WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that, after this decision, Jazz fully compensated Fuji for the infringing sales of LFFPs. Would Jazz have acquired the right to refurbish those LFFPs in the future? Explain.

THE GLOBAL DIMENSION • How does the prohibition against importing goods that infringe U.S. patents protect those patents outside the United States?

QUOTAS AND TARIFFS Limits on the amounts of goods that can be imported are known as quotas. At one time, the United States had legal quotas on the number of automobiles that could be imported from Japan. Today, Japan "voluntarily" restricts the number of automobiles exported to the United States. Tariffs are taxes on imports. A tariff is usually a percentage of the value of the import, but it can be a flat rate per unit (such as per barrel of oil). Tariffs raise the prices of imported goods, causing some consumers to purchase more domestically manufactured goods instead of imports.

Sometimes, countries impose tariffs on goods from a particular nation in retaliation for political acts. For example, in 2009 Mexico imposed tariffs of 10 to 20 percent on ninety products exported from the United States in retaliation for the Obama administration's cancellation of a cross-border trucking program. The program had been instituted to comply with a provision in the North American Free Trade Agreement (to be discussed shortly) that called for Mexican trucks to eventually be granted full access to U.S. highways. U.S. truck drivers opposed the program, however, and consumer protection groups claimed that the Mexican trucks posed safety issues.

President Barack Obama signed legislation that cut off funding for the program, but asked his trade representative to look into creating a new program for cross-border transportation.

In the following case, an importer provided invoices that understated the value of its imports and resulted in lower tariffs than would have been paid on the full value of the goods. Was this fraud or negligence?

CASE 23.2

United States v. Inn Foods, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Federal Circuit, 560 F.3d 1338 (2009).

www.cafc.uscourts.gov^a

COMPANY PROFILE • Inn Foods, Inc. (www.innfoods.com), was established in 1976 as a subsidiary of the VPS Companies, Inc. Inn Foods imports frozen fruits and vegetables into the United States from sources worldwide. At its plants in California and Texas, the company blends, custom packages, flavors, and seasons vegetables, pasta, potatoes, rice, fruits, and other food products. Each year, Inn Foods sells more than 157 million pounds of food. Its customers include buyers in the food service industry, industrial food markets, and retail food markets at locations around the globe.

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Between 1987 and 1990, Inn Foods imported frozen produce from six Mexican growers who agreed to issue invoices that understated the value of the produce. For each understated invoice, Inn Foods sent an order confirmation that estimated the produce's actual market value. Inn Foods later remitted the difference to the growers. Through this double-invoicing system, Inn Foods undervalued its purchases by approximately $3.5 million and paid lower tariff taxes as a result. During an investigation by U.S. Customs and Border Protection, Inn Foods' accounting supervisor denied the existence of the double invoices. The federal government filed an action in the U.S. Court of International Trade against Inn Foods. The court held the defendant liable for fraud and assessed the amount of the unpaid taxes—$624,602.55—plus an additional penalty of $7.5 million. Inn Foods appealed, claiming that it had acted negligently, not fraudulently.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

DYK, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

Initially we note that the record fully supports the trade court's determination that Inn Foods knew that the invoice for each shipment of produce was grossly undervalued, and hence false. The Mexican grower sent Inn Foods a copy of the undervalued "factura" invoice; that "factura" invoice was used to value the entries for Customs purposes. There was evidence that the growers specifically informed Inn Foods of the undervaluation. As the trade court noted, for example, a letter * * * from one of the Mexican growers stated that "we ship * * * Broccoli Spears at 0.50/lb" but that "my invoice * * * will read * * * 0.28/lb." Moreover, upon receipt of the undervalued factura, a * * * manager * * * adjusted the prices to reflect the true and higher estimate. This higher amount was entered into Inn Foods's accounting system. Inn Foods then sent an order confirmation to the Mexican grower with the higher price, retaining a copy of both the undervalued and true invoices for its files. *Thus, one invoice served to bring the produce into the United States at a reduced cost and * * * the second to keep accurate accounting records.* [Emphasis added.]

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 23.2 CONTINUED ♦ The existence of the double invoices was also concealed. * * * [For example,] during the initial Customs investigation, Inn Foods’s accounting supervisor—with what must have been full knowledge of the falsity of the statement—denied outright the existence of a second invoice reflecting a price higher than the amount reported to Customs. This concealment, too, points strongly to fraudulent intent.

The record also makes clear, and Inn Foods does not contest, that Inn Foods knew the false invoices would be used to enter goods into the United States.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit affirmed the lower court’s judgment. The evidence showed that Inn Foods “knowingly entered goods by means of a material false statement.”

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that after Inn Foods learned of the investigation, the company told U.S. Customs and Border Protection that it was working to correct the “errors” and would “advise” as soon as that happened. Would this have undercut the government’s case? Why or why not?

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Inn Foods passed on the cost savings from the lower duties to the growers when it paid them the difference between the understated value of the products and their actual value. Should this in any way absolve Inn Foods of liability for fraud? Explain your answer.

ANTIDUMPING DUTIES The United States has laws specifically directed at what it sees as unfair international trade practices. Dumping, for example, is the sale of imported goods at “less than fair value.” Fair value is usually determined by the price of those goods in the exporting country. Foreign firms that engage in dumping in the United States hope to undersell U.S. businesses to obtain a larger share of the U.S. market. To prevent this, an extra tariff—known as an antidumping duty—may be assessed on the imports.

Two U.S. government agencies are instrumental in imposing antidumping duties: the International Trade Commission (ITC) and the International Trade Administration (ITA). The ITC assesses the effects of dumping on domestic businesses and then makes recommendations to the president concerning temporary import restrictions. The ITA, which is part of the Department of Commerce, decides whether imports were sold at less than fair value. The ITA’s determination establishes the amount of antidumping duties, which are set to equal the difference between the price charged in the United States and the price charged in the exporting country. A duty may be retroactive to cover past dumping.

Trade Agreements That Minimize Trade Barriers

Restrictions on imports are also known as trade barriers. The elimination of trade barriers is sometimes seen as essential to the world’s economic well-being. Most of the world’s leading trading nations are members of the World Trade Organization (WTO), which was established in 1995. To minimize trade barriers among nations, each member country of the WTO is required to grant normal trade relations (NTR) status (formerly known as most-favored-nation status) to other member countries. This means that each member is obligated to treat other members at least as well as it treats the country that receives its most favorable treatment with regard to imports or exports. Various regional trade agreements and associations also help to minimize trade barriers between nations.

THE EUROPEAN UNION (EU) The European Union (EU) arose out of the 1957 Treaty of Rome, which created the Common Market, a free trade zone comprising the nations of Belgium, France, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and West Germany. Today, the EU is a single integrated European trading unit made up of twenty-seven European nations.

The EU has its own governing authorities. These include the Council of Ministers, which coordinates economic policies and includes one representative from each nation; a commission, which proposes regulations to the council; and an elected assembly, which oversees the commission. The EU also has its own court, the European Court of Justice, which can review each nation’s judicial decisions and is the ultimate authority on EU law.

The EU has gone a long way toward creating a new body of law to govern all of the member nations—although some of its efforts to create uniform laws have been confounded by nationalism. The council and the commission issue regulations, or directives, that define EU law in various areas, such as environmental law, product liability, anticompetitive practices, and corporations. The directives normally are binding on all member countries.

THE NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT (NAFTA) The North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) created a regional trading unit consisting of Canada, Mexico, and the United States. The goal of NAFTA is to eliminate tariffs among these three nations on substantially all goods by reducing the tariffs incrementally over a period of time. NAFTA gives the three countries a competitive advantage by retaining tariffs on goods imported from countries outside the NAFTA trading unit. Additionally, NAFTA provided for the elimination of barriers that traditionally have prevented the cross-border movement of services, such as financial and transportation services. NAFTA also attempts to eliminate citizenship requirements for the licensing of accountants, attorneys, physicians, and other professionals.

THE CENTRAL AMERICA–DOMINICAN REPUBLIC–UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT (CAFTA-DR) The Central America–Dominican Republic–United States Free Trade Agreement (CAFTA-DR) was formed by Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, and the United States. Its purpose is to reduce trade tariffs and improve market access among all of the signatory nations, including the United States. Legislatures from all seven countries have approved the CAFTA-DR, despite significant opposition in certain nations.

U.S. LAWS IN A GLOBAL CONTEXT

The internationalization of business raises questions about the extraterritorial application of a nation's laws—that is, the effect of the country's laws outside its boundaries. To what extent do U.S. domestic laws apply to other nations' businesses? To what extent do U.S. domestic laws apply to U.S. firms doing business abroad? Here, we discuss the extraterritorial application of certain U.S. laws, including antitrust laws, tort laws, and laws prohibiting employment discrimination.

U.S. Antitrust Laws

U.S. antitrust laws (to be discussed in Chapter 47) have a wide application. They may subject firms in foreign nations to their provisions, as well as protect foreign consumers and competitors from violations committed by U.S. citizens. Section 1 of the Sherman Act—the most important U.S. antitrust law—provides for the extraterritorial effect of the U.S. antitrust laws. The United States is a major proponent of free competition in the global economy. Thus, any conspiracy that has a substantial effect on U.S. commerce is within the reach of the Sherman Act. The law applies even if the violation occurs outside the United States, and foreign governments as well as businesses can be sued for violations. Before U.S. courts will exercise jurisdiction and apply antitrust laws, however, it must be shown that the alleged violation had a substantial effect on U.S. commerce.

CASE IN POINT An investigation by the U.S. government revealed that a number of companies that manufactured and sold thermal fax paper on the global market had met in Japan and reached a price-fixing agreement (an agreement to set prices—see Chapter 47). A Florida company that uses thermal fax paper filed a lawsuit against New Oji Paper Company, a Japanese-based manufacturer that had participated in the conspiracy. Although New Oji is based in a foreign nation, it sold fax paper in the United States. Thus, its agreement to sell paper at above-normal prices throughout North America had a substantial restraining effect on U.S. commerce. Therefore, the Supreme Court of Florida ruled that it had jurisdiction over New Oji, even though all of the price-fixing activities took place outside the United States.⁶

International Tort Claims

The international application of tort liability is growing in significance and controversy. An increasing number of U.S. plaintiffs are suing foreign (or U.S.) entities for torts that these entities have allegedly committed overseas. Often, these cases involve human rights violations by foreign governments. The Alien Tort Claims Act (ATCA),⁷ adopted in 1789, allows even foreign citizens to bring civil suits in U.S. courts for injuries caused by violations of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States.

6. Execu-Tech Business Systems, Inc. v. New Oji Paper Co., 752 So.2d 582 (Fla. 2000).

7. 28 U.S.C. Section 1350.

Since 1980, foreign plaintiffs have increasingly used the ATCA to bring actions against companies operating in nations such as Colombia, Ecuador, Egypt, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Nigeria, and Saudi Arabia. Some of these cases have involved alleged environmental destruction. In addition, mineral companies in Southeast Asia have been sued for collaborating with oppressive government regimes.

The following case involved claims against hundreds of corporations that allegedly “aided and abetted” the government of South Africa in maintaining its apartheid (racially discriminatory) regime.

Khulumani v. Barclay National Bank, Ltd.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 504 F.3d 254 (2007).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

PER CURIAM [By the whole court].

* * * *

The plaintiffs in this action bring claims under the Alien Tort Claims Act (“ATCA”) against approximately fifty corporate defendants and hundreds of “corporate Does” [including Bank of America, N.A.; Barclay National Bank, Ltd.; Citigroup, Inc.; Credit Suisse Group; Deutsche Bank A.G.; General Electric Company; IBM Corporation; and Shell Oil Company]. The plaintiffs argue that these defendants actively and willingly collaborated with the government of South Africa in maintaining a repressive, racially based system known as “apartheid,” which restricted the majority black African population in all areas of life while providing benefits for the minority white population.

Three groups of plaintiffs filed ten separate actions in multiple federal district courts asserting these apartheid-related claims. One group, the Khulumani Plaintiffs, filed a complaint against twenty-three domestic and foreign corporations, charging them with various violations of international law. The other two groups, the Ntsebeza and Digwamaje Plaintiffs, brought class action claims on behalf of the “victims of the apartheid related atrocities, human rights’ violations, crimes against humanity and unfair [and] discriminatory forced labor practices.”

* * * All of the actions [were transferred to a federal district court in] the Southern District of New York * * *. Thirty-one of the fifty-five defendants in the Ntsebeza and Digwamaje actions * * * [and] eighteen of the twenty-three defendants in [the Khulumani] action * * * filed * * * motion[s] to dismiss.

* * * *

Ruling on the defendants’ motions to dismiss, the district court held that the plaintiffs failed to establish subject matter jurisdiction under the ATCA. * * * The district court therefore dismissed the plaintiffs’ complaints in their entirety. * * * The plaintiffs filed timely notices of appeal [with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit].

* * * *

* * * [This court] vacate[s] the district court’s dismissal of the plaintiffs’ ATCA claims because the district court erred in holding that aiding and abetting violations of customary international law cannot provide a basis for ATCA jurisdiction. We hold that * * * a plaintiff

may plead a theory of aiding and abetting liability under the ATCA. * * * [The majority of the judges on the panel that heard this case agreed on the result but differed on the reasons, which were presented in two concurring opinions. One judge believed that liability on these facts is “well established in international law,” citing such examples as the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. Another judge stated that grounds existed in such resources of U.S. law as Section 876(b) of the Restatement (Second) of Torts, under which liability could be assessed in part for “facilitating the commission of human rights violations by providing the principal tortfeasor with the tools, instrumentalities, or services to commit those violations.”] [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * We decline to affirm the dismissal of plaintiffs’ ATCA claims on the basis of the prudential concerns^a raised by the defendants. * * * The Supreme Court [has] identified two different respects in which courts should consider prudential concerns in deciding whether to hear claims brought under the ATCA.^b First, * * * courts should consider prudential concerns in the context of determining whether to recognize a cause of action under the ATCA. Specifically,

- The term prudential concerns refers to the defendants’ arguments that the plaintiffs do not have standing to pursue their case in a U.S. court. Here, prudential means that the arguments are based on judicially (or legislatively) created principles rather than on the constitutionally based requirements set forth in Article III of the U.S. Constitution.
- The court is referring to the United States Supreme Court decision in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 124 S.Ct. 2739, 159 L.Ed.2d 718 (2004). In the Sosa case, the Court outlined the need for caution in deciding actions under the ATCA and said that the “potential implications for the foreign relations of the United States of recognizing such causes should make courts particularly wary of impinging [encroaching] on the discretion of the Legislative and Executive Branches in managing foreign affairs.”

* * * the determination whether a norm is sufficiently definite to support a cause of action should (and, indeed, inevitably must) involve an element of judgment about the practical consequences of making that cause available to litigants in the federal courts. Second, * * * in certain cases, other prudential principles might operate to limit the availability of relief in the federal courts for violations of customary international law.

* * * *

One such principle * * * [is] a policy of case-specific deference to the political branches [of the U.S. government]. This policy of judicial deference to the Executive Branch on questions of foreign policy has long been established under the prudential justiciability doctrine known as the political question doctrine. Another prudential doctrine that the defendants raise in this case is international comity. This doctrine * * * asks whether adjudication of the case by a United States court would offend amicable working relationships with a foreign country. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

We decline to address these case-specific prudential doctrines now and instead remand to the district court to allow it to engage in the first instance in the careful “case-by-case” analysis that questions of this type require.

* * * *

* * * We VACATE the district court’s dismissal of the plaintiffs’ ATCA claims * * * and REMAND for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

QUESTIONS

1. What are the ramifications for the defendants of the ruling in this case?
2. How might such “prudential concerns” as the principle of comity affect the eventual outcome?

Antidiscrimination Laws

As will be explained in Chapter 35, federal laws in the United States prohibit discrimination on the basis of race, color, national origin, religion, gender, age, and disability. These laws, as they affect employment relationships, generally apply extraterritorially. Since 1984, for example, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967 has covered U.S. employees working abroad for U.S. employers. The Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990, which requires employers to accommodate the needs of workers with disabilities, also applies to U.S. nationals working abroad for U.S. firms.

For some time, it was uncertain whether the major U.S. law regulating discriminatory practices in the workplace, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, applied extraterritorially. The Civil Rights Act of 1991 addressed this issue. The act provides that Title VII applies extraterritorially to all U.S. employees working for U.S. employers abroad. Generally, U.S. employers must abide by U.S. discrimination laws unless to do so would violate the laws of the country where their workplaces are located. This “foreign laws exception” allows employers to avoid being subjected to conflicting laws.

REVIEWING

International Law in a Global Economy

Robco, Inc., was a Florida arms dealer. The armed forces of Honduras contracted to purchase weapons from Robco over a six-year period. After the government was replaced and a democracy installed, the Honduran government sought to reduce the size of its military, and its relationship with Robco deteriorated. Honduras refused to honor the contract and purchase the inventory of arms, which Robco could sell only at a much lower price. Robco filed a suit in a federal district court in the United States to recover damages for this breach of contract by the government of Honduras. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

International Law in a Global Economy, Continued

1. Should the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA) preclude this lawsuit? Why or why not?
2. Does the act of state doctrine bar Robco from seeking to enforce the contract? Explain.
3. Suppose that prior to this lawsuit, the new government of Honduras had enacted a law making it illegal to purchase weapons from foreign arms dealers. What doctrine of deference might lead a U.S. court to dismiss Robco's case in that situation?
4. Now suppose that the U.S. court hears the case and awards damages to Robco, but the government of Honduras has no assets in the United States that can be used to satisfy the judgment. Under which doctrine might Robco be able to collect the damages by asking another nation's court to enforce the U.S. judgment?

 DEBATE THIS: The U.S. federal courts are accepting too many lawsuits initiated by foreigners that concern matters not relevant to this country.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

23-1. Comity In 1995, France implemented a law that makes the use of the French language mandatory in certain legal documents. Documents relating to securities offerings, such as prospectuses, for example, must be written in French. So must instruction manuals and warranties for goods and services offered for sale in France. Additionally, all agreements entered into with French state or local authorities, with entities controlled by state or local authorities, and with private entities carrying out a public service (such as providing utilities) must be written in French. What kinds of problems might this law pose for U.S. businesspersons who wish to form contracts with French individuals or business firms?

23-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Dumping.

The U.S. pineapple industry alleged that producers of canned pineapple from the Philippines were selling their canned pineapple in the United States for less than its fair market value (dumping). The Philippine producers also exported other products, such as pineapple juice and juice concentrate, which used separate parts of the same fresh pineapple, so they shared raw material costs, according to the producers' own financial records. To determine fair value and anti-dumping duties, the pineapple industry argued that a court should calculate the Philippine producers' cost of production and allocate a portion of the shared fruit costs to the canned fruit. The result of this allocation showed that more than 90 percent of the canned fruit sales were below the cost of production. Is this a reasonable approach to determining the production costs and fair market value of canned pineapple in the United States? Why or why not?

- For a sample answer to Question 23-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

23-3. Comity E&L Consulting, Ltd., is a U.S. corporation that sells lumber products in New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania. Doman Industries, Ltd., is a Canadian corporation that also sells lumber products, including green hem-fir, a durable product used for home building. Doman supplies more than 95 percent of the green hem-fir for sale in the northeastern United States. In 1990, Doman contracted to sell green hem-fir through E&L, which received monthly payments plus commissions. In 1998, Sherwood Lumber Corp., a New York firm and an E&L competitor, approached E&L about a merger. The negotiations were unsuccessful. According to E&L, Sherwood and Doman then conspired to monopolize the green hem-fir market in the United States. When Doman terminated its contract with E&L, the latter filed a suit in a federal district court against Doman, alleging violations of U.S. antitrust law. Doman filed for bankruptcy in a Canadian court and asked the U.S. court to dismiss E&L's suit, in part, under the principle of comity. What is the principle of comity? On what basis would it apply in this case? What would be the likely result? Discuss. [E&L Consulting, Ltd. v. Doman Industries, Ltd., 360 F.Supp.2d 465 (E.D.N.Y. 2005)]

23-4. Dumping A newspaper printing press system is more than a hundred feet long, stands four or five stories tall, and weighs 2 million pounds. Only about ten of the systems are sold each year in the United States. Because of the size and cost, a newspaper may update its system, rather than replace it, by buying “additions.” By the 1990s, Goss International Corp. was the only domestic maker of the equipment in the United States and represented the entire U.S. market. Tokyo Kikai Seisakusho (TKSC), a Japanese corporation, makes the systems in Japan. In the 1990s, TKSC began to compete in the U.S. market, forcing Goss to cut its prices below cost. TKSC's tactics included offering its customers “secret” rebates on prices that were ultimately substantially less than the products' actual market value in Japan. According to TKSC office memos, the goal was to “win completely this survival game” against Goss, the “enemy.” Goss filed a suit in a federal district court against TKSC and others, alleging illegal dumping. At what point does a foreign firm's attempt to compete with a domestic manufacturer in the United States become illegal dumping? Was that point reached in this case? Discuss. [Goss International Corp. v. Man Roland Druckmaschinen Aktiengesellschaft, 434 F.3d 1081 (8th Cir. 2006)]

23-5. Comity Jan Voda, M.D., a resident of Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, owns three U.S. patents related to guiding catheters for use in interventional cardiology, as well as corresponding foreign patents issued by the European Patent Office, Canada, France, Germany, and Great Britain. Voda filed a suit in a federal district court against Cordis Corp., a U.S. firm, alleging infringement of the U.S. patents under U.S. patent law and of the corresponding foreign patents under the patent law of the various foreign countries. Cordis admitted, “The XB catheters have been sold domestically and internationally since 1994. The XB catheters were manufactured in Miami Lakes, from 1993 to 2001 and have been manufactured in Juarez, Mexico, since 2001.” Cordis argued, however, that Voda could not assert infringement claims under foreign patent law because the court did not have jurisdiction over such claims. Which of the important international legal principles discussed in this chapter would be most likely to apply in this case? How should the court apply it? Explain. [Voda v. Cordis Corp., 476 F.3d 887 (Fed.Cir. 2007)]

23-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Sovereign Immunity.

When Ferdinand Marcos was president of the Republic of the Philippines, he put assets into a company called Arelma. Its holdings are in New York. A group of plaintiffs, referred to as the Pimentel class, brought a class-action suit in a U.S. district court for human rights violations by Marcos. They won a judgment of $2 billion and sought to attach Arelma's assets to help pay the judgment. At the same time, the Republic of the Philippines established a commission to recover property wrongfully taken by Marcos. A court in the Philippines was convened to determine whether Marcos's property, including Arelma, should be forfeited to the Republic or to other parties. The Philippine government, in opposition to the Pimentel judgment, moved to dismiss the U.S. court proceedings. The district court refused, and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit agreed that the Pimentel class should take the assets. The Republic of the Philippines appealed. What are the key international legal issues? [Republic of the Philippines v. Pimentel, 553 U.S. 851, 128 S.Ct. 2180, 171 L.Ed.2d 131 (2008)]

23-7. Dumping Nuclear power plants use low enriched uranium (LEU) as fuel. LEU consists of feed uranium enriched by energy to a certain assay—the percentage of the isotope necessary for a nuclear reaction. The amount of energy is described by an industry standard as a “separative work unit” (SWU). A nuclear utility may buy LEU from an enricher, or the utility may provide an enricher with feed uranium and pay for the SWUs necessary to produce LEU. Under an SWU contract, the LEU returned to the utility may not be exactly the uranium the utility provided. This is because feed uranium is fungible and trades like a commodity (such as wheat or corn), and profitable enrichment requires the constant processing of undifferentiated stock. Foreign enrichers, including Eurodif, S.A., allegedly exported LEU to the United States and sold it for “less than fair value.” Did this constitute dumping? Explain. If so, what could be done to prevent it? [United States v. Eurodif, S.A., ___ U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 878, 172 L.Ed.2d 679 (2009)]

23-8. International Agreements and Jurisdiction The plaintiffs in this case were descendants of Holocaust victims who had lived in various countries in Europe. Before the Holocaust, the plaintiffs' ancestors had purchased insurance policies from Assicurazioni Generali, S.P.A., an Italian insurance company. When Generali refused to pay benefits under the policies, the plaintiffs, who were U.S. citizens and the beneficiaries of these policies, sued for breach of the insurance contracts. Due to certain agreements among nations after World War II, such lawsuits could not be filed for many years. In 2000, however, the United States agreed that Germany could establish a foundation—the International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims, or ICHEIC—that would compensate victims who had suffered losses at the hands of the Germans during the war. Whenever a German company was sued in a U.S. court based on a Holocaust-era claim, the U.S. government would inform the court that the matter should be referred to the ICHEIC as the exclusive forum and remedy for the resolution. There was no such agreement with Italy, however. The plaintiffs sued the Italy-based Generali in a U.S. district court. The court dismissed the suit, and the plaintiffs appealed. Did the plaintiffs have to take their claim to the ICHEIC rather than sue in a U.S. court? Why or why not? [In re Assicurazioni Generali, S.P.A., 592 F.3d 113 (2d Cir. 2010)]

23–9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Sovereign Immunity.

On December 21, 1988, Pan Am Flight 103 exploded 31,000 feet in the air over Lockerbie, Scotland, killing all 259 passengers and crew on board and 11 people on the ground. Among those killed was Roger Hurst, a U.S. citizen. An investigation determined that a portable radio-cassette player packed in a brown Samsonite suitcase smuggled onto the plane was the source of the explosion. The explosive device was constructed with a digital timer specially made for, and bought by, Libya. Abdel Basset Ali Al-Megrahi, a Libyan government official and an employee of the Libyan Arab Airline (LAA), was convicted by the Scottish High Court of Justiciary on criminal charges that he planned and executed the bombing in association with members of the Jamahiriya Security Organization (JSO) (an agency of the Libyan government that performs security and intelligence functions) or the Libyan military. Members of the victims' families filed a suit in a U.S. district court against the JSO, the LAA, Al-Megrahi, and others. The plaintiffs claimed violations of U.S. federal law, including the Anti-Terrorism Act, and state law, including the intentional infliction of emotional distress. [Hurst v. Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, 474 F.Supp.2d 19 (D.D.C. 2007)]

- Under what doctrine, codified in which federal statute, might the defendants claim to be immune from the jurisdiction of a U.S. court? Should this law include an exception for “state-sponsored terrorism”? Why or why not?
- The defendants agreed to pay $2.7 billion, or $10 million per victim, to settle all claims for “compensatory death damages.” The families of eleven victims, including Hurst, were excluded from the settlement because they were “not wrongful death beneficiaries under applicable state law.” These plaintiffs continued the suit. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss. Should the motion be granted on the ground that the settlement bars the plaintiffs' claims? Explain.

Domestic and International Sales & Lease Contracts

Transactions involving the sale or lease of goods make up a great deal of the business activity in the commercial and manufacturing sectors of our economy. Articles 2 and 2A of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) govern the sale or lease of goods in every state except Louisiana. Many of the UCC's provisions express our ethical standards.

Good Faith and Commercial Reasonableness

The concepts of good faith and commercial reasonableness permeate the UCC and help to prevent unethical behavior by businesspersons. These two key concepts are read into every contract and impose certain duties on all parties. Additionally, reasonableness in the formation, performance, and termination of contracts underlies almost all of the UCC's provisions.

As an example, consider the UCC's approach to open terms. Section 2-311(1) states that when a term is to be specified by one of the parties, "any such specification must be made in good faith and within limits set by commercial reasonableness." The requirement of commercial reasonableness means that the term subsequently supplied by one party should not come as a surprise to the other. The party filling in the missing term may not take advantage of the opportunity to add a term that will be beneficial to himself or herself (and detrimental to the other party) and then demand a contractual performance that the other party totally failed to anticipate. Under the UCC, the party filling in the missing term is not allowed to deviate from what is commercially reasonable in the context of the transaction. Courts frequently look to course of dealing, usage of trade, and the surrounding circumstances in determining what is commercially reasonable in a given situation.

Good Faith in Output and Requirements Contracts

The obligation of good faith is particularly important in so-called output and requirements contracts. UCC 2-306 states that "quantity" in these contracts "means such actual output or requirements as may occur in good faith." For example, Mandrow's Machines, which assembles personal computers, has a requirements contract with Advanced Tech Circuit Boards, under which Advanced Tech is to supply Mandrow's with all of the circuit boards it needs. If Mandrow's suddenly quadruples the size of its business, it cannot insist that Advanced Tech supply all of its requirements, as specified in the original contract.

As another example, assume that the market price of the goods subject to a requirements contract rises rapidly and dramatically because of an extreme shortage of materials necessary to their production. The buyer could claim that her needs are equivalent to the seller's entire output. Then, after buying all of the seller's output at the contract price (which is substantially below the market price), the buyer could turn around and sell the goods that she does not need at the higher market price. Under the UCC, this type of unethical behavior is prohibited, even though the buyer in this instance has not technically breached the contract.

Bad Faith Not Required for Breach A party can breach the obligation of good faith under the UCC even if the party did not show "bad faith"—that is, even when there is no proof that the party was dishonest. For example, in one case a large manufacturer of recreational boats, Genmar Holdings, Inc., purchased Horizon, a small company that produced a particular type of fishing boat. At the time of the purchase, Genmar executives promised that Horizon boats would be the company's "champion" and vowed to keep Horizon's key employees on as managers. The contract required Genmar to pay Horizon a lump sum in cash and also to pay "earn-out consideration" under a specified formula for five years. The "earn-out" amount would depend on the number of Horizon brand boats sold and on annual gross revenues.

One year after the sale, Genmar renamed the Horizon brand boats "Nova" and told employees to give priority to producing Genmar brand boats over the Nova boats. Because the Genmar boats were more difficult and time consuming to make than the Nova boats, gross revenues and production decreased, and Genmar was not required to pay the "earn-out" amounts. Eventually, Genmar fired the former Horizon employees and stopped manufacturing the Nova boats entirely. The former employees filed a suit alleging that Genmar had breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. Genmar argued that it could not have violated good faith because there was no proof that it had engaged in fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation. The court held for the plaintiffs, however, and the decision was affirmed on appeal.¹ It is possible for a party to breach its good faith obligations under the UCC even if the party did not engage in fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation.

Commercial Reasonableness Under the UCC, the concept of good faith is closely linked to commercial reasonableness. All commercial actions—including the performance and enforcement of contract obligations—must display commercial reasonableness. A merchant is expected to act in a reasonable manner according to reasonable commercial customs. The reliance of the UCC's drafters on commercial customs, or usage of trade, as a guideline to reasonable behavior in a given trade or industry indicates the importance of commercial reasonableness in sales law.

UNIT FOUR • FOCUS ON ETHICS

The concept of commercial reasonableness is clearly expressed in the doctrine of commercial impracticability. Under this doctrine, which is related to the common law doctrine of impossibility of performance, a party's nonperformance of a contractual obligation may be excused when, because of unforeseen circumstances, performance of the contract becomes impracticable. The courts make clear, however, that performance will not be excused under this doctrine unless the nonperforming party has made every reasonable effort to fulfill his or her obligations.

The Concept of the Good Faith Purchaser

The concept of the good faith purchaser reflects the UCC's emphasis on protecting innocent parties. Suppose, for example, that you innocently and in good faith purchase a boat for a fair market price from someone who appears to have good title. Under the UCC, you are protected from the possibility that the real owner—from whom the seller may have fraudulently obtained the boat—will later appear and demand his boat back. (Note that nothing prevents the true owner from bringing suit against the party who defrauded him.)

Ethical questions arise, though, when both parties to a dispute over title to goods are good faith purchasers. For example, suppose that a car dealer purchases a used car in good faith for value and sells it to a customer, also a good faith purchaser. If it turns out that there was actually a lien on the vehicle and the true owner claims title to the car, which of these two good faith purchasers should lose out? Here, a court would likely look to trade usage for guidance. In one case involving this situation, the court noted that in the used-car industry, it is customary for the seller to reimburse the buyer when the seller cannot deliver good title to a vehicle. According to the court, this custom is consistent with public policy. Car dealers are better able than buyers to investigate irregularities in title, so the risk of forged title documents "can and should be borne by dealers rather than purchasers."²

Another ethical issue is raised when the purchaser of goods is not quite so innocent. Suppose that the purchaser has reason to suspect that the seller may not have good title to the goods being sold but nonetheless goes ahead with the transaction because it is a "good deal." Has this buyer crossed the boundary that separates the good faith purchaser from one who purchases in bad faith? This boundary is important in the law of sales because the UCC will not be a refuge for those who purchase in bad faith. The term good faith purchaser means just that—one who enters into a contract for the purchase of goods without knowing, or having any reason to know, that there is anything shady or illegal about the deal.

Unconscionability

The doctrine of unconscionability is a good example of how the law attempts to enforce ethical behavior. This doctrine suggests that some contracts may be so unfair to one party as to be unenforceable, even though that party originally agreed to the contract's terms. Section 2–302 of the UCC provides that a court will consider the fairness of contracts and may hold that a contract or any clause of a contract was unconscionable at the time it was made. If a court makes such a determination, it may refuse to enforce the contract, enforce the contract without the unconscionable clause, or limit the application of the clause so as to avoid an unconscionable result.

The Test for Unconscionability The UCC does not define the term unconscionability. The drafters of the UCC, however, have added explanatory comments to the relevant sections, and these comments serve as guidelines for applying the UCC. Comment 1 to Section 2–302 suggests that the basic test for unconscionability is whether, under the circumstances existing at the time of the contract's formation, the clause in question was so one sided as to be unconscionable. This test is to be applied against the general commercial background of the contract.

Unconscionability—A Case Example In one case applying Section 2–302, a New York appellate court held that an arbitration clause was unconscionable and refused to enforce it. Gateway 2000, Inc., which sold computers and software directly to consumers, included in its retail agreements a clause specifying that any dispute arising out of the contract had to be arbitrated in Chicago, Illinois, in accordance with the arbitration rules of the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC).

A number of consumers who had purchased Gateway products became incensed when they learned that the ICC rules required advance fees of $4,000 (more than the cost of most Gateway products) and that the $2,000 registration fee was nonrefundable—even if the consumer prevailed at the arbitration. Additionally, the consumers would have to pay travel expenses to Chicago. In the class-action litigation against Gateway that followed, the New York court agreed with the consumers that the "egregiously

Warranties

A seller or lessor has not only a legal obligation to provide safe products but also an ethical one. When faced with the possibility of increasing safety at no extra cost, every ethical businessperson will certainly opt for a safer product. An ethical issue arises, however, when producing a safer product means higher costs. To some extent, our warranty laws serve to protect consumers from sellers who may be tempted to neglect ethical concerns if what they are doing is both legal and profitable.

Express and Implied Warranties The UCC recognizes both express and implied warranties. Under UCC 2–314 and 2A–212, goods sold by a merchant or leased by a lessor must be fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used, be of proper quality, and be properly labeled and packaged. The UCC injects greater fairness into contractual situations by recognizing descriptions as express warranties. Hence, a seller or lessor of goods may be held to have breached a contract if the goods fail to conform to the description. In this way, the UCC acknowledges that a buyer or lessee may often reasonably believe that a seller or lessor is warranting his or her product, even though the seller or lessor does not use a formal word such as warrant or guarantee. Thus, the law imposes an ethical obligation on sellers and lessors in a statutory form.

Warranty Disclaimers The UCC requirement that warranty disclaimers be sufficiently conspicuous to catch the eye of a reasonable purchaser is based on the ethical premise that sellers of goods should not take advantage of unwary consumers, who may not always read the “fine print” on standard purchase order forms. As discussed in Chapter 22, if a seller or lessor, when attempting to disclaim warranties, fails to meet the specific requirements imposed by the UCC, the warranties will not be effectively disclaimed. Before the UCC was adopted by the states, purchasers of automobiles frequently signed standard-form purchase agreements drafted by the auto manufacturer without learning the meaning of all the fine print until later.

3. Brower v. Gateway 2000, Inc., 246 A.D.2d 246, 676 N.Y.S.2d 569 (1998). See also DeFontes v. Dell, Inc., 984 A.2d 1061 (R.I. 2009).

Freedom of Contract versus Freedom from Contract—Revisited Although freedom of contract reflects a basic ethical principle in our society, courts have made it clear that when such freedom leads to gross unfairness, it should be curbed. (Several examples of the exceptions to freedom of contract that courts will make were offered in the Focus on Ethics feature at the end of Unit Three.) Nonetheless, before the UCC was in effect, courts generally would not intervene in cases involving warranty disclaimers in fine print or otherwise “hidden” in a standard purchase order form. Exceptions were made only when the resulting unfairness “shocked the conscience” of the court. By obligating sellers and lessors to meet specific requirements when disclaiming warranties, the UCC has made dealing fairly with buyers and lessees—already an ethical obligation of all sellers and lessors of goods—a legal obligation as well.

Today, if a warranty disclaimer unfairly “surprises” a purchaser or a lessee, chances are that the disclaimer was not sufficiently conspicuous. In this situation, the unfairness of the bargain need not be so great as to “shock the court’s conscience” before a remedy will be granted.

International Transactions

Conducting business internationally presents unique challenges including, at times, ethical challenges. This is understandable, given that laws and cultures vary from one country to another. Consider the role of women. In the United States, equal employment opportunity is a fundamental public policy. This policy is clearly expressed in Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (to be discussed in Chapter 35), which prohibits discrimination against women in the employment context. Some other countries, however, largely reject any professional role for women. Consequently, U.S. women conducting business transactions in those countries may encounter difficulties. For example, when the World Bank sent a delegation that included women to negotiate with the Central Bank of Korea, the Koreans were surprised and offended. They thought that the presence of women meant that the negotiations were not being taken seriously.

There are also some important ethical differences among nations. In Islamic countries, for example, the consumption of alcohol and certain foods is forbidden by the Islamic religion. Thus, it would be thoughtless and imprudent to invite a Saudi Arabian business contact out for a drink. Additionally, in many foreign nations, gift giving is a common practice between contracting companies or between companies and government officials. To Americans, such gift giving may look suspiciously like an unethical (and possibly illegal) bribe. This cultural difference has been an important source of friction in international business, particularly since the U.S.

Congress passed the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in 1977 (discussed in Chapters 5 and 9). This act prohibits U.S. business firms from offering certain side payments to foreign officials to secure favorable contracts.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Review the UCC provisions that apply to the topics discussed in Chapters 19 through 22. Discuss fully how various UCC provisions, excluding the provisions discussed above, reflect social values and ethical standards.
2. How can a court objectively measure good faith and commercial reasonableness?
3. Generally, the courts determine what constitutes “reasonable” behavior in disputes between contract parties over this issue. Should the UCC be more specific in defining what will be deemed reasonable in particular circumstances so that the courts do not have to decide the issue? Why or why not?
4. Why does the UCC protect innocent persons (good faith purchasers) who buy goods from sellers with voidable title but not innocent persons who buy goods from sellers with void title?
5. Should U.S. firms doing business internationally send female employees to foreign nations that reject any role for women in business? Why or why not? How can a U.S. company accommodate the culture of foreign nations and still treat its own employees equally?

The Function and Creation of Negotiable Instruments

Most commercial transactions that take place in the modern business world would be inconceivable without negotiable instruments. A negotiable instrument can function as a substitute for cash or as an extension of credit. For example, when a buyer writes a check to pay for goods, the check serves as a substitute for cash. When a buyer gives a seller a promissory note in which the buyer promises to pay the seller the purchase price within sixty days, the seller has essentially extended credit to the buyer for a sixty-day period.

For a negotiable instrument to operate practically as either a substitute for cash or a credit device, or both, it is essential that the instrument be easily transferable without danger of being uncollectible. This is a fundamental function of negotiable instruments. Each rule described in the following pages can be examined in light of this function.

The law governing negotiable instruments grew out of commercial necessity. In the medieval world, merchants engaging in foreign trade used bills of exchange to finance and conduct their affairs, rather than risk transporting gold or coins. The merchants developed their own set of rules, which eventually became a distinct set of laws known as the Lex Mercatoria (Law Merchant).

The Law Merchant was later codified in England and is the forerunner of Article 3 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

Article 3 imposes special requirements for the form and content of negotiable instruments. These requirements are discussed throughout this chapter and in Chapters 25 and 26. Article 3 also governs the process of negotiation (the transfer of an instrument from one party to another) and the parties' responsibilities in negotiation, as will be discussed. Article 4 of the UCC, which governs bank deposits and collections, will be covered in Chapter 27. The revised Articles 3 and 4 are included in their entirety in Appendix C.

TYPES OF NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS

A negotiable instrument is a signed writing (or record) that contains an unconditional promise or order to pay an exact amount, either on demand or at a specific future time. Most negotiable instruments are paper documents, which is why they are sometimes referred to as commercial paper. UCC 3–104(b) defines an instrument as a “negotiable instrument.”¹ For that reason, whenever the term instrument is used in this book, it refers to a negotiable instrument.

The UCC specifies four types of negotiable instruments: drafts, checks, notes, and certificates of deposit

(CDs). These instruments, which are summarized briefly in Exhibit 24–1 on the facing page, frequently are divided into the two classifications that we will discuss in the following subsections: orders to pay (drafts and checks) and promises to pay (promissory notes and CDs).

Negotiable instruments may also be classified as either demand instruments or time instruments. A demand instrument is payable on demand—that is, it is payable immediately after it is issued and thereafter for a reasonable period of time.² Issue is “the first delivery of an instrument by the maker or drawer

1. Note that all of the references to Article 3 of the UCC in this chapter are to the 1990 version of Article 3, which has been adopted by almost all of the states.

2. “A promise or order is ‘payable on demand’ if it (i) states that it is payable on demand or at sight, or otherwise indicates that it is payable at the will of the holder, or (ii) does not state any time of payment” [UCC 3–108(a)]. The UCC defines a holder as “the person in possession of a negotiable instrument that is payable either to bearer or to an identified person [who] is the person in possession” [UCC 1–201(21)(A)]. The term bearer will be defined later in this chapter.

. . . for the purpose of giving rights on the instrument to any person” [UCC 3-105]. All checks are demand instruments because, by definition, they must be payable on demand. A time instrument is payable at a future date.

Drafts and Checks (Orders to Pay)

A draft is an unconditional written order that involves three parties. The party creating the draft (the drawer) orders another party (the drawee) to pay money, usually to a third party (the payee). The most common type of draft is a check, but drafts other than checks may be used in commercial transactions.

TIME DRAFTS AND SIGHT DRAFTS A time draft is payable at a definite future time. A sight draft (or demand draft) is payable on sight—that is, when it is presented to the drawee (usually a bank or financial institution) for payment. A sight draft may be payable on acceptance. Acceptance is the drawee’s written promise to pay the draft when it comes due. Usually, an instrument is accepted by writing the word accepted across its face, followed by the date of acceptance and the signature of the drawee. A draft can be both a time and a sight draft; such a draft is payable at a stated time after sight. An example would be a draft that states that it is payable ninety days after sight.

Exhibit 24-2 on the following page shows a typical time draft. For the drawee to be obligated to honor the order, the drawee must be obligated to the drawer either by agreement or through a debtor-creditor relationship. For example, on January 16, OurTown Real Estate orders $1,000 worth of office supplies from Eastman Supply Company, with payment due April 16. Also on January 16, OurTown sends Eastman a draft drawn on its account with the First National Bank of Whiteacre as payment. In this scenario, the drawer is OurTown, the drawee is OurTown’s bank (First National Bank of Whiteacre), and the payee is Eastman Supply Company. First National Bank is obligated to honor the draft because of its account agreement with OurTown Real Estate.

TRADE ACCEPTANCES A trade acceptance is a type of draft that is frequently used in the sale of goods. In a trade acceptance, the seller of the goods is both the drawer and the payee. The buyer to whom credit is extended is the drawee. Essentially, the draft orders the buyer to pay a specified amount to the seller, usually at a stated time in the future.

For example, Jackson Street Bistro buys its restaurant supplies from Osaka Industries. When Jackson requests supplies, Osaka creates a draft ordering Jackson to pay Osaka for the supplies within ninety days and sends it along with the supplies. When the supplies arrive, Jackson accepts the draft by signing its face and is then obligated to make the payment. This signed draft is a trade acceptance and can be sold to a third party (on the commercial money market—the market that businesses use for short-term borrowing) if Osaka needs cash before the payment is due.

When a draft orders the buyer's bank to pay, it is called a banker's acceptance. Banker's acceptances are commonly used in international trade.

CHECKS As mentioned, the most commonly used type of draft is a check. The writer of the check is the drawer, the bank on which the check is drawn is the drawee, and the person to whom the check is made payable is the payee. Checks are demand instruments because they are payable on demand. For a discussion of how payments made via mobile phones can replace checks and also promote sustainability, see this chapter's Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature on the facing page.

Checks will be discussed more fully in Chapter 27, but it should be noted here that with certain types of checks, such as cashier's checks, the bank is both the drawer and the drawee. The bank customer purchases a cashier's check from the bank—that is, pays the bank the amount of the check—and indicates to whom the check should be made payable. The bank, not the customer, is the drawer of the check, as well as the drawee. A cashier's check functions the same as cash because the bank has committed itself to paying the stated amount on demand.

Note also that while checks are still commonly used in the United States, their negotiability is questionable in other nations. In many European nations, including Austria, France, Germany, and the Netherlands, people write fewer checks today. Instead, they rely on direct bank transfers and electronic payments (both of which will be discussed in Chapter 27). The shift away from checks in Europe has been spurred by the European Union's low-cost electronic payment system, which is much faster and more efficient than the systems available in the United States.

Promissory Notes (Promises to Pay)

A promissory note is a written promise made by one person (the maker of the promise) to pay another (usually a payee) a specified sum. A promissory note, which is often referred to simply as a note, can be made payable at a definite time or on demand. It can name a specific payee or merely be payable to bearer (bearer instruments will be discussed later in this chapter). For example, on April 30, Laurence and Margaret Roberts, who are called co-makers, sign a writing unconditionally promising to pay “to the order of” the First National Bank of Whiteacre $3,000 (with 8 percent interest) on or before June 29. This writing is a promissory note. A typical promissory note is shown in Exhibit 24-3 on the facing page.

CASE IN POINT Joseph Cotton borrowed funds from a bank for his education and signed a promissory note for their repayment. The bank assigned the note to the U.S. Department of Education, and Cotton failed to pay the debt. The government then

SHIFTING LEGAL PRIORITIES FOR BUSINESS

Person-to-Person Mobile Payments Aid in Sustainability

Approximately 70 billion checks are written and processed each year in the United States. All of these checks are written on paper, and some of them are transported in physical form for long distances within the U.S. banking system—a process that requires airplane and truck fuel. Thus, whenever we make payments by some electronic means instead of by checks, trees do not have to be cut down to make paper, and fossil fuels do not have to be used to transport the checks. Many people, especially younger ones, have already embraced online shopping and electronic banking. Now they seem poised to take another step toward sustainability.

Person-to-Person Mobile Phone Payments

Mobile phones have long been commonplace in the United States, but today many U.S. residents are using their mobile phones to buy goods or pay for services. Banks are facilitating the process by adding person-to-person payments to their existing mobile and online banking offerings. For example, if you loan your classmate $50, he can now repay you by sending the payment to your e-mail address or cell phone number. The 80 million people who have PayPal accounts have been conducting similar transactions worldwide for several years. PayPal allows its members to transfer funds over their cell phones.

Mobile Phone Payments Are Part of a Growing Trend

Banking is just one part of our interrelated business world that, whether consciously or not, is moving toward sustainability. Whenever an industry or company creates a new service that avoids the need for paper, we can enjoy that service at a lower resource cost, thereby improving our future resource wealth. The move to use electronic substitutes for checks is part of this trend. Indeed, the day may come when paper checks will no longer be accepted.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS

Although there is no current legislation that requires banks and other businesses to reduce their use of paper, some may be enacted in the near future. Given that sustainability appears to be a priority for the Obama administration and Congress, such legislation is likely to be proposed. Managers can start now to reduce the amount of paper that their employees use by encouraging more paperless communication as well as more electronic presentations concerning finance, human resources, and other topics.

to pay the government. He also argued that the note lacked consideration because the school had closed down before he had completed his education. The court found that failure of consideration is not a defense in student loan cases, because the student

Promissory notes are used in a variety of credit transactions. Often, a promissory note will carry the name of the transaction involved. For example, a note may be secured by personal property, such as an automobile. This type of note is referred to as a collateral note because property pledged as security for the satisfaction of a debt is called collateral.⁴ A note payable in installments, such as installment payments for a large-screen 3D LCD television over a twelve-month period, is called an installment note.

Certificates of Deposit (Promises to Pay)

A certificate of deposit (CD) is a type of note issued when a party deposits funds with a bank, and the bank promises to repay the funds, with interest, on a certain date [UCC 3-104(j)]. The bank is the maker of the note, and the depositor is the payee. For example, on February 15, Sara Levin deposits $5,000 with the First National Bank of Whiteacre. The bank promises to repay the $5,000, plus 3.25 percent annual interest, on August 15.

CASE IN POINT Premier Interval Resorts, Inc., borrowed $42 million secured by a deed of trust on a Nevada casino that was to be purchased with the $42 million. In addition, to provide collateral to comply with Nevada's workers' compensation laws (to be discussed in Chapter 34), Premier deposited two CDs at Bank West, one for $2.5 million and the other for $350,000. Shortly after that, Premier filed for bankruptcy, and the court had to decide whether the CDs were notes. If so, the creditor from which Premier had borrowed the $42 million would be entitled to the proceeds because the financing statement (see Chapter 29) that the creditor had filed with the appropriate state office to protect its security interest in the collateral for the loan included "notes" related to the casino, among other things.

3. Cotton v. U.S. Department of Education, 2006 WL 3313753 (M.D. Fla. 2006).
4. To minimize the risk of loss when making a loan, a creditor often requires the debtor to provide some collateral, or security, beyond a promise that the debt will be repaid. When this security takes the form of personal property (such as a motor vehicle), the creditor has an interest in the property known as a security interest. Security interests will be discussed in detail in Chapter 29.

The court found that because Nevada's version of the UCC defined a CD as a promise of payment, or a note, and because the CDs related to the casino, they were incorporated by reference in the financing statement. Therefore, the creditor was entitled to the proceeds from the CDs.⁵

Because CDs are time deposits, the purchaser-payee typically is not allowed to withdraw the funds before the date of maturity (except in limited circumstances, such as disability or death). If a payee wants to access the funds before the maturity date, he or she can sell (negotiate) the CD to a third party. Certificates of deposit in small denominations (for amounts up to $100,000) are often sold by savings and loan associations, savings banks, commercial banks, and credit unions. Exhibit 24-4 on the facing page shows a typical small CD.

SECTION 2 REQUIREMENTS FOR NEGOTIABILITY

For an instrument to be negotiable, it must meet the following requirements:

1. Be in writing.
2. Be signed by the maker or the drawer.
3. Be an unconditional promise or order to pay.
4. State a fixed amount of money.
5. Be payable on demand or at a definite time.
6. Be payable to order or to bearer, unless it is a check.

Written Form

Normally, negotiable instruments must be evidenced by a writing or record.⁶ Clearly, an oral promise can create the danger of fraud or make it difficult to determine liability. The writing must be on material that lends itself to permanence. Promises

5. In re Premier Interval Resorts, Inc., 2003 WL 22880715 (5th Cir. 2003).
6. UCC Section 3-104, which defines negotiable instruments, does not explicitly require a writing. The writing requirement comes from the UCC's definitions of an order (as a written instruction) and a promise (as a written undertaking) [UCC 3-103(a) (6), (9)]. Note, however, that since the widespread adoption of the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA), discussed in Chapter 11, an electronic record may be sufficient to constitute a negotiable instrument (see UETA Section 16). Additionally, a small number of states have adopted a 2002 amendment to Article 3 that explicitly authorizes electronic negotiable instruments.

carved in blocks of ice or inscribed in the sand or on other impermanent surfaces would not qualify as negotiable instruments. The UCC nevertheless gives considerable leeway as to what can be a negotiable instrument. Checks and notes have been written on napkins, menus, tablecloths, shirts, and a variety of other materials.

The writing must also have portability. Although the UCC does not explicitly state this requirement, if an instrument is not movable, it obviously cannot meet the requirement that it be freely transferable. For example, suppose that Cullen writes on the side of a cow, “I, Cullen, promise to pay to Merrill or her order $500 on demand.” Technically, this would meet the requirements of a negotiable instrument—except for portability. Because a cow cannot easily be transferred in the ordinary course of business, the “instrument” is nonnegotiable.

Signatures

For an instrument to be negotiable, it must be signed by (1) the maker if it is a note or a certificate of deposit or (2) the drawer if it is a draft or a check [UCC 3–103(a)(3), (5)]. If a person signs an instrument as an authorized agent for the maker or drawer, the maker or drawer has effectively signed the instrument [UCC 3–402]. (Agents’ signatures will be discussed in Chapter 26.)

SIGNATURE REQUIREMENTS The UCC is quite lenient with regard to what constitutes a signature. Almost any symbol executed or adopted by a person with the intent to authenticate a written or electronic document can be a signature [UCC 1–201(39)]. A signature can be made manually or by means of some device, such as a rubber stamp or thumbprint, and can consist of any name, including a trade or assumed name, or a word, mark, or symbol [UCC 3–401(b)]. If necessary, parol evidence (discussed in Chapter 15) is admissible to identify the signer. When the signer is identified, the signature becomes effective.

Although there are almost no limitations on the manner in which a signature can be made, one should be careful about receiving an instrument that has been signed in an unusual way. Oddities on a negotiable instrument can open the door to disputes and lead to litigation. Furthermore, an unusual signature clearly will decrease the marketability of an instrument because it creates uncertainty.

PLACEMENT OF THE SIGNATURE The location of the signature on the document is unimportant, although the usual place is the lower right-hand corner. A handwritten statement on the body of the instrument, such as “I, Kammie Orlik, promise to pay Janis Tan,” is sufficient to act as a signature.

Unconditional Promise or Order to Pay

The terms of the promise or order must be included in the writing on the face of a negotiable instrument. The terms must also be unconditional—that is, they cannot be conditioned on the occurrence or nonoccurrence of some other event or agreement [UCC 3–104(a)].

PROMISE OR ORDER For an instrument to be negotiable, it must contain an express promise or order to pay. If a buyer executes a promissory note using the words “I promise to pay Alvarez $1,000 on demand for the purchase of these goods,” then this requirement for a negotiable instrument is satisfied. A mere acknowledgment of the debt, such as an I.O.U. (“I owe you”), might logically imply a promise, but it is not sufficient under the UCC. This is because the UCC requires that a promise be an affirmative (express) undertaking [UCC 3–103(a)(9)]. If such words as “to be paid on demand” or “due on demand” are added to an I.O.U., the need for an express promise is satisfied.

A certificate of deposit is exceptional in this respect. No express promise is required in a CD because the bank’s acknowledgment of the deposit and the other terms of the instrument clearly indicate a promise by the bank to repay the sum of money [UCC 3–104(j)].

An order is associated with three-party instruments, such as checks, drafts, and trade acceptances. An order directs a third party to pay the instrument as drawn. In the typical check, for example, the word pay (to the order of a payee) is a command to the drawee bank to pay the check when presented, and thus it is an order. A command, such as “pay,” is mandatory even if it is accompanied by courteous words, as in “Please pay” or “Kindly pay.” Generally, the language used must indicate that a command, or order, is being given. Stating “I wish you would pay” does not fulfill this requirement. An order may be addressed to one person or to more than one person, either jointly (“to A and B”) or alternatively (“to A or B”) [UCC 3–103(a)(6)]. (The effect of naming alternative or joint payees will be discussed in Chapter 25.)

UNCONDITIONALITY OF THE PROMISE OR ORDER A negotiable instrument’s utility as a substitute for cash or as a credit device would be dramatically reduced if it had conditional promises attached to it. No one could safely purchase the instrument without first investigating whether the condition was satisfied, and doing so would be time consuming and expensive. Also, this would restrict the instrument’s transferability. Therefore, only instruments with unconditional promises or orders can be negotiable [UCC 3–104(a)].

A promise or order is conditional (and not negotiable) if it states (1) an express condition to payment, (2) that the promise or order is subject to or governed by another writing (or record), or (3) that the rights or obligations with respect to the promise or order are stated in another writing or record. A mere reference to another writing or record, however, does not of itself make the promise or order conditional [UCC 3–106(a)]. For example, including the phrase “as per contract” or “This debt arises from the sale of goods X and Y” does not render an instrument nonnegotiable.

Similarly, a statement in the instrument that payment can be made only out of a particular fund or source will not render the instrument nonnegotiable [UCC 3–106(b)(ii)]. For example, the terms of Biggs’s note state that payment will be made out of the proceeds of next year’s cotton crop. This does not make the note nonnegotiable—although the payee of such a note may find the note commercially unacceptable and refuse to take it.

If the payment is to be made from a fund that does not yet exist, however, or is conditioned on the occurrence of some future event, then the instrument will be nonnegotiable. For example, Duffy’s note promises to pay Sherman from the trust account that Duffy will establish when he receives the proceeds from his father’s estate. This promise is conditional, and the note is nonnegotiable.

A Fixed Amount of Money

Negotiable instruments must state with certainty a fixed amount of money, with or without interest or other charges described in the promise or order, to be paid at the time the instrument is payable [UCC 3–104(a)]. This requirement ensures that the value of the instrument can be determined with clarity and certainty.

FIXED AMOUNT The term fixed amount (sometimes called sum certain) means that the amount must be ascertainable from the face of the instrument. Interest may be stated as a fixed or variable rate. A demand note payable with 10 percent interest meets the requirement of a fixed amount because its amount can be determined at the time it is payable [UCC 3–104(a)].

The rate of interest may also be determined with reference to information that is not contained in the instrument if that information is readily ascertainable by reference to a formula or a source described in the instrument [UCC 3–112(b)]. For example, an instrument that is payable at the legal rate of interest (a rate of interest fixed by statute) is negotiable. Mortgage notes tied to a variable rate of interest (a rate that fluctuates as a result of market conditions) can also be negotiable.

PAYABLE IN MONEY UCC 3–104(a) provides that a fixed amount is to be payable in money. The UCC defines money as “a medium of exchange authorized or adopted by a domestic or foreign government as a part of its currency” [UCC 1–201(24)]. An instrument payable in the United States with a face amount stated in a foreign currency can be paid in the foreign money or in the equivalent in U.S. dollars [UCC 3–107].

Suppose that the maker of a note promises “to pay on demand $1,000 in U.S. gold.” Gold is not a medium of exchange adopted by the U.S. government, so the note is nonnegotiable because it is not payable in money. The same result occurs if the maker promises “to pay $1,000 and fifty magnums of 1994 Chateau Lafitte-Rothschild wine” because the instrument is not payable entirely in money. An instrument payable in government bonds or in shares of IBM stock is nonnegotiable because neither is a medium of exchange recognized by the U.S. government. The statement “Payable in $1,000 U.S. currency or an equivalent value in gold” would render the instrument nonnegotiable if the maker reserved the option of paying in money or gold. If the instrument left the option to the payee, some legal scholars argue that it would be negotiable.

Payable on Demand or at a Definite Time

A negotiable instrument must “be payable on demand or at a definite time” [UCC 3–104(a)(2)]. To determine the value of a negotiable instrument, it is necessary to know when the maker, drawee, or acceptor is required to pay (an acceptor is a drawee who has accepted, or agreed to pay, an instrument when it is presented later for payment). It is also necessary to know when the obligations of secondary parties, such as indorsers,⁷ will arise. Furthermore, it is necessary to know when an instrument is due in order to calculate when the statute of limitations may apply [UCC 3–118(a)]. Finally, with an interest-bearing instrument, it is necessary to know the exact interval during which the interest will accrue to determine the instrument’s value at the present time.

PAYABLE ON DEMAND Instruments that are payable on demand include those that contain the words “Payable at sight” or “Payable upon presentment.” Presentment means a demand made by or on behalf of a person entitled to enforce an instrument to either pay or accept the instrument [UCC 3–501]. Thus, presentment occurs when a person brings the instrument to the appropriate party for payment or acceptance.

The very nature of the instrument may indicate that it is payable on demand. For example, a check, by definition, is payable on demand [UCC 3–104(f)]. If no time for payment is specified and the person responsible for payment must pay on the instrument’s presentment, the instrument is payable on demand [UCC 3–108(a)].

CASE IN POINT Patrick Gowin was an employee of a granite countertop business owned by John Stathis. In November 2000, Gowin signed a promissory note agreeing to pay $12,500 in order to become a co-owner of the business. The note was dated January 15, 2000 (ten months before it was signed) and required him to make installment payments starting in February 2000. Stathis told Gowin not to worry about the note and never requested any payments. Gowin continued working at the business until 2002 and then quit. Stathis claimed that Gowin did not own any interest in the business because he had never paid the $12,500. When Gowin brought a lawsuit, the court reasoned that because compliance with the stated dates was impossible, the note effectively did not state a date for its payment and therefore was a demand note under UCC 3–108(a). The court also concluded that because no demand for payment had been made, Gowin’s obligation to make it had not arisen and the termination of his ownership interest in the granite business was improper.⁸

In the following case, the issue before the court was whether a promissory note was a demand note.

7. We should note that because the UCC uses the spelling indorse (indorsement, and the like), rather than the more common spelling endorse (endorsement, and the like), we adopt the UCC’s spelling here and in other chapters in this text. Indorsers will be discussed in Chapter 25.

Reger Development, LLC v. National City Bank

www.ca7.uscourts.gov^a

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

FLAUM, Circuit Judge.

* * *

* * * Plaintiff-appellant Reger Development, LLC

* * * is an Illinois limited liability company involved in real estate development. Kevin Reger is Reger Development's principal and sole member. Defendant-appellee National City Bank * * * had lent money to Reger Development for several previous projects. In June 2007, National City offered the company a line of credit to fund potential development opportunities. * * * Reger Development then executed the form contract, which was structured as a promissory note ("Note") * * *.

The main question in this case is whether the Note entitles National City to demand payment from Reger Development at will. * * * [One of the contract clauses reads, in part:]

PAYMENT: Borrower will pay this loan in full immediately upon Lender's demand.

* * *

The Note [continues on] to reference payment on lender's demand several times in other provisions.

* * * [About a year later, National City asked Reger Development to pay down some of the loan and] notified appellant that it would be reducing the amount of cash available through the line of credit * * *.

Kevin Reger "expressed surprise" about these developments and asked if National City would call the line of credit if Reger Development did not agree to the requests. The bank acknowledged that Reger Development was not in default but stated that "there is a possibility that we may demand payment of the line."

Reger Development then filed a complaint in Illinois state court accusing National City of breaching the terms of the Note. * * * Appellee removed the case to the Northern District of Illinois under diversity jurisdiction and then successfully moved to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a cause of action under which relief could be granted. * * * Reger Development [appealed].

While Illinois law generally holds that "a covenant of fair dealing and good faith is implied into every contract absent express disavowal," the duty to act in good faith does not apply to lenders seeking payment on demand notes. In light of this controlling law, appellant's complaint appears vacuous [lacking in content]. Reger Development's allegations are "that National City breached the Contract Documents by arbitrarily and capriciously (1) demanding payment under the Line of Credit even though Reger Development was in good standing and (2) unilaterally changing and attempting to change the fundamental terms of the Contract Documents without Reger Development's consent." Reger

Development [points] to several provisions in the Note that it believes to be fundamentally inconsistent with the nature of a demand instrument. These include * * * the prepayment clause, which allows the borrower to pay down "all or a portion of the amount owed earlier than it is due;" and the clause that grants National City the right to access the borrower's financial information. Reger Development describes the latter as a "financial insecurity" provision that conditions the right to demand payment on some economic cause. [Emphasis added.]

We are not persuaded by the suggestion that these references * * * somehow overpower the repeated, explicit contract language setting forth the lender's right to demand payment at any time. A bank that wishes to call the Note can specify some future date on which it needs payment as a "due date." Failure to pay at that point in time, as well as failure to make monthly interest payments required by the Note, would constitute default, but the mere use of the terms "due date" or "default" would not alter the nature of the agreement. * * * The language merely reinforces National City's right to collect scheduled monthly interest payments and does not deviate from the structure of a demand note. [Emphasis added.]

For the foregoing reasons, we AFFIRM the district court's grant of National City's motion to dismiss the Reger Development complaint.

QUESTIONS

- In its opinion, the court pointed out that "the duty to act in good faith does not apply to lenders seeking payment on demand notes." Why not?
- If National City had demanded "payment of the line" instead of just indicating that there was a possibility it might do so in the future, would the outcome of this case have been any different? Explain.

PAYABLE AT A DEFINITE TIME If an instrument is not payable on demand, to be negotiable it must be payable at a definite time. An instrument is payable at a definite time if it states that it is payable (1) on a specified date, (2) within a definite period of time (such as thirty days) after being presented for payment, or (3) on a date or time readily ascertainable at the time the promise or order is issued [UCC 3-108(b)]. The maker or drawee is under no obligation to pay until the specified time.

When an instrument is payable by the maker or drawer on or before a stated date, it is clearly payable at a definite time. The maker or drawer has the option of paying before the stated maturity date, but the payee can still rely on payment being made by the maturity date. The option to pay early does not violate the definite-time requirement. For example, John gives Ernesto an instrument dated May 1, 2011, that indicates on its face that it is payable on or before May 1, 2012. This instrument satisfies the definite-time requirement.

In contrast, an instrument that is undated and made payable “one month after date” is clearly nonnegotiable. There is no way to determine the maturity date from the face of the instrument. Whether the time period is a month or a year, if the date is uncertain, the instrument is not payable at a definite time. Thus, an instrument that states, “One year after the death of my grandfather, Jeremy Adams, I promise to pay to the order of Lucy Harmon $5,000. [Signed] Jacqueline Wells,” is nonnegotiable.

ACCELERATION CLAUSE An acceleration clause allows a payee or other holder of a time instrument to demand payment of the entire amount due, with interest, if a certain event occurs, such as a default in payment of an installment when due. (A holder is any person in possession of a negotiable instrument that is payable either to the bearer or to an identified person that is the person in possession [UCC 1-201(20)].)

Assume that Martin lends $1,000 to Ruth, who makes a negotiable note promising to pay $100 per month for eleven months. The note contains an acceleration provision that permits Martin or any holder to immediately demand all the payments plus the interest owed to date if Ruth fails to pay an installment in any given month. If, for example, Ruth fails to make the third payment and Martin accelerates the unpaid balance, the note will be due and payable in full. Ruth will owe Martin the remaining principal plus any unpaid interest to that date.

Under the UCC, instruments that include acceleration clauses are negotiable because (1) the exact value of the instrument can be ascertained and (2) the instrument will be payable on a specified date if the event allowing acceleration does not occur [UCC 3-108(b)(ii)]. Thus, the specified date is the outside limit used to determine the value of the instrument.

In the following case, the question was whether a party entitled to installment payments on a promissory note that contained an acceleration clause waived the right to exercise this provision when the party accepted late payments from the maker.

Foundation Property Investments, LLC v. CTP, LLC

Court of Appeals of Kansas, 37 Kan.App.2d 890, 159 P.3d 1042 (2007).
www.kscourts.org/Cases-and-Opinions/opinions^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In April 2004, CTP, LLC, bought a truck stop in South Hutchinson, Kansas. As part of the deal, CTP borrowed $96,000 from Foundation Property Investments, LLC. The loan was evidenced by a promissory note, which provided that CTP was to make monthly payments of $673.54 between June 1, 2004, and June 1, 2009. The note stated that on default in any payment “the whole amount then unpaid shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder without notice.” CTP paid the first four installments on or before the due dates, but beginning in October 2004, CTP paid the next nine installments late. In July 2005, citing the late payments, Foundation demanded full payment of the note by the end of the month. CTP responded that the parties’ course of dealing permitted payments to be made beyond their due dates. Foundation filed a suit in a Kansas state court against CTP to collect the note’s full amount. CTP asserted that Foundation had waived its right to accelerate the note by its acceptance of late payments. The court determined

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 24.2 CONTINUED ♦ that Foundation was entitled to payment of the note in full, plus interest and attorneys' fees and costs, for a total of $110,975.58, and issued a summary judgment in Foundation's favor. CTP appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

GREEN, J. [Judge]

* * * *

The general rule is that where a [note] contains an acceleration clause relating to default of a required payment, the [holder] is entitled because of such default to enforce the acceleration clause at once according to its terms. * * * However, an acceleration clause may be waived. A waiver is the intentional relinquishment of a known right, and intention may be inferred from conduct. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * Foundation argues that the provisions of the note should be strictly construed against CTP, because it was the drafter of the note. Foundation also points to one of the note's provisions: "Upon default in payment of any interest, or any installment of principal, the whole amount then unpaid shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder without notice." Foundation argues that under this provision, CTP expressly waived demand of payment and notice of nonpayment.

Foundation's arguments afford no basis for saying that it did not waive the condition of prompt payment by routinely accepting late payments. There is no dispute that CTP drafted the note or that the language of the note allowed Foundation to accelerate payment at its option, without notice to CTP. The fact that the note affords Foundation the option to accelerate, however, does not mean that Foundation could not waive the acceleration clause, especially when the note does not contain an anti-waiver provision. Consequently, the question that we must determine is whether Foundation waived the option to accelerate based on its pattern of accepting late payments from CTP.

CTP argues that Foundation's acceptance of late payments over 9 months' time (October 2004–June 2005) established a course of dealing by which late payments would be accepted. Course of dealing is defined [in Kansas Statutes Annotated Section 84-1-205(1), Kansas's version of UCC 1-205(1)] as a "sequence of previous conduct between the parties to a particular transaction which is fairly to be regarded as establishing a common basis of understanding for interpreting their expressions and other conduct." [Emphasis added.]

Foundation alleges that course of dealing cannot be found in the present case because this concept * * * only relates to conduct between the parties that occurs before the agreement in question.

Contrary to Foundation's argument, * * * the course of dealing concept is applicable * * *. Absent an anti-waiver provision in the note or actual notice that future late payments will not be accepted, a previous practice of accepting late payments precludes acceleration of the note.

In the present case, there is nothing in the record to indicate that Foundation ever objected to CTP's late payments before the July 2005 letter stating that Foundation was exercising its option to accelerate payment on the note. Foundation's action of accepting late payments from CTP was inconsistent with its claim or right to receive prompt payments. Accordingly, the trial court incorrectly determined that Foundation's conduct did not constitute a waiver of its right of acceleration.

Foundation, however, suggests that CTP suffered no detrimental reliance because Foundation's delay in accelerating the payment actually benefited CTP: the principal balance was less than it would have been had Foundation exercised the acceleration clause upon any of CTP's previous late payments. Nevertheless, CTP had reasonably relied on Foundation accepting late payments without exercising the acceleration clause. Moreover, CTP will clearly suffer prejudice if forced to now pay the note in full. It would be inequitable to permit Foundation to accelerate the entire note without Foundation first giving notice to CTP that Foundation would no longer accept late payments.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court held that Foundation's acceptance of late payments constituted a waiver of its right to exercise the note's acceleration clause. The appellate court reversed the lower court's ruling and remanded the case with instructions to enter a judgment in CTP's favor.

CASE 24.2 CONTINUED ♦ THE E-COMMERCE DIMENSION • If Foundation had sent CTP an e-mail threatening to accelerate the note each time CTP's payment was late, would this have been sufficient to support the holder's eventual demand for full payment? Why or why not?

THE GLOBAL DIMENSION • Suppose that Foundation was an entity based outside the United States. Could it have successfully claimed, in attempting to enforce the acceleration clause, that it had not given CTP notice because it was not aware of Kansas law? Discuss.

EXTENSION CLAUSE The reverse of an acceleration clause is an extension clause, which allows the date of maturity to be extended into the future [UCC 3-108(b)(iii), (iv)]. To keep the instrument negotiable, the interval of the extension must be specified if the right to extend the time of payment is given to the maker or the drawer of the instrument. If, however, the holder of the instrument can extend the time of payment, the extended maturity date need not be specified.

Suppose that Alek executes a note that reads, "The maker has the right to postpone the time of payment of this note beyond its definite maturity date of January 1, 2012. This extension, however, shall be for no more than a reasonable time." A note with this language is not negotiable because it does not satisfy the definite-time requirement. The right to extend is the maker's, and the maker has not indicated when the note will become due after the extension.

In contrast, suppose that Alek's note reads, "The holder of this note at the date of maturity, January 1, 2012, can extend the time of payment until the following June 1 or later, if the holder so wishes." This note is a negotiable instrument. The length of the extension does not have to be specified because the option to extend is solely that of the holder. After January 1, 2012, the note is, in effect, a demand instrument.

Payable to Order or to Bearer

Because one of the functions of a negotiable instrument is to serve as a substitute for cash, freedom to transfer is essential. To ensure a proper transfer, the instrument must be "payable to order or to bearer" at the time it is issued or first comes into the possession of the holder [UCC 3-104(a)(1)]. An instrument is not negotiable unless it meets this requirement.

ORDER INSTRUMENTS An order instrument is an instrument that is payable (1) "to the order of an identified person" or (2) "to an identified person or order" [UCC 3-109(b)]. An identified person is the person "to whom the instrument is initially payable" as determined by the intent of the maker or drawer [UCC 3-110(a)]. The identified person, in turn, may transfer the instrument to whomever he or she wishes. Thus, the maker or drawer is agreeing to pay either the person specified on the instrument or whomever that person might designate. In this way, the instrument retains its transferability. Suppose that an instrument states, "Payable to the order of James Yung" or "Pay to James Yung or order." Clearly, the maker or drawer has indicated that payment will be made to Yung or to whomever Yung designates. The instrument is negotiable.

Note that in order instruments, the person specified must be identified with certainty because the transfer of an order instrument requires the indorsement, or signature, of the payee. An indorsement is a signature placed on an instrument, such as on the back of a check, generally for the purpose of transferring one's ownership rights in the instrument. Indorsements will be discussed at length in Chapter 25. An order instrument made "Payable to the order of my nicest cousin," for instance, is not negotiable because it does not clearly specify the payee.

BEARER INSTRUMENTS A bearer instrument is an instrument that does not designate a specific payee [UCC 3-109(a)]. The term bearer refers to a person in possession of an instrument that is payable to bearer or indorsed in blank (with a signature only, as will be discussed in Chapter 25) [UCC 1-201(5), 3-109(a), 3-109(c)]. This means that the maker or drawer agrees to pay anyone who presents the instrument for payment. Any instrument containing terms such as the following is a bearer instrument:

1. "Payable to the order of bearer."
2. "Payable to Simon Reed or bearer."
3. "Payable to bearer."
4. "Pay cash."
5. "Pay to the order of cash."

In addition, an instrument that "indicates that it is not payable to an identified person" is a bearer instrument [UCC 3-109(a)(3)]. Thus, an instrument that is “payable to X” can be negotiated as a bearer instrument, as though it were payable to cash. Similarly, an instrument that is “payable to Batman” is negotiable as a bearer instrument because it is obvious that it is payable to a nonexistent person. The UCC does not accept an instrument issued to a nonexistent organization as payable to bearer, however [UCC

3–109, Comment 2]. Therefore, an instrument “payable to the order of the Camrod Company,” if no such company exists, would not be a bearer instrument or an order instrument and, in fact, would not qualify as a negotiable instrument.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 24.1

Requirements for Negotiability

Requirements	Basic Rules
Must Be in Writing UCC 3–103(6), (9)	A writing can be on anything that is readily transferable and that has a degree of permanence.
Must Be Signed by the Maker or Drawer UCC 1–201(39) UCC 3–103(a)(3), (5) UCC 3–401(b) UCC 3–402	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The signature can be anywhere on the face of the instrument. 2. It can be in any form (such as a word, mark, or rubber stamp) that purports to be a signature and authenticates the writing. 3. A signature may be made in a representative capacity.
Must Be a Definite Promise or Order UCC 3–103(a)(6), (9) UCC 3–104(a)	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. A promise must be more than a mere acknowledgment of a debt. 2. The words “I/We promise” or “Pay” meet this criterion.
Must Be Unconditional UCC 3–106	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Payment cannot be expressly conditional on the occurrence of an event. 2. Payment cannot be made subject to or governed by another agreement.
Must Be an Order or Promise to Pay a Fixed Amount UCC 3–104(a) UCC 3–107 UCC 3–112(b)	An amount may be considered a fixed sum even if payable in installments, with a fixed or variable rate of interest, or at a foreign exchange rate.
Must Be Payable in Money UCC 3–104(a)	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Any medium of exchange recognized as the currency of a government is money. 2. The maker or drawer cannot retain the option to pay the instrument in money or something else.
Must Be Payable on Demand or at a Definite Time UCC 3–104(a)(2) UCC 3–108(a), (b), (c)	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Any instrument that is payable on sight, presentment, or issue or that does not state any time for payment is a demand instrument. 2. An instrument is still payable at a definite time, even if it is payable on or before a stated date or within a fixed period after sight or if the drawer or maker has the option to extend the time for a definite period. 3. Acceleration clauses do not affect the negotiability of the instrument.
Must Be Payable to Order or to Bearer UCC 3–104(a)(1) UCC 3–109 UCC 3–110(a)	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. An order instrument must identify the payee with reasonable certainty. 2. An instrument whose terms indicate payment to no particular person is payable to bearer.

FACTORS THAT DO NOT AFFECT NEGOTIABILITY

Certain ambiguities or omissions will not affect the negotiability of an instrument. Article 3's rules for interpreting ambiguous terms include the following:

1. Unless the date of an instrument is necessary to determine a definite time for payment, the fact that an instrument is undated does not affect its negotiability. A typical example is an undated check, which is still negotiable. If a check is not dated, under the UCC its date is the date of its issue, meaning the date on which the drawer first delivers the check to another person to give that person rights on the check [UCC 3-113(b)].
2. Antedating or postdating an instrument does not affect its negotiability [UCC 3-113(a)]. Antedating occurs when a party puts a date on an instrument that precedes the actual calendar date. Postdating occurs when a party puts a date on an instrument that is after the actual date. For example, Crenshaw draws a check on his account at First Bank, payable to Sung Imports. He postdates the check by fifteen days. Sung Imports can immediately negotiate the check, and, unless Crenshaw tells First Bank otherwise, the bank can charge the amount of the check to Crenshaw's account [UCC 4-401(c)].
3. Handwritten terms outweigh typewritten and printed terms (preprinted terms on forms, for example), and typewritten terms outweigh printed terms [UCC 3-114]. For example, your check (like most checks) has printed on it "Pay to the order of" with a blank next to it. In handwriting, you insert in the blank "Anita Delgado or bearer." The handwritten terms will outweigh the printed form (an order instrument), and the check will be a bearer instrument.
4. Words outweigh figures unless the words are ambiguous [UCC 3-114]. This rule becomes important when the numerical amount and the written amount on a check differ. Suppose that Paruzzo issues a check payable to Cheaper Appliance Company. For the amount, she fills in the number "$100" but writes out the words "One thousand and 00/100" dollars. The check is payable in the amount of $1,000.
5. When an instrument simply states "with interest" and does not specify a particular interest rate, the interest rate is the judgment rate of interest (a rate of interest fixed by statute that is applied to a monetary judgment awarded by a court until the judgment is paid or terminated) [UCC 3-112(b)].
6. A check is negotiable even if there is a notation on it stating that it is "nonnegotiable" or "not governed by Article 3." Any other instrument, however, can be made nonnegotiable by the maker's or drawer's conspicuously noting on it that it is "nonnegotiable" or "not governed by Article 3" [UCC 3-104(d)].

REVIEWING

The Function and Creation of Negotiable Instruments

Robert Durbin, a student, borrowed funds from a bank for his education and signed a promissory note for their repayment. The bank lent the funds under a federal program designed to assist students at postsecondary institutions. Under this program, repayment ordinarily begins nine to twelve months after the student borrower fails to carry at least one-half of the normal full-time course load at his or her school. The federal government guarantees that the note will be fully repaid. If the student defaults on the repayment, the lender presents the current balance—principal, interest, and costs—to the government. When the government pays the balance, it becomes the lender, and the borrower owes the government directly. After Durbin defaulted on his note, the government paid the lender the balance due and took possession of the note. Durbin then refused to pay the government, claiming that the government was not the holder of the note. The government filed a suit in a federal district court against Durbin to collect the amount due. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Using the categories discussed in the chapter, what type of negotiable instrument was the note that Durbin signed (an order to pay or a promise to pay)? Explain.

2. Suppose that the note did not state a specific interest rate but instead referred to a statute that established the maximum interest rate for government-guaranteed school loans. Would the note fail to meet the requirements for negotiability in that situation? Why or why not?
3. For the government to be a holder, which method must have been used to transfer the instrument from the bank to the government?
4. Suppose that in court, Durbin argues that because the school closed down before he could finish his education, there was a failure of consideration: he did not get something of value in exchange for his promise to pay. Assuming that the government is a holder of the promissory note, would this argument likely be successful against it? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

24-1. Negotiable Instruments Sabrina Runyan writes the following note on a sheet of paper: "I, the undersigned, do hereby acknowledge that I owe Leo Woo one thousand dollars, with interest, payable out of the proceeds of the sale of my horse, Lightning, next month. Payment is to be made on or before six months from date." Discuss specifically why this is not a negotiable instrument.

24-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Negotiability.

Juan Sanchez writes the following note on the back of an envelope: "I, Juan Sanchez, promise to pay Kathy Martin or bearer $500 on demand." Is this a negotiable instrument?

Discuss fully.

- For a sample answer to Question 24-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

24-3. Promissory Notes A college student, Austin Keynes, wished to purchase a new entertainment system from Friedman Electronics, Inc. Because Keynes did not have the cash to pay for the entertainment system, he offered to sign a note promising to pay $150 per month for the next six months. Friedman Electronics, eager to sell the system to Keynes, agreed to accept the promissory note, which read, "I, Austin Keynes, promise to pay to Friedman Electronics or its order the sum of $150 per month for the next six months." The note was signed by Austin Keynes. About a week later, Friedman Electronics, which was badly in need of cash, signed the back of the note and sold it to the First National Bank of Halston. Give the specific designation of each of the three parties on this note.

24-4. Bearer Instruments Adam's checks are imprinted with the words "Pay to the order of" followed by a blank. Adam fills in an amount on one of the checks and signs it, but he does not write anything in the blank following the "Pay to the order of" language. Adam gives this check to Beth. On another check, Adam writes in the blank “Carl or bearer.” Which, if either, of these checks is a bearer instrument, and why?

24-5. Negotiability In October 1998, Somerset Valley Bank notified Alfred Hauser, president of Hauser Co., that the bank had begun to receive what appeared to be Hauser Co. payroll checks. None of the payees were Hauser Co. employees, however, and Hauser had not written the checks or authorized anyone to sign them on his behalf. Automatic Data Processing, Inc., provided payroll services for Hauser Co. and used a facsimile signature on all its payroll checks. Hauser told the bank not to cash the checks. In early 1999, Robert Triffin, who deals in negotiable instruments, bought eighteen of the checks, totaling more than $8,800, from various check-cashing agencies. The agencies stated that they had cashed the checks expecting the bank to pay them. Each check was payable to a bearer for a fixed amount, on demand, and did not state any undertaking by the person promising payment other than the payment of money. Each check bore a facsimile drawer’s signature stamp identical to Hauser Co.’s authorized stamp. Each check had been returned to an agency marked “stolen check” and stamped “do not present again.” When the bank refused to cash the checks, Triffin filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against Hauser Co. Were the checks negotiable instruments? Why or why not? [Triffin v. Somerset Valley Bank, 343 N.J.Super. 73, 777 A.2d 993 (2001)]

24-6. Negotiability In October 1996, Robert Hildebrandt contracted with Harvey and Nancy Anderson to find a tenant for the Andersons’ used-car lot. The Andersons agreed to pay Hildebrandt “a commission equal in amount to five percent up to first three years of lease.” On December 12, Paramount Automotive, Inc., agreed to lease the premises for three years at $7,500 per month, and the Andersons signed a promissory note, which stated that they would pay Hildebrandt $13,500, plus interest, in consecutive monthly installments of $485 until the total sum was paid. The note contained an acceleration clause. In a separate agreement, Paramount promised to pay $485 of its monthly rent directly to Hildebrandt. Less than a year later, Paramount stopped making payments to all parties. To enforce the note, Hildebrandt filed a suit in an Oregon state court against the Andersons. One issue in the case was whether the note was a negotiable instrument. The Andersons claimed that it was not, because it was not “unconditional,” arguing that their obligation to make payments on the note was conditioned on their receipt of rent from Paramount. Are the Andersons correct? Explain. [Hildebrandt v. Anderson, 180 Or.App. 192, 42 P.3d 355 (2002)]

24-7. Cashier’s Checks In July 1981, Southeast Bank in Miami, Florida, issued five cashier’s checks, totaling $450,000, to five payees, including Roberto Sanchez. Two months later, in Colombia, South America, Sanchez gave the checks to Juan Diaz. In 1991, Southeast failed. Under federal law, notice must be mailed to a failed bank’s depositors, who then have eighteen months to file a claim for their funds. Under an “Assistance Agreement,”

First Union National Bank agreed to assume Southeast’s liability for outstanding cashier’s checks and other items. First Union received funds to pay these items but was required to return the funds if, within eighteen months after Southeast’s closing, payment for any item had not been claimed. In 1996, in Colombia, Diaz gave the five cashier’s checks that he had received from Sanchez to John Acevedo in payment of a debt. In 2001, Acevedo tendered these checks to First Union for payment. Does First Union have to pay? Would it make any difference if the required notice had not been mailed? Why or why not? [Acevedo v. First Union National Bank, 357 F.3d 1244 (11th Cir. 2004)]

24-8. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Negotiability.

 In September 2001, Cory Babcock and Honest Air Conditioning & Heating, Inc., bought a new 2001 Chevrolet Corvette from Cox Chevrolet in Sarasota, Florida. Their retail installment sales contract (RISC) required monthly payments until $52,516.20 was paid. The RISC imposed many other conditions on the buyers and seller with respect to the payment for, and handling of, the Corvette. Cox assigned the RISC to General Motors Acceptance Corp. (GMAC). In August 2002, the buyers sold the car to Florida Auto Brokers, which agreed to pay the balance due on the RISC. The check to GMAC for this amount was dishonored for insufficient funds, however, after the vehicle’s title had been forwarded. GMAC filed a suit in a Florida state court against Honest Air and Babcock, seeking $35,815.26 as damages for breach of contract. The defendants argued that the RISC was a negotiable instrument. A ruling in their favor on this point would reduce any damages due GMAC to less than the Corvette’s current value. What are the requirements for an instrument to be negotiable? Does the RISC qualify? Explain. [General Motors Acceptance Corp. v. Honest Air Conditioning & Heating, Inc., 933 So.2d 34 (Fla.App. 2 Dist. 2006)]

24-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Promissory Notes.

 In November 2000, Monay Jones signed a promissory note in favor of a mortgage company in the amount of $261,250, using the deed to her home in Denver, Colorado, as collateral. Fifth Third Bank soon became the holder of the note. After Jones defaulted on the payment, in September 2001 she and the bank agreed to raise the note’s balance to $280,231.23. She again defaulted. In November, the bank received a check from a third party as payment on Jones’s note. It was the bank’s policy to refuse personal checks in payoff of large debts. The bank representative who worked on Jones’s account noted receipt of the check in the bank’s records and forwarded it to the “payoff department.” A week later, the bank discovered that the check had been lost without having been posted to Jones’s account or submitted for payment. The bank notified Jones, and both parties searched, without success, for a copy of the check or evidence of the identity of its maker, the drawee bank, or the amount. In late 2002, the bank filed a suit in a Colorado state court to foreclose on Jones's home. She insisted that the note had been paid in full by a cashier's check issued by an Arkansas bank at the request of her deceased aunt. [Fifth Third Bank v. Jones, 168 P.3d 1 (Colo.App. 2007)]

- (a) What evidence supports a finding that Jones gave the bank a check? Does it seem more likely that the check was a cashier's check or a personal check? Would it be fair for a court to find that the check had paid the note in full?
- (b) Under UCC 3-310, if a cashier's check or other certified check "is taken for an obligation, the obligation is discharged." The bank argued that it had not "taken [Jones's check] for an obligation" because the bank's internal administrative actions were still pending when the check was lost. Would it be fair for the court to rule in the bank's favor based on this argument? Why or why not?

Transferability and Holder in Due Course

Once issued, a negotiable instrument can be transferred to others by assignment or by negotiation. Recall from Chapter 16 that an assignment is a transfer of rights under a contract. Under contract law principles, a transfer by assignment to an assignee gives the assignee only those rights that the assignor possessed. Any defenses that can be raised against an assignor can normally be raised against the assignee. This same rule applies when a negotiable instrument, such as a promissory note, is transferred by assignment to an assignee: the assignee receives only those rights in the instrument that the assignor had prior to the assignment.

In contrast, when an instrument is transferred by negotiation, the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) provides that the transferee (the person to whom the instrument is transferred) becomes a holder [UCC 3-201(a)]. A holder receives, at the very least, the rights of the previous possessor [UCC 3-203(b), 3-305]. But unlike an assignment, a transfer by negotiation can make it possible for a holder to receive more rights in the instrument than the prior possessor had [UCC 3-305]. A holder who receives greater rights is known as a holder in due course, a concept we discuss in this chapter. First, though, we look at the requirements for negotiation and examine the various types of indorsements that are used when order instruments are negotiated.

SECTION 1 NEGOTIATION

As just described, negotiation is the transfer of an instrument in such form that the transferee becomes a holder. There are two methods of negotiating an instrument so that the receiver becomes a holder. The method used depends on whether the instrument is an order instrument or a bearer instrument.

Negotiating Order Instruments

An order instrument contains the name of a payee capable of indorsing, as in “Pay to the order of Elliot Goodseal.” If an instrument is an order instrument, it is negotiated by delivery with any necessary indorsements (indorsements will be discussed shortly). For example, the Welpac Corporation issues a payroll check “to the order of Elliot Goodseal.” Goodseal takes the check to the bank, signs his name on the back (an indorsement), gives it to the teller (a delivery), and receives cash. Goodseal has negotiated the check to the bank [UCC 3-201(b)].

Negotiating order instruments requires both delivery and indorsement. If Goodseal had taken the check to the bank and delivered it to the teller without signing it, the transfer would not qualify as a negotiation. In that situation, the transfer would be treated as an assignment, and the bank would become an assignee rather than a holder. In fact, whenever a transfer fails to qualify as a negotiation because it fails to meet one or more of the requirements of a negotiable instrument, it is treated as an assignment.

Negotiating Bearer Instruments

If an instrument is payable to bearer, it is negotiated by delivery—that is, by transfer into another person’s possession. Indorsement is not necessary [UCC 3-201(b)]. The use of bearer instruments thus involves a greater risk of loss or theft than the use of order instruments.

Assume that Alonzo Cruz writes a check payable to “cash,” thus creating a bearer instrument. Cruz then hands the check to Blaine Parrington (a delivery). Parrington puts the check in his wallet, which is subsequently stolen. The thief now has possession of the check. At this point, the thief has no rights in the check. If the thief “delivers” the check to an innocent third person, however, negotiation will be complete. All rights to the check will pass absolutely to that third person, and Parrington will lose all right to recover the proceeds of the check from that person [UCC 3–306]. Of course, Parrington can recover his funds from the thief, if the thief can be found.

EXHIBIT 25–1 • A Blank Indorsement

An order instrument indorsed in blank becomes a bearer instrument and can be negotiated by delivery alone [UCC 3–205(b)]. In other words, as will be discussed later, a blank indorsement converts an order instrument to a bearer instrument, which anybody can cash. Suppose that Rita Chou indorses in blank a check payable to her order and then loses it on the street. If Schaefer finds the check, he can sell it to Duncan for value without indorsing it. This constitutes a negotiation because Schaefer has made delivery of a bearer instrument (which was an order instrument until it was indorsed in blank).

SECTION 2 INDORSEMENTS

An indorsement is required whenever an order instrument is negotiated. An indorsement is a signature with or without additional words or statements. It is most often written on the back of the instrument itself. If there is no room on the instrument, the indorsement can be written on a separate piece of paper (called an allonge) that is firmly affixed to the instrument, such as with staples. A paper firmly attached to a negotiable instrument is part of the instrument [UCC 3–204(a)].

A person who transfers a note or a draft by signing (indorsing) it and delivering it to another person is an indorser. The person to whom the check is indorsed and delivered is the indorsee. For example, Luisa Parks receives a graduation check for $100. She can transfer the check to her mother (or to anyone) by signing it on the back. Luisa is an indorser. If Luisa indorses the check by writing “Pay to Avery Parks,” Avery Parks is the indorsee.

Here, we examine four categories of indorsements: blank, special, qualified, and restrictive. Note that a single indorsement may have characteristics of more than one category. In other words, these categories are not mutually exclusive.

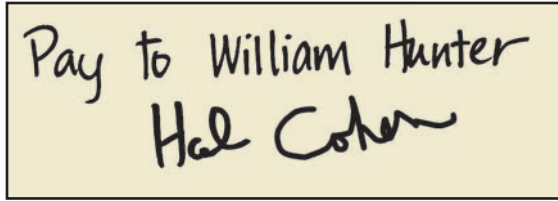

Blank Indorsements

A blank indorsement does not specify a particular indorsee and can consist of a mere signature [UCC 3–205(b)]. Hence, a check payable “to the order of Mark Deitsch” can be indorsed in blank simply by writing Deitsch’s signature on the back

Special Indorsements

A special indorsement contains the signature of the indorser and identifies the person to whom the indorser intends to make the instrument payable; that is, it names the indorsee [UCC 3–205(a)]. For example, words such as “Pay to the order of Russell Clay” or “Pay to Russell Clay,” followed by the signature of the indorser, are sufficient. When an instrument is indorsed in this way, it is an order instrument.

To avoid the risk of loss from theft, a holder may convert a blank indorsement to a special indorsement by writing, above the signature of the indorser, words identifying the indorsee [UCC 3–205(c)]. This changes the bearer instrument back to an order instrument. For example, a check is made payable to Hal Cohen. He signs his name on the back of the check—a blank indorsement—and negotiates the check by delivering it to William Hunter. Hunter is not able to cash the check immediately but wants to avoid any risk should he lose the check. He therefore writes “Pay to William Hunter” above Cohen’s blank indorsement. In this manner, Hunter has converted Cohen’s blank indorsement into a special indorsement. Further negotiation now requires William Hunter’s indorsement, plus delivery. Exhibit 25–2 on the facing page shows a special indorsement.

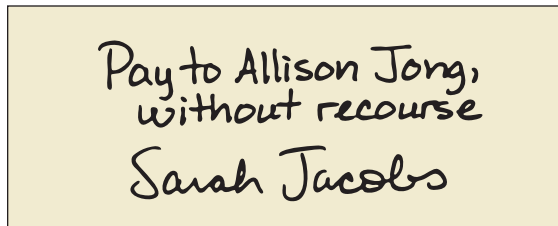

EXHIBIT 25-2 • A Special Indorsement

Qualified Indorsements

Generally, an indorser, merely by indorsing, impliedly promises to pay the holder, or any subsequent indorser, the amount of the instrument in the event that the drawer or maker defaults on the payment [UCC 3-415(a)]. Usually, then, indorsements are unqualified indorsements. In other words, the indorser is guaranteeing payment of the instrument in addition to transferring title to it. An indorser who does not wish to be liable on an instrument can use a qualified indorsement to disclaim this liability [UCC 3-415(b)]. The notation “without recourse” is commonly used to create a qualified indorsement.

Suppose that a check is made payable to the order of Sarah Jacobs. Sarah wants to negotiate the check to Allison Jong but does not want to assume liability for the check’s payment. Sarah could create a qualified indorsement by indorsing the check as follows: “Pay to Allison Jong, without recourse, [signed] Sarah Jacobs” (see Exhibit 25-3 below).

EXHIBIT 25-3 • A Qualified Indorsement

Pay to Allison Jong,

THE EFFECT OF QUALIFIED INDORSEMENTS Qualified indorsements are often used by persons (agents) acting in a representative capacity. For example, insurance agents sometimes receive checks payable to them that are really intended as payment to the insurance company. The agent is merely indorsing the payment through to the insurance company and should not be required to make good on a check if it is later dishonored. The “without recourse” indorsement relieves the agent from any liability on the check. If the instrument is dishonored, the holder cannot recover from the agent who indorsed “without recourse” unless the indorser breached one of the transfer warranties that will be discussed in Chapter 26. These warranties relate to good title, authorized signature, no material alteration, and other requirements.

SPECIAL VERSUS BLANK QUALIFIED INDORSEMENTS

A qualified indorsement (“without recourse”) can be accompanied by either a special indorsement or a blank indorsement. A special qualified indorsement includes the name of the indorsee as well as the words “without recourse,” as shown in Exhibit 25-3 in the left column below. The special indorsement makes the instrument an order instrument, and it requires an indorsement, plus delivery, for negotiation. A blank qualified indorsement (“without recourse, [signed] Jennie Cole”) makes the instrument a bearer instrument, and only delivery is required for negotiation. In either situation, the instrument still transfers title and can be further negotiated.

CASE IN POINT Chester Crow executed a promissory note payable “to the order of The First National Bank of Shreveport or bearer” in the amount of $21,578.42. More than ten years later, Credit Recoveries, Inc., filed a suit alleging that Crow still owed $7,222.57 on the note. Crow responded that Premier Bank, the successor to First National Bank of Shreveport, had canceled the note. Crow also argued that although Credit Recoveries was in possession of the note, it was not listed as the payee and had not proved it owned the note. On the back of the note was the following qualified indorsement: “Pay to the Order of Credit Recoveries, Inc., without recourse [signed, the vice president of] Premier Bank.” The trial court dismissed the case, but the state appellate court held that because the note was made payable to bearer (or to the bank), it was bearer paper and could have been transferred by mere delivery to Credit Recoveries. Any later indorsement did not change the fact that Credit Recoveries had title to, and was a holder of, the note. Credit Recoveries was entitled to present the note as evidence at trial, and the trial court should have admitted it and then allowed Crow to present any defenses he had to payment of the note.¹

At some point after executing the Note and the Deed, Plaintiffs "refused" to continue paying on their obligation under the Note. Defendants then initiated foreclosure proceedings^c on the Property. Defendant Deutsche Bank * * * subsequently purchased the property at the foreclosure sale * * *.

* * * *

Plaintiffs filed their Complaint on September 8, 2009 in the Circuit Court for Fairfax County, Virginia. Defendants then removed the action to this Court and filed motions to dismiss on January 13, 2010 and February 25, 2010, respectively.

Plaintiffs allege that the entities which foreclosed on their home are not entitled as a matter of law to do so. Specifically, Plaintiffs allege that "Defendants have no legal or equitable right or interest in the Promissory Note and/or the Deed of Trust * * *. However, nothing in Plaintiffs' conclusory [convincing, but not definitive] allegations provides a plausible basis for relief after considering the settled law of negotiable instruments or the enforcement of a deed of trust securing notes after their negotiation.

Under Virginia law, the holder of an instrument or a nonholder in possession of the instrument with the same rights as the holder may enforce the instrument. Further, an individual may be "entitled to enforce the instrument even though the person is not the owner of the instrument or is in wrongful possession of the instrument." An individual becomes the "holder" of an instrument through the process of negotiation, and if "an instrument is payable to an identified person, negotiation requires transfer of possession of the instrument and its endorsement by the holder." On the other hand, if an instrument has a blank endorsement, it is considered "payable to bearer," and it may be negotiated by transfer of possession alone. In this case, the face of the Note shows that the Note has a blank endorsement. Accordingly, it may be negotiated by a simple change in possession and enforced by its current possessor, Deutsche Bank. [Emphasis added.]

Further, absent a contrary provision, notes are generally freely transferable, and the transferee retains the right to enforce the instrument. The explicit terms of the Note at issue here indicate that it is freely transferable. ("I understand that the Lender may transfer this Note. The Lender or anyone who takes this Note by transfer and who is entitled to receive payments under this Note is called the Note Holder").

By their own allegations, Plaintiffs admit they "refused to pay" on the Note. * * * To permit the parties to the [instrument] to object to its payment, on any of the grounds stated, would greatly impair the negotiability of bills and notes[,] their most distinguishing, most useful, and most valued feature."

* * * *

Plaintiffs' Complaint fails to state a plausible basis on which relief may be granted. * * * Accordingly, this case is dismissed.

- a. As you will read in Chapter 50, a deed is a document by which real property, or realty, is transferred from one party to another. With a deed of trust, a type of instrument in use in some states, legal title to real property is held by one or more trustees. A deed of trust is used to secure the repayment of funds or to meet some other condition.
- b. An allonge (pronounced uh-lonj) is a piece of paper firmly attached to a negotiable instrument, on which indorsements can be made if there is no room on the instrument.
- c. Mortgages and foreclosure proceedings will be discussed in Chapter 31.

QUESTIONS

1. How do the requirements for negotiation of an instrument with a blank qualified indorsement, as was used in this case, differ from those for negotiation of an instrument with a special qualified indorsement?
2. Suppose that the indorsement at issue in this case had been written on a separate document that was not firmly affixed to the note. Would this document have constituted an allonge? Would Deutsche Bank be entitled to enforce the note? Explain.

Restrictive Indorsements

A restrictive indorsement requires the indorsee to comply with certain instructions regarding the funds involved but does not prohibit further negotiation of the instrument [UCC 3-206(a)]. Although most indorsements are nonrestrictive, many forms of restrictive indorsements exist, including those discussed here.

INDORSEMENTS PROHIBITING FURTHER INDORSEMENT

An indorsement such as “Pay to Julie Diaz only, [signed] Thomas Fasulo” does not destroy negotiability. Diaz can negotiate the paper to a holder just as if it had read “Pay to Julie Diaz, [signed] Thomas Fasulo” [UCC 3-206(a)]. If the holder gives value, this type of restrictive indorsement has the same legal effect as a special indorsement.

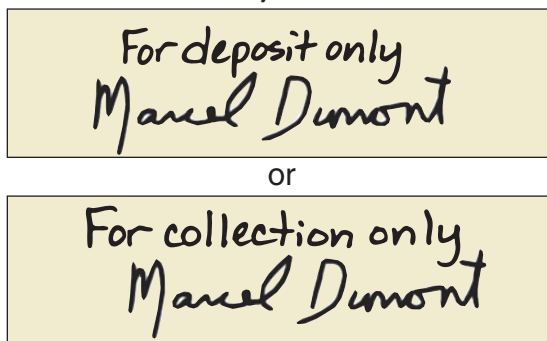

CONDITIONAL INDORSEMENTS When payment depends on the occurrence of some event specified in the indorsement, the instrument has a conditional indorsement [UCC 3-204(a)]. For example, Ken Barton indorses a check as follows: “Pay to Lars Johansen if he completes the renovation of my kitchen by June 1, 2012, [signed] Ken Barton.” Barton has created a conditional indorsement.

Article 3 states that an indorsement conditioning the right to receive payment “does not affect the right of the indorsee to enforce the instrument” [UCC 3-206(b)]. A person paying or taking an instrument for value (taking for value will be discussed later in the chapter) can disregard the condition without liability.

The effect of a conditional indorsement, which appears on the back of an instrument, differs from the effect of conditional language that appears on the face (front) of an instrument. As noted, conditional instruments do not prevent further negotiation. In contrast, an instrument with conditional language on its face is not negotiable, because it does not meet the requirement that a negotiable instrument must contain an unconditional promise to pay.

INDORSEMENTS FOR DEPOSIT OR COLLECTION A common type of restrictive indorsement makes the indorsee (almost always a bank) a collecting agent of the indorser [UCC 3-206(c)]. Exhibit 25-4 (above right) illustrates this type of indorsement on a check payable and issued to Marcel Dumont. In particular, the indorsements “For deposit only” and “For collection only” have the effect of locking the instrument into the bank collection process. Only a bank can acquire the rights of a holder following one of these indorsements until the item has been specially indorsed by a bank to a person who is not a bank [UCC 3-206(c), 4-201(b)]. A bank’s liability for payment of an instrument with a restrictive indorsement of this kind will be discussed in Chapter 27.

TRUST (AGENCY) INDORSEMENTS Indorsements to persons who are to hold or use the funds for the benefit of the indorser or a third party are called trust indorsements (also known as agency indorsements) [UCC 3-206(d), (e)]. For example, Ralph Zimmer asks his accountant, Stephanie Contento, to pay some bills for him while he is out of the country. He indorses a check, drawn by a friend, to Stephanie Contento “as agent for Ralph Zimmer.” This trust (agency) indorsement obligates Contento to use the funds from his friend’s check only for the benefit of Zimmer.

The result of a trust indorsement is that legal rights in the instrument are transferred to the original indorsee. To the extent that the original indorsee pays or applies the proceeds consistently with the indorsement (for example, in an indorsement stating “Pay to Ellen Cook in trust for Roger Callahan”), the indorsee is a holder and can become a holder in due course (a status that will be described shortly). Sample trust (agency) indorsements are shown in Exhibit 25-5.

The fiduciary restrictions—restrictions mandated by a relationship involving trust and loyalty—on the instrument do not reach beyond the original indorsee [UCC 3–206(d), (e)]. Any subsequent purchaser can qualify as a holder in due course unless he or she has actual notice that the instrument was negotiated in breach of a fiduciary duty.

For a synopsis of the various indorsements and the consequences of using each type, see Concept Summary 25.1 below.

How Indorsements Can Convert Order Instruments to Bearer Instruments and Vice Versa

Earlier we saw that order instruments and bearer instruments are negotiated differently. The method used for negotiation depends on the character of the instrument at the time the negotiation takes place. Indorsement can convert an order instrument into a bearer instrument. For example, a check originally payable to “cash” but subsequently indorsed with the words “Pay to Arnold” must be negotiated as an order instrument (by indorsement and delivery), even though it was previously a bearer instrument [UCC 3–205(a)].

As mentioned earlier, an instrument payable to the order of a named payee and indorsed in blank becomes a bearer instrument [UCC 3–205(b)]. For example, a check made payable to the order of Jessie Arnold is issued to Arnold, and Arnold indorses it by signing her name on the back. The instrument, which is now a bearer instrument, can be negotiated by delivery without indorsement. Arnold can negotiate the check to whomever she wishes merely by delivery, and that person can negotiate by delivery

Types of Indorsements and Their Effect

Type of Indorsement	Description	Examples	Legal Effect
Blank Indorsements	Indorser does not identify the person to whom the instrument is payable; can consist of a mere signature.	“Elana Guiterez” “Mark Deitsch”	Creates a bearer instrument, which can be negotiated by delivery alone.
Special Indorsements	Indorser identifies the person to whom the instrument is payable.	“Pay to the order of Russell Clay” “Pay to William Hunter”	Creates an order instrument; negotiation requires indorsement and delivery.
Qualified Indorsements	Indorser includes words indicating that he or she is not guaranteeing or assuming liability for payment.	“Without recourse, Elana Guiterez” (blank qualified indorsement) “Pay to Allison Jong without recourse, Sarah Jacobs” (special qualified indorsement, which creates an order instrument)	Relieves indorser of any liability for payment of the instrument; frequently used by agents or others acting on behalf of another.
Restrictive Indorsements	Indorser includes specific instructions regarding the funds involved or states a condition to the right of the indorsee to receive payment.	“For deposit only” “For collection only” “Pay to Stephanie Contento as agent for Ralph Zimmer” “Pay to Ellen Cook in trust for Roger Callahan”	Only a bank can become a holder of instruments that are indorsed for deposit or collection. In a trust indorsement, the third party agent or trustee has the rights of a holder but has fiduciary duties to use the funds consistently with the indorsement.

without indorsement. If Arnold loses the check after she indorses it, anyone who finds the check can negotiate it further.

Similarly, a bearer instrument can be converted into an order instrument through indorsement. Suppose that Arnold takes the check that she indorsed in blank (now a bearer instrument) and negotiates it, by delivery, to Jonas Tolling. Tolling indorses the check “Pay to Mark Hyatt, [signed] Jonas Tolling.” By adding this special indorsement, Tolling has converted the check into an order instrument. The check can be further negotiated only by indorsement (by Mark Hyatt) and delivery [UCC 3–205(b)]. Exhibit 25–6 below illustrates how an indorsement can convert an order instrument into a bearer instrument and vice versa.

MISCELLANEOUS
INDORSEMENT PROBLEMS

Of course, a significant problem occurs when an indorsement is forged or unauthorized. The UCC rules concerning unauthorized or forged signatures and indorsements will be discussed in Chapter 26 in the context of signature liability. These rules will be examined again in Chapter 27 in the context of the bank’s liability for payment of an instrument containing an unauthorized signature. Here we look at some other difficulties that may arise with indorsements.

Misspelled Names

An indorsement should be identical to the name that appears on the instrument. A payee or indorsee whose name is misspelled can indorse with the misspelled name, the correct name, or both [UCC 3–204(d)]. For example, if Marie Ellison receives a check payable to the order of Mary Ellison, she can indorse the check either “Marie Ellison” or “Mary Ellison.” The usual practice is to indorse with the name as it appears on the instrument followed by the correct name.

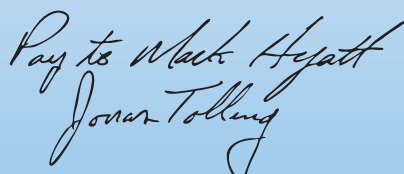

Instruments Payable to Entities

A negotiable instrument can be drawn payable to an entity such as an estate, a partnership, or an organization. In this situation, an authorized representative of the entity can negotiate the instrument. For example, a check may read “Pay to the order of the Red Cross.” An authorized representative of the Red Cross can negotiate this check. Similarly, negotiable paper can be payable to a public officer. For example, checks reading “Pay to the order of the County Tax Collector” or “Pay to the order of Larry White, Receiver of Taxes” can be negotiated by whoever holds the office [UCC 3–110(c)].

Alternative or Joint Payees

An instrument payable to two or more persons in the alternative (for example, “Pay to the order of Ying or Mifflin”) requires the indorsement of only one of the payees [UCC 3-110(d)]. If, however, an instrument is made payable to two or more persons jointly (for example, “Pay to the order of Bridgette and Tony Van Horn”), all of the payees’ indorsements are necessary for negotiation.

EXHIBIT 25-6 • Converting an Order Instrument to a Bearer Instrument and Vice Versa

ALTERNATIVE PAYEES PRESUMED IF THE INSTRUMENT IS AMBIGUOUS If an instrument payable to two or more persons does not clearly indicate whether it is payable in the alternative or payable jointly, then “the instrument is payable to the persons alternatively” [UCC 3-110(d)]. The same principles apply to special indorsements that identify more than one person to whom the indorser intends to make the instrument payable [UCC 3-205(a)].

CASE IN POINT Hyatt Corporation hired Skyscraper Building Maintenance, LLC, to perform maintenance services. Skyscraper asked Hyatt to make checks for the services payable to Skyscraper and J&D Financial Corporation, but two of the checks issued by Hyatt were made payable to “J&D Financial Corp. Skyscraper Building Maint.” Parties listed in this manner—without an “and” or “or” between them—are referred to as stacked payees. The checks were indorsed only by Skyscraper and negotiated by a bank. J&D and Hyatt filed a lawsuit claiming that the checks were payable jointly and thus required indorsement by both payees. The bank argued that the checks were payable to J&D and Skyscraper alternatively. The court found that the bank was not liable. A check payable to stacked payees is ambiguous and thus payable alternatively, with indorsement by only one of the payees, under UCC 3-110(d).²

SUSPENSION OF THE DRAWER’S OBLIGATION When a drawer gives one alternative or joint payee a check, the drawer’s obligation on the check to other payees is suspended [UCC 3-310(b)(1)]. The payee who has possession of the check holds it for the benefit of all of the payees. In other words, the drawer has no obligation to make sure that the funds are allocated or distributed among the joint payees.

CASE IN POINT Vernon and Shirley Graves owned a building that they leased to John and Tamara Johnson for operating a business, Johnson’s Towing & Recovery. The Johnsons insured the property and their business through Westport Insurance Company. When a fire destroyed the building,

Westport Insurance agreed to pay $98,000 in three payments with the checks co-payable to Johnson’s Towing and Vernon Graves. Westport issued two checks, for $30,000 and $29,000, and delivered them to Vernon, who deposited them in his account. A third check was tendered to the Johnsons, but they did not remit the funds to the Graveses, who subsequently filed a lawsuit against the Johnsons and Westport. The court dismissed the lawsuit, holding that the parties had agreed that the insurance company would issue the checks to joint payees and that Westport had complied with this agreement. Once Westport sent the checks to one of the joint payees, its obligation to the other joint payees was suspended until the check was either paid or dishonored.³

SECTION 4 HOLDER IN DUE COURSE (HDC)

One of the important distinctions in the law governing negotiable instruments is that between a holder and a holder in due course (HDC). Often, whether a holder is entitled to obtain payment will depend on whether she or he is an HDC. Here, we first look briefly at the difference between an ordinary holder and an HDC. Then we examine the requirements for HDC status.

Holder versus Holder in Due Course

When an instrument is transferred, an ordinary holder obtains only those rights that the transferor had in the instrument, as mentioned previously. In this respect, a holder has the same status as an assignee (see Chapter 16). Like an assignee, a holder normally is subject to the same defenses that could be asserted against the transferor.

In contrast, a holder in due course (HDC) is a holder who, by meeting certain acquisition requirements (to be discussed shortly), takes an instrument free of most of the defenses and claims that could be asserted against the transferor. Stated another way, an HDC can normally acquire a higher level of immunity than can an ordinary holder in regard to defenses against payment on the instrument or ownership claims to the instrument by other parties.

An example will help to clarify the distinction between the rights of an ordinary holder and the rights of an HDC. Debby Morrison signs a $10,000

2. Hyatt Corp. v. Palm Beach National Bank, 840 So.2d 300 (Fla.App. 2003).

3. Graves v. Johnson, 862 N.E.2d 716 (Ind.App. 2007).

note payable to Alex Jerrod in payment for some ancient Roman coins. Jerrod negotiates the note to Beverly Larson, who promises to pay Jerrod for it in thirty days. During the next month, Larson learns that Jerrod has breached his contract with Morrison by delivering coins that were not from the Roman era, as promised, and for this reason, Morrison will not honor the $10,000 note. Whether Larson can hold Morrison liable on the note depends on whether Larson has met the requirements for HDC status. If Larson has met these requirements and thus has HDC status, she is entitled to payment on the note. If Larson has not met these requirements, she has the status of an ordinary holder, and Morrison's defense against payment to Jerrod will also be effective against Larson.

Requirements for HDC Status

The basic requirements for attaining HDC status are set forth in UCC 3-302. An HDC must first be a holder of a negotiable instrument and must have taken the instrument (1) for value, (2) in good faith, and (3) without notice that it is defective (such as when the instrument is overdue, dishonored, irregular, or incomplete). We now examine each of these requirements.

TAKING FOR VALUE An HDC must have given value for the instrument [UCC 3-302(a)(2)(i), 3-303]. A person who receives an instrument as a gift or inherits it has not met the requirement of value. In these situations, the person normally becomes an ordinary holder and does not possess the rights of an HDC.

Under UCC 3-303(a), a holder takes an instrument for value if the holder has done any of the following:

1. Performed the promise for which the instrument was issued or transferred.
2. Acquired a security interest or other lien in the instrument, excluding a lien obtained by a judicial proceeding (see Chapters 28 and 29).
3. Taken the instrument in payment of, or as security for, an antecedent claim (preexisting obligation). For example, Zon owes Dwyer $2,000 on a past-due account. If Zon negotiates a $2,000 note signed by Gordon to Dwyer and Dwyer accepts it to discharge the overdue account balance, Dwyer has given value for the instrument.
4. Given a negotiable instrument as payment. For example, Martin has issued a $5,000 negotiable promissory note to Paulene. The note is due six months from the date issued. Paulene needs cash and does not want to wait until the maturity date to collect. She negotiates the note to her friend Kristen, who pays $2,000 in cash and writes Paulene a check—a negotiable instrument—for the balance of $3,000. Kristen has given full value for the note by paying $2,000 in cash and issuing Paulene the check for $3,000.

5. Given an irrevocable commitment (such as a letter of credit, described in Chapter 21 on page 416) as payment.

Value Is Distinguishable from Consideration.

The concept of value in the law of negotiable instruments is not the same as the concept of consideration in the law of contracts. Although an executory promise (a promise to give value in the future) is clearly valid consideration to support a contract, it does not constitute sufficient value to make the promisor an HDC.

If a person promises to perform or give value in the future, that person is not an HDC. A holder takes an instrument for value only to the extent that the promise has been performed [UCC 3-303(a)(1)]. Therefore, in the Morrison-Jerrod-Larson example presented earlier Larson is not an HDC because she did not take the instrument (Morrison's note) for value—she has not yet paid Jerrod for the note. Thus, Morrison's defense of breach of contract is valid against Larson as well as against Jerrod. If Larson had paid Jerrod for the note at the time of transfer (given value), she would be an HDC and could have held Morrison liable on the note even though Morrison has a valid defense against Jerrod. Exhibit 25-7 on the following page illustrates these concepts.

Exceptions. In a few situations, the holder may pay for the instrument but does not acquire HDC status. For example, when the instrument is purchased at a judicial sale, such as a bankruptcy or creditor's sale, the holder will not be an HDC. Similarly, if the instrument is acquired as a result of taking over a trust or estate (as administrator), or as part of a corporate purchase of assets, the holder will have only the rights of an ordinary holder [UCC 3-302(c)].

TAKING IN GOOD FAITH The second requirement for HDC status is that the holder must take the instrument in good faith [UCC 3-302(a)(2)(ii)]. This means that the holder must have acted honestly in the process of acquiring the instrument. UCC 3-103(a)(4) defines good faith as “honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing” [UCC 3-103(a)(4)].

EXHIBIT 25-7 • Taking for Value

By exchanging defective goods (coins that were not Roman) for the note, Jerrod breached his contract with Morrison. Morrison could assert this defense if Jerrod presented the note to her for payment. Jerrod exchanged the note for Larson's promise to pay in thirty days, however. Because Larson did not take the note for value, she is not a holder in due course. Thus, Morrison can assert against Larson the defense of Jerrod's breach when Larson submits the note to Morrison for payment. In contrast, if Larson had taken the note for value, Morrison could not assert that defense and would be liable to pay the note.

The good faith requirement applies only to the holder. It is immaterial whether the transferor acted in good faith. Thus, even a person who takes a negotiable instrument from a thief may become an HDC if the person acquired the instrument in good faith and had no reason to be suspicious of the transaction. The purchaser must have honestly believed that the instrument was not defective, however. If a person purchases a $10,000 note for $300 from a stranger on a street corner, the issue of good faith can be raised on the grounds of both the suspicious circumstances and the grossly inadequate consideration (value).

In the following case, the court had to determine whether a check had been accepted in good faith.

CASE 25.2*Georg v. Metro Fixtures Contractors, Inc.

Supreme Court of Colorado, 178 P.3d 1209 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Clinton Georg employed Cassandra Demery as a bookkeeper at his business, Freestyle, until he discovered that she had embezzled more than $200,000 and had failed to pay $240,000 in state and federal taxes owed by Freestyle. Georg fired Demery and said that if she did not repay the embezzled funds, he would notify the authorities. Demery went to work as a bookkeeper for Metro Fixtures, a company owned by her parents. Without authorization, she wrote a check to Freestyle for $189,000 out of Metro's account and deposited it to Freestyle's checking account. She told Georg that the check was a loan to her from her family to enable her to repay him. Georg used the funds to pay his back taxes. Two years later, Metro discovered Demery's theft and sued Georg and Freestyle for conversion (see Chapter 6), as Demery had no authority to take the funds. The trial court held that Freestyle was a holder in due course (HDC) and granted summary judgment. Metro appealed. The appeals court reversed, holding that because Demery had deposited the check directly into Freestyle's account, Freestyle could not have been an HDC, as it never had actual possession of the check. Georg and Freestyle appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

HOBBS, Justice.

* * * *

A check is a negotiable instrument. The holder in due course doctrine is designed to encourage the transfer and usage of checks and facilitate the flow of capital. An entity may qualify as a holder in due course even if the instrument at issue may have passed through the hands of a thief. [Emphasis added.] A holder in due course must meet five conditions: (1) be a holder; (2) of a negotiable instrument who took it; (3) for value; (4) in good faith; (5) without notice of certain problems with the instrument.

To be a holder one must meet two conditions * * * : (1) he or she must have possession (2) of an instrument drawn, issued, or indorsed to him or her. Possession is an element designed to CASE 25.2 CONTINUED ♦ prevent two or more claimants from qualifying as holders who could take free of the other party's claim of ownership. With rare exceptions, those claiming to be holders have physical ownership of the instrument in question.

An otherwise authorized signature on a negotiable instrument is not converted into an unauthorized forgery when an agent, authorized to sign negotiable instruments in his principal's name, abuses that authority by negotiating the instrument to a holder in due course for the agent's own personal benefit.

Section 4-201(a) [of Colorado's UCC statute] states that a collecting bank "is an agent or sub-agent of the owner of the item." Further, the statute states, "This provision applies regardless of the form of indorsement or lack of indorsement * * *." A check payable to a party and deposited in that party's account makes the party the "owner" of the check under the UCC. Further, the [well-known] treatise on the UCC speaks to a collecting bank as an agent for the owner's possession:

Sometimes the one claiming to be a holder in due course will not have possession of the instrument at the time of the suit. When a collecting bank holds the check, the solution is simple for section 4-201 makes that bank the agent of the owner of the check. Under traditional analysis, the agent's possession would be the owner's possession and thus the owner would have "possession."

Thus, there are circumstances wherein requiring actual physical possession of the instrument would be problematic and constructive possession applies. Nevertheless, a determination of constructive possession should occur only when delivery is clearly for an identifiable person under circumstances excluding any other party as a holder in due course. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Colorado's UCC intends to promote reliability on issued instruments, not to undermine their efficacy by placing the burden on the person to whom it is issued to determine a check's validity. Metro's recourse is not against Freestyle, but rather against its agent employee for breaching her fiduciary duty to the company.

Having reviewed the holder in due course elements in light of the undisputed facts of the case, we determine that Freestyle was a holder with constructive possession of a negotiable instrument, which was given for value and taken in good faith without notice of a forgery or an unauthorized signature. Accordingly, we reverse the judgment of the court of appeals and remand with directions that the court of appeals return this case to the district court for entry of judgment in favor of Freestyle.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Colorado Supreme Court reinstated the verdict of the trial court and held that Freestyle had received the check in good faith, not knowing it involved theft. Demery was the wrongdoer in this case, and either Metro or Freestyle would have to absorb the loss. Because Freestyle had no reason to know of the theft and Metro did not take steps to prevent it, the loss should fall on Metro.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that Demery had gone to work for a company with which she had no relationship and had stolen funds from it to pay Georg. Would Georg then be the more innocent party? Why or why not?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Since Georg knew that Demery had previously embezzled funds from Freestyle when she was an employee, shouldn't he have been suspicious about the source of the funds that Demery was using to repay Freestyle? Why did the court conclude that Freestyle acted in good faith in accepting the check?

TAKING WITHOUT NOTICE The final requirement for HDC status concerns notice of defects. A person cannot be an HDC if she or he knows or has reason to know that the instrument is defective in any one of the following ways [UCC 3-302(a)]:

1. It is overdue.

2. It has been dishonored.

3. It is part of a series in which at least one instrument has an uncured (uncorrected) default.

4. The instrument contains an unauthorized signature or has been altered.

5. There is a defense against the instrument or a claim to the instrument.

6. The instrument is so incomplete or irregular as to call into question its authenticity.⁴

A holder will be deemed to have notice if she or he (1) has actual knowledge of the defect; (2) has received a notice of the defect (such as a letter from a bank identifying the serial numbers of stolen bearer instruments); or (3) has reason to know that a defect exists, given all the facts and circumstances known at the time in question [UCC 1–201(25)]. The holder must also have received the notice “at a time and in a manner that gives a reasonable opportunity to act on it” [UCC 3–302(f)]. A purchaser’s knowledge of certain facts, such as insolvency proceedings against the maker or drawer of the instrument, does not constitute notice that the instrument is defective [UCC 3–302(b)].

Overdue Demand Instruments. What constitutes notice that an instrument is overdue depends on whether it is a demand instrument (payable on demand) or a time instrument (payable at a definite time). A purchaser has notice that a demand instrument is overdue if he or she either takes the instrument knowing that demand has been made or takes the instrument an unreasonable length of time after its date. For a check, a “reasonable time” is ninety days after the date of the check. For all other demand instruments, what will be considered a reasonable time depends on the circumstances [UCC 3–304(a)].

Overdue Time Instruments. Normally, a time instrument is overdue on the day after its due date; hence, anyone who takes a time instrument after the due date is on notice that it is overdue [UCC 3–304(b)].⁵ Thus, if a promissory note due on May 15 is purchased on May 16, the purchaser will be an ordinary holder, not an HDC. If an instrument states that it is “Payable in thirty days,” counting begins the day after the instrument is dated. For example, a note dated December 1 that is payable in thirty days is due by midnight on December 31. If the payment date falls on a Sunday or holiday, the instrument is payable on the next business day.

A series of notes issued at the same time with successive maturity dates is overdue when any note in the series is overdue. This serves to notify prospective purchasers that they cannot qualify as HDCs [UCC 3–302(a)(2)(iii)].

If the principal is to be paid in installments, the default or nonpayment of any one installment will make the instrument overdue and provide notice to prospective purchasers of the default. The instrument will remain overdue until the default is cured [UCC 3–304(b)(1)]. An instrument does not become overdue if there is a default on a payment of interest only, however [UCC 3–304(c)]. For this reason, most installment notes provide that any payment shall be applied first to interest and then the balance to the principal. This serves as notice that any installment payment for less than the full amount results in a default on an installment payment toward the principal.

Dishonored Instruments. An instrument is dishonored when the party to whom the instrument is presented refuses to pay it. If a holder knows or has reason to know that an instrument has been dishonored, the holder is on notice and cannot claim HDC status [UCC 3–302(a)(2)]. Thus, a person who takes a check clearly stamped “insufficient funds” is put on notice. Conversely, if a person purchasing an instrument does not know and has no reason to know that it has been dishonored, the person is not put on notice and therefore can become an HDC.

For example, suppose that Gonzalez holds a demand note dated September 1 on Apex, Inc., a local business firm. On September 17, she demands payment, and Apex refuses (that is, dishonors the instrument). On September 22, Gonzalez negotiates the note to Brenner, a purchaser who lives in another state. Brenner does not know, and has no reason to know, that the note has been dishonored. Because Brenner is not put on notice, Brenner can become an HDC.

Notice of Claims or Defenses. A holder cannot become an HDC if he or she has notice of any claim to the instrument or defense against it [UCC 3–302(a)(2)(v), (vi)]. Knowledge of claims or defenses can be imputed (attributed) to the purchaser if these claims or defenses are apparent on the face of the instrument or if the purchaser otherwise had reason to know of them from facts surrounding the transaction.⁶ For example, a potential purchaser who knows

4. Section 302(1)(c) of the unrevised Article 3 provided that HDC protection is lost if a holder has notice that an instrument is overdue or has been dishonored or if there is a claim to or a defense against it.

5. A time instrument also becomes overdue the day after an accelerated due date, unless the purchaser has no reason to know that the due date has been accelerated [UCC 3–302(a)(2)(iii), 3–304(b)(3)].

6. If an instrument contains a statement required by a statute or an administrative rule to the effect that the rights of a holder or transferee are subject to the claims or defenses that the issuer could assert against the original payee, the instrument is negotiable, but there cannot be an HDC of the instrument. See UCC 3–106(d) and the discussion of federal limitations on HDC rights in Chapter 26.

that the maker of a note has breached the underlying contract with the payee cannot thereafter purchase the note as an HDC.

Knowledge of one defense precludes a holder from asserting HDC status in regard to all other defenses. For example, Litton, knowing that the note he has taken has a forged indorsement, presents it to the maker for payment. The maker refuses to pay on the ground of breach of the underlying contract. The maker can assert this defense against Litton even though Litton had no knowledge of the breach, because Litton's knowledge of the forgery alone prevents him from being an HDC in any circumstances.

What steps should a bank take to determine that there are no defenses against the payment of a check? In the following case, a bank phoned the issuer of a cashier's check (a check on which the bank is both the drawer and the drawee—see Chapter 27) to confirm that it was “good,” and the court had to determine whether this was sufficient.

South Central Bank of Daviess County v. Lynnville National Bank

Indiana Court of Appeals, 901 N.E.2d 576 (2009).

COMPANY PROFILE • South Central Bank of Kentucky can trace its beginnings to 1889, when Deposit Bank of Monroe County was chartered. In 1972, James Bale bought Deposit Bank with the goal of providing more banking services to rural Kentucky. Over the next thirty-five years, South Central grew from a single branch with $10 million in assets to a bank holding company composed of five individually chartered banks with more than twenty-six offices across the state and assets of more than $800 million. The organization's motto—“Hometown banking . . . there is a difference”—epitomizes the banks' focus on the needs of the people in the communities they serve.

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Lynnville National Bank in Lynnville, Indiana, issued a cashier's check for $31,917.55 payable to Landmark Housing Center, Inc. The check represented a loan to Bryan and Lisa Fisher to buy a manufactured home. The same day, Landmark deposited the check into its account with South Central Bank of Daviess County in Owensboro, Kentucky. South Central phoned Lynnville and, on confirmation of the date, amount, and payee of the check, paid its entire amount. Two days later, Lynnville learned that Landmark was unable to fulfill its contract with the Fishers. Lynnville then told South Central that payment on the cashier's check would be refused. South Central filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Lynnville, seeking to recover the amount of the check, plus interest and fees. The court entered a summary judgment in the defendant's favor. South Central appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

BAKER, Chief Judge.

* * * *

Indiana Code Section 26-1-3.1-411 [Indiana's version of UCC 3–411] governs situations in which an obligated bank wrongfully refuses to pay a cashier's check.

* * * Only under certain, very specific circumstances is a bank entitled to stop payment on a cashier's check * * *. None of those circumstances occurred in this case. Lynnville's obligation to pay was clear and it was able to pay, but it refused payment on the check as an accommodation to the Fishers, who had no right to make that request.

Lynnville relies on the defense of fraud as its basis for stopping payment on the cashier's check. But * * * Lynnville cannot maintain an action of its own against Landmark for fraud. Lynnville was never a victim of fraud.

* * * *

Moreover, South Central argues that it was a holder in due course (HDC) of the cashier's check, which would further limit the defenses available to Lynnville.

On June 1, when a Landmark representative presented the cashier's check to South Central, South Central took the instrument for value and in good faith. * * * Acting with an abundance of caution, South Central telephoned Lynnville to confirm the date, amount, and payee of the CASE 25.3 CONTINUED ♦ check. Although South Central was not required to do so—and, to be clear, we do not intend to imply that the holder of a cashier's check is required to make such a phone call—that act certainly means that South Central was without notice of any problems with the instrument. Indeed, at that time, Lynnville was without notice of any problems with the instrument. Therefore, when South Central accepted the cashier's check on June 1, it became an HDC.

*Because South Central is an HDC, the only defenses that could be raised by Lynnville are the “real” defenses enumerated by Indiana Code Section 26-1-3.1-305 [UCC 3–305]. * * * None of these defenses apply to Lynnville. [Emphasis added.]*

* * * Landmark's fraud on the Fishers does not automatically spill over to South Central[,] who had absolutely no knowledge of what Landmark did or did not promise the Fishers * * *. There is absolutely nothing in the cashier's check that in any way indicated what type of transaction was involved or what, if anything, had been promised to the Fishers. * * * It could not be clearer that Lynnville was not entitled to stop payment on the cashier's check. It has no valid defense for that action.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court reversed the lower court's judgment and remanded the case for the entry of a judgment in South Central's favor for the amount of the check, plus expenses and interest, and for a determination of consequential damages. South Central took the check without notice of any defense against its payment.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that Landmark had a history of unreliability as a South Central customer. Would South Central's acceptance of the check have then constituted a failure to act reasonably? Explain your answer.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • How would a decision in favor of Lynnville have affected the status of a cashier's check as a substitute for cash?

Incomplete Instruments. A purchaser cannot become an HDC of an instrument so incomplete on its face that an element of negotiability is lacking (for example, the amount is not filled in) [UCC 3–302(a)(1)]. Minor omissions (such as the omission of the date—see Chapter 24) are permissible because these do not call into question the validity of the instrument [UCC 3–113(b)].

Similarly, when a person accepts an instrument that has been completed without knowing that it was incomplete when issued, the person can take it as an HDC [UCC 3–115(b), 3–302(a)(1)]. Even if an instrument that is originally incomplete is later completed in an unauthorized manner, an HDC can still enforce the instrument as completed [UCC 3–407(c)].

To illustrate: Peyton asks Brittany to buy a textbook for him when she goes to the campus bookstore. Peyton writes a check payable to the campus store, leaves the amount blank, and tells Brittany to fill in the price of the textbook. The cost of the textbook is $85. If Brittany fills in the check for $150 before she gets to the bookstore, the bookstore cashier sees only a properly completed instrument.

Therefore, because the bookstore had no notice that the check was incomplete when it was issued, the bookstore can take the check for $150 and become an HDC. (Material alterations will be discussed in Chapter 26.)

Irregular Instruments. Any irregularity on the face of an instrument (such as an obvious forgery or alteration) that calls into question its validity or ownership, or that creates an ambiguity as to the party to pay, will bar HDC status. A difference between the handwriting used in the body of a check and that used in the signature will not in and of itself make an instrument irregular. Antedating or postdating a check or stating the amount in digits but failing to write out the numbers normally will not make a check irregular [UCC 3–113(a)].⁷ Visible evidence that a maker's or drawer's signature is forged,

7. Note that some courts have held that the postdating of a check may raise substantial suspicions about its authenticity, particularly if it is a commercial check. See, for example, Bay Shore Check Cashing Corp. v. Landscapes by North East Construction Corp., 776 N.Y.S.2d 742 (N.Y. Dist. 2004).

however, will disqualify a purchaser from HDC status. Nevertheless, a good forgery of a signature or a careful alteration can go undetected by reasonable examination. In that situation, the purchaser can qualify as an HDC [UCC 3–302(a)(1)].

Losses that result from well-crafted forgeries usually fall on the party to whom the forger transferred the instrument (assuming, of course, that the forger cannot be found). This means that a bank that accepts a check for deposit despite apparent evidence on the check's face that it is irregular will bear the loss if the check later turns out to be forged.

CASE IN POINT First Service Title Agency (FSTA) issued three checks drawn on its account with Key Bank in conjunction with a real estate transaction. The next day, FSTA discovered that the real estate transaction had been fraudulent and put stop-payment orders (see Chapter 27 on page 523) on all three checks. Meanwhile, Randall Davis, who had accounts at Firststar Bank, N.A., but was not a party to any of the checks, presented the checks to Firststar for payment. The checks had multiple indorsements that appeared to be in the same handwriting and were marked “for deposit only.” Without further inquiry, Firststar paid the checks and sent them to Key Bank, which returned the three checks to Firststar with the notation “payment stopped.” Claiming that it was an HDC, Firststar filed a suit against FSTA for failure to pay the checks. The court found that Firststar was not an HDC because the checks were irregular and Firststar had failed to exercise ordinary care to determine if the checks were forged or otherwise deficient before it had paid them. FSTA could, therefore, successfully assert its defenses to Firststar's demand for payment.⁸

HOLDER THROUGH AN HDC

A person who does not qualify as an HDC but who derives his or her title through an HDC can acquire the rights and privileges of an HDC. This rule, which is sometimes called the shelter principle, is set out in UCC 3–203(b):

8. Firststar Bank, N.A. v. First Service Title Agency, Inc., 2004 WL 1906851 (Ohio App. 2004).

Transfer of an instrument, whether or not the transfer is a negotiation, vests in the transferee any right of the transferor to enforce the instrument, including any right as a holder in due course, but the transferee cannot acquire rights of a holder in due course by a transfer, directly or indirectly, from a holder in due course if the transferee engaged in fraud or illegality affecting the instrument.

The Purpose of the Shelter Principle

The shelter principle extends the benefits of HDC status and is designed to aid the HDC in readily disposing of the instrument. Anyone, no matter how far removed from an HDC, who can ultimately trace her or his title back to an HDC comes within the shelter principle. Normally, a person who acquires an instrument from an HDC or from someone with HDC rights receives HDC rights on the legal theory that the transferee of an instrument receives at least the rights that the transferor had. By extending the benefits of HDC status, the shelter principle promotes the marketability and free transferability of negotiable instruments.

Limitations on the Shelter Principle

There are some limitations on the shelter principle. Certain persons who formerly held instruments cannot improve their positions by later reacquiring the instruments from HDCs [UCC 3–203(b)]. If a holder participated in fraud or illegality affecting the instrument, or had notice of a claim or defense against an instrument, that holder is not allowed to improve her or his status by repurchasing the instrument from a later HDC.

To illustrate: Matthew and Carla collaborate to defraud Dina. Dina is induced to give Carla a negotiable note payable to Carla's order. Carla then specially indorses the note for value to Larry, an HDC. Matthew and Carla split the proceeds. Larry negotiates the note to Stuart, another HDC. Stuart then negotiates the note for value to Matthew. Matthew, even though he obtained the note through an HDC, is not a holder through an HDC because he participated in the original fraud and can never acquire HDC rights in this note.

See Concept Summary 25.2 on the following page for a review of the requirements for HDC status.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 25.2

Rules and Requirements for HDC Status

Basic Requirements	Rules
Must Be a Holder	A holder is defined as a person in possession of an instrument “if the instrument is payable to bearer or, in the cases of an instrument payable to an identified person, if the identified person is in possession” [UCC 1–201(20)].
Must Take for Value	A holder gives value by doing any of the following [UCC 3–303]: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Performing the promise for which the instrument was issued or transferred. 2. Acquiring a security interest or other lien in the instrument (other than a lien obtained by a judicial proceeding). 3. Taking the instrument in payment of, or as security for, an antecedent debt. 4. Giving a negotiable instrument as payment. 5. Giving an irrevocable commitment as payment.
Must Take in Good Faith	Good faith is defined for purposes of revised Article 3 as “honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing” [UCC 3–103(a)(4)].
Must Take without Notice	A holder must not be on notice that the instrument is defective in any of the following ways [UCC 3–302, 3–304]: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The instrument is overdue. 2. The instrument has been dishonored. 3. There is an uncured (uncorrected) default with respect to another instrument issued as part of the same series. 4. The instrument contains an unauthorized signature or has been altered. 5. There is a defense against the instrument or a claim to the instrument. 6. The instrument is so irregular or incomplete as to call into question its authenticity.
Shelter Principle—Holder through a Holder in Due Course	A holder who cannot qualify as an HDC has the rights of an HDC if he or she derives title through an HDC [UCC 3–203(b)].

REVIEWING

Transferability and Holder in Due Course

The Brown family owns several companies, including the J. H. Stevedoring Company and Penn Warehousing and Distribution, Inc. Many aspects of the companies’ operations and management are intertwined. Dennis Bishop worked for J. H. and Penn for more than ten years until by 2011, he had become the financial controller at J. H., where he was responsible for approving invoices for payment and reconciling the corporate checkbook. In December 2012, Bishop began stealing from Penn and J. H. by writing checks on the corporate accounts and using the funds for his own benefit (committing the crime of embezzlement). Several members of the Brown family signed the checks for Bishop without hesitation because he was a longtime, trusted employee. Over the next two years, Bishop embezzled $1,209,436, of which $670,632 was used to buy horses from the Fasig-Tipton Company and Fasig-Tipton Midlantic, Inc., with Penn and J. H. checks made payable to those firms. When Bishop’s fraud was revealed, J. H. and Penn filed a suit in a federal district court against the Fasig-Tipton firms (the defendants) to recover the amounts of the checks made payable to them. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What method was most likely used to negotiate the instruments described here?

2. Suppose that all of the checks issued to the defendants were made payable to “Fasig-Tipton Co., Fasig-Tipton Midlantic, Inc.” Under the Uniform Commercial Code, were the instruments payable jointly or in the alternative? Why is this significant?
3. Do the defendants in this situation (the two Fasig-Tipton firms) meet the requirements of an HDC? Why or why not?
4. In whose favor should the court rule, and why?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

25-1. Indorsements A check drawn by Cullen for $500 is made payable to the order of Jordan and issued to Jordan. Jordan owes his landlord $500 in rent and transfers the check to his landlord with the following indorsement: “For rent paid, [signed] Jordan.” Jordan’s landlord has contracted to have Deborah do some landscaping on the property. When Deborah insists on immediate payment, the landlord transfers the check to Deborah without indorsement. Later, to pay for some palm trees purchased from Better-Garden Nursery, Deborah transfers the check with the following indorsement: “Pay to Better-Garden Nursery, without recourse, [signed] Deborah.” Better-Garden Nursery sends the check to its bank indorsed “For deposit only, [signed] Better-Garden Nursery.”

- (a) Classify each of these indorsements.
- (b) Was the transfer from Jordan’s landlord to Deborah, without indorsement, an assignment or a negotiation? Explain.

25-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Holder in Due Course.

Celine issues a ninety-day negotiable promissory note payable to the order of Hayden. The amount of the note is left blank, pending a determination of the amount that Hayden will need to purchase a used car for Celine. Celine authorizes any amount not to exceed $2,000. Hayden, without authority, fills in the note in the amount of $5,000 and thirty days later sells the note to First National Bank of Oklahoma for $4,850. Hayden does not buy the car and leaves the state. First National Bank has no knowledge that the instrument was incomplete when issued or that Hayden had no authority to complete the instrument in the amount of $5,000.

- (a) Does the bank qualify as a holder in due course? If so, for what amount? Explain.
- (b) If Hayden had sold the note to a stranger in a bar for $500, would the stranger qualify as a holder in due course? Explain.

• For a sample answer to Question 25-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

25-3. Holder in Due Course Through negotiation, Emilio has received from dishonest payees two checks with the following histories:

- (a) The drawer issued a check to the payee for $9. The payee cleverly altered the numeral amount on the check from $9 to $90 and the written word from “nine” to “ninety.”
- (b) The drawer issued a check to the payee without filling in the amount. The drawer authorized the payee to fill in the amount for no more than $90. The payee filled in the amount of $900.

Discuss whether Emilio, by giving value to the payees, can qualify as a holder in due course of these checks.

25-4. Negotiation Bertram writes a check for $200 payable to “cash.” He puts the check in his pocket and drives to the bank to cash the check. As he gets out of his car in the bank’s parking lot, the check slips out of his pocket and falls to the pavement. Jerrod walks by moments later, picks up the check, and later that day delivers it to Amber, to whom he owes $200. Amber indorses the check “For deposit only, [signed] Amber Dowel” and deposits it into her checking account. In light of these circumstances, answer the following questions:

- Is the check a bearer instrument or an order instrument?
- Did Jerrod’s delivery of the check to Amber constitute a valid negotiation? Why or why not?
- What type of indorsement did Amber make?
- Does Bertram have a right to recover the $200 from Amber? Explain.

25-5. Alternative or Joint Payees Hartford Mutual Insurance Co. issued a check for $60,150 payable to “Andrew Michael Bogdan, Jr., Crystal Bogdan, Oceanmark Bank FSB, Goodman-Gable-Gould Company.” The check was to pay a claim related to the Bogdans’ commercial property. Besides the Bogdans, the payees were the mortgage holder (Oceanmark) and the insurance agent who adjusted the claim. The Bogdans and the agent indorsed the check and cashed it at Provident Bank of Maryland. Meanwhile, Oceanmark sold the mortgage to Pelican National Bank, which asked Provident to pay it the amount of the check. Provident refused. Pelican filed a suit in a Maryland state court against Provident, arguing that the check had been improperly negotiated. Was this check payable jointly or in the alternative? Whose indorsements were required to cash it? In whose favor should the court rule? Explain. [Pelican National Bank v. Provident Bank of Maryland, 381 Md. 327, 849 A.2d 475 (2004)]

25-6. Holder in Due Course Robert Triffin bought a number of dishonored checks from McCall’s Liquor Corp., Community Check Cashing II, LLC (CCC), and other licensed check-cashing businesses in New Jersey. Seventeen of the checks had been dishonored as counterfeit. In an attempt to recover on the items, Triffin met with the drawer, Automatic Data Processing, Inc. (ADP). At the meeting, Triffin said that he knew the checks were counterfeit. When ADP refused to pay, Triffin filed suits in New Jersey state courts to collect, asserting claims totaling $11,021.33. With each complaint were copies of assignment agreements corresponding to each check. Each agreement stated, among other things, that the seller was a holder in due course (HDC) and had assigned its rights in the check to Triffin. ADP had not previously seen these agreements. A private investigator determined that the forms attached to the McCall’s and CCC checks had not been signed by their sellers but that Triffin had scanned the signatures into his computer and pasted them onto the agreements. ADP claimed fraud. Does Triffin qualify as an HDC? If not, did he acquire the rights of an HDC under the shelter principle? As for the fraud claim, which element of fraud would ADP be least likely to prove? [Triffin v. Automatic Data Processing, Inc., 394 N.J.Super. 237, 926 A.2d 362 (App.Div. 2007)]

25-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Holder in Due Course.

American International Group, Inc. (AIG), an insurance company, issued a check to Jermielem Merriwether in connection with a personal-injury matter. Merriwether presented the check to A-1

Check Cashing Emporium for payment. A-1’s clerk forgot to have Merriwether sign the check. When he could not reach Merriwether and ask him to come back to A-1 to sign the check, the clerk printed Merriwether’s name on the back and deposited the check for collection. When the check was not paid, A-1 sold it to Robert Triffin, who is in the business of buying dishonored checks. When Triffin could not get the check honored, he sued AIG, contending that he, through A-1, had the right to collect on the check as a holder in due course (HDC). The trial court rejected that claim. Triffin appealed. On what basis could he claim HDC status? [Triffin v. American International Group, Inc., ___ A.2d ___ (N.J.Super. 2008)]

25-8. Transfer and Holder in Due Course Germanie Fequiere executed and delivered a promissory note in the principal amount of $240,000 to BNC Mortgage. As security for the note, Fequiere executed and delivered a mortgage on real property. BNC indorsed the promissory note in blank. Several years later, when Fequiere failed to make payments on the note, Chase Home Finance, LLC—the holder in due course of the note and holder of the mortgage—moved to foreclose on the property. In defense, Fequiere asserted that Chase could not foreclose on the property because the mortgage on the property had not been properly transferred from BNC to Chase. Assuming that is true, does it mean that Chase, as holder of the negotiable note, cannot foreclose on the collateral (the property secured by the mortgage)? Explain your answer. [Chase Home Finance, LLC v. Fequiere, 119 Conn.App. 570, 989 A.2d 606 (2010)]

25-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Indorsements.

As an assistant comptroller for Interior Crafts, Inc., in Chicago, Illinois, Todd Leparski was authorized to receive checks from Interior’s customers and deposit the checks into Interior’s account. Between October 2000 and February 2001, Leparski stole more than $500,000 from Interior by indorsing the checks “Interior Crafts—For Deposit Only” but depositing some of them into his own account at Marquette Bank through an automated teller machine owned by Pan American Bank.

Marquette alerted Interior, which was able to recover about $250,000 from Leparski. Interior also recovered $250,000 under its policy with American Insurance Co. To collect the rest of the missing funds, Interior filed a suit in an Illinois state court against Leparski and the banks. The court ruled in favor of Interior, and Pan American appealed to a state intermediate appellate court. [Interior Crafts, Inc. v. Leparski, 366 Ill.App.3d 1148, 853 N.E.2d 1244, 304 Ill.Dec. 878 (3 Dist. 2006)]

- (a) What type of indorsement is “Interior Crafts—For Deposit Only”? What is the obligation of a party that receives a check with this indorsement? Does the fact that Interior authorized Leparski to indorse its checks but not to deposit those checks into his own account absolve Pan American of liability? Explain.
 - (b) From an ethical perspective, how might a business firm such as Interior discourage an employee’s thievery such as Leparski’s acts in this case? Discuss.
- (a) According to the instructor in the video, what are the two reasons why banks generally require a person to indorse a check that is made out to cash (a bearer instrument), even when the check is signed in the presence of the teller?
 - (b) Suppose that your friend makes out a check payable to cash, signs it, and hands it to you. You take the check to your bank and indorse the check with your name and the words “without recourse.” What type of indorsement is this? How does this indorsement affect the bank’s rights?
 - (c) Now suppose that you go to your bank and write a check on your account payable to cash for $500. The teller gives you the cash without asking you to indorse the check. After you leave, the teller slips the check into his pocket. Later, the teller delivers it (without an indorsement) to his friend Carol in payment for a gambling debt. Carol takes your check to her bank, indorses it, and deposits the money. Discuss whether Carol is a holder in due course.

Liability, Defenses, and Discharge

Liability on a negotiable instrument can arise either from a person's signature on the instrument (signature liability) or from the warranties that are implied when the person presents the instrument for negotiation (warranty liability). A person who signs a negotiable instrument is potentially liable for payment of the amount stated on the instrument. Unlike signature liability, warranty liability does not require a signature and extends to both signers and nonsigners. A breach of warranty can occur when the instrument is transferred or presented for payment.

This chapter focuses on the liability of the instrument itself or the warranties connected with the transfer or presentation of the instrument, as opposed to the liability on any underlying contract. Suppose that Donna agrees to buy one thousand Blu-ray discs from Luis and issues a check to Luis in payment. The liability discussed in this chapter does not relate directly to the contract (for instance, whether the Blu-ray discs are of proper quality or fit for the purpose for which they are intended). The liability discussed here is the one in connection with the check (such as what recourse Luis will have if Donna's bank refuses to pay the check due to insufficient funds in her account or her order to stop payment on the check).

The first part of this chapter covers the liability of the parties who sign instruments—for example, drawers of drafts and checks, makers of notes and certificates of deposit, and indorsers. It also covers the liability of accommodation parties and the warranty liability of those who transfer instruments and present instruments for payment.

The chapter then examines the defenses that can be raised to avoid liability on an instrument and the effect that holder in due course (HDC) status has on those defenses. The final section in the chapter looks at some of the ways in which parties can be discharged from liability on negotiable instruments.

SECTION 1 SIGNATURE LIABILITY

The key to liability on a negotiable instrument is a signature. As discussed in Chapter 24 on page 467, the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) broadly defines a signature as any name, word, mark, or symbol executed or adopted by a person with the present intention to authenticate a writing [UCC 1-209(39), 3-401(b)]. A signature can be made manually or by use of any device or machine.

The general rule is that every party, except a qualified indorser,¹ who signs a negotiable instrument is either primarily or secondarily liable for payment of that instrument when it comes due. Signature liability is contractual liability—no person will be held contractually liable for an instrument that he or she has not signed personally or through an authorized representative (agent) [UCC 3-401(a)]. The following subsections discuss primary and secondary liability, as well as the conditions that must be met before liability can arise.

Primary Liability

A person who is primarily liable on a negotiable instrument is absolutely required to pay the instrument—unless, of course, he or she has a valid defense to payment. Liability is immediate when the instrument is signed or issued. No action by the holder of the instrument is required. Only makers and acceptors of instruments are primarily liable [UCC 3-412, 3-413].

1. A qualified indorser—one who indorses “without recourse”—undertakes no obligation to pay [UCC 3-415(b)]. A qualified indorser merely assumes warranty liability, which will be discussed later in this chapter.

MAKERS The maker of a promissory note unconditionally promises to pay the note according to its terms. It is the maker's promise to pay that renders the instrument negotiable. If the instrument was incomplete when the maker signed it, the maker is obligated to pay it according to either its stated terms or terms that were agreed on and later filled in to complete the instrument [UCC 3-115, 3-407, 3-412].

For example, Tristan executes a preprinted promissory note to Sharon, without filling in the due-date blank. If Sharon does not complete the form by adding the date, the note will be payable on demand. If Sharon subsequently writes in a due date that Tristan authorized, the note is payable on the stated due date. In either situation, Tristan (the maker) is obligated to pay the note. (Note that if Sharon fills in a date that Tristan did not authorize, Tristan can claim a defense to payment—material alteration, which will be discussed later in this chapter.)

ACCEPTORS An acceptor is a drawee who promises to pay an instrument when it is presented later for payment, as mentioned in Chapter 24. Once a drawee accepts a draft (usually by writing “accepted” across its face and signing it), the drawee becomes an acceptor and is obligated to pay the draft when it is presented for payment [UCC 3-409(a)]. The drawee's acceptance is a promise to pay that places the drawee in almost the same position as the maker of a promissory note [UCC 3-413]. Failure to pay an accepted draft when presented leads to primary signature liability for the drawee-acceptor.

Acceptance of a check is called certification, as will be discussed in Chapter 27. Certification is not necessary on checks, and a bank is under no obligation to certify checks. If it does certify a check, however, the drawee bank occupies the position of an acceptor and is primarily liable on the check to any holder [UCC 3-409(d)].

Secondary Liability

Drawers and indorsers are secondarily liable. On a negotiable instrument, secondary liability is similar to the liability of a guarantor in a simple contract (described in Chapter 28) in the sense that it is contingent liability. In other words, a drawer or an indorser will be liable only if the party that is primarily responsible for paying the instrument refuses to do so—that is, dishonors the instrument. On drafts and checks, a drawer's secondary liability does not arise until the drawee fails to pay or to accept the instrument, whichever is required. With regard to promissory notes, an indorser's secondary liability does not arise until the maker, who is primarily liable, has defaulted on the instrument [UCC 3-412, 3-415].

Thus, dishonor of an instrument triggers the liability of parties who are secondarily liable on the instrument—that is, the drawer and unqualified indorsers. For example, Lee writes a check for $1,000 on her account at Western Bank payable to the order of Carerra. Carerra indorses and delivers the check, for value, to Deere. Deere deposits the check into his account at Universal Bank, but the bank returns the check to Deere marked “insufficient funds,” thus dishonoring the check. The question for Deere is whether the drawer (Lee) or the drawee-indorser (Carerra) can be held liable on the check after the bank has dishonored it. The answer to the question depends on whether certain conditions for secondary liability have been satisfied.

1. The instrument is properly and timely presented.
2. The instrument is dishonored.
3. Timely notice of dishonor is given to the secondarily liable party.³

PROPER PRESENTMENT As discussed in Chapter 24, presentment occurs when a person presents an instrument either to the party liable on the instrument for payment or to a drawee for acceptance. The UCC requires that a holder present the instrument to the appropriate party, in a timely fashion, and give reasonable identification if requested [UCC 3-414(f), 3-415(e), 3-501]. The party to whom the instrument must be presented depends on the type of instrument involved. A note or certificate of deposit (CD) must be presented to the maker for payment. A draft is presented to the drawee for acceptance, payment, or both. A check is presented to the drawee (bank) for payment [UCC 3-501(a), 3-502(b)].

Presentment can be made by any commercially reasonable means, including oral, written, or electronic communication [UCC 3-501(b)]. It is ordinarily effective when the demand for payment or

2. An instrument can be drafted to include a waiver of the presentment and notice of dishonor requirements [UCC 3-504]. Presume, for simplicity's sake, that such waivers have not been incorporated into the instruments described in this chapter.
3. Note that these requirements are necessary for a secondarily liable party to have signature liability on a negotiable instrument, but they are not necessary for a secondarily liable party to have warranty liability (to be discussed later in this chapter).

acceptance is received (unless presentment takes place after an established cutoff hour, in which case it may be treated as occurring on the next business day).

TIMELY PRESENTMENT Timeliness is important for proper presentment [UCC 3-414(f), 3-415(e), 3-501(b)(4)]. Failure to present an instrument on time is a common reason for improper presentment and can lead to unqualified indorsers being discharged from secondary liability. A reasonable time for presentment is determined by the nature of the instrument, any usage of banking or trade, and the facts of the particular case.

If the instrument is payable on demand, the holder should present it for payment or acceptance within a reasonable time. For domestic, uncertified checks, the UCC establishes a presumptively reasonable time period [UCC 3-414(f), 3-415(e)]. An ordinary check should be presented for payment within thirty days of its date or the date that it was indorsed. A drawer is not automatically discharged from liability for checks presented after thirty days, but the holder must be able to prove that the presentment after that time was reasonable.⁴

The time for proper presentment for different types of instruments is shown in Exhibit 26-1 below.

DISHONOR As mentioned previously, an instrument is dishonored when payment or acceptance of the instrument is refused or cannot be obtained within the prescribed time. An instrument is also dishonored when the required presentment is excused (as it would be, for example, if the maker had died) and the instrument is not properly accepted or paid [UCC 3-502(e), 3-504].

4. For a seminal case in which a state's highest court held that presentment more than thirty days after the date of an uncertified check did not discharge the liability of the drawer, see Grist v. Osgood, 90 Nev. 165, 521 P.2d 368 (1974).

In certain situations, a delay in payment or a refusal to pay an instrument will not dishonor the instrument. When presentment is made after an established cutoff hour (not earlier than 2:00 P.M.), for instance, a bank can postpone payment until the following business day without dishonoring the instrument [UCC 3-501(b)(4)]. In addition, when the holder refuses to exhibit the instrument, to give reasonable identification, or to sign a receipt for the payment on the instrument, a bank's refusal to pay does not dishonor the instrument [UCC 3-501(b)(2)]. Returning an instrument because it lacks a proper indorsement also is not a dishonor [UCC 3-501(b)(3)(i)].

PROPER NOTICE Once an instrument has been dishonored, proper notice must be given to secondary parties (drawers and indorsers) for them to be held liable. Notice may be given in any reasonable manner, including an oral, written, or electronic communication, as well as notice written or stamped on the instrument itself [UCC 3-503(b)].⁵ If the party giving notice is a bank, it must give any necessary notice before its midnight deadline (midnight of the next banking day after receipt) [UCC 3-503(c)]. Notice by any party other than a bank must be given within thirty days following the day of dishonor or the day on which the person who is secondarily liable received notice of dishonor [UCC 3-503(c)].

Accommodation Parties

An accommodation party is one who signs an instrument for the purpose of lending his or her name as credit to another party on the instrument [UCC 3-419(a)]. Requiring an accommodation party

5. Written notice is preferable because a secondary party may claim that an oral notice was never received. Also, to give proper notice of the dishonor of a foreign draft (a draft drawn in one country and payable in another country), a formal notice called a protest is required [UCC 3-505(b)].

EXHIBIT 26-1 • Time for Proper Presentment

TYPE OF INSTRUMENT	FOR ACCEPTANCE	FOR PAYMENT
Time	On or before due date.	On due date.
Demand	Within a reasonable time (after date of issue or after secondary party becomes liable on the instrument).	Within a reasonable time.
Check	Not applicable.	Within thirty days of its date, to hold drawer secondarily liable. Within thirty days of indorsement, to hold indorser secondarily liable.

is one way to secure against nonpayment of a negotiable instrument. When a person (such as a parent) cosigns a promissory note with the maker (such as the parent's son or daughter), the cosigner is an accommodation party, and the maker is the accommodated party.

If the accommodation party signs on behalf of the maker, he or she is an accommodation maker and is primarily liable on the instrument. For example, if Alex takes out a loan to purchase a car and his uncle cosigns the note, the uncle becomes primarily liable on the instrument. In other words, Alex's uncle is guaranteeing payment, and the bank can seek payment directly from the uncle.

If, however, the accommodation party signs on behalf of a payee or other holder (usually to make the instrument more marketable), she or he is an accommodation indorser and, as an indorser, is secondarily liable. For example, suppose that Frank Huston applies to Northeast Bank for a $20,000 loan to start a small business. Huston's lender (who has possession of the note) has Finch Smith, who has invested in Huston's business, sign the note. In this situation, Smith is an indorser, and his liability is secondary—that is, the lender must pursue Huston first before seeking payment from Smith. If Smith ends up paying the amount due on the note, he has a right to reimbursement from Huston (the accommodated party) [UCC 3-419(e)].

Authorized Agents' Signatures

The general law of agency, covered in Chapters 32 and 33, applies to negotiable instruments. Questions often arise as to the liability on an instrument signed by an agent. An agent is a person who agrees to represent or act for another, called the principal. Agents can sign negotiable instruments, just as they can sign contracts, and thereby bind their principals [UCC 3-401(a)(ii), 3-402(a)]. Without such a rule, all corporate commercial business would stop, as every corporation can and must act through its agents. Certain requirements must be met, however, before the principal becomes liable on the instrument. A basic requirement to hold the principal liable on the instrument is that the agent must be authorized to sign the instrument on the principal's behalf.

LIABILITY OF THE PRINCIPAL Generally, an authorized agent binds a principal on an instrument if the agent clearly names the principal in the signature (by writing, mark, or some symbol). In this situation, the UCC presumes that the signature is authorized and genuine [UCC 3-308(a)]. The agent may or may not add his or her own name, but if the signature shows clearly that it is made on behalf of a specific principal, the agent is not liable on the instrument [UCC 3-402(b)(1)].

For example, either of the following signatures by Sandra Binney as agent for Bob Aronson will bind Aronson on the instrument:

1. Aronson, by Binney, agent.
2. Aronson.

If Binney (the agent) signs just her own name, however, she will be personally liable to a holder in due course (HDC) who has no notice of her agency status. An agent can escape liability to ordinary holders if the agent proves that the original parties did not intend the agent to be liable on the instrument [UCC 3-402(a), (b)(2)].⁶ In either situation, the principal is bound if the party entitled to enforce the instrument can prove the agency relationship.

LIABILITY OF THE AGENT An authorized agent may be held personally liable on a negotiable instrument in three situations. First, as noted above, if the agent signed the agent's own name on the instrument with no indication that she or he was signing as an agent, an HDC can hold the agent personally liable. Second, an agent may be liable if the agent signed in both the agent's name and the principal's name but nothing on the instrument indicated the agency relationship. For example, if Binney signs the instrument "Sandra Binney, Bob Aronson" or "Aronson, Binney," she may be held personally liable because it is not clear that there is an agency relationship.

CASE IN POINT Hugh Caraway was the president of Internacional Realty, Inc. When Internacional hired Land Design Studio to landscape an apartment complex, Caraway signed a promissory note as "Hugh Caraway, Internacional Realty, Inc." When Internacional did not make any payments on the note, Land Design filed a suit against both Caraway and Internacional. Caraway claimed that he had signed the note as an agent and should not be personally liable for the debt. The court ruled that Caraway was personally liable on the note because there was no indication that he was signing as an agent for Internacional.⁷

The third situation in which an agent may be liable is when the agent indicates agency status in signing a negotiable instrument but fails to name the principal (for example, "Sandra Binney, agent")

6. See UCC 3-402, Comment 1.

7. Caraway v. Land Design Studio, 47 S.W.3d 696 (Tex.App.—Austin 2001).

[UCC 3–402(b)(2)]. Obviously, to protect against potential liability, an authorized agent should disclose on the instrument the identity of the principal and also indicate that the agent is signing in a representative capacity.

CHECKS SIGNED BY AGENTS An important exception to the rules on agent liability is made for checks that are signed by agents. If an agent signs his or her own name on a check that is payable from the account of the principal, and the principal is identified on the check, the agent will not be personally liable on the check [UCC 3–402(c)]. Suppose that Binney, who is authorized to draw checks on Aronson Company's account, signs a check that is preprinted with Aronson Company's name. The signature reads simply "Sandra Binney." In this situation, Binney will not be personally liable on the check.

The following case illustrates the rule for determining liability when an agent signs his own name to a check that is preprinted with the name of the principal.

Jeanmarie v. Peoples

Court of Appeal of Louisiana, Fourth Circuit, 34 So.3d 945 (2010).
www.la4th.org/caseSearch.aspx^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • On August 26, 2005, Anthony and Alcibia Jeanmarie sold property located in New Orleans to Melanie Murray. As part of the transaction, Encore Credit Corporation provided two loans to Murray, for $104,000 and $26,000. Murray secured each loan with a mortgage (mortgages will be discussed in Chapter 31) in favor of Encore. Mark Peoples, through his company, Pyramid Title, LLC, handled the closing of the sale. At the closing, a check was drawn on the Pyramid escrow account^b in the sum of $110,303.86, payable to the Jeanmaries. The Jeanmaries deposited the check in their account, but two days later the check was returned because there were insufficient funds in Pyramid's escrow account to cover the check. Peoples stated that one of the reasons for the shortage of funds in the escrow account was that Encore Credit had not "timely funded" the $26,000 loan, which would normally be in the account. The Jeanmaries filed an action in a Louisiana state court, seeking payment from both Pyramid Title, LLC, and Peoples personally. Peoples contended that he should not be held liable because he had signed the Pyramid check to the Jeanmaries in his representative capacity. The trial court held for the Jeanmaries, and Peoples and Pyramid submitted a motion for a new trial. When the trial court denied that motion, Peoples and Pyramid appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Joan Bernard ARMSTRONG, Chief Judge.

* * * *

The record contains an undisputed copy of the check in question. It bears the title, "Pyramid Title LLC Escrow Account." Mr. Peoples does not contest the fact that the check bears his signature upon the line entitled "Authorized Signature." [Louisiana's equivalent to UCC 3–402] concerning signatures affixed in a representative capacity provides as follows:

§ 3–402. Signature by representative

* * * *

(c) If a representative signs the name of the representative as drawer of a check without indication of the representative status and the check is payable from an account of the represented person who is identified on the check, the signer is not liable on the check if the signature is an authorized signature of the represented person. [Emphasis added.]

The Louisiana court system maintains this Web site.
- Until a sale of real property, or real estate, is finalized (closed), funds paid by the buyer to the seller, such as a down payment, as well as funds to be paid to the seller by a financing institution, are typically held in an escrow account. The concept of escrow and the utilization of escrow accounts in the sale of real property will be discussed in Chapter 50.

CASE 26.1 CONTINUED ♦ Comment No. 3 of the Uniform Commercial Code found under [Louisiana’s equivalent to UCC 3–402] shows that [the section] quoted above is the paragraph applicable to the fact situation found in the instant case:

3. Subsection (c) * * * states that if the check identifies the represented person, the agent who signs on the signature line does not have to indicate agency status. Virtually all checks used today are in personalized form that identify the person on whose account the check is drawn. In this case, nobody is deceived into thinking that the person signing the check is meant to be liable.

In the instant case, the check clearly identifies the represented person at the top in boldface and a large font as Pyramid Title LLC * * *.

The signature line is entitled, “AUTHORIZED SIGNATURE,” a designation not typically found on personal checks. It is patent [obvious] on the face of the check that Mark Peoples signed as the authorized signatory for Pyramid Title and not in his personal capacity * * *. There is nothing subtle, obscure or ambiguous about this.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Louisiana appellate court held that it was clear from the face of the instrument that Peoples had signed the check in his representative capacity and thus was not personally liable on the instrument. The court vacated the trial court’s ruling on this issue and remanded the case for further proceedings consistent with its opinion.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the name Pyramid Title, LLC, had not been included on the face of the check. Would Peoples have been personally liable for payment of the check in that situation? Why or why not?

THE ECONOMIC DIMENSION • Should Encore Credit Corporation’s failure to “timely fund” the $26,000 loan be taken into consideration by the court when determining whether Peoples could be held personally liable on the check to the Jeanmaries? Discuss fully.

Unauthorized Signatures

Unauthorized signatures arise in two situations—when a person forges another person’s name on a negotiable instrument and when an agent who lacks the authority signs an instrument on behalf of a principal. The general rule is that an unauthorized signature is wholly inoperative and will not bind the person whose name is signed or forged. Suppose that Pablo finds Veronica’s checkbook lying on the street, writes out a check to himself, and forges Veronica’s signature. If a bank negligently fails to ascertain that Veronica’s signature is not genuine and cashes the check for Pablo, the bank generally will be liable to Veronica for the amount. (The liability of banks for paying instruments with forged signatures will be discussed further in Chapter 27.)

Similarly, if an agent lacks the authority to sign the principal’s name or has exceeded the authority given by the principal, the signature does not bind the principal but will bind the “unauthorized signer” [UCC 3–403(a)]. For example, Maya Campbell is the principal, and Lena Shem is her agent. Shem, without authority, signs a promissory note as follows: “Maya Campbell, by Lena Shem, agent.” Because Maya Campbell’s “signature” is unauthorized, Campbell cannot be held liable, but Shem is liable to a holder of the note. This would be true even if Shem had signed the note “Maya Campbell,” without indicating any agency relationship. In either situation, the unauthorized signer, Shem, is liable on the instrument.

EXCEPTIONS TO THE GENERAL RULE There are two exceptions to the general rule that an unauthorized signature will not bind the person whose name is signed:

1. When the person whose name is signed ratifies (affirms) the signature, he or she will be bound [UCC 3–403(a)]. The parties involved need not be principal and agent. For example, a mother may ratify her daughter’s forgery of the mother’s signature so that the daughter will not be prosecuted for forgery. A person can ratify an unauthorized signature either expressly (by affirming the validity of the signature) or impliedly (by other conduct, such as keeping any benefits received in the transaction or failing to repudiate the signature).
2. When the negligence of the person whose name was forged substantially contributed to the forgery, a court may not allow the person to deny the effectiveness of an unauthorized signature [UCC 3–115, 3–406, 4–401(d)(2)]. For example, Rob, the owner of a business, leaves his signature stamp and a blank check on an office counter. An employee uses the stamp to fill in the check and cashes it. Rob can be estopped (prevented), on the basis of his negligence, from denying liability for payment of the check. Whatever loss occurs, however, may be allocated between certain parties on the basis of comparative negligence [UCC 3-406(b)]. If Rob, in this example, can demonstrate that the bank was negligent in paying the check, a court may require the bank to bear a portion of the loss. (The liability of the parties in this type of situation will be discussed further in Chapter 27.)

WHEN THE HOLDER IS A HOLDER IN DUE COURSE A person who forges a check or signs an instrument without authorization can be held personally liable for payment by a holder in due course, or HDC [UCC 3-403(a)]. This is true even if the name of the person signing the instrument without authorization does not appear on the instrument. For example, if Michel Vuillard signs “Paul Richman” without Richman’s authorization, Vuillard is personally liable just as if he had signed his own name. Vuillard’s liability is limited, however, to persons who in good faith pay the instrument or take it for value. A holder who knew the signature was unauthorized would not qualify as an HDC (because of the good faith requirement) and thus could not recover from Vuillard on the instrument. (The defenses that are effective against ordinary holders versus HDCs will be discussed in detail later in this chapter.)

Special Rules for Unauthorized Indorsements

Generally, when an indorsement is forged or unauthorized, the burden of loss falls on the first party to take the instrument with the forged or unauthorized indorsement. The reason for this general rule is that the first party to take an instrument is in the best position to prevent the loss.

For example, Jenny Nilson steals a check drawn on Universal Bank and payable to the order of Inga Leed. Nilson indorses the check “Inga Leed” and presents the check to Universal Bank for payment. The bank, without asking Nilson for identification, pays the check, and Nilson disappears. In this situation, Leed will not be liable on the check, because her indorsement was forged. The bank will bear the loss, which it might have avoided if it had requested identification from Nilson.

This general rule has two important exceptions. These exceptions arise when an indorsement is made by an imposter or by a fictitious payee.

IMPOSTERS An imposter is one who, by her or his personal appearance or use of the mails, Internet, telephone, or other communication, induces a maker or drawer to issue an instrument in the name of an impersonated payee. If the maker or drawer believes the imposter to be the named payee at the time of issue, the indorsement by the imposter is not treated as unauthorized when the instrument is transferred to an innocent party. This is because the maker or drawer intended the imposter to receive the instrument. In this situation, under the UCC’s imposter rule, the imposter’s indorsement will be effective—that is, not considered a forgery—insofar as the drawer or maker is concerned [UCC 3-404(a)].

The comparative negligence standard mentioned previously also applies to situations involving imposters [UCC 3-404(d)]. Thus, if a bank fails to exercise ordinary care in cashing a check made out to an imposter, the drawer may be able to recover a portion of the loss from the bank.

CASE IN POINT Jennifer Pennington was an employee at Cablecast. Part of her job was to indorse checks that her employer received in the mail with the Cablecast deposit stamp, prepare the deposit slip, and take the checks to be deposited at City National Bank. On discovering that Pennington had deposited checks payable to Cablecast into her personal account at Premier Bank, Cablecast filed a suit against Premier, claiming that the bank had failed to act in good faith and to exercise ordinary care in handling the checks. The court ruled that there was no evidence that the bank had not acted in good faith. Pennington had represented that she was doing business as Cablecast, and the bank had no reason to doubt her statements or suspect her of wrongdoing. The bank had also observed commercially reasonable standards in its handling of the checks, so it was not negligent. Therefore, the court held that the employer, not the bank, would bear the loss because it was in the best position to prevent the unauthorized indorsement.⁸

FICTITIOUS PAYEES When a person causes an instrument to be issued to a payee who will have no interest in the instrument, the payee is referred to as a fictitious payee. A fictitious payee can be a person or firm that does not truly exist, or it may be an identifiable party that will not acquire any interest in the instrument. Under the UCC’s fictitious payee rule, the payee's indorsement is not treated as a forgery, and an innocent holder can hold the maker or drawer liable on the instrument [UCC 3-404(b), 3-405].

8. Cablecast Magazine v. Premier Bank, N.A., 729 So.2d 1165 (La. App. 1 Cir. 1999).

Situations involving fictitious payees most often arise when (1) a dishonest employee deceives the employer into signing an instrument payable to a party with no right to receive payment on the instrument or (2) a dishonest employee or agent has the authority to issue an instrument on behalf of the employer and issues a check to a party who has no interest in the instrument.

How a Fictitious Payee Can Be Created—An Example. Assume that Goldstar Aviation, Inc., gives its bookkeeper, Leslie Rose, general authority to issue company checks drawn on First State Bank so that Rose can pay employees' wages and other corporate bills. Rose decides to cheat Goldstar out of $10,000 by issuing a check payable to the Del Rey Company, a supplier of aircraft parts. Rose does not intend Del Rey to receive any of the funds, nor is Del Rey entitled to the payment. Rose indorses the check in Del Rey's name and deposits the check in an account that she opened in West National Bank in the name "Del Rey Co." West National Bank accepts the check and collects payment from the drawee bank, First State Bank. First State Bank charges Goldstar's account $10,000. Rose transfers $10,000 out of the Del Rey account and closes the account. Goldstar discovers the fraud and demands that the account be recredited.

Who Bears the Loss? According to the UCC's fictitious payee rule, Rose's indorsement in the name of a payee with no interest in the instrument is "effective," so there is no "forgery" [UCC 3-404(b) (2)]. Under this provision, West National Bank is protected in paying on the check, and the drawee bank is protected in charging Goldstar's account. Thus, the employer-drawer, Goldstar, will bear the loss. Of course, Goldstar has recourse against Rose, if she has not absconded with the funds. Additionally, if Goldstar can prove that West National Bank's failure to exercise reasonable care contributed substantially to the loss, the bank may be required to bear a proportionate share of the loss under the UCC's comparative negligence standard [UCC 3-404(d)]. Thus, West National Bank could be liable for a portion of the loss if it failed to exercise ordinary care in its dealings with Rose.

Regardless of whether a dishonest employee actually signs the check or merely supplies his or her employer with names of fictitious creditors (or with true names of creditors having fictitious debts), the result is the same under the UCC. Suppose that Dan Symes draws up the payroll list from which employees' salary checks are written. He fraudulently adds the name Penny Trip (a real person but a fictitious employee) to the payroll, thereby causing checks to be issued to her. Trip cashes the checks and shares the proceeds with Symes. Again, it is the employer-drawer who bears the loss.

For a synopsis of the rules relating to signature liability, see Concept Summary 26.1 on the following page.

WARRANTY LIABILITY

In addition to the signature liability, transferors make certain implied warranties regarding the instruments that they are negotiating. Warranty liability arises even when a transferor does not indorse (sign) the instrument [UCC 3-416, 3-417]. Warranty liability is particularly important when a holder cannot hold a party liable on her or his signature, such as when a person delivers a bearer instrument. Unlike secondary signature liability, warranty liability is not subject to the conditions of proper presentment, dishonor, or notice of dishonor.

Warranties fall into two categories: those that arise from the transfer of a negotiable instrument and those that arise on presentment. Both transfer and presentment warranties attempt to shift liability back to the wrongdoer or to the person who dealt face to face with the wrongdoer and thus was in the best position to prevent the wrongdoing.

Transfer Warranties

Under UCC 3-416, one who transfers an instrument for consideration makes the following five transfer warranties to all subsequent transferees and holders who take the instrument in good faith (with some exceptions, as will be noted shortly):

1. The transferor is entitled to enforce the instrument.
2. All signatures are authentic and authorized.
3. The instrument has not been altered.
4. The instrument is not subject to a defense or claim of any party that can be asserted against the transferor.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 26.1

Signature Liability

Concept	Description
Primary and Secondary Liability	Every party (except a qualified indorser) who signs a negotiable instrument is either primarily or secondarily liable for payment of the instrument when it comes due. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Primary liability—Makers and acceptors are primarily liable [UCC 3–409, 3–412, 3–413]. 2. Secondary liability—Drawers and indorsers are secondarily liable [UCC 3–414, 3–415, 3–501, 3–502, 3–503]. Parties who are secondarily liable on an instrument promise to pay on that instrument only if the following events occur: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. The instrument is properly and timely presented. b. The instrument is dishonored. c. Timely notice of dishonor is given.
Accommodation Parties	An accommodation party is one who signs an instrument for the purpose of lending his or her name as credit to another party on the instrument [UCC 3–419]. Accommodation makers are primarily liable; accommodation indorsers are secondarily liable.
Agents' Signatures	An agent is a person who agrees to represent or act for another, called the principal . Agents can sign negotiable instruments and thereby bind their principals. Liability on the instrument depends on whether the agent is authorized and on whether the agent's representative capacity and the principal's identity are both indicated on the instrument [UCC 3–401, 3–402, 3–403]. Agents need not indicate their representative capacity on checks —provided the checks clearly identify the principal and are drawn on the principal's account.
Unauthorized Signatures	An unauthorized signature is wholly inoperative as the signature of the person whose name is signed unless : <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The person whose name is signed ratifies (affirms) it or is precluded from denying it [UCC 3–115, 3–403, 3–406, 4–401]. 2. The instrument has been negotiated to a holder in due course [UCC 3–403].
Special Rules for Unauthorized Indorsements	An unauthorized indorsement will not bind the maker or drawer of the instrument except in the following circumstances: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. When an imposter induces the maker or drawer of an instrument to issue it to the imposter (imposter rule) [UCC 3–404(a)]. 2. When a person causes an instrument to be issued to a payee who will have no interest in the instrument (fictitious payee rule) [UCC 3–404(b), 3–405].

5. The transferor has no knowledge of any bankruptcy proceedings against the maker, the acceptor, or the drawer of the instrument.⁹

9. A 2002 amendment to UCC 3–416(a) adds a sixth warranty: “with respect to a remotely created consumer item, that the person on whose account the item is drawn authorized the issuance of the item in the amount for which the item is drawn.” UCC 3–103(16) defines a “remotely created consumer item” as an item, such as a check, drawn on a consumer account, that is not created by the payor bank and does not contain the drawer's handwritten signature. Suppose that a telemarketer submits an instrument to a bank for payment, claiming that the consumer on whose account the instrument purports to be drawn authorized it over the phone. Under this amendment, which has been adopted in only a few states, a bank that accepts and pays the instrument warrants to the next bank in the collection chain that the consumer authorized the item in that amount.

Note that for transfer warranties to arise, an instrument must be transferred for consideration. For example, Quality Products Corporation sells goods to Royal Retail Stores, Inc., and receives in payment Royal Retail's note. Quality then sells the note, for value, to Superior Finance Company. In this situation, the instrument has been transferred for consideration.

PARTIES TO WHOM WARRANTY LIABILITY EXTENDS

The manner of transfer and the type of negotiation that are used determine how far a transfer warranty will run and whom it will cover. Transfer of an order instrument by indorsement and delivery extends warranty liability to any subsequent holder who takes the instrument in good faith. The warranties of a person who, for consideration, transfers without indorsement (by delivery of a bearer instrument), however, will extend only to the immediate transferee [UCC 3–416(a)].

Suppose that Wylie forges Kim’s name as a maker of a promissory note. The note is made payable to Wylie. Wylie indorses the note in blank, negotiates it for consideration to Bret, and then leaves the country. Bret, without indorsement, delivers the note for consideration to Fern. Fern, also without indorsement, delivers the note for consideration to Rick. On Rick’s presentment of the note to Kim, the forgery is discovered. Rick can hold Fern (the immediate transferor) liable for breach of the warranty that all signatures are genuine. Rick cannot hold Bret liable because Bret is not Rick’s immediate transferor; rather, Bret is a prior nonindorsing transferor.

Note that if Wylie had added a special indorsement (“Payable to Bret”) instead of a blank indorsement, the instrument would have remained an order instrument. In that situation, Bret would have had to indorse the instrument to negotiate it to Fern, and his transfer warranties would extend to all subsequent holders, including Rick. This example shows the importance of the distinction between transfer by indorsement and delivery (of an order instrument) and transfer by delivery only, without indorsement (of a bearer instrument).

For a synopsis of the rules on transfer warranty liability, see Concept Summary 26.2 below.

