific performance. The legal remedy—monetary damages—is ordinarily adequate in such situations because substantially identical goods can be bought or sold in the market. Only if the goods are unique will a court grant specific performance. For example, paintings, sculptures, or rare books or coins are so unique that monetary damages will not enable a buyer to obtain substantially identical substitutes in the market.

SALE OF LAND A court may grant specific performance to a buyer in an action for a breach of contract involving the sale of land. In this situation, the legal remedy of monetary damages may not compensate the buyer adequately because every parcel of land is unique: the same land in the same location obviously cannot be obtained elsewhere. Only when specific performance is unavailable (such as when the seller has sold the property to someone else) will monetary damages be awarded instead.

CASE IN POINT Howard Stainbrook entered into a contract to sell Trent Low forty acres of mostly timbered land for $45,000. Low agreed to pay for a survey of the property and other costs in addition to the price. He gave Stainbrook a check for $1,000 to show his intent to fulfill the contract. One month later, Stainbrook died. His son David became the executor of the estate. After he discovered that the timber on the property was worth more than $100,000, David asked Low to withdraw his offer to buy the forty acres. Low refused and filed a suit against David seeking specific performance of the

7. The rescission discussed here is unilateral rescission, in which only one party wants to undo the contract. In mutual rescission, both parties agree to undo the contract. Mutual rescission discharges the contract; unilateral rescission generally is available as a remedy for breach of contract.

8. The Federal Trade Commission and many states have rules or statutes allowing consumers to unilaterally rescind contracts made at home with door-to-door salespersons. Rescission is allowed within three business days for any reason or for no reason at all. See, for example, California Civil Code Section 1689.5.

9. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 370.

10. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 359.

contract. The court found that because Low had substantially performed his obligations under the contract and offered to perform the rest, he was entitled to specific performance.¹¹

CONTRACTS FOR PERSONAL SERVICES Personal-service contracts require one party to work personally for another party. Courts generally refuse to grant specific performance of personal-service contracts because to order a party to perform personal services against his or her will amounts to a type of involuntary servitude.¹²

Moreover, the courts do not want to monitor contracts for personal services, which usually require the exercise of personal judgment or talent. For example, if Nicole contracted with a surgeon to perform surgery to remove a tumor on her brain, and he refused, the court would not compel (and she certainly would not want) the surgeon to perform under those circumstances. A court cannot assure meaningful performance in such a situation.¹³

11. Stainbrook v. Low, 842 N.E.2d 386 (Ind.App. 2006).
12. Involuntary servitude, or slavery, is contrary to the public policy expressed in the Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. A court can, however, enter an order (injunction) prohibiting a person who breached a personal-service contract from engaging in similar contracts for a period of time in the future.
13. Similarly, courts often refuse to order specific performance of construction contracts because courts are not set up to operate as construction supervisors or engineers.

If a contract is not deemed personal, the remedy at law of monetary damages may be adequate if substantially identical service (such as lawn mowing) is available from other persons.

Reformation

Reformation is an equitable remedy used when the parties have imperfectly expressed their agreement in writing. Reformation allows a court to rewrite the contract to reflect the parties' true intentions.

WHEN FRAUD OR MUTUAL MISTAKE IS PRESENT

Courts order reformation most often when fraud or mutual mistake (for example, a clerical error) is present. Typically, a party seeks reformation so that some other remedy may then be pursued. To illustrate: If Carson contracts to buy a certain parcel of land from Malboa but their contract mistakenly refers to a different parcel of land and not the one being sold, the contract does not reflect the parties' intentions. Accordingly, a court can reform the contract so that it conforms to the parties' intentions and accurately refers to the parcel of land being sold. Carson can then, if necessary, show that Malboa has breached the contract as reformed. She can at that time request an order for specific performance.

In the following case, a court was asked to reform a deed eight months after the transaction in which the deed played a principal part.

CASE 18.3 Drake v. Hance

Court of Appeals of North Carolina, 673 S.E.2d 411 (2009).
www.nccourts.org^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In June 2005, Eric and Debra Hance agreed to buy Garry and Wanda Drake's home in Monroe, North Carolina. The contract described the property as "#15 Legacy Lake." The deed, however, listed "lot 15, Legacy Lake" and "lot 11, Legacy Lake." Lot 15 is the property on which the home sits. Lot 11 is a vacant lot across the street. After the sale, the deed was filed with the appropriate state office. Eight months later, when the Drakes tried to sell lot 11 to a third party, they learned that it had been listed on the Hances' deed. The Drakes told the Hances, who denied that any mistake had been made. Claiming that they had intended to sell only lot 15, the Drakes filed a suit in a North Carolina state court against the Hances. The attorney who closed the sale testified that the deed was drafted improperly. The court reformed it. The Hances appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

CALABRIA, Judge.

* * * *

A deed is a written document that on its face conveys title or an interest in real property. A deed is an integrated document and the parties may not introduce oral or written evidence to contradict its terms.

However, if a party can show a mutual mistake was made in the execution of a deed, in this case due to the error of the draftsman, parol evidence is competent evidence to show the true intentions of the parties. If the evidence is strong, cogent, and convincing that the deed, as recorded, did not reflect the agreement between the parties due to a mutual mistake caused by a drafting error, a deed can be reformed. [Emphasis added.]

In the present case, the closing attorney improperly prepared the deed due to an error in his office. The court found that repeated attempts were made to contact the defendants to correct the error but were unsuccessful. More importantly, the defendants, at that time, did not dispute that an error had been made. The trial court found the closing attorney's testimony "exceptionally persuasive," and we agree.

* * * The evidence of an error by the draftsman was strong, cogent, and convincing. The trial court did not err in reforming the deed based on this evidence.

Competent evidence supports the trial court's findings that the parties contracted for the sale of lot 15 only, and that the attorney erred when drafting the deed that included both lots. The trial court did not err in admitting parol evidence to determine the intent of the parties, and did not err in reforming the deed when presented evidence of the attorney's mistake.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's action. The parties had contracted for the sale of only one lot. The deed could be reformed based on the testimony of the party who drafted it.

THE E-COMMERCE DIMENSION • Is a mistake such as the one in this case likely to occur when software is used to draft a document? Why or why not?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • What may have motivated the defendants in this case to assert that there was no mistake in the deed? Discuss.

Exhibit 18–2 graphically summarizes the remedies, including reformation, that are available to the nonbreaching party.

ORAL CONTRACTS AND COVENANTS NOT TO COMPETE Courts also frequently reform contracts in two other situations. The first involves two parties who have made a binding oral contract. They further agree to put the oral contract in writing, but in doing so, they make an error in stating the terms. Normally, a court will allow into evidence the correct terms of the oral contract, thereby reforming the written contract.

The second situation occurs when the parties have executed a written covenant not to compete (discussed in Chapter 13 on page 263). If the covenant is for a valid and legitimate purpose (such as the sale of a business) but the area or time restraints of the covenant are unreasonable, some courts will reform the restraints by making them reasonable and will enforce the entire contract as reformed. Other courts, however, will throw out the entire restrictive covenant as illegal.

SECTION 3

RECOVERY BASED ON QUASI CONTRACT

In some situations, when no actual contract exists, a court may step in to prevent one party from being unjustly enriched at the expense of another party. As discussed in Chapter 10 on pages 212 and 213, quasi contract is a legal theory under which an obligation is imposed in the absence of an agreement. The legal obligation arises because the law considers that the party accepting the benefits has made an implied promise to pay for them. Generally, when one party has conferred a benefit on another party, justice requires that the party receiving the benefit pay the reasonable value for it. The party conferring the benefit can recover in quantum meruit, which means “as much as he or she deserves.”

EXHIBIT 18-2 • Remedies for Breach of Contract

When Quasi Contract Is Used

Quasi contract allows a court to act as if a contract exists when there is no actual contract or agreement between the parties. A court can also use this theory when the parties entered into a contract, but it is unenforceable for some reason. Quasi-contractual recovery is often granted when one party has partially performed under a contract that is unenforceable. It provides an alternative to suing for damages and allows the party to recover the reasonable value of the partial performance, measured in some cases according to the benefit received and in others according to the detriment suffered.

For example, Ericson contracts to build two oil derricks for Petro Industries. The derricks are to be built over a period of three years, but the parties do not make a written contract. Thus, the Statute of Frauds will bar enforcement of the contract.¹⁴ After Ericson completes one derrick, Petro Industries informs him that it will not pay for the derrick. Ericson can sue Petro Industries under the theory of quasi contract.

The Requirements of Quasi Contract

To recover under the theory of quasi contract, the party seeking recovery must show the following:

1. The party has conferred a benefit on the other party.
2. The party conferred the benefit with the reasonable expectation of being paid.

¹⁴ Contracts that by their terms cannot be performed within one year must be in writing to be enforceable (see Chapter 15).

3. The party did not act as a volunteer in conferring the benefit.
4. The party receiving the benefit would be unjustly enriched if allowed to retain the benefit without paying for it.

Applying these requirements to the example just given, Ericson can sue in quasi contract because all of the conditions for quasi-contractual recovery have been fulfilled. Ericson conferred a benefit on Petro Industries by building the oil derrick. Ericson built the derrick with the reasonable expectation of being paid and was not intending to act as a volunteer. The derrick conferred an obvious benefit on Petro Industries. Petro Industries would be unjustly enriched if it was allowed to keep the derrick without paying Ericson for the work. Therefore, Ericson should be able to recover in quantum meruit the reasonable value of the oil derrick that was built, which is ordinarily equal to its fair market value.

Concept Summary 18.1 on the following page reviews all of the equitable remedies, including quasi contract, that may be available in the event that a contract is breached.

SECTION 4

ELECTION OF REMEDIES

In many cases, a nonbreaching party has several remedies available. When the remedies are inconsistent with one another, the common law of contracts requires the party to choose which remedy to pursue. This is called election of remedies.

The Purpose of the Doctrine

The purpose of the doctrine of election of remedies is to prevent double recovery. Suppose that

CONCEPT SUMMARY 18.1

Equitable Remedies

Remedy	Description
Rescission and Restitution	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Rescission—A remedy whereby a contract is canceled and the parties are restored to the original positions that they occupied prior to the transaction. 2. Restitution—When a contract is rescinded, both parties must make restitution to each other by returning the goods, property, or funds previously conveyed.
Specific Performance	An equitable remedy calling for the performance of the act promised in the contract. Only available when monetary damages would be inadequate—such as in contracts for the sale of land or unique goods—and never available in personal-service contracts.
Reformation	An equitable remedy allowing a contract to be reformed, or rewritten, to reflect the parties' true intentions. Available when an agreement is imperfectly expressed in writing, such as when a mutual mistake has occurred.
Recovery Based on Quasi Contract	An equitable theory under which a party who confers a benefit on another with the reasonable expectation of being paid can seek a court order for the fair market value of the benefit conferred.

McCarthy agrees in writing to sell his land to Tally. Then McCarthy changes his mind and repudiates the contract. Tally can sue for compensatory damages or for specific performance. If Tally could seek compensatory damages in addition to specific performance, she would recover twice for the same breach of contract. The doctrine of election of remedies requires Tally to choose the remedy she wants, and it eliminates any possibility of double recovery. In other words, the election doctrine represents the legal embodiment of the adage “You can’t have your cake and eat it, too.”

The doctrine has often been applied in a rigid and technical manner, leading to some harsh results. For example, Beacham is fraudulently induced to buy a parcel of land for $150,000. He spends an additional $10,000 moving onto the land and then discovers the fraud. Instead of suing for damages, Beacham sues to rescind the contract. The court allows Beacham to recover the purchase price of $150,000 in restitution, but not the additional $10,000 in moving expenses (because the seller did not receive this payment, he or she will not be required to return it). So Beacham suffers a net loss of $10,000 on the transaction. If Beacham had elected to sue for damages instead of seeking the remedy of rescission and restitution, he could have recovered the $10,000 as well as the $150,000.

The UCC’s Rejection of the Doctrine

Because of the many problems associated with the doctrine of election of remedies, the UCC expressly rejects it.¹⁵ As will be discussed in Chapter 21, remedies under the UCC are not exclusive but are cumulative in nature and include all the available remedies for breach of contract.

Pleading in the Alternative

Although the nonbreaching party must ultimately elect which remedy to pursue, modern court procedures do allow plaintiffs to plead their cases “in the alternative” (pleadings were discussed in Chapter 3 on page 52). In other words, when the plaintiff originally files a lawsuit, he or she can ask the court to order either rescission (and restitution) or damages. At trial, the party can elect the remedy that is most beneficial or appropriate, or the judge can order one remedy and not another. This process still prevents double recovery because the party can be awarded only one of the remedies requested.

SECTION 5

WAIVER OF BREACH

Under certain circumstances, a nonbreaching party may be willing to accept a defective performance of the contract. This knowing relinquishment of a legal right (that is, the right to require satisfactory and full performance) is called a waiver.

¹⁵ See UCC 2–703 and 2–711.

Consequences of a Waiver of Breach

When a waiver of a breach of contract occurs, the party waiving the breach cannot take any later action on it. In effect, the waiver erases the past breach; the contract continues as if the breach had never occurred. Of course, the waiver of breach of contract extends only to the matter waived and not to the whole contract.

Reasons for Waiving a Breach

Businesspersons often waive breaches of contract to get whatever benefit is still possible out of the contract. For instance, a seller contracts with a buyer to deliver to the buyer ten thousand tons of coal on or before November 1. The contract calls for the buyer to pay by November 10 for coal delivered. Because of a coal miners' strike, coal is hard to find. The seller breaches the contract by not tendering delivery until November 5. The buyer will likely choose to waive the seller's breach, accept delivery of the coal, and pay as contracted.

Waiver of Breach and Subsequent Breaches

Ordinarily, a waiver by a contracting party will not operate to waive subsequent, additional, or future breaches of contract. This is always true when the subsequent breaches are unrelated to the first breach. For example, an owner who waives the right to sue for late completion of a stage of construction does not waive the right to sue for failure to comply with engineering specifications on the same job.

A waiver will be extended to subsequent defective performance, however, if a reasonable person would conclude that similar defective performance in the future will be acceptable. Therefore, a pattern of conduct that waives a number of successive breaches will operate as a continued waiver. To change this result, the nonbreaching party should give notice to the breaching party that full performance will be required in the future.

The party who has rendered defective or less-than-full performance remains liable for the damages caused by the breach of contract. In effect, the waiver operates to keep the contract going. The waiver prevents the nonbreaching party from declaring the contract at an end or rescinding the contract. The contract continues, but the nonbreaching party can recover damages caused by the defective or less-than-full performance.

CONTRACT PROVISIONS LIMITING REMEDIES

A contract may include provisions stating that no damages can be recovered for certain types of breaches or that damages will be limited to a maximum amount. The contract may also provide that the only remedy for breach is replacement, repair, or refund of the purchase price. Provisions stating that no damages can be recovered are called exculpatory clauses (see Chapter 13 on page 268). Provisions that affect the availability of certain remedies are called limitation-of-liability clauses.

The UCC Allows Sales Contracts to Limit Remedies

The UCC provides that in a contract for the sale of goods, remedies can be limited. We will examine the UCC provisions on limited remedies in Chapter 21, in the context of the remedies available on the breach of a contract for the sale or lease of goods.¹⁶

Enforceability of Limitation-of-Liability Clauses

Whether a limitation-of-liability clause in a contract will be enforced depends on the type of breach that is excused by the provision. For example, a provision excluding liability for fraudulent or intentional injury will not be enforced. Likewise, a clause excluding liability for illegal acts, acts that are contrary to public policy, or violations of law will not be enforced.

CASE IN POINT Engineering Consulting Services, Ltd. (ECS), contracted with RSN Properties, Inc, a real estate developer, to perform soil studies for $2,200 and render an opinion on the use of septic systems in a particular subdivision being developed. A clause in the contract limited ECS's liability to RSN to the value of the engineering services or the sum of $50,000, whichever was greater. ECS concluded that most of the lots were suitable for septic systems. RSN proceeded with the development in reliance on ECS's conclusions, which turned out to be incorrect. RSN filed a breach of contract lawsuit against ECS and argued that the limitation of liability was against public policy and unenforceable. The court, however, held that the "contract represented a reasonable allocation of risks in an arm's-length business transaction, and did not violate public policy for professional engineering practice." The court therefore enforced the limitation-of-liability clause.¹⁷

A clause that excludes liability for negligence may be enforced in some situations when the parties have roughly equal bargaining positions.¹⁸ If the limitation-of-liability clause is contained in a contract between persons with unequal bargaining power or is part of an adhesion contract, then it may not be enforced.

REVIEWING

Breach of Contract and Remedies

Kyle Bruno enters a contract with X Entertainment to be a stuntman in a movie. Bruno is widely known as the best motorcycle stuntman in the business, and the movie to be produced, Xtreme Riders, has numerous scenes involving high-speed freestyle street-bike stunts. Filming is set to begin August 1 and end by December 1 so that the film can be released the following summer. Both parties to the contract have stipulated that the filming must end on time to capture the profits from the summer movie market. The contract states that Bruno will be paid 10 percent of the net proceeds from the movie for his stunts. The contract also includes a liquidated damages provision, which specifies that if Bruno breaches the contract, he will owe X Entertainment $1 million. In addition, the contract includes a limitation-of-liability clause stating that if Bruno is injured during filming, X Entertainment's liability is limited to nominal damages. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. One day, while Bruno is preparing for a difficult stunt, he gets into an argument with the director and refuses to perform any stunts at all. Can X Entertainment seek specific performance of the contract? Why or why not?
2. Suppose that while performing a high-speed wheelie on a motorcycle, Bruno is injured by the intentionally reckless act of an X Entertainment employee. Will a court be likely to enforce the limitation-of-liability clause? Why or why not?
3. What factors would a court consider to determine whether the $1 million liquidated damages provision constitutes valid damages or is a penalty?
4. Suppose that the contract had no liquidated damages provision (or the court refused to enforce it) and X Entertainment breached the contract. The breach caused the release of the film to be delayed until the fall. Could Bruno seek consequential (special) damages for lost profits from the summer movie market in that situation? Explain.

 DEBATE THIS: Courts should always uphold limitation-of-liability clauses, whether or not the two parties to the contract had equal bargaining power.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

18-1. Liquidated Damages Cohen contracts to sell his house and lot to Windsor for $100,000. The terms of the contract call for Windsor to pay 10 percent of the purchase price as a deposit toward the purchase price, or a down payment. The terms further stipulate that if the buyer breaches the contract, Cohen will retain the deposit as liquidated damages. Windsor pays the deposit, but because her expected financing of the $90,000 balance falls through, she breaches the contract. Two weeks later Cohen sells the house and lot to Ballard for $105,000. Windsor demands her $10,000 back, but Cohen refuses, claiming that Windsor's breach and the contract terms entitle him to keep the deposit. Discuss who is correct.

18-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Specific Performance.

In which of the following situations would specific performance be an appropriate remedy? Discuss fully.

- (a) Thompson contracts to sell her house and lot to Cousteau. Then, on finding another buyer willing to pay a higher purchase price, she refuses to deed the property to Cousteau.
 - (b) Amy contracts to sing and dance in Fred's nightclub for one month, beginning May 1. She then refuses to perform.
 - (c) Hoffman contracts to purchase a rare coin owned by Erikson, who is breaking up his coin collection. At the last minute, Erikson decides to keep his coin collection intact and refuses to deliver the coin to Hoffman.
 - (d) ABC Corp. has three shareholders: Panozzo, who owns 48 percent of the stock; Chang, who owns another 48 percent; and Ryan, who owns 4 percent. Ryan contracts to sell her 4 percent to Chang. Later, Ryan refuses to transfer the shares to Chang.
- For a sample answer to Question 18-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

18-3. Mitigation of Damages Lauren Barton, a single mother with three children, lived in Portland, Oregon. Cynthia VanHorn also lived in Oregon until she moved to New York City to open and operate an art gallery. VanHorn asked Barton to manage the gallery under a one-year contract for an annual salary of $72,000. To begin work, Barton relocated to New York. As part of the move, Barton transferred custody of her children to her husband, who lived in London, England. In accepting the job, Barton also forfeited her husband's alimony and child-support payments, including unpaid amounts of nearly $30,000. Before Barton started work, VanHorn repudiated the contract. Unable to find employment for more than an annual salary of $25,000, Barton moved to London to be near her children. Barton filed a suit in an Oregon state court against VanHorn, seeking damages for breach of contract. Should the court hold, as VanHorn argued, that Barton did not take reasonable steps to mitigate her damages? Why or why not?

18-4. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Damages.

Tyna Ek met Russell Peterson in Seattle, Washington. Peterson persuaded Ek to buy a boat that he had once owned, the O'Hana Kai, which was in Juneau, Alaska. Ek paid $43,000 for the boat, and in January 2000, the parties entered into a contract. In the contract, Peterson agreed to make the vessel seaworthy so that within one month it could be transported to Seattle, where he would pay its moorage costs. He would also renovate the boat at his own expense in return for a portion of the profit on its resale in 2001. At the time of the resale, Ek would recover her costs, after which she would reimburse Peterson for his expenses. Ek loaned Peterson her cell phone so that they could communicate while he prepared the vessel for the trip to Seattle. In March, Peterson, who was still in Alaska, borrowed $4,000 from Ek. Two months later, Ek began to receive unanticipated, unauthorized bills for vessel parts and moorage, the use of her phone, and charges on her credit card. She went to Juneau to take possession of the boat. Peterson moved it to Petersburg, Alaska, where he registered it under a false name, and then to Taku Harbor, where the police seized it. Ek filed a suit in an Alaska state court against Peterson, alleging breach of contract and seeking damages. If the court finds in Ek's favor, what should her damages include? Discuss. [Peterson v. Ek, 93 P.3d 458 (Alaska 2004)]

18-5. Waiver of Breach In May 1998, RDP Royal Palm Hotel, L.P., contracted with Clark Construction Group, Inc., to build the Royal Palms Crowne Plaza Resort in Miami Beach, Florida. The deadline for "substantial completion" was February 28, 2000, but RDP could ask for changes, and the date would be adjusted accordingly. During construction, Clark faced many setbacks, including a buried seawall, contaminated soil, the unforeseen deterioration of the existing hotel, and RDP's issue of hundreds of change orders. Clark requested extensions of the deadline, and RDP agreed, but the parties never specified a date. After the original deadline passed, RDP continued to issue change orders, Clark continued to perform, and RDP accepted the work. In March 2002, when the resort was substantially complete, RDP stopped paying Clark. Clark stopped working. RDP hired another contractor to finish the resort, which opened in May. RDP filed a suit in a federal district court against Clark, alleging, among other things, breach of contract for the two-year delay in the resort's completion. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? Discuss. [RDP Royal Palm Hotel, L.P. v. Clark Construction Group, Inc., ___ F.3d ___ (11th Cir. 2006)]

18-6. Remedies On July 7, 2000, Frances Morelli agreed to sell to Judith Bucklin a house at 126 Lakedell Drive in Warwick, Rhode Island, for $77,000. Bucklin made a deposit on the house. The closing at which the parties would exchange the deed for the price was scheduled for September 1. The agreement did not state that “time is of the essence,” but it did provide, in “Paragraph 10,” that “[i]f Seller is unable to [convey good, clear, insurable, and marketable title], Buyer shall have the option to: (a) accept such title as Seller is able to convey without abatement or reduction of the Purchase Price, or (b) cancel this Agreement and receive a return of all Deposits.” An examination of the public records revealed that the house did not have marketable title. Wishing to be flexible, Bucklin offered Morelli time to resolve the problem, and the closing did not occur as scheduled. Morelli decided “the deal is over” and offered to return the deposit. Bucklin refused and, in mid-October, decided to exercise her option under Paragraph 10(a). She notified Morelli, who did not respond. Bucklin filed a suit in a Rhode Island state court against Morelli. In whose favor should the court rule? Should damages be awarded? If not, what is the appropriate remedy? Why? [Bucklin v. Morelli, 912 A.2d 931 (R.I. 2007)]

18-7. Quasi Contract Middleton Motors, Inc., a struggling Ford dealership in Madison, Wisconsin, sought managerial and financial assistance from Lindquist Ford, Inc., a successful Ford dealership in Bettendorf, Iowa. While the two dealerships negotiated the terms for the services and a cash infusion, Lindquist sent Craig Miller, its general manager, to assume control of Middleton. After about a year, the parties had not agreed on the terms, Lindquist had not invested any money, Middleton had not made a profit, and Miller was fired without being paid. Lindquist and Miller filed a suit in a federal district court against Middleton based on quasi contract, seeking to recover Miller’s pay for his time. What are the requirements to recover on a theory of quasi-contract? Which of these requirements is most likely to be disputed in this case? Why? [Lindquist Ford, Inc. v. Middleton Motors, Inc., 557 F.3d 469 (7th Cir. 2009)]

18-8. Liquidated Damages and Penalties Planned Pethood Plus, Inc., is a veterinarian-owned clinic. It borrowed $389,000 from KeyBank at an interest rate of 9.3 percent per year for ten years. The loan had a “prepayment penalty” clause that clearly stated that if the loan was repaid early, a specific formula would be used to assess a lump-sum payment to extinguish the obligation. The sooner the loan was paid off, the higher the prepayment penalty. After a year, the veterinarians decided to pay off the loan. KeyBank invoked a prepayment penalty of $40,525.92, which was equal to 10.7 percent of the balance due. The veterinarians sued, contending that the prepayment requirement was unenforceable because it was a penalty. The bank countered that the amount was not a penalty but liquidated damages and that the sum was reasonable. The trial court agreed with the bank, and the veterinarians appealed. Was the loan’s prepayment charge reasonable, and should it have been enforced? Why or why not? [Planned Pethood Plus, Inc. v. KeyCorp, Inc., 228 P.3d 262 (Colo.App. 2010)]

18-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Remedies.

In 2004, Tamara Cohen, a real estate broker, began showing property in Manhattan to Steven Galistinos, who represented comedian Jerry Seinfeld and his wife, Jessica. According to Cohen, she told Galistinos that her commission would be 5 or 6 percent, and he agreed. According to Galistinos, there was no such agreement. Cohen spoke with Maximilian Sanchez, another broker, about a townhouse owned by Ray and Harriet Mayeri. According to Cohen, Sanchez said that the commission would be 6 percent, which they agreed to split equally. Sanchez later acknowledged that they had agreed to split the fee, but claimed that they had not discussed a specific amount. On a Friday in February 2005, Cohen showed the townhouse to Jessica. According to Cohen, she told Jessica that the commission would be 6 percent, with the Seinfelds paying half, and Jessica agreed. According to Jessica, there was no such conversation. Later that day, Galistinos asked Cohen to arrange for the Seinfelds to see the premises again. Cohen told Galistinos that her religious beliefs prevented her from showing property on Friday evenings or Saturdays before sundown. She suggested the following Monday or Tuesday, but Galistinos said that Jerry would not be available and asked her to contact Carolyn Liebling, Jerry’s business manager. Cohen left Liebling a message. Over the weekend, the Seinfelds toured the building on their own and agreed to buy the property for $3.95 million. Despite repeated attempts, they were unable to contact Cohen. [Cohen v. Seinfeld, 15 Misc.3d 1118(A), 839 N.Y.S.2d 432 (Sup. 2007)]

- (a) The contract between the Seinfelds and the Mayeris stated that the sellers would pay Sanchez’s fee and the “buyers will pay buyer’s real estate broker’s fees.” The Mayeris paid Sanchez $118,500, which is 3 percent of $3.95 million. The Seinfelds refused to pay Cohen. She filed a suit in a New York state court against them, asserting, among other things, breach of contract. Should the court order the Seinfelds to pay Cohen? If so, is she entitled to a full commission even though she was not available to show the townhouse when the Seinfelds wanted to see it? Explain.
- (b) What obligation do parties involved in business deals owe to each other with respect to their religious beliefs? How might the situation in this case have been avoided?

UNIT THREE • FOCUS ON ETHICS

Contract Law and the Application of Ethics

Generally, as you read in Chapter 5, a responsible business manager will evaluate a business transaction on the basis of three criteria—legality, profitability, and ethics. But what does acting ethically mean in the area of contracts? If you enter into a contract with an individual who fails to look after her or his own interests, is that your fault? Should you be doing something about it? If the contract happens to be to your advantage and to the other party's detriment, do you have a responsibility to correct the situation?

Suppose that your neighbor puts a "For sale" sign on her car and offers to sell it for $6,000. You learn that she is moving to another state and needs the extra cash to help finance the move. You know that she could easily get $10,000 for the car, and you consider purchasing it and then reselling it at a profit. But you also discover that your neighbor is completely unaware that she has priced the car significantly below its Blue Book value. Are you ethically obligated to tell her that she is essentially giving away $4,000 if she sells you the car for only $6,000?

This kind of situation, transplanted into the world of commercial transactions, raises an obvious question: At what point should the sophisticated businessperson cease looking after his own economic welfare and become "his brother's keeper," so to speak?

Freedom of Contract and Freedom from Contract

The answer to the question just raised is not simple. On the one hand, a common ethical assumption in our society is that individuals should be held responsible for the consequences of their own actions, including their contractual promises. This principle is expressed in the legal concept of freedom of contract. On the other hand, another common assumption in our society is that individuals should not harm one another by their actions. This is the basis of both tort law and criminal law.

In the area of contract law, ethical behavior often involves balancing these principles. In the above example, if you purchased the car and your neighbor later learned its true value and sued you for the difference, very likely no court of law would find that the contract should be rescinded. At times, however, courts will hold that the principle of freedom of contract should give way to the principle of freedom from contract, a doctrine based on the assumption that people should not be harmed by the actions of others. We look next at some examples of situations in which parties to contracts may be excused from performance under their contracts to prevent injustice.

Impossibility of Performance The doctrine of impossibility of performance is based to some extent on the ethical question of whether one party should suffer economic loss when it is impossible to perform a contract. The rule that one is "bound by his or her contracts" is not followed when performance becomes impossible. This doctrine, however, is applied only when the parties themselves did not consciously assume the risk of the events that rendered performance impossible. Furthermore, this doctrine rests on the assumption that the party claiming the defense of impossibility has acted ethically.

A contract is discharged, for example, if it calls for the delivery of a particular car and, through no fault of either party, this car is stolen and completely demolished in an accident. Yet the doctrine would not excuse performance if the party who agreed to sell the car caused its destruction by her or his negligence.

Before the late nineteenth century, courts were reluctant to discharge a contract even when performance was literally impossible. Just as society's ethics changes with the passage of time, however, the law also changes to reflect society's new perceptions of ethical behavior.¹ Today, courts are much more willing to discharge a contract when its performance has become literally impossible. Holding a party in breach of contract, when performance has become impossible through no fault of that party, no longer coincides with society's notions of fairness.

Unconscionability The doctrine of unconscionability is a good example of how the law attempts to enforce ethical behavior. Under this doctrine, a contract may be deemed to be so unfair to one party as to be unenforceable—even though that party voluntarily agreed to the contract's terms. Unconscionable action, like unethical action, defies precise definition. Information about the particular facts and specific circumstances surrounding the contract is essential. For example, a court might find that a contract made with a marginally literate consumer was unfair and unenforceable but might uphold the same contract made with a major business firm.

Section 2-302 of the Uniform Commercial Code, which incorporates the common law concept of unconscionability, similarly does not define the concept with any precision. Rather, it leaves it to the courts to determine when a contract is so one sided and unfair to one party as to be unconscionable and thus unenforceable.

Usually, courts will do all that they can to save contracts rather than render them unenforceable. Only in extreme situations, as when a contract or clause is so one sided as to "shock the conscience" of the court, will a court hold a contract or contractual clause unconscionable.

1. A leading English case in which the court held that a defendant was discharged from the duty to perform due to impossibility of performance is Taylor v. Caldwell, 122 Eng.Rep. 309 (K.B. [King's Bench] 1863).

Exculpatory Clauses In some situations, courts have also refused to enforce exculpatory clauses on the ground that they are unconscionable or contrary to public policy. An exculpatory clause attempts to excuse a party from liability in the event of monetary or physical injury, no matter who is at fault. In some situations, such clauses are upheld. Generally, the law permits parties to assume, by express agreement, the risks inherent in certain activities. For example, a health club can require its members to sign a clause releasing the club from any liability for injuries the members might incur while using the club's equipment and facilities. Likewise, an exculpatory clause releasing a ski resort from liability for skiing accidents would likely be enforced.² In such situations, exculpatory clauses make it possible for a firm's owner to stay in business—by shifting some of the liability risks from the business to the customer.

Nonetheless, some jurisdictions take a dubious view of exculpatory clauses, particularly when the agreement is between parties with unequal bargaining power, such as a landlord and a tenant or an employer and an employee. Frequently, courts will hold that an exculpatory clause that attempts to exempt an employer from all liability for negligence toward its employees is against public policy and thus void.³ The courts reason that disparity in bargaining power and economic necessity force the employee to accept the employer's terms. Also, if a plaintiff can prove that an exculpatory clause is ambiguous, the courts generally will not enforce the clause.⁴

Covenants Not to Compete

In today's complicated, technological business world, knowledge learned on the job, including trade secrets, has become a valuable commodity. To prevent this knowledge from falling into the hands of competitors, more and more employers are requiring their employees to sign covenants not to compete. The increasing number of lawsuits over noncompete clauses in employment contracts has caused many courts to reconsider the reasonableness of these covenants.

Generally, the courts have few problems with enforcing a covenant not to compete that is ancillary to the sale of a business as long as the covenant's terms are reasonable. After all, part of what is being sold is the business's reputation and goodwill. If, after the sale, the seller opens a competing business nearby, the value of the original business to the purchaser could be greatly diminished.

More difficult for the courts is determining whether covenants not to compete in the employment context should be enforced. Often, this determination involves balancing the interests of the employer against the interests of the employee. Employers have a legitimate interest in protecting their trade secrets, customer lists, and other knowledge key to their businesses' success from falling into the hands of competitors. At the same time, employees should not be unreasonably restricted in their ability to work in their chosen profession or trade. Inevitably, issues of fairness arise in deciding such issues.

Jurisdictional Differences in Enforcement Jurisdictions vary in their approach to covenants not to compete. Many jurisdictions will enforce noncompete covenants in the employment context if (1) the limitations placed on an employee are reasonable as to time and geographic area, and (2) the limitations do not impose a greater restraint than necessary to protect the goodwill or other business interests of the employer.⁵ In a number of jurisdictions, if a court finds that a restraint in a noncompete covenant is not reasonable in light of the circumstances, it will reform the unreasonable provision and then enforce it. For example, a court might rewrite an unreasonable restriction by reducing the time period during which a former employee cannot compete from three years to one year and then enforce the reformed agreement.⁶

Other jurisdictions are not so "employer friendly" and refuse to enforce unreasonable covenants. Under California law, covenants not to compete are illegal, as are a number of other types of agreements that have a similar effect.⁷ Other western states also tend to regard noncompete covenants with suspicion. For example, the Washington Supreme Court has refused to reform noncompete covenants that are unreasonable and lacking in consideration.⁸

Courts in Arizona and Texas have reached similar conclusions.⁹

Do Noncompete Covenants Stifle Innovation? One of the reasons that the courts usually look closely at covenants not to compete and evaluate them on a case-by-case basis is the strong public policy favoring competition in this country. Some scholars claim that covenants not to compete, regardless of how reasonable they are, may stifle competition and innovation.

Consider, for example, the argument put forth some years ago by Ronald Gilson, a Stanford University professor of law and business. He contended that California's prohibition on covenants not to compete helped to explain why technological innovation and economic growth skyrocketed in California's Silicon Valley in the late 1990s, while technological development along Massachusetts's Route 128 languished during the same time period. According to Gilson, the different legal rules regarding covenants not to compete in California and Massachusetts were a "critical" factor in explaining why one area saw so much innovation and transfer of technology knowledge and the other area did not.¹⁰

Oral Contracts and Promissory Estoppel

Oral contracts are made every day. Many—if not most—of them are carried out, and no problems arise. Occasionally, however, oral contracts are not performed, and one party decides to sue the other. Sometimes, to prevent injustice, the courts will enforce oral contracts under the theory of promissory estoppel. Ethical standards certainly underlie this doctrine, under which a person who has reasonably relied on the promise of another to his or her detriment can often obtain some measure of recovery. Essentially, promissory estoppel allows a variety of oral promises to be enforced even though they lack what is formally regarded as consideration.

An oral promise made by an insurance agent to a business owner, for example, may be binding if the owner relies on that promise to her or his detriment. Employees who rely to their detriment on an employer's promise may be able to recover under the doctrine of promissory estoppel. A contractor who, when bidding for a job, relies on a subcontractor's promise to perform certain construction work at a certain price may be able to recover, on the basis of promissory estoppel, any damages sustained because of the subcontractor's failure to perform. These are but a few of the many examples in which the courts, in the interests of fairness and justice, have estopped a promisor from denying that a contract existed.

Oral Contracts and the Statute of Frauds

The courts sometimes use the theory of promissory estoppel to remove a contract from the Statute of Frauds. As you learned in Chapter 15, the Statute of Frauds was originally enacted in England in 1677. The act was intended to prevent harm to innocent parties by requiring written evidence of agreements concerning important transactions.

Until the Statute of Frauds was passed, the English courts had enforced oral contracts on the strength of oral testimony by witnesses. Under these conditions, it was not too difficult to evade justice by procuring "convincing" witnesses to support the claim that a contract had been created and then breached. The possibility of fraud in such actions was enhanced by the fact that seventeenth-century English courts did not allow oral testimony to be given by the parties to a lawsuit—or by any parties with an interest in the litigation, such as husbands or wives. Defense against actions for breach of contract was thus limited to written evidence or the testimony of third parties.

Detrimental Reliance Under the Statute of Frauds, if a contract is oral when it is required to be in writing, it will not, as a rule, be enforced by the courts. An exception to this rule is made if a party has reasonably relied, to his or her detriment, on the oral contract. Enforcing an oral contract on the basis of a party's reliance arguably undercuts the essence of the Statute of Frauds. The reason that such an exception is made is to prevent the statute—which was created to prevent injustice—from being used to promote injustice. Nevertheless, this use of the doctrine is controversial—as is the Statute of Frauds itself.

Criticisms of the Statute of Frauds Since its inception more than three hundred years ago, the statute has been criticized by some because, although it was created to protect the innocent, it can also be used as a technical defense by a party breaching a genuine, mutually agreed-on oral contract—if the contract falls within the Statute of Frauds. For this reason, some legal scholars believe the act has caused more injustice than it has prevented. Thus, exceptions are sometimes made—such as under the doctrine of promissory estoppel—to prevent unfairness and inequity. Generally, the courts are slow to apply the statute if doing so will result in obvious injustice. In some instances, this has required a good deal of inventiveness on the part of the courts.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Suppose that you contract to purchase steel at a fixed price per ton. Before the contract is performed, a lengthy steelworkers' strike causes the price of steel to triple from the price specified in the contract. If you demand that the supplier fulfill the contract, the supplier will go out of business. What are your ethical obligations in this situation? What are your legal rights?
2. Many countries have no Statute of Frauds, and even England, the country that created the original act, has repealed it. Should the United States do likewise? What are some of the costs and benefits to society of the Statute of Frauds?
3. In determining whether an exculpatory clause should be enforced, why does it matter whether the contract containing the clause involves essential services (such as transportation) or nonessential services (such as skiing or other leisure-time activities)?
4. Employers often include covenants not to compete in employment contracts to protect their trade secrets. What effect, if any, will the growth in e-commerce have on the reasonability of covenants not to compete?

CHAPTER 19

The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

When we turn to contracts for the sale and lease of goods, we move away from common law principles and into the area of statutory law. State statutory law governing sales and lease transactions is based on the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), which, as mentioned in Chapter 1, has been adopted as law by all of the states.¹

1. Louisiana has not adopted Articles 2 and 2A, however.

We open this chapter with a discussion of the UCC's Article 2 (on sales) and Article 2A (on leases) as a background to the topic of this chapter, which is the formation of contracts for the sale and lease of goods. The goal of the UCC is to simplify and to streamline commercial transactions, allowing parties to form sales and lease contracts without observing the same degree of formality used in forming other types of contracts.

Today, businesses often engage in sales and lease transactions on a global scale. Because international sales transactions are increasingly commonplace, we conclude the chapter with an examination of the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG), which governs international sales contracts. The CISG is a model uniform law that applies only when a nation has adopted it, just as the UCC applies only to the extent that it has been adopted by a state.

SECTION 1

THE UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE

In the early years of this nation, sales law varied from state to state, and this lack of uniformity complicated the formation of multistate sales contracts. The problems became especially troublesome in the late nineteenth century as multistate contracts became the norm. For this reason, numerous attempts were made to produce a uniform body of laws relating to commercial transactions. The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL) drafted two uniform ("model") acts that were widely adopted by the states: the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law (1896) and the Uniform Sales Act (1906). Several other proposed uniform acts followed, although most were not as widely adopted.

In the 1940s, the NCCUSL recognized the need to integrate the half dozen or so uniform acts covering commercial transactions into a single, comprehensive body of statutory law. The NCCUSL developed the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) to serve that purpose. First issued in 1949, the UCC facilitates commercial transactions by making the laws governing sales and lease contracts clearer, simpler, and more readily applicable to the numerous difficulties that can arise during such transactions.

Comprehensive Coverage of the UCC

The UCC is the single most comprehensive codification of the broad spectrum of laws involved in a total commercial transaction. The UCC views the entire "commercial transaction for the sale of and payment for goods" as a single legal occurrence having numerous facets.

You can gain an idea of the UCC's comprehensiveness by looking at the titles of the articles of the UCC in Appendix C. As you will note, Article 1, titled General Provisions, sets forth definitions and general principles applicable to commercial transactions, including an obligation to perform in "good faith” all contracts falling under the UCC [UCC 1–304]. Article 1 thus provides the basic groundwork for the remaining articles, each of which focuses on a particular aspect of commercial transactions.

A Single, Integrated Framework for Commercial Transactions

The UCC attempts to provide a consistent and integrated framework of rules to deal with all the phases ordinarily arising in a commercial sales transaction from start to finish. A simple example will illustrate how several articles of the UCC can apply to a single commercial transaction. Suppose that a consumer—a person who purchases goods primarily for personal or household use—buys a stainless steel bottom-freezer refrigerator from an appliance store. The consumer agrees to pay for the refrigerator on an installment plan.

Because the transaction involves a contract for the sale of goods, Article 2 will apply. If the consumer gives a check as the down payment on the purchase price, it will be negotiated and ultimately passed through one or more banks for collection. This process is the subject matter of Article 3, Negotiable Instruments, and Article 4, Bank Deposits and Collections. If the appliance store extends credit to the consumer through an installment plan, it may retain a lien (a legal right or interest) on the refrigerator (the collateral, which is the property pledged as security against a debt). If so, then Article 9, Secured Transactions, will be applicable (secured transactions will be discussed in detail in Chapter 29).

Suppose, in addition, that the appliance company must obtain the refrigerator from the manufacturer’s warehouse before shipping it by common carrier to the consumer. The storage and shipment of goods are the subject matter of Article 7, Documents of Title. To pay the manufacturer, which is located in another state, for the refrigerator supplied, the appliance company may use a letter of credit—the subject matter of Article 5.

Periodic Revisions of the UCC

Various articles and sections of the UCC are periodically revised or supplemented to clarify certain rules or to establish new rules when changes in business customs have rendered the existing UCC provisions inapplicable. For example, because of the increasing importance of leases of goods in the commercial context, Article 2A, governing leases, was added to the UCC. To clarify the rights of parties to commercial fund transfers, particularly electronic fund transfers, Article 4A was issued.

Articles 3 and 4, covering negotiable instruments and banking, underwent a significant revision in the 1990s, as did Articles 5, 8, and 9. Because of other changes in business practices and in the law, the NCCUSL has recommended the repeal of Article 6 (on bulk transfers) and has offered a revised Article 6 to those states that prefer not to repeal it. Article 1 was revised in 2001, and the NCCUSL approved amendments to Articles 3 and 4 in 2002.