RECOVERY FOR BREACH OF WARRANTY A transferee or holder who takes an instrument in good faith can sue on the basis of breach of a warranty as soon as he or she has reason to know of the breach [UCC 3–416(d)]. Notice of a claim for breach of warranty must be given to the warrantor within thirty days after the transferee or holder has reason to know of the breach and the identity of the warrantor, or the warrantor is not liable for any loss caused by a delay [UCC 3–416(c)]. The transferee or holder can recover damages for the breach in an amount equal to the loss suffered (but not more than the amount of the instrument), plus expenses and any loss of interest caused by the breach [UCC 3–416(b)].

These warranties can be disclaimed with respect to any instrument except a check [UCC 3–416(c)]. In the check-collection process, discussed in Chapter 27, banks rely on these warranties. For all other instruments, the immediate parties can agree to a disclaimer, and an indorser can disclaim by including in the indorsement such words as “without warranties.”

Presentment Warranties

Any person who presents an instrument for payment or acceptance makes the following presentment warranties to any other person who in good faith pays or accepts the instrument [UCC 3–417(a), (d)]:

1. The person obtaining payment or acceptance is entitled to enforce the instrument or is authorized

CONCEPT SUMMARY 26.2

Transfer Warranty Liability for Transferors Who Receive Consideration

Transferors	Transferees to Whom Warranties Extend If Consideration Is Received
Indorsers Who Receive Consideration	Five transfer warranties extend to all subsequent holders: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The transferor is entitled to enforce the instrument. 2. All signatures are authentic and authorized. 3. The instrument has not been altered. 4. The instrument is not subject to a defense or claim of any party that can be asserted against the transferor. 5. The transferor has no knowledge of insolvency proceedings against the maker, acceptor, or drawer of the instrument.
Nonindorsers Who Receive Consideration	Same as for indorsers, but warranties extend only to the immediate transferee .

to obtain payment or acceptance on behalf of a person who is entitled to enforce the instrument. (This is, in effect, a warranty that there are no missing or unauthorized indorsements.)

2. The instrument has not been altered.
3. The person obtaining payment or acceptance has no knowledge that the signature of the drawer of the instrument is unauthorized.¹⁰

These warranties are referred to as presentment warranties because they protect the person to whom the instrument is presented. They often have the effect of shifting liability back to the party that was in the best position to prevent the wrongdoing. The second and third warranties do not apply to makers, acceptors, and drawers. It is assumed that a drawer or a maker will recognize his or her own signature and that a maker or an acceptor will recognize whether an instrument has been materially altered. Presentment warranties cannot be disclaimed with respect to checks, and a claim for breach must be given to the warrantor within thirty days after the claimant knows or has reason to know of the breach and the identity of the warrantor, or the warrantor is not liable for any loss caused by a delay [UCC 3-417(e)].

10. As discussed in Footnote 9, the 2002 amendments to Article 3 of the UCC provide additional protection for “remotely created consumer items,” such as a check drawn on a personal account that the account holder authorized over the phone but did not physically sign.

SECTION 3 DEFENSES AND LIMITATIONS

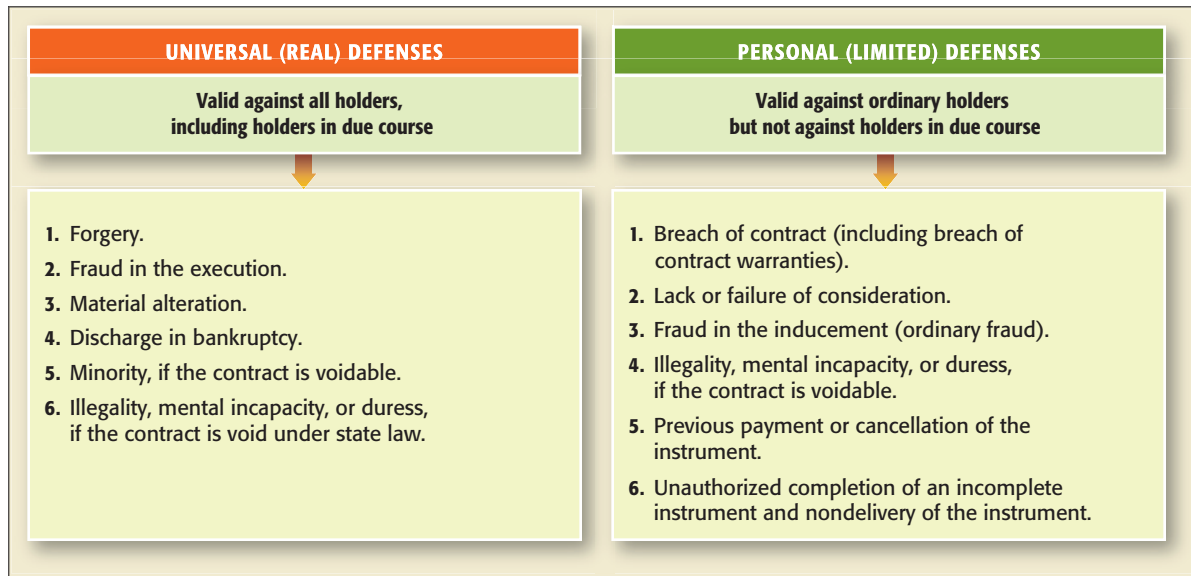

Depending on whether a holder or a holder in due course (HDC)—or a holder through an HDC—makes the demand for payment, certain defenses can bar collection from persons who would otherwise be liable on an instrument. There are two general categories of defenses—universal defenses and personal defenses, which are discussed below and summarized in Exhibit 26-2 below.

Universal Defenses

Universal defenses (also called real defenses) are valid against all holders, including HDCs and holders through HDCs. Universal defenses include those described in the following subsections.

FORGERY Forgery of a maker’s or drawer’s signature cannot bind the person whose name is used unless that person ratifies (approves or validates) the signature or is precluded from denying it (because the forgery was made possible by the maker’s or drawer’s negligence, for example) [UCC 3-401(a), 3-403(a)]. Thus, when a person forges an instrument, the person whose name is forged has no liability to pay any holder or any HDC the value of the forged instrument.

EXHIBIT 26-2 • Defenses against Liability on Negotiable Instruments

FRAUD IN THE EXECUTION If a person is deceived into signing a negotiable instrument, believing that she or he is signing something other than a negotiable instrument (such as a receipt), fraud in the execution (or inception) is committed against the signer [UCC 3–305(a)(1)(iii)]. For example, Connor, a salesperson, asks Javier, a customer, to sign a paper, which Connor says is a receipt for the delivery of goods that Javier is picking up from the store. In fact, the paper is a promissory note, but Javier is unfamiliar with the English language and does not realize this. In this situation, even if the note is negotiated to an HDC, Javier has a valid defense against payment.

This defense cannot be raised, however, if a reasonable inquiry would have revealed the nature and terms of the instrument. Thus, the signer's age, experience, and intelligence are relevant because they frequently determine whether the signer should have understood the nature of the transaction before signing.

MATERIAL ALTERATION An alteration is material if it changes the contract terms between two parties in any way. Examples include any unauthorized addition of words or numbers or other changes to complete an incomplete instrument that affect the obligation of a party to the instrument [UCC 3–407(a)]. Making any change in the amount, the date, or the rate of interest—even if the change is only one penny, one day, or 1 percent—is material.

It is not a material alteration, however, to correct the maker's address or to draw a red line across the instrument to indicate that an auditor has checked it. It is also not a material alteration to change the figures on a check so that they agree with the written amount. If the alteration is not material, any holder is entitled to enforce the instrument according to its original terms.

A Complete or Partial Defense. Material alteration is a complete defense against an ordinary holder but only a partial defense against an HDC. An ordinary holder can recover nothing on an instrument that has been materially altered [UCC 3–407(b)]. In contrast, when the holder is an HDC and an original term, such as the monetary amount payable, has been altered, the HDC can enforce the instrument against the maker or drawer according to the original terms but not for the altered amount [UCC 3–407(c)(i)].

In the following case, a note that allowed for an extension for payment expired. Its maker and payee then executed a second note, which the payee insisted was only an extension of the time for payment but which in reality increased the balance due. The question before the court was whether the second note materially altered the first.

Keesling v. T.E.K. Partners, LLC

Indiana Court of Appeals, 861 N.E.2d 1246 (2007).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

NAJAM, Judge.

* * *

In January 1998, Heritage Land [Company] and M.G. Financial [Services of Indiana, Inc.] formed Heritage/M.G. [LLC], for the purpose of developing a residential neighborhood known as Ironwood Estates in Delaware County [Indiana]. On May 25, 1999, Heritage/M.G. executed * * * [a] note to Peoples Bank and Trust Company, custodian for the James Henke, I.R.A. (“Henke I.R.A.”), in the amount of $300,000 to partially finance the development. The final installment under the note was due June 1, 2001. [The note authorized an extension of the time for payment.] The signatories [included Thomas McMullen, on behalf of Heritage/M.G., and Larry and Vivian Keesling.]

Heritage/M.G. did not complete the payments under the original note by the June 2001 deadline. On January 3, 2002, the balance due on the note was $48,228.69.

Then, on May 24, 2002, * * * without the knowledge or consent of the Keeslings * * *, Heritage/M.G. executed [a] second note to the Henke I.R.A. in the amount of $102,000. * * * No payments were ever made on the second note.

Accordingly, on September 2, 2004, 1st National Bank and Trust Company, [which had succeeded Peoples Bank] as custodian for the Henke I.R.A., filed * * * [a complaint in an Indiana state court] against the Keeslings [and others]. On October 25, 2004, the Henke I.R.A. assigned * * * both the original note and the second note to T.E.K. [Partners, LLC] * * *. On November 19, 2004, the trial court entered an order substituting T.E.K. for 1st National Bank as plaintiff. Following a * * * trial, the trial court * * * concluded in relevant part that * * * T.E.K. is entitled to judgment * * * in the sum of $365,905.07 plus $10,000 in attorney fees, for a total judgment of $375,905.07. * * * The Keeslings * * * bring this appeal [to a state intermediate appellate court].

In sum, the Keeslings * * * contend that because they were accommodation parties on the original note, and the second note constitutes a material alteration of the original note, they are discharged from further personal liability under the original note, and they have no liability under the second note.

* * * *A guaranty is * * * a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person. It is an agreement collateral to the debt itself and represents a conditional promise whereby the guarantor promises to pay only if the principal debtor fails to pay.* [Emphasis added.]

Under Indiana common-law principles, when parties cause a material alteration of an underlying obligation without the consent of the guarantor, the guarantor is discharged from further liability * * *. A material alteration which will effect a discharge of the guarantor must be a change which alters the legal identity of the principal's contract, substantially increases the risk of loss to the guarantor, or places the guarantor in a different position. The change must be binding. [Emphasis added.]

Here, Heritage/M.G. is the principal obligor. The Keeslings are guarantors on the original note payable to the Henke I.R.A., which was the original obligee. As guarantors, the Keeslings are accommodation parties.

The original note was past due. * * * T.E.K. maintains that the second note merely extended the time for payment of the original note, as authorized by that note, and did not constitute a material alteration of the original obligation. The trial court agreed, finding that the second note for $102,000 was merely given “to evidence the current amount of monies then due and owing” under the original note “and extend the due date for payment” of the original note. Those findings are clearly erroneous.

The evidence shows that * * * on May 24, 2002, * * * McMullen, on behalf of Heritage/M.G., executed the second note for $102,000 payable to the Henke I.R.A. * * *. McMullen, who signed both notes, testified that the “difference [between $48,228.69 and $102,000] was used to pay vendors,” as well as to pay “interest and stuff.”

The evidence clearly shows that the second note did not merely extend the time of payment on the “current amount of monies then due and owing” on the original note. Instead, the facts demonstrate that the second note included additional money to “pay the bills.”

The second note also capitalized interest due on the original note, that is, it converted interest due on the original note to principal in the second note. The capitalization of interest meant that the contract interest rate of 12% and the default interest rate of 24% would be charged against the interest added to the second note, thereby compounding the payment of interest and the effective interest rate. In itself, this capitalization of interest was a material alteration.

Thus, the second note not only added new debt but increased the total principal draws beyond the $300,000 face amount of the original note. [James] Henke testified that under the original note, his I.R.A. was committed to advance “up to $300,000” for the project. The Henke I.R.A. advanced two $130,000 draws to Heritage/M.G. under the original note, for a total of $260,000. But the second note of $102,000 brought total draws to $362,000 * * * which was $62,000 more in draws than the original note authorized.

The original note was an unambiguous “promise to pay * * * the sum of $300,000.” The note contains a promise to pay a sum certain and does not provide for total draws greater than that sum. The original note was not a revolving line of credit. The accommodation parties assumed the risk of a $300,000 loan, not some multiple of $300,000.

In sum, the second note constitutes a material alteration of the original obligation. As such, the Keeslings * * * are discharged from their personal liability on the original note, and they have no liability for the additional sums advanced under the second note, which they did not sign. We reverse the trial court’s judgment [against the Keeslings] * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. If the court had affirmed the judgment in favor of T.E.K., against whom might the Keeslings have had a right of recourse?
2. What might the parties who executed the second note have done at the time to avoid the outcome in this case?

An HDC Can Enforce an Incomplete Instrument That Was Subsequently Altered. Note that if the instrument was originally incomplete and was later completed in an unauthorized manner, alteration can no longer be claimed as a defense against an HDC, and the HDC can enforce the instrument as completed [UCC 3-407(b), (c)]. This is because a drawer or maker who has issued an incomplete instrument normally will be held responsible for such an alteration, which could have been avoided by the exercise of greater care. If the alteration is readily apparent (such as a number changed on the face of a check), then obviously the holder has notice of some defect or defense and therefore cannot be an HDC (and therefore cannot enforce the instrument) [UCC 3-302(a)(1), (2)(iv)].

DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY Discharge in bankruptcy (see Chapter 30) is an absolute defense on any instrument regardless of the status of the holder [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(iv)]. This defense exists because the purpose of bankruptcy is to finally settle all of the insolvent party's debts.

MINORITY Minority, or infancy, is a universal defense only to the extent that state law recognizes it as a defense to a simple contract. Because state laws on minority vary, so do determinations of whether minority is a universal defense against an HDC [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(i)]. (See Chapter 13 for further discussion of the contractual liability of minors.)

ILLEGALITY Certain types of illegality constitute universal defenses, whereas others are personal defenses. If a statute provides that an illegal transaction is void, then the defense is universal—that is, absolute against both an ordinary holder and an HDC. If the law merely makes the instrument voidable, then the illegality is a personal defense against an ordinary holder, but not against an HDC [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(ii)].

MENTAL INCAPACITY If a court has declared a person to be mentally incompetent, then any instrument issued by that person is void. The instrument is void ab initio (from the beginning) and unenforceable by any holder or HDC [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(ii)]. Mental incapacity in these circumstances is a universal defense. If a court has not declared a person to be mentally incompetent, then mental incapacity operates as a personal defense against ordinary holders but not against HDCs.

EXTREME DURESS When a person signs and issues a negotiable instrument under such extreme duress as an immediate threat of force or violence (for example, at gunpoint), the instrument is void and unenforceable by any holder or HDC [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(ii)]. (Ordinary duress is a defense against ordinary holders but not against HDCs.)

Personal Defenses

Personal defenses (sometimes called limited defenses), such as those described next, are used to avoid payment to an ordinary holder of a negotiable instrument, but not to an HDC or a holder through an HDC.

BREACH OF CONTRACT OR BREACH OF WARRANTY

When there is a breach of the underlying contract for which the negotiable instrument was issued, the maker of a note can refuse to pay it, or the drawer of a check can order his or her bank to stop payment on the check. Breach of warranty can also be claimed as a defense to liability on the instrument.

For example, Elias purchases two dozen pairs of athletic shoes from De Soto. The shoes are to be delivered in six weeks. Elias gives De Soto a promissory note for $1,000, which is the price of the shoes. The shoes arrive, but many of them are stained, and the soles of several pairs are coming apart. Elias has a defense to liability on the note on the basis of breach of contract and breach of warranty. (Recall from Chapter 22 that a seller impliedly promises that the goods being sold are at least merchantable.) If, however, the note is no longer in the hands of the payee-seller (De Soto) but is presented for payment by an HDC, the maker-buyer (Elias) will not be able to plead breach of contract or warranty as a defense against liability on the note.

LACK OR FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION The absence of consideration (value) may be a successful defense in some instances [UCC 3-303(b), 3-305(a)(2)]. For example, Tony gives Cleo, as a gift, a note that states, "I promise to pay you $100,000," and Cleo accepts the note. No consideration is given in return for Tony's promise, and a court will not enforce the promise.

Similarly, if delivery of goods becomes impossible, a party who has issued a draft or note under the contract has a defense for not paying it. Thus, in the hypothetical athletic-shoe transaction described previously, if the shoes were lost in an accident and delivery became impossible, De Soto could not subsequently enforce Elias's promise to pay the $1,000 promissory note. If the note was in the hands of an HDC, however, Elias's defense would not be available against the HDC.

FRAUD IN THE INDUCEMENT (ORDINARY FRAUD) A person who issues a negotiable instrument based on false statements by the other party will be able to avoid payment on that instrument, unless the holder is an HDC. To illustrate: Weston agrees to purchase Carla's used tractor for $26,500. Carla, knowing her statements to be false, tells Weston that the tractor is in good working order and that it has been used for only one harvest. In addition, she tells Weston that she owns the tractor free and clear of all claims. Weston pays Carla $4,500 in cash and issues a negotiable promissory note for the balance. As it turns out, Carla still owes the original seller $10,000 on the purchase of the tractor, and the tractor is subject to a valid security interest (discussed in Chapter 29). In addition, the tractor is three years old and has been used in three harvests.

In this situation, Weston can refuse to pay the note if it is held by an ordinary holder. If, however, Carla has negotiated the note to an HDC, Weston must pay the HDC. Of course, Weston can then sue Carla to recover the funds.

ILLEGALITY As mentioned, if a statute provides that an illegal transaction is voidable, the defense is personal. For example, some states make contracts in restraint of trade voidable. Thus, an instrument given in payment of a contract to restrain trade in those states is voidable and operates as a personal defense (only against ordinary holders).

MENTAL INCAPACITY If a maker or drawer issues a negotiable instrument while mentally incompetent but before a court has declared him or her to be so, the instrument is voidable. In this situation, mental incapacity serves as a personal defense (only against ordinary holders).

OTHER PERSONAL DEFENSES A number of other personal defenses can be used to avoid payment to an ordinary holder, but not an HDC, of a negotiable instrument, including the following:

1. Discharge by previous payment or cancellation [UCC 3-601(b), 3-602(a), 3-603, 3-604].
2. Unauthorized completion of an incomplete instrument [UCC 3-115, 3-302, 3-407, 4-401(d)(2)].
3. Nondelivery of the instrument [UCC 1-201(14), 3-105(b), 3-305(a)(2)].
4. Ordinary duress or undue influence rendering the contract voidable [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(ii)].

Federal Limitations on HDC Rights

The federal government limits HDC rights in certain circumstances because of the harsh effects that the HDC rules can sometimes have on consumers. Under the HDC doctrine, a consumer who purchased a defective product (such as a defective automobile) would continue to be liable to HDCs even if the consumer returned the defective product to the retailer. For example, to buy a used truck with a one-year warranty, Brian pays $5,000 down and signs a promissory note to the dealer, for the remaining $15,000. The truck turns out to be defective, but the dealer has already sold the note to an HDC. Thus, even if Brian returns the truck to the dealer, under the HDC doctrine, he would remain liable to the HDC for $15,000 because his claim of breach of warranty is a personal defense. To protect consumers who purchased defective products, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) adopted Rule 433.¹¹

FTC RULE 433 FTC Rule 433 severely limits the rights of HDCs that purchase instruments arising out of consumer credit transactions. The rule applies to consumers who purchase goods or services for personal, family, or household use using a consumer credit contract. The FTC regulation attempts to prevent a consumer from being required to make payment for a defective product to a third party HDC of a promissory note that formed part of the contract with the dealer who sold the defective good.

Rule 433 requires the following provision to be included in boldface type in a consumer credit contract:

NOTICE

ANY HOLDER OF THIS CONSUMER CREDIT CONTRACT IS SUBJECT TO ALL CLAIMS AND DEFENSES WHICH THE DEBTOR COULD ASSERT AGAINST THE SELLER OF GOODS OR SERVICES OBTAINED PURSUANT HERETO OR WITH THE PROCEEDS HEREOF. RECOVERY HEREUNDER BY THE DEBTOR SHALL NOT EXCEED AMOUNTS PAID BY THE DEBTOR HEREUNDER.

EFFECT OF THE RULE When a negotiable instrument contains the required notice, a consumer is allowed to bring any defense that she or he has against the seller of a product against a subsequent holder as well. In essence, FTC Rule 433 places an HDC of the instrument in the position of a contract assignee. The rule makes the buyer's duty to pay conditional on the seller's full performance of the contract. It also clearly reduces the degree of transferability of negotiable instruments resulting from consumer credit contracts. An instrument that contains this notice or a similar statement required by law may remain negotiable, but there cannot be an HDC of such an instrument [UCC 3-106(d)].

There is a loophole, however, in that FTC Rule 433 does not prohibit third parties from purchasing 11. 16 C.F.R. Section 433.2. The rule was enacted in 1976 pursuant to the FTC's authority under the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. Sections 41-58.

notes or credit contracts that do not contain the required notice. So, if a third party purchases an instrument arising from a consumer credit transaction that lacks the required notice, that third party normally is not subject to the buyer's defenses against the seller. Thus, some consumers remain unprotected by the FTC rule.¹²

SECTION 4 DISCHARGE

Discharge from liability on an instrument can occur in several ways, including by payment, by cancellation, and, as previously discussed, by material alteration. Discharge can also occur if a party reacquires an instrument, if a holder impairs another party's right of recourse, or if a holder surrenders collateral without consent.

Discharge by Payment or Tender of Payment

All parties to a negotiable instrument will be discharged when the party primarily liable on it pays to a holder the full amount due [UCC 3-602, 3-603].¹³ The liability of all parties is also discharged when the drawee of an unaccepted draft or check makes payment in good faith to the holder. Payment by any other party (for example, an indorser) discharges only the liability of that party and subsequent parties. The party making such a payment still has the right to recover on the instrument from any prior parties.¹⁴

12. A 2002 amendment to UCC 3-305(e) closes this loophole, but only a minority of the states have adopted the amendment. The amendment makes a third party holder in possession of a note or other instrument that was supposed to include this notice subject to a buyer's defenses against a seller even if the instrument did not include the notice.
13. This is true even if the payment is made with knowledge of a claim to the instrument by another person unless the payor knows that "payment is prohibited by injunction or similar process of a court of competent jurisdiction" or, in most situations, "the party making payment accepted, from a person having a claim to the instrument, indemnity against loss resulting from refusal to pay the person entitled to enforce the instrument" [UCC 3-602(a), (b)(1)].
14. Under the 2002 amendment to UCC 3-602(b), when a party entitled to enforce an instrument transfers it without giving notice to the parties obligated to pay it, and one of those parties pays the transferor, that payment is effective. For example, Roberto borrows $5,000 from Consumer Finance Company on a note payable to the lender. Consumer Finance transfers the note to Delta Investment Corporation but continues to collect payments from Roberto. Under this amendment, those payments effectively discharge Roberto to the extent of their amount.

A party will not be discharged when paying in bad faith to a holder who acquired the instrument by theft or who obtained the instrument from someone else who acquired it by theft (unless, of course, the person has the rights of an HDC) [UCC 3-602(b)(2)].

If a tender of payment is made to a person entitled to enforce the instrument and the tender is refused, indorsers and accommodation parties whose rights to seek reimbursement are impaired (impairment of the right of recourse is discussed shortly) are discharged to the extent of the amount of the tender [UCC 3-603(b)]. If a tender of payment of an amount due on an instrument is made to a person entitled to enforce the instrument, the obligor's obligation to pay interest after the due date on the amount tendered is discharged [UCC 3-603(c)].

Discharge by Cancellation or Surrender

Intentional cancellation of an instrument discharges the liability of all parties [UCC 3-604]. Intentionally writing "Paid" across the face of an instrument cancels it. Intentionally tearing up an instrument cancels it. If a holder intentionally crosses out a party's signature, that party's liability and the liability of subsequent indorsers who have already indorsed the instrument are discharged. Materially altering an instrument may discharge the liability of all parties, as previously discussed [UCC 3-407(b)]. (An HDC may be able to enforce a materially altered instrument against its maker or drawer according to the instrument's original terms, however.)

Destruction or mutilation of a negotiable instrument is considered cancellation only if it is done with the intention of eliminating obligation on the instrument [UCC 3-604(a)(i)]. Thus, if destruction or mutilation occurs by accident, the instrument is not discharged, and the original terms can be established by parol evidence [UCC 3-309]. A note's holder may also discharge the obligation by surrendering the note to the person to be discharged—provided that the holder intended to eliminate the obligation [UCC 3-604(a)(i)].

CASE IN POINT Edith Mark bought a Ford pickup and signed a loan contract and promissory note with Huntington National Bank to finance the purchase. She had made twenty of the sixty-six payments required on the loan when she received the original agreement, stamped "PAID," in the mail, along with the title certificate. Mark stopped making payments on the loan, and the bank filed a lawsuit. Mark argued that the note had been discharged by surrender, but the bank claimed that the documents were returned to her due to an inadvertent clerical error. The court held that because the bank did not intend to discharge the note when it returned the documents to Mark, the surrender did not constitute a valid cancellation of the note.¹⁵

Discharge by Reacquisition

A person who reacquires an instrument that he or she held previously discharges all intervening indorsers against subsequent holders who do not qualify as HDCs [UCC 3–207]. Of course, the person reacquiring the instrument may be liable to subsequent holders if the instrument is dishonored.

Discharge by Impairment of Recourse

Discharge can also occur when a party's right of recourse is impaired [UCC 3–605]. A right of recourse is a right to seek reimbursement. Ordinarily, when a holder collects the amount of an instrument from an indorser, the indorser has a right of recourse against prior indorsers, the maker or drawer, and accommodation parties. If the holder has adversely affected the indorser's right to seek reimbursement from these other parties, however, the indorser is not liable on the instrument (to the extent that the indorser's right of recourse is impaired). This occurs when, for example, the holder releases or agrees not to sue a party against whom the indorser has a right of recourse. It also occurs when a holder agrees to an extension of the instrument's due date or to some other material modification that results in a loss to the indorser with respect to the right of recourse [UCC 3–605(c), (d)].¹⁶

Discharge by Impairment of Collateral

Sometimes, a party to an instrument gives collateral as security that her or his performance will occur. When a holder “impairs the value” of that collateral without the consent of the parties who would benefit from the collateral in the event of nonpayment, those parties to the instrument are discharged to the extent of the impairment [UCC 3–605(e), (f)].

For example, Jerome and Myra sign a note as co-makers, putting up Jerome's property as collateral. The note is payable to Montessa. Montessa is required by law to file a financing statement (discussed in Chapter 29) with the state to put others on notice of her interest in Jerome's property as collateral for the note. If Montessa fails to file the statement and Jerome goes through bankruptcy—which results in his property's being sold to pay other debts and leaves him unable to pay anything on the note—Montessa has impaired the value of the collateral to Myra, who is discharged to the extent of that impairment.

In other words, when Jerome goes through bankruptcy, Montessa's earlier failure to file the statement prevents her from taking possession of the collateral, selling it, and crediting the amount owed on the note. Myra, as co-maker, is then responsible only for any remaining indebtedness, instead of the entire unpaid balance. Thus, Myra is discharged to the extent that the proceeds from the sale of the collateral would have discharged her liability on the note.

16. The 2002 amendments to UCC 3–605 essentially apply the principles of suretyship and guaranty (to be discussed in Chapter 28) to circumstances that involve the impairment of the right of recourse of “secondary obligors,” which include indorsers and accommodation parties. One important difference from the principles of suretyship and guaranty, however, is that under amended UCC 3–605(a), the release of a principal obligor by a person entitled to enforce a check grants a complete discharge to an indorser of the check without requiring proof of harm.

REVIEWING

Liability, Defenses, and Discharge

Nancy Mahar was the office manager at Golden Years Nursing Home, Inc. She was given a signature stamp to issue checks to the nursing home's employees for up to $100 as advances on their pay. The checks were drawn on Golden Years' account at First National Bank. Over a seven-year period, Mahar wrote a number of checks to employees exclusively for the purpose of embezzling funds for herself. She forged the employees' indorsements on the checks, signed her name as a second indorser, and deposited the checks in her personal account at Star Bank. The employees whose names were on the checks never actually requested them. When the scheme was uncovered, Golden Years filed a suit against Mahar, Star Bank, and others to recover the funds. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. With regard to signature liability, which provision of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) discussed in this chapter applies to this scenario?
2. What is the rule set forth by that provision?
3. Under the UCC, which party, Golden Years or Star Bank, must bear the loss in this situation? Why?
4. Based on these facts, describe any transfer or presentment warranties that Mahar may have violated.

 DEBATE THIS: Because signature stamps create so many opportunities for embezzlement, they should be banned.

26-1. Material Alteration Williams purchased a used car from Stein for $1,000. Williams paid for the car with a check (written in pencil) payable to Stein for $1,000. Stein, through careful erasures and alterations, changed the amount on the check to read $10,000 and negotiated the check to Boz. Boz took the check for value, in good faith, and without notice of the alteration and thus met the Uniform Commercial Code's requirements for the status of a holder in due course. Can Williams successfully raise the universal (real) defense of material alteration to avoid payment on the check? Explain.

26-2. Signature Liability Waldo makes out a negotiable promissory note payable to the order of Grace. Grace indorses the note by writing on it "Without recourse, Grace" and transfers the note for value to Adam. Adam, in need of cash, negotiates the note to Keith by indorsing it with the words "Pay to Keith, Adam." On the due date, Keith presents the note to Waldo for payment, only to learn that Waldo has filed for bankruptcy and will have all debts (including the note) discharged. Discuss fully whether Keith can hold Waldo, Grace, or Adam liable on the note.

26-3. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Defenses.

Niles sold Kennedy a small motorboat for $1,500, maintaining to Kennedy that the boat was in excellent condition. Kennedy gave Niles a check for $1,500, which Niles indorsed and gave to Frazier for value. When Kennedy took the boat for a trial run, she discovered that the boat leaked, needed to be painted, and required a new motor. Kennedy stopped payment on her check, which had not yet been cashed. Niles has disappeared. Can Frazier recover from Kennedy as a holder in due course? Discuss.

- For a sample answer to Question 26-3, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

26-4. Signature Liability Gil makes out a $900 negotiable promissory note payable to Ben. By special indorsement,

Ben transfers the note for value to Jess. By blank indorsement, Jess transfers the note for value to Pam. By special indorsement, Pam transfers the note for value to Adrien. In need of cash, Adrien transfers the instrument for value by blank indorsement back to Jess. When told that Ben has left the country, Jess strikes out Ben's indorsement. Later she learns that Ben is a wealthy restaurant owner in Baltimore and that Gil is financially unable to pay the note. Jess contends that, as a holder in due course, she can hold Ben, Pam, or Adrien liable on the note. Discuss fully Jess's contentions.

26-5. Agents' Signatures Robert Helmer and Percy Helmer, Jr., were authorized signatories on the corporate checking account of Event Marketing, Inc. The Helmers signed a check drawn on Event Marketing's account and issued to Rumarson Technologies, Inc. (RTI), in the amount of $24,965. The check was signed on July 13, 1998, but dated August 14. When RTI presented the check for payment, it was dishonored due to insufficient funds. RTI filed a suit in a Georgia state court against the Helmers to collect the amount of the check. Claiming that the Helmers were personally liable on Event Marketing's check, RTI filed a motion for summary judgment. Can an authorized signatory on a corporate account be held personally liable for corporate checks returned for insufficient funds? Are the Helmers liable in this case? Discuss. [Helmer v. Rumarson Technologies, Inc., 245 Ga.App. 598, 538 S.E.2d 504 (2000)]

26-6. Defenses On September 13, 1979, Barbara Shearer and Barbara Couvion signed a note for $22,500, with interest at 11 percent, payable in monthly installments of $232.25 to Edgar House and Paul Cook. House and Cook assigned the note to Southside Bank in Kansas City, Missouri. In 1997, the note was assigned to Midstates Resources Corp., which assigned the note to the Cadle Co. in 2000. According to the payment history that Midstates gave to Cadle, the interest rate on the note was 12 percent. A Cadle employee noticed the discrepancy and recalculated the payments at 11 percent. When Shearer and Couvion refused to make further payments on the note, Cadle filed a suit in a Missouri state court against them to collect. Couvion and Shearer responded that they had made timely payments on the note, that Cadle and the previous holders had failed to accurately apply the payments to the reduction of principal and interest, and that the note "is either paid in full and satisfied or very close to being paid in full and satisfied." Is the makers' answer sufficient to support a verdict in their favor? If so, on what ground? If not, why not? [The Cadle Co. v. Shearer, 69 S.W.3d 122 (Mo.App.W.D. 2002)]

26-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Agents' Signatures.

Ameripay, LLC, is a payroll services company that, among other things, issues payroll checks to the employees of its clients. In July 2002, Nu Tribe Radio Networks, Inc. (NTRN), based in New York City, hired Ameripay. Under their agreement, Ameripay set up an account on NTRN's behalf at Commerce Bank. NTRN agreed to deposit funds in the account to cover its payroll obligations. Arthur Piacentini, an owner of Ameripay, was an authorized signatory on the account. On the checks, NTRN was the only identified company, and Piacentini's signature appeared without indicating his status. At the end of the month, four NTRN employees cashed their payroll checks, which Piacentini had signed, at A-1 Check Cashing Emporium, Inc. The checks were returned dishonored. Ameripay had stopped their payment because it had not received the funds from NTRN. A-1 assigned its interest in the checks to Robert Triffin, who filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against Ameripay. Between a principal and an agent, what principles determine which party is liable for the amount of an unpaid instrument? How do those principles apply in this case? Is Ameripay liable? Why or why not? [Triffin v. Ameripay, LLC, 368 N.J.Super. 587, 847 A.2d 628 (App. Div. 2004)]

26-8. Accommodation Parties Donald Goosic, a building contractor in Nebraska, did business as "Homestead" builders. To construct a house "on spec" (without a pre-construction buyer), Donald obtained materials from Sack Lumber Co. on an open account. When Donald "got behind in his payments," his wife, Frances, cosigned a note payable to Sack for $43,000, the outstanding balance on the account. Donald made payments on the note until he obtained a discharge of his debts in a bankruptcy proceeding to which Frances was not a party. Less than a year later, Sack filed a suit in a Nebraska state court against Frances to collect on the note. She contended that she was an accommodation party, not a maker, and thus was not liable because the applicable statute of limitations had run. She testified that Donald "made more debt than . . . money" and that she was "paying the bills out of [her] income." The Goosics' most recent tax returns showed only losses relating to Homestead. Under the Uniform Commercial Code, a person receiving only an indirect benefit from a transaction can qualify as an accommodation party. How would you rule on this question of fact? Why? [Sack Lumber Co. v. Goosic, 15 Neb.App. 529, 732 N.W.2d 690 (2007)]

26-9. Unauthorized Indorsements Stephen Schor, an accountant in New York City, advised his client, Andre Romanelli, Inc., to open an account at J. P. Morgan Chase Bank, N.A., to obtain a favorable interest rate on a line of credit. Romanelli's representative signed a signature card, which he gave to Schor. When the accountant later told Romanelli that the rate was not favorable, the firm told him not to open the account. Schor signed a blank line on the signature card, changed the mailing address to his office, and opened the account in Romanelli's name. In a purported attempt to obtain credit for the firm elsewhere, Schor had its principals write checks payable to themselves for more than $4.5 million, ostensibly to pay taxes. He indorsed and deposited the checks in the Chase account and eventually withdrew and spent the funds. Romanelli filed a suit in a New York state court against Chase and other banks, alleging that a drawer is not liable on an unauthorized indorsement. Is this the rule? What are its exceptions? Which principle applies to these facts, and why? [Andre Romanelli, Inc. v. Citibank, N.A., 60 A.D.3d 428, 875 N.Y.S.2d 14 (1 Dept. 2009)]

26-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Primary and Secondary Liability.

Clarence Morgan, Jr., owned Easy Way Automotive, a car dealership in D'Lo, Mississippi. Easy Way sold a truck to Loyd Barnard, who signed a note for the amount of the price payable to Trustmark National Bank in six months. Before the note came due, Barnard returned the truck to Easy Way, which sold it to another buyer. Using some of the proceeds from the second sale, Easy Way sent a check to Trustmark to pay Barnard's note. Meanwhile, Barnard obtained another truck from Easy Way, financed through another six-month note payable to Trustmark. After eight of these deals, some of which involved more than one truck, an Easy Way check to Trustmark was dishonored. In a suit in a Mississippi state court, Trustmark sought to recover the amounts of two of the notes from Barnard. Trustmark had not secured titles to two of the trucks covered by the notes, however, and this complicated Barnard's efforts to reclaim the vehicles from the later buyers. [Trustmark National Bank v. Barnard, 930 So.2d 1281 (Miss.App. 2006)]

- (a) On what basis might Barnard be liable on the Trustmark notes? Would he be primarily or secondarily liable? Could this liability be discharged on the theory that Barnard's right of recourse had been impaired when Trustmark did not secure titles to the trucks covered by the notes? Explain.
- (b) Easy Way's account had been subject to other recent overdrafts, and a week after the check to Trustmark was returned for insufficient funds, Morgan committed suicide. At the same time, Barnard was unable to obtain a mortgage because the unpaid notes affected his credit rating. How do the circumstances of this case underscore the importance of practicing business ethics?

Checks and Banking in the Digital Age

Checks are the most common type of negotiable instruments regulated by the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). Checks are convenient to use because they serve as a substitute for cash. Although debit cards now account for more retail payments than do checks, commercial checks remain an integral part of the U.S. economic system.

Articles 3 and 4 of the UCC govern issues relating to checks. As noted in the preceding chapters, Article 3 establishes the requirements for all negotiable instruments, including checks. Article 3 also sets forth the rights and responsibilities of parties to negotiable instruments. Article 4 establishes a framework for deposit and checking agreements between a bank and its customers. Article 4 also governs the relationships of banks with one another as they process checks for payment. A check therefore may fall within the scope of Article 3 and yet be subject to the provisions of Article 4 while in the course of collection. If a conflict arises between Articles 3 and 4, Article 4 controls [UCC 4-102(a)].

In this chapter, we first identify the legal characteristics of checks and the legal duties and liabilities that arise when a check is issued. Then we examine the check-collection process. Increasingly, credit cards, debit cards, and other devices and methods for transferring funds electronically are being used to pay for goods and services. In the latter part of this chapter, we look at the law governing electronic fund transfers.

SECTION 1 CHECKS

A check is a special type of draft that is drawn on a bank, ordering the bank to pay a fixed amount of money on demand [UCC 3-104(f)]. Article 4 defines a bank as “a person engaged in the business of banking, including a savings bank, savings and loan association, credit union or trust company” [UCC 4-105(1)]. If a nonbank institution (such as a brokerage firm) handles a check for payment or for collection, the check is not covered by Article 4.

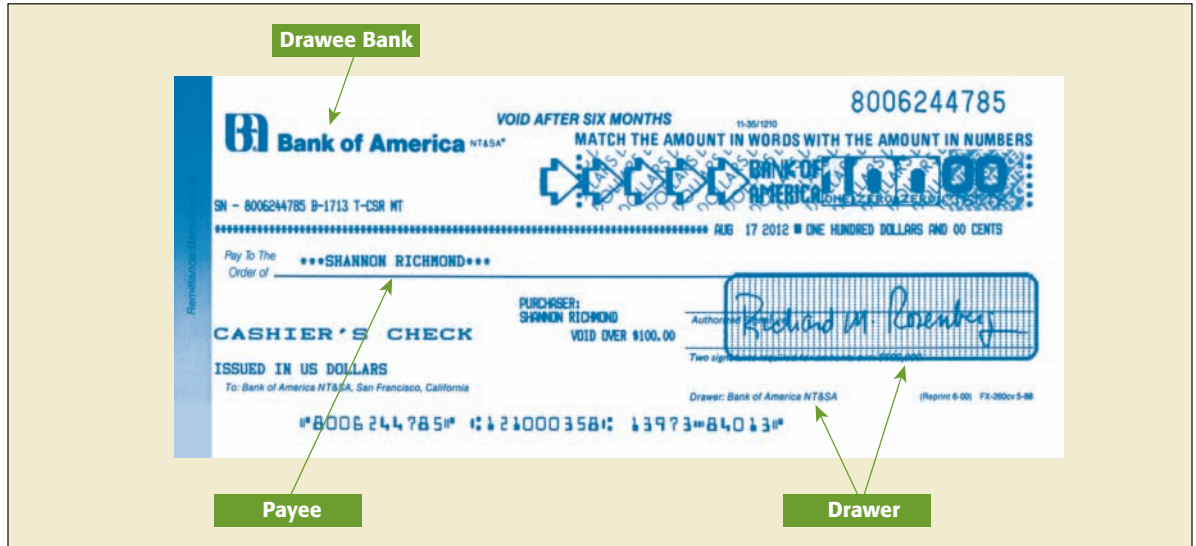

Recall from the preceding chapters that a person who writes a check is called the drawer. The drawer is usually a depositor in the bank on which the check is drawn. The person to whom the check is payable is the payee. The bank or financial institution on which the check is drawn is the drawee. Thus, if Anne Tomas writes a check on her checking account to pay her college tuition, she is the drawer, her bank is the drawee, and her college is the payee.

Between the time a check is drawn and the time it reaches the drawee, the effectiveness of the check may be altered by some event—for example, the drawer may die or order payment not to be made, or the account on which the check is drawn may be depleted. To avoid this problem, a payee may insist on payment by an instrument that has already been accepted by the drawee, such as a cashier’s check, a traveler’s check, or a certified check.

Cashier’s Checks

Checks are usually three-party instruments, but on some checks, the bank serves as both the drawer and the drawee. For example, when a bank draws a check on itself, the check is called a cashier’s check and is a negotiable instrument on issue (see Exhibit 27-1 on the facing page) [UCC 3-104(g)]. Normally, a cashier’s check indicates a specific payee. In effect, with a cashier’s check, the bank assumes responsibility for paying the check, thus making the check more readily acceptable as a substitute for cash.

EXHIBIT 27-1 • A Cashier's Check

*The abbreviation NT&SA stands for National Trust and Savings Association. The Bank of America NT&SA is a subsidiary of Bank of America Corporation, which is engaged in financial services, insurance, investment management, and other businesses.

For example, Blake needs to pay a moving company $8,000 for moving his household goods to his new home in another state. The moving company requests payment in the form of a cashier's check. Blake goes to a bank (he need not have an account at the bank) and purchases a cashier's check, payable to the moving company, in the amount of $8,000. Blake has to pay the bank the $8,000 for the check, plus a small service fee. He then gives the check to the moving company.

Cashier's checks are commonly used in business to pay for real estate transactions or to make tax payments because payment is immediately credited (the payee need not wait to see if the check "clears"). Except in very limited circumstances, the issuing bank must honor its cashier's checks when they are presented for payment. If a bank wrongfully dishonors a cashier's check, a holder can recover from the bank all expenses incurred, interest, and consequential damages [UCC 3-411]. This same rule applies if a bank wrongfully dishonors a certified check (to be discussed shortly) or a teller's check. (A teller's check is similar to a cashier's check except that usually it is drawn by a bank on another bank [UCC 3-104(h)]. A teller's check may be used when a person withdraws funds from one bank to transfer to an account at another bank.)

Rather than being treated as the equivalent of cash, should a cashier's check be treated as a note with all of the applicable defenses? That was the contention in the following case.

MidAmerica Bank, FSB v. Charter One Bank, FSB

Illinois Supreme Court, 232 Ill.2d 560, 905 N.E.2d 839 (2009).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Mary Christelle was the mother of David Hernandez, president of Essential Technologies of Illinois (ETI). Christelle bought a $50,000 cashier's check from Charter One Bank payable to ETI. ETI deposited the check into its account with MidAmerica Bank. Four days later, Christelle asked Charter One to stop payment (see pages 523 and 524) on the cashier's check. Charter One agreed and refused to honor the check. MidAmerica returned the check to ETI. Within two weeks, ETI's account had a negative balance of $52,000. MidAmerica closed the account and filed a

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 27.1 CONTINUED ♦ suit in an Illinois state court against Charter One, alleging that it had wrongfully dishonored the cashier's check. Charter One argued that a cashier's check should be treated as a note subject to the defense of fraud. The court ruled in MidAmerica's favor, but a state intermediate appellate court reversed the ruling. MidAmerica appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice KILBRIDE delivered the judgment of the court, with opinion.

* * * *

A cashier's check is an item drawn on the issuing bank. Thus, a cashier's check is not an item drawn on the customer's account. The plain language of [UCC] 4-403 permits a customer to stop payment only on items drawn "on the customer's account." It does not authorize a bank to stop payment on a cashier's check at a customer's request because cashier's checks are not drawn "on the customer's account." [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * A bank's refusal to pay a cashier's check based on its customer's request to stop payment is "wrongful" under [UCC] 3-411 because a customer has no right to stop payment on a cashier's check under [UCC] 4-403.

* * * By accepting Christelle's request to stop payment on the cashier's check issued by Charter One, and then refusing payment based solely on that request, Charter One wrongfully dishonored the cashier's check and is, therefore, liable under [UCC] 3-411.

* * * *

* * * Charter One submits that * * * revisions [to UCC Article 3] changed the law from treating cashier's checks as "cash equivalents" to treating them as "demand notes." Charter One argues that all defenses to the enforcement of a note now apply to cashier's checks.

* * * *

* * * [Under the UCC,] cashier's checks are treated as drafts to reflect common commercial usage, but [the] liability of the "drawer" is the same as the "maker" of a note. This is because a bank issuing a cashier's check is both the drawer and [the] drawee of the check. The UCC provides that cashier's checks are drafts, not notes. * * * The liability of a bank is that of the maker of a note because issuance of a cashier's check establishes the bank as both drawer and drawee, representing that it will honor the draft when presented. Thus the * * * revisions * * * do not represent a change in the former law. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The UCC comment preceding Article 3 explains that cashier's checks are to be treated as "cash equivalents." We therefore reject Charter One's argument that * * * revisions to the UCC changed the law to treat cashier's checks as "demand notes."

* * * *

Charter One, nonetheless, attempts to assert defenses to support its dishonor of the cashier's check, arguing that the cashier's check was procured by fraud. To the contrary, the record does not show that Charter One had knowledge of any fraud when it dishonored the cashier's check.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Illinois Supreme Court reversed the lower court's decision, awarded MidAmerica the amount of the check, and remanded the case for a determination of interest and fees. Except in limited circumstances, none of which applied here, a bank can obtain payment on a cashier's check over the drawee bank's stop-payment order.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the court had accepted Charter One's argument that a cashier's check should be treated as a note and the bank had presented proof of fraud in the procurement of the check. What might have been the result in this case? Explain.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • It is worth noting that no one—managers and consumers alike—can treat stop-payment orders casually. These orders have to be for a valid cause, such as fraud or nondelivery of merchandise or services purchased. Moreover, when a cashier's check is involved, as the court determined in this case, there virtually is never a valid reason to place a stop-payment order on a cashier's check, and banks normally should ignore such orders.

Traveler's Checks

A traveler's check is an instrument that is payable on demand, drawn on or payable at a financial institution (such as a bank), and designated as a traveler's check. The issuing institution is directly obligated to accept and pay its traveler's check according to the check's terms. Traveler's checks are designed as a safe substitute for cash when a person is on vacation or traveling and are issued for a fixed amount, such as $20, $50, or $100. The purchaser is required to sign the check at the time it is purchased and again at the time it is used [UCC 3-104(i)]. Today, instead of issuing traveler's checks, most major banks purchase and issue American Express traveler's checks for their customers (see Exhibit 27-2 below).

Certified Checks

A certified check is a check that has been accepted by the bank on which it is drawn [UCC 3-409(d)]. When a drawee bank agrees to certify a check, it immediately charges the drawer's account with the amount of the check and transfers those funds to its own certified-check account. In effect, the bank is agreeing in advance to accept that check when it is presented for payment and to make payment from those funds reserved in the certified-check account. Essentially, certification prevents the bank from denying liability. It is a promise that sufficient funds are on deposit and have been set aside to cover the check.

To certify a check, the bank writes or stamps the word certified on the face of the check and typically writes the amount that it will pay.¹ Either the drawer or the holder (payee) of a check can request certification, but the drawee bank is not required to certify a check. A bank's refusal to certify a check is not a dishonor of the check [UCC 3-409(d)]. Once a check is certified, the drawer and any prior indorsers are completely discharged from liability on the check [UCC 3-414(c), 3-415(d)]. Only the certifying bank is required to pay the instrument.

SECTION 2 THE BANK-CUSTOMER RELATIONSHIP

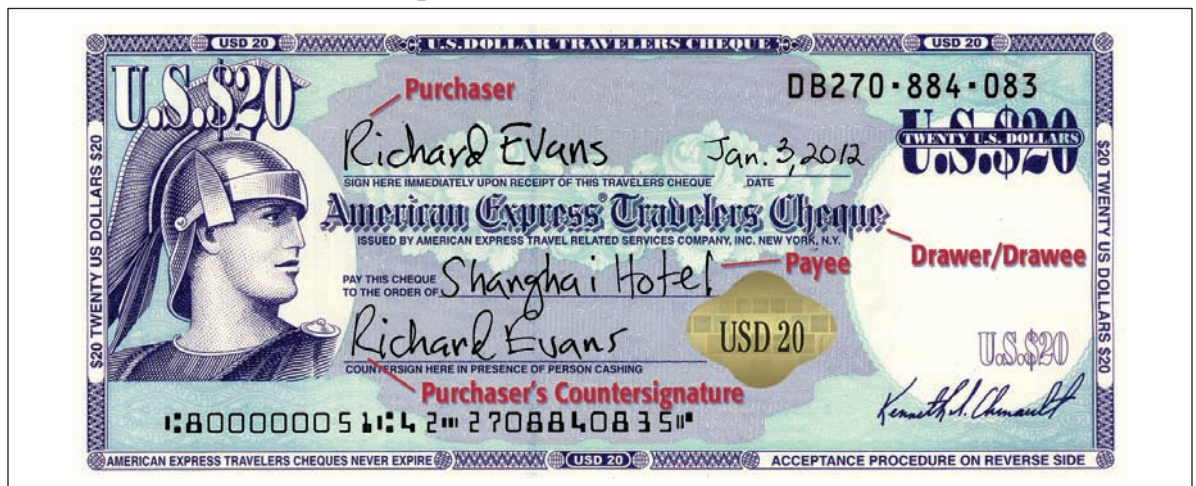

The bank-customer relationship begins when the customer opens a checking account and deposits funds that the bank will use to pay for checks written by the customer. Essentially, three types of relationships come into being, as discussed next.

Creditor-Debtor Relationship

A creditor-debtor relationship is created between a customer and a bank when, for example, the customer makes cash deposits into a checking account. When a customer makes a deposit, the customer becomes a creditor, and the bank a debtor, for the amount deposited.

1. If the certification does not state an amount, and the amount is later increased and the instrument negotiated to a holder in due course (HDC), the obligation of the certifying bank is the amount of the instrument when it was taken by the HDC.

EXHIBIT 27-2 • An American Express Traveler's Check

Agency Relationship

An agency relationship also arises between the customer and the bank when the customer writes a check on his or her account. In effect, the customer is ordering the bank to pay the amount specified on the check to the holder when the holder presents the check to the bank for payment. In this situation, the bank becomes the customer's agent and is obligated to honor the customer's request. Similarly, if the customer deposits a check into his or her account, the bank, as the customer's agent, is obligated to collect payment on the check from the bank on which the check was drawn.

Contractual Relationship

Whenever a bank-customer relationship is established, certain contractual rights and duties arise. The contractual rights and duties of the bank and the customer depend on the nature of the transaction. These rights and duties are discussed in detail in the following pages.

THE BANK'S DUTY TO HONOR CHECKS

When a banking institution provides checking services, it agrees to honor the checks written by its customers, with the usual stipulation that sufficient funds must be available in the account to pay each check. When a drawee bank wrongfully fails to honor a check, it is liable to its customer for damages resulting from its refusal to pay [UCC 4–402(b)]. To sue for wrongful dishonor, the customer does not have to prove that the bank breached its contractual commitment or was negligent.

The customer's agreement with the bank includes a general obligation to keep sufficient funds on deposit to cover all checks written. The customer is liable to the payee or to the holder of a check in a civil suit if a check is dishonored for insufficient funds. If intent to defraud can be proved, the customer can also be subject to criminal prosecution for writing a bad check.

When the bank properly dishonors a check for insufficient funds, it has no liability to the customer. The bank may rightfully refuse payment on a customer's check in other circumstances as well. We look here at the rights and duties of both the bank and its customers in specific situations.

Overdrafts

When the bank receives an item properly payable from its customer's checking account but the account contains insufficient funds to cover the amount of the check, the bank has two options. It can either (1) dishonor the item or (2) pay the item and charge the customer's account, thus creating an overdraft, providing that the customer has authorized the payment and the payment does not violate any bank-customer agreement [UCC 4–401(a)].² The bank can subtract the difference (plus a service charge) from the customer's next deposit because the check carries with it an enforceable implied promise to reimburse the bank.

When a check "bounces," a holder can resubmit the check, hoping that at a later date sufficient funds will be available to pay it. The holder must notify any indorsers on the check of the first dishonor, however; otherwise, they will be discharged from their signature liability, as discussed in Chapter 26.

A bank can expressly agree with a customer to accept overdrafts through what is sometimes called an "overdraft protection agreement." If such an agreement is formed, any failure of the bank to honor a check because it would create an overdraft breaches this agreement and is treated as a wrongful dishonor [UCC 4–402(a), (b)].

Postdated Checks

A bank may also charge a postdated check against a customer's account, unless the customer notifies the bank, in a timely manner, not to pay the check until the stated date. (Indeed, banks today typically ignore the dates on checks and treat them as demand instruments unless they have received notice from a customer that a check was postdated.) The notice of postdating must be given in time to allow the bank to act on the notice before committing itself to pay on the check.

The UCC states that the bank should treat the notice like a stop-payment order (to be discussed shortly). If the bank fails to act on the customer's notice and charges the customer's account before the date on the postdated check, the bank may be liable for any damages incurred by the customer. Damages include those that result from the dishonor of checks that are subsequently presented for payment and are dishonored for insufficient funds [UCC 4-401(c)].

2. When customers have a joint account, the bank cannot hold any customer on the account liable for payment of an overdraft unless that customer has signed the check or has benefited from the proceeds of the check [UCC 4–401(b)].

Stale Checks

Commercial banking practice regards a check that is presented for payment more than six months from its date as a stale check. A bank is not obligated to pay an uncertified check presented more than six months from its date [UCC 4-404]. When receiving a stale check for payment, the bank has the option of paying or not paying the check. If a bank pays a stale check in good faith without consulting the customer, the bank has the right to charge the customer's account for the amount of the check.

Death or Incompetence of a Customer

Neither the death nor the incompetence of a customer revokes a bank's authority to pay an item until the bank knows of the situation and has had reasonable time to act on the notice [UCC 4-405]. Thus, if, at the time a check is issued or its collection is undertaken, a bank does not know that the customer who wrote the check has been declared incompetent, the bank can pay without incurring liability.

Even when a bank knows of the death of its customer, for ten days after the date of death it can pay or certify checks drawn on or before the date of death. Without this provision, banks would constantly be required to verify the continued life and competence of their drawers. An exception to the rule is made if a person claiming an interest in the account of the deceased customer, such as an heir or an executor of the estate (see Chapter 52), orders the bank to stop payment.

Stop-Payment Orders

A stop-payment order is an order by a customer to her or his bank not to pay a certain check.³ Only a customer or a "person authorized to draw on the account" can order the bank not to pay the check when it is presented for payment [UCC 4-403(a)]. A customer has no right to stop payment on a check that has already been certified (or accepted) by a bank, however. Also, a stop-payment order must be received within a reasonable time and in a reasonable manner to permit the bank to act on it [UCC 4-403(a)]. Although a stop-payment order can be given orally, usually by phone, the order is binding on the bank for only fourteen calendar days unless confirmed in writing.⁴ A written stop-payment order (see Exhibit 27-3 on the following page) or an oral order confirmed in writing is effective for six months, at which time it must be renewed in writing [UCC 4-403(b)].

BANK'S LIABILITY FOR WRONGFUL PAYMENT If the bank pays the check over the customer's properly instituted stop-payment order, the bank will be obligated to recredit the customer's account. In addition, if the bank's payment over a stop-payment order causes subsequent checks written on the drawer's account to "bounce," the bank will be liable for the resultant costs the drawer incurs. The bank is liable only for the amount of the actual loss suffered by the drawer because of the wrongful payment, however [UCC 4-403(c)].

Assume that Mike Murano orders one hundred cell phones from Advanced Communications, Inc., at $50 each. Murano pays in advance for the phones with a check for $5,000. Later that day, Advanced Communications tells Murano that it will not deliver the phones as arranged. Murano immediately calls the bank and stops payment on the check. Two days later, in spite of this stop-payment order, the bank inadvertently honors Murano's check to Advanced Communications for the undelivered phones. The bank will be liable to Murano for the full $5,000.

The result would be different, however, if Advanced Communications had delivered and Murano had accepted ninety-nine phones. Because Murano would have owed Advanced Communications $4,950 for the goods delivered, Murano's actual loss would be only $50. Consequently, the bank would be liable to Murano for only $50.

CUSTOMER'S LIABILITY FOR WRONGFUL STOP-PAYMENT ORDER A stop-payment order has its risks for a customer. The drawer must have a valid legal ground for issuing such an order; otherwise, the holder can sue the drawer for payment. Moreover, defenses sufficient to refuse payment to a payee may not be valid grounds to prevent payment to a subsequent holder in due course [UCC 3-305, 3-306]. A person who wrongfully stops payment on a check not only will be liable to the payee for the amount of the check but also may be liable for consequential damages incurred by the payee as a result of the wrongful stop-payment order.

3. Note that although this discussion focuses on checks, the right to stop payment is not limited to checks; it extends to any item payable by any bank. See Official Comment 3 to UCC 4-403.

4. Some states do not recognize oral stop-payment orders; the orders must be in writing.

Forged Drawers' Signatures

When a bank pays a check on which the drawer's signature is forged, generally the bank suffers the loss.⁵ A bank may be able to recover at least some of the loss from the customer, however, if the customer's negligence substantially contributed to the forgery. A bank may also obtain partial recovery from the forger of the check (if he or she can be found) or from the holder who presented the check for payment (if the holder knew that the signature was forged).

THE GENERAL RULE A forged signature on a check has no legal effect as the signature of a drawer [UCC 3-403(a)]. For this reason, banks require a signature card from each customer who opens a checking account. Signature cards allow a bank to verify whether the signatures on its customers' checks are genuine. The general rule is that the bank must recredit the customers' account when it pays on a forged signature. (Banks today normally verify signatures only on checks that exceed a certain threshold, such as $2,500 or some higher amount. Even though a bank sometimes incurs liability costs when it has paid forged checks, the costs of verifying the signature on every check would be much higher.)

5. Each year, check fraud costs banks many billions of dollars—more than the combined losses from credit-card fraud, theft from automated teller machines, and armed robberies.

Note that a bank may contractually shift to the customer the risk of forged checks created by the use of facsimile or other nonmanual signatures. For example, the contract might stipulate that the customer is solely responsible for maintaining security over any device affixing a signature. The contract might also provide that any nonmanual signature is effective as the customer's signature regardless of whether the person who affixed the signature was authorized to do so.

CUSTOMER NEGLIGENCE When a customer's negligence substantially contributes to a forgery, the bank normally will not be obligated to recredit the customer's account for the amount of the check [UCC 3-406(a)]. If negligence on the part of the bank (or other "person") paying the instrument or taking it for value or for collection substantially contributed to the customer's loss, however, the customer's liability may be reduced by the amount of the loss caused by the bank's negligence [UCC 3-406(b)].

Suppose that CompuNet, Inc., uses a check-writing machine to write its payroll and business checks. A CompuNet employee uses the machine to create a check for $10,000 payable to himself, and CompuNet's bank subsequently honors it. CompuNet asks the bank to recredit $10,000 to its account for incorrectly paying on a forged check. If the bank can show that CompuNet failed to take reasonable care in controlling access to the check-writing equipment, the bank will not be required to recredit the account for the amount of the forged check. If CompuNet can show that negligence on the part of the bank contributed substantially to the loss, however, then CompuNet's liability may be reduced proportionately.

In the following case, an employee opened a bogus bank account and fraudulently deposited his employer's checks in it for years. The court had to determine if the bank should have requested written authorization from the company before opening the account.

Auto-Owners Insurance Co. v. Bank One

Supreme Court of Indiana, 879 N.E.2d 1086 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Kenneth Wulf worked in the claims department of Auto-Owners Insurance Company for ten years. When the department received checks, a staff member would note them in the file and send them on to headquarters. Wulf opened a checking account at Bank One in the name of “Auto-Owners, Kenneth B. Wulf.” Over a period of eight years, he deposited $546,000 worth of checks that he had stolen from Auto-Owners and indorsed with a stamp that read “Auto-Owners Insurance Deposit Only.” When the scam was finally discovered, Auto-Owners sued Bank One, contending that it had failed to exercise ordinary care in opening the account because it had not asked for documentation to show that Wulf was authorized to open an account in the name of Auto-Owners. The lower courts rejected that argument and granted summary judgment for Bank One. Auto-Owners appealed.

SULLIVAN, Justice.

* * * *

We begin with the question of whether Bank One exercised ordinary care. * * * Auto-Owners claims that Bank One should have invested more energy in confirming Wulf's legitimacy when Wulf opened a bank account in Auto-Owners's name in 1991. However, [UCC 3-]405(b) makes no mention of a bank's responsibilities when opening an account for a new customer. Rather, subsection (b) requires ordinary care from a bank in the “paying” or “taking” of an instrument.

* * * *

Even if Bank One did not demonstrate ordinary care in its acceptance of the checks proffered [submitted] by Wulf, Auto-Owners must still show that such a lack of ordinary care “substantially contributed” to its losses.

* * * Thus, to determine whether conduct has substantially contributed to a loss, we follow the second comment to [UCC 3-406] and ask whether the opening of the bank account was (1) a contributing factor to Auto-Owners's loss and (2) whether the opening of the bank account was a substantial factor in bringing the loss about. * * * We will view the conduct of Bank One “in its entirety.” [Emphasis added.]

* * * Other than the lack of procedure used in opening the bank account in 1991, Bank One appears to have followed required protocol in depositing checks from Wulf. Even if we assume that Bank One's conduct in opening the account was a contributing factor to Auto-Owners's loss, and meets the first part of the “substantially contributed” test, * * * Bank One's conduct was not a substantial factor in bringing that loss about under the second part of the test. In other words, when viewed in its entirety Bank One's conduct does not meet the “substantially contributed” test. * * * Auto Owners was the substantial contributor to its own losses * * * with its less than rigorous monitoring of its files and incoming checks.

CASE 27.2 CONTINUED ♦ * * * We agree with the trial court's determination that Bank One was entitled to summary judgment and that Auto-Owners is not entitled to a trial * * *.

DECISION AND REMEDY • Indiana's highest court affirmed the lower court's decision granting summary judgment to Bank One. Bank One's conduct did not "substantially contribute" to bringing about the losses suffered by Auto-Owners. The bank breached no duty to the insurance company by opening Wulf's checking account.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • What reasonable steps could Auto-Owners have taken to prevent such internal fraud?

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Would the outcome in this case have been changed if Auto-Owners had never given Wulf (and other staff members) the authority to deposit checks to its bank account? Why or why not?

Timely Examination of Bank Statements Required.

Banks typically send or make available (such as with online statements) to their customers monthly statements detailing the activity in their checking accounts. In the past, banks routinely included the canceled checks themselves (or photocopies of the canceled checks) with the statement sent to the customer. Today, most banks simply provide the customer with information (check number, amount, and date of payment) on the statement that will allow the customer to reasonably identify each check that the bank has paid [UCC 4-406(a), (b)]. If the bank retains the canceled checks, it must keep the checks—or legible images of them—for seven years [UCC 4-406(b)]. The customer may obtain a copy of a canceled check from the bank during this period of time.

The customer has a duty to examine promptly bank statements (and canceled checks or photocopies, if they are included) with reasonable care on receipt and to report any alterations or forged signatures [UCC 4-406(c)]. The customer is also obligated to report any alteration or forgery in the signatures of indorsers (to be discussed shortly). If the customer fails to fulfill her or his duty and the bank suffers a loss as a result, the customer will be liable for the loss [UCC 4-406(d)].

Consequences of Failure to Detect Forgeries.

Sometimes, the same wrongdoer forges the customer's signature on a series of checks. In that situation, to recover for all of the forged items, the customer must discover and report the first forged check to the bank within thirty calendar days of the receipt or availability of the bank statement [UCC 4-406(d)(2)]. Failure to notify the bank within this time period discharges the bank's liability for all forged checks that it pays prior to notification.

CASE IN POINT Joseph Montanez, an employee at Espresso Roma Corporation, used stolen software and blank checks to generate company checks on his home computer. The series of forged checks spanned a period of more than two years and totaled more than $330,000. When the bank statements containing the forged checks arrived in the mail, Montanez removed the checks so that the forgeries would go undetected. Eventually, Espresso Roma discovered the forgeries and asked the bank to recredit its account. When the bank refused, litigation ensued. The court held that the bank was not liable for the forged checks because Espresso Roma had failed to report the first forgeries within thirty days, as required by the UCC.⁶

Negligence and the Bank's Duty of Care. In one situation, a bank customer can escape liability, at least in part, for failing to notify the bank of forged or altered checks within the required thirty-day period. That situation occurs when the customer can prove that the bank was also negligent—that is, that the bank failed to exercise ordinary care. Then the bank, too, will be liable, and the loss will be allocated between the bank and the customer on the basis of comparative negligence [UCC 4-406(e)]. In other words, even though a customer may have been negligent, the bank may still have to recredit the customer's account for a portion of the loss if the bank failed to exercise ordinary care.

The UCC defines ordinary care as the "observance of reasonable commercial standards, prevailing in the area in which [a] person is located, with respect to the business in which that person is engaged" [UCC 3-103(a)(7)]. As mentioned earlier, it is customary in the banking industry to examine signatures only on checks that exceed a certain amount. Thus, a bank's failure to verify the authenticity of a signature on a particular check does not necessarily mean that it has breached its duty to exercise ordinary care.

The plaintiff in the following case alleged that his father's bank had breached the duty of care when it added a signatory to his father's bank account. The central question before the court had to do with how the required standard of care was to be determined.

Schultz v. Bank of America, N.A.

Court of Appeals of Maryland, 413 Md. 15, 990 A.2d 1078 (2010).

www.courts.state.md.us/opinions.html^a

GREENE, J. [Judge]

* * * *

[Melvin] Schultz died on July 5, 2005, at the age of 81. * * * Before he died * * * he developed some sort of relationship with [Robin] Holbrook, who had moved into Schultz's home. Holbrook was apparently acting as Schultz's caregiver, but Petitioner [Stephen Schultz, Melvin Schultz's son and personal representative^b] alleges that Holbrook also took advantage of Schultz by having her name added to Schultz's account with the Bank [of America, N.A.]. Petitioner has advanced two theories as to how this occurred, one in which Holbrook coerced Schultz into adding her name to his account and another in which Holbrook had her name added through forgery. There is no dispute that Holbrook's name was in fact added to Schultz's account and that she made withdrawals from the account.

Petitioner filed suit against the Bank, alleging that the Bank negligently handled Schultz's account * * *. At trial, * * * a handwriting expert examined several of Schultz's known signatures and the signature card that was used to add Holbrook's name to Schultz's bank account. He opined that the signature purporting to be Schultz's on the signature card was not the signature that Schultz used in the normal course of business. He also testified that several checks drawn on Schultz's account appeared to have been forged with Schultz's signature.

Petitioner * * * testified to the deterioration in Schultz's health, and * * * that the signatures on some checks drawn from Schultz's bank account were not authentic. He also explained that there had been activity on Schultz's ATM account after Schultz met Holbrook, even though Schultz never used an ATM.

* * * *

* * * The trial court denied the Bank's motion [for summary judgment], concluding that expert testimony was unnecessary to establish the standard of care on the facts of this case, [and] that there was sufficient evidence to submit the negligence claim to the jury * * * .

[At trial, the jury found in Schultz's favor. The bank appealed, and the Court of Special Appeals (an intermediate appellate court) reversed the trial court's judgment. Schultz then appealed to Maryland's highest state court, the Court of Appeals.]

* * * *

In a negligence case, there are four elements that the plaintiff must prove to prevail: "a duty owed to him [or her] (or to a class of which he [or she] is a part), a breach of that duty, a legally cognizable causal relationship between the breach of duty and the harm suffered, and damages." In regard to the duty a bank owes to its customers when disbursing the customers' funds, banks are not to be held strictly liable for every wrongful disbursement. Instead, our case law and the comments to the Maryland Uniform Commercial Code ("Commercial Code") establish that a duty of "ordinary care" applies. The Commercial Code defines "ordinary care" as the "1) observance of reasonable commercial standards, 2) which prevail in the area in which the person is located, 3) with respect to the business in which the person is engaged." A bank customer may bring a negligence suit against a bank for a violation of this duty of ordinary care. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

In this case, Petitioner's negligence claim is based on his allegation that the Bank failed to satisfy its duty of ordinary care in regard to its handling of Schultz's checking account. Specifically at issue in this appeal is Petitioner's claim that the Bank did not satisfy that duty when it "fail[ed] to properly add Holbrook to the account and verify her and [Schultz's] identities."

The Bank argues that expert testimony was necessary to establish

the Bank's standard of care, while Petitioner contends that * * * no expert testimony was necessary to explain the Bank's standard of care to the jury. We disagree with Petitioner's contention * * *. To explain [the process of adding names to bank accounts], a plaintiff must produce expert testimony from someone familiar with the process from a bank's perspective. Petitioner also failed to provide evidence of the reasonable commercial banking standards that prevail specifically in the relevant geographical area of the Bank, as required by the ordinary care standard. Finally, banking practices are changing in the era of the Internet and other electronic banking practices. Bank procedures may not be the same today as they were just a few years ago, which also means that an expert may be necessary to explain to the trier of fact [a judge or jury] what duty a bank owes to a customer.

When negligence is alleged against a bank, * * * expert testimony is ordinarily necessary to establish the applicable standard of care. Such testimony is not necessary when the bank's alleged negligence, if proven, so obviously deviated from the applicable standard of care that the trier of fact could appreciate the deviation without an expert's assistance. The alleged negligence in this case, however, involved internal banking procedures that the trier of fact could not be expected to appreciate. Petitioner should have provided expert testimony to explain to the jury what banks ordinarily do to protect their customers from imposters when adding a name to the customer's account, so that the jury could then decide whether the Bank had acted in accordance with the duty of ordinary care. Instead, Petitioner provided no testimony on this issue at all. Without expert testimony to explain the duty of ordinary care, the jury could not know whether to hold the Bank accountable for failing to protect its customer's account. Petitioner therefore failed to provide any competent evidence of the duty owed to him, a necessary element of a negligence claim, and the trial court should not have submitted this claim to the jury. We agree with the Court of Special Appeals that the trial court should have granted the Bank's motion for judgment.

Judgment of the court of special appeals affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. "Expert testimony should not be required to inform jurors of what a reasonable standard of care should be in commonplace banking transactions." Do you agree with this statement? Why or why not?
2. Suppose that both Schultz and the bank had been found negligent in the addition of Holbrook's name to Schultz's account. In this situation, which party would be liable for any damages resulting from the negligence? Explain.

One-Year Time Limit. Regardless of the degree of care exercised by the customer or the bank, the UCC places an absolute time limit on the liability of a bank for paying a check with a customer's forged signature. A customer who fails to report her or his forged signature within one year from the date that the statement was made available for inspection loses the legal right to have the bank recredit her or his account [UCC 4-406(f)]. The parties can also agree in their contract to a lower time limit, but the UCC stipulates that the bank has no liability on forged instruments after one year.

CASE IN POINT Wanda Williamson, a clerk at Visiting Nurses Association of Telfair County, Inc. (VNA), was responsible for making VNA bank deposits, but she was not a signatory on the association's account. Over a four-year period, Williamson embezzled more than $250,000 from VNA by forging its indorsement on checks, cashing them at the bank, and keeping a portion of the proceeds.

Williamson was eventually arrested and convicted. VNA then filed a lawsuit against the bank, claiming that it had been negligent in allowing Williamson to cash the checks. The court dismissed the case because VNA had failed to report the forged indorsements within the prescribed time period. Not only did UCC 4-406(f) preclude the action, but the bank's contract with VNA had also included a clause stating that customers had to report a forgery within sixty days. Thus, the bank was not liable.⁷

OTHER PARTIES FROM WHOM THE BANK MAY RECOVER As noted earlier, a forged signature on a check has no legal effect as the signature of a drawer; a forged signature, however, is effective as the signature of the unauthorized signer [UCC 3-403(a)]. Therefore, when a bank pays a check on which the drawer's signature is forged, the bank has a right to recover from the party who forged the signature. The bank may also have a right to recover from a party (its customer or a collecting bank—to be discussed later in this chapter) who transferred a check bearing a forged drawer's signature and received payment (see the discussion of transfer warranties in Chapter 26). This right is limited, however, in that the bank cannot recover from a person who took the check in good faith and for value or who in good faith changed position in reliance on the payment or acceptance [UCC 3–418(c)].

Checks Bearing Forged Indorsements

A bank that pays a customer's check bearing a forged indorsement must recredit the customer's account or be liable to the customer (drawer) for breach of contract. Suppose that Cameron issues a $500 check "to the order of Sophia." Margo steals the check, forges Sophia's indorsement, and cashes the check. When the check reaches Cameron's bank, the bank pays it and debits Cameron's account. The bank must recredit Cameron's account for the $500 because it failed to carry out Cameron's order to pay "to the order of Sophia" [UCC 4–401(a)]. Of course, Cameron's bank can in turn recover—for breach of warranty (see Chapter 26 on page 507)—from the bank that cashed the check when Margo presented it [UCC 4–207(a)(2)].

Eventually, the loss usually falls on the first party to take the instrument bearing the forged indorsement because a forged indorsement does not transfer title. Thus, anyone who takes an instrument with a forged indorsement cannot become a holder.

The customer, in any event, has a duty to report forged indorsements promptly. The bank is relieved of liability if the customer fails to report the forged indorsements within three years of receiving the bank statement that contained the forged items [UCC 4–111].⁸

Altered Checks

The customer's instruction to the bank is to pay the exact amount on the face of the check to the holder. The bank has an implicit duty to examine checks before making final payments. If it fails to detect an alteration, it is liable to its customer for the loss because it did not pay as the customer ordered. The loss is the difference between the original amount of the check and the amount actually paid. Suppose that a check written for $11 is raised to $111. The customer's account will be charged $11 (the amount the customer ordered the bank to pay). The bank will normally be responsible for the remaining $100 [UCC 4–401(d)(1)].

CUSTOMER NEGLIGENCE As in a situation involving a forged drawer's signature, a customer's negligence can shift the loss when payment is made on an altered check (unless the bank was also negligent). For example, a person may carelessly write a check and leave large gaps around the numbers and words where additional numbers and words can be inserted (see Exhibit 27–4 on the following page).

Similarly, a person who signs a check and leaves the dollar amount for someone else to fill in is barred from protesting when the bank unknowingly and in good faith pays whatever amount is shown [UCC 4–401(d)(2)]. Finally, if the bank can trace its loss on successive altered checks to the customer's failure to discover the initial alteration, then the bank can reduce its liability for reimbursing the customer's account [UCC 4–406].⁹

In every situation involving a forged drawer's signature or an alteration, a bank must observe reasonable commercial standards of care in paying on a customer's checks [UCC 4–406(e)]. The customer's contributory negligence can be asserted only if the bank has exercised ordinary care.

OTHER PARTIES FROM WHOM THE BANK MAY RECOVER

The bank is entitled to recover the amount of loss (including expenses and any loss of interest) from a transferor who, by presenting a check for payment, warrants that the check has not been altered.¹⁰ This rule has two exceptions. If the bank is the drawer (as it is on a cashier's check), it cannot recover on this ground from the presenting party if the party is a holder in due course (HDC) acting in good faith [UCC 3-417(a)(2), 4-208(a)(2)]. The reason is that an instrument's drawer is in a better position than an HDC to know whether the instrument has been altered.

8. This is a general statute of limitations for all actions under Article 4; it provides that any lawsuit must be brought within three years of the time that the cause of action arises.

9. The bank's defense is the same whether the successive payments were made on a forged drawer's signature or on altered checks. The bank must prove that prompt notice would have prevented its loss. For example, notification might have alerted the bank not to pay further items or might have enabled it to catch the forger.

10. Usually, the party presenting an instrument for payment is the payee, a holder, a bank customer, or a collecting bank. A bank's customers include its account holders, which may include other banks [UCC 4–104(a)(5)]. As will be discussed later in this chapter, a collecting bank is any bank handling an item for collection except the bank on which the check is drawn [UCC 4–105(5)].

Similarly, an HDC who presents a certified check for payment in good faith does not warrant to the check's certifier that the check was not altered before the HDC acquired it [UCC 3-417(a)(2), 4-208(a)(2)]. Consider an example. Alan, the drawer, draws a check for $500 payable to Pam, the payee. Pam alters the amount to $5,000. National City Bank, the drawee, certifies the check for $5,000. Pam negotiates the check to Jordan, an HDC. The drawee bank pays Jordan $5,000. On discovering the mistake, the bank cannot recover from Jordan the $4,500 paid by mistake, even though the bank was not in a superior position to detect the alteration. This is in accord with the purpose of certification, which is to obtain the definite obligation of a bank to honor a definite instrument.

For a synopsis of the rules governing the honoring of checks, see Concept Summary 27.1 on the facing page.

THE BANK'S DUTY TO ACCEPT DEPOSITS

A bank has a duty to its customer to accept the customer's deposits of cash and checks. When checks are deposited, the bank must make the funds represented by those checks available within certain time frames. A bank also has a duty to collect payment on any checks payable or indorsed to its customer and deposited by the customer into his or her account. Cash deposits made in U.S. currency are received into the customer's account without being subject to further collection procedures.

Availability Schedule for Deposited Checks

The Expedited Funds Availability Act (EFAA) of 1987¹¹ and Regulation CC,¹² which was issued by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors (the Federal Reserve System will be discussed shortly) to implement the act, require that any local check deposited must be available for withdrawal by check or as cash within one business day from the date of deposit. A check is classified as a local check if the first bank to receive the check for payment and the bank on which the check is drawn are located in the same check-processing region (regions are designated by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors). For nonlocal checks, the funds must be available for withdrawal within not more than five business days. Note that under the Check Clearing in the 21st Century Act (the Check 21 Act will be discussed later in this chapter), a bank will have to credit a customer's account as soon as the bank receives the funds.

Honoring Checks

Situation	Basic Rules
Wrongful Dishonor [UCC 4-402]	The bank is liable to its customer for actual damages proved if it wrongfully dishonors a check due to its own mistake.
Overdraft [UCC 4-401]	The bank has a right to charge a customer's account for any item properly payable, even if the charge results in an overdraft.
Postdated Check [UCC 4-401]	The bank may charge a postdated check against a customer's account, unless the customer notifies the bank of the postdating in time to allow the bank to act on the notice before the bank commits itself to pay on the check.
Stale Check [UCC 4-404]	The bank is not obligated to pay an uncertified check presented more than six months after its date, but the bank may do so in good faith without liability.
Death or Incompetence of a Customer [UCC 4-405]	So long as the bank does not know of the death or incompetence of a customer, the bank can pay an item without liability. Even with knowledge of a customer's death, a bank can honor or certify checks (in the absence of a stop-payment order) for ten days after the date of the customer's death.
Stop-Payment Order [UCC 4-403]	The customer (or a "person authorized to draw on the account") must institute a stop-payment order in time for the bank to have a reasonable opportunity to act. A customer has no right to stop payment on a check that has been certified or accepted by the bank, however, and can be held liable for stopping payment on any check without a valid legal ground.
Forged Signature or Alteration [UCC 4-406]	The customer has a duty to examine account statements with reasonable care on receipt and to notify the bank promptly of any unauthorized signatures or alterations. The customer's failure to report promptly an unauthorized signature or alteration will discharge the bank's liability—unless the bank failed to exercise reasonable care (and then the bank may be responsible for some portion of the loss). The customer is prevented from holding the bank liable after one year for unauthorized customer signatures or alterations and after three years for unauthorized indorsements.

1. That funds be available on the next business day for cash deposits and wire transfers, government checks, the first $100 of a day's check deposits, cashier's checks, certified checks, and checks for which the banks receiving and paying the checks are branches of the same institution.
2. That the first $100 of any deposit be available for cash withdrawal on the opening of the next business day after deposit. If a local check is deposited, the next $400 is to be available for withdrawal by no later than 5:00 P.M. on the next business day. If, for example, Heidi deposits a local check for $500 on Monday, she can withdraw $100 in cash at the opening of the business day on Tuesday, and an additional $400 must be available for withdrawal by no later than 5:00 P.M. on Wednesday.

A different availability schedule applies to deposits made at nonproprietary automated teller machines (ATMs). These are ATMs that are not owned or operated by the bank receiving the deposits. Basically, a five-day hold is permitted on all deposits, including cash deposits, made at nonproprietary ATMs. Other exceptions also exist. For example, a banking institution has eight days to make funds available in new accounts (those open less than thirty days) and has an extra four days on deposits that exceed $5,000 (except deposits of government and cashier's checks).

Some commentators argue that making funds available more quickly has encouraged fraud. See this chapter's Insight into Ethics feature below for a discussion of this issue.

Interest-Bearing Accounts

Under the Truth-in-Savings Act (TISA) of 1991¹³ and Regulation DD,¹⁴ the act's implementing regulation, banks must pay interest based on the full balance of a customer's interest-bearing account each day. For example, Nigel has an interest-bearing checking account with First National Bank. Nigel keeps a $500 balance in the account for most of the month but withdraws all but $50 the day before the bank posts the interest. The bank cannot pay interest on just the $50. The interest must be adjusted to account for the entire month, including those days when Nigel's balance was higher.

Before opening a deposit account, new customers must be provided certain information. The information, which must also appear in all advertisements, includes the following:

1. The minimum balance required to open an account and to be paid interest.
2. The interest, stated in terms of the annual percentage yield on the account.
3. How interest is calculated.

13. 12 U.S.C. Sections 4301–4313.

14. 12 C.F.R. Sections 230.1–230.9.

4. Any fees, charges, and penalties and how they are calculated.

Also, under the TISA and Regulation DD, a customer's monthly statement must disclose the interest earned on the account, any fees that were charged, how the fees were calculated, and the number of days that the statement covers.

The Traditional Collection Process

Usually, deposited checks involve parties who do business at different banks, but sometimes checks are written between customers of the same bank. Either situation brings into play the bank collection process as it operates under Article 4 of the UCC. The check-collection process described in the following subsections will be modified as the banking industry implements Check 21, which will be discussed shortly.

DESIGNATIONS OF BANKS INVOLVED IN THE COLLECTION PROCESS

The first bank to receive a check for payment is the depository bank.¹⁵ For example, when a person deposits a tax-refund check

15. All definitions in this section are found in UCC 4–105. The terms depository and depository have different meanings in the banking context. A depository bank is a physical place (a bank or other institution) in which deposits or funds are held or stored.

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

Expedited Funds and an Increase in Check Fraud

Since the Expedited Funds Availability Act (EFAA) was enacted, millions of people have fallen prey to various types of check fraud. In a common scam, the fraudsters contact an individual—via e-mail, telephone, or letter—and say that they will send that person a check for a certain amount if he or she agrees to wire some of the funds back to them, typically to cover “fees and taxes.” The victim receives a check and deposits it in his or her account. A day or so later, when the law says the funds must be made available, the victim confirms that the funds are in his or her bank account and wires the requested amount back to the fraudsters.

Unfortunately, by the time the bank discovers the check is a fake and notifies the customer, he or she has already sent thousands of dollars to the fraudsters. Because the check was counterfeit, the bank has no liability on it, and the loss falls to the customer. The incidence of these scams is increasing, largely because the fraudsters know that the law requires U.S. banks to make the funds available soon after checks are deposited, even if those checks later prove to be counterfeit.

Moreover, technology has improved fraudsters' ability to create checks that look real. Although the EFAA was intended to protect bank customers, it now appears to be having the opposite effect—making them a target for increased fraud.

CRITICAL THINKING

INSIGHT INTO THE BUSINESS ENVIRONMENT

Why would banks say that they, too, are worse off because of the EFAA?

from the Internal Revenue Service into a personal checking account at the local bank, that bank is the depository bank. The bank on which a check is drawn (the drawee bank) is called the payor bank. Any bank except the payor bank that handles a check during some phase of the collection process is a collecting bank. Any bank except the payor bank or the depository bank to which an item is transferred in the course of this collection process is called an intermediary bank.

During the collection process, any bank can take on one or more of the various roles of depository, payor, collecting, or intermediary bank. To illustrate: Brooke, a buyer in New York, writes a check on her New York bank and sends it to David, a seller in San Francisco. David deposits the check in his San Francisco bank account. David's bank is both a depository bank and a collecting bank. Brooke's bank in New York is the payor bank. As the check travels from San Francisco to New York, any collecting bank handling the item in the collection process (other than the ones acting as depository bank and payor bank) is also called an intermediary bank. Exhibit 27–5 below illustrates how various banks function in the check-collection process.

CHECK COLLECTION BETWEEN CUSTOMERS OF THE SAME BANK An item that is payable by the depository bank that receives it (which in this situation is also the payor bank) is called an “on-us item.” Usually, a bank issues a “provisional credit” for on-us items within the same day. If the bank does not dishonor the check by the opening of the second banking day following its receipt, the check is considered paid [UCC 4–215(e)(2)].

CHECK COLLECTION BETWEEN CUSTOMERS OF DIFFERENT BANKS Once a depository bank receives a check, it must arrange to present the check, either directly or through intermediary banks, to the appropriate payor bank. Each bank in the collection chain must pass the check on before midnight of the next banking day following its receipt [UCC 4–202(b)].¹⁶

16. A bank may take a “reasonably longer time” in certain circumstances, such as a power failure that disrupts the bank’s computer system [UCC 4–202(b)].

EXHIBIT 27–5 • The Check-Collection Process

A “banking day” is any part of a day on which the bank is open to carry on substantially all of its banking functions. Thus, if only a bank’s drive-through facilities are open, a check deposited on Saturday will not trigger a bank’s midnight deadline until the following Monday. When the check reaches the payor bank, that bank is liable for the face amount of the check, unless the payor bank dishonors the check or returns it by midnight of the next banking day following receipt [UCC 4–302].¹⁷

Because of this deadline and because banks need to maintain an even work flow in the many items they handle daily, the UCC permits what is called deferred posting. According to UCC 4–108, “a bank may fix an afternoon hour of 2:00 P.M. or later as a cutoff hour for the handling of money and items and the making of entries on its books.” Any checks received after that hour “may be treated as being received at the opening of the next banking day.” Thus, if a bank’s “cutoff hour” is 3:00 P.M., a check received by a payor bank at 4:00 P.M. on Monday will be deferred for posting until Tuesday. In this situation, the payor bank’s deadline will be midnight Wednesday.

HOW THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM CLEARS CHECKS The Federal Reserve System is a network of twelve district banks, which are located around the country and headed by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors. Most banks in the United States have Federal Reserve accounts. The Federal Reserve System has greatly simplified the check-collection process by acting as a clearinghouse—a system or a place where banks exchange checks and drafts drawn on each other and settle daily balances.

Suppose that Tami Moy of Philadelphia writes a check to Jeanne Sutton of San Francisco. When Jeanne receives the check in the mail, she deposits it in her bank. Her bank then deposits the check in the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, which transfers it to the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia. That Federal Reserve bank then sends the check to Moy’s bank, which deducts the amount of the check from Moy’s account.

17. Most checks are cleared by a computerized process, and communication and computer facilities may fail because of electrical outages, equipment malfunction, or other conditions. If such conditions arise and a bank fails to meet its midnight deadline, the bank is “excused” from liability if the bank has exercised “such diligence as the circumstances require” [UCC 4–109(d)].

ELECTRONIC CHECK PRESENTMENT In the past, most checks were processed manually—the employees of each bank in the collection chain would physically handle each check that passed through the bank for collection or payment. Today, most checks are processed electronically—a practice that has been facilitated by Check 21 (to be discussed next). Whereas manual check processing can take days, electronic check presentment can be done on the day of the deposit. With electronic check presentment, items are encoded with information (such as the amount of the check) that is read and processed by other banks’ computers. In some situations, a check may be retained at its place of deposit, and only its image or description is presented for payment [UCC 4–110].

A bank that encodes information on an item after the item has been issued warrants to any subsequent bank or payor that the encoded information is correct [UCC 4–209]. This is also true for a bank that retains an item and presents an image or description of the item for payment.

Regulation CC provides that a returned check must be encoded with the routing number of the depository bank, the amount of the check, and other information. The regulation further states that a check must still be returned within the deadlines required by the UCC.

Check Clearing and the Check 21 Act

In the traditional collection process, paper checks had to be physically transported before they could be cleared. To streamline this costly and time-consuming process and to improve the overall efficiency of the nation’s payment system, Congress passed the Check Clearing in the 21st Century Act¹⁸ (Check 21). Check 21 is a federal law and applies to all financial institutions, other businesses, and individuals in the United States.

Before the implementation of Check 21, banks had to present the original paper check for payment in the absence of an agreement for presentment in some other form. Although the UCC authorizes banks to use other means of presentment, such as electronic presentment, a broad-based system of electronic presentment failed to develop because it required agreements among individual banks.

Although the act did not require banks to change their current check-collection practices, its creation of substitute checks has certainly facilitated the use of electronic check processing. In addition, since Check 21, bank customers cannot demand that their original canceled checks be returned with their monthly statements, nor can anyone refuse to accept a substitute check as proof of payment.

WHAT IS A SUBSTITUTE CHECK? A substitute check is a paper reproduction of the front and back of an original check that contains all of the same information required on checks for automated processing. Banks create a substitute check from a digital image of an original check. Every substitute check must include the following statement somewhere on it: “This a legal copy of your check. You can use it in the same way you would use the original check.” See Exhibit 27-6 below for an example of a substitute check.

In essence, those financial institutions that exchange digital images of checks do not have to send the original paper checks. They can simply transmit the information electronically and replace the original checks with the substitute checks. Banks that do not exchange checks electronically are required to accept substitute checks in the same way that they accept original checks.

Because the original check can be destroyed after a substitute check is created, the financial system can prevent the check from being paid twice and reduce the expense of paper storage and retrieval. Nevertheless, at least for quite a while, not all checks will be converted to substitute checks. Thus, if a bank returns canceled checks to deposit holders at the end of each month, some of those returned checks may be substitute checks, and some may be original canceled paper checks.

REDUCED “FLOAT” TIME Sometimes, individuals and businesses write checks even though they have insufficient funds in their accounts to cover those checks. Such check writers are relying on the “float,” or the time between when a check is written and when the amount is actually deducted from their account. When all checks had to be physically transported, the float time could be several days, but as Check 21 has been implemented, the time required to process checks (the float time) has been substantially reduced. Consequently, account holders who plan to cover their checks after writing them may experience unexpected overdrafts.

FASTER ACCESS TO FUNDS The Expedited Funds Availability Act (mentioned earlier in this chapter) requires that the Federal Reserve Board revise the availability schedule for funds from deposited checks to correspond to reductions in check-processing time. Therefore, as the speed of check processing increases under Check 21, the Federal Reserve Board will reduce the maximum time that a bank can hold funds from deposited checks before making them available to the depositor. Thus, account holders will have faster access to their deposited funds.

ELECTRONIC FUND TRANSFERS

The application of computer technology to banking, in the form of electronic fund transfer systems, has helped to reduce the mountains of paperwork previously required to process fund transfers. An electronic fund transfer (EFT) is a transfer of funds made by the use of an electronic terminal, a telephone, a computer, or magnetic tape. The law governing EFTs depends on the type of transfer involved. Consumer fund transfers are governed by the Electronic Fund Transfer Act (EFTA) of 1978.¹⁹ Commercial fund transfers are governed by Article 4A of the UCC.

Although electronic banking offers numerous benefits, it also poses difficulties on occasion. It is difficult to issue stop-payment orders with electronic banking. Also, fewer records are available to prove or disprove that a transaction took place, and the possibilities for tampering with a person's private banking information have increased.

Types of EFT Systems

Most banks offer EFT services to their customers. The following are the most common types of EFT systems used by bank customers:

1. Automated teller machines (ATMs)—The machines are connected online to the bank's computers. A customer inserts a debit card (a plastic card, also called an ATM card) issued by the bank and keys in a personal identification number (PIN) to access her or his accounts and conduct banking transactions.
2. Point-of-sale systems—Online terminals allow consumers to transfer funds to merchants to pay for purchases using a debit card.
3. Direct deposits and withdrawals—Customers can authorize the bank to allow another party, such as the government or an employer, to make direct deposits into their accounts. Similarly, a customer can ask the bank to make automatic payments to a third party at regular, recurrent intervals from the customer's funds (insurance premiums or loan payments, for example).
4. Internet payment systems—Many financial institutions permit their customers to access the institution's computer system via the Internet and direct a transfer of funds between accounts or pay a particular bill, such as a utility bill. Payments can be made on a onetime or a recurring basis. The Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature in Chapter 24 on page 465 discussed how many customers now use their mobile phones to access the Internet and direct their banks to make online payments.

Consumer Fund Transfers

The Electronic Fund Transfer Act (EFTA) provides a basic framework for the rights, liabilities, and responsibilities of users of EFT systems. Additionally, the act gave the Federal Reserve Board authority to issue rules and regulations to help implement the act's provisions. The Federal Reserve Board's implemental regulation is called Regulation E.

The EFTA governs financial institutions that offer electronic transfers of funds involving customer accounts. The types of accounts covered include checking accounts, savings accounts, and any other asset accounts established for personal, family, or household purposes. Telephone transfers are covered by the EFTA only if they are made in accordance with a prearranged plan under which periodic or recurring transfers are contemplated.

DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS The EFTA is essentially a disclosure law benefiting consumers. The act requires financial institutions to inform consumers of their rights and responsibilities, including those listed here, with respect to EFT systems.

1. If a customer's debit card is lost or stolen and used without her or his permission, the customer shall be required to pay no more than $50. The customer, however, must notify the bank of the loss or theft within two days of learning about it. Otherwise, the customer's liability increases to $500. The customer may be liable for more than $500 if she or he does not report the unauthorized use within sixty days after it appears on the customer's statement. (If a customer voluntarily gives her or his debit card to another, who then uses it improperly, the protections just mentioned do not apply.)
2. The customer has sixty days to discover and notify the bank of any error on the monthly statement. The bank then has ten days to investigate and must report its conclusions to the customer in writing. If the bank takes longer than ten days, it must return the disputed amount to the customer's account until it finds the error. If there is no error, the customer is required to return the funds to the bank.

3. The bank must furnish receipts for transactions made through computer terminals, but it is not obligated to do so for telephone transfers.
4. The bank must provide a monthly statement for every month in which there is an electronic transfer of funds. Otherwise, the bank must provide a statement every quarter. The statement must show the amount and date of the transfer, the names of the retailers or other third parties involved, the location or identification of the terminal, and the fees. Additionally, the statement must give an address and a phone number for inquiries and error notices.
5. Any preauthorized payment for utility bills and insurance premiums can be stopped three days before the scheduled transfer if the customer notifies the financial institution orally or in writing. (The institution may require the customer to provide written confirmation within fourteen days of an oral notification.) For other EFT transactions, however, the EFTA does not provide for the reversal of an electronic transfer of funds once the transfer has occurred.

UNAUTHORIZED TRANSFERS Because of the vulnerability of EFT systems to fraudulent activities, the EFTA clearly defined what constitutes an unauthorized transfer. Under the act, a transfer is unauthorized if (1) it is initiated by a person who has no actual authority to initiate the transfer, (2) the consumer receives no benefit from it, and (3) the consumer did not furnish the person “with the card, code, or other means of access” to his or her account. Gaining unauthorized access to an EFT system constitutes a federal felony, and those convicted may be fined up to $10,000 and sentenced to as long as ten years in prison.

VIOLATIONS AND DAMAGES Banks must strictly comply with the terms of the EFTA and are liable for any failure to adhere to its provisions. For a bank's violation of the EFTA, a consumer may recover both actual damages (including attorneys' fees and costs) and punitive damages of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000. In a class-action suit, up to $500,000 or 1 percent of the institution's net worth can be awarded as punitive damages. Failure to investigate an error in good faith makes the bank liable for treble damages (three times the amount of damages). Even when a customer has sustained no actual damage, the bank may be liable for legal costs and punitive damages if it fails to follow the proper procedures outlined by the EFTA for error resolution.

Commercial Fund Transfers

Funds are also transferred electronically “by wire” between commercial parties. In fact, payments made via wire transfers amount to more than $1 trillion a day—an amount that far exceeds the dollar volume of payments made by other means. The two major wire payment systems are the Federal Reserve wire transfer network (Fedwire) and the New York Clearing House Interbank Payments Systems (CHIPS).

Commercial wire transfers are governed by Article 4A of the UCC, which has been adopted by most of the states. Article 4A uses the term funds transfer rather than wire transfer to describe the overall payment transaction. The full text of Article 4A is presented in Appendix C.

As an example of the type of funds transfer covered by Article 4A, assume that American Industries, Inc., owes $5 million to Chandler Corporation. Instead of sending Chandler a check or some other instrument that would enable Chandler to obtain payment, American Industries tells its bank, North Bank, to credit $5 million to Chandler's account in South Bank. North Bank debits American Industries' North Bank account and wires $5 million to South Bank with instructions to credit $5 million to Chandler's South Bank account. In more complex transactions, additional banks would be involved.

E-MONEY AND ONLINE BANKING

New forms of electronic payments (e-payments) have the potential to replace physical cash—coins and paper currency—with virtual cash in the form of electronic impulses. This is the unique promise of digital cash, which consists of funds stored on microchips and other computer devices. Online banking has also become commonplace in today's world. In a few minutes, anybody with the proper software can access his or her account, transfer funds, write “checks,” pay bills, monitor investments, and even buy and sell stocks. Various forms of electronic money, or e-money, are emerging, as discussed in the following subsections.

Stored-Value Cards

The simplest kind of e-money system uses stored-value cards. These are plastic cards embossed with magnetic strips containing magnetically encoded data. You may have purchased a stored-value card (called a fare card) to pay your fare to ride on mass transit, such as a subway or train, in a major metropolitan area like New York or San Diego. In some applications, for instance, gift cards for retailers such as Home Depot or Starbucks, a stored-value card can be used only to purchase goods and services offered by the specific card issuer.

Prepaid credit cards and prepaid ATM cards are further examples of stored-value cards. A prepaid credit or ATM card has no link to a bank account. The purchaser simply pays a specific amount to the card provider, and that amount is loaded onto the card. The user can then access those funds anywhere in the world without having to provide identification or have a bank account. Students, travelers and persons without bank accounts can use prepaid cards as a convenient and safe substitute for cash. There is a growing concern, however, that criminals (especially drug traffickers) are using these stored-value cards to launder money and move illicit funds across international borders.

Smart Cards

Another form of e-money is the smart card. Smart cards are plastic cards containing computer microchips that can hold much more information than magnetic strips. A smart card carries and processes security programming. This capability gives smart cards a technical advantage over stored-value cards. The microprocessors on smart cards can also authenticate the validity of transactions. Retailers can program electronic cash registers to confirm the authenticity of a smart card by examining a unique digital signature stored on its microchip. (Digital signatures were discussed in Chapter 11.)

Online Banking Services

Most customers use three kinds of online banking services: bill consolidation and payment, transferal of funds among accounts, and applications for loans. Customers typically must appear in person to finalize the terms of a loan, however. Generally, customers are not yet able to deposit and withdraw funds online, although smart cards may eventually allow people to do so (withdrawing funds and depositing them onto the card as needed).

Since the late 1990s, several banks have operated exclusively on the Internet. These “virtual banks” have no physical branch offices. Because few individuals are equipped to send funds to virtual banks via smart-card technology, the virtual banks have accepted deposits through physical delivery systems, such as the U.S. Postal Service, FedEx, or UPS.

Privacy Protection

At the present time, it is not clear which, if any, laws apply to the security of e-money payment information and e-money issuers’ financial records. The Federal Reserve has decided not to impose Regulation E, which governs certain electronic fund transfers, on e-money transactions. Federal laws prohibiting unauthorized access to electronic communications might apply, however. For example, the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986²⁰ prohibits any person from knowingly divulging to any other person the contents of an electronic communication while that communication is in transmission or in electronic storage.

E-MONEY ISSUERS’ FINANCIAL RECORDS Under the Right to Financial Privacy Act of 1978,²¹ before a financial institution may give financial information about an individual to a federal agency, he must explicitly consent. If he does not, a federal agency wishing to access his financial records normally must obtain a warrant. A digital cash issuer may be subject to this act if that issuer is deemed to be (1) a bank by virtue of its holding customer funds or (2) any entity that issues a physical card similar to a credit or debit card.

CONSUMER FINANCIAL DATA In 1999, Congress passed the Financial Services Modernization Act,²² also known as the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act, in an attempt to delineate how financial institutions can treat customer data. In general, the act and its rules²³ place restrictions and obligations on financial institutions to protect consumer data and privacy. Every financial institution must provide its customers with information on its privacy policies and practices. No financial institution can disclose nonpublic personal information about a consumer to an unaffiliated third party unless the act’s disclosure and opt-out requirements are met.

REVIEWING

Checks and Banking in the Digital Age

RPM Pizza, Inc., issued a check for $96,000 to Systems Marketing for an advertising campaign. A few days later, RPM decided not to go through with the deal and placed a written stop-payment order on the check. RPM and Systems had no further contact for many months. Three weeks after the stop-payment order expired, however, Toby Rierson, an employee at Systems, cashed the check. Bank One Cambridge, RPM's bank, paid the check with funds from RPM's account. Because of the amount of the check, and because the check was more than six months old (stale), the signature on the check should have been specially verified according to standard banking procedures and Bank One's own policies, but it was not. RPM filed a suit in a federal district court against Bank One to recover the amount of the check. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. How long is a written stop-payment order effective? What else could RPM have done to prevent this check from being cashed?
2. What would happen if it turned out that RPM did not have a legitimate reason for stopping payment on the check?
3. What are a bank's obligations with respect to stale checks? Should Bank One have contacted RPM before paying the check? Why or why not?
4. Assume that Rierson's indorsement on the check was a forgery. Would a court be likely to hold the bank liable for the amount of the check because it failed to verify the signature on the check? Why or why not?

 DEBATE THIS: To reduce fraud, checks that utilize mechanical or electronic signature systems should not be honored.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

27-1. Forged Signatures Roy Supply, Inc., and R. M. R. Drywall, Inc., had checking accounts at Wells Fargo Bank. Both accounts required all checks to carry two signatures—that of Edward Roy and that of Twila June Moore, both of whom were executive officers of both companies. Between January 2009 and March 2010, the bank honored hundreds of checks on which Roy's signature was forged by Moore. On January 31, 2011, Roy and the two corporations notified the bank of the forgeries and then filed a suit in a California state court against the bank, alleging negligence. Who is liable for the amounts of the forged checks? Why?

27-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Customer Negligence.

Gary goes grocery shopping and carelessly leaves his checkbook in his shopping cart. His checkbook, with two blank checks remaining, is stolen by Dolores. On May 5, Dolores forges Gary's name on a check for $10 and cashes the check at Gary's bank, Citizens Bank of Middletown. Gary has not reported the loss of his blank checks to his bank. On June 1, Gary receives his monthly bank statement and copies of canceled checks from Citizens Bank, including the forged check, but he does not examine the canceled checks. On June 20, Dolores forges Gary's last check. This check is for $1,000 and is cashed at Eastern City Bank, a bank with which Dolores has previously done business. Eastern City Bank puts the check through the collection process, and Citizens Bank honors it. On July 1, on receipt of his bank statement and canceled checks covering June transactions, Gary discovers both forgeries and immediately notifies Citizens Bank. Dolores cannot be found. Gary claims that Citizens Bank must recredit his account for both checks, as his signature was forged. Discuss fully Gary's claim.

27–3. Bank's Duty to Honor Checks On January 5, Brian drafts a check for $3,000 drawn on Southern Marine Bank and payable to his assistant, Shanta. Brian puts last year's date on the check by mistake. On January 7, before Shanta has had a chance to go to the bank, Brian is killed in an automobile accident. Southern Marine Bank is aware of Brian's death. On January 10, Shanta presents the check to the bank, and the bank honors the check by payment to Shanta. Later, Brian's widow, Joyce, claims that because the bank knew of Brian's death and also because the check was by date more than one year old the bank acted wrongfully when it paid Shanta. Joyce, as executor of Brian's estate and sole heir by his will, demands that Southern Marine Bank recredit Brian's estate for the check paid to Shanta. Discuss fully Southern Marine's liability in light of Joyce's demand.

27–4. Electronic Fund Transfers Yannuzzi has a checking account at Texas Bank. She frequently uses her debit card to obtain cash from the bank's automated teller machines. She always withdraws $50 when she makes a withdrawal, but she never withdraws more than $50 in any one day. When she received the April statement on her account, she noticed that on April 13 two withdrawals for $50 each had been made from the account. Believing this to be a mistake, she went to her bank on May 10 to inform it of the error. A bank officer told her that the bank would investigate and advise her as to the result. On May 26, the bank officer called her and said that bank personnel were having trouble locating the error but would continue to try to find it. On June 20, the bank sent her a full written report telling her that no error had been made. Yannuzzi, unhappy with the bank's explanation, filed a suit against the bank, alleging that it had violated the Electronic Fund Transfer Act. What was the outcome of the suit? Would it matter if the bank could show that on the day in question it deducted $50 from Yannuzzi's account to cover a check that cleared the bank on that day—a check that Yannuzzi had written to a local department store?

27–5. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Forgery.

In December 1999, Jenny Triplett applied for a bookkeeping position with Spacemakers of America, Inc., in Atlanta, Georgia. Spacemakers hired Triplett and delegated to her all responsibility for maintaining the company checkbook and reconciling it with the monthly statements from SunTrust Bank. Triplett also handled invoices from vendors. Spacemakers' president, Dennis Rose, reviewed the invoices and signed the checks to pay them, but no other employee checked Triplett's work. By the end of her first full month of employment, Triplett had forged six checks totaling more than $22,000, all payable to Triple M Entertainment, which was not a Spacemakers vendor. By October 2000, Triplett had forged fifty-nine more checks, totaling more than $475,000. A SunTrust employee became suspicious of an item that required sight inspection under the bank's fraud detection standards, which exceeded those of other banks in the area. Triplett was arrested. Spacemakers filed a suit in a Georgia state court against SunTrust. The bank filed a motion for summary judgment. On what basis could the bank avoid liability? In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [Spacemakers of America, Inc. v. SunTrust Bank, 271 Ga.App. 335, 609 S.E.2d 683 (2005)]

27–6. Forged Indorsements In 1994, Brian and Penny Grieme bought a house in Mandan, North Dakota. They borrowed for the purchase through a loan program financed by the North Dakota Housing Finance Agency (NDHFA). The Griemes obtained insurance for the house from Center Mutual Insurance Co. When a hailstorm damaged the house in 2001, Center Mutual determined that the loss was $4,378 and issued a check for that amount, drawn on Bremer Bank, N.A. The check's payees included Brian Grieme and the NDHFA. Grieme presented the check for payment to Wells Fargo Bank of Tempe, Arizona. The back of the check bore his signature and in hand-printed block letters the words "ND Housing Finance." The check was processed for collection and paid, and the canceled check was returned to Center Mutual. By the time the insurer learned that NDHFA's indorsement had been forged, the Griemes had canceled their policy, defaulted on their loan, and filed for bankruptcy. The NDHFA filed a suit in a North Dakota state court against Center Mutual for the amount of the check. Who is most likely to suffer the loss in this case? Why? [State ex rel. North Dakota Housing Finance Agency v. Center Mutual Insurance Co., 720 N.W.2d 425 (N.Dak. 2006)]

27–7. Bank's Duty to Honor Checks Sheila Bartell was arrested on various charges related to burglary, the possession for sale of methamphetamine, and other crimes. She pleaded guilty in a California state court to some charges in exchange for the dismissal of others and an agreement to reimburse the victims. The victims included "Rita E.," who reported that her checkbook had been stolen and her signature forged on three checks totaling $590. Wells Fargo Bank had “covered” the checks and credited her account, however, so the court ordered Bartell to pay the bank. Bartell appealed, arguing that the bank was not entitled to restitution. What principles apply when a person forges a drawer’s signature on a check? Is the bank entitled to recover from the defendant? Explain. [People v. Bartell, 170 Cal.App.4th 1258, 88 Cal.Rptr.3d 844 (3 Dist. 2009)]

27-8. Bank’s Duty of Care Arnett Gertrude, a widow with no children, lived with her sister and her nephew Jack Scriber. When Gertrude was diagnosed with cancer, she added Scriber as an authorized signatory to her checking account at Salyersville National Bank and gave him power of attorney. Shortly before Gertrude died, Scriber wrote checks on the account to withdraw nearly all of the $600,000 in the account and transferred the funds into his own account. After Gertrude’s death, Bobbie Caudill, the administrator of the estate, discovered the withdrawals. Caudill sued the bank for aiding Scriber in the conversion of Gertrude’s funds. The bank’s defense was that Scriber had power of attorney over Gertrude’s finances and had the power to write checks on the account, so the bank had to honor the checks that Scriber had written. The estate argued that the bank had breached its duty to Gertrude to guard against such obvious misappropriation. The trial court held for the bank. Did the bank breach its duty to Gertrude? Why or why not? [Caudill v. Salyersville National Bank, ___ S.W.3d ___ (Ky.App. 2010)]

27-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Forged Drawer’s Signature.

From the 1960s, James Johnson served as Bradley Union’s personal caretaker and assistant, and was authorized by Union to handle his banking transactions. Louise Johnson, James’s wife, wrote checks on Union’s checking account to pay his bills, normally signing the checks “Brad Union.” Branch Banking & Trust Co. (BB&T) managed Union’s account. In December 2000, on the basis of Union’s deteriorating mental and physical condition, a North Carolina state court declared him incompetent. Douglas Maxwell was appointed as Union’s guardian. Maxwell “froze” Union’s checking account and asked BB&T for copies of the canceled checks, which were provided by July 2001. Maxwell believed that Union’s signature on the checks had been forged. In August 2002, Maxwell contacted BB&T, which refused to recredit Union’s account. Maxwell filed a suit on Union’s behalf in a North Carolina state court against BB&T. [Union v. Branch Banking & Trust Co., 176 N.C.App. 711, 627 S.E.2d 276 (2006)]

- (a) Before Maxwell’s appointment, BB&T sent monthly statements and canceled checks to Union, and Johnson reviewed them, but no unauthorized signatures were ever reported. On whom can liability be imposed in the case of a forged drawer’s signature on a check? What are the limits set by Section 4-406(f) of the Uniform Commercial Code? Should Johnson’s position, Union’s incompetence, or Maxwell’s appointment affect the application of these principles? Explain.
- (b) Why was this suit brought against BB&T? Is BB&T liable? If not, who is? Why? Regardless of any violations of the law, did anyone act unethically in this case? If so, who and why?

UNIT FIVE • FOCUS ON ETHICS

Negotiable Instruments

Articles 3 and 4 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), which deal with negotiable instruments, constitute an important part of the law governing commercial transactions. These articles reflect several fundamental ethical principles. One principle is that individuals should be protected against harm caused by the misuse of negotiable instruments. Another basic principle—and one that underlies the entire concept of negotiable instruments—is that the laws governing the use of negotiable instruments should be practical and reasonable to encourage the free flow of commerce.

Here, we look first at some of the ethical implications of the concept of a holder in due course (HDC). We then examine some other ethical issues that frequently arise in relation to these instruments.

Ethics, the HDC Concept, and Ort v. Fowler

The drafters of Article 3 did not create the HDC concept out of thin air. Indeed, under the common law, courts had often restricted the extent to which defenses could successfully be raised against a good faith holder of a negotiable instrument. As an example, consider a classic 1884 case, Ort v. Fowler.¹

Case Background Ort, a farmer, was working alone in his field one day, when he was approached by a stranger who claimed to be the statewide agent for a manufacturer of iron posts and wire fencing. The two men conversed for some time, and eventually the stranger persuaded the farmer to act as an area representative for the manufacturer. The stranger then completed two documents for Ort to sign, telling him that they were identical copies of an agreement in which Ort agreed to represent the manufacturer.

Because the farmer did not have his glasses with him and could read only with great difficulty, he asked the stranger to read the document to him. The stranger then purported to do so, not mentioning that the document was a promissory note. Both men signed each document. The stranger later negotiated the promissory note he had fraudulently obtained from Ort to a party that today we would refer to as an HDC. When this party brought suit against him, Ort attempted to defend on the basis of fraud in the execution.

The Court's Decision The Kansas court that decided the issue entertained three possible views. One was that because Ort never intended to execute a note, he should not be held liable for doing so. A second view was that the jury should decide, as a question of fact, whether Ort was guilty of negligence under the circumstances. The third view was that because Ort possessed all of his faculties and was able to read the English language, signing a promissory note solely in reliance on a stranger's assurances that it was a different instrument constituted negligence.

This third view was the one adopted by the court in 1884. The court held that Ort's negligence had contributed to the fraud and that such negligence precluded Ort from raising fraud as a defense against payment on the note. Today, the UCC expresses essentially the same reasoning: fraud is a defense against an HDC only if the injured party signed the instrument "with neither knowledge nor a reasonable opportunity to learn of its character or its essential terms" [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(iii)].

The Reasoning of the HDC Concept Although it may not seem fair that an innocent victim should have to suffer the consequences of another's fraudulent act, the UCC assumes that it would be even less fair if an HDC could not collect payment. The reasoning behind this assumption is that an HDC, as a third party, is less likely to have been responsible for—or to have had an opportunity to protect against—the fraud in the underlying transaction.

In general, the HDC doctrine, like other sections of the UCC, reflects the philosophy that when two or more innocent parties are at risk, the burden should fall on the party that was in the best position to prevent the loss. For businesspersons, the HDC doctrine means that they should exercise caution when they issue and accept commercial paper in order to protect against the risk of loss through fraud.

Good Faith in Negotiable Instruments Law

Clearly, the principle of good faith reflects ethical principles. The most notable application of the good faith requirement in negotiable instruments law is, of course, the HDC doctrine. Traditionally, to acquire the protected status of an HDC, a holder must have acquired an instrument in good faith. Other transactions subject to Articles 3 and 4 also require good faith—as, indeed, do all transactions governed by the UCC.

The Importance of Good Faith A party that acts in bad faith may be precluded from seeking shelter under UCC provisions that would otherwise apply, such as the fictitious payee rule or the imposter rule. Cases often turn on whether a party exercised good faith, as a case decided by Maryland's courts illustrates.

The bank in this case, American General Financial Services, Inc., was contacted by telephone by a man who represented himself to be Ronald E. Wilder—although later it was discovered that he was an imposter. The man wanted to obtain a loan for $20,000 to renovate his property and supplied Wilder's personal information and copies of his tax returns to complete the loan application. The bank ran a credit check on Wilder and, finding that he had excellent credit, approved an $18,000 loan. The imposter then came to the bank, presented a driver's license with his photo and Ronald Wilder's personal information to a bank employee, and obtained the check.

Later that day, the imposter took the $18,000 check to a check-cashing business, State Security Check Cashing, Inc., to cash it. He presented the same false identification that he had used at the bank, and a State Security employee examined the check and reviewed the loan documents before giving the man the face value of the check (less State Security's fee). The day after the loan check was negotiated, the real Ronald E. Wilder informed American General that someone had fraudulently applied for a loan in his name. When he learned about the check written to the imposter, Wilder placed a stop-payment order on the check. American General then refused to pay State Security, who sued to recover for payment of the check's proceeds to the imposter.

The court had to decide which party—the bank or the check-cashing company—was liable for the amount of the check. Good faith was the controlling issue. American General claimed that State Security had not taken the check in good faith, because “suspicious circumstances” surrounded the transaction. After all, reasonable persons do not cash $18,000 loan checks at check-cashing establishments, which charge very high fees ($900 in this case). The bank argued that State Security should have taken additional steps to verify the check or at least have waited until the check cleared before disbursing the funds. The trial court agreed: State Security was in the best position to prevent the loss and should not have immediately paid out the funds. Because State Security had not exercised good faith or due care, it was not an HDC and was precluded from asserting the imposter rule.

State Security appealed, and the reviewing court reversed. The appellate court found that the bank had not shown that State Security had failed to exercise good faith when it cashed the check in reliance on the same documents that the bank had seen. This meant that State Security was an HDC and that the imposter rule applied. Therefore, the appellate court ruled that American General was liable for the $18,000.²

How Should Good Faith Be Tested? There has long been a division of opinion as to how good faith should be measured or tested. At one end of the spectrum of views is the position that the test of good faith should be subjective in nature. In other words, as long as a person acts honestly, no matter how negligent or foolish the conduct may be, that person is acting in good faith. At the other end of the spectrum is the “objective” test of good faith. Under this test, honesty in itself is not enough. A party must also act reasonably under the circumstances.

Over time, the pendulum seems to have swung from one end of the spectrum to the other. When the UCC was initially drafted, the definition of good faith set forth in UCC 1–201(19) established a subjective test for good faith. It defined good faith as “honesty in fact in the conduct or transaction concerned.” The only UCC article that incorporated a more objective test for good faith was Article 2. Section 2–103(1)(b) defined good faith as both honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade. Under this test, a person who acts honestly in fact but does not observe reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing will not meet the good faith requirement. This more objective measure of good faith has since been incorporated into other articles of the UCC, including Articles 3, 4, and 4A.

Criticisms of the Objective Standard Some critics claim that while the subjective test of “honesty in fact” is manageable, the objective test that requires the “observance of reasonable commercial standards” opens the door to potentially endless litigation. After all, it is difficult to determine what is commercially reasonable in a given context until you hear what others in that commercial situation have to say. Thus, parties to a dispute can nearly always make some kind of good faith argument, and any time the issue is raised, litigation can result.

How Good Faith Standards Can Affect HDC Status Whether the objective or the subjective standard of good faith is used has considerable impact on HDC status, as an example will illustrate. Mitchell was a farmer who operated a multistate farming operation on leased property. Runnells, a grain broker, had sold Mitchell's 2001 grain crop. Mitchell instructed Runnells to use the crop proceeds to draw checks payable to Mitchell's various landlords in fulfillment of his rent obligations. The checks totaled more than $153,000. The landlords accepted the checks in payment of the farmer's rent—completely unaware that Mitchell had already pledged the proceeds from the sale of his crops as collateral for a loan from Agrilience (security interests will be discussed in Chapter 29). Agrilience filed a lawsuit in a federal court against Runnells and the various landlords for conversion (wrongful taking of personal property—see Chapter 6 on page 127).

2. State Security Check Cashing, Inc. v. American General Financial Services, Inc., 409 Md. 81, 972 A.2d 882 (2009).

According to the UCC, an HDC takes a negotiable instrument free of any claim to the instrument, including claims of prior secured parties. Thus, the outcome of the case depended on whether Runnells and the landlords were HDCs. Under the subjective standard, the landlords were HDCs because they took the checks without actual knowledge of Agriliance's claim to the crop proceeds. The objective standard, however, dictated a different result. Because it is common for farmers to put their crops up as collateral for loans, the court held that reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing required Mitchell's creditors (Runnells and the landlords) to conduct a search of the public records. Such a search would have revealed the existence of Agriliance's prior secured claim. Runnells and the landlords could not be HDCs in this case because they failed to meet the objective element of good faith. The court, therefore, ruled that Agriliance was entitled to the crop proceeds.³

Efficiency versus Due Care

A major problem faced by today's banking institutions is how to verify customer signatures on the billions of checks that are processed by the banking system each month. If a bank fails to verify a signature on a check it receives for payment and the check turns out to be forged, the bank will normally be held liable to its customer for the amount paid. But how can banks possibly examine, item by item, each signature on every check that they pay?

The banks' solution to this problem is simply to not examine all signatures. Instead, computers are programmed to verify signatures only on checks exceeding a certain threshold amount, such as $2,500 or perhaps some higher figure. Checks for less than the threshold amount are selected for signature verification only on a random basis. In other words, serious attention is restricted to serious matters. As a result, many, if not most, checks are paid without signature verification. This practice, which has become an acceptable standard in today's banking industry, is economically efficient for banks. Even though liability costs are sometimes incurred—when forged checks are paid—the total costs involved in verifying the authenticity of each and every signature would be far higher.

Some people have argued that banks using such procedures are not exercising due care in handling their customers' accounts. Under the UCC, banks are held to a standard of "ordinary care." At one time in the banking industry, ordinary care was generally interpreted to mean that a bank had a duty to inspect all signatures on checks. But what constitutes ordinary care in today's world? Does a bank exercise ordinary care if it follows the prevailing industry practice of examining signatures on only a few, randomly selected checks payable for under a certain amount? Or does ordinary care still mean that a bank should examine each signature?

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Because the UCC offers special protection to HDCs, innocent makers of notes or drawers of checks in fraudulent transactions often have no legal recourse. From an ethical standpoint, how could you justify to the "losers" in such situations the provisions of the UCC that fail to protect them? Can you think of a way in which such problems could be handled more fairly or ethically than they are under the UCC?
2. What do you think would result if the law was changed to allow personal defenses to be successfully raised against HDCs? Who would lose, and who would gain? How would such a change in the law affect the flow of commerce in this country?
3. Do you think that the UCC's provisions have struck an appropriate balance between the interests of banks and those of bank customers? Why or why not?

Creditors' Rights and Remedies

Normally, creditors have no problem collecting the debts owed to them. When disputes arise over the amount owed, however, or when the debtor simply cannot or will not pay, what happens? What remedies are available to creditors when a debtor defaults (fails to pay as promised)? In this chapter, we focus on some basic laws that assist the debtor and creditor in resolving their dispute without resorting to bankruptcy (see Chapter 30) or mortgage foreclosure (see Chapter 31). In Chapter 29, we will discuss the remedies that are available only to secured creditors (those whose loans are supported or backed by collateral) under Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

LAWS ASSISTING CREDITORS

Both the common law and statutory laws other than Article 9 of the UCC create various rights and remedies for creditors. We discuss here some of these rights and remedies, including liens, garnishment, and creditors' composition agreements.

Liens

A lien is an encumbrance on (claim against) property to satisfy a debt or protect a claim for the payment of a debt. As mentioned, liens may arise under the common law (usually by possession of the property) or under statutory law. Statutory liens include mechanic's liens, whereas artisan's liens were recognized at common law. Judicial liens are those that represent a creditor's efforts to collect on a debt before or after a judgment is entered by a court.

Liens are a very important tool for creditors because they generally take priority over other claims against the same property (priority of claims will be discussed in depth in Chapter 29). In fact, mechanic's and artisan's liens normally take priority over creditors who have a perfected security interest in the property. (As you will read in Chapter 29, a creditor who has perfected a security interest in property—by filing a financing statement, for example—usually prevails against other parties with an interest in the same property, except for certain lienholders.)

MECHANIC'S LIENS When a person contracts for labor, services, or materials to be furnished for the purpose of making improvements on real property but does not immediately pay for the improvements, the creditor can place a mechanic's lien on the property. This creates a special type of debtor-creditor relationship in which the real estate itself becomes security for the debt.

For example, a painter agrees to paint a house for a homeowner for an agreed-on price to cover labor and materials. If the homeowner refuses to pay or pays only a portion of the charges, a mechanic's lien against the property can be created. The painter is then a lienholder, and the real property is encumbered (burdened) with the mechanic's lien for the amount owed. If the homeowner does not pay the lien, the property can be sold to satisfy the debt. Notice of the foreclosure (the process by which the creditor deprives the debtor of his or her property—see Chapter 31) and sale must be given to the debtor in advance, however.

Note that state law governs the procedures that must be followed to create a mechanic's (or other statutory) lien. Generally, the lienholder must file a written notice of lien against the particular property involved. The notice of lien must be filed within a specific time period, measured from the last date on which materials or labor was provided (usually within 60 to 120 days). If the property owner fails to pay the debt, the lienholder is entitled to foreclose on the real estate on which the work or materials were provided and to sell it to satisfy the debt. The sale proceeds are used to pay the debt and the costs of the legal proceedings; the surplus, if any, is paid to the former owner.

ARTISAN'S LIENS An artisan's lien is a device created at common law through which a creditor can recover payment from a debtor for labor and materials furnished in the repair of personal property. In contrast to a mechanic's lien, an artisan's lien is possessory. This means that the lienholder ordinarily must have retained possession of the property and have expressly or impliedly agreed to provide the services on a cash, not a credit, basis. The lien remains in existence as long as the lienholder maintains possession, and the lien is terminated once possession is voluntarily surrendered—unless the surrender is only temporary.¹ As mentioned, artisan's liens usually take priority over other creditors' claims to the same property.

CASE IN POINT Erie Power Technologies, Inc., hired Shaw Group to design and fabricate steam generators for Erie's power plant. Erie delivered the necessary materials for the development of the generators and made several payments to Shaw as the work progressed. Shaw completed the fabrication of the materials in its possession, but Erie made no further payments and filed for bankruptcy. Under the bankruptcy reorganization plan (see Chapter 30), Erie was required to pay Shaw $320,000 for completing the generators. Erie then filed a lawsuit to recover that payment, claiming that those funds should have gone to other secured creditors who had priority over Shaw. The court held that Shaw had a common law artisan's lien in the goods that it possessed and had added value to them. Because the artisan's lien took priority over the claims of other secured creditors, the court granted a summary judgment in favor of Shaw.²

Modern statutes permit the holder of an artisan's lien to foreclose and sell the property subject to the lien to satisfy the debt. As with a mechanic's lien, the lienholder is required to give notice to the owner of the property prior to foreclosure and sale. The sale proceeds are used to pay the debt and the costs of the legal proceedings, and the surplus, if any, is paid to the former owner.³

JUDICIAL LIENS When a debt is past due, a creditor can bring a legal action against the debtor to collect the debt. If the creditor is successful in the action, the court awards the creditor a judgment against the debtor (usually for the amount of the debt plus any interest and legal costs incurred in obtaining the judgment). Frequently, however, the creditor is unable to collect the awarded amount.

To ensure that a judgment in the creditor's favor will be collectible, the creditor is permitted to request that certain nonexempt property of the debtor be seized to satisfy the debt. (As will be discussed later in this chapter, under state or federal statutes some kinds of property are exempt from attachment by creditors.) A court's order to seize the debtor's property is known as a writ of attachment if it is issued prior to a judgment in the creditor's favor. If the order is issued after a judgment, it is referred to as a writ of execution.

Writ of Attachment. In the context of judicial liens, attachment refers to a court-ordered seizure and taking into custody of property prior to the securing of a judgment for a past-due debt. (As you will read in Chapter 29, attachment means something different in the context of secured transactions.⁴) Normally, attachment is a prejudgment remedy, occurring either at the time a lawsuit is filed or immediately afterwards. To attach before a judgment, a creditor must comply with the specific state's statutory restrictions and requirements. The due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution also applies and requires that the debtor be given notice and an opportunity to be heard (see Chapter 4).

The creditor must have an enforceable right to payment of the debt under law and must follow certain procedures. Otherwise, the creditor can be liable for damages for wrongful attachment. Typically, the creditor must file with the court an affidavit (a

1. Involuntary surrender of possession by a lienholder, such as when a police officer seizes goods from a lienholder, does not terminate the lien.
2. In re Erie Power Technologies, Inc., 364 Bankr. 896 (W.D.Pa. 2007).

3. An artisan's lien has priority over a filed statutory lien (such as a title lien on an automobile or a lien filed under Article 9 of the UCC) and a bailee's lien (such as a storage lien).
4. In secured transactions, attachment refers to the process through which a security interest becomes effective and enforceable against a debtor with respect to the debtor's collateral [UCC 9-203].

written statement, made under oath) stating that the debtor has failed to pay and indicating the statutory grounds under which attachment is sought. The creditor must also post a bond to cover at least the court costs, the value of the property attached, and the value of the loss of use of that property suffered by the debtor. When the court is satisfied that all the requirements have been met, it issues a writ of attachment, which directs the sheriff or other officer to seize nonexempt property. If the creditor prevails at trial, the seized property can be sold to satisfy the judgment.

Writ of Execution. If a creditor obtains a judgment against the debtor and the debtor will not or cannot pay the judgment, the creditor is entitled to go back to the court and request a writ of execution. A writ of execution is an order that directs the sheriff to seize (levy) and sell any of the debtor's nonexempt real or personal property that is within the court's geographic jurisdiction (usually the county in which the courthouse is located). The proceeds of the sale are used to pay the judgment, accrued interest, and costs of the sale. Any excess is paid to the debtor. The debtor can pay the judgment and redeem the nonexempt property at any time before the sale takes place. (Because of exemption laws and bankruptcy laws, however, many judgments are practically uncollectible.)

Garnishment

An order for garnishment permits a creditor to collect a debt by seizing property of the debtor that is held by a third party. In a garnishment proceeding, the third party—the person or entity on whom the garnishment judgment is served—is called the garnishee. Typically, the garnishee is the debtor's employer, and the creditor is seeking a judgment so that part of the debtor's usual paycheck will be paid to the creditor. In some situations, however, the garnishee is a third party that holds funds belonging to the debtor (such as a bank) or has possession of, or exercises control over, funds or other types of property owned by the debtor. A creditor can garnish almost all types of property, including tax refunds, pensions, and trust funds—so long as the property is not exempt from garnishment and is in the possession of a third party.

GARNISHMENT PROCEEDINGS State law governs garnishment actions, so the specific procedures vary from state to state. According to the laws in many states, the judgment creditor needs to obtain only one order of garnishment, which will then apply continuously to the judgment debtor's weekly wages until the entire debt is paid. Garnishment can be a prejudgment remedy, requiring a hearing before a court, but it is most often a postjudgment remedy.

LAWS LIMITING THE AMOUNT OF WAGES SUBJECT TO GARNISHMENT Both federal and state laws limit the amount that can be taken from a debtor's weekly take-home pay through garnishment proceedings.⁵ Federal law provides a minimal framework to protect debtors from losing all their income to pay judgment debts.⁶ State laws also provide dollar exemptions, and these amounts are often larger than those provided by federal law. Under federal law, an employer cannot dismiss an employee because his or her wages are being garnished.

The question in the following case was whether payments to an independent contractor (see Chapter 32) for services performed could be garnished.

5. A few states (for example, Texas) do not permit garnishment of wages by private parties except under a child-support order.
6. For example, the federal Consumer Credit Protection Act, 15 U.S.C. Sections 1601–1693r, provides that a debtor can retain either 75 percent of his or her disposable earnings per week or an amount equivalent to thirty hours of work paid at federal minimum wage rates, whichever is greater.

Indiana Surgical Specialists v. Griffin

Court of Appeals of Indiana, 867 N.E.2d 260 (2007).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Helen Griffin owed Indiana Surgical Services a certain amount. When the debt was not paid, Indiana Surgical filed a suit in an Indiana small claims court against Griffin. Griffin did not answer the complaint. In 2001, the court issued a default judgment against her. Four years later, Indiana Surgical learned that Griffin worked for MDS Courier Services. On Indiana Surgical's request, the court issued a garnishment order against MDS to “withhold from the earnings of” Griffin the appropriate amount until her debt was paid. MDS responded:

CASE 28.1 CONTINUED ♦ MDS Courier Services, Inc. employs drivers on a “contract” basis, therefore, drivers are not actual employees, but rather “contracted” to do a particular job. Because of this, we are not responsible for any payroll deductions including garnishments.

Indiana Surgical asked the court to hold MDS in contempt. Dawn Klingenberger, an MDS manager, testified that Griffin was a subcontractor of MDS, called as needed, compensated per job at “thirty-five percent of whatever she does,” and paid on a biweekly basis. The court ruled that “the judgment debtor is a subcontractor, and not an employee,” and that her earnings could not be garnished. Indiana Surgical appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

MAY, Judge.

Indiana Surgical argues the trial court erred by declining to enforce the garnishment order issued to MDS on the ground Griffin was a “subcontractor” and not an employee of MDS. Indiana Surgical asserts the trial court’s “distinction between wages subject to withholding and other earnings” is not supported in law. Under the facts of this case, we agree.

Garnishment refers to “any legal or equitable proceedings through which the earnings of an individual are required to be withheld by a garnishee, by the individual debtor, or by any other person for the payment of a judgment” [under Indiana Code Section 24-4.5-105(1)(b)].

Earnings are [defined in Indiana Code Section 24-4.5-1-301(9) as] “compensation paid or payable for personal services, whether denominated as wages, salary, commission, bonus, or otherwise, and includes periodic payments under a pension or retirement program.”^a In discussing the [provision in the Consumer Credit Protection Act that is the] federal counterpart to the Indiana statute, the [United States] Supreme Court stated: “There is every indication that Congress, in an effort to avoid the necessity of bankruptcy, sought to regulate garnishment in its usual sense as a levy on periodic payments of compensation needed to support the wage earner and his family on a week-to-week, month-to-month basis.” [Emphasis added.]

Griffin received “periodic payments of compensation” for her personal services as a courier. These payments were earnings that could be garnished through a garnishment order. The trial court erred to the extent it held otherwise. We reverse and remand for further proceedings including, but not limited to, a determination of MDS’s liability for payments made to Griffin after Indiana Surgical acquired an equitable lien upon service of process in [garnishment proceedings]. In light of our holding, the trial court should also determine whether MDS should be held in contempt of the garnishment order.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court held that payments for the services of an independent contractor fell within the applicable definition of earnings and thus Griffin’s earnings as an independent contractor could be garnished. The court reversed the decision of the lower court and remanded the case.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Should some people be exempt from garnishment orders? Explain why or why not.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Building contractors and subcontractors are typically classified as independent contractors. Could payments to these parties also fall within the definition of earnings applied in this case? Discuss.

a. Indiana’s definition of earnings is included in the part of the Indiana Code known as the Uniform Consumer Credit Code, which was derived from the federal Consumer Credit Protection Act. The federal provision defining earnings is identical.

Creditors’ Composition Agreements

Creditors may contract with the debtor for discharge of the debtor’s liquidated debts (debts that are definite, or fixed, in amount) on payment of a sum less than that owed. These agreements are referred to as creditors’ composition agreements (or composition agreements) and usually are held to be enforceable unless they are formed under duress.

Concept Summary 28.1 on the following page provides a synopsis of the remedies available to creditors.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 28.1

Remedies Available to Creditors

Remedy	Description
Liens	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Mechanic's lien—A lien placed on an owner's real estate for labor, services, or materials furnished for improvements made to the realty. 2. Artisan's lien—A lien placed on an owner's personal property for labor performed or value added to that property. 3. Judicial liens— <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. Writ of attachment—A court-ordered seizure of property prior to a court's final determination of the creditor's rights to the property. Creditors must strictly comply with applicable state statutes to obtain a writ of attachment. b. Writ of execution—A court order directing the sheriff to seize (levy) and sell a debtor's nonexempt real or personal property to satisfy a court's judgment in the creditor's favor.
Garnishment	A collection remedy that allows the creditor to attach a debtor's funds (such as wages owed or bank accounts) and property that are held by a third person.
Creditors' Composition Agreement	A contract between a debtor and her or his creditors by which the debtor's debts are discharged by payment of a sum less than the amount that is actually owed.

SURETYSHIP AND GUARANTY

When a third person promises to pay a debt owed by another in the event that the debtor does not pay, either a suretyship or a guaranty relationship is created. Exhibit 28–1 on the facing page illustrates these relationships. The third person's creditworthiness becomes the security for the debt owed. At common law, there were significant differences in the liability of a surety and a guarantor, as discussed in the following subsections. Today, however, the distinctions outlined here have been abolished in some states.

Suretyship

A contract of strict suretyship is a promise made by a third person to be responsible for the debtor's obligation. It is an express contract between the surety (the third party) and the creditor. In the strictest sense, the surety is primarily liable for the debt of the principal. This means that the creditor can demand payment from the surety from the moment the debt is due and that the creditor need not exhaust all legal remedies against the principal debtor before holding the surety responsible for payment.

For example, Roberto Delmar wants to borrow from the bank to buy a used car. Because Roberto is still in college, the bank will not lend him the funds unless his father, José Delmar, who has dealt with the bank before, will cosign the note (add his signature to the note, thereby becoming a surety and thus jointly liable for payment of the debt). When José Delmar cosigns the note, he becomes primarily liable to the bank. On the note's due date, the bank can seek payment from either Roberto or José Delmar, or both jointly.

Guaranty

With a suretyship arrangement, the surety is primarily liable for the debtor's obligation. With a guaranty arrangement, the guarantor—the third person making the guaranty—is secondarily liable. The guarantor can be required to pay the obligation only after the principal debtor defaults, and usually only after the creditor has made an attempt to collect from the debtor. The guaranty contract terms determine the extent and time of the guarantor's liability.

For example, a corporation, BX Enterprises, needs to borrow to meet its payroll. The bank is skeptical about the creditworthiness of BX and requires Dawson, its president, who is a wealthy businessperson and owner of 70 percent of BX Enterprises, to sign an agreement making herself personally liable for payment if BX does not pay off the loan. As a guarantor of the loan, Dawson cannot be held liable until BX Enterprises is in default.

EXHIBIT 28-1 • Suretyship and Guaranty Parties

In a suretyship or guaranty arrangement, a third party promises to be responsible for a debtor's obligations. A third party who agrees to be responsible for the debt even if the primary debtor does not default is known as a surety; a third party who agrees to be secondarily responsible for the debt—that is, responsible only if the primary debtor defaults—is known as a guarantor. As noted in Chapter 15, normally a promise of guaranty (a collateral, or secondary, promise) must be in writing to be enforceable.

Under the Statute of Frauds, a guaranty contract between the guarantor and the creditor must be in writing (recorded) to be enforceable unless the main purpose exception (discussed in Chapter 15) applies.⁷ At common law, a suretyship agreement did not need to be in writing to be enforceable, and oral surety agreements were sufficient. Today, however, some states require a writing (or electronic record) to enforce a suretyship.

In the following case, a guarantor claimed that she did not understand the full extent of her liability under a guaranty agreement at the time she signed it. Did her alleged ignorance of the terms of the agreement excuse her from liability for the debt after the primary debtor's default? That was the issue before the court.

7. Briefly, the main purpose exception provides that if the main purpose of the guaranty agreement is to benefit the guarantor, then the contract need not be in writing to be enforceable.

KAVANAGH, J. [Justice]

In February 2005, defendant Nam Koo Kim (hereinafter the husband), as sole owner of Majestic Group Korea, Ltd., entered into a loan agreement on behalf of the company with plaintiff [the Overseas Private Investment Corporation] to borrow $1,500,000 for the purposes of financing a “Ruby Tuesday’s” restaurant in South Korea. The husband and his wife, defendant Hee Sun Kim (hereinafter the wife), issued personal guaranties for the loan. In October 2005, Majestic defaulted on the loan and a restructured loan and assumption agreement was executed by the parties and included a promissory note by the husband to pay plaintiff

$1,517,000 in the event of a default. Once again, the wife agreed to personally guaranty the terms of the note and signed a written commitment to that effect. When the borrowers defaulted on the restructured loan, plaintiff, as was its right under the agreement, accelerated payments of the promissory note and commenced this action seeking recovery of the amount due under the note, together with interest and counsel fees. Plaintiff moved for summary judgment, and [the trial court granted the plaintiff's motion].

* * * *

* * * Defendants argue that a question of fact has been created as to the scope of the wife's guaranty and the Supreme Court [trial court] erred by granting plaintiff summary judgment. We do not agree.

A party is entitled to a judgment on a guaranty of a note if it proves that there has been a default on the payment of a promissory note and the party against whom judgment has been sought has executed a valid guaranty warranting the payment of the amount due under that note.

In her defense, the wife argues that when she signed the guaranty she was only provided with the last page of the agreement and claims to have been told that her liability under the guaranty was limited to the value of her real property interest in Virginia. However, she admits that she did not participate in the negotiations that led up to the issuance of the promissory note and that it was her husband who asked her to sign the guaranty agreement. While the husband echoes the wife's claim that she signed the guaranty agreement without seeing the entire document, he does not deny that, at the time, he was in possession of the entire agreement. In addition, he provides no confirmation of his wife's assertion that when she signed the guaranty agreement she was told that her legal obligation was limited to the value of her real estate interest in Virginia. In addition, the terms of the guaranty are clear on its face and specifically provide that the wife has guaranteed full payment of the promissory note. In fact, immediately above the wife's signature is an acknowledgment to the effect that she "has received a copy of this Restructured Loan Deferral Letter, agrees to all terms and conditions hereof, and confirms that the Personal Guaranty is, and remains, in full force and effect." In short, the wife's contention that it was her understanding that she was providing a limited commitment in regard to the payment of the promissory note is belied [contradicted] by what is clearly set forth in the document and, "in the absence of fraud, duress or some other wrongful act by a party to a contract, a signer of an agreement is deemed to be conclusively bound by its terms whether or not he or she read it." The wife—who by her own admission had no contact with plaintiff in regard to this transaction—has presented no documentary evidence to support the conclusion that plaintiff used duress or fraud to procure her signature on this document. As such, she is bound by the terms of her guaranty. [Emphasis added.]

ORDERED that the order is affirmed, with costs.

QUESTIONS

1. If the guaranty agreement had not been in writing, would the agreement have been enforceable? Explain.
2. A guarantor can be required to pay a debt only after the principal debtor defaults. Which party was the principal debtor in this case?

Actions Releasing the Surety and the Guarantor

The actions that will release the surety from an obligation are basically the same as those that will discharge the guarantor. Making any material modification to the terms of the original contract—without the consent of the surety or guarantor—will discharge the surety or guarantor's obligation. (The extent to which the surety or guarantor is discharged depends on whether he or she was compensated, and to what extent he or she suffered a loss from the modification. For example, a father who receives no consideration in return for acting as a surety on his daughter's loan will be completely discharged if the loan contract is modified without his consent.) Similarly, if a creditor surrenders the collateral to the debtor or impairs the collateral without the consent of the surety or guarantor, these acts can reduce the obligation of the surety or guarantor.

Naturally, any payment of the principal obligation by the debtor or by another person on the debtor's behalf will discharge the surety or guarantor from the obligation. Even if the creditor refused to accept payment of the principal debt when it was tendered, the obligation of the surety or guarantor can be discharged (if the creditor knew about the suretyship or guaranty).

Defenses of the Surety and the Guarantor

Generally, the surety or guarantor can also assert any of the defenses available to the principal debtor to avoid liability on the obligation to the creditor. A few exceptions do exist, however. The surety or guarantor cannot assert the principal debtor's incapacity or bankruptcy as a defense, nor can the surety assert the statute of limitations as a defense.

Obviously, a surety or guarantor may also have his or her own defenses—for example, incapacity or bankruptcy. If the creditor fraudulently induced the person to act as a surety or guarantor on the debt, the surety or guarantor can assert fraud as a defense. In most states, the creditor has a legal duty to inform the surety, before the formation of the suretyship contract, of material facts known by the creditor that would substantially increase the surety's risk. Failure to so inform may constitute fraud and renders the suretyship obligation voidable.

When the surety or guarantor pays the debt owed to the creditor, he or she acquires certain rights, as discussed next.

THE RIGHT OF SUBROGATION The surety or guarantor has the legal right of subrogation. Simply stated, this means that any right that the creditor had against the debtor now becomes the right of the surety or guarantor. Included are creditor rights in bankruptcy, rights to collateral possessed by the creditor, and rights to judgments obtained by the creditor. In short, the surety or guarantor now stands in the shoes of the creditor and may pursue any remedies that were available to the creditor against the debtor.

CASE IN POINT Guerrero Brothers, Inc. (GBI), contracted with the Public School System (PSS) to build a high school. Century Insurance Company (CIC) agreed to provide GBI with the required payment and performance bonds on the project. Thus, CIC acted as a surety of GBI's performance and promised to finish the project if GBI defaulted. Four years after construction began, PSS terminated GBI's contract for default, and CIC fulfilled GBI's obligations by finishing construction of the school. Numerous disputes arose, and litigation ensued. Ultimately, PSS agreed to pay GBI $500,000 in contract funds. CIC then filed an action against GBI and PSS to recover the $867,867.16 it claimed PSS owed it for finishing the school. The court found that CIC, as a performing surety, was entitled to the remaining contract funds through the right of subrogation. It had performed GBI's obligations and therefore stepped into GBI's shoes and had the right to obtain payment from PSS.⁸

8. Century Insurance Co. v. Guerrero Brothers, Inc., 2010 WL 997112 (N.Mariana Islands 2010).

THE RIGHT OF REIMBURSEMENT The surety or guarantor has a right of reimbursement from the debtor. Basically, the surety is entitled to receive from the debtor all outlays made on behalf of the suretyship arrangement. Such outlays can include expenses incurred as well as the actual amount of the debt paid to the creditor.

THE RIGHT OF CONTRIBUTION Two or more sureties are called co-sureties. When a co-surety pays more than her or his proportionate share on a debtor's default, she or he is entitled to recover from the other co-sureties the amount paid above that surety's obligation. This is the right of contribution. Generally, a co-surety's liability either is determined by agreement or, in the absence of agreement, is set at the maximum liability under the suretyship contract.

For example, assume that two co-sureties are obligated under a suretyship contract to guarantee the debt of a debtor. Together, the sureties' maximum liability is $25,000. Surety A's maximum liability is $15,000, and surety B's is $10,000. The debtor owes $10,000 and is in default. Surety A pays the creditor the entire $10,000. In the absence of agreement, Surety A can recover $4,000 from Surety B ($$10,000/$25,000 \times $10,000 = $4,000$, Surety B's obligation).

PROTECTION FOR DEBTORS

The law protects debtors as well as creditors. Certain property of the debtor, for example, is exempt under state law from creditors' actions. Consumer protection statutes (see Chapter 45) also protect debtors' rights. Of course, bankruptcy laws, which will be discussed in Chapter 30, are designed specifically to assist debtors in need of help.

In most states, certain types of real and personal property are exempt from execution or attachment. State exemption statutes usually include both real and personal property.

Exempted Real Property

Probably the most familiar exemption is the homestead exemption. Each state permits the debtor to retain the family home, either in its entirety or up to a specified dollar amount, free from the claims of unsecured creditors or trustees in bankruptcy. (Note that federal bankruptcy law now places a cap on the amount that debtors filing bankruptcy can claim is exempt under their states' homestead exemption—see Chapter 30 for details.)

For example, Beere owes Veltman $40,000. The debt is the subject of a lawsuit, and the court awards Veltman a judgment of $40,000 against Beere. Beere's homestead is valued at $50,000, and the homestead exemption is $25,000. There are no outstanding mortgages or other liens on his homestead. To satisfy the judgment debt, Beere's family home is sold at public auction for $45,000. The proceeds of the sale are distributed as follows:

1. Beere is given $25,000 as his homestead exemption.
2. Veltman is paid $20,000 toward the judgment debt, leaving a $20,000 deficiency judgment (that is, "leftover debt") that can be satisfied from any other nonexempt property (personal or real) that Beere may own, if permitted by state law.

In a few states, statutes allow the homestead exemption only if the judgment debtor has a family. If a judgment debtor does not have a family, a creditor may be entitled to collect the full amount realized from the sale of the debtor's home. In addition, note that the homestead exemption interacts with other areas of law and can sometimes operate to cancel out a portion of a lien on a debtor's real property.

CASE IN POINT Antonio Stanley purchased a modular home from Yates Mobile Services Corporation.

When Stanley failed to pay the purchase price of the home, Yates obtained a judicial lien against Stanley's property in the amount of $165,138.05. Stanley then filed for bankruptcy and asserted the homestead exemption. The court found that Stanley was entitled to avoid the lien to the extent that it impaired his exemption. Using a bankruptcy law formula, the court determined that the total impairment was $143,639.05 and that Stanley could avoid paying this amount to Yates. Thus, Yates was left with a judicial lien on Stanley's home in the amount of $21,499.⁹

Exempted Personal Property

Personal property that is most often exempt from satisfaction of judgment debts includes the following:

1. Household furniture up to a specified dollar amount.
2. Clothing and certain personal possessions, such as family pictures or a Bible.
3. A vehicle (or vehicles) for transportation (at least up to a specified dollar amount).
4. Certain classified animals, usually livestock but including pets.
5. Equipment that the debtor uses in a business or trade, such as tools or professional instruments, up to a specified dollar amount.

REVIEWING

Creditors' Rights and Remedies

Air Ruidoso, Ltd., operated a commuter airline and air charter service between Ruidoso, New Mexico, and airports in Albuquerque and El Paso. Executive Aviation Center, Inc., provided services for airlines at the Albuquerque International Airport. When Air Ruidoso failed to pay more than $10,000 that it owed on its account for fuel, oil, and oxygen, Executive Aviation took possession of Air Ruidoso's plane, claiming that it had a lien on the plane. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Can Executive Aviation establish an artisan's lien on the plane? Why or why not?
2. Suppose that Executive Aviation files a lawsuit in court against Air Ruidoso for the $10,000 past-due debt. What two methods discussed in this chapter would allow the court to seize Air Ruidoso's plane to satisfy the debt?
3. Suppose that Executive Aviation discovers that Air Ruidoso has sufficient assets in one of its bank accounts to pay the past-due amount. How might Executive Aviation attempt to obtain access to these funds?
4. Suppose that a clause in the contract between Air Ruidoso and Executive Aviation provides that "if the airline becomes insolvent, Braden Fasco, the chief executive officer of Air Ruidoso, agrees to cover its outstanding debts." Is this a suretyship or a guaranty agreement?

 DEBATE THIS: Because writs of attachment are a prejudgment remedy for nonpayment of a debt, they are unfair and should be abolished.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

28-1. Liens Sylvia takes her car to Caleb's Auto Repair Shop. A sign in the window states that all repairs must be paid for in cash unless credit is approved in advance. Sylvia and Caleb agree that Caleb will repair Sylvia's car engine and put in a new transmission. No mention is made of credit. Because Caleb is not sure how much engine repair will be necessary, he refuses to give Sylvia an estimate. He repairs the engine and puts in a new transmission. When Sylvia comes to pick up her car, she learns that the bill is $2,500. Sylvia is furious, refuses to pay Caleb that amount, and demands possession of her car. Caleb insists on payment. Discuss the rights of both parties in this matter.

28-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Judicial Liens.

Kanahara is employed part-time by the Cross-Bar Packing Corp. and earns take-home pay of $400 per week. He is $2,000 in debt to the Holiday Department Store for goods purchased on credit over the past eight months. Most of this property is nonexempt and is now in Kanahara's apartment. Kanahara is in default on his payments to Holiday. Holiday learns that Kanahara has a girlfriend in another state and that he plans to give her most of this property for Christmas. Discuss what actions are available to and should be taken by Holiday to collect the debt owed by Kanahara.

- For a sample answer to Question 28-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

28-3. Mechanic's Lien Grant is the owner of a relatively old home valued at $45,000. He notices that the bathtubs and fixtures are leaking and need to be replaced. He contracts with Jane's Plumbing to replace the bathtubs and fixtures. Jane replaces them, and on June 1 she submits her bill of $4,000 to Grant. Because of financial difficulties, Grant does not pay the bill. Grant's only asset is his home, but his state's homestead exemption is $40,000. Discuss fully Jane's remedies in this situation.

28-4. Garnishment Susan Guinta is a real estate salesperson. Smythe Cramer Co. went to an Ohio state court and obtained a garnishment order to attach Guinta's personal earnings. The order was served on Russell Realtors to attach sales commissions that Russell owed to Guinta. Russell objected, arguing that commissions are not personal earnings and are therefore exempt from attachment under a garnishment of personal earnings. An Ohio statute defines personal earnings as "money, or any other consideration or thing of value, that is paid or due to a person in exchange for work, labor, or personal services provided by the person to an employer." An employer is "a person who is required to withhold taxes out of payments of personal earnings made to a judgment debtor." Russell does not withhold taxes from its salespersons' commissions. Under a federal statute, earnings means "compensation paid or payable for personal services, whether denominated as wages, salary, commission, bonus, or otherwise." When the federal definition is more restrictive and results in a smaller garnishment, that definition is controlling. Property other than personal earnings may be subject to garnishment without limits. How should the court rule regarding Russell's objection? Why? [Smythe Cramer Co. v. Guinta, 116 Ohio Misc.2d 20, 762 N.E.2d 1083 (2001)]

28-5. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Liens.

*Karen and Gerald Baldwin owned property in Rapid City, South Dakota, which they leased to Wyoming Alaska Corp. (WACO) for use as a gas station and convenience store. The lease obligated the Baldwins to make repairs, but WACO was authorized to make necessary repairs. After seventeen years, the property was run-down. The store's customers were tripping over chunks of concrete in the parking lot. An underground gasoline storage tank was leaking. The store's manager hired Duffield Construction, Inc., to install a new tank and make other repairs. The Baldwins saw the new tank sitting on the property before the work began. When WACO paid only a small portion of the cost, Duffield filed a mechanic's lien and asked a South Dakota state court to foreclose on the property. The Baldwins disputed the lien, arguing that they had not requested the work. What is the purpose of a mechanic's lien? Should property owners who do not contract for improvements be liable for the cost under such a lien? How might property owners protect themselves against a lien for work that they do not request? Explain. [Duffield Construction, Inc. v. Baldwin, 679 N.W.2d 477 (S.D. 2004)]*

28-6. Attachment In 2004 and 2005, Kent Avery, on behalf of his law firm—the Law Office of Kent Avery, LLC—contracted with Marlin Broadcasting, LLC, to air commercials on WCCC-FM, 106.9 “The Rock.” Avery, who was the sole member of his firm, helped to create the ads, which solicited direct contact with “defense attorney Kent Avery,” featured his voice, and repeated his name and experience to make potential clients familiar with him. When WCCC was not paid for the broadcasts, Marlin filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Avery and his firm, alleging an outstanding balance of $35,250. Pending the court’s hearing of the suit, Marlin filed a request for a writ of attachment. Marlin offered in evidence the parties’ contracts, the ads’ transcripts, and WCCC’s invoices. Avery contended that he could not be held personally liable for the cost of the ads. Marlin countered that the ads unjustly enriched Avery by conferring a personal benefit on him to Marlin’s detriment. What is the purpose of attachment? What must a creditor prove to obtain a writ of attachment? Did Marlin meet this test? Explain. [Marlin Broadcasting, LLC v. Law Office of Kent Avery, LLC, 101 Conn.App. 638, 922 A.2d 1131 (2007)]

28-7. Liens Autolign Manufacturing Group, Inc., was a plastic injection molder that made parts for the auto industry. Because of a fire at its plant, Autolign subcontracted its work to several other companies to produce parts for its customers. Autolign provided the subcontractors with molds it owned so that they could produce the exact parts needed. The subcontractors produced the parts for Autolign, which it then sold to automakers. Shortly afterward, Autolign ceased operations. The subcontractors sued Autolign for breach of contract, claiming that they were never paid for the parts that they had produced for Autolign. The subcontractors asserted a statutory “molder’s lien” on the molds in their possession. A molder’s lien is similar to an artisan’s lien in that it is possessory, but was established by a Michigan statute rather than common law. One of Autolign’s creditors, Wamco 34, Ltd., argued that the molds were its property because the molds were used to secure repayment of a debt that Autolign owed to Wamco. The trial court held that Wamco was a secured creditor and that its interest had priority over the plaintiffs’ lien in the molds. The subcontractors appealed. Which party had the superior claim? 28-8. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Guaranty.

73-75 Main Avenue, LLC, agreed to lease a portion of the commercial property at 73 Main Avenue, Norwalk, Connecticut, to PP Door Enterprise, Inc. Nan Zhang, as manager of PP Door, signed the lease agreement. The lessor required the principal officers of PP Door to execute personal guaranties. In addition, the principal officers agreed to provide the lessor with credit information. Apparently, both the lessor and the principals of PP Door signed the lease and guaranty agreements that were sent to PP Door’s office. When PP Door failed to make monthly payments, 73-75 Main Avenue filed a suit against PP Door and its owner, Ping Ying Li. At trial, Li testified that she was the sole owner of PP Door but denied that Zhang was its manager. She also denied signing the guaranty agreement. She claimed that she had signed the credit authorization form because Zhang had told her he was too young to have good credit. Li claimed to have no knowledge of the lease agreement. She did admit, however, that she had paid the rent. She claimed that Zhang had been in a car accident and had asked her to help pay his bills, including the rent at 73 Main Avenue. Li further testified that she did not see the name PP Door on the storefront of the leased location. [73-75 Main Avenue, LLC v. PP Door Enterprise, Inc., 120 Conn.App. 150, 991 A.2d 650 (2010)]

- Li argued that she was not liable on the lease agreement because Zhang was not authorized to bind her to the lease. Do the facts support Li? Why or why not?
- Li claimed that the guaranty for rent was not enforceable against her. Why might the court agree?

- Issue: The main issue concerned the enforceability of a guaranty agreement. Who was arguing that the agreement should not be enforced, and on what grounds?
- Rule of Law: What are the requirements for a guaranty agreement to be enforceable?
- Applying the Rule of Law: How did the court apply the rule of law to the guaranty agreement in this case?
- Conclusion: After applying the rule of law, what did the court conclude? Who benefited from the court’s decision, the plaintiff or the defendants?

Secured Transactions

Whenever the payment of a debt is guaranteed, or secured, by personal property owned by the debtor or in which the debtor has a legal interest, the transaction becomes known as a secured transaction. The concept of the secured transaction is as basic to modern business practice as the concept of credit. Logically, sellers and lenders do not want to risk nonpayment, so they usually will not sell goods or lend funds unless the promise of payment is somehow guaranteed. Indeed, business as we know it could not exist without laws permitting and governing secured transactions.

Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) governs secured transactions in personal property. Personal property includes accounts, agricultural liens, chattel paper (any writing evidencing a debt secured by personal property), commercial assignments of $1,000 or more, fixtures (certain property that is attached to land), instruments, and other types of intangible property, such as patents.

Article 9 does not cover creditor devices such as liens (see Chapter 28) and real property mortgages (see Chapter 31).

In this chapter, we first look at the terminology of secured transactions. We then discuss how the rights and duties of creditors and debtors are created and enforced under Article 9. As will become evident, the law of secured transactions tends to favor the rights of creditors, but it also offers debtors some protections, though to a lesser extent.

THE TERMINOLOGY OF SECURED TRANSACTIONS

The UCC's terminology has been uniformly adopted in all documents used in situations involving secured transactions. The following is a brief summary of the UCC's definitions of terms relating to secured transactions:

1. A secured party is any creditor who has a security interest in the debtor's collateral. This creditor can be a seller, a lender, a cosigner, or even a buyer of accounts or chattel paper [UCC 9-102(a)(72)].
2. A debtor is the party who owes payment or other performance of a secured obligation [UCC 9-102(a)(28)].
3. A security interest is the interest in the collateral (such as personal property, fixtures, or accounts) that secures payment or performance of an obligation [UCC 1-201(37)].

4. A security agreement is an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest [UCC 9-102(a)(73)].
5. Collateral is the subject of the security interest [UCC 9-102(a)(12)].
6. A financing statement—referred to as the UCC-1 form—is the document that is normally filed to give public notice to third parties of the secured party's security interest [UCC 9-102(a)(39)].

Together, these basic definitions form the concept under which a debtor-creditor relationship becomes a secured transaction relationship (see Exhibit 29-1 on the following page).

CREATION OF A SECURITY INTEREST

A creditor has two main concerns if the debtor defaults: (1) Can the debt be satisfied through the

EXHIBIT 29-1 • Secured Transactions—Concept and Terminology

In a security agreement, a debtor and a creditor agree that the creditor will have a security interest in collateral in which the debtor has rights. In essence, the collateral secures the loan and ensures the creditor of payment should the debtor default.

possession and (usually) sale of the collateral? (2) Will the creditor have priority over any other creditors or buyers who may have rights in the same collateral? These two concerns are met through the creation and perfection of a security interest. We begin by examining how a security interest is created.

To become a secured party, the creditor must obtain a security interest in the collateral of the debtor. Three requirements must be met for a creditor to have an enforceable security interest:

1. Unless the creditor has possession of the collateral, there must be a written or authenticated security agreement that clearly describes the collateral subject to the security interest and is signed or authenticated by the debtor.
2. The secured party must give the debtor something of value.
3. The debtor must have rights in the collateral.

Once these requirements have been met, the creditor's rights are said to attach to the collateral. Attachment gives the creditor an enforceable security interest in the collateral [UCC 9-203].¹

For example, if Sam applies for a credit card at a local department store, the application will likely contain a clause stating that the store will retain a security interest in the goods that he buys with the card until he has paid for the goods in full. This application would be considered a written security agreement, which is the first requirement for an enforceable security interest. The goods that Sam buys with the card are the collateral (the second requirement), and his ownership interest in those goods is the right that he has in them (the third requirement). Thus, the requirements for an enforceable security interest are met. When Sam buys something with the card, the store's rights attach to it.

Written or Authenticated Security Agreement

When the collateral is not in the possession of the secured party, the security agreement must be either written or authenticated, and it must describe the collateral. Authentication is the act of signing, executing, or adopting any symbol on an electronic record that verifies that the person signing has the intent to adopt or accept the record [UCC 9-102(a)(7)]. If the security agreement is in writing or authenticated, only the debtor's signature or authentication is required to create the security interest. The reason authentication is acceptable is to provide for electronic filing (the filing process will be discussed later).

A security agreement must contain a description of the collateral that reasonably identifies it. Generally, such phrases as "all the debtor's personal property" or "all the debtor's assets" would not constitute a sufficient description [UCC 9-108(c)].

Secured Party Must Give Value

The secured party must give something of value to the debtor. Under the UCC, value can include a binding commitment to extend credit and, in general, any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract [UCC 1-204]. Normally, the value given by a secured party involves a direct loan or a commitment to sell goods on credit.

Debtor Must Have Rights in the Collateral

The debtor must have rights in the collateral; that is, the debtor must have some ownership interest

1. As was mentioned on page 547 in Chapter 28, the term attachment has a different meaning in secured transactions than it does in the context of judicial liens. In judicial liens, attachment refers to a court-ordered seizure and taking into custody of property prior to the securing of a court judgment for a past-due debt.

or right to obtain possession of that collateral. The debtor's rights can represent either a current or a future legal interest in the collateral. For example, a retail seller–debtor can give a secured party a security interest not only in existing inventory owned by the retailer but also in future inventory to be acquired by the retailer.

PERFECTION OF A SECURITY INTEREST

Perfection is the legal process by which secured parties protect themselves against the claims of third parties who may wish to have their debts satisfied out of the same collateral. Whether a secured party's security interest is perfected or unperfected can have serious consequences for the secured party if, for example, the debtor defaults on the debt or files for bankruptcy. What if the debtor has borrowed from two different creditors and used the same property as collateral for both loans? If the debtor defaults on both loans, which of the two creditors has first rights to the collateral? In this situation, the creditor with a perfected security interest will prevail.

Perfection usually is accomplished by filing a financing statement with the office of the appropriate government official. In some circumstances, however, a security interest becomes perfected even though no financing statement is filed.

Perfection by Filing

The most common means of perfection is by filing a financing statement—a document that gives public notice to third parties of the secured party's security interest—with the office of the appropriate government official. The security agreement itself can also be filed to perfect the security interest. The financing statement must provide the names of the debtor and the secured party, and must indicate the collateral covered by the financing statement. A uniform financing statement form (see Exhibit 29–2 on the next page) is used in all states [UCC 9–521].

Communication of the financing statement to the appropriate filing office, together with payment of the correct filing fee, or acceptance of the financing statement by the filing officer constitutes a filing [UCC 9–516(a)]. The word communication means that the filing can be accomplished electronically [UCC 9–102(a)(18)]. Once completed, filings are indexed by the name of the debtor so that they can be located by subsequent searchers. A financing statement may be filed even before a security agreement is made or a security interest attaches [UCC 9–502(d)].

THE DEBTOR'S NAME The UCC requires that a financing statement be filed under the name of the debtor [UCC 9–502(a)(1)]. Slight variations in names normally will not be considered misleading if a search of the filing office's records, using a standard computer search engine routinely used by that office, would disclose the filings [UCC 9–506(c)].² If the debtor is identified by the correct name at the time when the financing statement is filed, the secured party's interest retains its priority even if the debtor's name later changes. Because most states use electronic filing systems, UCC 9–503 sets out detailed rules for determining when the debtor's name as it appears on a financing statement is sufficient.

Specific Types of Debtors. For corporations, which are organizations that have registered with the state, the debtor's name on the financing statement must be “the name of the debtor indicated on the public record of the debtor's jurisdiction of organization” [UCC 9–503(a)(1)]. If the debtor is a trust or a trustee with respect to property held in trust, the filed financing statement must disclose this information and must provide the trust's name as specified in its official documents [UCC 9–503(a)(3)]. For all others, the filed financing statement must disclose “the individual or organizational name of the debtor” [UCC 9–503(a)(4)(A)]. As used here, the word organization includes unincorporated associations, such as clubs and some churches, as well as joint ventures and general partnerships. If an organizational debtor does not have a group name, the names of the individuals in the group must be listed.

Trade Names. In general, providing only the debtor's trade name (or fictitious name) in a financing statement is not sufficient for perfection [UCC 9–503(c)]. Assume that a loan is being made to a sole proprietorship owned by Peter Jones. The trade, or fictitious, name is Pete's Plumbing. A financing statement filed in the trade name Pete's Plumbing

2. If the name listed in the financing statement is so inaccurate that a search using the standard search engine will not disclose the debtor's name, the financing statement is deemed seriously misleading under UCC 9–506. See also UCC 9–507, which governs the effectiveness of financing statements found to be seriously misleading.

would not be sufficient because it does not identify Peter Jones as the actual debtor. As will be discussed in Chapter 36, a sole proprietorship (such as Pete's Plumbing) is not a legal entity distinct from the person who owns it. The reason for this rule is to ensure that the debtor's name on a financing statement is one that prospective lenders can locate and recognize in future searches.

CHANGES IN THE DEBTOR'S NAME If the debtor's name changes, the financing statement remains effective for collateral the debtor acquired before or within four months after the name change. Unless an amendment to the financing statement is filed within this four-month period, collateral acquired by the debtor after the four-month period is unperfected [UCC 9-507(b) and (c)]. A one-page uniform financing statement amendment form is available for filing name changes and for other purposes (see the discussion of amendments later in this chapter) [UCC 9-521].

DESCRIPTION OF THE COLLATERAL The UCC requires that both the security agreement and the financing statement contain a description of the collateral in which the secured party has a security interest. The security agreement must describe the collateral because no security interest in goods can exist unless the parties agree on which goods are subject to the security interest. The financing statement must also describe the collateral to provide public notice of the fact that certain goods of the debtor are subject to a security interest. Other parties who might later wish to lend funds to the debtor or buy the collateral can thus learn of the security interest by checking with the state or local office in which a financing statement for that type of collateral would be filed. For land-related security interests, a legal description of the realty is also required [UCC 9-502(b)].

Sometimes, the descriptions in the two documents differ, with the description in the security agreement being more precise than the description in the financing statement, which is allowed to be more general. For example, a security agreement for a commercial loan to a manufacturer may list all of the manufacturer's equipment subject to the loan by serial number, whereas the financing statement may simply state "all equipment owned or hereafter acquired."

The UCC permits broad, general descriptions in the financing statement, such as "all assets" or "all personal property." Usually, if a financing statement accurately describes the agreement between the secured party and the debtor, the description is sufficient [UCC 9-504].

WHERE TO FILE In most states, a financing statement must be filed centrally in the appropriate state office, such as the office of the secretary of state, in the state where the debtor is located. Filing in the county where the collateral is located is required only when the collateral consists of timber to be cut; fixtures; or items to be extracted, such as oil, coal, gas, and minerals [UCC 9-301(3) and (4), 9-502(b)].

The state in which a financing statement should be filed depends on the debtor's location, not the location of the collateral (as was required under the unrevised Article 9) [UCC 9-301]. The debtor's location is determined as follows [UCC 9-307]:

1. For an individual debtor, it is the state of the debtor's principal residence.
2. For an organization registered with the state, such as a corporation or limited liability company, it is the state in which the organization is registered. For example, if a debtor is incorporated in Delaware and has its chief executive office in New York, a secured party would file the financing statement in Delaware because that is where the debtor's business is registered.
3. For all other entities, it is the state in which the business is located or, if the debtor has more than one office, the place from which the debtor manages its business operations and affairs (the office of its chief executive).

CONSEQUENCES OF AN IMPROPER FILING Any improper filing renders the secured party's interest unperfected and reduces the secured party's claim in bankruptcy to that of an unsecured creditor. For example, if the debtor's name on the financing statement is inaccurate or if the collateral is not sufficiently described on the filing statement, the filing may not be effective.

CASE IN POINT Corona Fruits & Veggies, Inc., sublet farmland to Armando Munoz Juarez, a strawberry farmer, and loaned funds to Juarez for payroll and production expenses. The sublease and other documents set out Juarez's full name, but Juarez generally went by the name "Munoz" and signed the sublease "Armando Munoz." Corona filed financing statements that identified the debtor as "Armando Munoz." In December, Juarez contracted to sell strawberries to Frozsun Foods, Inc., which advanced funds secured by a financing statement that identified the debtor as "Armando Juarez." By the next July, Juarez owed Corona $230,482.52 and Frozsun $19,648.52. When Juarez did not repay his debt, Corona took possession of the farmland, harvested and sold the strawberries, and kept the proceeds. Corona and Frozsun then filed a suit against Juarez to collect the rest. At trial, Froszun presented evidence that it had conducted a debtor name search for “Juarez” and had not discovered Corona’s financing statement. The court concluded that the “Armando Munoz” debtor name in Corona’s financing statement was seriously misleading. Froszun’s interest thus took priority because its financing statement was recorded properly.³

Perfection without Filing

In two types of situations, security interests can be perfected without filing a financing statement. The first occurs when the collateral is transferred into the possession of the secured party. The second occurs when the security interest is one of a limited number under the UCC that can be perfected on attachment (without a filing and without possession of the goods) [UCC 9–309]. The phrase perfected on attachment means that these security interests are automatically perfected at the time of their creation. Two of the most common security interests that are perfected on attachment are a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods (defined and explained shortly) and an assignment of a beneficial interest in a decedent’s estate [UCC 9–309(1), (13)].

Where or how to perfect a security interest sometimes depends on the classification or definition of the collateral. Collateral is generally divided into two classifications: tangible collateral (collateral that can be seen, felt, and touched) and intangible collateral (collateral that consists of or generates rights). Exhibit 29–3 below and on the facing page summarizes the various classifications of collateral and the methods of perfecting a security interest in collateral falling within each of those classifications.⁴

PERFECTION BY POSSESSION In the past, one of the most frequently used means of obtaining financing under the common law was to pledge certain

4. There are additional classifications, such as agricultural liens, commercial tort claims, and investment property. For definitions of these types of collateral, see UCC 9–102(a)(5), (a)(13), and (a)(49).

TANGIBLE COLLATERAL		METHOD OF PERFECTION
All things that are movable at the time the security interest attaches (such as livestock) or that are attached to the land, including timber to be cut and growing crops.
1. Consumer Goods [UCC 9–301, 9–303, 9–309(1), 9–310(a), 9–313(a)]	Goods used or bought primarily for personal, family, or household purposes—for example, household furniture [UCC 9–102(a)(23)].	For purchase-money security interest, attachment (that is, the creation of a security interest) is sufficient; for boats, motor vehicles, and trailers, filing or compliance with a certificate-of-title statute is required; for other consumer goods, general rules of filing or possession apply.
2. Equipment [UCC 9–301, 9–310(a), 9–313(a)]	Goods bought for or used primarily in business (and not part of inventory or farm products)—for example, a delivery truck [UCC 9–102(a)(33)].	Filing or (rarely) possession by secured party.
3. Farm Products [UCC 9–301, 9–310(a), 9–313(a)]	Crops (including aquatic goods), livestock, or supplies produced in a farming operation—for example, ginned cotton, milk, eggs, and maple syrup [UCC 9–102(a)(34)].	Filing or (rarely) possession by secured party.
4. Inventory [UCC 9–301, 9–310(a), 9–313(a)]	Goods held by a person for sale or under a contract of service or lease; raw materials held for production and work in progress [UCC 9–102(a)(48)].	Filing or (rarely) possession by secured party.
5. Accessions [UCC 9–301, 9–310(a), 9–313(a)]	Personal property that is so attached, installed, or fixed to other personal property (goods) that it becomes a part of these goods—for example, a DVD player installed in an automobile [UCC 9–102(a)(1)].	Filing or (rarely) possession by secured party (same as personal property being attached).

If the information is inscribed on a tangible medium, it is called tangible chattel paper [UCC 9-102(a)(11), (a)(31), and (a)(78)].	Filing or possession or control by secured party.
2. Instruments [UCC 9-301, 9-309(4), 9-310(a), 9-312(a) and (e), 9-313(a)]	A negotiable instrument, such as a check, note, certificate of deposit, draft, or other writing that evidences a right to the payment of money and is not a security agreement or lease but rather a type that can ordinarily be transferred (after indorsement, if necessary) by delivery [UCC 9-102(a)(47)].	Except for temporary perfected status, filing or possession. collateral as security for the debt and transfer the collateral into the creditor's possession. When the debt was paid, the collateral was returned to the debtor. Although the debtor usually entered into a written security agreement, oral security agreements were also enforceable as long as the secured party possessed the collateral.

Article 9 of the UCC retained the common law pledge and the principle that the security agreement need not be in writing to be enforceable if the collateral is transferred to the secured party [UCC 9-310, 9-312(b), 9-313]. For example, Sheila borrows $4,000 from Trent to pay for a needed medical procedure. As security on the loan, she gives him a promissory note on which she is the payee. Even though the agreement to hold the note as collateral was oral, Trent has a perfected security interest. He does not need to file a financing statement, because he has possession of the note. No other creditor of Sheila's can attempt to recover the promissory note from Trent in payment for other debts.

For most collateral, possession by the secured party is impractical because then the debtor cannot use or derive income from the property to pay off the debt. For example, Jason, a farmer, takes out a loan to finance the purchase of a corn harvester and uses the equipment as collateral. Clearly, the purpose of the purchase would be defeated if Jason transferred the collateral into the creditor's possession because he would not be able to use the equipment to harvest his corn. Certain items, however, such as stocks, bonds, negotiable instruments, and jewelry, are commonly transferred into the creditor's possession when they are used as collateral for loans.

PERFECTION BY ATTACHMENT—THE PURCHASE-MONEY SECURITY INTEREST IN CONSUMER GOODS

Under the UCC, fourteen types of security interests are perfected automatically at the time they are created [UCC 9–309]. The most common of these is the purchase-money security interest (PMSI). A PMSI in consumer goods is created when a person buys goods primarily for personal, family, or household purposes, and the seller or lender agrees to extend credit for part or all of the purchase price of the goods. The entity that extends the credit and obtains the PMSI can be either the seller (a store, for example) or a financial institution that lends the buyer the funds with which to purchase the goods [UCC 9–102(a)(2)].

Automatic Perfection. A PMSI in consumer goods is perfected automatically at the time of a credit sale—that is, at the time the PMSI is created. The seller in this situation does not need to do anything more to perfect her or his interest. For example, Jamie purchases a Whirlpool Duet steam washer and dryer from West Coast Appliance for $2,500. Unable to pay the entire amount in cash, Jamie signs a purchase agreement to pay $1,000 down and $100 per month until the balance, plus interest, is fully paid. West Coast Appliance is to retain a security interest in the appliances until full payment has been made. Because the security interest was created as part of the purchase agreement with a consumer, it is a PMSI, and West Coast Appliance's security interest is automatically perfected.

Exceptions to Automatic Perfection. There are two exceptions to the rule of automatic perfection for PMSIs. First, certain types of security interests that are subject to other federal or state laws may require additional steps to be perfected [UCC 9–311]. For example, many jurisdictions have certificate-of-title statutes that establish perfection requirements for security interests in certain goods, including automobiles, trailers, boats, mobile homes, and farm tractors. If a consumer in these jurisdictions purchases a boat, for example, the secured party will need to file a certificate of title with the appropriate state official to perfect the PMSI.

A second exception involves PMSIs in nonconsumer goods, such as a business's inventory or livestock, which are not automatically perfected [UCC 9–324]. These types of PMSIs will be discussed later in this chapter in the context of priorities.

Effective Time Duration of Perfection

A financing statement is effective for five years from the date of filing [UCC 9–515]. If a continuation statement is filed within six months prior to the expiration date, the effectiveness of the original statement is continued for another five years, starting with the expiration date of the first five-year period [UCC 9–515(d), (e)]. The effectiveness of the statement can be continued in the same manner indefinitely. Any attempt to file a continuation statement outside the six-month window will render the continuation ineffective, and the perfection will lapse at the end of the five-year period.

If a financing statement lapses, the security interest that had been perfected by the filing now becomes unperfected. A purchaser for value can take the property that was used as collateral as if the security interest had never been perfected [UCC 9–515(c)].

For a synopsis of the rules for creating and perfecting a security interest, see Concept Summary 29.1 on the facing page.

THE SCOPE OF A SECURITY INTEREST

As previously mentioned, a security interest can cover property in which the debtor has ownership or possessory rights in the present or in the future. Therefore, security agreements can cover the proceeds of the sale of collateral, after-acquired property, and future advances, as discussed next.

Proceeds

Proceeds are the cash or property received when collateral is sold or disposed of in some other way

CONCEPT SUMMARY 29.1

Creating and Perfecting a Security Interest

Concept	Description
Creating a Security Interest	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Unless the creditor has possession of the collateral, there must be a written or authenticated security agreement signed or authenticated by the debtor and describing the collateral subject to the security interest. 2. The secured party must give value to the debtor. 3. The debtor must have rights in the collateral—some ownership interest or right to obtain possession of the specified collateral.
Perfecting a Security Interest	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Perfection by filing—The most common method of perfection is by filing a financing statement containing the names of the secured party and the debtor and indicating the collateral covered by the financing statement. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. Communication of the financing statement to the appropriate filing office, together with the correct filing fee, constitutes a filing. b. The financing statement must be filed under the name of the debtor; fictitious (trade) names normally are not sufficient. 2. Perfection without filing— <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. By transfer of collateral—The debtor can transfer possession of the collateral to the secured party. For example, a pledge is this type of transfer. b. By attachment—A limited number of security interests are perfected by attachment, such as a purchase-money security interest (PMSI) in consumer goods. If the secured party has a PMSI in consumer goods (bought for personal, family, or household purposes), the secured party's security interest is perfected automatically.

[UCC 9–102(a)(64)]. A security interest in the collateral gives the secured party a security interest in the proceeds acquired from the sale of that collateral. For example, People's Bank has a perfected security interest in the inventory of a retail seller of heavy farm machinery. The retailer sells a tractor out of this inventory to Jacob Dunn, who is by definition a buyer in the ordinary course of business (this term will be discussed later in the chapter). Dunn agrees, in a security agreement, to make monthly payments to the retailer for a period of twenty-four months. If the retailer goes into default on the loan from the bank, the bank is entitled to the remaining payments Dunn owes to the retailer as proceeds.

A security interest in proceeds perfects automatically on the perfection of the secured party's security interest in the original collateral and remains perfected for twenty days after the debtor receives the proceeds. One way to extend the twenty-day automatic perfection period is to provide for such extended coverage in the original security agreement [UCC 9–315(c), (d)]. This is typically done when the collateral is the type that is likely to be sold, such as a retailer's inventory—for example, of computers or cell phones. The UCC also permits a security interest in identifiable cash proceeds to remain perfected after twenty days [UCC 9–315(d)(2)].

After-Acquired Property

After-acquired property is property that the debtor acquired after the execution of the security agreement. The security agreement may provide for a security interest in after-acquired property, such as a debtor's inventory [UCC 9–204(1)]. A secured party whose security interest is in existing inventory knows that the debtor will sell that inventory, thereby reducing the collateral subject to the security interest.

Generally, the debtor will purchase new inventory to replace the inventory sold. The secured party wants this newly acquired inventory to be subject to the original security interest. Thus, the after-acquired property clause continues the secured party's claim to any inventory acquired thereafter. (This is not to say that the original security interest will take priority over the rights of all other creditors with regard to this after-acquired inventory, as will be discussed later.)

To illustrate: Amato buys factory equipment from Bronson on credit, giving as security an interest in all of her equipment—both what she is buying and what she already owns. The security agreement with Bronson contains an after-acquired property clause. Six months later, Amato pays cash to another seller of factory equipment for additional equipment. Six months after that, Amato goes out of business before she has paid off her debt to Bronson. Bronson has a security interest in all of Amato's equipment, even the equipment bought from the other seller.