SECTION 2

THE SCOPE OF ARTICLE 2— THE SALE OF GOODS

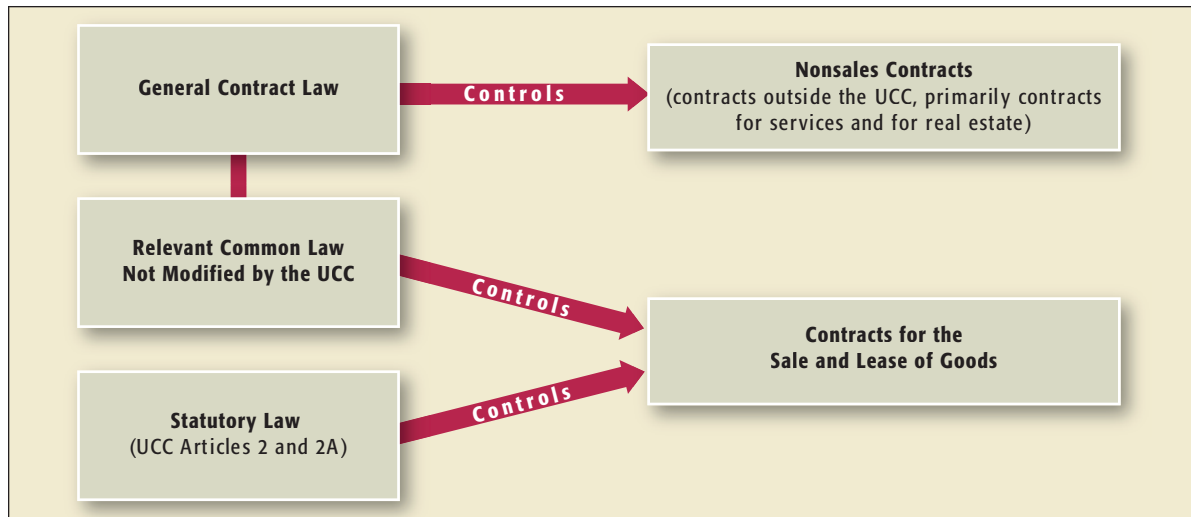

Article 2 of the UCC (as adopted by state statutes) governs sales contracts, or contracts for the sale of goods. To facilitate commercial transactions, Article 2 modifies some of the common law contract requirements that were discussed in the previous chapters. To the extent that it has not been modified by the UCC, however, the common law of contracts also applies to sales contracts. For example, the common law requirements for a valid contract—agreement (offer and acceptance), consideration, capacity, and legality—that were summarized in Chapter 10 and discussed at length in Chapters 11 through 13 are also applicable to sales contracts. Thus, you should reexamine these common law principles when studying the law of sales.

In general, the rule is that whenever a conflict arises between a common law contract rule and the state statutory law based on the UCC, the UCC controls. In other words, when a UCC provision addresses a certain issue, the UCC rule governs; when the UCC is silent, the common law governs. The relationship between general contract law and the law governing sales of goods is illustrated in Exhibit 19–1 on the following page.

In regard to Article 2, keep two points in mind. First, Article 2 deals with the sale of goods; it does not deal with real property (real estate), services, or intangible property such as stocks and bonds. Thus, if the subject matter of a dispute is goods, the UCC governs. If it is real estate or services, the common law applies. Second, in some situations, the rules may vary quite a bit, depending on whether the buyer or the seller is a merchant. We look now at how the UCC defines a sale, goods, and merchant status.

EXHIBIT 19-1 • The Law Governing Contracts

This exhibit graphically illustrates the relationship between general contract law and statutory law (UCC Articles 2 and 2A) governing contracts for the sale and lease of goods. Sales contracts are not governed exclusively by Article 2 of the UCC but are also governed by general contract law whenever it is relevant and has not been modified by the UCC.

What Is a Sale?

The UCC defines a sale as “the passing of title [evidence of ownership rights] from the seller to the buyer for a price” [UCC 2–106(1)]. The price may be payable in cash or in other goods or services.

What Are Goods?

To be characterized as a good, an item of property must be tangible, and it must be movable. Tangible property has physical existence—it can be touched or seen. Intangible property—such as corporate stocks and bonds, patents and copyrights, and ordinary contract rights—has only conceptual existence and thus does not come under Article 2. A movable item can be carried from place to place. Hence, real estate is excluded from Article 2.

Two areas in particular give rise to disputes over whether the object of a contract is goods and thus whether Article 2 is applicable. One problem concerns goods associated with real estate, such as crops or timber, and the other concerns contracts involving a combination of goods and services.

GOODS ASSOCIATED WITH REAL ESTATE Goods associated with real estate often fall within the scope of Article 2. Section 2–107 provides the following rules:

1. A contract for the sale of minerals or the like (including oil and gas) or a structure (such as a building) is a contract for the sale of goods if severance, or separation, is to be made by the seller. If the buyer is to sever (separate) the minerals or structures from the land, the contract is considered to be a sale of real estate governed by the principles of real property law, not the UCC.

2. A sale of growing crops (such as potatoes, carrots, and wheat) or timber to be cut is a contract for the sale of goods regardless of who severs them.
3. Other “things attached” to real property but capable of severance (separation) without material harm to the land are considered to be goods regardless of who severs them.² Examples of “things attached” that are severable without harm to realty include a window air conditioner in a house and tables and stools in a restaurant. Thus, the removal and sale of these items would be considered a sale of goods. The test is whether removal will cause substantial harm to the real property to which the item is attached.

CASE IN POINT Homeowners in Colorado installed underground radiant heating systems to warm indoor flooring or melt snow and ice under driveways and sidewalks. When the systems began to leak as a result of the hardening of a hose called Entran II, the homeowners filed a lawsuit against the maker of the systems and against Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, the maker of the hose. The homeowners asserted various contract claims under Colorado's version of the UCC. Goodyear argued that the UCC did not apply because Entran II was used in the construction of underground systems that were covered by flooring or cement, and thus the hose was not a "good." The court, however, ruled that because the hose was an existing and movable good at the time the contract was made, it was a "good" under the UCC. The UCC applied to the contract even though Entran II was later incorporated into real property (under flooring).³

2. The UCC avoids the term fixtures here because of the numerous definitions of the word. In general, a fixture is anything so firmly or permanently attached to land or to a building as to become a part of it. Once personal property becomes a fixture, real estate law governs. See Chapter 50.

GOODS AND SERVICES COMBINED In cases involving contracts in which goods and services are combined, courts have reached different results. For example, is providing blood to a patient during an operation a "sale of goods" or the "performance of a medical service"? Some courts say it is a good; others say it is a service. Because the UCC does not provide the answers to such questions, the courts generally use the predominant-factor test to determine whether a contract is primarily for the sale of goods or for the sale of services.⁴ This determination is important because if a court decides that a mixed contract is primarily a goods contract, any dispute, even a dispute over the services portion, will be decided under the UCC. Likewise, any disagreement over a predominantly services contract will not be decided using the UCC, even if the dispute involves the goods portion of the contract.

For example, an accounting firm contracts to purchase customized software from Micro Systems. The contract states that half of the purchase price is for Micro's professional services and the other half is for the goods (the software). If a court determines that the contract is predominantly for the software, rather than the services to customize the software, the court will hold that the transaction falls under Article 2. Conversely, if the court finds that the services are predominant, it will hold that the transaction is not governed by the UCC.

If an entire business—including a truck and its equipment—is sold, but the contract does not specify what portion of the sale price relates to the goods, does Article 2 of the UCC still apply to the transaction? That was the main issue in the following case.

3. Loughridge v. Goodyear Tire and Rubber Co., 192 F.Supp.2d 1175 (D.Colo. 2002).

4. UCC 2-314(1) does stipulate that serving food or drinks is a "sale of goods" for purposes of the implied warranty of merchantability, as will be discussed in Chapter 22. The UCC also specifies that selling unborn animals or rare coins qualifies as a "sale of goods."

CASE 19.1 Jannusch v. Naffziger

Appellate Court of Illinois, Fourth District, 379 Ill.App.3d 381, 883 N.E.2d 711 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Gene and Martha Jannusch ran Festival Foods, which provided concessions at events around Illinois and Indiana. They owned a truck, a trailer, freezers, roasters, chairs, tables, a fountain service, signs, and lighting. Lindsey and Louann Naffziger were interested in buying the concessions business. They met with the Jannusches and orally agreed to a price of $150,000. The Naffzigers paid $10,000 down with the balance to come from a bank loan. They took possession of the equipment and began to use it immediately in Festival Foods operations at various events, even though Gene Jannusch kept the titles to the truck and trailer in his name. Gene Jannusch was paid to attend two events with the Naffzigers to provide advice about running the operation. After six events, and at the end of the outdoor season, the Naffzigers returned the truck and all the equipment to its storage location and wanted out of the deal. They said the business did not generate as much income as they expected. The Jannusches sued the Naffzigers for the balance due on the purchase price. The trial court held that the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) governed the case but that there was not enough evidence to show that the parties had a sufficient meeting of the minds to form a contract. The Jannusches appealed.

Charles J. REYNARD, Judge Presiding.

* * * *

Defendants [the Naffzigers] argue the UCC should not apply because this case involves the sale of a business rather than just the sale of goods. The “predominant purpose” test is used to determine whether a contract for both the sale of goods and the rendition of services falls within the scope of Article 2 of the UCC.

* * * *

Defendants argue that nothing was said in the contract about allocating a price for good will, a covenant not to compete, allocating a price for the equipment, how to release liens, what would happen if there was no loan approval, and other issues. Defendants argue these are essential terms for the sale of a business and the Internal Revenue Service requires that parties allocate the sales price. “None of these items were even discussed much less agreed to. There is not an enforceable agreement when there are so many essential terms missing. A contract may be enforced even though some contract terms may be missing or left to be agreed upon, but if the essential terms are so uncertain that there is no basis for deciding whether the agreement has been kept or broken, there is no contract.”

The essential terms were agreed upon in this case. The purchase price was $150,000, and the items to be transferred were specified. No essential terms remained to be agreed upon; the only action remaining was the performance of the contract. Defendants took possession of the items to be transferred and used them as their own. “Rejection of goods must be within a reasonable time after their delivery or tender. It is ineffective unless the buyer seasonably [within a reasonable amount of time] notifies the seller” [UCC 2–602(1)]. Defendants paid $10,000 of the purchase price. The fact that defendants were disappointed in the income from the events they operated is not inconsistent with the existence of a contract. [Emphasis added.]

The trial court noted that “the parties have very different views about what transpired in the course of the contract-formation discussions.” It is not necessary that the parties share a subjective understanding as to the terms of the contract; the parties’ conduct may indicate an agreement to the terms. The conduct in this case is clear. Parties discussing the sale of goods do not transfer those goods and allow them to be retained for a substantial period before reaching agreement. Defendants replaced equipment, reported income, paid taxes, and paid Gene for his time and expenses, all of which is inconsistent with the idea that defendants were only “pursuing buying the business.” An agreement to make an agreement is not an agreement, but there was clearly more than that here.

* * * The parties’ agreement could have been fleshed out with additional terms, but the essential terms were agreed upon. [Naffziger] admitted there was an agreement to purchase Festival Foods for $150,000 but could not recall specifically making an oral agreement on any particular date. “An agreement sufficient to constitute a contract for sale may be found even though the moment of its making is undetermined” [UCC 2–204(2)]. Returning the goods at the end of the season was not a rejection of plaintiffs’ offer to sell; it was a breach of contract. [Emphasis added.]

We conclude there was an agreement to sell Festival Foods for the price of $150,000 and that defendants breached that agreement. We reverse the circuit court’s judgment and remand for the entry of an order consistent with this opinion.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The appeals court reversed the decision of the trial court, finding that a contract had been formed under the UCC and that the Naffzigers had breached it. The primary value of the contract was in the goods, not the value of the business; the parties agreed on a price; and the Naffzigers took possession of the business. They had no right to return it.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the contract had stated that the truck and other equipment were worth $50,000 and the goodwill value of the business was worth $100,000. Would that have changed the outcome of this case? Why or why not?

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • This case illustrates how important it is to anticipate the factors that courts consider in determining whether Article 2 of the UCC applies. The facts of each situation are carefully considered. For example, even though the purchase of software may appear to be a purchase of goods, if the contract also provides for installing and modifying the software, a court might construe the contract as predominantly for services. For the managers involved in purchasing or selling the software, this would mean that the UCC does not apply, which may be a very important consideration in some transactions.

Who Is a Merchant?

Article 2 governs the sale of goods in general. It applies to sales transactions between all buyers and sellers. In a limited number of instances, though, the UCC presumes that special business standards ought to be imposed because of merchants' relatively high degree of commercial expertise.⁵ Such standards do not apply to the casual or inexperienced seller or buyer (consumer). Section 2-104 sets forth three ways in which merchant status can arise:

1. A merchant is a person who deals in goods of the kind involved in the sales contract. Thus, a retailer, a wholesaler, or a manufacturer is a merchant of the goods sold in his or her business. A merchant for one type of goods is not necessarily a merchant for another type. For example, a sporting goods retailer is a merchant when selling tennis rackets but not when selling a used computer.
2. A merchant is a person who, by occupation, holds himself or herself out as having knowledge and skill unique to the practices or goods involved in the transaction. This broad definition may include banks or universities as merchants.
3. A person who employs a merchant as a broker, agent, or other intermediary has the status of merchant in that transaction. Hence, if an art collector hires a broker to purchase or sell art for her, the collector is considered a merchant in the transaction.

In summary, a person is a merchant when she or he, acting in a mercantile capacity, possesses or uses an expertise specifically related to the goods being sold. This basic distinction is not always clear-cut. For example, state courts appear to be split on whether farmers should be considered merchants.⁶ In some states, courts have held that the drafters of the UCC did not intend to include farmers as merchants. In other states, farmers are considered merchants because they sell products or livestock on a regular basis.

CASE IN POINT Steve Hammer and Ron Howe placed 150 breeding heifers with Kevin Thompson for grazing. Thompson resold the cattle to Roger Morris, who then resold them to other parties. Hammer and Howe filed a lawsuit against Morris and others alleging conversion (see Chapter 6 on page 127). In his defense, Morris argued that he bought the cattle from Thompson, whom he believed was a cattle “order buyer,” meaning a middleman who purchases cattle specifically to resell them to others. A Kansas state court decided that because Thompson had previously acted as a cattle order buyer, he was a merchant, even though there had been a lapse of time between his order-buying transactions. Therefore, Thompson was held to the higher standard of conduct that is required of merchants under the UCC.⁷

THE SCOPE OF ARTICLE 2A—LEASES

In the past few decades, leases of personal property (goods) have become increasingly common. Consumers and business firms lease automobiles, industrial equipment, items for use in the home (such as floor polishers), and many other types of goods. Article 2A of the UCC was created to fill the need for uniform guidelines in this area. Article 2A covers any transaction that creates a lease of goods or a sublease of goods [UCC 2A-102, 2A-103(1)(k)]. Article 2A is essentially a repetition of Article 2, except that it applies to leases of goods rather than sales of goods and thus varies to reflect differences between sales and lease transactions. (Note that Article 2A is not concerned with leases of real property, such as land or buildings. The laws governing these types of transactions will be examined in Chapter 50.)

Definition of a Lease Agreement

Article 2A defines a lease agreement as a lessor and lessee's bargain with respect to the lease of goods, as found in their language and as implied by other circumstances [UCC 2A-103(1)(k)]. A lessor is one who transfers the right to the possession and use of goods under a lease [UCC 2A-103(1)(p)]. A lessee is one who acquires the right to the possession and use of goods under a lease [UCC 2A-103(1)(o)]. In other words, the lessee is the party who is leasing the goods from the lessor. Article 2A applies to all types of leases of goods. Special rules apply to certain types of leases, however, including consumer leases and finance leases.

5. The provisions that apply only to merchants deal principally with the Statute of Frauds, firm offers, confirmatory memoranda, warranties, and contract modification. These special rules reflect expedient business practices commonly known to merchants in the commercial setting. They will be discussed later in this chapter.
6. See one court's discussion of this issue in R. F. Cunningham & Co. v. Driscoll, 7 Misc.3d 234, 790 N.Y.S.2d 368 (2005).

7. Hammer v. Thompson, 35 Kan.App.2d 165, 129 P.3d 609 (2006).

Consumer Leases

A consumer lease involves three elements: (1) a lessor who regularly engages in the business of leasing or selling; (2) a lessee (except an organization) who leases the goods “primarily for a personal, family, or household purpose”; and (3) total lease payments that are less than $25,000 [UCC 2A–103(1)(e)]. In the interest of providing special protection for consumers, certain provisions of Article 2A apply only to consumer leases. For example, one provision states that a consumer may recover attorneys’ fees if a court determines that a term in a consumer lease contract is unconscionable [UCC 2A–108(4)(a)].

Finance Leases

A finance lease involves a lessor, a lessee, and a supplier. The lessor buys or leases goods from the supplier and leases or subleases them to the lessee [UCC 2A–103(1)(g)]. Typically, in a finance lease, the lessor is simply financing the transaction. For example, Marlin Corporation wants to lease a crane for use in its construction business. Marlin’s bank agrees to purchase the equipment from Jennco, Inc., and lease the equipment to Marlin. In this situation, the bank is the lessor-financer, Marlin is the lessee, and Jennco is the supplier.

Article 2A, unlike ordinary contract law, makes the lessee’s obligations under a finance lease irrevocable and independent from the financer’s obligations [UCC 2A–407]. In other words, the lessee must perform and continue to make lease payments even if the leased equipment turns out to be defective. The lessee must look almost entirely to the supplier for any recovery.

CASE IN POINT American Transit Insurance Company (ATIC) arranged to lease telephone equipment through a finance lease. Siemens Credit Corporation obtained the equipment from the manufacturer and then leased the equipment to ATIC. When the equipment turned out to be defective, ATIC stopped making the lease payments. Siemens then sued ATIC, which argued that requiring it to make payments on defective equipment was unconscionable. According to the court, though, the lease clearly qualified as a finance lease under Article 2A, and thus ATIC was obligated to make all payments due under the lease regardless of the performance of the leased equipment. The court said that ATIC’s claims could be brought only against the manufacturer, not against the lessor (Siemens).⁸

8. Siemens Credit Corp. v. American Transit Insurance Co., 2001 WL 40775 (S.D.N.Y. 2001).

SECTION 4 THE FORMATION OF SALES AND LEASE CONTRACTS

In regard to the formation of sales and lease contracts, the UCC modifies the common law in several ways. We look here at how Articles 2 and 2A of the UCC modify common law contract rules. Remember, though, that parties to sales contracts are basically free to establish whatever terms they wish. The UCC comes into play when the parties either fail to provide certain terms in their contract or wish to change the effect of the UCC’s terms in the contract’s application. The UCC makes this very clear time and again by its use of such phrases as “unless the parties otherwise agree” and “absent a contrary agreement by the parties.”

Offer

In general contract law, the moment a definite offer is met by an unqualified acceptance, a binding contract is formed. In commercial sales transactions, the verbal exchanges, correspondence, and actions of the parties may not reveal exactly when a binding contractual obligation arises. The UCC states that an agreement sufficient to constitute a contract can exist even if the moment of its making is undetermined [UCC 2–204(2), 2A–204(2)].

OPEN TERMS According to general contract law, an offer must be definite enough for the parties (and the courts) to ascertain its essential terms when it is accepted. In contrast, the UCC states that a sales or lease contract will not fail for indefiniteness even if one or more terms are left open as long as (1) the parties intended to make a contract and (2) there is a reasonably certain basis for the court to grant an appropriate remedy [UCC 2–204(3), 2A–204(3)].

Suppose that Mike agrees to lease a highly specialized computer work station from CompuQuik. Mike and one of CompuQuik’s sales representatives sign a lease agreement that leaves some of the details blank, to be “worked out” the following week, when the leasing manager will be back from vacation. In the meantime, CompuQuik obtains the necessary equipment from one of its suppliers and spends several days modifying the equipment to suit Mike’s needs. When the leasing manager returns, she calls Mike and tells him that his work station is ready. Mike says he is no longer interested in the work station, as he has arranged to lease the same equipment for a lower price from another firm. CompuQuik sues Mike to recover its costs in obtaining and modifying the equipment, and one of the issues before the court is whether the parties had an enforceable contract. The court will likely hold that they did, based on their intent and conduct, despite the blanks in their written agreement.

Relative to the common law of contracts, the UCC has radically lessened the requirement of definiteness of terms. Keep in mind, though, that if too many terms are left open, a court may find that the parties did not intend to form a contract.

Open Price Term. If the parties have not agreed on a price, the court will determine a “reasonable price at the time for delivery” [UCC 2–305(1)]. If either the buyer or the seller is to determine the price, the price is to be fixed in good faith [UCC 2–305(2)]. Under the UCC, good faith means honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade [UCC 2–103(1)(b)]. The concepts of good faith and commercial reasonableness permeate the UCC. (The obligations of good faith and commercial reasonableness in sales and lease contracts will be examined in Chapter 22.) For a discussion of how sellers might charge slightly higher prices for goods in the interest of promoting “fair trade,” see this chapter’s Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature on the next page.

Sometimes, the price fails to be fixed through the fault of one of the parties. In that situation, the other party can treat the contract as canceled or fix a reasonable price. For example, Perez and Merrick enter into a contract for the sale of goods and agree that Perez will fix the price. Perez refuses to specify the price. Merrick can either treat the contract as canceled or set a reasonable price [UCC 2–305(3)].

Open Payment Term. When the parties do not specify payment terms, payment is due at the time and place at which the buyer is to receive the goods [UCC 2–310(a)]. The buyer can tender payment using any commercially normal or acceptable means, such as a check or credit card. If the seller demands payment in cash, however, the buyer must be given a reasonable time to obtain it [UCC 2–511(2)]. This is especially important when the contract states a definite and final time for performance.

Open Delivery Term. When no delivery terms are specified, the buyer normally takes delivery at the seller’s place of business [UCC 2–308(a)]. If the seller has no place of business, the seller’s residence is used. When goods are located in some other place and both parties know it, delivery is made there. If the time for shipment or delivery is not clearly specified in the sales contract, then the court will infer a “reasonable” time for performance [UCC 2–309(1)].

Duration of an Ongoing Contract. A single contract might specify successive performances but not indicate how long the parties are required to deal with each other. In this situation, either party may terminate the ongoing contractual relationship. Nevertheless, principles of good faith and sound commercial practice call for reasonable notification before termination so as to give the other party sufficient time to seek a substitute arrangement [UCC 2–309(2), (3)].

Options and Cooperation with Regard to Performance. When specific shipping arrangements have not been made but the contract contemplates shipment of the goods, the seller has the right to make these arrangements in good faith, using commercial reasonableness in the situation [UCC 2–311].

When terms relating to an assortment of goods are omitted from a sales contract, the buyer can specify the assortment. For example, Harley and Babcock contract for the sale of one thousand pens. The pens come in a variety of colors, but the contract is silent as to which colors are ordered. Babcock, the buyer, has the right to take whatever colors he wishes. Babcock, however, must exercise good faith and commercial reasonableness in making the selection [UCC 2–311].

Open Quantity Term. Normally, if the parties do not specify a quantity, a court will have no basis for determining a remedy. This is because there is almost no way to determine objectively what is a reasonable quantity of goods for someone to purchase (whereas a court can objectively determine a reasonable price for particular goods by looking at the market). The UCC recognizes two exceptions in requirements and output contracts [UCC 2–306(1)].

In a requirements contract, the buyer agrees to purchase and the seller agrees to sell all or up to a stated amount of what the buyer needs or requires. There is implicit consideration in a requirements contract because the buyer gives up the right to buy from any other seller, and this forfeited right creates a legal detriment. Requirements contracts are common in the business world and normally are enforceable. If, however, the buyer promises to purchase only if he or she wishes to do so, or if the buyer

Fair Trade and Environmental Sustainability

Sales contracts, whether domestic or international, involve the transfer of a quantity of goods at a price. But sales contracts can do more than that. Thanks to the Fair Trade movement, they can also benefit poor farmers in developing countries and promote environmentally sustainable farming practices.

What Is the Fair Trade Movement?

The origins of the Fair Trade movement can be traced to an effort in Europe almost fifty years ago to provide relief to refugees and other poor communities by selling their handicrafts. But the movement only began to expand in the 1980s when the “Fair Trade” label was developed in the Netherlands to identify coffee produced under certain conditions. Today, the Fairtrade Labeling Organizations International determines minimum “fair” prices that ensure that small producers can earn a living wage. Products obtained at these prices can bear the Fair Trade label. Retailers can still charge any price they wish, but because they pay more for products with the Fair Trade label, they usually pass these costs on to consumers in the form of slightly higher prices.

TransFair U.S.A. founder Paul Rice describes the Fair Trade movement this way: “Fair Trade creates the opportunity for businesses to increase their profits through socially responsible business practices, for consumers to vote with every purchase for a more equitable world, and for farmers to view themselves not as an anonymous cog in the world market, but as a valuable contributor to a global society.”

The Principles of Fair Trade

Under the Fair Trade system, low-income farmers and artisans in developing countries form alliances with importers and marketers in Western Europe and North America. Participants must agree to certain basic principles:

- Producers must receive a stable minimum price for their products.

- Forced or child labor will not be used.
- Production methods must be environmentally friendly.

When these standards are met, international certification bodies allow the products to carry a Fair Trade logo, such as the well-known label borne by some coffee imported into the United States.

Emphasis on Environmental Sustainability

As mentioned, only producers who agree to use environmentally sustainable farming methods can sell their products through the Fair Trade system. The farmers must agree to preserve valuable ecosystems for future generations. The use of harmful chemicals and genetically modified organisms is strictly prohibited.

According to Paulette Stenzel, professor of international business law at the Eli Broad College of Business at Michigan State University, “Fair Trade is simply one way of carrying out business, which takes into account all aspects of sustainability, especially of the producers.” Stenzel argues that businesses must take responsibility for environmental and socioeconomic outcomes that are directly related to their activities: “Today, many companies realize that sustainability efforts must be based on the triple bottom line of economy, social equity, and environment.”

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS

Today, Fair Trade certification is available in the United States for coffee, cocoa and chocolate, tea and herbs, fresh fruit, sugar, rice, and vanilla. As more consumers become aware of the movement, sales of Fair Trade products are likely to grow. Collaboration between Fair Trade producers and retail outlets in the United States is a key aspect of the movement. Marketing managers at large retail companies may find that their bottom lines will improve if they seek products bearing the Fair Trade label for their customers.

reserves the right to buy the goods from someone other than the seller, the promise is illusory (without consideration) and unenforceable by either party.⁹

In an output contract, the seller agrees to sell and the buyer agrees to buy all or up to a stated amount of what the seller produces. Again, because the seller essentially forfeits the right to sell goods to another buyer, there is implicit consideration in an output contract.

The UCC imposes a good faith limitation on requirements and output contracts. The quantity under such contracts is the amount of requirements or the amount of output that occurs during a normal production period. The actual quantity purchased or sold cannot be unreasonably disproportionate to normal or comparable prior requirements or output [UCC 2–306].

9. See, for example, In re Anchor Glass Container Corp., 345 Bankr. 765 (M.D.Fla. 2006).

MERCHANT’S FIRM OFFER Under regular contract principles, an offer can be revoked at any time before acceptance. The major common law exception is an option contract (discussed in Chapter 11 on page 230), in which the offeree pays consideration for the offeror’s irrevocable promise to keep the offer open for a stated period. The UCC creates a second exception, which applies only to firm offers for the sale or lease of goods made by a merchant (regardless of whether or not the offeree is a merchant).

When a Merchant’s Firm Offer Arises. A firm offer arises when a merchant-offeror gives assurances in a signed writing that the offer will remain open. The merchant’s firm offer is irrevocable without the necessity of consideration¹⁰ for the stated period or, if no definite period is stated, a reasonable period (neither to exceed three months) [UCC 2–205, 2A–205].

To illustrate: Osaka, a used-car dealer, writes a letter to Bennett on January 1, stating, “I have a used 2010 Suzuki on the lot that I’ll sell you for $20,500 any time between now and January 31.” By January 18, Osaka has heard nothing from Bennett, so he sells the Suzuki to another person. On January 23, Bennett tenders $20,500 to Osaka and asks for the car. When Osaka tells him the car has already been sold, Bennett claims that Osaka has breached a valid contract. Bennett is right. Osaka is a merchant of used cars and assured Bennett in a signed writing that he would keep his offer open until the end of January. Thus, Bennett’s acceptance on January 23 created a contract, which Osaka breached.

The Offer Must Be in Writing and Signed by the Offeror. It is necessary that the offer be both written and signed by the offeror.¹¹ When a firm offer is contained in a form contract prepared by the offeree, the offeror must also sign a separate assurance of the firm offer. This requirement ensures that the offeror will be made aware of the offer. For instance, an offeree might respond to an initial offer by sending its own form contract containing a clause stating that the offer will remain open for three months. If the firm offer is buried amid copious language in one of the pages of the offeree’s form contract, the offeror may inadvertently sign the contract without realizing that it contains a firm offer. This would defeat the purpose of the rule—which is to give effect to a merchant’s deliberate intent to be bound to a firm offer.

Acceptance

Under the UCC, acceptance of an offer to buy, sell, or lease goods generally may be made in any reasonable manner and by any reasonable means. We examine the UCC’s provisions governing acceptance in detail in the subsections that follow.

METHODS OF ACCEPTANCE The general common law rule is that an offeror can specify, or authorize, a particular means of acceptance, making that means the only one effective for contract formation. Under the common law, if the offer is accepted by an improper means of communication, normally it is considered a counteroffer rather than an acceptance. (For a review of the requirements relating to the mode and timeliness of acceptance, see Chapter 11 on pages 232 and 233.) Only when the offeror does not specify an authorized means of acceptance will courts applying general contract law consider whether the acceptance was by reasonable means. The UCC, in contrast, gives effect to all acceptances communicated by reasonable means.

Any Reasonable Means. When the offeror does not specify a means of acceptance, the UCC provides that acceptance can be made by any means of communication that is reasonable under the circumstances [UCC 2–206(1), 2A–206(1)]. This is also the basic rule under the common law of contracts (see Chapter 11).

For example, Anodyne Corporation writes a letter to Bethlehem Industries offering to lease $5,000 worth of goods. The offer states that Anodyne will keep the offer open for only ten days from the date of the letter. Before the ten days have lapsed, Bethlehem sends Anodyne an acceptance by fax. The fax is misdirected by someone at Anodyne’s offices and does not reach the right person at Anodyne until after the ten-day deadline has passed. Has a valid contract been formed? The answer is probably yes, because acceptance by fax appears to be a commercially reasonable mode of acceptance under the circumstances. Acceptance would be effective on Bethlehem’s transmission of the fax, which occurred before the offer lapsed.

10. If the offeree pays consideration, then an option contract (not a merchant’s firm offer) is formed.

11. Signed includes any symbol executed or adopted by a party with a present intention to authenticate a writing [UCC 1–201(37)]. A complete signature is not required.

Promise to Ship or Prompt Shipment. The UCC permits an offeree to accept an offer to buy goods “either by a prompt promise to ship or by the prompt or current shipment of conforming or nonconforming goods” [UCC 2–206(1)(b)]. Conforming goods are goods that accord with the contract’s terms; nonconforming goods do not.

The seller’s prompt shipment of nonconforming goods constitutes both an acceptance (a contract) and a breach of that contract. This rule does not apply if the seller seasonably (within a reasonable amount of time) notifies the buyer that the nonconforming shipment is offered only as an accommodation, or as a favor. The notice of accommodation must clearly indicate to the buyer that the shipment does not constitute an acceptance and that therefore no contract has been formed.

Assume that Barrymore orders one thousand black fans from Stroh. Stroh ships one thousand blue fans to Barrymore, notifying Barrymore that these are sent as an accommodation because Stroh has only blue fans in stock. The shipment of blue fans is not an acceptance but a counteroffer, and a contract will be formed only if Barrymore accepts the blue fans. If, however, Stroh ships one thousand blue fans instead of black without notifying Barrymore that the goods are being shipped as an accommodation, Stroh’s shipment acts as both an acceptance of Barrymore’s offer and a breach of the resulting contract. Barrymore may sue Stroh for any appropriate damages.

COMMUNICATION OF ACCEPTANCE Under the common law, because a unilateral offer invites acceptance by performance, the offeree need not notify the offeror of performance unless the offeror would not otherwise know about it. In other words, a unilateral offer can be accepted by beginning performance. The UCC is more stringent than the common law in this regard because it requires notification. Under the UCC, if the offeror is not notified within a reasonable time that the offeree has accepted the contract by beginning performance, then the offeror can treat the offer as having lapsed before acceptance [UCC 2–206(2), 2A–206(2)].

ADDITIONAL TERMS Recall from Chapter 11 on page 230 that under the common law, the mirror image rule requires that the terms of the acceptance exactly match those of the offer. Thus, if Alderman makes an offer to Beale, and Beale in turn accepts but adds some slight modification, there is no contract. The UCC dispenses with the mirror image rule. Generally, the UCC takes the position that if the offeree’s response indicates a definite acceptance of the offer, a contract is formed, even if the acceptance includes terms additional to or different from those contained in the offer [UCC 2–207(1)]. Whether the additional terms become part of the contract depends, in part, on whether the parties are nonmerchants or merchants.

Rules When One Party or Both Parties Are Nonmerchants. If one (or both) of the parties is a nonmerchant, the contract is formed according to the terms of the original offer and not according to the additional terms of the acceptance [UCC 2–207(2)]. For instance, Tolsen offers in writing to sell his iPad and thirteen additional apps to Valdez for $1,500. Valdez e-mails a reply to Tolsen, stating, “I accept your offer to purchase your iPad and the thirteen additional apps for $1,500. I would like a box of laser printer paper and two extra toner cartridges to be included in the purchase price.” Valdez has given Tolsen a definite expression of acceptance (creating a contract), even though the acceptance also suggests an added term for the offer. Because Tolsen is not a merchant, the additional term is merely a proposal (suggestion), and Tolsen is not legally obligated to comply with that term.

Rules When Both Parties Are Merchants. The drafters of the UCC created a special rule for merchants to avoid the “battle of the forms,” which occurs when two merchants exchange separate standard forms containing different contract terms. Under UCC 2–207(2), in contracts between merchants, the additional terms automatically become part of the contract unless one of the following conditions arises:

1. The original offer expressly limited acceptance to its terms.
2. The new or changed terms materially alter the contract.
3. The offeror objects to the new or changed terms within a reasonable period of time.

When determining whether an alteration is material, courts consider several factors. Generally, if the modification does not involve any unreasonable element of surprise or hardship for the offeror, a court will hold that the modification did not materially alter the contract. Courts also consider the parties’ prior dealings.

For example, Woolf has ordered meat from Tupman sixty-four times over a two-year period. Each time, Woolf placed the order over the phone, and Tupman mailed first a confirmation form, and then an invoice, to Woolf. Tupman's confirmation form and invoice have always included an arbitration clause. If Woolf places another order and fails to pay for the meat, the court will likely hold that the additional term—the arbitration provision—did not materially alter the contract, because Woolf should not have been surprised by the term. The result might be different, however, if the parties had dealt with each other on only two prior occasions and the arbitration clause had been included on the back of a faxed invoice but not in the confirmation form.

Conditioned on Offeror's Assent. Regardless of merchant status, the UCC provides that the offeree's expression cannot be construed as an acceptance if it contains additional or different terms and is expressly conditioned on the offeror's assent to those terms [UCC 2–207(1)]. For example, Philips offers to sell Hundert 650 pounds of turkey thighs at a specified price and with specified delivery terms. Hundert responds, “I accept your offer for 650 pounds of turkey thighs on the condition that you agree to give me ninety days to pay for them.” Hundert's response will be construed not as an acceptance but as a counteroffer, which Philips may or may not accept.

Additional Terms May Be Stricken. The UCC provides yet another option for dealing with conflicting terms in the parties' writings. Section 2–207(3) states that conduct by both parties that recognizes the existence of a contract is sufficient to establish a contract for sale even though the writings of the parties do not otherwise establish a contract. In this situation, “the terms of the particular contract will consist of those terms on which the writings of the parties agree, together with any supplementary terms incorporated under any other provisions of this Act.” In a dispute over contract terms, this provision allows a court simply to strike from the contract those terms on which the parties do not agree.

Suppose that SMT Marketing orders goods over the phone from Brigg Sales, Inc., which ships the goods to SMT with an acknowledgment form (confirming the order). SMT accepts and pays for the goods. The parties' writings do not establish a contract, but there is no question that a contract exists. If a dispute arises over the terms, such as the extent of any warranties, UCC 2–207(3) provides the governing rule.

As noted previously, the fact that a merchant's acceptance frequently contains terms that add to or even conflict with those of the offer is often referred to as the “battle of the forms.” Although the UCC tries to eliminate this battle, the problem of differing contract terms still arises in commercial settings, particularly when contracts are based on the merchants' standard forms, such as order forms and confirmation forms.

Consideration

The common law rule that a contract requires consideration also applies to sales and lease contracts. Unlike the common law, however, the UCC does not require a contract modification to be supported by new consideration. The UCC states that an agreement modifying a contract for the sale or lease of goods “needs no consideration to be binding” [UCC 2–209(1), 2A–208(1)].

MODIFICATIONS MUST BE MADE IN GOOD FAITH Of course, any contract modification must be made in good faith [UCC 1–304]. For example, Allied, Inc., agrees to lease a new recreational vehicle (RV) to Diane Lee for a stated monthly payment. Subsequently, a sudden shift in the market makes it difficult for Allied to lease the new RV to Lee at the contract price without suffering a loss. Allied tells Lee of the situation, and she agrees to pay an additional sum for the lease of the RV. Later, Lee reconsiders and refuses to pay more than the original price. Under the UCC, Lee's promise to modify the contract needs no consideration to be binding. Hence, she is bound by the modified contract.

In this example, a shift in the market is a good faith reason for contract modification. What if there really was no shift in the market, however, and Allied knew that Lee needed the RV immediately but refused to deliver it unless Lee agreed to pay an additional amount? This attempt at extortion through modification without a legitimate commercial reason would be ineffective because it would violate the duty of good faith. Allied would not be permitted to enforce the higher price.

WHEN MODIFICATION WITHOUT CONSIDERATION DOES REQUIRE A WRITING

In some situations, an agreement to modify a sales or lease contract without consideration must be in writing to be enforceable. For example, if the contract itself specifies that any changes to the contract must be in a signed writing, only those changes agreed to in a signed writing are enforceable. If a consumer (nonmerchant buyer) is dealing with a merchant and the merchant supplies the form that contains the prohibition against oral modification, the consumer must sign a separate acknowledgment of the clause [UCC 2–209(2), 2A–208(2)].

Also, under Article 2, any modification that brings a sales contract under the Statute of Frauds must usually be in writing to be enforceable. Thus, if an oral contract for the sale of goods priced at $400 is modified so that the goods are priced at $600, the modification must be in writing to be enforceable [UCC 2–209(3)]. (This is because the UCC’s Statute of Frauds provision, as you will read shortly, requires a written record of sales contracts for goods priced at $500 or more.) Nevertheless, if the buyer accepts delivery of the goods after the oral modification, he or she is bound to the $600 price [UCC 2–201(3)(c)]. (Unlike Article 2, Article 2A does not say whether a lease as modified needs to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.)

The Statute of Frauds

As discussed in Chapter 15, the Statute of Frauds requires that certain types of contracts, to be enforceable, must be in writing or be evidenced by a written memorandum or record. The UCC contains Statute of Frauds provisions covering sales and lease contracts. Under these provisions, sales contracts for goods priced at $500 or more and lease contracts requiring total payments of $1,000 or more must be in writing to be enforceable [UCC 2–201(1), 2A–201(1)]. (These low threshold amounts may eventually be raised.)

SUFFICIENCY OF THE WRITING The UCC has greatly relaxed the requirements for the sufficiency of a writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. A writing or a memorandum will be sufficient as long as it indicates that the parties intended to form a contract and as long as it is signed by the party (or agent of the party) against whom enforcement is sought. The contract normally will not be enforceable beyond the quantity of goods shown in the writing, however. All other terms can be proved in court by oral testimony. For leases, the writing must reasonably identify and describe the goods leased and the lease term.

SPECIAL RULES FOR CONTRACTS BETWEEN MERCHANTS Once again, the UCC provides a special rule for merchants in sales transactions (there is no corresponding rule that applies to leases under Article 2A). Merchants can satisfy the Statute of Frauds if, after the parties have agreed orally, one of the merchants sends a signed written confirmation to the other merchant within a reasonable time.

The communication must indicate the terms of the agreement, and the merchant receiving the confirmation must have reason to know of its contents. Generally, courts hold that it is sufficient if a merchant sends an e-mail confirmation of the agreement.¹² Unless the merchant who receives the confirmation gives written notice of objection to its contents within ten days after receipt, the writing is sufficient against the receiving merchant, even though she or he has not signed it [UCC 2–201(2)].

For example, Alfonso is a merchant-buyer in Cleveland. He contracts over the telephone to purchase $6,000 worth of spare aircraft parts from Goldstein, a merchant-seller in New York City. Two days later, Goldstein sends a written and signed confirmation detailing the terms of the oral contract, and Alfonso subsequently receives it. If Alfonso does not notify Goldstein in writing of his objection to the contents of the confirmation within ten days of receipt, Alfonso cannot raise the Statute of Frauds as a defense against the enforcement of the oral contract.

EXCEPTIONS The UCC defines three exceptions to the writing requirements of the Statute of Frauds. An oral contract for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more or the lease of goods involving total payments of $1,000 or more will be enforceable despite the absence of a writing in the circumstances described next [UCC 2–201(3), 2A–201(4)].

Specially Manufactured Goods. An oral contract is enforceable if (1) it is for goods that are specially manufactured for a particular buyer or specially manufactured or obtained for a particular lessee, (2) these goods are not suitable for resale or lease to others in the ordinary course of the seller’s or lessor’s business, and (3) the seller or lessor has substantially started to manufacture the goods or has made commitments for the manufacture or procurement of the goods. In these situations, once the seller or lessor has taken action, the buyer or lessee cannot repudiate the agreement claiming the Statute of Frauds as a defense.

Suppose that Womach orders custom-made draperies for her new boutique. The price is $9,000, and the contract is oral. When the merchant-seller manufactures the draperies and tenders delivery to Womach, she refuses to pay for them, even though the job has been completed on time. Womach claims that she is not liable because the contract was oral. Clearly, if the unique style and color of the draperies make it improbable that the seller can find another buyer, Womach is liable to the seller.

12. See, for example, Bazak International Corp. v. Tarrant Apparel Group, 378 E.Supp.2d 377 (S.D.N.Y. 2005); and Great White Bear, LLC v. Mervyns, LLC, 2007 WL 1295747 (S.D.N.Y. 2007).

Note that the seller must have made a substantial beginning in manufacturing the specialized item prior to the buyer's repudiation. In addition, the court must be convinced by evidence of the terms of the oral contract.

Admissions. An oral contract for the sale or lease of goods is enforceable if the party against whom enforcement is sought admits in pleadings, testimony, or other court proceedings that a sales or lease contract was made. In this situation, the contract will be enforceable even though it was oral, but enforceability will be limited to the quantity of goods admitted.

For example, Lane and Salazar negotiate an agreement over the telephone. During the negotiations, Lane requests a delivery price for five hundred gallons of gasoline and a separate price for seven hundred gallons of gasoline. Salazar replies that the price would be the same, $3.10 per gallon. Lane orally orders five hundred gallons. Salazar honestly believes that Lane ordered seven hundred gallons and tenders that amount. Lane refuses the shipment of seven hundred gallons, and Salazar sues for breach. In his pleadings and testimony, Lane admits that an oral contract was made, but only for five hundred gallons. Because Lane admits the existence of the oral contract, Lane cannot plead the Statute of Frauds as a defense. The contract is enforceable, however, only to the extent of the quantity admitted (five hundred gallons).

Is it possible to admit to a contract in court and also assert the Statute of Frauds as a defense? That was the position of the one of the parties in the following case.

CASE 19.2

Glacial Plains Cooperative v. Lindgren

Court of Appeals of Minnesota, 759 N.W.2d 661 (2009).
www.lawlibrary.state.mn.us/archive^a

COMPANY PROFILE • Glacial Plains Cooperative is a locally owned agricultural cooperative based in west central Minnesota. Glacial Plains employs fifty to one hundred workers, who supply grain marketing, seed, energy, feed, and agronomy products and services. Recent annual sales have averaged between $50 million and $100 million. The cooperative also offers short-term, low-interest loans and other financial products to its members. Glacial Plains' motto is "Solid Performance and Returning Cash to Member Owners."

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Gerald Lindgren, a farmer, agreed by phone to sell grain to Glacial Plains Cooperative. They reached four agreements: two for the delivery of 9,000 and 10,000 bushels of soybeans in the fall of 2006, one for the delivery of 65,000 bushels of corn in the same season, and one for the sale of 30,000 bushels of corn in the fall of 2007. Glacial Plains sent Lindgren four written—but unsigned—contracts. Lindgren made the soybean deliveries and part of the first corn delivery, but sold the rest of his corn to another dealer. Glacial Plains bought corn elsewhere, paying a higher price, and filed a suit in a Minnesota state court against Lindgren for breach of contract. During a deposition and in papers filed with the court, Lindgren acknowledged his oral agreements with Glacial Plains and admitted that he did not fully perform. He argued, nonetheless, that the agreements were unenforceable because they were not signed. The court denied Lindgren's defense. He appealed.

KLAPHAKE, Judge.

Appellant argues that the oral corn agreements are not enforceable because they violate the Statute of Frauds. Minnesota's version of the UCC provides that a contract for the sale of goods for the price of $500 or more is not enforceable "unless there is

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 19.2 CONTINUED ♦ some writing sufficient to indicate that a contract for sale has been made between the parties and signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought.”

Respondent argues that the oral agreements fall within * * * the admission exception.

The admission exception to the code’s statute of frauds is found in [Minnesota Statutes Section 36.2-201(3)(b), Minnesota’s version of UCC 2–201(3)(b)], which provides that even when there is no signed writing sufficient to satisfy the writing requirement, the Statute of Frauds will not act to abolish the contract “if the party against whom enforcement is sought admits in pleading, testimony or otherwise in court that a contract for sale was made.” The exception was created to reduce the risk of fraud: Where the making of a contract is admitted in court, no additional writing is necessary for protection against fraud, and the contract becomes enforceable notwithstanding the provisions of the statute of frauds. [Emphasis added.]

Appellant has made such an admission here. During his deposition and in his summary judgment papers, appellant acknowledged that he made two oral agreements in April 2006 for the sale of corn to be delivered in 2006 and 2007, and that he operated under the assumption that he was obligated under these agreements throughout the summer of 2006. He further admitted that he * * * decided [the unsigned contracts] were unenforceable, and stopped performing on the 2006 corn contract and never performed on the 2007 corn agreement. * * * Based on these admissions by appellant, we conclude that the admission exception applies here, removing the agreement from the UCC statute of frauds.

* * * Meeting the Minnesota Statute of Frauds does not prove the terms of the contract; meeting the Statute of Frauds simply removes the defense and allows a jury to determine the issue of whether the parties entered into an agreement and its terms.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court’s decision. The appellate court remanded the case for a determination of the terms of the contracts.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that Lindgren had admitted to a lesser quantity than he had orally promised to Glacial Plains but that other proof of the true terms was available. What might have been the result? Explain your answer.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Lindgren entered into an agreement in the spring of 2006 to deliver corn to Great Plains in the fall of 2007. Should the court have denied the enforcement of this agreement under the one-year rule? Explain.

Partial Performance. An oral contract for the sale or lease of goods is enforceable if payment has been made and accepted or goods have been received and accepted. This is the “partial performance” exception. The oral contract will be enforced at least to the extent that performance actually took place.

CASE IN POINT Quality Pork International formed an oral contract with Rupari Food Services, Inc., which buys and sells food products to retail operations. Quality was to ship three orders of pork to Star Food Processing, Inc., and Rupari was to pay for the products. Quality shipped the pork to Star and sent invoices to Rupari. Rupari billed Star for all three orders but paid Quality only for the first two. Quality filed a suit against Rupari to recover $44,051.98, the cost of the third order. Rupari argued that because the parties did not have a written agreement, there was no enforceable contract. The court held that even though Rupari had not signed a written contract or purchase order, it had accepted the goods and partially performed the contract by paying for the first two shipments. Rupari’s conduct was sufficient to prove the existence of a contract, and the court required Rupari to pay for the last shipment.¹³

The exceptions just discussed and other ways in which sales law differs from general contract law are summarized in Exhibit 19–2.

Parol Evidence

When the parties to a contract set forth its terms in a confirmatory memorandum or in other writing that is intended as a complete and final statement of their agreement, it is considered fully integrated (see Chapter 15 on page 230). The terms of a fully integrated contract cannot be contradicted by evidence of any prior agreements or contemporaneous oral agreements. If, however, the writing contains some

EXHIBIT 19-2 • Major Differences between Contract Law and Sales Law

	CONTRACT LAW	SALES LAW
Contract Terms	Contract must contain all material terms.	Open terms are acceptable if parties intended to form a contract, but the contract is not enforceable beyond quantity term.
Acceptance	Mirror image rule applies. If additional terms are added in acceptance, a counteroffer is created.	Additional terms will not negate acceptance unless acceptance is expressly conditioned on assent to the additional terms.
Contract Modification	Modification requires consideration.	Modification does not require consideration.
Irrevocable Offers	Option contracts (with consideration).	Merchants' firm offers (without consideration).
Statute of Frauds Requirements	All material terms must be included in the writing.	Writing is required only for sale of goods priced at $500 or more, but the contract is not enforceable beyond the quantity specified. Merchants can satisfy the writing by a confirmation evidencing their agreement. Exceptions: 1. Specially manufactured goods. 2. Admissions by party against whom enforcement is sought. 3. Partial performance.

of the terms the parties agreed on but not others, then the contract is not fully integrated.

When a court finds that the terms of a contract are not fully integrated, then the court may allow evidence of consistent additional terms to explain or supplement the terms stated in the contract. The court may also allow the parties to submit evidence of course of dealing, usage of trade, or course of performance [UCC 2-202, 2A-202].

COURSE OF DEALING AND USAGE OF TRADE Under the UCC, the meaning of any agreement, evidenced by the language of the parties and by their actions, must be interpreted in light of commercial practices and other surrounding circumstances. In interpreting a commercial agreement, the court will assume that the course of dealing between the parties and the general usage of trade were taken into account when the agreement was phrased.

A course of dealing is a sequence of actions and communications between the parties to a particular transaction that establishes a common basis for their understanding [UCC 1-303(b)]. A course of dealing is restricted to the sequence of conduct between the parties in their transactions previous to the agreement. The UCC states, “A course of performance or course of dealing between the parties or usage of trade in the vocation or trade in which they are engaged or of which they are or should be aware is relevant in ascertaining the meaning of the parties' agreement, may give particular meaning to specific terms of the agreement, and may supplement or qualify the terms of the agreement” [UCC 1-303(d)].

Usage of trade is defined as any practice or method of dealing having such regularity of observance in a place, vocation, or trade as to justify an expectation that it will be observed with respect to the transaction in question [UCC 1-303(c)]. The express terms of an agreement and an applicable course of dealing or usage of trade will be construed to be consistent with each other whenever reasonable. When such a construction is unreasonable, however, the express terms in the agreement will prevail [UCC 1-303(e)].

COURSE OF PERFORMANCE The conduct that occurs under the terms of a particular agreement is called a course of performance [UCC 1-303(a)]. Presumably, the parties themselves know best what they meant by their words, and the course of performance actually carried out under their agreement is the best indication of what they meant [UCC 2-208(1), 2A-207(1)].

For example, Janson's Lumber Company contracts with Lopez to sell Lopez a specified number of two-by-fours. The lumber in fact does not measure 2 inches by 4 inches but rather $1\frac{7}{8}$ inches by $3\frac{3}{4}$ inches. Janson's agrees to deliver the lumber in five deliveries, and Lopez, without objection, accepts the lumber in the first three deliveries. On the fourth delivery, however, Lopez objects that the two-by-fours do not measure precisely 2 inches by 4 inches.

The course of performance in this transaction—that is, the fact that Lopez accepted three deliveries without objection under the agreement—is relevant in determining that here a “two-by-four” actually means a “ $1\frac{7}{8}$ -by- $3\frac{3}{4}$.” Janson's can also prove that two-by-fours need not be exactly 2 inches by 4 inches by applying usage of trade, course of dealing, or both. Janson's can, for example, show that in previous transactions, Lopez took $1\frac{7}{8}$ -inch-by- $3\frac{3}{4}$ -inch lumber without objection. In addition, Janson's can show that in the trade, two-by-fours are commonly $1\frac{7}{8}$ inches by $3\frac{3}{4}$ inches.

RULES OF CONSTRUCTION The UCC provides rules of construction for interpreting contracts. Express terms, course of performance, course of dealing, and usage of trade are to be construed together when they do not contradict one another. When such a construction is unreasonable, however, the following order of priority controls: (1) express terms, (2) course of performance, (3) course of dealing, and (4) usage of trade [UCC 1-303(e), 2-208(2), 2A-207(2)].

Unconscionability

As discussed in Chapters 13 and 14, an unconscionable contract is one that is so unfair and one sided that it would be unreasonable to enforce it. The UCC allows a court to evaluate a contract or any clause in a contract, and if the court deems it to have been unconscionable at the time it was made, the court can do any of the following [UCC 2-302, 2A-108]:

1. Refuse to enforce the contract.
2. Enforce the remainder of the contract without the unconscionable part.
3. Limit the application of the unconscionable term to avoid an unconscionable result.

The following landmark case illustrates an early application of the UCC's unconscionability provisions.

EXTENDED CASE 19.3

Jones v. Star Credit Corp.

Supreme Court of New York, Nassau County, 59 Misc.2d 189, 298 N.Y.S.2d 264 (1969).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Sol M. WACHTLER, Justice.

On August 31, 1965 the plaintiffs, who are welfare recipients, agreed to purchase a home freezer unit for $900 as the result of a visit from a salesman representing Your Shop At Home Service, Inc. With the addition of the time credit charges, credit life insurance, credit property insurance, and sales tax, the purchase price totaled $1,234.80. Thus far the plaintiffs have paid $619.88 toward their purchase. The defendant claims that with various added credit charges paid for an extension of time there is a balance of $819.81 still due from the plaintiffs. The uncontroverted proof at the trial established that the freezer unit, when purchased, had a maximum retail value of approximately $300. The question is whether this transaction and the resulting contract could be considered unconscionable within the meaning of section 2-302 of the Uniform Commercial Code * * * .

There was a time when the shield of caveat emptor ["let the buyer beware"] would protect the most unscrupulous in the marketplace—a time when the law, in granting parties unbridled latitude to make their own contracts, allowed exploitive and callous practices which shocked the conscience of both legislative bodies and the courts.

The law is beginning to fight back against those who once took advantage of the poor and illiterate without risk of either exposure or interference.

* * * *

Section 2-302 of the Uniform Commercial Code enacts the moral sense of the community into the law of commercial transactions. It authorizes the court to find, as a matter of law, that a contract or a clause of a contract was “unconscionable at the time it was made,” and upon so finding the court may refuse to enforce the contract, excise the objectionable clause or limit the application of the clause to avoid an unconscionable result. The principle * * * is one of the prevention of oppression and unfair surprise. It permits a court to accomplish directly what heretofore was often accomplished by construction of language, manipulations of fluid rules of contract law and determinations based upon a presumed public policy.

* * * *

Fraud, in the instant case, is not present; nor is it necessary under the statute. The question which presents itself is whether or not, under the circumstances of this case, the sale of a freezer unit having a retail value of $300 for $900 ($1,439.69 including credit charges and $18 sales tax) is unconscionable as a matter of law. The court believes it is.

* * * *

Concededly, deciding [this case] is substantially easier than explaining it. No doubt, the mathematical disparity between $300, which presumably includes a reasonable profit margin, and $900, which is exorbitant on its face, carries the greatest weight. Credit charges alone exceed by more than $100 the retail value of the freezer. These alone may be sufficient to sustain the decision. Yet, a caveat [warning] is warranted lest we reduce the import of Section 2–302 solely to a mathematical ratio formula. It may, at times, be that; yet it may also be much more. The very limited financial resources of the purchaser, known to the sellers at the time of the sale, is entitled to weight in the balance. Indeed, the value disparity itself leads inevitably to the felt conclusion that knowing advantage was taken of the plaintiffs. In addition, the meaningfulness of choice essential to the making of a contract can be negated by a gross inequality of bargaining power. [Emphasis added.]

There is no question about the necessity and even the desirability of installment sales and the extension of credit. Indeed, there are many, including welfare recipients, who would be deprived of even the most basic conveniences without the use of these devices. Similarly, the retail merchant selling on installment or extending credit is expected to establish a pricing factor which will afford a degree of protection commensurate with the risk of selling to those who might be default prone. However, neither of these accepted premises can clothe the sale of this freezer with respectability.

* * * *

Having already [been] paid more than $600 toward the purchase of this $300 freezer unit, it is apparent that the defendant has already been amply compensated. In accordance with the statute, the application of the payment provision should be limited to amounts already paid by the plaintiffs and the contract be reformed and amended by changing the payments called for therein to equal the amount of payment actually so paid by the plaintiffs.

QUESTIONS

1. Why would the seller's knowledge of the buyers' limited resources support a finding of unconscionability?
2. Why didn't the court rule that the buyers, as adults, had made a decision of their own free will and therefore were bound by the terms of the contract, regardless of the difference between the freezer's contract price and its retail value?

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY'S LAW • This early classic case illustrates the approach that many courts take today when deciding whether a sales contract is unconscionable—an approach that focuses on “excessive” price and unequal bargaining power. Most of the litigants who have used UCC 2–302 successfully could demonstrate both an absence of meaningful choice and contract terms that were unreasonably favorable to the other party.

Concept Summary 19.1 on the next page reviews the concepts and rules related to the formation of sales and lease contracts.

SECTION 5 CONTRACTS FOR THE INTERNATIONAL SALE OF GOODS

International sales contracts between firms or individuals located in different countries may be governed by the 1980 United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG). The CISG governs international contracts only if the countries of the parties to the contract have ratified the CISG and if the parties have not agreed that some other law will govern their contract. As of 2010, the CISG had been adopted by seventy countries, including the United States, Canada, Mexico, some Central and South American countries, China, Japan, and most European nations. That means that the CISG is the uniform international sales law of countries that account for more than two-thirds of all global trade.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 19.1

The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

Concept	Description
Offer and Acceptance	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> Offer— <ol style="list-style-type: none"> Not all terms have to be included for a contract to be formed. The price does not have to be included for a contract to be formed. Particulars of performance can be left open. An offer by a merchant in a signed writing with assurances that the offer will not be withdrawn is irrevocable without consideration (for up to three months). Acceptance— <ol style="list-style-type: none"> Acceptance may be made by any reasonable means of communication; it is effective when dispatched. The acceptance of a unilateral offer can be made by a promise to ship or by the shipment of conforming or nonconforming goods. Acceptance by performance requires notice within a reasonable time; otherwise, the offer can be treated as lapsed. A definite expression of acceptance creates a contract even if the terms of the acceptance modify the terms of the offer.
Consideration	A modification of a contract for the sale of goods does not require consideration.
Requirements under the Statute of Frauds	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> All contracts for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more must be in writing. A writing is sufficient as long as it indicates a contract between the parties and is signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. A contract is not enforceable beyond the quantity shown in the writing. When written confirmation of an oral contract between merchants is not objected to in writing by the receiver within ten days, the oral contract is enforceable. Exceptions to the requirement of a writing exist in the following situations: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> When the oral contract is for specially manufactured or obtained goods not suitable for resale or lease to others and the seller or lessor has made commitments for the manufacture or procurement of the goods. If the defendant admits in pleadings, testimony, or other court proceedings that an oral contract for the sale or lease of goods was made, then the contract will be enforceable to the extent of the quantity of goods admitted. The oral agreement will be enforceable to the extent that payment has been received and accepted or to the extent that goods have been received and accepted.
Parol Evidence Rule	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> The terms of a clearly and completely worded written contract cannot be contradicted by evidence of prior agreements or contemporaneous oral agreements. Evidence is admissible to clarify the terms of a writing in the following situations: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> If the contract terms are ambiguous. If evidence of course of dealing, usage of trade, or course of performance is necessary to learn or to clarify the intentions of the parties to the contract.

Applicability of the CISG

Essentially, the CISG is to international sales contracts what Article 2 of the UCC is to domestic sales contracts. As discussed in this chapter, in domestic transactions the UCC applies when the parties to a contract for a sale of goods have failed to specify in writing some important term concerning price, delivery, or the like. Similarly, whenever the parties to international transactions have failed to specify in writing the precise terms of a contract, the CISG will be applied. Unlike the UCC, the CISG does not apply to consumer sales, and neither the UCC nor the CISG applies to contracts for services.

Businesspersons must take special care when drafting international sales contracts to avoid problems caused by distance, including language differences and differences in national laws. The appendix following this chapter (pages 380–383) shows an actual international sales contract used by Starbucks Coffee Company. The contract illustrates many of the special terms and clauses that are typically contained in international contracts for the sale of goods. Annotations in this appendix explain the meaning and significance of specific clauses in the contract. (See Chapter 23 for a discussion of other laws that frame global business transactions.)

A Comparison of CISG and UCC Provisions

The provisions of the CISG, although similar for the most part to those of the UCC, differ from them in some respects. In the event that the CISG and the UCC are in conflict, the CISG applies (because it is a treaty of the national government and therefore is supreme—see the discussion of the supremacy clause of the U.S. Constitution in Chapter 4).

The major differences between the CISG and the UCC in regard to contract formation concern the mirror image rule, irrevocable offers, the Statute of Frauds, and the time of contract formation. We discuss these differences in the subsections that follow. CISG provisions relating to risk of loss, performance, remedies, and warranties will be discussed in the following chapters as those topics are examined.

THE MIRROR IMAGE RULE Under the UCC, a definite expression of acceptance that contains additional terms can still result in the formation of a contract, unless the additional terms are conditioned on the assent of the offeror. In other words, the UCC does away with the mirror image rule in domestic sales contracts.

Article 19 of the CISG provides that a contract can be formed even though the acceptance contains additional terms, unless the additional terms materially alter the contract. Under the CISG, however, the definition of a “material alteration” includes almost any change in the terms. If an additional term relates to payment, quality, quantity, price, time and place of delivery, extent of one party’s liability to the other, or the settlement of disputes, the CISG considers the added term a material alteration. In effect, then, the CISG requires that the terms of the acceptance mirror those of the offer.

Therefore, as a practical matter, businesspersons undertaking international sales transactions should not use the sale or purchase forms that they customarily use for transactions within the United States. Instead, they should draft specific forms to suit the needs of the particular transactions.

IRREVOCABLE OFFERS UCC 2–205 provides that a merchant’s firm offer is irrevocable, even without consideration, if the merchant gives assurances in a signed writing. In contrast, under the CISG, an offer can become irrevocable without a signed writing. Article 16(2) of the CISG provides that an offer will be irrevocable if the offeror simply states orally that the offer is irrevocable or if the offeree reasonably relies on the offer as being irrevocable. In both of these situations, the offer will be irrevocable even without a writing and without consideration.

THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS As mentioned previously, the UCC’s Statute of Frauds provision [UCC 2–201] requires that contracts for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more be evidenced by a written record signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. Article 11 of the CISG, however, states that a contract of sale “need not be concluded in or evidenced by writing and is not subject to any other requirements as to form. It may be proved by any means, including witnesses.” Article 11 of the CISG accords with the legal customs of most nations, which no longer require contracts to meet certain formal or writing requirements to be enforceable.

TIME OF CONTRACT FORMATION Under the common law of contracts, an acceptance is effective on dispatch, so a contract is created when the acceptance is transmitted. The UCC does not alter this so-called mailbox rule. Under the CISG, in contrast, a contract is created not at the time the acceptance is transmitted but only on its receipt by the offeror. (The offer becomes irrevocable, however, when the acceptance is sent.) Article 18(2) states that an acceptance by return promise “becomes effective at the moment the indication of assent reaches the offeror.” Under Article 18(3), the offeree may also bind the offeror by performance even without giving any notice to the offeror. The acceptance becomes effective “at the moment the act is performed.” Thus, it is the offeree’s reliance, rather than the communication of acceptance to the offeror, that creates the contract.

Special Provisions in International Contracts

Language and legal differences among nations can create various problems for parties to international contracts when disputes arise. It is possible to avoid these problems by including in a contract special provisions relating to choice of language, choice of forum, choice of law, and the types of events that may excuse the parties from performance.

CHOICE OF LANGUAGE A deal struck between a U.S. company and a company in another country frequently involves two languages. One party may not understand complex contractual terms that are written in the other party's language. Translating the terms poses its own problems, as typically many phrases are not readily translatable into another language. To make sure that no disputes arise out of this language problem, an international sales contract should include a choice-of-language clause, designating the official language by which the contract will be interpreted in the event of disagreement. The clause might also specify that the agreement is to be translated into, say, Spanish; that the translation is to be ratified by both parties; and that the foreign company can rely on the translation. If arbitration is anticipated, an additional clause must be added to indicate the official language that will be used at the arbitration proceeding.

CHOICE OF FORUM A forum-selection clause designates the forum (place, or court) in which any disputes that arise under the contract will be litigated. Including a forum-selection clause in an international contract is especially important because when several countries are involved, litigation may be sought in courts in different nations. There are no universally accepted rules regarding the jurisdiction of a particular court over subject matter or parties to a dispute, although the adoption of the 2005 Choice of Court Convention should help resolve certain issues. A forum-selection clause should indicate the specific court that will have jurisdiction. The forum does not necessarily have to be within the geographic boundaries of either party's nation.

Under certain circumstances, a forum-selection clause will not be valid. Specifically, if the clause denies one party an effective remedy, is the product of fraud or unconscionable conduct, causes substantial inconvenience to one of the parties, or violates public policy, the clause will not be enforced.

CHOICE OF LAW A contractual provision designating the applicable law, called a choice-of-law clause, is typically included in every international contract. At common law (and in European civil law systems—see Chapter 23), parties are allowed to choose the law that will govern their contractual relationship, provided that the law chosen is the law of a jurisdiction that has a substantial relationship to the parties and to the business transaction.

Under the UCC, parties may choose the law that will govern the contract as long as the choice is “reasonable.” Article 6 of the CISG, however, imposes no limitation on the parties in their choice of what law will govern the contract, and the 1986 Hague Convention on the Law Applicable to Contracts for the International Sale of Goods—often referred to as the Choice-of-Law Convention—allows unlimited autonomy in the choice of law. Whenever a choice of law is not specified in a contract, the Hague Convention indicates that the law of the country where the seller's place of business is located will govern.

FORCE MAJEURE CLAUSE Every contract, and particularly those involving international transactions, should include a force majeure clause. The meaning of the French term force majeure is “impossible or irresistible force”—sometimes loosely defined as “an act of God.” Force majeure clauses commonly stipulate that in addition to acts of God, a number of other eventualities (such as governmental orders or regulations, embargoes, or extreme shortages of materials) may excuse a party from liability for nonperformance.

REVIEWING

The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

Guy Holcomb owns and operates Oasis Goodtime Emporium, an adult entertainment establishment. Holcomb wanted to create an adult Internet system for Oasis that would offer customers adult theme videos and “live” chat room programs using performers at the club. On May 10, Holcomb signed a work order authorizing Thomas Consulting Group (TCG) “to deliver a working prototype of a customer chat system, demonstrating the integration of live video and chatting in a Web browser.” In exchange for creating the prototype, Holcomb agreed to pay TCG $64,697. On May 20, Holcomb signed an additional work order in the amount of $12,943 for TCG to install a customized firewall system. The work orders stated that Holcomb would make monthly installment payments to TCG, and both parties expected the work would be finished by September. Due to unforeseen problems largely attributable to system configuration and software incompatibility, the project required more time than anticipated. By the end of the summer, the Web site was still not ready, and Holcomb had fallen behind in his payments to TCG. TCG threatened to cease work and file a suit for breach of contract unless the bill was paid. Rather than make further payments, Holcomb wanted to abandon the Web site project. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would a court be likely to decide that the transaction between Holcomb and TCG was covered by the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC)? Why or why not?
2. Would a court be likely to consider Holcomb a merchant under the UCC? Why or why not?
3. Did the parties have a valid contract under the UCC? Were any terms left open in the contract? If so, which terms? How would a court deal with open terms?
4. Suppose that Holcomb and TCG meet in October in an attempt to resolve their problems. At that time, the parties reach an oral agreement that TCG will continue to work without demanding full payment of the past due amounts and Holcomb will pay TCG $5,000 per week. Assuming the contract falls under the UCC, is the oral agreement enforceable? Why or why not?

 DEBATE THIS: The UCC should require the same degree of definiteness of terms, especially with respect to price and quantity, as contract law does.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

19-1. Statute of Frauds Fresher Foods, Inc., orally agreed to purchase one thousand bushels of corn for $1.25 per bushel from Dale Vernon, a farmer. Fresher Foods paid $125 down and agreed to pay the remainder of the purchase price on delivery, which was scheduled for one week later. When Fresher Foods tendered the balance of $1,125 on the scheduled day of delivery and requested the corn, Vernon refused to deliver it. Fresher Foods sued Vernon for damages, claiming that Vernon had breached their oral contract. Can Fresher Foods recover? If so, to what extent?

19-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Acceptance.

 Flint, a retail seller of television sets, orders one hundred Color-X sets from manufacturer Martin. The order specifies the price and that the television sets are to be shipped by Hummingbird Express on or before October 30. Martin receives the order on October 5. On October 8, Martin writes Flint a letter indicating that the order was received and that the sets will be shipped as directed, at the specified price. Flint receives this letter on October 10. On October 28, Martin, in preparing the shipment, discovers it has only ninety Color-X sets in stock. Martin ships the ninety Color-X sets and ten television sets of a different model, stating clearly on the invoice that the ten are being shipped only as an accommodation. Flint claims Martin is in breach of contract. Martin claims that the shipment was not an acceptance and therefore no contract was formed. Explain who is correct, and why.

19–3. Additional Terms Strike offers to sell Bailey one thousand shirts for a stated price. The offer declares that shipment will be made by the Dependable Truck Line. Bailey replies, “I accept your offer for one thousand shirts at the price quoted. Delivery to be by Yellow Express Truck Line.” Both Strike and Bailey are merchants. Three weeks later, Strike ships the shirts by the Dependable Truck Line, and Bailey refuses shipment. Strike sues for breach of contract. Bailey claims (a) that there never was a contract because the reply, which included a modification of carriers, did not constitute an acceptance and (b) that even if there had been a contract, Strike would have been in breach owing to having shipped the shirts by Dependable, contrary to the contract terms. Discuss fully Bailey’s claims.

19–4. Goods and Services Combined Propulsion Technologies, Inc., a Louisiana firm doing business as PowerTech Marine Propellers, markets small steel boat propellers that are made by a unique tooling method. Attwood Corp., a Michigan firm, operated a foundry (a place where metal is cast) in Mexico. In 1996, Attwood offered to produce castings of the propellers. Attwood promised to maintain quality, warrant the castings against defects, and obtain insurance to cover liability. In January 1997, the parties signed a letter that expressed these and other terms—Attwood was to be paid per casting, and twelve months’ notice was required to terminate the deal—but the letter did not state a quantity. PowerTech provided the tooling. Attwood produced rough castings, which PowerTech refined by checking each propeller’s pitch; machining its interior; grinding, balancing, and polishing the propeller; and adding serial numbers and a rubber clutch. In October, Attwood told PowerTech that the foundry was closing. PowerTech filed a suit in a federal district court against Attwood, alleging, among other things, breach of contract. One of the issues was whether their deal was subject to Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code. What type of transactions does Article 2 cover? Does the arrangement between PowerTech and Attwood qualify? Explain. [Propulsion Technologies, Inc. v. Attwood Corp., 369 F.3d 896 (5th Cir. 2004)]

19–5. Offer In 1998, Johnson Controls, Inc. (JCI), began buying auto parts from Q.C. Onics Ventures, LP. For each part, JCI would inform Onics of its need and ask the price. Onics would analyze the specifications, contact its suppliers, and respond with a formal quotation. A quote listed a part’s number and description, the price per unit, and an estimate of units available for a given year. A quote did not state payment terms, an acceptance date, timing of performance, warranties, or quantities. JCI would select a supplier and issue a purchase order for a part. The purchase order required the seller to supply all of JCI’s requirements for the part but gave the buyer the right to end the deal at any time. Using this procedure, JCI issued hundreds of purchase orders. In July 2001, JCI terminated its relationship with Onics and began buying parts through another supplier. Onics filed a suit in a federal district court against JCI, alleging breach of contract. Which documents—the price quotations or the purchase orders—constituted offers? Which were acceptances? What effect would the answers to these questions have on the result in this case? Explain. [Q.C. Onics Ventures, LP v. Johnson Controls, Inc., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (N.D.Ind. 2006)]

19–6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Parol Evidence.

Clear Lakes Trout Co. operates a fish hatchery in Idaho. Rodney and Carla Griffith are trout growers. Clear Lakes agreed to sell “small trout” to the Griffiths, who agreed to sell the trout back when they had grown to “market size.” At the time, in the trade “market size” referred to fish approximating one-pound live weight. The parties did business without a written agreement until September 1998, when they executed a contract with a six-year duration. The contract did not define “market size.” All went well until September 11, 2001, after which there was a demand for larger fish. Clear Lakes began taking deliveries later and in smaller loads, leaving the Griffiths with overcrowded ponds and other problems. In 2003, the Griffiths refused to accept more fish and filed a suit in an Idaho state court against Clear Lakes, alleging breach of contract. Clear Lakes argued that there was no contract because the parties had different interpretations of “market size.” Clear Lakes claimed that “market size” varied according to whatever its customers demanded. The Griffiths asserted that the term referred to fish of about one-pound live weight. Is outside evidence admissible to explain the terms of a contract? Are there any exceptions that could apply in this case? If so, what is the likely result? Explain. [Griffith v. Clear Lakes Trout Co., 143 Idaho 733, 152 P.3d 604 (Idaho 2007)]

19–7. Additional Terms Continental Insurance Co. issued a policy to cover shipments by Oakley Fertilizer, Inc. Oakley agreed to ship three thousand tons of fertilizer by barge from New Orleans, Louisiana, to Ameropa North America in Caruthersville, Missouri. Oakley sent Ameropa a contract form that set out these terms and stated that title and risk (discussed in Chapter 20) would pass to the buyer after the seller was paid for the goods. Ameropa e-mailed a different form that set out the same essential terms but stated that title and risk of loss would pass to the buyer when the goods were loaded onto the barges in New Orleans. The cargo was loaded onto barges but had not yet been delivered when it was damaged in

Hurricane Katrina. Oakley filed a claim for the loss with Continental but was denied coverage. Oakley filed a suit in a Missouri state court against the insurer. Continental argued that title and risk passed to Ameropa before the damage as specified in the buyer's form under Section 2-207(3) of the Uniform Commercial Code because the parties did not have a valid contract under UCC 2-207(1). Apply UCC 2-207 on additional terms in an acceptance to these facts. Is Continental correct? Explain. [Oakley Fertilizer, Inc. v. Continental Insurance Co., 276 S.W.3d 342 (Mo.App.E.D. 2009)]

19-8. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Contract Terms.

Daniel Fox owned Fox and Lamberth Enterprises, Inc., a kitchen and bath remodeling business, in Dayton, Ohio. Fox leased a building from Carl and Bellulah Hussong. Craftsmen Home Improvement, Inc., also remodeled baths and kitchens. When Fox planned to close his business, Craftsmen expressed an interest in buying his showroom assets. Fox set a price of $50,000. Craftsmen's owners agreed and gave Fox a list of the desired items and "A Bill of Sale" that set the terms for payment. The parties did not discuss Fox's arrangement with the Hussongs, but Craftsmen expected to negotiate a new lease and extensively modified the premises, including removing some of the displays to its own showroom. When the Hussongs and Craftsmen could not agree on new terms, Craftsmen told Fox that the deal was off. [Fox & Lamberth Enterprises, Inc. v. Craftsmen Home Improvement, Inc., __ Ohio App.3d __, __ N.E.2d __ (2 Dist. 2006)]

- (a) In Fox's suit in an Ohio state court for breach of contract, Craftsmen raised the Statute of Frauds as a defense. What are the requirements of the Statute of Frauds? Did the deal between Fox and Craftsmen meet these requirements? Did it fall under one of the exceptions? Explain.
- (b) Craftsmen also claimed that the predominant factor of its agreement with Fox was a lease for the Hussongs' building. What is the "predominant-factor" test? Does it apply here? In any event, is it fair to hold a party to a contract to buy a business's assets when the buyer cannot negotiate a favorable lease of the premises on which the assets are located? Discuss.

Go to this text's Web site at www.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 19." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Sales and Lease Contracts: Price as a Term. Then answer the following questions.

- (a) Is Anna correct in assuming that a contract can exist even though the sales price for the computer equipment was not specified? Explain.
- (b) According to the Uniform Commercial Code, what conditions must be satisfied in order for a contract to be formed when certain terms are left open? What terms (in addition to price) can be left open?
- (c) Are the e-mail messages that Anna refers to sufficient proof of the contract?
- (d) Would parol evidence be admissible?

An Example of a Contract for the International Sale of Coffee

- 1 This is a contract for a sale of coffee to be imported internationally. If the parties have their principal places of business located in different countries, the contract may be subject to the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG). If the parties' principal places of business are located in the United States, the contract may be subject to the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).
- 2 Quantity is one of the most important terms to include in a contract. Without it, a court may not be able to enforce the contract. See Chapter 19.
- 3 Weight per unit (bag) can be exactly stated or approximately stated. If it is not so stated, usage of trade in international contracts determines standards of weight.
- 4 Packaging requirements can be conditions for acceptance and payment. Bulk shipments are not permitted without the consent of the buyer.
- 5 A description of the coffee and the "Markings" constitute express warranties. Warranties in contracts for domestic sales of goods are discussed generally in Chapter 22. International contracts rely more heavily on descriptions and models or samples.
- 6 Under the UCC, parties may enter into a valid contract even though the price is not set. Under the CISG, a contract must provide for an exact determination of the price.
- 7 The terms of payment may take one of two forms: credit or cash. Credit terms can be complicated. A cash term can be simple, and payment can be made by any means acceptable in the ordinary course of business (for example, a personal check or a letter of credit). If the seller insists on actual cash, the buyer must be given a reasonable time to get it. See Chapter 21.
- 8 Tender means the seller has placed goods that conform to the contract at the buyer's disposition. What constitutes a valid tender is explained in Chapter 21. This contract requires that the coffee meet all import regulations and that it be ready for pickup by the buyer at a "Bonded Public Warehouse." (A bonded warehouse is a place in which goods can be stored without payment of taxes until the goods are removed.)
- 9 The delivery date is significant because, if it is not met, the buyer may hold the seller in breach of the contract. Under this contract, the seller is given a "period" within which to deliver the goods, instead of a specific day. The seller is also given some time to rectify goods that do not pass inspection (see the "Guarantee" clause on page two of the contract). For a discussion of the remedies of the buyer and seller, see Chapter 21.
- 10 As part of a proper tender, the seller (or its agent) must inform the buyer (or its agent) when the goods have arrived at their destination. The responsibilities of agents are set out in Chapters 32 and 33.
- 11 In some contracts, delivered and shipped weights can be important. During shipping, some loss can be attributed to the type of goods (spoilage of fresh produce, for example) or to the transportation itself. A seller and buyer can agree on the extent to which either of them will bear such losses. See Chapter 49 for a discussion of the liability of common carriers for loss during shipment.
- 12 Documents are often incorporated in a contract by reference, because including them word for word can make a contract difficult to read. If the document is later revised, the entire contract might have to be reworked. Documents that are typically incorporated by reference include detailed payment and delivery terms, special provisions, and sets of rules, codes, and standards.
- 13 In international sales transactions, and for domestic deals involving certain products, brokers are used to form the contracts. When so used, the brokers are entitled to a commission. See Chapter 32.

TERMS AND CONDITIONS

- 14 ARBITRATION: All controversies relating to, in connection with, or arising out of this contract, its modification, making or the authority or obligations of the signatories hereto, and whether involving the principals, agents, brokers, or others who actually subscribe hereto, shall be settled by arbitration in accordance with the "Rules of Arbitration" of the Green Coffee Association of New York City, Inc., as they exist at the time of the arbitration (including provisions as to payment of fees and expenses). Arbitration is the sole remedy hereunder, and it shall be held in accordance with the law of New York State, and judgment of any award may be entered in the courts of that State, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction. All notices or judicial service in reference to arbitration or enforcement shall be deemed given if transmitted as required by the aforesaid rules.
- 15 GUARANTEE: (a) If all or any of the coffee is refused admission into the country of importation by reason of any violation of governmental laws or acts, which violation existed at the time the coffee arrived at Bonded Public Warehouse, seller is required, as to the amount not admitted and as soon as possible, to deliver replacement coffee in conformity to all terms and conditions of this contract, excepting only the Arrival terms, but not later than thirty (30) days after the date of the violation notice. Any payment made and expenses incurred for any coffee denied entry shall be refunded within ten (10) calendar days of denial of entry, and payment shall be made for the replacement delivery in accordance with the terms of this contract. Consequently, if Buyer removes the coffee from the Bonded Public Warehouse, Seller's responsibility as to such portion hereunder ceases.
(b) Contracts containing the overstamp "No Pass-No Sale" on the face of the contract shall be interpreted to mean: If any or all of the coffee is not admitted into the country of Importation in its original condition by reason of failure to meet requirements of the government's laws or Acts, the contract shall be deemed null and void as to that portion of the coffee which is not admitted in its original condition. Any payment made and expenses incurred for any coffee denied entry shall be refunded within ten (10) calendar days of denial of entry.
- 16 CONTINGENCY: This contract is not contingent upon any other contract.
- 17 CLAIMS: Coffee shall be considered accepted as to quality unless within fifteen (15) calendar days after delivery at Bonded Public Warehouse or within fifteen (15) calendar days after all Government clearances have been received, whichever is later, either:
(a) Claims are settled by the parties hereto, or,
(b) Arbitration proceedings have been filed by one of the parties in accordance with the provisions hereof.
(c) If neither (a) nor (b) has been done in the stated period or if any portion of the coffee has been removed from the Bonded Public Warehouse before representative sealed samples have been drawn by the Green Coffee Association of New York City, Inc., in accordance with its rules, Seller's responsibility for quality claims ceases for that portion so removed.
(d) Any question of quality submitted to arbitration shall be a matter of allowance only, unless otherwise provided in the contract.
- 18 DELIVERY: (a) No more than three (3) chops may be tendered for each lot of 250 bags.
(b) Each chop of coffee tendered is to be uniform in grade and appearance. All expense necessary to make coffee uniform shall be for account of seller.
(c) Notice of arrival and/or sampling order constitutes a tender, and must be given not later than the fifth business day following arrival at Bonded Public Warehouse stated on the contract.
- 19 INSURANCE: Seller is responsible for any loss or damage, or both, until Delivery and Discharge of coffee at the Bonded Public Warehouse in the Country of Importation.

All Insurance Risks, costs and responsibility are for Seller's Account until Delivery and Discharge of coffee at the Bonded Public Warehouse in the Country of Importation.

Buyer's insurance responsibility begins from the day of importation or from the day of tender, whichever is later.
- 20 FREIGHT: Seller to provide and pay for all transportation and related expenses to the Bonded Public Warehouse in the Country of Importation.
- 20 EXPORT DUTIES/TAXES: Exporter is to pay all Export taxes, duties or other fees or charges, if any, levied because of exportation.
IMPORT DUTIES/TAXES: Any Duty or Tax whatsoever, imposed by the government or any authority of the Country of Importation, shall be borne by the Importer/Buyer.
- 21 INSOLVENCY OR FINANCIAL FAILURE OF BUYER OR SELLER: If, at any time before the contract is fully executed, either party hereto shall meet with creditors because of inability generally to make payment of obligations when due, or shall suspend such payments, fail to meet his general trade obligations in the regular course of business, shall file a petition in bankruptcy or, for an arrangement, shall become insolvent, or commit an act of bankruptcy, then the other party may at his option, expressed in writing, declare the aforesaid to constitute a breach and default of this contract, and may, in addition to other remedies, decline to deliver further or make payment or may sell or purchase for the defaulter's account, and may collect damage for any injury or loss, or shall account for the profit, if any, occasioned by such sale or purchase.

This clause is subject to the provisions of (11 USC 365 (e) 1) if invoked.
- 22 BREACH OR DEFAULT OF CONTRACT: In the event either party hereto fails to perform, or breaches or repudiates this agreement, the other party shall subject to the specific provisions of this contract be entitled to the remedies and relief provided for by the Uniform Commercial Code of the State of New York. The computation and ascertainment of damages, or the determination of any other dispute as to relief, shall be made by the arbitrators in accordance with the Arbitration Clause herein.
- 23 Consequential damages shall not, however, be allowed.

An Example of a Contract for the International Sale of Coffee

- 14 Arbitration is the settling of a dispute by submitting it to a disinterested party (other than a court), which renders a decision. The procedures and costs can be provided for in an arbitration clause or incorporated through other documents. To enforce an award rendered in an arbitration, the winning party can “enter” (submit) the award in a court “of competent jurisdiction.” For a general discussion of arbitration and other forms of dispute resolution (other than courts), see Chapter 2.
- 15 When goods are imported internationally, they must meet certain import requirements before being released to the buyer. Because of this, buyers frequently want a guaranty clause that covers the goods not admitted into the country and that either requires the seller to replace the goods within a stated time or allows the contract for those goods not admitted to be void. See Chapter 17.
- 16 In the “Claims” clause, the parties agree that the buyer has a certain time within which to reject the goods. The right to reject is a right by law and does not need to be stated in a contract. If the buyer does not exercise the right within the time specified in the contract, the goods will be considered accepted. See Chapter 21.
- 17 Many international contracts include definitions of terms so that the parties understand what they mean. Some terms are used in a particular industry in a specific way. Here, the word chop refers to a unit of like-grade coffee beans. The buyer has a right to inspect (“sample”) the coffee. If the coffee does not conform to the contract, the seller must correct the nonconformity. See Chapter 21.
- 18 The “Delivery,” “Insurance,” and “Freight” clauses, with the “Arrival” clause on page one of the contract, indicate that this is a destination contract. The seller has the obligation to deliver the goods to the destination, not simply deliver them into the hands of a carrier. Under this contract, the destination is a “Bonded Public Warehouse” in a specific location. The seller bears the risk of loss until the goods are delivered at their destination. Typically, the seller will have bought insurance to cover the risk. See Chapter 20 for a discussion of delivery terms and the risk of loss and Chapter 51 for a general discussion of insurance.
- 19 Delivery terms are commonly placed in all sales contracts. Such terms determine who pays freight and other costs and, in the absence of an agreement specifying otherwise, who bears the risk of loss. International contracts may use these delivery terms, or they may use INCOTERMS, which are published by the International Chamber of Commerce. For example, the INCOTERM DDP (delivered duty paid) requires the seller to arrange shipment, obtain and pay for import or export permits, and get the goods through customs to a named destination.
- 20 Exported and imported goods are subject to duties, taxes, and other charges imposed by the governments of the countries involved. International contracts spell out who is responsible for these charges.
- 21 This clause protects a party if the other party should become financially unable to fulfill the obligations under the contract. Thus, if the seller cannot afford to deliver, or the buyer cannot afford to pay, for the stated reasons, the other party can consider the contract breached. This right is subject to “11 USC 365(e)(1),” which refers to a specific provision of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code dealing with executory contracts. Bankruptcy provisions are covered in Chapter 30.
- 22 In the “Breach or Default of Contract” clause, the parties agreed that the remedies under this contract are the remedies (except for consequential damages) provided by the UCC, as in effect in the state of New York. The amount and “ascertainment” of damages, as well as other disputes about relief, are to be determined by arbitration. Breach of contract and contractual remedies in general are explained in Chapter 21. Arbitration is discussed in Chapter 2.
- 23 Three clauses frequently included in international contracts (see Chapter 19) are omitted here. There is no choice-of-language clause designating the official language to be used in interpreting the contract terms. There is no choice-of-forum clause designating the place in which disputes will be litigated, except for arbitration (law of New York State). Finally, there is no force majeure clause relieving the sellers or buyers from nonperformance due to events beyond their control.