Future Advances

Often, a debtor will arrange with a bank to have a continuing line of credit under which the debtor can borrow funds intermittently. Advances against lines of credit can be subject to a properly perfected security interest in certain collateral. The security agreement may provide that any future advances made against that line of credit are also subject to the security interest in the same collateral [UCC 9–204(c)]. Future advances need not be of the same type or otherwise related to the original advance to benefit from this type of cross-collateralization.⁵ Cross-collateralization occurs when an asset that is not the subject of a loan is used to collateralize that loan.

For example, Stroh is the owner of a small manufacturing plant with equipment valued at $1 million. He has an immediate need for $40,000 of working capital, so he obtains a loan from Midwestern Bank and signs a security agreement, putting up all of his equipment as security. The bank properly perfects its security interest. The security agreement provides that Stroh can borrow up to $500,000 in the future, using the same equipment as collateral for any future advances. In this situation, Midwestern Bank does not have to execute a new security agreement and perfect a security interest in the collateral each time an advance is made, up to a cumulative total of $500,000. For priority purposes, each advance is perfected as of the date of the original perfection.

The Floating-Lien Concept

A security agreement that provides for a security interest in proceeds, in after-acquired property, or in collateral subject to future advances by the secured party (or in all three) is often characterized as a floating lien. This type of security interest continues in the collateral or proceeds even if the collateral is sold, exchanged, or disposed of in some other way.

A FLOATING LIEN IN INVENTORY Floating liens commonly arise in the financing of inventories. A creditor is not interested in specific pieces of inventory, which are constantly changing, so the lien “floats” from one item to another, as the inventory changes.

Consider an example. Cascade Sports, Inc., a corporation formed in Oregon, operates as a cross-country ski dealer and has a line of credit with Portland First Bank to finance an inventory of cross-country skis. Cascade and Portland First enter into a security agreement that provides for coverage of proceeds, after-acquired inventory, present inventory, and future advances. Portland First perfects its security interest in the inventory by filing centrally with the office of the secretary of state in Oregon. One day, Cascade sells a new pair of the latest cross-country skis and receives a used pair in trade. That same day, Cascade purchases two new pairs of cross-country skis from a local manufacturer for cash. Later that day, to meet its payroll, Cascade borrows $8,000 from Portland First Bank under the security agreement.

Portland First has a perfected security interest in the used pair of skis under the proceeds clause, has a perfected security interest in the two new pairs of skis purchased from the local manufacturer under the after-acquired property clause, and has the new amount of funds advanced to Cascade secured on all of the above collateral by the future-advances clause. All of this is accomplished under the original perfected security interest. The various items in the inventory have changed, but Portland First still has a perfected security interest in Cascade's inventory. Hence, it has a floating lien in the inventory.

A FLOATING LIEN IN A SHIFTING STOCK OF GOODS

The concept of the floating lien can also apply to a shifting stock of goods. The lien can start with raw materials, follow them as they become finished goods and inventories, and continue as the goods are sold and are turned into accounts receivable, chattel paper, or cash.

SECTION 5 PRIORITIES

When more than one party claims an interest in the same collateral, which has priority? The UCC sets out detailed rules to answer this question. Although in many situations the party who has a perfected security interest will have priority, there are exceptions that give priority rights to another party, such as a buyer in the ordinary course of business.

General Rules of Priority

The basic rule is that when more than one security interest has been perfected in the same collateral, the first security interest to be perfected (or filed) has priority over any security interests that are perfected later. If only one of the conflicting security interests has been perfected, then that security interest has priority. If none of the security interests have been perfected, then the first security interest that attaches has priority. The UCC's rules of priority can be summarized as follows:

5. See Official Comment 5 to UCC 9–204.

1. A perfected security interest has priority over unsecured creditors and unperfected security interests. When two or more parties have claims to the same collateral, a perfected secured party's interest has priority over the interests of most other parties [UCC 9–322(a)(2)]. This includes priority to the proceeds from a sale of collateral resulting from a bankruptcy (giving the perfected secured party rights superior to those of the bankruptcy trustee, as will be discussed in Chapter 30).
2. Conflicting perfected security interests. When two or more secured parties have perfected security interests in the same collateral, generally the first to perfect (by filing or taking possession of the collateral) has priority [UCC 9–322(a)(1)].

CASE IN POINT Rebel Rents, Inc., bought snorkel equipment to use as inventory in its rental business and gave Textron Financial Corporation, which financed the purchase, a security interest in the equipment and its proceeds. Later that year, General Electric Capital Corporation (GECC) loaned Rebel up to $25 million and obtained a security interest in substantially all of Rebel's assets, including its inventory and proceeds. On January 5, 2001, GECC filed a financing statement to perfect its interest. Textron filed its financing statement on January 16. Rebel filed a petition for bankruptcy in 2002 but obtained $430,661 from operating its business after the filing. Textron claimed that because its security interest was created first, it was entitled to the $430,661. The court, however, ruled that GECC's security interest had priority because of the date of perfection. Although Textron's security interest was created first, it was not perfected until January 16. GECC's financing statement was filed on January 5—eleven days before Textron's financing statement was filed.⁶

3. Conflicting unperfected security interests. When two conflicting security interests are unperfected, the first to attach (be created) has priority [UCC 9–322(a)(3)]. This is sometimes called the “first-in-time” rule.

CASE IN POINT Ag Venture Financial Services, Inc., made multiple loans to a family-owned dairy farm, Montagne Heifers, Inc. (MHI). Michael Montagne owned the business, and his wife and son were shareholders and employees. In 2005, MHI executed a promissory note and security agreement in favor of Ag Venture, which listed all of MHI's accounts, equipment, farm products, inventory, livestock, and proceeds as collateral. In 2006, Montagne and his wife separated, and he signed a separation agreement that gave her some funds and certain parcels of land. In 2007, Montagne gave his son a promissory note for $100,000 in exchange for his shares in MHI; the note listed all of MHI's equipment, inventory, livestock, and proceeds as collateral. Also in 2007, Montagne sold a herd of dairy cows for $500,000 and gave his former wife a check for $240,000. In 2008, Montagne filed a petition for bankruptcy, and a dispute arose over which party (Ag Venture or Montagne's son or former wife) was entitled to the proceeds from the 2007 sale of the cows. The court held that because Ag Venture's security interest in the proceeds was the first in time to attach (it was created in 2005), Ag Venture had first priority to the proceeds.⁷

In the following case, the court had to determine which of two conflicting security interests in a manufactured (mobile) home took priority.

Citizens National Bank of Jessamine County v. Washington Mutual Bank

Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 309 S.W.3d 792 (2010).
apps.courts.ky.gov/supreme/sc_opinions.shtml^a

NICKELL, Judge.

* * * *

The sole issue to be decided in this appeal is the priority of competing liens in and to a manufactured [mobile] home located on, but not attached to, a parcel of real estate which is the subject of a foreclosure action.

The land and mobile home were both previously owned by Rose Day.

On February 18, 1999, Ms. Day conveyed [transferred] the real estate to Anthony Reynolds and Kim Reynolds by deed, which was thereafter duly recorded in the Garrard County Clerk's Office. The deed description does not mention the mobile home; but it is clear from the record that the Reynolds were purchasing both from Ms. Day. The Reynolds further executed a mortgage to Washington Mutual Bank's predecessor in interest that was recorded shortly after the deed conveying a security interest in the * * * property. There is no question the Washington Mutual Bank has a valid and first lien on the real property.^b There is no specific mention of the mobile home on the mortgage. Additionally, the Reynolds did not obtain a title certificate to the mobile home in their name. The evidence reveals that at the time of filing of the Complaint in this action by Washington Mutual, the mobile home was still titled in Ms. Day's name. There was no title lien statement issued in favor of Washington Mutual, or its predecessors in interest. The parties acknowledge that the mobile home was never legally affixed to the real property so as to remove it from the motor vehicle title records and change its character from personal property to real property.

On or about May 30, 2002, the Reynolds executed a second mortgage encumbering [burdening] the real property in favor of Citizens. Once again there was no description of the mobile home in the mortgage and no title lien statement issued in favor of Citizens. The Reynolds subsequently defaulted on both loans prompting the filing of the present litigation.

The Complaint was filed by Washington Mutual on April 16, 2007, claiming lien priority on both the real estate and the manufactured home. On April 19, 2007, the Plaintiff [Washington Mutual] recorded a lis pendens^c notice with the Garrard County Clerk's Office claiming an interest in both the real estate and the mobile home. The lis pendens and its amendment both identified Citizens National Bank of Jessamine County as an interested party. Further, Citizens was listed as a party defendant and properly served with the Complaint. On May 16, 2007, after being served with the Complaint, Citizens and the Reynolds executed a Title Lien Statement regarding the mobile home, which was recorded in the Garrard County Clerk's Office on August 14, 2007.

The master commissioner * * * determined that [the relevant Kentucky statute concerning the lis pendens] applied equally to real and personal property. Without further citation to authority, the master commissioner found "the filing of the Complaint and lis pendens by Washington Mutual created a priority claim in the mobile home." * * * The master commissioner concluded Washington Mutual's claims to the real estate and the manufactured home should be given priority over all other claims.

* * * *
[The trial court confirmed the master commissioner's report, and this appeal followed.]

Citizens contends the trial court erred in confirming the master commissioner's report as it was based on the erroneous conclusion that the filing of a complaint and lis pendens created a priority lien on the manufactured home. Citizens contends the purpose of a lis pendens is to provide notice of a claim and applies only to interests in real estate.

* * * *

We agree with Citizens. Kentucky's lis pendens statute clearly applies only to real estate.

* * * As adopted in this Commonwealth, the UCC does not allow for the filing of a lis pendens on personal property such as the manufactured home in issue here.

* * * KRS [Kentucky Revised Statutes] 186A.190 provides that the sole means of perfecting a security interest in personal property for which a certificate of title is issued is by placing a notation of the lien on the certificate of title. There is no dispute Citizens has so perfected its lien but Washington Mutual has not. It is fundamental that unperfected security interests are subordinate to perfected security interests. This is true regardless of Citizens' knowledge of Washington Mutual's filing of a notice of lis pendens and any claim set up by such filing because, as we stated earlier, the notice of lis pendens applied only to the real estate which was the subject of the underlying foreclosure action, and not the manufactured home situated thereon. Because Washington Mutual has failed to perfect its lien under the mandates of KRS 186A.190, its interest in the Reynolds' manufactured home must necessarily give way to Citizens' perfected claim. The master commissioner's findings were incorrect and the trial court erred in not so finding. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the Garrard Circuit Court is reversed and the cause remanded for entry of a judgment consistent with this opinion.

b. Real property (realty) consists of land and everything attached to it. All other property is regarded as personal property. In this case, the manufactured home, because it was not affixed to the land, is classified as personal property.

c. The term lis pendens (pronounced lease pen-dense) is Latin for "suit pending." It is a written notice, filed with the court and recorded with the county recorder, stating that a lawsuit has been initiated concerning the title to certain real property.

QUESTIONS

1. According to the court, which of the two security interests in the land on which the manufactured home was situated had priority? Why?
2. Suppose that the manufactured home had been affixed to the land and regarded as real property. In that situation, which of the two security interests would have taken priority? Why?

Exceptions to the General Rule

Under some circumstances, on the debtor's default, the perfection of a security interest will not protect a secured party against certain other third parties having claims to the collateral. For example, the UCC provides that in some instances a PMSI, properly perfected,⁸ will prevail over another security interest in after-acquired collateral, even though the other was perfected first. We discuss several significant exceptions to the general rules of priority in the following subsections.

BUYERS IN THE ORDINARY COURSE OF BUSINESS

Under the UCC, a person who buys “in the ordinary course of business” takes the goods free from any security interest created by the seller even if the security interest is perfected and the buyer knows of its existence [UCC 9–320(a)]. In other words, a buyer in the ordinary course will have priority even if a previously perfected security interest exists as to the goods. The rationale for this rule is obvious: if buyers could not obtain the goods free and clear of any security interest the merchant had created, for example, in inventory, the free flow of goods in the marketplace would be hindered.

A buyer in the ordinary course of business is a person who in good faith, and without knowledge that the sale violates the rights of another in the goods, buys in ordinary course from a person in the business of selling goods of that kind [UCC 1–201(9)]. Note that the buyer can know about the existence of a perfected security interest, so long as he or she does not know that buying the goods violates the rights of any third party.

CASE IN POINT Dublin Auto Sales granted a security interest in its inventory to Heartland Bank for a $300,000 line of credit. Heartland perfected its security interest by filing financing statements with the appropriate state offices. Dublin Auto used $9,000 of its credit to buy a 1997 Ford F-150 and $13,000 to buy a 1999 Jeep Cherokee and delivered the certificates of title, which designated Dublin Auto as the owner, to Heartland. In March 2002, Dublin Auto sold the F-150 for $15,386.63 to Joe and Michael Murphy, and the Jeep for $14,045 to Michael Laxton. National City Bank financed both purchases. New certificates of title designated the buyers as the owners and Heartland as the “first lienholder.” Heartland received none of the funds from the sales and consequently filed a suit in an Ohio state court against National City and others, seeking a declaration that its security interest in the vehicles took priority. The court, however, ruled in National City's favor. Because the Murphys and Laxton were buyers in the ordinary course of business, Heartland's security interest in the motor vehicles at issue was extinguished when the vehicles were sold to them.⁹

PMSI IN GOODS OTHER THAN INVENTORY AND LIVESTOCK

An important exception to the first-in-time rule involves certain types of collateral, such as equipment, that is not inventory (or livestock) and in which one of the secured parties has a perfected PMSI [UCC 9–324(a)]. Suppose that Sandoval borrows funds from West Bank, signing a security agreement in which she puts up all of her present and after-acquired equipment as security. On May 1, West Bank perfects this security interest (which is not a PMSI). On July 1, Sandoval purchases a new piece of equipment from Zylex Company on credit, signing a security agreement. The delivery date for the new equipment is August 1.

Zylex thus has a PMSI in the new equipment (which is not part of its inventory), but the PMSI is not in consumer goods and thus is not automatically perfected. If Sandoval defaults on her payments to both West Bank and Zylex, which of them has priority with regard to the new piece of equipment? Generally, West Bank would have priority because its interest perfected first in time. In this situation, however, as long as Zylex perfected its PMSI in the new equipment within twenty days after Sandoval took possession on August 1, Zylex has priority.

PMSI IN INVENTORY Another important exception to the first-in-time rule has to do with security interests in inventory. A perfected PMSI in inventory has priority over a conflicting security interest in the same inventory, provided that the holder of the PMSI notifies the holder of the conflicting security interest on or before the time the debtor takes possession of the inventory [UCC 9–324(b)].

Suppose that on May 1, SNS Electronics borrows funds from West Bank. SNS signs a security agreement that puts up all of its present inventory and any inventory thereafter acquired as collateral. West Bank perfects its interest (not a PMSI) on that date. On June 10, SNS buys new inventory from Martin,

8. Recall that, with some exceptions (such as motor vehicles), a PMSI in consumer goods is automatically perfected—no filing is necessary. A PMSI that is not in consumer goods must still be perfected, however.

9. Heartland Bank v. National City Bank, 171 Ohio App.3d 132, 869 N.E.2d 746 (2007).

Inc., a manufacturer, to use for its Fourth of July sale. SNS makes a down payment for the new inventory and signs a security agreement giving Martin a PMSI in the new inventory as collateral for the remaining debt. Martin delivers the inventory to SNS on June 28, but SNS's Fourth of July sale is a disaster, and most of its inventory remains unsold. In August, SNS defaults on its payments to both West Bank and Martin.

Does West Bank or Martin have priority with respect to the new inventory delivered to SNS on June 28? If Martin has not perfected its security interest by June 28, West Bank's after-acquired collateral clause has priority because it was the first to be perfected (on May 1). If, however, Martin has perfected and gives proper notice of its security interest to West Bank before SNS takes possession of the goods on June 28, Martin has priority.

BUYERS OF THE COLLATERAL The UCC recognizes that there are certain types of buyers whose interest in purchased goods could conflict with those of a perfected secured party on the debtor's default. These include buyers in the ordinary course of business (as discussed), as well as buyers of farm products, instruments, documents, or securities. The UCC sets down special rules of priority for these types of buyers.

Exhibit 29-4 on the facing page describes the various rules regarding the priority of claims to a debtor's collateral.

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF DEBTORS AND CREDITORS

The security agreement itself spells out most of the rights and duties of the debtor and the secured party. The UCC, however, imposes some rights and duties that are applicable in the absence of a valid security agreement that states the contrary.

Information Requests

At the time of filing, a secured party has the option of furnishing a copy of the financing statement being filed to the filing officer and requesting that the filing officer make a note of the file number, the date, and the hour of the original filing on the copy [UCC 9-523(a)]. The filing officer must send this copy to the person designated by the secured party or to the debtor, if the debtor makes the request. The filing officer must also give information to a person who is contemplating obtaining a security interest from a prospective debtor [UCC 9-523(c), (d)]. If requested, the filing officer must issue a certificate that provides information on possible perfected financing statements with respect to the named debtor.¹⁰

Release, Assignment, and Amendment

A secured party can release all or part of any collateral described in the financing statement, thereby terminating its security interest in that collateral. The release is recorded by filing a uniform amendment form [UCC 9-512, 9-521(b)]. A secured party can also assign all or part of the security interest to a third party (the assignee). The assignee becomes the secured party of record if the assignment is filed by use of a uniform amendment form [UCC 9-514, 9-521(a)].

If the debtor and the secured party agree, they can amend the filing—to add or substitute new collateral, for example—by filing a uniform amendment form that indicates the file number of the initial financing statement [UCC 9-512(a)]. The amendment does not extend the time period of perfection, but if new collateral is added, the perfection date (for priority purposes) for the new collateral begins on the date the amendment is filed [UCC 9-512(b), (c)].

Confirmation or Accounting Request by Debtor

The debtor may believe that the amount of the unpaid debt or the list of the collateral subject to the security interest is inaccurate. The debtor has the right to request a confirmation of the unpaid debt or list of collateral [UCC 9-210]. The debtor is entitled to one request without charge every six months.

The secured party must comply with the debtor's confirmation request by authenticating and sending to the debtor an accounting within fourteen days after the request is received. Otherwise, the secured party can be held liable for any loss suffered by the debtor, plus $500 [UCC 9-210, 9-625(f)].

10. The filing officer will charge a fee for the certification and for any information copies provided [UCC 9-525(d)].

EXHIBIT 29-4 • Priority of Claims to a Debtor's Collateral

PARTIES	PRIORITY
Perfected Secured Party versus Unsecured Parties and Creditors	A perfected secured party's interest has priority over the interests of most other parties, including unsecured creditors, unperfected secured parties, subsequent lien creditors, trustees in bankruptcy, and buyers who do not purchase the collateral in the ordinary course of business.
Perfected Secured Party versus Perfected Secured Party	Between two perfected secured parties in the same collateral, the general rule is that the first in time of perfection is the first in right to the collateral [UCC 9-322(a)(1)].
Perfected Secured Party versus Perfected PMSI	A PMSI, even if second in time of perfection, has priority providing that the following conditions are met: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Other collateral—A PMSI has priority, providing it is perfected within twenty days after the debtor takes possession [UCC 9-324(a)]. 2. Inventory—A PMSI has priority if it is perfected and proper written or authenticated notice is given to the other security-interest holder on or before the time the debtor takes possession [UCC 9-324(b)]. 3. Software—Applies to a PMSI in software only if used in goods subject to a PMSI. If the goods are inventory, priority is determined the same as for inventory; if they are not, priority is determined as for goods other than inventory [UCC 9-103(c), 9-324(f)].
Perfected Secured Party versus Purchaser of Debtor's Collateral	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Buyer of goods in the ordinary course of the seller's business—Buyer prevails over a secured party's security interest, even if perfected and even if the buyer knows of the security interest [UCC 9-320(a)]. 2. Buyer of consumer goods purchased outside the ordinary course of business—Buyer prevails over a secured party's interest, even if perfected by attachment, providing the buyer purchased as follows: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. For value. b. Without actual knowledge of the security interest. c. For use as a consumer good. d. Prior to the secured party's perfection by filing [UCC 9-320(b)]. 3. Buyer of chattel paper—Buyer prevails if the buyer: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. Gave new value in making the purchase. b. Took possession in the ordinary course of the buyer's business. c. Took without knowledge of the security interest [UCC 9-330]. 4. Buyer of instruments, documents, or securities—Buyer who is a holder in due course, a holder to whom negotiable documents have been duly negotiated, or a bona fide purchaser of securities has priority over a previously perfected security interest [UCC 9-330(d), 9-331(a)]. 5. Buyer of farm products—Buyer from a farmer takes free and clear of perfected security interests unless, where permitted, a secured party files centrally an effective financing statement (EFS) or the buyer receives proper notice of the security interest before the sale.
Unperfected Secured Party versus Unsecured Creditor	An unperfected secured party prevails over unsecured creditors and creditors who have obtained judgments against the debtor but who have not begun the legal process to collect on those judgments [UCC 9-201(a)].

Termination Statement

When the debtor has fully paid the debt, if the secured party perfected the security interest by filing, the debtor is entitled to have a termination statement filed. Such a statement demonstrates to the public that the filed perfected security interest has been terminated [UCC 9-513].

Whenever consumer goods are involved, the secured party must file a termination statement (or, alternatively, a release) within one month of the final payment or within twenty days of receiving the debtor's authenticated demand, whichever is earlier [UCC 9-513(b)].

When the collateral is other than consumer goods, on an authenticated demand by the debtor, the secured party must either send a termination statement to the debtor or file such a statement within twenty days [UCC 9-513(c)]. Otherwise, when the collateral is not consumer goods, the secured party is not required to file or to send a termination statement. Whenever a secured party fails to file or send the termination statement as requested, the debtor can recover $500 plus any additional loss suffered [UCC 9-625(e)(4), (f)].

SECTION 7 DEFAULT

Article 9 defines the rights, duties, and remedies of the secured party and of the debtor on the debtor's default. If the secured party fails to comply with his or her duties, the debtor is afforded particular rights and remedies under the UCC.

The topic of default is of great concern to secured lenders and to the lawyers who draft security agreements. What constitutes default is not always clear. In fact, Article 9 does not define the term. Consequently, parties are encouraged in practice—and by the UCC—to include in their security agreements the standards under which their rights and duties will be measured [UCC 9-601, 9-603]. In so doing, parties can stipulate the conditions that will constitute a default. Often, these critical terms are shaped by creditors themselves with an attempt to provide the maximum protection possible. The parties cannot agree to waive or alter certain UCC provisions, however, such as those involving the debtor's right to an accounting or disposition of collateral [UCC 9-602]. The terms may also not run counter to the UCC's provisions regarding good faith and unconscionability.

Any breach of the terms of the security agreement can constitute default. Nevertheless, default occurs most commonly when the debtor fails to meet the scheduled payments that the parties have agreed on or when the debtor becomes bankrupt.

Basic Remedies

The rights and remedies of secured parties under Article 9 are cumulative [UCC 9-601(c)]. Therefore, if a creditor is unsuccessful in enforcing rights by one method, she or he can pursue another method. Generally, a secured party's remedies can be divided into the two basic categories discussed next.

REPOSSESSION OF THE COLLATERAL—THE SELF-HELP REMEDY On the debtor's default, a secured party can take possession (peacefully or by court order) of the collateral covered by the security agreement [UCC 9-609(b)]. This provision, because it allows the secured party to take peaceful possession of the collateral without the use of the judicial process, is often referred to as the “self-help” provision of Article 9. This provision has been controversial, largely because the UCC does not define what constitutes peaceful possession. The general rule, however, is that the collateral has been taken peacefully if the secured party has taken it without committing (1) trespass onto land, (2) assault and/or battery, or (3) breaking and entering. On taking possession, the secured party may either retain the collateral for satisfaction of the debt [UCC 9-620] or resell the goods and apply the proceeds toward the debt [UCC 9-610].

JUDICIAL REMEDIES Alternatively, a secured party can relinquish the security interest and use any judicial remedy available, such as obtaining a judgment on the underlying debt, followed by execution and levy. (Execution is the implementation of a court's decree or judgment. Levy is the obtaining of funds by legal process through the seizure and sale of nonexempt property, usually done after a writ of execution has been issued. This writ was discussed in Chapter 28 on page 548.) Execution and levy are rarely undertaken unless the collateral is no longer in existence or has declined so much in value that it is worth substantially less than the amount of the debt and the debtor has other assets available that may be legally seized to satisfy the debt [UCC 9-601(a)].¹¹

If a customer finances a purchase through a bank loan, returns the item, and refuses to make the loan payments, what are the rights of the bank (the secured party)? That was one of the issues in the following case.

11. Some assets are exempt from creditors' claims under state statutes (see Chapter 28) or bankruptcy laws (see Chapter 30).

CASE 29.2

First National Bank of Litchfield v. Miller

Supreme Court of Connecticut, 285 Conn. 294, 939 A.2d 572 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • The Millers wanted to buy a boat from Norwest Marine, so they made a deposit and signed a form contract. Title and ownership were to pass when the Millers made full payment, although delivery would occur earlier. The agreement stated that the Millers had inspected and accepted the boat and that the document constituted the entire agreement between the parties. The Millers needed financing and contacted First National Bank of Litchfield to begin the loan process. The Millers signed a loan agreement with the bank, which sent Norwest full payment for the boat. When the Millers took delivery of the boat, it did not run properly, so they returned it to Norwest for repairs. After the repairs were completed, the Millers refused to accept the boat, claiming that it was not satisfactory. They told the bank that they did not want the boat, and they stopped making loan payments. The bank sued, contending that the Millers had breached the retail contract by refusing to make monthly payments. The Millers filed claims against the bank and Norwest asserting that they had committed fraud. The trial court held for the bank, awarding it the full amount owed under the loan contract, plus attorneys' fees. The Millers appealed, and the appellate court reversed and remanded. The case was certified to the state's highest court for review.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURTSCHALLER*, Justice.

[UCC 2–606] defines what constitutes acceptance of goods: “Acceptance of goods occurs when the buyer (a) after a reasonable opportunity to inspect the goods signifies to the seller that the goods are conforming or that he will take or retain them in spite of their nonconformity; or (b) fails to make an effective rejection as provided by subsection (1) of section 42a–2-602, but such acceptance does not occur until the buyer has had a reasonable opportunity to inspect them; or (c) does any act inconsistent with the seller’s ownership; but if such act is wrongful as against the seller it is an acceptance only if ratified by him.”

The record reveals that the trial court had ample support for its finding that the Millers had accepted the boat. The court based its finding both on the fact that the Millers had signed both the purchase agreement and the retail installment contract and on the numerous actions by the Millers, subsequent to the purchase of the boat, that were inconsistent with Norwest’s ownership of the boat. The purchase agreement provided that the Millers had inspected the boat at the time that they signed the agreement and that they were satisfied with it. This representation by the Millers to Norwest supports the trial court’s finding of acceptance because it indicates that the Millers, “after a reasonable opportunity to inspect the goods,” had signified to Norwest “that the goods [were] conforming * * *.” The retail installment contract also contained a representation by Norwest that the boat had been accepted by the Millers. Although the Millers did not make this representation, they signed the retail installment contract, which was a pre-printed form that contained the representation under a section of the contract entitled, “Seller’s Agreement with Lender.”

The court also grounded its decision on an independent basis for finding acceptance, namely, that the Millers had engaged in acts inconsistent with Norwest’s ownership of the boat. The court expressly grounded this finding on evidence that the Millers had obtained a temporary certificate of registration of the boat in their names. The record reveals additional facts that provide support for this aspect of the trial court’s finding, including the Millers’ request that Norwest install a depth finder and radio on the boat and paint the bottom of the boat. Based on the record before the trial court, its conclusion that the Millers had accepted the boat was not clearly erroneous.

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 29.2 CONTINUED ♦ DECISION AND REMEDY • The court reinstated the verdict of the trial court, holding that the Millers had accepted delivery of the boat under the UCC. They had signed a purchase agreement providing that they had inspected the boat and were satisfied with it. The Millers could not claim they had never taken delivery of the boat, and they were therefore responsible for the loan they had accepted.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • How could Norwest and the bank have avoided the problem that arose in this case?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Why should the Millers be held responsible for a statement that Norwest made in the retail installment contract, which said the boat had been accepted by the Millers?

Disposition of Collateral

Once default has occurred and the secured party has obtained possession of the collateral, the secured party has several options. The secured party can (1) retain the collateral in full or partial satisfaction of the debt (subject to limitations, discussed next) or (2) sell, lease, license, or otherwise dispose of the collateral in any commercially reasonable manner and apply the proceeds toward satisfaction of the debt [UCC 9–602(7), 9–603, 9–610(a), 9–613, 9–620]. Any sale is always subject to procedures established by state law.

RETENTION OF COLLATERAL BY THE SECURED PARTY

The UCC acknowledges that parties are sometimes better off if they do not sell the collateral. Therefore, a secured party may retain the collateral unless it consists of consumer goods and the debtor has paid 60 percent or more of the purchase price in a PMSI or debt in a non-PMSI (as will be discussed shortly) [UCC 9–620(e)].

This general right is subject to several conditions, however. The secured party must notify the debtor of its proposal to retain the collateral. Notice is required unless the debtor has signed a statement renouncing or modifying her or his rights after default [UCC 9–620(a), 9–621]. If the collateral is consumer goods, the secured party does not need to give any other notice. In all other situations, the secured party must also send notice to any other secured party from whom the secured party has received written or authenticated notice of a claim of interest in the collateral in question. The secured party must also send notice to any junior lienholder (one holding a lien that is subordinate to one or more other liens on the same property) who has filed a statutory lien (such as a mechanic's lien—see Chapter 28) or a security interest in the collateral ten days before the debtor consented to the retention [UCC 9–621].

If, within twenty days after the notice is sent, the secured party receives an objection sent by a person entitled to receive notification, the secured party must sell or otherwise dispose of the collateral (disposition procedures will be discussed shortly). If no such written objection is received, the secured party may retain the collateral in full or partial satisfaction of the debtor's obligation [UCC 9–620(a), 9–621].

CONSUMER GOODS When the collateral is consumer goods and the debtor has paid 60 percent of the purchase price on a PMSI or loan amount, the secured party must sell or otherwise dispose of the repossessed collateral within ninety days [UCC 9–620(e), (f)]. Failure to comply opens the secured party to an action for conversion or other liability under UCC 9–625(b) and (c) unless the consumer-debtor signed a written statement after default renouncing or modifying the right to demand the sale of the goods [UCC 9–624].

DISPOSITION PROCEDURES A secured party who does not choose to retain the collateral or who is required to sell it must resort to the disposition procedures prescribed under UCC 9–602(7), 9–603, 9–610(a), and 9–613. The UCC allows substantial flexibility with regard to disposition. A secured party may sell, lease, license, or otherwise dispose of any or all of the collateral in its present condition or following any commercially reasonable preparation or processing [UCC 9–610(a)].

The collateral can be disposed of at public or private proceedings, but every aspect of the disposition's method, manner, time, and place must be commercially reasonable [UCC 9–610(b)]. The secured party must notify the debtor and other specified parties in writing ahead of time about the sale or disposition of the collateral. Notification is not required if the collateral is perishable, will decline rapidly in value, or is of a type customarily sold on a recognized market [UCC 9–611(b), (c)]. The debtor may waive the right to receive this notice, but only after default [UCC 9–624(a)].

The secured party may purchase the collateral at a public sale, but not at a private sale—unless the collateral is of a kind customarily sold on a recognized market or is the subject of widely distributed standard price quotations [UCC 9–610(c)]. If the secured party does not dispose of the collateral in a commercially reasonable manner and the price paid for the collateral is affected, a court can reduce the amount of any deficiency that the debtor owes to the secured party [UCC 9–626(a)(3)].

Under the UCC, the secured party must meet a high standard when disposing of collateral. Although obtaining a satisfactory price is the purpose of requiring the secured party to resell collateral in a commercially reasonable way, price is only one aspect, as the following case makes clear.

Hicklin v. Onyx Acceptance Corp

Delaware Supreme Court, 970 A.2d 244 (2009).
www.courts.state.de.us/Courts^a COMPANY PROFILE • Onyx Acceptance Corporation (www.onyxacceptance.com) was founded in 1993 and is headquartered in Foothill Ranch, California. Onyx and its wholly owned subsidiaries operate as an automobile finance company in the United States. Together, they provide an independent source to automobile dealers to finance their customers' purchases of new and used vehicles. The company's markets include automotive manufacturers, banks, savings associations, independent finance companies, credit unions, and leasing companies. In addition, Onyx purchases, securities, and services motor vehicle retail installment contracts originated by franchised and select independent automobile dealerships. It also acquires contracts that are collateralized by late model used and new automobiles. Today, Onyx Acceptance Corporation operates as a subsidiary of Capital One Financial Corp. This group has approximately 12,000 dealerships and eighteen auto finance centers throughout the country.

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Shannon Hicklin bought a 1993 Ford Explorer under an installment sales contract. When she fell three payments behind—still owing $5,741.65—Onyx Acceptance Corporation repossessed the car. The car was sold for $1,500 at a private auction held by ABC Washington-Dulles, LLC. After the costs of repossession and sale were deducted from these proceeds, a deficiency of $5,018.88 remained. Onyx filed a suit in a Delaware state court to collect this amount from Hicklin. To establish that the sale was commercially reasonable, Onyx offered proof only of the price. The court found that the fair market value of the car at the time of the sale was $2,335 and held that the sale was commercially reasonable solely because the auction price was more than 50 percent of this estimated market value. The court granted Onyx a deficiency judgment, which a state intermediate appellate court affirmed. Hicklin appealed.

JACOBS, Justice.

* * * *

The UCC does not specifically define the term “commercially reasonable.” Whether or not a secured party’s disposition of collateral action was commercially reasonable must be considered on a case-by-case basis.

* * * To be commercially reasonable the actions must be in keeping with prevailing trade practice among reputable and responsible business and commercial enterprises engaged in the same or similar businesses. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Onyx could prove that its sale of Hicklin’s car was commercially reasonable * * * in one of two ways. First, it could show that every aspect of the sale was conducted in a commercially reasonable manner, as Section 9–610(b) prescribes. Second, it could [show under UCC 9–627(b)(3)] that it sold the car in accordance with the accepted practices of reputable dealers in that type of property.

CASE 29.3 CONTINUED ♦ * * * *

* * * Because every aspect of a sale must be “commercially reasonable,” showing that the sale grossed over 50% of the collateral’s value, without more, will not establish the secured party’s compliance with [UCC] 9–610(b). Therefore, the [lower courts] reversibly erred by holding that the sale of Hicklin’s car for over 50% of its * * * fair market value, without more, was “commercially reasonable.”

* * * *
 * * * The sale of a car to the highest bidder at a poorly publicized, sparsely attended, and inconveniently located auction would not be meaningful; but a sale to the highest bidder at a highly publicized, well-attended auction run by a highly regarded auctioneer in a convenient location would be. Onyx has failed to adduce [cite as proof] any evidence that would permit a fact-finder to determine whether the ABC auction represented the former or the latter kind of auction. Without proof of the specific auction procedures that were followed, a secured party cannot satisfy its burden of establishing commercial reasonableness. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *
 Nor has Onyx proved commercial reasonableness by establishing conformity with accepted practices in the trade.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Delaware Supreme Court reversed the lower court’s judgment and remanded the case. The price obtained on a sale of repossessed collateral does not prove, without more, that the sale was commercially reasonable.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Why does UCC 9–627(b)(3) require that a sale be conducted in conformity with reasonable commercial practices among dealers in the type of property that was the subject of the disposition?

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that Onyx had argued that private auctions generally yield higher prices, and because Hicklin’s car was sold at a private auction, the sale must have been commercially reasonable. Should the court have ruled in favor of the creditor on this ground? Explain your answer.

PROCEEDS FROM DISPOSITION Proceeds from the disposition of collateral after default on the underlying debt are distributed in the following order:

1. Reasonable expenses incurred by the secured party in repossessing, storing, and reselling the collateral.
2. Balance of the debt owed to the secured party.
3. Junior lienholders who have made written or authenticated demands.
4. Unless the collateral consists of accounts, payment intangibles, promissory notes, or chattel paper, any surplus goes to the debtor [UCC 9–608(a); 9–615(a), (e)].

NONCASH PROCEEDS Whenever the secured party receives noncash proceeds from the disposition of collateral after default, the secured party must make a value determination and apply this value in a commercially reasonable manner [UCC 9–608(a)(3), 9–615(c)].

DEFICIENCY JUDGMENT Often, after proper disposition of the collateral, the secured party still has not collected all that the debtor owes. Unless otherwise agreed, the debtor normally is liable for any deficiency, and the creditor can obtain a deficiency judgment from a court to collect the deficiency. Note, however, that if the underlying transaction is a sale of accounts, chattel paper, or promissory notes, the debtor is not entitled to any surplus or liable for any deficiency unless that right is granted by the security agreement [UCC 9–615(e)].

REDEMPTION RIGHTS At any time before the secured party disposes of the collateral or enters into a contract for its disposition, or before the debtor’s obligation has been discharged through the secured party’s retention of the collateral, the debtor or any other secured party can exercise the right of redemption of the collateral. To redeem the collateral, the debtor or other secured party must tender the entire obligation that is owed plus any reasonable expenses and attorneys’ fees incurred by the secured party in retaking and maintaining the collateral [UCC 9–623].

Concept Summary 29.2 on the facing page provides a review of the secured party’s remedies on the debtor’s default.

Remedies of the Secured Party on the Debtor's Default

Concept	Description
Repossession of the Collateral	The secured party may take possession (peacefully or by court order) of the collateral covered by the security agreement and then pursue one of two alternatives: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Retain the collateral (unless the collateral is consumer goods and the debtor has paid 60 percent of the selling price on a PMSI or 60 percent of the debt on a non-PMSI). To retain the collateral, the secured party must— <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. Give notice to the debtor if the debtor has not signed a statement renouncing or modifying his or her rights after default. With consumer goods, no other notice is necessary. b. Send notice to any other secured party who has given written or authenticated notice of a claim to the same collateral or who has filed a security interest or a statutory lien ten days before the debtor consented to the retention. If an objection is received within twenty days from the debtor or any other secured party given notice, the creditor must dispose of the collateral according to the requirements of UCC 9–602, 9–603, 9–610, and 9–613. Judicial Remedies	The secured party may relinquish the security interest and proceed with any judicial remedy available, such as obtaining a judgment on the underlying debt, followed by execution and levy on the nonexempt assets of the debtor.

REVIEWING

Secured Transactions

Paul Barton owned a small property-management company, doing business as Brighton Homes. In October, Barton went on a spending spree. First, he bought a Bose surround-sound system for his home from KDM Electronics. The next day, he purchased a Wilderness Systems kayak and roof rack from Outdoor Outfitters, and the day after that he bought a new Toyota 4-Runner financed through Bridgeport Auto. Two weeks later, Barton purchased six new iMac computers for his office, also from KDM Electronics. Barton bought each of these items under an installment sales contract. Six months later, Barton's property-management business was failing, and he could not make the payments due on any of these purchases and thus defaulted on the loans. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. For which of Barton's purchases (the surround-sound system, the kayak, the 4-Runner, and the six iMacs) would the creditor need to file a financing statement to perfect its security interest?
 2. Suppose that Barton's contract for the office computers mentioned only the name Brighton Homes. What would be the consequences if KDM Electronics filed a financing statement that listed only Brighton Homes as the debtor's name?
 3. Which of these purchases would qualify as a PMSI in consumer goods?
 4. Suppose that after KDM Electronics repossesses the surround-sound system, it decides to keep the system rather than sell it. Can KDM do this under Article 9? Why or why not?
-  DEBATE THIS: A financing statement that does not have the debtor's exact name should still be effective because creditors should always be protected when debtors default.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

29-1. Priorities Redford is a seller of electric generators. He purchases a large quantity of generators from a manufacturer, Mallon Corp., by making a down payment and signing an agreement to make the balance of payments over a period of time. The agreement gives Mallon Corp. a security interest in the generators and the proceeds. Mallon Corp. properly files a financing statement on its security interest. Redford receives the generators and immediately sells one of them to Garfield on an installment contract, with payment to be made in twelve equal installments. At the time of the sale, Garfield knows of Mallon's security interest. Two months later, Redford goes into default on his payments to Mallon. Discuss Mallon's rights against Garfield in this situation.

29-2. Perfection of a Security Interest Marsh has a prize horse named Arabian Knight. Marsh is in need of working capital. She borrows $50,000 from Mendez, who takes possession of Arabian Knight as security for the loan.

No written agreement is signed. Discuss whether, in the absence of a written agreement, Mendez has a security interest in Arabian Knight. If Mendez does have a security interest, is it a perfected security interest?

29-3. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: The Scope of a Security Interest.

Edward owned a retail sporting goods shop. A new ski resort was being constructed in his area, and to take advantage of the potential business, Edward decided to expand his operations. He borrowed a large sum from his bank, which took a security interest in his present inventory and any after-acquired inventory as collateral for the loan. The bank properly perfected the security interest by filing a financing statement. Edward's business was profitable, so he doubled his inventory. A year later, just a few months after the ski resort had opened, an avalanche destroyed the ski slope and lodge. Edward's business consequently took a turn for the worse, and he defaulted on his debt to the bank. The bank then sought possession of his entire inventory, even though the inventory was now twice as large as it had been when the loan was made. Edward claimed that the bank had rights to only half of his inventory. Is Edward correct? Explain.

29-4. Security Interest In St. Louis, Missouri, in August 2000, Richard Miller orally agreed to loan Jeff Miller $35,000 in exchange for a security interest in a 1999 Kodiak dump truck. The Millers did not put anything in writing concerning the loan, its repayment terms, or Richard's security interest or rights in the truck. Jeff used the amount of the loan to buy the truck, which he kept in his possession. In June 2004, Jeff filed a petition to obtain a discharge of his debts in bankruptcy. Richard claimed that he had a security interest in the truck and thus was entitled to any proceeds from its sale. What are a creditor's main concerns on a debtor's default? How does a creditor satisfy these concerns? What are the requirements for a creditor to have an enforceable security interest? Have these requirements been met in this case? Considering these points, what is the court likely to rule with respect to Richard's claim? [In re Miller, 320 Bankr. 911 (E.D.Mo. 2005)]

29-5. Creating a Security Interest In 2002, Michael Sabol, doing business in the recording industry as Sound Farm Productions, applied to Morton Community Bank in Bloomington, Illinois, for a $58,000 loan to expand his business. Besides the loan application, Sabol signed a promissory note that referred to the bank's rights in "any collateral." Sabol also signed a letter that stated, "the undersigned does hereby authorize Morton Community Bank to execute, file and record all financing statements, amendments, termination statements and all other statements authorized by Article 9 of the Illinois Uniform Commercial Code, as to any security interest." Sabol did not sign any other documents, including the financing statement, which contained a description of the collateral. Less than three years later, without having repaid the loan, Sabol filed a petition in a federal bankruptcy court to declare bankruptcy. The bank claimed a security interest in Sabol's sound equipment. What are the elements of an enforceable security interest? What are the requirements of each of those elements? Does the bank have a valid security interest in this case? Explain. [In re Sabol, 337 Bankr. 195 (C.D.Ill. 2006)]

29-6. Default Primesouth Bank issued a loan to Okefenokee Aircraft, Inc. (OAI), to buy a plane. OAI executed a note in favor of Primesouth in the amount of $161,306.25 plus interest. The plane secured the note. When OAI defaulted, Primesouth repossessed the plane. Instead of disposing of the collateral and seeking a deficiency judgment, however, the bank retained possession of the plane and filed a suit in a Georgia state court against OAI to enforce the note. OAI did not deny that it had defaulted on the note or dispute the amount due. Instead, OAI argued that Primesouth Bank was not acting in a commercially reasonable manner. According to OAI, the creditor must sell the collateral and apply the proceeds against the debt. What is a secured creditor's obligation in these circumstances? Can the creditor retain the collateral and seek a judgment for the amount of the underlying debt, or is a sale required? Discuss. [Okefenokee Aircraft, Inc. v. Primesouth Bank, 296 Ga.App. 782, 676 S.E.2d 394 (2009)]

29-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Purchase-Money Security Interest.

In 2007, James Cavazos purchased a new Mercedes vehicle from a dealer and gave JPMorgan Chase Bank (Chase) a purchase-money security interest (PMSI) in the car. The state recorded Chase's lien on the original certificate of title. Cavazos then forged a release of the lien against the title and received a certified copy of the original title. In reliance on that title, NXCESS Motor Cars, Inc., bought the car. It sold the car to Xavier Valeri, who granted a PMSI to U.S. Bank. NXCESS warranted that the title was free of all liens. When a new title was issued, Chase learned of Cavazos's forgery. It sued Cavazos, Valeri, and U.S. Bank for conversion (see page 127 in Chapter 6). Chase demanded possession of the vehicle and that Cavazos repay the loan. Valeri and U.S. Bank contended that they were buyers in the ordinary course of business and had good title to the Mercedes because the state had provided a title free of liens and claims. Cavazos is liable on the loan, but who has the right to possess the car? Which PMSI dominates? Explain your answers. [NXCESS Motor Cars, Inc. v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A., ___ S.W.3d ___ (Tex.App.—Houston 2010)]

29-8. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Priorities.

In 1995, Mark Denton cosigned a $101,250 loan issued by the First Interstate Bank (FIB) in Missoula, Montana, to Denton's friend Eric Anderson. Denton's business assets—a mini-warehouse operation—secured the loan. On his own, Anderson obtained a $260,000 U.S. Small Business Administration (SBA) loan from FIB at the same time. The purpose of both loans was to buy logging equipment so that Anderson could start a business. In 1997, the business failed. As a consequence, FIB repossessed and sold the equipment and applied the proceeds to the SBA loan. FIB then asked Denton to pay the other loan's outstanding balance ($98,460), plus interest. When Denton refused, FIB initiated proceedings to obtain his business assets. Denton filed a suit in a Montana state court against FIB, claiming, in part, that Anderson's equipment was the collateral for the loan that FIB was attempting to collect from Denton. [Denton v. First Interstate Bank of Commerce, 2006 MT 193, 333 Mont. 169, 142 P.3d 797 (2006)]

- (a) Denton's assets served as the security for Anderson's loan because Anderson had nothing to offer. When the loan was obtained, Dean Gillmore, FIB's loan officer, explained to them that if Anderson defaulted, the proceeds from the sale of the logging equipment would be applied to the SBA loan first. Under these circumstances, is it fair to hold Denton liable for the unpaid balance of Anderson's loan? Why or why not?
- (b) Denton argued that the loan contract was unconscionable and constituted a "contract of adhesion." What makes a contract unconscionable? Did the transaction between the parties in this case qualify? What is a "contract of adhesion"? Was this deal unenforceable on that basis? Explain.
- (d) Assume that the bank had a perfected security interest and repossessed the editing equipment. Also assume that the purchase price (and the loan amount) for the equipment was $100,000, of which Onyx had paid $65,000. Discuss the rights and duties of the bank with regard to the collateral in this situation.

29-9. VIDEO QUESTION: Secured Transactions.

Bankruptcy Law

Historically, debtors had few rights. At one time, debtors who could not pay their debts as they came due faced harsh consequences, including imprisonment and involuntary servitude. Today, in contrast, debtors have numerous rights, some of which were discussed in Chapters 28 and 29. In this chapter, we look at another significant right of debtors: the right to petition for bankruptcy relief under federal law.

The number of petitions for bankruptcy filed each year in the United States rose dramatically from 1980 until 2005, when bankruptcy reform legislation significantly reduced individual bankruptcy filings. In recent years, bankruptcy filings have jumped again as a result of the economic recession that swept the country in 2008 and 2009. In this chapter, you will read about the different types of relief offered under federal bankruptcy law and about the basic bankruptcy procedures required for specific types of relief.

THE BANKRUPTCY CODE

Bankruptcy relief is provided under federal law. Although state laws may play a role in bankruptcy proceedings, particularly state laws governing property, the governing law is based on federal legislation.

Congressional authority to provide bankruptcy relief for debtors is based on Article I, Section 8, of the U.S. Constitution, which gives Congress the power to establish “uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.” Federal bankruptcy legislation was first enacted in 1898 and since then has undergone several modifications.

Bankruptcy law before 2005 was based on the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978, as amended—hereinafter called the Bankruptcy Code or, more simply, the Code. In 2005, Congress enacted the Bankruptcy Reform Act,¹ which significantly overhauled certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Code.

1. The full title of the act was the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (April 20, 2005).

Goals of Bankruptcy Law

Modern bankruptcy law is designed to accomplish two main goals. The first is to provide relief and protection to debtors who have “gotten in over their heads.” The second is to provide a fair means of distributing a debtor’s assets among all creditors. Thus, the law attempts to balance the rights of the debtor and the creditors.

Although the twin goals of bankruptcy remain the same, the balance between them has shifted somewhat under the 2005 reform legislation. That law was enacted, in part, because of the growing concern that the 1978 act allowed too many debtors to avoid paying their debts. Thus, one of the major goals of the 2005 legislation was to require more consumers to pay as many of their debts as they possibly could instead of having those debts fully extinguished in bankruptcy.

Bankruptcy Courts

Bankruptcy proceedings are held in federal bankruptcy courts, which are under the authority of U.S. district courts, and rulings from bankruptcy courts can be appealed to the district courts. Essentially, a bankruptcy court fulfills the role of an administrative court for the federal district court concerning matters in bankruptcy. The bankruptcy court holds the proceedings required to administer the estate of the debtor in bankruptcy (the estate consists of the debtor's assets, as will be discussed shortly).

Bankruptcy court judges are appointed for terms of fourteen years. A bankruptcy court can conduct a jury trial if the appropriate district court has authorized it and the parties to the bankruptcy consent. Bankruptcy courts follow the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure rather than the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (discussed in Chapter 3).

Types of Bankruptcy Relief

The Bankruptcy Code is contained in Title 11 of the United States Code and has eight chapters. Chapters 1, 3, and 5 of the Code contain general definitional provisions, as well as provisions governing case administration, creditors, the debtor, and the estate. These three chapters normally apply to all kinds of bankruptcies.

Four chapters of the Code set forth the most important types of relief that debtors can seek:

1. Chapter 7 provides for liquidation proceedings (the selling of all nonexempt assets and the distribution of the proceeds to the debtor's creditors).
2. Chapter 11 governs reorganizations.
3. Chapter 12 (for family farmers and family fishermen) and 13 (for individuals) provide for the adjustment of debts by persons with regular incomes.²

In the following pages, we look at the specific type of bankruptcy relief provided under Chapters 7, 11, 12, and 13 of the Code. Note that a debtor (except for a municipality) need not be insolvent³ to file for bankruptcy relief under the Bankruptcy Code. Anyone obligated to a creditor can declare bankruptcy.

Special Requirements for Consumer-Debtors

Recall from Chapter 29 that a consumer-debtor is a debtor whose debts result primarily from the purchase

2. There are no Chapters 2, 4, 6, 8, or 10 in Title 11. Such "gaps" are not uncommon in the United States Code. They occur because chapter numbers (or other subdivisional unit numbers) are sometimes reserved for future use when a statute is enacted. (A gap may also appear if a law has been repealed.)

3. The inability to pay debts as they become due is known as equitable insolvency. Balance sheet insolvency, which exists when a debtor's liabilities exceed assets, is not the test. Thus, debtors whose cash-flow problems become severe may petition for bankruptcy voluntarily or be forced into involuntary bankruptcy even though their assets far exceed their liabilities.

of goods for personal, family, or household use. To ensure that a consumer-debtor is aware of the types of relief available, the Code requires that the clerk of the court give all consumer-debtors written notice of the general purpose, benefits, and costs of each chapter under which they might proceed. In addition, the clerk must provide consumer-debtors with information on the types of services available from credit counseling agencies. In practice, most of these steps are handled by an attorney, not by court clerks.

LIQUIDATION PROCEEDINGS

Liquidation under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code is probably the most familiar type of bankruptcy proceeding and is often referred to as an ordinary, or straight, bankruptcy. Put simply, a debtor in a liquidation bankruptcy turns all assets over to a bankruptcy trustee, a person appointed by the court to manage the debtor's funds. The trustee sells the nonexempt assets and distributes the proceeds to creditors. With certain exceptions, the remaining debts are then discharged (extinguished), and the debtor is relieved of the obligation to pay the debts.

Any "person"—defined as including individuals, partnerships, and corporations⁴—may be a debtor in a liquidation proceeding. A husband and wife may file jointly for bankruptcy under a single petition. Insurance companies, banks, savings and loan associations, investment companies licensed by the Small Business Administration, and credit unions cannot be debtors in a liquidation bankruptcy, however. Other chapters of the Bankruptcy Code or other federal or state statutes apply to them.

A straight bankruptcy can be commenced by the filing of either a voluntary or an involuntary petition in bankruptcy—the document that is filed with a bankruptcy court to initiate bankruptcy proceedings. If a debtor files the petition, the bankruptcy is voluntary. If one or more creditors file a petition to force the debtor into bankruptcy, the bankruptcy is involuntary. We discuss both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy proceedings under Chapter 7 in the following subsections.

Voluntary Bankruptcy

To bring a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, the debtor files official forms designated for that purpose in the bankruptcy court. Current bankruptcy law specifies that before debtors can file a petition, they must receive credit counseling from an approved nonprofit agency within the 180-day period preceding the date of filing. Debtors filing a Chapter 7 petition must include a certificate proving that they have received individual or group counseling from an approved agency within the last 180 days (roughly six months).

4. The definition of corporation includes unincorporated companies and associations. It also covers labor unions.

A consumer-debtor who is filing for liquidation bankruptcy must confirm the accuracy of the petition's contents. The debtor must also state in the petition, at the time of filing, that he or she understands the relief available under other chapters of the Code and has chosen to proceed under Chapter 7. Attorneys representing the consumer-debtors must file an affidavit stating that they have informed the debtors of the relief available under each chapter of the Bankruptcy Code. In addition, the attorneys must reasonably attempt to verify the accuracy of the consumer-debtors' petitions and schedules (described below). Failure to do so is considered perjury.

CHAPTER 7 SCHEDULES The voluntary petition must contain the following schedules:

1. A list of both secured and unsecured creditors, their addresses, and the amount of debt owed to each.
2. A statement of the financial affairs of the debtor.
3. A list of all property owned by the debtor, including property that the debtor claims is exempt.
4. A list of current income and expenses.
5. A certificate of credit counseling (as discussed previously).
6. Proof of payments received from employers within sixty days prior to the filing of the petition.
7. A statement of the amount of monthly income, itemized to show how the amount is calculated.
8. A copy of the debtor's federal income tax return for the most recent year ending immediately before the filing of the petition.

The official forms must be completed accurately, sworn to under oath, and signed by the debtor. To conceal assets or knowingly supply false information on these schedules is a crime under the bankruptcy laws.

With the exception of tax returns, failure to file the required schedules within forty-five days after the filing of the petition (unless an extension of up to forty-five days is granted) will result in an automatic dismissal of the petition. The debtor has up to seven days before the date of the first creditors' meeting to provide a copy of the most recent tax returns to the trustee.

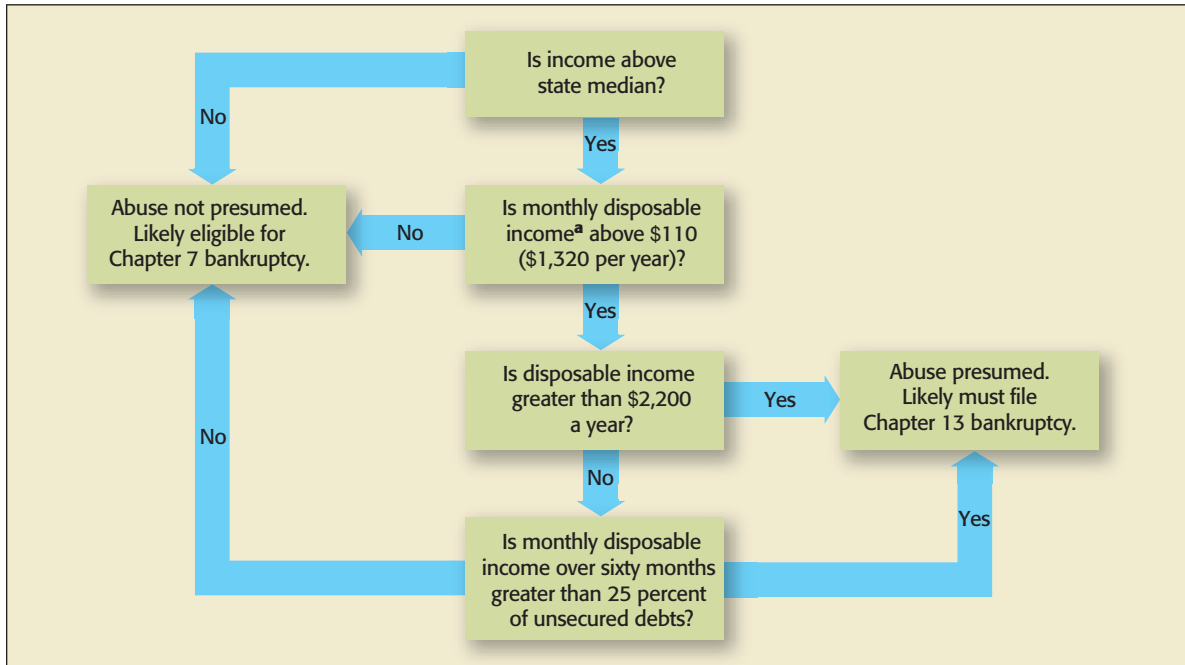

TAX RETURNS DURING BANKRUPTCY In addition, a debtor may be required to file a tax return at the end of each tax year while the case is pending and to provide a copy to the court. This may be done at the request of the court or of the U.S. trustee—a government official who performs administrative tasks that a bankruptcy judge would otherwise have to perform, including supervising the work of the bankruptcy trustee. Any party in interest (a party, such as a creditor, who has a valid interest in the outcome of the proceedings) may make this request as well. Debtors may also be required to file tax returns during Chapter 11 and 13 bankruptcies.

SUBSTANTIAL ABUSE—MEANS TEST In the past, a bankruptcy court could dismiss a Chapter 7 petition for relief (discharge of debts) if the use of Chapter 7 would constitute a “substantial abuse” of bankruptcy law. Today, the law provides a means test to determine a debtor's eligibility for Chapter 7. The purpose of the test is to keep upper-income people from abusing the bankruptcy process by filing for Chapter 7, as was thought to have happened in the past. The test forces more people to file for Chapter 13 bankruptcy rather than have their debts discharged under Chapter 7. Exhibit 30–1 on the following page outlines the essentials of the means test, but there are exceptions that apply in a small number of cases.

The Basic Formula. A debtor wishing to file for bankruptcy must complete the means test to determine whether she or he qualifies for Chapter 7. The debtor's average monthly income in recent months is compared with the median income in the geographic area in which the person lives. (The U.S. Trustee Program provides these data at its Web site.) If the debtor's income is below the median income, the debtor usually is allowed to file for Chapter 7 bankruptcy, as there is no presumption of bankruptcy abuse.

Applying the Means Test to Future Disposable Income. If the debtor's income is above the median income, then further calculations must be made to determine whether the person will have sufficient disposable income in the future to repay at least some of his or her unsecured debts. Disposable income is calculated by subtracting living expenses and secured debt payments, such as mortgage payments, from monthly income. In making this calculation, the debtor's recent monthly income is presumed to continue for the next sixty months. Living expenses are the amounts allowed under formulas used by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS). The IRS allowances include modest allocations for food, clothing, housing, utilities, transportation (including a car payment), health care, and other necessities. (The U.S. Trustee Program's Web site also provides these amounts.) The allowances do not include expenditures for items such as cell phones and cable television service.

Once future disposable income has been estimated, that amount is used to determine whether the debtor will have income that could be applied to unsecured debts. As shown in Exhibit 30-1 above, the debtor will fall into one of the following categories, based on his or her disposable income (these amounts are adjusted annually):

- If disposable income is less than $110 per month ($1,320 per year), no abuse is presumed, and the debtor will likely be allowed to file for Chapter 7 bankruptcy.
- If disposable income is more than $110 per month ($1,320 per year), then the debtor will have income that could be applied to unsecured debts, and Chapter 13 bankruptcy may be required.
- If disposable income is more than $183 per month ($2,200 per year), then abuse is presumed, and

Chapter 13 bankruptcy will be required, except in unusual cases.⁵

- If disposable income is between $1,320 and $2,200 per year and the total over sixty months (five years) is greater than 25 percent of the debtor's unsecured debts, then abuse is presumed, and Chapter 13 is required. If the total over sixty months is less than 25 percent of the unsecured debts, then Chapter 7 bankruptcy is allowed.

To a large extent, this system follows the prior law on substantial abuse. The court may also consider the debtor's bad faith or other circumstances indicating abuse.

ADDITIONAL GROUNDS FOR DISMISSAL As noted, a debtor's voluntary petition for Chapter 7 relief may be dismissed for substantial abuse or for failing to provide the necessary documents (such as schedules and tax returns) within the specified time. In addition, a motion to dismiss a Chapter 7 filing might be granted in two other situations. First, if the debtor has been convicted of a violent crime or a drug-trafficking offense, the victim can file a motion to dismiss the voluntary petition.⁶ Second, if the debtor fails to pay post-petition domestic-support obligations (which include child and spousal support), the court may dismiss the debtor's petition.

ORDER FOR RELIEF If the voluntary petition for bankruptcy is found to be proper, the filing of the petition will itself constitute an order for relief. (An order for relief is a court's grant of assistance to a petitioner.) Once a consumer-debtor's voluntary petition has been filed, the trustee and creditors must be given notice of the order for relief by mail not more than twenty days after entry of the order.

Involuntary Bankruptcy

An involuntary bankruptcy occurs when the debtor's creditors force the debtor into bankruptcy proceedings.⁷ For an involuntary action to be filed, the following requirements must be met: If the debtor has twelve or more creditors, three or more of these creditors having unsecured claims totaling at least $14,425 must join in the petition. If a debtor has fewer than twelve creditors, one or more creditors having a claim totaling $14,425 or more may file.⁸

If the debtor challenges the involuntary petition, a hearing will be held, and the bankruptcy court will enter an order for relief if it finds either of the following:

1. The debtor is not paying debts as they come due.
2. A general receiver, assignee, or custodian took possession of, or was appointed to take charge of, substantially all of the debtor's property within 120 days before the filing of the petition.

If the court grants an order for relief, the debtor will be required to supply the same information in the bankruptcy schedules as in a voluntary bankruptcy.

An involuntary petition should not be used as an everyday debt-collection device, and the Code provides penalties for the filing of frivolous petitions against debtors. If the court dismisses an involuntary petition, the petitioning creditors may be required to pay the costs and attorneys' fees incurred by the debtor in defending against the petition. If the petition was filed in bad faith, damages can be awarded for injury to the debtor's reputation. Punitive damages may also be awarded.

Automatic Stay

The moment a petition, either voluntary or involuntary, is filed, an automatic stay, or suspension, of almost all actions by creditors against the debtor or the debtor's property normally goes into effect. In other words, once a petition has been filed, creditors cannot contact the debtor by phone or mail or start any legal proceedings to recover debts or to repossess property. (In some circumstances, a secured creditor or other party in interest may petition the bankruptcy court for relief from the automatic stay, as will be discussed shortly.)

The Code provides that if a creditor knowingly violates the automatic stay (a willful violation), any injured party, including the debtor, is entitled to recover actual damages, costs, and attorneys' fees, and may be awarded punitive damages as well. Until the bankruptcy proceeding is closed or dismissed, the automatic stay prohibits a creditor from taking any act to collect, assess, or recover a claim against the debtor that arose before the filing of the petition.

Did a university's refusal to provide a transcript unless a debt was paid constitute an act in violation of the automatic stay? That was the issue in the following case.

6. Note that the court may not dismiss a case on this ground if the debtor's bankruptcy is necessary to satisfy a claim for a domestic-support obligation.
7. An involuntary case cannot be filed against a charitable institution or a farmer (an individual or business that receives more than 50 percent of gross income from farming operations).
8. 11 U.S.C. Section 303. The amounts stated in this chapter are in accordance with those computed on April 1, 2010.

CASE 30.1 In re Kuehn

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 563 F.3d 289 (2009).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Stefanie Kuehn, an art teacher, obtained a master's degree at Cardinal Stritch University in Wisconsin. But when Kuehn asked for a transcript—which was required to CASE 30.1 CONTINUED ♦ receive an increase in salary from her school district—the university refused because she owed more than $6,000 in tuition. Kuehn offered to pay the nominal transcript fee but not the tuition. She then filed a petition in a federal bankruptcy court, listing the university as her only creditor. While the case was pending, she again asked for a transcript. The university once more refused unless she paid the tuition. Kuehn complained to the court, which ordered the university to provide a transcript. A federal district court affirmed the order. The university appealed.

EASTERBROOK, Chief Judge.

* * * *

* * * [If] providing a transcript is an implicit part of the educational contract, covered by the fee for the course hours, [then] Kuehn * * * has a contract or property right for which she has already paid. (Well, she hasn't paid, but her obligation to do so has been [stayed by the bankruptcy petition] so it comes to the same thing.) The University cannot charge Kuehn extra if the fee for instruction covers transcripts, too. Then the University's refusal to certify a transcript of Kuehn's grades would be an act to collect the discharged debt and would violate * * * the automatic stay. [Emphasis added.]

Well, then, does Kuehn have a property interest because a certified transcript is part of the package of goods and services that a college offers in exchange for tuition? Property interests are created and defined by state law unless a federal law requires a different result. Nothing in the Bankruptcy Code creates or alters property rights in grades or the right to receive a transcript. Other federal law addresses privacy concerns but not property interests. What remain are state statutes and common law.

* * * *

Wisconsin courts have not considered whether a student has a contract or property right to receive a transcript. No Wisconsin statute is on point. Under Wisconsin common law, property rights may arise from custom and usage. Universities have consistently provided transcripts at or around cost. A transcript currently sets students back $4 at Cardinal Stritch University, $3 at Harvard University, and nothing at the University of Chicago if delivered electronically (otherwise $12). Fees at other universities are similar. We could not find any case in any court where a university had asserted that it could charge a student more than cost for a transcript, and, as far as we can tell, no university has ever tried to profit by charging a fee based on the transcript's effect on a student's future income. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Kuehn's property right might be limited to her grades, * * * and not include a right to receive a transcript from the University certifying those grades. But the custom of universities has been to provide certified transcripts, and for good reason. Intangible grades are worthless without proof. Kuehn's school district increases compensation only after it receives a certified transcript. Other employers have similar policies. * * * A right to receive a certified copy of a transcript is essential to a meaningful property right in grades.

* * * *

* * * We conclude that Kuehn has a state-law right to receive a certified copy of her transcript. The University's refusal to honor that right until Kuehn paid her back tuition was an act to collect a debt and thereby violated the automatic stay.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed the lower court's order. Kuehn had a right to a copy of her transcript, and the university's refusal to honor that right until she paid her tuition was an act to collect a debt in violation of the automatic stay.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that instead of offering to pay for a transcript, Kuehn had tried to obtain one on credit. Would the university's refusal to provide one on that basis have led to the same result? Why or why not?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Some might say that higher education institutions should be able to use all methods possible to collect unpaid tuition, including withholding certified grade transcripts. What ethical issues would this approach raise?

THE ADEQUATE PROTECTION DOCTRINE Underlying the Code's automatic-stay provision for a secured creditor is a concept known as adequate protection. The adequate protection doctrine, among other things, protects secured creditors from losing their security as a result of the automatic stay. The bankruptcy court can provide adequate protection by requiring the debtor or trustee to make periodic cash payments or a one-time cash payment (or to provide additional collateral or replacement liens) to the extent that the stay may actually cause the value of the property to decrease.

EXCEPTIONS TO THE AUTOMATIC STAY The Code provides several exceptions to the automatic stay. Collection efforts can continue for domestic-support obligations, which include any debt owed to or recoverable by a spouse, a former spouse, a child of the debtor, that child's parent or guardian, or a governmental unit. In addition, proceedings against the debtor related to divorce, child custody or visitation, domestic violence, and support enforcement are not stayed. Also excepted are investigations by a securities regulatory agency (see Chapter 42) and certain statutory liens for property taxes.

LIMITATIONS ON THE AUTOMATIC STAY A secured creditor or other party in interest can petition the bankruptcy court for relief from the automatic stay. If a creditor or other party requests relief from the stay, the stay will automatically terminate sixty days after the request, unless the court grants an extension⁹ or the parties agree otherwise. Also, the automatic stay on secured debts (see Chapter 29) will terminate thirty days after the petition is filed if the debtor filed a bankruptcy petition that was dismissed within the prior year. Any party in interest can request that the court extend the stay by showing that the filing is in good faith.

If the debtor had two or more bankruptcy petitions dismissed during the prior year, the Code presumes bad faith, and the automatic stay does not go into effect until the court determines that the petition was filed in good faith. In addition, the automatic stay on secured property terminates forty-five days after the creditors' meeting (to be discussed shortly) unless the debtor redeems or reaffirms certain debts (reaffirmation will be discussed later in this chapter). In other words, the debtor cannot keep the secured property (such as a financed automobile), even if she or he continues to make payments on it, without reinstating the rights of the secured party to collect on the debt.

Bankruptcy Estate

On the commencement of a liquidation proceeding under Chapter 7, a bankruptcy estate (sometimes called an estate in property) is created. This task is performed by the bankruptcy trustee, as described next. The estate consists of all the debtor's interests in property currently held, wherever located. It also includes community property (property jointly owned by a husband and wife in certain states—see Chapter 50), property transferred in a transaction voidable by the trustee, proceeds and profits from the property of the estate, and certain after-acquired property. Interests in certain property—such as gifts, inheritances, property settlements (from divorce), and life insurance death proceeds—to which the debtor becomes entitled within 180 days after filing may also become part of the estate. Withholdings for employee benefit plan contributions are excluded from the estate. Generally, though, the filing of a bankruptcy petition fixes a dividing line: property acquired prior to the filing of the petition becomes property of the estate, and property acquired after the filing of the petition, except as just noted, remains the debtor's.

The Bankruptcy Trustee

Promptly after the order for relief in the liquidation proceeding has been entered, a trustee is appointed. The basic duty of the trustee is to collect and reduce to cash the property in the bankruptcy estate that is not exempt. (Exemptions will be discussed later in the chapter.) The trustee is held accountable for administering the debtor's estate to preserve the interests of both the debtor and unsecured creditors. To enable the trustee to accomplish this duty, the Code gives the trustee certain powers, stated in both general and specific terms. These powers must be exercised within two years of the order for relief.

DUTIES FOR MEANS TESTING The trustee is required to promptly review all materials filed by the debtor to determine if there is substantial abuse. Within ten days after the first meeting of the creditors (held soon after the order for relief is granted, as discussed later), the trustee must file a statement indicating whether the case is presumed to be an abuse under the means test. The trustee must provide a copy of this statement to all creditors within five days. When there is a presumption of abuse, the trustee must either file a motion to dismiss the petition (or convert it to a Chapter 13 case) or file a statement setting forth the reasons why a motion would not be appropriate. If the debtor owes a domestic-support obligation (such as child support), the trustee is required to provide written notice of the bankruptcy to the claim holder (a former spouse, for example).

9. The court might grant an extension, for example, on a motion by the trustee that the property is of value to the estate.

THE TRUSTEE'S POWERS The trustee has the power to require persons holding the debtor's property at the time the petition is filed to deliver the property to the trustee.¹⁰ To enable the trustee to implement this power, the Code provides that the trustee has rights equivalent to those of certain other parties, such as a creditor who has a judicial lien. This power of a trustee, which is equivalent to that of a lien creditor, is known as strong-arm power.

In addition, the trustee has specific powers of avoidance—that is, the trustee can set aside (avoid) a sale or other transfer of the debtor's property, taking it back as a part of the debtor's estate. These powers include voidable rights available to the debtor, preferences, and fraudulent transfers by the debtor. Each is discussed in more detail below. In addition, a trustee can avoid certain statutory liens (creditors' claims against the debtor's property).

The debtor shares most of the trustee's avoidance powers. Thus, if the trustee does not take action to enforce one of the rights just mentioned, the debtor in a liquidation bankruptcy can enforce that right.¹¹

VOIDABLE RIGHTS A trustee steps into the shoes of the debtor. Thus, any reason that a debtor can use to obtain the return of her or his property can be used by the trustee as well. These grounds include fraud, duress, incapacity, and mutual mistake.

For example, Ben sells his boat to Tara. Tara gives Ben a check, knowing that she has insufficient funds in her bank account to cover the check. Tara has committed fraud. Ben has the right to avoid that transfer and recover the boat from Tara. If Ben files for bankruptcy relief under Chapter 7, the trustee can exercise the same right to recover the boat from Tara, and the boat becomes a part of the debtor's estate.

PREFERENCES A debtor is not permitted to transfer property or to make a payment that favors—or gives a preference to—one creditor over others. The trustee is allowed to recover payments made both voluntarily and involuntarily to one creditor in preference over another.

To have made a preferential payment that can be recovered, an insolvent debtor must have transferred property, for a preexisting debt, within ninety days prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition. The transfer must have given the creditor more than the creditor would have received as a result of the bankruptcy proceedings. The Code presumes that a debtor is insolvent during the ninety-day period before filing a petition.

If a preferred creditor (one who has received a preferential transfer from the debtor) has sold the property to an innocent third party, the trustee cannot recover the property from the innocent party. The preferred creditor, however, generally can be held accountable for the value of the property.

Preferences to Insiders. Sometimes, the creditor receiving the preference is an insider—an individual, a partner, a partnership, a corporation, or an officer or a director of a corporation (or a relative of one of these) who has a close relationship with the debtor. In this situation, the avoidance power of the trustee is extended to transfers made within one year before filing. (If the transfer was fraudulent, as will be discussed shortly, the trustee can avoid transfers made within two years before filing.) Note, however, that if the transfer occurred before the ninety-day period, the trustee is required to prove that the debtor was insolvent at the time it occurred or that the transfer was made to or for the benefit of an insider.

What Constitutes a Preference? Not all transfers are preferences. To be a preference, the transfer must be made for something other than current consideration. Most courts generally assume that payment for services rendered within fifteen days before the payment is not a preference. If a creditor receives payment in the ordinary course of business from an individual or business debtor, such as payment of last month's cell phone bill, the bankruptcy trustee cannot recover the payment.

To be recoverable, a preference must be a transfer for an antecedent (preexisting) debt, such as a year-old landscaping bill. In addition, the Code permits a

10. Usually, though, the trustee takes constructive, rather than actual, possession of the debtor's property. For example, to obtain control of a debtor's business inventory, a trustee might change the locks on the doors to the business and hire a security guard.

11. Under a Chapter 11 bankruptcy (to be discussed later), for which no trustee other than the debtor generally exists, the debtor has the same avoidance powers as a trustee under Chapter 7. Under Chapters 12 and 13 (also to be discussed later), a trustee must be appointed.

consumer-debtor to transfer any property to a creditor up to a total value of $5,850 without the transfer's constituting a preference. Payment of domestic-support debts does not constitute a preference.

FRAUDULENT TRANSFERS The trustee may avoid fraudulent transfers or obligations if they (1) were made within two years of the filing of the petition, or (2) were made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor. For example, a debtor who is thinking about petitioning for bankruptcy sells her gold jewelry, worth $10,000, to a friend for $500. The friend agrees that in the future he will “sell” the collection back to the debtor for the same amount. This is a fraudulent transfer that the trustee can undo.

Transfers made for less than reasonably equivalent consideration are also vulnerable if the debtor thereby became insolvent or was left engaged in business with an unreasonably small amount of capital. When a fraudulent transfer is made outside the Code's two-year limit, creditors may seek alternative relief under state laws. Some state laws may allow creditors to recover for transfers made up to three years before the filing of a petition.

In the following case, a trustee alleged that severance payments—that is, compensation paid to an employee who is fired—made to the chief executive officer of a company reorganizing under Chapter 11 constituted both an unlawful preference to an insider and a fraudulent transfer under the Code.

Leslie H. SOUTHWICK,
Circuit Judge.

TransTexas Gas Corporation was engaged in [the] exploration, production, and transmission of oil and natural gas. In April 1999, TransTexas filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. The reorganization plan provided that the company would enter a three-year Employment Agreement with John Stanley, Sr., the company's founder. Stanley would serve as Chief Executive Officer and be one of the five directors * * * .

The Employment Agreement provided that Stanley could be terminated beginning two years after its execution * * * [and] would be entitled to severance pay. If he were dismissed for reasons other than cause, he would receive three million dollars. If he were terminated for cause, his payment would be one and a half million dollars. If he voluntarily resigned, he would be paid no severance.

* * * In February 2001, a law firm retained by the Board to investigate allegations of Stanley's wrongdoing found that he could validly be dismissed for cause.

* * * *

Between January and March 2002, Stanley remained CEO and a member of the Board as he negotiated the terms of his departure. In March, Stanley and TransTexas agreed that he would resign. On March 14, 2002, the Board executed a “Separation Agreement.” It explicitly superseded [replaced] his Employment Agreement. He was to be paid three million dollars in installments. Stanley received $2,270,794.90 before the payments ceased.

* * * *

As a result of its financial deterioration, TransTexas in November 2002 filed a second Chapter 11 proceeding in the bankruptcy court for the Southern District of Texas.

* * * Under the plan, a liquidating trust was established with U.S. Bank as the liquidating trustee.

U.S. Bank filed an adversary proceeding against Stanley, seeking to avoid the severance payments.

* * * The bankruptcy court held that the severance payments constituted both unlawful preferences under Section 547(b) and fraudulent transfers pursuant to Section 548 * * * .

On appeal, the district court agreed in most respects. * * * [The court held] that Stanley's severance payments were avoidable as fraudulent transfers pursuant to Section 548 * * * , but not as preferential transfers under Section 547(b).

On appeal now, * * * U.S. Bank seeks reversal of the district court's holding that the transfers were not preferential under Section 547(b). Stanley argues for reversal of the holding that the severance payments were fraudulent transfers under Section 548 * * * *.

An avoidable fraudulent transfer requires (a) an obligation (b) incurred by the debtor for the benefit of an insider (c) made or incurred within two years before the date of petition where the debtor either (d) incurred such obligation with actual intent to hinder, delay or defraud a creditor, or (e) received less than reasonably equivalent value in exchange for such obligation while the debtor was insolvent or made for the benefit of an insider under an employment contract and not in the ordinary course of business. [Emphasis added.]

Two elements are clearly satisfied. The severance payments made to Stanley after his dismissal were obligations incurred by TransTexas within two years of its petition date.

Superficially, it would appear that the third element of Stanley's being an insider is beyond question. That element is challenged, though, on the basis that at the time of the actual payments, Stanley had left the company and was no longer an insider.

Under Section 548, it is enough that Stanley was an insider either at the time of the transfer of the funds or at the time the company incurred such obligation. The language of the statute makes that evident. A "trustee may avoid any transfer (including any transfer to or for the benefit of an insider under an employment contract)," if the debtor "(A) made such transfer or incurred such obligation" with the requisite intent, "or (B)(i) received less than a reasonably equivalent value in exchange for such transfer or obligation" (emphases added [by the court]).

Stanley was indisputably an insider at the time he entered into the relevant obligation. That is enough for Section 548.

The bankruptcy court found there was no value to the 2002 agreement to pay three million dollars. The district court assigned some value to the exchange, such as Stanley's release and covenant not to sue. Stanley suggests that by agreeing to "go quietly," he provided benefit to the company.

TransTexas did not receive reasonably equivalent value for providing Stanley greater compensation than required by the terms of the Employment Agreement. The district court agreed that even under the most favorable circumstances, Stanley could only have been entitled to $1.5 million under the Employment Agreement, basing that on the conclusion that there was good cause for terminating him. There is simply too much disparity [difference] between TransTexas's payments and any concessions Stanley may have made for his expedient [convenient] exit from the company.

[As to the insolvency of TransTexas,] the language in Section 548 regarding fraudulent transfers [makes it] clear that there are different ways in which such transfers can occur. One alternative is that a transfer has been made when the debtor was insolvent. Another alternative is [that] the transfer be made "to or for the benefit of an insider, or incurred such obligation to or for the benefit of an insider, under an employment contract and not in the ordinary course of business." That latter provision applies. As we have discussed, Stanley was an insider at the time the obligation was incurred.

* * * [We] AFFIRM the district court on the basis that TransTexas's payments to Stanley were avoidable fraudulent transfers under Section 548.

1. What might Stanley have meant when he said that by agreeing to "go quietly," he provided a benefit to the company?
2. Stanley argued that he was not an insider because he was no longer employed by the company when the severance payments were made. How did the court respond to this argument?

Exemptions

As just described, the trustee takes control over the debtor's property in a Chapter 7 bankruptcy, but an individual debtor is entitled to exempt (exclude) certain property from the bankruptcy. The Bankruptcy Code exempts the following property:¹²

¹² The dollar amounts stated in the Bankruptcy Code are adjusted automatically every three years on April 1 based on changes in the Consumer Price Index. The adjusted amounts are rounded to the nearest $25. The amounts stated in this chapter are in accordance with those computed on April 1, 2010.

1. Up to $21,625 in equity in the debtor's residence and burial plot (the homestead exemption).
2. Interest in a motor vehicle up to $3,450.
3. Interest, up to $550 for a particular item, in household goods and furnishings, wearing apparel, appliances, books, animals, crops, and musical instruments (the aggregate total of all items is limited to $11,525).
4. Interest in jewelry up to $1,450.
5. Interest in any other property up to $1,150, plus any unused part of the $21,625 homestead exemption up to $10,825.

6. Interest in any tools of the debtor's trade up to $2,175.
7. A life insurance contract owned by the debtor (other than a credit life insurance contract).
8. Certain interests in accrued dividends and interest under, or loan value of, life insurance contracts owned by the debtor, not to exceed $11,525.
9. Professionally prescribed health aids.
10. The right to receive Social Security and certain welfare benefits, alimony and support, certain retirement funds and pensions, and education savings accounts held for specific periods of time.
11. The right to receive certain personal-injury and other awards up to $21,625.

Individual states have the power to pass legislation precluding debtors from using the federal exemptions within the state; a majority of the states have done this (see Chapter 28). In those states, debtors may use only state, not federal, exemptions. In the rest of the states, an individual debtor (or a husband and wife filing jointly) may choose either the exemptions provided under state law or the federal exemptions.

The Homestead Exemption

As mentioned in Chapter 28, the 2005 reforms significantly changed the law for those debtors seeking to use state homestead exemption statutes. In six states, including Florida and Texas, homestead exemptions allowed debtors petitioning for bankruptcy to shield unlimited amounts of equity in their homes from creditors. The Code now places limits on the amount that can be claimed as exempt in bankruptcy. In addition, a debtor must have lived in a state for two years before filing the bankruptcy petition to be able to use the state homestead exemption (prior law required only six months).

In general, if the debtor acquired the homestead within three and a half years preceding the date of filing, the maximum equity exempted is $146,450, even if state law would permit a higher amount. Note, however, that a debtor who has violated securities laws (see Chapter 42) or been convicted of a felony may not be able to claim the exemption. Similarly, the court can prevent a debtor who has committed any criminal act, intentional tort, or other misconduct that caused serious physical injury or death to another individual in the previous five years from using the homestead exemption.

Creditors' Meeting

In addition to creating and preserving the bankruptcy estate, the bankruptcy trustee has several duties in regard to the creditors. One is to hold the creditors' meeting. Within a reasonable time after the order for relief has been granted (not less than twenty days or more than forty days), the trustee must call a meeting of the creditors listed in the schedules filed by the debtor. The bankruptcy judge does not attend this meeting. The debtor is required to attend (unless excused by the court) and to submit to examination under oath by the creditors and the trustee. At the meeting, the trustee ensures that the debtor is aware of the potential consequences of bankruptcy and of his or her ability to file for bankruptcy under a different chapter of the Bankruptcy Code.

Creditors' Claims

To be entitled to receive a portion of the debtor's estate, each creditor normally files a proof of claim with the bankruptcy court clerk within ninety days of the creditors' meeting.¹³ The proof of claim lists the creditor's name and address, as well as the amount that the creditor asserts is owed to the creditor by the debtor. A creditor need not file a proof of claim if the debtor's schedules list the creditor's claim as liquidated (exactly determined) and the creditor does not dispute the amount of the claim. A proof of claim is necessary if there is any dispute concerning the claim.

Distribution of Property

In the next step in a Chapter 7 bankruptcy, the trustee distributes the bankruptcy estate to the creditors. In the distribution of the debtor's estate, secured creditors take priority over unsecured creditors. The Code provides that a consumer-debtor, within thirty days of filing a liquidation petition or before the date of the first meeting of the creditors (whichever is first), must file with the clerk a statement of intention with respect to the secured collateral. The statement must indicate whether the debtor will retain the collateral or surrender the collateral to the secured party. Also, if applicable, the debtor must specify whether the collateral will be claimed as exempt property and whether the debtor intends to redeem the property or reaffirm the debt secured by the collateral. The trustee is obligated to enforce the debtor's statement within forty-five days after it is filed.

13. This ninety-day rule applies in Chapter 12 and Chapter 13 bankruptcies as well.

In a bankruptcy case in which the debtor has no assets (called a "no-asset case"), creditors are notified of the debtor's petition for bankruptcy but are instructed not to file a claim. In no-asset cases, the unsecured creditors will receive no payment, and most, if not all, of these debts will be discharged.

DISTRIBUTION TO SECURED CREDITORS The rights of perfected secured creditors were discussed on pages 572–577 in Chapter 29. If the collateral is surrendered to the secured party, the secured creditor can enforce the security interest either by accepting the property in full satisfaction of the debt or by selling the collateral and using the proceeds to pay off the debt. Thus, the secured party has priority over unsecured parties as to the proceeds from the disposition of the collateral. Should the collateral be insufficient to cover the secured debt owed, the secured creditor becomes an unsecured creditor for the difference.

DISTRIBUTION TO UNSECURED CREDITORS Bankruptcy law establishes an order of priority for classes of debts owed to unsecured creditors, and they are paid in the order of their priority. Each class must be fully paid before the next class is entitled to any of the remaining proceeds. If there are insufficient proceeds to pay fully all the creditors in a class, the proceeds are distributed proportionately to the creditors in that class, and classes lower in priority receive nothing. In almost all cases, the funds will be insufficient to pay all creditors. The order of priority among classes of unsecured creditors is as follows (some of these classes involve cases against bankrupt businesses):

1. Claims for domestic-support obligations, such as child support and alimony.
2. Administrative expenses, including court costs, trustee fees, and attorneys' fees.
3. In an involuntary bankruptcy, expenses incurred by the debtor in the ordinary course of business.
4. Unpaid wages, salaries, and commissions earned within ninety days of the filing of the petition; the amount is capped for each claimant.
5. Unsecured claims for contributions to be made to employee benefit plans; the amount is capped for each claimant.
6. Consumer deposits given to the debtor before the petition was filed; the amount is capped for each claimant.

7. Certain taxes and penalties owed to government units, such as income and property taxes.
8. Claims for death or personal injury resulting from the unlawful operation of a motor vehicle.
9. Claims of general creditors.

If any amount remains after the priority classes of creditors have been satisfied, it is turned over to the debtor.

Discharge

From the debtor's point of view, the primary purpose of liquidation is to obtain a fresh start through a discharge of debts. Certain debts, however, are not dischargeable in bankruptcy. Also, certain debtors may not qualify to have all debts discharged in bankruptcy. These situations are discussed next.

EXCEPTIONS TO DISCHARGE Discharge of a debt may be denied because of the nature of the claim or the conduct of the debtor. Claims that are not dischargeable in bankruptcy include the following:

1. Claims for back taxes accruing within two years prior to bankruptcy.
2. Claims for amounts borrowed by the debtor to pay federal taxes or any nondischargeable taxes.¹⁴
3. Claims against property or funds obtained by the debtor under false pretenses or by false representations.
4. Claims by creditors who were not notified of the bankruptcy; these claims did not appear on the schedules the debtor was required to file.
5. Claims based on fraud¹⁵ or misuse of funds by the debtor while acting in a fiduciary capacity or claims involving the debtor's embezzlement or larceny.
6. Domestic-support obligations and property settlements as provided for in a separation agreement or divorce decree.

14. Taxes accruing within three years prior to bankruptcy are nondischargeable, including federal and state income taxes, employment taxes, taxes on gross receipts, property taxes, excise taxes, customs duties, and any other taxes for which the government claims the debtor is liable in some capacity. See 11 U.S.C. Sections 507(a)(8) and 523(a)(1).

15. Even if a debtor who is sued for fraud settles the lawsuit, the United States Supreme Court has held that the amount due under the settlement agreement may not be discharged in bankruptcy because of the underlying fraud. See Archer v. Warner, 538 U.S. 314, 123 S.Ct. 1462, 155 L.Ed.2d 454 (2003).

7. Claims for amounts due on a retirement account loan.
8. Claims based on willful or malicious conduct by the debtor toward another or the property of another.
9. Certain government fines and penalties.
10. Certain student loans or obligations to repay funds received as an educational benefit, scholarship, or stipend—unless payment of the loans imposes an undue hardship on the debtor and the debtor's dependents. (For an example of what constitutes undue hardship, see the Case in Point feature that follows this list.)
11. Consumer debts of more than $600 for luxury goods or services owed to a single creditor incurred within ninety days of the order for relief.
12. Cash advances totaling more than $875 that are extensions of open-end consumer credit obtained by the debtor within seventy days of the order for relief.
13. Judgments against a debtor as a result of the debtor's operation of a motor vehicle while intoxicated.
14. Fees or assessments arising from property in a homeowners' association, as long as the debtor retained an interest in the property.
15. Taxes with respect to which the debtor failed to provide required or requested tax documents.

CASE IN POINT Keldric Mosley incurred student loans while attending Alcorn State University and then joined the U.S. Army Reserve Officers' Training Corps. He was injured during training and resigned from the Corps because of medical problems related to his injuries. Mosley worked briefly for several employers, but depressed and physically limited by his injuries, he was unable to keep any of the jobs. A federal bankruptcy court granted him a discharge under Chapter 7, but it did not include the student loans. By 2004, Mosley was homeless and had a monthly income of $210 in disability benefits, but he still owed $45,000 in student loans. He asked the bankruptcy court to reopen his case and discharge his student loans based on undue hardship. The court held that Mosley's medical problems, lack of skills, and "dire living conditions" made it unlikely that he would be able to hold a job and repay the loans. The court therefore discharged the debt, reasoning that Mosley could not maintain a minimal standard of living if forced to repay the loans.¹⁶

16. In re Mosley, 494 F.3d 1320 (11th Cir. 2007).

OBJECTIONS TO DISCHARGE In addition to the exceptions to discharge previously discussed, a bankruptcy court may also deny the discharge based on the debtor's conduct. In such a situation, the assets of the debtor are still distributed to the creditors, but the debtor remains liable for the unpaid portion of all claims. Grounds for a denial of discharge of the debtor include the following:

1. The debtor's concealment or destruction of property with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor.
2. The debtor's fraudulent concealment or destruction of financial records.
3. The grant of a discharge to the debtor within eight years before the petition was filed.
4. The debtor's failure to complete the required consumer education course.
5. Proceedings in which the debtor could be found guilty of a felony (basically, a court may not discharge any debt until the completion of felony proceedings against the debtor).

EFFECT OF A DISCHARGE The primary effect of a discharge is to void, or set aside, any judgment on a discharged debt and prohibit any action to collect a discharged debt. A discharge does not affect the liability of a co-debtor. (For a discussion of how some debts that were discharged in bankruptcy have still appeared on debtors' credit reports, see this chapter's Insight into Ethics feature on the next page.)

REVOCATION OF DISCHARGE On petition by the trustee or a creditor, the bankruptcy court can, within one year, revoke the discharge decree if it is discovered that the debtor acted fraudulently or dishonestly during the bankruptcy proceedings. The revocation renders the discharge void, allowing creditors not satisfied by the distribution of the debtor's estate to proceed with their claims against the debtor.

Reaffirmation of Debt

An agreement to pay a debt dischargeable in bankruptcy is called a reaffirmation agreement. A debtor may wish to pay a debt—for example, a debt owed to a family member, physician, bank, or some other creditor—even though the debt could be discharged in bankruptcy. Also, as noted previously, a debtor cannot retain secured property while continuing to pay without entering into a reaffirmation agreement.

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

The Debt That Never Goes Away

When a bankruptcy judge discharges certain debts, they are no longer supposed to appear on debtors' credit reports. Nonetheless, many credit-card companies and other creditors have been keeping debts active even after they have been discharged in bankruptcy. Not surprisingly, some aggressive entrepreneurs have found a way to profit from this practice. Companies with names such as eCast Settlement and Max Recovery purchase discharged debt obligations at pennies on the dollar. Then they pursue the debtors and pressure them to pay the debts even though they have been discharged. Some of these companies have been successful enough to become publicly traded on the New York Stock Exchange.

The fact that discharged debt does not have a zero dollar value indicates that some consumers have been repaying these debts. As the number of bankruptcies rose during the latest recession, the market price of fully discharged Chapter 7 debt actually increased—to about seven cents on the dollar.

One federal district court judge, though, has had enough. In a class-action lawsuit, plaintiffs claimed that credit reporting agencies had violated the federal Fair Credit Reporting Act (see Chapter 45) by failing to follow reasonable procedures that ensured accurate reporting of debts discharged in Chapter 7 bankruptcies. The court agreed and ordered the agencies to revise their procedures.^a Today, credit agencies must automatically report all prebankruptcy debt as “discharged,” unless the debt is nondischargeable. Although the purchasers of discharged debt may still attempt to pressure consumers into paying debts that they do not owe, the change in the credit bureaus' procedures may give consumers additional help in their efforts to rebuild their lives after bankruptcy.

INSIGHT INTO THE ECONOMIC ENVIRONMENT

About six years ago, one could buy debt that had been discharged in bankruptcy for less than five cents on the dollar. Why has the price increased to seven cents on the dollar?

^a White v. Experian Information Solutions, No. 05-CV-1-70 DOC (C.D.Cal. 2008).

THE REAFFIRMATION PROCESS To be enforceable, reaffirmation agreements must be made before the debtor is granted a discharge. The agreement must be signed and filed with the court. Court approval is required unless the debtor is represented by an attorney during the negotiation of the reaffirmation and submits the proper documents and certifications. Even when the debtor is represented by an attorney, court approval may be required if it appears that the reaffirmation will result in undue hardship on the debtor. When court approval is required, a separate hearing will take place. The court will approve the reaffirmation only if it finds that the agreement will not result in undue hardship to the debtor and that the reaffirmation is consistent with the debtor's best interests.

REAFFIRMATION DISCLOSURES To discourage creditors from engaging in abusive reaffirmation practices, the law provides specific language for disclosures that must be given to debtors entering into reaffirmation agreements. Among other things, these disclosures explain that the debtor is not required to reaffirm any debt, but that liens on secured property, such as mortgages and cars, will remain in effect even if the debt is not reaffirmed.

The reaffirmation agreement must disclose the amount of the debt reaffirmed, the rate of interest, the date payments begin, and the right to rescind. The disclosures also caution the debtor: “Only agree to reaffirm a debt if it is in your best interest. Be sure you can afford the payments you agree to make.” The original disclosure documents must be signed by the debtor, certified by the debtor's attorney, and filed with the court at the same time as the reaffirmation agreement. A reaffirmation agreement that is not accompanied by the original signed disclosures will not be effective.

REORGANIZATIONS

The type of bankruptcy proceeding most commonly used by corporate debtors is the Chapter 11 reorganization. In a reorganization, the creditors and the debtor formulate a plan under which the debtor pays a portion of the debts and is discharged of the remainder. The debtor is allowed to continue in business. Although this type of bankruptcy is generally a corporate reorganization, any debtor (except a stockbroker or a commodities broker) who is eligible for Chapter 7 relief is eligible for relief under Chapter 11. Railroads are also eligible.

In 1994, Congress established a “fast-track” Chapter 11 procedure for small-business debtors whose liabilities do not exceed $2.19 million and who do not own or manage real estate. The fast track enables a debtor to avoid the appointment of a creditors’ committee and also shortens the filing periods and relaxes certain other requirements. Because the process is shorter and simpler, it is less costly.

The same principles that govern the filing of a liquidation (Chapter 7) petition apply to reorganization (Chapter 11) proceedings. The case may be brought either voluntarily or involuntarily. The automatic-stay provisions and adequate protection doctrine apply in reorganizations as well. An exception from the automatic stay is triggered if the debtor files for bankruptcy again within two years and new grounds for dismissal (such as substantial abuse) or conversion of the case are established.

Workouts

In some instances, to avoid bankruptcy proceedings, creditors may prefer private, negotiated adjustments of creditor-debtor relations, also known as workouts. Often, these out-of-court workouts are much more flexible and thus more conducive to a speedy settlement. Speed is critical because delay is one of the most costly elements in any bankruptcy proceeding. Another advantage of workouts is that they avoid the various administrative costs of bankruptcy proceedings.

Focus Is on the Best Interests of the Creditors

After a petition for Chapter 11 bankruptcy has been filed, a bankruptcy court, after notice and a hearing, can dismiss or suspend all proceedings at any time if dismissal or suspension would better serve the interests of the creditors. The Code also allows a court, after notice and a hearing, to dismiss a case under reorganization “for cause.” Cause includes the absence of a reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation, the inability to effect a plan, and an unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to (may harm the interests of) creditors.¹⁷

Debtor in Possession

On entry of the order for relief, the debtor generally continues to operate the business as a debtor in possession (DIP). The court, however, may appoint a trustee (often referred to as a receiver) to operate the debtor’s business if gross mismanagement of the business is shown or if appointing a trustee is in the best interests of the estate.

The DIP’s role is similar to that of a trustee in a liquidation.¹⁸ The DIP is entitled to avoid preferential payments made to creditors and fraudulent transfers of assets. The DIP has the power to decide whether to cancel or assume obligations under prepetition executory contracts (those that are not yet performed) or unexpired leases. The DIP can also exercise a trustee’s strong-arm powers.

Creditors’ Committees

As soon as practicable after the entry of the order for relief, a creditors’ committee of unsecured creditors is appointed.¹⁹ This committee often is composed of the biggest suppliers to the business. The committee may consult with the trustee or the DIP concerning the administration of the case or the formulation of the plan. Additional creditors’ committees may be appointed to represent special interest creditors.

Generally, no orders affecting the estate will be entered without the consent of the committee or after a hearing in which the judge is informed of the committee’s position. As mentioned earlier, businesses with debts of less than $2.19 million that do not own or manage real estate can avoid creditors’ committees. In these cases, orders can be entered without a committee’s consent.

The Reorganization Plan

A reorganization plan to rehabilitate the debtor is a plan to conserve and administer the debtor’s assets in the hope of an eventual return to successful

17. See 11 U.S.C. Section 1112(b). Debtors are not prohibited from filing successive petitions, however. A debtor whose petition is dismissed, for example, can file a new Chapter 11 petition (which may be granted unless it is filed in bad faith).

18. 11 U.S.C. Section 544(a).

19. If the debtor has filed a reorganization plan accepted by the creditors, the trustee may decide not to call a meeting of the creditors.

operation and solvency. The plan must be fair and equitable and must do the following:

1. Designate classes of claims and interests.
2. Specify the treatment to be afforded the classes. (The plan must provide the same treatment for all claims in a particular class.)
3. Provide an adequate means for execution. (Individual debtors are required to utilize post-petition assets as necessary to execute the plan.)
4. Provide for payment of tax claims over a five-year period.

FILING THE PLAN Only the debtor may file a plan within the first 120 days after the date of the order for relief. This period may be extended, but not beyond eighteen months from the date of the order for relief. If the debtor does not meet the 120-day deadline or obtain an extension, and if the debtor fails to procure the required creditor consent (discussed below) within 180 days, any party may propose a plan. The plan need not provide for full repayment to unsecured creditors. Instead, creditors receive a percentage of each dollar owed to them by the debtor. If a small-business debtor chooses to avoid a creditors' committee, the time for the debtor's filing is 180 days.

ACCEPTANCE AND CONFIRMATION OF THE PLAN

Once the plan has been developed, it is submitted to each class of creditors for acceptance. For the plan to be adopted, each class that is adversely affected by the plan must accept it. A class has accepted the plan when a majority of the creditors, representing two-thirds of the amount of the total claim, vote to approve it. Confirmation is conditioned on the debtor's certification that all postpetition domestic-support obligations have been paid in full.

Even when all classes of creditors accept the plan, the court may refuse to confirm it if it is not "in the best interests of the creditors." The plan can also be modified on the request of the debtor, the trustee, the U.S. trustee, or a holder of an unsecured claim. If an unsecured creditor objects to the plan, specific rules apply to the value of property to be distributed under the plan. Tax claims must be paid over a five-year period.

Even if only one class of creditors has accepted the plan, the court may still confirm the plan under the Code's so-called cram-down provision. In other words, the court may confirm the plan over the objections of a class of creditors. Before the court can exercise this right of cram-down confirmation, it must be demonstrated that the plan does not discriminate unfairly against any creditors and is fair and equitable.

DISCHARGE The plan is binding on confirmation; however, the law provides that confirmation of a plan does not discharge an individual debtor. For individual debtors, the plan must be completed before discharge will be granted, unless the court orders otherwise. For all other debtors, the court may order discharge at any time after the plan is confirmed. At this time, the debtor is given a reorganization discharge from all claims not protected under the plan. This discharge does not apply to any claims that would be denied discharge under liquidation.

BANKRUPTCY RELIEF UNDER CHAPTER 13 AND CHAPTER 12

In addition to bankruptcy relief through liquidation and reorganization, the Code also provides for individuals' repayment plans (Chapter 13) and family-farmer and family-fisherman debt adjustments (Chapter 12).

Individuals' Repayment Plans

Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code provides for "Adjustment of Debts of an Individual with Regular Income." Individuals (not partnerships or corporations) with regular income who owe fixed (liquidated) unsecured debts of less than $360,475 or fixed secured debts of less than $1,081,400 may take advantage of bankruptcy repayment plans. Among those eligible are salaried employees; sole proprietors; and individuals who live on welfare, Social Security, fixed pensions, or investment income. Many small-business debtors have a choice of filing under either Chapter 11 or Chapter 13. Repayment plans offer some advantages because they are less expensive and less complicated than reorganization or liquidation proceedings.

FILING THE PETITION A Chapter 13 repayment plan case can be initiated only by the debtor's filing of a voluntary petition or by court conversion of a Chapter 7 petition (because of a finding of substantial abuse under the means test, for example). Certain liquidation and reorganization cases may be converted to repayment plan cases with the consent of the debtor.²⁰ A trustee, who will make payments under the plan, must be appointed. On the filing of a repayment plan petition, the automatic stay previously discussed takes effect. Although the stay applies to all or part of the debtor's consumer debt, it does not apply to any business debt incurred by the debtor or to any domestic-support obligations.

GOOD FAITH REQUIREMENT The Bankruptcy Code imposes the requirement of good faith on a debtor at both the time of the filing of the petition and the time of the filing of the plan. The Code does not define good faith, but if the circumstances on the whole indicate bad faith, a court can dismiss a debtor's Chapter 13 petition.

CASE IN POINT Roger and Pauline Buis bought an air show business, including a helicopter. They decorated the helicopter as "Otto the Clown" and operated the business as Otto Airshows. Several years later, a competitor won a defamation lawsuit against the Buis and Otto Airshows. The Buis then stopped doing business as Otto Airshows and formed a new firm, Prop and Rotor Aviation, Inc., to which they leased the Otto equipment. Within a month, they filed a bankruptcy petition under Chapter 13. The plan and the schedules failed to mention the lawsuit, the equipment lease, and several other items. The court therefore dismissed the Buis' petition due to bad faith. The debtors had not included all of their assets and liabilities on their initial petition, and they had timed its filing to avoid payment on the defamation judgment.²¹

THE REPAYMENT PLAN A plan of rehabilitation by repayment must provide for the following:

1. The turning over to the trustee of such future earnings or income of the debtor as is necessary for execution of the plan.
2. Full payment through deferred cash payments of all claims entitled to priority, such as taxes.²²
3. Identical treatment of all claims within a particular class. (The Code permits the debtor to list co-debtors, such as guarantors or sureties, as a separate class.)

The repayment plan may provide either for payment of all obligations in full or for payment of a lesser amount. The length of the payment plan can be three or five years, depending on the debtor's family income. If the debtor's family income is greater than the median family income in the relevant geographic area under the means test, the term of the proposed plan must be for five years.²³ The term may not exceed five years.

The debtor must begin making payments under the proposed plan within thirty days after the plan has been filed and must continue to make "timely" payments from her or his disposable income. Failure of the debtor to make timely payments or to commence payments within the thirty-day period will allow the court to convert the case to a liquidation bankruptcy or to dismiss the petition.

CONFIRMATION OF THE PLAN After the plan is filed, the court holds a confirmation hearing, at which interested parties (such as creditors) may object to the plan. The hearing must be held at least twenty days, but no more than forty-five days, after the meeting of the creditors. The debtor must have filed all prepetition tax returns and paid all postpetition domestic-support obligations before a court will confirm any plan. The court will confirm a plan with respect to each claim of a secured creditor under any of the following circumstances:

1. If the secured creditors have accepted the plan.
2. If the plan provides that secured creditors retain their liens until there is payment in full or until the debtor receives a discharge.
3. If the debtor surrenders the property securing the claims to the creditors.

In addition, for a motor vehicle purchased within 910 days before the petition is filed, the plan must provide that a creditor with a purchase-money security interest (PMSI—see page 564 in Chapter 29) retains its lien until the entire debt is paid. For PMSIs on other personal property, the payment plan must cover debts incurred within a one-year period preceding the filing.

DISCHARGE After the debtor has completed all payments, the court grants a discharge of all debts provided for by the repayment plan. Except for allowed claims not provided for by the plan, certain long-term debts provided for by the plan, certain tax claims, payments on retirement accounts, and claims for domestic-support obligations, all other debts are dischargeable. Under prior law, a discharge of debts under a Chapter 13 repayment plan was sometimes referred to as a “superdischarge” because it allowed the discharge of fraudulently incurred debt and claims resulting from malicious or willful injury. The 2005 reforms, however, deleted most of the “superdischarge” provisions, especially for debts based on fraud or taxes. Today, debts related to injury or property damage caused while driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs are also nondischargeable.

CASE IN POINT James Ellett owed $18,000 in personal income taxes to the state of California at the time he petitioned for Chapter 13 bankruptcy. Ellett listed the debt in his petition but misstated the last digit of his Social Security number (SSN). Because of this error, the California Franchise Tax Board (FTB) did not receive any notice of Ellett’s bankruptcy and never filed a proof of claim or received any distribution through his repayment plan. After Ellett completed the repayment plan and received a discharge, the FTB attempted to collect the tax debt. Ellett filed a lawsuit seeking a court declaration that the debt to the FTB had been discharged. The court ruled against him, and he appealed. A federal appellate court concluded that because of Ellett’s negligence in listing an erroneous SSN on his bankruptcy petition, the FTB had been never notified of his bankruptcy; thus, the tax debt was not discharged.²⁴

In the following case, the issue before the United States Supreme Court was whether the discharge of certain student loan debt had been rendered void by a legal error on the part of the bankruptcy court.

United Student Aid Funds, Inc. v. Espinosa

www.supremecourtus.gov²

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Francisco Espinosa filed a petition for an individual repayment plan under Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code. The plan proposed that Espinosa would repay only the principal of his student loan debt and that the interest on the loan would be discharged once the principal was repaid. Under Chapter 13, a student loan cannot be discharged unless the bankruptcy court finds that payment of the debt would constitute an undue hardship for the debtor. Despite this requirement, no undue hardship hearing was requested by Espinosa, by the court, or by United Student Aid Funds, Inc. (United), the creditor. United received notice of the plan but did not object to it. In addition, United failed to file an appeal after the bankruptcy court subsequently confirmed the plan. Years later, however, United filed a motion under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60(b)(4) asking the bankruptcy court to rule that its order confirming the plan was void because the order was issued in violation of the laws and rules governing bankruptcy. The court denied the petition and ordered United to cease its collection efforts. United appealed to the U.S. District Court for the District of Arizona, which reversed the bankruptcy court’s ruling. On further appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court’s judgment. United appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice THOMAS delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * * *

A discharge under Chapter 13 “is broader than the discharge received in any other chapter.” Chapter 13 nevertheless restricts or prohibits entirely the discharge of certain types of debts. As relevant here, [Section] 1328(a) [of the Bankruptcy Code] provides that when a debtor has completed the repayments required by a confirmed plan,

CASE 30.3 CONTINUED ♦ a bankruptcy court “shall grant the debtor a discharge of all debts provided for by the plan or disallowed under Section 502 of this title, except,” inter alia [among others], “any debt * * * of the kind specified in [Section] 523(a)(8). [That section], in turn, specifies certain student loan debts “unless excepting such debt from discharge * * * would impose an undue hardship on the debtor and the debtor’s dependents.” * * * [The] Bankruptcy Rules require a party seeking to determine the dischargeability of a student loan debt to commence an adversary proceeding by serving a summons and complaint on affected creditors. We must decide whether the Bankruptcy Court’s order confirming Espinosa’s plan is “void” under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 60(b)(4) because the Bankruptcy Court confirmed the plan without complying with these requirements. [Emphasis added.]

The Bankruptcy Court’s order confirming Espinosa’s proposed plan was a final judgment, from which United did not appeal. * * * Rule 60(b)(4)—the provision under which United brought this motion—authorizes the court to relieve a party from a final judgment if “the judgment is void.”

* * * *

“A judgment is not void * * * simply because it is or may have been erroneous.” Similarly, a motion under Rule 60(b)(4) is not a substitute for a timely appeal. Instead, Rule 60(b)(4) applies only in the rare instance where a judgment is premised either on a certain type of jurisdictional error or on a violation of due process that deprives a party of notice or the opportunity to be heard.

* * * *

Unable to demonstrate a jurisdictional error or a due process violation, United and the Government, as amicus [friend of the court], urge us to expand the universe of judgment defects that support Rule 60(b)(4) relief. Specifically, they contend that the Bankruptcy Court’s confirmation order is void because the court lacked statutory authority to confirm Espinosa’s plan absent a finding of undue hardship.

* * * *

*Given the Code’s clear * * * requirement for an undue hardship determination, the Bankruptcy Court’s failure to find undue hardship before confirming Espinosa’s plan was a legal error. But the order remains enforceable and binding on United because United had notice of the error and failed to object or timely appeal.* [Emphasis added.]

United’s response—that it had no obligation to object to Espinosa’s plan until Espinosa served it with the summons and complaint the Bankruptcy Rules require—is unavailing [fails to achieve the desired result]. Rule 60(b)(4) does not provide a license for litigants to sleep on their rights. United had actual notice of the filing of Espinosa’s plan, its contents, and the Bankruptcy Court’s subsequent confirmation of the plan. In addition, United filed a proof of claim regarding Espinosa’s student loan debt, thereby submitting itself to the Bankruptcy Court’s jurisdiction with respect to that claim. United therefore forfeited its arguments regarding the validity of service or the adequacy of the Bankruptcy Court’s procedures by failing to raise a timely objection in that court.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The United States Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. The bankruptcy court’s order confirming Espinosa’s Chapter 13 repayment plan was not void, and the student loan debt was thus discharged.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • At one point, United argued that if the Court failed to declare the bankruptcy court’s order void, it would encourage dishonest debtors to abuse the Chapter 13 process. How might such abuse occur? Discuss whether the possibility of such abuse should affect the Court’s decision.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • Business owners and managers should be aware that courts generally have little sympathy for those who “sleep on their rights.” In this case, the creditor could have objected to the plan, but it did not. The creditor also could have appealed the confirmation order, but it did not. Only years later did the creditor seek to have the confirmation order declared void. To protect their rights, businesspersons should take care, if a client or other debtor petitions for bankruptcy relief, to respond to any notices received from the debtor or the bankruptcy court in a timely fashion.

Family Farmers and Fishermen

In 1986, to help relieve economic pressure on small farmers, Congress created Chapter 12 of the Bankruptcy Code. In 2005, Congress extended this protection to family fishermen, modified its provisions somewhat, and made it a permanent chapter in the Bankruptcy Code (previously, the statutes authorizing Chapter 12 had to be periodically renewed by Congress).

DEFINITIONS For purposes of Chapter 12, a family farmer is one whose gross income is at least 50 percent farm dependent and whose debts are at least 50 percent farm related. The total debt for a family farmer must not exceed $3,792,650. A partnership or closely held corporation (see Chapter 39) at least 50 percent owned by the farm family can also qualify as a family farmer.²⁵

A family fisherman is defined as one whose gross income is at least 50 percent dependent on commercial fishing operations²⁶ and whose debts are at least 80 percent related to commercial fishing. The total debt for a family fisherman must not exceed $1,757,475. As with family farmers, a partnership or closely held corporation can also qualify.

FILING THE PETITION The procedure for filing a family-farmer or family-fisherman bankruptcy plan

25. Note that for a corporation or partnership to qualify under Chapter 12, at least 80 percent of the value of the firm's assets must consist of assets related to the farming operation.
26. Commercial fishing operations include catching, harvesting, or raising fish, shrimp, lobsters, urchins, seaweed, shellfish, or other aquatic species or products.

is very similar to the procedure for filing a repayment plan under Chapter 13. The debtor must file a plan not later than ninety days after the order for relief. The filing of the petition acts as an automatic stay against creditors' and co-obligors' actions against the estate.

A farmer or fisherman who has already filed a reorganization or repayment plan may convert it to a Chapter 12 plan. The debtor may also convert a Chapter 12 plan to a liquidation plan.

CONTENT AND CONFIRMATION OF THE PLAN The content of a plan under Chapter 12 is basically the same as that of a Chapter 13 repayment plan. Generally, the plan must be confirmed or denied within forty-five days of filing.

Court confirmation of the plan is the same as for a repayment plan. The plan must provide for payment of secured debts at the value of the collateral. If the secured debt exceeds the value of the collateral, the remaining debt is unsecured. For unsecured debtors, the plan must be confirmed if either (1) the value of the property to be distributed under the plan equals the amount of the claim or (2) the plan provides that all of the debtor's disposable income to be received in a three-year period (or longer, by court approval) will be applied to making payments. Disposable income is all income received less amounts needed to support the farmer or fisherman and his or her family and to continue the farming or commercial fishing operation. Completion of payments under the plan discharges all debts provided for by the plan.

REVIEWING
Bankruptcy Law

Three months ago, Janet Hart's husband of twenty years died of cancer. Although he had medical insurance, he left Janet with outstanding medical bills of more than $50,000. Janet has worked at the local library for the past ten years, earning $1,500 per month. Since her husband's death, Janet also receives $1,500 in Social Security benefits and $1,100 in life insurance proceeds every month, for a total monthly income of $4,300. After she pays the mortgage payment of $1,500 and the amounts due on other debts, Janet has barely enough left to buy groceries for her family (she has two teenage daughters at home). She decides to file for Chapter 7 bankruptcy, hoping for a fresh start. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What must Janet do before filing a petition for relief under Chapter 7?
2. How much time does Janet have after filing the bankruptcy petition to submit the required schedules? What happens if Janet does not meet the deadline?
3. Assume that Janet files a petition under Chapter 7. Further assume that the median family income in the geographic area in which Janet lives is $49,300. What steps would a court take to determine whether Janet's petition is presumed to be "substantial abuse" using the means test?
4. Suppose that the court determines that no presumption of substantial abuse applies in Janet's case. Nevertheless, the court finds that Janet does have the ability to pay at least a portion of the medical bills out of her disposable income. What would the court likely order in that situation?

DEBATE THIS: Rather than being allowed to file Chapter 7 bankruptcy petitions, individuals and couples should always be forced to make an effort to pay off their debts through Chapter 13.

30-1. Voluntary versus Involuntary Bankruptcy

Burke has been a rancher all her life, raising cattle and crops. Her ranch is valued at $500,000, almost all of which is exempt under state law. Burke has eight creditors and a total indebtedness of $70,000. Two of her largest creditors are Oman ($30,000 owed) and Sneed ($25,000 owed). The other six creditors have claims of less than $5,000 each. A drought has ruined all of Burke's crops and forced her to sell many of her cattle at a loss. She cannot pay off her creditors.

- (a) Under the Bankruptcy Code, can Burke, with a $500,000 ranch, voluntarily petition herself into bankruptcy? Explain.
- (b) Could either Oman or Sneed force Burke into involuntary bankruptcy? Explain.

30-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Preferences.

Peaslee is not known for his business sense. He started a greenhouse and nursery business two years ago, and because of his lack of experience, he soon was in debt to a number of creditors. On February 1, Peaslee borrowed $5,000 from his father to pay some of these creditors. On May 1, Peaslee paid back the $5,000, depleting his working capital. One creditor, the Cool Springs Nursery Supply Corp., had extended credit to Peaslee on numerous purchases. Cool Springs pressured Peaslee for payment, and on July 1, Peaslee paid Cool Springs half the amount owed. On September 1, Peaslee voluntarily petitioned himself into bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy claims that both Peaslee's father and Cool Springs must turn over to the debtor's estate the amounts Peaslee paid to them. Discuss fully the trustee's claims.

- For a sample answer to Question 30-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

30-3. Distribution of Property Montoro petitioned himself into voluntary bankruptcy. There were three major claims against his estate. One was made by Carlton, a friend who held Montoro's negotiable promissory note for $2,500; one was made by Elmer, an employee who was owed three months' back wages of $4,500; and one was made by the United Bank of the Rockies on an unsecured loan of $5,000. In addition, Dietrich, an accountant retained by the trustee, was owed $500, and property taxes of $1,000 were owed to Rock County. Montoro's nonexempt property was liquidated, with proceeds of $5,000. Discuss fully what amount each party will receive, and why.

30-4. Exceptions to Discharge Between 1988 and 1992, Lorna Nys took out thirteen student loans, totaling about $30,000, to finance an associate of arts degree in drafting from the College of the Redwoods and a bachelor of arts degree from Humboldt State University (HSU) in California. In 1996, Nys began working at HSU as a drafting technician. As a "Drafter II," the highest-paying drafting position at HSU, Nys's gross income in 2002 was $40,244. She was fifty-one years old. Her net monthly income was $2,299.33, and she had $2,295.05 in monthly expenses, including saving $140 for her retirement, which she planned for age sixty-five. When Educational Credit Management Corp. (ECMC) began to collect payments on Nys's student loans, she filed a Chapter 7 petition in a federal bankruptcy court, seeking a discharge of the loans. ECMC argued that Nys did not show any "additional circumstances" that would impede her ability to repay. What is the standard for the discharge of student loans under Chapter 7? Does Nys meet that standard? Why or why not? [In re Nys, 446 F.3d 938 (9th Cir. 2006)]

30-5. Substantial Abuse James Stout, a professor of economics and business at Cornell College in Iowa City, Iowa, filed a petition in bankruptcy under Chapter 7, seeking to discharge about $95,000 in credit-card debts. At the time, Stout had been divorced for ten years and had custody of his children: Z. S., who attended college, and G. S., who was twelve years old. Stout's ex-wife did not contribute child support. According to Stout, G. S. was an "elite" ice-skater who practiced twenty hours a week and had placed between first and third at more than forty competitive events. He had decided to home school G. S., whose academic achievements were average for her grade level despite her frequent absences from public school. His petition showed monthly income of $4,227 and expenses of $4,806. The expenses included annual home school costs of $8,400 and annual skating expenses of $6,000. They did not include Z. S.'s college costs, such as airfare for his upcoming studies in Europe, and other items. The trustee allowed monthly expenses of $3,227—with nothing for skating—and asked the court to dismiss the petition. Can the court grant this request? Should it? If so, what might it encourage Stout to do? Explain. [In re Stout, 336 Bankr. 138 (N.D. Iowa 2006)]

30-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Discharge in Bankruptcy.

Rhonda Schroeder married Gennady Shvartsshteyn (Gene) in 1997. Gene worked at Royal Courier and Air Domestic Connect in Illinois, where Melissa Winyard also worked in 1999 and 2000.

*During this time, Gene and Winyard had an affair. A year after leaving Royal, Winyard filed a petition in a federal bankruptcy court under Chapter 7 and was granted a discharge of her debts. Sometime later, in a letter to Schroeder who had learned of the affair, Winyard wrote, "I never intentionally wanted any of this to happen. I never wanted to disrupt your marriage." Schroeder obtained a divorce and, in 2005, filed a suit in an Illinois state court against Winyard, alleging "alienation of affection." Schroeder claimed that there had been "mutual love and affection" in her marriage until Winyard engaged in conduct intended to alienate her husband's affection. Schroeder charged that Winyard "caused him to have sexual intercourse with her," resulting in "the destruction of the marital relationship." Winyard filed a motion for summary judgment on the ground that any liability on her part had been discharged in her bankruptcy. Is there an exception to discharge for "willful and malicious conduct"? If so, does Schroeder's claim qualify? Discuss. [Schroeder v. Winyard, 375 Ill.App.3d 358, 873 N.E.2d 35, 313 Ill.Dec. 740 (2 Dist. 2007)]*

30-7. Discharge in Bankruptcy Cathy Coleman took out loans to complete her college education. After graduation, Coleman was irregularly employed as a teacher before filing a petition in a federal bankruptcy court under Chapter 13. The court confirmed a five-year plan under which Coleman was required to commit all of her disposable income to paying the student loans. Less than a year later, she was laid off. Still owing more than $100,000 to Educational Credit Management Corp., Coleman asked the court to discharge the debt on the ground that it would be undue hardship for her to pay it. Under Chapter 13, when is a debtor normally entitled to a discharge? Are student loans dischargeable? If not, is "undue hardship" a legitimate ground for an exception? With respect to a debtor, what is the goal of bankruptcy? With these facts and principles in mind, what argument could be made in support of Coleman's request? [In re Coleman, 560 F.3d 1000 (9th Cir. 2009)]

30-8. Discharge in Bankruptcy Caroline McAfee loaned $400,000 to Carter Oaks Crossing. Joseph Harman, president of Carter Oaks Crossing, signed a promissory note providing that the company would repay the amount with interest in installments beginning in 1999 and ending by 2006. Harman signed a personal guaranty for the note. Carter Oaks Crossing defaulted on the note, so McAfee sued Harman for payment under the guaranty. Harman moved for summary judgment on the ground that McAfee's claim against him had been discharged in his Chapter 7 bankruptcy case, filed after 1999 but before the default on the note. The guaranty was not listed among Harman's debts in the bankruptcy filing. Would the obligation under the guaranty have been discharged in bankruptcy, as Harman claimed? Why or why not? [Harman v. McAfee, 302 Ga.App. 698, 691 S.E.2d 586 (2010)]

30-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Discharge in Bankruptcy.

In October 1994, Charles Edwards formed ETS Payphones, Inc., to sell and lease pay phones as investment opportunities—an investor would buy a phone from ETS, which would lease it back. ETS promised returns of 14 to 15 percent but consistently lost money. To meet its obligations to existing investors, ETS had to continually attract new investors. Eventually, ETS defrauded thousands of investors of more than $300 million. Edwards transferred the funds from ETS to himself. In 2000, ETS filed a petition in a federal bankruptcy court to declare bankruptcy. Darryl Laddin was appointed trustee. On the debtor's behalf, Laddin filed a suit against Reliance Trust Co. and others, alleging, among other things, that the defendants helped defraud investors by “ignoring the facts” and “funneling” the investors' funds to ETS, causing it to “incur millions of dollars in additional debt.” Laddin sought treble (triple) damages. [Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors of PSA, Inc. v. Edwards, 437 F.3d 1145 (11th Cir. 2006)]

- (a) The defendants argued, in part, that the doctrine of in pari delicto, which provides that a wrongdoer may not profit from his or her wrongful acts, barred Laddin's claim. Who should be considered ethically responsible for the investors' losses? Explain.
- (b) Laddin contended that his actions, as trustee on behalf of the debtor, should not be subject to the doctrine of in pari delicto because that doctrine depends on the “personal malfeasance of the individual seeking to recover.” The defendants filed a motion to dismiss Laddin's complaint. Do you think that the court should rule in favor of Laddin or the defendants? Why?

Mortgages and Foreclosures after the Recession

During the early years of the twenty-first century, the United States experienced one of the biggest real estate bubbles in its history as prices of homes in many areas increased at unprecedented rates. The bubble started to shrink in 2006 and was still deflating in 2011. As a result of the collapse of the housing market and the financial crisis that accompanied it, the United States and much of the rest of the world suffered through what is now called the Great Recession. Although the recession may be over by the time you read this, the real estate market is still in turmoil in countless areas. Many people have lost their homes to foreclosure because they could not make the payments; others can afford the payments but choose not to because they owe more on the properties than those properties are worth.

This chapter examines the rights and obligations that apply to homeowners and their lenders. The chapter begins with a discussion of mortgages—the loans that lenders provide to enable borrowers to purchase real property (real property will be discussed in Chapter 50). Next, we examine the laws that protect borrowers when they obtain mortgages. The chapter concludes with a discussion of the options that lenders and homeowners have when the homeowners cannot continue to make their mortgage payments.

MORTGAGES

When individuals purchase real property, they typically borrow funds from a financial institution for part or all of the purchase price. A mortgage is a written instrument that gives the creditor (the mortgagee) an interest in, or lien on, the property being acquired by the debtor (the mortgagor) as security for the debt's payment. Here, we look first at the different types of mortgages, including some new varieties that helped to inflate the housing bubble. Then we consider some of the ways that creditors protect their interest in the property and examine some of the most important provisions in a typical mortgage document.

Types of Mortgages

Mortgage loans are contracts, and as such, they come in a variety of forms. Lenders offer various types of mortgages to meet the needs of different borrowers. In recent decades, the expansion of home ownership became a political goal, and lenders were encouraged to become more creative in devising new types of mortgages. In many instances, these new mortgages were aimed at borrowers who could not qualify for traditional mortgages and lacked the funds to make a down payment (the part of the purchase price that is paid up front in cash).

In general, these mortgages, which include some adjustable-rate mortgages, interest-only mortgages, and balloon mortgages, feature a low initial interest rate. Often, the borrower hopes to refinance—pay off the original mortgage and obtain a new one at more favorable terms—within a few years. When the housing bubble burst and house prices began to decline, however, refinancing became more difficult than many borrowers had anticipated.

FIXED-RATE MORTGAGES Fixed-rate mortgages are the simplest mortgage loans. A fixed-rate mortgage is a standard mortgage with a fixed, or unchanging, rate of interest. Payments on the loan remain the same for the duration of the mortgage, which ranges from fifteen to forty years. Lenders determine the interest rate based on a variety of factors, including the borrower's credit history, credit score, income, and debts. Today, for a borrower to qualify for a standard fixed-rate mortgage loan, lenders typically require that the monthly mortgage payment (including principal, interest, taxes, and insurance) not exceed 28 percent of the person's gross income.

ADJUSTABLE-RATE MORTGAGES The rate of interest paid by the borrower changes periodically with an adjustable-rate mortgage (ARM). Typically, the initial interest rate for an ARM is set at a relatively low fixed rate for a specified period, such as a year or three years. After that time, the interest rate adjusts annually or by some other period, such as biannually or monthly. ARMs generally are described in terms of the initial fixed period and the adjustment period. For example, if the interest rate is fixed for three years and then adjusts annually, the mortgage is called a 3/1 ARM; if the rate adjusts annually after five years, the mortgage is a 5/1 ARM.

The interest rate adjustment is calculated by adding a certain number of percentage points (called the margin) to an index rate (one of various government interest rates). The margin and index rate are specified in the mortgage loan documents. For example, Greta and Marcus obtain a 3/1 ARM to purchase a home. After three years, when the first adjustment is to be made, the index rate is 6 percent. If the margin specified in the loan documents is 3 percentage points, the fully indexed interest rate for the ARM would be 9 percent. Most ARMs, however, have lifetime interest rate caps that limit the amount that the rate can rise over the duration of the loan.

Some ARMs also have caps that stipulate the maximum increase that can occur at any particular adjustment period. In the Greta and Marcus example above, if the initial interest rate was 5 percent and the loan stipulated that the rate could rise no more than 3 percentage points in one adjustment period, the interest rate after three years would increase to 8 percent, not 9 percent, because of the cap. Note that the interest rate could be adjusted downward as well as upward; if the index rate was 1 percent, the adjusted rate would potentially fall to 4 percent, although some ARMs also limit the amount that the rate can fall.

INTEREST-ONLY (IO) MORTGAGES With an interest-only (IO) mortgage, the borrower can choose to pay only the interest portion of the monthly payments and forgo paying any of the principal for a specified period of time. (IO loans can be for fixed-rate or adjustable-rate mortgages.) This IO payment usually is available for three to ten years. After the IO payment option is exhausted, the borrower's payment increases to include payments on the principal.

SUBPRIME MORTGAGES During the late 1990s and the first decade of the 2000s, subprime lending increased significantly. A subprime mortgage is a loan made to a borrower who does not qualify for a standard mortgage. Often, such borrowers have poor credit scores or high current debt-to-income ratios—that is, the total amount owed as a percentage of current after-tax income. Subprime mortgages are riskier than traditional mortgages and have a higher default rate. Consequently, lenders charge a higher interest rate for subprime loans. Subprime mortgages can be fixed-rate, adjustable-rate, or IO loans. Subprime lending allows many people who could not otherwise purchase real property to do so, but at a higher risk to the lender.

CONSTRUCTION LOANS A construction loan is similar to a mortgage in many ways—for example, this type of loan comes in all varieties, including fixed-rate and adjustable-rate loans. Rather than purchasing an existing home, the borrower uses the funds from a construction loan to build a new home. Construction loans are often set up with a schedule of “draws.” For example, Joel and Jennie borrow funds to purchase real estate and build a home. The first draw of funds pays for the land. Subsequent draws occur when the foundation is laid, when the framing for the structure is finished, when the exterior is completed, and finally when the interior is completed and the contractor turns the house over to the couple for occupancy.

PARTICIPATION LOANS In some instances, a lender may be interested in receiving more than standard principal and interest payments for a loan. In exchange for more desirable loan terms (for example, lower interest rates or lower down payment requirements), a borrower may agree to give the lender some equity (ownership) rights in a purchase. Such a loan agreement, called a participation loan (also referred to as an equity participation loan), typically gives the lender a right to receive a percentage of revenue, rental income, or resale income from the property.

BALLOON MORTGAGES Similar to an ARM, a balloon mortgage starts with low payments for a specified period, usually seven to ten years. At the end of that period, a large balloon payment for the entire balance of the mortgage loan is due. Because the balloon payment is often very large, many borrowers refinance when this payment is due. A potential disadvantage is that the lender will set the interest rate of the refinanced loan at whatever the market dictates at that time. As a result, the payments may be higher than they would have been if the buyer had initially obtained a fixed-rate mortgage instead of a balloon mortgage.

HYBRID AND REVERSE MORTGAGES A variety of other less common mortgages are also available. One example is a hybrid mortgage (also called a two-step mortgage), which starts as a fixed-rate mortgage and then converts into an ARM.

With a reverse mortgage, instead of borrowing funds from a bank to buy a home, existing homeowners take cash for the equity in their home. The mortgage does not need to be repaid until the home is sold or the owner dies. Reverse mortgages are geared toward older borrowers (over the age of sixty-two) who have substantial equity in their homes. By converting a portion of that equity into cash, the homeowners can supplement their retirement income.

Home Equity Loans

Home equity refers to the portion of a home's value that is "paid off." For example, if Susanna has a home valued at $200,000 and owes the bank $120,000 on her mortgage, she has 40 percent equity in her house ($$80,000/$200,000 = 40$ percent). With a home equity loan, a bank accepts the borrower's equity as collateral, which can be seized if the loan is not repaid on time. If Susanna takes out a $30,000 home equity loan, the amount is added to the amount of her mortgage ($$30,000 + $120,000 = $150,000$), so she now has only $50,000 (25 percent) equity in her $200,000 home.

Borrowers often take out home equity loans to obtain funds to renovate the property itself. Others obtain home equity loans to pay off debt, such as credit-card debt, that carries a higher interest rate than they will pay on the home equity loan. This strategy can lead to problems, however, if the borrower cannot keep up the payments. Many Americans who lost their homes during the Great Recession were able to pay their original mortgage loans, but not their home equity loans. From the lender's perspective, a home equity loan is riskier than a mortgage loan because home equity loans are subordinated, which means that they take a lower priority in any proceeding that occurs if the homeowner fails to make the payments on the primary mortgage.

Creditor Protection

When creditors grant mortgages, they are advancing a significant amount of funds for a number of years. Consequently, creditors take a number of steps to protect their interest. One precaution is to require debtors to obtain private mortgage insurance if they do not make a down payment of at least 20 percent of the purchase price. For example, if a borrower makes a down payment of only 5 percent of the purchase price, the creditor might require insurance covering 15 percent of the cost. Then, if the debtor defaults, the creditor repossesses the house and receives reimbursement from the insurer for the covered portion of the loan.

In addition, the creditor will record the mortgage with the appropriate office in the county where the property is located. Recording ensures that the creditor is officially on record as holding an interest in the property. In essence, recording a mortgage perfects the lender's security interest in the property (see page 559 in Chapter 29). A lender that fails to record a mortgage could find itself in the position of an unsecured creditor.

Mortgages normally are lengthy documents that include a number of provisions. Many of these provisions are aimed at protecting the creditor's investment.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS Because a mortgage involves a transfer of real property, it must be in writing to comply with the Statute of Frauds (see page 290 in Chapter 15). Most mortgages today are highly formal documents that follow similar formats, but a mortgage is not required to follow any particular form. Indeed, as long as the mortgage satisfies the Statute of Frauds, it generally will be effective.

IMPORTANT MORTGAGE PROVISIONS Mortgage documents ordinarily contain all or most of the following terms:

1. The terms of the underlying loan. These include the loan amount, the interest rate, the period of repayment, and other important financial terms, such as the margin and index rate for an ARM. Many lenders include a prepayment penalty clause, which requires the borrower to pay a penalty if the mortgage is repaid in full within a certain period. A prepayment penalty helps to protect the lender should the borrower refinance within a short time after obtaining a mortgage.
2. Provisions relating to the maintenance of the property. Because the mortgage conveys an interest in the property to the lender, the lender will require the borrower to maintain the property in such a way that the lender's investment is protected.

3. A statement obligating the borrower to maintain homeowners' insurance (also known as hazard insurance) on the property. This type of insurance protects the lender's interest in the event of a loss due to certain hazards, such as fire or storm damages.
4. A list of the nonloan financial obligations to be borne by the borrower. For example, the borrower typically is required to pay all property taxes, assessments, and other claims against the property.
5. A provision requiring that the borrower pay certain obligations. For example, a borrower may be required to pay some or all of the taxes, insurance, assessments, or other expenses associated with the property in advance or through the lender. In this way, the lender is assured that the funds for these expenses will be available when the bills come due.

Although a record number of homeowners have failed to keep up with their mortgage payments in recent years, courts have continued to enforce the terms of plainly written financing documents. Even in today's more protective environment, borrowers cannot avoid the clear meaning of terms in financing documents, even when the effect may be harsh.

REAL ESTATE FINANCING LAW

During the real estate boom in the first decade of the 2000s, some lenders were less than honest with borrowers about the loan terms they were signing. As a result, many individuals failed to understand how much the monthly payments on ARMs, interest-only mortgages, and other exotic types of loans might increase. In addition, fees and penalties often were not properly disclosed. In an effort to provide more protection for borrowers, Congress and the Federal Reserve Board have instituted a number of new requirements, mostly in the form of required disclosures. Here, we examine some of the most important statutes that provide protection for borrowers. First, though, we look at some of the practices that led to the enactment of these statutes.

Predatory Lending and Other Improper Practices

The general term predatory lending is often used to describe situations in which borrowers are the victims of loan terms or lending procedures that are excessive, deceptive, or not properly disclosed. Predatory lending typically occurs during the loan origination process. It includes a number of practices ranging from failure to disclose terms to providing misleading information to outright dishonesty.

Two specific types of improper practices are often at the core of a violation. Steering and targeting occurs when the lender manipulates a borrower into accepting a loan product that benefits the lender but is not the best loan for the borrower. For example, a lender may steer a borrower toward an ARM, even though the buyer qualifies for a fixed-rate mortgage. Loan flipping occurs when a lender convinces a homeowner to refinance soon after obtaining a mortgage. Such early refinancing rarely benefits the homeowner and may, in fact, result in prepayment penalties.

The Truth-in-Lending Act (TILA)

The Truth-in-Lending Act (TILA) of 1968¹ requires lenders to disclose the terms of a loan in clear, readily understandable language so that borrowers can make rational choices. (We will discuss the TILA in more detail in Chapter 45 in the context of consumer law.) With respect to real estate transactions, the TILA applies only to residential loans.

REQUIRED DISCLOSURES The major terms that must be disclosed under the TILA include the loan principal; the interest rate at which the loan is made; the annual percentage rate, or APR (the actual cost of the loan on a yearly basis); and all fees and costs associated with the loan. The TILA requires that these disclosures be made on standardized forms and based on uniform formulas of calculation. Certain types of loans—including ARMs, reverse mortgages, open-ended home equity loans, and high-interest loans—have specially tailored disclosure requirements. The Mortgage Disclosure Improvement Act (MDIA) of 2008² amended the TILA to strengthen the disclosures required for ARMs, which, as mentioned earlier, played a leading role in the recent real estate meltdown.

1. 15 U.S.C. Sections 1601–1693r.

2. The Mortgage Disclosure Improvement Act is contained in Sections 2501 through 2503 of the Housing and Economic Recovery Act of 2008, Pub. L. No. 110-289, enacted on July 30, 2008. Congress then amended its provisions as part of the Emergency Economic Stabilization Act of 2008 (also known as the Bailout Bill), Pub. L. No. 110-343, enacted on October 3, 2008.

PROHIBITIONS AND REQUIREMENTS The TILA prohibits certain lender abuses and creates certain borrower rights. Among the prohibited practices is the charging of prepayment penalties on most subprime mortgages and home equity loans.

The TILA also addresses other unfair, abusive, or deceptive home mortgage-lending practices. For example, lenders may not coerce an appraiser (an individual who specializes in determining the value of specified real or personal property) into misstating the value of a property on which a loan is to be issued. Also, a loan cannot be advertised as a fixed-rate loan if, in fact, its rate or payment amounts will change.

Right to Rescind. A mortgage cannot be finalized until at least seven days after a borrower has received the TILA paperwork. Even if all required disclosures are provided, the TILA gives the borrower the right to rescind (cancel) a mortgage within three business days. According to the 2008 amendments, Sunday is the only day of the week that is not a business day. If the lender fails to provide material TILA disclosures, including the three-day right to rescind, the rescission period lasts up to three years.

Written Representations. The TILA requirements apply to the written materials the lender provides, not to any oral representations. If a lender provides the required TILA disclosures, a borrower who fails to read the relevant documents cannot claim fraud, even if the lender orally misrepresented the terms of the loan.

CASE IN POINT Patricia Ostolaza and José Diaz owned a home on which they had two mortgage loans and a home equity line of credit provided by Bank of America. Anthony Falcone called them and said that he could refinance their mortgages in a manner that would reduce their monthly payments. Falcone said that he represented Bank of America when in fact he represented Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. At the closing of the new loan, the homeowners were given all of the relevant documents, including the TILA disclosure statement. The documents accurately stated the monthly payment under the new loan, which was higher than the couple's original payments. The homeowners later filed a lawsuit against Falcone and Countrywide Bank, alleging fraud. The trial court dismissed the suit, and the appellate court upheld the dismissal because the homeowners had been given the opportunity to read all of the relevant documents, but had not done so.³

Protection for High-Cost Mortgage Loan Recipients

In the last twenty years, lenders have provided many high-cost and high-fee mortgage products to people who could not easily obtain credit under other loan programs. These loans are commonly known as HOEPA loans, named after the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act (HOEPA) of 1994,⁴ which amended the TILA to create this special category of loans. The rules pertaining to HOEPA loans are contained in Section 32 of Regulation Z, enacted by the Federal Reserve Board to implement the TILA (see Chapter 45).

A loan can qualify for protection under HOEPA either because it carries a high rate of interest or because it entails high fees for the borrower. HOEPA applies if the APR disclosed for the loan exceeds the interest rates of Treasury securities (or bonds) of comparable maturity by more than 8 percentage points for a first mortgage and 10 percentage points for a second mortgage. HOEPA can also apply when the total fees paid by the consumer exceed 8 percent of the loan amount or a set dollar amount (based on changes in the consumer price index), whichever is larger.

SPECIAL CONSUMER PROTECTIONS If a loan qualifies for HOEPA protection, the consumer must receive several disclosures in addition to those required by the TILA. The lender must disclose the APR, the regular payment amount, and any required balloon payments. For loans with a variable rate of interest, the lender must disclose that the rate and monthly payments may increase and state the potential maximum monthly payment. These disclosures must be provided at least three business days before the loan is finalized.

In addition, the lender must provide a written notice stating that the consumer need not complete the loan simply because he or she received the disclosures or signed the loan application. Borrowers must also be informed that they could lose their home (and all funds invested in it) if they default on the loan.

HOEPA also prohibits lenders from engaging in certain practices, such as requiring balloon payments for loans with terms of five years or less. Loans that result in negative amortization are also prohibited. Negative amortization occurs when the monthly payments are insufficient to cover the interest due on the loan. The difference is then added to the principal, so the balance owed on the loan increases over time.

HOEPA also provides the borrower with protection when the original lender assigns the mortgage to a third party. For most purposes, HOEPA eliminates the status of holder in due course and its accompanying defenses (see Chapter 25) for a mortgage assignee. To encourage an assignee to scrutinize an assigned loan carefully, the assignee is subject to all claims and defenses that the borrower could have asserted against the original lender.

REMEDIES AND LIABILITIES For HOEPA violations, consumers can obtain damages in an amount equal to all finance charges and fees paid if the lender's failure to disclose is deemed material. Any failure to comply with HOEPA provisions also extends the borrower's right to rescind the loan for up to three years.

Whether a particular loan is covered by HOEPA and thus is entitled to the statute's significant protections can have important ramifications because it can determine whether a lender can foreclose on a loan. In the following case, a consumer challenged the foreclosure of her home by claiming that the bank had not met all of the requirements under HOEPA.

Bank of New York v. Parnell

Court of Appeal of Louisiana, Fifth Circuit, 32 So.3d 877 (2010).
www.fifthcircuit.org/Opinions.aspx^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Kathleen Parnell executed a promissory note and mortgage in favor of EquiCredit Corporation of America on May 9, 2001. Later that year, EquiCredit assigned its rights to the Bank of New York. On June 19, 2003, Parnell's attorney wrote a letter to the Bank of New York on behalf of Parnell providing a notice of rescission. The letter stated that rescission was proper because the loan was governed by the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act (HOEPA) and that EquiCredit had failed to deliver required material disclosures. These disclosures included documents stating that Parnell did not need to enter into the loan and that she could lose her home as a result of entering into the loan. The bank responded that the loan was not large enough to trigger HOEPA disclosures but that, in any event, Parnell had received full and accurate disclosures. Later, the bank filed a petition alleging that Parnell was in default and that it was accelerating the payments due under the mortgage. Subsequently, the trial judge directed the sheriff to seize and sell the property secured by the mortgage. Parnell filed a petition to stop the seizure and sale. The bank filed a motion for summary judgment in its favor, which the court granted. Parnell appealed.

Congress enacted the Truth in Lending Act to assure a meaningful disclosure of credit terms so that the consumer will be able to compare more readily the various credit terms available to him and avoid the uninformed use of credit, and to protect the consumer against inaccurate and unfair credit billing and credit card practices. Accordingly, the Act requires creditors to provide borrowers with clear and accurate disclosures of terms dealing with things like finance charges, annual percentage rates of interest, and the borrower's rights. A creditor's failure to comply with these disclosure requirements may result in actual and statutory damages. Additionally, if a creditor fails to provide a consumer with material disclosures when the loan is secured by the consumer's "principal dwelling," the consumer has "the right to rescind the transaction until midnight of the third business day following the consummation of the transaction or the delivery of the information and rescission forms required * * * whichever is later." If the required material disclosures are not delivered, the rescission period expires "three years after the date

CASE 31.1 CONTINUED ♦ of consummation [completion] of the transaction or upon the sale of the property, whichever occurs first.” [Emphasis added.]

The Truth in Lending Act as amended by HOEPA and Regulation Z of the Federal Reserve Board provides that when a consumer loan violates the Act, the consumer is entitled to rescind the loan, to recover monies and other property given to the creditor, and to [cancel] any mortgages made in connection with the loan.

* * * *

TILA was enacted in 1968 to aid the unsophisticated consumer so that he would not be easily misled as to the total costs of financing. Consequently, it is not surprising that courts have held that TILA, as a remedial statute which is designed to balance the scales, [and] “thought to be weighed in favor of lenders,” is to be liberally construed in favor of borrowers. Nonetheless, finding that TILA’s protections were still inadequate, Congress added the protections and requirements of the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act (“HOEPA”) in 1994. HOEPA was designed to address the problem of “reverse redlining,” that is, the targeting of persons for “credit on unfair terms” based on their income, race, or ethnicity. In an attempt to even the playing field, Congress enacted HOEPA to ensure that consumers understand the terms of such loans and are protected from high pressure sales tactics[.] * * * The legislation requires creditors making High Cost Mortgages to provide a special, streamlined High Cost Mortgage disclosure three days before consummation of the transaction. The bill also prohibits High Cost Mortgages from including certain terms such as prepayment penalties and balloon payments that have proven particularly problematic.

Accordingly, we find that the trial judge erred in granting summary judgment insofar as the HOEPA claim.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The appellate court overturned the lower court’s grant of summary judgment and sent the case back to the lower court for a full trial on the issue.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • The Truth-in-Lending Act, HOEPA, and other consumer protection laws exist to protect purchasers from unscrupulous lenders or sellers. As consumers become better informed about these issues, will these laws still be needed? Discuss.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • If the lender had been dealing with a borrower who was a professor of finance at Harvard, would the appellate judge have ruled the same way? Why or why not?

Protection for Higher-Priced Mortgage Loans

In 2008, the Federal Reserve Board enacted an amendment to Regulation Z that created a second category of expensive loans, called Higher-Priced Mortgage Loans (HPMLs). Only mortgages secured by a consumer’s principal home qualify to receive the HPML designation.

REQUIREMENTS TO QUALIFY To be an HPML, a mortgage must have an APR that exceeds the average prime offer rate for a comparable transaction by 1.5 percentage points or more if the loan is a first lien on a dwelling. (The average prime offer rate is the rate offered to the best-qualified borrowers as established by a survey of lenders.) If the loan is secured by a subordinate lien on a home, then the APR must exceed the average prime offer rate by 3.5 percentage points or more in order to be considered an HPML.

Mortgages excluded from coverage include those for the initial construction of a home, temporary or bridge loans that are one year or shorter in duration, home equity lines of credit, and reverse mortgages. (Bridge loans are short-term loans that allow a buyer to make a down payment on a new home before selling her or his current home.)

SPECIAL PROTECTIONS FOR CONSUMERS As with a HOEPA loan, consumers receiving an HPML receive additional protections. First, lenders cannot make an HPML based on the value of the consumer’s home without verifying the consumer’s ability to repay the loan. This verification is typically accomplished through review of the consumer’s financial records such as tax returns, bank account statements, and payroll records. The creditor must also verify the consumer’s other credit obligations.

Second, prepayment penalties are severely restricted for HPMLs. Prepayment penalties are allowed only if they are limited to two years, and they will not even apply if the source of the prepayment funds is a refinancing by the creditor or the creditor's affiliate. Additionally, lenders must establish escrow accounts for borrowers' payments for homeowners' insurance and property taxes for all first mortgages. (An escrow account holds funds to be paid to a third party—see Chapter 50). Finally, lenders cannot structure a loan specifically to evade the HPML protections.

FORECLOSURES

If a homeowner defaults, or fails to make mortgage payments, the lender has the right to foreclose on the mortgaged property. Foreclosure is a process that allows a lender to legally repossess and auction off the property that is securing a loan.⁵ Foreclosure is expensive and time consuming, however, and generally benefits neither the borrowers, who lose their homes, nor the lenders, which face the prospect of losses on their loans. Therefore, various methods to avoid foreclosure have been developed. We look first at some of these methods and then turn to the foreclosure process itself.

How to Avoid Foreclosure

In the past, especially during the Great Depression of the 1930s, a number of alternatives to foreclosure have been developed. More recently, as foreclosures have become more common than at any time since the Great Depression, Congress has intervened to aid in the modification of mortgage loans.

FORBEARANCE AND WORKOUT AGREEMENTS The first preforeclosure option a borrower has is called forbearance. Forbearance is the postponement, for a limited time, of part or all of the payments on a loan in jeopardy of foreclosure. Such payment waivers had their origins in the Great Depression. A lender grants forbearance when it expects that, during the forbearance period, the borrower can solve the problem by securing a new job, selling the property, or finding another acceptable solution.

When a borrower fails to make payments as required, the lender may attempt to negotiate a workout. As noted in Chapter 30, a workout is a voluntary process to cure the default in some fashion. The parties may even create a formal workout agreement—a written document that describes the rights and responsibilities of the parties as they try to resolve the default without proceeding to foreclosure. In such an agreement, the lender will likely agree to delay seeking foreclosure or other legal rights. In exchange, the borrower may agree to provide financial information to the lender on which a workout might be constructed. Whether a workout is possible or preferable to foreclosure depends on many factors, including the value of the property, the amount of the unpaid principal, the market in which the property will be sold, the relationship of the lender and the borrower, and the financial condition of the borrower.

HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

A lender may be able to work with the borrower to obtain an interest-free loan from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) to bring the mortgage current. HUD assistance may be available if the loan is at least four months (but not more than twelve months) delinquent, if the property is not in foreclosure, and if the borrower is able to make full mortgage payments. When the lender files a claim, HUD pays the lender the amount necessary to make the mortgage current. The borrower executes a note to HUD, and a lien for the second loan is placed on the property. The promissory note is interest free and comes due if the property is sold.

SHORT SALES When an owner is unable to make mortgage payments, a lender may agree to a short sale—that is, a sale of the property for less than the balance of the mortgage loan. Typically, the borrower has to show some hardship, such as the loss of job, a decline in the value of the home, a divorce, or a death in the household. In a short sale, the borrower sells the real property with the permission of the lender, often for an amount less than the balance due on the mortgage loan. The lender receives the proceeds of the sale, and the borrower still owes the balance of the debt to the lender, unless the lender specifically agrees to forgive the remaining debt. In 2007, Congress passed the Mortgage Forgiveness Debt Relief Act,⁶ which eliminated income taxes on the forgiven debt. (Ordinarily, forgiven debt must be reported as income that is subject to federal income tax.)

A short sale can offer several advantages. Although the borrower's credit rating is affected, the negative impact is less than it would be with a foreclosure, which generally remains on the borrower's credit report for seven years.⁷ The short sale process also avoids the expense of foreclosure for the lender and the trauma of being evicted from the home for the homeowner. But because the lender often has approval rights in a short sale, the sale process can take much longer than a standard real estate transaction. In addition, although the parties' losses are mitigated, the borrower still loses her or his home.

5. Lenders other than those holding a first mortgage on a property may also foreclose. For example, a roofing company holding a mechanic's lien for the unpaid cost of a new roof can foreclose on the property.

6. Pub. L. No. 110-142, December 7, 2007.

SALE AND LEASEBACK In some situations, the homeowner may be able to sell the property to an investor who is looking for an income property. The owner sells the property to the investor and then leases it back at an amount that is less than the monthly mortgage payment. The owner-seller uses the proceeds of the sale to pay off the mortgage and still has the use and possession of the property. In some circumstances, this strategy can also be used to raise capital when there is no risk of loss of the property.

HOME AFFORDABLE MODIFICATION PROGRAM In 2009, the U.S. Treasury Department launched the Home Affordable Modification Program (HAMP) to encourage private lenders to modify mortgages so as to lower the monthly payments of borrowers who are in default. The program may share in the costs of modifying the loan and provides incentives to lenders based on successful loan modification. A series of steps must be taken to determine debtor eligibility, the appropriate method for reducing the mortgage burden, and the possibility of forbearance of part of the mortgage loan.

Determination If a Homeowner Qualifies. HAMP modifications are not available for every mortgage. To qualify, the loan must have originated on or before January 1, 2009, the home must be occupied by the owner, and the unpaid balance may not exceed $729,750 for a single-unit property.⁸ The homeowner must be facing financial hardship and be either more than sixty days late on mortgage payments or at risk of imminent default. Homeowners are required to verify their hardship through appropriate documentation.

In addition, the home must be the homeowner's primary residence. Investor-owned homes, vacant homes, and condemned properties are not eligible under the program. Borrowers in active litigation related to their mortgage may take advantage of the program without waiving their legal rights.

Steps Taken to Alleviate the Mortgage Burden.

The purpose of HAMP is not to force lenders to forgive all high-risk mortgages, but rather to reduce monthly mortgage payments to a level that the homeowner can reasonably pay. The goal is to reduce the debtor's mortgage payment to 31 percent of his or her gross monthly income.

The loan is then restructured by adding any delinquencies (such as accrued interest, past-due taxes, or unpaid insurance premiums) to the principal amount. This increases the number of payments but eliminates the delinquencies by spreading them over the life of the loan. Once the loan is restructured, lenders try to incrementally lower the mortgage interest rate to a level at which the payments are less than 31 percent of the debtor's income. If the lender cannot reach the 31 percent target by lowering the interest rate to 2 percent, then the lender can reamortize the loan (change the way the payments are configured), extending the schedule of payments for up to forty years.

Borrowers who qualify under HAMP then begin a ninety-day trial period to determine their ability to make three modified monthly mortgage payments. If they succeed, the lender offers them permanent modifications.

VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE Under some circumstances, the parties might benefit from a deed in lieu of foreclosure, by which the property is conveyed (transferred) to the lender in satisfaction of the mortgage. A property that is worth close to the outstanding loan principal and on which no other loans have been taken might be the subject of such a conveyance.

Although the lender faces the risk that it may ultimately sell the property for less than the loan amount, the lender avoids the time, risk, and expense of foreclosure litigation. The borrower who gives the property to the lender without a fight also avoids the foreclosure process and may preserve a better credit rating than if he or she had been forced to give up the property involuntarily.

FRIENDLY FORECLOSURE Another way for the parties to avoid a contested foreclosure is to engage in a friendly foreclosure. In such a transaction, the borrower in default agrees to submit to the court's jurisdiction, to waive any defenses as well as the right to appeal, and to cooperate with the lender. This process takes longer than a voluntary conveyance,

7. Credit reporting agencies also claim that a foreclosure looks much worse on a credit report than a bankruptcy.

8. Higher limits are allowed for properties with two to four units.

but all of the parties have greater certainty as to the finality of the transaction with respect to others who might have a financial interest in the property.

PREPACKAGED BANKRUPTCY Bankruptcy allows a borrower to escape payment of some debts (see Chapter 30). A prepackaged bankruptcy allows a debtor to negotiate terms with all of her or his creditors in advance. The package of agreements is then submitted to the bankruptcy court for approval. This approach to bankruptcy will likely save considerable time and expense for all parties involved, although the creditors are also likely to receive less than full payment on their particular debts.

The Foreclosure Procedure

If all efforts to find another solution fail, the lender will proceed to foreclosure—a process that dates back to English law. A formal foreclosure is necessary to extinguish the borrower's equitable right of redemption (discussed later). Generally, two types of foreclosure are used in the United States: judicial foreclosure and power of sale foreclosure. In a judicial foreclosure, which is available in all states, a court supervises the process. In a power of sale foreclosure, the lender is allowed to foreclose on and sell the property without judicial supervision. Only a few states permit power of sale foreclosures because borrowers have less protection when a court does not supervise the process.

ACCELERATION CLAUSES In a strict foreclosure, the lender may seek only the amount of the missed payments, not the entire loan amount. Therefore, lenders almost always include an acceleration clause in their loan documents. An acceleration clause allows the lender to call the entire loan due—even if only one payment is late or missed. Thus, with an acceleration clause, the lender can foreclose only once on the entire amount of the loan rather than having to foreclose on smaller amounts over a period of time as each payment is missed.

NOTICE OF DEFAULT AND OF SALE To initiate a foreclosure, a lender must record a notice of default with the appropriate county office. The borrower is then on notice of a possible foreclosure and can take steps to pay the loan and cure the default. If the loan is not paid within a reasonable time (usually three months), the borrower will receive a notice of sale. In addition, the notice of sale usually is posted on the property, recorded with the county, and announced in the newspaper.

The property is then sold in an auction on the courthouse steps at the time and location indicated in the notice of sale. The buyer generally has to pay cash within twenty-four hours for the property. If the procedures are not followed precisely, the parties may have to resort to litigation to establish clear ownership of the property. The following case illustrates how the notice requirements work.

Mitchell v. Valteau

Court of Appeal of Louisiana, Fourth Circuit, 30 So.3d 1108 (2010).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Patricia Rivet MURRAY, Judge.

* * * *

On April 30, 2001, Dr. Mitchell borrowed $143,724 to purchase a house and the lot on which it was located * * * (the “Property”). [The loan] * * * was secured by a mortgage on the Property. * * * The mortgage contained [a clause] providing for the acceleration of the amount secured and the sale of the property in the event of a default on the loan.

In 2006, Dr. Mitchell defaulted on her mortgage payments. On December 15, 2006, [the lending bank] commenced an executory proceeding * * *. The trial court ordered the issuance of a writ of seizure and sale.

On January 23, 2007, Dr. Mitchell was served personally with the notice of seizure, which stated that a sheriff’s sale was tentatively scheduled for November 2, 2007.

Subsequently, * * * Dr. Mitchell and [the bank] entered into a [repayment agreement that postponed the seizure and sale of the property while the agreement was in place].

* * * Although Dr. Mitchell made a few (about two) payments, she was unable to comply with the payment terms of the repayment agreement.

On July 19, 2007, the trial court ordered that the original petition be amended and that an amended writ of seizure be issued. On September 7, 2007, the sheriff issued an amended notice of seizure. * * * The sheriff attempted to serve Dr. Mitchell at her residence on seven occasions. Because the sheriff was unable to serve Dr. Mitchell, [the court appointed a receiver who] accepted service on Dr. Mitchell's behalf.

On January 3, 2008, the Property was sold at a sheriff's sale * * * .

* * * *

On April 11, 2008, Dr. Mitchell filed a Petition to Annul Executory Proceedings and Judicial Sale, and for Damages for Wrongful Seizure [against Sheriff Paul Valteau, Jr., the lending bank, and others].

On November 18, 2008, [the bank] filed a motion for summary judgment. Following a hearing, the trial court granted the motion and rendered judgment dismissing all the parties. [Dr. Mitchell appealed.]

* * * *

A creditor seeking to enforce a mortgage or privilege on property by executory process must file a petition praying for the seizure and sale of the property affected by the mortgage or privilege.

* * * In this case, [the bank] filed a petition for executor process and attached thereto authentic evidence satisfying all three requirements for obtaining an order of seizure and sale: a copy of the note, mortgage agreement, and a certified copy of the assignment of the mortgage note to it. * * * It is undisputed that Dr. Mitchell was served with the initial notice of seizure. Dr. Mitchell, however, contends that the sheriff also was required to serve her with the amended notice of seizure from which her property was seized and sold. [Emphasis added.]

Resolution of the issue of whether service of the amended notice of seizure was required turns on construction of several * * * statutory provisions. La. C.C.P. Art. [Louisiana Code of Civil Procedure Article] 2721 provides that the sheriff must serve upon the defendant "a written notice of the seizure of the property. ["] La. C.C.P. Art. 2293(B) also provides that the sheriff shall serve "a notice of seizure."

* * * *

Construing La. R.S. [Louisiana Revised Statutes] 13:3852 and La. C.C.P. Art. 2293(B) * * * [a prior court] rejected a debtor's argument that she was entitled to a second notice of seizure when the first sale was delayed.

* * * [There,] the court * * * reasoned that the debtor had defaulted under the terms of the mortgage and that the creditor had validly exercised its right to have the property seized and sold in accord with the executor process provisions. * * * The court further reasoned that read together

La. C.C.P. Art 2293(B)—which requires service of "a written notice of seizure of the property"—and La. R.S. 13:3852—which requires [that] the notice include "the date of the first scheduled sale of the property"—mandate that "upon seizure of their property, a defendant receive a written notice that informs them of the first scheduled sale date." * * * The court still further reasoned that there was no Louisiana authority for requiring a creditor to provide a debtor with notice of a rescheduled judicial sale.

The situation in this case is analogous to the situation presented in the [referenced] case. Dr. Mitchell defaulted on her loan agreement and [the bank] established its right to proceed by executory process to seize and sell the Property. Dr. Mitchell was served with a notice of seizure. Thereafter, she entered into the repayment agreement, [which] expressly provided that the executor proceeding would be placed on hold for the time the repayment agreement was in place. The agreement also provided for the resumption of the foreclosure in the event of a default in its terms, which Dr. Mitchell acknowledged occurred. When the executory proceeding was resumed, there was no obligation to serve Dr. Mitchell with another notice of seizure.

* * * We thus find the trial court correctly concluded that there was no requirement that Dr. Mitchell be served with the amended notice of seizure.

QUESTIONS

1. What are the purposes of the notice provisions in the Louisiana code? Did this court stay true to those purposes? Explain your answer.
2. How might the lender have avoided the dispute in this case?

DEFICIENCY JUDGMENTS If any equity remains after the foreclosed property is sold, the borrower is often able to keep the difference between the sale price and the mortgage amount. If the sale amount is not enough to cover the loan amount, the lender can ask a court for a deficiency judgment (a judgment against the borrower for the amount of debt remaining unpaid after the collateral is sold, as discussed in Chapter 29). A deficiency judgment requires the borrower to make up the difference to the lender over time. (Note that some states do not allow deficiency judgments for mortgaged residential real estate.)

Redemption Rights

Borrowers in every state have the right to purchase the property after default by paying the full amount of the debt, plus any interest and costs that have accrued, before the foreclosure sale. This is referred to as the buyer's equitable right of redemption. Equitable redemption allows a defaulting borrower to gain title and regain possession of a property.⁹ The idea behind equitable redemption is that it is only fair, or equitable, for the borrower to have a chance to regain possession after default. Although many critics question the utility of this right, all states still allow for an equitable right of redemption.

Some states have passed laws that entitle a borrower to repurchase property even after a judicial foreclosure.¹⁰ This is called a statutory right of redemption, and it may be exercised even if the property was purchased at auction by a third party.

9. Note that a foreclosure proceeding is the legal means by which a lender terminates the borrower's equitable right of redemption.
10. This right of redemption is not available after a power of sale foreclosure.

Generally, the borrower may exercise this right for up to one year from the time the house is sold at a foreclosure sale.¹¹ The borrower¹² must pay the price at which the house was sold at the foreclosure sale (the redemption price), plus taxes, interest, and assessments, as opposed to the balance owed on the foreclosed loan.

Some states allow the borrower to retain possession of the property after the foreclosure sale until the statutory redemption period ends. If the borrower does not exercise the right of redemption, the new buyer receives title to and possession of the property. The statutes creating this right were enacted to drive up sale prices at foreclosure auctions on the theory that third parties would offer prices too high for defaulting borrowers to afford. Instead, in many states, the statutory right of redemption has created a strong disincentive for potential buyers to tie up their funds in an uncertain transaction.

11. Some states do not allow a borrower to waive the statutory right of redemption. This means that a buyer at auction must wait one year to obtain title to, and possession of, a foreclosed property.
12. Some states also allow the spouse of a defaulting borrower or creditors holding liens on the property to purchase the property under the statutory right of redemption.

REVIEWING

Mortgages and Foreclosures after the Recession

Al and Betty Smith's home is valued at $200,000. They have paid off their mortgage and own the house outright—that is, they have 100 percent home equity. They lost most of their savings when the stock market declined during the Great Recession. Now they want to start a new business and need funds, so they decide to obtain a home equity loan. They borrow $150,000 for ten years at an interest rate of 12 percent. On the date they take out the loan, a ten-year Treasury bond is yielding 3 percent. The Smiths pay a total of $10,000 in fees to Alpha Bank. The Smiths are not given any notice that they can lose their home if they do not meet their obligations under the loan. Two weeks after completing the loan, the Smiths change their minds and want to rescind the loan.

1. Is the Smiths' loan covered by the Truth-in-Lending Act as amended by the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act? Why or why not?
2. Do the Smiths have a right to rescind the loan two weeks after the fact, or are they too late? Explain.
3. Assume now that Alpha Bank gave the Smiths all of the required notices before the loan was completed. If all other facts remain the same, do the Smiths have a right to rescind? Discuss your answer.
4. Suppose now that the Smiths never rescind the loan and that they default four years later while still owing Alpha Bank $120,000. The bank forecloses and raises only $110,000 when the house is sold at auction. If the state where the Smiths live follows the majority rule, can Alpha Bank seek the remaining $10,000 from the Smiths?

 DEBATE THIS: Federal legislation enacted in the past few years has unfairly benefited homeowners who should not have bought such expensive houses and taken on so much debt.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

31-1. Disclosure Requirements Rancho Mortgage, Inc., is planning a new advertising campaign designed to attract homebuyers in a difficult economic environment. Rancho wants to promote its new loan product, which offers a fixed interest rate for the first five years and then switches to a variable rate of interest. Rancho believes that Spanish-speaking homebuyers have been underserved in recent years, and it wants to direct its ads to that market. What must Rancho say (and not say) in its advertising campaigns about the structure of the loan product, and in what language? What language should Rancho use in its Truth-in-Lending disclosures? Why?

31-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Real Estate Financing.

Jane Lane refinanced her mortgage with Central Equity, Inc. Central Equity split the transaction into two separate loan documents with separate Truth-in-Lending disclosure statements and settlement statements. Two years later, Lane sought to exercise her right to rescission under the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act (HOEPA), but Central Equity refused. Central Equity responded that the original transactions comprised two separate loan transactions and because neither loan imposed sufficient fees and costs to trigger HOEPA, its protections did not apply. Lane claims that if the costs and fees were combined into a single transaction (which Lane expected the loan to be), they would surpass the HOEPA threshold and trigger its protections. In turn, because Central Equity did not provide the necessary disclosures under HOEPA, Lane argues that she can properly rescind under its provisions. Is Lane correct? Does loan splitting allow the lender to count each loan transaction with a borrower separately for HOEPA purposes? Why or why not?

- For a sample answer to Question 31-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

31-3. Lender's Options In 2008, Frank relocated and purchased a home in a beautiful mountain town. The home was five years old, and Frank purchased it for $450,000. He paid $90,000 as a down payment and financed the remaining $360,000 of the purchase price with a loan from Bank of Town. Frank signed mortgage documents that gave Bank of Town a mortgage interest in the home. Frank made payments on the loan for three years. But the housing market declined significantly, and Frank's home is now valued at only $265,000. The balance due on his loan is $354,000. In addition to the decline in housing prices, the economy has slowed, and the booming business that Frank started when he bought the home has experienced a decrease in revenues. It seems inevitable that Frank will not be able to make his mortgage payments. Discuss Bank of Town's options in this situation.

31-4. Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act Michael and Edith Jones owned a home that went into foreclosure. During this time, they were contacted by a representative of Rees-Max, whose notice read: "There are only a few months to go in your redemption period! Your options to save the equity in your home are fading. Call me immediately for a no-bull, no-obligation assessment of your situation. Even if you have been 'promised' by a mortgage broker or investor that they will help, CALL ME . . ." The Joneses contacted Rees-Max, and they entered into a sale and leaseback transaction. Rees-Max would purchase the property from the Joneses, the Joneses would lease the property for a few months, and then the Joneses would purchase the property back from Rees-Max on a contract. The property was appraised at $278,000 and purchased by Rees-Max for $214,000, with more than $30,000 in fees. The Joneses disputed these fees, and Rees-Max moved to evict them. The agreement did not use the terms debt, security, or mortgage, and the documents stated that no security interest was granted. Does this transaction constitute a mortgage that would receive protection under the Truth-in-Lending Act and the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act? Why or why not? [Jones v. Rees-Max, LLC, 514 F.Supp.2d 1139 (D.Minn. 2007)]

31-5. Right of Rescission George and Mona Antanuos obtained a mortgage loan secured with rental property from the First National Bank of Arizona. At the closing, they received from the bank a “Notice of Right to Cancel,” informing them of their three-day rescission period under the Truth-in-Lending Act (TILA). The following day, according to the Antanuoses, they informed the lender via fax that they wished to exercise their right to rescind. The lender refused to rescind the agreement. George and Mona sued the bank. In federal court, the Antanuoses did not dispute that a consumer’s right to rescind under the TILA applies only to the consumer’s original dwelling and that they had used their commercial property as a security interest. Instead, the Antanuoses argued that the bank was prohibited from denying them the rescission right because they relied to their detriment on the bank’s disclosure, which would have been required under the TILA. Would the court be convinced? Explain. [Antanuos v. First National Bank of Arizona, 508 F.Supp.2d 466 (E.D.Va. 2007)]

31-6. Mortgage Foreclosure In January 2003, Gary Ryder and Washington Mutual Bank, F.A., executed a note in which Ryder promised to pay $2,450,000, plus interest at a rate that could vary from month to month. The amount of the first payment was $10,933. The note was to be paid in full by February 1, 2033. A mortgage on Ryder’s real property at 345 Round Hill Road in Greenwich, Connecticut, in favor of the bank secured his obligations under the note. The note and mortgage required that he pay the taxes on the property, which he did not do in 2004 and 2005. The bank notified him that he was in default and, when he failed to act, paid $50,095.92 in taxes, penalties, interest, and fees. Other disputes arose between the parties, and Ryder filed a suit in a federal district court against the bank, alleging, in part, breach of contract. He charged, among other things, that some of his timely payments were not processed and were subjected to incorrect late fees, forcing him to make excessive payments and ultimately resulting in “non-payment by Ryder.” The bank filed a counterclaim, seeking to foreclose on the mortgage. What should a creditor be required to prove to foreclose on mortgaged property? What would be a debtor’s most effective defense? Which party in this case is likely to prevail on the bank’s counterclaim? Why? [Ryder v. Washington Mutual Bank, F.A., 501 F.Supp.2d 311 (D.Conn. 2007)]

31-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Wrongful Foreclosure.

After a series of bankruptcies and foreclosures, Wells Fargo Home Mortgage, the mortgagee, foreclosed on the debtors’ home and purchased it for $33,500. The debtors then filed a complaint against Wells Fargo and certain related entities, claiming wrongful foreclosure and breach of contract. The debtors sought damages, specific performance, and other remedies. The dispute grew out of a loan note for $51,300 that the plaintiffs had executed with Southern Atlantic Financial Services, Inc. In exchange for that loan, the plaintiffs gave Southern Atlantic a security interest in their home. Southern Atlantic transferred its interest in the property and the note to GE Capital Mortgage Services, Inc. On September 30, 2000, Wells Fargo Home Mortgage started servicing this loan for GE. Wells Fargo acquired the loan from GE on December 1, 2004. When the plaintiffs did not make all of the required payments, Wells Fargo sought relief from a stay to file a foreclosure because the debtors were in arrears on the mortgage. The parties agreed that Wells Fargo could have relief from the stay if the debtors failed to make all future payments. Claiming default, Wells Fargo then filed a foreclosure and bought the property at the sale. The debtors filed a complaint alleging that the price paid was shockingly insufficient and constituted wrongful foreclosure and a breach of fiduciary duty. Under what circumstances is a foreclosure sale unfair? Does a property foreclosure sale have to realize the market price? The amount owed on the note? Discuss. [In re Sharpe, 425 Bankr. 620 (N.D.Ala. 2010)]

31-8. Foreclosure on Mortgage and Liens LaSalle Bank loaned $8 million to Cypress Creek to build an apartment complex. The loan was secured by a mortgage. Cypress Creek hired contractors to provide concrete work, plumbing, carpentry, and other construction services. Cypress Creek went bankrupt, owing LaSalle $3 million. The contractors recorded mechanic’s liens (see page 546 in Chapter 28) when they did not get paid for their work. The property was sold to LaSalle at a sheriff’s sale for $1.3 million. The contractors claimed that they should be paid the amounts they were owed out of the $1.3 million and that the mechanic’s liens should be satisfied before any funds were distributed to LaSalle for its mortgage. The trial court distributed the $1.3 million primarily to LaSalle, with only a small fraction going to the contractors. Do the liens come before the mortgage in priority of payment? Discuss. [LaSalle Bank v. Cypress Creek, 925 N.E.2d 233 (Ill.App.3d 2010)]

31-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Predatory Lending.

Peter Sutton owned a home that was subject to two mortgages, but his only source of income was a $1,080 monthly Social Security benefit. In an effort to reduce his mortgage payments, which exceeded

$1,400 per month, he sought a refinancing loan through an Apex Mortgage Services mortgage broker. According to Sutton, the broker led him to believe that he could receive, from Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., a refinancing loan with payments of $428 per month. The broker, however, ultimately arranged for Sutton to receive an adjustable-rate loan from Countrywide; the loan required monthly payments that started at more than $1,000 per month and were subject to further increases. Sutton also alleged that the broker reported his monthly income as four times the actual amount and failed to inform Sutton about the existence of a prepayment penalty. Sutton signed forms stating that he agreed to the terms of the loan arranged by the broker. He claimed, however, that he did not understand the terms of the loan until after the closing. As compensation for brokering Sutton's loan, Countrywide paid Apex $7,270, which included a yield-spread premium of $4,710. (A yield-spread premium is a form of compensation paid to a broker by a lender for providing a borrower with a loan that carries an interest rate above the lender's par rate.) Sutton sued the broker and lender claiming violations of federal law. [Sutton v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., ___ F.3d ___ (11th Cir. 2009)]

- (a) Who is ethically responsible for Sutton's predicament? To what extent does Sutton have a duty to read and understand what he signs? Discuss.
- (b) Sutton argued that because the broker provided services that were of no value to Sutton, the broker should not receive the yield-spread premium. Do you agree? Why or why not?
- (c) Did Countrywide, the lender, have any ethical obligation to monitor the activities of the broker? Would the result have been different if Countrywide had intervened before the documents were signed? Explain.

UNIT SIX • FOCUS ON ETHICS

Creditors' Rights and Bankruptcy

We have certainly come a long way from the period in our history when debtors' prisons existed. Today, debtors are in a much more favorable position—they can file for protection under bankruptcy law. Indeed, after the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978 was passed, some claimed that we had gone too far toward protecting debtors and had made it too easy for them to avoid paying what they legally owed. Critics of the 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act were concerned that the pendulum had swung too far in the opposite direction—favoring creditors' interests and making it too difficult for debtors to obtain a fresh start. Clearly, it is hard to protect the rights of both debtors and creditors at the same time, and laws governing debtor-creditor relationships have traditionally been perceived, by one group or another, as being unfair.

It is obviously impossible for the law to protect both debtors and creditors at all times under all circumstances. Attempts to balance the rights of both groups necessarily raise questions of fairness and justice. In this Focus on Ethics feature, we look at several aspects of debtor-creditor relationships that frequently involve issues of fairness, and we examine the ethical ramifications of the bankruptcy reform legislation for debtors and creditors.

“Self-Help” Repossession

Section 9–503 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) states that “[u]nless otherwise agreed, a secured party has on default the right to take possession of the collateral. In taking possession, a secured party may proceed without judicial process if this can be done without breach of the peace.” The underlying rationale for this “self-help” provision of Article 9 is that it simplifies the process of repossession for creditors and reduces the burden on the courts. Because the UCC does not define “breach of the peace,” however, it is not always easy to predict what behavior will constitute such a breach.

One problem is that the debtor may not realize what is happening when agents of the creditor show up to repossess the collateral. Often, to avoid confrontation with the debtor and any potential violence or breach of the peace, a secured creditor will arrange to have the collateral repossessed during the night or in the early-morning hours, when the repossession effort is least likely to be observed. But a debtor who awakens in the night and sees his or her car being towed away may not realize that it is being repossessed.

At the same time, repossession can be risky for the creditor; if the repossession results in a breach of the peace, the creditor may be liable for substantial damages. Inevitably, repossession attempts will occasionally result in confrontations with the debtor. Indeed, some contend that the self-help provision encourages violence by providing an incentive for debtors to incite creditors to breach the peace, which may entitle the debtors to damages.

Ethics and Bankruptcy

As we have discussed, the first goal of bankruptcy law is to provide relief and protection to debtors. Society generally has concluded that everyone should be given the chance to start over. But how far should society go in allowing debtors to avoid obligations that they voluntarily incurred?

Consider the concept of bankruptcy from the point of view of the creditor. The creditor has extended a transfer of purchasing power from herself or himself to the debtor. That transfer of purchasing power represents a transfer of an asset for an asset. The debtor obtains the asset of funds, goods, or services, and the creditor obtains the asset of a secured or unsecured legal obligation to repay. Once the debtor is in bankruptcy, voluntarily or involuntarily, the asset that the creditor owns most often has a diminished value. Indeed, in many circumstances, that asset has no value. Yet the easier it becomes for debtors to discharge their debts under bankruptcy laws, the greater will be the incentive for debtors to use such laws to avoid paying amounts that are legally owed.

Clearly, bankruptcy law is a balancing act between providing a second chance for debtors and ensuring that creditors are given reasonable protection. Understandably, ethical issues arise in the process.

Bankruptcy and Economics

Among other things, when the number of bankruptcies increases, creditors incur higher risks in making loans—because bankruptcy shifts the cost of the debt from the debtor to the creditor. To compensate for these higher risks, creditors take one or more of the following actions: increase the interest rates charged to everyone, require additional security (collateral), or become more selective in granting credit. Thus, with more lenient bankruptcy laws, debtors who find themselves in bankruptcy will be better off, but debtors who will never be in bankruptcy will be worse off. Ethical concerns regarding this trade-off must be matched with the economic concerns of other groups of individuals affected by the law, especially in the economic environment after the Great Recession.

Consequences of Bankruptcy Under bankruptcy law, filing for personal bankruptcy (particularly under Chapter 7) is difficult. Although the stigma attached to bankruptcy today is less than it once was, bankruptcy is never easy for debtors. Many debtors feel a sense of shame and failure when they petition for bankruptcy. After all, bankruptcy is a matter of public record, and there is no way to avoid a certain amount of publicity. In one case, for example, a couple who filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy wanted to use their attorney's mailing address in another town on their bankruptcy schedules in an effort to prevent an elderly parent and one of their employers from learning about the bankruptcy. The court, however, held that debtors are not entitled to be protected from publicity surrounding the filing of their cases.¹

A court in another case held that the public interest in information involving a particular bankruptcy debtor (Gitto Global Corporation) was important enough to justify disclosing a previously sealed report from a bankruptcy examiner. In essence, the court gave the media access to the bankruptcy examiner's report on the misconduct of more than 120 individuals at the debtor company.²

Bankruptcy also has other consequences for debtors, including blemished credit ratings for up to ten years and higher interest charges for new debts, such as those incurred through the purchase of cars or homes. Some private employers may even refuse to hire a job applicant who has filed for bankruptcy. The courts provide little relief for applicants who are denied a job for this reason.³

Thus, bankruptcy can have adverse effects for both debtors and creditors. Because of the consequences of bankruptcy, debtors do not always get the fresh start promised by bankruptcy law. At the same time, creditors rarely are able to recover all that is owed them once a debtor petitions for bankruptcy.

Investment Risk Management and Bankruptcy In the years leading up to the Great Recession, many investors opted to invest most or all of their funds in risky propositions that promised to yield ultra-high returns. Rather than simply seeking a healthy profit, these investors were looking for extraordinary gains. Too often, they were so certain of success that they failed to manage the risk of investment by diversifying their portfolios or holding some funds in reserve. Many were so overconfident that they borrowed additional funds to invest. When the recession hit, however, those risky investments came crashing down, and many investors were left unable to pay their debts and had to file for bankruptcy.

The combination of overdependence on credit and overconfidence in investments helped bring on the global economic crisis from which the United States has not yet fully recovered. What these investors lacked was a sense of self-sufficiency and a clear understanding of the importance of minimizing debt. A person or firm that minimizes debt and is financially self-reliant will be less affected by fluctuations in the market or difficulties in obtaining credit, and therefore will be less likely to be bankrupted in a recession.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Do you think that the law favors debtors at the expense of creditors or vice versa? Is there any way to achieve a better balance between the interests of creditors and those of debtors?
2. So long as a breach of the peace does not result, a lender may repossess goods on the debtor's default under the self-help provision of Article 9. Do you think that debtors have a right to be told in advance about a planned repossession? Some observers argue that the self-help remedy under Article 9 should be abolished. Do you agree? Why or why not?
3. Is it unethical to avoid paying one's debts by going into bankruptcy? Does a person have a moral responsibility to pay his or her debts? Discuss.
4. Are borrowers better off as a result of the bankruptcy reform legislation? Why or why not?
5. How does minimizing business or personal debt help prevent bankruptcies in a recession?