Title, Risk, and Insurable Interest

Before the creation of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), title—the right of ownership—was the central concept in sales law, controlling all issues of rights and remedies of the parties to a sales contract. There were numerous problems with this concept, however. For example, it was frequently difficult to determine when title actually passed from the seller to the buyer, and therefore it was also difficult to predict which party a court would decide had title at the time of a loss. Because of such problems, the UCC divorced the question of title as completely as possible from the question of the rights and obligations of buyers, sellers, and third parties (such as subsequent purchasers, creditors, or the tax collector).

In some situations, title is still relevant under the UCC, and the UCC has special rules for assigning title. These rules will be discussed in the sections that follow. In most situations, however, the UCC has replaced the concept of title with three other concepts: identification, risk of loss, and insurable interest.

In lease contracts, of course, the lessor-owner of the goods retains title. Hence, the UCC's provisions relating to passage of title do not apply to leased goods. Other concepts discussed in this chapter, though, including identification, risk of loss, and insurable interest, relate to lease contracts as well as to sales contracts.

SECTION 1 IDENTIFICATION

Before any interest in specific goods can pass from the seller or lessor to the buyer or lessee, the goods must be (1) in existence and (2) identified as the specific goods designated in the contract [UCC 2-105(2)]. Identification takes place when specific goods are designated as the subject matter of a sales or lease contract. Title and risk of loss cannot pass to the buyer from the seller unless the goods are identified to the contract. (As mentioned, title to leased goods remains with the lessor—or, if the owner is a third party, with that party.) Identification is significant because it gives the buyer or lessee the right to insure (or to have an insurable interest in) the goods and the right to recover from third parties who damage the goods. Once the goods are in existence, the parties can agree in their contract on when identification will take place. If they do not so specify, the UCC will determine when identification takes place [UCC 2-501(1), 2A-217].

Existing Goods

If the contract calls for the sale or lease of specific and ascertained goods that are already in existence, identification takes place at the time the contract is made. For example, Litco, LLC, contracts to purchase or lease a fleet of five cars by their vehicle identification numbers (VINs). Because the cars are identified by their VINs, identification has taken place, and Litco acquires an insurable interest in them at the time of contracting.

Future Goods

Any goods that are not in existence at the time of contracting are known as future goods. If a sale or lease involves unborn animals to be born within twelve months after contracting, identification takes place when the animals are conceived. If a sale involves crops that are to be harvested within twelve months (or the next harvest season occurring after contracting, whichever is longer), identification takes place when the crops are planted. Otherwise, identification takes place when the crops begin to grow. In a sale or lease of any other future goods, identification occurs when the goods are shipped, marked, or otherwise designated by the seller or lessor as the goods to which the contract refers.

CASE IN POINT Gordon Bonner signed a contract with Ronnie Carman to build a forty-six-foot motorboat for $278,950. The contract required progress payments but did not contain any specific provisions regarding delivery (which, as you will read shortly, can determine when title to the goods passes to the buyer). After nearly three years, with the boat still not completed, Carman filed for bankruptcy. The bankruptcy trustee wanted to sell the unfinished boat to pay Carman's creditors, but Bonner claimed that the boat—which was still on Carman's business premises—was his. The court held that under the UCC, the boat constituted future goods because it did not exist at the time the contract was signed. In addition, title had not passed to Bonner, because the boat had not been identified to the contract—for example, by listing its hull number in the contract or by later marking or designating it as Bonner's. Therefore, the bankruptcy trustee could sell it and distribute the funds to Carman's creditors.¹

Goods That Are Part of a Larger Mass

Goods that are part of a larger mass are identified when the goods are marked, shipped, or somehow designated by the seller or lessor as the particular goods to pass under the contract. Suppose that a buyer orders 10,000 pairs of men's jeans from a lot that contains 90,000 articles of clothing for men, women, and children. Until the seller separates the 10,000 pairs of jeans from the other items, title and risk of loss remain with the seller.

A common exception to this rule involves fungible goods. Fungible goods are goods that are alike naturally, by agreement, or by trade usage. Typical examples include specific grades or types of wheat, oil, and wine, which usually are stored in large containers. If the owners of these goods hold title as tenants in common (owners having shares undivided from the entire mass jointly owned—see Chapter 49), a seller-owner can pass title and risk of loss to the buyer without actually separating the goods. The buyer replaces the seller as an owner in common [UCC 2-105(4)].

For example, Alvarez, Braudel, and Carpenter are farmers. They deposit, respectively, 5,000 bushels, 3,000 bushels, and 2,000 bushels of grain of the same grade and quality in a grain elevator. The three become owners in common, with Alvarez owning 50 percent of the 10,000 bushels, Braudel 30 percent, and Carpenter 20 percent. Alvarez contracts to sell her 5,000 bushels of grain to Treyton. Because the goods are fungible, she can pass title and risk of loss to Treyton without physically separating the 5,000 bushels. Treyton now becomes an owner in common with Braudel and Carpenter.

SECTION 2 WHEN TITLE PASSES

Once goods exist and are identified, the provisions of UCC 2-401 apply to the passage of title. In nearly all subsections of UCC 2-401, the words “unless otherwise explicitly agreed” appear, meaning that any explicit understanding between the buyer and the seller determines when title passes. Without an explicit agreement to the contrary, title passes to the buyer at the time and the place the seller performs by delivering the goods [UCC 2-401(2)]. For example, if a person buys cattle at a livestock auction, title will pass when the cattle are physically delivered to him or her (unless, of course, the parties agree otherwise).²

Shipment and Destination Contracts

Unless otherwise agreed, delivery arrangements can determine when title passes from the seller to the buyer. In a shipment contract, the seller is required or authorized to ship goods by carrier, such as a trucking company. Under a shipment contract, the seller is required only to deliver the goods into the hands of a carrier, and title passes to the buyer at the time and place of shipment [UCC 2-401(2)(a)]. Generally, a contract is assumed to be a shipment contract if nothing to the contrary is stated in the contract.

1. In re Carman, 399 Bankr. 158 (D.Md. 2009). For another case in which a boat was held to be future goods, see Gonsalves v. Montgomery, 2006 WL 2711540 (N.D.Cal. 2006).

2. See, for example, In re Stewart, 274 Bankr. 503 (2002).

In a destination contract, the seller is required to deliver the goods to a particular destination, usually directly to the buyer, but sometimes to another party designated by the buyer. Title passes to the buyer when the goods are tendered at that destination [UCC 2–401(2)(b)]. As you will read in Chapter 21, tender of delivery occurs when the seller places or holds conforming goods at the buyer's disposal (with any necessary notice), enabling the buyer to take possession [UCC 2–503(1)].

Delivery without Movement of the Goods

Sometimes, a sales contract does not call for the seller to ship or deliver the goods (such as when the buyer is to pick up the goods). In that situation, the passage of title depends on whether the seller must deliver a document of title, such as a bill of lading or a warehouse receipt, to the buyer. A *bill of lading*³ is a receipt for goods that is signed by a carrier and serves as a contract for the transportation of the goods. A warehouse receipt is a receipt issued by a warehouse for goods stored in a warehouse.

When a document of title is required, title passes to the buyer when and where the document is delivered. Thus, if the goods are stored in a warehouse, title passes to the buyer when the appropriate documents are delivered to the buyer. The goods never move. In fact, the buyer can choose to leave the goods at the same warehouse for a period of time, and the buyer's title to those goods will be unaffected.

When no document of title is required, and delivery is made without moving the goods, title passes at the time and place the sales contract is made, if the goods have already been identified. If the goods have not been identified, title does not pass until identification occurs. Suppose that Juarez sells lumber to Bodan. They agree that Bodan will pick up the lumber at the yard. If the lumber has been identified (segregated, marked, or in any other way distinguished from all other lumber), title passes to Bodan when the contract is signed. If the lumber is still in large storage bins at the mill, title does not pass to Bodan until the particular pieces of lumber to be sold under this contract are identified [UCC 2–401(3)].

3. The term bill of lading has been used by international carriers for many years and is derived from bill, which historically referred to a schedule of costs for services, and the verb to lade, which means to load cargo onto a ship or other form of transportation.

Sales or Leases by Nonowners

Problems occur when persons who acquire goods with imperfect titles attempt to sell or lease them. Sections 2–402 and 2–403 of the UCC deal with the rights of two parties who lay claim to the same goods sold with imperfect titles. Generally, a buyer acquires at least whatever title the seller has to the goods sold.

These same UCC sections also protect lessees. Obviously, a lessee does not acquire whatever title the lessor has to the goods; rather, the lessee acquires a right to possess and use the goods—that is, a leasehold interest. A lessee acquires whatever leasehold interest the lessor has or has the power to transfer, subject to the lease contract [UCC 2A–303, 2A–304, 2A–305].

VOID TITLE A buyer may unknowingly purchase goods from a seller who is not the owner of the goods. If the seller is a thief, the seller's title is void—legally, no title exists. Thus, the buyer acquires no title, and the real owner can reclaim the goods from the buyer. The same result would occur if the goods were leased instead, because the lessor would have no leasehold interest to transfer.

If Saki steals a valuable necklace owned by Macy, Saki has a void title to that necklace. If Saki sells the necklace to Valdez, Macy can reclaim it from Valdez even though Valdez acted in good faith and honestly was not aware that the necklace was stolen. (Note that Valdez may file a tort claim against Saki under these circumstances, but here we are only discussing title to the goods.) Article 2A contains similar provisions for leases.

VOIDABLE TITLE A seller has a voidable title if the goods that he or she is selling were obtained by fraud, paid for with a check that was later dishonored, purchased from a minor, or purchased on credit when the seller was insolvent. (Under the UCC, a person is insolvent when that person ceases to pay his or her debts in the ordinary course of business, cannot pay his or her debts as they become due, or is insolvent within the meaning of federal bankruptcy law [UCC 1–201(23)].)

Good Faith Purchasers. In contrast to a seller with void title, a seller with voidable title has the power to transfer good title to a good faith purchaser for value. A good faith purchaser is one who buys without knowledge of circumstances that would make a person of ordinary prudence inquire about the validity of the seller's title to the goods.

One who purchases for value gives legally sufficient consideration (value) for the goods purchased. The original owner normally cannot recover goods from a good faith purchaser for value [UCC 2-403(1)].⁴ If the buyer of the goods is not a good faith purchaser for value, then the actual owner of the goods can reclaim them from the buyer (or from the seller, if the goods are still in the seller's possession). Exhibit 20-1 illustrates these concepts.

Voidable Title and Leases. The same rules apply in situations involving leases. A lessor with voidable title has the power to transfer a valid leasehold interest to a good faith lessee for value. The real owner cannot recover the goods, except as permitted by the terms of the lease. The real owner can, however, receive all proceeds arising from the lease and can obtain a transfer of the rights that the lessor had under the lease, including the right to the return of the goods when the lease expires [UCC 2A-305(1)].

THE ENTRUSTMENT RULE Entrusting goods to a merchant who deals in goods of that kind gives the merchant the power to transfer all rights to a buyer in the ordinary course of business [UCC 2-403(2)]. This is known as the entrustment rule. Entrusting includes both turning over the goods to the merchant and leaving purchased goods with the merchant for later delivery or pickup [UCC 2-403(3)]. Article 2A provides a similar rule for leased goods [UCC 2A-305(2)]. A buyer in the ordinary course of business is a person who—in good faith and without knowledge that the sale violates the rights of another party—buys goods in the ordinary course from a merchant (other than a pawnbroker) in the business of selling goods of that kind [UCC 1-201(9)].

The entrustment rule basically allows innocent buyers to obtain legitimate title to goods purchased from merchants even if the merchants do not have good title. Assume that Jan leaves her watch with a jeweler to be repaired. The jeweler sells both new and used watches. The jeweler sells Jan's watch to Kim, a customer who is unaware that the jeweler has no right to sell it. Kim, as a good faith buyer, gets good title against Jan's claim of ownership.⁵ Kim, however, obtains only those rights held by the person entrusting the goods (Jan).

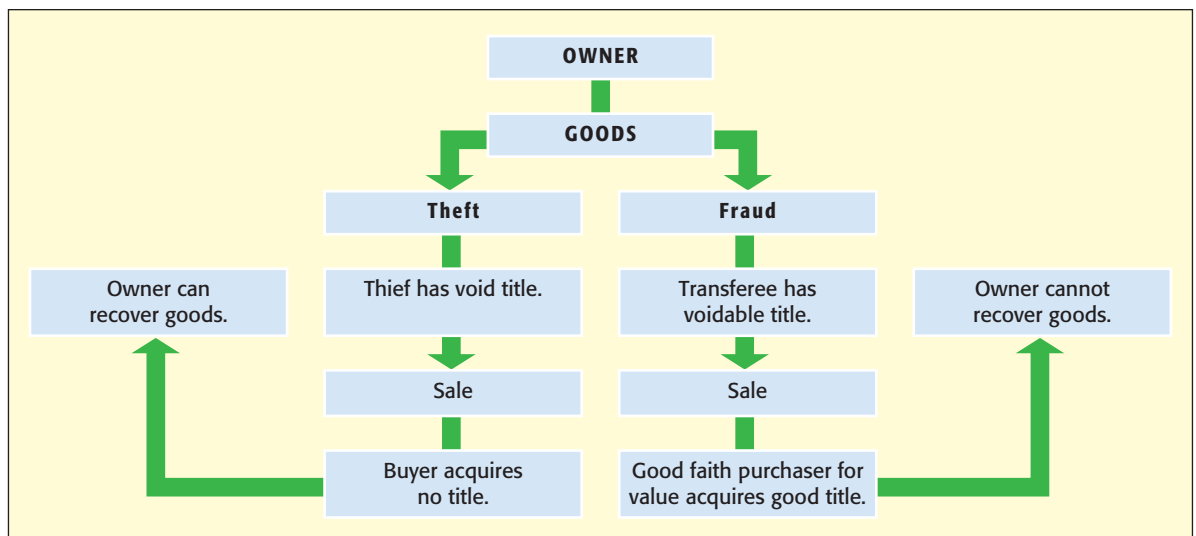

Now suppose instead that Jan had stolen the watch from Greg and then left it with the jeweler to be repaired. The jeweler then sold it to Kim. Kim would obtain good title against Jan, who entrusted

4. The real owner could sue the person who initially obtained voidable title to the goods.

5. Jan can sue the jeweler for the tort of conversion (or trespass to personal property) to obtain damages equivalent to the cash value of the watch (see Chapter 6 on page 127).

EXHIBIT 20-1 • Void and Voidable Titles

If goods are transferred from their owner to another by theft, the thief acquires no ownership rights. Because the thief's title is void, a later buyer can acquire no title, and the owner can recover the goods. If the transfer occurs by fraud, the transferee acquires a voidable title. A later good faith purchaser for value can acquire good title, and the original owner cannot recover the goods.

the watch to the jeweler, but not against Greg (the real owner), who neither entrusted the watch to Jan nor authorized Jan to entrust it.

A nonowner's sale of Red Elvis, an artwork by Andy Warhol, was at the center of the dispute in the following case.

CASE 20.1

Lindholm v. Brant

Supreme Court of Connecticut, 283 Conn. 65, 925 A.2d 1048 (2007).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In 1987, Kerstin Lindholm of Greenwich, Connecticut, bought a silkscreen by Andy Warhol titled Red Elvis from Anders Malmberg, a Swedish art dealer, for $300,000. In 1998, Lindholm loaned Red Elvis to the Guggenheim Museum in New York City for an exhibition to tour Europe. Peter Brant, who was on the museum's board of trustees and also a Greenwich resident, believed that Lindholm was the owner. Stellan Holm, a Swedish art dealer who had bought and sold other Warhol works with Brant, told him, however, that Malmberg had bought it and would sell it for $2.9 million. Malmberg refused Brant's request to provide a copy of an invoice between Lindholm and himself on the ground that such documents normally and customarily are not disclosed in art deals. To determine whether Malmberg had good title, Brant hired an attorney to search the Art Loss Register (an international database of stolen and missing artworks) and other sources. No problems were found, but Brant was cautioned that this provided only "minimal assurances." Brant's attorney drafted a formal contract, which conditioned payment on the delivery of Red Elvis to a warehouse in Denmark. The exchange took place in April 2000.^a Lindholm filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Brant, alleging conversion, among other things. The court issued a judgment in Brant's favor. Lindholm appealed to the Connecticut Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

SULLIVAN, J. [Justice]

* * *

* * * "A person buys goods in the ordinary course if the sale to the person comports with the usual or customary practices in the kind of business in which the seller is engaged or with the seller's own usual or customary practices * * *" [according to Connecticut General Statutes Annotated Section 42a-1-201(9), (Connecticut's version of UCC 1-201(9)). A person buys goods in good faith if there is "honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing" in the conduct or transaction concerned [under Section 42a-1-201(20)]. [Emphasis added.]

We are required, therefore, to determine whether the defendant followed the usual or customary practices and observed reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the art industry in his dealings with Malmberg. * * * The defendant presented expert testimony that the vast majority of art transactions, in which the buyer has no reason for concern about the seller's ability to convey good title, are "completed on a handshake and an exchange of an invoice." It is not customary for sophisticated buyers and sellers to obtain a signed invoice from the original seller to the dealer prior to a transaction, nor is it an ordinary or customary practice to request the underlying invoice or corroborating information as to a dealer's authority to convey title. Moreover, it is not customary to approach the owner of an artwork if the owner regularly worked with a particular art dealer because any inquiries about an art transaction customarily are presented to the art dealer rather than directly to the [owner]. It is customary to rely upon representations made by respected dealers regarding their authority to sell works of art. A dealer customarily is not required to present an invoice establishing when and from whom he bought the artwork or the conditions of the purchase. [Emphasis added.]

- a. Unaware of this deal, Lindholm accepted a Japanese buyer's offer of $4.6 million for Red Elvis. The funds were wired to Malmberg, who kept them. Lindholm filed a criminal complaint against Malmberg in Sweden. In 2003, a Swedish court convicted Malmberg of "gross fraud embezzlement." The court awarded Lindholm $4.6 million and other relief.

CASE 20.1 CONTINUED ♦ We are compelled to conclude, however, that the sale from Malmberg to the defendant was unlike the vast majority of art transactions. * * * Under such circumstances, a handshake and an exchange of invoice is not sufficient to confer status as a buyer in the ordinary course.

* * * *

* * * A merchant buyer has a heightened duty of inquiry when a reasonable merchant would have doubts or questions regarding the seller's authority to sell. * * * In the present case, the defendant had concerns about Malmberg's ability to convey good title to Red Elvis because he believed that Lindholm might have had a claim to the painting. The defendant also was concerned that Malmberg had not yet acquired title to the painting * * *.

Because of his concern that Lindholm might make a claim to Red Elvis, the defendant took the extraordinary step of hiring counsel to conduct an investigation and to negotiate a formal contract of sale on his behalf. * * * Such searches typically are not conducted during the course of a normal art transaction and, therefore, provided the defendant with at least some assurance that Lindholm had no claims to the painting.

Moreover, * * * both Malmberg and Holm had reputations as honest, reliable, and trustworthy art dealers. * * * The defendant had little reason to doubt Malmberg's claim that he was the owner of Red Elvis, and any doubts that he did have reasonably were allayed [reduced] by relying on Holm's assurances that Malmberg had bought the painting from the plaintiff * * *.

The defendant's concerns were further allayed when Malmberg delivered Red Elvis to a * * * warehouse in Denmark, the delivery location the parties had agreed to in the contract of sale. At the time of the sale, the painting was on loan to the Guggenheim, whose policy it was to release a painting on loan only to the true owner, or to someone the true owner had authorized to take possession. * * * We conclude that these steps were sufficient to conform to reasonable commercial standards for the sale of artwork under the circumstances and, therefore, that the defendant had status as a buyer in the ordinary course of business.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Connecticut Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. The state supreme court concluded that "on the basis of all the circumstances surrounding this sale," Brant was a buyer in the ordinary course of business and, therefore, took all rights to Red Elvis under UCC 2-403(2).

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • How did the "usual and customary" methods of dealing in the art business help Malmberg deceive the other parties in this case? What additional steps might those parties have taken to protect themselves from such deceit?

THE GLOBAL DIMENSION • Considering the international locales in this case, why was Lindholm able to bring an action against Brant in Connecticut?

SECTION 3 RISK OF LOSS

Under the UCC, risk of loss does not necessarily pass with title. When risk of loss passes from a seller or lessor to a buyer or lessee is generally determined by the contract between the parties. Sometimes, the contract states expressly when the risk of loss passes. At other times, it does not, and a court must interpret the existing terms to ascertain whether the risk has passed. When no provision in the contract indicates when risk passes, the UCC provides special rules, based on delivery terms, to guide the courts.

Delivery with Movement of the Goods—Carrier Cases

When the contract involves movement of the goods through a common carrier but does not specify when risk of loss passes, the courts first look for specific delivery terms in the contract. The terms that have traditionally been used in contracts are listed and defined in Exhibit 20-2 on the next page. Unless the parties agree otherwise, these terms will determine which party will pay the costs of delivering the goods and who will bear the risk of loss. If the contract does not include these terms, then the courts must decide whether the contract is a shipment or a destination contract.

EXHIBIT 20-2 • Contract Terms—Definitions

The contract terms listed and defined in this exhibit help to determine which party will bear the costs of delivery and when risk of loss will pass from the seller to the buyer.

F.O.B. (free on board)—Indicates that the selling price of goods includes transportation costs to the specific F.O.B. place named in the contract. The seller pays the expenses and carries the risk of loss to the F.O.B. place named [UCC 2-319(1)]. If the named place is the place from which the goods are shipped (for example, the seller's city or place of business), the contract is a shipment contract. If the named place is the place to which the goods are to be shipped (for example, the buyer's city or place of business), the contract is a destination contract.

F.A.S. (free alongside ship)—Requires that the seller, at his or her own expense and risk, deliver the goods alongside the vessel in the manner usual in that port or on a dock designated and provided by the buyer [UCC 2-319(2)]. An F.A.S. contract is essentially an F.O.B. contract for ships.

C.I.F. or C.&F. (cost, insurance, and freight or just cost and freight)—Requires, among other things, that the seller “put the goods in possession of a carrier” before risk passes to the buyer [UCC 2-320(2)]. (These are basically pricing terms, and the contracts remain shipment contracts, not destination contracts.)

Delivery ex-ship (delivery from the carrying vessel)—Means that risk of loss does not pass to the buyer until the goods are properly unloaded from the ship or other carrier [UCC 2-322].

SHIPMENT CONTRACTS In a shipment contract, the seller or lessor is required or authorized to ship goods by carrier, but is not required to deliver them to a particular destination. The risk of loss in a shipment contract passes to the buyer or lessee when the goods are delivered to the carrier [UCC 2-509(1)(a), 2A-219(2)(a)].

For example, a seller in Texas sells five hundred cases of grapefruit to a buyer in New York, F.O.B. Houston (free on board in Houston, which means that the buyer pays the transportation charges from Houston—see Exhibit 20-2). The contract authorizes shipment by carrier; it does not require that the seller tender the grapefruit in New York. Risk passes to the buyer when conforming goods are properly placed in the possession of the carrier. If the goods are damaged in transit, the loss is the buyer's. (Actually, buyers have recourse against carriers, subject to certain limitations, and they may insure the goods from the time the goods leave the seller.)

The following case illustrates how the application of a contract's delivery term can affect a buyer's recovery for goods damaged in transit.

✦ EXTENDED CASE 20.2 ✦

Spray-Tek, Inc. v. Robbins Motor Transportation, Inc.

United States District Court, Western District of Wisconsin, 426 F.Supp.2d 875 (2006).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

SHABAZ, District Judge.

* * * *

Plaintiff Spray-Tek, Inc., is engaged in the business of commercial dehydration of food flavor, pharmaceutical and soft chemical products. In 2003 plaintiff entered into a contract with Niro, Inc. (hereinafter Niro) in which Niro was to design and manufacture a fourteen-foot diameter cone-bottom drying chamber (hereinafter drying chamber) for plaintiff. Pursuant to the terms of the contract Niro was also responsible for shipping the drying chamber from its facility in Hudson, Wisconsin, to plaintiff's facility in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. The contract stated in relevant part:

* * * *

For one (1) Niro-Bowen * * * drying chamber, * * * F.O.B. points of manufacture in the U.S.A. * * *

Price * * * $1,161,500.00

* * * *

IX. RISKS OF LOSS. The Purchaser shall bear the risk of loss of or damage to the equipment and parts after delivery of the equipment and parts to the job site or to the shipping point if delivery F.O.B. shipping point is specified.

On October 14, 2004 Niro's representative Mr. David Thoen contacted defendant Robbins Motor Transportation, Inc., to obtain an estimate for transporting the drying chamber to plaintiff. Mr. Thoen spoke with Mr. Robert Kauffman, Jr., who serves as defendant's Southwest Regional Terminal Manager. * * * Mr. Kauffman prepared and sent an estimate to Niro.

Mr. Thoen signed the estimate and faxed it back to defendant * * *.

On October 18, 2004 defendant arrived at Niro's facility in Hudson,

Wisconsin, and the drying chamber was loaded onto its trailer. Niro prepared a Bill of Lading * * * .

* * * *
On or about October 28, 2004, the drying chamber was damaged while it was in transit * * * in Baltimore, Maryland. Accordingly, the drying chamber never arrived at plaintiff's facility in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. The drying chamber was damaged when it struck an overpass and became dislodged from defendant's vehicle. It was inspected and declared a total loss. Accordingly, Niro manufactured a replacement drying chamber for plaintiff and invoiced it $233,100.00 in replacement costs.

* * * *
[Spray-Tek filed a suit in a federal district court against Robbins under a federal statute known as the Carmack Amendment to recover the replacement cost and other expenses.] The Carmack Amendment * * * states in relevant part:

A carrier providing transportation or service * * * shall issue a receipt or bill of lading for property it receives for transportation under this part. That carrier * * * [is] liable to the person entitled to recover under the receipt or bill of lading.

The purpose of the Carmack Amendment is to establish uniform federal guidelines designed in part to remove the uncertainty surrounding a carrier's liability when damage occurs to a shipper's interstate shipment.

Under the Carmack Amendment plaintiff bears the burden of establishing a prima facie case [legally sufficient case] which requires it to demonstrate: (1) delivery to the carrier in good condition; (2) arrival in damaged condition; and (3) the amount of damages. * * * The excepted causes [relieving a carrier of liability] are: (1) acts of God; (2) the public enemy; (3) acts of the shipper himself; (4) public authority; or (5) the inherent vice or nature of the goods.

Defendant concedes that it received the drying chamber in good condition. Accordingly, plaintiff's first element of its prima facie case is established.

* * * *
It is undisputed that the drying chamber was damaged when it struck an overpass and became dislodged from defendant's vehicle. Additionally, it is undisputed that after the accident the drying chamber was inspected and declared a total loss.

An * * * argument defendant asserts concerning plaintiff's second element of its prima facie case is that plaintiff cannot demonstrate it owned the drying chamber during transport. However, the contract plaintiff entered into with Niro establishes that it was the owner of the drying chamber when it was damaged. The contract provided that the terms of sale were "F.O.B. points of manufacture in the U.S.A." According to * * * David Brand who serves as plaintiff's vice-president and general manager "F.O.B. points of manufacture" means that the drying chamber became plaintiff's property once it was "placed on board the delivery truck at its point of manufacture in Hudson, Wisconsin."

Mr. Brand's assertion * * * is reinforced by the provision in the contract concerning risks of loss. * * * The "F.O.B. points of manufacture" language * * * demonstrates that plaintiff bore the risk of loss once the drying chamber departed from Niro's Hudson, Wisconsin, facility. * * * Accordingly, plaintiff established the second element of its prima facie case.

Finally, defendant asserts plaintiff cannot meet its burden of establishing the third element of its prima facie case because it failed to demonstrate what "it is obligated to pay for the dryer." However, * * * Niro invoiced plaintiff $233,100.00 for the replacement dryer. Accordingly, plaintiff established the third element of its prima facie case because its amount of damages is $233,100.00.

Plaintiff met its burden of establishing a prima facie case under the Carmack Amendment. * * * Defendant concedes it failed to produce any evidence establishing that damage to the shipment was due to one of the excepted causes. Accordingly, plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment on the issue of defendant's liability under the Carmack Amendment.

* * * *
* * * There remains a genuine issue of material fact concerning the issue of whether defendant provided Niro with a reasonable opportunity to choose between two different levels of liability.

* * * *
* * * The October 14, 2004, estimate does not contain a term or condition limiting defendant's liability. However, the Bill of Lading limits defendant's liability * * * . Accordingly, when the two documents are viewed together as a whole the Court concludes the contract is ambiguous and its interpretation must be reserved for the fact finder [at trial].

QUESTIONS

1. Would the result have been different if the contract between Spray-Tek and Niro had specified "F.O.B. Bethlehem, Pennsylvania"? Explain.
2. One of the elements required to establish a carrier's liability is a showing that the goods arrived in damaged condition. Should Robbins Motor Transportation have been absolved of liability in this case on the ground that the drying chamber never arrived at its final destination? Why or why not?

DESTINATION CONTRACTS In a destination contract, the risk of loss passes to the buyer or lessee when the goods are tendered to the buyer or lessee at the specified destination [UCC 2–509(1)(b), 2A–219(2)(b)]. In the preceding example involving the cases of grapefruit, if the contract had been a destination contract, F.O.B. New York, risk of loss during transit to New York would have been the seller’s. Risk of loss would not have passed to the buyer until the carrier tendered the goods to the buyer in New York.

Whether a contract is a shipment contract or a destination contract can have significant consequences for the parties. When an agreement is ambiguous as to whether it is a shipment or a destination contract, courts normally will presume that it is a shipment contract. The parties must use clear and explicit language to overcome this presumption and create a destination contract.

Delivery without Movement of the Goods

The UCC also addresses situations in which the contract does not require the goods to be shipped or moved. Frequently, the buyer or lessee is to pick up the goods from the seller or lessor, or the goods are to be held by a bailee. A bailment is a temporary delivery of personal property, without passage of title, into the care of another, called a bailee. Under the UCC, a bailee is a party who—by a bill of lading, warehouse receipt, or other document of title—acknowledges possession of goods and/or contracts to deliver them. For example, a warehousing company or a trucking company may be a bailee.⁶

GOODS HELD BY THE SELLER When the seller keeps the goods for pickup, a document of title usually is not used. If the seller is not a merchant, the risk of loss to goods held by the seller passes to the buyer on tender of delivery [UCC 2–509(3)]. This means that the seller bears the risk of loss until he or she makes the goods available to the buyer and notifies the buyer that the goods are ready to be picked up. If the seller is a merchant, risk of loss to goods held by the seller passes to the buyer when the buyer actually takes physical possession of the goods [UCC 2–509(3)]. In other words, the merchant bears the risk of loss between the time the contract is formed and the time the buyer picks up the goods.

6. See Chapter 49 for a detailed discussion of the law of bailments.

CASE IN POINT Henry Ganno purchased a twelve-foot beam at a lumberyard, and an employee at the lumberyard loaded it onto Ganno’s truck. A sign at the lumberyard stated that the store did not secure loads for customers, but Ganno did not tie down or otherwise secure the beam to his truck. After he drove onto the highway, the beam fell out of his truck. While he was trying to retrieve the beam, he was struck by another vehicle and injured. Ganno sued the lumberyard for negligence, but the court held that Ganno—not the lumberyard—bore the risk of loss and injury after he left the lumberyard’s premises. Once the truck was loaded, the risk of loss passed to Ganno under the UCC because he had taken physical possession of the goods.⁷

With respect to leases, the risk of loss passes to the lessee on the lessee’s receipt of the goods if the lessor—or supplier, in a finance lease (see Chapter 19 on page 362)—is a merchant. Otherwise, the risk passes to the lessee on tender of delivery [UCC 2A–219(2)(c)]. For example, Erikson Crane leases a helicopter from Jevis, Ltd., which is in the business of renting aircraft. While Erikson’s pilot is on the way to Idaho to pick up the helicopter, the helicopter is damaged during an unexpected storm. In this situation, Jevis is a merchant-lessor, so it bears the risk of loss to the leased helicopter until Erikson takes possession of the helicopter.

GOODS HELD BY A BAILEE When a bailee is holding goods that are to be delivered under a contract without being moved, the goods are usually represented by a document of title, such as a bill of lading or a warehouse receipt.⁸ Risk of loss passes to the buyer when (1) the buyer receives a negotiable document of title for the goods, (2) the bailee acknowledges the buyer’s right to possess the goods, or (3) the buyer receives a nonnegotiable document of title or a writing (record) directing the bailee to hand over the goods and the buyer has had a reasonable time to present the document to the bailee and demand the goods. Obviously, if the bailee refuses to honor the document, the risk of loss remains with the seller [UCC 2–503(4)(b), 2–509(2)].

With respect to leases, if goods held by a bailee are to be delivered without being moved, the risk of loss passes to the lessee on acknowledgment by the bailee of the lessee’s right to possession of the goods [UCC 2A–219(2)(b)].

7. Ganno v. Lanoga Corp., 119 Wash.App. 310, 80 P.3d 180 (2003).

8. A negotiable document of title actually stands for the goods it covers, so any transfer of the goods requires the surrender of the document. In contrast, a nonnegotiable document of title merely serves as evidence of the goods’ existence.

Concept Summary 20.1 reviews the rules for when title and risk of loss pass to the buyer or lessee when the seller or lessor is not required to ship or deliver the goods.

Conditional Sales

Buyers and sellers can form sales contracts that are conditioned either on the buyer’s approval of the goods or on the buyer’s resale of the goods. Under such contracts, the buyer is in possession of the goods, and disputes can arise over which party should bear the loss if the goods are damaged or stolen. Disputes may also arise over whether the goods being held by the buyer are subject to claims of the buyer’s creditors.

SALE ON APPROVAL In a sale on approval, a seller offers to sell goods to a buyer (who is usually not a merchant) and sends the goods to the buyer on a trial basis. The goods are delivered primarily so that the prospective buyer can use the goods and be convinced of their appearance or performance. The term sale here is misleading, because only an offer to sell has been made, along with a bailment created by the buyer’s possession.

In a sale on approval, title and risk of loss remain with the seller until the buyer accepts (approves) the offer by any act inconsistent with the trial purpose or the seller’s ownership (such as retaining the goods beyond the trial period). If the buyer does not wish to accept, the buyer may notify the seller of that fact within the trial period, and the return is made at the seller’s expense and risk [UCC 2–327(1)]. Goods held on approval are not subject to the claims of the buyer’s creditors until acceptance.

For example, Brad orders a Bowflex TreadClimber over the Internet, and the manufacturer allows him to try it risk-free for thirty days. If Brad decides to keep the TreadClimber, then the sale is complete, but if he returns it within thirty days, there will be no sale and he will not be charged. If Brad files for bankruptcy within the thirty-day period and still has the TreadClimber in his possession, his creditors may not attach (seize) the TreadClimber, because he has not accepted it yet.

Delivery without Movement of the Goods

Concept	Description
Goods Not Represented by a Document of Title	Unless otherwise agreed, if the goods are not represented by a document of title, title and risk pass as follows: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Title passes on the formation of the contract [UCC 2–401(3)(b)]. 2. Risk of loss passes to the buyer or lessee: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. If the seller or lessor is a merchant, risk passes on the buyer’s or lessee’s receipt of the goods. b. If the seller or lessor is a nonmerchant, risk passes to the buyer or lessee on the seller’s or lessor’s tender of delivery of the goods [UCC 2–509(3), 2A–219(2)(c)].
Goods Represented by a Document of Title	Unless otherwise agreed, if the goods are represented by a document of title, title and risk pass to the buyer when any of the following occurs: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The buyer receives a negotiable document of title for the goods. 2. The bailee acknowledges the buyer’s right to possess the goods. 3. The buyer receives a nonnegotiable document of title or a writing (record) directing the bailee to hand over the goods and the buyer has had a reasonable time to present the document to the bailee and demand the goods [UCC 2–503(4)(b), 2–509(2)].
Leased Goods Held by a Bailee	If leased goods held by a bailee are to be delivered without being moved, the risk of loss passes to the lessee on acknowledgment by the bailee of the lessee’s right to possession of the goods [UCC 2A–219(2)(b)].

SALE OR RETURN In a sale or return, in contrast, the sale is completed but the buyer has an option to return the goods and undo the sale. Sale-or-return contracts often arise when a merchant purchases goods primarily for resale, but has the right to return part or all of the goods in lieu of payment if the goods fail to be resold. Basically, a sale or return is a sale of goods in the present that may be undone at the buyer's option within a specified time period.

Because the buyer receives possession at the time of the sale, title and risk of loss pass to the buyer and remain with the buyer unless the goods are returned within the time period specified. If the buyer decides to return the goods within this time period, the return is made at the buyer's risk and expense. Goods held under a sale-or-return contract are subject to the claims of the buyer's creditors while they are in the buyer's possession.

Consignments

Under a consignment, the owner of goods (the consignor) delivers them to another (the consignee) to be sold or kept. The consignee essentially acts as an agent (agency will be discussed in Chapter 32) of the consignor-owner and holds the goods as a bailee. Consignments are common in business. For example, a wholesale diamond company might give diamonds to a retailer on consignment, or a pharmaceutical company might provide drugs to a sales representative on consignment.⁹ A consignment is similar to a sale or return in that a merchant takes possession of goods for resale, but a consignment normally results in a bailment rather than a sale.

Before the adoption of the 2001 amendments to the UCC, consignments were treated as a sale or return and governed by Article 2. Since these amendments, however, Article 9 on secured transactions (see Chapter 29) generally has governed consignment transactions, with some exceptions. For example, Article 9 does not cover consignments of goods that are considered “consumer goods” immediately before delivery. If neither Article 2 nor Article 9 govern such consignments, what law applies to them? This was the issue before the court in the following case.

CASE 20.3

In re Music City RV, LLC

Supreme Court of Tennessee, 304 S.W.3d 806 (2010).
www.tsc.state.tn.us/OPINIONS/TSC/sc1qtr2010.shtm#a BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Dudley King and eight other unrelated individuals consigned their recreational vehicles (RVs) for sale on the lot of Music City RV, LLC (MCRV). Subsequently, an involuntary Chapter 7 bankruptcy petition was filed against MCRV by some of its creditors (this type of bankruptcy proceeding will be discussed in Chapter 30). At the time of the bankruptcy, all of the consigned RVs were still on MCRV's premises. Given that Article 9 of the UCC does not cover consignments that consist of consumer goods, the question before the bankruptcy court was whether the transaction was covered by Article 2 of the UCC. Because there were no precedents to guide the bankruptcy court on this issue, the court submitted the question to the Supreme Court of Tennessee for its decision.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

* * * *

In the case at bar [the case before the court], the parties agree that Article 9 does not apply because the consigned RVs were “consumer goods,” defined by the UCC as “goods that are used or bought for use primarily for personal, family, or household purposes,” and apparently the bankruptcy court agreed.

- a. On the page that opens, scroll down to “Cases posted the week of 1/18/2010” to find the case title, and click on “View” to access the opinion. The Tennessee Supreme Court maintains this Web site.

CASE 20.3 CONTINUED ♦ Regarding the consignment transactions in the instant case, consignor Mr. King argues that the effect of the 2001 Amendment[s] to [Tennessee's law corresponding to UCC Section 2–326] was to remove all consignment transactions from the province of Article 2 of the UCC. Accordingly, because the transactions at issue do not fall within Article 9's definition of "consignment," the UCC does not apply and the consignments here are governed by the common law of bailment. The Bankruptcy Trustee argues that the 2001 Amendment[s] did not remove all consignments from [Section 2–326]. Consequently, those consignment transactions that do not fall within Article 9's definition of "consignment" continue to be governed by Article 2, and each consignment transaction should be deemed a "sale or return" by operation of [Section 2–326]. Our review of the statutory language at issue and the Official Comments to the UCC persuades us that Mr. King's position is correct. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

As an initial matter, we note that [UCC Section 2–326] no longer makes reference to consignments, nor does it describe a transaction that could be characterized as a "consignment." A "classic consignment" has been described as a transaction where "the owner of goods delivers possession to a bailee [one to whom person property is entrusted for a particular purpose] who is also given the power to sell the goods to its customers. Title remains with the consignor until the goods are sold to the ultimate buyer and the consignee is free to return any unsold goods to the consignor."

Further, [UCC 2–326] expressly applies to situations where "delivered goods may be returned by the buyer even though they conform to the contract." (Emphasis added [by the court]). Subsection (2) of the statute similarly refers to "the buyer" in describing applicable transactions: "(g)oods held on approval are not subject to the claims of the buyer's creditors until acceptance; goods held on sale or return are subject to such claims while in the buyer's possession." (Emphasis added [by the court]). Article 2 of the UCC as adopted in Tennessee defines "buyer" as "a person who buys or contracts to buy goods." In this case, there is no indication that MCRV contracted to buy the RVs at issue, but rather, as a consignee, MCRV agreed to take possession and to try to sell them to a third party for a commission. Similarly, there was no "sale" as defined at [UCC 2–106] as "the passing of title from the seller to the buyer for a price." MCRV was not a buyer of the RVs, and it consequently follows that [UCC Section 2–326] does not apply under the circumstances of this case.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Supreme Court of Tennessee concluded that the consignment of an RV by a consumer (not another business) to a Tennessee RV dealer, for the purpose of selling that RV to a third person, is not a transaction covered under Section 2–326 of the UCC, as adopted in Tennessee. Rather, the transaction is covered by the law of bailments.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the goods on consignment were not consumer goods but goods owned by a business enterprise. How would that change in the facts affect the court's decision?

THE ECONOMIC DIMENSION • How does the answer to the question before the court affect the consignors?

WHO HOLDS TITLE TO CONSIGNED GOODS? If the consignee sells consigned goods, title passes to the buyer, and the consignee must pay the consignor for the goods sold. The consignee typically receives a commission for selling the goods. If the consignee does not sell or keep the goods, they may simply be returned to the consignor. Although the goods are in the possession of the consignee, the consignee does not hold title to them. The consignor-owner can retake the goods from the consignee at any time.

CREDITORS' CLAIMS TO CONSIGNED GOODS As previously mentioned, the question of whether the goods being held on consignment are subject to the claims of creditors is now governed by Article 9 of the UCC. Generally, if the owner of the consigned goods has filed a financing statement (see Chapter 29) covering the goods, then that party's creditors can assert claims against the goods. If the owner-consignor has not filed a financing statement, then the creditors of the dealer who is in possession of the consigned goods can assert claims against the goods. The goods are not subject to claims by the consignee-dealer's creditors, however, if the creditors know that the consignee is in the business of regularly selling the goods of others on consignment [UCC 9-102(20)].¹⁰

Risk of Loss When a Sales or Lease Contract Is Breached

When a sales or lease contract is breached, the transfer of risk operates differently depending on which party breaches. Generally, the party in breach bears the risk of loss.

WHEN THE SELLER OR LESSOR BREACHES If the goods are so nonconforming that the buyer has the right to reject them, the risk of loss does not pass to the buyer until the defects are cured (that is, until the goods are repaired, replaced, or discounted in price by the seller—see Chapter 21) or until the buyer accepts the goods in spite of their defects (thus waiving the right to reject). For example, suppose that a buyer orders black refrigerators from a seller, F.O.B. seller's plant. The seller ships white refrigerators instead. The white refrigerators (nonconforming goods) are damaged in transit. The risk of loss falls on the seller. Had the seller shipped black refrigerators (conforming goods) instead, the risk would have fallen on the buyer [UCC 2-510(1)].

10. See Fariba v. Dealer Services Corp., 178 Cal.App.4th 156, 100 Cal. Rptr.3d 219 (2009); and Italian Designer Import Outlet, Inc. v. New York Central Mutual Fire Insurance Co., 26 Misc.3d 631, 891 N.Y.S.2d 260 (2009).

If a buyer accepts a shipment of goods and later discovers a defect, acceptance can be revoked. The revocation allows the buyer to pass the risk of loss back to the seller, at least to the extent that the buyer's insurance does not cover the loss [UCC 2-510(2)].

Article 2A provides a similar rule for leases. If the tender or delivery of goods is so nonconforming that the lessee has the right to reject them, the risk of loss remains with the lessor (or the supplier) until cure or acceptance [UCC 2A-220(1)(a)]. If the lessee, after acceptance, rightfully revokes her or his acceptance of the goods, the risk of loss passes back to the lessor or supplier to the extent that the lessee's insurance does not cover the loss [UCC 2A-220(1)(b)].

WHEN THE BUYER OR LESSEE BREACHES The general rule is that when a buyer or lessee breaches a contract, the risk of loss immediately shifts to the buyer or lessee. This rule has three important limitations [UCC 2-510(3), 2A-220(2)]:

1. The seller or lessor must already have identified the contract goods.
2. The buyer or lessee bears the risk for only a commercially reasonable time after the seller or lessor has learned of the breach.
3. The buyer or lessee is liable only to the extent of any deficiency in the seller's or lessor's insurance coverage.

See Concept Summary 20.2 for a review of the rules on who bears the risk of loss when a contract is breached.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 20.2

Risk of Loss When a Sales or Lease Contract Is Breached

Concept	Description
When the Seller or Lessor Breaches the Contract	If the seller or lessor breaches by tendering nonconforming goods that the buyer or lessee has a right to reject, the risk of loss does not pass to the buyer or lessee until the defects are cured or the buyer accepts the goods (thus waiving the right to reject) [UCC 2-510(1), 2A-220(1)].
When the Buyer or Lessee Breaches the Contract	If the buyer or lessee breaches the contract, the risk of loss to identified goods immediately shifts to the buyer or lessee. Limitations to this rule are as follows [UCC 2-510(3), 2A-220(2)]: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The seller or lessor must have already identified the contract goods. 2. The buyer or lessee bears the risk for only a commercially reasonable time after the seller or lessor has learned of the breach. 3. The buyer or lessee is liable only to the extent of any deficiency in the seller's or lessor's insurance coverage.

INSURABLE INTEREST

Parties to sales and lease contracts often obtain insurance coverage to protect against damage, loss, or destruction of goods. Any party purchasing insurance, however, must have a sufficient interest in the insured item to obtain a valid policy. Insurance laws—not the UCC—determine sufficiency. The UCC is helpful, though, because it contains certain rules regarding insurable interests in goods.

Insurable Interest of the Buyer or Lessee

A buyer or lessee has an insurable interest in identified goods. The moment the contract goods are identified by the seller or lessor, the buyer or lessee has a special property interest that allows the buyer or lessee to obtain the necessary insurance coverage for those goods even before the risk of loss has passed [UCC 2–501(1), 2A–218(1)]. Identification can be made at any time and in any manner agreed to by the parties. If the parties do not explicitly agree on identification in their contract, then the UCC provisions on identification that were previously discussed in this chapter apply. For example, in March a farmer sells a cotton crop that she hopes to harvest in October. If the contract does not specify otherwise, the buyer acquires an insurable interest in the crop when it is planted because the goods (the cotton crop) are identified to the sales contract at that time [UCC 2–501(1)(c)].

Insurable Interest of the Seller or Lessor

A seller has an insurable interest in goods as long as he or she retains title to the goods. Even after title passes to a buyer, a seller who has a security interest in the goods (a right to secure payment—see Chapter 29) still has an insurable interest and can insure the goods [UCC 2–501(2)]. Thus, both the buyer and the seller can have an insurable interest in identical goods at the same time. Of course, the buyer or seller must sustain an actual loss to have the right to recover from an insurance company. In regard to leases, the lessor retains an insurable interest in leased goods unless the lessee exercises an option to buy, in which event the risk of loss passes to the lessee [UCC 2A–218(3)].

REVIEWING

Title, Risk, and Insurable Interest

In December, Mendoza agreed to buy the broccoli grown on one hundred acres of Willow Glen's one-thousand-acre broccoli farm. The sales contract specified F.O.B. Willow Glen's field by Falcon Trucking. The broccoli was to be planted in February and harvested in March of the following year. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. At what point is a crop of broccoli identified to the contract under the Uniform Commercial Code? Why is identification significant?
2. When does title to the broccoli pass from Willow Glen to Mendoza under the contract terms? Why?
3. Suppose that while in transit, Falcon's truck overturns and spills the entire load. Who bears the loss, Mendoza or Willow Glen?
4. Suppose that instead of buying fresh broccoli, Mendoza had contracted with Willow Glen to purchase one thousand cases of frozen broccoli from Willow Glen's processing plant. The highest grade of broccoli is packaged under the "FreshBest" label, and everything else is packaged under the "FamilyPac" label. Further suppose that although the contract specified that Mendoza was to receive FreshBest broccoli, Falcon Trucking delivered FamilyPac broccoli to Mendoza. If Mendoza refuses to accept the broccoli, who bears the loss?

 DEBATE THIS: The distinction between shipment and destination contracts for the purpose of deciding who will bear the risk of loss should be eliminated in favor of a rule that always requires the buyer to obtain insurance for the goods being shipped.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

20-1. Risk of Loss Mackey orders from Pride one thousand cases of Greenie brand peas from lot A at list price to be shipped F.O.B. Pride's city via Fast Freight Lines. Pride receives the order and immediately sends Mackey an acceptance of the order with a promise to ship promptly. Pride later separates the one thousand cases of Greenie peas and prints Mackey's name and address on each case. The peas are placed on Pride's dock, and Fast Freight is notified to pick up the shipment. The night before the pickup by Fast Freight, through no fault of Pride's, a fire destroys the one thousand cases of peas. Pride claims that title passed to Mackey at the time the contract was made and that risk of loss passed to Mackey when the goods were marked with Mackey's name and address. Discuss Pride's contentions.

20-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Risk of Loss.

On May 1, Sikora goes into Carson's retail clothing store to purchase a suit. Sikora finds a suit he likes for $190 and buys it. The suit needs alterations. Sikora is to pick up the altered suit at Carson's store on May 10. Consider the following separate sets of circumstances:

- One of Carson's major creditors obtains a judgment on the debt Carson owes and has the court issue a writ of execution (a court order to seize a debtor's property to satisfy a debt) to collect on that judgment all clothing in Carson's possession. Discuss Sikora's rights in the suit under these circumstances.
 - On May 9, through no fault of Carson's, the store burns down, and all contents are a total loss. Between Carson and Sikora, who suffers the loss of the suit destroyed by the fire? Explain.
- For a sample answer to Question 20-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

20-3. Sale or Return Zeke, who sells lawn mowers, tells Stasio, a regular customer, about a special promotional campaign. On receipt of a $50 down payment, Zeke will sell Stasio a new Universal lawn mower for $200, even though it normally sells for $350. Zeke also says that if Stasio does not like the performance of the lawn mower, he can return it within thirty days, and Zeke will refund the $50 down payment. Stasio pays the $50 and takes the mower. On the tenth day, the lawn mower is stolen through no fault of Stasio's. Stasio calls Zeke and demands the return of his $50. Zeke claims that Stasio should suffer the risk of loss and that he still owes Zeke $150 for the rest of the purchase price. Discuss who is correct, Stasio or Zeke.

20-4. Risk of Loss H.S.A. II, Inc., made parts for motor vehicles. Under an agreement with Ford Motor Co., Ford provided steel to H.S.A. to make Ford parts. Ford's purchase orders for the parts contained the term "FOB Carrier Supplier's [Plant]." GMAC Business Credit, L.L.C., loaned money to H.S.A. under terms that guaranteed payment would be made—if the funds were not otherwise available—from H.S.A.'s inventory, raw materials, and finished goods. H.S.A. filed for bankruptcy on February 2, 2000, and ceased operations on June 20, when it had in its plant more than $1 million in finished goods for Ford. Ford sent six trucks to H.S.A. to pick up the goods. GMAC halted the removal. The parties asked the bankruptcy court to determine whose interest had priority. GMAC contended, among other things, that Ford did not have an interest in the goods because there had not yet been a sale. Ford responded that under its purchase orders, title and risk of loss transferred on completion of the parts. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [In re H.S.A. II, Inc., 271 Bankr. 534 (E.D.Mich. 2002)]

20-5. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Entrustment Rule.

*William Bisby gave an all-terrain vehicle (ATV) to Del City Cycle in Enid, Oklahoma, to sell on his behalf. Joseph Maddox bought the ATV but paid for it with a check written on a closed checking account. The bank refused to honor the check. Before Del City or Bisby could reclaim the ATV, however, Maddox sold it to Aaron Jordan, who sold it to Shannon Skaggs. In November 2003, the Enid Police Department seized the ATV from Skaggs. Bisby filed a suit in an Oklahoma state court against the state and Skaggs, claiming that he was the owner of the ATV and asking the court to return it to him. Skaggs objected. Is there a distinction between the ownership interests of a party who steals an item and those of a party who acquires the item with a check that is not honored? What was the status of Skaggs's title, if any, to the ATV? Among the many parties involved in this case, which one should the court rule is the owner of "good" title to the ATV? Why? [State v. Skaggs, 140 P.3d 576 (Okla.Civ.App. Div. 3 2006)]*

20–6. Shipment and Destination Contracts In 2003, Karen Pearson and Steve and Tara Carlson agreed to buy a 2004 Dynasty recreational vehicle (RV) from DeMartini’s RV Sales in Grass Valley, California. On September 29, Pearson, the Carlsons, and DeMartini’s signed a contract providing that “seller agrees to deliver the vehicle to you on the date this contract is signed.” The buyers made a payment of $145,000 on the total price of $356,416 the next day, when they also signed a form acknowledging that the RV had been inspected and accepted. They agreed to return later to have the RV transported out of state for delivery (to avoid paying state sales tax on the purchase). On October 7, Steve Carlson returned to DeMartini’s to ride with the seller’s driver to Nevada to consummate the out-of-state delivery. When the RV developed problems, Pearson and the Carlsons filed a suit in a federal district court against the RV’s manufacturer, Monaco Coach Corp., alleging, in part, breach of warranty under state law. The applicable statute is expressly limited to goods sold in California. Monaco argued that this RV had been sold in Nevada. How does the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) define a sale? What does the UCC provide with respect to the passage of title? How do these provisions apply here? Discuss. [Carlson v. Monaco Coach Corp., 486 F.Supp.2d 1127 (E.D.Cal. 2007)]

20–7. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Void and Voidable Titles.

Kenneth West agreed to sell his car, a 1975 Corvette, to a man representing himself as Robert Wilson. In exchange for a cashier’s check, West signed over the Corvette’s title to Wilson and gave him the car. Ten days later, when West learned that the cashier’s check was a forgery, he filed a stolen vehicle report with the police. The police could not immediately locate Wilson or the Corvette, however, and the case grew cold. Nearly two and a half years later, the police found the Corvette in the possession of Tammy Roberts, who also had the certificate of title. She said that she had bought the car from her brother, who had obtained it through an ad in a newspaper. West filed a suit in a Colorado state court against Roberts to reclaim the car. The court applied Colorado Revised Statutes Section 4-2-403 (Colorado’s version of Section 2–403 of the Uniform Commercial Code) to determine the vehicle’s rightful owner. [West v. Roberts, 143 P.3d 1037 (Colo. 2006)]

- Under UCC 2–403, what title, if any, to the Corvette did “Wilson” acquire? What was the status of Roberts’s title, if any, assuming that she bought the car without knowledge of circumstances that would make a person of ordinary prudence inquire about the validity of the seller’s title? In whose favor should the court rule? Explain.
- If the original owner of a vehicle relinquishes it due to fraud, should he or she be allowed to recover the vehicle from a good faith purchaser? If not, which party or parties might the original owner sue for recovery? What is the ethical principle underlying your answer to these questions? Discuss.

Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts

The performance that is required of the parties under a sales or lease contract consists of the duties and obligations each party has under the terms of the contract. The basic obligation of the seller or lessor is to transfer and deliver the goods as stated in the contract, and the basic duty of the buyer or lessee is to accept and pay for the goods.

Keep in mind that “duties and obligations” under the terms of the contract include those specified by the agreement, by custom, and by the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). Thus, parties to a sales or lease contract may be bound not only by terms they expressly agreed on, but also by terms implied by custom, such as a customary method of weighing or measuring particular goods. In addition, the UCC sometimes imposes terms on parties to a sales contract, such as the requirement that a seller find a substitute carrier to deliver goods to the buyer if the agreed-on carrier becomes unavailable. In this chapter, we examine the basic performance obligations of the parties under a sales or lease contract.

Sometimes, circumstances make it difficult for a person to carry out the promised performance, leading to a breach of the contract. When a breach occurs, the aggrieved party looks for remedies—which we examine in the second half of the chapter. The UCC provides a range of possible remedies, from retaining the goods to requiring the breaching party’s performance under the contract. Generally, these remedies are designed to put the aggrieved party “in as good a position as if the other party had fully performed.” Note that in contrast to the common law of contracts, remedies under the UCC are cumulative in nature. In other words, an innocent party to a breached sales or lease contract is not limited to one exclusive remedy.

SECTION 1

PERFORMANCE OBLIGATIONS

As discussed in previous chapters, the obligations of good faith and commercial reasonableness underlie every sales and lease contract.

The UCC’s Good Faith Provision

The UCC’s good faith provision, which can never be disclaimed, reads as follows: “Every contract or duty within this Act imposes an obligation of good faith in its performance or enforcement” [UCC 1–304]. Good faith means honesty in fact. For a merchant, it means honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade [UCC 2–103(1)(b)]. In other words, merchants are held to a higher standard of performance or duty than are nonmerchants.

Good Faith and Contract Performance

The principle of good faith applies to both parties and provides a framework for the entire agreement. If a sales contract leaves open some particulars of performance, for instance, the parties must exercise good faith and commercial reasonableness when later specifying the details. The Focus on Ethics feature on pages 457–460 at the end of this unit explores the ethical implications of the UCC’s good faith standard.

In performing a sales or lease contract, the basic obligation of the seller or lessor is to transfer and deliver conforming goods. The basic obligation of the buyer or lessee is to accept and pay for conforming goods in accordance with the contract [UCC 2–301, 2A–516(1)]. Overall performance of a sales or lease contract is controlled by the agreement between the parties. When the contract is unclear and disputes arise, the courts look to the UCC and impose standards of good faith and commercial reasonableness.

SECTION 2

OBLIGATIONS OF THE SELLER OR LESSOR

As stated, the basic duty of the seller or lessor is to deliver the goods called for under the contract to the buyer or lessee.

Tender of Delivery

Goods that conform to the contract description in every way are called conforming goods. To fulfill the contract, the seller or lessor must either deliver or tender delivery of conforming goods to the buyer or lessee. Tender of delivery occurs when the seller or lessor makes conforming goods available to the buyer or lessee and gives the buyer or lessee whatever notification is reasonably necessary to enable the buyer or lessee to take delivery [UCC 2–503(1), 2A–508(1)].

Tender must occur at a reasonable hour and in a reasonable manner. For example, a seller cannot call the buyer at 2:00 A.M. and say, “The goods are ready. I’ll give you twenty minutes to get them.” Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, the goods must be tendered for delivery at a reasonable hour and kept available for a reasonable period of time to enable the buyer to take possession of them [UCC 2–503(1)(a)].

Normally, all goods called for by a contract must be tendered in a single delivery—unless the parties have agreed that the goods may be delivered in several lots or installments (to be discussed shortly) [UCC 2–307, 2–612, 2A–510]. Hence, an order for 1,000 shirts cannot be delivered two shirts at a time. If, however, the parties agree that the shirts will be delivered in four orders of 250 each as they are produced (for summer, fall, winter, and spring stock), then tender of delivery may occur in this manner.

Place of Delivery

The buyer and seller (or lessor and lessee) may agree that the goods will be delivered to a particular destination where the buyer or lessee will take possession. If the contract does not designate the place of delivery, then the goods must be made available to the buyer at the seller’s place of business or, if the seller has none, the seller’s residence [UCC 2–308(a)]. If, at the time of contracting, the parties know that the goods identified to the contract are located somewhere other than the seller’s business, then the location of the goods is the place for their delivery [UCC 2–308(b)].

For example, Li Wan and Boyd both live in San Francisco. In San Francisco, Li Wan contracts to sell Boyd five used trucks, which both parties know are located in a Chicago warehouse. If nothing more is specified in the contract, the place of delivery for the trucks is Chicago. Li Wan may tender delivery either by giving Boyd a negotiable or nonnegotiable document of title or by obtaining the bailee’s (warehouse’s) acknowledgment that the buyer is entitled to possession.¹

Delivery via Carrier

In many instances, attendant circumstances or delivery terms in the contract (such as F.O.B. or F.A.S. terms; see Exhibit 20–2 on page 390) make it apparent that the parties intend that a carrier be used to move the goods. In contracts involving a carrier, a seller can complete performance of the obligation to deliver the goods in two ways—through a shipment contract or through a destination contract.

SHIPMENT CONTRACTS Recall from Chapter 20 that a shipment contract requires or authorizes the seller to ship goods by a carrier. The contract does not require that the seller deliver the goods at a particular destination [UCC 2–319, 2–509(1)(a)]. Unless otherwise agreed, the seller must do the following:

1. Place the goods into the hands of the carrier.
2. Make a contract for their transportation that is reasonable according to the nature of the goods and their value. (For example, certain types of goods need refrigeration in transit.)
3. Obtain and promptly deliver or tender to the buyer any documents necessary to enable the buyer to obtain possession of the goods from the carrier.

1. If the seller delivers a nonnegotiable document of title or merely instructs the bailee in a writing (record) to release the goods to the buyer without the bailee’s acknowledgment of the buyer’s rights, this is also a sufficient tender, unless the buyer objects [UCC 2–503(4)]. Risk of loss, however, does not pass until the buyer has had a reasonable amount of time in which to present the document or the instructions. See Chapter 20.

4. Promptly notify the buyer that shipment has been made [UCC 2–504].

If the seller does not make a reasonable contract for transportation or fails to notify the buyer of the shipment, the buyer can reject the goods, but only if a material loss of the goods or a significant delay results. Suppose that a contract involves the shipment of fresh fruit, such as strawberries, but the seller does not arrange for refrigerated transportation. In this situation, if the fruit spoils during transport, a material loss will likely result. (Of course, the parties are free to make agreements that alter the UCC's rules and allow the buyer to reject goods for other reasons.)

DESTINATION CONTRACTS In a destination contract, the seller agrees to deliver conforming goods to the buyer at a particular destination. The goods must be tendered at a reasonable hour and held at the buyer's disposal for a reasonable length of time. The seller must also give the buyer appropriate notice. In addition, the seller must provide the buyer with any documents of title necessary to enable the buyer to obtain delivery from the carrier. Sellers often do this by tendering the documents through ordinary banking channels [UCC 2–503].

The Perfect Tender Rule

As previously noted, the seller or lessor has an obligation to ship or tender conforming goods, which the buyer or lessee is then obligated to accept and pay for according to the terms of the contract [UCC 2–507]. Under the common law, the seller was obligated to deliver goods that conformed with the terms of the contract in every detail. This was called the perfect tender rule. The UCC preserves the perfect tender doctrine by stating that if goods or tender of delivery fails in any respect to conform to the contract, the buyer or lessee has the right to accept the goods, reject the entire shipment, or accept part and reject part [UCC 2–601, 2A–509].

For example, a lessor contracts to lease fifty Comclear monitors to be delivered at the lessee's place of business on or before October 1. On September 28, the lessor discovers that it has only thirty Comclear monitors in inventory but will have another twenty Comclear monitors within the next two weeks. The lessor tenders delivery of the thirty Comclear monitors on October 1, with the promise that the other monitors will be delivered within two weeks. Because the lessor has failed to make a perfect tender of fifty Comclear monitors, the lessee has the right to reject the entire shipment and hold the lessor in breach.

Exceptions to the Perfect Tender Rule

Because of the rigidity of the perfect tender rule, several exceptions to the rule have been created, some of which we discuss here.

AGREEMENT OF THE PARTIES Exceptions to the perfect tender rule may be established by agreement. If the parties have agreed, for example, that defective goods or parts will not be rejected if the seller or lessor is able to repair or replace them within a reasonable period of time, the perfect tender rule does not apply.

CURE The UCC does not specifically define the term cure, but it refers to the right of the seller or lessor to repair, adjust, or replace defective or nonconforming goods [UCC 2–508, 2A–513]. When any delivery is rejected because of nonconforming goods and the time for performance has not yet expired, the seller or lessor can attempt to “cure” the defect within the contract time for performance [UCC 2–508(1), 2A–513(1)]. To do so, the seller or lessor must seasonably (timely) notify the buyer or lessee of the intention to cure.

Reasonable Grounds Required When Time for Performance Has Expired. Once the time for performance under the contract has expired, the seller or lessor can still exercise the right to cure if he or she has reasonable grounds to believe that the nonconforming tender will be acceptable to the buyer or lessee [UCC 2–508(2), 2A–513(2)]. For example, if in the past a buyer frequently accepted a particular substitute for a good when the good ordered was not available, the seller has reasonable grounds to believe the buyer will again accept the substitute. Even if the buyer had rejected the substitute good on a particular occasion, the seller nonetheless has reasonable grounds to believe that the substitute will be acceptable. A seller or lessor will sometimes tender nonconforming goods with some type of price allowance, which can serve as the “reasonable grounds” to believe that the buyer or lessee will accept the nonconforming tender.

A Restriction on the Buyer's or Lessee's Right of Rejection. The right to cure substantially restricts the right of the buyer or lessee to reject goods. For example, if a lessee refuses a tender of goods as nonconforming but does not disclose the nature of the defect to the lessor, the lessee cannot later assert the defect as a defense if the defect is one that the lessor could have cured. Generally, buyers and lessees must act in good faith and state specific reasons for refusing to accept goods [UCC 2–605, 2A–514].

SUBSTITUTION OF CARRIERS When an agreed-on manner of delivery (such as the use of a particular carrier to transport the goods) becomes impracticable or unavailable through no fault of either party, but a commercially reasonable substitute is available, this substitute performance is sufficient tender to the buyer and must be used [UCC 2–614(1)]. For example, a sales contract calls for the delivery of a large piece of machinery to be shipped by ABC Truck Lines on or before June 1. The contract terms clearly state the importance of the delivery date. The employees of ABC Truck Lines go on strike. The seller must make a reasonable substitute tender, perhaps by another trucking firm or by air freight, if it is available. Note that the seller normally is responsible for any additional shipping costs, unless contrary arrangements have been made in the sales contract.

INSTALLMENT CONTRACTS An installment contract is a single contract that requires or authorizes delivery in two or more separate lots to be accepted and paid for separately. With an installment contract, a buyer or lessee can reject an installment only if the nonconformity substantially impairs the value of the installment and cannot be cured [UCC 2–307, 2–612(2), 2A–510(1)]. If the buyer or lessee fails to notify the seller or lessor of the rejection, however, and subsequently accepts a nonconforming installment, the contract is reinstated [UCC 2–612(3), 2A–510(2)].

The entire installment contract is breached only when one or more nonconforming installments substantially impair the value of the whole contract. The UCC strictly limits rejection to instances of substantial nonconformity. Suppose that an installment contract involves parts of a machine. The first part is necessary for the operation of the machine, but when it is delivered, it is irreparably defective. The failure of this first installment will be a breach of the whole contract because the machine will not operate without the first part. The situation would likely be different, however, if the contract had called for twenty carloads of plywood and only 9 percent of one of the carloads of plywood had deviated from the thickness specifications in the contract.

The point to remember is that the UCC significantly alters the right of the buyer or lessee to reject the entire contract if the contract requires delivery to be made in several installments. Only a substantial nonconformity will allow the buyer or lessee to reject the contract (unless, of course, the parties agree that breach of an installment constitutes a breach of the entire contract).

COMMERCIAL IMPRACTICABILITY As discussed in Chapter 17 on page 328, occurrences unforeseen by either party when a contract was made may make performance commercially impracticable. When this occurs, the perfect tender rule no longer applies. According to UCC 2–615(a) and 2A–405(a), a delay in delivery or nondelivery in whole or in part is not a breach if performance has been made impracticable “by the occurrence of a contingency the nonoccurrence of which was a basic assumption on which the contract was made.” The seller or lessor must, however, notify the buyer or lessee as soon as practicable that there will be a delay or nondelivery.

Foreseeable versus Unforeseeable Contingencies. The doctrine of commercial impracticability does not extend to problems that could have been foreseen. An increase in cost resulting from inflation, for instance, does not in and of itself excuse performance, as this kind of foreseeable risk is ordinarily assumed by a seller or lessor conducting business. The nonoccurrence of the contingency must have been a basic assumption on which the contract was made [UCC 2–615, 2A–405].

For example, a major oil company that receives its oil from the Middle East has a contract to supply a buyer with one hundred thousand barrels of oil. Because of an oil embargo by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, the seller is unable to secure oil from the Middle East or any other source to meet the terms of the contract. This situation comes fully under the commercial impracticability exception to the perfect tender doctrine.

Can unanticipated increases in a seller’s costs that make performance “impracticable” constitute a valid defense to performance on the basis of commercial impracticability? The court dealt with this question in the following case.

Maple Farms, Inc. v. City School District of Elmira

Supreme Court of New York, 76 Misc.2d 1080, 352 N.Y.S.2d 784 (1974).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • On June 15, 1973, Maple Farms, Inc., formed an agreement with the city school district of Elmira, New York, to supply the school district with milk for the 1973–1974 school year. The agreement was in the form of a requirements contract, under which Maple Farms would sell to the school district all the milk the district required at a fixed price—which was the June market price of milk. By December 1973, the price of raw milk had increased by 23 percent over the price specified in the contract. This meant that if the terms of the contract were fulfilled, Maple Farms would lose $7,350. Because it had similar contracts with other school districts, Maple Farms stood to lose a great deal if it was held to the price stated in the contracts. When the school district would not agree to release Maple Farms from its contract, Maple Farms brought an action in a New York state court for a declaratory judgment (a determination of the parties’ rights under a contract). Maple Farms contended that the substantial increase in the price of raw milk was an event not contemplated by the parties when the contract was formed and that, given the increased price, performance of the contract was commercially impracticable.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Charles B. SWARTWOOD, Justice.

* * * *

* * * [The doctrine of commercial impracticability requires first that] a contingency—something unexpected—must have occurred. Second, the risk of the unexpected occurrence must not have been allocated either by agreement or by custom.

* * * Here we find that the contingency causing the increase of the price of raw milk was not totally unexpected. The price from the low point in the year 1972 to the price on the date of the award of the contract in June 1973 had risen nearly 10%. And any businessman should have been aware of the general inflation in this country during the previous years * * *. [Emphasis added.]

* * * Here the very purpose of the contract was to guard against fluctuation of price of half pints of milk as a basis for the school budget. Surely had the price of raw milk fallen substantially, the defendant could not be excused from performance. We can reasonably assume that the plaintiff had to be aware of escalating inflation. It is chargeable with knowledge of the substantial increase of the price of raw milk from the previous year’s low. * * * It nevertheless entered into this agreement with that knowledge. It did not provide in the contract any exculpatory clause to excuse it from performance in the event of a substantial rise in the price of raw milk. On these facts the risk of a substantial or abnormal increase in the price of raw milk can be allocated to the plaintiff.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The New York trial court ruled that inflation and fluctuating prices did not render performance impracticable in this case and granted summary judgment in favor of the school district.

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY’S LAW • This classic case illustrates the UCC’s commercial impracticability doctrine as courts still apply it today. Under this doctrine, increased cost alone does not excuse performance unless the rise in cost is due to some unforeseen contingency that alters the essential nature of the performance.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the court had ruled in the plaintiff’s favor. How might that ruling have affected the plaintiff’s contracts with other parties?

Partial Performance. Sometimes, the unforeseen event only partially affects the capacity of the seller or lessor to perform, and thus the seller or lessor can partially fulfill the contract but cannot tender total performance. In this event, the seller or lessor is required to allocate in a fair and reasonable manner any remaining production and deliveries among its regular customers and those to whom it is contractually obligated to deliver the goods [UCC 2–615(b), 2A–405(b)]. The buyer or lessee must receive notice of the allocation and has the right to accept or reject it [UCC 2–615(c), 2A–405(c)].

For example, a Florida orange grower, Best Citrus, Inc., contracts to sell this season’s production to a number of customers, including Martin’s grocery chain. Martin’s contracts to purchase two thousand crates of oranges. Best Citrus has sprayed some of its orange groves with a chemical called Karmoxin. The U.S. Department of Agriculture discovers that persons who eat products sprayed with Karmoxin may develop cancer and issues an order prohibiting the sale of these products. Best Citrus picks all the oranges not sprayed with Karmoxin, but the quantity is insufficient to meet all the contracted-for deliveries. In this situation, Best Citrus is required to allocate its production. It notifies Martin’s that it cannot deliver the full quantity specified in the contract and indicates the amount it will be able to deliver. Martin’s can either accept or reject the allocation, but Best Citrus has no further contractual liability.

CASE IN POINT By contract, Hoosier Energy Rural Electric Cooperative was required to make lease payments to John Hancock Life Insurance Company for sixty-three years. The lease payments were guaranteed by Ambac Assurance Corporation, but when the latest global financial crisis struck, Ambac’s credit rating was downgraded. Under the terms of the contract, this meant that Hoosier would have to pay $120 million to John Hancock or find another guarantor within a very short time. Hoosier went to court, claiming commercial impracticability, among other things. Hoosier argued that the obstacles it faced in finding another guarantor were the product of the credit crisis, were not anticipated, and could not have been guarded against. The court agreed and issued an injunction that prevented John Hancock from obtaining the $120 million, even though Hoosier had agreed to the payment when it entered into the contract.²

DESTRUCTION OF IDENTIFIED GOODS Sometimes, an unexpected event, such as a fire, totally destroys goods through no fault of either party and before risk passes to the buyer or lessee. In such a situation, if the goods were identified at the time the contract was formed, the parties are excused from performance [UCC 2–613, 2A–221]. If the goods are only partially destroyed, however, the buyer or lessee can inspect them and either treat the contract as void or accept the damaged goods with a reduction in the contract price.

Consider an example. Atlas Sporting Equipment agrees to lease to River Bicycles sixty bicycles of a particular model that has been discontinued. No other bicycles of that model are available. River specifies that it needs the bicycles to rent to tourists. Before Atlas can deliver the bicycles, they are destroyed by a fire. In this situation, Atlas is not liable to River for failing to deliver the bicycles. Through no fault of either party, the goods were destroyed before the risk of loss passed to the lessee. The loss was total, so the contract is avoided. Clearly, Atlas has no obligation to tender the bicycles, and River has no obligation to pay for them.

ASSURANCE AND COOPERATION Two other exceptions to the perfect tender doctrine apply equally to both parties to sales and lease contracts: the right of assurance and the duty of cooperation.

The Right of Assurance. The UCC provides that if one of the parties to a contract has “reasonable grounds” to believe that the other party will not perform as contracted, she or he may in writing “demand adequate assurance of due performance” from the other party. Until such assurance is received, she or he may “suspend” further performance without liability. What constitutes “reasonable grounds” is determined by commercial standards. If such assurances are not forthcoming within a reasonable time (not to exceed thirty days), the failure to respond may be treated as a repudiation of the contract [UCC 2–609, 2A–401].

CASE IN POINT Two companies that made road-surfacing materials, Koch Materials and Shore Slurry Seal, Inc., entered into a contract. Koch obtained a license to use Novachip, a special material made by Shore, and Shore agreed to buy all of its asphalt from Koch for the next seven years. A few years into the contract term, Shore notified Koch that it was planning to sell its assets to Asphalt Paving Systems, Inc. Koch demanded assurances that Asphalt Paving would continue the deal, but Shore refused to provide assurances. The court held that Koch could treat Shore’s failure to give assurances as a repudiation and sue Shore for breach of contract.³

3. Koch Materials Co. v. Shore Slurry Seal, Inc., 205 F.Supp.2d 324 (D.N.J. 2002).

The Duty of Cooperation. Sometimes, the performance of one party depends on the cooperation of the other. The UCC provides that when such cooperation is not forthcoming, the other party can suspend his or her own performance without liability and hold the uncooperative party in breach or proceed to perform the contract in any reasonable manner [UCC 2–311(3)].

Suppose that Amati is required by contract to deliver twelve hundred Model K washing machines to locations in the state of California to be specified later by Farrell. Deliveries are to be made on or before October 1. Amati has repeatedly requested the delivery locations, but Farrell has not responded. The twelve hundred Model K machines are ready for shipment on October 1, but Farrell still refuses to give Amati the delivery locations. Amati does not ship on October 1. Can Amati be held liable? The answer is no. Amati is excused for any resulting delay of performance because of Farrell's failure to cooperate.

OBLIGATIONS OF THE BUYER OR LESSEE

The main obligation of the buyer or lessee under a sales or lease contract is to pay for the goods tendered in accordance with the contract. Once the seller or lessor has adequately tendered delivery, the buyer or lessee is obligated to accept the goods and pay for them according to the terms of the contract.

Payment

In the absence of any specific agreements, the buyer or lessee must make payment at the time and place the goods are received [UCC 2–310(a), 2A–516(1)]. When a sale is made on credit, the buyer is obliged to pay according to the specified credit terms (for example, 60, 90, or 120 days), not when the goods are received. The credit period usually begins on the date of shipment [UCC 2–310(d)]. Under a lease contract, a lessee must make the lease payment that was specified in the contract [UCC 2A–516(1)].

Payment can be made by any means agreed on between the parties—cash or any other method generally acceptable in the commercial world. If the seller demands cash when the buyer offers a check, credit card, or the like, the seller must permit the buyer reasonable time to obtain legal tender [UCC 2–511].

Right of Inspection

Unless the parties otherwise agree, or for C.O.D. (collect on delivery) transactions, the buyer or lessee has an absolute right to inspect the goods before making payment. This right allows the buyer or lessee to verify that the goods tendered or delivered conform to the contract. If the goods are not as ordered, the buyer or lessee has no duty to pay. An opportunity for inspection is therefore a condition precedent to the right of the seller or lessor to enforce payment [UCC 2–513(1), 2A–515(1)].

Inspection can take place at any reasonable place and time and in any reasonable manner. Generally, what is reasonable is determined by custom of the trade, past practices of the parties, and the like. The buyer bears the costs of inspecting the goods but can recover the costs from the seller if the goods do not conform and are rejected [UCC 2–513(2)].

The following case focuses on the buyer's right to inspect the goods before acceptance, as well as the buyer's right to reject nonconforming goods.

Romero v. Scoggin-Dickey Chevrolet-Buick, Inc.

Romero went to the Scoggin-Dickey Chevrolet-Buick, Inc., dealership in Lubbock, Texas, and sought to purchase a 2006 Silverado pickup from Fred Morales. Romero proposed to purchase the pickup by assigning the dealership the factory rebates, supplying two trade-in vehicles (a 2003 Mitsubishi Montero SP and a 2002 Chevrolet Silverado pickup), and paying the cash difference. At the time of the negotiations, Romero did not have the proposed trade-in vehicles on the lot for inspection by Scoggin-Dickey.

The Texas Seventh Court of Appeals in Amarillo, Texas, maintains this Web site.

After negotiating a value for the trade-in vehicles, Romero and Morales signed a contract order wherein Scoggin-Dickey agreed to sell Romero the 2006 Silverado pickup for $21,888. In return, Romero agreed to trade in two vehicles having a combined net value of $15,000, assign factory rebates totaling $3,000, and pay $4,333.52 in cash.

Romero paid the cash, assigned the rebates, and took possession of the 2006 Silverado pickup. At that time, Romero did not deliver the trade-in vehicles to Scoggin-Dickey, nor did Scoggin-Dickey transfer title to the 2006 Silverado pickup to Romero. Subsequently, Romero showed Morales the location of the [Mitsubishi] Montero. After several weeks passed, Romero informed Morales that the 2002 Silverado pickup was located at a body shop. The pickup was not in running condition and was eventually towed by wrecker to Scoggin-Dickey.

After inspecting the trade-in vehicles, Scoggin-Dickey determined the Montero and 2002 Silverado pickup had little, or no, commercial value.

Thereafter, Scoggin-Dickey took back the 2006 Silverado pickup and made two settlement offers to Romero pertaining to a partial refund of his down payment. Romero rejected the offers and filed suit.

* * * The trial court concluded, as a matter of law, that Scoggin-Dickey had a right to inspect the trade-in vehicles under [the Texas Code's equivalent to UCC Section 2-513] and, upon inspection, had validly exercised their right to reject the vehicles tendered by Romero.

* * * *

* * * Romero [argued on appeal, among other things, that] Scoggin-Dickey had no legal right to inspect and/or reject the trade-in vehicles after the contract order was executed[.]

* * * *

* * * Unless the parties agree otherwise, a buyer has a right to inspect goods identified to a contract for sale at any reasonable place and time and in any reasonable manner prior to payment or acceptance of the goods. This is an implied condition in all contracts for sale. Moreover, if the goods are nonconforming, the buyer also has "an absolute right to reject." Thus, the trial court correctly held, as a matter of law, that Scoggin-Dickey had a right to inspect Romero's trade-in vehicles to verify ownership, make, model, and value, even after the contract order was executed. If the trade-in vehicles did not conform to their description in the contract order, Scoggin-Dickey had a right to reject any nonconforming vehicle. [Emphasis added.]

* * * Execution of the contract order did not constitute a "sale" because there was no present transfer of ownership of the 2006 Silverado pickup to Romero or a transfer of ownership of the two trade-in vehicles in full payment of the purchase price to Scoggin-Dickey. Rather, the contract order was a contract for sale, [that is,] "a contract to sell goods at a future time"; or conditional sale. * * * Under these facts, the trial court could conclude that the parties intended that vehicle ownership pass in the future when the balance of the purchase price was paid to Scoggin-Dickey, [that is, when] Romero tendered two trade-in vehicles conforming to their description in the contract order.

* * * *

The trial court's judgment is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. Why didn't the "contract order" signed by the parties constitute a binding contract for the sale of goods?
2. According to the court, "Romero and Scoggin-Dickey were both buyers and sellers." What did the court mean by this statement?

Acceptance

Once the buyer or lessee has had a reasonable opportunity to inspect the goods, the buyer or lessee can demonstrate acceptance of the delivered goods by words or conduct. A buyer or lessee who indicates to the seller or lessor that either the goods are conforming or he or she will retain them in spite of their nonconformity has accepted the goods [UCC 2-606(1)(a), 2A-515(1)(a)]. Acceptance of the goods is presumed when the buyer or lessee fails to reject the goods within a reasonable period of time [UCC 2-602(1), 2-606(1)(b), 2A-515(1)(b)].

In sales contracts, if the buyer performs any act inconsistent with the seller's ownership, then the buyer will be deemed to have accepted the goods. For example, any use or resale of the goods—except for the limited purpose of testing or inspecting the goods—generally constitutes an acceptance [UCC 2-606(1)(c)].

Partial Acceptance

If some of the goods delivered do not conform to the contract and the seller or lessor has failed to cure, the buyer or lessee can make a partial acceptance [UCC 2–601(c), 2A–509(1)]. The same is true if the nonconformity was not reasonably discoverable before acceptance. (In the latter situation, the buyer or lessee may be able to revoke the acceptance, as will be discussed later in this chapter.)

A buyer or lessee cannot accept less than a single commercial unit, however. The UCC defines a commercial unit as a unit of goods that, by commercial usage, is viewed as a “single whole” for purposes of sale and that cannot be divided without materially impairing the character of the unit, its market value, or its use [UCC 2–105(6), 2A–103(1)(c)]. A commercial unit can be a single article (such as a machine), a set of articles (such as a suite of furniture), a quantity (such as a bale, a gross, or a carload), or any other unit treated in the trade as a single whole.

See Concept Summary 21.1 for a review of the obligations of both parties to a sales or lease contract.

SECTION 4 ANTICIPATORY REPUDIATION

What if, before the time for contract performance, one party clearly communicates to the other the intention not to perform? As discussed in Chapter 17

CONCEPT SUMMARY 21.1

Performance of Sales and Lease Contracts

Concept	Description
Obligations of the Seller or Lessor	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The seller or lessor must tender conforming goods to the buyer or lessee at a reasonable hour and in a reasonable manner. Under the perfect tender doctrine, the seller or lessor must tender goods that conform exactly to the terms of the contract [UCC 2–503(1), 2A–508(1)]. 2. If the seller or lessor tenders nonconforming goods and the buyer or lessee rejects them, the seller or lessor may cure (repair or replace the goods) within the contract time for performance [UCC 2–508(1), 2A–513(1)]. Even if the time for performance under the contract has expired, the seller or lessor has a reasonable time to substitute conforming goods without liability if the seller or lessor has reasonable grounds to believe the nonconforming tender will be acceptable to the buyer or lessee [UCC 2–508(2), 2A–513(2)]. 3. If the agreed-on means of delivery becomes impracticable or unavailable, the seller must substitute an alternative means (such as a different carrier) if a reasonable one is available [UCC 2–614(1)]. 4. If a seller or lessor tenders nonconforming goods in any one installment under an installment contract, the buyer or lessee may reject the installment only if the nonconformity substantially impairs its value and cannot be cured. The entire installment contract is breached only when one or more installments substantially impair the value of the whole contract [UCC 2–612, 2A–510]. 5. When performance becomes commercially impracticable owing to circumstances unforeseen when the contract was formed, the perfect tender rule no longer applies [UCC 2–615, 2A–405].
Obligations of the Buyer or Lessee	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. On tender of delivery by the seller or lessor, the buyer or lessee must pay for the goods at the time and place the goods are received, unless the sale is made on credit. Payment can be made by any method generally acceptable in the commercial world, but the seller can demand cash [UCC 2–310, 2–511]. 2. Unless otherwise agreed or in C.O.D. shipments, the buyer or lessee has an absolute right to inspect the goods before acceptance [UCC 2–513(1), 2A–515(1)]. 3. The buyer or lessee can manifest acceptance of delivered goods in words or by conduct, such as by failing to reject the goods after having had a reasonable opportunity to inspect them. A buyer will be deemed to have accepted goods if he or she performs any act inconsistent with the seller's ownership [UCC 2–606(1), 2A–515(1)].

on pages 324 and 325, such an action is a breach of the contract by anticipatory repudiation.

Suspension of Performance Obligations

When anticipatory repudiation occurs, the non-breaching party has a choice of two responses: (1) treat the repudiation as a final breach by pursuing a remedy or (2) wait to see if the repudiating party will decide to honor the contract despite the avowed intention to renege [UCC 2–610, 2A–402]. In either situation, the nonbreaching party may suspend performance.

A Repudiation May Be Retracted

The UCC permits the breaching party to “retract” his or her repudiation (subject to some limitations). This can be done by any method that clearly indicates the party’s intent to perform. Once retraction is made, the rights of the repudiating party under the contract are reinstated. There can be no retraction, however, if since the time of the repudiation the other party has canceled or materially changed position or otherwise indicated that the repudiation is final [UCC 2–611, 2A–403].

On April 1, Cora, who owns a small inn, purchases a suite of furniture from Tom Horton, proprietor of Horton’s Furniture Warehouse. The contract states that “delivery must be made on or before May 1.” On April 10, Tom informs Cora that he cannot make delivery until May 10 and asks her to consent to the modified delivery date. In this situation, Cora has the option of either treating Tom’s notice of late delivery as a final breach of contract and pursuing a remedy or agreeing to the later delivery date. Suppose that Cora does neither for two weeks. On April 24, Tom informs Cora that he will be able to deliver the furniture by May 1 after all. In effect, he has retracted his repudiation, reinstating the rights and obligations of the parties under the original contract. Note that if Cora had indicated after Tom’s repudiation that she was canceling the contract, he would not have been able to retract his repudiation.

SECTION 5

REMEDIES OF THE SELLER OR LESSOR

When the buyer or lessee is in breach, the seller or lessor has numerous remedies under the UCC. Generally, the remedies available to the seller or lessor depend on the circumstances existing at the time of the breach. The most pertinent considerations are which party has possession of the goods, whether the goods are in transit, and whether the buyer or lessee has rejected or accepted the goods.