Agency Formation and Duties

One of the most common, important, and pervasive legal relationships is that of agency. In an agency relationship involving two parties, one of the parties, called the agent, agrees to represent or act for the other, called the principal. The principal has the right to control the agent's conduct in matters entrusted to the agent. By using agents, a principal can conduct multiple business operations simultaneously in various locations. Thus, for example, contracts that bind the principal can be made at different places with different persons at the same time.

A familiar example of an agent is a corporate officer who serves in a representative capacity for the owners of the corporation. In this capacity, the officer has the authority to bind the principal (the corporation) to a contract. In fact, agency law is essential to the existence and operation of a corporate entity because only through its agents can a corporation function and enter into contracts.

Most employees are also considered to be agents of their employers. Thus, some of the concepts of employment law that you will learn about in Chapters 34 and 35 are based on agency law. Indeed, agency relationships permeate the business world. For that reason, an understanding of the law of agency is crucial to understanding business law.

SECTION 1 AGENCY RELATIONSHIPS

Section 1(1) of the *Restatement (Third) of Agency*¹ defines agency as “the fiduciary relation [that] results from the manifestation of consent by one person to another that the other shall act in his [or her] behalf and subject to his [or her] control, and consent by the other so to act.” In other words, in a principal-agent relationship, the parties have agreed that the agent will act on behalf and instead of the principal in negotiating and transacting business with third parties.

The term fiduciary is at the heart of agency law. This term can be used both as a noun and as an adjective. When used as a noun, it refers to a person having a duty created by his or her undertaking to act primarily for another's benefit in matters connected with the undertaking. When used as an adjective, as in the phrase fiduciary relationship, it means that the relationship involves trust and confidence.

Agency relationships commonly exist between employers and employees. Agency relationships may sometimes also exist between employers and independent contractors who are hired to perform special tasks or services.

Employer-Employee Relationships

Normally, all employees who deal with third parties are deemed to be agents. A salesperson in a department store, for instance, is an agent of the store's owner (the principal) and acts on the owner's behalf. Any sale of goods made by the salesperson to a customer is binding on the principal. Similarly, most representations of fact made by the salesperson with respect to the goods sold are binding on the principal.

Because employees who deal with third parties generally are deemed to be agents of their employers, agency law and employment law overlap considerably. Agency relationships, though, as will become apparent, can exist outside an employer-employee relationship, and thus agency law has a broader reach than employment law does.

Employment laws (state and federal) apply only to the employer-employee relationship. Statutes governing Social Security, withholding taxes, workers' compensation, unemployment compensation, workplace safety, employment discrimination, and other aspects of employment (see Chapters 34 and 35) are applicable only when an employer-employee relationship exists. These laws do not apply to an independent contractor.

Employer-Independent Contractor Relationships

Independent contractors are not employees because, by definition, those who hire them have no control over the details of their work performance. Section 2 of the Restatement (Third) of Agency defines an independent contractor as follows:

[An independent contractor is] a person who contracts with another to do something for him [or her] but who is not controlled by the other nor subject to the other's right to control with respect to his [or her] physical conduct in the performance of the undertaking. He [or she] may or may not be an agent.

Building contractors and subcontractors are independent contractors; a property owner who hires a contractor and subcontractors to complete a project does not control the details of the way they perform their work. Truck drivers who own their vehicles and hire out on a per-job basis are independent contractors, but truck drivers who drive company trucks on a regular basis usually are employees.

The relationship between a principal and an independent contractor may or may not involve an agency relationship. To illustrate: An owner of real estate who hires a real estate broker to negotiate the sale of her property not only has contracted with an independent contractor (the real estate broker) but also has established an agency relationship for the specific purpose of selling the property. Another example is an insurance agent, who is both an independent contractor and an agent of the insurance company for which he or she sells policies. (Note that an insurance broker, in contrast, normally is an agent of the person obtaining insurance and not of the insurance company.)

Determination of Employee Status

The courts are frequently asked to determine whether a particular worker is an employee or an independent contractor. How a court decides this issue can have a significant effect on the rights and liabilities of the parties. For example, employers are required to pay certain taxes, such as Social Security and unemployment taxes, for employees but not for independent contractors.

CRITERIA USED BY THE COURTS In deciding whether a worker is categorized as an employee or an independent contractor, courts often consider the following questions:

1. How much control does the employer exercise over the details of the work? (If the employer exercises considerable control over the details of the work and the day-to-day activities of the worker, this indicates employee status. This is perhaps the most important factor weighed by the courts in determining employee status.)
2. Is the worker engaged in an occupation or business distinct from that of the employer? (If so, this points to independent-contractor, not employee, status.)
3. Is the work usually done under the employer's direction or by a specialist without supervision? (If the work is usually done under the employer's direction, this indicates employee status.)
4. Does the employer supply the tools at the place of work? (If so, this indicates employee status.)
5. For how long is the person employed? (If the person is employed for a long period of time, this indicates employee status.)
6. What is the method of payment—by time period or at the completion of the job? (Payment by time period, such as once every two weeks or once a month, indicates employee status.)
7. What degree of skill is required of the worker? (If a great degree of skill is required, this may indicate that the person is an independent contractor hired for a specialized job and not an employee.)

Sometimes, workers may benefit from having employee status—for tax purposes and to be protected under certain employment laws, for example. As mentioned earlier, federal statutes governing employment discrimination apply only when an employer-employee relationship exists. Protection under employment-discrimination statutes provides a significant incentive for workers to claim that they are employees rather than independent contractors.

CASE IN POINT A Puerto Rican television station, WIPR, contracted with Victoria Lis Alberty-Vélez to co-host a television show. Alberty-Vélez signed a new contract for every new episode, each of which required her to work a certain number of days. She was under no other commitment to work for WIPR and was free to pursue other opportunities during the weeks between filming. WIPR did not withhold any taxes from the lump-sum amount it paid her for each contract. When Alberty-Vélez became pregnant, WIPR stopped contracting with her. She filed a lawsuit claiming that WIPR was discriminating against her in violation of federal employment-discrimination laws, but the court found in favor of WIPR. Because the parties had structured their relationship through the use of repeated fixed-length contracts and had described the woman as an independent contractor on tax documents, she could not maintain an employment-discrimination suit.²

Whether a worker is an employee or an independent contractor can also affect the employer's liability for the worker's actions. In the following case, the court had to determine the status of a taxi driver whose passengers were injured in a collision.

2. Alberty-Vélez v. Corporación de Puerto Rico para la Difusión Pública, 361 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2004).

Lopez v. El Palmar Taxi, Inc.

Court of Appeals of Georgia, 297 Ga.App. 121, 676 S.E.2d 460 (2009).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • El Palmar Taxi, Inc., requires its drivers to supply their own cabs, which must display El Palmar's logo. The drivers pay gas, maintenance, and insurance costs, as well as a fee to El Palmar. They are expected to follow certain rules—dress neatly, for example—and to comply with the law, including licensing regulations, but they can work when they want for as long as they want. El Palmar may dispatch a driver to pick up a fare, or the driver can look for a fare. Mario Julaju drove a taxi under a contract with El Palmar that described him as an independent contractor. El Palmar sent Julaju to pick up Maria Lopez and her children. During the ride, Julaju's cab collided with a truck. To recover for their injuries, the Lopezes filed a suit in a Georgia state court against El Palmar. The employer argued that it was not liable because Julaju was an independent contractor. The court ruled in El Palmar's favor. The plaintiffs appealed.

PHIPPS, Judge.

* * * *

In the complaint, Lopez alleged that she, accompanied by her children, hired El Palmar to transport them safely to their destination. * * * In its * * * answer, El Palmar denied this allegation and stated that Lopez had hired an independent contractor for transportation, not El Palmar.

* * * *

As a general rule, an employer is not responsible for [the actions of] its employee when the employee exercises an independent business and is not subject to the immediate direction and control of the employer. To determine whether the relationship of the parties is that of employer and servant or that of employer and independent contractor, the primary test is whether the employer retains the right to control the time, manner and method of executing the work. [Emphasis added.]

Here, Julaju executed an agreement with * * * El Palmar Taxi that he would work for El Palmar as an independent contractor. The only restrictions the contract imposed on him were to comply with all federal, state and local laws requiring business permits, certificates and licenses and to refrain from operating under the company's name in any jurisdiction where the vehicle could not legally be operated.

The evidence does not show that El Palmar assumed control over the time, manner or method of Julaju's work. He was free to work when and for as long as he wanted, he was not required to accept fares from El Palmar, he could obtain his own fares and he could work anywhere the taxi could legally be operated. The fact that the cars he drove displayed the El Palmar logo and the fact that he received calls from El Palmar are not sufficient to create an employer-employee relationship.

* * * The car [Julaju] drove the day of the collision was not owned by El Palmar. Thus, El Palmar cannot be held liable for Julaju's [actions] under the theory that Julaju was El Palmar's employee.

CASE 32.1 CONTINUED ♦ DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court affirmed this part of the lower court's decision. A taxi driver who is not subject to the control of the taxi company is an independent contractor. But the appellate court reversed the judgment in El Palmar's favor on other grounds and remanded the case for trial.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that El Palmar had limited its driver to a set schedule in a specific area of the city and allowed him to pick up only certain passengers. Would these facts have established Julaju as an employee? Why or why not?

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • When an employment contract clearly designates one party as an independent contractor, the relationship between the parties is presumed to be that of employer and independent contractor. But this is only a presumption. Evidence can be introduced to show that the employer exercised sufficient control to establish the other party as an employee. The Internal Revenue Service is becoming increasingly aggressive in pursuing cases involving independent contractor versus employee status. Thus, from a tax perspective, business managers need to ensure that all independent contractors fully control their own work.

CRITERIA USED BY THE IRS The Internal Revenue Service (IRS) has established its own criteria for determining whether a worker is an independent contractor or an employee. Although the IRS once considered twenty factors in determining a worker's status, guidelines today encourage IRS examiners to look closely at just one of those factors—the degree of control the business exercises over the worker.

The IRS tends to scrutinize closely a firm's classification of its workers, because, as mentioned, employers can avoid certain tax liabilities by hiring independent contractors instead of employees. Even when a firm has classified a worker as an independent contractor, the IRS may decide that the worker is actually an employee. In that situation, the employer will be responsible for paying any applicable Social Security, withholding, and unemployment taxes. Microsoft Corporation, for example, was once ordered to pay back payroll taxes for hundreds of temporary workers who had contractually agreed to work for Microsoft as independent contractors.³

EMPLOYEE STATUS AND "WORKS FOR HIRE" Under the Copyright Act of 1976, any copyrighted work created by an employee within the scope of her or his employment at the request of the employer is a "work for hire," and the employer owns the copyright to the work. In contrast, when an employer hires an independent contractor—a freelance artist, writer, or computer programmer, for example—the independent contractor normally owns the copyright. In this situation, the employer can own the copyright only if the parties agree in writing that the work is a "work for hire" and the work falls into one of nine specific categories, including audiovisual and other works.

CASE IN POINT Artisan House, Inc., hired a professional photographer, Steven H. Lindner, owner of SHL Imaging, Inc., to take pictures of its products for the creation of color slides to be used by Artisan's sales force. Lindner controlled his own work and carefully chose the lighting and angles used in the photographs. When Lindner later discovered that Artisan had published the photographs in a catalogue and brochures without his permission, he had SHL register the photographs with the copyright office and file a lawsuit for copyright infringement. Artisan claimed that its publication of the photographs was authorized because they were works for hire. The court, however, decided that SHL was an independent contractor and owned the copyright to the photographs. SHL had only given Artisan permission (a license) to provide the photographs to its sales reps, not to reproduce them in other publications. Because Artisan had used the photographs in an unauthorized manner, the court ruled that Artisan was liable for copyright infringement.⁴

FORMATION OF THE AGENCY RELATIONSHIP

Agency relationships normally are consensual—that is, they come about by voluntary consent and agreement between the parties. Generally, the agreement need not be in writing,⁵ and consideration is not required.

4. SHL Imaging, Inc. v. Artisan House, Inc., 117 F.Supp.2d 301 (S.D.N.Y. 2000).

A person must have contractual capacity to be a principal.⁶ Those who cannot legally enter into contracts directly should not be allowed to do so indirectly through an agent. Any person can be an agent, however, regardless of whether he or she has the capacity to contract (including minors).

An agency relationship can be created for any legal purpose. An agency relationship created for a purpose that is illegal or contrary to public policy is unenforceable. If Archer (as principal) contracts with Burke (as agent) to sell illegal narcotics, the agency relationship is unenforceable because selling illegal narcotics is a felony and is contrary to public policy. It is also illegal for physicians and other licensed professionals to employ unlicensed agents to perform professional actions.

An agency relationship can arise in four ways: by agreement of the parties, by ratification, by estoppel, and by operation of law. We look here at each of these possibilities.

Agency by Agreement

Most agency relationships are based on an express or implied agreement that the agent will act for the principal and that the principal agrees to have the agent so act. An agency agreement can take the form of an express written contract or be created by an oral agreement. For example, Henry asks Grace, a gardener, to contract with others for the care of his lawn on a regular basis. If Grace agrees, an agency relationship exists between Henry and Grace for the lawn care.

An agency agreement can also be implied by conduct. For example, a hotel expressly allows only Hans Cooper to park cars, but Hans has no employment contract there. The hotel's manager tells Hans when to work, as well as where and how to park the cars. The hotel's conduct manifests a willingness to have Hans park its customers' cars, and Hans can infer from the hotel's conduct that he has authority to act as a parking valet. Thus, there is an implied agreement that Hans is an agent of the hotel and provides valet parking services for hotel guests.

At issue in the following case was whether an agency relationship arose when a man, who was being hospitalized, asked his wife to sign the admissions papers for him.

5. There are two main exceptions to the statement that agency agreements need not be in writing. An agency agreement must be in writing (1) whenever agency authority empowers the agent to enter into a contract that the Statute of Frauds requires to be in writing (this is called the equal dignity rule, to be discussed in the next chapter) and (2) whenever an agent is given power of attorney.
6. Note that some states allow a minor to be a principal. When a minor is permitted to be a principal, any resulting contracts will be voidable by the minor principal but not by the adult third party.

Laurel Creek Health Care Center v. Bishop

Court of Appeals of Kentucky, ___ S.W.3d ___ (2010).
courts.ky.gov/courtsofappeals^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Gilbert Bishop was admitted to Laurel Creek Health Care Center suffering from various physical ailments. During an examination, Bishop told Laurel Creek staff that he could not use his hands well enough to write or hold a pencil, but he was otherwise found to be mentally competent. Bishop's sister, Rachel Combs, testified that when she arrived at the facility, she offered to sign the admissions forms, but Laurel Creek employees told her that it was their policy to have the patient's spouse sign the admissions papers if the patient was unable to do so. Combs also testified that Bishop asked her to get his wife, Anna, so that she could sign his admissions papers. Combs then brought Anna to the hospital, and Anna signed the admissions paperwork, which contained a provision for mandatory arbitration. Subsequently, Bishop went into cardiopulmonary arrest and died. Following his death, Bishop's family brought an action in a Kentucky state court against Laurel Creek for negligence. Laurel Creek asked the trial court to order the parties to proceed to arbitration in accordance with the mandatory arbitration provision

LAMBERT, Judge.

* * * *

Laurel Creek first argues that this is a case of actual agency and that Anna Bishop had actual authority as Gilbert’s agent to sign the admissions paperwork and is therefore bound by the arbitration agreement therein.

* * * *

We agree with Laurel Creek that Gilbert created an actual agency relationship between him and his wife. According to his sister, Rachel, Gilbert specifically asked that his wife be brought to the nursing home so that she could sign the admissions documents for him, and Anna acted upon that delegation of authority and signed the admissions papers. This is consistent with the creation of actual authority as described in the Restatement (Third) of Agency, [Section] 2.01, Comment c (2006). The Restatement explains the rationale for the creation of actual agency in three steps. First, “the principal manifests assent to be affected by the agent’s action.” In the instant case, Gilbert asked that Anna come to the hospital to sign the papers for him. Second, “the agent’s actions establish the agent’s consent to act on the principal’s behalf.” Here, Anna signed all the admissions papers per her husband’s request and therefore consented to act on Gilbert’s behalf. Third, by acting within such authority, the agent affects the principal’s legal relations with third parties. Clearly here, Anna’s actions affected Gilbert’s relations with Laurel Creek, a third party. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * The evidence indicates that Gilbert indicated to Laurel Creek that he was physically incapable of signing the documents but was of sound mental capacity and wanted his wife to sign the documents on his behalf. When Gilbert communicated this to his sister, and the sister brought Anna in to sign the documents, Gilbert created an agency relationship upon which Laurel Creek relied.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Kentucky Court of Appeals reversed the trial court’s judgment and remanded the case for further proceedings consistent with its opinion. An actual agency relationship between Bishop and his wife, Anna, had been formed, and the trial court had erred when it found otherwise.

THE ECONOMIC DIMENSION • Which party benefited from the court’s ruling? Why?

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Laurel Creek argued that even if there was no actual agency relationship, an implied agency relationship existed. Is this argument valid? Why or why not?

Agency by Ratification

On occasion, a person who is in fact not an agent (or who is an agent acting outside the scope of her or his authority) may make a contract on behalf of another (a principal). If the principal approves or affirms that contract by word or by action, an agency relationship is created by ratification. Ratification involves a question of intent, and intent can be expressed by either words or conduct. The basic requirements for ratification will be discussed in Chapter 33.

Agency by Estoppel

When a principal causes a third person to believe that another person is the principal’s agent, and the third person acts to his or her detriment in reasonable reliance on that belief, the principal is “estopped to deny” (prevented from denying) the agency relationship. In such a situation, the principal’s actions have created the appearance of an agency that does not in fact exist. The third person must prove that he or she reasonably believed that an agency relationship existed, however.⁷ Facts and circumstances must show that an ordinary, prudent person familiar with business practice and custom would have been justified in concluding that the agent had authority.

CASE IN POINT Marsha and Jerry Wiedmaier owned Wiedmaier, Inc., a corporation that operated a truck stop. Their son, Michael, did not own any interest in the corporation but had worked at the truck stop as a fuel operator. Michael decided to form his own business called Extreme Diecast, LLC. To obtain a line of credit with Motorsport Marketing, Inc., which sells racing memorabilia, Michael asked his mother to sign the credit application form. After Marsha had signed as “Secretary-Owner” of Wiedmaier, Inc., Michael added his name to the list of corporate owners and faxed the form to Motorsport. Later, when Michael stopped making payments on the merchandise he had ordered, Motorsport sued Wiedmaier, Inc., for the unpaid balance. The court ruled that Michael was an apparent agent of Wiedmaier, Inc., because the credit application had caused Motorsport to reasonably believe that Michael was acting as Wiedmaier’s agent in ordering merchandise.⁸

7. These concepts also apply when a person who is in fact an agent undertakes an action that is beyond the scope of her or his authority, as will be discussed in Chapter 33.

8. Motorsport Marketing, Inc. v. Wiedmaier, Inc., 195 S.W.3d 492 (Mo. App. 2006).

Note that the acts or declarations of a purported agent in and of themselves do not create an agency by estoppel. Rather, it is the deeds or statements of the principal that create an agency by estoppel. Thus, in the Case in Point feature just discussed, if Marsha Wiedmaier had not signed the credit application on behalf of the principal-corporation, then Motorsport would not have been justified in believing that Michael was Wiedmaier’s agent.

Agency by Operation of Law

The courts may find an agency relationship in the absence of a formal agreement in other situations as well. This may occur in family relationships, such as when one spouse purchases certain basic necessities and charges them to the other spouse’s account. The courts often rule that a spouse is liable for payment for the necessities because of either a social policy or a legal duty to supply necessities to family members.

Agency by operation of law may also occur in emergency situations, when the agent is unable to contact the principal and the agent’s failure to act outside the scope of her or his authority would cause the principal substantial loss. For example, a railroad engineer may contract on behalf of his or her employer for medical care for an injured motorist hit by the train.

Concept Summary 32.1 below reviews the various ways that agencies are formed.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 32.1

Formation of the Agency Relationship

Method of Formation	Description
By Agreement	The agency relationship is formed through express consent (oral or written) or implied by conduct.
By Ratification	The principal either by act or by agreement ratifies the conduct of a person who is not in fact an agent.
By Estoppel	The principal causes a third person to believe that another person is the principal’s agent, and the third person acts to his or her detriment in reasonable reliance on that belief.
By Operation of Law	The agency relationship is based on a social or legal duty (such as the need to support family members) or formed in emergency situations when the agent is unable to contact the principal and failure to act outside the scope of the agent’s authority would cause the principal substantial loss.

DUTIES OF AGENTS AND PRINCIPALS

Once the principal-agent relationship has been created, both parties have duties that govern their conduct. As discussed previously, the principal-agent relationship is fiduciary—based on trust. In a fiduciary relationship, each party owes the other the duty to act with the utmost good faith. In this section, we examine the various duties of agents and principals.

Agent's Duties to the Principal

Generally, the agent owes the principal five duties—performance, notification, loyalty, obedience, and accounting.

PERFORMANCE An implied condition in every agency contract is the agent's agreement to use reasonable diligence and skill in performing the work. When an agent fails to perform his or her duties, liability for breach of contract may result. The degree of skill or care required of an agent is usually that expected of a reasonable person under similar circumstances. Generally, this is interpreted to mean ordinary care. If an agent has represented herself or himself as possessing special skills, however, the agent is expected to exercise the degree of skill claimed. Failure to do so constitutes a breach of the agent's duty.

Not all agency relationships are based on contract. In some situations, an agent acts gratuitously—that is, without payment. A gratuitous agent cannot be liable for breach of contract, as there is no contract; he or she is subject only to tort liability. Once a gratuitous agent has begun to act in an agency capacity, he or she has the duty to continue to perform in that capacity in an acceptable manner and is subject to the same standards of care and duty to perform as other agents.

For example, Bower's friend Alcott is a real estate broker. Alcott offers to sell Bower's farm at no charge. If Alcott never attempts to sell the farm, Bower has no legal cause of action to force her to do so. If Alcott does find a buyer, however, but negligently fails to follow through with the sales contract, causing the buyer to seek other property, then Bower can sue Alcott for negligence.

NOTIFICATION An agent is required to notify the principal of all matters that come to her or his attention concerning the subject matter of the agency. This is the duty of notification, or the duty to inform. Suppose that Perez, an artist, is about to negotiate a contract to sell a series of paintings to Barber's Art Gallery for $25,000. Perez's agent learns that Barber is insolvent and will be unable to pay for the paintings. The agent has a duty to inform Perez of Barber's insolvency because it is relevant to the subject matter of the agency, which is the sale of Perez's paintings. Generally, the law assumes that the principal is aware of any information acquired by the agent that is relevant to the agency—regardless of whether the agent actually passes on this information to the principal. It is a basic tenet of agency law that notice to the agent is notice to the principal.

LOYALTY Loyalty is one of the most fundamental duties in a fiduciary relationship. Basically, the agent has the duty to act solely for the benefit of his or her principal and not in the interest of the agent or a third party. For example, an agent cannot represent two principals in the same transaction unless both know of the dual capacity and consent to it. The duty of loyalty also means that any information or knowledge acquired through the agency relationship is confidential. It is a breach of loyalty to disclose such information either during the agency relationship or after its termination. Typical examples of confidential information are trade secrets and customer lists compiled by the principal.

In short, the agent's loyalty must be undivided. The agent's actions must be strictly for the benefit of the principal and must not result in any secret profit for the agent.

CASE IN POINT Don Cousins contracted with Leo Hodgins, a real estate agent, to negotiate the purchase of an office building. While working for Cousins, Hodgins discovered that the property owner would sell the building only as a package deal with another parcel. Hodgins then formed a company to buy the two properties and resell the building to Cousins. When Cousins discovered these actions, he filed a lawsuit alleging that Hodgins had breached his fiduciary duties. The court ruled in Cousins's favor. As a real estate agent, Hodgins had a duty to communicate all offers to his principal and not to secretly purchase the property and then resell it to his principal. Hodgins was required to act in Cousins's best interests and could only become the purchaser in this situation with Cousins's knowledge and approval.⁹

In the following case, an employer alleged that a former employee had breached his duty of loyalty by planning a competing business while still working for the employer.

He was an at-will employee,^b and he did not sign any employment contract, non-compete agreement, or non-disclosure agreement.

In December 2006, Ward began exploring whether he could personally develop the concept of an eyeglass-mounted camera. He sought legal advice about whether he could permissibly develop such a camera independent of Taser, and hired patent counsel to conduct a patent search on the idea.

Between April 2007 and his resignation approximately four months later, Ward shifted his exploration to the concept of a clip-on camera device, after learning that the eyeglass-mounted concept was already patent protected. He directed patent counsel to conduct a patent search on the modified idea. He communicated with JAM-Proactive, a product development company, about the design and development of a clip-on camera device, and he received a detailed product development proposal from JAM-Proactive on June 12, 2007. Prior to his resignation, Ward planned to leave Taser to form a new business, and completed substantial work on a business plan to develop, market, and sell a clip-on camera device.

Ward resigned on July 24, 2007. * * * He formed Viewu LLC on August 23, 2007, and Viewu now markets a clip-on camera device to general consumers and law enforcement. Ten months after Ward resigned, Taser announced the AXON, a product that provides an audio-video record of an incident from the visual perspective of the person involved.

[Taser filed a suit against Ward in an Arizona state court alleging, among other things, that Ward had breached his duty of loyalty to Taser. Taser moved for summary judgment in its favor, which the court granted. Ward appealed.]

"In Arizona, an employee/agent owes his or her employer/principal a fiduciary duty." "It is too plain to need discussion that an agent is under the duty to act with entire good faith and loyalty for the furtherance of the interests of his principal in all matters concerning or affecting the subject of his agency, and if he fails to do so, he is responsible to his principal for any loss resulting therefrom." [Emphasis added.]

One aspect of this broad principle is that an employee is precluded from actively competing with his or her employer during the period of employment.

Although an employee may not compete prior to termination, "[the employee] may take action [during employment], not otherwise wrongful, to prepare for competition following termination of the agency relationship." Preparation cannot take the form of "acts in direct competition with the employer's business."

The line separating mere preparation from active competition may be difficult to discern in some cases, and we must "focus on the nature of the defendant's preparations to compete." [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

It is undisputed that, prior to his resignation, Ward did not solicit or recruit any Taser employees, distributors, customers, or vendors; he did not buy, sell, or incorporate any business; he did not acquire office space or other general business services; he did not contact or enter into any agreements with suppliers or manufacturers for his proposed clip-on camera; and he did not sell any products. However, Ward did begin developing a business plan, counseled with several attorneys, explored and abandoned the concept of an eyeglass-mounted camera device, and engaged, to some extent, in the exploration and development of a clip-on camera device.

Ward argues that his pre-termination activities did not constitute active competition but were merely lawful preparation for a future business venture. Taser contends, however, that "this case is not about just investigating computer software, acquiring a line of credit, securing office space, or getting prices on telephones * * * [but] about developing a rival design during employment, knowing full well TASER has sold such a device and continues to develop a second-generation product.”

Upon review, we agree with Ward that certain of his pre-termination activities are qualitatively different than “direct competition” and cannot form the basis for liability.

* * * *

However, assuming Taser was engaged in the research and development of a recording device during Ward’s employment, assuming Ward knew or should have known of those efforts, and assuming Taser’s device would compete with Ward’s concept, substantial design and development efforts by Ward during his employment would constitute direct competition with the business activities of Taser and would violate his duty of loyalty. In the context of a business which engages in research, design, development, manufacture, and marketing of products, we cannot limit “competition” to just actual sales of competing products.

Summary judgment on this theory is nevertheless improper because a genuine issue of material fact exists as to the extent of Ward’s pre-termination design and development efforts.

* * * *

For the foregoing reasons, we reverse the grant of summary judgment entered in favor of Taser * * * and remand for further proceedings.

QUESTIONS

1. Why was it unclear whether Ward’s pretermination actions constituted direct competition with his employer or were mere planning activities?
2. Suppose that Ward’s planning and development efforts were focused on a product that in no way would compete with Taser’s products. Would such efforts have breached his duty of loyalty to Taser in any way? Explain fully.

OBEDIENCE When acting on behalf of the principal, an agent has a duty to follow all lawful and clearly stated instructions of the principal. Any deviation from such instructions is a violation of this duty. During emergency situations, however, when the principal cannot be consulted, the agent may deviate from the instructions without violating this duty. Whenever instructions are not clearly stated, the agent can fulfill the duty of obedience by acting in good faith and in a manner reasonable under the circumstances.

ACCOUNTING Unless an agent and a principal agree otherwise, the agent has a duty to keep and make available to the principal an account of all property and funds received and paid out on behalf of the principal. This includes gifts from third parties in connection with the agency. For example, a gift from a customer to a salesperson for prompt deliveries made by the salesperson’s firm, in the absence of a company policy to the contrary, belongs to the firm. The agent has a duty to maintain separate accounts for the principal’s funds and the agent’s personal funds, and the agent must not intermingle the funds in these accounts. Whenever a licensed professional (such as an attorney) violates this duty to account, he or she may be subject to disciplinary proceedings carried out by the appropriate regulatory institution (such as the state bar association) in addition to being liable to the principal (the professional’s client) for failure to account.

Principal’s Duties to the Agent

The principal also has certain duties to the agent. These duties relate to compensation, reimbursement and indemnification, cooperation, and safe working conditions.

COMPENSATION In general, when a principal requests certain services from an agent, the agent reasonably expects payment. The principal therefore has a duty to pay the agent for services rendered. For example, when an accountant or an attorney is asked to act as an agent, an agreement to compensate the agent for this service is implied. The principal also has a duty to pay that compensation in a timely manner. Unless the agency relationship is gratuitous and the agent does not act in exchange for payment, the principal must pay the agreed-on value for the agent’s services. If no amount has been expressly agreed on, then the principal owes the agent the customary compensation for such services.

REIMBURSEMENT AND INDEMNIFICATION Whenever an agent disburses funds to fulfill the request of the principal or to pay for necessary expenses in the course of reasonable performance of her or his agency duties, the principal has the duty to reimburse the agent for these payments.¹⁰ Agents cannot recover for expenses incurred by their own misconduct or negligence, though.

Subject to the terms of the agency agreement, the principal has the duty to indemnify (compensate) an agent for liabilities incurred because of authorized and lawful acts and transactions. For example, if the agent, on the principal's behalf, forms a contract with a third party, and the principal fails to perform the contract, the third party may sue the agent for damages. In this situation, the principal is obligated to compensate the agent for any costs incurred by the agent as a result of the principal's failure to perform the contract.

Additionally, the principal must indemnify the agent for the value of benefits that the agent confers on the principal. The amount of indemnification usually is specified in the agency contract. If it is not, the courts will look to the nature of the business and the type of loss to determine the amount. Note that this rule applies to acts by gratuitous agents as well.

COOPERATION A principal has a duty to cooperate with the agent and to assist the agent in performing his or her duties. The principal must do nothing to prevent that performance. For example, when a principal grants an agent an exclusive territory, it creates an exclusive agency, in which the principal cannot compete with the agent or appoint or allow another agent to compete. If the principal does so, it violates the exclusive agency, and the principal is exposed to liability for the agent's lost profits. Suppose that Akers (the principal) creates an exclusive agency by granting Johnson (the agent) a territory within which only Johnson may sell Akers's products. If Akers begins to sell the products himself within Johnson's territory or permits another agent to do so, Akers has violated the exclusive agency and can be held liable for Johnson's lost profits.

SAFE WORKING CONDITIONS The common law requires the principal to provide safe working premises, equipment, and conditions for all agents and employees. The principal has a duty to inspect working areas and to warn agents and employees about any unsafe situations. When the agent is an employee, the employer's liability is frequently covered by state workers' compensation insurance, and federal and state statutes often require the employer to meet certain safety standards (see Chapter 34).

RIGHTS AND REMEDIES OF AGENTS AND PRINCIPALS

In general, for every duty of the principal, the agent has a corresponding right, and vice versa. When one party to the agency relationship violates his or her duty to the other party, the remedies available to the nonbreaching party arise out of contract and tort law. These remedies include monetary damages, termination of the agency relationship, an injunction, and required accountings.

Agent's Rights and Remedies against the Principal

The agent has the right to be compensated, to be reimbursed and indemnified, and to have a safe working environment. An agent also has the right to perform agency duties without interference by the principal.

TORT AND CONTRACT REMEDIES Remedies of the agent for breach of duty by the principal follow normal contract and tort remedies. For example, Aaron Hart, a builder who has just constructed a new house, contracts with a real estate agent, Fran Boller, to sell the house. The contract calls for the agent to have an exclusive ninety-day listing and to receive 6 percent of the selling price when the home is sold. Boller holds several open houses and shows the home to a number of potential buyers. One month before the ninety-day listing terminates, Hart agrees to sell the house to another buyer—not one to whom Boller has shown the house—after the ninety-day listing expires. Hart and the buyer agree that Hart will reduce the price of the house by 3 percent because he will sell it directly and thus will not have to pay Boller's commission. In this situation, if Boller learns of Hart's actions, she can terminate the agency relationship and sue Hart for damages, including the 6 percent commission she should have earned on the sale of the house.

10. This principle applies to acts by gratuitous agents as well. If a finder of a dog that becomes sick takes the dog to a veterinarian and pays the required fees for the veterinarian's services, the gratuitous agent is entitled to be reimbursed for those fees by the owner of the dog.

DEMAND FOR AN ACCOUNTING An agent can also withhold further performance and demand that the principal give an accounting. For example, a sales agent may demand an accounting if the agent and principal disagree on the amount of commissions the agent should have received for sales made during a specific period of time.

NO RIGHT TO SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE When the principal-agent relationship is not contractual, the agent has no right to specific performance. An agent can recover for past services and future damages but cannot force the principal to allow him or her to continue acting as an agent.

Principal's Rights and Remedies against the Agent

In general, a principal has contract remedies for an agent's breach of fiduciary duties. The principal also has tort remedies if the agent engages in misrepresentation, negligence, deceit, libel, slander, or trespass. In addition, any breach of a fiduciary duty by an agent may justify the principal's termination of the agency. The main actions available to the principal are constructive trust, avoidance, and indemnification.

CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST Anything that an agent obtains by virtue of the employment or agency relationship belongs to the principal. An agent commits a breach of fiduciary duty if he or she secretly retains benefits or profits that, by right, belong to the principal. For example, Lee, a purchasing agent for Metcalf, receives cash rebates from a customer. If Lee keeps the rebates for himself, he violates his fiduciary duty to his principal, Metcalf. On finding out about the cash rebates, Metcalf can sue Lee and recover them.

AVOIDANCE When an agent breaches the agency agreement or agency duties under a contract, the principal has a right to avoid any contract entered into with the agent. This right of avoidance is at the election of the principal.

INDEMNIFICATION In certain situations, when a principal is sued by a third party for an agent's negligent conduct, the principal can sue the agent for indemnification—that is, for an equal amount of damages. The same holds true if the agent violates the principal's instructions. For example, Parker (the principal) owns a used-car lot where Moore (the agent) works as a salesperson. Parker tells Moore to make no warranties for the used cars. Moore is eager to make a sale to Walters, a customer, and adds a 50,000-mile warranty for the car's engine. Parker may still be liable to Walters for engine failure, but if Walters sues Parker, Parker normally can then sue Moore for indemnification for violating his instructions.

Sometimes, it is difficult to distinguish between instructions of the principal that limit an agent's authority and those that are merely advice. For example, Gutierrez (the principal) owns an office supply company, and Logan (the agent) is the manager. Gutierrez tells Logan, "Don't purchase any more inventory this month." Gutierrez goes on vacation. A large order comes in from a local business, and the inventory on hand is insufficient to meet it. What is Logan to do? In this situation, Logan probably has the inherent authority to purchase more inventory despite Gutierrez's command. It is unlikely that Logan would be required to indemnify Gutierrez in the event that the local business subsequently canceled the order.

Agency Formation and Duties

James Blatt hired Marilyn Scott to sell insurance for the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co. Their contract stated, "Nothing in this contract shall be construed as creating the relationship of employer and employee." The contract was terminable at will by either party. Scott financed her own office and staff, was paid according to performance, had no taxes withheld from her checks, and could legally sell products of Massachusetts Mutual's competitors. But when Blatt learned that Scott was simultaneously selling insurance for Perpetual Life Insurance Corp., one of Massachusetts Mutual's fiercest competitors, Blatt withheld client contact information from Scott that would have assisted her insurance sales for Massachusetts Mutual. Scott complained to Blatt that he was inhibiting her ability to sell insurance for Massachusetts Mutual. Blatt subsequently terminated their contract. Scott filed a suit in a New York state court against Blatt and Massachusetts Mutual. Scott claimed that she had lost sales for Massachusetts Mutual—and her commissions—as a result of Blatt's withholding contact information from her. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Who is the principal and who is the agent in this scenario? By which method was an agency relationship formed between Scott and Blatt?
2. What facts would the court consider most important in determining whether Scott was an employee or an independent contractor?
3. How would the court most likely rule on Scott's employee status? Why?
4. Which of the four duties that Blatt owed Scott in their agency relationship has probably been breached?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

32-1. Agency Formation Paul Gett is a well-known, wealthy financial expert living in the city of Torris. Adam Wade, Gett's friend, tells Timothy Brown that he is Gett's agent for the purchase of rare coins. Wade even shows Brown a local newspaper clipping mentioning Gett's interest in coin collecting. Brown, knowing of Wade's friendship with Gett, contracts with Wade to sell a rare coin valued at $25,000 to Gett. Wade takes the coin and disappears with it. On the payment due date, Brown seeks to collect from Gett, claiming that Wade's agency made Gett liable. Gett does not deny that Wade was a friend, but he claims that Wade was never his agent. Discuss fully whether an agency was in existence at the time the contract for the rare coin was made.

32-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Duty of Loyalty.

Peter hires Alice as an agent to sell a piece of property he owns. The price is to be at least $30,000. Alice discovers that the fair market value of Peter's property is actually at least $45,000 and could be higher because a shopping mall is going to be built nearby. Alice forms a real estate partnership with her cousin Carl, and she prepares for Peter's signature a contract for the sale of the property to Carl for $32,000. Peter signs the contract. Just before closing and passage of title, Peter learns about the shopping mall and the increased fair market value of his property. Peter refuses to deed the property to Carl. Carl claims that Alice, as agent, solicited a price above that agreed on when the agency was created and that the contract is therefore binding and enforceable. Discuss fully whether Peter is bound to this contract.

32-3. Principal's Remedies against Agent Ankir is hired by Jamison as a traveling salesperson. Ankir not only solicits orders but also delivers the goods and collects payments from his customers. Ankir deposits all payments in his private checking account and at the end of each month draws sufficient cash from his bank to cover the payments made. Jamison is totally unaware of this procedure. Because of a slowdown in the economy, Jamison tells all his salespeople to offer 20 percent discounts on orders. Ankir solicits orders, but he offers only 15 percent discounts, pocketing the extra 5 percent paid by customers. Ankir has not lost any orders by this practice, and he is rated as one of Jamison's top salespersons. Jamison learns of Ankir's actions. Discuss fully Jamison's rights in this matter.

32-4. Agency Formation Ford Motor Credit Co. is a subsidiary of Ford Motor Co. with its own offices, officers, and directors. Ford Credit buys contracts and leases of automobiles entered into by dealers and consumers. Ford Credit also provides inventory financing for dealers' purchases of Ford and non-Ford vehicles and makes loans to Ford and non-Ford dealers. Dealers and consumers are not required to finance their purchases or leases of Ford vehicles through Ford Credit. Ford Motor is not a party to the agreements between Ford Credit and its customers and does not directly receive any payments under those agreements. Also, Ford Credit is not subject to any agreement with Ford Motor "restricting or conditioning" its ability to finance the dealers' inventories or the consumers' purchases or leases of vehicles. A number of plaintiffs filed a product liability suit in a Missouri state court against Ford Motor. Ford Motor claimed that the court did not have venue. The plaintiffs asserted that Ford Credit, which had an office in the jurisdiction, acted as Ford's "agent for the transaction of its usual and customary business" there. Is Ford Credit an agent of Ford Motor? Discuss. [State ex rel. Ford Motor Co. v. Bacon, 63 S.W.3d 641 (Mo. 2002)]

32-5. Agent's Duties to Principal Sam and Theresa Daigle decided to build a home in Cameron Parish, Louisiana. To obtain financing, they contacted Trinity United Mortgage Co. At a meeting with Joe Diez on Trinity's behalf, on July 18, 2001, the Daigles signed a temporary loan agreement with Union Planters Bank. Diez assured them that they did not need to make payments on this loan until their house was built and permanent financing had been secured. Because the Daigles did not make payments on the Union loan, Trinity declined to make the permanent loan. Meanwhile, Diez left Trinity's employ. On November 1, the Daigles moved into their new house. They tried to contact Diez at Trinity but were told that he was unavailable and would get back to them. Three weeks later, Diez came to the Daigles' home and had them sign documents that they believed were to secure a permanent loan but that were actually an application with Diez's new employer. Union filed a suit in a Louisiana state court against the Daigles for failing to pay on its loan. The Daigles paid Union, obtained permanent financing through another source, and filed a suit against Trinity to recover the cost. Who should have told the Daigles that Diez was no longer Trinity's agent? Could Trinity be liable to the Daigles on this basis? Explain. [*Daigle v. 32-6. Principal's Duties to Agent Josef Boehm was an officer and the majority shareholder of Alaska Industrial

Hardware, Inc. (AIH), in Anchorage, Alaska. In August 2001, Lincolnshire Management, Inc., in New York, created AIH Acquisition Corp. to buy AIH. The three firms signed a "commitment letter" to negotiate "a definitive stock purchase agreement" (SPA). In September, Harold Snow and Ronald Braley began to work, on Boehm's behalf, with Vincent Coyle, an agent for AIH Acquisition, to produce an SPA. They exchanged many drafts and dozens of e-mails. Finally, in February 2002, Braley told Coyle that Boehm would sign the SPA "early next week." That did not occur, however, and at the end of March, after more negotiations and drafts, Boehm demanded a larger payment. AIH Acquisition agreed, and, following more work by the agents, another SPA was drafted. In April, the parties met in Anchorage. Boehm still refused to sign. AIH Acquisition and others filed a suit in a federal district court against AIH. Did Boehm violate any of the duties that principals owe to their agents? If so, which duty, and how was it violated? Explain. [AIH Acquisition Corp., LLC v. Alaska Industrial Hardware, Inc., __ F.Supp.2d __ (S.D.N.Y. 2004)]

32-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Agent's Duties to Principal.

*In July 2001, John Warren viewed a condominium in Woodland Hills, California, as a potential buyer. Hildegard Merrill was the agent for the seller. Because Warren's credit rating was poor, Merrill told him he needed a co-borrower to obtain a mortgage at a reasonable rate. Merrill said that her daughter Charmaine would "go on title" until the loan and sale were complete if Warren would pay her $10,000. Merrill also offered to defer her commission on the sale as a loan to Warren so that he could make a 20 percent down payment on the property. He agreed to both plans. Merrill applied for and secured the mortgage in Charmaine's name alone by misrepresenting her daughter's address, business, and income. To close the sale, Merrill had Warren remove his name from the title to the property. In October, Warren moved into the condominium, repaid Merrill the amount of her deferred commission, and began paying the mortgage. Within a few months, Merrill had Warren evicted. Warren filed a suit in a California state court against Merrill and Charmaine. Who among these parties was in an agency relationship? What is the basic duty that an agent owes a principal? Was the duty breached here? Explain. [Warren v. Merrill, 143 Cal.App.4th 96, 49 Cal. Rptr.3d 122 (2 Dist. 2006)]*

32-8. Agent's Duties to Principal Su Ru Chen owned the Lucky Duck Fortune Cookie Factory in Everett, Massachusetts, which made Chinese-style fortune cookies for restaurants. In November 2001, Chen listed the business for sale with Bob Sun, a real estate broker, for $35,000. Sun's daughter Frances and her fiancé, Chiu Chung Chan, decided that Chan would buy the business. Acting as a broker on Chen's (the seller's) behalf, Frances asked about the Lucky Duck's finances. Chen said that each month the business sold at least 1,000 boxes of cookies at a $2,000 profit. Frances negotiated a price of $23,000, which Chan (her fiancé) paid. When Chan began to operate the Lucky Duck, it became clear that the demand for the cookies was actually about 500 boxes per month—a rate at which the business would suffer losses. Less than two months later, the factory closed. Chan filed a suit in a Massachusetts state court against Chen, alleging fraud, among other things. Chan’s proof included Frances’s testimony as to what Chen had said to her. Chen objected to the admission of this testimony. What is the basis for this objection? Should the court admit the testimony? Why or why not? [Chan v. Chen, 70 Mass.App.Ct. 79, 872 N.E.2d 1153 (2007)]

32-9. Agency by Ratification Wesley Hall, an independent contractor managing property for Acree Investments, Ltd., lost control of a fire he had set to clear ten acres of Acree land. The runaway fire burned seventy-eight acres of Earl Barrs’s property. Russell Acree, one of the owners of Acree Investments, had previously owned the ten acres, but he had put it into the company and was no longer the principal owner. Hall had worked for Russell Acree in the past and had told the state forestry department that he was burning the land for Acree. Barrs sued Russell Acree for the acts of his agent, Hall. In his suit, Barrs noted that Hall had been an employee of Russell Acree, Hall had talked about burning the land “for Acree,” Russell Acree had apologized to Barrs for the fire, and Acree Investments had not been identified as the principal property owner until Barrs had filed his lawsuit. Barrs argued that those facts were sufficient to create an agency by ratification to impose liability on Russell Acree. Was Barrs’s agency by ratification claim valid? Why or why not? [Barrs v. Acree, 691 S.E.2d 575 (Ga.App. 2010)]

32-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Agency Formation and Duties.

Emergency One, Inc. (EO), makes fire and rescue vehicles. Western Fire Truck, Inc., contracted with EO to be its exclusive dealer in Colorado and Wyoming through December 2003. James Costello, a Western salesperson, was authorized to order EO vehicles for his customers. Without informing Western, Costello e-mailed EO about Western’s difficulties in obtaining cash to fund its operations. He asked about the viability of Western’s contract and his possible employment with EO. On EO’s request, and in disregard of Western’s instructions, Costello sent some payments for EO vehicles directly to EO. In addition, Costello, with EO’s help, sent a competing bid to a potential Western customer. EO’s representative e-mailed Costello, “You have my permission to kick [Western’s] ass.” In April 2002, EO terminated its contract with Western, which, after reviewing Costello’s e-mail, fired Costello. Western filed a suit in a Colorado state court against Costello and EO, alleging, among other things, that Costello breached his duty as an agent and that EO aided and abetted the breach. [Western Fire Truck, Inc. v. Emergency One, Inc., 134 P.3d 570 (Colo.App. 2006)]

- (a) Was there an agency relationship between Western and Costello? Western required monthly reports from its sales staff, but Costello did not report regularly. Does this indicate that Costello was not Western’s agent? In determining whether an agency relationship exists, is the right to control or the fact of control more important? Explain.
- (b) Did Costello owe Western a duty? If so, what was the duty? Did Costello breach it? If so, how?
- (c) A Colorado state statute allows a court to award punitive damages in “circumstances of fraud, malice, or willful and wanton conduct.” Did any of these circumstances exist in this case? Should punitive damages be assessed against either defendant? Why or why not?

Agency Liability and Termination

As discussed in the previous chapter, the law of agency focuses on the special relationship that exists between a principal and an agent—how the relationship is formed and the duties the principal and agent assume once the relationship is established. This chapter deals with another important aspect of agency law—the liability of principals and agents to third parties.

We look first at the liability of principals for contracts formed by agents with third parties. Generally, the liability of the principal will depend on whether the agent was authorized to form the contract. The second part of the chapter deals with an agent's liability to third parties in contract and tort, and the principal's liability to third parties because of an agent's torts. The chapter concludes with a discussion of how agency relationships are terminated.

SECTION 1 SCOPE OF AGENT'S AUTHORITY

The liability of a principal to third parties with whom an agent contracts depends on whether the agent had the authority to enter into legally binding contracts on the principal's behalf. An agent's authority can be either actual (express or implied) or apparent. If an agent contracts outside the scope of his or her authority, the principal may still become liable by ratifying the contract.

Express Authority

Express authority is authority declared in clear, direct, and definite terms. Express authority can be given orally or in writing.

THE EQUAL DIGNITY RULE In most states, the equal dignity rule requires that if the contract being executed is or must be in writing, then the agent's authority must also be in writing. Failure to comply with the equal dignity rule can make a contract voidable at the option of the principal. The law regards the contract at that point as a mere offer. If the principal decides to accept the offer, the acceptance must be ratified, or affirmed, in writing.

Assume that Paloma (the principal) orally asks Austin (the agent) to sell a ranch that Paloma owns. Austin finds a buyer and signs a sales contract (a contract for an interest in realty must be in writing) on behalf of Paloma to sell the ranch. The buyer cannot enforce the contract unless Paloma subsequently ratifies Austin's agency status in writing. Once the contract is ratified, either party can enforce rights under the contract.

Modern business practice allows an exception to the equal dignity rule. An executive officer of a corporation normally is not required to obtain written authority from the corporation to conduct ordinary business transactions. The equal dignity rule does not apply when the agent acts in the presence of the principal or when the agent's act of signing is merely perfunctory (token or customary). Thus, if Healy (the principal) negotiates a contract but is called out of town the day it is to be signed and orally authorizes Santini to sign, the oral authorization is sufficient.

POWER OF ATTORNEY Giving an agent a power of attorney confers express authority.¹ The power of attorney is a written document and is usually notarized. (A document is notarized when a notary public—a public official authorized to attest to the authenticity of signatures—signs and dates the document and imprints it with her or his seal of authority.) Most states have statutory provisions for creating a power of attorney. A power of attorney can be special (permitting the agent to perform specified acts only), or it can be general (permitting the agent to transact all business for the principal). Because of the extensive authority granted to an agent by a general power of attorney (see Exhibit 33–1 below), it should be used with great caution and usually only in exceptional circumstances. Ordinarily, a power of

1. An agent who holds a power of attorney is called an attorney-in-fact for the principal. The holder does not have to be an attorney-at-law (and often is not).

Implied Authority

An agent has the implied authority to do what is reasonably necessary to carry out express authority and accomplish the objectives of the agency. Authority can also be implied by custom or inferred from the position the agent occupies. For example, Archer is employed by Packard Grocery to manage one of its stores. Packard has not expressly stated that Archer has authority to contract with third persons. Nevertheless, authority to manage a business implies authority to do what is reasonably required (as is customary or can be inferred from a manager's position) to operate the business. This includes forming contracts to hire employees, to buy merchandise and equipment, and to advertise the products sold in the store.

In general, implied authority is authority customarily associated with the position occupied by the agent or authority that can be inferred from the express authority given to the agent to perform fully his or her duties. For example, an agent has authority to solicit orders for goods sold by the principal. The agent, however, does not carry any goods with him when soliciting orders, and thus generally would not have the authority to collect payments for the goods. The test is whether it was reasonable for the agent to believe that she or he had the authority to enter into the contract in question.

Also note that an agent's implied authority cannot contradict his or her express authority. Thus, if a principal has limited an agent's authority—by forbidding a manager to enter into contracts to hire additional workers, for example—then the fact that managers customarily would have such authority is irrelevant.

Apparent Authority

Actual authority (express or implied) arises from what the principal makes clear to the agent. Apparent authority, in contrast, arises from what the principal causes a third party to believe. An agent has apparent authority when the principal, by either word or action, causes a third party reasonably to believe that the agent has authority to act, even though the agent has no express or implied authority.

A PATTERN OF CONDUCT Apparent authority usually comes into existence through a principal's pattern of conduct over time. For example, Ashley is a traveling salesperson with the authority to solicit orders for a principal's goods. Because she does not carry any goods with her, she normally would not have the implied authority to collect payments from customers on behalf of the principal. Suppose that she does accept payments from Cabo Enterprises, however, and submits them to the principal's accounting department for processing. If the principal does nothing to stop Ashley from continuing this practice, a pattern develops over time, and the principal confers apparent authority on Ashley to accept payments from Cabo.

In the following case, an employee misappropriated more than $1 million from her employer by using his credit card without authorization over a number of years. The issue before the court was whether the employee had apparent authority to use the card.

CASE 33.1 Azur v. Chase Bank, USA

www.ca3.uscourts.gov^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • ATM Corporation of America, Inc. (ATM), manages settlement services for large national lenders. Francis Azur, the founder of ATM, served as its president and chief executive officer until September 2007, when ATM was sold. In July 1997, ATM hired Michelle Vanek to be Azur's personal assistant. Vanek's responsibilities included opening Azur's personal bills, preparing and CASE 33.1 CONTINUED ♦ presenting checks for Azur to sign, balancing Azur’s checking and savings accounts, and reviewing his credit-card and bank statements. Vanek also had access to Azur’s credit-card number so that she could make purchases for him. Over a period of seven years, Vanek withdrew unauthorized cash advances of between $200 and $700, typically twice a day, from Azur’s credit-card account with Chase Bank, USA. The fraudulent charges were reflected on at least sixty-five monthly billing statements sent by Chase to Azur, and Vanek paid the bills by either writing checks and forging Azur’s signature or making online payments from Azur’s checking account. In all, Vanek misappropriated more than $1 million from Azur. When Azur discovered Vanek’s fraudulent scheme in 2006, he terminated her employment and closed the Chase account. Azur sued Chase, seeking reimbursement of the fraudulent charges under Section 1643 of the Truth-in-Lending Act, or TILA.^b A magistrate judge concluded that Azur’s claim failed because Vanek had apparent authority to use Azur’s credit card. The trial court—a U.S. district court—agreed and granted Chase’s motion for summary judgment on this issue. Azur appealed.

FISHER, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

* * * [Section 1643 of the TILA] provides that “[a] cardholder shall be liable for the unauthorized use of a credit card” in certain circumstances. The term “unauthorized use” is defined as the “use of a credit card by a person other than the cardholder who does not have actual, implied, or apparent authority for such use and from which the cardholder receives no benefit.” [Emphasis added.]

To determine whether apparent authority exists, we turn to applicable state agency law. * * * Citing the Restatement (Second) of Agency, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court has explained as follows:

Apparent authority is power to bind a principal which the principal has not actually granted but which he leads persons with whom his agent deals to believe that he has granted. Persons with whom the agent deals can reasonably believe that the agent has power to bind his principal if, for instance, the principal knowingly permits the agent to exercise such power or if the principal holds the agent out as possessing such power.

* * * *

* * * A cardholder may, in certain circumstances, vest a fraudulent user with the apparent authority to use a credit card by enabling the continuous payment of the credit card charges over a period of time.

Here, Azur’s negligent omissions led Chase to reasonably believe that the fraudulent charges were authorized. Although Azur may not have been aware that Vanek was using the Chase credit card, or even that the Chase credit card account existed, Azur knew that he had a Dollar Bank checking account, and he did not review his Dollar Bank statements or exercise any other oversight over Vanek, his employee. * * * Had Azur occasionally reviewed his statements, Azur would have likely noticed that checks had been written to Chase. Because Chase reasonably believed that a prudent business person would oversee his employees in such a manner, Chase reasonably relied on the continuous payment of the fraudulent charges.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit affirmed the trial court’s judgment, holding that Azur had vested Vanek with apparent authority to use the Chase credit card.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • The TILA essentially is a consumer-protection law. How does allowing a credit-card company to avoid liability—if a card user has apparent authority to use the card—protect consumers?

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • Business owners and managers should take precautions to avoid being held liable, under a theory of apparent authority, for unauthorized credit-card charges made by their employees. Any employee who has access to the employer’s credit-card number, credit-card statements, bank accounts, and other financial data should be carefully supervised. The employer should periodically review bank statements and credit-card payments to ensure that no checks have been forged and that all payments to credit-card companies are for authorized charges.

b. Among other things, the Truth-in-Lending Act (TILA) protects holders of credit cards from liability for the fraudulent use of their credit cards. (See Chapter 45 for a detailed discussion of this consumer-protection statute.)

APPARENT AUTHORITY AND ESTOPPEL The doctrine of agency by estoppel (introduced in Chapter 32) may be applied in situations in which a principal has given a third party reason to believe that an agent has authority to act. If the third party changes position to his or her detriment in good faith reliance on the principal's representations, the principal may be estopped (prevented) from denying that the agent had authority.

In the following case, the court applied the doctrine of estoppel to a situation involving a question of apparent authority or, as the court referred to it, "ostensible authority."

Ermoian v. Desert Hospital

Court of Appeal of California, Fourth District, 152 Cal.App.4th 475, 61 Cal.Rptr.3d 754 (2007).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In 1990, Desert Hospital in California established a comprehensive perinatal services program (CPSP) to provide obstetrical care to women who were uninsured (perinatal is often defined as relating to the period from about the twenty-eighth week of pregnancy to around one month after birth). The CPSP was set up in an office suite across from the hospital and named "Desert Hospital Outpatient Maternity Services Clinic." The hospital contracted with a corporation controlled by Dr. Morton Gubin, which employed Dr. Masami Ogata, to provide obstetrical services. In January 1994, Jackie Shahan went to the hospital's emergency room because of cramping and other symptoms. The emergency room physician told Shahan that she was pregnant and referred her to the clinic. Shahan visited the clinic throughout her pregnancy. On May 15, Shahan's baby, Amanda Ermoian, was born with brain abnormalities that left her severely mentally retarded and unable to care for herself. Her conditions could not have been prevented, treated, or cured in utero. Through a guardian, Amanda filed a suit in a California state court against the hospital and others, alleging "wrongful life." She claimed that the defendants negligently failed to inform her mother of her abnormalities before her birth, depriving her mother of the opportunity to make an informed choice to terminate the pregnancy. The court ruled in the defendants' favor, holding, among other things, that the hospital was not liable because Drs. Gubin and Ogata were not its employees. Amanda appealed to a state intermediate appellate court, contending that the physicians were the hospital's "ostensible agents."

KING, J. [Judge]

* * * *

Agency may be either actual or ostensible [apparent]. Actual agency exists when the agent is really employed by the principal. Here, there was evidence that the physicians were not employees of the Hospital, but were physicians with a private practice who contracted with the Hospital to perform obstetric services at the clinic. The written contract between the Hospital and Dr. Gubin's corporation (which employed Dr. Ogata) describes Dr. Gubin and his corporation as "independent contractors with, and not as employees of, [the] Hospital." [Maria Sterling, a registered nurse at the clinic and Shahan's CPSP case coordinator] testified that Drs. Gubin and Ogata, not the Hospital, provided the obstetric services to the clinic's patients. Donna McCloudy, a director of nursing [who set up the CPSP] at the Hospital, testified that while the Hospital provided some aspects of the CPSP services, "independent physicians * * * provided the obstetrical care * * * ." Based upon such evidence, the [trial] court reasonably concluded that the physicians were not the employees or actual agents of the Hospital for purposes of vicarious [indirect] liability.

Ostensible [apparent] agency on the other hand, may be implied from the facts of a particular case, and if a principal by his acts has led others to believe that he has conferred authority upon an agent, he cannot be heard to assert, as against third parties who have relied thereon in good faith, that he did not intend to confer such power * * * . The doctrine establishing the principles of liability for the acts of an ostensible agent rests on the doctrine of estoppel. The essential elements are representations by the principal, justifiable reliance thereon by a third party,

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 33.2 CONTINUED ♦ and change of position or injury resulting from such reliance. Before recovery can be had against the principal for the acts of an ostensible agent, the person dealing with an agent must do so with belief in the agent's authority and this belief must be a reasonable one. Such belief must be generated by some act or neglect by the principal sought to be charged and the person relying on the agent's apparent authority must not be guilty of neglect. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Here, the Hospital held out the clinic and the personnel in the clinic as part of the Hospital. Furthermore, it was objectively reasonable for Shahan to believe that Drs. Gubin and Ogata were employees of the Hospital. The clinic was located across the street from the Hospital. It used the same name as the Hospital and labeled itself as an outpatient clinic. Numerous professionals at the clinic were employees of the Hospital. [Carol Cribbs, a comprehensive perinatal health worker at the clinic] and Sterling indicated to Shahan that they were employees of the Hospital and that the program was run by the Hospital. Sterling personally set up all of Shahan's appointments at the main Hospital rather than giving Shahan a referral for the various tests. Shahan was referred by individuals in the emergency room specifically to Dr. Gubin. When she called for an appointment she was told by the receptionist that she was calling the Hospital outpatient clinic which was the clinic of Dr. Gubin. On days when Shahan would see either Dr. Gubin or Dr. Ogata at the clinic, she would also see either Cribbs or Sterling, whom she knew were employed by the Hospital.

* * * At her first appointment she signed a document titled "patient rights and responsibilities," which would unambiguously lead a patient to the conclusion that the clinic "was a one-stop shop for the patient," and that all individuals at the clinic were connected with the Hospital. All of Shahan's contacts with the physicians were at the Hospital-run clinic. Most, if not all, of the physician contacts occurred in conjunction with the provision of other services by either Sterling or Cribbs. The entire appearance created by the Hospital, and those associated with it, was that the Hospital was the provider of the obstetrical care to Shahan.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court decided that, contrary to the lower court's finding, Drs. Gubin and Ogata were "ostensible agents of the Hospital." The appellate court affirmed the lower court's ruling, however, on Amanda's "wrongful life" claim, concluding that the physicians were not negligent in failing to advise Shahan to have an elective abortion.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Does a principal have an ethical responsibility to inform an unaware third party that an apparent (ostensible) agent does not in fact have authority to act on the principal's behalf?

THE E-COMMERCE DIMENSION • Could Amanda have established Drs. Gubin and Ogata's apparent authority if Desert Hospital had maintained a Web site that advertised the services of the CPSP clinic and stated clearly that the physicians were not its employees? Explain.

Emergency Powers

When an unforeseen emergency demands action by the agent to protect or preserve the property and rights of the principal, but the agent is unable to communicate with the principal, the agent has emergency power. For example, Fulsom is an engineer for Pacific Drilling Company. While Fulsom is acting within the scope of his employment, he is severely injured in an accident at an oil rig many miles from home. Acosta, the rig supervisor, directs Thompson, a physician, to give medical aid to Fulsom and to charge Pacific for the medical services. Acosta, an agent, has no express or implied authority to bind the principal, Pacific Drilling, for Thompson's medical services. Because of the emergency situation, however, the law recognizes Acosta as having authority to act appropriately under the circumstances.

Ratification

Ratification occurs when the principal affirms, or accepts responsibility for, an agent's unauthorized act. When ratification occurs, the principal is bound to the agent's act, and the act is treated as if it had been authorized by the principal from the outset. Ratification can be either express or implied.

If the principal does not ratify the contract, the principal is not bound, and the third party's agreement with the agent is viewed as merely an unaccepted offer. Because the third party's agreement is an unaccepted offer, the third party can revoke it at any time, without liability, before the principal ratifies the contract. The agent, however, may be liable to the third party for misrepresenting her or his authority.

The requirements for ratification can be summarized as follows:

1. The agent must have acted on behalf of an identified principal who subsequently ratifies the action.
2. The principal must know all of the material facts involved in the transaction. If a principal ratifies a contract without knowing all of the facts, the principal can rescind (cancel) the contract.³
3. The principal must affirm the agent's act in its entirety.
4. The principal must have the legal capacity to authorize the transaction at the time the agent engages in the act and at the time the principal ratifies. The third party must also have the legal capacity to engage in the transaction.
5. The principal's affirmation (ratification) must occur before the third party withdraws from the transaction.

3. If the third party has changed position in reliance on the apparent contract, however, the principal can rescind but must reimburse the third party for any costs.

6. The principal must observe the same formalities when ratifying the act as would have been required to authorize it initially.

Concept Summary 33.1 below summarizes the rules concerning an agent's authority to bind the principal and a third party.

LIABILITY FOR CONTRACTS

Liability for contracts formed by an agent depends on how the principal is classified and on whether the actions of the agent were authorized or unauthorized. Principals are classified as disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed.⁴

A disclosed principal is a principal whose identity is known by the third party at the time the contract is made by the agent. A partially disclosed principal is a principal whose identity is not known by the third party, but the third party knows that the agent is or may be acting for a principal at the time the contract is made. An undisclosed principal is a principal whose identity is totally unknown by the third party, and the third party has no knowledge that the agent is acting in an agency capacity at the time the contract is made.

4. Restatement (Third) of Agency, Section 1.04 (2).

CONCEPT SUMMARY 33.1

Authority of an Agent to Bind the Principal and a Third Party

Authority of Agent	Definition	Effect on Principal and Third Party
Express Authority	Authority expressly given by the principal to the agent.	Principal and third party are bound in contract.
Implied Authority	Authority implied (1) by custom, (2) from the position in which the principal has placed the agent, or (3) because such authority is necessary if the agent is to carry out expressly authorized duties and responsibilities.	Principal and third party are bound in contract.
Apparent Authority	Authority created when the conduct of the principal leads a third party to believe that the principal's agent has authority.	Principal and third party are bound in contract.
Unauthorized Acts	Acts committed by an agent that are outside the scope of his or her express, implied, or apparent authority.	Principal and third party are not bound in contract— unless the principal ratifies prior to the third party's withdrawal.

Authorized Acts

If an agent acts within the scope of her or his authority, normally the principal is obligated to perform the contract regardless of whether the principal was disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed. Whether the agent may also be held liable under the contract, however, depends on the disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed status of the principal.

DISCLOSED OR PARTIALLY DISCLOSED PRINCIPAL A disclosed or partially disclosed principal is liable to a third party for a contract made by the agent. If the principal is disclosed, the agent has no contractual liability for the nonperformance of the principal or the third party. If the principal is partially disclosed, in most states the agent is also treated as a party to the contract, and the third party can hold the agent liable for contractual nonperformance.⁵

CASE IN POINT Walgreens leased commercial property at a mall owned by Kedzie Plaza Associates to operate a drugstore. A property management company, Taxman Corporation, signed the lease on behalf of the principal, Kedzie. The lease required the landlord to keep the sidewalks free of snow and ice, so Taxman, on behalf of Kedzie, contracted with another company to remove ice and snow from the sidewalks surrounding the Walgreens store. When a Walgreens employee slipped on ice outside the store and was injured, she sued Taxman, among others, for negligence. Because the principal's identity (Kedzie) was fully disclosed in the snow-removal contract, however, the court ruled that the agent, Taxman, could not be held liable. Taxman did not assume a contractual obligation to remove the snow but merely retained a contractor to do so on behalf of the owner.⁶

UNDISCLOSED PRINCIPAL When neither the fact of an agency relationship nor the identity of the principal is disclosed, the undisclosed principal is bound to perform just as if the principal had been fully disclosed at the time the contract was made.

When a principal's identity is undisclosed and the agent is forced to pay the third party, the agent is entitled to be indemnified (compensated) by the principal. The principal had a duty to perform, even though his or her identity was undisclosed,⁷ and failure to do so will make the principal ultimately liable.

5. Restatement (Third) of Agency, Section 6.02.

6. McBride v. Taxman Corp., 327 Ill.App.3d 992, 765 N.E.2d 51 (2002).

7. If the agent is a gratuitous agent, and the principal accepts the benefits of the agent's contract with a third party, then the principal will be liable to the agent on the theory of quasi contract (see Chapter 10).

Once the undisclosed principal's identity is revealed, the third party generally can elect to hold either the principal or the agent liable on the contract.

Conversely, the undisclosed principal can require the third party to fulfill the contract, unless (1) the undisclosed principal was expressly excluded as a party in the written contract; (2) the contract is a negotiable instrument signed by the agent with no indication of signing in a representative capacity;⁸ or (3) the performance of the agent is personal to the contract, allowing the third party to refuse the principal's performance.

Unauthorized Acts

If an agent has no authority but nevertheless contracts with a third party, the principal cannot be held liable on the contract. It does not matter whether the principal was disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed. The person who acted as an agent is liable, however. For example, Updike signs a contract for the purchase of a truck, purportedly acting as an agent under authority granted by Parker. In fact, Parker has not given Updike any such authority. Parker refuses to pay for the truck, claiming that Updike had no authority to purchase it. The seller of the truck is entitled to hold Updike liable for payment.

If an agent for a disclosed or partially disclosed principal contracts with a third party without authorization, the third party who relied on the agency status can also hold the agent liable for breaching the implied warranty of authority. The agent's liability here is based on the third party's reliance on the agent's purported authority, not on the breach of the contract itself.⁹ For example, Pinnell, a reclusive artist, hires Auber to solicit offers for particular paintings from various galleries, but does not authorize her to enter into sales agreements. Olaf, a gallery owner, offers to buy two of Pinnell's paintings for an upcoming show. If Auber draws up a sales contract with Olaf, she impliedly warrants that she has the authority to enter into sales contracts on behalf of Pinnell. If Pinnell does not agree to ratify Auber's sales contract, Olaf cannot hold Pinnell liable, but he can hold Auber liable for breaching the implied warranty of authority.

Note that if the third party knows at the time the contract is made that the agent does not have authority, then the agent is not liable. Similarly, if the agent expressed to the third party uncertainty as to the extent of her or his authority, the agent is not personally liable.

8. Under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), only the agent is liable if the instrument neither names the principal nor shows that the agent signed in a representative capacity [UCC 3-402(b)(2)].

9. The agent is not liable on the contract, because the agent was never intended personally to be a party to the contract.

Actions by E-Agents

Although in the past standard agency principles applied only to human agents, today these same agency principles also apply to e-agents. An electronic agent, or e-agent, is a semiautonomous computer program that is capable of executing specific tasks. E-agents used in e-commerce include software that can search through many databases and retrieve only relevant information for the user.

The Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA), which was discussed on pages 233 to 239 in Chapter 11, sets forth provisions relating to the principal's liability for the actions of e-agents. According to Section 15 of the UETA, e-agents can enter into binding agreements on behalf of their principals—at least, in those states that have adopted the act. Thus, if consumers place an order over the Internet, and the company (principal) takes the order via an e-agent, the company cannot later claim that it did not receive the order.

The UETA also stipulates that if an e-agent does not provide an opportunity to prevent errors at the time of the transaction, the other party to the transaction can avoid the transaction. Therefore, if an e-agent fails to provide an on-screen confirmation of a purchase or sale, the other party can avoid the effect of any errors. For example, Bigelow wants to purchase three copies of three different books (a total of nine items). The e-agent mistakenly records an order for thirty-three of a single book and does not provide an on-screen verification of the order. If thirty-three books are then sent to Bigelow, he can avoid the contract to purchase them.

LIABILITY FOR TORTS AND CRIMES

Obviously, any person, including an agent, is liable for his or her own torts and crimes. Whether a principal can also be held liable for an agent's torts and crimes depends on several factors, which we examine here. In some situations, a principal may be held liable not only for the torts of an agent, but also for torts committed by an independent contractor.

Principal's Tortious Conduct

A principal who acts through an agent may be liable for harm resulting from the principal's own negligence or recklessness. Therefore, a principal may be liable if he or she gives improper instructions, authorizes the use of improper materials or tools, or establishes improper rules that result in the agent's committing a tort. For instance, Peter knows that Audrey's driver's license has been suspended but nevertheless tells her to use the company truck to deliver some equipment to a customer. If someone is injured as a result, Peter will be liable for his own negligence in instructing Audrey to drive without a valid license.

Principal's Authorization of Agent's Tortious Conduct

Similarly, a principal who authorizes an agent to commit a tort may be liable to persons or property injured thereby, because the act is considered to be the principal's. For example, Pagani directs his agent, Atkin, to cut the corn on specific acreage, which neither of them has the right to do. The harvest is therefore a trespass (a tort), and Pagani is liable to the owner of the corn.

Note that an agent acting at the principal's direction can be liable as a tortfeasor (one who commits a wrong, or tort), along with the principal, for committing the tortious act even if the agent was unaware that the act was wrong. Assume in the above example that Atkin, the agent, did not know that Pagani lacked the right to harvest the corn. Atkin can still be held liable to the owner of the field for damages, along with Pagani, the principal.

Liability for Agent's Misrepresentation

A principal is exposed to tort liability whenever a third person sustains a loss due to the agent's misrepresentation. The principal's liability depends on whether the agent was actually or apparently authorized to make representations and whether the representations were made within the scope of the agency. The principal is always directly responsible for an agent's misrepresentation made within the scope of the agent's authority.

Suppose that Ainsley is a demonstrator for Pavlovich's products. Pavlovich sends Ainsley to a home show to demonstrate the products and to answer questions from consumers. Pavlovich has given Ainsley authority to make statements about the products. If Ainsley makes only true representations, all is fine. But if he makes false claims, Pavlovich will be liable for any injuries or damages sustained by third parties in reliance on Ainsley's false representations.

APPARENT IMPLIED AUTHORITY When a principal has placed an agent in a position of apparent authority—making it possible for the agent to defraud a third party—the principal may also be liable for the agent’s fraudulent acts. For example, Joan Ableman is a loan officer at First Security Bank. In the ordinary course of her job, Ableman approves and services loans and has access to the credit records of all customers. Ableman falsely represents to a borrower, McMillan, that the bank feels insecure about McMillan’s loan and intends to call it in unless McMillan provides additional collateral, such as stocks and bonds. McMillan gives Ableman numerous stock certificates, which Ableman keeps in her own possession and later uses as collateral to take out a personal loan. The bank is liable to McMillan for any losses sustained on the stocks even though the bank was unaware of the fraudulent scheme.

If, in contrast, Ableman had been a recently hired junior bank teller rather than a loan officer when she told McMillan that the bank required additional security for the loan, McMillan would not have been justified in relying on her representation. In that situation, the bank normally would not be liable to McMillan for any the losses sustained.

As will be discussed in Chapter 37, partners in a partnership generally have the apparent implied authority to act as agents on behalf of the firm. Thus, if one of the partners commits a tort or a crime, the partnership itself—and often the other partners personally—can be held liable for the loss.

CASE IN POINT Selheimer & Company, a securities broker-dealer that operated as a partnership, provided various financial services. The managing partner, Perry Selheimer, embezzled funds that clients had turned over to the firm for investment. After Selheimer was convicted, other partners in the firm claimed that they were not liable for losses resulting from his illegal activities. The court, however, held that Selheimer had apparent implied authority to act in the ordinary course of the partnership’s business. Thus, the firm, as principal, was liable, and under the law of partnerships, the personal assets of the individual partners could be used to cover the firm’s liability.¹⁰

INNOCENT MISREPRESENTATION Tort liability based on fraud requires proof that a material misstatement was made knowingly and with the intent to deceive. An agent’s innocent mistakes occurring in a contract transaction or involving a warranty contained in the contract can provide grounds for the third party’s rescission of the contract and the award of damages. Moreover, justice dictates that when a principal knows that an agent is not accurately advised of facts but does not correct either the agent’s or the third party’s impressions, the principal is directly responsible to the third party for resulting damages. The point is that the principal is always directly responsible for an agent’s misrepresentation made within the scope of authority.

Liability for Agent’s Negligence

Under the doctrine of respondent superior,¹¹ the principal-employer is liable for any harm caused to a third party by an agent-employee within the scope of employment. This doctrine imposes vicarious liability, or indirect liability, on the employer—that is, liability without regard to the personal fault of the employer for torts committed by an employee in the course or scope of employment.¹² Third parties injured through the negligence of an employee can sue either that employee or the employer, if the employee’s negligent conduct occurred while the employee was acting within the scope of employment.

When an agent commits a negligent act, can the agent, as well as the principal, be held liable? That was the issue in the following case.

10. In re Selheimer & Co., 319 Bankr. 395 (E.D.Pa. 2005).

11. Pronounced ree-spahn-dee-uht soo-peer-ee-your. The doctrine of respondent superior applies not only to employer-employee relationships but also to other principal-agent relationships in which the principal has the right of control over the agent.

12. The theory of respondent superior is similar to the theory of strict liability covered in Chapter 7.

Desert Images,
LLC (SDI) was hired by Warner’s employer, Aegis Communications (Aegis), to perform landscaping and weed control. On September 29, 2003, SDI employee [David] Hoggatt began spraying an herbicide on weeds on the property around Aegis’s building. * * * After approximately an hour and a half of spraying, Hoggatt was informed that people inside Aegis’s building were complaining. The herbicide spray had entered the building through its air conditioning system and had circulated throughout the building. After being informed of the situation, Hoggatt stopped spraying. Emergency services arrived as the building was being evacuated. Employees in the building complained of respiratory problems and itching and burning eyes.

Prior to and during the evacuation, [an Aegis employee, Catherine] Warner began having difficulty breathing, was coughing violently, and felt burning in her eyes, nose, and throat. As she exited the building, Warner began to feel faint and felt “extreme chest pain” and heart palpitations. Warner had had [two heart attacks in the past], and had undergone heart surgery in May 2003. * * * She was then transported by ambulance to the hospital, where she was treated and released after about four hours. * * * [It was later determined that Warner had suffered a heart attack on the day of the evacuation. She continued to experience health complications that she blamed on exposure to the spray.]

Warner sued SDI for negligence in September 2004, later amending her complaint to include * * *

Hoggatt [and several others as defendants].

* * * *

The jury found SDI to be completely responsible for the injuries Warner suffered by inhaling the herbicide. * * * It awarded Warner $3,825 in compensatory damages and costs against SDI. [Warner appealed.]

On the last day of trial, the court entered a directed verdict in favor of Hoggatt because “the evidence [wa]s undisputed that Mr. Hoggatt [had] acted within the scope of his employment for [SDI],” and, thus, that SDI was “clearly liable in situation for whatever damages the jury does find in this matter.” There was no dispute at trial that Hoggatt had been negligent * * *.

We agree with Warner that “there was no legal basis for the court’s decision to dismiss Hoggatt from the action.” It is well-established law that an agent will not be excused from responsibility for tortious conduct merely because he is acting for his principal. [Also, as stated in the Restatement (Third) of Agency], “An agent is subject to liability to a third party harmed by the agent’s tortious conduct. Unless an applicable statute provides otherwise, an actor remains subject to liability although the actor acts * * * within the scope of employment.” [Emphasis added.]

Hoggatt cites no authority suggesting this rule should not apply in this case. He does, however, argue the error was harmless. * * * Hoggatt asserts Warner was not prejudiced [injured] because “the jury apportioned one hundred percent of the fault to SDI. Adding other possible parties to the jury verdict form would not have changed the outcome of this case.” We agree that including Hoggatt as a defendant throughout the trial could not have changed Warner’s damage award, and Warner does not argue otherwise. Nor is there a need for the jury to apportion fault between Hoggatt and SDI—the liability of those parties is joint and several.

That the error does not warrant a new trial, however, does not mean it was not prejudicial to Warner. She has a right to recover her damages from Hoggatt, and his improper dismissal has deprived her of that right. Accordingly, we reverse the trial court’s grant of a directed verdict in Hoggatt’s favor and amend the judgment in Warner’s favor to show it is against Hoggatt as well.

QUESTIONS

1. Why should Hoggatt be personally liable if he merely followed the instructions of his employer, SDI, given that the employer is better able financially to pay the judgment and may have insurance that covers the matter?
2. How could SDI reduce the likelihood of similar lawsuits occurring in the future?

RATIONALE UNDERLYING THE DOCTRINE OF RESPONDEAT SUPERIOR

At early common law, a servant (employee) was viewed as the master’s (employer’s) property. The master was deemed to have absolute control over the servant’s acts and was held strictly liable for them, no matter how carefully the master supervised the servant. The rationale for the doctrine of respondereat superior is based on the social duty that requires every person to manage his or her affairs, whether accomplished by the person or through agents, so as not to injure another. Liability is imposed on employers because they are deemed to be in a better financial position to bear the loss. The superior financial position carries with it the duty to be responsible for damages.

Generally, public policy requires that an injured person be afforded effective relief, and a business enterprise is usually better able to provide that relief than is an individual employee. Employers normally carry liability insurance to cover any damages awarded as a result of such lawsuits. They are also able to spread the cost of risk over the entire business enterprise.

The doctrine of respondereat superior, which the courts have applied for nearly two centuries, continues to have practical implications in all situations involving principal-agent (employer-employee) relationships. Today, the small-town grocer with one clerk and the multinational corporation with thousands of employees are equally subject to the doctrinal demand of “let the master respond.” (Keep this principle in mind when you read through Chapters 34 and 35.)

THE SCOPE OF EMPLOYMENT The key to determining whether a principal may be liable for the torts of an agent under the doctrine of respondent superior is whether the torts are committed within the scope of the agency or employment. Courts may consider the following factors in determining whether a particular act occurred within the course and scope of employment:

1. Whether the employee’s act was authorized by the employer.
2. The time, place, and purpose of the act.
3. Whether the act was one commonly performed by employees on behalf of their employers.
4. The extent to which the employer’s interest was advanced by the act.
5. The extent to which the private interests of the employee were involved.
6. Whether the employer furnished the means or instrumentality (for example, a truck or a machine) by which an injury was inflicted.
7. Whether the employer had reason to know that the employee would perform the act in question and whether the employee had done it before.
8. Whether the act involved the commission of a serious crime.

THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN A “DETOUR” AND A “FROLIC” A useful insight into the concept of “scope of employment” may be gained from Judge Baron Parke’s classic distinction between a “detour” and a “frolic” in the case of Joel v. Morison (1834).¹³ In this case, the English court held that if a servant merely took a detour from his master’s business, the master will be responsible. If, however, the servant was on a “frolic of his own” and not in any way “on his master’s business,” the master will not be liable.

Consider an example. Mandel, a traveling salesperson, while driving his employer’s vehicle to call on a customer, decides to stop at the post office—which is one block off his route—to mail a personal letter. As Mandel approaches the post office, he negligently runs into a parked vehicle owned by Chan. In this situation, because Mandel’s detour from the employer’s business is not substantial, he is still acting within the scope of employment, and the employer is liable. The result would be different, though, if Mandel had decided to pick up a few friends for cocktails in another city and in the process had negligently run his vehicle into Chan’s. In that circumstance, the departure from the employer’s business would be substantial, and the employer normally would not be liable to Chan for damages. Mandel would be considered to have been on a “frolic” of his own.

EMPLOYEE TRAVEL TIME An employee going to and from work or to and from meals usually is considered to be outside the scope of employment. In contrast, all travel time of traveling salespersons or others whose jobs require them to travel normally is considered to be within the scope of employment for the duration of the business trip, including the return trip home, unless there is a significant departure from the employer’s business.

NOTICE OF DANGEROUS CONDITIONS The employer is charged with knowledge of any dangerous conditions discovered by an employee and pertinent to the employment situation. Suppose that Brad, a maintenance employee in an apartment building, notices a lead pipe protruding from the ground in the building’s courtyard. Brad neglects either to fix the pipe or to inform his employer of the danger. John trips on the pipe and is injured. The employer is charged with knowledge of the dangerous condition regardless of whether Brad actually informed the employer. That knowledge is imputed to the employer by virtue of the employment relationship.

BORROWED SERVANTS Employers sometimes lend the services of their employees to other employers. Suppose that an employer leases ground-moving equipment to another employer and sends along an employee to operate the machinery. Who is liable for injuries caused by the employee’s negligent actions on the job site?

Liability turns on which employer had the primary right to control the employee at the time the injuries occurred. Generally, the employer who rents out the equipment is presumed to retain control over her or his employee. If the rental is for a relatively long period of time, however, control may be deemed to pass to the employer who is renting the equipment and presumably controlling and directing the employee.

13. 6 Car. & P. 501, 172 Eng.Rep. 1338 (1834).

Liability for Agent's Intentional Torts

Most intentional torts that employees commit have no relation to their employment; thus, their employers will not be held liable. Nevertheless, under the doctrine of respondeat superior, the employer can be liable for intentional torts of the employee that are committed within the course and scope of employment, just as the employer is liable for negligence. For example, an employer is liable when an employee (such as a “bouncer” at a nightclub or a security guard at a department store) commits the tort of assault and battery or false imprisonment while acting within the scope of employment.

In addition, an employer who knows or should know that an employee has a propensity for committing tortious acts is liable for the employee's acts even if they would not ordinarily be considered within the scope of employment. For example, if an employer hires a bouncer knowing that he has a history of arrests for criminal assault and battery, the employer may be liable if the employee viciously attacks a patron in the parking lot after hours.

An employer is also liable for permitting an employee to engage in reckless actions that can injure others. For example, an employer observes an employee smoking while filling containerized trucks with highly flammable liquids. Failure to stop the employee will cause the employer to be liable for any injuries that result if a truck explodes. Needless to say, most employers purchase liability insurance to cover their potential liability for employee conduct in many situations (see Chapter 51).

Liability for Independent Contractor's Torts

Generally, an employer is not liable for physical harm caused to a third person by the negligent act of an independent contractor in the performance of the contract. This is because the employer does not have the right to control the details of an independent contractor's performance. Courts make an exception to this rule when the contract involves unusually hazardous activities, such as blasting operations, the transportation of highly volatile chemicals, or the use of poisonous gases. In these situations, an employer cannot be shielded from liability merely by using an independent contractor. Strict liability is imposed on the employer-principal as a matter of law. Also, in some states, strict liability may be imposed by statute.

Liability for Agent's Crimes

An agent is liable for his or her own crimes. A principal or employer is not liable for an agent's or employee's crime simply because the agent or employee committed the crime while otherwise acting within the scope of authority or employment. An exception to this rule is made when the principal or employer participated in the crime by conspiracy or other action. In some jurisdictions, under specific statutes, a principal may be liable if an agent, in the course and scope of employment, violates regulations such as those governing sanitation, prices, weights, and the sale of liquor.

TERMINATION OF AN AGENCY

Agency law is similar to contract law in that both an agency and a contract may be terminated by an act of the parties or by operation of law. Once the relationship between the principal and the agent has ended, the agent no longer has the right (actual authority) to bind the principal. For an agent's apparent authority to be terminated, though, third persons may also need to be notified that the agency has been terminated.

Termination by Act of the Parties

An agency relationship may be terminated by act of the parties in any of the following ways:

1. Lapse of time. When an agency agreement specifies the time period during which the agency relationship will exist, the agency ends when that time period expires. For example, Akers signs an agreement of agency with Janz “beginning January 1, 2012, and ending December 31, 2014.” The agency is automatically terminated on December 31, 2014. If no definite time is stated, then the agency continues for a reasonable time and can be terminated at will by either party. What constitutes a reasonable time depends on the circumstances and the nature of the agency relationship.
2. Purpose achieved. If an agent is employed to accomplish a particular objective, such as the purchase of breeding stock for a cattle rancher, the agency automatically ends after the cattle have been purchased. If more than one agent is employed to accomplish the same purpose, such as the sale of real estate, the first agent to complete the sale automatically terminates the agency relationship for all the others.

3. Occurrence of a specific event. When an agency relationship is to terminate on the happening of a certain event, the agency automatically ends when the event occurs. For example, if Posner appoints Rubik to handle her business affairs while she is away, the agency automatically terminates when Posner returns.
4. Mutual agreement. The parties to an agency can cancel (rescind) their contract by mutually agreeing to terminate the agency relationship, whether the agency contract is in writing or whether it is for a specific duration.
5. Termination by one party. As a general rule, either party can terminate the agency relationship—because agency is a consensual relationship, and thus neither party can be compelled to continue in the relationship. The agent's act is said to be a renunciation of authority. The principal's act is a revocation of authority. Although both parties may have the power to terminate the agency, they may not possess the right to terminate and therefore may be liable for breach of contract, or wrongful termination.

WRONGFUL TERMINATION Wrongful termination can subject the canceling party to a lawsuit for breach of contract. For example, Rawlins has a one-year employment contract with Munro to act as agent in return for $65,000. Although Munro has the power to discharge Rawlins before the contract period expires, if he does so, he can be sued for breaching the contract because he had no right to terminate the agency.

Even in an agency at will—that is, an agency that either party may terminate at any time—the principal who wishes to terminate must give the agent reasonable notice. The notice must be at least sufficient to allow the agent to recoup his or her expenses and, in some situations, to make a normal profit.

AGENCY COUPLED WITH AN INTEREST A special rule applies in an agency coupled with an interest. This type of agency is not an agency in the usual sense because it is created for the agent's benefit instead of for the principal's benefit. For example, Julie borrows $5,000 from Rob, giving Rob some of her jewelry and signing a letter authorizing him to sell the jewelry as her agent if she fails to repay the loan. After Julie receives the $5,000 from Rob, she attempts to revoke his authority to sell the jewelry as her agent. Julie will not succeed in this attempt because a principal cannot revoke an agency created for the agent's benefit.

An agency coupled with an interest should not be confused with a situation in which the agent merely derives proceeds or profits from the sale of the subject matter. For example, an agent who merely receives a commission from the sale of real property does not have a beneficial interest in the property itself.

NOTICE OF TERMINATION When an agency has been terminated by act of the parties, it is the principal's duty to inform any third parties who know of the existence of the agency that it has been terminated (notice of the termination may be given by others, however).

Although an agent's actual authority ends when the agency is terminated, an agent's apparent authority continues until the third party receives notice (from any source) that such authority has been terminated. If the principal knows that a third party has dealt with the agent, the principal is expected to notify that person directly. For third parties who have heard about the agency but have not yet dealt with the agent, constructive notice is sufficient.¹⁴

No particular form is required for notice of termination of the principal-agent relationship to be effective. The principal can personally notify the agent, or the agent can learn of the termination through some other means. For example, Manning bids on a shipment of steel, and Stone is hired as an agent to arrange transportation for the shipment. When Stone learns that Manning has lost the bid, Stone's authority to make the transportation arrangement terminates. If the agent's authority is written, however, normally it must be revoked in writing (unless the written document contained an expiration date).

Termination by Operation of Law

Certain events terminate agency authority automatically because their occurrence makes it impossible for the agent to perform or improbable that the principal would continue to want performance. We look at these events here. Note that when an agency terminates by operation of law, there is no duty to notify third persons—unless the agent's authority is coupled with an interest.

1. Death or insanity. The general rule is that the death or insanity of either the principal or the agent automatically and immediately terminates an ordinary agency relationship.¹⁵ Knowledge of the death or insanity is not required. For example, Grey sends Bosley to Japan to purchase a rare book. Before Bosley makes the purchase, Grey dies. Bosley's agent status is terminated at the moment of Grey's death, even though Bosley does not know that Grey has died. (Some states, however, have enacted statutes that change the common law rule to require an agent's knowledge of the principal's death before termination.)

14. With constructive notice of a fact, knowledge of the fact is imputed by law to a person if he or she could have discovered the fact by proper diligence. Constructive notice is often accomplished by publication in a newspaper.

15. An exception to this rule exists in the bank-customer relationship. A bank, as agent, can continue to exercise specific types of authority even after the customer's death or insanity, and can continue to pay checks drawn by the customer for ten days after death (see page 523 in Chapter 27).

An agent's transactions that occur after the death of the principal normally are not binding on the principal's estate. Assume that McCoy had an individual checking account and that he later authorized his live-in girlfriend, Kaye, to write checks on that account. The girlfriend is merely McCoy's agent and is not a joint account holder. If McCoy dies, Kaye's authority to write checks on the account is terminated. Thus, if Kaye writes checks on this account after McCoy's death, McCoy's estate is not bound by her acts. If the bank was aware of McCoy's death and paid the checks, it will be liable to the estate for the amount of the checks.¹⁶

- 2. Impossibility. When the specific subject matter of an agency is destroyed or lost, the agency terminates. For example, Gonzalez employs Arnez to sell Gonzalez's house. Prior to any sale, the house is destroyed by fire. Arnez's agency and authority to sell the house terminate. Similarly, when it is impossible for the agent to perform the agency lawfully because of a change in the law, the agency terminates.

- 3. Changed circumstances. When an event occurs that has such an unusual effect on the subject matter of the agency that the agent can reasonably infer that the principal will not want the agency to continue, the agency terminates. Suppose that Baird hires Joslen to sell a tract of land for $40,000. Subsequently, Joslen learns that there is oil under the land and that the land is therefore worth $1 million. The agency and Joslen's authority to sell the land for $40,000 are terminated.
- 4. Bankruptcy. If either the principal or the agent petitions for bankruptcy, the agency is usually terminated. In certain circumstances, such as when the agent's financial status is irrelevant to the purpose of the agency, the agency relationship may continue. Insolvency (the inability to pay debts when they come due or when liabilities exceed assets), as distinguished from bankruptcy, does not necessarily terminate the relationship.
- 5. War. When the principal's country and the agent's country are at war with each other, the agency is terminated. In this situation, the agency is automatically suspended or terminated because there is no way to enforce the legal rights and obligations of the parties.

See Concept Summary 33.2 below and on the following page for a synopsis of the rules governing the termination of an agency.

16. See, for example, Sturgill v. Virginia Citizens Bank, 223 Va. 394, 291 S.E.2d 207 (1982).

CONCEPT SUMMARY 33.2

Termination of an Agency

Method of Termination	Rules	Termination of Agent's Authority
Act of the Parties 1. Lapse of time. 2. Purpose achieved. 3. Occurrence of a specific event. 4. Mutual agreement. 5. At the option of one party (revocation, if by principal; renunciation, if by agent).	Automatic at end of the stated time. Automatic on the completion of the purpose. Normally automatic on the happening of the event. Mutual consent required. Either party normally has a right to terminate the agency but may lack the power to do so; wrongful termination can lead to liability for breach of contract.	Notice to Third Parties Required— 1. Direct to those who have dealt with agency. 2. Constructive to all others.

Method of Termination	Rules	Termination of Agent's Authority
Operation of Law 1. Death or insanity. 2. Impossibility—destruction of the specific subject matter. 3. Changed circumstances. 4. Bankruptcy. 5. War between principal's country and agent's country.	Automatic on the death or insanity of either the principal or the agent (except when the agency is coupled with an interest). Applies any time the agency cannot be performed because of an event beyond the parties' control. Events so unusual that it would be inequitable to allow the agency to continue to exist. Bankruptcy petition (not mere insolvency) usually terminates the agency. Automatically suspends or terminates agency—no way to enforce legal rights.	No Notice Required— Automatic on the happening of the event.

REVIEWING

Agency Liability and Termination

Lynne Meyer, on her way to a business meeting and in a hurry, stopped at a Buy-Mart store for a new pair of nylons to wear to the meeting. There was a long line at one of the checkout counters, but a cashier, Valerie Watts, opened another counter and began loading the cash drawer. Meyer told Watts that she was in a hurry and asked Watts to work faster. Instead, Watts, only slowed her pace. At this point, Meyer hit Watts. It is not clear whether Meyer hit Watts intentionally or, in an attempt to retrieve the nylons, hit her inadvertently. In response, Watts grabbed Meyer by the hair and hit her repeatedly in the back of the head, while Meyer screamed for help. Management personnel separated the two women and questioned them about the incident. Watts was immediately fired for violating the store's no-fighting policy. Meyer subsequently sued Buy-Mart, alleging that the store was liable for the tort (assault and battery) committed by its employee. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

- Under what doctrine discussed in this chapter might Buy-Mart be held liable for the tort committed by Watts?
- What is the key factor in determining whether Buy-Mart is liable under this doctrine?
- How is Buy-Mart's potential liability affected by whether Watts's behavior constituted an intentional tort or a tort of negligence?
- Suppose that when Watts applied for the job at Buy-Mart, she disclosed in her application that she had previously been convicted of felony assault and battery. Nevertheless, Buy-Mart hired Watts as a cashier. How might this fact affect Buy-Mart's liability for Watts's actions?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

33-1. Agent's Authority Adam is a traveling salesperson for Peter Petri Plumbing Supply Corp. Adam has express authority to solicit orders from customers and to offer a 5 percent discount if payment is made within thirty days of delivery. Petri has said nothing to Adam about extending credit. Adam calls on a new prospective customer, John's Plumbing Firm. John tells Adam that he will place a large order for Petri products if Adam will give him a 10 percent discount with payment due in equal installments thirty, sixty, and ninety days from delivery. Adam says he has authority to make such a contract. John calls Petri and asks if Adam is authorized to make contracts giving a discount. No mention is made of payment terms. Petri replies that Adam has authority to give discounts on purchase orders. On the basis of this information, John orders $10,000 worth of plumbing supplies and fixtures. The goods are delivered and are being sold. One week later, John receives a bill for $9,500, due in thirty days. John insists he owes only $9,000 and can pay it in three equal installments, at thirty, sixty, and ninety days from delivery. Discuss the liability of Petri and John only.

33-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Unauthorized Acts.

Janell Arden is a purchasing agent-employee for the A&B Coal Supply partnership. Arden has authority to purchase the coal needed by A&B to satisfy the needs of its customers. While Arden is leaving a coal mine from which she has just purchased a large quantity of coal, her car breaks down. She walks into a small roadside grocery store for help. While there, she encounters Will Wilson, who owns 360 acres back in the mountains with all mineral rights. Wilson, in need of cash, offers to sell Arden the property for $1,500 per acre. On inspection of the property, Arden forms the opinion that the subsurface contains valuable coal deposits. Arden contracts to purchase the property for A&B Coal Supply, signing the contract "A&B Coal Supply, Janell Arden, agent." The closing date is August 1. Arden takes the contract to the partnership. The managing partner is furious, as A&B is not in the property business. Later, just before closing, both Wilson and the partnership learn that the value of the land is at least $15,000 per acre. Discuss the rights of A&B and Wilson concerning the land contract.

33-3. Ratification by Principal Springer was a political candidate running for Congress. He was operating on a tight budget and instructed his campaign staff not to purchase any campaign materials without his explicit authorization. In spite of these instructions, one of his campaign workers ordered DUBYCHEK Printing Co. to print some promotional materials for Springer's campaign. When the printed materials arrived, Springer did not return them but instead used them during his campaign. When Springer failed to pay for the materials, DUBYCHEK sued for recovery of the price. Springer contended that he was not liable on the sales contract because he had not authorized his agent to purchase the printing services. DUBYCHEK argued that the campaign worker was Springer's agent and that the worker had authority to make the printing contract. Additionally, DUBYCHEK claimed that even if the purchase was unauthorized, Springer's use of the materials constituted ratification of his agent's unauthorized purchase. Is DUBYCHEK correct? Explain.

33-4. Respondeat Superior ABC Tire Corp. hires Arnez as a traveling salesperson and assigns him a geographic area and time schedule in which to solicit orders and service customers. Arnez is given a company car to use in covering the territory. One day, Arnez decides to take his personal car to cover part of his territory. It is 11:00 A.M., and Arnez has just finished calling on all customers in the city of Tarrytown. His next appointment is at 2:00 P.M. in the city of Austex, twenty miles down the road. Arnez starts out for Austex, but halfway there he decides to visit a former college roommate who runs a farm ten miles off the main highway. Arnez is enjoying his visit with his former roommate when he realizes that it is 1:45 P.M. and that he will be late for the appointment in Austex. Driving at a high speed down the country road to reach the main highway, Arnez crashes his car into a tractor, severely injuring Thomas, the driver of the tractor. Thomas claims that he can hold ABC Tire

Corp. liable for his injuries. Discuss fully ABC's liability in this situation.

33-5. Liability for Independent Contractor's Torts Dean Brothers Corp. owns and operates a steel drum manufacturing plant. Lowell Wyden, the plant superintendent, hired Best Security Patrol, Inc. (BSP), a security company, to guard Dean property and "deter thieves and vandals." Some BSP security guards, as Wyden knew, carried firearms. Pete Sidell, a BSP security guard, was not certified as an armed guard but nevertheless brought his gun, in a briefcase, to work. While working at the Dean plant on October 31, 2010, Sidell fired his gun at Tyrone Gaines, in the belief that Gaines was an intruder. The bullet struck and killed Gaines. Gaines's mother filed a lawsuit claiming that her son's death was the result of BSP's negligence, for which Dean was responsible. What is the plaintiff's best argument that Dean is responsible for BSP's actions? What is Dean's best defense? Explain.

33-6. Principal's Liability for Contracts In 1998, William Larry Smith signed a lease for certain land in Chilton County, Alabama, owned by Sweet Smitherman. The lease stated that it was between "Smitherman, and WLS, Inc., d/b/a [doing business as] S&H Mobile Homes," and the signature line identified the lessee as "WLS, Inc. d/b/a S&H Mobile Homes. . . . By: William Larry Smith, President." The amount of the rent was $5,000, payable by the tenth of each month. All of the checks that Smitherman received for the rent identified the owner of the account as "WLS Corporation d/b/a S&H Mobile Homes." Nearly four years later, Smitherman filed a suit in an Alabama state court against William Larry Smith, alleging that he owed $26,000 in unpaid rent. Smith responded, in part, that WLS was the lessee and that he was not personally responsible for the obligation to pay the rent. Is Smith a principal, an agent, both a principal and an agent, or neither? In any event, in the lease, is the principal disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed? With the answers to these questions in mind, who is liable for the unpaid rent, and why? Discuss. [Smith v. Smitherman, 887 So.2d 285 (Ala.Civ.App. 2004)]

33-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Apparent Authority.

Lee Dennegar and Mark Knutson lived in Dennegar's house in Raritan, New Jersey. Dennegar paid the mortgage and other household expenses. With Dennegar's consent, Knutson managed their household's financial affairs and the "general office functions concerned with maintaining the house." Dennegar allowed Knutson to handle the mail and "to do with it as he chose." Knutson wrote checks for Dennegar to sign, although Knutson signed Dennegar's name to many of the checks with Dennegar's consent. AT&T Universal issued a credit card in Dennegar's name in February 2001. Monthly statements were mailed to Dennegar's house, and payments were sometimes made on those statements. Knutson died in June 2003. The unpaid charges on the card of $14,752.93 were assigned to New Century Financial Services, Inc. New Century filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against Dennegar to collect the unpaid amount. Dennegar claimed that he never applied for or used the card and knew nothing about it. Under what theory could Dennegar be liable for the charges? Explain. [New Century Financial Services, Inc. v. Dennegar, 394 N.J.Super. 595, 928 A.2d 48 (A.D. 2007)]

33-8. Undisclosed Principal Homeowners Jim and Lisa Criss hired Kevin and Cathie Pappas, doing business as Outside Creations, to undertake a landscaping project. Kevin signed the parties' contract as "Outside Creations Rep." The Crisses made payments on the contract with checks payable to Kevin, who deposited them in his personal account—there was no Outside Creations account. Later, alleging breach of contract, the Crisses filed a suit in a Georgia state court against the Pappases. The defendants contended that they could not be liable because the contract was not with them personally. They claimed that they were the agents of Forever Green Landscaping and Irrigation, Inc., which had been operating under the name "Outside Creations" at the time of the contract and had since filed for bankruptcy. The Crisses pointed out that the name "Forever Green" was not in the contract. Can the Pappases be liable on this contract? Why or why not? [Pappas v. Criss, 296 Ga.App. 803, 676 S.E.2d 21 (2009)]

33-9. Liability Based on Actual or Apparent Authority Summerall Electric Co. and other subcontractors were hired by National Church Services, Inc. (NCS), which was the general contractor on a construction project for the Church of God at Southaven. As work progressed, payments from NCS to the subcontractors were late and eventually stopped altogether. The church had paid NCS in full for the entire project beforehand, but apparently NCS had mismanaged the project. When payments from NCS stopped, the subcontractors filed mechanic's liens (see page 546 in Chapter 28) for the value of the work they had performed but for which they had not been paid. The subcontractors sued the church, contending that it was liable for the payments because NCS was its agent on the basis of either actual or apparent authority. Was NCS an agent for the church, thereby making the church liable to the subcontractors? Explain your reasoning. [Summerall Electric Co. v. Church of God at Southaven, 25 So.3d 1090 (App.Miss. 2010)]

33-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Power of Attorney.

Warren Davis lived with Renee Brandt in a house that Davis owned in Virginia Beach, Virginia. At Davis's request, attorney Leigh Ansell prepared, and Davis acknowledged, a durable power of attorney appointing Ansell to act as Davis's attorney-in-fact. Ansell was authorized to sign "any . . . instrument of . . . deposit" and "any contract . . . relating to . . . personal property." Ansell could act "in any circumstances as fully and effectively as I could do as part of my normal, everyday business affairs if acting personally." A few days later, at Davis's direction, Ansell prepared, and Davis signed, a will that gave Brandt the right to occupy, rent-free, the house in which she and Davis lived "so long as she lives in the premises." The will's other chief beneficiaries were Davis's daughters, Sharon Jones and Jody Clark. According to Ansell, Davis intended to "take care of [Brandt] outside of this will" and asked Ansell to designate Brandt the beneficiary "payable on death" (POD) of Davis's $250,000 certificate of deposit (CD). The CD had no other named beneficiary. Less than two months later, Davis died. A suit between Brandt and Davis's daughters ensued in a Virginia state court. [Jones v. Brandt, 274 Va. 131, 645 S.E.2d 312 (2007)]

Liability in Agency Relationships

CHAPTER 34

Employment, Immigration, and Labor Law

Until the early 1900s, most employer-employee relationships were governed by the common law. Even today, under the common law employment-at-will doctrine, private employers are generally free to hire and fire workers at will, unless doing so violates an employee's contractual or statutory rights. Now, however, there are numerous statutes and administrative agency regulations that regulate the workplace. Thus, to a large extent, statutory law has displaced common law doctrines.

In this chapter, we look at the most significant laws regulating employment relationships. We deal with other important laws regulating the workplace—those that prohibit employment discrimination—in the next chapter.

EMPLOYMENT AT WILL

Traditionally, employment relationships have generally been governed by the common law doctrine of employment at will. Under this doctrine, either party may terminate the employment relationship at any time and for any reason, unless doing so would violate the provisions of an employment contract or a statute. The majority of U.S. workers continue to have the legal status of “employees at will.” In other words, this common law doctrine is still in widespread use, and only one state (Montana) does not apply the doctrine.

Nonetheless, as mentioned in the chapter introduction, federal and state statutes governing employment relationships prevent the doctrine from being applied in a number of circumstances. Today, an employer is not permitted to fire an employee if doing so would violate a federal or state employment statute, such as one prohibiting employment termination for discriminatory reasons (see Chapter 35). Note that the distinction made under agency law (discussed in Chapter 32) between employee status and independent-contractor status is important here. The employment laws that will be discussed in this chapter and in Chapter 35 apply only to the employer-employee relationship. They do not apply to independent contractors.

Exceptions to the Employment-at-Will Doctrine

Under the employment-at-will doctrine, as mentioned, an employer may hire and fire employees at will (regardless of the employees' performance) without liability, unless the decision violates the terms of an employment contract or statutory law. Because of the harsh effects of the employment-at-will doctrine for employees, courts have carved out various exceptions to this doctrine. These exceptions are based on contract theory, tort theory, and public policy.

EXCEPTIONS BASED ON CONTRACT THEORY Some courts have held that an implied employment contract exists between the employer and the employee. If the employee is fired outside the terms of the implied contract, he or she may succeed in an action for breach of contract even though no written employment contract exists.

For example, an employer's manual or personnel bulletin may state that, as a matter of policy, workers will be dismissed only for good cause. If the employee is aware of this policy and continues to work for the employer, a court may find that there is an implied contract based on the terms stated in the manual or bulletin. Generally, the key consideration in determining whether an employment manual creates an implied contractual obligation is the employee's reasonable expectations.

Courts in a few states have gone further and held that all employment contracts contain an implied covenant of good faith. This means that both sides promise to abide by the contract in good faith. If an employer fires an employee for an arbitrary or unjustified reason, the employee can claim that the covenant of good faith was breached and the contract violated.

Increasingly, employers and their employees are negotiating the terms of employment contracts via e-mail and other forms of electronic communication. See this chapter's Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature on the next page for a discussion of whether the promises that employers make to employees in e-mail exchanges are enforceable in court.

EXCEPTIONS BASED ON TORT THEORY In some situations, the discharge of an employee may give rise to an action for wrongful discharge under tort theories. Abusive discharge procedures may result in a lawsuit for intentional infliction of emotional distress or defamation. In addition, some courts have permitted workers to sue their employers under the tort theory of fraud. Under this theory, an employer may be held liable for making false promises to a prospective employee if the person detrimentally relies on the employer's representations by taking the job.

Suppose that an employer induces a prospective employee to leave a lucrative position and move to another state by offering "a long-term job with a thriving business." In fact, the employer is having significant financial problems. Furthermore, the employer is planning a merger that will result in the elimination of the position offered to the prospective employee. If the person takes the job in reliance on the employer's representations and is laid off shortly thereafter, he or she may be able to bring an action against the employer for fraud.¹

EXCEPTIONS BASED ON PUBLIC POLICY Most often, a common law exception to the employment-at-will doctrine is made on the basis of public policy. Courts may apply this exception when an employer fires a worker for reasons that violate a fundamental public policy of the jurisdiction. Generally, the courts require that the public policy involved be expressed clearly in the statutory law governing the jurisdiction.

For example, employers with fifty or more employees are required by the federal Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA—see page 664) to give employees up to twelve weeks of unpaid family or medical leave per year. Mila's employer has only forty employees and thus is not covered by the law. Nonetheless, if Mila is fired from her job because she takes three weeks of unpaid family leave to help her son through a difficult surgery, a court may deem that the employer's actions violated the public policy expressed in the FMLA.

An exception may also be made when an employee "blows the whistle" on an employer's wrongdoing. Whistleblowing occurs when an employee tells government authorities, upper-level managers, or the media that her or his employer is engaged in some unsafe or illegal activity. Whistleblowers on occasion have been protected from wrongful discharge for reasons of public policy.² Normally, however, whistleblowers seek protection from retaliatory discharge under federal and state statutory laws, such as the Whistleblower Protection Act of 1989.³

Wrongful Discharge

Whenever an employer discharges an employee in violation of an employment contract or a statutory law protecting employees, the employee may bring an action for wrongful discharge. Even if an employer's actions do not violate any express employment contract or statute, the employer may still be subject to liability under a common law doctrine, such as a tort theory or agency. For example, if an employer discharges a female employee and publicly discloses private facts about her sex life to her co-workers, the employee could bring a wrongful discharge suit based on an invasion of privacy (see Chapter 6).

WAGE AND HOUR LAWS

In the 1930s, Congress enacted several laws regulating the wages and working hours of employees. In 1931, Congress passed the Davis-Bacon Act,⁴ which requires contractors and subcontractors working on

SHIFTING LEGAL PRIORITIES FOR BUSINESS

The Online Creation and Modification of Employment Contracts

Today, e-mail is used in nearly every aspect of the employment environment—from workplace communications to negotiations of contracts with employees. As you learned in Chapter 15, under the one-year rule of the Statute of Frauds, most employment contracts must be in writing. But electronic communications, including e-mail, instant messages, text messages, and even Twitter, can be used as evidence to show that a contract existed or that the parties modified their contract.

Moreover, although many employment contracts include traditional integration clauses stating that the contract can be modified only by a signed writing, such a clause may not necessarily prevent e-mail modifications. Under the federal E-Sign Act and the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (both discussed in Chapter 11), what constitutes a signed writing has changed. A court cannot refuse to enforce a contract solely because it is contained in an electronic record, and a name typed at the end of an e-mail can be a signature.

E-Mail Evidence That an Employment Contract Existed

The court applied this rule in a recent case. Robert Moroni negotiated a deal to provide consulting services for Medco Health Solutions, Inc., a third party administrator of prescription-drug plans. Medco sent Moroni an e-mail setting forth the details of the parties' agreement. Moroni e-mailed a counteroffer, proposing that he would work on Medco's projects two days a week for thirteen months, in exchange for $17,000 per month ($204,000 annually), plus travel expenses. Medco accepted via e-mail, and Moroni began performing the contract, but Medco refused to pay him. Moroni sued for breach of contract. Medco argued that no enforceable contract existed and that the e-mail exchange showed only an agreement to agree. The court, however, ruled that the e-mail amounted to an agreement to the essential terms of an employment contract.^a

E-Mail Modifications of an Employment Contract

In another case, Arthur Stevens sold his public relations firm in New York to Publicis, S.A., a French global communications company. (S.A. stands for Société Anonyme, the French equivalent of a U.S. corporation.) The sale involved two contracts: a stock purchase agreement (SPA) and an employment contract. Stevens received an initial payment of more than $3 million under the SPA and stood to receive additional payments of up to $4 million over the next three years, depending on the new company's earnings. The employment contract allowed Stevens to stay on as chief executive officer (CEO) of the new company for three years and contained an integration clause that required any modification to be in a signed writing.

Within six months of the sale, however, the new company had lost $900,000 and was not meeting revenue and profit targets. Stevens was removed as CEO and given the option of leaving the firm or staying to develop new business. An agent of Publicis then e-mailed Stevens another option, giving him specific information on the responsibilities he could assume. Within a day, Stevens sent an e-mail stating, "I accept your proposal with total enthusiasm and excitement." The message also said that he was "psyched" about his new position. Nevertheless, Stevens later sued Publicis, claiming that it had breached the terms of his original employment contract by not keeping him on as CEO. The court, however, held that in the e-mail exchanges, Stevens had accepted the proposed modification of his employment contract in a signed writing. Because the e-mail modification was binding, Stevens could not sue Publicis.^b

Communication with potential and actual employees via Twitter, instant messaging, Facebook, MySpace, and e-mail has become common. Managers must understand that a court may review the entire thread of such communications and determine that the exchange is sufficient to create an agreement about the essential terms of a contract. Thus, any form of online communication about a job or a modification of an employment agreement must be treated as if it were part of actual contract negotiations.

federal government construction projects to pay "prevailing wages" to their employees. In 1936, the Walsh-Healey Act⁵ was passed. This act requires that a minimum wage, as well as overtime pay at 1.5 times regular pay rates, be paid to employees of manufacturers or suppliers entering into contracts with agencies of the federal government.

In 1938, Congress passed the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA).⁶ This act extended wage-hour requirements to cover all employers engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce, plus selected other types of businesses. Here, we examine the FLSA's provisions in regard to child labor, minimum wages, and overtime.

Child Labor

The FLSA prohibits oppressive child labor. Children under fourteen years of age are allowed to do certain types of work, such as deliver newspapers, work for their parents, and be employed in the entertainment and (with some exceptions) agricultural areas. Children who are fourteen or fifteen years of age are allowed to work, but not in hazardous occupations. There are also numerous restrictions on how many hours per day and per week children can work.

Working times and hours are not restricted for persons between the ages of sixteen and eighteen, but they cannot be employed in hazardous jobs or in jobs detrimental to their health and well-being. None of these restrictions apply to those over the age of eighteen.

Minimum Wages

The FLSA provides that a minimum wage of $7.25 per hour must be paid to employees in covered industries. Congress periodically revises this minimum wage.⁷ Under the FLSA, employers who customarily furnish food or lodging to employees can deduct the reasonable cost of those services from the employees' wages.

Overtime Provisions and Exemptions

Under the FLSA, any employee who works more than forty hours per week must be paid no less than 1.5 times her or his regular pay for all hours over forty. Note that the FLSA overtime provisions apply only after an employee has worked more than forty hours per week. Thus, employees who work for ten hours a day, four days per week, are not entitled to overtime pay, because they do not work more than forty hours per week.

Certain employees—usually administrative, executive, and professional employees, as well as outside salespersons and computer programmers—are exempt from the FLSA's overtime provisions. Employers are not required to pay overtime wages to exempt employees. An employer can voluntarily pay overtime to ineligible employees but cannot waive or reduce the overtime requirements of the FLSA.

An executive employee is one whose primary duty is management. An employee's primary duty is determined by what he or she does that is of principal value to the employer, not by how much time the employee spends doing particular tasks. An employer cannot deny overtime wages to an employee based only on the employee's job title, however, and must be able to show that the employee's primary duty qualifies her or him for an exemption.⁸

CASE IN POINT Starbucks hired Kevin Keevican as a barista to wait on customers, operate the cash register, make drinks, and clean the equipment. Eventually, he was promoted to manager. As manager, Keevican worked seventy hours a week for $650 to $800, a 10 to 20 percent bonus, and fringe benefits, such as paid sick leave, which were not available to baristas. Keevican quit and, along with other former managers, filed a claim against Starbucks for unpaid overtime. The managers admitted that they had performed many managerial tasks, but argued that they had spent 70 to 80 percent of their time on barista chores and thus were not executive employees. The court, however, found that each manager was "the single highest-ranking employee in his [or her] particular store and was responsible on site for that store's day-to-day overall operations." Therefore, each manager's primary duty was managerial, and Starbucks was not required to pay overtime.⁹

The exemptions from the overtime-pay requirement do not apply to manual laborers or to licensed nurses, police, firefighters, and other public-safety workers. White-collar workers who earn more than $100,000 per year, computer programmers, dental hygienists, and insurance adjusters are typically exempt, though they must also meet certain other criteria.

In the following case, the issue before the court was whether an employee of a pharmaceutical company was an administrative employee and therefore exempt from the overtime requirements of the FLSA.

7. Note that many state and local governments also have minimum-wage laws. These laws may provide for minimum-wage rates higher than the federal rate.

Pediatrics, a J&J

[Johnson and Johnson] wholly owned subsidiary, employed [Patty Lee] Smith in the position of Senior Professional Sales Representative. In essence, Smith's position required her to travel to various doctors' offices and hospitals where she extolled the benefit of J&J's pharmaceutical drug Concerta to the prescribing doctors. * * * Smith, however, did not sell Concerta (a controlled substance) directly to the doctors, as such sales are prohibited by law.

J&J gave Smith a list of target doctors that it created and told her to complete an average of ten visits per day, visiting every doctor on her target list at least once each quarter. To schedule visits with reluctant doctors, Smith had to be inventive and cultivate relationships with the doctor's staff, an endeavor in which she found that coffee and donuts were useful tools. J&J left the itinerary and order of Smith's visits to the target doctors to her discretion. * * * J&J gave her a budget for these visits and she could use the money in the budget to take the doctors to lunch or to sponsor seminars.

In Smith's deposition she made it clear that she appreciated the freedom and responsibility that her position provided. Though a supervisor accompanied Smith during the doctor visits on a few days each quarter, by her own calculation Smith was unsupervised 95% of the time. As Smith explained during her deposition, "it was really up to me to run the territory the way I wanted to. And it was not a micromanaged type of job. I had pretty much the ability to work it the way I wanted to work it." According to Smith's job description, she was required to plan and prioritize her responsibilities in a manner that maximized business results. J&J witnesses testified (and J&J documents confirmed) that Smith was the "expert" on her own territory and was supposed to develop a strategic plan to achieve higher sales.

Smith earned a base salary of $66,000 but was not paid overtime, though J&J, at its discretion, could award her a bonus.

Smith filed suit seeking overtime pay under the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA"). * * * J&J moved for summary judgment, arguing that she was not entitled to overtime pay under the FLSA because she was exempt from that statute under * * * the "administrative employee" exemption. [The court granted J&J's motion, and Smith appealed.]

* * *

Under the FLSA, employees who work more than 40 hours per week are entitled to overtime pay unless they fall within one of the FLSA's exemptions. * * * The District Court held that the administrative employee exemption applied to Smith, so we focus on the regulations describing that exemption.

Under the administrative employee exemption, anyone employed in a bona fide administrative capacity is exempt from the FLSA's overtime requirements. The Secretary [of Labor] has defined an administrative employee as someone:

(1) *Compensated on a salary or fee basis at a rate of not less than $455 per week * * * exclusive of board, lodging or other facilities;*

(2) Whose primary duty is the performance of office or non-manual work directly related to the management or general business operations of the employer or the employer's customers; and

(3) Whose primary duty includes the exercise of discretion and independent judgment with respect to matters of significance. [Emphasis added.]

The parties agree that Smith's salary qualifies her for the administrative employee exemption, but dispute her qualification for that exemption under the remaining two sections.

We find that the administrative employee exemption applies to Smith. While testifying at her deposition Smith elaborated on the independent and managerial qualities that her position required. Her non-manual position required her to form a strategic plan designed to maximize sales in her territory. We think that this requirement satisfied the "directly related to the management or general business operations of the employer" provision of the administrative employee exemption because it involved a high level of planning and foresight, and the strategic plan that Smith developed guided the execution of her remaining duties.

When we turn to the "exercise of discretion and independent judgment with respect to matters of significance" requirement, we note that Smith executed nearly all of her duties without direct oversight. In fact, she described herself as the manager of her own business who could run her own territory as she saw fit.

1. Is it unfair to exempt employees to deprive them of overtime wages? Why or why not?
2. J&J argued that Smith was exempt under either the administrative employee exemption or the outside salesperson exemption. The district court found, though, that Smith did not qualify for the outside salesperson exemption. What single fact might have made Smith ineligible for the outside salesperson exemption?

SECTION 3 LAYOFFS

During the latest economic recession in the United States, mass layoffs of workers resulted in high unemployment rates. Later in this chapter, we will discuss unemployment insurance, which helps some workers manage financially until they can find another job. In this section, we discuss the laws pertaining to employee layoffs, an area that is increasingly the subject of litigation.

The Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act

Since 1988, the Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act,¹⁰ or the WARN Act, has required large businesses to provide sixty days' notice before implementing a mass layoff or closing a plant that employs more than fifty full-time workers. This federal law applies to employers with at least one hundred full-time employees. It is intended to give workers advance notice so that they can start looking for a new job while they are still employed.

The WARN Act defines the term mass layoff as a reduction in force that, during any thirty-day period, results in an employment loss of either:

1. At least 33 percent of the full-time employees at a single job site and at least fifty employees; or
2. At least five hundred full-time employees.

An employment loss is defined as a layoff that exceeds six months or a reduction in hours of work of more than 50 percent during each month of any six-month period.

10. 29 U.S.C. Sections 2101 et seq.

NOTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS The WARN Act requires that advance notice of the layoff be sent to the affected workers or their representative (if the workers are members of a labor union), as well as to state and local government authorities. The state and local authorities are notified so that they can provide resources, such as job training, to displaced workers. Employers must also provide notice to part-time and seasonal employees who are being laid off, even though these workers do not count in determining whether the act's provisions are triggered. Note also that even companies that are planning to file for bankruptcy normally must provide notice under the WARN Act before implementing a mass layoff. Nevertheless, employers can sometimes avoid the WARN notice requirements by staggering layoffs over many months or various locations.

REMEDIES FOR VIOLATIONS An employer that orders a mass layoff or plant closing in violation of the WARN Act can be fined up to $500 for each day of the violation. Employees can recover back pay for each day of the violation (up to sixty days), plus reasonable attorneys' fees. An employee can also recover benefits under an employee benefit plan, including the cost of medical expenses that would have been covered by the plan. (Employees who are laid off may also claim that the layoff was discriminatory in violation of the laws described in Chapter 35 if it disproportionately affects members of a protected class, such as minorities or women.)

State Laws May Also Require Layoff Notices

Many states also have statutes requiring employers to provide notice before initiating mass layoffs, and these laws may have different and even stricter requirements than the WARN Act. In New York, for instance, companies with fifty or more employees must provide ninety days' notice before any layoff that affects twenty-five or more full-time employees. The law in Illinois applies to companies with seventy-five or more employees and requires sixty days' advance notice of any layoff that affects twenty-five or more full-time employees at one plant or two hundred and fifty employees.

FAMILY AND MEDICAL LEAVE

In 1993, Congress passed the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA)¹¹ to allow employees to take time off work for family or medical reasons. A majority of the states also have legislation allowing for a leave from employment for family or medical reasons, and many employers maintain private family-leave plans for their workers. The FMLA does not supersede any state or local law that provides more generous family- or medical-leave protection. In 2009, significant changes to the FMLA created new categories of leave for military caregivers and for qualifying exigencies that arise due to military service.

Coverage and Application

The FMLA requires employers who have fifty or more employees to provide an employee with up to twelve weeks of unpaid family or medical leave during any twelve-month period. The FMLA expressly covers private and public (government) employees who have worked for their employers for at least a year.¹² An employee may take family leave to care for a newborn baby or a child recently placed for adoption or foster care.¹³ An employee can take medical leave when the employee or the employee's spouse, child, or parent has a serious health condition requiring care.

In addition, an employee caring for a family member with a serious injury or illness incurred as a result of military duty can now take up to twenty-six weeks of military caregiver leave within a twelve-month period.¹⁴ An employee can also take up to twelve weeks of qualifying exigency leave to handle specified nonmedical emergencies when a spouse, parent, or child is on, or called to, active military duty.¹⁵

Benefits and Protections

When an employee takes FMLA leave, the employer must continue the worker's health-care coverage on the same terms as if the employee had continued to work. On returning from FMLA leave, most employees must be restored to their original position or to a comparable position (with nearly equivalent pay and benefits, for example). An important exception allows the employer to avoid reinstating a key employee—defined as an employee whose pay falls within the top 10 percent of the firm's workforce.

Employees suffering from addiction to drugs or alcohol pose a special problem under the FMLA. Under what circumstances do days off resulting from the addiction, as opposed to days off for medical treatment in a medical facility, count as part of protected leave? That issue was addressed in the following case.

11. 29 U.S.C. Sections 2601, 2611–2619, 2651–2654.

12. Note that changes to the FMLA rules allow employees who have taken a break from their employment to qualify for FMLA leave if they worked a total of twelve months during the previous seven years. See 29 C.F.R. Section 825.110(b)(1-2).

13. The foster care must be state sanctioned for such an arrangement to fall within the coverage of the FMLA.

14. 29 C.F.R. Section 825.200.

15. 29 C.F.R. Section 825.126.

CASE 34.2

Darst v. Interstate Brands Corp.

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 512 F.3d 903 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Krzysztof Chalimoniuk worked for Interstate Brands Corporation (IBC) for fifteen years before he was fired for excessive absenteeism. Chalimoniuk, an alcoholic, sought treatment for his condition. He requested leave under the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA) from July 29 to August 14, 2000, to deal with the problem. From August 4 to 11, he was hospitalized for treatment of alcohol dependence and withdrawal. When he failed to return to work on August 15, he was fired for being absent. IBC noted that he was also absent from July 29 to August 3, when he

CASE 34.2 CONTINUED ♦ was not hospitalized, and those days were counted as improper absences because he had already exceeded the number of days he could miss under the company's leave policy. Chalimoniuk sued, contending that IBC had violated his FMLA rights. During the course of litigation, Chalimoniuk filed for bankruptcy, and his claim against IBC became part of the bankruptcy estate. Richard Darst, as trustee for the estate, continued to prosecute the claim. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of IBC. Darst appealed.

The substantive law at issue is the FMLA. Under the FMLA, eligible employees are entitled to up to twelve weeks of unpaid leave per year for absence due to, among other things, a “Serious Health Condition” that renders the employee unable to perform the functions of his or her job. To ensure the entitlement, the FMLA makes it “unlawful for any employer to interfere with, restrain, or deny the exercise of or the attempt to exercise, any right provided.” When an employee alleges a deprivation of the substantive guarantees of the FMLA, the employee must establish, by a preponderance of the evidence, an entitlement to the disputed leave. Because the district court resolved the case on a motion for summary judgment, Chalimoniuk need only raise a genuine issue of material fact regarding his entitlement to FMLA leave on the relevant dates.

A Serious Health Condition is defined as an illness, injury, impairment, or physical or mental condition that involves either (1) inpatient care in a hospital, hospice, or residential medical facility; or (2) continuing treatment by a health care provider. Although the statute itself does not specifically address whether alcoholism [and] substance abuse constitute serious health conditions, Department of Labor regulations that implement the statute provide the answer. As we noted above, substance abuse may be a Serious Health Condition under certain conditions but FMLA leave may be taken only for treatment for substance abuse. On the other hand, absence because of the employee's use of the substance, rather than for treatment, does not qualify for FMLA leave. Under this regulation, Chalimoniuk was entitled to FMLA leave only for treatment for substance abuse. Because of the final sentence in the regulation, the parties argue over whether Chalimoniuk was intoxicated on July 31, August 2 or August 3, but we will assume for the purposes of summary judgment that he was not intoxicated on those days. Even if he was sober on those days, however, he has provided no explanation for his absence that would excuse the absence under IBC's point system except that he was in treatment for alcoholism. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Dr. Pfeifer [Chalimoniuk's physician] confirmed that Chalimoniuk received inpatient treatment at [the hospital] from August 4 until August 11. He produced no records and had no recollection of treating Chalimoniuk prior to that time. Chalimoniuk provided an affidavit from Dr. Pfeifer stating the doctor's belief that “treatment” for alcoholism begins when the patient takes the first step towards seeking professional help. According to Dr. Pfeifer, this includes the first phone call to the health care provider seeking evaluation, treatment or referral. Based on his training and experience as a medical doctor, Dr. Pfeifer averred [asserted] that Chalimoniuk's treatment therefore began on July 29, when he first contacted his physician's office. Under the FMLA, however, “treatment” is a defined term that does not include actions such as calling to make an appointment. Treatment would include examinations to determine if a serious health condition exists and evaluation of the condition. But Chalimoniuk has produced no evidence that he was being examined or evaluated on July 29, August 2 or August 3. Treatment does not include “any activities that can be initiated without a visit to a health care provider.” Chalimoniuk complains that memories have faded since the time of his termination, that his doctors could have testified regarding his treatment on those days if he had known closer to the time that the company was challenging the fact of treatment on the days in question. But Chalimoniuk knew as of August 15, days after his treatment ended, that the company was denying him FMLA leave for all of the days he was absent except the period of his hospitalization. He had ample opportunities to preserve any relevant evidence. Thus, because Chalimoniuk has produced no evidence that he received any treatment as that term is defined by the FMLA on the days in question, he was not entitled to FMLA leave on those dates. Because he had exceeded the number of points allowable

CASE 34.2 CONTINUED ♦ under IBC’s absenteeism policy, the defendants were free to terminate his employment without running afoul of the FMLA. [Emphasis added.]

DECISION AND REMEDY • The appeals court affirmed that Chalimoniuk’s employer did not violate his FMLA leave by dismissing him for excessive absences. FMLA leave covered the days he was receiving medical treatment, not the days he missed work prior to or after the treatment.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Did IBC take unfair advantage of the “letter of the law” by not granting Chalimoniuk a little more leave time? After all, he was, in fact, dealing with his problem. Explain your answer.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Although IBC won this case, defending against the lawsuit was costly. How can employers avoid such litigation?

Violations

An employer that violates the FMLA can be required to provide various remedies, including (1) damages for lost wages and benefits, denied compensation, and actual monetary losses (such as the cost of providing for care of a family member) up to an amount equivalent to the employee’s wages for twelve weeks; (2) job reinstatement; and (3) promotion, if a promotion was denied.

In addition, a successful plaintiff is entitled to court costs and attorneys’ fees; if bad faith on the part of the employer is shown, the plaintiff may also receive two times the amount of damages awarded by the judge or jury. Supervisors can also be held personally liable, as employers, for violations of the act.

Employers generally are required to notify employees when an absence will be counted against leave authorized under the act. If an employer fails to provide such notice, and the employee consequently is damaged because he or she did not receive notice, the employer may be sanctioned.¹⁶

WORKER HEALTH AND SAFETY

Under the common law, employees who were injured on the job had to file lawsuits against their employers to obtain recovery. Today, numerous state and federal statutes protect employees from the risk of accidental injury, death, or disease resulting from their employment. This section discusses the primary federal statute governing health and safety in the workplace, along with state workers’ compensation acts.

16. Ragsdale v. Wolverine World Wide, Inc., 535 U.S. 81, 122 S.Ct. 1155, 152 L.Ed.2d 167 (2002).

The Occupational Safety and Health Act

At the federal level, the primary legislation protecting employees’ health and safety is the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970,¹⁷ which is administered by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA). Congress passed this act in an attempt to ensure safe and healthful working conditions for practically every employee in the country.

REQUIREMENTS The act imposes a general duty on employers to keep workplaces safe. To this end, OSHA has established specific safety standards that employers must follow depending on the industry. For instance, OSHA regulations require the use of safety guards on certain mechanical equipment and set maximum levels of exposure to substances in the workplace that may be harmful to a worker’s health. The act also requires that employers post certain notices in the workplace, perform prescribed record-keeping, and submit specific reports.

For instance, employers with eleven or more employees are required to keep occupational injury and illness records for each employee. Each record must be made available for inspection when requested by an OSHA compliance officer. Whenever a work-related injury or disease occurs, employers must make reports directly to OSHA. If an employee dies or five or more employees are hospitalized because of a work-related incident, the employer must notify the U.S. Department of Labor within forty-eight hours. A company that fails to do so will be fined. Following the incident, a complete inspection of the premises is mandatory.

17. 29 U.S.C. Sections 553, 651–678.

Occupational Safety and Health Act.¹⁸ Employees may also file complaints of violations. Under the act, an employer cannot discharge an employee who files a complaint or who, in good faith, refuses to work in a high-risk area if bodily harm or death might result.

Criminal penalties for willful violation of the Occupational Safety and Health Act are limited. Employers may also be prosecuted under state laws, however. In other words, the act does not preempt state and local criminal laws.¹⁹

State Workers' Compensation Laws

State workers' compensation laws establish an administrative procedure for compensating workers injured on the job. Instead of suing, an injured worker files a claim with the administrative agency or board that administers local workers' compensation claims.

Most workers' compensation statutes are similar. No state covers all employees. Typically, domestic workers, agricultural workers, temporary employees, and employees of common carriers (companies that provide transportation services to the public) are excluded, but minors are covered. Usually, the statutes allow employers to purchase insurance from a private insurer or a state fund to pay workers' compensation benefits in the event of a claim. Most states also allow employers to be self-insured—that is, employers that show an ability to pay claims do not need to buy insurance.

WORKERS' COMPENSATION REQUIREMENTS In general, the only requirements to recover benefits under state workers' compensation laws are:

1. The existence of an employment relationship.
2. An accidental injury that occurred on the job or in the course of employment, regardless of fault. (If an employee is injured while commuting to or from work, the injury usually will not be considered

18. In 1978, the United States Supreme Court held that warrantless inspections violate the warrant clause of the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. See Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc., 436 U.S. 307, 98 S.Ct. 1816, 56 L.Ed.2d 305 (1978). Although this case has not been overruled, the Supreme Court subsequently indicated that statutory inspection programs can provide a constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant. See Donovan v. Dewey, 452 U.S. 594, 101 S.Ct. 2534, 69 L.Ed.2d 262 (1981).

to have occurred on the job or in the course of employment and hence will not be covered.)

An injured employee must notify her or his employer promptly (usually within thirty days of the accident). Generally, an employee must also file a workers' compensation claim with the appropriate state agency or board within a certain period (sixty days to two years) from the time the injury is first noticed, rather than from the time of the accident.

WORKERS' COMPENSATION VERSUS LITIGATION An employee who accepts workers' compensation benefits is prohibited from suing for injuries caused by the employer's negligence. By barring lawsuits for negligence, workers' compensation laws also prevent employers from raising common law defenses to negligence, such as contributory negligence or assumption of risk, to avoid liability. A worker may sue an employer who intentionally injures the worker, however.

INCOME SECURITY

Federal and state governments participate in insurance programs designed to protect employees and their families from the financial impact of retirement, disability, death, hospitalization, and unemployment. The key federal law on this subject is the Social Security Act of 1935.²⁰

Social Security

The Social Security Act of 1935 provides for old-age (retirement), survivors', and disability insurance. The act is therefore often referred to as OASDI. Both employers and employees must "contribute" under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act (FICA)²¹ to help pay for benefits that will partially make up for the employees' loss of income on retirement.

The basis for the employee's and the employer's contribution is the employee's annual wage base—the maximum amount of the employee's wages that is subject to the tax. The employer withholds the employee's FICA contribution from the employee's wages and then matches this contribution. The annual wage base is adjusted each year as needed to take into account the rising cost of living. In 2010, employers were required to withhold 6.2 percent of each employee's wages, up to a maximum wage base of $106,800, and to match this contribution.

20. 42 U.S.C. Sections 301–1397e.

Retired workers are eligible to receive monthly payments from the Social Security Administration, which administers the Social Security Act. Social Security benefits are fixed by statute but increase automatically with increases in the cost of living.

Medicare

Medicare, a federal government health-insurance program, is administered by the Social Security Administration for people sixty-five years of age and older and for some under age sixty-five who are disabled. It originally had two parts, one pertaining to hospital costs and the other to nonhospital medical costs, such as visits to physicians' offices. Medicare now offers additional coverage options and a prescription-drug plan. People who have Medicare hospital insurance can obtain additional federal medical insurance if they pay small monthly premiums, which increase as the cost of medical care rises.

As with Social Security, both the employer and the employee contribute to Medicare, but the programs differ in that there is no cap on the amount of wages subject to the Medicare tax. In 2010, both the employer and the employee were required to pay 1.45 percent of all wages and salaries to finance Medicare. Thus, for Social Security and Medicare together, in 2010 the employer and employee each paid 7.65 percent of the first $106,800 of income (6.2 percent for Social Security + 1.45 percent for Medicare), for a combined total of 15.3 percent. In addition, all wages and salaries above $106,800 were taxed at a combined (employer and employee) rate of 2.9 percent for Medicare.²² Self-employed persons pay both the employer and the employee portions of the Social Security and Medicare taxes (15.3 percent of income up to $106,800 and 2.9 percent of income above that amount in 2010).

22. Note that as a result of the 2010 health-care reform legislation (the Health Care and Education Reconciliation Act of 2010, H.R. 4872), not only are Medicare tax rates expected to rise, but also the applicable compensation base will expand to include more than just salary incomes. For instance, starting in 2012, there will be a 3.8 percent Medicare payroll tax on investment income for families making more than $250,000 per year.

Private Pension Plans

The major federal statute regulating employee retirement plans set up by employers is the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) of 1974.²³ This act empowers a branch of the U.S. Department of Labor to enforce its provisions governing employers who have private pension funds for their employees. ERISA created the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation (PBGC), an independent federal agency, to provide timely and uninterrupted payment of voluntary private pension benefits. The pension plans pay annual insurance premiums (at set rates adjusted for inflation) to the PBGC, which then pays benefits to participants in the event that a plan is unable to do so. Under the Pension Protection Act of 2006,²⁴ the director of the PBGC is appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate.

ERISA does not require an employer to establish a pension plan. When a plan exists, however, ERISA provides standards for its management. A key provision of ERISA concerns vesting. Vesting gives an employee a legal right to receive pension benefits at some future date when she or he stops working. Before ERISA was enacted, some employees who had worked for companies for as long as thirty years received no pension benefits when their employment terminated because those benefits had not vested. ERISA establishes complex vesting rules. Generally, however, all of an employee's contributions to a pension plan vest immediately, and the employee's rights to the employer's contributions vest after five years of employment.

In an attempt to prevent mismanagement of pension funds, ERISA has established rules on how they must be invested. Managers must choose investments cautiously and must diversify the plan's investments to minimize the risk of large losses. ERISA also includes detailed record-keeping and reporting requirements.

Unemployment Compensation

To ease the financial impact of unemployment, the United States has a system of unemployment insurance. The Federal Unemployment Tax Act (FUTA) of 1935²⁵ created a state-administered system that provides unemployment compensation to eligible individuals. Under this system, employers pay into a fund, and the proceeds are paid out to qualified unemployed workers. The FUTA and state laws require employers that fall under the provisions of the act to pay unemployment taxes at regular intervals.

24. The Pension Protection Act amended 26 U.S.C. Sections 430–432, 436, 4966, 4967, 6039I, 6050U, 6050V, 6695A, 6720B, 7443B; and 29 U.S.C. Sections 1082–1085, 1202a.

To be eligible for unemployment compensation, a worker must be willing and able to work. Workers who have been fired for misconduct or who have voluntarily left their jobs are not eligible for benefits. In the past, workers had to be actively seeking employment to continue receiving benefits. Due to the high unemployment rates after the Great Recession, however, President Barack Obama announced measures that allow jobless persons to retain their unemployment benefits while pursuing additional education and training (rather than seeking employment).

COBRA

For workers whose jobs have been terminated—and who are thus no longer eligible for group health-insurance plans—federal law also provides a right to continued health-care coverage. The Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act (COBRA) of 1985²⁶ prohibits an employer from eliminating a worker's medical, optical, or dental insurance on the voluntary or involuntary termination of the worker's employment.

Employers, with some exceptions, must inform employees of COBRA's provisions when they face termination or a reduction of hours that would affect their eligibility for coverage under the plan. Only workers fired for gross misconduct are excluded from protection.

PROCEDURES A worker has sixty days (beginning with the date that the group coverage would stop) to decide whether to continue with the employer's group insurance plan. If the worker chooses to discontinue the coverage, then the employer has no further obligation. If the worker chooses to continue coverage, though, the employer is obligated to keep the policy active for up to eighteen months (twenty-nine months if the worker is disabled). The coverage provided must be the same as that enjoyed by the worker prior to the termination or reduction of work. If family members were originally included, for instance, COBRA prohibits their exclusion.

PAYMENT The worker does not receive the insurance coverage for free. Generally, an employer can require the employee to pay all of the premiums, plus a 2 percent administrative charge. In 2009, however, the law was changed to provide for certain workers who involuntarily lost their jobs.²⁷ These employees can be charged no more than 35 percent of the premiums. The employer receives a tax credit as reimbursement for the remaining 65 percent of the premiums.

If the worker fails to pay the required premiums (or if the employer completely eliminates its group benefit plan), the employer is relieved of further responsibility. (The employer is also relieved of the obligation if the worker becomes eligible for Medicare or obtains coverage under another health plan, such as a spouse's or new employer's plan.) An employer that does not comply with COBRA risks substantial penalties, such as a tax of up to 10 percent of the annual cost of the group plan or $500,000, whichever is less.

Employer-Sponsored Group Health Plans

The Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA),²⁸ which was discussed in Chapter 4 in the context of its privacy protections, contains provisions that affect employer-sponsored group health plans. HIPAA does not require employers to provide health insurance, but it does establish requirements for those that do provide such coverage. For instance, HIPAA strictly limits an employer's ability to exclude coverage for preexisting conditions. It also requires employers to give credit to employees for previous health coverage (including COBRA coverage) to decrease any waiting period before their coverage becomes effective.

In addition, HIPAA restricts the manner in which covered employers collect, use, and disclose the health information of employees and their families. Employers must train employees, designate privacy officials, and distribute privacy notices to ensure that employees' health information is not disclosed to unauthorized parties. Failure to comply with HIPAA regulations can result in civil penalties of up to $100 per person per violation (with a cap of $25,000 per year). The employer is also subject to criminal prosecution for certain types of HIPAA violations and can face up to $250,000 in criminal fines and imprisonment for up to ten years if convicted.

26. 29 U.S.C. Sections 1161–1169.

27. These changes were made by the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act (Stimulus Bill) of 2009, Pub. L. No. 111-5, 123 Stat. 115 (February 17, 2009). The provisions for workers who involuntarily lost their jobs were originally set to end in 2009 but were later extended through November 2010.

SECTION 7

EMPLOYEE PRIVACY RIGHTS

In the last thirty years, concerns about the privacy rights of employees have arisen in response to the sometimes invasive tactics used by employers to monitor and screen workers. Perhaps the greatest privacy concern in today's employment arena has to do with electronic monitoring of employees' activities.

Electronic Monitoring

According to the American Management Association, more than two-thirds of employers engage in some form of electronic monitoring of their employees. This surveillance may include monitoring employees' e-mails, blogs, instant messages, tweets, Internet use, and computer files; video-recording employee job performance; and recording and reviewing telephone conversations, voice mail, and text messages.

Various specially designed software products have made it easier for an employer to track employees' Internet use, including the specific Web sites visited and the time spent surfing the Web. Indeed, inappropriate Web surfing seems to be a primary concern for employers. More than 75 percent of them are monitoring workers' Web connections. Filtering software, which was discussed in Chapter 4, can be used to prevent access to certain Web sites, such as sites containing sexually explicit images. Private employers are generally free to use filtering software to block access to certain Web sites because the First Amendment's protection of free speech prevents only government employers from restraining speech by blocking Web sites.

EMPLOYEE PRIVACY PROTECTION Recall from Chapter 4 that the United States Supreme Court has inferred a personal right to privacy from the constitutional guarantees provided by the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Amendments to the Constitution. Tort law (see Chapters 6 and 7), state constitutions, and a number of state and federal statutes also provide for privacy rights.

When determining whether an employer should be held liable for violating an employee's privacy rights, the courts generally weigh the employer's interests against the employee's reasonable expectation of privacy. Normally, if employees are informed that their communications are being monitored, they cannot reasonably expect those communications to be private. If employees are not informed that certain communications are being monitored, however, the employer may be held liable for invading their privacy. For this reason, most employers that engage in electronic monitoring notify their employees about the monitoring.

Nevertheless, establishing a general privacy policy may not sufficiently protect an employer who monitors other forms of communications that the policy fails to mention. Similarly, notifying employees that their e-mails may be monitored may not protect an employer who monitors text messages. Courts also look at other factors when deciding if the employee had a reasonable expectation of privacy. For instance, if the employer provided the e-mail system or blog that the employee used for communications, a court will typically hold that the employee did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy.

ELECTRONIC COMMUNICATIONS PRIVACY ACT The major statute governing electronic monitoring by employers is the Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA) of 1986.²⁹ This act amended existing federal wiretapping law to cover electronic forms of communications, such as communications via cell phones and e-mail. The ECPA prohibits the intentional interception of any wire or electronic communication or the intentional disclosure or use of the information obtained by the interception. Excluded from coverage are any electronic communications through devices that are "furnished to the subscriber or user by a provider of wire or electronic communication service" and that are being used by the subscriber or user, or by the provider of the service, "in the ordinary course of its business."

This "business-extension exception" to the ECPA allows an employer to monitor employees' electronic communications in the ordinary course of business. It does not, however, permit an employer to monitor employees' personal communications. Nevertheless, under another exception to the ECPA, an employer may avoid liability if the employees consent to having their electronic communications intercepted by the employer. Thus, by simply requiring employees to sign forms indicating that they consent to such monitoring, an employer can avoid liability for monitoring employees' personal communications.

29. 18 U.S.C. Sections 2510–2521.

STORED COMMUNICATIONS Part of the ECPA is known as the Stored Communications Act (SCA).³⁰ The SCA prohibits intentional and unauthorized access to stored electronic communications and sets forth criminal and civil sanctions for violators. A person can violate the SCA by intentionally accessing a stored electronic communication or by intentionally exceeding the authorization given to access the communication. To prove a violation, however, an individual must show that the other party (for example, an employer) lacked the authority to access the stored communication. Proving this lack of authority may be difficult at times, especially when an employer provided the electronic communication device.

CASE IN POINT Jeff Quon, a police sergeant for Ontario, California, was issued a pager with wireless text-messaging services provided by Arch Wireless Operating Company. Although the city had a general policy that employees should not use work computers, Internet, and e-mail for personal matters, it did not expressly mention the pagers or text messaging. On several occasions, Quon paid the city overage charges for exceeding the limit on text messages. Without Quon's knowledge, his supervisors obtained transcripts of his stored text messages from Arch Wireless to determine whether any of the texts were personal. When Quon learned that the city had read his personal texts, he filed a lawsuit against the city and Arch Wireless for violating his privacy rights. A federal appellate court ruled that Quon had a reasonable expectation of privacy in his text messages that were temporarily stored by Arch Wireless, a third party provider. Therefore, Arch Wireless should not have provided transcripts to the city without his authorization. On appeal, the United States Supreme Court reversed that ruling, finding that the search of Quon's text messages was reasonable. Because the police department had a written policy, which Quon admitted that he understood applied to the pagers, he should have had no reasonable expectation of privacy.³¹

Other Types of Monitoring

In addition to monitoring their employees' online activities, employers also engage in other types of employee screening and monitoring practices. The practices discussed next often have been challenged as violations of employee privacy rights.

31. City of Ontario, California v. Quon, ___ U.S. ___, 130 S.Ct. 2619, ___ L.Ed.2d ___ (2010).

LIE-DETECTOR TESTS At one time, many employers required employees or job applicants to take polygraph examinations (lie-detector tests). In 1988, Congress passed the Employee Polygraph Protection Act,³² which generally prohibits employers from requiring or causing employees or job applicants to take lie-detector tests or suggesting or requesting that they do so. The act also restricts employers' ability to use or ask about the results of any lie-detector test or to take any negative employment action based on the results.

Employers excepted from these prohibitions include federal, state, and local government employers; certain security service firms; and companies manufacturing and distributing controlled substances. Other employers may use polygraph tests when investigating losses attributable to theft, including embezzlement and the theft of trade secrets.

DRUG TESTING In the interests of public safety and to reduce unnecessary costs, many employers, including the government, require their employees to submit to drug testing. Government (public) employers, of course, are constrained in drug testing by the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures (see Chapter 4). Drug testing of public employees is allowed by statute for transportation workers and is normally upheld by the courts when drug use in a particular job may threaten public safety. Also, when there is a reasonable basis for suspecting public employees of drug use, courts often find that drug testing does not violate the Fourth Amendment.

The Fourth Amendment does not apply to drug testing conducted by private employers.³³ Hence, the privacy rights and drug testing of private-sector employees are governed by state law, which varies from state to state. Many states have statutes that allow drug testing by private employers but put restrictions on when and how the testing may be performed. A collective bargaining agreement (discussed later in this chapter) may also provide protection against drug testing (or authorize drug testing under certain conditions). The permissibility of a private employee's drug test often hinges on whether the employer's testing was reasonable. Random drug tests and even "zero-tolerance" policies (which deny a "second chance" to employees who test positive for drugs) have been held to be reasonable.³⁴

GENETIC TESTING A serious privacy issue arose when some employers began conducting genetic testing of employees or prospective employees in an effort to identify individuals who might develop significant health problems in the future. To date, however, only a few cases involving this issue have come before the courts.

CASE IN POINT Lawrence Berkeley Laboratory screened prospective employees for the gene that causes sickle-cell anemia, although the applicants were not informed of this. When the prospective employees subsequently sued the laboratory, a federal appellate court held that they had a cause of action for violation of their privacy rights. The case was later settled for $2.2 million.³⁵

In 2008, to prevent the improper use of genetic information by employers and health insurance providers, Congress passed the Genetic Information Nondiscrimination Act (GINA).³⁶ Under GINA, employers cannot make decisions about hiring, firing, job placement, or promotion based on the results of genetic testing. GINA also prohibits group health plans and insurers from denying coverage or charging higher premiums based solely on a genetic predisposition to develop a disease in the future.

IMMIGRATION LAW

The United States did not have any laws restricting immigration until the late nineteenth century. In recent years, immigration law has become an area of increasing concern for businesses as the number of immigrants—especially illegal immigrants—to the United States has grown. An estimated 11 to 12 million illegal immigrants now live in the United States. The great majority of these illegal immigrants came to find jobs, but U.S. employers face serious penalties if they hire illegal immigrants. Thus, an understanding of the immigration laws has become increasingly important for businesses. Today, the most important laws affecting the employment relationship are the Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA) of 1986³⁷ and the Immigration Act of 1990.³⁸

37. 29 U.S.C. Section 1802.

38. This act amended various provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, 8 U.S.C. Sections 1101 et seq.

The Immigration Reform and Control Act

When the IRCA was enacted in 1986, it provided amnesty to certain groups of illegal aliens living in the United States at the time. It also established a system that sanctions employers that hire illegal immigrants who lack work authorization. The IRCA makes it illegal to hire, recruit, or refer for a fee someone not authorized to work in this country. Through Immigration and Customs Enforcement officers, the federal government conducts random compliance audits and engages in enforcement actions against employers who hire illegal immigrants.

I-9 EMPLOYMENT VERIFICATION To comply with IRCA requirements, an employer must perform I-9 verifications for new hires, including those hired as “contractors” or “day workers” if they work under the employer’s direct supervision. The employer must complete Form I-9, Employment Eligibility Verification, which is available from U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services,³⁹ for each worker within three days of his or her commencement of employment. The three-day period allows the employer to check the form’s accuracy and to review and verify documents establishing the prospective worker’s identity and eligibility for employment in the United States.

The employer must attest, under penalty of perjury, that an employee produced documents establishing his or her identity and legal employability. Acceptable documents include a U.S. passport establishing the person’s citizenship or a document authorizing a foreign citizen to work in the United States, such as a permanent resident card or an Alien Registration Receipt (discussed on the facing page).

Note that most legal actions alleging violations of I-9 rules are brought against employees. An employee must state on the I-9 form that she or he is a U.S. citizen or otherwise authorized to work in the United States. If the employee enters false information on the form or presents false documentation, the employer can fire the worker, who then may be subject to deportation.

The IRCA prohibits “knowing” violations, including situations in which an employer “should have known” that the worker was unauthorized. Good faith is a defense under the statute, and employers are legally entitled to rely on a document authorizing a person to work that reasonably appears on its face to be genuine, even if it is later established to be counterfeit.

ENFORCEMENT The IRCA rules are enforced by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), a federal agency that was established in 2003 as the largest investigative arm of the U.S. Department of Homeland Security. ICE has a general inspection program that conducts random compliance audits. Other audits may occur if the agency receives a written complaint alleging that an employer has committed violations. Government inspections include a review of an employer's file of I-9 forms. The government does not need a subpoena or a warrant to conduct such an inspection.

If an investigation reveals a possible violation, ICE will bring an administrative action and issue a Notice of Intent to Fine, which sets out the charges against the employer. The employer has a right to a hearing on the enforcement action if it files a request within thirty days. This hearing is conducted before an administrative law judge (see Chapters 1 and 44), and the employer has a right to counsel and to discovery (see Chapter 3). A typical defense in such actions is good faith or substantial compliance with the documentation provisions. Although the federal government increased its enforcement actions significantly during the Bush administration, the Obama administration shifted the focus away from enforcement actions and toward reforming immigration laws.

PENALTIES An employer who violates the law by hiring an unauthorized alien is subject to substantial penalties. The employer can be fined up to $2,200 for each unauthorized employee for a first offense, $5,000 per employee for a second offense, and up to $11,000 for subsequent offenses. Employers who have engaged in a "pattern or practice of violations" are subject to criminal penalties, which include additional fines and imprisonment for up to ten years. A company may also be barred from future government contracts for violations. In determining the penalty, ICE considers the seriousness of the violation (such as intentional falsification of documents) and the employer's past compliance. ICE regulations also identify factors that will mitigate or aggravate the penalty under certain circumstances, such as whether the employer cooperated in the investigation or is a small business.

The Immigration Act

U.S. immigration laws have long included provisions that permit businesses to hire foreign workers with special qualifications when there are not enough qualified workers available in the United States. The Immigration Act of 1990 placed caps on the number of visas (entry permits) that can be issued to immigrants each year.

Most temporary visas are set aside for workers who can be characterized as "persons of extraordinary ability," members of the professions holding advanced degrees, or other skilled workers and professionals. To hire such an individual, an employer must submit a petition to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, which determines whether the job candidate meets the legal standards. Each visa is for a specific job, and there are legal limits on the employee's ability to switch jobs once he or she is in the United States.

I-551 ALIEN REGISTRATION RECEIPTS A company seeking to hire a noncitizen worker may do so if the worker is self-authorized. This means that the worker either is a lawful permanent resident or has a valid temporary Employment Authorization Document. A lawful permanent resident can prove his or her status to an employer by presenting an I-551 Alien Registration Receipt, known as a green card, or a properly stamped foreign passport. Many immigrant workers are not already self-authorized, and an employer that wishes to hire them may obtain labor certification, or green cards, for them. To gain authorization for hiring a foreign worker, the employer must show that no U.S. worker is qualified, willing, and able to take the job. Approximately fifty thousand new green cards are issued each year. A green card can be obtained only for a person who is being hired for a permanent, full-time position. (A separate authorization system provides for the temporary entry and hiring of nonimmigrant visa workers.)

THE H-1B VISA PROGRAM The most common and controversial visa program today is the H-1B visa system. To obtain an H-1B visa, the potential employee must be qualified in a "specialty occupation," which is defined as involving highly specialized knowledge and the attainment of a bachelor's or higher degree or its equivalent. The recipients of these visas include many high-tech workers, such as computer programmers and electronics specialists. Individuals with H-1B visas can stay in the United States for three to six years and work only for the sponsoring employer.

LABOR CERTIFICATION Before an employer can submit an H-1B application, it must file a Labor Certification application on a form known as ETA 9035. The employer must agree to provide a wage level at least equal to the wages offered to other individuals with similar experience and qualifications, and must attest that the hiring will not adversely affect other workers similarly employed. The employer is required to inform U.S. workers of the intent to hire a foreign worker by posting the form. The U.S. Department of Labor reviews the applications and may reject them for omissions or inaccuracies.

H-2, O, L, AND E VISAS Other specialty temporary visas are available for other categories of employees. H-2 visas provide for workers performing agricultural labor of a seasonal nature. O visas provide entry for persons who have “extraordinary ability in the sciences, arts, education, business or athletics which has been demonstrated by sustained national or international acclaim.” L visas allow a company’s foreign managers or executives to work inside the United States. E visas permit the entry of certain foreign investors or entrepreneurs.

SECTION 9 LABOR UNIONS

In the 1930s, in addition to the wage and hour laws discussed earlier, Congress enacted several other laws regulating employment relationships. These laws protect employees’ rights to join labor unions, to bargain with management over the terms and conditions of employment, and to conduct strikes.

Federal Labor Laws

Federal labor laws governing union-employer relations have developed considerably since the first law was enacted in 1932. Initially, the laws were concerned with protecting the rights and interests of workers. Subsequent legislation placed some restraints on unions and granted rights to employers. We look here at four major federal statutes regulating union-employer relations.

NORRIS-LAGUARDIA ACT Congress protected peaceful strikes, picketing, and boycotts in 1932 in the Norris-LaGuardia Act.⁴⁰ The statute restricted the power of federal courts to issue injunctions against unions engaged in peaceful strikes. In effect, this act declared a national policy permitting employees to organize.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT One of the foremost statutes regulating labor is the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) of 1935.⁴¹ This act established the rights of employees to engage in collective bargaining and to strike. The act also specifically defined a number of employer practices as unfair to labor:

1. Interference with the efforts of employees to form, join, or assist labor organizations or to engage in concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection.
2. An employer’s domination of a labor organization or contribution of financial or other support to it.
3. Discrimination in the hiring of or the awarding of tenure to employees for reason of union affiliation.
4. Discrimination against employees for filing charges under the act or giving testimony under the act.
5. Refusal to bargain collectively with the duly designated representative of the employees.

The National Labor Relations Board. To ensure that employees’ rights would be protected, the NLRA established the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB). The NLRB has the authority to investigate employees’ charges of unfair labor practices and to file complaints against employers in response to these charges. When violations are found, the NLRB may also issue a cease-and-desist order—an order compelling the employer to stop engaging in unfair practices. Cease-and-desist orders can be enforced by a federal appellate court if necessary. Disputes over alleged unfair labor practices are first decided by the NLRB and may then be appealed to a federal court.

Under the NLRA, employers and unions have a duty to bargain in good faith. Bargaining over certain subjects is mandatory, and a party’s refusal to bargain over these subjects is an unfair labor practice that can be reported to the NLRB. In one case, for example, an employer was required to bargain with the union over the use of hidden video surveillance cameras.⁴²

Workers Protected by the NLRA. To be protected under the NLRA, an individual must be an employee or a job applicant (otherwise, the NLRA's ban on discrimination in regard to hiring would mean little). Additionally, the United States Supreme Court has held that individuals who are hired by a union to organize a company (union organizers) are to be considered employees of the company for NLRA purposes.⁴³ LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT The Labor-Management Relations Act (LMRA) of 1947⁴⁴ was passed to proscribe certain unfair union practices, such as the closed shop. A closed shop is a firm that requires union membership as a condition of employment. Although the act made the closed shop illegal, it preserved the legality of the union shop. A union shop is a firm that does not require union membership as a prerequisite for employment but can, and usually does, require that workers join the union after a specified amount of time on the job.

The LMRA also prohibited unions from refusing to bargain with employers, engaging in certain types of picketing, and featherbedding (causing employers to hire more employees than necessary). In addition, the act allowed individual states to pass their own right-to-work laws—laws making it illegal for union membership to be required for continued employment in any establishment. Thus, union shops are technically illegal in the twenty-two states that have right-to-work laws.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT The Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act (LMRDA) of 1959⁴⁵ established an employee bill of rights and reporting requirements for union activities. The act strictly regulates unions' internal business procedures, including elections. For example, the LMRDA requires unions to hold regularly scheduled elections of officers using secret ballots. Former convicts are prohibited from holding union office. Moreover, union officials are accountable for union property and funds. Members have the right to attend and to participate in union meetings, to nominate officers, and to vote in most union proceedings.

The act also outlawed hot-cargo agreements, in which employers voluntarily agree with unions not to handle, use, or deal in goods of other employers produced by nonunion employees. The act made all such boycotts (called secondary boycotts) illegal.

Union Organization

Forming a union requires support from a majority of the employees in a defined bargaining unit, such as all of the workers at a specific automotive plant or all of the nurses employed by a particular hospital. Typically, the first step union organizers (unionizers) take is to have the workers that the union is seeking to represent sign authorization cards. An authorization card usually states that the worker desires to have a certain union, such as the United Auto Workers, represent the workforce. If a majority of the workers sign authorization cards, the organizers can present the cards to the employer and ask for formal recognition of the union. The employer is not required to recognize the union at this point, but it may do so voluntarily on a showing of majority support. (Under pro-union legislation that has been proposed in the U.S. Congress, the employer would be required to recognize the union as soon as a majority of the workers had signed authorization cards—without holding an election, as described next.⁴⁶)

UNION ELECTIONS If the employer refuses to voluntarily recognize the union after a majority of the workers sign authorization cards—or if fewer than 50 percent of the workers sign authorization cards—the union organizers present the cards to the NLRB with a petition for an election. For an election to be held, the unionizers must demonstrate that at least 30 percent of the workers to be represented support a union or an election on unionization.

The proposed union must also represent an appropriate bargaining unit. Not every group of workers can form a single union. One key requirement to being an appropriate bargaining unit is a mutuality of interest among all the workers to be represented by the union. Factors considered in determining whether there is a mutuality of interest include the similarity of the jobs of all the workers to be unionized and their physical location.

If all of these requirements are met, an election is held. The NLRB supervises the election and ensures secret voting and voter eligibility. If the proposed union receives majority support in a fair election, the NLRB certifies the union as the bargaining representative for the employees.

UNION ELECTION CAMPAIGNS Many disputes between labor and management arise during union election campaigns. Generally, the employer has control over unionizing activities that take place on company property and during working hours. Thus, the employer may limit the campaign activities of union supporters as long as the employer has a legitimate business reason for doing so. The employer may also reasonably limit the times and places that union solicitation occurs, provided that the employer is not discriminating against the union.

Suppose that a union is seeking to organize clerks at a department store owned by Amanti Enterprises. Amanti can prohibit all union solicitation in areas of the store open to the public because the unionizing activities could interfere with the store's business. It can also restrict union-related activities to coffee breaks and lunch hours. Amanti cannot, however, allow solicitation for charitable causes during work hours or in the public part of the store if it prohibits union-related solicitation.

An employer may campaign among its workers against the union, but the NLRB carefully monitors and regulates the tactics used by management. If the employer issued threats ("If the union wins, you'll all be fired") or engaged in other unfair labor practices, the NLRB may certify the union even though it lost the election. Alternatively, the NLRB may ask a court to order a new election.

During a campaign, employers cannot undertake certain types of surveillance of workers or even create the impression of observing workers to identify union sympathizers. Not all management tactics will be deemed illegal, however. In the following case, the question was whether managers' brief interruptions of unionizing activities constituted illegal surveillance in violation of the National Labor Relations Act.

Local Joint Executive Board of Las Vegas v. National Labor Relations Board

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 515 F.3d 942 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Aladdin Gaming, LLC, operates a hotel and casino in Las Vegas, Nevada. On May 30, 2003, Local Joint Executive Board of Las Vegas and two other unions began an open campaign to organize Aladdin's housekeeping, food, and beverage departments. On two occasions during this campaign, human resources managers at Aladdin (Tracy Sapien and Stacey Briand) approached union organizers who were discussing unionization with employees in an employee dining room during a lunch break. Sapien and Briand interrupted the organizers while they were obtaining signatures on authorization cards and asked whether the employees had been fully informed of the facts before signing. The unions filed a complaint with the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) claiming that the managers' actions were illegal surveillance in violation of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA). The NLRB ruled in favor of Aladdin, and the unions appealed.

CALLAHAN, Circuit Judge:

* * * *

Section 8(a)(1) of the NLRA states that "it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title." The [NLRB] has interpreted Section 8(a)(1) to make observation of union activity unlawful, "if the observation goes beyond casual and becomes unduly intrusive." * * * "The test for determining whether an employer engages in unlawful surveillance or whether it creates the impression of surveillance is an objective one and involves the determination of whether the employer's conduct, under the circumstances, was such as would tend to interfere with, restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the [National Labor Relations] Act." [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

There is no evidence that either Ms. Sapien or Ms. Briand used threats, force, or promises of benefits that would strip their speech of the protections of Section 8(c). Ms. Sapien attempted to give the buffet servers additional facts to consider before signing the union cards. Ms. Briand told Ms. Felix [an employee] that Ms. Bueno [another employee] should not sign a union card without fully understanding the consequences and provided her opinion that the union may not be able to deliver on its promises. Ms. Felix voluntarily translated Ms. Briand's comments for Ms. Bueno. After Ms. Felix explained the translation, Ms. Briand left.

CASE 34.3 CONTINUED ♦ DECISION AND REMEDY • The federal appellate court denied the unions' petition for review, concluding that the managers' brief interruptions of organizing activity did not constitute illegal surveillance.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • If management employees had interrupted union-organizing activities twenty-five times rather than just two, would the outcome of this case have been different? Why or why not?

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • An administrative law judge (ALJ) originally ruled that the two brief verbal interruptions by the company's human resources managers were in violation of the National Labor Relations Act. Why might the ALJ have made this ruling?

Collective Bargaining

If the NLRB certifies the union, the union becomes the exclusive bargaining representative of the workers. The central legal right of a union is to engage in collective bargaining on the members' behalf. Collective bargaining is the process by which labor and management negotiate the terms and conditions of employment, including wages, benefits, working conditions, and other matters. Collective bargaining allows union representatives elected by the union members to speak on their behalf at the bargaining table.

When a union is officially recognized, it may demand to bargain with the employer and negotiate new terms or conditions of employment. In collective bargaining, as in most other business negotiations, each side uses its economic power to pressure or persuade the other side to grant concessions.

Bargaining does not mean that one side must give in to the other or that compromises must be made. It does mean that a demand to bargain with the employer must be taken seriously and that both sides must bargain in good faith. Good faith bargaining requires that management must be willing to meet with union representatives and consider the union's wishes when negotiating a contract. Examples of bad faith bargaining on the part of management include engaging in a campaign among workers to undermine the union, constantly shifting positions on disputed contract terms, and sending bargainers who lack authority to commit the company to a contract. If an employer (or a union) refuses to bargain in good faith without justification, it has committed an unfair labor practice, and the other party may petition the NLRB for an order requiring good faith bargaining.

Strikes

Even when labor and management have bargained in good faith, they may be unable to reach a final agreement. When extensive collective bargaining has been conducted and an impasse results, the union may call a strike against the employer to pressure it into making concessions. In a strike, the unionized employees leave their jobs and refuse to work. The workers also typically picket the workplace, walking or standing outside the facility with signs stating their complaints.

A union may strike when the employer has engaged in unfair labor practices, but most strikes are economic strikes, which are initiated because the union wants a better contract. For example, in 2010 the union representing workers at the Disneyland Hotel organized a hunger strike to draw attention to a prolonged contract dispute over workers' health-care benefits and workloads. After two years of negotiations with the hotel, the workers still had no signed contract for health-care benefits.

THE RIGHT TO STRIKE The right to strike is guaranteed by the NLRA, within limits, and strike activities, such as picketing, are protected by the free speech guarantee of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Persons who are not employees have a right to participate in picketing an employer. The NLRA also gives workers the right to refuse to cross a picket line of fellow workers who are engaged in a lawful strike. Employers are permitted to hire replacement workers to substitute for the striking workers.

STRIKER RIGHTS AFTER A STRIKE ENDS An important issue concerns the rights of strikers after a strike ends. In a typical economic strike, the employer has a right to hire permanent replacements during the strike and need not terminate the replacement workers when the economic strikers seek to return to work. In other words, striking workers are not guaranteed the right to return to their jobs after the strike if satisfactory replacement workers have been found.

If the employer has not hired replacement workers to fill the strikers' positions, however, then the employer must rehire the economic strikers to fill any vacancies. Employers may not discriminate against former economic strikers, and those who are rehired retain their seniority rights. Different rules apply when a union strikes because the employer has engaged in unfair labor practices. In this situation, the employer may still hire replacements but must give the strikers back their jobs once the strike is over.

REVIEWING

Employment, Immigration, and Labor Law

Rick Saldona began working as a traveling salesperson for Aimer Winery in 1988. Sales constituted 90 percent of Saldona's work time. Saldona worked an average of fifty hours per week but received no overtime pay. In June 2011, Saldona's new supervisor, Caesar Braxton, claimed that Saldona had been inflating his reported sales calls and required Saldona to submit to a polygraph test. Saldona reported Braxton to the U.S. Department of Labor, which prohibited Aimer from requiring Saldona to take a polygraph test for this purpose. In August 2011, Saldona's wife, Venita, fell from a ladder and sustained a head injury while employed as a full-time agricultural harvester. Saldona delivered to Aimer's Human Resources Department a letter from his wife's physician indicating that she would need daily care for several months, and Saldona took leave until December 2011. Aimer had sixty-three employees at that time. When Saldona returned to Aimer, he was informed that his position had been eliminated because his sales territory had been combined with an adjacent territory. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would Saldona have been legally entitled to receive overtime pay at a higher rate? Why or why not?
2. What is the maximum length of time Saldona would have been allowed to take leave to care for his injured spouse?
3. Under what circumstances would Aimer have been allowed to require an employee to take a polygraph test?
4. Would Aimer likely be able to avoid reinstating Saldona under the key employee exception? Why or why not?

 DEBATE THIS: The U.S. labor market is highly competitive, so state and federal laws that require overtime pay are unnecessary and should be abolished.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

34-1. Unfair Labor Practices Consolidated Stores is undergoing a unionization campaign. Prior to the union election, management states that the union is unnecessary to protect workers. Management also provides bonuses and wage increases to the workers during this period. The employees reject the union. Union organizers protest that the wage increases during the election campaign unfairly prejudiced the vote. Should these wage increases be regarded as an unfair labor practice? Discuss.

34-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Wrongful Discharge.

Denton and Carlo were employed at an appliance plant. Their job required them to perform occasional maintenance work while standing on a wire mesh twenty feet above the plant floor. Other employees had fallen through the mesh, and one of them had been killed by the fall. When their supervisor told them to perform tasks that would likely involve walking on the mesh, Denton and Carlo refused because they feared they might suffer bodily injury or death. Because they refused to do the requested work, the two employees were fired from their jobs. Was their discharge wrongful? If so, under what federal employment law? To what federal agency or department should they turn for assistance?

34–3. Federal Medical Leave Act Jennifer Willis worked for Coca Cola Enterprises, Inc. (CCE), in Louisiana as a senior account manager. On a Monday in May 2003, Willis called her supervisor to tell him that she was sick and would not be able to work that day. She also said that she was pregnant, but she did not say she was sick because of the pregnancy. On Tuesday, she called to ask where to report to work and was told that she could not return without a doctor's release. She said that she had a doctor's appointment on "Wednesday," which her supervisor understood to be the next day. Willis meant the following Wednesday. For more than a week, Willis did not contact CCE. When she returned to work, she was told that she had violated CCE's "No Call/No Show" policy. Under this policy "an employee absent from work for three consecutive days without notifying the supervisor during that period will be considered to have voluntarily resigned." She was fired. Willis filed a suit in a federal district court against CCE under the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA). To be eligible for FMLA leave, an employee must inform an employer of the reason for the leave. Did Willis meet this requirement? Did CCE's response to Willis's absence violate the FMLA? Explain. [Willis v. Coca Cola Enterprises, Inc., 445 F.3d 413 (5th Cir. 2006)]

34–4. Unemployment Insurance Mary Garas, a chemist, sought work in Missouri through Kelly Services, Inc. Kelly is a staffing agency that places individuals in jobs of varying duration with other companies. Through Kelly, Garas worked at Merial Co. from April 2005 to February 2006. After the assignment ended, Garas asked Kelly for more work. Meanwhile, she filed a claim for unemployment benefits with the Missouri Division of Employment Security (DES). In March, Kelly recruiter Rebecca Cockrum told Garas about a temporary assignment with Celsis Laboratory. Garas said that she would prefer a "more stable position," but later asked Cockrum to submit her résumé to Celsis. Before the employer responded, Kelly told the DES that Garas had refused suitable work. Under a Missouri state statute, a claim for unemployment benefits must be denied if "the claimant failed without good cause . . . to accept suitable work when offered the claimant . . . by an employer by whom the individual was formerly employed." The DES denied Garas's claim for benefits. She filed an appeal with a state court. Was the DES's denial right or wrong?

Why? [Garas v. Kelly Services, Inc., 211 S.W.3d 149 (Mo. App.E.D. 2007)]

34–5. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Immigration.

Nicole Tipton and Sadik Seferi owned and operated a restaurant in Iowa. Acting on a tip from the local police, agents of Immigration and Customs Enforcement executed search warrants at the restaurant and at an apartment where some restaurant workers lived. The agents discovered six undocumented aliens working at the restaurant and living together. When the I-9 forms for the restaurant's employees were reviewed, none were found for the six aliens. They were paid in cash while other employees were paid by check. The jury found Tipton and Seferi guilty of hiring and harboring illegal aliens. Both were given prison terms. The defendants challenged the conviction, contending that they did not violate the law because they did not know that the workers were unauthorized aliens. Was that argument credible? Why or why not? [United States v. Tipton, 518 F.3d 591 (8th Cir. 2008)]

34–6. Immigration Work Status Mohammad Hashmi, a citizen of Pakistan, entered the United States in 2002 on a student visa. Two years later, when he applied for a job at CompuCredit, he completed an I-9 form and checked the box to indicate that he was "a citizen or national of the United States." Soon after submitting that form, he married a U.S. citizen. Several months later, the federal immigration services claimed that Hashmi had misrepresented himself as a U.S. citizen. Hashmi contended that he had not misrepresented himself. At an administrative hearing, he testified that when he filled out the I-9 form he believed that he was a "national of the United States" because he was legally in the country under a student visa and was going to marry a U.S. citizen. He requested that his immigration status be adjusted to account for the fact that he was employed and married to an American. The immigration judge rejected that request and found that Hashmi had made a false claim on the I-9 form. He ruled that Hashmi was "inadmissible" to the United States and that his legal status in the country could not be amended because of his marriage or employment. Hashmi appealed. Was it reasonable for Hashmi to think he was a U.S. national? Should his visa status be changed because of his marriage and employment? Why or why not? [Hashmi v. Mukasey, 533 F.3d 700 (8th Cir. 2008)]

34–7. Vesting The United Auto Workers (UAW) represents workers at Caterpillar, Inc., and negotiates labor contracts on their behalf. A 1988 labor agreement provided lifetime no-cost medical benefits for retirees but did not state when the employees' rights to those benefits vested. This agreement expired in 1991. Caterpillar and the UAW did not reach a new agreement until 1998. Under the new agreement, retiree medical benefits were subject to certain limits, and retirees were to be responsible for paying some of the costs. Workers who retired during the period when no agreement was in force filed a suit in a federal district court to obtain benefits under the 1988 agreement. Review the Employee Retirement Income Security Act vesting rules for private pension plans on page 668. What is the most plausible application of those rules to these facts? Why? [Winnett v. Caterpillar, Inc., 553 F.3d 1000 (6th Cir. 2009)]

34-8. Unfair Labor Practices The Laborers' International Union of North America, Local 578, and Shaw Stone & Webster Construction, Inc., were parties to a collective bargaining agreement that covered workers at the company. The agreement contained a union-security provision that required all company employees who were represented by the union to join the union. If an employee failed to join or pay union dues, the union would request that the employee be fired. After Sebedeo Lopez went to work for Shaw Stone, he failed to pay his union initiation fee and monthly dues. Lopez's shop steward told him to pay these fees, although the amount owed was unclear. He was also told that the union was pressing the company to fire him. Lopez agreed to pay the fees and left a money order for $200 at the union's office, but the union claimed that it did not find the money order. Lopez promised to pay another $215 in a few days, but the union demanded his immediate dismissal. Shaw Stone fired him on the spot. Lopez complained to the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), which brought unfair labor practice charges against the union. An administrative law judge ruled against the union, and the NLRB agreed. The union appealed. Was the union guilty of unfair labor practices under the National Labor Relations Act by having Lopez fired? Why or why not? [Laborers' International Union of North America, Local 578 v. National Labor Relations Board, 594 F.3d 732 (10th Cir. 2010)]

34-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Workers' Compensation Law.

In 1999, after working for Atchison Leather Products, Inc., in Kansas for ten years, Beverly Tull began to complain of hand, wrist, and shoulder pain. Atchison recommended that she contact a certain physician, who in April 2000 diagnosed the condition as carpal tunnel syndrome "severe enough" for surgery. In August, Tull filed a claim with the state workers' compensation board. Because Atchison changed workers' compensation insurance companies every year, a dispute arose as to which company should pay Tull's claim. Fearing liability, no insurer would authorize treatment, and Tull was forced to delay surgery until December. The board granted her temporary total disability benefits for the subsequent six weeks that she missed work. On April 23, 2002, Berger Co. bought Atchison. The new employer adjusted Tull's work so that it was less demanding and stressful, but she continued to suffer pain. In July, a physician diagnosed her condition as permanent. The board granted her permanent partial disability benefits. By May 2005, the bickering over the financial responsibility for Tull's claim involved five insurers—four of which had each covered Atchison for a single year and one of which covered Berger. [Tull v. Atchison Leather Products, Inc., 37 Kan.App.2d 87, 150 P.3d 316 (2007)]

- When an injured employee files a claim for workers' compensation, a proceeding is held to assess the injury and determine the amount of compensation. Should a dispute between insurers over the payment of the claim be resolved in the same proceeding? Why or why not?
- The board designated April 23, 2002, as the date of Tull's injury. What is the reason for determining the date of a worker's injury? Should the board in this case have selected this date or a different date? Why?
- How should the board assess liability for the payment of Tull's medical expenses and disability benefits? Would it be appropriate to impose joint and several liability on the insurers (holding each of them responsible for the full amount of damages), or should the individual liability of each of them be determined? Explain.

- In the video, Laura asserts that she can fire Ray "for any reason; for no reason." Is this true? Explain your answer.
- What exceptions to the employment-at-will doctrine are discussed in the chapter? Does Ray's situation fit any of these exceptions?
- Would Ray be protected from wrongful discharge under whistleblowing statutes? Why or why not?
- Assume that you are the employer in this scenario. What arguments can you make that Ray should not be able to sue for wrongful discharge in this situation?

CHAPTER 35

Employment Discrimination

Out of the 1960s civil rights movement to end racial and other forms of discrimination grew a body of law protecting employees against discrimination in the workplace. This protective legislation further eroded the employment-at-will doctrine, which was discussed in Chapter 34. In the past several decades, judicial decisions, administrative agency actions, and legislation have restricted the ability of both employers and unions to discriminate against workers on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, gender, age, or disability. A class of persons defined by one or more of these criteria is known as a protected class.

Several federal statutes prohibit employment discrimination against members of protected classes. The most important statute is Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.¹ Title VII prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, and gender. The Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967² and the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990³ prohibit discrimination on the basis of age and disability, respectively. As was discussed in Chapter 23, the protections afforded under these laws also extend to U.S. citizens who are working abroad for U.S. firms or for companies that are controlled by U.S. firms.

This chapter focuses on the kinds of discrimination prohibited by these federal statutes. Note, however, that discrimination against employees on the basis of any of the above-mentioned criteria may also violate state human rights statutes or other state laws prohibiting discrimination.

TITLE VII OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and its amendments prohibit job discrimination against employees, applicants, and union members on the basis of race, color, national origin, religion, and gender at any stage of employment. It prohibits discrimination in the hiring process, as well as in discipline procedures, discharge, promotion, and benefits. Title VII applies to employers with fifteen or more employees, labor unions with fifteen or more members, labor unions that operate hiring halls (to which members go regularly to be assigned jobs as they become available), employment agencies, and state and local governing units or agencies.

The United States Supreme Court has also ruled that an employer with fewer than fifteen employees is not automatically shielded from a lawsuit filed under Title VII.⁴ A special section of the act prohibits discrimination in most federal government employment. When Title VII applies to the employer, any employee—including an undocumented (alien) worker—can bring an action for employment discrimination.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) monitors compliance with Title VII. A victim of alleged discrimination must first file a claim with the EEOC before a lawsuit can be brought against the employer. The EEOC may investigate the dispute and attempt to obtain the parties' voluntary consent to an out-of-court settlement. If a voluntary agreement cannot be reached, the EEOC may file a suit against the employer on the employee's behalf.

The EEOC does not investigate every claim of employment discrimination. Generally, it takes only "priority cases," such as cases that affect many workers and cases involving retaliatory discharge (firing an employee in retaliation for submitting a claim with the EEOC). If the EEOC decides not to investigate a claim, the victim may bring his or her own lawsuit against the employer.

Intentional and Unintentional Discrimination

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits both intentional and unintentional discrimination.