When the Goods Are in the Possession of the Seller or Lessor

Under the UCC, if the buyer or lessee breaches the contract before the goods have been delivered, the seller or lessor has the right to pursue the following remedies:

1. Cancel (rescind) the contract.
2. Resell the goods and sue to recover damages.
3. Sue to recover the purchase price or lease payments due.
4. Sue to recover damages for the buyer’s nonacceptance of goods.

THE RIGHT TO CANCEL THE CONTRACT If the buyer or lessee breaches the contract, the seller or lessor can choose to simply cancel the contract [UCC 2–703(f), 2A–523(1)(a)]. The seller or lessor must notify the buyer or lessee of the cancellation, and at that point all remaining obligations of the seller or lessor are discharged. The buyer or lessee is not discharged from all remaining obligations, however; he or she is in breach, and the seller or lessor can pursue remedies available under the UCC for breach.

THE RIGHT TO WITHHOLD DELIVERY In general, sellers and lessors can withhold delivery or discontinue performance of their obligations under sales or lease contracts when the buyers or lessees are in breach. This is true whether a buyer or lessee has wrongfully rejected or revoked acceptance of contract goods (which will be discussed later in this chapter), failed to make a payment, or repudiated the contract [UCC 2–703(a), 2A–523(1)(c)]. The seller or lessor can also refuse to deliver the goods to a buyer or lessee who is insolvent (unable to pay debts as they become due) unless the buyer or lessee pays in cash [UCC 2–702(1), 2A–525(1)].

THE RIGHT TO RESELL OR DISPOSE OF THE GOODS

When a buyer or lessee breaches or repudiates the contract while the seller or lessor is in possession of the goods, the seller or lessor can resell or dispose of the goods. The seller can retain any profits made as a result of the sale and can hold the buyer or lessee liable for any loss [UCC 2–703(d), 2–706(1), 2A–523(1)(e), 2A–527(1)].

The seller must give the original buyer reasonable notice of the resale, unless the goods are perishable or will rapidly decline in value [UCC 2–706(2), (3)]. A good faith purchaser in a resale takes the goods free of any of the rights of the original buyer, even if the seller fails to comply with this requirement [UCC 2–706(5)]. The UCC encourages the resale of the goods because although the buyer is liable for any deficiency, the seller is not accountable to the buyer for any profits made on the resale [UCC 2–706(6)].

Unfinished Goods. When the goods contracted for are unfinished at the time of the breach, the seller or lessor can either (1) cease manufacturing the goods and resell them for scrap or salvage value or (2) complete the manufacture and resell or dispose of the goods, holding the buyer or lessee liable for any deficiency. In choosing between these two alternatives, the seller or lessor must exercise reasonable commercial judgment in order to mitigate the loss and obtain maximum value from the unfinished goods [UCC 2–704(2), 2A–524(2)]. Any resale of the goods must be made in good faith and in a commercially reasonable manner.

Measure of Damages. In sales transactions, the seller can recover any deficiency between the resale price and the contract price, along with incidental damages (see Chapter 18), defined as those costs to the seller resulting from the breach [UCC 2–706(1), 2–710]. The resale can be private or public, and the goods can be sold as a unit or in parcels.

In lease transactions, the lessor may lease the goods to another party and recover from the original lessee, as damages, any unpaid lease payments up to the beginning date of the lease term under the new lease. The lessor can also recover any deficiency between the lease payments due under the original lease contract and those under the new lease contract, along with incidental damages [UCC 2A–527(2)].

THE RIGHT TO RECOVER THE PURCHASE PRICE OR LEASE PAYMENTS DUE Under the UCC, an unpaid seller or lessor can bring an action to recover the purchase price or the payments due under the lease contract, plus incidental damages [UCC 2–709(1), 2A–529(1)]. If a seller or lessor is unable to resell or dispose of the goods and sues for the contract price or lease payments due, the goods must be held for the buyer or lessee. The seller or lessor can resell the goods at any time prior to collecting the judgment from the buyer or lessee. If the goods are resold, the net proceeds from the sale must be credited to the buyer or lessee because of the duty to mitigate damages.

Suppose that Southern Realty contracts with Gem Point, Inc., to purchase one thousand pens with Southern Realty's name inscribed on them. Gem Point tenders delivery of the pens, but Southern Realty wrongfully refuses to accept them. In this situation, Gem Point can bring an action for the purchase price because it delivered conforming goods, and Southern Realty refused to accept or pay for the goods. Gem Point obviously cannot resell the pens inscribed with the buyer's business name, so this situation falls under UCC 2–709. Gem Point is required to make the pens available for Southern Realty, but can resell them (in the event that it can find a buyer) at any time prior to collecting the judgment from Southern Realty.

THE RIGHT TO RECOVER DAMAGES FOR THE BUYER'S NONACCEPTANCE If a buyer or lessee repudiates a contract or wrongfully refuses to accept the goods, a seller or lessor can bring an action to recover the damages sustained. Ordinarily, the amount of damages equals the difference between the contract price or lease payments and the market price or lease payments at the time and place of tender of the goods, plus incidental damages [UCC 2–708(1), 2A–528(1)]. When the ordinary measure of damages is inadequate to put the seller or lessor in as good a position as the buyer's or lessee's performance would have, the UCC provides an alternative. In that situation, the proper measure of damages is the lost profits of the seller or lessor, including a reasonable allowance for overhead and other expenses [UCC 2–708(2), 2A–528(2)].

When the Goods Are in Transit

When the seller or lessor has delivered the goods to a carrier or a bailee but the buyer or lessee has not yet received them, the goods are said to be in transit. If, while the goods are in transit, the seller or lessor learns that the buyer or lessee is insolvent, the seller or lessor can stop the carrier or bailee from delivering the goods, regardless of the quantity of goods shipped. If the buyer or lessee is in breach but is not insolvent, the seller or lessor can stop the goods in transit only if the quantity shipped is at least a carload, a truckload, a planeload, or a larger shipment [UCC 2–705(1), 2A–526(1)].

To stop delivery, the seller or lessor must timely notify the carrier or other bailee that the goods are to be returned or held for the seller or lessor. If the carrier has sufficient time to stop delivery, the goods must be held and delivered according to the instructions of the seller or lessor, who is liable to the carrier for any additional costs incurred [UCC 2-705(3), 2A-526(3)].

The seller or lessor has the right to stop delivery of the goods under UCC 2-705(2) and 2A-526(2) until the time when:

1. The buyer or lessee receives the goods.
2. The carrier or the bailee acknowledges the rights of the buyer or lessee in the goods (by reshipping or holding the goods for the buyer or lessee, for example).
3. A negotiable document of title covering the goods has been properly transferred to the buyer in a sales transaction, giving the buyer ownership rights in the goods [UCC 2-705(2)].

Once the seller or lessor reclaims the goods in transit, she or he can pursue the remedies allowed to sellers and lessors when the goods are in their possession.

When the Goods Are in the Possession of the Buyer or Lessee

When the buyer or lessee has breached a sales or lease contract and the goods are in his or her possession, the seller or lessor can sue to recover the purchase price of the goods or the lease payments due, plus incidental damages [UCC 2-709(1), 2A-529(1)].

In some situations, a seller may also have a right to reclaim the goods from the buyer. For example, in a sales contract, if the buyer has received the goods on credit and the seller discovers that the buyer is insolvent, the seller can demand the return of the goods [UCC 2-702(2)]. Ordinarily, the demand must be made within ten days of the buyer's receipt of the goods.⁴ The seller's right to reclaim the goods is subject to the rights of a good faith purchaser or other subsequent buyer in the ordinary course of business who purchases the goods from the buyer before the seller reclaims them.

In regard to lease contracts, if the lessee is in default (fails to make payments that are due, for example), the lessor may reclaim the leased goods that are in the lessee's possession [UCC 2A-525(2)].

4. The seller can demand and reclaim the goods at any time, though, if the buyer misrepresented his or her solvency in writing within three months prior to the delivery of the goods.

SECTION 6 REMEDIES OF THE BUYER OR LESSEE

When the seller or lessor breaches the contract, the buyer or lessee has numerous remedies available under the UCC. Like the remedies available to sellers and lessors, the remedies available to buyers and lessees depend on the circumstances existing at the time of the breach.

When the Seller or Lessor Refuses to Deliver the Goods

If the seller or lessor refuses to deliver the goods to the buyer or lessee, the basic remedies available to the buyer or lessee include the right to:

1. Cancel (rescind) the contract.
2. Recover goods that have been paid for if the seller or lessor is insolvent.
3. Sue to obtain specific performance if the goods are unique or if damages are an inadequate remedy.
4. Buy other goods (obtain cover—defined on page 413) and recover damages from the seller.
5. Sue to obtain identified goods held by a third party (replevy goods—defined on page 413).
6. Sue to recover damages.

THE RIGHT TO CANCEL THE CONTRACT When a seller or lessor fails to make proper delivery or repudiates the contract, the buyer or lessee can cancel, or rescind, the contract. The buyer or lessee is relieved of any further obligations under the contract but retains all rights to other remedies against the seller or lessor [UCC 2-711(1), 2A-508(1)(a)]. (The right to cancel the contract is also available to a buyer or lessee who has rightfully rejected goods or revoked acceptance, as will be discussed shortly.)

THE RIGHT TO RECOVER THE GOODS If a buyer or lessee has made a partial or full payment for goods that remain in the possession of the seller or lessor, the buyer or lessee can recover the goods if the seller or lessor becomes insolvent within ten days after receiving the first payment and if the goods are identified to the contract. To exercise this right, the buyer or lessee must tender to the seller or lessor any unpaid balance of the purchase price or lease payments [UCC 2-502, 2A-522].

THE RIGHT TO OBTAIN SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE A buyer or lessee can obtain specific performance if the goods are unique or the remedy at law (monetary damages) is inadequate [UCC 2-716(1), 2A-521(1)]. Ordinarily, an award of damages is sufficient to place a buyer or lessee in the position she or he would have occupied if the seller or lessor had fully performed. When the contract is for the purchase of a particular work of art or a similarly unique item, however, damages may not be sufficient. Under these circumstances, equity requires that the seller or lessor perform exactly by delivering the particular goods identified to the contract (the remedy of specific performance).

Animals are items of property and can be classified as “goods.” An animal such as a pet likely seems unique to its owner. But does a pet possess the quality of uniqueness necessary for an award of specific performance? That was the question in the following case.

CASE 21.3 Houseman v. Dare

Superior Court of New Jersey, Appellate Division, 405 N.J.Super. 538, 966 A.2d 24 (2009).
www.lawlibrary.rutgers.edu/search.shtml^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Doreen Houseman and Eric Dare were together for thirteen years. They bought a house and were engaged to marry. They also bought a pedigreed dog for $1,500, which they registered with the American Kennel Club as joint owners. When Dare decided to end the relationship, they agreed that he could pay Houseman for her interest in the house and she would move out. They also agreed that she could take the dog. She asked him to put the agreement about the dog in writing, but he told her that she could trust him. She allowed him to take the dog for visits. After one such visit, Dare kept the dog. Houseman filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against Dare. In a summary judgment, the court concluded that specific performance is not available as a remedy for the breach of an oral agreement about the possession of a dog and awarded Houseman $1,500. She appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

GRALL, J.A.D. [Judge, Appellate Division]

* * * *

The court’s conclusion that specific performance is not, as a matter of law, available to remedy a breach of an oral agreement about possession of a dog reached by its joint owners is not sustainable. The remedy of specific performance can be invoked to address a breach of an enforceable agreement when money damages are not adequate to protect the * * * interest of the injured party.

Specific performance is generally recognized as the appropriate remedy when an agreement concerns possession of property such as heirlooms, family treasures and works of art that induce a strong sentimental attachment. That is so because money damages cannot compensate the injured party for the special subjective benefits he or she derives from possession.

* * * *

*The special subjective value of personal property worthy of recognition by a court of equity is sentiment explained by facts and circumstances—such as the party’s relationship with the donor or prior associations with the property—that give rise to the special affection. * * * Pets have special subjective value to their owners. [Emphasis added.]*

There is no reason for a court of equity to be more wary in resolving competing claims for possession of a pet based on one party’s sincere affection for and attachment to it than in resolving competing claims based on one party’s sincere sentiment for an inanimate object based upon a relationship with the donor. In both types of cases, a court of equity must consider the CASE 21.3 CONTINUED ♦ interests of the parties pressing competing claims for possession and public policies that may be implicated by an award of possession.

* * * *

We conclude that the trial court erred by declining to consider the relevance of the oral agreement alleged on the ground that a pet is property. Agreements about property jointly held by cohabitants are material in actions concerning its division. They may be specifically enforced when that remedy is appropriate.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court reversed the lower court's decision and remanded the case for trial. A dog can have the unique value essential to an award of specific performance for the breach of an oral agreement concerning its ownership.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • In Dare's response to Houseman's complaint, he admitted that he had orally promised her that she could have the dog. Suppose that he had not admitted to this promise. On what principle should a trial court base a finding that one of the parties is more credible on this point?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • What might the award to Houseman of the value of the dog instead of its possession mean to Dare, and what might it indicate to others who could be tempted to breach their agreements?

THE RIGHT OF COVER In certain situations, buyers and lessees can protect themselves by obtaining cover—that is, by buying or leasing substitute goods for those that were due under the contract. This option is available when the seller or lessor repudiates the contract or fails to deliver the goods. (Cover is also available when a buyer or lessee has rightfully rejected goods or revoked acceptance, to be discussed shortly.)

In obtaining cover, the buyer or lessee must act in good faith and without unreasonable delay [UCC 2-712, 2A-518]. After purchasing or leasing substitute goods, the buyer or lessee can recover from the seller or lessor the difference between the cost of cover and the contract price (or lease payments), plus incidental and consequential damages, less the expenses (such as delivery costs) that were saved as a result of the breach [UCC 2-712, 2-715, 2A-518]. Consequential damages are any losses suffered by the buyer or lessee that the seller or lessor had reason to know about at the time of contract formation. Consequential damages can also include any injury to the buyer's or lessee's person or property proximately resulting from the contract's breach [UCC 2-715(2), 2A-520(2)].

Buyers and lessees are not required to cover, and failure to do so will not bar them from using any other remedies available under the UCC. A buyer or lessee who fails to cover, however, risks collecting a lower amount of consequential damages. A court may reduce the consequential damages by the amount of the loss that could have been avoided had the buyer or lessee purchased or leased substitute goods.

THE RIGHT TO REPLEVY GOODS Buyers and lessees also have the right to replevy goods. Replevin⁵ is an action to recover identified goods in the hands of a party who is unlawfully withholding them. At common law, replevin refers to a legal proceeding to recover specific personal property that has been unlawfully taken. Under the UCC, a buyer or lessee can replevy goods identified to the contract if the seller or lessor has repudiated or breached the contract. To maintain an action to replevy goods, buyers and lessees must usually show that they were unable to cover for the goods after making a reasonable effort [UCC 2-716(3), 2A-521(3)].

THE RIGHT TO RECOVER DAMAGES If a seller or lessor repudiates the contract or fails to deliver the goods, the buyer or lessee can sue for damages. The measure of recovery is the difference between the contract price (or lease payments) and the market price of the goods (or lease payments that could be obtained for the goods) at the time the buyer (or lessee) learned of the breach. The market price or market lease payments are determined at the place where the seller or lessor was supposed to deliver the goods. The buyer or lessee can also recover incidental and consequential damages less the expenses that were saved as a result of the breach [UCC 2-713, 2A-519].

Consider an example. Schilling orders ten thousand bushels of wheat from Valdone for $7.00 per bushel, with delivery due on June 14 and payment due on June 20. Valdome does not deliver on June 14. On June 14, the market price of wheat is $7.50 per bushel. Schilling chooses to do without the wheat. He sues Valdome for damages for non-delivery. Schilling can recover $$0.50 \times 10,000$, or $5,000, plus any expenses the breach has caused him. The measure of damages is the market price on the day Schilling was to have received delivery less the contract price. (Any expenses Schilling saved by the breach would be deducted from the damages.)

5. Pronounced ruh-pleh-vun, derived from the Old French word plevir, meaning "to pledge."

When the Seller or Lessor Delivers Nonconforming Goods

When the seller or lessor delivers nonconforming goods, the buyer or lessee has several remedies available under the UCC.

THE RIGHT TO REJECT THE GOODS If either the goods or the tender of the goods by the seller or lessor fails to conform to the contract in any respect, the buyer or lessee can reject all of the goods or any commercial unit of the goods [UCC 2–601, 2A–509]. If the buyer or lessee rejects the goods, she or he may then obtain cover or cancel the contract, and may seek damages just as if the seller or lessor had refused to deliver the goods (see the earlier discussion of these remedies).

CASE IN POINT Jorge Jauregui contracted to buy a new Kawai RX5 piano for $24,282 from Bobb's Piano Sales & Service, Inc. When the piano was delivered with “unacceptable damage,” Jauregui rejected it and filed a lawsuit for breach of contract. The court ruled that Bobb's had breached the contract by delivering nonconforming goods. Jauregui was entitled to damages equal to the contract price with interest, plus the sales tax, delivery charge, and attorneys' fees.⁶

Timeliness and Reason for Rejection Are Required. The buyer or lessee must reject the goods within a reasonable amount of time after delivery or tender of delivery and must seasonably (timely) notify the seller or lessor [UCC 2–602(1), 2A–509(2)]. If the buyer or lessee fails to reject the goods within a reasonable amount of time, acceptance will be presumed. The buyer or lessee must also designate defects that are ascertainable by reasonable inspection. Failure to do so precludes the buyer or lessee from using such defects to justify rejection or to establish breach when the seller or lessor could have cured the defects if they had been disclosed seasonably [UCC 2–605, 2A–514].

Duties of Merchant Buyers and Lessees When Goods Are Rejected. What happens if a merchant buyer or lessee rightfully rejects goods and the seller or lessor has no agent or business at the place of rejection? In that situation, the merchant buyer or lessee has a good faith obligation to follow any reasonable instructions received from the seller or lessor with respect to the goods [UCC 2–603, 2A–511]. The buyer or lessee is entitled to be reimbursed for the care and cost entailed in following the instructions. The same requirements hold if the buyer or lessee rightfully revokes her or his acceptance of the goods at some later time [UCC 2–608(3), 2A–517(5)]. (Revocation of acceptance will be discussed shortly.)

If no instructions are forthcoming and the goods are perishable or threaten to decline in value quickly, the buyer or lessee can resell the goods. The buyer or lessee must exercise good faith and can take appropriate reimbursement and a selling commission (not to exceed 10 percent of the gross proceeds) from the proceeds [UCC 2–603(1), (2); 2A–511(1)]. If the goods are not perishable, the buyer or lessee may store them for the seller or lessor or reship them to the seller or lessor [UCC 2–604, 2A–512].

REVOCATION OF ACCEPTANCE Acceptance of the goods precludes the buyer or lessee from exercising the right of rejection, but it does not necessarily prevent the buyer or lessee from pursuing other remedies. In certain circumstances, a buyer or lessee is permitted to revoke his or her acceptance of the goods.

Acceptance of a lot or a commercial unit can be revoked if the nonconformity substantially impairs the value of the lot or unit and if one of the following factors is present:

1. Acceptance was predicated on the reasonable assumption that the nonconformity would be cured, and it has not been cured within a reasonable period of time [UCC 2–608(1)(a), 2A–517(1)(a)].
2. The buyer or lessee did not discover the nonconformity before acceptance, either because it was difficult to discover before acceptance or because assurances made by the seller or lessor that the goods were conforming kept the buyer or lessee from inspecting the goods [UCC 2–608(1)(b), 2A–517(1)(b)].

6. Jauregui v. Bobb's Piano Sales & Service, Inc., 922 So.2d 303 (Fla. App. 2006).

Revocation of acceptance is not effective until notice is given to the seller or lessor. Notice must occur within a reasonable time after the buyer or lessee either discovers or should have discovered the grounds for revocation. Additionally, revocation must occur before the goods have undergone any substantial change (such as spoilage) not caused by their own defects [UCC 2–608(2), 2A–517(4)]. Once acceptance is revoked, the buyer or lessee can pursue remedies, just as if the goods had been rejected.

THE RIGHT TO RECOVER DAMAGES FOR ACCEPTED GOODS

A buyer or lessee who has accepted nonconforming goods may also keep the goods and recover for any loss “resulting in the ordinary course of events . . . as determined in any manner which is reasonable” [UCC 2–714(1), 2A–519(3)]. To do so, the buyer or lessee must notify the seller or lessor of the breach within a reasonable time after the defect was or should have been discovered. Failure to give notice of the defects (breach) to the seller or lessor bars the buyer or lessee from pursuing any remedy [UCC 2–607(3), 2A–516(3)]. In addition, the parties to a sales or lease contract can insert a provision requiring the buyer or lessee to give notice of any defects in the goods within a prescribed period.

When the goods delivered are not as promised, the measure of damages equals the difference between the value of the goods as accepted and their value if they had been delivered as warranted, unless special circumstances show proximately caused damages of a different amount [UCC 2–714(2), 2A–519(4)]. The buyer or lessee is also entitled to incidental and consequential damages when appropriate [UCC 2–714(3), 2A–519(3)]. The UCC further permits the buyer or lessee, with proper notice to the seller or lessor, to deduct all or any part of the damages from the price or lease payments still due under the contract [UCC 2–717, 2A–516(1)].

CASE IN POINT James Fitl attended a sports-card show in San Francisco, California, where he met Mark Strek, an exhibitor at the show. Fitl bought a 1952 Mickey Mantle Topps baseball card for $17,750 from Strek, who had represented that the card was in near-mint condition. Strek delivered it to Fitl in Nebraska, and Fitl placed it in a safe-deposit box. Two years later, Fitl sent the card to Professional Sports Authenticators (PSA), a sports-card grading service. PSA told Fitl that the card was ungradable because it had been discolored and doctored. Fitl complained to Strek, who refused to refund the purchase price because of the amount of time that had gone by. Fitl then filed a lawsuit, and the court awarded him

$17,750, plus his court costs. Strek appealed. The Nebraska Supreme Court affirmed Fitl’s right to recover damages. The court held that Fitl had reasonably relied on Strek’s representation that the card was “authentic,” which it was not, and that Fitl had given Strek timely notice of the card’s defects when they were discovered.⁷

ADDITIONAL PROVISIONS AFFECTING REMEDIES

The parties to a sales or lease contract can vary their respective rights and obligations by contractual agreement. For example, a seller and buyer can expressly provide for remedies in addition to those provided in the UCC. The parties can also specify remedies in lieu of those provided in the UCC, or they can change the measure of damages. As under the common law of contracts, they may also include clauses in their contracts providing for liquidated damages in the event of a breach or a delay in performance (see Chapter 18 on page 338).

Additionally, a seller can stipulate that the buyer’s only remedy on the seller’s breach will be repair or replacement of the item, or the seller can limit the buyer’s remedy to return of the goods and refund of the purchase price. In sales and lease contracts, an agreed-on remedy is in addition to those provided in the UCC unless the parties expressly agree that the remedy is exclusive of all others [UCC 2–719(1), 2A–503(1), (2)].

Exclusive Remedies

If the parties state that a remedy is exclusive, then it is the sole remedy. For example, Standard Tool Company agrees to sell a pipe-cutting machine to United Pipe & Tubing Corporation. The contract limits United’s remedy exclusively to repair or replacement of any defective parts. Thus, repair or replacement of defective parts is the buyer’s only remedy under this contract.

When circumstances cause an exclusive remedy to fail in its essential purpose, however, it is no longer exclusive, and the buyer or lessee may pursue other remedies available under the UCC

7. Fitl v. Strek, 269 Neb. 51, 690 N.W.2d 605 (2005).

[UCC 2-719(2), 2A-503(2)]. In the example just given, suppose that Standard Tool Company was unable to repair a defective part, and no replacement parts were available. In this situation, because the exclusive remedy failed in its essential purpose, the buyer could pursue other remedies available under the UCC.

Consequential Damages

As discussed earlier in this chapter on page 413, consequential damages are special damages that compensate for indirect losses (such as lost profits) resulting from a breach of contract that were reasonably foreseeable. Under the UCC, parties to a contract can limit or exclude consequential damages, provided the limitation is not unconscionable. When the buyer or lessee is a consumer, any limitation of consequential damages for personal injuries resulting from consumer goods is prima facie (presumptively) unconscionable. The limitation of consequential damages is not necessarily unconscionable when the loss is commercial in nature—for example, lost profits and property damage [UCC 2-719(3), 2A-503(3)].

Lemon Laws

Purchasers of defective automobiles—often referred to as “lemons”—may have remedies in addition to those offered by the UCC. All of the states and the District of Columbia have enacted lemon laws. Basically, lemon laws provide that if an automobile under warranty has a defect that significantly affects the vehicle’s value or use, and the defect is not remedied by the seller within a specified number of opportunities (usually three or four), the buyer is entitled to a new car, replacement of defective parts, or return of all consideration paid.

In most states, lemon laws require an aggrieved new-car owner to notify the dealer or manufacturer of the problem and to provide the dealer or manufacturer with an opportunity to solve it. If the problem remains, the owner must then submit complaints to the arbitration program specified in the manufacturer’s warranty before taking the case to court. Decisions by arbitration panels are binding on the manufacturer—that is, cannot be appealed by the manufacturer to the courts—but usually are not binding on the purchaser. All arbitration boards must meet state and/or federal standards of impartiality, and some states have established mandatory government-sponsored arbitration programs for lemon-law disputes.

SECTION 8 DEALING WITH INTERNATIONAL CONTRACTS

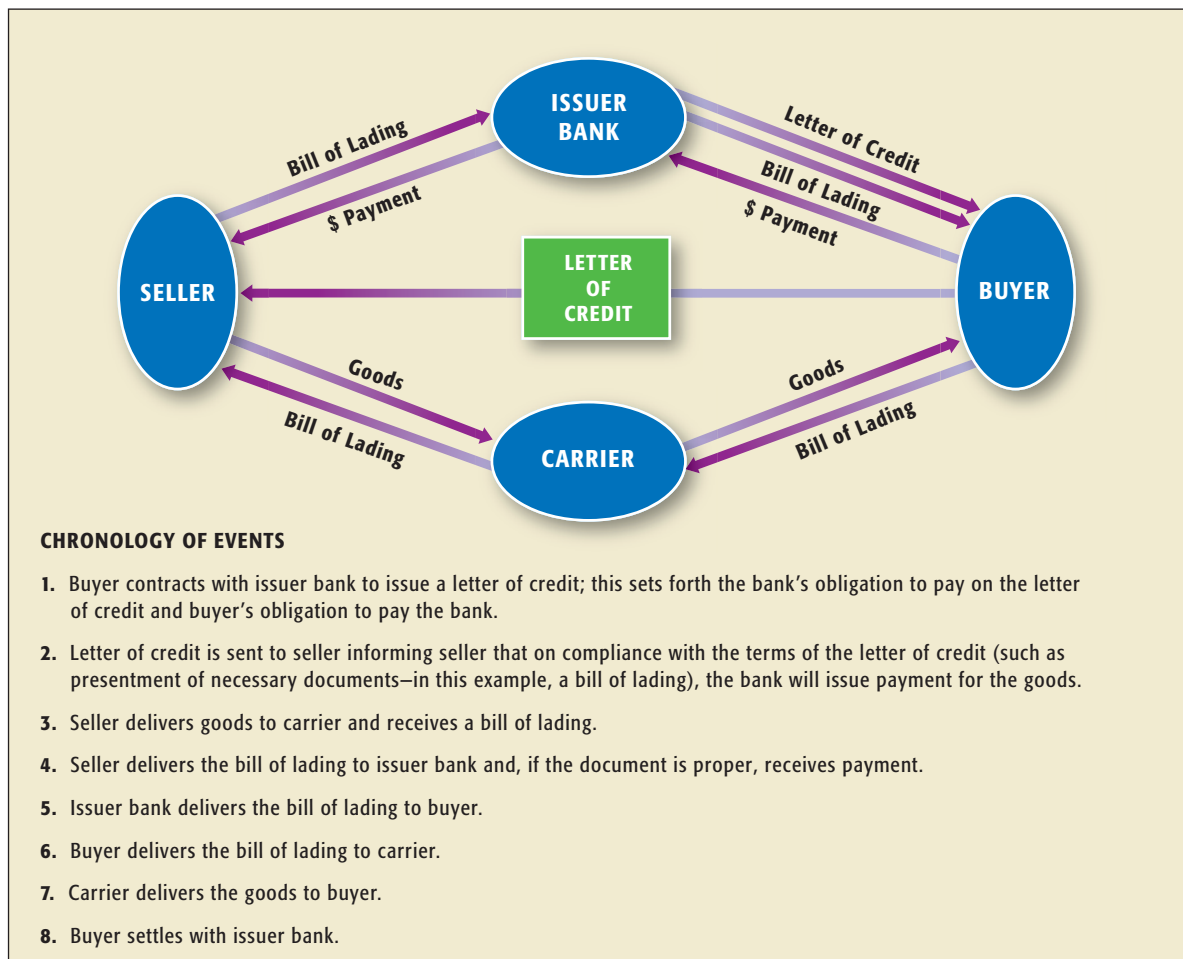

Because buyers and sellers (or lessees and lessors) engaged in international business transactions may be separated by thousands of miles, special precautions are often taken to ensure performance under international contracts. Sellers and lessors want to avoid delivering goods for which they might not be paid. Buyers and lessees desire the assurance that sellers and lessors will not be paid until there is evidence that the goods have been shipped. Thus, letters of credit frequently are used to facilitate international business transactions.

Letter-of-Credit Transactions

In a simple letter-of-credit transaction, the issuer (a bank) agrees to issue a letter of credit and to ascertain whether the beneficiary (seller or lessor) performs certain acts. In return, the account party (buyer or lessee) promises to reimburse the issuer for the amount paid to the beneficiary. The transaction may also involve an advising bank that transmits information and a paying bank that expedites payment under the letter of credit. See Exhibit 21-1 for an illustration of a letter-of-credit transaction.

Under a letter of credit, the issuer is bound to pay the beneficiary (seller or lessor) when the beneficiary has complied with the terms and conditions of the letter of credit. The beneficiary looks to the issuer, not to the account party (buyer or lessee), when it presents the documents required by the letter of credit. Typically, the letter of credit will require that the beneficiary deliver a bill of lading (the carrier’s contract) to prove that shipment has been made. Letters of credit assure beneficiaries (sellers or lessors) of payment while at the same time assuring account parties (buyers or lessees) that payment will not be made until the beneficiaries have complied with the terms and conditions of the letter of credit.

The basic principle behind letters of credit is that payment is made against the documents presented by the beneficiary and not against the facts that the documents purport to reflect. Thus, in a letter-of-credit transaction, the issuer (bank) does not police the underlying contract; the letter of credit is independent of the underlying contract between the buyer and the seller. Eliminating the need for the bank (issuer) to inquire into whether actual conditions have been satisfied greatly reduces the costs of letters of credit.

EXHIBIT 21-1 • A Letter-of-Credit Transaction

Remedies for Breach of International Sales Contracts

The United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG) provides international sellers and buyers with remedies very similar to those available under the UCC. Article 74 of the CISG provides for money damages, including foreseeable consequential damages, on a contract's breach. As under the UCC, the measure of damages normally is the difference between the contract price and the market price of the goods.

Under Article 49, the buyer is permitted to avoid obligations under the contract if the seller breaches the contract or fails to deliver the goods during the time specified in the contract or later agreed on by the parties. Similarly, under Article 64, the seller can avoid obligations under the contract if the buyer breaches the contract, fails to accept delivery of the goods, or fails to pay for the goods.

The CISG also allows for specific performance as a remedy under Article 28, which provides that "one party is entitled to require performance of any obligation by the other party." This statement is then qualified, however. Article 28 goes on to state that a court may grant specific performance as a remedy only if it would do so "under its own law in respect of similar contracts of sale not governed by this Convention." As already discussed, in the United States the equitable remedy of specific performance will normally be granted only if no adequate remedy at law (monetary damages) is available and the goods are unique in nature. In other countries, such as Germany, however, specific performance is a commonly granted remedy for breach of contract.

REVIEWING

Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts

GFI, Inc., a Hong Kong company, makes audio decoder chips, an essential component in the manufacture of MP3 players. Egan Electronics contracts with GFI to buy 10,000 chips on an installment contract, with 2,500 chips to be shipped every three months, F.O.B. Hong Kong, via Air Express. At the time for the first delivery, GFI delivers only 2,400 chips but explains to Egan that although the shipment is less than 5 percent short, the chips are of a higher quality than those specified in the contract and are worth 5 percent more than the contract price. Egan accepts the shipment and pays GFI the contract price. At the time for the second shipment, GFI makes a shipment identical to the first. Egan again accepts and pays for the chips. At the time for the third shipment, GFI ships 2,400 of the same chips, but this time GFI sends them via Hong Kong Air instead of Air Express. While in transit, the chips are destroyed. When it is time for the fourth shipment, GFI again sends 2,400 chips, but this time Egan rejects the chips without explanation. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did GFI have a legitimate reason to expect that Egan would accept the fourth shipment? Why or why not?
2. Did the substitution of carriers in the third shipment constitute a breach of the contract by GFI? Explain.
3. Suppose that the silicon used for the chips becomes unavailable for a period of time. Consequently, GFI cannot manufacture enough chips to fulfill the contract, but does ship as many as it can to Egan. Under what doctrine might a court release GFI from further performance of the contract?
4. Under the UCC, does Egan have a right to reject the fourth shipment? Why or why not?

DEBATE THIS: If a contract specifies a particular carrier, then the shipper must use that carrier or be in breach of the contract—no exceptions should ever be allowed.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

21-1. Remedies of the Seller or Lessor Ames contracts to ship to Curley one hundred Model Z television sets. The terms of delivery are F.O.B. Ames's city, by Green Truck Lines, with delivery on or before April 30. On April 15, Ames discovers that because of an error in inventory control, all Model Z sets have been sold, and the stock has not been replenished. Ames has Model X, a similar but slightly more expensive unit, in stock. On April 16, Ames ships one hundred Model X sets, with notice that Curley will be charged the Model Z price. Curley (in a proper manner) rejects the Model X sets when they are tendered on April 18. Ames does not wish to be held in breach of contract, even though he has tendered nonconforming goods. Discuss Ames's options.

21-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Anticipatory Repudiation.

Topken has contracted to sell Lorwin five hundred washing machines of a certain model at list price. Topken is to ship the goods on or before December 1. Topken produces one thousand washing machines of this model but has not yet prepared Lorwin's shipment. On November 1, Lorwin repudiates the contract. Discuss the remedies available to Topken.

21-3. Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee Lehor collects antique cars. He contracts to purchase spare parts for a 1938 engine from Beem. These parts are not made anymore and are scarce. To obtain the contract with Beem, Lehor agrees to pay 50 percent of the purchase price in advance. Lehor sends the payment on May 1, and Beem receives it on May 2. On May 3, Beem, having found another buyer willing to pay substantially more for the parts, informs Lehor that he will not deliver as contracted. That same day, Lehor learns that Beem is insolvent. Discuss fully any possible remedies available to Lehor to enable him to take possession of these parts.

21-4. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Limitation of Remedies.

Eaton Corp. bought four air-conditioning units from Trane Co., an operating division of American Standard, Inc., in 1998. The contract stated in part, “NEITHER PARTY SHALL BE LIABLE FOR . . . CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES.” Trane was responsible for servicing the units. During the last ten days of March 2003, Trane’s employees serviced and inspected the units, changed the filters and belts, and made a materials list for repairs. On April 3, a fire occurred at Eaton’s facility, extensively damaging the units and the facility, although no one was hurt. Alleging that the fire started in the electric motor of one of the units, and that Trane’s faulty servicing of the units caused the fire, Eaton filed a suit in a federal district court against Trane. Eaton asserted breach of contract, among other claims, and sought consequential damages. Trane filed a motion for summary judgment, based on the limitation-of-remedies clause. What are consequential damages? Can these be limited in some circumstances? Is the clause valid in this case? Explain. [Eaton Corp. v. Trane Carolina Plains, 350 F.Supp.2d 699 (D.S.C. 2004)]

21-5. Remedies of the Buyer L.V.R.V., Inc., sells recreational vehicles (RVs) in Las Vegas, Nevada, as Wheeler’s Las Vegas RV. In September 1997, Wheeler’s sold a Santara RV made by Coachmen Recreational Vehicle Co. to Arthur and Roswitha Waddell. The Waddells hoped to spend two or three years driving around the country, but almost immediately—and repeatedly—they experienced problems with the RV. Its entry door popped open. Its cooling and heating systems did not work properly. Its batteries did not maintain a charge. Most significantly, its engine overheated when ascending a moderate grade. The Waddells took the RV to Wheeler’s service department for repairs. Over the next year and a half, the RV spent more than seven months at Wheeler’s. In March 1999, the Waddells filed a complaint in a Nevada state court against the dealer to revoke their acceptance of the RV. What are the requirements for a buyer’s revocation of acceptance? Were the requirements met in this case? In whose favor should the court rule? Why? [Waddell v. L.V.R.V., Inc., 122 Nev. 15, 125 P.3d 1160 (2006)]

21-6. Additional Provisions Affecting Remedies Nomo Agroindustrial Sa De CV is a farm company based in Mexico that grows tomatoes, cucumbers, and other vegetables to sell in the United States. In the early part of the first decade of the 2000s, Nomo’s tomato plants contracted a disease: tomato spotted wilt virus (TSWV). To obtain a crop that was resistant to TSWV, Nomo contacted Enza Zaden North America, Inc., an international corporation that manufactures seeds. Enza’s brochures advertised—and Enza told Nomo—that its Caiman variety was resistant to TSWV. Based on these assurances, Nomo bought Caiman seeds. The invoice, which Nomo’s representative signed, limited any damages to the purchase price of the seeds. The plants germinated from the Caiman seeds contracted TSWV, which destroyed Nomo’s entire tomato crop. Nomo filed a suit in a federal district court against Enza, seeking to recover for the loss. Enza argued, in part, that any damages were limited to the price of the seeds. Can parties agree to limit their remedies under the Uniform Commercial Code? If so, what are Nomo’s best arguments against the enforcement of the limitations clause in Enza’s invoice? What should the court rule on this issue? Why? [Nomo Agroindustrial Sa De CV v. Enza Zaden North America, Inc., 492 F.Supp.2d 1175 (D.Ariz. 2007)]

21-7. Obligations of the Seller Flint Hills Resources, LP, a refiner of crude oil, agreed to buy “approximately 1,000 barrels per day” of Mexican natural gas condensate from JAG Energy, Inc., an oil broker. Four months into the contract, Pemex, the only authorized seller of freshly extracted Mexican condensate, warned Flint Hills that some companies might be selling stolen Mexican condensate. Fearing potential criminal liability, Flint Hills refused to accept more deliveries from JAG without proof of the title to its product. JAG promised to forward documents showing its chain of title. After several weeks, when JAG did not produce the documents, Flint Hills canceled their agreement. JAG filed a suit in a federal district court against Flint Hills, alleging breach of contract. Did Flint Hills have a right to demand assurance of JAG’s title to its product? If so, did Flint Hills act reasonably in exercising that right? Explain. [Flint Hills Resources LP v. JAG Energy, Inc., 559 F.3d 373 (5th Cir. 2009)]

21-8. Breach and Damages Before Chad DeRosier could build a house on his undeveloped property, he needed to have some fill dirt deposited on the land. Utility Systems of America, Inc., was doing roadwork nearby, and DeRosier asked Utility if it would like to deposit extra fill dirt on his property. Utility said it would, and DeRosier obtained the necessary permit. The permit was for 1,500 cubic yards of fill dirt, the amount that DeRosier needed. DeRosier gave Utility a copy of the permit. Later, DeRosier found 6,500 cubic yards of fill dirt on his land and had to have 5,000 cubic yards of it removed. Utility denied responsibility but said that it would remove the fill dirt for $9,500. DeRosier filed a suit against Utility and hired another company to remove the fill dirt and to do certain foundation work. He paid $46,629 to that contractor. The district court held that Utility had breached its contract and ordered it to pay DeRosier $22,829 in general damages and $8,000 in consequential damages. Utility appealed. In view of the fact that Utility charged nothing for the fill dirt, did a breach of contract occur? If a breach occurred, should the damages be greater than $9,500? Can consequential damages be justified? Discuss. [DeRosier v. Utility Systems of America, Inc., 780 N.W.2d 1 (Minn.App. 2010)]

21-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Revocation.

Scotwood Industries, Inc., sells calcium chloride flake for use in ice melt products. Between July and September 2004, Scotwood delivered thirty-seven shipments of flake to Frank Miller & Sons, Inc. After each delivery, Scotwood billed Miller, which paid thirty-five of the invoices and processed 30 to 50 percent of the flake. In August, Miller began complaining about the product's quality. Scotwood assured Miller that it would remedy the situation. Finally, in October, Miller told Scotwood, "This is totally unacceptable. We are willing to discuss Scotwood picking up the material." Miller claimed that the flake was substantially defective because it was chunked. Calcium chloride maintains its purity for up to five years, but if it is exposed to and absorbs moisture, it chunks and becomes unusable. In response to Scotwood's suit to collect payment on the unpaid invoices, Miller filed a counterclaim in a federal district court for breach of contract, seeking to recover based on revocation of acceptance, among other things. [Scotwood Industries, Inc. v. Frank Miller & Sons, Inc., 435 F.Supp.2d 1160 (D.Kan. 2006)]

- (a) What is revocation of acceptance? How does a buyer effectively exercise this option? Do the facts in this case support this theory as a ground for Miller to recover damages? Why or why not?
- (b) Is there an ethical basis for allowing a buyer to revoke acceptance of goods and recover damages? If so, is there an ethical limit to this right? Discuss.

CHAPTER 22

Warranties and Product Liability

Warranty is an age-old concept. In sales and lease law, a warranty is an assurance or guarantee by the seller or lessor of certain facts concerning the goods being sold or leased. The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) has numerous rules governing product warranties as they occur in sales and lease contracts and specifies several types of warranties, each of which we examine in this chapter.

Because a warranty imposes a duty on the seller or lessor, a breach of warranty is a breach of the seller's or lessor's promise. Assuming that the parties have not agreed to limit or modify the remedies available, if the seller or lessor breaches a warranty, the buyer or lessee can sue to recover damages from the seller or lessor. Under some circumstances, a breach of warranty can allow the buyer or lessee to rescind (cancel) the agreement.

Breach of warranty actions are a subset of product liability claims. Product liability encompasses the contract theory of warranty, as well as the tort theories of negligence, misrepresentation, and strict liability (discussed in Chapters 6 and 7). Manufacturers and sellers of goods can be held liable for products that are defective or unreasonably dangerous. Goods can be defective in a number of ways, including manufacturing defects, design defects, and inadequate warnings. We examine product liability in the second part of the chapter. Because warranty law protects buyers, some of whom are consumers, warranty law is also part of the broad body of consumer protection law that will be discussed in Chapter 45.

TYPES OF WARRANTIES

Most goods are covered by some type of warranty designed to protect buyers. Articles 2 (on sales) and 2A (on leases) of the UCC designate several types of warranties that can arise in a sales or lease contract, including warranties of title, express warranties, and implied warranties. In the following subsections, we discuss these types of warranties as well as a federal statute that is designed to prevent deception and make warranties more understandable.

Warranties of Title

Under the UCC, three types of title warranties—good title, no liens, and no infringements—can automatically arise in sales and lease contracts [UCC 2-312, 2A-211]. Normally, a seller or lessor can disclaim or modify these title warranties only by including specific language in the contract. For example, sellers may assert that they are transferring only such rights, title, and interest as they have in the goods.

GOOD TITLE In most sales, sellers warrant that they have good and valid title to the goods sold and that the transfer of the title is rightful [UCC 2-312(1)(a)]. Suppose that Alexis steals goods from Camden and sells them to Emma, who does not know that they are stolen. If Camden discovers that Emma has the goods, then he has the right to reclaim them from Emma. When Alexis sold Emma the goods, Alexis automatically warranted to Emma that the title conveyed was valid and that its transfer was rightful. Because a thief has no title to stolen goods, Alexis breached the warranty of title imposed by UCC 2-312(1)(a) and became liable to the buyer for appropriate damages. (See pages 386–389 in Chapter 20 for a detailed discussion of sales by nonowners.)