INTENTIONAL DISCRIMINATION Intentional discrimination by an employer against an employee is known as disparate-treatment discrimination. Because intent may sometimes be difficult to prove, courts have established certain procedures for resolving disparate-treatment cases. Suppose that a woman applies for employment with a construction firm and is rejected. If she sues on the basis of disparate-treatment discrimination in hiring, she must show that (1) she is a member of a protected class, (2) she applied and was qualified for the job in question, (3) she was rejected by the employer, and (4) the employer continued to seek applicants for the position or filled the position with a person not in a protected class.

If the woman can meet these relatively easy requirements, she has made out a prima facie case of illegal discrimination. Making out a prima facie case of discrimination means that the plaintiff has met her initial burden of proof and will win unless the employer can present a legally acceptable defense. (Defenses to claims of employment discrimination will be discussed later in this chapter.) The burden then shifts to the employer-defendant, who must articulate a legal reason for not hiring the plaintiff. For example, the employer might say that the plaintiff was not hired because she lacked sufficient experience or training. To prevail, the plaintiff must then show that the employer's reason is a pretext (not the true reason) and that discriminatory intent actually motivated the employer's decision.

UNINTENTIONAL DISCRIMINATION Employers often use interviews and tests to choose from among a large number of applicants for job openings.

Minimum educational requirements are also common. Some employer practices, such as those involving educational requirements, may have an unintended discriminatory impact on a protected class. Disparate-impact discrimination occurs when a protected group of people is adversely affected by an employer's practices, procedures, or tests, even though they do not appear to be discriminatory.

In a disparate-impact discrimination case, the complaining party must first use one of two statistical methods to show that the employer's practices, procedures, or tests are discriminatory in effect. Under the pool of applicants test, a plaintiff can prove a disparate impact by showing that the percentage of the protected class in the employer's workforce does not reflect the percentage of that group in the pool of qualified individuals available in the local labor market. Alternatively, a plaintiff can prove disparate impact by comparing the selection rates of members of a protected class with the selection rates of nonmembers, regardless of the relative percentages of the two groups in the employer's workforce. Under EEOC guidelines, a selection rate for a protected class that is less than four-fifths, or 80 percent, of the rate for the group with the highest rate of hiring generally will be regarded as evidence of disparate impact.

Once a disparate impact has been proved using one of these methods, the plaintiff must show a causal link between the employer's practice and the discriminatory effect. This establishes a prima facie case, and the burden of proof then shifts to the employer to show that the practices or procedures in question were justified.

Discrimination Based on Race, Color, and National Origin

Title VII prohibits employers from discriminating against employees or job applicants on the basis of race, color, or national origin. Although there has been some uncertainty in the federal courts about what constitutes race versus national origin discrimination, race is interpreted broadly to apply to the ancestry or ethnic characteristics of a group of persons, such as Native Americans. The national origin provisions make it unlawful to discriminate against persons based on their birth in another country, such as Iraq or the Philippines, or their ancestry or culture, such as Hispanic.

If an employer's standards or policies for selecting or promoting employees have a discriminatory effect on employees or job applicants in these protected classes, then a presumption of illegal discrimination arises. To avoid liability, the employer must then show that its standards or policies have a substantial, demonstrable relationship to realistic qualifications for the job in question.

CASE IN POINT Jiann Min Chang was an instructor at Alabama Agricultural and Mechanical University (AAMU). When AAMU terminated his employment, Chang filed a lawsuit claiming discrimination based on national origin. Chang established a prima facie case because he (1) was a member of a protected class, (2) was qualified for the job, (3) suffered an adverse employment action, and (4) was replaced by someone outside his protected class (a non-Asian instructor). When the burden of proof shifted to the employer, however, AAMU showed that Chang had argued with a university vice president and refused to comply with her instructions. The court ruled that the university had not renewed Chang's contract for a legitimate reason—insubordination—and therefore was not liable for unlawful discrimination.⁵

REVERSE DISCRIMINATION Note that Title VII also protects against reverse discrimination—that is, discrimination against majority group individuals, such as white males. For example, if an African American woman fired several white men from their management positions at a school district, the district could be held liable for reverse discrimination unless it had articulated a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for its actions.⁶

In 2009, the United States Supreme Court issued a decision that will have a significant impact on disparate-impact and reverse discrimination litigation. Employers may find the application of the ruling somewhat confusing, however, because the Court found that an employer had engaged in reverse discrimination when it discarded test results in an attempt to avoid unlawful discrimination.

CASE IN POINT The fire department in New Haven, Connecticut, administered a test to determine which firefighters were eligible for promotions. No African Americans and only two Hispanic firefighters passed the test. Fearing that it would be sued for racial discrimination if it used the test results for promotions, the city refused to certify (and basically discarded) the results. The white firefighters (and one Hispanic) who had passed the test then sued the city, claiming reverse discrimination. The lower courts found in favor of the city, but the United States Supreme Court reversed. The Court held that the city's race-conscious, discriminatory actions were not justified. An employer can engage in intentional discrimination to remedy unintentional discrimination only if the employer has “a strong basis in evidence” to believe that it will be successfully sued for disparate-impact discrimination. Mere fear of litigation was not a sufficient reason for the city to discard its test results. The city subsequently promoted all the firefighters involved in the lawsuit.⁷

POTENTIAL SECTION 1981 CLAIMS Victims of racial or ethnic discrimination may also have a cause of action under 42 U.S.C. Section 1981. This section, which was enacted as part of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 to protect the rights of freed slaves, prohibits discrimination on the basis of race or ethnicity in the formation or enforcement of contracts. Because employment is often a contractual relationship, Section 1981 can provide an alternative basis for a plaintiff's action and is potentially advantageous because it does not place a cap on damages (see page 688).

Discrimination Based on Religion

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 also prohibits government employers, private employers, and unions from discriminating against persons because of their religion. Employers cannot treat their employees more or less favorably based on their religious beliefs or practices and cannot require employees to participate in any religious activity (or forbid them from participating in one).

If an employee's religion prohibits her or him from working on a certain day of the week or at a certain type of job, the employer must make a reasonable attempt to accommodate these religious requirements. Employers must reasonably accommodate an employee's sincerely held religious belief even if the belief is not based on the doctrines of a traditionally recognized religion, such as Christianity or Judaism, or denomination, such as Baptist.

Discrimination Based on Gender

Under Title VII, as well as under other federal acts (including the Equal Pay Act of 1963, which is discussed next), employers are forbidden from discriminating against employees on the basis of gender. Employers are prohibited from classifying jobs as male or female and from advertising in help-wanted columns that are designated male or female unless the employer can prove that the gender of the applicant is essential to the job. Employers also cannot have separate male and female seniority lists or refuse to promote employees based on their gender.

5. Jiann Min Chang v. Alabama Agricultural and Mechanical University, 2009 WL 3403180 (11th Cir. 2009).

Generally, to succeed in a suit for gender discrimination, a plaintiff must demonstrate that gender was a determining factor in the employer's decision to hire, fire, or promote him or her. Typically, this involves looking at all of the surrounding circumstances.

CASE IN POINT The EEOC filed a lawsuit against a plastics manufacturer, Polycon Industries, Inc. The EEOC alleged that the company had reserved higher-paying production jobs for male employees and refused to promote female workers to these jobs because of their gender. The EEOC decided to pursue the case when it received complaints from women who had applied for production jobs but had never even been interviewed.⁸

The Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978,⁹ which amended Title VII, expanded the definition of gender discrimination to include discrimination based on pregnancy. Women affected by pregnancy, childbirth, or related medical conditions must be treated—for all employment-related purposes, including the receipt of benefits under employee benefit programs—the same as other persons not so affected but similar in ability to work.

EQUAL PAY ACT The Equal Pay Act of 1963¹⁰ prohibits employers from engaging in gender-based wage discrimination. For the act's equal pay requirements to apply, the male and female employees must work at the same establishment doing similar work. The work need not be identical, provided that it involves substantial equality in skill, effort, responsibility, and working conditions. To determine whether the Equal Pay Act has been violated, a court will look at the primary duties of the two jobs, focusing on the job content rather than the job description.¹¹ If the court finds that the wage differential is based on a permissible practice, such as a seniority or merit system, it does not violate the Equal Pay Act.

2009 EQUAL PAY LEGISLATION More than four decades after the Equal Pay Act was enacted, there is still a significant gap between the wages earned by male and female employees in the United States. Women typically earn about three-quarters of what men earn. This continuing disparity prompted Congress to pass the Paycheck Fairness Act of 2009, which closed some loopholes in the Equal Pay Act that allowed employers to justify wage discrimination if it was based on any factor other than gender. The Paycheck Fairness Act clarifies the defenses that employers may offer and prohibits the use of gender-based differentials in assessing an employee's education, training, or experience. The act also provides additional remedies for wage discrimination, including compensatory and punitive damages, which are available as remedies for discrimination based on race and national origin.

In another 2009 action, Congress responded to a 2007 decision by the United States Supreme Court that required a plaintiff alleging wage discrimination to file a complaint within 180 days of the decision that set the discriminatory pay.¹² Congress rejected this limit when it enacted the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009.¹³ The act makes discriminatory wages actionable under federal law regardless of when the discrimination began. Each time a person is paid discriminatory wages, benefits, or other compensation, a cause of action arises (and the plaintiff has 180 days from that date to file a complaint). In other words, if a plaintiff continues to work for the employer while receiving discriminatory wages, the time period for filing a complaint is basically unlimited.

Constructive Discharge

The majority of Title VII complaints involve unlawful discrimination in decisions to hire or fire employees. In some situations, however, employees who leave their jobs voluntarily can claim that they were “constructively discharged” by the employer. Constructive discharge occurs when the employer causes the employee's working conditions to be so intolerable that a reasonable person in the employee's position would feel compelled to quit.

PROVING CONSTRUCTIVE DISCHARGE The plaintiff must present objective proof of intolerable working conditions, which the employer knew or had reason to know about yet failed to correct within a reasonable time period. Courts generally also require the employee to show causation—that the employer’s unlawful discrimination caused the working conditions to be intolerable. Put a different way, the employee’s resignation must be a foreseeable result of the employer’s discriminatory action. Although courts weigh the facts on a case-by-case basis, employee demotion is one of the most frequently cited reasons for a finding of constructive discharge, particularly when the employee was subjected to humiliation.

For example, Khalil’s employer humiliates him by informing him in front of his co-workers that he is being demoted to an inferior position. Khalil’s co-workers then continually insult, harass, and make derogatory remarks to him about his national origin (he is from Iraq). The employer is aware of this discriminatory treatment but does nothing to remedy the situation, despite repeated complaints from Khalil. After several months, Khalil quits his job and files a Title VII claim. In this situation, Khalil would likely have sufficient evidence to maintain an action for constructive discharge in violation of Title VII.

APPLIES TO ALL TITLE VII DISCRIMINATION Note that constructive discharge is a theory that plaintiffs can use to establish any type of discrimination claims under Title VII, including race, color, national origin, religion, gender, pregnancy, and sexual harassment. Constructive discharge has also been successfully used in situations that involve discrimination based on age or disability (both of which will be discussed later in this chapter). Constructive discharge is most commonly asserted in cases involving sexual harassment, however.

When constructive discharge is claimed, the employee can pursue damages for loss of income, including back pay. These damages ordinarily are not available to an employee who left a job voluntarily.

Sexual Harassment

Title VII also protects employees against sexual harassment in the workplace. Sexual harassment can take two forms: quid pro quo harassment and hostile-environment harassment. Quid pro quo is a Latin phrase that is often translated as “something in exchange for something else.” Quid pro quo harassment occurs when sexual favors are demanded in return for job opportunities, promotions, salary increases, or other benefits. According to the United States Supreme Court, hostile-environment harassment occurs when “the workplace is permeated with discriminatory intimidation, ridicule, and insult, that is sufficiently severe or pervasive to alter the conditions of the victim’s employment and create an abusive working environment.”¹⁴

The courts determine whether the sexually offensive conduct was sufficiently severe or pervasive to create a hostile environment on a case-by-case basis. Typically, a single incident of sexually offensive conduct is not enough to permeate the work environment (although there have been exceptions when the conduct was particularly objectionable).¹⁵ Note also that if the employee who is alleging sexual harassment has signed an employment contract containing an arbitration clause (see Chapter 3), she or he will most likely be required to arbitrate the claim.¹⁶

HARASSMENT BY SUPERVISORS For an employer to be held liable for a supervisor’s sexual harassment, the supervisor normally must have taken a tangible employment action against the employee. A tangible employment action is a significant change in employment status or benefits, such as when an employee is fired, refused a promotion, demoted, or reassigned to a position with significantly different responsibilities. Only a supervisor, or another person acting with the authority of the employer, can cause this sort of harm. A co-worker cannot dock another employee’s pay, demote her or him, or set conditions for continued employment, for example. A constructive discharge also qualifies as a tangible employment action.¹⁷

THE ELLERTH/FARAGHER AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSE In 1998, the United States Supreme Court issued several important rulings that have had a lasting impact on cases involving alleged sexual harassment by supervisors.¹⁸ The Court held that an employer (a city) was liable for a supervisor’s harassment of employees even though the employer was unaware of the behavior. Although the city had a written policy against sexual harassment, it had not distributed the policy to its employees and had not established any complaint procedures for employees who felt that they had been sexually harassed. In another case, the Court held that an employer can be liable for a supervisor's sexual harassment even though the employee does not suffer adverse job consequences.

The Court's decisions in these cases established what has become known as the Ellerth/Faragher affirmative defense to charges of sexual harassment. The defense has two elements:

1. The employer must have taken reasonable care to prevent and promptly correct any sexually harassing behavior (by establishing effective harassment policies and complaint procedures, for example).
2. The plaintiff-employee must have unreasonably failed to take advantage of preventive or corrective opportunities provided by the employer to avoid harm.

An employer that can prove both elements will not be liable for a supervisor's harassment.

RETALIATION BY EMPLOYERS Employers sometimes retaliate against employees who complain about sexual harassment or other Title VII violations. Retaliation can take many forms. An employer might demote or fire the person, or otherwise change the terms, conditions, and benefits of employment. Title VII prohibits retaliation, and employees can sue their employers when it occurs. In a retaliation claim, an individual asserts that she or he has suffered a harm as a result of making a charge, testifying, or participating in a Title VII investigation or proceeding. In a 2009 decision, the United States Supreme Court held that Title VII's retaliation protection extends to an employee who speaks out about discrimination not on her or his own initiative, but in answering questions during an employer's internal investigation of another employee's complaint.¹⁹

At one time, the courts disagreed as to whether the plaintiff had to show that the challenged action adversely affected the terms or conditions of employment to prove retaliation. In the following case, the United States Supreme Court resolved the question of whether Title VII's ban on retaliation covers acts that are not job related.

Burlington Northern and Santa Fe Railroad Co. v. White

Supreme Court of the United States, 548 U.S. 53, 126 S.Ct. 2405, 165 L.Ed.2d 345 (2006).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice BREYER delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * * *

* * * Sheila White

[was] the only woman working in the Maintenance of Way department at [Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Railway Company's] Tennessee Yard.

In September 1997, White complained to Burlington officials that her * * * supervisor, Bill Joiner, had repeatedly told her that women should not be working in the Maintenance of Way department. [Joiner was disciplined. White was reassigned from forklift duty to "track laborer" tasks.]

* * * * *

On October 10, White filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC * * *).

[In December, White's supervisor, Percy Sharkey, complained to Burlington officials that White had been insubordinate. She was suspended without pay but reinstated after an investigation and awarded back pay for the period of the suspension. White filed a second charge with the EEOC.]

* * * * *

* * * [Later,] White filed this Title VII action against Burlington

in federal [district] court. * * * She claimed that Burlington's actions—(1) changing her job responsibilities, and (2) suspending her * * * without pay—amounted to unlawful retaliation in violation of Title VII. A jury found in White's favor * * * [and] awarded her $43,500 in * * * damages * * * .

* * * [On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit held that Title VII's antiretaliation ban is limited to acts that adversely affect the terms, conditions, or benefits of employment, and] affirmed the District Court's judgment in White's favor on both retaliation claims. [Burlington appealed to the United States Supreme Court.]

* * * *
 * * * The language of the [antidiscrimination] provision differs from that of the anti-retaliation provision in important ways.

The * * * words in the [anti-discrimination] provision—“hire,” “discharge,” “compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment,” “employment opportunities,” and “status as an employee”—explicitly limit the scope of that provision to actions that affect employment or alter the conditions of the workplace. No such limiting words appear in the anti-retaliation provision.

* * * The two provisions differ not only in language but in purpose as well. The anti-discrimination provision seeks a workplace where individuals are not discriminated against because of their racial, ethnic, religious, or gender-based status. The anti-retaliation provision seeks to secure that primary objective by preventing an employer from interfering (through retaliation) with an employee's efforts to secure or advance enforcement of the Act's basic guarantees. The [anti-discrimination] provision seeks to prevent injury to individuals based on who they are, i.e., their status. The anti-retaliation provision seeks to prevent harm to individuals based on what they do, i.e., their conduct. [Emphasis added.]

To secure the first objective, Congress did not need to prohibit anything other than employment-related discrimination.

But one cannot secure the second objective by focusing only upon employer actions and harm that concern employment and the workplace. * * * An employer can effectively retaliate against an employee by taking actions not directly related to his employment or by causing him harm outside the workplace. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *
 * * * We conclude that * * * the anti-retaliation provision extends beyond workplace-related or employment-related retaliatory acts * * * .

* * * *
 * * * A plaintiff must show that a reasonable employee would have found the challenged action materially adverse, which in this context means it well might have dissuaded a reasonable worker from making or supporting a charge of discrimination.

* * * *
 * * * [In this case,] the track labor duties were by all accounts more arduous and dirtier; * * * the forklift operator position required more qualifications, which is an indication of prestige; and * * * the forklift operator position was objectively considered a better job and the male employees resented White for occupying it. Based on this record, a jury could reasonably conclude that the reassignment of responsibilities would have been materially adverse to a reasonable employee.

* * * *
 For these reasons, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. Why did the Court evaluate the language of Title VII's antidiscrimination and antiretaliation provisions?
2. What was the Court's interpretation of those provisions?

HARASSMENT BY CO-WORKERS AND OTHERS When the harassment of co-workers, rather than supervisors, creates a hostile working environment, an employee may still have a cause of action against the employer. Normally, though, the employer will be held liable only if it knew or should have known about the harassment and failed to take immediate remedial action.

Occasionally, a court may also hold an employer liable for harassment by nonemployees if the employer knew about the harassment and failed to take corrective action. Suppose that Gordon, who owns and manages a Great Bites restaurant, knows that one of his regular customers, Dean, repeatedly harasses Sharon, a waitress. If Gordon does nothing and permits the harassment to continue, he may be liable under Title VII even though Dean is not an employee of the restaurant.

CASE IN POINT Kathleen Torres-Negrón, a sales representative at Merck & Company, Inc., was temporarily assigned to work in Mexico at Merck-Mexico (a subsidiary of Merck). She claimed that she was being sexually harassed and informed the supervisor in Mexico. When she filed a lawsuit, Merck argued that it should not be liable because the alleged harassers were employed by Merck-Mexico and not by the U.S.-based Merck. Although the trial court granted a summary judgment in Merck's favor, an appellate court held that there was a sufficient issue of fact as to whether Merck and Merck-Mexico could be considered a single employer for purposes of a Title VII claim. Thus, the court ruled that there was enough evidence of Merck's control over the alleged harassers for the employee to take her case to a jury.²⁰

SAME-GENDER HARASSMENT In 1998, in the landmark case Oncale v. Sundowner Offshore Services, Inc.,²¹ the Supreme Court held that Title VII protection extends to situations in which individuals are sexually harassed by members of the same gender. It can be difficult, though, to prove that the harassment in same-gender cases is “based on sex.” When the victim is homosexual, some courts have found that the harasser's conduct does not qualify as sexual harassment under Title VII because it was based on the employee's sexual orientation, not on his or her “sex.”²² It is easier to establish a case of same-gender harassment when the harasser is homosexual.²³

Although federal law (Title VII) does not prohibit discrimination or harassment based on a person's sexual orientation, a growing number of states have enacted laws that prohibit sexual orientation discrimination in private employment.²⁴ Many companies have also voluntarily established nondiscrimination policies that include sexual orientation.

Online Harassment

Employees' online activities can create a hostile working environment in many ways. Racial jokes, ethnic slurs, or other comments contained in e-mail, text or instant messages, and blog posts can become the basis for a claim of hostile-environment harassment or other forms of discrimination. A worker who regularly sees sexually explicit images on a co-worker's computer screen may find the images offensive and claim that they create a hostile working environment.²⁵ Nevertheless, employers may be able to avoid liability for online harassment by taking prompt remedial action.

CASE IN POINT While working at WorldCom Corporation, Angela Daniels received racially harassing e-mailed jokes from another employee. Shortly afterward, the company issued a warning to the offending employee about the proper use of the e-mail system and held two meetings to discuss company policy on the use of the system. In Daniels's suit against WorldCom for racial discrimination, a federal district court concluded that the employer was not liable for its employee's racially harassing e-mails because the employer took prompt remedial action.²⁶

Remedies under Title VII

Employer liability under Title VII may be extensive. If the plaintiff successfully proves that unlawful discrimination occurred, he or she may be awarded reinstatement, back pay, retroactive promotions, and damages. Compensatory damages are available only in cases of intentional discrimination. Punitive damages may be recovered against a private employer only if the employer acted with malice or reckless indifference to an individual's rights. The statute limits the total amount of compensatory and punitive damages that plaintiffs can recover from specific employers (ranging from $50,000 from employers with one hundred or fewer employees to $300,000 from employers with more than five hundred employees).

DISCRIMINATION BASED ON AGE

Age discrimination is potentially the most widespread form of discrimination, because anyone—regardless of race, color, national origin, or gender—could be a victim at some point in life. The Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) of 1967, as amended, prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of age against individuals forty years of age or older. The act also prohibits mandatory retirement for nonmanagerial workers. The United States Supreme Court has made it clear that the text and the legislative history of the ADEA show that it was meant to protect relatively older workers from discrimination that gives an unfair advantage to the relatively young. For the act to apply, an employer must have twenty or more employees, and the employer's business activities must affect interstate commerce. The EEOC administers the ADEA, but the act also permits private causes of action against employers for age discrimination.

Procedures under the ADEA

The burden-shifting procedure under the ADEA differs from the procedure under Title VII as a result of a United States Supreme Court decision, which dramatically changed the burden of proof in age discrimination cases.²⁷ As explained earlier, if the plaintiff in a Title VII case can show that the employer was motivated, at least in part, by unlawful discrimination, the burden of proof shifts to the employer to articulate a legitimate nondiscriminatory reason for the challenged action. Thus, in cases in which the employer has a “mixed motive” for discharging an employee, the employer has the burden of proving its reason was legitimate.

27. Gross v. FBL Financial Services, Inc., ___ U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 2343, 174 L.Ed.2d 119 (2009).

Under the ADEA, in contrast, a plaintiff must show that the unlawful discrimination was not just a reason but the reason for the adverse employment action. In other words, the employee has the burden of persuasion to establish but for causation—that is, that age discrimination was, in fact, the reason for the adverse decision. Thus, to establish a prima facie case, the plaintiff must show that she or he (1) was a member of the protected age group, (2) was qualified for the position from which she or he was discharged, and (3) was discharged because of age discrimination. Then the burden shifts to the employer. If the employer offers a legitimate reason for its action, then the plaintiff must show that the stated reason is only a pretext for the employer’s decision. The following case illustrates this process.

Mora v. Jackson Memorial Foundation, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Eleventh Circuit, 597 F.3d 1201 (2010).
www.ca11.uscourts.gov/opinions/search.php^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Josephine Mora was sixty-two years old when she was fired from her job as a fund-raiser for Jackson Memorial Foundation, Inc. Mora’s supervisor had become dissatisfied with Mora’s work and recommended that she be fired. The foundation’s chief executive officer, Mr. Rodriguez, agreed. Later, though, Rodriguez decided to give Mora a different position in his office “where he could observe her more closely.” Mora worked with Rodriguez for a month, and more errors and issues with professionalism supposedly arose. Mora contended that when Rodriguez fired her, he told her, “I need someone younger I can pay less.” A former employee stated that she had heard this conversation, adding that she heard Rodriguez say to Mora, “You are very old, you are very inept. What you should be doing is taking care of old people. They really need you. I need somebody younger that I can pay less and I can control.” Another former employee stated that Rodriguez explained to her and another employee that Mora was “too old to be working here anyway.” Rodriguez denied that he had made these statements, and one of the employees substantiated Rodriguez’s version of events. Mora sued the foundation in a federal district court for wrongful termination under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA). The foundation moved for summary judgment, arguing that regardless of the discrimination issue, Mora still would have been terminated for poor job performance. The district court granted the motion, and Mora appealed.

PER CURIAM [By the Whole Court].

After Plaintiff [Mora] appealed, the Supreme Court, in Gross v. FBL Financial Services, Inc.,^b clarified the nature of ADEA claims. The Supreme Court concluded that ADEA claims are not subject to the burden-shifting protocol set forth for Title VII suits in CASE 35.2 CONTINUED ♦ Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins.^c The ADEA requires that “age [be] the reason that the employer decided to act.” Because an ADEA plaintiff must establish “but for” causality, no “same decision” affirmative defense [the argument that the same decision—to fire someone, for example—would have been made regardless of the alleged discrimination] can exist: the employer either acted “because of” the plaintiff’s age or it did not. [Emphasis added.]

Because the Supreme Court has excluded the whole idea of a “mixed motive” ADEA claim—and the corresponding “same decision” defense—we need not consider the district court’s analysis of Defendant’s [the foundation’s] affirmative defense. Instead, * * * we look to determine whether a material factual question exists on this record about whether Defendant discriminated against her. We say “Yes.”

* * * *

A plaintiff in an ADEA claim may “establish a claim of illegal age discrimination through either direct evidence or circumstantial evidence.” Plaintiff’s testimony that Rodriguez fired her because she was “too old” was substantiated by the affidavits of two other employees of Defendant. Rodriguez and Quevedo [another employee] testified that no such comments were made * * * .

The resolution of this case depends on whose account of the pertinent conversations a jury would credit. We conclude that a reasonable juror could accept that Rodriguez made the discriminatory-sounding remarks and that the remarks are sufficient evidence of a discriminatory motive which was the “but for” cause of Plaintiff’s dismissal. Summary judgment for Defendant was therefore incorrect.

We have considered cases factually similar to Plaintiff’s. In [one case], we concluded that statements from a county official who “didn’t want to hire any old pilots” were direct evidence of discrimination * * * . In [another case], we likewise concluded that an employer’s statement that he wanted “aggressive, young men like himself to be promoted” was circumstantial evidence of discrimination.

While these cases were litigated under the now-defunct ADEA mixed motive theory, they remain instructive. Plaintiff’s situation is similar. A reasonable juror could find that Rodriguez’s statements should be taken at face value and that he fired Plaintiff because of her age.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit vacated (set aside) the decision of the trial court and remanded the case for further proceedings. Because there was a “disputed question of material fact” as to whether the plaintiff had been fired because of her age, the defendant was not entitled to summary judgment.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Is the court’s decision in this case fair to employers? Why or why not?

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • Business owners and supervisory personnel should be careful to avoid statements regarding an employee’s age that may sound discriminatory. If the employee later has to be dismissed due to poor performance, comments about his or her age may become the basis for an age discrimination lawsuit.

c. 490 U.S. 228, 109 S.Ct. 1775, 104 L.Ed.2d 268 (1989).

Replacing Older Workers with Younger Workers

Numerous age discrimination cases have been brought against employers who, to cut costs, replaced older, higher-salaried employees with younger, lower-salaried workers. Whether a firing is discriminatory or simply part of a rational business decision to prune the company’s ranks is not always clear. Companies typically defend a decision to discharge a worker by asserting that the worker could no longer perform her or his duties or that the worker’s skills were no longer needed.

A plaintiff must prove only that the discharge was motivated by age bias. The plaintiff does not need to prove that she or he was replaced by a person “outside the protected class” (under the age of forty years), as long as the replacement worker is younger than the plaintiff.²⁸ The issue in all ADEA cases is whether age discrimination has, in fact, occurred, regardless of the age of the replacement worker. Nevertheless, the bigger the age gap, the more likely the plaintiff is to succeed in showing age discrimination.

When an older worker who is laid off as part of a restructuring subsequently files a suit against the company for age discrimination, he or she must present evidence that the layoff was motivated by age bias. Relevant evidence that will be allowed at trial might include testimony from other employees or former employees concerning the company's attitudes toward the workers' ages.²⁹

State Employees Not Covered by the ADEA

Generally, the states are immune under the Eleventh Amendment from lawsuits brought by private individuals in federal court—unless a state consents to the suit. This immunity stems from the United States Supreme Court's interpretation of the Eleventh Amendment (the text of this amendment is included in Appendix B).

CASE IN POINT In two cases, professors and librarians contended that their employers—two Florida state universities—denied them salary increases and other benefits because they were getting old and their successors could be hired at a lower cost. The universities claimed that as agencies of a sovereign state, they could not be sued without the state's consent. The cases ultimately reached the United States Supreme Court, which held that the Eleventh Amendment bars private parties from suing state employers for violations of the ADEA.³⁰

State immunity under the Eleventh Amendment is not absolute, as the Court explained in 2004. In some situations, such as when fundamental rights are at stake, Congress has the power to abrogate (abolish) state immunity to private suits through legislation that unequivocally shows Congress's intent to subject states to private suits.³¹ Generally, though, the Court has found that state employers are immune from private suits brought by employees under the ADEA (for age discrimination), the

Americans with Disabilities Act (for disability-based discrimination),³² and the Fair Labor Standards Act.³³ As explained in Chapter 34, state employers are not immune from the requirements of the Family and Medical Leave Act.³⁴

SECTION 3 DISCRIMINATION BASED ON DISABILITY

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) of 1990 is designed to eliminate discriminatory employment practices that prevent otherwise qualified workers with disabilities from fully participating in the national labor force. The ADA prohibits disability-based discrimination in all workplaces with fifteen or more workers (with the exception of state government employers, who are generally immune under the Eleventh Amendment, as was just discussed). Basically, the ADA requires that employers “reasonably accommodate” the needs of persons with disabilities unless to do so would cause the employer to suffer an “undue hardship.” In 2008, Congress enacted the ADA Amendments Act,³⁵ which broadened the coverage of the ADA's protections, as discussed shortly.

Procedures under the ADA

To prevail on a claim under the ADA, a plaintiff must show that he or she (1) has a disability, (2) is otherwise qualified for the employment in question, and (3) was excluded from the employment solely because of the disability. As in Title VII cases, the plaintiff must pursue his or her claim through the EEOC before filing an action in court for a violation of the ADA. The EEOC may decide to investigate and perhaps even sue the employer on behalf of the employee. The EEOC can bring a suit on behalf of the employee under the ADA even if the employee signed an arbitration agreement with the employer.³⁶

If the EEOC decides not to sue, then the employee may do so. Plaintiffs in lawsuits brought under the ADA may seek many of the same remedies that are available under Title VII. These include reinstatement, back pay, a limited amount of compensatory and punitive damages (for intentional discrimination), and certain other forms of relief. Repeat violators may be ordered to pay fines of up to $100,000.

What Is a Disability?

The ADA broadly defines persons with disabilities as persons with physical or mental impairments that “substantially limit” their everyday activities. More specifically, the ADA defines a disability as “(1) a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more of the major life activities of such individuals; (2) a record of such impairment; or (3) being regarded as having such an impairment.”

Health conditions that have been considered disabilities under federal law include blindness, alcoholism, heart disease, cancer, muscular dystrophy, cerebral palsy, paraplegia, diabetes, acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS), testing positive for the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV, the virus that causes AIDS), and morbid obesity (which exists when an individual’s weight is two times the normal weight for his or her height). The ADA excludes from coverage certain conditions, such as kleptomania (the obsessive desire to steal).

AN INITIAL NARROW INTERPRETATION Although the ADA’s definition of disability is broad, United States Supreme Court rulings from 1999 to 2007 interpreted that definition narrowly and made it harder for employees to establish a disability under the act. In 1999, the Supreme Court held that severe myopia, or nearsightedness, which can be corrected with lenses, does not qualify as a disability under the ADA.³⁷ In 2002, the Supreme Court held that repetitive-stress injuries (such as carpal tunnel syndrome) ordinarily do not constitute a disability under the ADA.³⁸ After that ruling, the courts began focusing on how the person functioned when using corrective devices or taking medication, not on how the person functioned without these measures.³⁹

2008 AMENDMENTS BROADEN DEFINITION In response to the Supreme Court’s limiting decisions, Congress decided to amend the ADA in 2008. Basically, the amendments reverse the Court’s restrictive interpretation of disability under the ADA and prohibit employers from considering mitigating measures or medications when determining if an individual has a disability. As a result, disability is now determined on a case-by-case basis.

A condition may fit the definition of disability in one set of circumstances, but not in another. What makes the difference in an individual situation? The court in the following case answered that question.

CASE 35.3

Rohr v. Salt River Project Agricultural Improvement and Power District

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 555 F.3d 850 (2009).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Diabetes is a chronic disease associated with an increased risk of heart disease, stroke, high blood pressure, blindness, kidney disease, nervous system disease, and amputations, among other things. Larry Rohr has type 2 diabetes, which results from the body’s failure to use insulin properly. He tires quickly and suffers from high blood pressure, deteriorating vision, and loss of feeling in his hands and feet. Insulin injections, other medicine, blood tests, and a strict diet are fixtures of his daily life. If he fails to follow this regimen, his blood sugar rises to a level that aggravates his disease. At the time of his diagnosis, he was a welding metallurgy specialist for the Salt River Project Agricultural Improvement and Power District, which provides utility services to homes in Arizona. Due to the effort required to manage his diabetes, particularly his strict diet schedule, Rohr’s physician forbade CASE 35.3 CONTINUED ♦ his assignment to tasks involving overnight, out-of-town travel. Salt River told Rohr that this would prevent him from performing the essential functions of his job, such as responding to power outages. Rohr was asked to transfer, apply for disability benefits, or take early retirement. He filed a suit in a federal district court against Salt River, alleging discrimination. The court issued a summary judgment in the employer's favor. Rohr appealed.

BAER, Senior District Judge:

* * * *

The ADA defines “disability,” in pertinent part, as “a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more of the major life activities of such individual.” Diabetes is a “physical impairment” because it affects the digestive, hemic [blood] and endocrine systems, and eating is a “major life activity.” Whether Rohr’s diabetes substantially limits his eating is an individualized inquiry. Once an impairment is found, the issue is whether Rohr’s diabetes substantially limits his activity of eating. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

To determine whether an insulin-dependent type 2 diabetic like Rohr is substantially limited in his eating, we must compare the condition, manner or duration under which he can eat as compared to the condition, manner or duration under which the average person in the general population can eat.

* * * *

Finally, we must consider not only whether the symptoms of Rohr’s diabetes substantially limit one of his major life activities, but also whether his efforts to mitigate [diminish] the disease constitute a substantial limitation.

* * * *

* * * For people like Rohr, who must treat their diabetes with insulin, the failure to take insulin will result in severe problems and eventually death. Insulin injections themselves can be dangerous. * * * It is difficult to determine how much insulin to take, as the necessary amount varies depending on the food and activity level. * * * To obtain the appropriate balance, Rohr must test his blood glucose levels * * * numerous times a day.

If daily insulin injections alone more or less stabilized Rohr’s blood sugar levels, such that any limitation imposed on his diet would be minor, then Rohr’s major life activity of eating might not be substantially limited. However, [there are] substantial limitations on his eating in spite of his medicine and insulin. He must snack regularly, plan his daily schedule around his diet, avoid skipping meals and eat immediately when he feels dizzy or light-headed. * * * Straying from a diet for more than one or two meals is not a cause for medical concern for most people, and skipping a meal, or eating a large one, does not expose them to the risk of fainting. * * * For Rohr, the effort required to control his diet is itself substantially limiting.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit vacated the lower court’s judgment and remanded the case for trial. Diabetes satisfies the ADA’s definition of “disability” if it significantly restricts an individual’s eating.

THE E-COMMERCE DIMENSION • If Rohr could have monitored his condition and regimen through a cell phone or other portable Internet connection, would the result in this case likely have been affected? Explain.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Salt River argued that type 1 diabetes is harder to control than Rohr’s type 2 diabetes. Assuming this is true, would it support a conclusion that Rohr does not suffer from a disability? Why or why not?

Reasonable Accommodation

The ADA does not require that employers accommodate the needs of job applicants or employees with disabilities who are not otherwise qualified for the work. If a job applicant or an employee with a disability, with reasonable accommodation, can perform essential job functions, however, the employer must make the accommodation. Required modifications may include installing ramps for a wheelchair, establishing flexible working hours, creating or modifying job assignments, and designing or improving training materials and procedures.

Generally, employers should give primary consideration to employees' preferences in deciding what accommodations should be made.

UNDUE HARDSHIP Employers who do not accommodate the needs of persons with disabilities must demonstrate that the accommodations would cause undue hardship in terms of being significantly difficult or expensive for the employer. Usually, the courts decide whether an accommodation constitutes an undue hardship on a case-by-case basis.

For example, Bryan Lockhart, who uses a wheelchair, works for a cell phone company that provides parking for its employees. Lockhart informs the company supervisors that the parking spaces are so narrow that he is unable to extend the ramp on his van that allows him to get in and out of the vehicle. Lockhart therefore requests that the company reasonably accommodate his needs by paying a monthly fee for him to use a larger parking space in an adjacent lot. In this situation, a court would likely find that it would not be an undue hardship for the employer to pay for additional parking for Lockhart.

JOB APPLICATIONS AND PHYSICAL EXAMS Employers must modify their job-application and selection process so that those with disabilities can compete for jobs with those who do not have disabilities. For instance, a job announcement might be modified to allow job applicants to respond by e-mail or letter, as well as by telephone, so that it does not discriminate against potential applicants with hearing impairments.

Employers are restricted in the kinds of questions they may ask on job-application forms and during preemployment interviews. In addition, employers cannot require persons with disabilities to submit to preemployment physicals unless such exams are required of all other applicants. An employer can condition an offer of employment on the applicant's successfully passing a medical examination, but can only disqualify the applicant if the medical problems discovered would make it impossible for the applicant to perform the job. For example, when filling the position of delivery truck driver, a company cannot screen out all applicants who are unable to meet the U.S. Department of Transportation's hearing standard. The company would first have to prove that drivers who are deaf are not qualified to perform the essential job function of driving safely and pose a higher risk of accidents than drivers who are not deaf.⁴⁰

40. See, for example, Bates v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 465 F.3d 1069 (9th Cir. 2006).

SUBSTANCE ABUSERS Drug addiction is considered a disability under the ADA because it is a substantially limiting impairment. Those who are actually using illegal drugs are not protected by the act, however. The ADA protects only persons with former drug addictions—those who have completed or are now in a supervised drug-rehabilitation program. Individuals who have used drugs casually in the past are not protected under the act. They are not considered addicts and therefore do not have a disability (addiction).

People suffering from alcoholism are protected by the ADA. Employers cannot legally discriminate against employees simply because they suffer from alcoholism. Of course, employers have the right to prohibit the use of alcohol in the workplace and can require that employees not be under the influence of alcohol while working. Employers can also fire or refuse to hire a person who is an alcoholic if he or she poses a substantial risk of harm either to himself or herself or to others and the risk cannot be reduced by reasonable accommodation.

HEALTH-INSURANCE PLANS Workers with disabilities must be given equal access to any health insurance provided to other employees. Nevertheless, an employer can put a limit, or cap, on health-care payments under its group health policy as long as the cap is applied equally to all insured employees and does not discriminate on the basis of disability. Whenever a group health-care plan makes a disability-based distinction in its benefits, the plan violates the ADA (unless the employer can justify its actions under the business necessity defense, as will be discussed later in this chapter).

Association Discrimination

The ADA contains an “association provision” that protects qualified individuals from employment discrimination based on an identified disability of a person with whom the qualified individual is known to have a relationship or an association.⁴¹ The purpose of this provision is to prevent employers from taking adverse employment actions based on stereotypes or assumptions about individuals who associate with people who have disabilities. An employer cannot, for instance, refuse to hire the parent of a child with a disability based on the assumption that the person will miss work too often or be unreliable.

To establish a prima facie case of association discrimination under the ADA, the plaintiff must show that she or he (1) was qualified for the job, (2) was subjected to an adverse employment action, and

41. 42 U.S.C. Section 12112(b)(4).

(3) was known by her or his employer to have a relative or an associate with a disability.

CASE IN POINT Randall Francin had worked at Mosby, Inc., for twelve years before his wife was diagnosed with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (Lou Gehrig’s disease). He discussed his rights for leave under the Family and Medical Leave Act (see Chapter 34) with a company representative. Early in 2004, Francin received a “merit award increase” in salary and subsequently discussed his wife’s illness with his supervisor. In September 2004, Francin was fired. Francin filed a lawsuit claiming that Mosby had discriminated against him because of his association with a person with a disability. Although the trial court granted a summary judgment for Mosby, the appellate court found that there was sufficient evidence that Francin’s wife’s illness was a contributing factor to his termination for the case to go to trial. Thus, summary judgment was inappropriate.⁴²

DEFENSES TO EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION

The first line of defense for an employer charged with employment discrimination is to assert that the plaintiff has failed to meet his or her initial burden of proving that discrimination occurred. As noted, plaintiffs bringing cases under the ADEA may find it difficult to meet this initial burden because they must prove that age discrimination was, in fact, the reason for their employer’s decision to discharge them.

Once a plaintiff succeeds in proving that discrimination occurred, then the burden shifts to the employer to justify the discriminatory practice. Often, employers attempt to justify the discrimination by claiming that it was the result of a business necessity, a bona fide occupational qualification, or a seniority system. Alternatively, they may assert that employee misconduct should limit their liability. In some situations, as noted earlier, an effective antiharassment policy and prompt remedial action when harassment occurs may shield employers from liability for sexual harassment under Title VII.

Business Necessity

An employer may defend against a claim of disparate-impact (unintentional) discrimination by asserting that a practice that has a discriminatory effect is a business necessity. If requiring a high school diploma, for example, is shown to have a discriminatory effect, an employer might argue that a high school education is necessary for workers to perform the job at a required level of competence. If the employer can demonstrate to the court’s satisfaction that a definite connection exists between a high school education and job performance, then the employer normally will succeed in this business necessity defense.

Bona Fide Occupational Qualification

Another defense applies when discrimination against a protected class is essential to a job—that is, when a particular trait is a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ). Race, color, and national origin, however, can never be BFOQs.

Generally, courts have restricted the BFOQ defense to instances in which the employee’s gender or religion is essential to the job. For example, a women’s clothing store might legitimately hire only female salespersons if part of a salesperson’s job involves assisting clients in the store’s dressing rooms. Similarly, the Federal Aviation Administration can legitimately impose age limits for airline pilots—but an airline cannot impose weight limits only on female flight attendants.

Seniority Systems

An employer with a history of discrimination may have no members of protected classes in upper-level positions. Even if the employer now seeks to be unbiased, it may face a lawsuit from members of protected classes claiming that they should be promoted ahead of schedule to compensate for past discrimination. If no present intent to discriminate is shown, however, and if promotions or other job benefits are distributed according to a fair seniority system (in which workers with more years of service are promoted first or laid off last), the employer normally has a good defense against the suit.

According to the United States Supreme Court, this defense may also apply to claims of discrimination under the ADA. A baggage handler who had injured his back requested an assignment to a mailroom position at U.S. Airways, Inc. The airline refused to give the employee the position because another employee had seniority. The Court sided with U.S. Airways. If an employee with a disability requests an accommodation that conflicts with an employer’s seniority system, the accommodation generally will not be considered “reasonable” under the ADA.⁴³

After-Acquired Evidence of Employee Misconduct

In some situations, employers have attempted to avoid liability for employment discrimination on the basis of “after-acquired evidence”—that is, evidence that the employer discovers after a lawsuit is filed—of an employee’s misconduct. Suppose that an employer fires a worker, who then sues the employer for employment discrimination. During pretrial investigation, the employer learns that the employee made material misrepresentations on his employment application—misrepresentations that, had the employer known about them, would have served as a ground to fire the individual. Can this after-acquired evidence be used as a defense?

According to the United States Supreme Court, after-acquired evidence of wrongdoing cannot be used to shield an employer entirely from liability for employment discrimination. It may, however, be used to limit the amount of damages for which the employer is liable.⁴⁴

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

Federal statutes and regulations providing for equal opportunity in the workplace were designed to reduce or eliminate discriminatory practices with respect to hiring, retaining, and promoting employees. Affirmative action programs go a step further and attempt to “make up” for past patterns of discrimination by giving members of protected classes preferential treatment in hiring or promotion. During the 1960s, all federal and state government agencies, private companies that contracted to do business with the federal government, and institutions that received federal funding were required to implement affirmative action policies.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 neither requires nor prohibits affirmative action. Thus, most private companies and organizations have not been required to implement affirmative action policies, though many have done so voluntarily. Affirmative action programs have been controversial, however, particularly when they result in reverse discrimination against members of a majority group, such as white males.

Constitutionality of Affirmative Action Programs

Because of their inherently discriminatory nature, affirmative action programs may violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The United States Supreme Court has held that any federal, state, or local government affirmative action program that uses racial or ethnic classifications as the basis for making decisions is subject to strict scrutiny by the courts.⁴⁵ Recall from Chapter 4 that strict scrutiny is the highest standard, which means that most programs do not survive a court’s analysis under this test.

Today, an affirmative action program normally is constitutional only if it attempts to remedy past discrimination and does not make use of quotas or preferences. Furthermore, once such a program has succeeded in the goal of remedying past discrimination, it must be changed or dropped.

Affirmative Action in Schools

Most of the affirmative action cases that have reached the United States Supreme Court in the last twenty years have involved university admissions programs and schools, rather than business employers. Generally, the Court has found that a school admissions policy that automatically awards minority group applicants a specified number of points violates the equal protection clause.⁴⁶ A school can, however, “consider race or ethnicity more flexibly as a ‘plus’ factor in the context of individualized consideration of each and every applicant.”⁴⁷ In other words, it is unconstitutional for schools to apply a mechanical formula that gives “diversity bonuses” based on race or ethnicity.

CASE IN POINT In 2007, the Supreme Court ruled on two cases involving the use of racial classifications to assign students to schools. Two school districts (in Seattle, Washington, and Jefferson County, Kentucky) had adopted student assignment plans that relied on race to determine which schools certain children would attend. The Seattle plan classified children as “white” or “nonwhite” and used the racial classifications as a “tiebreaker” to determine which school students would attend. The Jefferson County plan classified students as “black” or “other” to assign them to schools. When parents claimed that the racial preferences violated the equal protection clause, the Court held that the school districts had failed to show that the use of racial classifications was necessary to achieve their stated goal of racial diversity. Hence, the Court found that both districts’ affirmative action programs were unconstitutional.⁴⁸

REVIEWING

Employment Discrimination

Amaani Lyle, an African American woman, was hired by Warner Brothers Television Productions to be a scriptwriters’ assistant for the writers of Friends, a popular, adult-oriented television series. One of her essential job duties was to type detailed notes for the scriptwriters during brainstorming sessions in which they discussed jokes, dialogue, and story lines. The writers then combed through Lyle’s notes after the meetings for script material. During these meetings, the three male scriptwriters told lewd and vulgar jokes and made sexually explicit comments and gestures. They often talked about their personal sexual experiences and fantasies, and some of these conversations were then used in episodes of Friends.

During the meetings, Lyle never complained that she found the writers’ conduct offensive. After four months, Lyle was fired because she could not type fast enough to keep up with the writers’ conversations during the meetings. She filed a suit against Warner Brothers, alleging sexual harassment and claiming that her termination was based on racial discrimination. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would Lyle’s claim of racial discrimination be for intentional (disparate-treatment) or unintentional (disparate-impact) discrimination? Explain.
2. Can Lyle establish a prima facie case of racial discrimination? Why or why not?
3. When Lyle was hired, she was told that typing speed was extremely important to the position. At the time, she maintained that she could type eighty words per minute, so she was not given a typing test. It later turned out that Lyle could type only fifty words per minute. What impact might typing speed have on Lyle’s lawsuit?
4. Lyle’s sexual-harassment claim is based on the hostile working environment created by the writers’ sexually offensive conduct at meetings that she was required to attend. The writers, however, argue that their behavior was essential to the “creative process” of writing for Friends, a show that routinely contained sexual innuendos and adult humor. Which defense discussed in the chapter might Warner Brothers assert using this argument?

 DEBATE THIS: Members of minority groups and women have made enough economic progress in the last several decades that they no longer need special legislation to protect them.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

35-1. Title VII Violations Discuss fully whether either of the following actions would constitute a violation of Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, as amended:

- Tennington, Inc., is a consulting firm and has ten employees. These employees travel on consulting jobs in seven states. Tennington has an employment record of hiring only white males.
- Novo Films is making a movie about Africa and needs to employ approximately one hundred extras for this picture. To hire these extras, Novo advertises in all major newspapers in Southern California. The ad states that only African Americans need apply.

35-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Religious Discrimination.

When Kayla Caldwell got a job as a cashier at a Costco store, she wore multiple pierced earrings and had four tattoos, but she had no facial piercings. Over the next two years, Caldwell engaged in various forms of body modification, including facial piercing and cutting. Then Costco revised its dress code to prohibit all facial jewelry, except earrings. Caldwell was told that she would have to remove her facial jewelry. She asked for a complete exemption from the code, asserting that she was a member of the Church of Body Modification and that eyebrow piercing was part of her religion. She was told to remove the jewelry, cover it, or go home. She went home and was later discharged for her absence. Based on these facts, will Caldwell be successful in a lawsuit against Costco for religious discrimination in violation of Title VII? Does an employer have an obligation to accommodate its employees' religious practices? If so, to what extent?

- For a sample answer to Question 35-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

35-3. Discrimination Based on Gender For twenty years, Darlene Jespersen worked as a bartender at Harrah's Casino in Reno, Nevada. In 2000, Harrah's implemented a "Personal Best" program that included new grooming standards. Among other requirements, women were told to wear makeup "applied neatly in complimentary colors." Jespersen, who never wore makeup off the job, felt so uncomfortable wearing it on the job that it interfered with her ability to perform. Unwilling to wear makeup and not qualifying for another position at Harrah's with similar compensation, Jespersen quit her job. She filed a suit in a federal district court against Harrah's Operating Co., the casino's owner, alleging that the makeup policy discriminated against women in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Harrah's argued that any burdens under the new program fell equally on both genders, citing the "Personal Best" short-hair standard that applied only to men. Jespersen responded by describing her personal reaction to the makeup policy and emphasizing her exemplary record during her tenure at Harrah's. In whose favor should the court rule? Why? [Jespersen v. Harrah's Operating Co., 444 F.3d 1104 (9th Cir. 2006)]

35-4. Discrimination Based on Disability Cerebral palsy limits Steven Bradley's use of his legs. He uses forearm crutches for short-distance walks and a wheelchair for longer distances. Standing for more than ten or fifteen minutes is difficult. With support, however, Bradley can climb stairs and get on and off a stool. His condition also restricts the use of his fourth finger to, for example, type, but it does not limit his ability to write—he completed two years of college. His grip strength is normal, and he can lift heavy objects. In 2001, Bradley applied for a "greeter" or "cashier" position at a Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., Supercenter in Richmond, Missouri. The job description stated, "No experience or qualification is required." Bradley indicated that he was available for full- or part-time work from 4:00 P.M. to 10:00 P.M. any evening. His employment history showed that he currently worked as a proofreader and that he had previously worked as an administrator. His application was rejected, according to Janet Daugherty, the personnel manager, based on his "work history" and the "direct threat" that he posed to the safety of himself and others. Bradley claimed, however, that the store refused to hire him due to his disability. What steps must Bradley follow to pursue his claim? What does he need to show to prevail? Is he likely to meet these requirements? Discuss. [EEOC v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 477 F.3d 561 (8th Cir. 2007)]

35-5. Defenses to Employment Discrimination The Milwaukee County Juvenile Detention Center established a new policy that required each unit of the facility to be staffed at all times by at least one officer of the same gender as the detainees housed at a unit. The purpose of the policy, administrators said, was to reduce the likelihood of sexual abuse of juveniles by officers of the other gender. Because there were many more male units in the center than female units, the policy had the effect of reducing the number of shifts available for women officers and increasing the number of shifts for men. Two female officers sued for gender discrimination. The district court held for the county, finding that the policy of assignment was based on a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ) and so was not illegal gender discrimination. The officers appealed. What would be evidence that the county had a valid BFOQ? [Henry v. Milwaukee County, 539 F.3d 573 (7th Cir. 2008)]

35-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Sexual Harassment.

The Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, Tennessee (Metro), began looking into rumors of sexual harassment by the Metro School District's employee relations director, Gene Hughes. Veronica Frazier, a Metro human resources officer, asked Vicky Crawford, a Metro employee, whether she had witnessed “inappropriate behavior” by Hughes. Crawford described several instances of sexually harassing behavior. Two other employees also reported being sexually harassed by Hughes. Metro took no action against Hughes, but soon after completing the investigation, Metro accused Crawford of embezzlement and fired her. The two other employees were also fired. Crawford filed a suit in a federal district court against Metro, claiming retaliation under Title VII. What arguments can be made that Crawford’s situation does or does not qualify as a retaliation claim under Title VII? Discuss. [Crawford v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, Tennessee, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 846, 172 L.Ed.2d 650 (2009)]

35–7. Discrimination Based on Gender Brenda Lewis had been employed for two years at Heartland Inns of America, LLC, and gradually worked her way up the management ladder. Lewis, who described herself as a tomboy, was commended for her good work. When she moved to a different Heartland hotel, the director of operations, Barbara Cullinan, told one of the owners that Lewis was not a “good fit” for the front desk because she was not feminine enough. Cullinan told various people that the hotel wanted “pretty” girls at the front desk. Cullinan then informed Lewis that her hiring had not been done properly and that she would need to undergo another interview. Soon after the interview, Cullinan fired Lewis. The reason given in a letter was that Lewis was hostile during the interview. Lewis sued Heartland for gender discrimination based on unlawful gender stereotyping. The district court dismissed the suit. Lewis appealed. Does her claim fall under Title VII’s prohibition against discrimination based on gender? Why or why not? [Lewis v. Heartland Inns of America, LLC, 591 F.3d 1033 (8th Cir. 2010)]

35–8. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Discrimination Based on Disability.

Titan Distribution, Inc., employed Quintak, Inc., to run its tire mounting and distribution operation in Des Moines, Iowa. Robert Chalfant worked for Quintak as a second shift supervisor at Titan. He suffered a heart attack in 1992 and underwent heart bypass surgery in 1997. He also had arthritis. In July 2002, Titan decided to fire Quintak. Chalfant applied to work at Titan. On his application, he described himself as disabled. After a physical exam, Titan’s physician concluded that Chalfant could work in his current capacity, and he was notified that he would be hired. Despite the notice, Nadis Barucic, a Titan employee, wrote “not pass px” at the top of Chalfant’s application, and he was not hired. He took a job with AMPCO Systems, a parking ramp management company. This work involved walking up to five miles a day and lifting more weight than he had at Titan. In September, Titan eliminated its second shift. Chalfant filed a suit in a federal district court against Titan, in part, under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). Titan argued that it had not hired Chalfant because he did not pass the physical, but no one—including Barucic—could explain why she had written “not pass px” on his application. Later, Titan claimed that Chalfant was not hired because the entire second shift was going to be eliminated. [Chalfant v. Titan Distribution, Inc., 475 F.3d 982 (8th Cir. 2007)]

- What must Chalfant establish to make his case under the ADA? Can he meet these requirements? Explain.
- In employment-discrimination cases, punitive damages can be appropriate when an employer acts with malice or reckless indifference toward an employee’s protected rights. Would an award of punitive damages to Chalfant be appropriate in this case? Discuss.

Go to this text’s Web site at www.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select “Chapter 35.” Click on “Video Questions” and view the video titled Mary Tyler Moore. Then answer the following questions.

- In the video, Mr. Grant (Ed Asner) asks Mary (Mary Tyler Moore) some personal questions during a job interview, including why she is not married and what religion she practices. He also tells her that he “figured he’d hire a man.” Can Mary make out a prima facie case of gender or religious discrimination based on these questions? Why or why not?
- Can Mary prove a prima facie case of age discrimination because Mr. Grant asked her age during the interview and then implied that she was “hedging” about her age? What would she need to prove under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act?
- How does the fact that Mr. Grant hired Mary as an associate producer affect her ability to establish a case of employment discrimination?
- Mr. Grant says that he will hire Mary to see if it works out but fire her if he does not like her or if she does not like him at the end of this trial period. Can he do that? Explain. If he fired Mary a few weeks later, would this affect Mary’s ability to sue for employment discrimination? Why or why not?

UNIT SEVEN • FOCUS ON ETHICS

Agency and Employment

Ethical principles—and challenging ethical issues—pervade the areas of agency and employment. As you read in Chapter 32, when one person agrees to act on behalf of another, as an agent does in an agency relationship, that person assumes certain ethical responsibilities. Similarly, the principal also assumes certain ethical duties. In essence, agency law gives legal force to the ethical duties arising in an agency relationship. Although agency law also focuses on the rights of agents and principals, those rights are framed by the concept of duty—that is, an agent’s duty becomes a right for the principal, and vice versa. Significantly, many of the duties of the principal and agent are negotiable when they form their contract. In forming a contract, the principal and the agent can extend or abridge many of the ordinary duties owed in such a relationship.

Employees who deal with third parties are also deemed to be agents and thus share the ethical (and legal) duties imposed under agency law. In the employment context, however, it is not always possible for an employee to negotiate favorable employment terms. Often, an employee who is offered a job must either accept the job on the employer’s terms or look elsewhere for a position. Although numerous federal and state statutes protect employees, in some situations employees still have little recourse against their employers. At the same time, employers complain that statutes regulating employment relationships impose so many requirements that they find it hard to exercise a reasonable amount of control over their workplaces.

The Agent’s Duty to the Principal

The very nature of the principal-agent relationship is one of trust. Because of the nature of this relationship, which we call a fiduciary relationship, an agent is considered to owe certain duties to the principal. These duties include being loyal and obedient, informing the principal of important facts concerning the agency, accounting to the principal for property or funds received, and performing with reasonable diligence and skill.

Thus, ethical conduct would prevent an agent from representing two principals in the same transaction, making a secret profit from the agency relationship, or failing to disclose the agent’s interest in property being purchased by the principal. The expected ethical conduct of the agent has evolved into rules that, if breached, cause the agent to be held legally liable.

Does an Agent Also Have a Duty to Society? A question that sometimes arises is whether an agent’s obligation extends beyond the duty to the principal and includes a duty to society as well. Consider, for example, the situation faced by an employee who knows that her employer is engaging in an unethical—or even illegal—practice, such as marketing an unsafe product. Does the employee’s duty to the principal include keeping silent about this practice, which may harm users of the product? Does the employee have a duty to protect consumers by disclosing this information to the public, even if she loses her job as a result? Some scholars have argued that many of the greatest evils in the past thirty years have been accomplished in the name of duty to the principal.

Does an Agent’s Breach of Loyalty Terminate the Agent’s Authority? Suppose that an employee-agent who is authorized to access company trade secrets contained in computer files takes those secrets to a competitor for whom the employee is about to begin working. Clearly, in this situation the agent has violated the ethical—and legal—duty of loyalty to the principal. Does this breach of loyalty mean that the employee’s act of accessing the trade secrets was unauthorized? The question has significant implications because if the act was unauthorized, the employee will be subject to state and federal laws prohibiting unauthorized access to computer information and data. If the act was authorized, the employee will not be subject to such laws.

To date, most courts have ruled that an agent’s authority continues, even though there was a breach of loyalty. In one case, for example, three employees of Lockheed Martin Corporation copied confidential information and trade secrets from Lockheed’s computer network onto compact discs and BlackBerries (personal digital assistants). Lockheed had authorized the employee-agents to access these files but was understandably upset when the three resigned and went to work for a competitor, taking the trade secrets with them. Lockheed sued the former agents under the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act (discussed in Chapter 6), arguing that they had accessed the data without authorization. The federal district court, however, held that the individuals did have authorization to access the computer network and did not lose this authorization when they breached the duty of loyalty. Therefore, the court dismissed the case.¹

The Principal’s Duty to the Agent

Just as agents owe certain duties to their principals, so do principals owe duties to their agents, such as compensation and reimbursement for job-related expenses. Principals also owe their agents a duty of cooperation. One might expect principals to cooperate with their agents out of self-interest, but this does not always happen.

Suppose that a principal hires an agent on commission to sell a building, and the agent puts considerable time and expense into finding a buyer. If the principal changes his mind and decides to retain the building, he may try to prevent the agent from completing the sale. Is such action ethical? Does it violate the principal's duty of cooperation? What alternatives would the principal have?

Although a principal is legally obligated to fulfill certain duties to the agent, these duties do not include any specific duty of loyalty. Some argue that employers' failure to be loyal to their employees has resulted in a reduction in employee loyalty to employers. After all, they maintain, why should an employee be loyal to an employer's interests over the years when the employee knows that the employer has no corresponding legal duty to be loyal to the employee's interests? Employers who do show a sense of loyalty toward their employees—for example, by not laying off longtime, faithful employees when business is slow or when those employees could be replaced by younger workers at lower cost—base that loyalty primarily on ethical, not legal, considerations.

Respondeat Superior

Agency relationships have ethical ramifications for third parties as well as for agents and principals. A legal concept that addresses the effect of agency relationships on third parties is the doctrine of respondeat superior. This doctrine raises a significant ethical question: Why should innocent employers be required to assume responsibility for the tortious, or wrongful, actions of their agent-employees? The answer has to do with the courts' perception that when one of two innocent parties must suffer a loss, the party in the better position to prevent that loss should bear the burden. In an employment relationship, for example, the employer has more control over the employee's behavior than a third party to the relationship does.

Another reason for retaining the doctrine of respondeat superior in our laws is that the employer is assumed to be better able to pay any damages incurred by a third party. One of our society's shared beliefs is that an injured party should be afforded the most effective relief possible. Thus, even though an employer may be absolutely innocent, the employer has "deeper pockets" than the employee and will be more likely to have the funds necessary to make the injured party whole.

Immigration Reform

Unauthorized (illegal) workers make up 5 percent of the total U.S. workforce and 12 percent of the workers in the construction industry. The federal government during the Bush administration significantly stepped up enforcement actions (raids) to combat the growing number of illegal immigrants. The raids targeted workers in many industries, including food processing and packaging firms, contractors (landscape, cleaning, and janitorial services), construction firms, temporary employment services, and fast-food restaurants. Often, the unauthorized workers were performing jobs that no one else wanted because the jobs paid low wages or involved substandard conditions.

As a result of these raids, many immigrant workers were detained and deported, their families were torn apart, the businesses for which they worked were disrupted, and some managers faced prison terms. The impact of these raids on immigrants—in a nation founded by immigrants—has led many U.S. citizens to believe that reforming the immigration laws is a moral imperative. Many believe that it is unethical to imprison and deport these impoverished and unrepresented workers—who often were already being exploited by their U.S. employers.

When President Barack Obama took office, he promised to reform immigration law. His goals were to decrease bureaucracy, increase efficiency, and boost the number of immigrant workers with legal status in the United States in an effort to keep families together and meet employers' needs for workers. Although the number of workplace raids has decreased, the Obama administration's policies have not resulted in more favorable treatment of immigrant workers. For example, in September 2009, American Apparel, a U.S.-based clothing company, laid off more than 1,600 workers in Los Angeles rather than face fines for employing undocumented workers.²

Problems with I-9 Verification

Verifying a person's eligibility to work in the United States can be a complicated and costly process for employers. The most recent I-9 form (see Chapter 34) specifies the documents that an employer may accept to verify employment eligibility and identification. At the same time, it is illegal for an employer to discriminate against foreign-born workers by requiring them to provide a driver's license or Social Security card to prove their identity. If an employer relies on the documents a worker provides to prove identity and eligibility (such a school photo identification card) and these documents later prove to be fraudulent or invalid, the employer can be sanctioned for hiring a person that the employer “should have known” was unauthorized. Thus, employers are forced to choose between violating antidiscrimination laws and risking sanctions for violating immigration laws. It is an ethical dilemma with no easy answer.

Discrimination against Transgender Persons

Although some states have laws that specifically ban discrimination based on gender identity, most courts have held that federal law (Title VII, discussed in Chapter 35) does not protect transgender persons from discrimination. This situation may be changing, however, now that one federal court has extended Title VII protection against gender discrimination to transsexuals. Diane Schroer (previously David Schroer) was born male but always identified with the female gender. Schroer, who has master’s degrees in history and international relations, served twenty-five years in the military and was a commander of special forces. After retiring with top-secret clearance, Schroer applied for a terrorism specialist position at the Library of Congress. At the job interview, Schroer dressed as a man and received the highest interview score of all eighteen candidates. The selection committee unanimously voted to offer the job to Schroer.

Schroer then met with her future supervisor and explained that she had been diagnosed with gender identity disorder and was planning to have sex reassignment surgery. The next day, the Library of Congress withdrew its offer to hire Schroer. When Schroer sued alleging gender discrimination, the Library claimed that it had withdrawn its offer because Schroer was untrustworthy and would be unable to receive the needed security clearance. The court, however, found that these reasons were pretexts (excuses) and ruled in favor of Schroer. The court held that the Library had refused to hire Schroer because her appearance and background did not comport with the selection committee’s stereotypes about how women and men should act and appear. The court concluded that the revocation of the job offer violated Title VII; it was discrimination “because of sex” even though Title VII does not include transsexuals as a protected class. In 2009, Schroer was awarded nearly $500,000 in back pay and damages.³

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. How much obedience and loyalty does an agent-employee owe to an employer? What if the employer engages in an activity—or requests that the employee engage in an activity—that violates the employee’s ethical standards but does not violate any public policy or law? In such a situation, does an employee’s duty to abide by her or his own ethical standards override the employee’s duty of loyalty to the employer?
2. When an agent acts in violation of his or her ethical or legal duty to the principal, should that action terminate the agent’s authority to act on behalf of the principal? Why or why not?
3. If an agent-employee injures a third party during the course of employment, under the doctrine of respondet superior, the employer may be held liable for the employee’s action even though the employer did not authorize the action and was not even aware of it. Is it fair to hold the employer liable in this situation? Would it be more equitable if the employee alone was held liable for his or her tortious (legally wrongful) actions to third parties, even when the actions were committed within the scope of employment?
4. How should immigration law be reformed? Does the United States have any ethical duties to undocumented (illegal) aliens who come here to work? How can the law be fair and balance the rights of immigrants, their families, the companies that employ them, and U.S. citizens?
5. Should the law prohibit discrimination against transgender persons? Why or why not?

Sole Proprietorships and Franchises

An anyone who starts a business must first decide which form of business organization will be most appropriate for the new endeavor. In making this decision, the entrepreneur (one who initiates and assumes the financial risk of a new enterprise) needs to consider a number of factors, especially (1) ease of creation, (2) the liability of the owners, (3) tax considerations, and (4) the need for capital. In studying this unit, keep these factors in mind as you read about the various business organizational forms available to entrepreneurs. You may also find it helpful to refer to Exhibit 41–4 on pages 807 and 808, which compares the major business forms in use today with respect to these and other factors.

Traditionally, entrepreneurs have relied on three major business forms—the sole proprietorship, the partnership, and the corporation. In this chapter, we examine the sole proprietorship form of business. We also look at franchises, which are widely used today. The franchise is not actually a separate organizational form. Rather, it is a contractual arrangement, and the parties to a franchise contract may use any one of several organizational forms—for example, the parties may be a sole proprietor and a corporation or two corporations.

In Chapter 37, we will examine the second major traditional business form, the partnership, as well as some newer variations on partnerships. In Chapter 38, we will look at the limited liability company (LLC), a relatively new and increasingly popular form of business enterprise, and other special forms of business.

The third major traditional form—the corporation—will be discussed in Chapters 39 through 42. We conclude this unit with a chapter (Chapter 43) discussing practical legal information that all businesspersons should know, particularly those operating small businesses.

SOLE PROPRIETORSHIPS

The simplest form of business is a sole proprietorship. In this form, the owner is the business; thus, anyone who does business without creating a separate business organization has a sole proprietorship. More than two-thirds of all U.S. businesses are sole proprietorships. They are usually small enterprises—about 99 percent of the sole proprietorships in the United States have revenues of less than $1 million per year. Sole proprietors can own and manage any type of business from an informal, home-office undertaking to a large restaurant or construction firm.

Advantages of the Sole Proprietorship

A major advantage of the sole proprietorship is that the proprietor owns the entire business and receives all of the profits (because she or he assumes all of the risk). In addition, starting a sole proprietorship is often easier and less costly than starting any other kind of business, as few legal formalities are required.¹ No documents need to be filed with the government to start a sole proprietorship (though a state business license may be required to operate certain types of businesses).

This form of business organization also offers more flexibility than does a partnership or a corporation. The sole proprietor is free to make any decision he or she wishes concerning the business—such as whom to hire, when to take a vacation, and what kind of business to pursue. In addition, the proprietor can sell or transfer all or part of the business to another party at any time and does not need approval from anyone else (as would be required from partners in a partnership or normally from shareholders in a corporation).

1. Although starting a sole proprietorship involves fewer legal formalities than other business organizational forms, even small sole proprietorships may need to comply with zoning requirements, obtain licenses, and the like.

A sole proprietor pays only personal income taxes (including Social Security and Medicare taxes) on the business's profits, which are reported as personal income on the proprietor's personal income tax return. Sole proprietors are also allowed to establish certain retirement accounts that are tax-exempt until the funds are withdrawn, usually after age fifty-nine and a half.

Disadvantages of the Sole Proprietorship

The major disadvantage of the sole proprietorship is that the proprietor alone bears the burden of any losses or liabilities incurred by the business enterprise. In other words, the sole proprietor has unlimited liability, or legal responsibility, for all obligations that arise in doing business. Any lawsuit against the business or its employees can lead to unlimited personal liability for the owner of a sole proprietorship. Creditors can go after the owner's personal assets to satisfy any business debts. This unlimited liability is a major factor to be considered in choosing a business form.

The sole proprietorship also has the disadvantage of lacking continuity on the death of the proprietor. When the owner dies, so does the business—it is automatically dissolved. Another disadvantage is that in raising capital, the proprietor is limited to his or her personal funds and any personal loans that he or she can obtain.

The personal liability of the owner of a sole proprietorship was at issue in the following case. The case involved the federal Cable Communications Act, which prohibits a commercial establishment from broadcasting television programs to its patrons without authorization. The court had to decide whether the owner of a sole proprietorship that installed a satellite television system was personally liable for violating this act by identifying a restaurant as a “residence” for billing purposes.

Garden City Boxing Club, Inc. v. Dominguez

United States District Court, Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (2006).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Garden City Boxing Club, Inc. (GCB), which is based in San Jose, California, owned the exclusive right to broadcast several prizefights, via closed-circuit television, including a match between Oscar De La Hoya and Fernando Vargas on September 14, 2002. GCB sold the right to receive the broadcasts to bars and other commercial venues. The fee was $20 multiplied by an establishment's maximum fire code occupancy. Antenas Enterprises in Chicago, Illinois, sells and installs satellite television systems under a contract with DISH Network. After installing a system, Antenas sends the buyer's address and other identifying information to DISH. In January 2002, Luis Garcia, an Antenas employee, identified a new customer as Jose Melendez at 220 Hawthorn Commons in Vernon Hills. The address was a restaurant—Mundelein Burrito—but Garcia designated the account as residential. Mundelein's patrons watched the De La Hoya–Vargas match on September 14, as well as three other fights on other dates, for which the restaurant paid only the residential rate to DISH and nothing to GCB. GCB filed a suit in a federal district court against Luis Dominguez, the sole proprietor of Antenas, to collect the fee.

Section 605(a) [of the Cable Communications Act] states “[a]n authorized intermediary of a communication violates the Act when it divulges communication through an electronic channel to one other than the addressee.” Mundelein Burrito was clearly a commercial establishment. The structure of the building, an exterior identification sign, and its location in a strip mall made this obvious. Mundelein Burrito paid only the residential fee for the four fights it broadcast to its patrons. It was not an authorized addressee of any of the four fights. By improperly listing Mundelein Burrito as a residence, Antenas Enterprises allowed CASE 36.1 CONTINUED ♦ the unauthorized broadcast of the [De La Hoya–Vargas fight], and three additional fights, to Mundelein Burrito. Antenas Enterprises is liable under [Section] 605 of the Act.

The unauthorized broadcast of the four separate events deprived GCB of the full value of its business investment. * * * [Under the Cable Communications Act] an aggrieved party * * * may recover an award of damages “for each violation of [Section 605(a)] involved in the action in a sum of not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000, as the court considers just.” If the violation was willful and for purposes of commercial advantage or private financial gain, the court in its discretion may increase the award of damages—by an amount not more than $100,000. The court must award attorneys’ fees to the prevailing party.

GCB argues that the Antenas Enterprises failure to properly list Mundelein Burrito resulted in four separate violations. According to the license fee charged for each of the four fights that were illegally broadcast by Mundelein Burrito, the proper amount would have been $20.00 times the maximum fire code occupancy (46) or $3,680.00. Instead, due to the improper identification of the account as residential, Mundelein Burrito paid only $184.40 to broadcast the four events. GCB did not receive any of the $184.40.

* * * [Considering] the willfulness of the defendant’s conduct and the deterrent value of the sanction imposed * * * twice the amount of actual damages is reasonable for this case. Therefore, Antenas Enterprises is liable to GCB for the sum of $7,360.00. Pursuant to the Act, GCB is also entitled to reasonable attorneys’ fees.

* * * *

GCB argues Luis Dominguez is personally liable for Antenas Enterprises’ violation of [Section] 605 of the Act. The term “person” in the Act means an “individual, partnership, association, joint stock company, trust, corporation or governmental entity.”

Antenas Enterprises is a sole proprietorship, owned by Dominguez. A sole proprietor is personally responsible for actions committed by his employees within the scope of their employment. Accordingly, Dominguez is personally liable for the damages caused by the violation of [Section] 605 of the Act. [Emphasis added.]

DECISION AND REMEDY • The court issued a summary judgment in GCB’s favor, holding that the plaintiff was entitled to the amount of Mundelein’s fee, for which Dominguez was personally liable, plus damages and attorneys’ fees.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • If Mundelein had identified itself as a residence when ordering the satellite system, how might the result in this case have been different?

THE GLOBAL DIMENSION • Because the Internet has made it possible for sole proprietorships to do business worldwide without greatly increasing their costs, should they be considered, for some purposes, the equivalent of other business forms? Why or why not?

SECTION 2 FRANCHISES

Instead of setting up a sole proprietorship to market their own products or services, many entrepreneurs opt to purchase a franchise. A franchise is an arrangement in which the owner of a trademark, a trade name, or a copyright licenses others to use the trademark, trade name, or copyright in the selling of goods or services. A franchisee (a purchaser of a franchise) is generally legally independent of the franchisor (the seller of the franchise). At the same time, the franchise is economically dependent on the franchisor’s integrated business system.

In other words, a franchisee can operate as an independent businessperson but still obtain the advantages of a regional or national organization. Today, franchising companies and their franchisees account for a significant portion of all retail sales in this country. Well-known franchises include McDonald’s, 7-Eleven, and Holiday Inn. Franchising has also become a popular way for businesses to expand their operations internationally because franchisees can operate abroad without violating the legal restrictions that many nations impose on foreign ownership of businesses.

Types of Franchises

Many different kinds of businesses now sell franchises, and numerous types of franchises are available. Generally, though, franchises fall into one of three classifications: distributorships, chain-style business operations, and manufacturing or processing-plant arrangements.

DISTRIBUTORSHIP In a distributorship, a manufacturer (the franchisor) licenses a dealer (the franchisee) to sell its product. Often, a distributorship covers an exclusive territory. An example is an automobile dealership or a beer distributorship, such as a distributorship for Anheuser-Busch products.

CHAIN-STYLE BUSINESS OPERATION In a chain-style business operation, a franchise operates under a franchisor's trade name and is identified as a member of a select group of dealers that engage in the franchisor's business. The franchisee is generally required to follow standardized or prescribed methods of operation. Often, the franchisor insists that the franchisee maintain certain standards of performance. In addition, the franchisee may be required to obtain materials and supplies exclusively from the franchisor. McDonald's and most other fast-food chains are examples of this type of franchise. Chain-style franchises are also common in service-related businesses, including real estate brokerage firms, such as Century 21, and tax-preparation services, such as H&R Block, Inc.

MANUFACTURING ARRANGEMENT In a manufacturing, or processing-plant, arrangement, the franchisor transmits to the franchisee the essential ingredients or formula to make a particular product. The franchisee then markets the product either at wholesale or at retail in accordance with the franchisor's standards. Examples of this type of franchise include Coca-Cola and other soft-drink bottling companies.

Laws Governing Franchising

Because a franchise relationship is primarily a contractual relationship, it is governed by contract law. If the franchise exists primarily for the sale of products manufactured by the franchisor, the law governing sales contracts as expressed in Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code applies (see Chapters 19 through 22). Additionally, the federal government and most states have enacted laws governing certain aspects of franchising. Generally, these laws are designed to protect prospective franchisees from dishonest franchisors and to prevent franchisors from terminating franchises without good cause.

FEDERAL REGULATION OF FRANCHISES The federal government regulates franchising through laws that apply to specific industries and through the Franchise Rule, created by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC).

Industry-Specific Standards. Congress has enacted laws that protect franchisees in certain industries, such as automobile dealerships and service stations. These laws protect the franchisee from unreasonable demands and bad faith terminations of the franchise by the franchisor. If an automobile manufacturer–franchisor terminates a franchise because of a dealer–franchisee's failure to comply with unreasonable demands (for example, failure to attain an unrealistically high sales quota), the manufacturer may be liable for damages.² Similarly, federal law prescribes the conditions under which a franchisor of service stations can terminate the franchise.³ Federal antitrust laws (to be discussed in Chapter 47) also apply in certain circumstances to prohibit certain types of anticompetitive agreements.

The Franchise Rule. The FTC's Franchise Rule requires franchisors to disclose certain material facts that a prospective franchisee needs in order to make an informed decision concerning the purchase of a franchise.⁴ The rule was designed to enable potential franchisees to weigh the risks and benefits of an investment. The rule requires the franchisor to make numerous written disclosures to prospective franchisees, but franchisors can provide online disclosure documents as long as they met certain requirements. Prospective franchisees must be able to download or save all electronic disclosure documents.

Under the Franchise Rule, all representations made to a prospective franchisee must have a reasonable basis. If a franchisor provides projected earnings figures, the franchisor must indicate whether the figures are based on actual data or hypothetical examples. (The rule does not require franchisors to provide potential earnings figures, however, as discussed in the Insight into Ethics feature on the following page.) If a franchisor makes sales or earnings projections based on actual data for a specific franchise location, the franchisor must disclose the number and percentage of its existing franchises that have achieved this result.

Franchisors are required to explain termination, cancellation, and renewal provisions of the franchise contract to potential franchisees before the agreement is signed. In addition, a franchisor must

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

Information on Potential Earnings Provided by Franchisors

Entrepreneurs who are thinking about investing in a franchise almost invariably ask, “How much will I make?”

Surprisingly, the law does not require franchisors to provide any estimate of, or actual data on, the earnings potential of a franchise. Franchisors can voluntarily choose to provide earnings data on their uniform disclosure documents but are not required to do so. If franchisors do make earnings claims, as mentioned in the text, they must indicate whether these figures are actual or hypothetical, follow specific rules, and have a reasonable basis for these claims. About 75 percent of franchisors choose not to provide information about earnings potential.

The failure of the FTC’s Franchise Rule to require disclosure of earnings potential has led to many complaints from franchisees. After all, some franchisees invest their life savings in franchises that ultimately fail because of unrealistic earnings expectations. Moreover, the franchisee may be legally responsible to continue operating and paying the franchisor even when the business is not turning a profit.

For instance, Thomas Anderson asked the franchisor, Rocky Mountain Chocolate Factory, Inc. (RMCF), and five of its franchisees for earnings information before he entered into a franchise agreement, but he did not receive any data. When his chocolate franchise failed to become profitable, Anderson and his partner were ordered by a court to pay $33,109 in past due royalties and interest to RMCF (plus court costs and expenses).^a provide disclosures concerning any lawsuits that it has filed against franchisees and settlement agreements that it has entered into with them. Those who violate the Franchise Rule are subject to substantial civil penalties, and the FTC can sue on behalf of injured parties to recover damages.

STATE PROTECTION FOR FRANCHISEES State legislation varies but often is aimed at protecting franchisees from unfair practices and bad faith terminations by franchisors. Approximately fifteen states have laws similar to the federal rules that require franchisors to provide presale disclosures to prospective franchisees.⁵

Some state laws also require that a disclosure document (known as the Franchise Disclosure Document, or FDD) be registered or filed with a state official. State laws may also require that a franchisor submit advertising aimed at prospective franchisees to the state for approval. To protect franchisees, a state law might require the disclosure of information such as the actual costs of operation, recurring expenses, and profits earned, along with facts substantiating these figures. State deceptive trade practices acts (see Chapter 45) may also apply and prohibit certain types of actions on the part of franchisors. To protect franchisees against arbitrary or bad faith terminations, state law may prohibit termination without “good cause” or require that certain procedures be followed in terminating a franchising relationship.

CASE IN POINT FMS, Inc., entered into a franchise agreement with Samsung Construction Equipment North America to become an authorized dealership for the sale of Samsung-brand equipment. Volvo Construction Equipment North America, Inc., purchased Samsung’s business and eventually modified and rebranded the construction equipment so that it could be sold under its own name. When Volvo canceled FMS’s franchise agreement, FMS filed a lawsuit alleging that Volvo, among other things, had violated Maine’s franchise law, which prohibits termination of a franchise without “good cause.” A federal appellate court, however, found that because Volvo was no longer manufacturing the Samsung-brand equipment, it did have good cause to terminate FMS’s franchise. Although the statute would have prevented Volvo from terminating the FMS franchise as to the Samsung-brand equipment, the statute did not apply to the rebranded equipment.⁶

The Franchise Contract

The franchise relationship is defined by a contract between the franchisor and the franchisee. The franchise contract specifies the terms and conditions of the franchise and spells out the rights and duties of the franchisor and the franchisee. If either party fails to perform its contractual duties, that party may be subject to a lawsuit for breach of contract. Furthermore, if a franchisee is induced to enter into a franchise contract by the franchisor's fraudulent misrepresentation, the franchisor may be liable for damages. Generally, statutes and the case law governing franchising tend to emphasize the importance of good faith and fair dealing in franchise relationships.

Because each type of franchise relationship has its own characteristics, it is difficult to describe the broad range of details a franchising contract may include. We look next at some of the major issues that typically are addressed in a franchise contract.

PAYMENT FOR THE FRANCHISE The franchisee ordinarily pays an initial fee or lump-sum price for the franchise license (the privilege of being granted a franchise). This fee is separate from the various products that the franchisee purchases from or through the franchisor. In some industries, the franchisor relies heavily on the initial sale of the franchise for realizing a profit. In other industries, the continued dealing between the parties brings profit to both. In most situations, the franchisor receives a stated percentage of the annual (or monthly) sales or annual volume of business done by the franchisee. The franchise agreement may also require the franchisee to pay a percentage of the franchisor's advertising costs and certain administrative expenses.

BUSINESS PREMISES The franchise agreement may specify whether the premises for the business must be leased or purchased outright. Sometimes, a building must be constructed to meet the terms of the agreement. Certainly, the agreement will specify whether the franchisor or the franchisee is responsible for supplying equipment and furnishings for the premises.

LOCATION OF THE FRANCHISE Typically, the franchisor determines the territory to be served. Some franchise contracts give the franchisee exclusive rights, or "territorial rights," to a certain geographic area. Other franchise contracts, while defining the territory allotted to a particular franchise, either specifically state that the franchise is nonexclusive or are silent on the issue of territorial rights.

Many franchise cases involve disputes over territorial rights, and the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing often comes into play in this area of franchising. If the franchise contract does not grant the franchisee exclusive territorial rights and the franchisor allows a competing franchise to be established nearby, the franchisee may suffer a significant loss in profits. In this situation, a court may hold that the franchisor's actions breached an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing.

BUSINESS ORGANIZATION As part of the franchise agreement, the franchisor may require that the business use a particular organizational form and capital structure. The franchise agreement may also set out standards of operation in such aspects of the business as sales quotas, quality, and record keeping. Additionally, a franchisor may retain stringent control over the training of personnel involved in the operation and over administrative aspects of the business.

QUALITY CONTROL The day-to-day operation of the franchise business normally is left up to the franchisee. Nonetheless, the franchise agreement may provide for some degree of supervision and control by the franchisor so that it can protect the franchise's name and reputation. When the franchise prepares a product, such as food, or provides a service, such as motel accommodations, the contract often states that the franchisor will establish certain standards for the facility. Typically, the contract will state that the franchisor is permitted to make periodic inspections to ensure that the standards are being maintained.

As a general rule, the validity of a provision permitting the franchisor to establish and enforce certain quality standards is unquestioned. Because the franchisor has a legitimate interest in maintaining the quality of the product or service to protect its name and reputation, it can exercise greater control in this area than would otherwise be tolerated. If a franchisor exercises too much control over the operations of its franchisees, however, the franchisor risks potential liability under agency law for the tortious acts of the franchisees' employees (see Chapter 33).

6. FMS, Inc. v. Volvo Construction Equipment North America, Inc., 557 F.3d 758 (7th Cir. 2009).

PRICING ARRANGEMENTS Franchises provide the franchisor with an outlet for the firm's goods and services. Depending on the nature of the business, the franchisor may require the franchisee to purchase certain supplies from the franchisor at an established price.⁷ A franchisor cannot, however, set the prices at which the franchisee will resell the goods because such price setting may be a violation of state or federal antitrust laws, or both. A franchisor can suggest retail prices but cannot mandate them.

FRANCHISE TERMINATION

The duration of the franchise is a matter to be determined between the parties. Generally, a franchise relationship starts with a short trial period, such as a year, so that the franchisee and the franchisor can determine whether they want to stay in business with one another. Usually, the franchise agreement specifies that termination must be “for cause,” such as the death or disability of the franchisee, insolvency of the franchisee, breach of the franchise agreement, or failure to meet specified sales quotas. Most franchise contracts provide that notice of termination must be given. If no set time for termination is specified, then a reasonable time, with notice, is implied. A franchisee must be given reasonable time to wind up the business—that is, to do the accounting and return the copyright or trademark or any other property of the franchisor.

7. Although a franchisor can require franchisees to purchase supplies from it, requiring a franchisee to purchase exclusively from the franchisor may violate federal antitrust laws (see Chapter 47).

A franchise agreement may grant the franchisee the opportunity to cure an ordinary, curable breach within a certain period of time after notice to enable the franchisee to postpone, or even avoid, the termination of the contract. Could a franchisee's conduct so seriously undermine the basis of the agreement that the franchisor could cancel the contract despite a notice-and-cure provision? That was the issue in the following case.

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 599 Pa. 546, 962 A.2d 639 (2009).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Pilot Air Freight Corporation moves freight through a network of company-owned and company-franchised locations at airports and other sites. Franchisees included LJL Transportation, Inc., which is owned by Louis Pektor and Leo Decker. The franchise agreement required LJL to assign all shipments to the Pilot network. The agreement also provided that “Pilot shall allow Franchisee an opportunity to cure a default within ninety (90) days of receipt of written notice.” After eight years as a Pilot franchisee, LJL began to divert shipments to Northeast Transportation, a competing service owned by Pektor and Decker. On learning of the diversions, Pilot terminated the franchise agreement. LJL filed a suit in a Pennsylvania state court against Pilot, alleging breach of contract and asserting a right to cure. The court issued a summary judgment in Pilot's favor, and a state intermediate appellate court affirmed. LJL appealed.

We find our law does not require a non-breaching party to prolong a contractual relationship under such circumstances.

Wrongful Termination

Because a franchisor's termination of a franchise often has adverse consequences for the franchisee, much franchise litigation involves claims of wrongful termination. Generally, the termination provisions of contracts are more favorable to the franchisor than to the franchisee. This means that the franchisee, who normally invests a substantial amount of time and financial resources in making the franchise operation successful, may receive little or nothing for the business on termination. The franchisor owns the trademark and hence the business. It is in this area that statutory and case law become important. The federal and state laws discussed earlier attempt, among other things, to protect franchisees from the arbitrary or unfair termination of their franchises by the franchisors.

In the following case, a group of service-station franchisees claimed that their franchisor had violated the Petroleum Marketing Practices Act (PMPA) of 1979, which limits the circumstances in which petroleum franchisors may terminate a franchise. The franchisees contended that changes in the rental provisions of the franchise contract had effectively increased their fuel costs, thereby "constructively" (in effect) terminating the franchises. The franchisees, however, had continued to operate their service stations. Under the PMPA, must a franchisee abandon its franchise in order to recover for constructive termination? That was the issue facing the United States Supreme Court.

Mac's Shell Service, Inc. v. Shell Oil Products Co.

Supreme Court of the United States, ___ U.S. ___, 130 S.Ct. 1251, 176 L.Ed.2d 36 (2010).

www.supremecourt.gov^a

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice ALITO delivered the opinion of the Court.

This litigation involves a dispute between Shell Oil Company (Shell), a petroleum franchisor, and several Shell franchisees in Massachusetts. Pursuant to their franchise agreements with Shell, each franchisee was required to pay Shell monthly rent for use of the service-station premises. For many years, Shell offered the franchisees a rent subsidy that reduced the monthly rent by a set amount for every gallon of motor fuel a franchisee sold above a specified threshold. Shell renewed the subsidy annually through notices that “explicitly provided for cancellation [of the rent subsidy] with thirty days’ notice.” Nonetheless, Shell representatives made various oral representations to the franchisees “that the subsidy or something like it would always exist.”

In 1998, Shell joined with two other oil companies to create Motiva Enterprises LLC (Motiva), a joint venture that combined the companies’ petroleum-marketing operations in the eastern United States. Shell assigned to Motiva its rights and obligations under the relevant franchise agreements. * * * Effective January 1, 2000, Motiva ended the volume-based rent subsidy, thus increasing the franchisees’ rent.

In July 2001, sixty-three Shell franchisees (hereinafter dealers) filed suit against Shell and Motiva in Federal District Court. Their complaint alleged that Motiva’s discontinuation of the rent subsidy constituted a breach of contract under state law. Additionally, the dealers asserted [a claim] under the PMPA [Petroleum Marketing Practices Act]. * * * They maintained that Shell and Motiva, by eliminating the rent subsidy, had “constructively terminated” their franchises in violation of the Act.

After a two-week trial involving eight of the dealers, the jury found against Shell and Motiva on all claims. Both before and after the jury’s verdict, Shell and Motiva moved for judgment as a matter of law on the dealers’ [PMPA claim]. They argued that they could not be found liable for constructive termination under the Act because none of the dealers had abandoned their franchises in response to Motiva’s elimination of the rent subsidy—something Shell and Motiva said was a necessary element of any constructive termination claim. * * * The District Court denied [the motion], and Shell and Motiva appealed. [The U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit affirmed the district court’s judgment, and Shell and Motiva appealed to the United States Supreme Court.]

The * * * question we are asked to decide is whether a service-station franchisee may recover for constructive termination under the PMPA when the franchisor’s allegedly wrongful conduct did not force the franchisee to abandon its franchise. For the reasons that follow, we conclude that a necessary element of any constructive termination claim under the Act is that the franchisor’s conduct forced an end to the franchisee’s use of the franchisor’s trademark, purchase of the franchisor’s fuel, or occupation of the franchisor’s service station. [Emphasis added.]

When given its ordinary meaning, the text of the PMPA prohibits only that franchisor conduct that has the effect of ending a franchise. As relevant here, the Act provides that “no franchisor * * * may * * * terminate any franchise,” except for an enumerated reason and after providing written notice.

The word “terminate” ordinarily means “put an end to.” * * * The object of the verb “terminate” is the noun “franchise,” a term the Act defines as “any contract” for the provision of one (or more) of the three elements of a typical petroleum franchise. Thus, when given its ordinary meaning, the Act is violated only if an agreement for the use of a trademark, purchase of motor fuel, or lease of a premises is “put [to] an end” * * *. Conduct that does not force an end to the franchise, in contrast, is not prohibited by the Act’s plain terms.

Requiring franchisees to abandon their franchises before claiming constructive termination is also consistent with the general understanding of the doctrine of constructive termination. As applied in analogous legal contexts—both now and at the time Congress enacted the PMPA—a plaintiff must actually sever a particular legal relationship in order to maintain a claim for constructive termination. For example, courts have long recognized a theory of constructive discharge in the field of employment law. Similarly, landlord-tenant law has long recognized the concept of constructive eviction. The general rule under that doctrine is that a tenant must actually move out in order to claim constructive eviction. [Emphasis added.]

As generally understood in these and other contexts, a termination is deemed “constructive” because it is the plaintiff, rather than the defendant, who formally puts an end to the particular legal relationship—not because there is no end to the relationship at all. There is no reason why a different understanding should apply to constructive termination claims under the PMPA. At the time when it enacted the statute, Congress presumably was aware of how courts applied the doctrine of constructive termination in these analogous legal contexts. And in the absence of any contrary evidence, we think it reasonable to interpret the Act in a way that is consistent with this well-established body of law.

* * * *

We therefore hold that a necessary element of any constructive termination claim under the PMPA is that the complained-of conduct forced an end to the franchisee’s use of the franchisor’s trademark, purchase of the franchisor’s fuel, or occupation of the franchisor’s service station. Because none of the dealers in this litigation abandoned any element of their franchise operations in response to Motiva’s elimination of the rent subsidy, they cannot maintain a constructive termination claim on the basis of that conduct.

* * * *

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed * * *. The cases are remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

QUESTIONS

1. The PMPA regulates only the circumstances in which service-station franchisors may terminate a franchise or decline to renew a franchise relationship. Are there any reasons why Congress might have limited the scope of the PMPA to just these two aspects of franchising? Explain.
2. Suppose that some of the service-station franchisees, on the expiration of their contracts with Shell, signed a renewal agreement with Motiva, even though the franchisees believed that the rental terms of the new agreement were unacceptable. Given the Court’s reasoning on the issue of constructive termination, would the franchisees have been likely to succeed in a suit against the franchisor for “constructive nonrenewal” of the franchise agreement? Why or why not?

The Importance of Good Faith and Fair Dealing

Generally, both statutory law and case law emphasize the importance of good faith and fair dealing in terminating a franchise relationship. In determining whether a franchisor has acted in good faith when terminating a franchise agreement, the courts usually try to balance the rights of both parties. If a court perceives that a franchisor has arbitrarily or unfairly terminated a franchise, the franchisee will be provided with a remedy for wrongful termination. If a franchisor’s decision to terminate a franchise was made in the normal course of the franchisor’s business operations, however, and reasonable notice of termination was given to the franchisee, in most instances a court will not consider the termination wrongful.

CASE IN POINT Chapin Miller acquired Chic Miller’s Chevrolet, a General Motors Corporation (GM) dealership. Chic Miller’s entered into lending agreements, commonly known as floor plan financing, to enable it to buy new vehicles from GM. At first, the dealership had floor plan financing through GM, but then it switched to Chase Manhattan Bank. In 2002, Chase declined to provide further financing, and Chic Miller’s was unable to obtain a loan from any other lender, including GM. Under the franchise’s “Dealer Sales and Service Agreement,” GM could terminate a dealership for “Failure of Dealer to maintain the line of credit.” In March 2003, GM terminated Chic Miller’s franchise. Chic Miller’s claimed that GM had failed to act in good faith in terminating the franchise, but the court held in GM’s favor. GM had good cause to terminate the dealership because Chic Miller’s failed to maintain floor plan financing, which was a material requirement under the franchise agreement.⁸

REVIEWING

Sole Proprietorships and Franchises

Carlos Del Rey decided to open a Mexican fast-food restaurant and signed a franchise contract with a national chain called La Grande Enchilada. The contract required the franchisee to strictly follow the franchisor's operating manual and stated that failure to do so would be grounds for terminating the franchise contract. The manual set forth detailed operating procedures and safety standards, and provided that a La Grande Enchilada representative would inspect the restaurant monthly to ensure compliance. Nine months after Del Rey began operating his restaurant, a spark from the grill ignited an oily towel in the kitchen. No one was injured, but by the time firefighters were able to put out the fire, the kitchen had sustained extensive damage. The cook told the fire department that the towel was "about two feet from the grill" when it caught fire. This was in compliance with the franchisor's manual that required towels be placed at least one foot from the grills. Nevertheless, the next day La Grande Enchilada notified Del Rey that his franchise would terminate in thirty days for failure to follow the prescribed safety procedures. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What type of franchise was Del Rey's La Grande Enchilada restaurant?
2. If Del Rey operates the restaurant as a sole proprietorship, then who bears the loss for the damaged kitchen? Explain.
3. Assume that Del Rey files a lawsuit against La Grande Enchilada, claiming that his franchise was wrongfully terminated. What is the main factor that a court would consider in determining whether the franchise was wrongfully terminated?
4. Would a court be likely to rule that La Grande Enchilada had good cause to terminate Del Rey's franchise in this situation? Why or why not?

DEBATE THIS: All franchisors should be required by law to provide a comprehensive estimate of the profitability of a prospective franchise based on the experiences of their existing franchisees.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

36-1. Franchising Maria, Pablo, and Vicky are recent college graduates who would like to go into business for themselves. They are considering purchasing a franchise. If they enter into a franchising arrangement, they would have the support of a large company that could answer any questions they might have. Also, a firm that has been in business for many years would be experienced in dealing with some of the problems that novice businesspersons might encounter. These and other attributes of franchises can lessen some of the risks of the marketplace. What other aspects of franchising—positive and negative—should Maria, Pablo, and Vicky consider before committing themselves to a particular franchise?

36-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Control of a Franchise.

National Foods, Inc., sells franchises to its fast-food restaurants, known as Chicky-D's. Under the franchise agreement, franchisees agree to hire and train employees strictly according to Chicky-D's standards. Chicky-D's regional supervisors are required to approve all job candidates before they are hired and all general policies affecting those employees. Chicky-D's reserves the right to terminate a franchise for violating the franchisor's rules. In practice, however, Chicky-D's regional supervisors routinely approve new employees and individual franchisees' policies. After several incidents of racist comments and conduct by Tim, a recently hired assistant manager at a Chicky-D's, Sharon, a counterperson at the restaurant, resigns. Sharon files a suit in a federal district court against National. National files a motion for summary judgment, arguing that it is not liable for harassment by franchise employees. Will the court grant National's motion? Why or why not?

- For a sample answer to Question 36–2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

36–3. The Franchise Contract Otmar has secured a high-quality ice cream franchise. The franchise agreement calls for Otmar to sell the ice cream only at a specific location; to buy all the ice cream from the franchisor; to order and sell all the flavors produced by the franchisor; and to refrain from selling any ice cream stored for more than two weeks after delivery by the franchisor, as the quality of the ice cream declines after that period of time. After two months of operation, Otmar believes that he can increase his profits by moving the store to another part of the city. He refuses to order even a limited quantity of the “fruit delight” flavor because of its higher cost, and he has sold ice cream that has been stored longer than two weeks without customer complaint. Otmar maintains that the franchisor has no right to restrict him in these practices. Discuss his claims.

36–4. Franchise Termination In the automobile industry, luxury-car customers are considered the most demanding segment of the market with respect to customer service. Jaguar Cars, a division of Ford Motor Co. until 2008, was the exclusive U.S. distributor of Jaguar luxury cars. Jaguar Cars distributes its products through franchised dealers. In April 1999, Dave Ostrem Imports, Inc., an authorized Jaguar dealer in Des Moines, Iowa, contracted to sell its dealership to Midwest Automotive III, LLC. A Jaguar franchise generally cannot be sold without Jaguar Cars' permission. Jaguar Cars asked Midwest Auto to submit three years of customer satisfaction index (CSI) data for all franchises with which its owners had been associated. (CSI data are intended to measure how well dealers treat their customers and satisfy their customers' needs. Jaguar Cars requires above-average CSI ratings for its dealers.) Most of Midwest Auto's scores fell below the national average. Jaguar Cars rejected Midwest Auto's application and sought to terminate the franchise, claiming that a transfer of the dealership would be “substantially detrimental” to the distribution of Jaguar vehicles in the community. Was Jaguar Cars' attempt to terminate this franchise reasonable? Why or why not? [Midwest Automotive III, LLC v. Iowa Department of Transportation, 646 N.W.2d 417 (Iowa 2002)]

36–5. The Franchise Contract On August 23, 1995, Climaco Guzman entered into a commercial janitorial services franchise agreement with Jan-Pro Cleaning Systems, Inc., in Rhode Island for a franchise fee of $3,285. In the agreement, Jan-Pro promised to furnish Guzman with “one (1) or more customer account(s) . . . amounting to $8,000.00 gross volume per year. . . . No portion of the franchise fee is refundable except and to the extent that the Franchisor, within 120 business days following the date of execution of the Franchise Agreement, fails to provide accounts.” By February 19, Guzman had not received any accounts and demanded a full refund. Jan-Pro then promised “two accounts grossing $12,000 per year in income.” Despite its assurances, Jan-Pro did not have the ability to furnish accounts that met the requirements. In September, Guzman filed a suit in a Rhode Island state court against Jan-Pro, alleging, in part, fraudulent misrepresentation. Should the court rule in Guzman's favor? Why or why not? [Guzman v. Jan-Pro Cleaning Systems, Inc., 839 A.2d 504 (R.I. 2003)]

36–6. Sole Proprietorship James Ferguson operates Jim's 11#E Auto Sales in Jonesborough, Tennessee, as a sole proprietorship. In 1999, Consumers Insurance Co. issued a policy to “Jim Ferguson, Jim's 11#E Auto Sales” covering “Owned 'Autos' Only.” Auto was defined to include “a land motor vehicle,” which was not further explained in the policy. Coverage extended to damage caused by the owner or driver of an underinsured motor vehicle. In 2000, Ferguson bought and titled in his own name a 1976 Harley-Davidson motorcycle, intending to repair and sell the cycle through his dealership. In October 2001, while riding the motorcycle, Ferguson was struck by an auto driven by John Jenkins. Ferguson filed a suit in a Tennessee state court against Jenkins, who was underinsured with respect to Ferguson's medical bills, and Consumers. The insurer argued, among other things, that because the motorcycle was bought and titled in Ferguson's own name, and he was riding it at the time of the accident, it was his personal vehicle and thus was not covered under the dealership's policy. What is the relationship between a sole proprietor and a sole proprietorship? How might this status affect the court's decision in this case? [Ferguson v. Jenkins, 204 S.W.3d 779 (Tenn.App. 2006)]

36–7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Franchise Termination.

Walid Elkhatib, a Palestinian Arab, emigrated to the United States in 1971 and became a U.S. citizen. Eight years later, Elkhatib bought a Dunkin' Donuts, Inc., franchise in Bellwood, Illinois. Dunkin' Donuts began offering breakfast sandwiches with bacon, ham, or sausage through its franchises in 1984, but Elkhatib refused to sell these items at his store on the ground that his religion forbade the handling of pork. In 1995, Elkhatib opened a second franchise in Berkeley, Illinois, at which he also refused to sell pork products. The next year, at both locations, Elkhatib began selling meatless sandwiches. In 1998, Elkhatib opened a third franchise in Westchester, Illinois. When he proposed to relocate this franchise, Dunkin' Donuts refused to approve the new location and added that it would not renew any of his franchise agreements because he did not carry the full sandwich line. Elkhatib filed a suit in a federal district court against Dunkin' Donuts and others. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. Did Dunkin' Donuts act in good faith in its relationship with Elkhatib? Explain. [Elkhatib v. Dunkin' Donuts, Inc., 493 F.3d 827 (7th Cir. 2007)]

36–8. Sole Proprietorship Julie Anne Gaskill is an oral and maxillofacial surgeon in Bowling Green, Kentucky. Her medical practice is a sole proprietorship that consists of Gaskill as the sole surgeon and an office staff. She sees every patient, exercises all professional judgment and skill, and manages the business. When Gaskill and her spouse, John Robbins, initiated divorce proceedings in a Kentucky state court, her accountant estimated the value of the practice at $221,610, excluding goodwill. Robbins's accountant estimated the value at $669,075, including goodwill. (Goodwill is the ability or reputation of a business to draw customers, get them to return, and contribute to future profitability.) How can a sole proprietor's reputation, skill, and relationships with customers be valued? Could these qualities be divided into “personal” and “enterprise” goodwill, with some goodwill associated with the business and some solely due to the personal qualities of the proprietor? If so, what might comprise each type? Is this an effective method for valuing Gaskill's practice? Discuss. [Gaskill v. Robbins, 282 S.W.3d 306 (Ky. 2009)]

36–9. Franchise Disclosure Peaberry Coffee, Inc., owned and operated about twenty company stores in the Denver area. The company began a franchise program and prepared a disclosure document as required by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC). Peaberry sold ten franchises, and each franchisee received a disclosure document. Later, when the franchises did not do well, the franchisees sued Peaberry, claiming that its FTC disclosure document had been fraudulent. Specifically, the franchisees claimed that Peaberry had not disclosed that most of the company stores were unprofitable and that its parent company had suffered significant financial losses over the years. In addition, the trial court found that an article in the Denver Business Journal—in which an executive had said that Peaberry was profitable—was fraudulent. This article had been included in the franchisees' information packets. The district court dismissed the franchisees' complaint, noting that the FTC disclosure document had contained an exculpatory clause (see Chapter 13). This clause said that the buyers should not rely on any material that was not in the franchise contract itself. The franchisees appealed. Can a franchisor disclaim the relevance of the information it provides to franchisees? Why or why not? [Colorado Coffee Bean, LLC v. Peaberry Coffee, Inc., ___ P.3d ___ (Colo.App. 2010)]

36–10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Sole Proprietorship.

In August 2004, Ralph Vilardo contacted Travel Center, Inc., in Cincinnati, Ohio, to buy a trip to Florida in December for his family to celebrate his fiftieth wedding anniversary. Vilardo paid $6,900 to David Sheets, the sole proprietor of Travel Center. Vilardo also paid $195 to Sheets for a separate trip to Florida in February 2005. Sheets assured Vilardo that everything was set, but in fact no arrangements were made. Later, two unauthorized charges for travel services totaling $1,182.35 appeared on Vilardo's credit-card statement. Vilardo filed a suit in an Ohio state court against Sheets and his business, alleging, among other things, fraud and violations of the state consumer protection law. Vilardo served Sheets and Travel Center with copies of the complaint, the summons, a request for admissions, and other documents filed with the court, including a motion for summary judgment. Each of these filings asked for a response within a certain time period. Sheets responded once on his own behalf with a denial of all of Vilardo's claims. Travel Center did not respond. [Vilardo v. Sheets, ___ Ohio App.3d ___ (2006)]

- Almost four months after Vilardo filed his complaint, Sheets decided that he was unable to adequately represent himself and retained an attorney, who asked the court for more time. Should the court grant this request? Why or why not? Ultimately, what should the court rule?
- Sheets admitted that Travel Center, Inc., was a sole proprietorship. He also argued that liability might be imposed on his business but not on himself. How would you rule with respect to this argument? Why? Would there be anything unethical about allowing Sheets to avoid liability on this basis? Explain.

Partnerships and Limited Liability Partnerships

Traditionally, the two most common forms of business organization selected by two or more persons entering into business together have been the partnership and the corporation. A partnership arises from an agreement, express or implied, between two or more persons to carry on a business for a profit. Partners are co-owners of the business and have joint control over its operation and the right to share in its profits. In this chapter, we examine several forms of partnership. (Corporations will be discussed in Chapters 39 through 41.)

We begin the chapter with an examination of traditional partnerships, or general partnerships, and the rights and duties of partners in this business entity.

We then examine some special forms of partnerships known as limited partnerships and limited liability partnerships, which receive a different treatment under the law.

SECTION 1 BASIC PARTNERSHIP CONCEPTS

Partnerships are governed both by common law concepts (in particular, those relating to agency) and by statutory law. As in so many other areas of business law, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws has drafted uniform laws for partnerships, and these have been widely adopted by the states.

Agency Concepts and Partnership Law

When two or more persons agree to do business as partners, they enter into a special relationship with one another. To an extent, their relationship is similar to an agency relationship because each partner is deemed to be the agent of the other partners and of the partnership. The agency concepts that were discussed in Chapters 32 and 33 thus apply—specifically, the imputation of knowledge of, and responsibility for, acts carried out within the scope of the partnership relationship. In their relationships with one another, partners, like agents, are bound by fiduciary ties.

In one important way, however, partnership law is distinct from agency law. In a partnership, two or more persons agree to commit some or all of their funds or other assets, labor, and skills to a business with the understanding that profits and losses will be shared. Thus, each partner has an ownership interest in the firm. In a nonpartnership agency relationship, the agent usually does not have an ownership interest in the business, nor is he or she obligated to bear a portion of ordinary business losses.

The Uniform Partnership Act

The Uniform Partnership Act (UPA) governs the operation of partnerships in the absence of express agreement and has done much to reduce controversies in the law relating to partnerships. Except for Louisiana, all of the states, as well as the District of Columbia, have adopted the UPA. A majority of the states have enacted the most recent version of the UPA to provide limited liability for partners in a limited liability partnership.¹ Excerpts from the latest version of the UPA are presented in Appendix E.

1. At the time this book went to press, more than two-thirds of the states, as well as the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the U.S. Virgin Islands, had adopted the UPA with the 1997 amendments.

Definition of a Partnership

Parties sometimes find themselves in conflict over whether their business enterprise is a legal partnership. The UPA defines a partnership as “an association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit” [UPA 101(6)]. Note that the UPA’s definition of person includes corporations, so a corporation can be a partner in a partnership [UPA 101(10)]. The intent to associate is a key element of a partnership, and one cannot join a partnership unless all other partners consent [UPA 401(i)].

When Does a Partnership Exist?

In resolving disputes over whether a partnership exists, courts usually look for the following three essential elements, which are implicit in the UPA’s definition of a general partnership:

1. A sharing of profits or losses.
2. A joint ownership of the business.
3. An equal right to be involved in the management of the business.

If the evidence in a particular case is insufficient to establish all three factors, the UPA provides a set of guidelines to be used. For example, the sharing of profits and losses from a business creates a presumption that a partnership exists. No presumption is made, however, if the profits were received as payment of any of the following [UPA 202(c)(3)]:

1. A debt by installments or interest on a loan.
2. Wages of an employee or for the services of an independent contractor.
3. Rent to a landlord.
4. An annuity to a surviving spouse or representative of a deceased partner.
5. A sale of the goodwill (the valuable reputation of a business viewed as an intangible asset) of a business or property.

To illustrate: A debtor owes a creditor $5,000 on an unsecured debt. To repay the debt, the debtor agrees to pay (and the creditor, to accept) 10 percent of the debtor’s monthly business profits until the loan with interest has been paid. Although the creditor is sharing profits from the business, the debtor and creditor are not presumed to be partners.

Joint Property Ownership and Partnership Status

Joint ownership of property does not in and of itself create a partnership. In fact, the sharing of gross returns and even profits from such ownership “does not by itself establish a partnership” [UPA 202(c)(1) and (2)].² Suppose that MacPherson and Bunker jointly own a piece of farmland and lease it to a farmer for a share of the profits from the farming operation in lieu of set rental payments. This arrangement normally would not make MacPherson, Bunker, and the farmer partners.

Note, though, that while the sharing of profits from ownership of property does not prove the existence of a partnership, sharing both profits and losses usually does. For example, two sisters, Zoe and Cienna, buy a restaurant together, open a joint bank account from which they pay for supplies and expenses, and share the proceeds (and losses) that the restaurant generates. Zoe manages the restaurant and Cienna handles the bookkeeping. After eight years, Cienna stops keeping the books and does no other work for the restaurant. Zoe claims that she and Cienna did not establish a partnership. In this situation, a court would find that a partnership existed because the sisters shared management responsibilities, had a joint account, and shared the profits and losses of the restaurant equally.

Entity versus Aggregate

At common law, a partnership was treated only as an aggregate of individuals and never as a separate legal entity. Thus, at common law a lawsuit could never be brought by or against the firm in its own name; each individual partner had to sue or be sued.

Today, in contrast, a majority of the states follow the UPA and treat a partnership as an entity for most purposes. For example, a partnership usually can sue or be sued, collect judgments, and have all accounting procedures in the name of the partnership entity [UPA 201, 307(a)]. As an entity, a partnership may hold the title to real or personal property in its name rather than in the names of the individual partners. Additionally, federal procedural laws permit the partnership to be treated as an entity in suits in federal courts and bankruptcy proceedings.

Tax Treatment of Partnerships

Modern law does treat a partnership as an aggregate of the individual partners rather than a separate legal entity in one situation—for federal income tax purposes. The partnership is a pass-through entity and not a taxpaying entity. A pass-through entity is a business entity that has no tax liability; the entity's income is passed through to the owners of the entity, who pay taxes on it. Thus, the income or losses the partnership incurs are “passed through” the entity framework and attributed to the partners on their individual tax returns. The partnership itself pays no taxes and is responsible only for filing an information return with the Internal Revenue Service. A partner's profit from the partnership (whether distributed or not) is taxed as individual income to the individual partner.

2. See, for example, In re Estate of Ivanchak, 169 Ohio App.3d 140, 862 N.E.2d 151 (2006).

SECTION 2 PARTNERSHIP FORMATION

As a general rule, agreements to form a partnership can be oral, written, or implied by conduct. Some partnership agreements, however, must be in writing (or an electronic record) to be legally enforceable under the Statute of Frauds (see Chapter 15 for details). For example, a partnership agreement that authorizes the partners to deal in transfers of real property must be evidenced by a sufficient writing (or record).

The Partnership Agreement

A partnership agreement, also known as articles of partnership, can include almost any terms that the parties wish, unless they are illegal or contrary to public policy or statute [UPA 103]. The terms commonly included in a partnership agreement are listed in Exhibit 37-1 below.

Duration of the Partnership

The partnership agreement can specify the duration of the partnership by stating that it will continue until a designated date or until the completion of a particular project. This is called a partnership for a term. Generally, withdrawal from a partnership for a term prematurely (before the expiration date) constitutes a breach of the agreement, and the responsible partner can be held liable for any resulting losses [UPA 602(b)(2)].

If no fixed duration is specified, the partnership is a partnership at will. Any partner can dissolve this type of partnership at any time without violating the agreement and without incurring liability for losses to other partners that result from the termination.

Arbitration	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Whether arbitration is required for any dispute relating to the partnership agreement.

Partnership by Estoppel

Occasionally, persons who are not partners nevertheless hold themselves out as partners and make representations that third parties rely on in dealing with them. In such a situation, a court may conclude that a partnership by estoppel exists and impose liability—but not partnership rights—on the alleged partner or partners. Similarly, a partnership by estoppel may be imposed when a partner represents, expressly or impliedly, that a nonpartner is a member of the firm. Whenever a third person has reasonably and detrimentally relied on the representation that a nonpartner was part of the partnership, a partnership by estoppel is deemed to exist. When this occurs, the nonpartner is regarded as an agent whose acts are binding on the partnership [UPA 308].

CASE IN POINT Gary Chavers operated Chavers Welding and Construction (CWC). Gary's two sons began to work in the business after graduating from high school. CWC contracted with Epsco, Inc., to provide payroll services for CWC. Epsco extended credit to CWC, which the Chaverses represented was a partnership. When CWC's account was more than $80,000 delinquent, Epsco sued to recover payment. The father filed for bankruptcy, and his obligation to Epsco was discharged. The sons claimed that their father owned CWC as a sole proprietor and that they were not partners in the business. The court, however, held that the sons were liable for CWC's debts based on partnership by estoppel. Because the Chaverses had represented to Epsco that CWC was a partnership and Epsco had relied on this representation when extending credit, the sons were prevented from claiming that no partnership existed.³

PARTNERSHIP OPERATION

The rights and duties of partners are governed largely by the specific terms of their partnership agreement. In the absence of provisions to the contrary in the partnership agreement, the law imposes the rights and duties discussed in the following subsections. The character and nature of the partnership business generally influence the application of these rights and duties.

3. Chavers v. Epsco, Inc., 352 Ark. 65, 98 S.W.3d 421 (2003).

Rights of Partners

The rights of partners in a partnership relate to the following areas: management, interest in the partnership, compensation, inspection of books, accounting, and property.

MANAGEMENT In a general partnership, all partners have equal rights in managing the partnership [UPA 401(f)]. Unless the partners agree otherwise, each partner has one vote in management matters regardless of the proportional size of his or her interest in the firm. In a large partnership, partners often agree to delegate daily management responsibilities to a management committee made up of one or more of the partners.

The majority rule controls decisions on ordinary matters connected with partnership business, unless otherwise specified in the agreement. Decisions that significantly affect the nature of the partnership or that are outside the ordinary course of the partnership business, however, require the unanimous consent of the partners [UPA 301(2), 401(i), 401(j)].

Unanimous consent is likely to be required for a decision to undertake any of the following actions:

1. To alter the essential nature of the firm's business as expressed in the partnership agreement or to alter the capital structure of the partnership.
2. To admit new partners or engage in a completely new business.
3. To assign partnership property to a trust for the benefit of creditors.
4. To dispose of the partnership's goodwill (defined on page 720).
5. To confess judgment against the partnership or to submit partnership claims to arbitration. (A confession of judgment is an act by a debtor that permits a judgment to be entered against him or her by a creditor, for an agreed sum, without the institution of legal proceedings.)
6. To undertake any act that would make further conduct of partnership business impossible.
7. To amend the terms of the partnership agreement.

INTEREST IN THE PARTNERSHIP Each partner is entitled to the proportion of business profits and losses that is specified in the partnership agreement. If the agreement does not apportion profits (indicate how the profits will be shared), the UPA provides that profits will be shared equally. If the agreement does not apportion losses, losses will be shared in the same ratio as profits [UPA 401(b)].

For example, Rico and Brett form a partnership. The partnership agreement provides for capital contributions of $60,000 from Rico and $40,000 from Brett, but it is silent as to how they will share profits or losses. In this situation, they will share both profits and losses equally. If their partnership agreement had provided that they would share profits in the same ratio as capital contributions, however, 60 percent of the profits would go to Rico, and 40 percent would go to Brett. If this agreement was silent as to losses, losses would be shared in the same ratio as profits (60 percent and 40 percent, respectively).

COMPENSATION Devoting time, skill, and energy to partnership business is a partner's duty and generally is not a compensable service. Rather, as mentioned, a partner's income from the partnership takes the form of a distribution of profits according to the partner's share in the business. Partners can, of course, agree otherwise. For example, the managing partner of a law firm often receives a salary—in addition to her or his share of profits—for performing special administrative or managerial duties.

INSPECTION OF THE BOOKS Partnership books and records must be kept accessible to all partners. Each partner has the right to receive (and the corresponding duty to produce) full and complete information concerning the conduct of all aspects of partnership business [UPA 403]. Each firm retains books for recording and securing such information. Partners contribute the information, and a bookkeeper typically has the duty to preserve it. The books must be kept at the firm's principal business office (unless the partners agree otherwise). Every partner, whether active or inactive, is entitled to inspect all books and records on demand and can make copies of the materials. The personal representative of a deceased partner's estate has the same right of access to partnership books and records that the decedent would have had [UPA 403].

ACCOUNTING OF PARTNERSHIP ASSETS OR PROFITS An accounting of partnership assets or profits is required to determine the value of each partner's share in the partnership. An accounting can be performed voluntarily, or it can be compelled by court order. Under UPA 405(b), a partner has the right to bring an action for an accounting during the term of the partnership, as well as on the partnership's dissolution and winding up.

PROPERTY RIGHTS Property acquired by a partnership is the property of the partnership and not of the partners individually [UPA 203]. Partnership property includes all property that was originally contributed to the partnership and anything later purchased by the partnership or in the partnership's name (except in rare circumstances) [UPA 204]. A partner may use or possess partnership property only on behalf of the partnership [UPA 401(g)]. A partner is not a co-owner of partnership property and has no right to sell, mortgage, or transfer partnership property to another [UPA 501].⁴

In other words, partnership property is owned by the partnership as an entity and not by the individual partners. Thus, a creditor of an individual partner cannot seek to use partnership property to satisfy the partner's debt. Such a creditor can, however, petition a court for a charging order to attach the individual partner's interest in the partnership (her or his proportionate share of the profits and losses and right to receive distributions) to satisfy the partner's obligation [UPA 502]. A partner can also assign her or his right to a share of the partnership profits to another to satisfy a debt.

Duties and Liabilities of Partners

The duties and liabilities of partners that we examine here are basically derived from agency law. Each partner is an agent of every other partner and acts as both a principal and an agent in any business transaction within the scope of the partnership agreement. Each partner is also a general agent of the partnership in carrying out the usual business of the firm “or business of the kind carried on by the partnership” [UPA 301(1)]. Thus, every act of a partner concerning partnership business and “business of the kind” and every contract signed in the partnership's name bind the firm. The UPA affirms general principles of agency law that pertain to the authority of a partner to bind a partnership in contract or tort.

FIDUCIARY DUTIES The fiduciary duties that a partner owes to the partnership and the other partners are the duty of care and the duty of loyalty [UPA 404(a)]. Under the UPA, a partner's duty of care is limited to refraining from “grossly negligent or reckless conduct, intentional misconduct, or a knowing violation of law” [UPA 404(c)].⁵ A partner is not

4. Under the previous version of the UPA, partners were tenants in partnership. This meant that every partner was a co-owner with all other partners of the partnership property. The current UPA does not recognize this concept.

5. The previous version of the UPA touched only briefly on the duty of loyalty and left the details of the partners' fiduciary duties to be developed under the law of agency.

liable to the partnership for simple negligence or honest errors in judgment in conducting partnership business.

The duty of loyalty requires a partner to account to the partnership for “any property, profit, or benefit” derived by the partner in the conduct of the partnership’s business or from the use of its property. A partner must also refrain from competing with the partnership in business or dealing with the firm as an adverse party [UPA 404(b)]. The duty of loyalty can be breached by self-dealing, misusing partnership property, disclosing trade secrets, or usurping a partnership business opportunity. The following case is a classic example.

CASE 37.1

Meinhard v. Salmon

Court of Appeals of New York, 249 N.Y. 458, 164 N.E. 545 (1928).
www.nycourts.gov/reporter/index.htm^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Walter Salmon negotiated a twenty-year lease for the Hotel Bristol in New York City. To pay for the conversion of the building into shops and offices, Salmon entered into an agreement with Morton Meinhard to assume half of the cost. They agreed to share the profits and losses from the joint venture (see page 746), but Salmon was to have the sole power to manage the building. Less than four months before the end of the lease term, the building’s owner, Elbridge Gerry, approached Salmon about a project to raze the converted structure, clear five adjacent lots, and construct a single building across the whole property. Salmon agreed and signed a new lease in the name of his own business, Midpoint Realty Company, without telling Meinhard. When Meinhard learned of the deal, he filed a suit in a New York state court against Salmon. The court ruled in Meinhard’s favor, and Salmon appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

CARDOZO, C.J. [Chief Justice]

* * * *

Joint adventurers, like copartners, owe to one another, while the enterprise continues, the duty of the finest loyalty. Many forms of conduct permissible in a work-a-day world for those acting at arm’s length are forbidden to those bound by fiduciary ties. * * * Not honesty alone, but the punctilio [strictness in observance of details] of an honor the most sensitive, is then the standard of behavior. As to this there has developed a tradition that is unbending and inveterate [entrenched]. Uncompromising rigidity has been the attitude of courts * * * when petitioned to undermine the rule of undivided loyalty.

* * * The trouble about [Salmon’s] conduct is that he excluded his coadventurer from any chance to compete, from any chance to enjoy the opportunity for benefit.

* * * The very fact that Salmon was in control with exclusive powers of direction charged him the more obviously with the duty of disclosure, [because] only through disclosure could opportunity be equalized.

* * * Authority is, of course, abundant that one partner may not appropriate to his own use a renewal of a lease, though its term is to begin at the expiration of the partnership. The lease at hand with its many changes is not strictly a renewal. Even so, the standard of loyalty for those in trust relations is without the fixed divisions of a graduated scale. * * * *A man obtaining [an] * * * opportunity * * * by the position he occupies as a partner is bound by his obligation to his copartners in such dealings not to separate his interest from theirs, but, if he acquires any benefit, to communicate it to them. Certain it is also that there may be no abuse of special opportunities growing out of a special trust as manager or agent.* [Emphasis added.]

* * * Very likely [Salmon] assumed in all good faith that with the approaching end of the venture he might ignore his coadventurer and take the extension for himself. He had given to the enterprise time and labor as well as money. He had made it a success. Meinhard, who had given money, but neither time nor labor, had already been richly paid. * * * [But] Salmon had put himself in a position in which thought of self was to be renounced, however hard the CASE 37.1 CONTINUED ♦ abnegation [self-denial]. He was much more than a coadventurer. He was a managing coadventurer. For him and for those like him the rule of undivided loyalty is relentless and supreme.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Court of Appeals of New York held that Salmon breached his fiduciary duty by failing to inform Meinhard of the business opportunity and secretly taking advantage of it himself. The court granted Meinhard an interest “measured by the value of half of the entire lease.”

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that Salmon had disclosed Gerry’s proposal to Meinhard, who had said that he was not interested. Would the result in this case have been different? Explain.

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY’S LAW • This landmark case involved a joint venture, not a partnership. At the time, a member of a joint venture had only the duty to refrain from actively subverting the rights of the other members. The decision in this case imposed the highest standard of loyalty on joint-venture members. The duty is now the same in both joint ventures and partnerships. The eloquent language in this case that describes the standard of loyalty is frequently quoted approvingly by courts in cases involving partnerships.

BREACH AND WAIVER OF FIDUCIARY DUTIES A partner’s fiduciary duties may not be waived or eliminated in the partnership agreement, and in fulfilling them each partner must act consistently with the obligation of good faith and fair dealing [UPA 103(b), 404(d)]. The agreement can specify acts that the partners agree will violate a fiduciary duty.

Note that a partner may pursue his or her own interests without automatically violating these duties [UPA 404(e)]. The key is whether the partner has disclosed the interest to the other partners. For example, a partner who owns a shopping mall may vote against a partnership proposal to open a competing mall, provided that the partner has fully disclosed her interest in the existing shopping mall to the other partners at the firm. A partner cannot make secret profits or put self-interest before his or her duty to the interest of the partnership, however.

AUTHORITY OF PARTNERS The UPA affirms general principles of agency law that pertain to a partner’s authority to bind a partnership in contract. A partner may also subject the partnership to tort liability under agency principles. When a partner is carrying on partnership business or business of the kind with third parties in the usual way, apparent authority exists, and both the partner and the firm share liability.

The partnership will not be liable, however, if the third parties know that the partner has no such authority. For example, Patricia, a partner in a law firm, applies for a bank loan on behalf of the partnership without authorization from the other partners. If the bank manager knows that Patricia has no authority to do so and nonetheless grants the loan, Patricia will be personally bound, but the partnership will not be liable.

A partnership may file in a designated state office a “statement of partnership authority” to limit a partner’s capacity to act as the firm’s agent or transfer property on its behalf [UPA 105, 303]. Any such limit on a partner’s authority, however, normally does not affect a third party who does not know about the statement (except in real estate transactions when the statement has been recorded with the appropriate state office—see Chapter 50).

The agency concepts relating to apparent authority, actual authority, and ratification that were discussed in Chapter 33 also apply to partnerships. The extent of implied authority generally is broader for partners than for ordinary agents, however.

The Scope of Implied Powers. The character and scope of the partnership business and the customary nature of the particular business operation determine the implied powers of partners. For example, a trading partnership is a business that has goods in inventory and makes profits buying and selling those goods. A partner in a trading partnership has a wide range of implied powers, such as to advertise products, hire employees, and extend the firm’s credit by issuing or signing checks (see Chapter 26).

In an ordinary partnership, the partners can exercise all implied powers reasonably necessary and customary to carry on that particular business. Some customarily implied powers include the authority to make warranties on goods in the sales business and the power to enter into contracts consistent with the firm's regular course of business. Most partners also have the implied authority to make admissions and representations concerning partnership affairs. A partner might also have the implied power to convey (transfer) real property in the firm's name when such conveyances are part of the ordinary course of partnership business.

Authorized versus Unauthorized Actions. If a partner acts within the scope of authority, the partnership is legally bound to honor the partner's commitments to third parties. For example, a partner's authority to sell partnership products carries with it the implied authority to transfer title and to make usual warranties. Hence, in a partnership that operates a retail tire store, any partner negotiating a contract with a customer for the sale of a set of tires can specify that "each tire will be warranted for normal wear for 40,000 miles." This same partner, however, does not have the authority to sell office equipment, fixtures, or the partnership's retail facility without the consent of all of the other partners.

In addition, because partnerships are formed to generate profits, a partner generally does not have the authority to make charitable contributions without the consent of the other partners. Such actions are not binding on the partnership unless they are ratified by all of the other partners.

LIABILITY OF PARTNERS One significant disadvantage associated with a traditional partnership is that the partners are personally liable for the debts of the partnership. Moreover, in most states, the liability is essentially unlimited because the acts of one partner in the ordinary course of business subject the other partners to personal liability [UPA 305]. The following subsections explain the rules on a partner's liability.

Joint Liability. At one time, each partner in a partnership generally was jointly liable for the partnership's obligations. Joint liability means that a third party must sue all of the partners as a group, but each partner can be held liable for the full amount.⁶ If a third party sued a partner on a contractual debt, the lawsuit had to name all of the partners as defendants to seek partnership assets to pay any judgment. With joint liability, the partnership's assets must be exhausted before creditors can reach the partners' individual assets.⁷

Joint and Several Liability. In the majority of the states, under UPA 306(a), partners are both jointly and severally (separately, or individually) liable for all partnership obligations, including contracts, torts, and breaches of trust. Joint and several liability means that a third party has the option of suing all of the partners together (jointly) or one or more of the partners separately (severally). This is true even if a partner did not participate in, ratify, or know about whatever it was that gave rise to the cause of action. Normally, though, the partnership's assets must be exhausted before a creditor can enforce a judgment against a partner's separate assets [UPA 307(d)].

A judgment against one partner severally (separately) does not extinguish the others' liability. Those not sued in the first action normally may be sued subsequently, unless the court in the first action held that the partnership was in no way liable. If a plaintiff is successful in a suit against a partner or partners, he or she may collect on the judgment only against the assets of those partners named as defendants. A partner who commits a tort may be required to indemnify (reimburse) the partnership for any damages it pays—unless the tort was committed in the ordinary course of the partnership's business.

CASE IN POINT Nicole Moren was a partner in Jax Restaurant. After work one day, Moren was called back to the restaurant to help in the kitchen. She brought her two-year-old son, Remington, and sat him on the kitchen counter. While she was making pizzas, Remington reached into the dough press. His hand was crushed, causing permanent injuries. Through his father, Remington filed a suit against the partnership for negligence. The partnership filed a complaint against Moren, arguing that it was entitled to indemnity (compensation or reimbursement) from Moren for her negligence. The court held in favor of Moren and ordered the partnership to pay damages to Remington. Moren was not required to indemnify the partnership because her negligence occurred in the ordinary course of the partnership's business.⁸

6. Under the previous version of the UPA, which is still in effect in a few states, partners were subject to joint liability on partnership debts and contracts, excluding partnership debts arising from torts. States that still follow the previous version of the UPA include Connecticut, West Virginia, and Wyoming. In these states, the partners are subject to joint liability on contracts and to joint and several liability (discussed next) on debts arising from torts.

7. For a case applying joint liability to a partnership, see Shar's Cars, LLC v. Elder, 97 P.3d 724 (Utah App. 2004).

8. Moren v. Jax Restaurant, 679 N.W.2d 165 (Minn.App. 2004).

Liability of Incoming Partners. A partner newly admitted to an existing partnership is not personally liable for any partnership obligation incurred before the person became a partner [UPA 306(b)]. In other words, the new partner's liability to existing creditors of the partnership is limited to her or his capital contribution to the firm.

For example, Smartclub, an existing partnership with four members, admits a new partner, Alex Jaff. He contributes $100,000 to the partnership. Smartclub has debts amounting to $600,000 at the time Jaff joins the firm. Although Jaff's capital contribution of $100,000 can be used to satisfy Smartclub's obligations, Jaff is not personally liable for partnership debts that were incurred before he became a partner. Thus, his personal assets cannot be used to satisfy the partnership's preexisting debt. If, however, the managing partner at Smartclub borrows funds for the partnership after Jaff becomes a partner, Jaff will be personally liable for those amounts, along with all other partners.

DISSOCIATION OF A PARTNER

Dissociation occurs when a partner ceases to be associated in the carrying on of the partnership business. Although a partner always has the power to dissociate from the firm, he or she may not have the right to dissociate. Dissociation normally entitles the partner to have his or her interest purchased by the partnership, and terminates his or her actual authority to act for the partnership and to participate with the partners in running the business. After that, the partnership continues to do business without the dissociated partner.⁹

Events That Cause Dissociation

Under UPA 601, a partner can be dissociated from a partnership in any of the following ways:

1. By the partner's voluntarily giving notice of an "express will to withdraw." (Note that when a partner gives notice of her or his intent to withdraw, the remaining partners must decide whether to continue or give up the partnership business. If they do not agree to continue the partnership, the voluntary dissociation of a partner will dissolve the firm [UPA 801(1)].)

2. By the occurrence of an event specified in the partnership agreement.
3. By a unanimous vote of the other partners under certain circumstances, such as when a partner transfers substantially all of her or his interest in the partnership, or when it becomes unlawful to carry on partnership business with that partner.
4. By order of a court or arbitrator if the partner has engaged in wrongful conduct that affects the partnership business, breached the partnership agreement or violated a duty owed to the partnership or the other partners, or engaged in conduct that makes it "not reasonably practicable to carry on the business in partnership with the partner" [UPA 601(5)].
5. By the partner's declaring bankruptcy, assigning his or her interest in the partnership for the benefit of creditors, or becoming physically or mentally incapacitated, or by the partner's death. Note that although the bankruptcy or death of a partner represents that partner's "dissociation" from the partnership, it is not an automatic ground for the partnership's dissolution (dissolution will be discussed shortly).

Wrongful Dissociation

As mentioned, a partner has the power to dissociate from a partnership at any time, but if she or he lacks the right to dissociate, then the dissociation is considered wrongful under the law [UPA 602]. When a partner's dissociation breaches a partnership agreement, for instance, it is wrongful. Suppose that a partnership agreement states that it is a breach of the agreement for any partner to assign partnership property to a creditor without the consent of the other partners. If Janis, a partner, makes such an assignment, she has not only breached the agreement but has also wrongfully dissociated from the partnership. Similarly, if a partner refuses to perform duties required by the partnership agreement—such as accounting for profits earned from the use of partnership property—this breach can be treated as a wrongful dissociation.

A partner who wrongfully dissociates is liable to the partnership and to the other partners for damages caused by the dissociation. This liability is in addition to any other obligation of the partner to the partnership or to the other partners. Thus, a wrongfully dissociating partner is liable to the partnership

9. Under the previous version of the UPA, when a partner withdrew from a partnership, the partnership was considered dissolved, its business had to be wound up, and the proceeds had to be distributed to creditors and among partners. The new UPA provisions dramatically changed the law governing partnership breakups and dissolution by no longer requiring that the partnership end if one partner dissociates.

not only for any damages caused by breach of the partnership agreement, but also for costs incurred to replace the partner's expertise or to obtain new financing.

Effects of Dissociation

Dissociation (rightful or wrongful) terminates some of the rights of the dissociated partner, requires that the partnership purchase his or her interest, and alters the liability of the parties to third parties.

RIGHTS AND DUTIES On a partner's dissociation, his or her right to participate in the management and conduct of the partnership business terminates [UPA 603]. The partner's duty of loyalty also ends. A partner's duty of care continues only with respect to events that occurred before dissociation, unless the partner participates in winding up the partnership's business (which will be discussed shortly). For example, Debbie Pearson is a partner who is leaving an accounting firm, Bubb & Pearson. Pearson can immediately compete with the firm for new clients. She must exercise care in completing ongoing client transactions, however, and must account to the firm for any fees received from the old clients based on those transactions.

After a partner's dissociation, his or her interest in the partnership must be purchased according to the rules in UPA 701. The buyout price is based on the amount that would have been distributed to the partner if the partnership had been wound up on the date of dissociation. Offset against the price are amounts owed by the partner to the partnership, including damages for wrongful dissociation.

CASE IN POINT In 1978, Wilbur and Dee Warnick and their son Randall bought a ranch for $335,000 and formed a partnership to operate it. The partners' initial capital contributions totaled $60,000, of which Randall paid 34 percent. Over the next twenty years, each partner contributed funds to the operation and received cash distributions from the partnership. In 1999, Randall dissociated from the partnership. When the parties could not agree on a buyout price, Randall filed a lawsuit. The court awarded Randall $115,783.¹³—the amount of his cash contributions, plus 34 percent of the increase in the value of the partnership's assets above all partners' cash contributions. Randall's parents appealed, arguing that $50,000 should be deducted from the appraised value of the assets for the estimated expenses of selling them. The court affirmed the buyout price, however, because “purely hypothetical costs of sale are not a required deduction in valuing partnership assets” to determine a buyout price.¹⁰

LIABILITY TO THIRD PARTIES For two years after a partner dissociates from a continuing partnership, the partnership may be bound by the acts of the dissociated partner based on apparent authority [UPA 702]. In other words, the partnership may be liable to a third party with whom a dissociated partner enters into a transaction if the third party reasonably believed that the dissociated partner was still a partner. Similarly, a dissociated partner may be liable for partnership obligations entered into during a two-year period following dissociation [UPA 703].

To avoid this possible liability, a partnership should notify its creditors, customers, and clients of a partner's dissociation. In addition, either the partnership or the dissociated partner can file a statement of dissociation in the appropriate state office to limit the dissociated partner's authority to ninety days after the filing [UPA 704]. Filing this statement helps to minimize the firm's potential liability for the former partner and vice versa.

PARTNERSHIP TERMINATION

The same events that cause dissociation can result in the end of the partnership if the remaining partners no longer wish to (or are unable to) continue the partnership business. Only certain departures of a partner will end the partnership, though, and generally the partnership can continue if the remaining partners consent [UPA 801].

The termination of a partnership is referred to as dissolution, which essentially means the commencement of the winding up process. Winding up is the actual process of collecting, liquidating, and distributing the partnership assets.¹¹ Here, we discuss the dissolution and winding up of partnership business.

Dissolution

Dissolution of a partnership generally can be brought about by acts of the partners, by operation of law,

10. Warnick v. Warnick, 2006 WY 58, 133 P.3d 997 (2006).

11. Although “winding down” would seem to describe more accurately the process of settling accounts and liquidating the assets of a partnership, English and U.S. statutory and case law have traditionally used “winding up” to denote this final stage of a partnership's existence.

or by judicial decree [UPA 801]. Any partnership (including one for a fixed term) can be dissolved by the partners' agreement. Similarly, if the partnership agreement states that it will dissolve on a certain event, such as a partner's death or bankruptcy, then the occurrence of that event will dissolve the partnership. A partnership for a fixed term or a particular undertaking is dissolved by operation of law at the expiration of the term or on the completion of the undertaking.

Any event that makes it unlawful for the partnership to continue its business will result in dissolution [UPA 801(4)]. Under the UPA, a court may order dissolution when it becomes obviously impractical for the firm to continue—for example, if the business can only be operated at a loss [UPA 801(5)]. Note, however, that even when one partner has brought a court action seeking to dissolve a partnership, the partnership continues to exist until it is legally dissolved by the court or by the parties' agreement.

CASE IN POINT Ellin Curley and Lawrence Kaiser were married when they formed a general partnership, K&K Associates. Later, Curley and Kaiser were divorced and entered into an amended partnership agreement that stated that Curley owned 80 percent of the firm and Kaiser owned 20 percent. K&K invested part of its capital, but the investment suffered losses. When Kaiser refused to pay his share of the losses, Curley filed a suit for breach of contract and requested judicial dissolution of K&K. While the lawsuit was pending, Kaiser died, and his new wife was substituted as the defendant. A provision in the amended agreement stated that if Kaiser died while still a partner, K&K would terminate, and the value of Kaiser's ownership interest in the closing capital account would be zero. The defense argued that this provision was not enforceable because the partnership no longer existed. The court ruled that although the dissolution process had begun, the partnership still existed when Kaiser died. Therefore, the provision in the amended agreement effectively terminated the partnership and reduced the value of Kaiser's interest to zero.¹²

Winding Up and Distribution of Assets

After dissolution, the partnership continues for the limited purpose of the winding up process.¹³ The partners cannot create new obligations on behalf of the partnership. They have authority only to complete transactions begun but not finished at the time of dissolution and to wind up the business of the partnership [UPA 803, 804(1)].

Winding up includes collecting and preserving partnership assets, discharging liabilities (paying debts), and accounting to each partner for the value of his or her interest in the partnership. Partners continue to have fiduciary duties to one another and to the firm during this process. UPA 401(h) provides that a partner is entitled to compensation for services in winding up partnership affairs (and reimbursement for expenses incurred in the process) above and apart from his or her share in the partnership profits.

Both creditors of the partnership and creditors of the individual partners can make claims on the partnership's assets. In general, partnership creditors share proportionately with the partners' individual creditors in the partners' assets, which include their interests in the partnership. A partnership's assets are distributed according to the following priorities [UPA 807]:

1. Payment of debts, including those owed to partner and nonpartner creditors.
2. Return of capital contributions and distribution of profits to partners.¹⁴

If the partnership's liabilities are greater than its assets, the partners bear the losses—in the absence of a contrary agreement—in the same proportion in which they shared the profits (rather than, for example, in proportion to their contributions to the partnership's capital).

Partnership Buy-Sell Agreements

Before entering into a partnership, partners should agree on how the assets will be valued and divided in the event that the partnership dissolves. A buy-sell agreement, sometimes called simply a buyout agreement, provides for one or more partners to buy out the other or others, should the situation warrant. Agreeing beforehand on who buys what, under what circumstances, and, if possible, at what price may eliminate costly negotiations or litigation later. Alternatively, the agreement may specify that one 12. Curley v. Kaiser, 112 Conn.App. 213, 962 A.2d 167 (2009).

13. Note that at any time after dissolution but before winding up is completed, all of the partners may decide to continue the partnership business and waive the right to have the business wound up [UPA 802].

14. Under the previous version of the UPA, creditors of the partnership had priority over creditors of the individual partners. Also, in distributing partnership assets, third party creditors were paid before partner creditors, and capital contributions were returned before profits.

or more partners will determine the value of the interest being sold and that the other or others will decide whether to buy or sell.

Under UPA 701(a), if a partner's dissociation does not result in a dissolution of the partnership, a buyout of the partner's interest is mandatory. The UPA contains an extensive set of buyout rules that apply when the partners do not have a buyout agreement. Basically, a withdrawing partner receives the same amount through a buyout that he or she would receive if the business were winding up [UPA 701(b)].

SECTION 6

LIMITED LIABILITY PARTNERSHIPS

The limited liability partnership (LLP) is a hybrid form of business designed mostly for professionals who normally do business as partners in a partnership. The first state to enact an LLP statute was Texas, in 1991. Other states quickly followed suit, and by 1997, almost all of the states had enacted LLP statutes.

The major advantage of the LLP is that it allows a partnership to continue as a pass-through entity for tax purposes but limits the personal liability of the partners. The LLP is especially attractive for two categories of businesses: professional service firms and family businesses. In fact, all of the “Big Four” accounting firms—the four largest international accountancy and professional services firms—are organized as LLPs, including Ernst & Young, LLP, and PricewaterhouseCoopers, LLP.

Formation of an LLP

LLPs must be formed and operated in compliance with state statutes, which may include provisions of the UPA. The appropriate form must be filed with a central state agency, usually the secretary of state's office, and the business's name must include either “Limited Liability Partnership” or “LLP” [UPA 1001, 1002]. In addition, an LLP must file an annual report with the state to remain qualified as an LLP in that state [UPA 1003].

In most states, it is relatively easy to convert a traditional partnership into an LLP because the firm's basic organizational structure remains the same. Additionally, all of the statutory and common law rules governing partnerships still apply (apart from those modified by the LLP statute). Normally, LLP statutes are simply amendments to a state's already existing partnership law.

Liability in an LLP

An LLP allows professionals, such as attorneys and accountants, to avoid personal liability for the malpractice of other partners. A partner in an LLP is still liable for her or his own wrongful acts, such as negligence, however. Also liable is the partner who supervised the individual who committed a wrongful act. (This generally is true for all types of partners and partnerships, not just LLPs.)

Although LLP statutes vary from state to state, generally each state statute limits the liability of partners in some way. For example, Delaware law protects each innocent partner from the “debts and obligations of the partnership arising from negligence, wrongful acts, or misconduct.” The UPA more broadly exempts partners from personal liability for any partnership obligation, “whether arising in contract, tort, or otherwise” [UPA 306(c)]. Although the language of these statutes may seem to apply specifically to attorneys, almost any group of professionals can organize as an LLP.

LIABILITY FROM STATE TO STATE When an LLP formed in one state wants to do business in another state, it may be required to register in the second state—for example, by filing a statement of foreign qualification [UPA 1102]. Because state LLP statutes are not uniform, a question sometimes arises as to which law applies if the LLP statutes in the two states provide different liability protection. Most states apply the law of the state in which the LLP was formed, even when the firm does business in another state, which is also the rule under UPA 1101.

SHARING LIABILITY AMONG PARTNERS When more than one partner in an LLP is negligent, there is a question as to how liability should be shared. Some states provide for proportionate liability—that is, for separate determinations of the negligence of the partners. For example, accountants Don and Jane are partners in an LLP, with Don supervising Jane. Jane negligently fails to file a tax return for one of their clients, Centaur Tools. Centaur files a suit against Don and Jane. Under a proportionate liability statute, Don will be liable for no more than his portion of the responsibility for the missed tax deadline. In a state that does not allow for proportionate liability, Don can be held liable for the entire loss.

Family Limited Liability Partnerships

A family limited liability partnership (FLLP) is a limited liability partnership in which the partners are related to each other—for example, as spouses, parents and children, siblings, or cousins. A person acting in a fiduciary capacity for persons so related can also be a partner. All of the partners must be natural persons or persons acting in a fiduciary capacity for the benefit of natural persons.

Probably the most significant use of the FLLP form of business organization is in agriculture. Family-owned farms sometimes find this form to their benefit. The FLLP offers the same advantages as other LLPs with certain additional advantages, such as, in Iowa, an exemption from real estate transfer taxes when partnership real estate is transferred among partners.¹⁵

SECTION 7 LIMITED PARTNERSHIPS

We now look at a business organizational form that limits the liability of some of its owners—the limited partnership (LP). Limited partnerships originated in medieval Europe and have been in existence in the United States since the early 1800s. In many ways, limited partnerships are like the general partnerships discussed at the beginning of this chapter, but they differ from general partnerships in several ways. For this reason, they are sometimes referred to as special partnerships.

A limited partnership consists of at least one general partner and one or more limited partners. A general partner assumes management responsibility for the partnership and has full responsibility for the partnership and for all its debts. A limited partner contributes cash or other property and owns an interest in the firm but does not undertake any management responsibilities and is not personally liable for partnership debts beyond the amount of his or her investment. A limited partner can forfeit limited liability by taking part in the management of the business. A comparison of general partnerships and limited partnerships appears in Exhibit 37–2 on the following page.¹⁶

Until 1976, the law governing limited partnerships in all states except Louisiana was the Uniform Limited Partnership Act (ULPA). Since 1976, most states and the District of Columbia have adopted the revised version of the ULPA, known as the Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act (RULPA). Because the RULPA is the dominant law governing limited partnerships in the United States, we refer to it in the following discussion. Note, however, that amendments to make the RULPA more flexible were proposed to the states in 2001, and fifteen states have adopted the 2001 version of this law.

Formation of a Limited Partnership

In contrast to the informal, private, and voluntary agreement that usually suffices for a general partnership, the formation of a limited partnership is a public and formal proceeding that must follow statutory requirements. A limited partnership must have at least one general partner and one limited partner, as mentioned previously. Additionally, the partners must sign a certificate of limited partnership, which requires information such as the name, mailing address, and capital contribution of each general and limited partner. (The information required is similar to that found in a corporation's articles of incorporation—see Chapter 39.) The certificate must be filed with the designated state official—under the RULPA, the secretary of state. The certificate is usually open to public inspection.

Liabilities of Partners in a Limited Partnership

General partners, unlike limited partners, are personally liable to the partnership's creditors. Thus, at least one general partner is necessary in a limited partnership so that someone has personal liability. This policy can be circumvented in states that allow a corporation to be the general partner in a partnership. Because the corporation has limited liability by virtue of corporation statutes, if a corporation is the general partner, no one in the limited partnership has personal liability.

The liability of a limited partner, as mentioned, is limited to the capital that she or he contributes or agrees to contribute to the partnership [RULPA 502]. Limited partners enjoy this limited liability only so long as they do not participate in management [RULPA 303]. A limited partner who participates in management will be just as liable as a general partner to any creditor who transacts business with the limited partnership and believes, based on the limited partner's conduct, that the limited partner is a general partner [RULPA 303]. It is not always clear how much review and advisement a limited partner can engage in before being exposed to liability, though.

15. Iowa Statutes Section 428A.2.

16. Under the UPA, a general partnership can be converted into a limited partnership and vice versa [UPA 902, 903]. The UPA also provides for the merger of a general partnership with one or more general or limited partnerships [UPA 905].

EXHIBIT 37-2 • A Comparison of General Partnerships and Limited Partnerships

CHARACTERISTIC	GENERAL PARTNERSHIP (UPA)	LIMITED PARTNERSHIP (RULPA)
Creation	By agreement of two or more persons to carry on a business as co-owners for profit.	By agreement of two or more persons to carry on a business as co-owners for profit. Must include one or more general partners and one or more limited partners. Filing of a certificate with the secretary of state is required.
Sharing of Profits and Losses	By agreement; or, in the absence of agreement, profits are shared equally by the partners, and losses are shared in the same ratio as profits.	Profits are shared as required in the certificate agreement, and losses are shared likewise, up to the amount of the limited partners' capital contributions. In the absence of a provision in the certificate agreement, profits and losses are shared on the basis of percentages of capital contributions.
Liability	Unlimited personal liability of all partners.	Unlimited personal liability of all general partners; limited partners liable only to the extent of their capital contributions.
Capital Contribution	No minimum or mandatory amount; set by agreement.	Set by agreement.
Management	By agreement; or, in the absence of agreement, all partners have an equal voice.	Only the general partner (or the general partners). Limited partners have no voice or else are subject to liability as general partners (but only if a third party has reason to believe that the limited partner is a general partner). A limited partner may act as an agent or employee of the partnership and vote on amending the certificate or on the sale or dissolution of the partnership.
Duration	Terminated by agreement of the partners, but can continue to do business even when a partner dissociates from the partnership.	Terminated by agreement in the certificate or by retirement, death, or mental incompetence of a general partner in the absence of the right of the other general partners to continue the partnership. Death of a limited partner does not terminate the partnership, unless he or she is the only remaining limited partner.
Distribution of Assets on Liquidation—Order of Priorities	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Payment of debts, including those owed to partner and nonpartner creditors. 2. Return of capital contributions and distribution of profit to partners. 	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Outside creditors and partner creditors. 2. Partners and former partners entitled to distributions of partnership assets. 3. Unless otherwise agreed, return of capital contributions and distribution of profit to partners.

Rights and Duties in a Limited Partnership

With the exception of the right to participate in management, limited partners have essentially the same rights as general partners. Limited partners have a right of access to the partnership's books and to information regarding partnership business. On dissolution of the partnership, limited partners are entitled to a return of their contributions in accordance with the partnership certificate [RULPA 201(a)(10)]. They can also assign their interests subject to the certificate [RULPA 702, 704] and can sue an outside party on behalf of the firm if the general partners with authority to do so have refused to file suit [RULPA 1001].

General and limited partners also owe each other a fiduciary duty to exercise good faith in transactions related to the partnership. Can this duty be waived through a provision in the partnership agreement? That was the issue in the following case.

1515 North Wells, LP v. 1513 North Wells, LLC

Appellate Court of Illinois, First District, 392 Ill.App.3d 863, 913 N.E.2d 1 (2009).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Thomas Bracken (owner of 1513 North Wells, LLC), Mark Sutherland, and Alex Pearsall were limited partners in 1515 North Wells, LP. Sutherland and Pearsall's company, SP Development Corporation, was 1515's general partner. The partnership was formed to build a condominium with residential and commercial space. SP chose another Sutherland and Pearsall company, Sutherland and Pearsall Development, to be the general contractor for the 1515 project. Meanwhile, Bracken borrowed $250,000 from 1515. When he did not repay the loan, 1515 filed a suit in an Illinois state court to collect. In response, Bracken filed a claim that included SP Development Corporation, alleging breach of fiduciary duty. The court ordered Bracken to repay the loan and SP to pay Bracken $900,000. SP appealed, arguing that a provision in 1515's partnership agreement, which allowed all partners to engage in "whatever activities they choose," effectively "relaxed" SP's fiduciary duty.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice CAHILL delivered the opinion of the court:

* * * *

* * * Paragraph 1.7 of the limited partnership agreement * * * provided:

The General Partner and each Limited Partner may, notwithstanding this Agreement, engage in whatever activities they choose, whether the same are competitive with the Partnership or otherwise, without having or incurring any obligation to offer any interest in such activities to the Partnership or any Partner.

* * * *

The general partner argues that paragraph 1.7 did in fact relax the parties' fiduciary duties to each other.

* * * *

A fiduciary relationship exists between partners and each is bound to exercise the utmost good faith in all dealings and transactions related to the partnership. To state a claim for breach of fiduciary duty, a plaintiff must establish (1) a fiduciary duty on the part of the defendant, (2) the defendant's breach of that duty, and (3) damages that were proximately caused by the defendant's breach.

Under Section 103(b)(3) of the Uniform Partnership Act, a partnership agreement may not "eliminate or reduce a partner's fiduciary duties." Language in an agreement that allows the partners discretion in certain areas does not metamorphose [transform] the document into an unrestricted license to engage in self-dealing at the expense of those to whom the managing partner owes such a duty. There is no authority for the proposition that there can be a priori waiver of fiduciary duties in a partnership. Nor is the practice of imposing purported advance waivers of fiduciary duties in limited partnership enterprises to be given judicial recognition. [Emphasis added.]

Here, there was ample evidence to support the [trial] court's finding of a breach of fiduciary duty, including the "cost plus fee" contract that the general partner awarded to the general contractor and the profits from condominium upgrades that went to the general contractor, not to the limited partnership. Paragraph 1.7 of the limited partnership agreement did not immunize the partners against liability for breach of fiduciary duty.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment. A partnership agreement cannot "contract away" the fiduciary duty that a general partner owes to limited partners.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that instead of choosing Sutherland and Pearsall Development to be the general contractor, SP had selected a party with no connection to any of 1515's partners. Is it likely that the result in this case would have been different? Why or why not?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Did any of the parties involved in this case commit an ethical violation? Discuss.

Dissociation and Dissolution

A general partner has the power to voluntarily dissociate, or withdraw, from a limited partnership unless the partnership agreement specifies otherwise. A limited partner theoretically can withdraw from the partnership by giving six months' notice unless the partnership agreement specifies a term, as most do. Also, some states have passed laws prohibiting the withdrawal of limited partners.

In a limited partnership, a general partner's voluntary dissociation from the firm normally will lead to dissolution unless all partners agree to continue the business. Similarly, the bankruptcy, retirement, death, or mental incompetence of a general partner will cause the dissociation of that partner and the dissolution of the limited partnership unless the other members agree to continue the firm [RULPA 801]. Bankruptcy of a limited partner, however, does not dissolve the partnership unless it causes the bankruptcy of the firm. Death or an assignment of the interest of a limited partner does not dissolve a limited partnership [RULPA 702, 704, 705]. A limited partnership can be dissolved by court decree [RULPA 802].

On dissolution, creditors' claims, including those of partners who are creditors, take first priority. After that, partners and former partners receive unpaid distributions of partnership assets and, except as otherwise agreed, amounts representing returns of their contributions and amounts proportionate to their shares of the distributions [RULPA 804].

In the following case, two limited partners wanted the business of the partnership to be sold on its dissolution, while another limited partner (actor Kevin Costner) and the general partner wanted it to continue.

EXTENDED CASE 37.3

In re Dissolution of Midnight Star Enterprises, LP

Supreme Court of South Dakota, 2006 SD 98, 724 N.W.2d 334 (2006).

SABERS, Justice.

* * * *

Midnight Star Enterprises, L.P.

(Midnight Star) is a limited partnership, which operates a gaming, on-sale liquor and restaurant business in Deadwood, South Dakota. The owners of Midnight Star consist of: Midnight Star Enterprises, Ltd. (MSEL) as the general partner, owning 22 partnership units; Kevin Costner (Costner), owning 71.50 partnership units; and Francis and Carla Caneva (Canevas), owning 3.25 partnership units each. Costner is the sole owner of MSEL and essentially owns 93.5 partnership units.

The Canevas managed the operations of Midnight Star, receiving salaries and bonuses for their employment. According to MSEL, it became concerned about the Canevas' management and voiced concerns. Communications between the * * * partners broke down * * * .

MSEL * * * brought a Petition for Dissolution [in a South Dakota state court]. In order to dissolve, the fair market value of Midnight Star had to be assessed. MSEL hired Paul Thorstenson, an accountant, to determine the fair market value. * * * The Canevas solicited an "offer" from Ken Kellar, a Deadwood casino, restaurant, and hotel owner * * * .

* * * Thorstenson determined the fair market value was $3.1 million based on the hypothetical transaction standard of valuation.

* * * The * * * court * * * found Kellar's offer of $6.2 million to be the fair market value * * * [and] ordered the majority owners to buy the business for $6.2 million within 10 days or the court would order the business to be sold on the open market. [MSEL appealed to the South Dakota Supreme Court.]

* * * [The] Canevas claim the partnership agreement does not allow the general partner to buy out their interest in Midnight Star. Instead, the Canevas argue, the agreement mandates the partnership be sold on the open market upon dissolution. * * * Article 10.4 provides:

After all of the debts of the Partnership have been paid, the General Partner * * * may distribute in kind any Partnership property provided that a good faith effort is first made to sell * * * such property * * * at its estimated fair value to one or more third parties * * * .

* * * *

* * * This provision clearly states the General Partner "may distribute in kind any partnership property" if the property is first offered to a third party for a fair value. While the General Partner may offer the property on the open market, Article 10.4 does not require it.

This interpretation is reinforced when read together with Article 10.3.1 * * * [which] instructs that "no assets * * * shall be sold or otherwise transferred to [any partner] unless the assets are valued at their then fair market value * * * ." If Article 10.4 requires a forced sale, then there would be no need to have the fair market value provision of Article 10.3.1. [Emphasis added.] * * * Read as a whole, the partnership agreement does not require a mandatory sale upon dissolution. Instead, the general partner can opt to liquidate using either a sale or transfer under Article 10.3.1. * * * Because MSEL decided to pursue dissolution under Article 10.3.1, we decide the correct standard for determining the fair market value of the partnership.

* * * *
MSEL claims the correct standard * * * is the hypothetical transaction analysis * * * . [The] Canevas argue that * * * the offer from Kellar represented the fair market value * * * .

* * * *
* * * [There are] sound policy reasons why an offer cannot be the fair market value. * * * What if a businessman, for personal reasons, offers 10 times the real value of the business? What if the partnership, for personal reasons, such as sentimental value, refuses to sell for that absurdly high offer? These arbitrary, emotional offers and rejections cannot provide a rational and reasonable basis for determining the fair market value. [Emphasis added.]

Conversely, the hypothetical transaction standard does provide a rational and reasonable basis for determining the fair market value

* * * by removing the irrationalities, strategies, and emotions * * * .

Since it was error for the [lower] court to value Midnight Star at $6.2 million, it was also error to force the general partners to buy the business for $6.2 million or sell the business.

* * * *
* * * Instead of ordering the majority partners to purchase the whole partnership for the appraised value, the majority partners should only be required to pay any interests the withdrawing partner is due.

* * * The majority partners should only be required to pay the Canevas the value of their 6.5 partnership units * * * .

* * * We reverse and remand for further proceedings * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. Why did the court hold that a forced sale of the property of the limited partnership was not appropriate?
2. Under what circumstances might a forced sale of the property of a limited partnership on its dissolution be appropriate?

Limited Liability Limited Partnerships

A limited liability limited partnership (LLLP) is a type of limited partnership. An LLLP differs from a limited partnership in that a general partner in an LLLP has the same liability as a limited partner in a limited partnership. In other words, the liability of all partners is limited to the amount of their investments in the firm.

A few states provide expressly for LLLPs.¹⁷ In states that do not provide for LLLPs but do allow for limited partnerships and limited liability partnerships, a limited partnership should probably still be able to register with the state as an LLLP.

17. See, for example, Colorado Revised Statutes Annotated Section 7-62-109. Other states that provide expressly for limited liability limited partnerships include Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Nevada, Texas, and Virginia.

REVIEWING

Partnerships and Limited Liability Partnerships

Grace Tarnavsky and her sons, Manny and Jason, bought a ranch known as the Cowboy Palace in March 2007, and the three verbally agreed to share the business for five years. Grace contributed 50 percent of the investment, and each son contributed 25 percent. Manny agreed to handle the livestock, and Jason agreed to handle the bookkeeping. The Tarnavskys took out joint loans and opened a joint bank account into which they deposited the ranch's proceeds and from which they made payments toward property, cattle, equipment, and supplies. In September 2011, Manny severely injured his back while baling hay and became permanently unable to handle livestock. Manny therefore hired additional laborers to tend the livestock, causing the Cowboy Palace to incur significant debt. In September 2012, Al's Feed Barn filed a lawsuit against Jason to collect $32,400 in unpaid debts. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Was this relationship a partnership for a term or a partnership at will?
2. Did Manny have the authority to hire additional laborers to work at the ranch after his injury? Why or why not?
3. Under the current UPA, can Al's Feed Barn bring an action against Jason individually for the Cowboy Palace's debt? Why or why not?
4. Suppose that after his back injury in 2011, Manny sent his mother and brother a notice indicating his intent to withdraw from the partnership. Can he still be held liable for the debt to Al's Feed Barn? Why or why not?

DEBATE THIS: A partnership should automatically end when one partner dissociates from the firm.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

37-1. Partnership Formation Daniel is the owner of a chain of shoe stores. He hires Rubya to be the manager of a new store, which is to open in Grand Rapids, Michigan. Daniel, by written contract, agrees to pay Rubya a monthly salary and 20 percent of the profits. Without Daniel's knowledge, Rubya represents himself to Classen as Daniel's partner and shows Classen the agreement to share profits. Classen extends credit to Rubya. Rubya defaults. Discuss whether Classen can hold Daniel liable as a partner.

37-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Partnership Dissolution.

Dorinda, Luis, and Elizabeth form a limited partnership. Dorinda is a general partner, and Luis and Elizabeth are limited partners. Consider the separate events below, and discuss fully whether each event constitutes a dissolution of the limited partnership.

- (a) Luis assigns his partnership interest to Ashley.

- (b) Elizabeth is petitioned into involuntary bankruptcy.
- (c) Dorinda dies.

- For a sample answer to Question 37–2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

37–3. Distribution of Partnership Assets Meyer, Knapp, and Cavanna establish a partnership to operate a window-washing service. Meyer contributes $10,000 to the partnership, and Knapp and Cavanna contribute $1,000 each. The partnership agreement is silent as to how profits and losses will be shared. One month after the partnership begins operation, Knapp and Cavanna vote, over Meyer's objection, to purchase another truck for the firm. Meyer believes that because he contributed $10,000, the partnership cannot make any major commitment to purchase over his objection. In addition, Meyer claims that in the absence of any provision in the agreement, profits must be divided in the same ratio as capital contributions. Discuss Meyer's contentions.

37–4. Indications of Partnership At least six months before the 1996 Summer Olympic Games in Atlanta, Georgia, Stafford Fontenot, Steve Turner, Mike Montelaro, Joe Sokol, and Doug Brinsmade agreed to sell Cajun food at the Games and began making preparations. Calling themselves "Prairie Cajun Seafood Catering of Louisiana," on May 19 the group applied for a license with the Fulton County, Georgia, Department of Public Health–Environmental Health Services. Later, Ted Norris received for the sale of a mobile kitchen an $8,000 check drawn on the "Prairie Cajun Seafood Catering of Louisiana" account and two promissory notes, one for $12,000 and the other for $20,000. The notes, which were dated June 12, listed only Fontenot "d/b/a [doing business as] Prairie Cajun Seafood" as the maker. On July 31, Fontenot and his friends signed a partnership agreement, which listed specific percentages of profits and losses. They drove the mobile kitchen to Atlanta, but business was "disastrous." When the notes were not paid, Norris filed a suit in a Louisiana state court against Fontenot, seeking payment. What are the elements of a partnership? Did a partnership exist among Fontenot and the others? Why or why not? Who is liable on the notes? Why? [Norris v. Fontenot, 867 So.2d 179 (La.App. 3 Cir. 2004)]

37–5. Partnership Status Charlie Waugh owned and operated an auto parts junkyard in Georgia. Charlie's son, Mack, started working in the business part-time as a child and full-time when he left school at the age of sixteen. Mack oversaw the business's finances, depositing the profits in a bank. Charlie gave Mack a one-half interest in the business, telling him that if "something happened" to Charlie, the entire business would be his. In 1994, Charlie and his wife, Alene, transferred to Mack the land on which the junkyard was located. Two years later, however, Alene and her daughters, Gail and Jewel, falsely convinced Charlie, whose mental competence had deteriorated, that Mack had cheated him. Mack was ordered off the land. Shortly thereafter, Charlie died.

Mack filed a suit in a Georgia state court against the rest of the family, asserting, in part, that he and Charlie had been partners and that he was entitled to Charlie's share of the business. Was the relationship between Charlie and Mack a partnership? Is Mack entitled to Charlie's "share"? Explain. [Waugh v. Waugh, 265 Ga.App. 799, 595 S.E.2d 647 (2004)]

37–6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Indications of Partnership.

In August 2003, Tammy Duncan began working as a waitress at Bynum's Diner, which was owned by her mother, Hazel Bynum, and her stepfather, Eddie Bynum, in Valdosta, Georgia. Less than a month later, the three signed an agreement under which Eddie was to relinquish his management responsibilities, allowing Tammy to be co-manager. At the end of this six-month period, Eddie would revisit this agreement and could then extend it for another six-month period. The diner's bank account was to remain in Eddie's name. There was no provision with regard to the diner's profit, if any, and the parties did not change the business's tax information. Tammy began doing the bookkeeping, as well as waiting tables and performing other duties. On October 30, she slipped off a ladder and injured her knees. At the end of the six-month term, Tammy quit working at the diner. The Georgia State Board of Workers' Compensation determined that she had been the diner's employee and awarded her benefits under the diner's workers' compensation policy with Cypress Insurance Co. Cypress filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Tammy, arguing that she was not an employee, but a co-owner. What are the essential elements of a partnership? Was Tammy a partner in the business of the diner? Explain. [Cypress Insurance Co. v. Duncan, 281 Ga.App. 469, 636 S.E.2d 159 (2006)]

37–7. Partnership Dissolution Nine minority partners each owned one-half of 1 percent of J&J Celcom, a partnership with AT&T, which owned the rest. AT&T, using its majority power, voted to buy out the minority partners. It offered each partner a price that was slightly higher than the price provided by a third party's appraisal. Some of the partners accepted the offer, but others did not. AT&T then voted to dissolve the partnership, forcing the remaining minority partners to accept the appraisal price. Those partners sued. The trial court held for AT&T, and the minority partners appealed. The appeals court held that the price offered was the fair market price, but certified the following question to Washington State's highest court: "Does a controlling partner violate the duty of loyalty to the partnership or to dissenting minority partners where the controlling partner causes the partnership to sell all its assets" to another party? How should the Washington Supreme Court answer this question? Why? [J&J Celcom v. AT&T Wireless Services, Inc., 162 Wash.2d 102, 169 P.3d 823 (Sup.Ct. 2007)]

37-8. Limited Partnership James Carpenter contracted with Austin Estates, LP, to buy property in Texas. Carpenter asked Sandra McBeth to invest in the deal. He admitted that a dispute had arisen with the city of Austin over water for the property, but he assured her that it would not be a significant obstacle. McBeth agreed to invest $800,000 to hold open the option to buy the property. She became a limited partner in StoneLake Ranch, LP. Carpenter acted as the firm's general partner. Despite his assurances to McBeth, the purchase was delayed due to the water dispute. Unable to complete the purchase in a timely manner, Carpenter paid the $800,000 to Austin Estates without notifying McBeth. Later, Carpenter and others—excluding McBeth—bought the property and sold it at a profit. McBeth filed a suit in a Texas state court against Carpenter. What is the nature of the fiduciary duty that a general partner owes a limited partner? Did Carpenter breach that duty in this case? Explain. [McBeth v. Carpenter, 565 F.3d 171 (5th Cir. 2009)]

37-9. Partnership Dissolution George Chaney and William Dickerson were partners in Bowen's Mill Landing, which purchased a large piece of land in the 1980s. The partners had planned to develop the property, but nothing was ever done. Chaney died in 1990, and his wife inherited his interest. When she died in 2004, her two sons, John and Dewey Lynch, inherited the half-interest in the partnership. Dickerson died in 1995, and his daughter, Billie Thompson, inherited his half-interest. In 2006, the Lynches filed a petition for partition, asking that a commission be appointed to make a fair division of the land, giving the Lynches half and Thompson half. In 2007, the commission reported on how to divide the land into two parts. Thompson objected that the land belonged to Bowen's Mill Landing and could not be divided. The trial court ordered Thompson to "effectuate the dissolution of any partnership entity and . . . to wind up the business and affairs of any partnership" so that the land could be divided. Thompson appealed. Can the court order the partnership to dissolve? Why or why not? [Thompson v. Lynch, 990 A.2d 432 (Sup.Ct.Del. 2010)]

37-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Wrongful Dissociation.

Elliot Willensky and Beverly Moran formed a partnership to renovate and "flip" (resell) some property. According to their agreement, Moran would finance the purchase and renovation of the property, and Willensky would provide labor and oversight of the renovation work. Moran would be reimbursed from the profits of the sale, and the remainder of the profits would be divided evenly. Any losses would also be divided evenly. Moran paid $240,000 for a house and planned to spend $60,000 for its renovation. The parties agreed that the renovation would be completed in six months. Willensky lived in the house during the renovation. More than a year later, the project still was not completed, and the cost was much more than the $60,000 originally planned. Willensky often failed to communicate with Moran, and when she learned that her funds were nearly exhausted and the house nowhere near completion, she became worried. She told Willensky that he would have to pay rent and utility bills if he wished to continue to live in the house. Shortly thereafter, Willensky left for Florida due to a family emergency, saying that he would return as soon as he could. He never returned, however, and Moran lost touch with him. Moran took over the project and discovered that Willensky had left numerous bills unpaid, spent money on excessive or unnecessary items, and misappropriated funds for his personal use. After completing the project, paying all expenses relating to the renovation (in all, the renovation costs came to $311,222), and selling the property, Moran brought an action in a Tennessee state court to dissolve the partnership and to recover damages from Willensky for breach of contract and wrongful dissociation from the partnership. [Moran v. Willensky, ___ S.W.3d ___ (Tenn.Ct.App. 2010)]

- Moran alleged that Willensky had wrongfully dissociated from the partnership. When did this dissociation occur? Why was his dissociation wrongful?
- Which of Willensky's actions simply represent unethical behavior or bad management, and which constitute a breach of the agreement?

Limited Partnerships and Limited Liability Partnerships

CHAPTER 38

Limited Liability Companies and Special Business Forms

In the preceding chapters, we examined sole proprietorships, partnerships, and several forms of limited partnerships. Here, we examine a relatively new form of business organization called the limited liability company (LLC). LLCs are becoming an organizational form of choice among businesspersons—a trend encouraged by state statutes permitting their use.

In this chapter, we begin by examining the origins and evolution of the LLC. We then look at important characteristics of the LLC, including formation, jurisdictional requirements, and the advantages and disadvantages of choosing to do business as an LLC. Next, we examine the operation and management options in an LLC. The chapter concludes with a discussion of various other special business forms, including joint ventures, syndicates, joint stock companies, business trusts, and cooperatives.

SECTION 1

THE LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANY

A limited liability company (LLC) is a hybrid form that combines the limited liability aspects of the corporation and the tax advantages of a partnership. These business forms are governed by state LLC statutes. These laws vary, of course, from state to state. In an attempt to create more uniformity among the states in this respect, in 1995 the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws issued the Uniform Limited Liability Company Act (ULLCA), but less than one-fifth of the states adopted it. Some provisions are common to most state statutes, however, and we base our discussion of LLCs in this section on these common elements.

In 1977, Wyoming became the first state to pass legislation authorizing the creation of an LLC. Although LLCs emerged in the United States in the latter half of the 1900s, they have been used for more than a century in other foreign jurisdictions, including several European and South American nations. For example, the South American limitada is a form of business organization that operates more or less as a partnership but provides limited liability for the owners. Japan has the godo kaisha, a limited liability type of business organization that is similar to an LLC.

Taxation of the LLC

In the United States, after Wyoming's adoption of an LLC statute, it still was unclear how the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) would treat the LLC for tax purposes. In 1988, however, the IRS ruled that Wyoming LLCs would be taxed as partnerships instead of corporations, providing that certain requirements were met. Before this ruling, only one additional state—Florida, in 1982—had authorized LLCs. The 1988 ruling encouraged other states to enact LLC statutes, and in less than a decade, all states had done so.

In 1997, IRS rules also encouraged more widespread use of LLCs in the business world. Under these rules, any unincorporated business with more than one owner is automatically taxed as a partnership unless it indicates otherwise on its tax form or fits into one of the exceptions. The exceptions involve publicly traded companies, companies formed under a state incorporation statute, and certain foreign-owned companies. If a business chooses to be taxed as a corporation, it can indicate this preference by checking a box on its tax form.

Part of the impetus behind creating LLCs in this country is that foreign investors are allowed to become LLC members. Thus, in an era increasingly characterized by global business efforts and investments, the LLC offers U.S. firms and potential investors from other countries flexibility and the opportunity for limited liability and increased tax benefits.

The Nature of the LLC

LLCs share many characteristics with corporations. Like corporations, LLCs are creatures of state statute. In other words, they must be formed and operated in compliance with state law. Like the shareholders of a corporation, the owners of an LLC, who are called members, enjoy limited liability [ULLCA 303].¹ Thus, if the LLC is sued for wrongful discharge, for example, its individual members, managers, and agents cannot be held liable based solely on their status in the LLC.²

Similar to corporations, LLCs are legal entities apart from their owners. As a legal person, the LLC can sue or be sued, enter into contracts, and hold title to property [ULLCA 201]. The terminology used to describe LLCs formed in other states or nations is also similar to that used in corporate law. For example, an LLC formed in one state but doing business in another state is referred to in the second state as a foreign LLC.

1. Members of an LLC can also bring derivative actions, which you will read about in Chapter 40, on behalf of the LLC [ULLCA 101]. As with a corporate shareholder's derivative suit, any damages recovered go to the LLC, not to the members personally.
2. See, for example, McFarland v. Virginia Retirement Services of Chesterfield, LLC, 477 F.Supp.2d 727 (2007).

The Formation of the LLC

As mentioned, LLCs are creatures of statute and thus must follow state statutory requirements. To form an LLC, articles of organization must be filed with a central state agency—usually the secretary of state's office [ULLCA 202].³ Typically, the articles are required to include such information as the name of the business, its principal address, the name and address of a registered agent, the names of the owners, and information on how the LLC will be managed [ULLCA 203]. The business's name must include the words Limited Liability Company or the initials LLC [ULLCA 105(a)]. Although a majority of the states permit one-member LLCs, some states require at least two members.

Businesspersons sometimes enter into contracts on behalf of a business organization that is not yet formed. As you will read in Chapter 39, persons who are forming a corporation may enter into contracts during the process of incorporation but before the corporation becomes a legal entity. These contracts are referred to as preincorporation contracts. Once the corporation is formed and adopts the preincorporation contracts (by means of a novation, discussed in Chapter 17), it can enforce the contract terms.

In the following case, the question was whether the same principle extends to LLCs. A person in the process of forming an LLC entered into a preorganization contract under which it would be obligated to purchase a hotel. Once the LLC legally existed, the owners of the hotel refused to sell the property to the LLC, claiming that the contract was unenforceable.

3. In addition to requiring articles of organization to be filed, a few states require that a notice of the intention to form an LLC be published in a local newspaper.

02 Development, LLC v. 607 South Park, LLC

Court of Appeal of California, Second District, 159 Cal.App.4th 609, 71 Cal.Rptr.3d 608 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In 2004, 607 South Park, LLC, entered into a written agreement to sell Park Plaza Hotel to 607 Park View Associates, Ltd., for $8.7 million. The general partner of 607 Park View Associates was Creative Environments of Hollywood, Inc. In 2005, Creative Environments assigned the rights to the hotel purchase to another company, 02 Development, LLC. At the time, 02 Development did not yet exist; it was legally created several months later. When 607 South Park subsequently refused to sell the hotel, 02 Development sued 607 South Park for breach of the hotel purchase agreement. 607 South Park moved for summary judgment, arguing that no enforceable contract

CASE 38.1 CONTINUED ♦ existed because at the time of the assignment, O2 Development did not yet legally exist. Furthermore, 607 South Park argued that O2 Development suffered no damages because it was “not ready, willing, and able to fund the purchase of the hotel.” The trial court granted the motion and entered judgment in favor of 607 South Park. O2 Development appealed.

ROTHSCHILD, J. [Judge]

* * * *

It is hornbook law [black letter, or well-established, law] that a corporation can enforce preincorporation contracts made in its behalf, as long as the corporation “has adopted the contract or otherwise succeeded to it.” * * * California law does not deviate from that well-established norm. 607 South Park does not argue that limited liability companies should be treated differently from corporations in this respect, and we are aware of no authority that would support such a position. 607 South Park’s first ground for its summary judgment motion—that there is no enforceable contract between 607 South Park and O2 Development because O2 Development did not exist when the assignment agreement was executed—therefore fails as a matter of law. [Emphasis added.]

607 South Park’s principal contention to the contrary is that a nonexistent business entity cannot be a party to a contract. The contention is true but irrelevant. When the assignment agreement was executed, O2 Development did not exist, so it was not then a party to the agreement. But once O2 Development came into existence, it could enforce any pre-organization contract made in its behalf, such as the assignment agreement, if it adopted or ratified it. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

In the trial court, 607 South Park contended that in order to prove causation, O2 Development would have to prove either that it had the $8.7 million necessary to fund the transaction or that it had legally binding commitments from third parties to provide the necessary funding.* * * 607 South Park disavows [this contention] on appeal.

Instead, 607 South Park now argues that its motion was based on the proposition that O2 Development “must present admissible evidence that it would have been financially able to close the transaction.” But 607 South Park’s evidence in support of its motion showed only that O2 Development had neither the $8.7 million to fund the transaction nor legally binding commitments from third parties to provide the funding. 607 South Park presented no evidence that O2 Development would have been unable to arrange for the necessary funding to close the transaction on time if 607 South Park had given it the opportunity instead of repudiating the contract in advance. Because 607 South Park introduced no evidence to support an argument based on the proposition of law that 607 South Park is now advocating, the burden of production never shifted to O2 Development to present contrary evidence. For all of these reasons, the trial court erred when it granted 607 South Park’s motion for summary judgment. [Emphasis added.]

DECISION AND REMEDY • The California intermediate appellate court reversed the judgment and directed the trial court to enter an order denying 607 South Park’s motion for summary judgment. According to the appellate court, limited liability companies should be treated the same as corporations with respect to preorganization contracts.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Why did the appellate court dismiss 607 South Park’s argument that O2 Development should be required to prove that it had funding commitments for $8.7 million?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • What might have been some of the reasons that 607 South Park refused to sell the property to O2 Development?

Jurisdictional Requirements

One of the significant differences between LLCs and corporations involves federal jurisdictional requirements. Under the federal jurisdiction statute, a corporation is deemed to be a citizen of the state where it is incorporated and maintains its principal place of business. The statute does not mention the state citizenship of partnerships, LLCs, and other unincorporated associations, but the courts have tended to regard these entities as citizens of every state in which their members are citizens.

The state citizenship of an LLC may come into play when a party sues the LLC based on diversity of citizenship. Remember from Chapter 2 that when parties to a lawsuit are from different states and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000, a federal court can exercise diversity jurisdiction. Total diversity of citizenship must exist, however.

Suppose that Jen Fong, a citizen of New York, wishes to bring a suit against Skycel, an LLC formed under the laws of Connecticut. One of Skycel's members also lives in New York. Fong will not be able to bring a suit against Skycel in federal court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction because the defendant LLC is also a citizen of New York. The same would be true if Fong was bringing a suit against multiple defendants and one of the defendants lived in New York.