NO LIENS A second warranty of title protects buyers and lessees who are unaware of any encumbrances (claims, charges, or liabilities—usually called *liens*¹) against goods at the time the contract is made [UCC 2-312(1)(b), 2A-211(1)]. This warranty protects buyers who, for example, unknowingly purchase goods that are subject to a creditor’s security interest (a security interest in this context is an interest in the goods that secures payment or performance of an obligation—see Chapter 29). If a creditor legally repossesses the goods from a buyer who had no actual knowledge of the security interest, the buyer can recover from the seller for breach of warranty. (A buyer who has actual knowledge of a security interest has no recourse against a seller.)

Consider an example. Henderson buys a used boat from Loring for cash. A month later, Barish proves that she has a valid security interest in the boat and that Loring, who has missed five payments, is in default. Barish then repossesses the boat from Henderson. Henderson demands his cash back from Loring. Under Section 2-312(1)(b), Henderson has legal grounds to recover from Loring because the seller of goods warrants that the goods are delivered free from any security interest or other lien of which the buyer has no knowledge.

Article 2A affords similar protection for lessees. Section 2A-211(1) provides that during the term of the lease, no claim of any third party will interfere with the lessee’s enjoyment of the leasehold interest.

NO INFRINGEMENTS Finally, when the seller or lessor is a merchant, he or she automatically warrants that the buyer or lessee takes the good free of infringements. In other words, a merchant promises that the goods delivered are free from any copyright, trademark, or patent claims of a third person² [UCC 2-312(3), 2A-211(2)].

If this warranty is breached and the buyer is sued by the party holding copyright, trademark, or patent rights in the goods, the buyer must notify the seller of the litigation within a reasonable time to enable the seller to decide whether to defend the lawsuit. If the seller states in a writing (or record) that she or he has decided to defend and agrees to bear all expenses, then the buyer must turn over control of the litigation to the seller; otherwise, the buyer is barred from any remedy against the seller for liability established by the litigation [UCC 2-607(3)(b), 2-607(5)(b)].

In situations that involve leases rather than sales, Article 2A provides for the same notice of infringement litigation [UCC 2A-516(3)(b), 2A-516(4)(b)]. There is an exception for leases to individual consumers for personal, family, or household purposes. A consumer who fails to notify the lessor within a reasonable time does not lose his or her remedy against the lessor for whatever liability is established in the litigation [UCC 2A-516(3)(b)].

Express Warranties

A seller or lessor can create an express warranty by making representations concerning the quality, condition, description, or performance potential of the goods. Under UCC 2-313 and 2A-210, express warranties arise when a seller or lessor indicates any of the following:

1. That the goods conform to any affirmation (a declaration that something is true) of fact or promise that the seller or lessor makes to the buyer or lessee about the goods. Such affirmations or promises are usually made during the bargaining process. Statements such as “these drill bits will easily penetrate stainless steel—and without dulling” are express warranties.
2. That the goods conform to any description of them. For example, a label that reads “Crate contains one 150-horsepower diesel engine” or a contract that calls for the delivery of a “wool coat” creates an express warranty that the content of the goods sold conforms to the description.
3. That the goods conform to any sample or model of the goods shown to the buyer or lessee.

Express warranties can be found in a seller’s or lessor’s advertisement, brochure, or promotional materials, in addition to being made orally or in an express warranty provision in a sales or lease contract.

BASIS OF THE BARGAIN To create an express warranty, a seller or lessor does not have to use formal words such as warrant or guarantee. It is only necessary that a reasonable buyer or lessee would regard the representation as being part of the basis of the bargain [UCC 2-313(2), 2A-210(2)]. Just what constitutes the basis of the bargain is hard to say. The UCC does not define the concept, and it is a question of fact in each case whether a representation was made

1. Pronounced leens. Liens will be discussed in detail in Chapter 28.

2. Recall from Chapter 19 that a merchant is defined in UCC 2-104(1) as a person who deals in goods of the kind involved in the sales contract or who, by occupation, presents himself or herself as having knowledge or skill peculiar to the goods involved in the transaction.

at such a time and in such a way that it induced the buyer or lessee to enter into the contract. Therefore, if an express warranty is not intended, the marketing agent or salesperson should not promise too much.

STATEMENTS OF OPINION AND VALUE Only statements of fact create express warranties. A seller or lessor who makes a statement that merely relates to the value or worth of the goods, or states an opinion about or recommends the goods, does not create an express warranty [UCC 2–313(2), 2A–210(2)].

Suppose that a seller claims that “this is the best used car to come along in years; it has four new tires and a 250-horsepower engine just rebuilt this year.” The seller has made several affirmations of fact that can create a warranty: The automobile has an engine; it has a 250-horsepower engine; the engine was rebuilt this year; there are four tires on the automobile; and the tires are new.

The seller’s opinion that the vehicle is “the best used car to come along in years,” however, is known as “puffery” and creates no warranty. (Puffery is an expression of opinion by a seller or lessor that is not made as a representation of fact.) A statement relating to the value of the goods, such as “it’s worth a fortune” or “anywhere else you’d pay $10,000 for it,” usually does not create a warranty.

An Exception for Statements of Opinion by Experts. Although normally giving an opinion is not a warranty, if the seller or lessor is an expert and gives an opinion as an expert to a layperson, then a warranty may be created. For example, Stephen is an art dealer and an expert in seventeenth-century paintings. If Stephen states to Lauren, a purchaser, that in his opinion a particular painting is a Rembrandt, Stephen has warranted the accuracy of his opinion.

Puffery versus Express Warranties. It is not always easy to determine whether a statement constitutes an express warranty or puffery. The reasonableness of the buyer’s or lessee’s reliance appears to be the controlling criterion in many cases. For example, a salesperson’s statements that a ladder will “never break” and will “last a lifetime” are so clearly improbable that no reasonable buyer should rely on them. Additionally, the context in which a statement is made may be relevant in determining the reasonableness of a buyer’s or lessee’s reliance. A reasonable person is more likely to rely on a written statement made in an advertisement than on a statement made orally by a salesperson.

CASE IN POINT A tobacco farmer read an advertisement for Chlor-O-Pic, a chemical fumigant, which stated that, if applied as directed, Chlor-O-Pic would give “season-long control with application in fall, winter, or spring” against black shank disease, a fungal disease that destroys tobacco crops. The farmer bought Chlor-O-Pic and applied it as directed to his tobacco crop. Nonetheless, the crop developed black shank disease. The farmer sued the manufacturer of Chlor-O-Pic, arguing that he had purchased the product in reliance on a “strong promise” of “season-long control.” The court found that the manufacturer’s strong promise had created an express warranty and that the farmer was entitled to the value of the damaged crop.³

Implied Warranties

An implied warranty is one that the law derives by inference from the nature of the transaction or the relative situations or circumstances of the parties. Under the UCC, merchants impliedly warrant that the goods they sell or lease are merchantable and, in certain circumstances, fit for a particular purpose. In addition, an implied warranty may arise from a course of dealing or usage of trade. We examine these three types of implied warranties in the following subsections.

IMPLIED WARRANTY OF MERCHANTABILITY Every sale or lease of goods made by a merchant who deals in goods of the kind sold or leased automatically gives rise to an implied warranty of merchantability [UCC 2–314, 2A–212]. Thus, a merchant who is in the business of selling ski equipment makes an implied warranty of merchantability every time he sells a pair of skis. A neighbor selling her skis at a garage sale does not (because she is not in the business of selling goods of this type).

Merchantable Goods. To be merchantable, goods must be “reasonably fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used.” They must be of at least average, fair, or medium-grade quality. The quality must be comparable to quality that will pass without objection in the trade or market for goods of the same description. To be merchantable, the goods must also be adequately packaged and labeled, and they must conform to the promises or affirmations of fact made on the container or label, if any. Of course, merchants are not absolute insurers against all accidents arising in connection with the goods. For example, a bar of soap is not unmerchantable merely because a user could slip and fall by stepping on it.

Knowledge of Defect Not Required. The warranty of merchantability may be breached even though the merchant did not know or could not have discovered that a product was defective (not merchantable). For example, Christine contracts to purchase a log home package from Milde, a log home dealer. The dealer provides the logs and other materials and constructs the home. Immediately after Christine moves into the house, she finds that due to a defective waterproofing product used on the logs, the exterior walls leak when it rains, staining and discoloring the interior walls. Even though Milde did not know that the waterproofing product was defective, he can be held liable because the waterproofing product was not reasonably fit for its ordinary purpose—that is, making the house waterproof.

CASE IN POINT Darrell Shoop bought a Dodge Dakota truck that had been manufactured by DaimlerChrysler Corporation. Almost immediately, he had problems with the truck. During the first eighteen months, the engine, suspension, steering, transmission, and other components required repairs twelve times, including at least five times for the same defect, which remained uncorrected.

Shoop eventually traded in the truck and filed a lawsuit against DaimlerChrysler for breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. The court held that Shoop could maintain an action against DaimlerChrysler and use the fact that the truck had required a significant number of repairs as evidence that it was unmerchantable.⁴

Merchantable Food. The UCC treats the serving of food or drink to be consumed on or off the premises as a sale of goods subject to the implied warranty of merchantability [UCC 2–314(1)]. “Merchantable” food is food that is fit to eat on the basis of consumer expectations. For example, the courts assume that consumers should reasonably expect to find on occasion bones in fish fillets, cherry pits in cherry pie, a nutshell in a package of shelled nuts, and the like—because such substances are natural to the ingredients or the finished food product. In contrast, consumers would not reasonably expect to find an inchworm in a can of peas or a piece of glass in a soft drink—because these substances are not natural to the food product.

In the following classic case, the court had to determine whether one should reasonably expect to find a fish bone in fish chowder.

CASE 22.1

Webster v. Blue Ship Tea Room, Inc.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 347 Mass. 421, 198 N.E.2d 309 (1964).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Blue Ship Tea Room, Inc., was located in Boston in an old building overlooking the ocean. Webster, who had been born and raised in New England, went to the restaurant and ordered fish chowder. The chowder was milky in color. After three or four spoonfuls, she felt something lodged in her throat. As a result, she underwent two esophagoscopies; in the second esophagoscopy, a fish bone was found and removed. Webster filed a suit against the restaurant in a Massachusetts state court for breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. The jury rendered a verdict for Webster, and the restaurant appealed to the state’s highest court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

REARDON, Justice.

[The plaintiff] ordered a cup of fish chowder. Presently, there was set before her “a small bowl of fish chowder.” * * * After 3 or 4 [spoonfuls] she was aware that something had lodged in her throat because she “couldn’t swallow and couldn’t clear her throat by gulping and she could feel it.” This misadventure led to two esophagoscopies [procedures in which a telescope-like instrument is used to look into the throat] at the Massachusetts General Hospital, in the second of which, on April 27, 1959, a fish bone was found and removed. The sequence of events produced injury to the plaintiff which was not insubstantial.

CASE 22.1 CONTINUED ♦ We must decide whether a fish bone lurking in a fish chowder, about the ingredients of which there is no other complaint, constitutes a breach of implied warranty under applicable provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code * * *. As the judge put it in his charge [jury instruction], “Was the fish chowder fit to be eaten and wholesome? * * * Nobody is claiming that the fish itself wasn’t wholesome. * * * But the bone of contention here—I don’t mean that for a pun—but was this fish bone a foreign substance that made the fish chowder unwholesome or not fit to be eaten?”

* * * *

[We think that it] is not too much to say that a person sitting down in New England to consume a good New England fish chowder embarks on a gustatory [taste-related] adventure which may entail the removal of some fish bones from his bowl as he proceeds. We are not inclined to tamper with age-old recipes by any amendment reflecting the plaintiff’s view of the effect of the Uniform Commercial Code upon them. We are aware of the heavy body of case law involving foreign substances in food, but we sense a strong distinction between them and those relative to unwholesomeness of the food itself, [such as] tainted mackerel, and a fish bone in a fish chowder. * * * We consider that the joys of life in New England include the ready availability of fresh fish chowder. We should be prepared to cope with the hazards of fish bones, the occasional presence of which in chowders is, it seems to us, to be anticipated, and which, in the light of a hallowed tradition, do not impair their fitness or merchantability.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts “sympathized with a plaintiff who has suffered a peculiarly New England injury” but entered a judgment for the defendant, Blue Ship Tea Room. A fish bone in fish chowder is not a breach of the implied warranty of merchantability.

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY’S LAW • This classic case, phrased in memorable language, was an early application of the UCC’s implied warranty of merchantability to food products. The case established the rule that consumers should expect to find, on occasion, elements of food products that are natural to the product (such as fish bones in fish chowder). Courts today still apply this rule.

THE E-COMMERCE DIMENSION • If Webster had made the chowder herself from a recipe that she had found on the Internet, could she have successfully brought an action against its author for a breach of the implied warranty of merchantability? Explain.

IMPLIED WARRANTY OF FITNESS FOR A PARTICULAR PURPOSE The implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose arises when any seller or lessor (merchant or nonmerchant) knows the particular purpose for which a buyer or lessee will use the goods and knows that the buyer or lessee is relying on the skill and judgment of the seller or lessor to select suitable goods [UCC 2–315, 2A–213].

Particular versus Ordinary Purpose. A “particular purpose” of the buyer or lessee differs from the “ordinary purpose for which goods are used” (merchantability). Goods can be merchantable but unfit for a particular purpose. For example, you need a gallon of paint to match the color of your living room walls—a light shade somewhere between coral and peach. You take a sample to your local hardware store and request a gallon of paint of that color. Instead, you are given a gallon of bright blue paint. Here, the salesperson has not breached any warranty of implied merchantability—the bright blue paint is of high quality and suitable for interior walls—but she or he has breached an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose.

Knowledge and Reliance Requirements. A seller or lessor need not have actual knowledge of the buyer’s or lessee’s particular purpose. It is sufficient if a seller or lessor “has reason to know” the purpose. For an implied warranty to be created, however, the buyer or lessee must have relied on the skill or judgment of the seller or lessor in selecting or furnishing suitable goods. Moreover, the seller or lessor must have reason to know that the buyer or lessee is relying on her or his judgment or skill.

For example, Bloomberg leases a computer from Future Tech, a lessor of technical business equipment. Bloomberg tells the clerk that she wants a computer that will run a complicated new engineering graphics program at a realistic speed. Future Tech leases

Bloomberg an Architex One computer with a CPU speed of only 2.4 gigahertz, even though a speed of at least 3.8 gigahertz would be required to run Bloomberg's graphics program at a "realistic speed." After discovering that it takes forever to run her program, Bloomberg wants a full refund. Here, because Future Tech has breached the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, Bloomberg normally will be able to recover. The clerk knew specifically that Bloomberg wanted a computer with enough speed to run certain software and was relying on the clerk's judgment. Furthermore, Bloomberg relied on the clerk to furnish a computer that would fulfill this purpose. Because Future Tech did not do so, the warranty was breached.

WARRANTIES IMPLIED FROM PRIOR DEALINGS OR TRADE CUSTOM

Implied warranties can also arise (or be excluded or modified) as a result of course of dealing or usage of trade [UCC 2-314(3), 2A-212(3)]. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, when both parties to a sales or lease contract have knowledge of a well-recognized trade custom, the courts will infer that both parties intended for that custom to apply to their contract. For instance, if the industrywide custom is to lubricate a new car before it is delivered and a dealer fails to do so, the dealer can be held liable to a buyer for damages resulting from the breach of an implied warranty. (This, of course, would also be negligence on the part of the dealer.)

Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act

The Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act of 1975⁵ was designed to prevent deception in warranties by making them easier to understand. The act modifies UCC warranty rules to some extent when consumer transactions are involved. The UCC, however, remains the primary codification of warranty rules for commercial transactions. Under the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act, no seller is required to give a written warranty for consumer goods sold. If a seller chooses to make an express written warranty, however, and the cost of the consumer goods is more than $25, the warranty must be labeled as either "full" or "limited."

A full warranty requires free repair or replacement of any defective part. If the product cannot be repaired within a reasonable time, the consumer has the choice of a refund or a replacement without charge. A full warranty can be for an unlimited or limited time period, such as a "full twelve-month warranty." A limited warranty is one in which the buyer's recourse is limited in some fashion, such as to replacement of an item. The fact that only a limited warranty is being given must be conspicuously stated.

The Magnuson-Moss Act further requires the warrantor to make certain disclosures fully and conspicuously in a single document in "readily understood language." The seller must disclose the name and address of the warrantor, specifically what is warranted, and the procedures for enforcing the warranty. The seller must also clarify that the buyer has legal rights and explain limitations on warranty relief.

See Concept Summary 22.1 on the facing page for a review of the various types of warranties.

SECTION 2 OVERLAPPING WARRANTIES

Sometimes, two or more warranties are made in a single transaction. An implied warranty of merchantability, an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, or both can exist in addition to an express warranty. For example, when a sales contract for a new car states that "this car engine is warranted to be free from defects for 36,000 miles or thirty-six months, whichever occurs first," there is an express warranty against all defects, as well as an implied warranty that the car will be fit for normal use.

When the Warranties Are Consistent

The rule under the UCC is that express and implied warranties are construed as cumulative if they are consistent with one another [UCC 2-317, 2A-215]. Courts will interpret two or more overlapping warranties as being consistent, and thus cumulative, if this interpretation is reasonable. If the warranties are not consistent with one another, then the court looks at the intention of the parties to determine which warranty is dominant.

Conflicting Warranties

If the warranties are inconsistent, the courts usually apply the following rules to interpret which warranty is most important:

1. Express warranties displace inconsistent implied warranties, except implied warranties of fitness for a particular purpose.

5. 15 U.S.C. Sections 2301-2312.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 22.1

Types of Warranties

Concept	Description
Warranties of Title	The UCC provides for the following warranties of title [UCC 2–312, 2A–211]: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Good title—A seller warrants that he or she has the right to pass good and rightful title to the goods. 2. No liens—A seller warrants that the goods sold are free of any encumbrances (claims, charges, or liabilities—usually called liens). A lessor warrants that the lessee will not be disturbed in her or his possession of the goods by the claims of a third party. 3. No infringements—A merchant-seller warrants that the goods are free of infringement claims (claims that a patent, trademark, or copyright has been infringed) by third parties. Lessors make similar warranties.
Express Warranties	An express warranty arises under the UCC when a seller or lessor indicates any of the following as part of the sale or bargain [UCC 2–313, 2A–210]: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. An affirmation of fact or promise. 2. A description of the goods. 3. A sample or model shown as conforming to the contract goods.
Implied Warranty of Merchantability	When a seller or lessor is a merchant who deals in goods of the kind sold or leased, the seller or lessor warrants that the goods sold or leased are properly packaged and labeled, are of proper quality, and are reasonably fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used [UCC 2–314, 2A–212].
Implied Warranty of Fitness for a Particular Purpose	An implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose arises when the buyer's or lessee's purpose or use is known by the seller or lessor, and the buyer or lessee purchases or leases the goods in reliance on the seller's or lessor's selection [UCC 2–315, 2A–213].
Other Implied Warranties	Other implied warranties can arise as a result of course of dealing or usage of trade [UCC 2–314(3), 2A–212(3)].
Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act	An express written warranty covering consumer goods priced at more than $25, if made , must be labeled as either a full warranty or a limited warranty. A full warranty requires free repair or replacement of defective parts and refund or replacement for goods that cannot be repaired in a reasonable time. A limited warranty is one in which the buyer's recourse is limited in some fashion, such as to replacement of an item. Sellers must make certain disclosures to buyers and must state any limitations on a warranty clearly, conspicuously, and in readily understood language.

2. Samples take precedence over inconsistent general descriptions.
3. Exact or technical specifications displace inconsistent samples or general descriptions.

For example, Innova, Ltd., leases a computer from Vernon Computer Source. The contract contains an express warranty concerning the speed of the CPU and the application programs that the computer is capable of running. Innova does not realize that the speed expressly warranted in the contract is insufficient for its needs until it tries to run the software and the computer slows to a crawl. Innova files an action claiming that Vernon has breached the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose because Innova made it clear that it was leasing the computer to perform certain tasks. In this situation, Innova normally will prevail. Although the express warranty on CPU speed takes precedence over the implied warranty of merchantability, it normally does not take precedence over an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose.

WARRANTY DISCLAIMERS AND LIMITATIONS ON LIABILITY

The UCC generally permits warranties to be disclaimed or limited by specific and unambiguous language, provided that this is done in a manner that protects the buyer or lessee from surprise. Because each type of warranty is created in a different way, the manner in which a seller or lessor can disclaim warranties varies with the type of warranty.

Express Warranties

A seller or lessor can disclaim all oral express warranties by including in the contract a written (or an electronically recorded) disclaimer in language that is clear and conspicuous, and called to a buyer's or lessee's attention [UCC 2-316(1), 2A-214(1)]. This allows the seller or lessor to avoid false allegations that oral warranties were made, and it ensures that only representations made by properly authorized individuals are included in the bargain.

Note, however, that a buyer or lessee must be made aware of any warranty disclaimers or modifications at the time the contract is formed. In other words, any oral or written warranties—or disclaimers—made during the bargaining process cannot be modified at a later time by the seller or lessor without the consent of the buyer or lessee.

Implied Warranties

Generally, unless circumstances indicate otherwise, the implied warranties of merchantability and fitness are disclaimed by an expression such as “as is” or “with all faults.” The phrase must be one that in common understanding for both parties calls the buyer's or lessee's attention to the fact that there are no implied warranties [UCC 2-316(3)(a), 2A-214(3)(a)]. (Note, however, that some states have passed consumer protection statutes that forbid “as is” sales or make it illegal to disclaim warranties of merchantability on consumer goods.)

CASE IN POINT Mandy Morningstar advertised a “lovely, eleven-year-old mare” with extensive jumping ability for sale. After examining the horse twice, Sue Hallett contracted to buy the horse. She signed a contract that described the horse as an eleven-year-old mare and as being sold “as is.” Shortly after the purchase, a veterinarian determined that the horse was actually sixteen years old and in no condition for jumping. Hallett stopped payment, and Morningstar filed a lawsuit for breach of contract. The court held that the statement in the contract describing the horse as eleven years old constituted an express warranty, which Morningstar had breached. Although the “as is” clause effectively disclaimed any implied warranties (of merchantability and fitness for a particular purpose, such as jumping), the court ruled that it did not disclaim the express warranty concerning the horse's age.⁶

DISCLAIMER OF THE IMPLIED WARRANTY OF MERCHANTABILITY To specifically disclaim an implied warranty either of merchantability or of fitness, a seller or lessor must mention the word merchantability. The disclaimer need not be written, but if it is, the writing (or record) must be conspicuous [UCC 2-316(2), 2A-214(4)]. Under the UCC, a term or clause is conspicuous when it is written or displayed in such a way that a reasonable person would notice it. Conspicuous terms include words set in capital letters, in a larger font size, or in a different color so as to be set off from the surrounding text.

DISCLAIMER OF THE IMPLIED WARRANTY OF FITNESS To disclaim an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, the disclaimer must be in a writing (or record) and must be conspicuous. The writing does not have to mention the word fitness; it is sufficient if, for example, the disclaimer states, “There are no warranties that extend beyond the description on the face hereof.”

Buyer's or Lessee's Examination or Refusal to Inspect

If a buyer or lessee actually examines the goods (or a sample or model) as fully as desired before entering into a contract, or refuses to examine the goods on the seller's or lessor's request that he or she do so, there is no implied warranty with respect to defects that a reasonable examination would reveal or defects that are found on examination [UCC 2-316(3)(b), 2A-214(2)(b)].

Assume that Joplin buys a lamp at Gershwin's Home Store. No express warranties are made. Gershwin asks Joplin to inspect the lamp before buying it, but she refuses. Had Joplin inspected the lamp, she would have noticed that the base was obviously cracked and the electrical cord was pulled loose. If the lamp later cracks or starts a fire in Joplin's home and causes damage, she normally will not be able to hold Gershwin's liable for breach of the warranty of merchantability. Because she refused to examine the lamp as Gershwin requested, Joplin will be deemed to have assumed the risk that it was defective.

Warranty Disclaimers and Unconscionability

The UCC sections dealing with warranty disclaimers do not refer specifically to unconscionability as a factor. Ultimately, however, the courts will test warranty disclaimers with reference to the UCC's unconscionability standards [UCC 2-302, 2A-108]. Such things as lack of bargaining position, “take-it-or-leave-it” choices, and a buyer's or lessee's failure to understand or know of a warranty disclaimer will be relevant to the issue of unconscionability.

Statutes of Limitations

A cause of action for breach of contract under the UCC must be commenced within four years after the cause of action accrues—that is, within four years after the breach occurs. The parties can reduce this period to not less than one year in their original agreement, but they cannot extend it beyond four years [UCC 2-725(1), 2A-506(1)]. An action for breach of warranty accrues when the seller or lessor tenders delivery, even if the buyer or lessee is unaware of the breach at that time [UCC 2-725(2), 2A-506(2)]. In addition, the nonbreaching party usually must notify the breaching party within a reasonable time after discovering the breach or be barred from pursuing any remedy [UCC 2-607(3)(a), 2A-516(3)].

circumstances. If a manufacturer fails to exercise “due care” to make a product safe, a person who is injured by the product may sue the manufacturer for negligence.

DUE CARE MUST BE EXERCISED Due care must be exercised in designing the product, selecting the materials, using the appropriate production process, assembling and testing the product, and placing adequate warnings on the label informing the user of dangers of which an ordinary person might not be aware. The duty of care also extends to the inspection and testing of any purchased components that are used in the product sold by the manufacturer.

PRIVITY OF CONTRACT NOT REQUIRED A product liability action based on negligence does not require the injured plaintiff and the negligent defendant-manufacturer to be in privity of contract (see Chapter 16 on page 304). In other words, the plaintiff and the defendant need not be directly involved in a contractual relationship with one another. Thus, any person who is injured by a product may bring a negligence suit even though he or she was not the one who actually purchased the product. A manufacturer, seller, or lessor is liable for failure to exercise due care to any person who sustains an injury proximately caused by a negligently made (defective) product. Relative to the long history of the common law, this exception to the privity requirement is a fairly recent development—it dates to the early part of the twentieth century.⁷

SECTION 4 PRODUCT LIABILITY

Those who make, sell, or lease goods can be held liable for physical harm or property damage caused by those goods to a consumer, user, or bystander. This is called product liability. Product liability may be based on the warranty theories just discussed, as well as on the theories of negligence, misrepresentation, and strict liability. Note that multiple theories of liability can be, and often are, asserted in the same case. We look here at product liability based on negligence and on misrepresentation.

Product Liability Based on Negligence

In Chapter 7, negligence was defined as the failure to exercise the degree of care that a reasonable, prudent person would have exercised under the

Product Liability Based on Misrepresentation

When a user or consumer is injured as a result of a manufacturer's or seller's fraudulent misrepresentation, the basis of liability may be the tort of fraud. In this situation, the misrepresentation must have been made knowingly or with reckless disregard for the facts. The intentional mislabeling of packaged cosmetics, for instance, or the intentional concealment of a product's defects would constitute fraudulent misrepresentation. The misrepresentation must be of a material fact, and the seller must have intended to induce the buyer's reliance on the misrepresentation. Misrepresentation on a label or advertisement is enough to show an intent to induce the reliance of anyone who may use the product. In addition, the buyer must have relied on the misrepresentation.

7. A landmark case in this respect is MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co., 217 N.Y. 382, 111 N.E. 1050 (1916).

STRICT PRODUCT LIABILITY

Under the doctrine of strict liability (discussed in Chapter 7), people may be liable for the results of their acts regardless of their intentions or their exercise of reasonable care. In addition, liability does not depend on privity of contract. The injured party does not have to be the buyer or a third party beneficiary (see Chapter 16), as required under contract warranty theory. In the 1960s, courts applied the doctrine of strict liability in several landmark cases involving manufactured goods, and it has since become a common method of holding manufacturers liable.

Strict Product Liability and Public Policy

The law imposes strict product liability as a matter of public policy. This public policy rests on the threefold assumption that (1) consumers should be protected against unsafe products; (2) manufacturers and distributors should not escape liability for faulty products simply because they are not in privity of contract with the ultimate user of those products; and (3) manufacturers, sellers, and lessors of products are in a better position to bear the costs associated with injuries caused by their products—costs that they can ultimately pass on to all consumers in the form of higher prices.

California was the first state to impose strict product liability in tort on manufacturers. In a landmark decision, Greenman v. Yuba Power Products, Inc.,⁸ the California Supreme Court set out the reason for applying tort law rather than contract law (including laws governing warranties) in cases involving consumers who were injured by defective products. According to the Greenman court, the “purpose of such liability is to [e]nsure that the costs of injuries resulting from defective products are borne by the manufacturers . . . rather than by the injured persons who are powerless to protect themselves.” Today, the majority of states recognize strict product liability, although some state courts limit its application to situations involving personal injuries (rather than property damage).

The Requirements for Strict Product Liability

The courts often look to the Restatements of the Law for guidance, even though the Restatements are not binding authorities. Section 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts, which was originally issued in 1964, has become a widely accepted statement of how the doctrine of strict liability should be applied to sellers of goods (including manufacturers, processors, assemblers, packagers, bottlers, wholesalers, distributors, retailers, and lessors).

The bases for an action in strict liability that are set forth in Section 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts can be summarized as a series of six requirements, which is listed here. Depending on the jurisdiction, if these requirements are met, a manufacturer’s liability to an injured party can be almost unlimited.

1. The product must be in a defective condition when the defendant sells it.
2. The defendant must normally be engaged in the business of selling (or otherwise distributing) that product.
3. The product must be unreasonably dangerous to the user or consumer because of its defective condition (in most states).
4. The plaintiff must incur physical harm to self or property by use or consumption of the product.
5. The defective condition must be the proximate cause of the injury or damage.
6. The goods must not have been substantially changed from the time the product was sold to the time the injury was sustained.

PROVING A DEFECTIVE CONDITION Under these requirements, in any action against a manufacturer, seller, or lessor, the plaintiff need not show why or in what manner the product became defective. The plaintiff does, however, have to prove that the product was defective at the time it left the hands of the seller or lessor and that this defective condition made it “unreasonably dangerous” to the user or consumer. Unless evidence can be presented to support the conclusion that the product was defective when it was sold or leased, the plaintiff will not succeed. If the product was delivered in a safe condition and subsequent mishandling made it harmful to the user, the seller or lessor normally is not strictly liable.

UNREASONABLY DANGEROUS PRODUCTS The Restatement recognizes that many products cannot be made entirely safe for all uses; thus, sellers or lessors are liable only for products that are unreasonably dangerous. A court could consider a product so defective as to be an unreasonably dangerous product in either of the following situations:

8. 59 Cal.2d 57, 377 P.2d 897, 27 Cal.Rptr. 697 (1962).

1. The product was dangerous beyond the expectation of the ordinary consumer.
2. A less dangerous alternative was economically feasible for the manufacturer, but the manufacturer failed to produce it.

As will be discussed next, a product may be unreasonably dangerous due to a flaw in the manufacturing process, a design defect, or an inadequate warning.

Product Defects

Because Section 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts did not clearly define such terms as defective and unreasonably dangerous, these terms have been subject to different interpretations by different courts. In 1997, to address these concerns, the American Law Institute issued the Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability. This Restatement defines the three types of product defects that have traditionally been recognized in product liability law—manufacturing defects, design defects, and inadequate warnings.

MANUFACTURING DEFECTS According to Section 2(a) of the Restatement (Third) of Torts, a product “contains a manufacturing defect when the product departs from its intended design even though all possible care was exercised in the preparation and marketing of the product.” Basically, a manufacturing defect is a departure from a product’s design specifications that results in products that are physically flawed, damaged, or incorrectly assembled. A glass bottle that is made too thin and explodes in a consumer’s face is an example of a product with a manufacturing defect.

Usually, such defects occur when a manufacturer fails to assemble, test, or adequately check the quality of a product. Liability is imposed on the manufacturer (and on the wholesaler and retailer) regardless of whether the manufacturer’s quality control efforts were “reasonable.” The idea behind holding defendants strictly liable for manufacturing defects is to encourage greater investment in product safety and stringent quality control standards. Cases involving allegations of a manufacturing defect are often decided based on the opinions and testimony of experts.

CASE IN POINT While Kevin Schmude was standing on an eight-foot ladder that he had purchased, it collapsed and he was seriously injured. He filed a lawsuit against the ladder’s maker, Tricam Industries, Inc., based on a manufacturing defect. Experts testified that the preexisting holes in the ladder’s top cap did not properly line up with the holes in the rear right rail and backing plate. As a result of the misalignment, the rivet at the rear legs of the ladder was more likely to fail. A jury concluded that this manufacturing defect made the ladder unreasonably dangerous and awarded Schmude more than $677,000 in damages.⁹

DESIGN DEFECTS Unlike a product with a manufacturing defect, a product with a design defect is made in conformity with the manufacturer’s design specifications but nevertheless results in injury to the user because the design itself was faulty. A product “is defective in design when the foreseeable risks of harm posed by the product could have been reduced or avoided by the adoption of a reasonable alternative design by the seller or other distributor, or a predecessor in the commercial chain of distribution, and the omission of the alternative design renders the product not reasonably safe.”¹⁰

For example, after a massive recall of Toyota vehicles in 2009 due to problems with purportedly unintended acceleration, owners of recalled cars filed numerous product liability lawsuits against Toyota. Some of these lawsuits claimed that the Japanese automaker negligently manufactured the cars or made fraudulent misrepresentations concerning the electronic throttle control system used in the cars. In 2010, Toyota admitted that there was in fact a design defect that caused some Prius models to have brake problems.

Test for Design Defects. To successfully assert a design defect, a plaintiff has to show that a reasonable alternative design was available and that the defendant’s failure to adopt the alternative design rendered the product not reasonably safe. In other words, a manufacturer or other defendant is liable only when the harm was reasonably preventable.

Factors to Be Considered. According to the Restatement, a court can consider a broad range of factors, including the magnitude and probability of the foreseeable risks as well as the relative advantages and disadvantages of the product as it was designed and as it could have been designed. Basically, most courts engage in a risk-utility analysis, determining whether the risk of harm from the product as designed outweighs its utility to the user and to the public.

9. Schmude v. Tricam Industries, Inc., 550 F.Supp.2d 846 (E.D.Wis. 2008).

10. Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability, Section 2(b).

CASE IN POINT Jodie Bullock smoked cigarettes manufactured by Philip Morris for forty-five years. When she was diagnosed with lung cancer, Bullock brought a product liability suit against Philip Morris. She presented evidence that by the late 1950s, scientists had proved that smoking caused lung cancer. Nonetheless, Philip Morris had issued full-page announcements stating that there was no proof that smoking caused cancer and that “numerous scientists” questioned “the validity of the statistics.” At trial, the judge instructed the jury to consider the gravity of the danger posed by the design, as well as the likelihood that the danger would cause injury. The jury found that there was a defect in the design of the cigarettes and that they had been negligently designed. It awarded Bullock $850,000 in compensatory damages and $28 million in punitive damages. Philip Morris appealed, claiming that no evidence had been offered to show that there was a safer design for cigarettes, but the reviewing court found that the jury had been properly instructed. The court affirmed the award but remanded the case for a reconsideration of the proper amount of punitive damages.¹¹

INADEQUATE WARNINGS A product may also be deemed defective because of inadequate instructions or warnings. A product will be considered defective “when the foreseeable risks of harm posed by the product could have been reduced or avoided by the provision of reasonable instructions or warnings by the seller or other distributor, or a predecessor in the commercial chain of distribution, and the omission of the instructions or warnings renders the product not reasonably safe.”¹²

Important factors for a court to consider include the risks of a product, the “content and comprehensibility” and “intensity of expression” of warnings and instructions, and the “characteristics of expected user groups.”¹³ Courts apply a “reasonableness” test to determine if the warnings adequately alert consumers to the product’s risks. For example, children will likely respond readily to bright, bold, simple warning labels, whereas educated adults might need more detailed information.

An action alleging that a product is defective due to an inadequate label can be based on state law. (For a discussion of a case involving a state law that required warning labels on violent video games, see this chapter’s Insight into Ethics feature on page 434.) Can a state-law claim still be asserted if a federal agency approved the label? That was the question in the following case.

Wyeth v. Levine

Supreme Court of the United States, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 1187, 173 L.Ed.2d 51 (2009).
www.findlaw.com/casecode/supreme.html^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Diane Levine, a professional guitar player and pianist, visited Plainfield Health Center in Vermont for treatment of a migraine headache. A physician’s assistant gave her Phenergan (an antihistamine used to treat nausea) with a syringe—the intravenous-push (IV-push) method. The drug’s label, which the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) had approved, did not warn that this method was more risky than the IV-drip method. Phenergan entered Levine’s artery and, because the drug is corrosive, led to gangrene and the amputation of her forearm. She filed a suit in a Vermont state court against Wyeth, the drug’s manufacturer, alleging that the label’s warning was inadequate. Levine was awarded damages of $7.4 million. The Vermont Supreme Court affirmed the result. Wyeth appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

Wyeth first argues that Levine’s state-law claims are pre-empted because it is impossible for it to comply with both the state-law duties underlying those claims

CASE 22.2 CONTINUED ♦ and its federal labeling duties. * * * Generally speaking, a manufacturer may only change a drug label after the FDA approves a supplemental application. There is, however, an FDA regulation that permits a manufacturer to make certain changes to its label before receiving the agency's approval. Among other things, this * * * regulation provides that if a manufacturer is changing a label to "add or strengthen a contraindication, warning, precaution, or adverse reaction" * * *, it may make the labeling change upon filing its supplemental application with the FDA; it need not wait for FDA approval.

* * * *

* * * *The * * * regulation permitted Wyeth to unilaterally strengthen its warning, and the mere fact that the FDA approved Phenergan's label does not establish that it would have prohibited such a change.* [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Wyeth also argues that requiring it to comply with a state-law duty to provide a stronger warning about IV-push administration would obstruct the purposes and objectives of federal drug labeling regulation.

* * * The most glaring problem with this argument is that all evidence of Congress' purposes is to the contrary. Building on its 1906 Act, Congress enacted the [Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act (FDCA) in 1938] to bolster consumer protection against harmful products. Congress did not provide a federal remedy for consumers harmed by unsafe or ineffective drugs in the 1938 statute or in any subsequent amendment. Evidently, it determined that widely available state rights of action provided appropriate relief for injured consumers. It may also have recognized that state-law remedies further consumer protection by motivating manufacturers to produce safe and effective drugs and to give adequate warnings.

If Congress thought state-law suits posed an obstacle to its objectives, it surely would have enacted an express pre-emption provision at some point during the FDCA's 70-year history. * * * Its silence on the issue, coupled with its certain awareness of the prevalence of state tort litigation, is powerful evidence that Congress did not intend FDA oversight to be the exclusive means of ensuring drug safety and effectiveness.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The United States Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's decision. The FDA's approval of Phenergan's label did not preempt Levine's claim against the drug's manufacturer.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the Phenergan label had contained a stronger warning against the IV-push method without explicitly stating that the method should not be used. Would the result in Levine's case have been the same? Discuss.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • In a 2006 preamble to a regulation, for the first time the FDA expressed the opinion that state-law actions "threaten [the] FDA's statutorily prescribed role as the expert Federal agency responsible for evaluating and regulating drugs." What might have motivated this dramatic change in the agency's traditional position?

Obvious Risks. There is no duty to warn about risks that are obvious or commonly known. Warnings about such risks do not add to the safety of a product and could even detract from it by making other warnings seem less significant. As will be discussed later in the chapter, the obviousness of a risk and a user's decision to proceed in the face of that risk may be a defense in a product liability suit based on an inadequate warning.

CASE IN POINT Sixteen-year-old Gary Crosswhite attempted to do a back flip on a trampoline in his backyard and accidentally landed on his head and neck. The fall fractured his spine and resulted in paraplegia. Crosswhite filed a strict product liability lawsuit against the manufacturer, in which he claimed that the trampoline was defective because of inadequate warnings and instructions. The court found that there were nine warning labels affixed to the trampoline, an instruction manual with safety warnings, and a placard attached to the entrance that advised users not to do flips. These warnings were sufficient to make the risks obvious and insulate the manufacturer from liability for Crosswhite's injuries.¹⁴

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

Warning Labels for Video Games

The video game industry uses a voluntary rating system that includes six age-specific labels. Should video game makers also be required to attach labels to their games that warn parents of excessive violence? When California legislated this requirement, video software dealers sued.

The act defined a violent video game as one in which “the range of options available to a player includes killing, maiming, dismembering, or sexually assaulting an image of a human being.” While agreeing that some video games are unquestionably violent by everyday standards, the trial court pointed out, as did the federal court that heard the appeal, that many video games are based on popular novels or motion pictures and have complex plot lines. Accordingly, the court found that the definition of a violent video game was unconstitutionally vague and thus violated the First Amendment’s guarantee of freedom of speech. The court also noted the existence of the voluntary rating system.

The state appealed, but the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit also found that the statute’s definition of a violent video game was unconstitutionally broad.^a The appeals court noted that other federal circuit courts had already ruled against extending restrictions on sex-based content to restrictions on violence in video games.^b

INSIGHT INTO THE SOCIAL ENVIRONMENT

Why would some legislators believe that the six-part voluntary labeling system for video games is not sufficient to protect minors?

a. Video Software Dealers Association v. Schwarzenegger, 556 F.3d 950 (9th Cir. 2009).

b. See, for example, Interactive Digital Software Association v. St. Louis County, 329 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 2003).

Nevertheless, risks that may seem obvious to some users will not be obvious to all users, especially when the users are likely to be children. A young child may not be able to read or understand warning labels or comprehend the risk of certain activities. Therefore, if a child is permanently injured by diving into a shallow, aboveground pool, the manufacturer cannot escape liability simply by having a warning label on the box in which the pool was shipped. To avoid liability, the manufacturer would have to prove that the warnings it provided were adequate to make the risk of injury obvious to a young child using the pool.¹⁵

Foreseeable Misuses. Generally, a seller must warn those who purchase its product of the harm that can result from the foreseeable misuse of the product as well. The key is the foreseeability of the misuse. Sellers are not required to take precautions against every conceivable misuse of a product, just those that are foreseeable.

Market-Share Liability

Ordinarily, in all product liability claims, a plaintiff must prove that the defective product that caused his or her injury was the product of a specific defendant. In a few situations, however, courts have dropped this requirement when plaintiffs could not prove which of many distributors of a harmful product supplied the particular product that caused the injuries.

CASE IN POINT John Smith, a resident of Hawaii, was a hemophiliac. Because of his condition, Smith received injections of a blood protein known as anti-hemophiliac factor (AHF) concentrate. Smith later tested positive for the acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) virus. Because it was not known which manufacturer was responsible for the particular AHF received by Smith, the court held that all of the manufacturers of AHF could be held liable under the theory of market-share liability.¹⁶

Courts in many jurisdictions do not recognize this theory of liability because they believe that it deviates too significantly from traditional legal principles.¹⁷ In jurisdictions that do recognize market-share liability, 15. See, for example, Bunch v. Hoffinger Industries, Inc., 123 Cal. App.4th 1278, 20 Cal.Rptr.3d 780 (2004).

16. Smith v. Cutter Biological, Inc., 72 Haw. 416, 823 P.2d 717 (1991). See also Sutowski v. Eli Lilly & Co., 82 Ohio St.3d 347, 696 N.E.2d 187 (1998); and In re Methyl Tertiary Butyl Ether (“MTBE”) Products Liability Litigation, 447 F.Supp.2d 289 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).

17. For the Illinois Supreme Court’s position on market-share liability, see Smith v. Eli Lilly & Co., 137 Ill.2d 222, 560 N.E.2d 324 (1990). Pennsylvania law also does not recognize market-share liability. See Bortell v. Eli Lilly & Co., 406 F.Supp.2d 1 (D.D.C. 2005).

it is usually applied in cases involving drugs or chemicals, when it is difficult or impossible to determine which company made a particular product.