Advantages of the LLC

The LLC offers many advantages to businesspersons, which is why this form of business organization has become increasingly popular.

LIMITED LIABILITY A key advantage of the LLC is that the liability of members is limited to the amount of their investments. Although the LLC as an entity can be held liable for any loss or injury caused by the wrongful acts or omissions of its members, the members themselves generally are not personally liable.

As you will read in Chapter 39, the courts on occasion make an exception to the limited liability of shareholders. In certain circumstances, a court will pierce the corporate veil and hold a shareholder personally liable for a corporate obligation.

Sometimes, the corporate veil is pierced when a corporation is deemed to be merely an “alter ego” of the shareholder-owner (see page 768). A court may apply the alter-ego theory when a shareholder commingles personal and corporate funds or fails to observe required corporate formalities.

Whether the alter-ego theory should be applied to an LLC was at issue in the following case.

ORX Resources, Inc. v. MBW Exploration, LLC

Court of Appeal of Louisiana, Fourth Circuit, 32 So.3d 931 (2010).

Charles R. JONES, Judge.

* * * *

On January 16, 2003, ORX [Resources, Inc.,] entered into the “Cloveley Purchase Agreement” with Coastline Oil & Gas, Inc. Pursuant to this Agreement, ORX purchased certain oil, gas and mineral leases/interests in a tract of land located in Lafourche Parish, known as the “Cloveley Prospect.” ORX partnered with other entities, including MBW [Exploration, LLC], to share in the expense and potential profits of the venture to explore and develop the Clovelly Prospect. The partnering parties entered into a Joint Operating Agreement (“JOA”) and the Clovelly Prospect Participation Agreement (“Participation Agreement”). Mr. [Mark] Washauer signed these documents in October of 2003 and December of 2004, respectively, on behalf of MBW, in his capacity as a “Managing Member.” However, MBW did not come into existence until July of 2005, when its articles of organization were filed with the Louisiana Secretary of State.

The JOA provided that ORX was to serve as the “Operator” drilling a well within the Clovelly Prospect. It further provided that the nonoperating working interest partners, like MBW, would pay their proportionate share of the costs in exchange for a corresponding working interest ownership share in the Clovelly Prospect. The drilled well was governed by the Participation Agreement, which provided that MBW had a working interest in the Clovelly Prospect whereby MBW would share in 2.5% of the costs incurred, and would gain a proportionate share of the returns, if any, produced by the well.

Later, ORX submitted an Authorization for Expenditure

(“AFE”) to MBW for approval, which Mr. Washauer signed in his own name. Additionally, he paid MBW’s participation fee with a check drawn from the account of another entity, MBW Properties, LLC.

In 2006, ORX, as the well Operator, began planning the Allain LeBreton Well No. 2 in the Clovelly Prospect, (“the Well”), which was the “initial well” called for in the Participation Agreement. * * * Mr. Washauer paid the full amount of MBW’s share of an ORX cash call invoice of $59,325 with a personal check.

The well proved to be unsuccessful, and was ultimately plugged. MBW’s unpaid share of expenses for said project amounted to $84,220.01, for which ORX demanded payment via correspondence, but to no avail. As a result, ORX filed suit for breach of contract against both MBW and Mr. Washauer (“the Appellants”).

* * * [The trial court—a state district court—determined that Washauer operated MBW as his alter ego and allowed ORX to pierce the veil of the LLC. The court granted summary judgment in favor of ORX, holding that Washauer and MBW were liable, jointly and severally, to ORX in the amount of $84,220.01.]

The Appellants timely filed [an] appeal from this judgment.

* * * *
We first address whether the district court erred in ruling that the alter ego theory of the corporate veil piercing applied to Louisiana limited liability companies.

* * * *
The provisions of La. R.S. [Louisiana Revised Statutes] 12:1320(D) provide for the piercing of an LLC’s veil when the situation so warrants.

* * * *
* * * Piercing the veil of an LLC is justified to prevent the use of the LLC form to defraud creditors. Under our * * * review, we find that the district court did not err in determining that the alter ego theory of corporate veil piercing applies to a Louisiana limited liability company, under the facts of this case, where it appears that Mr. Washauer used MBW as a shell and tried to avoid paying a legitimate debt of the LLC. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *
The Louisiana Supreme Court has identified five nonexclusive factors to be used in determining whether to apply the alter ego doctrine: [commingling of corporate and shareholder funds; failure to follow statutory formalities for incorporating and transacting corporate affairs;

undercapitalization; failure to provide separate bank accounts and bookkeeping records; and failure to hold regular shareholder and director meetings]. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *
In applying [these] factors, * * * we find that Mr. Washauer’s activities on behalf of MBW do merit the piercing of the veil of this LLC. Commingling of the LLC’s funds occurred with the funds of Mr. Washauer and a separate company of his. This commingling occurred because MBW was undercapitalized and did not have a separate bank account to transact its own affairs. Furthermore, at the time MBW began contracting with ORX, it was not yet recognized as an LLC by the Louisiana Secretary of State. Lastly, while LLCs are not bound by corporate laws to hold regular meetings, the fact that MBW has not had a meeting in over a year further evidences that Mr. Washauer was operating MBW at his leisure and direction. Thus, we find that the district court did not err in determining that MBW was being operated as the alter ego of Mr. Washauer under the [above-mentioned] factors, and therefore, he can be held personally liable jointly and solidarily [severally] with MBW.

For the foregoing reasons, * * * the judgment of the district court is affirmed * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. One of the advantages of the LLC is that its members enjoy limited personal liability for the company’s obligations. In view of this fact, does the possibility that a court may hold an LLC member personally liable for the LLC’s debts reduce the utility of the LLC form of business organization? Explain.
2. What does “jointly and solidarily” (jointly and severally) mean in terms of liability? Would ORX prefer that Washauer and MBW be held personally liable jointly and severally, rather than that Washauer alone be held personally liable? Explain.

FLEXIBILITY IN TAXATION Another advantage of the LLC is its flexibility in regard to taxation. An LLC that has two or more members can choose to be taxed as either a partnership or a corporation. As will be discussed in Chapter 39, a corporate entity must pay income taxes on its profits, and the shareholders pay personal income taxes on profits distributed as dividends. An LLC that wants to distribute profits to its members may prefer to be taxed as a partnership to avoid the “double taxation” that is characteristic of the corporate entity.

Unless an LLC indicates that it wishes to be taxed as a corporation, the IRS automatically taxes it as a partnership. This means that the LLC, as an entity, pays no taxes. Rather, as in a partnership, profits are “passed through” the LLC to the members, who then personally pay taxes on the profits. If an LLC’s members want to reinvest profits in the business rather than distribute the profits to members, however, they may prefer to be taxed as a corporation. Corporate income tax rates may be lower than personal tax rates. Part of the attractiveness of the LLC is this flexibility with respect to taxation.

An LLC that has only one member cannot be taxed as a partnership. For federal income tax purposes, one-member LLCs are automatically taxed as sole proprietorships unless they indicate that they wish to be taxed as corporations. With respect to state taxes, most states follow the IRS rules.

MANAGEMENT AND FOREIGN INVESTORS Another advantage of the LLC for businesspersons is the flexibility it offers in terms of business operations and management—as will be discussed shortly. Because foreign investors can participate in an LLC, the LLC form of business is attractive as a way to encourage investment.

Disadvantages of the LLC

The main disadvantage of the LLC is that state LLC statutes are not uniform. Therefore, businesses that operate in more than one state may not receive consistent treatment in these states. Generally, most states apply to a foreign LLC (an LLC formed in another state) the law of the state where the LLC was formed. Nonetheless, difficulties can arise when one state’s court must interpret and apply another state’s laws.

SECTION 2

OPERATION AND MANAGEMENT OF AN LLC

As mentioned, an advantage of the LLC form of business is the flexibility it offers in terms of operation and management. Here, we discuss the operating agreement, management options, and general operating procedures of LLCs.

The LLC Operating Agreement

The members of an LLC can decide how to operate the various aspects of the business by forming an operating agreement [ULLCA 103(a)]. Operating agreements typically contain provisions relating to management, how profits will be divided, the transfer of membership interests, whether the LLC will be dissolved on the death or departure of a member, and other important issues.

A WRITING IS PREFERRED In many states, an operating agreement is not required for an LLC to exist, and if there is one, it need not be in writing. Generally, though, LLC members should protect their interests by creating a written operating agreement. As with any business, disputes may arise over any number of issues. If there is no agreement covering the topic under dispute, such as how profits will be divided, the state LLC statute will govern the outcome. For example, most LLC statutes provide that if the members have not specified how profits will be divided, they will be divided equally among the members.

PARTNERSHIP LAW MAY APPLY When an issue, such as the authority of individual members, is not covered by an operating agreement or by an LLC statute, the courts often apply principles of partnership law. These principles can give the members broad authority to bind the LLC unless the operating agreement provides otherwise.

CASE IN POINT Clifford Kuhn, Jr., and Joseph Tumminelli formed Touch of Class Limousine Service as an LLC. They did not create a written operating agreement but orally agreed that Kuhn would provide the financial backing and that Tumminelli would manage the day-to-day operations. Tumminelli embezzled $283,000 from the company after cashing customers’ checks at Quick Cash, Inc., a local check-cashing service. Kuhn sued Tumminelli and Quick Cash to recover the embezzled funds. He argued that Quick Cash was liable because Tumminelli did not have the authority to cash the company’s checks. The court, however, held that in the absence of a written operating agreement to the contrary, a member of an LLC, like a partner in a partnership, has the authority to cash a firm’s checks.⁴

Management of an LLC

Basically, LLC members have two options for managing the firm. It can be either a “member-managed” LLC or a “manager-managed” LLC. Most state LLC statutes and the ULLCA provide that unless the articles of organization specify otherwise, an LLC is assumed to be member managed [ULLCA 203(a)(6)].

In a member-managed LLC, all of the members participate in management, and decisions are made by majority vote [ULLCA 404(a)]. In a manager-managed

4. Kuhn v. Tumminelli, 366 N.J.Super. 431, 841 A.2d 496 (2004).

LLC, the members designate a group of persons to manage the firm. The management group may consist of only members, both members and nonmembers, or only nonmembers.

Under the ULLCA, managers in a manager-managed LLC owe fiduciary duties (the duty of loyalty and the duty of care) to the LLC and its members—just as corporate directors and officers owe fiduciary duties to the corporation and its shareholders [ULLCA 409(a), 409(h)]. But because not all states have adopted the ULLCA, some state statutes provide that managers owe fiduciary duties only to the LLC and not to the LLC's members. Although to whom the duty is owed may seem insignificant at first glance, it can have a dramatic effect on the outcome of litigation. See this chapter's Insight into Ethics feature below for further discussion of this issue.

Operating Procedures

An LLC's operating agreement can also include provisions governing decision-making procedures. For instance, the agreement can set forth procedures for choosing or removing managers. Although most LLC statutes are silent on this issue, the ULLCA provides that members may choose and remove managers by majority vote [ULLCA 404(b)(3)].

The members are also free to include in the agreement provisions designating when and for what purposes they will hold formal members' meetings. Most state LLC statutes have no provisions regarding members' meetings, which is in contrast to most state laws governing corporations, as you will read in Chapter 39.

Members may also specify in their agreement how voting rights will be apportioned. If they do not, LLC statutes in most states provide that voting rights are apportioned according to each member's capital contributions.⁵ Some states provide that, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, each member has one vote.

DISSOCIATION AND DISSOLUTION OF AN LLC

Recall from Chapter 37 that in the context of partnerships, dissociation occurs when a partner ceases to be associated in the carrying on of the partnership business. The same concept applies to LLCs. A member

5. In contrast, partners in a partnership generally have equal rights in management and equal voting rights unless they specify otherwise in their partnership agreement (see Chapter 37).

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS Fiduciary Duties of LLC Managers

Fiduciary duties, such as the duty of loyalty and the duty of care, have an ethical component because they require a person to act honestly and faithfully toward another. In states that have adopted the ULLCA, the managers of a manager-managed LLC owe fiduciary duties to the members and thus basically are required to behave ethically toward them. In other states, however, the LLC statutes may not include such a requirement. Consequently, even when a manager has acted unfairly and unethically toward members, the members may not be able to sue the manager for a breach of fiduciary duties.

In North Carolina and Virginia, for example, the LLC statutes do not explicitly create fiduciary duties for managers to members. Instead, the statutes require that a manager exercise good business judgment in the best interests of the company. Because the statutes are silent on the manager's duty to members, in 2009 courts in those two states held that a manager-member owed fiduciary duties only to the LLC and not to the other members.^a In contrast, in two other cases decided in 2009, courts in Idaho and Kentucky held that a manager-member owed fiduciary duties to the LLC's other members and that the members could sue the manager for breaching fiduciary duties.^b

INSIGHT INTO THE ETHICAL ENVIRONMENT

Why wouldn't a manager always owe a fiduciary duty to the members of an LLC?

of an LLC has the power to dissociate from the LLC at any time, but he or she may not have the right to dissociate. Under the ULLCA, the events that trigger a member's dissociation from an LLC are similar to the events causing a partner to be dissociated under the Uniform Partnership Act (UPA). These include voluntary withdrawal, expulsion by other members or by court order, bankruptcy, incompetence, and death. Generally, even if a member dies or otherwise dissociates from an LLC, the other members may continue to carry on the LLC business, unless the operating agreement provides otherwise.

Effect of Dissociation

When a member dissociates from an LLC, he or she loses the right to participate in management and the right to act as an agent for the LLC. The member's duty of loyalty to the LLC also terminates, and the duty of care continues only with respect to events that occurred before dissociation. Generally, the dissociated member also has a right to have his or her interest in the LLC bought out by the other members. The LLC's operating agreement may contain provisions establishing a buyout price, but if it does not, the member's interest is usually purchased at a fair value. In states that have adopted the ULLCA, the LLC must purchase the interest at fair value within 120 days after the dissociation.

If the member's dissociation violates the LLC's operating agreement, it is considered legally wrongful, and the dissociated member can be held liable for damages caused by the dissociation. Suppose that Chadwick and Barrow are members in an LLC. Chadwick manages the accounts, and Barrow, who has many connections in the community and is a skilled investor, brings in the business. If Barrow wrongfully dissociates from the LLC, the LLC's business will suffer, and Chadwick can hold Barrow liable for the loss of business resulting from her withdrawal.

Dissolution

Regardless of whether a member's dissociation was wrongful or rightful, normally the dissociated member has no right to force the LLC to dissolve. The remaining members can opt either to continue or to dissolve the business. Members can also stipulate in their operating agreement that certain events will cause dissolution, or they can agree that they have the power to dissolve the LLC by vote. As with partnerships, a court can order an LLC to be dissolved in certain circumstances, such as when the members have engaged in illegal or oppressive conduct, or when it is no longer feasible to carry on the business.

When an LLC is dissolved, any members who did not wrongfully dissociate may participate in the winding up process. To wind up the business, members must collect, liquidate, and distribute the LLC's assets. Members may preserve the assets for a reasonable time to optimize their return, and they continue to have the authority to perform reasonable acts in conjunction with winding up. In other words, the LLC will be bound by the reasonable acts of its members during the winding up process. Once all of the LLC's assets have been sold, the proceeds are distributed to pay off debts to creditors first (including debts owed to members who are creditors of the LLC). The members' capital contributions are returned next, and any remaining amounts are then distributed to members in equal shares or according to their operating agreement.

SPECIAL BUSINESS FORMS

In addition to the LLC and the other traditional business forms discussed in this unit, several other forms can be used to organize a business. For the most part, these special business forms are hybrid organizations—that is, they have characteristics similar to those of partnerships or corporations, or combine features of both. These forms include joint ventures, syndicates, joint stock companies, business trusts, and cooperatives.

Joint Venture

A joint venture is a relationship in which two or more persons or business entities combine their efforts or their property for a single transaction or project or a related series of transactions or projects. Unless otherwise agreed, joint venturers share profits and losses equally and have an equal voice in controlling the project. For instance, when several contractors combine their resources to build and sell houses in a single development, their relationship is a joint venture.

Joint ventures range in size from very small activities to multimillion-dollar joint actions carried out by some of the world's largest corporations. Large organizations often undertake new products or services by forming joint ventures with other enterprises. For example, Intel Corporation and Micron Technology, Inc., formed a joint venture to manufacture NAND flash memory, a data-storage chip widely used in digital cameras, cell phones, and portable music players, including some iPods made by Apple, Inc. Similarly, Mitsubishi Chemical Corporation formed a joint venture with Exxon Chemical Corporation to start Mytex Polymers, a company that produces certain plastic compounds used by automakers in the United States and Japan.

SIMILARITIES TO PARTNERSHIPS The joint venture resembles a partnership and is taxed like a partnership. For this reason, most courts apply the same principles to joint ventures as they apply to partnerships. Joint venturers owe each other the same fiduciary duties, including the duty of loyalty, that partners owe each other. Thus, if one of the venturers secretly buys land that was to be acquired by the joint venture, the other joint venturers may be awarded damages for the breach of loyalty. A joint venturer can also be held personally liable for the venture's debts (because joint venturers share profits and losses).

Like partners, joint venturers have equal rights to manage the activities of the enterprise, but they can agree to give control of the operation to one of the members.⁶ Joint venturers also have authority as agents to enter into contracts for the business that will bind the joint venture.

The question in the following case was whether two vintage aircraft makers had formed a joint venture.

6. See, for example, PGI, Inc. v. Rathe Productions, Inc., 265 Va. 438, 576 S.E.2d 438 (2003).

SPW Associates, LLP v. Anderson

Supreme Court of North Dakota, 2006 ND 159, 718 N.W.2d 580 (2006).
www.ndcourts.com/search/opinions.aspx

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In 1996, Murdo Cameron and Douglas Anderson entered into a written agreement to build two vintage airplanes. Cameron was to provide an engine for the first airplane and various other component parts for both airplanes, and Anderson was to design and manufacture additional parts and build the airplanes. On the first flight of one of the planes, Anderson was to pay Cameron for the engine, with the price dependent upon the amount of time it took Anderson to build the airplane. Although not expressly stated in the written agreement, Cameron and Anderson had agreed that each would keep one of the two completed airplanes. The parties intended to build additional planes for sale to the public. In 1997, Anderson entered into a loan agreement with SPW Associates, LLP, to finance the operation. The first airplane was pledged as security for the loan. Anderson did not disclose to SPW his agreement with Cameron and did not disclose to Cameron the loan transaction with SPW. The second airplane was never built. In 2002, after Anderson defaulted on the loan, SPW brought an action against Anderson, Cameron, and others in a North Dakota state court, seeking a declaratory judgment that it was entitled to possession of the aircraft. The court found that Anderson and Cameron had entered into a joint venture and that Anderson was authorized to grant SPW a security interest in the airplane, which was joint-venture property. The court found that SPW had a perfected security interest in the airplane superior to any rights of Cameron and was entitled to possession of the plane. Cameron appealed, claiming that there was no joint venture.

CASE 38.3 CONTINUED ♦ * * * Applying these principles in this case, if Anderson was a joint venturer with Cameron, he had the authority to grant a security interest in joint venture property and the security agreement would be valid.

For a business enterprise to constitute a joint venture, the following four elements must be present:

- (1) contribution by the parties of money, property, time, or skill in some common undertaking * * * ; (2) a proprietary interest and right of mutual control over the engaged property; (3) an express or implied agreement for the sharing of profits * * * ; and (4) an express or implied contract showing a joint venture was formed.

* * * *

In this case there is no dispute on three of the four elements. Both parties made contributions to the enterprise, both exerted a degree of control over the enterprise, and there was a written contract evidencing the agreement. Cameron contends, however, that there was no evidence showing an agreement, either express or implied, to share profits.

In this case the parties admittedly contemplated building additional airplanes for sale to the public * * * . The parties' written agreement also expressly recognized that additional planes would be built for sale. For example, the agreement provided that Cameron would provide computerized documentation and lab test results on composite parts he manufactured to Anderson "and future aircraft purchasers," and Anderson was to "develop an inspection and documentation process on the first two airplanes, and all future airplanes purchased." The agreement further provided that construction of "all appliances" to be used in the manufacturing process "will be such that they can be used for multiple year production runs."

* * * *

We conclude the * * * court did not err in determining that Cameron and Anderson had entered into a joint venture.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Supreme Court of North Dakota affirmed the lower court's decision. Cameron and Anderson had entered into a joint venture, and SPW was entitled to possession of the plane.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • On what basis might Cameron maintain a suit against Anderson?

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • How might the outcome of this case have been different if Cameron had been merely an aircraft parts supplier, with his only profit to be from the sale of components to Anderson?

DIFFERENCES FROM PARTNERSHIPS Joint ventures differ from partnerships in several important ways. The members of a joint venture have less implied and apparent authority than the partners in a partnership. In part, this is because a joint venture is typically created for a single project or series of transactions, whereas a partnership usually (though not always) involves an ongoing business. As discussed in Chapter 37, each partner is treated as an agent of the other partners. Because the activities of a joint venture are more limited than the business of a partnership, the members of a joint venture are presumed to have less power to bind their co-venturers. In Case 38.3 above, for instance, if Anderson's loan agreement with SPW had not been directly related to the business of building vintage planes, the court might have concluded that Anderson lacked the authority to bind the joint venture. Also, unlike most partnerships, a joint venture normally terminates when the project or transaction for which it was formed is completed, unless the members have otherwise agreed.

Syndicate

In a syndicate, or investment group, several individuals or firms join together to finance a particular project, such as the construction of a shopping center or the purchase of a professional basketball franchise. The form of such entities varies considerably. A syndicate may be organized as a corporation or as a general or limited partnership. In some instances, the members do not have a legally recognized business arrangement but merely purchase and own property jointly.

Joint Stock Company

A joint stock company is a true hybrid of a partnership and a corporation. It has many characteristics of a corporation in that (1) its ownership is represented by transferable shares of stock, (2) it is normally managed by directors and officers of the company or association, and (3) it can have a perpetual existence. Most of its other features, however, are more characteristic of a partnership, and it generally is treated as a partnership. As with a partnership, a joint stock company is formed by agreement (not statute). Property usually is held in the names of the members, and the owners (shareholders) have personal liability. In a joint stock company, however, shareholders are not considered to be agents of each other, as they would be in a true partnership.

Business Trust

A business trust is created by a written trust agreement that sets forth the interests of the beneficiaries and the obligations and powers of the trustees. Legal ownership and management of the trust's property stay with one or more of the trustees, and the profits are distributed to the beneficiaries.

The business trust form of organization was started in Massachusetts in an attempt to obtain the limited liability advantage of corporate status while avoiding certain restrictions on a corporation's ownership and development of real property. A business trust resembles a corporation in many respects. Beneficiaries of the trust, for example, are not personally responsible for the trust's debts or obligations. In fact, in a number of states, business trusts must pay corporate taxes.

Cooperative

A cooperative is an association that is organized to provide an economic service to its members (or shareholders). It may or may not be incorporated. Most cooperatives are organized under state statutes for cooperatives, general business corporations, or LLCs. Generally, an incorporated cooperative will distribute dividends, or profits, to its owners on the basis of their transactions with the cooperative rather than on the basis of the amount of capital they contributed. Members of incorporated cooperatives have limited liability, as do shareholders of corporations and members of LLCs. Cooperatives that are unincorporated are often treated like partnerships. The members have joint liability for the cooperative's acts.

The cooperative form of business is generally adopted by groups of individuals who wish to pool their resources to gain some advantage in the marketplace. Consumer purchasing co-ops are formed to obtain lower prices through quantity discounts. Seller marketing co-ops are formed to control the market and thereby enable members to sell their goods at higher prices. Co-ops range in size from small, local consumer cooperatives to national businesses such as Ace Hardware and Land O'Lakes, a well-known producer of dairy products.

Special Business Forms

Concept	Description
Joint Venture	An organization created by two or more persons in contemplation of a limited activity or a single transaction; similar to a partnership in many respects.
Syndicate	An investment group that undertakes to finance a particular project; may be organized as a corporation or as a general or limited partnership.
Joint Stock Company	A business form similar to a corporation in some respects (transferable shares of stock, management by directors and officers, perpetual existence) but otherwise resembling a partnership.
Business Trust	A business form created by a written trust agreement that sets forth the interests of the beneficiaries and the obligations and powers of the trustee(s). A business trust is similar to a corporation in many respects. Beneficiaries are not personally liable for the debts or obligations of the business trust.
Cooperative	An association organized to provide an economic service, without profit, to its members. A cooperative can take the form of a corporation or a partnership.

REVIEWING

Limited Liability Companies and Special Business Forms

The city of Papagos, Arizona, had a deteriorating bridge in need of repair on a prominent public roadway. The city posted notices seeking proposals for an artistic bridge design and reconstruction. Davidson Masonry, LLC, which was owned and managed by Carl Davidson and his wife, Marilyn Rowe, decided to submit a bid to create a decorative concrete structure that incorporated artistic metalwork. They contacted Shana Lafayette, a local sculptor who specialized in large-scale metal creations, to help them design the bridge. The city selected their bridge design and awarded them the contract for a commission of $184,000. Davidson Masonry and Lafayette then entered into an agreement to work together on the bridge project. Davidson Masonry agreed to install and pay for concrete and structural work, and Lafayette agreed to install the metalwork at her expense. They agreed that overall profits would be split, with 25 percent going to Lafayette and 75 percent going to Davidson Masonry. Lafayette designed numerous metal sculptures of salmon that were incorporated into colorful decorative concrete forms designed by Rowe, while Davidson performed the structural engineering. The group worked together successfully until the completion of the project. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would Davidson Masonry automatically be taxed as a partnership or a corporation?
2. Is Davidson Masonry member managed or manager managed?
3. When Davidson Masonry and Lafayette entered an agreement to work together, what kind of special business form was created? Explain.
4. Suppose that during construction, Lafayette had entered into an agreement to rent space in a warehouse that was close to the bridge so that she could work on her sculptures near the site where they would eventually be installed. She entered into the contract without the knowledge or consent of Davidson Masonry. In this situation, would a court be likely to hold that Davidson Masonry was bound by the contract that Lafayette entered? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

38-1. Limited Liability Companies John, Lesa, and Tabir form a limited liability company. John contributes 60 percent of the capital, and Lesa and Tabir each contribute 20 percent. Nothing is decided about how profits will be divided. John assumes that he will be entitled to 60 percent of the profits, in accordance with his contribution. Lesa and Tabir, however, assume that the profits will be divided equally. A dispute over the profits arises, and ultimately a court has to decide the issue. What law will the court apply? In most states, what will result? How could this dispute have been avoided in the first place? Discuss fully.

38-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Special Business Forms.

Bateson Corp. is considering entering into two contracts—one with a joint stock company that distributes home products east of the Mississippi River and the other with a business trust formed by a number of sole proprietors who are sellers of home products on the West Coast. Both contracts will require Bateson to make large capital outlays in order to supply the businesses with restaurant equipment. In both business organizations, at least two shareholders or beneficiaries are personally wealthy, but both organizations have limited financial resources. The owner-managers of Bateson are not familiar with either form of business organization. Because each form resembles a corporation, they are concerned about potential limits on liability in the event that either business organization breaches the contract by failing to pay for the equipment. Discuss fully Bateson's concern.

38-3. Diversity Jurisdiction and Limited Liability Companies Joe, a resident of New Jersey, wants to open a restaurant. He asks Kay, his friend, an experienced attorney and a New Yorker, for her business and legal advice in exchange for a 20 percent ownership interest in the restaurant. Kay helps Joe negotiate a lease for the restaurant premises and advises Joe to organize the business as a limited liability company (LLC). Joe forms Café Olé, LLC, and with Kay's help, obtains financing. Then, the night before the restaurant opens, Joe tells Kay that he is "cutting her out of the deal." The restaurant proves to be a success. Kay wants to file a suit in a federal district court against Joe and the LLC. Can a federal court exercise jurisdiction over the parties based on diversity of citizenship? Explain.

38-4. Fiduciary Duties Westbury Properties, Inc., and others (collectively, the Westbury group) owned, managed, and developed real property. Jerry Stoker and the Stoker Group, Inc. (the Stokers), also developed real property. The Westbury group entered into agreements with the Stokers concerning a large tract of property in Houston County, Georgia. The parties formed limited liability companies (LLCs), including Bellemeade, LLC (the LLC group), to develop various parcels of the tract for residential purposes. The operating agreements provided that "no Member shall be accountable to the [LLC] or to any other Member with respect to [any other] business or activity even if the business or activity competes with the [LLC's] business." The Westbury group entered into agreements with other parties to develop additional parcels within the tract in competition with the LLC group. The Stokers filed a suit in a Georgia state court against the Westbury group, alleging, among other things, breach of fiduciary duty. What duties do the members of an LLC owe to each other? Under what principle might the terms of an operating agreement alter these duties? In whose favor should the court rule? Discuss. [Stoker v. Bellemeade, LLC, 272 Ga.App. 817, 615 S.E.2d 1 (2005)]

38-5. Limited Liability Companies A "Certificate of Formation" (CF) for Grupo Dos Chiles, LLC, was filed with the Delaware secretary of state in February 2000. The CF named Jamie Rivera as the "initial member." The next month, Jamie's mother, Yolanda Martinez, and Alfred Shriver, who had a personal relationship with Martinez at the time, signed an "LLC Agreement" for Grupo, naming themselves "managing partners." Grupo's business was the operation of Dancing Peppers Cantina, a restaurant in Alexandria, Virginia. Identifying themselves as Grupo's owners, Shriver and Martinez borrowed funds from Advanceme, Inc., a restaurant lender. In June 2003, Grupo lost its LLC status in Delaware for failing to pay state taxes, and by the end of July, Martinez and Shriver had ended their relationship. Shriver filed a suit in a Virginia state court against Martinez to wind up Grupo's affairs. Meanwhile, without consulting Shriver, Martinez paid Grupo's back taxes. Shriver filed a suit in a Delaware state court against Martinez, asking the court to dissolve the firm. What effect did the LLC agreement have on the CF? Did Martinez's unilateral act reestablish Grupo's LLC status? Should the Delaware court grant Shriver's request? Why or why not? [In re Grupo Dos Chiles, LLC, __ A.2d __ (Del.Ch. 2006)]

38-6. Limited Liability Companies A limited liability company (LLC) sold a Manhattan apartment building that it owned. The owners of 25 percent of the membership interests in the LLC filed a lawsuit on behalf of the LLC—called a derivative suit—claiming that those in majority control of the LLC had sold the building for less than its market value and had personally profited from the deal. The trial court dismissed the suit, holding that the plaintiffs individually could not bring a derivative suit "to redress wrongs suffered by the corporation" because such actions were permitted only for corporations and could not be brought for an LLC. An intermediate appellate court reversed, holding that derivative suits on behalf of LLCs are permitted. That decision was appealed. A key problem for the court was that the state law governing LLCs did not address the issue. How should such matters logically be resolved? Are the minority owners in an LLC at the mercy of the decisions of the majority owners? [Tzolis v. Wolff, 10 N.Y.3d 100, 884 N.E.2d 1005 (2008)]

38-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Joint Venture.

Holiday Isle Resort & Marina, Inc., operated four restaurants, five bars, and various food kiosks at its resort in Islamorada, Florida. Holiday entered into a "joint-venture agreement" with Rip Tosun to operate a fifth restaurant called "Rip's—A Place for Ribs." The agreement gave Tosun authority over the employees and "full authority as to the conduct of the business." It also prohibited Tosun from competing with Rip's without Holiday's approval but did not prevent Holiday from competing. Later, Tosun sold half of his interest in Rip's to Thomas Hallock. Soon, Tosun and Holiday opened the Olde Florida Steakhouse next to Rip's. Holiday stopped serving breakfast at Rip's and diverted employees and equipment from Rip's to the Steakhouse, which then started offering breakfast. Hallock filed a suit in a Florida state court against Holiday. Did Holiday breach the joint-venture agreement? Did it breach the duties that joint venturers owe each other? Explain. [Hallock

38–8. LLC Dissolution Walter Van Houten and John King formed 1545 Ocean Avenue, LLC, with each managing 50 percent of the business. Its purpose was to renovate an existing building and construct a new commercial building. Van Houten and King quarreled over many aspects of the work on the properties. King claimed that Van Houten paid the contractors too much for the work performed. As the projects neared completion, King demanded that the LLC be dissolved and that Van Houten agree to a buyout. Because the parties could not agree on a buyout, King sued for dissolution. The trial court enjoined (prevented) further work on the projects until the dispute was settled. As the ground for dissolution, King cited the fights over management decisions. There was no claim of fraud or frustration of purpose. The trial court ordered that the LLC be dissolved, and Van Houten appealed. Should either of the owners be forced to dissolve the LLC before the completion of its purpose—that is, before the building projects are finished? Explain. [In re 1545 Ocean Avenue, LLC, 893 N.Y.S.2d 590 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2010)]

38–9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Limited Liability Companies.

Blushing Brides, LLC, a publisher of wedding planning magazines in Columbus, Ohio, opened an account with Gray Printing Co. in July 2000.

On behalf of Blushing Brides, Louis Zacks, the firm’s member-manager, signed a credit agreement that identified the firm as the “purchaser” and required payment within thirty days. Despite the agreement, Blushing Brides typically took up to six months to pay the full amount for its orders. Gray printed and shipped 10,000 copies of a fall/winter 2001 issue for Blushing Brides but had not been paid when the firm ordered 15,000 copies of a spring/summer 2002 issue. Gray refused to print the new order without an assurance of payment. On May 22, Zacks signed a promissory note payable to Gray within thirty days for $14,778, plus interest at 6 percent per year. Gray printed the new order but by October had been paid only $7,500. Gray filed a suit in an Ohio state court against Blushing Brides and Zacks to collect the balance. [Gray Printing Co. v. Blushing Brides, LLC, __ N.E.2d __ (Ohio App. 10 Dist. 2006)]

- Under what circumstances is a member of an LLC liable for the firm’s debts? In this case, is Zacks personally liable under the credit agreement for the unpaid amount on Blushing Brides’ account? Did Zacks’s promissory note affect the parties’ liability on the account? Explain.
- Should a member of an LLC assume an ethical responsibility to meet the obligations of the firm? Discuss.
- Gray shipped only 10,000 copies of the spring/summer 2002 issue of Blushing Brides’ magazine, waiting for the publisher to identify a destination for the other 5,000 copies. The magazine had a retail price of $4.50 per copy. Did Gray have a legal or ethical duty to “mitigate the damages” by attempting to sell or otherwise distribute these copies itself? Why or why not?

CHAPTER 39

Corporate Formation and Financing

The corporation is a creature of statute. A corporation is an artificial being, existing only in law and neither tangible nor visible. Its existence generally depends on state law, although some corporations, especially public organizations, are created under federal law. Each state has its own body of corporate law, and these laws are not entirely uniform.

The Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA) is a codification of modern corporation law that has been influential in shaping state corporation statutes. Today, the majority of state statutes are guided by the most recent version of the MBCA, often referred to as the Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA). (Excerpts from the RMBCA are included in Appendix G of this text.) Keep in mind, however, that corporation laws vary considerably even among states that have used the MBCA or the RMBCA as a basis for their statutes, and several states do not follow either act. Consequently, individual state corporation laws should be relied on to determine corporate law rather than the MBCA or RMBCA.

In this chapter, we examine the nature of the corporate form of business enterprise and the various classifications of corporations. We then discuss the formation and financing of today's corporation.

SECTION 1

THE NATURE AND CLASSIFICATION OF CORPORATIONS

A corporation is a legal entity created and recognized by state law. This business entity can have one or more owners (called shareholders), and it operates under a name distinct from the names of its owners. The owners may be individuals, or natural persons (as opposed to the artificial legal person of the corporation), or other businesses. Although the corporation substitutes itself for its shareholders when conducting corporate business and incurring liability, its authority to act and the liability for its actions are separate and apart from the individuals who own it.

A corporation is recognized as a “person,” and it enjoys many of the same rights and privileges under state and federal law that U.S. citizens enjoy. For example, corporations possess the same right of access to the courts as citizens and can sue or be sued. The constitutional guarantees of due process, free speech, and freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures also apply to corporations.

Corporate Personnel

In a corporation, the responsibility for the overall management of the firm is entrusted to a board of directors, whose members are elected by the shareholders. The board of directors makes the policy decisions and hires corporate officers and other employees to run the daily business operations of the corporation.

When an individual purchases a share of stock in a corporation, that person becomes a shareholder and an owner of the corporation. Unlike the partners in a partnership, the body of shareholders can change constantly without affecting the continued existence of the corporation. A shareholder can sue the corporation, and the corporation can sue a shareholder. Additionally, under certain circumstances, a shareholder can sue on behalf of a corporation. The rights and duties of corporate directors, officers, and shareholders will be examined in Chapter 40.

The Limited Liability of Shareholders

One of the key advantages of the corporate form is the limited liability of its owners. Normally, corporate shareholders are not personally liable for the obligations of the corporation beyond the extent of their investments. In certain limited situations, however, a court can pierce the corporate veil (see page 766) and impose liability on shareholders for the corporation's obligations. Additionally, creditors often will not extend credit to small companies unless the shareholders assume personal liability, as guarantors, for corporate obligations.

Corporate Earnings and Taxation

When a corporation earns profits, it can either distribute them to its shareholders in the form of dividends or retain the profits. These retained earnings, if invested properly, will yield higher corporate profits in the future and thus cause the price of the company's stock to rise. Individual shareholders can then reap the benefits of these retained earnings in the capital gains that they receive when they sell their stock.

CORPORATE TAXATION Whether a corporation retains its profits or passes them on to the shareholders as dividends, those profits are subject to income tax by various levels of government. Failure to pay taxes can lead to severe consequences. The state can suspend the entity's corporate status until the taxes are paid or even dissolve the corporation for failing to pay taxes.

Another important aspect of corporate taxation is that corporate profits can be subject to double taxation. The company pays tax on its profits, and then if the profits are passed on to the shareholders as dividends, the shareholders must also pay income tax on them (unless the dividends represent distributions of capital). The corporation normally does not receive a tax deduction for dividends it distributes. This double-taxation feature is one of the major disadvantages of the corporate form.

A taxation issue of increasing importance to corporations is whether they are required to collect state sales taxes on goods or services sold to consumers via the Internet. See this chapter's Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature on the facing page for a discussion of this issue.

HOLDING COMPANIES Some U.S. corporations use holding companies to reduce or defer their U.S. income taxes. At its simplest, a holding company (sometimes referred to as a parent company) is a company whose business activity consists of holding shares in another company. Typically, the holding company is established in a low-tax or no-tax offshore jurisdiction, such as the Cayman Islands, Dubai, Hong Kong, Luxembourg, Monaco, or Panama.

Sometimes, a U.S. corporation sets up a holding company in a low-tax offshore environment and then transfers its cash, bonds, stocks, and other investments to the holding company. Generally, any profits received by the holding company on these investments are taxed at the rate of the offshore jurisdiction where the company is registered (not at the rates applicable to the corporation or its shareholders in their country of residence). Thus, deposits of cash, for example, may earn interest that is taxed at only a minimal rate. Once the profits are brought "onshore," though, they are taxed at the federal corporate income tax rate, and any payments received by the shareholders are also taxable at the full U.S. rates. In the federal government's 2011 budget, the Obama administration proposed measures that would restrict multinational companies from deferring the payment of taxes on profits earned overseas.

Torts and Criminal Acts

A corporation is liable for the torts committed by its agents or officers within the course and scope of their employment. This principle applies to a corporation exactly as it applies to the ordinary agency relationships discussed in Chapter 33. It follows the doctrine of respondeat superior.

Under modern criminal law, a corporation may also be held liable for the criminal acts of its agents and employees, provided the punishment is one that can be applied to the corporation. Although corporations cannot be imprisoned, they can be fined. (Of course, corporate directors and officers can be imprisoned, and many have been in recent years.) In addition, under sentencing guidelines for crimes committed by corporate employees (white-collar crimes), corporate lawbreakers can face fines amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars.¹

1. Note that the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 (see Chapter 5) stiffened the penalties for certain types of corporate crime and ordered the U.S. Sentencing Commission to revise the sentencing guidelines accordingly.

SHIFTING LEGAL PRIORITIES FOR BUSINESS

The Latest Recession Re-Ignites the Internet Taxation Debate

Governments at the state and federal levels have long debated whether states should be able to collect sales taxes on online sales to their residents. State governments claim that their inability to tax online sales has caused them to lose billions of dollars in sales tax revenue. The issue has taken on new urgency as the states search desperately for revenue in the wake of the economic recession that began in late 2007.

Supreme Court Precedent Requires Physical Presence

In 1992, the United States Supreme Court ruled that no individual state can compel an out-of-state business that lacks a substantial physical presence (such as a warehouse, office, or retail store) within that state to collect and remit state taxes.^a The Court recognized that Congress has the power to pass legislation requiring out-of-state corporations to collect and remit state sales taxes, but Congress so far has chosen not to tax Internet transactions.

In fact, Congress temporarily prohibited the states from taxing Internet sales, and that ban was extended until 2014.^b Thus, only online retailers that also have a physical presence within a state must collect state taxes on any Web sales made to residents of that state. (Otherwise, state residents are required to self-report their purchases and pay so-called use taxes to the state, which rarely occurs.)

New York Changed Its Definition of Physical Presence

In an effort to collect taxes on Internet sales made by out-of-state corporations, New York changed its tax laws in 2008 to redefine physical presence. Under the new law, if an online retailer pays any party within the state to solicit business for its products, that retailer has a physical presence in the state and must collect state taxes.^c For example, Amazon.com, the largest U.S. online retailer, pays thousands of associates in New York to post ads that link to Amazon's Web site. Consequently, the law requires Amazon to collect tax on any sales to New York residents.

Both Amazon and Overstock.com, a Utah corporation, filed lawsuits in 2009 claiming that the new law was unconstitutional. A New York court dismissed Amazon's case, finding that the law provided a sufficient basis for requiring collection of New York taxes. As long as the seller has a substantial connection with the state, the taxes need not derive from in-state activity. The court also observed that "out-of-state sellers can shield themselves from a tax-collection obligation by altogether prohibiting in-state solicitation activities . . . on their behalf."^d As a result, Amazon now collects and pays state sales taxes on shipments to New York.

Overstock also lost its lawsuit but has filed an appeal.^e In the meantime, to avoid having to collect the sales tax, Overstock canceled agreements with its New York affiliates that were being paid to direct traffic to its Web site. In 2009 and 2010, Amazon ended its arrangements with affiliates in Colorado, North Carolina, and Rhode Island for the same reason. Fifteen other states, including California, Illinois, Iowa, Maryland, New Mexico, Vermont, and Virginia, are now considering passing laws similar to New York's.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS

Most states and municipal governments continue to struggle with budgets, so they will continue to seek additional sources of revenues. These governments will pass more laws to try to capture taxes from commercial activities on the Internet. Therefore, managers whose companies sell goods or services on the Internet must keep track of what lawmakers are planning in this contentious area.

into reverse, Angelo allowed Gauthier to continue driving the truck. At a worksite, when Gauthier backed up to dump the truck's load, he struck and killed a police officer who was facing away from the truck. The state charged Angelo and Gauthier with the crime of vehicular homicide. Angelo argued that a corporation could not be guilty of vehicular homicide because it cannot operate a vehicle. The court ruled that if an employee commits a crime "while engaged in corporate business that the employee has been authorized to conduct," the corporation can be held liable for the crime. Hence, the court held that Angelo was liable for Gauthier's negligent operation of its truck, which resulted in a person's death.²

Classification of Corporations

Corporations can be classified in several ways. The classification of a corporation normally depends on its location, purpose, and ownership characteristics, as described in the following subsections.

DOMESTIC, FOREIGN, AND ALIEN CORPORATIONS A corporation is referred to as a domestic corporation by its home state (the state in which it incorporates). A corporation formed in one state but doing business in another is referred to in the second state as a foreign corporation. A corporation formed in another country (say, Mexico) but doing business in the United States is referred to in the United States as an alien corporation.

A corporation does not have an automatic right to do business in a state other than its state of incorporation. In some instances, it must obtain a certificate of authority in any state in which it plans to do business. Once the certificate has been issued, the corporation generally can exercise in that state all of the powers conferred on it by its home state. If a foreign corporation does business in a state without obtaining a certificate of authority, the state can impose substantial fines and sanctions on the corporation, and sometimes even on its officers, directors, or agents.

Note that most state statutes specify certain activities that are not considered “doing business” within the state. These statutes often allow foreign corporations to participate in lawsuits, hold meetings of directors or shareholders, own real or personal property, and maintain an office or bank account.³ Normally, a foreign corporation can conduct isolated business transactions (but not repeated transactions) within a state without obtaining a certificate of authority to do business there.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CORPORATIONS A public corporation is a corporation formed by the government to meet some political or governmental purpose. Cities and towns that incorporate are common examples. In addition, many federal government organizations, such as the U.S. Postal Service, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and AMTRAK, are public corporations. Note that a public corporation is not the same as a publicly held corporation. A publicly held corporation (often called a public company) is any corporation whose shares are publicly traded in a securities market, such as the New York Stock Exchange or the NASDAQ (an electronic stock exchange founded by the National Association of Securities Dealers).

In contrast to public corporations, private corporations (such as publicly held companies) are created either wholly or in part for private benefit (for profit). Most corporations are private. Although they may serve a public purpose, as a public electric or gas utility does, they are owned by private persons rather than by the government.⁴

NONPROFIT CORPORATIONS Corporations formed for purposes other than making a profit are called non-profit or not-for-profit corporations. Private hospitals, educational institutions, charities, and religious organizations, for example, are frequently organized as nonprofit corporations. The nonprofit corporation is a convenient form of organization that allows various groups to own property and to form contracts without exposing the individual members to personal liability.

CLOSELY HELD CORPORATIONS Most corporate enterprises in the United States fall into the category of closely held corporations (sometimes called close corporations). A closely held corporation is one whose shares are not publicly traded. In fact, there is no trading market for the shares. The shares are often held by family members or by a relatively small group of persons. Usually, the members of the small group constituting a closely held corporation are personally known to each other. Closely held corporations are also sometimes referred to as privately held corporations.

In practice, a closely held corporation is often operated like a partnership. Some states have enacted special statutory provisions that apply to these corporations and allow them to depart significantly from certain formalities required by traditional corporation law.⁵

Additionally, a provision in the RMBCA gives a closely held corporation considerable flexibility in determining its rules of operation [RMBCA 7.32]. If all of a corporation’s shareholders agree in writing, the corporation can operate without directors, bylaws, annual or special shareholders’ or directors’ meetings, stock certificates, or formal records of shareholders’ or directors’ decisions.⁶

4. The United States Supreme Court first recognized the property rights of private corporations and clarified the distinction between public and private corporations in the landmark case Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 518, 4 L.Ed. 629 (1819).

5. For example, in some states (such as Maryland), a closely held corporation need not have a board of directors.

6. Shareholders cannot agree, however, to eliminate certain rights of shareholders, such as the right to inspect corporate books and records or the right to bring derivative actions (lawsuits on behalf of the corporation—see Chapter 40).

3. See, for example, Iowa Code Section 490.1501 and Texas Code Section 9.251.

Management of Closely Held Corporations. A closely held corporation has a single shareholder or a tightly knit group of shareholders, who usually hold the positions of directors and officers. Management of a closely held corporation resembles that of a sole proprietorship or a partnership. As a corporation, however, the firm must meet all specific legal requirements set forth in state statutes.

To prevent a majority shareholder from dominating a closely held corporation, the company may require that more than a simple majority of the directors approve any action taken by the board. Typically, this would apply only to extraordinary actions, such as changing the amount of dividends or dismissing an employee-shareholder, and not to ordinary business decisions.

Transfer of Shares in Closely Held Corporations. By definition, a closely held corporation has a small number of shareholders. Thus, the transfer of one shareholder's shares to someone else can cause serious management problems. The other shareholders may find themselves required to share control with someone they do not know or like.

Suppose that three brothers, Terry, Damon, and Henry Johnson, are the only shareholders of Johnson's Car Wash, Inc. Terry and Damon do not want Henry to sell his shares to an unknown third person. To avoid this situation, the corporation could restrict the transferability of shares to outside persons. Shareholders could be required to offer their shares to the closely held corporation or the other shareholders before selling them to an outside purchaser. In fact, a few states have statutes that prohibit the transfer of closely held corporation shares unless certain persons—including shareholders, family members, and the corporation—are first given the opportunity to purchase the shares for the same price.

Shareholder Agreement to Restrict Stock Transfers. Control of a closely held corporation can also be stabilized through the use of a shareholder agreement. A shareholder agreement can provide that when one of the original shareholders dies, her or his shares of stock in the corporation will be divided in such a way that the proportionate holdings of the survivors, and thus their proportionate control, will be maintained. Agreements between shareholders can also restrict the transfer of a closely held corporation's stock in other ways.

CASE IN POINT The Kearns-Tribune Corporation, a closely held corporation owned by the Kearns-McCarthy family, owned The Salt Lake Tribune. In 1997, the family sold the corporation to cable company Tele-Communications, Inc. (TCI). As part of the agreement, the family received an option to repurchase the assets of The Tribune at a later date. After TCI merged with AT&T Corporation, giving AT&T control over Kearns-Tribune, the family attempted to exercise the option to repurchase The Tribune. The court denied the request, however, because Kearns-Tribune had previously signed another agreement with Deseret News to form the Newspaper Agency Corporation (NAC), with Kearns-Tribune and Deseret News each owning 50 percent of NAC. Under that contract, the shareholders agreed to prohibit the transfer of ownership of NAC stock. Therefore, the stock transfer restriction was an obstacle to the family's claim for specific performance of the option.⁷

Misappropriation of Closely Held Corporation Funds. Sometimes, a majority shareholder in a closely held corporation takes advantage of his or her position and misappropriates company funds. In such situations, the normal remedy for the injured minority shareholders is to have their shares appraised and to be paid the fair market value for them.

In the following case, two wronged minority shareholders pursued an additional remedy.

CASE 39.1 Williams v. Stanford

District Court of Appeal of Florida, First District, 977 So.2d 722 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Two brothers, Paul and James Williams, together held 30 percent of the stock in Brown and Standard (B&S), Inc., a construction company. John Stanford owned the other 70 percent of the closely held corporation shares. The Williams brothers worked for B&S for five years when they became suspicious of Stanford's financial management. Stanford reported net losses

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 39.1 CONTINUED ♦ for the company. When the brothers asked to see the B&S books, they were fired. Later, it was shown that Stanford had misappropriated at least $250,000 in B&S funds for his personal use. The Williams brothers brought a shareholder's derivative suit (see Chapter 40) on behalf of B&S, naming Stanford as the defendant and accusing him of breach of fiduciary duty. Before trial, Stanford resigned from B&S and closed the company. He gave the assets and liabilities of B&S to a new company he formed and owned, J. C. Stanford & Sons. He offered the Williams brothers $25,000 each for their stock in B&S. They responded with a request for $125,000 each. The trial court held that by law the Williams brothers, by making a counteroffer, had given up their rights to bring a suit against the company. Hence, the court granted summary judgment to Stanford. The Williams brothers appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

KAHN, Judge.

* * * *

In the present case, the Williams brothers alleged sufficient acts of unfair dealing to withstand appellees' [Stanford and his wife, who served on the board of directors] motion for summary judgment, which the trial court should have denied.

In cases such as the present controversy, involving dissenting shareholders who seek more than appraisal of their shares in the wake of objectionable transactions, courts must balance the principle that an adequate remedy should exist for a dissenting shareholder in an unfair transaction against the consideration that courts should not become bogged down in a wide range of disputes over the fairness of cash-out prices offered to minority shareholders who object to corporate transactions. We have no question that, in the present case, we are not dealing with "a fair price complaint artfully disguised in the camouflage of procedural unfairness." As appellants' counsel pointed out during oral argument, the Williams brothers' complaint over the fairness of the transfer of B&S assets stems from the fact that, at the time appellants' statutory appraisal right crystallized, the company's treasury—and thus the corresponding value of their shares—had been all but eviscerated [reduced to practically no value] through several years of the Stanfords' alleged misappropriations and mismanagement of corporate funds, activities the Williams brothers did not detect until the company recorded a net loss in 2001. Contingent upon proof of the allegations, appraisal at the time of the November 2003 transfer of B&S assets, effectuated [accomplished] after years of allegedly value destroying activities on the Stanfords' part, would not have afforded the Williams brothers adequate recourse in this particular case. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

We interpret the "fraud or material misrepresentation" exception in [Florida's corporation statute] to mean that a minority shareholder who alleges specific acts of "fraud, misrepresentation, self-dealing, or deliberate waste of corporate assets," may be entitled to equitable remedies beyond an appraisal proceeding if those allegations are proven true and if the alleged acts have so besmirched [tarnished] the propriety of the challenged transaction that no appraisal could fairly compensate the aggrieved minority shareholder. We adopt the entire fairness analysis developed in [other cases] to assess whether a corporate transaction avails aggrieved minority shareholders of rights beyond appraisal. The trial court erred in granting summary judgment as to appellants' claim for rescission of the transfer of assets; we reverse summary judgment and remand for factual determinations as to the truth of appellants' allegations of fraud, misrepresentation, and breaches of fiduciary duty on the Stanfords' part.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The state appellate court reversed the trial court, holding that the Williams brothers were entitled to a trial to determine if they could prove abuse of the company by Stanford. Although this did not follow the usual procedure for appraisal of minority shares, given the strong suspicion of fraud in this instance, the court was willing to allow for greater review.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Was it acceptable for the William brothers to demand $125,000 each for their shares? Why or why not?

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • No matter how friendly the shareholders of a closely held corporation may be, or how informal its formation, all owners, particularly minority owners, must insist from the beginning that the corporation establish written procedures that will enable them to carefully audit its financial activities. All shareholders should have continuing access to accounting information as well as the right to review bank statements.

S CORPORATIONS A closely held corporation that meets the qualifying requirements specified in Subchapter S of the Internal Revenue Code can choose to operate as an S corporation. (A corporation will automatically be taxed under Subchapter C unless it elects S corporation status.) If a corporation has S corporation status, it can avoid the imposition of income taxes at the corporate level while retaining many of the advantages of a corporation, particularly limited liability. Among the numerous requirements for S corporation status, the following are the most important:

1. The corporation must be a domestic corporation.
2. The corporation must not be a member of an affiliated group of corporations.
3. The shareholders of the corporation must be individuals, estates, or certain trusts and tax-exempt organizations.
4. The corporation must have no more than one hundred shareholders.
5. The corporation must have only one class of stock, although all shareholders do not need to have the same voting rights.
6. No shareholder of the corporation may be a non-resident alien.

An S corporation is treated differently than a regular corporation for tax purposes. An S corporation is taxed like a partnership, so the corporate income passes through to the shareholders, who pay personal income tax on it. This treatment enables the S corporation to avoid the double taxation imposed on regular corporations.

In addition, the shareholders' tax brackets may be lower than the tax bracket that the corporation would have been in if the tax had been imposed at the corporate level. The resulting tax saving is particularly attractive when the corporation wants to accumulate earnings for some future business purpose. If the corporation has losses, the S election allows the shareholders to use the losses to offset other income. Nevertheless, because the limited liability company (see Chapter 38) and the limited liability partnership (see Chapter 37) offer similar tax advantages and greater flexibility, the S corporation has lost some of its appeal.

PROFESSIONAL CORPORATIONS Professionals such as physicians, lawyers, dentists, and accountants can incorporate. Professional corporations are typically identified by the letters P.C. (professional corporation), S.C. (service corporation), or P.A. (professional association).

In general, the laws governing the formation and operation of professional corporations are similar to those governing ordinary business corporations. There are some differences in terms of liability, however. For liability purposes, some courts treat a professional corporation somewhat like a partnership and hold each professional liable for any malpractice committed within the scope of the business by the others in the firm. With the exception of malpractice or a breach of duty to clients or patients, a shareholder in a professional corporation generally cannot be held liable for the torts committed by other professionals at the firm.

See Concept Summary 39.1 on the following page for a review of the ways in which corporations are classified.

SECTION 2 CORPORATE FORMATION

Up to this point, we have discussed some of the general characteristics of corporations. We now examine the process by which corporations come into existence. Incorporating a business is much simpler today than it was twenty years ago. In fact, many states allow businesses to incorporate online.

One of the most common reasons for creating a corporation is the need for additional capital to finance expansion. Many Fortune 500 companies started as sole proprietorships or partnerships and then converted to corporate entities. Incorporation may be the best choice for an expanding business organization because a corporation can obtain more capital by issuing shares of stock. (Corporate financing will be discussed later in this chapter.)

Promotional Activities

In the past, preliminary steps were taken to organize and promote the business prior to incorporating. Contracts were made with investors and others on behalf of the future corporation. Today, however, due to the relative ease of forming a corporation in most states, persons incorporating their business rarely, if ever, engage in preliminary promotional activities.

Nevertheless, it is important for businesspersons to understand that they are personally liable for all preincorporation contracts made with investors, accountants, or others on behalf of the future corporation. A promoter may limit her or his potential liability in an initial promotional contract with a third party by including a provision that makes the corporation, once formed, assume liability under the contract. If the contract does not include such

Classification of Corporations

Classification	Description
Domestic, Foreign, and Alien Corporations	A corporation is referred to as a domestic corporation in its home state (the state in which it incorporates). A corporation is referred to as a foreign corporation by any state that is not its home state. A corporation is referred to as an alien corporation if it originates in another country but does business in the United States.
Public and Private Corporations	A public corporation is formed by a government (for example, a city, town, or public project). A private corporation is formed wholly or in part for private benefit. Most corporations are private corporations.
Nonprofit Corporation	A corporation formed without a profit-making purpose (for example, charitable, educational, and religious organizations and hospitals).
Closely Held Corporation	A corporation that is owned by a family or a relatively small number of individuals. Because the number of shareholders is small and the transfer of shares usually is restricted, the shares are not traded in a public securities market. (Sometimes called a close corporation.)
S Corporation	A small domestic corporation (must have no more than one hundred shareholders) that, under Subchapter S of the Internal Revenue Code, is given special tax treatment. S corporations allow shareholders to enjoy the limited legal liability of the corporate form but avoid its double-taxation feature. (Shareholders pay taxes on the income at personal income tax rates, and the S corporation is not taxed separately.)
Professional Corporation	A corporation formed by professionals (for example, physicians or lawyers) to obtain the advantages of incorporation (such as tax benefits and limited liability). In most situations, the professional corporation is treated like other corporations, but sometimes the courts disregard the corporate form and treat the shareholders as partners, especially with regard to malpractice liability.

a provision, the promoter's personal liability continues. A promoter will remain personally liable for the preincorporation contract until the corporation assumes liability through a novation (a contract to substitute a third party in the place of one of the original contracting parties—see Chapter 17). A newly formed corporation is not liable for any preincorporation contract unless it has expressly agreed to its terms (in the initial contract or the novation).

Incorporation Procedures

Exact procedures for incorporation differ among states, but the basic steps are as follows: (1) select a state of incorporation, (2) secure the corporate name, (3) prepare the articles of incorporation, and (4) file the articles of incorporation with the secretary of state. These steps are discussed in more detail in the following subsections.

SELECT THE STATE OF INCORPORATION The first step in the incorporation process is to select a state in which to incorporate. Because state laws differ, individuals may look for the states that offer the most advantageous tax or incorporation provisions. Another consideration is the fee that a particular state charges to incorporate as well as the annual fees and the fees for specific transactions (such as stock transfers).

Delaware has historically had the least restrictive laws, along with provisions that favor corporate management. Consequently, many corporations, including a number of the largest, have incorporated there. Delaware's statutes permit firms to incorporate in that state and conduct business and locate their operating headquarters elsewhere. Most other states now permit this as well. Generally, though, closely held corporations, particularly those of a professional nature, incorporate in the state where their principal shareholders live and work. For reasons of convenience and cost, businesses often choose to incorporate in the state in which most of the corporation's business will be conducted.

SECURE THE CORPORATE NAME The choice of a corporate name is subject to state approval to ensure against duplication or deception. State statutes usually require that the secretary of state run a check on the proposed name in the state of incorporation. Some states require that the persons incorporating a firm, at their own expense, run a check on the proposed name, which can often be accomplished via Internet-based services. Once cleared, a name can be reserved for a short time, for a fee, pending the completion of the articles of incorporation.

Must Include Words That Disclose Corporate Status. All states require the corporation name to include the word Corporation (Corp.), Incorporated (Inc.), Company (Co.), or Limited (Ltd.). A firm's failure to disclose its corporate status through the use of one of these terms or abbreviations can result in the individual who signed a contract for the corporation being held personally liable (as an undisclosed principal—see Chapter 33).

Cannot Infringe on Another's Trademark Rights. A new corporation's name cannot be the same as (or deceptively similar to) the name of an existing corporation doing business within the state (see Chapter 8). Suppose that an existing corporation is named Digital Synergy, Inc. The state will not likely allow a new corporation to use the name Digital Synergy Company. That name is deceptively similar to the first and could cause confusion. This similar name could also transfer part of the goodwill established by the first corporate user to the second, thus infringing on the first company's trademark rights.

If those incorporating a firm contemplate doing business in other states—or over the Internet—they will also need to check existing corporate names in the other states in which they will do business to avoid liability for trademark infringement in those states. A related issue concerns the new firm's Internet domain name. Because the firm will want to use its name as a domain name, those incorporating the firm will need to make sure that the domain name is available by checking the ICANN database of domain names (see page 156).

PREPARE THE ARTICLES OF INCORPORATION The primary document needed to incorporate a business is the articles of incorporation (for an example, see Exhibit 39–1 on the next page). The articles include basic information about the corporation and serve as a primary source of authority for its future organization and business functions. The person or persons who execute (sign) the articles are called incorporators. Generally, the articles of incorporation must include the following information [RMBCA 2.02].

1. The name of the corporation.
2. The number of shares the corporation is authorized to issue.
3. The name and street address of the corporation's initial registered agent and registered office.
4. The name and address of each incorporator.

In addition, the articles may set forth other information, such as the names and addresses of the initial members of the board of directors, the duration and purpose of the corporation, a par value for shares of the corporation, and any other information pertinent to the rights and duties of the corporation's shareholders and directors. Articles of incorporation vary widely depending on the jurisdiction and the size and type of the corporation. Frequently, the articles do not provide much detail about the firm's operations, which are spelled out in the company's bylaws (internal rules of management adopted by the corporation at its first organizational meeting).

Shares of the Corporation. The articles must specify the number of shares of stock the corporation is authorized to issue [RMBCA 2.02(a)]. For instance, a company might state that the aggregate number of shares that the corporation has the authority to issue is five thousand. Large corporations often state a par value for each share, such as $.20 per share, and specify the various types or classes of stock authorized for issuance (see the discussion of common and preferred stock later in this chapter). Sometimes, the articles set forth the capital structure of the corporation and other relevant information concerning equity, shares, and credit. To allow for the raising of additional capital in the future, the articles of incorporation often authorize many more shares of stock than will initially be issued. This avoids the cumbersome and sometimes complicated task of amending the articles of incorporation at a later date.

Registered Office and Agent. The corporation must indicate the location and street address of its registered office within the state. Usually, the registered office is also the principal office of the corporation. The corporation must also give the name and address of a specific person who has been designated as an agent and who can receive legal documents (such as orders to appear in court) on behalf of the corporation.

Incorporators. Each incorporator must be listed by name and address. The incorporators need not have any interest at all in the corporation, and sometimes signing the articles is their only duty. Many states do not have residency or age requirements for incorporators. In some states, only one incorporator is needed, but other states require as many as three. Incorporators frequently participate in the first organizational meeting of the corporation.

Duration and Purpose. A corporation has perpetual existence unless the articles state otherwise. The RMBCA does not require a specific statement of purpose to be included in the articles. A corporation can be formed for any lawful purpose. Some incorporators include a general statement of purpose “to engage in any lawful act or activity,” while others specify the intended business activities (such as “to engage in the production and sale of agricultural products”). The trend is toward allowing corporate articles to state that the corporation is organized for “any legal business,” with no mention of specifics, to avoid the need for future amendments to the corporate articles [RMBCA 2.02(b)(2)(i), 3.01]. (Stating that a corporation is organized for any legal business also might avoid potential ultra vires issues, as discussed later in this chapter.)

Internal Organization. The articles can describe the corporation's internal management structure, although this usually is included in the bylaws adopted after the corporation is formed. The articles of incorporation commence the corporation. The bylaws are formed after commencement by the board of directors. Bylaws cannot conflict with the incorporation statute or the articles of incorporation [RMBCA 2.06].

Under the RMBCA, shareholders may amend or repeal the bylaws. The board of directors may also amend or repeal the bylaws unless the articles of incorporation or provisions of the incorporation statute reserve this power to the shareholders exclusively [RMBCA 10.20]. The bylaws typically describe such matters as voting requirements for shareholders, the election of the board of directors, and the methods of replacing directors. Bylaws also frequently outline the manner and time of holding shareholders' and board meetings (these corporate activities will be discussed in Chapter 40).

FILE THE ARTICLES WITH THE STATE Once the articles of incorporation have been prepared and signed by the incorporators, they are sent to the appropriate state official, usually the secretary of state, along with the required filing fee. In most states, the secretary of state then stamps the articles "Filed" and returns a copy of the articles to the incorporators. Once this occurs, the corporation officially exists. (Note that some states issue a certificate of incorporation, or corporate charter, which is similar to articles of incorporation, representing the state's authorization for the corporation to conduct business.⁸ This procedure was typical under the unrevised MBCA.)

First Organizational Meeting to Adopt Bylaws

After incorporation, the first organizational meeting must be held. Usually, the most important function of this meeting is the adoption of bylaws, which, as mentioned, are the internal rules of management for the corporation. If the articles of incorporation named the initial board of directors, then the directors, by majority vote, call the meeting to adopt the bylaws and complete the company's organization. If the articles did not name the directors (as is typical), then the incorporators hold the meeting to elect the directors, adopt bylaws, and complete the routine business of incorporation (authorizing the issuance of shares and hiring employees, for example). The business transacted depends on the requirements of the state's corporation statute, the nature of the corporation, the provisions made in the articles, and the desires of the incorporators.

Improper Incorporation

The procedures for incorporation are very specific. If they are not followed precisely, others may be able to challenge the existence of the corporation. Errors in incorporation procedures can become important when, for example, a third party who is attempting to enforce a contract or bring a suit for a tort injury learns of them. If a corporation has substantially complied with all conditions precedent to incorporation, the corporation is said to have de jure (rightful and lawful) existence. In most states and under RMBCA 2.03(b), the secretary of state's filing of the articles of incorporation is conclusive proof that all mandatory statutory provisions have been met [RMBCA 2.03(b)].

Sometimes, the incorporators fail to comply with all statutory mandates. If the defect is minor, such as an incorrect address listed on the articles of incorporation, most courts will overlook the defect and find that a corporation (de jure) exists. If the defect is substantial, however, such as a corporation's failure to hold an organizational meeting to adopt bylaws, the outcome will vary depending on the court. Some states, including Mississippi, New York, Ohio, and Oklahoma, still recognize the common law doctrine of de facto corporation.⁹ In those states, the courts will treat a corporation as a legal corporation despite the defect in its formation if the following three requirements are met:

1. A state statute exists under which the corporation can be validly incorporated.
2. The parties have made a good faith attempt to comply with the statute.
3. The parties have already undertaken to do business as a corporation.

Many state courts, however, have interpreted their states' version of the RMBCA as abolishing the common law doctrine of de facto corporations. These states include Alaska, Arizona, the District of Columbia, New Mexico, Minnesota, Oregon, South Dakota, Tennessee, Utah, and Washington. In those states, if there is a substantial defect in complying with the incorporation statute, the corporation does

8. Under some circumstances, such as when a corporation fails to pay taxes, a state can revoke the firm's corporate charter, or status as a corporation.

9. See, for example, In re Hausman, 13 N.Y.3d 408, 921 N.E.2d 191, 893 N.Y.S.2d 499 (2009).

not legally exist, and the incorporators are personally liable.

Corporation by Estoppel

If a business holds itself out to others as being a corporation but has made no attempt to incorporate, the firm may be estopped (prevented) from denying corporate status in a lawsuit by a third party. This doctrine of corporation by estoppel is most commonly applied when a third party contracts with an entity that claims to be a corporation but has not filed articles of incorporation—or contracts with a person claiming to be an agent of a corporation that does not in fact exist. When justice requires, courts in some states will treat an alleged corporation as if it were an actual corporation for the purpose of determining the rights and liabilities in particular circumstances.¹⁰ Recognition of corporate status does not extend beyond the resolution of the problem at hand.

In the following case, a party sought to avoid liability on a contract with a firm that had not yet filed its articles of incorporation. Could the party escape liability on the ground that the corporation did not exist at the time of the contract?

10. Some states have expressly rejected the common law theory of corporation by estoppel, finding that it is inconsistent with their statutory law, whereas other states have abolished only the doctrines of de facto and de jure corporations. See, for example, Stone v. Jetmar Properties, LLC, 733 N.W.2d 480 (Minn.App. 2007).

Brown v. W. P. Media, Inc.

Supreme Court of Alabama, 17 So.3d 1167 (2009).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In 2001, W. P. Media, Inc., and Alabama MBA, Inc., agreed to form a joint venture—to be called Alabaster Wireless MBA, LLC—to provide wireless Internet services to consumers. W. P. Media was to create a wireless network and provide ongoing technical support. Alabama MBA was to contribute capital of $79,300, and W. P. Media was to contribute “proprietary technology” in the same amount. Hugh Brown signed the parties’ contract on Alabama MBA’s behalf as the chair of its board. At the time, however, Alabama MBA’s articles of incorporation had not yet been filed. Brown filed the articles of incorporation in 2002. Later, Brown and Alabama MBA filed a suit in an Alabama state court, alleging that W. P. Media had breached their contract by not building the wireless network. The court issued a summary judgment in the defendant’s favor. The plaintiffs appealed.

Corporate action may * * * be established under principles of estoppel, whether or not an entity or organization qualifies as a de facto corporation. The doctrine is based on conduct by a party that recognizes an organization as a corporation or an express or implied representation by a corporation that it is a corporation. In the first instance, estoppel cannot apply to one who has not dealt with the organization or in any way recognized it as having corporate existence, or who has participated in holding it out as a corporation. In the second instance, where a party has contracted or otherwise dealt with an organization, believing it to be a corporation, there may have been no holding out of corporate status by the organization. In either instance, estoppel arises from the contract or course of dealing by the parties and is applicable in a suit by the party dealing with the organization, as well as in a suit by the organization. [Emphasis added.]

Alabama MBA * * * argues that because W. P. Media treated Alabama MBA as a corporation, W. P. Media is now estopped from denying Alabama MBA’s corporate existence.

W. P. Media entered into a contractual relationship with Alabama MBA to operate Alabaster Wireless. The operating agreement identified Alabama MBA as a corporation, was executed in Alabama MBA’s corporate name, and was signed by Brown as Alabama MBA’s “chairman of the board.” W. P. Media further concedes * * * that Alabama MBA and Brown had essentially “represented” that Alabama MBA was “a viable, legal corporation” and that W. P. Media had

SECTION 3 CORPORATE POWERS

Under modern law, a corporation generally can engage in any act and enter into any contract available to a natural person in order to accomplish the purposes for which it was formed. When a corporation is created, the express and implied powers necessary to achieve its purpose also come into existence.

Express Powers

The express powers of a corporation are found in its articles of incorporation, in the law of the state of incorporation, and in the state and federal constitutions. State statutes often give corporations a wide variety of powers, allowing a corporation to issue stocks and bonds, execute contracts and negotiable instruments, buy and sell (or lease) property, pay employee benefits, and make charitable contributions.

Corporate bylaws and the resolutions of the corporation’s board of directors also grant or restrict certain powers. Because state corporation statutes frequently provide default rules that apply if the company’s bylaws are silent on an issue, it is important that the bylaws set forth the specific operating rules of the corporation. In addition, after the bylaws are adopted, the corporation’s board of directors will pass resolutions that also grant or restrict corporate powers.

The following order of priority is used if a conflict arises among the various documents involving a corporation:

1. The U.S. Constitution.
2. State constitutions.
3. State statutes.
4. The articles of incorporation.
5. Bylaws.
6. Resolutions of the board of directors.

Implied Powers

Certain implied powers arise when a corporation is created. Unless expressly prohibited by a constitution, a statute, or the articles of incorporation, the corporation has the implied power to perform all acts reasonably appropriate and necessary to accomplish its corporate purposes. For this reason, a corporation has the implied power to borrow funds within certain limits, lend funds, and extend credit to those with whom it has a legal or contractual relationship.

To borrow funds, the corporation acts through its board of directors to authorize the loan. Most often, the president or chief executive officer (see Chapter 40) of the corporation will execute the necessary papers on behalf of the corporation. Corporate officers such as these have the implied power to bind the corporation in matters directly connected with the ordinary business affairs of the enterprise. There is a limit to what a corporate officer can do, though. A corporate officer does not have the authority to bind the corporation to an action that will greatly affect the corporate purpose or undertaking, such as the sale of substantial corporate assets.

Ultra Vires Doctrine

The term ultra vires means “beyond the power.” In corporate law, acts of a corporation that are beyond its express or implied powers are ultra vires acts. Under Section 3.04 of the RMBCA, the shareholders can seek an injunction from a court to prevent the corporation from engaging in ultra vires acts. The attorney general in the state of incorporation can also bring an action to obtain an injunction against the ultra vires transactions or to institute dissolution proceedings against the corporation on the basis of ultra vires acts. The corporation or its shareholders (on behalf of the corporation) can seek damages from the officers and directors who were responsible for the ultra vires acts.

In the past, most cases dealing with ultra vires acts involved contracts made for unauthorized purposes. Now, however, most private corporations are organized for “any legal business” and do not state a specific purpose, so the ultra vires doctrine has declined in importance in recent years. Today, cases that allege ultra vires acts usually involve nonprofit corporations or municipal (public) corporations.

CASE IN POINT Four men formed a nonprofit corporation to create the Armenian Genocide Museum & Memorial (AGM&M). The bylaws appointed them as trustees (similar to corporate directors) for life. One of the trustees, Gerard L. Cafesjian, became the chair and president of AGM&M. Eventually, the relationship among the trustees deteriorated, and Cafesjian resigned. The corporation then brought a suit claiming that Cafesjian had engaged in numerous ultra vires acts, self-dealing, and mismanagement. Among other things, although the bylaws required an 80 percent affirmative vote of the trustees to take action, Cafesjian had taken many actions without the board’s approval. He had also entered into contracts for real estate transactions in which he had a personal interest. Because Cafesjian had taken actions that exceeded his authority and had failed to follow the rules set forth in the bylaws for board meetings, the court ruled that the corporation could go forward with its suit.¹¹

SECTION 4 PIERCING THE CORPORATE VEIL

Occasionally, the owners use a corporate entity to perpetrate a fraud, circumvent the law, or in some other way accomplish an illegitimate objective. In these situations, the courts will ignore the corporate structure and pierce the corporate veil, exposing the shareholders to personal liability [RMBCA 2.04].

Generally, when the corporate privilege is abused for personal benefit, the courts will require the owners to assume personal liability to creditors for the corporation’s debts. The courts will also impose personal liability when the corporate business is treated so carelessly that the corporation and the controlling shareholders are no longer separate entities. In short, when the facts show that great injustice would result from the use of a corporation to avoid individual responsibility, a court will look behind the corporate structure to the individual shareholders.

Factors That Lead Courts to Pierce the Corporate Veil

The following are some of the factors that frequently cause the courts to pierce the corporate veil:

1. A party is tricked or misled into dealing with the corporation rather than the individual.
2. The corporation is set up never to make a profit or always to be insolvent, or it is too “thinly” capitalized—that is, it has insufficient capital at the time it is formed to meet its prospective debts or potential liabilities.
3. The corporation is formed to evade an existing legal obligation.
4. Statutory corporate formalities, such as holding required corporation meetings, are not followed.
5. Personal and corporate interests are mixed together, or commingled, to the extent that the corporation has no separate identity.

Although state corporation codes usually do not prohibit a shareholder from lending funds to her or his corporation, courts will scrutinize the transaction closely if the loan comes from an officer, director, or majority shareholder. Loans from persons who control the corporation must be made in good faith and for fair value.

A Potential Problem for Closely Held Corporations

The potential for corporate assets to be used for personal benefit is especially great in a closely held corporation, in which the shares are held by a single person or by only a few individuals, usually family members. In such a situation, the separate status of the corporate entity and the sole shareholder (or family-member shareholders) must be carefully preserved. Certain practices invite trouble for the one-person or family-owned corporation: the commingling of corporate and personal funds, the failure to hold board of directors' meetings and record the minutes, or the shareholders' continuous personal use of corporate property (for example, vehicles).

In the following case, a creditor asked the court to pierce the corporate veil and hold the sole shareholder-owner of the debtor corporation personally liable for a corporate debt.

EXTENDED CASE 39.3

Schultz v. General Electric Healthcare Financial Services

Court of Appeals of Kentucky, ___ S.W.3d ___ (2010).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

STUMBO, Judge.

* * * *

[Thomas] Schultz was the president and sole shareholder/owner of Intra-Med [Services, Inc.], a Kentucky corporation that performed medical diagnostic imaging services, such as MRIs and CT scans. GE [General Electric Healthcare Financial Services, Inc.; General Electric Company; and General Electric Capital Corporation] entered into a contract to lease certain medical equipment to Intra-Med. In 2004, Intra-Med defaulted on the contract by failing to make the required lease payments to GE.

On July 8, 2004, GE filed a complaint against Intra-Med in Jefferson Circuit Court. On November 15, 2004, the court entered a judgment on the pleadings in favor of GE for over $4.7 million. GE was able to collect approximately $700,000 of the judgment.

While collecting on its judgment, GE learned of certain documents that Intra-Med had produced in discovery in another lawsuit. Those documents revealed that Mr. Schultz had used Intra-Med assets for his own purposes. For example, Mr. Schultz bought multiple pieces of property for himself using Intra-Med funds and when some of this property was later sold, Mr. Schultz kept the proceeds. GE intervened in this other lawsuit and filed a third-party complaint against Mr. Schultz seeking to pierce the corporate veil and hold him personally liable for the judgment against Intra-Med.

On April 17, 2007, GE filed a motion for partial judgment on the pleadings in which it requested a partial judgment in the amount of $1,150,000. This was allegedly the amount of Intra-Med funds which Schultz used improperly.

On August 10, 2007, the trial court held that Mr. Schultz's admissions in his answer to GE's third-party complaint support the conclusion that Schultz improperly used Intra-Med's funds. It also held that none of Mr. Schultz's affirmative defenses would preclude an entry of judgment against him. However, the court found that Mr. Schultz might have been entitled to receive some payments from Intra-Med because he personally loaned the company $700,000. Because of this possibility, the court denied GE's motion.

GE next filed a motion in which it stated it would settle for $450,000, the difference between $1,150,000 and the claimed $700,000 loan. GE also stipulated that it would voluntarily dismiss its remaining claims against Mr. Schultz if the court entered the $450,000 judgment. The court ultimately granted the motion on September 10, 2007. Mr. Schultz filed a motion to alter or amend, but it was denied. This appeal followed.

* * * *

Mr. Schultz admitted several facts in his answer to GE's third-party complaint. The relevant admitted facts are: on November 15, 2004, GE was awarded a judgment in the amount of $4,746,921.80, plus interest, against Intra-Med; Mr. Schultz had knowledge of the GE judgment on or after November 15, 2005; on or about December of 1998, Mr. Schultz, individually, purchased real property located at 7405 New LaGrange Road, Louisville, KY 40242, using Intra-Med funds; Intra-Med did not receive any of the proceeds from the subsequent sale of the New LaGrange Road property in March of 2004; on or about October of 2000, Mr. Schultz, individually, purchased and improved real property located at 8700 Dixie Highway, Louisville, KY 40258, using Intra-Med funds; after entry of the GE judgment, Mr. Schultz sold the Dixie Highway property, which had been purchased and renovated by Mr. Schultz with Intra-Med funds, for $850,000; Intra-Med did not receive any of the proceeds from the sale of the Dixie Highway property; on or about May 24, 2001, Mr. Schultz, individually, purchased a marina slip for $23,000 with Intra-Med funds; and Intra-Med did not receive any of the proceeds from the subsequent sale of the marina slip. It is from these admitted facts that GE moved for a judgment on the pleadings.

EXTENDED CASE CONTINUES ▶

“Three basic theories have been utilized to hold the shareholders of a corporation responsible for corporate liabilities. These have been labeled (1) the instrumentality theory; (2) the alter ego theory; and (3) the equity formulation.” GE focused on the instrumentality theory in its motion.

Under the instrumentality theory three elements must be established in order to warrant a piercing of the corporate veil: (1) that the corporation was a mere instrumentality of the shareholder; (2) that the shareholder exercised control over the corporation in such a way as to defraud or to harm the plaintiff; and (3) that a refusal to disregard the corporate entity would subject the plaintiff to unjust loss. The courts adopting this test have been virtually unanimous in requiring that these three elements co-exist before the corporate veil will be pierced. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The admitted facts * * * support the finding that the corporate veil should be pierced under the instrumentality theory. Mr. Schultz treated the corporation as a mere instrumentality by using corporate funds for his own individual purposes to purchase real estate and a boat slip. The admitted facts also demonstrate that Mr. Schultz harmed GE by using corporate funds as his own even after GE obtained a monetary judgment against Intra-Med. Money that could have been used to satisfy that judgment was used by Mr. Schultz for his own purposes. Finally, not piercing the corporate veil would subject GE to an unjust loss. As previously stated, money that could have been used to satisfy GE’s judgment against Intra-Med was removed from the company and used elsewhere. GE has only been able to recover around $700,000 from a $4.7 million judgment. Piercing the corporate veil appears to be the only method for GE to recover its judgment.

* * * *

For the foregoing reasons we affirm the trial court’s judgment on the pleadings.

QUESTIONS

- Schultz argued that even if the corporate veil should be pierced, the $450,000 judgment against him was too much and should be reduced. How might the court have responded to this argument?
- Suppose that Schultz had turned over the proceeds from the sale of his properties to his corporation, Intra-Med, and used them to pay part or all of GE’s judgment. In this situation, if the funds were insufficient to cover the debt, would the court have pierced the corporate veil to obtain the balance from Schultz personally? Explain.

The Alter-Ego Theory

Sometimes, courts pierce the corporate veil under the theory that the corporation was not operated as a separate entity, but was just another side (or alter ego) of the individual or group who actually controlled the corporation. This is called the alter-ego theory. The theory is applied when a corporation is so dominated and controlled by an individual or group that the separate identities of the person (or group) and the corporation are no longer distinct. Courts use the alter-ego theory to avoid injustice or fraud that would result if wrongdoers were allowed to hide behind the protection of limited liability.

CASE IN POINT Harvey and Barbara Jacobson owned Aqua Clear Technologies, Inc., which installed and serviced home water-softening systems. The Jacobsons consistently took funds out of the business for their personal expenses, including payments for their home, cars, health-insurance premiums, and credit cards. Three weeks after Aqua filed a bankruptcy petition, Harvey formed another corporation called Discount Water Services, Inc. Discount appropriated Aqua’s equipment and inventory (without buying it) and continued to service water-softening systems for Aqua’s customers, even using the same phone number. The trustee appointed to Aqua’s bankruptcy case sought to recover Aqua’s assets on the ground that Discount was Aqua’s alter ego. The court ruled that Discount was simply a continuation of Aqua’s business (its alter ego) under a new name, and therefore held Discount liable for the claims asserted against Aqua in bankruptcy (totaling $108,732.64).¹²

CORPORATE FINANCING

Corporations are financed by the issuance and sale of corporate securities, which include stocks and bonds. Stocks, or equity securities, represent the purchase of ownership in the business firm. Bonds (debentures), or debt securities, represent the borrowing of funds by firms (and governments). Of course, not all debt is in the form of debt securities. For example, some debt is in the form of accounts payable and notes payable, which typically are short-term debts. Bonds are simply a way for corporations to split up their long-term debt so that it can be more easily marketed.

Bonds

Bonds are issued by business firms and by governments at all levels as evidence of the funds they are borrowing from investors. Bonds normally have a designated maturity date—the date when the principal, or face amount, of the bond (or loan) is returned to the investor. They are sometimes referred to as fixed-income securities because their owners (that is, the creditors) receive fixed-dollar interest payments, usually semiannually, during the period of time prior to maturity.

Because debt financing represents a legal obligation on the part of the corporation, various features and terms of a particular bond issue are specified in a lending agreement, called a bond indenture.

A corporate trustee, often a commercial bank trust department, represents the collective well-being of all bondholders in ensuring that the corporation meets the terms of the bond issue. The bond indenture specifies the maturity date of the bond and the pattern of interest payments until maturity.

Stocks

Issuing stocks is another way for corporations to obtain financing [RMBCA 6.01]. The ways in which stocks differ from bonds are summarized in Exhibit 39–2 below.

Exhibit 39–3 on the following page offers a summary of the types of stocks issued by corporations. The two major types are common stock and preferred stock.

COMMON STOCK The true ownership of a corporation is represented by common stock. Common stock provides a proportionate interest in the corporation with regard to (1) control, (2) earnings, and (3) net assets. A shareholder's interest is generally in proportion to the number of shares he or she owns out of the total number of shares issued.

Any person who purchases common stock acquires voting rights—one vote per share held. Voting rights in a corporation apply to the election of the firm's board of directors and to any proposed changes in the ownership structure of the firm. For example, a holder of common stock generally has the right to vote in a decision on a proposed merger, as mergers can change the proportion of ownership.

EXHIBIT 39–2 • How Do Stocks and Bonds Differ?

STOCKS	BONDS
1. Stocks represent ownership.	1. Bonds represent debt.
2. Stocks (common) do not have a fixed dividend rate.	2. Interest on bonds must always be paid, whether or not any profit is earned.
3. Stockholders can elect the board of directors, which controls the corporation.	3. Bondholders usually have no voice in or control over management of the corporation.
4. Stocks do not have a maturity date; the corporation usually does not repay the stockholder.	4. Bonds have a maturity date, when the corporation is to repay the bondholder the face value of the bond.
5. All corporations issue or offer to sell stocks. This is the usual definition of a corporation.	5. Corporations do not necessarily issue bonds.
6. Stockholders have a claim against the property and income of the corporation after all creditors' claims have been met.	6. Bondholders have a claim against the property and income of the corporation that must be met before the claims of stockholders.

EXHIBIT 39-3 • Types of Stocks

TYPE	DEFINITION
Common Stock	Voting shares that represent ownership interest in a corporation. Common stock has the lowest priority with respect to payment of dividends and distribution of assets on the corporation's dissolution.
Preferred Stock	Shares of stock that have priority over common-stock shares as to payment of dividends and distribution of assets on dissolution. Dividend payments are usually a fixed percentage of the face value of the share. Preferred shares may or may not be voting shares.
Cumulative Preferred Stock	Preferred shares on which required dividends not paid in a given year must be paid in a subsequent year before any common-stock dividends can be paid.
Participating Preferred Stock	Preferred shares entitling the owner to receive (1) the preferred-stock dividend and (2) additional dividends after the corporation has paid dividends on common stock.
Convertible Preferred Stock	Preferred shares that, under certain conditions, can be converted into a specified number of common shares either in the issuing corporation or, sometimes, in another corporation.
Redeemable, or Callable, Preferred Stock	Preferred shares issued with the express condition that the issuing corporation has the right to repurchase the shares as specified.

State corporation law specifies the types of actions for which shareholder approval must be obtained.

Firms are not obligated to return a principal amount per share to each holder of common stock because no firm can ensure that the market price per share of its common stock will not decline over time. The issuing firm also does not have to guarantee a dividend; indeed, some corporations never pay dividends.

Holders of common stock are investors who assume a residual position in the overall financial structure of the business. In terms of receiving returns on their investments, they are last in line. They are entitled to the earnings that are left after federal and state taxes are paid and after preferred stockholders, bondholders, suppliers, employees, and other groups have been paid. Once those groups are paid, however, the owners of common stock may be entitled to all the remaining earnings. (The board of directors normally is not under any duty to declare the remaining earnings as dividends, however.)

PREFERRED STOCK Preferred stock is an equity security with preferences. Usually, this means that holders of preferred stock have priority over holders of common stock as to dividends and payment on dissolution of the corporation. The preferences must be stated in the articles of incorporation. Holders of preferred stock may or may not have the right to vote.

Preferred stock is not included among the liabilities of a business because it is equity. Like other equity securities, preferred shares have no fixed maturity date on which the firm must pay them off. Although firms occasionally buy back preferred stock, they are not legally obligated to do so. Investors who hold preferred stock have assumed a rather cautious position in their relationship to the corporation. They have a stronger position than common shareholders with respect to dividends and claims on assets, but they do not share in the full prosperity of the firm if it grows successfully over time. Preferred stockholders receive fixed dividends periodically, however, and they may benefit to some extent from changes in the market price of the shares.

The return and the risk for preferred stock lie somewhere between those for bonds and those for common stock. Preferred stock is more similar to bonds than to common stock, even though preferred stock appears in the ownership section of the firm's balance sheet. As a result, preferred stock is often categorized with corporate bonds as a fixed-income security, even though the legal status is not the same.

Venture Capital and Private Equity Capital

As discussed, corporations traditionally obtain financing through issuing and selling securities (stocks and bonds) in the capital market. Many investors do not want to purchase stock in a business that lacks a track record, however, and banks generally are reluctant to extend loans to high-risk enterprises. Numerous corporations fail because they are undercapitalized. Therefore, to obtain sufficient financing, many entrepreneurs seek alternative financing.

VENTURE CAPITAL Start-up businesses and high-risk enterprises often obtain venture capital financing. Venture capital is capital provided to new business ventures by professional, outside investors (venture capitalists, usually groups of wealthy investors and securities firms). Venture capital investments are high risk—the investors must be willing to lose their invested funds—but offer the potential for well-above-average returns at some point in the future.

To obtain venture capital financing, the start-up business typically gives up a share of its ownership to the venture capitalists. In addition to funding, venture capitalists may provide managerial and technical expertise, and are nearly always given some control over the new company's decisions. Many Internet-based companies, such as Google and Amazon, were initially financed by venture capital.

PRIVATE EQUITY CAPITAL Private equity firms obtain their capital from wealthy investors in private markets. The firms use their private equity capital to invest in existing corporations. Usually, a private equity firm buys an entire corporation and may later reorganize it as a publicly held corporation. Sometimes, divisions of the purchased company are sold off to pay down debt. Ultimately, the private equity firm may sell shares in the reorganized (and perhaps more profitable) company to the public in an initial public offering (usually called an IPO—see Chapter 42). In this way, the private equity firm can make profits by selling its shares in the company to the public.

REVIEWING

Corporate Formation and Financing

William Sharp was the sole shareholder and manager of Chickasaw Club, Inc., an S corporation that operated a popular nightclub of the same name in Columbus, Georgia. Sharp maintained a corporate checking account but paid the club's employees, suppliers, and entertainers in cash out of the club's proceeds. Sharp owned the property on which the club was located. He rented it to the club but made mortgage payments out of the club's proceeds and often paid other personal expenses with Chickasaw corporate funds. At 12:45 A.M. on July 31, eighteen-year-old Aubrey Lynn Pursley, who was already intoxicated, entered the Chickasaw Club. A city ordinance prohibited individuals under the age of twenty-one from entering nightclubs, but Chickasaw employees did not check Pursley's identification to verify her age. Pursley drank more alcohol at Chickasaw and was visibly intoxicated when she left the club at 3:00 A.M. with a beer in her hand. Shortly afterward, Pursley lost control of her car, struck a tree, and was killed. Joseph Dancause, Pursley's stepfather, filed a tort lawsuit in a Georgia state court against Chickasaw Club, Inc., and William Sharp, seeking damages. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Under what theory might the court in this case make an exception to the limited liability of shareholders and hold Sharp personally liable for the damages? What factors would be relevant to the court's decision?
2. Suppose that Chickasaw's articles of incorporation failed to describe the corporation's purpose or management structure as required by state law. Would the court be likely to rule that Sharp is personally liable to Dancause on that basis?
3. Suppose that the club extended credit to its regular patrons in an effort to maintain a loyal clientele, although neither the articles of incorporation nor the corporate bylaws authorized this practice. Would the corporation likely have the power to engage in this activity? Explain.
4. How would the court classify the Chickasaw Club corporation—domestic or foreign, public or private?

 DEBATE THIS: The sole shareholder of an S corporation should not be able to avoid liability for the torts of her or his employees.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

39-1. Incorporation Jonathan, Gary, and Ricardo are active members of a partnership called Swim City. The partnership manufactures, sells, and installs outdoor swimming pools in the states of Arkansas and Texas. The partners want to continue to be active in management and to expand the business into other states as well. They are also concerned about rather large recent judgments entered against swimming pool companies throughout the United States. Based on these facts only, discuss whether the partnership should incorporate.

39-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Preincorporation.

Cummings, Okawa, and Taft are recent college graduates who want to form a corporation to manufacture and sell personal computers. Peterson tells them he will set in motion the formation of their corporation. First, Peterson makes a contract with Owens for the purchase of a piece of land for $20,000. Owens does not know of the prospective corporate formation at the time the contract is signed. Second, Peterson makes a contract with Babcock to build a small plant on the property being purchased. Babcock's contract is conditional on the corporation's formation. Peterson secures all necessary subscription agreements and capitalization, and he files the articles of incorporation.

- Discuss whether the newly formed corporation, Peterson, or both are liable on the contracts with Owens and Babcock.
 - Discuss whether the corporation is automatically liable to Babcock on formation.
- For a sample answer to Question 39-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

39-3. Ultra Vires Doctrine Oya Paka and two business associates formed a corporation called Paka Corp. for the purpose of selling computer services. Oya, who owned 50 percent of the corporate shares, served as the corporation's president. Oya wished to obtain a personal loan from her bank for $250,000, but the bank required the note to be cosigned by a third party. Oya cosigned the note in the name of the corporation. Later, Oya defaulted on the note, and the bank sued the corporation for payment. The corporation asserted, as a defense, that Oya had exceeded her authority when she cosigned the note on behalf of the corporation. Had she? Explain.

39-4. Corporate Powers InterBel Telephone Cooperative, Inc., is a Montana corporation organized under the Montana Rural Electric and Telephone Cooperative Act. This statute limits the purposes of such corporations to providing "adequate telephone service" but adds that this "enumeration . . . shall not be deemed to exclude like or similar objects, purposes, powers, manners, methods, or things." Mooseweb Corp. is an Internet service provider that has been owned and operated by Fred Weber since 1996. Mooseweb provides Web site hosting, modems, computer installation, technical support, and dial-up access to customers in Lincoln County, Montana. InterBel began to offer Internet service in 1999, competing with Mooseweb in Lincoln County. Weber filed a suit in a Montana state court against InterBel, alleging that its Internet service was ultra vires. Both parties filed motions for summary judgment. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [Weber v. InterBel Telephone Cooperative, Inc., 2003 MT 320, 318 Mont. 295, 80 P.3d 88 (2003)]

39-5. Torts and Criminal Acts Greg Allen is an employee, shareholder, and director of Greg Allen Construction Co., and its president. In 1996, Daniel and Sondra Estelle hired Allen's firm to renovate a home they owned in Ladoga, Indiana. To finance the cost, they obtained a line of credit from Banc One, Indiana, which required periodic inspections before it would disburse funds. Allen was on the job every day and supervised all of the work. He designed all of the structural changes, including a floor system for the bedroom over the living room, the floor system of the living room, and the stairway to the second floor. He did all of the electrical, plumbing, and carpentry work and installed all of the windows. He did most of the drywall taping and finishing and most of the painting. The Estelles found much of this work to be unacceptable, and the bank's inspector agreed that it was of poor quality. When Allen failed to act on the Estelles' complaints, they filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Allen Construction and Allen personally, alleging, in part, that his individual work on the project was negligent. Can both Allen and his corporation be held liable for this tort? Explain. [Greg Allen Construction Co. v. Estelle, 798 N.E.2d 171 (Ind. 2004)]

39-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Torts and Criminal Acts.

Thomas Persson and Jon Nokes founded Smart Inventions, Inc., in 1991 to market household consumer products. The success of their first product, the Smart Mop, continued with later products, which were sold through infomercials and other means. Persson and Nokes were the firm's officers and equal shareholders, with Persson responsible for product development and Nokes in charge of day-to-day operations. By 1998, they had become dissatisfied with each other's efforts. Nokes represented the firm as financially "dying," "in a grim state, . . . worse than ever," and offered to buy all of Persson's shares for $1.6 million. Persson accepted. On the day that they signed the agreement to transfer the shares, Smart Inventions began marketing a new product—the Tap Light—that was an instant success, generating millions of dollars in revenues. In negotiating with Persson, Nokes had intentionally kept the Tap Light a secret. Persson filed a suit in a California state court against Smart Inventions and others, asserting fraud and other claims. Under what principle might Smart Inventions be liable for Nokes's fraud? Is Smart Inventions liable in this case? Explain. [Persson v. Smart Inventions, Inc., 125 Cal.App.4th 1141, 23 Cal.Rptr.3d 335 (2 Dist. 2005)]

39-7. Improper Incorporation Denise Rubenstein and Christopher Mayor agreed to form Bayshore Sunrise Corp. (BSC) in New York to rent certain premises and operate a laundromat. BSC entered into a twenty-year commercial lease with Bay Shore Property Trust on April 15, 1999. Mayor signed the lease as the president of BSC. The next day—April 16—BSC's certificate of incorporation was filed with New York's secretary of state. Three years later, BSC defaulted on the lease, which resulted in its termination. Rubenstein and BSC filed a suit in a New York state court against Mayor, his brother-in-law Thomas Castellano, and Planet Laundry, Inc., claiming wrongful interference with a contractual relationship. The plaintiffs alleged that Mayor and Castellano conspired to squeeze Rubenstein out of BSC and arranged the default on the lease so that Mayor and Castellano could form and operate their own business, Planet Laundry, at the same address. The defendants argued that they could not be liable on the plaintiffs' claim because there had never been an enforceable lease—BSC lacked the capacity to enter into contracts on April 15. What theory might Rubenstein and BSC assert to refute this argument? Discuss. [Rubenstein v. Mayor, 41 A.D.3d 826, 839 N.Y.S.2d 170 (2 Dept. 2007)]

39-8. Piercing the Corporate Veil Smith Services, Inc., was a corporation solely owned by Tony Smith. Bear, Inc., owned and operated Laker Express, a fueling station in Kentucky. Smith charged fuel to an account at Laker Express and owed approximately $35,000. There was no written agreement indicating who was liable on the account in the event of default, but all invoices had been issued to Smith Services. Smith later dissolved Smith Services and continued to run his business as a sole proprietorship. When Laker Express sued Smith Services to collect on the debt, there were no assets in the corporation. Laker Express sued Tony Smith personally and asked the court to pierce the corporate veil, claiming that Smith was engaged in fraud and was using the corporate form only to protect himself. The trial court dismissed the case, and Laker Express appealed. Should the court pierce the corporate veil and hold Smith personally liable for the unpaid corporate debt? Why or why not? Or should Laker Express have been more careful when dealing with clients? Explain. [Bear, Inc. v. Smith, 303 S.W.3d 137 (Ky.App. 2010)]

39-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Improper Incorporation.

Mike Lyons incorporated Lyons Concrete, Inc., in Montana, but did not file its first annual report, so the state involuntarily dissolved the firm in 1996. Unaware of the dissolution, Lyons continued to do business as Lyons Concrete. In 2003, he signed a written contract with William Weimar to form and pour a certain amount of concrete on Weimar's property in Lake County for $19,810. Weimar was in a rush to complete the entire project, and he and Lyons orally agreed to additional work on a time-and-materials basis. When scheduling conflicts arose, Weimar had his own employees set some of the forms, which proved deficient. Weimar also directed Lyons to pour concrete in the rain, which undercut its quality. In mid-project, Lyons submitted an invoice for $14,389, which Weimar paid. After the work was complete, Lyons sent Weimar an invoice for $25,731, but he refused to pay, claiming that the $14,389 covered everything. To recover the unpaid amount, Lyons filed a mechanic's lien as "Mike Lyons d/b/a Lyons Concrete, Inc." against Weimar's property. Weimar filed a suit in a Montana state court to strike the lien, and Lyons filed a counterclaim to reassert it. [Weimar v. Lyons, 338 Mont. 242, 164 P.3d 922 (2007)]

- Before the trial, Weimar asked for a change of venue on the ground that a sign on the courthouse lawn advertised "Lyons Concrete." How might the sign affect a trial on the parties' dispute? Should the court grant this request?
- Weimar asked the court to dismiss the counterclaim on the ground that the state had dissolved Lyons Concrete in 1996. Lyons immediately filed new articles of incorporation for "Lyons Concrete, Inc.” Under what doctrine might the court rule that Weimar could not deny the existence of Lyons Concrete? What ethical values underlie this doctrine? Should the court make this ruling?

- (c) At the trial, Weimar argued, in part, that there was no “fixed price” contract between the parties and that even if there were, the poor quality of the work, which required repairs, amounted to a breach, excusing Weimar’s further performance. Should the court rule in Weimar’s favor on this basis?

CHAPTER 40

Corporate Directors, Officers, and Shareholders

A corporation joins together the efforts and resources of a large number of individuals for the purpose of producing greater returns than those persons could have obtained individually. Corporate directors, officers, and shareholders all play different roles within the corporate entity. Sometimes, actions that may benefit the corporation as a whole do not coincide with the separate interests of the individuals making up the corporation. In such situations, it is important to know the rights and duties of all participants in the corporate enterprise. This chapter focuses on these rights and duties and the ways in which conflicts among corporate participants are resolved.

SECTION 1

ROLES OF DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS

The board of directors is the ultimate authority in every corporation. Directors have responsibility for all policymaking decisions necessary to the management of all corporate affairs. Additionally, the directors must act as a body in carrying out routine corporate business. The board selects and removes the corporate officers, determines the capital structure of the corporation, and declares dividends. Each director has one vote, and customarily the majority rules. The general areas of responsibility of the board of directors are shown in Exhibit 40-1 on the following page.

Directors are sometimes inappropriately characterized as agents because they act on behalf of the corporation. No individual director, however, can act as an agent to bind the corporation. As a group, directors collectively control the corporation in a way that no agent is able to control a principal. In addition, although directors occupy positions of trust and control over the corporation, they are not trustees because they do not hold title to property for the use and benefit of others.

Few qualifications are required for directors. Only a handful of states impose minimum age and residency requirements. A director may be a shareholder, but that is not necessary (unless the articles of incorporation or bylaws require ownership interest).

Election of Directors

Subject to statutory limitations, the number of directors is set forth in the corporation's articles or bylaws. Historically, the minimum number of directors has been three, but today many states permit fewer. Normally, the incorporators appoint the first board of directors at the time the corporation is created, or the directors are named in the articles of incorporation. The initial board serves until the first annual shareholders' meeting. Subsequent directors are elected by a majority vote of the shareholders.

A director usually serves for a term of one year—from annual meeting to annual meeting. Most state statutes permit longer and staggered terms. A common practice is to elect one-third of the board members each year for a three-year term. In this way, there is greater management continuity.

REMOVAL OF DIRECTORS A director can be removed for cause—that is, for failing to perform a required duty—either as specified in the articles or bylaws or by shareholder action. The board of directors may also have the power to remove a director for cause, subject to shareholder review. In most states, a director cannot be removed without cause unless the shareholders have reserved the right to do so at the time of election.

EXHIBIT 40-1 • Directors' Management Responsibilities

RESPONSIBILITIES	EXAMPLES
Authorize Major Corporate Policy Decisions	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Oversee major contract negotiations and management-labor negotiations. • Initiate negotiations on the sale or lease of corporate assets outside the regular course of business. • Decide whether to pursue new product lines or business opportunities.
Select and Remove Corporate Officers and Other Managerial Employees, and Determine Their Compensation	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Search for and hire corporate executives and determine the elements of their compensation packages, including stock options. • Supervise managerial employees and make decisions regarding their termination.
Make Financial Decisions	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Make decisions regarding the issuance of authorized shares and bonds. • Decide when to declare dividends to be paid to shareholders.

VACANCIES ON THE BOARD Vacancies occur on the board if a director dies or resigns or when a new position is created through amendment of the articles or bylaws. In these situations, either the shareholders or the board itself can fill the vacant position, depending on state law or on the provisions of the bylaws. Note, however, that even when an election appears to be authorized by the bylaws, a court can invalidate the results if the directors were attempting to manipulate the election in order to reduce the shareholders' influence.

CASE IN POINT The bylaws of Liquid Audio, Inc., authorized a board of five directors, with two directors to be elected each year. Another company offered to buy all of Liquid Audio's stock, but the board rejected this offer. Fearing that the shareholders would elect new directors who would allow the sale, the directors amended the bylaws to increase the number of directors to seven, thereby diminishing the shareholders' influence in the upcoming election. When the shareholders challenged the election, the court ruled that the directors' action was illegal because they had attempted to diminish the shareholders' right to vote effectively in an election of directors.¹

Compensation of Directors

In the past, corporate directors rarely were compensated, but today they are often paid at least nominal sums and may receive more substantial compensation in large corporations because of the time, work, effort, and especially risk involved. Most states permit the corporate articles or bylaws to authorize compensation for directors. In fact, the Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) states that unless the articles or bylaws provide otherwise, the board itself may set the directors' compensation [RMBCA 8.11]. Directors also gain through indirect benefits, such as business contacts and prestige, and other rewards, such as stock options.

In many corporations, directors are also chief corporate officers (president or chief executive officer, for example) and receive compensation in their managerial positions. A director who is also an officer of the corporation is referred to as an inside director, whereas a director who does not hold a management position is an outside director. Typically, a corporation's board of directors includes both inside and outside directors.

Board of Directors' Meetings

The board of directors conducts business by holding formal meetings with recorded minutes. The dates of regular meetings are usually established in the articles or bylaws or by board resolution, and ordinarily no further notice is required. Special meetings can be called, with notice sent to all directors. Today, most states allow directors to participate in board of directors' meetings from remote locations via telephone or Web conferencing, provided that all the directors can simultaneously hear each other during the meeting [RMBCA 8.20].

Normally, a majority of the board of directors must be present to constitute a quorum [RMBCA 8.24]. (A quorum is the minimum number of members of a body of officials or other group that must be present for business to be validly transacted.) Modern incorporation statutes, however, generally permit the articles of incorporation or bylaws to set a quorum at more or less than a majority.²

1. MM Companies, Inc. v. Liquid Audio, Inc., 813 A.2d 1118 (Del.Sup. Ct. 2003).

Once a quorum is present, the directors transact business and vote on issues affecting the corporation. Each director present at the meeting has one vote.³ Ordinary matters generally require a simple majority vote; certain extraordinary issues may require a greater-than-majority vote. In other words, the affirmative vote of a majority of the directors present at a meeting binds the board of directors with regard to most decisions.

Rights of Directors

A corporate director must have certain rights to function properly in that position. The right to participation means that directors are entitled to participate in all board of directors' meetings and have a right to be notified of these meetings. Because the dates of regular board meetings are usually specified in the bylaws, no notice of these meetings is required. If special meetings are called, however, notice is required unless waived by the director [RMBCA 8.23].

A director also has a right of inspection, which means that each director can access the corporation's books and records, facilities, and premises. Inspection rights are essential for directors to make informed decisions and to exercise the necessary supervision over corporate officers and employees. This right of inspection is almost absolute and cannot be restricted (by the articles, bylaws, or any act of the board of directors).

When a director becomes involved in litigation by virtue of her or his position or actions, the director may also have a right to indemnification (reimbursement) for the legal costs, fees, and damages incurred. Most states allow corporations to indemnify and purchase liability insurance for corporate directors [RMBCA 8.51].

Committees of the Board of Directors

When a board of directors has a large number of members and must deal with myriad complex business issues, meetings can become unwieldy. Therefore, the boards of large, publicly held corporations typically create committees, appoint directors to serve on individual committees, and delegate certain tasks to these committees. Committees focus on individual subjects and increase the efficiency of the board. The most common types of committees are discussed next.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE The board members often elect an executive committee to handle interim management decisions between board meetings. The committee is limited to making management decisions about ordinary business matters and conducting preliminary investigations into proposals. It cannot declare dividends, authorize the issuance of shares, amend the bylaws, or initiate any actions that require shareholder approval.

AUDIT COMMITTEE The audit committee is responsible for the selection, compensation, and oversight of the independent public accountants who audit the corporation's financial records. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 requires all publicly held corporations to have an audit committee (as will be discussed in Chapters 42 and 48).

NOMINATING COMMITTEE This committee chooses the candidates for the board of directors that management wishes to submit to the shareholders in the next election. The committee can nominate but cannot select directors to fill vacancies on the board (because only the shareholders can elect directors) [RMBCA 8.25].

COMPENSATION COMMITTEE The compensation committee reviews and decides the salaries, bonuses, stock options, and other benefits that are given to the corporation's top executives. The committee may also determine the compensation of directors.

LITIGATION COMMITTEE This committee decides whether the corporation should pursue requests by shareholders to file a lawsuit against some party that has allegedly harmed the corporation. The committee members investigate the allegations and weigh the costs and benefits of litigation.

In addition to appointing committees, the board of directors can also delegate some of its functions to corporate officers. In doing so, the board is not relieved of its overall responsibility for directing the affairs of the corporation. Instead, corporate officers and managerial personnel are empowered to make decisions relating to ordinary, daily corporate activities within well-defined guidelines.

2. See, for example, Delaware Code Annotated Title 8, Section 141(b); and New York Business Corporation Law Section 707. Both these state statutes allow corporations to set a quorum at less than a majority, but not less than one-third of the directors.

3. Except in Louisiana, which allows a director to vote by proxy under certain circumstances.

Corporate Officers and Executives

The board of directors hires officers and other executive employees. At a minimum, most corporations have a president, one or more vice presidents, a secretary, and a treasurer. In most states, an individual can hold more than one office, such as president and secretary, and can be both an officer and a director of the corporation. In addition to carrying out the duties articulated in the bylaws, corporate and managerial officers act as agents of the corporation, and the ordinary rules of agency (discussed in Chapters 32 and 33) normally apply to their employment.

Corporate officers and other high-level managers are employees of the company, so their rights are defined by employment contracts. Nevertheless, the board of directors normally can remove a corporate officer at any time with or without cause. If the directors remove an officer in violation of the terms of an employment contract, however, the corporation may be liable for breach of contract.

The duties of corporate officers are similar to those of directors because both groups are involved in decision making and are in similar positions of control. Hence, officers and directors are viewed as having the same fiduciary duties of care and loyalty in their conduct of corporate affairs, a subject to which we now turn.

For a synopsis of the roles of directors and officers, see Concept Summary 40.1 below.

DUTIES AND LIABILITIES OF DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS

Directors and officers are deemed to be fiduciaries of the corporation because their relationship with the corporation and its shareholders is one of trust and confidence. As fiduciaries, directors and officers owe ethical—and legal—duties to the corporation and

CONCEPT SUMMARY 40.1

Roles of Directors and Officers

Aspect	Description
Election of Directors	The incorporators usually appoint the first board of directors; thereafter, shareholders elect the directors. Directors usually serve a one-year term, although the term can be longer. Few qualifications are required; a director can be a shareholder but is not required to be. Compensation usually is specified in the corporate articles or bylaws.
Board of Directors' Meetings	The board of directors conducts business by holding formal meetings with recorded minutes. The dates of regular meetings are usually established in the corporate articles or bylaws; special meetings can be called, with notice sent to all directors. Usually, a quorum is a majority of the corporate directors. Once a quorum is present, each director has one vote, and the majority normally rules in ordinary matters.
Rights of Directors	Directors' rights include the rights of participation, inspection, compensation, and indemnification.
Board of Directors' Committees	Directors may appoint committees and delegate some of their responsibilities to the committees and to corporate officers and executives. For example, directors commonly appoint an executive committee , which handles ordinary, interim management decisions between board of directors' meetings. Directors might also appoint an audit committee to hire and supervise the independent public accountants who audit the corporation's financial records.
Role of Corporate Officers and Executives	The board of directors normally hires the corporate officers and other executive employees. In most states, a person can hold more than one office and can be both an officer and a director of a corporation. The rights of corporate officers and executives are defined by employment contracts.

the shareholders as a whole. These fiduciary duties include the duty of care and the duty of loyalty.

Duty of Care

Directors and officers must exercise due care in performing their duties. The standard of due care has been variously described in judicial decisions and codified in many state corporation codes. Generally, a director or officer is required to act in good faith, to exercise the care that an ordinarily prudent (careful) person would exercise in similar circumstances, and to do what she or he believes is in the best interests of the corporation [RMBCA 8.30(a), 8.42(a)]. Directors and officers whose failure to exercise due care results in harm to the corporation or its shareholders can be held liable for negligence (unless the business judgment rule applies, as will be discussed shortly).

DUTY TO MAKE INFORMED DECISIONS Directors and officers are expected to be informed on corporate matters and to conduct a reasonable investigation of the situation before making a decision. This means that they must do what is necessary to keep adequately informed: attend meetings and presentations, ask for information from those who have it, read reports, and review other written materials. In other words, directors and officers must investigate, study, and discuss matters and evaluate alternatives before making a decision. They cannot decide on the spur of the moment without adequate research.

Although directors and officers are expected to act in accordance with their own knowledge and training, they are also normally entitled to rely on information given to them by certain other persons. Most states and Section 8.30(b) of the RMBCA allow a director to make decisions in reliance on information furnished by competent officers or employees, professionals such as attorneys and accountants, and committees of the board of directors (on which the director does not serve). The reliance must be in good faith, of course, to insulate a director from liability if the information later proves to be inaccurate or unreliable.

DUTY TO EXERCISE REASONABLE SUPERVISION

Directors are also expected to exercise a reasonable amount of supervision when they delegate work to corporate officers and employees. Suppose that Dale, a corporate bank director, fails to attend any board of directors' meetings for five years. In addition, Dale never inspects any of the corporate books or records and generally fails to supervise the activities of the bank president and the loan committee. Meanwhile,

Brennan, the bank president, who is a corporate officer, makes various improper loans and permits large overdrafts. In this situation, Dale (the corporate director) can be held liable to the corporation for losses resulting from the unsupervised actions of the bank president and the loan committee.

DISSENTING DIRECTORS Directors are expected to attend board of directors' meetings, and their votes should be entered into the minutes. Sometimes, an individual director disagrees with the majority's vote (which becomes an act of the board of directors). Unless a dissent is entered in the minutes, the director is presumed to have assented. If a decision later leads to the directors' being held liable for mismanagement, dissenting directors are rarely held individually liable to the corporation. For this reason, a director who is absent from a given meeting sometimes registers a dissent with the secretary of the board regarding actions taken at the meeting.

The Business Judgment Rule

Directors and officers are expected to exercise due care and to use their best judgment in guiding corporate management, but they are not insurers of business success. Under the business judgment rule, a corporate director or officer will not be liable to the corporation or to its shareholders for honest mistakes of judgment and bad business decisions. Courts give significant deference to the decisions of corporate directors and officers, and consider the reasonableness of a decision at the time it was made, without the benefit of hindsight. Thus, corporate decision makers are not subjected to second-guessing by shareholders or others in the corporation.

The business judgment rule will apply as long as the following occurred:

1. The director or officer took reasonable steps to become informed about the matter.
2. He or she had a rational basis for the decision.
3. There was no conflict of interest between the director's or officer's personal interest and that of the corporation.

In fact, unless there is evidence of bad faith, fraud, or a clear breach of fiduciary duties, most courts will apply the rule and protect directors and officers who make bad business decisions from liability for those choices. Consequently, if there is a reasonable basis for a business decision, a court is unlikely to interfere with that decision, even if the corporation suffers as a result. Note also that as a practical matter, corporate officers face liability more often than directors under this rule because they work at the corporation every day, whereas directors meet once a month or less. But does the business judgment rule ever provide too much protection for corporate decision makers? See this chapter's Insight into Ethics feature below for a discussion of this issue.

Duty of Loyalty

Loyalty can be defined as faithfulness to one's obligations and duties. In the corporate context, the duty of loyalty requires directors and officers to subordinate their personal interests to the welfare of the corporation. For instance, a director should not oppose a transaction that is in the corporation's best interest simply because pursuing it may cost the director her or his position. Directors cannot use corporate funds or confidential corporate information for personal advantage and must refrain from self-dealing. Cases dealing with the duty of loyalty typically involve one or more of the following:

1. Competing with the corporation.
2. Usurping (taking personal advantage of) a corporate opportunity.
3. Having an interest that conflicts with that of the corporation.
4. Using information that is not available to the public to make a profit trading securities (see insider trading on page 820).
5. Authorizing a corporate transaction that is detrimental to minority shareholders.
6. Selling control over the corporation.

The following classic case illustrates the conflict that can arise between a corporate official's personal interest and his or her duty of loyalty.

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

Is the Business Judgment Rule Overly Protective?

The business judgment rule generally insulates corporate decision makers from liability for bad decisions even though this may seem to contradict the goal of greater corporate accountability. Is the rule fair to shareholders?

Citigroup—An Example

In 2009, a Delaware court ruled against shareholders of Citigroup, Inc., who claimed that the bank's directors had breached their fiduciary duties. The shareholders alleged that the directors had caused Citigroup to continue to engage in subprime lending (see Chapter 31) despite the steady decline of the housing market, the dramatic increase in foreclosures, the collapse of other subprime lenders, and other red flags that should have warned Citigroup to change its practices.

The shareholders claimed that the directors' failure to adequately protect the corporation's exposure to risk given these warning signs was a breach of their duties and resulted in significant losses to Citigroup. The court, however, found that "the warning signs alleged by plaintiffs are not evidence that the directors consciously disregarded their duties or otherwise acted in bad faith; at most they evidence that the directors made bad business decisions."^a Thus, under the business judgment rule, the court dismissed the shareholders' claims of breach of fiduciary duty. The court, however, did allow the shareholders to maintain a claim for waste based on the directors' approval of a compensation package for the company's chief executive officer.

Lyondell Chemical—Another Example

Another 2009 case also involved the business judgment rule. Early in 2007, a foreign firm had announced its intention to acquire Lyondell Chemical Company. Over the next several months, Lyondell's directors did nothing to prepare for a possible merger. They failed to research Lyondell's market value and made no attempt to seek out other potential buyers. The $13 billion cash merger was negotiated and finalized in less than one week in July 2007.

At that time, the directors met for a total of only seven hours to discuss the transaction. Shortly afterward, shareholders filed a lawsuit alleging that the directors had breached their fiduciary duties by failing to maximize the sale price of the corporation. Nevertheless, the Delaware Supreme Court ruled that the directors were protected by the business judgment rule.^b

INSIGHT INTO THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT

If courts were to ignore the business judgment rule, what might the consequences be?

b. Lyondell Chemical Co. v. Ryan, 970 A.2d 235 (Del.Sup.Ct. 2009).

CASE 40.1 Guth v. Loft, Inc.

Supreme Court of Delaware, 23 Del.Ch. 255, 5 A.2d 503 (1939).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Loft, Inc., made and sold candies, syrups, beverages, and food from its offices and plant in Long Island City, New York. Loft operated 115 retail outlets in several states and also sold its products wholesale. Charles Guth was Loft's president. Guth and his family owned Grace Company, which made syrups for soft drinks in a plant in Baltimore, Maryland. Coca-Cola Company supplied Loft with cola syrup. Unhappy with what he felt was Coca-Cola's high price, Guth entered into an agreement with Roy Megargel to acquire the trademark and formula for Pepsi-Cola and form Pepsi-Cola Corporation. Neither Guth nor Megargel could finance the new venture, however, and Grace was insolvent. Without the knowledge of Loft's board, Guth used Loft's capital, credit, facilities, and employees to further the Pepsi enterprise. At Guth's direction, Loft made the concentrate for the syrup, which was sent to Grace to add sugar and water. Loft charged Grace for the concentrate but allowed forty months' credit. Grace charged Pepsi for the syrup but also granted substantial credit. Grace sold the syrup to Pepsi's customers, including Loft, which paid on delivery or within thirty days. Loft also paid for Pepsi's advertising. Finally, losing profits at its stores as a result of switching from Coca-Cola, Loft filed a suit in a Delaware state court against Guth, Grace, and Pepsi, seeking their Pepsi stock and an accounting. The court entered a judgment in the plaintiff's favor. The defendants appealed to the Delaware Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

LAYTON, Chief Justice, delivering the opinion of the court:

* * * *

Corporate officers and directors are not permitted to use their position of trust and confidence to further their private interests. * * * They stand in a fiduciary relation to the corporation and its stockholders. A public policy, existing through the years, and derived from a profound knowledge of human characteristics and motives, has established a rule that demands of a corporate officer or director, peremptorily [not open for debate] and inexorably [unavoidably], the most scrupulous observance of his duty, not only affirmatively to protect the interests of the corporation committed to his charge, but also to refrain from doing anything that would work injury to the corporation * * *. The rule that requires an undivided and unselfish loyalty to the corporation demands that there shall be no conflict between duty and self-interest. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * If there is presented to a corporate officer or director a business opportunity which the corporation is financially able to undertake [that] is * * * in the line of the corporation's business and is of practical advantage to it * * * and, by embracing the opportunity, the self-interest of the officer or director will be brought into conflict with that of his corporation, the law will not permit him to seize the opportunity for himself. * * * In such circumstances, * * * the corporation may elect to claim all of the benefits of the transaction for itself, and the law will impress a trust in favor of the corporation upon the property, interests and profits so acquired. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * The appellants contend that no conflict of interest between Guth and Loft resulted from his acquirement and exploitation of the Pepsi-Cola opportunity [and] that the acquisition did not place Guth in competition with Loft * * *. [In this case, however,] Guth was Loft, and Guth was Pepsi. He absolutely controlled Loft. His authority over Pepsi was supreme. As Pepsi, he created and controlled the supply of Pepsi-Cola syrup, and he determined the price and the terms. What he offered, as Pepsi, he had the power, as Loft, to accept. Upon any consideration of human characteristics and motives, he created a conflict between self-interest and duty. He made himself the judge in his own cause. * * * Moreover, a reasonable probability of injury to Loft resulted from the situation forced upon it. Guth was in the same position to impose his terms upon Loft as had been the Coca-Cola Company.

CASE CONTINUES ►

CASE 40.1 CONTINUED ♦ * * * The facts and circumstances demonstrate that Guth's appropriation of the Pepsi-Cola opportunity to himself placed him in a competitive position with Loft with respect to a commodity essential to it, thereby rendering his personal interests incompatible with the superior interests of his corporation; and this situation was accomplished, not openly and with his own resources, but secretly and with the money and facilities of the corporation which was committed to his protection.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Delaware Supreme Court upheld the judgment of the lower court. The state supreme court was "convinced that the opportunity to acquire the Pepsi-Cola trademark and formula, goodwill and business belonged to [Loft], and that Guth, as its President, had no right to appropriate the opportunity to himself."

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that Loft's board of directors had approved Pepsi-Cola's use of its personnel and equipment. Would the court's decision have been different? Discuss.

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY'S LAW • This early Delaware decision was one of the first to set forth a test for determining when a corporate officer or director has breached the duty of loyalty. The test has two basic parts—whether the opportunity was reasonably related to the corporation's line of business, and whether the corporation was financially able to undertake the opportunity. The court also considered whether the corporation had an interest or expectancy in the opportunity and recognized that when the corporation had "no interest or expectancy, the officer or director is entitled to treat the opportunity as his own."

Disclosure of Potential Conflicts of Interest

Corporate directors often have many business affiliations, and a director may sit on the board of more than one corporation. Of course, directors are precluded from entering into or supporting businesses that operate in direct competition with corporations on whose boards they serve. Their fiduciary duty requires them to make a full disclosure of any potential conflicts of interest that might arise in any corporate transaction [RMBCA 8.60].

Sometimes, a corporation enters into a contract or engages in a transaction in which an officer or director has a personal interest. The director or officer must make a full disclosure of the nature of the conflicting interest and all facts pertinent to the transaction, and must abstain from voting on the proposed transaction.

For example, Ballo Corporation needs office space. Stephanie Colson, one of its five directors, owns the building adjoining the corporation's headquarters. Colson can negotiate a lease for the space to Ballo if she fully discloses her conflicting interest and any facts known to her about the proposed transaction to Ballo and the other four directors. If the lease arrangement is fair and reasonable, Colson abstains from voting on it, and the other members of the corporation's board of directors unanimously approve it, the contract is valid. The rule is one of reason. Otherwise, directors would be prevented from ever having financial dealings with the corporations they serve.

Liability of Directors and Officers

Directors and officers are exposed to liability on many fronts. They can be held liable for negligence in certain circumstances, as previously discussed. They may also be held liable for the crimes and torts committed by themselves or by corporate employees under their supervision, as discussed in Chapters 9, 33, and 39.

Additionally, if shareholders perceive that the corporate directors are not acting in the best interests of the corporation, they may sue the directors, in what is called a shareholder's derivative suit, on behalf of the corporation. (This type of action will be discussed later in this chapter, in the context of shareholders' rights.) Directors and officers can also be held personally liable under a number of statutes, such as statutes enacted to protect consumers or the environment (see Chapters 45 and 46).

See Concept Summary 40.2 on the facing page for a review of the duties and liabilities of directors and officers.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 40.2

Duties and Liabilities of Directors and Officers

Aspect	Description
Duties of Directors and Officers	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Duty of care—Directors and officers are obligated to act in good faith, to use prudent business judgment in the conduct of corporate affairs, and to act in the corporation’s best interests. If a director or officer fails to exercise this duty of care, he or she may be answerable to the corporation and to the shareholders for breaching the duty. The business judgment rule immunizes a director from liability for a corporate decision as long as it was within the power of the corporation and the authority of the director to make and was an informed, reasonable, and loyal decision. 2. Duty of loyalty—Directors and officers have a fiduciary duty to subordinate their own interests to those of the corporation in matters relating to the corporation. 3. Conflicts of interest—To fulfill their duty of loyalty, directors and officers must make a full disclosure of any potential conflicts between their personal interests and those of the corporation.
Liability of Directors and Officers	Corporate directors and officers are personally liable for their own torts and crimes (when not protected under the business judgment rule). Additionally, they may be held personally liable for the torts and crimes committed by corporate personnel under their direct supervision (see Chapters 9, 33, and 39). They may also be held personally liable for violating certain statutes, such as environmental and consumer protection laws, and can sometimes be sued by shareholders for mismanaging the corporation.

THE ROLE OF SHAREHOLDERS

The acquisition of a share of stock makes a person an owner and a shareholder in a corporation. Shareholders thus own the corporation. Although they have no legal title to corporate property, such as buildings and equipment, they do have an equitable (ownership) interest in the firm.

As a general rule, shareholders have no responsibility for the daily management of the corporation, although they are ultimately responsible for choosing the board of directors, which does have such control. Ordinarily, corporate officers and other employees owe no direct duty to individual shareholders (unless some contract or special relationship exists between them in addition to the corporate relationship). Their duty is to act in the best interests of the corporation and its shareholder-owners as a whole. In turn, as you will read later in this chapter, controlling shareholders owe a fiduciary duty to minority shareholders.

In this section, we look at the powers of shareholders, which may be established in the articles of incorporation and under the state’s general corporation law.

Shareholders’ Powers

Shareholders must approve fundamental changes affecting the corporation before the changes can be implemented. Hence, shareholder approval normally is required to amend the articles of incorporation or bylaws, to conduct a merger or dissolve the corporation, and to sell all or substantially all of the corporation’s assets. Some of these powers are subject to prior board approval. Shareholder approval may also be requested (though it is not required) for certain other actions, such as to approve an independent auditor.

Shareholders also have the power to vote to elect or remove members of the board of directors. As described earlier, the first board of directors is either named in the articles of incorporation or chosen by the incorporators to serve until the first shareholders’ meeting. From that time on, selection and retention of directors are exclusively shareholder functions.

Directors usually serve their full terms; if the shareholders judge them unsatisfactory, they are simply not reelected. Shareholders have the inherent power, however, to remove a director from office for cause (breach of duty or misconduct) by a majority vote.⁴ As noted earlier in this chapter, some state

4. A director can often demand court review of removal for cause, however.

statutes (and some articles of incorporation) permit removal of directors without cause by the vote of a majority of the shareholders entitled to vote.⁵

Shareholders' Meetings

Shareholders' meetings must occur at least annually. In addition, special meetings can be called to deal with urgent matters.

NOTICE OF MEETINGS A corporation must notify its shareholders of the date, time, and place of an annual or special shareholders' meeting at least ten days, but not more than sixty days, before the meeting date [RMBCA 7.05].⁶ (The date and time of the annual meeting can be specified in the bylaws.) Notice of a special meeting must include a statement of the purpose of the meeting, and business transacted at the meeting is limited to that purpose. The RMBCA does not specify how the notice must be given (such as by mail or e-mail), but most corporations specify in their bylaws the acceptable methods of notifying shareholders about meetings. Also, some states' incorporation statutes outline the means of notice that a corporation can use in that jurisdiction. For example, in Alaska, notice may be given in person, by mail, or by various electronic transmission methods—including fax, e-mail, blog, or Web post—as long as the shareholder has agreed to that electronic method.⁷

PROXIES It usually is not practical for owners of only a few shares of stock of publicly traded corporations to attend a shareholders' meeting. Therefore, the law allows stockholders to appoint another person as their agent to vote their shares at the meeting. The signed appointment form or electronic transmission authorizing an agent to vote the shares is called a proxy (from the Latin procurare, meaning "to manage or take care of").

Management often solicits proxies, but any person can do so to concentrate voting power. Groups of shareholders have used proxies as a device for taking over a corporation (corporate takeovers will be discussed in Chapter 41). Proxies normally are revocable (can be withdrawn), unless they are specifically designated as irrevocable and coupled with an interest (such as when the person receiving the proxies from shareholders has agreed to buy their shares). Under RMBCA 7.22(c), proxies are valid for eleven months, unless the proxy agreement mandates a longer period.

SHAREHOLDER PROPOSALS When shareholders want to change a company policy, they can put their ideas up for a shareholder vote. They do this by submitting a shareholder proposal to the board of directors and asking the board to include the proposal in the proxy materials that are sent to all shareholders before meetings.

The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), which regulates the purchase and sale of securities (see Chapter 42), has special provisions relating to proxies and shareholder proposals. SEC Rule 14a-8 provides that all shareholders who own stock worth at least $1,000 are eligible to submit proposals for inclusion in corporate proxy materials. The corporation is required to include information on whatever proposals will be considered at the shareholders' meeting along with proxy materials. Only those proposals that relate to significant policy considerations, not ordinary business operations, must be included.

Under the SEC's e-proxy rules,⁸ all public companies must post their proxy materials on the Internet and notify shareholders how to find that information. Although the law requires proxy materials to be posted online, public companies may still choose among several options—including paper documents or a DVD sent by mail—for actually delivering the materials to shareholders.

Shareholder Voting

Shareholders exercise ownership control through the power of their votes. Corporate business matters are presented in the form of resolutions, which shareholders vote to approve or disapprove. Unless there is a provision to the contrary, each common shareholder is entitled to one vote per share, although the voting techniques discussed next enhance the power of the shareholder's vote. The articles of incorporation can exclude or limit voting rights, particularly

5. Most states allow cumulative voting (see facing page) for directors. If cumulative voting is authorized, a director may not be removed if the number of votes against removal would be sufficient to elect a director under cumulative voting. See, for example, California Corporations Code Section 303A. See also Section 8.08(c) of the RMBCA.

6. The shareholder can waive the requirement of notice by signing a waiver form [RMBCA 7.06]. A shareholder who does not receive notice but who learns of the meeting and attends without protesting the lack of notice is said to have waived notice by such conduct.

7. Alaska Statutes Section 10.06.410 Notice of Shareholders' Meetings.

8. 17 C.F.R. Parts 240, 249, and 274.

for certain classes of shares. For example, owners of preferred shares are usually denied the right to vote [RMBCA 7.21]. If a state statute requires specific voting procedures, the corporation's articles or bylaws must be consistent with the statute.

QUORUM REQUIREMENTS For shareholders to act during a meeting, a quorum must be present. Generally, a quorum exists when shareholders holding more than 50 percent of the outstanding shares are present, but state laws often permit the articles of incorporation to set higher or lower quorum requirements. In some states, obtaining the unanimous written consent of shareholders is a permissible alternative to holding a shareholders' meeting [RMBCA 7.25].

Once a quorum is present, voting can proceed. A straight majority vote of the shares represented at the meeting is usually required to pass resolutions. Assume that Novo Pictures, Inc., has 10,000 outstanding shares of voting stock. Its articles of incorporation set the quorum at 50 percent of outstanding shares and provide that a majority vote of the shares present is necessary to pass ordinary matters. Therefore, for this firm, at the shareholders' meeting, a quorum of stockholders representing 5,000 outstanding shares must be present to conduct business, and a vote of at least 2,501 of those shares is needed to pass ordinary resolutions. Thus, if 6,000 shares are represented, a vote of 3,001 will be necessary.

At times, more than a simple majority vote will be required either by statute or by the articles of incorporation. Extraordinary corporate matters, such as a merger, a consolidation, or dissolution of the corporation (see Chapter 41), require a higher percentage of all corporate shares entitled to vote, not just a majority of those present at that particular meeting [RMBCA 7.27].

VOTING LISTS The RMBCA requires a corporation to maintain an alphabetical voting list of shareholders. The corporation prepares the voting list before each shareholders' meeting. Ordinarily, only persons whose names appear on the corporation's stockholder records as owners are entitled to vote.⁹ The voting list contains the name and address of each shareholder as shown on the corporate records on a given cutoff date, or record date. (Under RMBCA 7.07, the bylaws or board of directors may fix a record date that is as much as seventy days before the meeting.) The voting list also includes the number of voting shares held by each owner. The list is usually kept at the corporate headquarters and must be made available for shareholder inspection [RMBCA 7.20].

CUMULATIVE VOTING Most states permit, and many require, shareholders to elect directors by cumulative voting, a voting method designed to allow minority shareholders to be represented on the board of directors.¹⁰ With cumulative voting, each shareholder is entitled to a total number of votes equal to the number of board members to be elected multiplied by the number of voting shares that the shareholder owns. The shareholder can cast all of these votes for one candidate or split them among several nominees for director. All nominees stand for election at the same time. When cumulative voting is not required by statute or under the articles, the entire board can be elected by a majority of shares at a shareholders' meeting.

Suppose that a corporation has 10,000 shares issued and outstanding. The minority shareholders hold 3,000 shares, and the majority shareholders hold the other 7,000 shares. Three members of the board are to be elected. The majority shareholders' nominees are Alvarez, Beasley, and Caravel. The minority shareholders' nominee is Dovrik. Can Dovrik be elected to the board by the minority shareholders?

If cumulative voting is allowed, the answer is yes. The minority shareholders have 9,000 votes among them (the number of directors to be elected times the number of shares, or $3 \times 3,000 = 9,000$ votes). All of these votes can be cast to elect Dovrik. The majority shareholders have 21,000 votes ($3 \times 7,000 = 21,000$ votes), but these votes must be distributed among their three nominees. The result of cumulative voting is that no matter how the majority shareholders cast their 21,000 votes, they will not be able to elect all three directors if the minority shareholders cast all of their 9,000 votes for Dovrik, as illustrated in Exhibit 40-2 on the next page.

9. When the legal owner is deceased, bankrupt, mentally incompetent, or in some other way under a legal disability, his or her vote can be cast by a person designated by law to control and manage the owner's property.

10. See, for example, California Corporations Code Section 708. Some states, such as Nebraska, require cumulative voting in their state constitutions. Under RMBCA 7.28, no cumulative voting rights exist unless the articles of incorporation so provide.

EXHIBIT 40-2 • Results of Cumulative Voting

2	9,001	9,000	2,999	9,000	Alvarez, Beasley, Dovrik
3	6,000	7,000	8,000	9,000	Beasley, Caravel, Dovrik

OTHER VOTING TECHNIQUES A group of shareholders can agree in writing prior to a shareholders' meeting, in a shareholder voting agreement, to vote their shares together in a specified manner. Such agreements usually are held to be valid and enforceable. A shareholder can also appoint a voting agent and vote by proxy, as mentioned previously.

Another technique is for shareholders to enter into a voting trust. A voting trust is an agreement (a trust contract) under which a shareholder assigns the right to vote his or her shares to a trustee, usually for a specified period of time. The trustee is then responsible for voting the shares on behalf of all the shareholders in the trust. The shareholder retains all rights of ownership (for example, the right to receive dividend payments) except the power to vote the shares [RMBCA 7.30].

Although shareholders are free to make voting agreements among themselves and with management, corporate managers must be careful that such agreements do not constitute a breach of their fiduciary duties. Agreements regarding voting must be in the corporation's best interests, or the corporate officers and directors can be sued.

CASE IN POINT Several shareholders of Cryo-Cell International, Inc., mounted a proxy contest in an effort to replace the board of directors. Another stockholder, Andrew Filipowski, agreed to support management in exchange for being included in management's slate of directors. The company's chief executive officer, Mercedes Walton, secretly promised Filipowski that if management's slate won, the board of directors would add another board seat to be filled by a Filipowski designee. After management won the election, Walton prepared to add Filipowski's designee to the board. When the dissident shareholders challenged the election results, the court held that the board's actions and Walton's secret agreement constituted serious breaches of fiduciary duty that tainted the election. The court therefore ordered a new election to be held.¹¹

RIGHTS OF SHAREHOLDERS

Shareholders possess numerous rights. A significant right—the right to vote their shares—has already been discussed. We look at some additional rights of shareholders in the following subsections.

Stock Certificates

In the past, corporations commonly issued stock certificates that evidenced ownership of a specified number of shares in the corporation. Today, however, most shares of stock are uncertificated—that is, no actual, physical stock certificates are issued [RMBCA 6.26]. Instead, the corporation keeps an official record of its shareholders and may send each of them a letter or other notice that contains the pertinent information that formerly was included on the face of stock certificates.

Stock is intangible personal property, and the ownership right has always existed independently of any stock certificate. Thus, if a stock certificate was lost or destroyed, ownership was not destroyed with it. A new certificate could be issued to replace the one that was lost or destroyed. Notice of shareholders' meetings, dividends, and operational and financial reports are all distributed according to the recorded ownership listed in the corporation's books, not on the basis of possession of a certificate.

Preemptive Rights

Sometimes, the articles of incorporation grant preemptive rights to shareholders. With preemptive rights, a shareholder receives a preference over all other purchasers to subscribe to or purchase a pro-rated share of a new issue of stock. In other words, the shareholder can purchase a percentage of the new shares that is equal to his or her current percentage of ownership in the corporation. Under RMBCA 6.30, preemptive rights do not exist unless provided for in the articles of incorporation. Preemptive rights do not apply to treasury shares—shares that are authorized and issued but are no longer outstanding because they have been redeemed (purchased back) by the corporation.

THE PURPOSE OF PREEMPTIVE RIGHTS Preemptive rights allow each shareholder to maintain her or his proportionate control, voting power, or financial interest in the corporation. Generally, preemptive rights apply only to additional, newly issued stock sold for cash, and the preemptive rights must be exercised within a specified time period, which usually is thirty days.

For example, Tron Corporation authorizes and issues 1,000 shares of stock, and Omar Loren purchases 100 shares, making him the owner of 10 percent of the company's stock. Subsequently, Tron, by vote of its shareholders, authorizes the issuance of another 1,000 shares (by amending the articles of incorporation). This increases its capital stock to a total of 2,000 shares. If preemptive rights have been provided, Loren can purchase one additional share of the new stock being issued for each share he already owns—or 100 additional shares. Thus, he can own 200 of the 2,000 shares outstanding, and his relative position as a shareholder will be maintained. If preemptive rights are not reserved, his proportionate control and voting power will be diluted from that of a 10 percent shareholder to that of a 5 percent shareholder because the additional 1,000 shares were issued.

PREEMPTIVE RIGHTS IN CLOSELY HELD CORPORATIONS Preemptive rights are most important in closely held corporations because each shareholder owns a relatively small number of shares but controls a substantial interest in the corporation. Without preemptive rights, it would be possible for a shareholder to lose his or her proportionate control over the firm. Nevertheless, preemptive rights can hinder a corporation from raising capital from new, outside investors who can provide needed expertise as well as capital.

Stock Warrants

Stock warrants are rights to buy stock at a stated price by a specified date that are given by the company. Usually, when preemptive rights exist and a corporation is issuing additional shares, it gives its shareholders stock warrants. Warrants are often publicly traded on securities exchanges.

Dividends

A dividend is a distribution of corporate profits or income ordered by the directors and paid to the shareholders in proportion to their respective shares in the corporation. Dividends can be paid in cash, property, stock of the corporation that is paying the dividends, or stock of other corporations.¹²

State laws vary, but each state determines the general circumstances and legal requirements under which dividends are paid. State laws also control the sources of revenue to be used; only certain funds are legally available for paying dividends. Once declared, a cash dividend becomes a corporate debt enforceable at law like any other debt. Depending on state law, dividends may be paid from the following sources:

1. Retained earnings. All states allow dividends to be paid from the undistributed net profits earned by the corporation, including capital gains from the sale of fixed assets. As mentioned in Chapter 39, the undistributed net profits are called retained earnings.
2. Net profits. A few states allow dividends to be issued from current net profits without regard to deficits in prior years.
3. Surplus. A number of states allow dividends to be paid out of any kind of surplus.

ILLEGAL DIVIDENDS Sometimes, dividends are improperly paid from an unauthorized account, or their payment causes the corporation to become insolvent. Generally, shareholders must return illegal dividends only if they knew that the dividends were illegal when the payment was received (or if the dividends were paid when the corporation was insolvent). Whenever dividends are illegal or improper, the board of directors can be held personally liable for the amount of the payment.

THE DIRECTORS' FAILURE TO DECLARE A DIVIDEND

When directors fail to declare a dividend, shareholders can ask a court to compel the directors to meet and declare a dividend. To succeed, the shareholders must show that the directors have acted so unreasonably in withholding the dividend that their conduct is an abuse of their discretion.

Often, a corporation accumulates large cash reserves for a legitimate corporate purpose, such as expansion or research. The mere fact that the firm has sufficient earnings or surplus available to pay a dividend normally is not enough to compel the directors to distribute funds that, in the board's opinion, should not be distributed.¹³ The courts are reluctant to interfere with corporate operations and will not compel directors to declare dividends unless abuse of discretion is clearly shown.

12. On one occasion, a distillery declared and paid a dividend in bonded whiskey.
13. A striking exception to this rule was made in Dodge v. Ford Motor Co., 204 Mich. 459, 170 N.W. 668 (1919), when Henry Ford, the president and major stockholder of Ford Motor Company, refused to declare a dividend notwithstanding the firm's large capital surplus. The court, holding that Ford had abused his discretion, ordered the company to declare a dividend.

Inspection Rights

Shareholders in a corporation enjoy both common law and statutory inspection rights. The RMBCA provides that every shareholder is entitled to examine specified corporate records, including voting lists [RMBCA 7.20, 16.02]. The shareholder's right of inspection is limited, however, to the inspection and copying of corporate books and records for a proper purpose, and the request to inspect must be made in advance. The shareholder may inspect in person, or an attorney, accountant, or other authorized assistant can do so as the shareholder's agent.

The power of inspection is fraught with potential abuses, and the corporation is allowed to protect itself from them. For example, a shareholder can properly be denied access to corporate records to prevent harassment or to protect trade secrets or other confidential corporate information.¹⁴ Some states require that a shareholder must have held her or his shares for a minimum period of time immediately preceding the demand to inspect or must hold a minimum number of outstanding shares. A shareholder who is denied the right of inspection can seek a court order to compel the inspection.

CASE IN POINT Craig Johnson was the sole officer and director and the majority shareholder of Distributed Solutions, Inc. (DSI), which provided consulting services, including payroll services. Jeffrey Hagen was a minority shareholder. Johnson sold DSI's payroll services to himself and set up another payroll services company. Although DSI revenues had been $739,034 and $934,532 the two previous years, the following year all of DSI's assets were sold. Johnson told Hagen that he was dissolving the firm because it conducted no business and had no future prospects. Hagen asked to inspect the corporate records so that he could determine DSI's financial condition, the value of its stock, and whether any misconduct had occurred. When there was no response, Hagen filed a lawsuit to compel the inspection. An Illinois appellate court found that Hagen had shown a proper purpose and allowed him access to DSI's records.¹⁵

14. See, for example, Disney v. Walt Disney Co., 857 A.2d 444 (Del. Ch. 2004).

15. Hagen v. Distributed Solutions, Inc., 328 Ill.App.3d 132, 764 N.E.2d 1141, 262 Ill.Dec. 24 (1 Dist. 2002).

Transfer of Shares

Corporate stock represents an ownership right in intangible personal property. The law generally recognizes the right of an owner to transfer property to another person unless there are valid restrictions on its transferability. When shares are transferred, a new entry is made in the corporate stock book to indicate the new owner. Until the corporation is notified and the entry is complete, all rights—including voting rights, notice of shareholders' meetings, and the right to dividend distributions—remain with the current record owner.

Rights on Dissolution

When a corporation is dissolved and its outstanding debts and the claims of its creditors have been satisfied, the remaining assets are distributed to the shareholders in proportion to the percentage of shares owned by each shareholder. The articles of incorporation may provide that certain classes of preferred stock will be given priority. If no class of stock has been given preference in the distribution of assets, all of the stockholders share the remaining assets. (See Chapter 41 for a full discussion of the process of dissolution, including the circumstances under which shareholders may petition a court to have the corporation dissolved.)

The Shareholder's Derivative Suit

When the corporation is harmed by the actions of a third party, the directors can bring a lawsuit in the name of the corporation against that party. If the corporate directors fail to bring a lawsuit, shareholders can do so "derivatively" in what is known as a shareholder's derivative suit. Before shareholders can bring a derivative suit, they must submit a written demand to the corporation, asking the board of directors to take appropriate action [RMBCA 7.40]. The directors then have ninety days in which to act. Only if they refuse to do so can the derivative suit go forward.

The right of shareholders to bring a derivative action is especially important when the wrong suffered by the corporation results from the actions of the corporate directors and officers—because they, for obvious reasons, would probably be unwilling to take any action against themselves. Nevertheless, a court will dismiss a derivative suit if a majority of the directors or an independent panel determines in good faith that the lawsuit is not in the best interests of the corporation [RMBCA 7.44].

When shareholders bring a derivative suit, they are not pursuing rights or benefits for themselves personally but are acting as guardians of the corporate entity. Therefore, if the suit is successful, any damages recovered normally go into the corporation's treasury, not to the shareholders personally.¹⁶

The following case illustrates some of the hurdles that a plaintiff must overcome when undertaking a shareholder's derivative suit.

16. The shareholders may be entitled to reimbursement for reasonable expenses of the derivative lawsuit, including attorneys' fees.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

DONDERO, J. [Justice]

* * * *

On May 22, 2007, plaintiff [Lawrence Bezirdjian] filed a shareholder derivative complaint on behalf of Chevron Corporation (Chevron) against [David O'Reilly and others] current and certain former members of its Board of Directors (Board). The complaint contains counts for breach of fiduciary duties, gross mismanagement, constructive fraud, and waste of corporate assets, in connection with illicit payments Chevron allegedly made to Saddam Hussein in exchange for Iraqi oil from 2000 to 2003. In the complaint, plaintiff acknowledged that the majority of his factual allegations were derived from an article published by the New York Times on May 8, 2007, entitled "Chevron Seen Settling Case on Iraq Oil." He also alleged that he was excused from making a prefiling demand on the Board to institute this action because such demand would be futile. Specifically, he stated "the [Board] cannot exercise independent objective judgment in deciding whether to bring this action or whether to vigorously prosecute this action because each of its members participated personally in the wrongdoing or are dependent upon other Defendants who did."

On August 9, 2007, the trial court filed its order staying the action. The order includes a stipulation from the parties deeming the complaint to be a stockholder's demand to pursue the claims alleged therein, and giving the Board until December 1, 2007, to act on the demand. Plaintiff was granted leave to amend the complaint within 15 days upon the lifting of the stay. The matter was subsequently continued several times.

On June 17, 2008, plaintiff filed an amended shareholder derivative complaint. The amended complaint repeats the original complaint's allegations concerning the illicit [illegal] payments, deletes the allegation excusing a prefiling demand, and adds the following: "Plaintiff made demand on Chevron to commence legal action * * *. Plaintiff's demand was refused. Accordingly, plaintiff has made sufficient effort to get Chevron to bring this action and need do no more." This portion of the complaint goes on to state that the Board had formed a special committee of directors (Committee) to consider and respond to plaintiff's demand. On April 30, 2008, the Committee reported to the Board "that it had concluded its investigation and * * * had determined it not to be in the best interests of Chevron or its stockholders to pursue the claims asserted herein." Thereafter, Chevron management was directed to seek dismissal of the action.

* * * *

[The trial court granted Chevron's motion for judgment on the pleadings and dismissed the action. The plaintiff appealed.]

* * * *

Before proceeding to plaintiff's contentions, we review some basic principles regarding shareholder derivative actions. Chevron is incorporated in the state of Delaware, and both parties agree that Delaware law applies [to] this lawsuit. "A basic principle of the General Corporation Law of the State of Delaware is that directors, rather than shareholders, manage the business and affairs of the corporation. The exercise of this managerial power is tempered by fundamental fiduciary obligations owed by the directors to the corporation and its shareholders. The decision to bring a lawsuit or to refrain from litigating a claim on behalf of a corporation is a decision concerning the management of the corporation. Consequently, such decisions are part of the responsibility of the board of directors.” [Emphasis added.]

* * * “[Delaware law] requires that shareholders seeking to assert a claim on behalf of the corporation must first exhaust intracorporate [within the corporation itself] remedies by making a demand on the directors to obtain the action desired, or to plead with particularity why demand is excused. The purpose of pre-suit demand is to assure that the stockholder affords the corporation the opportunity to address an alleged wrong without litigation, to decide whether to invest the resources of the corporation in litigation, and to control any litigation which does occur.”

Courts generally accord some deference to a corporation’s decision to refuse a shareholder’s demand: “[Because] a conscious decision by a board of directors to refrain from acting may be a valid exercise of business judgment, where demand on a board has been made and refused, [courts] apply the business judgment rule in reviewing the board’s refusal to act pursuant to a stockholder’s demand to file a lawsuit. The business judgment rule is a presumption that in making a business decision, not involving self-interest, the directors of a corporation acted on an informed basis, in good faith and in the honest belief that the action taken was in the best interests of the company. ‘The burden is on the party challenging the decision to establish facts rebutting [this] presumption.’” [Emphasis added.]

* * * To rebut the presumption, a plaintiff must plead with particularity facts that create a reasonable doubt as to the good faith or reasonableness of a board’s investigation. Mere conclusory allegations are insufficient. “If there is reason to doubt that the board acted independently or with due care in responding to the demand, the stockholder may have the basis * * * to claim wrongful refusal. The stockholder then has the right to bring the underlying action * * *.”

* * * *

Plaintiff contends that his complaint states a valid cause of action under Delaware law. Certainly, the allegations in his complaint with respect to Chevron’s alleged payments to Saddam Hussein suggest corporate wrongdoing. Nevertheless, as we have already discussed, it was within the Board’s power to refuse to undertake this lawsuit if it deemed the litigation would be contrary to the corporation’s best interests. Thus, even assuming, as we must at this stage of the proceedings, that all of the allegations in the complaint are true, plaintiff’s failure to rebut the presumption created by the business judgment rule is fatal to his complaint.

* * * *

The judgment is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. Given that the shareholder was suing the directors and not a third party (an outsider to the corporation), was it fair to him to require that he first demand that the directors undertake the suit? Why or why not?
2. Assuming that the shareholder’s accusations were true, what could he have done to prevent the case from being dismissed?

SECTION 5

LIABILITY OF SHAREHOLDERS

One of the hallmarks of the corporate form of organization is that shareholders are not personally liable for the debts of the corporation. If the corporation fails, the shareholders can lose their investments, but that generally is the limit of their liability. As discussed in Chapter 39, in certain instances of fraud, undercapitalization, or careless observance of corporate formalities, a court will pierce the corporate veil (disregard the corporate entity) and hold the shareholders individually liable. But these situations are the exception, not the rule.

A shareholder also can be personally liable in certain other rare instances. One relates to illegal dividends, which were discussed previously. Another relates to watered stock. Still another concerns the duties majority shareholders owe to minority shareholders.

Concept Summary 40.3 on the facing page reviews the role, rights, and liability of shareholders in a corporation.

Watered Stock

When a corporation issues shares for less than their fair market value, the shares are referred to as watered stock.¹⁷ Usually, the shareholder who receives watered stock must pay the difference to the corporation (the shareholder is personally liable). In some states, the shareholder who receives watered stock may be liable to creditors of the corporation for unpaid corporate debts.

17. The phrase watered stock was originally used to describe cattle that were kept thirsty during a long drive and then were allowed to drink large quantities of water just before their sale. The increased weight of the watered stock allowed the seller to reap a higher profit.

For example, during the formation of a corporation, Gomez, one of the incorporators, transfers his property, Sunset Beach, to the corporation for 10,000 shares of stock at a par value of $100 per share for a total price of $1 million. After the property is transferred and the shares are issued, Sunset Beach is carried on the corporate books at a value of $1 million. On appraisal, it is discovered that the market value of the property at the time of transfer was only $500,000. The shares issued to Gomez are therefore watered stock, and he is liable to the corporation for the difference between the value of the shares and the value of the property.

Duties of Majority Shareholders

In some instances, a majority shareholder is regarded as having a fiduciary duty to the corporation and to the minority shareholders. This duty occurs when a single shareholder (or a few shareholders acting in concert) owns a sufficient number of shares to exercise de facto (actual) control over the corporation. In these situations, the majority shareholder owes a fiduciary duty to the minority shareholders.

When a majority shareholder breaches her or his fiduciary duty to a minority shareholder, the minority shareholder can sue for damages. A breach of fiduciary duties by those who control a closely held corporation normally constitutes what is known as oppressive conduct. A common example of a breach of fiduciary duty occurs when the majority shareholders “freeze out” the minority shareholders and exclude them from certain benefits of participating in the firm.

CASE IN POINT Brodie, Jordan, and Barbuto formed a closely held corporation to operate a machine shop. Each owned one-third of the shares in the company, and all three were directors. Brodie served as the corporate president for twelve years but thereafter met with the other shareholders only a few times a year. After disagreements arose, Brodie asked the company to purchase his shares, but his requests were refused. A few years later, Brodie died, and his wife inherited his shares in the company. Jordan and Barbuto refused to perform a valuation of the company, denied her access to the corporate

Role, Rights, and Liability of Shareholders

Aspect	Description
Shareholders' Powers	Shareholders' powers include approval of all fundamental changes affecting the corporation and election of the board of directors.
Shareholders' Meetings	Shareholders' meetings must occur at least annually; special meetings can be called when necessary. Notice of the time and place of a meeting (and its purpose, if the meeting is specially called) must be sent to shareholders. A minimum number of shareholders (quorum) must be present to vote.
Shareholders' Rights	Shareholders have numerous rights, which may include the following: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Voting rights. 2. Preemptive rights (depending on the corporate articles). 3. The right to receive dividends (at the discretion of the directors). 4. The right to inspect the corporate records. 5. The right to transfer shares (this right may be restricted in closely held corporations). 6. The right to receive a share of corporate assets when the corporation is dissolved. 7. The right to sue on behalf of the corporation (bring a shareholder's derivative suit) when the directors fail to do so.
Shareholders' Liability	Shareholders may be liable for watered stock. In certain situations, majority shareholders may be regarded as having a fiduciary duty to minority shareholders and will be liable if that duty is breached.

information she requested, did not declare any dividends, and refused to elect her as a director. In this situation, a court found that the majority shareholders had violated their fiduciary duty to Brodie's wife.¹⁸

How egregious must majority shareholders' misbehavior be to warrant an award of punitive damages, in addition to compensatory damages? The court in the following case set out the factors to consider and weighed the majority shareholders' acts against these standards.

CASE 40.3 Mazloom v. Mazloom

Court of Appeals of South Carolina, 382 S.C. 307, 675 S.E.2d 746 (2009).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Four brothers—Iraj, Ahmad, Manooch, and Aboli Mazloom—incorporated a business known as AMBI, Inc. AMBI owned real estate in South Carolina on which the brothers operated a Mini Mart, a liquor store, and a one-bedroom apartment. Each brother had a 25 percent interest in AMBI. After seventeen years, Ahmad, Manooch, and Aboli dissolved AMBI, filed articles of organization for a new firm—AMA, LLC—and transferred AMBI's assets to AMA for five dollars. When Iraj learned of the changes, he had Manooch and Aboli file an amendment to AMA's articles stating that "Iraj Mazloom owns 25% (or 1/4) shares of stock in AMA." Less than five months later, Ahmad sold his interest in AMA to Manooch and Aboli, who then sold AMA's assets to Ganesh Mini Mart, LLC, for $345,000. They paid Iraj nothing. He filed a suit in a South Carolina state court against Manooch and Aboli, claiming breach of fiduciary duty. The brothers asserted that Iraj did not own shares in AMBI or AMA. The court awarded Iraj 25 percent of the proceeds from the sale of AMA's assets and other amounts, including punitive damages of $50,000. Manooch and Aboli appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

WILLIAMS, J. [Judge]

* * * *

*If punitive damages are awarded, the [court] should review the amount awarded by considering the * * * following: (1) defendant's degree of culpability [guilt]; (2) duration of the conduct; (3) defendant's awareness or concealment; (4) the existence of similar past conduct; (5) likelihood the award will deter the defendant or others from like conduct; (6) whether the award is reasonably related to the harm likely to result from such conduct; (7) defendant's ability to pay; and finally, (8) * * * other factors deemed appropriate. [Emphasis added.]*

* * * The [trial court] found the misconduct of the brothers warranted an award of punitive damages to Iraj. This conduct included selling all of AMA's assets to a third party without Iraj's knowledge or consent, filing an official document stating Iraj held a 25 percent interest in AMA and then taking an opposite position after the business' assets were sold, failing to hold the sales proceeds in trust and to provide Iraj with his share, and filing Articles of Termination for AMA without Iraj's knowledge or consent.

Additionally, * * * the [court] found the brothers were completely culpable for the misconduct leading to the award of punitive damages and that the brothers were fully aware of this misconduct which they engaged in repeatedly. The [court] also found the award was likely to deter the brothers from similar conduct in the future, the brothers had the ability to pay the award based on their [receipt of proceeds from the transaction] with Ganesh and ownership interests in houses * * * , and the award was reasonably related to the harm.

There is ample evidence in the record to support the [court's] findings. For example, Iraj testified he was not told about the sale of AMA's assets and was not given any of the proceeds. Iraj stated that after the sale he repeatedly asked the brothers to provide him with his 25 percent share which they had acknowledged he owned in the [amendment to AMA's articles], but the brothers refused to acknowledge his interest. Iraj also testified he was not consulted or included in the filing of the Articles of Termination for AMA.

CASE 40.3 CONTINUED ♦ DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the award of punitive damages for Manooch and Aboli's breach of fiduciary duty to Iraj. Majority shareholders' breach of fiduciary duty owed to a minority shareholder can support an award of punitive damages

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Why is an award of punitive damages almost completely at the discretion of a jury and trial judge?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • The court awarded $50,000 in punitive damages. Given the repeated culpable behavior of the three brothers, was the damages award appropriate? Why or why not?

REVIEWING

Corporate Directors, Officers, and Shareholders

David Brock is on the board of directors of Firm Body Fitness, Inc., which owns a string of fitness clubs in New Mexico. Brock owns 15 percent of the Firm Body stock and is also employed as a tanning technician at one of the fitness clubs. After the January financial report showed that Firm Body's tanning division was operating at a substantial net loss, the board of directors, led by Marty Levinson, discussed the possibility of terminating the tanning operations. Brock successfully convinced a majority of the board that the tanning division was necessary to market the clubs' overall fitness package. By April, the tanning division's financial losses had risen. The board hired a business analyst, who conducted surveys and determined that the tanning operations did not significantly increase membership. A shareholder, Diego Peñada, discovered that Brock owned stock in Sunglow, Inc., the company from which Firm Body purchased its tanning equipment. Peñada notified Levinson, who privately reprimanded Brock. Shortly thereafter, Brock and Mandy Vail, who owned 37 percent of the Firm Body stock and also held shares of Sunglow, voted to replace Levinson on the board of directors. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What duties did Brock, as a director, owe to Firm Body?
2. Does the fact that Brock owned shares in Sunglow establish a conflict of interest? Why or why not?
3. Suppose that Firm Body brought an action against Brock claiming that he had breached the duty of loyalty by not disclosing his interest in Sunglow to the other directors. What theory might Brock use in his defense?
4. Now suppose that Firm Body did not bring an action against Brock. What type of lawsuit might Peñada be able to bring based on these facts?

 DEBATE THIS: Because most shareholders never bother to vote for directors, shareholders have no real control over corporations.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

40-1. Conflicts of Interest Oxy Corp. is negotiating with the Wick Construction Co. for the renovation of the Oxy corporate headquarters. Wick, the owner of the Wick Construction Co., is also one of the five members of Oxy's board of directors. The contract terms are standard for this type of contract. Wick has previously informed two of the other directors of his interest in the construction company. Oxy's board approves the contract by a three-to-two vote, with Wick voting with the majority. Discuss whether this contract is binding on the corporation.

40-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Liability of Directors.

AstroStar, Inc., has approximately five hundred shareholders. Its board of directors consists of three members (Eckhart, Dolan, and Macero). At a regular board meeting, the board selects Galiard as president of the corporation by a two-to-one vote, with Eckhart dissenting. The minutes of the meeting do not register Eckhart's dissenting vote. Later, an audit reveals that Galiard is a former convict and has embezzled $500,000 from the corporation that is not covered by insurance. Can the corporation hold directors Eckhart, Dolan, and Macero personally liable? Discuss.

- For a sample answer to Question 40-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

40-3. Preemptive Rights Superal Corp. authorized 100,000 shares and issued all of them during its first six months in operation. Avril purchased 10,000 of the shares (10 percent). Later, Superal reacquired 10,000 of the shares it originally issued. With shareholder approval, Superal has now amended its articles so as to authorize and issue another 100,000 shares. It has also, by a resolution of the board of directors, made plans to reissue the 10,000 shares of treasury stock (the shares reacquired by the corporation). The corporate articles do not include a provision dealing with shareholders' preemptive rights. Because of her ownership of 10 percent of Superal, Avril claims that she has the preemptive right to purchase 10,000 shares of the new issue and 1,000 shares of the stock being reissued. Discuss her claims.

40-4. Rights of Shareholders Lucia has acquired one share of common stock of a multimillion-dollar corporation with more than 500,000 shareholders. Lucia's ownership interest is so small that she is not sure what her rights are as a shareholder. For example, she wants to know whether this one share entitles her to (1) attend and vote at shareholders' meetings, (2) inspect the corporate books, and (3) receive yearly dividends. Discuss Lucia's rights in these three matters.

40-5. Duties of Majority Shareholders Steve and Marie Venturini were involved in the operation of Steve's Sizzling Steakhouse in Carlstadt, New Jersey, from the day their parents opened it in the 1930s. By the 1980s, Steve, Marie, and her husband Joe were running it. The business was a corporation with Steve and Marie each owning half of the stock. Steve died in 2001, leaving his stock in equal shares to his sons Steve and Gregg. Son Steve had never worked there. Gregg had done occasional maintenance work until his father's death. Despite their lack of participation, the sons were paid more than $750 per week each. In 2002, Marie's son Blaise, who had obtained a college degree in restaurant management while working part-time at the steakhouse, took over its management. When his cousins became threatening, he denied them access to the business and its books. Marie refused Gregg and Steve's offer of about $1.4 million for her stock in the restaurant, and they refused her offer of about $800,000 for theirs. They filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against her, claiming, among other things, a breach of fiduciary duty. Should the court order the aunt to buy out the nephews or the nephews to buy out the aunt, or neither? Why? [Venturini v. Steve's Steakhouse, Inc., __ N.J.Super. __, __ A.2d __ (Ch.Div. 2006)]

40-6. Fiduciary Duties and Liabilities Harry Hoas and Larry Griffiths were shareholders in Grand Casino, Inc., which owned and operated a casino in Watertown, South Dakota. Griffiths owned 51 percent of the stock and Hoas 49 percent. Hoas managed the casino, which Griffiths typically visited once a week. At the end of 1997, an accounting showed that the cash on hand was less than the amount posted in the casino's books. Later, more shortfalls were discovered. In October 1999, Griffiths did a complete audit. Hoas was unable to account for $135,500 in missing cash. Griffiths then kept all of the casino's most recent profits, including Hoas's $9,447.20 share, and, without telling Hoas, sold the casino for $100,000 and kept all of the proceeds. Hoas filed a suit in a South Dakota state court against Griffiths, asserting, among other things, a breach of fiduciary duty. Griffiths countered with evidence of Hoas's misappropriation of corporate cash. What duties did these parties owe each other? Did either Griffiths or Hoas, or both of them, breach those duties? How should their dispute be resolved? How should their finances be reconciled? Explain. [Hoas v. Griffiths, 2006 SD 27, 714 N.W.2d 61 (2006)]

40-7. Role of Directors The board of directors of Necanicum Investment Co., a property management corporation in Oregon, meets on a regular basis. Necanicum paid the directors $6,000 each in the third quarter of 2003. It did not report the payments as part of its payroll and did not pay unemployment tax on the payments. The Oregon Employment Department contended that the company owed $700 in unemployment taxes on the payments to the directors. Necanicum protested. The administrative law judge (ALJ) for the Employment Department held that the company owed the taxes because directors' fees are the same as wages for unemployment tax purposes. Necanicum appealed, but the court of appeals affirmed the ALJ's ruling. The company appealed again. Are payments to directors the same as wages for tax purposes?

Why or why not? [Necanicum Investment Co. v. Employment Department, 345 Or. 138, 190 P.3d 368 (2008)]

40-8. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Duties of Directors and Officers.

First Niles Financial, Inc., is a company whose sole business is to own and operate a bank, Home Federal Savings and Loan Association of Niles, Ohio. First Niles's directors included bank officers William Stephens, Daniel Csontos, and Lawrence Safarek; James Kramer, president of an air-conditioning company that serviced the bank; and Ralph Zuzolo, whose law firm served the bank and whose title company participated in most of its real estate deals. First Niles's board put the bank up for sale and received three bids. Farmers National Bank Corp. stated that it would not retain the board. Cortland Bancorp indicated that it would terminate the directors but consider them for future service. First Financial Corp. said nothing about the directors. The board did not pursue Farmers' offer, failed to timely respond to Cortland's request, and rejected First Financial's bid. Leonard Gantler and other First Niles shareholders filed a suit in a Delaware state court against Stephens and the others. What duties do directors and officers owe to a corporation and its shareholders? How might those duties have been breached here? Discuss. [Gantler v. Stephens, 965 A.2d 695 (Del.Sup.Ct. 2009)]

40-9. Fiduciary Duty of Officers Designer Surfaces, Inc., supplied countertops to homeowners who shopped at stores such as Lowe's and Costco. The homeowners paid the store, which then contracted with Designer to fabricate and install the countertops. Designer bought materials from Arizona Tile, LLC, on an open account. Designer's only known corporate officers were Howard Berger and John McCarthy. Designer became insolvent and could not pay Arizona Tile for all the materials it had purchased, including materials for which Designer had already received payment from the retail stores. Arizona Tile sued Designer and won a default judgment, but the company had no funds. Arizona Tile then sued Berger and McCarthy personally for diverting company funds that Designer had received in trust for payment to Arizona Tile. Arizona Tile argued that the use of the funds for other purposes was a breach of fiduciary duty. Berger and McCarthy argued that corporate law imposed neither a fiduciary duty on corporate officers nor personal liability for breach of a duty to suppliers of materials. Which argument is more credible and why? [Arizona Tile, LLC v. Berger, 223 Ariz. 491, 224 P.3d 988 (Ariz.App. 2010)]

40-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Duties of Directors and Officers.

New Orleans Paddlewheels, Inc. (NOP), is a Louisiana corporation formed in 1982 when James Smith, Sr., and Warren Reuther were its only shareholders, with each holding 50 percent of the stock. NOP is part of a sprawling enterprise of tourism and hospitality companies in New Orleans. The positions on the board of each company were split equally between the Smith and Reuther families. At Smith's request, his son James Smith, Jr. (JES), became involved in the businesses. In 1999, NOP's board elected JES as president, to be in charge of day-to-day operations, and Reuther is chief executive officer (CEO), to be in charge of marketing and development. Over the next few years, animosity developed between Reuther and JES. In October 2001, JES terminated Reuther as CEO and denied him access to the offices and books of NOP and the other companies, literally changing the locks on the doors. At the next meetings of the boards of NOP and the overall enterprise, deadlock ensued, with the directors voting along family lines on every issue. Complaining that the meetings were a "waste of time," JES began to run the entire enterprise by taking advantage of an unequal balance of power on the companies' executive committees. In NOP's subsequent bankruptcy proceeding, Reuther filed a motion for the appointment of a trustee to formulate a plan for the firm's reorganization, alleging, among other things, misconduct by NOP's management. [In re New Orleans Paddlewheels, Inc., 350 Bankr. 667 (E.D.La. 2006)]

- Was Reuther legally entitled to have access to the books and records of NOP and the other companies? JES maintained, among other things, that NOP's books were "a mess." Was JES's denial of that access unethical? Why or why not?
- How would you describe JES's attempt to gain control of NOP and the other companies? Were his actions devious and self-serving in the pursuit of personal gain or legitimate and reasonable in the pursuit of a business goal? Discuss.

Corporate Merger, Consolidation, and Termination

Although a corporation may grow simply by reinvesting retained earnings in more equipment or by hiring more employees, corporations may also expand their operations by engaging in various transactions with other corporations. These transactions include a merger, a consolidation, a share exchange, a purchase of assets, or a purchase of a controlling interest in another corporation. This chapter examines each of these types of corporate expansion. We look at how each type of transaction is carried out, whether the approval of the shareholders and the board of directors is required, and the rights of shareholders who object to the proposed transaction.

In the latter part of the chapter, we discuss dissolution and winding up—the combined processes by which a corporation terminates its existence. Dissolution may come about either voluntarily or involuntarily, and we will look at some typical reasons for dissolution and at the methods used in the termination process.

This chapter concludes with a brief comparison of the major forms of business organization discussed in Chapters 36 through 41. We present a summary of the advantages and disadvantages of each business form.

SECTION 1

MERGER, CONSOLIDATION, AND SHARE EXCHANGE

The terms merger and consolidation traditionally referred to two legally distinct proceedings. Today, however, people commonly use the term consolidation to refer to all types of combinations, including mergers (discussed below) and acquisitions (discussed later in this chapter). Whether a combination is a merger, a consolidation, or a share exchange, the rights and liabilities of shareholders, the corporation, and the corporation's creditors are the same. Note also that the power to merge, consolidate, and exchange shares is conferred by statute, and thus state law establishes the specific procedures.

Merger

A merger involves the legal combination of two or more corporations. After a merger, only one of the corporations continues to exist. For example, Corporation A and Corporation B decide to merge. They agree that A will absorb B. Therefore, after the merger, B ceases to exist as a separate entity, and A continues as the surviving corporation. Exhibit 41-1 below graphically illustrates this process.

After the merger, Corporation A is recognized as a single corporation possessing all of the rights, privileges, and powers of itself and B. Corporation A automatically acquires all of B's property and assets without the necessity of a formal transfer. Corporation A also inherits B's preexisting legal rights. Thus, if B had a right of action against a third party under tort or property law, for example, Corporation A can bring a suit after the merger to recover B's damages. Corporation A also becomes liable for all of B's debts and obligations. Finally, Corporation A's articles of incorporation are deemed amended to include any changes that are stated in the articles of merger.

Consolidation

In a consolidation, two or more corporations combine so that each corporation ceases to exist and a new one emerges. Corporation A and Corporation B consolidate to form an entirely new organization, Corporation C. In the process, A and B both terminate, and C comes into existence as a new entity. Exhibit 41–2 below graphically illustrates this process.

The results of a consolidation are similar to those of a merger—only one company remains—but it is a completely new entity (the consolidated corporation). Corporation C is recognized as a new corporation and a single entity; A and B cease to exist. C inherits all of the rights, privileges, and powers previously held by A and B. Title to any property and assets owned by A and B passes to C without a formal transfer. C assumes liability for all debts and obligations owed by A and B. The articles of consolidation take the place of A's and B's original corporate articles and are thereafter regarded as C's corporate articles.

When a merger or a consolidation takes place, the surviving corporation or newly formed corporation will issue shares or pay some fair consideration to the shareholders of the corporation or corporations that cease to exist. True consolidations have become less common among for-profit corporations because it is often advantageous for one of the firms to survive. In contrast, nonprofit corporations and associations may prefer consolidation because it suggests a new beginning in which neither of the two initial entities is dominant.

Share Exchange

In a share exchange, some or all of the shares of one corporation are exchanged for some or all of the shares of another corporation, but both corporations continue to exist. Share exchanges are often used to create holding companies (companies that own part or all of other companies' outstanding stock—see Chapter 39). For example, UAL Corporation is a large holding company that owns United Airlines. If one corporation owns all of the shares of another corporation, it is referred to as the parent corporation, and the wholly owned company is the subsidiary corporation.

Merger, Consolidation, and Share Exchange Procedures

All states have statutes authorizing mergers, consolidations, and share exchanges for domestic (in-state) and foreign (out-of-state) corporations. The procedures vary somewhat among jurisdictions. In some states, a consolidation resulting in an entirely new corporation simply follows the initial incorporation procedures discussed in Chapter 39, whereas other business combinations must follow the procedures outlined below.

The Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) sets forth the following basic requirements [RMBCA 11.01–11.07]:

1. The board of directors of each corporation involved must approve the merger or share exchange plan.
2. The plan must specify any terms and conditions of the merger. It also must state how the value of the shares of each merging corporation will be determined and how they will be converted into shares or other securities, cash, property, or additional interests in another corporation.
3. The majority of the shareholders of each corporation must vote to approve the plan at a shareholders' meeting. If any class of stock is entitled to vote as a separate group, the majority of each separate voting group must approve the plan. As mentioned in Chapter 40, frequently a corporation's articles of incorporation or bylaws require approval by more than a majority once a quorum is present. In addition, some state statutes require the approval of two-thirds of the outstanding shares of voting stock (not just the shareholders present at the meeting), and others require a four-fifths approval.

4. Once the plan is approved by the directors and the shareholders of both corporations, the surviving corporation files the plan (articles of merger, consolidation, or share exchange) with the appropriate official, usually the secretary of state.
5. When state formalities are satisfied, the state issues a certificate of merger to the surviving corporation or a certificate of consolidation to the newly consolidated corporation.

Short-Form Mergers

RMBCA 11.04 provides a simplified procedure for the merger of a substantially owned subsidiary corporation into its parent corporation. Under these provisions, a short-form merger—also referred to as a parent-subsidiary merger—can be accomplished without the approval of the shareholders of either corporation. The short-form merger can be used only when the parent corporation owns at least 90 percent of the outstanding shares of each class of stock of the subsidiary corporation. Once the board of directors of the parent corporation approves the plan, it is filed with the state, and copies are sent to each shareholder of record in the subsidiary corporation.

Shareholder Approval

As mentioned, except in a short-form merger, the shareholders of both corporations must approve a merger or other plan of consolidation. Shareholders invest in a corporation with the expectation that the board of directors will manage the enterprise and make decisions on ordinary business matters. For extraordinary matters, normally both the board of directors and the shareholders must approve the transaction.

Mergers and other combinations are extraordinary business matters, meaning that the board of directors must normally obtain the shareholders' approval and provide appraisal rights (discussed next). Amendments to the articles of incorporation and the dissolution of the corporation also generally require shareholder approval. Sometimes, a transaction can be structured in such a way that shareholder approval is not required, but if the shareholders challenge the transaction, a court might require shareholder approval. For this reason, the board of directors may request shareholder approval even when it might not be legally required.

Appraisal Rights

What if a shareholder disapproves of a merger or a consolidation but is outvoted by the other shareholders? The law recognizes that a dissenting shareholder should not be forced to become an unwilling shareholder in a corporation that is new or different from the one in which the shareholder originally invested. Dissenting shareholders therefore are given a statutory right to be paid the fair value of the number of shares they held on the date of the merger or consolidation. This right is referred to as the shareholder's appraisal right. So long as the transaction does not involve fraud or other illegal conduct, appraisal rights are the exclusive remedy for a shareholder who is dissatisfied with the price received for the stock.

Appraisal rights usually extend to regular mergers, consolidations, share exchanges, short-form mergers, and sales of substantially all of the corporate assets not in the ordinary course of business. Such rights can be particularly important in a short-form merger because the minority stockholders do not receive advance notice of the merger, the directors do not consider or approve it, and there is no vote.¹ Appraisal rights are often the only recourse available to shareholders who object to parent-subsidiary mergers.

APPRAISAL RIGHTS PROCEDURES Each state establishes the procedures for asserting appraisal rights in that jurisdiction. Generally, the corporation must notify shareholders that appraisal rights are or may be available [RMBCA 13.20]. Dissenting shareholders usually must then file a written notice of intent to demand payment with the corporation, before the shareholders' vote on the proposed transaction [RMBCA 13.21]. The "fair value of shares" normally is the value on the day prior to the date on which the vote was taken [RMBCA 13.21]. The corporation must make a written offer to purchase a dissenting shareholder's stock and must include a current corporate balance sheet and income statement with the offer. If the shareholder and the corporation do not agree on the fair value, a court will determine it.

Shareholders may lose their appraisal rights if they do not adhere precisely to the procedures prescribed by statute. When they lose the right to an appraisal, dissenting shareholders must go along with the transaction despite their objections.

APPRAISAL RIGHTS AND SHAREHOLDER STATUS

Under the RMBCA, once a dissenting shareholder elects appraisal rights, the shareholder loses her or his shareholder status [RMBCA 13.23]. Without that status, the shareholder cannot vote, receive dividends, or sue to enjoin whatever action prompted the dissent. In some jurisdictions (and under the RMBCA), shareholder status may be reinstated if the shareholder decides to withdraw from the appraisal process. In other jurisdictions, shareholder status may not be reinstated until the appraisal is concluded.

1. See, for example, Glassman v. Unocal Exploration Corp., 777 A.2d 242 (Del.Sup.Ct. 2001).

SECTION 2 PURCHASE OF ASSETS

When a corporation acquires all or substantially all of the assets of another corporation by direct purchase, the purchasing, or acquiring, corporation simply extends its ownership and control over more assets. Because no change in the legal entity occurs, the acquiring corporation usually does not need to obtain shareholder approval for the purchase.²

Both the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission, however, have issued guidelines that significantly constrain and often prohibit mergers that could result from a purchase of assets. (These guidelines are part of the federal antitrust laws that will be discussed in Chapter 47.)

Sales of Corporate Assets

Note that the corporation that is selling all of its assets is substantially changing its business position and perhaps its ability to carry out its corporate purposes. For that reason, the corporation whose assets

- Shareholder approval may be required in a few situations. If the acquiring corporation plans to pay for the assets with its stock but not enough authorized unissued shares are available, then shareholders must approve the issuance of additional shares. Also, if the acquiring corporation is one whose stock is traded on a national stock exchange and it will be issuing a significant number of shares (such as a number equal to 20 percent of outstanding shares), then shareholders must approve.

are being sold must obtain approval from both its board of directors and its shareholders [RMBCA 12.02]. In most states and under RMBCA 13.02, dissenting shareholders of the selling corporation can demand appraisal rights.

Successor Liability in Purchases of Assets

Generally, a corporation that purchases the assets of another corporation is not automatically responsible for the liabilities of the selling corporation. Exceptions to this rule are made in certain circumstances, however.

In any of the following situations, the acquiring corporation will be held to have assumed both the assets and the liabilities of the selling corporation:

- When the purchasing corporation impliedly or expressly assumes the seller's liabilities.
- When the sale transaction is, in effect, a merger or consolidation of the two companies.³
- When the purchaser continues the seller's business and retains the same personnel (same shareholders, directors, and officers).
- When the sale is entered into fraudulently for the purpose of escaping liability.

The following case involved a sale of corporate assets. Although the parties agreed that the purchasing corporation was assuming the seller's liabilities as well, the parties disagreed as to whether the liabilities being assumed were limited to those that were existing and outstanding as of the closing date or also included liabilities that arose after the closing date. That was the question before the court.

- See, for example, Cargo Partner AG v. Albatross, Inc., 352 F.3d 41 (2d Cir. 2003) applying New York law on de facto mergers; and Village Builders 96, LP v. U.S. Laboratories, Inc., 121 Nev. 261, 112 P.3d 1082 (2005).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • American Standard, Inc., sold its Kewanee Boiler division to OakFabco, Inc. The parties' agreement stated that OakFabco would purchase Kewanee assets subject to Kewanee liabilities. The phrase Kewanee liabilities was defined as "all the debts, liabilities, obligations, CASE 41.1 CONTINUED ♦ and commitments (fixed or contingent) connected with or attributable to Kewanee existing and outstanding at the Closing Date.” The boilers manufactured by Kewanee had been insulated with asbestos, and as a result, many tort claims were brought in the years and decades following the purchase of the business. Some of those claims were brought by plaintiffs who had suffered injuries after the closing of the transaction, allegedly attributable to boilers manufactured and sold before the closing. American Standard brought an action against OakFabco, asking the court for a declaratory judgment on the issue of whether liabilities for such injuries were among the Kewanee liabilities that OakFabco assumed. The trial court entered a declaratory judgment holding that OakFabco had assumed the liabilities. An intermediate appellate court affirmed the trial court’s ruling, and OakFabco appealed to New York’s highest court, the New York Court of Appeals.

SMITH, J. [Judge]

* * * *

American Standard’s position—that OakFabco assumed all tort liabilities arising out of boilers manufactured by the Kewanee Boiler division, whether the injury was suffered before or after American Standard sold the division—is strongly supported by the purpose of the transaction, as described in the agreement itself: It was a purchase and sale of substantially all the assets of the Kewanee Boiler business “subject to all debts, liabilities, and obligations connected with or attributable to such business and operations.” Nothing in the nature of the transaction suggests that the parties intended OakFabco, which got all the assets, to escape any of the related obligations. [Emphasis added.]

OakFabco, however, argues that the definition of “Kewanee Liabilities”—the liabilities OakFabco assumed—is less broad than the purpose of the transaction would imply. It stresses the words “existing and outstanding” in the definition—“all the debts, liabilities, obligations and commitments * * * existing and outstanding at the Closing Date” (emphasis added [by the court]). According to OakFabco, a tort claim cannot be “existing and outstanding” before the tort plaintiff has been injured, because until then it is not possible for a tort lawsuit to be brought.

* * * *

That there was no such intention is made clear by a clause in the agreement relating to certain obligations owed to the boiler division’s customers. The agreement said that the buyer would deliver at the closing:

An executed undertaking wherein the Buyer will assume and agree to pay, and defend and hold Seller harmless against, all Kewanee Liabilities, including, by way of specification but not limitation, the following:

* * * *

(iii) warranty, service, repair and return obligations of Kewanee, and other claims and complaints arising out of or in connection with any products manufactured, sold, leased or installed by Kewanee on or prior to the Closing Date[.]

This language clearly meant that the buyer would deal with any problems customers had after the closing date with boilers that had been installed previously. It would have been absurd for OakFabco to tell a customer whose boiler failed after the closing that, since the customer’s claim was not “existing and outstanding” on the closing date, it was not OakFabco’s problem. By including warranty, service, repair and return claims of this kind in the definition of “Kewanee Liabilities,” the parties demonstrated that they were not reading the words “existing and outstanding” as OakFabco would have us read them.

We therefore agree with the [intermediate appellate court] that the liabilities assumed by OakFabco include claims brought by tort claimants injured after the closing date by boilers installed before that date.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The New York Court of Appeals affirmed the appellate court’s decision. The court concluded that the contract expressed the intention that OakFabco was to assume the liabilities of the selling corporation, including those claims that arose after the closing date.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Generally, a corporation that purchases the assets of another is not automatically responsible for the liabilities of the selling corporation, with some exceptions. Which exception applied to this case? Explain.

CASE 41.1 CONTINUED ▶ MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • This case illustrates the kinds of problems that can arise over contract interpretation. Business owners or managers who draft contracts should make sure that all contract clauses and terms are clearly defined and that the parties' intentions are clear. Before signing any contract drafted by another firm, business owners and managers should scrutinize it carefully for any wording that may be ambiguous or give rise to interpretational differences in the future.

PURCHASE OF STOCK

An alternative to the purchase of another corporation's assets is the purchase of a substantial number of the voting shares of its stock. This enables the acquiring corporation to control the target corporation (the corporation being acquired). The process of acquiring control over a corporation in this way is commonly referred to as a corporate takeover.

Tender Offers

In seeking to purchase the stock of the target corporation, the acquiring corporation deals directly with the target's shareholders by making a tender offer. A tender offer is a proposal to buy shares of stock from a target corporation's shareholders either for cash or for some type of corporate security of the acquiring company. The tender offer can be conditioned on the receipt of a specified number of outstanding shares by a certain date.

As a means of inducing shareholders to accept the offer, the tender price offered generally is higher than the market price of the target's stock before the tender offer was announced. For example, in the 2009 merger of two Fortune 500 pharmaceutical companies, Pfizer, Inc., paid $68 billion to acquire its rival, Wyeth. Wyeth shareholders reportedly received approximately $50.19 per share (part in cash and part in Pfizer stock), which amounted to a 15 percent premium over the market price of the stock.

Federal securities laws strictly control the terms, duration, and circumstances under which most tender offers are made. In addition, many states have passed antitakeover statutes. Generally, the offering corporation does not need to notify the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) or the target corporation's management until after the tender offer is made. The offeror must then disclose to the SEC the source of the funds used in the offer, the purpose of the offer, and the acquiring corporation's plans for the firm if the takeover is successful.

Responses to Tender Offers

A firm may respond to a tender offer in numerous ways. If the target firm's board of directors views the tender offer as favorable, the board will recommend that the shareholders accept it. Frequently, though, the target corporation's management opposes the proposed takeover. This is referred to as a hostile takeover.

To resist a takeover, a target company may make a self-tender, in which it offers to acquire stock from its own shareholders and thereby retain corporate control. The target corporation may also engage in a media campaign to persuade its shareholders that the tender offer is not in their best interests. Another possible defense is for the target firm to issue additional stock, thereby increasing the number of shares that the acquiring corporation must purchase to gain control. Several other tactics to resist a takeover are described in Exhibit 41–3 on the following page.

Concept Summary 41.1 on page 803 reviews all of the ways in which a corporation may expand its operations.

Takeover Defenses and Directors' Fiduciary Duties

As mentioned, the board of directors of the target corporation often opposes the takeover. Clearly, board members have an interest in keeping their jobs and control, but they also have a fiduciary duty to the corporation and its shareholders to act in the best interests of the company. In a hostile takeover attempt, sometimes directors' duties of care and loyalty collide with their self-interest. Then the shareholders, who would have received a premium for their shares as a result of the takeover, file lawsuits alleging that the directors breached their fiduciary duties in defending against the tender offer.

In this situation, courts apply the business judgment rule (see page 779 in Chapter 40) to analyze whether the directors acted reasonably in resisting the takeover attempt. The directors must show that they had reasonable grounds to believe that

EXHIBIT 41-3 • The Terminology of Takeover Defenses

TERM	DEFINITION
Crown Jewel	When threatened with a takeover, management makes the company less attractive to the raider by selling the company's most valuable asset (the "crown jewel") to a third party.
Golden Parachute	When a takeover is successful, top management usually is changed. With this in mind, a company may establish special termination or retirement benefits that must be paid to top managers if they are "retired." In other words, a departing high-level manager's parachute will be "golden" when he or she is forced to "bail out" of the company.
Greenmail	To regain control, a target company may pay a higher-than-market price to repurchase all of the stock that the acquiring corporation bought. When a takeover is attempted through a gradual accumulation of target stock rather than a tender offer, the intent may be to induce the target company to buy back the shares at a premium price—a concept similar to blackmail.
Pac-Man	Named after the Atari video game, this is an aggressive defense in which the target corporation attempts its own takeover of the acquiring corporation.
Poison Pill	The target corporation issues to its stockholders rights to purchase additional shares at low prices when there is a takeover attempt. This makes the takeover undesirably or even prohibitively expensive for the acquiring corporation.
White Knight	The target corporation solicits a merger with a third party, which then makes a better (often simply a higher) tender offer to the target's shareholders. The third party that "rescues" the target is the "white knight."

the tender offer posed a danger to the corporation's policies and effectiveness. In addition, the board's response must have been rational in relation to the threat posed.⁴ Basically, the defensive tactics used must have been reasonable, and the board of directors must have been trying to protect the corporation and its shareholders from a perceived danger. If the directors' actions were reasonable under the circumstances, then they are not liable for breaching their fiduciary duties.

Takeovers and Antitrust Law

Sometimes, a target corporation will seek an injunction against an aggressor on the ground that the attempted takeover violates antitrust laws. This defense may succeed if a court finds that the takeover would result in a substantial increase in the acquiring corporation's market power. Because antitrust laws are designed to protect competition rather than competitors, incumbent managers who are able to avoid a takeover by resorting to the use of private antitrust actions are unintended beneficiaries of the laws.

4. For a landmark Delaware Supreme Court case applying the business judgment rule to hostile takeovers, see Unocal Corp. v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 493 A.2d 946 (Del.Sup.Ct. 1985). See also Shaper v. Bryan, 371 Ill.App.3d 1079, 864 N.E.2d 876, 309 Ill. Dec. 635 (2007).

As will be discussed in Chapter 47, antitrust challenges to mergers may also be brought by the government rather than by private parties. Hence, the antitrust considerations involved in a proposed takeover can exist apart from the consideration of defense tactics.

SECTION 4 TERMINATION

The termination of a corporation's existence has two phases—dissolution and winding up. Dissolution is the legal death of the artificial "person" of the corporation. Winding up is the process by which corporate assets are liquidated, or converted into cash and distributed among creditors and shareholders according to specific rules of preference.⁵

Voluntary Dissolution

Dissolution can be brought about voluntarily by the directors and the shareholders. State corporation statutes establish the procedures required for

5. Some prefer to call this phase liquidation, but we use the term winding up to mean all acts needed to bring the legal and financial affairs of the business to an end, including liquidating the assets and distributing them among creditors and shareholders. See RMBCA 14.05.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 41.1

Methods of Expanding Corporate Operations and Interests

Method	Description
Merger and Consolidation	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> Merger—The legal combination of two or more corporations, with the result that the surviving corporation acquires all of the assets and obligations of the other corporation, which then ceases to exist. Consolidation—The legal combination of two or more corporations, with the result that each corporation ceases to exist and a new one emerges. The new corporation assumes all of the assets and obligations of the former corporations. Share exchange—A form of business combination in which some or all of the shares of one corporation are exchanged for some or all of the shares of another corporation, but both firms continue to exist. Procedure—Determined by state statutes. Basic requirements are the following: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> The board of directors of each corporation involved must approve the plan of merger, consolidation, or share exchange. The shareholders of each corporation must approve the merger or other consolidation plan at a shareholders' meeting. Articles of merger or consolidation (the plan) must be filed, usually with the secretary of state. The state issues a certificate of merger (or consolidation) to the surviving (or newly consolidated) corporation. Short-form merger (parent-subsidiary merger)—When the parent corporation owns at least 90 percent of the outstanding shares of each class of stock of the subsidiary corporation, shareholder approval is not required for the two firms to merge. Appraisal rights—Statutory rights of dissenting shareholders to receive the fair value for their shares when a merger or consolidation takes place. If the shareholder and the corporation do not agree on the fair value, a court will determine it.
Purchase of Assets	A purchase of assets occurs when one corporation acquires all or substantially all of the assets of another corporation. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> Acquiring corporation—The acquiring (purchasing) corporation is not required to obtain shareholder approval. The corporation is merely increasing its assets, and no fundamental business change occurs. Acquired corporation—The acquired (purchased) corporation is required to obtain the approval of both its directors and its shareholders for the sale of its assets because the sale will substantially change the corporation's business position.
Purchase of Stock	A purchase of stock occurs when one corporation acquires a substantial number of the voting shares of the stock of another (target) corporation. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> Tender offer—A public offer to all shareholders of the target corporation to purchase their stock at a price generally higher than the market price of the target stock prior to the announcement of the tender offer. Federal and state securities laws strictly control the terms, duration, and circumstances under which most tender offers are made. Target responses—The ways in which target corporations respond to takeover bids include self-tender (the target firm's offer to acquire its own shareholders' stock) and numerous other strategies (see Exhibit 41-3 on the previous page).

voluntarily dissolving a corporation. Basically, there are two possible methods: by the shareholders' unanimous vote to initiate dissolution proceedings⁶ or by a proposal of the board of directors that is submitted to the shareholders at a shareholders' meeting.

When a corporation is dissolved voluntarily, the corporation must file articles of dissolution with the state and notify its creditors of the dissolution. The corporation must also establish a date (at least 120 days after the date of dissolution) by which all claims against the corporation must be received [RMBCA 14.06].

6. Only some states allow shareholders to initiate corporation dissolution. See, for example, Delaware Code Annotated Title 8, Section 275(c).

A corporation's creditors want to be notified when the firm is dissolved so that they can file claims for payment. If a corporation is dissolved and its assets are liquidated without notice to a party who has a claim against the firm, who is liable for the debt? That was the question in the following case.

EXTENDED CASE 41.2

Parent v. Amity Autoworld, Ltd.

New York District Court, Suffolk County, Third District, 15 Misc.3d 633, 832 N.Y.S.2d 775 (2007).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

C. Stephen HACKELING,
J. [Judge]

* * * *

The plaintiff
[Christine Parent]

leased an automobile from Amity Autoworld, Ltd. (hereafter "Amity") [in Amityville, New York] in January 2002.

Amity sold all its Toyota automobile franchise assets * * * to respondent J S Autoworld, Ltd. (hereafter "Atlantic") pursuant to agreement in May 2002. * * * The alleged payments for the Amity dealership were made * * * directly to John Staluppi, Jr.

The plaintiff made a written claim for money damages to Amity on June 11, 2002.

The plaintiff commenced a small claims action [in a New York state court] against Amity via complaint dated March 9, 2005 and obtained a $2,643 * * * award.

The Suffolk County Sheriff returned the plaintiff's execution against Amity as unsatisfied on July 12, 2006, advising that the Toyota dealership is now owned by Atlantic.

* * * *

Amity's principal stockholder [was] John Staluppi, Jr., who is the son of Atlantic's principal stockholder John Staluppi, Sr. John Staluppi, Jr. is listed with the N.Y. State Division of Corporation database as the "chairman, chief executive officer, executive officer and agent for process of Amity Autoworld, Ltd."

* * * *

* * * Even in the absence of fraud, it [is] a violation of a duty on the part of the directors of a corporation to divest itself of all its property without affording a reasonable opportunity to its creditors to present and enforce their claims before the transfer becomes effective. [Emphasis added.]

The assets of a corporation constitute a * * * fund for the payment of its debts. After the return of an unsatisfied execution against the defunct corporation, a creditor may maintain an action against a shareholder to reach assets received by him. Directors incur derivative personal liability when they undertake to divest a corporation of all its property and in reality dissolve it without undertaking the proceedings for voluntary dissolution. [Emphasis added.]

* * * [Section] 1007 of the [New York] Business Corporation Law * * * provides:

* * * *

[Section] 1007. Notice to creditors; filing or barring claims

(a) At any time after dissolution, the corporation may give a notice requiring all creditors and claimants * * * to present their claims in writing and in detail at a specified place and by a specified day, which shall not be less than six months after the first publication of such notice. Such notice shall be published at least once a week for two successive weeks in a newspaper of general circulation in the county in which the office of the corporation was located * * * .

The Court notes that the use of the language "may give notice" to creditors in [Section] 1007 is permissive in nature. As such, * * * New York law allows for a corporation to informally dissolve by transferring all its assets without giving notice to creditors. However, * * * the cost of an informal dissolution is that directors cannot shield themselves against corporate creditor liability. Directors who undertake to divest a corporation of all its property without taking the proceedings for a voluntary dissolution do so at their peril.

In the matter presented, it is undisputed that Amity was informally liquidated and dissolved without notice to creditors and that John Staluppi, Jr. received in excess of $4,000,000 personally. * * * Accordingly, the Court authorizes the amendment of the plaintiff's complaint to include John Staluppi, Jr. as a * * * defendant and directs the Clerk of the Court to * * * schedule a trial of the matter.

QUESTIONS

1. A corporation may do business under a variety of names. How strictly should the law require a judgment to be issued against a corporation in its "true" name?
2. Could a corporation's former directors or shareholders, or its successors, avoid liability following its informal dissolution by claiming that they did all they felt was necessary to protect its creditors? Why or why not?

Involuntary Dissolution

Because corporations are creatures of statute, the state can also dissolve a corporation in certain circumstances. The secretary of state or the state attorney general can bring an action to dissolve a corporation that has failed to pay its annual taxes or to submit required annual reports, for example [RMBCA 14.20]. A state court can also dissolve a corporation that has committed fraud or misrepresentation to the state during incorporation or has engaged in mismanagement [RMBCA 14.30].

In some circumstances, a shareholder or a group of shareholders may petition a court to have the corporation dissolved. The RMBCA permits any shareholder to initiate an action for dissolution in any of the following circumstances [RMBCA 14.30]:

1. The directors are deadlocked in the management of corporate affairs, the shareholders are unable to break the deadlock, and the corporation is suffering irreparable injury as a result or is about to do so.
2. The acts of the directors or those in control of the corporation are illegal, oppressive, or fraudulent.
3. Corporate assets are being misapplied or wasted.

4. The shareholders are deadlocked in voting power and have failed, for a specified period (usually two annual meetings), to elect successors to directors whose terms have expired or would have expired with the election of successors.

CASE IN POINT Mt. Princeton Trout Club, Inc. (MPTC), was formed to own land in Colorado and provide recreational benefits to its shareholders. The articles of incorporation prohibited MPTC from selling or leasing any of its property without the approval of a majority of the directors. Nevertheless, MPTC officers entered into leases and contracts to sell corporate property without even notifying the directors. When a shareholder petitioned for dissolution, the court dissolved MPTC based on a finding that its officers had engaged in illegal, oppressive, and fraudulent conduct.⁷

The issue in the following case was whether the circumstances satisfied the statutory requirements for a court to dissolve a trucking corporation.

⁷ Colt v. Mt. Princeton Trout Club, Inc., 78 P.3d 1115 (Colo.App. 2003).

CASE 41.3

Sartori v. S&S Trucking, Inc.

Supreme Court of Montana, 2006 MT 164, 332 Mont. 503, 139 P.3d 806 (2006).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Tony Stacy approached his friend Justin Sartori about buying a trucking business and operating it together. Sartori agreed, and because he had a good credit rating and Stacy did not, Sartori borrowed $78,493.68 from First Interstate Bank in Eureka, Montana, to buy the business. In September 2003, they formed S&S Trucking, Inc., and agreed to be its only directors, officers, and shareholders, with each owning an equal number of shares. Within weeks, however, they realized that they were incompatible. For example, Sartori often did not show up when and where Stacy expected, and they differed over the payment of earnings from S&S's income. In October, Sartori incorporated Brimstone Enterprise to undermine S&S. He had S&S's mail forwarded to Brimstone, transferred S&S's licenses to Brimstone, and attempted to attract S&S's customers to Brimstone. In mid-November, he quit working for S&S and filed a suit in a Montana state court against S&S and Stacy, demanding that the firm be dissolved. The court set a deadline for the dissolution. The defendants appealed to the Montana Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice W. William LEAPHART delivered the opinion of the court.

* * *

The [lower] Court dissolved S&S pursuant to [Montana Code Section] 35-1-938(2), which states that a * * * court may dissolve a corporation in a proceeding by a shareholder if it is established that:

- (a) the directors are deadlocked in the management of the corporate affairs, the shareholders are unable to break the deadlock, and irreparable injury to the corporation is threatened or being suffered

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 41.3 CONTINUED ▶ or the business and affairs of the corporation can no longer be conducted to the advantage of the shareholders generally because of the deadlock * * * .

Stacy maintains on appeal that, rather than dissolving the corporation, the * * * Court * * * should have simply removed Sartori as a shareholder and director of the corporation. While Stacy appears to concede that he and Sartori were unable to break their management deadlock as to corporate affairs, he argues that the court failed to find any harm to the corporation per the statutory language. Stacy stresses the fact that S&S is now a twelve-employee company that has thrived in the wake of Sartori's departure. Since there has been no corporate injury, Stacy argues, there can be no dissolution.

In making this argument, Stacy ignores relevant statutory language. Section 35-1-938(2)(a) * * * provides that the court may order dissolution if "irreparable injury to the corporation is threatened or being suffered or the business and affairs of the corporation can no longer be conducted to the advantage of the shareholders generally because of the deadlock." Stacy and Sartori were S&S's only shareholders. Although the corporation may not have suffered irreparable injury, the [lower] Court found that the management deadlock led Sartori to take numerous steps to sabotage the corporation. As a result, the business and affairs of S&S could no longer be conducted to the advantage of the shareholders, Stacy and Sartori. The court properly exercised its statutory authority when it dissolved S&S. [Emphasis added.]

DECISION AND REMEDY • The Montana Supreme Court held that the dissolution of a corporation may be ordered without a finding that the firm has suffered or is threatened with an injury if its business can no longer be conducted to its shareholders' advantage. Thus, the order for the dissolution of S&S was correct, and the court affirmed the decision of the lower court.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Did Sartori or Stacy behave unethically toward the other or toward the corporation? Discuss.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • At the time of the defendants' appeal, S&S had twelve employees, and, according to Stacy, its business was thriving. Should the court have taken these factors into consideration when deciding whether to order the dissolution of the firm? Explain.

Winding Up

When dissolution takes place by voluntary action, the members of the board of directors act as trustees of the corporate assets. As trustees, they are responsible for winding up the affairs of the corporation for the benefit of corporate creditors and shareholders. This responsibility makes the board members personally liable for any breach of their fiduciary trustee duties.

When the dissolution is involuntary—or if board members do not wish to act as trustees of the assets—the court will appoint a receiver to wind up the corporate affairs and liquidate corporate assets. Courts may also appoint a receiver when shareholders or creditors can show that the board of directors should not be permitted to act as trustees of the corporate assets.

On dissolution, the liquidated assets are first used to pay creditors. Any remaining assets are distributed to shareholders according to their respective stock rights. Preferred stock has priority over common stock. Generally, the preferences are stated in the corporate articles.

SECTION 5

MAJOR BUSINESS FORMS COMPARED

As mentioned in Chapter 36, when deciding which form of business organization to choose, businesspersons normally consider several factors, including ease of creation, the liability of the owners, tax considerations, and the ability to raise capital. Each major form of business organization offers distinct advantages and disadvantages with respect to these and other factors.

Exhibit 41–4 on pages 807 and 808 summarizes the essential advantages and disadvantages of each of the forms of business organization discussed in Chapters 36 through 41.

EXHIBIT 41-4 • Major Forms of Business Compared

CHARACTERISTIC	SOLE PROPRIETORSHIP	PARTNERSHIP	CORPORATION
Method of Creation	Created at will by owner.	Created by agreement of the parties.	Authorized by the state under the state's corporation law.
Legal Position	Not a separate entity; owner is the business.	A traditional partnership is a separate legal entity in most states.	Always a legal entity separate and distinct from its owners—a legal fiction for the purposes of owning property and being a party to litigation.
Liability	Unlimited liability.	Unlimited liability.	Limited liability of shareholders—shareholders are not liable for the debts of the corporation.
Duration	Determined by owner; automatically dissolved on owner's death.	Terminated by agreement of the partners, but can continue to do business even when a partner dissociates from the partnership.	Can have perpetual existence.
Transferability of Interest	Interest can be transferred, but individual's proprietorship then ends.	Although partnership interest can be assigned, assignee does not have full rights of a partner.	Shares of stock can be transferred.
Management	Completely at owner's discretion.	Each partner has a direct and equal voice in management unless expressly agreed otherwise in the partnership agreement.	Shareholders elect directors, who set policy and appoint officers.
Taxation	Owner pays personal taxes on business income.	Each partner pays pro rata share of income taxes on net profits, whether or not they are distributed.	Double taxation—corporation pays income tax on net profits, with no deduction for dividends, and shareholders pay income tax on disbursed dividends they receive.
Organizational Fees, Annual License Fees, and Annual Reports	None or minimal.	None or minimal.	All required.
Transaction of Business in Other States	Generally no limitation.	Generally no limitation. ^a	Normally must qualify to do business and obtain certificate of authority.

CHARACTERISTIC	LIMITED PARTNERSHIP	LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANY	LIMITED LIABILITY PARTNERSHIP
Method of Creation	Created by agreement to carry on a business for profit. At least one party must be a general partner and the other(s) limited partner(s). Certificate of limited partnership is filed. Charter must be issued by the state.	Created by an agreement of the member-owners of the company. Articles of organization are filed. Charter must be issued by the state.	Created by agreement of the partners. A statement of qualification for the limited liability partnership is filed.
Legal Position	Treated as a legal entity.	Treated as a legal entity.	Generally, treated same as a traditional partnership.
Liability	Unlimited liability of all general partners; limited partners are liable only to the extent of capital contributions.	Member-owners' liability is limited to the amount of capital contributions or investments.	Varies, but under the Uniform Partnership Act, liability of a partner for acts committed by other partners is limited.
Duration	By agreement in certificate, or by termination of the last general partner (retirement, death, and the like) or last limited partner.	Unless a single-member LLC, can have perpetual existence (same as a corporation).	Remains in existence until cancellation or revocation.
Transferability of Interest	Interest can be assigned (same as a traditional partnership), but if assignee becomes a member with consent of other partners, certificate must be amended.	Member interests are freely transferable.	Interest can be assigned same as in a traditional partnership.
Management	General partners have equal voice or by agreement. Limited partners may not retain limited liability if they actively participate in management.	Member-owners can fully participate in management or can designate a group of persons to manage on behalf of the members.	Same as a traditional partnership.
Taxation	Generally taxed as a partnership.	LLC is not taxed, and members are taxed personally on profits "passed through" the LLC.	Same as a traditional partnership.
Organizational Fees, Annual License Fees, and Annual Reports	Organizational fee required; usually not others.	Organizational fee required; others vary with states.	Fees are set by each state for filing statements of qualification, statements of foreign qualification, and annual reports.
Transaction of Business in Other States	Generally no limitations.	Generally no limitation, but may vary depending on state.	Must file a statement of foreign qualification before doing business in another state.

REVIEWING

Corporate Merger, Consolidation, and Termination

In November 2005, Mario Bonsetti and Rico Sanchez incorporated Gnarly Vulcan Gear, Inc. (GVG), to manufacture windsurfing equipment. Bonsetti owned 60 percent and Sanchez owned 40 percent of the corporation's stock, and both men served on the board of directors. In January 2009, Hula Boards, Inc., owned solely by Mai Jin Li, made a public offer to Bonsetti and Sanchez to buy GVG stock. Hula offered 30 percent more than the market price per share for the GVG stock, and Bonsetti and Sanchez each sold 20 percent of their stock to Hula. Jin Li became the third member of the GVG board of directors. In April 2011, an irreconcilable dispute arose between Bonsetti and Sanchez over design modifications of their popular Baked Chameleon board. Sanchez and Jin Li voted to merge GVG with Hula Boards under the latter name, despite Bonsetti's dissent. Gnarly Vulcan Gear was dissolved, and production of the Baked Chameleon ceased. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What rights does Bonsetti have (in most states) as a minority shareholder dissenting to the merger of GVG and Hula Boards?
2. Could the parties have used a short-form merger procedure in this situation? Why or why not?
3. What is the term used for Hula's offer to purchase GVG stock? By what method did Hula acquire control over GVG?
4. Suppose that after the merger, a person who was injured on a Baked Chameleon board sued Hula (the surviving corporation). Can Hula be held liable for an injury? Why or why not?

 DEBATE THIS: Corporate law should be altered to prohibit incumbent management from using most currently legal methods to fight takeovers.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

41-1. Corporate Acquisitions Gretz is the chair of the board of directors of Faraday, Inc., and Williams is the chair of the board of directors of Firebrand, Inc. Faraday is a manufacturing corporation, and Firebrand is a transportation corporation. Gretz and Williams meet to discuss the possibility of combining their corporations and activities into a single corporate entity. They consider two alternative courses of action: (1) Faraday acquires all of the stock and assets of Firebrand, or (2) the two corporations combine to form a new corporation, Farabrand, Inc. Both chairs are concerned about the necessity of a formal transfer of property, liability for existing debts, and the need to amend the articles of incorporation. Explain what the two proposed combinations are called, and discuss the legal effect each has on the transfer of property, the liabilities of the combined corporations, and the need to amend the articles of incorporation.

41-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Corporate Merger.

Alir owns 10,000 shares of Ajax Corp. Her shares represent a 10 percent ownership in Ajax. Zeta Corp. is interested in acquiring Ajax in a merger, and the board of directors of each corporation has approved the merger. The shareholders of Zeta have already approved the acquisition, and Ajax has called for a shareholders' meeting to approve the merger. Alir disapproves of the merger and does not want to accept Zeta shares for the Ajax shares she holds. The market price of Ajax shares is $20 per share the day before the shareholder vote and drops to $16 on the day the shareholders of Ajax approve the merger. Discuss Alir's rights in this matter, beginning with the notice of the proposed merger.

- For a sample answer to Question 41–2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

41–3. Corporate Takeover Alitech Corp. is a small midwestern business that owns a valuable patent. Alitech has approximately 1,000 shareholders with 100,000 authorized and outstanding shares. Block Corp. would like to have the use of the patent, but Alitech refuses to give Block a license. Block has tried to acquire Alitech by purchasing Alitech's assets, but Alitech's board of directors has refused to approve the acquisition. Alitech's shares are selling for $5 per share. Discuss how Block Corp. might proceed to gain the control and use of Alitech's patent.

41–4. Successor Liability In 1996, Robert McClellan, a licensed contractor doing business as McClellan Design and Construction, entered into a contract with Peppertree North Condominium Association, Inc., to do earthquake repair work on Peppertree's seventy-six-unit condominium complex in Northridge, California. McClellan completed the work, but Peppertree failed to pay. In an arbitration proceeding against Peppertree to collect the amount due, McClellan was awarded $141,000, plus 10 percent interest, attorneys' fees, and costs. McClellan filed a suit in a California state court against Peppertree to confirm the award. Meanwhile, the Peppertree board of directors filed articles of incorporation for Northridge Park Townhome Owners Association, Inc., and immediately transferred Peppertree's authority, responsibilities, and assets to the new association. Two weeks later, the court issued a judgment against Peppertree. When McClellan learned about the new association, he filed a motion asking the court to add Northridge as a debtor to the judgment. Should the court grant the motion? Why or why not? [McClellan v. Northridge Park Townhome Owners Association, Inc., 89 Cal.App.4th 746, 107 Cal. Rptr.2d 702 (2 Dist. 2001)]

41–5. Corporate Dissolution Trans-System, Inc. (TSI), is an interstate trucking business. In 1994, to provide a source of well-trained drivers, TSI formed Northwestern Career Institute, Inc., a school for persons interested in obtaining a commercial driver's license. Tim Scott, who had worked for TSI since 1987, was named chief administrative officer and director. Scott, a Northwestern shareholder, disagreed with James Williams, the majority shareholder of both TSI and Northwestern, over four equipment leases between the two firms under which the sum of the payments exceeded the value of the equipment by not more than $3,000. Under four other leases, payments were $40,000 less than the value of the equipment. Scott also disputed TSI's one-time use, for purposes unrelated to the driving school, of $125,000 borrowed by Northwestern. Scott was terminated in 1998. He filed a suit in a Washington state court against TSI, seeking, among other things, the dissolution of Northwestern on the ground that the directors of the two firms had acted in an oppressive manner and misapplied corporate assets. Should the court grant this relief? If not, what remedy might be appropriate? Discuss. [Scott v. Trans-System, Inc., 148 Wash.2d 701, 64 P.3d 1 (2003)]

41–6. Purchase of Assets Paradise Pools, Inc. (PPI), also known as "Paradise Pools and Spas," was incorporated in 1981. In 1994, PPI entered into a contract with Bromanco, Inc., to build a pool in Vicksburg, Mississippi, as part of a Days Inn Hotel project being developed by Amerihost Development, Inc. PPI built the pool, but Bromanco, the general contractor, defaulted on other parts of the project, and Amerihost completed the construction itself. Litigation ensued in Mississippi state courts, and Amerihost was awarded $12,656.46 against PPI. Meanwhile, Paradise Corp. (PC) was incorporated in 1995 with the same management as PPI, but different shareholders. PC acquired PPI's assets in 1996, without assuming its liabilities, and soon became known as "Paradise Pools and Spas." Amerihost obtained a writ of garnishment against PC to enforce the judgment against PPI. PC filed a motion to dismiss the writ on the basis that it was "not a party to the proceeding." Should the court dismiss the case? Why or why not? [Paradise Corp. v. Amerihost Development, Inc., 848 So.2d 177 (Miss. 2003)]

41–7. Successor Liability In January 1999, General Star Indemnity Co. agreed to insure Indianapolis Racing League (IRL) race cars against damage during on-track accidents. In connection with the insurance, General Star deposited $400,000 with G Force, LLC (GFCO), a Colorado firm, to enable it to buy and provide parts for damaged cars without delay. GFCO agreed to return any unspent funds. Near the end of the season, Elan Motorsports Technologies (EMT) acquired GFCO. In 2000, EMT incorporated G Force, LLC, in Georgia (GFGA), and GFCO ceased to exist. GFGA renewed the arrangement with General Star and engaged in the same operations as GFCO, but EMT employees conducted GFGA's business at EMT's offices. In 2002, EMT assumed ownership of GFGA's assets and continued the business. EMT also assumed GFGA's liabilities, except for the obligation to return General Star's unspent funds. General Star filed a suit in a Georgia state court against EMT, seeking to recover its deposit. What is the rule concerning the liability of a corporation that buys the assets of another? Are there exceptions? Which principles apply in this case? Explain. [General Star Indemnity Co. v. Elan Motorsports Technologies, Inc., 356 F.Supp.2d 1333 (N.D.Ga. 2004)]

41–8. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Dissolution.

Clara Mahaffey operated Mahaffey's Auto Salvage, Inc., in Dayton, Ohio, as a sole proprietorship. In 1993, Kenneth Stumpff and Mahaffey's son, Richard Harris, joined the firm. Stumpff ran the wrecker and bought the vehicles for salvage. Harris handled the day-to-day operations and the bookkeeping. They became the company's equal 50 percent shareholders on Mahaffey's death in 2002. Harris, who inherited the land on which the firm was located, increased the rent to $1,500 per month. Within two years of Mahaffey's death, and without consulting Stumpff, Harris raised the rent to $2,500. Stumpff's wife died, and he took a leave of absence, during which the company paid him $2,500 a month and provided health insurance. After two years, Harris stopped the payments, discontinued the health benefits, and fired Stumpff, threatening to call the police if he came on the premises. Stumpff withdrew $16,000 from the firm's account, leaving a balance of $113. Harris offered to buy Stumpff's interest in the business, but Stumpff refused and filed a suit in an Ohio state court against Harris. A state statute permits the dissolution of a corporation if the owners are deadlocked in its management. Should the court order the dissolution of Mahaffey's? Why or why not? [Stumpff v. Harris, __ N.E.2d __ (Ohio App. 2006)]

41–9. Successor Liability In 2004, the Watergate Hotel in Washington, D.C., obtained a loan from PB Capital. At this time, hotel employees were represented by a union (see Chapter 34), and under a collective bargaining agreement, the hotel agreed to make contributions to an employees' pension fund run by the union. In 2007, the hotel was closed due to poor business, although the owner stated that the hotel would reopen in 2010. Despite this expectation, PB Capital—which was still owed $40 million by the hotel owner—instituted foreclosure proceedings (see Chapter 31). At the foreclosure sale, PB Capital bought the hotel and reopened it under new management and with a new workforce. The union sued PB Capital, contending that it should pay $637,855 owed by the previous owner into the employees' pension fund. Should PB Capital, as the hotel's new owner, have to incur the previous owner's obligation to pay into the pension fund under the theory of successor liability? Why or why not? [Board of Trustees of Unite Here Local 25 v. MR Watergate, LLC, 677 F.Supp.2d 229 (D.D.C. 2010)]

41–10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Purchase of Stock.

Topps Co. makes baseball and other cards, including the Pokemon collection, and distributes Bazooka bubble gum and other confections. Arthur Shorin, the son of Joseph Shorin, one of Topps's founders and the inspiration for "Bazooka Joe" (a character in the comic strip wrapped around each piece of gum), worked for Topps for fifty years and had served as its board chair and chief executive officer since 1980. Shorin's son-in-law, Scott Silverstein, served as Topps's president and chief operating officer. When Topps's financial performance began to lag, the board considered selling the company. Michael Eisner (formerly head of Disney Studios) offered to pay $9.75 per share and to retain Topps's management in a merger with his company. Upper Deck Co., Topps's chief competitor in the sports-card business, offered $10.75 per share but did not offer to retain the managers. Topps demanded that Upper Deck not reveal its bid publicly, but Topps publicized the offer, without accurately representing Upper Deck's interest and disparaging its seriousness. Upper Deck asked Topps to allow it to tell its side of events and to make a tender offer to Topps's shareholders. Topps refused and scheduled a shareholder vote on the Eisner offer. Topps's shareholders filed a suit in a Delaware state court against their firm, asking the court to prevent the vote. [In re Topps Co. Shareholders Litigation, 926 A.2d 58 (Del.Ch. 2007)]

- (a) The shareholders contended that Topps's conduct had "tainted the vote." What factors support this contention? How might these factors affect the vote?
- (b) Why might Topps's board and management be opposed to either of the offers for the company? Is this opposition ethical? Should the court enjoin (prevent) the scheduled vote? Explain.

CHAPTER 42

Securities Law and Corporate Governance

The stock market crash of October 29, 1929, and the ensuing economic depression caused the public to focus on the importance of securities markets for the economic well-being of the nation. Congress was pressured to regulate securities trading, and the result was the Securities Act of 1933¹ and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934.² Both acts were designed to provide investors with more information to help them make buying and selling decisions about securities—generally defined as any instruments evidencing corporate ownership (stock) or debts (bonds)—and to prohibit deceptive, unfair, and manipulative practices in the purchase and sale of securities.

1. 15 U.S.C. Sections 77a–77aa.
2. 15 U.S.C. Sections 78a–78mm.

This chapter discusses the nature of federal securities regulation and its effect on the business world. We begin by looking at the federal administrative agency that regulates securities transactions, the Securities and Exchange Commission. Next, we examine the major traditional laws governing securities offerings and trading.

We then discuss corporate governance and the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which significantly affects certain types of securities transactions. In the concluding pages of this chapter, we look at how securities laws are being adapted to the online environment.

SECTION 1

THE SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 created the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) as an independent regulatory agency. The SEC administers the Securities Act of 1933 and the 1934 act. The SEC also plays a key role in interpreting the provisions of these acts (and their amendments) and in creating regulations governing the purchase and sale of securities. The basic functions of the SEC are as follows:

1. Interprets federal securities laws and investigates securities law violations.
2. Issues new rules and amends existing rules.
3. Oversees the inspection of securities firms, brokers, investment advisers, and ratings agencies.
4. Oversees private regulatory organizations in the securities, accounting, and auditing fields.
5. Coordinates U.S. securities regulation with federal, state, and foreign authorities.

Updating the Regulatory Process

The SEC is working to make the regulatory process more efficient and more relevant to today's securities trading practices. To this end, the SEC has embraced modern technology and communications methods, especially the Internet, more completely than many other federal agencies have. For example, the agency now requires companies to file certain information electronically so that it can be posted on the SEC's EDGAR (Electronic Data Gathering, Analysis, and Retrieval) database.

The SEC currently requires companies to make disclosures regarding climate change, as discussed in this chapter's Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature on the facing page.

The SEC's Expanding Regulatory Powers

Since its creation, the SEC's regulatory functions have gradually been increased by legislation granting it authority in different areas. For example, to further curb securities fraud,

SHIFTING LEGAL PRIORITIES FOR BUSINESS

SEC Disclosures and Climate Change

The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) requires companies to reveal the potential financial impacts of future events such as increased competition, changes in regulatory rules, and pending lawsuits. In short, publicly traded corporations must disclose material information about future developments that might affect their earnings so that investors can make sound investment decisions. Should that information include the potential impact of climate change related to global warming?

The Risks and Opportunities of Climate Change

Since 2007, environmental groups, large institutional investors such as state pension funds, and other groups have petitioned the SEC, asking the commission to require that publicly held companies disclose climate-related information that could materially affect their operations.^a The groups cited a number of potential costs related to climate change, such as property losses in flooded coastal areas that would affect the property owners and their insurers, increased costs for food producers due to crop losses, and increased costs for pollution-control equipment to curb greenhouse gas emissions. At the same time, climate change could also present opportunities for companies that produce goods and services that can mitigate the effects of global warming or supply energy without generating emissions.

The SEC Responds

In 2010, the SEC decided that climate change had become a sufficiently important issue that publicly held companies should disclose their exposure to it. Accordingly, the SEC issued a guidance to aid companies in deciding when and whether to disclose the potential impacts of climate change on their future profitability.^b In announcing the decision, Mary Schapiro, the SEC chair, pointed out that “we are not opining on whether the world’s climate is changing, at what pace it might be changing, or due to what causes. Nothing that the commission does today should be construed as weighing in on these topics.”

The SEC’s guidance suggests that companies note in their quarterly and annual reports to shareholders any significant developments in federal and state legislation and regulations regarding climate change. For example, companies should disclose estimates for any material capital expenditures for pollution-control facilities. Risk factors related to existing or pending environmental legislation or regulations should be disclosed. In particular, companies should be “sensitive to greenhouse gas legislation or regulation.”

The material impact of treaties or international conventions related to climate change should also be considered and disclosed. Companies whose businesses are “reasonably likely to be affected by such agreements should monitor the progress of any potential agreements and consider the possible impact.”

Finally, the SEC suggested that companies consider changes in demand for their products or services, both existing and proposed, that might occur as a consequence of climate change or environmental legislation and regulations. For example, there might be a decrease in demand for services related to carbon-based energy, such as drilling or equipment maintenance services.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS

For the moment, only managers working in publicly held companies must worry about the SEC’s guidelines with respect to climate change. Nonetheless, nonpublic companies sometimes “go public.” Thus, managers in those companies should also monitor pending legislation, national and international, that might affect their businesses.

Congress enacted the Securities Enforcement Remedies and Penny Stock Reform Act of 1990.³ This act expands the SEC’s enforcement options and allows SEC administrative law judges to hear cases involving more types of alleged securities law violations, such as fraudulent financial reporting and financial fraud. The Securities Acts Amendments of 1990 authorized the SEC to seek sanctions against those who violate foreign securities laws.⁴

The National Securities Markets Improvement Act of 1996 expanded the power of the SEC to exempt persons, securities, and transactions from the requirements of the securities laws.⁵ The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, which you will read about later in this chapter, further expanded the authority of the SEC. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act required the SEC to adopt new rules relating to corporate disclosure requirements and created an oversight board to regulate public accounting firms.

SECTION 2 THE SECURITIES ACT OF 1933

The Securities Act of 1933 governs initial sales of stock by businesses. The act was designed to prohibit various forms of fraud and to stabilize the securities industry by requiring that investors receive financial and other significant information concerning the securities being offered for public sale. Basically, the purpose of this act is to require disclosure. The 1933 act provides that all securities transactions must be registered with the SEC unless they are specifically exempt from the registration requirements.

What Is a Security?

Section 2(1) of the Securities Act of 1933 contains a broad definition of securities, which generally include the following:⁶

1. Instruments and interests commonly known as securities, such as preferred and common stocks, treasury stocks, bonds, debentures, and stock warrants.
2. Any interests commonly known as securities, such as stock options, puts, calls, or other types of privilege on a security or on the right to purchase a security or a group of securities in a national security exchange.
3. Notes, instruments, or other evidence of indebtedness, including certificates of interest in a profit-sharing agreement and certificates of deposit.
4. Any fractional undivided interest in oil, gas, or other mineral rights.
5. Investment contracts, which include interests in limited partnerships and other investment schemes.

In interpreting the act, the United States Supreme Court has held that an investment contract is any transaction in which a person (1) invests (2) in a common enterprise (3) reasonably expecting profits (4) derived primarily or substantially from others' managerial or entrepreneurial efforts. Known as the Howey test, this definition continues to guide the determination of what types of contracts can be considered securities.⁷

6. 15 U.S.C. Section 77b(1). Amendments in 1982 added stock options.

For our purposes, it is convenient to think of securities in their most common form—stocks and bonds issued by corporations. Bear in mind, though, that securities can take many forms, including interests in whiskey, cosmetics, worms, beavers, boats, vacuum cleaners, muskrats, and cemetery lots. Almost any stake in the ownership or debt of a company can be considered a security. Investment contracts in condominiums, franchises, limited partnerships in real estate, and oil or gas or other mineral rights have qualified as securities.

CASE IN POINT Alpha Telecom sold, installed, and maintained pay-phone systems. The company guaranteed buyers of the systems a 14 percent annual return. Alpha was operating at a net loss, however, and continually borrowed funds to pay investors the fixed rate of return it had promised. Eventually, the company filed for bankruptcy, and the SEC brought an action alleging that Alpha had violated the Securities Act of 1933. A federal court concluded that the pay-phone program was a security because it involved an investment contract.⁸

Registration Statement

Section 5 of the Securities Act of 1933 broadly provides that if a security does not qualify for an exemption, that security must be registered before it is offered to the public. Issuing corporations must file a registration statement with the SEC and must provide all investors with a prospectus. A prospectus is a disclosure document that describes the security being sold, the financial operations of the issuing corporation, and the investment or risk attaching to the security. The prospectus also serves as a selling tool for the issuing corporation. Recent SEC rules allow an issuer to deliver a prospectus to investors electronically via the Internet.⁹ In principle, the registration statement and the prospectus supply sufficient

8. SEC v. Alpha Telecom, Inc., 187 F.Supp.2d 1250 (2002). See also SEC v. Edwards, 540 U.S. 389, 124 S.Ct. 892, 157 L.Ed.2d 813 (2004), in which the United States Supreme Court held that an investment scheme offering contractual entitlement to a fixed rate of return can be an investment contract and therefore can be considered a security under federal law.

9. Basically, an electronic prospectus must meet the same requirements as a printed prospectus. The SEC rules address situations in which the graphics, images, or audio files in or accompanying a printed prospectus cannot be reproduced in an electronic form. 17 C.F.R. Section 232.304.

information to enable unsophisticated investors to evaluate the financial risk involved.

CONTENTS OF THE REGISTRATION STATEMENT The registration statement must be written in plain English and fully describe the following:

1. The securities being offered for sale, including their relationship to the registrant's other capital securities.
2. The corporation's properties and business (including a financial statement certified by an independent public accounting firm).
3. The management of the corporation, including managerial compensation, stock options, pensions, and other benefits. Any interests of directors or officers in any material transactions with the corporation must be disclosed.
4. How the corporation intends to use the proceeds of the sale.
5. Any pending lawsuits or special risk factors.

All companies, both domestic and foreign, must file their registration statements electronically so that they can be posted on the SEC's EDGAR database (mentioned previously) and investors can access the information via the Internet. The EDGAR database includes material on initial public offerings (IPOs), proxy statements, corporations' annual reports, registration statements, and other documents that have been filed with the SEC.

REGISTRATION PROCESS The registration statement must be reviewed and approved by the SEC before it can become effective (unless it is filed by a well-known seasoned issuer, as will be discussed shortly). The 1933 act restricts the types of activities that an issuer can engage in at each stage of the registration process. If an issuer violates these restrictions, investors can rescind their contracts to purchase the securities. During the prefiling period (before filing the registration statement), the issuer normally cannot sell or offer to sell the securities. The issuer also cannot advertise its upcoming securities offering during the prefiling period.

Waiting Period. Once the registration statement has been filed, there is a waiting period of at least twenty days during which the SEC reviews the registration statement for completeness. Frequently, the staff members at the SEC who review the registration statement ask the registrant to make numerous changes and additions, which extends the length of the waiting period.

During the waiting period, the securities can be offered for sale but cannot be sold by the issuing corporation. Only certain types of offers are allowed. All issuers can distribute a preliminary prospectus, called a red herring prospectus.¹⁰ A red herring prospectus contains most of the information that will be included in the final prospectus but often does not include a price. General advertising is permitted, such as a tombstone ad, so named because historically the format resembled a tombstone. Such ads simply tell the investor where and how to obtain a prospectus.¹¹

Most issuers can also use a free-writing prospectus during this period (although some inexperienced issuers will need to file a preliminary prospectus first).¹² A free-writing prospectus is any type of written, electronic, or graphic offer that describes the issuer or its securities and includes a legend indicating that the investor may obtain the prospectus at the SEC's Web site. The issuer normally must file the free-writing prospectus with the SEC no later than the first date it is used.

Posteffective Period. Once the SEC has reviewed and approved the registration statement and the waiting period is over, the registration is effective, and the posteffective period begins. The issuer can now offer and sell the securities without restrictions. If the company issued a preliminary or free-writing prospectus to investors, it must provide those investors with a final prospectus either before or at the time they purchase the securities. The issuer can require investors to download the final prospectus from a Web site if it notifies them of the appropriate Internet address.

Registration Process Review. To review the entire process, suppose that Delsey Corporation wants to make a public offering of its common stock. It files a registration statement and a prospectus with the SEC. On the same day, the company can make offers to sell the stock and start using a free-writing prospectus, but it cannot actually sell any of the stock. Delsey and its attorneys work with the SEC and provide additional information as requested for nearly six months. When the SEC finally indicates that it has all the necessary information for the registration statement to be approved, Delsey can request that the twenty-day waiting period be accelerated. Only after the SEC declares the registration to be effective and the waiting period has elapsed or been accelerated can Delsey sell the first shares in the issue.

10. The name red herring comes from the legend printed in red across the prospectus stating that the registration has been filed but has not become effective.

11. During the waiting period, the SEC also allows road shows, in which a corporate executive travels around speaking to institutional investors and securities analysts. In addition, electronic road shows are viewed via real-time communications methods, such as Web casting.

12. See SEC Rules 164 and 433. Note also companies that qualify as well-known seasoned issuers (see page 816) can even use a free-writing prospectus during the prefiling period.

RESTRICTIONS RELAXED FOR WELL-KNOWN SEASONED ISSUERS

In 2005, the SEC revised the registration process. The revisions created new categories of issuers based on size and presence in the market and provided a simplified registration process for large, experienced issuers.¹³ The rules created new categories of issuers depending on their size and presence in the market and provided a simplified registration process for these issuers. The large, well-known securities firms that issue most securities have the greatest flexibility. A well-known seasoned issuer (WKSI) is a firm that has issued at least $1 billion in securities in the last three years or has at least $700 million of value of outstanding stock in the hands of the public. WKSIs can file registration statements the day they announce a new offering and are not required to wait for SEC review and approval. They can also use a free-writing prospectus at any time, even during the prefiling period.

Exempt Securities and Transactions

Certain types of securities are exempt from the registration requirements of the Securities Act of 1933. These securities—which generally can also be resold without being registered—are summarized in Exhibit 42–1 on the facing page under the heading “Exempt Securities.”¹⁴ The exhibit also lists and describes certain transactions that are exempt from registration requirements under various SEC regulations.

The transaction exemptions are the most important because they are very broad and can enable an issuer to avoid the high cost and complicated procedures associated with registration. Because the coverage of the exemptions overlaps somewhat, an offering may qualify for more than one. Therefore, many sales occur without registration. Even when a transaction is exempt from the registration requirements, the offering is still subject to the antifraud provisions of the 1933 act (as well as those of the 1934 act, to be discussed later in this chapter).

13. Securities Offering Reform, codified at 17 C.F.R. Sections 200, 228, 229, 230, 239, 240, 243, 249, and 274.

14. 15 U.S.C. Section 77c.

REGULATION A OFFERINGS An issuer’s offering of up to $5 million in securities in any twelve-month period is exempt from registration.¹⁵ Regulation A¹⁶ provides a simplified registration process for issues of securities by small businesses (companies with annual revenues of less than $25 million). The issuer must file with the SEC a notice of the issue and an offering circular, which must also be provided to investors before the sale. This process is much less expensive than the procedures associated with full registration.

Companies are allowed to “test the waters” for potential interest before preparing the offering circular. To test the waters means to determine potential interest without actually selling any securities or requiring any commitment on the part of those who express interest. Small-business issuers can also use an integrated registration and reporting system that requires simpler forms than the full registration system.

Some companies have sold their securities via the Internet using Regulation A. In 1996, the Spring Street Brewing Company became the first company to sell securities via an online IPO. Spring Street raised about $1.6 million—without having to pay any commissions to brokers or underwriters. Such online IPOs are particularly attractive to small companies and start-up ventures that may find it difficult to raise capital from institutional investors or through underwriters. By making the offering online under Regulation A, the company can avoid both commissions and the costly and time-consuming filings required for a traditional IPO under federal and state law.

REGULATION D OFFERINGS The SEC’s Regulation D contains several separate exemptions from registration requirements for limited offers (offers that either involve a small dollar amount or are made in a limited manner). Regulation D provides that any of these offerings made during any twelve-month period are exempt from the registration requirements.

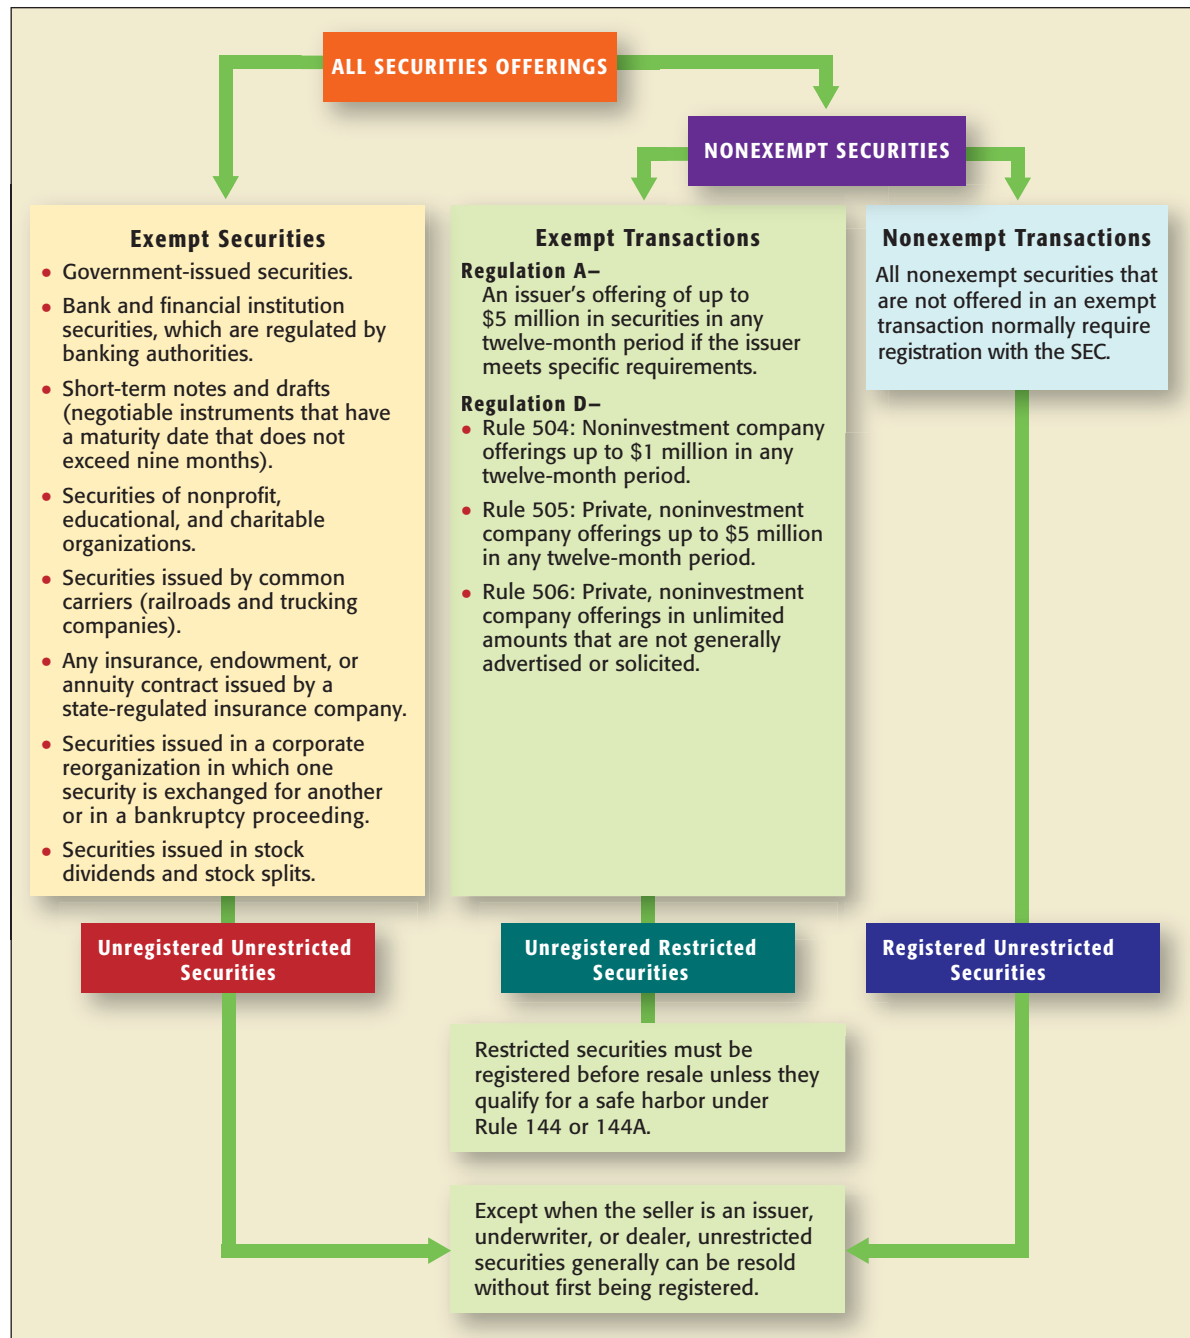

Rule 504. Rule 504 is the exemption used by most small businesses. It provides that noninvestment company offerings up to $1 million in any twelve-month period are exempt.¹⁷ Noninvestment

15. 15 U.S.C. Section 77c(b).

16. 17 C.F.R. Sections 230.251–230.263.

17. 17 C.F.R. Section 230.504. Small businesses in California may also be exempt under SEC Rule 1001. California’s rule permits limited offerings of up to $5 million per transaction, if they satisfy the conditions of Section 25102(n) of the California Corporations Code. These offerings, however, can be made only to “qualified purchasers”—that is, knowledgeable, sophisticated investors.

EXHIBIT 42-1 • Exemptions for Securities Offerings under the 1933 Securities Act companies are firms that are not engaged primarily in the business of investing or trading in securities. (In contrast, an investment company is a firm that buys a large portfolio of securities and professionally manages it on behalf of many smaller shareholders/owners. A mutual fund is a well-known type of investment company.)

For example, Zeta Enterprises is a limited partnership that develops commercial property. Zeta intends to offer $600,000 of its limited partnership interests for sale between June 1 and next May 31. The buyers will become limited partners in Zeta. Because an interest in a limited partnership meets the definition of a security (discussed earlier in this chapter), its sale is subject to the registration and prospectus requirements of the Securities Act of 1933. Under Rule 504, however, the sales of Zeta's interests are exempt from these requirements because Zeta is a noninvestment company making an offering of less than $1 million in a given twelve-month period. Therefore, Zeta can sell its interests without filing a registration statement with the SEC or issuing a prospectus to any investor.

Rule 505. Another exemption is available under Rule 505 for private, noninvestment company offerings up to $5 million in any twelve-month period. Under this exemption, the offer may be made to an unlimited number of accredited investors and up to thirty-five unaccredited investors. Accredited investors include banks, insurance companies, investment companies, employee benefit plans, the issuer's executive officers and directors, and persons whose income or net worth exceeds a certain threshold. Specific information about the offering company, its business, and the securities must be provided to all buyers before the sale if there are any unaccredited investors.

The SEC must be notified of the sales, and precautions must be taken because these restricted securities may be resold only by registration or in an exempt transaction.¹⁸ (The securities purchased and sold by most people who handle stock transactions are called, in contrast, unrestricted securities.) The purchasers must buy for investment and may not sell the securities for at least a year. No general solicitation or advertising is allowed.

Rule 506. Rule 506 exempts private, noninvestment company offerings in unlimited amounts, as long as the offerings are not generally solicited or advertised. This exemption is often referred to as the private placement exemption because it exempts "transactions not involving any public offering."¹⁹ There can be an unlimited number of accredited investors and up to thirty-five unaccredited investors. To qualify for the exemption, the issuer must believe that each unaccredited investor has sufficient knowledge or experience in financial matters to be capable of evaluating the investment's merits and risks.²⁰

The private placement exemption is perhaps the most important exemption for firms that want to raise funds through the sale of securities without registering them. For example, Citco Corporation needs to raise capital to expand its operations. Citco decides to make a private $10 million offering of its common stock directly to two hundred accredited investors and a group of thirty highly sophisticated, but unaccredited, investors. Citco provides all of these investors with a prospectus and material information about the firm, including its most recent financial statements. As long as Citco notifies the SEC of the sale, this offering will likely qualify as an exempt transaction under Rule 506. The offering is nonpublic and not generally advertised. There are fewer than thirty-five unaccredited investors, and each of them possesses sufficient knowledge and experience to evaluate the risks involved. The issuer has provided all purchasers with the material information. Thus, Citco will not be required to comply with the registration requirements of the Securities Act of 1933.

RESALES AND SAFE HARBOR RULES Most securities can be resold without registration. The Securities Act of 1933 provides exemptions for resales by most persons other than issuers or underwriters. The average investor who sells shares of stock need not file a registration statement with the SEC. Resales of restricted securities acquired under Rule 505 or Rule 506, however, trigger the registration requirements unless the party selling them complies with Rule 144 or Rule 144A. These rules are sometimes referred to as safe harbors.

Rule 144. Rule 144 exempts restricted securities from registration on resale if all of the following conditions are met:

1. There is adequate current public information about the issuer. ("Adequate current public information" refers to the reports that certain companies are required to file under the Securities Exchange Act of 1934.)
2. The person selling the securities has owned them for at least six months if the issuer is subject to the reporting requirements of the 1934 act.²¹ If

18. Precautions to be taken against nonexempt, unregistered resales include asking the investor whether he or she is buying the securities for others; disclosing to each purchaser in writing, before the sale, that the securities are unregistered and thus cannot be resold, except in an exempt transaction, without first being registered; and indicating on the certificates that the securities are unregistered and restricted.

19. 15 U.S.C. Section 77d(2).

20. 17 C.F.R. Section 230.506.

21. Before 2008, when amendments to Rule 144 became effective, the holding period for restricted securities was one year if the issuer was subject to the reporting requirements of the 1934 act. See the revised SEC Rules and Regulations at 72 Federal Rules 71546-01, 2007 WL 4368599, Release No. 33-8869. This reduced holding period allows nonpublic issuers to raise capital electronically from private and overseas sources more quickly.

the issuer is not subject to the 1934 act's reporting requirements, the seller must have owned the securities for at least one year.

3. The securities are sold in certain limited amounts in unsolicited brokers' transactions.
4. The SEC is notified of the resale.²²

Rule 144A. Securities that at the time of issue were not of the same class as securities listed on a national securities exchange or quoted in a U.S. automated interdealer quotation system may be resold under Rule 144A.²³ They may be sold only to a qualified institutional buyer (an institution, such as an insurance company or a bank, that owns and invests at least $100 million in securities). The seller must take reasonable steps to ensure that the buyer knows that the seller is relying on the exemption under Rule 144A. A sample restricted stock certificate is shown in Exhibit 42–2 below.

Violations of the 1933 Act

It is a violation of the Securities Act of 1933 to intentionally defraud investors by misrepresenting or omitting facts in a registration statement or prospectus. Liability is also imposed on those who are negligent in not discovering the fraud. Selling securities before the effective date of the registration statement or under an exemption for which the securities do not qualify results in liability.

CRIMINAL PENALTIES Criminal violations are prosecuted by the U.S. Department of Justice. Violators may be fined up to $10,000, imprisoned for up to five years, or both.

CIVIL SANCTIONS The SEC is authorized to impose civil sanctions against those who willfully violate the 1933 act. It can request an injunction to prevent further sales of the securities involved or ask a court to grant other relief, such as ordering a violator to refund profits.

Private parties who purchase securities and suffer harm as a result of false or omitted statements or other violations may bring a suit in a federal court to recover their losses and additional damages. If a registration statement or a prospectus contains material false statements or omissions, for example, damages may be recovered from those who signed the statement or those who provided information used in preparing the statement (such as accountants and other experts—see Chapter 48).

DEFENSES There are three basic defenses to charges of violations under the 1933 act. A defendant can avoid liability by proving that (1) the statement or omission was not material, (2) the plaintiff knew about the misrepresentation at the time of purchasing the stock, or (3) the defendant exercised due diligence in preparing the registration and reasonably believed at the time that the statements were true.

The due diligence defense is the most important because it can be asserted by any defendant, except the issuer of the stock. The defendant must prove that she or he reasonably believed, at the time the registration statement became effective, that the statements in it were true and there were no omissions of material facts. (This defense will be discussed further in Chapter 48, in the context of the liability of accountants.)

THE SECURITIES EXCHANGE ACT OF 1934

The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 provides for the regulation and registration of securities exchanges, brokers, dealers, and national securities associations, such as the National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD). Unlike the 1933 act, which is a one-time disclosure law, the 1934 act provides for continuous periodic disclosures by publicly held corporations to enable the SEC to regulate subsequent trading.

The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 applies to companies that have assets in excess of $10 million and five hundred or more shareholders. These corporations are referred to as Section 12 companies because they are required to register their securities under Section 12 of the 1934 act. Section 12 companies are required to file reports with the SEC annually and quarterly, and sometimes even monthly if specified events occur (such as a merger).

The act also authorizes the SEC to engage in market surveillance to deter undesirable market practices such as fraud, market manipulation, and misrepresentation. In addition, the act provides for the SEC's regulation of proxy solicitations for voting (discussed in Chapter 40).

Section 10(b), SEC Rule 10b-5, and Insider Trading

Section 10(b) is one of the more important sections of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. This section prohibits the use of any manipulative or deceptive mechanism in violation of SEC rules and regulations. Among the rules that the SEC has promulgated pursuant to the 1934 act is SEC Rule 10b-5, which prohibits the commission of fraud in connection with the purchase or sale of any security.

APPLICABILITY OF SEC RULE 10b-5 SEC Rule 10b-5 applies to almost all cases concerning the trading of securities, whether on organized exchanges, in over-the-counter markets, or in private transactions. Generally, the rule covers just about any form of security, including notes, bonds, agreements to form a corporation, and joint-venture agreements. The securities need not be registered under the 1933 act for the 1934 act to apply.

SEC Rule 10b-5 applies only when the requisites of federal jurisdiction—such as the use of stock exchange facilities or any means of interstate commerce—are present. Nevertheless, this requirement is easily met because almost every commercial transaction involves interstate contacts. In addition, the states have corporate securities laws, many of which include provisions similar to SEC Rule 10b-5.

INSIDER TRADING One of the major goals of Section 10(b) and SEC Rule 10b-5 is to prevent so-called insider trading, which occurs when persons buy or sell securities on the basis of information that is not available to the public. Corporate directors, officers, and others, such as majority shareholders, often have advance inside information that can affect the future market value of the corporate stock. Obviously, if they act on this information, their positions give them a trading advantage over the general public and other shareholders.

The 1934 Securities Exchange Act defines inside information. It also extends liability to those who take advantage of such information in their personal transactions when they know that the information is unavailable to those with whom they are dealing. Section 10(b) of the 1934 act and SEC Rule 10b-5 apply to anyone who has access to or receives information of a nonpublic nature on which trading is based—not just to corporate “insiders.”

DISCLOSURE UNDER SEC RULE 10b-5 Any material omission or misrepresentation of material facts in connection with the purchase or sale of a security may violate Section 10(b) of the 1934 act and SEC Rule 10b-5. The key to liability (which can be civil or criminal) is whether the information omitted or misrepresented is material.

The following are some examples of material facts calling for disclosure under SEC Rule 10b-5:

1. Fraudulent trading in the company stock by a broker-dealer.
2. A dividend change (whether up or down).
3. A contract for the sale of corporate assets.
4. A new discovery, a new process, or a new product.
5. A significant change in the firm's financial condition.
6. Potential litigation against the company.

Note that any one of these facts, by itself, is not automatically considered material. Rather, it will be regarded as a material fact only if it is significant enough that it would likely affect an investor's decision as to whether to purchase or sell the company's securities.

For example, Sheen, Inc., is the defendant in a class-action product liability suit that its attorney, Paula Frasier, believes that the company will lose.

Frasier has advised Sheen's directors, officers, and accountants that the company will likely have to pay a substantial damages award. Sheen plans to make a $5 million offering of newly issued stock before the date when the trial is expected to end. Sheen's potential liability and the financial consequences to the firm are material facts that must be disclosed because they are significant enough to affect an investor's decision as to whether to purchase the stock.

The case that follows is a landmark decision interpreting SEC Rule 10b-5. The SEC sued several of Texas Gulf Sulphur Company's directors, officers, and employees under SEC Rule 10b-5 after they purchased large amounts of the company's stock before the announcement of a rich ore discovery by the corporation. At issue was whether the ore discovery was a material fact that had to be disclosed under Rule 10b-5.

SEC v. Texas Gulf Sulphur Co.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 401 F.2d 833 (1968).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Texas Gulf Sulphur Company (TGS) conducted aerial geophysical surveys over more than 15,000 square miles of eastern Canada. The operations indicated concentrations of commercially exploitable minerals. At one site near Timmins, Ontario, TGS drilled a hole that appeared to yield a core with an exceedingly high mineral content. TGS kept secret the results of the core sample. Officers and employees of the company made substantial purchases of TGS's stock or accepted stock options (rights to purchase stock) after learning of the ore discovery, even though further drilling was necessary to establish whether there was enough ore to be mined commercially. Several months later, TGS announced that the strike was expected to yield at least 25 million tons of ore. Subsequently, the price of TGS stock rose substantially. The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) brought a suit against the officers and employees of TGS for violating SEC Rule 10b-5. The officers and employees argued that the information on which they had traded had not been material at the time of their trades because the mine had not then been commercially proved. The trial court held that most of the defendants had not violated SEC Rule 10b-5, and the SEC appealed.

* * * Whether facts are material within Rule 10b-5 when the facts relate to a particular event and are undisclosed by those persons who are knowledgeable thereof will depend at any given time upon a balancing of both the indicated probability that the event will occur and the anticipated magnitude of the event in light of the totality of the company activity. Here, * * * knowledge of the possibility, which surely was more than marginal, of the existence of a mine of the vast magnitude indicated by the remarkably rich drill core located rather close to the surface (suggesting mineability by the less expensive openpit method) within the confines of a large anomaly (suggesting an extensive region of mineralization) might well have affected the price of TGS stock and would certainly have been an important fact to a reasonable, if speculative, investor in deciding whether he should buy, sell, or hold. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 42.1 CONTINUED ♦ * * * A major factor in determining whether the * * * discovery was a material fact is the importance attached to the drilling results by those who knew about it. * * * The timing by those who knew of it of their stock purchases * * *—purchases in some cases by individuals who had never before purchased * * * TGS stock—virtually compels the inference that the insiders were influenced by the drilling results.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The appellate court ruled in favor of the SEC. All of the trading by insiders who knew of the mineral find before its true extent had been publicly announced violated SEC Rule 10b-5.

IMPACT OF THIS CASE ON TODAY'S LAW • This landmark case affirmed the principle that the test of whether information is “material,” for SEC Rule 10b-5 purposes, is whether it would affect the judgment of reasonable investors. The corporate insiders’ purchases of stock and stock options indicated that they were influenced by the drilling results and that the information about the drilling results was material. The courts continue to cite this case when applying SEC Rule 10b-5 to cases of alleged insider trading.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that further drilling had revealed that there was not enough ore at this site for it to be mined commercially. Would the defendants still have been liable for violating SEC Rule 10b-5? Why or why not?

The Private Securities Litigation Reform Act. One of the unintended effects of SEC Rule 10b-5 was to deter disclosure of forward-looking information. To understand why, consider an example. A company announces that its projected earnings in a certain time period will be $15 million. It turns out that the forecast is wrong. The earnings are in fact much lower, and the price of the company's stock is affected—negatively. The shareholders then bring a class-action suit against the company, alleging that the directors violated SEC Rule 10b-5 by disclosing misleading financial information.

In an attempt to rectify this problem and promote disclosure, Congress passed the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act (PSLRA) of 1995. Among other things, the PSLRA provides a “safe harbor” for publicly held companies that make forward-looking statements, such as financial forecasts. Those who make such statements are protected against liability for securities fraud as long as the statements are accompanied by “meaningful cautionary statements identifying important factors that could cause actual results to differ materially from those in the forward-looking statement.”²⁴

The Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act. After the PSLRA was passed, a number of class-action suits involving securities were filed in state courts to skirt its requirements. In response to this problem, Congress passed the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act (SLUSA) of 1998.²⁵ This act placed stringent limits on the ability of plaintiffs to bring class-action suits in state courts against firms whose securities are traded on national stock exchanges. The SLUSA not only prevents the purchasers and sellers of securities from bringing class-action fraud claims under state securities laws, but it also applies to investors who are fraudulently induced to hold on to their securities.²⁶

OUTSIDERS AND SEC RULE 10b-5 The traditional insider-trading case involves true insiders—corporate officers, directors, and majority shareholders who have access to (and trade on) inside information. Increasingly, however, liability under Section 10(b) of the 1934 act and SEC Rule 10b-5 has been extended to include certain “outsiders”—those who trade on inside information acquired indirectly. Two theories have been developed under which outsiders may be held liable for insider trading: the tipper/tippee theory and the misappropriation theory. In 2008, the United States Supreme Court heard a case in which the plaintiffs attempted to assert a third theory—scheme liability.

CASE IN POINT In 2000, management at the cable operator Charter Communications devised an accounting scheme that would artificially inflate its reported revenues. As part of the scheme, Charter's cable converter (set top) box suppliers, Scientific-Atlanta and Motorola, agreed to overcharge Charter for the cable boxes in exchange for additional advertising on Charter's cable network. A group of investors sued Scientific-Atlanta and Motorola, alleging violation of Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and of SEC Rule 10b-5. The United States Supreme Court affirmed the dismissal of the suit, holding that Section 10(b)'s private right of action cannot be applied to suppliers or customers who seemingly "aid and abet" a scheme to show inflated sales revenues for a publicly traded company. The Court pointed out that the suppliers had no role in preparing or disseminating Charter's financial statements. The financial statements of both Scientific-Atlanta and Motorola were correct, and their deceptive acts were not communicated to the investing public. Consequently, the plaintiffs were unable to show reliance upon any of the actions of Scientific-Atlanta and Motorola "except in an indirect chain" that the Court found too remote to justify liability.²⁷

25. Pub. L. No. 105-353. This act amended many sections of Title 15 of the United States Code.

26. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc. v. Dabit, 547 U.S. 71, 126 S.Ct. 1503, 164 L.Ed.2d 179 (2006).

Tipper/Tippee Theory. Anyone who acquires inside information as a result of a corporate insider's breach of his or her fiduciary duty can be liable under SEC Rule 10b-5. This liability extends to tippees (those who receive "tips" from insiders) and even remote tippees (tippees of tippees).

The key to liability under this theory is that the inside information must be obtained as a result of someone's breach of a fiduciary duty to the corporation whose shares are traded. The tippee is liable under this theory only if (1) there is a breach of a duty not to disclose inside information, (2) the disclosure is made in exchange for personal benefit, and (3) the tippee knows (or should know) of this breach and benefits from it.²⁸

Misappropriation Theory. Liability for insider trading may also be established under the misappropriation theory. Under this theory, an individual who wrongfully obtains (misappropriates) inside information and trades on it for her or his personal gain is held liable because the individual stole information rightfully belonging to another.

The misappropriation theory has been controversial because it significantly extends the reach of SEC Rule 10b-5 to outsiders who ordinarily would not be deemed fiduciaries of the corporations in whose stock they trade. It is not always wrong to disclose material, nonpublic information about a company to a person who would not otherwise be privy to it. Nevertheless, a person who obtains the information and trades securities on it can be held liable.

CASE IN POINT Patricia Rocklage was the wife of Scott Rocklage, the chief executive officer of Cubist Pharmaceuticals, Inc. Scott had sometimes disclosed material, nonpublic information about Cubist to Patricia. She had always kept the information confidential. In 2001, however, when Scott told Patricia that one of Cubist's key drugs had failed its clinical trial, Patricia refused to keep the information secret. She warned her brother, William Beaver, who owned Cubist stock. Beaver sold his Cubist shares and tipped his friend David Jones, who sold his shares. When Cubist publicly announced the trial results, the price of its stock dropped. Beaver and Jones avoided significant losses by selling when they did. The SEC filed a lawsuit against Patricia, Beaver, and Jones. The defendants claimed that because Patricia had told her husband that she was going to tell her brother about the failed trial, they had not "misappropriated" the information. The court, however, determined that Patricia had "engaged in deceptive devices," because she had "tricked her husband into revealing confidential information to her so that she could, and did, assist her brother with the sale of his Cubist stock." The court therefore found all three defendants guilty of insider trading under the misappropriation theory.²⁹

Insider Reporting and Trading—Section 16(b)

Section 16(b) of the 1934 act provides for the recapture by the corporation of all profits realized by certain insiders on any purchase and sale or sale and purchase of the corporation's stock within any six-month period. It is irrelevant whether the insider actually uses inside information; all such short-swung profits must be returned to the corporation. In this context, insiders means officers, directors, and large stockholders of Section 12 corporations (those owning 10 percent of the class of equity securities registered under Section 12 of the 1934 act).³⁰ To discourage such insiders from using nonpublic information about their companies to their personal benefit in the stock market, they must file reports with the SEC concerning their ownership and trading of the corporation's securities.

Section 16(b) applies not only to stock but also to warrants, options, and securities convertible into stock. In addition, the courts have fashioned complex rules for determining profits. Note that the SEC exempts a number of transactions under Rule 16b-3.³¹ For all of these reasons, corporate insiders should seek the advice of competent counsel before trading in the corporation's stock. Exhibit 42-3 below compares the effects of SEC Rule 10b-5 and Section 16(b).

Regulation of Proxy Statements

Section 14(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 regulates the solicitation of proxies (see Chapter 40) from shareholders of Section 12 companies. The SEC regulates the content of proxy statements. Whoever solicits a proxy must fully and accurately disclose in the proxy statement all of the facts that are pertinent to the matter on which the shareholders are to vote. SEC Rule 14a-9 is similar to the antifraud provisions of SEC Rule 10b-5. Remedies for violations are extensive, ranging from injunctions to prevent a vote from being taken to monetary damages.

Violations of the 1934 Act

As mentioned earlier, violations of Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5, including insider trading, may lead to both criminal and civil liability. For either criminal or civil sanctions to be imposed, however, scienter must exist—that is, the violator must have had an intent to defraud or knowledge of his or her misconduct (see Chapter 14). Scienter can be proved if it is shown that the defendant made false statements or wrongfully failed to disclose material facts.

Violations of Section 16(b) include the sale by insiders of stock acquired less than six months before the time of sale (or less than six months after the sale, if selling short—that is, selling securities that one does not yet own). These violations are subject to civil sanctions. Liability under Section 16(b) is strict liability. Neither scienter nor negligence is required.

In the following case, the defendants were accused of securities fraud in violation of Section 10(b) and SEC Rule 10b-5. At issue was whether the defendants had acted with scienter.

Gebhart v. SEC

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 595 F.3d 1034 (2010).

FISHER, Circuit Judge.

In 1994, [Alvin Gebhart] began working at Mutual of New York (MONY) in San Diego, where he sold annuities and mutual funds. While at MONY, Gebhart met Jack Archer, a fellow MONY salesperson. In 1995, Archer told Gebhart about a business venture, Community Service Group (CSG), run by James Scovie. CSG was in the business of converting mobile home parks to resident ownership. CSG purchased parks from the owners and then assisted residents in purchasing them. In late 1996, Scovie and another person, David Mounier, created MHP Conversions, LLC (MHP), to facilitate the conversion process. MHP issued promissory notes that were sold to individual investors to raise funds for CSG's purchase of the parks. The MHP notes had one-year terms with fixed interest rates of 18 percent for new investments and 14 percent for reinvested funds. Each note stated that it would "ultimately be secured by a deed of trust" on the particular park to be purchased with the funds, but that "until such time as said deed of trust is recorded, the sole asset of [the issuer] will be a deed of trust for the property known as Eastern Trailer Park."

Archer told Gebhart about the MHP program, and * * * Gebhart arranged for Archer to make a presentation of the MHP program to three of his clients, all of whom made investments in the program.

In early 1996, Gebhart moved from MONY to another financial services firm, Mutual Service Corporation (MSC), a broker-dealer and member of the NASD [National Association of Securities Dealers]. His wife, Donna Gebhart, joined him at MSC, and the two opened and operated a MSC branch in Rancho Bernardo, California, where they sold insurance and annuities and provided financial planning services to clients. In October 1996, Archer approached the Gebharts about selling MHP notes to their MSC clients. * * * Archer told them that the MHP program had been approved by the compliance officer at Archer's firm, MONY. This was not true, however. Archer also told the Gebharts "that the parks were in good shape and he always assured us that they had a lot of equity in them * * *."

The Gebharts conducted no independent investigation into the MHP program, either in 1996 or over the next four years, during which time they sold MHP [financial] notes to their clients. They failed to obtain any financial statements for CSG or MHP, ascertain who were the owners, officers, or shareholders of CSG or MHP, determine what compensation would be paid to CSG or MHP or their officers, verify that trust deeds securing the notes were being recorded, or obtain copies of recorded trust deeds. * * * Although the Gebharts believed that their clients' loans would be secured by second trust deeds, they did not inquire why they were not first trust deeds or who held the first trust deeds. In lieu of an independent investigation, the Gebharts relied on Archer's representations.

* * * *

Between the Gebharts' meeting with Archer in October 1996 and CSG's collapse in 2000, the Gebharts sold nearly $2.4 million in MHP promissory notes to 45 of their clients, earning about $105,000 in commission fees. The sales were based on several statements by the Gebharts that, it later became clear, were false. The Gebharts told their clients that the MHP notes were a proven investment that offered substantial returns and were secured by recorded deeds of trust. They said that in the worst case scenario their clients would be part owners of the mobile home parks and would be able to recover their investments. In fact, the trust deeds were not recorded and the parks were significantly over-encumbered [had excessive debt]. The Gebharts failed to disclose that their statements were based on information provided by Archer rather than their own, independent investigation.

* * * At the time of MHP's collapse [in 2000], the Gebharts' clients had over $1.5 million invested in outstanding MHP notes. MSC terminated the Gebharts' employment in August 2000.

As a result of these events, in 2002 the NASD's Department of Enforcement filed a complaint against the Gebharts for securities fraud. * * * A NASD hearing panel found that the Gebharts had acted in good faith and therefore rejected the fraud charges, but the NASD National Adjudicatory Council (NAC) reversed. The NAC found that the Gebharts had committed fraud, imposed a lifetime bar on Alvin Gebhart, and imposed a one-year suspension and a $15,000 fine on

Donna Gebhart. The SEC [Securities and Exchange Commission] upheld the NASD decision in 2006.

The Gebharts petitioned for review of the SEC decision.

* * * *

To establish a violation of Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5, the SEC is required to “show that there has been a misstatement or omission of material fact, made with scienter.” “The plaintiffs may establish scienter by proving either actual knowledge or recklessness.”

* * * *

Scienter * * * is a subjective inquiry. It turns on the defendant’s actual state of mind. Thus, although we may consider the objective unreasonableness of the defendant’s conduct to raise an inference of scienter, the ultimate question is whether the defendant knew his or her statements were false, or was consciously reckless as to their truth or falsity. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The Gebharts contend that the SEC applied an erroneous scienter standard in this case by focusing exclusively on * * * objective inquiry and disregarding evidence of subjective good faith. We disagree. The SEC considered all of the evidence bearing on the Gebharts’ actual state of mind, including the Gebharts’ extreme departure from ordinary standards of care, and found that the Gebharts were consciously aware of the risk that their statements were false. There was no error.

The SEC certainly considered the objective unreasonableness of the Gebharts’ actions as part of its analysis. The SEC found that the Gebharts failed to perform any meaningful investigation into the MHP promissory notes—an extreme departure from ordinary standards of care that “created the substantial [and obvious] risk * * * that their representations were not true.” The SEC found that the Gebharts “made no effort to investigate or understand why their clients were being sold second (and not first) deeds of trust; no effort to identify the first trust deed holders or the amounts of those outstanding trust deeds; and no effort to ensure their clients’ investments were actually being secured by recorded trust deeds.” The Gebharts made “no effort” to corroborate [substantiate] Archer’s representations that the parks were not overly encumbered.

The SEC properly considered the objective unreasonableness of the Gebharts’ actions as some evidence supporting the inference that the Gebharts acted with scienter, but did not treat it as dispositive [a deciding factor]. The * * * [SEC] evaluated “the evidence the Gebharts put forward to demonstrate their good faith beliefs” as “part of the complete mix of facts bearing on an evaluation of their [actual] state of mind” and concluded that the “evidence from the Gebharts about their subjective belief [was] not sufficient to overcome” the inference of scienter created by the evidence as a whole. The Gebharts’ assertions of good faith were “not plausible” and lacked “credibility.” Based on the evidence as a whole, the SEC determined that the Gebharts “knew they had no direct knowledge of the truth or falsity” of their statements, and made their statements “despite not knowing whether they were true or false.” The SEC correctly applied the appropriate scienter standard.

PETITION DENIED.

QUESTIONS

1. At one point in the opinion (not included here), the court noted that “there is no evidence in the record that the Gebharts ever intended to defraud anyone.” Why, then, did the court conclude that the Gebharts had acted with scienter?
2. According to the court, if the evidence before an agency is “susceptible to more than one rational interpretation,” the court “may not substitute its judgment for that of the agency.” Why do the courts show such deference to agency rulings?

CRIMINAL PENALTIES For violations of Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5, an individual may be fined up to $5 million, imprisoned for up to twenty years, or both. A partnership or a corporation may be fined up to $25 million. Under Section 807 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, for a willful violation of the 1934 act the violator can be imprisoned for up to twenty-five years (in addition to being subject to a fine). For a defendant to be convicted in a criminal prosecution under the securities laws, there can be no reasonable doubt that the defendant knew he or she was acting wrongfully—a jury is not allowed merely to speculate that the defendant may have acted willfully.

CASE IN POINT Martha Stewart, founder of a well-known media and homemaking empire, was once charged with intentionally deceiving investors based on statements she made at a conference. In December 2001, Stewart’s stockbroker allegedly informed Stewart that the head of ImClone Systems, Inc., was selling his shares in that company. Stewart then sold her ImClone shares. The next day, ImClone announced that the Food and Drug Administration had failed to approve Erbitux, a greatly anticipated medication that the company had been developing. After the government began investigating Stewart's ImClone trades, she publicly stated at a Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia conference that she had previously instructed her stockbroker to sell her ImClone stock if the price fell to $60 per share. The government then filed a lawsuit, claiming that Stewart's statement showed she had the intent to deceive investors. The court, however, acquitted Stewart on this charge because "to find the essential element of criminal intent beyond a reasonable doubt, a rational juror would have to speculate."³²

CIVIL SANCTIONS The SEC can also bring a civil action against anyone who violates or aids in a violation of the 1934 act or SEC rules by purchasing or selling a security while in the possession of material nonpublic information.³³ The violation must occur through the use of a national securities exchange or a broker or dealer.³⁴ The court may assess as a penalty as much as triple the profits gained or the loss avoided by the guilty party.³⁵ The Insider Trading and Securities Fraud Enforcement Act of 1988 enlarged the class of persons who may be subject to civil liability for insider trading and gave the SEC authority to offer monetary rewards to informants.³⁶

Private parties may also sue violators of Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5. A private party may obtain rescission (cancellation) of a contract to buy securities or damages to the extent of the violator's illegal profits. Those found liable have a right to seek contribution from those who share responsibility for the violations, including accountants, attorneys, and corporations. (The liability of accountants and attorneys for violations of the securities laws is discussed in Chapter 48.) For violations of Section 16(b), a corporation can bring an action to recover the short-swing profits.

Recall from Chapter 14 that a required element of fraud is reliance. The innocent party must justifiably have relied on the misrepresentation. If an investor is aware of misrepresentations by corporate management and purchases shares in the firm anyway, can the investor still bring a lawsuit against the corporation for a violation of Rule 10b-5? That was the question in the following case.

34. Transactions pursuant to a public offering by an issuer of securities are excepted.

CASE 42.3

Stark Trading v. Falconbridge, Ltd.

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 552 F.3d 568 (2009).
www.ca7.uscourts.gov^a

COMPANY PROFILE • Brian Stark's interest in investing began in high school, when he worked for his father, an independent accountant. Together, they invested in the financial markets. Stark tested his own investment theories throughout college and law school, where he met Mike Roth. In 1992, Stark and Roth formed Stark Trading. Known today as Stark Investments, the firm invests in commodities, real estate, equity, and other markets. Its principals apply hedging and portfolio management techniques on behalf of their investors, including institutions, investment funds, and wealthy individuals. The firm has offices in cities around the world, including Hong Kong, London, Singapore, and Toronto.

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Stark Trading was a minority shareholder in Falconbridge, Inc. Noranda, Inc., owned 59 percent of Falconbridge. Both were Canadian mining companies. Noranda offered its common stockholders preferred stock for their common stock. Noranda also offered to redeem the preferred stock for $25 per share, which exceeded the market value of the common stock. On the same day, Noranda offered minority shareholders in Falconbridge 1.77 shares of Noranda common stock for each share of Falconbridge common stock. Stark knew that Noranda's value was overstated in the offer to its common stockholders. Stark thought that the Falconbridge stock was CASE 42.3 CONTINUED ♦ undervalued in the market. This meant that Noranda was buying out Falconbridge's shareholders at a reduced price. Stark sent a letter explaining this to the Ontario Securities Commission. Nonetheless, Stark exchanged its Falconbridge shares for Noranda stock. Later, Noranda and Falconbridge merged to become Falconbridge, Ltd. Stark and others filed a suit in a federal district court against the new firm, alleging a violation of Rule 10b-5. The court dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

POSNER, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

In a typical Rule 10b-5 case, the plaintiff buys stock at a price that he claims was inflated by misrepresentations by the corporation's management and sells his stock at a loss when the truth comes out and the price plummets. * * * [The plaintiffs] argue that * * * the offer to swap preferred stock in Noranda for common stock inflated the apparent value of Noranda stock, and therefore made the offer of Noranda stock for Falconbridge stock look generous. But they were not fooled. They knew that the tender offer undervalued Falconbridge—that Noranda was trying to buy out the minority shareholders (thus including the plaintiffs) cheap. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * We cannot find any basis for inferring that [the plaintiffs] relied on the defendants' [offer as a representation of the value] of Falconbridge. They knew better. They knew Falconbridge was worth a lot—that's why they invested. They thought the tender offer price was too low and that Noranda had resorted to fraud to make it succeed. They had known [when they bought their Falconbridge stock] they were buying into a company that had a majority shareholder, that it was a Canadian company, and therefore that a minority shareholder would not have the same legal protections (such as appraisal rights) that minority shareholders in U.S. corporations have. They also had to know that because they thought Falconbridge undervalued, so would Noranda, which would therefore try to buy out the minority shareholders before the market revalued Falconbridge upward. * * * And a week before the deadline for tendering their shares, the plaintiffs revealed in their letter to the [Canadian] securities commission the evidence that * * * Noranda [was] trying to pull a fast one on the minority shareholders.

* * * *

* * * Sophisticated investors, they must have considered the combination of the tender-offer price and a later suit (this suit) against the defendants a better deal than holding on to their shares and by doing so, and disseminating their doubts, trying to defeat the tender offer. That is not a strategy that the courts should reward in the name of rectifying securities fraud.

DECISION AND REMEDY • *The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit upheld the lower court's decision. "So implausible is an inference of reliance from the complaint in this case * * * that the dismissal of the 10b-5 claim must be affirmed."*

THE GLOBAL DIMENSION • Noranda and Falconbridge were Canadian companies. Falconbridge, Ltd., was later bought by Xstrata, a Swiss mining company. On what basis could a U.S. court exercise jurisdiction in this case?

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Stark's assessment of the value of Falconbridge proved correct. On the day the suit in this case was filed, the Noranda shares that Stark had received in exchange for its Falconbridge shares were worth about 50 percent more than what Stark had paid in accepting the offer. In other words, the plaintiffs could not allege that they had suffered a loss as a result of the trade. What effect does this fact have on their complaint?

STATE SECURITIES LAWS

Today, every state has its own corporate securities laws, or blue sky laws, that regulate the offer and sale of securities within its borders. (The phrase blue sky laws dates to a 1917 decision by the United States Supreme Court in which the Court declared that the purpose of such laws was to prevent "speculative schemes which have no more basis than so many feet of 'blue sky.'")³⁷ Article 8 of the Uniform 37. Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., 242 U.S. 539, 37 S.Ct. 217, 61 L.Ed. 480 (1917).

Commercial Code, which has been adopted by all of the states, also imposes various requirements relating to the purchase and sale of securities.

Requirements

Typically, state laws have disclosure requirements and antifraud provisions, many of which are patterned after Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5. State laws also provide for the registration of securities offered or issued for sale within the state and impose disclosure requirements. Methods of registration, required disclosures, and exemptions from registration vary among states. Unless an exemption from registration is applicable, issuers must register or qualify their stock with the appropriate state official, often called a corporations commissioner. Additionally, most state securities laws regulate securities brokers and dealers.

Concurrent Regulation

State securities laws apply mainly to intrastate transactions. Since the adoption of the 1933 and 1934 federal securities acts, the state and federal governments have regulated securities concurrently. Issuers must comply with both federal and state securities laws, and exemptions from federal law are not exemptions from state laws.

The dual federal and state system has not always worked well, particularly during the early 1990s, when the securities markets underwent considerable expansion. In response, Congress passed the National Securities Markets Improvement Act of 1996, which eliminated some of the duplicate regulations and gave the SEC exclusive power to regulate most national securities activities. The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws then substantially revised the Uniform Securities Act to coordinate state and federal securities regulation and enforcement efforts. The new version was offered to the states for adoption in 2002. Seventeen states have adopted the Uniform Securities Act.³⁸

38. At the time this book went to press, the Uniform Securities Act had been adopted in Georgia, Hawaii, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, New Mexico, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Vermont, and Wisconsin, as well as in the U.S. Virgin Islands. You can find current information on state adoptions at www.nccusl.org.

SECTION 5 CORPORATE GOVERNANCE

Corporate governance can be narrowly defined as the relationship between a corporation and its shareholders. According to a broader definition, corporate governance specifies the rights and responsibilities among different corporate participants (including stakeholders) and spells out the rules and procedures for making decisions on corporate affairs. Regardless of the way it is defined, effective corporate governance requires more than just compliance with laws and regulations.

Because corporate ownership (by shareholders) is separated from corporate control (by officers and managers), effective corporate governance is essential in large corporations. Otherwise, officers and managers may be able to advance their own interests at the expense of the shareholders. The well-publicized corporate scandals in the early 2000s clearly illustrate the reasons for concern about managerial opportunism. Indeed, corporate governance has become an issue of concern for corporate entities around the world. With the globalization of business, a corporation's bad acts (or lack of control systems) can have far-reaching consequences.

Attempts at Aligning the Interests of Officers with Those of Shareholders

Some corporations have sought to align the financial interests of their officers with those of the company's shareholders by providing the officers with stock options, which enable them to purchase shares of the corporation's stock at a set price. When the market price rises above that level, the officers can sell their shares for a profit. Because a stock's market price generally increases as the corporation prospers, the options give the officers a financial stake in the corporation's well-being and supposedly encourage them to work hard for the benefit of the shareholders.

Options have turned out to be an imperfect device for providing effective governance, however. Executives in some companies have "cooked" the company's books in order to keep share prices high so that they could sell their stock for a profit. Executives in other firms have had their options "repriced" so that they did not suffer any loss when the share price declined (and so that they could still profit from future increases above the lowered share price). Thus, although stock options theoretically can motivate officers to protect shareholder interests, stock option plans have sometimes become a way for officers to take advantage of shareholders.

The Goal Is to Promote Accountability

Effective corporate governance standards are designed to address problems such as those briefly discussed above and to motivate officers to make decisions that promote the financial interests of the company's shareholders. Generally, corporate governance entails corporate decision-making structures that monitor employees (particularly officers) to ensure that they are acting for the benefit of the shareholders. Thus, corporate governance involves, at a minimum:

1. The audited reporting of financial conditions at the corporation so that managers can be evaluated.
2. Legal protections for shareholders so that violators of the law who attempt to take advantage of shareholders can be punished for misbehavior and victims can recover damages for any associated losses.

Effective corporate governance can have considerable practical significance because corporate decision makers necessarily become more accountable for their actions to shareholders. Firms that are more accountable to shareholders typically report higher profits, higher sales growth, higher firm value, and other economic advantages. Thus, a corporation with better corporate governance and greater accountability to investors may also have a higher valuation than a corporation that is less concerned about governance.

Governance and Corporate Law

State corporation statutes set up the legal framework for corporate governance. Under the corporate law of Delaware, where most major companies incorporate, all corporations must have certain structures of corporate governance in place. The most important structure, of course, is the board of directors because the board makes the major decisions about the future of the corporation.

Some argue that shareholder democracy is the key to improving corporate governance. If shareholders could have more say on major corporate decisions, they presumably could have more control over the corporation. Essential to shareholder democracy is the election of the board of directors, usually at the corporation's annual meeting.

Although shareholders vote for directors, they often find it difficult to elect their nominees because organizing enough shareholders to sway an election can be very costly. In 2010, the SEC announced that it would work to modernize shareholder voting and proxy rules to reduce these costs and give shareholders direct access to other shareholders through the company's facilities for communicating with shareholders. The SEC's goal is to make the contest more even between the shareholders' candidates and the company's nominees.

THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS Under corporate law, a corporation must have a board of directors elected by the shareholders. Almost anyone can become a director, though some organizations, such as the New York Stock Exchange, require certain standards of service for directors of their listed corporations.

Directors are responsible for ensuring that the corporation's officers are operating wisely and in the exclusive interest of shareholders. Directors receive reports from the officers and give them managerial directions. In reality, though, corporate directors devote a relatively small amount of time to monitoring officers.

Ideally, shareholders would monitor the directors' supervision of the officers. In practice, however, it can be difficult for shareholders to monitor directors and hold them responsible for corporate failings. Although the directors can be sued if they fail to do their jobs effectively, directors are rarely held personally liable.

THE COMPENSATION COMMITTEE An important committee of the board of directors, mentioned in Chapter 40, is the compensation committee, which determines the compensation to be paid to the company's officers. As part of this process, the committee must assess the officers' performance and design a compensation system that will best align the officers' interests with those of the shareholders.

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002

As discussed in Chapter 5, in 2002, following a series of corporate scandals, Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act (see Appendix H for excerpts and explanatory comments). The act addresses certain issues relating to corporate governance. Generally, the act attempts to increase corporate accountability by imposing strict disclosure requirements and harsh penalties for violations of securities laws. Among other things, the act requires chief corporate executives to take personal responsibility for the accuracy of financial statements and reports that are filed with the SEC.

REPORTING ON EFFECTIVENESS OF INTERNAL CONTROLS

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act requires all public companies to assess the effectiveness of their internal controls over financial reporting and to comply with certain procedures. Although the 2002 act initially required all public companies to have an independent auditor file a report with the SEC on management's assessment of internal controls, Congress enacted an exemption for smaller companies in 2010. In an effort to reduce compliance costs, public companies with a market capitalization, or public float, of less than $75 million no longer need to have an auditor report on management's assessment of internal controls.

OTHER PROVISIONS Additionally, the act requires that certain financial and stock-transaction reports be filed with the SEC earlier than was required under the previous rules. The act also created a new entity, called the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which regulates and oversees public accounting firms. Other provisions of the act established new private civil actions and expanded the SEC's remedies in administrative and civil actions.

Because of the importance of this act, we present some of its key provisions relating to corporate accountability in Exhibit 42-4 on the following page. (Provisions of the act that relate to public accounting firms and accounting practices will be discussed in Chapter 48, in the context of the liability of accountants.)

INTERNAL CONTROLS AND ACCOUNTABILITY The Sarbanes-Oxley Act includes some traditional securities law provisions but also introduces direct federal corporate governance requirements for public companies (companies whose shares are traded in the public securities markets). The law addresses many of the corporate governance procedures just discussed and creates new requirements in an attempt to make the system work more effectively. The requirements deal with independent monitoring of company officers by both the board of directors and the auditors.

Sections 302 and 404 of the act require high-level managers (the most senior officers) to establish and maintain an effective system of internal controls. Moreover, senior management must reassess the system's effectiveness on an annual basis. Some companies already had strong and effective internal control systems in place before the passage of the act, but others had to take expensive steps to bring their internal controls up to the new federal standards. These include "disclosure controls and procedures" to ensure that the company's financial reports are accurate and timely. Assessment must involve documenting financial results and accounting policies before reporting the results. After the act was passed, hundreds of publicly held companies reported that they had identified and corrected shortcomings in their internal control systems.

CERTIFICATION AND MONITORING Section 906 requires that chief executive officers and chief financial officers certify the accuracy of the information in the corporate financial statements. These corporate officers are subject to both civil and criminal penalties for violations of this section. This requirement makes the officers directly accountable for the accuracy of their financial reporting and precludes any "ignorance defense" if shortcomings are later discovered.

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act also includes requirements to improve directors' monitoring of officers' activities. All members of the corporate audit committee for public companies must be outside directors. The New York Stock Exchange has a similar rule that also extends to the board's compensation committee. The audit committee must have a written charter that sets out its duties and provides for performance appraisal. At least one "financial expert" must serve on the audit committee, which must hold executive meetings without company officers being present. The audit committee must also establish procedures to encourage whistleblowers (see Chapter 34) to report violations. In addition to reviewing the internal controls, the committee also monitors the actions of the outside auditor.

ONLINE SECURITIES FRAUD

A major problem facing the SEC today is how to enforce the antifraud provisions of the securities laws in the online environment. In 1999, in the first cases involving illegal online securities offerings, the SEC filed suit against three individuals for illegally offering securities on an Internet auction site.³⁹ In

39. In re Davis, SEC Administrative File No. 3-10080 (October 20, 1999); In re Haas, SEC Administrative File No. 3-10081 (October 20, 1999); and In re Sitaras, SEC Administrative File No. 3-10082 (October 20, 1999).

EXHIBIT 42-4 • Some Key Provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 Relating to Corporate Accountability

Certification Requirements: Under Section 906 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the chief executive officers (CEOs) and chief financial officers (CFOs) of most major companies listed on public stock exchanges must certify financial statements that are filed with the SEC. CEOs and CFOs have to certify that filed financial reports “fully comply” with SEC requirements and that all of the information reported “fairly represents in all material respects, the financial conditions and results of operations of the issuer.”

Under Section 302 of the act, CEOs and CFOs of reporting companies are required to certify that a signing officer reviewed each quarterly and annual filing with the SEC and that it contains no untrue statements of material fact. Also, the signing officer or officers must certify that they have established an internal control system to identify all material information and that any deficiencies in the system were disclosed to the auditors.

Effectiveness of Internal Controls on Financial Reporting: Under Section 404(a), all public companies are required to assess the effectiveness of their internal controls over financial reporting. Section 404(b) requires independent auditors to report on management’s assessment of internal controls, but companies with a public float of less than $75 million are exempted from this requirement.

Loans to Directors and Officers: Section 402 prohibits any reporting company, as well as any private company that is filing an initial public offering, from making personal loans to directors and executive officers (with a few limited exceptions, such as for certain consumer and housing loans).

Protection for Whistleblowers: Section 806 protects “whistleblowers”—employees who report (“blow the whistle” on) securities violations by their employers—from being fired or in any way discriminated against by their employers.

Blackout Periods: Section 306 prohibits certain types of securities transactions during “blackout periods”—periods during which the issuer’s ability to purchase, sell, or otherwise transfer funds in individual account plans (such as pension funds) is suspended.

Enhanced Penalties for:

- Violations of Section 906 Certification Requirements—A CEO or CFO who certifies a financial report or statement filed with the SEC knowing that the report or statement does not fulfill all of the requirements of Section 906 will be subject to criminal penalties of up to $1 million in fines, ten years in prison, or both. Willful violators of the certification requirements may be subject to $5 million in fines, twenty years in prison, or both.
- Violations of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934—Penalties for securities fraud under the 1934 act were also increased (as discussed earlier in this chapter). Individual violators may be fined up to $5 million, imprisoned for up to twenty years, or both. violators may be imprisoned for up to twenty-five years in addition to being fined.
- Destruction or Alteration of Documents—Anyone who alters, destroys, or conceals documents or otherwise obstructs any official proceeding will be subject to fines, imprisonment for up to twenty years, or both.
- Other Forms of White-Collar Crime—The act stiffened the penalties for certain criminal violations, such as federal mail and wire fraud, and ordered the U.S. Sentencing Commission to revise the sentencing guidelines for white-collar crimes (see Chapter 9).

Statute of Limitations for Securities Fraud: Section 804 provides that a private right of action for securities fraud may be brought no later than two years after the discovery of the violation or five years after the violation, whichever is earlier.

essence, all three indicated that their companies would soon go public and attempted to sell unregistered securities via the Web auction site. All of these actions were in violation of Sections 5, 17(a)(1), and 17(a)(3) of the 1933 Securities Act. Since then, the SEC has brought a variety of Internet-related fraud cases and regularly issues interpretive releases to explain how securities laws apply in the online environment.

Investment Scams

As discussed in Chapter 9, the Internet has created a new vehicle for criminals to use to commit fraud and provided them with new ways of targeting innocent investors. The criminally inclined can use spam, online newsletters and bulletin boards, chat rooms, blogs, and tweets to spread false information and perpetrate fraud. For a relatively small cost, criminals can even build sophisticated Web pages to facilitate their investment scams.

Investment scams come in countless variations, but they almost always promise spectacular returns for small investments. A person might receive spam e-mail, for example, that falsely claims that a home business can “turn $5 into $60,000 in just three to six weeks.” Another popular investment scam claims “a stimulus package has arrived” and promises individuals that they can make $100,000 a year using their home computer. Although most people today are dubious of the bogus claims made in spam messages, such offers can appear more attractive during times of economic recession. Often, investment scams are simply the electronic version of pyramid schemes in which the participants attempt to profit solely by recruiting new participants.

Online Investment Newsletters and Forums

Hundreds of online investment newsletters provide free information on stocks. Legitimate online newsletters can help investors gather valuable information, but some online newsletters are used for fraud. The law allows companies to pay people who write these newsletters to tout their securities, but the newsletters are required to disclose who paid for the advertising. Many fraudsters either fail to disclose or lie about who paid them. Thus, an investor reading an online newsletter may believe that the information is unbiased, when in fact the fraudsters will directly profit by convincing investors to buy or sell particular stocks.

The same deceptive tactics can be used on online bulletin boards (such as newsgroups and usenet groups), blogs, and social networking sites, including Twitter. While hiding their true identity, fraudsters may falsely pump up a company or reveal some “inside” information about a new product or lucrative contract to convince people to invest. By using multiple aliases on an online forum, a single person can easily create the illusion of widespread interest in a small stock.

Ponzi Schemes

In recent years, the SEC has filed an increasing number of enforcement actions against perpetrators of Ponzi schemes. In these scams, named after Charles Ponzi, the swindler promises high returns to investors and then uses their funds to pay previous investors. Ponzi schemes sometimes target U.S. residents and convince them to invest in offshore companies or banks. Other times, Ponzi schemes claim to offer risk-free or low-risk investments to lure investors.

CASE IN POINT Michael C. Regan told investors that he had an MBA and a proven track record of successful securities trading. As evidence, he offered fake financial statements and tax returns that showed high account balances. In reality, Regan did not have an MBA, was not a registered investment adviser, and had not traded any securities for several years. Regan promised investors returns averaging 20 percent with minimal risk and claimed to be using an investment strategy based on “short-term price trends.” He used less than half of the funds entrusted to him for trading purposes and spent at least $2.4 million for his personal and family expenses. In 2009, the SEC filed a complaint alleging that Regan had engaged in a multimillion-dollar Ponzi scheme. Regan agreed to settle the case and return more than $8.7 million (plus interest) of the wrongfully acquired funds.⁴⁰

Securities Law and Corporate Governance

Dale Emerson served as the chief financial officer for Reliant Electric Co., a distributor of electricity serving portions of Montana and North Dakota. Reliant was in the final stages of planning a takeover of Dakota Gasworks, Inc., a natural gas distributor that operated solely within North Dakota. Emerson went on a weekend fishing trip with his uncle, Ernest Wallace. Emerson mentioned to Wallace that he had been putting in a lot of extra hours at the office planning a takeover of Dakota Gasworks. When he returned from the fishing trip, Wallace purchased $20,000 worth of Reliant stock. Three weeks later, Reliant made a tender offer to Dakota Gasworks stockholders and purchased 57 percent of Dakota Gasworks stock. Over the next two weeks, the price of Reliant stock rose 72 percent before leveling out. Wallace then sold his Reliant stock for a gross profit of $14,400. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

42-1. Registration Requirements Estrada Hermanos, Inc., a corporation incorporated and doing business in Florida, decides to sell $1 million worth of its common stock to the public. The stock will be sold only within the state of Florida. José Estrada, the chair of the board, says the offering need not be registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission. His brother, Gustavo, disagrees. Who is right? Explain.

42-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Registration Requirements.

Huron Corp. has 300,000 common shares outstanding. The owners of these outstanding shares live in several different states. Huron has decided to split the 300,000 shares two for one. Will Huron Corp. have to file a registration statement and prospectus on the 300,000 new shares to be issued as a result of the split? Explain.

- For a sample answer to Question 42-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

42-3. Insider Trading David Gain was the chief executive officer (CEO) of Forest Media Corp., which became interested in acquiring RS Communications, Inc., in 2010.

To initiate negotiations, Gain met with RS's CEO, Gill Raz, on Friday, July 12. Two days later, Gain phoned his brother Mark, who bought 3,800 shares of RS stock on the following Monday. Mark discussed the deal with their father, Jordan, who bought 20,000 RS shares on Thursday. On July 25, the day before the RS bid was due, Gain phoned his parents' home, and Mark bought another 3,200 RS shares. The same routine was followed over the next few days, with Gain periodically phoning Mark or Jordan, both of whom continued to buy RS shares. Forest's bid was refused, but on August 5, RS announced its merger with another company. The price of RS stock rose 30 percent, increasing the value of Mark and Jordan's shares by $664,024 and $412,875, respectively. Did Gain engage in insider trading? What is required to impose sanctions for this offense? Could a court hold Gain liable? Why or why not?

42-4. Securities Laws In 1997, WTS Transnational, Inc., required financing to develop a prototype of an unpatented fingerprint-verification system. At the time, WTS had no revenue, $655,000 in liabilities, and only $10,000 in assets. Thomas Cavanagh and Frank Nicoloi, who operated an investment banking company called U.S. Milestone (USM), arranged the financing using Curbstone Acquisition Corp. Curbstone had no assets but had registered approximately 3.5 million shares of stock with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). Under the terms of the deal, Curbstone acquired WTS, and the resulting entity was named Electro-Optical Systems Corp. (EOSC). New EOSC shares were issued to all of the WTS shareholders. Only Cavanagh and others affiliated with USM could sell EOSC stock to the public, however. Over the next few months, these individuals issued false press releases, made small deceptive purchases of EOSC shares at high prices, distributed hundreds of thousands of shares to friends and relatives, and sold their own shares at inflated prices through third party companies they owned. When the SEC began to investigate, the share price fell to its actual value, and innocent investors lost more than $15 million. Were any securities laws violated in this case? If so, what might be an appropriate remedy? [SEC v. Cavanagh, 445 F.3d 105 (2d Cir. 2006)]

42-5. Securities Trading Between 1994 and 1998, Richard Svoboda, a credit officer for NationsBank N.A., in Dallas, Texas, evaluated and approved his employer's extensions of credit to clients. These responsibilities gave Svoboda access to nonpublic information about the clients' earnings, performance, acquisitions, and business plans in confidential memos, e-mail, credit applications, and other sources. Svoboda devised a scheme with Michael Robles, an independent accountant, to use this information to trade securities. Pursuant to their scheme, Robles traded in the securities of more than twenty different companies and profited by more than $1 million. Despite their agreement that Robles would do all of the trading, Svoboda also executed trades on his own and made profits of more than $200,000. Aware that their scheme violated NationsBank's policy, they attempted to conduct their trades so as to avoid suspicion. When NationsBank questioned Svoboda about his actions, he lied, refused to cooperate, and was fired. Did Svoboda or Robles commit any crimes? Is either of them subject to civil liability? If so, who could file a suit, and on what ground? What are the possible sanctions? What might be a defense? How should a court rule? Discuss. [SEC v. Svoboda, 409 F.Supp.2d 331 (S.D.N.Y. 2006)]

42-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Duty to Disclose.

Orphan Medical, Inc., was a pharmaceutical company that focused on central nervous system disorders. Its major product was the drug Xyrem. In June 2004, Orphan merged with Jazz Pharmaceuticals, Inc., and Orphan shareholders received $10.75 per share for their stock. Before the merger was final, Orphan completed a phase of testing of Xyrem that indicated that the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) would allow the drug to proceed to the next stage of testing, which was necessary for the drug to be more widely marketed. If that happened, the value of the drug and Orphan would increase, and the stock would have been worth more than $10.75. Little Gem Life Sciences, LLC, was an Orphan shareholder that had received $10.75 per share for its stock. It sued, claiming violations of federal securities laws because shareholders were not told, during the merger process, that the current stage of FDA tests had been successful. Little Gem claimed that if the information had been public, the stock price would have been higher. The federal district court dismissed the suit, holding that it did not meet the standards required by the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act. Little Gem appealed. Did Orphan's directors have a duty to reveal all relevant drug-testing information to shareholders? Why or why not? [Little Gem Life Sciences LLC v. Orphan Medical, Inc., 537 F.3d 913 (8th Cir. 2008)]

42-7. Violations of the 1934 Act To comply with accounting principles, a company that engages in software development must either "expense" the cost (record it immediately on the company's financial statement) or "capitalize" it (record it as a cost incurred in increments over time). If the project is in the pre- or post-development stage, the cost must be expensed. Otherwise it may be capitalized. Capitalizing a cost makes a company look more profitable in the short term. Digimarc Corp., which provides secure personal identification documents, announced that it had improperly capitalized software development costs over at least the previous eighteen months. The errors resulted in $2.7 million in overstated earnings, requiring a restatement of prior financial statements. Zucco Partners, LLC, which had bought Digimarc stock within the relevant period, filed a suit in a federal district court against the firm. Zucco claimed that it could show that there had been disagreements within Digimarc over its accounting. Is this sufficient to establish a violation of SEC Rule 10b-5? Why or why not? [Zucco Partners, LLC v. Digimarc Corp., 552 F.3d 981 (9th Cir. 2009)]

42-8. Insider Trading Jabil Circuit, Inc., is a publicly traded electronics and technology company headquartered in St. Petersburg, Florida. In 2008, a group of shareholders who had owned Jabil stock from 2001 to 2007 sued the company and its auditors, directors, and officers for insider trading. Stock options were a part of Jabil's compensation for executives. In some situations, stock options were backdated to a point in time when the stock price was lower, making the options worth more to certain company executives. Backdating is legal as long as it is reported, but Jabil did not report the fact that backdating had occurred. Thus, expenses were understated and net income was overstated by millions of dollars. The shareholders claimed that by rigging the value of the stock options by backdating, the executives had engaged in insider trading and that there had been a general practice among the executives of selling stock before unfavorable news about the company was reported to the public. The shareholders, however, had no specific information about these stock trades or about when (or even if) a particular executive was aware of any accounting errors during the time of any backdating purchases. Were the shareholders' allegations sufficient to assert that insider trading had occurred under SEC Rule 10b-5? Why or why not? [Edward J. Goodman Life Income Trust v. Jabil Circuit, Inc., 594 F.3d 783 (11th Cir. 2010)]

42-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Violations of the 1934 Act.

Melvin Lyttle told John Montana and Paul Knight about a "Trading Program" that purportedly would buy and sell securities in deals that were fully insured, as well as monitored and controlled by the Federal Reserve. Without checking the details or even verifying whether the Program existed, Montana and Knight, with Lyttle's help, began to sell interests in the Program to investors. For a minimum investment of $1 million, the investors were promised extraordinary rates of return—from 10 percent to as much as 100 percent per week—without risk. They were told, among other things, that the Program would "utilize banks that can ensure full bank integrity of The Transaction whose undertaking[s] are in complete harmony with international banking rules and protocol and who guarantee maximum security of a Funder's Capital Placement Amount." Nothing was required but the investors' funds and their silence—the Program was to be kept secret. Over a four-month period in 1999, Montana raised approximately $23 million from twenty-two investors. The promised gains did not accrue, however. Instead, Montana, Lyttle, and Knight depleted investors' funds in high-risk trades or spent the funds on themselves. [SEC v. Montana, 464 F.Supp.2d 772 (S.D.Ind. 2006)]

- (a) The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) filed a suit in a federal district court against Montana and the others, seeking an injunction, civil penalties, and refund of profits with interest. The SEC alleged, among other things, violations of Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5. What is required to establish such violations? Describe how and why the facts in this case meet, or fail to meet, these requirements.

- (b) It is often remarked, "There's a sucker born every minute!" Does that phrase describe the Program's investors? Ultimately, about half of the investors recouped the amount they invested. Should the others be considered at least partly responsible for their own losses? Why or why not?

- (b) Did Susan breach a fiduciary duty to the corporation by telling the bartender about the proposed merger? Does the fact that she may be laid off by the company after the merger affect her duties? Explain.
- (c) Under what legal theory might it be illegal for the bartender to buy shares in the company based on the information that he got from Susan? Analyze the owner's potential liability. CHAPTER 43

Law for Small Business

Small businesses create much of the wealth and many of the new jobs in the United States. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, there are around 5 million firms with ten or fewer employees. The U.S. Small Business Administration (SBA) reports that small businesses employ half of all private-sector employees in the country, generate more than half of the nation's gross domestic product, and obtain a disproportionate number of patents. The SBA also reports, however, that more than half of small businesses fail within four years. A lack of understanding of legal issues and how to respond to them is one of the reasons that new businesses fail.

Some relatively new companies, such as Apple and Google, have become highly successful. Understanding business law and the legal environment has often been crucial to business success. Consider that Apple's and Google's growth is grounded to some extent in the smart decisions about contracts that those companies made in their early days.

For the most part, the laws of particular interest to small-business owners are the same general business laws covered throughout this text, and this chapter provides a review of some of those laws. In addition, we examine a number of the options and legal requirements faced by those who wish to start their own small businesses.

We also indicate how the general legal principles discussed throughout this book apply in the context of a small-business enterprise. Because legal compliance is crucial for any venture, we begin with a discussion of the importance of obtaining legal counsel.

SECTION 1

THE IMPORTANCE OF LEGAL COUNSEL

Nearly everyone who starts a business enterprise faces the following question: "Do I need an attorney?" The answer to this question will likely be "yes." Today, nonexperts find it almost impossible to keep up with the myriad rules and regulations that govern the conduct of business in the United States. Indeed, businesspersons sometimes incur penalties for violating laws or regulations of which they are totally unaware, as noted in Chapter 5. Obtaining competent legal counsel can help a small business avoid a number of pitfalls. An attorney may be very helpful when a business undertakes certain types of transactions, including the following:

1. Negotiating a franchise agreement;
2. Creating standard business forms, such as purchase orders and contract confirmations;

3. Buying or selling real property or a business;
4. Negotiating agreements to license intellectual property rights; and
5. Obtaining new outside investors.

Relevant questions thus include how to find the right attorney for one's needs and how to hold down legal costs as much as possible.

Although attorneys may seem expensive, the prudent business owner will make sure that he or she is not "penny wise and pound foolish." The consultation fee paid to an attorney may be a drop in the bucket compared with the potential liability facing a businessperson for violating a statutory law or regulation. Also, outside legal help may be essential for certain tasks associated with forming a new business, such as drafting and filing the documents necessary for incorporation. Failure to comply with specific state incorporation requirements may subject the owners of the new enterprise to personal liability for contracts or other obligations.

Find an Attorney

In selecting an attorney, most businesspersons rely on referrals from friends, business associates, and other local entities. Business networks, such as chambers of commerce and bar organizations, may also help identify knowledgeable attorneys. Attorneys and their areas of specialty are often listed in the Yellow Pages. Another good source of information is the Martindale-Hubbell Law Directory, which can be found at most law libraries. (It is also accessible online at www.martindale.com.) This directory lists the names, addresses, telephone numbers, areas of legal practice, and other information for more than 900,000 attorneys and law firms in the United States.

A number of lawyers specialize in small-business law. Many states now have certification programs that identify specialists in various legal areas.

Retain an Attorney

Retaining an experienced attorney will yield benefits beyond the resolution of legal problems. Many attorneys have advantageous contacts, including potential investors in your enterprise. An attorney may also have valuable business expertise. Furthermore, because the law protects the confidentiality of attorney-client communications, an attorney provides a useful sounding board for business plans.

Consider retaining an attorney at a large law firm. Such an attorney will be more expensive but may also have more ability and influence in the local business community than an attorney at a small firm. Furthermore, the attorney can draw on his or her firm's resources, and a letter on the letterhead of a large, well-known firm may carry more clout.

At the start-up stage, many entrepreneurs may feel that they do not have the financial resources to pay a lawyer, especially one who charges a high hourly rate. Attorneys have responded to this situation by offering innovative fee arrangements. Most attorneys will not charge for an initial consultation and typically will charge a flat fee for routine tasks, such as incorporating a business. Prospective clients should be careful to find out precisely what services the fee will cover, however. Some law firms offer prepaid legal service plans that cover many of the services that a small-business owner may require. An advantage of these plans is that the annual costs of legal representation for ordinary matters are predictable. Some attorneys will even provide a substantial amount of service in exchange for a promise of future legal business after the venture is established. Sometimes, an attorney may accept an equity (ownership) stake in the new business in lieu of a cash payment. Clients often have the opportunity to negotiate their attorney's compensation system to suit their needs.

Some small-business owners keep an attorney on retainer. This means that the client pays the attorney a fixed amount every month, and the attorney handles all necessary legal business that arises during the month. The amount of the retainer is negotiated with an eye toward expected legal needs. Thus, this approach probably will not save much overall, but it will make legal costs stable and predictable over time.

Hire an Accountant

In a new business, the proper management of accounts receivable and accounts payable is critical. There are software accounting programs to handle this job, but many small businesses hire professional accountants to do their bookkeeping. Although it is more expensive, having an accountant adds to your credibility with potential investors and lenders. Accurate bookkeeping is also legally important, as errors often provoke litigation.

SECTION 2

SELECTION OF THE BUSINESS ORGANIZATION

The various forms of business organization available to businesspersons were discussed in Chapters 36 through 42. We will now review them in the context of small businesses.

In the earliest stages, a small business may operate as a sole proprietorship, which requires few legal formalities. The law considers all new, single-owner businesses to be sole proprietorships, unless the owner affirmatively adopts some other form. Once business is under way, however, the sole proprietorship form may become problematic if additional investors are needed or the personal financial risks of the business become too great. The owner and any additional investors may then want to establish a more formal organization, such as a limited partnership (LP), a limited liability partnership (LLP), a limited liability company (LLC), or a corporation.

Each business form has its own advantages and disadvantages. Factors to consider when choosing a business form include liability, taxation, continuity of life, and the legal formalities and costs associated with starting the business.

Limitations on Liability

A key consideration in starting a business is whether the business form chosen will limit the owner's personal liability for business debts and obligations. If you form a limited liability entity, such as a corporation, you normally can avoid personal liability if, say, a customer slips and breaks his ankle in your store, sues your store, and is awarded damages by a court. Although the business entity may be liable for damages, you and the other owners normally will not be personally liable beyond the extent of your contributions to the firm. Legal limited liability generally is necessary for those who wish to raise outside capital.

Corporate business forms offer limited liability to the shareholder-owners. In a traditional, or general, partnership, however, there is no limited liability. Each partner is personally liable for the debts and obligations of the partnership. In an LP, the limited partners have limited liability; however, it must have at least one general partner who remains personally liable for the partnership's obligations. Note that limited personal liability does not obviate the need to obtain insurance for significant business liability risks (see Chapter 51). Limited liability organizations protect only personal assets, and a substantial uninsured liability can bankrupt the business and cause the owner to lose her or his entire investment. Moreover, limited personal liability may be lost by contract (such as when an individual personally guarantees payment of a business loan) or by failure to comply with the rules for a business form.

Today, all states permit businesspersons to conduct their business operations as LLCs, and most states provide for LLPs. These increasingly popular business forms also offer the advantage of limited personal liability for business debts and obligations (see Chapters 37 and 38).

Tax Considerations

Taxes are another critical factor to be considered in choosing a small-business form. A sole proprietorship is not a separate legal entity, and the owner pays taxes on business income as an individual. All revenues are taxable, but business expenses can be deducted, so the owner is taxed only once on the business's profits.

All corporations must pay certain state and local taxes—such as franchise taxes (annual taxes imposed for the privilege of doing business in a state)—but the key consideration involves corporate income taxes. The corporate form entails what is known as double taxation. The company must pay a corporate income tax on its profits, and the shareholder-owners must also pay individual income tax on any distributions of the remaining profits that they receive from the corporation. Double taxation is limited to distributions of profits, though, so corporations are taxed only once on retained earnings. (See Chapter 39 for a complete discussion of corporate taxation). Partnerships, LLCs, LLPs, and S corporations avoid double taxation and provide for “pass-through” taxation—that is, profits are passed through to the partners, members, or owners and are taxed only on their individual returns, not at the business level.

Continuity of Life

Continuity of life is another concern in selecting a business form. A business should prepare for the possibility that an owner may die, resign, be expelled, or become incapacitated. Corporations have continuity of life—that is, they survive their owners—except in the unusual event that the corporate documents provide otherwise. Normally, on the death of a corporate shareholder-owner, that shareholder's ownership interest simply passes to his or her heirs.

In many states, a partnership will not terminate on the death or withdrawal of a partner, unless the partners have expressly provided otherwise. (In those states that have not adopted the most recent version of the Uniform Partnership Act, however, the death of a partner will automatically dissolve the partnership—see Chapter 37.) By definition, a sole proprietorship terminates with the death of the sole proprietor.

Legal Formality and Expense

Additionally, businesspersons need to consider the legal formalities and expenses involved in starting a business. The requirements and costs associated with forming and operating as a corporation can be considerable. The expense of establishing an LP may also be significant. For these reasons, some individuals initially operate their businesses as sole proprietorships or traditional partnerships—and run considerable financial risk because of the personal liability associated with each of these business forms. Start-up formalities and costs generally are less extensive for LLCs than for corporations or limited partnerships.

REQUIREMENTS FOR ALL BUSINESS FORMS Although sole proprietorships and traditional partnerships avoid the legal formalities associated with incorporating or creating an LP, sole proprietors and partners must still comply with many laws. Any business, whatever its form, has to meet a variety of legal requirements, which typically relate to the following:

1. Business name registration.
2. Occupational licensing.
3. State tax registration (for example, to obtain permits for collecting and remitting sales taxes).
4. Health and environmental permits.
5. Zoning and building codes.
6. Import/export regulations.

If the business has employees, the owner must also comply with a host of laws governing the workplace. (We will look at several of these laws in the final section of this chapter.) Some small businesses, with few employees, are exempted from some of these laws. For example, the health-care legislation enacted in 2010 imposes a fine on employers that do not provide health insurance for their employees, but companies with fewer than fifty employees might remain exempt from this requirement.

FORMALIZING THE BUSINESS The owner should not overlook the potential benefits of establishing a business arrangement more formal than a sole proprietorship. Consider a family business that is owned and operated by a husband and wife. At the outset, the spouses should consider the possibility that they may have a falling-out in the future. If they run their enterprise as a sole proprietorship, it may be difficult to establish their respective ownership rights in the business should a dispute arise.

If they form a partnership, however, they can specify in a written partnership agreement how profits and losses will be shared, as well as the extent of each partner's ownership interest in the partnership. Alternatively, the spouses could incorporate and draw up a shareholder agreement (see page 848) that will provide for various eventualities and thus enable the company to continue. Formalizing the business is critical to its potential expansion as well.

SECTION 3

THE LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANY

The limited liability company (LLC) has been available for only a few decades, but it has become the preferred structure for many small businesses.

Indeed, since 2004, the LLC has been the first choice of most small-business owners who want a business form other than a sole proprietorship. The number of LLCs has increased so rapidly because they offer several advantages. For example, an LLC provides limited liability without the double taxation associated with a corporation. Forming an LLC is a much simpler process than setting up a corporation, although the owners of the LLC must still file a certificate with the state and pay a fee. We examined LLCs in Chapter 38, but the form has become so important for small businesses that we take a closer look at certain aspects of the LLC next.

The Basic Structure

The structure of an LLC roughly parallels that of a corporation. Instead of articles of incorporation, though, an LLC has articles of organization. In addition, it has an operating agreement that serves as the organization's charter. The owners of an LLC are called members, not shareholders. A member need not be a natural person but may be a separate corporation or other organized entity. Those who run the day-to-day operations of an LLC are known as managers. Two important aspects of an LLC's structure are its flexibility and the fiduciary duties of its members and managers.

FLEXIBILITY IN DETERMINING MEMBERS' RIGHTS

Under state law, LLCs have much more flexibility than corporations enjoy. Whereas corporations must comply with numerous requirements, the members of an LLC generally have the flexibility to decide what rules they will include in their operating agreement. Typically, the state statute includes default rules that will govern an LLC unless its operating agreement provides otherwise. For example, default rules often provide that profits, voting rights, and assets on liquidation will be apportioned according to the value of each member's financial contribution. An LLC's operating agreement, however, may apportion the members' voting rights equally or according to some criterion other than contributions. Similarly, the operating agreement may provide for profits and losses, and distributions to members, to be allocated on some other basis.

As another example, state statutes usually presume that an LLC's members will be its managers, but the agreement may provide otherwise. LLC membership interests normally cannot be transferred, and new memberships may not be issued, without the consent of all existing members. These default rules may also be modified by the agreement. Unlike a corporation, an LLC is not required by law to hold a formal annual meeting, but the agreement may require such a meeting. One leading case even found that the agreement could require all disputes among an

LLC's members to be resolved by arbitration, with no appeal of the decision to a court.¹

The following case demonstrates how the rights of a terminated LLC member can be limited by the operating agreement.

EXTENDED CASE 43.1

Mixon v. Iberia Surgical, LLC

Court of Appeal of Louisiana, Third Circuit, 956 So.2d 76 (2007).

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

COOKS, Judge.

* * * *

Iberia Surgical [LLC] was formed, in August 1998, by a group of physicians practicing in Iberia Parish [Louisiana] for the purpose of establishing an ambulatory, outpatient surgery center. * * * Dr. [Tynes] Mixon was one of the original organizers and became the managing partner.

In June 1999, Iberia Surgical, in a joint ownership venture with Iberia Medical Center, formed New Iberia Surgery Center, L.L.C., an outpatient surgical facility.

Not long after the formation of Iberia Surgical, Dr. Mixon became dissatisfied with the operation of the new facility and management practices of his fellow physicians. * * * After months of discord, * * * on August 28, 2002, Dr. Mixon was terminated from Iberia Surgical by unanimous vote of the membership. Pursuant to the Buy-Out provisions of the Operating Agreement, Dr. Mixon was paid $71,356.85 * * * .

[Mixon filed a suit against Iberia Surgical in a Louisiana state court, presenting evidence that the fair market value of his interest in the business was $483,100. The trial court issued a summary judgment in the defendant's favor. Mixon appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.]

* * * *

* * * Article 3.2(g) of the Operating Agreement provides:

Termination Without Cause.

A Member may be Terminated Without Cause, by unanimous vote in writing of the remaining Members of the Company.

* * * Dr. Mixon asserts the exercise of this contractual right by Iberia Surgical to terminate his membership was an abuse of right and violates moral rules, good faith, and elementary fairness. He also contends there was an absence of a serious or legitimate motive for the exercise of the right and, therefore, he concludes it was done to cause harm.

There is ample evidence in the record, including Dr. Mixon's own testimony, to establish he objected to the way the facility was being managed * * * . His views were not well received and represented the minority opinion within the organization. * * * A decision was made to buy-out Dr. Mixon's interest and sever financial ties with him.

The Operating Agreement, which Dr. Mixon negotiated and signed, gave Iberia Surgical the right to terminate one of its members without cause. Dr. Mixon has provided no evidence to suggest the termination was done to cause him harm or for any other reason than a legitimate business reason. The provisions of the Operating Agreement are straightforward * * * . There is no evidence to suggest the terms of the Operating Agreement violate moral rules, good faith, or elementary fairness.

(c) Purchase Price and Terms. The Purchase Price of a Former Member's Interest * * * shall be determined as follows:

* * * *

(ii) The "Book Value" means the "fair market value" of a Membership Interest computed in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles, of the net equity of the Company as of the end of the last full taxable year immediately preceding the year in which the Event giving rise to the purchase and sale of the Membership Rights or Interest occurred.

Dr. Mixon contends “Book Value” is not synonymous with “Fair Market Value.” He contends the Operating Agreement requires his membership share should be computed according to the “Fair Market Value,” which he defines as the price a seller is willing to accept and a buyer is willing to pay on the open market.

We agree the terms “Book Value” and “Fair Market Value” are not synonymous and have generally recognized meanings in accounting in valuation. * * * Under the terms of the Operating Agreement, the parties agreed to use the “book value” in determining the value of a member’s interest, not fair market value. The book value of a business has a well-defined meaning, is unambiguous, and is susceptible of only one construction. It is the value as shown by the books of the business, and no other value. Book value is calculated by measuring the assets of the business against its liabilities. Goodwill, actual value or value in the open market, is not considered in determining book value. [Emphasis added.]

Based on the foregoing review of the record, we affirm the decision of the trial court granting summary judgment in favor of Iberia Surgical * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. What might Mixon and the other members of Iberia Surgical have done to avoid the litigation and its ultimate result in this case?
2. Does the outcome in this case illustrate the advantages or the disadvantages of the LLC form of business organization? Explain.

EXTENT OF FIDUCIARY DUTIES A key element of corporate law involves the fiduciary duties of directors and officers to shareholders. The nature and scope of these duties are not as fully defined for LLCs, but the states have imposed some requirements of fair and honest dealing by members and managers. Like many other aspects of the LLC, the duties of members and managers may be set out and limited in the LLC’s operating agreement. If the agreement does not expressly limit or disavow the fiduciary duties of managers and members, then they have the same fiduciary duties as corporate managers (see Chapter 40).²

Converting an LLC into a Corporation

If a small business begins as an LLC and thrives, the owners may wish to convert it to a corporation. By incorporating, the larger business can attract more outside capital with public offerings of its equity. Because the company will likely be retaining its earnings to fund future growth, rather than distributing them to the owners, it will not experience the double-taxation disadvantage of the corporate form. In addition, the corporate structure facilitates the use of equity-based employee incentive plans, such as grants of stock options, and a more expansive management structure.

2. For example, in 2010, a decision by a Delaware court made clear that managers have fiduciary duties to LLC owners, unless the operating agreement explicitly disavows those duties. See Kelly v. Blum, 2010 WL 629850 (Del.Ch. 2010).

If the LLC agreement does not provide otherwise, this conversion may require the unanimous consent of the members. The LLC must then file articles of dissolution with the state. The members will agree on a process to assign ownership interests in the new corporation by shareholdings. Then, they will go about forming the successor corporation, a procedure discussed in the next section.

SECTION 4

HOW TO FORM A BUSINESS ENTITY

As explained earlier in this chapter, the various forms of business organization differ considerably in the formalities and expenses required to create a business. There are no special legal requirements for creating a sole proprietorship, and a traditional partnership requires only an agreement between the partners. Forming an LLC involves only slightly more legal work but does require a filing with the state government. Forming an LP is somewhat more complicated. The limited partnership agreement, often called a certificate of limited partnership, must be prepared and recorded with the appropriate governmental authority. State laws also regulate the names of LPs, require certain record keeping, and govern other aspects of the business. The procedures required for the creation of a corporation are perhaps the most complicated of all, so the remainder of this section is devoted to them.

Corporate Name

To incorporate, you first must choose a corporate name and file it with the appropriate state office, usually the office of the secretary of state. The name must be different from those used by existing businesses (even unincorporated businesses). Although private databases can be used to check names, the secretary of state's office should have all of the information necessary. The name of your new company should also include the word Corporation, Company, or Incorporated (abbreviated Corp., Co., and Inc., respectively).

Note that filing a name with the appropriate state official will protect the name as a trade name only within the state. Therefore, businesspersons who anticipate doing business nationally—via the Internet, for example—will want to make sure that their trade names will be protected under trademark law (to be discussed shortly).

Articles of Incorporation, Bylaws, and Initial Meeting

The second key step in incorporation is preparing and filing the articles of incorporation. Other steps involve drafting the corporate bylaws and holding the initial board of directors' meeting.

ARTICLES OF INCORPORATION As discussed in Chapter 39, states have different requirements as to the provisions that must be included in the articles. For example, some states require a minimum number of incorporators or directors, or a minimum capital contribution. As mentioned, entrepreneurs typically engage an attorney to help them draft and file the documents necessary to incorporate, including the articles of incorporation.

CORPORATE BYLAWS Another important step in the incorporation process is drafting the bylaws, which become the company's governing rules. The bylaws establish the dates on which annual meetings will be held, the number required for a voting quorum, and other rules. Incorporators generally include these rules in the bylaws rather than the articles of incorporation because the articles are relatively difficult to change. Bylaws are binding, but they are more easily modified. Usually, bylaws can be changed by a majority vote of the shareholders. In some states, the bylaws can be modified by the board of directors.

THE INITIAL BOARD OF DIRECTORS' MEETING The new corporation then holds its first board of directors' meeting. The initial corporate directors are designated in the articles of incorporation. The directors adopt the agreed-on bylaws, appoint corporate officers and define their respective authority, issue stock, open a bank account, and take other necessary actions. The directors will continue to meet periodically and must stand for election at annual shareholders' meetings.

Corporate Records Book

The next step is to establish a corporate records book in which the corporation's important documents, such as the articles of incorporation and the minutes of directors' and shareholders' meetings, will be kept. If the state requires stock certificates, they will have to be printed and distributed to the owners. The corporation may also need a corporate seal because banks and other institutions sometimes require that seals be placed on certain documents. Again, an attorney typically handles these tasks as part of the incorporation process.

SECTION 5

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY

Protecting rights in intellectual property is the central concern for some businesses. For example, software companies depend on their copyrights and patents to protect their investments in the research and development required to create new programs. Without copyright or patent protection, a competitor or a customer could simply copy the software. Laws governing rights in intellectual property were discussed in detail in Chapter 8. Here, we examine some aspects of intellectual property law that individuals should consider at the outset of any business venture.

Trademarks

Choosing a trademark or service mark and making sure that it can be protected under trademark law can be crucial to the success of a new business venture. A factor to consider in choosing a name for your business entity is whether you will use your business name as a trademark. Assume that you plan to incorporate your business. When the firm is incorporated, the secretary of state (or other state agency with which the business name is filed) approves your company's name only as a trade name—the name that you can use on checks, invoices, and letterhead stationery. You have legal ownership of your trade name only in that own state.

If you decide to use your business (trade) name as a trademark, then you need to follow the principles of trademark law. The general rule is that your trademark cannot be the same as another's mark or so similar that confusion might result.

Historically, the first business that actually used a trademark in the marketplace owned it. Today, for national trademark protection, the business must be the first to register the trademark with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (PTO) in Washington, D.C. First use still takes some precedence over federal registration, however. Suppose that you have used a particular trademark for two years but have not registered the mark with the PTO. If another company then registers the same mark with the PTO, you will probably have the traditional common law right to continue using that mark, but only in the geographic region in which you have been operating. Outside that region, the federal registrant will own the mark.

TRADEMARK SELECTION A trademark should be distinctive. Use of your name or a mere description of your product will probably receive, at most, only weak protection. If you have started a new online company, you cannot call it “Internet” and expect to receive protection. Although using a slight twist on the word may be tempting, this may lead to confusion. Thousands of companies already have the word net as part of their names. A distinctive made-up word (such as Exxon or Kodak) may be a good choice.

Once you have chosen a mark, you should do a trademark search to ensure that the mark is not too similar to existing marks. You can hire a trademark search firm or do the search yourself. Sources to consult include the Yellow Pages in any area in which you do business and Brands and Their Companies (available at www.gale.cengage.com or at your local library). You can also look at the federal trademark register, as well as the trademark register in your state. (Go to www.uspto.gov to check the PTO's online federal trademark register.) Other trademark databases, such as TrademarkScan, are also available on the Internet.

TRADEMARK REGISTRATION After selecting a trademark that appears to be available and that is not confusingly similar to an existing mark, you should register the mark with both the state government and the federal government. As explained earlier, if you do not register, your protection may be limited to the area in which you do business. Federal registration gives your trademark nationwide protection, provided that the trademark is already in use or will be used within six months. Even if your current business is only local, registration for national protection is important to protect your business's long-term growth.

To register your trademark with the PTO, you must submit an application that includes a specimen (picture) of your trademark, a list of marked goods and/or services, and the date on which you first used the trademark. You may want to register more than one mark. If your logo consists of a distinctive name as well as a graphic, you can register each item independently. For example, Apple, Inc., uses a rainbow-colored apple as a registered logo and the name Apple as a trademark. The apple logo and the Apple name could be registered separately to get independent protection. The PTO allows online filing through the Trademark Electronic Application System at www.uspto.gov/teas.

TRADEMARK PROTECTION After registering your trademark, you must take care of it. If your mark is federally registered, you may use the symbol ® with your mark; this puts others on notice of your registration. Even if you have not registered, you can use the symbol ™ with your mark. Five years after you initially register your mark, you should renew your registration with the PTO. Thereafter, you can renew at ten-year intervals. Filing for renewal informs the PTO that your mark is still in use and ensures that others cannot contest its validity.

To protect your mark, you must be alert to possible trademark infringement. If another company uses your trademark or a mark very similar to yours, you should take prompt action by sending a letter of complaint and consider filing a lawsuit for trademark infringement. If you ignore the problem, you may lose rights in your trademark. If, for example, a media outlet improperly refers to your trademark as if it were a generic word, send a letter of correction and keep a copy in your files. You may at some point need to demonstrate that you have consistently sought to enforce your rights in the mark, or it may be deemed abandoned.

Trade Secrets

Much of the value of a business may lie in its trade secrets. As discussed in Chapter 8, trade secrets are business secrets that have value and might be appropriated by another company, such as a competitor. Trade secrets may include information concerning product development, production processes and techniques, or customer lists. Preserving the secrecy of the information is necessary for legal protections.

As a practical matter, trade secrets must be divulged to key employees. Thus, any business runs the risk that those employees might disclose the secrets to competitors—or even set up competing businesses themselves. Generally, protecting against the possibility that valuable trade secrets will fall into the hands of others, especially competitors, presents an ongoing challenge for businesses, including new enterprises.

NONDISCLOSURE AND NONCOMPETE AGREEMENTS

To protect their trade secrets, companies may require employees who have access to trade secrets to agree in their employment contracts never to divulge those secrets. A company may also include a covenant not to compete in an employment contract. A noncompete covenant will help to protect against the possibility that a key employee will go to work for a competitor or set up a competing business—situations in which the company's trade secrets will likely be disclosed.

MISAPPROPRIATION As discussed in Chapter 8, trade secrets are protected under the common law.³ Thus, a company can sue an individual or a firm that has misappropriated its trade secrets. For example, two engineers developed new software for their company and then left to work at another firm. After the engineers developed a similar product for their new employer, the first company sued for infringement of trade secrets and prevailed in court.

SECTION 6

FINANCIAL CAPITAL

Raising financial capital is critical to the growth of most small businesses. In the early days of a business, the sole proprietor or partners may be able to contribute sufficient capital, but if the business becomes successful, more funds may be needed. The owner or owners may want to raise capital from external sources to expand the business. One way to do this is to borrow funds. Another is to exchange equity (ownership rights) in the company in return for funds, either through private arrangements or through public stock offerings.

Loans

A small business may find it beneficial to obtain a bank loan because raising capital in this way allows the founder to retain full ownership and control of the business (though the bank may place some restrictions on future business decisions as a condition of granting the loan). Bank loans may not be available for some businesses, however. Banks are usually reluctant to lend significant sums to businesses that are not yet established. Even if a bank is willing to make such a loan, the bank may require personal guaranty contracts from the owners, putting their personal assets at risk (see Chapter 28).

Loans with desirable terms may be available from the U.S. Small Business Administration (SBA). One SBA program provides loans of up to $25,000 to businesspersons who are women, low-income individuals, or members of minority groups. Be aware that the SBA requires business owners to put some of their own funds at risk in the business. Some entrepreneurs have even used their credit cards to obtain initial capital.

The stimulus program that Congress enacted in 2009 also sought to assist small businesses, funneling $30 billion to smaller banks to support small-business lending. In addition, the government gave employers tax breaks for hiring new workers and eliminated the capital gains tax on investments in small business.

Venture Capital

As discussed in Chapter 39, many new businesses raise needed capital by exchanging equity in the firm for venture capital. In other words, an outsider contributes funds in exchange for an ownership interest in the company. Venture capitalists, often organized into major firms, seek out promising enterprises and fund them in exchange for equity stakes. Akin to venture capitalists are “angels,” individuals who typically invest somewhat smaller sums in new businesses.

3. The theft of trade secrets is also a federal crime under the Economic Espionage Act of 1996 (see Chapter 9).

EXHIBIT 43-1 • Venture Capital Issues

ISSUE	DESCRIPTION
Type and Quantity of Stock	The venture capitalists will negotiate the amount of stock (which will determine their ownership share of the enterprise) and the type of stock (which usually will be preferred stock).
Stock Preferences	If the venture capitalists receive preferred shares, the shares generally will (1) provide for an annual per-share dividend to be paid before common stockholders receive any dividends and (2) give the venture capitalists priority among shareholders in the event of the firm's liquidation.
Conversion and Antidilution Rights	The preferred shares will be convertible into common stock at the option of the venture capitalists, and the company will be restrained from issuing new stock in an amount that would materially dilute the venture capitalists' ownership interests.
Board of Directors	The venture capitalists will define their proportionate representation on the board of directors.
Registration Rights	If the company conducts a public offering or registers its shares at a later date, the venture capitalists will have the right to have their shares registered also ("piggybacked"), making those shares more marketable.
Representations and Warranties	The owner will be required to make representations about the firm's capital structure, its possession of necessary government authorizations, its financial statements, and other material facts.

THE PROS AND CONS OF VENTURE CAPITAL FINANCING According to the U.S. National Venture Capital Association, U.S. venture capitalists invested $25.5 billion in nearly three thousand deals in 2007. The number of investments dropped precipitously during the Great Recession but should grow again as the economy recovers. On average, a venture capitalist invests about $5 million to $10 million in a company. In addition to providing needed financing, venture capitalists offer other advantages for businesses. Venture capitalists are often experienced managers who can provide invaluable assistance to entrepreneurs with respect to strategic business decisions, marketing, and important business contacts. Obtaining this assistance may be crucial to a new company's success.

The disadvantage is that a venture capitalist with a substantial equity stake will demand a corresponding degree of operational control over the company and a similar proportion of future profits.

CREATION OF A BUSINESS PLAN To attract outside venture capital, you will need a business plan that describes the company, its products, and its anticipated future performance. The plan should be relatively concise (typically fewer than fifty pages). After considering your plan, a venture capitalist may decide to investigate your venture further. This step may require you to disclose trade secrets, and you should insist that the potential investor sign a confidentiality agreement. If all goes well, you will then negotiate the terms of financing. A key point to be negotiated is how much ownership and control the venture capitalist will receive in exchange for the capital contribution. (Exhibit 43-1 above summarizes some key issues that may arise in negotiations with venture capitalists.)

Although venture capital may be crucial to a small business's growth, the prospect of venture capital may create new problems, as the following case illustrates.

CASE 43.2

Halo Technology Holdings, Inc. v. Cooper

United States District Court, District of Connecticut, ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (2010).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Halo Technology Holdings, Inc., is a Nevada corporation with its principal place of business in Connecticut. In 2005 and 2006, Halo acquired all of the shares of the entities that became HTH Emp., Inc., known as New Empagio, which was then a wholly owned subsidiary of Halo. Randall Cooper and other former employees of Halo (the Cooper Group) helped manage New Empagio. Halo sought to sell New Empagio to pay off a $20 million loan it had with Fortress Financial Corporation. Halo expected to receive at least $30 million from the sale. Cooper allegedly led potential buyers to believe that he had a right of first refusal, which led potential buyers not to submit bids. The Cooper Group then obtained venture capital financing from the Primus Group to buy New Empagio. The CASE 43.2 CONTINUED ♦ Primus Group entered into a nondisclosure agreement with Halo and gained access to information on New Empagio. Unbeknownst to Halo, members of the Cooper Group provided inside information to the Primus Group and worked to obstruct other potential purchasers. They allegedly created a liquidity crisis at New Empagio, driving down its value. The Primus Group offered $14.5 million for New Empagio, which Halo rejected. Halo was unable to find any other purchasers by the time the Fortress loan came due, so it entered bankruptcy. New Empagio subsequently sold its assets for $16 million and also filed for bankruptcy. Halo filed a suit against Cooper and the Primus Group for breach of contract, interference, civil conspiracy, and violation of the Connecticut Unfair Trade Practices Act (CUTPA). New Empagio later intervened as an additional plaintiff. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim.

UNDERHILL, District Judge.

* * * *

* * * Halo claims that the Primus Group intentionally breached the terms of the non-disclosure agreement by taking steps and actions constituting aggravating circumstances so substantial as to be immoral, oppressive, and unscrupulous in violation of CUTPA, and (b) the Primus Group conspired with the other defendants to breach that contract in violation of CUTPA.

* * * *

In Connecticut, a deceptive act that constitutes a breach of contract can form the basis for a CUTPA claim. A simple contract breach, however, does not constitute a violation of CUTPA. [There must also be a significant aggravating factor to establish a CUTPA claim.]

* * * *

At the motion to dismiss stage, the plaintiff must allege facts that form the basis of a plausible claim for relief. Halo alleges no fact that supports any inference that the Primus Group defendants actually breached the non-disclosure agreement. * * * The complaint makes no mention of what the Primus Group disclosed. Nor does it state which section of the agreement was violated.

* * * New Empagio alleges tortious interference with its business activities and conspiracy to commit tortious interference. *To survive a motion to dismiss * * , New Empagio must show that it had a business relationship with another party, the Primus Group knew of that relationship, the Primus Group intentionally interfered with that relationship, and New Empagio suffered a resulting loss.

* * * Halo cannot bring a claim for indirect harm and, at this stage of the litigation, Halo cannot bring a shareholder action for recovery because it no longer owns shares of New Empagio.

* * * *

Taking the facts in the complaint as true, New Empagio had a business relationship with its customers * * * and with its lender, Fortress. The Primus Group was aware of New Empagio's business relationship with its customers and lender. The Primus Group conspired with the Cooper Group to interfere in those relationships by delaying customer payments, instructing lower management to delay customer invoicing in order to induce a liquidity crisis, and taking steps to impede New Empagio's ability to repay Fortress.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The court granted the motion to dismiss the claims brought by Halo but denied the motion to dismiss New Empagio's claims.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • There was an important legal distinction in the duties that the defendants owed to Halo and New Empagio. Was there a similar ethical distinction? Explain.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • Why did the court dismiss Halo's claims?

Securities Regulation

Anyone raising capital needs to be aware of the regulations that govern securities. Many small-business owners raise funds from friends or business acquaintances instead of from venture capitalists.

Whatever method is used, the investor exchanges capital for an interest in the enterprise. If this interest consists of shares of stock (or otherwise qualifies as a security under federal or state law), the business may become subject to extraordinarily detailed regulatory requirements. The securities may have to be registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) or with the state in which the offering is made, unless the offering falls within an exemption to the securities laws.

PRIVATE OFFERINGS In certain circumstances, legal exemptions are available so that businesspersons need not worry about full registration or compliance with all of the securities regulations. (Securities regulations and exemptions were discussed in Chapter 42.) In short, the exemptions permit you to raise a limited amount of funds from a limited number of investors in what is sometimes called a private offering. If your offering qualifies, you need not register your shares as securities with the SEC. States have separate regulatory schemes and different terms for their exemptions from registration. In a private offering, capital typically is raised through a private placement memorandum distributed to selected potential investors.

PUBLIC OFFERINGS If your business proves especially successful, you may make a public offering in which a certain number of your shares are offered for purchase by members of the public at a price that you have set. Public offerings are highly regulated, but they may allow you to raise very large amounts of capital. Securities issued through public offerings must be registered with the SEC and applicable state regulatory agencies.

Full registration is complex, but the states and the SEC have jointly created a simplified securities registration process for small businesses. The Small Corporate Offering Registration (SCOR), which requires a form with only fifty questions, can be used for small offerings. Forty-three states have adopted the SCOR process, but their laws relating to use of the form vary.

SHAREHOLDER AGREEMENTS AND KEY-PERSON INSURANCE

In the excitement of forming a new business, it is easy to overlook the possibility that partners or shareholders may die or become disabled or that disputes among partners or shareholders may make business decision making impossible. At the outset of any enterprise involving two or more owners, the owners should decide—and put in writing—how such problems will be resolved.

Shareholder Agreements

Even if a new company has only two owners, they should have a shareholder agreement that defines their relative ownership rights and interests. Such agreements are vital for small, closely held companies, in large part because shares in such entities cannot be readily sold to outsiders. This means that an owner may be locked into the investment against her or his will with little return.

A key aspect of the shareholder agreement is a buy-sell agreement. (This type of agreement was discussed in Chapter 37 in the context of a partnership agreement.)

BUY-SELL AGREEMENTS In a corporate shareholder agreement, a buy-sell agreement provides for the buyout of a shareholder and establishes criteria for the price to be paid for that shareholder's ownership interest. The death of a shareholder might trigger a buy-sell agreement, enabling the decedent's heirs to cash out the investment. Other common triggering events include a shareholder's bankruptcy, a shareholder's divorce, and the legal attachment of a shareholder's shares for other reasons.

BUY-SELL AGREEMENT PROVISIONS Buy-sell agreements can also resolve serious deadlocks that may develop between co-owners as the business grows. The agreement might provide that one owner has an option to buy out the others in the event that such a deadlock occurs. Alternatively, all co-owners might submit sealed bids to buy each other out, with the highest bidder being allowed to buy out the others.

The buy-sell agreement should include a provision for pricing the shares that will be sold. The price may be a set price or may be calculated according to a formula. The agreement might also include a provision for a right of first refusal, which restricts the transferability of the shares for a specified duration. Such a provision will prevent an owner from selling to a third party without first giving the other owners an opportunity to buy out his or her interest. An alternative to the right of first refusal is a "take-along right," which allows an investor to participate in any sale of shares to a third party. This right can protect relatively passive investors from the possibility that managing shareholders may "bail out" of the corporation by selling their shares to third parties.

Key-Person Insurance

Much of the value of a small enterprise may rest in the skills of one or a few employees (such as a software designer or a top management executive). To protect against the risk that these key persons may become disabled or die, business enterprises typically obtain key-person insurance (see Chapter 51). The proceeds of a key-person insurance policy can help cover the losses caused by the death or disability of essential employees. Venture capitalists or other investors may require that the company take out a key-person insurance policy as a condition of investing in the corporation.

SECTION 8 CONTRACT LAW AND SMALL BUSINESSES

Any business venture will require that contracts be formed and signed. For example, if you lease business premises, you will need to sign a lease contract. Any purchases or sales of equipment will also involve contracts. Understanding the basic contract law principles that were covered in Chapters 10 through 19 can help to ensure that any contracts you form will be valid and enforceable. As a general rule, you should make sure that any contractual agreement is in writing. Then, if a dispute arises, there will be written evidence of the contract's terms. Additionally, as discussed in Chapter 15, some contracts—such as contracts for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more⁴—fall under the Statute of Frauds, which means that they must be evidenced by a writing to be enforceable.

Contract Forms

Small-business owners often consult with their attorneys in creating contract forms for specific purposes. For example, a business may wish to provide a warranty for its products but also limit the scope of that warranty. This decision is best made through the mutual judgment of the businessperson and her or his attorney to ensure that both business and legal concerns are addressed. Standard-form contracts are available on the Internet, but they are only a starting point and should be adapted to the specific circumstances of the transaction.

4. There was an attempt in 2003 to raise this amount to $5,000 in a new version of Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code, but no state has adopted the newer version, so, for the moment, the relatively low $500 figure remains in force.

Potential Personal Liability

Contract law contains traps, and you should be aware of them. If you incorporate, you will want to enter into contracts as an agent of the corporation, not in your individual capacity. Otherwise, you may be held personally liable on the contracts. This principle applies to negotiable instruments as well. For example, if you sign a promissory note on behalf of the corporation, indicate that you are signing in a representative capacity (see Chapter 26 for further details on signature liability with respect to negotiable instruments). The same advice applies to partners and partnerships. Sometimes, personal liability may be unavoidable because other parties may not be willing to do business without a personal guaranty.

CASE IN POINT 1 Cache, LLC, applied for a line of credit with DBL Distributing, Inc. Gary and Aaron Bracken, officers and members of 1 Cache, signed the credit application on 1 Cache's behalf. The application contained the following clause: "The undersigned agrees to unconditionally guarantee payment of all sums owed pursuant to this Agreement." DBL gave 1 Cache the credit and then later requested that the Brackens sign an updated form, which stated, "The undersigned agrees to personally guarantee payment of all sums owed pursuant to this Agreement." When 1 Cache subsequently filed for bankruptcy, DBL filed a lawsuit against the Brackens claiming that they were personally liable for the company's debt. The court ruled that the Brackens' signatures on the updated credit application form provided an additional potential source of liability despite their claim that they signed on 1 Cache's behalf.⁵

SECTION 9 EMPLOYMENT ISSUES

Small businesses are exempt from some employment laws. For example, businesses with fewer than fifteen employees are exempt from federal laws prohibiting employment discrimination and certain other federal acts, such as the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993.⁶ Some state statutes have similar exemptions for small businesses. Nevertheless, even the smallest businesses are subject to many employment laws, so some knowledge of employment law is crucial for entrepreneurs starting up businesses.

5. DBL Distributing, Inc. v. 1 Cache, LLC, 147 P.3d 478 (Utah 2006).
6. 29 U.S.C. Sections 2601, 2611–2619, 2651–2654.

For example, the rather detailed regulations of the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration have no small-business exemptions. Small businesses may be less likely to be inspected for violations, but if enforcement and penalties are applied, they can be far more disastrous for start-up companies than for larger, established firms that are in a better position to absorb these costs. Similarly, just one successful lawsuit against a small business can mean bankruptcy for the business.

Hiring Employees

Hiring good employees can be crucial to business success. Keep the following legal issues in mind during this process:

1. Be sure that the person you hire will not be disclosing any protected trade secrets of a former employer.
2. Do not make promises of job security unless you are sure you can keep them. If you promise that an employee's job will be permanent and the employee relies on your assurances, you may find it difficult to fire her or him.
3. Determine what screening tests are appropriate for the job. In some circumstances, you may be able to require the applicant to take a drug test.
4. Comply with all of the requirements imposed by federal immigration laws with respect to verifying whether workers are U.S. citizens and whether those who are not citizens are authorized to work in this country.

EMPLOYMENT CONTRACTS Usually, all employment agreements should be in writing. This generally is done in an offer letter that sets forth the basic terms of employment, including wages and benefits. An employment contract might specify that the contract is for at-will employment (see Chapter 34). At-will employment means that you can fire the employee at any time for any reason, provided that no employment laws are violated. In new businesses, an employee might want stock or options in lieu of part of his or her salary. Although granting equity to an employee saves scarce cash, it dilutes the other owners' interests. For high-level employees at least, it would be wise to consult an attorney regarding what contractual provisions should be included before awarding an equity interest in the firm.

VERIFICATION OF APPLICANTS' CREDENTIALS It goes without saying that you should contact former employers of job applicants and verify the applicants' credentials and job experience. You should also make sufficient inquiries to avoid a negligent-hiring lawsuit. Suppose that you hire a person who has been convicted twice for criminal assault. If that employee attacks a customer, the customer could sue your business for negligence in screening the worker's background during the hiring process. You therefore should check to see if a job applicant has any history of criminal conduct. You should also check a job applicant's driving record if the job involves driving a vehicle for business purposes. Additionally, actions of dishonest employees can cause a small business to suffer substantial economic losses. Thorough screening procedures will help you to avoid such problems.

Workers' Compensation

Most states require that employers carry workers' compensation insurance. If one of your employees is injured in the course of employment, the employee will be compensated for the injury by the state workers' compensation fund. That employee generally cannot sue you for further damages.

Workers' compensation insurance premiums are often high, and they may constitute one of a small business's greatest expenses. Premiums are initially based on the size of your payroll and the amount of risk involved in the business that you operate. After some time, your rates may be raised or lowered, depending on the safety record of your company. The fewer claims made against you, the lower your workers' compensation insurance costs will be.

Firing Employees

At one time or another, a small-business owner will probably find it necessary to fire a worker. Unless otherwise specified in employment contracts, your employees are presumptively at-will employees, and you can fire them without having to give any reason for doing so. Nevertheless, it is generally advisable to document good cause for terminating a worker—otherwise, he or she may succeed in a lawsuit against you for unlawful discrimination or some other legal violation.

EMPLOYEE FILES Generally, you should keep a file on each employee that includes the employee's application, performance reviews, and other relevant information. If you fire the employee, full documentation of why she or he was fired should be added to the file. Realize, though, that nearly half of the states have laws that allow employees to have access to their personnel records.

SEVERANCE PAY If you fire a worker, you might want to offer severance pay, which is a payment in addition to the employee's wages owed on termination. As a condition of receiving the severance pay, you might ask the employee to sign a release promising not to sue. Severance pay may be especially appropriate if the termination is not the employee's fault. Normally, you are not required to give severance pay (unless you have previously promised to do so or a union contract requires it). Most states have laws governing when you must provide the employee with his or her final paycheck, however.

WRONGFUL DISCHARGE Some states recognize a legal action for wrongful discharge (discussed in Chapter 35), but these actions generally are limited to terminations in bad faith. Be aware of any promises you made to an employee in a written contract, in an employee handbook, or even orally. These promises may prevent you from firing the employee without due process, good cause, or whatever else you may have promised.

Independent Contractors

Independent contractors are not considered to be employees, as was explained in Chapter 32. An independent contractor is a person who contracts with another to do something for him or her, but who is not controlled by the other with respect to his or her physical conduct in the performance of the undertaking.

BENEFITS OF INDEPENDENT CONTRACTORS The use of independent contractors offers many advantages to small businesses. For one thing, you need not withhold income taxes and Social Security and Medicare taxes from payments made to independent contractors, as you are required to do when you pay wages to employees. Furthermore, you need not match the amount withheld for Social Security and Medicare taxes, which can be costly for an employer.

Additionally, you need not pay premiums for workers' compensation insurance or unemployment insurance with respect to independent contractors.

Another important benefit of hiring independent contractors rather than employees is that you are not subject to laws governing employment relationships, including laws prohibiting discrimination. Normally, a court will not permit an independent contractor to bring a suit against you for age discrimination, for example, or for any other type of discrimination prohibited by federal or state laws governing employment relationships—because these laws protect only employees, not independent contractors.

LIABILITY FOR MISCLASSIFICATION OF WORKERS

Of course, the trade-off in using independent contractors is that you cannot exercise a significant amount of control over how they perform their work. If you do, the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) or another government agency may decide that they are, in fact, employees and not independent contractors. Misclassification of an employee as an independent contractor can subject you to considerable tax liability, including penalties.

CASE IN POINT Microsoft Corporation was required to pay overdue employment taxes after the IRS reclassified as employees a number of workers that the company had designated as independent contractors. Then several hundred independent contractors sued the company to recover the benefits that Microsoft had made available to its employees but not to the independent contractors. The court held that the workers were entitled to participate in Microsoft's stock-purchase plan and other employee benefits—benefits worth millions of dollars.⁷

Law for Small Business

APC, Inc., is a venture capital firm that invests in new businesses to help them grow. Wyatt Newmark owns and serves as a chef at “Earp’s,” a restaurant with a Western design that he operates as a sole proprietorship. Newmark has five employees at his restaurant—three servers, another chef, and a janitor. Newmark has had great success and hopes to expand or franchise the business. Newmark, who has not even retained an attorney for his small business, has approached APC for an investment. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What approaches may APC take in order to invest in the restaurant, and what are the legal implications of each approach?
2. If APC takes an equity interest, the restaurant will need a new legal organizational form. What form would you recommend? Why?
3. In order to preserve the opportunity for growth and a possible franchise, what legal filings should Newmark's entity undertake?
4. What is the difference between employee status and independent-contractor status? Which form of employment relationship would be more advantageous to Newmark? Why should employers be cautious when designating workers as independent contractors?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

43-1. Business Forms George Overton has plans for establishing a new business with Elena Costanza. They will both be managers, and each will take an annual salary of $50,000. The company will have other expenses of $175,000. They expect to take in $375,000 in the first year of operation and share the profits equally. George and Elena have not yet decided whether to incorporate the new business or run it as a partnership. What are the tax differences between the two approaches?

43-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Limited Liability Companies.

Amy forms Best Properties (BP), LLC, to own real estate as a long-term investment. BP acquires a 40,000-square-foot warehouse for $500,000, with the financing arranged for, and guaranteed by, Amy. Later, Carl and Dave become BP members. They sign a member's agreement, which states, "Amy shall own a 50 percent interest in the capital, profits, and losses of BP and shall have 50 percent of the voting rights. Carl and Dave, collectively, shall own a 50 percent interest in the capital, profits, and losses of BP and shall have 50 percent of the voting rights." BP's sole asset is the warehouse. When relations among the members become strained, Amy executes a deed transferring the warehouse to Excel, LLC, for $500,000. Excel has two members—Amy, with a 60 percent interest, and Carl, with 40 percent. Neither Amy nor Carl discusses the warehouse transfer with Dave, but Amy mails him a check that purports to represent his 25 percent interest in the warehouse. Dave files a suit against Amy and Carl, alleging that the transfer was unfair. On what basis might the court rule in favor of the defendants? Why might the court decide in Dave's favor? Explain.

• For a sample answer to Question 43-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

43-3. Officer Liability South Shore Imaging, Inc., agreed to lease a Konica laser imager machine from Key Equipment Finance. The lease contained a guaranty section to be signed by the officers. The officers returned the lease with their signatures but added their corporate titles in handwriting. Key then demanded that the document be reexecuted without the reference to corporate capacities. The officers did so. Key later sought to recover from the individual officers for breach of the lease. Should the court hold them liable? Explain. [Key Equipment Finance v. South Shore Imaging, Inc., 69 A.D.3d 805, 893 N.Y.S.2d 574 (2010)]

43-4. Trade Secrets Hudson & Muma, Inc., was a small, family-owned insurance agency. Andrew Muma, the son of the founder, was an officer, shareholder, and director of the company. Andrew left the company and began working as a commissioned salesman for another insurance agency, Wolf-Hulbert Co. Hudson & Muma filed a suit against Wolf-Hulbert, alleging that Andrew had taken customer information that was a trade secret. Wolf-Hulbert argued that it had no knowledge of this, and the trial court granted a motion dismissing the action. Hudson & Muma appealed. How should the appellate court decide? Why? [Hudson & Muma, Inc. v. Wolf-Hulbert Co., ___ N.W.2d ___ (Mich.App. 2010)]

43-5. Owner Liability Raynor Manufacturing Co. sold garage doors and related products. In 1983, it sold products to Kelly and Janet Stoner, doing business as Raynor Door Co. of Topeka. The Stoners, operating as a partnership, personally guaranteed payment of any balance to Raynor Manufacturing. The Stoners and Raynor Manufacturing continued doing business for more than a decade. In August 1992, the Stoners incorporated their partnership. In 2005, Raynor Manufacturing made a demand for a past due amount exceeding $223,000. It also sued the Stoners for failing to pay under their personal guaranty. The Stoners argued that their personal guaranty did not survive incorporation, but the district court found for Raynor Manufacturing. On appeal, what should be the result? Why? [Raynor Manufacturing Co. v. Raynor Door Co. 225 P.3d 780 (2010)]

43-6. Limited Partnerships Wall Street Technology Partners, LP, was a limited partnership, operating under a 2000 limited partnership agreement. Limited partners made capital contributions on joining the partnership. Under the agreement, they were obligated to make additional contributions as needed, when requested by the general partner. In December 2002, a capital call was sent to the limited partners, but they failed to respond. Wall Street brought an action to compel them to pay. They claimed that they had been promised that such contributions would not be required. Should they be compelled to pay? Why or why not? [Wall Street Technology Partners, LP, v. Kanders, ___ A.2d ___ (Conn.Super. 2010)]

43-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Fraud.

Emil Cerullo owned a small diagnostic imaging center in Dallas, Texas. With one of the doctors who used the center, he formed a partnership to develop ambulatory centers for lap band surgeries for weight-loss patients. Cerullo and his partner approached Peter Gottlieb about building and managing a center, and he promised that he would do so. Gottlieb subsequently set up the center independently, without Cerullo and his partner, and Cerullo sued. A jury found that Gottlieb had committed fraud and awarded actual and punitive damages. Should this verdict stand on appeal? Explain why or why not. [Cerullo v. Gottlieb, 309 S.W.3d 160 (Tex. App. 2010)]

43-8. Limited Liability Companies Coco Investments, LLC, and other investors participated in a condominium conversion project to be managed by Zamir Manager River Terrace, LLC. The participants entered into a new LLC agreement for the project. The investors subsequently complained that Zamir had failed to disclose its plans for dramatic changes involving higher than expected construction costs and delays, had failed to provide financial information, and had restructured loans in a manner that allowed Zamir representatives to avoid personal liability. The investors sued Zamir on various grounds, including breach of contract and breach of fiduciary duty. Zamir moved for summary judgment. How should the court rule? Explain. [Coco Investments, LLC v. Zamir Manager River Terrace, LLC, 26 Misc.3d 1231 (N.Y.Sup. 2010)]

43-9. Limited Liability Companies PT China, LLC, joined with PT Korea, LLC, to form PT Holdings. Harrison Wang and Michael Kim, representing the two entities, were to be the managers. The agreements prohibited them from engaging in related outside business endeavors. PT China subsequently filed a suit against PT Korea and Kim, alleging that Kim had misappropriated funds. The defendants counterclaimed, alleging that Wang had breached his fiduciary duties of loyalty to the entity by usurping business opportunities. Wang moved to dismiss the counterclaim, contending that any allegation that he had violated his fiduciary duties was precluded by Kim's claim against him for breach of contract under the LLC's operating agreement. How should the court rule? Why? [PT China, LLC v. PT Korea, LLC, ___ A.2d ___ (Del.Ch. 2010)]

43-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Taxation of LLCs.

Sean McNamee was the owner of an accounting firm, W. F. McNamee & Co., LLC (WFM), which he founded and formed in Connecticut as a limited liability company (LLC). For federal tax purposes, an LLC can elect to be treated as a corporation or as a sole proprietorship by checking the appropriate box on a certain tax form. A corporation's income is subject to double taxation—the corporation is taxed directly, and its shareholders are taxed on dividends paid to them from the income—but its owners normally are not liable if the firm does not pay its taxes. A sole proprietorship is taxed only once—the owner pays personal income tax on the business's income—but its owner is liable if the tax is not paid. In 2000, an LLC with a single owner that did not elect corporate treatment was taxed as a sole proprietorship. McNamee did not elect to have WFM treated as a corporation. During the last six months of 2000 and all of 2001, WFM employed an average of six persons but did not pay any payroll taxes. The unpaid total was $64,736.18. WFM went out of business in 2002. The U.S. Department of the Treasury, through the Internal Revenue Service (IRS), assessed the amount of the unpaid tax against McNamee personally. [McNamee v. Department of the Treasury, 488 F.3d 100 (2d Cir. 2007)]

(a) McNamee objected to the IRS's attempt to collect the tax from him, pointing to Connecticut statutes under which the members of an LLC are not personally liable for its debts. He argued that the IRS's action was "in direct conflict with the right of an LLC member." How would the IRS likely respond to this objection? Do you agree with McNamee or the IRS? Why? What might McNamee have done to avoid this dispute?

(b) In October 2005, the IRS proposed to amend the check-the-box regulation to relieve the owner of a single-member LLC from the possibility of personal liability for the LLC's payroll tax liability. Does this proposal show that the check-the-box regulation under which McNamee was personally assessed with the amount of the unpaid taxes was "unethical" or "wrong"? Why or why not?

Business Organizations

Every now and then, scandals in the business world rock the nation. Certainly, this was true in the first decade of the 2000s when the activities of Enron Corporation, AIG, and a number of other companies came to light. As noted in several chapters in this unit, Congress responded to public outcry in 2002 by passing the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which imposed stricter requirements on corporations with respect to accounting practices and statements made in documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). The lesson for the business world is, of course, that if business leaders do not behave ethically (and legally), the government will create new laws and regulations that force them to do so. We offered suggestions on how business decision makers can create an ethical workplace in Chapter 5. Here, we look at selected areas in which the relationships within specific business organizational forms may raise ethical issues.

The Emergence of Corporate Governance

The well-publicized corporate abuses of recent years provided the impetus for businesspersons to create their own internal rules for corporate governance (discussed in Chapter 42). Examples of these abuses make it clear why such rules are needed. In a few situations, officers have blatantly stolen from the corporation and its shareholders. More frequently, though, officers have received excessive benefits, or “perks,” because of their position. To illustrate: Tyco International bought a $6,000 shower curtain and a $15,000 umbrella stand for its chief executive officer’s apartment.

Corporate officers may be given numerous benefits, which they may or may not deserve. On several occasions, a leading corporate officer has received compensation of $50 million or more in a year when the company’s share price actually declined. Even if corporate officers are scrupulously honest and have modest personal tastes, their behavior may still raise concerns: they may not be good managers, and they may make incompetent corporate decisions. They may be a little lazy and fail to do the hard work necessary to investigate the corporation’s alternatives. Sometimes, officers may simply fail to appreciate the concerns of shareholders on certain matters, such as maximizing short-term versus long-term results.

Corporate governance controls are meant to ensure that officers receive only the benefits they earn. Governance monitors the actions taken by officers to make sure they are wise and in the best interests of the company. In this way, the corporation can be confident that it is acting ethically toward its shareholders.

Fiduciary Duties Revisited

The law of agency, as outlined in Chapters 32 and 33, permeates nearly all relationships within any partnership or corporation. An important duty that arises in the law of agency, and applies to all partners and corporate directors, officers, and management personnel, is the duty of loyalty. As caretakers of the shareholders’ wealth, corporate directors and officers also have a fiduciary duty to exercise care when making decisions affecting the corporate enterprise.

The Duty of Loyalty Every individual has his or her own personal interests, which may at times conflict with the interests of the partnership or corporation with which he or she is affiliated. In particular, a partner or a corporate director may face a conflict between personal interests and the interests of the business entity. Corporate officers and directors may find themselves in a position to acquire assets that would also benefit the corporation if acquired in the corporation’s name. If an officer does purchase the asset without offering the opportunity to the corporation, however, she or he may be liable for usurping a corporate opportunity.¹

Most courts also hold that a corporate officer or director has a fiduciary duty to disclose improper conduct to the corporation. The Supreme Court of Arkansas weighed in on this issue in 2007. Thomas Coughlin was a top executive in theft prevention at Wal-Mart who held several other high-level positions prior to becoming a member of the corporation’s board of directors. He retired in 2005 and entered into a retirement agreement and release of claims with Wal-Mart under which he was to receive millions of dollars in benefits over the years.

Then Wal-Mart discovered that Coughlin, before his retirement, had abused his position of authority and conspired with subordinates to misappropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars in property and cash through various fraudulent schemes. Wal-Mart filed a lawsuit alleging that Coughlin had breached his fiduciary duty of loyalty by failing to disclose his misconduct before entering a self-dealing contract. Ultimately, the state’s highest court agreed and held that the director’s fiduciary duty obligated him to divulge material facts of past fraud to the corporation before entering the contract. The court stated, “We are persuaded, in addition, that the majority view is correct, which is that the failure of a fiduciary to disclose material facts of his fraudulent conduct to his corporation prior to entering into a self-dealing contract with that corporation will void that contract.”²

The Duty of Care In addition to the duty of loyalty, every corporate director or officer owes a duty of care. Due care means that officers and directors must keep themselves informed and make businesslike judgments. Officers have a duty to disclose material information that shareholders need for competent decision making. Some courts have even suggested that corporate directors have a duty to detect and “ferret out” wrongdoing within the corporation.³ In fact, a number of courts applying Delaware law have recognized that directors may be held liable for failing to exercise proper oversight.⁴ For example, in 2009 a Delaware court held that shareholders of Citigroup, Inc., could sue the directors and officers for failure to exercise due care to adequately protect the corporation from exposure to the subprime lending market.⁵ Corporate law also creates other structures to protect shareholder interests, such as the right to inspect books and records.

Although traditionally the duty of care did not require directors to monitor the behavior of corporate employees to detect and prevent wrongdoing, the tide may be changing. Since the corporate sentencing guidelines were issued in 1991, courts have had the power to impose substantial penalties on corporations and corporate directors for criminal wrongdoing. The guidelines allow these penalties to be mitigated, though, if a company can show that it has an effective compliance program in place to detect and prevent wrongdoing by corporate personnel. Since the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 required the sentencing commission to revise these guidelines, the penalties for white-collar crimes, such as federal mail and wire fraud, have increased dramatically.

Fiduciary Duties to Creditors It is a long-standing principle that corporate directors ordinarily owe fiduciary duties only to a corporation’s shareholders. Directors who favor the interests of other corporate “stakeholders,” such as creditors, over those of the shareholders have been held liable for breaching these duties. The picture changes, however, when a corporation approaches insolvency. At this point, the shareholders’ equity interests in the corporation may be worthless, while the interests of creditors become paramount. In this situation, do the fiduciary duties of loyalty and care extend to the corporation’s creditors as well as to the shareholders? The answer to this question, according to some courts, is yes. In a leading case on this issue, a Delaware court noted that “the possibility of insolvency can do curious things to incentives, exposing creditors to risks of opportunistic behavior and creating complexities for directors.” The court held that when a corporation is on the brink of insolvency, the directors assume a fiduciary duty to other stakeholders that sustain the corporate entity, including creditors.⁶ When a corporation is insolvent, courts often require directors to consider the best interests of the whole corporate enterprise—including all its constituent groups—and not to give preference to the interests of any one group.⁷

Corporate Blogs and Tweets and Securities Fraud

In the fast-paced world of securities trading, there is a great demand for the latest information about companies, earnings, and market conditions. Corporations have adapted to technology by establishing Web sites and blogs, and using other interactive online media, such as Twitter and online shareholder forums. Nearly 20 percent of Fortune 500 companies sponsor blogs. Corporations that use the Internet to distribute information about the company to investors, however, need to make sure that they comply with the regulations issued by the SEC. The SEC treats statements by employees in online media, such as blogs and Twitter, the same as any other company statements for purposes of federal securities laws.

“Tweets” That Contain Financial Information Some corporate blogs include links to corporate employees’ Twitter accounts so that readers can communicate directly with, and get updates from, the individual who posted the information. For example, eBay, Inc., launched its corporate blog in 2008. A few months later, Richard Brewer-Hay, a seasoned blogger that eBay hired to report online, began “tweeting” (posting updates on Twitter) about eBay’s quarterly earnings and what took place at Silicon Valley technology conferences. Brewer-Hay’s tweets gained him a following, but then eBay’s lawyers required him to include a regulatory disclaimer with certain posts to avoid problems with the SEC. Many of his followers were disappointed by the company’s oversight, which put an end to his spontaneous, personal, and informal style.

Brewer-Hay is now much more reserved in his tweets on financial matters and often simply repeats eBay executives' statements verbatim.⁸

A 2008 SEC Release Provides Guidance The reaction of eBay's lawyers to Brewer-Hay's tweets was prompted in part by an interpretive release issued by the SEC in August 2008. The SEC generally embraces new technology and encourages companies to use electronic communication methods. The SEC noted that "the use of the Internet has grown such that, for some companies in certain circumstances, posting of the information on the company's Web site, in and of itself, may be a sufficient method of public disclosure."