Other Applications of Strict Product Liability

Almost all courts extend the strict liability of manufacturers and other sellers to injured bystanders. Thus, if a defective forklift that will not go into reverse injures a passerby, that individual can sue the manufacturer for product liability (and possibly bring a negligence action against the forklift operator as well).

Strict product liability also applies to suppliers of component parts. For example, suppose that General Motors buys brake pads from a subcontractor and puts them in Chevrolets without changing their composition. If those pads are defective, both the supplier of the brake pads and General Motors will be held strictly liable for the injuries caused by the defects.

DEFENSES TO PRODUCT LIABILITY

Defendants in product liability suits can raise a number of defenses. One defense, of course, is to show that there is no basis for the plaintiff's claim. For example, in a product liability case based on negligence, if a defendant can show that the plaintiff has not met the requirements (such as causation) for an action in negligence, generally the defendant will not be liable. Similarly, in a case involving strict product liability, a defendant can claim that the plaintiff failed to meet one of the requirements. For example, if the defendant establishes that the goods were altered after they were sold, normally the defendant will not be held liable.¹⁸ Defendants may also assert the defenses discussed next.

Assumption of Risk

Assumption of risk can sometimes be used as a defense in a product liability action. To establish such a defense, the defendant must show that (1) the plaintiff knew and appreciated the risk created by the product defect and (2) the plaintiff voluntarily assumed the risk, even though it was unreasonable to do so. For example, if a buyer failed to heed a seller's product recall, the buyer may be deemed to have assumed the risk of the product defect that the seller offered to cure. (See Chapter 7 for a more detailed discussion of assumption of risk.)

In the following case, an injured user of a tanning booth had signed an exculpatory clause stating that she was using the booth at her own risk and that she released the manufacturer, among others, from any liability for any injuries. The issue before the court was whether an exculpatory clause can relieve a manufacturer from strict product liability.

18. See, for example, Edmondson v. Macclesfield L-P Gas Co., 642 S.E.2d 265 (N.C.App. 2007); and Pichardo v. C. S. Brown Co., 35 A.D.3d 303, 827 N.Y.S.2d 131 (N.Y.App. 2006).

Boles v. Sun Ergoline, Inc.

Supreme Court of Colorado, 223 P.3d 724 (2010).

Justice COATS delivered the opinion of the court.

* * * *

Savannah Boles brought suit against Sun Ergoline, Inc., asserting a strict products liability claim for personal injury. Sun Ergoline moved for summary judgment, countering that Boles's claim was barred by a release she signed prior to using its product. The trial court agreed and granted Sun Ergoline's motion on the basis of the following undisputed facts.

Executive Tans operated an upright tanning booth manufactured by Sun Ergoline. Prior to using the booth, Boles signed a release form provided by Executive Tans that contained the following exculpatory agreement: "I have read the instructions for proper use of the tanning facilities and do so at my own risk and hereby release the owners, operators, franchiser, or manufacturers, from any damage or harm that I might incur due to use of the facilities." the booth, several of Boles's fingers came in contact with an exhaust fan located at the top of the booth, partially amputating them.

On direct appeal, the court of appeals affirmed. * * * [It found] that the language of the release was broad enough to include any damage or harm that might occur due to Boles's use of the facilities [and] * * * found no violation of public policy.

We granted Boles's petition for a writ of certiorari [a request by the losing party asking the higher court to hear the case] challenging the court of appeals' determination that the exculpatory agreement barred her strict products liability claim.

* * * *

"Strict products liability" has been described as a "term of art that reflects the judgment that products liability is a discrete area of tort law which borrows from both negligence and warranty" but "is not fully congruent with classical tort or contract law." Rather than resting on negligence principles, it "is premised on the concept of enterprise liability for casting a defective product into the stream of commerce." In strict products liability, the focus is on the nature of the product rather than the conduct of either the manufacturer or the person injured. [Emphasis added.]

As such, strict products liability evolved to accommodate, and is driven by, public policy considerations surrounding the relationship between manufacturers and consumers in general, rather than any particular transaction or contract for sale. In addition to the typical inaccessibility of information and inequality of bargaining power inherent in any disclaimer or ordinary consumer's agreement to release a manufacturer, a claim for strict products liability is also premised on a number of public policy considerations that would be flatly thwarted [prevented] by legitimizing such disclaimers or exculpatory agreements. Not least among these is the deliberate provision of economic incentives for manufacturers to improve product safety and take advantage of their unique "position to spread the risk of loss among all who use the product."

* * * The Second Restatement of Torts clearly indicates that exculpatory agreements between a manufacturer and an end-user can have no effect. * * * The Third Restatement would even more emphatically prohibit "contractual exculpations" from barring or reducing otherwise valid products liability claims for personal injuries by ordinary consumers against sellers or distributors of new products.

There appears to be virtually universal agreement on this point among the other jurisdictions considering the question.

* * * An agreement releasing a manufacturer from strict products liability for personal injury, in exchange for nothing more than an individual consumer's right to have or use the product, necessarily violates the public policy of this jurisdiction and is void.

* * * *

Because the lower courts erred * * * in finding the exculpatory agreement in this case enforceable, the judgment of the court of appeals is reversed with directions to remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

QUESTIONS

1. What did the court mean when it stated that strict product liability laws are "not fully congruent" with classical tort law?
2. Why would the enforcement of the exculpatory clause in this case conflict with the rationale underlying strict product liability?

Product Misuse

Similar to the defense of voluntary assumption of risk is that of product misuse, which occurs when a product is used for a purpose for which it was not intended. Here, in contrast to assumption of risk, the injured party does not know that the product is dangerous for a particular use. The courts have severely limited this defense, however. Even if the injured party does not know about the inherent danger of using the product in a wrong way, if the misuse is reasonably foreseeable, the seller must take measures to guard against it. For example, it is reasonably foreseeable that a child might misuse a product without understanding the danger of doing so. Thus, if a child is playing with a BIC lighter and starts a fire that causes injury to another person, the manufacturer cannot escape liability by claiming that the child misused the lighter.¹⁹

Comparative Negligence (Fault)

Developments in the area of comparative negligence, or fault (see Chapter 7), have also affected the doctrine of strict liability. In the past, the plaintiff's conduct was never a defense to liability for a defective product. Today, courts in many jurisdictions will consider the negligent or intentional actions of both the plaintiff and the defendant when apportioning liability and damages.²⁰ This means that a defendant may be able to limit at least some of its liability if it can show that the plaintiff's misuse of the product contributed to his or her injuries. When proved, comparative negligence differs from other defenses in that it does not completely absolve the defendant of liability, but it can reduce the total amount of damages that will be awarded to the plaintiff. Note that some jurisdictions allow only intentional conduct to affect a plaintiff's recovery, whereas other states allow ordinary negligence to be used as a defense to product liability.

19. See, for example, Price v. BIC Corp., 702 A.2d 330 (Sup.Ct.N.H. 1997).

CASE IN POINT Dan Smith, a mechanic, was not wearing a hard hat at work when he was asked to start the diesel engine of an air compressor. Because the compressor was an older model, he had to prop open a door to start it. When the engine started, the door fell from its position and hit Smith's head. The injury caused him to suffer from seizures. Smith sued the manufacturer, claiming that the engine was defectively designed. The manufacturer contended that Smith had been negligent by failing to wear a hard hat and propping open the door in an unsafe manner. Although Smith argued that ordinary negligence could not be used as a defense in product liability cases, the court ruled that defendants can use the plaintiff's ordinary negligence to reduce their liability proportionately.²¹

Commonly Known Dangers

The dangers associated with certain products (such as matches and sharp knives) are so commonly known that, as already mentioned, manufacturers need not warn users of those dangers. If a defendant succeeds in convincing the court that a plaintiff's injury resulted from a commonly known danger, the defendant will not be liable.

CASE IN POINT In 1957, Marguerite Jamieson was injured when an elastic exercise rope slipped off her foot and struck her in the eye, causing a detachment of the retina. Jamieson claimed that the manufacturer should be liable because it had failed to warn users that the exerciser might slip off a foot in such a manner. The court stated that to hold the manufacturer liable in these circumstances "would go beyond the reasonable dictates of justice in fixing the liabilities of manufacturers." After all, stated the court, "almost every physical object can be inherently dangerous or potentially dangerous in a sense. . . . A manufacturer cannot manufacture a knife that will not cut or a hammer that will not mash a thumb or a stove that will not burn a finger. The law does not require [manufacturers] to warn of such common dangers."²²

Knowledgeable User

A related defense is the knowledgeable user defense. If a particular danger (such as electrical shock) is or should be commonly known by particular users of a product (such as electricians), the manufacturer need not warn these users of the danger.

CASE IN POINT The parents of teenagers who had become overweight and developed health problems filed a product liability suit against McDonald's. The teenagers claimed that the fast-food chain had failed to warn customers of the adverse health effects of eating its food. The court rejected this claim, however, based on the knowledgeable user defense. The court found that it is well known that the food at McDonald's contains high levels of cholesterol, fat, salt, and sugar and is therefore unhealthful. The court's opinion, which thwarted future lawsuits against fast-food restaurants, stated: "If consumers know (or reasonably should know) the potential ill health effects of eating at McDonald's, they cannot blame McDonald's if they, nonetheless, choose to satiate their appetite with a surfeit [excess] of supersized McDonald's products."²³

Statutes of Limitations and Repose

As previously discussed, statutes of limitations restrict the time within which an action may be brought. The statute of limitations for product liability cases varies according to state law, and unlike warranty claims, product liability claims are not subject to the UCC's limitation period. Usually, the injured party must bring a product liability claim within two to four years. Often, the running of the prescribed period is tolled (that is, suspended) until the party suffering an injury has discovered it or should have discovered it. To ensure that sellers and manufacturers will not be left vulnerable to lawsuits indefinitely, many states have passed laws, called statutes of repose, that place outer time limits on product liability actions. For example, a statute of repose may require that claims be brought within twelve years from the date of sale or manufacture of the defective product. If the plaintiff does not bring an action before the prescribed period expires, the seller cannot be held liable.

REVIEWING

Warranties and Product Liability

Shalene Kolchek bought a Great Lakes Spa from Val Porter, a dealer who was selling spas at the state fair. Porter told Kolchek that Great Lakes spas were “top of the line” and “the Cadillac of spas” and indicated that the spa she was buying was “fully warranted for three years.” Kolchek signed an installment contract; then Porter handed her the manufacturer’s paperwork and arranged for the spa to be delivered and installed for her. Three months later, Kolchek noticed that one corner of the spa was leaking onto her new deck and causing damage. She complained to Porter, but he did nothing about the problem. Kolchek’s family continued to use the spa. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did Porter’s statement that the spa was “top of the line” and “the Cadillac of spas” create any type of warranty? Why or why not?
2. If the paperwork provided to Kolchek after her purchase indicated that the spa had no warranty, would this be an effective disclaimer under the Uniform Commercial Code? Explain.
3. One night, Kolchek’s six-year-old daughter, Litisha, was in the spa with her mother. Litisha’s hair became entangled in the spa’s drain, and she was sucked down and held underwater for a prolonged period, causing her to suffer brain damage. Under which theory or theories of product liability can Kolchek sue Porter to recover for Litisha’s injuries?
4. If Kolchek had negligently left Litisha alone in the spa prior to the incident described in the previous question, what defense to liability might Porter assert?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

22-1. Implied Warranties Moon, a farmer, needs to install a two-thousand-pound piece of equipment in his barn. This will require lifting the equipment thirty feet up into a hayloft. Moon goes to Davidson Hardware and tells Davidson that he needs some heavy-duty rope to be used on his farm. Davidson recommends a one-inch-thick nylon rope, and Moon purchases two hundred feet of it. Moon ties the rope around the piece of equipment; puts the rope through a pulley; and, with a tractor, lifts the equipment off the ground. Suddenly, the rope breaks. The equipment crashes to the ground and is severely damaged. Moon files a suit against Davidson for breach of the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose. Discuss how successful Moon will be in his suit.

22-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Product Liability.

Jason Clark, an experienced hunter, bought a paintball gun. Clark practiced with the gun and knew how to screw in the carbon dioxide cartridge, pump the gun, and use its safety and trigger. Although Clark was aware that he could purchase protective eyewear, he chose not to buy it. Clark had taken gun safety courses and understood that it was “common sense” not to shoot anyone in the face. Clark’s friend, Chris Wright, also owned a paintball gun and was similarly familiar with the gun’s use and its risks. Clark, Wright, and their friends played a game that involved shooting paintballs at cars whose occupants also had the guns. One night, while Clark and Wright were cruising with their guns, Wright shot at Clark’s car, but hit Clark in the eye. Clark filed a product liability lawsuit against the manufacturer of Wright’s paintball gun to recover for the injury. Clark claimed that the gun was defectively designed. During the trial, Wright testified that his gun “never malfunctioned.” In whose favor should the court rule? Why?

22-3. Defenses to Product Liability Baxter manufactures electric hair dryers. Julie purchases a Baxter dryer from her local Ace Drugstore. Cox, a friend and guest in Julie’s home, has taken a shower and wants to dry her hair. Julie tells Cox to use the new Baxter hair dryer that she has just purchased. As Cox plugs in the dryer, sparks fly out from the motor, and sparks continue to fly as she operates it. Despite this, Cox begins drying her hair. Suddenly, the entire dryer ignites into flames, severely burning Cox’s scalp. Cox sues Baxter on the basis of negligence and strict liability in tort. Baxter admits that the dryer was defective but denies liability, particularly because Cox was not the person who purchased the dryer. In other words, Cox had no contractual relationship with Baxter. Discuss the validity of Baxter’s defense. Are there any other defenses that Baxter might assert to avoid liability? Discuss fully.

22-4. Express Warranties Videotape is recorded magnetically. The magnetic particles that constitute the recorded image are bound to the tape’s polyester base. The binder that holds the particles to the base breaks down over time. This breakdown, which is called sticky shed syndrome, causes the image to deteriorate. The Walt Disney Co. made many of its movies available on tape. Buena Vista Home Entertainment, Inc., sold the tapes, which it described as part of a “Gold Collection” or “Masterpiece Collection.” The advertising included such statements as “Give Your Children the Memories of a Lifetime—Collect Each Timeless Masterpiece!” and “Available for a Limited Time Only!” Charmaine Schreiber and others who bought the tapes filed a suit in an Illinois state court against Disney and Buena Vista, alleging, among other things, breach of warranty. The plaintiffs claimed that the defendants’ marketing promised the tapes would last for generations. In reality, the tapes were as subject to sticky shed syndrome as other tapes. Did the ads create an express warranty? In whose favor should the court rule on this issue? Explain. [Schreib v. The Walt Disney Co., ___ N.E.2d ___ (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2006)]

22-5. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Product Liability.

Bret D’Auguste was an experienced skier when he rented equipment to ski at Hunter Mountain Ski Bowl, Inc., owned by Shanty Hollow Corp., in New York. The adjustable retention/release value for the bindings on the rented equipment was set at a level that, according to skiing industry standards, was too low—meaning that the skis would be released too easily—given D’Auguste’s height, weight, and ability. When D’Auguste entered a “double black diamond,” or extremely difficult, trail, he noticed immediately that the surface consisted of ice and almost no snow. He tried to exit the steeply declining trail by making a sharp right turn, but in the attempt, his left ski snapped off. D’Auguste lost his balance, fell, and slid down the mountain, striking his face and head against a fence along the trail. According to a report by a rental shop employee, one of the bindings on D’Auguste’s skis had a “cracked heel housing.” D’Auguste filed a suit in a New York state court against Shanty Hollow and others, including the bindings’ manufacturer, on a theory of strict product liability. The manufacturer filed a motion for summary judgment. On what basis might the court grant the motion? On what basis might the court deny the motion? How should the court rule? Explain. [D’Auguste v. Shanty Hollow Corp., 26 A.D.3d 403, 809 N.Y.S.2d 555 (2 Dept. 2006)]

22-6. Implied Warranties Peter and Tanya Rothing operated Diamond R Stables near Belgrade, Montana, where they bred, trained, and sold horses. Arnold Kallestad owned a ranch in Gallatin County, Montana, where he grew hay and grain, and raised Red Angus cattle. For more than twenty years, Kallestad had sold between three hundred and one thousand tons of hay annually, sometimes advertising it for sale in the Bozeman Daily Chronicle. In 2001, the Rothings bought hay from Kallestad for $90 a ton. They received delivery on April 23. In less than two weeks, at least nine of the Rothings’ horses exhibited symptoms of poisoning that was diagnosed as botulism. Before the outbreak was over, nineteen animals had died. Robert Whitlock, associate professor of medicine and the director of the Botulism Laboratory at the University of Pennsylvania, concluded that Kallestad’s hay was the source. The Rothings filed a suit in a Montana state court against Kallestad, claiming, in part, breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. Kallestad asked the court to dismiss this claim on the ground that, if botulism had been present, it had been in no way foreseeable. Should the court grant this request? Why or why not? [Rothing v. Kallestad, 337 Mont. 193, 159 P.3d 222 (2007)]

22-7. Defenses to Product Liability Terry Kunkle and VanBuren High hosted a Christmas party in Berkeley County, South Carolina. Guests had drinks and hors d'oeuvres at a residence and adjourned to dinner in a barn across a public road. Brandon Stroud ferried the guests to the barn in a golf car made by Textron, Inc. The golf car was not equipped with lights, and Textron did not warn against its use on public roads at night. South Carolina does not require golf cars to be equipped with lights, but does ban their operation on public roads at night. As Stroud attempted to cross the road at 8:30 P.M., his golf car was struck by a vehicle driven by Joseph Thornley. Stroud was killed. His estate filed a suit in a South Carolina state court against Textron, alleging strict product liability and product liability based on negligence. The estate claimed that the golf car was defective and unreasonably dangerous. What might Textron assert in its defense? Explain. [Moore v. Barony House Restaurant, LLC, 382 S.C. 35, 674 S.E.2d 500 (S.C.App. 2009)]

22-8. Product Liability Yun Tung Chow tried to unclog a floor drain in the kitchen of the restaurant where he worked. He used a drain cleaner called Lewis Red Devil Lye that contained crystalline sodium hydroxide. The product label said to wear eye protection, to put one tablespoon of lye directly into the drain, and to keep one's face away from the drain because there could be dangerous back-splash. Without eye protection, Chow mixed three tablespoons of lye in a can and poured that mixture down the drain while bending over it. Liquid splashed back into his face, causing injury. He brought a product liability suit based on inadequate warnings and design defect. The trial court granted summary judgment to the manufacturer, and Chow appealed. An expert for Chow stated that the product was defective because it had a tendency to back-splash. Is that a convincing argument? Why or why not? [Yun Tung Chow v. Reckitt & Coleman, Inc., 69 A.D.3d 413, 891 N.Y.S.2d 402 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept. 2010)]

22-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Dangerous Products.

Susan Calles lived with her four daughters, Amanda, age eleven, Victoria, age five, and Jenna and Jillian, age three. In March 1998, Calles bought an Aim N Flame utility lighter, which she stored on the top shelf of her kitchen cabinet. A trigger can ignite the Aim N Flame after an "ON/OFF" switch is slid to the "on" position.

On the night of March 31, Calles and Victoria left to get videos. Jenna and Jillian were in bed, and Amanda was watching television. Calles returned to find fire trucks and emergency vehicles around her home. Robert Finn, a fire investigator, determined that Jenna had started a fire using the lighter. Jillian suffered smoke inhalation, was hospitalized, and died on April 21. Calles filed a suit in an Illinois state court against Scripto-Tokai Corp., which distributed the Aim N Flame, and others. In her suit, which was grounded, in part, in strict liability claims, Calles alleged that the lighter was an "unreasonably dangerous product." Scripto filed a motion for summary judgment. [Calles v. Scripto-Tokai Corp., 224 Ill.2d 247, 864 N.E.2d 249, 309 Ill.Dec. 383 (2007)]

- (a) A product is unreasonably dangerous when it is dangerous beyond the expectation of the ordinary consumer. Whose expectation—Calles's or Jenna's—applies? Does the lighter pass this test? Explain.
- (b) Calles presented evidence as to the likelihood and seriousness of injury from lighters that do not have child-safety devices. Scripto argued that the Aim N Flame is an alternative source of fire and is safer than a match. Calles admitted that she knew the dangers presented by lighters in the hands of children. Scripto admitted that it had been a defendant in several suits for injuries under similar circumstances. How should the court rule? Why?

- (a) What warranties of title arise in the sales of used cars by dealers?
- (b) In the video, a father (Danny DeVito) uses a tool to turn back the numbers on a vehicle's odometer. When he sells this car, if he tells the buyer the mileage is only 60,000 knowing that it is really 120,000, has he breached an express warranty? What if the seller did not make any oral statements about the car's mileage, could the buyer claim an express warranty existed? Explain.
- (c) What would a person who buys the car in the video have to show to prove that the seller breached the implied warranty of merchantability?

CHAPTER 23

International Law in a Global Economy

International business transactions are not unique to the modern world. Commerce has always crossed national borders. What is new in our day is the dramatic growth in world trade and the emergence of a global business community. Because exchanges of goods, services, and ideas (intellectual property) on a global level are now routine, students of business law and the legal environment should be familiar with the laws pertaining to international business transactions.

Laws affecting the international legal environment of business include both international law and national law. International law can be defined as a body of law—formed as a result of international customs, treaties, and organizations—that governs relations among or between nations. International law may be public, creating standards for the nations themselves; or it may be private, establishing international standards for private transactions that cross national borders. National law is the law of a particular nation, such as Brazil, Germany, Japan, or the United States.

In this chapter, we examine how both international law and national law frame business operations in the global context. We also look at some selected areas relating to business activities in a global context, including common types of international business transactions, export and import controls, and the role of trade agreements. We conclude the chapter with a discussion of the application of certain U.S. laws in a transnational setting.

SECTION 1 INTERNATIONAL LAW

The major difference between international law and national law is that government authorities can enforce national law. What government, however, can enforce international law? By definition, a nation is a sovereign entity—which means that there is no higher authority to which that nation must submit. If a nation violates an international law and persuasive tactics fail, other countries or international organizations have no recourse except to take coercive actions—from severance of diplomatic relations and boycotts to, as a last resort, war—against the violating nation.

In essence, international law attempts to reconcile the need of each country to be the final authority over its own affairs with the desire of nations to benefit economically from trade and harmonious relations with one another. Sovereign nations can, and do, voluntarily agree to be governed in certain respects by international law for the purpose of facilitating international trade and commerce, as well as civilized discourse. As a result, a body of international law has evolved. In this section, we examine the primary sources and characteristics of that body of law, as well as some important legal principles and doctrines that have been developed over time to facilitate dealings among nations.

Sources of International Law

Basically, there are three sources of international law: international customs, treaties and international agreements, and international organizations and conferences. We look at each of these sources here.

INTERNATIONAL CUSTOMS One important source of international law consists of the international customs that have evolved among nations in their relations with one another. Article 38(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice refers to an international custom as “evidence of a general practice accepted as law.” The legal principles and doctrines that you will read about shortly are rooted in international customs and traditions that have evolved over time in the international arena.

TREATIES AND INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

Treaties and other explicit agreements between or among foreign nations provide another important source of international law. A treaty is an agreement or contract between two or more nations that must be authorized and ratified by the supreme power of each nation. Under Article II, Section 2, of the U.S. Constitution, the president has the power “by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.”

A bilateral agreement, as the term implies, is an agreement formed by two nations to govern their commercial exchanges or other relations with one another. A multilateral agreement is formed by several nations. For example, regional trade associations such as the Andean Common Market, the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, and the European Union are the result of multilateral trade agreements.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS In international law, the term international organization generally refers to an organization composed mainly of officials of member nations and usually established by treaty. The United States is a member of more than one hundred multilateral and bilateral organizations, including at least twenty through the United Nations. These organizations adopt resolutions, declarations, and other types of standards that often require nations to behave in a particular manner. The General Assembly of the United Nations, for example, has adopted numerous nonbinding resolutions and declarations that embody principles of international law. Disputes with respect to these resolutions and declarations may be brought before the International Court of Justice. That court, however, normally has authority to settle legal disputes only when nations voluntarily submit to its jurisdiction.

The United Nations Commission on International Trade Law has made considerable progress in establishing uniformity in international law as it relates to trade and commerce. One of the commission’s most significant creations to date is the 1980 Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG). Recall from Chapters 19 through 22 that the CISG is similar to Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code in that it is designed to settle disputes between parties to sales contracts. It spells out the duties of international buyers and sellers that will apply if the parties have not agreed otherwise in their contracts. The CISG governs only sales contracts between trading partners in nations that have ratified the CISG.

Common Law and Civil Law Systems

Companies operating in foreign nations are subject to the laws of those nations. In addition, international disputes often are resolved through the court systems of foreign nations. Therefore, businesspersons should understand that legal systems around the globe generally are divided into common law and civil law systems. Exhibit 23–1 on the facing page lists some of the nations that use civil law systems and some that use common law systems.

COMMON LAW SYSTEMS As discussed in Chapter 1, in a common law system, the courts independently develop the rules governing certain areas of law, such as torts and contracts. These common law rules apply to all areas not covered by statutory law. Although the common law doctrine of stare decisis obligates judges to follow precedential decisions in their jurisdictions, courts may modify or even overturn precedents when deemed necessary.

CIVIL LAW SYSTEMS In contrast to common law countries, most of the European nations, as well as nations in Latin America, Africa, and Asia, base their legal systems on Roman civil law, or “code law.” The term civil law, as used here, refers not to civil as opposed to criminal law but to codified law—an ordered grouping of legal principles enacted into law by a legislature or other governing body.

In a civil law system, the primary source of law is a statutory code. Courts interpret the code and apply the rules to individual cases, but courts may not depart from the code and develop their own laws. Judicial precedents are not binding, as they are in a common law system. In theory, the law code sets forth all of the principles needed for the legal system. Trial procedures also differ in civil law systems. Unlike judges in common law systems, judges in civil systems often actively question witnesses.

ISLAMIC LEGAL SYSTEMS A third, less prevalent, legal system is common in Islamic countries, where the law is often influenced by sharia, the religious law of Islam. Sharia is a comprehensive code of principles that governs both the public and the private lives of persons of the Islamic faith, directing many aspects of day-to-day life, including politics, economics, banking, business law, contract law, and social issues. Although sharia affects the legal codes of many Muslim countries, the extent of its impact and its interpretation vary widely. In some Middle Eastern nations, aspects of sharia have been codified and are enforced by national judicial systems.

International Principles and Doctrines

Over time, a number of legal principles and doctrines have evolved and are employed—to a greater or lesser extent—by the courts of various nations to resolve or reduce conflicts that involve a foreign element. The three important legal principles discussed below are based primarily on courtesy and respect, and are applied in the interests of maintaining harmonious relations among nations.

THE PRINCIPLE OF COMITY Under the principle of comity, one nation will defer and give effect to the laws and judicial decrees of another country, as long as they are consistent with the law and public policy of the accommodating nation. For example, a Swedish seller and a U.S. buyer have formed a contract, which the buyer breaches. The seller sues the buyer in a Swedish court, which awards damages. The buyer's assets, however, are in the United States and cannot be reached unless the judgment is enforced by a U.S. court. In this situation, if a U.S. court determines that the procedures and laws applied in the Swedish court are consistent with U.S. national law and policy, the U.S. court will likely defer to, and enforce, the foreign court's judgment.

CASE IN POINT After Karen Goldberg's husband was killed in a terrorist bombing of a bus in Israel, she filed a lawsuit in a federal court in New York against UBS AG, a Switzerland-based global financial services company with many offices in the United States. Goldberg claimed that UBS was liable under the U.S. Anti-Terrorism Act for aiding and abetting the murder of her husband because it provided financial services to the international terrorist organizations responsible for his murder. UBS argued that the case should be transferred to a court in Israel, which would offer a remedy “substantially the same” as the one available in the United States. The court refused to transfer the case, however, because that would require an Israeli court to take evidence and judge the emotional damage suffered by Goldberg, “raising distinct concerns of comity and enforceability.” U.S. courts hesitate to impose U.S. law on foreign courts when such law is “an unwarranted intrusion” on the policies governing a foreign nation's judicial system.¹

One way to understand the principle of comity (and the act of state doctrine, which will be discussed shortly) is to consider the relationships among the states in our federal form of government. Each state honors (gives “full faith and credit” to) the contracts, property deeds, wills, and other legal obligations formed in other states, as well as judicial decisions with respect to such obligations. On a global basis, nations similarly attempt to honor judgments rendered in other countries when it is feasible to do so. Of course, in the United States the states are constitutionally required to honor other states' actions, whereas, internationally, nations are not required to honor the actions of other nations.

THE ACT OF STATE DOCTRINE The act of state doctrine provides that the judicial branch of one country will not examine the validity of public acts committed by a recognized foreign government within the latter's own territory.

When a Foreign Government Takes Private Property. The act of state doctrine can have important consequences for individuals and firms doing business with, and investing in, other countries. This doctrine is frequently employed in cases involving expropriation, which occurs when a government seizes a privately owned business or privately owned goods for a proper public purpose and awards just compensation. When a government seizes private property for an illegal purpose and without just compensation, the taking is referred to as a confiscation. The line between these two forms of taking is sometimes blurred because of differing interpretations of what is illegal and what constitutes just compensation.

For example, Flaherty, Inc., a U.S. company, owns a mine in Brazil. The government of Brazil seizes the mine for public use and claims that the profits Flaherty has already realized from the mine constitute just compensation. Flaherty disagrees, but the act of state doctrine may prevent that company's recovery in a U.S. court. Note that in a case alleging that a foreign government has wrongfully taken the plaintiff's property, the defendant government has the burden of proving that the taking was an expropriation, not a confiscation.

Doctrine May Immunize a Foreign Government's Actions. When applicable, both the act of state doctrine and the doctrine of sovereign immunity, which we discuss next, tend to shield foreign nations from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts. As a result, firms or individuals who own property overseas generally have little legal protection against government actions in the countries where they operate.

THE DOCTRINE OF SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY When certain conditions are satisfied, the doctrine of sovereign immunity exempts foreign nations from the jurisdiction of the U.S. courts. In 1976, Congress codified this rule in the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA).² The FSIA exclusively governs the circumstances in which an action may be brought in the United States against a foreign nation, including attempts to attach a foreign nation's property. Because the law is jurisdictional in nature, a plaintiff generally has the burden of showing that a defendant is not entitled to sovereign immunity.

2. 28 U.S.C. Sections 1602–1611.

Section 1605 of the FSIA sets forth the major exceptions to the jurisdictional immunity of a foreign state. A foreign state is not immune from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts in the following situations:

1. When the foreign state has waived its immunity either explicitly or by implication.
2. When the foreign state has engaged in commercial activity within the United States or in commercial activity outside the United States that has “a direct effect in the United States.”
3. When the foreign state has committed a tort in the United States or has violated certain international laws.

When courts apply the FSIA, questions frequently arise as to whether an entity is a “foreign state” and what constitutes a “commercial activity.” Under Section 1603 of the FSIA, a foreign state includes both a political subdivision of a foreign state and an instrumentality (department or agency of any branch of a government) of a foreign state. Section 1603 broadly defines a commercial activity as a regular course of commercial conduct, transaction, or act that is carried out by a foreign state within the United States. Section 1603, however, does not describe the particulars of what constitutes a commercial activity. Thus, the courts are left to decide whether a particular activity is governmental or commercial in nature.

SECTION 2 DOING BUSINESS INTERNATIONALLY

A U.S. domestic firm can engage in international business transactions in a number of ways. The simplest way is for U.S. firms to export their goods and services to foreign markets. Alternatively, a U.S. firm can establish foreign production facilities to be closer to the foreign market or markets in which its products are sold. The advantages may include lower labor costs, fewer government regulations, and lower taxes and trade barriers. A domestic firm can also obtain revenues by licensing its technology to an existing foreign company or by selling franchises to overseas entities.

Exporting

company signs a sales contract with a foreign purchaser that provides for the conditions of shipment and payment for the goods. (International contracts for the purchase and sale of goods, as well as the use of letters of credit to make payments in international transactions, were discussed in Chapters 19 through 22.) If sufficient business develops in a foreign country, a U.S. company may establish a specialized marketing organization there by appointing a foreign agent or a foreign distributor. This is called indirect exporting.

When a U.S. firm wishes to limit its involvement in an international market, it will typically establish an agency relationship with a foreign firm (agency will be discussed in Chapter 32). The foreign firm then acts as the U.S. firm's agent and can enter contracts in the foreign location on behalf of the principal (the U.S. company).

When a foreign country represents a substantial market, a U.S. firm may wish to appoint a distributor located in that country. The U.S. firm and the distributor enter into a distribution agreement—a contract setting out the terms and conditions of the distributorship, such as price, currency of payment, guarantee of supply availability, and method of payment. Disputes concerning distribution agreements may involve jurisdictional or other issues, as well as contract law.

In response to the latest economic recession, the U.S. government has taken a greater interest in the export of goods and services to foreign markets by U.S. companies. For a discussion of a recent federal initiative to encourage exports, see this chapter's Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature on the following page.

Manufacturing Abroad

An alternative to direct or indirect exporting is the establishment of foreign manufacturing facilities. Typically, U.S. firms establish manufacturing plants abroad when they believe that by doing so they will reduce costs—particularly for labor, shipping, and raw materials—and thereby be able to compete more effectively in foreign markets. Foreign firms have done the same in the United States. Sony, Nissan, and other Japanese manufacturers have established U.S. plants to avoid import duties that the U.S. Congress may impose on Japanese products entering this country.

A U.S. firm can conduct manufacturing operations in other countries in several ways. They include licensing, franchising, and investing in a wholly owned subsidiary or a joint venture.

LICENSING A U.S. firm may license a foreign manufacturing company to use its copyrighted, patented, or trademarked intellectual property or trade secrets. Like any other licensing agreement (see Chapters 8 and 11), a licensing agreement with a foreign-based firm calls for a payment of royalties on some basis—such as so many cents per unit produced or a certain percentage of profits from units sold in a particular geographic territory. For example, the Coca-Cola Bottling Company licenses firms worldwide to employ (and keep confidential) its secret formula for the syrup used in its soft drink; in return, the company receives a percentage of the income gained from the sale of Coca-Cola by those firms.

The licensing of intellectual property rights benefits all parties to the transaction. The firm that receives the license can take advantage of an established reputation for quality. The firm that grants the license receives income from the foreign sales of its products and also establishes a global reputation. Once a firm's trademark is known worldwide, the demand for other products manufactured or sold by that firm may increase—obviously, an important consideration.

FRANCHISING Franchising is a well-known form of licensing. As you will read in Chapter 36, in a franchise arrangement, the owner of a trademark, trade name, or copyright (the franchisor) licenses another (the franchisee) to use the trademark, trade name, or copyright, under certain conditions or limitations, in the selling of goods or services. In return, the franchisee pays a fee, which is usually based on a percentage of gross or net sales. Examples of international franchises include Holiday Inn and Hertz.

INVESTING IN A WHOLLY OWNED SUBSIDIARY OR A JOINT VENTURE Another way to expand into a foreign market is to establish a wholly owned subsidiary firm in a foreign country. In many European countries, a subsidiary would likely take the form of a société anonyme (S.A.), which is similar to a U.S. corporation. In German-speaking nations, it would be called an Aktiengesellschaft (A.G.). When a wholly owned subsidiary is established, the parent company, which remains in the United States, retains complete ownership of all of the facilities in the foreign country, as well as total authority and control over all phases of the operation.

A U.S. firm can also expand into international markets through a joint venture. In a joint venture, the U.S. company owns only part of the operation; the rest is owned either by local owners in the foreign country or by another foreign entity. All of the firms involved in a joint venture share responsibilities, as

SHIFTING LEGAL PRIORITIES FOR BUSINESS

The National Export Initiative

Although the United States is one of the world's major exporters, exports make up a much smaller share of annual output in the United States than they do in our most important trading partners. In an effort to increase this nation's exports, in 2010 the Obama administration created the National Export Initiative (NEI) with a goal of doubling U.S. exports by 2015. Some commentators believe that another goal of the NEI is to reduce outsourcing—the practice of having manufacturing or other activities performed in lower-wage countries such as China and India. Especially in view of the higher unemployment rate, there is increasing concern that U.S. jobs are being shipped overseas.

The Export Promotion Cabinet

An important component of the NEI is the Export Promotion Cabinet, which reports directly to the president. The cabinet's members include officials from the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, and State, as well as from the Small Business Administration, the U.S. Export-Import Bank, and the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative. All members must submit detailed plans to the president that outline the steps that they will take to increase U.S. exports.

Increased Efforts to Promote Exports

The U.S. Commerce Department will play a leading role in the NEI and is receiving increased funding to do so. More than three hundred trade experts from the department will serve as advocates for U.S. companies and will help some twenty thousand "client companies" increase their export sales. In addition, the Commerce Department's International Trade Administration will play a more active role in promoting U.S. exports in the emerging high-growth markets of Brazil, China, and India. Finally, the department will identify market opportunities in fast-growing sectors, such as environmental goods and services, biotechnology, and renewable energy.

Increased Export Financing

Under the NEI, the U.S. Export-Import Bank is increasing the financing that it makes available to small and medium-sized businesses by 50 percent. In the initial phase of the NEI, the bank added hundreds of new small-business clients that sell a wide variety of products, from sophisticated polymers to date palm trees and nanotechnology-based cosmetics. In addition, the administration has proposed that $30 billion be used to boost lending to small businesses, especially for export purposes.

Removing the Economic Blind Spot

Officials at the Commerce Department believe that in the past the United States has had an economic "blind spot" toward exports. The U.S. government has not placed as much emphasis on exports as the governments of many trading partners, which actively promote their nations' exports. As a result, other countries have been able to slowly chip away at the United States' international competitiveness. One way to improve the situation is to remove barriers that deny U.S. companies fair access to foreign markets. To this end, the government will pursue trade agreements that improve market access for U.S. workers, firms, farmers, and ranchers. In addition, while remaining committed to a rule-based international trading system, the government will continue to combat unfair tariffs and nontariff barriers.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS

Managers in companies that are now outsourcing or are thinking of doing so may wish to reconsider. Increasingly, the federal government is taking a stance against outsourcing. As long as unemployment remains high in the United States, the emphasis will be on the creation of jobs at home. These efforts will often be backed by subsidies and access to federally supported borrowing initiatives.

well as profits and liabilities. (See Chapter 38 for a more detailed discussion of joint ventures.)

SECTION 3

REGULATION OF SPECIFIC BUSINESS ACTIVITIES

Doing business abroad can affect the economies, foreign policies, domestic politics, and other national interests of the countries involved. For this reason, nations impose laws to restrict or facilitate international business. Controls may also be imposed by international agreements.

Investment Protections

Firms that invest in foreign nations face the risk that the foreign government may expropriate the investment property. Expropriation, as mentioned earlier in this chapter, occurs when property is taken and the owner is paid just compensation for what is taken. This generally does not violate observed principles of international law. Confiscating property without compensation (or without adequate compensation), however, normally violates these principles. Few remedies are available for confiscation of property by a foreign government. Claims are often resolved by lump-sum settlements after negotiations between the United States and the taking nation.

To counter the deterrent effect that the possibility of confiscation may have on potential investors, many countries guarantee compensation to foreign investors if property is taken. A guaranty can be in the form of national constitutional or statutory laws or provisions in international treaties. As further protection for foreign investments, some countries provide insurance for their citizens' investments abroad.

Export Controls

The U.S. Constitution provides in Article I, Section 9, that "No Tax or Duty shall be laid on Articles exported from any State." Thus, Congress cannot impose any export taxes. Congress can, however, use a variety of other devices to restrict or encourage exports. Congress may set export quotas on various items, such as grain being sold abroad. Under the Export Administration Act of 1979,³ the flow of technologically advanced products and technical data can be restricted.

While restricting certain exports, the United States (and other nations) also use incentives and subsidies to stimulate other exports and thereby aid domestic businesses. Under the Export Trading Company Act of 1982,⁴ for example, U.S. banks are encouraged to invest in export trading companies, which are formed when exporting firms join together to export a line of goods. The Export-Import Bank of the United States provides financial assistance, primarily in the form of credit guaranties given to commercial banks that in turn lend funds to U.S. exporting companies.

Import Controls

All nations have restrictions on imports, and the United States is no exception. Restrictions include strict prohibitions, quotas, and tariffs. Under the Trading with the Enemy Act of 1917,⁵ for example, no goods may be imported from nations that have been designated enemies of the United States. Other laws prohibit the importation of illegal drugs, books that urge insurrection against the United States, and agricultural products that pose dangers to domestic crops or animals.

The importation of goods that infringe U.S. patents is also prohibited. The International Trade Commission is the government agency that investigates allegations that imported goods infringe U.S. patents and imposes penalties if necessary. In the following case, the court considered an appeal from a company that had been fined more than $13.5 million for importing certain disposable cameras.

Fuji Photo Film Co. v. International Trade Commission

United States Court of Appeals, Federal Circuit, 474 F.3d 1281 (2007).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Fuji Photo Film Company owns fifteen patents for "lens-fitted film packages" (LFFPs), popularly known as disposable cameras. An LFFP consists of a plastic shell pre-loaded with film. To develop the film, a consumer gives the LFFP to a film processor and receives back the negatives and prints, but not the shell. Fuji makes and sells LFFPs. Jazz Photo Corporation collected used LFFP shells in the United States, shipped them abroad to insert new film, and imported refurbished shells back into the United States for sale. The International Trade Commission (ITC) determined that Jazz's resale of shells originally sold outside the United States infringed Fuji's patents. In 1999, the ITC issued a cease-and-desist order to stop the imports. While the order was being disputed at the ITC and in the courts, between August 2001 and December 2003 Jazz imported and sold 27 million refurbished LFFPs. Fuji complained to the ITC, which fined Jazz more than $13.5 million. Jack Benun, Jazz's chief operating officer, appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit.

DYK, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

* * * The Commission concluded that 40% of the LFFPs in issue were first sold abroad * * *. This conclusion was supported by substantial evidence. It was based on * * * the identifying numbers printed on the LFFPs and Fuji's production and shipping databases to determine where samples of Fuji-type LFFPs with Jazz packaging (i.e., ones that were refurbished by Jazz) were first sold.

Benun urges that the Commission's decision in this respect was not supported by substantial evidence, primarily arguing that Jazz's so-called informed compliance program required a finding in Jazz's favor. Benun asserts that this program tracked shells from collection through the refurbishment process to sale and insured that only shells collected from the United States were refurbished for sale here. The Commission rejected this argument for two reasons. First, it concluded that the program was too disorganized and incomplete to provide credible evidence that Jazz only refurbished shells collected from the United States. Second, the Commission concluded that at most the program could insure that Jazz only refurbished LFFPs collected from the United States, not LFFPs that were first sold here.

Responding to the second ground, Benun urges that proof that Jazz limited its activities to shells collected in the United States was sufficient * * * because Fuji "infected the pool" of camera shells collected in the United States by taking actions that made it difficult for Jazz and Benun to insure that these shells were from LFFPs first sold here. These actions allegedly included allowing [one company] to import cameras with Japanese writing on them for sale in the United States; allowing [that company] to import spent shells into the United States for recycling; and allowing tourists to bring cameras first sold abroad into the United States for personal use. Under these circumstances, Benun argues that a presumption should arise that shells collected in the United States were first sold here. However, the Commission found that the number of shells falling into these categories was insignificant, and that finding was supported by substantial evidence. Moreover, *there was evidence that Jazz treated substantial numbers of its own shells collected in the United States * * * as having been sold in the United States even though it knew that 90% of these shells were first sold abroad * * . [Emphasis added.]

In any event, the Commission's first ground—that the program was too incomplete and disorganized to be credible—was supported by substantial evidence. Since there was no suggestion that the incomplete and disorganized nature of the program was due to Fuji's actions, this ground alone was sufficient to justify a conclusion that Benun had not carried his burden to prove [the refurbished LFFPs had been sold first in the United States].

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit held that Jazz had violated the cease-and-desist order, affirming this part of the ITC's decision. The court concluded, among other things, that "substantial evidence supports the finding that the majority of the cameras were first sold abroad."