The release also addressed company-sponsored blogs, electronic shareholders' forums, and other "interactive Web site features." The SEC acknowledged that blogs and other interactive Web features are a useful means of ongoing communications among companies, their clients, investors, shareholders, and stakeholders. The SEC cautioned, though, that all communications made by or on behalf of a company are subject to the antifraud provisions of federal securities laws. "While blogs or forums can be informal and conversational in nature, statements made there . . . will not be treated differently from other company statements." In addition, the release stated that companies cannot require investors to waive protections under federal securities laws as a condition of participating in a blog or forum. (The release also cautioned companies that they can, in some situations, be liable for providing hyperlinks to third party information or inaccurate summaries of financial information on their Web sites.)⁹

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act and Insider Trading

The attorney-client privilege generally prevents lawyers from disclosing confidential client information—even when the client has committed an unlawful act. The idea is to encourage clients to be open and honest with their attorneys to ensure competent representation. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, however, requires attorneys to report any material violations of securities laws to the corporation's highest authority.¹⁰ The act does not require that the lawyer break client confidences, though, because the lawyer is still reporting to officials within the corporation.

In August 2003, the SEC went one step further than the Sarbanes-Oxley Act to permit attorneys to disclose confidential information to the SEC without the corporate client's consent in certain circumstances.¹¹ Although the American Bar Association modified its ethics rules to allow attorneys to break confidence with a client to report possible corporate fraud, not all state ethics codes allow attorneys to disclose client information to the SEC. Thus, by reporting possible violations of securities law to the SEC, corporate lawyers may violate the state ethics code of their profession.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Three decades ago, corporations and corporate directors were rarely prosecuted for crimes, and penalties for corporate crimes were relatively light. Today, this is no longer true. Under the corporate sentencing guidelines and the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, corporate wrongdoers can receive substantial penalties. Do these developments mean that corporations are committing more crimes today than in the past? Will stricter laws be effective in curbing corporate criminal activity? How can a company avoid liability for crimes committed by its employees?
2. Do you agree that when a corporation is approaching insolvency, the directors' fiduciary obligations should extend to the corporation's creditors as well as to the shareholders?
3. When a company's executives offer opinions about the firm's financial status and future business prospects through blogs, Twitter, and other Internet forums, the SEC can hold the company liable for violating securities laws. Is this fair to investors who want to hear the straight scoop from the firm's executives? What arguments can you make in favor of this restriction? What arguments can you make against it?
4. Should corporate lawyers who become aware that someone at the client corporation may have violated securities laws report their suspicions only to persons within the corporation, or should they report their concerns to the SEC? Explain.

CHAPTER 44

Administrative Law

Government agencies established to administer the law have a great impact on the day-to-day operations of the government and the economy. In its early years, the United States had a simple, nonindustrial economy with few political demands for detailed regulations and therefore not very many administrative agencies. Today, in contrast, rules cover almost every aspect of a business's operation. Consequently, agencies have multiplied.

Administrative agencies issue rules, orders, interpretations, and decisions. The regulations make up the body of administrative law. You were introduced briefly to some of the main principles of administrative law in Chapter 1. In the following pages, we will look at these principles in much greater detail.

SECTION 1

THE PRACTICAL SIGNIFICANCE OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW

Unlike statutory law, administrative law is created by administrative agencies, not by legislatures, but it is nevertheless of paramount significance for businesses. When Congress—or a state legislature—enacts legislation, it typically adopts a rather general statute and leaves its implementation to an administrative agency, which then creates the detailed rules and regulations necessary to carry out the statute. The administrative agency, with its specialized personnel, has the time, resources, and expertise to make the detailed decisions required for regulation.

Administrative Agencies Exist at All Levels of Government

Administrative agencies are spread throughout the government. At the federal level, the Securities and Exchange Commission regulates a firm's capital structure and financing, as well as its financial reporting. The National Labor Relations Board oversees relations between a firm and any unions with which it may deal. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission also regulates employer-employee relationships. The Environmental Protection Agency and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration affect the way a firm manufactures its products, and the Federal Trade Commission influences the way it markets those products.

Added to this layer of federal regulation is a second layer of state regulation that, when not preempted, may cover many of the same activities as federal regulation or regulate independently the activities that federal regulation does not cover. If the actions of parallel state and federal agencies conflict, the actions of the federal agency will prevail under the supremacy clause of the U.S. Constitution. Agency regulations at the county or municipal level can also affect certain types of business activities.

Agencies Provide a Comprehensive Regulatory Scheme

Often, administrative agencies at various levels of government work together and share the responsibility of creating and enforcing particular regulations. For example, when Congress enacted the Clean Air Act (to be discussed in Chapter 46), it provided only general directions for the prevention of air pollution. The specific pollution-control requirements imposed on business are almost entirely the product of decisions made by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). Moreover, the EPA works with parallel environmental agencies at the state level to analyze existing data and determine the appropriate pollution-control standards.

Legislation and regulations have significant benefits—in the example of the Clean Air Act, a cleaner environment than existed in decades past. At the same time, these benefits entail considerable costs for business. The EPA has estimated the costs of compliance with the Clean Air Act at many tens of billions of dollars yearly. Although the agency has calculated that the overall benefits of its regulations often exceed their costs, the burden on business is substantial. Additionally, the costs are proportionately higher for small businesses because they cannot take advantage of the economies of scale (cost advantages that a firm obtains due to expansion) available to larger operations.

Given the costs that regulation entails, business has a strong incentive to try to influence the regulatory environment. Whenever new regulations are proposed, as happens constantly, companies may lobby the agency to try to persuade it not to adopt a particular regulation or to adopt one that is more cost-effective. At the same time, public-interest groups may be lobbying in favor of more stringent regulation.

AGENCY CREATION AND POWERS

Congress creates federal administrative agencies. By delegating some of its authority to make and implement laws, Congress can monitor indirectly a particular area in which it has passed legislation without becoming bogged down in the details relating to enforcement—details that are often best left to specialists.

To create an administrative agency, Congress passes enabling legislation, which specifies the name, purposes, functions, and powers of the agency being created. Federal administrative agencies can exercise only those powers that Congress has delegated to them in enabling legislation. Through similar enabling acts, state legislatures create state administrative agencies, which commonly parallel federal agencies.

An agency's enabling statute defines its legal authority. An agency cannot regulate beyond the powers granted by the statute, and it may be required to take some regulatory action by the terms of that statute. When regulated groups oppose a rule adopted by an agency, they often bring a lawsuit arguing that the rule was not authorized by the enabling statute and is therefore void. Conversely, a group may file suit claiming that an agency has illegally failed to pursue regulation required by the enabling statute.

Enabling Legislation—An Example

Congress created the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) by enacting the Federal Trade Commission Act of 1914.¹ The act prohibits unfair methods of competition and deceptive trade practices. It also describes the procedures that the FTC must follow to charge persons or organizations with violations of the act, and it provides for judicial review of agency orders. The act grants the FTC the power to do the following:

1. To create “rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the Act.”
2. To conduct investigations of business practices.
3. To obtain reports from interstate corporations concerning their business practices.
4. To investigate possible violations of federal anti-trust statutes.²
5. To publish findings of its investigations.
6. To recommend new legislation.
7. To hold trial-like hearings to resolve certain kinds of trade disputes that involve FTC regulations or federal antitrust laws.

The authorizing statute for the FTC allows it to prevent the use of “unfair methods of competition,” but does not define unfairness. Congress delegated that authority to the commission, thereby providing it with considerable discretion in regulating competition. The commission that heads the FTC is composed of five members, each of whom the president appoints, with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of seven years.

Types of Agencies

As discussed in Chapter 1, there are two basic types of administrative agencies: executive agencies and independent regulatory agencies. Federal executive agencies include the cabinet departments of the executive branch, which were formed to assist the president in carrying out executive functions, and the subagencies within the cabinet departments. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration, for example, is a subagency within the U.S. Department of Labor. Executive agencies usually have a single administrator, director, or secretary who is appointed by the president to oversee the agency and can be removed by the president at any time. Exhibit 44–1 below lists the cabinet departments and some of their most important subagencies.

2. The FTC shares enforcement of the Clayton Act with the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Department of Justice (see Chapter 47).

Independent regulatory agencies are outside the federal executive departments (those headed by a cabinet secretary). Examples of independent agencies include the Federal Trade Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). Rather than having a single person as its head, an independent agency usually is run by a commission or board made up of several members, one of whom serves as the agency's chair. Commissioners or board members typically serve for fixed terms and cannot be removed without just cause. The SEC has five commissioners who serve

Agency Powers and the Constitution

Administrative agencies occupy an unusual niche in the U.S. legal scheme because they exercise powers that normally are divided among the three branches of government. As mentioned earlier, agencies' powers include functions associated with the legislature (rulemaking), the executive branch (enforcement), and the courts (adjudication).

The constitutional principle of checks and balances allows each branch of government to act as a check on the actions of the other two branches. Furthermore, the U.S. Constitution authorizes only the legislative branch to create laws. Yet administrative agencies, to which the Constitution does not specifically refer, can make legislative rules, or substantive rules, that are as legally binding as laws that Congress passes. (Administrative agencies also issue interpretive rules, which simply declare policy and do not affect legal rights or obligations.)

THE DELEGATION DOCTRINE Article I of the U.S. Constitution authorizes Congress to delegate powers to administrative agencies. In fact, courts generally hold that Article I is the basis for all administrative law. Section 1 of that article grants all legislative powers to Congress and requires Congress to oversee the implementation of all laws. Article I, Section 8, gives Congress the power to make all laws necessary for executing its specified powers. The courts interpret these passages, under what is known as the delegation doctrine, as granting Congress the power to establish administrative agencies that can create rules for implementing those laws.

The three branches of government exercise certain controls over agency powers and functions, as discussed next, but in many ways administrative agencies function independently. For this reason, administrative agencies, which constitute the bureaucracy, are sometimes referred to as the fourth branch of the U.S. government.

EXECUTIVE CONTROLS The executive branch of government exercises control over agencies both through the president's power to appoint federal officers and through the president's veto power. The president may veto enabling legislation presented by Congress or congressional attempts to modify an existing agency's authority. In addition, the president has created a process whereby the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs (OIRA) of the Office of Management and Budget reviews the cost-effectiveness of agency rules. The OIRA also reviews agencies' compliance with the Paperwork Reduction Act,³ which requires agencies to minimize the paperwork burden on regulated entities.

LEGISLATIVE CONTROLS Congress also exercises authority over agency powers. Congress gives power to an agency through enabling legislation and can take power away—or even abolish an agency altogether—through subsequent legislation. Legislative authority is required to fund an agency, and enabling legislation usually sets certain time and monetary limits on the funding of particular programs. Congress can always revise these limits. In addition to its power to create and fund agencies, Congress has the authority to investigate the implementation of its laws and the agencies that it has created. Congress also has the power to “freeze” the enforcement of most federal regulations before the regulations take effect. Another legislative check on agency actions is the Administrative Procedure Act, which will be discussed shortly.

JUDICIAL CONTROLS The judicial branch exercises control over agency powers through the courts' review of agency actions. As you will read in the next section, the Administrative Procedure Act provides for judicial review of most agency decisions. Agency actions are not automatically subject to judicial review, however, and the courts can deny review under the two theories discussed next.

The Exhaustion Doctrine. The party seeking court review must first exhaust all of his or her administrative remedies under what is called the exhaustion doctrine. In other words, the complaining party normally must have gone through the administrative process (from complaint to hearing to final agency order, all of which will be discussed later in this chapter) before seeking court review.

Suppose that an employee who has a disability believes that she has suffered unlawful discrimination in the workplace (see Chapter 35). Under the exhaustion doctrine, before she can file a complaint in court, she must have filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), and the EEOC must have issued its final ruling.

The Ripeness Doctrine. In addition, under what is known as the ripeness doctrine, a court will not review an administrative agency's decision until the case is “ripe for review.” Generally, a case is ripe for review if the parties can demonstrate that they have met certain requirements. For example, the party bringing the action must have standing to sue the agency (the party must have a direct stake in the outcome of the judicial proceeding, as discussed in Chapter 2), and there must be an actual controversy at issue. A court can dismiss the action if the administrative agency has not yet issued a decision or if the party lacks standing.

THE ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT

All federal agencies must follow specific procedural requirements when fulfilling their three basic functions of rulemaking, enforcement, and adjudication. In this section, we focus on agency rulemaking (enforcement and adjudication will be discussed in a later section of this chapter). Sometimes, Congress specifies certain procedural requirements in an agency's enabling legislation. In the absence of any directives from Congress concerning a particular agency procedure, the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) of 1946⁴ applies.

The Arbitrary and Capricious Test

One of Congress's goals in enacting the APA was to provide for more judicial control over administrative agencies. To that end, the APA provides that courts should “hold unlawful and set aside” agency actions found to be “arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law.”⁵ Under this standard, parties can challenge regulations as contrary to law or so irrational as to be arbitrary and capricious.

3. Pub. L. No. 104-13, May 22, 1995, 109 Stat. 163, amending 44 U.S.C. Sections 3501 et seq.

4. 5 U.S.C. Sections 551–706.

5. 5 U.S.C. Section 706(2)(A).

There is no precise definition of what makes a rule arbitrary and capricious, but the standard includes factors such as whether the agency has done any of the following:

1. Failed to provide a rational explanation for its decision.
2. Changed its prior policy without justification.

3. Considered legally inappropriate factors.
4. Entirely failed to consider a relevant factor.
5. Rendered a decision plainly contrary to the evidence.

In the following case, the United States Supreme Court considered the application of the arbitrary and capricious standard.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

The Communications Act of 1934 established a system of limited-term broadcast licenses subject to various “conditions” * * * .

* * * [These conditions include] the indecency ban—the statutory proscription [prohibition] against “utter[ing] any obscene, indecent, or profane language by means of radio communication”—which Congress has instructed the [Federal Communications] Commission to enforce * * * .

* * * *

The Commission first invoked the statutory ban on indecent broadcasts in 1975, declaring a daytime broadcast of George Carlin’s “Filthy Words” monologue actionably indecent. At that time, the Commission announced the definition of indecent speech that it uses to this day, prohibiting “language that describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards for the broadcast medium, sexual or excretory activities or organs, at times of the day when there is a reasonable risk that children may be in the audience.”

* * * *

Over a decade later, the Commission emphasized that the “full context” in which particular materials appear is “critically important,” but that a few “principal” factors guide the inquiry, such as the “explicitness or graphic nature” of the material, the extent to which the material “dwells on or repeats” the offensive material, and the extent to which the material was presented to “pander,” to “titillate,” or to “shock.” * * * “Where sexual or excretory references have been made once or have been passing or fleeting in nature, this characteristic has tended to weigh against a finding of indecency.”

In 2004, the Commission took one step further by declaring for the first time that a nonliteral (expletive) use of the F- and S-Words could be actionably indecent, even when the word is used only once. The first order to this effect dealt with an NBC broadcast of the Golden Globe Awards, in which the performer Bono [lead singer of the rock group U-2] commented, “This is really, really, fing brilliant.”

* * * *

The order acknowledged that “prior Commission and staff action have indicated that isolated or fleeting broadcasts of the ‘F-Word’ * * * are not indecent or would not be acted upon.” It explicitly ruled that “any such interpretation is no longer good law.”

[The present case] concerns utterances in two live broadcasts aired by Fox Television Stations, Inc., * * * prior to the Commission’s Golden Globes Order. The first occurred during the 2002 Billboard Music Awards, when the singer Cher exclaimed, “I’ve also had critics for the last 40 years saying that I was on my way out every year. Right. So f ‘em.” The second involved a segment of the 2003 Billboard Music Awards, [when Nicole Richie asked] the audience, “Why do they even call it ‘The Simple Life?’ Have you ever tried to get cow s out of a Prada purse? It’s not so fing simple.”

On March 15, 2006, the Commission released Notices of Apparent Liability for a number of broadcasts that the Commission deemed actionably indecent, including the two described above.

* * * *

* * * In the Commission’s view, “granting an automatic exemption for ‘isolated or fleeting’ expletives unfairly forces viewers (including children)” to take “the first blow” and would allow broadcasters “to air expletives at all hours of a day so long as they did so one at a time.”

Fox [appealed] to the Second Circuit [Court of Appeals] for review of the [order] * * * . The Court of Appeals reversed the agency's order, finding the Commission's reasoning inadequate under the Administrative Procedure Act. * * * We granted certiorari.

* * * *

The Administrative Procedure Act, which sets forth the full extent of judicial authority to review executive agency action for procedural correctness, permits (insofar as relevant here) the setting aside of agency action that is “arbitrary” or “capricious.” Under what we have called this “narrow” standard of review, we insist that an agency “examine the relevant data and articulate a satisfactory explanation for its action.” We have made clear, however, that “a court is not to substitute its judgment for that of the agency,” and should “uphold a decision of less than ideal clarity if the agency’s path may reasonably be discerned.” [Emphasis added.]

In overturning the Commission's judgment, the Court of Appeals here relied in part on Circuit precedent requiring a more substantial explanation for agency action that changes prior policy. The Second Circuit has interpreted the Administrative Procedure Act and our opinion in [a previous case] as requiring agencies to make clear “why the original reasons for adopting the [displaced] rule or policy are no longer dispositive [a deciding factor]” as well as “why the new rule effectuates the statute as well as or better than the old rule.” The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has similarly indicated that a court's standard of review is “heightened somewhat” when an agency reverses course.

We find no basis in the Administrative Procedure Act or in our opinions for a requirement that all agency change be subjected to more searching review. The Act mentions no such heightened standard. [Emphasis added.]

To be sure, the requirement that an agency provide reasoned explanation for its action would ordinarily demand that it display awareness that it is changing position. An agency may not, for example, depart from a prior policy sub silentio [under silence, without any notice of the change] or simply disregard rules that are still on the books. And of course the agency must show that there are good reasons for the new policy. But it need not demonstrate to a court's satisfaction that the reasons for the new policy are better than the reasons for the old one; it suffices that the new policy is permissible under the statute, that there are good reasons for it, and that the agency believes it to be better.

* * * *

Judged under the above-described standards, the Commission's new enforcement policy and its order finding the broadcasts actionably indecent were neither arbitrary nor capricious. First, the Commission forthrightly acknowledged that its recent actions have broken new ground, taking account of inconsistent “prior Commission and staff action” and explicitly disavowing them as “no longer good law.” * * * There is no doubt that the Commission knew it was making a change. That is why it declined to assess penalties * * * .

Moreover, the agency's reasons for expanding the scope of its enforcement activity were entirely rational. It was certainly reasonable to determine that it made no sense to distinguish between literal and nonliteral uses of offensive words, requiring repetitive use to render only the latter indecent. * * * It is surely rational (if not inescapable) to believe that a safe harbor for single words would “likely lead to more widespread use of the offensive language.”

* * * *

The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.^b

b. On remand, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit ruled that the FCC's indecency policies were unconstitutionally vague and violated the broadcast networks' First Amendment rights. See Fox Television Stations, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission, 613 F.3d 317 (2010).

QUESTIONS

1. Today, children are likely exposed to indecent language in various media far more often than they were in the 1970s, when the Federal Communications Commission first began to sanction indecent speech. Does this mean that we need more stringent—or less stringent—regulation of broadcasts? Explain.
2. Technological advances have made it easier for broadcasters to “bleep out” offending words in the programs that they air. Does this development support a more stringent—or less stringent—enforcement policy by the Federal Communications Commission? Explain.

Rulemaking

Today, the major function of an administrative agency is rulemaking—the formulation of new regulations, or rules. The APA defines a rule as “an agency statement of general or particular applicability and future effect designed to implement, interpret, or prescribe law and policy.”⁶ Regulations are sometimes said to be legislative because, like statutes, they have a binding effect. Like those who violate statutes, violators of agency rules may be punished. Because agency rules have such significant legal force, the APA established procedures for agencies to follow in creating rules. Many rules must be adopted using the APA's notice-and-comment rulemaking procedure.

Notice-and-comment rulemaking involves three basic steps: notice of the proposed rulemaking, a comment period, and the final rule. The APA recognizes some limited exceptions to these procedural requirements, but they are seldom invoked. If the required procedures are violated, the resulting rule may be invalid.

The impetus for rulemaking may come from various sources, including Congress, the agency itself, or private parties, who may petition an agency to begin a rulemaking (or repeal a rule). For example, environmental groups have petitioned for stricter air-pollution controls to combat emissions that may contribute to global warming.

NOTICE OF THE PROPOSED RULEMAKING When a federal agency decides to create a new rule, the agency publishes a notice of the proposed rulemaking proceedings in the Federal Register, a daily publication of the executive branch that prints government orders, rules, and regulations. The notice states where and when the proceedings will be held, the agency's legal authority for making the rule (usually its enabling legislation), and the terms or subject matter of the proposed rule. The APA requires an agency to make available to the public certain information, such as the key scientific data underlying the proposal. The proposed rule is also often reported by the news media and published in the trade journals of the industries that will be affected by the new rule.

COMMENT PERIOD After the publication of the notice of the proposed rulemaking proceedings, the agency must allow ample time for persons to comment in writing on the proposed rule. The comment period must be at least thirty days but is often sixty days or longer. An agency can extend the period to allow for more comments or shorten it in emergencies (such as when the Federal Aviation Administration changed airport security procedures after September 11, 2001).

The purpose of this comment period is to give interested parties the opportunity to express their views on the proposed rule in an effort to influence agency policy. Anyone can submit comments. The comments may be in writing or, if a hearing is held, may be given orally. All comments are logged in and become a public record that others can examine.

The agency need not respond to all comments, but it must respond to any significant comments that bear directly on the proposed rule. The agency responds by either modifying its final rule or explaining, in a statement accompanying the final rule, why it did not make any changes. In some circumstances, particularly when the procedure being used in a specific instance is less formal, an agency may accept comments after the comment period is closed. The agency should summarize these ex parte (private, "off-the-record") comments in the record for possible review.⁷

THE FINAL RULE After the agency reviews the comments, it drafts the final rule and publishes it in the Federal Register. The final rule must contain a "concise general statement of . . . basis and purpose" that describes the reasoning behind the rule.⁸ The final rule may modify the terms of the proposed rule in light of the public comments, but if substantial changes are made, a new proposal and a new opportunity for comment are required. The final rule is later compiled along with the rules and regulations of other federal administrative agencies in the Code of Federal Regulations. Final rules have binding legal effect unless the courts later overturn them and for this reason are considered legislative rules. If an agency failed to follow proper rulemaking procedures when it issued the final rule, however, the rule may not be binding.

CASE IN POINT Members of the Hemp Industries Association (HIA) manufacture and sell food products made from hemp seed and oil. These products contain only trace amounts of tetrahydrocannabinols (THC, a component of marijuana) and are nonpsychoactive—that is, they do not affect a person's mind or behavior. In 2001, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) published an interpretive rule declaring that "any product that contains any amount of THC is a Schedule I controlled substance [a drug whose availability is restricted by law]." Subsequently, without following formal rulemaking procedures, the DEA declared that two legislative rules relating to products containing natural THC were final. These rules effectively

7. Ex parte is a Latin term meaning "from one party." In the law, it usually refers to proceedings in which only one party to a dispute is present. Ex parte communications with judges (or administrative law judges) generally are prohibited. Thus, when agencies accept ex parte public comments, they must record them and make them available to others.

8. 5 U.S.C. Section 555(c).

banned the possession and sale of the food products of the HIA's members. The HIA petitioned for court review, arguing that the DEA rules should not have been enforced. A federal appellate court agreed and ruled in favor of the HIA. The DEA should have held hearings on the record concerning the rules, invited public comment, and then issued formal rulings on each finding, conclusion, and exception. Because the DEA did not follow its formal rulemaking procedures, the rules were not enforceable.⁹

Informal Agency Actions

Rather than take the time to conduct notice-and-comment rulemaking, agencies have increasingly been using more informal methods of policymaking, such as issuing interpretive rules and guidance documents. As mentioned previously, legislative rules are substantive in that they affect legal rights, whereas interpretive rules simply declare policy and do not affect legal rights or obligations. Agencies also issue various other materials, such as guidance documents, which advise the public on the agencies' legal and policy positions.

Informal agency actions are exempt from the APA's requirements because they do not establish legal rights—a party cannot be directly prosecuted for violating an interpretive rule or a guidance document. Nevertheless, an agency's informal action can be of practical importance because it warns regulated entities that the agency may engage in formal rulemaking if they fail to heed the positions taken informally by the agency.

JUDICIAL DEFERENCE TO AGENCY DECISIONS

When asked to review agency decisions, courts historically granted some deference (significant weight) to the agency's judgment, often citing the agency's great expertise in the subject area of the regulation. This deference seems especially appropriate when applied to an agency's analysis of factual questions, but should it also extend to an agency's interpretation of its own legal authority? In Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc.,¹⁰ the United States Supreme Court held that it should, thereby creating a standard of broadened deference to agencies on questions of legal interpretation.

The Holding of the Chevron Case

At issue in the Chevron case was whether the courts should defer to an agency's interpretation of a statute giving it authority to act. The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) had interpreted the phrase "stationary source" in the Clean Air Act as referring to an entire manufacturing plant, and not to each facility within a plant. The agency's interpretation enabled it to adopt the so-called bubble policy, which allowed companies to offset increases in emissions in part of a plant with decreases elsewhere in the plant—an interpretation that reduced the pollution-control compliance costs faced by manufacturers. An environmental group challenged the legality of the EPA's interpretation.

The Supreme Court held that the courts should defer to an agency's interpretation of law as well as fact. The Court found that the agency's interpretation of the statute was reasonable and upheld the bubble policy. The Court's decision in the Chevron case created a new standard for courts to use when reviewing agency interpretations of law, which involves the following two questions:

1. Did Congress directly address the issue in dispute in the statute? If so, the statutory language prevails.
2. If the statute is silent or ambiguous, is the agency's interpretation "reasonable"? If it is, a court should uphold the agency's interpretation even if the court would have interpreted the law differently.

When Courts Will Give Chevron Deference to Agency Interpretation

The notion that courts should defer to agencies on matters of law was controversial. Under the holding of the Chevron case, when the meaning of a particular statute's language is unclear and an agency interprets it, the court must follow the agency's interpretation as long as it is reasonable. This led to considerable discussion and litigation to test the boundaries of the Chevron holding. For instance, are courts required to give deference to all agency interpretations or only to those interpretations that result from adjudication or formal rulemaking procedures? Are informal agency interpretations issued through opinion letters and internal memoranda also entitled to deference?

CASE IN POINT The United States has a tariff (tax) schedule that authorizes the U.S. Customs Service to classify and fix the rate of duty on imports. “Ruling letters” set tariff classifications for particular imports. Mead Corporation imported “daily planners,” which had been tariff-free for several years. The Customs Service issued a ruling letter reclassifying them as “bound diaries,” which were subject to a tariff. Mead brought a lawsuit claiming that the ruling letter should not receive Chevron deference because it was not put into effect pursuant to notice-and-comment rulemaking. When the case reached the United States Supreme Court, the Court agreed that the ruling letter was not entitled to Chevron deference. For agencies to be assured of such judicial deference, they must meet the formal legal standards for notice-and-comment rulemaking.¹¹

9. Hemp Industries Association v. Drug Enforcement Administration, 357 F.3d 1012 (9th Cir. 2004).

11. United States v. Mead Corporation, 533 U.S. 218, 121 S.Ct. 2164, 150 L.Ed.2d 292 (2001).

In the case that follows, an environmental organization brought an action challenging the U.S. Forest Service’s decision to issue a special use permit to a business that conducts helicopter-skiing operations in two national forests. As you will read in Chapter 46, the National Environmental Policy Act requires federal agencies to prepare an environmental impact statement (EIS) that considers every significant aspect of the environmental impact of a proposed action. Although the Forest Service prepared an EIS before issuing the use permit, environmental groups claimed that the EIS did not sufficiently analyze increasing recreational pressures in the forests. The groups sought to have the court invalidate the permit. Although the Chevron precedent is not specifically mentioned, the court’s analysis illustrates the way in which courts review agency decisions.

CASE 44.2

Citizens’ Committee to Save Our Canyons v. Krueger

United States Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit, 513 F.3d 1169 (2008).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Under the National Forest Management Act (NFMA), the U.S. Forest Service manages national forests in accordance with forest plans periodically developed for each forest. The plans for two national forests—the Wasatch-Cache and Uinta forests—were initially adopted in 1985 and revised in 2003. The Forest Service interpreted the 1985 forest plans as requiring the forests to allow helicopter skiing, and the plans expressly recognized helicopter skiing as a legitimate use of the national forests. Wasatch Powderbird Guides (WPG) has continuously operated a guided helicopter-skiing business in the Wasatch-Cache and Uinta national forests since 1973. It operates under the authority of special use permits periodically issued by the Forest Service. Citizens’ Committee to Save Our Canyons and Utah Environmental Congress (referred to collectively as SOC) are nonprofit organizations whose members use the areas in which WPG operates for nonmotorized uses, such as backcountry skiing, snowshoeing, hiking, and camping. They claimed that their recreational opportunities and experiences were diminished by WPG’s operations and argued that the Forest Service failed to comply with relevant laws when issuing WPG’s most recent permit. The district court upheld the Forest Service permit, and SOC appealed.

Under the Administrative Procedure Act (“APA”), which governs judicial review of agency actions, * * * we set aside the agency’s action * * * if it is “arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law.” We will also set aside an agency action if the agency has failed to follow required procedures.

Our review is highly deferential [respectful of the agency’s reasoning]. The duty of a court reviewing agency action under the “arbitrary or capricious” standard is to ascertain whether the agency examined the relevant data and articulated a rational connection between the facts found and the decision made. Furthermore, in reviewing the agency’s explanation, the reviewing court must determine whether the agency considered all relevant factors and whether there has been a clear error of judgment. A presumption

* * * *

NFMA requires the Forest Service to “develop, maintain, and, as appropriate, revise land and resource management plans for units of the National Forest System.” All permits the Forest Service issues “for the use and occupancy of National Forest System lands shall be consistent with the land management plans.”

* * * The EIS examined various options and concluded an acceptable balance between helicopter skiing and other uses could be reached by imposing certain restrictions on WPG’s operations. These restrictions reflect no special consideration for WPG’s economic viability beyond the goal of providing “a range of diverse, recreational opportunities” including helicopter skiing. The EIS thoroughly explains the Forest Service’s approach, and the 2005 permit includes a number of reasonable restrictions on WPG with the goal of allowing both helicopter skiers and other backcountry users to enjoy the national forests. In the end, the Forest Service’s permit reflected the “type and level” of heli-skiing it thought appropriately balanced the competing recreational uses in the forests.

Taking the interpretation of the forest plans represented by the EIS as a whole, the EIS and the ultimate permitting decision comply with the Forest Service’s interpretation of its forest plans. The Forest Service properly considered how particular options would affect the range of recreational opportunities available in the forests and balanced interests in a way it believed promoted multiple forest uses.

* * * *

In sum, the Forest Service’s EIS fully disclosed and considered the impact of its decision to issue a special use permit to WPG. Our objective is not to “fly speck” the [EIS], but rather, to make a pragmatic judgment whether the [EIS]’s form, content and preparation foster both informed decision-making and informed public participation. The [National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA)] process in this case, including extensive public comment, considered a variety of options and yielded a number of reasonable restrictions on WPG’s operations designed to minimize conflict among forest users. This is all NEPA requires. [Emphasis added.]

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit affirmed the district court’s decision that upheld the Forest Service permit allowing WPG to conduct helicopter-skiing operations in two national forests. The Forest Service’s EIS properly considered all relevant factors and allowed for public comment. Because the Forest Service’s interpretation of the NFMA and NEPA was reasonable, the court found that the permit complied with federal laws.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the Forest Service had granted WPG a permit for its helicopter-skiing operations on national forest land without preparing an EIS or soliciting public comment. How might that have changed the court’s ruling?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • If it turned out that the helicopter-skiing operation had paid a substantial sum to the Forest Service official who prepared the EIS to influence the official’s findings, would the court have been able to consider this fact and invalidate the permit? Why or why not?

ENFORCEMENT AND ADJUDICATION

Although rulemaking is the most prominent agency activity, enforcement of the rules is also critical. Often, an agency itself enforces its rules. It identifies alleged violators and pursues civil remedies against them in a proceeding held by the agency rather than in federal court, although the agency’s determinations are reviewable in court.

Investigation

After final rules are issued, agencies conduct investigations to monitor compliance with those rules or the requirements of the enabling statute. A typical agency investigation of this kind might begin when a citizen reports a possible violation to the agency. (See this chapter’s Insight into Ethics feature on the facing page for a discussion of how concern about violating regulations has made pharmaceutical companies reluctant to use Twitter and Facebook.)

Many agency rules also require considerable compliance reporting from regulated entities, and such

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

Should Pharmaceutical Companies Be Allowed to Tweet?

Where do Americans go when they need medical information? More than 60 percent turn to the Internet, and half of those go to social networks, such as Twitter and Facebook, to consult with others about diagnosis and treatments. According to pharmaceutical companies, however, much of the information that potential customers are finding online is incorrect.

Consumers Lack Complete Information on Drugs

Drug companies are, of course, in the business of selling prescription drugs, and they have an incentive to ensure that consumers have correct information about those drugs. Yet drug manufacturers spend less than 5 percent of their consumer advertising budgets on Internet advertising. (More than 95 percent of the $4 billion that these companies spend on direct consumer advertising goes to traditional outlets, such as newspapers, magazines, and television.)

Similarly, drug companies have little or no presence on sites such as Facebook and Twitter. Why not? They fear that the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) will retaliate if they do not list all of the potential side effects when they mention their drugs on the Web.

Web Ads and Tweets Have Size Limits

The FDA requires advertisements for prescription drugs to disclose all of the potential negative side effects. A magazine ad for a prescription drug, for example, typically includes a large block of small print that details potential side effects. Display ads on the Web are not amenable to such lists. So, to avoid violating the FDA's regulations, pharmaceutical companies run only general, disease-related search ads on the Web. Because the ads only rarely mention a drug's brand name, consumers looking for information about a particular drug rarely click on or find such ads.

As a result, consumers have less information about available prescription drugs. For the same reason, drug companies are reluctant to tweet about their drugs. How could they possibly describe all of the potential side effects in only 140 characters?

CRITICAL THINKING

Do pharmaceutical companies have an ethical responsibility to correct erroneous information about their products on sites such as Wikipedia?

a report may trigger an enforcement investigation. For example, environmental regulators often require reports of emissions, and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration requires companies to report any work-related deaths.

INSPECTIONS Many agencies gather information through on-site inspections. Sometimes, inspecting an office, a factory, or some other business facility is the only way to obtain the evidence needed to prove a regulatory violation. Administrative inspections and tests cover a wide range of activities, including safety inspections of underground coal mines, safety tests of commercial equipment and automobiles, and environmental monitoring of factory emissions. An agency may also ask a firm or individual to submit certain documents or records to the agency for examination. For example, the Federal Trade Commission often asks to inspect corporate records for compliance.

Normally, business firms comply with agency requests to inspect facilities or business records because it is in any firm's interest to maintain a good relationship with regulatory bodies. In some instances, however, such as when a firm thinks an agency's request is unreasonable and may be detrimental to the firm's interest, the firm may refuse to comply with the request. In such situations, an agency may resort to the use of a subpoena or a search warrant.

SUBPOENAS There are two basic types of subpoenas. The subpoena ad testificandum ("to testify") is an ordinary subpoena. It is a writ, or order, compelling a witness to appear at an agency hearing. The subpoena *duces tecum*¹² ("bring it with you") compels an individual or organization to hand over books, papers, records, or documents to the agency. An administrative agency may use either type of subpoena to obtain testimony or documents.

There are limits on the information that an agency can demand. To determine whether an agency is abusing its discretion in its pursuit of information as part of an investigation, a court may consider such factors as the following:

1. The purpose of the investigation. An investigation must have a legitimate purpose. Harassment is an example of an improper purpose. An agency may not issue an administrative subpoena to inspect business records if the agency's motive is to harass or pressure the business into settling an unrelated matter.

12. Pronounced doo-suhs tee-kum.

2. The relevance of the information being sought. Information is relevant if it reveals that the law is being violated or if it assures the agency that the law is not being violated.
3. The specificity of the demand for testimony or documents. A subpoena must, for example, adequately describe the material being sought.
4. The burden of the demand on the party from whom the information is sought. In responding to a request for information, a party must bear the costs of, for example, copying the documents that must be handed over. A business generally is not required to reveal its trade secrets, however.

SEARCHES DURING SITE INSPECTIONS As mentioned, agency investigations often involve on-site inspections. For example, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) frequently conducts inspections to enforce environmental laws. The EPA may inspect a site to determine if hazardous wastes are being stored properly or to sample a facility's wastewater to ensure that it complies with the Clean Water Act. Usually, companies do not resist such inspections, although in some circumstances they may do so.

Search Warrant Usually Required. The Fourth Amendment protects against unreasonable searches and seizures by requiring in most instances that a search warrant be obtained before a physical search for evidence is conducted. An agency typically must obtain a search warrant that directs law enforcement officials to search a specific place for a specific item and present it to the agency.

Some Warrantless Searches Legal. Agencies can conduct warrantless searches in several situations. Warrants are not required to conduct searches in certain highly regulated industries. Firms that sell firearms or liquor, for example, are automatically subject to inspections without warrants. Sometimes, a statute permits warrantless searches of certain types of hazardous operations, such as coal mines or liquid propane retailers. A warrantless inspection might also be considered reasonable in emergency situations or when a violation is potentially dangerous to human health or the environment. Finally, if procuring a warrant will defeat the purpose of the inspection (because evidence will be destroyed or concealed, for example), a search undertaken without a warrant may be reasonable. Note also that if a business gives a valid consent to an agency's request for an inspection and search, it has waived its right to object to the lack of a warrant.¹³

Adjudication

After an investigation reveals a suspected violation, an agency may begin to take administrative action against an individual or organization. Most administrative actions are resolved through negotiated settlements at their initial stages, without the need for formal adjudication (the process of resolving a dispute by presenting evidence and arguments before a neutral third party decision maker).

NEGOTIATED SETTLEMENTS Depending on the agency, negotiations may take the form of a simple conversation or a series of informal conferences. Whatever form the negotiations take, their purpose is to rectify the problem to the agency's satisfaction and eliminate the need for additional proceedings.

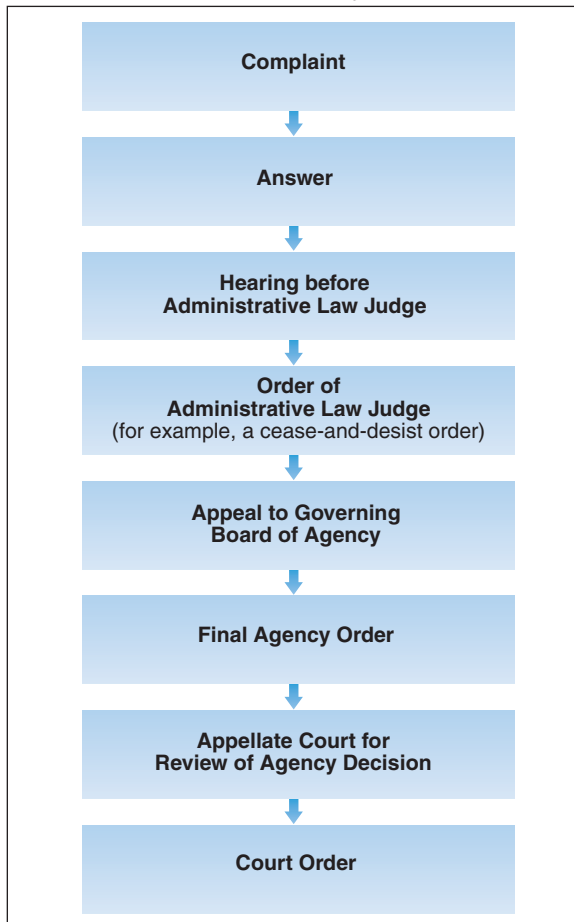

Settlement is an appealing option to firms for two reasons: to avoid appearing uncooperative and to avoid the expense involved in formal adjudication proceedings and in possible later appeals. Settlement is also an attractive option for agencies. To conserve their own resources and avoid formal actions, administrative agencies devote a great deal of effort to giving advice and negotiating solutions to problems.

FORMAL COMPLAINTS If a settlement cannot be reached, the agency may issue a formal complaint against the suspected violator. If the EPA, for example, finds that a factory is polluting groundwater in violation of federal pollution laws, the EPA will issue a complaint against the violator in an effort to bring the plant into compliance with federal regulations. This complaint is a public document, and a press release may accompany it. The factory charged in the complaint will respond by filing an answer to the EPA's allegations. If the factory and the EPA cannot agree on a settlement, the case will be adjudicated.

Agency adjudication may involve a trial-like arbitration procedure before an administrative law judge (ALJ). The Administrative Procedure Act (APA) requires that before the hearing takes place, the agency must issue a notice that includes the facts and law on which the complaint is based, the legal authority for the hearing, and its time and place. The administrative adjudication process is described next and illustrated graphically in Exhibit 44-3 on the facing page.

13. See, for example, Lakeland Enterprises of Rhineland, Inc. v. Chao, 402 F.3d 739 (7th Cir. 2005).

EXHIBIT 44-3 • The Process of Formal Administrative Adjudication

THE ROLE OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE LAW JUDGE An ALJ presides over the hearing and has the power to administer oaths, take testimony, rule on questions of evidence, and make determinations of fact. The law requires an ALJ to be an unbiased adjudicator (judge), even though the ALJ actually works for the agency prosecuting the case (in our example, the EPA). There are no juries in administrative hearings. The ALJ assumes the role of a judge and jury in a trial.

Certain safeguards prevent bias on the part of the ALJ and promote fairness in the proceedings. For example, the APA requires that the ALJ be separate from an agency's investigative and prosecutorial staff. The APA also prohibits ex parte (private) communications between the ALJ and any party to an agency proceeding, such as the EPA or the factory. Finally, provisions of the APA protect the ALJ from agency disciplinary actions unless the agency can show good cause for such an action.

HEARING PROCEDURES Hearing procedures vary widely from agency to agency. Administrative agencies generally exercise substantial discretion over the type of procedure that will be used. Frequently, disputes are resolved through informal adjudication proceedings. For example, the parties, their counsel, and the ALJ may simply meet at a table in a conference room to attempt to settle the dispute.

A formal adjudicatory hearing, in contrast, resembles a trial in many respects. Prior to the hearing, the parties are permitted to undertake discovery—involving depositions, interrogatories, and requests for documents or other information, as described in Chapter 3—although the discovery process is not quite as extensive as it would be in a court proceeding. The hearing itself must comply with the procedural requirements of the APA and must also meet the constitutional standards of due process. During the hearing, the parties may give testimony, present other evidence, and cross-examine adverse witnesses. A significant difference between a trial and an administrative agency hearing, though, is that normally much more information, including hearsay (secondhand information), can be introduced as evidence during an administrative hearing. The burden of proof in an enforcement proceeding is placed on the agency.

AGENCY ORDERS Following a hearing, the ALJ renders an initial order, or decision, on the case. Either party can appeal the ALJ's decision to the board or commission that governs the agency. If the factory in our example is dissatisfied with the ALJ's decision, it can appeal the decision to the EPA. If the factory is dissatisfied with the commission's decision, it can appeal the decision to a federal court of appeals. If no party appeals the case, the ALJ's decision becomes the final order of the agency. The ALJ's decision also becomes final if a party appeals and the commission and the court decline to review the case. If a party appeals and the case is reviewed, the final order comes from the commission's decision or (if that decision is appealed to a federal appellate court) that of the reviewing court.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY

As a result of growing public concern over the powers exercised by administrative agencies, Congress passed several laws to make agencies more accountable through public scrutiny. Here, we discuss the most significant of these laws.

Freedom of Information Act

Enacted in 1966, the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA)¹⁴ requires the federal government to disclose certain records to any person or entity on written request, even if no reason is given for the request. The FOIA exempts certain types of records, such as those pertaining to national security and those containing information that is confidential or personal. Under a 1996 amendment to the FOIA, all federal government agencies must make their records available electronically on the Internet and in other electronic formats. Any document an agency creates must be accessible by computer within a year after its creation. Agencies must also provide a clear index to all of their documents.

A request that complies with the FOIA procedures need only contain a reasonably specific description of the information sought. Many agencies now accept requests via e-mail, as well as by fax. The agency has twenty working days to answer a request and must notify the individual if the information sought is being withheld and which exemptions apply. The agency typically charges the person requesting the information a fee for research, copying, and other services.

An agency's failure to comply with a FOIA request can be challenged in a federal district court. The media, industry trade associations, public-interest groups, and even companies seeking information about competitors rely on these FOIA provisions to obtain information from government agencies.

At issue in the following case was whether certain documents requested by reporters fell under an exemption to the FOIA and thus should not be released.

CASE 44.3

United Technologies Corp. v. U.S. Department of Defense

United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, 601 F.3d 557 (2010).
www.cadc.uscourts.gov/internet/home.nsf^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • Sikorsky Aircraft Corporation makes helicopters, and Pratt and Whitney makes aircraft engines. Both companies are wholly owned by United Technologies Corporation. Both have various foreign and domestic military and civilian customers, and both sell their products to the U.S. Department of Defense (DoD). The Defense Contract Management Agency (DCMA), an agency within the DoD, monitors defense contractors, including Sikorsky and Pratt, to ensure that they satisfy their contractual obligations when providing services and supplies to the DoD. If the DCMA discovers a problem, it notifies the contractor and may issue a Corrective Action Request (CAR) or an audit report to the contractor to remedy the problem. In 2004, a reporter submitted a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request to the regional DCMA office for copies of all CARs that had been issued to Sikorsky during the previous year concerning Sikorsky's Black Hawk helicopter. Another reporter requested information, including a CAR and audit-related documents, concerning Pratt's airplane engine center at Middletown, Connecticut. Sikorsky and Pratt argued that the documents were exempt from FOIA disclosure. The DCMA disagreed and ruled that the documents could be disclosed. Sikorsky and Pratt filed separate suits against the DoD in a federal district court, arguing that the decision to release the documents was arbitrary, capricious, and contrary to law under the Administrative Procedure Act. They sought declaratory and injunctive relief preventing the documents' disclosure. The district court granted summary judgment to the DoD in both cases, and Sikorsky and Pratt appealed.

CASE 44.3 CONTINUED ♦ be exempt from disclosure, their release must be likely to cause the contractors “substantial competitive harm” or “impair the Government’s ability to obtain necessary information in the future.” [Emphasis added.]

To qualify [as a “substantial competitive harm”], an identified harm must “flow from the affirmative use of proprietary information by competitors.”

* * * *

* * * Sikorsky and Pratt maintain that the documents contain sensitive proprietary information about their quality control processes. Pratt’s Director of Quality Military Engines attested that “a competitor with similar expertise could and would use the information to gain insights into the strengths and weaknesses of [Pratt’s] quality control system as well as manufacturing techniques and use those insights to revise and improve its own quality control and manufacturing systems.” Similarly, Sikorsky asserted that “proprietary information regarding Sikorsky’s manufacturing process and procedures” is “inextricably intertwined with the quality control information” included in the CARs and it asserted that “release of this proprietary information would substantially harm Sikorsky’s competitive position because its competitors would use this information to their advantage * * *.” In response, [the] DCMA simply stated that it had redacted [removed or obscured] all of the sensitive proprietary information and concluded that disclosure of the remaining information was not likely to cause the contractors substantial competitive harm.

We find [the] DCMA’s response insufficient. The documents, even as redacted by [the] DCMA, appear to reveal details about Sikorsky’s and Pratt’s proprietary manufacturing and quality control processes. * * * The documents describe, in part, how the contractors build and inspect helicopters and/or engines. Once disclosed, competitors could, it appears, use the information to improve their own manufacturing and quality control systems, thus making “affirmative use of proprietary information” against which Exemption 4 is meant to guard.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The federal appellate court concluded that the DCMA had failed to provide a reasoned basis for its conclusion. The court remanded the case to the DCMA to examine the relevant data and give a satisfactory explanation for its decision, if it could, “including a rational connection between the facts found and the choice made.”

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Sikorsky and Pratt also argued that if the documents were released, their competitors would use the documents to discredit them in the eyes of current and potential customers. Would such actions amount to a “substantial competitive harm”? Explain.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS • Businesses that contract with government agencies to provide goods or services can expect to have their processes and procedures monitored by these agencies. This means that proprietary information, including trade secrets, may find its way into various government reports or other documents. To protect this information from competitors, managers in such businesses would be wise to seek counsel as to what types of documents are exempt from disclosure under the FOIA.

Government in the Sunshine Act

Congress passed the Government in the Sunshine Act,¹⁵ or open meeting law, in 1976. It requires that “every portion of every meeting of an agency” be open to “public observation.” The act also requires the establishment of procedures to ensure that the public is provided with adequate advance notice of scheduled meetings and agendas. Like the FOIA, the Sunshine Act contains certain exceptions. Closed meetings are permitted when (1) the subject of the meeting concerns accusing any person of a crime,

(2) an open meeting would frustrate the implementation of agency actions, or (3) the subject of the meeting involves matters relating to future litigation or rulemaking. Courts interpret these exceptions to allow open access whenever possible.

Regulatory Flexibility Act

Concern over the effects of regulation on the efficiency of businesses, particularly smaller ones, led Congress to pass the Regulatory Flexibility Act¹⁶ in

15. 5 U.S.C. Section 552b.

16. 5 U.S.C. Sections 601–612.

1980. Under this act, whenever a new regulation will have a “significant impact upon a substantial number of small entities,” the agency must conduct a regulatory flexibility analysis. The analysis must measure the cost that the rule would impose on small businesses and must consider less burdensome alternatives. The act also contains provisions to alert small businesses—through advertising in trade journals, for example—about forthcoming regulations. The act reduces some record-keeping burdens for small businesses, especially with regard to hazardous waste management.

Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act

The Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act (SBREFA) of 1996¹⁷ allows Congress to review

new federal regulations for at least sixty days before they take effect. This period gives opponents of the rules time to present their arguments to Congress.

The SBREFA also authorizes the courts to enforce the Regulatory Flexibility Act. This helps to ensure that federal agencies, such as the Internal Revenue Service, will consider ways to reduce the economic impact of new regulations on small businesses. Federal agencies are required to prepare guides that explain in plain English how small businesses can comply with federal regulations.

The SBREFA also set up the National Enforcement Ombudsman at the Small Business Administration to receive comments from small businesses about their dealings with federal agencies. Based on these comments, Regional Small Business Fairness Boards rate the agencies and publicize their findings.

REVIEWING

Administrative Law

Assume that the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) has a rule that it will enforce statutory provisions prohibiting insider trading only when the insiders make monetary profits for themselves. Then the SEC makes a new rule, declaring that it will now bring enforcement actions against individuals for insider trading even if the individuals did not personally profit from the transactions. In making the new rule, the SEC does not conduct a rulemaking procedure but simply announces its decision. A stockbrokerage firm objects and says that the new rule was unlawfully developed without opportunity for public comment. The brokerage firm challenges the rule in an action that ultimately is reviewed by a federal appellate court. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Is the SEC an executive agency or an independent regulatory agency? Does it matter to the outcome of this dispute? Explain.
2. Suppose that the SEC asserts that it has always had the statutory authority to pursue persons for insider trading regardless of whether they personally profited from the transactions. This is the only argument the SEC makes to justify changing its enforcement rules. Would a court be likely to find that the SEC's action was arbitrary and capricious under the Administrative Procedure Act (APA)? Why or why not?
3. Would a court be likely to give Chevron deference to the SEC's interpretation of the law on insider trading? Why or why not?
4. Now assume that a court finds that the new rule is merely “interpretive.” What effect would this determination have on whether the SEC had to follow the APA's rulemaking procedures?

 DEBATE THIS: Because an administrative law judge (ALJ) acts as both judge and jury, there should always be at least three ALJs in each administrative hearing.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

44-1. Rulemaking and Adjudication Powers

For decades, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) resolved fair trade and advertising disputes through individual adjudications. In the 1960s, the FTC began promulgating rules that defined fair and unfair trade practices. In cases involving violations of these rules, the due process rights of participants were more limited and did not include cross-examination. Although anyone charged with violating a rule would receive a full adjudication, the legitimacy of the rule itself could not be challenged in the adjudication. Furthermore, a party charged with violating a rule was almost certain to lose the adjudication. Affected parties complained to a court, arguing that their rights before the FTC were unduly limited by the new rules. What would the court examine to determine whether to uphold the new rules?

44-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Informal Rulemaking.

Assume that the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), using proper procedures, adopts a rule describing its future investigations. This new rule covers all future circumstances in which the FDA wants to regulate food additives. Under the new rule, the FDA is not to regulate food additives without giving food companies an opportunity to cross-examine witnesses. Later, the FDA wants to regulate methylnisocyanate, a food additive. The FDA undertakes an informal rulemaking procedure, without cross-examination, and regulates methylnisocyanate. Producers protest, saying that the FDA promised them the opportunity for cross-examination. The FDA responds that the Administrative Procedure Act does not require such cross-examination and that it is free to withdraw the promise made in its new rule. If the producers challenge the FDA in court, on what basis would the court rule in their favor?

- For a sample answer to Question 44-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

44-3. Arbitrary and Capricious Test Lion Raisins, Inc., is a family-owned, family-operated business that grows raisins and markets them to private enterprises. In the 1990s,

Lion also successfully bid on more than fifteen contracts awarded by the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA). In May 1999, a USDA investigation reported that Lion appeared to have falsified inspectors' signatures, listed false moisture content, and changed the grade of raisins on three USDA raisin certificates issued between 1996 and 1998. Lion was subsequently awarded five more USDA contracts. Then, in November 2000, the company was the low bidder on two new USDA contracts for school lunch programs. In January 2001, however, the USDA awarded these contracts to other bidders and, on the basis of the May 1999 report, suspended Lion from participating in government contracts for one year. Lion filed a suit in the U.S. Court of Federal Claims against the USDA, seeking, in part, lost profits on the school lunch contracts on the ground that the USDA's suspension was arbitrary and capricious. What reasoning might the court employ to grant a summary judgment in Lion's favor? [Lion Raisins, Inc. v. United States, 51 Fed.Cl. 238 (2001)]

44-4. Investigation Maureen Droge began working for United Air Lines, Inc. (UAL), as a flight attendant in 1990. In 1995, she was assigned to Paris, France, where she became pregnant. Because UAL does not allow its flight attendants to fly during their third trimester of pregnancy, Droge was placed on involuntary leave. She applied for temporary disability benefits through the French social security system, but her request was denied because UAL does not contribute to the French system on behalf of its U.S.-based flight attendants. Droge filed a charge of discrimination with the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), alleging that UAL had discriminated against her and other Americans. The EEOC issued a subpoena, asking UAL to detail all benefits received by all UAL employees living outside the United States. UAL refused to provide the information, in part, on the grounds that it was irrelevant and compliance would be unduly burdensome. The EEOC filed a suit in a federal district court against UAL. Should the court enforce the subpoena? Why or why not? [Equal Employment Opportunity Commission v. United Air Lines, Inc., 287 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2002)]

44-5. Judicial Controls Under federal law, when accepting bids on a contract, an agency must hold “discussions” with all offerors. An agency may ask a single offeror for “clarification” of its proposal, however, without holding “discussions” with the others. Regulations define clarifications as “limited exchanges.” In March 2001, the U.S. Air Force asked for bids on a contract. The winning contractor would examine, assess, and develop means of integrating national intelligence assets with the U.S. Department of Defense space systems, to enhance the capabilities of the Air Force’s Space Warfare Center. Among the bidders were Information Technology and Applications Corp. (ITAC) and RS Information Systems, Inc. (RSIS). The Air Force asked the parties for more information on their subcontractors but did not allow them to change their proposals. Determining that there were weaknesses in ITAC’s bid, the Air Force awarded the contract to RSIS. ITAC filed a suit in the U.S. Court of Federal Claims against the government, contending that the postproposal requests to RSIS, and its responses, were improper “discussions.” Should the court rule in ITAC’s favor? Why or why not? [Information Technology & Applications Corp. v. United States, 316 F.3d 1312 (Fed. Cir. 2003)].

44-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Investigation.

Riverdale Mills Corp. makes plastic-coated steel wire products in Northbridge, Massachusetts. Riverdale uses a water-based cleaning process that generates acidic and alkaline wastewater. To meet federal clean-water requirements, Riverdale has a system within its plant to treat the water. It then flows through a pipe that opens into a manhole-covered test pit outside the plant in full view of Riverdale’s employees. Three hundred feet away, the pipe merges into the public sewer system. In October 1997, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) sent Justin Pimpare and Daniel Granz to inspect the plant. Without a search warrant and without Riverdale’s express consent, the agents took samples from the test pit. Based on the samples, Riverdale and James Knott, the company’s owner, were charged with criminal violations of the federal Clean Water Act. The defendants filed a suit in a federal district court against the EPA agents and others, alleging violations of the Fourth Amendment. What right does the Fourth Amendment provide in this context? This right is based on a “reasonable expectation of privacy.” Should the agents be held liable? Why or why not? [Riverdale Mills Corp. v. Pimpare, 392 F.3d 55 (1st Cir. 2004)]

44-7. Rulemaking The Investment Company Act of 1940 prohibits a mutual fund from engaging in certain transactions in which there may be a conflict of interest between the manager of the fund and its shareholders. Under rules issued by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), however, a fund that meets certain conditions may engage in an otherwise prohibited transaction. In June 2004, the SEC added two new conditions. A year later, the SEC reconsidered the new conditions in terms of the costs that they would impose on the funds. Within eight days, and without asking for public input, the SEC readopted the conditions. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States—which is both a mutual fund shareholder and an association with mutual fund managers among its members—asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review the new rules. The Chamber charged, in part, that in readopting the rules, the SEC relied on materials not in the “rulemaking record” without providing an opportunity for public comment. The SEC countered that the information was otherwise “publicly available.” In adopting a rule, should an agency consider information that is not part of the rulemaking record? Why or why not? [Chamber of Commerce of the United States v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 443 F.3d 890 (D.C.Cir. 2006)]

44-8. Agency Powers A well-documented rise in global temperatures has coincided with a significant increase in the concentration of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere. Some scientists believe that the two trends are related, because when carbon dioxide is released into the atmosphere, it produces a greenhouse effect, trapping solar heat. Under the Clean Air Act (CAA) of 1963, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) is authorized to regulate “any” air pollutants “emitted into . . . the ambient air” that in its “judgment cause, or contribute to, air pollution.” Calling global warming “the most pressing environmental challenge of our time,” a group of private organizations asked the EPA to regulate carbon dioxide and other “greenhouse gas” emissions from new motor vehicles. The EPA refused, stating, among other things, that Congress last amended the CAA in 1990 without authorizing new, binding auto emissions limits. The petitioners—nineteen states, including Massachusetts, and others—asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to review the EPA’s denial. Did the EPA have the authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new motor vehicles? If so, was its stated reason for refusing to do so consistent with that authority? Discuss. [Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency, 549 U.S. 497, 127 S.Ct. 1438, 167 L.Ed.2d 248 (2007)]

44-9. Judicial Deference Dave Conley, a longtime heavy smoker, was diagnosed with lung cancer. He died two years later. His death certificate stated that the cause of death was cancer, but it also noted other significant conditions that had contributed to his death were a history of cigarette smoking and coal mining. Conley’s wife filed for benefits under the Black Lung Benefits Act, which provides for victims of black lung disease caused by coal mining. To qualify for benefits under the act, the exposure to coal dust must be a substantially contributing factor leading to the person’s death, which, under the statute, means “hastens death.” The U.S. Department of Labor collected Conley’s work and medical records. An administrative law judge (ALJ) reviewed the record and took testimony from several physicians about the cause of Conley's death. Only one physician testified that the coal dust was a substantial factor leading to Conley's lung cancer, but he offered no evidence other than his testimony to support his conclusion. The ALJ nevertheless ruled that coal mining had hastened Conley's death and awarded benefits to Mrs. Conley. Conley's employer appealed to the Benefits Review Board (BRB) for black lung claims. The BRB reversed the ALJ, finding that there was insufficient evidence to hold that coal dust was a substantial factor that triggered Conley's lung cancer. Mrs. Conley appealed to a federal appellate court. Should the federal court defer to the ALJ's decision on the cause of Conley's death? Why or why not? Which decision does the federal appellate court review, the ALJ's conclusions or the BRB's reversal? [Conley v. National Mines Corp., 595 F.3d 297 (6th Cir. 2010)]

44-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Rulemaking.

To ensure highway safety and protect driver health, Congress charged federal agencies with regulating the hours of service of commercial motor vehicle operators. Between 1940 and 2003, the regulations that applied to long-haul truck drivers were mostly unchanged. (Long-haul drivers are those who operate beyond a 150-mile radius of their base.) In 2003, the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration (FMSCA) revised the regulations significantly, increasing the number of daily and weekly hours that drivers could work. The agency had not considered the impact of the changes on the health of the drivers, however, and the revisions were overturned. The FMSCA then issued a notice that it would reconsider the revisions and opened them up for public comment. The agency analyzed the costs to the industry and the crash risks due to driver fatigue under different options and concluded that the safety benefits of not increasing the hours were less than the economic costs. In 2005, the agency issued a rule that was nearly identical to the 2003 version. Public Citizen, Inc., and others, including the Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to review the 2005 rule as it applied to long-haul drivers. [Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, Inc. v. Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration, 494 F.3d 188 (D.C.Cir. 2007)]

- (a) The agency's cost-benefit analysis included new methods that were not disclosed to the public in time for comments. Was this unethical? Should the agency have disclosed the new methodology sooner? Why or why not?
- (b) The agency created a graph to show the risk of a crash as a function of the time a driver spent on the job. The graph plotted the first twelve hours of a day individually, but the rest of the time was depicted with an aggregate figure at the seventeenth hour. This made the risk at those hours appear to be lower. Is it unethical for an agency to manipulate data? Explain.

Consumer Law

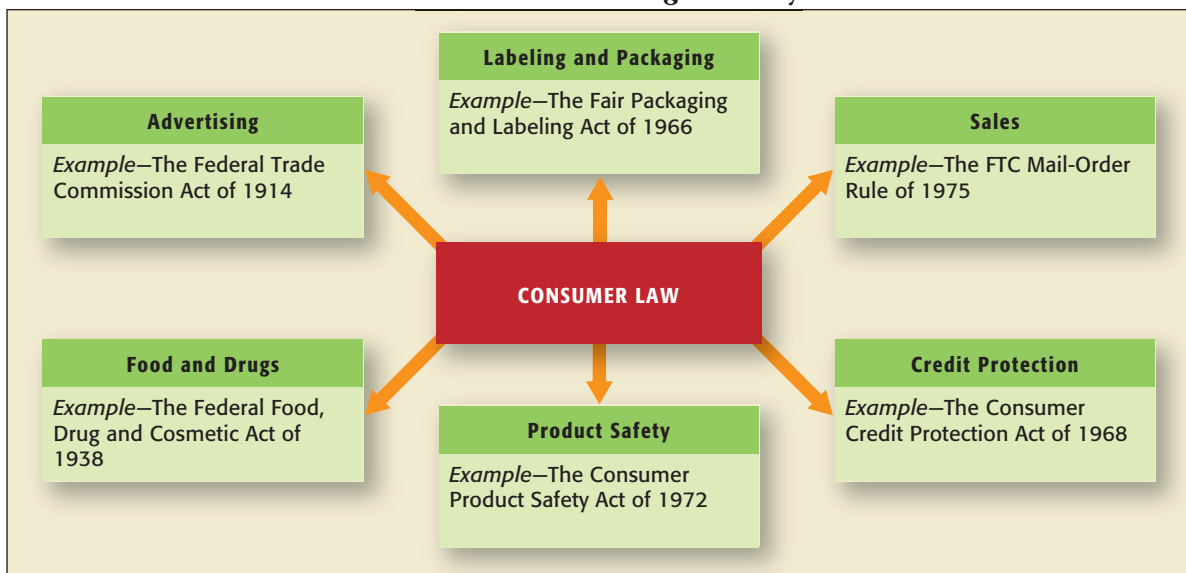

All statutes, agency rules, and common law judicial decisions that serve to protect the interests of consumers are classified as consumer law. Traditionally, in disputes involving consumers, it was assumed that the freedom to contract carried with it the obligation to live by the deal made. Over time, this attitude has changed considerably. Today, myriad federal and state laws protect consumers from unfair trade practices, unsafe products, discriminatory or unreasonable credit requirements, and other problems related to consumer transactions. Nearly every agency and department of the federal government has an office of consumer affairs, and most states have one or more such offices to help consumers. Also, typically the attorney general's office assists consumers at the state level.

In this chapter, we examine some of the major laws and regulations protecting consumers. Because of the wide variation among state consumer protection laws, our primary focus in this chapter is on federal legislation. Realize, though, that state laws often provide more sweeping and significant protections for the consumer than do federal laws. Exhibit 45-1 below indicates many of the areas of consumer law that are regulated by federal statutes.

EXHIBIT 45-1 • Selected Areas of Consumer Law Regulated by Statutes

SECTION 1 DECEPTIVE ADVERTISING

One of the earliest federal consumer protection laws—and still one of the most important—was the Federal Trade Commission Act of 1914 (mentioned in Chapter 44).¹ The act created the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) to carry out the broadly stated goal of preventing unfair and deceptive trade practices, including deceptive advertising.²

Generally, deceptive advertising occurs if a reasonable consumer would be misled by the advertising claim. Vague generalities and obvious exaggerations are permissible. These claims are known as puffery. When a claim takes on the appearance of literal authenticity, however, it may create problems. Advertising that appears to be based on factual evidence but in fact is not reasonably supported by some evidence will be deemed deceptive.

Some advertisements contain “half-truths,” meaning that the presented information is true but incomplete and therefore leads consumers to a false conclusion. For example, the maker of Campbell’s soups advertised that “most” Campbell’s soups are low in fat and cholesterol and thus helpful in fighting heart disease. What the ad did not say was that many Campbell’s soups are high in sodium, and high-sodium diets may increase the risk of heart disease. Hence, the FTC ruled that Campbell’s claims were deceptive. Advertising that contains an endorsement by a celebrity may be deemed deceptive if the celebrity does not actually use the product.

Even before the FTC brought the following case, Wired magazine had already put the product in question on its list of the top ten “snake oil gadgets.”

CASE 45.1

Federal Trade Commission v. QT, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 512 F.3d 858 (2008).
www.ca7.uscourts.gov^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • QT, Inc., heavily promoted the Q-Ray Ionized Bracelet on television infomercials and on its Web site. In its promotions, the company claimed that the bracelet offered immediate and significant or complete pain relief and could cure chronic pain. At trial, the U.S. district court labeled all such claims fraudulent; forbade further promotional claims; and ordered the company to pay $16 million, plus interest, into a fund to be distributed to customers. QT appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

EASTERBROOK, Chief Judge.

* * * According to the district court’s findings, almost everything that defendants have said about the bracelet is false. Here are some highlights:

- Defendants promoted the bracelet as a miraculous cure for chronic pain, but it has no therapeutic effect.
- Defendants told consumers that claims of “immediate, significant or complete pain relief” had been “test-proven”; they hadn’t.
* * * *
- Defendants represented that the therapeutic effect wears off in a year or two, despite knowing that the bracelet’s properties do not change. This assertion is designed to lead customers to buy new bracelets. Likewise the false statement that the bracelet has a “memory cycle specific to each individual wearer” so that only the bracelet’s original wearer can experience pain relief is designed to increase sales by eliminating the second-hand market and “explaining” the otherwise-embarrassing fact that the buyer’s friends and neighbors can’t perceive any effect.

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 45.1 CONTINUED ♦ The magistrate judge [the judge presiding over the trial] did not commit a clear error, or abuse his discretion, in concluding that the defendants set out to bilk unsophisticated persons who found themselves in pain from arthritis and other chronic conditions.

* * * The Federal Trade Commission Act forbids false and misleading statements, and a statement that is plausible but has not been tested in the most reliable way cannot be condemned out of hand. [Emphasis added.]

* * * For the Q-Ray Ionized Bracelet, * * * all statements about how the product works—Q-Rays, ionization, enhancing the flow of bio-energy, and the like—are blather [nonsense]. Defendants might as well have said: “Beneficent creatures from the 17th Dimension use this bracelet as a beacon to locate people who need pain relief, and whisk them off to their home-world every night to provide help in ways unknown to our science.”

* * * Proof is what separates an effect new to science from a swindle. Defendants themselves told customers that the bracelet’s efficacy had been “test-proven”; * * * but defendants have no proof of the Q-Ray Ionized Bracelet’s efficacy. The “tests” on which they relied were bunk. * * * What remain are testimonials, which are not a form of proof * * *. That’s why the “testimonial” of someone who keeps elephants off the streets of a large city by snapping his fingers is the basis of a joke rather than proof of cause and effect. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Physicians know how to treat pain. Why pay $200 for a Q-Ray Ionized Bracelet when you can get relief from an aspirin tablet that costs [one cent]?

DECISION AND REMEDY • The federal appellate court affirmed the district court’s decision. QT, Inc., was required to stop its deceptive advertising and to pay the $16 million, plus interest, so that its customers could be reimbursed.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Assume that the defendant had actually conducted scientific studies, but they were inconclusive. How might the judge have ruled in that situation?

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Most people have seen infomercials. Does the fact that QT used infomercials to make fraudulent promotional claims mean that all products “pitched” on television are suspect? Why or why not?

Bait-and-Switch Advertising

The FTC has issued rules that govern specific advertising techniques. One of the most important rules is contained in the FTC’s “Guides Against Bait Advertising,”³ issued in 1968. The rule seeks to prevent bait-and-switch advertising—that is, advertising a very low price for a particular item that will likely be unavailable to the consumer, who will then be encouraged to purchase a more expensive item. The low price is the “bait” to lure the consumer into the store. The salesperson is instructed to “switch” the consumer to a different, more expensive item. Under the FTC guidelines, bait-and-switch advertising occurs if the seller refuses to show the advertised item, fails to have a reasonable quantity of the item in stock, fails to promise to deliver the advertised item within a reasonable time, or discourages employees from selling the item.

3. 16 C.F.R. Part 238.

Online Deceptive Advertising

Deceptive advertising can occur in the online environment as well. The FTC actively monitors online advertising and has identified hundreds of Web sites that have made false or deceptive claims for products ranging from medical treatments for various diseases to exercise equipment and weight-loss aids.

The FTC has issued guidelines to help online businesses comply with existing laws prohibiting deceptive advertising.⁴ These guidelines include three basic requirements:

1. All ads—both online and offline—must be truthful and not misleading.
2. The claims made in an ad must be substantiated; that is, advertisers must have evidence to back up their claims.
3. Ads cannot be unfair, which the FTC defines as “likely to cause substantial consumer injury that

4. “Advertising and Marketing on the Internet: Rules of the Road.” www.ftc.com. September 2000: n.p. Web.

consumers could not reasonably avoid and that is not outweighed by the benefit to consumers or competition.”

The guidelines also call for “clear and conspicuous” disclosure of any qualifying or limiting information. The overall impression of the ad is important in meeting this requirement. The FTC suggests that advertisers should assume that consumers will not read an entire Web page. Therefore, to satisfy the “clear and conspicuous” requirement, the disclosure should be placed as close as possible to the claim being qualified or be included within the claim itself. If such placement is not feasible, the next-best location is on a section of the page to which a consumer can easily scroll. Generally, hyperlinks to a disclosure are recommended only for lengthy disclosures or for disclosures that must be repeated in several locations on the Web page.

FTC Actions against Deceptive Advertising

The FTC receives complaints from many sources, including competitors of alleged violators, consumers, consumer organizations, trade associations, Better Business Bureaus, government organizations, and state and local officials. When the agency receives numerous and widespread complaints about a particular problem, it will investigate.

THE COMPLAINT ORDER If the FTC concludes that a given advertisement is unfair or deceptive, it drafts a formal complaint, which is sent to the alleged offender. The company may agree to settle the complaint without further proceedings. If not, the FTC can conduct a hearing in which the company can present its defense (see Chapter 44).

THE CEASE-AND-DESIST ORDER If the FTC succeeds in proving that an advertisement is unfair or deceptive, it usually issues a cease-and-desist order requiring the company to stop the challenged advertising. In some circumstances, it may also impose a sanction known as counteradvertising, which requires the company to advertise anew—in print, on the Internet, on radio, and on television—to inform the public about the earlier misinformation. The FTC sometimes institutes a multiple product order, which requires a firm to cease and desist from false advertising in regard to all of its products, not just the product that was the subject of the original action. When a company’s deceptive ad leads to wrongful payments by consumers, the FTC may seek other remedies, including restitution.

CASE IN POINT Verity International, Ltd., billed phone-line subscribers who accessed certain online pornography sites at the rate for international calls to Madagascar. When consumers complained about the charges, Verity told them that the charges were valid and had to be paid, or the consumers would face further collection activity. A federal appellate court held that this representation of “uncontestability” was deceptive and a violation of the FTC Act. The court ordered Verity to pay nearly $18 million in restitution to consumers.⁵

Telemarketing and Fax Advertising

The Telephone Consumer Protection Act (TCPA)⁶ prohibits telephone solicitation using an automatic telephone dialing system or a prerecorded voice. In addition, most states have statutes regulating telephone solicitation. The TCPA also makes it illegal to transmit ads via fax without first obtaining the recipient’s permission. (Similar issues have arisen with respect to junk e-mail, called spam—see Chapters 6 and 9.)

The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) enforces the act. The FCC imposes substantial fines ($11,000 each day) on companies that violate the junk fax provisions of the act and has even fined one company as much as $5.4 million.⁷ The TCPA also gives consumers a right to sue for either $500 for each violation of the act or for the actual monetary losses resulting from a violation, whichever is greater. If a court finds that a defendant willfully or knowingly violated the act, the court has the discretion to treble (triple) the amount of damages awarded.

The Telemarketing and Consumer Fraud and Abuse Prevention Act of 1994⁸ directed the FTC to establish rules governing telemarketing and to bring actions against fraudulent telemarketers. The FTC’s Telemarketing Sales Rule (TSR)⁹ requires a telemarketer to identify the seller’s name, describe the product being sold, and disclose all material facts related to the sale (such as the total cost of the goods being sold). The TSR makes it illegal for telemarketers to misrepresent information or facts about their goods or services. A telemarketer must also remove a consumer's name from its list of potential contacts if the customer so requests. An amendment to the TSR established the national Do Not Call Registry. Telemarketers must refrain from calling those consumers who have placed their names on the list. Significantly, the TSR applies to any offer made to consumers in the United States—even if the offer comes from a foreign firm. Thus, the TSR helps to protect consumers from illegal cross-border telemarketing operations.

LABELING AND PACKAGING LAWS

A number of federal and state laws deal specifically with the information given on labels and packages. In general, labels must be accurate, and they must use words that are easily understood by the ordinary consumer. For example, a box of cereal cannot be labeled “giant” if that would exaggerate the amount of cereal contained in the box.

In some instances, labels must specify the raw materials used in the product, such as the percentage of cotton, nylon, or other fiber used in a garment. In other instances, the product must carry a warning. Cigarette packages and advertising, for example, must include one of several warnings about the health hazards associated with smoking.¹⁰

Federal Statutes

Numerous federal laws regulate the labeling and packaging of products. These include the Wool Products Labeling Act of 1939,¹¹ the Fur Products Labeling Act of 1951,¹² the Flammable Fabrics Act of 1953,¹³ and the Fair Packaging and Labeling Act of 1966.¹⁴ The Comprehensive Smokeless Tobacco Health Education Act of 1986¹⁵ requires producers, packagers, and importers of smokeless tobacco to include one of several warnings about the use of smokeless tobacco on the labels of their products.

The Energy Policy and Conservation Act of 1975¹⁶ requires automakers to attach an information label to every new car. This label must include the Environmental Protection Agency's fuel economy estimate for the vehicle. In the following case, the buyer of a new car complained that the vehicle had failed to achieve the fuel economy estimate advertised in the automaker's brochure and listed on the label.

Paduano v. American Honda Motor Co.

California Court of Appeal, Fourth District, 169 Cal.App.4th 1453, 88 Cal.Rptr.3d 90 (2009).

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • In 2004, Gaetano Paduano bought a new Honda Civic Hybrid in California. The information label on the car stated that the fuel economy estimates from the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) were forty-seven miles per gallon (mpg) and forty-eight mpg for city and highway driving, respectively. Honda's sales brochure added, “Just drive the Hybrid like you would a conventional car and save on fuel bills.” Paduano soon became frustrated with the car's fuel economy, which was less than half of the EPA's estimate. When American Honda Motor Company refused to repurchase the vehicle, Paduano filed a suit in a California state court against the automaker, alleging deceptive advertising in violation of the state's Consumer Legal Remedies Act and Unfair Competition Law. Honda argued that the federal Energy Policy and Conservation Act (EPCA), which prescribed the EPA's fuel economy estimate, preempted Paduano's claims (preemption was discussed in Chapter 4). The court issued a summary judgment in Honda's favor. Paduano appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

AARON, J. [Judge]

* * * *

The basic rules of preemption are not in dispute: Under the supremacy clause of the United States Constitution, Congress has the power to preempt state law concerning matters that lie within the authority of Congress. In determining whether federal law preempts state

CASE 45.2 CONTINUED ♦ law, a court's task is to discern congressional intent. Congress's express intent in this regard will be found when Congress explicitly states that it is preempting state authority. [Emphasis added.]

* * *

Honda * * * argues that [the EPCA] prevents Paduano from pursuing his * * * claims. That provision states in pertinent part,

When a requirement under [the EPCA] is in effect, a State or a political subdivision of a State may adopt or enforce a law or regulation on disclosure of fuel economy or fuel operating costs for an automobile covered by [the EPCA] only if the law or regulation is identical to that requirement.

* * * Honda goes on to assert that "Paduano's deceptive advertising and misrepresentation claims would impose non identical disclosure requirements."

Contrary to Honda's characterization * * *, Paduano's claims are based on statements Honda made in its advertising brochure to the effect that one may drive a Civic Hybrid in the same manner as one would a conventional car, and need not do anything "special," in order to achieve the beneficial fuel economy of the EPA estimates. * * * Paduano is challenging * * * Honda's * * * commentary in which it alludes to those estimates in a manner that may give consumers the misimpression that they will be able to achieve mileage close to the EPA estimates while driving a Honda hybrid in the same manner as they would a conventional vehicle. Paduano does not seek to require Honda to provide "additional alleged facts" regarding the Civic Hybrid's fuel economy, as Honda suggests, but rather, seeks to prevent Honda from making misleading claims about how easy it is to achieve better fuel economy. Contrary to Honda's assertions, if Paduano were to prevail on his claims, Honda would not have to do anything differently with regard to its disclosure of the EPA mileage estimates.

* * *

* * * Allowing states to regulate false advertising and unfair business practices may further the goals of the EPCA, and we reject Honda's claim.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The state intermediate appellate court concluded that federal law did not preempt Paduano's claims concerning Honda's advertising. The court reversed the judgment and remanded the case.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • Suppose that the defendant automaker had opposed this action solely to avoid paying for a car that had proved to be a "lemon." Would this have been unethical? Explain.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • What does the interpretation of the law in this case suggest to businesspersons who sell products labeled with statements mandated by federal or state law?

Food Labeling

Because the quality and safety of food are so important to consumers, several statutes deal specifically with food labeling. The Fair Packaging and Labeling Act requires that food product labels identify (1) the product; (2) the net quantity of the contents and, if the number of servings is stated, the size of a serving; (3) the manufacturer; and (4) the packager or distributor. The act includes additional requirements concerning descriptions on packages, savings claims, components of nonfood products, and standards for the partial filling of packages.

Food products must bear labels detailing the nutritional content, including the number of calories and the amounts of various nutrients that the food contains. The Nutrition Labeling and Education Act of 1990¹⁷ requires food labels to provide standard nutrition facts (including the amount and type of fat that the food contains) and regulates the use of such terms as fresh and low fat. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) and the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) are the primary agencies that issue regulations on food labeling. These rules are published in the Federal Register and updated annually.

New rules that became effective in 2009 require the labels on fresh meats, vegetables, and fruits to indicate where the food originated so that consumers can know whether their food was imported. See

17. 21 U.S.C. Section 343.1.

SHIFTING LEGAL PRIORITIES FOR BUSINESS

New Health-Care Law Requires Caloric Information

Tucked into the 2,700-page health-care reform bill that President Obama signed into law in March 2010 was a provision aimed at combating the problem of obesity in the United States. The provision requires all restaurant chains with twenty or more locations to post the caloric content of the foods on their menus so that customers will know how many calories they are eating.^a The hope is that customers, armed with this information, will consider the number of calories when they make their food choices. The new federal law will supersede all state and local laws already in existence.

What the Law Does and Does Not Cover

The law now directs the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) to create a new national standard for menu labeling and to establish specific regulations supporting that standard—a task that will take at least a year. Nevertheless, the outlines of the new requirement are clear. Any restaurant to which the law applies will have to post the caloric content of the foods listed on its standard menu, menu boards, or menu lists for drive-thru windows. Signs will also have to be posted near salad bars and buffets, providing information on the foods offered there. Exempt from the rules are condiments, daily specials, and foods offered for only a limited period (less than sixty days). In addition, restaurants will be required to post standard guidelines on the number of calories that an average person requires daily so that customers can determine what portion of a day's calories a particular food choice will provide.

a. See Section 4205 of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, H.R. 3590, passed by Congress on March 21, 2010 (also see the Health Care and Education Reconciliation Act of 2010, H.R. 4872).

The law applies to foods offered through vending machines. The foods most affected will be those that do not list the number of calories on the front of the package.

The Law Will Spur Innovations

Restaurant chains affected by the new law will likely be forced to innovate as customers discover how many calories some of their favorite foods contain. Some customers, for example, may be surprised to learn that a Big Mac hamburger from McDonald's provides 540 calories—more than a quarter of the 2,000 calories needed by an average adult each day. The restaurant chains will have to create lower-calorie foods that taste as good as their high-calorie popular items. Some chains are already doing just that. Dunkin' Donuts has launched a lower-calorie DDSmart option. KFC now offers grilled chicken, and Starbucks has switched to lower-fat milk for espresso-based drinks.

MANAGERIAL IMPLICATIONS

Although the new requirements currently apply only to restaurant chains with twenty or more locations, managers in other restaurant situations can anticipate that calorie-posting requirements will eventually affect them. The FDA may even decide to impose criminal penalties on those who violate the calorie-posting requirements. Therefore, managers throughout the food-services industry should start thinking now about how they are going to comply with any calorie-posting requirements in the future. It is always less costly to introduce change gradually than all at once.

this chapter's Shifting Legal Priorities for Business feature above for a discussion of a new requirement imposed on restaurant chains by the health-care legislation enacted in 2010.

SALES

A number of statutes protect consumers by requiring the disclosure of certain terms in sales transactions and providing rules governing unsolicited merchandise and various forms of sales, such as door-to-door sales, mail-order sales, and referral sales. The FTC has regulatory authority in this area, as do other federal agencies. The Federal Reserve Board of Governors, for example, has issued Regulation Z,¹⁸ which governs credit provisions associated with sales contracts, as will be discussed later in this chapter. Many states and the FTC have “cooling-off” laws that permit the buyers of goods sold door to door to cancel their contracts within three business days. The FTC rule further requires that consumers be notified in Spanish of this right if the oral negotiations for the sale were in that language.

18. 12 C.F.R. Sections 226.1–226.30.

Telephone and Mail-Order Sales

The FTC Mail or Telephone Order Merchandise Rule of 1993 amended the FTC Mail-Order Rule of 1975.¹⁹ The rule provides specific protections for consumers who purchase goods over the phone, through the mail, online via computer, or by fax machine. Among other things, the rule requires merchants to ship orders within the time promised in their catalogues or advertisements and to notify consumers when orders cannot be shipped on time. The rule also requires merchants to issue a refund within a specified period of time when a consumer cancels an order.

In addition, under the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970,²⁰ a consumer who receives unsolicited merchandise sent by U.S. mail can keep it, throw it away, or dispose of it in any manner that she or he sees fit. The recipient will not be obligated to the sender.

Online Sales

The FTC and other federal agencies have brought numerous enforcement actions against those who perpetrate online fraud (see the discussion of wire fraud in Chapter 9). Nonetheless, protecting consumers from fraudulent and deceptive sales practices conducted via the Internet has proved to be a challenging task. The number of consumers who have fallen prey to Internet fraud has actually grown in recent years. Faced with economic recession, job losses, mounting debt, and dwindling savings, many consumers are looking for any source of income. Complaints to the FTC about sales of fraudulent business opportunities, such as work-at-home offers and real estate systems, nearly doubled from 2008 to 2009, and nearly tripled in the first six months of 2010.

SECTION 4 CREDIT PROTECTION

Credit protection is one of the more important aspects of consumer protection legislation. Nearly 80 percent of U.S. consumers have credit cards, and most carry a balance on these cards, which amounts to about $2.5 trillion of debt nationwide. In 2010, Congress established a new agency, the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, which is dedicated to overseeing the practices of banks, mortgage lenders, and credit-card companies.²¹ We discuss significant consumer credit protection legislation next.

The Truth-in-Lending Act

A key statute regulating the credit and credit-card industries is Title I of the Consumer Credit Protection Act,²² which is commonly referred to as the Truth-in-Lending Act (TILA). The TILA has been amended several times, most recently in 2009, when Congress passed sweeping reforms to strengthen its consumer protections.²³

The TILA is basically a disclosure law. It is administered by the Federal Reserve Board and requires sellers and lenders to disclose credit terms or loan terms so that individuals can shop around for the best financing arrangements. TILA requirements apply only to persons who, in the ordinary course of business, lend funds, sell on credit, or arrange for the extension of credit. Thus, sales or loans made between two consumers do not come under the protection of the act. Additionally, this law protects only debtors who are natural persons (as opposed to the artificial “person” of a corporation). It does not extend to other legal entities.

DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENTS The disclosure requirements are contained in Regulation Z. If the contracting parties are subject to the TILA, the requirements of Regulation Z apply to any transaction involving an installment sales contract that calls for payment to be made in more than four installments. Transactions subject to Regulation Z typically include installment loans, retail and installment sales, car loans, home-improvement loans, and certain real estate loans if the amount of financing is less than $25,000.

Under the provisions of the TILA, all of the terms of a credit instrument must be clearly and conspicuously disclosed. A lender must disclose the annual percentage rate (APR), finance charge, amount financed, and total payments (the sum of the amount loaned, plus any fees, finance charges, and interest at the end of the loan). The TILA provides for contract rescission (cancellation) if a creditor

23. The TILA was amended in 1980 by the Truth-in-Lending Simplification and Reform Act. It was significantly amended again in 2009 by the Credit Card Accountability, Responsibility, and Disclosure Act of 2009, Pub. No. 111-24, 123 Stat. 1734, enacting 15 U.S.C. Sections 1616, 1651, 1665c–1665e, 1666b, 1666i-1, 1666i-2, and 1693l-1, and 16 U.S.C. Section 1a-7b, as well as amending many other provisions of the TILA.

fails to follow exactly the procedures required by the act.²⁴

EQUAL CREDIT OPPORTUNITY In 1974, Congress enacted the Equal Credit Opportunity Act (ECOA)²⁵ as an amendment to the TILA. The ECOA prohibits the denial of credit solely on the basis of race, religion, national origin, color, gender, marital status, or age. The act also prohibits credit discrimination on the basis of whether an individual receives certain forms of income, such as public-assistance benefits.

Under the ECOA, a creditor may not require the signature of an applicant's spouse, except as a joint applicant, on a credit instrument if the applicant qualifies under the creditor's standards of credit-worthiness for the amount and terms of the credit request.

CASE IN POINT Tonja, an African American, applied for financing with a used-car dealer. The dealer looked at Tonja's credit report and, without submitting the application to the lender, decided that she would not qualify. Instead of informing Tonja that she did not qualify, the dealer told her that she needed a cosigner on the loan to purchase the car. She filed a complaint. According to a federal appellate court, the dealer qualified as a creditor in this situation because the dealer unilaterally denied the credit and thus could be held liable under the ECOA.²⁶

CREDIT-CARD RULES The TILA also contains provisions regarding credit cards. One provision limits the liability of a cardholder to $50 per card for unauthorized charges made before the creditor is notified that the card has been lost. If a consumer receives an unsolicited credit card in the mail that is later stolen, the company that issued the card cannot charge the consumer for any unauthorized charges. Another provision requires credit-card companies to disclose the balance computation method that is used to determine the outstanding balance and to state when finance charges begin to accrue. Other provisions set forth procedures for resolving billing disputes with the credit-card company. These procedures are used if, for example, a cardholder thinks that an error has occurred in billing or wishes to withhold payment for a faulty product purchased by credit card.

ADDITIONAL CREDIT-CARD PROTECTION In 2009, President Barack Obama signed into law amendments to the credit-card protections of the TILA that became effective in 2010. The most significant provisions of the new rules impose the following requirements on credit-card companies:

1. A company may not retroactively increase the interest rates on existing card balances, unless the account is sixty days delinquent.
2. A company must provide forty-five days' advance notice to consumers before changing the credit-card terms.
3. Monthly bills must be sent to cardholders twenty-one days before the due date.
4. The interest rate charged on a customer's credit-card balance may not be increased except in specific situations, such as when a promotional rate ends.
5. A company may not charge over-limit fees except in specified situations.
6. When the customer has balances at different interest rates, payments in excess of the minimum amount due must be applied first to the balance with the highest rate (for example, a higher interest rate is commonly charged for cash advances).
7. A company may not compute finance charges based on the previous billing cycle (a practice known as double-cycle billing, which hurts consumers because they are charged interest for the previous cycle even though they have paid the bill in full).

CONSUMER LEASES The Consumer Leasing Act (CLA) of 1988²⁷ amended the TILA to provide protection for consumers who lease automobiles and other goods. The CLA applies to those who lease or arrange to lease consumer goods in the ordinary course of their business. The act applies only if the goods are priced at $25,000 or less and if the lease term exceeds four months. The CLA and its implementing regulation, Regulation M,²⁸ require lessors to disclose in writing (or by electronic record) all of the material terms of the lease.

The Fair Credit Reporting Act

The Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA)²⁹ protects consumers against inaccurate credit reporting and requires that lenders and other creditors report correct, relevant, and up-to-date information. The act provides that consumer credit reporting agencies may issue credit reports to users only for specified purposes, including the extension of credit, the issuance of insurance policies, and compliance with a court order, and in response to a consumer's request for a copy of his or her own credit report.

24. Note, however, that amendments to the TILA enacted in 1995 prevent borrowers from rescinding loans because of minor clerical errors in closing documents [15 U.S.C. Sections 1605, 1631, 1635, 1640, and 1641].

CONSUMER NOTIFICATION AND INACCURATE INFORMATION Any time a consumer is denied credit or insurance on the basis of her or his credit report, the consumer must be notified of that fact and of the name and address of the credit reporting agency that issued the report. The same notice must be sent to consumers who are charged more than others ordinarily would be for credit or insurance because of their credit reports.

Under the FCRA, consumers may request the source of any information used by the credit agency, as well as the identity of anyone who has received an agency's report. Consumers are also permitted to access the information about them contained in a credit reporting agency's files. If a consumer discovers that an agency's files contain inaccurate information, he or she should report the problem to the agency. On the consumer's written request, the agency must conduct a systematic examination of its records. Any unverifiable or erroneous information must be deleted within a reasonable period of time.

REMEDIES FOR VIOLATIONS A credit reporting agency that fails to comply with the act is liable for actual damages, plus additional damages not to exceed $1,000 and attorneys' fees.³⁰ Creditors and other companies that use information from credit reporting agencies may also be liable for violations of the FCRA. In 2007, the United States Supreme Court held that an insurance company's failure to notify new customers that they were paying higher insurance rates as a result of their credit scores was a willful violation of the FCRA.³¹

CASE IN POINT Rex Saunders obtained an auto loan from Branch Banking & Trust Company of Virginia (BB&T), which failed to give Saunders a payment coupon book and rebuffed his attempts to make payments on the loan. In fact, BB&T told him that it had not extended a loan to him. Eventually, BB&T discovered its mistake and demanded full payment, plus interest and penalties. When payment was not immediately forthcoming, BB&T declared that Saunders was in default. It then repossessed the car and forwarded adverse credit information about Saunders to credit reporting agencies, without noting that Saunders disputed the information. Saunders filed a lawsuit alleging violations of the FCRA and was awarded $80,000 in punitive damages. An appellate court found that the damages award was reasonable, given BB&T's willful violation.³²

The Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act

In an effort to combat identity theft (discussed in Chapter 9), Congress passed the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions (FACT) Act of 2003.³³ The act established a national fraud alert system so that consumers who suspect that they have been or may be victimized by identity theft can place an alert on their credit files. The act also requires the major credit reporting agencies to provide consumers with free copies of their own credit reports every twelve months.

Another provision requires account numbers on credit-card receipts to be truncated (shortened) so that merchants, employees, or others who may have access to the receipts do not have the consumers' names and full credit-card numbers. The act further mandates that financial institutions work with the FTC to identify "red flag" indicators of identity theft and to develop rules for the disposal of sensitive credit information.

The FACT Act gives consumers who have been victimized by identity theft some assistance in rebuilding their credit reputations. For example, credit reporting agencies must stop reporting allegedly fraudulent account information once the consumer establishes that identity theft has occurred. Business owners and creditors are required to provide consumers with copies of any records that can help the consumer prove that a particular account or transaction is fraudulent (records showing that a fraudulent signature was used in the creation of an account, for example). In addition, the act allows consumers to report the accounts affected by identity theft directly to creditors in order to help prevent the spread of erroneous credit information.

The Fair Debt Collection Practices Act

In 1977, Congress enacted the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (FDCPA)³⁴ in an attempt to curb perceived abuses by collection agencies. The act applies only to specialized debt-collection agencies and attorneys who regularly attempt to collect debts on behalf of someone else, usually for a percentage of the amount owed. Creditors attempting to collect debts are not covered by the act unless, by misrepresenting themselves, they cause debtors to believe they are collection agencies.

PROHIBITED DEBT COLLECTION TACTICS Under the FDCPA, a collection agency may not do any of the following:

1. Contact the debtor at the debtor's place of employment if the debtor's employer objects.
2. Contact the debtor at inconvenient or unusual times (for example, at three o'clock in the morning) or at any time, if the debtor is being represented by an attorney.
3. Contact third parties other than the debtor's parents, spouse, or financial adviser about payment of a debt unless a court authorizes such action.
4. Harass or intimidate the debtor (by using abusive language or threatening violence, for example) or make false or misleading statements (such as posing as a police officer).

5. Communicate with the debtor at any time after receiving notice that the debtor is refusing to pay the debt, except to advise the debtor of further action to be taken by the collection agency.

NOTIFICATION AND BONA FIDE ERRORS The FDCPA also requires a collection agency to include a validation notice whenever it initially contacts a debtor for payment of a debt or within five days of that initial contact. The notice must state that the debtor has thirty days in which to dispute the debt and to request a written verification of the debt from the collection agency. A debt collector who fails to comply with the act is liable for actual damages, plus additional damages not to exceed $1,000³⁵ and attorneys' fees.

Debt collectors who violate the act are exempt from liability if they can show that the violation was not intentional and "resulted from a bona fide error notwithstanding the maintenance of procedures reasonably adapted to avoid any such error." The "bona fide error" defense typically has been applied to mistakes of fact or clerical errors. Should the defense also apply to mistakes of law? In other words, if a debt collector violates the act because of a mistaken interpretation of the legal requirements of the FDCPA, can the debt collector avoid liability under the act? That was the issue in the following case.

35. According to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, the $1,000 limit on damages applies to each lawsuit, not to each violation. See Wright v. Finance Service of Norwalk, Inc., 22 F.3d 647 (6th Cir. 1994).

EXTENDED CASE 45.3

Jerman v. Carlisle, McNellie, Rini, Kramer & Ulrich, LPA

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice SOTOMAYOR delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

Respondents in this case are a law firm, Carlisle, McNellie, Rini, Kramer & Ulrich, L.P.A., [Legal Professional Association], and one of its attorneys, Adrienne S. Foster (collectively Carlisle). In April 2006, Carlisle filed a complaint in Ohio state court on behalf of a client, Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. Carlisle sought foreclosure of a mortgage held by Countrywide in real property owned by petitioner Karen L. Jerman. The complaint included a "Notice," later served on Jerman, stating that the mortgage debt would be assumed to be valid unless Jerman disputed it in writing. Jerman's lawyer sent a letter disputing the debt, and Carlisle sought verification from Countrywide. When Countrywide acknowledged that Jerman had, in fact, already paid the debt in full, Carlisle withdrew the foreclosure lawsuit.

Jerman then filed her own lawsuit seeking * * * damages under the FDCPA [Fair Debt Collection Practices Act], contending that Carlisle violated [the act] by stating that her debt would be assumed valid unless she disputed it in writing. While acknowledging a division of authority on the question, the District Court held that Carlisle had violated [the act] by requiring Jerman to dispute the debt in writing. The court ultimately granted summary judgment to Carlisle, however, concluding that Section 1692k(c) [of the FDCPA] shielded it from liability because the violation was not intentional, resulted from a bona fide error, and occurred despite the maintenance of procedures reasonably adapted to avoid any such error. The Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit affirmed. Acknowledging that the Courts of Appeals are divided regarding the scope of the bona fide error defense, and that the “majority view is that the defense is available for clerical and factual errors only,” the Sixth Circuit nonetheless held that Section 1692k(c) extends to “mistakes of law.”

* * *

The parties disagree about whether a “violation” resulting from a debt collector’s misinterpretation of the legal requirements of the FDCPA can ever be “not intentional” under 1692k(c). Jerman contends that when a debt collector intentionally commits the act giving rise to the violation (here, sending a notice that included the “in writing” language), a misunderstanding about what the Act requires cannot render the violation “not intentional,” given the general rule that mistake or ignorance of law is no defense. Carlisle and the dissent, in contrast, argue that nothing in the statutory text excludes legal errors from the category of “bona fide error[s]” covered by 1692k(c) and note that the Act refers not to an unintentional “act” but rather an unintentional “violation.” The latter term, they contend, evinces [makes clear] Congress’ intent to impose liability only when a party knows its conduct is unlawful. Carlisle urges us, therefore, to read 1692k(c) to encompass “all types of error,” including mistakes of law.

We decline to adopt the expansive reading of Section 1692k(c) that Carlisle proposes. We have long recognized the “common maxim, familiar to all minds, that ignorance of the law will not excuse any person, either civilly or criminally.” Our law is therefore no stranger to the possibility that an act may be “intentional” for purposes of civil liability, even if the actor lacked actual knowledge that her conduct violated the law. [Emphasis added.]

* * * When Congress has intended to provide a mistake-of-law defense to civil liability, it has often done so more explicitly than here. In particular, the FTC [Federal Trade Commission] Act’s administrative-penalty provisions—which * * * Congress expressly incorporated into the FDCPA—apply only when a debt collector acts with “actual knowledge or knowledge fairly implied on the basis of objective circumstances” that its action was “prohibited by [the FDCPA].” Given the absence of similar language in Section 1692k(c), it is a fair inference that Congress chose to permit injured consumers to recover actual damages, costs, fees, and modest statutory damages for “intentional” conduct, including violations resulting from mistaken interpretation of the FDCPA, while reserving the more onerous penalties of the FTC Act for debt collectors whose intentional actions also reflected “knowledge fairly implied on the basis of objective circumstances” that the conduct was prohibited.

* * *

We draw additional support for the conclusion that bona fide errors in Section 1692k(c) do not include mistaken interpretations of the FDCPA from the requirement that a debt collector maintain “procedures reasonably adapted to avoid any such error.” The dictionary defines “procedure” as “a series of steps followed in a regular orderly definite way.” In that light, the statutory phrase is more naturally read to apply to processes that have mechanical or other such “regular orderly” steps to avoid mistakes—for instance, the kind of internal controls a debt collector might adopt to ensure its employees do not communicate with consumers at the wrong time of day or make false representations as to the amount of a debt. * * * We do not dispute that some entities may maintain procedures to avoid legal errors. But legal reasoning is not a mechanical or strictly linear process. For this reason, we find * * * that the broad statutory requirement of procedures reasonably designed to avoid “any” bona fide error indicates that the relevant procedures are ones that help to avoid errors like clerical or factual mistakes. Such procedures are more likely to avoid error than those applicable to legal reasoning, particularly in the context of a comprehensive and complex federal statute such as the FDCPA that imposes open-ended prohibitions on, inter alia [among other things], “false, deceptive,” or “unfair” practices.

* * *

For the reasons discussed above, the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

QUESTIONS

1. One of the concerns raised by Carlisle was that if attorneys could be held liable for their reasonable misinterpretations of the FDCPA’s requirements, there would be a “flood of lawsuits” against creditors’ attorneys by plaintiffs seeking damages and attorneys’ fees. Should this concern have any bearing on the outcome of this case? Why or why not?
2. Jerman’s attorneys contended that if the Court agreed with Carlisle’s argument (that the bona fide error defense included errors in legal interpretation), ethical debt collectors would be placed at a disadvantage. Why would this be?

Garnishment of Wages

Despite the increasing number of protections afforded debtors, creditors are not without means of securing payment on debts. One of these is the right to garnish a debtor's wages after the debt has gone unpaid for a prolonged period. Recall from Chapter 28 that in a garnishment process, a creditor directly attaches, or seizes, a portion of the debtor's assets (such as wages) that are in the possession of a third party (such as an employer).

State law governs the garnishment process, but the law varies among the states as to how easily garnishment can be obtained. Indeed, a few states, such as Texas, prohibit garnishment of wages except for child support and court-approved spousal maintenance. Constitutional due process and federal legislation under the TILA also provide certain protections against abuse.³⁶ In general, the debtor is entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard. Moreover, wages cannot be garnished beyond 25 percent of the debtor's after-tax earnings, and the garnishment must leave the debtor with at least a specified minimum income.

CONSUMER HEALTH AND SAFETY

The laws discussed earlier regarding the labeling and packaging of products are intended to promote consumer health and safety. Nevertheless, there is a significant distinction between regulating the information dispensed about a product and regulating the actual content of the product. The classic example is tobacco products. Producers of tobacco products are required to warn consumers about the hazards associated with the use of their products, but the sale of tobacco products has not been subjected to significant restrictions or banned outright, despite the obvious dangers to health.³⁷ Here, we examine various laws that regulate the actual products made available to consumers.

The Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act

The first federal legislation regulating food and drugs was enacted in 1906 as the Pure Food and Drugs Act.

That law, as amended in 1938, exists today as the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act (FFDCA).³⁸ The act protects consumers against adulterated and misbranded foods and drugs. As to foods, in its present form, the act establishes food standards, specifies safe levels of potentially hazardous food additives, and sets classifications of foods and food advertising. Most of these statutory requirements are monitored and enforced by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA).

The FFDCA also charges the FDA with the responsibility of ensuring that drugs are safe and effective before they are marketed to the public. Because the FDA must ensure the safety of new medications, there is always a delay before drugs are available to the public, and this sometimes leads to controversy.

CASE IN POINT A group of terminally ill patients claimed that they were entitled, under the U.S. Constitution, to access to experimental drugs before the FDA completed its clinical tests. The court, however, found that the FDA's policy of limiting access to drugs undergoing tests was rationally related to protecting patients from potentially unsafe drugs. Therefore, the court held that terminally ill patients do not have a fundamental constitutional right of access to experimental drugs.³⁹

The Consumer Product Safety Act

As early as 1953, Congress began enacting laws to protect consumers from specific classes of unsafe products, such as highly flammable clothing or materials. Then, in 1972, Congress enacted the Consumer Product Safety Act,⁴⁰ which created the first comprehensive scheme of regulation over matters of consumer safety. The act also established the Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC), which has far-reaching authority over consumer safety.

THE CPSC'S AUTHORITY The CPSC conducts research on the safety of individual consumer products and maintains a clearinghouse on the risks associated with various products. The Consumer Product Safety Act authorizes the CPSC to:

1. Set safety standards for consumer products.
2. Ban the manufacture and sale of any product that the commission believes poses an "unreasonable risk" to consumers. (Products banned by the CPSC have included various types of fireworks,

36. 15 U.S.C. Sections 1671–1677.

37. We are ignoring recent civil litigation concerning the liability of tobacco product manufacturers for injuries that arise from the use of tobacco. See, for example, Philip Morris USA v. Williams, 549 U.S. 346, 127 S.Ct. 1057, 166 L.Ed.2d 940 (2007).

cribs, and toys, as well as many products containing asbestos or vinyl chloride.)

3. Remove from the market any products it believes to be imminently hazardous. The CPSC's authority is sufficiently broad to allow it to ban any product that it believes poses an "unreasonable risk" to consumers. The CPSC frequently works in conjunction with manufacturers to voluntarily recall defective products from stores.
4. Require manufacturers to report on any products already sold or intended for sale if the products have proved to be hazardous.
5. Administer other product-safety legislation, including the Child Protection and Toy Safety Act of 1969⁴¹ and the Federal Hazardous Substances Act of 1960.⁴²

NOTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS The Consumer Product Safety Act requires the distributors of consumer products to notify the CPSC immediately if they receive information that a product "contains a defect which . . . creates a substantial risk to the public" or "an unreasonable risk of serious injury or death."

CASE IN POINT A company that sold juicers received twenty-three letters from customers complaining that during operation the juicer had suddenly exploded, sending pieces of glass and razor-sharp metal across the room. Nevertheless, the company waited more than six months before notifying the CPSC. In a case filed by the federal government, the court held that a company is required to report a problem to the CPSC within twenty-four hours after receiving information about a threat. Even if it must investigate the allegations, the company should not take more than ten days to verify the information and report the problem. The court found that the company had violated the law and ordered it to pay damages.⁴³

REVIEWING Consumer Law

Leota Sage saw a local motorcycle dealer's newspaper advertisement offering a MetroRider EZ electric scooter for $1,699. When she went to the dealership, however, she learned that the EZ model had been sold out. The salesperson told Sage that he still had the higher-end MetroRider FX model in stock for $2,199 and would sell her one for $1,999. Sage was disappointed but decided to purchase the FX model. When Sage said that she wished to purchase the scooter on credit, she was directed to the dealer's credit department. As she filled out the credit forms, the clerk told Sage, who is an Asian American, that she would need a cosigner to obtain a loan. Sage could not understand why she would need a cosigner and asked to speak to the store manager. The manager apologized, told her that the clerk was mistaken, and said that he would "speak to" the clerk about that. The manager completed Sage's credit application, and Sage then rode the scooter home. Seven months later, Sage received a letter from the manufacturer informing her that a flaw had been discovered in the scooter's braking system and that the model had been recalled. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did the dealer engage in deceptive advertising? Why or why not?
2. Suppose that Sage had ordered the scooter through the dealer's Web site but that the dealer had been unable to deliver it by the date promised. What would the FTC have required the merchant to do in that situation?
3. Assuming that the clerk required a cosigner based on Sage's race or gender, what act prohibits such credit discrimination?
4. What organization has the authority to ban the sale of scooters based on safety concerns?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

45-1. Unsolicited Merchandise Andrew, a resident of California, received an advertising circular in the U.S. mail announcing a new line of regional cookbooks distributed by the Every-Kind Cookbook Co. Andrew didn't want any books and threw the circular away. Two days later, Andrew received in the mail an introductory cookbook entitled Lower Mongolian Regional Cookbook, as announced in the circular, on a “trial basis” from Every-Kind. Andrew was not interested but did not go to the trouble to return the cookbook. Every-Kind demanded payment of $20.95 for the Lower Mongolian Regional Cookbook. Discuss whether Andrew can be required to pay for the book.

45-2. Credit-Card Rules Maria Ochoa receives two new credit cards on May 1. She has solicited one of them from Midtown Department Store, and the other arrives unsolicited from High-Flying Airlines. During the month of May, Ochoa makes numerous credit-card purchases from Midtown Department Store, but she does not use the High-Flying Airlines card. On May 31, a burglar breaks into Ochoa's home and steals both credit cards, along with other items. Ochoa notifies the Midtown Department Store of the theft on June 2, but she fails to notify High-Flying Airlines. Using the Midtown credit card, the burglar makes a $500 purchase on June 1 and a $200 purchase on June 3. The burglar then charges a vacation flight on the High-Flying Airlines card for $1,000 on June 5. Ochoa receives the bills for these charges and refuses to pay them. Discuss Ochoa's liability for the charges.

45-3. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Sales.

On June 28, a salesperson for Renowned Books called on the Gonchars at their home. After a very persuasive sales pitch by the agent, the Gonchars agreed in writing to purchase a twenty-volume set of historical encyclopedias from Renowned Books for a total of $299. A down payment of $35 was required, with the remainder of the cost to be paid in monthly payments over a one-year period. Two days later, the Gonchars, having second thoughts, contacted the book company and stated that they had decided to rescind the contract. Renowned Books said this would be impossible. Did Renowned Books violate any consumer law by not allowing the Gonchars to rescind their contract? Explain.

45-4. Fair Credit Reporting Act Source One Associates, Inc., is based in Poughquag, New York. Peter Easton, Source One's president, is responsible for its daily operations. Between 1995 and 1997, Source One received requests from persons in Massachusetts seeking financial information about individuals and businesses. To obtain this information, Easton first obtained the targeted individuals' credit reports through Equifax Consumer Information Services by claiming that the reports would be used only in connection with credit transactions involving the consumers. From the reports, Easton identified financial institutions at which the targeted individuals held accounts. He then called the institutions to learn the account balances by impersonating either officers of the institutions or the account holders. The information was then provided to Source One's customers for a fee. Easton did not know why the customers wanted the information. The state (“commonwealth”) of Massachusetts filed a suit in a Massachusetts state court against Source One and Easton, alleging, among other things, violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA). Did the defendants violate the FCRA? Explain. [Commonwealth v. Source One Associates, Inc., 436 Mass. 118, 763 N.E.2d 42 (2002)]

45-5. Food Labeling One of the products that McDonald's Corp. sells is the Happy Meal®, which consists of a McDonald's food entree, a small order of french fries, a small drink, and a toy. In the early 1990s, McDonald's began to aim its Happy Meal marketing at children aged one to three. In 1995, McDonald's began making nutritional information for its food products available in documents known as “McDonald's Nutrition Facts.” Each document lists each food item that the restaurant serves and provides a nutritional breakdown, but the Happy Meal is not included. Marc Cohen filed a suit in an Illinois state court against McDonald's, alleging, among other things, that the defendant had violated a state law prohibiting consumer fraud and deceptive business practices by failing to adhere to the Nutrition Labeling and Education Act (NLEA) of 1990. The NLEA sets out different requirements for products specifically intended for children under the age of four—generally, the products' labels cannot declare the percent of daily value of nutritional components. Would this requirement be readily understood by a consumer who is not familiar with nutritional standards? Why or why not? Should a state court impose such regulations? Explain. [Cohen v. McDonald's Corp., 347 Ill.App.3d 627, 808 N.E.2d 1, 283 Ill.Dec. 451 (1 Dist. 2004)]

45-6. Debt Collection 55th Management Corp. in New York City owns residential property that it leases to various tenants. In June 2000, claiming that one of the tenants, Leslie Goldman, owed more than $13,000 in back rent, 55th retained Jeffrey Cohen, an attorney, to initiate nonpayment proceedings. Cohen filed a petition in a New York state court against Goldman, seeking recovery of the unpaid rent and at least $3,000 in attorneys' fees. After receiving notice of the petition, Goldman filed a suit in a federal district court against Cohen. Goldman contended that the notice of the petition constituted an initial contact that, under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (FDCPA), required a validation notice. Because Cohen did not give Goldman a validation notice at the time, or within five days, of the notice of the petition, Goldman argued that Cohen was in violation of the FDCPA. Should the filing of a suit in a state court be considered "communication," requiring a debt collector to provide a validation notice under the FDCPA? Why or why not? [Goldman v. Cohen, 445 F.3d 152 (2d Cir. 2006)]

45-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Food Labeling.

The Nutrition Labeling and Education Act (NLEA) requires packaged food to have a "Nutrition Facts" panel that sets out "nutrition information," including "the total number of calories" per serving. Restaurants are exempt from this requirement. The NLEA also regulates nutritional content claims, such as "low sodium," that a purveyor might choose to add to a label. The NLEA permits a state or city to require restaurants to disclose nutrition information about the food they serve, but expressly preempts state or local attempts to regulate nutritional content claims. New York City Health Code Section 81.50 requires 10 percent of the restaurants in the city, including McDonald's, Burger King, and KFC, to post calorie content information on their menus. The New York State Restaurant Association (NYSRA) filed a suit in a federal district court, contending that the NLEA preempts Section 81.50. (Under the U.S. Constitution, state or local laws that conflict with federal laws are preempted.) Is the NYSRA correct? Explain. [New York State Restaurant Association v. New York City Board of Health, 556 F.3d 114 (2d Cir. 2009)]

45-8. Deceptive Advertising Brian Cleary and Rita Burke filed a suit against the major cigarette maker Philip Morris USA, Inc., seeking class-action status for a claim of deceptive advertising. Cleary and Burke claimed that "light" cigarettes, such as Marlboro Lights, were advertised as safer than regular cigarettes, even though the health effects are the same. They contended that the tobacco companies concealed the true nature of light cigarettes. Philip Morris correctly claimed that it was authorized by the government to advertise cigarettes, including light cigarettes. Assuming that is true, should the plaintiffs still be able to bring a deceptive advertising claim against the tobacco company? Why or why not? [Cleary v. Philip Morris USA, Inc., 683 F.Supp.2d 730 (N.D.Ill. 2010)]

45-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Debt-Collection Practices.

After graduating from law school—and serving time in prison for attempting to collect debts by posing as an FBI agent—Barry Sussman theorized that if a debt-collection business collected only debts that it owned as a result of buying checks written on accounts with insufficient funds (NSF checks), it would not be subject to the Federal Debt Collection Practices Act (FDCPA). Sussman formed Check Investors, Inc., to act on his theory. Check Investors bought more than 2.2 million NSF checks, with an estimated face value of about $348 million, for pennies on the dollar. Check Investors added a fee of $125 or $130 (more than the legal limit in most states) to the face amount of each check and aggressively pursued its drawer to collect. The firm's employees were told to accuse drawers of being criminals and to threaten them with arrest and prosecution. The threats were false. Check Investors never took steps to initiate a prosecution. The employees contacted the drawers' family members and used "saturation phoning"—phoning a drawer numerous times in a short period. They used abusive language, referring to drawers as "deadbeats," "retards," "thieves," and "idiots." Between January 2000 and January 2003, Check Investors netted more than $10.2 million from its efforts. [Federal Trade Commission v. Check Investors, Inc., 502 F.3d 159 (3d Cir. 2007)]

- The Federal Trade Commission filed a suit in a federal district court against Check Investors and others, alleging, in part, violations of the FDCPA. Was Check Investors a "debt collector," collecting "debts," within the meaning of the FDCPA? If so, did its methods violate the FDCPA? Were its practices unethical? What might Check Investors argue in its defense? Discuss.
- Are "deadbeats" the primary beneficiaries of laws such as the FDCPA? If not, how would you characterize debtors who default on their obligations?

CHAPTER 46

Environmental Law

Concern over the degradation of the environment has increased over time in response to the environmental effects of population growth, urbanization, and industrialization. Environmental protection is not without a price, however. For many businesses, the costs of complying with environmental regulations are high, and for some they may seem too high. A constant tension exists between the desire to increase profits and productivity and the need to protect the environment.

In this chapter, we discuss environmental law, which consists of all laws and regulations designed to protect and preserve our environmental resources. To a great extent, environmental law consists of statutes passed by federal, state, or local governments and regulations issued by administrative agencies. Before examining statutory and regulatory environmental laws, however, we look at the remedies against environmental pollution that are available under the common law.

SECTION 1

COMMON LAW ACTIONS

Common law remedies against environmental pollution originated centuries ago in England. Those responsible for operations that created dirt, smoke, noxious odors, noise, or toxic substances were sometimes held liable under common law theories of nuisance or negligence. Today, injured individuals continue to rely on the common law to obtain damages and injunctions against business polluters.

Nuisance

Under the common law doctrine of nuisance, persons may be held liable if they use their property in a manner that unreasonably interferes with others' rights to use or enjoy their own property. Courts typically balance the harm caused by the pollution against the costs of stopping it. Courts have often denied injunctive relief on the ground that the hardships that would be imposed on the polluter and on the community are greater than the hardships suffered by the plaintiff. For example, a factory that causes neighboring landowners to suffer from smoke, soot, and vibrations may be left in operation if it is the core of the local economy. The injured parties may be awarded only monetary damages, which may include compensation for the decline in the value of their property caused by the factory's operation.

A property owner may be given relief from pollution if he or she can identify a distinct harm separate from that affecting the general public. This harm is referred to as a "private" nuisance. Under the common law, individuals were denied standing (access to the courts—see Chapter 2) unless they suffered a harm distinct from the harm suffered by the public at large. Some states still require this. A public authority (such as a state's attorney general), however, can sue to stop a "public" nuisance.

Negligence and Strict Liability

An injured party may sue a business polluter in tort under the negligence and strict liability theories discussed in Chapters 6 and 7. The basis for a negligence action is a business's alleged failure to use reasonable care toward a party whose injury was foreseeable and was caused by the lack of reasonable care. For example, employees might sue an employer whose failure to use proper pollution controls contaminated the air, causing the employees to suffer respiratory illnesses. Lawsuits for personal injuries caused by exposure to a toxic substance, such as asbestos, radiation, or hazardous waste, have given rise to a growing body of tort law known as toxic torts.

Businesses that engage in ultrahazardous activities—such as the transportation of radioactive materials—are strictly liable for any injuries the activities cause. In a strict liability action, the injured party does not have to prove that the business failed to exercise reasonable care.

SECTION 2

FEDERAL, STATE, AND LOCAL REGULATIONS

All levels of government in the United States regulate some aspect of the environment. In this section, we look at some of the ways in which the federal, state, and local governments control business activities and land use in the interests of environmental preservation and protection.

State and Local Regulations

In addition to the federal regulation to be discussed shortly, many states have enacted laws to protect the environment. State laws may restrict a business's discharge of chemicals into the air or water or regulate its disposal of toxic wastes. States may also regulate the disposal or recycling of other wastes, including glass, metal, plastic containers, and paper. Additionally, states may restrict emissions from motor vehicles.

City, county, and other local governments also regulate some aspects of the environment. For instance, local zoning laws may be designed to inhibit or regulate the growth of cities and suburbs or to protect the natural environment. In the interest of safeguarding the environment, such laws may prohibit certain land uses. Even when zoning laws permit a business's proposed development, the proposal may have to be altered to lessen the development's impact on the environment. In addition, cities and counties may impose rules regulating methods of waste removal, the appearance of buildings, the maximum noise level, and other aspects of the local environment.

State and local regulatory agencies also play a significant role in implementing federal environmental legislation. Typically, the federal government relies on state and local governments to enforce federal environmental statutes and regulations such as those regulating air quality.

Federal Regulations

Congress has passed a number of statutes to control the impact of human activities on the environment. Exhibit 46–1 on the facing page lists and summarizes the major federal environmental statutes discussed in this chapter. Most of these statutes are designed to address pollution in the air, water, or land. Some of the laws specifically regulate toxic chemicals, including pesticides, herbicides, and hazardous wastes.

ENVIRONMENTAL REGULATORY AGENCIES The primary federal agency regulating environmental law is the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), which was created in 1970 to coordinate federal environmental responsibilities. Other federal agencies with authority for regulating specific environmental matters include the Department of the Interior, the Department of Defense, the Department of Labor, the Food and Drug Administration, and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. All federal agencies must take environmental factors into consideration when making significant decisions. In addition, as mentioned, state and local agencies play an important role in enforcing federal environmental legislation.

Most federal environmental laws provide that citizens can sue to enforce environmental regulations if government agencies fail to do so—or to limit enforcement actions if agencies go too far in their actions. Typically, a threshold hurdle in such suits is meeting the requirements for standing to sue (see page 35 in Chapter 2).

ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STATEMENTS The National Environmental Policy Act of 1969¹ requires that an environmental impact statement (EIS) be prepared for every major federal action that significantly affects the quality of the environment. An EIS must analyze (1) the impact on the environment that the action will have, (2) any adverse effects on the environment and alternative actions that might be taken, and (3) irreversible effects the action might generate.

An action qualifies as “major” if it involves a substantial commitment of resources (monetary or otherwise). An action is “federal” if a federal agency has the power to control it. Development of a ski resort by a private developer on federal land, for example, may require an EIS. Construction or operation of a nuclear plant, which requires a federal permit, or creation of a dam as part of a federal project requires an EIS. If an agency decides that an EIS is multistate air pollution and provide assistance to the states. Later amendments to the act, especially those enacted in 1970, provide the basis for issuing regulations to control air pollution. The Clean Air Act covers both mobile sources (such as automobiles and other vehicles) and stationary sources (such as electric utilities and industrial plants) of pollution.

SECTION 3

AIR POLLUTION

Federal involvement with air pollution goes back to the 1950s and 1960s, when Congress authorized funds for air-pollution research. In 1963, the federal government passed the Clean Air Act² to address

Mobile Sources

Regulations governing air pollution from automobiles and other mobile sources specify pollution standards and establish time schedules for meeting the standards. For example, 1990 amendments to the Clean Air Act required automobile manufacturers to cut new automobiles' exhaust emissions of nitrogen oxide by 60 percent and emissions of hydrocarbons and carbon monoxide by 35 percent by 1998. Beginning with 2004 models, the rules also applied to sport-utility vehicles (SUVs) and light trucks. The EPA periodically updates the pollution standards in light of new developments and data, reducing the amount of emissions allowed.

2. 42 U.S.C. Sections 7401–7671q.

In 2009, the Obama administration announced a long-term goal of reducing emissions, including those from cars and SUVs, by 80 percent by 2050. In 2010, the administration ordered the EPA to develop national standards regulating fuel economy and emissions for medium- and heavy-duty trucks starting with 2014 models.

A growing concern among many scientists and others around the world is that greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide (CO₂), are contributing to global warming. The Clean Air Act, as amended, however, does not specifically mention CO₂ emissions. Therefore, up until 2009, the EPA did not regulate CO₂ emissions from motor vehicles.

CASE IN POINT In 2007, environmental groups and several states, including Massachusetts, sued the EPA in an effort to force the agency to regulate CO₂ emissions. When the case reached the United States Supreme Court, the EPA argued that the plaintiffs lacked standing because global warming has widespread effects and thus an individual plaintiff could not show the particularized harm required for standing. Furthermore, the agency maintained, it did not have authority under the Clean Air Act to address global climate change and regulate CO₂. The Court, however, ruled that Massachusetts had standing because its coastline, including state-owned lands, faced an imminent threat from rising sea levels caused by global warming. The Court also held that the Clean Air Act's broad definition of air pollutant gives the EPA authority to regulate CO₂ and requires the EPA to regulate any air pollutants that might “endanger public health or welfare.” Accordingly, the Court ordered the EPA to determine whether CO₂ was a pollutant that endangered public health.³ (In 2009, the EPA concluded that greenhouse gases, including CO₂ emissions, do constitute a public danger.)

Stationary Sources

The Clean Air Act also authorizes the EPA to establish air-quality standards for stationary sources (such as manufacturing plants) but recognizes that the primary responsibility for implementing these standards rests with state and local governments. The standards are aimed at controlling hazardous air pollutants—those likely to cause death or a serious, irreversible, or incapacitating condition such as cancer or neurological or reproductive damage.

LISTING OF HAZARDOUS AIR POLLUTANTS The Clean Air Act requires the EPA to list all hazardous air pollutants (HAPs) on a prioritized schedule. In all, nearly two hundred substances—including asbestos, benzene, beryllium, cadmium, and vinyl chloride—have been classified as hazardous. They are emitted from stationary sources by a variety of business activities, including smelting (melting ore to produce metal), dry cleaning, house painting, and commercial baking.

Mercury was added to the list of hazardous substances in 2000. The EPA attempted nonetheless to remove mercury from its list of designated HAPs emitted from steam-generating electricity plants. New Jersey and others challenged this delisting in the following case.

3. Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency, 549 U.S. 497, 127 S.Ct. 1438, 167 L.Ed.2d 248 (2007).

State of New Jersey v. Environmental Protection Agency

United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, 517 F.3d 574 (2008).

www.cadc.uscourts.gov/bin/opinions/allopinions.asp^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) published a rule—the Delisting Rule—that had the effect of removing from its regulation the emissions of mercury from steam-generating electricity plants that used coal or oil as their energy sources. This Delisting Rule ran counter to the EPA's own conclusions at the end of 2000 that it was “appropriate and necessary”

CASE 46.1 CONTINUED ♦ to regulate mercury emissions. At that time, the agency placed mercury on its list of hazardous air pollutants (HAPs) to be monitored at electricity-generating sites. Later, however, the EPA tried to “delist” mercury from the HAPs list. New Jersey and fourteen other states, plus various state agencies, challenged the EPA’s delisting action.

ROGERS, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

First, Congress required EPA to regulate more than one hundred specific HAPs, including mercury and nickel compounds. Further, EPA was required to list and to regulate, on a prioritized schedule, “all categories and subcategories of major sources and area sources” that emit one or more HAPs. In seeking to ensure that regulation of HAPs reflects the “maximum reduction in emissions which can be achieved by application of [the] best available control technology,” Congress imposed specific, strict pollution control requirements on both new and existing sources of HAPs. [Emphasis added.]

Second, Congress restricted the opportunities for EPA and others to intervene in the regulation of HAP sources. For HAPs that result in health effects other than cancer, as is true of mercury, Congress directed that the Administrator “may delete any source category” from the section 112(c)(1) list only after determining that “emissions from no source in the category or subcategory concerned . . . exceed a level which is adequate to protect public health with an ample margin of safety and no adverse environmental effect will result from emissions from any source.”

* * * *

EPA maintains that it possesses authority to remove EGUs [electrical generating units] from * * * [the] list under the “fundamental principle of administrative law that an agency has inherent authority to reverse an earlier administrative determination or ruling where an agency has a principled basis for doing so.” EPA states in its brief that it has previously removed sources listed * * * without satisfying the requirements of [the statute]. But previous statutory violations cannot excuse the one now before the court. “We do not see how merely applying an unreasonable statutory interpretation for several years can transform it into a reasonable interpretation.”

DECISION AND REMEDY • The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit ruled in favor of New Jersey and the other plaintiffs. The EPA was required to cancel its delisting of mercury.

WHAT IF THE FACTS WERE DIFFERENT? • Suppose that the EPA had carried out scientific tests that showed mercury was relatively harmless as a by-product of electricity generation. How might this have affected the court’s ruling?

THE GLOBAL DIMENSION • Because air pollution knows no borders, how did this ruling affect our neighboring countries?

AIR-POLLUTION CONTROL STANDARDS The EPA sets primary and secondary levels of ambient standards—that is, maximum permissible levels of certain pollutants—and the states formulate plans to achieve those standards. Different standards apply depending on whether the sources of pollution are located in clean areas or polluted areas and whether they are existing sources or major new sources.

Major new sources include existing sources modified by a change in a method of operation that increases emissions. Performance standards for major sources require the use of the maximum achievable control technology, or MACT, to reduce emissions. The EPA issues guidelines as to what equipment meets this standard.⁴

Violations of the Clean Air Act

For violations of emission limits under the Clean Air Act, the EPA can assess civil penalties of up to $25,000 per day. Additional fines of up to $5,000 per day can be assessed for other violations, such as failure to maintain the required records. To penalize those who find it more cost-effective to violate the act than to comply with it, the EPA is authorized to impose a penalty equal to the violator's economic benefits from noncompliance. Persons who provide information about violators may be paid up to $10,000. Private citizens can also sue violators.

4. The EPA has also issued rules to regulate hazardous air pollutants emitted by landfills. See 40 C.F.R. Sections 60.750–60.759.

Those who knowingly violate the act may be subject to criminal penalties, including fines of up to $1 million and imprisonment for up to two years (for false statements or failure to report violations). Corporate officers are among those who may be subject to these penalties.

WATER POLLUTION

Water pollution stems mostly from industrial, municipal, and agricultural sources. Pollutants entering streams, lakes, and oceans include organic wastes, heated water, sediments from soil runoff, nutrients (including fertilizers and human and animal wastes), and toxic chemicals and other hazardous substances.

Federal regulations governing water pollution can be traced back to the Rivers and Harbors Appropriations Act of 1899.⁵ These regulations prohibited ships and manufacturers from discharging or depositing refuse in navigable waterways without a permit.⁶ In 1948, Congress passed the Federal Water Pollution Control Act (FWPCA),⁷ but its regulatory system and enforcement powers proved to be inadequate.

The Clean Water Act

In 1972, amendments to the FWPCA—known as the Clean Water Act (CWA)—established the following goals: (1) make waters safe for swimming, (2) protect fish and wildlife, and (3) eliminate the discharge of pollutants into the water. The CWA also set specific schedules, which were extended by amendment in 1977 and by the Water Quality Act of 1987.⁸ Under these schedules, the EPA limits the discharge of various types of pollutants based on the technology available for controlling them.

5. 33 U.S.C. Sections 401–418.

6. The term navigable waters is interpreted today as including interstate lakes and streams used by interstate travelers and industries, as well as coastal and freshwater wetlands.

7. 33 U.S.C. Sections 1251–1387.

8. This act amended 33 U.S.C. Section 1251.

FOCUS ON POINT-SOURCE EMISSIONS The CWA established a permit system, called the National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System (NPDES), for regulating discharges from “point sources” of pollution that include industrial, municipal (such as pipes and sewage treatment plants), and agricultural facilities.⁹ Under this system, any point source emitting pollutants into water must have a permit. Pollution not from point sources, such as runoff from small farms, is not subject to much regulation. NPDES permits can be issued by the EPA and authorized state agencies and Indian tribes, but only if the discharge will not violate water-quality standards. NPDES permits must be reissued every five years. Although initially the NPDES system focused mainly on industrial wastewater, it was later expanded to cover storm water discharges.

In practice, the permit system under the CWA includes the following elements:

1. National effluent (pollution) standards set by the EPA for each industry.
2. Water-quality standards set by the states under EPA supervision.
3. A discharge permit program that sets water-quality standards to limit pollution.
4. Special provisions for toxic chemicals and for oil spills.
5. Construction grants and loans from the federal government for publicly owned treatment works, primarily sewage treatment plants.

STANDARDS FOR EQUIPMENT Regulations generally specify that the best available control technology, or BACT, be installed. The EPA issues guidelines as to what equipment meets this standard. Essentially, the guidelines require the most effective pollution-control equipment available. New sources must install BACT equipment before beginning operations. Existing sources are subject to timetables for the installation of BACT equipment and must immediately install equipment that utilizes the best practical control technology, or BPCT. The EPA also issues guidelines as to what equipment meets this standard.

The EPA must take into account many factors when issuing and updating its rules. Some provisions of the CWA instruct the EPA to weigh the cost of the technology required relative to the benefits achieved. The provision that covers power plants, however, neither requires nor prohibits a cost-benefit analysis. The question in the following case was whether the EPA could conduct such an analysis anyway.

9. 33 U.S.C. Section 1342.

CASE 46.2

Entergy Corp. v. Riverkeeper, Inc.

Supreme Court of the United States, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 1498, 173 L.Ed.2d 369 (2009).
www.findlaw.com/casecode/supreme.html^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • As part of its implementation of the Clean Water Act, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has developed two sets of rules that apply to the cooling systems of power plants. Phase I rules require new power plants to restrict their inflow of water “to a level commensurate with that which can be attained by a closed-cycle recirculating cooling water system.” Phase II rules apply “national performance standards” to more than five hundred existing plants but do not require closed-cycle cooling systems. The EPA found that converting these facilities to closed-cycle operations would cost $3.5 billion per year. The facilities would then produce less power while burning the same amount of coal. Moreover, other technologies can attain nearly the same results as closed-cycle systems. Phase II rules also allow a variance from the national performance standards if a facility’s cost of compliance “would be significantly greater than the benefits.” Environmental organizations, including Riverkeeper, Inc., challenged the Phase II regulations, arguing that existing plants should be required to convert to closed-cycle systems. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit issued a ruling in the plaintiffs’ favor. Power-generating companies, including Entergy Corporation, appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

In setting the Phase II national performance standards and providing for site-specific cost-benefit variances, the EPA relied on its view that [the] “best technology available” standard permits consideration of the technology’s costs and of the relationship between those costs and the environmental benefits produced.

* * * The “best” technology—that which is “most advantageous”—may well be the one that produces the most of some good, here a reduction in adverse environmental impact. But “best technology” may also describe the technology that most efficiently produces some good. In common parlance one could certainly use the phrase “best technology” to refer to that which produces a good at the lowest per-unit cost, even if it produces a lesser quantity of that good than other available technologies. [Emphasis added.]

* * * This latter reading is [not] precluded by the statute’s use of the phrase “for minimizing adverse environmental impact.” Minimizing * * * is a term that admits of degree and is not necessarily used to refer exclusively to the “greatest possible reduction.” [Emphasis added.]

Other provisions in the Clean Water Act also suggest the agency’s interpretation. When Congress wished to mandate the greatest feasible reduction in water pollution, it did so in plain language: The provision governing the discharge of toxic pollutants into the Nation’s waters requires the EPA to set “effluent limitations which shall require the elimination of discharges of all pollutants * * *.” The less ambitious goal of “minimizing adverse environmental impact” suggests, we think, that the agency retains some discretion to determine the extent of reduction that is warranted under the circumstances. That determination could plausibly involve a consideration of the benefits derived from reductions and the costs of achieving them.

* * * [Under other Clean Water Act provisions that impose standards on sources of pollution,] the EPA is instructed to consider, among other factors, “the total cost of application of technology in relation to the * * * benefits to be achieved.”

* * * *

This * * * comparison of * * * statutory factors * * * leads us to the conclusion that it was well within the bounds of reasonable interpretation for the EPA to conclude that cost-benefit analysis is not categorically forbidden.

While not conclusive, it surely tends to show that the EPA's current practice is a reasonable and hence legitimate exercise of its discretion to weigh benefits against costs that the agency has been proceeding in essentially this fashion for over 30 years.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The United States Supreme Court concluded that the EPA permissibly relied on a cost-benefit analysis to set national performance standards and to allow for variances from those standards as part of the Phase II regulations. The Court reversed the lower court's judgment and remanded the case.

THE ETHICAL DIMENSION • In this case, aquatic organisms were most directly at risk. Is it acceptable to apply cost-benefit analyses to situations in which the lives of people are directly affected? Explain.

THE GLOBAL DIMENSION • In analyzing the costs and benefits of an action that affects the environment, should a line be drawn at a nation's borders? Why or why not?

WETLANDS The CWA prohibits the filling or dredging of wetlands unless a permit is obtained from the Army Corps of Engineers. The EPA defines wetlands as “those areas that are inundated or saturated by surface or ground water at a frequency and duration sufficient to support, and that under normal circumstances do support, a prevalence of vegetation typically adapted for life in saturated soil conditions.” Wetlands are thought to be vital to the ecosystem because they filter streams and rivers and provide habitat for wildlife. In the past, the EPA's broad interpretation of what constituted a wetland generated substantial controversy, but the courts have considerably scaled back the CWA's protection of wetlands in recent years.¹⁰

In the following case, the court had to deal with the meaning of wetlands and whether the term included saturated land adjacent to so-called navigable-in-fact waters.

10. See, for example, Rapanos v. United States, 547 U.S. 715, 126 S.Ct. 2208, 165 L.Ed.2d 159 (2006).

✧ EXTENDED CASE 46.3 ✧

United States v. Lucas

United States Court of Appeals, Fifth District, 516 F.3d 316 (2008).

Patrick E.
HIGGINBOTHAM,
Circuit Judge.

* * * *

Robert J. Lucas owned Big Hill Acres, Inc. (BHA, Inc.) and Consolidated Investments, Inc. Through these companies, he acquired Big Hill Acres (BHA), a large parcel of land in Jackson County, Mississippi, approximately eight miles from the Gulf of Mexico. He subdivided the property and sold mobile home lots under long-term installment plans. The property was not connected to a central municipal waste system, and County law required Lucas to certify and install individual septic systems on each lot before they could establish electric hook-ups or sell the lots. In Jackson County, septic systems must be approved by an engineer with the Mississippi Department of Health (MDH) or by an independent licensed engineer. Lucas initially hired an MDH engineer to approve septic systems, but MDH withdrew many of its initial approvals when it found that the lots were on saturated soils. Lucas then hired a private licensed engineer, M. E. Thompson, Jr., to approve and certify the septic systems. Robbie Lucas Wrigley, Lucas's daughter, advertised the lots, showed them to prospective buyers, and leased them.

The [U.S.] Army Corps of Engineers, the EPA [Environmental Protection Agency], the MDH, and the Mississippi Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ) became concerned that Defendants were selling house lots and installing septic systems on wetlands. These agencies issued several cease and desist orders against Lucas and Thompson, and the EPA sent letters to residents and organized a meeting of the residents to warn them of lot conditions and to tell them where wetlands were located on the property. It also met with BHA's counsel to attempt to designate the areas where they would allow development. These efforts were not fully successful.

The Government filed a forty-one-count indictment against Defendants * * *, charging filling of wetlands without a Section 404 permit from the [U.S. Army] Corps [of Engineers], failing to obtain Section 402 National Pollutant Discharge Elimination System (NPDES) Permits for the septic tanks, mail fraud, and conspiracy to commit mail fraud and to violate Sections 402 and 404 of the CWA [Clean Water Act]. * * * A jury convicted Defendants on all counts, and the court * * * sentenced Lucas, Wrigley, and [Thompson] to prison terms; placed BHA, Inc., and Consolidated Investments on probation; and ordered all Defendants to pay restitution, special assessments, and fines.

* * * *

The first and overarching [dominant] question is jurisdiction—whether the jury was properly required to find that the property at issue was subject to the CWA. * * * The instructions stated in relevant part,

* * * *

The term wetlands means those areas that are inundated or saturated by surface or groundwater at a frequency and duration sufficient to support, and that under normal circumstances do support, a prevalence of vegetation typically adapted for life in saturated soil conditions * * *. * * * Wetlands that are waters of the United States are protected by the Clean Water Act. Wetlands are considered waters of the United States if they are adjacent to a navigable body of open water. Wetlands are adjacent to a navigable body of water if there is a significant nexus [connection] between the wetlands in question and a navigable-in-fact waterway. Some of the factors which you may wish to consider in determining whether there is a significant nexus include, but are not limited to: * * * flow rate of surface waters from the wetlands into a navigable body of water * * * when, or to what extent, contaminants from the wetlands have or will affect a navigable body of water * * *. [Emphasis added.]

Defendants argue that the court erred in not including their requested language that:

* * * adjacency implicates a “significant nexus” between the water in question and the navigable-in-fact waterway. If the government fails to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the wetlands at issue in this case are in fact navigable or truly adjacent to [that is,] lying near, close, contiguous, or adjoining a navigable waterway, you must find the defendants not guilty * * *.

* * * *

* * * A district court abuses its discretion in omitting a requested *jury instruction only if the requested language “(1) is substantively correct; (2) is not substantially covered in the charge given to the jury; and (3) concerns an important point in the trial * * .” [Emphasis added.]

The court’s instructions were not in error, nor was the court’s omission of Defendants’ requested instructions. * * * The instructions substantially covered Defendants’ requested instructions by requiring adjacency as defined by a significant nexus.

* * * *

The government has shown that there is a significant nexus between the wetlands on Big Hill Acres and navigable-in-fact waters. * * * The surface from the Big Hill Acres site drains in three directions. The western portions of the site drain into Bayou Costapia. Bayou Costapia empties into the Tchoutacabouffa River, which then empties into the Gulf of Mexico. The central portions of the Big Hill Acres development drained through tributaries into Old Fort Bayou Creek. And Old Fort Bayou Creek connects to Old Fort Bayou, which is a protected coastal preserve emptying into the Gulf of Mexico. And the eastern portions drain into the headwaters of Little Bluff Creek, which then connects to Bluff Creek, which flows into the Pascagoula River and on to the Gulf of Mexico. The court did not abuse its discretion in giving the CWA instructions.

QUESTIONS

1. Assume that during most of the year, there was a solid strip of land around the property in question that was never under water or saturated. Would the outcome of this case have been the same? Why or why not?
2. According to the judge, what three characteristics of jury instructions does a federal appellate court examine to determine whether a district court has abused its discretion in omitting a requested jury instruction? Which of these three characteristics was at issue in this case?

VIOLATIONS OF THE CLEAN WATER ACT Because point-source water pollution control is based on a permit system, the permits are the key to enforcement. States have primary responsibility for enforcing the permit system, subject to EPA monitoring.

Discharging emissions into navigable waters without a permit, or in violation of pollution limits under a permit, violates the CWA. Firms that have discharge permits must monitor their own performance and file discharge monitoring reports. These reports are available for public inspection. Violators must report their violations and are subject to fines. Depending on the violation, civil penalties range from $10,000 to $25,000 per day, but not more than $25,000 per violation. Lying about a violation is more serious than admitting the truth about improper discharges.

Serious and intentional violations can result in criminal prosecutions, with substantial fines and imprisonment. Every year, violators—including some corporate officers—are sent to prison for dumping toxic pollutants. As with the Clean Air Act, citizens have the right to bring lawsuits for pollution that the EPA or a state environmental agency has not addressed properly. Injunctive relief and damages can also be imposed. The polluting party can be required to clean up the pollution or pay for the cost of doing so.

Drinking Water

The Safe Drinking Water Act¹¹ requires the EPA to set maximum levels for pollutants in public water systems. Operators of public water systems must come as close as possible to meeting the EPA's standards by using the best available technology that is economically and technologically feasible. The EPA is particularly concerned about contamination from underground sources, such as pesticides and wastes leaked from landfills or disposed of in underground injection wells. Many of these substances are associated with cancer and may cause damage to the central nervous system, liver, and kidneys.

The act was amended in 1996 to give the EPA greater flexibility in setting regulatory standards governing drinking water. These amendments also imposed certain requirements on suppliers of drinking water. Each supplier must send to every household it supplies with water an annual statement describing the source of its water, the level of any contaminants contained in the water, and any possible health concerns associated with the contaminants.

Ocean Dumping

The Marine Protection, Research, and Sanctuaries Act of 1972¹² (popularly known as the Ocean Dumping Act) regulates the transportation and dumping of material (pollutants) into ocean waters. It prohibits entirely the ocean dumping of radiological, chemical, and biological warfare agents and high-level radioactive waste.

The act also established a permit program for transporting and dumping other materials, and designated certain areas as marine sanctuaries. Each violation of any provision or permit requirement in the Ocean Dumping Act may result in a civil penalty of up to $50,000. A knowing violation is a criminal offense that may result in a $50,000 fine, imprisonment for not more than a year, or both. A court may also grant an injunction to prevent an imminent or continuing violation.

Oil Pollution

When more than 10 million gallons of oil leaked into Alaska's Prince William Sound from the Exxon Valdez supertanker in 1989, Congress responded and passed the Oil Pollution Act of 1990.¹³ (At that time, the Exxon Valdez disaster was the worst oil spill in U.S. history, but the British Petroleum oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico in 2010 surpassed it.) Under this act, any onshore or offshore oil facility, oil shipper, vessel owner, or vessel operator that discharges oil into navigable waters or onto an adjoining shore may be liable for clean-up costs, as well as damages. The act created an oil clean-up and economic compensation fund, and required oil tankers using U.S. ports to be double hulled by the year 2011 (to limit the severity of accidental spills).

Under the act, damage to natural resources, private property, and the local economy, including the increased cost of providing public services, is compensable. The penalties range from $2 million to $350 million, depending on the size of the vessel and on whether the oil spill came from a vessel or an offshore facility. The party held responsible for the clean-up costs can bring a civil suit for contribution from other potentially liable parties.

TOXIC CHEMICALS

Originally, most environmental clean-up efforts were directed toward reducing smog and making water safe for fishing and swimming. Today, control of toxic chemicals used in agriculture and in industry has become increasingly important.

12. 16 U.S.C. Sections 1401–1445.

13. 33 U.S.C. Sections 2701–2761.

Pesticides and Herbicides

The Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA) of 1947¹⁴ regulates pesticides and herbicides. Under FIFRA, pesticides and herbicides must be (1) registered before they can be sold, (2) certified and used only for approved applications, and (3) used in limited quantities when applied to food crops. The EPA can cancel or suspend registration of substances that are identified as harmful and may also inspect factories where the chemicals are made. Under 1996 amendments to FIFRA, a substance is deemed harmful if human exposure to the substance, including exposure through eating food, results in a risk of one in a million (or higher) of developing cancer.¹⁵

It is a violation of FIFRA to sell a pesticide or herbicide that is either unregistered or has had its registration canceled or suspended. It is also a violation to sell a pesticide or herbicide with a false or misleading label or to destroy or deface any labeling required under the act. For example, it is an offense to sell a substance that has a chemical strength different from the concentration declared on the label. Penalties for commercial dealers include imprisonment for up to one year and a fine of up to $25,000 (producers can be fined up to $50,000). Farmers and other private users of pesticides or herbicides who violate the act are subject to a $1,000 fine and incarceration for up to thirty days. Note that a state can also regulate the sale and use of federally registered pesticides.

CASE IN POINT The EPA conditionally registered Strongarm, a weed-killing pesticide. Dow Agrosciences, LLC, sold Strongarm to Texas peanut farmers. When the farmers applied it, however, Strongarm damaged their crops and failed to control the growth of weeds. The farmers sued Dow for violations of Texas law, but the lower courts ruled that FIFRA preempted their claims. The farmers appealed to the United States Supreme Court. The Court held that under a specific provision of FIFRA, a state can regulate the sale and use of federally registered pesticides so long as the regulation does not permit anything that FIFRA prohibits.¹⁶

Toxic Substances

The first comprehensive law covering toxic substances was the Toxic Substances Control Act of 1976.¹⁷ The act was passed to regulate chemicals and chemical compounds that are known to be toxic—such as asbestos and polychlorinated biphenyls, popularly known as PCBs—and to institute investigation of any possible harmful effects from new chemical compounds.

The regulations authorize the EPA to require that manufacturers, processors, and other entities planning to use chemicals first determine their effects on human health and the environment. The EPA can regulate substances that may pose an imminent hazard or an unreasonable risk of injury to health or the environment. The EPA may require special labeling, limit the use of a substance, set production quotas, or prohibit the use of a substance altogether.

SECTION 6

HAZARDOUS WASTES

Some industrial, agricultural, and household wastes pose more serious threats than others. If not properly disposed of, these toxic chemicals may present a substantial danger to human health and the environment. If released into the environment, they may contaminate public drinking water resources.

Resource Conservation and Recovery Act

In 1976, Congress passed the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA)¹⁸ in response to growing concern about the effects of hazardous waste materials on the environment. The RCRA required the EPA to establish regulations to determine which forms of solid waste should be considered hazardous and to establish regulations to monitor and control hazardous waste disposal. The act also requires all producers of hazardous waste materials to label and package properly any hazardous waste to be transported. The RCRA was amended in 1984 and 1986 to decrease the use of land containment in the disposal of hazardous waste and to require smaller generators of hazardous waste to comply with the act.

Under the RCRA, a company may be assessed a civil penalty of up to $25,000 for each violation.¹⁹ The penalty is based on the seriousness of the violation, the probability of harm, and the extent to which the violation deviates from RCRA requirements. Criminal penalties include fines of up to $50,000 for each day of violation, imprisonment for up to two years (in most instances), or both.

Criminal fines and the time of imprisonment can be doubled for certain repeat offenders.

Superfund

In 1980, Congress passed the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act (CERCLA),²⁰ commonly known as Superfund. The basic purpose of Superfund is to regulate the clean-up of disposal sites in which hazardous waste is leaking into the environment.

CERCLA, as amended, has four primary elements:

1. It established an information-gathering and analysis system that enables the government to identify chemical dump sites and determine the appropriate action.
2. It authorized the EPA to respond to hazardous substance emergencies and to arrange for the clean-up of a leaking site directly if the persons responsible for the problem fail to clean up the site.
3. It created a Hazardous Substance Response Trust Fund to pay for the clean-up of hazardous sites using funds obtained through taxes on certain businesses. (The name Superfund is sometimes used to refer just to the trust fund, but here we use it in the broader sense to refer to CERCLA as a whole.)
4. It allows the government to recover the cost of clean-up from the persons who were (even remotely) responsible for hazardous substance releases.

POTENTIALLY RESPONSIBLE PARTIES Superfund provides that when a release or a threatened release of hazardous chemicals from a site occurs, the following persons are responsible for cleaning up the site: (1) the person who generated the wastes disposed of at the site, (2) the person who transported the wastes to the site, (3) the person who owned or operated the site at the time of the disposal, or (4) the current owner or operator. A person falling within one of these categories is referred to as a potentially responsible party (PRP). If the PRPs do not clean up the site, EPA can clean up the site and recover the clean-up costs from the PRPs.

Superfund imposes strict liability on PRPs and that liability cannot be avoided through transfer of ownership. Thus, selling a site at which hazardous wastes were disposed does not relieve the seller of liability, and the buyer also becomes liable for the clean-up. Liability also extends to those that merge with or buy corporations that have violated CERCLA. Although a parent corporation is not automatically liable for the violations of its subsidiary, it can be held liable if the subsidiary was merely a shell company or if it participated in or controlled the facility.²¹

JOINT AND SEVERAL LIABILITY Liability under Superfund is usually joint and several—that is, a PRP who generated only a fraction of the hazardous waste disposed of at the site may nevertheless be liable for all of the clean-up costs. CERCLA authorizes a party who has incurred clean-up costs to bring a “contribution action” against any other person who is liable or potentially liable for a percentage of the costs.

MINIMIZING LIABILITY One way for a business to minimize its potential liability under Superfund is to conduct environmental compliance audits of its own operations regularly. A business can perform internal investigations of its own operations and lands to determine whether any environmental hazards exist.

The EPA encourages companies to conduct self-audits and promptly detect, disclose, and correct wrongdoing. Companies that do so are subject to lighter penalties (fines may be reduced as much as 75 percent) for violations of environmental laws. Under EPA guidelines, the EPA will waive all fines if a small company corrects environmental violations within 180 days after being notified of the violations (or 360 days if pollution-prevention techniques are involved). The policy does not apply to criminal violations of environmental laws, though, or to actions that pose a significant threat to public health, safety, or the environment.

DEFENSES There are a few defenses to liability under CERCLA. The most important is the innocent landowner defense.²² Under this defense, an innocent property owner may be able to avoid liability by showing that he or she had no contractual or employment relationship with the person who released the hazardous substance on the land. Thus, if the property was transferred by contract from the third party who disposed of the substances to the current owner, the defense normally will not be available. To assert the defense, the landowner must be able to show that at the time the property was acquired, she or he had no reason to know that hazardous substances had been disposed of on it. The landowner must also show that at the time of the purchase, she or he undertook all appropriate investigation into the previous ownership and uses of the property to determine whether there was reason to be concerned about hazardous substances. In effect, this defense protects only property owners who took precautions and investigated the possibility of environmental hazards at the time they bought the property.

20. 42 U.S.C. Sections 9601–9675.

21. The landmark case establishing the liability of a parent corporation under CERCLA is United States v. Bestfoods, 524 U.S. 51, 118 S.Ct. 1876, 141 L.Ed.2d 43 (1998).

22. 42 U.S.C. Section 9601(35)(B).

REVIEWING

Environmental Law

In the early part of the first decade of the 2000s, residents of Lake Caliope, Minnesota, began noticing an unusually high number of lung ailments among their population. A group of concerned local citizens pooled their resources and commissioned a study of the frequency of these health conditions per capita in Lake Caliope as compared with national averages. The study concluded that residents of Lake Caliope experienced four to seven times the rate in the frequency of asthma, bronchitis, and emphysema as the population nationwide. During the study period, citizens began expressing concerns about the large volumes of smog emitted by the Cotton Design apparel manufacturing plant on the outskirts of town. The plant had opened its production facility two miles east of town beside the Tawakoni River in 1999 and employed seventy full-time workers by 2010.

Just downstream on the Tawakoni River, the city of Lake Caliope operated a public water works facility, which supplied all city residents with water. In August 2010, the Minnesota Pollution Control Agency required Cotton Design to install new equipment to control air and water pollution. In May 2011, citizens brought a lawsuit in a Minnesota state court against Cotton Design for various respiratory ailments allegedly caused or compounded by smog from Cotton Design's factory. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Under the common law, what would each plaintiff be required to identify in order to be given relief by the court?
2. Are air-quality regulations typically overseen by federal, state, or local governments?
3. What standard for limiting emissions into the air does Cotton Design's pollution-control equipment have to meet?
4. What information must the city send to every household that it supplies with water?

 DEBATE THIS: The courts should reject all cases in which the wetlands in question do not consist of actual bodies of water that exist during the entire year.

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

46-1. Clean Air Act Current scientific knowledge indicates that there is no safe level of exposure to a cancer-causing agent. In theory, even one molecule of such a substance has the potential for causing cancer. Section 112 of the Clean Air Act requires that all cancer-causing substances be regulated to ensure a margin of safety. Some environmental groups have argued that all emissions of such substances must be eliminated if a margin of safety is to be reached. Such a total elimination would likely shut down many major U.S. industries. Should the Environmental Protection Agency totally eliminate all emissions of cancer-causing chemicals? Discuss.

46-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Environmental Laws.

Fruitade, Inc., is a processor of a soft drink called Freshen Up. Fruitade uses returnable bottles, which it cleans with a special acid to allow for further beverage processing. The acid is diluted with water and then allowed to pass into a navigable stream. Fruitade crushes its broken bottles and throws the crushed glass into the stream. Discuss fully any environmental laws that Fruitade has violated.

- For a sample answer to Question 46-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

46-3. Environmental Laws Moonbay is a home-building corporation that primarily develops retirement communities. Farmtex owns a number of feedlots in Sunny Valley. Moonbay purchased 20,000 acres of farmland in the same area and began building and selling homes on this acreage. In the meantime, Farmtex continued to expand its feedlot business, and eventually only 500 feet separated the two operations. Because of the odor and flies from the feedlots, Moonbay found it difficult to sell the homes in its development. Moonbay wants to enjoin (prevent) Farmtex from operating its feedlot in the vicinity of the retirement home development. Under what common law theory would Moonbay file this action? Has Farmtex violated any federal environmental laws? Discuss.

46-4. Environmental Impact Statement Greers Ferry Lake is in Arkansas, and its shoreline is under the management of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which is part of the U.S. Department of Defense (DOD). The Corps's 2000 Shoreline Management Plan (SMP) rezoned numerous areas along the lake, authorized the Corps to issue permits for the construction of new boat docks in the rezoned areas, increased by 300 percent the area around habitable structures that could be cleared of vegetation, and instituted a Wildlife Enhancement Permit to allow limited modifications of the shoreline. In relation to the SMP's adoption, the Corps issued a Finding of No Significant Impact, which declared that no environmental impact statement (EIS) was necessary. The Corps issued thirty-two boat dock construction permits under the SMP before Save Greers Ferry Lake, Inc., filed a suit in a federal district court against the DOD, asking the court to, among other things, stop the Corps from acting under the SMP and order it to prepare an EIS. What are the requirements for an EIS? Is an EIS needed in this case? Explain. [Save Greers Ferry Lake, Inc. v. Department of Defense, 255 F.3d 498 (8th Cir. 2001)]

46-5. CERCLA Beginning in 1926, Marietta Dyestuffs Co. operated an industrial facility in Marietta, Ohio, to make dyes and other chemicals. In 1944, Dyestuffs became part of American Home Products Corp. (AHP), which sold the Marietta facility to American Cyanamid Co. in 1946. In 1950, AHP sold the rest of the Dyestuffs assets and all of its stock to Goodrich Co., which immediately liquidated the acquired corporation. Goodrich continued to operate the dissolved corporation's business, however. Cyanamid continued to make chemicals at the Marietta facility, and in 1993, it created Cytec Industries, Inc., which expressly assumed all environmental liabilities associated with Cyanamid's ownership and operation of the facility. Cytec spent nearly $25 million on clean-up costs and filed a suit in a federal district court against Goodrich to recover, under CERCLA, a portion of the costs attributable to the clean-up of hazardous wastes that may have been discarded at the site between 1926 and 1946. Cytec filed a motion for summary judgment in its favor. Should the court grant Cytec's motion? Explain. [Cytec Industries, Inc. v. B. F. Goodrich Co., 196 F.Supp.2d 644 (S.D. Ohio 2002)]

46-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER: Superfund.

*William Gurley was the president and majority stockholder in Gurley Refining Co. (GRC). GRC bought used oil, treated it, and sold it. The refining process created a by-product residue of oily waste. GRC disposed of this waste by dumping it at, among other locations, a landfill in West Memphis, Arkansas. In February 1992, after detecting hazardous chemicals at the site, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) asked Gurley about his assets, the generators of the material disposed of at the landfill, site operations, and the structure of GRC. Gurley refused to respond, except to suggest that the EPA ask GRC. In October, the EPA placed the site on its clean-up list and again asked Gurley for information. When he still refused to respond, the EPA filed a suit in a federal district court against him, asking the court to impose a civil penalty. In February 1999, Gurley finally answered the EPA's questions. Under CERCLA, a court may impose a civil penalty "not to exceed $25,000 for each day of noncompliance against any person who unreasonably fails to comply" with an information request. Should the court assess a penalty in this case? Why or why not? [United States v. Gurley, 384 F.3d 316 (6th Cir. 2004)]*

46-7. Clean Water Act The Anacostia River, which flows through Washington, D.C., is one of the ten most polluted rivers in the country. For bodies of water such as the Anacostia, the Clean Water Act requires states (which, under the act, include the District of Columbia) to set a “total maximum daily load” (TMDL) for pollutants. A TMDL is to be set “at a level necessary to implement the applicable water-quality standards with seasonal variations.” The Anacostia contains biochemical pollutants that consume oxygen, putting the river’s aquatic life at risk for suffocation. In addition, the river is murky, stunting the growth of plants that rely on sunlight and impairing recreational use. The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) approved one TMDL limiting the annual discharge of oxygen-depleting pollutants and a second limiting the seasonal discharge of pollutants contributing to turbidity. Neither TMDL limited daily discharges. Friends of the Earth, Inc. (FoE), asked a federal district court to review the TMDLs. What is FoE’s best argument in this dispute? What is the EPA’s likely response? What should the court rule, and why? [Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Environmental Protection Agency, 446 F.3d 140 (D.C.Cir. 2006)]

46-8. Environmental Impact Statement The fourth largest crop in the United States is alfalfa, of which 5 percent is exported to Japan. RoundUp Ready alfalfa is genetically engineered to resist glyphosate, the active ingredient in the herbicide RoundUp. The U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) regulates genetically engineered agricultural products through the Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service (APHIS). APHIS concluded that RoundUp Ready alfalfa does not have any harmful health effects on humans or livestock and deregulated it. Geertson Seed Farms and others filed a suit in a federal district court against Mike Johanns (then the secretary of the USDA) and others, asserting that APHIS’s decision required the preparation of an environmental impact statement (EIS). The plaintiffs argued, among other things, that the introduction of RoundUp Ready alfalfa might significantly decrease the availability of or even eliminate, all nongenetically engineered varieties. The plaintiffs were concerned that the RoundUp Ready alfalfa might contaminate standard alfalfa because alfalfa is pollinated by bees, which can travel as far as two miles from a pollen source. If contamination occurred, farmers would not be able to market “contaminated” varieties as “organic,” which would affect the sales of “organic” livestock and exports to Japan, which does not allow the import of glyphosate-resistant alfalfa. Should an EIS be prepared in this case? Why or why not? [Geertson Seed Farms v. Johanns, ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (N.D.Cal. 2007)]

46-9. Environmental Impact Statement The U.S. National Park Service (NPS) manages the Grand Canyon National Park in Arizona under a management plan that is subject to periodic review. In 2006, after nine years of background work and the completion of a comprehensive environmental impact statement, the NPS issued a new management plan for the park. The plan allowed for the continued use of rafts on the Colorado River, which runs through the Grand Canyon. The number of rafts was limited, however. Several environmental groups criticized the plan because they felt that it still allowed too many rafts on the river. The groups asked a federal appellate court to overturn the plan, claiming that it violated the wilderness status of the national park. When can a federal court overturn a determination by an agency such as the NPS? Explain. [River Runners for Wilderness v. Martin, 593 F.3d 1064 (9th Cir. 2010)]

46-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS: Clean Air Act.

In the Clean Air Act, Congress allowed California, which has particular problems with clean air, to adopt its own standard for emissions from cars and trucks, subject to the approval of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) according to certain criteria. Congress also allowed other states to adopt California’s standard after the EPA’s approval. In 2004, in an effort to address global warming, the California Air Resources Board amended the state’s standard to attain “the maximum feasible and cost-effective reduction of GHG [greenhouse gas] emissions from motor vehicles.” The regulation, which applies to new passenger vehicles and light-duty trucks for 2009 and later, imposes decreasing limits on emissions of carbon dioxide through 2016. While EPA approval was pending, Vermont and other states adopted similar standards. Green Mountain Chrysler Plymouth Dodge Jeep and other auto dealers, automakers, and associations of automakers filed a suit in a federal district court against George Crombie (then the secretary of the Vermont Agency of Natural Resources) and others, seeking relief from the state regulations. [Green Mountain Chrysler Plymouth Dodge Jeep v. Crombie, 508 F.Supp.2d 295 (D.Vt. 2007)]

The plaintiffs argued, among other things, that the EPCA, which prohibits states from adopting separate fuel economy standards, preempts Vermont’s GHG regulation. Do the GHG rules equate to the fuel economy standards? Discuss.
- (b) Do Vermont’s rules tread on the efforts of the federal government to address global warming internationally? Who should regulate GHG emissions? The federal government? The state governments? Both? Neither? Why?

CHAPTER 47

Antitrust Law

Today's antitrust laws are the direct descendants of common law actions intended to limit restraints of trade (agreements between firms that have the effect of reducing competition in the marketplace). Concern over monopolistic practices arose following the Civil War with the growth of large corporate enterprises that attempted to reduce or eliminate competition. They did this by legally tying themselves together in business trusts, a type of business entity described on page 749 in Chapter 38. The participants in the most famous trust—the Standard Oil trust of the late 1800s—transferred their stock to a trustee and received trust certificates in exchange. The trustee then made decisions fixing prices, controlling production, and determining the control of exclusive geographic markets for all of the oil companies that were members of the trust. Some argued that the trust wielded so much economic power that corporations outside the trust could not compete effectively.

Many states attempted to control such monopolistic behavior by enacting statutes outlawing the use of trusts. That is why all of the laws that regulate economic competition in the United States today are referred to as antitrust laws. At the national level, Congress recognized the problem in 1887 and passed the Interstate Commerce Act,¹ followed by the Sherman Antitrust Act² in 1890. In 1914, Congress passed the Clayton Act³ and the Federal Trade Commission Act⁴ to further curb anticompetitive or unfair business practices. Congress subsequently amended the 1914 acts to broaden and strengthen their coverage, and they continue to be an important element in the legal environment in which businesses operate.

This chapter examines these major antitrust statutes, focusing particularly on the Sherman Act and the Clayton Act, as amended, and the types of activities they prohibit. Remember in reading this chapter that the basis of antitrust legislation is the desire to foster competition. The law prohibits anticompetitive practices because of our belief that competition leads to lower prices, generates more product information, and results in a more equitable distribution of wealth between consumers and producers.

THE SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT

The author of the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890, Senator John Sherman, was the brother of the famed Civil War general and a recognized financial authority. He had been concerned for years about what he saw as diminishing competition within U.S. industry and the emergence of monopolies. He told Congress that the Sherman Act “does not announce a new principle of law, but applies old and well-recognized principles of the common law.”⁵

The common law regarding trade regulation was not always consistent. Certainly, it was not very familiar to the members of Congress. The public concern over large business integrations and trusts was familiar, however, and in 1890 Congress passed “An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies”—more commonly referred to as the Sherman Antitrust Act, or simply the Sherman Act.

5. 21 Congressional Record 2456 (1890).

Major Provisions of the Sherman Act

Sections 1 and 2 contain the main provisions of the Sherman Act:

1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal [and is a felony punishable by fine and/or imprisonment].
2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a felony [and is similarly punishable].

Differences between Section 1 and Section 2

These two sections of the Sherman Act are quite different. Section 1 requires two or more persons, as a person cannot contract, combine, or conspire alone. Thus, the essence of the illegal activity is the act of joining together. Section 2, though, can apply either to one person or to two or more persons because it refers to “every person.” Thus, unilateral conduct can result in a violation of Section 2.

The cases brought to the courts under Section 1 of the Sherman Act differ from those brought under Section 2. Section 1 cases are often concerned with finding an agreement (written or oral) that leads to a restraint of trade. Section 2 cases deal with the structure of a monopoly that exists in the marketplace. The term monopoly generally is used to describe a market in which there is a single seller or a very limited number of sellers. Whereas Section 1 focuses on agreements that are restrictive—that is, agreements that have a wrongful purpose—Section 2 looks at the so-called misuse of monopoly power in the marketplace.

Monopoly power exists when a firm has an extreme amount of market power—the ability to affect the market price of its product. Both Section 1 and Section 2 seek to curtail market practices that result in undesired monopoly pricing and output behavior. For a case to be brought under Section 2, however, the “threshold” or “necessary” amount of monopoly power must already exist.

Jurisdictional Requirements

The Sherman Act applies only to restraints that have a significant impact on interstate commerce. Courts have generally held that any activity that substantially affects interstate commerce falls within the scope of the Sherman Act. As will be discussed later in this chapter, the Sherman Act also extends to U.S. nationals abroad that are engaged in activities that affect U.S. foreign commerce. State laws regulate local restraints on competition.

SECTION 2

SECTION 1 OF THE SHERMAN ACT

The underlying assumption of Section 1 of the Sherman Act is that society’s welfare is harmed if rival firms are permitted to join in an agreement that consolidates their market power or otherwise restrains competition. The types of trade restraints that Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits generally fall into two broad categories: horizontal restraints and vertical restraints, both of which will be discussed shortly. First, though, we look at the rules that the courts may apply when assessing the anticompetitive impact of alleged restraints of trade.

Per Se Violations versus the Rule of Reason

Some restraints are so substantially anticompetitive that they are deemed per se violations—illegal per se (inherently)—under Section 1. Other agreements, however, even though they result in enhanced market power, do not unreasonably restrain trade and are therefore lawful. Using what is called the rule of reason, the courts analyze anticompetitive agreements that allegedly violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act to determine whether they may, in fact, constitute reasonable restraints of trade. The need for a rule-of-reason analysis of some agreements in restraint of trade is obvious—if the rule of reason had not been developed, almost any business agreement could conceivably be held to violate the Sherman Act.

When analyzing an alleged Section 1 violation under the rule of reason, a court will consider several factors. These factors include the purpose of the agreement, the parties' power to implement the agreement to achieve that purpose, and the effect or potential effect of the agreement on competition. A court might also consider whether the parties could have relied on less restrictive means to achieve their purpose.

In the following case, the United States Supreme Court had to decide if a Section 1 violation had occurred. In addition, the Court had to determine whether the violation should have been considered a per se violation or whether it should have been analyzed under the rule of reason.

American Needle, Inc. v. National Football League

Supreme Court of the United States, ___ U.S. ___, 130 S.Ct. 2201, ___ L.Ed.2d ___ (2010).
www.supremecourt.gov^a

BACKGROUND AND FACTS • The National Football League (NFL) includes thirty-two separately owned professional football teams. Each team has its own name, colors, and logo, and owns related intellectual property. In 1963, the teams formed National Football League Properties (NFLP) to develop, license, and market their trademarked items, such as caps and jerseys. Until 2000, the NFLP granted nonexclusive licenses to a number of vendors, permitting them to manufacture and sell apparel bearing team insignias. American Needle, Inc., was one of those licensees. In late 2000, the teams authorized the NFLP to grant exclusive licenses, and the NFLP granted Reebok International, Ltd., an exclusive ten-year license to manufacture and sell trademarked headwear for all thirty-two teams. It thereafter declined to renew American Needle's nonexclusive license. American Needle brought an action in a federal district court alleging that the agreements involving the NFL, its teams, the NFLP, and Reebok violated Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. In response, the defendants argued that they were incapable of conspiring within the meaning of Section 1 "because they are a single economic enterprise" as far as the marketing of trademarked goods was concerned. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. American Needle appealed, and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed the trial court's decision. American Needle appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

As the case comes to us, we have only a narrow issue to decide: whether the NFL respondents are capable of engaging in a "contract, combination * * * or conspiracy," as defined by Section 1 of the Sherman Act, or * * * whether the alleged activity by the NFL respondents "must be viewed as that of a single enterprise for purposes of Section 1."

* * * *

* * * The question is whether the agreement [among the teams with respect to the marketing of their intellectual property] joins together "independent centers of decision-making." If it does, the entities are capable of conspiring under Section 1, and the Court must decide whether the restraint of trade is an unreasonable and therefore illegal one.

* * * Each of the [NFL] teams is a substantial, independently owned, and independently managed business. "Their general corporate actions are guided or determined" by "separate corporate consciousnesses," and "their objectives are" not "common." The teams compete with one another, not only on the playing field, but to attract fans, for gate receipts and for contracts with managerial and playing personnel.

CASE CONTINUES ▶

CASE 47.1 CONTINUED ▶ Directly relevant to this case, the teams compete in the market for intellectual property. To a firm making hats, the Saints and the Colts are two potentially competing suppliers of valuable trademarks. When each NFL team licenses its intellectual property, it is not pursuing the “common interests of the whole” league but is instead pursuing interests of each “corporation itself”; teams are acting as “separate economic actors pursuing separate economic interests,” and each team therefore is a potential “independent center of decision-making.” Decisions by NFL teams to license their separately owned trademarks collectively and to only one vendor are decisions that “depriv[e] the marketplace of independent centers of decision-making,” and therefore of actual or potential competition.

* * * *

Respondents argue that * * * they constitute a single entity because without their cooperation, there would be no NFL football. * * * But the Court of Appeals’ reasoning is unpersuasive.

The justification for cooperation is not relevant to whether that cooperation is concerted or independent action. A “contract, combination * * * or conspiracy” that is necessary or useful to a joint venture is still a “contract, combination * * * or conspiracy” if it “deprives the marketplace of independent centers of decision-making.” Any joint venture involves multiple sources of economic power cooperating to produce a product. And for many such ventures, the participation of others is necessary. But that does not mean that necessity of cooperation transforms concerted action into independent action; a nut and a bolt can only operate together, but an agreement between nut and bolt manufacturers is still subject to Section 1 analysis. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Football teams that need to cooperate are not trapped by antitrust law. * * * The fact that NFL teams share an interest in making the entire league successful and profitable, and that they must cooperate in the production and scheduling of games, provides a perfectly sensible justification for making a host of collective decisions. But the conduct at issue in this case is still concerted activity under the Sherman Act that is subject to Section 1 analysis.

When “restraints on competition are essential if the product is to be available at all,” per se rules of illegality are inapplicable, and instead the restraint must be judged according to the flexible Rule of Reason. In such instances, the agreement is likely to survive the Rule of Reason. And depending upon the concerted activity in question, the Rule of Reason may not require a detailed analysis; it “can sometimes be applied in the twinkling of an eye.”

* * * *

Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

DECISION AND REMEDY • The United States Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the court of appeals and remanded the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. The agreement among the NFL teams to license their intellectual property exclusively through the NFLP to Reebok constituted concerted activity subject to Section 1 analysis.

THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT DIMENSION • What did the Court mean when it stated that “the agreement is likely to survive the Rule of Reason”?

THE ECONOMIC DIMENSION • Does the Court’s ruling mean that the NFL teams’ activities with respect to the marketing of their intellectual property through the NFLP were illegal? Explain.

Horizontal Restraints

The term horizontal restraint is encountered frequently in antitrust law. A horizontal restraint is any agreement that in some way restrains competition between rival firms competing in the same market.

PRICE FIXING Any agreement among competitors to fix prices, or price-fixing agreement, constitutes a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

Perhaps the definitive case regarding price-fixing agreements is still the 1940 case of *United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co.*⁶ In that case, a group of independent oil producers in Texas and Louisiana were caught between falling demand due to the Great Depression of the 1930s and increasing supply from newly discovered oil fields in the region. In response to these conditions, a group of the major refining companies agreed to buy “distress” gasoline (excess supplies) from the independents so as to dispose of it in an “orderly manner.” Although there was no explicit agreement as to price, it was clear that the purpose of the agreement was to limit the supply of gasoline on the market and thereby raise prices.

There may have been good reasons for the agreement. Nonetheless, the United States Supreme Court recognized the potentially adverse effects that such an agreement could have on open and free competition. The Court held that the reasonableness of a price-fixing agreement is never a defense. Any agreement that restricts output or artificially fixes price is a per se violation of Section 1.

CASE IN POINT The manufacturer of the prescription drug Cardizem CD, which can help prevent heart attacks, was about to lose its patent on the drug. Another company had developed a generic version in anticipation of the patent’s expiration. After the two firms became involved in litigation over the patent, the first company agreed to pay the second company $40 million per year not to market the generic version until their dispute was resolved. This agreement was held to be a per se violation of the Sherman Act because it restrained competition between rival firms and delayed the entry of generic versions of Cardizem into the market.⁷

GROUP BOYCOTTS A group boycott is an agreement by two or more sellers to refuse to deal with (boycott) a particular person or firm. Traditionally, the courts have considered group boycotts to constitute per se violations of Section 1 of the Sherman Act because they involve concerted action. To prove a violation of Section 1, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the boycott or joint refusal to deal was undertaken with the intention of eliminating competition or preventing entry into a given market. Although most boycotts are illegal, a few, such as group boycotts against a supplier for political reasons, may be protected under the First Amendment right to freedom of expression.

HORIZONTAL MARKET DIVISION It is a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act for competitors to divide up territories or customers. For example, manufacturers A, B, and C compete against one another in the states of Kansas, Nebraska, and Oklahoma. They agree that A will sell products only in Kansas, B only in Nebraska, and C only in Oklahoma. This concerted action reduces costs and allows each of the three (assuming there is no other competition) to raise the price of the goods sold in its own state. The same violation would take place if A, B, and C agreed that A would sell only to institutional purchasers (such as school districts, universities, state agencies and departments, and cities) in the three states, B only to wholesalers, and C only to retailers.

TRADE ASSOCIATIONS Businesses in the same general industry or profession frequently organize trade associations to pursue common interests. A trade association may engage in various joint activities, such as exchanging information, representing the members’ business interests before governmental bodies, conducting advertising campaigns, and setting regulatory standards to govern the industry or profession. Generally, the rule of reason is applied to many of these horizontal actions. If a court finds that a trade association practice or agreement that restrains trade is nonetheless sufficiently beneficial both to the association and to the public, it may deem the restraint reasonable.

In concentrated industries, however, trade associations can be, and have been, used as a means to facilitate anticompetitive actions, such as fixing prices or allocating markets. A concentrated industry is one in which either a single firm or a small number of firms control a large percentage of market sales. When trade association agreements have substantially anticompetitive effects, a court will consider them to be in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

JOINT VENTURES Joint ventures undertaken by competitors are also subject to antitrust laws. As discussed in Chapter 38, a joint venture is an undertaking by two or more individuals or firms for a specific purpose. If a joint venture does not involve price fixing or market divisions, the agreement will be analyzed under the rule of reason. Whether the venture will then be upheld under Section 1 depends on an overall assessment of the purposes of the venture, a strict analysis of the potential benefits relative to the likely harms, and, in some cases, an assessment of whether there are less restrictive alternatives for achieving the same goals.⁸

7. In re Cardizem CD Antitrust Litigation, 332 F.3d 896 (6th Cir. 2003).

8. For a classic example of how courts judge joint ventures under the rule of reason, see United States v. Morgan, 118 F.Supp. 621 (S.D.N.Y. 1953).

Vertical Restraints

A vertical restraint of trade results from an agreement between firms at different levels in the manufacturing and distribution process. In contrast to horizontal relationships, which occur at the same level of operation, vertical relationships encompass the entire chain of production. The chain of production normally includes the purchase of inputs, basic manufacturing, distribution to wholesalers, and eventual sale of a product at the retail level. For some products, these distinct phases are carried on by different firms. In other instances, a single firm carries out two or more of the separate functional phases. Such enterprises are said to be vertically integrated firms.

Even though firms operating at different functional levels are not in direct competition with one another, they are in competition with other firms. Thus, agreements between firms standing in a vertical relationship may affect competition. Some vertical restraints are per se violations of Section 1. Others are judged under the rule of reason.

TERRITORIAL OR CUSTOMER RESTRICTIONS In arranging for the distribution of its products, a manufacturing firm often wishes to insulate dealers from direct competition with other dealers selling its products. To this end, the manufacturer may institute territorial restrictions or attempt to prohibit wholesalers or retailers from reselling the products to certain classes of buyers, such as competing retailers.

A firm may have legitimate reasons for imposing such territorial or customer restrictions. For example, a computer manufacturer may wish to prevent a dealer from reducing costs and undercutting rivals by offering computers without promotion or customer service, while relying on a nearby dealer to provide these services. In this situation, the cost-cutting dealer reaps the benefits (sales of the product) paid for by other dealers who undertake promotion and arrange for customer service. By not providing customer service, the cost-cutting dealer may also harm the manufacturer's reputation.

Territorial and customer restrictions were once considered per se violations of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.⁹ In 1977, however, the United States Supreme Court reconsidered the treatment accorded to such vertical restrictions and held that they should be judged under the rule of reason.

CASE IN POINT GTE Sylvania, Inc., a manufacturer of television sets, limited the number of retail franchises that it granted in any given geographic area. It also required each franchisee to sell only Sylvania products from the location at which it was franchised. Sylvania retained sole discretion to increase the number of retailers in an area. When Sylvania decided to open a new franchise, it terminated the franchise of Continental T.V., Inc., an existing franchisee in that area that would have been in competition with the new franchise. Continental filed a lawsuit claiming that Sylvania's vertically restrictive franchise system violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act. The United States Supreme Court found that "vertical restrictions promote interbrand competition by allowing the manufacturer to achieve certain efficiencies in the distribution of his products." Therefore, Sylvania's vertical system, which was not price restrictive, did not constitute a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.¹⁰

The Continental case above marked a definite shift from rigid characterization of territorial and customer restrictions to a more flexible, economic analysis of these vertical restraints under the rule of reason. This rule is still applied in most vertical restraint cases.

RESALE PRICE MAINTENANCE AGREEMENTS An agreement between a manufacturer and a distributor or retailer in which the manufacturer specifies what the retail prices of its products must be is known as a resale price maintenance agreement. Such agreements were once considered to be per se violations of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, but in 1997 the United States Supreme Court ruled that maximum resale price maintenance agreements should be judged under the rule of reason.¹¹ The setting of a maximum price that retailers and distributors can charge for a manufacturer's products may sometimes increase competition and benefit consumers.

The question before the United States Supreme Court in the following case was whether minimum resale price maintenance agreements should be treated as per se violations.

Leegin Creative Leather Products, Inc. v. PSKS, Inc.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * * *

Petitioner, Leegin Creative Leather Products, Inc. (Leegin), designs, manufactures, and distributes leather goods and accessories. In 1991, Leegin began to sell [products] under the brand name “Brighton.”

Respondent, PSKS, Inc. (PSKS), operates Kay’s Kloset, a women’s apparel store in Lewisville, Texas. * * * It first started purchasing Brighton goods from Leegin in 1995.

* * * * *

In December 2002, Leegin discovered Kay’s Kloset had been marking down Brighton’s entire line by 20 percent. * * * Leegin stopped selling [Brighton products] to the store.

PSKS sued Leegin in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Texas. It alleged, among other claims, that Leegin had violated the antitrust laws by “enter[ing] into agreements with retailers to charge only those prices fixed by Leegin.” * * * [The court] entered judgment against Leegin in the amount of $3,975,000.80.

The [U.S.] Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed. * * * We granted certiorari * * * .

* * * * *

The rule of reason is the accepted standard for testing whether a practice restrains trade in violation of [Section] 1 [of the Sherman Act].

* * * * *

*Resort to per se rules is confined to restraints * * * that would always or almost always tend to restrict competition and decrease output. To justify a per se prohibition a restraint must have manifestly anticompetitive effects, and lack * * * any redeeming virtue.* [Emphasis added.]

As a consequence, the per se rule is appropriate only after courts have had considerable experience with the type of restraint at issue, and only if courts can predict with confidence that it would be invalidated in all or almost all instances under the rule of reason.

* * * * *

The reasoning of the Court’s more recent jurisprudence has rejected the rationales on which [the application of the per se rule to minimum resale price maintenance agreements] was based. * * * [These rationales were] based on formalistic legal doctrine rather than demonstrable economic effect.

* * * Furthermore [the Court] treated vertical agreements a manufacturer makes with its distributors as analogous to a horizontal combination among competing distributors. * * * Our recent cases formulate antitrust principles in accordance with the appreciated differences in economic effect between vertical and horizontal agreements * * * .

* * * * *

The justifications for vertical price restraints are similar to those for other vertical restraints. Minimum resale price maintenance

*can stimulate interbrand competition * * * by reducing intrabrand competition * * * .* The promotion of interbrand competition is important because the primary purpose of the antitrust laws is to protect this type of competition. * * * Resale price maintenance also has the potential to give consumers more options so that they can choose among low-price, low-service brands; high-price, high-service brands; and brands that fall in between. [Emphasis added.]

* * * * *
